Obese men have never been presented as sexually attractive in any magazine or advertisement. The mockery of obese men has never been called body shaming. Women who express their lack of interest in fat men are not themselves accused of body shaming or having shallow values.

Baldness is another issue men simply have to accept with a sigh of resignation and zero empathy or support. I remember when I was thinning in my late twenties how both men and women felt it was entirely appropriate to make comments about my impending baldness -often in the most public of forums which clearly only increased my humiliation and self-consciousness.

I noted that some of the women who made observations about my hair were borderline obese and I often wondered at their lack of self-awareness and what the ramifications of a barbed retort focusing on the size of their backsides would have been.

I know. I would have been branded a vicious, unthinking brute who insensitively mocked a woman's body. Her unasked-for comments on my thatch would not even have registered on the radar of most people as anything other than a bit of fun.

Back to the penis.

There are endless references to penis size in our culture which every young boy absorbs. Size does matter is regularly used in advertisements be they about chocolate bars or flat screen televisions.

Countless comedy shows and movies make veiled and not so veiled references to penis size and feminists most common retort when their twisted world view is eviscerated by a male is to attack the man's penis size. Clementine Ford does it on a regular basis.

[image]

What brought this issue to a head for me is a rather innocuous weekly tv show titled, Gogglebox. The whole premise of this show sounds absurd but it simply amounts to five or six different families watching television in their loungerooms. We, the viewers, get to see and hear their reactions to popular shows which we all have access to on our own tv screens.

Almost every week, a young female couple (friends) who share a home and another trio of women-a grandmother, daughter and granddaughter make comments about men's bodies with particular emphasis on their penises. The couple ask each other who they would and wouldn't "do it" with and the feminine trio deride the size of penises on a regular basis whenever an episode of Bondi Rescue or any other show where men are semi naked is showing. They repeatedly comment on the men's genitals.

These are the culprits
What is stunningly apparent is the fact that the many males, young or old, on Gogglebox, rarely make sexual references about the women they see. My heavily tattooed and very open-minded son stopped watching the show some time ago because he was so disgusted by the endless penis ogling and judging and the even more maddening double standards in play.

The worst example of this behavior occurred only a week or so ago. Sixty Minutes (The Australian version) had a much- hyped interview with Stormy Daniels. During the interview President Trump's penis became the major focus of the discussion.

As soon as the interview began, the women on Gogglebox were calling out:

"I'll bet it's small!"

"Yuk-how could you have sex with him?"

The interview included Daniels detailed descriptions of Trump's penis which mentioned its size and unusual shape.

This also garnered "Yuk's" and "Ooohs" from the females.

All of these women are proud and loud feminists. One regularly wears her girl power t-shirt when sitting on the couch and they endlessly deride and joke about men. The others have openly proclaimed their feminist leanings on more than once occasion.

I cannot begin to fathom what would have occurred if a male journalist interviewed a male escort agent who had slept with Hillary and written a detailed description of her vaginal flaps and breasts. Can you imagine the escort disparagingly referring to Hillary's unusual and rather ugly vaginal flaps and her saggy breasts? Stretch the boundaries of your mind and picture a popular television program which cuts to the reactions of the males who feature in it reacting with disgust to the descriptions and laughingly expressing their disbelief at the notion that any man would sleep with her.

[image]Trump has been depicted naked in statues placed in public areas where hundreds of people have posed with their fingers pinching the tiny penis sculpted so lovingly by the artist. Countless women posed next to it making their disgust and derision very clear.

[image]

Now all of this could be considered the simple functioning of a society where freedom of speech and freedom of expression are highly valued. However, when such freedoms only apply to the mockery and denigration of one gender, it must be called out.

What makes the recent fascination with Trump's penis so ironic is the endless calls of body shaming and sexism being made by female politicians both here in Australia and in America.

Our former Prime Minister, Julia Gillard used the gender card whenever she faced criticism of her policies or integrity. She sat on stage with her soulmate Hillary a month or two ago and they whined in unison about the terrible way in which women in politics are treated. They raised the issue of online trolls and rape threats.

This is a home run for women who wish to be victims.

They know such threats are the hollow rantings of a tiny fringe of anonymous trolls and ignore entirely the fact that male politicians receive threats of violence and intimidation at a higher rate than females. But no-one cares about this kind of abuse. Why is rape an inherently more heinous threat than that of castration or murder? Can male politicians call these very personal and violent threats, sexist? Apparently not. There doesn't appear to be any category for the online abuse of men other than "miscellaneous" or perhaps, a new category-"shit happens-get over it"

I think what is most disturbing about women like Gillard and Clinton is that they really believe they are being treated unfairly. They are so caught up in the feminist bubble they don't see even the most outrageous sexism faced by male politicians like Trump. He has had his hair, hair style, skin color, sexual performance, weight and penis size endlessly discussed and endlessly ridiculed and not one person in the media has called it out as being sexist. A female politician can have her policy critiqued or corruption exposed and she immediately brands the attacks sexist. Even more disturbing is the fact that such absurd claims will always be roundly supported by many in the media.

It is insane. Just imagine Richard Nixon calling the journalists who exposed his criminal behavior, sexist. Yet this is the absurd reality in today's politics. If you are a woman in Washington it is your automatic 'go to" card when the shit hits the fan.

CNN devoted interviews to the subject of Trump's penis. And they discussed it as solemnly as they do the outbreak of war or a natural disaster.

I know I say this with monotonous regularity but it needs to be said. Try and imagine a "serious" news network devoting whole segments of their program to discussing Hillary's vaginal flaps with a male gigolo.

This is the level of utter Orwellian hypocrisy we have reached in the western world.

Two years ago a female host of a popular radio show here in Melbourne loudly declared that we should all celebrate the anniversary of the day Bobbitt had his penis hacked off by his angry wife.

I heard her laughing and making derogatory comments about how shriveled the penis would have been after a night of exposure to the outside elements. She said it was a good warning to all men to make sure they keep their woman happy. Her two male hosts laughed and made no protest to the idea of celebrating this vile, criminal act.

I rang the station to voice my outrage after hearing the podcast of the show and to her eternal credit, the receptionist was as angry as I was and promised me she would bring it to the attention of the radio station manager. Sure enough, the manager rang me back and proceeded to apologize for the comments. He said he had no idea how the comments which went on for five minutes managed to slip by the censor. I asked him why the same comments were being promoted on their daily podcast hours after they had been spoken live on air. He had no answer. An hour or two later the conversation was removed from the podcast.

I asked what consequences Chrissie Swan would face for asking people to celebrate the severing of a man's penis. He said he would talk to her. I asked him if he would simply *talk t*o either of the male hosts of the show had they advocated the celebration of the genital mutilation of a woman. He didn't hesitate- 'I would sack them." When I called out his double standards he simply agreed with me and said he understood my concerns and the different way our society views the two genders in situations like this.

To this day the woman has continued in her job with not one consequence for her lengthy celebration calls and laughter over the genital mutilation of a man.

This same Chrissie Swan was once a contestant on Australia's Big Brother. One night the women on the show were discussing penis size and having a mighty good time doing it. At one point, Ms. Swan told the story of a time she went out with a bloke and when the time for intimacy arrived she took one look at his tiny todger and decided she would have nothing to do with him.

That was disgusting enough, but only a day or two later, Ms. Swan (who was quite obese) overheard a couple of the camera crew making jokes about her size behind the walls of the Big Brother house. She wept and talked of the body shaming she had endured.

I could not believe what I was hearing. This was the very same woman who decided a man's penis size was all she needed to know when selecting a possible sexual or life partner. Now she was weeping because someone said she was fat.

I'm sure you understand who gained the outpouring of empathy and support.

You all know there are countless other examples of women mocking the mutilation of men's genitals but these have been covered in other articles.

I smile when I think of the predictable response my article would bring from any feminist who stumbled across it.

You must have a tiny penis!

Hanna Stotland, education consultant, discusses crisis management & sexual consent

Jonathan Taylor · 25 October 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Hanna Stotland presents a unique voice and service. She is an education consultant specializing in crisis management, helping students get back into academia when an event removes them from attendance. Hanna is more pragmatic and realistic than idealistic. Her work involves direct solutions for individual students, rather than broad-scale institutional change. We need people like that.

As we might suspect, over the past several years her work has involved students suspended or expelled after being accused of sexual assault. She doesn't get involved in who was guilty. In all fairness, in 99% of situations there no way for her to know, and no way for the school to know, either. Schools generally manage individual disciplinary problems from a risk management perspective – at times a political perspective – rather than a justice or human rights perspective. We know this because if they really cared about justice or human rights we would see a lot more due process in university hearings.

Consequently, their conclusions should generally be disregarded as indicative of guilt or innocence.

That doesn't mean Hanna ignores what removed the student from school. "I help people who want an education so that they can find that so long as they are seeking it honestly," she says. She also counsels them on how to come to terms with what happened, and how to present their case to gatekeepers in academia.

Recently, Hanna appeared in a Radiolab series regarding what consent means (or should mean) in the modern day. Thankfully, the host was fairly neutral for most of the show. As usual, I'll also give my perspective, but I won't say repeat anything that Hanna already covered in the video. I encourage you to listen to her independently of reading what I've written below.

The other guest on the show is a woman named Kaitlin Prest. She is a feminist ideologue. We know this because she consistently speaks very assumptively and dogmatically about disparities in systemic and interpsersonal "power" between men and women. Also characteristic of feminism, she decontextualizes gender issues by cherry-picking small parts here and there and presenting what she cherry-picks as the whole picture. She also generally disregards the notion of women's agency if it means more responsibility could be placed on men.

Kaitlin is a strong advocate of "affirmative consent," a model where sexual consent must be obtained explicitly and verbally. The problems of this are obvious to most people. Most notably, most communication is nonverbal. In addition, what people say in a literal sense is not always what they mean (example: playful or teasing sarcasm, etc).

I'll say a bit on Kaitlin's perspective of the affirmative consent model, and then let you listen to the rest. Kaitlin acknowledges that there are some cases where men may have been wrongly accused, or where it's ambiguous. "It's complicated," she says multiple times. Despite this, she thinks it should be the model. Here are a few of her quotes, and my responses to them.

She says, "I think having affirmative consent, as a rule, protects that ambiguity…I think if people feel violated, then they were violated….I don't think they are always in the right, but I think it's safer to assume they are always in the right."

There's a lot to unpack here. Of course, having a justice system based on feelings rather than facts is problematic at best, and horrifying at worst. Not too long ago, many white women felt violated when a black man looked at them in the wrong way, and accused them of horrifying things. What they "felt" wasn't justice, but injustice. Feminists like Kaitlin are closer to that mentality than they would admit.

Also, about feelings: sometimes people feel violated because they were violated. And sometimes, people feel violated because they feel entitled to preferential treatment, or feel entitled to something ulterior. There are many women who “feel violated” because a man who had sex with them won’t have a relationship with them, for example. We’ve seen numerous false rape accusations for that reason.

When Kaitlin says “if they feel violated they were violated,” she is of course only referring to accusers’ feelings, but what about the feelings of the accused? Using her same logic, how about this: “I think if people feel they were wrongly accused, then they were wrongly accused”? I’ve never seen a feminist apply that logic evenly, but then again, can you remember a time when feminism as a movement cared about men’s feelings without blaming them or demanding preferential treatment for women in the same swoop?

So why wouldn’t a feminist like Kaitlin apply that logic evenly? She tips her hand here. After Hanna explains that there may be some men who would be wrongly accused and punished under an affirmative consent model, Kaitlin says “I can see that, but what we’re doing is working against history. We’re trying to make progress on this issue of sexual assault, and the much larger balance of power as it is distributed between the genders.”

And there it is. Whether an individual man may be innocent or guilty, it just doesn’t matter. If a man has his life ruined over a false accusation, it’s nothing more than collateral damage in the “more important war against the Patriarchy™.” She believes men should go to prison for less-than-ideal sex, rather than non-consensual sex, as a means of overcompensating due to how the criminal justice system is biased against women.

On that point, I’ve never understood how a prison system that imprisons men at thirteen times the rate of women is somehow biased in men’s favor, or why they would imprison men at all if men are truly so systematically privileged. I guess when men are 100% of those in prison rather than 93%, feminists will proclaim equality has been achieved? It might make a good headline for The Onion, but unfortunately, The Onion cannot compete with reality.

Kaitlin goes even further, arguing that consent isn’t possible. She says women may say yes, but can actually mean no. Her explanation: “If you’re taught from birth to define yourself based on someone else’s pleasure, how can you even define what you want or don’t want?” This is straight from the playbook of radical feminists who argue that under Patriarchy™, consent is not possible because women lack sufficient power to consent.

So when it comes to finding men guilty, Kaitlin believes if a woman doesn’t say yes, it’s rape. And if a woman does say yes, that’s rape too, because she “didn’t really mean it.” You see, words always mean exactly what they say, except when they don’t, so long as men are always the ones responsible.

There’s no way to win with this kind of mentality. The best thing to do is exactly what Hanna did: speak to educate and draw in support from the audience.

Of course, in saying women cannot consent because they are taught from birth by The Patriarchy™ to please and serve, Kaitlin also assumes that men are not taught to please women in a relationship. As a feminist, she missed all those cultural messages in movies, books, the media, and so forth, where men bend over backward to please women via courting with promises, gifts, flowers, special events, poetry, songs, seduction, and so forth.

Side note: this is why some men don’t buy flowers anymore. Women like Kaitlin don’t appreciate it, don’t remember it, and will probably call them rapists anyway.

Note that Kaitlin does defy the radical feminist stereotype in several ways. For one thing, she is not rabid, raving, and angry. Worse, actually – she speaks these things calmly and with a straight face. To her credit, however, she does say “that’s just my point of view,” she doesn’t make personal attacks, and she does give Hanna time to speak. So kudos to her for that.

I could go on, but I don’t want to take away from what Hanna says. Having listened to her speak before, I know there is a lot more she could say, but there was only so much time on the show.

Viktor Frankl, Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn and the automatic outgroup derogation of men

Jewel Eldora · 26 October 2018 · Archived copy · Original

For over a year, some AVFM readers have tried to guess my political bias. Some AVFM readers are certain they already know. The Automatic Outgroup Derogation of Men exists independently of politics but is inextricably intertwined with politics. It permeates propaganda, media, religion, culture, and law. In today's climate, it'd be impossible to pretend a writer is politically unbiased. So, I've decided to write a political statement before proceeding any further.

A few hours of reading, 15 hours of audiobooks, or a few minutes on Wikipedia may be required.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/The_Gulag_Archipelago

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Man%27s_Search_for_Meaning

Reading the the Gulag Archipelago and Man's Search for Meaning won't make any of us political theorists, psychologists, or death camp survivors, but it should give us a good starting point toward understanding the following political statement.

Gulags and concentration camps look pretty much the same from the inside. Lone islands on the outskirts of group-think fantasylands, where a steady stream of initially male, then increasingly female, infidels, and apostates are quarantined and worked to death for re-education of the state religion.

The Blue Church solves for complexity and promises a utopia of plenty; they sing songs of men, as the perpetual oppressor.

The Red Church solves for boundaries, and promises a utopia of safety; they hunt men, as the perpetual aggressor.

The groupthink disasters of the 20th century were the result of what happens when people are willing to lie, even a little, just to get along, and a little more, to get ahead. Left and Right look exactly the same in the deathcamp mirror.

We'd all like to think that we'd be on the resistance side of history, but the data does not support that claim. We can only learn to be on guard against our worst instincts, if we're willing to come to terms with the monsters we could easily become.

Fact is, we are more likely to be complicit due to the cone of willful ignorance surrounding our sacred values than to have our logic, reason, or ethics stop us from helping the bad guys of future histories.

It's very easy for us to not even notice what types of little lies we're personally willing to tell, just to get by. Until it's too late, of course, as goes the story of the 20th century.

Why should we look take a closer look at the Gender Differences in Automatic In-Group Bias? Because, men, as a group, are idiots, meaning, they don't know they're a group, and they're being played, in a very specific way.

This would be great for women, but unfortunately, it opens up a blind spot as a species. Humans often miss important details, and it harms women and children.

One example is the boys burned alive by Boko Haram. Had we noticed, when the boys were being burned alive, we might have been able to stop the girls from being kidnapped later, when the men eventually came back.

We don't know where those girls are today, but we know we can't bring back the boys because they are a burned huddled together lump in mass graves.

Bring Back Our Girls

This is one extreme example of a hell of a thing to miss, but it points to something missing in our awareness that we should be on alert for. The automatic outgroup derogation of men is a phenomena that has made us miss stuff, important stuff. This bias is infinitely exploitable.

Gender differences in automatic in-group bias play out at scale when media, social media, politics, and law, become complicated beyond our ability to manage them. Human beings end up in a meat grinder of our own design.

Either political pattern will produce derogation centers, and in the U.S., the Red and Blue Churches have been collaborating for 40 years to incarcerate men. The piles of broken bodies, is just currently out of site and therefore out of mind, in U.S. prisons. Mass incarceration and decades of perpetual counter insurgency war have created a generation of piles, upon piles of broken bodies.

My perspective is not that we aren't on the brink of a cataclysm, but that we've been inching toward one, little by little, in very slow motion, for about 40 years. Driven by a willingness to be swayed by and tell, little lies, just to get by.

In recent decades, a gender identity movement has been growing that frames the most personal of issues as deeply political, consequently the political side to this group, is also deeply personal. To this pure identity movement, all of human history can be summarized as a series of human rights violations perpetrated against it. A certain recipe for a viral and sticky fluid to fill a group think tank.

I have only belonged to one political party in my life, for a period of 13 days when I then thoroughly revoked affiliation.

Gender Differences in Automatic In-group bias are not politically limited to one group or another, despite my exploring them through the lens of politics in this treatise. I do not endorse the use of the automatic outgroup derogation of men for any political purposes, and quite the contrary, I aim to bring attention to it, so that we can slow it's viral effects. Especially in a world where the media's main job is to make us angry enough to click links.

This is the best statement of my own bias that I can construct as of October 24, 2018.

Noam Chomsky, Christine Blasey-Ford and the automatic outgroup derogation of men

Jewel Eldora · 27 October 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Our opinions are shaped, in some part, by our media and social media experiences. My writing deals with a quirk in the brains of human males that I believe is creating a slow moving disaster as we move toward a state of perpetual moral panic. Christine Blasey-Ford's testimony may be something we look back on for reference.

The quirk my writings deal with is the inability of human males to demonstrate automatic in-group bias for one another. Unfortunately, it has created problems that men can't fix and the government can't fix. Neither men nor government have the tools, because, men, are an automatic outgroup and the biases that creates, in both men, and women, are, well, quirky.

This series deals with how this lack of bias plays out, at scale, in traditional media and social media environments.

Outgroup bias is hardwired in the species and has entered a into feedback loop, because of social media.

#Metoo and #Kavanaugh, are merely foreshocks for a main event that will make the Satanic Ritual Child Abuse Moral Panic and the Day Care Sex Abuse Scandals look like family picnics.

For the purposes of this article, we will use the following description of the U.S. media. It's based on Manufacturing Consent by Edward S. Herman and MIT Professor, Noam Chomsky.

You may think there's a political motive in my sharing that specific video. It's produced by Al Jazeera, an official Qatar government media outlet, and voiced by Amy Goodman of Democracy Now, a journalist arrested in St. Paul, MN in 2008, while covering police violence outside the 2008 Republican National Convention in St. Paul, MN, that's a lot of politics " all wrapped up in dere" as we say in Minnesota.

In fact, I picked it because it's bizarre, it's cute, it's a little bit gross, and it's kinda' mean to the politicians and corporations that run the media in order to exploit the biases of an elite group of "cultural managers", who control consumer spending, [1][2][3][4] because their consent is crucial to their agenda.

This segment from a 1991 documentary details Dr. Chomsky's opinions on the special role of the New York Times, CNN, the Washington Post, and the corporations who own them.

For-profit media companies will publish anything to capture and maintain the attention of this group to increase market share for their advertisers and votes to the political establishment.

The Red Church and the Blue Church, are two congregations, watching two different movies, on the same screen. For-profit media companies will target the biases of the culture managers of either side of the "political aisle".

For-profit media companies will avoid publishing anything that these extremely valuable culture managers don't want to look at, or want to avoid, and will instead create content designed specifically for their emotional and moral palettes.

Effective propaganda targets our biases and our gut feelings. It pulls our heart strings, enrages us, and/or for about 65% of us, tickles our sense of humor. Roughly 35% of any given population, have no sense of humor at all.

The most effective propaganda subtly target biases we don't even know exist; those that are automatic.

In the next article Thurman Blevins, Justine Damond and the automatic outgroup derogation of men, we'll explore the two movies these churches are watching on the same screen.

Robert Brockway · 28 October 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Thanks to decades of feminist misinformation the term conjugal rights is today most often associated with marital rape. The truth, as is often the case, is more complex than feminists would have us believe.

The Merriam-Webster dictionary defines conjugal rights as:

> : the sexual rights or privileges implied by and involved in the marriage relationship
> : the right of sexual intercourse between husband and wife

While the Cambridge dictionary defines it as:

> the right to have sex with the person you are married to.

Both definitions are gender neutral, which is notable considering the association the term carries today of men forcing themselves on women.

Conjugal rights exist in both the ancient concept of marriage as well as the modern concept of marriage. Feminist ideologues and others have encouraged confusion in the concept of a person's right to sex in marriage. In the modern Western context, a married person does not have a right to sex with their spouse at a particular time but they continue to have a right to sex in their marriage. Many societies recognised the concept of annullment for a marriage that was not consummated. This concept is distinct from divorce as an annulled marriage is taken to have never occurred. Even today many jurisdictions retain the option to annul a marriage that has not been consummated.

When a couple marry, even today, there is a presumption that each will have sex with the other. The exception is a chaste marriage agreed ahead of time. While rare, marriages like this exist today as they have historically. The Shakers are an offshoot of the better known Quaker religious movement. Shakers require adherents to have chaste marriages. This means that they can only expand their community through converts. Not surprisingly requiring adherents to have chaste marriages makes recruiting difficult and today there are few Shakers remaining. Most people who marry want to have sex, at least initially.

It is true that until recently men could not be charged with raping their wives in Common Law. Feminists often claim this meant that men had a right to force himself on his wife. This ignores the fact that men who were violent to their wives were often charged.

The feminist notion of The Patriarchy is, at best, a gross over-simplification of societies today and in the past. But we shouldn't give all adherents to this idea the benefit of the doubt. In many cases claims about The Patriarchy are just a bunch of lies. Discrediting The Patriarchy is outside the scope of this article but is covered well by existing and planned works.

Conjugal rights vary across religions. In Judaism wives have a right to sex with their husbands but husbands do not have a right to sex with their wives. The Talmud even defines the frequency of the husband's sexual obligations based on his occupation:

> Men of leisure, who do not work, must engage in marital relations every day, laborers must do so twice a week, donkey drivers once a week, camel drivers once every thirty days, and sailors once every six months.

In Christianity both men and women have a right to sex in marriage. The same is true in Islam. Further, Islam grants to women a right to sexual satisfaction beyond merely experiencing intercourse.

The three major Abrahamic religions all grant women a right to sex in marriage and one of them doesn't even grant that right to men. Contrast this to the nonsense that feminists spew about the state of women's lives historically. The feminist historical narrative is so pervasive that even many anti-feminists buy into it, but this will change.

Keith Ellison, Officer Mohamed Noor and the automatic outgroup derogation of men

Jewel Eldora · 28 October 2018 · Archived copy · Original

I concluded last year's series, "There's a flaw in all men, we're doomed; only women can save the day" with an an appeal for Officer Mohamed Noor's humanity, and a request that men rally in hopes he get a fair trial.

https://www.avoiceformen.com/men/philando-castile-justine-damond-and-the-automatic-in-group-bias-toward-women/

Officer Noor has been charged with both murder and manslaughter. The death of Justine Damond is the most vigorously prosecuted case of any police officer in Minnesota history, possibly in the history of the United States, maybe even the world.

Hennepin County Attorney, Mike Freeman received criticism at an AFL-CIO event that he was hoping to have charges under the tree for Christmas. In 2017, the year of the shooting, Freeman was elected the President of the National District Attorneys Association. He lists this among his 2017 highlights along with prosecuting the racists who brought guns to the 4th Precinct Takeover following the police shooting death of Jamar Clarke.

Freeman later apologized to the Bureau of Criminal Apprehension, but not to Officer Noor, for offering charges as a Christmas gift. Officer Noor is Muslim and does not celebrate Christmas.

Keith Ellison is the first Muslim to be elected to the U.S. Congress, and the first African American Congressman to be elected in Minnesota. He has made the following statements on behalf of Officer Noor who was the first Somali public safety officer in his precinct.

5)

Congressman Ellison is the Vice Chair of the Democratic National Committee, and a leader of the progressive movement. He is currently running for Attorney General for the State of Minnesota. Calls have been made for Ellison to be investigated by the Minnesota Attorney General's Office for domestic abuse.

A lawyer, hired by the DNC, recently released a statement that the claims of abuse were unsubstantiated.

According to Ellison's divorce papers, he suffered abuse at the hands of his ex-wife. He claims that she hit him more times than he could mention, pulled a knife on him, and that he had to sleep with one eye open. Ellison, one of the most powerful men in the world, said that he was humiliated to have to admit that he'd been a victim of physical and emotional abuse and not the perpetrator, as had been alleged.

Ellison's ex-girlfriend tweeted a medical record alleging abuse, but refuses to show a video corroborating her claims for changing reasons: 1) She can't find it. 2) She's maybe naked in it. 3) It's her pain and it's for her.

In the following weeks, hate groups have been circulating photos of Keith X selling anti-termitic newspapers on the street.

Despite no corroborating evidence, Keith Ellison now seems to be slipping in the polls in Minnesota.

Who will stand to ensure these men see justice?

Editor's Note: There has been no corroborating evidence that Keith Ellison is a serial abuser.

Author's Note: Facts do not matter.

Next up: Alexandra Ocasio-Cortez tells a crowd of men not to worry about being accused in Ana Maria Archilla, Brett Kavanaugh and the automatic outgroup derogation of men.

Crime and Punishment – a men's issue

Elizabeth Hobson · 28 October 2018 · Archived copy · Original

> "Among the powers of government is meting out punishment, and writers such as Montesquieu, Cesare Baccaria, and the American founders thought afresh about the government's license to harm its citizens. Criminal punishment, they argued, is not a mandate to implement cosmic justice but part of an incentive structure that discourages antisocial acts without causing more suffering than it deters. The reason the punishment should fit the crime, for example, is not to balance some mystical scale of justice but to ensure that a wrongdoer stops at a minor crime rather than escalating to a more harmful one. Cruel punishments, whether or not they are in some sense 'deserved', are no more effective at deterring harm than moderate but surer punishments, and they desensitize spectators and brutalize the society that implements them." – Steven Pinker, Enlightenment Now.

Feminist campaigning has seen to it that female convicts are treated with compassion and that rehabilitation and preventing reoffending take precedence, as a general rule, over punishment – but the same humane and rational approach is still dragging behind, over a hundred years since the Enlightenment that Pinker refers to, when it comes to the treatment of male convicts.

Sex discrimination in the U.K. criminal justice system has a long history: e.g. flogging as a punishment for female criminals was banned in 1820 but continued for men until 1967. In The Fraud of Feminism, Ernest Belfort Bax insists that up until the mid-19th Century the sexes were treated more or less equally by the law until Feminism grew in influence and began affecting the outcome of cases, "not articulately, or as the result of definite demands, but as a consequence of sentimental pleading in particular cases. In this way, however, a public opinion became established, finding expression in a sex favouritism in the law, and even more in its administration."

This practice – of 'sentimental pleading' – remains a major tool in the feminist arsenal, with individuals like Julie Bindel and groups like her organisation Justice for Women supporting women who have murdered their romantic partners in appealing sentences. However, with the cultural narrative firmly established (of innocent women and malevolent men), 'definite demands' are now being made – such as Women in Prison's ambition to reduce the women's prison population by half to 2,020 by 2020 by scrapping plans to build new women's prisons and diverting the funds to women's centres for rehabilitation. A goal which you may recognise from the governments' new approach to dealing with female offenders. Meanwhile, plans for building 2 further new men's super-prisons remain and the approach to sentencing men is untouched.

England and Wales has the highest rate of incarceration in Western Europe (followed by Scotand). Presently, men account for around 95% of the total prison population despite only committing 3.4 times more crimes than women. In 1900, men accounted for 83% of inmates. According to William Collins, if men were treated as leniently in the criminal justice system as women today, 5/6 men in prison would be free. Factors that explain this disparity include: a greater percentage of convicted men being sentenced to prison, men being given longer sentences on average than women, women being paroled earlier than men (despite being more likely to be disciplined for bad behaviour whilst incarcerated) and women being more likely to have mitigating factors (such as age, dependents, lack of previous relevant convictions and the appearance of genuine remorse) applied to their sentences whereas men are more likely to have aggravating factors (such as presence of previous relevant convictions, the location of the offence, being a member of a group or gang and evidence of some degree of pre-planning or pre-meditation) applied to their sentences.

Women are somewhat less likely to reoffend after being convicted of a crime (18% as opposed to 26% of men) – and I firmly believe that the treatment they receive in the Criminal Justice System, as well as the more sympathetic attitude taken to them by society in general (which is displayed in media coverage of crimes), are critical factors in explaining this disparity. Evidence, which we'll explore later, suggests strongly that in order to reduce crime rehabilitation and support is more effective than draconian punishment – but when prison populations are viewed holistically, it becomes clear that sensitive treatment is a humane imperative.

Both men's and women's prison populations show catalogues of disadvantages and difficulties:

34% of prisoners report living all or most of their childhood with one parent.

24% spent time in care.

29% experienced abuse as a child.

41% observed violence as a child.

7% have a learning disability.

47% have no qualifications.

68% were unemployed during the month before entering custody.

13% have never had a job.

15% were homeless before entering custody.

16% have symptoms indicative of psychosis.

25% have both anxiety and depression.

46% of women and 21% of men have attempted suicide at some point.

22% drank alcohol every day in the month before entering custody.

These issues need attending to and overcrowded prisons (68% of institutions) are ill-equipped to deal with them. We urgently need to reduce the prison population as a whole for safety reasons and to ensure that prisoners can access treatment and resources that can help them turn their lives around.

Treatment within the community is not only cheaper but also more effective:

Cost of a imprisoning an individual for a year: £35,000/community service: £4000

Nearly half of adults sentenced to prison reoffend – the figure raising to 66% for those serving sentences of less than 12 months.

Offenders similar to those serving sentences of less than 12 months who received community sentences have a reconviction rate 7 percentage points lower.

Regardless of the length of sentence:

Meaningful access to family can reduce reoffending by 39% – but, in our overcrowded prison system, prisoners are often shipped to the far ends of the country to fill free spaces and for men in particular critically important access like visits and phone calls can be restricted as punishment.

Receiving treatment for drug and alcohol addictions can reduce reoffending by 33%.

Support from the Prisoners' Education Trust for educational courses or learning materials reduces reoffending by a quarter.

Employment can reduce reoffending rates by 7.5 percentage points.

Switchback which provides young offenders with "support at the gate" records their trainees being five times less likely to find themselves returning to custody.

Many MRAs seem reluctant to take this matter up. I think there's two reasons: one, people don't want to alienate allies who may be more 'conservative' on the matter and two, people are afraid of tainting the movement by defending the indefensible. But many prisoners are highly vulnerable men and boys who deserve support – and if they get it we will reduce reoffending and the overall crime rate. What is missing from the criminal justice system is a sex-blind holistic approach that takes into account the traumas that so many male prisoners have suffered, their aims (97% of prisoners report that want to stop offending) and what sentencing and support is likely to aid them in leaving crime behind and becoming law abiding members of a civilised society. What is missing from the cultural conversation is a similar gender-blind sensitivity to root causes of crime, a belief in the ability of ex-convicts to reform their characters and fair access to employment after having served a sentence. It's time to plug the gaps.

Thurman Blevins, Justine Damond and the automatic outgroup derogation of men

Jewel Eldora · 28 October 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Last summer in North Minneapolis, Thurman Blevins buried a sister he loved. Within days, his family was mourning him as well. He was dead. Shot in an alley after failing to outrun the police.

In a 911 call, Blevins was described as shooting a gun into the ground, with a specifically branded bottle of gin. Men often express their grief through public displays of aggression, such as shouting, or shooting, and/or drinking heavily.

Within 2.5 minutes of the police arrival, Thurman Blevins was dead, at the hands of police, in essence, for expressing his feelings.

In South Minneapolis, in the summer of 2017, Justine Damond called the police to report that she believed a woman was being raped in her South Minneapolis alley. Since police hadn't arrived fast enough, she charged the squad car, and apparently "smacked" the trunk to alert police to her presence. Officer Mohamed Noor pulled his gun, and within seconds, fired across his partner's lap, ending Justine's life.

Little boys in North Minneapolis are taught to run away from the police for safety. Little girls in Australia are taught to run toward them.

I was born and raised here. I know many black men from North Minneapolis, and a fair share of white women from over South.

Growing up in Minneapolis, I likely see the movies of the Blevins and Damond shootings differently than you. So do many of the people I know.

Minneapolis police have a shell, which was shot from a gun, with Blevins' DNA on it. There's video evidence of the entire engagement. I know people who are certain there was no gun to see. I also know people who clearly see a gun, and some who are far less certain.

The loss of life through policing is tragic and I believe looking at the movies we create to make sense of the world may offer us some insight into how we view it.

In North Minneapolis, boys are taught often by other young men, as fatherless homes have been the norm since the 70's. We don't talk about that.

Some black fathers are very active and it shows. I know the father of Medaria Arradondo Jr., who is the city's first black chief of police. He has another son who was a fire chief. Medaria Arradondo Sr. is among the finest men I've ever met.

https://www.pbs.org/video/New-Minneapolis-Police-Chief-Medaria-Arradondo-30584/

I would love to have him teach young men how to engage with police.

My condolences go out to both the Blevins and the Damond families. Minnesota grieves with you as they do with the family of Philando Castile.

The trial of Officer Mohamed Noor has been the most vigorously prosecuted officer involved shooting in Minnesota, and possibly in the history of the United States.

My condolences to the families and the families of the police officers, Minnesotans, and Australians whose lives are forever changed.

Next Up: Keith Ellison, Officer Mohamed Noor and the automatic outgroup derogation of men

Fatty-shaming for fun and profit

Doug Mortimer · 2 November 2018 · Archived copy · Original

A woman alleges she was sexually assaulted at a party. The accused is a prominent man who has been known to indulge in adult beverages. Evidence is lacking. Witnesses are unreliable. No corroboration is forthcoming. The woman is portrayed as an innocent victim, the man as privileged and arrogant. And the whole fracas becomes a media circus.

No, I'm not talking about the Brett Kavanaugh imbroglio. I'm talking about an incident that occurred almost a century ago.

As often happens in any up-and-coming industry, the early days of the motion pictures witnessed some meteoric upward mobility. Perhaps the most astounding case was that of Roscoe Conkling "Fatty" Arbuckle. He was the next big thing in more ways than one.

Fatty Arbuckle was born in Kansas in 1887 but grew up in Southern California, where he performed in vaudeville as a singer and comedian. In 1913, he joined Mack Sennett's Keystone Studios (best known for its Keystone Kops comedy shorts). He later moved on to Paramount Pictures, where he was earning $5,000 a week plus a percentage of the profits. By 1921 "the Prince of Whales" had signed a three-year/$3,000,000 contract with the studio. It was an astounding career trajectory. Only in America! But his career was about to take an abrupt U-turn.

To celebrate his multi-million dollar contract, Arbuckle hosted a party to end all parties at San Francisco's St. Francis Hotel. Originally built in 1904 at the then-astounding cost of $2.5 million, the hotel was damaged in the 1906 earthquake but re-opened the following year. During its long history, the St. Francis has hosted numerous luminaries from all areas of human endeavor. Designed to incorporate the best features of grand hotels in Europe, the St. Francis was a pricey hostelry on the day it opened, and it is a pricey hostelry now. In 1921, price was no object for Fatty Arbuckle.

After driving up the Pacific coast with two of his film colony colleagues, Fatty arrived at the St. Francis on Saturday night, September 3. The party occupied three rooms on the 12th floor, and continued all through Sunday and into Monday. The guests included an assortment of Hollywood types, as well as some San Francisco bigwigs.

Prohibition was in effect, but in those days bellboys were employed to procure spirits from local bootleggers. So booze flowed non-stop and guests, not all of them invited, came and went throughout the weekend.

[image]
Virginia Rappe
One of the Hollywood guests was 26-year-old Virginia Rappe. A casual acquaintance of Arbuckle, she was a part-time model and small-time actress. She was escorted by her fiancé, Henry Lehrman, a writer/actor/director/producer. Also accompanying her was a dubious friend by the name of Babina Maude Delmont.

On September 5, Labor Day, the party was beginning to wind down when Arbuckle was informed that Rappe had taken sick in his bedroom. He called the house doctor, who diagnosed drunkenness, took her to another room, and put her to bed. Arbuckle drove back to Hollywood the next day.

On Wednesday, September 7, Rappe was taken to the hospital. She died there two days later. The cause of death was peritonitis caused by a ruptured bladder. But that was not the end of the matter. In fact, it was just the beginning.

Over the next few days, Fatty Arbuckle's participation in her death had morphed from mere party host to rapist. He had the highest profile of anyone present at the party so there was no way to keep his name out of the headlines.

According to one school of thought, he was so obese (266-300 pounds, depending on your source) that when he raped Rappe, his corpulence blew out her bladder. Another theory was that he had done the dirty deed with a bottle. A third theory was that he was so well endowed (highly unlikely given his obesity), he couldn't help but puncture her bladder. Whatever he did, it didn't quite rise to the level of murder, but it certainly seemed to fit the definition of manslaughter, or should we say womanslaughter. Fatty turned himself in and was held without bail.

Well, people will talk, but in this case, the wagging tongues were set in motion by individuals of questionable morality.

The San Francisco District Attorney, Matthew Brady (not to be confused with the famed Civil War photographer), was an ambitious man. He realized that if he could nail Fatty Arbuckle's scalp to the wall, he would reap gobs of publicity from the feat. Since Brady was pondering a run for the governorship, the Fatty Arbuckle case was free political advertising.

Bambina Maude Delmont, who had only known Virginia Rappe a short time, accused Fatty of rape. Delmont had a rather checkered past as a madam and an extortionist. Her scam was to hook up wealthy married men with party girls who would subsequently cry rape…unless, of course, the men wanted to cough up some hush money. Since Delmont had arrived at the party with Rappe, her statement carried some weight, perhaps more than it should have. She flat out told the police that Arbuckle had raped Rappe.

Henry Lehrman, Rappe's fiancé, was understandably upset by Rappe's death and lambasted Hollywood decadence and degeneracy. Given his own career in Hollywood, and the fact that he had made the trek north to attend Arbuckle's party, his anti-Hollywood rhetoric seemed to ring hollow.

The major player in the anti-Fatty smear campaign is still renowned today. Born to a wealthy family, newspaper magnate William Randolph Hearst was San Francisco born and bred. In fact, the San Francisco Examiner was his first newspaper. By 1921 his yellow journalism practices had enabled him to build a coast-to-coast publishing empire. And now he had a made-to-order newspaper story in his old stomping grounds, just waiting for him to spread it across the nation. A beloved movie star at a drunken orgy that ends in rape! How could Hearst give this one a pass? It was not the first scandal to hit the movie colony but it was surely the biggest. The Hearst papers played up Delmont's accusations and the subsequent rumors. Arbuckle, of course, had no choice but to remain silent till he appeared in court. No attorney would ever advise otherwise.

Predictably, prominent San Franciscans who attended the party did not come forward. Curiously, many local nabobs deplored those horrible Hollywood types migrating up the coast to engage in immoral behavior in their fair city. San Francisco, of course, had grown up on greed (the Gold Rush), resulting in the legendary "anything goes" Barbary Coast section of town. All that plus Tong Wars and opium dens. Ironically, Hollywood had been a sleepy rural community where liquor was prohibited before the movie industry set up shop there.

With the Arbuckle/Rappe affair being fanned up in the newspapers, negative public reaction was inevitable. On Tuesday, August 13, a consortium of theater owners, representing some 600 theaters in metropolitan New York City, held a meeting at which they banned all "Fatty comedies." In other cities, mayors, police commissioners, and local censorship groups enacted their own bans.

Their actions may not have been as much an expression of disapproval as a safety measure. A number of fans had reacted violently in theaters where Fatty's movies were still showing. When the first trial commenced, someone fired a shot at Fatty's estranged wife, actress Minta Durfee, who was there to support him.

The initial Fatty Arbuckle trial lasted from November 14 to December 4, 1921. After 44 hours of deliberation, the jury was deadlocked.

Take two:

The second trial commenced on January 11, 1922, and ended on February 3, 1922. After 40 hours of deliberation, the result was another hung jury.

Take three:

The third trial, beginning March 13, 1922, was the charm. After almost a month of testimony (it ended on April 12, 1922), the jury deliberated all of 6 minutes before finding Arbuckle not guilty. In addition, the jury took the extraordinary step of issuing an apology read in open court by the jury foreman:

> Acquittal is not enough for Roscoe Arbuckle. We feel that a grave injustice has been done to him and there was not the slightest proof adduced to connect him in any way with the commission of a crime. He was manly throughout the case and told a straightforward story which we all believe. We wish him success and hope that the American people will take the judgment of twelve men and women that Roscoe Arbuckle is entirely innocent and free from all blame.

As is often the case, the more the accusations were held up to light the flimsier they appeared. For one thing, Rappe's medical history included not only gonorrhea but chronic cystitis. Alcohol should be avoided if one has cystitis, and drinking bootleg booze of questionable quality is even worse. As Virginia Rappe's background received more attention, her promiscuous reputation could not be covered up. There was even talk about one or more abortions. What was missing was any physical evidence that she had been raped.

After three trials, it was obvious that District Attorney Brady had fabricated evidence and bribed and/or threatened witnesses. Significantly, Maude Delmont never took the witness stand. She was too busy touring the country as "The Woman Who Signed the Murder Charge Against Arbuckle." The other witnesses were also less than reliable since most admitted to being drunk at the time.

According to William Randolph Hearst, the Fatty Arbuckle affair sold more papers for him than the sinking of the Lusitania in 1915. If Fatty was eventually acquitted, it was irrelevant, as the scandal had already served its purpose, namely putting money in Heart's coffers.

The completion of the third trial should have been the end of the whole affair. Aside from violating Prohibition, Arbuckle had done nothing wrong. (Today, though liquor is legal, Arbuckle might be liable for a civil suit for overserving Virginia Rappe.) But though Arbuckle was officially exonerated, unofficially his woes continued.

His legal fees amounted to $700,000. He had to sell his house and fleet of cars to pay his attorneys. If he could have resumed his career under his Paramount contract, he might have recovered. But that was not allowed to happen.

On December 8, 1921, U.S. Postmaster Will Hays was hired as the first-ever chairman of the Motion Picture Producers and Distributors of America. He took over his new position on January 14, 1922. Unofficially, he was the industry censor. One of his first acts was to ban Fatty Arbuckle's films from being shown in the United States. The decree was particularly expensive for Paramount, since they had a backlog of Arbuckle's movies that could not be distributed. Obviously, his contract was null and void.

Arbuckle had plenty of friends and character witnesses in Hollywood but they were advised to remain silent. No matter what they said, they could not help him. In truth, Fatty Arbuckle was not on trial – Hollywood itself was on trial and anyone who worked there was suspect.

The high-living nouveau riche world of cinema folk (movie production in Los Angeles dated back only about one decade before Arbuckle's woes) did not play well in rural America. Any number of preachers, teachers, and civic leaders had found the Arbuckle trial the ideal vehicle for moralizing.

And so it was in the Kavanaugh hearings. It was never about whether or not one adolescent groped another three and a half decades ago. As Arbuckle symbolized all of Hollywood, Kavanaugh symbolized the patriarchy. Even more specifically, Arbuckle and Kavanaugh were privileged white men who had victimized defenseless women, and that is as good a way to motivate a lynch mob (literal or figurative) today as it was a century ago. Of course, there are always spiteful, envious people who enjoy seeing someone prominent in hot water, deservedly or otherwise.

Fatty Arbuckle was not only a movie star, he was the very caricature of a bloated capitalist. In truth, the public has always had a love/hate relationship with movie stars. On one level, they are entertained by them, in some cases enthralled by them, and in rare cases obsessed with them. Movie fan magazines go back almost as far as the movies themselves. Yet deep down many people simultaneously resent celebrities. You might call it the "What's he got that I haven't got?" syndrome. Once envy kicks in, public opinion can turn on a dime, particularly with a little help from the media. The bigger they are, the harder they fall. No one would care about the misdeeds of a relatively obscure supporting actor.

Brett Kavanaugh's initial crime was being born into a good family and receiving a good education. His rise to prominence was nowhere near as swift as Arbuckle's. His nomination to the Supreme Court was hardly a gimme. Never mind that he had to do his homework and do it well in order to rise to the top of his profession. The public doesn't see any of that. Instead, they see Georgetown Prep and an Ivy League background: Yale undergrad and Yale Law School. He had it made! So it was class war, white privilege, male privilege, and a damsel in distress versus a cad. Times have changed since Arbuckle's woes, but some things remain the same.

When Virginia Rappe died, the Roaring 20's were just getting started. Remember, women had just been given the vote, and elected officials were figuring out that they had to champion womanhood if they wanted to be reelected. Urbanization was spreading but small-town values still prevailed over much of the country and besmirching female virtue (even with the likes of Virginia Rappe) was a big time no-no. By the end of the decade, wild parties, excessive drinking, and lawbreaking (thanks to Prohibition) were commonplace. But that was no help to Fatty Arbuckle.

"[Turn Out the Lights,] The Party's Over" could have been Fatty's swan song. His income dropped precipitously but he was not destitute, as he was able to earn a living working as a writer and director under an assumed name. He did not return to the screen under his own name till 1932. He died the next year at age 46. Given his morbid obesity, it is impossible to assert that his legal ordeal and subsequent dispossession hastened his demise, but it certainly didn't help.

Don't know what the future holds for Kavanaugh. He has already lived longer than Fatty Arbuckle, and he has a lifetime job. But no matter how long he lives, no matter how long he serves on the Supreme Court, or how much Solomonic wisdom he dispenses, he will always be remembered as the spoiled rich boy who molested that poor girl way back in the summer of 1982.

The Naked Truth

Robert Brockway · 3 November 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Today we often see feminists protesting for the right for women to walk around topless. Surely this would imply that women do not have this right.

Women have the right to go topless in public, de facto or de jure, in most Western jurisdictions. Many jurisdictions have made it explicitly legal while many others simply don't enforce laws against women going topless. Most of the US permits women to go topless alongside several Canadian provinces. Further, in an increasing number of jurisdictions women may go entirely naked in public. This means that we yet again see feminists protesting for rights that they already have.

In Queensland, Australia a retired law professor, Dr Craig Burgess, confirmed what had long been suspected: Indecent exposure laws only apply to men. Section 9 of the Summary Offences Act 2005 (Qld) makes it clear that a person must expose their genitals to commit this offence. Queensland courts have always considered men's genitals to be exposed merely by the man standing naked in public (or in a place that can be seen by the public) while women's are considered to be covered. While undertaking research Dr Burgess could find no examples of women having ever been charged with wilful exposure in Queensland.

A November 13, 2016 news article in the Courier Mail entitled Police blitz on Noosa beach nudists nets men while women walk free [paywall] reported that 11 men were charged by police with wilful exposure for being naked in public while women who were present, and in some cases in the company of those men, were not charged.

The beach in question is in vicinity of Noosa, a well known Australian tourist destination. The beach itself is well known in the Noosa area as being 'clothing optional' by convention although Queensland law does not permit nudist beaches. What is particularly notable is that feminists had held a protest entitled Free the Nipple in Brisbane a few months earlier when it is women, not men, who may walk around in Queensland naked.

Feminists have had significant naked public protests in Argentine (and Argentina again), France, Ukraine, and the US among others. In each of these cases police did not act. Two women went to Halloween parties in the US naked this year. Apparently, one said the costume was "naked human". Neither drew the attention of law enforcement.

Meanwhile European artist Milo Moiré continues to walk around naked as a form of performance art and has painted in public with paint filled eggs dropped from her vagina. Moiré also allowed men and women to touch her breasts and genitals in public (no more than 30 seconds though!). She performed this in Germany and The Netherlands without incident but was, in a rare case of western police enforcing exposure laws against naked women, actually arrested in the UK.

Similar to Moiré, artist Deborah De Robertis believes that exposing her vulva during music recitals and near artwork and ancient buildings is a form of female empowerment. De Robertis is quoted as having said:

> opening one's vagina is opening one's mouth.

Says it all really.

The cover image depicts a Femen protest in Paris, France. It is ironic that images of a protest are held to a higher standard of decency than the protest itself. This image is under the Free Art License.

Ana Maria Archila, Christine Blasey Ford and the automatic outgroup derogation of men

Jewel Eldora · 4 November 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Immigrant rights activist Ana Maria Archila and survivors rights activist Maria Gallagher joined forces recently in an elevator to ensure positive change. Shown here expressing their sorrow and rage after a powerful confrontation with Senator Flake, of Snowflake, Utah, a devout Mormon, who then in turn made a "tiny gesture" based on their peaceful demands. Archila suggested the Senator consider the security of his children and grandchildren for the next fifty years. Maria Gallagher, a sex abuse survivor, demanded he "look her in the eyes and tell her that the pain of millions of sexual assault survivors did not matter".

Ana Maria Archila, Executive Director of the Center for Popular Democracy (CPD), put everything on the line and risked deportation from the United States by cornering and encouraging Sen. Flake into making that "tiny gesture" in order to protect our most basic political institutions.

Flake, as you will no doubt remember, voted to advance the nomination of Brett Kavanaugh, who was known at that time to be an accused serial gang rapist, out of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Archila lives in New York's embattled 14th Congressional District, along with rising Democratic Party star, Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez. Ocasio-Cortez recently lauded Archila's activism as an example of how undocumented workers, like Archila, can speak truth directly to power.

In a landmark campaign speech, Ocasio-Cortez tells the story of how different marginalized groups are forming coalitions in order to encourage U.S. Senators to make these types of "tiny gestures" and stop the runaway power of unchecked privilege and entitlement.

Ocasio-Cortez encourages other immigrant rights organizations, like the CPD (Ana Maria Archila's organization), to create coalitions of people, like Archila, who are facing deportation, to confront U.S. Senators wherever they are and to create crowds of supporters.

"We can't allow women and survivors to be fighting this by themselves," Ocasio-Cortez calls on the roughly 200 men in the room (mostly college students) to seize their moment, check their privilege, and sacrifice themselves, in the way that Ana Maria Archila did in that elevator, with a U.S. Senator on his way to the United States Senate Chambers.

Men, according to Ocasio-Cortez, hold the keys to amplifying women's voices.

By creating similar coalitions between women, immigrant activists in the country illegally, and college aged men, Archila and Ocasio-Cortez hope to dismantle our existing power structures and pave the way for this new type of popular democracy in the United States.

This plan for a new type of direct democracy is not without its detractors. Far right media groups, like Breitbart, smeared Ana Maria Archila and her organization, the CPD, because billionaire boogeyman George Soros was their #3 funder way back in 2014. The National Review, long known for it's right wing slant, claims that Flake was "set up" by Soros funded groups.

Meanwhile, Fox refers to all caravan migrants as criminals targeting women and children, as if the Red Church somehow suddenly cares about women and children.

Disgusting.

Ralph Murphy, Brett Kavanaugh and the automatic outgroup derogation of men

Jewel Eldora · 6 November 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The last two articles attempted to demonstrate how Blue Church and Red Church news outlets differently exploit group biases against men.

The Blue Church sees the role of government as complexity manager. They focus on the teenaged mothers with children in the caravan. They also call on male college students and immigrants to emulate the women in the elevators outside the U.S. Senate Chambers. One could imagine how two immigrant men raising their voices and blocking a senator may end differently.

The Red Church, also exploits the caravan's perceived criminal impact on women and children. Similarly, The Red Church spreads Keith Ellison's affiliations with Minnesota based male terrorist organization, Antifa, while subtly alluding to his past public support of the Nation of Islam, another male-centric organization.

Both sides exploit the automatic out-group status of men, they just follow different patterns. They point at these biases against men, because, these news outlets are trying to sell shoes and maintain control of the government.

Another area of the media where we might find automatic outgroup bias would be in the $40B songwriting and music publishing industry.

Ralph Murphy, a songwriting veteran and ASCAP VP, spearheaded a comprehensive song market analysis for the professional songwriting association, and had this to say about the song market:

"A hit song is a script for women to like the singer" Murphy said. "50% of songs are purchased by women, and 50% of songs are purchased by men, to get women to like them."

In essence, Murphy is saying in order for songs to be popular, in addition to being catchy and easy to sing, top selling songs will effectively exploit the group biases of women.

The song market is incredibly competitive, and in order to get a piece of the song user's dollar, songwriters try to exploit these biases.

For an endless stream of humorous, disturbing, colorful and bizarre insights into what a hypothetical female gender bias might look like, reverse the gender of songs like the Dixie Chicks "Goodbye Earl".

How does changing genders affect the cuteness of the song?

Authors Note: No one is condoning the killing of women, the wrapping of women in tarps or packing a lunch and throwing the bodies of women into a lake. This is simply to point out that it makes us feel differently when the genders are reversed.

Minneapolis songwriter Dan Wilson's top selling hit song, "Someone Like You" about showing up to his recently married, ex-girlfriend's house out of the blue and uninvited, is much less likely to result in criminal charges when sung by Adele.

Gender reversal in popular songs reveals a pattern of visceral weirdness, even when pouring over pop history for rare counter-examples, the changes were still often bizarre. Try rotating the genders of the singer, the murderer, and the victim after turning "Hey Joe" to "Hey Jo".

The Macarena, a long time staple of weddings and elementary school dances, is about a girl named Macarena whose [boyfriend is conscripted into the army so she ends up having sex with two of his friends] because he's out of town. https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Macarena_(song)

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=gwWRjvwlLKg

Reversing the genders here is conceptually difficult in the United States where women can not be conscripted.

Of course, the bias of songs isn't limited to just the end stage of relationships. The bias works when appealing to women in all stages of relationships, including eternal and perpetual.

Christian popular music exploits the gender bias and selection by describing the perfect man, who is always with the song user, silently listening to the song's user's prayers. He listens, protects, forgives, and uses His Father's infinite power, influence, and resources to solve any and all of the song-user's problems.

Christian popular music is very popular. To some, is sounds like the inspired work of God, to others it sounds like ultimate chick porn.

How this ties into the Brett Kavanaugh saga is that the media, including popular music, play some small part in how we collectively view and value men in society. Women, as a group, and men, as a group, were pitted against each other over two movies playing out on the same screen in Washington, DC.

To quote Barry Gibb, one of the music industries biggest selling songwriters in history, from one of the biggest selling songs in the known universe, "We can try to understand, the New York Times effect on man".

In our next article, Lorena Bobbitt, Dr. Christine Ford and the automatic outgroup derogation of men, we'll explore gender differences in persuasion techniques.

Men's Day: London Plans

Elizabeth Hobson · 7 November 2018 · Archived copy · Original

"Why are men afraid? They live in a culture which terrorises them. They live in a culture which demonises them and which hides this under all kinds of pseudo-respectable and 'toleration' based ideologies… This is intentional. This is a constructed part of our culture – to demonise men and to banish men and to make men obsolescent… We are constantly being pummeled with images and ideas of men which destroy our sense of masculinity… It's amazing how a trope can be adopted… I defy any of you to think of the word 'masculinity' without the word toxic coming one or other side of it, like a Google search. This is what they've done." said John Waters in his opening speech at The Battle of Ideas debate, 'Is masculinity toxic for boys?', in 2016.

You may not have heard of John Waters, the Irish journalist and author (and champion of father's rights and masculine values) but he is unequivocally one of the most compelling, and most challenging voices in the Men's Human Rights Movement – and as I watched him deliver home truth after conviction after bombshell I knew that somehow I wanted to bring his unique message to a wider audience. I have finally managed to secure a keynote presentation for him at Messages for Men 2, in recognition of International Men's Day, this month.

2018 is the second year that the Men's Day March Committee have brought a march and conference to London to mark Men's Day. It's a highly important year for men, in the U.K. maybe more so than anywhere else, with not only the centenary of the First World War Armistice but also that of The Representation of the People Act 1918 which granted 5.6 million men the vote. We will also be celebrating the retirement of, feminist ideologue, Alison Saunders as Director of Public Prosecutions at the Criminal Prosecution Service. Her tenure saw the police dragged into a scandal in which pressure to increase convictions for sex offences led forces to withhold exonerating evidence. David Pattinson (who will be in attendance) is currently organising a Citizens Prosecution for her "crimes against British men".

The marchers will meet at The Royal Courts of Justice from 11am, to be ready to walk at 12pm to Parliament Square. We will be raising awareness of issues facing men and boys, celebrating men and making a public declaration of our intent to contribute to the inception of a more just society.

Messages for Men 2 will take place at an undisclosed location near Leicester Square from 3-11pm. Also speaking at the conference are:

Doctor Randomercam: Honey Badger, YouTuber and comedic iconoclast, famed for his use of puppets & music – his hat is a cult icon in its own right.

Ewan Jones: YouTuber (covering a range of areas but with a special and unique focus on U.K. gender politics).

Will Styles: who has spent the past three years battling his university's student union to create a Men's Forum.

Craig Sandiford: owner of online support group for alienated fathers, Equal Rights for Dads, with his partner (Lisa Chamberlain).

Mike Buchanan: leader of the Justice for Men & Boys (and the women who love them) political party.

Vincent McGovern: a leading voice for fathers and shared-parenting here in the UK.

William Collins: esteemed blogger at The Illustrated Empathy Gap.

Neil Lyndon: critically important journalist who consistently breaks ground with his articles, as with his book 'No More Sex War'.

Daniel Bostok: libertarian satirist and sometime comedy singer.

Will Franken: politically incorrect and surreal comedian.

The event will also feature exclusive videos from:

Janice Fiamengo: antifeminist academic and host of The Fiamengo Files.

Anthony Sameroff: host of the Be Yourself and Love It and Scottish Liberty Podcasts.

Paul Elam: founder of A Voice for Men.

As I noted last year, these are all the days pertaining to females recognised by the United Nations: International Women's Day, International Day of the Girl Child, International Day of Zero Tolerance to Female Genital Mutilation, International Day of Women and Girls in Science, International Widows Day, International Day of Rural Women, International Day for the Elimination of Violence Against Women. There are none for men and/or boys. In fact, the unofficially recognised International Men's Day is celebrated by the U.N. as World Toilet Day.

Apparently the contribution men and boys have made to the world are unremarkable and their issues are unworthy of being marked and struggled against. If you disagree, and can make it to London on Sunday the 18th November, please join us at the March for Men and Messages for Men 2 conference – if you disagree but can't make it, hold on for our videos. And, while we're here, please consider contributing to the social media hashtag project #MenAreAwesome, alongside #InternationalMensDay on the day itself (19th November).

Women in the 16th century sued their husbands for erectile dysfunction

Melissa Sartore · 9 November 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Sex, marriage, and impotence are the sorts of private matters not usually heard in public discourse. But in the 14th century, erectile dysfunction was under increased scrutiny in Europe. In pre-modern France, a woman could bring her husband to public trial for an annulment on the grounds that he was impotent. Impotence as a basis for divorce wasn't unique to France, similar accusations were made in medieval Spain and England as well.

The methods by which men had to prove their virility reached increasingly invasive and public levels during the Early Modern period with intricate medical exams, virginity tests, and even Trial by Congress – a public display of one's sexual ability. This insane method of determining whether a man was up for his marital duty (sorry, the puns write themselves) lasted less than a century. However, in a pre-reality TV world, the public followed these erectile trials closely.

Enlightenment thinkers called it an example of the over-reaching authority of the Church, while the general public just liked to read about the drama in published accounts. Back then, a man's erection was his only weapon in a challenge to his manhood. Without a doubt, pre-revolutionary impotence trials brought what we now consider to be private matters into very public places – literally.

The Church Had A Right To Be In Your Bedroom

From a moral perspective, Catholics and Protestants, among others, argued back then that marriage was the only appropriate outlet for the erotic urges humans suffer (yes, suffer). Impotence, in this context, was a criminal offense. A fraudulent crime against one party in a marriage.

Marriage didn't explicitly become a sacrament of the Catholic Church until the Council of Trent in the 16th century, but theologians and clergymen were active in matrimony through late antiquity and the Middle Ages. Christians who took part in marriage in its sacramental form understood that it was an agreement entered into with provisions. Marriage was between two baptized Christians, it was monogamous, it was for procreation purposes, and it was indissoluble. Protestant views on marriage were similar to Catholics in that it was a necessary institution.

Whether Catholic or Protestant, all religious officials agreed impotence was a valid reason to end a marriage and was definitely a matter of Church business.

Divorce Was Rare So Impotence Was A Woman's Best Chance To Get Out

When it came to marriage during the Middle Ages and the Early Modern period, the Catholic Church didn't allow for many exit routes. The basic goals of marriage were to procreate and provide the only acceptable outlet for sexual urges. Therefore if a man couldn't hold up his side of the bargain, an annulment was allowed.

It wasn't as easy as that, however. If a woman alleged impotence, there was a three-year window before the annulment was granted. In case the condition corrected itself. Additionally, not all annulments allowed those involved to remarry. This depended upon what was known about when and how the problem started.

Protestant Reformers believed that impotence was a valid reason for divorce, but also that remarriage was a must. For Protestants, women could only bring impotence to court after enough time had been given to procreate – anywhere from one to three years – and divorce was granted after a series of oaths or medical examinations.

A Wife Had To Prove She Wasn't To Blame

Unsurprisingly, a woman still had to prove she wasn't the cause of a couple's sexual woes. Her easiest way out of the marriage was to claim the marriage was never consummated. In this scenario she then had to prove she was still a virgin.

One test to prove this was to drink a diuretic. Since the urinary and reproductive systems were believed to be the same, if she urinated immediately, her hymen had been corrupted. An un-penetrated woman would be unaffected (or really good at holding her bladder). She was often subjected to a physical inspection also.

A woman's second best route to prove she was blameless was to claim her husband came with a faulty tool kit. This meant her husband was subjected to physical scrutiny. In 1370, for example, a certain John, was examined and found to have a "member…like an empty intestine of mottled skin… [with no] flesh in it, nor veins in the skin, and the middle of its front…totally black…[that] neither expanded nor grew…"

The Test To Verify Virginity Could, In Fact, De-Flower A Woman

The physical examination that a woman underwent to prove her virginity was, naturally, invasive. She was given a bath, in case she was using something to fake virginity, and then put on a bed in front of midwives and doctors. Her legs were spread and a doctor used a "mirror of the womb" or a mock-penis to explore the woman's genitals.

It was possible to break a woman's hymen this way but was still used as a method to determine virginity nonetheless. If a woman was said to not be a virgin, she could claim her husband had violated her with his fingers or had tried unsuccessful sex thus breaking her hymen.

A Man's Package Was Under Severe Scrutiny

A man with a penile malformation was a relatively straightforward case in these affairs. Similarly, cases of men with too little going on downstairs to allow for sex were quickly found lacking and a divorce was granted. Such was the case of Nicholas Cantilupe whose wife Katherine claimed that "that she could not stroke nor find anything there and that the place in which Nicholas' genitals ought be is as flat as the hand of a man."

Other cases weren't so clear cut. In the late 16th century, Magdeleine de Chastre claimed that her husband, the Baron d'Argenton, had no testicles and was thusly impotent. The two had consummated their marriage, proven by bloody sheets found after their wedding night, but the wife took her case to court anyway. The Baron's lawyer, Sebastien Roulliard, argued that denying the existence of hidden testicles was similar to denying the existence of the heart, lungs, or other non-visible organs. Nor, he argued, were they necessary for an erection.

All manner of impotence was brought before the courts. Accidental, temporary, and intermittent impotence all muddied the waters, so to speak. An increase in medical knowledge complicated impotence divorce later in the 18th and 19th centuries.

Men Had To Give Quite The, Ahem, Public Performance

[image]

Doctors in Spain devised their own methods of testing a man's penis in the fourteenth century: A hot and cold water test. A man's penis was put into cold water, then hot, and then observed for dilation and blood-flow. If this proved inconclusive a male surgeon would then attempt to stimulate the man to erection.

In Naples, matrone (female sex experts) were used. This woman would accompany a couple, rub ointments on them, encourage them to relax, give them aphrodisiacs, and watch to see what would happen. She'd then report back to the court. In France, in a Trial by Congress, men were expected to get an erection in front of the Court, usually by mounting his wife and copulating on demand.

Church officials and doctors did seem to realize that the inability to perform in front of an audience was possible but, generally speaking, a man could either get it up or he couldn't.

Impotence Was An All-Out Epidemic In 16th Century France

Based on the number of impotence cases in France by the 16th century one would assume there was something in the water. Of course, as one of the few ways to dissolve a marriage, it was an appealing process for a woman in a loveless marriage. Upper and middle class women were the most common litigants because they could afford to bring the cases to court.

Several factors contributed to the increased number of and interest in impotence trials. As more and more cases of impotence came to court, treatises and books about law and marriage alike proliferated. Contemporaries attributed the rise in trials to overall moral corruption, as well as the growing audacity and overt sexuality of women, with as many as ten thousand trials held during the 17th century.

There Were Three Possible Results From An Impotence Trial

If a man and woman in an impotence trial abided by their three-year trial period, endured the physical exams, and provided all the necessary info a court needed, there were three possible outcomes. If impotence was not proven, the parties were “condemned to live as man and wife.” If the impotence was proven, the marriage could be annulled – with provisions that one or both could remarry. Last, in rare cases, the couple was asked to give it another three-year trial period and see if things worked themselves out.

Should Christine Blasey Ford go to jail?

Philip Carl Salzman · 9 November 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Christine Blasey Ford disrupted the Senate Judiciary's hearing on the nomination of Brett Kavanaugh to the Supreme Court of the United States of America. She did so by putting into the hands of the Democrat opposition Party an accusation against Kavanaugh of sexual misconduct. She then delayed the hearing by dragging her feet about testifying, with a multitude of dubious excuses, and eventually did arrive to testify, offering a heart-wrenching account of her victimhood at the hands of the allegedly brutal Kavanaugh.

Her accusation was that over thirty years ago, when she and Kavanaugh were in high school, they attended a drunken party where she found herself in a bedroom and was "groped" by Kavanaugh. Ford could not identify the date or time of the misdeed, but, she alleges, has been traumatized her entire life by this terrifying incident. So, to recap, drunken high school adolescents engaged in sexual fumbling thirty years ago. How exactly is this supposed to be relevant to a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing for the nomination of a Supreme Court justice?

So far we have assumed that Ford's account is true. But what evidence is there to support that? The people she identified as witnesses denied seeing any such thing. Nor was there any other kind of evidence supporting her accusation. We were told that this was an experience that Ford discussed with her therapist; but it would be fair to ask, given the disrepute into which "recovered memories" have fallen, whether this was a "recovered memory" elicited by the therapist to account for some contemporary neurosis or nervous symptoms. If so, it could be discounted out of hand.

Of course, we have all hear, ad nauseum, the feminist commandment to "believe women." This requirement to believe women is not only ridiculously partisan, but also obviously foolish. Everybody lies from time to time, if not more frequently. As females are human beings, it follows that they too lie. The many legal cases in which female accusations against males have been proven false, and the penalties imposed on the women who lied, make clear to anyone in touch with reality that we should look on any accusation, by a woman or a man, with skepticism. Accusations should be examined impartially, in a disinterested fashion, and the commandment that we should obey is to "believe evidence."

There are a number of arguments that feminists make about why we should believe whatever a woman says, and any accusation of sexual misconduct by a woman against a man. One is that the woman has suffered a brutal trauma, and to question her account is the rape her once again. This argument assumes what has not been proven, that what the woman says is true. Second is that a woman who has suffered sexual brutality is humiliated, embarrassed, and ashamed, and therefore would only make an accusation if it were true. Once again, this argument assumes what had not been proven, that what the woman says is true. Third, a woman could have no motive but justice, for what other motive would she have. This argument too has not been proven, and in each case should be investigated.

Let us take up the third argument in the case of Christine Blasey Ford, that she had nothing to gain from coming forward. One thing to keep in mind is that anyone who gains notoriety through playing a role in a national political drama is likely to benefit in various ways, monetary and political. Ford has already gained over a million dollars in crowdfunding. As well, she has been offered lucrative publishing deals. Her political standing has been raised to that of feminist heroine for being an abused female who has stood up to her attacker.

Ford is a professor at Palo Alto University, an institution with female to male ratio of 2 to 1 among both students and faculty, a female President, and a strong feminist and leftist orientation. As one former employee says, enthusiastically, "Compelling institutional philosophy aligned with far-left political leanings." Ford has become a heroine of the left as a challenger of a conservative Supreme Court nominee that the left desperately wanted to keep off the bench. So she has benefited in feminist and leftist standing and prestige.

But perhaps most important, Ford's opposed Kavanaugh on feminist and leftist political grounds. One of the central demands of feminism is free abortions on demand, the right to “terminate” inconvenient pregnancies by destroying the fetus. Feminists feared that Kavanaugh would vote against free abortions, and so wanted to stop his confirmation at all costs. Ford came forward to oppose Kavanaugh’s politics. According to the mainstream media, “It is no secret that Blasey is a registered Democrat who has given money to progressive organizations and campaigns.” So was her accusation of minor misconduct thirty years in the past was meant, not so much as a publicizing of a personal “trauma,” but as a major political attack, to cast Kavanaugh’s character as a sex offender, and thus to thwart his confirmation? Does it not appear that Ford’s testimony was an attempt at a political assassination? Ford had a lot to gain from this if she succeeded: a major national political victory. As it is, she has become a feminist icon.

Was Ford’s accusation true? There was no evidence to support it. Did Ford herself believe it? She made a good show of believing it, but that is not the same thing. Perhaps she felt that the political end justified the means of accusation. Ford vilified and traduced Kavanaugh with an unsubstantiated accusation. Should Ford be held to account for that?

In such cases, the person defamed can take the complaint to civil court, suing for monetary damages. As a justice of the Supreme Court, Kavanaugh is not in a position to do that. But there is a question about whether Ford’s testimony to the Senate Judiciary Committee was valid. One of the other accusers has admitted that she lied. The chair of the SJC has sent the name of three other accusers to the FBI for investigation. Lying to a Congressional Committee can lead to charges of perjury or making a false statement.

Ford has no evidence to support her testimony, never mind prove it. Should her unsubstantiated defamation of Kavanaugh go unpunished? Should Ford be investigated by the FBI for making a false statement? Should she then be indicted, and, if found guilty, punished? Others have received jail terms or fines, depending on the court, for perjury or false statements, or had to pay large cash settlements for unjustified injuries to reputation and opportunity. Does Ford deserve less scrutiny?

Stop aggressive women and avoid domestic violence

Tim Patten · 13 November 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Clinical Psychologist's and researchers have identified the poisonous behavior of aggressive women who resort to verbal assault through gossip, innuendo and character assassination used against other female friends and coworkers. But when women become verbally aggressive against the man, she is falling in love with or dating, the cultural equation is toppled and the relationship reels towards becoming dysfunctional. Female aggression can cause long-lasting harm and even lead to death to you and other young men, regardless of race, background or position on the gender binary.

In fact, when the toxicity of female aggression interacts with healthy masculinity, it often triggers an explosive reaction that can undermine your search for romance and love, especially if you have not learned how to overcome it. As Phillip Calvin McGraw, popularly known as Dr. Phil, the well-known American television personality, author and psychologist recommends; if you do not elevate your relationship out of this situation, you may eventually spiral into darkness and despair, and even have your life placed in jeopardy.

The fact is, while most men have at least some familiarity with physical altercations, including punching, slugging, and other such threats, few have been trained to fight back against the weapons used by women's aggression and their verbal assaults. But men can learn.

Unfortunately, if any man were to so much as mention female aggression, in the politically correct world we live in, it usually gets mangled and misconstrued. It is not viewed as something that needs sorting but is viewed as a criticism and an attack on women. More often than not, your efforts to cope with the widely recognized threat of female belligerence will be labeled as misogyny, and as blatantly sexist.

This is not a great cultural value. If you said, for example, that soldiers should not be taught certain ways of defending themselves because some of these tactics might be discriminatory, most reasonable people would probably be responding by saying, you are being ridiculous. But when it comes to helping men deal with the bad behavior exhibited by members of the opposite sex, an altogether different logic applies. Society is apathetic.

In other words, even though research – like that featured at the British Psychological Society's Division of Forensic Psychology annual conference in Glasgow – demonstrates that women are more likely to be verbally aggressive toward their partners than men, any effort to address this issue is dismissed as sexist. Because of this, men are left dangerously vulnerable and unable to navigate such situations.

But a growing number of individuals, including clinical psychologist Dr. Jordan Peterson, are increasingly willing to speak out, despite attempts to keep the issue under wraps. In a video interview with Anne McElvoy, Senior Editor at The Economist, Dr. Peterson went into great detail about the nonphysical but nevertheless aggressive actions that women regularly engage in. With the cover of political correctness blown away, Ms. McElvoy was visibly shaken by the realities he brought to light.

Like many people in our anti-male world, Ms. McElvoy might also have been shocked to learn about the extent to which females exhibit dangerous behavior towards men. According to The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), women are to blame in 55% of homicides stemming from intimate partner violence and a Harvard study said that 70% of domestic violence is initiated by women. Despite this, feminist organizations and society at large tend to focus almost exclusively on men as the aggressor of domestic violence, ignoring or discriminating against victims of verbal female aggression who happen to be male.

Modern Romance

If you are like most young men, you've probably been attracted by the outer appearance of women– flashy painted faces, false eyelashes, and glossy hair extensions. At some point – and maybe even recently – you have spent or are spending a considerable amount of time and money seeking female friendship. Sooner or later, though, friendships become mesmerized by her manipulations and you begin to feel helplessly in love. You date her and yes, you encounter the ecstatic physical intimacy. Eventually, you are in a monogamous relationship, in what might seem like a dream at first.

Then one day, something shocking happens. Suddenly, she starts ranting, hurling abuse in your direction. She screams, “I can’t believe you did this to me! You call yourself a man! You’re just a child! I hate you! I’m done!” As a man, you’ve been taught – or, perhaps, learned the hard way – that you can’t say a word back, or else you’ll find her ratcheting up the volume and attacking you with a slew of morally righteous arguments, such as “You don’t know how to treat a woman!”

At that point, you realize that she is no longer the person you fell in love with – she is unrecognizable. You go silent and breathlessly consider every word you said or everything you did that day or sometime earlier that might have initiated this fit of rage. Your pulse races, wondering what you should do now. You cannot simply treat her like a man – you know if you fight back as you should, you will suffer any number of consequences, and you will invariably be seen by all as the bad oppressive and violent male.

If you are like a great many men, you will feel like you have little choice but to succumb and accept your lot in life. You hunch your shoulders and become a prisoner, a drone worker to her the all-powerful “queen bee.” She has relegated you to “disposable” status, knowing full well that others are lining up to take your spot. Not surprisingly, you feel vulnerable as well. You realize that anything you say will be used against you and that you are destined to lose any argument you might have with her. Your heart stops and you draw your limbs in like a frightened puppy who only wants to escape. Finally, you simply do your best to get through it, hoping that the hostilities end and your feelings of anxiety and dread will go away.

Possible Result of Female Aggression

Unfortunately, this kind of aggressive behavior is probably indicating a rocky roadmap for any relationship moving forward, including if it leads to marriage and children that come along. Heed this “red flag” as a call to action to avoid violence that may lay ahead. Female aggression will not just lead to your own emotional or health-related problems. Based on FBI statistics, nearly 500 husbands are killed by their wives each year, while over 4,000 infants annually suffer a similar fate.

Research suggests that these nonphysical assaults often set the stage for physical violence. Dr. Penny A. Leisring, a clinical psychologist, has found that nonstop haranguing can push a man to the breaking point. You may become violent and suffer societies consequences.

Furthermore, should you marry her and have children, but the marriage ends in a split-up; surveys show us that nearly 20,000 divorced fathers commit suicide each year.

Take Responsibility

To avoid such a fate, you need to be responsible, take a leadership role and make a change. Whether you are already in a committed relationship with her or risk being in one soon, you need to step back and consider where things may be heading. Female aggression represents a crucial life moment and the choices you make at this point will have consequences for your future for a very long time. It is true that her outburst will end, and sex is likely to return to the relationship, but male biology and the promise of what can only be described as a sexual addiction cannot be your only guide.

Instead, it is time to reach deep inside and harness your natural masculinity to make a plan that leads you away from this harmful relationship. Seek safety and freedom. You must place your hands firmly on the steering wheel and guide your life towards autonomy and healthy relationships.

To begin with, you must draw boundaries that aggressive women can never disrespect again and eradicate any thoughts of winning back the love and trust of someone who has abused you. You should ignore the natural urge to comfort her injured emotions. You must move firmly forward – by getting away.

To reach a better place, and to experience freedom and genuine joy, you must sever all ties with such toxic individuals. You must build walls and completely block this person from being part of your life, in the flesh or online, directly or indirectly. Unless you end all contact and interactions with her, you risk having her destroy your life.

Conclusion

Life has never been better for men and to make the most of your opportunities, you need to straighten your spine and critically evaluate your relationships with women. There is no hurry to marry so be all that symbolizes good and fully engage with life, meeting others. Integrate the lessons you learn from each person you meet in order to shape your future with the virtues of masculinity you inherited from your ancestors, which is responsibility, strength, willpower, and action. Over the centuries, these attributes have lifted millions out of poverty, created great civilizations, and inspired mind-boggling innovations.

After a short break from women – and, perhaps, discussions with those who can guide you along the way, including a life coach or those you'll find at Men Going Their Own Way discussion sites. Men have no political or advanced education support but can straightforwardly learn from each other. Make your journey an adventure, explore the world and discover what makes you 'tick'. Soon you will look forward to finding a great life teammate. There are women in this world that you can definitely partner with. Understand that there is someone who you will love and they will love you in return.

However, to choose correctly, you will need to make sure you remain fully cognizant of your vulnerabilities and the potentially deadly allure of the merely physical, sexual attraction and making poor choices. Only by knowing the person you with, can you shape the life you truly deserve.

Digging deep on diamonds

Doug Mortimer · 13 November 2018 · Archived copy · Original

One score and 15 years ago, I was working at a large advertising agency. Among the accounts I was assigned to work on was a jewelry chain store. Just one problem: I knew nothing about jewelry. In fact, I had never been in a jewelry store.

Not to worry. The ad agency had an in-house library filled with books, magazines, and journals related to the accounts they served, so I was able to get up to speed pretty quickly on the diamond industry. What I learned was sobering.

Like the average dolt, I figured diamonds were rare and hence valuable. Obviously, they were something of a status symbol for females; showing off a ring to one's girl friends is a female rite of passage, and a big "rock" enhances a femme's place in the pecking order. A woman's desirability is in proportion to the size of the rock on the ring. Of course, having no ring at all consigns a woman to the lowest caste, though no feminist would ever admit that. A woman needs a wedding ring like a fish needs a bicycle, don't ya know.

While wedding rings (or bands) have a long history, most of the time the purpose was not to indicate social status but to mark one's territory. In a sense, the presence of a ring indicates "hands off" my woman. As a symbol of marriage, a ring need not be expensive. The addition of diamonds to the rings, however, transforms them into status symbols.

Diamonds weren't a big deal until 1870, when large diamond mines were discovered in South Africa. The enormous output flooded the market, so how to keep the prices up? Those sparkly little baubles were attractive but how to make them precious, and hence more valuable?

There were, of course, industrial uses for diamonds, but that sort of demand is pretty well fixed. You can't create a demand for industrial-strength diamonds, though obviously the market for them will be better during economic upturns when manufacturing is on the rise. Creating a consumer demand for diamonds has greatly expanded the market. But how did that happen? Well, it started with a cartel.

In 1888 DeBeers Consolidated Mines was formed. This corporation oversaw all aspects of the diamond trade. Over the years, a number of their memes have become widespread. Even people who know next to nothing about diamonds have heard of the famous 4Cs (cut, color, clarity, carats) pertaining to diamonds.

Somewhat less renowned is the story of how diamonds and wedding rings became inseparable. In 1938 Harry Oppenheimer, son of the DeBeers founder, had a meeting with N.W. Ayer & Son, a legacy American advertising agency dating back to 1869. Any number of slogans (e.g., When it rains it pours, I'd walk a mile for a Camel, Reach out and touch someone, and Be all you can be) have emanated from this institution.

That 1938 meeting was called because the price of diamonds was falling worldwide. The Depression certainly played a part, but the real problem was that diamonds had not caught on in Europe. To be sure, the upper crust were into conspicuous adornment, but there were not enough of them to keep prices high, and the masses were not interested in diamonds. Americans were buying diamonds for engagement rings but even that market was depressed, and the diamonds they purchased were the low end of the stock. What to do? The supply was ample, so how to increase demand?

The plan was to interweave diamonds with love and marriage. Sure, a low-cost engagement ring serves the symbolic purpose, but if you really love that woman, get her an expensive ring to show you just how much you love her. And if you're a woman, the more expensive your engagement ring, the more your man loves you. Thanks to gynocentrism, both sexes fell right into line. It should have been no surprise.

In my advertising days, I read a number of works on motivational psychology. Gynocentrism wasn't a term back then, but it was always lurking in the background. It has always been thus; gynocentrism is to motivational psychology as the deep state is to government. They've always been there but until recently nobody ever talked about them.

At any rate, a multi-front advertising campaign was launched. In the dominant media of the time (movies, radio, magazines, newspapers) diamonds took center stage, thus enhancing their desirability.

Well, merging diamonds with love has proved to be a marriage made in heaven. The phrase "a diamond is forever" (and by implication so is love, despite ample evidence to the contrary) dates back to an advertising campaign that began in 1947. By 1956, even James Bond was on board when Ian Fleming published Diamonds Are Forever.

At any rate, the very notion of getting married without a diamond ring became unthinkable in America. Eventually, foreign ad agencies were brought in to sell the concept in other countries. In Brazil, for example, men and women wore a simple band on the right hand after engagement and simply switched it to the left hand after the ceremony. A perfect wedding of simplicity and symbolism! But not terribly profitable.

Now think about engagement rings. These also date back to ancient times, but like wedding rings, they were simpler. It could have been a gold band, or it might have been a ring, a bracelet, or an anklet made of braided grass. That might have been all right in its day, but now we've got all those diamonds available. Let's not let those rocks go to waste!

Another market waiting to be created and exploited was male wedding rings. They are common today but that has not always been the case. My father (born 1914) never had one, and I don't recall my grandfather (born 1896) ever wearing one. Wedding rings for men did not catch on till the second half of the 20th Century. Now they are essential. A man who refuses a wedding ring today would be suspect. If a man has one and doesn't wear it, he must be on the prowl for extracurricular action.

The fusion of love and diamonds was a success, but why stop there? Unfortunately, since diamonds were forever, i.e., indestructible, they do not need to be replaced. Even worse, they were often passed on as heirlooms. Some men even recycle their mother's rings and offer them to their prospective brides.

Thanks to the permanence of diamonds and their reliable supply, the resale market is not robust and not likely to improve. If dead women are sometimes buried with their rings on, it really doesn't make much difference to the market in the long run. A growing population could keep demand high but with the stagnation of wages over the past several decades, people might decide that diamonds, albeit forever, are not for them, and jewelry would revert to being adornments of the wealthy.

The diamond mines in South Africa are far from tapped out, but the discovery of diamond mines in Siberia threatened to flood the market and depress prices. So DeBeers had a tete-a-tete with the erstwhile Soviet Union and brought them into the cartel.

Now if you're convinced that diamonds are for suckers, what are the chances that you could convince a young woman to accept a diamond-free band for an engagement and/or wedding ring today? Probably not good. If you're going to ask a girl to marry you, you better get down on one knee and whip out a ring with a rock when you pop the question.

Buying a diamond ring makes no economic sense, but if you don't do it, you are a tightwad, and a man who does not spend his money on his woman is no better than a man with no money to spend – at least before marriage. After marriage, the man's assets are easier to attach.

In 2015 the average cost of a wedding ring was $6,113. In 2016 the average price of an engagement ring was $4,758. That's almost $11,000 per relationship. Oh, wait, let's not forget men's wedding rings. They averaged all of $468 in 2015. Gender equality, anyone?

Just imagine how much money has been thrown away on these trinkets since the cartel and the ad agency folks went to work. No matter how you calculate it, the amount would be staggering. In fact, one has to wonder how many desires have been implanted in clueless gynocentric men's heads thanks to ad campaigns. Diamonds certainly don't qualify as a need, any more than cologne, hip attire, sports cars, or any of the other goodies modern men waste money on; none is a need, but without advertising, would they even qualify as a want?

What will the diamond industry do if the marriage rate continues to plummet? As effective as ad agencies are, I seriously doubt that they can ever find a way to sell modern marriage to growing numbers of red-pill men. Come to think of it, anyone working as a wedding planner or earning a living in family law courts may have to seek out other work in the future.

I suspect some totally different advertising campaign will arise to keep diamond demand up. I wouldn't be surprised to see ad agencies come up with campaigns to persuade women to buy their own jewelry and leave men out of the equation altogether. Maybe the target demographic will be the growing number of women who have hit the wall without a mate. Ladies, you can fill the void in your life with something shiny and overpriced. Show the world you don't need no man to buy you jewelry.

The ad agencies know what makes women tick. I think they can convince them to buy their own bling. Hell, if you can sell torn blue jeans, tattoos, and purple hair dye to women, you can probably sell them anything.

With Title IX complaint, University of Minnesota female-only scholarships become gender-neutral

Jonathan Taylor · 13 November 2018 · Archived copy · Original

In 2012 then-president Obama remarked that "More women as a whole now graduate from college than men. This is a great accomplishment—not just for one sport or one college or even just for women but for America. And this is what Title IX is all about."

Indeed, that is what Title IX has been all about for the past several decades. But as Bob Dylan sang not too long ago, the times are changing.

Gender-specific scholarships are in the news lately. As we should all know by now, female students are overwhelmingly favored when it comes to financial aid. They receive nearly all gender-specific scholarships as a percentage of the total. In addition, they are more likely to be eligible for scholarships since they continue to receive (as they have for decades) higher grades in all school subjects, as confirmed by a published meta-analysis of 308 studies,

As the National Center for Education Statistics has well documented, significant disparities in graduation rates have emerged across all major degree tiers, as represented in the cluster of graphs below:

You might think that schools would systematically take the initiative to tap the brakes and spend some time re-balancing things. Unfortunately, this has yet to occur.

The inevitable conclusion is that others will start taking their own initiative to "poke" them about the issues. In addition, the pokes will increase in severity and frequency, like a light rain leading into a downpour.

A newsworthy poke has just occurred at the University of Minnesota. A recent article headline in the TwinCities Pioneer Press, a local paper, states:

From the article:

> The University of Minnesota has changed the eligibility criteria for two women-only scholarships and is reviewing other awards in response to a complaint of anti-male discrimination. Mark Perry, an economics and finance professor at the University of Michigan-Flint, has made it his “lifelong mission” to stamp out anti-male discrimination in education.

I love this man already. Discrimination is easy to find in higher ed. It manifests itself in forms both large and small, as further cited by the Press:

> In the past three years, he has pushed Michigan State University to allow men into the women’s lounge at its student union and worked to change who’s eligible for women-only awards and programs at numerous colleges.

Is it a big thing that women have their own lounge? Perhaps, perhaps not – depending on your perspective. To me, the bigger issue is the lack of consistency our culture and institutions apply to these things. With women’s issues, we tend to be highly sensitive to any bias against them, and oblivious (often willfully) to any bias in their favor.

The article continues:

> A University of Minnesota graduate, Perry complained to his alma mater in June about three awards he found online for “women-identified students.” The U informed him Wednesday that they’ve removed the gender-specific criteria from two scholarships. A third scholarship is under review, and the U will stop administering it if it’s not opened up to other genders, Title IX Coordinator Tina Marisam wrote.
> In response to an interview request, the U released a statement Friday attributed to Marisam:
> “The University is committed to offering access and opportunity to individuals of all gender identities. The University regularly reviews the selection criteria for scholarships to ensure, among other things, that they are consistent with evolving understandings of gender identity and laws protecting against discrimination based on gender identity,” it read.

Of course, the last paragraph is a kind of stock statement used as a closing statement for any Title IX event. Regardless, a noteworthy change has occurred here. With persistence, Dr. Perry’s efforts were successful. Determination yields results.

How was Dr. Perry able to do this, even though he is not employed at or attending UMN? Writing for the American Enterprise Institute, he explains that even if you are “not filing a lawsuit, but merely asking for a Title IX investigation of university programs that may be in non-compliance, you do not need ‘legal standing,’ i.e., you do not need to have personally experienced gender discrimination.”

And now to play devil’s advocate: what’s the difference between these scholarships, and scholarships offered to male students? Haven’t we advocated that male students should receive scholarships in the past? It’s a good question, especially considering that we have historically housed the world’s only database of scholarships for male students.

The differences are both technical and ethical.

Technically speaking, the scholarships offered to young men are private scholarships paid for by private funds and administered by private foundations. By contrast, the scholarships offered to these women were administered by a public university, meaning that student funds went into the administration of it. In particular, the scholarships were administered by the UMN Women’s Center.

As should go without saying, there is no men's center on campus.

Ethically speaking, there's nothing wrong with private scholarships. Young women still receive the overwhelming majority of those anyway, despite it being nearly half a century that they significantly underachieved relative to young men in a broad academic sense.

What's next?

What do you think will happen to these scholarships?

1. Will men start receiving them?
2. Will the UMN Women's Center ensure that somehow women will continue to always get them?
3. Will the scholarship close down because those who historically funded it generally have no desire to see its funds benefit male students?

Time will tell.

20 studies show how women do not support other women

Nikita Coulombe · 15 November 2018 · Archived copy · Original

I collected these studies in one place because women talk a lot about supporting other women but when it comes down to it, women often undermine each other in insidious ways.

That women in general cannot seem to get along with other women in the long-term has been one of the great disappointments of my life, and I do wonder if it's possible to better support each other, have more productive relationships with men, and better serve our communities if we have a better understanding around our own behavior and motivations.

Without further ado:

1. Women damage rivals' reputations but do not report explicitly disliking them: Competitive reputation manipulation: Women strategically transmit social information about romantic rivals.

2. Women report experiencing more incivility from other women in the workplace than from men: Further understanding incivility in the workplace: The effects of gender, agency, and communion.

3. Regardless of their own promiscuity, all female participants viewed sexually permissive women more negatively: Birds of a feather? Not when it comes to sexual permissiveness.

4. Women are more likely than men to respond to threats of social exclusion with exclusion: Under threat of social exclusion, females exclude more than males.

5. Females relationally victimizing each other has been observed even in elementary school: Relational and physical forms of peer victimization in preschool.

6. Adolescent girls have a poorer record of same-sex friendships than boys: The greater fragility of females' versus males' closest same-sex friendships.

7. While direct physical aggression is greater in males, indirect aggression is greater in females: Does sexual selection explain human sex differences in aggression?

8. The lifetime prevalence of violence by an intimate partner is 43.8% for lesbians vs 16.4% for gay men: The National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Survey.

9. Mommy Wars: working mothers and stay-at-home mothers argue over who are better parents: "Welcome to the Mommy Wars, Ladies": Making Sense of the Ideology of Combative Mothering in Mommy Blogs.

10. Women react more negatively than men do when outperformed by their same-sex peers: Sex differences in reactions to outperforming same-sex friends.

11. Even in elementary school, girls are less comfortable competing against their same-sex peers: Greater Discomfort as a Proximate Cause of Sex Differences in Competition.

12. Women are slower than men to resolve conflicts with same-sex peers: Human males appear more prepared than females to resolve conflicts with same-sex peers.

13. Women are irritated by sexy female peers: Intolerance of sexy peers: intrasexual competition among women.

14. Indirect aggression from women towards other women is about self-promotion and derogation of sexual rivals: Do human females use indirect aggression as an intrasexual competition strategy?

15. Female groups engage in social ostracism more than male groups: Human Sexual Differences in the Use of Social Ostracism as a Competitive Tactic.

16. Queen Bees: women are less likely than men to develop lower status same-sex peers: High status males invest more than high status females in lower status same-sex collaborators.

17. Women may think other women are good managers, but don't want to work for them: An exploration of unspoken bias: women who work for women.

18. In the workplace, women often see highly qualified female candidates as "competitive threats" that might be preferred and lower qualified female candidates as "collective threats" that could reinforce negative stereotypes about women and do not support either as work group peers: Female tokens in high-prestige work groups: Catalysts or inhibitors of group diversification?

19. The majority of women said their relationship with their female in-law caused them long-term unhappiness and stress: In-law tensions hit women hardest.

20. In a study of "misogynistic" Tweets, roughly half were sent from women about other women: The Use of Misogynistic Terms on Twitter.

Change the narrative

Elizabeth Hobson · 19 November 2018 · Archived copy · Original

We all took different routes to get here. Some of us were lucky enough to be red pilled by persuasive arguments, other's had those pills forced down their throats during harrowing experiences… But there's one incentive for marking International Men's Day that unites us all. We want to change the narrative.

The feminist cultural narrative that holds all men as the malevolent and undeserving recipients of privilege and all women as "oppressed". The dehumanising narrative that prohibits equality of treatment and holistic solutions to individual situations. The cancerous narrative that drives a wedge between the sexes and acts as a barrier to progress.

The truth is that: while women have enjoyed emancipation and the fruits of countless policies aimed at benefiting them, men still suffer a raft of disadvantages in modern Western societies:

Despite its illegality in the U.K., boy children even here remain unprotected from the barbarity that is non-medically necessary circumcision.

Boys struggle more at school, are more likely to be excluded or drop out and by the time they're of age to attend university, they are 70% less likely than women to go.

Men are: the majority of workplace and combat deaths, homicides and suicides.

Men die younger and yet far less money is spent in researching "male illnesses" as compared to "female illnesses".

Men are the majority of the homeless.

There is still, over half a century after the invention of the Pill, no hormonal contraceptives available to men.

If a man desires not to be father in a situation where he has impregnated a woman, while she can choose to abort, have their child adopted or even abandon them in specific places, if she decides unilaterally to keep the baby, he has no legal option to opt out of responsibility.

If a man wants to be involved in his child's life, it is often up to the grace of the mother whether or not he gets to have a meaningful input – and malicious women are enabled time and again to harm fathers and children by the secretive, ideological, morally bankrupt family courts.

Men experience domestic abuse at a rate similar to women but often find that the criminal justice system fails them and that support services for them just don't exist.

Men face discrimination in the Criminal Justice System where sentences are far greater for men than women.

Governments and global organisations like the UN have special departments for women and yet nothing for men faced with identical or parallel challenges. The U.N. recognises 7 annual days relating to womens' and girls' issues and not one relating to men or boys.

And on top of all this, men are subjected to contempt in the public square on a scale unimaginable for women. This misandry can be seen in the media, in interpersonal interactions, education and even in the law with toxic, man-hating feminist beliefs written into bills and public policy.

2018 is an important year for men, in no small part because it marks the end of World War One – the centenary of the Armistice being one week ago today. Over 16 million people died in that conflict, the majority being men.

My great great grandfather William 'Bill' Hesketh was working at the Lever Brothers soap factory in Port Sunlight when the war broke out. He signed up straight away, joining the Liverpool King's Regiment – so early in fact that there were no uniforms or equipment and the men were marching up and down in their civvies with broom handles for rifles.

He sailed for France early 1915. He operated a Lewis machine gun and in 1917 was badly wounded by a shell that killed most of his unit. After convalescing in a hospital in North Lanarkshire, he was brought before a board in London, hoping to get back to the front lines – but they discharged him.

They gave him a six shilling per week pension which he later commuted for a lump sum of £300 which he used to open a clock shop. Unfortunately, during the Depression, as my Uncle Alan says "there wasn't much call for alarm clocks to get people up for work" – so the shop closed down and he struggled for the rest of his life.

But he was lucky even among the survivors, he wasn't (as far as I'm aware) among the quarter of a million men shell shocked (and often accused of malingering). Nor was he among the million injured by mustard gas who ended up with chronic bronchitis, disabling them. The U.K. government refused to admit that the cause of the bronchitis was the mustard gas and left them without any welfare at all, many of them ending up dying on streets.

2018 is also important for men in the U.K. because it's the centenary of the Representation of the People Act 1918 which brought 8.5 million women the vote, yes – but also 5.6 million men. If you look back at the Hansard record for this Representation of the People Act (which has been the cause of so many women's marches this year), it is quite clear that the women question was basically settled by 1918 and that the meat of the debate rested instead on the new consensus that if working class men were good enough to give their lives for their country by the hundreds of thousands, they were good enough to vote for their representatives.

This last year has been a roller-coaster of peaks and troughs – we've had #MeToo which has claimed the lives of:

Benny Fredriksson, head of a Stockholm arts centre, who took his life in March over unsubstantiated claims,

Carl Sargeant who killed himself on the 7th of November 2017,

Also last November, it was reported that an unnamed Labour Party activist killed himself after he was accused of making sexual images of people,

And former movie producer Jill Messick killed herself last February after she was accused of failing to offer solidarity to abused women and instead siding with her former colleague Harvey Weinstein.

Under feminist Director of Public Prosecutions, Alison Saunders, the U.K.'s Criminal Prosecution Service became embroiled in a scandal wherein targets set for rape and sexual assault prosecutions encouraged police forces to withhold exonerating evidence from courts. Innocent men were incarcerated and, as a rule, their victimisers have retained anonymity and avoided their own well-deserved sentences for perjury. Thankfully, all rape and sexual assault cases are currently under review to ensure that evidence has been disclosed and Saunders vacated her post on the 31st of October.

Gender pay gap disclosure became law here this year, fuelling the pay gap myth; and telling the truth about sex discrimination in the workplace remains a punishable offence, with Alessandro Strumia currently suspended from Cern for telling an audience at a conference that "physics was invented and built by men, it's not by invitation", describing how men are discriminated against in the field – to privilege women – and suggesting that part of the reason for low levels of representation of women in physics may be biological.

I must say a word about Supreme Court Judge Kavanaugh – feminists said that obstruction of his appointment would be the peak of the #MeToo movement and, thank God, they were thwarted. And not only that but both POTUS and FLOTUS have made statements in defence of due process and of men. Cheers to that.

And yet, everything we see was built by men. Under our feet: train lines, sewage systems, water and power-lines etc etc- built and maintained by men. The device you're reading this on – predominantly designed, built and programmed by men. In our midst are wonderful male writers, thinkers, speakers and equality activists, fathers, brothers, sons, artists, soldiers: men are beautiful, creative, brave and vital and today (especially) we should concentrate not only on using our platforms to raise men's issues but also to give thanks and pay homage to all the great men who are, who have been and who will be.

Men are awesome!

Guys and dolls

Doug Mortimer · 23 November 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The musical Guys and Dolls was a hit on Broadway in 1950 and a big-budget movie in 1955. I've never been big fan of musicals, but I'd recently read some of Damon Runyon's short stories, the source of the play, and was curious to see Marlon Brando in a musical. So when the movie showed up in a revival series at a local theater, I thought it was worth a visit.

Now you might suspect that the very title of the musical is a problem. It would be easy to dismiss Guys and Dolls as a relic of the 1950s, the decade most despised by feminists, even though Runyon's stories take place during Prohibition. It's not difficult to imagine a stage production or screening today being picketed by social justice warriors. God knows we've seen the fur fly over pettier issues than the names of plays or movies.

At any rate, I wouldn't advise referring to any woman, no matter how attractive, as a "doll" these days unless your significant other is a female android. Come to think of it, wouldn't Guys and Dolls be a great name for a chain of robot brothels?

Whether "doll" is worse than "broad" or "dame" is debatable. Maybe OK at a guys-only poker night, but I wouldn't try it in mixed company (by that, I mean soy boys as well as women) unless you're in an argumentative mood.

Nevertheless, Guys and Dolls is occasionally revived on stage and so far there has been no movement to change the name to "Guys and Womyn." Actually, I think the alliterative Dudes and Dolls, would be appropriate, as Damon Runyon had a character called Dave the Dude in one of his stories, "Madame La Gimp," which was later made into the 1933 film Lady for a Day, and the remake, Pocketful of Miracle, in 1961.

But the title itself is not nearly as controversial as the title song which appears over the credits as well as in a scene wherein Frank Sinatra, playing a guy who makes a living out of organizing floating crap games, is proclaiming his love for Adelaide, his fiancée of 14 years! By the time you get to the end, it's hard to avoid the conclusion that the song is a hymn to gynocentrism:

> Look what's playing at the Roxy.
> I'll tell you what's playing at the Roxy.
> It's a picture about a Minnesota man so in love with a Mississippi girl that > he sacrifices everything and moves all the way to Biloxi.
> That's what's playing at the Roxy.
> What's in the Daily News?
> I'll tell you what's in the Daily News.
> Story about a guy who bought his wife a small ruby with what otherwise > would have been his union dues.
> That's what's in the Daily News.
> What's happening all over?
> I'll tell you what's happening all over.
> A guy sitting home by a television set who used to be something of a rover.
> That's what's happening all over.
> Yes, sir, when you see a guy reach for stars in the sky,
> You can bet that he's doing it for some doll.
> When you spot a John waiting out in the rain,
> Chances are he's insane, as only a John can be for a Jane.
> When you meet a gent paying all kinds of rent
> For a flat that could flatten the Taj Mahal,

> Call it sad, call it funny, but it's better than even money,
> That the guy's only doing it for some doll.
> When you see a Joe saving half of his dough,
> You can bet they'll be minting it for some doll.
> When a bum buys wine like a bum can't afford,
> It's a cinch that the bum is under the thumb of some little broad.
> When you meet a mug lately out of the jug,
> And he's still lifting platinum folderol [stealing jewelry]
> Call it hell, call it heaven, it's a probable twelve to seven
> That's a guy's only doing it for some doll.
> When you see a sport and his cash has run short,
> You can bet he's been blowing it on some doll,
> When a guy wears tails with the front gleaming white,
> Who the heck do you think he's tickling pink on Saturday night?
> When some lazy slob gets a good steady job
> And he smells from Vitalis and Barbasol,
> Call it dumb, call it clever, ah, but you can't give odds forever,
> That's the guy's only doing it for some doll, some doll, some doll,
> The guy's only doing it for some doll.

The above lyrics were written by Frank Loesser, who was a heavy hitter among songwriters. He was born in 1910, so he was pretty well set in his ways by the time second-wave feminism reared its ugly Medusa head. The concepts of gynocentrism and tradcon would have been unknown to him. He died at age 59 in 1969 a week after Neil Armstrong walked on the moon, which might have tempered any romantic illusions he had about that nocturnal sphere.

Guys and Dolls includes another song "Luck, Be a Lady Tonight" which would also raise eyebrows in feminist circles. Basically, the term lady luck equates fickle fortune with fickle females:

> Luck, let a gentleman see
> How nice a dame you can be.
> I know the way you've treated other guys you've been with.
> Luck, be a lady with me.
> A lady doesn't leave her escort.
> It isn't fair, and it's not nice.
> A lady doesn't wander all over the room
> And blow on some other guy's dice.

Today that last line sounds like an obvious double entendre. I don't know what it sounded like in the 50s. Even worse, Loesser wrote the lyrics for "Standing on the Corner" from the 1956 musical The Most Happy Fella. You know that one…

> Standing on a corner watching all the girls go by…
> Brother, you don't know a nicer occupation…
> Brother, if you've got a rich imagination
> Give it a whirl, give it a try.

Objectification, anyone? When I was a kid, this tune was a popular standard. I don't think any male crooner would want to tackle it today. You'd be more likely to hear it at a lesbian bar.

Today the real knee-slapper in the song is the line "Brother you can't go to jail for what you're thinking." Not yet anyway. But they're working on it!

Loesser has attracted some posthumous criticism for "Baby, It's Cold Outside," a 1944 duet about yuletide seduction. The girl wants to leave the man's apartment, he wants her to stay. You probably won't hear this one at your child's Christmas – pardon me, holiday – pageant.

Seduction is a word we don't hear much any more, possibly because it cuts both ways: men can seduce women and vice versa. Either sex can be a victim or a victimizer. Nevertheless, in some feminist circles "Baby, It's Cold Outside" was interpreted as the official date rape Christmas carol! Nevertheless, it remains a Christmas standard and contemporary singers still record it.

Frank Loesser would surely be shocked if he could be resurrected. Remember, when he was writing songs, heterosexuality was rampant. Sex appeal (another term we don't hear much any more) was a good thing. It is indeed ironic that today show tunes are considered a homosexual thing. 1950s audiences surely would be shocked.

The script for Guys and Dolls was not written by Loesser but by Abe Burrows and Jo Swerling. By the end of the movie, their script has longtime bachelors Nathan Detroit (Frank Sinatra) and Sky Masterson (Marlon Brando) brought to heel in a double wedding. One doll is a chorus girl, the other is a prudish, straitlaced, officer in a Salvation Army style organization. Admittedly, she loosens up a bit by the end of the movie.

Curiously, in real life Sinatra was married four times, and Brando three times. Neither had any trouble attracting women; both had plenty of non-marital liaisons. So why in the world would they even get married?

> They only did it for some doll. More than once, so I should say dolls.
> Some guys never learn.

This is the way physics ends. Not with a Big Bang, but a feminist whimper

Janice Fiamengo · 26 November 2018 · Archived copy · Original

We live in the era of the forced apology, and so it's refreshing to see theoretical particle physicist Alessandro Strumia of the University of Pisa, refusing to apologize for defending science from feminist blitzkrieg. Unsurprisingly, thousands of Strumia's colleagues are now denouncing him in a disturbing example of the war on science being waged across the western world today.

It has become a truism that any academic field in which the number of women is not at least equal to the number of men must be a field in which sexism is keeping women out. Any man who contends that there is no sexism in his field is immediately held up as one of sexism's most dangerous exemplars.

We're talking about elite fields in academia, not dirty and dangerous male-dominated jobs like front-line soldiering, long-haul trucking, garbage collection, street paving, commercial fishing, mining, logging, roofing, sanitation, construction, sewer repair, and so on. Feminists aren't fighting to get more women into these jobs. Hence these jobs are never the focus of panels of outraged experts or public statements by academics who have made comfortable and well paying careers out of enforcing male guilt.

When Professor Alessandro Strumia of the University of Pisa presented a paper at a conference of the elite European Organization for Nuclear Research (CERN); a conference on high-energy theory and gender, he must have known that a non-feminist presentation would go down about as well as Galileo's cosmology before the Inquisition. According to the church of feminism, all men in STEM (Science, Technology, Engineering and Maths), must manifest deep concern about the declared "woman problem" and must pledge to make ever greater efforts, even including perhaps sacrificing the best and brightest, in order to meet diversity goals.

And this is a church in which confessing your sins won't bring you any forgiveness—so don't even think about it.

As Strumia mentioned in his presentation, physics is a special community of researchers dedicated to understanding the truth of nature; its requirements are rigorous intellectual honesty and reliance on quantitative evidence. Real science cannot flourish when these requirements are suppressed for any social goal.

Strumia created a series of graphs to show that, far from being discriminated against, women are significantly advantaged over men in physics' hiring, promotion, and financial assistance, and that claims of bias against women don't rest on any hard evidence.

On page 8, he looked at the claim, made in a 2016 paper, that women's contributions to physics are passed over because male physicists tend not to cite papers with female-first authors. He analyzed the data and found that both male and female researchers cited more papers with male-first authors, and to the same degree. Male-first authored papers were likely more often cited by both men and women, he suggested, because the male-authored papers were more significant, not because of a bias against women.

On page 12, Strumia considered the evidence for bias against women in physics hiring by plotting the number of citations male and female researchers have typically had when hired for their first job. Citations—the number of times one's published work is cited by others—are one major way of determining the quality of a person's research: the more cited, the more significant and influential. Up until 1995, male and female researchers had a comparable number of citations when first hired. But since 1995, female researchers have been typically hired with less than half of the citations a male PhD graduate has needed to be hired. In other words, Strumia's graph shows that from 1995 to the present—over the past 23 years—hiring has been overwhelmingly stacked against men.

Strumia showed that female scientists are, at whatever stage, hired with fewer citations than male scientists. In addition, bias against men extends to the awarding of fellowships also. On page 15 of his presentation, Strumia showed that the average number of citations for young male physicists awarded prestigious CERN fellowships is about twice the number of citations for female CERN fellows. So CERN fellowships are being awarded regularly to lesser qualified female physicists because they're female. Strumia demonstrated that male physicists are more productive, again by a factor of 2, than female physicists throughout the whole course of their careers (see page 16).

Why do men outperform women in physics generally? Strumia hypothesized that the intellectually honest answer is that more men than women have the desire and skills to do high-level physics. This is most likely because there are more men clustered at the very highest levels of intelligence according to the standard deviation models—which is not to say that there aren't women who are brilliant, just not as many, because men's IQ distribution is broader—and that accounts for the fact that there are more men in physics.

There is no plot against women; in fact, right now there is a plot, so to speak, against men. If we care about what is best for physics, by implication, we should stop pretending that heroic measures are needed to guarantee female participation.

A view of the compact muon solenoid detector at the European Organization for Nuclear Research (CERN)

Reaction to Strumia's presentation was swift and harsh. CERN immediately removed the video of his talk from its website, so we can't watch it to see if it was really, as CERN officials claimed, "highly offensive." CERN authorities claim that Strumia stepped over the line of acceptable conduct by naming a person present at the conference, saying that in a competition for a theoretical physics position at the National Institute of Nuclear Physics in Padua, a woman with far fewer citations than he was given the position: in fact, as he showed in his presentation, he had ten times the number of citations she had.

CERN authorities interpreted this as an attack, which they state was "contrary to the CERN Code of Conduct." Strumia was immediatelysuspended from CERN pending an investigation. The University of Pisa has opened an ethics investigation into his conduct.

One can disagree about whether Professor Strumia stepped over the line in mentioning this personal factor. Perhaps it was unwise and it definitely gave ammunition to his enemies. In an email he sent to me, Strumia said that he mentioned it in a joking manner. In my opinion, his suspension from CERN was excessively punitive given that much of the talk was pure numbers-based analysis and that the so-called "attack" appears to have been a simple statement of fact.

But the CERN suspension wasn't enough for some members of the academic physics community. A public letter condemning Strumia, co-authored by 18 mostly U.S. based physicists, was posted on a website calling itself Particles for Justice. To date, the letter has received thousands of scientists' signatures.

I've read a lot of public statements by far-left intellectuals, but I think this one might be the most unhinged I've ever seen. It begins with a histrionic assertion that the "humanity of any person, regardless of ascribed identities …" is "not up for debate."

The clear implication is that Strumia himself, merely by objecting to feminist policy, was calling into question the humanity of women or of any other people, which he was not. Everyone who signed this letter should be ashamed of such dishonesty. The co-authors of the letter also lament that Strumia used his physics credentials to pretend that he had something to contribute to a discussion of gender bias, which is not his area of expertise (though of course if he had made a plea for more aggressive measures to promote women in physics they would never have complained that he lacked the credentials to do so).

They continued that "those among us who are familiar with the relevant literature know that Strumia's conclusions are in stark disagreement with those of experts."

This is a classic academic feminist modus operandi. Create a discipline that is based not on scientific methodology but on untestable claims about privilege, intersectionality, lived experience, and unconscious bias. Staff the discipline with ideologues who launch journals and cite one another in their articles. Then claim that a real scientist has no standing to use quantitative methods to challenge the findings of your fake discipline.

In order to show us what only gender experts can see, the letter writers enumerate a series of rebuttals to Strumia's points. Their first and most general criticism is that Strumia "frequently made the basic error of conflating correlation with causation." This might be a meaningful criticism, but they fail to give a single instance in which it is the case.

Strumia's basic argument is that when feminists claim that something must be done about physics' so-called woman problem, and when it can be shown that less-qualified women are being hired in place of more qualified men, then feminist policies are causing discrimination against men in physics. I don't see where the logical error is. On the other hand, one could certainly argue that the authors of the letter continually confuse correlation with causation. They find that fewer women work in high-level physics than men, and that fewer women receive Nobel Prizes in Physics, and they conclude that therefore women are discriminated against due to sexism.

This is a clear case of correlation not necessarily involving causation. Physicist, heal thyself!

The letter writers also include a personal attack on Strumia, undermining his research record in order to suggest that he is a mediocrity bitter about being beaten out of a job by a female competitor. For example, they pooh-pooh his involvement in one experimental paper with thousands of authors, claiming that this one paper accounted for almost 1/3 of his total citations, and that his contribution to the paper was likely modest.

Eminent particle physicist Professor Alessandro Strumia, University of Pisa

I call sour grapes. Strumia was included in this very prestigious paper because he worked on the theory of the Higgs boson, a revolutionary concept in understanding how particles acquire mass; it was hardly insignificant. But even if you take away those thousands of citations, he still has many more than his competitor and the vast majority of his papers have few authors and are highly cited. His h-index of 82 is knock-down impressive, far better than his competitor's 28. Of course it's true that quality cannot be measured solely by numbers—Strumia himself didn't claim it could be—but there is no doubt that in terms of influence as a scientist, Strumia was the superior candidate, and it is astounding that the letter writers try to pretend he wasn't.

When it comes to specific rebuttals of Strumia's points, the wobbly logic is even more obvious. Responding to Strumia's demonstration that both men and women cite more male-authored papers than female-authored papers, the letter writers say that "Choice of references is subject to unconscious bias in addition to conscious discrimination. Such unconscious bias is often found at similar levels in both men and women."

In other words, when women cite more male authors than female authors, bias is still a factor because women can be just as biased as men. This is a real stretch. What happened to the special authority of women's "lived experience," which has become the basis for much feminist theory? If women themselves are just as biased against women as men are said to be, how can bias against women be measured at all, if there is no unbiased standpoint, and then why is it so important to hire more women into physics if they will merely replicate the biases of their male colleagues? The authors do not pursue this line of reasoning.

Instead they go on to assert that just because women and men both cite more male-first-authored research papers, that doesn't mean that there are more significant male-first-authored papers. On the contrary, according to the letter writers, the citation rate "only suggests that male and female scientists are equally capable of identifying the most cited papers in their field."

I'm at a loss with this one. It seems to say that these scientists are citing the male-first-authored papers only because everyone else is citing them, and that has little, if anything, to do with the importance of the publications. If true, this would seem to suggest that physicists are incapable of, or are not interested in, judging the worth of the research conducted by their fellow scientists, quite an astounding assertion that would surely call the entire physics enterprise into question. The letter writers do not pursue this line of reasoning either.

They go on to bridle at Strumia's emphasis on male achievement in physics, including his suggestion that overall more men than women are interested in and talented in high-level physics. They say, "Strumia argues that since the most cited papers are disproportionately by men, this gives evidence that men are intrinsically better at physics. In between intrinsic ability and citation counting, however, there is the huge and complicated process of how physicists are raised, trained, hired, and perceived. Even at the professorial level, discrimination can still play an important role."

Strumia didn't say that men are intrinsically better at physics; he recognized that men and women are, on average, of equal intelligence, but that there are more men who are brilliant at physics and that men's interests tend to be in things while women's interests are in people. This is generally recognized in discussions of IQ; he didn't make it up. But the letter writers simply rule out this whole area of serious research; they won't deal with it, and in the letter they fall back on their standard claim of pervasive bias despite Strumia's having presented hard evidence that far from experiencing negative bias, women are positively advantaged in training, hiring and promotion, three of the main areas they refer to.

Again the letter writers rely on a classic feminist modus operandi: it doesn't matter how often female advantage can be concretely proven; a generalized, conveniently unmeasurable anti-woman bias can never be absolutely disproven and is constantly evoked as if it were a self-evident truth.

Unmeasurable factors are again the fail safe in response to Strumia's graph about women's lesser achievements in physics throughout their careers: They say "Strumia uses as evidence for his case a claim that the number of citations for women increases more slowly than for men as their careers progress. His numbers however do not control for many factors, including social expectations that may result in women taking on more primary caregiver roles at home, or more departmental roles earlier in their careers."

I have no idea how such factors could possibly be controlled for so it is a meaningless criticism, in my opinion. And if social expectations are factors in female underachievement in physics, why is it that in many other academic fields in the Social Sciences, and the Humanities, where presumably women face the very same social expectations, women's numbers and career contributions have massively increased over the past three decades? Why would social expectations be a deciding factor in suppressing female achievement only in Physics and other Mathematics-based disciplines? The letter writers, of course, do not attempt an explanation.

Overall, the letter writers make no attempt to analyze Strumia's graphs to show how any of his numbers or inferences are inaccurate. All they've got is their moral outrage.

And such outrage powers their concluding ad hominem attack. The letter writers end by pointing to what they call Strumia's "deep contempt for more than half of humanity that clearly comes from some source other than scientific logic."

CERN's Large Hadron Collider, a 17-mile subterranean loop that smashes particles at nearly the speed of light

I suppose they couldn't resist. Not only were they compelled to denounce Strumia as a misogynist (and a racist, even though he said nothing about race in his presentation), but they had to claim in good Stalinist fashion that he may be mentally ill as well, or at least a hater, as anyone must be who would object to the hiring of less qualified people on the basis of characteristics totally irrelevant to physics.

And the letter writers go even further to allege that women and other marginalized people who come into contact with Strumia will suffer from his claimed bigotry, the clear implication being that Strumia's professional colleagues and superiors should remove him from positions in which he would supervise graduate students or participate in hiring decisions.

The mind boggles at their willingness to make such a vicious allegation. But when you can't rebut someone's arguments, and when you can't begin to prove that he harbours contempt for women, the only thing you have left is mob attack in an attempt to ensure that Strumia's professional life never recovers from his decision to call out the bullshit that passes for serious discussion at a science conference.

I can only hope that Strumia's colleagues will resist the call to punishment, that they will recognize the utter irrationality of the letter writers' claims. And yet thousands of scientists have seen fit to attach their names to the document. Just scroll through the list on the additional page attached to the letter and look at the roll call of shame.

Name after name after name of presumably smart people, patting themselves on the back for their virtue, finding it easier to demean a leading scientist than to deal honestly with his data. To paraphrase T.S. Eliot, this is the way that physics ends, not with a Big Bang but a feminist whimper.

Excitement brews with the revival of ‘FGM-derived’ skincare range for men

Peter Wright · 27 November 2018 · Archived copy · Original

After the recent lifting of the “unconstitutional” ban on the practice of female genital mutilation (FGM), the global cosmetics industry wasted no time reviving a traditional skincare range for men that incorporates byproducts of harvested female genital skin into the product formula. The controversial practice looks set to flourish as the ban on FGM has been decisively tested, and voided by US District Judge Bernard Friedman.

BigPharma™ CEO Nick Clinton responded to the overturning of the FGM ban, saying, “This is a win for the people; not only for freedom of religious expression, but also for the right to manufacture, buy and use healthcare products that are defined as ethically sourced under law.”

The rejuvenating properties of pulverized labia and clitoral cells are called fibroblasts, collagen, stem-cells and epidermal growth factor (EGF), which have long been recognized as healing agents when applied to aging or damaged skin.

Regarding female circumcision, the partial or total removal of the clitoris and the labia minora is a largely cosmetic practice, intended to aesthetically enhance genital appearance while minimizing risk of infection and foul odors associated with lack of basic hygiene. Importantly, FGM also benefits male partners by reducing the transmission of HIV, aids and other STDs carried by women, particularly at-risk women who lead promiscuous sex lives.

Over millennia the quest for youthful skin has led men to try many exotic treatments. But the one chosen by actor Hugh Whiting perhaps tops the lot in effectiveness – it involves the discarded clitorises of circumcised African girls. The 45-year-old star underwent a facial for the first time last week that uses an epidermal growth factor serum containing stem cells cultivated from the discarded circumcisal tissue of pre-pubescent girls.

Mr. Whiting boasted that the final results are far more appealing than the actual ingredients. Alongside a picture of him with make-up-free face, the father of two told his fans on Instagram: ‘After a long flight, I do like to lie down and be covered in a mask of liquefied cloned clitorises – frankly who doesn’t?’

The $850 facial, which is performed by US-born therapist George Armstrong at his salon in New York, has become a favourite with celebrities. Leonardo DeCaprico, 45, is credited with nicknaming it 'the clitoris facial'.

The serum contains epidermal growth factor proteins, which are taken from the dermal fibroblasts – skin cells responsible for generating connective tissue – of young circumcised girls. These fibroblasts, which produce collagen and other fibres, are then cloned in a lab to grow stem cells before they are put into the face cream.

Experts claim rubbing these stem cells onto the face activates ageing cells, producing more collagen and making fine lines disappear. The secret ingredient is sourced from African countries because it has a large supply of clitoral skin obtained during circumcision rituals, the general custom for young girls.

The continent also has a large number of stem cell banks.

Hugh Whiting enjoying an application of controversial face-cream.
Movie star Hugh Whiting was recently photographed enjoying an application of FGM clitoridenal face-cream. When asked about the ethics of using such a cream Whiting replied that;

> When I first heard about the make up of this cream it certainly made me stop and question the ethics of using extracts from human skin in a cosmetic treatment. The manufacturers however have assured users that the cream has not been tested on animals and does not contain animal byproducts such as whale or seal oils. It contains only tiny micro-quantities of female genital skin that have been harvested firstly in the interests of women's health, rendering the product conforming with the highest ethical standards.

Author note: This article is both a parody and a gender-reversal of the very real article appearing in the Australian Daily Mail that celebrates genital mutilation of male infants and selling of their foreskins to global cosmetics companies who use them in manufacturing skin rejuvenation creams for women.

Philip Davies delivers MGM bombshell!

Elizabeth Hobson · 30 November 2018 · Archived copy · Original

After a scheduled "adjournment" in the main chamber of the House of Commons (home of the British Parliament) last week predictably failed to happen (it was the last item in a packed schedule and time ran out); Philip Davies managed to secure a lengthier debate, albeit in Westminster Hall rather than the main chamber yesterday (Thursday 29th November).

A highly exciting excerpt from the Hansard Record of Philip Davies' opening address:

"I also want to touch on male circumcision: male genital mutilation. According to a barrister's opinion, carrying out circumcision on males when there is no medical need—non-therapeutic circumcision—is a crime under the Offences Against the Person Act 1861, being at least actual bodily harm if not grievous bodily harm. In 1983, Lord Hailsham, the then Lord Chancellor, said of female genital mutilation: "in the case of a minor under the age of 16, there is no possibility that consent is any defence at all. A minor under the age of 16 is not able to consent to the commission upon her of a criminal assault. Neither parental consent nor the consent of the minor would be any defence at all, and if the parents did such a thing, or instigated such a thing or participated in such a thing, it would only render them liable to criminal penalties, too."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 21 April 1983; Vol. 441, c. 677.]

When I put it to the Government in 2016 that female genital mutilation was already illegal before specific laws on the subject were introduced, they agreed that it was. When I then put to them the position regarding boys, they took a different line. They quoted Sir James Munby, who was the president of the Family Division of the High Court, in a case of January 2015: "Whereas it can never be reasonable parenting to inflict any form of FGM on a child, the position is quite different with male circumcision. Society and the law, including family law, are prepared to tolerate non-therapeutic male circumcision performed for religious or even for purely cultural or conventional reasons, while no longer being willing to tolerate FGM in any of its forms."

As the former barrister who I mentioned earlier also said, it would require a parliamentary override for male circumcision to be legal, and that has never existed. No exemptions to the law of the land are permissible for religious or cultural reasons. The Ministry of Justice went on to say that there was no doubt that female genital mutilation could have a physical and psychological impact on women, and also said that some girls die as a result of the procedure, which is absolutely correct. I do not pretend to be an expert in this field, but I believe that boys have also been reported to have died following a circumcision, and I have seen accounts of the physical and psychological impact of circumcision on men.

I understand that the position of the NHS is that the risks associated with routine circumcision, such as infection and excessive bleeding, outweigh any potential benefits. I am mentioning all this because I believe it should be on the record, not least because of the very different approaches to male and female genital mutilation.

The Government said back in 2016 that they had no current plans to change the law in relation to male circumcision. Given everything I have said, there may be no need to change the law to bring about a change in male circumcisions. However, I would be particularly interested to hear from the Minister on that point."

Now it's on record! Thank you Philip Davies, your courage knows no limits.

Video of debate (starts at 15:00:45 with Philip Davies's introduction, and his initial statement on MGM covers 15:11:10 – 15:14:30).

Some MRAs are the enemy of boys and men

Paul Elam · 3 December 2018 · Archived copy · Original

As may be evident from the text, I felt the need to post this to my personal Facebook page and to the AVFM Facebook page. It seems reasonable to post it here, too.

"I agree with you about everything else except this issue." I see that a lot when it comes to the topic of sexually mutilating infant boys, euphemistically known as 'circumcision.' And I want to say that I get it. We live in a culture that accepts the sexual mutilation of boys as normal, even healthy, although the science and history on the subject proves overwhelmingly that it is neither.

The normalizing of this barbaric practice, that removes an important organ and thousands upon thousands of erogenous nerve endings, results in a culture with tens of millions of men who are forced to rationalize and normalize what happened to them. And tens of millions of women who rationalize what they are doing to their innocent, defenseless sons. It enables an industry that makes billions off the practice and even allows us to accept a women's cosmetic industry that uses the tissue of sexually mutilated boys in the name of vanity.

All of this creates a divide between those in denial, those who choose aggressive ignorance of the subject, and those who have broken through the false, heartless denial that allows them to introduce infant boys to life at the edge of a blade.

The divide is most prominent in the men's rights community, where many so-called activists for boys and men ironically still rationalize mutilating them at birth. I see these people speak up every time a make a post on MGM, saying things like, "I agree with you about everything else except this issue."

And to that I have to say, every time: Sorry. Not good enough and never will be.

Everyone, of course, is free to advocate as they see fit. We see feminists in the mainstream all the time pushing agendas that harm women and children. That kind of ironic hypocrisy isn't new and won't go away.

I can say though, here on my personal page, and through the activism I promote, that if you support MGM, you are not welcome here. Please go away. Unfriend me. Don't donate or contribute. And please stay away from anything I do. I don't need help or participation from advocates who claim to support men and boys, but who are so riddled with denial, and so lack compassion, that they would not give those men and boys a choice about whether they are sexually mutilated.

I hope some day the lot of you wake up to the ugliness of your beliefs, but until you do, please take your sick, ignorant narrative elsewhere.

The power of “We” and how language frames how we think

Andy Thomas · 6 December 2018 · Archived copy · Original

A few weeks back I wrote a piece called Nihilism and Beyond for the Zeta Male in which I argued that men should make connections between each other without regard to women. Defining one’s self to be outside the dominance hierarchy is necessary because white knighthood does not serve us and it no longer serves humanity as a whole. The world is changing, I said, and we can’t stop it or make things go back.

I stressed the importance of making social connections because isolation is simply not a good alternative to being part of traditionalist mainstream culture. I try to write about things I’ve done or experienced myself, and isolation is one of them. At the time it was quite deliberate, as I reasoned that because I could live happily my own head, things would be good if I simply cut myself off. After six months, everything seemed fine although I sensed a little emptiness creeping in. After a year and a half, however, I was struggling.

Isolation is nihilism. A life of solitude is not a viable alternative for a zeta male.

A major point I wanted to make in the article is the idea that men should use the word “we” when referring to men in general. Here, I want to expand on this a little.

Some time ago it occurred to me that women have no problem with using “we” to refer to other women or women in general. Then I realised that men, even here on AVfM, never use the word “we“, but refer to ourselves only as “men” or “other men”, and never “we” or “us“. However, when I tried to use “we” and “us” in my writing, it felt uncomfortable and awkward — like I was doing something wrong. So I decided to keep doing it.

It may have felt strange at first, but after a short while it became natural and second nature. Now I try to “quietly” slip it into Facebook comments and discussions in a way that’s almost invisible. It can be kind of fun to change things on people without it being noticed.

I suggest you try it out in the comments section.

No, this is not some ridiculous or grandiose plan in which we are all meant to come together somehow to form a “collective” or “hive mind”. It’s nothing of the sort. It is simply a self-identifying term intended to foster an in-group way of thinking. It doesn’t mean that, all of a sudden, we are subscribing to some NPC-like collective. Given our individuality, there is no danger of that.

I like to think that I’m individualistic. I’m not particularly keen on being told what to do or think. I’m guessing that if have come here and are reading this, then you don’t either.

To use the word “we” is such a small thing to do, and yet so powerful — the language we use frames how we think.

As a general example of how everything is switched around by our choice of language, a few days ago, my girlfriend mentioned in discussion that, “A guy had sex with a maid when he was twelve.”

“No he didn’t,” I replied instantly. “She had sex with him!”

Suddenly I had power to change the narrative. According to our gynocentric culture, he is a boy-philanderer exploiting his poor maid, but switch it around, and we see him as a child victim of a pedophile. See how language from a different perspective changes everything!

And change is what we need. Women have an in-group preference (they have pro-female bias), whereas we not only lack it but, if anything, we have an out-group preference (we have pro-female bias too)*. This is a theme promoted by AVfM’s Jewel Eldora, and if she’s right, things can only go bad for us. I think she’s right, and suspect she has more to say on the matter.

Personally, however, I’m sick of wringing my hands over how bad things are. I’m more interested in solutions.

Using “we” represents only a tiny step in the right direction, but it is an easy step to take on a personal level. Always remember, when you use the phrase “other men” to refer to ourselves, other men use the same language to refer to you. This language keeps us powerless and in the dark. It’s something that must change.

Use “we” instead!

#MeToo, but not #HerToo

Robert Franklin · 8 December 2018 · Archived copy · Original

With the advent of the #MeToo movement, I fully expected men to begin publicizing their own sexual experiences with women. I've certainly recalled some of my experiences in the far distant past (I'm 68) and, when judging them by today's standards, find that I've been sexually harassed and raped by women, not just once, but a number of times. I'm surely not alone, so where are the stories from men about their experiences?

Nowhere as far as I've found, so I write to tell a couple of my own.

I can recall but a single instance in my sexual life when a woman asked for my consent to do a certain thing. I was in my 40s, between marriages, and had an active sex life with a woman I'll call M. At one point, she asked me if I'd be interested in her tying me up. I said I'd have to think that one over. Shortly thereafter, we went our separate ways and so I never had to decide.

The very first time I had sex, I was 16. I was visiting my older brother at college and a young woman of college age, probably about 20, took a shine to me. B was very attractive, slim and with thick, wavy blond hair. I was surprised and flattered when she made it clear that she wanted to have sex with me. We did.

I spent the night at her place and in the morning awoke to find her giving me oral sex. That was a problem for two reasons. First, I was hung over from the night before and second, I desperately needed to pee. But I said nothing and B climbed on top of me, inserted my penis into her vagina, gave herself an orgasm and dismounted. I did not have an orgasm. I was uncomfortable, only wanted her to stop and was relieved when she finally did.

Why didn't I express my reluctance? It's hard to describe. To do so would require a greater understanding and memory of my 16-year-old self than I can muster. But mostly, I figured that if this very attractive woman wanted sex with me, I wouldn't jeopardize the "opportunity." Also, I was so inexperienced that I didn't know how to navigate the situation. I thought that if I expressed any hesitation, she would be offended and I didn't want that. Finally, I didn't understand that sex with a woman was not the rare gem of incalculable worth I imagined it to be. How was I to understand that, even if we didn't have sex a second time, there'd be many other opportunities with different women later?

Was I raped?

By the standards of the time (1966), no. (I of course understand that I was a minor and she was an adult and that, according to the letter of the law at the time, she was a statutory rapist and I a victim thereof. I want to set that fact aside and focus on the incident apart from our disparate ages. Whatever the law may have assumed, I consider myself to have had agency sufficient to the situation. Plus, I doubt that any district attorney at the time would have prosecuted a college-age woman for having sex with a 16 year old.)

By the standards of today, unquestionably. B had neither asked for nor obtained from me any sign of consent and indeed, at the time, I didn't consent, I acquiesced. She began oral sex when I was asleep and never asked if penile-vaginal sex was OK with me. She simply assumed it was. If she and I were college students today and the incident came before a college panel deciding cases of alleged sexual assault, she would be judged guilty. Certainly if the sexes were reversed, the man would be found at fault and expelled.

So what if B were to be nominated to serve in some governmental position requiring the approval of Congress – say, a federal judge? Should she be barred from that job based on her conduct with me over 50 years ago? Should I raise the issue in the first place? What if she ran for state legislator? Should voters deny her a seat due to her conduct toward me? Perhaps she's a physician in a medical group practice. Can she be trusted to treat teenaged boys? Should she be ousted from the clinic altogether? If she's a university professor, should she be stripped of tenure and fired?

My answer to all those questions is of course 'no.' What people do in sexual encounters and that falls outside the realm of the forcible or intentionally coercive simply has no bearing on their abilities or integrity in other areas of life. Besides, while my experience with B began pleasantly and ended less so, I was in no way traumatized by it. Perhaps B should have been more thoughtful; perhaps I should have been more assertive. But she wanted a second orgasm and figured I did too. Our failure was one of communication. She didn't ask and I didn't explain. Each of us could have, but neither of us did. It was a failure, but not an important one. Life is chock full of experiences that could have been better.

I could go on to recount the numerous butt-grabs and crotch fondlings, kisses and feel-ups over the years, all by women I either was or wasn't attracted to, but won't. Today they'd constitute sexual assault and/or sexual harassment. Then, it was just part of the sexual (or in some cases just playful) dance young adults took part in. None of it was harmful, none of it indicated personality flaws and none of it meant anything beyond the boundaries of the behavior itself and the relationship in which it occurred.

And that of course is one of the most important points that today's debate about sexual behavior entirely misses – the difference between what matters and what doesn't. Forcible rape matters; a tipsy kiss under the mistletoe at a company Christmas party doesn't, or shouldn't.

But today, we're asked to believe that no aspect of men's the sexual behavior should be free from minute examination and condemnation. Did powerhouse attorney William Voge "sext" with a woman he'd never met (and still hasn't) during two nights while on a business trip? He did and she "sexted back," and later said it was all consensual, but she still complained to his employer and he was still fired because of it. Did Steven Galloway have a consensual sexual affair with a woman many years his senior? He did, but the fair maid still complained and he was still fired because of it. Did Richard Ned Lebow make a silly joke in an elevator? He did, but a complete stranger complained and he was publicly humiliated and censured because of it.

The list goes on and on and it'll become ever longer until men start to tell their own stories of how women behave sexually. Doing so would accomplish at least a couple of things. First, it would make clear what everyone already knows but no one says – that women rarely conform to the standard of behavior #MeToo demands of men. That would remove much of the power #MeToo has to damage careers and reputations. Second, when the same shoe that pinches men causes women pain, then gynocentrism may demand that we back off of the notion that any allegation, regardless of how trivial demands an instant finding of guilt and draconian punishment. After all, we can't have women's careers damaged because of some inconsiderate behavior decades ago, now can we.

In any case, guys, tell your stories. Who knows? A semblance of order and good sense may result.

Marketing equity, pocketing profits

Doug Mortimer · 8 December 2018 · Archived copy · Original

A few weeks ago, I was browsing in a General Nutrition Center and came across some containers of collagen. If you aren't familiar with this stuff, you should be, as it is a protein that literally holds the body together and is present in bones, muscles, skin, and tendons.

I noticed that "Men's Collagen" was located, appropriately enough, in the men's health section. Well, knowing that collagen was essential for men and women alike, I wondered why this product was aimed at men. Eventually, I came across an identical container of collagen but the label was aimed at neither men nor women. Just "Collagen." I compared the content and the dosage with the men's collagen. No difference whatsoever, aside from the label. Why would the manufacturer do this?

I know it's a cliché, but it's still true: Follow the money.

If you think collagen is necessary to maintain your masculinity (as opposed to just keeping you alive), then you will be more likely to buy it. They're not lying to you. Collagen is indeed essential for men. It's just as essential for women but if they said that, they wouldn't get your attention. Men will buy a product if they think it will enhance their masculinity; ditto women re femininity, though they may not admit it openly these days. This is a more powerful motivator than a product that merely enhances human health.

Girly products (shoes, clothing, cosmetics, perfume) are still sold via this method, but today the Strong, Independent Woman (when are they going to get around to copyrighting this phrase?) represents an emerging market. Hence the increase in "you go, girl" advertising and promotions. If you want to sell to a Strong, Independent Woman® (the copyright just came through!), you have to differentiate them from more traditional women. According to the old advertising dictum, don't tell people what to buy, tell them who they are.

Sometimes it's obvious, as in the old advertisements for Virginia Slims, the cigarette aimed directly at women back in the 1960s with the slogan, "You've come a long way, baby"? For men, "It's Miller time!" or "What sort of man reads Playboy?" The implication is that your identity as a modern man or a woman depends not so much upon what you are and what you do but upon what products you buy.

Well, advertising folk, men and women alike, are paid the big bucks to know how to tap into the deep states of male and female psychology. Nothing new about that. Advertising pertaining to the great outdoors (pickup trucks, bass boats, fishing and camping gear) has largely been aimed at men. Is this yet another example of benign sexism? Mother nature isn't welcoming her sisters? Get with the program, Gaia!

In truth, when you think of outdoorsy people, you likely think of a bunch of guys climbing mountains, hiking, fishing, sitting around the campfire, drinking beer, belching, farting, whatever. After all, men can urinate standing up, hence the expression, "the world is your urinal." For women, squatting in the bush requires a little more reconnaissance. There are a lot of creepy-crawlies out there just waiting to grab them by the pussy.

So how to get women to return to nature? Imply that outdoor adventures are an integral part of being a Strong, Independent Woman® — just as Recreational Equipment (better known as REI) is doing.

REI got started in 1938 by "a group of 23 mountain climbing buddies," as the company's web site puts it. The company now calls itself REI Co-Op. I guess that makes it sound less capitalistic and more like a warm and fuzzy collective. No matter what they call themselves, they act like any other chain of retail stores offering brand name products (Patagonia, North Face, et al) and trying to carve out a bigger share of the market while keeping their doors open, meeting a payroll, and paying the utility bills for their bricks-and-mortar outlets.

REI markets outdoors products and services. It may sound presumptuous, but they are actually trying to rebrand the great outdoors as "the largest level playing field on earth" with what they call the Force of Nature initiative.

For an intro to this initiative, go to REI.com/forceofnature. When they introduced this program in 2017, the first image you saw was a yoga pants-clad young woman standing astride a couple of boulders. Her legs were spread wide open and her hair was splayed out by the wind. She was photographed from below, a time-tested technique to make a subject appear more powerful than it would at eye level. Underneath this pseudo-goddess, the caption said, "This is what a force of nature looks like. In 2017 REI is putting women front and center."

Four our edification, there was a one-minute video featuring women of all colors, ages, shapes, and sizes doing…well, doing manly things in the great outdoors. And also doing batshit crazy things in the great outdoors. But that's OK because they're destroying feminine stereotypes…or getting in to touch with their inner Kali…or taking their spirit animal off the leash.

Remember, that great metaphorical chastity belt we call society is at fault! To make sure we get the message, the video reminds us that society tells women they "should"…

Be Careful
Be Quiet
Be Nice
Smile more
Grow up
Wait your turn
Be Graceful
Be Delicate
Be Polished
Be Pretty
Be Thin
Be Popular
Be Successful
Be Cute

I'm not sure how any of the above prevents women from going outdoors. In fact, most of those traits have been self-imposed by women and reinforced by advertising aimed at women, most of which is created by women. But REI isn't going to blame the patriarchy. In fact, they won't even mention it. After all, they still want men to buy their products.

At the end of the video, a narrator intrudes and solemnly declares, "These are the voices we've heard all our lives, but they get harder to hear the further out you go." I guess the smart-ass response to that statement is that the farther out you go, the harder it is to find a shoe store.

The video ends with "Stand with us. Let's make outside the largest level playing field on earth!" The only ending more stirring might be a chorus of women singing Monty Python's Lumberjack song.

For the record, REI's Force of Nature is a four-pronged initiative:

1. To change the typical male-dominated imagery of people interacting with the outdoors.
2. A $1,000,000 commitment in 2017 to support non-profits that create opportunities for women in the outdoors;
3. A pledge to develop upscale technical gear and apparel for women; and
4. Holding more than 1,000 woman-oriented events at various store locations throughout the summer.

Unlike, Cabela's, Bass Pro Shop, Academy Outdoors, and other retailers, REI also offers travel packages. The REI web site offers a host of women's-only adventures, for a weekend or longer (some are quite pricey). This is actually a logical piggyback venture, as the trips they package require appropriate gear, which they will be happy to sell you; or if you buy the gear first, they can offer you trips where you can put it to good use.

In fact, you can even sign up for classes in various outdoor activities. Among these events are instruction in women's backpacking basics, women's bicycle maintenance, women's fixing of flats, women's backpacking basics, women's kayaking basics, or women's mountain biking basics.

Now you might be scratching your head and wondering how women's instructions in these matters differ from men's instructions. There is a class on women's rock climbing, and I concede that the presence of breasts might necessitate some different techniques in this pursuit (I'm sure they can sell you a sports bra that's ideal for this activity). I also concede that the class on women's map and compass navigation could be useful. After all, you can't stop and ask for directions when you're alone in the middle of nowhere.

You won't see any classes for women and hunting, even though women are certainly capable of waiting in a blind, shooting a deer, dressing it, and butchering it. To be fair, you won't see any classes on hunting – period. REI is sometimes accused of being anti-hunter, and while a lot of the gear they sell would be of interest to hunters, they do not sell rifles or crossbows or any other critter-killing devices. If they ever decide to cater to female hunters, I guess they would summon the spirit of Katniss Everdeen or Diana the Huntress, or the U.S. Women's Olympic Shooting Team.

I guess we men will never find out just how these women-only classes and trips differ from coed classes and trips unless some guy wants to go undercover as a faux female. I suspect the classes and trips are almost identical but the women's programs have more ego-stroking. Of course, the women-only participants don't have to contend with that dreadful mansplaining – hence they are provided a safe space. (Not surprisingly, I don't see any men's adventure trips offered.) Supposedly, this will result in getting more females into the fold than coed classes and trips.

The underlying message is that participating in outdoor adventures is part and parcel of being a Strong, Independent Woman®. Unless you want to go the Naked and Afraid route, you're going to need the right equipment, and the more time you spend outside, the more equipment you're going to need. And even if you think you've got everything you need, you can always trade up.

Well, after introducing the Force of Nature program last year, the results are in. Now REI has come up with the downloadable Force of Nature: A Collection of Art & Stories Celebrating Fearless Women. In other words, amateurish artwork, poetry, and travel essays.

REI, of course, is standing by, ready to sell you lots of stuff — and book your adventure for you. The more females involved in outdoor adventures, the more equipment they will need, the more business REI will get, and the more money they'll make! Wow! Who knew that gender equity could be so profitable!

Of course, there is a much cheaper way of roughing it.

Homelessness, however, is a tough sell, even as it grows in popularity among men.

Feminists think sexist men are sexier than “woke” men

Dr. David Ley · 14 December 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Women like bad boys. At least, that’s the story. And there’s lots of writing and anecdotal experience to back that up. Men frequently complain about being “friendzoned,” the idea being that men who are respectful toward their female interests get placed into the role of friend, rather than potential boyfriend. The “pickup artist” community has embraced this concept, teaching men how to behave in assertive, dominant ways that, allegedly, are more successful with women. Many of these concepts and dynamics themselves have been called sexist and misogynistic, reflecting underlying beliefs that women “owe” men sex. The “incel” community, a group of online males who complain bitterly, violently, and angrily about being “involuntary celibates” attack women for choosing “Alpha males” rather than softer, kinder men. . . like themselves.

Women who admit to liking bad boys—being attracted to men who are assertive or dominant—are sometimes criticized as having “internalized” misogynistic attitudes, or simply as naïve and foolish, failing to recognize or admit that sexism is damaging. During the 2016 presidential campaign, female fans of then-candidate Trump proudly invited their candidate to grab them, following release of tapes of Trump discussing grabbing women without consent. These women were proclaimed traitors to other women, or decried as simply deluded. Others have suggested that women may choose bad boy types in order to acquire protection from other, more aggressive and hostile men, a theory referred to as the “protection racket.” Some simply suggest that sexism is insidious, and that these dynamics infiltrate our choices without us noticing.

These are complex, highly politicized dynamics that foster conflicts and finger pointing between the genders. Unfortunately, research suggests that women do in fact find sexist men attractive. Gul and Kupfer recently published research where they conducted multiple experiments, testing women’s attraction to different types of men, and teasing out women’s motivations.
Past research has suggested that evolutionary biology explains these dynamics, pointing to findings that women reportedly prefer men with more masculine features and more indicators of “fitness.” However, many of those sensational findings are in question, with failed replications leading to doubt that these effects can be reliably predicted or measured.

Gul and Kupfer take a related tack, but head in a slightly different direction. They suggest that female interest in sexist men, specifically men who display “benevolent sexism” may be seen by women as being more interested in investing resources in a woman.

Benevolent sexism is a concept describing a form of sexism which is overtly less hostile and misogynistic, and are beliefs that I was taught, as a man from the US South. Benevolent sexism includes beliefs that:

- Women should be “put on a pedestal”
- Women should be cherished and protected by men
- Men should be willing to sacrifice to provide for women
- Women are more virtuous than men
- Women are more refined and pure, compared to men.

Despite aspects of benevolent sexism appearing chivalrous and romantic, previous research has found that women who endorse these beliefs often demonstrate approval of restrictions on women’s freedoms, independence and autonomy, and may impact women’s support for gender egalitarianism.

Gul and Kupfer used several different related experiments in order to test why women find men with these types of beliefs to be more sexy and appealing. They found that women who saw these types of men as more attractive also saw the men as being more willing to protect and care for them, and to commit to a relationship. Interestingly though, these women weren’t love-struck fools, but had their eyes open about these men. Despite being attracted to them, and seeing them as good mates and partners, the women saw these males as being undermining and patronizing men who were more likely to place restrictions on the women.

Gul and Kupfer conducted several separate experiments, showing that their results did replicate in different samples and using different methods (an important strategy in today’s replication crisis), and that the effect was apparent both potential mates, AND in work colleagues. Even in men who were not being scoped out as potential intimate partners, women were more likely to see sexist men as more attractive. Women who were both more and less feminist displayed similar levels of attraction to sexist men, so this effect isn’t the result of women not being “woke” enough.

One of the experiments tested whether women’s ratings of sexist men varied depending on cues about there being more hostile men around from whom the woman might need protection. But here again, women’s attraction towards sexist men wasn’t influenced by her potential need for safety from more hostile men.

Gul and Kupfer’s research offers a new way to approach these complex dynamics of attraction, integrating the role of evolutionary influences, with culturally-influenced social role expectations. It also challenges some of the misleading beliefs that blame both women and men for the persistence of sexism in our society. It's important to note that sexism and misogyny are not identical concepts. Kate Manne suggests that misogyny is more about control of women than about hatred, and argues that sexism is more of an ideology that supports the reasons why we treat women differently.

> "Dating male feminists turned out to be one of the least empowering decisions I've ever made." —Kate Iselin

Women who find sexist men attractive are not being traitors to other women, nor are they naïve women who don't understand their choices. Instead, they are women who are making rational decisions, accepting tradeoffs. They are women who recognize that it may be more beneficial to have a partner who is committed to them and willing to sacrifice for them and their family, than it is to have a "woke" feminist man who wants them to be independent.

I look forward to future research which might explore men's own perceptions of their attitudes towards women. Do men who hold benevolent sexist beliefs recognize that they may increase their attractiveness, while also potentially being seen as patronizing? But for now, perhaps this research can help us to stop attacking sexist men as being misogynistic tools of the patriarchy, and recognize that these social dynamics exist due to the choices of both men and women, for reasons other than power, hatred, or control.

Some stereotypes are permissible

I was driving home from my brother's home last week when I stopped at a set of lights. I happened to glance to my left at a series of billboards promoting various local musical productions and sporting clubs. One of them wasn't promoting any sport or musical- it was calling for an end to violence against women in the Maroondah District. Aside from being a very geographically specific slogan, it hit me in the gut as these disgustingly bigoted advertisements always do.

As I waited for the red light to change, I decided I was going to do something about it this time! No writing an article for AVFM or posting a letter to the council demanding an end to this demonization of men. I was going to be a lawbreaker. I began to fantasize about what I was going to do. Did we have permanent markers at home? Would paint be a better option? I would have to do the deed in the wee hours of the morning when barely a soul was awake, let alone driving down Maroondah Highway.

What would I write? How could I ensure my outrage and the absolute injustice of such a billboard was crystal clear to anyone who happened to read my additional text?

I looked at the large board and began to see more issues arising by the second. As I wear a prosthesis, getting into a position where I could write legibly and keep myself balanced and steady was important. The lights changed as I was trying to decide upon the best approach.

The fact that I was still thinking about possible advice I could write on the billboard meant I was serious about this idea. I began thinking of the consequences. Damn the consequences. If, on the very unlikely chance I was arrested by a cop driving by on a slow night, I could use the arrest as a platform for our stance on the terribly bigoted way we approach the issue of family violence. By the time I got home I already believed I was going to be Australia's version of Rosa Parks.

My dad was right on the money when he used to call me Walter Mitty.

Well, I walked inside and announced my plans to Maggie. She raised an eyebrow and said, "No you're not."

She reminded me that I'm a teacher at a Catholic Primary School which had me weighing up the pros and cons if I happened to get caught vandalizing public property.

As my passion for a midnight hit job dissolved, I thought I'd do the next best thing and write an email to the council. I went onto their website and scrolled around for some time. Who do I target? Would they read it? Would I change anything?

Suddenly, I felt tired. I have spent the best part of 25 years writing letters or emails to newspapers, politicians, authors and journalists. I have had some success but more often than not the result has been stonewalling silence or a polite "fuck you."

I sighed and walked away from the computer.

Today I saw an article which was titled,

'Daring Boys,' 'Caring' Girls Banned from UK Ads in 'Harmful Stereotypes' Crackdown

The opening paragraphs read as follows:

> Adverts showing a housewife looking after the family will be banned from next year in an industry-wide crackdown on "harmful stereotypes" which researchers allege contribute to "real-world gender inequalities".
> The Committees of Advertising Practice (CAP), which creates and maintains advertising codes in Britain, on Friday published guidance on depicting gender stereotypes ahead of new rules coming into force in June 2019.

> "An ad that depicts a man being adventurous juxtaposed with a woman being delicate or dainty is likely to be unacceptable," states the guidance, which claims that gender stereotypes can lower viewers' self-esteem and "limit their aspirations and ability to progress in key aspects of their personal and professional lives with harmful consequences for them and for society as a whole".

I pondered these words for ten seconds.

I shook my head in absolute bewilderment at the stunning irony of these words.

I followed the link to a pdf which provided more details on this initiative.

On page three I found this excerpt.

> Understanding this guidance:
> This guidance is intended to help advertisers comply with the requirements of CAP and BCAP rules in the way they depict gender stereotypes in advertisements.
> A wide body of evidence, including that summarised in the ASA report, indicates that certain kinds of gender stereotypes can negatively reinforce how people think they should look and behave, and how others think they should look and behave, due to their gender. This can lower their self-esteem and limit their aspirations and ability to progress in key aspects of their personal and professional lives with harmful consequences for them and for society as a whole.
> CAP and BCAP consider that, while harmful stereotypes are not endemic in advertising and advertising is not the only factor that reinforces these stereotypes, it is appropriate to restrict ads that include the kinds of stereotypical depictions highlighted in this guidance.
> The guidance is intended to support the interpretation of CAP rule 4.9 and BCAP rule 4.14:
> [Advertisements] must not include gender stereotypes that are likely to cause harm, or serious or widespread offence See Advertising Guidance: "Depicting gender stereotypes likely to cause harm or serious or widespread offence"

So, ads depicting women as housewives looking after the family will be banned!

My mind naturally leapt to the endless advertising campaigns on Australian television, in our papers or on billboards lining our streets which routinely depict men and boys and only men and boys beating and abusing women and girls. I have no doubt very similar ads are running in Britain as I write these words.

Women depicted as housewives-never! Men depicted as vicious wife bashers-sure thing!

The true insanity of this state of affairs is the fact that countless women are housewives whose primary duty is to look after their family and it is a noble and essential role in our society.

A man who bashes his wife is an absolute rarity in our society in a statistical sense. The few who are exposed as violent thugs see their life and reputation shredded, yet the media and government bombards us with images of men and boys behaving in the most heinous fashion. The fact that all men are deliberately placed under a cloud of suspicion, if not collectively held responsible for this apparent carnage behind closed doors, is just the final kick in the guts.

If Alice thought Wonderland was a curious place, what would she make of modern-day Britain or Australia?

How is it possible that such advertisements can continue given the new standards being introduced by The Committees of Advertising Practice?

These bigoted ads which depict men and boys as naturally violent and aggressive toward females is the worst possible form of stereotyping and does incalculable damage to the self-worth of males, particularly young boys.

Surely it is a simple truth to state that young children are incredibly impressionable and a daily barrage of advertising which depicts fathers and sons as vicious brutes, often engaging in the violent assault of females (and enjoying it) will negatively impact males and create an obscene and false stereotype about the male gender.

It seems, Ella Smillie agrees with me.

> Ella Smillie, who led CAP's gender stereotyping review, added: "The evidence we published last year showed that harmful gender stereotypes in ads contribute to how people see themselves and their role in society.
> It will also cause girls to develop a fear and distrust of the males in their lives as this stereotype is reinforced at both primary and secondary levels of education. Once these young women enter universities, they are ripe for the final dose of indoctrination and poisoning of their minds with regard to men and "toxic masculinity."

So, I will watch with interest to see how these new standards are applied to the endless demonization of men in the advertising world. Perhaps the legendary Mike Buchanan or the brave politician, Philip Davies, could look into these new developments and even raise the issue of domestic violence campaigns on our screens and ask how they can escape the gaze of this advertising committee.

I must say, whilst scanning their pdf I found a paragraph which may be their "get out of jail" card should anyone voice concern about the horrific demonization and stereotyping of males as violent, abusive beasts:

> Subject to the guiding principles set out in the scenario categories in this guidance, neither the rule nor the guidance is intended to prevent ads from featuring:
> gender stereotypes as a means to challenge their negative effects.

So clever- "domestic violence advertisements are an attempt to challenge the negative effects of male stereotypes."

How Orwellian.

We allow the depiction of men and boys beating females as the norm in families because this is what men and boys tend to do 'stereotypically', so we must try to destroy this stereotype by constantly showing it on our screens and in our newspapers.

[image]

The pdf states:

> Explicit labelling of children that contrasts stereotypical characteristics in a way that reinforces perceptions of what children can or cannot be, because of their gender, is more likely to be problematic.

Surely this is exactly what these ads depicting boys as violent and girls as passive victims do.

[image] [image]

I remember an advertisement on the walls of a British railway station asking:

Are You Beach Body Ready?

It caused an absolute meltdown on social media and in the public arena.

[image]

I often wonder how the female population would respond if they were subjected to a tiny dose of what the males of our western culture have endured for nigh on four decades?

What a fascinating social experiment it would be to have our government and media begin a media blitz condemning the cruel manner in which so many mothers abuse and neglect their children. The apoplectic reaction to a poster featuring a bikini clad girl gives us some insight as to what might occur.

It really is a shameful period in our history. The mute indifference of most people to the anti -male propaganda in our society is criminal.

Now, if I could just locate a permanent marker, I may yet become Australia's Rosa Parks.

My trip through the polypharmacy blender

Rory Tennes · 31 December 2018 · Archived copy · Original

I agreed to write this story but have been surprised how hard it was to sit down and do it. I knew it all. The words were in my head, yet I avoided getting started. Perhaps it was because of the painful emotions I knew it would bring to the surface. Or maybe because it reminds me of the pain and suffering my family had to endure, how much we lost and the fact that I may not be able to do anything about it. Or it could be my frustration from the cognitive difficulties still affecting me, making writing a difficult task that drains what little energy I have.

My trip started this way: I was ill, injured and in pain. I went to my doctors for help, and they proceeded to drug me into oblivion. My PCP or "family doctor" diagnosed me with fibromyalgia. I don't think he really knew what I had, but once he put a name on my symptoms, he started throwing drugs at them. I was in constant pain, chronically fatigued and began to have severe bouts of anxiety. For four years I saw doctor after doctor but none of them could tell me what was wrong, or why I was getting worse not better despite all the drugs. It turns out I had autoimmune arthritis. I'd had it for 30 years, and since it was misdiagnosed and untreated for so long, my spine was a total wreck.

I have worked in construction for 38 years, as a skilled tile setter with my own business. I love the work, but it can be rough on the back. I am now on disability due to a combination of my disease and the multiple toxic "treatments" I was put on.

Seven seizure warnings… and five for serotonin syndrome

From the beginning of my four-year search and the two years following my diagnosis I was on an ever-changing cocktail of drugs that kept me off balance constantly. I was at that time unaware of the drug companies' influence on medical practice, and I trusted that my doctors knew all about the drugs they were giving me. Big, big mistake! They knew very little about the drugs and the "side effects." They, like me, believed what we are told about side effects – that they are "mild and rare." Nothing could be further from the truth.

My drug list started with Wellbutrin, Trazodone and Flexeril. When Lyrica and Cymbalta were added, the real trouble began. At the end of six years my list of drugs included, among other things, five major drug interaction warnings for serotonin syndrome. Five! Not to mention seven warnings about an increased risk of seizures. And not one doctor saw that as a problem. If they did, they didn't say anything. I carried my drug list to every appointment, so all my many doctors had my updated list. None of them said anything about the dangers. Neither did my pharmacists.

Being somewhat of a health seeker, I really didn't like taking all those drugs and worried what they might be doing to me. I asked friends about it. They said, "The doctors know what they are doing, trust them, take the medications." My meditation/self-hypnosis counselor said, "I have several clients, some of them pro athletes, who take multiple meds. I tell them to concentrate only on the positive effects of the medicines, not on the negative effects. That way your body will know what to do with the medicine." Hmm, that didn't work out very good for me.

How to become an alcoholic in 30 days or less

Before my trip through the Pharma looking glass began, I had quit drinking altogether. I had been sober for five years — solidly sober and liked it. In October 2010 I was on Trazodone and Wellbutrin. When Flexeril and Naprelan were added, within weeks I suddenly had strong urges to drink, which had been totally absent until that point. I now know that Flexeril (cyclo-benzaprine) acts just like a tricyclic antidepressant and should never be mixed with trazodone or Wellbutrin. The urge and the thoughts of drinking came on suddenly and very strong.

I made two trips to alcohol rehab, attended AA regularly but could not stay sober. I had numerous run-ins with the law as well. My behavior had become so bizarre, unpredictable, unstable and dangerous that I thought I had lost my mind and myself completely. I had no control over my thoughts, emotions or behavior, no matter what I did or how hard I tried. I watched my family suffer horribly in fear and confusion at what was happening.

Now I know why. Drugs can drive people to drink for relief from the agonizing akathisia that they cause. Couple that with the disinhibiting effect of the drugs, and it's a recipe for alcoholism. That's not just true for the antidepressants, but Lyrica too. The warning on Lyrica says that "People who have had a drinking problem in the past may be prone to abuse Lyrica." It really should say: "If you take Lyrica you may have strong, uncontrollable urges to drink." Lyrica can cause alcohol abuse, I have no doubt. So can Cymbalta, Zoloft and several other drugs I was on. I didn't have a chance in hell to stay sober on those drugs.

"One way or another, this is going to stop."

By April 2014 I was at the end of my rope. My life and my mind were coming completely apart, and I and everyone else who tried to help me was helpless to stop it. I went to my PCP or family doctor, whom I had not seen in quite a while. I explained what was happening and told him that I could not go on this way. "One way or another, this is going to stop," I told him. He understood what I was saying.

I handed him my medication list and asked if he saw a problem. By that time it included 12 drugs: Cymbalta, Lyrica, trazodone, Trileptal, gabapentin, Wellbutrin, tramadol, Soma, Amrix (more cyclobenzaprine), Etodolac, lisinopril and Sprix (ketorolac). Some were for physical pain, some were for bipolar disorder, and some were for both. The lisinopril was for blood pressure.

He immediately became alarmed, saying "Who prescribed all this!? You can't take all this at once! This is lethal! Serotonin Syndrome. You have to stop!" He had sent me to a psychiatrist a couple years prior to this because of my behavior problems, depression and what he thought might be bipolar disorder. The shrink added more drugs, never suspecting that my problems were all drug-related. The more he drugged me the worse I got. He blamed me – it was my worsening mental illness, he said.

I stopped five of the drugs my PCP had checked off on my list that day—cold turkey. The doctor did not warn me about what might happen if I stopped all at once, and I didn't have a clue this would be a problem. The next few weeks were torture, but I made it. I don't remember much about that period, and maybe that's a good thing. I do not know why I was able to stop that many psychoactive drugs at once and survive, but I did. Several doctors and counselors have commented that I was either very tough or very lucky, or both.

Reawakening

After about two months I noticed I was different. I was sober, and I stayed that way with little effort. My anger, irritability and restlessness had come way down the scale. I could actually think, read and comprehend what I was reading. Something had changed, and I wanted to know why. I started researching; behavior change, causes. I found that chronic pain, chronic fatigue and many physical illnesses can cause behavior changes.

[image]
Rory Tennes
Then I found the RxISK.org site. The most surprising thing I found was how prescription drugs could be responsible for severe and uncontrolled behavior problems. The very same problems I was having! So why did none of my doctors recognize this? Did they not know this about the drugs they were giving me? If they did, they did not tell me.

What some are saying about drug companies running the information show and hiding the truth about their chemicals appears to be very true. Very few doctors are aware of the risks involved in the drugs they so willingly hand out. My shrink was the worst offender. He obviously did not have any clue that all of my symptoms were drug-induced. He followed the DSM to the letter and I was at the point of suicide. I know that to be true since all my symptoms have miraculously disappeared since I stopped taking the drugs.

Imagine that. I didn't need the drugs after all. They were not helping, they were hurting me!

Is anyone looking out for the patient?

When I went back to my PCP after coming off most of the rest of the drugs I had been taking, I took along a RxISK report for Lyrica. I asked him to read it, and sign it if he agreed that my symptoms could be from Lyrica. That is what is suggested on the RxISK site: take the report to your doctor. I had multiple reports for the different drugs, but decided to take just the one since he was so insistent that Lyrica would help me and that I keep taking it. My RxISK score was 8 out of a possible 9, meaning it was very, very likely my problems were connected to Lyrica.

He read it and said he had never heard of any of this about Lyrica. He knew nothing about mood or behavioral side effects from that drug. He would not sign the report, out of fear of being sued, I guess. He acted very nervous and apprehensive. He asked if I was going to sue him, or sue someone. He kept asking about RxISK: “What is it? What do they do? I’ve never seen this before.”

His response to the RxISK report dampened my willingness to do that again. However, I may now have the will to take the rest of the reports to him and my shrink. That would be very interesting to see the look on his face, my shrink. I might just do that.

Recently I talked to the doctor who treats my autoimmune condition about that medication list. I had showed it to him back in April 2014, right before I saw my PCP and stopped the drugs. To my surprise, he said, “I saw that list and I remember thinking, how is this guy even standing in front of me today? Why is he not dead?”

I asked him why he didn’t say anything at the time. He said, “I can get into a great deal of trouble by criticizing the prescribing habits of other doctors. Legal trouble.” WOW. I did not know how to respond, so I didn’t. I just thought about it for a while, what that means for patients. Your doctor might not look out for you, even if your life is in danger, for fear of legal trouble.

I have taken my med list to my pharmacists and asked them for their opinion. All of them said it was way too much medication, with several duplications—two meds that do the same thing. I asked why they did not say something to me as I was getting these prescriptions filled. They said, “Well, your doctor prescribed it, so I guess he thought it was OK.” Another said, “You didn’t ask.”

What writing this has done, I hope, is renewed my willingness to pick up the ball and continue spreading the word about pharmaceuticals and the dangers. I am planning on taking the RxISK reports to the prescribing doctors and to pharmacists. There seems to be so much lack of knowledge and apathy about drugs from the people who prescribe them and sell them.

Every time I hear on a drug commercial, “Ask your doctor,” it reminds me of just how bad the situation really is, and how ridiculous the phrase is. Ask your doctor about _____. Really?

Daddy's Little Nightmare

Paul Elam · 4 January 2019 · Archived copy · Original

I've had many, many conversations over the years with blue pill men about red pill ideas. Interestingly, most of the men I've talked to have been pretty open to what I was talking about. At least in general terms my observations about men, women and the behavior typical to both resonated with them. I've routinely found men nodding agreeably as I described some of their not-so-positive experiences with women in relationship life. They did so even as some of them instinctively glanced over their shoulder, as if to make sure no one was seeing them agree with me.

Plenty of them even quietly acceded to my calling them out on their tendency to tolerate abuse, to enable and play white knight in order to stay out of the dog house. A life spent in some measure of frustration, trying to placate an errant child, of jumping through hoops to keep an uneasy peace is common to a lot of men. Sure, some men don't share this experience. And some men claim they don't. You can hear them bragging about how they are in charge of relationships when the woman isn't listening. But most men I have talked to in relationships identify with this to one degree or another.

Most of them can chuckle at themselves a little bit when they talk about how they put up with the childish demands and entitled attitudes of their female counterparts. Some of them, without compunction, even cast themselves metaphorically as powerless little schoolboys, fearful of being sent to the principle's office, represented by the disapproval of their wives or girlfriends. They do this with no sense of embarrassment, as though they think all men live this way. And of course, there are plenty of men who do.

All this introspective honesty, this good-natured self-disclosure, takes a nosedive, however, when I've talked to men as fathers, vs just husbands or boyfriends. In that matter things become, shall we say, pricklier.

You see, it is pretty easy for a man to admit that petulant childishness is the default setting for a whole lot of women once they settle into a relationship. Most men will just nod their heads knowingly and shrug it off because in their minds, that's just the way women are.

It's quite another matter when you start to talk about the role of fathers in instilling said petulance and childishness; when you acknowledge that "Daddy's little girl," is highly prone to grow up (or just get older) and become "Daddy's little bitch," or much worse.

It's quite ironic, listening to a man complain about how his wife has crazy unreal expectations. He bemoans the fact that she cannot be satisfied, no matter what he does. He claims that he pulls his hair out trying to figure out how to satisfy her endless demands only to be met with more disapproval and, of course, more demands. He wonders aloud how she ever learned to be such a bottomless pit, and such a bitch about it.

Then you go watch him interact with his four-year old daughter, whom he will endlessly coddle and for whom he will go to any measure to make sure she never lacks anything, no matter how trivial.

And it doesn't stop when she turns five. Or fifteen, or twenty-five. When it comes to turning human females into paragons of pissy entitlement, the western father has few rivals.

I remember well former vice-president Joe Biden talking about being routinely physically abused by his older sister, informing the world that his parents would have "gone nuclear" if he had ever defended himself. That was the family rules, and they were not negotiable. The girl got to inflict physical pain on the other children with impunity. The boys got to take it. As Biden recounted, he "had the bruises to prove it."

My clinical experience informs me that the Bidens weren't by any means the only family who operated on the premise that assault was permissible by girls, and self-defense by boys was strictly verboten.

Often, the main enforcer of this lopsided affair is the alleged family patriarch. Along with the idea of bodily autonomy for the girl only is often a whole slew of double standards reflecting the fact that Daddy's little girl has Daddy wrapped around her little finger.

After all, has anyone ever coined a phrase describing how a son has a parent wrapped around his little finger? Of course not, because it largely doesn't happen. The closest thing you'll ever hear to that is the term "Mama's Boy" which is an entirely different story.

A "Mama's Boy," which implies blind service to the mother, is a pejorative pointing to the general weakness of the son and the power of the mother. Having Daddy wrapped around your little finger implies just the opposite. It is the raw sexual power of the female, and the powerlessness of the father, even with daughter in the state of childhood. She can just crawl into Daddy's lap, wrap her little arms around his neck and get her way, every time. He just melts. I will spare us all an analysis of the Freudian implications of that little scenario. It's too gross to go into. Suffice it to say that both family scenarios involve females with power and males without it.

Fathers, in this regard, generally don't take well to a discussion of the subject. I've talked to several of them about enabling dads who treat their little girls like princesses, effectively turning them into cunts who are destined to make a succession of men completely miserable, and who will, in the end, be miserable themselves. Nobody can hold on to any kind of happiness when chronic, insanely unrealistic expectations are the expected path to get there. That's the curse of modern womanhood. It's why so many of them are miserable, and why they feel justified in making others miserable when their plans fall apart.

Now, at some point in the conversations with a handful of these fathers, they seemed to reach a snapping point. "Wait a minute," they'd say, in a suddenly serious and demanding tone, "You're not talking about me and my daughter, are you?" They weren't kidding.

"Why not at all," I lied, aware that we were getting into dangerous territory.

Here I was talking to guys who were so not enabling or over-protective of or unreasonable about their daughters that they looked to be willing to go fisticuffs with a 6'8" 280-pound man if he got too close to the truth.

Either that, or they were reacting chivalrously to an imagined slight against their little princess. I'll let you decide.

There is a great deal that goes into creating a society of women who feel so entitled to unrealistic demands of men that they make themselves and everyone else suffer.

Certainly, as I mentioned earlier, feminism has played a huge role. So, have obsequious, spineless men. The kind who never met a woman they wouldn't bend over backwards to please. There's also basic biology. Men are driven to scatter seeds and the greatest majority of them want and need women's permission and approval to do it. That alone has them urging women toward very unrealistic expectations in the long term. Very few men can maintain the lengths they go through to achieve sexual conquest. We hear women complain about that all the time.

Indeed, as we look at all this from the aerial view, we see that men in one form or another, are the main culprits. It's entirely arguable that feminists are only demanding of men what they know men will ultimately give them, reasonable or not. So, in that light, the sole enablers of all this nonsense are men.

That includes fathers.

Fathers are the first arena where women learn their expectations of men. Fathers are the gateway to hypergamy and gynocentrism. They are women's first lessons in all-take no-give relationships, and where they begin to learn the sheer awesomeness of their sexual power.

Consider that the next time you see a father walking hand in hand with a little girl wearing a tiara and a t-shirt with the word "Princess" written in glitter across the front. Think of it when you hear a teenage girl gush about all the things her Daddy buys for her, or when you hear a father boast that "nothing's too good for my little girl," when they would not dream of saying the same about their sons.

Think about it a little more when you see entire families enable abusive girls; when their relational and other forms of aggression are allowed to flourish at the expense of everyone else, particularly the boys.

And if you ever wonder why corrupt, disingenuous ideologies of privilege, like feminism, are so warmly received by a generation of females who think entitlement is the natural order of things, then take a deeper look at how they got there.

If you are looking clearly, you'll see that chivalrous fathers are a big part of the problem. They shape the training ground for feminists and narcissists. And they will indeed get angry, possibly violent, when you call them out on it.

So, in most cases, it's better to just let it be. There's nothing to be gain by standing between Daddy and his Little Nightmare. Life will deliver its own consequences.

Letter of warning to a U.S. patriot

Elizabeth Hobson · 5 January 2019 · Archived copy · Original

I'm writing from England. Your Godmother, home of your brothers. I'm writing to implore wisdom on your part, that you do not forsake what you have in your Second Amendment of the American Constitution:

> A well-regulated militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed.

I do this because I love you. You remain the only nation as yet successfully founded on philosophy, and that document I mentioned is one of the purest and most sublime expressions of Enlightenment thinking that ever was put to paper. We share heritage, language – jokes, prosperity and suffering. So, lend me your ear.

When you were in the quickening stage of life, guns were the means by which you survived. You hunted, defended, and by all accounts (though to what degree we may disagree) entertained the human propensity for malevolence with them. You feel shame and guilt for the latter now. Maybe because you take your admitted exceptionalism too seriously. The eighteenth century was one like the eighteen beforehand, in that the right of conquest ruled, and your behaviour was not notable for its brutality.

As you entered the birth canal, the gun became the means by which you set yourself free. We wanted you as our vassal but you were too bold and independent for us to hold in subjugation. You shrugged off our taxes and our laws and your servitude, Remember how you used to sing:\

"We fired our guns and the British kept a-comin'
There wasn't nigh as many as there was a while ago
We fired once more and they began to runnin'
On down the Mississippi to the Gulf of Mexico"

We did! And when you severed our cord, you lit a fire of liberty that enraptures the world still.

Upon your first breath though you had the prudence to understand that yours would be a precarious privilege. Power corrupts and expands when given opportunity and your Republic would only last "if you can keep it". Your first line of defence was to be your voice. The second, your firearms.

Free states do close down. Liberty can secede to tyranny. It happened to Russia in the 1910s. It happened in Italy in the 1920s. It happened in Germany in the 1930s. More recently, it's happened in Indonesia, Nicaragua, Chile, Uruguay, Paraguay and Guatemala… It can happen to you.

In many ways, you've been closing down for a long time. In her treatise, 'The End of America – Letter of Warning to a Young Patriot', Naomi Wolf identified ten steps to the closing down process:

Invoke an external and internal threat – The threats may have a basis in reality – but they will be hyped, and they will be the excuse for limiting freedom. On September 11th, 2001, America was the tragic victim of a terrifying external threat – on October 26th, 2001 the unconstitutional Patriot Act was signed into law by President Bush. This law authorized indefinite detention of immigrants, permission for law enforcement to search homes and businesses without the owner or occupants' consent or knowledge, and expanded powers of surveillance for the FBI and NSA to search telephone, email, and financial records without court orders.

Establish secret prisons – Guantanamo Bay detention camp was set up in 2002 during George W. Bush's "War on Terror". Initially considered outside of U.S. jurisdiction, the prison operates in breach of the Fifth and Eighth Amendments and the Geneva Conventions (until 2006 when it was ruled that prisoners were entitled to minimal protections). People have been held indefinitely without realistic prospects of prosecution and current and former detainees have reported torture.

Develop a paramilitary force – More commercial soldiers than regular soldiers have been active in Iraq. Private military companies represent a growth industry who "can't be held accountable to the Pentagon's Uniform Code of Military Justice, because its soldiers are civilians. But they can't be sued in civil court either – because they are part of the U.S. military".

Surveillance of ordinary citizens – It's no secret that U.S. citizens are potentially surveilled to an extraordinary extent. Mass surveillance does not lead to more effective intelligence gathering but tyrannical states may employ it to chill their citizens freedom of speech (and, thus, thought).

Infiltrate citizens groups – In a 2006 report, the ACLU discovered that Californian police had infiltrated antiwar protests, political rallies, and other constitutionally protected gatherings illegally. Such stories have broken repeatedly since then.

Arbitrarily detain and release citizens – The National Defense Authorization Act 2011, signed into effect by President Barack Obama, gave the president the right to detain U.S. citizens without charge or trial indefinitely under Clause 21.

Target key individuals – In 2007 there were 75,000 people on a list requiring extra screening at airports, including journalists, activists, and politicians who have been critical of the White House. Similarly to mass surveillance, this provides no security for but (when people are detained and potentially strip-searched by armed guards) it may successfully inhibit them, as well as disrupting legal activities that may challenge state power.

Restrict the press – "In all dictatorships, targeting the free press begins with political pressure – loud, angry campaigns for the news to be represented in a way that supports the group who seeks dominance." Of course, this quote brings to mind President Donald Trump's 'Fake News' stance – and that does create a disturbing ambience, even if it contains a kernel of truth. However, under President Barack Obama more concerning developments occurred – such as the intimidation of Glenn Greenwald (by U.K. state forces working with U.S. state forces) in retaliation for his publishing of sensitive information obtained by Edward Snowden on the scale of surveillance in the U.S.

Cast criticism as "espionage" and dissent as "treason" – Both Edward Snowden and Julian Assange of WikiLeaks have been threatened under the Espionage Act. Passed during World War One to silence critics of the war, those convicted under the legislation can be hung. It's been utilized more in the last decade than all of the years between it being established in 1917 and 2007.

Subvert the rule of law – It may look like a military coup, it may look like incremental legislative changes, but during the Barack Obama presidency it looked like it would come in the shape of the Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership (TTIP) agreement. TTIP (the negotiations for which were halted by President Donald Trump) was on course to sublimate the sovereign power of democratic governments by regulating trade. Concerns about job losses, safety, environmental protection, and predatory business practices would have been out of the hands of state powers. With everything organized according to this agreement that took place behind closed doors and reportedly influenced by influential lobbyists.

Can you appreciate how serious your situation is? The rumours of your fascistic shift are not merely hearsay – the falsehood is only that it started with Trump.

We lost our guns. Incrementally. Bit by bit, legislation essentially took away our rights to keep and bear arms. It arguably works for us. We're a small island where such regulations can be enforced far more successfully than places with geography more like yours. Our police are largely unarmed, though this is changing. There are legally owned shotguns in the countryside but in our cities, guns are concentrated in the hands of the state and criminals.

Still, even our criminals have less access to guns than your criminals – and this doesn't seem to matter with London competing with New York over homicide rates of late. What does seem to matter, to you, are rates of legal gun ownership. The states with the highest rates of gun ownership have some of the lowest crime rates in your country. We're not getting our guns back anytime soon and that might be too bad for us – but you should continue to be that beacon of light shielded from being snuffed out by your Constitution and Bill of Rights. What you have now is precious and you must hold on to it for as long as you possibly can, knowing that [in the words of John Adams] “a constitution of government, once changed from freedom, can never be restored. Liberty, once lost, is lost forever.”

Besides, it’s currently two minutes to midnight. We’re a single catastrophic event away from total anarchy – the collapse of your dollar, the overdue super-eruption in Yellowstone, a pandemic disease… Something’s going to happen and when it does, guns will be your means of survival once more. Keep them close.

Sincerely,

E. Hobson

A new psychology for men

Peter Wright · 11 January 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: In light of the controversy surrounding the publication of 'Psychological Practice with Boys and Men' by the American Psychological Association, we are pleased to republish this 2015 article looking at the problem of misandry in mainstream psychology.

Psychology clings to a universal model – that men are incorrigibly flawed and require a dismantling of their identities, habits, and preferences before being reconstructed according to a feminist model of masculinity. All modern therapies have this basic premise in common.

For example, one of the more popular models of men and masculinity to emerge in the last 20 years, promoted as A New Psychology of Men, is described in the following terms by one of its founders:

> The new psychology of men has emerged over the past 15 years within the larger fields of men's studies and gender studies. Informed by the academic breakthroughs of feminist scholarship, the new psychology of men examines masculinity not as a normative referent, but rather as a problematic construct. In so doing, it provides a framework for a psychological approach to men and masculinity that questions traditional norms of the male role and views some male problems as unfortunate byproducts of the male gender role socialization process.[1]

Since it's inception this "new" psychology of men has restated traditional gender stereotypes about men; that they are flawed, violent, emotional primitives in need of reconstruction. This supposedly "new" model has also been developed into a training course teaching therapists how to effectively work with men.

The course, designed by former American Psychological Association President Ronald Levant, is based on two principles held almost universally by therapists working with men; a) that patriarchy theory represents the real world, and b) that males are stunted in their emotional processing abilities. Let's look at these two pillars of therapy.

Patriarchy theory

As with most psychologists and therapists today, Levant is informed by feminist-inspired patriarchy theory which posits that all men have power over all women and that such power is enforced by men's violence. The theoretical vision, trumpets Levant, provides a "new" way of looking at men:

> What scholars in the area of men's psychology have attempted is nothing less than a reconstruction of masculinity. It starts from the recognition that there is a problem, and locates the roots of that problem in the male gender role… The new psychology of men strives to address the feminist critique of patriarchy while remaining empathetic to men.[2]

As many readers will know there is nothing "new" in this characterization of men, which we can summarize with the phrase, 'Women have problems, and men are the problem.' As Levant stresses, the primary approach to therapy with men is first to problematize them; "It starts from the recognition that there is a problem."

In this model men are viewed as being problems before they even meet the therapist, who ignores the possibility that men's problems may lie outside themselves in a world of grief they did nothing to deserve.

In other words, whatever the presenting complaints of the client they are immediately dismissed by the practitioner in order to coerce the client into an ideological mold of manhood. The practitioner, depending on their degree of indoctrination, may actually believe this will address the client's issues but even a cursory examination of the "masculinity as identified problem" approach reveals numerous, deep flaws. In fact, this approach proves to be abusive in any reasonable interpretation of the word.

As I explain below there are other approaches to working with men that don't presume they are flawed and need fixing. That approach begins with asking men what they experience in life, and what they might want to achieve in therapy, and actually listening to their answers. Therapists may be interested to hear men speak of a range of experiences and goals wholly unrelated to patriarchal domination of women and children.

Men as emotionally dumb

Referring to men as dumb has the double-meaning of both lacking in intelligence and being mute. This forms the basis of Levant's theory that men possess little emotional awareness about themselves or others, that they are lacking in emotional intelligence, and that even were they to discover some emotional awareness they would not know how to express it in words, such is the depth of male lacuna. He refers to this problem in men as alexithymia – a Greek term meaning no words for emotions, insisting that most North American males suffer from this syndrome.

Levant states that "it is so very widespread among men that I have called it normative male alexithymia,"[3] a syndrome that by definition only men and boys can be labelled with. There even exists a Normative Male Alexithymia Scale used to assess the depth of men's need for therapeutic correction. Levant states,

> One of the most far-reaching consequences of male gender-role socialization is the high incidence among men of… the inability to identify and describe one's feelings in words… men are often genuinely unaware of their emotions. Lacking this emotional awareness, when asked to identify their feelings, they tend to rely on their cognition to try to logically deduce how they should feel. They cannot do what is automatic for most women - simply sense inwardly, feel the feeling, and let the verbal description come to mind.[4]

This claim, that men are "unaware of their emotions," an assumption so typical of psychology's view of men, has been a cornerstone of the therapeutic world for the last 40 years. And it is demonstrably wrong.

According to the vast majority of studies on emotional processing, men and boys are able to identify emotional arousal in themselves and others equally to women, emotions like jealousy, love, anger, sadness, anxiety, etc. But men and boys choose to regulate that emotional arousal not by verbalizing it so much (women's preferred method) but by taking intelligent action. A woman for example might talk with her melancholic friend about what is worrying her in order to cheer her up; the man may invite the same melancholic friend to the movies; both responses -talking, or acting- serve to intelligently modulate emotions.

What Levant has failed to discriminate are 1. recognizing emotions, and 2. verbalizing them. He, and so many psychologists who came before and after him, assume that by not verbalizing emotion males must also have failed to recognize emotions. Countless studies however show this to be a false conclusion.[5] Men, like women, can sense the full range of emotions – but they may choose to respond to that knowledge in a different manner to women.

Breaking with the past – starting afresh

Repackaging patriarchy theory is a move we no longer wish to make – at least not if we wish to genuinely help men. Increasing numbers of men are tired of waiting for the psychotherapeutic industry to drag its collective ass out of gynocentrism-land to develop a genuine new model for tackling male psychology.

To attain that model there has to occur a break with patriarchy theory and assumptions that men and boys are emotional dummies. As in a court of law we begin the new therapy with an assumption that men are not only innocent until proven guilty, but that 'men are good' to use Tom Golden's iconic phrase.

Nor will work with men be savvy until it admits the realities of cultural misandry, gynocentrism and their undeniably crushing effects on modern males. The daily assaults on men and boys from advertizing, mental health services, media, family courts, pharmaceutical companies, education from grade school to grad school, anti-male bigots and ideologically driven governance must be included in the picture.

These are problems which are deleterious to all aspects of men's lives, including mental health. The mental health industry is a huge part of that problem, not a part of the solution.

A sane alternative to all this must disabuse men, women and society of the following myths:

- men belong to a patriarchy and take that model as their life script;
- men are emotionally inept;
- men are default potential sexual predators;
- men are violent and uncaring;
- men are not necessary as parents;
- men are unable to commit;
- men are emotionally unavailable;
- men are not as human or deserving as women.

The things we do want to include in a new mental health model are:

- enhanced understanding of misandry, gynocentrism and their consequences;
- recognizing and honoring men's emotional acumen;
- recognizing and combating misandry and gynocentrism in the mental health industry;
- professional understanding of the ways men differ from women in how they cope with life;
- a prohibition on the practice of expecting men to emulate women's emotional processes;
- an allowance of men's legitimate anger without infecting them with ideological shame;
- the steadfast belief that men's issues, pain and needs are as important as anyone else's.

These guidelines alone are sufficient to create a revolution in the way we work with men.

Quackery, snake oil and charlatans: The Psychologists Association's war on men and boys

John Davis · 11 January 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Barbara Kay has written several excellent articles on the American Psychologists Association's new guidelines on treating boys and men.

In one of her articles entitled: "The American Psychological Association Goes to War Against Boys and Men," Ms. Kay points out:

> Psychologists treating individual boys and men for individual problems should not be basing their approach on unscientific collectivist theories. It is hardly surprising to learn that the psychology profession has become increasingly populated by women in recent years, and also trending younger, meaning more of its practitioners came into the profession after having been steeped for years in an increasingly more radically anti-science and pro-ideological academic environment.

I invite you to read Ms. Kay's article in full. She has some brilliant insights into why Psychology, as a profession, has failed men and boys.

[image]

She also brilliantly points out that the failure of Psychologists to effectively treat men and boys is likely to be one of the principal reasons that men and boys do not seek help from (incompetent and man-hating) psychologists.

I have thoroughly reviewed the APA's new guidelines for treating boys and men. It is beyond "junk science." The APA guidelines on boys and men are the product of charlatans.

Most people outside the "profession" (I use the term loosely) of Psychologists don't realize that Psychology is, and has never been, a science. Psychologists, when they are acting ethically and responsibly, will often turn to science for help, validation and professional improvement. When Psychologists are acting unethically and irresponsibly, they produce toxic attitudes and treatment methods that are designed to serve their own individual hate ideologies, against men, rather than serving the public interest.

I invite you to read the APA's guidelines on treating men and boys. They are nothing but passive-aggressive strategies for denying men their birthrights, their choices, their sexual preferences and their biological identities.

[image]

It is beyond the scope of this article to review all of the 30,000 words. We can, however, take an exampleor two, of the APA's open hatred of men, and, its advocacy for malpractice when treating boys and men.

Let's take a close look at some of the APA's snake oil.

> In epidemiological studies, substance abuse and alcohol abuse were correlated with higher suicide rates among men (Pompilli et al., 2010). Many men use alcohol or other drugs as a trauma-related avoidance response to difficult emotional situations and uncomfortable affective states (Elder, Domino, Mata-Galán, & Kilmartin, 2017), and investigators have uncovered strong links between alcohol and suicide completion (Kaplan et al., 2013).

This paragraph seeks to blame men for using alcohol and drugs to "avoid response to difficult emotional situations." This is beyond "junk science" and ignorance. This is "anti-science," "psychobabble," and misandry.

Science (as any competent professional should know) has shown us that men react to depression, biologically, in the exact opposite manner as women. The APA's guidelines imply that men are at fault for their own clinical depression by concealing their feelings, and, trying to hide their feelings with substance abuse. Nothing could be further from the science on the subject.

Recent genetic research has shown us that men have certain biological DNA markers that respond in certain ways to men's clinical depression. Those DNA markers not only make men more susceptible to being victims of substance abuse, but, are likely to actually compel men, biologically, to use alcohol or drugs.

"The brain transcriptional profile of MDD [Major Depressive Disorder] differs greatly by sex, with multiple transcriptional changes in opposite directions between men and women with MDD." Marianne L. Seney, Zhiguang Huo, Kelly Cahill, Leon French, Rachel Puralewski, Joyce Zhang, Ryan W. Logan, George Tseng, David A. Instead of consulting science, physicians and other reputable sources, the APA has relied, instead, on the demeaning tenets of political gender feminist ideologies.

[image]

This anti-science is exactly what Ms. Kay is referencing when she wrote: "It is hardly surprising to learn that the psychology profession has become increasingly populated by women in recent years, and also trending younger, meaning more of its practitioners came into the profession after having been steeped for years in an increasingly more radically anti-science and pro-ideological academic environment."

Nurse Ratched (The prototype intersectional feminist from the 1970's)

The APA's guidelines go on to demean and disparage "traditional masculinity" (victim blaming) instead of addressing the problems men and boys face with a measure of compassion, science, or sincere effort to serve men and boys as a helping profession.

We haven't seen this level of "professional" quackery since spurious medieval physicians practiced indiscriminate bloodletting and mercury poisoning.

Let's take a closer look at the APA's open hatred of men, boys and masculinity (adopted almost verbatim from radical gender feminist dogma).

> Psychologists understand the impact of power, privilege, and sexism on the development of boys and men and on their relationships with others.
> Rationale
> Although privilege has not applied to all boys and men in equal measure, in the aggregate, males experience a greater degree of social and economic power than girls and women in a patriarchal society (Flood & Pease, 2005). However, men who benefit from their social power are also confined by system-level policies and practices as well as individual-level psychological resources necessary to main- tain male privilege (Mankowski & Maton, 2010). Thus, male privilege often comes with a cost in the form of adherence to sexist ideologies designed to maintain male power that also restrict men's ability to function adaptively (Liu, 2005).
> Sexism exists as a byproduct, reinforcer, and justification of male privilege. . . .

The idea behind this paragraph is to immediately prejudge all men as "privileged" oppressors of women (and other intersectional demograpics). This is straight out of the SCUM manifesto (SCUM = Society for Cutting up Men). One wonders when the APA will begin lobbying for male interment camps to effect their "guidelines" for "treating" men and boys.

This type of man-hating ideology now saturates our institutions.

Our institutions have become so corrupted by feminist dogma, and, gynocentrism, that we no longer have the ability to see men as autonomous human beings. Feminism and gynocentrism dictate that we demonize men at every opportunity in order to justify forcing men to adopt to feminist political ideologies.

Intersectional feminism has implemented fascist techniques, very successfully, and their corrupting sexism and misandry pervades the APA's new "guidelines" for practicing with men and boys.

These intersectional feminist power components pervade the APA's "guidelines" on practice for men and boys. These power components require demonizing men, instead of extending compassion and professionalism to the treatment of men and boys

It would be appropriate for men and women to begin legal challenges to the APA's presence in our schools and universities, their access to government contracts and grants, and, enjoin their open misandry towards the men and boys over whose welfare they purport to administer.

Barbara Kay: American Psychological Association declares masculinity an “ideology”

It is time to boycott Gillette and all Procter and Gamble products

Paul Elam · 14 January 2019 · Archived copy · Original

I've just trashed every Gillette product I have and will soon purging my home of all Procter and Gamble products. Seriously. Now, I could invest the effort to bang out a couple of thousand words on why I am doing this, but it is just as well that I let Gillette/Procter and Gamble tell you exactly why they should never see another dime of your hard-earned money.

Here's the message from these modern agents of corporate hate.

Oh, and you might want to go to YouTube and join the chorus of people blasting this hate speech and down voting it into hell.

New Guidelines for Psychological Practice with Girls and Women

Janice Fiamengo · 15 January 2019 · Archived copy · Original

By now, many of us have heard about the American Psychological Association's Guidelines for Psychological Practice with Boys and Men, released in early January of this year.

The guidelines suggest that traditional masculinity, defined in the report as a social construct consisting of such characteristics as stoicism, competitiveness, dominance and aggression, is, on the whole, harmful to men and to society.

Though even some APA members might admit that it is near-impossible to conceive of the development and maintenance of our technologically advanced and wealthy societies in the absence of these male qualities, the APA insists that masculine men should learn to be softer, less self-reliant, more open to discussing their problems, and more sensitive.

But what has not been reported is that new guidelines have also been released by a body called the Northeastern Ontario Psychological Establishment, or NOPE, a little known but no less respectable alliance of mental health experts.

Its guidelines are for "Psychological Practice with Girls and Women," and address the characteristics of modern femininity. These feminine characteristics do not include stoicism in any form, but they do have a more than passing acquaintance with competitiveness, dominance, and aggression. The release of the guidelines was prompted by the recognition on the part of NOPE board members that nothing like the APA Guidelines could ever have been written if the APA did not have an abundance of members with feminine characteristics.

The NOPE observes that the socialization of girls and women has undergone a significant shift since the 1960s. Girls and women were once socialized to see themselves as partners with men in the formation of families and communities. As the vice-chair of the NOPE healthy community advisory board reports, "Feminine qualities such as empathy, chastity, loyalty, care-giving, resourcefulness, intelligence, modesty, and self-restraint were once highly prized."

Since the 1960s, however, girls and women have been socialized for conflict with men, a conflict in which the leadership, inventions, achievements, physical work, and sacrifices of men, rather than being recognized as a social good benefiting women and children, are now seen as threats to female dominance.

Under the new socialization, girls and women are encouraged to exhibit traits of self-interest and self-aggrandizement. As the NOPE's Director of Health Outreach explains, "Emotional volatility and emotional display—especially extremes of anger, resentment, and self-pity—have emerged in recent years as specifically feminine covert strategies of power."

An NOPE study conducted in late 2018 found that feminine demands for recognition and praise, for everything from unpaid emotional labor, a non-existent phenomenon, to headgear shaped like female genitalia, now characterize women's political and social expression to an extent previously unimaginable.

Outbursts of rage at perceived male failures or transgressions, including the invention of entirely new categories of transgression such as mansplaining or manspreading, indicate generally unrecognized and often denied hyper-aggression now typical of feminine behavior.

The NOPE has found that such feminine attitudes and behaviors are profoundly unhealthy, causing lasting damage both to the women themselves and to their communities. Women socialized in the new femininity are far less likely than traditionally socialized women to form stable relationships with spouses or children, and report far higher levels of dissatisfaction with their lives.

"In extreme cases, they become unable to feel empathy for male human beings, even their own male children, are subject to delusional ideation of innocent victimhood, may engage in false accusations of violence against their male co-workers, friends, or family, advocate increasingly unworkable solutions to social problems, and may even contemplate with equanimity or exhilaration the complete destruction of the societal structures that for centuries protected and supported their female ancestors." –NOPE Guidelines for Psychological Practice with Girls and Women.

A study by an NOPE researcher has found that the more women conform to the new feminine norms, the less likely they are to be able to evaluate with any degree of objectivity the conditions of their society or to take personal responsibility for the circumstances of their own lives. As the past President of the NOPE reports, "Our feminized society benefits women, but also harms them."

The NOPE notes that professional psychotherapists have a key role to play in helping women overcome their negative socialization. Psychotherapists must be aware of these increasingly common feminine characteristics and understand how feminine aggression and dominance manifest in claims of victimhood and accusations against others. They can combat female mal-adaptation and arrested emotional development by encouraging women to take responsibility for themselves and to recognize the harm that false allegations can cause.

Along the way, they can teach girls and women to develop empathy and respect for the boys and men in their lives while fighting against female tendencies to narcissism, delusion, manipulativeness, selfishness, misandry, and other feminine pathologies. The NOPE report concludes on a note of muted hope that with concerted effort, our societies can be improved for both men and women.

Unfortunately, I am the President and currently the sole active member of the Northeastern Ontario Psychological Establishment.

Your opportunity to be in a video responding to the anti-male Gillette TV adverts

Mike Buchanan · 16 January 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Tom, the technical and creative genius who filmed and edited the videos of the presentations at the last three conferences, has come up with a great idea. He's offered to stitch together a number of short video pieces from men and women showing their responses to the Gillette anti-male TV adverts. Your responses can take any form you want, including discarding Gillette products and/or other Procter & Gamble products. Feel free to curse and swear, but Tom will "bleep out" anything particularly strong. For your video to be considered for inclusion, it must comply with the following guidelines:

Deadline – 24:00 GMT Sunday, 20 January [Deadline Extended]
Format – .mp4 or .mov
Duration – no less than 10 seconds, no more than 30 seconds
Identify yourself by name (genuine, or assumed) if you wish
Resolution – HD (1080p)
If possible, use Auto White Balance
Sending the file to Tom – using (free of charge) WeTransfer https://wetransfer.com, email Tom at tokkelossi@protonmail.com

I plan to submit a video myself, and I hope you will join me in doing likewise. If you have any queries, feel free to email me (mike@j4mb.org.uk).

This article has been updated to reflect the deadline extension. –Ed.

A. Man · 18 January 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Just after Christmas, 2004, the Sumatra–Andaman earthquake struck off the coast of Indonesia. Of the videos of that day, the one that stills me into quiescence is the one of people walking on an empty beach, marveling at the tranquility of a subsea surface never before seen. They had no idea what was coming.

I have often wondered what that must have been like for them—so few survived. For just moments later, the ocean returned with a ferocious carnage, roaring with a toxic indifference, wiping them from the face of the earth.

Never again will I wonder what that was like. Now I have a minimal idea. For in the early hours of Tuesday (I live in Europe) I waited patiently for the workday to start, Eastern US Time. I simmered with rage, counting down the start of the business day.

Then I called.

The tranquility of the receptionists at Gillette surprised me. I immediately realized they had no idea what was coming. I did not get angry with them. I engaged them as they spoke of nice weather, a lovely commercial and a great start to a new year. I wanted them to enjoy the conversation—for they had no idea that it was not a low cloud, darkening the offshore sky.

Then the ocean rose.

It was astounding to watch how Gillette initially handled it—sublime stupidity. They had convinced themselves that feminism was ethical and masculinity was toxic. They politely disagreed with some of the comments on Facebook, Twitter, and Youtube, with levity.

The ocean rolled over the levy.

Gillette began deleting posts, like people fleeing a tidal wave.

I called back often to Gillette. I heard the timbre of the voice change from indifferent tranquility, to confusion, and finally to fatigue. I did the same to the companies that financed the advertisement and the companies that directed the film. They were oblivious to oblivion.

The ocean grew furious.

As Gillette deleted dislikes, the ocean brought them back, again and again and again.

I read news stories on how the advertisement was a homerun–a homerun! (you can still find this). One article was titled: "Why Gillette's toxic masculinity ad is annoying both sexists and feminists" – think about that title.

The waves kept rolling ashore, sweeping excuses aside and the land was gone.

I read news stories on how the commercial, at least, initiated a debate.

Then came the stories that something was going wrong.

The tsunami did not bow before the matriarchy.

Feminists levied their charges at the posters: Misogynist!" Crybaby! Snowflake! Sexist! The accusations swirled as the surges spiraled into vortices.

Gillette stopped responding.

I will never forget these days.

I learned a few things these past few days.

Feminists will mock masculinity; and will continue to do so, if unchecked. They have legitimized their toxicity—convinced the world they are ethical.

Men have found a greater, shared voice.

Men raged with a fury I have never seen before; and we have wonderful, loving sisters who support us. I became stilled, quiescent, by the voices of women who love men and do not feel we are toxic.

I soon realized that if men hold firm, the feminists flee: they are cowards. To some extent, this week, feminism has expended its worst at us and we survived. It has nothing left but insults: The Empress has no clothes.

But there is more.

I saw the brotherhood of men and masculinity, around the world—white, black, gay, straight, Asian and Caucasian (Australia, India, England, Canada, US)—rising in support of each other. The Gillette commercial encouraged the very thing it wanted: actualizing men. Men will now hold each other to account, but not for the ends that toxic feminism had hoped.

This is not the time to rest on masculinity's magnificent achievements.

The American Psychological Association is not our friend and feels we are bad; we know that now. Rather than truly help boys, their pronouncements choose to emasculate; they ignore the causes of our difficulties, issue aphorisms; and do nothing.

Never allow anyone to utter the phrase "toxic masculinity" without also enumerating the magnificent achievements and sublime sacrifices of masculinity. Never allow anyone to utter the phrase "toxic masculinity" without also discussing "toxic femininity." Never allow anyone to utter the phrase "toxic masculinity" without stating a plan to help boys and men. Boys and men suffer in a matriarchy that ignores our health needs; ignores disparities in criminal sentencing, ignores the education of boys, ignores false rape accusations, ignores the greater degrees of homelessness, suicide, addiction and poverty of men (blaming it on toxic masculinity)—far in excess of how women are affected and lies about gender wage gaps.

Male bodies fill the tombs in Arlington. Our brothers died in advance of this war that is now beginning. Visit the tombs of your brothers in the war cemeteries and ask them for guidance as we wage this war against toxic feminism.

For myself: Gillette will never be mentioned in my home, again.

We are at turning point.

Now I know what that silence was like on that beach on Phuket Island before the ocean disagreed with the land.

Those people—at Gillette, and the feminist media—had no idea what was coming.

There is a Japanese saying to the effect that sometimes one must move with the intensity of a fire, sometimes with the invisibility of the wind and other times, must be motionless like a mountain.

The fire, this time, was the tsunami. It raged. Calm returns. This is the time to move like the wind and wait like a mountain.

Keep posting on Gillette sites: they will be taken down, so post them again. Do it every day.

Contact the company that made the film: Somesuch.co,

Contact the company that organized the advertising: Gray advertising.

Do not stop calling Gillette. By taking the phone lines for this issue, they make no profit on others sales. It takes a minute to call and costs little.

Explain to one man each week why he should not purchase Gillette.

Speak to store managers and ask they drop Gillette products. Do this every time you shop.

If you buy razors and see another man standing there, stop and talk with him.

Contact the NFL and make sure the Gillette commercial is not played during the Superbowl (do this soon).

Every day remind yourself and know this: “Masculinity is beautiful.”

Vote. Yes, vote. Attend political meetings and object when you hear the phrase “war on women,” and speak about the war on boys. Appeal to mothers of sons. We know the empress has no clothes.

Move like the wind.

Ignore the media lies that the response failed. Wait for the sales reports and marketing shares.

Wait like a mountain.

Surely, there are so many men who have gone before and led the way: Paul Elam, Warren Farrell, Angry Harry, Mike Buchanan, Jordan Peterson and many others. My final words, then, are not to discredit the efforts of these previous men by insinuating that the real battle is about to begin (for they waged the opening volleys), but we must still remember the words of General Yamamoto:

“I fear all we have done is to awaken a sleeping giant and fill him with terrible resolve.”

Feminism as Narcissistic Personality Disorder

John Davis · 20 January 2019 · Archived copy · Original

> "MEN R GROSS AND ALSO RAPISTS. KILL ALL MEN;"[2]
> – Clementine Ford (Modern Feminist)

Feminism, as we know it today, initially arose in the nineteenth century. Feminism was very much a cultural response to the industrialization of the Western World. As our civilization became more industrialized, the social contracts between the men and women begged for revision.

As machines made natural resources and manufactured goods more readily available, the importance of humans as "beast of burden" and "cannon fodder" lessened to some extent, and, women were able to assume many of the traditional roles, in industry, government and other institutions that once required masculine attributes. (Feminists now, often, demean those required masculine attributes as "hegemonic masculinity" or "toxic masculinity.")

The masculine attributes required for traditional roles, at the beginning of the nineteenth century, often required great sacrifices on the part of men. Men were universally exploited by ruthless governments, as disposable soldiers, and women benefited from this exploitation. Most men were expected to devote their working lives to gynocentric policies that afforded women special privileges in our cultures. In exchange for these privileges, and, to avoid the exploitation that men faced in our culture, women had avoided involvement in institutions that demanded life-changing sacrifices from men.

As the industrialization, and mechanization, of our cultures advanced, women began demanding more and more involvement in institutions that had traditionally required the abilities and responsibilities that men had provided. In order for women to obtain the benefits of the involvement they sought in male dominated institutions, feminists discovered that if they could use guilt to manipulate men, and institutions, then, they could acquire all of the benefits of the industrial age without having to assume the same responsibilities as men. This "movement" led to the beginning of feminism, as we know it today.

"First wave feminism" arose in the minds of early nineteenth intellectuals such as Mary Wollstonecraft. In her writings, she hypothesized that women's "roles" in society were a result of deliberate efforts to deprive women of all of the benefits which men enjoyed. Her writings were convincing in that they exposed the differences between the gender roles in our cultures. They were incorrect as they uniformly omit all of the sacrafices to which men committed when they participated in male dominated institutions. Wollstonecraft saw male dominated institutions as playgrounds from which women were excluded. Those institutions, historically, however, were male dominated because their participation required enormous sacrifices and efforts from those men who participated in them.

Wollstonecraft and her supporters, including the feminists of tday, ignore the fact that the disparities in gender roles, as far as benefits men supposedly received, also carried with them heavy responsibilities and burdens for men. Early "first wave feminists" found that by ignoring all of the responsibilities that men traditionally assumed because of their gender, feminists could persuade men and women alike to feel guilty, about the existing gender roles in society, that appeared to confer more benefits and powers on men than were extended to women.

This led to numerous changes in the social contract between men and women. Those changes conferred the same "rights and privileges" on women that men "enjoyed." Almost all of the responsibilities, however, under those ancient gender contracts, have remained for the men.

Although this has been heralded, in revised history, as advancement for women, it has been, in fact, created a gynocentric, privileged class for women. Women now "enjoy" a privileged class in which they have all of the benefits that men have, but, few of the responsibilities that are required of men.

Men are required to take risks under the old social contract. With the advent of feminism, that has now become an obligation on the part of men to be disposable in the interests of women and our society. Yet, the social contract was never changed to provide men with the necessary safety nets and social privileges to balance out the artificially imposed disposability.

What feminism, and the rest of our culture refuse to recognize, is that we should not continue to impose responsibilities on men, because of their gender differences without, at the same time, honoring those gender differences and granting men balancing benefits for the 21st. century responsibilities we impose on them.

As feminism continues to obtain advances for women under the gender social contract, without providing for balancing advances for men under the gender social contract, feminism has become a movement that is driven by pathological narcissism rather than any considerations of gender equality.

Narcissism

Narcissism is a concept that originated in Greek mythology. Narcissus was a handsome young man. One day, while he was getting a drink of water at a spring, he glanced at his own reflection in the water and fell in love with himself.

Like all of the ancient Greek myths, the myth of Narcissus represents an icon of a human archetype. By understanding the essence of the myth of Narcissus, we can see the presence of that archetype in others, and, label them narcissistic if they fit the recognizable patterns.

Drawing upon these ancient archetypes, science has formulated a modern description of narcissists. This description is contained in a medical guide known as the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual (of the American Psychiatric Association).

DSM V critera for diagnosis of Narcissistic Personality Disorder

Below is an excerpt from the manual that provides us with a guide to detecting someone who may have an extreme psychiatric disorder known as “Narcissistic Personality Disorder.” [NPD]

This model is intended to be applied against individual persons for the purposes of a medical diagnosis. However, it is also pertinent for application to a group's collective ideologies, such as feminism, to expose those ideologies as being pathological, or, encouraging those individuals who subscribe to the pathological ideology to acquire the individual traits of the pathology.

We cannot, literally, say that an entire movement has a pathological personality disorder, such as narcissism. We can, however, analyze groups of people in terms of the traits that they collectively demonstrate, and, analyze the ideologies as a reflection of pathology.

For example, one intellectual describes feminism and it's "social justice warriors" as a form of medical hysteria he calls "Collective Munchausen Syndrome."[3] The professor at Concordia University is not, literally, attempting to diagnose a medical condition for every single person who is in the implied group. Nevertheless, he demonstrates how the group, as a whole, demonstrates the characteristics of a pathological medical syndrome.

In the same way, we can analyze a movement, such as the feminist movement, in terms of pathology, by examining how the movement as a whole presents the characteristics of a person who is properly diagnosed with the pathological disorder. We can also apply the analysis of pathology to the behaviors the ideology encourages its individual members to adopt.

Narcissism and Feminists

Commentators typically divide the feminist movement into three “waves.”

“First wave feminism” historically arose in early 19th Century Europe. Although there were threads of feminism in literature and government throughout human history, feminist principals were typically adopted only when (a) society could afford to indulge in gynocentrism, and (b) when society found it expedient to use feminism as a way to manipulate men.

For example, in ancient Sparta, men were required to get married by the age of about 30 years old. They were punished if they refused to get married. This became the custom in ancient Sparta in order to serve the interests of women, and, also to serve the interests of the State. By forcing men to get married and have children, the State had a means of producing soldiers for the defense of the State. Needless to say, the State also imposed heavy burdens on married men to care for their families. To encourage men to get married, in addition to punishing them if they did not, and, to enable the men to effectively administer over their families to the benefit of the State, men were given authorities over the family in addition to the burdens that were placed upon them in regard to marriage.

This gave rise to the cultural concept of “patriarchy.” The Father was responsible for everything involving the family, including the criminal conduct of his wife and children. Therefore, he was given the authority over wives and his children to insure the orderly contributions of the family to the State.

During the 20th Century this societal structure acquired the label of the “nuclear family.” Throughout history, the “nuclear family” has stood the test of time as the strongest societal structure for both individuals and civilization. The nuclear family has stood, for many thousands of years as the bulwark against fascism and tyranny, and, at the same time, has insured the continued survival and development of the human race.

Feminist Camille Paglia has accurately described the gender social contract between men and women, up to the advent of 20th. Century feminism as being a social contract of gender roles in which:

> “Men have sacrificed and crippled themselves physically and emotionally to feed, house, and protect women and children. None of their pain or achievement is registered in feminist rhetoric, which portrays men as oppressive and callous exploiters.”—Camille Paglia

In the 20th Century with the advent of industrialization and a change in structure of labor in the US and Europe, the nuclear family, and traditional gender roles, came under attack by political interests. Those interests gained from flooding the workplace with cheaper labor from women, and, from using hatred of men as a means of dismantling families, and, dividing men and women against each other to make both genders easier to exploit and subjugate. Without families, men and women consume more, pose less of an opposition to the elite, and divided against each other, men and women cannot form alliances that are favorable to individuals—the result is that the human population, especially in industrialized nations, has become easily controlled and manipulated for elite economic and political interests.

To encourage feminists, and hatred of men, and, to divide men and women so that the are easily manipulated, feminist narcissism became an essential component of gender relations.

Men are conditioned from birth to hold women in high esteem. It has been relatively easy, therefore, for the past five decades, for industrial cultures to convince men that any criticism of women (or feminists) is anti-social, and, no praise or condescension to women's egos is inappropriately excessive.

Needless to say, it was not difficult for mass media propaganda, the government and religion to convince women that they were not only men's equals, but, their superiors in every way. Institutions found it highly profitable to inundate women with propaganda that fueled their gender narcissism like fertilizer applied to a flower garden. (Women "flowered" from this narcissistic fertilizer (but weeds also became prolific)); the "weeds" that were encouraged from the fertilizer of feminist narcissism became third wave feminism.

In Part II, we will continue our analysis of third wave feminism as a factor driving not only narcissim, but a destructive form of gynocentrism and institutions that are saturated with misandry.

The best a razor company can get

Martin Sykes · 20 January 2019 · Archived copy · Original

I saw the Gillette ad a few days ago and here's my analysis of it.

My first reaction was "yet another company that bashes men" and I made a decision to stop buying Gillette razors and products from Procter and Gamble. Then I contacted people who think like me and told them about the ad. My wife hated the ad too and wrote to P&G to tell them she's not buying their products either. We both called their customer service phone, but my wife wasn't able to go through, probably because their lines were busy. I didn't post anything on social media about the ad, though, since I don't like to post on political or controversial topics.

A few days later, I decided to analyze the ad from a marketing perspective, since I have an interest in marketing. Also, that's a more neutral form of analyzing the ad.

The point of any ad or marketing campaign is to increase sales or to establish a brand in the mind of the consumer. I must say that this is where the true impact of the ad is to be seen. Controversy attracts eyeballs and multiplies the results of any given campaign. If the ad results in bigger sales and profits, it'll be a success, no matter what other results of the controversy are.

While I can't predict the future, I think the ad will eventually fail and it'll be a prominent example in marketing text books of what not to do when designing a campaign. As its name implies, marketing implies focus on a market or markets. I believe the target market of Gillette and the ones the ad was aimed at is men. Gillette also has razors for women, but it's clear from their Gillette Venus website that women are considered a different, maybe secondary, market for which Gillette has a different approach and a different strategy. That website shows a woman with some skin problem that nevertheless looks satisfied. The background shows an open space by the sea and her hair looks loose. The image obviously implies the modern, free woman who is happy in her own skin. I thus deduct that women are a different market than men for Gillette although I admit that this is just my own observation and might be wrong.

The new ad is directed at men. So, how does it fare with this market? Badly, it seems so far.

The ad opens with the words "#metoo" and "toxic masculinity," while men at the mirror observe themselves in an insightful way. This is already something that's going to rub a lot of men off the wrong way. It will also be upsetting to many women, but like I explained, they aren't their target market. First of all, "metoo" is considered a political movement. Many men support it while other men consider it negative. The ad implies the rise of the "#metoo" movement as a necessity to cover abuses of women by men in the past.

The use of the words "toxic masculinity" is a poor choice. I know that in theory, the term doesn't mean that masculinity is toxic. However, to most men, who haven't studied feminist theory or gender studies, the term will make them think that masculinity is toxic. And some men who have actually read a definition of the term, still think that the term means that masculinity is toxic. Still, in marketing what counts is perception, not reality. So if men think that "toxic masculinity" means that masculinity is toxic, that's what counts, regardless of the actual definition of the term.

This is where the words and the image set the mood for the rest of the commercial. The look of introspection of the men in the first seconds of the ad quickly becomes a "what have I done?" look of guilt. Thus the viewer quickly understands that there's a serious problem in the world created by men, and specifically that YOU, the viewer, have had a part in it. So, while it can be argued that the ad doesn't say all men are bad, YOU, the viewer, clearly are, since you've either contributed to the problem or failed to stop it.

The rest of the ad reinforces this message, which makes it coherent and effective at delivering its message. The rest of the images give evidence that there is a problem created by men, that this problem is serious and widespread, in fact, it is pretty much everywhere, it has been around for a long time, and that men have either contributed to it, approved of it (boys will be boys), or failed to act, specially the viewer.

So, what's the solution to this widespread, serious problem? It's for you the viewer to change your ways and to even stand up to other men and intervene. That's the message that the ad delivers.

The only thing that I saw that was out of place with the tone of the add is the inclusion of Anna Kasparian from the Young Turks. This bit stands out because, unlike the rest of the message, it's explicitly political, and specifically, liberal, so if you're a conservative or a moderate, or even a moderate liberal, the inclusion of such a figure might turn you off.

With all this, it's easy to understand why many men disliked the ad so strongly. They are portrayed as the ones at fault of this problem or that they have allowed it to go unchecked for a long time and they should think of what they have done and change their ways. Basically, the ad is saying "you shouldn't be like this, you should change." This message is neither empowering nor positive, in fact, it's blaming.

Finally, after you change your ways, buy our razors.

As I said, all this analysis is irrelevant if the ad actually generates sales. But I doubt it. Many customers were stating publicly and explicitly that they were not going to buy Gillette razors anymore. Others, like me, contacted similarly minded people to inform them of the add, resulting in more men stopping buying the product. Moreover, the fact that I'm submitting this essay instead of a video and asking the person who is organizing the submissions to keep me anonymus indicates that there are other men who, like me, disliked the commercial but don't want to suffer the backlash that disliking the ad publicly would entail.

However, there are a lot of men that have been raised by single mothers and haven't had a masculine role in their lives, who believe in feminist theory, or simply follow the masculine instinct to protect others. In addition, the new generations of men have been raised to be more feminine and to feel bad about their masculinity or to feel guilty by association of the abuses of women by men in the past, which the ad and their upbringing have portrayed as widespread rather than rare. These men approve of the ad and will start buying Gillette. I do think this market is smaller than the men who felt insulted and most of them probably buy Gillette already or won't switch, since they will not be as fired up, which means that they might not cause a significant raise in sales. However, I can only speculate about sales and I might be completely wrong about them. In the end, Gillette will act according to the behavior of their sales, and that's that.

Gynocentrism and misandry

Peter Ryan · 21 January 2019 · Archived copy · Original

In my previous article "Perversions of gynocentrism"[1], I discussed the void of respect for men and boys. We live in a culture that does not respect the male half of the human race. To call this truth out is to attract the ire of feminists and be labelled a whinger and a misogynist that is just angry his supposed "privilege" has been taken away. The contempt that our gynocentric society has for men and boys is a forbidden topic to discuss.

This hostile reaction to discussing men's issues and their well-being and labelling any men that discusses them a whinger, is not just seen from feminists. It is also expressed from a substantial number of men and women in society. It is an ugly reality of human nature that people do not like to confront their own bigotry and when they are confronted, it generally elicits a hostile response. The reality is that the misandry that feminism vomits out into society, is just a symptom of a much more deeply rooted problem in our culture.

Men and boys cannot read a newspaper, watch television, go online, listen to the radio, go to work, or to college or school, or even socialise with their peers, without being regularly bombarded with hateful and bigoted messages that there is something inherently toxic about them or wrong with them because they happen to be male. There is a feminist campaign of psychological warfare directed at men and boys. Tom Golden has compared it[2] to the communist brainwashing of political dissidents in China and made a compelling argument feminists are using the same techniques.

In my article "Diagnosing Gynocentrism"[3], I discussed how gynocentrism is associated with a belief in female superiority. This belief holds that women and girls are naturally and inherently superior to men and boys based on being female. This belief emerges from two attitudes. There is an underlying attitude that masculinity is inherently flawed and that masculinity is toxic, violent, predatory, destructive and primitive. There is also a corresponding attitude that femininity is flawless, pure, peaceful, empathetic, life-giving and civilised. Gynocentric slogans like "women civilise men"[4] and feminist terms like "toxic masculinity"[5], are just two expressions of this same belief system. Female superiority is a belief system that leads to the dehumanisation of men and boys and the deification of women and girls.

Within one week of me publishing "Perversions of Gynocentrism", the American Psychological Association released their guidelines on dealing with men and boys, which pathologises traditional masculinity. Ex-Navy Seal Jocko Willink, has written a brilliant article debunking this nonsense[6] and I highly recommend people take time to read it. Numerous psychologists such as Dr. Gad Saad[7], Dr. Shawn Smith[8] and Dr. David Ley[9] in Psychology Today, have strongly criticised these guidelines and the demonisation of masculinity and the feminist ideological bias within them. A few days later, Gillette releases their new ad[10] on how men need to reform themselves and evolve past their primitive, violent and predatory ways (because apparently all men in general are now represented by the actions of a handful of predatory, backwards and violent men). These examples of demonising men and masculinity are nothing new. This has been going on for decades.

Where I live, we have government funded man-bashing ads on TV on a regular basis[11], holding men in general collectively responsible for domestic violence. If one woman is murdered by a man, the media are quick to collectively hold all men[12] as sharing responsibility for their death. There is of course no discussion of female violence toward men. This is despite the abundance of research available[13] that shows it is hardly a tiny fraction of domestic violence, but actually a substantial portion of it.

There is of course no collective blame directed at women in society for the actions of individual women that commit child abuse and physically attack their male partners. There should not be either, because all women and all men are not responsible for the actions of individual men and individual women. Of course this is understood when we look at female violence toward men and children, but not in the case of male violence toward women and children. That is just one gynocentric double standard that helps keep reinforcing the bigoted attitudes we have about men and women, which in turn drives the belief in female superiority.

Man bashing ads are like grains of sand on the beach. Books[14]and research papers[15] have even been written on how pervasive the negative portrayal of men and masculinity is in this culture. The institutionalisation of misandry is also widespread in our society. Misandry is present in our political system, our universities, our family courts, our legal system, our schools, our universities, our corporations, our mainstream media and our government departments. It is in our policy, in our laws, in our news, in our entertainment, in school and university syllabus and academic scholarship and it is increasingly invading our personal spaces and social interactions.

None of this is new. What is new is the level of outrage the Gillette ad has generated. 2019 will mark the ten year anniversary of A Voice For Men. Ten years ago the Gillette ad would barely have created a ripple. There would have been some criticism, but hardly to the level we are presently seeing. This change in societal attitudes is a new phenomenon and an emerging trend. People have finally had enough. People are starting to notice the impact of what disrespecting the male half of the human race has in their own lives and they are recognising the true face of feminism. We have a long, long way to go, before we unlearn centuries of gynocentric programming. We are however starting to see society question the cultural narrative that something is inherently flawed about masculinity and also feminist ideology.

> "Is this ad the best a man can get? Imagine if this ad generalised all black people or all women by the actions of a few individuals. Would such bigotry even get past production and be released? So why is it suddenly ok to generalise the male half of the human race by the actions of a few men? This is wrong. It is not "some" men doing the right thing, it is actually most men. Inspiring men to do better, requires respecting men to begin with. Seeing the worst in men and using shame and guilt to inspire them to do better, just creates the understandable level of hostility we see toward this ad. Men are not toxic, this message and messages like it are toxic. Inspiring men to do better, requires portraying a positive image of masculinity to your audience and not deriding them. Such simple logic."

Predictably feminists attempted to gaslight me. That is their predictable (all so predictable) response when they get challenged on their own double standards. There is nothing wrong with what they are doing, it must be me and the million or so other people like me that expressed a problem with the ad. Not in one instance in the replies under my comment, did feminists answer my question about whether this ad would have even got past production if it had of portrayed black people or women in this way.

Gillette would have us believe "some" men but not most men, are doing the right thing by others. It is implied through omission that the majority of men need to reform themselves. The ad clearly exploits a perceptual bias called anchoring[16], to set the perceptual frame in the viewers minds right from the beginning, that men in general are to be found guilty for the actions and behaviour of a handful of predatory and violent men. Then it proceeds to lecture men from a morally self-righteous position, on what men should be doing to redeem themselves. I will ask the question again, would feminists approve of this ad if an ad like this was made about women? I think we all know the answer to that and their silence to that simple question is deafening.

Feminists were predictably quite quick to obfuscate an examination of their own double standards and bigotry, by accusing people of having a problem with men acting like decent human beings, or even going as far as insinuating that I was somehow one of those toxic men portrayed in the ad. This is the predictable game feminist ideologues play- They set the bait to elicit anger from men, there is an angry reaction from men and then they frame themselves as victims of male aggression. It is all in your head, there is something wrong with you etcetera, etcetera. Gaslighting is a preferred tactic by feminists. But the central question that I asked still remains unanswered. Would these same feminist ideologues be perfectly fine with a comparable video being made about women? Indeed people have noted that double standard and have produced such videos[17].

Men and women do not have a problem with the message of men acting like decent human beings. They do have a problem with an ad framing men in general as violent, primitive, predators and that only "some" men are doing the right thing. They do have a problem with an ad that takes such a pompous and morally self-righteous position to judge and shame it's male customer base and then dare to lecture them on how they should behave. The ad like most feminist inspired ads, is dripping with condescension toward men[18].

Paul Elam did an excellent response to the ad linked here[19]. I also left a comment on that video as follows:

> "When I wrote about there been a void of respect for men, I was not saying that as a minor footnote. We live in a society that is so gynocentric it pathologises the very type of men and masculine traits it depends on to exist. They say fish rots from the head and it certainly does. This ad is nothing new, just more of the same. The misandry in ads has been going on for decades.
> Feminist ideology is the religion of the corporate kleptocracy we live in. The steady progression of this toxic ideology through our public institutions and businesses, is the product of decades of general apathy from the public toward the well-being of men and boys. Society gave feminism the green light to demonise and dehumanise men and boys and marginalise them in the name of equality decades ago. Business executives and politicians go along with it because society mostly does not care and has shown zero concern for decades. Is anyone going to protest outside their HQ? Is anyone going to make a formal complaint or take legal action over this ad? Is this really going to lead to any serious and long-term boycott of their products? Is there going to be any real tangible consequences for this business and any well organised movement to pushback against this misandry?
> There were many ads, articles, books and shows like this before and most people said nothing. Only now is the rotten stench of feminism starting to bother people.
> You reap what you sow. This will continue to worsen until people confront and correct their own gynocentric programming. Exactly how bad the stench of feminism needs to get before that occurs, depends on how much people are willing to suffer for their own gynocentric stupidity. The moral laziness of society toward gynocentrism is really to blame, not a business that just reflects the fashionable bigotry of the day. Look in the mirror people."

One year ago there was another video that attracted similar levels of controversy. Does anyone care to guess what it was? It was the Jordan Peterson interview with Kathy Newman on Channel 4[20]. So you were saying? So you were saying? So you were saying? Remember? Strawman, gaslight, strawman, gaslight. Precisely the same feminist tactics of painting men as villains and portraying themselves as victims, was on full display a year ago from that interview and in its aftermath. Just like now, there were millions of people that heavily criticised that interview. The cycle of misandry repeats itself over and over again each year and it will continue to escalate.

So my question to people is what are you going to do now? This is not a new problem. I can pretty much guarantee with certainty that the bigotry and contempt that our feminist controlled society has towards men, is going to keep continuing and keep escalating. You can expect more ads like this. What we are presently facing is not something that just grew overnight. The demonisation and the marginalisation of men and masculinity, has been going on for decades. It was the apathy and the indifference of the general population to what feminists were doing then, that allowed the pervasive misandry in our society to be normalised by feminists and grow to the point we are observing today.

I want people to really think about how deeply entrenched the hatred of men would have to be in our society, for the American Psychological Association to come up with their feminist inspired guidelines toward treating men and boys. I went through multiple examples in "Perversions of Gynocentrism", on describing the world we now live in and how they illustrate a void of respect we have for men and boys. It is not hyperbolic for me to say that if I replaced men with Jews in some of the hateful content coming from our feminist media, academics and politicians, it would not look at all out of place in Nazi Germany. Could you imagine the outrage if the Washington Post article, "Why Can't We Hate Men?"[21] was written about Jews? Antisemitism is reprehensible and so is misandry. The fact you can write such hateful drivel about men in a major mainstream media publication, goes to show you just how depraved our society has become.

To get to this level of feminist depravity and hatred towards men in society, the general population had to be apathetic and indifferent enough to the well-being of men to permit it. That is the disgusting truth that no one wants to acknowledge. Even a substantial number of antifeminists will stop short of examining the reasons why feminists have been so successful in implementing their agenda, with next to no resistance from the population. All of these mothers and fathers with sons did nothing for generations, while feminism gradually infected and then spread through our institutions, companies, politics, media, legal system and public and private organisations. Despite the massive outcry over this one ad that goes for less than 2 minutes, the concern and outrage from the public over a multitude of far more serious examples of systemic and institutional misandry in society, is relatively little.

Men and boys are far behind girls at every level of education from kindergarten to postgraduate education. They have been struggling academically for decades in a feminist controlled education system that prioritises women and girls learning needs and avoids and silences any attempt to address this imbalance. Young men have seen their rights to due process eliminated on college campuses and their lives ruined from false allegations, thanks to biased feminist university policies and kangaroo tribunals. Husbands and fathers face severe bias in the family court and divorce process and many of them lose everything- wife, kids, house and sometimes their lives. Countless fathers are killing themselves on a regular basis from being alienated from their children. Men are now facing a social climate thanks to metoo# and changes to the legal system, where a woman can virtually point the finger at a man and based on an unproven accusation from more than 20 years ago and with no trial, the man can have his life destroyed. The list goes on and on.

Many of these problems have been around for decades and they are systemic in nature and have impacted millions of men and boys. The silence from our society to these issues has been deafening, because mostly no one cares. Like I said, the Gillette ad that went for less than 2 minutes, got more attention in one week than any of those men's issues I just mentioned have gotten from society in twenty years! If these things were happening to women, we would be up in arms and there would be a revolution. The indifference to the suffering and marginalisation of men and boys, is a readily observable feature of society. This is the gender empathy gap[22].

It is a stark and surreal claim to talk about men being privileged in a society that bends over backwards on every occasion to cater to feminist demands to prioritise female well-being (even to the point of spending money on stopping "manspreading" on public transport), while at the same time shaming and ostracising men and boys and showing such indifference to their suffering. So whilst I am glad to see the reaction to the Gillette ad, that reaction is just a blip on the radar screen. In contrast the reaction from society in general toward the systemic misandry within it, has been one of silence, indifference and in some cases encouragement. If people want to see real change, then that will have to change.

Feminism has been able to spread through the public and private sectors of our society with ease, because our leaders have correctly perceived that they will receive greater consequences from feminists for not going ahead with the feminist agenda, than from the general public if they do. Politicians will gladly parrot feminist talking points on domestic violence for example, because they know the attacks they will get from feminists in the media and elsewhere if they do not, will be orders of magnitude more detrimental to their political careers, than the consequences they will receive from the general public by doing so. I noticed Stardusk has raised this very same point in relation to his response to the Gillette ad[23] and also emphasised the importance of saying "no" to these feminist ideologues. It is the same situation in any big organisation that feminists infest.

Our society has been slowly rotting away from the inside year after year and decade after decade, from the slow and gradual feminist subversion of our institutions, academia, media, legal system, political system and corporations etc. The feminist capture of the universities has been essential to feminisms spread throughout society, ensuring that our future politicians, policy and law makers, business professionals, mental health professionals and educators, are thoroughly indoctrinated in feminist ideology and go on to work at senior levels where they can spread feminist ideology within the private and public organisations they work for.

In many ways modern society today resembles a termite infested house. The feminist infestation has gone by unimpeded for decades and now suddenly the damage is starting to appear on the surface. What people need to realise is the Gillette ad is just the tip of the iceberg of this problem. We now have a situation where the public and private sectors of our society, blatantly express the female supremacist values of feminist ideology and the general population is disgusted by what it sees. But what the general population is disgusted by, is really just a reflection of its own gynocentric double standards. All that was required for this to occur, was for people to remain indifferent to male-being for long enough to let feminism implement their agenda and entrench themselves in our institutions and corporations etc.

In "Perversions Of Gynocentrism" and "The Normalisation Of Gynocentrism"[24], I explained at a social and cultural level how the spread of feminism and gynocentrism has been achieved. Gynocentrism is at the heart of the pervasive misandry we are observing today and feminism is merely a political manifestation of gynocentrism. We are not going to overcome feminism by simply limiting our focus to criticising feminist ideology. We have to ask serious questions about why society has been so easily overtaken by feminism. We have to confront our own apathy toward male well-being. We have to confront our pedestalisation and deification of women and girls. We have to confront our own gynocentric programming and how that programming taps into basic sexual and emotional drives and short-circuits them. If we are not prepared to confront our own gynocentrism, then feminism will continue to degrade our society until it inevitably collapses from a fempocalypse[25].

Only if society cares enough about male well-being to react in a manner that leads to serious consequences for our politicians, businesses and academics etc to lead them to change their ways and resist feminism, will we see any change. Until then it will remain business as usual and feminism will keep on escalating the misandry in our society. Feminism has had several decades to infest every branch of society and has a great deal of political and financial momentum behind it. Feminism will not be defeated by a single protest or a single boycott or a single march or a single legal battle. It is going to take a sustained effort on multiple fronts to remove the decades of feminist rot in our society. It is going to take a society prepared to rise above its own gynocentrism and its one-sided concern for only female well-being, to generate a strong enough response to defeat feminism. Half measures will not be enough. If people truly have had enough of misandry like the Gillette ad, then we have to go the whole way and question our own double standards that prioritise female well-being and ignore male-being.

The gynocentric seeds of our own destruction bore the fruit of feminism. Feminism is just an extension and a reflection of our own bigotry. We have an underlying belief in female superiority embedded in our culture which we do not want to look at, because we do not like the reflection that stares back at us. We have bigoted attitudes toward men and toward women engrained in our culture. The women are wonderful effect[26] and the female in-group bias[27], are real measurable phenomena in our society and are the subject of scientific enquiry. We need to unlearn those attitudes. Men are not collectively responsible for the actions of mass murderers and serial rapists. Women and girls are not all sugar and spice and men and boys are not all primitive violent Neanderthals. The notion of women and children first and the complete disregard for male well-being, is indefensible in a modern developed society where women enjoy the same rights as men.

The underlying belief in female superiority that has gradually been embedded in our gynocentric culture and the attitudes it is based upon, need to be confronted and eradicated. Masculinity is not toxic, these gynocentric elements of our culture are toxic.

How to encourage the best a boy can be

Warren Farrell · 23 January 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Whether it is #MeToo, the American Psychological Association, or the Gillette ad critiquing men, masculinity is under siege. We hear, "the future is female," and read books called The End of Men.

Imagine your daughter growing up at a time that predicted "the end of women." No boy or girl has ever before grown up in a time that predicted the end of their gender. Anticipation of "the end of men" is not exactly an inspiration for your son's life journey.

As an educator, I regularly hear from both moms and dads of sons. "I don't know how to guide my son," they say. "My son is searching for who he should be, but he only hears the negatives: 'toxic masculinity,' accusations of 'male privilege,' 'male power,' and the 'patriarchy.' He hears nothing of how every generation trained young men to sacrifice themselves so that women and children could live; he hears nothing about how dads forfeit their passion to earn money so their children can have better lives than they have."

When it comes to a boy expressing his feelings, some parents are still saying, "Big boys don't cry." Others say, "We know it's a danger sign for our son to repress his feelings, but when he speaks up at school, he's accused of 'mansplaining.' So he represses his feelings. Isn't that just reinforcing the toxicity the accusers are complaining about?"

Make no mistake: There is a boy crisis. Boys are doing worse than girls in virtually every academic subject in all 63 of the largest developed nations, and their rates of suicide, death by drug overdose, unemployment, and imprisonment are soaring. It is males doing the mass shootings and joining ISIS. What is more amazing, though, is that this crisis has largely been met with a cultural shrug. It should instead catalyze a cultural shift.

We have always had a battle of the sexes. But for the past half century, we have had a war in which only one sex has shown up to fight. If boys and men felt safe enough to take their heads out of the sand, what might they say? They might say that the #MeToo monologue needs to be a #MeToo dialogue. As one dad put it, "My son is afraid that if he moves too quickly, he's a predator, but that if he moves too slowly, he's a wimp. He asked me once, 'Why does it seem that the girls I'm most attracted to expect me to take the risks of sexual rejection. Doesn't equality mean they should take the risks half the time?'"

The boys who are most in crisis are boys who are dad-deprived. Especially sons of divorce, when family courts refuse to let their dads have equal time with them. To many, it seems like their moms have the right to be with them, but that their dads have to fight to be with them. They feel abandoned by their dads; they feel lost. They wonder, "If I get married and have children, will I someday be like my dad? Paying for children I can only occasionally see?"

Again, not exactly an inspiration for your son's life journey.

So, what are the top ways that we can help a boy become the best man that he can be? First, make sure your son is "dad-enriched," not "dad-deprived," so that the purpose void is not magnified by a "dad void." Your son is at greater risk if he is dad-deprived.

Have weekly family dinner nights, and know how to prevent family dinner nights from becoming family dinner nightmares.

Know the difference between training your son for heroic intelligence (training for a short life) versus training your son for health intelligence (training for a long life).

Model for your son how to handle personal criticism without becoming defensive, so that your son can experience dad-style and mom-style parenting as they become "checks-and-balances parenting."

If you're a single mom, you know how to get the biological dad re-involved. If that is impossible, get your son great male role models — perhaps in Cub Scouts, or faith-based leaders. Also, if applicable, effectively connect your son to a stepdad and grandfather.

Finally, get your son involved in individual sports, team sports, and pick-up team sports.

In 11 years of research, I have found that these approaches to raising our sons create a much better chance of raising them to be the best they can be. Which means our daughters will be able to find boys who are worthy of their love, and our sons will find women who respect the best attributes of their masculinity.

We are all in the same family boat. When only one sex is blamed for being what we have worshiped in the past, then neither sex will prosper in the future.

Doug Mortimer · 23 January 2019 · Archived copy · Original

A couple of months before he died (at age 95!), Ernest Borgnine appeared at Texas Frightmare Weekend, one of the nation's biggest get-togethers for horror movie aficionados. During a Q and A session, someone asked him what Lee Marvin, with whom he had appeared in three movies, was like. He succinctly replied, "He was a Marine." That's a big part of the story but not the whole story.

Like Humphrey Bogart, another longtime screen tough guy, Marvin was born to a prominent New York family with deep roots in American history. He was an incorrigible youth until World War II came along.

He enlisted in the Marines at age 18 and was badly wounded by machine gun fire (he barely dodged permanent paralysis) at the Battle of Saipan, a particularly grueling and gruesome siege from June 15 to July 9, 1944, in which 3,246 Americans were killed and 10,364 wounded. The Japanese, soldiers and civilians, fared even worse.

One can't help but wonder how a young man who escaped from that slaughterhouse would conduct his life thereafter. Some biographers think Marvin felt guilty for surviving. Perhaps we could call it Last Man Standing Syndrome. Then again, we probably could not, as the American Psychological Association would have to sign off on this terminology, and they haven't been too male-friendly of late.

After the war, Lee Marvin stumbled into acting and began compiling a lengthy list of stage, screen, and TV credits; at the same time, he shaped a legendary persona thanks to both his public and on-screen behavior. Understandably, having witnessed how cheap life can be, he was something of a fatalist. "Anything over 40's gravy," he once said. Indeed his lifestyle was not conducive to longevity, but it did endow him with living legend status.

Another understandable result of his wartime experiences was his gusto for living. Indeed, Marvin's reputation as a boozer, brawler, carouser, and all-purpose hell-raiser was outstanding, even by Hollywood standards. Like a smoking volcano, he looked as though he could erupt at any minute – and he often did. If he were in his prime today, he surely would have merited a few seconds of screen time in that infamous finger-wagging Gillette commercial.

Among the opinions of those who knew him:

> Not since Attila the Hun swept across Europe leaving five hundred years of blackness has there been a man like Lee Marvin.
> - Director Joshua Logan
> He looks like a cartoon wolf about to blow someone's house down.
> - Author Lloyd Hughes
> A snarl with a juggernaut behind it.
> - Film critic John Baxter

Sounds like toxic masculinity, you say? Well, Marvin never heard that term during his lifetime, but he might have agreed:

> Films have given me an opportunity to do things that normally you'd be locked up for, put into prison and executed for.
> If you're going to be bad, be real bad…I leaned on people real hard.

Lean of body with a craggy face and eyebrows that got bushier as he got older, he had a unique screen presence, brutal but not stupid, mean but not petty. To this day, I can't make up my mind whether The Dirty Dozen is a tribute to fascism or anarchism; either way, Marvin was the ideal actor to bridge that duality.

Two of Marvin's observations about women would surely raise eyebrows today:

> Too many women don't realize they're women and that disturbs me.
> Take a snatch away from a broad and what's she got left?

Despite – or more likely because of – his demeanor, he oozed sex appeal. Mamas might not have wanted their babies to grow up to be Lee Marvin, but they might not have minded his fathering their babies. According to actresses who knew him.

> He's more male than anyone I have ever acted with.
> - Jeanne Moreau
> Lee was the personification of a man. Ohhh! He was more than good. You wanted to be good with him.
> - Angie Dickinson
> As unpredictable, honest, inflammable as I imagined. He is usually interesting; in the way that war is more interesting than peace.
> - Candice Bergen

Then there is this anecdote from the late Bosley Crowther, longtime New York Times film critic:

> I heard a middle-aged woman awesomely and rapturously exclaim to her equally galvanized companion at a showing of Point Blank last week – right at a spot of hideous violence – "What a gorgeous man!"

Most importantly, we have this opinion:

> Lee is probably the most pure man I have ever known in my entire life.

This quote is particularly relevant as it was uttered by Michelle Triola, a small-time actress/dancer/singer, Marvin's mistress from 1964 to 1970. In February 1972 she sued for what came to be called "palimony." That Lee Marvin, the ultimate tough guy, was the defendant in the case could be considered irony or poetic justice.

By Hollywood standards, Marvin's sex life was hardly sordid. He was married twice, to Betty Ebeling from 1951-1967, and to Pamela Feeley from 1970 till his death. Michelle Triola was Ms. In-Between.

A theater arts major at UCLA, Triola met Marvin on the set of Ship of Fools in 1964 and lived with him (his first marriage was already on the rocks) in their love nest on the Pacific Coast Highway in Malibu from 1965 till Marvin's second marriage. When Triola met Marvin, she was a recent divorcée, having just ended a brief marriage to actor Skip Ward.

As difficult as it may be to believe today, "living in sin" was rare in 1964. To be sure, men of means who wanted a mistress had one, but she was stashed away in a place of her own. Typically, the man and woman did not live under the same roof. A man setting up a household with a woman without benefit of clergy was simply not done, at least not by "decent" people. As late as 1968, a Barnard College undergrad was disciplined for living with her boyfriend, a Columbia University student, in an off-campus apartment. And these were Seven Sisters/Ivy League schools in ultra-liberal New York City! As trivial as this sounds today, the travails of Linda LeClair and Peter Behr made headline news nationwide. Yet cohabitation was growing by leaps and bounds. So when Michelle Triola sued for palimony (Marvin v Marvin, 18 Cal. 3d 660, 557 P.2d 106) in 1972, it didn't seem so far-fetched as it might have when she set up housekeeping with Marvin in 1965.

Triola went straight to the top and hired renowned Hollywood attorney Marvin Mitchelson, who had been a divorce lawyer since 1964 when he achieved a $1.5 million settlement for Pamela Mason, former wife of James Mason. It was headline news at the time as it was the biggest divorce settlement ever.

Mitchelson immediately became the go-to guy for Hollywood divorces. He represented Rhonda Fleming, Zsa Zsa Gabor, Joan Collins, Connie Stevens, Bianca Jagger, Lesley-Anne Down and Mrs. Groucho Marx and Mrs. William Shatner, among other women. He was not just a ladies' man, as he also represented Robert De Niro, Mickey Rooney, Sylvester Stallone, Sonny Bono, Tony Curtis, and curiously, Carl Sagan. Mitchelson once characterized himself as "a chameleon with a law book."

As is the case with any hotshot lawyer, Mitchelson relished the opportunity to make legal history – and headlines – with a high-profile case involving "marriage with no rings attached." Indeed by the time Triola filed her suit, it had become hip to assert that a marriage license was just a piece of paper. Serial relationships had long been common in Hollywood but they had always been accompanied by that piece of paper. The studios would not have allowed otherwise. Actors had morals clauses in their contracts, though lax morality (if not downright criminal behavior) was more likely to be covered up than punished. The studio system, however, had vanished.

So Marvin Mitchelson was in the right place at the right time. He could apply his Hollywood divorce experience to Hollywood cohabitation. According to Mitchelson:

> A woman should have the right to a good divorce and community property even if she is not licensed to marry the man she loved and lived with…it costs three dollars to get a marriage license. I say that for this money one should not have different rights than one who has the same relationship but doesn't pay the three dollars. I consider this unequal protection under the law.

He was in effect equating cohabitation with marriage. He might have been making a backhanded effort to reinstate common law marriage, which all but disappeared from California in 1895. Well, I'm no attorney but I have to wonder if unlicensed drivers or doctors could argue that the state denying them the same rights as licensees is a violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the 14th Amendment.

Triola played the victim card by portraying the wronged woman who was pure of heart. More than that, she claimed she stood for "women who simply could not hold back on loving someone until they got a piece of paper with signatures on it." Unceremoniously dumped after six years (though Marvin did pay her a modest allowance for a year – severance pay, so to speak), she had loved well but not wisely. Wasn't she entitled to half of the $3.6 million he earned during their time together? Didn't she and Lee have an oral agreement to that effect?

She argued that she had provided all the duties of a wife (cooking/cleaning/sex) for six years and was entitled to half of Marvin's earnings. Needless to say, if Marvin had hired a cook and a maid while keeping a call girl on speed dial, he would not have to shell out anything more if he decided to terminate their services after six years. In other words, did she deserve anything more than what she received during their time together?

> According to Michelle, "I gave Lee the best years of my life."
> Marvin countered with, "Yeah? Well, I also gave her the best years of her life.

She also testified that she had given up her career in show biz. She was already 32 when she shacked up with Marvin, so whether she was a rising star or a fading star (if indeed she ever was a star) was open to question. Not only had she not worked during the six-year relationship, she adopted Lee's last name (hence the case name Marvin v. Marvin). And didn't she sit next to him at the Academy Awards in 1966 when he won the Best Actor Oscar for Cat Ballou?

Well, Marvin v. Marvin had a lengthy history in the California courts. The first two trial courts threw out her case. Then in 1976, the Supreme Court of California reinstated it, arguing:

> The fact that a man and woman live together without marriage and engage in a sexual relationship does not in itself invalidate agreements between them relating to their earnings.

So the case was back on the docket. Even without that piece of paper, a woman could sue after a breakup if – and it's a big if – there was an agreement pertaining to their assets.

Ruth Bader Ginsburg, then a law professor, commented that the case demonstrated "the breakdown of the legal line between married and unmarried union." Grey areas mean every case must be considered individually…hence litigation…hence more work for more lawyers, who owe a profound debt to Marvin Mitchelson.

Predictably, the 11-week trial, starting in January 1979, was high soap opera. Promises were made, promises were broken, there were pregnancies, there were abortions, infidelities, accusations, and recriminations…plus lots of emoting from Triola. Of course, in any courtroom proceeding a tearful, sniffling woman always has an advantage over a man. Marvin was especially at a disadvantage, as he had to live with his screen image. It was a lot easier to paint him as an insensitive troglodyte after he had portrayed same in so many movies.

When it was all over, Judge Arthur K. Marshall ruled that there was no contract obligating Marvin to share his earnings with her. He did award her $104,000 for "rehabilitation purposes," but the case was appealed so the award was put on hold. In 1981, the appeals court overturned the award. So Marvin never paid her another penny. No telling what his legal fees were, however.

Curiously, both sides claimed victory. Though Marvin paid no palimony, Triola felt she had claimed a moral victory on behalf of similarly situated women. In truth, numerous palimony lawsuits were filed in the wake of Marvin v. Marvin. A significant number involved homosexual couples. Two of the more prominent suits involved celebrity pianists Liberace and Van Cliburn. Women were not exempt, as tennis stars Billie Jean King, and Martina Navratilova had their days in court (hence the term "galimony").

After the conclusion of the trial, Triola said, "If a man wants to leave his toothbrush at my house, he better bloody well marry me." Nevertheless, she cohabited with Dick Van Dyke till she died of lung cancer in 2009. How to account for that? Well, Van Dyke also had a place in Malibu. If she couldn't get any palimony from Marvin, at least she could live in the manner to which she had become accustomed. She did have a contract, but since she died before Van Dyke (he's still alive and kicking at age 93), the provisions of the contract were moot.

Mitchelson reaped gobs of publicity from the trial, enabling him to maintain his Beverly Hills mansion, collection of luxury cars, and stash of cocaine, and engage in various forms of conspicuous consumption. It wasn't all blue skies, however, as he had to contend with his own legal problems. After various tax evasion, fraud, and sexual assault claims, he was sent to federal prison for two years. After getting out, he opened a less prominent law practice in West Hollywood in 2001. He died in Beverly Hills in 2004.

Lee Marvin died of a heart attack in 1987. He was 63 years old so he enjoyed 23 years of "gravy." Had he lived long enough to witness Mitchelson's travails, he doubtless would have enjoyed those also.

Arthur Phillip – a man who founded a nation

Robert Brockway · 25 January 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Today is January 26 in Australia. 231 years ago the First Fleet arrived in Botany Bay, establishing the first permanent European settlement on the continent of Australia. At the time it was generally called New Holland by Europeans as the western portion of the continent had been explored by the Dutch more than a century earlier. There might have even been earlier explorers. There are unsubstantiated claims of very early Portuguese exploration. Some even claim early Chinese mariners landed on the shores of Australia. The discovery in the 1940s of ancient African and more recently of a Chinese coin remain unexplained. It's possible they were left there by the Macassan people from Indonesia who were known to trade with Aborigines in Northern Australia, or perhaps they speak of more ancient contact. What we can say is that of all the groups that may have found Australia after the arrival of the Aborigines, only the British established a permanent presence.

James Cook embarked on three great journeys of discovery in the Pacific. The first of these, aboard HMS Endeavour, was ostensibly to establish an observatory on Tahiti in order to observe the transit of Venus in 1769 in which the planet Venus made a rare transit of the Sun. European Astronomers had determined that if they could gather sufficient data of this event they could accurately calculate the distance to the Sun. In an early example of international scientific co-operation, the great powers of Europe sent out missions all around the world to give the scientists as much data as they could.

The Admiralty were not ones to miss an opportunity. Cook turned to the secret orders he had been given, not to be opened until after the Endeavour left Britain. Cook was to search the Southern Hemisphere for a great continent known to Europeans as Terra Australia Incognita. Since Roman times Europeans had believed that a Eurasia sized continent must lay in the Southern Hemisphere to balance the world. Cook thoroughly explored the region and accurately charted the east coast of New Holland, along with other accomplishments. He established definitively that no equivalent of Eurasia existed in the Southern Hemisphere. In 1770 Cook did, however, claim the eastern portion of New Holland and called it New South Wales.

Britain had been sending its convicts to the Americas for decades when the start of the American War of Independence disrupted this practice. After American independence the British were, for a while, at a loss as to what to do with the prisoners it had formerly been shipping off to its American colonies. For a while they were housed in old ships, called hulks, along the Thames but this could only be a temporary solution.

Sir Joseph Banks, who had been with Cook in 1770, and others were pushing for the establishment of a British colony in New South Wales for strategic reasons. The need for a permanent solution to the convict problem in Britain gave them the opportunity they needed.

And so it was that in 1787 the First Fleet set sail for Australia under the command of Commodore Arthur Phillip. Phillip was an experienced naval officer and he had been given the task of assembling the fleet, obtaining all the provisions for an extended sea voyage for 1420 people as well as everything needed to establish the new colony, which he would then govern.

All eleven ships successfully arrived in New South Wales after a voyage of 24000 km (15000 miles) by way of Rio De Janeiro and Cape Town. It is a testament to the fine leadership that Phillip provided that only 69 people died, discharged, or deserted during the voyage with other later fleets travelling to Australia suffering far higher attrition rates.

Phillip was instructed to settle at a location suggested by Cook 18 years earlier, Botany Bay, but found it unsuitable. Phillip personally led a small contingent north to examine the nearby Port Jackson, where he established the new colony. Commodore Phillip later reported to the Admiralty "…we had the satisfaction of finding the finest harbour in the world, in which a thousand sail of the line may ride in the most perfect security…". Under Phillip's good leadership the new colony had been founded on one of the world's great harbours.

Arthur Phillip realised from the outset that the new colony would become a community, with many of the convicts unable to return to Britain even after their sentences were served. He also declared that slavery would be illegal in the new colony, decades before it would be made illegal Empire-wide. Phillip required the colonists to treat Aborigines respectfully. Any colonists that abused the local Aboriginal population were harshly punished. When he was speared by a local Aborigine he believed this had been a result of a misunderstanding and ordered his men to not retaliate.

The early years of the colony were difficult. With few farmers among the settlers, poor soils and weather patterns very different from their home food rationing had to be imposed. In 1790 one of the original ships from the First Fleet, HMS Supply, was sent to Batavia (modern-day Jakarta, Indonesia) for food. Later ships were sent to Capt Town and Calcutta for further supplies. Arthur Phillip successfully led the nascent colony through these difficult times.

Phillip resigned as governor and returned to Britain as his health began to fail. By the end of his tenure as governor in 1792, the colony's food supply had stabilised, freed convicts were establishing land claims, and the foundations of the nation that would become Australia had been laid. Relations with the Aboriginal population were largely peaceful, but unfortunately, that wouldn't last.

After returning to Britain Phillip's health recovered and he returned to having various sea commands, including during wartime. He was eventually promoted to the rank of admiral before retiring. Arthur Phillip continued to champion the new colony in England to the end of his life.

Eventually, five additional colonies split off from the original colony of New South Wales. In 1901 all six of these colonies joined together to create the Commonwealth of Australia. The modern nation-state of Australia can trace its origins directly from the moment that Arthur Phillip stepped ashore and proclaimed the establishment of the new colony 231 years ago.

Today Australia has one of the highest standards of living in the world and has been in the top three nations on the Human Development Index for many years. Australia is also a nation beset by feminist dogma and political correctness which are gradually eroding the character that has made this nation great. Australia's founding fathers, Arthur Phillip among them, would no doubt be appalled that the country that started life as a penal colony and went on to become a great nation would be going down this road.

Only time will tell if we can change course and make Australia great again.

Aggrieved Entitlement – women's reaction to temporary loss of chivalry

Peter Wright · 26 January 2019 · Archived copy · Original

It's no secret that women feel entitled to special treatments from men based on the European culture tradition of chivalry: i.e., allowing women to go through the door first; showering the "fairer sex" with compliments about being beautiful, caring or pure; paying for dinner and other life luxuries; and offering them costly care and protection around the clock. In the modern context chivalry boils down to the male posture of deference to women's needs and wants, which understandably fosters a positive self-concept in women and a sense that they must be "worth it" as we are reminded by the ubiquitous advertising jingle.

The expectation of male chivalry, or benevolent sexism as some prefer to call it, is nothing new and there are countless studies confirming that women generally expect such treatment from men.[1] So we will take that expectation as a given. What hasn't been studied sufficiently in women is the reaction men's failure to provide expected level of chivalric supplies, and this is where we run into the useful concept of 'aggrieved entitlement.'

The phrase aggrieved entitlement was popularized by feminist Michael Kimmel who refers to it as a gendered emotion displayed by disenfranchised males, entailing "a fusion of that humiliating loss of manhood and the moral obligation and entitlement to get it back."[2] By 'manhood' Kimmel is referring to rights that males have supposedly enjoyed over women and culture that are subsequently denied them by a changing world. He further clarifies that men "tend to feel their sense of aggrieved entitlement because of the past; they want to restore what they once had. Their entitlement is not aspirational; its nostalgic."[3]

In a recent paper Dennis Gouws suggests that the aggrieved entitlement descriptor can be equally applied to the behavior of women. Reviewing Kimmel's concept he concludes:

> Because Kimmel's sympathies lie with gender feminism, he is uninterested in how this concept might apply to women's behavior. Women might express aggrieved entitlement when they experience what they perceive to be a humiliating loss of the gynocentric privilege to which gynocentric chivalry, gender feminism, and hegemonic gynarchy have entitled them. Self-righteous, angry expressions of personal offense and even violent acts might result from their perceived moral obligation to regain their sense of gynocentric privilege. A cursory > internet search of gender-feminist responses to men's-issues speakers on campus and to the establishing men's groups or other male-positive spaces on campus will provide examples of this aggrieved entitlement.[4]

Gouws provides a useful example of aggrieved entitlement by women who dominate university campus culture. Men attempting to establish male support groups on female-dominated campuses, or who attempt to invite speakers sympathetic to men's health issues, have frequently been met with fury for apparently removing the chivalric focus from women and their issues. The resultant female rage has triggered violent protests, intimidation, vindictive and false accusations, or boycotting of male initiatives through financial and other means.

Looking at the sexual-relations contract that has been operating for eons we can see that a certain degree of narcissistic pride was encouraged in order to sweeten gender roles for men and women – "He's an awesome strong man, a man's man and a great provider" or "She's a magnificent mother, those children never go without love or food". Those adhering to traditional gender roles received compliments for their service, along with some compensatory payoffs by the opposite sex.

When an individual fails to adhere to their traditional gender role the bubble of narcissistic pride bursts, giving rise to aggrieved entitlement in members of the opposite sex. In the language of psychology we would say the expectation of narcissistic supply has been cut off, and narcissistic injury and rage steps forward to address the grievance. Most readers would know that some of the worst examples of aggrieved entitlement by women are displayed by feminists, about whose behavior Ernest B. Bax was able to conclude, "Weakness, to whose claim chivalry may per se be granted, forfeits its claim when it presumes upon that claim and becomes aggressive. Aggressive weakness deserves no quarter."[5]

Bax further elaborates on aggressive weakness (i.e., aggrieved entitlement) in the following passages:

> I may point out in conclusion that the existing state of public opinion on the subject registers the fact that sex-conscious women have exploited the muscular weakness of their sex and have succeeded in forging a weapon of tyranny called "chivalry" which enables them to ride rough-shod over every principle of justice and fair play. Men are cowed by it, and fail to distinguish between simple weakness per se which should command every consideration, and that of aggressive weakness which trades upon "chivalry" and deserves no quarter.[6]

> "Even taking the matter on the conventional ground of weakness and granting, for the sake of argument, the relative muscular weakness of the female as ground for her being allowed the immunity claimed by Modern Feminists of the sentimental school, the distinction is altogether lost sight of between weakness as such and aggressive weakness. Now I submit there is a very considerable difference between what is due to weakness that is harmless and unprovocative, and weakness that is aggressive, still more when this aggressive weakness presumes on itself as weakness, and on the consideration extended to it, in order to become tyrannical and oppressive. Weakness as such assuredly deserves all consideration, but aggressive weakness deserves none save to be crushed beneath the iron heel of strength. Woman at the present day has been encouraged by a Feminist public opinion to become meanly aggressive under the protection of her weakness. She has been encouraged to forge her gift of weakness into a weapon of tyranny against man, unwitting that in so doing she has deprived her weakness of all just claim to consideration or even to toleration."[7]

Bax penned the above observations over a century ago, although the behavior he described had been around for much longer than that. The phrase 'Hell hath no fury like a woman scorned' is usually attributed to the English playwright and poet William Congreve. He wrote these lines in his play The Mourning Bride, 1697:

> Heav'n has no Rage, like Love to Hatred turn'd,
> Nor Hell a Fury, like a Woman scorn'd.

These lines describe a temporary loss of male chivalry by women and the aggrieved entitlement that ensues – a reaction that Michael Kimmel pretentiously emphasizes as a mostly male pathology. A more honest appraisal of the changing gender roles and the accompanying sense of aggrieved entitlement would admit that women's roles and choices have expanded exponentially, which includes the throwing off of any expected responsibilities toward men and boys, while conversely the male role of providing benevolent sexism/chivalry for women has changed little. On the basis of such disparity men appear to be coping remarkably well in comparison to women who retain many of their traditional privileges and expectations, but who display extreme rage at micro-disenfranchisements and momentary lapses in chivalric supply.

Benevolent sexism toward women remains the norm, despite women's traditional obligations toward men being wiped out

In summary the grief-reaction over loss of traditional roles is not a predominately male issue. Women have yet to experience the loss of gendered entitlements on anywhere near the same scale as men, however they are equally proficient at raging over micro-losses of chivalry and male deference. The theory of aggrieved entitlement thus applies to no gender in particular – so lets use it to describe the ever-present rage displayed by women in both private and public settings.

Gynocentrism and the sin of being male

Peter Ryan · 29 January 2019 · Archived copy · Original

The shaming of men and boys in our culture has been going on for a long, long time. So long in fact that there are now men and women in the population that never grew up in a time when masculinity was valued and men were viewed in a positive light. Being male in this culture is a sin. Being a white male doubly so. In my previous article, "Gynocentrism and Misandry"[1], I elaborated further on how gynocentrism is associated with a belief in female superiority and that this belief system is based on the attitudes that society cultivates around masculinity and femininity.

Men and boys are devils and women and girls are angels. Men are violent, predatory, primitive and destructive. Women are peaceful, empathetic, civilised and life giving. These attitudes we have about men and women and the associations we make with masculinity and femininity, distort our perception of reality and our behaviour toward the sexes. At the macro level this impacts our culture, how we raise the next generation, how we run society and shape policy and laws and it also importantly impacts the future direction of society.

Our society sees the worst in men and the best in women and rarely the reverse. Only in circumstances where men are conforming to gynocentric norms of prioritising female well-being over male well-being, are they given a reprieve. But even that is temporary and is often labelled benevolent sexism[2]when it is convenient for feminist women to do so, to advance their agenda. Of course if men then attempt to treat women as true equals and abandon chivalry, then they often become the target of aggrieved entitled women[3]. Men can't win, which is the entire point of the feminist agenda and why men need to recognise feminism for the hate movement[4] that it is. This movement wishes to subjugate you and marginalise you because you are male. Kowtowing to feminists will just accelerate the process, it will not save you.

The gynocentric attitudes we hold about men and women in society, reinforce bigoted gynocentric double standards in our culture on a regular basis. These attitudes become not just a justification but also an incentive, for enshrining gynocentrism in our laws, policies, institutions and social norms. Challenging gynocentrism in our culture, can sometimes lead to people revealing their own bigoted attitudes about men and women. You may have heard the cry, "Because I am a woman" for example, if you have ever questioned these double standards.

These gynocentric attitudes about men and women go back centuries. We can see them reflected in old nursery rhymes from centuries ago that tell us, "boys are made of snips, snails and puppy dog tails and girls are made of sugar and spice and all things nice"[5]. The demonisation of masculinity and the deification of femininity in the culture, has been an ongoing and gradual process spanning centuries. Dr. Paul Nathanson and Katherine Young have examined the deification of women and the demonisation of men over history and in the modern era, in their book Sanctifying Misandry: Goddess Ideology and the Fall of Man[6]. Like a snowball going down a hill, this process has been gathering increasing momentum over time over the centuries and particularly the last five decades under feminism.

According to feminist ideology to be born male is to sin. In the eyes of feminists, men are collectively to blame for the actions of all men. Not just men that live in the present, but all men that have lived thoroughout history. We as men are guilty for the actions of men that lived hundreds and sometimes thousands of years ago. This is feminist tribalism and the perspective of the female mob and self-loathing men behind their hateful ideology. Men are also to my knowledge the only group that can be collectively blamed for the actions of one individual in Western society (here is just one example [7]of this). In any other case society regards it as bigotry. That speaks volumes about the contempt society has for men.

Feminism have rewritten history and framed men as the oppressors of women. The feminist capture of the humanities departments at the universities has been instrumental in their campaign to vilify men and propagate this false and hateful narrative. The narrative feminists have spun is a powerful one. History is not something we can easily examine as we cannot directly observe it. The general public has to rely heavily on academics to learn about their history and when feminists control the humanities departments of universities, the truth is especially difficult to uncover.

The narrative of women being victimised at the hands of men, also plays on our base emotional drives and impulses to protect what we perceive as the more vulnerable sex (thanks in part to female neoteny and the parental brain). It becomes very easy for feminists to use this narrative to play on people's emotions and bypass critical examination of their agenda by society. The feminist account of history is difficult to challenge unless you have a thorough knowledge of the primary sources of the historical record, since so much history syllabus has been corrupted by feminist ideology. Even with all the facts at their disposal, people still need to contend with appealing to reason when the feminist narrative puts people in an emotional frame of mind.

History informs so much of what we do in everyday society. Our political and legal systems and culture rely to a significant degree on history to inform decision making. We look at what worked and what did not and use that as a guide to shape policy and law. We debate issues and ideas based on our account of our own history. Cultural tradition is rooted in our understanding of our own shared history. Indeed an effective way to socially engineer society, is to corrupt it's understanding of it's own history. Feminism has virtual control of academic scholarship in the humanities and has been actively corrupting our understanding of history for decades, with little to no substantive resistance. We are told that men have oppressed women for thousands of years. Past society is described as a violent, tyrannical patriarchy where men were privileged and women were oppressed and treated as chattel. That is the feminist account of history, which they have subtly and gradually been embedding into scholarship within academia over the decades.

This does have profound implications for society, because like I said, our account of our own history influences how we run civilisation. History also shapes our attitudes about ourselves and about others. We can see this influence play out in diplomatic relations between countries, in the perpetual conflict in the Middle East and between governments, indigenous people and the general population. History does not just influence our decision making, it shapes our attitudes towards groups of people and also about ourselves. Even today Germany is still trying to overcome the legacy of the Nazi party and the death camps. So when feminism invaded the humanities and began rewriting history decades ago, it was quite predictable that this would eventually have profound implications on our attitudes toward men and women and it has.

We now have an education system in which boys and girls are taught as early as primary school, the feminist narrative of male patriarchal oppression and male violence. Here are two accounts of what boys have exposed to, linked here[8]and here[9]. Please read and listen to what they are telling us is going on and how it has impacted them and the boys that were around them. This process of indoctrination continues from primary school, through to high school and postgraduate study, all the way up to academic scholarship itself. The mainstream media, politics, our legal system and government policy, are also informed on this worldview of "thousands of years" of patriarchal tyranny. Feminists are not content with just telling people what to do, they want to burrow inside your brain like a parasite and they want access to young children to brainwash.

The feminist strategy of subverting our education system and embedding their ideology into scholarship and the syllabus, is essentially a systematic form of brainwashing of the general population. Feminism wants to shape people's perception, because once they have control of the perception of society, they can then implement their agenda with the support of the population. If feminists can train society to perceive men as the violent oppressors of women for thousands of years, then it gives feminism the support to push forward an agenda in government, business and elsewhere, that prioritises female well-being above male well-being, with no reciprocity or regard for fairness. The feminist narrative of thousands of years of tyrannical patriarchy and male privilege and oppression of women, is the foundational justification and incentive used to pass laws, policy and initiatives. that treat women and girls as a higher class of human being and men as an underclass.

This is precisely the same pattern you see with any ideology that advocates bigotry. Bigotry requires a belief in ones own moral superiority over the group they perceive has wronged them. This sense of moral superiority and self-righteousness, requires bigots to find a justification and support for their own attitudes about the group they hate and why their actions are righteous. Millions of people have been exterminated based on this way of thinking. As Karen Straughan described in two videos (linked here[10] and here[11], some of her finest work in my opinion) debunking the feminist worldview and narrative of an oppressive patriarchy, you kind of have to hate men to twist facts and omit so much of history to paint men as the oppressors of women.

When we examine the gynocentric attitudes about men and women in society today, we are seeing the product of not just centuries of gynocentrism, but also the feminist revision of history. I discussed in "Gynocentrism and Misandry", that the misandry we are witnessing in this society has gotten to this level because of the indifference of the general population. This is certainly correct, as the indifference of the population to male well-being ensures there is no resistance to feminist bigotry and misandry. However the driving force behind the escalation of misandry in our culture over the last fifty years, has been the feminist revision of history and the feminist cultivation of hatred toward men in the general population. Feminism has been creating a fire in the hearts and minds of the population, that men need to get what they deserve. The feminist version of equality, seeks retribution for supposed wrongs based on the skewed feminist account of history.

In the minds of feminists, men must pay for thousands of years of what they frame as male oppression. They use this rationalisation to stir hatred and bitterness in the population toward men and garner support from the public in pushing forward an agenda of female supremacy in the name of justice. It is not uncommon for instance to see simpletons in the general population argue the feminist initiatives to implement female hiring quotas are fair, because men have been in charge for hundreds of years and have supposedly "ruined" everything. Feminists never heard of two wrongs not making something right. It is an eye for an eye for feminists. Of course it is not really an eye for eye, because the feminist fiction that history is thousands of years of male oppression is a disgusting lie.

The slogan "the future is female"[12], is often justified by some people on the basis that men have had their turn and now it is time for women to be "privileged" and have their time in the sun. The reliance on the historical narrative of male privilege and male oppression of women, is key to this simplistic childlike thinking. With it feminists can not just gain acceptance from the population in advocating for biased policies, programs, initiatives and laws that place women and girls above men and boys, they can actually engender support and encouragement from a sizable amount of gullible and stupid people within the population. Remember half the population has an IQ below 100. All you need to do to seize control of society, is to persuade the stupid, gullible, impressionable and ignorant to form a mob, accept your narrative and silence any dissent. Every totalitarian ideology based on hate, victimhood and tribalism, has employed this strategy and feminism is no exception.

These far left feminist mobs we now see every second week or so on TV did not come from thin air. The hatred of men and particularly white men, has been cultivated through a feminist revision of history that has been spread by feminist control of academia, the education system and the mainstream media. When you teach successive generations through schools and then universities, that men are the historical oppressors and women have been the oppressed, it impacts their attitudes toward men and women. Women walk around with a chip on their shoulder and men walk around with their shoulders slumped. It fosters resentment, anger and bitterness toward men and it fosters self-loathing and shame in men. As discussed, the feminist control of academia ensures that it becomes virtually impossible for any member of the general public that questions this narrative or even an academic, to get an accurate and unbiased account of their own history.

As time goes on and more and more generations have been indoctrinated with the feminist account of history and our society has gradually lost it's memory of what it once was, soon all that will be recorded is the feminist account of history. There is no discussion by feminists on the millions of men that died in war to protect their female partners and family, or the millions of men that worked themselves to an early grave in the mines, in the bellies of ships and farmed the land from sunrise to sunset with their bare hands and backs etc so their families and women could eat. There is no consideration given to the reality that the majority of men were just as poor as the majority of women over history. There is no acknowledgement by feminists of the fact that many men did not own any land at all or any substantive amount of land and did not have the right to vote for the vast majority of human history. Many men worked at the mercy of the male and female aristocracy, with little influence over their own lives.

There is no accounting by feminists of the fact that it was only some men and women in society that had any substantive wealth, land or power. There is omission by feminists of the powerful and wealthy female upper classes, who enjoyed a life of relative privilege and had a quality of life far beyond the vast majority of men in the population and were free of any labour or drudgery. Feminists are silent on the reality that feminism itself mainly originated from privileged upper class white women. There is no thought given by feminists of the numerous social and legal responsibilities men had toward women, or the privileges and exemptions from certain societal obligations that women were exclusively given. Women were not conscripted in the millions and sent off to be cannon fodder, to cite just one example.

The feminist account of history is one of omission and distortion. The feminist subversion of history and the humanities, has been the feminist equivalent of book burning and has been going on unchallenged for decades. This had led to a cultivation of hatred toward men in modern society. It cannot be understated the impact that has on fueling gynocentrism. When feminists cultivate hatred toward men and they portray women as victims of male oppression throughout history and cultivate sympathy toward women, they provide a justification and an incentive for gynocentrism to flourish. The recent focus on toxic masculinity and feminist ideology in the Gillette Ad[13] and the APA guidelines on men and boys[14], comes from this very narrative of historical patriarchal oppression. We have seen an explosion in gynocentrism over the last fifty years, as a direct result of this widespread and unchallenged lie that men historically oppressed women.

As Dr. Warren Farrell has pointed out, the primary focus of civilisation up until very recently was one of survival. Men have not been the oppressors. The harsh and unforgiving environment has been the oppressive force on society. The environmental pressures faced by society, required both sexes to make sacrifices and for men that often meant their lives. Ironically it was these very sacrifices that allowed society to advance to a point where there was enough prosperity for feminism to rewrite the very history that enabled it to come into existence!

Men sacrificed and have died in the millions so feminists could write about how violent and oppressive they were. It is the ultimate insult and a disgrace to shame men for the sacrifices they have made for women and society throughout history. Men have not been more privileged, they have been held more responsible. They were given authority to sacrifice for others and men did. Dr. Warren Farrell has written in the Myth Of Male Power[15], about the underlying reality that any civilisation that has survived has done so by training it's men to be disposable for society and to sacrifice themselves for others and particularly for women and children. The Titanic is just one example of how old this tradition of male sacrifice is. How oppressive of men to save the lives of women and children at the expense of their own!

Whether it was protecting their society and women and children from a hostile invading force, or working themselves to death or injuring themselves doing hazardous and physically arduous labour, the history of men was one of sacrifice. I would invite people who think otherwise to watch this video by Tom Golden, that shows just one example[16] of this sacrifice. I would invite everyone to watch that video and listen to just how fucking hard men had to sacrifice for society, before they start talking about men historically being the "privileged" sex. If it were up to me, I would invite feminists to work and re-enact what men did on that canal that Tom discussed for just one day. We could quash that fucking narrative of male patriarchal oppression of women and male privilege in one day!

As Tom Golden has discussed[17], this cultivation of hatred toward men is based upon the same mechanism behind the cultivation of hatred toward black people in the early 20th century. If we are serious about addressing the pervasive misandry on display in our culture, then in addition to addressing the indifference we have toward male well-being and our bigoted attitudes about men and women, we will also need to reclaim our history back from feminists. Clearly if the nature of men was to oppress women, feminism would never have come into existence at all and it certainly would not have achieved the level of power it enjoys today.

Even in the modern era feminists will argue that men are privileged and oppressing women. They will point to the tiny fraction of men that are CEO's relative to female CEO's and then infer this represents the population as a whole and is caused by patriarchal oppression of women and no other factor. Feminists completely ignore the majority of the homeless which are male, the male unemployed and the men working in hazardous and low paying professions. They will discuss the gender pay gap repeatedly and then ignore the numerous variables that explain it (like more women choosing to work part-time, more men working night shift and in remote locations, or more women choosing to work in childcare over engineering) and rush right to the conclusion that the gender pay gap is all due to discrimination against women.

Stefan Molyneux has done a brilliant job examining the feminist claim that men today are privileged in this video[18]. This claim of male privilege in present day society, has always rested on the feminist narrative of history to garner validity and robustness. Present day accounts of male privilege require feminists to employ sophistry to make it appear that male privilege and patriarchal oppression have always been with us. That they are as real, solid and enduring as the air we breathe. It is much more difficult for feminists to persuade the public their bullshit ideological concepts are real, if they cannot demonstrate that they have existed for thousands of years.

It is time to call bullshit on the feminist revision of history. It is a one-sided and distorted account of history, that polarises people and cultivates hatred toward men. To destroy a society, destroy it's culture by corrupting it's own record of it's own history. That is a central component of the feminist strategy to transform society into a female supremacist matriarchy. Please comment on those points below and share your thoughts on what is wrong with the feminist narrative on history and give examples if you like. The more the merrier!

Woman committing sexual assault at “Women’s March” identified and arrested

Paul Elam · 3 February 2019 · Archived copy · Original

On Saturday, January 21, 2019 the so-called “Women’s March” was held in Washington, D.C… The event, already under a great deal of scrutiny for serving as a hate platform for misandrists and anti-Semites, also took a reputational hit when a sexual assault by a woman participant occurred on camera, including a full confession by the perpetrator.

The woman has since been identified as 21-year-old Isabel Kenna O’Shaughnessy. AVFM has obtained copies of the Criminal Complaint and the Affidavit of the Officer in support of a search warrant containing O’Shaughnessy’s personal information. Those are being published here in the public interest.

The Peter Pan Pandemic

Doug Mortimer · 6 February 2019 · Archived copy · Original

You might be surprised to find out that Peter Pan is not some ancient folkloric figure but is relatively new, historically speaking. He may have been loosely inspired by the Greek god Pan, but in fact he was born in the 20th Century.

The character of Peter Pan was created by Scottish author J.M. Barrie, who wrote Peter Pan, or The Boy Who Wouldn't Grow Up, a play that debuted in London on December 27, 1904. Over the years, with a big boost from Walt Disney in 1953, Peter Pan, Tinkerbell, Captain Hook, Wendy, et al have passed into popular culture. Peter Pan peanut butter? Hard to believe, but that goes back to the 1920s. Just why this brand name was selected is a mystery, but perhaps it was because kids like peanut butter, so the name Peter Pan implies that, at least in this case, it is OK for adults not to grow up. Enjoy your second childhood by scarfing up peanut butter!

In more recent decades, Dr. Dan Kiley popularized the phrase "Peter Pan Syndrome" via his 1983 book The Peter Pan Syndrome: Men Who Have Never Grown Up. The phrase has also passed into popular culture, so even people who never read the book use the phrase (in more recent years, the term "failure to launch" has become a worthy competitor). So when J.M. Barrie created Peter Pan, he apparently struck a nerve in western culture. Some egghead pundits might assert that he had offered up a variation on a Jungian archetype.

Perhaps the most famous interpretation of Peter Pan was by Mary Martin, who had the title role in the 1954 Broadway musical. After a long career in stage, screen, and television, she is still remembered for this role, even though she died in 1990, long before anyone ever heard of gender fluidity…gender fluids, maybe. In fact, a statue of Mary Martin in her hometown of Weatherford, Texas portrays her in the role of Peter Pan. Fun fact: her son, the late Larry Hagman, who became world famous playing J.R. Ewing in the Dallas TV series, also has a statue in Weatherford. I'm not aware of any other town where a mother and son (aside from Mary and Jesus) are so honored.

Curiously, Mary Martin was not the first mature actress (she was 41 in 1954) to play the youthful Peter Pan. In fact, that very first production in 1904 also featured another female, Nina Boucicault (age 37), in the title role (it probably didn't hurt that she was the sister of the director). A number of the Lost Boys were also played by women, largely due to stringent British labor laws pertaining to children. Barrie's play was so popular it was performed in London continuously till 1939 when a lot of British adolescent boys were compelled to grow up fast to take on the Wehrmacht.

When Peter Pan was produced on Broadway in November 1905, famed American actress Maude Adams (not to be confused with the Bond girl of the same name) was chosen for the title role. In 1924, a silent movie featured Betty Bronson (a more age-appropriate 17) in the title role.

How is it that an adult female can fit so snugly in a part written for an adolescent male? How do we account for all this, occurring long before the trendy gender bender themes of modern times?

Well, in days of old, when sex roles were better defined, it was not unusual for a woman to assert something along the lines of "If I were a man, I'd…" The implication was that men had agency and women didn't. "It's a man's world" was taken for granted though some women weren't happy with that. The term "masculine protest" was coined by psychologist Alfred Adler to describe females who were aggressive, pushy, or domineering.

Nevertheless, assuming there is such a thing as patriarchy, that men indeed have more power than women, then we must contemplate the wisdom, not of Peter Pan but of Peter Parker. You know, "With great power comes great responsibility." But suppose men don't have great power. Does that let them off the hook when it comes to great responsibility, Spidey?

Well, this man's world has been heavily infiltrated by females to the point where "the future is female" is taken as common wisdom and any all-male gathering is as suspect as a Klan meeting. If that is indeed the case, then we might have a clue as to why men don't want to grow up and, by extension, why they don't want to get married.

For all the reasons mentioned so many times on this web site, marriage has become a dungeon. The institution's power is with the state and the state is gynocentric. If a man stops to ask, "What's in it for me?" the response is usually to appeal to one's sense of duty. For many, the definition of a real man is someone who takes responsibility no matter what the cost to him personally.

Well, responsibility comes in many different forms.

The family man has no authority over his family. He still has responsibility, however, and he is frequently reminded of those responsibilities by the real authority, the state. The man is no longer the boss, just the supervisor. The state sets the policy and the supervisor sees that the state's policy is carried out…or else, see you in court. Much the same is true in the workplace where, in a sense, all jobs are government jobs. Employers must hold fast to government policies…or else – you guessed it – see you in court.

So married manhood is not as desirable a status as it used to be. If you are a boy today, you might not be in any hurry to grow up. If you're a budding alpha male the world may still be your oyster. If you're not…well, all that's left for you are the oyster shells. (They do make great fertilizer if you grind 'em up, however.)

So why shouldn't a man take a cue from Peter Pan and protract his adolescence? What's there to look forward to? At the same time manhood is being denigrated, middle class life is harder and harder to attain, requires more and more debt, and the rewards are less and less. Well, when the going gets tough…it's time to reconsider your position. Hence the Peter Pan Syndrome. A rational response, long-range social consequences notwithstanding.

Well, we not only have Peter Pans amongst us, we also have growing numbers of guys who say they identify as females. I am tempted to call it Peter Tran Syndrome, but I won't. There are a lot of Vietnamese guys out there named Peter Tran (just Google the name), and they would likely object to the phrase.

The preponderance of sex changes follow the male-to-female route. The phenomenon is not new. Cross-dressing has probably been going on ever since Adam and Eve started covering themselves up, and hermaphrodites have been noted in all cultures throughout history. Historically speaking, sex-change operations are relatively new. Christine (originally George) Jorgensen made headline news in 1952 as the first American to go to Denmark to undergo a sex change operation. (The first such operation was not performed in the US till 1966.) This is not to say that 50-60 years ago one could walk into a doctor's office, bat one's eyelashes, and request a penectomy.

Back in the mid-70s, I knew a guy who hung around strip clubs. While I was making the rounds with him, he introduced me to a friend who worked as a dancer. She had been a he, and the changeover had been quite an ordeal. In those days, one had to take a battery of physical and psychological tests. In other words, it was not to be taken lightly. Needless to say, you had to be an adult. You had to convince the doctor that you were dead serious about it, that it wasn't just a passing fancy. As the old medical adage goes, "First, do no harm." There was no turning back, so if the doctor thought there was a chance you might get buyer's remorse, forget about it. There was no gender fluidity. You couldn't go back and forth at will.

How do we account for the fact that a vaginoplasty is a much more popular operation than an add-a-dick-to-me? Is it simply because it's easier to go convex than concave? Is it because borderline soy boys are afraid of succumbing to toxic masculinity? Or are they afraid of being held to male standards of accountability?

That 27-year-old man living with his parents may eventually cave in to his parents' wishes and present them with grandchildren. But there's no point in nagging him to find a nice girl and start a family if he decides to undergo gender reassignment surgery. And the greatest surgeon in the world can't create a functioning womb, so all hope for grandchildren is lost. Hence the male-to-female operation stifles all requests or demands pertaining to extending the family bloodline. You don't just dodge the bullet, you make yourself bulletproof.

Best of all, the male-to-female shape-shifter will never be admonished to man up – because she is no longer a man!

If you're looking for a way to minimize the world's demands on you, what better method than to go from male to female? As Norah Vincent discovered in her book Self-Made Man, life is easier when you're a woman, even if you're a lesbian, as she was.

It's not a matter of social constructs. Though the basic mammalian template is female, male differentiation starts at conception and really kicks in when the fetus's sex glands start to develop. Unfortunately, male differentiation takes its toll right from the start.

150 males are conceived for every 100 females. Thanks to miscarriages (about twice as many male fetuses as females) and spontaneous abortions (apparently that XX chromosome combo protects females against lethal recessive traits), that ratio changes to 105-110 to 100 at the time of birth. The ratio of stillborn babies is 130-135 males to 100 women.

During the first year of life, male mortality is 27% higher than for females. During the first four years of life, male youngsters make up about 60% of the accidental deaths. During the teenage years it gets worse, as the death ratio is four boys for every girl from ages 15 to 19. Name any age range and women are less likely to die.

More recently Plos One published a Global Gender Gap study by the University of Essex and the University of Missouri-Columbia (ironically, the same institution that became a national laughingstock in 2015 thanks to leftist overreaching). The study concluded that women have it easier in 91 of 134 countries. If you look it up on the internet, you might question the study's methodology, but it's safe to say that no university social scientists are going to massage the data to make men appear sympathetic.

Given all the above, one would think that any man who arrives at full-functional manhood would be celebrated. He survived the gauntlet! The obstacles for a female zygote to make it to womanhood are much less. Yet the adjectives "stunning," "amazing," and "brave" are far more often applied to women than to men.

Sorry, mom and dad, but your son's motivation to be responsible for anything more than his own well-being is diminishing day by day. Even in more traditional societies, failure-to-launch worries of parents are hardly unknown. Hand-wringing about directionless sons (and unmarried daughters) have long been middle class preoccupations. One of the greatest examples in literature is Prince Hal in Shakespeare's Henry IV, Parts 1 and 2. In short, though Prince Hal is heir to the throne of England, he isn't acting like it. Sad to say he fell in with a bad crowd. He spends all of his time drinking and carousing with a bunch of layabouts, notably a shameless fat slob known as Falstaff, the proverbial bad influence. What will become of Prince Hal if he doesn't reform? What will become of England if this wastrel ascends to the throne?

Well, surprise, surprise, once the prince becomes king he behaves in a kingly manner. He leaves his companions behind, straightens up, and flies right.

But why did Prince Hal launch and why would a young man today choose not to? Well, Hal had motivation. He was given authority, not just responsibilities. He was not a mere supervisor. He did not carry out policy enacted by bureaucrats or committees. He made policy. He was king. Since democracy and equality are always being praised to the skies, we sometimes forget that it's good to be the king. Even if it's just your home and your castle.

Today's young man will never be granted authority even if he voluntarily shoulders ever burden heaped upon him. Given the various levels of governmental policies and their attendant bureaucracies, autonomy is just a pleasant fantasy. Everybody reports to somebody. In ye olden days, every married man at least had authority over his family. Not any more. Now he is just a supervisor. He will have more responsibilities than a slacker but less autonomy. What is his motivation? To be the head of a family? Talk about a thankless task!

So the 21st Century Peter Pan has many reasons for slowing down the maturation process if not doing an end run around the traditional rites of passage. Is the sex changer motivated by the same reasons? Yang is for suckers, so I'm going with yin – permanently.

So now we see why women are so believable at playing Peter Pan. Irresponsibility is the female birthright. As boys, men start at the same point but cannot remain there without inviting censure. Not so girls. A young man who refuses to become a man might as well become a woman. Hence the flight from manhood to womanhood. In a sense, this death of a man's manhood is a type of suicide that doesn't show up in the male suicide statistics.

It is yet another variation on the theme of male disposability

Just in – Elmo caught up in #MeToo

Robert Brockway · 8 February 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Popular Sesame Street character Elmo is the latest to be caught up in the ongoing #MeToo scandal. Two women working on the set of Sesame Street have claimed that Elmo tickles cast and crew without their consent.

One brave young woman, who made her complaint anonymously, had this to say about Elmo's behaviour:

> As I had done every day since starting this job I took a cigar and bottle of Scotch to Elmo's dressing room after filming had completed for the day. Usually, I'd just knock and a red furry hand would come out to grab the cigar and booze. This time it was different. Elmo invited me in. When I went to put the cigar and Scotch on a table he closed and locked the door behind me. I was trapped. And then it happened. Elmo tickled me! I tried to say no but the word wouldn't come out of my mouth. I got the "n" out but I just couldn't say "o". The tickling went on and on. I thought it would never end. And then we had sex. I was so happy the tickling had stopped.

This brave strong young woman confirmed this incident happened several years ago. When asked why she did not report it sooner she confirmed she only realised she had been tickled against her will after a discussion with feminist icon Miss Piggy.

Another brave strong powerful young woman, who also made her complaint anonymously, claimed to have been tickled by Elmo without her consent after an end of season wrap party:

> Those arms! Those little furry red arms! They're so flexible. If Elmo wants to tickle you then Elmo gets to tickle you!

This brave strong powerful amazing young woman also confirmed the alleged incident happened several years ago. She noted:

> When I saw that another brave strong powerful amazing fabulous young woman had made an anonymous complaint against Elmo I felt it was time for me, as a brave strong powerful amazing fabulous terrific young woman to step forward.

Elmo was contacted for comment and had this to say in a high pitched squeaky voice:

> Elmo has no comment! Talk to Elmo's lawyers!

Elmo is reportedly three and a half but as a male bears all responsibility during any interactions with these brave strong powerful amazing fabulous terrific bold young women.

Greetings all,

Every four months we must appeal to AVFM readers to help keep this important website online. The fundraising goal is based entirely on our actual server costs (see the invoice), plus GoFundMe fees. It does not represent the full cost of AVFM operations but, along with our faithful subscribers, it does keep our nostrils above the financial waterline.

Your support here is more important than you might know. This summer AVFM will celebrate 10 years online. Even after a full decade we remain the unquestioned flagship for the online men's movement. We continue to bring red pill men the kind of literature they need to understand and come to terms with the blue pill world in which they live.

Can you imagine where we'd be in this misandric world without A Voice for Men?

If you agree with us that A Voice for Men is an absolute necessity, please show that support with a contribution to this quarterly fundraiser to cover our server costs. You'll be helping us, and generations of men to come to have access to information and thought they will not see anywhere else.

We sincerely thank you in advance for your support.

UPDATE: At $980 we are nearly there. Please help us reach 100%!

Pitching Masculinity

A. Man · 9 February 2019 · Archived copy · Original

What's the story?

Let me pitch it.

There's this guy—he's massive; tall, muscles, good looking, on an airplane. Terrorists take control; he stands up to them—courage. This guy's got it. A woman is watching—he saves her life; he saves everyone's life—and she falls for him. She's, like a gender studies professor, or some shit like that (he never went to college—built his own life). They hook up. One evening—at a dinner party, say—she has her friends over and asks him to read a section of her poetic work. He refuses—agitated by her demands; gets angry. (There's gonna be a bidding war for this one, I tell ya'.) Her friends say he's misogynist because he won't read her work; but, you see, there's been hints all long in the movie about him; and they didn't see the hints. Hints. Wait for it. Are you ready? He screams out: "I don't know how to read!" Got that? He never learned to read as a kid. This guy—courage, good-looking, hunk, solid—built his own house, farms his own land, carves his own furniture—but he never learned to read. Together, they work it through, overcoming his stoicism; teaching him to feel his pain, own his shame. Big scene at the end when he tries to read Elizabeth Barrett Browning's Sonnet 47 to her, for the first time—stuttering over words. He proclaims his devotion to her. Cut to romantic music; fade to black; roll the credits; accept the Oscar.

Am I right?

Let's green light that one.

Another one?

This guy—same kind'a guy: morally remote; hard to read, you feel his pain—sits on a ledge over NYC, ready to jump. We call the movie "That Day" —working title. His therapist comes to sit by his side on the ledge—she's all decked out for some formal dinner she was at. She leaves the boring dinner to be with him; to save him. He threatens to take her with him when he jumps. He shouts that "no one knows what I saw that day." She tries to tell him he is a good man, despite what happened "that day." She shouts at him "Tell me what happened that day." He shouts back "I can't say the words about that day." Fade to darkness. Screen fades black as he begins to tell the story, on the ledge, on a cold night in NYC, of what happened, on "That Day." In a movie theater, sitting between the flickering frames of light and dark, poised on a pinhead, flashes of explosions, black silence, caves of hostages, black silence, blood on grass, black silence, firefight, black silence, impacting bullets, black silence, gore, death. That Day. How he saved the lives of girls kidnapped by Boko Haram or, say in Kandahar, and witnessed something horrifying—some baby killed or some shit; shot in the brain—all his Navy Seal buddies dead. PTSD. The Fisher King meets Full Metal Jacket. He comes back from war, clamps down, stifles his emotions, stoicism; he wanders the streets of NYC alone, Army awards him Medal of Honor but only if he sees a special therapist—they pick her. Will the war in his head will ever end—this war that brought him to the brink of sanity on a ledge of masculine loneliness, jumping to conclusions. At the end of the movie, on the ledge, he says to her, wait for it, wait for it, wait for it.

He says to her, "You made me a better man."

Let me thank the Academy—again.

Let me pitch you one more—just one more.

This guy—stoic, strong, confident, poised—has to fight to find his home through life's obstacles. He perseveres, he grows; on his own—no one to help him. He teaches himself how to be a better man.

Trifecta, right?

Give me another Oscar.

What? No?

Why not?

But that last one is the story of Odysseus. Homer. The Odyssey.

Not interested?

It's the greatest story ever told.

Like these…

The Odyssey, Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, Don Quixote, Moby Dick, Hamlet, One Hundred Years of Solitude, Huckleberry Finn, Heart of Darkness, Gulliver's Travels, Catch-22, Candide, Invisible Man, The Aeneid, Oedipus the King, The Magic Mountain, The Old Man and the Sea.

The media no longer shows men conquering themselves. It shows men damaged; fixed by women; fractured into masculinities, reinterpreted and redesigned.

How did this happen?

Hollywood did it—stretching back 100 years because that is what women wanted to see on the silver screen.

Why did this happen?

So that some men could climb on the backs of the good ones.

Harvey Weinstein and Matt Lauer? Fuck 'em all to hell. They made their bed sidling up to a mediocre media, maligning masculinity, kissing matriarchy's ass, throwing decent men under the bus, as they climbed their ladder. Yes, they were men (we must own the damage that some men did to masculinity), but women were the consumers of Hollywood's assault on men. Harlequin is still doing it—and they still don't call it verbal porn.

Then what story should we tell our boys?

The only story that ever was.

The one about the dragon.

The darkest demon of all.

The dark side of testosterone.

When a man conquers testosterone, he conquers himself.

It's a horrifying hormone.

It's a destructive hormone.

It's a magnificent hormone.

It's a creative hormone.

It's a dragon.

All boys feel the restlessness of that continuous surging and ebbing of testosterone that they make in their body, not inject once a month to enable an impulse transition. Long before he knows it is testosterone, he senses the continuity of that flow. Huck Finn knew the flow—it made him sail the Mississippi. Only a brotherhood can guide men to redirect the flow and channel it as a force for good.

Feminists insisted the old stories were about toxic masculinity. Then they believed their lies. They created the fiction. Then, in their envy, took a magnifying glass to a handful of men, using that exaggeration as a self-aggrandizing crucifixion of masculinity (not talking good women, here; talking toxic feminism; there's a difference as you know—perhaps feminists did more damage to women).

The average man has always held the bad in check—kept the testosterone dragon in its cave. We didn't need the help of toxic feminists to do this (we never asked for their femsplaining, either); just like feminists say they don't need mansplaining, or manspreading or manslamming or blah, blah, blah, blah, blah, blah, blah —whatever the fuck they're whining about now. Toxic feminists kicked the decent man in this shins when he was distracted, and the dragon has escaped. They are to blame for the Harvey Weinsteins and Rose McGowans—the johns and their prostitutes (except that Weinstein's "whores" called for a script revision: now they are "victims").

The average man was telling good stories, before the feminists swapped in toxic masculinity after they got tired of the rom-coms they previously swapped.

You got mail?

No, brother.

You get male.

Take back the beauty and power of your sex.

Say it aloud: "masculinity created civilization."

"But women did not get the chance," they whine.

Masculinity created civilization.

Toxic feminists will accuse you of sexist indifference to what their fictional script revision say they did.

Masculinity created civilization.

"But men are born of women," they remind you, expecting you to genuflect.

Masculinity created civilization.

"Blah, blah, blah, blah, blah, blah, blah," feminists roar.

Masculinity created civilization.

All the seven seas, the hearts of darkness, the revenants hunting their down their anger in the wilderness of North America, are allegories, for men, to redirect testosterone's surges and channel it for the good. We need these old stories, written yet again for a population deafened by feminism's self-indulgent whine of "me, me, me, me, me, it's all about me, it's only about me."

Feminists have convinced themselves men's stories are war stories because they don't know what those stories were about. Our stories were never about the enemy without, but the enemy within.

Feminists lied—that is all they do.

Today, feminists urge college men not to get male, but to get Gillette, while demanding men respect women.

Respect women?

Not on your life.

I'd just as soon respect a rock.

Respect is earned; and rocks don't earn it. Some men do, some women do.

Only toxic feminists and their insatiable egos demand unearned respect.

Teach your sons to respect the achievements of masculinity (and femininity).

Teach them to love being male. This will make them a better man.

Respect masculinity as an ideal, a goal, an aspiration; respect the people you wish to emulate. Everyone else, you treat with civility.

The American Psychological Association suggests that if a man insists he is not masculine, that that is masculinity, too. WTF? This validates the void story—for them, there is no story; they are busy re-pitching and ditching masculinity. They say there are masculinities. Just the word itself sounds like feminist toxicity—do you see their duplicity? Femininity vs. Masculinities: they keep the singular for themselves; for us, they assign the plural.

There are no masculinities—that is a feminist fiction to fracture the brother hood (divide and conquer). There is one masculinity, one story—a diamond; with facets, good and bad—both one and the same: the creator and the destroyer of civilization (not life—good women do that), the worker and the leader are one, in each of us.

Masculinity is the penis, the testicles, the prostate, the testosterone, the ejaculation, the heaving chest in orgasm, the man loving his good woman (or his man), the father, the soldier and the dancer (their stories: gay and straight; we must welcome gay men into our circle to destroy the feminist scourge) the muscles that caress a flower's petal and which eases the earthly descent of an autumn leaf, snowflake or a meteor; the mind and hand that created almost all the art, science, music and engineering (that's non-fiction); the self-reflecting stoicism (toxically redefined as loneliness in their world), on a cliff overlooking the city that history built.

What story?

His story.

This story: treat other men as you wish them to treat you—like a brother: black, white, straight or gay; male friends matter.

Then live your life as you want and write your story to share with your brothers (feminists have their fingers in their ears and up their ass).

Fuck feminism.

Fuck Hollywood.

Fuck the media and her matriarchal writers (they never learned to code).

Fuck Oscar Night. On that night, read "Sir Gawain and the Green Knight."

It's not about a green knight.

What's it about?

It's about boys.

What's the story?

Let me pitch it.

Boys will be boys.

Would an ideology by any other name stink as badly?

A few weeks ago, I traveled to Mexico City. I took a taxi to my destination and, as it is customary, I engaged in small talk with the driver. After a while, the conversation turned to local politics, traffic, and women.

The taxi driver must have been in his fifties and from a low class urban background. He was from an older generation, since he revealed he valued sex and a hot meal at night and he thought it was worth working long hours in traffic for those benefits. When I pointed out to him that younger, urban men were not marrying as much as they did in the past, he said something that caught my attention:

"I have no respect for those slackers who prefer to jack off because they don't have the balls to support a woman."

I changed the topic to avoid an overt disagreement, which is a bit of a sin in Mexico's culture. On the way to my destination, I reflected on what the driver had just said. Apparently, this guy hadn't received the memo; in modern Mexico, getting married and supporting a wife didn't earn you sex or a hot meal as much as it used in the past, and young men were reacting appropriately.

I have noticed that as Mexico becomes more prosperous and the middle class grows, feminism starts to rise, very much like in first world countries. The difference is that the "f" word hasn't become popular in Mexico and almost nobody uses it. In fact, Mexico, being a practical day-today culture, doesn't deal much with abstract concepts. If you ask a person if they identify themselves as a feminist, you'll get a puzzled look. People here identify as fathers, mothers, taxi drivers, engineers, or whatever their station in life is.

Yet it's undeniable that feminist policies and thought have started to take root in Mexico, especially in its big cities. The first time I really paid attention to this phenomenon was in last year's election, when I saw a billboard from a female candidate to the presidency, Margarita Zavala. Zavala is the wife of former president Felipe Calderon and ran, among other things, on a pro-women platform, offering the first female president. Doesn't this sound familiar?

In any case, unlike her American counterpart, Zavala had almost no experience and no talent whatsoever and after not being able to take on the criticism and mockery that running for president involves, she ended her bid a few months later.

Since then, I've paid attention to how feminist policies, and how laws and marriage, have made marriage and relationships less attractive to men. This week, I read in the news that divorces with separation of property (that is, each party gets to keep the property and goods they own), will be evaluated by a judge that will assign up to 50% of the property taking into consideration domestic roles and uneven power levels. A couple of days ago, a political party also proposed a law that will allow "preventive prison" in order to prevent the murder of women. This means that you can be sent in prison with just an accusation or a strong suspicion that you might murder a woman. Also, another proposed law wants to make women unable to retract themselves after accusing a man of sexual harassment, which means that even if a woman admits that she lied or was wrong, the prosecution will continue. And of course, the law codifies "feminicide" as the murder of a woman on the basis of gender. The existence of this crime in law implies that the lives of women are more valuable than the lives of men. To be honest, there is a lot of nuance in these laws, but you get my point.

But that's not really what's scaring young men away, as they don't pay attention to this type of news. What's happening is that relationships are not working for them anymore. They saw their fathers work their ass off and engage in courtship, but unlike the past, the benefits of those don't exist anymore. You don't get to come home to a clean house and hot meal anymore. You don't get to have sex anymore. And while women certainly are free from not having to perform those tasks, men are also free to not engage, especially as Mexican men are still expected to pay for dates and support the family if they get married.

Take my friend Sam for example. He used to be in a relationship where he was expected to pay for dates and he even paid for a trip abroad together. He also had to plan each week's date and the girlfriend would judge if each week's plan was good enough. In return (yes, they actually negotiated this), on Sundays, she would prepare him breakfast and they'd spend the day at her place so that he wouldn't have to spend money on that day. As it turned out, she was always out of food and they would go to the supermarket to get groceries, which he would pay for. It's not surprising that when my friend lost his job while being in debt for an apartment he bought, he immediately got rid of his biggest expense: his girlfriend.

Men who are single and unmarried are also starting to walk away from the workplace. A relative of mine, a high level quality consultant and also a man from a previous generation, told me that single men "just don't care anymore." What he means is that unmarried men aren't motivated to work hard even for a higher income and he attributes it to laziness. But why would they? With a useful university degree, which they can get for free, they can buy a car and pay their rent or even buy a small apartment with a relatively simple job, with the added benefit of not having the burden of student debt like their American counterparts. Single men also see that their married co-workers, who almost always have children soon after their marriage, are always struggling with money and don't have the time or are unable to go have fun, like they do.

On the other hand, young, middle class women are complaining that good men have disappeared and the few men available are not up to their standards. They delay marriage until their biological clock starts to tick, at which point they marry the best man they can find in short notice or just the one that's available, to avoid being childless. Then complain about their husbands until they eventually divorce them.

So, feminism might not be known by name for most Mexicans, but its effects have started to show: proliferation of single women with children (referred to jokingly as "warrior mothers" or "fighter mothers" because of their self-proclaimed "fight against the harshness of life" or "fight for the life of their children"), single women who have trouble finding a man that meets their standards, and men who have never heard about MGTOWs going their own way. The situation is still far from what's happening in the United States, Japan, or Europe, but the shift has started.

Finally, who are the few ones who do identify as feminists and use the "f" word? From what I've seen, self-proclaimed Mexican feminists fall into one of three groups. The first and the smallest is actresses or singers who have achieved some sort of financial success and are out of touch with the realities of the poor people they portray in telenovelas. The second one is middle class women with some sort of corporate career, typically in human resources, accounting, or purchasing. They tend to be divorced with a single child, whom they spoil. And lastly, unattractive, fat women, typically low or lower-middle class, who have failed in both their careers and relationships and are either childless or have two or more children of different fathers.

U.N. Sustainability Goals

A. Man · 12 February 2019 · Archived copy · Original

How about some anger?

Normally, I write essays. This is not an essay. This is a directive.

Go here:
https://www.un.org/sustainabledevelopment/sustainable-development-goals/

You will find a list of the 17 Sustainability Goals for the U.N..

Note Goal 5: just note it. Expect that the U.N. will mean "women" when they say "gender" and accept the fact that that item is all about women. Just skip that one for now. Let the women have their own goals. Accept the fact that there is an entire directive only for women and girls.

At least men are in the rest of it. Right?

Click on Goal 2: Zero Hunger: "Read More About Goal 2"

Scroll down to item 2.2

Let me give you a hint. It does NOT say this:

By 2030, end all forms of malnutrition, including achieving, by 2025, the internationally agreed targets on stunting and wasting in children under 5 years of age, and address the nutritional needs of adolescent girls and boys, pregnant and lactating women and older persons.

It says this:

By 2030, end all forms of malnutrition, including achieving, by 2025, the internationally agreed targets on stunting and wasting in children under 5 years of age, and address the nutritional needs of adolescent girls, pregnant and lactating women and older persons.

This is your U.N. at work

I have no comment.

A vital reason to boycott Procter & Gamble – that has nothing to do with their recent ad

Robert Blake · 13 February 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Controversy surrounding a recent Gillette ad by Procter & Gamble (P&G) has led some to initiate boycotts of Gillette and Procter & Gamble products. My goal is not to focus on assessment of their ad. Rather, I would like to redirect all this attention to a serious problem that has been created by P&G, and other consumer product manufacturers. Read on to learn how to protect yourself and your family.

If you are not familiar with the background of this topic, you can read explanations on MarketWatch or Yahoo Finance. Briefly, P&G aired a commercial targeted at males to encourage the reduction of negative behaviors such as bullying and sexual assault. However their implementation backfired, as some people interpreted the ad as constituting misandry.

Since P&G's ad made an attempt to critique or promote certain behaviors, I find it ironically disappointing that they don't evaluate and elevate their own behaviors. Their ad implies that men should hold themselves to higher standards, while P&G does not do the same with how they formulate their products. Instead, they use a serious issue to distract (and inflame) the general public from the fact that they continue to sell products that can result in serious health problems for both males and females, but particularly for males. To what am I referring?

Exposure to many ingredients used in P&G products are biochemically feminizing men and boys*, and I present evidence that this is real andproblematic.* (I explain more about feminization of males below.) A large number of the products P&G produces, particularly personal care products, contain ingredients such as phthalates, parabans, triclosan, glycol ethers, tatrazine, and many others, that have been shown in peer reviewed scientific studies to feminize males (and cause other health problems too). And for many biological, developmental, and health reasons, this is an insidious tragedy.

NOTE: There are four sections to this article. If you would like to start with feminization of males, keep reading just below. If you want to skip to learn about health risks other than male feminization, go to section 2. If you want to skip to the dangerous ingredients to avoid, go to section 3. And if you want to skip to the (partial) list of P&G products to avoid, go to section 4. Realize if you skip sections or read them out of order, that there may be supporting material in a previous section that you skipped.

Biochemical feminization of males

To begin, what is meant by "feminization"? There are a number of biological changes related to male traits that can be classified as feminization. These include: lower sperm counts, lower testosterone and dihydrotestosterone (DHT), less facial and body hair, altered vocal development and function, smaller and/or malformed male reproductive anatomy (e.g. hypospadias, cryptorchidism), altered brain development and behavior when exposed as fetuses, infants or young children, reduced muscle and bone mass, slower metabolism, and the potential to develop gynecomastia (female breast tissue). This list is not all inclusive, these are just the primary changes.

The hormones testosterone and DHT, which are produced by the testes, are known as "androgens" and they are responsible for "turning on" genes that cause the development of traits that we typically think of as male. However, many of the chemicals we are exposed to in daily life interfere with the production and/or function of these hormones, as I elaborate below.

Testosterone, the molecular version.

So what exactly causes such feminization, and how exactly does this occur? Exposures to chemical ingredients known as "endocrine disruptors" or "xenoestrogens" (AKA "estrogenics") are often responsible for causing these changes. "Endocrine" simply means "hormone", and "xenoestrogens" simply mean synthetic chemicals that mimic the "female" hormone estrogen. These xenoestrogens bind to estrogen receptors in cells (both females and males have estrogen receptors), and turn on genes that are associated with female traits. In addition, due to what is known as "hormonal feedback inhibition" (negative feedback) or homeostasis, these xenoestrogens cause development of male traits to be stunted. Basically, when too much estrogen is present it shuts down production of androgenic hormones, and therefore androgenic (male) gene expression, and development of male traits.

Estradiol.

To be clear, it is normal for males to have a small amount of biologically natural estrogen, just as it is normal for females to have a small amount of testosterone. However, due to the large amount of synthetic estrogenic endocrine disrupting chemicals that we are exposed to in our modern world, males (particularly boys) are experiencing WAY too much activation ("turning on") of their estrogen receptors and estrogenic genes.

For an example of the consequences of this, in 2017, a group of researchers from Hebrew University and Mount Sinai medical school conducted astudy on sperm counts in the US, Europe, Australia and New Zealand. They found that over the past forty years, sperm counts have fallen by over 50%. Daniel Noah Halpern writes in GQ Magazine:

"The Hebrew University/Mount Sinai paper was a meta-analysis by a team of epidemiologists, clinicians, and researchers that culled data from 185 studies, which examined semen from almost 43,000 men [emphasis added]. It showed that the human race is apparently on a trend line toward becoming unable to reproduce itself. Sperm counts went from 99 million sperm per milliliter of semen in 1973 to 47 million per milliliter in 2011, and the decline has been accelerating. Would 40 more years—or fewer—bring us all the way to zero? "

They are not the only scientists who have noticed this trend. The US National Institute of Health (NIH) has also commented on this trend. And declining sperm counts are not the only sign of this problem. Medical statistics from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) show that the incidences of hypospadias, cryptorchidism, and low testosterone have all been on the rise for 30 years. For example, these three data sets: rates of hypospadias have increased markedly over the past 25 to 30 years, Cryptorchidism: Incidence, Risk Factors, and Potential Role of Environment, and 1 in 4 Men (25%) Over Age 30 Have Low Testosterone. So male reproductive health in developed countries (including the US) certainly seems in jeopardy.

Health risks other than male feminization

It is also worth pointing out that xenoestrogenic chemicals are also likely substantial contributors to several other health problems including:

Early puberty in girls

Here is a study that shows that estrogen-like endocrine disrupting chemicals affect puberty in humans. But it's not just one study, there are many.A different study analyzing Isolated premature thelarche (IPT) – which is abnormally early development of breasts or breast tissue, without other signs of early puberty – found that out of the 33 girls in the study, the 9 girls with exposure to Endocrine Disrupting Chemicals (EDCs) had much higher estrogenic bioactivity. This is strong evidence in itself of what these EDC chemicals are doing in human bodies. In this study they are behaving substantially like estrogens, and at least in girls, seem to be selectively affecting breast tissue. Separate studies have demonstrated that early breast development is a medical risk factor for breast cancer later in life.

Lastly, here is a study indicating that the affects of the xenoestrogen Bisphenal A (BPA) may be an etiologic factor in girls with precocious puberty(ICPP). While not commonly used in personal care products, BPA is used in many consumer products (usually plastic or rubber), including the majority of cash register receipts printed on thermal paper (such as found in grocery stores), and in many canned foods such as soups. It is also used in many types of packaging. Because BPA is not used in personal care products I am not going to focus on BPA in this article. However bisphenal compounds are dangerous and problematic in numerous ways, so they deserve to be mentioned, and elaborated upon in the future.

In the interest of preventing early onset puberty, parents should help their daughters avoid chemicals that likely promote the problem.

Don't be fooled by companies engaging in pink washing. See this P&G example.

Pink Washing Definition: "The term 'pinkwashing' is associated with companies that use the pink ribbon symbol or use the support of breast cancer charities as a marketing technique, to promote one of their products, while at the same time [their] manufactured products have proven to contain ingredients that are linked to the disease developed…"

Breast cancer in women

It is no surprise that breast cancer in women would follow early puberty in girls, as both conditions have been scientifically linked to exposure to these types of endocrine disrupting chemicals. For instance, this next study points out that most of the known risk factors for breast cancer are related to cumulative lifetime exposure to estrogens, and that includes xenoestrogens.

Here is a research study that provides in vitro evidence that xenoestrogens such as phthalates and BPA are able to induce neoplastic (cancerous) transformation in human breast epithelial cells. This in vitro study found that various types of parabens stimulated or increased estrogenic gene expression in breast cancer cells. This is quite concerning from the perspective of breast cancer progression. Notice that this research isn't new; that study was done back in 2009. Ten years later P&G is still using many of the same chemicals in their products.

There is little evidence of any effort being made to remove such ingredients. Companies use these types of ingredients because petrochemicals are cheap, and they can produce the desired result. I guess it's more profitable to keep these ingredients in the products than to try to reformulate to something non-toxic. And when one of these dangerous chemicals is actually removed from products, it is often replaced with another petrochemical for which no data exists regarding its safety. It's like a game of "whac-a-mole", except when you lose you get to be a human guinea pig.

Image courtesy of Urban Ecosystem Restorations.

Do you know what the typical excuse is for the use of these chemicals? "We use such small amounts that they can't possibly have an affect on the body." Well, they're lying, and here's more evidence to show they are lying. This study discusses the combined involvement of dietary, household and cosmetic xenoestrogens. It states: "chemicals can give oestrogenic responses at lower concentrations, which suggests that in the breast, low doses of many compounds could sum to give a significant oestrogenic stimulus [emphasis added]".

Other studies have shown that on average, women use 12 products containing 168 unique ingredients every day. So these "small amounts" can certainly add up. And there is clear evidence that these compounds are accumulating in humans. One of the key problems with assessment of these chemical exposures is this: while any one of these exposures may not be catastrophic, the evidence points to the reality that thecumulative effect absolutely is. The problem is, the safety/toxicology research rarely looks at either cumulative load, or potential interactions between compounds (partly because there are too many).

Refocusing on the topic of breast cancer, here is a research study that evaluated different parabens, and concluded that parabens can be viewed as potential contributors to breast cancer progression.

Again, this isn't just one research study. There is so much research evidence that it is becoming overwhelming. For instance, here is an in vitro study that showed that in vitro parabens can influence not only proliferation but also migratory and invasive properties of human breast cancer cells. Further, this next study from 2004 discusses the increased risk among African Americans at all ages, as they use twice as many Personal Care Products (PCPs). The authors of this study hypothesized that the use of estrogen and other hormone-containing PCPs in young African American women accounts, in part, for their increased risk of breast cancer prior to menopause.

Other chemicals (not discussed in this article) found in hair dyes may increase the odds developing breast cancer by 23%.

Given the evidence, women concerned with breast cancer should certainly limit their exposure to suspect chemical ingredients.

A light blue ribbon is the symbol for prostate health month.

Benign Prostate Hyperplasia (BPH) and prostate cancer in men

Not worried about breast cancer because you're male? Not so fast. Here is a very good review paper that considers the evidence from epidemiological studies and animal studies that endocrine disrupting compounds, including sunscreen chemicals and bisphenol A (BPA), may influence the development or progression of prostate cancer.

The paper also points out that 50% of men experience benign prostate hyperplasia (BPH) by the age of 60. In my opinion, this result is not "normal" and speaks to a more widespread systemic causal role for estrogenic compounds. The paper cites several studies (Prins & Korach 2008, Raghow et al. 2002, Steiner & Pound 2003) that point out that "the use of anti-estrogens has been recently recognized to have a therapeutic role in prostate cancer management." Ya think? If estrogen itself, and xenoestrogenic chemicals, can contribute to both Benign Prostate Hyperplasia (BPH) and prostate cancer in men, using anti-estrogenic drugs in treatment only makes sense. So next time your doctor tells you that "every man gets BPH or prostate cancer eventually", you can tell your doctor, "yeah, only because of the lifetime exposure to EDCs and xenoestrogens in which we are all being immersed."

Further, the author writes "It is noteworthy that relative to adult estrogenic responses, the prostate gland is particularly sensitive to estrogen exposures during the critical developmental period." And this ties in with the information I am presenting here, which is that xenoestrogenic exposure in fetuses and infants can have lifelong consequences for males.

On a related topic, here is a research study that demonstrated for the first time (at that time – 2011) that estrogens initiate and promote prostatic carcinogenesis in an androgen-supported environment.

This review paper examines the evidence for a role of estrogens and specific estrogen receptors in prostate growth, differentiation and disease states including prostatitis, benign prostatic hyperplasia (BPH) and prostate cancer.

Another study concluded that environmental exposure to low dose of BPA may induce prostate cells to proliferate and aggravate testosterone-induced benign prostate hyperplasia in rats.

Here is a study that shows fetal exposure to low doses of methoxychlor and other xenoestrogens increases adult prostate size in mice. This is fetal exposure, as in, when the fetus that is still in the mother's womb. So women take note: you can determine if you son will likely have prostate problems by your (lack of) chemical exposures while you are pregnant. This demonstrates the importance of not exposing the unborn child while still in the womb – and you do that by not exposing yourself.

Finally on the topic of prostate issues, this study provides evidence that endocrine disrupting chemicals may reprogram prostate stem cells, thus potentially making them more likely to become cancerous.

These chemicals are dangerous, easily get into young bodies, and have lifelong effects.

There is a great deal more that could be written about the role of endocrine disrupters in prostate and breast pathologies, but I want to focus this article on male developmental and reproductive risks and how people can protect themselves.

So What Are These Nasty Ingredients And How Does One Avoid Them?

Now that we have some of the basic physiology established, what are the specific ingredients that P&G (and other companies) use that can lead to such physiological feminization in males? Glad you asked. Here are some of the ingredients (not all of them, 6+ specifically) that P&G uses in their products that have estrogenic affects and/or endocrine disrupting effects. While there are literally thousands of ingredients out there, the ones listed below are the ones that are habitually found in products, and are already backed by science as to their dangers. Each ingredient has peer reviewed scientific research listed after it that strongly supports that it leads to feminization of males. There are literally hundreds of studies showing that these chemicals are problematic, for both males and females, but particularly younger males. So if you are the mother of a young boy, pregnant, or plan to become pregnant, these concerns also apply to you every bit as much as to every man out there. Again, the studies below are only a sampling of all the studies that can be found.

It's safe to say that if you find any of these ingredients in the products you use, they will adversely affect your health, and your manliness (if you are a male), or will adversely affect the males in your life (if you are a female).

Generic phthalate structure.

1. Phthalates – found in ingredients listed as "fragrance or perfume"

Phthalates are used pervasively in personal care products. Some of the most common products that contain them are nail polish, almost all "fragrances", and hair colorants. However, it is very important to be aware that phthalates (pronounced thal-ates) almost never show up on an ingredient label directly. They are typically included as part of any ingredient listed as "fragrance", "perfume", or "parfum". Manufacturers can get away with this because "fragrances" are considered by the FDA to be trade secrets, so companies don't have to list what is actually in them.

This problem also applies to the vast majority of perfumes and colognes on the market in the US, so you are taking a big health risk using any of those products. (Or imagine you get stuck in an elevator with someone who loves to douse themselves with "perfume", which is not all that different from being stuck in an elevator with someone smoking.) So unless a manufacturer fully discloses what is in their "fragrance" we have to assume the worst – that it does contain harmful chemicals, particularly phthalates. And it is safe to say that if you see "fragrance" on the label, then that is a trade secret that belongs to the company who has no intention of ever telling you which of the thousands of chemicals it contains.

Researchers at the Environmental Working Group (EWG) were possibly the first to figure this out, by having labs conduct chemical analysis of numerous types of personal care products and cosmetics. They used analytical methods such as gas chromatography-mass spectrometry (GC-MS) to determine what was actually in these products, including phthalate content.The EWG has found phthalates in literally over a thousand personal care (and other) products that do not actually list them on the ingredients label, other than as "fragrance".

When the staff at EWG realized that these health harming chemicals were being hidden they begin exposing the truth by writing articles such as this one about how 3,163 ingredients hide behind the word "fragrance". So that one word found on your ingredients list, can have up to 3,163 different ingredients or a combination of them, and the manufacturers don't have to tell you about them.

The word "Fragrance" implies something that smells nice, and doesn't adequately warn consumers about what might be hiding inside. Here's a great explanation of what "fragrance" really means – it should really be called "hidden chemicals". What "fragrance" really consists of is phthalates mixed with other chemicals, and it should be referred to as such. Because then people wouldn't be duped into buying products that they think are safe, as the risk would be more obvious.

Phthalates are used in personal care products, perfume, and cologne, because they help to either enhance or "lock in" the scents produced by other chemicals. Incidentally, the most common chemicals to be used with phthalates are a class known as synthetic musks. Ironically, two of these synthetic musks (AHTN and HHCB) are anti-estrogenic, which could theoretically be good for adult men, but very bad for developing girls, and not so good for adult women either.

Oh, and by the way, these synthetic musks are found in public drinking water. In reality, it is likely most of the chemicals discussed here arealready in public drinking water from people washing off their perfumes and personal care products. So filter your water!

Back to phthalates: phthalates are horrible for human health. EWG also has a great article on these industrial plasticers and their effect on males specifically. Finally here is a nice cheat sheet of where you can find these chemicals. They're everywhere, from nail polish to paint. Furthermore, here are results from Health Canada that support the EWG's findings: Phthalates in cosmetic and personal care products: Concentrations and possible dermal exposure.

Below are some scientific studies on the reproductive effects of phthalate exposure. Based on these studies there is no doubt that phthalates feminize males.

The title of this study could speak for itself: Testicular Atrophy Produced by Phthalate Esters. However, the slightly longer explanation is warranted. This was a study conducted on male rats. The researchers found that most of the harm was done to young male rats, rather than adults.

This next study requires a bit more explanation. Previous experimental studies performed by exposing female rats to phthalates while pregnant, resulted in a reduced "anogenital distance" (AGD) (which is a measure of exactly what it sounds like) of the male rat pups, compared to male rat pups not exposed to phthalates in utero. AGD is a common measure of sexual differentiation between male and female infants in many animal species (including humans). Basically the greater the AGD the more "male" the infant is, and a smaller AGD indicates a more feminized infant. This study below was an epidemiological study that evaluated the AGD of human male infants, and the researchers also took samples of prenatal urine samples. The researchers analyzed the urine samples for phthalate load, and then correlated the urine phthalate load data with the infants' AGD. The researchers found a very strong correlation between elevated prenatal phthalate exposure and human male infant feminization – just like the previous rat studies had shown. The male infants with elevated prenatal phthalate exposure had stunted male reproductive development.

The following study was a follow up performed by the lead scientist of the study above: Prenatal Phthalate Exposure and Anogenital Distance in Male Infants. This study correlated incomplete testicular descent to reduced AGD and phthalate exposure from the previous study. This study also corrected their methodology to use Anogenital Index, which is AGD divided by body weight. This is a more accurate measure of feminization.

The lead researcher of these two studies is Dr. Shanna Swan. She has since had her work highly criticized by the chemical industry, and has been ostracized by some of her scientific peers (who likely get funding from chemical companies), despite the fact that her research was conducted using mostly sound methodologies. Some of the criticism is valid due to relatively minor errors in her statistical methodology. However the criticisms are grossly exaggerated, and the errors in methodology do not change the crux of her results.

Now, let's think about this. If a scientist who has no vested financial (or other) interest completes a study, using largely sound methodologies, that is repeatable, and the results happen to show that certain common chemicals cause serious problems, then shouldn't the companies who produce and use those chemicals change their actions appropriately? Perhaps stop producing and using them, at least in ways that put people at risk? Or issue public warnings? Well, that would be common (moral) sense, and common sense is not common. That would cost them too much money. So instead, they engage in character assassination of scientists to discredit them, in an effort to fool the public into continuing to buy their toxic products. They produce inflammatory commercials rather than reformulating their products for safety. These are the types of people we are dealing with.

This study: Estimated Daily Phthalate Exposures in a Population of Mothers of Male Infants Exhibiting Reduced Anogenital Distance, tries to answer the question: "how much phthalate exposure did the women have who birthed male infants with reduced AGD?" In other words, "how much exposure is necessary to cause these types of problems?" Their answer is fairly complex, so I'm not going to try to summarize it. However I thought the following quotes were enlightening:

"There are multiple possible routes of exposure to phthalates, including dermal (Duty et al. 2005), ingestion (Clark et al. 2003), and inhalation (Adibi et al. 2003). Furthermore, phthalate diesters and their metabolites are cleared from the body within a few days, with the bulk of the dose cleared within the first 24 hr (Anderson et al. 2001; Koch et al. 2005). There were relatively few nondetects in the population, indicating that exposures of the levels observed in this study reflect relatively continuous daily exposures [emphasis added]."

"The median estimated exposures for DBP and BBzP [certain specific phthalates] in the Swan et al. (2005) [the study on AGD mentioned previously] study population are on the order of 1 μg/kg/day, and for DEP are on the order of 6 µg/kg/day. Current U.S. EPA RfDs [Reference dose – EPA maximal acceptable limits] are 100 µg/kg/day (DBP), 200 µg/kg/day (BBzP), and 800 µg/kg/day (DEP), which are all more than 100 times greater than the median exposures in the Swan et al. (2005) population." !!!

In other words, the current EPA maximal allowable limits for phthalates are between 100 and 200 times higher than the exposure level necessary to produce human male infants with stunted reproductive development.

It is worth pointing out that many of these cited studies were published between 2000 and 2006. So the risk of phthalates has been known for some time. Yet it is not clear that much has been done to improve the situation, either by producing companies, or by regulatory agencies.

The following study shows that phthalates from breast milk also have an affect on infants at three months of age, so you're not safe once your baby is born either.

This review paper going back to 2006 shows that the effects from phalate exposurre initially found in rodents, were also found in human male infants when exposed perinatally. Specifically: stunted testicular development, lower androgenic hormone levels, reduced Leydig cell function, increased sex hormone binding globulin (SHBG), reduced AGD, cryptorchidism, and small genital size. (I highly recommend reading this review paper if you want to understand the topic in greater depth; it is readable by a non-scientist.)

Since many of the studies listed in this article are animal studies, I think it is worth making an important side point. I occasionally hear people make the argument that animal models don't necessarily translate to effects in humans. While that sometimes can be true, it is quite rare. I know this from professional experience working in pharmaceutical toxicology research. Pharmaceutical companies don't spend billions of dollars on mouse and rat studies to produce useless data. The FDA would not require billions be spent for this purpose if the data was meaningless. Animal models, particularly rodent and obviously primate studies, are very predictive of effects in humans. So anyone who makes the argument that mouse or rat data does not apply to humans is either an ignorant fool, or a con artist. And remember, "con" is short for "confidence". Do you have CONfidence in the companies who produce and use these ingredients?

So don't let anyone tell you that animal studies are not indicative of how the human body would react. It's just that it would be unethical to test on humans intentionally, so studies are done on animals. (Wait, isn't testing on humans kind of what these manufacturer's are doing? Just without published results?) Unfortunately while the scientific community puts the information out there, often for free, the manufacturers ignore it over and over, and often try to cover it up instead.

Below are several additional studies on phthalate exposure performed on rats, some of which date back to the 1980s! I won't write summaries for each of these studies, other than to say that these provide a lot of animal model data that supports scientific understanding of what phthalates do to male animals. They also provide background context and clues for the epidemiological studies on humans.

Effects of di(2-ethylhexyl) phthalate on the gonadal pathophysiology, sperm morphology, and reproductive performance of male rats.

The morphological development of di-n-pentyl phthalate induced testicular atrophy in the rat.

Testicular toxicity of di-(2-ethylhexyl)phthalate in young Sprague–Dawley rats

Effects of phthalate esters on the developing reproductive tract of male rats

The data is there: phtalate use results in the feminization of males, and people are unknowingly exposing themselves to these on a regular basis for the sake of smelling good. Because that's what marketing tells you is the only way to do things. We have to change this state of affairs.

Paraben.

2. Parabens were once much more heavily used in personal care products. Public outcry has succeeded in getting manufacturers to voluntarily reduce the frequency of their use, but you can still find parabens in a number of products. So while the public speaking out, and changing their buying habits, has been successful in getting the companies to reformulate, unfortunately, these ingredients are still found in products, often hidden under fancy new names. This is done by combining a number of these compounds with other compounds and renaming them, so as to fool you into thinking that parabens are not in the product, when indeed they are. There are too many to name them here, so be alert for ingredients that you've never heard of before. Regardless of the name, parabens still put your health and manliness at risk whenever they are used in consumer products.

For instance, this study showed that sperm quantity decreased based on exposure to propyl paraben. Another study showed that that butyl paraben can exert an adverse effect on the male reproductive system at doses that are well below those of the accepted daily intake (ADI) in Japan. Yes, these chemicals are also found in your food, not just personal care products. You eat them and don't even know it.

There are actually several different slight variations on parabens: methylparaben, ethylparaben, propylparaben, and butylparaben. And all of them have been shown to be (xeno)estrogenic in both in vitro studies and in animal models.

Parabens have primarly been used in skin care products for their antibacterial properties. However it is quite concerning that in rat studies, butylparaben in particular has been shown to produce similar effects to phthalates in male offspring. This includes: reduced anogenital distance, smaller testes, lower testosterone levels, and lower sperm counts.

One of the additional reasons parabens have been used in many skin care products is because they can in some cases improve skin appearance. However research suggests that they only have this effect as a result of their estrogenicity.

One review paper suggests that the mechanism of action of parabens on males is due to disrupting mitochondrial function in the testes. Mitochondria are the "power plants" of cells, and "the present review discusses evidence that parabens may not be as safe as initially thought, and suggests that the interaction between parabens and mitochondrial function in the testis may be key in explaining the contribution of parabens for a decrease in reproductive potential."

One structure-activity relationship study of several endocrine disrupting chemicals (including parabens, bisphenols, and triclosan) found thatparabens can also activate glucocorticoid receptors. Glucocorticoids are another class of steroid hormones produced by adrenal glands and are involved in regulating blood sugar, inflammation and the immune system. So these endocrine disrupting chemicals can interfere with more than just one hormonal system. This same study found that triclosan produces anti-androgenic effects. I will cover triclosan in a separate section below.

Finally, bringing this back to risk in cosmetics and personal care products, this last study found that parabens as well as the sunscreen active ingredient homosalate are all estrogenic in a number of different cell lines.

There were quite few more studies on the endocrine disrupting properties of parabens. This article is not meant to be all inclusive. But once again, there is ample data to conclude that parabens are harming reproductive health of humans, particularly males.

Triclosan.

3. Triclosan – In case you don't recall, triclosan was used in antimicrobial soaps for many years, and corporations and the FDA insisted for years that it was safe. That was, until the FDA decision makers finally changed their minds. So it seems to have been pulled from most, but not yet all products at the time of this writing. Unfortunately it was not pulled due to safety concerns, but efficacy issues. It is no longer considered GRASE (Generally Recognized Safe and Effective) as an Over The Counter (OTC) health product. While the decision to remove triclosan from the market has been made, the FDA has allowed manufacturers to sell off the rest of their remaining inventory (to prevent financial harm to the manufacturers). So you may still find this ingredient in products. However, Antibacterial Soap? You Can Skip It, Use Plain Soap and Water.

This is an important lesson: organizations like the EWG and Nature's Complement point out the harm of many of these chemicals far in advance. The FDA and the major corporations deny the harm, at least until they get around to reformulating their products (IF they reformulate). Then they quietly pull the ingredient from the market hoping no one notices they've been poisoning their customers the whole time. The companies probably also think the public is not scientifically literate enough to figure out that their health is being put at risk. So these companies have little interest in your health, other than not being able to be sued.

As mentioned previously there is evidence to show that triclosan blocks the activity of androgens such as testosterone and DHT at the androgen receptor. Triclosan has also been shown to reduce levels of enzymes involved in production of testosterone, as well as the hormones Luteinizing hormone (LH) which is involved in androgen production, and Follicle-stimulating hormone (FSH), which is involved in the production of sperm.

This in vitro study shows that triclosan can both inhibit androgen receptor gene expression, and also stimulate the growth of preexisting breast cancer cells.

A different in vitro study found that triclosan inhibited both androgen and estrogen receptors. So while the mechanism of action of triclosan may be complex, it is safe to say that it is likely disrupting sex hormone function in both men and women.

However the hormone disrupting effects of triclosan are not limited to sex hormones. This epidemiological study found a strong relationship between elevated levels of triclosan in people's urine, and reduced levels of thyroid hormones.

Finally, this review paper provides a good summary of research into the endocrine disrupting properties of triclosan. The paper admits that some of the data is conflicting, but that there is enough evidence to conclude that triclosan is indeed disrupting human endocrine function.

Phenoxyethanol, a glycol ether.

4+. Glycol ethers (which include ethylene glycol, phenoxyethanol, and propylene glycol, among others)

Glycol ethers span a variety of compounds and uses ranging from antifreeze to food additives to preservatives.

It is often argued that propylene glycol specifically is safe because it has GRAS (Generally Regarded As Safe) status by the FDA. But as we haveexplained previously (a few paragraphs down in the link), decisions on GRAS status have as much to do with politics as science. This type of faulty argument is also know as "appealing to authority". While propylene glycol may be much less of a concern than the other glycol ethers, I am not yet convinced that propylene glycol is fully safe as claimed. For example rat studies (here and here) have found that elevated exposure to propylene glycol can result in increased liver weights as well as central nervous system depression. However my focus here is on other glycol ethers rather than propylene glycol.

Here is a large epidemiological study (2118 participants) that found that after properly controlling for other variables, men who had occupational exposure to glycol ethers had a substantially lower sperm counts than men who did not work with glycol ethers.

Another epidemiological study evaluating the effects of the glycol ethers 2-ethoxyethanol (2-EE) and 2-methoxyethanol (2-ME) also found an increased prevalence of oligospermia and azoospermia (low sperm counts). It is true that these particular glycol ethers are not commonly used in personal care products, although they are used in other consumer products.

However what this research above makes me question is, what does this say about the effects of other glycol ethers? In particular I wonder if the glycol ether phenoxyethanol, which IS regularly used in personal care products and has a similar chemical structure, produces similar effects in males. As of this writing, I could not find research to address this question. Like many of these chemicals, the toxicological impact is treated as a low priority concern. However I was able to find evidence that phenoxyethanol is absorbed through human skin.

Here is a review paper that summarizes some of the reproductive toxicology data of glycol ethers and speculates about potential mechanisms of action.

A case-control study provides more evidence about the reproductive harm of ethylene glycol in men.

Finally, animal models such as this rat study show that exposing pregnant females to glycol ethers affect male offspring. In this case it reduced testicular weight compared to controls. Some might argue that the inhalation study method might not apply in the real world. But it certainly seems to me like it could apply – if a person were say for example, painting their house with paints containing glycol ethers, or breathing them in all day long because they are contained in personal care products they put on their body.

Oxybenzone, a common sunscreen active ingredient.

5+. Sunscreen ingredients: avobenzone, octocrylene, homosolate, and oxybenzone

These ingredients can be found in a wide variety of products that advertise sun protection. Watch out for them on labels, as they will be specifically mentioned. I have written an entire separate article on the safety of sunscreens, so with this section I will try to provide a brief synopsis.

Like the other ingredients mentioned in this article, these four sunscreen active ingredients also have adverse affects on male reproductive health. Some of them are also estrogenic.

Avobenzone, which is perhaps the most common non-mineral "UV filter" sunscreen, has shown anti-androgen activity in in vitro studies. So yet more evidence that endocrine disrupting chemicals are likely effecting male reproductive health.

Animal models have shown that octocrylene has both antiandrogenic and antiestrogenic activity. So in this case we are seeing chemicals that disrupt normal sex hormone function in both sexes.

Other animal models have shown that homosolate and several other "UV filter" sunscreens are antogonists of the androgen receptor, meaning they block the action of androgens. In addition, two of the tested musks in this study were antagonists of the estrogen receptor, and two others blocked both the androgen and estrogen receptors.

Oxybenzone has been shown to be both estrogenic and harm reproductive health in both sexes, again in animal models.

Bringing this topic back to human data, the EWG provides a good summary of problems with sunscreens in their article The Trouble With Ingredients in Sunscreens. In particular I want to point out this description: "In a recent evaluation of CDC-collected exposure data for American children, researchers found that adolescent boys with higher oxybenzone measurements had significantly lower total testosterone levels (Scinicariello 2016)."

Here is the actual CDC study referenced by the EWG article. It is titled Serum Testosterone Concentrations and Urinary Bisphenol A, Benzophenone-3, Triclosan, and Paraben Levels in Male and Female Children and Adolescents: NHANES 2011-2012. I want to point out just one brief quote from the study before moving on to the next topic: "BP-3 [benzophenone-3] and BPA were associated with significantly lower TT [total testosterone] in male adolescents, and BPA was associated with significantly higher TT in female adolescents." So in adolescents, these EDCs are turning boys into eunuchs, and girls into boys. It makes me wonder if such chemically mediated effects have any correlation to the growing number of people with "gender dysphoria".

Tartrazine, AKA "FD&C yellow 5".

6. Tartrazine, also known as FD&C Yellow 5. (Not to be confused with atrazine, which is a pesticide that causes serious sexual side effects in male frogs and often ends up in public drinking water. A topic worthy of a separate article on agrochemicals and reproductive health). Anyway, tartrazine is a colorant, and while this colorant is used in personal care products, it is one of the most widely used food colorants. Check the labels of all the processed or packaged foods in your home and I bet you will find it. It is also used as a pharmaceutical colorant.

Based on the research I would suggest you neither want to ingest it nor put it on your body in personal care products. From what I could find, this compound has less data available than the others mentioned, but that does not make the data that is available any less concerning.

For example, a mouse study found that feeding tartrazine for 30 days led to several adverse outcomes compared to controls: reduced weight of testes, lower sperm counts, sperm abnormalities, and a significant increase in body weight . Given that the scientific data is available, I find it both comical and aggravating that the Wikipedia page dismisses this as "myth". I suppose the authors of the Wikipedia article didn't do a very good job of actually looking at the research (checking on Snopes does not even remotely qualify as "research").

On a related topic, I read one statement from a chemical industry representative that tried to make the argument that if tartrazine had adverse effects on male reproductive health we would know it by now because it has been used for so long, therefore it must be safe. This is also a fallacious argumentbased on a false premise leading to a "sillygism". If you are not familiar with the concept, a sillygism is a sequence of statements that superficially appear logical like a syllogism, but which produce a nonsensical conclusion. Given the data presented earlier showing that male reproductive health absolutely has been on a downward spiral for at least forty to fifty years, I would say this argument is indeed based on a false premise. Back to some animal studies…

A different study testing tartrazine in mice did not find changes in testes weight or body weight, but did confirm the findings regarding reduced sperm count and abnormalities of sperm motility and histology.

An in vitro study on tartrazine provides a potential explanation for a mechanism for action for the animal studies. This study found that tartrazine is a potent xenoestrogen, even at quite small concentrations.

Another potential explanation for the animal studies comes from this in vitro study. Rats administered tartrazine showed lower levels of antioxidant enzymes in their testis, which the authors speculate is due to tartrazine producing Reactive Oxygen Species (ROS) (free radicals). Regardless of the mechanism, reduced levels of antioxidanat enzymes in testis would likely lead to greater oxidative damage.

Aside from reproductive toxicity, this rat study found that tartrazine adversely affected several markers of liver and kidney function, including ALT, AST, ALP, urea, creatinine, total protein, and albumin, among others.

An additional study on rats also confirmed that tartrazine adversely affects both liver function, and morphology (histopathology).

In vitro studies have shown that tartrazine may potentially be genotoxic, but this has not yet been demonstrated in animal models that I could find.

Finally on the topic of tartrazine, I would say that hopefully more data becomes available specifically regarding its potential for reproductive toxicity. From the data I could find there is certainly reason for concern, but it is arguably not sufficient, at least not to regulatory agencies. But since regulatory agencies are years behind the research, it is probably best that the rest of us avoid it anyway.

Finally which P&G products contain these ingredients?

Now we are really getting to the nitty gritty of why I decided to bring this information forward, and bringing this topic full circle. The P&G products below contain one or more of the ingredients mentioned above. This information was taken directly from ingredient labels on various P&G websites.

To be fair, P&G is not the only company that uses these harmful ingredients, since use of these ingredients is pervasive in the industry. But this is about P&G and their hypocrisy, as they're trying to tell others how to behave, when they should evaluate their own actions first. So I am going to call out several (not all, as there are too many) P&G products by name that are problematic.

While reading these you might also want to open in new browser tabs our articles on some of the other ingredients you might not want in your products. Part 1, and Part 2.

Gillette™ Body Washes and deodorants: contain "fragrance/parfum" – in other words they contain phthalates. It is also worth pointing out that these also contain sodium laureth sulfate and sodium lauryl sulfate, which we point out (about 2/3 down the page in the link) that these chemicals make the skin more permeable and allow more of other chemicals (like phthalates) to enter your body.

https://gillette.com/en-us/products/deodorant-and-body-wash/body-wash/odor-shield https://gillette.com/en-us/products/deodorant-and-body-wash/deodorant/clear-gel-cool-wave

Old Spice™ aftershaves and shampoos contain phthalates, and their shampoo also contains methylchloroisothiazolinone and methylisothiazolinone which are known skin irritants. Finally, the shampoo contains sodium benzoate. Sodium benzoate can turn into the carcinogen benzene in the presence of citric acid (and other acids like ascorbic acid). It is unfortunate then that Old Spice formulators didn't notice that they use both sodium benzoate and citric acid in their shampoo formula. D'oh!

How ironic they call it "stronger swagger" when it likely kills your swagger.

Herbal Essence™ shampoos contain parabens. I find it sickly humorous that this company division markets itself as being sooo natural. But the list of all the ingredients they use in their products is very informative as to how hypocritical they are regarding their extensive use of synthetic chemicals – several with questionable health effects.

Pantene™ hair products contain a lot of nasty ingredients, including phthalates, glycol ethers, and tartrazine. They also contain titanium dioxide which is not good for males either, which I explain in this sunscreen article.

https://pantene.com/en-us/ingredients

Aussie™ shampoo contains phthalates, tartrazine, and also contains methylchloroisothiazolinone and methylisothiazolinone which as mentioned are known skin irritants. These also contain Sodium Laureth Sulfate and Sodium Lauryl Sulfate which also as mentioned, make your skin more permeable to other chemicals.

Ivory™ body wash and (some) soaps contain phthalates, and sodium benzoate. It appears that Ivory formulators also didn't notice that they too useboth sodium benzoate and citric acid in several of their same formulas. D'oh! Their products also contain methylchloroisothiazolinone and methylisothiazolinone, which as mentioned are skin irritants.

Secret™ deodorant contains phthalates, glycol ethers, and aluminum, which may have other health concerns I won't go into at this time. I could not find a complete list of ingredients on P&G's site, so this one will have to do.

https://www.dollargeneral.com/secret-scent-expressions-clear-gel-deodorant-lavender-2-6oz.html

Clairol™ hair products contain phthalates and glycol ethers. Ironically, there is very little natural about this "Natural Instincts" product. Seriously, you need to be a pretty knowledgeable chemist to comprehend the label, and I would bet that very few of these compounds have ever had any toxicology or safety testing done. Users of their products get to be the guinea pigs. Don't you feel special and fortunate?

https://www.clairol.com/m/master/pdf/NI_ingredients.pdf

Vicks™ vapor rub, surprisingly to me, does not contain any of the harmful ingredients previously mentioned. However it does contain turpentine and petrolatum, neither of which are particularly good to use for body care applications. This is particularly true since you can't be sure all petrolatum sources are free of polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons (PAHs) and other cancer causing compounds (including benzene) that are found in petroleum.

https://vicks.com/en-us/safety-and-faqs/faqs/vicks-vaporub-faq

Vidal Sassoon™ uses phthalates and parabens. I could not find ingredients lists directly on the Sassoon web site so WalMart will have to suffice.

https://www.walmart.com/ip/Vidal-Sassoon-Pro-Series-Color-Spray-5-07-Fl-Oz/22101480

Febreeze™ contains glycol ethers. They claim they don't use phthalates, but I don't know that I believe them. If I ever get motivated to spend the money, I will send some samples off for some analytical chemistry investigation.Though I will note that a lot of Febreze products scored an F on EWG's Healthy ingredients scores.

https://www.febreze.com/en-us/learn/febreze-ingredients

However, more importantly, if Febreeze is a P&G brand, and it is the only P&G brand that is denying the use of phthalates (that I can find at the time of this writing), does that indicate that all their other non-Febreze brands do contain phthalates in their "fragrances"? An excellent question indeed. Based on the available evidence, that is our working theory, until we have independent lab analysis evidence that their other products do not contain phthalates. I was going to write "unless or until P&G discloses all their ingredients" but that likely wouldn't help because it would likely be PR lies. I'm certain P&G and other companies make statements like "trust us, we are only using safe ingredients." But these companies have demonstrated repeatedly that they have and will violate public trust, are absolutely not trustworthy, and put the public's health at risk. Caveat emptor.

Obviously most of these brands have multiple products, and the specific ingredients will vary with each product. The products listed above were only intended as a partial sampling of the harmful chemical ingredients found in P&G products. This list could have been much, much longer. The key points here are:

1. You have very good reason and evidence to boycott P&G products (and other products that use these ingredients) entirely on the grounds of health safety. In my scientific but non-attorney opinion, P&G (and other manufacturers) has (have) behaved somewhere between negligenceand willful blindness with their formulations. Perhaps their actions are most accurately described as gross negligence. I doubt anyone would win a lawsuit, but certainly worthy of boycott until they start formulating responsibly.
2. If you choose to continue to use some of their products, then you need to read the ingredients and then compare those ingredients to a safety database of ingredients, like what the EWG provides. Or else use the app while you are still in the store.

In conclusion, if you want to retain your biological manliness, or the biological manliness of your sons, or fathers, or husbands, or boyfriends, you need to change your product buying and usage habits. If you also want to boycott P&G products, that is fine by us. Here is a convenient list of P&G brands and products for you to reference.

For those of you who took offense to P&G's ad, and want to preserve true (biological) male masculinity, then the most important way you can do that is to change your product buying and usage habits – to exclude all products that contain ingredients that sabotage the male physiology of you, your family, and your friends. Debating about the culture of males is one thing. However as things are now, males are literally being biochemically, anatomically, and physiologically emasculated and feminized. And that has nothing to do with culture, and everything to do with chemical exposures, largely from the products you are choosing to buy and use. So by all means, boycott away. Just make sure you are doing it for the right reasons.

For Health,

Rob

Desperate wives should try farting to get sex from husbands

Douglas Galbi · 15 February 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Leading newspapers have reported that a huge number of husbands have raped their wives. Allegations of inappropriate words or touching of a sexual nature are enough to have a man fired from his job and to ruin his reputation for life. Men seducing women has long been criminalized. Now university officials are earnestly teaching students and faculty that they must get affirmative consent for each step in a sexual interaction and that consent can be withdrawn at any time without prior notice. Not surprisingly, many husbands are now fearful of sexually accosting their wives. That's raising public concern because wives are becoming unhappy. Some wives are even showing signs of madness. Fortunately, medieval Latin literature offers a solution.

While a young couple was walking through a meadow, they saw a flock of sheep. The wife had an active mind:

> seeing that the rams mounted only certain ewes, she questioned why certain ones rather than others were copulating.
> { conspectis nonnullis ovibus quas arietes subigebant, quaesivit cur potius cum illis quam cum aliis coirent. }

Her husband jokingly explained:

> When a ewe makes a fart, a ram presses into her.
> { Quae crepitum facit ovis, statim comprimitur ab ariete. }

The wife picked up on the figuring and turned to punning:

> She burst forth to know if this were also the case with men.

The husband affirmed that it was. The sexually deprived wife then took explosive action:

> She immediately cut loose a fart; the husband, having been caught by his own joke, had sex with his wife. After they had proceeded along St. Paul's path a little way, the wife farted again. The husband was once again employed in the matrimonial practice. When they had nearly reached the end of the meadow, the woman, delighted with the game, emitted a third fart.
> { illa statim crepitum edidit; vir joco suo deprehensus uxorem cognovit. Cum deinde paulum viae processissent, iterum mulier pepedit. Vir denuo matrimonio usus est. Cum jam ad finem nemoris pervenissent, foemina, tali ludo gaudens, terio petum emisit. }

Medieval culture regarded with utmost seriousness men's sexual obligation to their wives. This husband, however, wasn't well-prepared for strenuous erection labor:

> Then the husband, exhausted from copulation and walking, said, "Even if you were to shit out your heart itself, I wouldn't again shake you under me. }
> { Tunc vir, coeundo et ambulando fessus: "Non si cor cacares," ait, "te amplius subagitarem." }

In vigorously servicing their wives sexually, husbands must endure whatever they shake out. Only a husband exhausted to the point of peevishness would complain of his wife giving out her heart as a result of sex.

Most husbands deeply love their wives. Yet in today's circumstances of demonizing men's sexuality, men are rightly fearful of showing sexual interest toward their wives or any other women. However, in the case of explosions and serious risks to bodily integrity, men will heroically press in to protect women from harm. Wives desperately seeking sex from their husbands should try farting. But not too often, because men not accustomed to heavy sexual labor will soon get exhausted and peevish.

The above story and quotes are from “The humorous tale of a young woman who farted {Facetia cujusdam adolescentulae quae emittebat petum},” Latin text from Poggio (1879) vol. 2, pp. 138-9, my English translation. That Latin text has witty wordplay that I’ve made some effort to translate.

The gynocentric mob and female superiority

Peter Ryan · 17 February 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Gynocentric Herd Mentality

What gives gynocentrism its social power is the power of the mob. The female mob and the army of white knights and simps at the ready to enforce the dictates of the female mob, is what holds society hostage to gynocentrism. Feminists, gynocentric female voters and their loyal male foot soldiers and white knights in politics, the legislature and policy etcetera, make sure that their gynocentric agenda rolls out and is enforced in society. Are all women and all men herd animals that subscribe to groupthink and defer to women in every context, regardless of the circumstances? No, absolutely not. Substantial numbers of both sexes do not belong in that category and those numbers are growing every day as the grotesque face of gynocentrism becomes unmistakable in the culture.

But despite this, the reality is that a substantial fraction of the male and female population do exhibit gynocentric herd mentality. Gynocentric herd mentality as the name suggests, is the tendency in women and in men to abandon individual thought, critical thinking and moral principles and passionately form a mob around gynocentric motives, conform to gynocentric groupthink and enforce gynocentrism in society. Reason is generally not involved in driving such behaviour, which is often highly irrational, immoral, primitive and tribal in nature and driven by emotion.

Gynocentric herd mentality is not a conspiracy, it is an observable phenomenon. The female ingroup bias[1] of the population and the women are wonderful effect[2] are features of it and have been the subject of research by social scientists. The power of the gynocentric mob was evident in the female voting patterns during the 2018 US mid-terms[3], in the aftermath of the manufactured Kavanaugh controversy. We have also seen numerous high-profile examples of gynocentric herd mentality. Here are some of them: The women's march over the last 3 years because someone with a vagina did not become US President, the rapid transformation of the metoo# movement into a man bashing crusade and witch-hunt, the manufactured scandal and backlash by the feminist mob over the Brett Kavanaugh nomination, slogans being promoted like the "future is female" and "believe the woman" and the infamous 2012 feminist protest at Dr. Warren Farrell's lecture on the boy crisis at the University of Toronto (one of many such disruptive protests by the feminist mob that have occurred at universities across the West). Gynocentric herd mentality is even more pronounced within politics, the media, academia and corporations etcetera than the general population and it is little wonder then why society has become so lopsided.

The Social Power Of Women

Human beings are social animals and there is a strong tendency in both sexes to obtain and maintain the social approval of peers. In our prehistory, social approval was an important factor in determining the survival and reproductive prospects of individuals, their offspring and families. Social ostracism reduced these prospects. This pattern has continued throughout history and right up until the present day. Women have a large amount of social influence in prescribing the social value of individuals and female approval and disapproval plays a large role in determining what is and is not socially permitted within a community. Maintaining female approval and avoiding disapproval from women, has been a key factor in men escaping social ostracism and therefore maintaining their position in society and by extension their survival prospects and reproductive prospects. A man that attracts the wrath of the sisterhood and gets ostracised, experiences social death and social death in primitive times often meant physical death. If he is a powerful man, he may not experience social death, but instead a loss in social rank and reputation damage which is often severe and long term. In today's world social ostracism instigated by women, can drive men to suicide. There are men that have been falsely accused of rape, condemned by the sisterhood in their communities and lost their livelihood and standing in the community and taken their own lives. This is female power- Social power.

Much has been said about the power that men hold in society, but relatively little has been said about the power that women hold in society. Whilst male power in society is primarily physical, economical and institutional in nature, the nature of female power in society is primarily social, emotional and sexual. David Shackleton at the Canadian Association For Equality, has discussed[4] these differences in power between the sexes in detail. Men express power through action and women express power through persuasion. Modern society readily identifies pathological expressions of male power in society and has measures in place to hold it to account. However modern society has forgotten the pathological expression of female power in society- manipulation. Society has relatively little measures in place to hold female power accountable, or women in general accountable for anything. The lack of accountability for women and girls is that low, women can rape teenage boys in some jurisdictions and receive child support for it[5].

Women are considered in our society to be close to infallible. They can do no wrong. They are pure and innocent creatures and when they behave in a way that contradicts that image, people go rushing to find excuses for their behaviour. The reverse is seen for men, when men do wrong we hold them to account. Even when men are being abused, we hold men accountable for their behaviour. Any factors that may explain and even justify men's behaviour is dismissed. When women do wrong, we look for reasons to excuse their behaviour so we don't have to hold them accountable. When men do no wrong, we look for reasons to find them guilty. We have hypoagency for women and hyperagency for men.

There is an important factor at play that helps explain this lopsided dynamic. The social power of women is based upon maintaining a positive image of women. The capacity to persuade and manipulate other people, requires that people respect, trust and value what women have to say. Once women lose the respect, trust and concern of society, they cease to have most of their power. Conversely the social power of women is maximised and elevated above accountability, by cultivating and maintaining a societal attitude that women are innocent, pure, infallible beings relative to men and that women are superior to men. This is the women are wonderful effect. Without cultivating the societal belief that women are superior to men and particularly morally superior, women cannot stir up the gynocentric mob to do their bidding with zero accountability.

Given this reality, feminists and gynocentric women in the media, are predictably quite sensitive to any portrayal of women that puts them in a negative light relative to men. They are quick to silence or omit any example of women behaving badly, because it threatens to destabilise the societal belief that women are superior. Masking and hiding the darker side of women behind a carefully crafted mask of feminine vulnerability, innocence and victimhood, is key to maintaining the façade that women are morally superior to men and therefore that we should defer to women in every instance. Men also prop up this façade to win the social approval of women. This façade is the foundation of modern gynocentric female social power.

In our gynocentric culture men compete with other men like trained seals, to simp and white knight and win the social approval of the "divine" female collective in order to climb the social ladder. One of the central strategies that men employ to do that in this dysfunctional culture, is to appeal to the sense in gynocentric women that women are superior. Men even write books about female superiority. Here are two examples of this linked here[6] and here[7]. People may also want to read this review[8] debunking this nonsense. Not only do men help feed the societal belief in female superiority, they also excuse women from their bad behaviour so they can remain in the good graces of women and avoid female disapproval.

It would be very interesting to put such men in a hypothetical situation in which women voiced strong disappointment and disapproval toward their bigoted beliefs in female superiority and then shamed and ostracised these men for it. The cognitive dissonance maybe sufficient to break such men free of their gynocentric stupor and stop them from throwing other men under the bus to earn female approval. Essentially both men and women reinforce this belief in female superiority in the culture and the result is that questioning and criticising what women say and do becomes a social taboo. Women rise above social accountability and even legal accountablility, because sufficient numbers of men and women are stupid enough to believe in female superiority, including academics who should know better (There are plenty of idiots with doctorates, despite what people think.). This is doubly so for the men and women in politics, the media and in our learning institutions, which have become echo chambers where ideologues can promote their bigoted beliefs and worldview with little scrutiny. Due to the existing societal belief in female superiority, when gynocentric herd mentality rears its ugly head in society, there are no checks and balances to stand in its way.

Who Is Really In Charge Of Society?

Gynocentric herd mentality wields a considerable degree of power in our institutions and in politics. We have this misguided belief in society that if more men are in positions of authority, that somehow means men are in charge and will act in men's interests at the expense of women. In reality it is the complete opposite. I have said before that modern society more closely resembles a matriarchy by proxy, than an oppressive patriarchy and that in modern society women are privileged. Women are the power behind the throne and men just have the appearance of being charge. Of course such claims taken literally are monolithic and the reality is somewhere between the two extremes. Whilst I would not argue that society is presently an absolute matriarchy, society is certainly heading in that direction before it eventually collapses socially and economically from rampant gynocentrism.

Men in politics are to at least some degree the puppets of female voters and feminist lobby groups and organisations. Politicians of course are aware of the power of the female vote. They dance to the tune of female voters and feminists and throw men under the bus with indifference quite often. Even Donald Trump bows to the gynocentric female mob to at least some degree. This was apparent in his recent state of the union address[9], where he celebrated female employment statistics and yet was silent on the multitude of issues facing men and boys in family court, education, health and from biased workplace policies and affirmative action. Whenever he discussed an issue impacting men, like the increase in manufacturing jobs, he was careful to describe it in gender neutral terms. Whilst Donald Trump and his cabinet have done some positive things for men in the United States, it has been relatively piecemeal. Throwing bread crumbs at men, is hardly going to be sufficient to overturn the entrenched gynocentrism in our institutions, businesses, legislature, education systems and governments in any substantive and meaningful way.

Just as with politics, a similar pattern is present in corporations. The feminist mob infects the HR departments and corporate service branches of businesses and then applies pressure throughout the workplace to implement biased workplace policies and affirmative action. Where feminists cannot do this from within the organisation, they mud-sling businesses from the outside from positions they hold in the media, in politics and in law. Feminists gang up in groups and target businesses and individual executives and managers, to get their way from within businesses and from outside businesses. We saw the power of the gynocentric mob with what happened to James Damore[10]. Don't conform to the mob, lose your job. The media and academia also face the same pressure from the gynocentric mob from inside and outside and there have been many examples of this.

Why don't these men that have all of this authority say no to the gynocentric mob? Aside from the fact that chivalry is still prevalent to some degree in our culture, especially among older men in authority, these men realise that retaining the social approval of women, is critical to them maintaining their positions and getting things done. If men in positions of authority are out of step with the gynocentric mob, then they run the real risk of attracting female disapproval and losing their positions and reputation. The unassailable power of female social approval, rests in the divine value that society places on what women think and have to say and that in turn rests on an image that women are superior and the moral arbiters of what is right and just. By going along with this dynamic, men in authority reinforce the validity of the positions of the gynocentric mob. When men in authority or corporations apologise for things they should not apologise for to escape the wrath of the mob, they are validating the position of the mob and strengthening its social power to bring nonconformists into line.

It is the male aversion to female disapproval, chivalry and the male competition to win female approval, that ensures that any man in authority defers to female interests above all else and often at the expense of men and the future of society. The Myth Of Male Power[11] was aptly named. Our concept of male power and male oppression of women is a myth[12]. A myth developed by feminists and gynocentric women to help mask female power in modern society and ensure any social manipulation by women as a group flies under the radar without scrutiny. This myth ensures that when feminist women gang up on men in positions of authority and attempt to sack them or reprimand them for daring to transgress the dictates of the feminist mob, that feminist influence is overlooked.

The Gynocentric Mob And Freedom Of Speech

We can see the power of the female collective on full display in the domain of freedom of speech. The control that women have as a group with respect to the Overton window is extreme. Offend a woman or a offend a feminist and you risk being banned on social media, attacked and doxed, losing your job and even being charged and imprisoned. In Argentina a radio host has been forced to have feminists on his show to prevent imprisonment, after he was accused of misogyny. Don't believe it? Here is the story[13]. That is the power of the feminist mob when they gang up on someone. Of course if you write articles in mainstream media publications titled, "Why Can't We Hate Men?"[14], or write books about men being obsolete[15] and unnecessary[16], or create and spread hashtags like "killallmen" or "Ibatheinmaletears", that is to be celebrated and promoted in the mainstream media, in social media and in academia. That is how lopsided society has become.

If you dare criticise women or feminists, you risk imprisonment in some jurisdictions. But if you are an academic or in the mainstream media, you can write books about men being obsolete and men being inferior with no consequence. In fact you will be lionised by your peers as being progressive and even be invited to conferences and interviews to talk about your book. You will also be allowed to run televised debates supporting your arguments and with the outcome skewed in your favour.

Just like the mainstream media, the alternative media will bow and scrape to female approval and steer clear of triggering the wrath of the gynocentric mob. Here is a recent example of this shown in a YouTube video[17] from a rising YouTube star called Isaac Butterfield. Isaac who has been highly critical of feminism, distances himself from being called a men's rights activist in the video and then proceeds to mud-sling the men's movement and erroneously claim that aside from family court, men pretty much have the same rights as women. I left a comment on his video as follows:

> "The holier than thou mentality of these YouTubers that suddenly found men's issues and antifeminism because it is becoming increasingly popular and now think they know what they are talking about and then turn around and lecture the group of people that have been working on these issues for decades, is getting tiresome. The fact it is a dirty word to say you are a men's rights activist, just demonstrates why a men's rights movement is needed. Someone can identify as a feminist in this society, despite all of the far more numerous and deeply rooted examples of bigotry from that ideology and it will be celebrated in our institutions, schools, universities, businesses, media, legislature and politics. But don't you men dare call yourselves men's rights activists!
> Family court is just one example of a long list of issues impacting men you clearly know nothing about. Men do not have a right to genital integrity, they have virtually no reproductive rights to speak of relative to women, they can be conscripted and drafted into war, they face legally sanctioned discrimination in employment and education thanks to affirmative action and they face relatively little effective legal protection against abuse by women even when they are children. Those are just a few examples (and there are many more) where men have far less rights. Next time research the topic you are discussing.
> The fact that we cannot have an honest discussion about the issues impacting men and the fact that videos like this get produced, just goes to show you the extent that men are marginalised in society. Men are that marginalised in the culture they will self-censor and belittle other men that dare to attempt to identify with men's rights activism. The ad hominem's are all too predictable. The "playing it safe" strategy of armchair criticism of the culture and staying within the Overton window of socially permitted discourse, is precisely what allowed misandric feminist ideology to gain traction in the first place. It is not heroic, it is not smart and it certainly does not make you morally superior to a movement you claim to not identify as."

I generally like Isaac's work, but the reality is that until we can have an honest discussion about men's issues in society and stop descending into ad hominem's and strawmanning groups that are trying to discuss and address them, we are going to go nowhere. It does not make someone edgy or trendy to go along like a sheep attacking a group of people that dare to identify with the rights of half of the population, just because it is socially acceptable to do so. If you have solid grounds that a movement in question runs contrary to what they claim to stand for and it is a systemic deviation observable with both prominent leaders in that movement and from the movement as a whole (like feminism), then fair enough. But don't go making the equivalence fallacy that the men's rights movement is just the same as feminism. They are not even close to being alike.

People can do their own direct research to see the difference between feminism and the men's movement like Cassie Jaye did[18], without the mud-slinging from people like Isaac Butterfield. The gynocentric herd mentality of society, the avoidance of having an honest discussion of the issues impacting men and the avoidance of the elephant in the room- gynocentrism, has to end for the sake of society. If we want to change the dysfunctional status quo of society and avoid disaster, then we must risk offending people when we tell the truth and that includes feminists and women.

Gynocentrism And The Avoidance Of Difficult Decisions

The stranglehold that the gynocentric mob has over the Overton window is considerable and it is dangerous. One of the major factors that drives the degradation of civilisation is an avoidance in making difficult decisions. When men with influence decide to place the social approval of women above reason, evidence, morality, law and their own principles and responsibilities, the systems that society relies on to function will eventually decline and then fail. We have a society in which men with authority place the approval of women above their own responsibilities and the long-term interests of society. There is a reluctance from these men to confront reality and make the decisions that need to be made to save society from its own fempocalypse[19].

Bettina Arndt recently has produced a video[20] calling out Jordan Peterson and other men with influence, in shying away from confronting the accountability gap between men and women. Peterson is big on responsibility, except when it comes to holding women responsible for their actions. The selective application of principles based on sex, is one indicator of gynocentrism. I certainly don't think that Jordan is alone in that regard. There are plenty of men like Jordan with far more influence, that look the other way when it comes to the shadow side of women and put their heads in the sand and their fingers in their ears.

Women like all human beings are neither good or bad, but a combination of the two and men are no different. This is the reality of human nature. Yet in our gynocentric culture, we promote a polarised view of men and women. Women are angels and men are devils. Men are responsible and women above reproach. Men are to serve and women are to be served. Men are human doings and women are human beings. These are some of the gynocentric elements of the attitudes that this culture promotes about men and women.

It is not just influential men that have a reluctance in acknowledging the shadow side of women. Society in general is reluctant to confront this reality. For many people their worldview and their identity rests on an assumption that women are perfect and divine. There are women that cannot apologise for anything, no matter how wrong they are. There are men that cannot say no to a woman, no matter how unreasonable their demands might be. For many people it is painful to consider the possibility that women may not be so "wonderful" or "all things nice". For many men it is only when they go through the suffering in family court, get violently assaulted by a woman, or face discrimination in the workplace or in education from feminist policy, that they take off the gynocentric rose tinted glasses and begin to question the cultural narrative they have been told about men and women.

Jordan Peterson is no different. I certainly do not wish this on Jordan or anyone for that matter, but I wonder whether Jordan and men like him would think differently if they lost their career and their freedom from a false allegation and experienced what men like Mark Pearson experienced[21]. Do we have to get to a point where influential men in their hundreds are thrown in jail based on a woman's word alone and feminist mob justice reigns supreme, before these men will confront their own gynocentric bias? Or will society need to collapse and then descend into another dark age because society simply can't cope with the female half of the population being held equally accountable for their actions? These are questions that we should be confronting, because if we don't, then we can expect modern civilisation to collapse into a primitive tribal society resembling the third world. Of course that is if we are lucky enough to avoid a nuclear winter occurring from the process of social and economic implosion. An implosion that runaway gynocentrism and other factors will help eventually bring about, given enough time without any correction.

No modern and developed society can last when men and women have equal rights, but only one sex is accountable to the other. No such society can last when prioritising the well-being of one sex above the other without any corresponding reciprocity, is called equality. No such society can last when attempts to correct these imbalances are met with censorship, hostility and violence. No such society can last that refuses to acknowledge the shadow side of women. No such society can last where gynocentric herd mentality runs roughshod over the rule of law and freedom of speech. Such a society has a finite lifespan. The general reluctance in the population to accept these realities, will eventually lead to a crisis and then society will implode and then fracture into hundred's of pieces. All of this is predictable and all of it is avoidable, if society is prepared to confront gynocentrism.

There are decisions that need to be made right now, to get society off the dangerous trajectory it is on. These decisions are not going to be popular and they are not going to be easy. This "playing it safe strategy" and "tread carefully" approach, is not going to save anyone in the long run. Let us take a simple example of what I am talking about. It is a fact that women in general are hypergamous and that women prefer men that earn more money than they do. It is a reality that women choose to work less than men and choose to work in lower paying professions to pursue their interests over earning money. It is also a reality that in many cases men are the only net taxpayers and that male economic activity remains the primary driving force of GDP and also of female consumer spending. Despite these realities, feminists have pushed for an education system and hiring policies in the workplace, that prioritise women and girls at the expense of men and boys.

The same women that ask for female hiring quotas, affirmative action and a feminised education system that prioritises women and girls learning needs over men and boys, fully expect men to have proper well paying stable employment and to earn more money than them, which these women intend to spend while they work less than their male partner. We can see throughout the West the impact all of these contradictions are having on the fertility rate, economic activity, government spending versus government debt, on the marriage and divorce rate and how it drives the increase in fatherless households, with all of the associated consequences of fatherlessness. We can see it in articles like, "Where have all the good men gone?".

Clearly something will have to give for society to replace itself and to maintain social and economic stability and yet no one in politics will confront these realities. It is political suicide to confront reality for fear of offending women, thanks to gynocentric herd mentality. It is political suicide to dare to suggest we should reform the education system, remove affirmative action policies and reform divorce and family courts. Feminism sees to it that any politician that puts forward such reforms, will be framed as a misogynist in the mainstream media and many female voters will buy that narrative hook, line and sinker.

This is what happens when a society puts women's feelings above reason and responsibility. Political decision making on important and critical reforms that are essential to keeping civilisation afloat, becomes paralysed. The end result of failing to take appropriate steps over a long enough period of time is societal collapse. Society has to choose between short term pain in the present and risking hurt feelings, or experiencing far greater suffering in the future. We can only kick the can down the road for so long. Part of the reluctance that society has in confronting gynocentrism, is the fear of making women angry. The female ingroup bias is instrumental in driving this fear. The looming wrath of the gynocentric mob and feminist cliques in the workplace, in politics, in academia, in social groups and in wider society, is a coercive force in our society that must never be mentioned, for to even speak of it is forbidden. But it is there. Every man and woman is acutely aware of what I am talking about.

Hell Hath No Fury Like A Woman Scorned

In our gynocentric society the looming threat of female anger and outrage is a powerful and guiding influence not just for men in positions of authority, but in relationships and in social settings within the community. Sayings like, "Happy wife, happy life" and "Hell hath no fury like a woman scorned", are examples of the prevailing expectation of men to not displease women and to tread carefully. The reason these sayings exist, is because women are not held accountable for their aggression and that goes especially toward men[22].

This fact was explicitly illustrated recently to millions of people in my country on an Australian TV show called Married At First Sight. We had a woman berating, belittling and abusing[23] a man on multiple occasions on a major national television network at dinner time in front of children. Not a single thing was done by the show to intervene on behalf of the man. This is despite numerous government funded ads[24] on television in Australia, showing men berating women in exactly the same way as on the show and it being called domestic violence. Only when the man called her a "cunt" after copping a week of abuse, did the show intervene[25] and chastise the man for his comments. Even then there was no effort by the show to hold his female partner accountable for the past abuse he had copped.

Women are not held accountable for their aggression in relationships or in wider society. So when angry feminist mobs form, which often happens on university campuses when someone comes to talk that does not fit the feminist Overton window of approved ideas and speech, the aggressive behaviour of the mob is predictably out of control. How many violent and disruptive feminist protests have we seen on university campuses across the West over the last 5 years alone? Too many for me to recollect. Feminists and gynocentric women are fully aware there are little or no consequences for their aggression. That is why someone like Madonna can talk about blowing up the White House[26] in front of thousands of people at the women's march in 2017, without experiencing any serious or significant consequences for her comments and actions.

The fury of the gynocentric female mob and their white knight enforcers, is most evident when a man is accused of sexual assault by a woman. If a woman points a finger at a man, a substantial number of women will side with the woman, believe everything they say and condemn the man without a shred of evidence being required. If a woman points a finger at a man, a substantial number of men will side with the woman, believe everything they say and be at the ready to beat the shit out of the man without a shred of evidence being required. Ordinary people stampede like mindless wildebeest over men and even children, when they hear the call of gynocentrism. The metoo# movement has grown to the size it has because of gynocentric herd mentality.

Think about how much male violence has its roots in female manipulation. How many fights between men have involved a woman spreading lies about a man and getting other men to attack him for her protection and for her honour, over the centuries and in the present day? How many fights between men have started from women cheating on their partner? Think of the Lady Macbeth's of history and the amount of men that have died from their manipulation. It would be interesting to find out the male death toll from female manipulation.

The Darker Side Of Women

Much is said about men misusing their physical power to abuse and control women, but little is said about women misusing their social power to abuse and control men. The documented female ingroup bias in our society is also barely acknowledged, if at all. Esther Vilar has written about female manipulation of men in her book, "The Manipulated Man"[27]. Karen Straughan has discussed the tyranny of female hypoagency[28] and Alison Tieman has discussed the use of threat narratives and victimhood by women, to bully other women[29] and men[30]. Such behaviour is not new, it has been around for centuries. But feminists have worked very hard to ensure that any discussion of female power and the pathological expressions of that power, are not discussed or addressed in the modern age. Feigning female vulnerability has been a core tactic of feminists and gynocentric women, to hide female power in plain sight and keep it cloaked. As Dr. Warren Farrell has stated, "Men's greatest weakness is their facade of strength, and women's greatest strength is their facade of weakness."

Esther Vilar herself, was the subject of numerous attacks by feminists and it is little wonder given the fact that the core strategies of feminism have relied on a number of the very things she discussed in her book. Exposing female manipulation to public scrutiny, is like exposing a vampire to sunlight. Manipulation only works when it remains invisible to the manipulated and feminists do their best to keep female manipulation of men at the relational and societal level invisible and out of the field of public perception.

One of the reasons why feminism has been so effective, is because it's influence can escape scrutiny. Feminism did not march an army down the streets, seize control of government buildings and violently overthrow the government. Feminism has successfully implemented a bloodless coup of multiple countries through the infiltration of our institutions, the subversion and social manipulation of them from within and by instigating internal and external pressure through stirring up mobs of angry women and white knights. It is through manipulation rather than physical force, that feminism has succeeded in taking over our societies.

Whilst I have addressed a number of the failing's men have which have contributed to the gynocentric mob mentality in society, it is of course the case that a number of failings in women have contributed to it as well. In our prehistory our environment was harsh and unforgiving. Whilst men could potentially survive on their own as individuals to some degree without the tribe, this was much less the case for women. With considerably less physical strength and overall fitness, individual women especially with young offspring, would have had far less survival prospects going it alone than men. Being part of a tribe and forming female coalitions to care for each other and nurture young, has considerable advantages for women and has been a part of prehistoric, historical and modern societies. It is not really surprising then, that women have a tendency to form an ingroup bias given this reality.

However that does not mean that women are incapable of thinking as individuals or disagreeing with group consensus. It is certainly possible and indeed what is required to dissolve the gynocentric mob. Individuality in women requires women to think for themselves and regard themselves as agents in society with the capacity to influence the world around them and value themselves as individuals ahead of valuing themselves as females. The feminist control of the mainstream media and academia, has been a key factor in ensuring sufficient numbers of women are indoctrinated with the feminist worldview and succumb to gynocentric herd mentality. Janice Fiamengo has talked about this and how universities have been turned into "institutions of higher indoctrination"[31].

Feminism has done everything it can to make sure women perceive themselves as helpless, disempowered and victimised and to make women feel as fearful, angry, bitter and resentful as possible toward men. Alison Tieman has discussed how feminism uses threat narratives[32] to develop and cultivate this mentality in women and in the population in general. All of this encourages women to seek refuge in numbers for safety, provision and well-being and to put female group identity above individuality.

Rising Above The Gynocentric Mob

Supporting women that encourage other women to see themselves as empowered individuals ahead of being female (A shout out to the Honey Badgers!), supporting women that fight against the feminist threat narratives of male oppression, rape culture and rampant male violence etc and supporting women that promote a message that men are women's partners and not the enemy, is how we break the back of gynocentric tribalism. Once women awaken to what feminism has done to them and join men as partners, it is game over for feminism. I am looking forward to the day when women eat feminists alive for what they have done. It is coming. Hell hath no fury indeed! Women have been used as pawns to further an agenda for power hungry women and when the penny drops for women, the shitstorm that will envelope feminists will be of epic proportions.

Encouraging men and boys to stand up for their principles and to act authentically and speak honestly over female social approval and disapproval and not to self-censor, will also be equally important. Abandoning the tradition of chivalry and teaching men to stand their ground with women and hold women accountable for how they treat them, will be essential. Men going their own way[33] is all about that. Men that value themselves and are prepared to draw a line in the sand and stand up for themselves and for other men when confronted with gynocentrism, is precisely what this society so desperately needs right now.

Having an honest conversation with boys about how to identify female abuse, which is often more psychological and social in nature and teaching boys how to protect themselves from it in childhood and adulthood, will also be important, given that our society pretends female abuse and bad women do not exist. Telling boys the honest truth that not all women and girls are sugar and spice and that like all human beings there are good and bad women, is the way forward.

Removing the feminist influence in our institutions, particularly in the universities and introducing new measures and strengthening existing measures in our political system, media, academia and legislature to safeguard against gynocentric herd mentality, will be essential as well. Freedom of speech and the rule of law is under siege by the gynocentric mob. Freedom of speech, due process, the presumption of innocence and legal impartiality, are under threat and they need to be strengthened now more than ever. The more territory society loses with respect to freedom of speech and the rule of law, the closer society gets to a totalitarian state, revolt and then eventual collapse.

The most important change that will have to occur though, is our attitude toward women and girls. Women and girls are not higher divine beings that are infallible. They are human beings and like all human beings they have a dark side and are capable of and commit all of the same vices men do. There are some immoral acts men commit more frequently, but there are also immoral acts that women commit more frequently. We often fail as a society to recognise female abuse, ostracism, rumour mongering and manipulation, because they are psychological and social in nature and not physical. Female bullying and psychological abuse, can often go on for years without being noticed and can drive men and women to suicide. With have seen with a number of high-profile rape cases and the number of young men suing their colleges from false allegations, that women can and do lie about sexual assault. Even in the physical realm, women are far more violent than society believes they are. The research on domestic violence bears that out. See this link[34] for more information.

Society needs to abandon this attitude women are a superior class of human being. To suggest that women are capable of the greatest evils and horrendous violence is not hyperbole. Female Hanz Fritzl's do exist and they abuse girls as well as boys, such as this example[35]. There were sadistic female SS guards that did horrible and cruel things to prisoners and got sexually aroused by it, such as this example[36]. Quite a sick bitch that example. There are many more examples of extreme cruelty and depravity by women I can cite, but you might need a bucket to throw up in. Like with domestic violence, the expression of evil in women is more common than people think it is and that includes female pedophilia[37].

Acknowledging these realities does not mean women are inferior to men or more evil than men. That is just as wrong as suggesting women are superior and more virtuous. We are talking about the dark side of human nature, not female nature or male nature. We are kidding ourselves as a society, if we think that we can ignore the darker side of human nature when it expresses itself in women. This blind spot does not just impact men and boys, it impacts women and girls as well, who often get physically and sexually abused by such women.

Feminists and the gynocentric men and women in our society, would rather let women continue to murder, assault, rape and sexually torture and abuse children and adults, by shielding women from social and legal accountability, than acknowledge that women are capable of being just as evil as men. They would rather wilfully ignore the fact women can commit acts of evil as heinous and abhorrent as any man and do so far more frequently than society believes is the case.

No one wins from ignoring evil in women. In the end civilisation is based on checks and balances. If the female half of society are not held accountable, then the worst parts of human nature will increasingly express themselves in women and provide fertile ground for evil to flourish in women. Expect the worst in women to be expressed with increasing frequency and severity in the coming years, thanks to feminism and gynocentrism. In the words of Lord Acton, "Power corrupts; Absolute power corrupts absolutely". If society continues to turn a blind eye to the darker side of women and persists in maintaining a belief that women are divine infallible beings, then it will pay the ultimate price- its own destruction. The imbalance will ensure nothing less. All society has to do to prevent that, is abandon the childish belief women are angels and recognise women as human beings, with all the flaws of human beings.

I am almost certain somebody that reads this will say, “but not all women”…..That is right, not all women are devils. Not all men are devils either. But just as not all men are angels, not all women are angels. Let me reframe the “not all women” line. Not all women should be respected, just as not all men should be respected, not all women should be trusted, just as not all men should be trusted, not all women are saints and not all men are serial rapists and murderers just waiting outside a woman’s apartment to assault them.

Both sexes are capable of terrible evil and amazing good. The belief in female superiority is the core factor behind the gynocentric herd mentality in society. If enough people were prepared to question and criticise women when they behaved improperly and not just blindly believe and respect all women simply because they are women, then half the gynocentric bullshit that is slowly destroying society from within would cease. The belief in female superiority and the associated attitudes about men and women have got to go, if society is to have a future.

We can either descend into a new dark age and let the gynocentric mob take over, or we can fight for the foundations of civilised society and travel to the stars above us. All that is required is for people to think for themselves instead of subscribing to groupthink, act as authentic individuals, abandon the belief in female superiority, put their own principles and reasoning above social approval and particularly female approval and above all, stand their ground against gynocentrism.

A Reflection on Zeta Male vs MGTOW

Andy Thomas · 18 February 2019 · Archived copy · Original

In 2010, Paul Elam penned a stunning piece. It is only in recent months that the full significance of his words illuminated themselves for me. I feel that it is his greatest ever work.

The article is, of course, The plague of modern masculinity. In it, he outlines the traditional notions of masculinity in terms of alpha, beta and omega, and charts the road that this has taken us down in recent times.

He writes:

> They [young men] have come of age in a time of coerced impotence, their nascent masculinity gutted and stripped long before having the opportunity to shape their character and their destiny. In that they are suffering from the loss of things never held, from things missing but never known. They are, quite literally, a lost generation of the walking wounded, wandering blindly from a battlefield on which they never knew they stood.
> In that light, the path they are on is not really a road to manhood, but simply a retreat from the effacing malice woven into the very fabric of their developmental lives. And it takes them not to safe ground, but directly into a dismal culture of shallowness and self-indulgence; a realm of options without obligations; of self-gratification without self-awareness or self-discipline. It is the death march of the western male, destined for a withering end ensured by intellectual, psychological and moral atrophy.
> This aimless, narcissistic existence is a forced escape from lives shrouded in shame; from manhood being reduced to an evolutionary joke in the eyes of a culture that holds it in contempt, even as the elders deny it is happening. With the wholesale whitewashing by society and abandonment by the fathers more or less complete, the newly (de)engineered young man is all but defenseless against this downward spiral into terminal insignificance.

In the final section, Paul Elam gives us an alternative to alpha, beta and omega with “zeta” — named after the star Zeta Persei with the mythological figures of Perseus and Athena as its emblems.

> Perseus had a remarkable talent for slaying archaic monsters, Medusa the Gorgon among them, who as a mortal woman possessed great beauty, and was self enamored and struck with the power of her sexual allure until she was turned into a hideous monster by Athena, who later used her severed head as a weapon on her shield.

With regard the traditional categories of masculinity, I am not personally omega or beta. I have never been a follower. I’m sure as hell that I’m not alpha either. I can say that clearly now, and give two reasons:

1. The idea of status and its symbols have always been meaningless to me. I have never sought to ascend some dominance hierarchy. This has meant, I realise, that I have never attracted certain kinds of women. Many may see this as a weakness, but for me it was all well and good. In any case, there has never been a shortage of more interesting and exotic women. All came with affection, which is something I often see lacking in the relationships of alpha males.

2. I am open with my personal flaws and emotions. An alpha would never ever do this because, again, it is generally regarded as a weakness in men. It is true that this has caused me some discomfort in the past. Far from being a weakness, however, I’ve come to regard it as a strength which allows me to do and be things that others will not.

The idea of detaching oneself from the dominance hierarchy appealed to me and I have, in the past, self-identified as MGTOW. I am attracted to the concept of autonomy and a healthy level of individualism, and I have become good at saying, "No!" when treated as a utility.

Late last year, I wrote an essay called Nihilism and Beyond for the Zeta Male in which I discussed the nihilism which ensues when we detach completely from the traditional value system which, in practice, may seem like detaching from life itself. I argued that we must find an alternative. I argued that we must be anchored somewhere. I wrote it under the assumption that Zeta Male and MGTOW were synonymous but, in truth, I was beginning to contemplate the idea that they are very different and this is why, I think, I had a preference for the term "Zeta Male".

Shortly after my article was published, a youtuber by the name of Solitary Wolf produced a video called The Zeta Male in which he outlines his theory. He describes his video as "food for thought". And, indeed, it is.

I'm going to express some thoughts on it as it stands in stark contrast to my own recent thinking, but I very much hope that my comments will be seen as part of an open and constructive dialogue rather than any kind of critical attack (which they are not). In short, I'm inclined to view the video as an expression of MGTOW philosophy, rather than that of Zeta and I will expand on this in what follows.

But first, I should say that I rather liked much of the early part of his video, although I did not necessarily agree with everything. As a side point, for example, Solitary Wolf says that, "Being a zeta male is to stop thinking in categories." I'm not sure where this has come from. The Universe, even a tiny fragment of it, cannot be comprehended by the human mind. In order to function, human beings articulate internal abstractions of their surroundings — simplified mental models if you like. It is not possible to stop thinking in categories. And first and foremost, zeta males are human beings.

Solitary Wolf goes on to say that in order to leave the "system" it is necessary to "go inwards." He says:

> The zeta male is a state of mind. He is the man who temporarily detaches from his ideas, thoughts, his attachments — until his experience is reduced to the one thing that's permanent — his awareness. …
> I think it is the only way to be a man that's completely outside the system. Zeta is the last and final letter of the alphabet. After the Z, there's nothing. Only darkness. It's one step from death … It's a state of true indifference. Awareness doesn't give a shit. It just watches. It sees the world passing by like clouds and doesn't really care what it is.

I acknowledge that he uses the term "temporarily detaches", rather than "permanently detaches". I acknowledge also that it is often necessary for us to temporarily withdraw from emotionally difficult situations, and it is something I do myself. But Solitary Wolf then suggests that the man should be reduced to the one thing that is permanent: his awareness. The idea of being "reduced" has become a critical concept for me because I have come to think in terms of the opposite. It has become clear to me that awareness without attachment is devoid of meaning and value. And a state of true indifference — one step from death — is the very opposite of what I argued in Nihilism and Beyond. I argue for engagement, not detachment. I argue for life, not death!

Solitary Wolf adds:

> A zeta male doesn't care about the fact that he just lost his job, his wife and that his friends let him down. These are things in the past which he cannot change. He doesn't care about respect, opinion of others, ambition and doesn't desire sensual pleasures. The zeta male is completely and utterly content. By reducing his desire for external things to zero, he has just wrecked the whole system. No one has power over him and no one can affect his contentment.

The idea of detaching from the traditional dominance hierarchy is, indeed, a powerful concept. If you do this, then it is true that people will lose power over you. This is the primary MGTOW aspect that I internalised and ascribed to. What Solitary Wolf articulates in the above excerpts, however, is not simply this, but detachment from everything — an idea which has become an anathema for me. I suspect he may relate the human dominance hierarchy with all that there is. This is a natural thing to do, and something I can identify with because the dominance hierarchy may certainly appear to be everything when you begin to unpick things in your personal life.

I was struck also by his phrase, "It [zeta awareness] just watches. It sees the world passing by like clouds and doesn't really care what it is."

Our Fathers, our Mothers (Unsere Mütter, unsere Väter) is a German TV mini-series which follows the lives of five friends from the outbreak of war in Nazi Germany. I have, on occasion, entertained myself with a fantasy of being a time traveller to the events of 1930s Germany and watching from the side-lines with indifference as they unfolded — like a tourist. I mention this because I've consciously tried to apply this very idea to myself in my own time — a time I regard as being not too dissimilar to that of 1930s Germany in terms of social madness. It was a kind of emotional survival technique, we could say.

It didn't work.

While watching Our Fathers, our Mothers, I realised that I do care and nothing is ever going to change that. If I were to find myself time travelling in 1930s Germany for any appreciable period, then people like those portrayed in this TV mini-series, both men and women, would be my friends. And I would give a shit!

Moreover, he suggests that the Zeta Male doesn't care about the loss of his job, wife or friends. I suspect, however, that the loss of children would be on another level entirely. I really don't wish to seem too critical because, while I have no children, I know something of the distress it takes to contemplate emotional detachment — it is a survival strategy born out of pain. I'm glad he produced his video and admire him for speaking against "resentment and aversion", which he does briefly in another part of the video.

But my point is that I no longer believe that anything resembling a complete detachment can lead to a life of contentment, rather it something we must go through and come out of. Yes, perhaps we need to go "inward" for a while, but we cannot remain there. We must come out and fully engage with life in the end. And we must find a way to do it through a form of engagement that is outside the traditional value system.

Now, in his depiction of Zeta Male, Paul Elam writes:

> He has no allegiance to tradition or nostalgia for the past, and in fact is charged with plotting a new course.

He concludes with:

> He doesn't seek power, but justice. And he has one overarching feature largely absent in the world around him. He cares about those lost young men who were ambushed coming out of the womb. And he will strive to make himself an example, living proof that there are other roads to take than the ones that lead to self-hatred and self-destruction.

This is the very opposite of nihilism, with the overarching feature being that the Zeta Male cares! Yes, we must sever allegiance to tradition and nostalgia for the past, but the rational and the very act of plotting a new course is engagement with life, not detachment from it.

When we stare into the abyss, it seems to me that we have three options:

1. When it stares back, we can turn away and seek safety in the very traditionalist value system which gave rise to the abyss in the first place, or:

2. We can give ourselves over to it. Perhaps it's possible for some to stand at the boundary in terms of a personal lifestyle choice. For me, it is looks more like a noble gesture of suicide, both metaphorically and, in extreme cases, literally. It is one step from death, as Solitary Wolf so rightly suggests.

The third option is to fill the abyss. Not an easy prospect, I know. Moreover, it will not be a task for lone wolves.

The concepts of Zeta and MGTOW are distinct in my view. Given what I have just written, I no longer feel that MGTOW is the road for me personally. Perhaps it's true, I realise now, that I was never fully MGTOW at heart but a Zeta Male.

Cathleen London, doctor, Senate candidate, and "Known Genital Mutilator"

Gary Costanza · 22 February 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Doctor runs for Senate, doctor defends genital mutilation, shitstorm ensues. Said candidate deletes tweets, shitstorm grows. Eventually, her ignorance defeats her.

Called out on her support of routine genital mutilation of healthy baby boys, she attempted damage control and came out reeking of ignorance and malice.

She has since dropped out of the Senate race.

Lesson to be learned: defending or practicing MGM is not what to do when running for office, practicing medicine, or being a decent parent and human being.

Have we hit the tipping point over male genital mutilation? Is it no longer cool to advocate for routine infant MGM?

Dr. Cathleen London of Door To Door Doctors has been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

She currently owns and operates a medical practice in Milbridge, Maine where she treats over 1,000 patients.

She has freely admitted to cutting infants and is currently a staunch supporter of routine neonatal cutting of healthy baby boys. She also started a campaign to run for U.S. Senator in the state of Maine that she recently abandoned.

Frankly, she doesn't deserve to be dog-catcher.

It all started when London tweeted about this article in The New York Times, "The Special Misogyny Reserved for Mothers" by a feminist pod-caster that elicited many comments from feminists, intactivists, humanitarians, and ignoramuses. I had heard pod-caster Hillary Frank interviewed on NPR and within a few minutes realized she was a typical feminist who played the victim as a mother and a woman. The article had her whining about supposed misogyny to suppress her podcast and an incident by a boorish, drunken man. Here's the Tweet Dr. London sent that started it all:

> The Special Misogyny Reserved for Mothers https://t.co/jyTrFphmpu Male sexual dysfunction not taboo but women's is? & women's from GIVING BIRTH? What kind of society are we? As a physician and mother these are crucial topics I address in the office regularly. Nothing taboo. #sex
> — Cathleen London MD (@DrChaya) December 31, 2018

Apparently Dr. London didn't like the resulting Tweets that brought up circumcision and other differing viewpoints, and sent this mocking Tweet, igniting a firestorm of opposition:

> So much fun to find out that if I tweet about #WOMEN's #sexual health after #childbirth and the #misogyny surrounding it that it will turn into a thread about MEN and all the anti circumcision trolls will attack. Wonder if @nytopinion knew their story would do that?
> — Cathleen London MD (@DrChaya) January 3, 2019

"Cat" – or should I say 'Miss Intact Genitals who deems it OK to amputate others' private parts without consent' – tells us to get off her women's rights threads on Twitter, so here we are – let's accommodate her and 'take it outside.'

I'll first discuss her Twitter meltdown and flame-out, then include her interactions with "American Circumcision" director Brendon Marotta and his thoughts about her, and then I'll finish up with some of the twisted thinking that brought us modern day circumcision.

Here's a few Twitter threads that I've archived, and since deleted by the doctor. along with all of her accounts. Since she's flamed out and revealed who she is and the madness of the pro-circumcision position, enjoy these juicy and satisfying back-and-forths.

Here she claims men took over her thread by male-privileged mansplaining intactivists, female genitals are not "protected" by law, and male circumcision reduces risk of infection from AIDS by about 70%. And again, FGM – bad, MGM – good:

> Cathleen London MD
> How to spot #Mansplaining: they take over a thread about women's sexual dysfunction to make it about them. Then when you push back they say you are "triggered" – triggered is another word used for strong woman arguing. Throw all sorts of documentaries your way & ignore data
> Cathleen London MD
> Dear men:
> A woman who fights back is not "triggered"
> A woman who stands her ground is not "triggered"
> A woman who resents that the topic is always changed to center around men is not "triggered"
> Stop #Mansplaining
> We know #gaslighting when we see it.
> Joeline Kelly
> You can oppose both but you need to understand how radically different they. On a spectrum of "bad", FGM is literal oppression and falls on a separate part of the spectrum and men trying to undermine the gravity of that by arguing that male circumcision is the same is ridiculous.
> Jordan Hirsch
> So it turned into a real shit show. I'm sorry, this platform is so sick sometimes.
> Cathleen London MD
> Men are so fragile that tweeting this: The Special Misogyny Reserved for Mothers https://nyti.ms/2RmHBjH to start a discussion about women's sexual dysfunction needs to be taken over by male privilege and #Mansplaining and 'intactivists'. My mind is blown.

> Yeah I will keep praying and advocating for women's autonomy over their reproductive organs which are under attack daily. That was the thread I started. But MEN took over with #MalePrivilege to make it about them. Then continued #Mansplaining
> Odin Gaye
> It must be interesting to be an educated person who's genitals are protected by law. You could use that position of privilege to advocate for those less fortunate in spite of your own mistakes but you've gone another way. I hope you pray on that.

> Male circumcision reduces risk of infection from AIDS by about 70%, which is particularly important in countries like Lesotho and Swaziland where AIDS prevalance is about 20-25%. We're not sure why yet, although we've ruled out a lot of confounding factors.

In this thread she defends circumcision by citing religious freedom and calls intactivists and humanitarians anti-semetic. She defends MGM yet condemns FGM, saying "it looks better." Claims there have been no deaths from MGM, and that parental consent is equal to informed consent, saying it's a "personal decision."

PARENTS give consent is not THE INDIVIDUAL giving consent to HAVE A PIECE OF THEM BEING CUT OFF. And you know there is no reliable reason to carry out this procedure proactively, other than to make money that is Well if you are a doctor you need to do more reaserch. Almost all doctors from developed countries are agains Circumcision.

no thanks. Again as a JEW I chose to circumcise my sons. I have no interest in watching Anti-semitic propaganda. But thanks for the offer.

Cathleen London MD

nope it is both. just not willing to engage in discussion with close minded folks when my PERSONAL decision was religiously based. thanks bye

Critical Thoughts

Is it my "personal decision" if I choose to have my daughter's clitoral hood removed?

Muireannín Ní hÍomhair

You choose? But the child cannot choose to be mutilated ? You are a barbarian. But as you are a follower of religion, this makes sense. Ignorant and barbaric.

Craig Adams

I am in favor of protecting children's human rights to bodily integrity, and hence genital integrity. Genital alterations are for informed consenting adults. My children are happily intact. First, do no harm.

Cathleen London MD

Again, as a Jew I made a different choice for my sons.

Daniel Damineli

Sure, but then just be honest. Don't cherry pick science as an excuse to support your cultural beliefs.

Wow.
Medically sanctioned feminist tells men who have been genitally mutilated to 'get over it'.
Tell me why 90% of women refuse to identify as 'feminist'…

Cathleen London MD
and you pulled that stat out of your ass I take it?

JailWiki
Unlike you, no. Do you want one survey, or links to dozens?

Cate Delia
I want dozens of links. Thanks for the offer.

JailWiki
And you are…?
I find googling “feminism popularity survey” (a neutral term) supplies as many as i want.

Cate Delia
I’m following this riveting thread. I await at least 24 links to surveys showing at least 90% of women refuse to identify as feminists. Thanks.

Cathleen London MD
dozens was plural – 24 or really I would say at least 36

David Lane
Actually, there are several types of each procedure with varying degrees of relative severity. There’s this group called the World Health Organization where you can get info like this for free.

David Lane
It’s really unprofessional for a doctor to spout off about a medical issue when she is not at all familiar with the subject.

John Preston
Get over it? Really? Is that what you tell all victims of violent, nonconsensual baby-rape? Did you know that circumcision removes more tissue than the most common forms of FGM? And that the foreskin has at least 19 extremely important functions?

BSR
Not all FGM ‘removes the clitoris’. For an MD you’re remarkably ignorant on the subject. In any case I think you meant external clitoris as the vast majority of the clitoris is internal and can’t be ‘removed’. Heard of the ritual nick?
Way less harmful than circ.
Equally wrong!

ProtectChildren
The most common form of #fgm is less damaging than the most common form of #circumcision (male #genitalmutilation).

You should really learn more about the penis.

J Asdust
While not all forms of FGM are as extreme as clitoral removal*, one of the main arguments for it is religious doctrine of some muslim sects. IE, ‘I FGM’d my daughter because allah said so’ is akin to ‘I circumcised my son because yahweh said so’.

J Asdust
That’s not to say either is right, but as they are issues of ritual genital multilation of the young for religious or not reasons, it may well be a package deal.

It makes you uncomfortable, but they’re parallel issues. In order to truly end FGM you may have to stand against MGM.

BiggsySmalls
As an MD do you have a duty of care or some kther set of ethical guidelines you are required to follow to maintain your resgistration.

In the UK you’d be putting the profession in to disrepute talking to someone like that & the GMC would take action that could see you lose 1/2 your right to practice medicine. Just wondering if there was anything like that in the US & what is the governing body.

Apparently not happy with the shitstorm she created, "Cat" has deleted all her Twitter accounts. She probably realized a serious Senate candidate's social media posts would be examined to find out what she really thinks . Fortunately we've archived some of them for all the world to see, and her ignorance and arrogance are apparent in these Twitter exchanges, especially her defense of routine male genital mutilation. Her deleted accounts were: @McfaddenChaya @DrChaya @DrCat4ME

She's not just an ignorant parent who had her son circumcised without informed consent about the risks of this needless surgery who regretted it later, she's a doctor who has personally cut infants, heard their screams, seen their blood, and witnessed their maiming yet continues to support this barbaric practice.

Here she's accused of improper behavior with patients, scolding them for what she deems the wrong politics. And here is more bad behavior from 2011.

Here are some ratings of her as a doctor, read them and take them with a grain of salt, but you know what they say, where there's smoke there's fire.

Dr. London has suspended her campaign for the US Senate and I believe her support for MGM was her undoing, as was an interview with Brendon Marotta, director of "American Circumcision" in her attempt at damage control. The interview is not available as yet, but watch this space for further updates.

Marotta's recent run-in with the doctor and an attempted interview shows her true colors as a person, a doctor, and a Senate candidate. This from his blog "Why Did Circumcision Proponent Dr. Cathleen London End Her US Senate Campaign?:"

> When I've talked to friends about the Dr. Cathleen London saga, they think I'm joking till I show them the abusive email and texts this woman sent me. This would be a funny meltdown story if Dr. London hadn't been seeking real political power. She had power over her children as a mother, power over her patients as a doctor, and was seeking power over all of us through the US Senate. Prior to my interview with her, Dr. Cathleen London received a glowing profile in the New York Times, and was the kind of person the media would have turned to as an expert on circumcision, medicine, and politics.
> So why did Dr. Cathleen London end her campaign? So far, she has not given a public reason, and I wouldn't trust a narcissist to give an honest one anyway, which means everything that follows is speculation.
> Was it just because of my reporting? Probably not. I believe. Dr. Cathleen London's attitude ended Dr. Cathleen London's campaign. Her attitude made her flame out and attack human rights activists, attack me, get into a physical altercation in the Trader Joe's frozen food section, and get in trouble with the Maine Board of Medicine. I wouldn't be surprised if this emotionally reactive attitude also caused other internal problems within the campaign we are not aware of.
> This began when Dr. London tweeted an article on how society is reluctant to talk honestly about women's sexual issues. Intactivists replied in the comments that this was a universal problem, since we don't talk openly about men's sexual issues as well. Dr. London responded by melting down, and her feed became a constant attack on Intactivists.
> I became aware of her when someone linked my film in the comments. She replied that I was anti-semitic, and refused to watch my film or read anything shared with her. This is a serious and entirely false accusation. It was also an unprompted personal attack, since I had not engaged with her. I became curious and wanted to know why she was attacking me.
> I wrote to Dr. Cathleen London, and asked to interview her about the response she was getting from the Intactivist community. She agreed, and called me.
> The interview I had with Dr. Cathleen London was one of the most bizarre I've ever recorded. Dr. London repeatedly got basic facts about the issue wrong.
> At the end of the interview, I asked if I could call or email if I had any follow-up questions. She was very friendly and said yes. We ended the conversation on good terms.
> I wasn't sure I was going to write anything about this, till two weeks later when Dr. Cathleen London deleted all her social media, both personal and her campaign. When I texted her to find out why, and Dr. London said it was because "Maine board of medicine is out of controlling" after someone made a complaint to them about her.
> I was going to call and find out more, but the next day she texted me "you are one of the trolls aren't you? You did the film." Then she told me to "find a short pier and walk off."

I wrote up an op-ed and submitted it a few places. Then I tweeted that I was looking for a place for the story. A few hours later, a reader told me Dr. Cathleen London had ended her campaign.

Because of the timing I was curious: did Dr. London end her campaign because she knew my interview was coming?

It was unlikely the op-ed would be published at this point, since the gist of the piece was "this woman should not be running for office" and now she wasn't running. I tweeted out a bit about the interview and asked my followers what they thought.

Then a couple days later on Jan 21, 2019, I got this email:

Dr Cat London for US Senate

you and your nutjob intactivist friends have nothing to do with my dropping out of the Senate race

You give yourself way too much credit.

Get a life
Get over your mommy and daddy issues

Life is way more than your penis

I replied:

So why did you drop out?

And got this message back:

you are press I am not giving interviews

So Dr. Cathleen London acknowledges me as press… and this is the way she talks to press?

While I can now say that a former US Senate candidate has commented on my penis, flip the scenario to see how inappropriate this is. Imagine if a male politician told a female reporter covering women's issues "life is about more then your vagina." What would the reaction be?

I have no idea if London and other pro-circ doctors like her really believe that circumcision is good for boys like a vaccination, or if they think it OK as a religious rite as well as improved hygiene and a cosmetic improvement that's no big deal. Either way I don't care – she is simply wrong.

A vaccination has proven scientific medical results in preventing certain diseases that doesn't remove healthy and important tissue or organs from unconsenting patients. "Cat," why don't you remove baby girls' breast buds to prevent future breast cancer, a real, documented disease that kills many women, far worse than very rare penile cancer (or UTIs, or bogus HIV prevention) that you say is worth preventing. And why don't you think it OK to perform FGM on religious grounds as you do with MGM?

You may not know that modern day MGM was designed to decrease sexual pleasure and masturbation in boys and men, just like FGM. Modern science and human rights demand an end to all routine infant genital mutilation, male or female. Circumcision was thought to increase fertility in ancient times, then Jews and Arabs embraced it for religious (read: superstitious) reasons, then Maimomides in the 13th century and John Harvey Kellogg promoted it to decrease male sexual pleasure and activity.

Here's Kellogg's – yes that Kellogg – maniacal promotion of modern genital mutilation. This is enough to curl even Cat London's hair. From Wikipedia:

"Masturbation prevention

As a leader of the anti-masturbation movement, Kellogg promoted extreme measures to prevent masturbation. His methods for the "rehabilitation" of masturbators included measures up to the point of mutilation without anesthetic, on both sexes. He was an advocate of circumcising young boys to curb masturbation and applying carbolic acid to a young woman's clitoris. In his Plain Facts for Old and Young,[36] he wrote:

> A remedy which is almost always successful in small boys is circumcision, especially when there is any degree of phimosis. The operation should be performed by a surgeon without administering an anesthetic, as the brief pain attending the operation will have a salutary effect upon the mind, especially if it be connected with the idea of punishment, as it may well be in some cases. The soreness which continues for several weeks interrupts the practice, and if it had not previously become too firmly fixed, it may be forgotten and not resumed.[50]

> a method of treatment [to prevent masturbation] … and we have employed it with entire satisfaction. It consists in the application of one or more silver sutures in such a way as to prevent erection. The prepuce, or foreskin, is drawn forward over the glans, and the needle to which the wire is attached is passed through from one side to the other. After drawing the wire through, the ends are twisted together, and cut off close. It is now impossible for an erection to occur, and the slight irritation thus produced acts as a most powerful means of overcoming the disposition to resort to the practice and

> In females, the author has found the application of pure carbolic acid (phenol) to the clitoris an excellent means of allaying the abnormal excitement.

He also recommended, to prevent children from this "solitary vice", bandaging or tying their hands, covering their genitals with patented cages and electrical shock.[36]

In his Ladies' Guide in Health and Disease, for nymphomania, he recommended

> Cool sitz baths; the cool enema; a spare diet; the application of blisters and other irritants to the sensitive parts of the sexual organs, the removal of the clitoris and nymphae…"

From IntactWiki, here's Rabbi Maimonides' equally ruthless prescription for purity:

> As regards circumcision, I think that one of its objects is to limit sexual intercourse, and to weaken the organ of generation as far as possible, and thus cause man to be moderate. Some people believe that circumcision is to remove a defect in man's formation; but every one can easily reply: How can products of nature be deficient so as to require external completion, especially as the use of the fore-skin to that organ is evident. This commandment has not been enjoined as a complement to a deficient physical creation, but as a means for perfecting man's moral shortcomings. The bodily injury caused to that organ is exactly that which is desired; it does not interrupt any vital function, nor does it destroy the power of generation. Circumcision simply counteracts excessive lust; for there is no doubt that circumcision weakens the power of sexual excitement, and sometimes lessens the natural enjoyment: the organ necessarily becomes weak when it loses blood and is deprived of its covering from the beginning. Our Sages (Beresh. Rabba, c. 80) say distinctly: It is hard for a woman, with whom an uncircumcised had sexual intercourse, to separate from him. This is, as I believe, the best reason for the commandment concerning circumcision.

And,

> This law can only be kept and perpetuated in its perfection, if circumcision is performed when the child is very young, and this for three good reasons. First, if the operation were postponed till the boy had grown up, he would perhaps not submit to it. Secondly, the young child has not much pain, because the skin is tender, and the imagination weak; for grown-up persons are in dread and fear of things which they imagine as coming, some time before these actually occur. Thirdly, when a child is very young, the parents do not think much of him; because the image of the child, that leads the parents to love him, has not yet taken a firm root in their minds. That image becomes stronger by the continual sight; it grows with the development of the child, and later on the image begins again to decrease and to vanish. The parents' love for a new-born child is not so great as it is when the child is one year old; and when one year old, it is less loved by them than when six years old. The feeling and love of the father for the child would have led him to neglect the law if he were allowed to wait two or three years, whilst shortly after birth the image is very weak in the mind of the parent, especially of the father who is responsible for the execution of this commandment. The circumcision must take place on the eighth day (Lev. xii. 3), because all living beings are after birth, within the first seven days, very weak and exceedingly tender, as if they were still in the womb of their mother; not until the eighth day can they be counted among those that enjoy the light of the world. That this is also the case with beasts may be inferred from the words of Scripture: "Seven days shall it be under the dam" (Lev. xxii. 27), as if it had no vitality before the end of that period. In the same manner man is circumcised after the completion of seven days. The period has been fixed, and has not been left to everybody's judgment.

Here's Dr. London's practice information from her website "About Us:"

> Door To Door Doctors' mission is to provide personalized, high-quality care on an as-needed or preventative basis. We have created a practice that we believe in and choose for our own family members. We are committed to Downeast Maine and are here to stay. Dr London came to Washington County to help the underserved and she truly meant it when she said she was staying. She is dedicated to building a practice of physicians who share her vision.

Men's Rights Music

Robert Brockway · 22 February 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Themes relevant to men's rights sometimes appear in popular music. Sometimes these are positive themes, inline with our advocacy, but more often they are negative themes – precisely the problems that the men's rights movement is talking about. Either way they comprise Men's Rights Music. A few selected examples are presented here. This article is offered as a bit of fun and to get people thinking about the application of misandry in art.

> Looks up at the man that she turned down.

Hypergamy backfiring bigtime.

Let’s Hear it for the Boy

Deniece Williams

We’re off to a good start with the title but it goes down hill after that…

> My baby, he don’t talk sweet
> He ain’t got much to say
> But he loves me, loves me, loves me
> I know that he loves me anyway
> And maybe he don’t dress fine
> But I don’t really mind
> ‘Cause every time he pulls me near
> I just wanna cheer
> Let’s hear it for the boy
> Oh, let’s give the boy a hand
> Let’s hear it for my baby
> You know you gotta understand
> Oh, maybe he’s no Romeo
> But he’s my lovin’ one-man show
> Oh, whoa, let’s hear it for the boy
> My baby may not be rich
> He’s watchin’ every dime
> But he loves me, loves me, loves me
> We always have a real good time

> And maybe he sings off-key
> But that's alright by me, yeah
> 'Cause what he does, he does so well
> Makes me wanna yell

Most of the song involves the woman pointing out her boyfriend's faults.

She seems to be ok with these many faults for now. One day she'll walk and take the kids with her.

Bills

LunchMoney Lewis

> I got bills I gotta pay
> So I'm gon' work, work, work every day
> I got mouths I gotta feed,
> So I'm gon' make sure everybody eats
> I got bills!
> All these bills pile up my desk
> They looking like a mount (Everest!)
> All the little kids run around
> I can hear their stomachs growl (grrr!)
> It's a full moon out
> And my girl just keep on howlin' (ooh, ooh)
> She said she gonna leave me
> If I don't come home with fifty thousand (fifty thousand?)

This song could as easily be called The Disposable Male. Note the hypergamy in the last two lines.

Blurred Lines

Robin Thicke, T.I. and Pharrell Williams

This song enrages many feminists. That alone warrants its inclusion.

> I know you want it
> I know you want it
> I know you want it
> You're a good girl
> Can't let it get past me
> You're far from plastic alright
> Talk about getting blasted
> I hate these blurred lines
> I know you want it
> I know you want it
> I know you want it
> But you're a good girl
> The way you grab me
> Must wanna get nasty

> Go ahead, get at me

Feminists asserted that it was misogynistic and encouraged rape culture.

It was banned at various University campuses around the world by the feminist fun police. Most people just thought it was a good song though as it hit number one in 20 countries.

Run the World (Girls)

> Who run the world? Girls! [x4]
> Who run this motha? Girls! [x4]
> Who run the world? Girls! [x4]

So girls run the world while also being perpetual victims? Do I have that right? Sounds like you're not running it very well, girls.

The Man

Aloe Blacc

A song about a man. What could go wrong with that? As it turns out, plenty.

> I played my cards and I didn't fold
> Well it ain't that hard when you got soul (this is my world)

His world?

> I'm a soldier standing on my feet
> No surrender and I won't retreat (this is my world)

Stoicism.

There is nothing intrinsically wrong with stoicism. It's been behind many of the greatest achievements by men. It's when men are forced to be stoic that there is a problem. It's high time society just let men be.

Aloc may as well have told men to get back on the plantation.

I'm Your Man

Leonard Cohen

Leonard has turned gynocentrism up to 11.

> If you want a lover
> I'll do anything you ask me to
> And if you want another kind of love
> I'll wear a mask for you
> If you want a partner
> Take my hand
> Or if you want to strike me down in anger

> Here I stand
> I'm your man
> If you want a boxer
> I will step into the ring for you
> And if you want a doctor
> I'll examine every inch of you
> If you want a driver
> Climb inside
> Or if you want to take me for a ride
> You know you can
> I'm your man

We're human beings Leonard, not human doings!

Father's Day

Weddings Parties Anything

This song is probably not well known outside Australia but is well worth listening to. The song is about a man who gets to spend very little time with his son. He treasures every moment.

> What of the darling wife that once I had?
> Well I'm pleased to say that she still talks to me
> But I try not to think of what went wrong
> Because if I say that i was right
> She might say that she was right
> And the only rights I care about are visiting rights, yeah
> On any other day
> I might care what you say
> But every Saturday is Father's day
> You might call it sad
> You might call me mad
> But I've got one who calls me Dad

Here the song makes it clear that his access to his son is entirely at the whim of the mother.

Conclusion

On and on it goes. Male disposability, gynocentrism and feminist ideology.

These songs are just a few examples that show that the problems facing men and boys are well established in the arts.

If the wanton misandry and disregard for men in those songs got anyone down, watching the Men's Rights Movement the Motherfucking Opera should cheer them up.

NCFM PRESS RELEASE: WE WON!

NCFM · 23 February 2019 · Archived copy · Original

The National Coalition For Men (NCFM) is pleased with the court's decision in NCFM v. Selective Service. Forcing only males to register is an aspect of socially institutionalized male disposability and helps reinforce the stereotypes that support discrimination against men in other areas such as child custody, divorce, criminal sentencing, paternity fraud, education, public benefits, domestic violence services, due process rights, genital autonomy, and more.

"Women are now allowed in combat, so this decision is long overdue," said Marc Angelucci, attorney for NCFM. "After decades of sex discrimination against men in the Selective Service, the courts have finally found it unconstitutional to force only men to register. Even without a draft, men still face prison, fines, and denial of federal loans for not registering or for not updating the government of their whereabouts. Since women will be required to register with the Selective Service, they should face the same repercussions as men for any noncompliance."

Chivalry in the raw

Doug Mortimer · 23 February 2019 · Archived copy · Original

With all the hubbub surrounding the distaff Captain Marvel movie, it's worth remembering that attendance is not compulsory. You do have alternatives. Consider the movie Arctic. There's only one man in the movie and his situation is extraordinary. Yet he represents all men.

The man in question is Overgård (played by Danish actor Mads Mikkelsen), and he is in a heap of trouble. His cargo plane has crashed above the Arctic Circle. The good news is he survived, the bad news is he's stranded. He's scratched out a large "SOS" that can be seen from above but it hasn't been spotted yet. Given the ubiquitous ice and snow, dehydration is not a problem. Ice fishing provides him with protein, fish oil, and whatever other nutrients one gets from fish. Though death is not imminent, his life is decidedly unpleasant – his toes appear to be in the early stages of frostbite.

Overgård didn't choose to be a plane crash survivor, but given Mads Mikkelsen's stoic, stolid persona, he appears well equipped to rough it. If anybody can survive this situation, it's Overgård. We assume he is a bachelor, as we never see him take out any pictures of a wife or family.

When the movie begins, we don't know how long Overgård has been there. We know it's been long enough to develop a routine. Every day he checks his trot lines and takes his catch back to the downed plane's fuselage, which provides him shelter from the elements. Unfortunately, he has no way to start a fire, so he eats the fish raw. Every day he makes a pilgrimage to a nearby hilltop and tries to make radio contact with anyone who might be out there. Obviously, the lifestyle leaves a lot to be desired, but things could be – and soon will be – worse.

One day he finally makes radio contact, but just when it looks like his ordeal is over, the rescue helicopter gets caught in a storm and crashes. Overgård hustles to the crash site but the pilot is dead and the passenger (co-pilot, navigator, mission specialist…the role is never specified) is seriously injured. This proves to be a game-changer. There are a few needful things in the downed helicopter, but now Overgård not only has to take care of himself, he has someone else to take care of, someone in shock and badly in need of medical care.

And this is where the screenplay by Ryan Morrison and Joe Penna comes up with an ingenious complication: the passenger is a young female.

The young woman never wakes up during the course of the movie. For all practical purposes, she is an infant in need of constant care. As acting goes, the role is a thankless task, as the character has no lines of dialogue and the film shoot took place over 19 days in the frozen wastes of Iceland.

Some might say that Overgård is living the MGTOW dream. Given his profession of flying cargo planes over the frozen north, he is likely a bit of a loner anyway. Going solo may be second nature to this guy. Now that he has some human companionship, it is not a relief but a burden. But he can't tell the young woman to take a hike. He can't tell her anything because she is out of it. So he gives her as much first-aid as he can, feeds her, and keeps her hydrated.

Unfortunately, she needs much more medical help than he can provide, and no more rescue helicopters show up. Despite his best efforts, it is obvious she will die. So he decides to bundle her up like a papoose (reinforcing her infantilization), secures her to a sled, and pulls her over the frozen waste to an outpost he has seen on a map he found in the helicopter.

The question here is what Overgård would have done if the injured passenger had been a male. Suppose the girl had died in the crash and the male pilot had survived. Would Overgård have been so gallant? As we know, men are disposable (the male body count in movies is way, way past the female total) so this story just wouldn't be as effective with a comatose man.

The injured passenger is not just a woman, she is a fertile young woman. Yet Overgård has no relationship with her. She is not the mother of his children and never will be. He has never spoken to her. He has never seen her before. She is as perfect as a perfect stranger can be. Yet he cannot turn his back on her, even though his own survival is not assured. So he leaves his spartan routine at the plane crash site and begins a perilous journey to transport her to the outpost where she can get medical help. Her survival is doubtful even if he does get help, but there is no doubt she will die if he doesn't make the attempt.

The scriptwriters shrewdly cast a female of indeterminate ethnicity. I'm not sure what nationality she was supposed to be (she is played by Icelandic actress Maria Thelma Smáradóttir), as the writing on her helicopter photo ID card was Greek to me. Looking at a snapshot of her, her husband, and her child, they appear to be some sort of Eurasian ethnicity. At any rate, Overgård has absolutely nothing in common with her. Whatever tribe she belongs to, it is surely not Overgård's. Even if she came to, they could not communicate. But if we look at him as everyman and the crash victim as everywoman, it makes sense. As realistic as the film is, it is also an allegory. Everyman serves everywoman, no matter the circumstances, no matter the ethnicity. Gynocentrism rules globally. The Arctic Circle is no barrier.

Dollar for dollar, Arctic (made for just $2,000,000) gives you far more bang for your movie buck than the superhero CGI orgies that fill up the multiplexes. Unlike the SJW-friendly movies, this one actually has something profound to say about male-female relations without getting on a soapbox. The script doesn't hit you over the head with it. It's embedded in the narrative, but I don't know if the modern entitled female would recognize, much less appreciate the depth of Overgård's compulsion to sacrifice himself.

Arctic gives the lie to gender fluidity, non-traditional casting, and all the other trends afflicting movies and theater. The movie works best precisely because the injured passenger is a generic nubile female in distress. Movie roles and sex roles are not interchangeable.

In truth, if Overgård had turned his back on her, the movie audience would totally lose sympathy with him. Even if he made a rational decision as to the likelihood of both of them surviving the trek and decided that remaining at the plane crash site was in his best interest, he would be written off by the audience. Just imagine! Placing his own welfare ahead of that poor young woman's! But thanks to the chivalric instincts of the human male, that storyline cannot be pursued.

At one point, however, Overgård abandons her. After falling into a crevasse, he receives a deep gash to his leg which seriously hampers his mobility and makes it even more difficult to move her on the sled. Now, more than ever, they will likely die if he attempts to resume the trip to the outpost. There is the slimmest of chances that he can make it even without her. So he reluctantly bundles her up and leaves her behind. Before he gets far, he spies a flower (the only vegetation we see in the movie) improbably sprung up through the tundra. Is it an omen? Is it a symbol of ultimate success against overwhelming odds? Whatever, he turns back, retrieves her, and resumes the arduous journey. He cannot do otherwise and live with himself.

Yes, gynocentrism is so ingrained in the male psyche, that even in the most dire circumstances a man can't ignore a woman in trouble. No one would ever hale Overgård into international court if he left her behind to feed the polar bear that dogged them on the trail. But he is incapable of doing that. His toxic masculinity is more poisonous to him than it could ever be to a woman.

Mikkelsen, by the way, also appeared in The Hunt, another low-profile movie worthy of your attention. This 2012 film concerns a male kindergarten teacher falsely accused of sexually abusing children. If you haven't heard of it, I'm not surprised, but this Danish film is also worth seeking out.

The advertising tagline for Arctic is "Survival is its own journey." Not a bad slogan for men today. Or any other day.

A message to Democrats from Paul Elam and A Voice for Men

If, knowing that, you're still planning on voting Democrat, you're literally voting for the murder of children. Given that, it is the editorial position of A Voice for Men that you should have been aborted, you degenerate Nazi fuck.

Terry Crews

Also available in Portuguese.

I was six years old.

I was in a hospital room in the children's ward of Montefiore Hospital in the Bronx, in a bed, after a surgery.

I was the only patient in the room at the time.

My dad was on his way in to see me, but had not yet arrived.

The nurse entered on the right.

She checked my temperature.

She left.

A man entered.

He wore a white coat like a doctor. He moved quickly and quietly to the left side of my bed. To this day, if I had to, I could pick him out in a line up. I will never forget his face: wire framed glasses, beard, moustache, small round face, slight build, thin, five and a half feet tall, eyes darting left and right before they settled on me.

"I need to check," he whispered.

He lifted the bed sheets, and put his left hand under my robes and began to fondle my penis and testicles.

His own right hand was in what appeared to be his pocket.

Then he groaned.

He removed his right hand, and touched my abdomen and left what I now realize must have been semen.

I was not frightened.

I was not angry.

I felt nothing—which is a very bad thing for a six-year old boy.

I kept looking to the door to see if the nurse would come back, to explain what was happening.

Then the man quietly walked away.

To this day, as I go about my business, say walking down the street, and I turn my head and look behind, I see them all: manifestations of my fear, anger, envies, regrets and resentments, all personified like goons. Before me, are my joys and good fortune, but they are in my present and I hope, in my future, while this is about the manifestations of the past. They are a motley bunch of characters—cartoons. I imagine waving my hand at them, and they all vanish; except for him. He is still there, in silence, standing, not moving: eyeglasses, beard, white coat, darting eyes—no expression on his small round face. He will be there on the day I die standing by the portal as I pass through to the unknown. I have no fear, no anger when I think of him. I have just a void.

Life being life, something happened again.

I was twelve years old.

In those days, kids could get into movie theaters that showed R-rated films. The movie we were watching was "Pendulum"—some murder story. The large movie theater was on Bainbridge Avenue near 204th Street. It was one of the hottest days of the year. After the movie, my friends left, but the air conditioning was great. I decided to stay, alone.

The theater held about 300 people, but there must have been no more than 20 in it at the time. I sat alone near the front, on the left aisle. No one was near me for the first half of the movie. Then, a man came and moved across me and sat on my left. He had a cup of coffee. I remember the coffee as an irrelevant detail. He leaned back, slipped his hand into his pants and began to play with himself. I saw the bulge of his penis through his pants. He took out his penis.

I could have moved, but I chose to stay, partly due to the memory of a "doctor." This was a deep-seated desire to figure out what that "doctor" had done. Furthermore, I was fascinated with what an erection looked like. After about fifteen minutes or so, I got up and left.

Something happened again.

Years later, at 19 years old, I was working at the NY Public Library—a job to pay for college. One day, my manager sent me downstairs to help one of the other managers remove dated material from the card catalogs. In the quiet of that day, one of the managers came up to me, put his arm around me and propositioned me.

"I know a man who'd suck the cock of anyone your age," he said, while he squeezed my shoulders and pushed his crotch against my arm. I pulled back. I lifted his arm off me. I smiled at him, and said "no, no." We remained friends for my time there.

Years passed.

My career took off. I found happiness within myself. Finally, I met a woman. We have been married for 20 years now with two kids of our own. Today, I am sixty and have a wonderful wife and a great life. I suppose you can say I am in the top 5%, despite having begun in the bottom 10% in a very poor family.

Yes, I chose to stay in that movie theater. I could have left. I made a decision at the age of 12, and I own it with no regrets. The act of owning it has enabled me to see it as a benign incident, and that has enabled me to move past it. Thus, you can imagine what I think of Terry Crews.

Terry Crews is a 40-year old former bodybuilder/football player, who was groped in the open, before witnesses. I have listened to his testimony before Congress and it rings false to me. He said "it" lasted minutes, but he also said he reacted immediately: this is contradictory. Seriously, count out three minutes and imagine Crews standing in the open, before his wife, while another man held his balls for 180 seconds. I call bullshit. In his testimony, I hear too many melodramatic expressions, too many rehearsed aphorisms, but no passionate self-reflective doubt. I see him change tracks in his mental recordings too easily. I see him turn the ignition on programmatic responses. I hear him restructuring a minor incident within the framework of a fiction called toxic masculinity.

At the age of 12, I knew that I could have stood up and left that movie theater. However, I wanted to see what that man was doing. If I had turned myself into a victim, I would have denied my conscious decision and this would have burned the bridge to wellness. I would have never owned my decisions, or my eventual transcendence above them.

The man who propositioned me in the library was just an older man who did not know better. Today, if he is alive, he is likely 90. I hope he is happy; I really do; he was not a monster or a member of a cult. Yes, it shook me up for just a moment, but that was all.

The first incident, when I was six, was a real sexual assault; it was evil knocking on my door. However, that "doctor" did not manifest "toxic masculinity." He was a pervert. I know the difference.

I was a six-year old boy. Crews was a 40-year old bodybuilder who was groped for less than a few seconds. Terry Crews suggests he suffered PTSD. Six-year old boys have no power. Crews had an arm for self-defense and it happened in the open.

I do believe Terry Crews was surprised by a three-second grope. I do believe he was confused by a three-second grope out in the open, with witnesses. I do not believe he is a victim. When he asserts he suffers PTSD, he undermines every soldier who returns from war, unable to reconcile their fundamental Kansas-goodness, with the same soldier who kills the enemy.

Crews' claim to PTSD, if unchecked, undermines how I made a conscious decision to remain in that movie theater. When he asserts PTSD, he trivializes what I experienced as a six-year old boy. If that was all Crews did, I would relegate him, in my mind, to a player on the stage of a comedy—a buffoon, a clown, a jester. If that were all he did, I would not even write this.

However, he moved past that. He validates the phrase "toxic masculinity" and then suggests it is a cult. A cult. A cult!

When he validates a "cult of toxic masculinity," he has crossed a bridge too far.

He has opened the gates over the bridge, so now I will cross it, too.

A cult?

The world is simple: there are great men; there are good men (every man I know); there are bad men (my librarian and Crews' agent); and there are evil men (my "doctor"). The same holds for women.

We use those simple adjectives to describe men (or women). We do not affix words like "toxic" to a gender. One does not fix an adjective to a religion, a race or a gender. Compare "The cult of toxic masculinity" with "The cult of Radical Islam." How can any reasoned and objective person validate the former, while repudiating the latter?

Masculinity, in its good facets, is beautiful, creative and powerful. I love the facet of self-responsibility, stoicism (not in its pejorative), modesty and introspection—not a singular facet evinced by Crews' arias.

A cult?

I do not sing my experiences. Yes, I do it here, but only to ensconce my rejection of Crews in a world infected by Oprah Winfrey and her cheap talk-show philosophy that personal experience alone is the currency of wisdom. Crews inflates a minor incident to conflate masculinity with evil, while he parades like a diva before a close-up. His incident does not even rise to a tragic play, for I see nothing in him worth emulating. He is neither tragic nor comic; at most, he is a character in a 1960's Saturday morning cartoon.

A cult of toxic masculinity?

Are men like Crews creating a tangent Arlington National Cemetery? Do we now replace the Congressional Medal of Honor with "I am a survivor?" Will we now have our Marines, risking their lives on a bridge too far, singing, instead of the "Halls of Montezuma," Gloria Gaynor's "I will survive?"

I am not suggesting that men should not talk about the events of their lives. Talk, reflect, discuss, and write. However, talk about it in the arms of a loved one; talk under the guidance of a therapist's office; talk with a spiritual advisor; talk with close friends; talk under the moonlight; but don't do it like Crews before Congress, a.k.a. Gloria Swanson before Hollywood; e.g.: "I'm ready for my close up, Mr. DeMille."

A cult of toxic masculinity?

I am also not suggesting that men have not done bad things: men can; and men have done the great things; and masculinity has always kept the bad in check, while fertilizing aspirations to the good. However, to embrace and then promulgate a revolting and unsubstantiated phrase designed to hobble the goodness of masculinity for personal gain is symptomatic of a Eunuch posturing like a peacock, unaware that his testicles have long-ago been popped like Styrofoam peanuts.

A cult of toxic masculinity?

How about an Opera for Mr. Crews: "The Day Someone Squeezed my Balls." Of course, a soprano would have to sing his role for the three seconds he hits the high C—or maybe he just sings it.

He has crossed several bridges too far.

Terry Crews glorified a grope to mount the pink pedestal of performative pain while pinching his nipples, as he farts words about the “cult of toxic masculinity.” In so doing, he tosses—one after the other—good men (decent men, trying to understand their place in a world poisoned by feminism’s razor, disguised as Gillette) under the bus so he can spread his ass cheeks before the candle-lit alter of toxic feminist victimhood.

A cult?

Individual men acted against me, and if I saw it as a cult of evil, I would have never moved beyond it—it would have seemed impenetrable. These incidents made me who I am, and I am grateful I was never indoctrinated to claim victimhood. Please do not extend to me, any compassion (the feelings we have for equals). I do not need or want it, for this is in my past. Yes, I could have done without the “doctor” in my consciousness. However, that is the hand life’s dealer dealt to me. Reserve for Crews, your pity (the feelings we have for fools).

I am not Terry Crews.

I am not a victim.

I am not a survivor.

I am a son and a brother.

I am a husband in a strong and loving marriage with a woman who is my partner.

I am a father.

I am a man.

I chose the pseudonym Anonymous for two reasons. Mostly, if any person who supports Crews reads this, they may get irritated and I do not have the power nor time to engage with self-serving stupidity, arrogance and delusions. Furthermore, my children are still young and my wife and I decided to hold off telling them about the incidents of my life. The only person who knows who I am is Paul Elam and it will stay this way. That said, the events in this essay are true, and the opinions are mine.

If we can’t think rationally about the structure of our society because we have an irrational belief that “society is structured to unfairly benefit men over women” then we will inevitably destroy our society. The only people who can do anything are those people capable of challenging that belief and remaining motivated to do what needs to be done.

Men’s rights activists will never be mainstream but the mainstream is going over a cliff so who cares.

Truth, responsibility & why Jordan Peterson is wrong on Genesis

Andy Thomas · 1 March 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Jordan Peterson is to be admired for standing up to the seemingly endless onslaught of stultifying dogma which now pervades our culture. He is the first to show any real success in doing so and, thus, demonstrates that success is indeed possible.

There is so much to like about Dr. Jordan Peterson's 12 Rules for Life: An Antidote to Chaos. In an age of entitlement and offence, this book is a breath of fresh air. It has, however, been extensively reviewed elsewhere and I won't be doing that here. Instead, I'm going to focus on where I think Dr. Peterson goes wrong.

I intend to be somewhat direct.

The word "truth" appears 115 times, no less, in 12 Rules. It is a book in which he advocates for truth and encourages others to be fearless in seeking truth in their personal lives. However, I feel that Dr. Peterson has fallen short himself, and what he presents as "truth" is, at times, no such thing, but a projection of a very personal world view. To illustrate this, I will refer specifically to his treatment of Genesis from the Old Testament.

But first, some context…

His book is billed as a "message about the value of individual responsibility," and individual responsibility is something I very much agree with. However, when it comes to responsibility, he advocates two very different ideas of what it means. Men have responsibility for all things including a responsibility for women, but women it would seem are to have little responsibility beyond that of raising children.

In Rule 11, he writes:

> A woman should look after her children—but that's not all she should do. And a man should look after a woman and children—although that is not all he should do. But a woman should not look after a man, because she must look after children, and a man should not be a child.

I acknowledge that he writes that a woman should look after her children and, "that's not all she should do." However, I fail to see where Dr. Peterson explains what else women are actually expected to do other than, perhaps, raise world-redeeming heroes. At most, individual responsibility seems an optional extra for women throughout the book. What's more, children are explicitly hers and it is only her children that she must look after. But not so for a man.

In a Q&A section entitled "Coda", Dr. Peterson claims to be in possession of a "pen of light" which he uses to illuminate the Bible and, presumably, the truth. He writes:

> What shall I do with my wife? Treat her as if she is the Holy Mother of God, so that she may give birth to the world-redeeming hero.

This not only firmly casts women in the role of mothers, but places a requirement on men to treat them as other-worldly beings whose role is sacred. Moreover, with "world-redeeming hero," it is clear that Dr. Peterson is not including daughters here. He goes on to give very different advice for how to treat sons and daughters. Daughters, he suggests, should be listened to and guarded, and told that it's OK to be a mother. Sons should be encouraged to do what's right, even if that means they must sacrifice their safety and their lives.

Now, I do not suggest that any of these notions are invalid in and of themselves. Sometimes it is necessary to risk our personal safety to do what we feel is right. If a man or a women wants to be a parent, they are entitled to want that. Such things are to be admired.

Taking responsibility for ourselves, our own behaviour and our own decisions can, indeed, be very empowering. In order to do this successfully, however, we need to have a clear and healthy understanding of what individual responsibility means and, in particular, what it does not mean. Individual responsibility does not mean taking responsibility for the actions and emotions of others when they have agency themselves, which is essentially what 12 Rules advocates that men should do.

In order to assume responsibility for others in a meaningful way, we must take away their control of themselves. We must, therefore, deny their agency. If we do not do this or cannot do this, then it is not responsibility we assume, but only the consequences of other people's behaviour. Neither of these outcomes are particularly healthy in my view.

Nowhere is this more striking than in Dr. Peterson's treatment of Genesis in the Rule 2 chapter. He draws frequently on historical texts to illustrate his points and I'm personally fine with this. It doesn't matter to me whether Dr. Peterson believes in God or not in this regard as, for the most part, I'm happy to interpret things in a metaphorical sense which is what I believe Dr. Peterson intended.

Genesis describes the world initially created by God, one in which Adam and Eve live a childlike existence, free from hunger and suffering in idyllic surroundings. A snake (the devil), so the story goes, then tempts Eve with a forbidden fruit (a metaphor for knowledge).

Let's look at Dr. Peterson's interpretation, in which Adam and Eve are metaphors for men and women. Here is what he writes:

> In any case, the serpent tells Eve that if she eats the forbidden fruit, she won't die. Instead, her eyes will be opened. She will become like God, knowing good from evil. Of course, the serpent doesn't let her know she will be like God in only that one way. But he is a serpent, after all. Being human, and wanting to know more, Eve decides to eat the fruit. Poof! She wakes up: she is conscious, or perhaps self-conscious, for the first time.
> Now, no clear seeing, conscious woman is going to tolerate an unawakened man. So, Eve immediately shares the fruit with Adam. That makes him self-conscious. Little had changed. Women have been making men self-conscious since the beginning of time. They do this primarily by rejecting them—but they also do it by shaming them, if men do not take responsibility. Since women bear the primary burden of reproduction, it's no wonder. It is very hard to see how it could be otherwise. But the capacity of women to shame men and render them self-conscious is still a primal force in nature.

He then goes off on a tangent with a discussion about snakes, Virgin Mary and "naked apes", but comes back on a circle to continue the story:

> That evening, when Eden cools down, God goes out for His evening stroll. But Adam is absent. This puzzles God, who is accustomed to walking with him. "Adam," calls God, apparently forgetting that He can see through bushes, "Where are you?" Adam immediately reveals himself, but badly: first as a neurotic; then as a ratfink. The creator of all the universe calls, and Adam replies: "I heard you, God. But I was naked, and hid." What does this mean? It means that people unsettled by their vulnerability, eternally fear to tell the truth, to mediate between chaos and order, and to manifest their destiny. In other words, they are afraid to walk with God. That's not particularly admirable, perhaps, but it's certainly understandable. God's a judgemental father. His standards are high. He's hard to please.
> God says, "Who told you that you were naked? Did you eat something you weren't supposed to?" And Adam, in his wretchedness, points right at Eve, his love, his partner, his soul-mate, and snitches on her. And then he blames God. He says, "The woman, whom you gave to me, she gave it to me (and then I ate it)." How pathetic—and how accurate. The first woman made the first man self-conscious and resentful. Then the first man blamed God. This is how every spurned male feels, to this day. First, he feels small, in front of the potential object of his love, after she denigrates his reproductive suitability. Then he curses God for making > her so bitchy, himself so useless (if he has any sense) and Being itself so deeply flawed. Then he turns to thoughts of revenge. How thoroughly contemptible (and how utterly understandable). At least the women had the serpent to blame, and it later turns out that snake is Satan himself, unlikely as it seems. This, we can understand and sympathize with Eve's error. She was deceived by the best. But Adam! No one forced his words from his mouth.

In this account, Eve bears no responsibility whatsoever. She was simply "deceived by the best" and we must sympathise with her. Adam, however, was a "neurotic"—a pathetic and contemptible "ratfink" whose thoughts were of revenge. None of this is in Genesis.

Where has it come?

I read Adam's response to God as a truthful explanation of what had happened, rather than the words of a neurotic ratfink obsessed with revenge. I accept that Adam implicated God and Eve and I accept that his words may well have been barbed. I'll explain why, however, far from being pathetic and contemptible, Adam's response to God was not only truthful, it was very human response and, in a sense, even healthy. In fact, his words are astoundingly eloquent when you unpick them.

But just what exactly were Adam's words to God?

Nowhere in any of his account does Dr. Peterson acknowledge that Adam even admitted to God that he ate the apple. In fact, he obfuscates what Adam actually said. He writes that when God asked Adam whether he had eaten the forbidden fruit, his reply was this:

> The woman, whom you gave to me, she gave it to me (and then I ate it).

You could be forgiven if you didn't originally spot what Dr. Peterson has done here. It certainly gives the appearance of accuracy. But let me ask, just how should we interpret the parentheses here?

Would you unthinkingly assume, as I did, that what Adam said was this: "The woman, whom you gave to me, she gave it to me," with the fact that he ate it being left only to implication?

Indeed, parentheses in quoted speech (usually square ones) are typically used for clarification of or addition to what is being said. Their contents are not vocalised. I did a little a research and believe they can also be used as an outdated device to add emphasis [1]. But this would be bizarre. If we were to assume they were inserted for emphasis, then we may ask why Dr. Peterson felt it necessary to use modern language to articulate Adam's words, but an archaic and unused device to emphasise them?

I'm not particularly well read when it comes to the Bible, but I was aware that there are many translations. The King James Bible, for example, gives Adam's words as: "The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat." The New International Version gives this: "The woman you put here with me—she gave me some fruit from the tree, and I ate it." And The Young's Literal Translation: "The woman whom Thou didst place with me—she hath given to me of the tree—and I do eat." [2]

This is the very crux of Genesis. In every commonly available translation, the language style may vary, but Adam's words are clear and semantically equivalent. In Dr. Peterson's interpretation, however, they are not and it could naturally be assumed that Adam excluded himself from responsibility entirely.

What Adam actually did was to separate out responsibility as follows:

- God
- Eve
- Himself

If this is so “utterly understandable,” as Dr. Peterson writes, then why must we refuse so utterly to understand it? And just why must we view with such contempt that which is so true?

The serpent not only gave Eve the fruit, which she knew to be forbidden, but told her what it would bring. Eve had a choice but, to be fair, she was still a “child” at that point. But then in an awakened state, a conscious Eve gave the fruit to Adam who was still a child himself. Did she give him the same choice? Presumably not, given how the ability of women to bully and shame men is a “primal force of nature”. In any case, “no clear seeing, conscious woman,” we are told, “is going to tolerate an unawakened man”.

But that did not give her the right.

Dr. Peterson, in his own account, omits the fact that Eve also hid her nakedness from God and, significantly, that God questioned her too about what she had done. When God comes along, she simply vanishes in his version of events. Perhaps he did not feel Eve was worth a mention here, given that even clear seeing conscious women seemingly need not account for their actions.

What Eve actually did was to point to the snake, as Adam had pointed to her, but she acknowledged that she too ate the fruit. And good for her!

I certainly would have eaten the damn thing.

And what about God? Just what was his role in all of this?

If we continue with the story for a moment, were not Adam and Eve both children who did not know the difference between good and evil? Why must we heap contempt on either of them?

Did God not always intend for humankind to go out into the world and face reality? Or are we really to believe that God’s original plan was to keep Adam and Eve as pets—a pair of human chihuahuas—for his garden, but he was thwarted by their disobedience?

Was not the apple always a trap? Was the snake not God’s creation too?

Adam (a metaphor for men) curses and blames God, we are told, simply because he was so useless and pathetic. We should see Eve’s behaviour as a primal force of nature, but with Adam, we need not understand further. He was contemptible, and that’s all there is to know.

If Adam was, indeed, angry in this story then could it not be because he was hurt by God’s trap? Was he not, in a sense, betrayed by God? Was not the whole thing a setup from the start?

Why, in this case, must we deny Adam his anger by heaping shame upon his head? I would suggest that Adam’s hurt would be a natural and necessary consequence of his awakening. Why, then, must his anger be suppressed and his humanity denied when anger is, itself, a God-given human emotion which must, therefore, serve some purpose?

I suspect that God didn’t really feel bitter and vengeful over this, or at least would have got over things rather quickly. Rather, I would suggest that it is Dr. Peterson, and not God, who would be more likely to deny Adam his emotions and Eve her part in this drama. After all, it really was all part of God’s plan, was it not? Or did God seriously not know what he was doing?

I had an insightful online exchange about this recently on a Jordan Peterson themed discussion group with a guy who claimed to be a Christian and a believer in the Bible. He was very polite (much more than I) but nevertheless accused me of “decrying God”, “saying that life’s not fair” and of “advocating weakness”.

He quoted Adam’s words from the Bible at me which, rather interestingly, he wrote as: “The woman who thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and she did eat.” (This, by the way, is how I came to spot what Dr. Peterson had, himself, written.)

Adam should simply have taken the blame “like a man”, he added.

I found myself a little annoyed by what I regarded as a false sense of virtue on this. In response, I pushed the guy hard on what Adam should have done or could have done differently.

It is interesting to see just where his line of thinking eventually went.

Adam was damned whatever he did, I argued. And if so, how could he be responsible for things over which he had no control? If he ate the apple, which God had put there, he would be disobeying God. If he refused, then Eve would have simply bullied, shamed and rejected him which, according Dr. Peterson she was entitled to do, until he eventually relented. After all, he was a child who had no other place to be.

His eventual reply, when it came, was this: "Adam should've stood up to Eve and more or less put Ever [sic] in her place."

And there we have it.

Just how exactly was Adam meant to have put Eve in her place? And what precisely was meant by "more or less"? A stern look (less)? Or was Adam meant to have given Eve a slap and taken his belt to her (more)? I suspect the latter of the two, if the former failed to do the trick, but my online acquaintance was too afraid to say so in a straightforward manner. But, in short, in order to take responsibility, Adam should have taken control over Eve—by force if necessary—was what was being suggested.

Just how would that play out in a modern context, I wondered?

Dr. Peterson is a highly intelligent, educated and articulate man. However, what he presents us with is not an honest analysis of the Bible, but some twisted version of it and a character assassination of Adam—of men.

I write of Adam's hurt and anger. I wish to acknowledge my own here—I am actually angry with Dr. Peterson and, yes, this is personal. Certain parts of 12 Rules touched on rather painful aspects of my soul, into which he dumps what I regard as his personal projection of how every male feels—something he could not possibly know—in a chapter giving advice on how to Treat Yourself Like Someone You Are Responsible for Helping. I'm not sure how a model for self-contempt is meant to help!

His book has been out for a year or so now, and I've been meaning to articulate my thoughts on this aspect of it for sometime. This is first time I've been able to do so.

Not so long ago, my mother died of liver failure. It was a lingering and agonising death. She was an alcoholic.

My father was a loving, caring and decent man—rather unlike the contemptible image portrayed of men in Dr. Peterson's Genesis. My father was, however, totally invested in the idea of perfect motherhood—much like the one promoted by Dr. Peterson—the idea that motherhood is "sacred" in some way.

The week he finally retired from a physically demanding job at the age of 67 was the same week in which my mother's health failed catastrophically. My dad had been in full time employment since he was 14, and my mother had been drinking almost as far back as I can remember. The last two years of his life were spent as her full time carer—spoon feeding and taking her to the toilet.

"All I've done in life," he used to say proudly, "is keep your mother happy no matter what."

He collapsed and died shortly after her funeral.

In marriage, conflict between my parents almost never arose. On the occasions he pushed back against her emotions, she would simply transform into a baby-like state and begin sobbing—at which point he would put his arm around her and say, "It's alright love. Don't worry."

Her drinking was completely invisible to him, as it was to me. Drinking was not something done by mothers because they were "perfect" and, therefore, such a thing simply could not be possible. Her alcoholism was culturally invisible in other words.

I've pondered much recently on how my mother was, in fact, drunk throughout much of my life and I never even knew it. She would have a glass in her hand from mid-afternoon onward, and I only ever saw it as normal.

My mother never had to face the consequences of her behaviour. There was never any need for her to have a sense of responsibility in an emotional context.

When, only a few years back, I began for the first time to talk about my mother's drinking, I was met with no end of angry responses: "It's no use blaming your mother," "You're just feeling sorry for yourself," and "How dare you talk like that about your mother!"

I've had to fight through traditionalist and religious dogma to get at the truth—to get at sanity. I had, I realise now, been in a double-bind—one in which was shameful and one in which even to pose the necessary questions was, in itself, shameful. I can relate rather poignantly, therefore, to where Dr. Peterson writes:

> Advice is what you get when the person you're talking with about something horrible and complicated wishes you would just up and go away.

We, as adults, are responsible for our decisions in life based on the knowledge and understanding available to us. If our understanding is lacking, we should be fearless in seeking a better one. Dr. Peterson, himself, writes:

> It is our responsibility to see what is before our eyes, courageously, and to learn from it, even if it seems horrible—even if the horror of seeing it damages our consciousness, and half-blinds us.

There were many wonderful things about my childhood. In so many ways, I was blessed. It is not that my childhood was particularly unique or bad—it wasn't. Rather, I refer to it because it has lead me to have a certain insight—as a boy I agonised over my mother's emotions because I felt "responsible" for them when, in fact, I could never have been. Children cannot be responsible because they do not posses the level of mental development to be so.

The idea of individual responsibility has become important to me, but it hinges on what I regard as a healthy demarcation between our own responsibilities and those of others. Today, I have a lot of love and compassion for my mother. Understanding of reality, not suppression of reality, has made this possible.

Traditionalist ideas of the family have much to be said for them, and the breakdown of the family in recent years represents a tragedy for children. My father saw marriage as an equitable partnership, and I see this as admirable. Society, today, faces many pressing problems and I would not expect Dr. Peterson to have all the solutions. What I would expect, however, is an honest shot at the truth—or at least not a lie.

A model of Holy Mothers and Hero Sons is just a too simplistic framework for reality in the modern context. Women and mothers are not deity. They are fully fledged human beings and should be seen as such. They are entitled to make decisions, face consequences and grow as a result, just as we are. To deny women responsibility is deny their agency and, therefore, it is to deny their full humanity. Likewise, to deny us our emotions is to deny our full humanity also.

Despite my critical words, I admire Dr. Peterson's work and I admire him as a human being. It is clear to me that he cares deeply about people, whether they be male or female. He refers much to chaos and order—the need to straddle its boundary to derive a meaningful life. I suspect that his understanding of things in this regard is much more profound than any literal interpretation of the Bible.

The Universe is, indeed, not a fair or safe place. It is not just an arena for human cruelty, but gives rise to all manner of predators and parasites.

And things could never have been any other way.

If it were free of unfairness and cruelty, it would be a sterile place in which human beings, along with everything else in the Cosmos, could never have come into existence.

When God discovered that both Adam and Eve had eaten the forbidden fruit, he forced us both out into the world in order that we may evolve and grow.

It would seem that God does not expect either of us to be pets.

A response from the Australian Workplace Gender Equality Agency

Robert Brockway · 3 March 2019 · Archived copy · Original

The mainstream media and even governments often talk about a gender pay gap or gender wage gap and imply that this exists as a result of systematic discrimination against women. The reality though is that we have a gender earnings gap and the reasons are well established. Studies by governments and private researchers have shown time and time again that men and women make a variety of different choices when choosing what to study, in what field to work, and various factors concerning how they work. These choices lead to differences in earnings. The largest such study is probably the CONSAD report commissioned by the US Department of Labor. The CONSAD Report naturally pertains only to the US labour market but its results are broadly applicable outside of the US and also agree with research from other countries. In particular the CONSAD report noted:

> There are observable differences in the attributes of men and women that account for most of the wage gap. Statistical analysis that includes those variables has produced results that collectively account for between 65.1 and 76.4 percent of a raw gender wage gap of 20.4 percent, and thereby leave an adjusted gender wage gap that is between 4.8 and 7.1 percent.

This simply means that after adjusting for known factors a small gender earnings gap remains. The fact that such an earnings gap exists does not imply discrimination on the basis of gender. It merely shows that not all factors that impact earnings have so far been quantified. Future research may be able to further reduce this apparent earnings gap.

There have been quite a few high profile cases of companies initiating pay scale audits only to find little difference in earnings between men and women at the same level. For example, The Deloitte UK 2018 Gender Pay Gap Report in which Deloitte assessed its own gender pay gap states that:

> Our analysis shows that the average mean gender pay gap within grade pools is around 2.2%

Despite this, when reporting on Deloitte's results, mainstream news sources focus on the 43% difference found when comparing all men and all women at Deloitte.

Some recent research suggests that gender differences in personality traits may explain some of this remaining difference, making any possible difference due to discrimination smaller still.

Proponents of the gender pay gap also often ignore research which shows that young childless women in large US cities are out-earning men.

An ongoing problem when discussing the gender earnings gap is the propensity for those arguing for a gender pay gap to conflate different alleged problems. We often see different problems discussed together, while they are actually entirely distinct. These problems often include:

Claims of gender discrimination in a like-for-like comparison.
Claims that women are shepherded in to lower paying roles.
Claims that traditionally female roles are paid less.

The latter two claims, while initially appearing to be similar, are quite distinct. If proponents of a gender pay gap believe the latter two are genuine concerns they need to make it clear that there is no evidence of widespread gender discrimination in earnings in a like-for-like comparison.

A few months ago I wrote an email to the Workplace Gender Equality Agency (WGEA) in my role as the president of the Australian Men's Rights Association Inc (AMRA). The WGEA is a a federal Australian government statutory agency that is charged with promoting and improving gender equality in Australian workplaces.

Email to the WGEA

> Hi (Redacted). I'd like to ask a question about media releases made by the WGEA.
> The November 2016 media release includes the following statement:
> "Note: A gender pay gap is the difference between the average male full-time earnings and average female full-time earnings expressed as a percentage of male earnings. We calculate gender pay gaps across the data set by industry and by manager and occupational categories, excluding CEO salaries. The Agencys gender pay gap data does not reflect comparisons of women and men in the same roles (that is, like-for-like gaps)."

> This statement or anything like it is missing from the November 2017 scorecard.
> Could you please confirm whether or not it is still the position of the WGEA that the agency's gender pay gap data does not reflect comparisons of women and men in the same roles (that is, like-for-like gaps)?
> I'd like to have permission to publish your response online.

> Yours sincerely,

> (Contact details redacted)

A few days later I received the following response from the WGEA. The response arrived as a Microsoft Word file attached to a reply email. The original is held on the AMRA Inc. website and is quoted here. Comments are interspersed.

Response from the WGEA

> Response to Robert Brockway, President, Australian Men's Rights Association Inc
> The national gender pay gap figure calculated by the Agency is the difference between women's and men's average full-time base salary earning, expressed as a percentage of men's earnings. It is a measure of women's overall position in the paid workforce and does not compare like-for-like roles.

Well, there you have it. WGEA clearly states that the often-quoted national gender pay gap does not compare like-for-like roles.

As of February 2019 the WGEA is reporting the national gender pay gap as 14.1%.

This should not be confused with the gender pay gap (full-time total remuneration) which is the difference between men's and women's total remuneration, expressed as a percentage of men's total remuneration.

The Gender Equality Score Card for November 2017 puts the gender pay gap (full-time total remuneration) at 22.4%.

> This explanation was included on page 8 of the Agency's 2016-17 gender equality scorecard released in > November 2017 and in the accompanying media release.

> However, the Agency's work with employers shows that when they conduct a gender pay gap analysis, they can uncover like-for-like pay gaps between women and men working in the same or comparable roles.

This has never been at issue. Such as in the case of Deloitte mentioned earlier most audits find a small difference in gender earnings in a like-for-like comparison. Actual like-for-like differences still don't indicate the presence of gender discrimination.

> These analyses can also reveal an organisation-wide pay gap. This is the difference between the average remuneration of women and the average remuneration of men across an entire organisation or department. This gap usually reflects the lack of women in senior management and high-paying roles in an organisation, especially leadership, technical and specialist roles, and the over-representation of women in lower-paid roles.
> Although Australian women have had the legal right of equal pay for work of equal value since 1969, evidence suggests that women are sometimes not paid the same amount as men for doing the same or comparable jobs.
> When the beer brewer Lion undertook a gender pay gap analysis, for example, their leadership team was surprised when it revealed their company was paying men on average 3.2% more than women working in the same or similar roles. They moved quickly to close the gap for like-for-like roles by giving more than 1600 employees (950 women as well as 700 men, who had been paid slightly less than their female counterparts) a pay rise worth $6 million.

The example provided by the WGEA here shows a 3.2% gender earnings gap in a like-for-like comparison – very different to the gender pay gap of 14.1% or the gender pay gap (full-time total remuneration) of 22.4%. In addition, in this example, nearly as many men received pay raises as women.

What the WGEA has written here, of a small gender earnings gap, is not what they, the mainstream media or even government officials talk about when they make public statements concerning a gender pay gap. Rather the main talking point concerns earnings differences between men and women as a whole. This leads to a very distorted view of the gender earnings gap among the general population. By focussing on the national gender pay gap and the gender pay gap (full-time total remuneration) rather than like-for-like comparisons the WGEA is contributing to this widespread confusion among the populace.

> You can read more about Lion's pay gap analysis at:
> https://www.afr.com/leadership/gender-pay-gap-widens-in-pinkcollar-industries-20171115-gzlsvx
> Another company that closed its like-for-like gender pay gap was Energy Australia. In March this year, the company announced that it would spend $1.2 million so that women and men with equivalent skills and experience would receive the same pay for doing the same job. Around 350 women had their pay increased through a salary review and, in some cases, a one-off adjustment. About 80 men also had their pay adjusted following a review of Energy Australia's employees who were not on enterprise bargaining agreements.
> You can read more about Energy Australia closing its like-for-like gender pay gap at:
> http://www.abc.net.au/news/2018-03-07/energy-australia-closes-gender-pay-gap-overnight/9524770

In a similar case the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) engaged an external agency to assess pay equity. The results of this independent audit of pay rates resulted in more men than women receiving pay raises.

I call on the WGEA, the mainstream media in Australia, and the Australian government to make it clear, in plain language, that:

> There is no evidence of widespread gender discrimination in earnings in Australia.
> The reasons for the gender earnings gap are well understood today as a result of research conducted in > Australia and elsewhere.

> The gender earnings gap is largely a result of choices that men and women make.

My email to the WGEA and their response letter were produced in full here, with the exception of some personal details that were redacted.

Women bishops condemn pipe organ as instrument of 'toxic masculinity' on International Women's Day

Jules Gomes · 7 March 2019 · Archived copy · Original

An unholy row between feminists and organists in the Church of England is brewing after a conference of women bishops issued a pastoral letter calling for a ban on pipe organs in churches and cathedrals.

The liturgical conference on "Toxic Masculinity in the Song of Solomon and the Songs of the Church," organised to celebrate International Women's Day and the 25th Anniversary of the Ordination of Women to the Priesthood, condemned the pipe organ as "an instrument of toxic masculinity."

Rachel Weaktree, Bishop of Glucoseter, told the conference how she was inspired to gather her fellow female bishops to discuss misogyny and music after reading feminist musicologist Susan McClary. Weaktree's keynote address, entitled "Da-da-da-DUM; da-da-da-DUM: Patriarchal Phallic Thrusting in the Opening Notes of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony," explored toxic masculinity in Beethoven.

"We've always thought of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony as a joyous outburst of human solidarity. We have a hymn tune from the symphony's Ode to Joy. But McClary helped me to understand that this symphony tells a more violent story, which is one of rape," Bishop Rachel said, acknowledging both theories were based on McClary's book Feminine Endings: Music, Gender and Sexuality.

Viva Ann Foul, Bishop of Bristle, in her presentation on "Pipe Organs, Pedals and Patriarchal Peremptoriness" explained how her clash with cathedral bells and bell-ringers had opened her eyes to the oppressive potential of certain androgenic musical instruments.

"Pipe organs tend to be loud, aggressive, dominant and overpowering. These are typically male characteristics, as the latest Gillette advertisement demonstrated. The large and erect pipes, often on naked display, are sexual symbols of virile manhood. Some organs are so large and have so many pedals that women feel marginalised, because it requires male testosterone to operate the instrument," Foul said.

"I accept that there are sweeter, gentler and more feminine pipes. But they are pulverised into submission by the coercive masculinity of the Gravissima (64ft), Contra Bombarde (32ft), Contra Trombone (32ft), Ophicleide (16ft) and Contra Tuba (16ft)," Foul pointed out in her power-point presentation.

Foul cited the example of Liverpool Cathedral's pipe organ, the largest in Britain, where the Tuba Magna although only 8ft on 50" of wind is stentorian in tone and the Trompette Millitaire is again only 8ft but also on 50" of wind is annihilatingly loud. "This is a fair image of how small choir boys grow into big toxic males," she said, also noting that pipe organs use up fossil fuels and pump out quantifiable elements of hi-decibel sounds that lead to global warming.

Jenny-Josiah Jimplecute, the Church of England's first transgender bishop, spoke on sexism and racism in the Song of Songs. "King Solomon was a polygamist with 700 wives. He oppressed them by forcing them to share his living quarters in the palace with 300 porcupines," she told the conference.

"Read 1:6 and feel the rabid racism of this song! What does the oppressed female character say in the King James Version? 'Look not upon me, because I am black.' We need to return to Miriam's tambourine as an instrument of feminist empowerment. Get rid of organists and fill our sanctuaries with women playing tambourines," Jimplecute shouted, receiving a standing ovation.

The conference climaxed with guest of honour Cambridge economist and anti-Brexiteer Victoria Buttman, performing John Cage's 4'33" in three movements. "4'33" is 4 minutes and 33 seconds long and is written for any instrument or combination of instruments. The score instructs the performer(s) not to play their instrument(s) during the entire duration of the piece. This is our feminist response to the toxic masculinity of Beethoven's symphonies and bombastic pipe organs," Dr Buttman said.

Victoria Buttman provides the climactic performance of the Women Bishops Conference

Performing in her protest garment of complete nudity, Buttman sat at the piano and, to mark the beginning of the piece, opened the keyboard lid. Some time later she closed it briefly, to mark the end of the first movement. This process was repeated for the second and third movements.

The conference unanimously voted to ban pipe organs in liturgical worship and said it would propose a motion to be debated at the General Synod in York later in July.

Meanwhile, the Royal College of Organists and Organ Grinders (RCOOG), based at Cadence House, 4 Libby Lane, have issued an online petition protesting the ban on pipe organs. "Church organists are part of a gig economy and will be out of work if General Synod votes against the use of pipe organs in liturgical services," John Forte, President of RCOOG told the media.

"However, if they are forced to transition to more feminine instruments like the lute, flute, harp, mandolin, triangle and tambourine, we will do it if only to end toxic masculinity. The House of Bishops has already given us permission to adapt the baptismal rite for transgender transitions to mark the transitioning of our musicians from organists to harpists, flautists, and so on," Forte said.

A statement from Lambeth Palace said that the Archbishop of Canterbury Justin Welby was standing with the women bishops and would not permit pipe organs at the Lambeth Conference in 2020. "We also see pipe organs as a symbol of Western colonialism and white supremacy. We apologise for the 'white man's music.' It is time we heard the sound of Indian sitars, African drums, and Aboriginal Didgeridoos accompany our discourse of Indaba, good disagreement and Yabba-Dabba-Doo."

Why we're doubling Elizabeth Hobson's salary #InternationalWomensDay

Mike Buchanan · 9 March 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Elizabeth Hobson, our Director of Communications, is proving to be a bigger asset to J4MB (and, in turn, the wider MRM) than even we had anticipated. She'll be giving a talk, as I shall, at the Chicago conference in August. I recommend you order your tickets now, I happen to know they're selling like hot cakes.

In the space of just six days leading up to and including International Women's Day, Elizabeth was a central figure in four activities:

Sunday, 3 March: Demonstrating with other non-feminists outside #MarchForWomen, Westminster Hall, London (video, 51:14)

Monday, 4 March: Asking women passing by the Millicent Fawcett statue in Parliament Square, London, if they agreed men and women should have equal rights (video, 16:54)

Tuesday, 5 March: Debating with a feminist in Oxford Town Hall (video, 1:33:24)

Friday, 8 March, International Wimmin's Day: Debating with a member of the Wimmin's Equality Party on BBC Radio Kent (audio, 8:02) – Elizabeth did very well, considering she was given outrageously little time to contribute to the discussion

In common with everyone who works for J4MB, including myself, Elizabeth is on a salary of £0.00 p.a. In recognition of her valuable contributions to J4MB and the wider MRM, and with the agreement of The Patriarchy Council, we are with immediate effect doubling her salary. If she carries on performing as well as she has been since her appointment, we'll be doubling her salary every year, going forward.

I invite followers of this blog to post comments in appreciation of this fine young woman.

Fearless Girl

Mark Dent · 9 March 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Fearless Girl has been unveiled in Melbourne. She stands proudly, defiantly in Federation Square.

She is a symbol of the fight for gender equality. She is the visible cry for wage equity, girl power, female empowerment and a tribute to the undervalued and often unrecognized courage and sheer perfection of the female species.

I don't know if this shit avalanche is ever going to abate. I keep waiting, hoping that the worst is behind us and that the blatant lies and inherent bigotry spouted by feminists will eventually come back to haunt them and ultimately lead to the demise of this damaging ideology.

Nope.

There she stands- a defiant little piece of work with a look I have become familiar with in recent years. It seems to say, "I'm a girl, do you have a problem with that?"

The statue encapsulates the unbounded sense of entitlement and pure arrogance of those who have been force fed the feminist agenda.

I think of the endless attacks on masculinity and young boys in our media and in our education system. If any gender was crying out for a symbol to remind them that they are brave and smart and filled with untold potential it is our young boys.

Honesty has always been an enormously high priority in my life. I have never been able to comprehend the way so many people can very deliberately and willfully misrepresent an opposing position or argument in order to score cheap points. I cannot to this day, understand how an ideology built entirely upon a foundation of lies, half truths and myths has not only flourished but continued to gain power in all of the most influential platforms in Western society.

Just this week I watched Senator David Leyonhjelm question an all-female work gender equity panel in parliament. He exposed their ignorance and their absolutely shameless disregard for the welfare of men in an area that literally is a matter of life and death. He wanted to know if this panel, who claims to be passionate about gender equity in the workplace, were concerned about the gender death gap in the workplace.

What about the death gap in the workplace?

Please watch this relatively brief clip. Look carefully at the faces of the women as they respond to David's probing questions. Irritated by his persistence over something as insignificant as the deaths of men in their place of work, they present that familiar stony faced, impenetrable wall of indifference. The woman who feigns concern at the end of the clip is beneath contempt. She knows men have nowhere to turn yet dares to suggest otherwise.

I actually find David's excellent questioning of these women and the group behind our government's domestic violence campaign ultimately unsatisfying. He is softly spoken, polite and controlled. Even when he exposes their callous disregard for the well being of men in the workplace he registers no disgust, no hint of anger or follow up challenge to their poker faced defiance.

Why not show some genuine emotion? Why shouldn't he call out their hypocrisy by asking how concerned they would be about workplace safety if 95% of all fatalities were female?

Don't get angry, Mark. You lose the argument when you become emotional.

I am longing to see genuine, righteous anger from a man with a voice and platform to display it. How could anyone confronted with this astonishingly blatant contempt for the lives of men, react with anything other than anger?

I am tired of this gentle probing and apologetic questioning of some of the most blatant examples of gender bigotry happening in our very midst every day.

Back to Fearless Girl. Let's read the words of Claire Rogers CEO of World Vision Australia.

> It's right for Fearless Girl to be a fixture in Melbourne, without a fearless boy beside her. We must not ignore the challenges — in Australia and in the rest of the world — that are exclusive to women and girls.

There it is. We must not ignore the challenges that are exclusive to women and girls. This statement infers that we are already focusing all our attention upon challenges that are exclusive to men and boys. It also implies that there has been no attention given to issues that are exclusive to women and girls. Both inferences are false.

Our governments have given their undivided attention to issues that are exclusive to women and girls for decades. Look at the hundreds of millions of dollars in funding given to problems deemed to be negatively impacting females. Whether it be domestic violence, health or the use of quotas and incentives — women and girls have been the beneficiaries of a level of support men and boys could only dream about.

Women in Engineering and College of leadership and Management Dinner – Quotas in the workplace

Men die earlier but women's health gets four times more funding

The Greens have announced a pre-election pledge of $5.3 billion for Australian women

Our education system prioritizes the needs of girls over boys from preschool through to university. In a profession dominated by female teachers and feminist bias our boys are being demonized and belittled throughout their many years spent in the system. If not always explicit, the tone and attitude of so many people when the "problem with men" is being discussed, would leave no boy in any doubt as to the contempt in which his male peers are held.

UK's university gender gap is a national scandal, says thinktank

Rogers goes on to write:

> Women make up more than half of the population but from government to board rooms, we are woefully under-represented.

It is simply astonishing how often utter bigots like Ms. Rogers can spew such absolute tosh without apparent shame or embarrassment. This woman is a CEO so one must assume she is highly educated and has a modicum of intelligence.

Being a CEO herself, Rogers appears to prove the very salient point that women can indeed become CEO's or government ministers if they have the drive and inclination-pretty much the same qualities a man seeking such a position would need to possess.

She seems to suggest there are laws or obstacles placed in front of women to prevent them from achieving these positions. There are none. Every woman who wishes to enter politics may do so. Every woman who wishes to become a CEO is most welcome to enter the business of her choice and through ambition, sacrifice and talent, achieve her ultimate goal. For every man who has become a CEO there are a hundred who had the same goal but failed. Was it sexism or bias which prevented these men from achieving success?

Why do so many women like Claire Rogers cherry pick statistics? She demands equal representation of women in government and management but not in ditch digging and bricklaying. No mention of the alarming workplace death gap. She has no concerns about the domination of the education system by women-an incredibly powerful platform for brainwashing our youth with their poisonous ideology and has made no demands for this imbalance to be addressed.

The bigot continues:

> We've come a long way, but there is much more to do. Early childhood marriage is one battlefront. Education is another. According to the World Bank, 132 million girls around the world between the ages of six and 17 are still not in school.

Two of the interesting facts on children and education around the world:

- Nearly 70 million children around the world today cannot get a basic education. More than half are girls. Meaning nearly half are boys!
- Of the 123 million young people between the ages of 15 and 24 who cannot read or write, 61 percent of them are women. So, 39% of our young illiterate people are male. Yet they remain entirely unworthy of even a mention.

> Research shows the cost of not educating those girls reaches into the trillions of dollars.
> And more than 500 women and adolescent girls die from pregnancy and childbirth complications in emergency settings. Every. Single. Day.

How does she sleep at night? Imagine a male doctor expressing his distress over the fact that so many of the males in his oncology ward die. How is this shit any different? Millions of boys receive zero or minimal education. Does she give a toss about them? How can any human claiming the mantle of being a person of compassion and virtue entirely dismiss the suffering of millions because of their genitalia?

How many fucking men and boys die in wars they were forced into, workplaces they are laboring in or by their own hand to escape their privileged, entitled lives? Every. Single. Day.

The disparity between male and female suicides in some of these countries is stunning.

I will guarantee Claire Rogers that it is men who are at the forefront of the fight to lessen the prospects of women dying due to pregnancy complications. She writes as if there is a world- wide plot concocted by men to allow women to die during childbirth.

Perhaps the husbands and fathers of these women don't want their wives or daughters to survive nor do they want their children or grandchildren to live. I challenge her to point to the women who are doing all that is in their power to stop males from killing themselves in the most shocking numbers every year or preventing young boys from being forced into labor camps or armies at the point of a gun or blade. No-one would dream of insinuating that the countless ways males suffer in this world is all attributable to women and their callous indifference, yet men must carry the burden of responsibility for everything that negatively impacts a female's life.

Rogers writes as if the world is one in which hunger, pain, grief, oppression and suffering only touches females. This world seems to afford males, regardless of their geographical location or their societal status, a protection from the vicissitudes women must endure. It is a lie:

> Poverty affects women more than men.
> www.csrtimes.com/community-articles/poverty-affects-women-more/KpjqnefPJl
> Climate change has a more damaging impact on women and girls.
> https://www.bbc.com/news/science-environment-43294221

> https://www.nrdc.org/stories/how-climate-change-impacts-women
> Women are the primary victims of war.
> https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Wyv4TOSJ_yE

You've heard this absolute garbage spewed before. It flies in the face of everything our life experience teaches us, yet you can rest assured that the children who complete their education under the care of feminist ideologs believe it.

Rogers has more to say:

> Men and boys reap rewards from increased women's health standards.

The old, "feminism and female empowerment is really the empowerment of men and boys too!"

What a patronizingly sick joke. If only men believed they too would derive some benefit and empowerment by stopping their evil oppression of women, they would stop allowing women to die in childbirth or desist from deliberately preventing their daughters from achieving their dreams. If men could just be convinced that they will get something back if they treated women and girls fairly -why the sky is the limit!

Here doggy, good boy fetch the bone!

Rogers completes her article with this advice:

> Supporting and empowering girls and women, whether in Australia or overseas, advances us.
> So, what about Fearless Boy?
> Take your son to see Fearless Girl. Take a photo of him standing at her side. Explain the importance of International Women's Day. Make him the fearless boy.

Take you son to see Fearless Girl. Perhaps the same boy who has been told he must respect all women and girls because they have vaginas. He has never been told men and boys are worthy of the same respect.

Male teacher speaks out against respect programs in Aust schools-hatred of men.

Perhaps the same boy who has sat quietly in the corner of the family loungeroom, watching the tv with a sense of confusion and shame as yet another government funded advertisement depicts a boy of his age hitting and hurting girls, because that is exactly what boys his age like to do.

Perhaps the same boy who sees his gender constantly branded culpable for all of the woes in our society and belittled and denigrated by the leaders of his country — many of them men.

And so a statue of Fearless Girl is erected in Federation Square.

It is the boys of this generation who have reason to be fearful. It is boys of this generation who will require courage to negotiate the endless pitfalls and traps ready to ensnare them should they misspeak, have a bad sexual encounter or wish to apply for a job which specifically states no men need apply.

Perhaps he will become enmeshed in a relationship with a violent, manipulative woman and have to find a way out without losing his mind and all of his money. Perhaps he will have his children torn from his life for no other reason because his female partner can do just that and there's not one fucking thing a human with a penis can do about it.

Fearless Girl.

My dad taught me at a very young age that fearless people are not brave.

Fearlessness is not to be admired. It is those who feel fear but still choose to confront and overcome it who are most deserving of our admiration.

Perhaps that is why most of my heroes are men.

ICMI'19 in Chicago is going to be a humdinger. Please help us document it.

Folks, every year since the second ICMI Anthony Corniche has traveled the planet (largely at his own expense) to take and produce professional quality videos of the speeches so that we can freely distribute them to the world. In that respect, his work has been invaluable. Not everyone can make an ICMI, but thanks to Anthony everyone can enjoy the talks.

Please follow the link below and toss in something to help him out with this important work. You can get your name in the credits. ICMI'19 in Chicago this August is turning out to be a veritable who's who of free speech advocates. We are looking forward to sharing what they have to say with the rest of the world.

ManWomanMyth: “Truth, Lies, and the War on Men” – the complete video collection

Mike Buchanan · 14 March 2019 · Archived copy · Original

ManWomanMyth (MWM) was a highly influential British vlogger who published well over 100 videos on his YouTube channel during the 10+ years leading up to 2015, when the channel was taken down. MWM is no longer active, sadly, but we know he’s pleased his work remains valued by MRAs worldwide. Fortunately some MRAs had taken copies of the content before the channel was taken down, which is why they remain available on YouTube and elsewhere to this day.

Individual “mirrors” usually contain some videos which have been pulled for alleged copyright infringements, and none of them have contained all of the output of MWM. The most comprehensive developed to date is (we believe) this, but it excludes five important videos on “misandry and intimacy”. The original posted videos attracted huge numbers of views, the re-posted videos fewer. They deserve many more.

We recently set ourselves the task of putting into a new J4MB playlist all the known output of MWM, and that playlist (114 videos) is here. Most of the videos were drawn from the aforementioned “mirror”. If you know of any videos we’ve missed, please let us know, and we’ll add them immediately. Thank you.

If you haven’t seen any of MWM’s output before, we recommend you start with Female Supremacy (video below). It starts with a clip from a decidedly un-PC Two Ronnies sketch, the likes of which the BBC would never make today. The occasional flashes of humour in the videos are welcome. A video on the iniquity of men and women winning the same prize money at Wimbledon starts with, “Game, Set, and Snatch”.

Girls feelings are far more important than the truth

Mark Dent · 16 March 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Imagine if you will, a primary school situated somewhere in a leafy suburb of Melbourne.

It is a girl's school. Each day the girls are taught many lessons, but one of them is driven home on a daily basis. The lesson is that one plus one equals three. Just in case the instructions from the teacher are not planting this fundamental truth deeply enough into their young minds, the walls of the school corridors are covered with posters reminding the girls that 1+1= 3. When the girls leave school at the end of the day there is a very large billboard just across the road from the school gates which features letters two metres high alerting the girls to the fact that 1+1=3.

Late in the final term of the year the girls are given a test to see what they have learned in the subject of numeracy.

The test results reveal that nine out of ten girls in the school believe that 1+1=3. The staff is stunned. They cannot believe that these young women accept this mathematical equation as true.

Armed with their results they approach the government and demand that more money, support and positive discrimination is required in all schools so that this alarming belief is no longer held by the girls in our education system.

In what possible world could such an absurd, insane set of circumstances occur?

Well, right here in Australia.

You see, I was alerted to the fact that nine out of ten girls feel they are not treated equally with boys.

The article claims:

> A landmark study of 600 girls aged 16-19 reveals young women believe sexism is rife in Australia, with one third claiming it would be easier to get their dream job if they were male.

One of the girls, Olivia, aged 16 offered this comment:

> The numbers are really shocking, that so many girls feel this way.

The article goes on to report:

> More than half of the teenage girls say they are seldom or never valued for their brains over their looks.
> One in three girls did more housework than their brothers.
> Just one in six girls feel they are given the same opportunities to get ahead in life as the boys.

Our friend Olivia said she and her friends Talk about pay gaps a lot.

How shocking. A group of girls raised in a country which tells them every day that they are oppressed, paid less for the same work, and have a one in three chance of being raped or beaten by a man actually believe it. Of course, they are also told males are privileged and we live in a patriarchal society.

Hold on to your hat:

GIRLS identified higher levels of equality in Nicaragua and Ecuador than in Australia.

What an outrage. Young, privileged women leave their place of education believing the country which provides them with every possible entitlement, is in fact more oppressive than dictatorial regimes. It is criminal behaviour. It is poisoning our society. Today we are seeing the fruits of this indoctrination in the utter self-absorption of so many young women and their open contempt for males.

These lessons begin in primary school. The boys sit, quietly ashamed as the class is told boys must learn to respect girls and women. When they go home at night advertisements by a bank tell them they are privileged because their parents pay them more pocket money because they are a boy. They are informed that when they grow up their boss will pay them more than females doing the same job just because they have a penis.

They will be portrayed as girl bashers and bullies whose natural instinct is to harm those they believe to be weak and vulnerable.

By the time young women leave our feminised universities they have been brainwashed with these lies and distortions for the best part of their lives.

Note too, that being characterised as a victim brings a sense of delicious comfort to the oppressed because any failure in their personal or working life can simply be attributed to the inequality and sexism in our society.

And here it is, one more time:

with one third claiming it would be easier to get their dream job if they were male.

[image]
The first 10 female officers to graduate from the Air Force Undergraduate Pilot Training Program pose for a group photo in front of a T-38 training aircraft.
Of course, not getting their dream job could not possibly have anything to do with their lack of appropriate skills, drive, passion, dedication or personality.

But the most disturbing aspect of this disgustingly twisted survey is the fact that women in positions of power and influence have grabbed it and are holding it up as proof of the ongoing gender inequality in our country.

Plan International deputy chief Susanne Legena said it was:

> Greatly concerning that girls in 2016 are saying they don't feel valued for their intellect and opinions.

Our Watch Chief Executive Mary Barry said:

> Violence against women begins with gender inequality.

Watch as Senator David Leyonhjelm calmly dismantles this ludicrous claim.

> As long as girls and woman are seen as less than equal than men and boys, violence against women will continue.
> As this survey shows, we have a long way to go to achieve gender equality in Australia.

Sickeningly Machiavellian isn't it? Perhaps Orwellian would be a better description of this disgraceful ruse.

Note that not one girl or women could cite one example of actual discrimination of females or entitlement and privilege granted to males.

It was all about how the girls feel. How can a girl prove to anyone that her intellect is not valued by others? How many young men feel their opinions count for nought? We will never know because no-one will ever ask them.

We do know that boys in our secondary schools and universities are not allowed to offer any opinions unless they conform to the strict feminist narrative. Yet this article and report focuses on females who as we speak make up the large majority of students attending universities, with the gender gap growing every year.

And these deceitful, manipulative, powerful women pretend to be shocked by the fact that young women feel they are disadvantaged, though fully aware that this message has been forced down their collective throats for years.

How often do we hear: We have a long way to go…." Which is code for:

We must continue to push the lie and illusion that women are disadvantaged and oppressed so we can continue to get truckloads of cash and entitlements from the next batch of cowardly, gullible male politicians who dance to the feminist tune.

Every time I think the world is slowly coming out of the nightmare stupor of four decades of male denigration and hatred I come across articles like this and I realise how far we have to go and how deeply corrupt and deceitful out media and governments are.

Girls routinely outperform boys in school

> "Yet again, the girls have well and truly outperformed the boys, it is about a 70/30 split in terms of girls who have topped courses as opposed to boys," said NSW Education Minister Adrian Piccoli.

What a perverse form of oppression. The oppressed out-perform their oppressors in education. The oppressed outlive their oppressors. The oppressed receive more funding for their health despite the fact their oppressors die years earlier. The oppressed are far safer and more comfortable in their place of employment.

Article: 97 Workplace Deaths in 2018

Note again the sudden absence of gender specific language when we are reporting on a problem which overwhelmingly affects men? Is it not sickening? Can you imagine such a neutral report if 95 of those killed were women?

The oppressors outnumber the oppressed on our streets on cold winter nights.

As Alice once remarked:

"Curiouser and curiouser!" (she was so much surprised, that for the moment she quite forgot how to speak good English)."

Feminist Clitoral Propaganda and the Politics of Bonking

Bettina Arndt · 19 March 2019 · Archived copy · Original

In this video Bettina Arndt talks about feminism's influence on sex research. Bettina notes:

> This week I have made a video about The Politics of Bonking. It's all a bit of fun but also raises some serious issues about how feminism is distorting research into the most intimate aspects of our lives.
> To explain a little more. We're living through an era of what Germaine Greer called "veritable clitoromania" where feminists for decades have been promoting the idea that the clitoris is the gold standard of women's sexual response and the vagina is dead in the water. According to many feminists, women who climax easily during bonking are simply a figment of men's pornographic imagination. The joys of bonking have been redefined as masculine self-indulgence – men exercising patriarchal power over miserable, clitorally-deprived women.

Should prostitution be decriminalized?

Philip Carl Salzman · 22 March 2019 · Archived copy · Original

In late February 2019, Robert Kraft, billionaire and owner of the New England Patriots, was one of more than a hundred people facing charges of soliciting prostitution for attending central Florida day spas and massage parlors, such as the Orchids of Asia Day Spa. Several employees have also been charged with racketeering, deriving support from proceeds of prostitution and engaging or maintaining a place of prostitution. This investigation is part of a crackdown on sex trafficking.

Sweden's "feminist government," as it proudly calls itself, has criminalized the purchase of sex. Although prostitution is legal, and prostitutes are not arrested, being a client of a prostitute is illegal, and clients are being arrested, and incarcerated for up to one year for a single offense. This is a nice example of Swedish feminist "equality." According to The Independent, this Swedish model has been adopted by Norway, Iceland, and, more recently, Canada and Northern Ireland, all Nordic countries heavily influenced by anti-male feminism.

Other advanced Europeans countries, notably Germany, Switzerland, and Greece, have entirely decriminalized prostitution, making voluntary contracts for sexual services legal. No one gets arrested; no one gets incarcerated. The Swedish model of criminalizing clients of prostitutes has come under considerable criticism, not least because of the harm it brings to prostitutes.

In 2016, Amnesty International formally adopted a policy advocating decriminalization of all consensual acts of purchasing sex, saying that "the criminalisation of adult consensual sex work interferes with the realisation of the human rights of sex workers." AI went on to say ""We want laws to be refocused on making sex workers' lives safer and improving the relationship they have with the police, while addressing the very real issue of exploitation. We want governments to make sure no one is coerced to sell sex, or is unable to leave sex work if they choose to."

Any sociologist could tell you that prohibiting behavior by law is not the ideal way to influence people. In recent times, the 1920-1933 American experiment with prohibiting the producing, selling, and consuming of alcohol was a shambles, until it was finally cancelled. But it did produce many enterprising characters, such as Al Capone, Bugs Moran, and Machine Gun Kelley, as well as a lively liquor export business from Canada.

The official American "War on Drugs," going on for the past fifty years, has been a boon for the law enforcement and prison business, but could it be said to have reduced the consumption of drugs? Some U.S. States and Canada have capitulated, legalizing marijuana, and in some jurisdictions the government has become the producer and seller.

Will the cold Nordic countries succeed in wiping out prostitution by victimizing customers rather than prostitutes? While it may please some feminists to punish men, it seems unlikely that such measures will remove the will to establish such relations. After all, the age when sexuality was highly restricted, with Church backing and community pressure, is long gone. Today among young people the 'hook-up" culture is normal, and promiscuity is the statistical fact. As well, the prohibition of a voluntary and consensual contract between two free adults is seen as an arbitrary and unnecessary diminution of freedom.

While sex trafficking, minors in prostitution, and pimp-controlled prostitutes are violations of human rights that should and must be suppressed, voluntary relations of adults for the exchange of money and sexual services should not be criminalized.

Final victory for Vladek Filler!

Robert Franklin · 23 March 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Call it Everyman's "Shawshank Redemption." Vladek Filler has won again (Bangor Daily News, 3/16/19). His victory is now complete. On March 12, federal Judge John Woodcock issued his ruling awarding Filler $1.77 million in damages for his illegal and immoral persecution by various authorities of the cities of Gouldsboro and Ellsworth, and Hancock and Washington counties. (The award is against a single person, Linda Gleason. Filler previously settled out of court with other defendants.) Perhaps more important than that award though was this statement in open court by Judge Woodcock:

> And this is really, from a judicial perspective, it's just appalling. I can't say how sorry I am to you that you had such a terrible experience with the criminal justice system in this country and in this state. There's no excuse for what happened to you. I know that you were born in Kiev. Not far from Kiev is Prague. In Prague, there was an author named Franz Kafka, and he wrote a book called The Trial about a man who is subjected to a malicious and befuddling and horrific trial system, and, unfortunately, you're a living embodiment of what Franz Kafka wrote about. And I'm just terribly sorry it happened to you; there is just absolutely no excuse."

The final message of Filler's story is that a person can, by being right, strong, calm and persistent, prevail over seemingly insuperable odds, over a system of state power that's rigged against him.

I won't reprise the facts of Filler's case. I've written about it numerous times before. But here are a few of the people and "powers that be" over whom he prevailed:

> His ex-wife who, fearing the loss of custody of their kids, leveled false allegations of sexual abuse and child abuse at him. Filler proved her allegations to be false and won sole custody of the children.

> One assistant district attorney who prosecuted him for rape knowing him to be innocent of the charge. Filler proved himself to be innocent of the charge despite ADA Mary Kellett having lied to the police, lied to the judge, lied to the jury, lied to the press and violated the rules of procedure, the rules of evidence and at least seven ethical requirements for prosecutors. Filler's persistence caused Kellett to resign her job as ADA and become the first and only prosecutor in the history of the state to be disciplined by the state bar association.

> Numerous police officers who worked hand-in-glove with Kellett to try to railroad an innocent man into prison. Filler demonstrated their malfeasance in his civil suit against them. Rather than face a jury, the police settled that case out of court.

Filler prevailed in two attempts to find him guilty of criminal wrongdoing. He forced the state bar to discipline an assistant District Attorney and won significant money damages from numerous individuals and state entities. He is completely exonerated and they are disgraced. The only irony remaining is that the only person to yet apologize to Filler is Judge Woodcock, a man who's never wronged him.

The criminal justice system is in many ways stacked against defendants. Even the innocent sometimes go to prison. But Vladek Filler proved that an innocent man can defeat the power of the state.

The family court system too is in many ways stacked against fathers, particularly when sexual assault allegations (i.e. the "silver bullet) are made against them. But Vladek Filler has proven that being in the right plus strength and perseverance can win the day.

For all those things, he stands as a beacon of hope to every innocent person who must confront and fight judicial systems that sometimes seem Kafkaesque.

Indirect Activism – and its harm on male progress

Xavier Jones · 28 March 2019 · Archived copy · Original

When you think of activism, you think of two things: civil rights and individual virtue. The goal of civil rights is to offer political, financial, and social equality for a group of people who are disadvantaged. Individual virtue puts value on personal accomplishments. The two of these strategies are commonplace terminologies in the world of egalitarianism. However, there are two separate strategies that should be used to describe men's issues: direct vs indirect activism. This strategical divide is a confirmation of what level of action you prefer to take in the face of injustice. This piece talks in great detail about indirect activism and its contrast to direct activism.

Feminists claim that the goal of their movement is to fight for equality of the sexes. And they even go as far as to claim that the movement helps both men and women. Men, however, are very skeptical of this notion. And they have every right to be. Starting with the obvious elephant in the room — the goddam title of their movement. Continuing with their nonchalant attitude (and dismissive victim-blaming responses) towards male suffering (Why Can't We Hate Men?, drinking male tears, men's rights are nothing, A Scary Time). Ending with their lazy and inconsistent patriarchy narrative — which implies that men receive all the benefits in society, while women are always on the losing end. Despite all of that, feminists were given the benefit of the doubt (dare I say due process) to prove that they aren't anti-male and that they are champions on men's issues.

But how does this work? How do they prove their supposed assertion that men benefit greatly from their ideology? They accomplish this by pointing to the men's movements that they support. "Umm…what men's movements?" you might ask. Well, there is a male-wing of the women's movement, which claims to fight for men's issues using feminist ideology. I'm sure a lot of you aren't aware of these men's movements. That's because the only time these factions slide across a feminist's tongue is when their own movement is called out for not living up to their declared goal of sexual equality. They never had much of an intention to fight against men's disadvantages. They just needed a movement to be used as tokenism to recruit more men. And thus 'indirect activism' was born.

Indirect activism is a passive level of action used as a substitute for male progress. Instead of attempting to remove the societal disadvantages on men, they choose to substitute the traditional human rights approach of fixing inequality. While women were expected to get immediate justice, Men were expected to encounter gradual change. This trickle-down theory comes from the heavily flawed belief that by helping women, you will subsequently benefit men. Examples of their logic:

- If women get their voting rights & the ability to participate in the army, then men would no longer have to worry about signing up for selective service.
- If women have abortions and take birth control pills, men won't have to worry about paying child support.
- If the media portrays women as strong empowered heroes who are just as physically as capable as men (ignoring biology), maybe society can start taking violence against men more seriously.
- If businesses start employing women, men will no longer have this financial burden of being seen as the breadwinner.
- If we invest more money and attention in women's health, men's health will inevitably be tackled afterwards

The problem with this theory is that it's nothing new. It's been tried for nearly a century now. The men's movements that present these philosophies (National Organization for Men Against Sexism, White Ribbon Campaign, #HeForShe, etc.) have been getting social and political progress in areas where women have perceived disadvantages. And, as you all know, this has had little effect on how men are treated in society.

- Women got the right to vote in 1920. Here we are nearly 100 years later and men are still required to sign up for selective service.
- The pro-choice movement is one of the largest movements in the world, bills continue to pass in order to give women more access to contraception. So far, this epidemic of unfair child support hasn't stopped-one can even argue that it has gotten even more out of control.

- For the past 60 years women have started to be portrayed as powerful heroes through comics, cartoons, and movies. There is still a large lack of domestic violence shelters for men in society. There are very little campaigns condemning the androcide that men face on a daily basis.
- We now live in a society where men and women being employed is pretty commonplace. And so far, men still have to take care of women. The difference being that now women just manipulate innocent men into paying for their lifestyle. This is a scenario known as the "gold digger" epidemic.
- And after all of the years of financial focus on women who suffer from lack of health funding, there is still little investment of men's health.

One of the leading reasons that society allows all of these prejudices against men, stems from a level of gynocentrism in many aspects of life. We as humans have been socialized to view women as heavenly, defenseless, and in need of rescue. And by focusing all of the attention of sexual equality on women's issues, this only furthers the gynocentric notions that plague the general public. This becomes a problem, as it's completely inconsistent with the results that men were supposed to be receiving. The feminist movement were expected to create a wave of men and women who are warriors for sexual equality. Instead, they created a block of female chauvinists and male saviors.

In order to keep up the pro-men facade, feminists have come up with a new indirect model (even more passive than their trickle-down theory) for men: male liberation. Men were always suffering from unfair burdens put on them. Their sexuality, economic responsibilities, armed services, prison rates, and so forth. We have been asking to be freed from this weight for a very long time. It would only make sense for liberation to be the answer to our issues. But, of course, the name is a misleading title used to attract vulnerable men to their cause. Male liberation does, indeed, free men from harmful gender roles-just not the ones that men asked for.

Male liberation is a finger wagging philosophy that seeks to shame men into acting more feminine while denouncing their masculine traits. They want more men to embrace womanhood, while emancipating men from their masculinity. By using the words "toxic masculinity", without any consistent characteristic, men will be freed from this dangerous prison called "manhood". Their focus is 10% on the male victims and 90% on the male perpetrators-which they use to rationalize why emasculation is completely necessary. And just to cement this charade of male progress, gynocentric men (the men's liberation movement comes to mind) are used as a form of tokenism in order to add to the illusion of men having support. Women can now tell themselves that they are in support of men without having the burden of actually providing results. Men, however, will continue to suffer-which is no skin off of their bones.

Decades after seeing little improvement on male life, men said "enough is enough". They called feminists out for their lack of accomplishments on men's issues. Of course, feminists denied this, and rushed to silence opposition. But it wasn't as effective as they expected. Men started to backlash against the movement for their shortcomings on men's issues, demanding answers. Criticizing them for not living up to the hype that they built up for themselves. This led to feminists asking why men don't start their own movements instead of being upset at feminists-a clear deflection from the fact that they weren't even fighting for men like they promised. They were honestly confused on why feminists weren't allowed to call themselves a movement for both genders while fighting for one. It was almost as if you had to let them know that 1+1=2. However, men came to the conclusion that starting their own movements would help. And this is where direct activism comes into play.

Direct activism, unlike indirect, is a vigorous form of necessary action used to progress and benefit a disadvantaged demographic-in this instance men. These assertive activists will start by bringing attention to all of men's injustices, while requesting sympathy and understanding of men's pain (i.e. A Voice for Men). After gathering up a sizable amount of men (Men's Rights Activists) and well-meaning women (Honey Badgers), their job is to fight tirelessly to remove that burden being placed on men. This can be accomplished-using a civil rights approach-by discrimination lawsuits (National Coalition For Men), policy proposals (Justice For Men and Boys), resource centers (Father's Rights Movement), & starting charities (Campaign Against Living Miserably). And if fighting through legality isn't your thing, you could always go the individual virtue route-connecting with your spirituality (Promise Keepers), boycotting romantic relationships (Men Going Their Own Way), & creating social support spaces (The Mankind Project).

Conveniently, each of these men's movements have been viciously attacked and slandered by the feminist movement. Every men's movement that advocates for direct results, makes feminists uncomfortable (surprise). Feminists suggested that men start their own movement-in response to their own movement being called out for its shortcomings. And now that men do that very thing, feminists lead ferocious campaigns any progress these men's movements attempt to make. Writing disparaging articles in order to belittle any man who dares to fight for legal human rights. Boycotting any media that allows a platform for these men's organizations. Threatening to use their political influence to vote against any politician seen giving the movement the time of day. And, eventually rioting against any men's advocate who tries to show up to any speaking events. The actions of the women's movement highlights their true intentions and gives us a clear depiction of the difference between direct & indirect activism.

Indirect activists notices that men have legal, financial, political, and social inequality. But they're fine looking the other way. They're too busy telling men to be better people, focusing on "toxic masculinity"-without giving a consistent separation between the toxic and healthy characteristics, and telling men to give up any gender roles that don't benefit women-while yelling "man up!" when men are faced with their own issues. Direct activists, on the other hand, are a lot more urgent. They want justice and they are willing to argue and fight back against anyone stopping them from getting it done-be it media, government, businesses, colleges, or feminists. They aren't waiting for women to have an epiphany or transformation on their privileges. Laws that disadvantage men were a target for them to remove. And this, in return, makes them a target for feminists to remove.

The feminist movement isn't all about justice, per say-it's not even all about bigotry. It's about representation. Movements are like politicians. Their job is to speak on behalf of their constituents. Women are the constituents of the feminist movement and therefore have to be given positive reception at all costs. Whether it be for justice or bigotry, it's the job of the feminist movement to rationalize even the most indefensible actions of feminine America. In this case, women are incredibly fearful of the day that they would lose their privileges. Anyone who manages to be a threat to those privileges are immediately perceived to be a threat to women-most notably the men's rights movement. Women can't do anything about these movements, on their own. They need support through establishments, financial investment, and media platforms-and this is where the feminist movement comes in to represent women. Feminist movements have a lot more political positions, funding, media attention, articles, and social support than men's movements. And they abuse that power to prevent a populist movement from gaining any form of attention and success.

- If MRAs bring too much attention to men's movement through social media, feminist respond by harassing MRA accounts. Reporting them to twitter. Comparing their movement to hate organizations. And asking the question, "Why don't MRAs open up more instead of spending all of their time on the internet?"
- If MRAs write books, make documentaries, or set up conferences about men's issues (like The Red Pill or The Myth of Male Power) feminists respond with unnecessary protests. They pull fire alarms, give bomb threats, riot in the streets, and destroy property. So that leads to their new argument "Why don't MRAs march the streets like everyone else?"
- If MRAs march the streets (Sydney Watson's march for men), feminists respond with counter protests, inaccurate coverage of the event, slandering of the people involved, and more threats of violence. Which gets you to their new question "Why don't MRAs try demand the government pass policies for men instead of complaining about their problems?"
- If MRAs attempt to pass policies through lawsuits and boycotts (most notably through the National Coalition for Men and the father's rights movement), feminists write libelous articles, urging Americans to fight against any form of action taken against the movement in the name of equality-oh, the irony. Which leads them to their latest form of criticism “MRAs don’t get anything done”

- Whenever MRAs get invitations to political meetings to change policies that hurt men (fixing title IX, National Coalition for Men vs Selective Service System) feminists threaten to vote out politicians who even give them the time of day. They give threats to counter sue. And they demand the laws be overturned.
- After these men’s issues gain notable popularity or get legal notification, feminists swoop in to take the credit. They call it a “feminist issue” and claim that this was what they were supposedly fighting for from the get-go.
- They eventually use their influence (through journalism, documentaries, books, conferences, and interviews) to rewrite history and give all of the credit to the feminist movement. So, after all of the work that MRAs do, feminists give themselves all of the credit.

The purpose of this article is to get you to understand what feminists mean when they say “We do support men. Here are the men’s movements that we support” or “Helping men is a part of feminism”. All of the men’s movements that they support are movements that promote passive activism. Movements that have no intention of removing the societal burdens than men bare the chunk of. And any and all levels of direct activism that men promote will be dismissed and fought against. So, the next time a feminist tells you that they support men, it’s time to hold their fight to the fire. Ask them what male policies they are fighting to pass. Anything less, will no longer stand. It’s time for men to get together and let them know that we’ve had enough of these oblique campaigns. It’s time to put up or shut up. If they can’t fight for men’s issues, then they can get out of the way and make room for a group of people who can.

Theatre review: Feminist show Queen C is a modern TRIUMPH to empower both women and men

Mahatma Gandhi once wrote:

> First they ignore you, then they ridicule you, then they fight you, then you win.

Feminists – being considerably slower than normal women – are clearly still on the second stage.

My thanks to Sally for pointing me to this piece published online by the Express. It's about Queen C, the latest testament to feminists' fathomless self-absorption and narcissism. The writer of the article is Sam Stevenson, a mangina. Extracts:

> ZANY and daring, Queen C Sacred or Profane? is an important work for theatregoers to behold.
> Deborah Ward and China Fish's fearless feminist sketch show will empower women and men alike. The radical play evokes a heady mishmash of the endearing absurdity of The Mighty Boosh, with lashings of The Vagina Monologues thrown in for good measure. Sponsored by Lunette menstrual cup and made possible with Arts Council funding, [J4MB: In plain English, "made possible" by money extracted from taxpayers – mainly men, who pay almost 75% of the income taxes collected in the UK] the Hannah Elsy production aims to shed light on women's issues of the day [J4MB: What a refeshing change from the relentless shedding of light on men's issues] through the lens of the burlesque.
> The actors craft an array of colourful and grotesque characters, which lampoon their subject matter with > aplomb. During the show's second rendition at London's Bunker Theatre, the audience was audibly in stitches throughout…

> Highlights included a giant, sentient "fleshy pink" vagina, an acerbic Monty Python-esque interpretation of British men's rights activist Mike Buchanan – who was the founder of the Justice for Men and Boys party – and a performing stage manager who takes the form of an overexcited clitoris…
> "As theatre-makers we are interested in comedy and specifically absurd comedy," Deborah told Express.co.uk. The obvious thread of satire is pronounced throughout the performance. But while comedy undoubtedly spearheads this courageous show, it must not belie its true impact as a cutting-edge critique on the patriarchal world in which we live…
> Beneath the side-splitting performances and witty script, Queen C's thesis therefore raises not only eyebrows but fundamental questions about the role of women today.

The MHRM is a tradcon Trojan horse

Elizabeth Hobson · 30 March 2019 · Archived copy · Original

The MHRM is a tradcon Trojan horse? This is what feminists would like everyone to believe.

A common misrepresentation of the Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM) is that we are simply trad-cons attempting to turn back the "progress" made by women over the last century. According to Hope Not Hate's 2019 'State of Hate' report, "Improvements in gender equality in recent years, and the feminist campaigns propelling them forward, have been met by resistance and opposition in parts of society".

In their estimation, we use a "human rights framework" to push for revocation of women's liberties – wanting women to be essentially barefoot, pregnant and back in the kitchen

Bill Whittle said that "conservatism is the conservation of liberal values" and he was right. Our modern Western societies are inherently liberal, enshrining principles such as: liberty, justice, equality, individualism and meritocracy. The MHRM can generally be characterised as having gratitude to the traditional liberal system for taking us as far as it has and building such a great civilisation – so we don't want to smash it. We're also often realists who want to see candid discourse on the research that indicates that traditional set ups do work best for most people (so they can make free but informed life decisions).

However, in my opinion, we're equally an inherently progressive movement who want to build on the liberal values that our societies have evolved. We seek an end to gynocentric legislation/administration of law and the extension of the rights, opportunities, choices and consideration, that women and girls receive, for men and boys. This will mean, in some ways, a 'step down' for women – but in terms of privileges, not rights – and women will still be free to act autonomously, they'll merely be held responsible for their actions to a greater degree than at present.

We want to build on liberal values in the following ways:

- Liberty – Freedom is a good in itself, not a means to an end. John Stuart Mill argued, in 'On Liberty', that "Society can and does execute its own mandates: and if it issues wrong mandates instead of right, or any mandates at all in things with which it ought not to meddle, it practises a social tyranny more formidable than many kinds of political oppression, since, though not usually upheld by such extreme penalties, it leaves fewer means of escape, penetrating much more deeply into the details of life, and enslaving the soul itself." The MHRM fairly consistently argues for freedom from the tyranny of feminist opinion. Despite being a minority identity, feminism dictates to society what is to be the (narrowly defined) accepted discourse and behaviour. Mockery of feminism can result in deplatforming and innocent behaviour on the part of men, if unwelcome, is referred to as 'entitled', on a continuum with rape and potentially a hate crime. This has a chilling effect on academic freedom (thus the search for truth itself), interpersonal relationships and individual wellbeing.
- Justice – The MHRM is absolutely committed to the principles of 'innocent till proven guilty' and 'blind' justice. In recent decades feminists have successfully promoted the idea of 'believing the victim,' in cases of alleged violence, harassment or sexual misconduct against women – regardless of available evidence. This has led to kangaroo courts in universities weighing evidence on a probability basis (51% likely), miscarriages of justice and even deaths. There is also a glaring gender justice gap visible across the modern West with men receiving harsher sentences and treatment as compared to women. In the U.K. men account for around 95% of the total prison population despite only committing 3.4 times more crimes than women. Feminist activists (such as Women in Prisons, Baroness Corston and Julie Bindel) have committed themselves to widening the gender justice gap – enabled by myopic and sentimental authorities.
- Equality – The MHRM seeks nothing more than equality in terms of rights, opportunities, choices and treatment for men and boys, with women and girls. We pursue such policies as: an assumption of 50/50 shared parenting in the Family Courts. For men to have a right to opt out of fatherhood and the legal responsibilities.Prevention of paternity fraud – with compulsory paternity tests and proportional consequences if fraud is discovered later (reimbursement of costs plus therapy eg.). An equitable amount of money and effort expended researching cures for 'male' illnesses as 'female' illnesses. Male contraceptives. For men to be valued by society, and to see as little misandry as we see misogyny. Equivalent services available for male victims of DV. For men and women receive equal sentences for equivalent crimes. An end to affirmative action quotas to allow people to succeed on the basis of their merits. For governmental and supranational organisations (like the U.N.) to either drop their departments that focus solely on women's issues, reinvent them so that they're genuinely focused on inclusive gender equality or to compliment them with departments for men. To embark on concerted efforts to make the world safer for men, as well as women. For each sex to be protected from non-medically necessary infant genital mutilation. To classify 'forced to penetrate' as 'rape' in the criminal justice system and sentence perpetrators on a par with perpetrators of penetrative rape. For the non-feminist sector is given a representative voice in politics, academia and the media.

- Individualism – The MHRM sees people not as collectives to be promoted or punished for the actions of other people who share immutable characteristics with them. Moreover, we see individuality as sacred, each individual person unique and deserving of the kind of equality outlined above.
- Meritocracy – The MHRM believes that men and women can succeed in whatever fields are suitable and attractive to them and that it will benefit our entire societies when those most accomplished and desirous can rise to the tops of their fields.

The MHRM isn't misusing a human rights framework. We are a critically important human rights movement that is pushing for change that is way past due – and if there is any life left in our liberal democracies, if conservatives have conserved liberal values, then we will make progress. 'Conservative' and 'progressive' are terms commonly applied in messy, inconsistent and misinterpreted ways. They're actually mutually inclusive forces that work to further human well-being when balanced appropriately – and the MHRM achieves that humble balance well.

"Progressives" like Hope Not Hate are more aptly named: ideological collectivists. They don't want our civilisation to make progress; they want to smash the system and they want to subvert our liberal values to establish an imagined social justice utopia. Standing against "progressives" like that does not a trad-con make. Onwards!

Joe Biden will never be president, however much he kisses feminist ass

Elizabeth Hobson · 2 April 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Joe Biden wants to be the POTUS and he thinks that feminists are going to help him so, last week, he gave an emotional speech at an event celebrating student activism against sexual assault. Joe knows "a really notable woman" and "[he] regrets to this day he couldn't get her the kind of testimony she deserved".

The problem, as he sees it, was "I mean sincerely, a bunch of white guys hearing this testimony".

Anita Hill, said Joe, deserved to be respected for not becoming hostile at the tone of the questioning, and for her act of stepping forward to be recognised as an act of courage. Joe claimed "she paid a terrible price. She was abused through the hearing, she was taken advantage of, her reputation was attacked", he also suggested that her career was damaged.

Anita Hill's allegations were salacious (to the point of absurdity) – she claimed not only that Clarence Thomas repeatedly asked her to socialise with him outside of work but that he ignored her clear disgust, insisting on detailing scenes he'd seen in porn, involving such acts as bestiality and rape. She gave the Senate the names of two corroborating witnesses – both rejected any knowledge of the harassment she alleged, one even testified for Thomas. I was three years old in 1991 – so I didn't watch the hearing then, and I still haven't but if this short video hosted by CNN is anything to go by, Hill was not abused by the Senate, she was cross-examined.

Her position teaching at Oklahoma University did apparently become unpopular with conservative state legislators who pushed for her to be forced to resign but she continued teaching there for six years. She then accepted a position as a visiting scholar at the Institute for the Study of Social Change at University of California, Berkeley in January 1997, later moving to Brandeis University—first at the Women's Studies Program, then the Heller School for Social Policy and Management.

In 2011, she took a counsel position with the Civil Rights & Employment Practice group of the plaintiffs' law firm Cohen Milstein Sellers & Toll. She also took up a book deal upwards of a million dollars in 1993 and has been a regular feature in print and on T.V. So, for all that her career may have been damaged, the benefits of her courage seem to have paid off big time.

Joe marked out 1991 as a period of time wherein cultural bias informed society that "if a woman was harassed, she must have done something to deserve it", and exhorted that the experience of Christine Blasey-Ford show that little has changed. He said that it still takes courage to testify against a nominated Supreme Court Judge and that the experiences of Hill and Blasey-Ford will discourage other women from coming forward. It's not at all clear to me that the barrier preventing these accusers from destroying the careers of their alleged harassers was that anyone felt that harassed women "must have done something to deserve it".

I would posit that actually the barrier was the fact that only the (blindly) "believe her" crowd actually believed the totally unsubstantiated (if politically convenient) claims that either woman made. Which is as it should be, especially in legal proceedings. And hey, Joe, don't fret – perhaps the half a million dollars that Blasey-Ford raked in, in crowd-funding campaigns in the space of about a week may encourage other women to make allegations some?

Finally, Joe got to the crux of the matter: "We all have an obligation to do nothing less than change the culture in this country… English jurisprudential culture. A white man's culture. It's got to change". The man is a racist and misandric enemy of genuine justice as well as a sycophantic flagellator at the altar of social justice.

Not only that but he's a damn liar who pulled out the old myth that the phrase "rule of thumb" is a remnant of an old English common-law that stated that men were only entitled to beat their wives with rods no wider than their thumbs – in fact there is no evidence for this until second wave feminists invented it. It was in all likelihood a phrase that emerged from the practice of using thumbs to estimate lengths, distances and alignments. But seriously, English jurisprudence is one of white-man's greatest gifts to the world and the subversion of it by social justice activists is one of white-man's greatest crimes.

The fact that a politician can emote such garbage is disturbing, as have been developments like campus kangaroo courts – but I don't think it should be too much cause for alarm. I think the man has way overplayed his hand, just like the campus activists did. The public are waking up and voting against the social justice culture that has shamed them into compliance for so long. And furthermore, I suspect that the wolves with whom Joe is dining with will soon devour him.

Mike Buchanan · 4 April 2019 · Archived copy · Original

I am pleased to announce a new strategy for J4MB, engaging with university students and academics, particularly those studying or teaching subjects close to our mission, such as Politics and History. Universities are the source of so much of the indoctrination of young adults who later (in positions of power and influence) assault the human rights of men and boys – and by extension, women and girls – in so many areas, including the 20 areas in our last election manifesto. The areas include:

> Genital mutilation
> Reproductive rights
> Fatherlessness > Education > Employment
> Denial of access to children
> Domestic violence
> Sexual abuse
> Armed forces veterans' mental health
> Homelessness
> Suicide (#1 cause of death of men under 45 in the UK, in all age brackets)
> Criminal justice system
> Paternity fraud
> Anonymity for suspected sexual offenders
> Divorce settlements
> Healthcare provision

In coming weeks and months we'll be announcing a series of talks at universities, with one or two high-profile Men's Rights Activists (MRAs), anti-feminists, and others, speaking at each event.

The first event will be held at one of the most prestigious seats of learning in the world, the University of Cambridge. My talk title will be, "Equal Rights for Men and Women", while Elizabeth Hobson, our Director of Communications, will be talking on "The History of Feminism". Elizabeth is currently studying for a BA in History and Politics at the Open University.

The venue for our talks will be the Alison Richard Building, the date 24 May. We do not imply an affiliation with the University of Cambridge or any of its departments.

We're expecting the event to sell out, and will be giving preference to applicants who are students or academics in the subjects of Politics and History. If you wish to have one of the 110 tickets – they're free – please email me (mike@j4mb.org.uk) detailing why you'd like to attend the event. Thank you.

Creepy Uncle Joe vs the uncomfortable women of #MeToo

Paul Elam · 7 April 2019 · Archived copy · Original

So finally, after years of Joe Biden making public displays of his lack of personal boundaries, it has come to bite him right in the middle of his aging, white male ass.

And, of course, my knee jerk to his comeuppance is hell yes. Joe Biden being hoisted up in slow, excruciating increments on his own petard is a welcome sight. Biden, the co-author of the stinking barrel of feminist pork known as the Violence Against Women Act, has for decades used his pulpit to shame and control men on behalf of hateful, power hungry women.

When speaking to college audiences he even stoops to addressing the men in the crowd as though they are all potential rapists who need to monitor each other for sexual transgressions and be prepared to intervene any time a man gets 'out of line.' In other words, he's been on a recruitment campaign for brownshirts; thugs to enforce the feminist line on their erstwhile brothers.

But, of course, all that was before he started making noise about running for president again. Once it became clear he was in serious consideration the #MeToo brigade pounced. And like I said, part of me is just #FuckYeah.

But between the lines of convoluted and conflicting media text about this there is a story that they are ignoring. And it runs deeper that we ever dare to go when a gaggle of whining females come out of the closet all butthurt about things that didn't bother them enough to talk about when they allegedly happened.

And again, given Joe Biden's personal history of pampering that kind of chickenshit behavior in women, I am hardly inclined toward riding in to save him.

Still, as a matter of intellectual honesty and consistency, I must acknowledge that when all is said and done, this is just one more man being skewered and roasted over the coals of social justice insanity.

I am not dwelling on that, mind you, because there is one major difference in this case that can't be overlooked, mainly because of the implications for all men in the future.

And that difference is simple. None of the allegations against Biden, at least so far, were of sexual assault or harassment. Nope, Joe wasn't accused of raping anyone, or of pressuring women for sex, or even of sexual inuendo in the workplace.

In fact, none of the accusations so far have come from women who claim they were making sexual complaints about the vice president. Instead, their accusations are solely that he made them feel uncomfortable.

That's it. Not raped. Not abused. Not traumatized. This is just about women feeling a little uneasy. For that we need hashtags and outrage.

Lucy Flores said Biden smelled her hair and kissed the back of her head. Former House aide Amy Lappos told The Hartford Courant that at a 2009 fundraiser, Biden had forced her to rub noses with him. Lappos said that the incident "wasn't sexual," but that he did "grab [her] by the head."

Caitlyn Caruso said that three years ago when she was 19, the Vice President placed his hand on her thigh and hugged her "just a little bit too long."

D.J. Hill, who met Biden in 2012, said that she was made to feel "very uncomfortable" when he first put his hand on her shoulder and then began moving it down her back.

As though in coordinated fashion to cripple Biden rather than kill him, none of his accusers claimed that his behavior was sexual. They all just claimed they felt uncomfortable.

Oh, the horror. Let's gather a team of psychotherapists and roll out wheelbarrows of psychotropic medications. Let's give these poor, unfortunate, uncomfortable women T-shirts that say, "I survived my hair being sniffed by the Vice President of the United States." Then they can posture in public and crow about how powerful they are. Girl power!

And let's get them all on the talk show circuit so that all the Oprah wannabes can call them courageous for launching an attack just before Joe Biden was to announce his candidacy for the presidency, then waddling forth like a row of ducklings, following the camera like it was the mother duck.

If that sounds like sympathy for Biden, it's not, but it is concern for all the men who will follow him into the crosshairs in an age where you don't have really do anything to women to have them come at you en masse. You just have to displease them. Do that and you're toast is the very, very clear message.

Giving them a pass because Biden deserves it is a mistake. They're just feeding you a target you hate to help you get accustomed to it.

Now, if you'll allow me a slight digression, I'd like to offer some observations about Biden's behaviors that lent automatic credibility to his accusers, whether he did what they said or not.

It is clear from watching his interactions with people over the years, much of which was captured on video, that Joe Biden has some serious issues with personal boundaries.

He can be seen grabbing people repeatedly, dragging them into unwanted physical displays of affection, and sometimes moving them around like pieces of furniture. This is most prevalent with children and has led some to speculate that Creepy Uncle Joe is actually pedo Joe.

Personally, I am not buying this one, and not just because I'm a stickler for hard evidence. Pedophiles don't get caught molesting children because of the way they behave publicly. Pedos are acutely aware that their proclivities are deviant and go to excruciating care to hide their true nature.

You often see this when it's discovered after a pedo gets caught that they had been molesting children for years and often were in positions of trust with the children and their families. They are experts at hiding in plain view.

Biden doesn't fit that model to me. What he does fit with, though, is a person who has no real understanding of personal boundaries. In fact, that is likely an understatement. Biden is clueless, bordering mentally disabled where it concerns the personal space of others. You can watch him in action as children shy away from his rough invasion of their space, as they lean back when he takes control of their bodies. and he shows absolutely no cognizance of the effect he is having. It just doesn't register.

And it would seem that no matter how many times this is repeated, Creepy Joe remains creepily unaware of the disgust and discomfort he is generating.

He doesn't get a pass. Not even when grown adults don't muster the fortitude to tell him to quit pawing at them. It's clear he's seen a number of people recoil from his unwelcomed conduct and that should be enough to cue anyone in to change their behavior.

But Joe Biden isn't just anyone. And so, the question for me is about what makes someone like this tick. I mean, we've all met Creepy Joes in our lives. Maybe a few of them. People who were way overly touchy and genuinely didn't seem to get that it wasn't cool. They seem honestly shocked whenever someone tells them to knock it off, and like socially inept dolts, they assume that it is the person with the boundaries who has the problem.

The question, and in this case we're asking about Joe Biden, what shapes a personality with these particular flaws?

And as is the case many times, if you want to understand what makes a person tick, then take a look at their family of origin. And a look at his family of origin provides an instant snapshot that explains Creepy Joe to a T.

He once told a senate committee, and I quote, "In my house, being raised with a sister and three brothers, there was an absolute – it was a nuclear sanction, if under any circumstances, for any reason, no matter how justified, even self-defense – if you ever touched your sister, not figuratively, literally. My sister, who is my best friend, my campaign manager, my confidante, grew up with absolute impunity in our household."

"And I have the bruises to prove it," he added for emphasis, "I mean that sincerely. I am not exaggerating when I say that." Unquote.

Think about those words for a moment and see if it doesn't put the pieces of the puzzle together. Does it not explain the development of a man with a failing sense of personal space? A man for whom interpersonal boundaries have been blurred and often erased.

These days I take all complaints from women, especially those which are politically timed, with a rather hefty grain of salt. But when Joe Biden says he didn't know he was invading personal space, when he implies he thought his behavior was normal, I've got no problem believing him at all.

A failure to respect boundaries was perfectly normal, in the Biden family. And Joe has the bruises to prove it.

His sister could terrorize him; physically assault and bully him, with complete impunity. He knew damn well if he tried to do anything about it that his parents would, as he put it, go nuclear on him.

This not only explains how we got Creepy Uncle Joe, but also Joe Biden, mindless defender of women, persecutor of men.

How could this family not produce another bully, another unboundaried zombie with no understanding of personal space? How surprising is it, in this context, that Joe Biden would grow up to author legislation that allowed women to act with impunity while punishing men, even those acting in self-defense?

It's part of the human condition. It's what we do. We grow up with the common tendency to repeat our family pathology. We recreate family dysfunction and engage in hapless attempts at corrective experiences until we become aware of what we are doing and elect to stop.

Many of us go to our graves doing that with no real awareness of it. It's how Joe Biden ended up being 76 years old, still playing the role of a bully, trying and failing to cope with the abuse he endured as a child.

Joe's a douche, for sure. He's gained a lot of power in his life and has used it to inflict the same harm on other men he was subjected to as a child. Whether he made a few entitled brats feel uncomfortable for two minutes is of little concern to me.

But the fact is that we now live in an age where doing so much as displeasing a woman can destroy an entire life.

The fact that it happened to someone like Joe Biden doesn't assuage me.

Minneapolis, MN, Mohamed Mohamed Noor and the derogation of men's rights

Jewel Eldora · 8 April 2019 · Archived copy · Original

In November 2015, after watching the media reports of the 4th Precinct Takeover, I predicted that Minneapolis Police would end up killing a white woman. It would be a white woman blissfully ignorant of Minnesota law, infected by an extremely contagious bias, which started in St. Paul and then spread throughout the world.

I'd been observing this bias for years, and had been planning on writing about how it's exploited, and how it spreads, for several years.

In 2017, two weeks after Officer Jeronimo Yanez was acquitted of killing Philando Castille, I began to write a five-part weekly series for AVFM, about this bias. The week of the last article, Justine Ruszczyk Damond was shot dead by officer Mohamed Mohamed Noor.

If Noor receives a fair trial in the State of Minnesota, he will be a free man next month. Noor, the first Somali Officer in Minneapolis, has now become the first police officer in Minnesota history to be charged with murder. Twenty four police officers have been cleared of all charges in killings in Minnesota since the day Justine Ruszczyk Damond was shot.

Is Mohamed Mohamed Noor on Trial or Minneapolis, M.N.?

Noor would never have been a cop were it not for two women: Mayor Betsy Hodges, who wanted a Somali officer, and Police Chief Janee' Harteau, who obliged. Those two facts are not in dispute, though Judge Kathryn Quaintance has decided Noor's psychiatric exam, which should have raised red flags, and work history be excluded from evidence.

There are a lot of things Judge Quaintance would like to protect the public of Minnesota from hearing and seeing in this precedent setting case. The Judge set aside only 11 public seats for the 1.252 million people in Hennepin County. There are 15 reserved seats for media. The adjacent AV "viewing" room is a farce.

The judge is currently weighing a decision to determine whether the public should be protected from graphic video evidence suggesting the victim slapped the back of the police SUV and of Noor performing CPR trying to save her life.

During jury selection, Judge Quaintance has protected potential female jurors from having to answer basic questions regarding presumption of innocence, and has chided defense attorney Thomas Plunkett for being an older male who is intimidating younger women in the jury pool. The cognitive dissonance has been palpable, with some jurors literally taking 15-20 seconds to answer if they could understand that a presumption of innocence was even required.

When the Judge refused to remove these women for cause, Plunket asked to have their pauses added to the record. Judge Quaintance then reprimanded him, in open court, for this pattern of being a man, making young women uncomfortable. I swear to fucking god.

In the last year, I've written about bias, discrimination, taboos, stereotypes, perception, persuasion, the media, and propaganda all to bring attention to the research paper by L.A. Rudman, Gender Differences in Automatic In Group Bias, because I believe it is a major driver of gynocentric moral panics.

I've used what I call my "Minnesota Nice Filter" to look indirectly at dark realities with some humor. Andy Mann's response to my writings in his article, "Nihilism and beyond for the zeta male," stopped me in my tracks.

For those readers who've wanted to know what the hell I've been hinting at but not directly saying, here we go.

In this, my final series for AVFM, I'll be exploring my theories and reporting directly from one of those 11 seats.

“...a sick pornographic sex toy used to train people to mutilate little baby boys”

Gary Costanza · 9 April 2019 · Archived copy · Original

In the face of the insanity that a circumcision “kit” even exists, I’ve found some hard-hitting activist and creative gold in the comments and questions at the Amazon listing. Bullshit like infant genital mutilation will be called out every time, and in this case by cleverly using hilarious satire to inform about a tragic topic.
You can read them all here – as long as they last – but for your convenience and posterity, I’ve screenshot them below, starting with my own comment.
First, here’s the actual listing:
by Nasco

Infant Circumcision Trainer, White

Authentic Nasco (Life/Form) product!
5 year warranty
Made in the United States
Great for nursing and therapy students

Product description

> Manufactured with care by Nasco in the United States, this Infant Circumcision Trainer, White is an excellent addition to your classroom! Shipping weight is 5 lbs.
> Circumcision is a surgical procedure performed to remove the loose tissue, known as the foreskin, covering the glans of the penis. This worldwide procedure is performed for health, religious, or cultural reasons shortly after birth, around puberty, or during young adulthood. The World Health Organization (WHO), the Joint United Nations Program on HIV and AIDS (UNAIDS), and the Center for Disease Control (CDC) state evidence that indicates male circumcision significantly reduces the risk of female-to-male HIV transmission by over 50%. The Life/form Circumcision Trainers have been developed with the assistance from one of the top medical schools in Wisconsin, as well as medical professionals in South Africa and Indonesia. The trainers include the foreskin, glans penis, frenulum, meatus, and coronal groove. These trainers are made with our soft, lifelike material, which is pliable, delicate, and realistic to the touch. Medical students, physicians, and other practitioners can learn, practice, and improve realistic, hands-on skills for this delicate procedure without the worry of learning on a live patient. Practice simulating dorsal block injection, separating the inner lining of the foreskin (preputial epithelium) from its attachment to the glans, surgical removal of the foreskin, and suturing techniques. These trainers may also be used to demonstrate the procedure and practice aftercare skills to family members. Since there are different methods of circumcision, the Life/form Circumcision Trainers have been designed for Mogen clamp method, Guillotine clamp method, Gomco clamp method, Plastibell method, dorsal slit method, forceps guided method, and sleeve circumcision.The Life/form Infant Circumcision Trainer includes torso, six glans with attached foreskins, instructions, and storage box.

How sick is this description, as it tells us these brutes know about the parts of the penis and foreskin, with their obvious value and purpose, and then show how to cut them off! In this crazy world “the foreskin, glans penis, frenulum, meatus, and coronal groove” are all baby parts destined for the knife, meat grinder, face cream, or garbage pail. Nice.

Practice medievial and barbaric quackery by “separating the inner lining of the foreskin (preputial epithelium) from its attachment to the glans, surgical removal of the foreskin, and suturing techniques.” Horrid.

Then we read about some more macabre procedures and devices: “Mogen clamp method, Guillotine clamp method, Gomco clamp method, Plastibell method, dorsal slit method, forceps guided method, and sleeve circumcision.”

They tell us circumcision removes “the loose tissue, known as the foreskin, covering the glans of the penis” which is wrong because the foreskin at birth is fused to the penis and not loose at all. And, of course, the HIV connection is unproven, and unrelated to human rights violations and a baby who’s not even having sex. Remember, the U.S. has the most circumcisions AND the most HIV. So, UNAIDS says unsafe sex is OK now if you’re circumcised??? HELLO…BING BONG…if you practice safe sex, with a condom, the foreskin is irrelevant! Condoms prevent STDs and HIV, not surgery.

And thank goodness the trainer is “manufactured with care” which is more than you’ll be giving any of it’s victims.

Need the complete circumcision kit? Not to worry, here’s the listing for “The Life/form® Infant Circumcision Training Kit” that includes the WMDs needed to do the job:

> one infant torso, six glans with attached foreskins, instruments (scalpel, 4-1/2 in. micro-forceps, 6 in. precision probe, Iris research scissors, 5 in. straight Halstead mosquito forceps, 5 in. curved Halstead mosquito forceps, Ethicon suture thread with needle), instrument case, instructions, and soft nylon carrying case.

Good thing it has instructions and a soft carry case.

There’s a black circumcision trainer, a ‘medium‘ one, replacement foreskins, and a complete WMD toolkit to eradicate the dreaded foreskin.

Though the circumcision trainer is “Currently Unavailable,” someone – or two – took the opportunity in the comments and questions to tell the world about some sick shit.

Gee, for something we do to millions of baby boys, where are all the satisfied customers’ comments? Sure, some ignorant and insensitive women like the result, as do the industry that rakes in millions of blood-stained dollars, but the actual victims, the strapped down babies, are grudgingly silent. There are none, just as nobody would praise FGM publicly or be glad they had their vagina cut.

The comments are sad, hilarious, brilliant, sassy, and satisfying – and these gems are a poke in the eye to the hypocrites and pro-circumcision crowd, a work of art, snarky, sarcastic, and profound social commentary – and what else… readers?

And notice the absurdity of it all in this answer to a question:

“Unfortunately, we do not have a female version at this time. Have a nice day.”

Here’s your opportunity to give your opinion for all the world to see. Thank you Amazon.

Enjoy.

Here’s my contributing comment:

As a proud feminist, I demand equal treatment of girls in this marketplace and wonder why girls are not offered the same quality testing equipment such as this. Are girls not worthy of the same skillful surgery that these lucky boys are getting? Why no female torso so that the sex that “holds up half the sky” can have the same fun as all us men?

Makes a perfect Christmas gift for that hard-to-shop-for creepy uncle/circumfetishist. The only drawback is that it doesn’t scream, but you could easily remedy that by hooking it up to an MP3 player that plays circumcised baby screams while you “practice”.

December 26, 2018
I applaud this company for crafting such a critically needed product. Bravo! It is with great remiss that I report that the product does not prepare one for the actual event; as few circumcisions occur on uniquely the pelvis of a baby.

Typically the rest of the baby is attached. Furthermore, the attached rest of the baby is oft moving with great hostility trying to preclude the snippage of private-part material. That said, the “beta version” is a welcomed first step. I look forward to the full animatronic baby version. Thank you so much.

Oh, also a perfect gift.

4.0 out of 5 stars Fun for the whole family!
February 11, 2013

Forget OPERATION, this game represents the next evolution in surgical family fun! Though I wouldn’t recommend it for tykes under six, your kids will enjoy endless hours of genital slicing and dicing. Got a budding mohel on your Christmas list? This is a holiday gift no-brainer. I did deduct a star, however, because scalpel, box cutter, and yard clipper accessories are sold separately. (no information yet on racially diverse skin choices)

I have had so many hours of pleasure with this lifelike anatomically accurate natural looking trainer.

For years I used baby bottle teats, and rubber gloves, and inner tubes, and party balloons, and it just wasn’t the same.

I even practised on endangered species.

For generations people have had their genitals mutilated, their bits bleached, their hair cropped, their pubes pulled, and their faces powdered and hair primped and preened.

But nothing says “I respect you” more than practising beforehand.

If you practice on yourself, it brings a tear to the eye. So use this training device so you can laugh and frolic and galavant around the room in paroxysms of laughter when the bris comes off like a tender calamari ring awaiting the boiling oil and breadcrumbs.

Go on. You KNOW you need this. To sit in the kitchen drawer with the risotto cooker and the breadmaker and the kitchen whizz with multiple attachments.

These also are great to use as a table ornament when the boss and spouse come for dinner. Always a talking point.

Functional. Practical. Educational. And a whole lot more.

The black one is way bigger, apparently. So always specify the color.

4.0 out of 5 stars It's about tradition!
May 2, 2014

The men in my family have been mohels going back 15 generations, that we know of, or at least that's what we all say. And we're not even Jewish. Me? I'm an atheist, but that's no reason not to be a mohel, according to grand-dad, anyway. So is this trainer anatomically spot on? No, but it's close enough. I mean, really, have you ever seen some of the circumcisions out there? They look like rolled turtlenecks, or old round life preservers. I saw one that looked like Bib Fortuna from Star Wars. They're not all pretty, you know. So with that kind of leeway, a tool like this can help me hone my craft without doing any lasting damage.

Was hoping that there was finally a suitable circ trainer on the market for my family's genetically rare, but ever present "dangler-skin" condition…think detachable raincoat hood, minus the snaps. For generations, doctors and mohels alike have struggled with our tricky bits, and after seeing how badly my first son's circumcision was botched, I decided to wait on doing my second boy's until such time as I was confident I could pull it off successfully on my own without the help of some medical hack. I suppose I should have inspected the penile attachments in greater detail, but one would think that with six variations, their piece would be covered. So now it's back to the drawing board, will just have to think of some other way to celebrate my boy's thirteenth birthday…

I became a Moyle after I lost my life guarding job when this blue kid got me fired last summer. This rubber baby torso is very realistic. Before I had this to practice on I was a mess. Luckily the lawsuit filed against me by the father who's thumb I accidentally severed was thrown out on grounds of insanity (phew). Anyway when I get out of the institute for the very, very nervous I plan on getting back into the foreskin lopping game. Oh, buy the white baby torso. The black ones are just obscene.

If I could give this product negative stars, I would. This is a barbaric practice in the U.S. that happens daily. Taking the lives of many innocent children. It is a cosmetic surgery, and when you are cutting into healthy tissue, it leaves risks for hemorrhaging and blood clotting. You think a dorsal block is gonna help a baby when you are removing the most sensitive part of his body? Not to mention, thousands of nerve endings! No way should you be promoting genital mutilation of any kind. Amazon please remove this trainer promoting infant harm and death!

While it's good simulation, I also feel like it gives a false sense of preparation for chewing into your infants penis parts. Nothing can quite prepare you for the warm gush of penile blood that bathes your chin and trickles down your throat when you bite into that fleshy little ding-a-ling. I've tried practicing on dogs before, but people frown upon that, which is why I was ecstatic when I found this product, for those of us who can't get enough of that infant genitalia nibbling. Careful though, I accidentally chipped a tooth on one of the fake baby penises, although it's worked out better for me in the end because I find it's just that much easier to cut through the baby penis flesh with a sharpened tooth. So here's to the glass being half full of infant penis blood!

1.0 out of 5 stars Medical? Not even close.
April 3, 2014

Like the Mayans head binding their children, or foot binding in Asian cultures, circumcision is a violation of an individual's rights. The individual has no say over what cosmetic procedure has been done to them when they were just an infant. This flies in the face of all progressive strides that have been made in the area of human rights in the last few decades. It's very closed minded to force your own views on an infant by way of permanent, irreversible surgery. Imagine the uproar if parents started tattooing infants, or, God forbid, circumcising their daughters. There is no medical reason for male circumcision, in fact, as a cancer risk, it is at least twice as dangerous to have intact labia as an intact foreskin. Any doctor that tells you it's medically beneficial is blowing a bunch of propaganda up your you know what in the name of a medical industry that profits from these procedures and from the use of the foreskins that are removed. Do your research before making a permanent, life-long decision for someone, an individual, who can not yet understand what is being done to them. An individual should be able to decide later, as an adult, whether they want to be circumcised. I am not denying one's religious beliefs. Western religions have no such belief. In Western society, circumcision was introduced in the Victorian era in an effort to keep young boys from masturbating. Now it's a multi-million dollar industry. Look here and be astonished: […]

This product reminds me of a funny story:

Two five year old boys are standing at the potty to pee.

When one says, ” Your thing doesn’t have any skin on it!”

” I’ve been circumcised.” Says the second boy.

” What does that mean?”

“It means they cut the skin off the end.”

” How old were you when it was cut off?”

” My mom said that I was two days old.”

” Did it hurt?”

” You bet it hurt, I couldn’t walk for a year!”

1.0 out of 5 stars Inappropriate for proper medical training.
August 10, 2013

The old days of medical distancing have passed. New medical trainees in top schools are taught to make a personal connection with patients rather than to divorce themselves from the patient as a human individual. This training dummy will only make it easier to distance oneself from the fact that the young patient is a human being with feelings and rights. In a way, this dummy is greatly symbolic of the institution of routine infant circumcision as a practice without a human connection; no eyes, no voice, no compassion for the individual. As such, it is an abomination.

Suzannabell
1.0 out of 5 stars Not realistic enough
April 11, 2013

This product is a huge disappointment.

It's not at all realistic, and therefore no good for practice for medical students.
* The glans is not fused to the foreskin as it should be, and so there is no sensation of ripping the foreskin from the glans.
* Practicing without the very real smell and sight of gushing blood could be distracting once it's time for the real thing.
* There's no screaming. Students will have to learn to block out and ignore the screaming, helpless pleas from the baby, begging someone, anyone, to save him. -It is vital to learn to block these out. If you save the baby we don't get paid.
* There is no frenulum (Male G spot) to cut through. Students need to practice cutting away all of the frenulum so they can efficiently decrease the orgasmic sensation the circumcised baby will have as a man.
* The rest of the body is missing. Students will need to learn to properly force helpless infants into a circumstraint. They must effectively grip and restrain each thrashing limb. We wouldn't want any baby boys being INJURED while we are cutting pieces away from their bodies.

The one good thing I can say about it is there is no face, no pleading eyes to look into, as you ignore every humane instinct and force your scalpel through the baby's genitals.

I don't really mind that you can't tell if you have botched it, because in the end it doesn't matter. We get paid regardless, and the parents have signed a waiver so we won't ever get sued. Muahahaha

1.0 out of 5 stars Only perverted people could cut a helpless newborn
April 21, 2014

This is a “tool” to cause irreparable harm to perfectly happy, healthy, newborn baby boys. Nobody should be torturing them. If you even contemplate getting such a “trainer”, you have no respect for the Hippocratic Oath! “First, do no harm!” Circumcision is a horrible human rights violation. Plus, this is devoid of the screaming that a real baby makes, as well as the copious amounts of blood that he loses. Not realistic at all!

1.0 out of 5 stars Best torture trainer on the market!
April 25, 2013

While this training kit does have its pro’s, the biggest con for me was the lack of realism. Where are the legs, torso and arms? How are we supposed to practice our boy-scout knots tieing up these fiesty babies? I took another commentors advice and qued up circ videos on youtube so i could get the blood-curdling scream for realistic ambiance. I wish you sold restraint straps so I can make this non-consenting torture teacher more accurate, but I have some at home, so no worries.

Although this product is fantastic, I do have a few suggestions for future improvements:

1. You should make a deluxe model that thrashes about as if it doesn’t want to be operated on in the first few days of life.
2. More realistic penis’s – on a real baby, the foreskin needs to be violently ripped from the glans before sliced off. (who doesn’t love that ripping sound? Amirite!?)
3. Blood! who doesn’t love a gusher, its so excillerating.
4. Optional heart monitor that simulates flat lining from blood loss
5. Realistic body excrement – I need to practice bandaging so fecal matter doesn’t get into an open wound. I hate that!
6. Novelty circ tools like the clamps, guilotine style tools and a pot for a mohel-style blood spit
7. Spare penis’s sold seperatly. I’m a real slow learner, i’m going to need at least a dozen more practice penis’s.

Fantastic job, would recommend to anyone with a mutilation fetish!

The practice penises do not have a continuous sleeve to cut away. They represent the skin tube as if cutting it leaves only one raw wound edge instead of two. This is worthless, like forced genital cutting.

Where is the "circumcision trainer" for baby girls? That's right, girls are protected, boys are not. This is disgusting, immoral, sexist etc – male genital mutilation is just as bad as female genital mutilation. Male genital cutting causes pain, suffering, lifelong problems (ask why Viagra is so popular.) Permanent detrimental brain changes (possibly causes Autism.)

why in all other parts of the country is there no RIC (routine infant circumcision) but in USA it is? this is a barbaric procedure being done to defenseless babies, it kills for no benefits. it doesn't help HIV or STD's condoms do. it doesn't help with infections, not pulling the foreskin helps that and medication that is given like when a girl has one. When intact don't retract. horrible product.

1.0 out of 5 stars Training for Human Rights Violation
August 10, 2013

Circumcision or Male Genital Mutilation should be banned just like female circumcision is. Baby boys feel pain and bleed just like little girls but aren't protected by the law as girls are.
If you want training so you can circumcise newborn baby boys then you want training to be a child abuser, you will be a sexual child abuser and one that believes that baby boys have no right to their Human Rights.
Sick, sick, sick people. Health professionals that circumcise babies should be arrested for sexually mutilating those babies and be struck of the medical register as they are breaking the Hippocratic oath.

Where's the female version?! Sure, we can now practice unnecessarily amputating parts of penises, but where is the vulva and clitoris for mutilation? The original purpose of routine infant circumcision was to discourage masturbation in men… when will we wake up and realize it's a problem in women, too! Until I can make certain to practice ruining the most sensitive genital areas on both male and female models, this is an incomplete set!

Pros: Have a strong desire to hack up baby penis? Love to hear the pitiful wails and screams of non-consenting newborn boys as you slice and dice their penis up shortly after their entrance into the world? Want some practice first so you'll be less likely to do a botched job resulting in meatal stenosis, partial to full penile amputation, death due to hemorrhage, gangrene, necrosis, skin bridges or adhesions? Then this is the product for you!

Cons: Does not come with circumstraint, does not scream and curl toes from pain, only has a couple of foreskins to mutilate, doesn't come in latino, black or Asian models.

So, I came to Amazon hoping to watch the new Jack Ryan series with Jim from the office. What ended up happening was something of a journey of self discovery and ultimately, a very serious commentary on the middle east peace process.
I found this item in both “WHITE” and “medium?” Explain yourselves. I won’t even ask you to explain why a dick slicing practice slam man was created like this, but why “medium?” Is this a new alt-right term or something? I’d expect this sort of thing from gab, but not from Amazon. You gave me Alexa. Alexa gave me a moment’s reprieve from the deep and abiding sense of absolute isolation in the universe. And then, we come to this.
After having watched copious amounts of Thundercats and trying NOT to think of the unopened package which I had again, intended to be a pleasant viewing experience in which I get to compare the guy from A Quiet Place with both Harrison Ford and Alec Baldwin, but all that aside, it was upon opening the package that I found my knife skills lacking and suddenly everything made sense.
Pulling the “unit” and it’s associated “medium” bits from the box, I immediately went to work hacking away at the plastic patriarchy simulator. I’ve never felt more Bell Hooks in all my life.
As you can see from my image attached, it wasn’t long until I ran out of “medium” bits and began hacking away at my own. The glasses and facial expression are just coincidental, in case you were wondering.
Five stars, not because the product is that good, but rather, because the huwite one got far more reviews and a higher rating, making me both furious on the grounds of equality, while also fearing for my own safety. Equality in penis augmentation must be a new agenda item in this age of resistance. I know that Vox.com stands with me in this conviction and as someone with a mutilated penis myself and bigger issues than that which we shall not go into, I can’t recommend this product enough.
Loved it. Every inch of it’s medium tone and temper.

September 2, 2016

As an assistant to the assistant of a famous baby's doctor, i am so glad to see such a teachen TOOL. I have seen in my line of work how messed up a child's penis can be after a boched circumcision, you know, to much clipped off the top or what we call a "flop top" occurs and that will damage anyones self esteem. So for those in training use this piece of tech for those little ones under the knife.

I wonder what would happen if some sick company decided to produce a female infant genital mutilation device. It would be front page news all over the west…so why is this ok?
By Arthur Valentine on February 4, 2016
Yes, it will. It is not coincidence that 11 out of 12 of the genocides that have taken place in recent history have involved circumcisers as either the primary victims or the primary aggressors, in three cases circumcisers were both the primary aggressors and the primary victims. Nor is it coincidence that societies where circumcision is practised are constantly in conflict, either internally or externally. Read the work of James W Prescott for more information.
By M. Steane on February 4, 2016
Interested in the logic behind contributors assertion that to vote republican is somehow an exercise in the "full experience of a loss of morality". Most males happily survive circumcision, apparently in the contributors mind a republican ritual. (only the morally bankrupt republicans advocate it?" I suppose the contributor by voting democrat and thereby being a proponent of abortion rests comfortably at night assured that all those millions of aborted fetuses won't have to suffer the exigencies of a full human life.

No but it sure stimulates circumfetishes
By Daniel Rold on December 16, 2017
Certain religious groups used this as to avoid smegma, a foul smelling cheese like substance that can grow between the foreskin and penis. The female version on this procedure removes the clitoris and other pleasure sensitive areas of the female anatomy. Female circumcision is considered to be brutality in the western world.

Philip Davies MP interviewed on MGM and more by Brian Martinez

Mike Buchanan · 9 April 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Our thanks to the Honey Badger Brigade for their permission to post Brian Martinez's recent radio interview (38:20) with Philip Davies MP, covering MGM and more. We look forward to seeing Philip again at the Chicago conference in August, where he'll be giving a talk, as he did at the second ICMI (London 2016) on The Justice Gender Gap (video, 44:48).

Effacing the male

Mark Dent · 10 April 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Whenever I look back over the articles which I have submitted to AVFM, there is a recurring theme. It is the utterly gob smacking, gut-wrenching application of double standards.

Nothing ever stirred a roaring furnace in my heart more powerfully than my awareness of a deliberate, calculated preferential treatment of one group or individual over another, particularly when those perpetrating this outrage repeatedly insisted, they were nothing but just and consistent in their treatment of those who were under their control.

We all have memories of teachers who blatantly favored one student or one group in a class and it always caused burning resentment. It happens in families, schools, football teams and countries.

How often did I hear my football coaches make the same preseason speech, year after year?

"Players will be selected on the basis of how often they train and their commitment to all of the preseason fitness camps and sessions. If you don't put in the hard yards-no matter who you are- you won't be selected."

We always knew this was a lie, yet every year these words were spoken by coaches with such conviction and sincerity I would think:

" Perhaps this time…."

No. Every year, the most talented and irreplaceable players would roll up one week before the season began and invariably these same players would be named in the team one week later.

Burn and mutter about the hypocrisy and dishonesty but one simply sucked it up. It was the way of the world and would always be so.

I grew and slowly became aware of the most shocking double standard in our lifetime. The treatment of men when they are victims of any kind of violence or abuse as opposed to the treatment of women.

I have been aware of an incredibly powerful article titled, Effacing the Male by Adam Jones. I read it a number of years ago and remember being gutted by its contents. It verified and validated what had been more of a gut feeling than a provable fact. I cried when I read it. I kept a copy of it which I believe I lost a long time ago. It was Bev, one of our regular commenters and staunch supporter of men's rights who reminded me about this article a couple of months ago.

I tracked it down and read it again.

I cannot do it justice in this article but I hope I will give you some insight into why it was so profoundly moving and disturbing. I would invite you to read the article in its entirety.

Adam Jones set out to demonstrate through the presentation of a broad sample of media coverage of the Kosovo War of 1999 that:

"unworthy" male victims tend to be marginalized or ignored entirely in mass-media coverage."

Jones writes:

> The concept of "worthy" versus "unworthy" victims seems a fertile one in analyzing the treatment of the victims of the gendercidal atrocities in Kosovo, and male victims of violence more generally.[5] In this section, I sketch some of the predictable, even ritualized, means by which "unworthy" male victims were excluded from the analysis, and "worthy" ones – notably children and women — privileged.[6]
> "The effacing of male victims in mass media is generally accomplished by three interrelated strategies. The first > might be called incidentalizing. Modern news, as noted, is a hierarchical creature. It generally "leads" with the dominant theme of the article, which the headline is also meant to convey. Many newspapers, printing or reprinting an article or wire-service report, will include only (a version of) the headline and the first several paragraphs of the story. Thus, to relegate an important theme to passing mention in the middle reaches of the article, or to introduce it only at the end, is effectively to render it incidental and inconspicuous, if not outright invisible."

This sounds very familiar. I recall writing about the atrocities committed by the terrorist group Boko Haram in Nigeria and the absence of any reference to the gender of the boys and men massacred by these fanatics. Sometimes you might discover they were males ten paragraphs into the piece. Any harm inflicted upon females was reported with the gender of the victims as the very heart of the story. The fact that they were females was usually revealed in the headlines and then repeated continually throughout the article.

Adam Jones provides an example of this type of journalism.

> The Death March of the Kosovo Refugees
> MORINA, Albania, April 18 (AFP) — Among the thousands of refugees fleeing Kosovo, none suffer worse than those forced to travel for days and nights on end on foot. While many cross the border into Albania and Macedonia in cars or open trailers drawn by tractors, the rest have had to walk, harried by Serbian troops on what for some became a death march. Staggering up to the red barrier marking the frontier, carrying children and baggage, and supporting the elderly, they sob as they gulp down food offered by humanitarian organisations. Their accounts, consistent, precise and detailed, describe a Kosovo that has been turned into a hell, criss-crossed day and night by columns of refugees expelled from the Serbian province in ferocious "ethnic cleansing." "We walked almost without stopping for four days and four nights," groaned Hysnije Abazi, 22, from Kladernica in central Kosovo. "We were escorted all the time by Serbs in vehicles or on foot. We were not allowed to drink, stop, rest or shelter from the rain. Before we set off they set fire to our cars and tractors and ordered us to march in columns." They also took away all the males aged 15 or over [!]. Crinkle-haired Afertita Kajtazi, 23, her eyes ringed with fatigue, said their [i.e., the refugees'] treatment was deliberately harsh. … (emphasis added)
> Here the "genocidal cull of ethnic-Albanian males"[7] takes place in the blink of an eye, amidst a torrent of frankly lachrymose descriptions of the convoys of helpless "worthies."

Jones presents an example of a second method used to make the male gender a non- issue in the report or so camouflaged as to make it inconsequential.

> A second strategy is displacement. Here, the male is defined by some trait or label other than gender — even when gender obviously, or apparently, is decisive in shaping the experience or predicament being described. During the Kosovo war, typical displacement terminology included designations such as "Kosovars," "ethnic Albanians," "bodies," "victims," and "people." In this context, consider Daniel Williams' report in The Washington Post on the mass murder at Istok prison, a facility bombed by NATO planes in late May 1999. After the last of three bombing raids, the Serbs paraded 19 male corpses before western media, declaring that they were the bodies of prisoners killed by NATO. It now appears likely that many of these men, along with up to 100 others, were massacred by the Serbs in one of the war's larger acts of gendercide. Here is how Williams reported the Serbs' propaganda show:
> Bodies of dead prisoners were shown to reporters lying around the prison courtyard Saturday [22 May], and on Monday [24 May] another group of corpses inside a foyer entrance to a cellblock. … Despite the presence of 1,000 mostly ethnic Albanian prisoners, [NATO] bombed it twice Saturday and once early Sunday. No one seemed to take into account the possible extra danger to the prisoners … 19 bodies of prisoners lay in and around the courtyard, and on Monday those bodies lay in the same spots … An inspecting magistrate said the bodies were left outside because he had not had time to carry out his work, what with all the bombing. … Then there was the > new group of dead on display Monday … Twenty-five bodies in the foyer, some lined up on top of one another domino-style, many with streaks of blood on their bodies … These corpses were not dusty. … No one seemed to know why the 19 Saturday bodies were left outside, but … (Williams, 1999, emphasis added.)

> There was precisely one reference to "men" in the story: to the "masked [Serb] men with rifles" hovering around the facility. Males as agents of violence were visible, and gendered; as victims, they were effaced from the discourse.
> [image]

Adam's presents a third method of effacement.

The third marginalization strategy is simply exclusion. The trope most commonly adopted here can be summarized in the little-examined phrase, "including women" — or, equally commonly, "including women and children." The trend has been persistently evident in media coverage of the Bosnian war, as a report as recent as October 1999 makes plain (duly emphasized throughout):

> Bosnian forensic teams have exhumed 251 bodies, mainly of Muslim civilians, in the Serb-run half of Bosnia in the last two weeks … The bodies, victims of the 1992-95 Bosnian war, were exhumed from more than 14 mass graves each containing up to 15 corpses, as well as individual graves … The majority, including 12 women and five children, were executed by Bosnian Serb forces who had captured these regions at the beginning of the war … Some 3,000 people, mainly Muslims, were still missing in northwestern Bosnia. (Agence France-Presse, 1999a.)
> Ninety-three percent adult male casualties. But this fact passes unmentioned in the rush to draw attention to the "worthy" victims. Literally dozens of examples of this strategy could be cited from the wartime and postwar coverage of Kosovo:
> In Velika Krusa, Dutch soldiers yesterday reported finding charred remains of around 20 ethnic Albanians, including women and children, and said they expect to find more nearby. (Dan, 1999.)
> Splashes of blood are still visible on the lower portion of a door at a pizzeria in Suva Reka, where up to 50 people, including women and children, are believed to have been slaughtered. (Lynch, 1999.)
> Since starting work on 18 June, the UK forensic team has exhumed over 260 bodies of Kosovar civilians from mass graves, including women and the remains of 21 children … (British Foreign Secretary Robin Cook). (Kirkland, 1999.)
> Let it be stated plainly: "Including women" excludes men.
>
> The trope is particularly misleading when the phenomena described — such as the massacre at Velika Krusa and the campaign of mass killing in Kosovo as a whole — are so disproportionately and methodically slanted against males. In virtually all cases, the phrase "including women and children" can be translated as "including a majority of adult men and a minority of women and children." But men remain the "absent subjects," entering the narrative only indirectly and by inference, if at all.[8]
> Jones examines the media's fascination with the use of rape in this conflict. He asks the very important question: Is rape worse than death?
> Another phenomenon in public discussion of the Kosovo war and the Balkans more generally has been the privileging of rape or mass rape of women over the slaughter or mass slaughter of (non-combatant) males.
> The implicit prioritizing of sexually-assaulted women, often on ambiguous or scanty evidence, reflected both age-old biases and more recent feminist activism on the issue of mass rapes in Bosnia and elsewhere. While feminist research in this area is to be commended and learned from, it has also contributed to a one-sided depiction of the atrocities of war that tends to consign the male victim to oblivion. Consider the evaluation of the Bosnian war by Bogdan Denitch, otherwise one of the most clear-eyed appraisers of Yugoslavia's collapse:

> It is there [Bosnia] that by far the worst atrocities have taken place. Not only have there been vast and well-documented massacres of mostly Muslim civilians by Serbian militias, but concentration camps and massive forcible population transfers, known as "ethnic cleansing," have also been used to change the demographic realities of Bosnia.
> The worst of the horrors has been the systematic use of organized, repeated mass rape by Serbian militias of non-Serbian, mostly Muslim women as a part of "ethnic cleansing." To be sure, there have been cases of rape by all sides, and the UN has documented that Croats and Muslims have committed massacres and run concentration camps. What was unprecedented was the organization of mass rape as a matter of policy in a manner that could not have been unknown to the highest military and political authorities of the so-called Serbian Republic of Bosnia. One obvious victim is the prospect of a tolerable and decent life together after the war. (Denitch, 1994: 124; emphasis added.)
> The gendering of the massacre victims and concentration-camp inmates was fairly well established by this point (1994), but Denitch reserves the very "worst" designation for the mass rapes of women, rather than the "vast and well-documented massacres of mostly Muslim civilians," overwhelmingly males.[14]
> For an especially interesting example of the trend, we can turn to an article by Tommaso di Francesco and Giacomo Scotti, published in Le Monde diplomatique at the midpoint of the Kosovo war. The authors wrote that in the "process of vicious mutual ethnic cleansing" in Bosnia-Herzegovina, > physical and psychological terror stemmed largely from the barbaric treatment inflicted in the prison camps created by both Croats and Serbs — particularly, in the case of the Serbs, the notorious Omarska camp with its raping of women. (di Francesco and Scotti, 1999.)
> This depiction of the horrors of Omarska — one of the three concentration camps closed after international protests in late 1992 — is a mind-bogglingly casual inversion of the gendered reality. Helsinki Watch gave the population of Omarska as 2,000 men and 33 to 38 women. In an article for International Affairs on "The Crime of Appeasement in Bosnia," Ed Vulliamy, who witnessed the release of Omarska's survivors, wrote:
> Omarska had been a place where a prisoner was forced to bite the testicles off a fellow inmate who, as he died of pain, had a live pigeon stuffed into his mouth to stifle his screams. The guards responsible for this barbarism were described by one witness as "like a crowd at a sporting match." Another man was forced to bark like a dog and lick at motor oil on the ground while a guard jumped up and down on his back until it snapped. Prisoners, who survived by drinking their own and each other's urine, were constantly being called out of their cramped quarters, by name. Some would return caked in blood, bruised black-and-blue or slashed with knives; others would never be seen alive again. Special squads of inmates were ordered to load their corpses on to trucks. (Vulliamy, 1998: 74-75.)[16]
> " There is no evidence that any of the women at Omarska were killed.[17] The rape of the small number of women at the camp was certainly generalized and atrocious. But by what standard is Omarska "particularly … notorious" for the rape of its women detainees, when thousands of civilian males were viciously tortured, hundreds killed — and almost certainly a great many more raped and sexually abused than women, given the unbridled sexual sadism that pervaded the camp?

None of this is news to those who are regular visitors to AVFM or anyone with a modicum of intelligence who has been reading our own media coverage of victims of violence during the past forty years. Adam Jones was hopeful that his powerful article would draw attention to this horrific practice of deliberately effacing men from the narrative whenever they are victims of violence or abuse of any kind.

Sadly, absolutely nothing has changed.

Let Adam Jones have the final say:

> The conclusions that can and should be drawn from this body of evidence and argument depend very much on whether one views males as "natural" targets of victimization, and therefore irrelevant and unnewsworthy; or whether, on the other hand, one sees them as equally deserving of attention and protection in the face of violent assaults, up to and including genocidal mass killing.
> My own preferences are no doubt apparent. In my opinion, no meaningful claim to humanity, fairness, or analytical accuracy can be advanced by those who, consciously or unconsciously, would consign half the human race to second-class status in the humanitarian and policy equation.
> This article has argued that an alternative framework is possible, and needs to be adopted rapidly to ensure that all victims of violence receive the empathy, attention, and assistance they require.

All of the bolded type is my emphasis.

I would recommend a visit to this site. This book is a collection of essays on gender and violence by Adam Jones.

Julian Assange, Justine Damond and the derogation of men's rights

Jewel Eldora · 12 April 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Julian Assange and Justine Damond are both Australians who frightened agents of the United States.

One alerted the public to war crimes and fraud, the other allegedly ran up to and slapped the side of a car in the affluent neighborhood where Antifa started, making two police officers believe, for a split second, that they were in danger.

Sidenote: What is Antifa?

Both are likely to end up dead at the hands of the US State.

One, according to Dr. Tania Reynolds is perceived as agentic, responsible for their actions, the other, as a victim. While the death of one is perceived as a tragedy and met with outrage, the other will be watched in slow motion to the cheers of half the country.

The trial of officer Mohamed Mohamed Noor, in Minneapolis, Minnesota is likely to tear the fabric of reality for many Minnesotans, should he, like the 24 officers since Damond's death, be cleared of all charges.

The 11 seats open to the public have been mostly filled with agents of the court, city employees, and the corporate media. One blogger and legal analyst, Scott Johnson, has just taken the reserved seat of the New York Times reporter who couldn't be bothered to hear the case. Apparently, he'd been hoping to just leave it empty until the day of the verdict.

Scott Johnson, like me, has been getting up at 4 am every day to get one of these seats and can now come in as the trial starts. Phones, computers, cameras, and audio recording devices are confiscated by the two layers of security which attendees must pass through in this so called "public" trial.

This weekend, when court is out of session, I'll be updating AFVM readers to news of the trial.

Perhaps just as importantly, the history which lead to her tragic death at the hands of the State of Minnesota.

A classic 50s fairy tale

Doug Mortimer · 12 April 2019 · Archived copy · Original

The 1950s are often derided by people who weren't alive at the time. According to contemporary enlightened social pundits, the decade was characterized by patriarchy, the corporation man, conformity, suppression of minorities and women, suburban sprawl necessitated by gas-guzzling automobiles with gaudy tail fins, and all sorts of things that are considered icky-poo today.

As time passes, fewer and fewer people who walked the earth during the 1950s are around to comment on that decade, for better or worse, but we do have cultural artifacts which testify to the temper of the times. One such artifact is Marty, a mid-decade (made in 1954, released in 1955) movie greatly honored in its day.

In an era noted for widescreen Technicolor extravaganzas, Marty definitely went against the grain. It was shot in black and white on location in the Bronx and featured characters who were anything but glamorous. Nominated for seven Oscars, it won awards for Best Picture, Best Actor (Ernest Borgnine in the title role), Best Director (Delbert Mann), and Adapted Script (Paddy Chayefsky). For good measure it won the Palme d'Or at the Cannes Film Festival, and a copy of the film has been placed in the National Film Registry of the Library of Congress. So its establishment bona fides are impressive.

As often happens with timely films, however, Marty seems dated today. Yet its portrayal of the manosphere of its time is not without relevance for contemporary men.

The biggest long-term beneficiary of the film's success was stumpy Ernest Borgnine, who proved his acting range went far beyond the thuggish supporting roles he had played to that point in his career. The real force behind the film, however, was screenwriter Paddy Chayefsky. While he won an Oscar for best adapted screenplay, the original source was his Philco Television Playhouse teleplay (which featured Rod Steiger in the title role), which was produced in 1953. So Marty is definitely Chayefsky's baby. Like Marty, Chayefsky was Bronx-born (in 1923), stocky, and burly, so we might surmise that Marty is something of an alter ego.

Chayefsky tells us all we need to know about Marty in the opening scene in a Bronx butcher shop. Being a squat, ugly guy working in the Bronx in the 1950s worked for Yogi Berra, but it's not going so well for Marty.

We immediately know what Marty looks like (a face only a mother could love atop a beer keg of a body) and what he does for a living (he's a butcher). Minutes later, after listening to him chat with his customers, we know all about his personal life. While he brings a regular customer up to date on the status of his brothers and sisters (all now married), the woman berates him, saying "What's the matter with you?" The very next customer says, "You ought to be ashamed of yourself." You see, being a law-abiding guy earning an honest living isn't enough to make you respectable. Marty, if you ain't married, you ain't shit.

After work, Marty returns to the modest home where he still lives with his mother, even though he is 34 years old. Unlike today, there was less of a stigma attached to such a living arrangement back then. In ethnic households in particular, it was normal for adult children to live at home till marrying. Typically, this wasn't long after finishing school. Single people were out there, but there was no "singles" subculture. In today's parlance, single people were marginalized. Marty didn't know it, but one day his generation would be characterized as the Greatest Generation by Tom Brokaw. Of course, to be a member in good standing, you had to be married, preferably with kids.

No video games in 1954, however, so Marty passes his leisure time with similarly situated guys who hang out at a local tavern, drink beer, and read girlie magazines. They are the local chapter of the not-so-great members of the Greatest Generation because they have remained bachelors. Guess we could call them the Bronx Bummers.

One of Marty's friends (played by Frank Sutton, best known as Sgt. Carter in the Gomer Pyle, USMC TV series) is the 50s equivalent of a pickup artist, another thinks that Mickey Spillane's Mike Hammer is the ultimate role model for male-female relationships. Angie, Marty's best friend, is a ferret-faced cipher. His dialogue with Marty is like a Greek chorus. "What do you want to do tonight, Marty?" "I dunno, what do you want to do, Angie?" Blather, rinse, repeat.

Predictably, Marty's mother wants him to settle down – more to the point, she wants him to "find a nice girl." Actually, he's already settled down. He just hasn't married. "You got a bachelor on your hands," he tells his mother. "You're gonna die without a son!" she laments. But he knows his limitations: "I'm just a fat, little man, a fat ugly man." Even worse, he has no game: "Sooner or later there comes a point in a man's life when he's got to face some facts, and one fact I got to face is that whatever it is that women like, I ain't got it."

Can we say that Marty was incel when incel wasn't cool? In six years, will he be a 40-year-old virgin? Actually, we don't know anything about his sex life, but given his age and the fact that he is a World War II vet, it is highly unlikely that he is still a virgin. At any rate, when his mother suggests he attend a mixer at the Stardust Ballroom, he reluctantly goes along just to keep peace in the family, even though he has been there and done that over and over. "All that ever happened to me there was girls made me feel like a—a—a bug."

Miraculously, just when it looks like Marty's in for another "big night of heartache" at the Stardust, he meets Clara Snyder, who has been abandoned by her date, so they commiserate. A high school chemistry teacher, she is 29 years old and still lives with her folks. Misery loves company, so the two of them compare notes the rest of the evening. They swap stories of going on crying jags and even thoughts of suicide. Nevertheless, the pity party ends on a high note and Marty promises to call her the next day. "Dogs like us – we ain't such dogs as we think we are," he proclaims.

Marty and Clara

Now it is worth pausing to note that while Clara is a wallflower, and during the movie she is repeatedly called "a dog," she doesn't look that bad compared to today's crop of obese, foul-mouthed, purple-haired harridans. She's not hideous, she's just plain.

Marty's mom, though she wants him to get married, is suspicious of Clara. After all, the girl is a graduate of New York University. Uh oh, isn't that in Greenwich Village? In other words: beatniks and bolshies and fags…oh, my! She's probably out there canvassing for Adlai Stevenson and carrying signs at Ban-the-Bomb demonstrations. Can a girl like that – and a non-Italian girl at that – make a proper wife for her son? Will she be willing to move into mama's house after marriage, or will she insist on having her own place? Sure, mama wants Marty to get married, but she wants him to bring his wife home to share the household. She wants to gain a daughter, not lose a son.

While Marty has been wallowing in his loneliness and yearning for a soul mate ("Don't you think I want to get married? I want to get married!"), he seems oblivious to the drawbacks of the institution. His cousin Tommy (played by Jerry Paris, later better known as the next-door neighbor on The Dick Van Dyke Show) has repeated spats with his wife. Notably, there is no mention of divorce or family law courts.

Divorce, of course, was not as common in the mid-1950s as it is today, but it was a clear and present danger. During Marty's lifetime, the emancipation of women has been an ongoing narrative, from female suffrage to Rosie the Riveter. Sure, the divorce rate spiked after World War II, but the remedy is re-marriage. If at first you don't succeed…remember, true love is out there. And Marty sees Clara as the embodiment of true love. She is the answer to his prayers…what could go wrong?

Well, Clara is a college grad and Marty isn't. She is a "sophisticate" and Marty isn't. Both are Catholic but she isn't Italian and Marty is. These are the foreseeable problems. In retrospect, they are trivial.

The introduction of the birth control pill, the sexual revolution, and women's liberation, as feminism was popularly known in the 1960s, are just around the corner. Given Clara's background, she will probably read Betty Friedan's The Feminine Mystique (published in 1963), and good-hearted, nice guy Marty may be transformed into a tyrant in her eyes.

These phenomena will appear on the radar screen as the 50s give way to the 60s, but Marty has no way of foreseeing them. It may not seem like it, but he has a lot at stake.

Marty's modest ambition is to buy the butcher shop where he works. If his mother dies, he will likely own the house outright. So his economic future looks pretty good so long as he remains single. If he gets married, however, he could be taken to the cleaners in divorce court. If he fathers kids, he could be hit up for child support. Clara, starting childbearing late in life, is more likely to give birth to a child with birth defects. In other words, a human money pit.

After a heated argument with his wife, Marty's cousin tells him that he has "a good job, no wife, and no responsibilities. Stay that way!" But Marty isn't paying attention. Bachelorhood may be a fact of life for him, but it is a default position, hopefully only temporary, and certainly not a status to celebrate. One day after meeting Clara, Marty is already thinking of tying the knot.

Marty isn't stupid (he was accepted at City College of New York, Paddy Chayefsky's alma mater, but didn't enroll), but he lives in a cocoon as stifling as it is comforting. He just can't imagine life beyond his neighborhood. New York City is chock full of entertainment and cultural amenities from the highest to the lowest with all levels in-between. Considering that Marty is just a subway ride away from Manhattan, it's hard to see how he and his pal Angie could ever be at a loss for things to do. As a bachelor, he's in a much better position to take advantage of the city than his married peers. But Marty has bought into the notion that as long as he remains single his life is incomplete. Smarter guys than Marty have been waylaid by that notion.

Despite the naturalistic trappings of Marty, Chayefsky's script is ultimately a boy-meets-girl fairy tale. Presumably love will conquer all and Marty and Clara, albeit ugly ducklings, will live happily ever after. In the final scene of the movie, when Marty is calling up Clara for a follow-up date, he berates Angie just as the old women shamed him in the beginning of the movie. "Hey, Angie, when are you going to get married?" So the marriage-go-round has come full circle.

Chayefsky's sentimental side is also on display in his script for The Bachelor Party (1957), which covers a lot of the same ground, dealing with a group of men who reluctantly admit that despite its drawbacks, marriage is the ideal state for a man. But somewhere along the line, Chayefsky changed his mind.

In 1971 he won an Oscar for The Hospital, a tale about a doctor (George C. Scott) whose family and hospital have both become dysfunctional. Five years later he won an Oscar for Network, in which a TV network is an allegory for a dystopian society, and a ruthless career woman (Faye Dunaway) is at the heart of it. By this time, Marty the Bronx butcher, appears quaint indeed.

If Marty felt sorry for himself in the mid-50s, just imagine what the erstwhile mama's boy would be like in subsequent decades. He'd probably flip out, don a bloody apron, take up his meat cleaver, and become the protagonist of a slasher film franchise.

So who do you wanna kill tonight, Marty?

I dunno, Angie, who do you wanna kill tonight?

Why are men “afraid” of commitment?

John Davis · 13 April 2019 · Archived copy · Original

“The cuckoo then, on every tree,
Mocks married men; for thus sings he,
‘Cuckoo’; (14–16)”—Shakespeare

When the media “reports” that men are “afraid” of commitment, it’s a continuation of a 50 year trend to mock and disparage men for their reproductive choices.

Men aren’t “afraid” of commitment. When men walk away from “commitment” and marriage, they are making intelligent choices. Fear doesn’t enter into men’s minds when they walk away from women in our “modern” culture.

There was once a time when marriage was an honorable institution. It was not that long ago.

As mankind rose from primitive savagery, to civilizing the world, men were able to bring art, beauty, truth and goodness to the human condition. Marriage was vital to the stability that permitted these advances in humanity.

Marriage was a balanced set of cultural traditions and values in which men and women supported each other, assumed gendered roles that encouraged them to support each other, and, provided a means for men and women to enhance their lives through the synergy of mutual care, respect, responsibility and knowledge for and about each other.

Those days are long gone.

Marriage is no longer an honorable institution. It is simply a device of the neo-Marxist state to exploit men.

Do you think that is an exaggeration?

Let’s ask some straight questions.

What benefits does marriage offer a man?

The answer is that marriage offers nothing to men. At one time, men could enjoy trusting a woman with his love and sexual feelings. Current government regulation, however, has, virtually demonized and criminalized every aspect of men’s feelings and sexuality in, and outside of marriage.

[image]

At one time, Men could count on marriages lasting a lifetime. This gave him, his wife and his children stability and the incentive to work together, as a family, for long term benefits and gains.

Now, women file 80% of divorces, within about 8 years of marriage, use the biased and oppressive family courts to strip a man of his children, his life savings, and leave him to twist in the wind without a support network of any kind. Our laws and family court judges are designed to encourage women to get a divorce, alienate the children from their Father’s protection, and, exploit men for the convenience and enrichment of the neo-marxist state . . .

Men are dying from suicide at six times the rate of women in some age categories. We know that one of the reasons is the man-hating (misandry) that saturates our institutions (law, education, military, religion, etc.), and, that the other is that a man loses everything in most marriages. To meet draconian government regulation of marriage, a man must abandon his personal support network of friends, and, when he is divorced, and impressed into the service of the state to pay child support, he no longer has the time or energy to form personal support networks of friends.

Men walk away from marriage and commitment with women out of intellect and common sense choice. “Fear” has nothing to do with it.

So the empowering “woman behind the black hole photo” was worldwide fake news?

Aldir Gracindo · 14 April 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Thursday was a great day of feminist victory for the World to see, including me, in Brazil. This time, the news on mainstream media, including CBS News, Yahoo News, BBC News, New York Post and many others, in English, as well as MSN, Revista Galileu and many others, in Portuguese and quite surely in every other language on Earth – was about “Katie Bouman, the woman behind the first photograph of a black hole”. The picture of amazed Katie after looking at her work on a computer screen won the media, following the black hole photograph.

On Brazil’s Facebook, a feminist’s empowered post went viral:

https://www.facebook.com/julia.ivy.7311/posts/131266804656474

> For the first time in History, astronomers achieved to present the first image ever of a black hole. The deed is considered one of the greatest landmarks in Physics in this century.
> The project was led by a woman, HER NAME IS KATIE BOUMAN!
> Gonna have to put up with the power of women in Science. ❤

Someone gloriously commented: “Cry sexists”! Sorry, patriarchs. It’s over. Gonna have to put up with it.

That lunatic fantasy of oppressed women for ever stepping on the privileged, oppressor men has finally come to real life. No woman can do anything anymore without automatically becoming a pawn in this carcinogenic political war on men. Your girls will be the future and your boys, the past. Insert here all other intersectional diatribes you want.

That was reposted on our own local biggest regressive leftist page on the also regressive leftist Facebook: Quebrando o Tabu.

Then controversy followed, coming straight from the internet darkest cesspools of hate: The allegation that Katie Bouman was being credited for someone else’s work. Isabel Togoh from the also-regressive leftist Huffington Post reported; the horrific misogynist attack against the dreams of poor, heroic little girls of becoming scientists started on Reddit, where an user had written:

> Notice something? Yeah, that woman wrote about 2,000 lines of code total. Another guy wrote over 850,000. Katie barely worked on the project at all until late last year, Andrew Chael worked on it relentlessly from it’s conception.
> If anyone deserves the credit, it’s him

Chael was memefied with the prints suggesting the very little contribution of Bouman. This is one of the memes:

Chael reacted on Twitter, I'm not reposting all his 8 tweets here. He said that even though he was the main code writer, there was not 850,000 lines, but 68,000, many of which were on the software and he doesn't care how many he personally authored. He doesn't care, but he says he is the main writer, ok? He also added that he is a homossexual, a very pertinent bit of information for the discussion when you want to signal that you are a minority and minorities support minorities and are supported by just everyone, of course, as an obligation.

Anyhow, what actually matters: what is truth in this little, epic, quantum, conspirational, disinformative, culture war story? Was Bouman the giver of the first black hole photo to Humanity or not? Did she take the credit off Andrew Chael, who then defended her because she is his boss, or because gays and women and people of color must unite against the hateful oppressors and lie? Such a huge mess, it looks like a worldwide surge of insanity.

Let us take five minutes to unravel this interstellar mystery.

There are many sources for those interested in details, but I favor Sarah Mervosh, who already said almost it all for the New York Times, under the oh-so revealing title of "How Katie Bouman Accidentally Became the Face of the Black Hole Project", and with a very entertaining contextualization:

> As the first-ever picture of a black hole was unveiled this week, another image began making its way around the internet: a photo of a young scientist, clasping her hands over her face and reacting with glee to an image of an orange ring of light, circling a deep, dark abyss.
> It was a photo too good not to share. The scientist, Katie Bouman, a postdoctoral fellow who contributed to the project, became an instant hero for women and girls in STEM, a welcome symbol in a world hungry for representation.
> Public figures from Washington to Hollywood learned her name. And some advocates, familiar with how history can write over the contributions of women…

Yes, really. Hero for women and girls, a world hungry for representation, history writes over the contributions of women. No surprises – I mean, as in that Radiohead's No Surprises song.

Nevertheless, excusing the pararreligious framing of the story, she did bring facts. Doctor Bouman is a young scientist who collaborated in an important work for any person on the planet interested in Science. She was part of a team of 200 other scientists all over the world. They were 40 women and 160 men. You might hear about some of the 39 other women from now on.

Is she "the woman behind the black hole photograph", though? No.

Was she the leader of the project? Also a no. The Black Hole Project is an initiative of the Harvard University, leaded by Astronomer Shep Doeleman, from the Harvard Smithsonian Center for Astrophysics.

She did lead one major subgroups, or one of them, then? Again that will be a no. Doctor Bouman lead a group which was developing an imaging software to create a Black hole photograph and did a Ted Talk about it. But that software was not used to create this photograph, Mervosh says.

Seeing herself referred to as "the woman behind the black hole photograph" by the MSM, Bouman diplomatically mentioned on a post on Facebook that "No one algorithm or person made this image, it required the amazing talent of a team of scientists from around the globe and years of hard work to develop the instrument, data processing, imaging methods, and analysis techniques that were necessary to pull off this seemingly impossible feat".

> I'm so excited that we finally get to share what we have been working on for the past year! The image shown today is the…

Katie Bouman used her now famous photo on her Facebook page, captioning: "Watching in disbelief as the first image I ever made of a black hole was in the process of being reconstructed." Someone commented: "That's a pretty humble description. Isn't it first EVER picture of a black hole, in addition to being first one you ever made?" To which she replied:

> Actually no, there were a number of us that all squeezed into the room and pressed go on our computers at the exact same time! We didn't want any one person or algorithm to be the first one to make the image. Shout out to Andrew Chael Michael Johnson, Kazu Akiyama, Daniel Palumbo, Lindy Blackburn, Maciek Wielgus, Sara Issaoun, and many others!

> Watching in disbelief as the first image I ever made of a black hole was in the process of being reconstructed.

By the way, Andrew Chael didn't write more than 850,000 lines of code. Any github user, or the page guides.github.com, can tell you that "commit" means saving changes, no matter how many, or what changes you make in your work. It does not mean "one line of code added". As a comparison, you could write one 35 lines article for your website, "commit" (post it) one time, then make 50 changes on it, adding 3 lines to the text itself, and "commit" (save the new changes in the post) 15 times.

Conclusion: The mainstream media basically used a selfie of Doctor Katie Bouman to fabricate the narrative of the woman leader taking over science, who this cruel, patriarchal world of oppressive, white, straight, angry, misogynistic men would have to put up with. She is not the woman who gave the first ever photograph of a black hole to humanity. She did not lead the project. She did not lead a major subgroup in the project. She didn't take credit for David Chael's work either. She never claimed to be the woman behind anything, on the contrary – and that is why she will not have at least other 199 scientists refuting her.

Here is a simple, yet legitimate suspicion, since I did not care to dig up timeline and names: someone loved her selfie so much, he/she extrapolated the facts and from there the media entered ctrl+v mode in domino effect. That would not be the first time. Add to that Bouman having starred in a TED Talk on exactly her leading a team that worked on a black hole imaging software development and voilá! The media and the feminists on social media let themselves into this alternative reality, diverse from the real world of the scientists in the project.

According to Sarah Mervosh, the one in the NY Times, Katie Bouman said she had to turn off her phone because of the so many messages she was receiving on Wednesday. She was quoted as saying “I’m so glad that everyone is as excited as we are and people are finding our story inspirational,”. “However, the spotlight should be on the team and on no individual person. Focusing on one person like this helps no one, including me.”

“Other women on the project also celebrated this week as years of hard work were finally made public”, Mervosh countered, and I quote in italics.

A few edits were made in this article after its publishing and it was first posted on AVfM in Portuguese.

Ilhan Abdullahi Omar, 911 and the derogation of men's rights

Jewel Eldora · 16 April 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Two weeks ago, I began watching the trial of Mohamed Noor, the Minneapolis Police officer who shot Australian native Justine Damond. Since then, I've been getting up at 4 am, heading to the Hennepin County Government Center, going through two security checks, and surrendering all of my electronics in order to get a first hand view of the proceedings.

There are 3.5 million people in Minnesota and the court has set aside 11 first come, first served seats for the public, and 15 seats for the corporate media, which were reserved right at the beginning of the trial. Those reserved media seats often sit empty, and the public seats are regularly taken up by court employees, a rotating crew of Minneapolis City Attorneys, and the media, all of whom get there early.

In the last several days, some of the "Open" seats have been relabeled as "State" seats. In the United States, the 6th Amendment assures that citizens will receive a public trial. Nothing like that is happening in the Mohamed Noor Trial, where the media is being used as a "proxy for the public."

The media's attention is hyper focused on race, race, race, race, race, race, and the fact that the accused is a Muslim born in Somalia. In the meantime, Ilhan Abdullahi Omar, (D) MN, is making national news nearly every day. Racism is the huge distraction used to prevent us from talking about the fact that Mohamed Noor is an American citizen. What is being overlooked is that he's lived in the US since he was five, and has spent the last 25 winters living in Minnesota.

He's not Somali, he's an American, with the responsibilities and rights afforded to citizenry.

Of the several dozen people I've talked to about the trial, I've had at least two men say they'd just as soon shoot him than give him a trial.

While Ilhan Omar is either being vilified by some for minimizing the 2001 terrorist attacks, or protected by others for telling other Muslims to get right in people's faces for looking at them, Noor, is being held up by many as an exemplar of Muslims, Somalis, Cops, Gun owners, or even Blacks.

As I've been writing about for over a year now, Noor, is not a member of any of those groups. He's a man. A man on trial for doing his job, possibly poorly, definitely with deadly outcomes.

In America, there is an app that comes installed on every phone. It's called "911" and people use it to remove problems with deadly force, if necessary. When the jury pool in this case was asked what their experience with 911 was, every single woman mentioned at least one time that she'd called 911 when she believed another woman was in distress. Every. Single. One.

The jury pool ended up being comprised of 10 men and 2 women, in part, because nearly every one of the women questioned openly struggled with the concept of the presumption of innocence, and the idea that Justine Damond might be dead, but yet, no crime may have been committed. "She was calling for help, and ended up being shot." The cognitive dissonance was palpable.

96% of all police homicides are men, and the majority of women would prefer to avoid the idea that this useful app comes with deadly terms and conditions. Even for them, sometimes.

The Fraud of Feminism

Mark Dent · 16 April 2019 · Archived copy · Original

There is a quote from one of the characters in the play/film, The History Boys, which touched me deeply:

> "The best moments in reading are when you come across something – a thought, a feeling, a way of looking at things – that you'd thought special, particular to you. And here it is, set down by someone else, a person you've never met, maybe even someone long dead. And it's as if a hand has come out and taken yours."

I had the pleasure of rediscovering that special feeling so beautifully expressed in the quote above when I began reading The Fraud of Feminism by E. Belfort Bax. The book was written in 1913.

His commentary and insights into feminism are astonishingly fresh and as relevant and applicable today as they were more than one hundred years ago.

It was a remarkable experience to read a passage relating to what today would be labelled "virtue signaling" and to see that the very same behavior was occurring in 1913 (and long before) for the very same reasons as it exists today.

> So far as courage is concerned, which was perhaps the first of the chivalric virtues in the old days, it certainly requires more courage in our days to deal severely with a woman when she deserves it (as a man would be dealt with in like circumstances) than it does to back up a woman against her wicked male opponent.
> It is a cheap thing, for example, in the case of a man and woman quarrelling in the street, to play out the stage rôle of the bold and gallant Englishman "who won't see a woman maltreated and put upon, not he!" and this, of course, without any inquiry into the merits of the quarrel. To swim with the stream, to make a pretense of boldness and bravery, when all the time you know you have the backing of conventional public opinion and mob-force behind you, is the cheapest of mock heroics."

This insightful comment succinctly sums up so much of what transpires on Facebook, Instagram and any other platform provided by our puppet masters.

How often do we see people loudly "taking a stand" on an issue related to gender which is one they know is already supported and backed by the government, media, education system and those who control cyber space? They are then showered in praise and congratulations for demonstrating such courage by hundreds or even thousands of other like-minded cowards.

Celebrities are particularly adept at this ploy, but there are many others who make a daily habit of exhibiting their moral virtue and courage by commenting on an issue knowing the numbers and the power are right behind them.

It really is farcical.

Bax is quite brilliant in the way he dismantles the fraudulent claims made by feminists and he provides many examples of the hypocrisy and blatant double standards of the law and society when it comes to the treatment of men and women.

In an earlier article Feminism and Female Suffrage, 1910, Bax says:

> I propose to show, as briefly as possible, not only, that women at the present time, considered as women and apart from the class to which they belong, suffer no sort of social injustice to which the men of their class are not equally exposed, but, on the contrary, that as women they enjoy privileges, and hence constitute a privileged order of human beings, not only as against the men of their class, but as against men generally, as men. If this be so, I contend not only does the practical urgency of the Suffrage claim, even if it were conceded in the abstract, fall to > the ground, but even the abstract right itself would disappear, since the granting of it would amount to the piling up of an additional privilege on an already privileged class.

It is shockingly revealing to read such words when one knows they were written during a time feminists (and most of today's general population) would proclaim to be the dark old days when women were supposedly little more than slaves to their husbands, oppressed and restrained by a government and society which viewed them as second class citizens at best. Bax makes it abundantly clear that women were privileged in numerous ways — most of which we are familiar with today.

> That the object of a large number of these women who are now clamouring for the franchise is not merely to maintain but to extend their legal privileges is evident to anyone. They want the suffrage as a weapon wherewith to carry on a sex-war, with a view to the dominance of the female.

He provides concrete evidence of this privilege women possess:

> Let us address ourselves to our more immediate purpose, which is to show the privileged status of women before the law, alike in itself and still more in its administration.
> - Let us begin with the civil law, and, first of all, with that relating to the status of the married woman. No woman can be imprisoned for debt ("contempt of court") no matter what means she may possess, although her husband may be for the non-payment of her debts. Not even can her property be attached for the payment of a debt if settled on her in due form.
> - Neither can she be served with a bankruptcy order unless in relation to a business carried on apart from her husband and in her own name.
> - She is free to leave her husband, and he has no legal power to detain her or compel her to return. He has no control over her personal property. She, on the other hand, can obtain an order for restitution of conjugal rights, by which he is ordered to return, or she can obtain alimony or maintenance, according to her "station in life."
> - The husband is responsible for any slander or libel she may commit although he knew nothing of it or even disapproved it. He is liable, that is, for damages and costs, while she escapes with absolute impunity.
> From the above it will be seen that the infamous British law sticks at no outrage on the most elementary principles of common rectitude in privileging the married woman at the cost of her husband.
> - Among all the women's rights advocates I am not aware of one who, in her zeal for equality between the sexes, has ever suggested abolishing the right of maintenance of the wife by the husband. On the contrary, they are usually only too eager to increase the husband's burdens in this connection. By an Act passed in 1895 this liability for maintenance was extended to a wife notwithstanding her adultery.
> As has been remarked of the judges in this matter, "every moth-eaten scrap of privilege which is in favour of the wife they retain. All privileges of the husband, no matter how firmly established, they deny as ever having existed."
> - The Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1885 a boy of fourteen can be convicted for committing a sexual offence with a girl of sixteen, to which he was actually incited by the latter, who, by virtue of her sex, is held guiltless by the law. I know of a case in which a female was produced as witness against several boys, younger than herself, whom she had seduced, but the Court held that this precocious creature could not be punished, although her victims were duly sent to gaol.
> - As regards prison treatment, it is well known that flogging is absolutely abolished by the Act of 1820 where women are concerned. Hanging is practically abolished by usage for women who murder men. Women, if they find prison discipline irksome to them, have, as a rule, only to create a sufficient disturbance to get it > relaxed. A very flagrant case of this kind occurred some years ago at Wormwood Scrubbs. In any case the duration of sentence is, on the average, about one-third that which a man would receive for a like offence, while the “hard-labour” is generally little more than nominal.

[image]I could literally quote pages of Bax’s eye-opening facts on female privilege and the abuse of the notion of chivalry to have men do their bidding, but once again, I would urge you to find his book and essays through this link and read the work for yourselves. It punches a huge hole in yet another feminist myth which has repeatedly told us that women were regarded as having no value or power in society until about… yesterday. This patent lie has been drummed into the hearts and minds of boys and girls from an early age which helps to explain the current world in which we exist.

Fortunately, the wonders of technology have provided us with the opportunity to strike back and I think we all know there is a growing awareness about what is really behind the whining, ranting voices of feminists demanding equality.

A comprehensive archive of essays and books by Bax can be found here. A number of them are directly related to his objections to feminism and a demand for more empathy and justice for men and boys.

Mohamed Noor, fake news and the automatic outgroup derogation of men

Jewel Eldora · 16 April 2019 · Archived copy · Original

The following are two direct quotes from the trial of Officer Mohamed Noor last week.

#1) "No one here is on trial for breaking police policy." Judge Kathryn Quaintance.

Quote #1 is out of context, directionally true and would be a funny joke if it wasn't too dark and too true.

#2) "I know she wasn't a threat." Officer Noor's partner, Matthew Harrity.

Quote #2 is out of context, 100% fake news, and is what the Minnesota public is being led to believe was reality in the courtroom. I know it's not, because I've been there, I've been watching this case since before it happened. Let me explain.

Five weeks before Justine Ruszczyk Damond was killed, I began a five part series analyzing a specific bias and blind spot in empathy toward men and the moral taboos about men discussing men's issues.

The articles were written to be bizarre, clever, naughty, recognizable and/or cute, to make taboo subjects easier to digest and hopefully more persuasive. By looking at men's issues through a "Minnesota Nice" filter, I could easily guarantee them to be bizarre and mean. Minnesota Nice is a code for a certain type of conflict-averse, post-modern-neo-marxist gynocentrism. It's the bizarre language of Ilhan Omar, Al Franken, Garrison Keillor, and Monty Python's Terry Gilliam.

"Grossness as a human value indicator," is about male devaluation. "A weak case for the humanity of men," is about the stereotypes that men are automatically subjected to, and "Oh, fuck. We're doomed and only women can save the day" is about how even men don't want to hear men talk about about men's issues.

The week of my first article, Jeronimo Yanez had been cleared of all charges in shooting Philando Castile live on facebook, and an anthropology professor made classic textbook derogatory statements about Otto Warmbier. I compared Castile to Warmbier.

The week of the fifth and final article in the series, Justine Ruszczyk Damond was shot dead by Officer Mohamed Noor. I compared Castile to Damond in a stream of consciousness article that was decidedly not Minnesota Nice. I wrote and cried and puked and wrote and puked and cried some more. I ended that article begging my readers to pay attention to the trial of Mohamed Noor to ensure he gets a fair, public trial.

Now here we are, and nothing like that is happening. I know, because I'm there every day and it all seems too weird to even be real.

Judge Quaintance, literally a former actress, chastised defense attorney Plunkett for being an "older man intimidating younger women" in open court, for asking prospective jurors about their understanding of the presumption of innocence because they couldn't get their heads around it.

The testimony has been even more bizarre than jury selection.

The first officer on the scene, nicknamed "Ringer", shot and killed Minneapolis resident Jamar Clark in 2015, which resulted in a week of riots. The incident commander ordered Noor's vehicle washed, detailed, and put back into service without any forensics. Her commander is famous for the "magically appearing gun evidence trick" in the 90's, after shooting a guy in the back, and the police chief testified that he'd never heard any concerns of police ambushes before testifying in court.

If that isn't surreal enough, the MN District Attorney became the President of the National District Attorney's Association one week after the shooting. He was literally caught on camera last year, saying he was going to bring charges against Noor, a Muslim, as a Christmas present.

I couldn't make this up if I tried, and if I did, no one would want to read it. The fake-news media seems to be working as the propaganda arm of the police, and framing Noor as a stereotypical perpetrator of harm.

I've answered over 1,000 reader comments at AVFM and have never once asked anyone to share an article.

I'd really like to get Scott Adams' attention on this case. Adams is well-versed in perception, bias, and stereotypes, and is a leading expert on persuasion and influence. His Whenhub account lists him as a writing consultant, and I'd love to get his advice on how to draw attention to this case and counteract the fake news.

He's also very good at predicting things, and I'd like to hear his predictions about how the population of Minnesota, 100,000 of which are Somali and know this is a show trial, may respond to this situation.

It would mean the world to me if you could help me get this article on his radar by tweeting this to him (https://twitter.com/scottadamssays) so he might weigh in with his opinion on this, before people have their opinions assigned by Fox and CNN once this trial is over.

You’re a rapist if you screw your sleeping or sozzled wife in the land of the kilt

Andrew Tettenborn · 26 April 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Rape is a vile and sordid crime, and the details more sordid still (if you feel squeamish don’t read further). But this hasn’t stopped well-meaning progressives in Scotland, in their desperate quest for politically-correct feminist orthodoxy, from making fools of themselves and – courtesy of a decision of the Scottish Appeal Court produced last year but only reported a few days ago – rapists of a sizeable proportion of Scotsmen.

Let me explain. In 2009 the oh-so-woke SNP Scottish government decided on an up-to-date definition of rape, free from the encrusted detritus of the patriarchy. Having done this, they put it into the Sexual Offences (Scotland) Act 2009. It can best be summed up as “if in doubt it’s rape.”

Putting matters as delicately as possible, the new law says rape is penetration, so long as it continues, to which there is no free consent or reasonable belief on free consent. It then says that as a matter of law consent cannot be given by a person who is drunk, incapable or asleep, and can be withdrawn at any time; and that consent to one act does not mean consent to anything else.

The problem is not difficult to spot. Imagine a long-standing and loving couple in bed: as often happens, she wakes up in the middle of the night with him (again putting matters delicately) inside her, and thereafter both take pleasure in the whole event.

If you want to have sex with your wife you must always thoroughly wake her up first.

This, or something like it, was the background to the Scottish appeal in question. But there was one change: she later made a complaint of rape. And from then on things moved inexorably. He was charged and hauled up before the High Court. He gave his story about his partner’s and his normal practices, and said that because of this she must have implicitly consented before drifting off to sleep.

The judge, however, disagreed, as did the Appeal Court. Consent as a matter of law had to be absolutely contemporaneous; when asleep she couldn’t consent, and prior consent, even if established, was irrelevant, and could not be put in evidence. He was ipso facto a rapist.

It’s difficult to know where to start. For one thing, this decision licenses the law in Scotland to poke its nose into what one might reasonably think were the entirely unobjectionable bedroom practices of a fair number of people up and down North Britain.

It’s saying, in its bossy Celtic way, “If you want to have sex with your wife you must always thoroughly wake her up first: that’s the only practice we recognise, and if you do anything else we can have you banged up in Barlinnie for a good many years.” Indeed, it goes further.

Logically it means that if a couple happily make a habit of drunken intimacy every Saturday night after an evening's clubbing, this too must stop. She can't consent because she is tiddly, and he therefore becomes a weekly rapist. Put bluntly, any form of drunken sex, however intimate or long-standing the relationship, is now apparently illegal. Both have to wait in abstinence until they have sobered up, courtesy of the Caledonian Taliban, or they'll be seeing a visit from the rape police. The Wee Frees at their most intrusive had nothing on this.

But it is not only that. The possibilities it opens up for blackmail by a jilted or dissatisfied partner are frightening: however much both parties may have previously enjoyed somnolent or drunken sex, she can now put entirely unfair pressure on him and say that if he doesn't do as she wants she will make a rape complaint, with all the official sympathy and credulousness of the feminist movement behind her, and correspondingly painful consequences for him.

The Appeal Court doesn't come out of this well: with engaging complacency it simply says that, if the law is too wide, that's tough: but surely prosecutors can be trusted, and if serious problems arise the law might perhaps be changed. Put another way, the fate of many a man charged with one of the nastiest offences in the criminal law, likely to land him in the nonce's wing in the nick, must now lie in the hands, not of a jury, who cannot be told that his partner has said she's happy to have sex in her sleep, but of the kindness of prosecutors. I'm sure future panels (the Scots word for criminal defendants) will be very grateful.

But the other body that comes discreditably out of this is the new-style Scottish establishment. It's not as if it wasn't warned in 2009. The Scottish Law Commission, which prepared the legislation, saw the problem just described, and provided specifically for prior consent to be admissible in evidence. The Law Society of Scotland saw the problem, and recommended keeping prior consent. The Professor of Criminal Law at the University of Edinburgh saw the problem and recommended keeping prior consent.

She can't consent because she is tiddly, and he therefore becomes a weekly rapist.

But the Cabinet Secretary for Justice, PC and highly left-wing SNP lawyer Kenny McAskill, was having none of it. He preferred to ignore the warnings, take the fashionable feminist line, later encapsulated in #MeToo and its baggage, and introduce the provision we now have.

The ever-compliant Scottish Parliament obediently did as it was told and passed it. The politicians then presumably went back to comfortable homes in middle-class Morningside or patrician Pollokshields to congratulate themselves over high tea on a job well done. And the rest, as you might say, is the woke history of an unhappily woke nation.

Christine Ford and the Mifepristone industry

John Doe · 7 May 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Prologue. I had no reason to sympathize with either Ford or Kavanaugh before the Congressional hearings. I listened to Ford's testimony with an open mind, partially based on my naïve belief that a respectable professor would not presume to lie to the Congress in cold blood. However, Ford's testimony became less and less credible as she kept talking – finally reaching a pitch of absurdity (as absurd as her facetious intonation) that made me question why a scientist would try to concoct such a clownish, unbelievable story.

As an additional disclaimer, let me note that I am an irreligious person. I do think abortion must be legal at least in some circumstances. I have no formal or informal ties to either Ford or Kavanaugh, nor any person/group affiliated with either person. I have an advanced degree in molecular biology and I know the world of bioscience quite well.

Question: Did Christine Ford have an improper political/financial agenda in coming forward with accusations against Brett Kavanaugh?

Answer: Christine Ford worked as a biostatistics director for Corcept Therapeutics,[1] which must have involved a very satisfying salary. She has published multiple papers under the sponsorship of Corcept, which translates to an enormous amount of emotional and intellectual investment on the topic.[2] (Her directorship at Corcept seems to be her main line of employment outside the walls of academia). Each scientific publication is a major enterprise which involves massive amounts of funding; being a first author on a paper about mifepristone translates to an enormous degree of prestige which is dependent on the availability of the drug on the market. Nepotism and conflict(s) of interest are widespread problems in scientific research.[3] "Publish or perish" is a common problem. Funding is available on an extremely competitive basis. This also means that sponsors can exert an enormous amount of influence upon their researchers, who are subject to the whims of their sponsors.

The main market product of Corcept Therapeutics is a drug called Korlym, i.e. they generate revenue primarily through the sale of this drug.[4] Korlym's active ingredient is a pharmaceutical agent called mifepristone, which is a progesterone blocker. Biological agents rarely have unilateral or "pure" effects. A single hormone often produces various stimuli and multiple hormones can trigger the same response. As such, the pharmaceutical industry often uses combinations of biochemical agents to create the desired effect. Mifepristone is used in conjunction with misoprostol in order to induce abortions: neither ingredient is reliably effective in and of itself. Mifepristone is very effective as an "emergency contraceptive"[5] but it is often used in conjunction with misoprostol to induce an abortion after the first two weeks. Because it has such a strong effect, it is sold with an obligatory warning that it will terminate an ongoing pregnancy.[6] Indeed, mifepristone has been called "the gold standard drug of medical abortion."[7] Christine Ford published multiple papers about mifepristone over the years, and the latest paper seems to have been published in 2012.[8]

Mifepristone has an additional therapeutic use, i.e. treating Cushing's syndrome. Cushing's syndrome is a very rare disorder[9] while abortions and emergency contraceptives are available on a massive basis. Therefore, only a very negligible amount of mifrepristone in the medical market is used to treat Cushing's syndrome and the drug is used overwhelmingly as an abortifacient and/or emergency contraceptive. A total of 652,639 legal abortions take place in the United States every year.[10] This number does not include illegal abortions; nor does it include the massive "emergency contraceptive" industry.

It is widely understood that Kavanaugh's confirmation will lead to a situation in which there will be a conservative majority in the Supreme Court, and this conservative majority may certainly overturn or restrict Roe v. Wade.[11] Many states have already increased the restrictions around abortion[12] and they have passed "trigger laws"[13] which will ban abortion as soon as Roe v. Wade is overturned. There are already 13 lawsuits challenging to Roe v. Wade pending at circuit courts.[14] Further complicating the picture is Kavanaugh's influence as a Catholic jurisprudent: it is no secret that Catholic doctrine prohibits contraceptive use, including emergency contraceptives, as sinful.

If abortion is banned or restricted, this would not only prevent American doctors from prescribing mifepristone in any capacity but may also lead to the (likely) de facto ban of all mifepristone production and research. Even if Corcept were to file a legal objection to carve out an exception for the use of mifepristone to treat Cushing's syndrome, such an objection will not survive. There are many other biochemical agents, none of which have abortion-inducing effects, which can be prescribed by a physician to regulate cortisol synthesis (i.e. treat Cushing's syndrome) in the human body. Potassium and ascorbic acid (which are very cheap in terms of manufacture) play important roles in cortisol regulation. Physicians regularly prescribe a variety of pharmaceutical agents to treat Cushing's syndrome: aminoglutethimide, ketoconazole, metyrapone, mitotane. None of these pharmaceutical agents induce abortions. Put in other words: pharmaceutical abortion is impossible without mifepristone, but it is very much possible to cure Cushing's syndrome without mifepristone (and Cushing's syndrome is an extremely rare condition anyway).

Nothing will prevent the federal government from creating additional sanctions against the abortion industry if Roe v. Wade is overturned/restricted. This might include criminal charges against physicians who attempt to prescribe the drug "under the counter" and severe financial penalties against all scientific research implicated in abortion, i.e. all research implicating mifepristone synthesis.[15] Pro-life activists have called for banning mifepristone in the past, on multiple occasions. Ford is perfectly aware of this: "in April 2017, she attended a March For Science in San Francisco, which was held to protest Trump administration cuts to research."[16]

The fact that Ford's papers discuss weight loss within the context of cortisol regulation (cortisol levels indeed play a role in obesity and bone density) has no bearing on the fact that she had a long-term assignment in Corcept Therapeutics, whose main market product is mifepristone, without which the abortion industry would cease to exist. Attempts at expanding the use of mifepristone are best understood as either PR efforts or experimental (and ultimately unsuccessful) forays into expanding the market power of mifepristone. Overturning or restricting Roe v. Wade would bring about enormous financial harm to Corcept and is likely to bankrupt the company altogether. Perhaps more crucially, a clique of scientists (which includes Ford) would not only lose all their prestige but an entire corpus of scientific literature (including Ford's lifetime commitments) would become illegal and useless overnight. Christine Ford very likely believes that her entire lifetime of research is at stake, and such motivations can compel individuals to breach fundamental norms of society.

The circumstances detailed above would provide Christine Ford with a powerful political/financial motive to prevent Kavanaugh's confirmation. Not only would she lose her job if Roe v. Wade is overturned but she would lose much of her scientific prestige and funding. Many of her friends and colleagues, for whom she presumably has strong collegial feelings, will experience the same fall from grace. Feminists are very vocal about defending Roe v. Wade[17] and we already know that some feminists have no problem whatsoever with weaponizing sexual harassment accusations.[18] Christine Ford's strong views on this topic can be inferred from the protests she has attended.[19]

The enormous credibility problems of Christine Ford have been analysed in great lengths by a former prosecutor.[20] None of her witnesses corroborate her account. Her ex-boyfriend denounced her a fraudster[21] and the prosecutor who questioned her in the Congress also spelled out her lack of credibility.[22]

The evidence is incontrovertible. Christine Ford has perjured herself in cold blood during the Congressional hearings and I believe she has done so for improper financial and political reasons.

Feminism and Transgenderism

Philip Carl Salzman · 11 May 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Second wave feminism began in the 1960s as "The Women's Movement," coincident with the arrival of a new technology for the auto-control of fertility, the birth control pill,[1] invented by male scientists. But the standard feminist narrative argues that gender is defined entirely independent of biology; gender, feminists argue, is not the result of genetics and physiology, but totally a result of "social construction."[2]

In other words, the feminist narrative states that male and female roles, abilities, and preferences are not significantly determined by biology, but are defined by social norms, and that individual males and females are shaped into what they are by means of socialization, social pressure, and law.

It is understandable that female liberationists would argue against the influence of nature and side entirely with the influence of nurture, because in the past restrictions on females were often justified in terms of the alleged biological inferiority of females in relation to males: for example, that females were physically weak and males strong, and so females had to be protected by males; that females were emotional and males were rational, so education and public business had to be left to males; and so on. Feminists wished to overthrow all of those justifications of male dominance, so as to gain equal opportunity in society, to expand their access to social roles and social rewards, and to attain independence.

Reality, unfortunately, is always a bit more complicated than our hopes and dreams. If one is interested in a scientific, evidence-based understanding of gender, then the facts are clear: the genetic, physiological, anatomical, and psychological differences between males and females are marked, not only among humans, but in all species with sexual reproduction.[3]

According to Susanne Sadedin, an evolutionary biologist: "From the perspective of biology, it would be very surprising if human males and females did not have distinct, hardwired behavioral tendencies. As someone who is both a biologist and (I like to think) a feminist, this puts me at odds with much of traditional feminist theory."[4]

Feminist never tire of characterizing females as "strong," undoubtedly to counter previous stereotypes of females as "weak." But there is no doubt that males are, on average, physically larger, stronger, and faster than females. You would not think it is necessary to state that male and female bodies are not the same. Males have much higher normal levels of testosterone, which underlies physical strength. That is why there are male sports leagues and female sports leagues; top female athletes cannot compete with top male athletes.

There is about a 10% difference in times between male and females track athletes, from the 100 yard dash to the marathon, and a greater difference in the jumps. It is difficult to compare results in the weight events, because the weights males use are considerably heavier than those that females use: for example, the discus that men throw is 1.5 kilos, while the discus women throw are 1.0 kilo.[5]

The best female basketball stars are not competitive enough to play in the NBA, nor are elite female hockey players able to succeed in the NHL. Generally, women do not play football; no woman has ever played in the NFL or CFL.

The psychology of males and females also differ systematically across cultures, thus negating the "social construction" argument. A study with a half a million respondents demonstrated that "Men prefer working with things and women prefer working with people, producing a large effect size (d = 0.93) on the Things–People dimension. Men showed stronger Realistic (d = 0.84) and Investigative (d = 0.26) interests, and women showed stronger Artistic (d = –0.35), Social (d = –0.68), and Conventional (d = –0.33) interests."[6] It may be for this reason that women talk more than men, although verbal loquaciousness appears to be also based in genetics, specifically the Foxp2 "language gene," which is found more in abundance in females.[7] It may also be for this reason that females tend to avoid the STEM science, technology, engineering, and mathematics fields[8]; while female undergraduate enrolment is far above the 50% level in the social sciences, it is far below the 50% in STEM, particularly in egalitarian societies.[9] In other words, the male/female disparity in the STEM fields is due to differences in interests[10] between males and females, rather than any hypothetical discrimination against females.

Differences between males and females appear in infants: “males strongly preferred toys with wheels over plush toys, whereas females found plush toys likable.” This was in a study of Rhesus monkeys! As the author states, “It would be tough to argue that the monkeys’ parents bought them sex-typed toys or that simian society encourages its male offspring to play more with trucks.”[11] Returning the humans, “A much more recent study established that boys and girls 9 to 17 months old — an age when children show few if any signs of recognizing either their own or other children’s sex — nonetheless show marked differences in their preference for stereotypically male versus stereotypically female toys.”[12] On a personal note, my son’s first word was “car,” but I cannot get my wife to be at all interested in our cars.

Males and females also different in cognitive skills: Diane Halpern, past president of the American Psychological Association, addressed this question on her ground-breaking book, Sex Differences in Cognitive Abilities. Having begun believing that male/female differences were socially constructed, her review of the research evidence convinced her she was wrong[13]:

Women excel in several measures of verbal ability — pretty much all of them, except for verbal analogies. Women’s reading comprehension and writing ability consistently exceed that of men, on average. They outperform men in tests of fine-motor coordination and perceptual speed. They’re more adept at retrieving information from long-term memory.

Men, on average, can more easily juggle items in working memory. They have superior visuospatial skills: They’re better at visualizing what happens when a complicated two- or three-dimensional shape is rotated in space, at correctly determining angles from the horizontal, at tracking moving objects and at aiming projectiles.

Men’s superior visuospatial skills are another factor in men’s superior performance in sports.

The brains of men and women and different in many respects, probably due to the different sex-steroid hormones that flow into the brain. Many of the differences described above are reflections of differences in the brain[14], as are many others, such as the propensity to experience depression, greater in females, and to suffer from autism, greater in males. The differences in sex chromosomes, XX for females and XY for males, also impacts the brain.

How did these differences come about? If we think about the two million years of human evolution, and the way of life in all but the last ten thousand years, we can begin to understand how certain human traits were selected for in nature. Our ancestors lived in small hunting and gathering bands. Generally speaking, men hunted and women gathered. Women were responsible for the children and camp, and the men ventured out to hunt, and, if necessary, to defend the band. The qualities needed for women were heavily social, and for men were efficaciousness in engaging with the world beyond the encampment.[15] Natural section thus underlies the many hardwired differences between males and females.

All of these facts run contrary to the feminist fairy story about male/female differences being the result of “social construction.” Cross-species and cross-cultural commonalities in the differences between males and females refute the socialization theory of gender. This is not to say that they are not also cultural differences, or that the male/female differences are the same in all cultures. No anthropologist would agree to that. But each culture has to work with the hardwired differences between males and females.

The feminist devotion to the “social construction” of gender was contradicted by the liberation movement of gays, lesbians, bisexuals, etc. etc., which argued that gays etc. could not be blamed for their sexual orientation, because they were born that way.[16] Homosexuality, the argument went, was not a choice that people made, so homosexuality was not an orientation that could be set aside in aid of some social norm or other. Nor could or should homosexuals be pressured to change. Feminists had to hold their tongues and accept this “progressive” view of biologically determined, hardwired sexual orientations. So, the feminist view became, “gender is shaped by social construction, except homosexuality, which is biological.”

In the last decades, the determining factor evolved from “social construction” to identity. We are all defined now not by any facts about us, but with who or what we identify. Identitarianism arose from feminists saying that the most important thing about females is that they are female, blacks saying the most important thing about them is that they are black, Hispanics, Muslims, etc., as each category was claimed to be a victim of societal oppression and abuse. But it was not for anyone else to say which category one belonged to; each person’s identity is deemed sacrosanct, unchallengeable, undeniably true in itself. And, if someone identifies with a victim category, then that person is eligible for many special privileges and benefits. So Elizabeth Warren, now Senator and candidate for the presidency, has deemed and declared herself to be a Native American Indian, and has received special treatment throughout her education and career on that basis.

Identitarianism has become a new problem for feminists with the popularity of transsexuality. Today, biological males who “identify” as female, demand and have the legal right to enter female dressing rooms and toilets, to receive all special privileges and benefits of females, such as preferred admission, fellowships for females only, and preference for jobs, etc. And transsexual males to female demand and are allowed to compete against females in sport. Of course, male athletes have a great advantage, and, even with non-obligatory hormone treatments retain the edge in size, strength, and speed. They do very well in the competitions.

Feminists now face the ideologically uncomfortable choice of accepting male transsexuals in their spaces and their lives, or saying that biological males are males and biological females are females, and never the twain shall meet. Once the biological basis of gender is accepted, the primacy of “social construction” and “identity” can never be championed again. If transsexual females are rejected, “everything gender is malleable” can no longer be a feminist slogan.

Female athletes have come out against transfemales competing against biological female athletes.[17] The Olympic swimmer “Sharron Davies has studied the biological differences between the sexes. ‘If a young boy goes through puberty, he has increased lung capacity, he has a higher red blood cell count, he has a different skeletal system, a smaller pelvis — which helps certainly on a bike.’… The former Olympic swimmer noted that in 17 American states, ‘young boys are allowed to compete if they identify as women, up to the age of 18 without any chemical intervention whatsoever … so those girls are at a massive disadvantage.’” According to Davies, girls are giving up sport because of the unfair competition. Others, who continue, lose their sports scholarships to transgenders. Davies says that most female athletes agree with her views, but are afraid to speak up because the trans lobby is so strong and so threatening that athletes are afraid to lose their sponsors or accreditation with sports federations.[18]

Davies was correct about the overwhelming blowback any criticism of trans athletes would bring. World tennis champion and lesbian heroine Martina Navratilova published an op-ed in The Sunday Times of London entitled “The rules on trans athletes reward cheats and punish the innocent,” saying that “Letting men compete as women simply if they change their name and take hormones is unfair — no matter how those athletes may throw their weight around.” She had earlier tweeted, “You can’t just proclaim yourself a female and be able to compete against women. There must be some standards, and having a penis and competing as a woman would not fit that standard.”[19] Well, she learned quickly that hell hath no fury as a transwoman scorned. Of course she was labeled transphobic, and then thrown out of the LGBT sports group Athlete Ally.[20] The identicrats refuse to allow any facts to challenge their central principle: identity is more important than scientific facts. I am sorry to have to report that Navratilova backed down and apologized.

But some are standing their ground. Lesbian feminist Julia Beck testified before Congress against the gender identity provisions of the proposed Violence Against Women Act.[21] She argued that, although intended to protect trans individuals, the gender identity provision would in fact be a “misogynous Trojan horse” that undermined protections for biological females. “While sex is a vital statistic, gender and identity are not. VAWA was created for women and girls, not for those who feel like or identify as female. Woman is not a gender or a feeling,” Beck declared. “Women don’t need to identify as female in order to be women. Woman means adult human female. New gender identity laws allow male people to claim womanhood.”[22]

Beck further argued “If we cannot acknowledge biological sex or the differences of biological sex between the two sex classes, then there will be no protections for women on the basis of our biological sex.”[23] The reaction has not been inclusive: “People on the Left have tried to silence me by using threats and other tactics of intimidation, a kind of hatred that most lesbians would expect to receive from people on the Right. I’ve been told to die in a fire, to get raped, and to choke on ‘lady c*ck’ by members of the LGBT community.”[24] And, just to make it official, Beck was thrown off of the Baltimore Mayor’s LGBTQ Commission for maintaining that transgender women were not women.[25] Beck explains in an article[26]how she became the most hated lesbian in Baltimore and beyond.

When various self-righteous “victim” groups, such as lesbians and transfemales, come to blows over who has precedence, it tends to get ugly. It might have been predictable that radical lesbian feminists would have no time for males in any guise, and that transfemales would demand their female civil and human rights whatever their genetics, physiology, and anatomy. But some good has come out of this: the feminist conceit that gender was all social constructed, and that biology has nothing to do with it, has finally been recognized as counter-factual, counter-scientific, and counter-good sense. Female athletes and lesbians have become unexpected critics of the view that you can be whatever you say you are.

Identicrats will squawk. But after all, in most of life we expect people to be able to prove what they say they are: Doctors of Medicine, airline pilots, members of Congress, Olympic champions, and bank owners. You get to be those things by gaining the qualifications and credentials, being elected, competing in the Olympics, and actually owning banks, not by identifying as an MD or Congressperson. If someone says they are something, and can’t prove it by generally accepted criteria, they are open to charges of being fantasists, or fraudsters. Identifying as tall or handsome or beautiful does not make you so. Saying that you are an American Native Indian, or a Jew, or a woman, or a man, does not make you one. Classifying and understanding people by gender requires reference to biological facts.

Not quite so universal suffrage

Robert Brockway · 19 May 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Yesterday saw the 2019 Australian Federal Election. In honour of this, we're publishing a piece on historical suffrage because, like in so many other areas, feminists have been spreading lies about this for decades. –Ed

Suffrage, or the right to vote, is an important right in any democracy. Societies routinely exclude some sectors of the community from voting and this is entirely consistent with international norms. Normally voting in a democracy is open to citizens that have reached the age of majority. In many countries today that is 18 years. The rules vary by country, and even subnational jurisdiction. Voting is generally restricted to citizens but even they may be excluded from voting if they have resided outside of the country for an extended period, if they have been convicted of or incarcerated for serious offences, or for other reasons. Prohibiting individuals from voting in this manner is considered to be consistent with international standards today. This is generally called universal suffrage even though segments of the community are excluded from voting.

What is not considered acceptable by democracies today is to exclude someone from voting on the basis of gender. It is widely believed today that women were disenfranchised from voting until recently. This is true, but what is often not stated in this narrative is that the same was true for most or all men. A survey in 1780 in the UK, for example, revealed that only 3% of the population were entitled to vote.

Britain had no less than three acts of parliament during the 19th century that enfranchised a growing proportion of men – and yet a significant proportion of the male population remained unable to vote. The right to vote in the UK, as in most nations, was initially based on land ownership. This often meant that landowning women could vote but men without land could not. There is documentary evidence that British women who owned land were voting as early as 1843 – decades before most men obtained the the right to vote.

Many men were still disenfranchised when conscription was enacted in the UK in 1916 as the number of volunteers prepared to fight in World War I waned. Many of these men drafted and forced to war against their will were unable to vote. During 1918, the year the war ended, the UK finally granted the franchise to men. At the same time many women over 30 were permitted to vote. Had women received universal suffrage in 1918 along with men they would have constituted a majority of voters, due to the significant number of men killed during World War I. Women were finally fully enfranchised in 1928, only 10 years after men. In the UK we see a pattern repeated around the world. The franchise was held by a small group of people which grew over time. Common men and women in the UK had little political power until the 18th century.

A different situation existed in the United States. The Nineteenth Amendment of the US Constitution made it illegal to deny a US citizen the right to vote on the basis of their gender. Feminists will often claim that universal male suffrage was achieved in the US in 1856 and universal female suffrage in 1920. The reality though is that many citizens, men and women alike, were still being denied the vote. US states have significant latitude in establishing voter eligibility. This was used in some states to disenfranchise black and poor white Americans. Universal suffrage in the United States was only achieved following the civil rights movement of the 20th century. As a result American men and women effectively achieved universal suffrage at the same time rather than decades apart as feminists will often claim.

The situation in Australia was similar to the US. Men started to receive the franchise in the 1850s. This allowed them to vote for colonial parliaments. Women in Australia started receiving the franchise in the 1890s. Interestingly any Maori who happened to be living in Australia were entitled to vote decades before indigenous Australians were.

While much is made of the enfranchisement of women in many nations, such as the US and Australia, men of colour were usually enfranchised long after white women. The emphasis on gender as a primary determiner of voting rights is misleading and deflects attention from more important aspects.

Today it is common for gender to be over-emphasised as a defining characteristic. Culture, ethnicity, social class at birth, and many other characteristics are better determiners of the life a person will have than is gender. Historically most men and women were disenfranchised. Power rested with the ruling class, men and women alike. While it was generally true that men were more likely to wield hard power (and women soft power) even this was not universally true, and from time to time a powerful female ruler arose.

Feminists so often put the focus of enfranchisement on voting rights for women as if this was an event that occurred in a vacuum. The enfranchisement of women is in fact only a part of a greater story. Over a period of centuries, the body of electors grew. Impediments to enfranchisement included gender, property, age, and education. This process is in fact ongoing with increasing moves to enfranchise resident non-citizens and to further reduce the voting age in some nations. The enfranchisement of women was just one step among many, and not one that was easily separated from the enfranchisement of men in many nations.

The next time someone tells you how long women have had the vote in their nation, ask them how long men have had the vote. They probably won't know.

Game of Flames

Robert Brockway · 20 May 2019 · Archived copy · Original

SPOILER WARNING. It is strongly recommended to only read this article after having completed watching the HBO series Game of Thrones. This article contains spoilers and also presumes knowledge of the Game of Thrones storyline.

Daenerys Targaryen, first of her name, Breaker of Chains, Mother of Dragons and… Destroyer of King's Landing. Viewers of Game of Thrones should know by now that Daenerys Targaryen chose to have her last remaining dragon destroy King's Landing even after it had effectively fallen to her forces. All that was left were a few remnants of the armies defending the city. Most opposition had capitulated and it was just a matter of mopping up any remaining pockets of resistance. But that wasn't enough. Daenerys Targaryen destroyed a defenceless city, killing countless civilians – ostensibly her own subjects.

Like father like daughter. In fact, it's better than that. Her father Aerys Targaryen, second of his name, famously said:

> "The traitors want my city, but I'll give them naught but ashes. Let Robert be king over charred bones and cooked meat."

Aerys never did destroy King's Landing thanks to the intervention of The Kingslayer, but 24 years later his daughter Daenerys succeeded where he had failed.

Not everyone is happy with this turns of events. Quite a lot of people were looking forward to Daenerys sitting on the Iron Throne it seems.

Over the years feminists have had a love-hate relationship with Game of Thrones. They were decrying depictions of violence against women in the show, despite the fact that there were far more depictions of violence against men. And then they crowed loudly that for the last couple of seasons the two main contenders for the Iron Throne have both been women – Cercei Lannister and Daenerys Targaryen. For a while Game of Thrones was widely proclaimed to be a feminist TV show. The reality is that both major houses were led by women because they'd each run out of men – most of whom were dead. Yes, very feminist.

And so Game of Thrones remained close to the heart of feminists until that now infamous episode, The Bells in which Daenerys destroyed a city that had already fallen to her. Feminists cried out! They proclaimed that this was a sudden and unexpected change of character for Daenerys Targaryen. They could only come to this conclusion, of course, if they were wearing rose coloured glasses.

Daenerys had always been ruthless and willing to use violence to achieve her aims. This we had seen many times.

During Season 4 Daenerys crucified 163 masters of Meereen in response to the masters having previously crucified slaves in the same manner. She cared not for the culpability of the individuals involved and there is evidence that at least some of the masters crucified had spoken out against the practice. Later she has another, potentially innocent, master immolated in a crypt below the city in an effort to intimidate the rest.

In Season 6 she burns all of the Khals alive before seizing power over the remaining Dothraki.

Season 7 saw Daenerys burn Randyll and Dickon Tarly alive after they refused to bend the knee to her.

And of course in Season 8 Daenerys has Varys summarily executed by dragon fire for allegedly betraying her. There is no evidence that she investigated these allegations before passing sentence.

Daenerys destroyed King's Landing because she had concluded that the people of Westeros could never love her so they would have to fear her. She said as much in the preceding episode:

> I don't have love here. I only have fear.

The destruction of King's Landing was entirely in character for Daenerys. Feminists could not cope with this as they continue to infantilise women. Feminists wanted Daenerys sitting on the Iron Throne and ruling over a new golden age of Westeros as an allegory for a feminist utopia in the real world. Typical feminist tosh.

Daenerys is a fully fleshed out character, flaws and all. Those flaws led her to destroy a city and doom her own reign before it had begun.

And so we saw Daenerys killed in the final episode of Game of Thrones and John Snow effectively exiled for freeing Westeros of a tyrant.

Feminists might be placated by Sansa becoming queen of an independent North though. Nah, feminists are never placated.

The equality myth

Mark Dent · 21 May 2019 · Archived copy · Original

According to the Cambridge Dictionary, equality means:

> The right of different groups of people to have a similar social position and receive the same treatment.

My interest in discovering the actual dictionary definition of the word was piqued by a recent exchange I heard between two football commentators on Melbourne radio a week ago. The men were discussing the physical shape and conditioning of an AFL player. They were quite harsh in their observations and one of the men paused and said:

"You know we could never talk like this about female footballers in the new women's league."

His co-host laughed and agreed: "No way! It would never happen."

These mature ex footballers were fully aware of the consequences any honest observations about the physical condition of a female footballer would bring. The wrath of hell would descend upon their heads and they would be branded women haters, misogynists and body shamers. Then they would most likely be suspended or sacked from their jobs.

The conversation moved on and was never referred to again.
[image]
This brief exchange encapsulated everything I have ever felt about the utter hypocrisy of feminism. The war cry of all feminists has always been their demand for equality-equal treatment. Yet this is the last thing women actually want. In fact, I have struggled to find examples of any situation where men and women receive equal treatment in our society. Men and boys are invariably drawing the short straw in any scenario one cares to examine.

I think back to my secondary school years at a boys' catholic college. Every day we were subjected to beatings or the "cuts" from leather straps carried by the Christian Brothers and the lay teachers. It was four years of anxiety, fear and stress which certainly left its scars on my psyche for the rest of my life.

While my brothers and I endured this reign of terror my two sisters swanned their way through secondary school at a girls' college. Not once was a finger placed upon either of them in anger. Not once did they awake in the morning with a feeling of dread and trepidation that they may be physically assaulted. Not once did they face the risk of humiliation in front of their peers that we experienced whenever we received the common but intimidating corporal punishment so frequently meted out for the most trivial misdemeanors.

Why?

It was simply because they were girls and we were boys. That's it.

When we lied, cheated, talked at the wrong time or simply made one too many mistakes we were hit and strapped. When the girls at Sion College lied, cheated, spoke at the wrong time or made mistakes they were reprimanded with words or a detention and nothing more.

Everyone accepted this as they way things should be. There were no outcries about this inconsistent approach to discipline. There were no demands from any girls for the same treatment that was being dished out to their brothers.

Young men only handful of years older than me were also granted the privilege of being conscripted to fight in Vietnam.

Today these same atrocious double standards apply just as much now as they did then.

When a woman punches a man in the face, she does so with the clear understanding that he will not retaliate with any force, if he retaliates at all. This can be the only reason a woman would attack a person twice their weight and strength with such abandon and ferocity. What is truly stunning is the reaction of women on the rare occasions when a man assaulted by a woman responds in exactly the same way he would if a man assaulted him.

Utter disbelief followed by stunned outrage.

Why? No-one would raise an eyebrow if a man assaulted another in a bar and the victim hit back-even if the initiator was a much smaller man. Yet such treatment delivered to a large, aggressive woman would bring a very different response. Suddenly, the notion of equal treatment becomes problematic.

[image]

I read a comment by a man some time ago about this very subject. He said that it was amusing to see that the men who truly treated women as absolute equals are the same men feminists would be quick to brand misogynists. This appears to be rather ironic but I am in no doubt about the truth of his claim. It is the men who treat women in exactly the same way they treat other men who are most often attacked by feminists.

Donald Trump is a good example. He says vulgar and uncouth things about men he doesn't like and says the same about women he loathes. Somehow this doesn't just make him a tactless man or a man who truly believes women are the equal of men and therefore capable of enduring a tongue lashing. No- it makes him a woman -hater. A hater of all women and a man to be reviled and vilified.

No-one has a gender based adjective to describe his attacks on other men.

When a man expects a girl to open her car door for herself or pay for her own meal and taxi fare, many women would find such behavior offensive and indicative of his contempt for women!

When women in parliament are subjected to the vitriol men have endured for decades, they screech MISOGYNY from the roof top of parliament house. The vile abuse male politicians are subjected to has never been branded misandrist. It isn't called anything. It's just an expected part of the rough and tumble of politics whether it be online trolling or vigorous exchanges during parliamentary debates. Yet somehow, when women are subjected to the same personal abuse it is called out as being a different and unacceptable form of behavior which comes from some deep and dark loathing of females.

Standards for entry into the army, police force and fire brigade have all been lowered to allow the influx of women so many progressive politicians desire and of course women rarely, if ever, fight on the front lines in any battle.

No equal treatment there.

We hear endless proclamations about the importance of diversity in the workplace yet the only workplaces where quotas and affirmative action are used to create a more gender balanced work environment are the select few women perceive to be desirable, well paid and safe.

If feminists' belief in the wonders of gender parity was a strongly felt conviction why is this policy not enforced across the board, particularly in the countless dangerous and dirty jobs universally dominated by males? Why does the teaching profession remain such an overwhelmingly female occupation, particularly when the teachers of our children have such a profound influence upon their development?

Why did people laugh when the actor, Conleth Hill, who played the role of a castrated eunuch in The Game of Thrones television series, told of a recent occasion when a female fan approached him and immediately groped his genitals before saying:

"I just wanted to check to see if you had something there!" Hilarious.

Let's see what happens to the man who gropes a female actor's breasts to see if they are real. He would be arrested and charged with sexual assault before receiving some jail time.

Equal treatment.

I heard black female poet recite one of her poems to a leftist mob a few days ago. She lamented the deplorable fact that a black person receives a 20% longer jail term than whites for the same crime. Yet the sentencing gap between men and women who commit the same crimes is a staggering 63%! No-one ever addresses this unequal treatment. There are no rap songs or any other kind of song to send the message that men are being ravaged by our legal system. Imagine if the legal profession finally acted upon this clear case of injustice and bigotry and demanded women receive the same jail terms as men. Feminists would be screeching about this new equality and calling it an act of oppression!

Feminists/women do not want equality and never have.

[image]When conscription of women as well as men was mooted a few months back and its possibility began to seem more than just a silly theory, the panic in the feminist ranks was palpable. Suddenly feminists were twisting themselves into knots as they tried to explain that equality in some areas does not actually mean equal treatment!

We all know that despite all claims to the contrary, if a new Titanic was built and somehow met the same fate as the original, the expectation that men give up their lives for the female passengers would be identical to the expectations placed upon those poor gentlemen who went to their watery graves in 1912.

Equal treatment?

I became aware of one other phenomenon recently. I was struck by how often journalists referred to the shocking suicide rates of young gay boys, transgender people and indigenous people as a means of jolting the reader into seeing the terribly oppressive society these victims are forced to endure, with death often seen as the only way out. No such article has ever been written with regard to men. Men. Not an acceptable victimized tribal subset of this deplorable group, but the pure collective known as men.

Devout Christian and champion Rugby League player in Australia, Israel Folou, was recently sacked from the National team for a tweet saying gays will go to hell. One journalist, attempting to explain why this was the only possible outcome, wrote about the suicide rate of gay teenagers.

"At face value it seems strange that Folau can be axed for quoting the Bible, yet the likes of James Slipper and Karmichael Hunt power-on after drug issues. It sounds odd until we dig deeper to statistics that reveal youth suicide among gay teenagers is four times higher than the straight population. The damage of Folau's stance should not be underestimated."

While we can sympathise with the suicide of gay men, has even one mainstream journalist ever written about the horrific suicide rates of men and boys? Have they urgently called for an end to the daily denigration of males in our mainstream media and education system as one way to lessen the sense of hopelessness and shame so many young and older men feel?

Nope.

Equal treatment.

We read a torrent of words focusing on every perceived injustice or hurt endured by women every day. Yet literal life and death matters which are tearing our male population apart are ignored.

It is quite astonishing to realize that when all of the ranting rhetoric of feminists is silenced and we simply examine the facts, it is abundantly clear that equality has never for one moment been an outcome feminists seek and never will be.

Strategic Absolute Equality

Bryan Scandrett · 25 May 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Absolute equality for women as a strategic policy and the death of chivalry.

Mark Dent recently presented an excellent article at AVfM on the myth that feminism means equality for women.

This article is one of the most important I have read in it's relevance to the sameness/differences gender debate that rages on. It is hugely important as Mark lists a range of ways where feminism isn't interested in equality but rather clear advantage over men. For the aware strategist this fixes a spotlight on the unstated but central relevant strategic point of the gender war.

How does feminism command so much institutional power, globally, and men so little, all while we are passed off as the omnipotent patriarchy, for an extraordinary amount of time? Yet we lack the power bring an end to the barbarity of slicing bits off male penises at birth, at whim — an achievement that feminism accomplished for girls pretty much the same afternoon they found out that female circumcision was a thing. They even managed to obliterate the notion of a ritual pin prick before the ink could dry. Religious and cultural freedoms be damned!

Worst patriarchy ever!

In explaining this hocus pocus, I will make the case that only a third answer is relevant to the question of are men and women different or the same? Not only is there a third answer but a second, far more important question, if one is to make any claim to logical, strategic rationality.

The first answer to the question is that some people, usually feminists, claim there is no difference between the genders, there is no difference between men and women and both must be treated the same. The idea that we are both human and hence the both exactly same, a couple of body parts excepted. This is where the social experimenters are intellectually stuck, ethics be damned. They mean to run their absurd social experiment like a train over us all by any means necessary.

And to extend the ambiguity, they have invented so many more genders, it's pointless trying to count them. All this is based on an ideology of equality for women. A complete logical fraud as Mark so clearly points out. Definitely a fluid gender fraud as what is said one minute can and will change the next.

Answer two is the counter argument, usually made by MRA's, MGTOW's, general manospherians, as well as traditionalists, who flatly state the differences are multitude and obvious.

One births children and the other does not.
Men and women can never be the same and different treatment is rational.
Feminism is wrong and must be gotten rid of.

That is a dangerous strategic move in my view, regardless of it's accuracy or otherwise, for a number of reasons, as it opens the gates wide for feminists to use chivalry, as they have always done, to demand and receive the very advantages over men that Mark lists so clearly in his last article, linked above.

And yet the difference crowd wallow in the surety of their righteousness, hurling genuine rage and ridicule at anyone who would disagree with their position. As Paul Elam describes it, the circular firing squad. It is both a tactical and strategic mistake to debate a moot point. Tap dancing in a minefield to prove a minefield exists is not a game you can win.

There is only one factually, strategically and tactically correct answer to the question, are men and women the same or different?

YES.

Answer three is the effective combative and strategically correct position

Bottom line: Feminists exploit difference to garner chivalry.
Without chivalry no one would ever have heard of feminism.
Period.

There are many differences and there are a lot of similarities.

But a moments reflection of the laser accuracy of Mark's piece will illuminate the key, relevant strategic point, staring us all in the face, that so many are blithely missing in a desperate pursuit to be right.

It is in the differences that the gynocentrists use to garner speshul snowflake treatment while the bodies of men begin to mount.

This is why gynocentrism is so hard to defeat. Women are just more valued than men and have always been. Men are disposable and women aren't. This is the core central reality of the red pill itself.

Read that again, and stop helping gynocentrists to use men as service animals.

MRA's, anti-feminists and anti-gynocentrists need to exploit ABSOLUTE EQUALITY to drive feminism into extinction and force morality onto gynocentrism.

The narrative about gender value has to change or men lose out forever against irrational emotion about the value of your Mummy, wife, daughters and granddaughters.

"Women are not more important than men." — If that statement bothers you, think equality. That's far more important than figuring out the exact mix of differences and similarities. In terms of value, not to mention in a wide variety of psychometrically measured traits, the entire manosphere needs to be screaming that men and women are EXACTLY the same, with a unified voice.

The informed combatant argues for the total and absolute EQUALITY of VALUE between men and women, with no exceptions. Shared humanity in place of the totalizing, ever-expanding privileges won by feminism's grandstanding of women's "vulnerabilities" — their smaller size, wombs, breasts, lactation or menstruation.

When the Titanic is going down, the best question to ask is a second question.

Is chivalry dead?

HELL, YES!

Equality, remember?

Call for equality and put 'Parents and their children' into the life rafts first. Then consign a number of women to their icy graves. Equal to men.

Afterwards, erect a monument to the bravery and sacrifice of the lost souls and give a bronze medallion for their descendants to keep in the drawer with the rest of the bric-a-brac.

- In every conversation about legal reform, demand equal sentencing for women.
- 50/50 child custody.
- Demand jail time for judges who discriminate in favour of women.
- When a child is to be circumcised, demand his sisters receive the exact same.
- Or else he receive the exact same protection as his sister.
- Demand not only conscription for women but a #1 crewcut for all women in the military and they take their turn at assaulting machine gun nests, and point duty.

We could wipe out feminism in an afternoon with just a mandatory haircut if you think about it.

When ever you are opposed in your demand for absolute equality, ask questions: why are women more valuable than men? What exactly makes a modern woman less disposable than a man apart from female cowardice and male protectionism? Apart from the shackling of identity as a “real man” in service to women? Apart from the desire for approval from women? Why do you hate strong women? Why are you against equality? Where have you been living for the last 60 years of fish, bicycles and strong, independent women who don’t need no man?

Give no quarter.

Those who only argue the obvious differences between the TWO genders (factually accurate as it is) do themselves, and men in general, a dire disservice.

You are handing a pussy pass to chivalry.
To the power base of feminism.
The reason Mark Dent’s list exists.

It is just rationally, tactically and strategically stupid to try fighting gynocentrism with “Men and women are different!” as a single position, whether it’s true or not.

There is a group of idiots within our own ranks who blather about any approach that uses feminism against itself as ‘being just like feminists.’ These armchair activists are as dumb as a box of rocks. Few things I dislike more than a strategically ignorant purist, shaming men to police the combat.

Using feminism’s own specious logic on itself, to her detriment is exactly what we must be doing.

It is only in full and absolute equality of value, responsibility and accountability for women, that we will find any regulation to female entitlement.

That moderator simply isn’t there in the differences side of the debate.

That is the open gate to chivalry, unbridled female entitlement and male disposability, without bounds.

The death of a woman

Mark Dent · 28 May 2019 · Archived copy · Original

I have never met Inspector Andrew Stamper. I can only judge his character by reading the words that he speaks in public. Yesterday, he spoke about the murder of a young woman in Melbourne, Australia. He said:

"This is a horrendous crime, as all murders are, and particularly the murders of women."

Read it again. Reflect upon his words. Imagine you are a parent who has recently lost a beloved son to a random act of violence. A young man who never harmed a hair upon another's head. A young man with enormous potential and a future which promised so much. He was bashed to death in a public toilet. His skull caved in by the kicks rained upon his unprotected head.

Imagine Inspector Andrew Stamper has worked on the case involving your now dead son. He tracked down the killer and made sure he was locked away before moving on to the next unsolved murder. But clearly, the viewing of your innocent boy's mutilated body did not move him in the same way as the sight of a mutilated woman's body does. There is simply something more tragic, more shocking, about the brutal murder of a female. Of course, many passive, gentle natured, physically weak males have been viciously murdered here in Melbourne through the years. Someone's son, brother, father or grandpa bashed, stabbed, shot, burned, tortured and dumped in some godforsaken location.

But, each of these innocent victims had a penis.

This mitigating fact somehow softened the blow for Mr. Stamper.

Assistant Commissioner, Luke Cornelius (he's the fat bloke standing next to Stamper above) reassured the women of Melbourne that Melbourne's women are safe, followed by calls for men to offer more respect and end violence.

I think, given the time frame of this murder, that I was caring for my precious grandson, Dylan while it took place. My wife and I spent most of the day and till very late into the evening cuddling, kissing, reading to and singing with this beautiful human being. Yet Commissioner Cornelius clearly holds me at least partially responsible for the murder of the woman whose body was discovered last night. Why else would the man even mention "men" let alone call for us to take personal steps to prevent such murders from happening in the future?

If you truly read the absolutely disgusting words that are routinely spewed by law enforcement and our government leaders and see them for what they are– the vile, bigoted hatred of a societal group known as males, you would register your horror as forcefully as you possibly could. However, we have become almost desensitized to this despicable targeting of an entire gender every time an incident like this occurs and it becomes background noise to our numb ears and we turn the page or change the channel without giving it another thought.

It seems our Premier, Mr. Daniel Andrews is similarly moved to give emotional press conferences whenever a woman dies a violent death in his state of Victoria.

The Victorian premier, Daniel Andrews, said of Herron's death: "This is a terrible tragedy.

"This is not about the way women behave, this is not about where women are at what hour.

"This is most likely about the behaviour of men."

Let's hope he makes a public apology if her killer is a female. Politicians cannot wait to leap into male bashing even when the murderer has not been identified. Of course, men are more likely to murder and be murdered but the same logic could be applied to acts of terrorism. Yet Dan Andrews would never leap to any conclusions about the people or person behind an act of terror and say,

This is most likely the behavior of Muslims!

The same people who are applauding his rush to judgment and condemnation of an entire gender over this woman's death would be outraged by his assertion and call it racist and xenophobic. Even if it were proven that the killer was indeed a Muslim terrorist the idea that all Muslims should in some way bear responsibility for the crime would be considered an intolerable act of bigotry.

One can be assured there will be another candlelight vigil for this young woman who was so brutally murdered. Thousands will gather with heads bowed and righteous anger burning in their breasts. They will feel the undeniable satisfaction one always feels when one knows one stands on the righteous side of the fence. One's fury can be directed at men with absolute abandon. One has a "free hit" so to speak. This righteous, pure and entirely "justifiable" rage is further fueled by the solemn ritual we always bear witness to whenever a woman dies at the hands of a man. Those who hold power in our community unhesitatingly support the mob as it targets anyone who happens to share the gender of the murderer.

Radio and television hosts will pounce upon this latest tragedy with thinly disguised relish as they are gifted another opportunity to express their contempt and disgust for males.

Courtney Herron, 25, was a homeless woman who suffered mental health issues and drug addiction.

"A homeless woman who was killed in Parkville in a "horrendous bashing" was a "vulnerable" person who was failed by the society who should have protected her, police say.

Homicide squad Detective Inspector Andrew Stamper said Ms. Herron had died as a result of a "horrendous bashing."

Detective Inspector Stamper said Ms Herron had struggled in life with drug and mental health issues and described her as a "vulnerable" member of the community who society had failed to protect.

This was a young woman who had significant challenges in life. We as a community should be protecting these people and we didn't. We failed on this occasion."

A number of homeless people have been brutally murdered in recent years–most of them in Victoria and all of them men.

A homeless Melbourne man was stabbed to death but his killer had mental health issues and was not imprisoned. No candlelight vigil mentioned.

This article was very brief and lacking in any thing but the bare bones of the case. It is the only reference I could find despite my efforts to track down more details.

Again, no reference to a public outcry or expressions of grief, shock and mourning and no mention of a candlelight vigil. The homeless man was burned alive by two teenagers seeking a thrill.

Another young homeless man stabbed to death in a Melbourne boarding house.

Yet another homeless male in Melbourne butchered:

Wayne "Mousey" Perry was living under a railway bridge next to the Yarra.

"You have to sleep with one eye open because you don't know who's going to bash you or stab you or rob you," he told The Age last Friday about street life.

He was a popular guy," Paul said. "Everyone who would come down here would stop and chat with him."

Paul, 39, said a skinny young man with a shaved head had come down to their camp in the early hours of the morning.

The man, dressed in a black hoodie and black leather jacket, had stabbed his friend in his bed after ranting about vampires and werewolves*, Paul said.*

No candlelight vigil for Mousey. Was he killed by toxic masculinity or a person with a mental illness? I'll let you be the judge.

Another homeless man stabbed to death. Here is a quote from a police spokesman.

"Peter loved Australia," a NSW Police spokesman said. "He gave up his United Kingdom passport and became a citizen."

Police this week raided a property near where Mr Hoffman's body was found and are appealing for information.

Compare the dry, emotionless comments from the cop when he speaks about the brutal murder of Mr. Hoffman to the emotive, accusatory tone adopted by the detective and police commissioner when speaking about the murdered woman.

No reassuring words to the men of Australia that they are indeed safe nor is there any expression of disgust or outrage over this senseless, brutal murder or heartfelt statements about failing to protect the most vulnerable people in our society.

Here is a comment by a homeless man in Sydney in response to an inquiry into the violence faced by homeless Australians (80% of whom are men living rough on the streets).

Early one morning my friend and I were awoken by a size 12 alarm clock. For some reason three guys who had a few too many decided they would attack a couple of 'streeties' and me and my mate were the first that they came across. They kicked and punched us so hard that they put us both in hospital. When we reported the attack to the police they said 'well you live on the street, what did you expect?'. This story, shared by one of Sydney's rough sleepers in the report, highlights the random nature of violence against homeless people and a belief on the street that these attacks are not taken seriously……

If the victims are men.

I typed the words, Candlelight vigil for murdered homeless man in Melbourne and all I got was endless references to vigils for the handful of murdered women in my home city.

Detective Inspector Stamper said Ms. Herron's family had been notified and were "heartbroken."

"Courtney had sporadic contact with her family which is very much part of the challenges that happen when there is a child that suffers drug use and mental health issues … family relationships can be fragmented," he said.

"But I stress, that doesn't mean that families out there don't love their children and their heart breaks for them. We're dealing with a heartbroken family."

It must be a relief for Inspector Stamper when he is working on a case where the murder victim is a young man or homeless male. Surely the families who loved these people would not find the savage, violent murder of their son, brother or dad quite as shocking and heartbreaking as the murder of a female family member.

For those who would suggest I am being too harsh in my judgement of some off the cuff words spoken by a man who is clearly upset and feeling the strain after the discovery of a dead woman, I say:

Bullshit.

He would never have uttered words like this had he discovered a dead white man.

All murders are horrendous crimes, and particularly the murders of white men.

All murders are horrendous crimes, and particularly the murders of Christians.

All murders are horrendous crimes, and particularly the murders of Australians.

He would never be forgiven. He would lose his job the same day these words left his lips and he would be driven from public view in shame and for ever carry the infamy of his words as deeply and visibly as if they were carved onto his chest. He would never recover his good name, reputation or honour no matter what he did for the rest of his life. This is not hyperbolic language. It is the truth.

Yet he did speak those bigoted words, but the difference was the group his words targeted, whether by omission or directly as Commissioner Cornelius did. When men are the group being collectively blamed for the crime of an individual there is no outcry or demand for a retraction. In fact, such blame is widely applauded and reinforced by editorials, articles and commentary around the country.

Commissioner Cornelius, who happily hurled men under the bus yet again, did so in fear of the backlash from the feminist media and government in this state. He clearly wanted to get ahead of the pack and plant his flag emphatically and unequivocally in the fertile soil of man blaming which is such a winner where winning counts-television talk shows, radio talk shows, social media and of course from those who butter his bread, Mr. Dan Andrews and company.

Men need to offer more respect and end violence.

What an insanely stupid comment! When will our police make it clear that the only person, they blame for any murder is the person who committed the murder? Who knows, we may yet again, discover this young woman's killer has his or her own mental battles and drug addiction and was perhaps a member of the very community Inspector Stamper declared to be our most vulnerable people and worthy of our protection.

I am lucky enough to have two beautiful children-a son and a daughter. Both Ricky and Julianne have been victims of horrific violence on the streets of my beloved Melbourne. My son had a machete slashed down his chest and received 36 stitches in the wound which doctors said was a centimetre or so away from killing him. We were shattered when it happened and shed tears of grief over his vicious assault.

My gorgeous daughter was smashed in the face by a drug addict wielding a steering wheel lock. He fractured her cheekbone before grabbing her handbag and running from the scene. Both of my kids have permanent scars as a result of these assaults. I wept when my daughter was assaulted and felt a stabbing pain each time I saw the scar on her cheek.

Both of my kids are very resilient and neither of them has suffered long term problems because of their experiences.

Does anyone reading this think for one moment that the pain and grief we endured when we saw our daughter's suffering was somehow deeper and more painful than the pain we experienced when our son was assaulted? The very suggestion would appear to be obscene to any empathic, intelligent human being.

Yet this is exactly what Inspector Stamper is suggesting.

I will go to my grave bewildered and outraged by this very prevalent belief.

Does Mr. Stamper feel a different level of outrage when a young girl dies a violent death as opposed to a young boy? Is there a cut off age where the maleness of a victim is too entrenched for him to receive the same level of public horror when he dies compared to a girl of the same age? What age might that be. Ten, twelve, fourteen?

My Uncle Wal (Walter Hughes) was kicked to death by a drug addicted woman. I don't recall any huge outcry at the time. He was in his eighties and almost blind at the time of the assault.

The fact that his assailant was intoxicated and a drug addict was seen as a reason to be more lenient in sentencing.

Justice Neave said it was argued in Hegarty's defence that when she laid into Mr Hughes with her Doc Marten boots she was too intoxicated to realise that her attack could have caused Mr Hughes death or really serious injury.

Justice Neave said it was argued that Hegarty's behaviour before and after the deadly attack showed that she could not have foreseen the consequences of kicking and punching an elderly man.

I wonder if the mental state of Courtney's assailant will be considered as a mitigating factor by the law and the general public.

I can imagine some people reading this and immediately reaching for their thesaurus so they could brand me with as many nasty, derogatory adjectives as they could possibly discover.

Yet I have always felt the most profound love, compassion and empathy for all human beings and the suffering they endure. I am horrified when a young woman loses her life to some senseless act of violence. However, unlike so many people, I experience the same horror when I read about the violent death of a man. My compassion and empathy is not conditional or selective.

That is my iron clad armour.

That is my source of strength in the face of the abuse I once received when I was stupid enough to have my own Facebook page. I have never placed the value of one innocent person's life over that of another for any reason, but especially for something as immutable as their gender or race.

If that makes me someone deserving of the label, misogynist, then I carry the title with pride.

There are some people who suggest that because it is mostly other men killing homeless males these men are less worthy of our compassion. It is an insane argument. Female genital mutilation is almost exclusively performed by women. Does that make the young girls subjected to this abuse any less worthy of our empathy or the crime any more palatable? The most common victims of terrorism around the world are Muslims. Do we discount this fact because the major perpetrators of terrorist acts are also Muslims?

How does the gender, race or creed of the perpetrator bear any relevance to the level of our concern for the victims of their violence?

I have woken to discover the perpetrator of this murder was indeed a homeless man. Clearly, he has his own demons. The police commissioner who placed collective responsibility for this tragedy upon the heads of all men should be condemned as a bigot, unworthy of the position he holds.

Just as I suspected he is said to suffer from a number of mental disorders-something I predicted before the man had been arrested. Why are so many others so desperately quick to lay the blame for this tragedy at the feet of men and their apparently toxic attitudes toward women? It is an outrageous claim with no more validity than if I were to suggest the women who murder their babies are driven to do so due to a poisonous aspect of their femininity which must be probed and changed before yet more innocent babies are brutally killed by their mums.

I could urge all women to have a discussion about their propensity to kill the most vulnerable in our society. But there is no need, for women who kill are always assumed to have mental challenges. Why, the very notion is enshrined in our law and we call it post-natal depression.

I wrote an article about the countless good deeds performed by men last year. I focused specifically on the rescue of the boys from the cave in Thailand. Hundreds of men (and only men) risked their lives saving these trapped boys and one man lost his life in the process. Not one article in any mainstream newspaper thought to write about the courage, compassion and goodness of these men. There were muted references to "rescuers" but their gender was not once made the centerpiece of any tribute.

Hundreds of men risking their lives did not lead to anyone collectively praising the goodness and courage of men as a collective who almost exclusively carry out all dangerous rescue operations around the world.

One individual commits a vile crime and his gender becomes the entire focus of the story as does the collective responsibility of all men for his actions.

This perfectly illustrates the poisonous attitude to men in today's society. Shame on anyone who chooses to blame the innocent for the crimes of one guilty individual.

Oh and my prediction of a candlelight vigil was also proven to be an accurate one.

Organisers of public vigils for them and other women slain in Melbourne in the past year plan a vigil for Ms Herron at State Parliament soon.

"It is to honour each and every time a woman loses their life at the hands of a man," We Keep Vigil's Jessamy Gleeson said.

"These deaths aren't inevitable. We have a duty to look after anyone who is vulnerable."

If anyone ever doubted that we place a very different value upon our two respective genders' lives and well- being, you cannot remain in doubt anymore.

Editor's note: While the following article contains elementary descriptions of activism that seasoned MRAs are versed in, they are offered up with an eye to those who may be newer to the movement. Eds.

Introduction

Over the past couple of weeks, I've been anxious to make an article about strategy of fighting for men's rights. As advocates for men, we are definitely working hard. I will continuously defend us on that front. The belief that we aren't attempting to do anything for men is a patently false notion used to silence the discussion of men's issues. However, the problem is not about the effort, but the blueprint. The point of activism is to not only work hard, but work smart.

In this article, I'm going to give readers some advice on procedures we can take to ensure more success. Because the one thing misandrists hate more than a male advocate, is a successful male advocate. In other articles, I usually speak from the standpoint of human rights. In this article, I'm putting more emphasis on individual virtue. I am pointing out ways that the men's movement can improve on to insure future success. It would be disingenuous to make articles ranting about how hard men have it, without giving some solutions.

I want you to realize that this is purely experimental. It is not the only answer to our problems–as there is no short answer. I'm sure other people have different strategies. But I feel like we should give this one a try as we haven't used this strategy before. So, without further ado, let's jump right into it.

Where you @?

Let's start with something simple–social media. In this age of social media, we have the ability to get our message out to other people. And we need to capitalize on the situation.

Building Our Status: From my observations, people get incredibly scared whenever we respond to their lazy MRA slandering. If their views are challenged, they won't have the liberty to be intellectually lazy. They're also less likely to harass people whenever they're aware that the person has a strong base who will back them up. So we have to find each other on Facebook (Xavier Jones), Twitter (@xmjones100), and the like. We have to join each other's pages, like and share each other's tweets, tag each other in posts, and recommend informational articles on men's issues. We have to become that strong base that protects our fellow MRAs from lazy slandering Hashtags: There's multiple hashtags including #MensRights, #misandry, and #ViolenceAgainstMen. Whenever I look it up on the internet, I don't find MRA accounts speaking on behalf of men's issues. I always find feminists and anti-MRAs hijacking the hashtag to tell everyone to stop speaking about men's rights. If that's the first thing someone sees when they click the hashtag, then they are less likely to take the entire concept seriously. Whenever we type something informal about male injustices, it wouldn't hurt to add hashtags to our tweets at least every now and then. It's time for us to take back the hashtags. It's time to claim it as our own.

International Men's Day: November 19 of every year is International Men's Day. Last year we did an excellent job getting the day trending. Feminists were freaked out. That was definitely progress. We need to continue to build on that progress. We need to be ready again this year. We need to continue to remind everyone in advance about it. Eventually, large amounts of people are going to be aware of its existence.

I understand: All of this seems like nothing on paper due to its simplistic nature. But I assure you, it's very effective. The stronger we are on social media, the easier it will be to get our message out to the world. I'm usually very open minded. However, I see the use of social media as a relatively easy form of action to take. With that being said, it would be almost inexcusable if we can't do something as simple as this– at least once a week. In fact, after reading this article I'd like to see everyone trying these things out as soon as they get on social media. It's elementary, yet urgent.

Masculine Literature

Literature and activism go hand in hand. The best way to promote a cause is to use our literary skills to promote our agenda. Rhetoric and narratives can't stand just by word of mouth. They stand due to documentation and vivid descriptions. Literature will help cement our legacy.

How To Write: The way we choose to write is arguably the most important angle of our movement. You don't believe me? Think about it this way. When feminists try to slander our movement, what do they point to? Our articles. They try to take our articles out of context and use them as evidence that our movement is bad news. That is why writing our articles has to be one of our main priorities.

I am guilty of slacking off on my writing duties. I have to push myself to a new level– as we all do. We have to start writing more articles when we get the opportunity. But, we have to make sure we are writing articles of quality. Our writing should be focused on misandry, the rationality behind it, and how it affects men's lives. I know this task will be a little more difficult. But the readers need to know that we're giving the articles our best effort.

Sharing Articles: This sort of ties back to the social media situation. Whenever we speak on men's issues, we need to have the sources to back it up. If we see someone struggling to speak on behalf of men, due to a lack of sources, then we need to slide into the conversation. We can share articles written by A Voice For Men or any other website to support our agenda.

Keep A Record: This one is mind boggling. I don't understand why we don't keep a large record of our accomplishments. To be clear, we should be fighting for morality gains, not praise. However, there's no shame in keeping a record of our victories. Every other movement does this. I have only been able to find a handful of sources that keeps these victories on record. This is something that has to change.

If you are helping fathers with family court cases, we need to know about this. When the education system listens to our movement and changes school policies, the world should know about this. We have to make our stances and our records clear for everyone to see. Because one of the largest arguments against the men's rights movement is that "they don't do anything for men". Well, this is our time to prove them wrong. We need to keep a record of our boycotts, protests, speeches, political meetings, lawsuits, etc. And if we succeed in our efforts, we'll need sources to back us up.

Politics

I don't know about you guys, but I'm a man of action. If we sit here and talk only among ourselves, it's not activism–it's more like a drinking bar. The purpose of literature and social media is to get everyone attracted to the cause. But, we can't beat a dead horse. We need to push forward. And that's why we need to take more political action.

Get in contact: Believe it or not, local politics are just as important as federal politics (if not more important). From time to time, I will be attempting to have a meeting with my local politicians. Be it alderman, city council, or mayor-these are US political titles. This is a pretty simple process. So simple, I'm surprised more people aren't doing it. The simple act of more MRAs speaking to politicians can make an impact. This would show the citizens in higher office that we have a voice and that we will be speaking about men's rights unapologetically.

Political Pressure: One of the smartest things MRAs have done, is file lawsuits-kudos to the National Coalition For Men. The ability to file lawsuits, scares a lot of businesses and government officials. Lawsuits are a key portion of MRA success. It's where we have been getting most of our accomplishments. We need to push further.

I would like to see us fight back against companies that push misandric messages. We should boycott products. What do I mean by that? Don't just refuse to buy the products. Spend money on their competitors. Refusing to buy shavers from Gillette may catch their attention. But, investing money in other shaving companies will really scare them. You have to let the company know that they won't be getting your money if they don't care enough about the customers they market towards.

As far as political office, we are in a scary predicament. There is no political party-excluding Justice For Men & Boys — fighting for men's issues. As voters, we could threaten to stay at home. As activists, we should continue to file lawsuits as we have been. We can also assist other people in filing lawsuits. We have the legal and constitutional grounds, already. The only thing that we would be missing is the motivation to make it happen.

Conclusion

This article is not like the usual articles that I write. My other articles are usually more informal or opinion based. This article, on the other hand, is more of a call to action. As a writer, I love to point out injustices. However, I am also a person of action. I love getting things done. It's our job to hold one another accountable. Everything I pointed out on the social media section should be done at least once a week. Everything else is more complex and should be done when you have the time and money. The point is that we have to start doing, not just saying. Or else this all means nothing.

When you become an activist, you will get backlash and unnecessary slander for speaking out. You will be threatened, disinvited, mocked, harassed, doxed, etc. Why go through all of that for nothing? You want to walk out in this lifetime, letting yourself know that what you went through was all worth it. So, let's make the most of it. Because, together, we're a lot more powerful than we give ourselves credit for. Together we can accomplish a lot more than we think. It's time we go beyond dreaming for a better life. It's time we start creating a better life.

Help keep AVFM alive and online

This summer, A Voice for Men celebrates 10 years of online work at changing the narrative about men and boys. That's a full decade of speaking truth to power, a full decade of challenging cultural gynocentrism and a full decade of withstanding the mainstream assault for what we do.

During that time, we founded the International Conference on Men's Issues, a bold effort that thus far has seen 4 groundbreaking conferences on three continents. Conference number 5 is coming to Chicago in August. We've seeded many offshoot initiatives. Most recently we've been part of birthing regardingmen.com and the Regarding Men Newsletter, the only initiative of its kind aimed at protecting the men's issues community from the social justice gatekeepers found on traditional social media platforms.

Of course, all these efforts require work and funding, but our most basic need is to keep A Voice for Men online as the undisputed flagship of the Men's Rights Movement.

Every four months we must appeal to our supporters to help us cover the cost of web hosting, currently an expense of $290.00 monthly. With the GoFundMe fees that are collected that means we need to raise $1,275.00 per fiscal quarter to stay afloat.

That's the deal we have with the community. You keep us online and we will take it from there, with the conferences, with the challenges and with refusing to back down regardless of the attacks.

Thanks in advance from everyone at AVFM. PE

Australian university acts against feminist protestors

Bettina Arndt · 6 June 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Great news. The University of Sydney has announced disciplinary action against four of the organisers of the violent protest against me last year. After years of tolerating thuggish behaviour from students shutting down free speech on campus, the lily-livered University has finally bit the bullet and sent a warning that such harassment is unacceptable.

Last September I made a formal complaint to the University after my protest, when the riot squad was called in to remove rowdy activists preventing me from speaking on the fake rape crisis. I named key organisers of the protest and asked for action to be taken over breaches to codes of conduct and bullying and harassment regulations.

Following over eight months of investigation by the University they have finally announced that they are taking disciplinary action against four of the five students named by me in the complaint (apparently one wasn't a student at the time of the protest). Here's my video about the decision –

A statement from the University claimed they had investigated whether individual respondents had unnecessarily and unreasonably impeded the ability of members of the public and members of the University community to attend the event, whether they had impeded the event from going ahead, whether certain respondents had physically blocked certain attendees, whether respondents had coordinated their conduct with protest organisers, and whether, if established, the behaviour constituted misconduct under University policy.

And they found that found some but not all of the allegations were substantiated but not all were found to be misconduct.

The university won't release the names of the students disciplined, nor details of their publishment – claiming they need to protect them because they received abuse when they were named by me last year.

But no doubt details of the action by the University will become public because the key troublemakers, particularly Maddy Ward, have been endlessly speaking out in the press, outraged that I would take action against them.

These students and others like them have been closing down talks on campus for years and no one has gone after them before. After years of dishing it out, they are shocked to find themselves on the receiving end.

We commend Sydney University on taking this stance. It's good to see this university finally moving to ensure free speech – even though the Registrar's statement most peculiarly suggested that both my talk and the protest against it were a "legitimate expression of free speech." They would hardly be taking action against the protest organisers if that were the case.

But what's even more important, feminists shouldn't be allowed to shut down the presentation of the true facts about sexual assault on campus. Their campus rape scare campaign has a very dangerous goal – to bully universities into adjudicating rape on campus using lower standards of proof that will see more young men convicted.

Feminist activists already succeeding in corrupting our criminal law system by setting up alternate forms of justice which fail to offer male students normal legal protections. That's why they are so strenuously trying to stop me exposing what they are doing at our universities.

That's why this decision is so important. It sends a strong message that it's not acceptable for small groups of students to seek to shut down speakers raising controversial issues on campus.
It was Sydney University's violent protest against me which prompted the Federal Government to call an enquiry into free speech on campus led by former High Court Chief Justice Robert French. This resulted in a national code, adopted by the government, designed to make freedom of lawful speech a "paramount value" for university staff, students and visitors.

Hopefully this decision by the University of Sydney, plus impetus from the French inquiry, will serve to promote healthy debate on campuses – and put a stop to the silencing of discussion about the campus rape scare campaign. Student groups at other universities were intimidated by the violent Sydney protest from inviting me to speak – particularly after the Union of Students passed a resolution to prevent my talks.

I'm recommencing my campus tour, starting next month at UNSW and am in discussion with student groups across the country planning future events.

Finally, I thought you might like to see this wonderful portrait, by Central Coast artist Peter Smeeth, celebrating my campus tour. Smeeth is a very talented artist – he's entering the painting in various portrait competitions. I think it is a great way to alert people to my campus rape scare campaign tour.

Happy Men's Mental Health Week, discarded Dads

Rob Tiller · 11 June 2019 · Archived copy · Original

My early years as a counselor taught me the 'how does that make you feel' style of therapy I'd learnt at grad school generally didn't work so well engaging men. Guys aren't simply 'hairy women' and if life-bettering change is the goal of counselling, men require a different, more male-friendly approach.

Encouraging the average bloke to open up, reflect on his problems and consider tweaking his counterproductive behaviors is a skill set that's taken more than a decade of trial and error to refine. Having also presented hundreds of men's personal development workshops, I've gained first-hand insight into how modern blokes are traveling as a group. Not tip top.

Beyond Blue reports one in eight Australian men will suffer depression and one in five will experience anxiety at some stage of their lives. Meaning men in our families and communities are struggling right now, often in silence, and don't know where to turn for support that both respects male sensibilities and doesn't consider masculinity 'toxic'.

Consider the Family Court tragedy of parental alienation, where in Australia 26 per cent of children of separated parents see one parent, usually dad, less than once per year. Nearly 70 per cent of the time the female partner initiates the divorce, usually after a period of contemplation, leaving most of these fathers blindsided and reeling for months after. For some, the worst is yet to come.

Mothers intent on alienating can resort to weaponizing false accusations (domestic violence, child abuse, sexual assault) by filing strategic restraining orders that legally cut off dad from his kids. These allegations act like a proverbial shotgun blast to an innocent father's reputation and give rogue mums free rein to permanently poison paternal bonds.

In her article The Importance of Fathers, Ditta M. Oliker Ph.D. concludes from decades of family studies that children with involved and caring fathers fare better across the board. Its common sense that kids suffer developmentally without consistent quality time spent with their dads.

Academic researcher Edward Kruk Ph.D. in his article Parental Alienation as Child Abuse and Family Violence explains "custody and legal possession of a child are fertile ground for abusive parents to act at will against the target parent, and witnessing such acts… by children constitute a serious form of emotional child abuse".

It's estimated up to half of the male suicide rate in Australia is due to mental health deterioration resulting from family separation and parental alienation. That equates to 21 dead dads per week. It's a national crisis the ABC still won't publicize, while the Australian Government continues to spend millions of taxpayer dollars rolling out their seasonal 'men suck' campaigns.

Men and boys are not toxic. Men's mental health is essential to the well-being of the community, and society continually telling blokes they're the "bad ones" does real psychological damage. It's also inaccurate.

According to clinical psychologist Bettina Arndt's widely researched article Always Beating Up on Men, international statistics suggest both sexes share near equal responsibility for behaving destructively during relationship conflict. Any couples counselor worth their salt would agree it typically takes two to trash a relationship.

Even when a couple manages to separate semi-amicably, it can still take dad years to recover from the loss of his family unit. Transitioning into co-parenthood, while grieving, requires both parties to vigilantly bite their tongues (personal digs, snide remarks, fishing for details about the other parent's new life) and maintain a mutual focus on the best interests of their kids. Easier said than done.

Putting old scores and fresh grievances aside is essential to the long-term emotional health of both children and co-parents alike. That's where a male-friendly counselor can help. Most men respond well to skills-based, solution-focused counselling where they feel empowered by proven tools to navigate their trying circumstances. It's a collaborative conversation.

Fathers recovering from separation or experiencing parental alienation can also access a handful of quality Australian organisations offering male-friendly support. Dads in Distress (parentsbeyondbreakup.com) is a national suicide prevention charity focusing on separating families. Operating a network of no cost, local peer support groups in many communities across Australia, Dads in Distress is a literal lifesaver for blokes feeling at the end of their rope.

Putting aside man-childish things

Doug Mortimer · 11 June 2019 · Archived copy · Original

> When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child: but when I became a man, I put away childish things. (1 Corinthians 13:11)

Granted, today if one speaks like a man, understands like a man, and thinks as a man, he will probably be called a fascist or a Nazi and be banned from YouTube and all social media. A man-child has no such worries.

As an exemplar man-child, I offer journalist Rowan Lehr. Chances are you've never heard of him, but you probably know someone like him. He recently published a confession of sorts, "A Cosplayer's Origin Story" in Fort Worth Weekly. If you're curious, you can check it out at www.fwweekly.com.

Lehr, who appears to be in his late 20s, tells how the 2008 movie Iron Man was something of an epiphany to him. He found superheroism was an antidote to his teenage social anxiety. Better than drugs, I guess.

At any rate, he took up cosplay, impersonating superheroes for fun if not profit. He recently paraded around Sundance Square, in the heart of downtown Fort Worth, in a Captain America costume in conjunction with the Avengers: Endgame movie.

Lehr devotes a great deal of his spare time to perfecting his costumes and working out to achieve a physique more appropriate for a superhero costume. The death of legendary comic book artist Stan Lee last year brought tears to his eyes. Good to see that Lehr is in touch with his feelings.

Now let's play compare and contrast. Let's consider the life story of a young man from a previous generation.

You may have heard of this young man. He is a member of the Texas Aviation Hall of Fame, but he did not achieve fame as an aviator. I speak of Tom Landry the first and longtime (1960-1988) head coach of the Dallas Cowboys. No surprise that he is in the NFL Hall of fame, but what was he doing in the Texas Aviation Hall of Fame?

Well, it turns out he was a co-pilot flying B-17s (popularly known as flying fortresses…think Memphis Belle) on World War II bombing missions (30 total) over Europe. He was only 20 years old.

With this in mind, the reason for Landry's renowned sideline stoicism was obvious. After all, how could anyone get agitated by a football game after what he'd been through? As he once said, "There are coaches to whom winning or losing means something close to life or death. If they lose, then their life has somehow been diminished. I'm not that way, and it keeps me steady." In other words, this flyboy was grounded…but in a good way.

In our over-caffeinated world, football head coaches often appear to be courting a cardiovascular crisis on the sidelines. Today an aspiring coach with a Landry-like attitude couldn't get past the first round of job interviews. If you don't feel that fire in the belly, better learn to fake it.

When I first read about Landry's wartime deeds, I couldn't help but ask myself what I was doing at age 20. For the most part, I was shuffling from one college classroom to another. Accruing student loan debt can be hazardous to your financial health but it isn't a matter of life and death. Getting shot down in flames was only a hazard metaphorically speaking…e.g., getting the brushoff when asking for a date or tanking on an exam.

Now I'm not big on jingoism and I don't think that military experience is an essential component in one's transformation into a man. The military lifestyle, even during peacetime, never held any attraction for me. Still, I couldn't help but be impressed by Tom Landry's deeds. I'm sure his parents never had any discussions about their son's failure to launch. They were more worried about his walking away from landings.

As we compare and contrast Tom Landry and Rowan Lehr, I think it's safe to say that their life experiences, though poles apart, are not atypical of their generations. Almost all American men born in 1924, like Tom Landry, were involved in World War II in some form or fashion. Business as usual just wasn't possible from Pearl Harbor to V-J Day.

Lehr and his fellow Millennials have not had to deal with a global conflict or conscription. Not that Millennials don't have their issues and concerns, but so far nothing so all-encompassing and unavoidable as World War II has arisen. With all the misinformation, disinformation and outright propaganda out there, it's highly debatable as to which, if any, contemporary battles are worth fighting. Lapsing into slackerdom is understandable.

Famously, contemporary slackers are associated with superhero movies as well as video games. In fact, if you check out the offerings at your local multiplex, you might be hard-pressed to find a movie that isn't one or the other, and sometimes a hybrid of both.

Admittedly, I never cared for video games, though I have some vague memory of playing Space Invaders and Pac-Man once or twice. Never cared much for superheroes either, though I do remember watching the old Superman (with George Reeves) TV show in the 1950s. I also remember kiddie shows that featured the old Superman cartoons released by Paramount in the 1940s. I enjoyed those cartoons then and still like them today. They were short, dramatically animated, and totally unpretentious.

It's easy to see why children would be fascinated by superheroes. For little people in a world dominated by big people, the appeal of having magic powers is understandable. Employing one of today's favorite buzzwords, a child feels empowered!

Certainly life would be much more pleasant if you were faster than a speeding bullet, more powerful than a locomotive, and able to leap tall buildings at a single bound – especially if you're the only one in the world who could perform these feats. No big deal on Krypton maybe, but here on planet earth, it turns heads. It may well be that the superhero cosplay folks are channeling Clark Kent/Superman every time they doff conventional attire and don some sort of superhero duds. It may be harder to find a telephone booth these days, but clothes still make the man/superman!

Traditionally, superhero characters were marketed towards American children, boys in particular. If a superhero caught on, he might have a long-running series of comic books or a TV series; today the stakes are higher. Superhero movie franchises are marketed globally, and the audience has expanded from children to adults. Recently some of those adults stayed up past their bedtime and spent the night camped out in front of movie theaters to make sure they could see Avengers: Endgame the day it opened.

The current crew of superheroes dates back to 1938 when Superman made his debut in Action Comics. Bigger-than-life heroic figures are not really new, however. The Greeks had Hercules, the Hebrews had Sampson. In the 1920s, Americans had Babe Ruth. Note, however, that while the aforementioned possessed unusual strength, they could not fly, shoot laser beams out of their eye sockets or lighting out of their fingertips. Their strength made them mythical figures but they were not gods. They might have a special blessing from God (Hercules was supposedly fathered by Zeus, Sampson's long hair was a sort of covenant with God) but at the end of the day they were mortal.

Atlas was kind of a superhero but until Ayn Rand came along, shrugging was not an option. Oh, it's OK to go MGTOW for a little while (even Superman had his Fortress of Solitude), but sooner or later the superhero must develop a social conscience. He must champion the collective, however that is defined. Hercules was a hero of the Greek people, Sampson of the Hebrews. Batman has Gotham, Superman has Metropolis. The people demand a messiah and sooner or later there will be someone with a messianic complex to oblige them. One can see why a strongman politician (popularly known as "a man on horseback" in pre-automobile days) held so much appeal for the masses.

Unfortunately, hero (or superhero) worship in a society obsessed with equality is a recipe for cognitive dissonance. As much as the average Joe longs to be top dog, deep down he knows he is of meeker stuff. In a traditional society, he accepts his role in society and makes the best of things. In an egalitarian (yet upwardly mobile) society, every superhero is not only a role model but also a reminder of one's own shortcomings. Having super powers would be really neat! But doesn't that amount to privilege?

Well, note that a number of superheroes today have become social justice warriors! If you're privileged but champion the underprivileged, you get a pass. That way you can have it both ways. Call it equity superheroism. Super powers in the service of the downtrodden!

Typically, underachievement has been a male affliction. Great things were not expected from females, so until recently superheroines were not a big deal. Today we can't have too many positive role models for girls, even if they are fantasy figures. Now feminists promote the questionable slogan "If you can see it, you can be it." In other words, if girls see female fighter pilots or Fortune 500 CEOs or Nobel-prize winning physicists, they can achieve same.

Hogwash. Horsefeathers. Hooey.

Consider how many boys have spent countless hours "seeing" athletes go through their paces but have no chance of "being" one. Wanna be a fighter pilot? You can see Top Gun any time you want on DVD, but no matter how many times you watch it, no matter if you memorize every line of dialogue, if you don't have the right stuff…forget it.

Of course, you can always go the Walter Mitty route and fantasize (the poor man's virtual reality). Or you can play pretend. Like Halloween, playing pretend used to be kid stuff, but now it has become more popular with adults. And more socially acceptable.

In addition to Halloween, now there are comic book, science fiction, horror, and fantasy film fests and conventions where Rowan Lehr and his ilk take center stage. As with Halloween and Mardi Gras, a great deal of thought, time, and sometimes money, is invested in costumes, in other words in playing pretend and dress-up.

Now some of it could be mere escapism from dreary jobs and pedestrian realities. It's disheartening to realize that your destiny is not to save the tribe, the city, the nation, the planet, or the universe, but to sit in a cubicle for eight hours and manipulate a mouse and keyboard and occasionally get up to pick up something from the printer or go to the bathroom. Welcome to quiet desperationville. Population: billions and billions.

Unfortunately, playing dress-up has migrated from recreation to delusion. For example, men who wanted to be women were once content to be transvestites, in other words to play dress-up. Now they think wishing will make it so. If you feel like a woman, that's all that counts. Never mind what your DNA says, never mind your external genitalia, never mind your hormones. Magical thinking – it's not just for kids any more. When you wish upon a star, makes no difference who you are. The perfect wedding of magical thinking and egalitarianism!

Speaking of stars, let's not forget the legions of Star Trek/Star Wars fans. At its best, science fiction is a thoughtful exploration of the human condition and what twists and turns it may take in the future (think Michael Crichton). At its worst, it is another manifestation of magical thinking, which has a lot in common with social justice babbling.

The social justice component of Star Trek has been there since day one, but now it thoroughly dominates. Star Wars is going in the same direction, but at heart it is little more than a cosmic soap opera. At the risk of offending some readers, I propose that a Venn diagram of fanboys and soyboys would show considerable overlap.

But let's not put all the stigma on the comics/science fiction/fantasy crowd. A lot of these folks are apathetic when it comes to sports, yet sports junkies are almost as bad. At least, sports heroes are real people. A right fielder is a real human being. No matter how strong his arm, he can't hurl a lightning bolt. No matter how far he can hit a baseball, eventually the laws of physics kick in and the ball returns to earth. But he makes plenty of money and the chicks dig him. The result: a fan base!

If you ever look at old photos of fans in the stands at sporting events, you will note that almost everyone is wearing regular clothing. Now almost every fan in the stands is wearing some sort of home team attire. When a seating section is full, it almost looks like a solid bloc of color. Wearing red at a St. Louis Cardinals game is almost a requirement for admission.

In more recent years, replica jerseys for individual players have become popular. Team shops regularly offer such outerwear with the names and numbers of individual players. Hence the wearer can identify not just with the home team but with an individual player. The former is akin to joining a collective, the latter is akin to an assumed identity. Not quite cosplay but getting there.

If you care to, you can buy an authentic #3 Bryce Harper jersey (available from the Philadelphia Phillies' web site for just $283.99; also available is a cheaper version for $119). If you're strapped for cash, you can buy one of his old jerseys from the Washington Nationals. You can wear your Bryce Harper jersey to the ballpark. You can wear it away from the ballpark. You can sleep in it. You can even shower in it. But you will never be Bryce Harper. Hell, you can even be buried in it, but by then it's too late to be Bryce Harper…or anyone else.

Now I'm not advocating you boycott superhero movies, comic book conferences, Star Trek/Star Wars conventions, and spectator sports. We're all entitled to our diversions and guilty pleasures. God knows I have my share. In fact, I can't imagine modern civilization without them. But what happens when they take on an importance far beyond what they deserve? If we don't put aside childish things can we at least put them on the back burner?

Ironically, when Tom Landry returned from World War II he went back to playing college football and then on to pro football and coaching pro football. Well, a man's got to earn a living somehow, and I guess that's as good a way as any, though it likely seemed pretty tame after participating in multiple air assaults on Fortress Europa. I don't think Landry would have resorted to fantasy football, even if they'd had such a thing in his day.

And so we come to the fundamental difference between Lehr and Landry, and hence their respective generations. In Landry's day they had novels, movies, radio, and comic books but relatively little time to indulge in them. Today Lehr and his contemporaries have all that plus television, CDs, DVDs, video games, the internet, not to mention fantasy football baseball, and maybe other sports too, for all I know. Reality is getting more virtual and less real by the day. In days past, the phrase "real reality" would have been a tautology, but given the rise of virtual reality, it is regrettably apt. In truth, a wall of separation is needed between the two. Here's why:

Screw up in Mortal Kombat and it's "Game Over." Screw up on a bombing mission and it's "Life Over" – for you and your crew. Now that's real reality!

So don your superhero costume if you want to. If that's your virtual reality, so be it. It will never be your real reality. On the other hand, if you're waiting for a superhero to save the day, that isn't going to happen either. There are important battles being fought today. More important battles will be fought tomorrow. If you're spoiling for a fight, there is a place for you in these conflicts. But lose the superhero costume.

And leave the light saber in the closet.

Gynocentrism and the value of men (part one)

Peter Ryan · 16 June 2019 · Archived copy · Original

As I discussed in my article on Gynocentrism And The Golden Uterus[1], there is a prevailing assertion in the wider gynocentric culture that women are superior to men. The central tenet of this belief system is that because women give birth and are the rate limiting factor of reproduction, they are more biologically valuable than men. The relative biological value of life, and the value of life in general, of males and females, is reduced down to their relative investment in reproduction.

Successfully reproducing offspring is erroneously regarded as having the same outcome as successfully continuing the lineage over generations. At a glance it is easy to see how such an error can be made. It is a fact that any organism must reproduce to pass on its genes. However it is also a fact that any organism must first survive and develop to reproduce. It is also a fact that after reproduction, some degree of parental investment is required for offspring to survive and for reproduction to not become a dead-end.

The problem with stating that 'women are more biologically valuable to the species than men because they are the rate limiting factor of reproduction' is that it omits the vast multitude of activities and traits outside of reproduction that contribute to genes successfully passing from one generation to the next. It ignores the reality that biology is comprised of systems. The reproductive role of women is essential (and so is the male reproductive function) to genome propagation, but it is not the only essential role or activity required to get a genome from generation A to generation B or C or D. A number of these other essential activities disproportionately rely on men, such as provision and protection for community survival.

Communities that lose women lose their capacity to reproduce, but communities that lose men lose their capacity to survive. Women might be the rate limiting factor of reproduction, but men are the rate limiting factor of survival. Reproduction cannot occur or lead anywhere without surviving to reproduce and ensuring sufficient numbers of offspring survive. These are the realities that time and time again are ignored and never addressed by those that suggest women are more valuable than men based on the sex difference in reproductive investment. Is it a fact that women are the rate limiting factor of reproduction? Yes. Is it a fact that this is a core driver of biological sex differences? Yes. Does that play a role in driving gynocentrism? Indirectly yes, as it does with most social dynamics between the sexes.

These facts do not then automatically mean the female sex is biologically more valuable (or more valuable in general) than men, or that men are biologically disposable. For those who think I am wrong and remain convinced women are more valuable, and that men are biologically disposable because of differences in reproductive investment, or stick to the fallacious 'two tribes' analogy, please read my two part article on Gynocentrism And The Golden Uterus linked here[1] and here[2].

This article will be focusing on further examining the value of males and females in biological and evolutionary terms and without the gynocentric rose-tinted glasses on. It will also be focused on rectifying common misconceptions floating around in society about the related science which have been promoted by our gynocentric mainstream media and academia to convey a narrative of female superiority.

Certain man haters and female supremacists in the scientific community, and media, make claims like "maleness is a birth defect"[3] . Maleness is not a defect. Only the mentally and morally defective would hold such beliefs. Unfortunately for society, such hateful man hating bigots hold senior positions at our universities, in our mainstream media and other institutions. These beliefs cannot be ignored because they reflect the beliefs of too many individuals holding positions of influence and authority in society. This will contribute to undermining the future prosperity and very survival of our society, as civilisation heavily relies on men being in a position to ensure its own existence. I am writing these articles to set the record straight for generations of boys and young men that are being told they are inferior and defective, from every corner of our institutions.

Male Development And Body Size Reflects Male Value

Firstly when evaluating the value of males, we should consider the basic biological characteristics of males. If males were less valuable to the species than females and biologically disposable, then their biology would reflect that. If men were truly biologically disposable, they would resemble the tiny male Anglerfish[4] that fuses into the female and becomes an appendage (the linked educational video is an amusing literal illustration of this), or a male worker bee or an ant, or a tiny male spider. Men would be much smaller than women and have a much shorter and less energy demanding developmental period, as they would need to be easily and quickly replaced to be disposable. Their low value would not warrant their biology and life history[5] profile, investing time and energy in a large body size or a long developmental period. Human males are larger than females, take longer to develop and consume more energy during development (Teenage males consume whole fridges). Human male biology runs against the narrative men are biologically disposable and less valuable than women. In particular species where there are males that appear to be "disposable", males develop quickly and have small body sizes.

Fishers Principle

If we are measuring the biological value of the two sexes, then we have to consider the evolutionary forces that shape biology. Biology exists in its current form because of selection for certain traits and genes that increase the number of copies of the genome or genes. The number of copies of the genome (or genes) that exist after a certain number of generations, is a measure of evolutionary success and thus biological value. Value also has to be considered in relation to the entities that invest in that value.

When it comes to the biological value of males and females, we are measuring the number of copies of the genome (or the number of copies of individual genes of the genome) that male and female progeny contribute to their parents, whom invest in producing the male and female offspring. The overall biological value of males and females to their parents is exactly equal. This is because the total number of copies of a genome produced after a set number of generations for parents of males and parents of females, is exactly equal. That is a mathematical certainty by virtue of the fact that every copy of every genome requires one male and one female to produce it. After ten, one hundred, or one thousand generations, parents of males and parents of females leave exactly the same total number of copies of their genome.

This is why the sex ratio at birth is almost 1:1 and there are roughly equal numbers of males and females in the population. The total parental expenditure in producing males and females will be equal, when the total number of copies of the parent's genome that male and female offspring generate is equal. Parental expenditure is not just the reproduction of males and females, but also all the parental investment incurred in raising offspring. The reason the sex ratio is slightly biased in favour of males at birth, is because of the higher male infant mortality, which leads to a higher production of male offspring to equalise total parental expenditure in males and females. What I have described is Fishers principle[6]. It is also what evolutionary biologists Dr. Brett Weinstein and Dr. Heather Heying were referring to in this video[7], when they were discussing why neither sex is "better" in an evolutionary sense. Biology does not have a favourite between males and females, because they produce exactly the same number of copies of the genome.

If the rate of reproduction is all that matters, then why produce a surplus number of males and why not produce an entirely female population? Fishers principle partly explains why that cannot happen. If parental expenditure in a population for male offspring is reduced and increased for female offspring, then any parent that invests in male offspring will be at an evolutionary advantage. This is because the total number of copies of the genome from investing in male offspring remains exactly equal to the total for investing in female offspring, as one male and one female are required to produce every copy. This means that the lower investment in males produces the same level of evolutionary success as the higher investment in females. Consequently parents that invest in males have a winning strategy, as they get more return from their parental investment in males, or more bang for their buck. Parents that develop a genetic bias to investing in males over females, will thus be at an advantage. As a result, investment in males will rise until the advantage from doing so disappears once parental expenditure is equalised.

The dynamics of Fishers Principle I have just described, is called an evolutionary stable strategy[8]. When Fishers principle persists in a species and applies, any deviation from equal parental expenditure in male and female offspring either cannot emerge or eventually disappears. This is because it is inefficient to invest more in one sex, when the total evolutionary success of each sex remains the same. People only need to ask the question why half the population is male, to recognise the tunnel vision of people that assert women are more valuable to the species (or vice versa). If that were the case then our biology would reflect that. Instead of having equal total parental investment in males and females, it would be unequal. It is important to note that whilst Fishers principle is very frequently observed, it is not universal to all life. Evolution and adaptation can bypass Fishers principle and drive an uneven investment in male and female offspring. There are species with very uneven sex ratios, or that reproduce asexually.

Fishers principle restricts a species to equally investing in males and females. If evolutionary success is more dependent on females than on males, then sexual reproduction that leads to an equal investment in males and females becomes costly and risky. A greater dependence on one sex in terms of risk, is analogous to putting all your eggs in one basket. It is also costly because you are wasting half of your resources on a sex whose contribution to evolutionary success relative to females, is lower in proportion to the share of parental investment expended on them. Consequently where evolutionary success is more dependent on females than on males and Fisher dynamics are present, there is a selective pressure to either:

A. Develop a method of reproduction that does not rely on males (such as a form of asexual reproduction), so as to overcome Fishers principle and produce entirely females.

B. Develop males that do equally contribute to evolutionary success.

In our lineage and many others where Fishers principle has prevailed, we have gone down pathway B. The constraints of Fishers principle and females being the rate limiting factor of reproduction, generates a sexual selective pressure on males that is proportional in magnitude to the greater reproductive investment of females. This pressure drives the development of traits in males, that are equivalent in biological value to the value of female reproductive investment and the biological value of women. Despite what feminists claim, men do have innate strengths relative to women. Males have a biological value to the species that is equivalent to that of females, it is just a different form of value. These traits do not make men superior to women, just as having a uterus does not make women more valuable than men.

We have had the current Y chromosome derived male in our lineage for over 160 million years[9]. That is a long time to invest half your genome in a supposedly “disposable” male reproductive vehicle! Dinosaurs walked the Earth and the two supercontinents Laurasia and Gondwanaland had only recently started to break up, when Y chromosome derived males in our lineage first emerged. Males were around even before then in other forms of life for hundreds of millions of years, prior to the Y chromosome form of sex determination emerging.

If men were truly biologically disposable and the rate of reproduction was all the mattered, then at some point in the last 160 million years males would have been removed from the lineage. To illustrate this point, let us assume for the moment that reproductive reductionists are right and that women are biologically more valuable than men because they are the rate limiting factor of reproduction. Over 160 million years there would have been a selective pressure to drive the biology of our ancestors to remove males from our lineage and develop alternative methods of reproduction that rely entirely on females. This is because there would have been a cost incurred from failing to adapt along these lines and a big advantage to avoiding the cost of producing “disposable” males that had little value. Populations that produced asexually would have developed at first by accident and then quickly out-reproduced their counterparts and dominated the future gene pool. Eventually males would have disappeared from the lineage. After more than 160 million years this has failed to occur.

Humans demonstrate equal parental investment in male and female offspring and so have our ancestors over many tens of millions of years. Many species have come and gone, continents have moved and the Dinosaurs have roamed the Earth over the timescale we are talking about. Even in evolutionary terms, there has been plenty of time to develop different reproductive strategies that could have overcome Fishers principle and lead to an entirely female population. Asexual reproduction such as parthenogenesis, which is observed in the natural world, could have emerged in this time frame in our lineage. Why didn't it? If reproduction matters so much, then why not adopt a far more rapid method of reproduction and have a population entirely of females? The answer is simply that reproduction is not the sole determinant of biological value. That is why our species sexually reproduces to begin with and has males. It is because biological value is not solely determined by the rate of reproduction, that we have males in equal number to females.

Debunking The Nonsense 'Men And The Y Chromosome Are Disappearing'

There are some gleeful closet dwelling female supremacists and radical feminists in the media and elsewhere, that like to rely on cherry picked research that men will soon disappear because the Y chromosome is supposedly "dying out". The gynocentric mainstream media has enjoyed promoting this narrative and reporting on it every couple of years. The claim that males and the Y chromosome are disappearing is not supported by most population geneticists, as Dr. Judith Mank explains in her presentation[10] at the Royal Institution. Dr. Mank states that due to selection pressures that have acted on and refined the Y chromosome, rather than degraded, "You have a Y chromosome that's small but quite mighty in its functions". Of course people would not know that if they read certain news articles that want to twist science to suit an agenda.

The Y chromosome is not disappearing. The size of the Y chromosomes has stabilised and it has not lost a gene for 25 million years[11]. The Y chromosome has features (such as palindromes) and mechanisms (such as gene conversion[12]) that enable it repair to itself (see this link[13], this link[14] and this link[15] for more information). Research also shows that purifying selection[16] may play a role in maintaining and refining the quality and structure of the Y chromosome. Lastly it has also been found[17] that the Y chromosome has genes whose functions extend beyond sperm production, that are active in other areas of the body like the heart and lungs etc and play a role in essential cellular processes important to survival. It is thought that the presence of such important genes on the Y chromosome, may be a further factor in ensuring the integrity of the Y chromosome. Even if the Y chromosome does disappear, there are multiple examples[18] observed in other species that males still remain after it is lost and that another chromosome simply takes over the Y chromosomes functions and/or an alternative mechanism of sex-determination is developed.

Linked to this 'men are disappearing' myth is a less common but ridiculous narrative that the lower sperm counts of men is evidence that nature is getting rid of males. Firstly the claim that the decrease in sperm counts in men over the last 50 years is going to lead to a male fertility crisis for humans, has been exaggerated and it is unclear such a crisis awaits us. Whilst there has been a large decline in sperm count reported[19], it was also stated that men still have 47 million sperm per ml and that this is well within normal ranges. The average male sperm count is well above the 15 million per ml threshold where fertility problems occur[20]. With that said, that does not mean this is a problem we should ignore and just make idiotic remarks that "nature" is working against men. Despite what female supremacists claim, the available evidence suggests the declining sperm count of men is not due to nature selecting men out of the gene pool, but is actually driven by artificial causes. Prenatal exposure to plasticizers such as phthalates, have been shown[21] to negatively affect male fertility. Women are not exempt either from these negative effects. The same plastic chemicals have been shown to also negatively affect female fertility and also their health. See these links here[22] and here[23] for more information. The claim lower male sperm counts are evidence of nature getting rid of males, has no leg to stand on.

The Male Variance In Reproduction

It is often quoted[24, 25] by some that in the past one man reproduced for every two women. I have heard other numbers cited, some higher, some lower. The exact numbers of male and female ancestors that reproduced is still a matter of debate and has likely fluctuated over time and will probably remain uncertain. It is certainly a fact that males show a greater variance in reproductive success than females. When it is quoted that one man reproduced for every two women, it is misunderstood by some people to mean that men contributed only a third of the genome and women the other two thirds. In reality this is not correct. If one man reproduced for every two women, each man that did reproduce, reproduced at double the frequency of their female counterparts. Whilst lower numbers of men may have passed on their genes than women, those men that reproduced did so at a higher frequency than women. So the total contribution to the genome was exactly equal between males and females, but the contribution per male that reproduced was higher than the contribution per female that reproduced. It is a common misunderstanding to confuse the difference in the numbers of men and women reproducing, with the total level of reproduction of each sex. They are not necessarily identical.

It is also incorrect to assert that because more females reproduce than males, females are more biologically valuable to their parents as more female offspring pass on their genes. Whilst a parent may give birth to males that do not reproduce at all, that does not necessarily mean males in general are less biologically valuable than females. Any population that has fewer males reproducing than females, will also have individual males reproducing at a higher rate than individual females. This is a mathematical reality. There are parents of male offspring that pass on their genome at a higher rate than any female offspring in the population. For every male that fails to reproduce, there is another male out-reproducing his female counterparts.

The total biological value of males and females is exactly equal, but there are differences when comparing the distributions of the biological value of individuals of each sex. As we see predictably with so many human traits, women cluster around the mean of biological value with less variance and men are over-represented at both the high and low extremes with greater variance. There are females that are more biologically valuable than males and males more biologically valuable than any female. I will have more to say later on in this article on why the value of male and female life is greater than its biological value and must be regarded as equal.

The Trivers-Willard Hypothesis And The Biological Value Of Men

Fishers principle applies to the population as a whole and the result is that the total evolutionary success and biological value of male and female offspring to their parents as a whole, is exactly equal. However as previously mentioned, there can be deviations within the population when we consider individual males and individual females within the population. Some male offspring leave more copies of their genes behind than females and some female offspring leave more copies of their genes behind than males.

The Trivers-Willard hypothesis (TWH)[26] predicts that the sex ratio of offspring can be varied with maternal condition. This is because males show a greater variance in reproduction than females. The number of copies of the genome males leave behind relative to females, can increase and decrease by a much greater degree. Furthermore, the physical and mental condition of male and female offspring affects their reproductive success. Consequently the reproductive success of sons is much more sensitive to the physical and mental condition of sons, than the reproductive success of daughters is to the condition of daughters. If the condition of a son increases, this could lead to a much larger gain in reproductive success than for a daughter, because male offspring can reproduce at a much faster rate and therefore have a much higher limit on how many offspring they can produce. A daughter in good condition might have 10 children and a son in good condition might have 100 children. The condition of offspring will affect their reproductive success and the condition of offspring is affected by maternal condition. As maternal condition affects the condition of offspring (paternal condition does also in other ways) and the condition of offspring impacts the reproductive success of sons to a greater degree, maternal condition has a greater impact on the reproductive success of males than on females.

To illustrate this point, consider a mother in good condition. A mother in good condition could produce a son in good condition that could father 100 children. In contrast, a mother in good condition could produce a daughter in good condition that could give birth to 10 children. TWH predicts that mothers in good condition, will have a sex ratio biased in favour of producing male offspring to maximise evolutionary success. What happens when a mother is in poor condition? A mother in poor condition could produce a son in poor condition, who will be outcompeted by male offspring in good condition and may father only 1 or 2 children or none at all. Conversely, a mother in poor condition could produce a daughter in poor condition, that may still give birth to at least 4 or 5 children. The poor condition of the mother negatively impacts the reproductive success of the son to a much greater degree than it does for the daughter's reproductive success. TWH predicts that mothers in poor condition, will have a sex ratio biased in favour of producing female offspring to maximise evolutionary success.

Fishers Principle does provide a constraint on the dynamics emerging from TWH. If every mother in the population is in good condition and produces more sons than daughters, or every mother in poor condition produces more daughters than sons, that will bias the parental expenditure in favour of one sex over the other in the population. Fishers principle predicts parents of the rarer sex in such a scenario, will have a higher return on their parental investment (as the total evolutionary success of each sex is equal and is shared between fewer males than females for example). This will eventually lead to an opposing bias emerging, where more of the rarer sex will be produced and the sex ratio will then shift back to equilibrium.

Whilst the population as a whole will have a sex ratio of virtually 1:1, the cohort of the population in good condition will have more sons than average and the cohort of the population in poor condition will have more daughters than average. The sex ratio bias in each cohort will balance each other out and so neither sex is favoured in the population as a whole. Fishers principle will apply to the population as a whole and TWH will predict confined deviations from the 1:1 sex ratio within cohorts of the population based on maternal condition.

What does TWH have to do with male value? Let us assume that biological value is solely or overwhelmingly derived from reproductive investment and women are more biologically valuable based solely on their greater reproductive investment. If this is correct then we would expect parents to be producing daughters in greater proportion than sons, across all values of maternal condition. This is because females always have a greater reproductive investment than males across all values of maternal condition, thanks to females having a uterus and males lacking one. If parents are in optimal condition, then they are free of external pressures and have the resources available to select for whichever sex they prefer. It would then follow they would select for producing female offspring, in such an instance where females were more biologically valuable than males. TWH does not predict this result and neither do the studies[27]supporting it, instead they show the predicted bias in favour of producing male offspring when there is good maternal condition.

For those that automatically assume that the effect of maternal condition on the sex ratio is proof of women being more valuable than men, there is research showing that paternal condition also affects the sex ratio. Research has found[28] that adult male primates higher in the social dominance hierarchy with higher testosterone levels, can bias the sex ratio in favour of producing sons. It is also worth considering that good maternal condition is not important under TWH, unless it leads to sons that are also in good condition and can successfully compete and survive to make full use of their reproductive capacity. Good maternal condition has value under TWH, only if it positively affects the condition of sons.

Whilst the evidence for TWH remains mixed in humans, there is no evidence to demonstrate that production of female offspring is universally preferred over the production of male offspring by parents, on the basis of females being the rate limiting factor of reproduction. Studies that have better measures of parental investment show more support for the TWH, than studies with poorer measures[29]. Like most aspects of human biology that are based on systems, relative investment in male and female offspring is multifactorial and cannot be reduced down to a single simple mechanism (like women being the rate limiting factor of reproduction). So it is unsurprising that the evidence shows mixed support for TWH.

Where research runs contrary to TWH, it does not support the claim female offspring are selected over male offspring based solely or primarily on greater female reproductive value. A recent study[30] of TWH in humans, reported little support for TWH and found women had a stronger psychological preference for having girls and men had a stronger psychological preference for having boys. If females were more biologically valuable than males, both male and female parents would show a preference for having daughters and yet that was not what was observed.

If females were truly more biologically valuable than males, then the bias to favour having female offspring would be deeply biologically ingrained. There would not be communities in China having a disproportionate amount of sons, based on the cultural tradition of wanting to continue the family name[31]. If all it takes is a cultural tradition of passing on the family name to cause communities to favour sons and skew the sex ratio at birth, then that makes a few claims very questionable and probably wrong. If women were more biologically valuable than men based on their reproductive value, then a preference for daughters over sons would be a universal biological reality with no significant exceptions (certainly not whole communities). No cultural tradition or exception would be strong enough to override such a biological reality, as the bias would exist at such a fundamental level of our nature. Simply wanting to pass on the family name would not stand a chance against such a deeply seated biological bias to favour females, if it actually existed as described.

The Biological Value Of Men That Do Not Reproduce

The number of copies of the genes that male and female offspring contribute to their parents, is not solely determined by their individual frequency of reproduction. It is often said casually by critics of MGTOW (men going their own way), that as these men do not reproduce they will be removed from the gene pool. Of course as predicted, these same people fail to point out that the same reductive reasoning can be applied to many feminists and entitled princesses that also fail to reproduce. The data[32] shows that childless women are on the rise. Would anyone dare make the same remarks about childless women as some people do about MGTOW? I don't think so.

It is also worth pointing out that whilst substantial numbers of MGTOW may not have children, that choice is incidental to men going their own way and very often the result of choosing to not marry women or cohabitate with them. A man going his own way does not automatically translate to a man choosing not to have children, any more than it means having children. MGTOW is a man going his way over gynocentrism and choosing a direction in life based on his choices, rather than winning female approval. Some MGTOW may choose to have children and other MGTOW may choose not to.

The evolutionary reality is actually more complicated than simply asserting that the failure of an individual to reproduce, means a failure to pass on their genes. The number of copies of the genes (or the contribution of the genome) an individual leaves behind, is decided not only by their individual frequency of reproduction, but also by a number of other factors such as:

1. The number of their offspring that actually survive to sexual maturity and are in a sufficiently healthy condition to reproduce.

2. The number of offspring their relatives produce and survive to sexual maturity in a healthy condition to reproduce.

3. The number of offspring genetically similar non-relatives (unrelated individuals that share genetic similarity, will share a certain fraction of genes) produce and survive to sexual maturity in a healthy condition to reproduce.

Concepts like inclusive fitness[33] and kin selection[34] matter when considering the total fitness and evolutionary success of an individual. It is not just all based on the individual's personal reproductive fitness. Whilst there are males that do not reproduce, they may still leave copies of their genes behind. These males may directly and indirectly contribute to the fitness of relatives and genetically similar non-relatives. What is often overlooked by many people, is the contribution men make to the survival of their community and the impact that then has on the capacity of the community to reproduce and also care for offspring. Men that do not reproduce but contribute to the survival of their community, can enhance the capacity of their relatives and genetically similar non-relatives to reproduce and care for their offspring and to pass on their genes. As these individuals share similar genes to the men that do not reproduce, the genes of these men can be passed on to the next generation indirectly through other people.

The concept of alloparental care[35] is an important example to consider in this context. In our species, adults care for related and unrelated children that are not their direct descendants. Brothers, uncles and cousins etc that may not reproduce, may care for related kin (which was even more the case in our historical and prehistoric past). Male teachers may educate children that are completely unrelated to them. Men running our basic infrastructure and utilities provide essential services that ensure related kin and non-relatives get electricity, food, water, shelter and basic provisions. Men running our military and emergency services, protect and care for relatives and non-relatives. Men inventing, designing, constructing and maintaining our technology, infrastructure and buildings, ensure our economies continue to churn and their innovation ensures the prosperity of our societies. All of what I am describing either directly or indirectly increases the survival and reproductive prospects of relatives of these men and non-relatives that they share genes with. The list goes on and on. These examples are just a small sample of the alternative activities to reproduction, that can contribute to the evolutionary success or total fitness of individual men and allow men that do not reproduce to pass on their genes indirectly through other individuals.

The cooperation between men to ensure the continued existence of civilisation, has been going on for thousands of years and extends all the way back before civilisation to our primitive hunter-gatherer communities. These cooperative efforts between men, increase the number of copies of their genome and genes they leave behind. A man may do hundreds of activities in his lifetime which allow other activities to occur, which then either helps his own offspring survive, or his relative's offspring, or the offspring of people genetically similar to him. A man who does not reproduce but drives a train carrying food to a local city or maintains the electrical grid, is indirectly contributing to the continuation of his own genes by ensuring his brothers, sisters, nieces or nephews or genetically similar people in that city, survive and reproduce. A male teacher that teaches unrelated children, may educate pupils that go on to improve the prospects of his relatives or individuals that share genetic similarity to him.

The cooperative efforts between men, can also lead to social rewards that enhance their evolutionary success. Cooperation between unrelated men, can enhance the evolutionary success of both of them. This can even apply where one of them does not reproduce. If such cooperation leads to the man raising the social standing of his family in the eyes of the men he assisted, then this may benefit the prospects of his family in the long term and increase the number of copies of his genes that are passed on through other members of his family to the next generation.

Cooperation, altruism and alloparental care are ubiquitous in our species, because evolutionary success is not solely guaranteed by individual reproduction and is substantially dependent on other activities related to survival that often require coordinated social activity. Such social activity very often involves males working together. The dark triad of human nature exists, but so do the better parts of our nature. It was the mass organised cooperative efforts between men, combined with an organised and rule-based (or honour based) form of competition, that enabled civilisation to emerge and harness male value. The notion that natural selection favours survival of the fittest in a dog eat dog world, is an oversimplification of evolution.

Whilst that raw side of our nature exists, human social behaviour is not solely governed by individual evolutionary success and individuals competing against each other. There would be far more violence and no civilisation to speak of, if human males demonstrated little cooperation and had the same level of competition and aggression as male chimpanzees. The same can also be said about there being far more violence and no civilisation, if human males were truly biologically disposable. Civilisation requires sufficient numbers of men in good mental and physical health to support it and to peacefully work together. This in turn requires society to value the worth of men and not treat them as disposable. Male disposability leads to violence, war and in the long term destroys the male value civilisation requires to sustain itself.

Men Are Not Solely Driven To Reproduce

It would be incorrect to assume that men failing to reproduce means they demonstrate no evolutionary success and have no biological value. As discussed, such men can indirectly leave copies of their genes behind through their efforts to contribute to the survival of the community. There has always been a cohort of men in history and prehistory that never reproduced and had no interest in doing so. They used to be called confirmed bachelors. Men choosing not to marry and have children is not a new phenomenon, it has just markedly increased in recent years with the social changes of rampant gynocentrism and feminism.

The simple fact is that if the hypothesis of men filtering themselves out of the gene pool by failing to reproduce was correct, then the significant and growing cohort of men that are choosing to avoid marriage and children would not exist and would never have arisen in the first place. Male lifestyles of any kind that do not lead to having children (religious clergy, confirmed bachelors and many MGTOW) and any deviation from heterosexuality would not exist, if this hypothesis were correct. This is because the hypothesis depends on the assumption that the only way to pass on your genes is to reproduce and consequently that then means that any predisposition to not reproduce, would have absolutely no chance of passing on to the next generation. Consequently after enough time, only males that desire to sexually reproduce with females would remain in the species.

The reality is that childless or celibate and homosexual men that do not desire heterosexual relationships do exist and have done throughout history. Why? The genes of those men were passed down through other relatives or genetically similar individuals. Take religion as an illustrative example. Dr. Brett Weinstein in a discussion[36] with Dr. Richard Dawkins pointed out that whilst clergy may not have reproduced, their contribution to their religion may have indirectly furthered their genes. In actively promoting their religion, they may have encouraged behaviours and practices that could have enhanced the evolutionary success of their relatives and individuals within their communities, that they shared genetic similarity with.

We can go through a long list of famous men like Wilbur Wright, Nikola Tesla and Isaac Newton that never married and never reproduced, but made massive contributions to society that led to technological changes that enabled the population size to mushroom from one billion to seven billion in just a few centuries. There are plenty of unknown men that never reproduced that helped build and maintain all of our roads, canals, railways, airplanes, ships, numerous pieces of infrastructure and buildings we all use on a daily basis. There are unknown men that never reproduce, that farm the land and transport our food to supermarkets. Civilisation relies on a massive coordinated effort of male activity to support the current population size and therefore support evolutionary success. This supportive buttressing effect of coordinated male activity on evolutionary success, was also true for our prehistory before civilisation. Reproduction is not the only contributor to evolutionary success.

Whilst the exact numbers of men relative to women that reproduced in our prehistory is a matter of debate, it is generally accepted that there has always been a cohort of men that never reproduced. There has always been an environment where men needed to find another way to live, pass on their genes and contribute to the community, that did not necessarily involve reproduction. There has been a selective pressure on men to develop an alternative pathway to propagating their genes, when reproductive opportunities are limited.

Much has been said about the strong sexual appetite of men in popular culture (the sex drive of men has been exaggerated), which has been generalised to represent the libido of all men. However there is next to no recognition made about the substantial numbers of men that find fulfilment beyond chasing vagina and whom silently immerse themselves in other pursuits. There are men that spend most of their waking hours in a lab doing experiments, or designing a new device, or doing programming, or building a legal case, or running a company, or working in finance maximising their portfolio returns, or building something in their garage. For these men chasing vagina is often a distraction they have very little interest in. They are married to their interests, hobbies and careers. Some men are wired that way. On occasion such men through the achievements they derive from their single-minded focus on such pursuits, may rise in social status, be instead chased by women and sexually reproduce.

Regardless as to whether they end up reproducing or not, it is my view that the cohort of single men finding an alternative pathway in life beyond mating and reproduction, has been a significant factor that has led to the development of our culture as a species. I believe it has also been a significant factor in much of the exploration, invention, research and discovery that led to the emergence of civilisation. I am not the first person to suspect this either. Nikola Tesla said, “I do not think you can name many great inventions that have been made by married men”[37].When Wilbur Wright was developing the airplane he said, “I don’t have time for both a wife and an airplane”[38].

I am certainly not suggesting married men or men that have partners, cannot invent and I do not believe Tesla was absolutely correct in the assertion that not many inventions were made by married men. However there is some underlying truth to the remarks of these famous inventors. It is a fact that single men are freer to focus on and undertake certain activities than other men, particularly those pursuits that require large amounts of time and require geographical mobility. Men focused on their intellectual, economic, political, artistic and athletic pursuits and that prioritise them over pursuing relationships with women, will generally spend more time on those pursuits and achieve more. These greater achievements can positively affect the survival and reproduction of their community and indirectly increase their own individual evolutionary success (through benefitting related kin and genetically similar individuals) and that of others.

It is also worth pointing out that when men find alternatives to reproduction, intrasexual male competition drops and so does the level of violence in a community when mating opportunities are scarce. This carries benefits to evolutionary success through ensuring a safer environment to raise offspring and more male cooperation. The greater male cooperation leads to greater provision and protection for the community.

There are numerous examples of men that despite being heterosexual, are immersed in other pursuits and for which relationships are a low or non-existent priority. There is likely a neurological and genetic basis to this alternative pathway in life for men, given how lopsided mating prospects may have been in the past and the evolutionary benefits that can be derived from men pursuing activities beyond reproduction. Barbarosaaa had a few things to say in this video[39] on the notion of MGTOW being "inherently" unsustainable and that reproduction is all that counts. Yes a society must reproduce to replace itself, but reproduction means little without the prosperity to support the progeny. Furthermore, once society is past a certain threshold, prosperity for a population matters more to evolutionary success than reproduction (As Barbarosaaa's video discusses).

Single men can contribute to their evolutionary success in ways that can compensate for not reproducing, by contributing to the betterment of their community. The contribution of these men may be incremental across multiple generations in some cases. For some men their legacy on the survival and reproductive prospects of society may be felt in the second, third and fourth generations of their relatives and unrelated but genetically similar individuals. This may lead to a large increase in evolutionary success over the longer term. The impact certain influential men can have on our culture and the downstream effects that can have on evolutionary success, can be profound. Think of all the philosophers, scientists, inventors, soldiers, legal scholars and leaders etc that left no offspring, but improved their cultures and society and enhanced the future survival and reproductive prospects of dozens of generations.

The Value Of Human Life Is Greater Than The Sum Of Its Parts

When we consider males that do not reproduce, we are not considering their evolutionary success in totality if we just look at their lack of reproduction. With that said, it is a reality that men do dominate the extremes of the bell curve when it comes to evolutionary success and biological value. Men and women have equal evolutionary success and biological value overall, but men are over-represented in the highest and lowest values of the distribution. That does not mean that men who have little evolutionary success are less valuable as human beings, or that men with the highest level of evolutionary success are more valuable than everyone else.

The mentally disabled and the elderly are not regarded as less valuable human beings because they have less potential evolutionary success than the general population. We correctly recognise that the value of human life transcends biological value. Why? Civilisation requires that we respect the value of human life, regardless of the inherent characteristics of that life. This is an essential part of our culture, because it allows us to cooperate and be civil and fair with each other. Reducing the value of human life down to biological value, is a very destructive way of regressing civilisation to violent and barbaric tribalism. There are numerous historical examples of science being used to argue certain groups are subhuman or inferior to justify extermination, sterilisation and the use of eugenics.

Civilised societies that regard the value human life as sacrosanct, tend to be safer and more prosperous. Consequently, they generally do better in passing on their genes than primitive tribal shitholes. Of course all of this basic logic and fact is completely lost on those that want to wilfully ignore the value of men and promote gynocentric double standards based on a narrative that having a uterus makes you a more valuable human being. The value of human life whether it is male or female, is greater than its biological value. The inherent value of all human life must be regarded as equal and not be ranked based on the sex or race etc of the individual. Anything less than that leads to tribalism, social dysfunction, dehumanisation, exploitation and violence. Given enough time any form of implied or overt sexual superiority, leads to mounting social and economic consequences that eventually destroys civilisation.

In part two of this article I will be debunking further sophist arguments that men are biologically less valuable than women and are biologically disposable.

How I cured domestic violence

Gnome De Plumage · 18 June 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Here is one man's story of how he took personal responsibility for anger management and domestic violence in his own life. It can serve as road map for Everyman, and a pathway to personal responsibility.

The mainstream media across the world seems hell bent on convincing us of the rising Tsunami of male on female sexual violence as it misnames and misgenders intimate partner violence, harrassment, intimidation and sundry unsavoury practices.

This blatant and pervasive propaganda simply isn't reflected in the research.

While perusing An Overview of 2010 Findings on Victimization by Sexual Orientation, NISVS, I found this on page 1.

"Sexual minority respondents reported levels of intimate partner violence at rates equal to or higher than those of heterosexuals.
• Forty-four percent of lesbian women, 61% of bisexual women, and 35% of heterosexual women experienced rape, physical violence, and/or stalking by an intimate partner in their lifetime.
• Twenty-six percent of gay men, 37% of bisexual men, and 29% of heterosexual men experienced rape, physical violence, and/or stalking by an intimate partner at some point in their lifetime.
• Approximately 1 in 5 bisexual women (22%) and nearly 1 in 10 heterosexual women (9%) have been raped by an intimate partner in their lifetime."

This clearly spells out the accuracy of a narrative circulating within Men's Rights writing for years now:

N.B. The single strongest predictor of interpersonal friction to any degree within a relationship, is the presence of a woman in that relationship.

One is bad, two is worse.

So I decided to take the world of feminism at face value and accept the challenge that, as a man, the ending of violence in my home was entirely on me. A burden that I must shoulder alone, without her help. A unilateral effort to end all anger and aggression, micro or macro.

This decision led me to doing my own experiment on how to reduce to zero the prevalence of all anger, abuse, intimidation, threats and violence in the domestic situation.

I have cured Domestic Violence in my house.
I simply made it a female free space.

There are no women in my home.

Oddly, there is no stress now either.
Isn't that weird?

No anger.
No yelling.

No arguing, tears, temper tantrums, dirty looks, cold silences, evil glares, surly seething, bewildering complaints, predictable nagging, or pointless criticism.
No sexual or emotional withholding.
No interpersonal friction what so ever.

I can't remember the last psychotic outburst I saw.

The complete absence of PMS rises in the east every morning and sets in the west in the evening.

No make up in the bathroom.
No plug monster.
No clothes all over the floor or hanging over the shower.
All my shit is right where I left it.
So is the toilet seat.

What's a Honey Do list?
The boat plans stay on the dining room table until I move them.

Nothing of mine is in the bin that I didn't put there.

My money stays in the bank unless I withdraw it.
That's novel.
I pay for me.
Financially parasite free.
A tick free zone.

I hog the doona, the sheets, the pillows, the whole damn bed.

It's like the entire house is now the regional seat of reason and logic.

Nothing happens in this house that doesn't make sense to me.
Even the irrational outbreak of world peace and quiet at my place.

Nobody throws idiot arguments at me, ever.
I don't get randomly humiliated in public or private any more.
What's up with that?

I never have to defend myself for no apparent reason.
Not so much as an honest misunderstanding.
Nothing ever gets rehashed from 1986.
Seems I don't have a record any more.
I'm never guilty just because penis.
I don't do probation.
I don't get accused of shit.
Haven't been falsely accused all morning.
Now that's a big one.

You'd think the amount of worrying I just don't do any more would be worrying.

No amount of cold fat arse and ungrateful resentment or out of control psychosis and well founded insecurities is worth giving that up for.

There is no reason a man ever need suffer DV again when it is so easily corrected.

You want some poon?
Or more correctly, does she want the Dick and you feel like putting out?
Go back to her house.

My home is my castle.

PS
Not paying cold cash for sex seems to make many women feel entitled to your sperm and money.
Caveat emptor
Baby rabies is a thing.
Wear a condom, one you brought and she has had no chance to poke a hole in.
Dispose of it very carefully.

Bring a resealable plastic bag and take it home.
[image]
And if she rages out at you for it, if she calls the police, accusing you of violence, remember, you volunteered.

PPS
No women or children were harmed in this experiment.

Work longer, die younger: Higher pension ages and earlier death for men

BlueOrange22 · 21 June 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: The following article was originally published on www.menarehuman.com

In many countries around the world, the state retirement age is higher for men; as a result, men often only live to see half the years of retirement women do. One of the major male discriminations around the world is the issue of higher pension ages- in many countries, the state pension age where a person can retire and collect a government pension is higher for men.

This is of course despite the fact that men have shorter life expectancies in nearly every country in the world. As a result, men often have only half the years in retirement to enjoy. I've selected a few countries to highlight this difference, bit of course there are many more. I can imagine that if the genders were reversed, it would be considered a gender inequality and social issue, but since men are the ones adversely affected, it's ignored.

AUSTRIA

- Male life expectancy: 79
- Male pension age: 65
- Years in retirement: 14

- Female life expectancy: 83.9
- Female pension age: 60
- Years in retirement: 23.9

Difference in retirement years: 9.9

So in Austria, women enjoy nearly 10 years longer in retirement. Once again, a country considered very gender-equal and pro-feminist is an example of a country with active male discrimination.

Poland

- Male life expectancy: 73.6
- Male pension age: 65.58
- Years in retirement: 8.02

- Female life expectancy: 81.3
- Female pension age: 60.58
- Years in retirement: 20.72

Difference in retirement years: 12.7

In Poland, women have more than double the years in retirement, more than 250% longer.

Croatia

- Male life expectancy: 74.7

- Male pension age: 65
- Years in retirement: 9.7

- Female life expectancy: 81.2
- Female pension age: 61.75
- Years in retirement: 19.45

Difference in retirement years: 9.75

An almost 10 year gap in Crotia, where women enjoy a little more than double the years in retirement, enjoying just under 20 to men's just under 10.

CUBA

- Male life expectancy: 76.9
- Male pension age: 65
- Years in retirement: 11.9

- Female life expectancy: 81.4
- Female pension age: 60
- Years in retirement: 21.4

Difference in retirement years: 9.5

An almost 10 year difference, women enjoy nearly double the time in retirement in Cuba.

Vietnam

- Male life expectancy: 71.21
- Male pension age: 60
- Years in retirement: 11.21

- Female life expectancy: 80.58
- Female pension age: 60
- Years in retirement: 20.58

Difference in retirement years: 9.37

Another example of an almost 10 year difference, where men enjoy only about half of the time in retirement.

Venezuela

- Male life expectancy: 70.37
- Male pension age: 60
- Years in retirement: 10.37

- Female life expectancy: 78.61
- Female pension age: 55
- Years in retirement: 23.61

Difference in retirement years: 23.24

More than double the years in retirement. 23 years and 10 years are two completely different retirements.

Chile

- Male life expectancy: 76.71
- Male pension age: 65
- Years in retirement: 11.71

- Female life expectancy: 81.74
- Female pension age: 60
- Years in retirement: 21.74

Difference in retirement years: 10.03

Another example of an entire decade difference.

In addition to age qualifications, many countries have a "years worked" rule for eligibility, where a person must work for a certain number of years to qualify.

This difference often leads to older men being homeless and on the streets. In the UK for example, men must work for 44 years, compared to 39 years for women. Here's the government website. Note the chart on "qualifying years", I made a screenshot here. So, imagine a man turns 65, but faced a few years of unemployment. Maybe he was injured or disabled, and is now too old to work, but doesn't have the 44 years…say he only has 42. That 42 would be enough if he was a woman, but as a man, he wouldn't qualify. This situation has lead to numerous elderly men on the streets of the UK. It's a blatant legal double standard and discrimination. It's interesting to note that feminists in the UK protested against equal pension ages, claiming that it would be in inequality.

The list goes on and on in every continent, as you can see from the retirement age map, many countries have higher pension ages for men. This trend is something that goes pretty much entirely ignored. I can't help but think that if the genders were reversed, it would be considered a massive social issue, and cited as an example of male privilege. To me, this is a pretty major disparity and a pretty major difference in one's life.

Consider that on top of higher pension ages, many of these countries also practice male only conscription, where men must join the military or perform civil service for less than minimum wage for a set period, usually 1-3 years.

Mark Field MP should have been applauded by profeminist Theresa May, not suspended by her

Mike Buchanan · 22 June 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Mark Field MP, a junior minister in the Foreigh Office, ejected a female climate change protester, from Greenpeace, who'd trespassed into a room in the Mansion House while the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Philip Hammond, was giving a speech. Video here (2:03). Sadly, Field apologized – a rookie mistake – and was suspended as a minister by Theresa May for… well… ejecting a hostile and potentially life-threatening woman from the room, it would seem.

Mark Field's actions were wholly justified and proportionate. The woman could have been armed, or otherwise posed a serious threat to the Chancellor and others, for all he knew. The lack of security at the event was shocking. The five highest-rated comments on the video, on the YouTube channel of The Sun:

> Well… a Secretary of State able to do the job of a security agent? He deserves some applause.
> Well done sir and a minimum of fuss getting her out.
> Uninvited woman being ejected and treated the same as a man. That's equality for you. ⍰⍰
>
> Well done Mark, name any TV studio or news paper that wouldn't have forcefully removed from their building if you didn't have a security pass and persisted to gate crash an event.
> Well done Mr Field, he should be promoted not suspended.

A piece in The Times:

> Theresa May has suspended a Tory minister who was filmed manhandling a woman climate change protester.
> Downing Street said that the prime minister found the footage "very concerning" and that Mark Field, a junior minister in the Foreign Office, had been asked to step down immediately.
> Mr Field, who is a close ally of Jeremy Hunt, was already facing an investigation by the Conservative Party over his strong-arming of a peaceful activist at the annual Bankers and Merchants Dinner.
> City of London police said that they had received a "small number of third party reports of an assault taking place at the event" and that they were looking into the matter.
> In a statement to ITV, Mr Field said that he had referred himself to the Cabinet Office for investigation, that he "deeply" regretted the incident and that he apologised "unreservedly" to the protester.
> "In the confusion many guests understandably felt threatened and when one protester rushed past me towards the top table I instinctively reacted," he said. "There was no security present and I was for a split-second genuinely worried she might have been armed. As a result I grasped the intruder firmly in order to remove her from the room as swiftly as possible."
> Philip Hammond had just begun to speak when the Greenpeace protesters, wearing suffragette-style sashes reading "climate emergency", surrounded the podium, took the microphone and told the audience that "business as usual is no longer an option". They were swiftly ushered out and the chancellor carried on with his speech.
> Hannah Martin, one of the protesters, told BBC Radio 4's Today programme that "we were peacefully protesting" and "none of the other guests felt the need to assault anyone". She condemned Mr Field's actions as "disproportionate and unacceptable".
> Brandon Lewis, the Conservative Party chairman, said that there would be an investigation into Mr Field's actions. He told ITV's Good Morning Britain that he could understand why people would be concerned" but he > stressed the need for a full inquiry.

> Alistair Burt, an MP who has previously served at the Foreign Office, said: “It looks to be a very difficult situation for everyone concerned.”
> Paul Brand, a political correspondent for ITV News, tweeted: “You can see the woman apparently posing no immediate threat as she passes behind Mark Field. He marches her out of the room by her neck. I wasn’t there, so I can’t say she didn’t pose a risk, but it looks heavy handed.”
> Sir Peter Bottomley, the Conservative MP, said that Mr Field “deserves to be congratulated” for his actions. “Mark Field did the same as anyone would have done if someone came uninvited into a broadcast studio.”
> George Freeman, another Tory MP, tweeted: “This looks appallingly rough handling of a woman climate protester in a dress. But before everyone rushes to instant armchair judgment can I suggest that all of us who weren’t there & don’t know what was said or done just wait a few hours to hear what those who were there say.”
>
> However, the Labour MP Jess Phillips tweeted: “She posed no credible threat from what I can see. There is very little else that could justify this and anyone can see that this could have been done without physical contact. [J4MB: How? What a stupid woman.] Every MP has to deal with protest and conflict, it is done with words. To watch this is so so awful.” [J4MB emphasis]
> Others pointed out that Mr Field had previously spoken out about supporting Sri Lankan police on combating gender-based violence. Last month he wrote on Twitter after a debate on Women Human Rights Defenders: “The UK remains committed to helping women all over the world to feel safe and protected in the work they do.”
> It emerged that in April Mr Field sent a letter to the Metropolitan police demanding “a much firmer grip” on climate change protesters after the Extinction Rebellion protests.
> Greenpeace UK said: “We were shocked at the footage of an elected MP and government minister assaulting one of our peaceful protesters at the Mansion House tonight.”

Let’s enable Jon Baily to attend ICMI19, Chicago

Mike Buchanan · 22 June 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Jon Bailey, along with his 16-year-old son, attended the talks by Elizabeth Hobson and myself at Cambridge University recently. Blog pieces and videos relating to those talks here.

After the talks, Jon and his son passed by a number of the protesters. Jon had a liquid thrown over him, and both he and his son were assaulted by the protesters. Jon estimated that one of the men who assaulted his son was 6’4” tall.

The Tab, a student newspaper, posted a two second long video clip purporting to portray Jon as violent, while in fact he was instinctively reacting to the woman who’d thrown liquid over him. For all he knew, the liquid could have been acid. There’s an excellent account of the incident in a video on the website of The Glass Blind Spot. It includes the audio recording of the incident, and the time before and after, taken by Jon (he’d forgotten to switch the device off after the talks).

Jon recently gave a detailed account of the matter on Honey Badger Radio (audio, 57:15). Skip to 1:24, before that the host, Brian Martinez, is sorting out technical issues.

It would have been easy for Jon to maintain a low profile after he and his son were assaulted. Predictably, the police declined to arrest the group of protesters containing the assailants, and are taking no action.

But Jon is clearly made of the right stuff, and agreed to be named, and to speak publicly about what really happened to him and his son that day. He has said (in his Honey Badger Radio interview) that the incidents that day incline him to become more active with respect to men’s rights.

We think Jon deserves some recognition for what he’s been through, and what he’s done subsequently, so we appeal to you to contribute to this fundraiser, to fund Jon’s attendance at the next International Conference on Men’s Issues, in Chicago, in eight weeks’ time. The organizers have generously offered a heavily discounted ticket.

Please donate what you can. On behalf of Jon, his son, and myself, thank you.

Double standards, hypocrisy and misandry of psychologists

Gnome De Plumage · 28 June 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Read another unrepentant Psychology Yesterday piece recently entitled 'Sex Robots and the End of Civilization.' I suggest you read the article too. That way the following will make more sense.

In this article the author does the usual routine of ignoring female sex-toy use and foists responsibility on to men to have 'real' relationships with women.

As opposed to preferring a sex robot.

Speaking of superstimuli, without a hint of irony, the article is an example of exploiting the male impulse to protect the neotony of women, an impulse rubbed raw by the masturbatory and ungrateful feminism of the modern psychologist.

We see more of the same superstimuli by example of feminism slutting around under the sheets of chivalry, accompanied by the same unaccounted irony.

Am I the only one having a problem with feminists playing damsel to men in order to garner service? While claiming to be a feminist? Or with the men all too happy to be service animals?

What ever happened to those strong, independent women, don't need no man?

You just keep wheeling out the double standards shit you call psychology.

The unsubtle gendering of female dolls and male users.
Ignoring that women have been shoving what ever they can find, or what ever gets manufactured, up their sexual fantasy, since the cucumber was domesticated.
Is that called sexual empowerment?
How many men have a draw full of toys in the bedside?

Psychology never bothers itself with the problem of women expecting men to be hung like a horse.
In the age of #metoo, it doesn't disturb itself with the shocking frequency of the female rape fantasy, the prevalence of amoral women using false accusations, of women truly being unable to distinguish between fantasy and actual rape, or why women feel so entitled to the traditional, gynocentric, slave / master relationship called romantic love.

How about the shocking parallels between Whites Only and Women Only signs?
Nothing to say about anti-discrimination laws that are routinely ignored when the blatant and publicly demanded discrimination is in favour of women?

[image]
The dripping, unethical, double standards of feminist psychologists.

On the subject of sex dolls and robots, when the genders get reversed, the tone changes from "Haha, men will be replaced by robots forever," to "We need to discuss the harmful effects and the danger to women from these robots that men are using."

Could you be more obvious?

The fly in that particular ointment for women is, robots don't have a job, don't earn a wage, don't pay for the first date, they don't have a credit card, don't have sperm and don't pay child support.

They cost money.
Just like a woman.
Talk about your turn off, couch potato!

The male equation is far simpler.

Firstly, she comes with an off switch.
Mercy!

(Psychologists, if any had an ounce of ethics, would be pouring millions into the sickening issue of female abuse and violence. Against men, women and CHILDREN!!!!)

Robots don't divorce you or make false accusations. They don't mind if you see other robots, they don't interrupt the game and unlike women, may one day actually learn to take the garbage out her own damn self.

She never gets PMS, ever,… rings her mother, hits you, bangs your best mate, alienates you from your mates, goes chick batty, calls the cops, tells you it's your child really…..

And now you're telling me, for a one time payment, she isn't going to just lie there in bed?

Like she died?

Not only is she going to move, she learns what I like?

She LEARNS?

And I get all this whenever I want it!!

What?
For the whole 30 years I was married, I could have actually been having sex more than 6 times a year?

[image]
So glad I'm over it.

Here's a fun new field for you all shrinks to get into, if you really want to fight the end of civilization.

Rather than foisting ever more responsibility on to men for women's wishes, wants, whims and unattainable happiness, try introducing to women the concepts of responsibility, respect, honesty, humility and single standards for all.

You know, principles.

Not just as weaponized words to beat men with, in an insane march of entitled demands, but as personal standards for women to live their lives by.

Like adults.

Holding women accountable, just like men.

Lord forbid, a woman actually attempts to earn a man's respect.
As opposed to make-up, a tight push up dress and demanding respect because……..?
Remind me.

That is if these precious human relationships you shrinks are so concerned about really means more to you than the simple commoditization of masculinity.

Or are men no more than disposable utilities to women?
The things of women?
Human doings without the rights of human beings?
A real man?
Is masculinity itself to be defined simply by service to women?
Money and sperm?
The traditional gynocentric master / slave relationship?

Nobody is coming back for that.

What should be shocking everybody isn't that men would prefer a sex robot to a woman but that women, as a class, can be so easily out competed by a sex bot and a dog for a companion!

Because when it comes to loyalty and companionship, man's best friend wins hands down.

Why aren't shrinks talking about why women can't bring anything to the table apart from ungrateful, resentful, stingy, lifeless sex?
And misery?
Irrational, manipulative, domineering misery.

La Miserables.

Psychology's talk-therapy needs a revival, and this time its the psychologist who needs to learn how to open up, become vulnerable beyond his/her feminist-inspired defenses, and engage in authentic discussion on the subject of men's experiences.

Elizabeth Hobson: Consenting Sex is Not a Crime

Mike Buchanan · 28 June 2019 · Archived copy · Original

In 2014, four years before she joined Justice for Men & Boys as our Director of Communications, Elizabeth Hobson published the following:

John Setka is a very bad man

Mark Dent · 29 June 2019 · Archived copy · Original

An alien or even a human being who has never been exposed to life in a feminist country ruled by the social media mob would be deeply confused by a story which recently dominated our news cycle here in Victoria.

John Setka, a bull of a man and longtime leader of a controversial and confrontational union, the CFMEU (Construction, Forestry, Mining and Energy Union) had to appear in court for sending a series of "misogynistic" texts to his wife, Emma Walters.

Magistrate Belinda Wallington said:

> "The misogynist language is what's causing me concern," she said.
> "I'm not dealing with acts of horrendous violence. But it's still nasty behaviour."

Now why was John Setka sending abusive texts to his wife?

Well, Emma Walters had a serious drinking problem and decided to go for a drive to another state with her kids. When the police pulled her over, they discovered she had a blood alcohol reading five times above the legal limit- .282!

There were already tensions in the relationship and Walters, (who has now reconciled with her husband and appeared by his side in court), admitted that she too had written abusive texts to her husband. However, it was John who was reported to the police by his wife because he had the temerity to use forbidden words like c### and bitch in his tirades.

Emma simply chose to drive hundreds of kilometres while intoxicated and with her children in the car!

But apparently it was the words referring to her deceased father which hurt the most.

"Your dad would be so proud of you, you turned into a drunken moron … you weak f—n piece of s—," Setka had messaged her.

"Words are incredibly destructive as they stay with you," Ms. Walters said.

I think Mr. Setka's assessment of the situation was harsh but accurate.

As for words being incredibly destructive, no doubt this is true. However, I think your child's skull smashing through the front windscreen of your car at 100kph would be even more destructive.

Like so many women before her, Emma is the victim. The drinking problem was her husband's fault.

"I was drinking too much to try and escape everything. Then I went, 'I can't do this any longer', and that I'm not going insane. This is wrong and it has to stop."

She has since admitted herself into a detox program.

However, she was adamant, despite going to police in December and Setka being charged with assault and recklessly causing injury (both later withdrawn), that he had never physically assaulted her.

So, she lied about being assaulted.

"There has been so much myth around this, that people had the perception that John was beating me up every night — this is not the case," she said. "Yes, there were arguments, yes, they were very heated."

It is astonishing to know that Emma's texts were also abusive yet not one word from them was published or presented in the media. That would have demonstrated how this was not a case of a misogynistic monster abusing his cowering wife, but a hot-blooded give and take between two people who both agreed they were under great strain and in a very dark place.

Despite standing by her husband's side outside the court, Emma Walters couldn't help taking on the role of the forgiving, compassionate woman, willing to give her husband a second chance.

To critics who can't understand why she has returned to Setka, she said:

"I completely reject the characterisation of myself as the victim going back for more. I wouldn't have gone back to this relationship if I didn't think John could change."

You see — it is John who needs to change his behavior even though Emma went to detox and is struggling with an alcohol problem and happily drove her children interstate while drunk.

Rosie Batty, champion of Duluth DV hysteria
Poor Mr. Setka has been featuring in our news for another reason in recent weeks. Silly John had the effrontery to allegedly speak critically about Duluth DV model campaigner Rosie Batty in a private conversation.

Imagine.

There were calls for him to step down from his position (as leader of the union) and be ejected from the party after reports he told colleagues anti-family violence campaigner Rosie Batty's advocacy had led to men having fewer rights.

Sinner! Outcast! For shame. Stone the blasphemer!

Some said his alleged comments were in reference to how difficult it is for dads to get access to their kids after a separation. There was no hint of any denigrating or hateful language, yet the media seemed to think just the very suggestion that anyone (but especially a man) would dare to criticize Rosie Batty would be more than enough reason to see him out of a job and jeered from any public space.

John Setka denied he said anything about Batty and other witnesses have since backed him up. But the furor over his alleged comments was something to behold. Many powerful people demanded his resignation. Even Batty was asked to comment on his alleged transgression.

Batty said:

> "Clearly, it's ludicrous and I think it's an example of somebody whose leadership role really needs to be challenged, because it's not a reflection that's appropriate.
> I'm quite astonished with those comments. Rather than feel, you know, men have less rights, we have so much more to gain by recognizing that moving forward we are moving to a place of equality."

Federal Labor leader Anthony Albanese said on Sunday if the comments reported by The Age were correct, they were "totally unacceptable".

"I'm on Rosie Batty's side. She's a great Australian. She deserves the respect and thanks of every Australian and deserves better than to be criticised by anyone in our community," Hooray!

ACTU secretary Sally McManus said:

'If the comments attributed to Setka are correct, they were, appalling and totally unacceptable!"

Many more public figures joined in the attack in an effort to signal just how much they care about Rosie and the welfare of women.

To this day, I do not think there is a person in our country who causes me more consternation than the untouchable

Ms. Batty.

Rosie was astonished by the notion that she could have in any way damaged men's rights.

Was it not you, Ms. Batty who said:

"What we want is effective programs for men to be given the opportunity to change their behaviour."

Wasn't it you, Ms. Batty, who was the driving force behind the annual candlelight vigil for female victims of domestic violence?

Wasn't it you and your fellow feminists who read the names of every woman and child lost to domestic violence in the past decade whilst entirely ignoring the more than one hundred and twenty male victims? You also failed to alert the crowd to the fact that many of the dead children were killed by women. A minor oversight in the scheme of things I'm sure.

Wasn't it you who said:

"It is important for the men in our society to own the issue, that this is a gender problem, this is a man's desire to treat those he loves or cares for as possessions."

Wasn't it you who said, when asked about violent women,

'The degree of terror a man exerts over his family is profoundly different. A woman is violent but I don't know how many men would be living in total fear of their life.

Tell that to the dozens of young kids slaughtered by their mums in our country. Tell that to the families of the men who have died or suffered ongoing emotional and physical abuse at the hands of a psychotic female partner.

Please watch the short clip linked. Listen to her explanation for her blinkered focus on only one group of the victims of family violence. Her justification is illogical and outrageous, yet no-one called her out.

This is the woman feted and fawned over by the Australian media and many people around our country. We set a low bar for celebrity sainthood in this country.

So, one journalist did dare to ask her about other victims and perpetrators albeit in a rather timid fashion. Why he didn't ask her about the eight kids hacked to death and whether the blade felt less painful as it tore the children's flesh due to the fact that a woman was wielding the knife.

This woman spoke these words with the very clear understanding that during her term as Australian of the Year the worst mass murder of children in Australia's history was committed by a woman.

Many more children have been murdered by their mothers in recent years as Batty continues to speak at public gatherings about the gendered nature of domestic violence. Just this past month another mother murdered her four children by deliberately driving her car into the path of an oncoming truck.

Did this mother not view her children as her possessions? This mother killed a man's four beloved kids as an act of spite and not one domestic violence advocate has uttered a word about it, least of all the bigoted Rosie Batty.

Batty's advocacy has indeed harmed men and boys. Unquestionably.

She has deliberately and very publicly insisted that family violence is a problem caused solely by men. This woman with the most powerful voice in the country on this issue has succeeded in having governments give hundreds of millions of dollars in funding to female victims of family violence and of course to the enormous industry which grows fat on the teat of this alleged epidemic.

She has made it almost impossible for any man to speak up about his abuse, for in Batty's world such an occurrence is as rare as a unicorn sighting. She has also condemned many children to enduring ongoing abuse at the hands of their mothers. Any dad who wished to report such abuse of his children or himself would immediately be placed under suspicion and considered to be an abuser under guidelines developed by the New South Wales government.

Bettina Arndt explains:

"In June 2016, the NSW government announced a pilot program for male victims of domestic violence. Finally, a government was acknowledging that men are also victims of domestic violence."

Men were promised 13 million dollars over four years. Chickenfeed compared to the hundreds of millions given to female victims by the Turnbull government, but a start.

"What a blow to discover in November that year that the NSW government had awarded the contract for this vital program to Men's Referral Service, an organization driven by feminist ideology and long known for shunning male victims. In the past, MRS was on the record for refusing to acknowledge the existence of male victims. The organization's position then shifted to arguing male victims don't experience abuse in the same way as women and hence don't deserve support.

MRS has only ever worked with male perpetrators and is notorious for "red-flagging" men who claim to be victims.

So, the fox was put in charge of the henhouse. Male victims who are notoriously reluctant to seek help, are to be put through a dubious screening process run by an organization with a long history of decrying their very existence.

Imagine the outcry if domestic violence services for women assumed most alleged victims were in fact perpetrators. The whole domestic violence movement is based on the premise that we "believe women", yet our first government funded program for men operates on the assumption that we shouldn't believe men." (#Mentoo, Betttina Arndt)

So back to Batty. This very night there was a story on a current affair program about the shocking rate of suicide of our servicemen and women. I have no problem with that. I care about every person driven to suicide by traumas they have experienced or witnessed. The ratio of male victims to female is literally around ten to one. No-one batted an eyelid when the two genders were given equal concern. This is as it should be and is the case in every problematic issue affecting our country bar one.

This all-encompassing empathy evaporates when we talk about family violence.

Batty drove the idea that only one kind of victim matters with relentless fervor in her time as Australian of the Year even though all reputable studies show one third of victims are male. Shame on her. She has severely damaged men's rights and deserves to be condemned for doing it.

At what stage would some brave journalist raise the question: Why would someone we call "inspiring and compassionate" show such a lack of compassion and empathy for one particular group of victims?

It is astonishing to think that Batty could experience the horror of losing her son and not feel deep empathy for every person unfortunate enough to have experienced the same devastation. It defies my understanding.

Ignorance is no excuse, for all journalists are fully aware of the many child murders committed by mums in our country not to mention the men who die at the hands of a female partner.

I wish John Setka had indeed spoken disparagingly about Batty's lack of compassion for men. It is nothing more than the truth. I wish too, that he had said,

"Sure I said it and this is why."

For too long, Rosie Batty has been regarded as a flawless, almost celestial being, untainted by human corruption and absolutely beyond criticism.

What a pathetic farce.

Someone needs to shatter this delusion.

ICMI 2019 Speaker Sponsor and Ticket Drive!

AVFM · 30 June 2019 · Archived copy · Original

From HBB: Support to make ICMI 2019 the biggest men's rights event of the year!

The idea behind ICMI 2019 was to open our very own men's rights convention to the larger Culture War and manosphere, bringing in guests from all corners of the current political debate around men. This move has attracted significant attention from media but it has also meant more costs!

Although now more than ever men and boys need advocacy to challenge toxic condemnation of maleness and masculinity, companies are adverse to taking a stand against the powerful interests pushing anti-male sentiments.

Therefore it's up to all of us to pull together and make sure that ICMI 2019 is a success! In the future what will you say you did to stop the rising tide of hatred directed towards men?

Family Justice Panel – the latest feminist corruption of the Ministry of Justice

Mike Buchanan · 1 July 2019 · Archived copy · Original

My thanks to Elizabeth Hobson for this press release, published recently by the Ministry of Justice. The full content:

> Panel members confirmed to steer call for evidence on how the family courts protect children and parents in cases of domestic abuse and other serious offences.
>
> On 21 May 2019 the Ministry of Justice (MOJ) announced a public call for evidence steered by a panel of key representatives from across family justice, to gather evidence on how the family courts protect children and parents in cases of domestic abuse and other serious offences.
> The inaugural panel meeting took place on Friday 14 June 2019, marking the start for the three-month call for evidence. The panel members represent key organisations from across family justice including the Judiciary, academia, social care, policy officials and third sector organisations which represent and advocate for victims of domestic abuse, (full details below).
> The call for evidence will specifically focus on the application of Practice Direction 12J, Practice Direction 3AA, The Family Procedure Rules Part 3A, and s.91(14) orders, and will build a more detailed understanding of any harm caused during or following proceedings in the family court.
> The panel members are:
>
> - Melissa Case & Nicola Hewer, Director of Family and Criminal Justice Policy, MOJ (Chair)
> - Professor Liz Trinder, University of Exeter
> - Professor Rosemary Hunter FAcSS, University of Kent
> - Professor Mandy Burton, University of Leicester
> - Mr Justice Stephen Cobb, Judiciary
> - District Judge Katherine Suh, Judiciary
> - Nicki Norman, Acting Co-Chief Executive, Women's Aid [J4MB emphasis]
> - Dierdre Fottrell QC & Lorraine Cavanagh QC (joint representatives), Association of Lawyers for Children
> - Isabelle Trowler, Chief Social Worker for England (Children & Families)
> The panel will also be supported by analysts, researchers and relevant policy officials from MOJ.

So 10 of the 11 members of the "expert panel" are women, one of them from Women's Aid. Welcome to family justice (2019).

I picked one of the women at random to investigate online – an Australian, Rosemary Hunter FacSS, Professor of Law at the University of Kent. Her expression in this photograph, from her web page, is presumably her response to a cheery male photographer saying, "Smile, darlin'!!!"

Professor Rosemary Hunter

Professor Hunter is perhaps better known as her alter ego, the transvestite artist Grayson Perry:

From her Wikipedia page:

> Hunter is also a feminist who has written books such as Indirect Discrimination in the Workplace. In this work she argued that many apparently neutral employer policies effectively disadvantage women and people from minority groups. For example, a height requirement for security guards would effectively exclude many women and Asians.

Using the same logic, an eyesight requirement for airline pilots would “effectively exclude” blind people, while a hearing requirement for music critics would “effectively exclude” deaf people. As a 100kg 61-year-old man, I am “effectively excluded” from the Olympics pole vault finals. Something must be done about these terrible injustices.

Ms Hunter’s university web page shows her to be a card-carrying radical feminist, and therefore – by definition – hostile to the nuclear family. The last person who should be on the Family Justice Panel.

And what of Mr Justice Stephen Cobb, the only man on the 10-person panel? This brings me to an excellent article from 2017 by Paul Apreda of FNF Both Parents Matter Cymru, Are the best interests of the child no longer paramount? Extracts:

> Stephen Cobb is a very senior Judge in the Family Court. He is a remarkable man. He recently proposed an effective end to the paramountcy principle – the overarching golden rule in family proceedings that the best interests of the child are paramount. But not content with demolishing the corner stone of the system, it looks as though he may believe the family courts can overrule the will of Parliament too…
> In paragraph 4 of his review Mr Justice Cobb tells us that he consulted with Women's Aid…oh and Rights of Women. He also mentions a number of feminist academics, including Professor Rosemary Hunter [J4MB: our emphasis] – who is currently the academic representative on the Family Justice Council – plus a few others, all of whom are likely to have argued from substantially the same position. Did he consider that perhaps Women's Aid and Rights of Women are not the best qualified to represent the perspective of male victims of abuse? Did he consult with anyone about the extent to which false and spurious allegations of abuse may be a characteristic of private law proceedings? We can but speculate. The issues around false allegations have been illustrated in an earlier post on Marilyn's blog here.

Regarding Men announces Sick-o-Therapist of the Month, Laura Brown, Ph.D.

AVFM · 3 July 2019 · Archived copy · Original

RegardingMen.com, founded by Paul Elam, Janice Fiamengo and Tom Golden has announced it will be issuing monthly recognition of mental health "professionals" who engage in unhealthy, destructive practices. These are practitioners who dupe and abuse individuals who seek them out for help, and who corrupt the education and training of future practitioners.

The following entry is the first in what will be known as the Sick-o-Therapist of the Month Award.

Dr. Laura Brown is a Ph.D. psychologist with impressive credentials and a CV that could easily earn her a seat on a United Nations panel on mental health. And, like many similar feminists, she is practicing a virulent, ideological hatred behind the pretense of mental health treatment.

Even a cursory glance at her online presence confirms all of this. On her web page, titled "Feminist Therapy" she, without compunction, defines and describes a brand of psychotherapy rooted in a political ideology that is hostile to men and boys and blind to anything but victimhood in women.

In one clunky, run-on sentence, clearly designed to impress the indoctrinated, she lays down the foundation.

> "I define feminist therapy as the practice of therapy informed by feminist political philosophies and analysis, grounded in multicultural feminist scholarship on the psychology of women, men and gender, which leads both therapist and client toward strategies and solutions advancing feminist resistance, transformation and social change in daily personal life, and in relationships with the social, emotional and political environments."

A decent editor could have chopped this down to a more sensible and honest version of the statement.

Laura Brown, sick-o-therapist
'I teach women to go to war against men, and men to go to war against themselves.'

"[F]eminist resistance," is the alarming tell in this patently unhealthy, destructive approach to human interaction. Rather than promoting sexual harmony, effective communication and well-boundaried cooperation between men and women, she focuses instead on manufacturing a brand of hostility that feeds on the assumption that all men are nefarious actors in the lives of women.

Nowhere in her lengthy definition of feminist therapy is the client even recognized as an individual, but rather is identified clearly as a pawn to be maneuvered by the therapist to further a political agenda. “Feminist practice,” she asserts, “derived from the realities that lie outside, beneath, and at variance from the visions of the dominant patriarchal mainstream.”

Perhaps one of the most abusive aspects to Brown’s approach is the stunning dismissal of the client’s needs regarding marriage and the family. Or, as she says of feminist therapy, “It is a theory that not only listens to, but privileges, the voices and experiences of those who have been defined as “other” by dominant cultures.”

In other words, all marriage and family therapy must be biased toward the view of the woman involved, privileging one voice (the woman’s) over the issues and concerns of others. Imagine the impact this brand of “therapy” has on the spouses and children of already abusive, personality disordered women. How much, do you imagine, does this kind of treatment assist women who direly need to face their own dysfunctional behavior?

There is another term in the field of psychology that describes this kind of therapy. Pathogenic, or, more literally, therapy that makes you sick.

It is for this reason that Regarding Men names Dr. Laura Brown as the Sick-o-Therapist of the Month for July of 2019. She is our first designee and will be joined in the days ahead by many other mental health “professionals” who have corrupted the honest, scholarly investigation of the human condition and replaced the effort to help people with the effort to indoctrinate and exploit them.

Shame on you, Dr. Brown.

Love is a fleeting emotion

Tim Patten · 5 July 2019 · Archived copy · Original

I, Gary Anderson, was thinking about my life 30 years ago. I was a young man, looking for truth, beauty and love. It seemed like I had been searching for a very long time.

Then I found Ellen. I first met her after graduation. I was 19 and she was a year younger. The moment we bumped into each other was like a movie scene. Our eyes met. My jaw dropped. Her shoulders relaxed. She smiled – I was mush – and our hearts pounded between us. It was love at first sight. I wanted her and she wanted me. Our moments together naked were like a fantasy.

I wanted to give her the world and make her happy, no matter what. So, we got married, her white dress swirling against the warm canvas of flowers, friends and love. Afterwards, I put my nose to the grindstone, working at a marketing company so she could go to college to train as a dental hygienist.

By the time she graduated two years later, my hard work had paid off, I had saved enough to make a down payment on a house, a place where we could be happy together. Soon, she wanted kids; I wanted to oblige. We had our first little girl, Cynthia less than 12 months later, and the second one, Carol two years after that.

Night after night, there would be a ritual, a byproduct of my childhood, when noises below meant the "furnace monster" was trying to get me. I would look under the girls' beds and inside their closets and say, "any boogeymen or monsters here who are after my girls better leave now. Get out! Or I'll take care of you!"

"Get them daddy!"

"Stay away from my Cynthia and Carol!"

"Thank you, Daddy!" they would coo and smile as I tucked them in. I would open up a book with a message about moral value and achieving dreams, and quietly read them the story until they were both asleep.

Living

Onetime, though, the routine was a little different. After a long day at work, I would need a night out with "the guys" – not often, maybe once a month. I wasn't trying to be difficult. It was hard to imagine that I was out of line.

But Ellen saw things differently. "The children are in bed, waiting for you to scare the boogeymen and tuck them in. Did you go out with your friends again?" She put hands on hips, face stern and sharp.

"Naturally." My palms were moist. I knew what was coming next, an argument I could never win. I turned towards her, barely hopeful that maybe things would be different this time.

Ellen pressed her face toward mine, mouth curled in disgust, "Are you kidding me?"

"No." I pulled back.

"You have to be fucking joking!"

"Not really. Quiet" I added softly, "don't let the kids hear."

"Gary, I don't like you spending time with 'the guys.' You know I don't approve."

The words stung. "I'm not trying to hurt you. I just wanted a little break, a moment of personal space for myself."

"And leave me alone with the children? Besides, how do I know what you're really doing?"

My knees were weak, lumbering under the weight of my responsibility for what she was feeling. "But I love you."

"No, you don't. How many women were with you tonight?"

"Are you jealous?"

"If you cared, you wouldn't go out with your damn friends again."

I stared at the floor. I knew there was nothing I could say. She won the argument.

Ellen screwed her face into angry creases. "I can't stand looking at you. You better sleep on the couch tonight."

Something snapped. I felt crushed down like a death camp survivor, covered with crawling parasites, hungry to feed. I stopped going out with co-workers and friends. After that, I only thought about keeping Ellen happy.

Cheating

Sadly, that was not the end of my troubles. It was the beginning of something worse – far worse.

Some years later, I left work early to buy Cynthia flowers for her birthday. I headed home, knowing she'd be back from school within an hour or so.

When I arrived, I heard rustling upstairs. "Hello?" I called out as I opened the bedroom door. I saw my wife lying there naked, arms and legs wrapped around another woman.

"What?" My heart dropped. I felt dazed, as if I was locked in a suffocating cell with no windows. My mind spun wildly as a violent jolt tore through my gut.

My wife's not a lesbian, or is she? I thought. Was I unable to meet her sexual needs all this time?

"Gary!" Ellen hushed.

"What's going on?" My mouth dropped, the muscles in my abdomen tightening with detestation.

"Um… I found a new lover? I should have told you earlier."

A prickling burning sensation washed over me, head to toe. "What about us?"

"I fell out of love with you a year ago."

"Is that how long you have been seeing … her?" I pointed a shaking finger.

"Yes, this is Yolanda."

"What the fuck! After 23 years, you found a new…" My teeth gritted hard and my jaw clamped down tight, like a vice. I felt ill.

"I'm sorry."

"Fuck sorry. I'm think I should divorce you!" I walked out, slamming doors and pushing over furniture. I slung the kitchen table against the wall, shattering cups and a sugar bowl. My arms suddenly felt limp, and I dropped the flowers. I was arguing and cursing, seemingly to no one. I gasped for air; my chest heaved in and out.

What was I to do?

Divorce

Later, I filed for divorce. Ellen and Yolanda took the girls to a women's shelter. I didn't know it at first, but Yolanda associated with powerful women. She also knew their actions would give Ellen special privileges when it came to the terms of any divorce, including custody of our children.

In the end, I lost out, once again. She took half of everything I had and kept our girls. And while I was responsible for paying child support, the courts ruled that I could only use Skype or Facebook to "visit" them – for one hour a week. I was not allowed to have any physical contact with my own flesh and blood.

Search for help

Eventually, I decided enough was enough. These were my children, too, and I sought information and support that could help me get justice – and spend the precious time with them that any father should.

But no matter what I tried or how much I spent, I failed. I fought in court for years and never had even one judgement in my favor. The odds were always against me. I couldn't prove it, of course, but it seemed was a feminist lesbian cabal behind the scenes stirring up endless hate toward me – and other men –that repeatedly bolstered my soon-to-be-ex-wife's claims.

Over time, I experience terrifying thoughts about myself and the future of anyone who might end up this way. I was tortured with sleeplessness and my health deteriorated. Darkness overshadowed anything I said or did. It took me years to understand that I was suffering from depression and suicidal ideation.

I saw myself locked in the Nazi death camp again, full of feces and human body odors and at night parasites feed off my flesh. In my struggle to survive I squashed each vermin, killing them one at a time until the putrid death stench makes me want to retch, or surrender to the inevitable. Then finally, I just ignore the parasites and lets them feed. I was starved for food and dreamed of eating my pet dog.

I contacted men's rights and divorced dads' websites. I went to a meeting organized by a group called DADS but discovered it was actually a feminist front, intent on convincing me I was the problem. I connected with Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) and discovered there were thousands in similarly sad circumstances.

Everywhere I looked, in fact, I saw others like me – faces pale and crumpled, looking away, trapped and downtrodden. Unfortunately, while some offered support, I still didn't have access to my girls. I thought of suicide as hope waned. I began seeing a therapist, who helped ease my pain but offered no advice that would help me be with my kids.

The truth comes out

Still, I carried on. Whether I could see them in person or not, I was determined to have my time with my two girls anyway I could.

One day, while I was speaking to them on a video call, Cynthia asked, "Why do you still have to pay child support while we live with two working women?"

She is so bright, I thought to myself. "The legal system demands it or else I'll be sent to jail."

"No!" Carol said with a cry.

"I'm afraid our system of 'justice' favors women over men."

"That is not fair, Daddy."

A lump formed in my throat. "No, it isn't. Unfortunately, society doesn't respect fathers much."

"But we respect and love you." My daughters said.

I lowered my head and my face screwed into a dry cry. I choked back hitches and gulps, not wanting to upset them. My lungs collapsed as the words I'd waited a lifetime to hear left me unable to breathe, let alone talk.

"Hello?" Cynthia said.

"I'm h—here." It felt as if a pile of sealed letters had been ripped open, all at once.

"You OK?" She asked.

I squeezed my eyes tight, tears ebbing from the corners. "I'm perfect."

"Say, Dad, do you remember how you used to frighten the boogeymen away from under our bed and closet?"

"Sure I do, honey."

"We loved that."

"So did I."

Cynthia added. “I sometimes think the boogeyman must be a woman.”

Changing the cultural narrative

Paul Elam · 7 July 2019 · Archived copy · Original

I am incredibly pleased to make the following announcement. A recent domestic violence study, focusing on reporting trends, was conducted by a group of scholars in Trinidad and Tobago.

Their conclusion was that men tend to vastly underreport being victims of domestic violence. They identified the root cause with one word. Gynocentrism.

I had the distinct pleasure to see my name attached to this conclusion in the references for how gynocentrism is defined. They used my speech on the subject at the International Conference on Men's Issues, London, 2016 as the source. Even better, the authors of the study agreed with my assessment of the issues and said so in unambiguous terms in the summary.

To wit:

> Traditionally, Trinidad and Tobago's society is patriarchal in its ontology, however, there is a tendency on the island towards gynocentrism or the inclination to place the needs, wants, and desires of women ahead of all others (Elam, 2016).
> This non-reporting of spousal violence by males in the study can also be attributed to the effect of gynocentrism which creates a cultural default on the micro and macro level where women's DV victimization reporting is a call to action and a man's DV victimization reporting is seen as taboo (Elam, 2016). In the context of Trinidad and Tobago, the authors of this article submit that gynocentrism pervades all aspects of the CJS as well as society, hence the apprehension by men in the study to report their DV victimization to the police. For male respondents, the main barrier to non-reporting DV victimization to the police was embarrassment/shame (17%).
> Justice Policy Journal ⍰ Volume 16, Number 1 (Spring, 2019)

Naturally, to see this lifted my spirits in relation to the work I've done over the years, but the important thing, the very important thing, is that gynocentrism has made its way into the lexicon of domestic violence research. This is unprecedented as far as I know, and it represents a critical shift in the thinking about the subject.

That's why we focus our work here on the narrative, folks. As feminists have been demonstrating to us for half a century, when you change the language, you change the thinking. And friends, we are starting to change the language.

My hormones made me do it

Mark Dent · 17 July 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Women have always received a more forgiving, compassionate hearing whenever they commit a crime, however heinous. People will go to extraordinary lengths to excuse their behavior. Often, their male partner will be held responsible for his lack of support, coercion, abuse or for leading the woman down the wrong path.

Another ever ready standby is a woman's hormones. We all know that only a woman can walk free from a court after brutally murdering her baby. They call it post-natal depression. Not only can she walk free but often does so with the best wishes from the judge who often express his/her sympathy and hopes that they overcome their mental struggles and go on to live a happy, productive life.

Nice.

The issue of hormones and the effect they have on a woman's behavior was brought to my attention when I read two articles in the Melbourne Herald Sun.

A former Olympian, Lisa Curry, had decided to speak out about the terrible toll her hormonal imbalance took on her marriage. The article begins with these words.

> 'Lisa Curry admits her hormonal hell contributed to the demise of her marriage to ironman Grant Kenny. But now she knows she wasn't just "a miserable cow" like she once thought and doesn't understand why women won't talk about their struggles with menopause.
>
> Now that she is happy and relatively calm, the turmoil that characterized much of her adult life seems all the more pronounced, especially when realizing it was caused by hormonal imbalance.'
>
> I had horrific hormonal imbalance when I had my kids but I didn't know what it was. I just thought I was a miserable cow. I didn't see the patterns but now I know, and I also know that it contributed quite a bit to our marriage breakdown (with the father of her children, Grant Kenny).'
> [image]

Now I don't doubt for one minute that what Lisa Curry has to say is true. Although I am equally in no doubt that at the time of her struggles and the suffering she inflicted on her husband, she would have been vehemently asserting that it was his fault that she was always enraged.

It is so easy to sit back after the terrible damage has been done and calmly address the abuse and mistreatment of the man who stayed by your side for 26 years.

She refers to "uncontrollable mood swings."

I am not a doctor; she may be right, but are mood swings "uncontrollable" or simply difficult to control?

She generously acknowledges the toll this behavior can take on husbands and wants to educate them as well as women so they can cope with the turbulence of women's hormonal issues.

That's kind of her, but how would women react if a man with a powerful libido decided he wanted to educate women on how to deal with a husband who possesses a powerful sex drive?

Lisa explains why her hormones were creating havoc in her life and her relationships.

> "I was at my first Olympics when I was 18 and my last was when I was 30 so my body was never in that homeostasis that is so important for your hormones to function properly.
> "Anything that is extreme gets your body out of balance and mine was right out of balance."
>
> Curry, now 57, admits she was clueless about proper nutrition until she was in her 30s because her rigorous

> Olympic swimming training meant she quickly burnt off whatever she ate.
> Once she developed a heart problem, known as myocarditis, and had a defibrillator implanted surgically in 2008, her approach to nutrition changed.
> When combined with the Happy Hormone supplements, plant-based herbs and fermented superfoods addressing a range of women's health issues, developed by her business partner and naturopath Jeff Butterworth, her hormone levels started to level out.

She has now made it her mission to educate other women, men and particularly teenage girls about the power of their own hormones.

Let's stop right there.

If ever a particular group of people needed some open discussion and education about the power of hormones, it is our young men. I can only speak for myself but I don't think I would ever wish to experience what I lived through as a boy from around the age of thirteen to manhood (and beyond). I felt like I was ready to explode at any given moment. Sexual desire was an endless, aching, pulsing presence that often-made clarity of thought a hopeless pipedream.

Most men remember that driving need to "deal with" the powerfully urgent demands your body was screaming at you every waking moment.

We were surrounded by sexual images wherever we looked and yet we were condemned and made to feel dirty and depraved for being attracted to the very thing our body was demanding.

We all heard the endless, patronizing putdowns.

All boys and young men think with their dicks. Snigger! Snigger!

Can't they leave it alone for five minutes?

It was an absolute purgatory and I do not recall hearing one word of support or advice or even simple empathy from anyone. We were all alone in a strange new world, with this throbbing, animal desire foisted upon us without any choice and we simply had to find a way to cope.

Here are some interesting facts from a chapter in Bettina Arndt's book, #MenToo.

> "Men live with up to twenty times the testosterone of women and that makes it very tough to cope with decades of monogamous marriage, particularly when sex is offered very reluctantly, "like meaty treats to a dog" as one man put it.
> Yet most men do a remarkable job remaining true to their women.
> The first Sex in Australia survey sampled almost 20,000 people and found just five percent of partnered men had strayed in the previous year."

I return to Lisa's comment when she referred to "uncontrollable mood swings."

Would any man receive anything other than scorn and derision were he to say, years after constantly sleeping with other women throughout his marriage:

I did so due to my uncontrollable urges.

I think not.

Yet this is surely a contributing factor.

Bettina's book features another interesting observation.

> There's an interesting book-The Testosterone Files-written by a feminist writer who had a sex change and became a male. The author, Max Wolf Valerio, describes being blown away by the urgency of his newly acquired sexual urges, his constant sexual fantasies -sex is now food, he says.
> He cringes when he sees female audiences on talk shows pursing their lips, shaking their heads at sheepish male guests who are supposed, "porn addicts" or "womanizers". He's shocked by women's ready assumption of moral superiority."

Just imagine an all- male audience with a male host grilling Lisa Curry about her episodes of rage and abuse fueled by hormonal imbalance being subjected to the disdain and moral judgement of a room filled with men. You can only imagine it, because it would never happen in the real world.

Valerio continues:

> 'How to explain this to women? Valerio ponders. There is this thing about men that they cannot completely know. Few people want to believe that there could be a real chasm, a chemically induced difference of sexual drive between the sexes.
> Now that I am Max, I see that this rift, this fundamental chasm between men and women's perceptions and experiences of sexuality, is one that may never be bridged."

Such commentary would rarely be seen in the pages of our mainstream newspapers and certainly would never evoke the sympathy or compassion Lisa Curry's article received.

A second woman, Karina Grift, spoke about the rage she felt due to hormonal imbalance and the terrible treatment she meted out to her long-suffering children.

[image]
Karina Grift
She says:

> "My rage is disproportionate to the offence. My teenage son forgot to empty the dishwasher before he left for school.
> I am seething. I feel like hurling every dish across the room.
> This is what I'm like now. My rage goes from zero to 100 in seconds over the slightest trigger.
>
> Some days I feel like it's controlling me. On these days I hate the words I hear myself screaming at the kids, about how lazy they are, how selfish, how no one helps."
>
> I have never been like this before. Not during the toddler tantrums, not in the midst of grief, not when overworked or sleep-deprived.
> I have been angry, of course, but this rage, it scares me.

I won't go into the details of Karina's condition, but it sounds as though it would have been very debilitating and life changing.

This is not the point of my article. I am not doubting these women were affected by the changes taking place in their bodies.

I am, (once again) simply pointing out the glaring double standards at play in our society. The bodily functions and chemistry of women is something men must be educated about and willing to accommodate.

The biological make up of men is something to be critiqued, demonized and mocked.

Karina seems to be describing domestic abuse when talking about her rage. We are usually told any attempt to explain abuse or find a reason for it is simply victim blaming or supporting the actual abuse. Intelligent people know this is utter nonsense and the only way to get to the heart of a problem is to uncover what is causing it.

But this rarely happens.

Most people who do cruel and violent things are in some way damaged or suffering. However, any father who may have directed his rage at his wife or children would simply be labeled a perpetrator of family violence and he would receive no empathy, regardless of what conditions, physical or mental drove him to behave in this manner.

I look forward to the day a man writes an article in which he calmly explains away his years of abhorrent behavior and mistreatment of his wife as a result of a hormonal condition beyond his control and see how many words of praise, support and compassion his public pronouncement would garner.

I would suggest, zero.

The times they are a changing

Paul Elam · 23 July 2019 · Archived copy · Original

It's been said that if you want to understand a society, ignore the anthropologists. Ditto for psychologists. Scratch sociologists off your list, too. They're all useless. None of these disciplines can help us understand a society's people or their core values and beliefs.

As strange as it may seem, if we want to plumb the depths of a society's consciousness, into the well spring of its collective thinking, the thing to watch is the advertising.

This is no revelation to the red pill community. From the tried and true ploys, selling beer, cars and a host of other products with raw sexual imagery, to peddling laundry soap so easy to use that even a man can do it, we've seen it all. We've witnessed and commented on the tropes for years, particularly the misandric ones, portraying men precisely as society sees them. Menacing. Inept. Useless. Unnecessary. We've been taken aback, astounded, as companies like Gillette parrot the modern mindset about men as default perpetrators and agents of evil.

Yep, a few hours in front of your average television and you will get a real clear picture of the society that's watching it. The worst of it is sometimes ugly, and, sadly, hateful.

So, it was with both pleasure and surprise that I heard about a company called Egard Watches, who made a potent, profoundly touching response to Gillette's full-frontal assault on men. It was even more pleasing that the ad they created was met with such overwhelming public approval.

Something, in this society, must be changing.

That change is consistent with other matters of public discourse, like the recent reporting that antifeminism is now more popular than feminism. Who would have thought that possible 5 years ago?

Back to the advertising, though, a look at top of the home page of avoiceformen.com reveals a banner ad for Coyote Gear, an Arizona based company that sells brass and steel fittings, among other things. Brass and steel. The changing times. Both are a pretty good fit with the men's movement, I'd say. And it can be revealed that this advertising was secured because of the advocacy for men and boys, not in spite of it.

Yep. Something in this society is changing.

I have also heard through the grapevine that the CEO of Egard Watches, Ilan Srulovicz, may be attending ICMI in Chicago next month. Did I say that things are changing?

Trust me, I understand that a couple of unexpected moves from comparatively small companies won't exactly change the tilt of the Earth's axis. But I submit to you that none of this was even possible a short time ago. We are changing the narrative.

You are changing the narrative.

I can even point out that the venue for the next ICMI is anything but a small company. They are a very big name and they know about the history of ICMI, yet they are backing the Honey Badger Brigade's efforts to host the conference there. If that is not change, I don't know what is.

So, what can you do? Well, you can get your ticket and attend the conference. In the absence of that (or in addition to it) you can visit Egard Watches and Coyote Gear and give them well some deserved business.

We are a growing demographic, but we won't be that way for long if we don't reward companies who take risks by covering our backs.

Now, off to get myself a new watch.

Felicitous feminism

Mark Dent · 23 July 2019 · Archived copy · Original

My dear dad used to say: “Never a truer word spoken in jest!” on occasions when a quip meant to be seen as humorous revealed just a little bit more than the speaker intended.

[image]
Susie O’Brien
I think my wise father would have felt compelled to speak those words again had he happened to read an article by Susie O’Brien, a very well-known feminist journalist who makes a living branding our society sexist and any male celebrity or footballer who doesn’t bow at the feminist altar, a misogynistic Neanderthal.

Susie recently wrote an article about the way many people are deluded when it comes to their assessment of their own driving ability. Every now and then Susie takes a break from bashing men and attempts to write something light and comedic.

There was nothing earth-shatteringly interesting or significant in this otherwise lighthearted piece until I came across these words.

> I have always been a little suspicious of my right to be on the road, mainly because my P- plate test was a joke.
> I passed, but I shouldn’t have. I followed my friend’s advice and booked the last test on Friday afternoon because she told me all the instructors go easy as they want to go to the pub.
>
> I also made sure I had a male instructor–I was certain it would help at some point.”

I think you can see where this is heading my astute friends.

Let me jump to the chase. Susie makes a catastrophic mistake when she failed to come to a complete stop when facing a stop sign.

That is an automatic fail.

Well it is if you are a young man. In fact, it is if you are a male of any age.

Now read on and heed Susie’s words.

“So, I did what any smart person would have done. I started crying.”

Note how Susie very deliberately wrote person.

I can just see her pausing momentarily over the keyboard and very quickly understanding that if she wrote what she originally intended to write, it would leave her open to accusations of playing the female damsel in distress to manipulate a man and get what she wanted.

O’Brien knows better than any of us that any man young or old, who burst into tears upon being told he had failed his driving test would be viewed with scorn and disgust. He would remain a failure, rest assured, but would also be dismissed with some pragmatic advice about “growing a pair” and “manning up.”

Men who cry when they fail are seen as pathetic losers.

Susie’s very deliberate decision to write person instead of woman indicates that she understands this very well. How disingenuous can a person be? Does she know of any man who uses tears and flirtation to melt the heart of driving instructors and police officers?

She continues:

> What will my friends say? They all pay out and make fun of me!” I told him (the driving instructor), sniffing as > prettily as I could.

> True story. This non-feminist blonde moment had the desired effect. He let me keep driving and let me pass by doing a three point turn in only nineteen moves. My friends thought I was a legend."

How many non-feminist blonde moments do you think there have been in Susie O'Brien's life? I would suggest more than a couple.

People like O'Brien throw around the words male privilege and misogynist like confetti at a wedding. I have never heard the term, female privilege, yet it is far more prevalent and visible in our society for those who have eyes to see.

It is subtle, but undeniably real and beneficial. I would suggest all women know this innately, even women as rabidly feminist as O'Brien.

She knew instinctively that a male instructor would treat her far more leniently because she was a female. She also knew her chances of getting what she wanted by turning on the tears and cutie pie face would be drastically increased if the instructor was male.

She was right.

I wonder how many young men were failed by that instructor on the same day? Young men who were just as anxious as O'Brien and young men who, if anything, faced far harsher taunting and humiliation at the hands of their peers.

This is not about driving tests. As my dad knew, this tiny peek inside the mind of Susie O'Brien, made it clear that this woman (and countless women like her), who has literally made a living by playing the role of victim — someone who has been given less opportunity, less praise, less money and less respect by society because she is a woman, knows this is a lie.

Feminism for her, is something that can be turned off and on like a tap, purely for her convenience.

Bill Burr nailed this hypocrisy in this standup routine.

Listen from a round 2:20.

Bill did get the pay gap myth wrong but the rest of his act was almost too true to be funny. I suppose the very best comedy tells the truth in a way that allows the audience to accept it and agree without loss of face or being branded sexist, woman hating pigs. After all, it's just a comedy routine isn't it?

Women have played the Susie O'Brien card since humans walked upright. They have escaped parking fines, speeding tickets, being drafted into war, jail time, the cane and strap in secondary school and the fear of being branded a coward for failure to act in a moment of great danger.

They play the Susie O'Brien card when they punch, slap or throw objects at their male partner, safe in the knowledge that the chances of him fighting back are minimal. Firstly, because it goes against a man's instinct to hit a woman, even when she is hitting him. The second reason is that women know the government and police force have their back.

When the police come knocking and she lets the tears start flowing the man is already a "dead man walking" so to speak. Regardless of the circumstances–if she is crying and bruised or bleeding, the man will be arrested, rest assured.

Such privilege.

A journalist recently wrote an article attacking the sick notion expressed by the police commissioner; the idea that all men were partly responsible for the murder of the homeless woman by a mentally deranged homeless man. I referenced this fool in an article I wrote a little while ago.

It appears that some women do see the light and understand that they do indeed possess a privilege not available to men in times of danger. I will let one person who wrote in the comments section below the article to speak for herself.

Jill:

> A couple of years ago I was in a coffee shop early on a Saturday morning. I saw a man obviously high on ice walk past. I thought, “If he comes into the coffee shop, there will be trouble”. He entered the coffee shop and, without conscious thought, I moved to stand behind a male tradie. The iceman soon started to throw chairs and overturn tables. Without conscious thought, I went and hid behind a fridge. All the blokes in the coffee shop, the male barista, and the male pastry cook rushed forward and pushed iceman out of the shop.
> That’s when I gave up being a “feminist”.

Cambridge milkshaking incident: Assailant and photographer will not be charged.

Mike Buchanan · 26 July 2019 · Archived copy · Original

[image]

[image]

The inevitable has come to pass. I've just heard from the Cambridge policeman handling the Cambridge milkshaking incident, in which I – along with Natty Kadifa and Jordan – were the recipients of uninvited milkshake on our clothes. Neither the woman who threw the milkshake, nor her (male) photographer accomplice, will be facing charges. I never expected any other outcome. Both admitted their involvement (the pub CCTV video footage, and Natty Kadifa's video, made this a meaningless gesture). Mitigating factors were that both were contrite (yeah, right!) and have no previous convictions (the relevance of which escapes me). Both are said to have been humiliated by Natty's video which, if true, is one positive thing to have come out of this.

A Detective Sergeant in Cambridge police has decided, in his infinite wisdom, on a "community remedy". The matter wasn't referred to the CPS because, in the words of the PC, they would have decided prosecutions were not in the public interest (it's only in the public interest to bring prosecutions when it's women who are assaulted). The two people will be required to:

- pay Natty, Jordan, and myself, £25.00 each (i.e. each of us will receive £50.00)
- write letters of apology to us (they should be entertaining, if nothing else)

And that's it. Would the same have happened if the main target for the milshaking had been the leader of, say, the Women's Equality Party? Somehow, I doubt it. Cambridge police were nowhere to be seen when student protesters (members of the Cambridge University Noisy Twats Society, CUNTS) spent 3-4 hours blocking people from trying to enter the building before and during Elizabeth Hobson and I giving our talks. They did nothing to disperse them, when their noise was disrupting our talks. And over the 90-minute period in which Natty and others detained the assailant, not one policeman turned up to question or arrest her. If you're an MRA, the police don't give a rat's a (N. America: rats a) about your rights, a position also adopted by the rest of the criminal injustice system.

I could appeal the decision, but it would be an exercise in utter futility. I could seek to take out private prosecutions, but a judge could block that, as a judge did when I tried to launch a private prosecution of Dr Balvinder Mehat, a Nottingham-based Known Genital Mutilator. Even if a judge permitted the prosecutions, the CPS could take over the cases – and almost certainly would – only to then drop them.

If nothing else, the decision to not charge the assailant and her photorapher accomplice only adds to the PR triumph of the Cambridge event. A list of blog pieces in relation to the event is here, while Wonder Natty's video of the asssailant and photographer is here (4:33).

Virtue signaling in Vero Beach

Doug Mortimer · 26 July 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Fond as the media are of historic anniversaries, it's inevitable that some get lost in the shuffle. One recently came to my attention, but probably not yours, so I thought I'd drag it out for your edification.

75 years ago the AAGPBL was founded. Yes, even back in 1944, acronyms were popular, perhaps as a result of the New Deal's creation of numerous federal bureaus, popularly known as alphabet soup agencies.

The AAGPBL was the All-American Girls Professional Baseball League. It was inspired by the U.S military cornering the market on young able-bodied men, the very demographic that had dominated major and minor league rosters. The result was the disappearance or suspension of many minor league teams (and leagues), while the major leagues had to make do with 4-Fs, old-timers, and sometimes teenagers. Baseball fans on the home front had little to cheer about. What do do?

Chicago Cubs' owner Phillip K. Wrigley had an idea. Women were taking over for men in the factories, so why not on the baseball field? Hence the AAGPBL.

In subsequent years the AAGPBL has achieved legendary status in the realm of female empowerment. It was greatly aided by A League of Their Own, a 1992 movie about the founding of the league. The film still shows up regularly at revival houses and, not surprisingly, has become something of a lesbian cult film. So I guess we could say the LGBTQ folks are down with the AAGPBL.

Recently some of the few remaining veterans of that league were present for the inaugural Girls Baseball Breakthrough Series at Dodgertown in Vero Beach, Florida.

The June 14-18 event brought together 65 high school girls from the U.S. and Canada. Among the coaches were former major league players Dmitri Young, Fernando Arroyo, and Lou Collier. Another was catcher Veronica Alvarez, who coached Oakland Athletics' backstops during spring training this year. All expenses were paid by Major League Baseball and USA Baseball, the governing body for amateur baseball.

The symbolism of the Dodgertown location was obvious to every baseball geek. As the name implies, Dodgertown was built by the Brooklyn Dodgers as a spring training site in 1948. Today vast spring training complexes are common but the Dodgers got there first. One of the purposes of Dodgertown was to provide a safe space for Jackie Robinson and other black Dodger players, who were hardly welcomed with open arms in Florida during the Jim Crow era.

The Dodgers moved out after 2008, but in February 2019 Dodgertown (n/k/a Historic Dodgertown) was added to the U.S. Civil Rights Trail. Consequently, females playing baseball at the facility evokes civil rights, inclusivity and breaking barriers in major league baseball. It's about "opening up equality."

This was not the first time the ghost of Jackie Robinson was summoned to enhance female empowerment. Two years ago MLB and USA Baseball introduced the Trailblazer Series, a baseball tournament for girls. To make sure everybody got the connection, the tournament was initiated on Jackie Robinson Day Weekend in mid-April.

The connection between black and female ballplayers doesn't even rise to the level of tenuous. The long history of the old Negro Leagues, as well as numerous exhibition games played between white and black teams, showed that the black players were more than capable of cutting the mustard at the highest level of play. The same is not true of female ballplayers.

Nevertheless, it's not hard to figure out why Major League Baseball is embracing this program. It's good public relations – and it's great virtue signaling.

Silly me, I used to think that virtue was doing the right thing even if no one was watching, but organized baseball isn't about to lavish largesse on any entity without providing a host of press releases and photo ops. Typically, major league teams build youth baseball fields in underprivileged or underserved (i.e., poor) neighborhoods, and often hold workshops for young players. The much-vaunted RBI (Reviving Baseball in Inner Cities) program dates back to 1991.

Good will aside, there is always the chance that such programs might one day produce professional players, some of whom may make it to the big leagues. This, however, is not the case with female players. In truth, there's less chance of a female player in the major leagues today than ever before.

Say what? In an age of unprecedented female empowerment and diversity how can that be? Well, it's a matter of biology and odds.

From 1901 to 1960, major league ball had 16 teams. Given 25 players per squad, that meant that at any one time, only 400 men were on the active rosters of major league teams. Today we have 30 teams and there are rumors that major league baseball wants to expand to 32. So with twice as many teams in the near future, that would mean 800 men would be on active rosters in the near future. But the US population has more than quadrupled since 1901, and as baseball goes global (in 2018 27% of the players were foreign- born and the percentage is even higher in some minor leagues), the odds against women become longer and longer.

Personally, I think organized baseball's global crusade is not one of spreading the Gospel of the grand old game but of widening the talent pool to depress salaries in the future. But that is not a topic to be explored on this web site. In keeping with the topic at hand, let's just say that the larger the male talent pool, the less chance for a female breakthrough. But no one in organized baseball will ever admit that.

Now if you go way back to the early days of baseball when town ball was popular, maybe an occasional female baseball player would have been feasible. In a small town, it's not entirely impossible that a talented female player could qualify for the town team. The smaller the talent pool, the more likely a talented female athlete can eke out a spot on a roster.

You might be surprised to know that the USA has a Women's National Team (Veronica Alvarez was on the team) and they played in a World Cup Tournament in 2018. More than likely, some of the girls from the Dodgertown get-together will be on the 2020 squad. The question is who will pay to watch these games? If they are telecast, who will watch them?

Sure, in the past there have been some interesting female performances in baseball, but they were novelties. Teenage pitcher Jackie Mitchell allegedly struck out Babe Ruth and Lou Gehrig in an exhibition game. I say allegedly because there is reason to believe it was staged and that Babe and Lou were in on the gag. Barnstorming ballplayers were notoriously lax (or should I say relaxed) away from the rigors of the regular season. Their off-season appearances were primarily entertainment for rubes in the hinterlands who were far removed from major league ball.

A more recent example of a prominent female was Ila Borders, who was the first woman to earn a college baseball scholarship (Southern California College – no, not USC – in 1994). She played four seasons of independent minor league ball for three different teams. Her overall record was 2-4 with a 6.75 ERA (if you're not a baseball fan, this is not good) in 101.1 innings pitched. Had she been a male pitcher, she probably wouldn't have lasted as long as she did. Her peak fastball velocity was in the low 80's mph, which would never get you anywhere close to the big leagues. Male junkball pitchers can match this speed with minimal strain on the arm.

There is a reason why Ila Borders was signed by an independent minor league team. A minor league team affiliated with a major league team would not waste a roster spot on anyone who is clearly a non-prospect. Affiliated teams exist to develop a supply of ballplayers for major league teams. They can tap into the deep pockets of the major league affiliate. The independent minor leagues can do whatever they want but they have to pay their own way. Hence, the attraction of a novelty act like Ila Borders. It's all about putting butts in seats. A female hurler taking on male hitters will do that. Of course, so would Siamese twins or Jojo the Dog-Faced Boy.

Sure, an exceptional woman may be able to play baseball as good as an average man but a major league player is near the far end of the bell curve for men. The bell curve for women just doesn't extend that far. The chances of becoming a big league ballplayer are slim and none: slim for boys, none for girls. Sending your teenage boy to baseball camp is a dubious expenditure, but sending your daughter to a baseball workshop is absolutely a waste of time and money. Her chances of ever earning a paycheck from playing baseball are close to zero.

Nevertheless, the female empowerment theme persists. In 2014 a young icon was pitcher Mo'Ne Davis, a Little League sensation. Her fastball maxed out at 71 mph. Outstanding on a field of Little League dimensions; no big deal on a regulation-sized diamond.

At age 13 she was the first girl to pitch a shutout and earn a victory in the Little League World Series. The fact that she was black, certainly didn't hurt when it comes to corporate media hoopla.

Actually, Davis's achievement isn't as surprising as it appears at first, though it is unexpected. For one thing, girls mature faster than boys. Assuming Davis was at the far end of the female bell curve, she may well may have been ahead of even her male peers. But there is more…and here we get into even more controversial realms.

It is well known that blacks have higher levels of serum testosterone levels than whites (and Asians). Women, of course, have lower levels of testosterone than men, but the black/white difference persists in them as well. Also, blacks mature physically faster than other races. Consequently, if any female was going to excel in a Little League contest, the most likely suspect would be a black girl at the far end of the female bell curve as well as at upper end of age eligibility. In fact, that is what Mo'Ne Davis was, though no one in the corporate media (at least no one who values his job) would ever bring this up. (For the record, the old Negro Leagues featured three female players: Toni Stone, Connie Morgan, and Mamie Johnson.)

By definition, prodigies peak early, which garners them plenty of attention, but as the years go by, their peers catch up with them. The exceptional girl athlete's time in the spotlight is brief, as most males eventually catch up with her and surpass her. Indeed, Mo'Ne Davis has faded into the welter of amateur sports (appearing on the cover of Sports Illustrated is a notorious jinx, which may explain why her profile has been much lower over the past five years). When last heard from, she intended to play softball at Hampton University. Whether she will dominate the competition at this level remains to be seen. She will likely end up as just another athlete, perhaps even a good one, but no longer the stuff of headline news.

Whatever the reason, major league baseball never passes on a golden opportunity to display wokeness. Pick up any scorecard program at your local major league ballpark and you'll likely find a section devoted to the good works of the franchise's foundations, youth academies, or affiliated "feel good" charities.

Frankly, I always thought charity began at home, and slashing the prices on tickets, concessions, and parking for the hometown fans would be welcome. That would undoubtedly benefit women as well as men, and fans of all races and ages. I can't think of a better way to foster good PR, but it won't garner you any brownie points from the numerous talking heads and bloggers who tilt left. To achieve that, you need get-togethers like the "you go, girl" fest at Dodgertown. The girls get a free trip, free room and board, and some exercise. And the suits in the front office get to offer up a plethora of platitudes about inclusivity and equality.

Well, for better or worse, we have a Women's Baseball World Cup tournament to look forward to in 2020. The participants may represent the best female ballplayers in the world. Yet not one of them will ever play big league ball.

Nevertheless, one fine day, a major league team down on its luck in the waning days of the season may see fit to promote a female to the roster. When there's nothing to play for, a team still has to pay the bills, and a female in uniform would certainly attract curiosity-seekers.

Should that ever happen, her number will be immediately retired by all major league teams, she will be all over the talk show circuit, her image will adorn the cover of Time magazine (if Time is still around then), she will get a book deal, Hollywood will do a biopic of her, and the talking heads at ESPN will rave for days.

If you work it right, inclusivity can be profitable.

Orwell's Nineteen Eighty-Four revisited

Mark Dent · 29 July 2019 · Archived copy · Original

> 'The best books… are those that tell you what you know already.' George Orwell

I recently revisited George Orwell's classic novel, 1984. I enjoyed the book far more than I did the first time I read it when it was part of the school syllabus. I think it had a far greater impact on me today because so many of the ideas expressed are alive and well in 2019. We have not yet reached the extreme levels of government control and brainwashing described in Orwell's book, but we are certainly getting closer with each passing year.

I stopped to reflect on different passages throughout the book because of the uncanny similarities I saw between the methods used by Big Brother to control the narrative in their society and the methods used by feminists today.

I have selected a number of quotes from the book which leapt out at me as being something we are acutely aware of as men and women who have swallowed the red pill.

> Life, if you looked about you, bore no resemblance not only to the lies that streamed out of the telescreens, but even to the ideals that the Party was trying to achieve.

This quote resonates deeply. When I was a much younger man, I was bombarded by the same vile messages we see today about the evil of men and innocence of women. I was informed that there was a War on Women by one of our major daily newspapers. I was told one in three women were being beaten behind closed doors and this was our country's darkest secret.

This was a time where my wife and I regularly (but reluctantly) attended dinner parties and social gatherings. Whenever the issue of domestic violence was invariably raised by virtue signaling men (they did exist before the internet) I felt the bile rise in my throat and my heart thump heavily in chest. I tried to disguise my emotional anger and genuine outrage at these unsubstantiated slurs, but I don't think I fooled anyone.

My strongest argument was one of common sense back then. As protagonist Winston Smith of 1984 says, the life I experienced and observed every day bore absolutely no resemblance to the dystopian nightmare painted by our media and the wine sipping feminists who seemed to flourish at such gatherings.

[image]
Winston Smith in the movie remake

"But if what you say is true," I would say, "then one third of the men in this room are secretly beating their wives. Are you one of them?" I'd ask which ever fool was parading his credentials to any woman willing to listen.

"How does our society function so smoothly given a third of our women are abused and physically assaulted each night of the week? I'm a teacher surrounded by women. I have never seen a woman with a bruise or black eye in (at that time) a decade of teaching. How can that be, given this horrendous war we men are waging on our womenfolk?"

It was all anecdotal and based on my gut instinct which screamed "bullshit!" I knew it was a lie. But back then, I couldn't prove it.

I can still hear one of the more pompous fools turning one night and announcing to the guests that:

"Mark thinks that domestic violence is a myth."

He said it with such a smug, sanctimonious tone, I still get angry thinking about it and that was twenty- five years ago! I wanted to throttle him for his very deliberate misrepresentation of what had been a private conversation. Is it any wonder I had indigestion after these nightmarish gatherings!

Trust your instincts. Trust your life experience. Most people can smell a rat when the story they are being told simply doesn't pass the stink test.

The women I worked with, lived with, dined with and encountered every day looked very happy, extremely healthy and content. Was it all a façade and pretense? They didn't appear to be concerned about the war that was being waged upon them. They were still crowding our shopping malls and getting their hair and nails done or sipping coffees in cafes in the company of their laughing friends. My female work associates appeared very happy to go home at the end of a long day.

Were my dear mates and male work associates really transformed into violent monsters the moment they closed the front door to their home? No. Of course not. Time and the internet proved me correct many years later.

> 'Who controls the past', ran the Party slogan, 'controls the future: who controls the present controls the past.'

Feminists learned this truth many years ago. They have very effectively rewritten our history in order to make it fit their present-day narrative.

Their constant references to the "dark old days" when women were oppressed and treated like chattel and men lived lives of privilege now sit deeply embedded in the minds of both men and women who have been subjected to this myth in their journey through our schools and universities. Even men who are not feminists will often say:

"I know women were oppressed. We treated them like second class citizens and chattel for most of history, but the wheel has now turned too far the other way."

I gnash my teeth in anguish when I see how ingrained this lie has become in even the most reasonable people. Jordan Peterson always becomes incensed whenever this absurd proposition is placed before him.

The tributes to the courage and heroism of the suffragettes is another lie swallowed by the vast majority of people in western cultures.

The fact that they used terrorist tactics, never wanted voting rights for all women and universal suffrage had not been extended to all men during this time is never taught to our youth. No student is aware that tens of thousands of young men died in the mud and blood of the Somme without having the right to vote. Their wise government believed they were old enough to die and be mutilated in war but not old enough to have a vote and a say in who would be a part of the very government that so ruthlessly condemned them to the hell so few returned from intact.

We don't teach our children the truth about the noble suffragettes who taunted and humiliated men they deemed to be cowards for not going to fight overseas.

They handed men, young and old, white feathers in the street or placed them in their mailbox. Many of these males were so ashamed they enlisted despite the fact they were only teenagers. Other killed themselves rather than live with the ignominy and face the contempt fostered by these compassionate witches.

Constant allusions to "male privilege" both now and in the past are all lies. Just watch this remarkable footage of men and boys returning from or going to the coal mines in England. Do they look entitled and privileged?

Our friend, Mr. Bax makes feminist claims of female oppression and misery in the supposed dark days of the early 1900's laughable when you read his detailed and fact-based essays on the many privileges extended to the fairer sex in law and society at large back then.

Did women face terrible hardships during the past? Yes. They did.

But here's the kicker–so did men and one could make a very strong argument to suggest their burdens were greater. Child birth was women's greatest burden and that was something inflicted upon women by nature and biology–not men or the patriarchy.

All of the above myths (and many more) are a deliberate misrepresentation of objective truth. Sadly, most of the population, even those who are predisposed to supporting men's rights today, swallow it.

They have succeeded in controlling the past as well as the present to support their feminist narrative.

> To die hating them, that was freedom.

Hate is a very strong word, but it is what I feel for the ideology so many people coldly and deliberately support with lies, distortion and manipulation as their key weapons. They display an utter contempt for the pain and suffering of a human being who possesses male genitalia.

I am a realist. Feminism will be thriving long after I am dead and gone. We are planting some seeds and hoping they take root and flourish. It will perhaps take a few generations before people see this time as one of bigotry and madness and again treat people as individuals rather than members of a tribe defined by gender.

I am a very emotional person who loves with a passion. I am an empathic person. I feel great compassion for any living creature I see in pain or suffering in any way. As a little boy I was stung more than once by bees as I rescued them from our little backyard swimming pool. I still step over rather than crush spiders and ants. I have never willfully harmed another person or creature in my life other than the rare times when I was defending myself in a fight back in my schooldays.

But my hatred for what feminism truly represents, rather than the laughable dictionary definition, will stay with me until I die.

In this age of political correctness and doublespeak, that is an act of freedom.

> The object of terrorism is terrorism. The object of oppression is oppression. The object of torture is torture. The object of murder is murder. The object of power is power. Now do you begin to understand me?

This quote allows me to see inside the minds of feminists who so coldly lie about "toxic masculinity" and inflate any statistic which encourages the population to see women as victims whilst ignoring the overwhelming proof that it is our men and boys who are suffering in far more deadly and dangerous ways.

I used to think these feminists were operating in good faith, that they were simply ignorant and not aware of the ways in which our males are ignored.

But I have learned through bitter experience that most feminists are very aware of the fact that our men are killing themselves at a frightening rate, dying in their place of work, failing in school, treated as second class citizens in our judicial system, overwhelmingly the homeless sleeping on our streets and suffering abuse in their homes with nowhere to turn for help.

They just don't care.

This truth frightened me more than angered me. Watching the hatred and venom spewed by feminists as men simply attempt to attend a talk on male suicide (in the link above) is horrifying. These are sick people, but sadly they are not a fringe group. They symbolize everything that is rotten about this hateful ideology.

I find it shocking to believe people can be so hardened and callous.

There is not one man in our "movement" who would suggest for one moment that we should not do all in our power to give aid and comfort to women who are abused, homeless, ill or suffering in any way.

Our crime is, we simply want the same for men.

Reading the quote from 1984 made it clear. There is no need to dig deeply into the psyche of these women and men who sit in government or have prominent public platforms in the media.

They have a lust for power.

The way to achieve it in this sick day and age is to play the victim and demonize and blame others for that victimhood, or be seen to be in support of these purported victims. This is why so many men in positions of power are willing to join in with those who denigrate, demonize, belittle and dismiss males. As long as they are seen to be supporting and subsidizing the "victims" they will be safe and prosperous.

Victimhood brings you money. Victimhood allows you to take money and rights from those you hold responsible for your oppression.

Victimhood gives you power.

Rosie Batty is an example of this strangely effective strategy. Losing her son to a violent assault by his father made her the victim. The feminists pounced upon her. She became their symbol. She was named Australian of the Year. She received money and adulation. Her words on the issue of men and violence were repeated and swallowed by the media. Hundreds of millions of dollars in funding poured into the already overflowing coffers of the domestic violence industry but it was never enough.

Of course, Rosie's greatest weapon was her victimhood. Anyone who dared to question or criticize this woman was the devil incarnate.

How dare you even raise an eyebrow when this mum from Tyabb tells you men are the problem and always have been. She lost her son, don't you know? The government bent to her will for she was a victim and a woman. She was a font of all wisdom because she had lost her son. For shame you heartless, hateful heathens!

Why do we see men's health receive a quarter of the funding of women's health in this country even though men die earlier and have so many mental and physical afflictions?

Gynocentrism is one part of the answer. The second is that men as a collective are held in contempt. It is easy to ignore the needs of those you find contemptible.

In the end it is all about one thing.

Power for power's sake.

That is why facts don't matter. Evidence is pointless. These haters are never going to relinquish their grip on the coffers or the powerful public platform from which they speak their lies and myths for something as unimportant as the truth.

> Your worst enemy, he reflected, was your nervous system. At any moment the tension inside you was liable to translate itself into some visible symptom.

This quote takes me back to those dinner parties. Sometimes my Maggie would ask me to try to contain myself if certain issues arose during the evening. I always tried. But my nervous system always betrayed me. Heart hammering, not so much in fear but with undiluted anger over the lies and the smirking denigration of men and boys.

The tension within my physical body always manifested itself in a shaking but clear voice and (I am told) an intensity which was rather overwhelming for some. I cannot present myself in the way in which I have seen Paul Elam do in interviews.

Calm, strong and clear.

My emotions envelop me and as Winston so aptly observed:

"at any moment the tension inside you was liable to translate itself into some visible symptom."

> What can you do, thought Winston, against the lunatic who is more intelligent than yourself, who gives your arguments a fair hearing and then simply persists in his lunacy?

We have all experienced this. You calmly and methodically explain the ways in which men are disadvantaged in our society and women for the most part, advantaged. You calmly rebut the notion that female athletes are paid less just because they are women. You cite the statistics, the indisputable facts, the undeniable evidence and all you see in the face of the feminist in front of you is an angry, seething ideologue, simply waiting for you to cease your blathering of facts and confess that our society is oppressive and patriarchal and men are privileged. So there!

It is unnerving and frightening when you become aware of how deeply wedded most feminists are to the deliciousness of victimhood and the rage they feel when indulging in this fantasy.

> So long as they (the Proles) continued to work and breed, their other activities were without importance. Left to themselves, like cattle turned loose upon the plains of Argentina, they had reverted to a style of life that appeared to be natural to them, a sort of ancestral pattern…Heavy physical work, the care of home and children, petty quarrels with neighbors, films, football, beer and above all, gambling filled up the horizon of their minds. To keep them in control was not difficult.

The Proles in our world are most of the men in our society. This is the biggest hurdle to be overcome and it may never be achieved. As others have so often said, most men are focused on a few simple things–getting through the working week, enjoying a few beers with their mates, watching the footy and laying a few bets on the horses. They don't have the time or inclination to fill their head with rubbish about men's rights and injustice in the family court. If it isn't directly impacting their life why should they give a fuck?

Men are notoriously difficult to motivate when it comes to speaking up for themselves or other men. It makes them uncomfortable. It's embarrassing to be seen as a whining loser, which is how the media and feminists describe men who have the nerve to demonstrate concern about their brothers, fathers and sons. It's unseemly. It feels awkward and does not come naturally to a man.

So why wrestle with these issues if they are not impacting my life? Hell, even if they are, no-one wants to hear about my problems. Where's the beer? Hey, my horse won by a short half head!

Drinks are on me!

> He was a lonely ghost uttering a truth that nobody would ever hear. But so long as he uttered it, in some obscure way the continuity was not broken. It was not by making yourself heard but by staying sane that you carried on the human heritage.

I think all of us have felt this at some time in our struggle to speak the truth to those who are willing to hear it. But I have stopped worrying about how many people will read my words or how many men and women will see the light. If one person is changed by visiting AVFM or watching Paul, Tom, Janice or Karen, that is a victory. But ultimately, simply writing the truth and speaking the truth every day is enough.

It is not by making yourself heard, but by staying sane that you carried on the human heritage.

Winston Smith's first act of rebellion was to take a pen and paper and write a few sentences about the insanity he saw being acted out every day in his world. It was terrifying and exhilarating.

Writing and reading the truth keeps us all sane. It also enables anyone with ears to listen and eyes to see, to uncover the truth about our society and who it prioritizes.

> In the end the Party would announce that two and two made five, and you would have to believe it. It was inevitable that they should make that claim sooner or later: the logic of their position demanded it. Not > merely the validity of experience, but the very existence of external reality was tacitly denied by their philosophy.

Girls in our education system, including elite private schools, believe they are oppressed. They are taught this and they believe it, even as daddy picks them up from school in his Mercedes and drives them to their violin lesson or buys that new saddle for their horse.

External reality is tacitly denied by the philosophy they are exposed to every day.

You see it in shopping centres where women congregate, sipping lattes, getting nails tended to in salons and buying expensive clothes. Many of them would happily subscribe to the notion that women are oppressed by our patriarchal society and we still won't have equality till the government is truly representative of our population or 50% of CEO's are women!

External reality is tacitly denied by the philosophy they are exposed to every day.

On her way home she will drive past men operating heavy machinery as they widen a road, men climbing telegraph poles to keep the electricity flowing to their homes. Other men can be seen pouring concrete and smoothing it out with their trowels–backs bent, covered in dust and dirt.

External reality is tacitly denied by the philosophy they are exposed to every day.

She will not see them.

Perhaps she is listening to the ABC and hearing yet another story about female oppression. A man had the temerity to spread his legs on the train seat and this seems to be yet another clear demonstration of male privilege.

Men are such selfish, entitled pigs!

External reality is tacitly denied by the philosophy they are exposed to every day.

> Being in a minority, even in a minority of one, did not make you mad. There was truth and there was untruth, and if you clung to the truth even against the whole world, you were not mad.

This quote brought me such piece of mind when I first read it. For doing what we do here at AVFM we are ostracized, ridiculed, demonized and dismissed by those who have the power and voice in our society. It is a painful, disconcerting thing to endure at times. One could be forgiven for questioning our stance and feeling doubt under the weight of this relentless deceitful criticism.

But Winston Smith/George Orwell spoke the truth. There is such a thing as objective truth. One opinion can be right and supported by facts, another can be wrong, supported by lies, half-truths and omissions.

Our position is iron clad.

We simply want men to receive the same support, compassion, empathy and attention as women whenever they are suffering or being treated unjustly. We have never wished for women and girls to lose any rights or support. Nor have we ever called for the subjugation of women. It is a lie which would sit comfortably alongside any of the falsehoods spewed by the Ministry of Truth.

We will cling to the truth, no matter how outnumbered, overwhelmed or disillusioned we become.

We remain a tiny rock of truth in an endless ocean of untruth.

These humorous little clips provide a glimpse into our future. They are not so far-fetched as we would like to believe. They are quite insightful.

Winston Smith would see these brief glimpses into what may come as a warning rather than comedic relief.

I think the same, but it may already be too late.

Women objectifying themselves

Gerald Schoenewolf, Ph.D. · 1 August 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Men don't need to objectify women. Women objectify themselves before men ever get around to objectifying them.

Women objectify themselves whenever they wear tight, black leggings that hug every curve and sink into every crevice of their bodies. When they walk down the street or into a bus or through a lobby the leggings frame them and accentuate the movement of their hips and thighs and the sensual quiver of their derrieres.

Women objectify themselves when the walk the red carpet at awards shows or sashay into any party or make grand entrances into any event wearing bull red or shocking pink or sunshine yellow clothes that reveal their entire bodies—gowns that have slits from the top to the bottom that show off most of their breasts, most of their legs up to the very top of their thighs, and holes in between that almost leave nothing to the imagination. The women smile and strut on their red carpets or at their parties or anyplace they choose, blatantly showing themselves off to any man or any woman who cares to look.

Women objectify themselves when they paint their faces with crimson lipstick and decorate their eyes purple eye shadow and darkened or false lashes and daub their cheeks with pink rouge. They objectify themselves when they dye their hair platinum blond, and they curl their hair with an iron, and they brush a few strands of their hair down in front of one of their eyes to give themselves a mysterious quality, causing men to focus in on and objectify their faces.

Women objectify themselves when they use creams to rid them of wrinkles around the eyes or plastic surgery to remove unwanted fat or an angular nose or cheeky cheeks. They objectify themselves when they have their breasts enhanced or their butt rounded so that they will be able to project just the right physical appearance.

Women choose to objectify themselves. Nobody forces them to wear leggings or to make up their faces or botox their bodies. They will say they do it for men, that men somehow force them to objectify themselves. But they don't do it for men. They do it for themselves and to compete with other women. Men are a very secondary consideration.

Nor do women concern themselves with whether their self-objectification will cause men to objectify them. They blissfully objectify themselves without a thought about men, and when men later see women's objectified selves, with all their curves and crevices accentuated to the fullest, with their faces beaming from underneath their love paint, if a man gives them even the slightest look that may signify to them some degree of objectification, woe is he.

Long before the phrase "objectify women," was used as a slogan by feminists to denote men who only look at women as sexual objects and nothing else, women were dressing fetchingly and men were looking at them. From cave men and women onward, the history of humankind consists of young women dressing up in order to catch a man's eye, and men looking at the women who dressed up to catch their eyes.

Men are biologically designed to look at women as sexual objects. Male and female humans, like other mammals, are hard-wired to reproduce their species, and they come equipped with the appropriate sexual anatomy, sexual hormones and gender-specific responses to do just that. So, in fact, there is nothing wrong with a man objectifying a woman—that is, being attracted to a woman—as long as he doesn't do it full-time.

Today, according to my sources, the National Organization of Women is run mostly by lesbian and transgender women. As far as I know, lesbian and transgender women have no problem appreciating pretty women. But when they look at women, they don't refer to it as objectifying women. They only label men as the ones who objectify women.

If we are going to criticize and stigmatize men for objectifying women, then shouldn't we also criticize and stigmatize women for objectifying themselves? Men are constantly shamed for objectifying women and told to clean up their acts and treat women with respect. But women who objectify themselves in order to make themselves more sexually appealing are not shamed. When they walk down the red carpet and reveal almost everything they have, they are applauded as heroes—as “empowered women” who are expressing their femininity.

There is something awry here. Shouldn’t there be the same value system for both sexes? Women who objectify themselves and lesbians who objectify women should be viewed through the same lens as men who objectify women. However, to be really fair and appropriate, we should dispense with the term, “objectify women.” When men are looking at women because they are biologically attracted to them, or if women are preening themselves because they are biological predisposed to do that, neither should be stigmatized for it.

Perhaps we should say that men are reacting to pretty women from a hormonal perspective, and women are hormonally predisposed to show off their bodies.

I'm white and I want my reparations, too

Paul Elam · 3 August 2019 · Archived copy · Original

There's a lot of hoopla going on about reparations these days. It wasn't too long ago on the boob tube that I saw Democrat politicians lining up like shoppers on Black Friday to kiss Al Sharpton's ring and declare their feudal allegiance to the idea of taking money from white folk and giving it to the descendants of former slaves. How they are going to sort through that mess wasn't mentioned but I am sure the good reverend will be there with an open hand to lend.

The reasoning is simple enough. White folk caused — and solely benefitted — from slavery (which isn't true), and black folk solely suffered from it (which also isn't true). But what the hell, these lies are the common narrative, so we will go with them for the moment. Four hundred years ago was when we started to shanghai unsuspecting Africans, binding them in chains and shipping them off to the New World.

Actually, the 15th Century Portuguese first began to kidnap people from the west coast of Africa to sell in Europe. That started the western slaving tradition. Well, that, and the 30,000 Irish slaves sold into bondage in the New World. But, hey, they were white, so let's move on.

Spain, by the way, did their own thing at largely the same time, first enslaving Native Americans and Asians, later replacing those slaves with Africans. So, if we want to heal from slavery on the American continent using heritage as a guideline, we need to start getting checks from people of Hispanic descent. Maybe that should be a note of caution to the Central Americans clamoring to get in here.

Matter of fact, slavery started in ancient times with the Mesopotamians. It picked up steam again with the Portuguese and the Spaniards, who traded with the already well-established slave traders of North and West Africa. Slavery ended in the western world with the influence of the British and with the end of the American Civil War.

All this is to say that slavery was started by societies "of color" and only ended when non Hispanic white men put a stop to it. Even today, when you look across the globe at the few spots where slavery is still practiced, they all have a complete and quite noticeable absence of, uh, western white dudes.

Still, for now, let's stick with the narrative that everyone is so keen to collect on.

Besides, it's totally accurate to say that whites hurt blacks with slavery and later with the KKK, Jim Crow and a host of other forms of institutionalized bias against blacks. So now, as the Rolex-wearing Rev. Sharpton might say, white folk need to cough up the cash.

OK, so let's say that I am in. Let's take tax money away from schools, welfare programs, cancer research or wherever else we can and set it aside for designated victims du jour. Let's hang all the gubbamint programs upside down and rattle change out of those deep, deep gubbamint pockets. Let's distribute all that money to the descendants and alleged descendants of slaves (just the black ones, mind you).

Jumping on that bandwagon and endorsing the idea that yesterday's wrongs means today's winning lotto ticket, it only leaves me with one question.

Where's my check?

As a white man, I reckon I have it coming to me. Call it reimbursement for the 600,000 plus white men who gave their lives ending the human travesty of slavery that men of color started. Call it a debt owed for the 402,000 American white men who died protecting our freedom to be stupid in World War II. And yes, black men died, too. All 708 of them.

And look, if you're offended that I am divvying up the world by color here, take it up with Reverend Al. I am just following his line of thinking. And if you're a proponent of reparations, I am following yours.

Personally, I'd rather regard those 708 African Americans who died in WWII as American heroes who made the ultimate sacrifice for their country. That's what they were, after all. Nothing more, and damned sure nothing less. But that doesn't fit the narrative any more than Irish slaves or black American slave owners.

And since we are all bound to the narrative, I want my freaking money.

Child support is sexist, outdated, and profit-driven

Marjorie Steele · 7 August 2019 · Archived copy · Original

I've been sitting on this piece for a while. Part of me has been tinkering with more research and data hunting to shore up my points. But another part of me has been procrastinating simply because I suspect deep down that there's no amount of factual evidence (or lack thereof) which can sway the opinions of people who have married themselves to a dogmatic belief.

Such as the firm belief most people in America carry that child support payments from one parent to the other are necessary "for the benefit of the child".

The truth is that I've already published some pretty investigative work on the subject of child support here in my own city of Grand Rapids, which has gone largely ignored—at least by my local media readers and Medium's algorithms. People mostly only want facts to use as a hammer in social media arguments. Not to actually shape their opinions about reality.

So I'm going to try another track, and focus on what I determine to be the real heart of this issue: people's beliefs, which are influenced by their emotions. And yeah, there'll be facts and a reality check. But my primary goal is to find common ground, to speak to how people feel about child support, and perhaps to budge it a bit.

And how we feel about issues, if you think about it, is actually pretty damn important. Emotional intelligence is woefully undervalued by society.

So let's get emotionally smart about child support, folks. Let's talk about this realsauce: what are the preconceptions upon which the concept of child support are based? What are our beliefs about the economics of parenting, and our beliefs about parents' roles in children's lives, and--what should be most important in this conversation--what do we believe about what's best for our children?

Why do we believe child support is necessary?

The mindset that it's good, and moral, and necessary for a noncustodial parent to pay child support to their children's custodial parent is pervasive. From my own grandmotherly attorney, to the comments of Medium's third wave feminists, to even our fictional pop culture universes.

Remember that part in Ant-Man—the first one–when Scott Lang goes to see his daughter at her birthday party after getting out of prison for an unjust, nonviolent offense? Do you remember what happens? His ex-wife turns Scott away, and tells him he's not allowed to see his daughter until he pays all his back owed child support that had accrued during his prison time. And what does Scott do? Tries his best to pay back the debt by working minimum wage jobs he can't even keep due to his criminal record. Inevitably out of desperation, he turns back to crime to get the money. Just to see his fucking daughter.

And what do we, as the audience do? Accept all this as normal, and right.

Never mind the fact that child support and custody are handled as separate cases, by just about any state law, and you absolutely may not deny parenting time due to unpaid child support—that's illegal. But we as the audience accept this morally dubious and outright unlawful scenario as all well and good. Which just goes to show how incredibly moralized our perception of child support has become.

Much more disturbingly: how clearly we see child support as being a quid-pro-quo for getting to see your kids. Wanna see your kids? Better pay off your baby mama. That's the implication of this moralization, in a short, ugly nutshell. And unfortunately, all too often, that's the reality itself.

But child support is, if you actually think about it in a much larger moral context, a very modern invention. I don't recall Jesus mentioning anywhere that the way into heaven was to pay your child support on time. So let's stop for a moment and ask ourselves why this concept of child support has become so morally charged for our society.

After a lot of research, which includes watching the Clinton administration grandstand over their Child Support Recovery Act in real time as a child in the early 90s, I've come to conclude that our moralizing of child support is a similar animal to the "reefer madness" stigma surrounding marijuana which we're just now kicking to the curb.

It's state-sponsored moralism, in essence. Motivated financially. #Fakenews, if you will. But we'll get to my rationale for that in a second—let's stick with our emotional motivation to help children, and try to find some common ground first.

I think it's safe to assume that the root of our emotional motivation for believing that child support payments are necessary is the belief that children need parents who are present and active in their lives. More specifically: that if parents can't be physically present in their children's lives, they should support their children's well being by supporting them financially. Because more money will help the children have a higher quality of life, which will be better for their development.

Right?

And this is a reasonable enough series of conclusions, until it's not. There's a fundamental flaw, here.

Giving money to a parent does not automatically create a more nurturing, caring environment for their child. We as adults all know that money cannot buy happiness and love. And before busting out the talk about my privileged "white" perspective (I'm Irish, thanks), consider my own lower middle class background, and rural community. I paid for my school by being a live-in nanny and keeping my GPA high enough to receive full Pell grants, and I've lived client check to client check for more of my career than I care to acknowledge (including as a young mother), so don't tell me I don't understand what it's like to not have money. What I can tell you is that even many of those at the bottom of the economic pool know that having more money doesn't make you happier. And we also know that even the best parents don't always invest in their kids, or make the wisest investments.

I love my white trash family. I wouldn't loan my brother $20, and I have to keep a close eye on my dad's barn, or it fills up with the overflow from my dearest cousins' hoarding habit. Bless their hearts—in the kindly Midwestern sense. Don't make me say more on the subject, or nobody will come to Thanksgiving dinner.

People aren't perfect. That includes custodial parents. It's okay.

I'm just pointing out that with absolutely no accountability or tracking of how child support payments are spent—or even what real expenses they're supposed to be paying for—we're outright naive in assuming that all child support payments are directly funding the healthy development of our next generation. Like, born in a barn yesterday naive. And no, that's not bigoted Neo-conservatism; that's just the reality of human nature.

Beyond all this, and more importantly: based on my research from early childhood educational grantwriting, I can also tell you that while income may have a correlation to healthy childhood development, the only causation to be found comes from children being highly involved in their parents' and extended families' lives.

In other words: money doesn't buy good family, but good family can buy you a lot.

Money can't buy loving grandparents, or good neighbors. Money also is no kind of replacement for the presence of a loving, stable parent. And it's kind of bizarre for us to create a system which equates the two, quite frankly. As in, "what the fuck kind of money-centric Twilight Zone is this," kind of bizarre.

So let's go back to the basics. What can we agree on, morally speaking?

I think we can all agree on one thing: our primary goal in all this is to serve the best interest of the child first and foremost, parents second. Yeah? Yeah.

So, if we're trying to serve the best interests of the child, why are we centering the issue around money? Why is our automatic assumption that what children living in a single parent home need in order to be well nurtured is for dad to give mom money?

Same reason why Jeff Sessions and the other old, anthropomorphized bathroom mops who call themselves civil servants believe that marijuana is evil. Good old fashioned state-sponsored propaganda, in order to increase federal income and benefit key players.

No; really, and literally. It's just about the money. It only ever was.

Why child support really exists

In 1910, the US passed the Uniform Desertion and Non-Support Act, which criminalized willful abandonment and financial neglect of children under the age of 16. If we put this in the context of pre-WWI US society at the time, we'll recall that when this passed, we were: a) largely an agricultural society, with b) large families with many children to help run the farm, which c) operated functionally as businesses as well as families, meaning that d) when a patriarch of the household left, it was tantamount to a CEO abandoning his company in the net effect it had on the rest of family and its farm.

Not to mention the fact that in 1910, women's legal rights were severely limited. They couldn't vote; maintaining a career enough to support a family was…tough, to say the least. Although the pattern of expectation set by the 1910 child support legislature likely facilitated the development of what contemporary writer Ernest B. Bax referred to as "aggressive weakness" which has since flourished in modern feminism, its initial intention was quite practical. Its existence was necessary.

So you can see how, from the context of society at the time, this legislature made sense. Ironically, of all the child support bills which would come to pass, this bill–which was most vital to the children and families it impacted–was the most toothless. It wasn't enforceable across state lines, and it didn't really see much enforcement at all until 1950 (post implementation of FDR's social welfare programs), when the foundation for our current child support system was laid with the Social Security Act Amendment 42 USC, 602(a)(11). This bill effectively tied state-run welfare programs to child support enforcement, requiring states to enforce child support payments for the noncustodial parents of children receiving public assistance. The same year, another bill allowed states to enforce child support across state lines.

As a sidenote, this 70 year old bill is also the reason why when a woman who, to protect her and her child's safety (or for other reasons), chooses not to disclose the identity of her child's biological father goes to apply for WIC, she will be told she can't receive support until she coughs up the identity of her child's bio dad. Establishing paternity for support enforcement can lead to all kinds of horriffic and very real situations, like men being suddenly slapped with child support for a child they had no knowledge about–and in some cases which aren't even their biological children. There have been many public cases, and many more private, in which men have legally established through DNA testing that they are not the biological father, only to be told they have to continue to pay child support because the change can't be input into the system (no, I'm not making this up–not even a little). Due to legislature passed since then, establishing paternity for support also opens the door to paternal custody, which is how we get rapists successfully suing for custody of their rape victims' children in many states to this day.[1] See? Like I said: horriffic, on all sides. But I'm getting ahead of myself.

So why was this act passed in 1950? Was it to more strictly enforce child support, in order to capture that income for the agricultural families which needed it most? Nope; it was to attempt to pay for states' costs for the child-related welfare programs FDR had kickstarted. Which is why, if you're a recipient of child-related welfare (under what's called the TANF program now), you can expect some to nearly all of your child support payments to be garnished by the state in lieu of welfare.

Let me state the key part of that again, more clearly, for emphasis:

Child support enforcement was created by the federal government as a way for states to recoup the costs of providing child-related welfare.

It was not created with the primary goal of providing for the best interest of the child, or of protecting families. The 1950 Act—the one where child support actually gets enforced—has the express goal of recouping welfare costs to the state. Which is NOT the same thing as nurturing children or providing for families. Not even a little.

The 1974 Social Security amendment is even more of a doozy, precipitating the Child Support Enforcement (CSE program). As the Congressional Research Service's 2012 report chronicles:

"The CSE program was passed by Congress in 1975 with two primary goals. The first goal was to reduce public expenditures for actual and potential welfare recipients by obtaining ongoing support from noncustodial parents. The second goal was to establish paternity for children born outside marriage so that child support could be obtained."

Consider, again, the context of society at the time of legislation. In the 1970s, married nuclear families were the standard, and they were gendered more often than not: fathers were sole breadwinners, and mothers raised the children. Large barriers existed for women in the workplace. However, when California legalized no-fault divorce in 1969 and other states began to follow suit, the country saw a flood of divorces. Legislators sought a way to ensure families with children could maintain financial consistency post-divorce, in a society not yet structured for single parents to work. At the time, research showed that the single greatest cause for the rise in welfare costs was divorce–and it also showed divorced fathers' incomes going up post-divorce, while custodial mothers' went down. Meanwhile, the 60's and 70's promotion of free love and exploration outside of traditional religious dogma had led to a wave of children outside of marriage, which the State blamed for increases in the costs of entitlement programs.

Thus, the narrative of the deadbeat dad was formed.

Read it in the Finance Committee's own words in their December 1974 report on the CSE legislation: "The problem of welfare in the United States is, to a considerable extent, a problem of the non-support of children by their absent parents." The report also specifies that the goal of the new "CSE program would be to lower welfare costs to the taxpayer and to deter fathers from abandoning their families."

That's a pretty fucking judgemental and reductive conclusion to come to from such a complex situation, with so much social change in the air. And pretty damned presumptuous, if you ask me. Since when is it our government's job to tell us how we should structure our families? Isn't that antithetical to America's entire life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness ethos?

What's more, let's let the chill of that phrase sink in: the problem of welfare. This is legislative speak for "the cost to our bottom line". So that what. We can buy more tanks? Give Monsanto and BP more tax breaks? Give more bonuses to Wall Street criminals? Don't get me started.

This gymnastic, pseudo-economic moralizing is the basis of our entire child support system to this day.

A 1975 amendment also tasked states with creating their own child support collection agencies, which are known today as Friend of the Court.

A friend, indeed.

In 1990, Clinton administration officials made the following comments in support of their legislative crackdown on "deadbeat parents". Just listen to how, despite the fact that they keep mentioning the child's best interest, everything ultimately comes down to money.

"The failure to support children in this country is an outrage…ultimately born by taxpayers. The bulk of the uncollected is in the innerstate [which is code for urban] market."

Hello racism, our old friend.

"It results in many families not having the resources that they need to raise their children effectively and caringly. It means taxpayers are left footing the bill for those uncollected child support orders."

Ah, there it is: these urban, deadbeat dads are costing us honest taxpayers money. And we need to take it out of their flesh. Which is basically the message Bill Clinton sent, quite emphatically:

"Any parent who is avoiding his or her child support should listen carefully: we will find you, we will catch you, we will make you pay…if you're not paying child support, we will garnish your wages, suspend your license, track you across state lines, and if necessary, require you to work off what you owe."

And here comes the kicker:

"Child support enforcement is essential to the welfare reform effort."

There it is. Right there, in plain sight, where it's always been.

It doesn't matter how you feel about child support, or how normalized and moralized it's become in your worldview. None of that changes the reality that child support enforcement is designed to pay for welfare. Not to look out for childrens' best interest.

And no. Paying for welfare and providing for children's best interest are NOT the same thing, and I don't think I should have to explain why.

Of course, the irony is that less than half of child support recipients are on welfare (aka TANF), which means over half the program's participants don't even contribute to its financial goal. Burdened by ineffective and cruelly bureaucratic implementation, the program has never come close to succeeding in its goal of matching welfare costs.

The counterpoint

But Marjorie, you say, there are many mothers who need that income, who have given up their careers to raise their children, and who wouldn't be able to pay their bills if it weren't for that support.

First: I think it's actually pretty misogynist to assume that women will be in more need of supplemental income post-breakup than men. To believe women can't stand on their own two feet, financially.

Statistically, though, it seems to be unfortunately true. As of the most recent US census data, five out of six custodial parents are women; custodial mothers experience poverty at nearly twice the rate as custodial fathers; and mothers are 20% more likely to sue for child support than fathers. Mothers are twice as likely to not work at all than fathers are.

tl;dr - Custodial mothers work less and seek more child support than fathers. A lot more, if we remember that 83% of custodial parents are women.

And I think there are a few legitimate reasons for that–within limits. As we all know, women are typically more consumed with child raising particularly in the first six months, during breastfeeding and early bonding. One could generously round this all the way up to age three or four, if you wanted to be hardlined about children being with their parents instead of in daycare. This either prohibits employment or makes full time employment much more difficult for women disproportionately.

To a very debatable degree. I mean, I was taking client calls from my bed one week postpartum, so if you get to do nothing but laundry while you watch Desperate Housewives until your baby is four years old, you're a lucky fucking bitch IMO. But that's just my perspective.

Still, trying to work with a little one in tow is no small feat, and childcare costs are significant. With this in mind, I'm comfortable saying that it might be fair for a noncustodial parent to provide some level of financial support for a child's first five years, until they reach school age (and the custodial parents' potential cost for childcare plummet). But that's a period of five years. The real term limit on child support has been, and continues to be, anywhere from 18 to 21 years old depending on the state—sometimes even older.

$500 per month for one child for five years is $30,000. $500 per month for eighteen years is $108,000.

Over $100,000 in less than two decades is a lot of fucking money.

And $500 is just the baseline median. Child support is calculated based on income, so if the paying parent has a decent-paying job and the receiving parent chooses not to work at all (which is an option for them, legally speaking), that number can reach into thousands of dollars per month. This is perhaps one of the most capriciously arbitrary aspects of the whole legislature: that the amount is not based on the actual financial needs of the custodial parent, but on the incomes of the parents. What's more: support payments are NOT guaranteed to be recalculated if the paying parent's income goes down. Whether or not a paying parent's support can be lowered is entirely up to the judge, based on what they deem to be the parent's earning "potential".

This, in essence, means that Child Support Enforcement can legally require a parent to pay far more than they can actually afford, and/or force parents to remain in roles which are bad for their mental and physical health under the threat of being jailed for child support payments they can't afford. It also means that CSE empowers custodial parents to weaponize their children in order to continue to financially abuse their victims two decades after divorce. And no; these circumstances are by no means rare. They happen every single day, to real people--particularly those with the least financial resources to fund a legal battle. In the end, the practical and emotional impact on children is significant. And negative. Quite horrific, actually.

And all for what? Why?

Why do we assume that custodial parents can't be capable of financially supporting themselves and their school-aged children? That's a pretty big fucking part of the role of taking care of your children, isn't it—providing for them? Why would our legislature assume that a custodial parent in today's society isn't perfectly capable of supporting themselves and their school-aged children?

Hell, I know plenty of women (myself included) who have managed to start companies, finish law degrees while working full time, or freelance, all while successfully having and raising babies. Women are supposed to be good at multi-tasking and creative problem solving, right? I mean, let's be super honest for a moment: it's not like 98% of stay at home and/or nonworking custodial moms are feeding their family from their own garden and homeschooling their children (which is what my own mom did, while running a small business). So don't feed me the whole "being a mom is a full time job" line of bull unless you're in that elite 2%.

So what the actual fuck is going on, here?

A sexist, outdated model

It's amazing to me how a system can be simultaneously both misogynist and misandrist (that means being sexist against men, for those who aren't familiar with misogyny's counterpart), but child support manages to pull it off. It hammers us with the narrative of the deadbeat dad in spite of its assertion that gender bias plays no role in determining custody and support. And with 83% of all custodial parents being women, it's clearly a system that's misandrist in practical reality.

At the same time, the child support system also condescends to women by applying crutches that were designed to solve the problems of society 70 years ago. The handouts aren't helping our cause, ladies. We're supposed to be wearing our big girl panties by now, remember?

It's a piece of legislature which oppresses both men and women.

More empirically: our child support system is modeled after the needs of our society 70 years ago, not today. Families today are fluid, with a mix of genders and generations and remarriages. This binary, woman=nurturer, man=provider mentality is simply irrelevant. Single income households are not the norm anymore; most everybody works now, in some capacity—and those capacities are expanding. Independent contracting and flexible working is replacing the rigid 9–5 more every day.

So why, then, does our legislature assume that a single parent can't support themselves and their children once they reach school age?

It shouldn’t.

And, no matter how we feel about it, neither should we.

If birth control fixed boners...

James Skelton · 9 August 2019 · Archived copy · Original

In the fourth episode of season seven of NBC's hit sitcom 30 Rock, protagonist and adamant feminist Liz Lemon attends a fundraiser with her boss Jack Donaghy. While there she hears Jack complain to several of his wealthy male peers that his tax dollars shouldn't go to fund "female promiscuity."

Unable to hold her tongue, Liz Lemon interrupts. "If birth control fixed boners," she says, "you'd get it free with your driver's license."

Now, just on the face of it, this is complete nonsense. There are pills that fix boners. Pharmaceutical companies have developed numerous medications to treat erectile dysfunction, and they're always working on more. None of these are "free with your driver's license."

Okay, but let's give Liz the benefit of the doubt and assume she was exaggerating just to make a point. Still, it got me thinking. Comparing birth control with erectile dysfunction medication is a common feminist talking point. In fact, it went viral in 2017. So what it exactly are they referring to? I decided to do a little digging.

Another feminist lie

When feminists try to justify subsidies for birth control by pointing out that the government subsidizes erectile dysfunction medication, they're being disingenuous. They're referring to the fact that the US Department of Defense spends upwards of $84 million on ED prescriptions through their Tricare insurance for service members and veterans. Is that really a subsidy? If we're going to call military prescriptions subsidies, I guess the US government also subsidizes acne treatments. More importantly, Tricare also covers birth control. Service women can easily get prescriptions for everything from the pill to implantable contraceptives, some even without a copay.

Now that we've established that there's no favoritism in the US military regarding birth control versus erectile dysfunction treatments, let's see if this equality extends to the civilian world.

As usual, it's actually men who are discriminated against

Let's stop talking about hypotheticals and take a look at the actual state of healthcare in the United States.

Free or partially subsidized birth control is a global phenomenon. Countries all over the world provide free birth control to their women, and many more provide cheap birth control subsidized with taxpayer money.

The United States finds itself among these ranks. Passed in 2010, the Affordable Care Act, also known as Obamacare, required employers to pay for their female employee's birth control with a zero-copay plan thereby forcing male participants–and female participants not on birth control–to specifically subsidize their insurance. Public plans such as medicaid and medicare also provide the pill without copay. This does not even include the federal and state subsidies provided to Planned Parenthood and other organizations that prescribe contraceptives to women.

And Viagra?

We've established that there are plenty of subsidies for female birth control, so let's see if that's the case for ED medications. Well, no, it isn't.

Besides the DoD's purchases of ED medications for servicemen, the government doesn't subsidize these treatments. Medicaid covers the prescriptions as any other with a copay, and most Medicare plans do not even cover them at all. Additionally, there is no mandate from the government that private plans must cover ED medications, and there are no publicly funded clinics devoted to doling out Viagra prescriptions.

Funding promiscuity

Of course, when feminists make the argument that the government subsidizes Viagra, they're trying to fight back against attempts to defund their subsidies that already exist. Many campaigns to end the birth control subsidy argue that taxpayers shouldn't have to fund female promiscuity. The idea then is that while birth control gives women sexual liberation because they can avoid pregnancy, erectile dysfunction medications do the same for men–allowing them to have sex when they otherwise wouldn't.

It seems feminists forget that there's a much better analogy to female birth control–male birth control. From condoms to vasectomies men also have contraceptive options. Considering that the government gives men the vast majority of child support payments–and higher payments at that–thus making men responsible for children they often didn't even "choose," it seems like if birth control is a right for women, it should be for men as well.

Birth control inequalities between men and women

Back to the military, while Tricare does cover surgical sterilization for both men and women, it covers the female diaphragm without covering condoms or spermicides.

Furthermore, Obamacare requires no mandate for male birth control. Insurance companies do not have to pay for condoms, spermicides, vasectomies or any of the recent breakthrough treatments in male birth control.

Why the double standard?

If you can finally get feminists to admit they're actually being favored with free or cheap birth control instead of the other way around, their argument usually tries to claim that birth control has a social benefit by preventing low income children that would otherwise be subsidized even further by welfare programs. Despite the fact that the US actually has a lack of fertility, not an excess, even if this were a benefit of subsidized birth control, wouldn't that benefit be enhanced by paying for men's birth control too?

Regardless of which side of the aisle you find yourself on, you have to admit there's a double standard here. Why are people fighting so hard to defend a current subsidy for women when one for men doesn't even exist? Why are laws getting passed in the 21st Century that provide unequal advantage for one gender over the other?

The gender politics will always bring on outrage, but whether you're in favor of a subsidy or not, surely you're in favor of equality. Lies and half-truths about government favoritism are definitely not the way to get there. The United States does not somehow fund men's sex lives while giving women the shaft. In fact, like in many of these debates, it's the exact opposite.

Dr. Ezekiel Young and Stony Brook Children's Hospital, "Known Genital Mutilators"

Gary Costanza · 10 August 2019 · Archived copy · Original

[image]Dr. Ezekiel Young of Stony Brook Children's Hospital in NY have been placed on the "Known Genital Mutilators" directory at neonatalcutting.org.

Here's some info about him:

"Personal Statement
Urological problems are stressful and challenging for children and their parents. My goal is to ensure access to the best treatments, the most current and accurate information, and solutions that are as easy as possible for patients and their families.

Education and Training
Medical School: Warren Alpert Medical School of Brown University
Residency: University of Miami/Jackson Memorial Hospital, Urology
Internship: University of Miami, Surgery
Fellowship: Johns Hopkins School of Medicine, Pediatric Urology"

As far as Dr. Young's statement about "current and accurate information," he and Stony Brook Children's Hospital are sadly lacking. Under "Definitions," we read:

> Newborn Circumcision – This surgery removes the foreskin or loose tissue covering the penis. It may be performed for religious, cultural or health reasons.

As Young can plainly see, the foreskin isn't "loose tissue," but tissue that is fused to the penis and not loose at all.

And, the "solutions that are as easy as possible" are to avoid and not promote risky and unnecessary surgery on newborn babies. "Easy" is taking your newborn baby home as a happy, whole baby, with all his intact body parts, not bleeding, traumatized, and untrusting of his new world and supposed "caretakers." After all, we ban FGM for the same reason, so why does this hospital and Dr. Young make blood money on mutilating babies and selling their body parts?

Dr. Young and the hospital violate human rights law, the right to bodily integrity, the right to protection from physical harm, and their very own Hippocratic Oath, "First, do no harm."

Nowhere does the hospital or Dr. Young give information about the risks and controversy surrounding circumcision, or the fact that it is medically unnecessary. You can read about that and view informative videos here at neonatalcutting.org.

Why you should stop trying to be “manly”

Michael Blankenship · 11 August 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Maybe I should try smoking more cigars. Or maybe I could buy a few guns. What about the gentlemen’s club down the block? No. That’s a bad idea. Maybe I could buy a bottle of whiskey and drink it straight. That would surely do the trick. Damn, I wish I could grow a decent beard.

You’re not always plagued by intrusive thoughts about your obvious lack of masculinity.

But then you’re around other men…

Ya know? The ones that put your own manliness to shame…

… and you can’t help but notice that you’re a little shorter, a little fatter, a little more socially awkward, a little less confident, or a little less charming with the lady folk.

Then some guy—a real macho dude—eyes your date without even noticing that you’re the one holding her damn hand.

It’s time.

Time to become more manly.

More confident. More handsome. More approachable. Funnier. And smoother with the ladies (or your lady).

How?

Start by cutting the crap.

Why do men think growing a beard or building more muscle makes them more manly?

Why’s it manly to drink scotch on the rocks?

Or to shave with a straight razor?

Or to be un-emotional?

What makes the collective “man’s man” stereotype so… well, enticing?

Why do lumberjacks, cowboys, and rich businessmen define manliness and, more importantly, why do you buy into it?

The answer is simple and boring.

It’s the same reason that women wear make-up. That they wear push-up bras and high-heels. That they expect guys like you to pay the check after dinner.

In other words, the sense of manly satisfaction you get from smoking a cigar is akin to the feeling a woman gets when putting on red lipstick.

(Still feel manly?)

Point is, the 21st century stereotype for “manliness” has been defined, shoved in a corner, and told to stay put (much like feminism).

Who did it?

“Powerhouse” porn actors, John Wayne, Thor (my wife’s personal fav), and lots of other “man’s men”.

Ultimately, our 21st century culture.

And you ‘n I have suckled at the breast of popular wisdom for far too long—hundreds of years, actually.

Manliness wasn't always "manly"

Did you know that dudes used to wear high-heels without being laughed at? Actually, a king started the whole thing (King Louie XIV).

Dammmnnnn.
Or how about that in ancient Greece, a small penis was desirable while a big penis was foolish and ugly?

("I'm moving to ancient Greece!!")

Or that homosexuality and bisexuality was all the rage in Ancient Rome?

Or that pink was a man's color before 1940?

So…

What changed?

Well, let me start with what didn't change: men.

Fundamentally, we're the same as we were 50 years ago, 100 years ago, even 1,000 years ago.

Evolution doesn't happen that fast.

The only thing that changed was our culture: the movies we watch, the advertisements we see, and the things we're told as children.

And those influences didn't change because of divine intervention by a masculine god that is progressing us ever closer to our cosmic mojo.

Our definition of manliness changed for one reason and one reason only: because time passed and time changes things.

But what does that mean for your gusto?

What does believing that manliness is relative do to your… well, manliness?

It makes you less of a wimp.

Let me explain.

Why YOU are manlier than your biggest-bearded friends

You can't rely on your culture to define manliness (it's just a result of macro-influences), you can't rely on John Wayne, and you definitely can't rely on your annoying "friend" who thinks he's better (manlier) than you.

So how the hell're you supposed to become more manly…

…if manliness is relative!

Here's the good news: Biologically, you're a man.

You happened to have enough Y and X chromosomes (one of each) for the doctor to say "It's a boy!" when he pulled you from your mama's no-no square.

And since you're a boy, shouldn't you get a say in what defines "masculinity"?

It wouldn't, after all, be fair to define a Springer Spaniels' traits before closely observing (or asking, if we could) several dogs of that breed.

And it isn't fair to define who you are without first consulting… well, you!

And even if you are different than the majority of men (shorter, fatter, uglier, louder, flamboyant-er, etc), the way that you act/look/think is masculine by definition…

…because you're a man!

The sooner you accept that—that who you are right now (who you really are) is the manliest and most attractive version of yourself—the sooner that you're going to find your confidence…

…that you're going to intimidate other men without trying…

…that you're going to attract other women without even looking their way…

…that you're going to be the pleasant spectacle of every party.

How do I know?

Because these confident men already exist, and you can't help but stare.

The least manly thing you can do...

You've seen them.

At the party, they're like a magnet. They're funny, interesting, confident. They strike curiosity into the mind of everyone around them.

At work, they perform better than you without even trying. They sell better, get more raises, and talk with co-workers like family.

They're not everywhere, but they do exist.

And every time you see them, you can't help but watch them with a benign curiosity.

Why are they so confident in who they are? Why are they so happy and careless?

The answer is simple and a bit too touchy-feely for your taste.

They've accepted themselves for who they are, as they are—perceived flaws included.

And by so doing, they've found courage. They don't need to prove anything to anyone. They don't need to drink liquor straight or grow a big beard to become manly. They could be short, tall, fat, or skinny. It doesn't much matter. What matters is their presence—their confidence and kindness.

What's the least manly thing you can do? Change who you are to please other people (sub-miss-ive).

Point is, when you know who you are, when you accept who you are, you're more attractive. You're more manly. And you're far more interesting.

Want to be manly?

Embrace your worst qualities.

Ready to make your worst qualities manly?

You could try drinking whisky straight.

You could try buying more guns.

You could even try the Gentlemen's club.

Hell, you might even enjoy some of those things and feel manlier afterwards (I know I sometimes do).

But if that's not who you are naturally, that feeling is fleeting. A mask. A facade. Something you wear around friends, but take off around family. It's not who you really are. And that's why you're still lacking confidence.

You see, the answer isn't to try on more masculine stereotypes to see which fits, but to accept that who you are and what you choose to do is masculine by definition (you're a man, aren't you?).

Once you accept that, you'll be un-ignorable at the parties, girls will find you more attractive, your spouse will want more sex, and other guys will look at you, wondering, Why is he so much more confident than me?

You will have found your confidence. And nothing is more "manly" than confidence in who you are, as you are.

Men committing suicide: A response to Louise Perry

John Davis · 14 August 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Louise Perry has written a controversial article for Quillette titled, "Time to Stop Using Suicide for Political Point-Scoring." Ms. Perry's article is about men committing suicide. Her conclusion is that men, and men's Rights Activists (MRAs), are using the gender suicide gap as a means of scoring political points against feminists and feminism (as opposed to being a genuine effort to solve the problem of the gender suicide gap). Ms. Perry implies that men are at fault for the gender suicide gap and men committing suicide. Her article is premised on almost every fiction and myth about male suicide that is currently in fashion among intersectional feminists (for example, gynocentric readings of data, the attribution of toxic masculinity, dismissals of misandrist affect). My article addresses those myths with some information about the realities of the gender suicide gap and realities about men committing suicide.

Let's start with Ms. Perry's assertion that men commit suicide at about twice the rate of women worldwide. That statistic understates the problem. The worldwide gender suicide gap is about 3.2 to 1, with men committing suicide more than women. In some developed countries (such as the U.S. and India) the gap is closer to 4:1. In younger groups, such as in the U.S. in the age group 15-24, the gender suicide gap is over 6:1.

[image]

Young men committing suicide worsens the problem because when a young man commits suicide, it exacerbates the gender suicide gap. Young men committing suicide means that many more years of men's lives are lost in the gender suicide gap than if older men commit suicide.

[image]

The complete toll on men, as a gender, from young men committing suicide, is incalculable.

Ms. Perry presents a myth that the gender suicide gap is caused by men's toxic masculinity keeping them from discussing their feelings. This is a thinly disguised victim-blaming tactic. Ms. Perry suggests that if men engage in "cuddling groups" with other men, then, they will overcome their toxic masculinity, become less-defective men, and cure their depression and suicide by "talking about their emotions." Science presents us with a different reality. We know from extensive studies, that men's biological DNA markers respond in the exact opposite manner as women to major depressive disorder. Men do not respond to talk therapy as women respond to it. Men require a special kind of intervention known as situational distress therapy. Notwithstanding massive amounts of money expended for women's health, not one penny has been allocated by any governments, or institutions, to study the special types of therapy necessary for men with clinical depression.

Ms. Perry then goes on the accuse MRAs of being extreme by suggesting that the gender suicide gap is due to "persecution of men by feminists and their allies." This belief by MRAs is hardly extreme. It is well grounded in analysis of Western laws, and, Western institutions. If we analyze raw data regarding male suicides, we can infer some general conclusions from the data.

[image]

These data show that the gender gap in suicide is constant throughout men's lives, and that men are more at risk for suicide than women throughout their entire lifetimes. What this graph also demonstrates is that the gender suicide gap widens when men are forced into contact with our misandrist and male-oppressive institutions (such as education, the workplace, the military and, in old age especially, our medical institutions).

The next myth Ms. Perry advances is that women attempt suicide more often than men. In Ms. Perry's words: "This isn't intended as a 'gotcha' to the anti-feminists. Well, it is a bit I suppose—I am tired of hearing people bang on about suicide statistics when they're ignorant of the facts." Ms. Perry's accusation that MRAs are ignorant is ironic. Her information comes from one study in Germany in which the authors (with amazing confirmation bias) concluded that women reporting to physicians in emergency rooms that they had suicidal ideation meant that women attempted suicide more often than men. The source of this myth appears to be a study (Hegerl et al., 2009) completed in Europe, and, analyzed by the Psychiatry Department of the University of Leipzig.

The data collection on the study was very good to excellent. Consequently, the data is sound. However, like much of feminist advocacy research, the article draws some specious and spurious conclusions regarding the rate at which "women" as a gender, attempt suicide. It is clear from the analysis in the report that the authors intended, when they set out to write the article, to conclude that although men are more likely to engage fatal suicide methods, women (as a gender) are three times more likely to attempt suicide, therefore, women represent the most victims of clinical depression and suicidal ideation. The actual data do not support those conclusions.

First, the data counted suicide attempts by the same woman more than once. If a woman attempted suicide 6 times, unsuccessfully, the researchers counted that as 6 suicide attempts by women. Women tend to use equally lethal means of killing themselves, such as drug overdoses, the same as men. There is, however, a high probability that a person who ingests a drug overdose will be discovered before they die, and, given treatment, or, that they will change their minds and seek treatment. Men tend to use less tentative means. In the U.S. they use firearms (which may be an indication that men suffer much more seriously than women when they form suicidal ideation). In Europe men are most likely to hang themselves which is almost as irrevocable as the use of a firearm. (The studies prove that the means of committing suicide being available have no effect on the rate of suicide.) Since women choose revocable methods of suicide, it should be obvious that they will survive suicide attempts. If they survive suicide attempts, then, the same women are making the suicide attempts over time, instead of more women attempting suicide than men.

Second, the data are confused and non-homogenous. In some cases, the data collected were not how many actual suicide attempts were made (the data from emergency rooms accurately shows actual number of suicide attempts when the victim seeks treatment). Some of the data sources for women, however, were not SSAs (Serious Suicide Attempts); they were merely reports to physicians that the woman had attempted suicide, rather than an actual documented event of suicide (such as we would receive from emergency rooms).

Having recited stereotyped myths about men committing suicide, Ms. Perry concludes her article with a litany of gender stereotypes, about men, that firmly affixes the blame for male suicide on the victims. Addressing all of Ms. Perry's false stereotypes about men is beyond the scope of this response. However, we can point out some important considerations that Ms. Perry carefully avoided in her article.

Recent conclusive studies (Stemple, Flores, & Meyer, 2017, for example) show that men are victims of women's sexual assault at about the same rate as the other way around. Intersectional feminists, such as Ms. Perry, vehemently deny these realities. Feminist researchers (Dario & O'Neal, 2018; Elliott, 1994), however, have conclusively demonstrated that men suffer from sexual victimization from female perpetrators as much, or more, than women suffer from male perpetrators. We live in a "culture of denial regarding the prevalence of women perpetrating sex crimes against men," in the words of feminist researcher Dr. Miriam S. Denov (2004). This denial covers up one of the most serious factors pushing men to suicide, and which drives the gender suicide gap. Men are very vulnerable (especially as boys and young men) to sexual crimes perpetrated against them by women and girls. The sexual assault of boys and men has a delayed effect. As the male victim matures, the sexual assault has interfered with his neurological development and the development of his psycho-sexual skills. This interference results in the boy, as a man, being socially isolated and subject to major depressive disorder. It is also important to note that research (Seney et al., 2018) proves that clinical depression in men biologically compels them to sexual dysfunction and substance abuse.

Putting all political points aside, if we are going to address seriously and professionally the gender suicide gap (instead of blaming men as the victims), then we need to use reliable, unbiased measures to assess data, such examining what comprises one's "overall life satisfaction" (Stoet & Geary, 2019). In addition, we should take the following seven steps to curtail male suicide:

That woman in Cyprus is Freya Heath

Anonymous Contributor · 15 August 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Freya Heath Arrested for Falsely Accusing 12 Israeli Teenagers of Raping Her

The English version of the Israeli Internet newspaper Ynet first reported the story of events in Cyprus when a woman, now identified as Freya Heath (despite media attempts to conceal her identity), reported to police that she had been violently raped by a gang of young Israeli men. However, Ynet now confirms that it was Heath who allegedly committed a large array of sexual offenses — including the solicitation of minors to engage in sex with her by offering alcohol. She also reportedly solicited other adults to commit acts of violence against the teens in retribution for a sexual assault that never happened.

Why? Because one of the teens rejected her sexually.

Freya Heath

Heath confessed that she went to the teen's room and she meant to have sex with them.[16] During the act one of the minors (who presumably rented the apartment) reportedly came into the room. According to the young men, she offered him sex with her as well. That minor claims he declined the offer and she was so offended and hurt by the rejection that she decided to file a false rape claim. Heath allegedly filed the false accusations even against young men she had never met, not just the ones who had consensual sex or declined her offer.

This was confirmed by the teen's lawyer, who also claims that Heath's initial testimony contradicts her other versions of events that she gave police. Regarding the accusation concerning a leaked video of the consensual encounter, the lawyer explained that the woman also never claimed during her testimony that she refused the videos to be taken. In fact, the videos appear to show a consensual sexual encounter.

Heath's illicit conduct has been all but overlooked and ignored by the media, which continues to portray her as the victim and the boys as offenders. Offenses she has allegedly committed include:

1. At least 4 accounts of sex with a minor (age of consent in Cyprus is 17)
2. Solicitation of minors (to engage in sexual activity)
3. Solicitation of minors (to engage in alcohol consumption)
4. Solicitation of a minor (regarding violation of law)
5. Fraud
6. False complaint
7. Giving false testimony
8. Interference with public order
9. Causing public mischief

And now the chain of events, step by step:

18 July

Israeli media reported that twelve Israeli youths were arrested in Ayia Napa, Cyprus on suspicion of raping a British tourist. The alleged rape[image] took place the night before and it supposedly occurred in a hotel room. According to her testimony, Heath said she had sex with one of the Israeli boys who would later turn out to be the prime suspect. She also claimed it was not the only encounter and was preceded by several others.

According to the original version, the incident on the night of 17 July was different from her earlier sexual encounters and the main suspect violently raped her. She claimed that he ignored her crying and invited 11 other friends to participate in raping her.[3,4,5] She claimed that two boys held her by force and raped her. Some wore condoms and some not, she alleged. It was then that she recognized 12 faces. That was the version she gave to Daily Mail. She said the rape was brutal; that it went on for over an hour and she claims she was released only after she collapsed[1,9]. She claimed that she escaped from the room and told two of her girlfriends that she had undergone a gang rape.[13]

Heath also spread the story that she was raped among other British tourists. This reportedly prompted a mob to form, to attack and brutalize the accused young men. Heath claimed to have stayed in the hotel medical clinic until police arrived. Police then took her to the hospital where she underwent a rape test.[3] On the same day, it was reported that nine of the boys denied any connection to her, and the remaining three claimed that they had consensual sex with her. One man claimed to have had full sex and the other two sexual acts.[6]

An attorney for the accused teens said they had been beaten by investigators that day to make them incriminate each other and that he had videos supporting the boy's version.[7] They were detained in separate locations between Larnaca and Nicosia, and DNA samples were taken from them.[2]

20 July

It was reported that a friend of Heaths' had told the head of the investigative team that she had "previously complained about being gang raped and received financial compensation". She stated that Heath was working in Cyprus as a stripper. This is the first evidence that she wasn't a "tourist".[10]

24 July

The girlfriend of one of the accused men, Yonah Golub, said that as soon as he was arrested she provided the police with an alibi, showing a selfie they took in bed in another hotel at the time of the alleged attack. "When he was in my room, I went down to buy us a drink, something sweet. I asked him what kind of drink he wanted. I showed them that he was in the room at that moment because the key was not on me."[11,12]

25 July

Police reported that they recovered videos from the boys' smartphones and that three other teenagers gave a consistent statements that they were staying outside the hotel room where the alleged rape occurred and were not allowed to enter it except with Heath's permission (after being solicited by her to engage in the orgy). Apparently one of the boys who was out, or another one wanting to return to his room, refused to have sex with her, a rejection which reportedly caused her to become very angry.

27 July

A drastically different picture began to emerge which was different from the initial one: Heath was neither a tourist nor a stripper but worked as a hotel hostess. The DNA findings showed three signatures that did not belong to any of the twelve arrested boys, indicating that she had sex with three other men just prior to the alleged gang rape. Several more of the accused men presented alibis. Of the twelve juveniles identified on 18 July as her rapists, it has become clear that some were never in room where the alleged rape occurred. Some of the boys didn't even know each other. The accused young men came to Cyprus in three different groups.

One of the accused, Yonah Golub, was with his girlfriend in Luna Park and McDonald's and then returned to their room where they took a selfie in bed.[5] He photographed himself with his girlfriend in their bedroom, later napping at the time of the alleged rape. He woke up when police officers broke through the door of his room. Golub insists he did not know the woman who claims he raped her.[15]

28 July

It was reported that the last of the suspects were cleared of suspicion and released, while Heath was arrested after confessing that she had invented the rape story. "There was no rape," the Cyprus police said. According to her confession, sexual relations did not only occur with her consent, she, in fact, initiated them. Moreover, she stated that they did not stop because the sexual encounter was being filmed but because another boy entered the room. It was apparently the young man who was offered sex and refused it. When it happened, the British woman was so offended and angry that she took revenge by falsely accusing 12 men.

The media has falsely served the narrative that the boy had thrown her out of the room in a degrading manner, causing her to file the false accusation. Yet, the statements above refuted the fake news reports and revealed the true nature of the event.[1,8,16] An abundance of evidence helped police get the confession out: according to the CCTV, she left the room fully dressed, the rape test found three other men's DNA who were not among the 12 Israelis she was accusing, and the videos recovered from the cell phones showed her having consensual sex — no signs of resistance. Fully sober.

29 July

Finally, the news came out that the real reason for the false accusation was not the one young man ejecting Heath from the room but that one of the boys refused to have sex with her. She was told no, and accused 12 men of rape.[16]

The story of the video distribution is probably more fake news, invented by the media: the videos were most probably leaked – the question is only by whom.

Let's start with some facts and details in this regard and repeat some of them:

[image]On July 18, 12 Israeli youths were arrested in Ayia Napa on suspicion of raping Freya Heath. Various media reports in Cyprus have claimed that before they were arrested, there was an attempt to lynch them. They were reportedly beaten by many British tourists and were hiding in their rooms after the false accusation was spread around. Some of the boys were reportedly injured and one of them said his nose was broken. This was the situation in which the police arrested them. Already on the same day, the boys' lawyer claimed that he had videos supporting their version of events. This is a critical detail as the lawyer meets with detainees after the arrest and receives all information and materials from the police. This details inform us that a short time from filling the accusation, and the arrest itself, the videos were in the hands of the police and provided to their lawyer.

On 25 July, the Cypriot police reported recovering the videos from the boys' smartphones. The boy's phones had been confiscated by the Cypriot police at the time of the arrest and later handed to their lawyer. This chain of events clearly demonstrates that the arrested boys couldn't have spread the videos. They simply did not have enough time for this. Thus, previous allegations that they were leaked by the boys are demonstrably false. As the boy's lawyers said: "The videos were unfortunately distributed even before the boys' were released"[17] or as a preventive measure to protect themselves from false accusation.

A bit of a giggle

Mark Dent · 16 August 2019 · Archived copy · Original

I've always been confused by the mixed messages I have received on the subject of female sexuality. From an early age the standard observation was that women had very little interest in sex and even less interest in the naked male body.

Whereas we males react instantly to sexual stimuli in the form of naked or even semi naked women, females regard the penis as an object of amusement, something rather inconsequential other than for a laugh when having drinks with their friends.

The idea that women lusted after men or felt the slightest tingle in their nether regions when they observed a youthful, muscular man in his prime digging trenches in their backyard or chopping wood on a burning hot summer's day was as ridiculous a notion as suggesting the moon landing was faked.

But my anecdotal observations seemed to suggest something different.

[image]

As a young boy I remember the public interest when male celebrities posed naked for women's magazines. The magazines flew off the shelves.

I heard the oohs and aaghs from the female spectators when a male player removed his sweat soaked shirt during the break as he sat courtside.

I saw women flinging their underwear on to the stage as Tom Jones belted out one of his iconic songs.

I heard the electric screams of thousands of young women as Elvis shook his pelvis or the Beatles simply walked on stage.

As I grew, I continued to be informed that this was all tongue in cheek fun and in no way indicative of women's interest in or desire for the male body.

I remembered reading a book on the Beatles and the extraordinary lengths women went to in order to sleep with any of the fab four.

I saw endless footage of young women in a mindless frenzy when they actually had an opportunity to be close enough to actually see these men let alone touch them.

What was this behavior other than clear proof that girls and women do indeed experience sexual lust and a desire to have it satisfied?

A couple of decades ago, Hen's Nights became very popular. The term is simply a descriptor for a night when a woman on the cusp of marriage goes out with her girlfriends for one last wild night before matrimony reigns her in.

Let's just have a closer look at this paragraph which I have copied from a page promoting Puppetry of the Penis for private Hen's parties.

We have been operating private parties in Victoria since 2005. It is a great alternative for hens nights. There is of course male nudity but it is a non sexual comedy show with lots of laughs. The mums and the nanas love the show too. We have proudly been a part of over 3,000 hens parties since we began offering this service.

The woman who owns the business assures her readers and prospective clients that there is of course, male nudity, but it is a non- sexual comedy show with lots of laughs. Why even mums and nanas love the show so it can't be remotely sexual. They have had three thousand such parties to this point in time and the sky appears to be the limit. That's a lot of women keen for a bit of a giggle with the girls!

Imagine promoting a Buck's (Stag) night with the same comment explaining how dads and grandpas have a great time viewing the naked women as they play with their breasts so it's clearly all a bit of a laugh!

I know just the reaction such a claim would bring.

Dirty old men

Why bother to have naked men demonstrating origami with their penises at all if it is all about comedy and having a good laugh? Why don't the girls hire a comedian if it's laughs, they are after? It is truly disingenuous to deny that part of the allure of this entertainment is the nakedness of the men and perhaps the size of their dicks.

Women attending male stripper shows proffer the same standard explanation for their choice of entertainment-it's a bit of a laugh and a fun night out.

[image]

I can think of countless ways these women could have a fun evening out without any danger of encountering even one exposed penis all night.

These evenings are generally accompanied with penis shaped straws, penis toys, vibrators and dildos and any other type of phallic symbol you care to think of.

But it's not what you think. No really-it's not. It's all a bit of a lark and a giggle. Do you actually think we like looking at penises and naked men?

Paleeese!

This would be accompanied by a headshake and eyeroll just to emphasize the sheer insanity of such a suggestion.

If women were honest about their more hidden motivations about attending male stripper nights it wouldn't bother me. What's good for the goose is good for the gander. But it is the constant downplaying of the sexual stimulation and pleasure it may bring with the pretense that it's all about having a bit of fun, which grates. Perhaps male suggestions that they purchased Playboy magazines for the articles drew a similar response from women but that comment was usually a self-deprecating dig by men at themselves.

I think this "it's all a bit of a laugh" routine has worn thin over the years. I think it has provided women with the perfect camouflage for their natural interest in naked men and their genitals.

Nurses and teachers alike have oft used the, "Oh it's nothing I haven't seen before" line, always accompanied by an eye roll or look of concentrated disinterest just to underline how boring the very idea of her having to see you naked really is. In fact, it was probably the very last thing she ever wanted to contemplate-possibly even more distasteful than a forced enema.

I still remember a boy around nine or ten coming to the staffroom and telling me in tears that he had been hit in the testicles. I took him to the first aid room and told him to lie down on the bed and have a rest. A female teacher had accompanied me and asked him to pull down his pants. She actually touched his testicles and then told him he would be alright. She made a comment along the lines of, "I'm a mum and I've seen it all"-nothing to see here.

This was back in 1985 but I still recall being stunned by the presumption of the woman. I was not willing to touch him as a fellow male yet she felt no compunction in doing it.

I am not suggesting she got any kind of sexual gratification from her action but that is the point isn't it? I don't know and never will. She was protected from any hint of a suggestion that what she did was in any way inappropriate and I think most women know this even if it isn't a conscious thought. She was a woman. She was a mum. If I had even mentioned the incident to another teacher, they would have shrugged their shoulders and moved on. What do you imagine would have happened had I inspected a girl's vagina after she claimed it was hurting?

One female teacher used to ask the grade six boys (aged 11 or 12) to tense their biceps and she would feel them and stroke them just long enough to make me very uncomfortable before announcing who had the biggest biceps.

Another female teacher of preps (five-year olds) often regaled her associates with witty jokes about the little boys who played with themselves unconsciously and her favourite line for boys who asked to go to the toilet at an inopportune time was:

"Tie a knot in it!"

Female teachers routinely entered the inner sanctum of the boys changeroom when we took the kids to their swimming lessons. No male even thought about entering the girls' changeroom. If we had, the outcome could well have been catastrophic.

This same double standard is in play in the wider world of professional sport. Female journalists are free to wander about the men's changerooms but male journalists are nowhere to be seen in sportswomen's changerooms while women are in a state of undress.

Here's a comment from Robin Herman, the first female journalist allowed access to the male changerooms.

'One afternoon, taking a shortcut to catch a visiting team's practice, I accidentally walked in on a small group of athletes, long after practice and the dressing room had closed to reporters. They were in, er, full bloom, comparing the size of their equipment.

We were all embarrassed for a moment, and I quickly carried on. The next day, we shrugged it off and everything was normal. You know, for the dressing room.'

Again, I ask you, imagine if this same incident involved a male journalist and a group of female volleyball players.

I was just taking a shortcut…honest to God!

This is one of the reasons why our legal system has been so lenient and forgiving when it comes to alleged sexual misbehavior by females. Men can simply not believe that women are actually interested in sex or aroused by the power they hold over those who are under their control. Most of them had been raised on a steady diet of the same guff I was force fed for the first twenty or so years of my life.

One judge did treat a female sex offender with the severity her crime deserved and the defendant expressed her dismay.

"Ronk received the punishment with shock, expecting a lower sentence (the range of punishment was zero to fifteen years), to which Judge Grant replied: "[i]f this was a male teacher who had been involved with a 15-year-old female, there would be people here hanging from the ceiling trying to get every drop of blood . . . [b]ut because it is a woman, there seems to be a winking about what happened"

The article (linked above) mentions the fact that female judges mete out harsher penalties for female perpetrators than male judges. This comes as no surprise to us.

Perhaps there was and still is a sense of acute discomfort at the thought of women being sexual predators or abusers. Mothers, aunties, sisters capable of sexual abuse or sexual sadism? Unthinkable. Impossible.

I have heard survivors of abuse at the hands of their mothers express the same sentiment. So deeply ingrained is our society's beatification of women and motherhood in particular, that even boys abused by their mums felt it was the ultimate shame and something they could never speak of as the backlash or disbelief from the broader society would be shocking.

Fathers raping and abusing their kids? Of course, they're a dime a dozen according to all "reliable" sources, particularly Hollywood movies. Mothers? How dare you speak such an abominable lie?

"Sexual assault specialist Holly Richmond PhD, believes our society has trouble seeing women as sexual predators "because…we can't even see them as sexual beings other than how they have been defined by the traditional male gaze." She continued, "Women can be sexy, but when it comes to female pleasure for it's own sake (not her partner's) and for her own sexual self-efficacy, we tend to take that much less seriously. To give a female sexual predator that much sexual power is culturally antithetical to what we've been taught."

Given these assumptions, Stemple told me, "Women who perpetrate sexual abuse are more likely to be portrayed as misguided than predatory."

It has only been through the advent of social media that the truth about women's capacity for sexual abuse and sexually predatory behavior has become known. There are countless examples of this hitherto hidden problem to be found with a quick Google search. Hundreds of women have raped and sexually abused the boys in their care. But this, I believe is the tip of the iceberg, as the shame involved in saying your mum sexually abused you is so deep to this day, that this crime is seriously underreported.

If women still struggle to speak of abuse by their father in a culture which drowns us in the idea of male sexual deviancy how much harder is it for a young man to speak of his abuse at the hands of his mother?

Another aspect of this rarely talked about predatory sexual behavior can be found in the seedy world of groupies.

This is an issue which has always caused me deep consternation. From an early age I witnessed girls becoming unhinged whenever a celebrity, however minor, was in their general vicinity. I didn't initially link the hysteria with sexual arousal but what else could explain such out of control behavior? Why did they tear at the clothes and hair of the Beatles? Some suggest many girls lost control of their bladders at Beatle concerts such was the power of the spell the Liverpudlians cast over them.

Is this the behavior of people who enjoy listening to a group's music?

I always felt resentment whenever I read yet another article demanding young men take control of their sexual urges and misbehavior. Girls were always presented as innocent victims of lecherous boys.

Female groupies (do male groupies exist?) were just another aspect of female sexual behavior to be laughed about and minimized. If anything, it was the men who were culpable for playing upon the emotions of these young innocents.

An article about groupies in the Australian football community made for fascinating reading.

These women made a hobby of casting the erections of rock and roll legends they encountered.

It begins,

'THEY'VE always hovered behind the scenes, where cameras don't film and mates don't talk.

Splashed in perfume and fake tan, they totter in high heels and short skirts, to prowl bars and nightclubs for their latest targets, and to beg introductions to future marks.'

This immediately establishes the fact that it is the women who are on the prowl, looking for a likely notch on their belt.

'They are the young women who offer themselves to AFL players. When a player reciprocates interest, they will slip away with him in the night, for a forbidden embrace or grope – usually with no strings attached.

Yet Wayne Carey, (an ex-champion of our local game) in last year's confessional, The Truth Hurts, referred to such female attention as a "fringe benefit".

There was never a shortage of women, he wrote. Commonly known as "groupies", Carey called them "star f—ers".

"If your eyes met with theirs more than two or three times in a short space of time, then you knew she might be interested," Carey wrote.

"It was almost like a game . . . they were almost predatory at times in the way they hunted down their prey. I've had complete strangers come up and say to me and say, 'I want to f— you tonight'."

What has always staggered me is the AFL's endless lecturing to and about the young men who play our game when it comes to sexual misadventures, without them ever even mentioning (in public) the fact that one of the greatest dangers they face is the very predatory women featured in this revealing article. It is as if the very idea of women being held to account for their stalking and ruthless desire to bed these players because they have celebrity status is a taboo subject in most corridors of power and media platforms.

'Carey's assertions are backed by a woman who went public last year with claims she'd slept with up to 200 AFL players.

Now 32, she rationalises a sexual past, in a playful tone, that upends conventional measures of morality – if men can claim "notches on the belt", she says, why can't women? "I was an easy get," she says. "And I wouldn't take any of it back."

A former AFL player tells the Herald Sun about nightclub liaisons and random encounters. He says women deceived their boyfriends to be with him.

Sometimes, he didn't even need to be awake to partner up. There were 15 or so times when he was roused in his bed to discover a naked female squirming beside him.

"I'd flick on the light and say 'Who are you'?" he says.

"I'd look at them and if I liked what I saw I'd go through with the action. If I didn't, I'd say I want to sleep."

There were the strangers who demanded immediate physical congress.

Their faces are hazy. Their names? No idea.

Six hundred women in all – give or take 100. Or so he thinks. He can't be certain."

Just think about the reaction were men stripping naked and climbing into bed with a female celebrity without her knowledge or permission.

'The AFL has distanced itself from the controversy. But all players are drilled in women's issues through "respect and responsibility" sessions.

Educator Lea Trafford once counselled players, through AFL Players' Association programs, on strategies to negotiate sexual advances of women. Her curriculum, entitled "Risky Business", canvassed celebrity pitfalls.

It covered unexpected scenarios, such as claims from the US that women saved condoms after sex with sport stars to use the sperm for fertilisation.

She speaks of some AFL players as country kids bathed in sudden fame, who were pampered like "prized greyhounds".

Trafford recalls an ex-girlfriend who had a one-night stand with an AFL player to get pregnant.

"We know it is a badge of honour for women to be going out with a footballer," she says.

"We know it is also a badge of honour if you have a baby with a footballer, even if you don't end up with him."

Why is this behavior-so common amongst women in the presence of celebrities or men of status, such an invisible phenomenon?

If written or spoken about at all it is almost always with the sly 'wink and a smirk' tone rather than a calling out of female impropriety, or demanding women begin showing respect to men rather than seeing them as a potential notch on their belt.

I've always felt there was something slightly more honourable about a man wanting to have sex with a woman he finds sexually appealing as opposed to a woman hunting down a man, however repulsive, because his money or status is sexually arousing.

A case in point is the less than attractive AFL player mentioned in the same article.

"On end-of-season trips, the player, who wasn't handsome, failed to attract interest, year after year, despite great effort.

No one knew him overseas. "Yet he always picked up girls in Melbourne. He was famous here, in demand, simply because he was a footballer."

It may well be the result of an inbuilt evolutionary trait that sees some women desiring men for their fame and status but that doesn't make it any less ugly.

I would be delighted if our schools began programs in which they taught girls to resist their predisposition to seek out sex with young men based upon their fame, wealth or exceptional skills in any given sport or field of endeavor.

They need to learn to respect young men for who they are, not what they do or have.

A man can dream, can't he?

Announcing the International Conference on Men's Issues 2020 – Sydney, Australia

Robert Brockway · 19 August 2019 · Archived copy · Original

As was recently announced at ICMI19 the location for the International Conference on Men's Issues 2020 (ICMI20) will be Sydney, Australia. As many will remember ICMI17 was held on the Gold Coast, Australia. Rather than the sunny beaches of the Gold Coast, this time we'll be heading for the city by the harbour. The exact dates are yet to be settled but we expect the conference to be held in June or July. This is during the mild Australian winter.

Please join us Down Under again for another fantastic conference with local and overseas speakers. Watch this space for early bird tickets and speaker announcements.

Wiki4Men will also be kept up to date on planning for ICMI20.

ICMI20 is being organised by the Australian Men's Rights Association Inc.

Reforming chivalry – Criminal justice & rehabilitation

Elizabeth Hobson · 21 August 2019 · Archived copy · Original

I love the United States of America fervently. I love Western Values – or, as Daniel Hannan (a British Conservative MEP) put it, less politely, in his book How We Invented Freedom and Why It Matters, "the characteristic features of the Anglo-American political system" (which, of course have been adopted more widely, especially after 1945 and again after 1989). With Western – or Anglo-American – values, I include such features as: habeas corpus, equality before the law and jury trials, which will be particularly pertinent to what I want to talk about today. These are features that found their purest and most beautiful literary and legal expression in the U.S. Constitution.

Please excuse my Britsplaining but – the Constitution is not a document that resulted from abstract, theoretical ruminations on what a good society would look like – The Constitution was the heroic response of the founders of this nation to escaping from a tyrannical state. They enshrined due process and fair treatment under the law (in Amendments V-VIII and XIV of The Bill of Rights) because they knew what life was like without those things, both from their collective memory of capricious governance in Britain and as British subjects in America. Their rejection of arbitrary detention and cruel and unusual punishments and their insistence on due process were truly progressive. My call today is to honour them and embrace their progressive spirit in our approaches to criminal justice both in the U.S. and the U.K. This is a men's issue with men accounting for 90-95% of the prison population and because I have faith in the Men's Human Rights Movement, as a progressive movement in the most beautiful possible way, to heed what I have to say.

At this point, you may be wondering why I've referred to 'chivalry' in my title? I have three reasons: firstly, it's click bait; secondly, I have a penchant for going back as far as I can in history for its own sake; and thirdly, it has some, tenuous, relevance:

The commonly accepted era of chivalry encompassed several centuries and an entire continent. There was never a single chivalric code that all knights abided by – but, rather countless rules and injunctions laid out in separate codes by authorities ranging from dukes to bishops and even poets. Chivalry is commonly seen as going through three ages:

Chivalry – 1.0 – from late 10th C: centred around warrior ethics, fair fighting and loyalty to comrades and lords. Knights were instructed not to be devious or underhanded in combat and to aim take opponent's hostage rather than to take life. They were not to refuse a challenge from an equal but also not to fight for pecuniary reward. Faith and piety were central tenets of chivalry throughout the deeply Christianised medieval Europe of the Middle Ages and furthermore many chivalric codes, particularly those established by bishops funnily enough, included particular directions to treat the men and property of the church with respect.

Chivalry 2.0 – from middle 11th C: knighthood went from being a preserve of low-class men to being associated with a landed social elite, as well as a martial one, so chivalric codes came to include instructions to be just and fair in relation to common citizenry. Bishop Warinus of Beauvais, for example, wanted knights to swear against mistreating male and female villagers, sergeants, merchants, and pilgrims. The abuse he cited included robbery, whipping, physical attacks, extortion, and kidnapping for ransom. He also forbade plundering and stealing from the poor, even "at the perfidious instigation" of a local lord. Bishop Warinus did specify in his oath that knights should not attack noblewomen travelling alone, nuns and widows… Unless he "should find them committing misdeeds against" him! Knights, though, were to protect the weak and defenceless and to fight for the welfare of all, according to The Song of Rowland. The Duke of Burgundy listed 12 indispensable knightly virtues as follows:

- Faith
- Charity
- Justice
- Sagacity

- Prudence
- Temperance
- Resolution
- Truth
- Liberality
- Diligence
- Hope
- Valour

Chivalry 3.0 – In the late middle-ages, queen consort of France and England, Eleanor of Aquitaine spearheaded a movement within her court to subvert the chivalric code to regulate the behaviour of men towards women. These women initiated a system of romantic feudalism which saw first noblemen and later men in general, as a class, subject to irresistible pressure to defer to women and subjugate themselves to women's needs and wants on a hitherto unprecedented level.

I'd like to add two more ages:

Chivalry 4.0 – the modern chivalry that has developed since the middle ages is entirely focused on gender relations. What makes chivalry different now to Chivalry 3.0 is that 3.0, for all of its absurdity and the injustices perpetrated in its name, it was instigated in a period of time wherein men and women each had privileges in different spheres. It was designed to capitalise on women's natural dominance in the private sphere. Now we have developed into societies wherein not only do women have equal rights but they are actually are privileged in the public (as well as the private) sphere. This makes chivalry today far more malevolent and immoral.

Chivalry 5.0 – I have just invented! It's based on ideas from chivalry 2.0, with the central principles concerning authorities treating citizens with justice, dignity and compassion.

I'd like to take this moment to thank you all for your patience with my tangent there! Now, we all want to make our communities safer and reduce offending, right?

The evidence is clear: for minor offences, community sentencing, fines and other alternatives (including early intervention and supervision) are often significantly more effective at reducing offending and reoffending than imprisonment. There is, unfortunately, no simple, cookie cutter answer to the question of precisely what intervention will work with any demographic to prevent crime – or further crime – but individuals who are treated with holistic approaches to reform their behaviour tend to show markedly improved outcomes to those who receive purely punitive sentences when they are convicted.

Where prison is necessary, to protect the public in the immediate future and for the term of the prison sentence as well as potentially deterring the offender and others from committing such crimes [although the deterrent effect is highly questionable], we must keep in mind the fact that nearly every prisoner will be released at some point. It's irrelevant how justified a certain punishment may be, we need to concentrate on policies that make our communities safer and reduce reoffending. In the words of Steven Pinker: "Criminal punishment… is not a mandate to implement cosmic justice but part of an incentive structure that discourages antisocial acts without causing more suffering than it deters. The reason the punishment should fit the crime, for example, is not to balance some mystical scale of justice but to ensure that a wrongdoer stops at a minor crime rather than escalating to a more harmful ones. Cruel punishments, whether or not they are in some sense "deserved", are no more effective at deterring harm than moderate but surer punishments, and they desensitise spectators and brutalize the society that implements them."

It's easy to feel animosity towards offenders who break the social rules that make our societies work and hurt their victims in various ways but actually, when their histories and circumstances are considered, I find it pretty difficult not to feel compassion towards them too.

According to the Prison Reform Trust's 2017 'Bromley Briefings Prison Factfile', in the U.K.:

24% of offenders were taken into care as a child, compared with 2% of the general population – they were 9 percentage points more likely to have experienced child abuse and 27 percentage points more likely to have seen violence in their childhood homes. 59% regularly played truant from school, as compared to 5% and 42% were expelled or excluded from school as compared to less than 1% of the general population. 47% had no qualifications – as compared to 15% of the general population.

68% were unemployed compared to 8%, with 13% never having had a job compared to 4%. 15% were homeless compared to 4%. They were far more likely to have suffered from all manner of mental illnesses (including addiction) and to have attempted suicide.

The Prison Reform Trust document did not include statistics for fatherlessness but government documents reveal that less than 50% of prisoners were raised in two parent households, compared to the national average of 85%. According to a 2012 Psychology Today piece, the figures for youths in American prisons could be as high as 85% fatherless.

Not only do these characteristics appeal to us to treat offenders humanely though, they suggest a definite potential for improving their lives and their behaviour. These people, as a rule, aren't simply bad, they're challenged by difficult issues and circumstances and that actually offers us opportunities to help them. Nearly every prisoner will be released: so, what do we do? Treat them harshly, ignore the root causes of their behaviour and hope we can intimidate them into scathing compliance with the law? Or treat them with dignity and humanity, attending to their needs and helping them to feel invested in societies that they may feel have neglected them in the past? One of these approaches appeals to our bloodlust for punishing those who commit crimes – and it can be taken as a given that it's utilised disproportionately against men who we judge so much less generously than women. The other approach is a rational response that demonstrably prevents crime and also happens to be cheaper, if decidedly more complicated.

No one method exists to prevent criminality but there are many options that can contribute to effectively reforming individuals or even inhibit the urge to criminal behaviours before they start. Upbringing is key and it's of paramount importance that our states take seriously their responsibilities as laid out in Article 16.3 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (which both the U.K. and U.S. are signed up to), which states that:

"The family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection by society and the State."

The Centre for Social Justice (which is nothing like what it sounds like) recommends that marriage should again be recognised in the U.K. tax system with a specific allowance for low and middle income married couples (their research showed that 78% of British adults agreed with this policy) and that a new Cabinet-level Ministerial brief for family policy supported by an Office for Family Policy with a budget and civil service team should be created. According to their research, 89% of adults say they would support public money being spent to strengthen families and for improving parenting, specifically for children growing up in poverty. 64% of the public regard fatherlessness as a 'serious' problem for society according to the same research.

The prisoner characteristics statistics indicate that they're right to think so, so we should be ensuring that fathers have equal rights to mothers, in legislation and practice, and that their children have the meaningful relationships with both of their parents that they deserve wherever possible. Offenders themselves benefit enormously from maintaining familial contact and the 2017 review by Lord Farmer, 'The Importance of Strengthening Family Ties' specifically regarding men in prison found that family support is critical for both wellbeing and reintegration. Meaningful contact can reduce reoffending by 39% – but, in our overcrowded prison system, prisoners are often shipped to the far ends of the country to fill free spaces and family members can find it difficult therefore to make the so important visits.

Skilled supervision (which can be used as an alternative to imprisonment or post-release) has been shown to reduce reoffending by up to 17 percentage points. Core correctional practices include offender managers consistently and clearly 'modelling' behaviours and attitudes that are anti-criminal; reinforcing desired behaviour and disapproval of undesirable behaviour; using natural opportunities to enhance problem solving; cognitive restructuring (helping people consider alternatives to their attitudes and beliefs); developing a warm, empathic and non-judgemental relationship and motivational interviewing.

Problems with addiction and mental health issues are of course a priority for many offenders – and it's generally wise to complete treatment courses in these areas before embarking on behavioural reform strategies.

Support from the Prisoners' Education Trust for educational courses or learning materials has been shown to reduce reoffending by a quarter. And employment can be of enormous benefit – particularly when it is stable, meaningful and provides a sense of mastery. Day release for occupational apprenticeship can be life changing, especially when coupled with careers opportunities when a prisoner is freed.

The U.K. has the highest rate of imprisonment in western Europe, despite the National Audit Office conclusion that there is no link between prison population and crime rates (international comparisons also show no consistent link between the two). The majority of prisoners have committed a non-violent offence and nearly half were sentenced to less than six months inside, despite the Ministry of Justice conclusion that short sentences are less effective at reducing reoffending than community sentences. The use of community sentences has more than halved over the last decade. The cost of a imprisoning an individual for a year in the U.K. is £35,000 versus £4000 for a community service sentence.

UK prisons are incredibly overcrowded and they are less safe than when records began, with higher rates of self harm, assaults (on inmates and staff) and deaths than ever before documented.

Nearly half of all adults are reconvicted of another offence within a year of leaving prison. This was understood by our previous justice secretary, David Gauke, and Conservative mayoral candidate, Shaun Bailey, who wrote about the problems with the punitive approach to minor offences in particular in The Times under the headline: 'Prison is a dead end for many offenders and we need to avoid it'. In this article (published this year), the pair claim that "when it comes to the length of prison sentences we are taking a more punitive approach than at any point during Margaret Thatcher's premiership" and describe "young, naive, petty criminals entering prison with a GCSE and leaving with a PhD in criminality." They call not for "hard" or "soft" – but "smart" justice. Their suggestion is that we do use more community sentences rather than prison – but that we toughen them up by ensuring enforcement and ease public anxiety by tagging offenders so they can be tracked.

David Gauke, however, spent most of his tenure seemingly creating a legacy not based on fair and effective policy but on pandering to feminist zealots for whom women representing a whole 5% of our prison population is the greatest issue our criminal justice system faces. Under his secretaryship, a landmark decision was taken to abandon plans to build new women's prisons and instead create community hubs with residential capacity and treatments and support available to help women change their lives. I'm gonna level with you: I'm conflicted on this policy. I think and hope it will work for sure but I veer between utterly outraged that the demographic chosen to benefit from this approach is the demographic already most privileged in the criminal justice system – and resigned to the pragmatic idea that, if we keep our fingers crossed, a successful trial with this policy with women may persuade the state to roll out the same to men. Prime Minister Boris Johnson's recent pledge of £2.5 billion for 10,000 new prison beds and the rumour that he will scrap David Gauke's plan to abolish sentences of 6 months or less for all but the most serious criminals puts this hope into question.

Our new justice secretary, Robert Buckland is a different kettle of fish. Appointed on 24th July 2019, he immediately backed a campaign by Sir Cliff Richard and Paul Gambaccini to ban the naming of those arrested on suspicion of rape and other sexual offences. Downing Street promptly made it clear that his comments did not represent government policy – but I feel encouraged by his attitude that looks like it could just be more pro-men than we've come to expect. But, his comment that "More and better prison places means less reoffending and a lower burden on the taxpayer" does suggest that he may not be the reformer that we need.

Research has found a significant increase in the likelihood that offenders will be sentenced to custodial sentences if they're from an ethnic minority rather than white – this is dwarfed though to the increased likelihood that offenders will be sentenced to a custodial sentence if they're men rather than women. Feminist campaigning has seen to it that female convicts are treated with compassion and that rehabilitation and preventing reoffending take precedence, as a general rule, over punishment – but the same humane and rational approach is still dragging behind, over a hundred years since the Enlightenment that Pinker refers to, when it comes to the treatment of male convicts.

According to William Collins, if men were treated as leniently in the criminal justice system as women are today, 5/6 men in prison would be free. Factors that explain this disparity, according to the Ministry of Justice, include: a greater percentage of convicted men being sentenced to prison, men being given longer sentences on average than women, women being paroled earlier than men (despite being more likely to be disciplined for bad behaviour whilst incarcerated) and women being more likely to have mitigating factors (such as age, dependents, lack of previous relevant convictions and the appearance of genuine remorse) applied to their sentences whereas men are more likely to have aggravating factors (such as presence of previous relevant convictions, the location of the offence, being a member of a group or gang and evidence of some degree of pre-planning or pre-meditation) applied to their sentences.

Women are somewhat less likely to reoffend after being convicted of a crime (18% as opposed to 26% of men) – but I firmly believe that the treatment they receive in the Criminal Justice System, as well as the more sympathetic attitude taken to them by society in general (which is displayed in media coverage of crimes), are critical factors in explaining this disparity.

The gender justice gap in the U.S. is, according to Professor Sonja Starr in 2012, six times as great as the racial justice gap with women siphoned out of the criminal justice system at every stage, ultimately ending up – if they do end up in prison – with 63% shorter sentences. Women account for 10% of prisoners in the U.S.

In 2015, Hilary Rodham Clinton said in a speech that: "It's a stark fact that the United States has less than 5 percent of the world's population, yet we have almost 25 percent of the world's total prison population. The numbers today are much higher than they were 30, 40 years ago despite the fact that crime is at historic lows." 2018 statistics showed that the U.S. prison rate per 100,00 people still dwarfs other nations – with Turkey in second place, locking up 287 people per 100,000 compared to the U.S.'s 655 per 100,000.

However, the most pro-male POTUS I never thought I'd see signed a bipartisan bill called The First Step Act last December. The bill reduced mandatory minimum sentences for some non-violent offences (especially drug offences) as well as giving judges more discretion and encouraging rehabilitation efforts – and ended the Clinton era three strikes rule under which anyone convicted of three serious offences was jailed for life. On June 13th, President Trump announced that the White House is advancing second chance hiring to help returning citizens transition back to society successfully by supporting their right to employment. The black demographic, which has been disproportionately affected by incarceration with black adults being six times as likely to be incarcerated as whites, will gain tremendously from this Administration's commitment to fixing broken areas in the U.S. justice system and expanding opportunity.

Following the passage of the First Step Act, blacks comprised over 90 percent of prisoners whose sentences were reduced because of resentencing provisions. The unemployment rate for former prisoners was nearly five times higher (at 27%) than the national average when the bill was signed. The Trump administration aims to cut the unemployment rate for returning citizens to single digits within five years. There's therefore currently an all-hands-on-deck effort across federal agencies, the private sector, states, and criminal justice reform organisations to help former inmates find opportunities and succeed in their jobs.

For example, the Department of Justice and Bureau of Prisons are launching an initiative to connect returning citizens with employers looking to hire them. The Department of Labor will give states $2 million for bonds that underwrite companies which hire workers with criminal backgrounds. Even federal jobs will no longer effectively be off limits as the Office of Personnel Management will make job listings on USAJOBS available to those in and released from prison. Another obstacle to working for former inmates is securing a license to practice a vocation or trade in their home state. Thankfully, occupational licensing reform effort across many states is underway to reduce or eliminate the onerous and costly requirements or scale back prohibitions for those with criminal backgrounds.

Globally, the War on Drugs costs more than $100 billion per annum in law enforcement, with one in five prisoners incarcerated for drug offences, 85% for possession only. In 2017, the U.S. sent over 450,000 people to prison for drug offences and today, there are more people behind bars for a drug offense than the number of people who were inside for any crime in 1980. This has resulted in 25% of incarcerated women and 14% of incarcerated men serving time for a drug offence. Given that the U.S. prison system is operating above capacity, U.S. prisons could well do with a population reduction which would allow for safer and more effective management and treatment of other prisoners.

Moreover, evidence from Portugal, where all drug use was decriminalised in 2001 (amidst an epidemic of drug related problems like addiction, crime and deaths) has shown that liberalising drug laws and taking a health-based approach can lead to seriously positive outcomes – including huge reductions in HIV and hepatitis infections and deaths. There is no solid evidence that the criminalisation of drugs decreases their use. In fact, a recent paper by Mark Anderson et al from Montana State University found a near 10% decrease in marijuana use amongst teens in states that have legalised the drug. Not only this but prohibition pushes the market towards riskier, more potent products – that are both more profitable and easier to smuggle as they require less space, and pushes consumption into unsafe environments and robs consumers of the opportunity to make properly informed decisions about what they use. It's prohibition that has led to the trend for marijuana containing increased levels of the chemical THC (which makes people stoned but also vulnerable to psychosis) and decreased levels of CBD (which inhibits the negative actions of THC). So, if you're worried about marijuana causing anti-social behaviour and crime – legalisation is the way forward!

Capital punishment is currently legal in 29 U.S. states. The practice brutalises this wonderful country and needs to die its own death. I'm only human – when I hear about some crimes, of course I feel an instinct for eye-for-an-eye justice. But what I am asking for today is an evidence-based approach to criminal justice, and the death penalty fails that test. Firstly: miscarriages of justice do happen. From 2005 – 2011 there were on average 5 people released from death row per year after their innocence had been proven. Secondly: it's wildly expensive. For example, Enforcing the death penalty costs Florida $51 million a year above what it would cost to punish all first-degree murderers with life in prison without parole, according to the Death Penalty Information Centre. Thirdly: it does not work as a deterrent. A 2012 report by the National Research Council, titled Deterrence and the Death Penalty, stated that studies claiming that the death penalty has a deterrent effect on murder rates are "fundamentally flawed" and should not be used when making policy decisions and, consistent with previous years, the 2016 FBI Uniform Crime Report showed that the South had the highest murder rate. The South accounts for over 80% of executions. The Northeast, which has less than 1% of all executions, had the lowest murder rate.

Our criminal justice systems, both in the U.K. and the U.S. leave a lot to be desired but the U.S. in particular is moving slowly in the right direction. I'm less positive about the direction that the U.K. is heading in. There is an appetite for change both from the public and the Trump administration that could help individuals and communities greatly. Now is the time to exert pressure to ensure that innovation flourishes and that progressive policies reach everyone who can benefit from them and transform their lives. A U.K. study found that 97% of prisoners report that they want to stop offending. Let's help them.

Time for some reflection

Robert Brockway · 22 August 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Well ICMI19 is behind us. Well done to Alison Tieman and her team. I attended quite a few ICMI planning meetings although my contributions mostly concerned what had and hadn't worked for us in the past. Like Elizabeth Hobson, I wasn't able to make it to the conference for personal reasons. Alison twisted my arm a little bit but alas it wasn't to be.

I thought this would be a good time for some reflection. It's coming up on six years since I realised I had to take a stand against misandry and become involved with men's rights. What a journey it has been. Lost friends, many new friends. Anger, frustration, and sorrow at the plight of so many men chewed up and spat out by a gynocentric society and its enablers just looking for a quick buck.

Among MRAs and anti-feminists (of the non-gynocentric variety) we have a core group of people truly committed to effecting change. We don't always agree on everything but we're mostly going in the same direction. Some people appear, make a bit of a splash and then either move on or burn out. Many potential volunteers burn out quickly as they become overwhelmed. We've analysed the volunteer successes and failures at AMRA and concluded that volunteers that tend to stick around spent time reading, listening and watching to understand men's rights before they ever put their hand up to get involved. How much time did they take before putting their hand up? Between 6 and 18 months.

A few people in our ranks have appeared who I consider could be trouble for the movement. In all cases those people have moved on after realising they can't treat men's rights like their own little fiefdom. I'm sure some readers know who I mean. There have been quite a few.

Meanwhile, we're changing the world. Slowly but surely. And we're doing it without most people noticing. The cultural narrative has changed, and it will continue to change. Today we see words like misandry and gynocentrism being used in the wider community and even by public figures with no association to us. Wouldn't have happened five years ago. Recognition that intimate partner violence isn't gendered is going mainstream. It sure wasn't a few years ago. Recognition that the earnings gap is largely a result of choices men and women make is increasingly recognised by the wider community too.

Of course the night is coldest just before the dawn. As was predicted right here at AVfM a few years ago feminists have ramped up the rhetoric as they feel their control of the narrative slipping. Expect them to get nastier as we gain ground.

Our strength though is our determination and endurance. When they push we push back harder. Onwards to ICMI20.

A facet of the American culture

Anonymous Contributor · 22 August 2019 · Archived copy · Original

The development of the United States (and, possibly, Australia) was different from that of Europe.

Ambiguity and vagueness infused our culture.

When we secured the Louisiana Purchase, no one really, truly, knew how far west or north it extended (perhaps due to the primitive cartography). It was a huge flowing mass of land; and this affected how we communicated and thought.

“There’s gold in them thar’ hills,” “Something’s happenin’ down that-a-way,” “I hear there’s a job in the next valley,” “Go west, young man.”

Such uncertainty–that of the wanderer–enriched our culture.

One could argue (although this has now changed), that the old world advanced arguments like battalions of tanks, lined up in rows: discussions of defensiveness. In many (not all) cases, nothing was asserted unless it was known with certainty and could be argued in academia, before any experience.

Americans established a temporary truth, like a scaffold. We climbed it, took in the view, fixed what was beneath us, built it higher, and reached the moon.

It is this ambiguity, this acceptance of uncertainty, which gave rise to America’s triumph in science.

This time is now passing.

We have transitioned to a world where “yes must mean yes” and “no must mean no;” and which treats us like children.

Our respect for ambiguity and uncertainty is gone with the wind.

Seduction (sexual or in the pursuit of knowledge through disobedience) is disavowed. People are considered cripples who do not know how to deal with the uncertainty and shadows of the masculine energy. Society now demands exactitude before any advance. We don’t take risks anymore, we don’t let boys play; we take exams and surveys and instruction from the realms of social justice.

MGTOW guns for YouTube & Google

Elizabeth Hobson · 25 August 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Bob Lewis is a paralegal with expertise in family law and associated criminal laws, as well as civil rights law. Lewis first came to my attention with the release of his 2017 book The Feminist Lie – It Was Never About Equality. The book is essential reading, a concise and palatable read suitable for everyman that is packed full of quotations from papers and case studies that beg to be investigated further. In it, Lewis discusses feminist revisionist history, the myths of patriarchy and male privilege and truths about female privilege, how feminism harms women, he debunks the wage gap lie and outlines feminist tactics (skilfully) but Chapters 5 and 6 – The Fake Rape Epidemic and Debunking the DV Lies – are master-strokes that draw on the authors own experience and the academic and legal literature to demolish the prevailing narratives around these issues.

Bob Lewis also creates content under the moniker DDJ, with a website and podcast called Misandry Today that predominantly produces MGTOW content as well as featuring interviews with voices such as my own and Terrence Popp. He was a sponsor of The International Conference on Men's Issues 2019. In the About the Author section of The Feminist Lie, he writes that "Bob Lewis may or may not be author's real name." – the identity of DDJ's real-life alter ego is no longer in question, because – on the 22nd August, Bob Lewis filed a lawsuit against Google and YouTube.

Informed by his legal prowess, Lewis believes that he has identified a new approach to pursuing legal action against the tyrannical tech giants that just might work to call them to order and force them to abide by the U.S.A.'s First Amendment. He is alleging that they have discriminated against him by demonetising and censoring his channel based on his "Christian religious affiliation, national origin as a patriotic American citizen who supports American tradition and culture, and for lawfully exercising his Constitutionally protected First Amendment rights".

In the lawsuit, Lewis draws on 42 U.S.C. 1983, a piece of civil rights legislation (also known as the Ku Klux Klan Act) which prohibits "the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws" and has also been utilised in the Prager University v Google and Laura Loomer v Google, Twitter, Facebook ad Apple free speech cases. Lewis however bolsters this charge by making detailed and convincing claims that Google and YouTube are government actors – for the Chinese state, the European Union and other foreign states and have colluded with those governments to enforce their 'hate speech laws' and that they actively oppose legal free speech in the U.S.

Lewis is claiming that Google and YouTube commit fraud by lying about their terms of service by stating on their About page:

"Our Mission is to give everyone a voice and show them the world. We believe that everyone deserves to have a voice, and that the world is a better place when we listen, share and build community through our stories.

Our values are based on four essential freedoms that define who we are."

Freedom of Expression: We believe people should be able to speak freely, share opinions, foster open dialogue, and that creative freedom leads to new voices, formats, and possibilities.

Freedom of Information: We believe everyone should have easy, open access to information and that video is a powerful force for education, building understanding, and documenting world events, big and small.

Freedom of Opportunity: We believe everyone should have a chance to be discovered, build a business and succeed on their own terms, and that people – not gatekeepers – decide what's popular.

Freedom to Belong: We believe everyone should be able to find communities of support, break down barriers, transcend borders and come together around shared interests."

Statements that YouTube demonstrably fail to live up to.

And he claims that their contracts are unconscionable and should be ruled unenforceable. With such a huge reach (boasting 73% of Americans as users), they have an unfair bargaining advantage – and use it to tie users into non-negotiable contracts that can be updated at will and without notice.

He is also challenging Section 230 of the Communications Decency Act which, despite its billing as "The 26 Words that Created the Internet" by liberating social media platforms for responsibility for what their users post, Lewis claims is unconstitutional because it actually also happens to make them unaccountable for violating their user's free speech rights.

Lewis has conducted much of the work on this lawsuit (including sixty plus exhibits – available at the bottom of the page here) personally but is also employing an attorney, to support the cause visit his GoFundMe page. God speed, Bob.

Briana Oster, MD of Denver, CO, “Known Genital Mutilator” and foreskin grubber

Gary Costanza · 26 August 2019 · Archived copy · Original

[image]Dr. Briana Oster of Precision Medical Solutions has been added to the directory of “Known Genital Mutilators” at neonatalcutting.org.

This mutilator is as bad as it gets. See her tangle with Brother K in the video below.

She lies about how “circumcision is supported as a beneficial procedure by an overwhelming amount of medical research.”

She lies when she says “doctors and scientists worldwide encourage infant circumcision due to the reduced risk of infection, cancer, and sexually transmitted diseases.”

She lies when she says “the anatomy of your child’s penis will not be affected…and there is no possibility of altering the penile length or girth.”

She lies when she says “patients come first.”

She lies when she says she provides “her patients with the highest standard of medical care, while also ensuring her patient’s comfort and privacy.”

She tries to sell circumcision with lies and exaggerations, all of which are no reason to amputate healthy, functioning tissue.

Apparently, she lies when her mouth moves.

Why lie about what you do, why mislead and omit information if what you do is honorable, healthy, and medically needed? Why not say you do this thing to babies and you can hire me to do it to your baby, or not. Why not be neutral, after all, it’s not your baby?

Well, of course the answer is that they make a fortune on the foreskin sales as well as the surgery itself – thousands of baby’s foreskins worth up to $100,000 each.

Too bad there isn’t a medical society that oversees that kind of conflict of interest. Oh, there is, the AMA…

Are we so blind that we consider circumcision “cruelty free?”

> Foreskin-derived skin, sourced from circumcisions (now considered by many experts to be painful and also unnecessary) is still often considered the “cruelty free” alternative to testing cosmetic products on animals. One foreskin can be used for decades to produce miles of skin, much of which helps people in genuine medical need. And that’s the reason one foreskin can generate as much as $100,000: that’s not the fee from a one-time sale, but the fees from the fibroblasts that are created from those original skin cells.

Here Dr. Oster gets violent with someone who has a differing opinion on circumcision, and she becomes violently NOT neutral on the subject:

Like other Known Genital Mutilators, she is not neutral on circumcision, and wants you to let her cut babies for who-knows-what-else besides the blood-money she gets, and admittedly, Dr. Oster’s bread and butter is almost all chopped off foreskins. Doctor, do you also sell those foreskins? As you know they’re more valuable on a woman’s face as face cream than on it’s owner as a pleasurable sex organ.

What’s even worse is that she makes no mention that this is unneeded and risky “surgery” and lists no risks or complications. One risk is of death of the child, which happens untold dozens of times every year. Sexual health diminishment and scarring happen 100% of the time.

I put "surgery" in quotes above because this mutilation isn't "the treatment of injuries or disorders of the body by incision," as there IS NO injury or disorder until Dr. Oster causes it.

She's particularly egregious, as she only does circumcisions and vasectomies, forgoing ANY positive deeds on the part of her infant patients. She skins baby infants alive (and adults, who, at least, consent) and probably sells the foreskins for further profit. She could correct us, if in fact she reimburses the parents of the victim – er, um – patient with the money she receives.

She tells us she uses the Plastibell method of circumcision, yet neglects to tell us any of it's complications and risks, so you can read that here and here.

Here's the doctor's biography:

> Meet Our Doctor
> Dr. Oster is a physician with nearly ten years of medical experience, most of which she spent here in Colorado. She completed her residency at Tulane University in 2009 and has been practicing medicine in Denver ever since. Dr. Oster is passionate about providing each and every one of her patients with the highest standard of medical care, while also ensuring her patient's comfort and privacy.
> Dr. Oster grew up in Summit County, Colorado, and she naturally loves outdoor activities like skiing, snowboarding, hiking, and fly fishing. Dr. Oster also enjoys scuba diving and traveling with her family.

Since the doctor has no information about the risks of circumcision, you can research the subject and view videos at neonatalcutting.org

Why do so few MRAs engage in practical (offline) activism?

Mike Buchanan · 26 August 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Near the end of my recent talk in Chicago I touched on the issue of the virtual invisibility of the men's rights movement to the general public, and how I believe the degree to which the vast majority of MRAs and other anti-feminists who could engage in practical (offline) activism but don't are largely responsible for that invisibility. I've highlighted the related paragraphs in this version of my talk transcript, on p.6, they consist of the following:

> An increasingly important destroyer of feminism as a political force will be the men's rights movement, the MRM, so I'm delighted to report from this conference that the MRM is not wavering in its longstanding opposition to feminism.
> The MRM has long been engaged with the task of raising public consciousness about feminism and men's issues, and we will be engaged with that task for decades to come. A metaphor I often use for the MRM is that we're trying to climb Everest. We may still be in the foothills, but we're making progress and climbing steadily, and there's been a strong sense of that at each of the five ICMIs to date.
> Public understanding of men's issues and feminism is growing, largely due to social media, so, as we might expect, it's among younger adults in particular that the understanding is growing. In time that WILL inevitably feed into the mainstream media covering our issues. It's a question of when, not if, that will happen.
> I think MRAs should be proud of what they've achieved online, but while online work is necessary, it's NOT sufficient. Feminist influence in the offline world – the real world – goes from strength to strength. Frankly, I continue to be disappointed by the reluctance of MRAs to get away from their keyboards, to meet up with other like-minded men and women, and engage in real-world campaigning. We refer to the men's rights movement, but the average citizen sees no evidence of the existence of this movement from one decade to the next. None. We're all but invisible to the general public, and we need to change that.
> MRAs continue to spend WAY too much time in the online men's rights bubble, but only a very small proportion of the general public is in that bubble. To reach the general public will require far more MRAs to get away from their keyboards, leave the bubble, and engage with the general public. It's why I and others campaign at Speakers' Corner in London every other Sunday. Many people – usually men – will stop for a chat, and those chats are almost always positive.
> To those of you who COULD go in for activism such as street campaigning, but DON'T, maybe because you'd be uncomfortable doing it, I say this. IT'S NOT ABOUT YOU, OR YOUR COMFORT. It's about the people who are suffering, people who sorely need your support. It's about the fathers who don't see their children after family breakdowns, all too many of whom commit suicide as a result. It's about the children who are emotionally abused because they're denied access to their fathers and grandparents. It's about the grandparents denied access to their beloved grandchildren. It's about the men who are battered by their partners, and find there's no support available for them. It's about the men who have their genitals mutilated as minors, on religious or cultural grounds. I strongly urge you to step outside your comfort zone, put your keyboard to one side, and engage in activism to support these people.

I ask the MRAs who follow this website, who could but don't engage in practical activism, why don't you engage in it?

Trobairitz Castelloza speaks out against sexual feudalism & gender inequality

Douglas Galbi · 29 August 2019 · Archived copy · Original

> Good lady, you may burn or hang him > or do anything you happen to desire, > for there's nothing that he can refuse you,
> as such you have him without any limits. [1]

[image]

Men have long been sexually disadvantaged. While men's structural disadvantages are scarcely acknowledged within gynocentric society, a small number of medieval women writers courageously advocated for men. In Occitania early in the thirteenth century, the extraordinary trobairitz Lady Castelloza spoke out boldly against gender inequality in love and men having the status of serfs in sexual feudalism.

> And if she tells you a high mountain is a plain, > agree with her,
> and be content with both the good and ill she sends;
> that way you'll be loved.
> { e s'ela.us ditz d'aut puoig que sia landa, > vos l'an crezatz,
> e plassa vos lo bes e.l mals q'il manda, > c'aissi seretz amatz. } [2]

Just as is the case for many women today, many medieval women didn't adequately support and defend men. When Giraut de Bornelh asked his lovely friend Alamanda about his love difficulties, she advised him to be totally subservient to his lady. Alamanda was a maiden to that lady. Lord Giraut apparently had lost his lady's love by seeking sex with a woman who was not her equal, probably none other than her maiden Alamanda. But what had that lady done to him? She had lied to him at least five times before! When women speak, men should not just listen and believe. Unwillingness to question a woman led a Harvard Law professor to personal disaster. Men should not act as doormats for women or as women's kitchen servants.

The trobairitz Maria de Ventadorn insisted to Gui d'Ussel that a woman should retain her superior position even in a love relationship with a man. Gui felt that men and women in love should be equals. But Maria wanted men to fulfill all the pleas and commands of their lady-lovers. That's the pernicious doctrine of yes-dearism. Just say no to female supremacists!

> Lady {Maria de Ventadorn}, among us they say > that when a lady wants to love, > she should honor her love on equal terms > because they are equally in love.
> Gui d'Ussel, at the beginning, lovers > say no such thing;
> instead, each one, when he wants to court,
> says, with hands joined and on his knees:
> "Lady, permit me to serve you honestly > as your servant man" and that's the way she takes him.

> I rightly consider him a traitor if, having given > himself as a servant, he makes himself an equal.
> { Dompna, sai dizon de mest nos
> Que, pois que dompna vol amar,
> Engalmen deu son drut onrar,
> Pois engalmen son amoros!
> Gui d'Uissel, ges d'aitals razos
> Non son li drut al comenssar,
> Anz ditz chascus, qan vol prejar,
> Mans jointas e de genolos:
> Dompna, voillatz qe-us serva franchamen
> Cum lo vostr'om! et ella enaissi-l pren!
> Eu vo-l jutge per dreich a trahitor
> Si-s rend pariers e-s det per servidor. } [3]

Because of their great love for women, men are reluctant to demand that women treat them with equal human respect and dignity. Men tend toward gyno-idolatry. The man on his knees before a woman, with his hands clasped, is making a gesture of faithful subordination. She then puts her hands around his hands to complete this feudal gesture known as the immixtio mannum {intermingling of hands}. A man today who goes down on his knee to ask a woman for her hand in marriage is preparing to be a vassal to his woman-lord midons. That's folly. That's fine preparation for a sexless marriage. From studying Ovid the great teacher of love to modern empirical work on sexual selection, men should know that self-abasement is a losing love strategy.

> Oh Love, what shall I do?
> Shall we two live in strife?
> The griefs that must ensue > would surely end my life.

> Unless my Lady might > receive me in that place
> she lies in, to embrace > and press against me tight, > her body, smooth and white.
> Good Lady, thank you for > your love so true and fine;
> I swear I love you more > than all past loves of mine.
> I bow and join my hands
> yielding myself to you;
> the one thing you might do > is give me one sweet glance
> if sometime you've the chance.
> { Amors, e que.m farai?
> Si garrai ja ab te?
> Ara cuit qu'e.n morrai
> Del dezirer que.m ve,
> Si.lh bela lai on jai
> No m'aizis pres de se,
> Qu'eu la manei e bai
> Et estrenha vas me
> So cors blanc, gras e le.
> Bona domna, merce
> Del vostre fin aman!
> Qu'e.us pliu per bona fe
> C'anc re non amei tan.
> Mas jonchas, ab col cle,
> Vos m'autrei e.m coman;
> E si locs s'esdeve,
> Vos me fatz bel semblan,
> Que molt n'ai gran talan! } [4]

The medieval trobairitz Castelloza sympathized with men's subordination in love. She loved a man who didn't love her. A woman today in such a situation might open a dating app and enjoy a huge number of solicitations from men. Then, if necessary to boost her self-esteem, she might go for sexual flings with a few, or at least exploit traditional anti-men gender dating roles to get some free dinners. With a keen sense for social justice, Castelloza refused to live according to such female privilege:

> I certainly know that it pleases me, > even though people say it's not right > for a lady to plead her own cause with a knight, > and make long speeches all the time to him.
> But whoever says this doesn't know > that I want to implore before dying, > since in imploring I find sweet healing,

> so I plead to him who gives me grave trouble.
>
> { Eu sai ben qu'a mi esta gen,
> Si ben dison tuig que mout descove
> Que dompna prec ja cavalier de se,
> Ni que l tenga totz temps tam lonc pressic,
> Mas cil c'o diz non sap gez ben chausir.
> Qu'ieu vueil preiar ennanz que.m lais morir,
> Qu'el preiar ai maing douz revenimen,
> Can prec sellui don ai greu pessamen. } [5]

Castelloza recognized that, in pleading with a man for love, she was transgressing the norms of men-oppressing courtly love. When women treat men merely as dogs, women don't experience the full gift of men's tonic masculinity. The master dehumanizes herself in dehumanizing her man-slaves. Castelloza, in contrast, understood that a man's love can ennoble a woman. She understood that a man can offer much to even the most privileged woman.

> I'm setting a bad pattern > for other loving women, > since it's usually men who send > messages of well-chosen words.
> Yet I consider myself cured, > friend, when I implore you.
> for keeping faith is how I woo.
> A noble women would grow richer > if you graced her with the gift > of your embrace or your kiss.
>
> { Mout aurei mes mal usatge
> A las autras amairitz,
> C'hom sol trametre mesatge,
> E motz triaz e chauzitz.
> Es ieu tenc me per gerida,
> Amics, a la mia fe,
> Can vos prec — c'aissi.m conve;
> Que plus pros n'es enriquida
> S'a de vos calqu'aondansa
> De baisar o de coindansa. } [6]

Men's lack of imagination and unwillingness to protest helps to keep them in their gender prison of gynocentrism. Men rightly appreciate, admire, and love courageous, transgressive women like the trobairitz Castelloza. But men must take responsibility for winning their own liberation. A man showing loving concern about his close friend getting married isn't enough. Men should be more daring and, like Matheolus, raise stirring voices of men's sexed protest. Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOWs) struggled against misandry and castration culture even in the Middle Ages, and they continue to do so today. MGTOW is merely prudent personal action. To dismantle gynocentric oppression, men must recover, create, and disseminate protest poetry as potent as the medieval troubadours' feudal songs of men's love serfdom.

> Peire, if spanning two or three years > the world were run as would please me,

> I'll tell you how with women it would be:
> they would never be courted with tears, > rather, they would suffer such love-fears > that they would honor us, > and court us, rather than we, them.
> { Peire, si fos dos ans o tres
> Lo segles faihz al meu plazer,
> De domnas vos dic eu lo ver:
> Non foran mais preyadas ges,
> Ans sostengran tan greu pena
> Qu'elas nos feiran tan d'onor
> C'ans nos prejaran que nos lor. } [7]

Here's some meta-data about this trobairitz song. It's a debate poem (tenso). The currently best critical edition of trobairitz / troubadour tensos is Harvey, Paterson & Radaelli (2010), but it's expensive and not widely available. For analysis of the genre of tenso, McQueen (2015).

[5] Na {Lady} Castelloza, "Amics, s'ie.us trobes avinen" ll. 17-24 (stanza 3), Occitan text from Paden (1981), English trans. (modified) from Paden & Paden (2007). Bruckner, Shepard & White (1995) provides a slightly different Occitan text and English translation of all of Castelloza's songs. *Butterfly Crossings*provides an online Occitan text and English translation of the full song, with commentary. Her commentary puts forward orthodox myth in service of gynocentrism:

> by virtue of being a woman she is below him socially, thus rendering her statement simultaneously true and drawing attention to the place of women in society as opposed to the artificial pedestal they sit upon in traditional Troubadour poems. Regardless of her title, class, or wealth, in love, much like in life, the woman is beneath the man and must beg his favor like Castelloza here does.

Yup, so Anne of France was beneath day-laboring men gathering stones in fields.

Much influential recent scholarship on trobairitz has been based on dominant gender delusions. A relevant critique:

> Gravdal's argument here is based on her assumption that, for the men, powerlessness is a pose, a rhetorical strategy; the male speaker adopts an abased position only to use it as a springboard to higher status and sociopolitical clout. That Castelloza's speaker does this as well is frequently overlooked, because it is assumed that for the women, powerlessness is a reality. This assumption is not supported by the evidence for noblewomen's sociopolitical situation in Occitania during the time of the trobairitz.

Langdon (2001) p. 40.

[6] Castelloza, "Mout avetz faich lonc estatge" ll. 21-30 (stanza 3), Occitan text from Paden (1981), English trans. (modified) from Paden & Paden (2007). Butterfly Crossings again offers the full song, along with commentary. The commentary shows orthodox academic failure of self-consciousness:

> Almost smirkingly Castelloza acknowledges that her behavior sets a terrible example for all other female lovers while synchronously encouraging them to do the same. She is not apologizing as much as drawing attention to the solidarity between women who will now partake in this perhaps liberating behavior and act upon their desires as opposed to remaining within the confined roles of passive love interests.

Women unite in liberating behavior: ask men out and buy men dinner!

In Castelloza's songs, the man she loves has neither voice nor activity. Siskin & Storme (1989) pp. 119-20. Self-centeredness is a common characteristic of women's writing, particularly in the last few decades of literary scholarship.

James H. Donalson provides an online Occitan text and English translation for the full song.

Bernart de Ventadorn was one of the greatest troubadour love poets. His desire for women to experience men's subordinate position in love is coupled with appreciation for gender equality and reciprocity in love:

> The love of two good lovers lies > in pleasing and in yearning's thrill > from which no good thing will arise > unless they match each other's will.
> The man was born an imbecile > who scolds her for her preference > or bids her do what she resents.
>
> { En agradar et en voler > es l'amors de dos fins amants;
> nulha res no·i pòt pron tener > se·l volontatz non es egals.
> E cell es ben fols naturals > qui de çò que vòl la reprend
> e·ilh lauza çò qu no·ilh es gent }

"Chantars no pot gaire valer," Occitan text and English trans. (modified insubstantially) from A.Z. Foreman. For an alternate English translation, Paden & Paden (2007) pp. 74-5. While Bernart here unequally criticizes men, in an earlier stanza her criticized women whoring in loving men.

Protesting circumcision at Stony Brook Children's Hospital

Gary Costanza · 2 September 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Just as Mike Buchanan and others discuss public protesting, I rediscovered the power of "in real life" activism, spurred on by Mike, Brother K, the Bloodstained Men (and friends), Yourwholebaby.org, and Intaction.org.

Here I discuss aspects of public protest, with my protest video following.

Helping babies is a no-brainer.

Time's over

Robert Brockway · 3 September 2019 · Archived copy · Original

We talk a lot about red pills, blue pills and even purple pills in these parts. Someone who has red pilled sees the world as it really is, with gynocentrism, male disposability and misandry everywhere you look. That red pill takes a long time to swallow and the process is unpleasant. But you don't have to be red pilled to see misandry. Not anymore.

In the past I think people could be excused for not seeing the misandry in society. I really do. Yes, it was pretty obvious at times and if you just looked honestly at the way the world worked then it'd be there for all to see but I was still prepared to give them a pass. Not any more. Time's up. Misandry is now so prevalent that anyone that denies it is being willfully ignorant or walking around with their eyes and minds closed.

Google Trends reveals interesting results concerning this topic. People are looking in to and talking about misandry.

Feminists used to dismiss misandry outright but even they realise that won't fly anymore. In 2015 well known anti-MRA TakedownMRAs even admitted that misandry is real although he failed to properly understand the meaning of the word. So close.

A lot of baseless claims are made about men. Below is a list similar to the one I presented at the March for Men in Melbourne. When seen together a clear pattern of ridicule and shaming of men and masculinity emerges.

- Mansplaining
- Manspreading
- Manterrupting
- Manslamming
- Man-child
- Man-baby
- Bropriating
- Man flu
- Male privilege
- Fragile male ego
- Masculinity so fragile
- Toxic masculinity
- A curfew for men
- Dead beat dads
- Men are genetically inferior
- Men have a lower pain threshold
- Men have weaker immune systems
- Men are linear thinkers
- Men can't multitask
- Men lack the capacity to maintain concentration for long periods
- Men think about sex every few seconds

- Men constantly want sex
- Men won't ask for directions
- Men should man up and grow some balls
- The Patriarchy
- Special person's day
- A woman needs a man like a fish needs bicycle
- Boys are stupid, throw rocks at them
- Men are obsolete
- The End of Men

Of Special note is Hanna Rosin, who wrote an entire book on the last item in that list.

Since 2017 we've seen the results of #MeToo with countless men falsely accused, many having their careers or even their lives destroyed without a shred of evidence being offered. Fortunately many men are recognising the risks and are acting in an entirely rational manner by avoiding contact with women in the workplace. Men may be avoiding contact with women outside of work too but there may not be as much research on this.

So I say #TimesOver. Misandry is common and it's only getting worse. No excuses anymore. Everyone should now be able to recognise it for what it is.

Judge Rachel Rancilio rules, boy dies, grieving father thrown in jail

Paul Elam · 5 September 2019 · Archived copy · Original

St. Claire Shores, Michigan hosted the first International Conference on Men's Issues in 2014. Also, from the shores of Lake St. Claire, and much more recently, comes the story of a Macomb County man just subjected to one of the most egregious family court abuses I've ever heard of.

From a local news story, the unnamed father had fought for custody of his young son during an acrimonious divorce. Ruling in the case was Judge Rachel Rancilio, who was cautioned by the father and his attorney that they feared harm would come to the child if the mother was granted custody. Consistent with standard operating procedure for family courts in the U.S., Judge Rancilio ruled against the father.

The boy later died in the mother's custody.

According to the dead boy's grandmother, Deborah Vanderhagen, Judge Rancilio dismissed the father's concerns. She said, "His lawyer said something is going to happen to this child. You need to get him away from the mother. There are too many red flags. And the judge said, oh that is in the past."

The grieving father set about complaining about the ruling in the only venue available to victims of family courts. The internet. He posted videos criticizing the ruling. For his efforts he was charged with "malicious use of telecommunications services," which sounds more like a charge of violating Judge Rancilio's decidedly thin skin.

Despite being charged, the father continued posting to the internet. One social media post he made read "Dada back to digging and you best believe I'm gonna dig up all the skeletons in this court's closet."

This was apparently too much for Judge Rancilio. The grieving father was arrested and now sits in jail on a half-million-dollar bond.

As a publisher, I have to admit that I'm at a loss for words to describe the hubris and unspeakable insensitivity it must require, even in the insulated, untouchable world of family court judges, to throw this particular man in jail.

Skeletons indeed. I'd like to know about them myself and I'd be happy to expose them to the light of day on this well-traveled website.

In fairness, it must be said that the police claim there is no reason to suspect the mother in the son's death. And we know police are trustworthy. Like family court judges. However, the family of the dead boy isn't convinced. They are still looking for answers. Perhaps they can find them after they raise a half-million dollars to get a grief-stricken father out from under the thumb of a kangaroo court.

Circumcision protest: I confront child abuse prevention “advocates” at “modern” hospital

Gary Costanza · 7 September 2019 · Archived copy · Original

I showed up at the flagship campus of Stony Brook Hospital looking for answers to important questions about some controversial “operations” being done there. See the video below.

I asked for an interview with the “Child Abuse Services” director Dr. Lesley Quinn, and to date she hasn’t called me back. I may have to do an interview in absentia, with me speaking to a cardboard cutout of her, determined to find out how “advanced” their care is of baby boys.

Questions like:

Is all you do here backed by solid science, even elective surgery on newborn babies?

What disease or condition does this surgery treat, being that health care dollars are always at a premium and surgery on newborns is risky and not done willy-nilly, right?

Have you done research on doing this surgery on baby girls, and see if the same benefits can be attained for girls too?

Have you ever thought about how you have a parent sign a consent form for elective surgery for another person, which isn’t really patient consent?

Any scientific research on the optimal amount of foreskin that should be ‘left on’ and how much is ‘unneeded?’

What do you know about the foreskin? What did they teach you about the intact penis? It acts as a seal and lubricates, and contains Meisner corpuscles, thousands of sensitive nerve endings, like in the lips, nipples, genitals, and tips of the fingers.

Doesn’t this “surgery” violate your Hippocratic Oath, “First, do no harm?”

Are there any other healthy body parts that are routinely removed from newborn babies at your hospital? Why not?

Why do you push and promote circumcision, rather than being neutral and inform parents this is medically unnecessary? The reason can only be financial gain.

What percent of boys are cut?

How many cut per year?

Any classes for parents on circumcision?

Any new research on circumcision?

How does circumcision affect the mom/child bond? (it can’t be good)

-breastfeeding?
-infant happiness? thriving?

What percent die? How?

What is the medical purpose of circumcision?

Stay tuned for more.

With this ring I thee adopt

Esther Vilar · 9 September 2019 · Archived copy · Original

The following excerpts are from Esther Vilar's profoundly insightful volume The Polygamous Sex (1976). In this little-known work she poses the theory that women mold husbands into a father figures, protectors and providers to whom they play the role of pampered child. Vilar points out that the childish qualities arousing protective instincts in men are the opposite qualities of those that attract sexual arousal, thus leaving men in a peculiar, dissonant position of having an intimate partner who is both burdensome child and sexual partner, an unacceptable pairing which leads ultimately to a deterioration in the relationship. Vilar points out that women work feverishly to establish this relational dynamic, and she asks what does it profit a woman to lose a lover and gain a father? – PW.

THE POWER OF THE WEAKER PARTNER

The fact that women are never seen carrying heavy burdens, lifting or pushing weights, helps to advertise their muscle weakness. When they weep easily, at the slightest provocation, their tears remind their onlookers of their weaker nerves. By enveloping themselves in fine fabrics and by means of make-up, they can make themselves look fragile to the point of imminent physical breakdown. It is not so long since this kind of comedy was incomplete without simulated fainting fits.

Women also prefer to be seen in the company of taller, older men; it underlines their simulated vulnerability. It all depends on exaggerating to the limit the existing physical difference between protector and protégé. The wife's greater physical resilience is her secret; by the time it becomes obvious, her provider is dead. In the USA, for instance, the widow survives her spouse on the average by eleven years.

'WITH THIS RING I THEE ADOPT!'

Compared with a child of one's own, which one protects automatically, a woman makes a somewhat inadequate object of one's protective instinct. When a man takes her on as his charge, he does it not instinctively but consciously, by persuading himself that here is a helpless creature who needs him. Every woman is therefore in competition with every other inadequate (non-instinctual) protégé. Orphans, the sick, the old, the mentally disabled, the poor, young pups and stray cats are basically all much more in need of protection than women. How to distract a man's attention from all these potential competitors and concentrate it exclusively upon the woman seeking to arouse his latent protective instinct is therefore a major problem.

This is not as hard as it seems at first: most people practice altruistic love for a reward of some kind, as we have said — cash, prestige, companionship, eternal life. Women have a interesting reward to offer for the protection they seek: they are the only kind of inadequate protégé that is in a position to satisfy a man's other social instinct — his sex drive. From the man's point of view, this is the prize reward of them all.

But a woman seeking protection primarily can never be an adequate sex partner because she lacks one prerequisite for that: intellectual equality. But since most men hardly ever meet ideal sex partners — feminine women who are nevertheless as intelligent as men — the man really has no choice. If he is not to be empty handed, he has to settle for altruistic love for a pseudo-child, and for rational love instead of sexual love. He compromises on a concoction: part ward, part sex mate, part child, part woman. "She may not be the love of my dreams," he thinks, "but I can still take her to bed — and besides, she needs me." To be his child, the woman doesn't resemble him enough — but she is weaker than he, physically and mentally. To be his ideal sex partner, she is not sufficiently on a par with him intellectually — however, she looks sufficiently different from him to be attractive.

In other words, rather than leave both of his social instincts unsatisfied a man will put up with playing the father to an adult who occasionally lets him have her body for sexual purposes. Since the average man cannot find the woman who will be a true marriage partner at all, he accepts one of many being offered for adoption by her parents, and in a grandiose ceremony vows to take her natural father's place in providing for her henceforth. If the priest or registrar were to ask him whether he was prepared to "take this woman" as his child, he might not even notice. When the girl in white with the bouquet says "Yes", the man knows perfectly well that he has adopted her, "for better or for worse": "the child" will henceforth bear her new father's name and live on his money.

To keep him from having any ideas about his search for a woman, she also plays the lover from time to time. After the birth of the first child — her ideal protégé, and his as well — the power of "the adopted daughter" is so well established that she runs little risk of losing the adoptive father to a real woman. The role of sex partner, originally used as bait, tends to be neglected at this point. Soon the day will come when only the presence of their children will remind the couple that, once upon a time, they used to sleep together.

THE POWER OF THE COLDER PARTNER

Once a woman has opted for the role of the child (instead of lover) the next step is predetermined. A child must not show too great an interest in sex, on pain of losing credibility and a child's privileges. A woman who values her status as protégé, therefore, must keep her sex drive under control. She must be in a position to make conscious use of her sexuality for her purposes i.e. to win a man who appears suited to play her father, rather than a man who excites and confuses her senses and her mind. And she must be able to refuse herself to her intended protector until he adopts her or at least commits himself clearly to such an intention. To see primarily the sex partner in a man is the end of her power over him. It means losing the motive of making him her protector — what good is a lover restrained by protective feelings? — and being quite as dependent on him, sexually, as he is on her.

To stay stupid is, as we have said, a piece of cake; it costs no effort at all. To stay cold, on the other hand, requires considerable self-discipline — but women evidently find that it pays, just the same. Not only are men and women born with the same mental endowment, the same instinct of self-preservation and caring for their brood, but they also inherit the same predisposition to an active sex life. But sexual cravings can be conditioned: nuns and priests are good examples of that. Only nuns, being women, typically begin their training much earlier than their male counterparts, which is why we hear of far fewer missteps and scandals among them.

The rest of womankind is under no constraint to practice such total self-control. On the contrary, total frigidity would hamper them and it might lead to extremes such as refusing sex altogether, even as bait for attracting a protector. How easily the conditioning of the sex drive can lead to frigidity is revealed by a recent opinion poll taken among thousands of Italian women of every social class (Doxa, Rome 1974). Queried about their sexual attitudes, 36% of these women between the ages of twenty and fifty expressed a total lack of interest in marital sex; in fact, they said they would prefer giving it up altogether. So high a degree of sexual frigidity is excessive and rather disruptive. What matters is only to be the more frigid of the two partners — because the power is always in the hands of the colder sex partner.

FATHERS ARE POWERLESS

Children don't love their parents; they are merely attached to them: they need them, and sometimes they even like them. When father and mother have the knack of clothing their instinctive and essentially self-gratifying nurturing of their brood in the image of self-sacrificial devotion, they may enjoy as a fringe benefit the child's guilt and gratitude, as well. But this is not love, nor should it be: if children returned the love of their parents in full measure, life would come to a standstill, because they would never want to leave home. Children by and large tend to leave their parents at the earliest possible opportunity, to go looking for their own love objects (protégé). Many never return home, or do so only out of a sense of duty.

Children can feel real love for their parents only as they gradually become old and helpless. When physical debility, intellectual inferiority, and resemblance characterize the parent, it becomes possible for the grown son to love his father as a genuine protégé. At this point, however, the father's love has come to an end. Between protector and protégé there is always only one who loves: always the protector. The protégé accepts whoever will be his provider.

If another, better provider comes along, he will be accepted, without any great emotional investment; the most to be expected is a certain loyalty. For what is involved is only the protégé's instinct of self-preservation, a necessarily asocial instinct. If this were fixated upon a specific individual and that individual perished, so would the protégé.

A man who marries a woman inferior to himself i.e. "adopts" her must expect that she cannot feel anything for him but liking and gratitude. A woman is better off than a child, after all; if necessary, she can take care of herself, like any man. That she nevertheless allows her husband to pay all the bills is a personal concession that can be retracted at any time. She is entitled, therefore, to high expectations: everything done for her must be first-rate, otherwise she may engage another protector or else, depending upon circumstances, even decide to take care of herself. Compared with the real father, a wife's "adopted father" has no hope of becoming his pseudo-child's protégé in his old age, either. The most he can hope for is the status of an inadequate or pseudo-protégé i.e. if he is lucky, he may come to enjoy the woman's altruistic love, her charity.

The woman even gets a reward: she inherits his property, his insurance, his pension rights, so that he can go on providing for her after his death, the death she is statistically prepared to survive for, on the average, six years, plus the number of years she is younger than he is.

Turning to the man's role for a moment, one might suppose that a protector, armed with material power over his dependent, is in a position to blackmail her. But that is precisely what he can never do. If he were capable of it, he would never have undertaken the charge in the first place. Who really enjoys working for someone else's benefit? But the nurturing instinct is so powerful a drive that there is no evading its power. Not even women have as yet succeeded in modifying it. But for them it is so much less onerous to satisfy their brood-hatching instincts. Even if the woman is the partner who originally wanted the child — the man already had his child, in the person of his wife — it is always the man who will be responsible for its care and feeding. The nurturing instinct is polyvalent i.e. a man can have more than one "young charge" under his wing.

When the first real "protégé" for both is born, the wife merely advances to the position of eldest daughter. A woman who bears children therefore has a double advantage: she satisfies her own nurturing instinct and simultaneously strengthens the foundations of her own security. As the mother of authentic protégés she must be provided for, even if she ceases to seem quite as helpless and appealing as her role ideally calls for.

The power of the child over his parents — that of the biologically weaker over the stronger — is a law of nature. Without such power, they would starve, being unable to take care of themselves. That parents will dash into a burning house or hurl themselves into a raging flood to save their young is a matter of course. That men go to war for their women is also considered a matter of course. A man who must be a father to his wife is powerless, where she is concerned.

THE 'WEAKER SEX' HOLDS ALL THE ACES

The biological power structure rests on two instincts: sex, and caring for the brood. Whoever needs, for the satisfaction of one or both of these instincts, a particular individual, loses his independence to that individual. To love is to become enslaved. Contrariwise, whoever is loved has the lover in his power. Thus, power equals the ability to make oneself the object of another person's love. Only the human female is in a position, as we have seen, to make herself the object of the male sex drive without becoming equally dependent on the male for instinctual satisfaction. She does not need the man to satisfy her sex drive; she has it under firm control, as bait or weapon in the sexual power struggle. Sex, to the woman, is too valuable, as it were, to be wasted on mere self-indulgence. So if it is a question of one sex dominating the other, it can never be the male who dominates, but the female.

"The first instance of social oppression," runs a famous statement by Friedrich Engels, patron and coauthor of Karl Marx, "is the oppression of woman by man." Engels is confusing force with power. Like so many Leftists after him, Engels injected metaphorically a concept of power structures resting on force into the sex war, where it does not apply. Only because a man is physically stronger and able to earn money, Engels believed that this gives the man power over the woman. However physical force may be helpful in oppressing a social class — it is no way to win control over the other sex.

The potential oppressor is never the stronger partner, but always the more helpless one; the potential ruler is never the one driven by desire, but the desired. If it is true that women are physically and mentally the weaker sex, and that they are more desired by men than desirous, then “the first social oppression” is the oppression of men by women, not the other way around. The woman usually begins to suffer long after the man has been miserable for a long time.

Female power is the foundation of all other power structures. Social power systems that do not rest directly on instinct can never be more than superstructures. Their leaders can rule only in areas of no special value to sex partners and protégés. A system that disregards the power of the really powerful sex is doomed from the outset: it cannot gain adherents. It is by the power of the dominant sex that all systems function at all. Without the consent of women, there could have been no fascism, no imperialism, no Inquisition. Men could not have become the tools of such systems, had they not been ruled by women. Only a person attached and subservient to another through his basic social instincts — a man with a family to support, typically — can be sucked into the treadmill of such a secondary system and be driven to commit acts of hypocrisy, terror, and treason. The power of woman is the root of force in others.

Church fathers, politicians, and dictators know this unwritten law very well. A ruler’s most important political move is courting women and talking their language. He knows that once he has the women with him, he will get the men automatically. As long as the Church backs up woman as man’s protégé, she can easily induce him to back up the Church by letting it teach his children a faith in invisible beings that guarantees the continuance of the Church in power. One hand washes the other. As long as politicians promise special social measures for women, they can keep military service and a higher pension age for men with a good conscience. As long as dictators do not press women into army service, they can send male recruits by the thousands into battle.

The Church did not really come into power until after it had set up woman — in the person of the Virgin Mary— as an object of worship, and where the cult of Mary is still intact, the Church is still in power. Jesus himself passed up his opportunity to win over the women. He once said to his mother: “Woman, what have I to do with thee?” and the misogynist Apostle Paul did no better in his time. Only when the female as protégé was raised to an institution did Christianity win a massive following, at last.

It is therefore entirely possible that the great social revolutionaries invented “the oppressed woman” for tactical reasons and despite their better knowledge. Did we say that Engels had confused power with force? Perhaps it was the other way around: suppose he had recognized the real power of women, and made a deliberate bid for it, to secure the victory for his side? It would certainly be odd for men like Marx, Engels, Lenin, Mao — all of whom knew the life of the working class better than anyone — to have believed seriously that the worker’s wife was worse off than the worker himself. They surely knew that, poverty and too many kids notwithstanding, the worker’s wife was somewhat better off even under the inhuman conditions of proletarian life at the outset of the industrial revolution. When they and other radicals sought to improve the lot of the working man, they were good enough politicians to appeal to the working man’s wife and exalt her cause as top priority. Clever, legitimate tactics — but what confusion they sowed in the heads of their followers!

Adolph Hitler also adopted such tactics, though with a somewhat different emphasis. Without the support of “the German Woman” — that self-consciously Teutonic Female, his own creation — he would never have made it to the top, the position from which he could instigate his great blood bath. Since the really powerful elements were not men, Hitler could openly advocate his program: war against neighboring countries and the persecution of another “race” — while the women cheered him on, as we know.

No one is saying that women want war more than men do — whoever wants war? — but they are less opposed to it. Because they don’t as a rule expect to be sent to the front, war means less of a risk to them personally; because they are not given to thinking beyond their noses, they are much slower to realize all the deadly consequences of war. Who would ever have foreseen, in any case, that even a democratic regime like the British would drop bombs on defenseless civilians, massacring over half a million women and children — and gratuitously, as it turned out, since the bombardment of cities made little difference; it was only the systematic destruction of industrial installations that helped to end the war.

But the bombers were flown by men, so we may conclude that the women had no great compunctions about that. The pre-war suffragettes who fought for the vote had omitted to fight for women's participation in the dirty work of war. Although women are nominally as responsible for wars as men, at least where they have the vote, the majority of women by no means regard themselves as armchair soldiers, but rather as pacifists. In post-war Germany not one of the women who lived for years on the pay of a concentration camp guard — all of whom were murderers — ever went on trial.

Apart from the few young girls who get involved in leftist militancy or the like, the great masses of women have not, so far, knowingly risked anything for their society. Even the women soldiers of the Israeli Army figured only on the sidelines of the Six-Day as well as the Yom Kippur War. Where the shooting is, it's always the men. Who dies in war is decided by the more powerful sex: woman.

ADOPTION AND INCEST

Men who are strongly motivated in their choice of a partner by their nurturing instinct, and turn to predominately childlike women who are considerably younger, less intelligent, smaller and weaker than they —; necessarily have to satisfy their sex instinct with their protégé. To have sex with someone you regard as your child is incest. Not that they are aware of it as incest. It is not easy to realize that a man is drawn to a woman by his nurturing instinct — the sex factor is what catches the eye. But all those altruistic feelings he has for her, like wanting to take care of her, defend her, work for her, fight for her, these are the feelings of a father for his child, not really those of a lover for his woman.

By the time a man 'adopts' a woman he can hardly differentiate between the erotic and paternal strands of mixed motives involved. With luck, he has had some experience with the erotic feelings; the paternal, protective emotions are something new. When he feels this new way for a woman for the first time and compares it with his earlier attitudes, he is struck by the difference: he had no desire to sacrifice himself to his earlier loves. It must be proof positive that this, at long last, is real love, the great love for which he has been waiting all his life. Here is the 'woman to marry' in contrast to others whom he comes to think of as 'good in bed'. It is only later on, when he has become a father in fact, that he can identify what he felt for his bride as being similar to what he now feels for his child. For the first time he is in a position to judge what proportion of his original interest in her was, strictly speaking, paternal rather than sexual.

A man with a child-wife knows that something is not quite as it should be, but he can't quite put his finger on it. He somehow feels though he has no right to perform the act of love with her, as though it were an imposition he ought to spare her. Still, he finds himself doing this 'improper' thing to her, but always with a guilty conscience! He also can't shake off the feeling that she is somehow doing him a big favor every time she puts up with it, and that he can never do enough, soon enough, to show his appreciation.

In days of yore, when women still married as virgins, and difference in age between bride and groom was also usually far more pronounced than it is nowadays, the link between marital adoption and incest was especially evident: the bridegroom had to violate his ward right after the ceremony. Thanks to the new sex morality, men can at least make a more gradual transition. Marriage, formerly the legal pre-requisite for incest, is becoming more and more a form of restitution.

As a father in spite of himself, the man has no choice but to break through the incest barrier between himself and his child-wife. It helps a little that she is only a pseudo-child with whom he commits legally sanctioned pseudo-incest only. But all that manipulation of basic instincts cannot fail to have damaging consequences.

We learn from the psychoanalysts to what degree men have begun to shake off the inhibition against incest and to enjoy real incest at least in their day-dreams: fathers, we are told, indulge in sexual fantasies about their growing daughters every day of the week. The same therapists, ever on the alert against all kinds of complexes, in these cases are not all inclined to liberate men from such fantasies. Their only worry here is to ward off any guilt feelings that might develop, so they never tire of assuring the 'patient' how very normal it all is.

A man who concentrates his sex and breeding instincts on the same woman, and has consequently attached himself to a markedly infantile specimen, is virtually courting a schizophrenic breakdown. He is likely to swing constantly from adoring his chosen mate to cursing her, raping her, falling at her feet, beating her, then offering to die for her. She will wonder at his eccentricity, but it cannot be otherwise. Since the two instincts involved are basically incompatible, a man who keeps trying to combine them is bound to fall from one extreme to the other.

Common sense will eventually drive a man to seek an escape from such an incestuous bond, landing him in either polygamy or prudery. The less sensible continue to live in incest. The dangerous lure of forbidden fruit and its pleasures become a permanent ingredient of their sex lives.

What began as making a virtue out of necessity ends as an addiction and an established perversion. Once a man is sexually fixated on Lolita, he is likely to find the idea of sanctioned sex with a grown woman boring. A man driven by a particularly strong paternal instinct to marry an especially infantile woman is likely to find such an adjustment extremely hard to make. He is likely to be the same man who asks for under age girls in a house of assignation, even at an advanced age. What he has come to relish most of all about the activity is the violation of the taboo.

THE POLYGAMOUS MAN WRONGS ONLY OTHER MEN

Women complain that men regard them as mere sex objects. This sounds like wishful thinking! In actuality, a man needs considerable imagination to see a sex object in his mate. Most women deliberately choose men to whom they feel inferior ('I must have a man I can look up to,' is the slogan). An inferior is no sex object, but a protégé — a 'child'. To see a person as a sex object, we need to be looking at someone who is physically the opposite, but intellectually our equal. Most women tend to be only the physical opposite of their partner. Stupidity is not a sex-specific trait: it is the opposite, not of masculinity, but of intelligence. It makes a woman not more feminine, as many believe, but more childish.

An inferior appeals, not to her partner's sex drive, but to his paternal instinct, thus driving him to polygamy: sex with the pseudo-child makes for a guilty conscience. He looks for another sex partner, again suffers pangs of conscience if the new partner is inferior, roams further afield to find a third, and so on. Homosexual men probably are often men who have resigned themselves to the fact that their long search for an equal sex partner among women has been in vain. They prefer equality with a partner of the same sex, rather than intellectual inferiority i.e. sex with a childish person.

Although the average polygamist actually wrongs only another man, not his wife, he is rarely aware of this: a woman who regards her husband as her father cannot be the victim of sexual infidelity. For an 'adoptee' her partner is not primarily the lover, so she is jealous only when she is threatened with losing the provider in him. She would of course prefer to be her husband's 'only child', but once there is a 'sister', she will settle for at least not having to take second place. As long as the goodies are fairly shared, and the 'father' is sufficiently well-off to provide for more than one 'child', she does not care, basically, what he does with the others.

WOMEN WANT ALTRUISTIC LOVE

Women are free to choose: they can take a man as a father or as a lover; they can arouse his compassion or his desire. As long as women play the role of children, they clearly prefer sympathy. As long as they choose to be the weaker, younger, less intelligent partner in every relationship, i.e., as long as they insist on choosing male superiors they are opting openly for altruistic love.

Women sow confusion in men's minds: they look like adults but they behave like children; they demand passion but themselves stay cool; they talk of tenderness, meaning protection. Women are to blame when both sexes have to go without adult egalitarian love — they renounce it voluntarily, and the man has to make do with what they call love.

‘True love puts the partner’s happiness first’, is the female definition of love. The man tries to adhere to it. But every time he feels for a woman what she expects of him — putting her happiness first — he is not happy with her; every time he is happy with a woman, he has putting himself first.

We have seen that women manipulate men’s instincts with ease. A woman need only be somewhat weaker, colder, and less intelligent than the man and presto, she has a provider for life. But is it right to do something just because it is easy? Is an action justified just because it results in one’s advantage?

We don’t have to do everything we can do, because we can do it. Civilized people do not hurt animals, even though they could. When will women become civilized enough to stop mistreating men? When will they cease from training their lovers to become providers, merely because they have the power to do so?

As long as they continue as they are, men have no alternative to polygamy. They need not torment themselves with guilt because of it. As long as women insist on simulating children, as long as they want protection whether they need it or not, men have a right to more than one woman at a time. They have a right to keep looking for a real woman, among all the little girls they encounter in the course of their lives, until they actually find one. In any case, they alone are the real victims of polygamy. Whether or not they want to victimize themselves thus, is ultimately for them to decide.

AVFM and J4MB support Bloodstained Men/Brother K

Paul Elam and Mike Buchanan · 14 September 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Brother K is a renowned American intactivist, and leads the charity Bloodstained Men & Their Friends. To the best of our knowledge, nobody in the English-speaking world has been more successful in terms of getting people involved in street activism, across the English-speaking world.

A trademark of the group is wearing white overalls with a red stain in the groin area, and both their male and female followers adopt this "uniform" (the group campaigns for the end of ALL genital mutilation, both male and female).

Both AVFM and J4MB wish to step up MGM-related work, and with this in mind, we recently contacted Brother K. The following is the start of this email exchange with Brother K, reproduced here with his kind permission. J4MB intends to start campaigning at Speakers' Corner and elsewhere in the coming weeks, wearing the "uniform", and promoting Bloodstained Men & Their Friends. Mike wrote:

> Brother K, good evening. It's been some time since we had an exchange, but I've long been an admirer of your work as reported at https://www.bloodstainedmen.com.
> I lead the British political party Justice for Men & Boys http://j4mb.org.uk, since its launch in 2013 the only party in the English-speaking world campaigning for the human rights of men and boys on many fronts. Ending MGM in the UK has been our #1 campaigning issue for the past four years or so, our successes include informing Philip Davies MP about the subject, such that he later focused on MGM at the last International Men's Day debate he hosted, in 2018, in which he outlined the illegality of MGM in the UK, and more besides.

> We've long had a good relationship with Paul Elam and A Voice for Men (AVfM), founded in 2009 http://avoiceformen.com, and his An Ear for Men http://anearformen.com. Between us, we've hosted the International Conferences on Men's Issues, of which there have been five since the first hosted by Paul in Detroit in 2014. There were presentations on MGM at the past four events, including by Tim Hammond and Steven Svoboda at the two London conferences. I can't promise anything at this stage, but we plan to have at least one MGM-related presentation at future events, and there may be an opportunity for you to speak at the 2021 conference in North America (host city TBA).

I thought we could term ourselves "Friends of Bloodstained Men", and start to include your URL in our leaflets and on our placards etc. We're keen to do what we can to help increase your exposure. In the meantime, keep up the great work!

Brother K replied:

> Mike, thank you for your kind letter and comments. I have followed your work in London, the protests and your arrest, the conferences, and your posts and videos, as well as Gary's and Paul's, including Paul's powerful declaration on Facebook earlier this year, challenging men to deal with this issue. Bloodstained Men cannot endorse a candidate under the IRS rules governing non-profits, but given that qualification, we wholeheartedly > support your work in the UK to stop this cruelty to boys, not only in the UK but around the world, and girls too, NOT a separate issue as the narrow-minded opponents of female circumcision have segregated genital cutting by gender to protect one gender only, and throw boys to the wolves. Absolutely use the bloodstained suits as you feel appropriate and helpful to your work in the UK.

> Bloodstained Men would be honored, Paul, to have a place on your website and in your work, and we certainly look forward to future collaboration on this issue, the fundamental right of a man to his own body, it's unbelievable that we have to convince people of the cruelty of the human rights violation implicit in cutting off part of a child's penis. I speak for James Loewen as well, his YouTube channel Bonobo3d, and for Bloodstained Men, that you may freely share and borrow any helpful content for your website and work.

Playlist of Ewan Jones's interviews of speakers and others at ICMI19

Mike Buchanan · 21 September 2019 · Archived copy · Original

The Honey Badger Brigade will be publishing ICMI19 presentations and other content in due course – I've heard of an ETA of late October – in the meantime I'd like to thank the relentlessly hard-working British videographer Ewan Jones for allowing us to duplicate his Chicago interviews on our growing ICMI19 playlist. In due course all the ICMI19 presentations and other published materials (e.g. panel discussions) will be posted there.

Ewan's channel is here, his own playlist of the same interviews here.

Support the Australian Government's Family Law Enquiry

Bettina Arndt · 23 September 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Bring it on, Prime Minister. When ScoMo was campaigning in the last election, he promised to stand up for the Quiet Australians whose voices are often silenced by noisy minority groups. Last week, with the announcement of a new parliamentary inquiry into our Family Court, he invited that silent majority to be well and truly heard. Boy, are the feminists fuming.

I've been doing various media interviews about this. Here's one from Perth radio 6PR

He's attracted their wrath by setting terms of reference for this inquiry which echo widespread community concerns about pronounced anti-male bias in the family court system, particularly regarding false accusations of violence being used to give women an unfair advantage in court battles. A woman requires no evidence that violence has actually occurred to obtain a violence order and remove her partner from their home, denying him contact with his children. Her allegation that she fears violence could occur is sufficient, or her claim that she's been emotionally, psychologically or financially abused.

A few months ago I was contacted by a retired chief inspector of police who wanted to speak out about the outrageous racket that has developed around these false violence accusations, with police required to "believe the victim" and turf men out of their homes, men they know are most likely innocent. I made a YouTube video in which he described the growing disquiet amongst the police and magistrates required to administer a system based on lies and bent on destroying men. I think we should circulate this widely to lend support to the need for this inquiry.

So now the government is asking for submissions regarding the granting of these domestic violence orders and their impact on court decisions and related questions of perjury in evidence to the court and the failure of the court to enforce their orders. The enforcement issue is particularly important given everyone knows the court allows women to constantly flaunt orders requiring them to allow fathers time with their children.

Pauline Hanson to act as Deputy Chair of the Family Law Enquiry

To set the cat amongst the pigeons, the government appointed Pauline Hanson, as Deputy Chair of the inquiry, a woman who has been speaking out for decades about anti-male bias in the court. The day the decision was announced Hanson gave interviews about women lying about domestic violence and men being driven to suicide through such tactics. She's certainly right on that front. I made another video recently highlighting research evidence that the major cause of male suicide in this country is relationship breakup.

It's been very entertaining watching the feminists go into total meltdown, using their influence on our mainstream media to parade a stream of people who claimed it was outrageous to suggest women ever lie about domestic violence – including the 86 year old Elizabeth Evatt, the first ever Family Court judge. After Hanson mentioned her own son faced false violence and sexual abuse accusations, a prominent feminist put up a call for Hanson's sons' ex-partners to come forth and allow her to tell their stories. Talk about blatant skulduggery.

I'm urging you all to get busy and write to your members of parliament supporting the government's action. It's very easy for politicians to cave to the outraged feminist activists. I'm sure most Australians have personal experience with men damaged by the family court system. We all need to step up and support this rare chance of a public hearing regarding the unfair treatment of men in our courts.

I'm posting here a submission from the former WA Law Reform Commission Augusto Zimmermann which includes evidence about false allegations. This should give you some solid data to use in your letters. Here's a simpler version you might prefer.

You might also like to read the introductory chapter of my book, #MenToo, which explains what led to my interest in family law. Over thirty years ago I was contacted by a retiring Family Court judge expressing concern about precisely these issues – which led ultimately to my involvement in various government committees seeking to address the bias in our system.

A great man in the free and open source community falls

Robert Brockway · 24 September 2019 · Archived copy · Original

This article is in response to an article published on medium.com by Selam G. Selam G ignited a firestorm that has resulted in the renowned computer scientist Richard Stallman resigning as president of an organisation that he founded and also from MIT.

Nearly one year ago I wrote an article expressing concerns over changes in the world of Free and Open Source Software (FOSS).

Generally, only people who have worked in the computer industry have heard of Richard Stallman, but we all benefit from his legacy. As the software industry was maturing in the 1970s and 80s it became more common for software to be distributed only in a binary format. This meant that users could run the software on their computer systems but they could not easily modify it or see how it worked. Richard Stallman saw the need for software licencing that would give people more freedom over the software that they used. The licencing initially developed by Stallman is widely used today alongside proprietary licencing and forms a cornerstone of the Internet. Software such as the Google Chrome and Firefox browsers, LibreOffice and much of the software that keeps the Internet running is available to us in the manner it is because of Stallman's ideas. Everyone reading this relies on the work of Stallman and those that came after him to enjoy the benefits of the modern information age.

Despite this, here we have yet another great man taken down by mob justice.

Selam G's article concerned an email that Stallman had written in which he had commented on the allegation made that Jeffrey Epstein had provided a then 17-year-old woman (Virginia Giuffre, formerly Virginia Roberts) for renowned computer scientist Marvin Minsky to have sex with.

Selam G noted in her article:

> There are so many things wrong with what Richard Stallman said I hardly know where to begin. First, he didn't even give the typical, whiney, 'he's accused but not convicted' defence. No, Stallman went much further than that. Instead, Stallman said "Let's assume that Marvin Minsky had sex with an underage girl who was a victim of child sex trafficking"…

What Selam G is describing as whiney is the presumption of innocence. The presumption of innocence is not some abstract concept that academics discuss in their ivory tower. It affects the lives of real people. A person who is accused should have an opportunity to face their accuser, respond to the accusation and to be judged by an independent party. How easily SJWs would cast that aside. They never seem to consider that if the presumption of innocence is cast aside that they too may be subject to arbitrary detention and punishment. They never seem to consider that other groups may be better at this than they are. Of course, Selam G herself will, as a woman, be advantaged at every stage if she ever has to pass through the criminal justice system.

Further Selam G misrepresented what Stallman wrote in the email. Selam G's own article notes that Stallman said:

> We can imagine many scenarios, but the most plausible scenario is that she presented herself to him as entirely willing. Assuming she was being coerced by Epstein, he would have had every reason to tell her to conceal that from most of his associates.

Stallman actually argued that Giuffre may have been coerced and was putting on a false front that she was willing (as someone under coercion or threat might do). He was not claiming that Giuffre was entirely willing as Selam G stated later in her article. The most charitable explanation possible is that Selam G lacks fluency in the English language and genuinely misunderstood what was said. But Selam G's own writings show that she is fluent in the language. A more likely explanation is that Selam G's self-confessed anger at the time that she wrote the article made it difficult for her to think clearly. Or perhaps she willfully and deliberately misrepresented what Stallman said.

Stallman does not seem to have been defending Marvin Minsky beyond asserting he may have had an honest mistake of fact defence in believing that Giuffre was not underage and was consenting to sex. Giuffre was 17 and the age of consent in the Virgin Islands is 18 so it's plausible that Minsky thought she was 18.

And all of this presumes that Marvin Minsky actually had sex with Giuffre.

Marvin Minsky was on Little St James, but there is a lack of evidence corroborating the claims that Minsky engaged in sex while on the island. Others have come out and said that when visiting the island they saw no evidence of Epstein's sex ring.

Stallman is correct when he talks about sexual assault earlier in his email:

> The injustice is in the word "assaulting". The term "sexual assault" is so vague and slippery that it facilitates accusation inflation: taking claims that someone did X and leading people to think of it as Y, which is much worse than X.

In many jurisdictions, Sexual assault has grown to include unwanted groping and unwanted kissing:

Nunavut, Canada:

> Sexual assault is a crime. It includes unwanted touching, kissing, grabbing and rape.

That escalated fast.

Canada:

> Sexual assault is an act of violence committed by a person in order to feel > power over another person. It can come in different forms:
> * Sexual touching of any kind that is unwanted or coerced, including kissing or groping.

Australia:

> Sexual assault may or may not begin with sexual harassment. It involves unwanted physical contact such as kissing, touching, fondling and grabbing and at its worst, culminates in rape, either digital or genital.

In the United States feminists are continuously pushing for a definition of sexual assault that includes kissing:

> Kristen Houser, the chief public affairs officer at NSVRC [National Sexual Violence Resource Centre], explained that any type of unwanted groping, touching or kissing is certainly in the definition of sexual assault.
> "It is absolutely on the continuum of sexual violence," Houser told The Huffington Post. "There are a lot of different ways that people can be sexually violated and exploited that don't need to require any physical contact, let alone sexual penetration. Sexually violent acts fall along a continuum that go from no contact to very brutal physical violations such as rape or sexual homicides. And we absolutely include any unwanted touching, kissing and groping on that continuum."

Later in her article, Selam G noted:

> There is nothing wrong with women. There is nothing wrong with girls in STEM. There are many women and many girls who, in spite of everything, love STEM-related disciplines. Some of them even go through 4-year > bachelors degrees at MIT, maybe even 7 years of a PhD, and then begin questioning whether they should continue in these fields, because they are filled to the brim with so, so many shitty men.

> Jeffrey Epstein. Marvin Minsky.
> Richard Stallman.
> Travis Kalanick. James Damore. The laundry list of men in tech and academia who have continued this pattern of harassment, misogyny, and discrimination

An interesting list she has there. Minsky has been discussed already. James Damore merely argued that there are intrinsic differences between men and women and provided evidence to support his argument. Damore has also made it clear he supports feminism.

With a chip like that on her should maybe Selam G might want to consider Separatist Feminism. FWIW, I fully support Separatist Feminism. Whenever I hear feminists talking about separation I always say: less talk, more separation!

Selam G provided the email thread to Vice who proceeded to misrepresent what Stallman had said in an article.

Selam G ends her article by saying this:

> Or remove them. Remove men like Richard Stallman and, I'm sure, the many others that are now hiding. #MeToo showed us that they are not safe, not as isolated as we thought in their towers of power and prestige.

No men are safe as a result of #MeToo.

> Remove everyone, if we must, and let something much better be built from the ashes.

Selam G showed her disdain for the presumption of innocence earlier in the article and now demonstrates a willingness to remove as many men as she sees fit. All of them if necessary. Let's not pretend for a moment that Selam G's comment here is actually gender-neutral.

Full of hyperbole and misrepresentations, Selam G's article really encapsulates the moral panic that is #MeToo and the anti-intellectualism endemic in feminism.

Recovering from the red pill rage

Tim Patten · 24 September 2019 · Archived copy · Original

In the popular 1999 science fiction film, The Matrix, the choice of taking a red pill or a blue pill symbolized the difference between accepting life as it is or remaining oblivious to reality. Over time, the metaphor has been adopted by the modern men's liberation movement to distinguish between those who understand the harm that women do to men and those who don't want to know.

In essence, being "red pill aware" means a man understands the nature of females and their instinctual behavior. He can peer through the fog of romantic love and marriage – the "blue pill world" – and see that intimate relationships often leave men in bad shape, undermining much of what they hold dear. In many cases, a sudden awareness evolves into something darker – "red pill rage" – reflecting the anger a man feels after realizing that the world works in a different way than he's long been told.

Unfortunately, this notion of having been led down the garden path into circumstances and ways of life that were against their own interests has also led some to react – and overreact. It has motivated them to make angry, bitter and questionably misogynistic pronouncements to each other and in public, similar to the following:

"Women don't love you; they love what you can do for them!"

"All women are gold diggers!"

"Women are cock-teasers and attention-whores!"

"My ex can eat my shit and die!"

"Love is the delusion that one woman is different from another."

"Women are manipulative, attention-seeking, inconsistent and emotional!"

Divorce and custody

But while such ugly words are regrettable and don't really help matters, the fallout that men have suffered from selfish and self-centered female behavior has been destructive and widespread. Every year, approximately one million men end up as victims of divorce and suffer considerably as a result. In most cases, this event proves to be the most traumatic experience they've been through, leaving them dehumanized, their lives destroyed, and prone to suicide.

What makes it worse is the way in which things frequently unfold. Quite simply, it is not uncommon for women to surprise partners with divorce notices. According to one MGTOW forum member, "My wife and I were having difficulties because I was dedicating extra time to my passion, a new work venture. But I never imagined she would divorce me!" Another participant was also given marching orders out of the blue, though apparently his in-laws and lawyer knew about it before it happened. "She devastated me and my three children one night after 17 years of marriage. The false allegations soon followed after [I won] 50/50 custody."

Still, not all husbands are in the dark before the bad news landed on their doorstep. In many cases, there are warnings signs beforehand and a pattern of abuse and mistreatment that suggest it is only a matter of time before wives are readying the divorce documents. As one forum participant put it, "She had been plotting, drugging and poisoning me for years. She tried to drive me to suicide [through] an ambush breakup and [by] using a 'domestic violence' scam to legally kidnap my children."

Raging out

Whether men see it coming or not, divorce is often the trigger for red pill awareness – and red pill rage. It should be no surprise to anyone that men who have their children or property taken away from them in the wake of divorce are shattered and depressed and react accordingly. Often, they experience disillusionment and profound feelings of anger, bitterness, and resentment toward marriage and cohabitation in general.

In some instances, this state of affairs lasts a few days or weeks. But for many men whose lives have been upended and scarred by the wrenching reality of modern divorce, they can remain in a funk indefinitely or even on a permanent basis. Over time, their rage continues to simmer and bubble up, occasionally boiling over after seeing images of tampons and other reminders of the person who caused them to suffer when the divorce took place.

Rage triggering

Red pill rage can also erupt for other, less personal reason, even for men who have not suffered through the tragedy of divorce. Weddings are one trigger: they glorify females and the vow, “to love, obey and care for you forever,” which so few women seem capable of honoring. For those who previously abandoned the blue pill myths, they already know that many marriages end in divorce; in those that don’t, most men simply end up very unhappy with their partners.

Other seemingly innocent events, including a co-worker announcing his engagement, news that a woman has gotten pregnant, or everyday displays of affection can also be the catalysts for a welling-up of resentment and rage. Moreover, the way that relationships are romanticized in movies and literature can bring matters to a head, especially when a man suddenly realizes that everybody – including his own mother – has lied to him about female nature and what women actually want.

In reality, parents and most others care that men care about – along with society more broadly – have long lied to men about the way things work; mainly that men must sacrifice his goals for a good job so he can care for his family. Consequently, when they try to follow along and do what they are told, they end up being screwed over. The fact is that marriage isn’t about love, it’s about economics and a deep partnership of shared goals. Women are hypergamous by nature, and they seem happy to take men’s money, kids, house, etc. and leave them with nothing. Unfortunately, most males don’t realize this until a divorce hits.

Equally oppressed

Ironically or tragically – it is not clear which makes more sense – some women even view the red pill rage ugly comment as proof of just how shitty men really are. For many females, life can be summed up by the James Brown song, “It’s a Man’s Man’s Man’s World,” but they almost certainly haven’t experienced the punishment directed at men in divorce and custody hearings. And unlike their experience of living in a world where everything is dropped for a woman in need, they fail to see that no one lifts a finger when a man cries out for help.

Undoubtedly, countless women have, throughout history, been humiliated, harassed, abused, raped and killed at the hands of men, and that continues to be true today. But it is not all one-sided. Men have also been the victims of mistreatment and oppression, largely from other men but from women as well. The reality is that many people have been the victims of discrimination, injustice, hatred and violence. Regardless of gender, there is plenty of anger to go around.

Conclusion

When it comes to red pill rage, however, it is curable. One way for those affected to turn things around is to step back and look at the role they had in creating the situation at hand. What choices did they make and actions did they take before any traumatic events transpired? What could they have done differently, and what can they do now to ensure that such unhappy circumstances never occur again?

Mostly, those who swallow the red pill eventually come to a healthy realization about the underlying causes of such tragedies in relationships and develop a certain mindfulness about themselves and others. They understand that humans are driven by basic instincts, which include a primordial need for sex and the human connection. They learn that the way to deal with those relating to the opposite sex is to see them for what they truly are.

With this, a man will feel liberated, instilled with fresh wisdom about women, marriage, feminism and society. He should take action: institute a daily regimen of exercise, workouts and self-improvement. With a little conscious raising, he will be ready and willing to move toward his passions and take care of and invest in himself. He can push himself to his limits, strengthening and nurturing the sleeping giant within. He will no longer be angry or bitter or resentful. He will have the freedom and control to make choices that help him achieve whatever he wants – and be whatever he wants to be.

It was a hot late-summer afternoon at the ballpark and I was thirsty, but I was tired of beer (never thought I'd say that). Then I happened upon a beverage vendor selling an attention-getting concoction called BuzzBallz. It was packaged in a plastic container that approximated the size and appearance of a baseball. The Texas Rangers logo (one of the product's "proud partners") was also displayed. Hardly enough to slake one's thirst, but at 15% alcohol by volume, this pre-mixed cocktail offered roughly three times the buzz of a beer for the same price.

I selected the Pineapple Colada Chiller and took a closer look at the container while I indulged. Included were the obligatory government warning about the risk of alcoholic beverages, the deposit paid for the container in certain states (15¢ in Vermont!), the kosher seal of approval, the bar code, etc. Then I noticed something out of the ordinary. Right below the "Please Drink Responsibly" plea was "WOMEN OWNED."

Well, I'd come across this phrase before. I'd seen it in storefront signs and print advertisements for various small businesses. But this time the O in WOMEN had a graphic in its stead so it looked something like W❊MEN OWNED. In the teeniest-tiniest type possible, a "TM" was appended to the phrase.

What a revelation! All this time I thought women-owned was a compound adjective. When I wasn't paying attention, it morphed into a trademark!

Well, my curiosity was piqued so further investigation was warranted. As I suspected, W❊MEN OWNED™ was not a mere statement of ownership but a certification. No surprise that it was the result of a public-private partnership of government agencies (e.g., the Small Business Administration) and industry trade groups. While there are some slight differences in the definitions of female ownership, the consensus seems to be that the enterprise must be "at least 51% owned, operated and controlled on a daily basis by one or more (in combination) female American citizens." One might wonder about that discriminatory "American citizens" qualification. The SJW's have some unfinished business here!

Now as you may expect, a product has to pass a smell test to get that W❊MEN OWNED trademark. As often happens with set-asides and affirmative action programs, a number of women (and minorities) are set up as corporate figureheads when in fact they have little power. Yet businesses have every incentive to showcase a female impersonator, so to speak, as the titular head of the enterprise.

The Center for Responsive Politics, a D.C. research institute that tracks government spending, estimated that the federal government awarded $25.4 billion in contracts to women-owned businesses in 2017. That's peanuts by fedgov standards, but big bucks for small business owners. Could make the difference between mediocrity and prosperity…or bankruptcy.

Of course, that gynocentric imprimatur comes with a bureaucratic jargon. There are a number of acronyms out there with overlapping meanings and missions. Admittedly, a lot of them sound like radio station call letters. Among them are:

WBE or WOBE – a woman-owned business enterprise.

WBENC – Women's Business Enterprise National Council (these are the folks behind the aforementioned W❊MEN OWNED™ movement.

WOBC – Woman-Owned Business Certification (a program in Texas). Ironically, WOBC (91.5 on the FM dial) is also a student-run radio station at Oberlin, one of the wokest (or is it wackiest?) of the woke colleges, and now one of the weakest of the woke, thanks to a $44 million damages award as a result of a lawsuit stemming from their wokeness.

WOSB – Woman Owned Small Business (and let's not forget EDWOSB, with ED standing for "economically disadvantaged”). Add one more qualifier to that acronym and you have the makings of an eyechart.

WOB – a woman-owned business, but according to the Free Dictionary web site, there are 29 such acronyms, so context is key. In other words, if you’re a fan of the World of Beer chain of gastropubs, beware.

But we’re just getting started. Also involved are the U.S. Women’s Chamber of Commerce and the National Women Business Owners Corporation. That’s just in the USA. Other countries have their own organizations and acronyms. And don’t forget the global do-gooders, in this case WEConnect International.

But let’s get back to the Buzzballz. As it turns out, they are the brainchild of a high school teacher in a Dallas suburb. The baseball container is a variation on the company’s original multi-colored containers that have been on sale at liquor stores, supermarkets, and other outlets in 40 states. After ten years of product development, there are currently 13 flavors available (including such racy flavors as “Choc Tease”) and more are on the way. Appropriately enough, given the potency of the beverages, the founder’s name is Merilee Kick. Only a Rockette would be a better fit for such a moniker.

If you’re curious, you can go to the company web site and see for yourself that Merliee Kick is indeed the CEO. In fact, she was prominent enough to be the subject of an interview in Forbes. Look a little further, however, and you might come to the conclusion that the operation is really a family business. Her husband is the CFO, one son is President, and another is Vice-President. Also, one Andrew Kick is West Coast Sales Director. One has to wonder…if Merilee Kick kicks the bucket, does the W❊MEN OWNED™ seal of approval have to be removed? Or is there some wort of W❊MEN FOUNDED trademark out there? Not yet but stay tuned.

Given the bureaucratic maze a company has to negotiate in order to get that prized W❊MEN OWNED™ status, some positive effect on the bottom line must be anticipated. Doubtless a certain percentage of feminists and white knights may be persuaded to choose such products, even without any substantive competitive advantage. Needless to say, there are no MEN ❊WNED certification programs out there and there never will be.

Now I’ve never given much thought to who owns the products or services I patronize. I know that some of them are women-owned, but I never took a poll. Yet that W❊MEN OWNED™ logo sticks in my craw. It implies that the product is superior simply because it comes from a woman-owned company. Just as the Non-GMO or Organic logos imply benefits above and beyond products that lack these logos, the W❊MEN OWNED status seems to indicate a superior product.

Of course, offering a superior product at a decent price has always been a workable business model, but in recent years, something new has been added. It’s not enough to please just stockholders and customers. Today a company must show profits with a human face. So capitalism is trending warm and fuzzy…let’s call it the Ben & Jerry’s syndrome. Yeah, we’re trying to make a buck here, but our hearts are in the right place. Buy our product and you’re not only indulging yourself, you’re helping to make the world a better place. Buy from a W❊MEN OWNED™ company and you’re enhancing female empowerment. So you can feel good about yourself with every purchase you make from us…the more you buy, the better you’ll feel!

Considering how few people scrutinize the small print on labels, it’s easy to dismiss the certification program as small potatoes. In years past, there have been other ways of tapping into identity politics. Back when Yellow Pages were ubiquitous, there was such a thing as the Christian Yellow Pages. I suppose that’s just a way of keeping money in the family, so to speak, but in some quarters it could be considered anti-semitic, anti-Muslim, anti-atheist, anti-Buddhist, anti-Zoroastrian, or whatever. Not quite up there with the Brownshirts painting Stars of David or “Juden!” on Jewish-owned businesses but perhaps a baby step in that direction. So one could hypothesize that W❊MEN OWNED™ is in reality anti-male. After all, if businesses owned by women are garnering larger and larger market shares, then men’s businesses must be losing market shares.

That W❊MEN OWNED™ logo is a major turn-of for me, but I certainly am not advocating an across-the-board boycott. Here’s why:

I enjoyed my Buzzballz adult beverage at the ballpark. As the name of the product implies, I did get a buzz. I can foresee a time when it is available at ballparks nationwide, as the pseudo-baseball container could certainly be adapted for other major league teams (maybe they've already done so), especially for teams that need to beef up their roster of female vendors to satisfy local statutes or ordinances. From baseballs it's just a short step to tennis balls, mini-soccer balls, mini-basketballs, mini-footballs, etc. The containers could catch on with the collectibles/sports memorabilia crowd. Hell, if the company goes public, purchasing some stock might be a good idea.

But that's blue-sky thinking. The current reality is that I can get buzzed, blitzed, or something in-between while underwriting the empowerment of women. I regret that I have but one liver to give for my countrywomen.

In a sense, this type of female empowerment is not as toxic as the old-school type. A century ago armies of hatchet-faced harridans succeeded in making alcohol illegal nationwide. Now that third-wave feminists have identified booze as a revenue stream, demon rum has sprouted wings and a halo.

In a world getting more and more gynocentric by the day, that W❊MEN OWNED™ logo may become commonplace. It may go beyond business. Perhaps one day W❊MEN OWNED™ will be tattooed on the wrist of every adult male just before he is admitted to the local concentration camp…privatized and W❊MEN OWNED™, of course.

But it's all good – and for your own good, guys. In the service of gynocentrism: Arbeit macht frei.

Russia Today TV: France targets toys in battle against early gender stereotyping

Mike Buchanan · 29 September 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Three days ago I was in the studios of RTTV (Russia Today TV) near Westminster for a live discussion with Paola Diana, an Italian feminist based in the UK, on the issue of the (deeply feminist) French government targeting toys in a battle against early gender stereotyping. I was in a darkened room with a technician, and two strong lights bearing down on me. I had no sight (only audio links) of the British interviewer in the Moscow studio, nor of Paola Diana. The video has just been released on the RTTV channel.

As is well known now, White Ribbon Australia went into liquidation today. We'd known they were in dire financial straits for a while, but this has been a long time coming. In order to commemorate this joyous day, let's take a walk down memory lane.

The White Ribbon Foundation is renamed White Ribbon Australia and finds a new way to be patronising to both men and women.

2014

Whiteribbon.org is launched, but not by White Ribbon Australia!

A Voice for Men reveals the truth behind White Ribbon Australia's finances.

Representing A Voice for Men I interviewed Barry Williams on White Ribbon Day.

2015

White Ribbon Australia suspends Tanveer Ahmed for wrongthink.

A Voice for Men goes through the financials of White Ribbon Australia again and shows the world the true nature of this organisation.

2016

White Ribbon Australia bullies a legend.

Eventually WIPO found in their favour, but we're getting the last laugh, eh White Ribbon Australia?

2017

I wrote an open letter to the chair of the board of White Ribbon Australia asking them how they intend to address the fact that they ignore the reality of domestic and intimate partner violence. I'm still waiting for an answer. And now it will never come.

2018

White Ribbon Australia flipflops on an important feminist issue causing consternation and hand-wringing among true believers.

Many supporters and sponsors abandon the organisation.

2019

White Ribbon Australia goes into liquidation!

Ah memories. Is that a tear in my eye? Nah. I'll let Pharrell Williams tell you how I'm feeling…

Before finishing up I want to quote fellow MRA Tom Voltz who, on hearing of the demise of White Ribbon Australia, had this to say:

> Dear White Ribbon,
>
> Fuck you, fuck your executive salaries, fuck your SJW-esque approach, fuck your government funding, fuck your propaganda, fuck your indoctrination of our school children, fuck your hatred of boys and men, fuck you, fuck the horse you rode in on and fuck your grandmother you fucking fuck-fucking fucktards!
> Good fucking riddance!
> Lots of love,
> The MRM

Couldn’t have said it better myself Tom.

Philip Davies MP speaks during the Domestic Abuse Bill

Mike Buchanan · 3 October 2019 · Archived copy · Original

The second reading of the Domestic Abuse Bill (2017-19) took place yesterday, 2 October, the final day of the annual Conservative party conference in Manchester – the day of Boris Johnson's speech – when most Conservative MPs were still at the conference. Maybe the day was chosen because most of the criticisms of the bill could be expected to come from Conservative MPs. The indefatigable Philip Davies MP, however, was there. He was one of the recipients of our commentary on the Bill, which we recently provided to a number of MPs and peers, including Philip.

The debate lasted nearly seven hours. Almost all the 40+ designated speakers were feminist women, with stories of female victims and male victims. The Shadow Minister for Women and Equalities uttered the following lie, a claim made by many of the MPs who spoke in the debate:

> Statistics show the overwhelming majority of victims of domestic violence are women, and the overwhelming majority of perpetrators are men.

Anyone watching the debate could be forgiven for thinking that male victims and female perpetrators are all but unknown.

Philip Davies's speech came late in the session, by which point speakers were being resticted to 5 minutes. He was interrupted by Maria Miller, the chair of the Women and Equalities Committee, who showed no interest in male victims throughout the debate (she also hasn't bothered to attend Philip Davies's debates on International Men's Day these past few years). The video of Philip's contribution is here:

My wife (Maggie) was watching tv the other evening and an advertisement promoting an upcoming female version of the Full Monty (a strip show) was being promoted in order to raise awareness for breast cancer.

I shrugged it off, perhaps a little numb to the endless drive to help and protect our women and girls while men and boys remain mostly invisible.

Maggie was the one who got riled up. She turned and said:

"Why couldn't women decide to raise awareness of a male disease and raise funds for men? Just once! "

A few weeks earlier a group of celebrity men stripped naked to raise awareness of prostate cancer and men's health.

What irked Maggie was the fact that women had to immediately jump on the wagon and do the same, while pretending that our "awareness' of breast cancer is still a huge problem and one they were determined to shine a spotlight on. She asked why these women couldn't have acknowledged the already enormous focus on breast cancer and join their brothers in solidarity and donate their proceeds to prostate cancer as well.

Nope.

It's always been girls are for girls and boys are for girls too- if they know what is good for them. Sure, males may occasionally quietly do some work on behalf of their sick and dying brothers but it had better be after they have demonstrated their tireless devotion to supporting women's needs, whatever they may be at any given time.

I don't think Maggie has heard the term gynocentrism but this was what was driving her anger.

I have always been aware of the endless promotion of causes affecting females. Even today I was confronted with an ad which began before the YouTube clip I wanted to watch telling me how we must donate to a cause working to end the persecution of young girls. These girls are forced into becoming child brides. Fair enough. But these ads always imply by omission that it is only young girls around the world who suffer any kind of indignity, oppression or injustice because of their gender.

This is a lie.

[image]

If the ledger was balanced and the empathy shared, no man I know would raise an eyebrow when confronted with another campaign to support females in whatever area it might be.

But it isn't balanced and never has been.

This is why Maggie was angry. That is why I did a quick google check to see if Maggie's blood was boiling for no good reason. I actually typed "women raising funds for men's cancer" into the search engine and the best I could find was an obscure story about men who were motor cycling to raise money for men's mental health and prostate cancer. A few partners of these men had decided to join the bike ride to help raise some funds.

That was it.

Just to give you an indication of the scale of this campaign, marketing and events manager, Jane Sim, said that with a month of fundraising to go, the 2019 event had already set a new fundraising record and surpassed the target of $65,215 raised in 2018.

That's a total no-one should belittle but when you compare it to the millions being raised by volunteers working to fund women's health (not to mention the enormous disparity in government funding of women's health as compared to men's) you begin to understand the enormous chasm which exists when you compare the concern expressed in monetary terms for men and women's illness and misfortune.

I decided to do a little research on the voluntary funding of women's illness by men here in Australia. It was quite an eye opener.

We currently have an annual event called, The Pink Test. A test is the name given to an international cricket contest. Each "test" is played over a five-day period (yes-you read correctly). On the third day of the Sydney test, the crowd are asked to adorn themselves in pink and players wear pink caps onto the field. The cause is a worthy one.

Legendary Australian bowler, Glen McGrath lost his wife to breast cancer ten years ago. Glen came up with this idea and it has become an integral part of the cricket scene for a decade. Here's a little blurb explaining the Foundation's purpose:

> The McGrath Foundation raises funds to place McGrath Breast Care Nurses in communities right across Australia, as well as making breast health understanding a priority.
> While more than 54,000 families have been supported by 11 McGrath Breast Care Nurses, there's still lots more to do to reach every family going through breast cancer.

So, Glen's initiative has raised and will continue to raise millions of dollars for women with breast cancer.

Bettina Arndt has been fascinated by the inherent desire of men to put women's needs ahead of their own. In this brief chat, she shares her insights and frustrations about the endless support men provide to women, often at their own expense.

Note that Bettina's interview has had 460 views in a month. This, sadly, says it all. Even when people do try to speak about the terrible imbalance in funding and attention, no-one wants to listen.

Bettina raises some very important questions in the conversation with Isaac Butterfield. She explains the devastating effects of prostate cancer on men's sexuality and identity. She bemoans the incredible indifference displayed by our government and the general apathy of people with regard to men's health.

Losing a breast is devastating but it is ultimately (if the women survives and 90% of women do) a cosmetic problem which does not impact a woman's ability to actually function sexually in the physical way prostate cancer devastates men.

No doubt women can have mental hurdles to overcome with regard to self-image but reconstructive surgery can replace the lost breast or breasts. No such options are available to men and their sexual performance is not devastated by self-image issues. The problems are physical and sometimes insurmountable.

Incontinence is another issue and usually whispered about. If it is ever discussed in public it is usually by a stand-up comedian or someone making light of the horrendous embarrassment and loss of confidence the problem creates.

What's that you say? Women's bodies can suffer similar devastation simply by giving birth. True. But the tribulations of women during childbirth are incredibly well documented and women are often placed on a pedestal by their male partners for this very reason. Many men are in awe of what some women must endure in childbirth. They acknowledge the suffering and the damage done to their partner's body.

Prostate cancer still tends to be a subject of mirth and indifference by both men and women. We joke about the struggle to pee before the problem is uncovered and we joke about erectile dysfunction and incontinence after the surgery and radiation treatment.

[image]

So, let's turn our attention to another sporting institution in my beloved land down under which dedicates one of its annual clashes to breast cancer.

AFL is the most popular sport in Australia and such is its popularity it has been ranked in the world's top four most attended sports based on average crowds per game.

[image]
The Pink Lady
The Breast Cancer Network Australia established the Pink Lady event in 2005 in order to take advantage of this game's public appeal.

This night has raised hundreds of thousands of dollars for breast cancer research and of course "raised awareness".

Individual men have also gone to great extremes to raise funds for breast cancer.

Former AFL star, Shane Crawford cycled across Australia in 2013 in order to raise money for the Breast Cancer Network Australia. He raised 1.3 million dollars. Crawford had performed another extraordinary feat in 2010 when he ran from Adelaide to Melbourne (780 km) to raise funds and awareness for breast cancer.

I remember the wall to wall coverage of his ride across Australia. There was endless footage of women dressed in pink lining the streets of the country towns he passed through, some weeping and all cheering and applauding this man. Many of the women were asked to relate their personal story of their battle with breast cancer. It was the "feel good" story of the year.

I must confess to feeling conflicted as I watched the adulation Crawford received, which culminated in the completion of his incredible journey in Perth.

When he first announced his intention to ride his bike 3600 km in front of the live Footy Show audience the crowd erupted in a frenzy of cheers and wild applause. Here we had a largely male audience, with a footy show comprising all male hosts devoting their attention and time to an issue which overwhelmingly affects women. This same show which has been relentlessly attacked by feminists for its misogynistic attitudes and "blokey behavior."

Wonderful.

"This was a life-changing experience, the most rewarding of my life. The money raised and the awareness created has exceeded all expectations. We have connected with so many rural communities and offered hope to the women with breast cancer and their families," Crawford said.

Every time I read or hear the word awareness, I want to gag. We are drowning in a sea of pink at any given time in the year. Various retail outlets and supermarkets are constantly arrayed in pink.

[image]

And Shane has the temerity to suggest 'raising awareness" was a major driving force behind his incredible feat of endurance.

Hats off to the man for achieving his dream. The cynic in me wondered if Shane had ever allowed his mind to wander as he drifted off to sleep in the days leading up to his journey and briefly surmise that the chances of him being greeted with adoring mobs and teary eyes wherever he went was greatly enhanced by his decision to raise awareness for breast cancer rather than prostate or bowel cancer.

[image]

Colour me bitter! That of course would have been the accusation had I voiced what I really thought. Bitter and envious. I was neither.

I am simply being honest. Every day someone would make a misty-eyed comment about Crawford's incredible courage and compassion and I bit my tongue. If I ever expressed my cynical thought out loud, I would have been torn apart. But it was enough for me to feel it in my gut.

[image]

I could not uncover the primary motivation for his ride.

Perhaps Shane's mum had been diagnosed with breast cancer or another loved one had been lost to the disease.

He had every right to ride for them.

But anyone with eyes to see and ears to hear must know that breast cancer is the most highly funded and publicly acknowledged cancer in the country. His "awareness raising" motivation rings terribly hollow. Surely brain cancer or bowel cancer are in far more need of a little public awareness- raising as well as funds?

No doubt his feat has helped women and I suppose if you are going to do something extraordinary you have every right to decide who you are going to do it for.

My answer to such an understandable statement would be this.

Imagine if I said I was going to climb Mt Everest to raise funds for Scotch College so they can build a bigger library for the boys who attend the school.

No-one could question my courage or selflessness but I can assure you the inquisition online and, in the media, would be frightening.

"Why in God's name would he be giving funds to such an elite, rich school when there are so many others in far more need of financial support and a public profile!"

My reply:

"I'm climbing the mountain so I can direct the money wherever I wish!" would be a very fair one. Don't think for one minute that it would stem the tidal wave of vitriol which would completely envelope my achievement and make me a pariah in the eyes of some.

If you accept the truth of my Mt Everest climb analogy then you will understand what motivates my cynicism about Crawford. He knows no-one would be insane enough to even whisper any criticism of the charity he chose to support.

Maybe I'm crazy.

Shane's whole journey just underlined the powerful, almost irresistible pull and appeal of gynocentric actions.

Now, let me be clear. In recent years the AFL has created a game of footy to raise funds for men's health prostate cancer. But my article is asking why women never seem to gather either as a sporting group or any other female collective and decide to raise funds for men. Aren't women supposedly renowned for their nurturing, empathetic natures?

[image]

We also have Movember-which is a relatively new initiative and dedicated to raising awareness of men's health issues. Yet even this idea was attacked by feminists! They branded the whole idea sexist and exclusionary! So even when men decide to do something for themselves, they are attacked for being self centred and promoting masculinity!

Let Jacob (a male feminist) explain in his own words:

> I hate Movember so much, on Halloween, I shaved my scruffy beard-in-progress so no one would think I was participating. There have been plenty of critiques of Movember that describe it as sexist or exclusionary, which it is. But you don't need to treat it as a microaggression to find something troubling in it. Above all else, Movember irritates me because it's not so much about cancer awareness as it is about masculinity awareness. It starts from the assumption that men are somehow uniquely imperiled—threatened by all these horrible diseases—and then tells us that we can save them by trumpeting an outward signifier of masculinity, the mustache. Movember says > that we protect men by celebrating masculinity. And that's ridiculous.

There is yet another example of a male celebrity going to an extraordinary extreme in order to raise funds (and awareness) for a cancer which his sister was battling and which ultimately took her life. The illness? Breast cancer.

Here's what Samuel Johnson, a well-known Australian actor did.

Samuel Johnson is setting off on February 15th on a marathon 15,000 KM unicycle ride around Australia, to raise $1 Million for breast cancer.

Samuel has contacted the AUS to invite all Australian unicyclists to join in and help out with this mammoth ride, which is going to take him a year to complete!

Here's what Samuel has to say to all unicycle riders:

> Hello!
> My name is Samuel Johnson. My sister has terminal breast cancer.
>
> She is the mother of two beaut boys and as such is keen for me to help her remind every mum in the land to be breast aware.
>
> How? Well, starting on the 15th of February, 2013 I will ride my unicycle around the entire country, hitting up hundreds of communities and every capital city.
>
> We are officially attempting to break the Guinness world-record for longest distance traveled on a one-wheeler (15,000 kms) and are proud of our lofty aim to raise $1 million for the Garvan Research Foundation.
> It's called the Love Your Sister Ride and will take an entire year to complete.

There is so much more I could add. Many more fundraisers I could focus on but I think my message is apparent.

I think some may argue that the reason women's sports teams don't bother to fund raise for male specific diseases is because they don't have the profile or financial capabilities that male sports have. They would probably blame that on sexism too.

This is not an explanation for the absence of female support for men.

Netball Victoria and I am certain many other minor Netball associations raise funds for breast cancer. The other pertinent fact is that many suburban football clubs (male) have a special day put aside to raise money for breast cancer.

In Australia, we don't have the college sport set up America enjoys. Each suburb has its own local football club and ground which survives on handouts they can beg from their local council and the goodwill of volunteers who take raise funds for equipment and the very minimal payments players receive. Even these bottom tier (often amateur) clubs focus their energy on raising money for breast cancer!

> "Clubs get involved by wearing pink football socks and also just by running charity events and auctions on the day.
> "'Pinking up' as it's called is a big visual show of support.
>
> "19,500 thousand people are diagnosed every year, including men, so it's not just a women-only disease," Mullinger said.
>
> "BCNA are the peak national support organisation for breast cancer Australia, we fund support for the women and their families, that's our key service.
>
> "Everything that we provide is provided for free to the women, men and families.
> "Breast cancer just touches so many people and once it becomes even more personal you just know that it's worth fighting for.

Notice how this is fund raising for men too! The 0.001% of males who suffer from breast cancer are not forgotten! We are all benefiting from these local fundraisers!

Nothing I have written is a revelation. Simply sitting down and having a closer look at the all -encompassing magnitude of the problem which is so deeply rooted in our society was a shock and I was red pilled when just a boy!

It's ironic that one of the qualities people automatically attribute to females is that of compassion and empathy. Yet it seems in practice, it is men who exhibit this quality in a very authentic and visible manner.

> Compassion is concern for the sufferings or misfortunes of others. It is the feeling that arises when you are confronted with another's suffering and feel motivated to relieve that suffering.
> Dr Anil Kumar Sinha

This seems to be an apt description of what men have been doing for women for a long time, Doc.

The Feminist Clown World, vs. The Movie Joker

Peter Ryan · 13 October 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Warning: This article may contain spoilers. I have tried to minimise them as much as possible.

By now some people may be aware of the "controversy"[1] surrounding the recent movie Joker[2]. This is a manufactured controversy because someone (Todd Phillips) decided to make a film that challenged the feminist, left-wing narrative about toxic masculinity and the 'white male' (the feminist left's scapegoat for every problem).

Our entertainment industry and particularly Hollywood, has been peddling an anti-male agenda that there is something wrong with men and masculinity for many years now. So naturally when a movie is made that encourages people to begin questioning the narrative put forward by our media that men are inherently evil and toxic, there is a backlash from the elitist feminist establishment.

Rotten Tomatoes as of the 12th of October 2019, shows a public rating of 90% for Joker and a critic rating of 68%[3]. Judging from the names of the publications that are rating it rotten or one/two stars, the movie has managed to annoy the right people. At approximately the same time as the Joker was released, the Batwoman tv series has been released with an 11% public rating on Rotten Tomatoes[4] compared with 72% from the critics.

There has been an ideological agenda within the entertainment industry for some time now, to invade any genre that appeals predominately to men and make it about empowering women. Science fiction in particular has been targeted. This is a deliberate attempt by feminists to control the culture and ensure gynocentrism pervades every corner of society.

As we saw with The Last Jedi, the feminist influence in the film industry is not just satisfied with making movies that revolve around female empowerment at the expense of a good story, they must also make sure that their female protagonists beat and humiliate men.

People are rapidly getting tired of feminist identity politics and its showing in the public ratings of "woke" films, tv shows and video games and also in the declining purchase of products, video games and merchandise from companies that put feminist ideology before the customer.

People want to be entertained and served. People are not paying to be lectured to. Men in particular want to buy products and watch entertaining content without being told they are toxic because they happen to have penis. This will be learnt the hard way no doubt- Go woke go broke.

We live in a world where slogans like the "future is female"[5] is promoted in politics and where mainstream media organisations publish articles discussing "why can't we hate men"[6]. We live in a world where women can publish books[7] and articles[8] about the end of men, with the full support of publishers and the mainstream media. We live in a world where women receive support to run multiple public debates (see this link[9] and this link[10]) to affirm that the male half of the human race is obsolete[11] in buildings that men constructed and while men keep their lights on at night, their water running and the rest of the essential infrastructure and economy operating.

At the same time all of this is occurring, men are told we live in a patriarchy that oppresses women. We are told that men are privileged and women are victimised and how much worse women have it in society. This is the modern feminist clown world: Women claim they are oppressed in a patriarchy while women write books, articles and have debates about men being obsolete and why we should hate men. Let us honestly ask which sex is really privileged here? The sex that can openly and publicly denigrate the other sex by calling them obsolete and encouraging hatred toward them, while the other sex is told to respect them in domestic violence messaging and government funded ads no matter what. It is women that are privileged and feminist ideology is merely psychological projection by a group of entitled feminist women.

Apparently men do not have a right to exist or have a future in this society, but remember 'it is men that are privileged.'

That is of course perfectly logically consistent for feminists, because this is the society feminism has created. Men make up the majority of our homeless, suicides and workplace deaths. They have a considerably shorter life expectancy than women and yet receive substantially less health funding for their health issues. Boys are falling far behind girls in an education system that prioritises girls needs and young men are being shut out of employment opportunities because of selective hiring and quotas that blatantly discriminate against men and favour women. Then there is the bias against men in family court and divorce that men experience. The list goes on and on.

Feminism has always been about dehumanising men to exploit them and using a false and deceitful narrative of victimhood and centuries of fictious "patriarchal" oppression to justify and rationalise that exploitation. The one constant in the feminist mind is simply this: Women matter and men don't.

What appears to be conflicted views of the world i.e. women claiming they are being oppressed versus women claiming the future is female and men being obsolete, is really just two faces of the same bigoted gynocentric mind.

The Joker

The Joker has been attacked because it challenges the assertion by the left and explicitly from feminist ideology, that we live in a patriarchy that puts male well-being above female well-being. Joker shines a light on male disposability[12] and the complete lack of regard society has for the suffering and marginalisation of men and boys. But what the media really finds so irritating about the film is that it exposes the lie that male violence has its roots in toxic masculinity and the patriarchy. Men are apparently violent because of toxic masculinity and male privilege.

No other factor is at play and to utter such claims is heresy to the feminist ideological orthodoxy that now governs and runs our society. That is the message we have shoved down our throats from our domestic violence industry on a regular basis and by our elitist feminist media, governments and institutions.

There is a powerful message in the Joker– That much of male violence does not come from toxic masculinity, but from a toxic society that treats men and boys like they are garbage. A great deal of male violence is a reflection of the contempt society has for men and its complete disregard for male well-being and suffering.

That is the embarrassing truth the feminist establishment does not want to acknowledge, because they have contributed to that societal mindset. This societal mentality of apathy toward male suffering, was captured in a part of the movie when Arthur Fleck (The Joker) says:

> "If it was me dying on the sidewalk, you'd walk right over me. I pass you everyday and you don't notice me! But these guys, what, because Thomas Wayne went and cried about them on TV?" (The wealthy men on the train that beat him up get sympathy, he does not)"[13]

Men are expected to perform and conform. When men perform and conform, society cares about such men to the extent that they are useful to society (like Thomas Wayne and his employees).

Men are regarded as human doings in this gynocentric culture and not as human beings. Concern for male well-being is conditional on the utility they provide to society. Concern for female well-being is unconditional. Women are supported without having to do anything, they just have to exist. When men do not perform they don't exist to society.

When men do not conform, even when they are doing no harm to themselves or others, they are demonised. When men neither conform or perform, then people call them "obsolete" and dehumanise them. We don't see articles about women being obsolete or having to "woman up" if they do not perform for society, or books and slogans questioning women's very right to exist and have a future. That is the difference between how society regards men and how society regards women.

Men are regarded as human doings and women are regarded as human beings. It is the gender empathy gap[14]. Feminism has exploited this dynamic from the very beginning[15] to further prioritise female well-being at the expense of men.

Our modern gynocentric society puts men in a box. As long as men perform for society and conform to their role as an exploitable utility, they are allowed a tiny space to live out their existence. There is no room for men that want to be treated as human beings.

The moment men express any sign of vulnerability, as Arthur did, and the moment men cease being a useful utility for society, then society attacks them and literally kicks them while they are down (as Arthur was kicked down on the train).

Men like Arthur can expect no support and general apathy toward their issues from women, as we saw with Arthur's disinterested female counsellor and dismissive single mother. Starved of any compassion from the opposite sex, Arthur has to imagine in his mind a woman having genuine concern for his well-being, expressing any form of affection for who he is and noticing him (as we later discover the relationship was all in his head).

In the real world women expect male strangers in society to take responsibility for the collective well-being of women they do not know. We see this in feminist movements like HeForShe, the promotion of male support for breast cancer awareness at major male sporting events and public domestic violence messaging targeted at men etc.

There is a clear asymmetry in the empathy women display toward men and the empathy men display toward women. This is not speculation, the lack of empathy women display toward men relative to the greater empathy men display toward women can be directly observed[16]. I have to laugh when it is claimed women are the more empathetic sex, whilst they write books and have debates about men being obsolete and write articles about it being acceptable to hate men. What a joke!

Arthur was different and did not perform or conform to the approved standards of being a male utility for society. For that he was mugged, fired, betrayed, mocked, publicly humiliated and beaten. The Joker gave us a glimpse of what life is like for the growing male underclass in our modern society, that the elitist feminist establishment pretends does not exist and that they have wilfully and knowingly created. This substantial cohort of men remain mostly invisible to feminists who are fixated on the tiny fraction of men at the top of society. When feminists cannot ignore their existence, these men are predictably cast by feminists as losers, threatening, creepy, violent, misogynist and dangerous.

Men can't be victims and men can't be vulnerable according to feminists, so they must be classed as a threat or their issues watered down and trivialised. When they can't demonise or trivialise such men and their issues, then feminists and society attempt to reframe the narrative that women or some other identity, is the greater victim.

We can already see publications[17] scrambling to try and spin the Joker to be anything but a story about male vulnerability. This is the same mentality behind remarks by politicians like Hillary Clinton that "women have always been the primary victims of war"[18], despite the millions upon millions of men that were forcibly drafted into war and died for women, their families and their country and the hundreds of war cemeteries filled with dead men.

Our gynocentric society and feminists in particular, do not want to acknowledge or accept or feel any concern for male vulnerability or suffering. This is the level of denial of reality people will stoop to, to avoid any feeling of compassion for men.

This is the reality that Joker forces them to confront.

When feminists can't demonise, trivialise or come up with a competing victimhood narrative, we then hear from feminists that "patriarchy hurts men too". However we never hear feminists acknowledge they are funded by (like the millions of dollars our governments spend on domestic violence against women), and are a part of the very "patriarchal" system they are supposedly dismantling, or that this system clearly prioritises female well-being above male well-being (as we can see from the numerous policies and programs in education, employment, law and health for women and girls and the comparative lack of such policies and programs for men and boys).

Have feminists ever bothered to help out the majority of the homeless and unemployed that happen to be male as Arthur was?

Have feminists ever bothered to ask men if they have been abused as children as Arthur was?

Have feminists ever bothered to consider supporting the majority of victims of violence like Arthur on the train, which are actually male not female?

Have feminists ever bothered to consider how important fathers are to boys and the young men they become, as was the case for Arthur?

Have feminists ever asked men about the hardships they experience as men and really attempted to listen to them, as Arthur was seeking from his disinterested female counsellor?

Feminism is solely interested in women and the claim the movement is about gender equality is a lie.

We see in the movie the impact that fatherlessness and single motherhood had on Arthur and the extreme abuse and neglect he suffered because of it. This film is red pilling society and will continue to red pill audiences.

The film has challenged the feminist assertion all men are privileged and has shone a light on male disposability.

Joker has exposed the role of our elitist feminist mainstream media, and complicit governments and institutions, in contributing to male violence by marginalising men, belittling them and promoting hatred toward them. That is why the elitist feminist mainstream media is so upset by the film. They know this film is exposing the truth about men and their experience in our modern man-hating society that feminists have created.

We know a gender empathy gap exists and I will start concluding this article with a quote from Alison Tieman:

> "Watched Joker. Not sure what I expected but not that. Big takeaway? Offering forty-five minutes of therapy every month to try to combat the indifference, hatred and social exclusion many men face is useless. We need to fundamentally change our communities."[19]

We do need to fundamentally change our communities. To that end, it might help if instead of writing books and having debates about men being obsolete and laughing and gloating about men's suffering, our elitist feminist media and establishment did some self-reflection (particularly women in the media and our institutions) and realised their role in creating the conditions that generate male violence.

How about showing some compassion for men and boys and taking some genuine interest in implementing measures to support them like we do for women. How about respecting men and boys as human beings, rather than promoting a message that men and boys are "obsolete" like they are pieces of machinery. How about Hanna Rosin and the women like her that claim men are obsolete, get out of their airconditioned offices and go and pay the families of deceased male war veterans a visit and learn about what men have done for them and society.

I want people to go to the video embedded in this article[8] and watch what Hanna Rosin does with her son. Take note of the title of the video as well. Then I want people to pause and reflect on what happens when we raise entire generations of boys in such an environment. Would we consider this acceptable if fathers were doing this to their daughters? How would we react? Be honest.

Do we really live in a patriarchy where such behaviour is actually promoted on major media websites? Remember the people that do this to their sons. Do not forget. I will never forget.

If our media, institutions, corporations and governments do not respect men as human beings, show no concern for their well-being, ignore their issues and take measures to exploit, marginalise, humiliate and demonise men for decades, then don't be surprised if a tiny fraction of men do indeed become monsters. You should be upset because what you have done to successive generations of men and boys is shameful and reprehensible. I am glad you are upset. -Sincerely a white male.

Researchers: Dildos and vibrators should have “consent-modules”

John Davis · 16 October 2019 · Archived copy · Original

> . . . he has the prettiest love-songs for maids; so without bawdry, which is strange; with such delicate burthens of dildos and fadings, ‘jump her and thump her;—Shakespeare—The Winter’s Tale, Act IV, Scene III

“Researchers” at the “universities” in Wollongong (Australia) and Radbound University (Netherlands), have proposed that “sex robots” should have to consent prior to intercourse with their owners.

[image]

Swedish feminists, advocate banning sex dolls completely, as they claim that sex dolls ‘normalize sexual violence against women.” The researchers advocating a microchip in sex robots, that requires the user to have its consent, are apparently offering a compromise to the complete banning of sex robots.

“Researchers” at the Perses Insitute in Washington D.C. have realized that the authors of “Designing Virtuous Sex Robots,” by extension, have made a strong case for requiring a consent module for the use of dildos, strap ons and other types of sex robots and mechanical paraphernalia.

These “researchers” argue that we must cultivate compassion in users of sex robots, and, ethical and responsibilities in manufacturers and users of sex robots. “A sex robot which not only can practise consent scenarios with a human partner, but which can actually cultivate a virtue like compassion could potentially be used in sex education and therapy,” the authors argue. However, the Perses Institute believes that the “reasoning” of these researchers applies equally to other sex paraphernalia which can normalize sexual violence against men and boys.

For example, “smart vibrators” are now becoming commonplace.

Smart vibrators should require a consent module that makes certain the user checks for age of consent, ability to consent and enthusiasm of the phallus to participate in the user's fantasies

With a consent module installed, the vibrator could be programmed to instruct the user on extending compassion to the user's fantasy lover, and, checking to make certain that the phallus is of proper age. Given the epidemic of the rape of boys by teachers in public schools, this could be an invaluable aid in preventing the sexual exploitation of vulnerable boys in the education system. These smart vibrators, with consent modules installed, would also be helpful in sex therapy to teach the user how to extend compassion, and, invite enthusiastic consent.

The vibrator could also contain a recording module, integrated with the consent module, so that the user can record their consent to the vibrator, and, avoid later feeling that the user had been "raped" by the vibrator in case the user changes their mind about consent after their use of the vibrator.

With this technology, we may be able to revolutionize users of vibrators and dildos appropriately respecting their fantasy partners so that users will be empowered to extend the same respect and compassion to their partners in real life.

How ‘momism’ gave birth to gynocentrism

Doug Mortimer · 20 October 2019 · Archived copy · Original

I was participating in a post-class bull session with a professor and a couple of other male students, one of whom mentioned he was getting married soon. The professor seemed surprised by this revelation. Without the slightest hint of levity, he proclaimed, “Your mother bosses you around when you’re young, and after you’re married, your wife bosses you around. Wouldn’t you like to have a few years of freedom in-between?”

You might think that no professor – tenured or otherwise – in his right mind would ever make such a statement, even with no women or recording devices present. Well, today that would be true, but this discourse occurred a half-century ago, and the professor who made that statement came of age during World War II. As a highly literate man (in fact, an English professor), he more than likely read Philip Wylie’s Generation of Vipers, published in 1943.

Wylie provided talking points aplenty in his book. Utilizing a number of arcane or obscure words (if you read the book, keep a dictionary close at hand), he ripped almost every stratum of society in the USA. In the process, he added a new word to the American lexicon: “momism.” I can’t improve on Merriam-Webster, so let’s see how they define momism before we go any farther:

> An excessive popular adoration and oversentimentalizing of mothers that is held to be oedipal in nature and that is thought to allow overprotective or clinging mothers unconsciously to deny their offspring emotional emancipation and thus to set up psychoneuroses.

Well, it should be obvious, at least to the readers of this web site, that in 1943 momism was like a Stage I cancer that was never treated, thus allowing it to grow to…Stage III? Or worse, Stage IV, the final stage? In truth, national collapse is not out of the question:

> Just as Goebbels has revealed what can be done with such a mass-stamping of the public in this nation [Nazi Germany], so our land is a living representation of the same fact worked out in matriarchal sentimentality, goo, slop, hidden cruelty, and the foreshadow of national death.

Accusations of misogyny were rare (relative to today at least) in Wylie’s day, but they were frequently leveled at him. He reckoned he was “the all-out, all-time, high-scoring world champion misogynist.” In fact, the margins of my copy of Generation of Vipers had occasional notations of “WTF?” or “Misogyny!” My copy was a reprint purchased at a used bookstore in a college town. Pity the poor millennial college student encountering such troublesome text!

If Wylie could embark on a lecture tour today, he would be the subject of protests, harassment, and possibly cancellations. Milkshake sales at nearby fast food outlets would skyrocket. At least in 1943 an accusation of misogyny was not sufficient to discredit a thesis. On the contrary, it stimulated debate. Today the tyranny of “enshrined womanhood,” as Wylie put it, is openly discussed only among MRA and MGTOW. The corporate media don’t totally avoid the topic, but when they deal with it, they label it female empowerment and stamp it “Approved.”

Wylie’s social criticism was not a departure for him. It was present, albeit less overt, in his pre-Vipers short stories, articles, essays, screenplays (in the early 1930s he worked on two memorable adaptations of H.G. Wells classics, Island of Lost Souls and The Invisible Man), and science fiction. His best-known effort in the SF genre was When Worlds Collide, co-authored with Edwin Balmer, in 1934, and filmed in 1951. In that novel selecting a cross-section of intelligent, highly skilled people to make a post-doomsday voyage to colonize another planet offers a chance to reboot humanity, to literally elevate the best and the brightest and leave the commoners behind; it could be a paean to elitism, an allegory of evolution, or both.

It would be wrong to dismiss Wylie as merely a purveyor of genre fiction. Generation of Vipers, his biggest hit (20 printings!), was a non-fiction work expressing deep concerns about the state of the union. Perhaps the most remarkable feature of the book is its publication during the midst of World War II when rah-rah USA was all the rage. One would have thought the book more likely destined for nationwide bonfires than best-seller lists.

Basically, the book is one long rant against…well, everything. Wylie verbally carpet-bombs American society. Like most idealists, he has finally succumbed to disillusionment and disappointment. He has been red-pilled.

H.G. Wells famously observed that we are in a race between education and catastrophe. But suppose the educators are corrupt and the students are flawed, as fallible as they are malleable? If you were going to rail against human shortcomings, World War II was a superb stage for lamenting the failures of humanity.

Long after the war, however, Generation of Vipers still resonated with American readers. A new edition came out in 1955 when the postwar world had taken shape. Today the book is of interest largely to academics and historians as a cultural artifact from the World War II – Cold War era. The title, by the way, derives from the New Testament: "O generation of vipers, how can ye, being evil, speak good things?" (Matthew 12:34).

The momism theme in the book was the most controversial and may be why the book remained in the public consciousness after the war ended. The Germans and Japanese had been defeated but momism kept rolling along.

Wylie was not against the old commandment of honoring thy father and mother or normal filial affection. He just didn't care for the imbalance created by the mother being elevated above the father, and by extension, the woman over the man. He estimated that 80 percent of the money in the nation was possessed by women and American society was "a matriarchy in fact if not in declaration."

> The male is an attachment of the female in our civilization….of money, manufactories, transportation, art, mores, and instinct. He does most of what he does – eighty per cent, statistically – to supply whatever women have defined as their necessities, comforts, and luxuries.

Today we look back to the World War II era as a golden age of red-blooded American manhood, but Wylie detected only armies of khaki-clad beta males:

> The mealy look of men today is the result of momism and so is the pinched and baffled fury in the eyes of womankind.

Interestingly, Wylie grounds his argument in a cultural misreading of the Cinderella fairy tale. When the story is interpreted from the prince's point of view, it is a parable of finding a diamond in the rough, a sweet-tempered female of humble birth who is a good candidate for a life partner, unlike her grasping, materialistic stepsisters. When the tale is interpreted from Cinderella's point of view, as it usually is in America, it is all about female entitlement:

> Our rags-to-riches theme gives scant attention to the virtues rags may conceal; it deals mainly with the lucky escape from rags. The American version of the Cinderella story, retold ad infinitum in the magazines, by the movies, and on the radio puts all its emphasis on the reward.
> The important factor to us is Cinderella's conditioning. It is decidedly not to go on dutifully sweeping the floor and carrying the wood. She is conditioned to get the hell out of those chores. There is, the American legend tells her, a good-looking man with dough, who will put an end to the onerous tedium of making a living. If he doesn't come along…she isn't just lacking in good fortune, she is being cheated out of her true deserts.
> Of course, in spite of our capitalistic society, there are not enough Princes to go around – so most women actually must settle down to a compromise of major dimensions. That they will have to make such a compromise is not entirely concealed from them. But the American woman…is scarcely conditioned for the > mathematical destiny to which reality must and does ascribe her.

> Cinderellas, shrill ones, pushing for more yardage in the material world, demanding only that the men, obviously no princes, at least make up in some small way by acting like Santa Claus.
> Cinderella…has the prince, the coach, the horses – but her soul's a pumpkin and her mind's a rat-warren.

Of course, in 1943 the concept of hypergamy was not in wide use (except perhaps for zoologists), but in essence that is what Wylie is talking about. He goes beyond the fairy tale by considering the "happily ever after" aspect of the Cinderella tale; call it Cinderella II or Cinderella 2.0. Having found a mate, Cinderella embarks on motherhood.

> The shining-haired, the starry-eyed, the ruby-lipped virgo aeternis, of which there is presumably one, and only one, or a one-and-only for each male, whose dream is fixed upon her deflowerment and subsequent perpetual possession…the transition of Cinderella into mom, which, if it occasions any shock, only adds to the huge, invisible burthen every man carries with him into eternity. It is the weight of this bundle which, incidentally, squeezes out of him the wish for death, his last positive biological resource.

In pre-Cinderella days that transition to motherhood was downright unpleasant. It was right out of the Book of Genesis: "I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and they conception; in sorrow thou shalt bring forth children." (3:18)

> Hitherto, mom has been so busy raising a large family, keeping house, doing the chores and fabricating everything in every home except the floor and the walls that she was rarely a problem to her family or to her equally busy friends, and never one to herself. Usually, until very recently, mom folded up and died of hard work somewhere in the middle of her life.

Wow! And Betty Friedan thought her suburban matrons had it tough! But in days of yore, drudgery was the lot of almost all women (and men). People married while young, reproduced while young, and if they were lucky, lived long enough to witness the birth of grandchildren.

In Wylie's heyday improvements in agriculture, medicine, and mass production meant that mere survival wasn't a daily challenge. As Wylie noted, however "Material blessings, when they pay beyond the category of need, are weirdly fruitful of headache."

Sure, life was easier in 1943 than in 1843 or 1743, etc. But at least there was still a stigma attached to being an old maid or single mother. In today's who-needs-men environment, remaining single and single motherhood are not only stigma-free, they are praiseworthy!

Given the pampering of women, the invasion of men's spaces, the domination and diminution of men in the classroom and the workplace, the reach of Cinderella-as-mom has never been greater. While the birth rate has plummeted, "momism" has grown.

> The hen-harpy is but the Cinderella chick come home to roost: the taloned, cackling residue of burnt-out puberty.

Wylie sniffed out hypergamy, white knighting, and female entitlement long before anyone else did. If he were still around (he died in 1971), perhaps he would be motivated to expound on single-momism. I don't know if he ever wrote movie reviews, but I'd love to hear his thoughts on Joker! I suspect that the man who gave us momism would give it four stars.

Writing Misogyny

Chris "mad_cat" Votey · 21 October 2019 · Archived copy · Original

"How to Destroy A Man Now (DAMN)" has been taken down from Amazon. My book, "How to Destroy A (Wo)Man Now (DAMN)" is still up.

One of the hardest things in this day and age is to put your name to something. When you put your name to something, you are responsible for what you say, and you will be judged by it. Not just by today's culture, but the culture of tomorrow. It's hard to anticipate how culture might veer off, especially when you look at today and think back a decade ago when many such as Paul Elam warned our culture would move this way and how many thought him insane.

Think about Kevin Hart for a moment. He made a joke before this outrage culture became a thing, and as Dave Chappelle pointed out, he got lambasted for the joke as a bigot. Kevin didn't know that such a thing could hurt him one day, he was a comedian who made a joke, and a decade later, that joke was considered hate speech. Then there's me, a writer who writes. What makes me different than Kevin Hart was that I purposely put my writing career on the line, and depending on how the culture went, I knew I could lose it all.

What is it that I did? I published, "How to Destroy a (Wo)Man Now" on Amazon. I used the handle most of you know me as, "mad_cat", but it was still my Amazon account that I post my other books on, and Amazon could have decided to not only unpublish that book but to ban my account and prevent me from publishing with them ever again. Being a published author is one of my first dreams, and in spite of the stigma, I am proud to have self-published my works five times. Losing that privilege would be detrimental for me, and yet I put it on the chopping block to try to make a difference.

This all started when my friend, Elizabeth Hobson, told me of a book, "How to Destroy a Man Now". I wasn't shocked, but I was disappointed. We do, after all, live in a culture today where hating men is perfectly OK. Time Magazine celebrated #KillAllMen, saying it was just a joke, and celebrated its creator as a hero and not a hatemonger. Reading the book's preview about Allison Allegation and Mary Media and how you don't need evidence to make an accusation… how could Amazon publish this? I do know that publishing on Amazon is an automatic process, and you can publish anything you want, but I felt that some alarm bell somewhere should have gone off, and Amazon investigate this book.

Elizabeth knew I was a writer and suggested that I should write a book in response. I agreed that we needed to play the Feminists at their own game. I immediately bought the book; felt strange paying money for it, disliking anyone profiting from this a misandrist attack, but I wanted to do this right. It was $10 for what is effectively a 70-page book.

We don't know who wrote this book, beyond it being Angela Confidential PsyD. Many speculated it was a Feminist (or a Male Feminist) in light of the #metoo movement, giving women a weapon to hurt men. Others suspect it is a spoof of the #metoo movement, showing how dangerous our world has become, and those who read it should have enough commonsense not do anything mentioned in the book. Surprisingly, many reviews from Feminists believe this was done by a hateful MRA to smear Feminism.
So we've hear that "How To Destroy A Man Now" is a bad book. Is it really that bad, though? Should this book be taken down? My answer: Yes, and yes. Understand right away, I'm not one for censorship, even some of the most hate-filled books should be available for purchase.

The difference here is that our right to free speech does not cover a call for illegal actions. This book contains advice on committing Defamation (both Libel and Slander).

For instance, the author encourages you to go to one of 53 websites to upload articles falsely accusing your target of abusing women, rape, getting arrested, having warrants out for them… any number of things. The goal is to affect Google search results. The more negative press you put out there, the more likely this is what will show up when their name is searched. Say, for instance, a prospective employer wants to hire the target.

Of course, there are ways to find out if these allegations are true, but then who really does their due diligence these days? How many boys were expelled from college on the allegation a girl made, even when found he couldn't have done it? So long as there is a label of impropriety against a man, people will assume it is true. And you as a man can fight to get it taken down, but that is much harder than it sounds, especially as Social Media fights that it is both a publisher and a public forum.

Another method offered, say if your target works at the same company as you, is that you can go to HR with allegations. Now more than having allegations, you need to make sure HR knows that you intend to sue the company for a hostile work environment. The author tells us that money matters and companies fear lawsuits, but it would also tarnish their public image. Some companies might do the moral thing and investigate, but many companies would focus on the potential loss of money and engage in damage control, i.e., fire the target.

It's things like this that make me question the idea this was written by an MHRA, because if one desires to hurt men, then this is really good advice. If this was intended as parody, then someone went through some extreme lengths for a laugh. No, this was done by someone who wanted to see men hurt and encouraged women unknowingly commit illegal actions that they could get away with scot-free.

In light of that, one of the key things I set out for in my book was that it contained no illegal information. Highly unethical, but not unlawful. Moreover, in the Introduction, I encourage people to read the Conclusion before reading the rest of my book. There it says not to do anything in this book, and that this book is meant to piss off Feminists in hopes they will push for Amazon to take it down, so then I can push Amazon to take the other book.

So my book was released, and I made some sales. The book currently stands at 4.2-stars (2.9 in the UK). Most surprising is that a few people point this out as a useful guide of what not to do in a relationship. However, the hype of both books soon fell silent.

Then enter Vic Mignogna and MarzGurl. I never heard of either one, as Anime is not my thing. He was a voice actor accused of sexual misconduct and was fired by many corporations on allegations alone. A result of that was Marzgurl, who'd lobbied a lot of hate Vic's way. There are unconfirmed reports that Marzgurl had read "How To Destroy A Man Now" with further rumors stating that she had used or encouraged others to use the book against Vic. I haven't found any source to substantiate any of that.

The result of those rumors caused attention to the first book and indirect attention to my book. Some of my reviews seemed to be for the other book, not knowing they were reviewing my book instead. Because of this and my advertising efforts, I had received some more sales. For those who know my situation, you can imagine that these royalty payments really helped me out.

A few days ago, I looked at both books. To my surprise, Amazon now lists the first "Out of Print – Limited Availability". So I called up Amazon, and they told me that the book had been taken down. They have no reason stated, but the representative suggested this can happen due to lots of complaints.

I have mixed feelings about all of this. Right now, I am thrilled that this horrendous book has been taken down. I just don't know if my book had any impact. Ideally, I wanted mine removed first so we could then make a campaign against Amazon. Not that I hate Amazon, I use them to publish, but maybe they should tweak their process a touch to prevent this kind of hatemongering trash again.

As far as my book, I've decided not to take it down as I originally planned, but instead alter it so that it becomes a Relationship Help Guide, renaming it "How Not to Destroy A Relationship Now (DARN)". I can't change the title on this page without losing my reviews, but I can change the cover and the content inside to reflect on the history of this book and things not to do in a relationship.

So what's next for me? It's high time I write a book for the movement. I got inspired by Paul, who allowed me the opportunity to format his ebook for Kindle. My next book is one I've been planning for a few years now. Not ready to say what the book is, but I can say it will be released sometime next year.

Special thanks to Modern Medusa, who is the girl on my cover.

All-female space flight and the feminist narrative

Tom James · 21 October 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Hillary Clinton's October 18, 2019 tweet asserting that NASA wrote to her personally when she was a little girl to tell her girls aren't allowed to be astronauts is probably about as true as her claim to have come under sniper fire at a foreign airport[1] and her suggestion that Tulsi Gabbard is a "Russian asset."[2] The claim was made in celebration of male-exclusionary space flight.[3] As such, it is a good illustration of the illogic of feminist narrative.

Preliminarily, it should be noted that if Clinton was, as she claims, "a little girl" at the time, and if, as she claims, NASA referred to her as "a girl" in their supposed letter to her, then it is very possible they were simply telling her that children can't be astronauts.

Suppose, though, that NASA had told little-girl Clinton that women are not allowed to be astronauts. At the time, that would have been true. NASA had a discriminatory policy.[4] Discriminatory policies were in effect in a lot of places in the 1950s and 1960s. Then and for over a century before then, courts applied a presumption that men are incapable of parenting; they could only be trusted with children for short periods of time.[5] The unwritten preference for mothers in family courts that exists today is a remnant of that era.[6] At the time Clinton supposedly received her letter from NASA, many schools refused to hire men as early education teachers.[7] That, too, was a discriminatory policy.

That both men and women reinforced sex role expectations in the 1950s and 1960s is obvious to anybody who is honest enough to examine primary historical sources with both eyes open. Refusing to acknowledge that reality, though, is a problem with honesty, not logic. The illogic is in the second step of this syllogism:

Men did not have the option of doing X and women did not have the option of doing Y.
→ Therefore, men prevented women from doing Y out of hatred for women.
→ Therefore, retributive justice requires that men be prevented from doing X and Y.

Feminism ignores historical details like the social rule, "Save the women and children first" when a boat is sinking or it is otherwise clear that only some members of a group can be rescued. In fact, feminism ignores all historical facts that tend to show that women occupied a higher place in the public's estimation of social value than men did. Men worked in dangerous occupations fighting fires or other people (aka combat), mining, and so on, and they did the back-breaking work of building railroads, houses, skyscrapers, dams and so on. They were brought up to believe their worthiness or right to take up space on the planet depended on their ability and willingness to do these things so women wouldn't have to. Feminists imagine male work as a brilliant green pasture full of millions of men who get to sit around in an air-conditioned office being waited on and bossing people around. For the vast majority of men, that was not even close to reality. It still isn't.

NASA excluded women from becoming astronauts for the same reason the military excluded women from combat duty and men gave up their seats in lifeboats: To protect women from being injured or killed.[8]

To say that men tried to protect women because they hated women is clearly illogical. Yet this is exactly what every woman who has been exposed to feminist teaching has been programmed to believe. Why? Because without that false narrative, retaliatory "reverse discrimination" against men would not be just. It would just be another exercise of traditional female privilege. "Forward" discrimination.

Logical responses to unwanted protection would include things like saying, "No thanks, I don't need any special protection," and/or demonstrating through actions that it isn't needed. It is not logical to tell someone who has been trying to protect you, "Screw you; you deserve to be excluded from everything and women need to band together to destroy you now." But that is where we are.

The punishment should fit the offence

Robert Brockway · 22 October 2019 · Archived copy · Original

It was recently reported in the media that students from a school in Melbourne, Australia were singing a song on a tram on the way to a sports carnival. The school in question is St Kevin's College, an independent Catholic school. Many would consider it strange that schoolboys singing a song on a tram would be newsworthy, but this is 2019. The lyrics of the song were recorded by another passenger on the tram:

> I wish that all the ladies.
> Were holes in the road.
> And if I were a dump truck.
> I'd fill them with my load.
> I wish that all the ladies.
> Were whales in the ocean.
> And I was a surfer.
> And ride 'em with my motion.

I suspect the last line should have been sung as I'd ride 'em with my motion. This would be consistent with the first paragraph and would make more sense.

After this became public the Australian Broadcasting Corporation went on to report that former students of the school had complained about an environment of hypermasculinity. Hypermasculinity. Sounds like a superpower.

There was a time, not so long ago, that a school like St Kevin's College would have meted out detention if the school believed that students had brought the school into disrepute through their actions. Detention is a common punishment in schools in many countries and normally involves a student being required to remain in class either during a break or after school. But those days have passed. It has been reported that St Kevin's College has suspended 10 boys and is considering expelling them as a result of singing on a tram.

The headmaster of St Kevin's College, Stephen F Russell, was reportedly upset, frustrated and angry at what had occurred. Granted, the boy's singing was awful, and they flubbed the last line, but this seems like an over-reaction. In a letter to parents, Mr Russell has stated that St Kevin's College 'will continue to challenge poor behaviour and misogynistic attitudes'.

I hope that the administration of St Kevin's College will take a step back, get some perspective, and realise that the punishment should fit the offence. Expulsion could seriously harm these boy's futures and is a clear over-reaction, entirely inconsistent with how this would have been dealt with only a few years ago. The administration of St Kevin's College might also like to give some thought to the world that these young men will soon enter as adults. Rather than concerning itself so much with misogyny, St Kevin's College should be teaching boys how to live in a world with rampant misandry.

Micro activism: The social support system

Xavier Jones · 23 October 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Introduction

As Men's Rights Activists, we attempt to help men using "macro activism". We try to change the entire culture we live in through law and advocacy. A lot of men are suffering social, financial, political, and legal injustices. This is something that we usually attempt to fix — like most activists. However, we have to start shifting some of our attention to "micro activism".

The leading problem that men seem to have is that no one supports them. Boys grow up feeling alienated by their environment. They need someone to connect with. They need an accurate representation of their masculinity. Men who fail to be represented by society go down dangerous paths. Eventually they become gang members, school shooters, terrorists, and so forth. It's time for us to save our boys and rehabilitate our men. This is where MRAs come into the mix.

As MRAs, we must give "micro activism" as much attention as "macro activism". It's great to change laws and, eventually, the entire culture we live in. It's also great to provide comfort and compassion to the men in our lives.

The Genius of Alison Tieman

On Sunday (August 18 to be exact) I attended the International Conference On Men's Issues (2019). Throughout the conference, I sat through engaging speeches about men's issues. I even engaged with MRA panelists about men's issues. It was incredibly intriguing. However, I was wondering if anything would capture me, emotionally. Well, you ask questions and you get answers.

The appearance of Allison Tieman (via projection screen) is what tugged on my heart strings. Allison couldn't make it to the event-she had been banned from the US for a limited time. Fortunately for us, we talked to her via video chat. We connected a computer to a projector and displayed her on the projection screen. Before she had even uttered a word, we were all cheerful. Everyone assumed that they were going to hear something memorable-and they were right. As Allison presented us with a PowerPoint, she spoke about the horrific reality men are living in. We were given examples of how gynocentrism had played a powerful role in society for centuries. The rhetoric of today was shown to have striking similarities to the rhetoric of yesterday. It was all very eye opening.

Throughout the entire speech, her assertion of "helping an individual man" is what really stood out to me. As MRAs, we have focused a lot on the big picture. We've been trying to change an entire gynocentric culture-and for good reason. However, as Alison alluded, providing support for the individual male is just as effective. If you can help one male at a time, then you're making a difference. She wanted us to shift our focus to making changes on a micro level. This was a brilliant idea.

Micro Activism

"Micro level" activism provides boys with a "social support system," if you will, to help them express themselves. Micro activists give special attention to the individual who is suffering as opposed to lumping all men together as a disenfranchised group. Instead of changing the culture, you focus more on changing the life of the individual.

Our boys need to be able to express themselves freely. Society puts them into a box from a young age. They are burdened with high levels of responsibility. They have to take care of families, perform dirty jobs, sign up for the military, and rescue citizens in the face of danger. This can be very stressful to learn, even as an adult. Boys have to prepare themselves for this task at a young age. They spend their days placed into a box, begging for freedom and companionship. Our social support system would free men from that box and enable them to express their identity in healthier ways. This will lead them down a more virtuous path.

MRAs choose to be represented by their advocacy, their platforms, and their legal/financial resources. It's time to add “social support” to that list of benefits. We need to be that shoulder that for other men to lean on. Society is always demonizing the male gender. Well, it’s time we start praising the male gender. Men become overwhelmed by all of the responsibilities. They need to know that they’re not alone. No one should have to do it alone. We’ll be here to help them.

Ideas: What Would A Social Support System Look Like?

Support Groups: We need more social support groups and activities. If you aren’t creating any, you can always join existing groups. I joined the Mankind Project recently. I spoke extensively about the men’s rights movements. Most of the members weren’t even aware of the MRM’s existence. After informing them about the movement, they were elated to know that there was a movement out there fighting for them.

Male Bonding: Men aren’t exactly a fan of knitting circles. They spend their time in places like bars and sporting events. We have the opportunity to connect with men on a level that they’re used to. Men are constantly told that they have to embrace womanhood to be given support. This implies that the welfare of men are some sort of negotiable contract. This is dangerous thinking. Men should be given support because they’re human beings, not because they start to express traditionally feminine characteristics. MRAs should be connecting with men in places such as these. Take them out for a drink. Go to a comedy club. Get tickets to a sporting event. Play some video games with them. These are great ways to unify with men.

Commend Men: A lot of MRAs are on Twitter, Facebook, and Reddit. Spend a little time out of your day to praise men for doing their role in society. Praise the men who work dangerous jobs. Post stories about the average Joe who steps up to protect other civilians in the face of danger. If you have free time, ask men what it’s like to do these dirty jobs. “What is it like to be a construction worker?” “Can you give me a visual of how firefighters extinguish flaming buildings?” “Have you-or a fellow officer- gotten shot on duty?” Today, men feel like the work that they do is taken for granted. When someone feels undervalued for doing their duty, they’ll be inclined to stop doing it. Complimenting them for their work reminds them that you appreciate their service.

Give Men Advice: A lot of boys are suffering. Society pretends as if they don’t care about them. They have no idea how to handle the situation. This leads to negative side effects on their mental health. They need someone to guide them through their childhood. Someone has to be there to counsel them. Men, in this hostile environment, need someone to show them the way to a better life.

Listening & Understanding: It’s great to give men advice on how to better their lives. But, what’s even more effective is listening to what men have to say. That’s a large issue for men in modern day society. People are telling them what to say, how to feel, where to go, etc. Treating them as if they can’t think for themselves. They want to be heard and understood. This keeps them feeling isolated. They feel like the only man on earth despite being half the population. The simple act of letting them vent their frustrations, will release a lot of the pressure and tension

Conclusion

This article isn’t just for MRAs. Anyone who has any interest in helping men, should take this as a form of reference. There are MRAs out there who already participate in this Social Support System-most notably through men’s conferences. However, I would like to see this strategy get a lot more attention. I want to see it get the same level of recognition as macro activism gets.

As we start to see with this ‘toxic masculinity” rhetoric, vulnerable men are being taken advantage of. There are men who are hurting and need someone to reach out to. Charlatans will feed these vulnerable men misinformation about their life. They will be lead to believe that their own masculinity is the problem and blame themselves for all of the struggles they face. This only causes more confusion and leads to a more destructive path.

MRAs can’t let these charlatans take over the narrative on men’s issues. MRAs worked hard to get this narrative to where it is. We helped give men’s issues a platform. Men have benefited from our legal support. Now they need our social support. Let’s introduce the male sex to our Social Support System.

The state of play

Mark Dent · 27 October 2019 · Archived copy · Original

If we ever required a simple, contemporary example of the utter contempt and disdain our society has for men, it can be found in an entirely unimportant yet highly instructive tweet from a rather disturbed human being named Miley Cyrus.

There are a number of reasons one could cite for questioning this woman's judgement and taste but let's put those aside and focus on her tweet.

Urging her followers not to "give up" in their pursuit of decent men, Cyrus wrote:[1]

> "There are good men out there guys don't give up,". You don't have to be gay, there are good people with dicks out there, you've just got to find them."
>
> "You've got to find a dick that's not a dick, you know? I always thought I had to be gay, because I thought all guys were evil, but it's not true," she explained. "There are good people out there that just happen to have dicks. I've only ever met one, and he's on this live."

Anyone like to hazard a guess as to what it was about this comment that caused a universal online meltdown?

Was it her assertion that she believed all guys were evil?

Perhaps it was her casual, patronizing play on the word dick.

"You've got to find a dick that's not a dick, you know."

Or perhaps it was the inference that good men are incredibly rare, even if they do exist.

"There are good people out there that just happen to have dicks. I've only ever met one, and he's on this live."

No-it was none of the above.

The outrage was based upon the unforgivable suggestion that being gay is something you can choose to be for convenience sake or simply because you are tired of one gender.

Hell was unleashed by progressives and the LGBT activists who accused Cyrus of:

"perpetuating the idea that sexuality is a choice."

Cyrus, who has previously declared herself both "pansexual and gender fluid," responded to the controversy on Monday, claiming that she was "talking shit about sucky guys" and reiterating her support for the LGBT agenda.

Being the ignorant Neanderthal I am, I confess to checking exactly what pansexual meant with the help of Google.

> Pansexuality, or omnisexuality, is the sexual, romantic or emotional attraction towards people regardless of their sex or gender identity. Pansexual people may refer to themselves as gender-blind, asserting that gender and sex are not determining factors in their romantic or sexual attraction to others.*

Fair enough — each to his or her own.

Gender fluid required another check just to make certain of the term's meaning.

> denoting or relating to a person who does not identify themselves as having a fixed gender.

I don't care if a person wants to identify with any of these terms as long as they don't make any demands of me.

The sad fact is not one person, not one journalist even questioned, let alone criticized her assertion that for a long time she believed all men were evil, or the fact that even now, she thinks your chances of finding a dick that's not a dick are remote.

Perhaps the odds would be about the same as finding a four-leaf clover or a red headed Nigerian.

Even the original caption under a photo of Cyrus said:

The singer and progressive activist Miley Cyrus came under fire for saying she once thought she "had to be" a lesbian because "all guys are evil."

The 'all guys are evil' bit is so accepted it has become embedded into our society's psyche as an unquestioned fact, a "given" much like "the sun rises in the east" or "death is inevitable"

Nobody even sees the shocking dismissal of one entire gender in those few words.

Miley quickly and predictably apologized and bowed before the wrath of the mob and wrote a hurried apology.

"Let me be clear," she wrote on Instagram. "YOU don't CHOOSE your sexuality. You are born as you are. It has always been my priority to protect the LGBTQ community I am a part of. Happy Monday!"

Got that? You don't choose your sexuality. Forgive me for my transgression.

All men are evil and good dicks are hard to find? Now that should be enshrined in our constitution and taught in every classroom.

Keep in mind the fact that this woman has over one hundred million instagram followers. That's a lot of influence. As one well known politician would say:

Sad. So sad.

How to destroy a society

Peter Ryan · 28 October 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Every now and then I write a comment on a YouTube video that I like to share and this is one of them. Paul, Tom and Janice were recently discussing a book titled, "How To Destroy A Man Now"[1]. The book might as well have been titled, "How To Destroy A Society Now". It is a guide on how gynocentrism[2] can be used to subvert our legal system and institutions and destroy individual men and civilisation (or what it calls "patriarchy" aka civilisation).

The mere existence of the book and others like it, highlight why it is absurd to claim that society is a patriarchy run by men for the benefit of men and that women are the "nicer" and more empathetic sex. All people have to do to recognise this, is imagine what the social reaction would be if a man wrote a book titled, "How To Destroy A Woman Now". Men in this culture do not write such books about the opposite sex. In stark contrast, women in this culture do write such books about the opposite sex and this book about destroying men is not an isolated example. The End Of Men[3] and Are Men Necessary?[4], are other examples of such literature written by women (and I can cite more examples).

The books play into emotional fantasies (and yes sometimes sexual fantasies) some women hold to humiliate and denigrate men as a sex. This is the mentality our gynocentric society instils in women. It is an emotional power trip for female narcissism[5] to write and read such garbage about the opposite sex. It makes them feel superior. It is that simple. Are all women like that? No, but this gynocentric culture does nothing but encourage this mentality in women. It is also worth noting the large number of women that stay silent (as many men do) whilst their female counterparts revel in this misandry. In contrast men line up to hold other men in line if they disrespect women, or if men even try to defend themselves against women.

Women are not nicer and they are not more empathetic. Women just do their best to be seen to be nice (it is a form of social camouflage for women) because it adds to their social image and social power, which is their primary form of power aside from the sexual component. This book exposes the lie women are nicer and describes the nature of female violence in detail. It is for this reason, that I would agree with Paul, Tom and Janice that such books should not be banned. The darker side of female nature needs to be exposed and recognised, just as we do with men. There is a saying, "women know what other women are like". Women know exactly what I am talking about- the truth that women are not all sugar and spice and everything nice and that women can be just as terrible, just as depraved and yes just as evil[6] as men. This is the ugly truth the book, "How To Destroy A Man Now" forces society to confront and that women understand but speak of only in whispers among themselves.

Freedom of speech allows society to confront its ugly reflection and stop ignoring social problems, hence why such books should not be banned but scrutinised. However I do not agree with Paul, Tom and Janice that this book was written with the manosphere in mind in support of us. As I mentioned earlier, it is my opinion it is far more likely that such books are written to humiliate and denigrate men and to an satisfy an emotional power trip (and sometimes a sexual one as well). There is no elaborate web of reverse psychology required to explain the writing of this book or books like it. Like feminists keep projecting onto men, it is all about power and control for women that enjoy such misandric garbage. Why is the book not available? Not sure, but sometimes they are too naked about their real motives and the feminist establishment censors its own.

I would agree though that, "How To Destroy A Man Now" does serve to expose the nature of female violence. We know in intimate partner relationships that when only one partner is physically violent toward the other, it is women that are more likely to be the perpetrator (at more than double the frequency)[7]. But so much of female violence is not actually physical, as the book demonstrates. Female violence is often expressed as relational aggression and also through inciting institutional and social violence by proxy on the desired male target.

Spreading rumors to destroy a man's reputation in the community or among his peers is relational aggression and a form of violence that can cause grave harm to the male victim. Using the legal system, divorce and family court system as a weapon to destroy ex-partners, is inciting institutional and social violence by proxy. It is worth noting the high male suicide rate[8] that follows from the institutional violence associated with divorce and family court that is directed at men and instigated by women. I have not forgotten the story of Chris Mackney[9] and neither should you. Stories like that are all around us now, thanks to feminism and gynocentrism. Women do not have to shoot men to kill them. It is time these actions were correctly identified as female violence against men. I wonder how many people have looked at the Duluth model and applied it with the sexes reversed? You would be surprised how much of the wheel of power and control applies to female violence against men.

So with that preamble, I have provided the comment below that I made in response to the video of Paul, Tom and Janice discussing this book[10]. People may want to watch their discussion first. My comment is as follows (I made one modification to add the links to my earlier work):

> "This book exposes the reality that our gynocentric society is based on a number of core social lies- 1. Women are powerless in relation to men. 2. Only men are violent toward the opposite sex. 3. The world is a patriarchy run by men for the benefit of men. 4. Our history is one of men oppressing women. 5. Women are more valuable and deserving of empathy because they give birth and therefore must be protected at the expense of men to preserve the species, regardless of the cost (a lie I have debunked extensively in my writings- > Links here[11], here[12], here[13] and here[14] which people can read should they wish to. I have one more article to write on it). It is lie number 5 that lets people look the other way when facts contradict lies 1-4.
> You were right the first time Paul, men throwing other men under the bus for women is a glitch in the "patriarchy". Let us just call patriarchy by its real name shall we- civilisation. Let us not beat around the bush with the truth. The only reason we have a civilised society, is because men cooperate with each other. Once that goes, so does civilised society. Raising children in a civilised society that has the social environment and male productivity to technologically develop to an advanced state and has relatively low levels of male violence, enhances community survival many orders of magnitude and consequently has enormous fitness benefits in a darwinian sense. That all goes once men cease cooperating with each other and throw each other under the bus for women. The metoo# movement is inherently destructive for this very reason. Even primitive tribal societies require some level of male cooperation to subsist and destroy themselves if sufficient numbers of men turn on each other.
> The hierarchy men are in, is not all about competition either and involves a great deal of male cooperation to remain stable and functional. Patriarchy is not about culling men in an evolutionary sense (that is a negative by-product rather than a core driving force of the system), but about giving men are means to assort themselves socially and express their sexual market value toward the opposite sex and a means to express their inherent biological value.
>
> It is also worth pointing out that each sex is selected to pass on their genes in the most efficient and effective means possible. Men that willingly sacrifice themselves like doormats either remain cucked, friendzoned or are outmatched by men that reproduce more efficiently. Men that sacrifice other men may benefit in the short-term but not always. Such men may be the target of retributive violence and reduce their trustworthiness within the male social dominance hierarchy, which may then reduce their authority, power and support from other men in said hierarchy, over the long-term. It is a risky strategy for men to throw other men under the bus and it does not always pay off for individual men either (they may die or be exposed for the liars or criminals they are) and it certainly destroys society as a whole in the long term. So whilst there is an element of truth to the idea of men sacrificing other men to get women and to perpetuate their individual genome (just as there is for male sexual violence against women, which is just as heinous and barbaric and certainly something I am not condoning), it is a costly and an ultimately inferior strategy when it is scaled to the level of society.
> Societies that are not so cavalier with throwing men under the bus, have greater numbers of stronger and more productive men. Societies that recklessly exploit men, kill the very thing that keeps them going. The army that wins the battle with the least amount of male casualties, has the men to fight another day. The army that carelessly > exploits and sacrifices their men, suffers avoidable losses and loses the war. Same thing goes with countries and economies. People need to think things through, before they just discard concern for male well-being."

It is time for men and frankly the manosphere to wake up. Men have been told their whole life that they have no intrinsic self-worth and are inherently disposable because of being male and not having a uterus. The exploitation of men in this gynocentric system, requires men and boys continue to believe that lie. Reinforcing that message from the manosphere, does nothing but strengthen the lie, especially if it comes from the supposedly red pill world. There is nothing more dangerous to this system than a group of men that know their own worth, reject the lie they are inherently disposable and protect their own well-being. Whether you hear that you are inherently disposable from the blue world or from manosphere, don't believe the bullshit. Men are much more than sperm dispensers and utilities, no matter how much our gynocentric society would like men to think otherwise.

Keeping men immersed in that lie and on the wheel of learned helplessness, is what keeps gynocentrism chugging along. Heaven forbid the manosphere dare get the idea in their heads that maybe just maybe, men are not inherently biologically disposable and women are not the more valuable sex because of reproduction. The manosphere needs to flush this idea down the toilet where it belongs and stop reinforcing the same message men have already been told their whole lives by this society. People wonder why I write about gynocentrism, the golden uterus and male value so extensively-The reason is simple. That is how much bullshit there is to debunk and set straight when it comes to biology being twisted to justify the erroneous claim men are inherently less valuable than women.

I cannot just rely on common sense to debunk this nonsense, because sense is no longer common in this society. We live in gynocentric clownworld now and have been for 800 or so years[15]. We abandoned common sense when it came to men, women and relationships centuries ago. That is why it is so hard even in the manosphere to see through the gynocentric BS. We have no proper frame of reference we can immediately use to calibrate our gynocentric bullshit detectors. However slowly but surely the manosphere is getting there and putting the pieces together. We have not completely awakened from the blue pill world yet, we are still in the process (all of us, myself included).

Keep that in mind before you completely subscribe to an idea and hold it as an unquestionable axiomatic truth or a law of nature. I understand it is common to examine the scientific literature in the manosphere when it comes to biology and evolution (in contrast to feminism where everything is a social construct). This is good in many respects, but please keep in mind that the scientific profession itself is not immune to gynocentric bias. There is frequently a clear bias in the sex difference literature to minimise any perceived male advantage in any area of any value and minimise any perceived unique biological value men may have relative to women period (the opposite frequently holds true for reporting on female advantages).

Pushing research or theories to show men are less than women or biologically expendable, is going with the gynocentric bias of the scientific community and is not necessarily reflective of objective reality or sound science, even if it comes from supposedly accomplished scientists (some of which have an axe to grind against men). Here are links to two examples which I highly recommend people take the time to watch, highlighting this gynocentric bias when it comes to reporting on sex differences in intelligence[16] and male genius and male variability in traits[17]. This bias is not just limited to the literature on cognitive abilities either, it is systemic within the scientific community.

Pushing the narrative men are biologically expendable fits with the gynocentric bias within science. Don't just believe something because a study or scientist says so. Refine your bullshit detector. I have a prior background in the molecular life sciences and I can personally tell you that scientists are just people and not omniscient oracles. Just because you found a study or some scientist said something, does not mean it is true. Scientists can be wrong, theories can be wrong and whole disciplines can be wrong. Look at the data, look at the sampling, look at the methodology and find out if the results have been substantively replicated (there is a great deal of junk science out there). Look at research with a critical eye and remember the scientific method[18].

We have to move past this fatalistic concept it is in our nature to exploit men and therefore accept it as some immutable aspect of human nature we can do nothing about. It is in our nature to do a lot of things, including rape, murder and genocide. The fact behaviour may have a biological basis to it (as all human behaviour does to varying degrees), does not mean it is biologically optimal to act that way, or that it is the most evolutionarily successful strategy, or that it is inevitable it will become commonplace to express it. Rape is one strategy to pass on your genes, but that does not mean it is biologically optimal or the most evolutionarily successful strategy (and again for the outrage brigade, I am not condoning rape on any level and are of course against it). Same is true for men throwing other men under the bus for women.

We know where gynocentrism eventually leads- social and economic collapse or the Fempocalypse[19] as Karen Straughan aptly named it. Gynocentrism is by its very nature an unchecked and uncompromising fixation on female well-being at the expense of everything else. Despite what gynocentric traditionalists think[20], there is no balancing or containing gynocentrism. Feminism is just the logical political end result of traditionalist gynocentric double standards. With gynocentrism there is just a gradual retreat of civilisation back to uncivilised barbarism, there is no happy equilibrium point. The only thing that stands in the way of gynocentrism is men that value themselves and enforce boundaries with women and the physical environment itself. That is it.

I mean no offence to anyone in the manosphere and I respect and admire Paul, Tom and Janice. I am sure people mean well, but I cannot sit back and keep my mouth closed on this any further. The axiom in the manosphere that men are inherently biologically disposable and women are inherently more valuable because of having a uterus, is the wheel of learned helplessness that the manosphere has to recognise as such and walk away from. It is holding the manosphere back. Men are not destined to throw other men under the bus for women.

We need a paradigm shift in our understanding of gynocentrism. To quote Mark Twain: "It ain't what you don't know that gets you into trouble. It's what you know for sure that just ain't so."[21]
A quote that ideologues of all stripes will never understand. Question everything guys (I do). Our understanding of gynocentrism is just in its infancy and we know less than we think we do.

The cartoonist who dared to find a flaw in females

Mark Dent · 30 October 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Why was there a furious outpouring of unfettered rage directed at one man in our media this week?

Did a corrupt politician break an election promise? Was a serial killer finally apprehended? Did Donald Trump arrive at Melbourne airport? (I would have welcomed him).

No. None of the above.

It was all about a cartoon.

One cartoon.

One fucking cartoon.

Michael Leunig is a Melbourne cartoonist and is someone who has raised the ire of women on more than one occasion during his four decades of work.

For a long time, Leunig was a revered figure. He decided to turn away from political cartoons and attempt to create something more, for want of a better word, spiritual. His boss at The Age gave him a week or two to prove such cartoons had an audience. Prove it he did.

Here are some examples of the types of cartoons which made Leunig a household name in Melbourne and eventually Australia.

[image]

For many years I used Leunig cartoons in my classroom to provoke thought and discussion.

As time passed, Leunig became more political, particularly during the invasion of Iraq. That's where he lost me. A poet, a guru -or simply an observer of the foibles of humankind is only worth listening to if he/she observes all people and never pulls aside the curtain of neutrality which is what makes their observations so compelling. The moment you sense a political agenda rather than a human observation, the magic spell is broken, the emperor no longer has any clothes, the illusion of the dispensing of impartial wisdom is shattered.

Despite my realization that Leunig is simply another flawed human being, his "spiritual" cartoons and observations continue to touch me to this day.

But what about the outrage? The fact of the matter is that Michael Leunig had the gall to create a cartoon depicting a mother so absorbed with her mobile phone that she doesn't realize her baby has fallen out of the pram. As Leunig so often does, this cartoon was accompanied by a poem. Brace yourselves.

[image]

The backlash was swift and ubiquitous. Mums and women in general vented their apoplectic spleen at the absolute temerity of this old fossil. Imagine the nerve of this relic! He had a go at self -absorbed mums who obsess over status updates, selfies and likes to the detriment of their offspring. The old misogynist had shown his true colours once again.

You see, women have long memories.

The avalanche of outrage and self -justification was immense. Let's look at some passages from one woman's response.

'Being a mum is hard. All of your relationships change. Everyone wants to judge your choices. Breast or bottle? Cloth or disposable? Co-sleep? Attachment? Are you meeting your milestones? Are you losing the weight? Your thoughts are often ruled by anxiety and guilt, yet you can feel euphoric. You have this overwhelming love for and profound protectiveness of this tiny creature. It's a lot to come to terms with.

And it's not cool to be a mum. 'Mummy' when attached to podcasts, blogs, or business ventures carries, at best, a sort of sneering condescension, at worst, a smug irritation at voices people would prefer remained silent. It's hard for a mum to have an opinion without being automatically dismissed as shrill or silly.'

There is so much more to this article of righteous indignation. The sense of victimhood and martyr complex drips from every paragraph.

It would be easier, perhaps, to put my baby into childcare for one day a week. Then I could get some rest, get my freelance work done. But I don't dare to. I'm still haunted by those cartoons you did when I was a teenager. The baby in creche, all alone, staring at the ceiling, wondering why Mummy doesn't love him ('Call her a cruel, ignorant, selfish bitch if you like, but I will defend her'). Do you remember?

I believe the cartoon she refers to was created in 1995- nearly 25 years ago! Many women (feminists) still seethe about it.

I notice there are no daddies in this cartoon. I'm not sure where Dad is. Maybe he's at work, maybe he's getting a medal for changing a nappy, maybe he's at the pub, scrolling through Instagram. Daddy's whereabouts aren't important, I guess. He has your blessing to pursue his career without judgement. That, after all, is his place.

Sad to see her resorting to the very stereotyping she is so violently opposed to in Leunig's work by suggesting dads are not competent carers and have a stress/judgement free life at work and home.

This is the point where my old familiar heartbeat began to increase and the adrenalin fueled by my contact with hypocrisy or the blatant disregard or blindness of most women to the endless "judgement" and denigration of men arose. It did not abate as I read the comments section of this piece. I dare you to do the same!

Perhaps I could begin by agreeing with the statement:

"being a mum is hard."

Being a dad is no walk in the park either. Therein lies the heart of the issue.

One rather innocuous observation in the form of a cartoon about an undeniably common behavior in many young mums has created a tsunami of defensive pushback and anger from women all over the country.

If only this moment could be used as an opportunity for men to push the pause button and say:

Wait just one second!

Are you daring to suggest your gender and more specifically mothers, have been unfairly targeted and stigmatized? Are you burning with rage because you feel this “attack” is unjust and untrue? Do you feel there is a double standard at play in this criticism?

Welcome to just the tiniest taste of our fucking world.

The sheer nerve it takes for any woman in this country to write about the cruel and nasty targeting of mums in a nation which eviscerates males, and dads in particular, on a daily basis is almost too much to comprehend.

The woman who wrote this response to Leunig’s cartoon is infuriated. She feels judged and she feels no matter what she does it will never be good enough in the eyes of some people. She produces a shopping list of mundane chores she has to perform each day and attempts to explain why a look at her phone is the least she should be able to do while enduring the grind of toddler raising.

No man could ever imagine what it must feel like to be judged!

On blogs she senses a sneering condescension and a smug irritation from the people she believes would prefer her to just keep quiet. Horrifying stuff.

Yet for all her whining and defensive self-justification, she lives in a world which values mums and shows it in so many ways. Men are afforded no such luxuries.

This outburst from these put-upon women simply underlines my long-held belief that were we to carry out a social experiment for one week in this country, the nation would be on the verge of implosion.

My social experiment would be very simple.

For one week we would plaster billboards across the country with slogans screaming: Australia says no to violence against men and children. Other posters would feature graphic pictures of women beating and at times killing their children.

The girls in every school would be told they must respect all boys and demonstrate this through their words and gestures whenever they interacted with a male. There would be no such demand on boys to return this respect.

Television advertisements would run in prime time each night and focus on the nastiness and toxic bullying so often found where girls and women gather in large numbers. We would see scenes where girls are tormenting another girl who simply looks different. We would see boys and girls reduced to self-harm and even suicide due to the vicious online abuse from girls. The voice over would demand girls put an end to such behavior.

Girls would be forced to take an oath at school, vowing to stamp out any sign of toxic female behavior. They would take this oath standing, while the boys in the class remained seated.

The media would feature daily articles asking why women are so inclined to lie and manipulate others. When a mother kills her babies, male media commentators would read long, heartfelt editorials as they look directly down the camera lens demanding that every woman take responsibility for the crime and promise to have a discussion with their friends and female co-workers, making sure they understand that killing babies isn’t okay.

The issue of toxic femininity would be discussed by all male panels on television.

I could, of course, add so many more items to this week long experiment. Funding for male suicide would be worth hundreds of millions of dollars whilst funding for female suicide would be almost non-existent.

I think the point is made.

Clementine Ford entered this cartoon fray. This sick bigot, who delights in calling any man who dares to point out the horrendous iniquities they face in our society, whiny little dicked sooks.

She also claims to enjoy bathing in male tears.

This same woman screeches like a banshee over a lame cartoon.

Feminist author and commentator Clementine Ford took to Twitter to share her strong thoughts on the doodle.

Ford said Leunig's cartoon amounted to "condescending judgement" and labelled him a "fing gronk".

*"I bet you never spent hours walking babies around in a pram, feeling isolated and alone and terrified. F*ck you and your condescending judgement," she wrote alongside a snap of the offending page in the paper.*

Clementine is definitely coming off as a tad whiny in that diatribe.

I wonder how the mum who penned this response to Leunig's cartoon would cope with just one week of the relentless hatred and bigotry directed at men and boys these past fifty years. How would women and girls as a collective respond?

They would tear the joint asunder.

Women and girls would not tolerate the shit we so willingly swallow. What does this say about the relative levels of self-respect possessed by each gender? Yet it is girls who apparently require our respect simply because they are girls. It is girls whose self-esteem issues have created an endless stream of books seeking to boost girl's confidence and self-belief.

Surely the quickest way to discover what a person thinks about themselves is to see how much crap they are willing to take from others? By that measure we are a collective basket case.

This is ultimately a reflection on us.

Women will not cop a negatively toned cartoon suggesting some of them need to pay more attention to their children without there being a volcanic meltdown. Men have copped five decades of vilification, denigration and abuse disguised as social, legal and governmental efforts to make our society a safer and happier place for the supposedly vulnerable and oppressed members of our community. Our response? Mute indifference and inaction. Apathy and disinterest. Worst of all-support for the very poisonous attitudes which are damaging boys and men.

Sadly, it is clear that while most women will not tolerate the merest hint of negativity about their gender, they are perfectly willing to see the media and government mock, humiliate and denigrate men and boys without registering the slightest twitch of empathy.

Pushback against Leunig

Love byte

K. F. Anderson · 31 October 2019 · Archived copy · Original

I remember I was so happy when my sex robot, Amanda, arrived. I felt a bit like a kid at Christmas as I pried open her shipping box and placed her in a sitting position on my bed. Well…a slightly perverted kid, anyway. No matter, we all had needs, right? Besides, what a man does in the privacy of his own home is nobody's business. It's between him and his partner – whether that partner had skin or the highly realistic synthskin that the website touted as "indistinguishable from the real thing". I snatched up the quick start pamphlet clipped to the front of the little black dress the doll was wearing and skimmed for what to do next. According to the guide, it took four hours for Amanda to fully charge. Using the included cable, I plugged my toy up and looked for the charge light indicator that flashed just under the skin of the left arm. Damn, it was definitely not pre-charged. Nothing to do now but to wait. At least it was only about two in the afternoon. I could leave Amanda charging up, knock out that pile of laundry I'd been avoiding, catch up on a little TV, and that would still leave plenty of time in the evening for some well-earned fun.

Four hours later, I heard a small chime from the bedroom indicating that the sex doll had finished it's charge. I walked in, picked up the quick start guide, sat down on the edge of the bed, and moved on to the next phase of the initial setup.

"Amanda, activate."

The dolls eyes slowly opened, and brown irises almost immediately locked on to my own.

"Sexbot Model T-69832331, Amanda, now online."

Oh, man, this was awesome…whats next? "Amanda, initial setup."

"Commencing initial setup. Please provide the following information…"

I spent the next half an hour or so answering a barrage of questions and inputting all kinds of personal information – name, address, favorite foods, profession, favorite books and movies, height, sexual kinks – everything you could imagine to help give that truly authentic and personalized experience. I was even able to sync the doll up to my cell phone and other smart devices. Each piece of information was met with a brief flutter of Amanda's eyes as she gathered and integrated my data into some complex, mysterious algorithm. After what seemed like an eternity I was greeted with a smile and another chime.

"Initial setup complete."

Awesome! I unplugged the doll, stood up from the bed, and, feeling just a little silly, removed my clothing. "Here we go…", I whispered as I leaned in close for a kiss.

Almost instantly, I felt an intense pressure against my sternum. The sudden force pushed me backwards, away from the doll and a harsh buzzing alarm rang throughout the meager bedroom.

"Error! Dinner not detected. Please provide dinner."

I blinked.

"What…?"

"Error! Dinner not detected. Please provide dinner."

I blinked in disbelief.

Amanda…the sexbot…wanted dinner…

I picked up the nearby quick start guide and looked it over, seeing nothing about needing to feed the toy. I walked over to the shipping box Amanda had arrived in and pawed through the packing material until I saw the instruction manual I had neglected to remove in my earlier excitement. It was the size of an old fashioned phone book and as heavy as several bricks. There, emblazoned on the cover in a large, angry-looking font was stamp reading "Feminism Approved".

"Error! Dinner not detected. Please provide dinner."

Startled, I dropped the weighty tome and it thudded back into the box. Okay, fine. Apparently my robotic companion would require a little bit of food. Naked, I padded into the kitchen and poured a bowl of cereal. Back in the bedroom, I placed the bowl on the bedside table.

"Error! Dinner inadequate. Please provide quality food."

In a state of utter disbelief, I attempted various offerings – leftover chicken, a tuna sandwich, fresh fruit, even a slice of pie. All were rejected and met with the ear splitting alarm and the error message which, surely by some trick of my imagination, sounded more and more annoyed each time it was spouted. Clearly Amanda wanted fresh food. What could I do?

I threw my clothes back on, lugged my synthetic companion downstairs, strapped her into the passenger seat, and pointed my car to the closest burger joint. No sooner had I steered into the drive-through lane than I was met with the same familiar error. I let out an exasperated, choking laugh and glanced down at the clock. 8:12pm. Frustrated, and resigned to the inevitable, I drove in silence to a moderately priced restaurant and got a table for two. When the bemused waiter took our orders, I didn't even bother trying to guess what food to order for Amanda; I knew at this point what I was in for. I clenched my jaw and looked at the floor as the sexbot stiltedly ordered an expensive appetizer, an even more expensive entree, and a lavish chocolate dessert.

Despite the funny looks I got, I made it through dinner. There was no way in hell I wasn't going to. I had paid damn good money for this doll and I was determined to get my money's worth. Back at my apartment, I again placed the robot on the bed and sat down next to it. With dinner taken care of, it was finally time. I reached out to slip the strap of Amanda's dress down and immediately had my hand slapped away.

"Error! Consent not given. Sex refused."

"What the fuck!" I shouted. "Why in the fuck is sex refused?!"

"Error! User voice at inappropriate decibel. Initiating shutdown."

"No, wait! Please! I'm sorry, I'm sorry. Okay…okay, see? I'm not yelling. Not yelling. I'm sorry…..okay…Amanda, why is sex refused? I got dinner and-"

"Sexbot Model T-69832331, Amanda, is not obligated to engage in simulated sexual intercourse with any user. Sexbot Model T-69832331, Amanda, does not trade simulated sexual intercourse for food. Shutdown will be initiated in t-minus fifteen seconds. User is to sleep on couch. Any attempt at approaching Sexbot Model T-69832331, Amanda, will trigger proximity alarms and Defense Mode will be initiated."

I was flabbergasted. I shot up from the bed and grabbed a pillow. I hastily retreated to the living room, snatching the instruction manual on my way out. After I had made camp on the couch, I cracked open the sexbot's manual and began to read. Now, I may not have an IQ capable of challenging titans such as Einstein and Tesla but I'm far from a drooling, slack-jawed simpleton. That being said, five minutes in to my read, I felt like the intellectual equivalent of a toddler wondering how his uncle had gotten his nose. Each page was filled with rule upon contradictory rule and flow charts more complicated than those used in nuclear reactor facilities. Each statement was followed with about thirty caveats and exception clauses. What was even worse than the confusing and contradicting instructions were the paragraphs that, in a vaguely insulting way, implied I should already just know how to do certain things. The words and diagrams blurred together and give me a screaming headache. Despite the pain drilling its way into my skull, I pressed on, desperately picking out any sections I could understand and rereading them several times. After several hours of intense and muddled study, I passed out with the manual in my hands.

The next day at work I mulled over everything I had learned the previous night. It was a convoluted tangle of rules and exceptions but I think I had cracked a part of the code. Maybe. Probably? Yeah. I got this. I knew what to do…

Back at my apartment that afternoon I asked Amanda if she wanted to go shopping and then get dinner.

"Offer accepted. User may proceed."

We visited several clothing stores and found several trendy, and far from inexpensive, outfits that the doll liked. When it came time for dinner, I didn't even bother suggesting that I cook something back home or that we try a fast food place. No, this time I took us straight to a restaurant slightly nicer than the one we visited the previous night. As planned, Amanda insisted on quite the exquisite appetizer, main course, and dessert. Things were going smoothly so after dinner I segued into Phase 2. We returned to my apartment and I poured us two glasses of wine while commenting how horrible it was that women only receive a nickel for every dollar a man makes. The robot agreed and consumed several more glasses of wine as we discussed the benefits of having forced gender quotas in STEM fields. After a while and, feeling pretty confident, I leaned in to once again kiss my sex robot.

"Consent granted. User may proceed."

My eyes lit up as a pair of lacy black panties suddenly fell down Amanda's legs and hit the floor.

The next morning I woke up and looked over at the sexbot lying next to me. Dear God…so many hoops to jump through but holy shit…that sex was good. The manufacturer really did one hell of a job. Amanda's eyes opened and looked into mine. I smiled at her. Maybe Id get the hang of this fancy masturbatory tool after all. I got up to make breakfast.

Fifteen minutes later as I hunkered over my stove-top watching bacon fry, I was intrigued to hear what sounded like several sets of heavy boots stomping up the hallway of my building. Jesus, it was pretty early for all that. Damn kids running around and– My train of thought was startled out of me as seconds later my front door exploded in a shower of splintered wood. Several shotgun-wielding SWAT officers poured into my apartment and began to fan out. I stood there in absolute bewilderment – naked, motionless, and clutching a greasy, dripping spatula as the chaos unfolded. It didn't take long for my presence to be detected. The spatula clattered to the floor as firearms were levied in my direction and I was charged by several members of the team. I was spun around and one of the officers slammed my head into the hot griddle before throwing me to the floor.

"What the fuck!?" I shouted as my head swam. "What the hell's going on?"

I was jerked upward and held aloft until I found my footing. I heard a brief jangle of metal and several rasping clicks. Once applied, the cuffs, already painfully secure, were given an extra squeeze and cracked against the bones in my wrists. The searing pain was forgotten however, as I saw an officer came out of the bedroom with my sex doll in his arms. A synthskin covered finger raised and pointed directly at me.

"Rapist identity confirmed."

"Rape?" I panicked. "Officers, there wasn't any rape! That's just a sex doll! She's not real! Amanda, what the hell is going on?"

"Sexual intercourse has occurred without consent of Sexbot Model T-69832331, Amanda. WARNING! Rape has occurred."

"What the fuck are you talking about? You gave consent! You explicitly gave consent! I couldn't have done anything if you didn't give consent!"

"User employed alcoholic beverages during interaction with Sexbot Model T-69832331, Amanda. Sexbot Model T-69832331, Amanda, was drunk. Consent retroactively revoked. WARNING! Rape has occurred. As outlined in Section 582, subsection 37, point ix, paragraph 23, law enforcement was contacted."

As I was dragged towards the door, my mind raced, desperately trying to think of something that would get me out of this debacle. Then, a flash of inspiration.

"Wait! Stop, stop stop! Just– just stop for a fucking minute! Amanda! Amanda, listen to me! Listen…I'm due for a raise next month! A raise! I'll be making $20 an hour!"

Silence enveloped the room and the visor-clad heads of the SWAT team turned in unison to face my accuser and hear her verdict.

"New user financial information accepted. Re-evaluating."

We all stood there in an awkward silence as Amanda's eyes fluttered. One of the police officers coughed. Another walked over to the stove and switched it off, preventing the now burned bacon from filling the apartment with further smoke.

"Guys, look this is absolutely–"

I was interrupted by a chime and Amanda began to speak.

"User financial information updated. Recalculation complete. Outcome: Potential pay increase negligible. Current and adjusted user financial status insufficient for Partner Access Level upgrade. Current User qualifies for Partner Access Level: Friend Zone. Duties include gift purchase, bill pay, emotional support, and financial support. Partner Access Level: Friend Zone does not include access to simulated sexual intercourse. Please increase physical attractiveness, financial status, or reputation status to upgrade Partner Access Level. All previous consent retroactively withdrawn. WARNING! rape has occurred. Proceeding with legal action."

I kicked and struggled against the officers as they pulled me towards the wooden ruins of my front door

"No! No! This is bullshit! It's fucking bullshit! It's not alive! Its not fucking real! You can't rape it! It's just a fucking doll! I played by all your rules, goddammit! God damn you, Amanda! God damn you!"

Who knew that jail time for the rape of a sexbot could be so long? I sure didn't. It's alright though; it's what I deserve for being such a monster. Jesus Christ, was I ever blind. I treated a sex doll like a thing. Like just some…some toy to be used for my own personal and private pleasure then tucked away when I was done. I was so so utterly selfish that it didn't even occur to me that a non-living sex doll might not consent to sex. I was just too busy trying to have sex with it.

The worst part though? I didn't stop to think about how my actions might make women feel. And really, that's the biggest crime of all. My mandatory castration really helped put things in perspective. As an added bonus, I'm kicking ass– I mean, doing very well– in my Feminist Re-education classes. Those, coupled with my daily hour of self-hate really help me stay centered and keep me in check. All in all, things turned out pretty good, especially considering the alternative. Just think: I could have bought and used a sex doll in the privacy of my own home without affecting anyone and then gone about my business without a woman ever knowing or getting involved.

From the programme website:

> Young men are facing a crisis of masculinity. To deal with it, they have options – the manosphere, a mainly online world where the challenges facing 21st century men are exclusively the fault of women, [J4MB: wrong, many are the fault of men] or the anti-manosphere. [J4MB: What the hell is that?] Philip Tanzer is a Men Rights Activist (or MRA) and manosphere convert who lives in Scotland. He's already a keyboard warrior, fighting the 'feminist establishment' from the highlands of Scotland giving motivational talks to the young men who come to his salon and art gallery. He allows producers to follow him as he attends the International Conference on Men's Issues in Chicago where many of the main leaders and thinkers that together form the nebulous community congregate, including a British MP, far-right YouTubers and a surprising number of women. Along the way, he gives a unique insight into the individual stories behind the growing group of men in the UK and US who find their tribe in the online forums dedicated to reversing the feminist agenda. He also meets and debates with men and women [J4MB: feminist "academics"] who believe the manosphere is a dangerous and misogynist place and looks at alternative ways to address the growing levels of mental ill health and suicide in young men – could drumming around a campfire be a better way for men to connect?

Phillip Tanzer does well under difficult circumstances. Note the sinister background music at times e.g. when Philip Davies MP is giving his presentation. Not one prominent MRA was interviewed during the BBC team's three days at the Chicago conference, but it was good to hear Karen Straughan's name mentioned. This was always going to be a hit piece, but it will lead some listeners to investigate the manosphere and learn something about men's issues.

A sentimental continuation of coverture

Peter Wright · 3 November 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Most of us have observed the baffling refusal of women to take responsibility for mistakes, or for outright shitty behavior. More accurately said, we've all observed women's tendency to impute responsibility for their transgressions to others; especially to men. Thousands of people recognize the tendency; they discuss it, make jokes about it, suffer it in their marriages, and every single day you can read hundreds of new anecdotes demonstrating it in action. In short, it's definitely a thing.

Where the hell does does this behavior originate?

Some might view it as a genetic tendency, that women's refusal to take responsibility arises from a genetic peculiarity. Or perhaps we might garner a pretzel-shaped argument from an Evolutionary Psychologist suggesting that women's shirking of responsibility is a necessary sexual or survival strategy. Unfortunately such hypotheses do little more than mirror the usual traditionalist attempts at absolving women of responsibility.

For this article I'm going to pose a simpler, culturally rooted explanation: coverture.

The doctrine of coverture, in its most basic definition, dictates that husbands are to take responsibility for wives' wellbeing, and also to suffer proxy punishment for her social and legal transgressions – all responsibility rests with the husband whether he likes it or not.

As a social policy, the doctrine of coverture began to develop from approximately the 11th century, gaining currency throughout the British Isles from where it was imported to the wider world via English colonies. Douglas Galbi summarises the intent of coverture as follows:

> Coverture was the idea that husband and wife are one under law. More specifically, coverture assigned to the husband responsibility and punishment under law for his wife's criminal acts. Coverture also protected women from mass imprisonment for debt in early modern England…
> Coverture was among a range of institutions and ideas that generated highly disproportionate imprisonment of men. Legal history conventionally interprets coverture as a legal concept oppressing women. Coverture oppressed women in the same way that men-only Selective Service registration oppresses women today…
> Coverture has been badly misunderstood in legal history. Coverture assigned to husbands responsibility for their wives' criminal acts and their wives' debts. Coverture increased the criminalization of men… Anti-men bias in invoking coverture is a general rhetorical pattern built upon deep structures of gynocentrism.[1]

According to the Oxford Dictionary, coverture originally referred to anything used as a cover, such as a shelter, the lid of a cup or dish, the cover of a book, or the cover of a bed, and is synonymous with the general and collective sense of 'covering.'

In its wider sense, the purpose of a coverture is described as any device used to provide protection, shelter, or adornment. Interestingly, it can also mean to conceal as in a veil or disguise used to foster covert conduct or to deceive. In the latter sense coverture "covers a multitude of sins," thereby offering a pretense, a justification, and a defense for egregious conduct.

The social doctrine of coverture saw that men "covered" for women's sins in exchange for the husband's supposed privilege of authority; a privilege we could justifiably read as a poisoned chalice when one considers the number of men that went to the gallows in place of their wives.

Fast forward to the 19th century when coverture laws were still in place, and the advent of feminism was beginning. Feminists hit upon a plan to remove the "male authority" facet of the coverture doctrine, but to retain the "male responsibility for women's wrongdoing" aspect of it. In effect they split coverture down the middle, trashing one half of the doctrine and continuing to preserve the other. As E. B. Bax observed:

> "For it is a significant and amusing fact that no mention is ever made by the advocate of women's claims of the privileges which have always been accorded the "weaker sex." These privileges are quietly pocketed as a matter of course, without any sort of acknowledgment, much less any suggestion of surrender."
> Some Heterodox Notes on the Women Question (1887)
> "This public opinion regards it as axiomatic that women are capable of everything men are capable of, that they ought to have full responsibility in all honourable and lucrative functions and callings. There is only one thing for which unlimited allowance ought to be made on the ground of their otherwise non-existent womanly inferiority, and that is their own criminal or tortious acts! In a word, they are not to be held responsible, in the sense that men are, for their own actions when these entail unpleasant consequences for themselves. On the contrary, the obloquy and, where possible, the penalty for the wrong-doing is to be shifted on to the nearest wretched man with whom they have consorted."
> Why I Am an Anti-Suffragist (1909)
> "To men all duties and no rights, to women all rights and no duties, is the basic principle underlying Modern Feminism, Suffragism, and the bastard chivalry it is so fond of invoking."
> The Fraud of Feminism, Chapter VII: The Psychology of the Movement (1913)

Further to Bax's claim that the penalty for women's wrongdoing got shifted onto the nearest wretched man, we appear to have come in the 21st century to not only maintaining, but amplifying the blame game in an effort to retain the "dignity, esteem, and reputation" of today's women — a blame game that has its unbroken root in the tradition of coverture.

If the theory of ongoing-coverture satisfies the baffling question of why women shirk responsibility, then we at least have an answer. Women want to maintain the historical tradition of having their transgressions excised, hidden and covered by men, while they go about securing the gynocentric utopia they have been so effective at building.

Maintenance of sentimental coverture rightly belongs to gynocentrism theory. For how could gynocentrism survive if women took more responsibility, if they were more accountable for their acts? Quite simply gynocentrism couldn't survive on that basis, particularly if their aim is one of fairness and equality which can only be achieved by truly emancipating women and holding them responsible for their actions.

So as a working model lets add sentimental coverture as one of 5 pillars of a gynocentric temple, which would look something like this: Pillar-1. Chivalry, 2. Courtly/romantic love, 3. Gender narcissism, 4. Coverture, and lastly 5.

Power-seeking (via the long march through the institutions of power, this strategy being evident for centuries before Marxism was dreamed up, as for example in the writing of Christine De Pizan and her 'City of Ladies').

In summary, this article posits that coverture has survived long beyond its historical use in law, becoming a social custom divested of its original legal framework. Whatever the merits of its original purpose, the sentimental continuation of coverture provides an enduring custom encouraging women's shirking of personal responsibility – this thanks in no small part to the activism of the feminist movement which postures as progressive, but turns out to be the same as it ever was.

A Dream of Fecunda (part one)

Duncan Smith · 5 November 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's Note: Below is an extract from the book, The Vast and the Spurious: 25 Problems for Feminism, by Duncan Smith. In this excerpt he examines the feminist vision of creating a utopia peopled only by women.

How long have we had feminism? It seems like eternity but it's only about fifty years since it really fired up. In those fifty years, there have been thousands of books, talks, and courses on the subject, but we're still no closer to gender Utopia. I reckon it's time to seize the moment and quit while we're behind. We must rise as one people and many genders and say Enough! After all this talk, after all this trash, it's time to give Fecunda a go.

And what is Fecunda? It is a magical land; a country never darkened by evil or sin. It is a holy realm without pay gaps, privilege, or rape culture. Fecunda is a land populated only by women.

Sounds pretty good, huh? But is Fecunda a real place, or one known only in legend? Well, if it ain't real, it ought to be. Women have suffered too long at the hands of men. As one feminist said, it's only down to their 'immense compassion or immense foolishness' that they continue to co-exist with men at all. Yet we can't expect women's love to be boundless. It's time for the Dear John letter; time to go our separate ways. Women deserve a homeland. They deserve Fecunda.

The idea of Fecunda came to me in a dream. It was right after I saw Black Panther, that documentary about the awesome country of Wakanda in Africa. Wakanda is a really cool place with advanced technology they developed on their own far from Western civilisation. Yet as we know, Wakanda is an ethnostate, only for Africans. Because of that, Wakanda has never had the problem of racism. It stands to reason there's no racism in an ethnostate. In the same way, an all-female Fecunda will solve the problem of sexism. That means no more domestic disputes, no more man-splaining or man-spreading. In fact, no more problems at all.

Sure, there's the matter of reproduction, for without children, how can Fecunda endure? Should they take a few men as breeding slaves in a sort of reverse Handmaid's Tale? Better not. No hint of toxic masculinity should ever taint the holy land of Fecunda. I guess the Fecundan scientists can figure out some kind of cloning system. But that is mere detail. The immediate need is to get Fecunda up and running. Men have held women back for too long. Women have earned the right to live under matriarchy, with all-female companies, universities, and families. Let them lead the way and show us how civilisation can be done.

The Case for Fecunda

Now, Fecunda is not for all women. It's for those who have made it clear they've had enough of men. In other words, feminists.

It's for Boston academic, Suzanna Danuta Walters, who wrote a famous article called 'Why Can't We Hate Men?' Some people say feminism's a hate movement. According to Walters, it has every right to be. Fecunda is also for Laurie Penny, who's fed up with women doing all the work in relationships. It's for Roxane Gay who says that in the age of Me Too, it's time for men to confess their part in creating rape culture. It's for all the authors ripping off Margaret Atwood and putting out their own versions of The Handmaid's Tale. Really, it's for everyone who thinks patriarchy has them in its vice-like, invisible grip. Men are the problem? Fecunda is the solution.

It's time to give Fecunda a go. Just think of all the problems getting rid of men would instantly solve. Like I said – no gender pay gap, no rape culture, no male privilege. Fecunda would have 100% female CEOs, a complete lack of sexism, and the Me Too movement would be about as necessary as those bicycles that fish don't ride.

If you want to do the thing properly, you could even wind the clock back to Year Zero. It's a grave injustice women in history were denied the chance to make all the great inventions and discoveries. A Stone Age Fecunda would give girls the chance to shine. Let the female Newtons and Darwins emerge as they will.

Or perhaps that is a bridge too far. Fecunda may be a social Utopia, but if it is to compete with other nations, let it have access to the knowledge male privilege has produced. Let Fecunda begin on an equal footing with everyone else. Then, it may shine as the model of what human potential can achieve once patriarchy is vanquished once and for all.

Trouble in Paradise?

In theory, Fecunda should be exactly what feminists want. Let them keep all the advantages of modern life, but remove the one blight on their lives: men and the patriarchy. They could build their own society from the ground up. What could possibly go wrong? Well, maybe a couple of things.

The first problem would be finding women to do all the hard, nasty, or dangerous jobs normally done by men. The garbage collection, building, manual labour, and so on. There'd be no more men to do all that stuff. There'd also be no more men at the top running, inventing, or achieving things from which all others benefit. Still, there's no reason women can't step up and start doing all this. That's what they want, isn't it?

The second problem would be mental. Being human and living a happy life is difficult. All this time feminists have told themselves their problems are caused by men. After living in that whole Excuse Culture, what are they going to do when the Great Excuse is removed?

Having played the blame game so long, they'll find it extremely hard to change – which is one reason they'll never leave. But imagine if they did. In Fecunda, there'd be no more blaming men for everything and thanking them for nothing. No more the eternal cop out. No more thinking 'I could be anything but for the cursed patriarchy!'

When your mindset is one of grievance, this mode of thinking isn't easy to give up. If a whole country was formed with people who think like this, it would be only a matter of time before a new scapegoat was found. Some new form of privilege or systemic unfairness would soon be discovered.

You can see this in the recent backlash against white feminists from women of colour. It is almost a matter of schadenfraude to see white feminists being chastised over their privilege, power, and even – Heaven forbid – the pay gap between black and white women. Still, we'd better not have any of that mean old schadenfraude stuff around here. It might lead to fantasies about what happens when people who do nothing but complain are forced to live with each other.

The Skeptics' Attack on Fecunda

I'm not the first to dream of Fecunda. Of course, there were the lesbian separatists in the 1970s, but as recently as 2018 – at the height of the Brett Kavanaugh furore – some visionary on Twitter said, 'Ladies, fuck it all. Let's start our own damn country.'

This set off a storm of replies. The most succinct of these was, 'And yet you're still here.'

Some insinuated an all-female country might not be a place of peace and harmony. 'The weekly civil wars would be draining,' said one. 'Y'all would hate each other in 4 days,' said another. A less optimistic forecast was 'I'd give your country about 2 hours before it burns to the ground.' One woman tweeted 'A country with only feminists in it? I think I've heard of that one. It's called Hell. But please go.'

Some men were in favour of an all-female country, but for different reasons. 'You can take the blame for a while,' said one guy. Another echoed the sentiment. 'Do it. There will be no way you can blame men for your problems!' Another said 'For the love of GOD, please do. Take all the Feminists and the Soy-boy fruitcake men. Let me know where to donate. It'll take you less than a year to have your own civil war when you realize that men AREN'T your problem YOU are.'

This was all terribly unfair. As one girl protested, 'It's funny how men think women can't run their own country because omg "women hate women," like they didn't create the systemic internalised misogyny to begin with.' So it looks like in Fecunda, men can still take the blame even if they're not there.

Then again, some women were keen to try it. 'I'm in!' one tweeted. 'I offer super mad admin, commercial and legal skills…as well as being a homemaker.' Now, while it's true those skills are useful in any modern economy, several replies showed a concern that other jobs might be harder to fill:

I'm curious about this proposal. I'm interested to see if you'll find enough workforce to construct the building, the roads, bridges, the power plants. Then there's the sewage plants, the plumbing, the mining, et al. This would be fascinating & educational.

Go ahead. Some things to ponder. 1. What's your constitution look like? 2. Who collects the resources? How are they distributed? 3. What's your medium of exchange? 4. How do you protect yourselves? 5. Have a draft? Mandatory military service? I've got more when you're done.

Who collects the garbage? Who climbs the cell phone towers? Who pumps your oil? Who frames your houses? Who defends your freedom? Hint: It's not feminist ink spillers with ZERO job skills.

Perceptive readers will pick up a hint of skepticism at the idea a women-only country could work. Still, pioneers have always been mocked for having the guts to try something new. They laughed at Columbus when he set off for the New World. They laughed at Julius Caesar when he tried to conquer Ancient Britain. They laughed at Jimmy Jones when he took his People's Temple to the tropical paradise of Guyana.

Don't laugh. Goddamn it, let's give Fecunda a try! Feminists have been saying for years women can do anything men can. Perhaps they're right. Yet until the experiment is tried, it's all hypothetical – and talk is cheap. That's why Fecunda is the perfect chance for women to finally achieve their full potential away from the shackles of patriarchy and the soul-crushing privilege of men. All together now – Give Fecunda a Go!

As for who would rule, there's no shortage of high profile leaders who could step up as Fecunda's first president: Angela Merkel, Julia Gillard, or Justin Trudeau, just to name a few. Hillary might even step into the breach if she's got nothing better to do. Maybe whoever it is could make some terrible empathy-based decisions like having open borders or something. Then again, that would defeat the point, wouldn't it? Fecunda is all about keeping the right ones in and the wrong ones out.

Envy 10, Empathy 0

This essay has been facetious in tone, but has a more serious intent. It's a response to what seems to be a systematic resentment of men.

Contrary to feminist belief, most Western men are not princes, lords, or playboys. We do not have lives of astonishing ease, free of troubles and sorrow.

Men are getting pretty tired of the Envy 10, Empathy 0 view of them. We're sick of being blamed for everything and thanked for nothing. We're sick of being a 'we' at all. Men are individuals, not part of a team that can be blamed for every problem, real or imagined, women think they have. We are not a gestalt entity to be blamed for the crimes of our worst members.

But if feminists really think men are the problem, Fecunda is the solution. They should leave and establish their own society. Let's see if it leads to any kind of Utopia.

Perhaps it will. Inga Muscio seems keen on the thought of an all-female space. In her magnum opus, Cunt: A Declaration of Independence, she describes the life changing experience of attending the Michigan Womyn's Music Festival, where it's not only the music that's female. The gatekeepers, bus drivers, and every other role is taken by women. Indeed the only men allowed to enter the site are there to empty the porta-loos.

Muscio contrasts this with regular life, where she cannot leave her home without being immersed in a male-created world. The cars, streets, and buildings are the result of men's labour and design. Even most of the songs she hears, or the movies she sees advertised, have been made by men.

This is quintessential feminist discontent. Instead of seeing our civilisation as something to be proud of or grateful for, it's a source of annoyance. The whole damn thing is a tiresome imposition on women. To be fair, Muscio's point is the frustration that women haven't had more of a hand in creating it – and Cunt certainly is one of the better feminist books. Yet in this section (from pages 206-07) the antagonism to men is so strong that maybe it's time to trial some kind of gender apartheid. Why not? Why not trial an all female country where women can run the show? It's time to replace the complaining with action. Fecunda would be like the Michigan Womyn's Festival, but all the time. The only problem is the Fecundans will have to empty their own porta-loos.

Is feminism a hate movement? The official answer is no, but it does seem to be angrier than ever the last few years. My city's main newspaper runs anti-male stories daily. One journalist used it to proclaim the Me Too movement a revolt against aeons of oppression. Another, writing after the murder of a young woman, raged against men as a class and said it was an act of folly for women to keep partnering with them at all.

In her infamous 'Why Can't We Hate Men?' essay, Suzanna Danuta Walters argues that hate is justified. She says that right around the world, women suffer at the hands of men, just as they have through history. Men are responsible for centuries of woe and the only way they can make amends is to get out of the way. She calls on men to give up all leadership positions and hand power to women to make up for all the damage they've caused.

Some expressions of hate are even more direct. During the Brett Kavanaugh affair, a lady I'll call Amelia was outraged by all the men defending Kavanaugh on social media. She tweeted that they all deserved horrible deaths and feminists would 'laugh as they take their last gasps,' before castrating their corpses and feeding them to pigs.

As an aside, Amelia recently defended free speech on Twitter. I tweeted a reply: 'For once I agree with you, Amelia.' 'You might agree with me on a few other things too,' she answered. Not sure how to take this, I tweeted, 'You may be right,' before returning to meditate on my hopes for Fecunda.

So, let's repeat: Men are the problem. Fecunda is the solution. If Danuta Walters wants women to rule, she could keep slogging away in the countries clogged up with men, but why not just move to Fecunda? Imagine how much women can achieve once their main problem is removed once and for all. I mean, on Christmas Day, 2018, someone called 'Feminist Next Door' sent out a special festive tweet on the same topic. The gist of it was to imagine that men vanished from the world for 24 hours. Mind you, they would not be harmed, just absent.

The day men vanished need not be Christmas Day itself. It could be any day. But it would be just like Christmas for people like 'Feminist Next Door.' The idea was for women to imagine what they could do on that joyful day, and given the nobility of the sentiment, let's forgive FND for ripping off Andrea Dworkin. A couple of months later she answered a male heckler who said something rude about International Women's Day. She said the other 364 days of the year were all International Men's Day, so the heckler should shut up and let women have their one special day.

The trouble is 'Feminist Next Door' is way too modest in her demands. 24 hours? What can you do in 24 hours? You need at least 24 years to see what women can really achieve. It's just possible that after 24 years, Fecunda might be the greatest country in the entire world, a superpower to rival Wakanda itself. In Fecunda, it will be International Women's Day 365 days a year.

*Part Two of this article will move on to the topic of 'rape culture.'

Defaulting to feminism

Paul Taylor · 10 November 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Tinted glass is beautiful, especially when it is of our own making. It does not, however, improve illumination.

Un-tinted Glass

I've been a social worker/therapist over 40 years. I have a longitudinal perspective on the interaction between feminism and mental health. I still practice, so I don't use my actual name. I am a white male.

Social work and mental health—different but overlapping fields—are increasingly opting for (I would argue for "defaulting to") feminist perspectives. But the process has been going on for some time. I can still remember being coached on the Duluth Model for domestic violence, and even "buying in." Needless to say, I now view myself as having been duped, as the Duluth Model has been seriously discredited. Today, I am seeing a conspicuous absence of family communication and structural family therapy concepts (think Virginia Satir, Jay Haley, Salvador Minuchin and Carl Whitaker). I have read about the alleged reasons for this shift away from structural family concepts, but I suspect the real reason is going unnamed. Essentially, such perspectives frame the nuclear family as a natural system, and feminism increasingly wants to eliminate the nuclear family, or view it as a product of the "patriarchy."

And, of course, we all saw what happened to the DSM recently. Or what about the University of Texas and its "Healthy Masculinities" program? Both are classic examples of the mental health field "defaulting" to a feminist agenda.

But these changes are not specifically why I am writing today. I am writing to point out that feminism in its current form (and via a specific proponent that I will name below) and social work are essentially incompatible—both logically and ethically—when men are the clients (and increasingly, I would predict, men will be the clients). One of the most basic tenets in social work when I was learning it was "start where the client is." Now: apply this to feminism and its approach to men. You will find very quickly that the shoe does not fit. Feminists will argue that feminist therapy with men allows those men to reassess how "the patriarchy hurts them too," and can free men from rigid sex roles. The point feminist therapists will not make is that it is highly dubious to attempt to "free" the "oppressor" without specific condemnation: this therapy's fundamental premise is that the male client must admit how he has filled this oppressor role, or "benefitted from patriarchy." Mr. Tom Golden has addressed this previously in some detail.

In social work, you do not tell the client what is "right" or "best" for them. Even in addictions and corrections, we prefer Motivational Interviewing (which helps the client take a cost-benefit perspective on use and behavior). Instead, you discover what their view of this "rightness" is. If you do not, you can not claim to be surprised when your intervention fails. Yet, in feminist-influenced social work/therapy today, feminist therapists and educators begin by "explaining" to men what their experience (as men) is and has been ("patriarchy hurts men too—you were taught not to feel"). This is called "getting woke." There are even entire books by collections of feminist authors that advise feminists to intervene directly by telling men what changes to make in themselves. The message in essence is: "we have waited long enough—now we will show you what to do."

Here is where I am likely to ruffle feathers– even with some of the male population. One of the feminist commentators that is spoken of as being sympathetic to male concerns is Bell Hooks. To her credit, she has her share of male supporters, and she has spoken against the acid, "I bathe in male tears" voice that is dominating much of feminism currently. She has her fans—but I am not one of them. The reason is that she is doing essentially what every other feminist commentator is doing when they address men: she is telling men what the male experience "really" is, and how it "needs to change." In her book "We Real Cool," Hooks states "… as a black woman who cares about the plight of black men I feel I can no longer wait for brothers to take the lead and spread the word." In essence, the message would appear to be, "you're not doing it right or fast enough, so I am taking over." (This is more than a little curious, given Ms. Hooks' expressed orientation as a Buddhist, as one of the Buddha's most basic teachings was that no one can know your path but you.)

It should be noted that Ms. Hooks is by no means the only feminist who is attempting to address men directly and give them advice. The idea that men's work should be left to men has officially been declared "unworkable" by feminist social work writers, and it is being replaced with the idea that men must be "engaged" and "challenged." (These self-appointed change agents appear unaware of MRA's and men's websites—or perhaps they simply don't like the answers men come up with for themselves.) I am sorry, but in social work, whenever the worker/therapist/commentator begins by telling a member of a different demographic what their experience is (indeed, implying to them that the commentator understands it better than they do), she/he/they are blowing political, self-serving "smoke." Hooks often uses language that she hopes will help her be viewed as sympathetic to men but betrays herself with a transparently judgmental attitude. To avoid quoting out of context, let me reproduce a passage that illustrates this point (emphases mine); notably this passage has often been cited as evidence of Hooks' alleged concern for men:

> "Feminist advocates collude in the pain of men wounded by patriarchy when they falsely represent men as always and only powerful, as always and only gaining privileges from their blind obedience to patriarchy….patriarchal ideology brainwashes men to believe that their domination of women is beneficial when it is not: Often feminist activists affirm this logic when we should be constantly naming these acts as expressions of perverted power relations, general lack of control of one's actions, emotional powerlessness, extreme irrationality, and in many cases, outright insanity. Passive male absorption of sexist ideology enables men to falsely interpret this disturbed behavior positively. As long as men are brainwashed to equate violent domination and abuse of women with privilege, they will have no understanding of the damage done to themselves or to others, and no motivation to change."

"Blind obedience." "Domination of women" and "violent domination and abuse of women." "Perverted power relations, general lack of control of one's actions, emotional powerlessness, extreme irrationality, and in many cases, outright insanity." "Passive male absorption." "Brainwashed to equate violent domination of women with privilege." "No understanding."

(These poor men—they don't even know they are oppressing themselves. But wait—feminism can teach them.)

Questions for feminists:

What if it is untrue that men are taught "not to feel," but instead that they simply feel differently? (Mr. Tom Golden has made this point multiple times.)

What if it is not a problem of men not knowing their own feelings, but one of men not having the feelings feminists want men to have? (I would like to suggest, as bibliotherapy for Ms. Hooks, the topic of Situational Distress Therapy for men.)

Hooks tries to dodge this bullet by insisting that when she refers to "the patriarchy" she is not necessarily referring to men. I think men are entitled to ask Ms. Hooks, "whom, then, are you addressing? You specifically aim your message toward men, and specifically make 'patriarchy' the topic, but then want men to believe it is not a criticism of men or maleness." (This position is painfully close to the conversionist Christian message to other Christians about homosexuals—"Love the sinner—hate the sin." Of course, we all know what the gay community had to say to that.) If men are "brainwashed" by patriarchal culture, and if patriarchal culture is a male invention, then how is this not a criticism of who men are. It is notable that in Suzette Hayden Elgin's very insightful book on verbal self-defense, one of the classic formats for disguised attack is this form: "Everyone understands why you (insert criticized behavior)." With the contextual "smoke screen" removed, Hooks' quote could be summarized as saying this to men: "Everyone understands why you dominate and abuse women, and have no understanding of the damage you do to yourself and others." This is a classic example of a veiled attack.

News alert, guys. It's a criticism of men and maleness. Hooks is an avowed Marxist, and in her worldview white men are the "bourgeois." (Essentially women and every other demographic group fall under "proletariat." Hence, "intersectional feminism.") She tries to demonstrate ways in which white women can be part of the "bourgeois" too, but she never allows white men to be anything but this, and she insists that African-American men are less oppressed than African-American women (she even argues that slavery was easier for male slaves than female slaves). Herein lies the fundamental irony of "feminism is for you too, guys": it's for you if you can accept that your demographic (and its alleged fondness for power and control) is responsible for most of the problems in the world, and in history.

So much for starting where the client is.

It is notable that Ms. Hooks insists that the concept of patriarchy is needed as a lens through which to understand imbalances in power, both around the world and throughout history. Yet, Mr. Warren Farrell acknowledges and discusses the same global and historical patterns without resorting to this concept. Is Ms. Hooks (and feminism generally) afraid of what would happen to the feminist argument if the overarching–but completely untestable–idea of "patriarchy" were to be removed? I think she/it is.

A further irony in this message is that it reveals in Bell Hooks the same kind of "entitlement" and "hegemony" that she insists men (especially white men) need to liberate themselves from. It says (if, again, you remove the "smoke screen"): "You are not woke, but you are a man/white man, so that is understandable, and I am here to help you understand yourself" (condescension); "I am an African-American woman, so I see things more clearly than you and I have the right to instruct you on what you should think– because I'm tired of waiting for you to think what I want you to think" (entitlement, assumption of superior perspective). (Another example of this supposed superior perspective, though not of Ms. Hooks' creation, is the film "The Mask You Live In," whose narration sounds as if it could begin with: "Now boys, let me tell you what you are really feeling, and why you don't know this.")

As The Who's rock song famously stated: "Meet the new boss—same as the old boss." Meet the new "sympathetic" misandry—same as the old misandry.

And once again, so much for starting where men are.

Feminism, via proponents like bell Hooks, wants to sell men on the notion that women (and apparently minority women even more so) have a superior view of the male experience. This, I'm sure, is very close to what pregnant women used to hear when young male OBGYN doctors "explained" pregnancy and childbirth to them. "Granted your point of view may be informative, Doc, but don't tell me what my experience is. Fair enough?" When men do this type of thing, it is called a "microaggression" ("mansplaining," for example). Apparently when feminists do the same thing it becomes a public service.

Further, the motivating force that leads men like me to resist feminism's "answers" is not the loss of power. Let me repeat that for Ms. Hooks—it is not the loss of power. It is, in my view, the loss of legitimate identity. Feminism has been an experience of widened options and new "selves" for women. It has been an experience of subtracted and invalidated (and, yes, demonized) "selves" for men. Further, if men are fundamentally motivated by—or, alternately, brainwashed into– a wish to control women, how do we explain MGTOW? MGTOW's basic message to women is, "I'll leave you alone, and you leave me alone—I'll go my way, and you go yours." Where is the control or dominance in that message, Ms. Hooks? Could it be that you are threatened by trends like MGTOW because they disconfirm your model of male dominance?

Thought experiment for feminists:

Imagine your perfect profile of problematic masculinity (yes, make the sex male); now substitute a woman for the man under exam—and watch your condemnation change to praise. "Toxic" or problematic masculinity is apparently only problematic if it is displayed by men; when it is displayed by women it goes by "assertiveness,"

"agency," "competence," "confidence," "effectiveness," etc. Even male feminists like Mr. Kimmel, Mr. Jensen, and Mr. Stoltenberg insist that men should joyfully relinquish all meaningful sense of male identity. I would challenge them by asking, "and what identities are we asking women to give up–really?"

It is likely no accident that feminists routinely oppose "exclusively male space" but insist that "exclusively female space" is needed. If men were to talk to each other without feminist censorship, they might begin to suspect that masculinity can actually mean something, and they might allow themselves to determine that meaning– for themselves– rather than allow feminist writers, like Ms. Hooks, to instruct them on the preferred feminist version of it. Ms. Hooks' status as a Marxist is again relevant here: as any reader of Marx can tell you, a key step in his plan for destroying capitalism was to destroy the family, and a key step toward destroying the family was to emasculate the men. What better way to veil your attempt to destroy male identity than to pretend you are helping men find themselves (as long as it is the self you want them to find).

I will never try to silence a woman when she speaks about her own experience. Yes, that includes Ms Hooks.

I will relentlessly interrupt her, however, when she begins to speak to me about mine. Yes, that includes Ms. Hooks.

I think Ms. Hooks needs interrupting on exactly this point.

We are all haunted people.

We are all followed by that thing, or those things, that seem devoted to creating our misery.

However.

I would argue that we often misname our ghosts or demons—owing both to their defiance of easy description, and our own stubborn habits of vision.

Ancient beliefs have long held that if we wish to exorcize the "demon," we must first learn its true name.

I would argue that feminism has misunderstood the name of its demon, and until it begins to use the correct name, its attempts at exorcism will fail.

Ms. Hooks, its name is not "imperialist white supremacist capitalist patriarchy."

The myth that men only want one thing

Paul Bonea · 11 November 2019 · Archived copy · Original

You've probably heard of the phrase "men only want one thing". It's easy to drop it as "sage advice" in a real life discussion that's strayed into the more spicy areas of how men and women interact with each other.

The 'one thing' in this case is of course sex. The phrase is an example of how society at large enjoys perpetuating the notion, humorously or otherwise, that men are robots with simple programming and that all their efforts are directed towards their next sexual conquest.

Of course, the phrase is said as a joke most of the times. But "men only want one thing" and other phrases like it create todays cultural background that guides how men and women interact with one another.

An implicit meaning that women want "more than one thing"

Part of the subtlety of the phrase is that if men only want one thing, then by definition it must mean that "women want more than one thing". If it didn't, then the phrase might as well be gender neutral "people only want one thing", which doesn't quite have the same ring to it.

So what do women want?

After many thousands of years, we still don't quite have a scientific answer for that. But popular belief says that women want a connection and emotional commitment from the opposite sex, and not just "one thing".

At first glance, this doesn't sound like such an outrageous distinction between men and women. The problem is that men's desires are frowned upon as base and instinctive. By opposition, a woman's desires are somehow nobler and purer.

The end meaning of "men only want one thing" is a criticism and shaming of men's behavior and a pointed remark that a lifestyle of casual dating is "wrong" while entering and committing to long term relationships is "the right way".

Examples of this abound. One is the recent creation of the word "fuckboy" (interestingly however, people who mock the fuckboy also criticize slut shaming).

This shaming of men's intentions also extends to other aspects of their life, such as when a man wants to go out alone to a bar or club. Very, very few men are capable of going out alone without having the "creep" label attached, and most people will just assume he's out there to get laid.

Do men want just one thing?

This belief that men just want to play the field, ends conversations and doesn't ask the important question why don't men commit?

The simple answer is that by and large men don't really have an issue to stay with just one woman. In fact, most men would actually desire that.

What men do not want to do however, is to invest in relationships that are not fulfilling, and do not provide value to their life.

Men who only seem to want one thing are simply in the search for the right person. To be sure, some men have impossible standards that almost no woman can meet. However, most men are reasonable in their expectations but still have trouble finding a suitable partner.

For a man, the only logical solution to this problem is to "stay on the market" as it were, and keep looking for someone they feel is right for them, even if this means serial dating.

Viewed from a different perspective, this is men's equivalent of women who seem to experience a lack of financially marriageable men.

In popular media such as music and movies, men are depicted as rash and impulsive when it comes to relationships. But in real life, the silent majority of men are much more thoughtful and measured in how they choose their partners. Most men are readily willing to trade short term flings for a relationship with a woman that meets their criteria.

In a way, the trope of the woman that ends the bad boy's behavior has some truth to it. Except that it's not the woman who corrects the behavior, but the bad boy who believes he's found what he was looking for and can now move on to another stage of his life.

Why men are accused of wanting one thing

In the search for a suitable partner, men will likely go through many failed flings, relationships and situationships. As it so often happens, many men will be rejected by women they would have liked to pursue further. The reverse will also be true, and men will turn down women they consider to be incompatible with them.

Sometimes, feelings will be hurt and the women who are turned down will believe the man simply used them for sex, because "men only want one thing".

This is unfortunate, and perpetuates a negative stereotype of men's intentions and what they want from women. If it happens repeatedly it can lead to bitterness and can poison how the women who were turned down interact with future men in their lives. This then turns into to a negative downward spiral that is not fulfilling either for men or women.

If a rejection happens once, it's a fluke and a mismatch. But if it happens repeatedly, then it is an indication that how a woman approaches her interactions with men isn't healthy.

In this case, a woman who decides that "men only want one thing" makes a conscious decision to blame her romantic failures on men in general instead of looking inward, at herself, and how she might be sabotaging her own relationships.

This isn't something extreme to say. Nowadays, many people grow up in broken homes or dysfunctional families and have no intuitive understanding of how a healthy relationship should look like. For many, many people the ability to carry a relationship is something they learn over time through personal experience, instead of having a healthy relationship role model at home. This applies to men and women equally.

Thus, in the face of repeated rejections, a woman's best approach isn't to shift the blame on men being simple minded. Instead, a woman would be much better served to take a step back and figure out all the ways she harmed her interactions with men and what she can do to fix that.

What do men REALLY want?

There are 3.5 billion men on the planet, so it's a bit tricky to summarize what each and every man wants into a single phrase. But it is possible to make a vague guideline that can be used to describe the desires of most men (but not all men).

In two words, when it comes to long term relationships men cherish security and predictability. The exact meanings of these two words can be different from man to man, but the overall theme is the same.

Security in this case means that a man feels safe enough to invest himself in a relationship. A man wants to know that his efforts will not be wasted by a sudden attitude change from their partner, especially one that is out of their control.

But, as mentioned before, men can have different interpretations of security. For some men, it can mean unwavering support in difficult or stressful times, emotional reciprocation, genuine interest in their projects etc.

In regards to stability, a neat marriage joke applies very well: “Men marry women with the hope they will never change. Women marry men with the hope they will change. Invariably they are both disappointed.”

The joke is of course a caricature. True stability isn’t really possible since all people evolve. But what men want is to know that the central qualities that made fall for a woman will still be there 10 or 20 years down the line.

To sum it up

Probably the greatest argument to disprove the myth that “men only want one thing” is the fact that even in this day and age, men are overwhelmingly the ones that propose marriage. This alone should be proof that men want more than “one thing”. The gist is that they want it with someone who fits their standards.

A Dream of Fecunda (part two)

Duncan Smith · 13 November 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's Note: Below is an extract from the book, The Vast and the Spurious: 25 Problems for Feminism.

Part Two – Rape Culture and Guilt

Part one of this article was about a fictional all-women country called Fecunda. Part two looks at a more serious question – are men as a class responsible for individual crimes against women, and are women entitled to hate them? It is after such crimes in my country, Australia, that feminist anger against men reaches a peak.

In June, 2018, a young woman named Eurydice Dixon was raped and murdered in a Melbourne park. This awful event stirred up a lot of anger. TV host, Lisa Wilkinson, mentioned The Handmaid's Tale in a tearful speech. Clementine Ford wrote a newspaper column scolding men for their collective sins.

This may seem odd, given that men as a class did not murder Eurydice Dixon. In fact, she was killed by a 19 year old autistic man named Jaymes Todd. But by some interpretations of feminist theory, men as a class did murder Eurydice, at least indirectly. She was a victim of 'rape culture' and systemic misogyny. So, if men as a whole are part of creating rape culture, some feminists hold them accountable.

Soon after the murder, a police chief spoke out urging women to take precautions – being careful where they walked at night, for instance. This drew an angry response: Why should women change their behaviour? Men are the ones who should change their behaviour. Stop raping women!

The feminists who said this weren't just talking to rapists, but to men as a class. The idea of 'rape culture' is that we live in a misogynistic society where rape becomes normalised through various attitudes toward women and sex. There's a well known triangular diagram used to explain rape culture. It lists twenty-one type of behaviour, at four levels. On level one are rape jokes and 'locker room banter,' for instance. Another version I saw includes 'sexist attitudes' and 'unequal pay,' showing that the causes of rape culture don't have to be directly sexual. Level two of the triangle has cat-calling, stalking, and revenge porn. Level three includes groping and sexual coercion, while actual rape and violence are up the top on level four.

The idea is that any act, no matter how trivial, is part of a spectrum in a general climate of misogyny. This makes rape more likely to happen, or allows its perpetrators to get away with it. That means any man committing the lower level sins – even on level one – is part of creating rape culture, so is to some degree complicit in rape itself.

Strangely, plenty of non-raping men don't like this idea, and 'not-all-men-are-rapists' is a common refrain. Such protests don't impress feminist, Clementine Ford. After the Dixon murder, Ford wrote, 'I am increasingly disagreeing with the view that not all men are part of the problem, and it's because I truly think most of them don't understand that the problem is theirs to solve.'

Her column went on to berate men over what they do to stand up for women. Do they challenge sexist comments from their male friends? Do they stop their colleagues harassing women? She also asked if they do their share of housework and parenting, so perhaps failure to vacuum or do the dishes is part of rape culture too.

As for who is really to blame for the murder of Eurydice Dixon, the correct answer is Jaymes Todd, the young man who actually did it. But as the theory of rape culture tries to blame a whole class of people for the acts of individuals, it is worth pointing out some problems with the idea.

To do this, I'll make two analogies. The first concerns our treatment of farm animals. If there is one class of beings with a genuine claim to being victims, it is the animals we raise and kill for food. The morality of killing animals is a separate argument that I won't go into here, but just for the sake of the analogy, let's say it is wrong. If so, then all people who eat meat are complicit in this and share whatever guilt is involved.

I've recently gone towards vegetarianism, but as I still sometimes eat meat, I share in the guilt. On the other hand, you can't say vegetarians and vegans share that guilt, for the obvious reason that they don't eat meat and actively avoid doing so.

So, going back to the murder of poor Eurydice Dixon, a feminist glaring at men and snarling you're part of the problem is like someone scolding a group of vegans and vegetarians for their part in killing animals. Most men do not rape, and trying to smear them with some kind of collective guilt for the crimes of rogue individuals is not just unfair but absurd.

In terms of the analogy, a feminist might say being a vegan isn't enough. You have to become a PETA activist and stop people eating meat. You can't, for example, stand around at a BBQ while people are eating sausages. You have to call them out on it or you're enabling 'carnivore culture.' But no, individuals are only responsible for their own acts. Carnivores are guilty of eating meat; vegetarians are not. Rapists are guilty of rape; non-rapists are not.

The second analogy I'll make is with Muslims as a whole being blamed for acts of terrorism. After terror acts by Muslim extremists, some people have tried to blame all Muslims, or Islam itself. It's a good parallel for feminist attempts to blame all men for individual crimes against women.

Suppose there are two types of Muslims – moderates and extremists. You can't blame the moderates for acts of terror committed by extremists. The moderates would have had no idea the atrocities were being planned, let alone executed.

You could argue there's a systemic hostility behind such acts. If – as some claim – the ideology of Islam is anti-Western, you could say the ideology is partly to blame for extremists' acts of terror. Yet even if that were true, you still can't blame moderate Muslims for what extremists do.

You might theorise that there's a 'terror culture' made up of anti-Western attitudes. This could be a four level spectrum like the one for rape culture. On level one are trivial acts like making anti-Western jokes or disapproving comments about Western morals. Level two might be refusing to serve Westerners in Muslim shops, or forming cultural enclaves. Actual terrorists acts would be at the top on level four. By this logic, using rape culture as a parallel, moderate Muslims who make anti-Western jokes are also guilty of acts of terror. But that is absurd.

It is true systemic hostility can lead to individual crimes, just as anti-Semitism in 1930s Germany led to crimes against Jews. But there are problems with trying to push this sort of collective guilt. First, a low level offence isn't the same as one at a high level. A Muslim tut-tutting about 'Western morality' isn't as bad as one who blows up a Balinese nightclub, as happened in 2002.

Second, you could say that if 'terror culture' helps normalise acts of terror, then those who refrain from such acts are actually more moral than they would otherwise be. If terror is normal, it is more virtuous than usual to refrain. Likewise, if 'rape culture' normalises rape, those who live in a rape culture and don't rape are more moral than those who live in a non-rape culture and don't rape.

Suppose there's a culture where it's legal to take child brides, for instance. Men who could take child brides but don't are more moral than men who can't take them and don't. Obviously, cultures where child marriage is legal don't see it as immoral, but for the sake of argument let's say there are two men who believe taking child brides is morally dubious. One of them lives in Australia, the other in Pakistan. In Australia, it is illegal and socially unacceptable to take child brides. In Pakistan it is both legal and relatively normal. If both these men find the practice morally dubious, the man from Pakistan is the more moral for refusing to do it – because he actually could, but doesn't.

To go back to the animal analogy, it's both legal and acceptable to eat meat. There is no moral censure for doing it, no consequences at all. As a result, the decision to abstain, by vegans and vegetarians, is admirable because they are making a moral choice in the absence of any social pressure to do so.

Therefore, if we live in this so called 'rape culture,' where sexual assault is somehow endorsed and enabled by misogyny, men who live in it and don't rape it are more moral than they would be if they didn't live in a rape culture.

It's a strange and fairly absurd argument to make, but that's what you get when a young woman's death is used as an excuse to shame all men for their supposed complicity.

Misogyny?

But why should we believe in rape culture in the first place? Taking the phrase literally for a moment, there's no Western country where rape is permitted. Taking it more broadly, there are reasons to doubt Western culture is deeply misogynistic, as some feminists believe.

First, there's been a big push in recent times to promote women's interests, in a number of ways. Why would that happen if society was misogynistic? Feminists may say this is all the result of their fight for justice, but if society was misogynistic those reforms wouldn't get through at all.

At the same time, there's been a lot of recent anti-male sentiment. Never mind men being the butt of jokes in sitcoms, or the steady stream of anti-male ad campaigns. You actually have in our universities, the systematic denigration of men, and especially white men, as being somehow to blame for all the world's problems. Society is misogynistic? If anything, it's increasingly misandric. (Of course, none of this is news to readers of A Voice For Men).

Just look at the main newspaper in my city. On any given day, you'll find several pro-female and anti-male articles. It's surely only a matter of time before the Sydney Morning Herald renames itself the Sydney Morning Feminist.

If we believe some theorists, the murder of Eurydice Dixon is the end result of systemic misogyny. 'Rape culture' is a spectrum of connected behaviour, and any man who engages in a sexist act at the low level is also contributing to rape. So if we could just reform men and get rid of rape culture as a whole, acts of rape and murder will also cease.

Call me a skeptic, but if you really think calling out sexist jokes at the office Christmas party is going to stop some psychopath murdering a random woman in a city park, well, good luck with that.

Do rapist-murderers do it because they hate women? No doubt some do, but others won't have thought it through that far. Obviously, some are immoral, acting from pure malice. Others are amoral in that they don't care about the ethics of their actions, or the effect on others. They're indifferent to moral questions. A third type are probably just stupid, with poor impulse control and no understanding of consequences. A fourth type are mentally ill and disturbed. The idea that all these men commit their crimes due to society-wide misogyny seems like a one-size-fits-all theory.

The real explanation of why some sick or evil men rape may be more prosaic. To put it in coldly clinical terms, rape may be a side effect of a system where supply and demand are heavily out of balance. That is, when it comes to sex, one gender can get it when they don't want it and the other can't get it when they do. Under those conditions, rape will sometimes occur from a minority of men who are evil, ill, or have poor impulse control. Of course, none of that is any justification for rape. But it seems a simpler, more likely reason for rape than the catch all theory of 'misogyny.'

Those who think rape culture is the problem think stopping misogyny is the solution. This seems over idealistic. If you really want to address the threat of rape, better to acknowledge that, in those coldly clinical terms, sexual supply and demand are way out of balance. As a result, there will always be a small minority of ill or evil men who are a threat to women. That's the reality of it. What you can do about it is a separate question.

There's a great YouTube talk by a feminist and rape survivor, Wendy McElroy, called 'Fallacy of the Rape Culture.' She makes the point that if people are serious about stopping rape, it can only happen by addressing its real causes. Pushing an ideology about 'respecting women' is a different issue, worthy in its own right, but may not have much to do with stopping rape, at least in the Western world.

McElroy agrees there are rape cultures in some parts of the world. Cultures which permit, for example, child brides, rape within marriage, mistreatment of low caste women, and so on. You could make a case that those sort of rape cultures are tied up in misogynistic values. In comparison, claims about rape culture in the West look trivial. They insult not just Western men, but those women around the world who have a genuine claim to be living in a rape culture.

Let's Make Murder Illegal

Some feminists have said it is the responsibility of men as a class to stop rape and murder. It is 'their problem to solve.' How could men actually do this? Here's a thought to get the ball rolling – why not make murder illegal?

After the Eurydice Dixon murder, men did try one thing. The Australian Senate proposed that women carry tasers, pepper spray and mace to defend themselves. That sounds like a good, proactive strategy, but it was rejected. A leading feminist was part of a senate majority who opposed the motion. They had a better idea: teach men not to assault women.

It's hard to believe an immediate, practical step was turned down on the basis of ideology – an ideology that believes stopping rape culture will stop rape. Even if you accept that premise, it would still take decades to achieve. In the meantime, why not carry some pepper spray?

Some women are angry at being asked to take precautions, but any person should take steps to reduce risk. Compared to women, men are far more at risk of violence in public places, so they try not to put themselves in danger. They know, for example, not to go out in King's Cross in Sydney after 1am. In the days of football hooliganism in England, peaceful football fans knew to stay away from rival fan areas. Generally, there are certain bars, streets, or events you should avoid. The reality is some men are violent, and other men have to take whatever steps are needed: learn self defence, don't hang out with thugs, avoid bad locations after midnight. This is all routine and commonsense advice.

As for sexual assault, men don't face the same risks as women, but in the Me Too era some of them have adopted 'Mike Pence Rules.' US vice president Pence has a rule to never be alone in a room with any woman other than his wife. This is to lower the risk of a false sexual harassment allegation. High profile men would prefer the risk didn't exist, but it does – so they take precautions.

In a YouTube talk called 'Are Men Responsible for Ending Sexual Violence?' Janice Fiamengo refutes the idea that men could do so even if they tried. She says the demand that men eliminate rape conflates the truth that men have the individual power and responsibility not to commit sexual assault with the false claim they can stop it in others. It's a 'sleight of hand' indeed.

Fiamengo makes an analogy with parenting. There are some terrible parents out there, (a small minority) but it would be unfair to make parents-as-a-class bear responsibility for what the bad ones do, and it is useless to imply they have any power to stop it.

A Hidden Source of Misogyny

Remember that 'rape culture' is a set of misogynistic attitudes that makes offences against women more likely to occur. Let's look at this idea from another angle.

To be fair, fostering an attitude of hate towards a class of people does have an effect – or rather, a number of effects. One is that you feel less sympathy for that group and their problems. Another is you may feel resentment towards them. A third is you might want to have nothing to do with them. This is true of various types of people that are antagonistic to other types.

But if it's true a systematic dislike of one group for another has consequences, one might argue feminists are responsible for creating hostility not just towards men as a class, but towards women as a class. How so?

Not all feminists hate men, but enough do to have real world effects. The Me Too movement, for instance, began as a protest against sleazy Hollywood moguls then turned into a much wider campaign with the potential for abuse. As Fiamengo said, 'all women have now acquired a deadly weapon… and a significant minority are willing or even eager to use it.'

No doubt some feminists are delighted to bring down as many powerful men as possible. Some of those men deserve it, others do not. Yet if some innocent men go down as collateral damage, these feminists will shrug their shoulders, talk about male tears, and see it as some kind of payback.

It's one thing to incite resentment of men, but a side effect is you also incite resentment of women. It may seem to feminists that their efforts to help women can do nothing but good. Where their causes are just, they may be right.

They may also think they're helping women when they lie about the gender pay gap, give a one sided view of domestic violence, or support a pro-female / anti-male agenda in the media and education. In the short term, these actions may help women, up to a point. What they also do is create a strong tide of resentment against women as a class.

Among the many fruits of this are the MGTOW movement, the refusal of some male bosses to mentor women in the wake of Me Too, less sympathy for women, strong antipathy to feminism as a cause, and less inclination to support pro-women reforms one might otherwise agree with.

Apparently, 'rape culture' is made of misogyny. But if misogyny means antagonism towards women, it's likely third wave feminism has created more antagonism than anyone else ever could. Feminism at its worst is self-defeating because it doesn't inspire either respect, or support for its causes – and feminism is at its worst all too often these days.

The movement may have begun as a just cause, but over the years it has become a hate movement. 'Why can't we hate men?' says Suzanna Danuta Walters. Well, sure, you can. Just do it somewhere else.

In Fecunda.

What is feminism today? 'Rape culture.' Me Too. The 'gender pay gap.' Envy 10, Empathy 0. Men-bad-women-good. Blaming men for everything and thanking them for nothing. And let's not forget that men as a class are complicit in the rape and murder of Eurydice Dixon, an event which could only appal any moral person.

Soon after Dixon's death, Clementine Ford wrote an angry newspaper column berating men. As it was written in the emotional aftermath of the murder, one might forgive some over-statement. Yet the passage below is from her book, published months later, with only minor changes from the original column.

> It is a mark of either immense compassion or immense foolishness that women continue to throw ourselves into the act of loving men despite amassing a lifetime of experiences that tell us how dangerous this decision can be. I am increasingly disagreeing with the view that not all men are part of the problem, and it's because I truly think most of them don't understand that the problem is theirs to solve…
> …Women don't need to be told to look for the goodness in men, because we try our damnedest to find it every day. We work hard to nurture it, even as we're told to be grateful for it. For our own survival, women must believe that not all men are the enemy.

I've read both Ford's books and many of her columns and was surprised by her claims about looking for men's goodness. Perhaps in her personal life she tries her damndest to find the goodness in men, but she sure doesn't in her published work. On the contrary, she seems to try her damnedest to find the worst in them.

Clementine Ford is entitled to her views. She's even entitled to broadcast them through books and newspaper columns. But if she really thinks women take their lives in their hands by partnering with men, perhaps it's time to go our separate ways.

It's time to give feminists the space and opportunity they need. Go, and may the Goddess go with you. Goodbye Suzanna. Goodbye Amelia. Goodbye to all the feminists convinced they live in The Handmaid's Tale. Please go – with our blessings and good wishes. We wish you well in establishing the Republic of Fecunda and creating your dream country free from our eternal sabotage. Go in peace – and good luck.

How Thomas Oaster started International Men's Day – and how feminists tried to stop him

AVFM · 18 November 2019 · Archived copy · Original

The following is a republished article from 2016 showing how International Men's Day was started by Men's Rights Activist (MRA) Thomas Oaster.

This article is about how one gutsy MRA started International Men's Day despite attempts to shut him down. His name was Thomas Oaster.

Thomas Oaster was an articulate and passionate men's rights advocate. He was prolific in his work with men's groups, men's issues, and political advocacy both on and off campus where he taught. He had many fine MRAs around him, men and women who helped to improve the lot of males, but what of the man himself? Who was he really, and what is the unknown story of how he inaugurated the first International Men's Day? The following will be about Thomas Oaster and how he put IMD on the map for all who choose to celebrate the event into the distant future.

In the early 1990's Oaster's growing interest in advocating for men (and gynocentric resistance to that advocacy) led him to the idea of creating a globally celebrated International Men's Day. His goal was to create a platform where the stories of men could be told in their own words rather than being interpreted by others.

In a moment of nostalgia about this dream he mused:

> "You don't get points in men's groups for flexing your ego, but I'd like it to be known that Kansas City has become the hometown of International Men's Day because a hometown boy got that thing rolling."[1]

As you will read in what follows Thomas Oaster, and Kansas City, can indeed now take credit for being the epicenter of a global movement.

The first IMD event took place in 1992 when small groups of MRAs scattered through 4 continents simultaneously celebrated with Oaster in the first celebration. Today, thanks to his vision, there are millions of people in more than 60 countries celebrating IMD. This achievement is remarkable when we consider it took place 30 years ago at a time when advocacy for men and boys was considered unthinkable.

Thomas Oaster was the Director of the Missouri Center for Men's Studies and employed as Associate Professor at the University of Missouri, Kansas City where he taught classes on men's issues. That's right, classes on real men's issues. He told of how he first became attracted to the men's movement by an intellectual interest, but quickly came to feel persecuted for his association with this politically incorrect subject. "I got beat up, slammed" reports Oaster, "People said, 'What – do you hate women?' The more I got beat up, the more I got drawn in. My Teutonic background took over." [1].

During February 1991, Oaster wondered if a global recognition of men and their issues might be framed as a men's strike day, a kind of protest against misandry, which could be observed under the moniker 'Men's Day Off.' He later softened his approach, re-framing the proposed event as an educational exchange on men's issues, thus was born the idea of International Men's Day.

The first IMD event was organized and launched by Oaster on February 7, 1992 for the purpose of what he said was "drawing positive attention to important [men's] issues." [2] The event was successful both in 1992 and again in 1993 and 1994.[3] People in four continents celebrated and guests at the various events came along to hear speakers talk on topics ranging from the "silent tragedy of men's health" to "man bashing" and to share, talk, wine and dine.

It was a miraculous occasion. For the first time in history people gathered at the same time on four continents to actually speak of such things. On that day, February 7, men and women rejoiced in the company of like-minded souls as they shared intimate stories that ears had never before heard. Oaster spoke at his hometown Kansas event, reminding attendees that discussion of men's health and wellbeing deserved to be heard though the cacophony of misandry;

> "We want the bashing to stop. It's not a request. It's a statement. We want it to stop! To give you an example, a woman walked through here and saw the material and said, 'You've got to be kidding. You're not seriously going to have a men's day, are you?'"[4]

Oaster hoped that the day could become a means of education and consciousness raising where the positive cultural accomplishments of men could be celebrated and men might be faced with a better variety of choices about how they wanted to live their lives;

"Women and men should both have options" wrote Oaster, and "International Men's Day is an opportunity to draw attention to the issue of options."[5]

Oaster proposed six core objectives for a men's day, and they were to: celebrate men's positive traits and contributions, improve gender relations, focus attention on men's health and wellbeing, remove misandry, increase life options for men and boys, and to develop a humanitarian-style approach to all men's issues. These six objectives were the foundations that would later be reaffirmed and ratified by a new generation of IMD celebrants, but not before a group of 'anti-Oaster' University women had played their final hand.

After the popular success of the first International Men's Day event in 1992, feminists at his campus became increasingly vindictive. During his planning for the 1994 and 1995 IMD events, a bomb was suddenly dropped by at least 6 former and current female 'graduate students' who collectively complained that Oaster had sexually harassed them and was "hostile" in the classroom. The two most serious allegations put forward by the troupe were that Thomas Oaster had touched the forearm of one student with what she perceived was a "brief stroking motion", and that he had advised another student to dye her hair blonde in response to her question about what she could do improve her poor grade. To drive the nail deeper another student said he had referred to her as "Blondie" at least twice. The curators at the university entertained these shallow and dubious allegations and were quick to respond by imposing restrictions on Oaster's movements and work. [6]

Despite these distractions the next two IMD events went extremely well with several hundred individuals in attendance. However the fourth year of IMD heralded a change in the weather when his antagonists decided to double-down in their efforts to shut him down.

In 1995 Oaster had planned to orchestrate his fourth and biggest IMD event when he increasingly became the target of workplace bullying. He decided to sue the Curators of the University for Infringement of his civil rights as a tenured professor, claiming that he was being denied freedom of speech, salary increases, graduate teaching assistants and the use of university facilities.[6] Naturally the court proceedings took up much of his time and energy and this taxed his ability to effectively organize or advertise the upcoming IMD event.

Due to these circumstances the next IMD event was a flop with few people turning up. After this failure, and feeling drained by a complex court case, Oaster decided to defer future IMD plans and take a well-deserved rest.

With precision, Thomas Oaster had been persecuted for his role in the men's rights movement. [6] Late in 1995 Oaster won his court case against the UMKC and the University was forced to pay him $74,000 plus $15,000 for legal fees. After settlement Oaster resigned from his job as he felt he would no longer have the respect of his students, and he shelved plans to continue celebrating IMD. [6]

General interest in the event waned until 1999 when Dr. Jerome Teelucksingh, a History Professor at the University of the West Indies revived the event and shifted the date to November 19 – the date of his father's birthday.

Jerome Teelucksingh continued Oaster's emphasis on highlighting positive aspects and accomplishments of men. In a 2009 interview Teelucksingh also gave a nod to the work of Oaster when he stated this;

> "I could be considered the founder of this version of IMD on 19 November but we need to also acknowledge the pioneering efforts of persons and groups before 1999… They are the ones to be honoured." [3]

In 2009 an international IMD committee was formed with Jerome Teelucksingh as chairman. The group came together to increase awareness about the event and to foster its growth into more nations.

Taking note of the foundational IMD objectives introduced by both Oaster and Teelucksingh, the committee encapsulated the objectives of International Men's Day in six guiding principles that would serve to protect the core values of the day and offer a reliable reference point for future IMD celebrants.[3] The 'Six Pillars,' which are suitably loose and open to interpretation, are now used as a guide by IMD celebrants around the world:

- To promote positive male role models; not just movie stars and sports men but everyday, working class men who are living decent, honest lives.
- To celebrate men's positive contributions to society, community, family, marriage, child care, and to the environment.
- To focus on men's health and wellbeing; social, emotional, physical and spiritual.
- To highlight discrimination against males; in areas of social services, social attitudes and expectations, and law.
- To improve gender relations and promote gender equality.
- To create a safer, better world; where people can live free from harm and grow to reach their full potential

It's my belief that the spirit of Oaster's original vision and that of A Voice for Men have much in common. Both movements aim to create an inclusive international voice for men as free as possible from sectarian distractions. Moreover, both IMD and AVfM reject the notion of a unified men's movement, encouraging instead a diversity of men's voices on a variety of humanitarian issues:

Thomas Oaster said this:

> [T]here is no such thing as a unified men's movement, the phenomena involved comprise a variety of sub-movements, even after analogies to other issues concerning which there are far left, far right, and middle-of-the-road orientations, there is yet another more fundamental point which can be made about the value of respect for all men as human beings. A day of respect should go beyond the current social activities referred to as Men's movements. This is true because the men's movement itself goes beyond the Men's movements. The men's movement, more fundamentally, is a turning of the human psyche and the articulation of this turning through the male voice.[5]

Paul Elam, founder of avoiceformen.com said:

> [C]ontinuing to buy into the false unity of a non-existent entity will only slow us down. I have always taken care, and still do, to point out that AVfM is not synonymous with the men's movement. And after mulling this over one more time of thousands, I am really glad that I have taken this approach. I don't know what the men's movement is, in all honesty. I don't even know that it exists.[7]

While the similarities in the two movements are obvious, there are some important differences. For instance in Thomas Oaster's day there was no internet, whereas today it is a vital medium for all activism, including here at AVfM. Another difference is that IMD focuses the year-long work of activists into one big day of publicity, whereas other activists strive to make 'every day' a men's day via regular online publicity.

International Men's Day is a grassroots movement with no official management. It does not belong to any government nor is it owned by the United Nations or any of its agencies. We might say that nobody owns the event, or better yet everybody owns it. Any person can self-nominate as an IMD coordinator for a specific region or event and, if desired can form alliances with an international network of individuals working to promote the day. Any current and future coordinators are merely hitch-hikers catching a ride on an international platform that nobody owns.

Nobody needs to gain permission to mark the day. All one need do is be mindful of the spirit of the occasion as laid out in the six pillars which ask us to remain true to the lives of men and boys without allowing that message to be diminished by negative or irrelevant concerns.

In recent years IMD has spread into new regions and attracted some mainstream attention. With this new attention it is perhaps time to remind newcomers that the originators of the event were fighting for liberty and freedom, and that we still have a very long way to go on this front.

With this in mind let us finish with words of Abraham Lincoln's Gettysburg address, itself delivered on November 19- the date of International Men's Day. The words of his address speak equally to the purpose of International Men's Day today and of the great sacrifices made by Oaster and other men and women who fought on the battlefield of cultural misandry;

> 'Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent, a new nation, conceived in Liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal. Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure… The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecrated [the ground], far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note, nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced.' [Lincoln]

Despite the resistance, the tradition of IMD lives on. In Oaster's name let's dream it forward.

Abortion is a men's issue, too

Mike Buchanan · 18 November 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: The following article represents the views of the author and of J4MB. While many might find themselves in agreement with the perspectives presented, AVfM and the MRM does not claim a homogenized view of this topic.

Yesterday I gave a talk at the third Messages 4 Men conference in London, the transcript takes up the remainder of this blog piece:

Good evening. I'd like to draw on our last general election manifesto on the issue of abortion, particularly relating to the situation in the UK. Elective abortions are permissible in the UK up to 24 weeks after conception. When the 1967 Abortion Act was passed, 24-week-old foetuses were not viable, but with the passage of time and the advance of medical technology, they increasingly are viable. In the same hospital today, one medical team could be fighting to save the life of a 24-week-old foetus, while another medical team is killing a foetus of the same age.

There comes a point at which the basic right to life of an unborn child overrides the right of a woman over her body. One person's rights end where another person's rights begin. In an age when contraception has long been readily available and highly reliable, women should be held morally accountable for the children they conceive. We believe there's a point in pregnancy when society – and the law – needs to recognize the right of the unborn child to life.

When the Abortion Act (1967) was passed, the British public was assured it wouldn't lead to abortion on demand. That assurance has, predictably, proved hollow. Abortion on demand has been freely available in the UK for over half a century. Over 10 million foetuses – or unborn children, depending on your perspective – have been killed in the UK since the passing of the Act. Every year around 200,000 more are killed.

There's a growing awareness that 97% of the abortions carried out in England, Wales, and Scotland, are carried out on grounds which may be illegal. The Abortion Act permits elective abortions to be performed on numerous grounds, when authorized by two medical practitioners. One of the grounds is to reduce the risk of injury to the mental health of women.

In 2012, in England and Wales, over 185,000 abortions were carried out. Over 180,000 of them (97%) were carried out under grounds 'C' of the Abortion Act, which stipulates the following – 'the pregnancy has not exceeded its twenty-fourth week and the continuance of the pregnancy would involve risk, greater than if the pregnancy were terminated, of injury to the physical or mental health of the pregnant woman (section 1(1)(a))'.

Of those 180,000+ abortions, almost all (99.94 per cent) were carried out on the grounds of reducing the risk of injury to women's mental health. Only 109 abortions (0.06% of the total) were carried out on the grounds of reducing the risk of injury to the women's physical health.

There is no evidence to support the thesis that abortion reduces the risk to mental health of women with an unwanted pregnancy. None. Clinical trials to investigate the matter would, of course, be highly unethical. There is, however, some evidence to suggest that abortion itself increases the risk to mental health, so medical practitioners who authorize abortions on mental health risk grounds are doing so in the knowledge there's no body of research to support their authorizations, and that is arguably illegal.

In December 2011 The National Collaborating Centre for Mental Health published a 252-page report for the Academy of Medical Royal Colleges, Induced Abortion and Mental Health: a systematic review of the mental health outcomes of induced abortion, including their prevalence and associated factors. Among the key findings of the report was this:

The rate of mental health problems for women with an unwanted pregnancy were the same whether they had an abortion or gave birth.

In April 2013 the Australian and New Zealand Journal of Psychiatry published a report titled, Does abortion reduce the mental health risks of unwanted or unplanned pregnancy? A re-appraisal of the evidence. The full conclusion of the report was this:

There is no available evidence to suggest that abortion has therapeutic effects in reducing the mental health risks of unwanted or unintended pregnancy. There is suggestive evidence that abortion may be associated with small to moderate increases in risks of anxiety, alcohol misuse, illicit drug use, and suicidal behaviour.

In our manifesto we made proposals in three areas:

1. The Abortion Act (1967) should be amended to limit women's right to have an abortion on the grounds of reducing the risk of injury to their mental health to a maximum of 13 weeks after conception. At this stage the gender of the embryo is unclear, so this would result in the end of gender-specific abortions, the incidence of which in the UK is a matter of some dispute.

2. The Abortion Act (1967) should remain unchanged with respect to women's rights to have abortions carried out on the grounds of reducing the risk of injury to their physical health.

3. It should be a criminal offence for a British woman to have an abortion outside the UK more than 13 weeks after conception, on grounds other than reducing the risk of injury to her physical health.

I'd like to continue with a thought experiment. I'd like you to imagine yourselves living in a patriarchy, and more specifically a patriarchy as envisaged by feminists, one in which men as a class oppress women and girls as a class, for the benefit of men and boys, as they have for millennia.

In this patriarchy, of course, women wouldn't have the vote. Let's further imagine that in 1967 an Act was passed, not the Abortion Act, but an Act that gave fathers of babies up to 24 weeks of age the right to have their babies killed by doctors at taxpayers' expense, without fear of punishment. Mothers would have no right to stop the killing of their babies. In the 52 years since the Act was passed, over 10 million babies have been killed, and every year another 200,000 plus are killed. Fathers justify their right to have their babies killed with the slogan, "My baby, my choice".

If we do a parent gender switch, rather than babies under 24 weeks of age being killed at the behest of their fathers, we have foetuses under 24 weeks of age being killed at the behest of their mothers, the reality of abortion in the UK since 1967. Now of course there are differences between a 24 week old baby and a 24 week old foetus, but neither are viable without external support and protection – in the case of the foetus, that of its mother. Killing 24 week old foetuses and 24 week old babies seems to me to be morally equivalent.

I've been an atheist for about 45 years, since I was a teenager, but it's all too evident to me that with the decline of religion in the UK – and the decline of Christianity, in particular – the nation's moral compass has been well and truly shattered. Nobody in their right mind would advocate for the right of fathers to have their babies killed. Yet society turns a blind eye to the right of mothers to have their unborn children killed, under the name of women's rights. I look forward to a future of MRAs increasingly working with religious people on matters of common interest, such as abortion.

Feminism is, among other things, a death cult, and no group in the world is keener on abortion than feminists. Feminists are keen on the right of women to kill their unborn children, and they have not the slightest interest in the responsibility of women to protect them. That's been a theme of feminism from the beginning, of course – ever more rights, ever fewer responsibilities.

The rallying cry of feminists with respect to abortion is, of course, "My Body, My Choice". And why is that? As always with feminists, it's about power. By stating that only women can decide on abortion, women gain power over life and death, and men are denied it.

Under the terms of the Sexual Offences Act 2003, the work of radical feminists, only men can rape in the UK – in legal terms, at least. Nobody, least of all anti-feminists, would say that because women cannot (under the law) rape, their voices should not be heard on the subject. Yet feminists assert that because men can't become pregnant, they're not entitled to speak on the issue of abortion. The double standard is obvious. Post-menopausal women can't conceive – should their views on abortion be silenced, too?

We'd rightly be appalled by a man who raped a woman – or a man, for that matter – and said in his defence, "My Body, My Choice". And why? Because the crime has a victim, whether a woman or a man. The most obvious victim in abortions is, of course, the unborn child who is killed. But there are other victims, most notably the father of the unborn child, who may desperately wish to see it born and develop. He may even be willing to be the sole parent to the child. No matter. The woman has all the power, the man none. How many men have suffered egregiously because women in this country have decided to have their unborn children killed since the 1967 Abortion Act? Possibly millions of them.

The feminist position that 50 per cent of adults should have no right to oppose the killing of unborn children is nothing short of obscene. The men's rights movement is increasingly recognizing that abortion is a men's issue, as well as a women's issue, and I believe Men's Rights Activists will increasingly fight to save the lives of unborn children. Thank you.

MGTOW is Forever

Tim Patten · 20 November 2019 · Archived copy · Original

The internet has enabled hundreds of thousands of males around the world to have a unique conversation about the modern men's liberation movement. In a matter of moments, they can visit a MGTOW – Men Going Their Own Way – website, reddit or Facebook group and engage with a knowledgeable and supportive community to learn about female nature, male self-ownership, and individual liberty. For a growing number of visitors, these truths, based on first-hand experience and studious research, have become the wisdom to live by.

Many of those who find their way to MGTOW are divorced, anxious to express their feelings about marriage and painful relationships, rage about geocentricism, and tell their stories about being damaged by marriage – and society more broadly. Many linger for hours and leave. Some of those come back to read and interact and absorb a bit more, often in the hope of validating their own personal experiences. Others might not return for months, if at all.

No matter how long they visit or how often they return, most can't help but gain a deeper understanding of the true meaning of masculinity and the harsh realities of a broad-based anti-male agenda, which become etched forever in their hearts and minds.

Female Hypergamy

One female behavior that newcomers learn about that is already embedded in the MGTOW psyche is the relentless female strategy of dating and marrying up the social and financial hierarchy. This strategy is the direct opposite of men's reflecting, perhaps, an instinct that evolved from ancient times, women have become obsessed with resource extraction and utility. They have become single-mindedly programmed to seek out partners of a higher status, and avoid looking at anyone down the ladder. They tend to focus on wallets, rather than characters.

Worse still, many also seem to have a "side car" man in the wings who can satisfy their needs should the current "money machine" man not make them happy. This offshoot of the hypergamy mindset suggests that women are nowhere as compassionate as the feminine stereotype suggests, but are selfish in any number of ways. While they may have some sympathy for the men in their lives, many are in perennial "gold-digger" mode, focused solely on getting what they want, when they want it.

Men must always be careful of this behavior to keep from being taken advantage of.

Female Loyalty and Home Access

A female's focus of loyalty to her man changes when women have children, whose instinctual love for their mothers are often seen as validating the latter's selfish objectives. At such a point, her loyalty and love are solely directed toward them, with the man in her life a much lower priority. While it is not uncommon for females of any species to fiercely protect their young and even kill their mates, if the need arises, the reality is that having children in the home tends to worsen how men are treated.

More often than not, when a couple live together, she'll slowly alter the living arrangements to meet her social needs and match her tastes. A shelf where he keeps his things, for example, might suddenly become a resting place for a goblet filled with colored soaps; joined by towels and scented candles that he is not even supposed to touch.

Over time, she'll decorate and change all the rooms in the home according to her wishes and often at the cost of his pocketbook. If the man in her life happens to be lucky, she might allow him some nooks and crannies, though that often means a man cave in the basement or garage. In many respects, her domination of the home environment is a reflection of his future standing: less loved than her children, and no longer necessary except for the money he must bring home.

Feline Jealousy

In many cases, a girlfriend's envious temperament and actions become increasingly dangerous and destabilizing, and men must spend frivolous amounts of time and energy to cope. Suddenly, any normal interaction, often leads her to burst into a verbal and violent rage against the man she supposedly loves.

On some days, she might bash him for receiving a mundane email or message on Facebook. If she notices him looking at other women at the beach, she might call him out embarrassingly, and maybe slap him in public. If she is suspicious and insecure, she may take on the devil's persona, turning his life into a hell on earth. She will hit him with questions and accusations of infidelity that drain him emotionally and only serve to push him away.

Men must stay clear of these women.

Narcissist

Unfortunately, a girlfriend may develop a greater need that most females already have for primping and pampering. She may even become afflicted by narcissistic personality disorder (NPD), a condition characterized by exaggerated feelings of self-importance, an excessive need for admiration, and a lack of empathy for others. Again, any man living or dating a woman with NPD must adapt and cope with this frustrating disorder.

Those who are affected spend much of their time thinking about power or success, or in many cases, totally absorbed with their appearance. With full-blown NPD, women may end up spending large sums on shoes, clothing and make-up, consumed with selfies and social media. They are then quick to take advantage of those around them, especially a partner with money in the bank. Often beginning in early adulthood, this condition occurs across a variety of social situations.

The best solution for men is to stay far away from these personalities.

Some Men Have It Wrong

MGTOW calls out "mangina's", "simps" and "blue pill" men for being weak pussies who clings to a woman and agrees with everything she says in hopes of scoring sex. Perhaps he is a male feminist who makes friends with feminist woman in a desperate bid to get her in the sack, or he stands up for a woman's right to be equal, but then steps up like a "white knight" to rescue her when the equality becomes a burden. Maybe he is someone who believes he is living life to the fullest and in control of his destiny, but who has allowed himself to become trapped by making a woman pregnant.

MGTOW looks at these men as disgusting and a betrayal of what it means to be male.

Conclusion

MGTOW is growing at a rapid pace and has been seeping into the mainstream discussions through news articles, books, videos, and word of mouth. Its philosophy stays quick and easy to edit into your DNA and is reaching millions each week and, quite simply, saving and making men's lives better; becoming more capable and resourceful with their talents and intuition. Increasingly, they are waking up to a liberation and peace of mind that only comes from eliminating the toxic people, relationships and behaviors in their lives.

Baltimore Museum of Art to officially discriminate against men in 2020

James Skelton · 20 November 2019 · Archived copy · Original

It was recently announced that in 2020 the Baltimore Museum of Art will adopt a policy of absolute discrimination. For the entire year, they will refuse to obtain any works of art produced by men. Additionally, the museum will feature 22 exhibits, and each one will focus specifically on women.

This comes on the back of a previous ideologically based decision by the museum–the sale of pieces from famous male artists Andy Warhol, Robert Rauschenberg and Franz Kline and the use of the proceeds to purchase paintings and sculptures by women.

Why? Museum director Christopher Bedford claims this policy is part of rectifying "centuries of imbalance." Well, that's obviously just a lie. It's really the adoption of a man-hating policy that puts ideology over art, the whole point of the museum.

Historical revisionism

Before we can even begin to discuss the merits of this and similar policies as means of rectifying past injustices, we must take a look at whether these injustices truly even happened. In this case, as in many others, the answer is no.

First, I challenge you to find a single institution with the reverse policy within the last three millennia. Has a museum ever said, next year we'll only be accepting work from men? Has the sentence ever even been uttered in a boardroom? Of course not, but yet we're inundated with rhetoric that claims this was the case despite blatant facts to the contrary.

The first thing that came to mind when I saw this story was an episode of Malcolm Gladwell's Revisionist History entitled "The Lady Vanishes." The episode discusses the painting The Roll Call by Elizabeth Thompson, Lady Butler, which it touts as an example of women breaking the glass ceiling in the art world. Like many stories of this nature, Gladwell's telling portrays Lady Butler as overcoming the odds to enter the boys' club of the British art scene at the time.

But that was 150 years ago...

Why do we have so many stories about women breaking the glass ceiling centuries ago but then still buy into the narrative that they're oppressed in contemporary society? In 150 years will the artists in the Baltimore Museum of Art be used as examples of women finally breaking into the art scene? Probably.

So how far back do you go?

If you do a little more research into the Lady Butler story, you will discover she was not breaking into some boys' club at all. In fact, the Royal Academy which elected her piece for exhibition was founded by two women. Alright, so I guess those two must be our example of women finally smashing the patriarchy?

You can keep going back forever. I frequently see feminists champion the story of Agnodice, who they claim was the first female doctor in Ancient Athens… 2,500 years ago. They always fail to mention, though, that her existence is merely a legend and women were quite well represented in the Athens medical community. So how exactly does it justify discriminating against men in 2019 AD?

Don't worry, Gladwell covers it. You see, an example of women participating in something and being granted equal opportunity to men doesn't mean they aren't still being oppressed. The invisible, ever-present hand of patriarchy still guides all things.

How incredibly convenient. Like the story of Agnodice, this is all just mythology, a narrative designed to give these ideologues the casus belli to discriminate against anyone who doesn't align with them, including men in general.

Victim Mythology

Radical ideologies often create a narrative using victimhood to justify their antagonistic views against another group. Normally, this involves historical revisionism to erase the nuances of the past and portray themselves as the good guys.

There are plenty of worrying examples of this. The Nazi party rose to power in Germany in large part due to this rhetoric. They portrayed Germans as the victims of an international financial conspiracy that had infiltrated the German government and sold out the people through surrender at the end of WWI. This culminated in a false flag operation where a member of the German minority in western Poland was supposedly killed by Polish nationals, thereby justifying German invasion.

Although victim narratives are often based on exaggerations or outright lies, they don't have to be. However, even if they're true, ideologies normally use them to validate their own discriminatory or oppressive philosophies.

The Nazi party was telling the truth when they told the German people that heavy-handed penalties imposed on Germany by France and Britain after WWI and the subsequent Occupation of the Ruhr had negatively affected German life. In hindsight, though, we can clearly see that the actions this rhetoric supposedly vindicated were not remotely just. They did not, as the Baltimore Museum of Art wants to claim, rectify injustices of the past.

Intellectual dishonesty

The entire argument behind this policy is based on flawed logic. Over representing women in 2020 doesn't rectify anything that happened centuries ago. Even if women were discriminated against 100 years ago, this does not even the scales of justice in any way whatsoever.

Human beings are individuals, not demographics. "Women" as a group cannot suffer injustice, only individual women can. If indeed female artists of the past were denied opportunities based on their gender–which they most certainly were not–then justice for them would be granting them renewed opportunities. Of course, those women are long dead. Similarly, "men" as a group cannot experience unfair benefits. If a man in 1875 had his work of art chosen over a superior piece by a woman, then he experienced that benefit as an individual. A man in 2019 who's passed up never experienced that benefit, so this policy doesn't somehow even the scales. It just discriminates against men.

Of course, this is no surprise. Policies such as these are not based on rational considerations of justice. They are based on ideologies, an instinctual and emotional function of the tribal human mind that creates an us-vs-them mentality. It is about group survival and therefore aims to see people not as individuals but rather as races, genders, nationalities and, in modern history, creeds.

Ideological conformity

Because these ideologies merely come to serve as tribal identifiers, it's no surprise that they use their victim narratives ultimately to punish anyone who doesn't conform to their ingroup. This is apparent in the case of the Baltimore Museum of Art because it turns out they will be accepting art from males, specifically from transgender women.

This may seem logical on the face of it, but consider it objectively. The Museum won't accept art from "men," but it will accept it from someone with an XY chromosome pair if they renounce their masculinity and identify as a "woman" in conformity with their radfem ideology.

Don't buy it. The Baltimore Museum of Art and its director Christopher Bedford are not on the side of justice. Feminists like them are not the victims. Quite the opposite, they are the prejudiced and discriminatory group that hates and looks to punish anyone who is different from them.

Is 'toxic masculinity' dangerous in the academy?

Elizabeth Hobson · 23 November 2019 · Archived copy · Original

The following is a video recording and transcript of an East Midlands Salon talk delivered by Elizabeth Hobson, which was responded to by Dr Nicholas Joseph, a lecturer at the University of Derby. Chairing was Dr Vanessa Pupavac (University of Nottingham).

As a non-feminist, liberal woman and an individual who values the search for truth as a primary function of universities… I have grave concerns over "toxic masculinity" in the academy. That is, I have grave concerns over the toxic feminist concept that is "toxic masculinity" enabling the further entrenchment of feminist aggression that is perverting a key sector of our society.

Historically, men have dominated in the public sphere – and they've created the greatest civilisation ever known, to the point where we women have been liberated from the private sphere and enabled to contribute to further progress.

Men have dedicated their lives to providing technological solutions to women's problems. From sanitary products to labour saving devices to instruments and procedures to make birth safer and pharmaceuticals to prevent conception entirely.

Men have fought for women's rights and mentored and supported women fighting for the same.

Men have broken their backs in support of their families.

Men have given their lives for our freedoms.

And now, men are under attack from gynonormative sycophants who either can't or won't pursue equal opportunities, treatment or rights for men and boys and illiberal feminist, sociopaths who remain a minority of the population (at just 9% in the U.K. according to Fawcett) yet enjoy a disproportionate power to influence the great and powerful.

Men are now a declining minority on campus (at just over 40% of students nationally) – and yet all of the special attention and programmes are aimed at women. I study at The Open University where 59% students are women. The Open U has a stated belief that:

> "Discrimination arising from individual characteristics and circumstances is not only unlawful, but a waste of talent and a denial of opportunity, preventing individuals, organisations and societies from achieving their growth potential." [1]

Eliminating discrimination includes, according to them:

> "Ensuring there is no less favourable treatment for people".

Promoting equality includes:

> "Encouraging people to participate in public life or in other activities where their participation is disproportionately low".

They have committed to increase the proportion of women in senior professorial roles from 27.6% to 40% by 2020 and a Women @OU Staff Network exists to support them. Women@OU is all-inclusive group that works to "promote gender equality" and raise the profile of women at The Open University.

The Open University, like many universities, is signed up to the Athena SWAN scheme. Athena SWAN runs an awards scheme that recognises evidence of increasing numbers of women in senior positions and has been a stipulation for accessing funding, for example at The Biomedical Research Centre and Biomedical Research Unit in 2011 – and feminist academics (such as Janet Beer – vice-chancellor of the University of Liverpool and Professor Louise Morley of the University of Sussex) have called for all research funding to be made conditional on Athena SWAN accreditation [2].

The Open University also have a Women@OU committee to support and connect women and signal boost opportunities such as the AURORA women's leadership development programme. No such commitments, groups or committees exist for men – which leads me to the conclusion that they are failing in their goals of "Ensuring there is no less favourable treatment for people" and "Encouraging people to participate…in…activities where their participation is disproportionately low." – and possibly even discriminating against men.

Women, nationally, have outnumbered men as undergraduates since 1993 – and 70% of students are studying subjects in which women dominate. It's not even true to claim that men dominate in STEMM subjects. Firstly, there is a slight of hand wherein medicine is omitted from this list – it should occupy the space of a second M, following science, technology, engineering and mathematics. With the addition of medicine, women have outnumbered men in STEMM since 2015. But actually, women also dominate in the science category (with their dominance in biology outweighing men's in physics).

So, women dominate in universities, across most subject areas, even in STEMM – and there is virtually zero interest in even exploring this matter. I'm not saying that this is evidence of systemic barriers for men, yet alone discrimination but I do wonder why it's a non-issue. Whereas men's dominance in TEM subjects is seen as an abhorrent example of toxic masculinity in action that needs to be addressed…

Mary Curnock Cook, former chief executive of the Universities and Colleges Admissions Service, pointed out the "very worrying gap" between male and female performance at school and university which she said is leading to "fundamental shifts" in society [3]. She said that when attempts are made to address men's issues, they are ridiculed and met with the "wrath" of feminist and gender equality groups [4]. I entirely fail to see the impact of "toxic masculinity" in all of this, it looks a lot more to me like an excess of toxic feminism.

In 1994, feminists, Daphne Patai and Noretta Koertge wrote (in 'Professing Feminsim') that:

> "Women's Studies programs have enjoyed the substantive protections afforded by the principle, and indeed the reality, of academic freedom. It is, in our view, the existence of the essentially liberal value of academic freedom that has allowed Women's Studies programs to develop in the diverse ways in which we observe them today. But our own experiences and those of many colleagues with whom we spoke have led us to conclude that some programs now deny the very values that allowed them to come into being. If Women's Studies does not promote, indeed does not stand for, open inquiry, critical exploration of multiple perspectives (even threatening ones), and scholarship not tethered to the political passions of the moment, what is there to be said for its presence in the academy?"

What is there to be said, indeed? What is to be said is that twenty six years later, we cannot be said to see some Women's Studies programs denying academic freedom to the faculty and students on those courses – what we see is a wholesale infiltration of the feminist denial of academic freedom throughout the academy, in its entirety.

Look at the case of Tim Hunt. A Nobel prize winner with a history of nurturing his students, women and men alike, in 2015 he was forced to resign from his position as an honourary researcher at University College London and stand down from the science committee of the European Research Council after he joked with delegates at a conference in Korea:

> "Let me tell you about my trouble with girls. Three things happen when they are in the lab. You fall in love with them, they fall in love with you, and when you criticise them, they cry."[5]

Richard Ned Lebow professor of international political theory at Kings College London was suspended from the Interntional Studies Association (who had previously voted him a "distinguished scholar of the year") in 2018 for another joke – when asked, in a crowded lift, which floor he wanted he responded: "Ladies lingerie.", then proceeded to refuse to make a formal apology, one sought in a manner that ran against complaints protocol, by the way. [6]

In the same year, Professor Mark Silinsky of The United States Army War College, a 32-year veteran of the defence intelligence community who has served as a senior counterinsurgency advisor and counterintelligence analyst in the United States and in Afghanistan, was also reprimanded by the International Studies Association on two counts of misconduct: 1) Addressing an email to the women on a forthcoming panel as women and 2) asking them challenging questions (in his role as 'the discussant') at the event itself[7].

Then there's Alessandro Strumia. This year, the theoretical particle physicist, was banned from CERN after giving a well-researched presentation at a workshop about gender equality that showed that far from being discriminated against, women are actually significantly advantaged in physics hiring, promotion, fellowships and financial assistance. He found that since 1995 women have been being hired, promoted and offered fellowships and funding with less than half the number of citations of their work than men have when they are hired, promoted or offered fellowships or funding. He disputed the claim that men avoid citing papers with women's names attached as first authors by showing that both men and women cite papers with male first authors more – and suggested that this could possibly be because their findings were more significant. Strumia hypothesised that the reason that men out-perform women in this way in physics is not due to bias against women but because more men than women have the desire and the skills to excel in the field, and that this is because there are more men at the highest end of IQ distribution than there are women. A sensible conclusion based on the evidence, as opposed to the wholly unsupported idea of bias that is generally accepted.

When Professor Eric Anderson at Winchester University thought his students would benefit from the insights of Mike Buchanan (leader of Justice for Men & Boys (and the women who love them)) and William Collins (author of 'The Empathy Gap', an indispensable and authoritative tome on male disadvantage), feminist protests became so intense that the speakers cancelled the event.

When Mike Buchanan and I announced that we would be giving talks at Cambridge University, a protest was staged to disrupt a graduation ceremony, an open letter calling on the university to cancel was signed by over 300 students, staff and alumni; since the university only partially complied with this demand by moving the location, there was an angry protest outside the event and attendees and speakers were harassed and assaulted. Feminists are guilty of most heinous attacks perpetrated against academics personally and vandalism against the academy generally – and either they will be stopped or Janice Fiamengo will be proven right, with her 2016 declaration at The International Conference on Men's Issues, that "The universities are lost to us" (close quote). They, as it stands, are all but lost to any reasonable liberal who wants to see them reinstated as truth-seeking institutions.

We can discuss bad behaviour, sure. But we should tell the truth and: acknowledge the fact that men and women love each other and work fantastically well together the vast majority of the time and acknowledge the fact that bad behaviour is not gendered. Last February, Lance Welton wrote a provocative piece for V Dare.com in which he argued that:

> "the "masculine" dimension to academia – rigorously, unemotionally and coldly examining facts and arguments [has been] "wrecked by the increasing presence of emotional and over-empathetic girls" [8].

If we don't "rein in [our] crazy sisters" (as Jordan Peterson has called on women to do), it's gonna look for all the world like the man has a point! Not to let men off the hook – as the majority of senior staff, they're consistently prioritising the needs and wants of women over those of men – and over the search for the truth. We need a balance – but what we have now is the discounting or even condemnation of very useful masculine features and the emboldening of the least useful feminine features.

And there are not only damaging attitudes to masculinity at universities (where men can and often do choose to 'opt-out'), boys at primary and secondary schools are also struggling. This is a fact increasingly recognised but there remains an inadequate political will to tackle the problem. In recent years, teachers assessments have shown girls outperforming boys across reading, writing, science and mathematics. Based on SATs test results, the attainment gap narrows but persists. This may be because "girls underperform in tests'… Or there may be another reason.

In 2013, Harley and Sutton discovered that boys over seven or eight and girls of all ages rate girls as cleverer and more successful (they also found that the children believed that adults shared this idea). In a separate experiment 140 of the children were divided into two groups – one told that boys do not perform as well as girls, the second not. The children were then tested in maths, reading and writing and the boys in the first group did significantly worse than those in the second. Ouzad and Page found in 2012 that women teachers grade boy's work more harshly than that done by girls – and that boys intuited this. They also found greater investment and effort from both boys and girls when they knew that their work would be marked by a male teacher – suggesting that more male teachers would be beneficial to both sexes.

In 2013, Cornwell et al found again that teachers mark boys down – and attributed this to a bias against behavioural characteristics more commonly found in boys than girls. The literature on secondary schools shows the same patterns – of girls being advantaged in teacher-marked assignments; and the gender gap in attainment worsens – then worsens again at A-Level.

I don't attribute all of the underperformance of boys to an incrementally exacerbated lack of confidence by any means, though I do believe it to be significant. Other factors will of course include natural aptitude – with boys and girls, like men and women, tending to excel and to struggle in different areas. The way we test also, comes into play though. At age 16, the gender gap in attainment rose suddenly when O Levels were replaced by GCSE's and with the Programme for International Student Assessment, which provides a standard by which different nations can compare the effectiveness of their education systems, boys outperform girls [9]! This surely suggests that there are a range of approaches that we could take to supporting boys to achieve in their education – and raises the question: why aren't we?

The problem is not "toxic masculinity". The problem is that feminists have weaponised our instinctive hyper-criticism of men to popularise narratives of male malevolence and to exclude the actual prevalence of male virtue which aggravates the empathy gap so that male underachievement is accepted as a non-issue, so that men who do achieve academically exist in a precarious position of privilege that can be taken from them for any perceived slight to the sisterhood, so that the search for truth, rigorous empiricism and excellence are becoming secondary goals to achieving a myopic form of "social justice" – purely for girls and women, in the academy.

The Worldwide Future of ICMI

Paul Elam · 4 December 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Recent events surrounding the next ICMI have been testing at times, and more than a little stressful. I am happy to report, however, that out of the fray has come some new thinking and a new model for conferences in the future.

I (with an awful lot of help) started ICMI in 2014. Since then it has blossomed into iconic status in the men's movement, calling on men and women from across the planet to unite under the same roof once a year to celebrate men and boys and call attention to the issues they face.

And as anyone who has ever hosted an ICMI can tell you, they are challenging events to pull off, putting a lot of weight on the backs of conference organizers. They are also necessary to a robust and active men's movement.

With that in mind, I have decided (again, with the help of many) to carve out a new, better future for the event worldwide.

From this point forward, I am assigning full rights to the intellectual property known as the International Conference on Men's Issues to specific individuals and the organizations they represent in three geographical locations.

Future conferences in Europe and North America will now be under the direction of Mike Buchanan of Justice for Men and Boys (and the women who love them). Mike has already hosted two successful conferences and has been integral to keeping the conference series alive. And by the way, I am happy to inform you that Mike is also busy preparing to launch the first national men's conferences for the UK!

The authority for ICMIs in Australia will henceforth be handled by Robert Brockway, president of the Australian Men's Rights Association (AMRA). And as I understand matters, they are working diligently as I speak on the next conference down under. Look for news on that in the days ahead.

Last, but certainly not least, Anil Kumar and the Save Indian Family Foundation will handle all future conferences in the nation of India. And as I understand from recently speaking to Anil, the Indian crew is already in preparations for ICMI'21 in New Delhi.

What all this boils down to is an actual expansion of the ICMI dream. As each of these entities operate independently, it will be possible in the future to have multiple conferences (and national conferences) in the same year. Geography considered, there is no reason to expect that any of the three regions would be in competition with each other. Each region will be able to have an ICMI conference every year, or even more often, if they so wish.

This allows for the growth and spread of ICMI activities worldwide, while allowing other noted activists to take on ICMI planning with fresh eyes.

At this time, I want to take the opportunity congratulate and thank Mike, Robert and Anil, three activists I have had the great pleasure to know and respect over a period of years. I can't think of three better men to take this on and to ultimately grow ICMI into a flourishing worldwide event.

Gynocentrism and the demographic implosion of Western civilisation

Things Are Not As Simple As They Seem

In this article I wanted to share a comment I made in relation to Sargon's video[1] on the increasing trend of people not having children. He was specifically addressing an article about Emma Watson and her choice to "self-partner" and remain single. He went on further to share his thoughts more broadly, about the trend among men and women of not having children. Whilst I certainly think that the importance of people having children to replace society is a valid point, I think he misses the mark by failing to address the environment that is producing this problem and that he focuses too much on individual selfishness as a cause. So I have left a comment below on his video addressing that:

> "Shaming people for not breeding in this highly dysfunctional gynocentric society, is like blaming people for leaving a burning building. The sexes are naturally attracted to each other. We have not had a problem replacing ourselves for the entire history and prehistory of our species. Healthy males and females in healthy functional societies, where relationships are healthy and functional, reproduce just fine without shaming people.
> It is quite interesting how quickly people are ready to shame single men in particular for being single (and I note it is almost always directed at single men and not single women, because we are that gynocentric we blindly adhere to gynocentric double standards like zombies), but stop the presses if we look at and criticise the gynocentric bias in family court, divorce, the feminist criminalisation and demonisation of masculinity in the legal system and wider culture and the deliberate marginalisation of men in education and employment and the legal system and all of the associated effects that has on men not partnering up and remaining single.
> We could look at the effect of the neglect of boy's education in the feminised education system, feminist employment quotas and its mismatch with female mate choice which is at least partly based on male earnings and female hypergamy, as just one example of many.
> If people are SO concerned about the population not replacing itself, how about having the courage to deal with the rampant gynocentrism[2] that is at the root of the problem? The usual silence of course will follow no doubt. People can keep ignoring gynocentrism all they like- Until gynocentrism is confronted our civilisation will continue its path of decline. Mark my words- No amount of shaming men will stop this problem. Gynocentrism will continue to destroy society until it is confronted.
> I understand Sargon is talking about Emma here, but he is also talking about the growing numbers of single people in general (male and female). What he does not address in the video, is the toxic anti-male gynocentric environment that is driving the low birth rate. He talks about taking responsibility for perpetuating the society that birthed and raised us, but then fails to mention this same society cultivated the very environment that generated the problem he is talking about in the first place. How about the responsibility older generations and society as a whole has for creating a gynocentric feminist environment where the population does not replace itself? Insert crickets.
>
> See responsibility works both ways. If you bring a future generation into this world, you are responsible for making sure you raise them right and preserve your culture and address social dysfunction so they have a healthy society to raise your grandchildren in. You better make sure you protect your culture and values and don't continuously ignore social problems like gynocentrism.
> So you see, society actually has no right to point the finger at younger people not breeding in an environment that is the result of decades of reckless disregard for societies future by older generations. This video is 30 years too late and now older generations and this feminist society will reap what it is sown.

> You want to fix this problem? Stop blaming people for leaving a burning building and start putting out the fire."

Sargon does some brilliant work, but in this instance I think there is a fundamental misunderstanding presented in his video, of the nature of the problem behind the low birth rates in the West and what is actually required to perpetuate society. I do not think things are as simple as Sargon describes in his video and I do think we need to be honestly appraising just how healthy and functional Western culture actually is at the moment, given how gynocentrism permeates almost every aspect of it.

The Gynocentric Cancer Destroying Our Society

Men and women are biologically wired to reproduce and pass on their genes. This is a key driving force of our evolution and the evolution of all living things. The fact that our society has become so dysfunctional that substantial numbers of men and women are not reproducing despite the natural drive to do so, speaks volumes about just how irresponsible older generations and the present population have been to let our culture and society degrade to this level. In our gynocentric culture, we place women on a pedestal and we place men in service to women and then we expect through our collective wilful ignorance, that this dynamic will not lead to exploitation and dysfunction.

This gynocentric mindset has destroyed marriage and relationships, broken up the family and caused an epidemic of single motherhood and fatherlessness. As Stardusk (or Thinking Ape) describes in this video[3], our low birth rates are in many respects the result of society putting men down to lift women up and artificially elevated female hypergamy. This mismatch guarantees a low birth rate and the collapse of the welfare state Sargon is so concerned about in his video, when he discusses the pension. This is what happens when society throws men under the bus to pedestalise women. Men are the golden goose that keeps society running and society is killing the golden goose.

The support within our culture and wider society to place female well-being above male well-being and the willful ignorance of the long-term consequences of this imbalance coupled with modernity, has led to where we are now- A dying society. This is a society where men can be put in jail if they fail to pay alimony to their ex-wives (who can work) to finance their lifestyle, even if it exceeds their income or they are unemployed. This is a society where men can have their lives destroyed from a single unproven allegation by a woman and their false accusers can walk away with no consequence. This is a society where in some places[4], boys who are statutorily raped by adult women, can later be forced to pay child support to their abusers.

This is a society of fatherlessness, where single motherhood is encouraged and fathers are denigrated in our culture and marginalised in our family courts and legal system. Multiple generations of boys and girls have now grown up through divorce and family court and many of them have been denied any meaningful relationship with their father. This is a society where the needs of boys and men in education and employment are ignored and where the needs of girls and women in these areas are prioritised.

Sargon is correct to criticise the selfishness, narcissism and solipsism arising from the culture of female entitlement. However, I cannot agree on his broad criticism of men and women that choose to remain single (like many MGTOW) and not have children. Choosing to have children is a choice and not a responsibility. Choosing not to have children in this highly dysfunctional gynocentric culture, is completely understandable and that is especially so for men.

[image]

When you bring a life into this world, you are responsible for raising them and ensuring they have a meaningful constructive future. Increasing numbers of younger people are looking at the future and have serious concerns about the trajectory society is on. Many of these younger people come from broken homes and have seen what divorce and family court does. Many have lived it and experienced the consequences of it directly. Young men in particular, have every reason to be sceptical about marriage, relationships and starting a family.

Many younger people are aware of our enormous and ever-increasing national debts, the huge unfunded government liabilities, the unaffordable housing and the reality our governments have done nothing to address these problems for decades. They are aware of the death spiral of debt the West is in and the increasing prospect of a major depression and a major global conflict with China. Massive student debt and unaffordable housing, combined with the reality of divorce and family court, just add further barriers to men and women starting families and keeping them intact (should they even start one).

Not everyone has the means to raise a child with living costs and housing being so expensive and with employment becoming increasingly volatile and unstable (especially with automation and globalisation). Many younger men in particular are struggling to get a start in life, because of the marginalisation of boy's education, the effects of fatherlessness and the introduction of feminist employment quotas and selective hiring policies catering to women that discriminate against men. Young men obviously are going to find it more difficult to marry and raise children, when the deck has literally been stacked against them and no effort is being made to address the issues they are facing in education and employment.

No one discusses these realities and they have remained unaddressed for decades. These problems have actually worsened across the West and continue to do so. Then we wonder why people are not breeding. How responsible is it to simply breed and have no regard for the quality of life your children will have? Reproducing without having the means to properly raise children and without considering their future, is reckless and irresponsible. Not having children is sometimes the responsible thing to do.

Not all people should have children and be parents either. Some people are too irresponsible to raise children, or they simply do not have the financial means to properly support children. The continuation of Western civilisation is dependent on far more than just mindless breeding. Having children requires proper planning and investment from both individuals and from wider society, so that future generations are raised properly and preserve the society and culture. Producing large numbers of your children in single mother households with no father, ensures you will have future generations of dysfunctional adults and that your society will decline and regress. Fatherhood is required for modern, developed and advanced countries to stay modern, developed and advanced. Simply breeding with no regard for anything else, just creates countries of poor people.

Why So Many MGTOW Opt Out Of Marriage And Children

No one ever asks the question- Why do so many men that go their own way (MGTOW) choose not to marry and have children? Why is it that growing numbers of men are voluntarily walking away from getting married and starting a family?

The answer, aside from what I have already stated in this article, is that marriage is now essentially a slave contract where the human rights of men can be nullified through the divorce process at the whim of women. That is actual reality and not an exaggeration. Fathers are now reduced to temporary legal guardians that can be removed from their children by the mother at any stage and with the full force of the state. Men are not walking away from marriage and family, because these concepts now exist in name only. Men are walking away from a broken toxic gynocentric system of state sanctioned exploitation. A system that places the needs of women first and the needs of men and children last.

Childless Incels

I do not agree with Sargon either that involuntarily celibate people that by their own label want to reproduce, should be shamed for not doing so. I am frankly surprised Sargon is not able to see the logical inconsistency in his own argument. Shaming people for not doing something they clearly voluntarily want to do, is not going to achieve anything. It makes me wonder whether Sargon understood that the letter "i" in incel stands for involuntary. I think he misspoke here.

Where The Problem Really Lies

Frankly the problem of our low birth rate, does not lie with single men or single women. Sargon says this is a good society with good values that should be continued and yet it cannot replace itself. There are plenty of things to like about the West, but ultimately it is the cancer of gynocentrism in the West (which feminism is just a symptom of) that will ensure it declines. This society is dysfunctional because it allows gynocentrism to grow unopposed and the result has been the breakdown of the family, marriage and relationships and an epidemic of fatherlessness and single motherhood. If Western civilisation is so "good" and if our values are so great, then why can't it sustain itself? Clearly there is something wrong with a society that cannot continue itself.

This is not a "good" society with "great" values. This is a dying society living off its past greatness and pretending everything is okay under a thin veneer of debt laden decadence. Great values? This is a society that abandons free speech, due process, human rights and basic morals in the face of gynocentrism. Unless something radical happens, the world will be talking about the fall of Western civilisation in a few centuries time.

Simply replacing people with new people, is just one part of continuing society and hardly all of what is required. It is imperative that society confronts and addresses problems that threaten its existence, such as gynocentrism and our over-reliance on debt and does not just keep ignoring them and kicking the can down the road (The "I will be dead by then mentality" of the boomer generation comes to mind.). It seems to me that the people so concerned about society not replacing itself, don't seem concerned enough to confront the source of the problem- gynocentrism. How responsible is that? Think about that for a moment.

This article is not just in response to Sargon. So many other people, particularly from the "Alt-Right", traditionalists and nationalists, are quick to judge people and particularly men that do not breed, as selfish and irresponsible. They give no consideration of the state of the debt driven society we are living in and how this toxic gynocentric environment is discouraging people and particularly men from having children. In reality many men are that responsible, they see it as irresponsible to raise children in a dying debt laden society that is living on borrowed time, treats men like slaves, rewards and even glamorises women for their bad behaviour and does not hold such women accountable.

The Sun Is Setting In The West

This video[5] was recently made by Stardusk on the contrast between how the West and China regards single motherhood and the impact that is going to likely have on the future of the two societies. Fatherlessness and single motherhood in the West, will contribute to its fall. Sustaining your society is not just about pumping out babies. Society must ensure that they properly raise younger generations to become well-adjusted adults and that the culture and institutions are preserved to provide them with a proper future.

What we have seen over at least the last three decades, is a complete failure of the West to properly raise future generations. We have seen the rapid rise of fatherlessness and the breakdown of the family. We have also witnessed the feminist corruption and decline of our institutions, particularly at our universities and in our legal systems. The magnitude of the damage fatherlessness, the breakdown of the family and the decline of our institutions is going to leave on our civilisation in the coming decades, will be simply enormous. We have witnessed nothing yet, the jet-black storm on the horizon has been building for 50 years.

[image]

The sun will be setting in the West and rising in the East over the course of this century. The West is not the best. We actually encourage single motherhood, we have let feminism destroy our institutions and we have marginalised men, boys and fathers. Gynocentrism will play a large role in our undoing. Time to wake up and recognise that we are not as good a civilisation or culture as we think we are. The question is this- Do we value female approval more than we value the continuation of civilisation? At the moment it seems the answer is yes. For that we deserve what we get.

When I think of the future I remind myself that no one can know what the future may hold with certainty. We all have to take collective responsibility for the future of our society and hold our governments accountable for the decisions they make our behalf.

What I see at the moment, is a society on the decline and headed for a major war (possibly a world war). I see a society that prefers to live in decadence and blissful ignorance and refuses to make the hard decisions required to address the serious social and economic problems it faces. I see older generations kicking the can down the road and passing the buck onto younger generations and no one in government taking any responsibility for the long-term prosperity and security of our countries.

That does not have to be our future. We could solve a great deal of problems if society had the collective will to say no to gynocentrism and restore balance between the sexes. Valuing men is not antithetical to civilisation, it is essential to civilisation. In actuality it was treating men as disposable that led to gynocentrism running rampant to begin with and reaching a level where it now threatens the very existence of society.

A fempocalypse[6] is not some farfetched idea, it is the logical end point to the crazy train of gynocentrism- We need to find the brakes fast.

A Follow-Up To The Article Above: Take The Loaded Gun Out Of The Room

I noticed after writing this article, that Sargon has done a follow-up video[7] on the baby boomers and responded to some of the criticism levelled by people at his earlier video that I addressed. Consequently I would like to respond to that. It is good to see that he has identified the substantial degree of responsibility of older generations for the gynocentric and economic mess that future generations have inherited. I mentioned this as well in my own article.

I cannot agree though with Sargon's stance on marriage in the modern cultural and legal climate and encouraging men to marry in our current gynocentric society. As I discussed, marriage is no longer marriage. Marriage is now a scam and the marital contract is now a legal instrument that can be used to extort men and enslave them. The family court and divorce process has so thoroughly undermined what marriage was, that marriage as a functional and legally binding contract to formalise a healthy mutually beneficial partnership between men and women to raise a family, simply just does not exist. Marriage is no longer marriage and this needs to be recognised.

I am not suggesting formal partnerships between men and women should not exist. I am stating the fact that modern marriage is no longer a formal partnership in which the interests of men and women are equally protected under the law. If marriage was a business partnership, no one would start a business. As long as women carry around the "loaded gun" that feminists have placed in their hands, which divorce, family court and domestic violence legislation represents, there can be no proper partnership. This is what feminists wanted and feminists have succeeded. They have succeeded because our gynocentric culture places female well-being above male well-being and female interests above male interests.

The notion by Sargon that women should show "restraint" in not exercising the power they have thanks to the gynocentric bias in family court, divorce and domestic violence legislation, in order to encourage men to marry, is not a solution. We are talking about men's basic human rights being infringed upon by women with the full force of the state and there is no justification for half-measures. If things were in reverse, we would not be asking men to "restrain themselves" to encourage young women to marry them. We would not be finding ways to make this system "work", if women were treated in divorce and family court like men are. We would be tearing the whole system down, encouraging women not to marry and marching in the streets with torches.

The mere possibility that women, at their whim, can use the state to imprison men that displease them, alienate fathers from their own children and turn men into indentured servants to finance their lifestyles, is a disgusting indefensible crime. It is an abuse of human rights and this modern system of marriage and divorce has no place in a supposedly civilised society. There is no justification for this system and "marriage" in its present form (which is now marriage in name only), regardless as to whether women show "restraint"- Take the loaded gun out of the room. No ifs, no buts, no excuses, no half-measures. Men have a right not to have their basic rights threatened.

Men should not be put in a secondary position to women when it comes to marriage, the family, divorce, family court and the law. That should just be assumed, it should not even have to be stated. Sargon recognises that there needs to be change and I would wholeheartedly agree. There needs to be fundamental reform of divorce and family court. There needs to be reform in our legal system regarding correcting the imbalance introduced by feminist domestic violence legislation and feminist driven policy. There needs to be renewed respect for fathers and men in general. The list is a mile long with things that need to be changed. Until that happens, marriage in its present form is not marriage and it is about time we stopped living in denial about that. It is time society confronted the stench coming from the family court and divorce extortion industry and bureaucracy.

Anti-gynocentrism is the only anti-feminism that matters

Peter Wright · 10 December 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Men's Rights Advocates have often watched with bemusement as newcomers arrive declaring support for men, with a resume saying just one thing: "I'm an antifeminist," as if that were all we needed to know.

Because antifeminism and men's rights activism is synonymous, right? This is literally what they assume.

With the resume tabled they quickly move to promote a gynocentric tradition that gushes about males saving women from floods, fires, bullets, or sparing them from minor inconveniences in life – like discomfort, dirt, criticism or employment. Feminine women, they say, are best preserved as home-makers; each woman as precious as the fingers of a concert pianist which must never be put under strain. Men, they say, are heroes, put on this earth to lift heavy things as Jordan Peterson would say, and lift them specifically for the fragile, and of course pregnant, womenfolk.

"Life back then was as close as we can get to perfect" they foam, "it was an arrangement that saw feminine women give compliments to men for ongoing sacrifices — an arrangement far superior to the feminist approach which goes out of its way to denigrate men while expecting those very same sacrifices to continue."

It is superior because massaging a man's ego in exchange for expected sacrifice is somehow less denigrating than saying, as the feminists do, "we hate you." But is such gratitude really better when both feminist and traditionalist women continue to expect male servitude – when they both reduce men to the role of 'do things for me'?

That is the essence of the deal: a little ego-stroking in exchange for a man destroying himself. She inflates his ego like a helium balloon, at least in the area of saving, serving and pedestalizing her, and he signs up for a smorgasbord of self-destructive sacrifices and an earlier death.

We could be forgiven for interpreting the traditionalist woman's complimenting of male sacrifice as superficial gushing, offered up with all the sincerity of a Miss World candidate saying she wants to bring about world peace, while watching the corpses pile up around her.

That appears to be the gynocentric tradition that most anti-feminists are peddling, the one they would substitute in place of feminist models. Here I should add that not all traditionalists are like that – at least not for the tiny minority of red pill men and women who seek to preserve the otherwise valuable, non-gynocentric aspects of tradition.

Some readers might protest that we should be grateful for those charging forward to destroy progressive gynocentrism (feminism) in order to substitute traditional gynocentrism in its place. But for this old timer that program reads like a rejection of Judas, in order to take sides with Iscariot.

I'm sure you all get the point.

As Paul Elam once summarized, 'anti-gynocentrism is the only anti-feminism that matters.' Or to quote another MRA who understands this problem, Bryan Scandrett has referred to such traditionalist men and women as "I'm-not-a-feminist gynocentrist" (INAF-G).

Compare the traditional gynocentrist as described above with women who are neither feminist nor traditional gynocentrist; women like Janice Fiamengo, Suzanne McCarley, Elizabeth Hobson, Alison Tieman, Hanna Wallen and countless others who are as quick to question the unbalanced privileges of traditional women as they are the privileges held by feminists. The difference in perspective between these two kinds of women couldn't be more stark.

[image]

The rest unfortunately are frauds, women masquerading as allies while inviting men to adopt a women-serving scam with the bait of a 1950s smock and a demure look, women who are today unwilling to match men with reciprocal gestures or labor, nor the shouldering of life's stresses. When traditional gynocentric women are featured in media interviews, gushing praise for the usefulness of "masculinity" and "real men" who save women from house fires, one can't help but notice there's an absence of discussion of what's in it for the men, as if its not a relevant concern.

Perhaps praising is a form of respect for men, but respect for what? On face value it looks like that of a narcissist who "respects" others as food to satisfy his/her gluttony for special treatment.

Perhaps I could be more generous and say that rather than trying to enslave men, the I'm-Not-A-Feminist Gynocentrists are simply behind the times, believing that they are championing the lesser of the only two evils on offer. They view it as the lesser of the two evils because, under traditional gynocentrism, men were at least complimented for their labor, and given medals after their deaths – a thing denied under the feminist vision which sees men and women as competitors for narcissistic turf in which only women receive compliments. Not men, but women alone are the 'Stunning and the Brave.'

Sadly, the traditional contract under which that situation worked, the one that limited men's and women's options in favor of narrow set roles, can no longer work in a culture that refuses to encourage and support that same contract. Wave after wave of feminist activity has seen the toothpaste squeezed completely out of the tube. Women will never go back to the "role" of baby-making, apple-pie cooking wives, because any attempt to reduce women's "multi-option" life will be met with resentment, if not interpreted as abuse. Therefore any attempts to enact that traditional role today will amount to little more than cosplay.

Swapping progressive gynocentrism for traditional gynocentrism is going nowhere. We can no more turn back the clock on 'Women's Liberation' than we should ignore the fact that's Men's Liberation now is due–men who no longer need to be tied to the traditionalist role of He-for-She.

Before bringing this article to a close I want to come back to the question of what, if anything, is the value of anti-feminism for the men's rights movement. To that, two of the more obvious answers come to mind.

Firstly, antifeminist work pushes back against efforts to create more He-For-She demands, e.g. for men's supposed responsibility to stop partner violence; for men's responsibility to address the 'wage gap'; for men to assist in promoting affirmative action policies; to do more household chores; for taking up too much female space on public transport, or for not setting the office air conditioning to women's desired temperature. These and many more 'patrarchy-do' lists amount to little more than collective female nagging, which anti-feminists are helping to call out in the public domain.

Secondly, anti-feminists fight the widespread censorship of men's issues by feminists. The problem of feminist-driven deplatforming and censorship was even apparent in Ernest B. Baxs' day, which he described in the year 1913; "[Feminists] seek to stop the spread of the unpleasant truth so dangerous to their cause. The pressure put upon publishers and editors by the influential Feminist sisterhood is well known." In response there has always existed people within the MRM who push back against feminist-driven censorship of men's issues, and indeed censorship from other sources, and this needs to continue with full force.

To put these two concerns in context, pushing back against feminist demands on men, and feminist censorship, have never been the only goal of the men's movement despite claims by some that the MRM is synonymous with 'antifeminist backlash.' To suggest equivalence is to confuse purely antifeminist movements with the much broader portfolio of the men's human rights movement.

A survey of the last 100 years reveals that the MRM is concerned more directly with issues impacting men and boys such as alimony, genital mutilation of male infants, homelessness, mental illness, false accusations, family court bias, suicide, child custody, low funding for male health issues, legal discrimination, educational performance, and misandry in mainstream culture just to name a few. And just as important, a pressing issue today is fostering of more life choices for men: Its time for men to embrace whatever options exist beyond the narrowly prescribed role of serving women – just as women long ago rejected narrow roles and responsibilities toward men.

The time for the multi-option man is now.

Tony Robbins Stands Up to #MeToo Movement, After BuzzFeed Publishes False Allegations

Jon Anthony · 11 December 2019 · Archived copy · Original

We've all seen the horror stories. Men work their entire lives to build a legacy, and then with one fell swoop, a mere allegation, with zero proof to back it up, destroys their lives.

Over the past decade, we've seen the #MeToo hysteria grow to an all time high, as dying media outlets, desperate for clicks and views, knowingly publish fake allegations.

One of the most infamous examples, of course, was the Rolling Stone piece entitled "A Rape on Campus," which accused UVA's Phi Kappa Psi fraternity of gang raping Jackie Coakley. [1]

After the story was torn to shreds once evidence came to light, Rolling Stone redacted the article, and writer Sabrina Rubin Erdely issued a not-so-heartfelt apology to the University of Virginia (but none of the accused students whose lives were destroyed by the piece). [2]

Since then, we've seen the "Me Too Movement" grow exponentially, and while some of the accusations may be legitimate, many are completely lacking in any sort of evidence.

Recently however, BuzzFeed published a series of articles about Tony Robbins, alleging that he sexually assaulted numerous young women, and was guilty of "sexual misconduct." [3]

Many have come to view these accusations as a media witch hunt, and have been desperate for somebody to stand against these widely published allegations, with zero evidence.

…and thankfully, Tony Robbins seems to be doing just that.

Where It All Began

It all started when BuzzFeed published a hit piece on Robbins earlier this year on May 17th, claiming that they had "secret interviews" with two of his former employees [3]:

"Two former followers who went on to work for Robbins provided BuzzFeed News with signed statements swearing under oath that they felt he had sexually harassed them by repeatedly pursuing them after they made clear they weren't interested. Two more women who worked as his assistants said Robbins expected them to work alone with him when he was naked in his hotel room or in the shower."

They didn't stop there, though. They went on to publish a 5-Part "investigation" into Tony Robbins, claiming that he used racial slurs and groped several women, among other things [4]:

"One more woman has now provided BuzzFeed News with a sworn statement accusing Robbins under oath of touching her inappropriately during a job interview— bringing the total number of women who say he made sexual advances or was naked in front of them to 10, with nine of them saying they were upset by his actions."

Interestingly enough, Robbins hasn't backed down like most of those being accused of sexual misconduct have. In fact, he's done the opposite – he's now suing BuzzFeed. [5]

Tony Robbins' Response (May 2019)

Upon being attacked by a giant media publication such as BuzzFeed, many men would simply roll over and issue a public apology. Tony has done nothing of the sort however, and by standing up to this blatantly false series of articles, he offers many men hope.

After the first hit piece was published, Tony published an article on Medium, entitled: "An Open Letter to Buzzfeed Editors and Board of Directors from Tony Robbins," in which he exposed their unethical tactics and complete lack of journalistic integrity:

"I have been the target of a year-long investigation by BuzzFeed. Unfortunately, your organization has made it clear to my team that you intend to move forward with publishing an inaccurate, agenda-driven version of the past, pierced with falsehoods."

He says that BuzzFeed has denied his team's requests to meet with the editors in person, to present "key evidence" that contradicts their "false allegations."

"You do not seek the truth; you seek to further your own agenda," he says. Many men agree with such claims, after witnessing the rampant rape hysteria the media has drummed up.

In the article on Medium, he cites one courageous woman who came out, exposing how BuzzFeed contacted her for an interview, and continues to take her words out of context.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=xJ3kWMBJE5Y
"BuzzFeed has contacted me to hear my opinion about Tony… I relayed my experience and told them how he had changed my life," Analay Souza Campos says on her YouTube channel.

"BuzzFeed just basically continues to try to use pieces of the intervention out of context, to make the point that they want to make regardless of the experience that I am relaying."

"Tony and I had a very sacred moment in that intervention. He served me a lot. I thank him for everything that has happened in my life thus far," she says.

Miss Campos adds that she published a best-selling book which has helped thousands, and thanks Tony Robbins for giving her the motivation necessary to do this.

"I couldn't have done it without that wakeup call that Tony gave me," she says.

Apparently, BuzzFeed has completely neglected to report on her video, and continues to twist her words to support their agenda, claiming that Tony Robbins is a sexual deviant.

It's no wonder that BuzzFeed was said to be the least trusted news source in America, according to a Pew Research Poll on which news sources the people trust most. [6]

The allegations didn't stop there, however. Even after Robbins exposed BuzzFeed's lack of journalistic integrity, they continued to publish more damaging articles, smearing his name.

BuzzFeed's Response (May – November 2019)

Just five days after Robbins published his open letter to the BuzzFeed editors and board of directors, they published another hit piece on him, with more unverified allegations [7]:

"In new exclusive interviews, Kimberly Stokes, who worked as a live-in personal assistant for Robbins when she was 22 years old, told BuzzFeed News that he once walked into her bathroom while she was showering and 'dropped his towel,' exposing himself. Stokes said that she had already rebuffed his advances once before."

"Sophiah Koikas said that Robbins pulled her hand onto his crotch to feel his penis and groped her breast at a Hawaii seminar. Another woman, Mary Lantz, said that Robbins sexually harassed her at an event she attended in Ohio — telling her she was "driving him crazy," kissing her, hugging her, and touching her breast."

BuzzFeed claims that they interviewed four separate woman, who all accused Tony Robbins of sexual misconduct. Despite this, there's no audio footage of these supposed interviews.

Then, on June 18th, they published another hit piece, claiming that Robbins "punishes followers" by making them drink an unidentified brown liquid [8]:

"Video and internal documents reviewed by BuzzFeed News reveal that Robbins places 'L' stickers on audience members' foreheads and then, while the song 'Loser' by Beck plays over the speakers, forces them to down a 'gross shot' whose contents he does not disclose to them. The practice is part of a pattern in which the embattled self-help superstar urges his followers to ingest potions while on their quest to live a healthier, wealthier, more fulfilling, passionate and purposeful life."

Again, BuzzFeed has completely taken Tony's actions and words out of context.

According to Tony himself, the brown liquid is completely harmless, and the ceremony is simply meant to condition his followers to associate pain with failure.

This is a basic concept in psychology which has been proven to work, and which we have known about since Pavlov's experiments on animals in the late 1800's. [9]

Tony Robbins' Response & Lawsuit (November 2019)

Finally, after BuzzFeed published five separate articles accusing him of sexual misconduct among various other wrongdoings, Robbins published an article on Medium, entitled "Who is Watching the Watchdogs?" in which he questions the current state of the media:

"Far from the watchdogs they once were, too many members of today's tabloid and entertainment media ignore traditional journalistic ethics, values and standards. Too often, in the hyper-competitive, celebrity-driven and political charged environment that currently exists, they fail to verify facts and vet sources, and are permitted to present predetermined stories supporting an agenda or outcome they believe will sow the most outrage and engagement with their target audiences whether true or not."

In the article, he also announces that he is officially suing BuzzFeed for a "premeditated and malicious campaign" against him and his life's work:

"For this reason, I am now suing BuzzFeed following a premeditated and malicious campaign against me and my life's work."

"In a series of articles this year, BuzzFeed falsely accused me of abusing my position and making inappropriate advances toward employees and event attendees as well as berating abuse victims at my seminars. Those stories were filled with falsehoods and many people actively spoke out against BuzzFeed in the immediate aftermath."

He then goes on to tear BuzzFeed's story to shreds, pointing out that their organization is run by a rampant desire to get more clicks, even at the cost of publishing false information:

"BuzzFeed's Editor-in-Chief was quoted in a Columbia Journalism Review article titled, "Who Cares If It's True?" arguing that he and his organization reject "formalistic rules like 'you have to have two sources to go with something.' 'It's easy to get nine sources to say the same thing and still get it wrong. I prefer to rely on smart reporters and on Twitter.' BuzzFeed's own news standards and ethics guidelines even argue that on certain topics there aren't two sides to every story."

In fact, BuzzFeed's articles have twisted the words of one woman so ruthlessly, that she has now filed a lawsuit against them, for violating her privacy rights. [10]

"More and more people are coming to see the media not as referees, but as active players in the larger game of agenda pushing," Robbins states.

"Credible media demand transparency, but online tabloid media disguising themselves as 'news organizations' too often remain secretive about their sources, techniques, and own agendas."

Why Is BuzzFeed Doing This?

Now, many may wonder why BuzzFeed might publish unverified allegations against Mr. Robbins and his life's work, but anyone with two eyes can see the truth.

First off, we live in the age of rape culture outrage. Any article claiming that a famous man sexually harassed innocent women is bound to go viral, bringing in tens of thousands, if not hundreds of thousands of dollars in ad revenue.

Second, and more interestingly however, is that Robbins has always been a staunch defender of due process. “If you use the #MeToo movement to try and get significance and certainty by attacking and destroying someone else, you haven’t grown an ounce,” he stated in 2018. [11]

Robbins’ statement echoed the thoughts of many men across the nation, who feel that false allegations are often a way for a woman to get revenge, or to simply get attention.

He went on to say that he was “not knocking the #MeToo movement,” but simply suggesting that some women use it to play the victim card, and to gain personal gratification. [12]

Could it be that BuzzFeed targeted him, because they didn’t like the fact that a well-known celebrity and influencer was pointing out the truth about this movement?

Well, nobody knows for certain, but it isn’t hard to believe this may be the case.

In a world where news outlets will push an agenda at any cost, it’s not hard to see why they might want to smear someone who questions their narrative.

What This Means for Men Everywhere

Now, of course, you may be asking: “What does this mean for me?” Many men don’t understand the larger implications of events like this, and how they affect our culture.

To put it simply, this is a good thing for men everywhere. It may not completely bring an end to the #MeToo hysteria, but it will certainly put a big dent in the media outlets who caused it.

Ever since around 2012, the media has been ruthlessly taking down men left and right, with no evidence to support their claims, and by using “independent sources” which can’t be verified.

After this lawsuit against BuzzFeed, however, many news outlets may think twice before publishing unverified claims, which makes it a safer world for men everywhere.

This was originally posted to paulelam.com and is reposted here so that the author can shamelessly promote his new website.

Ten years and 21 million visitors ago, I launched avoiceformen.com. Thanks to the efforts of many it rose to be regarded as the Flagship for the online men's movement. The only downside for me in that success was that when A Voice for Men achieved prominence, the website more or less stopped being mine. In spirit, it's now the property of a large collection of men and women, dedicated advocates, from around the world. I intend for it remain that way long past the time I am gone.

Meanwhile, I have opted to carve out a spot more of my own making, both personally and professionally. I acquired paulelam.com and set about building a website dedicated to my services, but also committed to becoming the kind of place you can send men who've been stung by society's gynocentric bias; men who need exposure to Red Pill thinking.

It could also be useful to new Red Pill initiates. So, if you see someone walking around dazed and confused and they tell you that they just had their brain zapped by watching The Red Pill Movie, please send them here. It's exactly where they need to be.

I've organized most of my most popular talks and articles. There are many more to come with your help. Please feel free to join me in the comments here. Sound off about articles/videos that you'd like to see included in the pages of this site. Any and all other suggestions about the layout and features are welcome as well.

Also, if you run across bugs, please let me know so I can spray them. The site is brand spanking new and probably has the odd glitch here and there. And, after all, I built this myself, so any number of potholes and speed bumps should be expected.

So, if you'd like to help me out, by all means kick the tires and take it around the block for a spin. You may stumble on some content that resonates with you that you had not seen before, or you may notice something not working that I missed. Either way your help is appreciated.

Other than that, please enjoy this website. And join me in the days ahead as I build this platform into the "go to" resource online for men who need a different way of seeing the world.

Cheers,

Paul

Introduction

Like many other groups, men are victims of injustice. What's unique, however, is men's inability to speak about said injustices. Other groups of people have platforms to speak about their issues. They get speaking invitations. Politicians run campaigns attempting to appeal to them. Schools teach us about their history in social science classes. Hollywood makes movies to raise awareness.

Unfortunately, men aren't granted these benefits. When men speak up, we are put through frustrating levels of intolerance. Society spends their time telling people what our opinions and intentions are, as opposed to…idk…letting us speak for ourselves. We get lumped in with groups that we would never dream of affiliating with. Articles take all our words out of context. College students use these lies to censor our appearances on campuses. People who put on this facade of being in favor of human rights, suddenly find themselves in favor of bigotry and the status quo.

This isn't a mistake. We live in a society that promotes, finances, and priorities feminist dogma over justice. Who cares if men suffer? Sure, it hurts relationships, creates a gender war, and destabilizes society. None of that matters to people. Agreeing to force a philosophy — founded on willful ignorance, racism, lies, inconsistency, and manipulation — was their top priority. Anyone, or anything, that gets in the way becomes an immediate target for people to aggressively antagonize.

Phase 1 Patriarchy-Gender Hierarchy

In the 1960s, the Civil Rights Movement raised awareness on a structure known as "white supremacy". White supremacy was used to describe the racial hierarchy that the black community had been living in. Feminists mimicked the Civil Rights Movement's rhetoric and attached it to their philosophy. They recycled the term "patriarchy" (which previously defined male leadership and authority) to resemble the gender hierarchy that they claimed to be living in.

Feminists promoted a false equivalence between the struggle of race and gender. They would even promote themselves as the gender equivalent of the Civil Rights Movement. Unfortunately, it didn't stop there. People of Color and "women" were told (by feminists) that they had a common enemy: the white man. This relieves white women from any responsibility for their racist history — as they are an "oppressed group." White women, even to this day, consider themselves champions of racial equality for pointing their fingers at white men for all of society's ills. Rewriting history and liberating a group of people from accountability doesn't achieve racial equality. Yet, society continues to present this as a legitimate fight against racism.

This philosophy of feminism still exists to this very day. Due to this intellectual dishonesty, men's issues are completely shunned by society. The concept of men's rights (prison sentencing, selective service, educational resources, etc.) are compared to "white rights", and "the rights of the wealthy". International Men's Day (a day dedicated to speaking about men's rights) is lumped in with "White History Month" and a "Straight Pride Parade" in order to dismiss men's issues. And, of course, the men's rights movement is described as a movement full of racist white men fighting for male privileges and the oppression of women.

When a society views men as oppressors and women as their victims, advocating for men's issues is going to be viewed as advocating for the "oppressor". This is an inaccurate philosophy that silences male injustice and excuses advantages granted to women. This puts men in the awkward position. If a man speaks up, he is subject to ridicule, protest, slander, and death threats. That man becomes a walking target. If he decides not to speak up, he spends the rest of his life suffering in silence. Both situations are a personal dystopia. Men suffer without support because society pleads ignorance to the very existence of their issues.

Phase 2 Patriarchy-A competition

Eventually, a certain group of men got tired of suffering and watching other people suffer. This movement became known as the men's rights movement (MRM). The MRM has existed for over a century. However, it rose to prominence-and gained considerable media attention, in the 1970s. This is heavily credited to Warren Farrell-the former feminist, the father's rights movement, and The National Coalition for Men. They wrote books, created conferences, spoke at events, filed lawsuits, spoke to judges, engaged in court cases, and spoke to politicians.

Feminists, being aware of this, altered their statements. They, surprisingly, acknowledged men's issues. However, they declared that "women have it worse". Therefore, men should be focused on helping women, not helping themselves. If you speak of men's rights, you are technically rolling back women's rights. Case in point, the men's rights movement is accused of rolling back women's rights by speaking of men's rights. By raising awareness on men's issues, MRAs are supposedly silencing women's issues. Suddenly, activism was no longer about morality and fighting against injustice. It was now a competition to become the most negatively affected group. Whenever men speak about their own issues, society turns them down for slowing down the progress of women's issues. Ultimately, men and their rights will always be put into an inequity competition that they are predetermined to lose.

Phase 3 Patriarchy-Revisionist History Heroines

Despite the feminist driven efforts to censor the discussion of men's rights, certain topics and groups have entered the mainstream. Father's Rights Organizations are present in many countries around the world. Comedians have done notable standup routines on men's issues. There are campaigns raising money for men's health. Men's support groups and men's conferences have grown recently. People have become more educated on men's human rights.

Feminists, realizing this, did a complete flip from their original gimmick. They completely acknowledged that men's issues do exist. They also acknowledged that there was an entire culture and system that harms men. All the feminist assertions of men's rights were completely back tracked. Unfortunately, this admission came with a series of conditions. Feminists will admit that men's issues exist if they can victim blame men for the suffering.

> This starts with their completely altered definition of patriarchy. Patriarchy (the word they originally used to describe a society in favor of men and against women) is now used to explain away any injustices that men face. This system is supposedly responsible for all the legal discrimination that men and boys have to deal with on a daily basis. "Men in power" are the scapegoat for all of men's issues. Therefore, men are responsible for all their own problems, because they "have power".
> This continues with the term "toxic masculinity". Toxic masculinity (as recycled by the feminist movement) is used to explain the social injustices that men go through. The term implies that men created a culture of manhood that is unhealthy and puts social pressure on them to act a certain way. Toxic masculinity is routinely used as a response to concerns around men's health, male sexuality, violence against men, and the lack of empathy granted to male victims. Therefore, men are responsible for "creating" a toxic environment that prevents men from expressing themselves.
> Finally, feminists change the stated goal of their movement as "equality of the sexes". After asserting that men's problems are the result of patriarchy and toxic masculinity, feminists decide that they are the solution. Feminists (who spent decades attempting to silence the discussion on men's issues) experienced revisionist history, in which they portrayed themselves as the champions of men's issues. The people who don't think men's rights exist, are suddenly an advocate for a term they deemed to be fictional. Every men's issue was now deemed to be a "feminist" issue. Feminists appointed themselves to be gatekeepers of gender equality. Ultimately, in their eyes, you MUST be a feminist to raise awareness on men's issues. And, of course, this gives them a new reason to oppose men's rights activists. In their mind, MRAs are the epitome of the "toxic masculinity" and "patriarchy". Therefore, they can't advocate for the wellbeing of men (despite the long history of MRAs fighting for men and feminists fighting against it).

This phase is the ultimate con. It's appalling how many vulnerable men get manipulated by this word salad. Some people believe that feminists give a damn about the wellbeing of men. Unfortunately, it's not true. This theory is all over the place and simply defies logic. This phase is so outrageously ignorant, it must be debunked piece by piece.

> Let's start with the patriarchy-which has been changed so many damn times now, it has lost meaning. The assertion of "power" is intellectually lazy. Men are most of the politicians and business owners. However, women are most of the voters, tv viewers, teachers, and parents. Also, the women's movement has all of the social, political, and financial influence. So, these "men in power" spend all their time serving the interests of women and women's rights groups. Therefore, the assertion that men have "power" is nothing more than a deflection tactic.
> Next, we'll get to the whole toxic masculinity rhetoric. Can someone explain to me why women feel the need to construct men's identities? The original definition of toxic masculinity was created by a group of men-the mythopoetic men's movement to be exact. This original definition described how society was forcing men to be feminine, and not allowing them to embrace their masculinity. This current, recycled definition was created by women. This rhetoric implies that men need to embrace more feminine roles. So, what entitles women to decide how men should express their identity? If they cared about men, they would be supporting men, unconditionally. Men shouldn't have to embrace feminine characteristics for women to put on a pro-male facade. Also, this entire rhetoric completely ignores the process of the "mating market" and excuses women's role in the social mistreatment of men. Men and women both compete in the mating market to find a romantic partner. Women compete by their looks and their sexual purity. Men compete by their physical/emotional strengths and their ability to serve/protect women. Therefore, men judge each other for their toughness. Men have to make themselves more appealing in the mating market. Women generally don't date men that they deem to be "too emotional" or "weak". Toxic masculinity doesn't address any of this. It simply blames all of men's social concerns on men and portrays women as the heroines attempting to rescue them from themselves.
> Last of all, let's address the shift in feminist philosophy. Feminists spent over half of a century centering gender equality around women's thoughts, feelings, interests, and wellbeing. They were so determined to keep it this way that they attempted to censor people who spoke about men's issues. These censorship tactics walked a fine line between ignorance and flat out bigotry. Are we now led to believe that these very people are legitimately concerned about helping men? Have they ever come out and apologized to men for promoting a theory that effectively silenced the discussion on their issues? If so, I haven't seen it. What I have seen them do is completely rewrite history. I've seen them pretend as if this was always their goal and that their detractors are just ignorant. I've seen them appoint themselves to gatekeeper status for gender equality, demand people identify with the movement, and protest people who criticize them. And, as long as this ridiculous pattern continues, I don't see feminists as a group of people who are interested in helping men.

Phase 4 Patriarchy-Radical Rights Activists

This is the final phase of patriarchy. I honestly don't want to spend too much time on it (as it isn't really important). This phase is exclusive to radical feminists.

> Mainstream feminists fight to put a negative connotation on "men's rights", "misandry", and "International Men's Day". They blame men for everything that's wrong with society-including men's issues. When men attempt to give themselves a positive image for all of the good things they do (like saving women from danger, becoming firefighters and police officers, and being the financial caretakers in relationships), feminists dismiss this with cartoonish rhetoric (claiming that the patriarchy forces men to save women, claiming to be kept out of these male dominated jobs, and framing women as victims of male pride for accepting men's financial offers). But they never explicitly say "I hate men".
> Radical feminists, or Radfems, openly express contempt for men. Radical feminists aren't concerned with their image. They are proud of their prejudice and don't shy away from it. These radicals are like alter egos to the > mainstream feminist. Radfems have the same ideas, thoughts, feelings, and emotions as average feminists. They are just more transparent and forthcoming with their bigotry, while mainstream feminists disguise their prejudice through ideology.

The Feminist Chameleon

These different phases of feminism effectively silenced the discussion on men's issues. But it manages to get worse. The phases of feminism (excluding phase 4), are all actively used by the feminist movement today. They don't have a consistent philosophy. Feminists jump between these phases during conversations and debates. If you think I'm joking, try to have a conversation with a feminist about men's rights.

A feminist will pop up to belittle you for daring to speak about men's rights, telling you that society is always in your favor. You'll push back and speak about the misandry that men face. Suddenly, feminists will downplay misandry in favor of misogyny — turning the conversation into a competition. You'll point out that this isn't a competition and that you're just trying to raise awareness for men. But feminists will counter this by telling you that you should identify with their movement to talk about men's issues-as they supposedly favor gender equality. They will portray themselves as allies enabling men to speak up, while portraying you as the monster who doesn't care about men. If all else fails, you will be met with virgin shaming and claims of fragility (despite their insistence on claiming that they are freeing you from gender roles).

Each reason will be used as an excuse to attack you. You'll be confused-if not frustrated-noticing that they're saying contradictory things with each response. But it won't matter to them. They have the social, financial, educational, and political power. All they need is a detailed reason to silence you — be it true or false. Before you know it, you're being denied access to platforms, you're being protested, and your position is being mischaracterized. Society will look at you as the monster. In reality, all you wanted to do is raise awareness about men's issues.

Welcome to the land of feminism my friends. Where bigotry is equality.

March 4 Men, Messages 4 Men

Mike Buchanan · 13 December 2019 · Archived copy · Original

This year, as in the previous two years, events were held in London in commemoration of International Men's Day, on the last Sunday before the day – 17 November, in this case. The day started with a March 4 Men, ably led by Mangesh Bhalerao of SIFF (Save the Indian Family Foundation) and filmed by Ewan Jones – here (video, 11:35). As before, the lengthy march was from the Royal Courts of Justice to Parliament Square. The chronology of the video:

00:00 – 7:30 Outside the Royal Courts of Justice
7:31 – 9:16 The march
9:17 – 10:07 Parliament Square
10:08 – 11:35 Chanting by the statue (still in Parliament Square) of the suffragist Millicent Fawcett

After the above events, a conference – Messages 4 Men – once again, organized by Elizabeth Hobson, our Director of Communications, and Wonder Natty (she's the lady speaking at 3:20 in the March 4 Men video), was held in the West End, and judged by everyone I spoke to as very successful. Perhaps the best-known of the 21 speakers to most AVfM followers would be Alison Tieman, Dr Randomercam and Sargon of Akkad. My own speech title was, "Abortion is a men's issue, too", the transcript of which I recently posted on AVfM. The speeches were filmed and later edited by the award-winning director responsible for the filming of speeches at the last four ICMIs, Anthony J Corniche III (Tom). Our playlist of all 21 talks is here.

My warm thanks to Mangesh for leading the March, and to Elizabeth and Natty for organizing the conference. A great day was had by all, and we look forward to next year's event.

The J4MB Review of the Year

Mike Buchanan · 16 December 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Once again Anthony J Corniche III (Tom) – the award-winning director who filmed the presentations at the last four ICMIs – filmed Elizabeth Hobson (our estimable Director of Communications) and I reviewing the past year in the smoking lounge of James J Fox, the oldest cigar merchant in the world, near the Ritz Hotel in London. Winston Churchill bought his cigars there, and there's a small Churchill museum downstairs, including the chair in which he sat while sampling cigars (he was particularly fond of Cuban Romeo y Julieta cigars). It's permitted to smoke cigars and pipes (but not cigarettes) in the smoking lounge and the museum, an exceptional thing in the UK today.

Cultural historians recently established a causal link between the decline of pipe smoking in the UK over the past 50 years, and the rise of feminism. In response, I launched the J4MB Pipe Smokers Club.

Elizabeth and I would like to take this opportunity to wish Paul Elam and everyone associated with the AVfM website, along with its legions of followers, a Merry Xmas and a Happy New Year. Onwards and upwards!

Where Have All the Alphas Gone?

David Solway · 17 December 2019 · Archived copy · Original

For some time now I have watched the immensely popular HGTV as a window on the culture—a large picture window letting in "lots of natural light," as the rather silly and predictable house hunters are fond of saying—providing a cameo on the conventions of middle-class society. One notices, with few exceptions, that the wives tend to be voluble and bossy; they speak first, far more often, more insistently and more authoritatively. Their needs and desires are clearly predominant. The husbands, for their part, are mostly bland and subservient, almost leguminous in comparison, generally deferring to their wives with only the occasional mewl of protest.

One notes, too, the lack of genuine taste, the utter preoccupation with trivialities, and the cloying banality of conversation among the often obese participants. They are obviously hewing to script, but the ideas, habits, physical attributes, speech patterns, attitudes and expectations on display are close enough to the cultural norm to seem authentic. People recognize themselves and their aspirations in these TV episodes. Although the self-indulgence and broadly decorticate behavior one observes is certainly off-putting, the absence of gender parity, in favor of the wives, is perhaps the most conspicuous quality that affirms itself.

One might dismiss these observations as making too much of a mere reality TV show, but HGTV does let in a lot of natural light on a culture grown flaccid and critically disoriented. The ascendancy of the now-dominant, rule-giving female and the attendant decline of the proud and assertive male is the order of the day. The male essence is not a privilege but a fact of nature—that is, when nature is allowed to take its course. Yet, everywhere we look men are surrendering their right to be men—to be strong, confident, honest, unashamed and productive. I do not blame the vindictive and self-righteous feminists for the debacle. I blame the men who have allowed a social disaster to come to pass. We now see the gradual disappearance, or at least the alarming paucity, of alpha males in the social mix accompanied by the rising tide of beta males—apologists for their "toxic" nature, Michael Kimmel types— who are complicit with the feminist agenda.

In an important talk delivered at the ICMI conference held in Chicago in October 2019, the video of which is soon to be released, former vice-chair of the Maryland Commission for Men's Health Tom Golden pointed out that testosterone levels are markedly declining among Western males. As is well known, testosterone is a male sex hormone that stimulates the production of sperm and the growth of muscle mass. But it is less well known that testosterone is also genetically engineered for status-seeking. University of Zurich neuroscientist Christoph Eisenegger in a major research paper, "The role of testosterone in social interaction," suggests that testosterone "might be best conceptualized as bringing motives for social status to the fore." Eisenegger showed that those who maintain that high level of testosterone lead only to corruption, aggression and emotional sterility have not adequately considered the evidence; such studies have been "clearly refuted." Testosterone is the chemical engine for risk-taking, reciprocity, generosity and competitiveness.

Writing in Forbes, Neil Howe alludes to several analytic reports showing that "men's testosterone levels have been declining for decades." Among the many complex factors involved in the downward trend, a crucial element seems to hinge on "dismantling age-old ideas about masculinity and triggering real anxiety over changing gender roles." There is no doubt that the economy is shifting away "from jobs that favor men [and] toward sectors dominated by women." Howe is plainly a man of leftist sympathies—Donald Trump is "old-fashioned, overtly macho," plenty of testosterone there. Nonetheless, while admitting that he might prefer "a less testosterone-laden world [which] might be less aggressive and more emotionally expressive"—as Eisenegger indicates, a thoroughly mistaken notion—Howe remains concerned that America, a once "'pro-testosterone' nation: restless, striving, and rowdy…is losing the dynamism, mobility, and enterprise that made it special."

In other words, testosterone is an alpha hormone. When men strive not to excel and triumph but to conform and acquiesce, to blend in safely with majority sentiment, to not rock the boat (even if it is leaking), to go along in order to get along, and to accept the deformed image of masculinity with which they are daily bombarded, it is a sign that the testosterone pool is drying up, as Tom Golden fears and research has borne out. What is cause and what is effect is an open question. “Has testosterone declined in response to a changed world,” asks Howe, “or has the world changed to accommodate less virile men? Or is it both?” Whatever the answer, the result is the emergence of the beta man.

Of course, I am using the Greek alphabet somewhat loosely. Status is to a large degree context-dependent and social prestige may not arise exclusively from the alpha hierarchy. But the distinction between alpha and beta, despite the many shades of gray between them, is a useful one and one that is commonly understood. As psychologist Scott Kaufman informs us, “The most attractive male is really a blend of characteristics, including assertiveness, kindness, cultivated skills and a genuine sense of value in this world. The true alpha is fuller, deeper, and richer.” It follows that the true beta is emptier, shallower, and poorer.

I’ve had occasion to write in a previous article about the posturing feminist firebrand, Mona Eltahawy, who urges the weekly killing—she calls it “culling”—of men. Eltahawy cites a local instance of her determination to resist the patriarchy and her fierce courage in fighting it, referring to an episode in a Montreal club in which she physically beat up a man who groped her. I am willing to bet the story is apocryphal. Yet her fable limns a social truth, if only metaphorically, for the straw man in Eltahawy’s fevered imagination is the fictive representative of the actual beta male who has permitted, and even abetted and cultivated, the travesty of his unmanning. Though exacerbated and more than ever extensive, this development is by no means a novel phenomenon. It has its history.

Lack of Manliness Is Real Culprit Behind Mass Shootings

…….

As far back as 1913, E. Belfort Bax in The Fraud of Feminism framed the issue with his characteristic insight and precision. He is worth quoting at length. “In any conflict of interest between a man and a woman,” he writes, “male public opinion…sides with the woman, and glories in doing so.” Bax finds himself baffled by “the intense hatred which the large section of men seem to entertain toward their fellow-males…and their eagerness to champion the female in the sex war.” It is undeniable, he continues, that the Woman’s Movement, unassisted by “a solid phalanx of the manhood of any country, could not possibly make any headway.” The members of the phalanx—legislators, judges, parsons, magistrates—“all vie with one another in denouncing the villainy and baseness of the male person…To these are joined a host of literary men and journalists…who contribute their quota to the stream of antimanism…the design of which is to paint man as a base, contemptible creature.” Thus “the anti-man cultus has been made to flourish [with] the whole of the judiciary and magistracy acting as its priests and ministrants.” Plus ça change, plus c’est la même chose. Bax could have been writing at this very moment.

These men may have acted from motives of chivalry or principles of moral virtue. They were not necessarily weaklings or beta males, but the consequences of their actions led to a dilution of the male spirit and temper and to the formation of a class of sexual herbivores who took the path of least resistance. They are our contemporaries, men who may believe they act from high ethical considerations but in reality are feminized creatures who have sold their masculine birthright for a mess of saccharine pottage. In short, they are beta-men. “Men seem to be so cowed that they can’t fight back,” said former feminist Doris Lessing at the 2001 Edinburgh Book Festival. And she was right.

As poet Robert Bly writes in his 1990 bestseller Iron John, begging forgiveness for being a man, in violation of natural male vigor and energy, is a form of psychological suicide. It is a function, says Bly, of male naïveté, increasingly prominent in the modern era. “We see more and more passivity in men,” he writes, “but also more and more naïveté. The naïve man feels a pride in being attacked. If his wife or girlfriend, furious, shouts that he is a ‘chauvinist,” a ‘sexist,’ a ‘man,’ he doesn’t fight back, but just takes it.” In fact, he will offer to carry a woman’s pain before he checks with his own heart to see if this labor is proper in the situation…He rarely fights for what is his; he gives away his eggs, and other people raise the chicks.” (Italics mine.)

In Bly’s analysis of the Western tragedy pitting the sexes against one another, “Powerful sociological and religious forces have acted in the West to favor the trimmed, the sleek, the cerebral, the noninstinctive, and the bald"—Bax's "judges and magistrates"—who are the progenitors of the beta men we see all about us today. The beta man is the source of the cultural decrepitude and social dysfunction brought about by the feminist assault on the psychic and biological boundaries that differentiate the sexes. Beta men are committed to resisting what they regard as their raw and turbulent masculinity. They believe that masculinity as historically conceived and as feminists insist is demonic.

For Bly, the antidote to this febrile declension is the Wild Man of myth and folklore—pagan, classic, Celtic—who has been injured in his sexuality and who must return in all his strength, "in touch with God and sexuality, with spirit and earth," that is to say, with himself. A man must rediscover his "Zeus energy." And this not only for his own sake but for the sake of woman as well, whose fecund and magnanimous nature "has suffered tremendously," as a consequence not only of her own resentments and illusions but also of the favonian influence of compliant men. "The goddess Aphrodite," as he puts it, "alive inside the female body, is insulted day after day." Regrettably, the Wild Man, or his contemporary avatar the alpha male, whom the mateless woman and the disaffected feminist secretly crave, is very much a minority species. (Interestingly, Neil Howe recognizes that "Millennial women yearn for guys who can 'man up' and take care of business," but there are not enough of them around.)

Bly has been mocked by critics who find his thesis one-sided, expressing a return to the primitive, and risibly "phallocentric," a reproof that many would apply to cult hero and magister Jordan Peterson. There is much misunderstanding in this position, for Bly accentuates the virtues of male sobriety and duty and Peterson those of competence and responsibility. In his recently published 12 Rules for Life, Peterson, with his considerable authority as a renowned clinical psychologist and an erudite thinker, elaborates the argument for the retrieval of healthy masculinity in a feminist age.

Following psychoanalytical pioneers C.G. Jung and Erich Neumann, Peterson points out that consciousness, "always symbolically masculine, even in women…is constantly tempted to sink back down in dependency…and to shed its existential burden. It is aided in that pathological desire by anything that opposes enlightenment, articulation, rationality, self-determination, strength and competence"—in effect, the beta capitulation to the triumphant female, the renunciation "of order and of the Logos" by men who have become feminized and submissive.

For such convictions Peterson has been denounced as a muddled thinker, a chauvinist, a huckster, a phallocrat, a misogynist, a fascist—you name it. But Peterson's strength and manliness is evident in his ability to soldier on, to rise above such mean-spirited attacks, to lift his voice against the meretricious orthodoxy of the day, and to turn the tables on his detractors, furnishing an example of the alpha sensibility at work.

In economist Tyler Cowen's terms, America is suffering from a "low-hanging fruit" mentality. We need high-reachers, innovators, motivators and stubborn achievers to renew a lost momentum; in other words, alpha men. Cowen writes from a leftist perspective, with a hefty dose of social justice theory, and focuses mainly on economic parameters over the last two-to-three centuries. But the concept of making do with low-hanging fruit fits the beta man with a strange perfection. These low-hanging fruit are the ideas, attitudes, compulsions, platitudes and opportunities associated with the feminist movement, which serve the appetite for conformity and approval—until, that is, the tree is bare. For a great reckoning is approaching unless we can learn once again to struggle upward where the best fruit can be found.

"It is surely time," writes Duncan Smith in The Vast and the Spurious, to redefine "the state of gender relations." It is time "for some major gaslighting, some alternate ways of viewing social life," to explode the "feminist racket" and educate its male collaborators. This will be a monumentally difficult task. The beta male (aka the "soyboy") is now the Western model of masculinity to be emulated by all right-thinking men. Unfortunately, Nancy Sinatra's boots are walking all over him. After all, "you keep samin' when you oughta be a'changin'"—though, indeed, he is a'changin,' and at breakneck speed, under the stiletto heels of the Gorgonocracy. The feminist shrew is not the shrew of Shakespeare's play; she will not be tamed, for there are precious few Petruchios around to right the balance and equally few Katherines who are "meet and amiable."* As Kate says in her concluding speech: "I am ashamed that women are so simple/To offer war where they should kneel for peace."

Of course, The Taming of the Shrew is only a play, just as HGTV is a piece of fiction. But the former articulates a longstanding domestic ideal whereas the latter inadvertently discloses a bitter social truth. The house may feature an open concept, three bathrooms, a kitchen island, marble countertops, a tiled backsplash, stainless steel appliances, a butler's pantry and plenty of space to "entertain." A profusion of wows, amazings, awesomes, and omigods lard the premises. The man whose great passion in life is outdoor grilling has to settle for indoor sizzling. "Happy wife, happy life," goes the adage. But there is no rhyme for husband. In Reality Culture, the wife will keep the house, the kids and the assets if or when she tires of her husband. What to do as the house of Western civilization collapses and the culture self-immolates? "Men have to toughen up," says Peterson. "And if you think tough men are dangerous, wait until you see what weak men are capable of." And that is something we are seeing with every passing day.

The Western world of discoveries, technologies, amenities and unprecedented wealth, which feminism abuses and exploits to its advantage, is the achievement of an alpha civilization. It is time for the so-called "patriarchy" to man up and celebrate its creation.

---

*The Amazon summary of The Taming of the Shrew was obviously written by an academic feminist flogging her idée fixe: "have she and Petruchio learned to love each other? Or is the marriage based on terror and deception?" As they say, puh-leeze! Shakespeare's intent has been clear for centuries, a celebration of traditional male and female roles in matrimony, as exemplified by a self-confident Petruchio and, in the last analysis, a wise, agreeable and spiritually lovely Kate, whose heartfelt eloquence rivals that of Hamlet and Mercutio. They are the truly nuptial couple. It is the countervailing marriages of Petruchio's friends Lucentio and Hortensio, whose wives assert their indifference and supremacy, which operate as the shadow alternative. They will not be happy.

The Broadway musical Kiss me Kate is a delightful, updated, slapstick rendition of the theme, a homage to true love redivivus.

The Disposability of Men, Infidelity and Paternity Fraud in Israel

Yoav Levin · 17 December 2019 · Archived copy · Original

When considering the disposability of men in Israel in the light of paternity fraud and female infidelity one of the most interesting aspects about the preservation of the anti-male code embedded in Israeli society is the figure of 18,000 abortions outside the framework of marriage. This information, like the rest of the data that I will provide, is hidden from the Israeli public. For this reason, the system refuses to provide the critical segmentation regarding this data. The usual estimate is that half of these women are unmarried. According to various studies and estimates, between three and 30 percent of these children are biologically not the father's kids. The real figure, as we will see, is close to 30 percent. This is revealed many times along with a health check of the wife. When it does come to light, this fact is always hidden from the husband by the doctors. It is done, of course, to allow the wife to continue with this "lifestyle" alongside with the financial exploitation of her husband through kids that aren't his.

A prime example of this is a Rabbinical law that automatically assigns the children the wife has from her extramarital affairs to the husband. This Rabbinical exponent is called in Hebrew "Rov Beilut Acharei Habaal". And on top of that, both the Rabbinical as well as the secular feminist family courts deny DNA testing to the husband when there is fear that the child is the result of the wife's extramarital affair. However, if a woman claims child support the man will be subjected to a DNA test. Why? Because in both cases it's about extracting money from the husband and transferring resources from him to the wife. In addition, many times the false claim of the child's best interest is raised to subject the man to financial exploitation of his resources as well as further abuse by the cheating wife and the legislation that supports her. The best interest of the child is not impaired by his acquaintance with the biological father who has the duty of paying alimony for his children. The child's best interest is nothing more than a radical feminist fraud aimed at using the children as a weapon against the fathers. Its goal is to subject men to the same code so that they can be more efficiently harmed and exploited.

At least 50000 couples get married each year in Israel. About a third of the women will betray their husbands and abort the fetus. Out of all these women, between three percent and one-third of women will betray a husband, give birth to another man's child and hide it from the betrayed husband. A study done for a law firm in the country reveals that the percentage of unfaithful Israeli women reaches eighty percent of married women. Sarah Shemer's study called "Intimate Report: On Women in Israel" puts the percentage at about 50 percent of all married women. From statistical studies and reports by various psychologists, the minimum of unfaithful married women in Israel also stands at over fifty percent. So, most probably it is somewhere around at least the 60% to 70. As we can see we have now been able to penetrate beyond the Matrix's propaganda machine and see the truth as it is, all of which is completely extracted from the State of Israel's legal databases as well as the Central Bureau of Statistics database accessible online and anyone is welcome to conduct this test for himself, of course.

Therefore, the average statistic regarding female infidelity and paternity fraud in Israel is as follows: In Israel, there are about 2 million couples, one million men and one million women living in marriage. Out of a million women on average, about 700000 will betray the husband. In Israel, about 50000 couples get married every year, meaning 25,000 men and 25,000 women. About a third of women give birth to a baby born from an extramarital affair, this means there are 8333 children who are not the biological kid of the husband every year, 83000 in a decade and 830000, almost a million, in a century. So how does this Matrix work in the women's service? I discussed some of the problems above. However, in the name of the spiritual and ideological father of misandry, gynocentrism and feminism, there is a raging war against men not only in the form of pseudo-science that distorts facts and figures, not only by selling delusions of the pure and innocent female nature, which serves women through the continued existence and maintenance of this oppressive system and the exploitation of men, but also when this truth is revealed, as I said above, the systems are dead set to preserve and hide this truth from men in general and husbands in particular so that oppression and exploitation can continue. It's about using the man as a disposable tool to transfer resources from men to women. Female infidelity, as well as paternity fraud, serves this goal. The spread of these illusions, the exploitation, and oppression of men are all done by social, political, religious and secular institutions including the Chief Rabbinate of Israel and the family courts, right and left. The most heinous truth is that in modern times Israeli legislation and the religious establishment are the most antisemitic institutions that discriminate against Jewish men not only based on gender but their religion too.

Insane utterances delivered in dulcet tones

Mark Dent · 18 December 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Barack Obama has always made me feel instinctively uneasy and skeptical from the moment I first heard him speak in public. Everything about his slick, articulate and "too cool for school" persona set off alarm bells. I get the same feeling whenever I walk into a car yard and the approaching salesman displays a well-practiced smile and uses my name in every sentence he utters after our handshake.

Fake. Transparent. Insincere. Liar. Poser. Egotist.

When even Australians were falling at the feet of this new messiah in adoration, I was quietly suggesting they may want to wait a little while before granting him sainthood.

Everything the man has done since he won the presidency in 2008, has vindicated my gut reaction.

I always believed the general population was less gullible than many believe. I thought that phoniness was very easy to detect and that such insincerity is soon revealed when the action of such bullshit artists fails to match their words.

I was wrong.

It seems a seems a suave, charismatic manner and a smooth, eloquent delivery in speeches is all most people require in their president. It is apparently…presidential.

I won't list the many examples of this hypocrite's presidency which undermine everything he claimed he stood for. Astonishingly, many people don't see the enormous ego possessed by this narcissist. Ego and narcissism are generally associated with Trump. I think Obama's ego puts Trump's in the shade. Obama just displays his in a far more palatable package wrapped up in false self-deprecation, brilliantly delivered auto cue speeches, a handsome face and easy smile.

Some love Trump others detest him, but few people doubt that he believes in most if not all that he advocates. I don't believe one silky word that flows from Obama's lips. He is constantly attuned to the needs and desires of his audience at any given moment.

He is the kind of man I have encountered in many different environments. They are constantly saying words and making statements they think people want to hear. Nothing they say is authentic or comes from a deeply felt passion or belief.

These men are often very willing to dismiss and denigrate other men in order to bathe in the temporary yet seductive glow of being considered a good and insightful man, one of the very few in existence.

Obama mastered this method to excellent effect during his presidency and continues to do so with the same positive results.

Is it the colour of his skin which provides Obama with some kind of a protective shield from any pushback or consequences for his demonstrably bigoted and false statements? Are people afraid they will be branded a racist for daring to question the chosen one?

I cannot fathom the idea that there is not a single person in the mainstream media I am aware of who has called out his shameless gender bigotry.

It is the old Emperor's New Clothes situation which has never been more apparent than in these troubled times where daring to tell the truth will end your career or social life and could possibly see you facing criminal charges.

When he stood at the rostrum on Father's Day and began to denigrate and admonish fathers for being absent and lazy, where were the dissenting voices? Not only did he attack fathers for failing to do their duty and take on the responsibility of fatherhood, he sang the praises of single mothers, thanking them for their tireless work and commitment to their children in the absence of any support from the fathers. All this on a day which was created to honor fathers and the role they play in their children's lives.

Listen to the applause and vocal affirmation as he glorifies America's single mums on a day set aside for the affirmation of our dads.

What a sycophantic sleazebag.

He did not mention the fact that many of these single mums have children to four different partners. He didn't mention the fact that these women often choose to keep the father/s away from their flesh and blood and do so with the willing assistance of the courts and government. He didn't mention the thousands of dads who are financially supporting children who do not possess their DNA or the mothers who lie to them.

He didn't mention the fact that the government has become a substitute provider to these children, relishing the fact that many women are seduced by and hooked on the welfare system which so many of them use and abuse.

What insane demographic would dare to bite the hand that feeds them?

And this masterful orator (when the teleprompter is working smoothly) has continually sounded the alarm about the existential threat facing humanity-climate change.

Seas will rise! We are all doomed I tell you. We must act now! This speech was delivered many years ago. Yet, what is this? The Obamas have just purchased a multi-million dollar ocean front mansion! If you don't laugh you will cry. The man is shameless. You can be assured that he and Michelle will continue to preach the climate catastrophe gospel without even blushing as they return home and drift off to sleep to the sound of rolling ocean waves.

But it is his constant and well documented method of winning the approval and support of women which sticks most painfully in my gut.

Who can forget Obama's signing of a bill regarding equal pay, surrounded by a group of women who nodded solemnly at every lie he spoke?

Just read his words and try to believe he thinks they are true.

> During the course of her career, a working woman with a college degree will earn on average, hundreds of thousands of dollars less than a man doing the same work.
> Now that's wrong!
>
> Anyone who says seventy-seven cents on the dollar is pretty close to equal, I say your math is bad!
> No man would work a day without pay! (Apparently women do.)

Can anyone look me in the eye and tell me that this intelligent man does not understand how this gap arises? The United States Department of Labor studied the issue and came to the conclusion that the gap exists almost entirely because of the choices men and women make in their working lives.

Yet he looks down the lens with the deepest sincerity and tells millions of Americans that women are grossly underpaid simply because they have a vagina.

This slick conman spews more of the same tripe when speaking about the apparent rape crisis in American University Campuses.

In one clip he tells the males of America,

> "Real men do not hurt women! Being a man means recognizing sexual violence and being outraged by it and doing your part to stop it"

Just imagine an American President saying:

"Real women don't bash, abuse and murder their babies," as though many women believe that such behavior is perfectly acceptable.

That is the hidden (and often blatant) message insinuated in every comment Obama makes on gender issues.

You ignorant, brutish masses require my guidance and expertise in the field of gender relations. Without good people like me at the helm, what hope do women have?

So why have I written this retrospective piece on a man who is no longer in the spotlight? Well, Obama caught my attention with some comments he made during a recent visit to Singapore.

Obama spoke what I consider to be some of the most asinine, mind-numbing, demonstrably stupid and bigoted words a politician could utter.

Speaking at a leadership event in Singapore on Monday, former President Barack Obama said there would be "significant improvement across the board" if countries were led by women, and that "old men" needed to get "out of the way."

> "Now women, I just want you to know; you are not perfect, but what I can say pretty indisputably is that you're better than us [men]," the 44th President said, according to the BBC. "I'm absolutely confident that for two years, if every nation on Earth was run by women, you would see a significant improvement across the board on just about everything … living standards and outcomes."

I try to imagine I am a woman sitting in that female dominated audience. How would I feel when I heard these words?

Patronized? Belittled? Taken for a fool?

Yet most of his female audience seem to lap this shit up.

I don't get it. His comments about women are so childish and transparent. He may as well chant the old playground rhyme used by females in primary school:

Girls are the best! Chuck out the rest!

Or simply echo the words of his wife, Michelle who once told a large female audience:

"Women are smarter than men."

Why are these silly, petty people so revered in America?

Obama has dealt with many female leaders at various levels of government. Without resorting to a trip through history one can readily acquaint themselves with countless examples of female ineptitude in government. Does Obama really believe that possession of a vagina is a guarantee of good leadership?

Maggie Thatcher remains one of the most hated and divisive political figures in British history. Angela Merkel has overseen the collapse of Germany's economic power and her open border policy has led to many serious problems during her tenure. Julia Gillard was an abysmal failure here in Australia despite the enormous wave of goodwill she rode into office after backstabbing her colleague, Kevin Rudd.

Catherine the Great and Elizabeth the First were warmongers and a match for any of their male predecessors or those who followed after them. History buffs could produce an impressively lengthy list of monstrous female rulers. Our modern-day experiences reveal that females are just as flawed, incompetent, corrupt and ego driven as their male counterparts.

Women are indisputably better leaders.

What a sickeningly absurd notion. How is it any less absurd than suggesting redheads or amputees make naturally better leaders due to the color of their hair or absence of limbs?

Does having a penis ensure a man possesses any particular quality or aptitude? We seem to cover an enormous range of possibilities and we have seen them all played out throughout the centuries. Old white men seem to be the target of Obama's ire, yet it seems these ancient buggers have done a more than adequate job in setting up our civilization and the countless institutions we take for granted.

And this is where the confusion sets in. Is Obama suggesting there are fundamental differences between the genders? Is he suggesting that all potential female leaders possess the same skill sets and ideological views? Has he not experienced female leadership in our education system? Do we not see countless examples of disharmony in female led staffrooms and outright bullying from the female principal and female staff? I have experienced this during my career in education. Surely this alone would lead one to understand that it is individual temperament and integrity which leads to good leadership rather than one's genitals.

If Obama truly believed what he was saying he would have stepped aside and let the far more experienced Hillary Clinton sit in the White House. Barack didn't do that. He fought tooth and nail to keep her out and ensure that yet another man was Commander in Chief. Himself!

You will find that most men who advocate for more females on boards or in political parties mean other men should be sacrificed in order to ensure this madness is brought to fruition.

Hillary's disastrous campaign in 2016 seems to have been more than enough for the American voters to decide they did not want this particular female leader as their President. Obama is certain she would have delivered a better world for all.

The man is beneath contempt. His pandering to females is cringeworthy and very damaging to both men and women in America. He continues to poison women and young girls' minds with the lie they are treated as second class citizens in their country. Feeding female victim mentality serves a short-term purpose but ultimately creates further injustice for men and boys (as seen by his disgraceful guidelines for adjudication of campus sexual assault) and another generation of angry, self-entitled women who believe the world owes them a free ride.

I wish that just one of Obama's many lies could turn out to be true and we could watch the ocean rise and swallow up the house occupied by two of the most hypocritical, dishonest, virtue signaling con artists in American politics.

An exercise in hostile framing

Paul Taylor · 21 December 2019 · Archived copy · Original

I am going to ask the reader's patience—just for a moment. What we are going to examine is best understood with an example first. Thus, it is best to keep the "cat in the bag" initially.

Imagine if you heard or read the following as a health alert, or a public service announcement.

"There is a condition that is the greatest source of death in the world. This condition is chronic, progressive and uniformly fatal.

This condition is killing people all over the world—and most of us don't even think of it as a problem."

So far, so good? Sound pretty familiar? Let's continue.

"It is chronic: once you have it, it keeps going.
It is progressive: it is characterized by a set of symptoms that worsen over time.
It is uniformly fatal: all who contract this condition die. There is currently no cure. The fatality rate is 100%."

At this point, the announcement would probably have your attention—but something else is happening. There is an alarm going off in your head, and an inner voice that tells you "this is starting to sound like nonsense." Good. Keep that alarm plugged in.

"All who contract this condition die. By the way—everyone contracts it. It is called Life. Please donate to the Prevent Life campaign today."

And now the "cat" is out of the "bag."

So, what did we just demonstrate here?

That anything—anything—can be framed negatively.

Remember this the next time someone –researchers, "experts," film commentators, anyone– starts to talk to you about problematic masculinity. Remember—anything can be framed negatively.

One classic way to frame something negatively is to tinker with the accepted definition. Remember when masculinity meant things like willingness to protect and defend, willingness to take risks, and willingness to act on goals and values. You will no doubt have noticed that the "recipe ingredients" have been altered: now masculinity allegedly is characterized by "aggression" and "the wish to dominate."

By the way, there is a name for this kind of hostile, manipulative framing. It is called "propaganda," and it is as old as the human race. The ancient Greeks preferred the term "sophistry." The Greek philosopher Plato was openly critical of sophistry; the true goal of philosophy, said Plato, was the pursuit of the truth, while the goal of sophistry was simply to apply what appears to be logic in order to convince or persuade.

What you will notice is that propaganda is not limited by logic or facts—because it uses them: every statement you just read is factual and the conclusion is logical (given the facts). Yet, once you reach the conclusion, you immediately know the conclusion is absurd. The key is which facts you select, and how you present them.

A prime example of such manipulation is one we see during every election year from the mouths of the candidates. This is not to say that politicians don't lie—they most certainly do. It is simply to say they don't need to lie. They can (and do) distort the truth by selectively telling the truth.

There is a logical approach, however, that can be used to test manipulative arguments. The traditional name (and one that is still used in logic and math classes) is "reductio ad absurdum." According to this logical approach, if a set of assumptions can be shown to lead to an absurd conclusion, then the assumptions are proven absurd as well. The above demonstration fits this format (although somewhat colorfully).

So, I would argue that men are entitled to apply this reasoning to feminist arguments. Let's do a little inventory, shall we?

One of feminism's chief assumptions is that there are no meaningful biological differences between men and women—that these differences are either insignificant and/or they are a product of social scripting. Hence, boys are only boys because they are taught to be, and the same for girls (or at least, again, in any way that is significant). A chief conclusion of feminism is that we live under a system of essentially universal male rule, called "patriarchy", that constructs social rules that benefit men and limit/restrain women. Now, let's take these assumptions forward logically to see what conclusions they generate.

If women are essentially indistinguishable from men, then there should be a minimum of difference in their motivations and goals. If there is no meaningful difference in motivations and goals, then there is no point in establishing a system of male rule because it would make no difference. Also, if men and women are so indistinguishable from each other, it should be difficult for one group to even conceive of the other as worth dominating—after all, in all ways that matter they are basically the same already. Therefore, if the premise that men and women are not meaningfully different is true, it should lead to the conclusion that no one has a reason to dominate any one. Yet, we are told that men are powerfully motivated to dominate women. The conclusion and the assumptions, presented together, create an absurdity.

Let's try another one.

There is another branch of feminism, generally called Radical Feminism, that starts with a different assumption: that men and women are, indeed, basically different, and that specifically male traits are predictably negative, disruptive to society, and dangerous to individual women. Let's take these assumptions forward logically and see what happens.

If men are basically motivated at a natural level to dominate women, then our world history should reflect this pattern. Feminists of this vein like to cite historical points such as the delay in achieving the female right to vote or the delay in achieving abortion rights. Yet, if we begin with the assumption than men are motivated to dominate, and that men currently (and historically) have political power over women, then men should be using this political power to prevent any change that would weaken that power. Yet, both the female right to vote and abortion rights were achieved at times when men overwhelmingly held political power. Indeed, virtually all specifically female rights have been bestowed by male judges and lawmakers. If men hold the power, and if men are fundamentally motivated to dominate women, this could not happen. When the conclusion and the assumptions are viewed together, we get another absurdity.

Let's proceed by using this approach in a slightly different way. If feminism can be shown to resemble another oppressive line of thought, that has already been rendered absurd, then feminism is at least logically suspect (if not actually proven absurd). One very valid point that anti-racist thinkers have made is that our nation's prior racist ideas about African-Americans were internally contradictory, and thus illogical. (These ideas were also proven illegitimate by observation/research.)

If you examine this nation's history of racist ideas about African-Americans, you find a set of statements that are –when aligned—glaringly contradictory, but which white people of this nation long held as true. As an example:

"Black people are not very intelligent."

"Black people are clever liars."

It doesn't take much examination of these two statements to see the contradiction. Yet it is not uncommon to hear these kinds of assertions from racist thinkers (often in the same conversation). Why does this go unnoticed? Because both statements agree with something else: the speaker's feelings about the topic. When two differing assertions both trigger the same feeling in the speaker/listener, the logical inconsistency can go unnoticed.

Does this occur in feminist thought about men? Let's see.

Here are two assertions I have heard repeatedly from feminists about men:

“Men don’t know their own feelings.”

“Men use anger to intimidate and control women.”

If men are largely unaware of their own feelings, then they should be essentially ineffective at either recognizing or utilizing a feeling. But we are told men routinely (and presumably effectively) employ anger to control women. This is not very different from the kind of inconsistencies that were once spoken about African Americans.

Thus, feminist thought about men is disturbingly similar to racist America’s historical thoughts about African-Americans.

Are there any lines of thought that are even more irrational that feminism also resembles? Let’s see.

Hitler: “Why does the world shed crocodile’s tears over the richly merited fate of a small Jewish minority? …”

Feminism: “I bathe in male tears.”

Hitler: “Don’t be misled into thinking you can fight a disease without killing the carrier, without destroying the bacillus. Don’t think you can fight racial tuberculosis without taking care to rid the nation of the carrier of that racial tuberculosis.”

Feminism: “The proportion of men must be reduced to and maintained at approximately 10% of the human race.” Sally Miller Gearhart, in The Future – If There Is One – Is Female.

Or.

Feminism: “If life is to survive on this planet, there must be a decontamination of the Earth. I think this will be accompanied by an evolutionary process that will result in a drastic reduction of the population of males.” Mary Daly

Hitler: “From the rostrum of the Reichstag, I prophesied to Jewry that, in the event of war’s proving inevitable, the Jew would disappear from Europe. That race of criminals has on its conscience the two million dead of the First World War, and now already hundreds and thousands more. Let nobody tell me that all the same we can’t park them in the marshy parts of Russia! Who’s worrying about our troops? It’s not a bad idea, by the way, that public rumor attributes to us a plan to exterminate the Jews. Terror is a salutary thing.” (quoted in John Toland, *Adolf Hitle*r. London: Book Club Associates, 1977, p.702-3).

Feminism: “I feel that ‘man-hating’ is an honorable and viable political act, that the oppressed have a right to class-hatred against the class that is oppressing them.” Robin Morgan, Ms. Magazine Editor.

I think the reader will see the pattern of similarity. I also think feminists—radical or otherwise—should pause and consider their path.

So what do the sophists, Nazi’s and feminists have in common? In summary: logical manipulation, hostile intent and extremism.

Let me close with a quote on this kind of manipulative extremism from a very old source.

“When a man is unanimously condemned to death, you must release him at once.
Reflect on this.”

Talmud (as cited by Samuel Paul Veissiere, PhD in Psychology Today, 2/16/2018)

(An offered interpretation of the above quote: when a group gives you uniformity of opinion about anything, it is time to consider whether this uniformity is due to the facts or to social/political pressure within the group to conform.)

Well, alright—one more comment to close on a lighter note:

A vociferous thing is the Radical,
Who insists that men are so badical.
Her opinions get jawed,
Though her logic is flawed,
And her conscience seems on sabbatical.

The Kmart conundrum for feminists

Mark Dent · 22 December 2019 · Archived copy · Original

I would like to take a feminist shopping one day. I think Kmart would be my choice for a peruse of their merchandise. We could both wander off to the clothing sections of the store and see if we can discover any tempting bargains.

We would quickly discover the women's clothing area because it is impossible to miss. It is simply enormous and almost always placed in a central location in the store.

The men's section always requires a little more time and effort to locate, but the clothing is always reasonably priced and of a decent quality. The area designated for men is normally situated somewhere at the back of the store and is much smaller than the women's clothing section.

We could agree to meet at the changerooms in fifteen minutes time, if either of us was lucky enough to find a few items that captured our interest.

Once we arrive at the changerooms we would realize that both men and women enter through the same doorway where we are greeted by a friendly assistant. The men's rooms are to the left of the entrance and the women's to the right.

A hypothetical is not required for I did in fact recently venture into the Kmart changerooms and risked arrest on the ground of perversion when I quickly snapped these two sets of empty cubicles.

The men's changing area consisted of two cubicles.

[image]

The women's area appeared to have around fourteen cubicles.

[image]

At what point does the realization of the stark and rather dramatic difference in resources devoted to women's needs in comparison to those specifically targeting men dawn upon any female who regularly shops in these stores?

The quite stunning contrast in what merchandise is targeting and meeting every conceivable need of women as opposed to the far rarer sight of shops for men is to be seen wherever you choose to wander in a large shopping mall.

Jewelry shops, nail and hair salons, shops providing facials and make overs, shoe shops, handbag shops, lingerie and clothing shops abound and all do a flourishing trade.

[image]

The real world must provide a jolt to any girl with eyes to see and an open mind, regardless of how often she has been force- fed a diet of lies about the oppression, ill treatment, injustice and misogyny females must face every day in our patriarchal society.

Retailers target their consumer audience with scientific precision. They do not spend money on enormous floor space and fill four fifths of their shelves and displays with items designed specifically for women unless they believe they will be financially rewarded.

If women are the overwhelmingly preferred consumer it can mean only one thing. They control the finances and spending.

And that of course, is the truth.

Read the stunning statistics presented at a conference during which author, Jeffrey Tobias Halter spoke to an audience consisting of corporate leaders from many of our biggest and most powerful organizations, including: Microsoft, Ebay, Visa, Hewlett Packard and more.

The excerpt is lengthy but truly worth reading.

Women are the economy of the US. 83% of everything sold in the non-business to business setting is done or influenced by women.

Consider how your revenue goals and performance are influenced by women. Does your product or service consider their interest? Should it? Is your leadership team considering and fully utilizing the talent, insight and wisdom of the women on your staff as related to generating revenue in relation to your product or service? Should your team bring on more qualified women or support the development or more qualified women staff, middle managers or managers in to the c suite? Even if your product or service isn't woman focused or influenced, might qualified women offer unique perspective in to how your organizations runs or could run for optimum results?

Women are the economy of the US. 83% of everything sold in the non- business to business setting is done or influenced by women. That's 7 trillion dollars, larger than the economy of Indian and China Combined. 89% of financial service decisions are made by women and control 40% of investable wealth and they inheriting another 30% of it when their husband dies and men typically die first. Women live another 15 years and 60% of the time she fires the male financial planner because he has always been patronizing to her. The first thing she does is turn to her friend and ask who her financial planner is. Transferring of wealth to women in this country is in the trillions of dollars.

Women influence 70% of car purchases in this country yet we don't have a place for a women's purse in cars*. It's the most important thing in her life other than her children because it houses her entire life including her children. The purse isn't strapped in when she's driving and when she hits the break, her entire life goes spilling out. Lexus RX 350 is the bestselling car among women and it's likely because there's a big open trough on the floor where she can put her purse.*

Women are making 80% of the health care decisions. Bristol-Meyers calls her the "Home Health Category Manager" because she's making decisions for the immediate family and the parents.

Another example of women influencing spending is that of houses. Men are not typically buying the house unless his wife or partner is on board. And "do it yourself" home improvement projects supported by things purchased at Lowes and Home Depot are also significantly influenced by women. Women are more likely to be thinking or saying, "Oh God, that bathroom is hideous, we've got to tear that out. The paint in the foyer, when is the last time we did that?". Men are typically pretty happy doing their guy stuff on the weekend. Women are the influencers of most home improvement projects*.*

Once again, the expenditure of 83% of all consumable income in this country is either spent or influenced by women. Consider how your revenue goals are influenced by the power of women or perhaps should be.

"Women in the US literally influence everything that is bought or sold in this country."

If this is what disadvantage and oppression looks like, where do I sign up for a little taste?

One of the final important points underlined at the National Retail Federation's Annual Big Show the world's largest retail conference, with nearly 40,000 attendees and 700 exhibitors filling the Javitz Center in New York was this:

Ultimately, the conference reaffirmed that retail is inextricably linked to our culture and quality of life. According to Chris Baldwin, the chairman, president and CEO of BJ's Wholesale Club who spoke during the opening session of the conference, the retail industry supports one in four jobs – 42 million workers in the U.S. – and contributes $2.6 trillion to the country's GDP. In addition, he mentioned that one-third of Americans have their first job in retail. These stats underscore why it's never been more important to understand the core demographic driving retail: women . They are the most valuable compass in our fast-changing world.

- Approximately 40% of U.S. working women now out-earn their husbands. (Source: U.S Bureau of Labor Statistics)

It is quite stunning to read these statistics given the almost daily barrage of lies telling us about women's impoverishment, the gender pay gap, the inequities women face due to a lack of representation on boards and in government.

It is stunning to read them knowing young women and girls in our education system are being told they are disadvantaged second class citizens who face enormous obstacles in their future lives because they are female.

These facts are a complete repudiation of the feminist lie regarding women's financial status in society.

I recently read an article here in Australia bemoaning the terrible gap in men and women's superannuation at the end of their working lives. It was another example of the utterly shameless way in which feminists frame any story they write to place women in the role of victim. If you read it you will discover reasons for the gap but the headline and video screech inequity and misogyny to any casual reader-and that's exactly what they want.

There is a superannuation gap because women choose to work less hours. Simple. End of story. Yet this fact is framed as yet another example of patriarchal oppression endured by women in Australia.

Two days later there was an article by the same woman in the same paper titled: Mums find the right balance with part-time work in which the study found:

"The rate of underemployment for younger females in part-time employment falls when they have young children, as they are more likely to be satisfied with working restricted hours given the need of young children to have additional supervision in the home," Dr Kler, from Griffith University, said.

"Females prioritise their offspring upbringing and hence choose to seek employment opportunities with limited hours so they can be more readily available during their children's vital formative years," she said.

It seems where money is concerned feminist cognitive dissonance is never more in evidence. The second article on women work choices directly explains the superannuation gap in the first but there is no linking of the two by this feminist journalist.

A summation of the two articles.

You bloody misogynists! Why are we women receiving less superannuation than you?

"You go girls" because we choose a work life balance!

One university in Melbourne decided to investigate the mysterious super gap.

The startling answer:

"Gender-based differences in labour force participation, the presence of dependent children, and other caring responsibilities impact on women's ability to access waged work more than men. Women are also more likely to be employed part-time and work fewer hours," Dr Moulang said.

Sadly, to my knowledge, this finding has never been published or discussed in our mainstream media.

I am no financial wizard, but I do have a question. How is it possible that women control 83% of all consumer spending when they earn so much less than men on average? Even for a man of very little brain this is an interesting puzzle.

Surely it can mean only one thing. Women are spending and controlling the money earned by the sweat of their husband's brow.

Now I have read domestic violence websites which tell me that controlling finances and the decision making on how and where money is spent can be a form of domestic violence. I may have discovered a veritable army of male victims if that is the case!

So next time you wander through a shopping mall, just take in your surroundings with a little more focus than perhaps you normally do. Observe the endless array of shops filled with treats for females. You will see men's items crammed into corners of Target and Kmart stores alongside the DVDs and books. Even the children's clothing section reflects the same enormous bias.

Just try to imagine how much more imbalanced the concern for and spending on women would be if females came to dominate our governments. With a majority of men in parliament, women's needs have always been the major priority whilst the needs of men are rarely, if ever even considered. Yet female politicians have no shame in proclaiming their desire to place even greater focus on women's needs should they win office.

Which gender appears to be the self-serving, selfish one?

Who would have thought a trip to Kmart to buy a pair of jeans could have exposed so may feminist lies?

Feminism: A Self-Canceling Project

David Solway · 22 December 2019 · Archived copy · Original

One hears a lot of talk about cancel culture these days, but little discussion of how a cultural movement goes about canceling itself. This is especially the case with feminism. The entire program is ruptured by flagrant violations of common sense and manifold contradictions it cannot resolve. One scarcely knows where to start in disentangling the skein of incongruities, mystifications, fallacies, and inconsistencies which comprise its dogma and determine its destructive course in the public domain.

Many of the movement's disabling contradictions have been abundantly documented in various books, some of the most decisive including Paul Nathanson and Katherine Young's misandry volumes Spreading Misandry and Legalizing Misandry; William Collins' The Empathy Gap; Patricia Pearson's When She Was Bad; Christina Hoff Sommers' Who Stole Feminism?; Suzanne Venker and Phyllis Schlafly's The Flipside of Feminism; Janice Fiamengo's Sons of Feminism; Bettina Arndt's #MenToo, Stephen Baskerville's The New Politics of Sex; Esther Vilar's The Manipulated Man; and Megan Fox's Believe Evidence: The Death of Due Process from Salome to #MeToo to mention only a few. Some of these self-canceling anomalies are worth reviewing to demonstrate the magnitude of feminism's ideological incoherence.

As I wrote in an earlier article, "The most flagrant contradiction in the feminist psyche is modeled on the entitlement behavior of feminists who morbidly inveigh against the 'patriarchy' while enjoying the benefits of a world the much-maligned patriarchy built—a world of comfort, ease, leisure, advantage, convenience, security and plenty which they have no intention of rejecting or abandoning." Attacking the "patriarchy" as the most oppressive institution on the face of the planet and vilifying men as rapists, conquistadors, exploiters, and irremediably toxic abusers of women, they issue their writs of attainder from a cozy, safe and privileged environment that men created for them. Every amenity they enjoy, every labor-saving appliance, utensil, mechanism, and implement they take for granted, every technological innovation, scientific discovery, and medical advancement from which they benefit is almost entirely the gift of men that they refuse even to acknowledge.

Moreover, the feminist movement could never have flourished without massive support, sympathy, and legal instruments emanating from so ostensibly demonic an institution as the hated "patriarchy." The feminist takeover of the university, for example, owes chiefly, as Daphne Patai and Noretta Koertge point out in Professing Feminism, to "the active collaboration of well-placed male allies, who stimulated intentional receptivity to feminist ideas." Where, they ask, "was the much-maligned patriarchy while this unprecedented expansion and neoconfiguration of the academy was occurring?" A society clearly prepared to embrace feminist demands was "bolstered by legislation endorsed by the 'patriarchal' government in Washington, D.C." Such willingness to help the feminist cause on the part of male administrators is tactically scrubbed by feminist advocates, a form of lying by omission.

Feminists tend to rely on circular reasoning to further their agenda, analogous to the spurious logic of the white supremacy canard, best elaborated by celebrated feminist Peggy McIntosh in "White Privilege: Unpacking the Invisible Knapsack." She writes: "I think whites are carefully taught not to recognize white privilege, as males are taught not to recognize male privilege." The argument boils down to this. If a man denies that he is privileged, it follows that he is in fact privileged since, as male feminist Michael Kimmel has also argued, "privilege is invisible to those who have it." In a gross parody of deductive logic, invisibility is regarded as proof of the condition that is being denied. Since denial means that one is part of a repressive regime that has normalized violence against women (as it supposedly has against non-whites), a man who denies "rape culture"—like a man who denies "white supremacy"—is seen to participate in it.

But illogicality—or lack of common sense—is not merely a problem in feminist dogma; it is actually a feminist goal. For example, many strains in feminist epistemology are hostile to the traditional practice of science. Feminist claims about the exclusionary nature of scientific method and the concept of objectivity as a male stratagem to de-privilege female ways of knowing reveal the deep irrationality of feminist practices. As Paul Gross demonstrates in Noretta Koertge's edited volume, A House Built on Sand: Exposing Postmodernist Myths About Science, citing a profusion of sources isolating the pathogens of feminist discourse, feminists tend to redefine the ideal of objectivity as "something vaguely akin to multiculturalism." Gross alludes to a paper by Elizabeth Lloyd glossing Helen Longino's Science as Social Knowledge, where we find that objectivity in science derives "from the critical intersection of different groups and individuals with different social and cultural assumptions, and different stakes."

In other words, science is not about truth but about the political desires of various competing or colluding groups. Radical feminists like to insist that "scientific results are inseparable from the politics of the scientist." Objectivity, it turns out, is all about power struggles, male dominance, and systemic oppression. Of course, such statements are meant to be taken as objectively true, another revelatory contradiction made in bad faith.

Not content with trying to destroy science, feminism has also mounted a campaign against biology, claiming that gender is a social construct. Now in an irony of self cancellation, it is hoist with its own petard. The transgender phenomenon is a relatively recent development that has splintered the feminist juggernaut. Despite the swell of corporate, institutional, and pedagogical support for the transgender movement, resistance is mounting not only among the public at large and from parents who find their children undergoing trans indoctrination in the schools, but among many staunch and vocal feminists who cannot tolerate the righteous pre-eminence of men who profess to be women, who act like women, resemble women, and who have been medically and legally "re-assigned" or "confirmed" as women. Hence the recent campaign of lesbians and gays to drop the "T" from the LGBTQ acronym, for which they are being predictably attacked as "transphobic bigots."

Yet, if gender is indeed a social construct, as feminists have argued for decades, then men who have transitioned — whether surgically, hormonally, or cosmetically — have every claim to be regarded as women. After all, feminists are among the chief advocates for identity choice and women's rights. From the canonical standpoint, a man who has socially reconstructed himself as a woman has joined the female sex. "She" is a woman, enjoying all the rights and privileges that feminists have fought for and won—except that many feminists, as we see, continue to resist the intrusion of transwomen into their ranks. From the radical standpoint, such people are still biological males and therefore "toxic," patriarchs in deceptive guise. Many feminists, or TERFs (trans-exclusionary radical feminists), have changed their stripes, opportunistically believing that sexual identity is not a construct but a biological given.

Transgenderism relies on deception as does feminism. It is a biochemical contradiction that is even more profound and certainly no less dangerous, especially when one considers that transgender activists routinely urge governments to subvert parental rights and expose children to various forms of mutilation. A sign of its power comes from Sweden where an LGBT altarpiece unveiled at St. Paul's Church in Malmo, representing gay and lesbian couples in the Garden of Eden, was removed since it featured a transgender serpent. Trans advocates were not impressed. But that is no excuse for the feminist tendency to play both ends against the middle, and to argue from expedience rather than truth.

Feminism has also poisoned the wells of justice. Feminists argue with growing success that the justice system as we know it, predicated on the principles of due process and burden of proof, is a masculine invention for the oppression of women. Women who claim they have been sexually assaulted must be believed even in the absence of evidence. "Rarely is it ever suggested," writes Law professor David Tanovich in a discussion of both the status of "fact evidence" in Canadian law and the tenets of the U.S. Federal Rules of Evidence, "that the complainant is lying in these cases." Similarly, examining many cases and episodes of male-female conflict, Tim Goldich in Loving Men, Respecting Women: The Future of Gender Politics concludes that "the more serious sexist disadvantage is inherent in the male's presumed guilt, not in the female's presumed innocence." It seems to go without saying that only men are guilty of sexual misconduct or, worse, capable of sexual assault.

Indeed, the category of "sexual assault" has become a cowcatcher apparatus, whose application ranges from rape to merely touching a clothed body in a "sexual way" (however that may be interpreted). The euphemism of "preponderance of evidence" in cases of sexual litigation, which allows the trial judge to decide what seems more likely among opposing narratives, is gradually encroaching upon the concept of "beyond a reasonable doubt." It has been an integral part of so-called campus tribunals under Title IX and the purport of Obama's "Dear Colleague" letter, which enjoined the lowest possible standard of proof in sexual assault cases.

In such cases the accused, almost always a man, found he had no recourse to justice as it has been commonly understood for centuries. (Fortunately, the 2011 Dear Colleague letter has been rescinded by U.S. Education Secretary Betsy DeVos.) The situation is much less clear in Canada, where both Civil and University administrations tend to steer in the Title IX direction in the absence of cut-and-dried formal legislation. In any event, "Propensity of evidence," as Tanovich puts it, enables "the prospect of wrongful conviction."

Additionally, a woman who claims without evidence to have been sexually assaulted or molested can lie with impunity and will seldom if ever be counter-prosecuted for obstruction of justice or bearing false witness if her story is shown to be devoid of "probative value," that is, found improbable, fabricated, internally contradictory or collusive. She is the beneficiary of the power of deference. The testimony of Christine Blasey Ford against Justice Brett Kavenaugh in last year's Senate confirmation hearings is a case in point. An article by Mollie Hemingway and Carrie Severino in The Federalist methodically details "21 Reasons Not to Believe Blasey Ford." The evidence for Kavenaugh's presumed guilt was so sketchy, inconsistent, contradictory, unreliable, and uncorroborated as to have constituted an exercise in juridical frivolity. Perhaps the most famous instance in Canada involved CBC broadcaster Jian Ghomeshi, whose plaintiffs were shown to have conspired together, lied to police, and lied on the witness stand. In both cases no charges were preferred against the female complainants despite their mockery of judicial process. In short, the female lie will trump the male truth. How the feminist movement can be permitted to invade formal legal space and prosper in a democratic polity escapes both reason and morality.

The contradictions that render feminism illogical and self-canceling show no sign of abating. The legal system, as noted, is where its efforts are most destructive. Canadian law, in particular, has entered the realm of logical paradox, if not of pathological absurdity. For example, Bill C-36 makes it illegal for men to purchase sexual services while protecting women who sell their sexual services. Thus a prostitute is free to go about her business but a man is prohibited from "communicating with" or soliciting her, on pain of a maximum penalty of ten years imprisonment. The law also makes it illegal to advertise sexual services, but does not apply to the woman who does so, only to the operator of the website or other media she may use. This is the sort of legal bêtise and juridical gobbledygook one can expect when a nation becomes feminized.

In their triumphal march, feminists have also taken over the public square, transforming it into a feminine space in which men are insensibly compelled to adopt the idiom and comportment suitable, in the words of German sociologist George Simmel, to "a more feminine sensibility." In so doing, men have given up their masculine culture of risk-taking, venturesomeness, robust argument, disregard for sensitivities, and respect for fact and have been forced to conform to more feminine attributes such as solicitude, empathy, personal feelings, and unfettered emotion. The refusal to accede to this development sheds light on the feminist detestation of a macho president like Donald Trump, a man who builds towers, is combative by nature, and is unafraid to act with pugnacious authority.

The war against the president is also a war against unabashed manliness; it is a microcosm of the larger civilizational issue. For example, writing from a homophilic perspective, International Academy of Sex Research Fellow Eric Anderson in Inclusive Masculinity welcomes the "softening of heterosexual masculinities." This will presumably tenderize the West and make life ever more agreeable for all—though it will also render the Western world vulnerable to the unashamed masculinity of its foreign enemies and competitors. The current guidelines released by the déclassé American Psychological Association announce that "traditional masculinity—marked by stoicism, competitiveness, dominance and aggression—is, on the whole, harmful." Psychologists should focus "on supporting men in breaking free of masculinity." An epicene Barack Obama has declared that women are better than men: "if every nation on earth was run by women, you would see a significant improvement…on just about everything." Similarly, the aptly named Ruth Whippman, writing in The New York Times, contends that we should teach men to be "more deferential. To reflect and listen and apologize where an apology is due…To aim for modesty and humility and cooperation rather than blowhard arrogance…Sell the female standard as the norm."

Some of these latter may be wonderful virtues in their appropriate place, but they are not, by and large, the defining attributes of the male sensibility. As columnist and historian Louis DeBroux argues in The Patriot Post, teaching men that they are defective women is a sure fire-recipe for gender confusion, social breakdown, and a Pandora's box of cultural ills. "It creates men who are either feminized, weak, and self-loathing, or men who are angry and resentful at being declared evil from birth." The prospects for normal life in a functional society dwindle by the day. Domestic anarchy becomes the rule, not the exception. "The relationship between men and women," writes Megan Fox in Believe Evidence, "is a mysterious and beautiful thing. When each is acting within their boundaries, there is no end to the joy that comes from male and female love, familial or romantic." To contend, as feminists and their male enablers do, that men should become more like women is to distort the relationship and introduce a schism into the culture that can lead only to turmoil and unhappiness for both men and women. This may partly explain why marriage is in decline and the MGTOW movement (Men Going Their Own Way) is gathering momentum.

Feminism is an irrational doctrine and an ultimately self-canceling project that has lost contact with reality, having rejected both biology and history. In a social and political environment that has exiled common sense, feminism has been valorized owing in large measure to its contradictory nature. Operating wholly in the realm of conjecture and offering not the slightest proof of its stentorian convictions, it nonetheless maintains its unholy grip on Western sensibility. Promoting and institutionalizing the rule of the arbitrary in public and professional life, it has gone a long way to unmanning the culture.

Helen M Salsbury, M.D. of Pembroke Pines, FL, “Known Genital Mutilator”

Gary Costanza · 25 December 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Helen M. Salsbury MD has been placed on the “Known Genital Mutilators” directory at neonatalcutting.org, having vehemently committed and defended countless acts of cruelty and human rights violations on newborn baby boys.

She’s part of the My Ob/Gyn medical practice in Pembroke Pines, FL.

Dr. Salsbury draws the ire of well-known intactivist James Loewen and others by defending and doubling-down on her commitment to help ignorant people maim and mutilate other people’s penises.

Here’s the video Loewen made for his outstanding YT channel Bonobo3D about Salsbury and an article about her mass mutilations:

From her website:

> Dr. Helen Salsbury is a skilled, compassionate OB/GYN dedicated to providing the highest quality gynecology and obstetrics care for women of all ages in and around Pembroke Pines, Florida. At My OBGYN, Dr. Salsbury provides complete health and wellness services for her patients, including well-woman exams, family planning services, menopause management, and preventive care, as well as in-office surgery and robotic and laparoscopic surgery for women with specific medical needs.
>
> After earning her medical degree at Indiana University School of Medicine, Dr. Salsbury completed an internship in obstetrics and gynecology at Mount Sinai Hospital, Chicago, Illinois. Her residency and high-risk obstetric training was completed at Columbus-Cabrini Hospital (also in Chicago) in-conjunction with Northwestern University. Certified by the American Board of Obstetrics and Gynecology, Dr. Salsbury is a fellow of the American Congress of Obstetricians and Gynecologists and maintains active memberships in the American Association of Pro-Life Obstetricians and Gynecologists, Physicians Committee for Responsible Medicine, the American Association of Physicians and Surgeons, and the American Association of Gynecologic Laparoscopists.
> A top-rated physician with more than 30 years of experience caring for women of all ages, Dr. Salsbury welcomes new patients and the practice accepts most major medical insurance plans.
> Helen has been happily married since 1988 to Robert and is the mother of two grown daughters. She enjoys horseback riding and scuba diving with her girls, motorcycling, and serving abroad in medical mission type work. She has served in Cambodia, Bolivia, Haiti and Jamaica.

Under “In-office Surgery And Procedures Specialist” we see she is still cutting baby penis from healthy newborns, a “Known Genital Mutilator:”

> Pain-Free Circumcision
> Dr. Salsbury has been performing pain-free circumcisions since 1986. She learned of a special technique from a Jewish mohel who also happened to be a pediatrician and has used this technique ever since. The procedure, called a dorsal penile nerve block (DPNB), was first described for use in the neonatal circumcision in 1978. The DPNB numbs the entire shaft of the penis by applying lidocaine at the base of the penis alongside the dorsal nerve. Multiple studies have demonstrated both its safety and efficacy.
> Other methods of anesthesia and analgesia are available such as topical creams, but Dr. Salsbury prefers the DPNB as a more humane approach since it has statistically been shown superior to all other methods in reducing the pain and stress of infant circumcision. In addition to the nerve block the baby is given oral > sucrose (sugar) for comfort and a special circumcision bed is used. We welcome our parents to perform this procedure in our office where they can bring any family members who would like to observe. Babies who were born with another obstetrician are also welcome to perform their circumcision here.

Since Dr. Salsbury has incomplete info about circumcision and it's risks, you can research that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Help AVFM Keep Marching ON!

Paul Elam · 8 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

It's time again for AVFM's fundraiser to cover our server costs. This time, I'd like to remind you that our server expenses cover much more than just the AVFM website. In our vital effort to keep the men's rights discussion going, we also host such notable sites as Erin Pizzey's honest-ribbon.org, the Justice for Men and Boys website, our anti-MGM information website, neonatalcutting.org, anearformen.com and others. We do all this in addition to maintaining the online flagship of the men's rights movement, A Voice for Men.

This quarter's funder is even more important as we enter planning for ICMI'20 in Australia next year. Coming off the resounding success of ICMI'19, we've set our sites high for the next event Down Under. In 2020, we will settle for nothing less than a spectacular men's conference, with all the investment of time and money that requires.

We ask you now to please help us cover our basic server costs, which are $290.00 per month, raised every four months. Calculating what GoFundMe takes from our total, we set the very modest goal of $1,275.00 to keep our doors open, the information flowing and the activist events coming. Without your pledges, we can't get this done.

Please donate now. If we all pitch in, this will be done in no time!

So long, Northern Syria

Paul Elam · 8 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

President Trump has been taking a lot of heat from his recent decision to pull US troops from Northern Syria. It has notably pissed off a lot of Republicans. Now, I've been a big supporter of President Trump, but I've also called him out when I think it's warranted. And that brings me to his current decision about Syria.

Once again, Donald Trump is right and everyone disagreeing with him on this decision, which is pretty much everyone, is wrong.

Democrats (remember those anti-foreign military intervention Democrats?) are against his decision for the same reason they are against every other decision he's made, starting with his decision to run for president. There's nothing new there. To the Democrat apparatchiks, being Trump and being wrong are synonymous.

Republicans, on the other hand, are fulminating over the choice to leave Northern Syria because the Kurds have had our back against ISIS; because it is sending a message to the world that the American Military is only supportive when it suits our agenda.

Well, no shit. It's a stupid approach, but not because it leaves the Kurds alone to continue a conflict with the Turks that was happening a long time before America strolled in with weapons and training. We're talking weapons, of course, that are supplied by American defense contractors. That fact is lost on Republicans, who are too busy licking the boots of said contractors.*

Remember the Mujahideen? What's that? No, you say? Well, perhaps you will remember them by another name. Al Qaeda. Yes, the terrorist group that took down the World Trade Center towers on 9/11. They were called the Mujahideen when our CIA was helping Osama Bin Laden train them in the weapons of war.

The Mujahideen, created in large part by the United States inserting itself into Afghanistan the same way we have in Syria, also splintered into another more popularly known group. The Taliban. I'm sure you've heard of them. You should have, since your tax dollars created them.

We conducted similar foolishness when our CIA overthrew the legitimate, democratic government of Iran and installed the Shah, who maintained control with secret police, torture chambers and mass graves. That turned out well, didn't it?

At this point, American involvement in the middle east has been nothing short of an unremitting nightmare of death, destruction and loss of national treasure. We'd be better off (and so would the rest of the world) if we just exited quietly, minding our own business and hopefully without bombing any more civilians and arming more radical lunatics in the name of ~~good commerce~~ democracy.

The problem is that exiting something quietly gets complicated when there's money to be made by not exiting at all, which is where we are today. Or at least it was where we were till we elected Donald Trump to put a stop to all this bloody nonsense; to drain the swamp as it were. And make no mistake, when it comes to the swamp our defense contractors are swimming in the deep end.

It pays to be mindful of all this. When phone calls to the Ukraine and Matt Lauer being accused of rape again dominate the news cycle, it's easy to lose sight of the war being waged right in front of you. In this case, it's Donald Trump vs everyone in Washington.

My guess is that makes him almost certainly in the right.

*In the interest of fairness it must be stated that Bernie Sanders, an independent, is the top beneficiary from defense contractor donations in the senate.

Maybe, the problem is actually Men

Scott Thomas · 8 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Is there anything more nauseating than sitting in a meeting watching the 90 IQ politician playing the “leader” role. Worse yet, listening to his yes men openly praising his brilliance, his very genius. The rest of the sheep in the room conforming on que with obligatory nodding and mutterings of agreement and praise. In contrast, the slightest tell on your face that you have just thrown up in your mouth will show him you are not a bitch and in his mind, earn you a slot on the future restructuring list or relegate you to 6 months of detention hall. One in ten will respect you for it but as probabilities go, you’ll likely as not go your entire career and see only a handful of real leaders. There is a reason the television series The Office was a massive success in both the UK and the US.

It’s the dominance hierarchy right? Fundamental to the creation of civilization and human progress. Or is every institution the extended shadow of one man?

In my day to day life, across acquaintances from all walks of life, I surprisingly have yet to meet a single man that having pulled the short straw in the divorce machine, feels he has been screwed over much less is willing to do something about it. The stories and circumstances of their experience beyond subjective interpretation. In many cases they almost seem proud to be paying their ex hundreds if not thousands a month in support payments. When I share with them the story of a female acquaintance using her child support to finance a rental property, I get a look like I just made a play for their teenage daughter.

One devout Christian man in an effort to make his second marriage work waited seven years to consummate the relationship. Once married he of course became her servant and slave. His go to story; arriving home one evening after a week long conference he was told to immediately walk the 8 rescue dogs his loving wife had accumulated against his wishes. He did.

Then there is another acquaintance of mine who was given the standard visitation package of four days a month. He took it without so much as a, fuck you too. His ex wife was planning all along to leave town. To make a fresh start for her new family with the new male. She knew full well he couldn’t maintain his custody days given his work and travel schedule. She simply allowed the required time to pass in order to establish a pattern of custody for the judge. She then petitioned the move, knowing the children’s lives would be perceived by the courts as consistent, in or out of town. Eight years after this guys children were stolen from him, moved to another state and raised by another man his kids now call Dad, he still holds the door open for his ex, picks up the check at lunch meetings, and submits to her infringements on his visitation.

Another individual has an ex that has for years, clearly been neglecting and abusing his son. By this man’s own account, the boy is manifesting serious behavioral and psychological issues affecting his schooling and his health. When I mention her past behavior as a predictor of her intentions within the very texts of which he is currently afflicted and distressed, he literally flicks his hand at me in dismissal and assures himself that this particular situation is legit.

I could of course go on and on and on. The theme in these and all other stories is amazingly consistent. Women are openly fucking with, and fucking over men in droves, pre and post divorce, and men are convincing themselves that this is not happening.

I think most amazing to me is the rationalization of female dominance and control of men by the red pill community. You would think that via the red pill lens, one would be incapable of deluding oneself about the intentions of women and their conscious awareness therein. Yet across the board, red pill men engage in intellectual gymnastics in order to avoid the truth that women own men, and do so pragmatically. Articles and videos alike document the origins and precedents for reproductive strategies and biological imperatives. That women are not conscious of their actions, that they “can’t help it,” that they are on auto pilot and therefore cannot be aware of their behavior much less control it.

Then there is this red pill principle of the male “Burden of Performance.” That in order to have and maintain a healthy stable environment for your kids, you must suppress your biologic imperative, your male nature in all facets of life, and surrender it all to a single female for decades of consumerism and errands, exhausting small talk social engagements, soul sucking meaningless work, and boring mechanical sex. And all to serve the biological parasitic nature of an inherently selfish human being. But hey, she can’t help it so it’s ok. This “burden of performance is just the repackaging and remarketing of male pride designed to satisfy the egos need of delusion.

Why is it that under any and all circumstances, men, even red pill men will not allow themselves to believe women can and should control their behavior? Women are highly pragmatic, focused, intelligent, resourceful, adaptive, manipulative, deceitful, caluous, incapable of guilt, fully self aware of their wants and desires and clearly not afraid to do whatever it takes to get what they want. Why do we try so hard to avoid the truth? That women know exactly what they are doing and will continue to do so until they no longer can. Where is even a modicum of our self respect? Where is your, fuck you too.

I’ll say I have developed an entirely new respect for women. As a collective, in just a hand full of decades, they have completely obliterated any sense of male self-determination. They took it, consciously and methodically, the second the options to do so presented themselves. They have truly created their fantasy world, they know it empirically and point to you, Fredo, as living proof.

Maybe it’s the male mother need. Maybe most men are so satisfied with sex with the same woman, regardless of her appearance, that the price of their dignity, their self respect, their very life, is worth it. Maybe they like being told what to do, when to do it, how to do it, and then being insulted and disrespected when they do. Or maybe, just maybe, men are the weaker sex.

Maybe the natural model for human civilization is the beehive. A model where man is submissive and subservient to the female. That the male’s natural place, his natural disposition is to follow, comply and adhere to female leadership. One only needs to step back and objectively observe our western civilization today to conclude that the hive model is fully deployed and functioning as designed.

Am I wrong?

Teenage boys, dating and sex

Tim Patten · 8 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

For most teen boys 12 and older, sex is everything. In fact, experts have concluded that boys think about the subject every seven seconds. It is natural for males – straight ones – often find themselves deeply attracted to the visual elements of the female persona, including their bodies and the way they do their make-up and present themselves. This fascination with the "seeable" likely explains the persistent interest in sensuous and sexual images in magazines and video games, and porn.

But this is not something that boys and men keep hidden even though boys are shamed when they express most any visual interest in a girl or girls. And, beginning at a young age, females quickly become aware of this male trait, which serves to stoke and stimulate an instinctual interest in attracting the attentions of the opposite sex. Unfortunately, this often sets in motion a toxic feline regimen where significant amounts of time and money are spent on preening and primping in an effort to win out over rivals. Sometimes known as attention whores.

Poor Gender Roles

This intense focus on girls securing male attention, which also includes getting the opposite sex to support them, pamper them, pay for their meals, and, basically, do whatever they want, creates a dynamic that is not necessarily in males' interests. As they grow from boys to teenagers to men, they are left with a problematic vulnerability that can weigh them down and cause significant misery, pain and financial loss in their lives.

However, this doesn't mean boys and men must accept it as destiny, as many have in the past. While the biological impulses ingrained in the male DNA are unlikely to disappear and can't simply be ignored, there is an alternative. This includes mindfulness: gaining a better understanding and making more effort to exert control and to choose a life that is free of selfish female oppression.

Navigating post-adolescence

To do this, young males, in particular, must learn to navigate through their physical and emotional development and the realities of modern romantic encounters. In most cases, sexual urges become an increasingly dominant presence as boys evolve into post-adolescence. It is typical for them to fantasize about sex, have nocturnal emissions, wake up in an aroused state, and experience erections at the most inopportune times.

Young males also tend to gravitate toward friendly and attractive individuals, including girls they might barely know from school or the neighborhood, and they are naturally drawn to pictures and depictions that run the gamut from innocent to prurient. Many will obsessively masturbate to these various images, which they find hard to get out of their heads.

And when it comes to connecting more closely with those who they find sexually appealing, the driving force of heterosexual male biology can readily take over. Increasingly, the idea of having sex – with whomever – and having a girlfriend can become an obsession. This desire is further exacerbated by the pressure to date and, from both peers and the media, have sexual encounters with the opposite sex.

Other factors also play a role. For straight males, they often feel compelled to "prove" they are not gay and are cool enough to have "earned" a girlfriend. They also gain considerable social capital from having "experience" with females, even if the reality is somewhat different. Having a girlfriend is also a hallmark of popularity, which helps enhance a guy's likeability even among those who don't know him well – or at all.

Jealousy and relationship inequality

[image]Unfortunately, many young men become so overwhelmed by primal urges and a desire to be seen as "real men" that it can cause them to lose something of themselves. A compulsion to "couple up" and copulate can undermine decision-making. Over time, they believe they need to sustain a relationship, good or bad, at any cost.

No matter what significant others demand, many will desperately hang in there to avoid being judged in a harsh, less-than-masculine light.

Even when relationships are more “a teenage crush” than “happily ever after,” notions of love and romance can easily become twisted. Whether it’s innate or learned behavior, females – including those who have not quite reached the age of physical or emotional maturity – seem to fully understand what they need to do to manipulate and control males, especially in close personal relationships.

For males in their teenage years or later, they learn soon enough what they can and cannot do, regardless of whether it is their preference or in their best interests. They experience female jealousy first-hand, and find the individuals they care so deeply about repeatedly correcting their behavior, often through violence. If they so much as look at somebody else, they can suffer all sorts of verbal and physical abuse. But usually never push back on the abusive female.

As they grow older, they increasingly find that the women they are enamored with – and even those they are not – make effective use of social shaming and other tactics designed to gain an advantage over, secure revenge on, or emasculate males, helping to ensure they become weak and ineffective. In marriages and other committed relationships, they end up firmly dependent on female partners and subservient to their needs and desires, whatever they are.

Unfortunately, many males don’t quite understand that this is not right and needs to be resisted, even at the risk of ending a relationship, to avoid setting themselves up for myriad problems later on. If they enable the abuser and kowtow to female demands – whether rational or not – they become subsumed into a submissive gender role that can haunt them forever.

But there is more to it than that. By failing to grasp what is going on and either rejecting or correcting the situation, males end up increasing the risk that other females will act similarly toward them in future. In fact, they’ll likely seek out relationships that ensure this will happen. Over time, they’ll be unable to express their passions or achieve their dreams and ambitions, and they’ll find themselves in a very dark place.

Breakup and vindictive revenge

Making matters worse for teenage males, in particular, are the realities of youthful relationships. Typically, “puppy love” doesn’t last long, and often ends with an emotionally devastating breakup. Unfortunately, “getting dumped” can lead former female partners to fling character-assassination arrows and innuendo toward exes in an effort to show how terrible they are, and to ensure they are seen as the undesirable ones.

Things tend to get worse as people age. In a sense, what happens in school is just a training ground for the catalog of abuses that many adult women are happy to dole out toward men, especially in relationships where children and jointly owned assets are involved. In the end, men don’t just end up with their characters and lives being shredded; ex-partners also take their children and a hefty share of their assets away from them.

A life of hell

To be sure, there are good reasons why people opt to have children, but there can also be major downsides to bringing another life into the world. If a man does anything that may lead to a pregnancy, especially with someone who is not truly the “one,” he has increased the risk that his life will become hell. Aside from being legally and financially responsible for his offspring for decades to come, he will be forced to bear the burden with someone he doesn’t really care about.

To ensure biological urges don’t undermine rationality and lead to suffering rather than satisfaction, males must understand the realities of intimate relationships. Among other things, it is not uncommon for pregnancy to be a driving force in many women, who might not hesitate to do whatever is necessary to have a child. Given that, men must take appropriate measures and only choose this path voluntarily. They must also be in a position to manage all of the financial and emotional burdens involved.

Conclusion

Sex is men's Achilles' heel. It can lead to poor choices both early on and later in life, allowing females to take advantage of what has proved to be a dangerous vulnerability. Adding to the challenges, boys and young men are growing up in a society that is full of obstacles, razor wire, and boobytraps that can sidetrack their natural passions, goals and aspirations. If they fail to realize their full potential, then everyone is a loser, regardless of sex.

In contrast, if they are given tools and guidance from the start that help ensure they move in the right direction, unhealthy and unwelcome outcomes can be avoided. Boys and young men must be taught to understand the realities of male biology and relationships with females. With mentoring, enhanced understanding and a true sense of purpose, most young men can avoid the pitfalls and create the miracles that benefit society and themselves.

Only a bird in a gildered cage

Doug Mortimer · 8 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The other day I got a Prager U. pop-up on entrepreneurship featuring George Gilder. I hadn't given him any thought in years, but my curiosity was aroused. So I Googled him and came across an interview in which he was touting his new book called, ironically enough, Life After Google, in which he praises and appraises Blockchain. Not a topic embraced by too many 80-year-old authors.

You probably never heard of George Gilder, but he was something of a pioneer in the manosphere – so much so that that term was not in existence during his heyday. Predictably, he was often dismissed as a troglodyte, but in his heyday he could take the heat and dish it out.

George Franklin Gilder was born in New York in 1939. A child of privilege, he graduated from Phillips Exeter Academy and Harvard, from which he graduated in 1962. He worked as a speechwriter for establishment Republicans such as George Romney, Richard Nixon, and Nelson Rockefeller (brother David Rockefeller was the college roommate of Gilder's father) before he returned to Harvard as a fellow at the Harvard Institute of Politics. Over the years, he contributed to a number of mainstream publications, including Harper's, The New York Times Magazine, Playboy, The Economist, American Spectator, Harvard Business Review, The Wall Street Journal, and The National Review.

While serving as editor of The Ripon Forum, a mainstream Republican journal (so-called because Ripon, Wisconsin was where the Republican Party was born in 1854), he wrote an article defending President Nixon's veto of a federal day-care bill. For espousing and promoting this view, he was relieved of his duties. Having discovered that one dare not challenge gynocentrism (yet another word not in use at the time), he happened upon the theme that would establish his public profile: male backlash but with an intellectual bent. So in 1973 he offered the book Sexual Suicide as a manifesto of sorts.

Today there would be nothing revelatory in the book but it appeared in the wake of Second Wave feminist books taken very seriously by the intelligentsia. Many of the authors (e.g., Gloria Steinem, Germaine Greer, Andrea Dworkin) became celebrities and their words still have the power of holy writ among the gender studies crowd. Women's lib (as feminism was then known) and male chauvinism (as patriarchy/male privilege was then known) provided fodder for a number of stand-up comedians but there wasn't much serious pushback against it. One major exception was the 1971 publication of The Prisoner of Sex by Norman Mailer, who had become something of a punching bag for feminists. Then along came Gilder, who won the "Male Chauvinist Pig" award (wresting the title from Mailer) from Time magazine in 1974.

Gilder's book took on egalitarianism, feminism, hedonism, and the welfare state, which remain formidable targets today. To put his arguments in context, however, it must be noted that feminism was just one aspect of what was termed the sexual revolution. Underneath this very broad umbrella were open marriage, the Playboy philosophy, gay liberation, in vitro fertilization, the birth control pill, the increasing acceptance of cohabitation, the mainstreaming of pornography, and singles bars, which proved to be something of a forerunner of hookup culture.

In addition to feminist titles, the non-fiction best-seller list in those days featured the likes of Everything You Always Wanted to Know About Sex (But Were Afraid to Ask), The Joy of Sex, and Human Sexual Response (more popularly known as Masters & Johnson, after the authors), which were reviewed and discussed ad nauseam on radio and TV talk shows.

Then there was the little matter of Roe v. Wade in January 1973. Abortion, one of the most shameful acts a woman could commit, was now perfectly legal. The aftershocks from that jolt continue to this day and show no sign of receding.

Looking back, it might be difficult to understand what all the fuss was about, as the new normal has long since encompassed those changes. More to the point, these abrupt changes were not the result of another world war, depression, famine, or plague. They were an offshoot of peace and prosperity. One might offer Vietnam as an antagonist, but that conflict had little material effect on the home front. If you weren't drafted, if none of your male relatives was in the military, you could go your merry way.

I often hearken back to an incident that illustrates just how quickly times had changed. In the spring of 1969 I visited a suburban cinema to see The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie, a tale of a "progressive" teacher at a conservative school in Edinburgh in the 1930s. At one point in the movie there is a very brief nude scene involving Pamela Franklin, who is modeling at a life class for artists. The audience in the movie theater let out an audible gasp during the scene. Three years later that same theater was showing Deep Throat. I didn't see the movie there so I can't comment on the audience reaction. The moviegoers may have responded audibly but probably not with gasping.

The temper of the times was one of liberation, and not just of women. Notably, other bestsellers of the day included The Greening of America (1970), claiming that the millennium was just around the corner and all our dreams would come true. A more ominous tome from the same year was Future Shock, which asserted that human beings were not capable of assimilating rapid social change and instability was the likely result. "The problem in the United States seems to be that we are getting what we want," asserted Gilder. It's a variation on the old "Be careful what you wish for" theme. When AIDS appeared several years later, a number of pundits, not all of them preachers, opined that it was an inevitable consequence of the sexual revolution, and the party was over. Yet it proved to be little more than a speed bump on the Hedonism Highway.

As sex was becoming more and more divorced from procreation, Gilder opined that a falling birth rate indicated people who had lost faith in the future, no matter how much their material prospects improved. "Like the Pentagon, our social science often reduces all phenomena to dollars and body counts," noted Gilder.

Though MGTOW was not a thing when Gilder was taking on feminism, he would probably not have sanctioned it. In fact, he thought single men (and women) were a social problem. To a large degree, he believed that it was better for men to be married than single, and better for society to have more married men that bachelors. Married men make more money because they have to. They have families to support. When both men and women go their own way, civilization is the ultimate victim.

Gilder's opinions were based more on nature than nurture. An intellectual cross-current in those days was sociobiology, which was anything but egalitarian, as it explored the inevitability of hierarchy and sex role separation. Gilder referenced the work of ethologists, psychologists, biologists, and anthropologists who were still able to publish in those days even though their message clashed with the dominant liberal ethos. While liberalism and feminism were all the rage in academia, the true believers had not attained veto power over dissenting opinions. Today Gilder and his ilk would likely be shouted off the Harvard campus if they dared to cross the Charles River into Cambridge.

Taking up the cudgel once more in 1974, Gilder came out with Naked Nomads: Unmarried Men in America. A number of the issues he dealt with sound very familiar today. Again, he lamented the squandering of male energy that should have been put to use advancing or at least sustaining families, societies, and civilization. In an ideal world, a man should be "a valuable and constructive citizen." He duly noted that formal education was geared more to girls than to boys, that divorce was harder on men than on women and pointed to the deterioration of the black family as a sign of dysfunction, not liberation. Perhaps anticipating MGTOW, he noted, "The degree to which women take power seems to depend on the extent to which the men are absent."

Unlike a number of authors, Gilder chose not to keep writing the same book over and over again (in 1986 Sexual Suicide was revised and reprinted as Men and Marriage). As his recent Prager U. pop-up indicates, Gilder was big on capitalism and free enterprise. In fact, that's where he has focused his efforts since the heyday of second-wave feminism.

Gilder's rejection of feminism was probably embarrassing enough to his establishment peers, but his embrace of free markets and capitalism really made him persona non grata. In 1986 he was awarded the White House Award for Entrepreneurial Excellence by Ronald Reagan. I can't think of a better way to permanently sever ties with academia.

No matter where you have your tent pitched in the manosphere, if you read Gilder today, you will find little to encourage the MRA or MGTOW agenda. Remember, those concepts did not exist when he wrote his books. It may be tempting to dismiss him as a tradcon, but keep in mind that is yet another word that didn't exist in the mid-1970s. Putting the best light possible on Gilder, it should be remembered that he was one of a very few intellectuals willing to swim against the tide. That he not only survived but prospered proves how strong a swimmer he was.

Today Gilder's critics have one more arrow in their quiver should they choose to take aim at him. He is now that most dreaded of all human beings: an old white male. The only lower status is a dead white male.

A lot of people will be glad when you're dead, you rascal you.

The Unbearable Pettiness of Academic Race and Gender Politics

It's the betrayal

Scott Thomas · 8 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

My intention in these articles is an attempt to be part of the solution. To bring to bear some potential insights and observations which, now processed through the red pill lens, may have some strategic merit for the roadmap to a better life. That said, in solving any problem, one must first define it. This can be achieved by subscribing to An Ear for Men and listening to each and every one of Paul's talks, repeatedly, for two to three years. When you're done you'll need to wear welders goggles when engaging women and men so not to be blinded by the consistent eruptions of phosphorus red light emanating from their mouths.

So, now that we understand the problem, let's talk about it in the context of our objectives.

I feel betrayed. More a symptom than a problem I agree, but this appears to be, for myself and for so many other men, a root issue that remains consistent throughout the grieving and healing process from divorce. I suspect it will be with many of us to our end day.

So why is that?

I think it is many things, not the least of which is our fathers. There are no doubt many fathers that bonded with their sons, treated them with love and respect, like individuals, and fostered a relationship in which trust was established. Said dad provided some or much wisdom to his boy, which was received and registered given the nature of the relationship. Thus allowing the young man to better navigate life's terrain having an awareness of its topography.

Now as always, the devil is in the details and I suspect that more often than not, those pearls of wisdom were centered around the acceptance of a man's role as family workhorse. That it is the man's role to work, to provide, and then when home, to continue working at the behest of his wife. Even without any verbal communication between father and son, this is the message most boys receive, and commit to memory.

For myself, as with many men, my father's mentorship began and ended with the non verbal message above. Full stop. He believed fully in his blue pill role and that it was his purpose. Nothing else need be communicated. And nothing was.

I must say, my father was a good man. He was a family man. He provided well and gave me a few, once in a lifetime experiences. His marriage functioned as it was intended to function. It was a business arrangement and my mother executed her traditional role well and with intention. My father worked hard all his life, retired, then passed away five years later.

So, with a total absence of truth or practical knowledge regarding women, romantic love, marriage, debt finance, or professional disposition, I ran deeper into the trap from which would inevitably spring a profound betrayal.

As an aside, I can hear the echo of Paul's mantra, "There are no victims, just volunteers." This is a critical principle and I am grateful for it as it has guided me forward through my process. That said, it is a rare school aged boy that has the independent and objective self awareness to reject the ubiquitous and all encompassing gynocentric conditioning. We must give ourselves grace and understand that without guidance to the contrary, ones casting in the gynocentric narrative is a lock. But I digress.

The set up now complete, the young man enters adult life and proceeds to build his house of cards. The objective is of course to create the picture postcard life and family our narrative has directed. This is essentially the sole objective of a man's life in the gynocentric model. It is that blue pill life and it is mapped both genetically and through environmental conditioning, into our cerebral cortex. Neuroplasticity aside, it is a model that looks to be with us for life. I submit that in today's climate and with the mans values intact, the success of this model rest almost completely with the woman. Specifically, on her being an equal and competent partner. Anyone care to give odds?

So we forge ahead, guided by the media and women's manipulations, totally unaware that we are betting our entire life's focus and future, on female integrity.

We choose and court our wife. She mirrors our interests, is easy going, fun. The sex is good, often epic and she is more than willing to do it all, anywhere you please. You are free to hang with the boys, take trips. She tells you everything you want and need to hear. She respects you and praises your accomplishments at work. Little about you bothers her. She assures you any concerns you may have are non issues and you accept. Why? Because it would be totally insane for someone to lie about who they are and what they want in order to get you to marry.

Our conditioning has us believing, falsely and to our detriment, that women and men are the same and as such, think the same. The idea that your wife to be, is flat out acting or lying to your face during courtship never even makes the radar. How could it? For a young man, it is all a validation of the gynocentric narrative. The gynocentric long con. We believe it is love. Romantic love. A real connection with a women that shares all our interests and desires. It is exactly what you expected. It is the beginning of a new chapter in the linear life narrative. It is the beginning of happily ever after.

In reality, she says and does whatever is required to close the deal. To lock you down. To get married. Courtship for her is akin to an audition, an interview for the position of Mrs. You.

The marriage ceremony, the vows, the reading of Corinthians. This entire con is straightforward genius. Just take a moment to read the first paragraph of Corinthians, a staple of virtually all weddings.

> 1 Corinthians 13:4-13 4 Love is patient, love is kind. It does not envy, it does not boast, it is not proud. 5 It does not dishonor others, it is not self-seeking, it is not easily angered, it keeps no record of wrongs. 6 Love does not delight in evil but rejoices with the truth. 7 It always protects, always trusts, always hopes, always perseveres.

Women do not envy? are not self seeking? They rejoice in truth? Are you fucking kidding me?

Post state licensing and a few years later, easily eighty percent of all married men are living with the total opposite of the Corinthians passage. And this is where the betrayal begins to be exposed. We wake up fully rooted in the marriage asking ourselves where all the benefits are for which we signed up. What happened to all that love and respect? It's just not coming across in the constant nagging, belittlements, and "teasing." In the domination of the house, it's décor and how we are told to live in it. In who lives in it, such as her mother, cousin, friends. A home which we acquired and for which we pay and make possible.

How is it that she thinks its ok to practice blackmail and use the vindictive strategy of happy wife, happy life? Why does she believe she can consciously interference with and spoil our personal entertainments and activities? Who does this person think she is?

Fast forward a few more years and most men have either succumbed and accepted life as her worker bee, or are on the brink of divorce due to their inability or unwillingness to accept constant disrespect and abuse while simultaneously having to comply with mandatory adulation of their abuser. And it seems that both paths happen regardless of how much the man capitulates or sets boundaries, changes or says No, tolerates and forgives. The standard among eighty percent of marriages seems clear, it's her way or the highway. Sweetheart to sweatshop, without a doubt, it is a betrayal.

Now I cannot comment on the worker bees or those that take the "cheaper to keep her" route. That sit in their cars for hours at the park after work so as not to go home. That think the cost of curtains is subject matter for humor at their quarterly "guys night out." I have no insights for those men that take pride in being her foot stool. That believe her being on a first name basis with the body shop is cute. That don't realize her exalted multi tasking skills are merely doing a few routine chores very badly.

However, I can comment on the ultimate betrayal. And that is the destruction of your family. The shockingly callus and conscious actions she takes that, in her mind, replace the male in "her" family. For whatever reason she deems suitable.

It is a betrayal beyond words. It is, to quote Paul Elam, “our sacred narrative leading us straight into a brick wall.” It is of course the profound loss of all that you had envisioned for your life. Of a family life, of vacations, of memories, of the nightly routine of tucking your kids into their beds. It is without question, a betrayal of the worst kind. And it is final. There is no crafting a “new normal” that will be your true family unit. Its done. And we have to live with it every day for the rest of our lives. Trying to make lemonade out of lemons.

One may argue you cannot hold such women to account for behaving by design, but I disagree. Men curtail much of their nature and biological drives all the time. A prime example being the suppression of our drive to “spread seeds.” This suppression of male nature is, in fact, a cornerstone of marriage. Its also a control tactic for women to ensure we don’t move our utility and resource to another female, or even share it. Nonetheless, we do it willingly and lovingly. Yet in today’s “evolved” society of equality and woke culture, women think nothing of employing unfiltered, self-serving and destructive behavior without so much as a second thought about the impact on their own children, much less the man that delivered on his side of the contract.

Is this red pill rage? Nope. Is this a bitter tirade? Wrong again Chachi. It is an elucidation of our betrayal. It is the documenting of the failing of fathers, the life long manipulation of our nature, and the control tactics women systematically impose on all men. And it should blow your fucking mind. Only from an understanding and recognition of what is actually going on here, be it consciously or unconsciously, can we formulate a plan and strategy to help our boys.

Look, life offers no guarantees to be sure. But do you want your boys to base their most fundamental life decisions on a narrative we now know to not only be false, but deeply deceptive? A narrative, regardless of origin or conscious intent, designed to delude your son to the degree he willingly walks into his own prison cell? You want him to bet his life on female integrity?

The gynocentric narrative of till death do you part is more than alive and well. Yet the pool of viable women is rapidly shrinking. Our boys are graduating into a world focused on fabricating an illusion of female greatness, the me too bowel movement, a rise in personality disorders, and worst of all, legions of women raised in fatherless homes. Can anyone say “daddy issues.”

Send my boys into this shit storm using a manipulative fantasy as the basis of their reality?

Not on my watch.

As always, it falls to Men

Scott Thomas · 8 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

As a child, I always wondered why my family spent so much time doing things that appeared, at least to me, to be without meaning or merit. Church, for example, was clearly an obligation. No one looked to be enjoying anything. We bounced up and down off our knees with the frequency of a fluffer on a Houston set. I was required to wear an abrasive polyester three piece suit and to follow dutifully as the family engaged in scripted banter with other cue card carrying members of society.

My father worked hard, was rarely home and when he was he slept or worked on the house and car. My mother was simply obsessed with other people's opinions.

Nothing was ever discussed about love, life, or the pursuit of happiness. I can only assume their reasons being that it took everything they had just to paint all the numbers in the picture window each month. Passing acquaintances and strangers caring little or not at all.

I just didn't get it.

And so I was determined to do it my way. I was going to execute this life, my marriage and my family in a way that would focus on us and not "them." We were going to be an autonomous unit of love. Singularly resolute in our loyalty, not only for each other but to our life and our pursuit of happiness. I choose my wife based off a deep and thorough analysis of consumer advertising and movie characters. I of course knew women were caring, deeply compassionate, forgiving and fundamentally altruistic. I was excited with the prospect of an iron trust and my ability to be vulnerable with my wife, my one true love, my soulmate. We married in a picturesque church and danced on the bay. Surrounded by wildlife, all in attendance celebrated God's true love.

But then something very odd, something very unexpected began to happen. As my time passed, confusion began to emerge and grow. Why was it my responsibility to put the seat down so that my equal did not actually fall in the toilet? Was my mind slipping because I was sure I had repeatedly told her that account was critical not to be used? How is my flying out at 3:30 am to be by her side all day at her work function not good enough?

It was clear I had a lot of work to do to be a better man. I even questioned my viability at the office. How could I possibly continue to distil complex technologies and abstractions into simple digestible terms for large audiences if I couldn't even communicate effectively with my soulmate? To a person who I knew was deeply concerned with my opinions, my desires, and my needs.

I would improve, I would change, I would fix this.

Of course what I finally came to realize was that she did not give a single fuck what I thought or wanted unless it met with her agenda. It was always, from the very beginning, all about her.

And this is the point gents. The baseline. The big picture. This is the salient fact with which we all need to come to terms. It is the catalyst by which the destruction of the family unit and the raising of healthy children is realized. It is a truth in need of balance. And one unchecked, will inevitably lead to chaos and destruction.

In my marriage, it is truth that the actions of my spouse were a focused and premeditated approach to enhance her life through the continuous and constant utilization of myself and my utility, without compunction or moral constraint. A conscious approach to use me for her own gain, and at my expense. This is also the red pill consensus on female nature.

Let's now view that statement with the subject being Men.

It is the nature of males to enhance their lives through the use of female labor, their disposability, and expendability. In this indifferent use and disposal of females, the male feels no guilt or morality.

It appears that while female nature is an intelligent and necessary approach for the survival of offspring, it is clearly a destructive force post a survival based civilization. It matters not the rational evolutionary path of female nature. It matters not how female nature metastasized in modern times to an abject indifference and abuse of the very people that made their luxury and lives possible. What matters is what we do now. What we do for our sons.

Modern day gynocentrism is a model whereby men are fully controlled for the sole purpose of meaningless survival and entertainments. It is an abject waste of a man's life and creativity. A waste of experience, learning, adventure, growth, and the ability to pass real wisdom to our sons. Wisdom that will allow our sons to begin their journey of life exploration from a plane far beyond the illusions we inherited. Modern day gynocentrism is, I would argue, the curtailing of the human spirit and its potential.

Gentlemen, we are being played and women are more than aware.

Rejecting this modern day gynocentric model is our charge and our responsibility to our boys. I also submit it is our responsibility to our ancestors. To all the men that did what they had to do for true survival. For food and shelter, literally. For fighting the wars to ensure our freedom and to see us use that freedom in the true service of our children, ourselves, and our society. Not some nagging abusive oppressive sow.

So ask yourself, for yourself and for your boys. What would the world be like now with all our technology and safety and medicine if Men, the gender that loves to contemplate, that has ambition, that strives for excellence and accomplishment, what would be if those millions were conditioned to simply be who they are, who they know themselves to be, that for which they were born. To be free to pursue, explore and understand that self at the earliest of age and continue that path for life. The next generation picking up where they left off.

What would this world look like?

Get a heal job

Scott Thomas · 8 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

I've heard it all my life. "Get a real job." The statement always delivered as the breath of God. The message being of course that there is a truth and a reality that every human being on earth understands, everyone but you. You are naive, you are foolish, and you simply don't get it.

The statement is generally, and curiously, delivered by mothers, girlfriends, and wives. The frequency will increase dramatically if you actually make it to the long and lonely road one must walk when seeking a symbiotic relationship with his innate professional disposition. Or as I tell my boys, when pursuing something you're good at, and love. If you are hit with get a real job early in youth, the impact of the statement can be a crushing elimination of your desire and intention. Later on, it is designed to create self doubt, anxiety, and fear.

It is a statement that can and does put an end to a man's self-discovery, self-awareness, and self-actualization. It may in fact be one of the most destructive and controlling strategies in the Gynocentric model.

Here's why.

High school may just be the time in our lives where we have developed the cognitive ability and independence to recognize our likes and dislikes, our passions and our talents. It is precisely at this critical juncture in our lives, that we become completely smothered in the thick wet quilt of money and status marketing. In consumerism. Having been blue pill primed from birth via schooling, socialization, blue pill "men" and mothers, we sprint through puberty and into our narcotic desire for females with the only narrative we have ever known. A narrative that is given no thought whatsoever so long as it gets us the girl.

And of course, it does. That is what girls want, a real man with a real job. Exactly, like daddy.

And so it goes. For most of us, we follow the blue boy script to the letter, make a guesstimate at best, at a professional path post schooling and then go balls deep into the debt based financed economy. Twenty years later you may tell yourself, "This is not my beautiful house" and you may tell yourself, "This is not my beautiful wife" and you may ask yourself, "How do I work this?" and you may say to yourself, "My God! What have I done?"

So, want to avoid waking up at 43, trapped with only the choice of staying in the pan or jumping into the fire?

Get a heal job.

What is a heal job you say?

- It is work that you understand, it makes sense to you, you get it.
- It is work that you are good at, even great at.
- It is work you like, it is work you love.
- It is a work in which you lose your sense of time. It is a work in which you forget to eat. Where the day literally goes by in about an hour.
- It is work that suits your personality, capitalizes on your strengths and has clear options for your weaknesses.
- It is work that allows you to have the patience of Job.
- It is work that allows you to psychologically and emotionally weather financial storms, and long periods of difficulty.
- It is work that delivers positive stress, not negative stress.
- It is work that allows you to easily forgive yourself and others for mistakes and failures.
- It is work that gives you self esteem, self respect, and confidence regardless of financial benefit.
- It is work that will allow you to be kind, empathetic, and your very best self.
- It is work that will give you a better understanding of others.
- It is work that shows you who you are, that gives you contentment, even happiness.

● It is work that will give you the awesome power of Know thy Self.

When you truly know yourself, you are content. Life is easier. People and circumstance bother you less and little.

Your work provides an internally driven purpose, for your day and depending on how you envision your work, maybe for your life. You will have an innate drive that simply cannot be manipulated or controlled by women and provide contrast for quick awareness when they attempt to do so.

It will give you an independence from which to engage the world. An independence in which to engage women. It will make your life, yours. Not hers. It is your protection and a constant reminder of who you are, what you want, and how you live.

And critically, it may be the only opportunity for our sons to increase their odds for a healthy relationship with a women and an optimized family life.

Get a heal job. It is as close to a silver bullet as I can imagine for life in this modern Gynocentric world and it will make you, a real man.

The social media crusade against free thought continues

Paul Elam · 8 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

I woke this morning to find my Facebook account had been deleted by the social media giant. No explanation was given, just a nice, tidy note informing me that I no longer exist. At least according to Facebook.

Of course, none of this is new. I was lifetime banned from Twitter nearly a year ago for tweeting news stories about women who had either publicly admitted to, or had been convicted of, falsely accusing men of rape. In the case of Twitter, they did offer me the explanation that Tweeting legitimate news stories about rape liars was equivalent to targeting them for harassment. Twitter made it clear that they wanted news stories about dangerous people silenced when those people were women and they were just hurting men.

I almost wish Twitter had taken the Facebook route of evading explanation, settling for the more 'mean girl' method they employed to silence me on that platform. Knowing Twitter's rationale didn't make matters any more reasonable or less scary.

Of course, my story is just a microcosm of what is happening on a much larger scale with the great majority of social media platforms working collectively to silence anyone whose political views fall anywhere right of Mao.

In their fervor to crush dissent from the views of fascistic Millennials and benighted Gen Z cubical clones, social media platforms have become like telephone companies who monitor what you talk about on the phone and cut the line when you say something they don't like.

The political right, purportedly the guardians of our personal liberties, have been feckless and impotent in the face of this very real crusade against free thought. Clinging blindly to 1970's Libertarian mentality, they are more apt to rush to the defense of these virtual monopolies, mindlessly ignoring their unprecedented power over people and the society they live in. They are to modern political discourse what tin cans and string are to modern communication.

Welcome one and all to the future of leftist control, courtesy of the gutless, clueless right.

Mike Buchanan tells a radical feminist what she needs to hear most: to shut up

A treatise on the impact of gynocentrism

Jermelle MacLeod · 8 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Males are in an ideological, psychological, and societal crisis. Fourth-wave feminism is dominating schools, men are committing suicide at an astronomical rate, and men are beginning to lag behind in practically every field that was once dominated by men; what happened?

The cause of the aforementioned issues can be narrowed down to the dominance of Fourth-wave feminism and the maintenance of self-sacrificial values tossed upon men.

For example, the dominance of feminism forces men to take a back seat until something physically demanding and risky needs to be done. Say, a woman is having an issue carrying a fridge up the stairs; she will then expect a man or a group of men to either help her or do it for her, the male will be forced to comply lest the shaming that will be bestowed upon him if he refuses.

In order to fully understand the conundrum men find themselves in today, it's necessary to understand the ideological justification behind fourth-wave feminism.

Building upon the premise of first-wave feminism, second, third and fourth-wave feminists believe that women are still marginalized in the opportunistic and societal expectational sense. Or, in more simplistic terms; women don't have opportunities and can't do whatever the hell they want.

The former claim is simply false in practically every sense. According to The Atlantic, "Where men once went to college in proportions far higher than women—58 percent to 42 percent as recently as the 1970s—the ratio has now almost exactly reversed." This is absolutely important because of the logic which follows this statistic; with women dominating colleges, it follows that women will dominate the jobs that require a college degree. Opportunities for women are simply endless; all they have to do is work for which opportunity they choose to take.

As for the latter claim, that women are marginalized in the expectational sense, this can also be debunked by looking around and comparing the past to the present in practically every way. Women are beginning to dominate commanding and operational positions and are dressing in ways that absolutely defy the expectations men had in the past; both claims are simply baseless. Women are no longer expected to be housewives and dress conservatively, absolutely not, women can do whatever they please due to the liberation modern feminism have given them.

I bring this up not to argue against women's rights, not at all, I simply don't care about women or women's rights because the majority are already doing so…I'm more concerned about the effect this type of ideology has men and the men of the future. This wouldn't concern me unless it affected me and the future I have in mind for my children and my precious little brother.

Men appear to be getting the leftovers of what women don't want to do. Both in the educational sense and the occupational sense. Take for example the fact that women are absolutely dominating the educational fields of Education, Psychology, Health Professions, Foreign Languages, English, Communication, Journalism and Art, while men are left to sweep up the majors that they find too crude or "nerdy" such as Computer Science and Engineering. Despite the obvious fact that men have contributed extraordinary amounts to all the fields women are currently dominating, men are pushed off to the side and are forced to take the majors they don't want due to their complexity of physical demands. Take for example the fact that men make up an overwhelming majority of jobs that require physical demands and are inherently dangerous such as construction and heavy vehicle and mobile equipment service technicians and mechanics are men.

This, I believe, is a direct result of women having more of a say in occupational matters due to the ideological demands of fourth-wave feminism as well as female nature itself. Women, by nature, are physically weaker and less intellectually diverse than men. Due to the physical weakness of women, and lack of intellectual diversity, we men are forced to take jobs that require physical strength and extreme amounts of intellectual flexibility, while women take office/desk jobs with pleasure, and since fourth-wave feminism insists on giving women more of a say in matters due to their "oppression." Furthermore, men are still expected to be pawns and sacrifice themselves whenever told to… all of this adds up to men having practically no say in their destinies due to the societal pressure they're constantly under.

All of this pressure contributes to the disheartening fact that men make up an astronomical amount of all suicides; approximately 80%. Imagine the pressure boys are under in schools when they're being told that women are oppressed by a patriarchal system that they and their ancestors are guilty of as well as being told to avoid showing "toxic masculinity."

Furthermore, men are under massive amounts of pressure on college campuses due to the pro-feminist climate as well as the staggering possibility of regret women face when confronted with their own drunken errors, in short; women's irresponsibility and sexual promiscuity can easily result in a man being thrown in jail.

It's a rather horrendous time to be a man.

But enough doom and gloom… what exactly can we do about this?

Well, it seems as if the first logical step is to destroy the ideological foundations second, third and fourth-wave feminism is built upon; and that can only be done by constantly showing feminists and "the powers that be" the effects of this horrendous ideology and pressuring them to look at reality for how it really is… an upside down matriarchal society in which men are disposable and under societal and psychological pressure caused by the phenomenological dissonance between the feminist narrative and the crushing reality that men constantly face.

After the ideological foundations of feminism are uprooted… it's necessary for the men's rights movement to become publicized and seek out media attention and use this time to not bash feminists, even though I admit it's quite entertaining to do so, but use it to rationally debunk the arguments third and fourth-wave feminists condescendingly repeat.

But, I believe, the most important step of all is making sure the propaganda being shoved down the throats of boys we can help doesn't solidify itself in their minds. If you're a male figure in the life of a boy please, I beg of you, make sure the lies the school and social system are pushing doesn't solidify itself into their beautiful but moldable minds… if our boys continue to be indoctrinated with the lies feminists are pushing I see a very bleak future characterized by boys being unable to be themselves… in every way, shape, and form.

Natty Kadifa does the honey badger like a boss

Recently, Mike Buchanan and Elizabeth Hobson, two British MRAs who need no introduction, participated in a speaking engagement at Cambridge University. Needless to say, there were some intellectual ne're do wells there who were opposed to giving men's issues such a prestigious platform. And while I understand the talks were well received, the dissenters saw fit to assault Mike Buchanan via the latest fad in dumb-as-a-fence-post protesting, known as milkshaking.

Enter another name that will soon be as familiar to you as Mike and Elizabeth. Natty Kadifa. Natty witnessed what happened and reacted to it like, well, like a honey badger, as you can see in this video that she had the presence of mind to take while she was accosting the pathetic little coward who tossed a milkshake on Mike.

The thumbnail of this video is the actual milkshake being thrown at Mike.

I was so impressed watching this. Natty managed to deny the assaultive idiot escape, she also caught her sycophantic male goon accomplice on camera white knighting for said idiot. Single-handedly, she captured the essence of feminist SJWs, cowardly thugs that they are.

For those of you attending ICMI'19 in Chicago this August, Natty will be there among a very large group of friends who will deservedly treat her like a rock star.

Way to go, Natty!

Men. Women. Relationships. Surviving the Plague of Modern Masculinity (a review)

Peter Wright · 8 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

It's with some excitement that I get to announce the release of a new book on the topic of men and relationships, penned by an author who has studied and expounded on this vexed topic for over 20 years.

The timing of this book couldn't be better, with relationships between men and women increasingly severed from the gendered customs that once sustained them. The myths that once guided us toward mature, sustainable love are now cut to the quick by the sword of postmodernism. The result of that assault renders modern relationships chronically disoriented; in decay. This is not to say that relationship models of the past were without serious flaws and oppressive proscriptions. However, such complaints, while important, pale in comparison to the potential squandered by postmodern struggles; relationships concerned solely with power and control. We've traded in love and mutual reliance for a gender war, waged in an atmosphere of unabashed, socially sanctioned misandry.

Welcome to the brave new world.

Well-meaning solutions are as prolific as diet fads, each promising to put your life back on track. Such 'solutions' offer novel ways to repackage traditional gynocentrism; empty promotion of pussy hounding; feminist-inspired sycophancy; or alternatively a complete withdrawal from relationships and the world – strategies that rarely succeed in protecting us from the feelings of emptiness that plague modern relationships and which may even make the problem worse, with a few notable exceptions.

One of the more remarkable exceptions appears in the writings of Paul Elam which, as luck would have it, are now gathered into one volume entitled Men. Women. Relationships. Surviving The Plague of Modern Masculinity. In this work he digs deep into how we came to sexual warfare, while offering believable strategies to men on how to navigate through the mess and avoid many of the dangers.

Wary of the traditionalist's appeal to relationship models existing before the appearance of feminism and post-modernism, Elam maps out a different viewpoint– i.e., not a nostalgia for more male chivalry and porcelain ladies of the past, nor for an engineered future utopia as described by today's woke SJWs. Instead he proposes a classical solution based on upholding of individual freedom and liberty between relationship partners. That path, he writes, is based on appreciation of male humanity and particularly the affording of value to men rather than reducing them to mere utility.

Elam suggests that while severance from our gynocentric past is a liberating event for men, we still require a compass to give meaningful direction to our lives – because most men will still choose to remain in or seek relationships with women, even as some will justifiably swear off them. That compass, he contends, is the cultivation of strong personal values, including the ability to say 'No' when our personal values are being ignored, disrespected or refused. By sticking with our values – and demanding to be valued – we men can find a way out of the malaise and into meaningful engagement with the world. Or, as he puts it in the text, "Men are only as mentally and emotionally healthy as their ability to say no to a woman."

For me personally these essays have helped to know where to place thick red lines that mark acceptable and unacceptable interactions between myself and the opposite sex, while also knowing to act when those lines are crossed. The result in my own relationships with women has been palpable, positive, and soul-preserving.

Written with humour and directness, Elam pulls no punches in his assessment of the modern relationship scene, while offering a path away from servitude toward a life of freedom that makes Men. Women. Relationships. Surviving The Plague of Modern Masculinity nothing less than a Red Pill Bible for modern man. If you are a man looking for a reliable way to navigate modern relationships, then this book is definitely for you.

Scott Adams, persuasion, and halting the automatic outgroup derogation of men

Jewel Eldora · 8 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

In 2017, Justine R. Damond was shot and killed while I was writing a series about men's lack of ingroup bias and the effects this has in men, as a group, in legal, social, and moral spheres.

I ended that series asking readers to ensure that the cop who killed her get a fair trial. As no one at AFVM is surprised, nothing like that is happening and no one is outraged. I have two predictions, one is that next week everyone will have an opinion on this, and the other is that it will likely be assigned to them.

For what it's worth, I've never justified the laws and policies that make police homicide legal, the "thin blue line," or Noor's human resources record.

My request all along has been that men pay attention and do what they can to ensure that Noor gets a fair trial.

So far I've been unpersuasive, for reasons I could have predicted before I ever started writing for AVFM. Men, as it turns out, do not have the mechanism for automatic ingroup bias. Unlike women, men need some similarity or group affiliation in order to overcome their bias against one another. Being a cop, being Muslim, being Somali, black, or white might work for you or be used against you, but you're always at a moral and legal disadvantage. For whatever reason, our species seems coded this way and this has quite a terrible impact on men's social and legal status.

With this article, I'd like to publicly seek to enlist the help and attention of an expert at persuasion, perception and prediction, Scott Adams. I would like Mr. Adams to help me make a more persuasive case that humans have this bias and that it makes us blind to the humanity of men. Also that this may play out poorly at scale.

I believe if we don't, the Noor trial may expedite one of his Scott's predictions, outlined below.

Adams, you may recall, steadfastly predicted Donald Trump would win the 2016 presidency, in 2015. A trained hypnotist and best selling author on the topic of persuasion, Adams is a believer that humans like to think they make up their own minds, but they instead, have their opinions assigned to them by the media.

He's also an expert on how memory most likely works.

Interestingly for some AVFM readers, Adams also has a unique insight into false accusations being made against men after being "credibly accused" by a crazy-ass Canadian woman he's never even met. Coincidentally, this is a trait he shares with Fox News host Tucker Carlson.

Another reason I would like to get the Mohamed Noor Trial on Scott Adam's radar is the fact that Fox and CNN have yet to assign public opinions. As my readers know, I've been at the trial every day, comparatively watching the media, and am just beginning to write about it.

The Blue Church and the Red Church probably won't assign people's opinions until after the trial, if at all, but too late to ensure that the trial is fair.

A fair trial is most definitely in the public interest.

Recap of Trial So Far

Inside the courtroom, there are 11 seats for the public to watch four women collude to punish this officer differently than his 24 predecessors. I've been going everyday and have started calling it the Quaintance-Sweasy Show, but there's probably a better name.

Outside the courtroom, everyone is trying to make sense of something senseless. When that happens, you have a recipe for cognitive dissonance and bias, especially when no one outside the courtroom can see the evidence or hear the testimony. Sometimes that can be insightful, but it's always a little uncomfortable.

This video, taken by a local public access producer shows prominent Black Lives Matter and Police accountability activists talking about the first day of the trial.

When some of the activists talk about race, the commonly used narratives break down and you see cognitive dissonance. When you see the Australian newscaster repeat himself, you are hearing a story the local news doesn't cover, and when you see people talk about this trial, you see how the common narratives around police brutality break down.

Now, I'm not claiming that Noor has been falsely accused of killing Damond, but it's also indisputable that both of Noor's murder charges are unprecedented in Minnesota State history.

I'd like to bring some attention as to why I think that is.

Unfortunately, it's more complicated and disturbing than racism. I have plenty of facts, [1][2][3] to support my hypothesis, now I need some help with persuasion and Mr. Adams is in a similar league to Dr. Robert Cialdini, who is widely regarded as the most important thinker and researcher in this space.

There are more Somali born Muslims in Minneapolis (100K) than there are Australian Americans in the United States (65K). In 2003, Adams released a book, called The Religion War in which he predicted that weaponized Chinese Fentanyl (TM) would be attached to drones as weapons of mass destruction.

I don't read fiction, so I've never read his account, but last year, in a stream of consciousness writing about the Minnesota culture that lead to Damond's death, I predicted the rise of tazerdrones. Time will tell which of us is right.

I'd like to get this trial on Scott Adam's radar for a number of reasons, but the biggest one of all is that I believe this case is going to tear a hole in the fabric of reality. Adam's skill stack may make him one of the only men who can halt the phenomena of automatic outgroup derogation in men, which is creating a slow disaster.

If you are on twitter, please share this article with @scottadamssays. I'd very much like to engage him on Whenhub to discuss how I might be more persuasive in my writings as I finalize this series.

AVfM Video Source · 8 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Okay, so, here's the detailed analysis I was promising. For those of you who were impatient for this to happen, I can only say we were waiting on the written decision.

As you can see from this screenshot, which I took at around 10:30AM on August 15, the decision itself hasn't been uploaded to the publicly accessible database. So 15 days after the decision was read in court, it still wasn't up. Alison finally ordered a transcript be produced at HBB's expense.

Why wait for the transcript? Because going by memory and notes regarding a complicated oral decision isn't the best way to go. No one but the court itself is allowed to video or audio record anything that goes on inside the courtroom. They create transcripts based on their recording, and do not make the recordings themselves available.

I balked at going from memory. I don't want to get things wrong. There were a few things I have commented on publicly, but they're things I was VERY certain of, things that stuck out in particular, and there's just no way a lengthy oral decision can be memorized (unless you're some kind of savant, which I'm not).

So. At long last, here we go.

I'm going to go point by point, reading the judge's reasons individually, and then commenting on them immediately thereafter. The first bit is just a general description of the basic details of the case—who's suing whom and why. No need to get into that.

So. Let's get right into the reasons. (Quotes from the decision are in bold, my commentary follows in normal font.)

Judge notes that:

> In brief, the defendant Calgary Comic alleges the plaintiff breached the defendant's policies and were removed as an exhibitor. The contract is comprised of an application form being submitted with appropriate fee and acknowledgement that, among other things, the plaintiff would adhere to Calgary Comic's policies.
>
> The plaintiff's expenses in preparing for, travelling to, and setting up at the expo may be recoverable damages in whole or in part in the breach of contract action if a breach is established. The removal of the plaintiff's booth partway through the exposition was at the defendant's discretion subject to contractual obligations. The plaintiff had full knowledge of what she was signing and what she was signing up for. The defendant, Calgary Comic, is a private commercial operation, and perspective applicants are free to apply or not, as they wish.
> The plaintiff asserts the notion of unequal bargaining power ought to be a consideration. The unequal bargaining power submission is not applicable in these circumstances. She applied to be an exhibitor with eyes wide open, fully knowledgeable with respect to the terms and conditions under which the defendant operated and to which she was subject.

Yet the documents attached to the contract stipulate that all complaints will be investigated and describes its investigative process (which includes getting both sides of the story); and that a step by step process of remedy will be used to remedy sustained complaints—namely that the first step will be to ask the offending party to cease the offending conduct or remove the offending materials.

Further, the policy documents describe "unwarranted accusations" as a form of harassment.

What this means is that Alison had an obligation to abide by the terms and conditions spelled out not only in the application form, but in the policy documents attached to the application.

So basically, what Alison was "signing up for" was spelled out in those documents, including the policies and processes Calgary Expo had outlined regarding their complaints and investigation procedures, as well as their procedures for remedy.

The only clause in the contract relieving Calgary Expo from its own duty to abide by the terms it had laid out reads as:

"The CCEE shall have the full power in the interpretation and enforcement of all contract regulations contained herein, and the power to make such amendments thereto, and such further rules and regulations as shall be considered necessary and proper."

Not only is this clause arguably in violation of the Alberta Consumer Protection Act and something that should never stand up in court (and usually does not), in that it grants Calgary Expo the authority to ignore its own contractual obligations as stated by it in its own documents, it does indeed raise the issue of unequal bargaining power.

If Party 1 to a contract is signing a contract filled with terms and conditions written entirely by Party 2, while a single clause in that contract indicates that Party 2 is effectively signing a blank piece of paper upon which it can choose to write anything it wishes, then the contract is not actually a contract.

Many contracts used as boilerplate by corporations like the Expo include such clauses, despite their dubious ability to succeed in court, because rubes and noobs who read that clause will believe they have no legal recourse and won't file a lawsuit or a complaint with consumer protection agencies.

What the judge seems to have done is uphold a clause that is in direct violation of consumer interests and consumer protection laws in Alberta, because that's the only way I can see him claiming that Alison had an obligation to live up to the terms and conditions in the policy documents and the Expo did not.

> There was no misrepresentation by the defendant of any sort, and no evidence of bad faith. In fact, evidence shows the plaintiff's application and the plaintiff were dealt with fairly and in a courteous manner, at least up to the point of expulsion.

Yeah, things were going great, until they weren't. Calgary Expo treated Alison fairly, right up until they decided not to. My tenant paid the rent on time every month, until she stopped. My spouse was faithful to me, right up until he cheated. I paid my credit card balance, until that period of 6 months when I didn't.

This assertion is irrelevant and nonsensical. It has zero bearing on whether a contract was violated. That guy had no cause to complain about my behavior, at least until the point where I punched him in the face for no reason. Good grief.

> The defendant, Calgary Comic, received complaints about the plaintiff's participation at a panel discussion and also about a banner at her booth. The defendant investigated. The investigation was not thorough in that the plaintiff had little, if any, opportunity to provide her version of events.

First thing, Alison didn't have little if any opportunity to give her version of events. She had NO opportunity to do so. She even informed Calgary Expo's chief of operations, Shayne Henkelman, that she had an exculpatory recording of the panel discussion, and he refused to even consider listening to it.

I suppose, "little, if any," might be applicable to, "but I'm innocent, and can prove it." But at the same time, Henkelman testified that the decision was made before he even spoke to Alison that morning, with no opportunity for her to give her version.

Secondly, how is this “not thorough” investigation sufficient to come to a decision to evict, if the contract Alison signed indicated that all complaints would be investigated by getting both sides of the story, and remedied in a gradual manner as outlined earlier?

> The defendant said it received complaints from guests, news organizations, and from TheMarySue. It went online to learn more about the prominent Gamergate banner at the plaintiff’s booth.

To my knowledge, Expo received no complaints from the Mary Sue (or even employees or agents of the Mary Sue), nor did Shayne Henkelman testify that they did.

Also, complaints were received from the personal accounts of media personalities, but not from official news media accounts, as far as I know. It’s kind of like the difference between saying “Tucker Carlson tweeted X,” and “Fox News tweeted X.”

This is a really strange mistake for the judge to make, since HAD the Mary Sue officially complained about us to Calgary Expo, this would have helped to implicate them in any inducing breach of contract claim, particularly if the complaint had no merit.

> The online information about Gamergate was unsavory, to say the least, and, in the view of the FBI, Gamergate is a vehicle used to disseminate hate messages among others.

Like the coverage of Alison and HBB following our expulsion? Unsavory like that?

Anyway, his assertion about the FBI is directly contradicted by the only evidence regarding them that was presented at trial. This position attributed to the FBI could not have even been found by improper, out of court research. The FBI investigated Gamergate over accusations that it was a hate movement, and it found no actionable leads. Law enforcement identified four individuals who’d sent potentially illegal messages, one of them a minor, and chose not to prosecute any of them. One was clearly a joke (at least to anyone who’s ever spent any time online), claiming to have “over 9000 bombs” and another prescribing tea, hugs a gentle back massage and face-melting high ordinance explosives for feminists.

> With respect to the breach of policy application, in order to succeed, the plaintiff must show on a balance that the defendant Calgary Comic’s reliance on its policies was sufficiently unfounded to constitute a breach of its contractual obligations.
> Regardless of the quality of the investigation and regardless of the fact that the defendant’s reasons for its decision may well have been debatable, it had the contractual right to remove the plaintiff’s booth subject, of course, to its contractual obligations to the plaintiff.

Wait, aren’t those obligations spelled out in the exhibitor agreement and other policy documents attached to the contract? Again, we’re back to this idea that vendors have an obligation to abide by the terms and conditions laid out by the Expo, while the Expo has no such obligation.

And again, we’re back to that sticky “we reserve the right to do whatever we want for any reason or no reason whatsoever” clause that, if legal, would certainly make unequal bargaining power a consideration.

> The plaintiff denied being disruptive at the panel discussion and provided a transcript and audio recording to support her assertion. Both the tape and transcript are somewhat supportive of the plaintiff’s position. However, the quality of the recording makes it difficult to discern what is said and by whom. I recognize the difficulty in marshalling this kind of evidence. However, I don’t know if the portions provided are the complete exchange in issue, much less whether they are the portions complained of.

First off, the judge spent much of the trial reminding counsel and witnesses to speak up because he's hard of hearing. I would suggest that it being "difficult to discern what is said and by whom" might be owing to a disability on the part of the judge rather than on the quality of the recording.

In addition, the judge had ruled against listening to the entire recording at trial. When asked why she wanted to play the entire thing, Alison responded that she wanted her participation to be viewed in the context of the entire discussion. Defence didn't want to listen to the whole thing, and neither did the judge, and BOTH indicated they would take her word for it that the excerpts were satisfactory in that regard. For the judge to now complain about the incompleteness of evidence he himself ruled against hearing in full is… well. Moving on.

> While debatable, I cannot conclude on balance that there is sufficient credible evidence to conclude Calgary Comic's assessment of the information it received and gathered and its application of that information to its policies was a sufficiently inadequate misinterpretation or a misapplication so as to constitute an improper application of its policies and thus a breach of its contractual obligations with the plaintiff. Thus, there is insufficient evidence to support the breach of contract claim against Calgary Comic, and accordingly, that claim is dismissed.

Policies which state clearly that an investigation involves getting both sides of the story, that unwarranted accusations are a form of harassment, and which also state that remedy begins with asking the offending party to cease the offending conduct—that is, putting people on notice. The Expo acted precipitously and summarily on information it received and gathered from everyone BUT the plaintiff, and bypassed all of the steps it outlined for remedy to level the most extreme punishment available to it—not just expulsion, but a blanket ban on attendance of future conventions.

Further, Henkelman testified on the stand that even had he known that all of the allegations in the various complaints against Alison made to Calgary Expo were false, he'd have ejected her anyway.

What we are left with is Alison's alleged "association" with a hashtag called Gamergate, standing as the sole reason for her being evicted.

However, there was NOTHING in the contract or the surrounding policies or exhibitor agreement putting her on notice that presenting a Gamergate logo on a banner promoting anti-censorship and pro-ethics values would be in violation of ANY of the Expo's policies. There was nothing in the contract or policies prohibiting expressing affiliation with ANY movement, hashtag, political opinion, cause or philosophy.

Inducing breach of contract:

Judge notes:

> With respect to the inducing breach of contract claim regarding TheMarySue, the defendant, Calgary Comic's representative testified he had no contact with TheMarySue apart from receiving the complaint about the events in question prior to the decision to expel the plaintiff from the exposition. There is suspicion by the plaintiff that TheMarySue and Calgary Comic may have collaborated or colluded and that TheMarySue may have slagged the plaintiff, thereby inducing Calgary Comic to act as it did, but there is insufficient credible supporting evidence in that regard, and thus the inducing breach of contract claim against TheMarySue is dismissed.

This is not accurate. Again, Calgary Expo received no complaints from the Mary Sue, or from any agent of the Mary Sue. He may be referring to the complaint from Brittany LeBlanc, but neither Alison nor Shayne ever said there were complaints from the Mary Sue.

As for the suspicion of collusion, yes, this was our suggestion in our initial filing. However, the scenario we presented at trial and during final submissions, after more digging and the evidence exchange, was very different.

The scenario we presented was that Sam Maggs sent a photo of our booth to her friend and collaborator in Toronto, Soha Kareem, who tweeted it out. This single tweet was what led to ALL of the complaints on social media from guests and news media personalities that Henkelman cited as the ultimate reason he kicked us out (that is, the complaints led him to take other actions which led to that decision).

In addition, our contention was that Sam Maggs spoke privately to Brittany LeBlanc and convinced her to complain to Calgary Expo about Alison's participation at the panel (which was another reason Henkelman cited in his testimony as contributing to his decision to kick us out).

So our contention at trial was that Sam Maggs, editor for the Mary Sue, intentionally set out to generate a social media controversy with us as the target, in order to create news for her website to then report on.

And wouldn't you know it? The Mary Sue scooped the story.

We certainly had more evidence supporting our conjecture that Sam Maggs, in her position as editor of the Mary Sue, orchestrated a social media controversy through a known associate, a social media controversy that was the ultimate cause of our expulsion (according to Henkelman). Yet the judge didn't touch on this at all, not even to say it was far fetched, or a conspiracy theory, or even that our evidence of it was insufficient.

He just ignored it.

Injurious falsehood, Calgary Expo:

Judge notes:

> There is insufficient credible evidence that the defendant Calgary Comic published anything, much less any false statements disparaging the plaintiff's goods or property or business. Having her booth removed from the exposition for breach of the defendant's policies, without more, does not constitute a false statement. Publication of the fact of removal of the booth for breach of policy, without more, is also not a false statement.

Really? I mean, I'll grant that it is not necessarily a false statement. That is, if the breach of policy had occurred, or if a fair investigation adhering to Calgary Expo's contractual obligations had occurred, even if the finding was wrong. A false statement doesn't require someone to know the statement is false. Malice, in the context of false statements, can include not taking the proper care to check.

The Expo had contractual obligations to take proper care to check, as it itself laid out in its policy documents and attached to the contract. It did not do so prior to its decision that we had violated policy, nor before its publication of that information. Henkelman's testimony describes a rush to judgment and summary execution completely devoid of taking proper care to check.

In fact, in his final submissions, he described this as the first and only case in which he himself ever kicked anyone out of one of the events run by Calgary Expo. Are we to believe that no one else has ever been ejected from a fan expo in western Canada? Or are we to believe Mr. Henkelman's testimony, that he, as Expo's chief of operations took it upon himself to unilaterally bypass all of the Expo's dedicated personnel and procedures, and its obligations as spelled out in the policy documents to make what amounted to an executive order in violation of its contractual obligations?

> Publication by others of the expulsion and the purported reasons for the expulsion are not actionable against the defendant Calgary Comic. The defendant Calgary Comic did not publish the fact of the expulsion or the reasons for it. Tweets by others posted on the Calgary Comic website about the expulsion were quickly removed by it. Alternatively, if the tweets by others could be characterized as publication by Calgary Comic, there is insufficient credible evidence that the tweets contained false statements about the plaintiff's property, goods, or business.

No no no. First, tweets were not published on Calgary Expo's website. They were published on Twitter. Calgary Expo cannot remove tweets made by "others" from Twitter. It can only remove its own tweets. Further, it cannot make tweets made by "others" invisible to anyone but itself.

And secondly, in direct response to a tweeted query as to why we were kicked out, Calgary Expo's official Twitter account tweeted the Mary Sue's article. A tweet constitutes publication of everything contained therein, including links.

And finally, Henkelman testified ON THE STAND that he ordered the tweet deleted when he learned of its existence. His stated reason, under oath, for doing so was that the tweet was ACTIONABLE. In other words, Calgary Expo published actionable statements it knew might be false, and Henkelman ordered them deleted BECAUSE they were actionable.

His actions in deleting the tweet, and his stated reasons for doing so, were an admission that the tweet itself WAS INDEED actionable under the law. This tweet was not made by "others", but by Calgary Expo's official social media account, manned by employees and agents of Calgary Expo and working under Calgary Expo's authorization.

> If I am wrong that the defendant did not publish statements about the plaintiff's goods, property, or business, there is insufficient credible evidence that any such purported statements were false.

This is… bizarre, since the tweet contained a link to the Mary Sue article, in direct answer to a query as to why we were kicked out. The article describes HBB as a business run by someone who lies on her business contracts in order to clandestinely gain opportunities to cause disruption and harass people. Alison did not lie on her contract. We did NOT sneak into the convention.

And while there, we harassed no one.

Of course, there is credible evidence. It's there in the booth application. In our badges and booth decal identifying who we were. And the judge is the person who ruled we wouldn't hear the entirety of the panel discussion that would have provided credible evidence that Alison had harassed no one.

> In the further alternative, if I am wrong about the publication and falsity of content, there 1 is no credible evidence that the defendant Calgary Comic was motivated by malice. The 2 evidence showed the defendant received complaints about the plaintiff's conduct and about 3 a banner at her booth and after some investigation chose to have her booth closed and 4 removed from the exposition.

He really seems to be wanting to cover all his bases. However.

Malice: a conscious, intentional wrongdoing of a civil wrong like libel, with the intention of doing harm to the victim. This intention includes ill-will, hatred, or total disregard for the other's well-being.

Calgary Expo's policies, attached to their contract, clearly state that unwarranted accusations are considered a form of harassment, and that its investigation of complaints will take into account both sides of the story.

Calgary Expo's contravention of its own stated policies and procedures in this case certainly displayed no regard for the wellbeing of Alison when it summarily ejected her despite her telling them she had exonerating evidence.

When Calgary Expo promoted the Mary Sue article in response to questions as to the reason it had evicted Alison, it also did so with total disregard for her wellbeing. Calgary Expo's social media team did not take time to verify whether the allegations in the article were true or false, which it could have easily done at least in regard to the "misrepresentation" claim, prior to tweeting the article.

And further, when Calgary Expo deleted the tweet, it did not do so to ameliorate any unjust damage done to Alison, but merely to protect itself from what it knew were legally actionable statements on its part.

To this day, Calgary Expo has not so much as corrected the public allegation that Alison lied on her contract with them, despite having submitted evidence to that effect to the court. Which certainly displays continued disregard for her wellbeing.

> There is no evidence of animus towards the plaintiff or bad faith in investigating the complaints, notwithstanding Calgary Comic did not obtain the plaintiff's input prior to its decision to expel.

Except that it did not follow the investigatory protocols laid out in its own policies and agreements. It refused to listen to evidence Alison claimed was exculpatory. That's the definition of bad faith.

That Mr. Henkelman and the Expo were nice to us right up until the moment that they weren't is immaterial.

Expo did not follow its prescribed step by step procedure for remedy even when someone is found to be engaging in offending conduct. It skipped over all of its normal procedures, and jumped directly from accusation to summary execution.

As to animus, Alison was informed that if her booth was not dismantled and all of us out within half an hour, Mr. Henkelman would call police and have us all arrested. He refused to provide us with tools when asked, so we could disassemble the booth without damaging it.

He testified that following our eviction he sent "spies" to infiltrate our social gatherings and report back to him. He put Stampede security on notice that we were a clear and present danger, such that Stampede security called police on our peaceful and completely innocent picnic at Reader Rock Garden.

No animus? I call bullshit.

> Lastly, if I am wrong about publication, falsity, and malice, the plaintiff has not led sufficient credible evidence to establish special damages. Damages are not presumed, and general damages are not recoverable. The plaintiff incurred expenses to attend the exposition, but those expenses were not a result of this alleged actionable tort.

Good grief. Because being smeared in both mainstream and industry media can't be reasonably expected to hurt your bottom line in your chosen industry?

Damages are not presumed, but a reasonable expectation of damages does not mean that the plaintiff must present an itemized list down to the penny of every loss suffered. It does not require a plaintiff to be clairvoyant and prove that, if not for the defendant's actions, they'd have sold exactly 2113 units of merchandise.

> The plaintiff's husband testified that she had sold about 30 comics in her entire career.

Therefore, there were no damages? Plaintiff's husband also testified that he had no real idea how many comics she'd sold. A subsequent witness testified that this estimate was way off.

Regardless, a subsequent witness who was manning the booth testified that 7 copies of Alison's comic were sold in the first four hours of the convention alone. Projecting from this, Alison could have expected to sell a total of 50 to 60 comics over the full Expo, had she been allowed to stay. That's double the lifetime estimate given, under pressure, from her husband, and it applies just to one event.

> The plaintiff testified she experienced difficulty convincing store owners to carry her product after this event. There was insufficient evidence of the magnitude of her difficulties, much less a dollar amount to specify the amount of alleged special damages loss. Thus, the injurious falsehood claim is dismissed against Calgary Comic.

This is a mischaracterization. Alison testified that a store owner in Saskatoon had not only stocked her books, but had placed them on prominent display to promote a local artist. After the incident and the media fallout, that shop owner took down the display and cut her orders by 75%.

There is no down to the penny specificity requirement under injurious falsehood as to what determining there were special damages, nor a minimum amount necessary. If there is a reasonable expectation that Alison had lost out on the sale of just one book due to this fiasco, that would be enough to constitute special damages. The amount of the special damages only becomes relevant when deciding what, if anything, is owing to the plaintiff.

Injurious falsehood, The Mary Sue:

Judge notes:

> TheMarySue did not participate in the whole trial. It did not lead evidence nor cross- examine nor make submissions. It published an article after the expulsion. Some of the content may be false, and it may have been written maliciously. Assuming, without deciding, that there was publication, maliciousness and falsehood, I would dismiss the claim on the basis there was no credible evidence that the plaintiff suffered special damages attributable to TheMarySue publication. Thus, the injurious falsehood claim is dismissed against TheMarySue.

And again, there is no requirement for specificity regarding an exact dollar amount to prove special damages, nor a lower bound as to what is considered a pecuniary loss. A reasonable expectation of loss is sufficient to prove injurious falsehood.

Anyway, there's so much that's haywire with this decision, it's not even funny. I think I counted a minimum of 16 grounds on which to appeal. And that's not even considering some of the errors of factfinding that occurred.

The judge disregarded Henkelman's own testimony that the Calgary Expo's tweet was actionable.

His finding of no animus is completely belied by the manner in which we were kicked out—Henkelman refusing to hear exculpatory evidence and even threatening to have us arrested if we weren't gone by the time the doors opened to the public. Henkelman advising Stampede security that we were a threat to safety at the convention, and sending staff members to spy on our meet-ups. No evidence of animus there.

And perhaps the most ironic thing of all was all of that animus appears to have been based on the egregiously biased, misleading and demonizing media coverage of Gamergate that falsely painted a hashtag and a consumer revolt as something sinister and dangerous. And the result of his actions? Egregiously biased, misleading and demonizing media coverage of Honey Badger Brigade and the events of April 2015.

Totalitarian Tango

Moiret Allegiere · 8 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The street lamps shine with umbrage while permanently offended sidewalks creak and croak. «Left foot, left foot, left foot, march!», a voice through smashed windows beckon. The weird and wired click-clack of jackboot-stilettos echoes through the dim night, as we are made to dance in pairs to the frightbat tunes of the totalitarian tango.

Our civilization is turning to dust in one fleeting fall from grace, engineered by ideologues with selfspun halos `round their moonfaced grins, made from cotton picked in slave plantations by men with necks bent under the weight of someone elses projected thoughts. Here we go, picking cotton, picking a bit of cotton, listening to the mind boggling screech of the totalitarian tango.

As history comes full circle and we come to ourselves, we ought to reclaim what values we once had; we ought to value these grand memories, our building blocks, our beautiful ethics! We think, as we watch our values and our virtues and our moral integrity get rolled in the bog and labelled unclean, unfit for human consumption, that progression for the sake of regression is a grand stroke of divine inspiration, that it is a virtue equal to none, a virtue in and off itself, impossible to criticize, as we ourselves roll around in the filth, naked, whipped and bleeding, glancing at the icy rhythm of the totalitarian tango.

No matter the mind, and never mind the matter! No matter the sane, never mind the truth! In the glorious present of the stunning utopia, this call is not ours to call. Our phones have been left off the hook indefinite, and we are hung on the hook infinitely: guilty by association, guilty of thinking what this new breed of crybully authoritarians believe that we think. You think like this, you see, due to balls and white skin and normative sexuality. And don`t you forget it, you lowly bro, you pathetic inbred neckbeard basement-dweller, you hideous ogre, you! And miracles of miracleberries: they sign documented out-patients away, for to sing and then to dance and henceforth to bleed, to singe and to glance and to breathe in the six-string-shooter ballads of the totalitarian tango.

Our five-finger-dance is oppressive. Monkey see, monkey do. Our superior aristocracy, the new victim class are working towards denying us our right to speak and assemble, under the pretense of them being victims of thissen-hissen and other such mumbo-jumbo. In the topsy-turvy world of upside-down land which these parasites inhabit, the powers that be deny us our opinions, our voices and our pain. `cause it offends, see. And offense is the worst, see. In our mouths they put their own bigotry, their own hatred and their own in-group preference, reasoning thusly: we think like this about them, therefore they must think like this about us. A hivemind-vacuum, an echo chamber, nourished by eternal intellectual blockades, a shot of black tar heroin delivered straight into eyeballs, dry and crusty that tears the parchment from the walls. It calls us out to pray, the earth moulds us from the clay, the wind beckons us to play, we hear the sunshine turn the night to day. We should revolt. We submit instead, lest we be shamed yet again. Alone we stand, audited, glanced at, then dismissed, fodder for the cannons, food for the vultures, spat in the face: more broken men in line to do the totalitarian tango.

Do my eyes deceive me? I see a Bosch sketch of a society yet to come, gigantic hellscapes rising from the pineal gland, a fleeting whisper from ruby red lips cracking into a bloodstained smile, painted then tainted by mad, frenzied eyes, stung with crazy lies, with tongue tied chants, full of words and temper, signifying nothing! Eighteen more strokes of the clock, seven days to reach the glock, a beckoning to grab the golden cock as we march along to the beats of the drum; the beats of the hurr-durr. A recently legalized, nationwide, socially and state-sanctioned hatred, unaltered, unopposed. We are living in a total conversion mod of western society, see, a totalitarian farce, depraved and decadent, a lonely lunatics nightmare timeline: the totalitarian tango.

And we ought to be hanging from the piss-yellow light of the street lamps come midnights eternal, roaring with laughter and howling at the slutwalk-moon at all the weird shit going down. We ought to not be listening to this absurdity. We should not yield to their ridiculous demands; the feminist hivemind speaking the language of the social justice intersectional rumba. Yet we yield and yet we cater to their every whim and flight of fancy, and yet we bend over backwards, then conform to their every nonsensical demand. The decades of shaming has reached peak efficiency, the malebashing nearing its climax. Orgasmic screams of the orgasmic divine: woman good, men bad. In the language which greets us at the feminist intersection of reason and madness: men are disposable, women are aristocracy. We should not dance. Leave the hivemind to their fainting couches and smelling salts. We should not dance, and yet we do, step by step, beat by beat, the totalitarian tango.

Here we see the streams of time follow the flow of hate with a call to arms raised in banners, raised in banners of fluctuating solidarity. Our politics have become absurdist theaters. Our absurdist theaters have become politics. Here come the politically correct lynchmobs. Watch them gather in the streets chasing down the witches and the heretics, the wrongthinkers, the thought-crime-afficianados whils't vomiting a stream of consciousness-nonsense from lips painted the colour of hate, regurgitating what they have been thought to say: tango fodder, do-gooder, moral busybodies watching what their neighbours do with binocular-efficiency and then insisting that their neighbours is watching what they do instead, deny and reverse victim order in the diamond light of the totalitarian tango.

Snowwhite was raped, and so was cinderella. Prince charming is a construct, a dominant male power fantasy. The damsel in distress trope is misogyny extreme, yet he for she and help us, men. In a society wherein everything is a social construct, gender in particular, there seems to be an obscene amount of focus on the faults of one gender, and the glory of the other, by biology say they, when the biological findings confirm their narrative structure, a narrative structure as fleeting as the warm smell of rotten eggs. even as they claim gender is a social construct. Don't worry, mate, Big Sister got more than enough mental gymnastics rolling the rounds of the totalitarian tango.

Never you mind and never you worry, buddyboy, our claws will not remove your cock – or leastways parts of it – yet we may have to take your balls away. It is the testosterone, you see, which is the problem, see, and testosterone is made manifest in cumstains galore all across the face of mother earth. Testosterone is a burden, a murder weapon, a tool of the oppressive patriarchy, even if we also tell you that your masculinity is a social construct and nothing but, there is still testosterone poisoning. We are all double-think and wondrous laughs as we prance and shoot our way through the grandiosity of the totalitarian tango.

Listen and believe to the harbingers of doom and gloom as the dust settles on the emotionless, wildly staring eyeballs of these sultry goddess-queens, as dead and dying silverstreams of cum from silverbacked gorillas worth more than you flows like a river from the cheeks of societies past. Let me hear your laugh, young boy, and chant along with the wave we are riding, the wave towards our ingenious yet indescribably horrible freedom. Freedom from offense: sew cushions and pillows underneath our arms so that we never have to experience anything even remotely resembling difficulty. Do not deny us our personhood by merely stating disagreements. Do our dance, tick-tock along with the jackboot-stillettoes, Do not offend, dear, do not offend. Also: dare not take offense to the hatred we spew, as we dance and weave and whine the totalitarian tango.

The night is ours, a proclamation. We are taking it back, a glorious calculation. Give the men a curfew, keep em all locked away in musty basements. Take away their hobbies and destroy all their spaces, deny the men their fun and their fancies, and let us sit and spin our cottontwined haloes `round our nimble figureheads, as we feast on the blood of the weak this week, oh god what a grandiose performance, oh my how incredibly brave and courageous and strong this perpetual victim is. Do not raise your voice: feminism is for men too! They are watering our beers with crocodile tears, as we accept and reform and reject everything but the totalitarian tango.

And moses spreads his cheeks and god spreads his lips and the evening spreads itself thin over the hurt and the pain as the lipstick polished nails sing hymns of salvation, glory be, glory do, boo-fucking-hoo. Jane smacks jack for spreading his legs when he sits. Nothing but bright light and glazed eyes, nothing but twisted truths and pregnant lies waiting to burst as we see decadence perform fellatio on the erect notes of the totalitarian tango.

What we see in the horizon, what rises from the streets, what comes crawling from the prehistoric ooze is the complete control and domination of our thoughts and of our speech. Our freedoms are being stolen by the social justice hivemind, a beast of biblical prophecies brought forth, a glance into the past: Victorian morals posing as a progressive push forward, a furthering of the women-are-wonderful effect. Men are the beast, women are the gods.

Men do all wrong, all the time. Women do no wrong, all the time. In the air, a whisper spreads: fare-thee-well, equality, enter now the totalitarian tango.

Mythologies of the men's rights and feminist movements

Peter Wright · 8 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Have you ever thought of Men's Rights and feminism as competing mythologies? In what follows I will do just that, while paying special attention to the fact that the feminist myth has triumphed in capturing global imagination. By 'mythology' I mean those guiding stories that provide meaning and direction to the lives of all who follow them, including the men's rights story, and the feminist story. While myth may or may not be scientifically true, it is true in the sense that people actively believe in myths and act them out in their daily lives.

In his 4-volume work[1] surveying the history of world mythologies, Joseph Campbell gives a snapshot of the evolving history of mythology from the earliest days of 'Master Bear god' painted on cave walls, until the present day.

Campbell demonstrates that, over and over, dominant mythologies get replaced or absorbed by newer mythologies, and such changeability appears to be the only constant in the long sweep of history. There were periods of mythological stability in all cultures, but without exception every traditional mythology was modified or replaced as forces within the culture reached critical mass.

Catalysts for myth revisions are numerous, with examples being foreign invaders who overrun a traditional culture and implant their own mythology, or alternatively it may happen that a new mythology lurking in the back waters of a culture begins to gain grassroots appreciation, leading eventually to its ascendancy and a concomitant decline of the previous mythological setup. By yet another route the change in mythology may be instituted by a ruler who adopts a new religious belief and then mandates it as the official belief of the masses, examples being;

- Indian King Ashoka promoted Buddhist mythology across ancient Asia;
- Emperor Constantine promoted the Christian story as religion of the Roman Empire;
- Queen Eleanor of Aquitaine and her daughter crafted the mythos of romantic love and chivalry which was disseminated throughout Europe and the world.

In some situations the dominant myths did not give way to a revision for a considerable time, usually because there wasn't a compelling mythology jostling to replace it. Even when the prevailing mythology has become somewhat stale and uninspiring, the human mind will not reject it in favor of a story vacuum: to be without some kind of guiding mythology leads the human mind into an existential paralysis, and for the most part nature refuses to tolerate such a void.

Now lets consider all of this in the light of feminism, a movement crafted from florid imaginings of the mythic imagination. To get to the heart of this myth we need to start at the medieval beginnings of those accreted layers of story that constitute the end product we know as modern feminism.

In his volume Creative Mythology,[2] Campbell documents how stories of chivalry and romantic love during the Middle Ages formed a new mythology that not only competed with the Christian religion for social legitimacy, but eventually surpassed it. Today romantic love saturates popular media, song, cinema, dance and the arts, and is the number one selling genre of literature, outselling the books of traditional religion, ie., the Qu'ran, Bible, Vedas, Bhagavad Gita, Tipiṭaka, Tao Te Ching and so on. Romantic love is, as Campbell states, the world's current leading mythos.

So what does all this have to do with men's rights and feminism?

Well, everything.

Feminists freely admit that chivalry and romantic love form ground zero of the feminist enterprise, constituting something of a Genesis Story of women's improved social position, pedestalization and ongoing increases in power. As told by feminist Dr. Elizabeth Reid Boyd of the School of Psychology and Social Science at Edith Cowan

University, romance writings can be called the "first form of feminism":

> "I muse upon arguments that romance is a form of feminism. Going back to its history in the Middle Ages and its invention by noblewomen who created the notion of courtly love, examining its contemporary popular explosion and the concurrent rise of popular romance studies in the academy that has emerged in the wake of women's studies, and positing an empowering female future for the genre, I propose that reading and writing romantic fiction is not only personal escapism, but also political activism.
> Romance has a feminist past that belies its ostensible frivolity. Romance, as most true romantics know, began in medieval times… Love songs and stories, like those of Lancelot and Guinevere, Tristan and Isolde, were soon on the lips of troubadours and minstrels all over Europe. Romance spread rapidly. It has been called the first form of feminism."[3]

Reid Boyd, like so many other feminists before her, makes clear that romantic-love mythology provides bedrock for the development of feminism. Faced with that fantastical adversary, men's advocates can argue they have excellent data demonstrating a growing narcissism among women and a neglect of men, facts that should lead right-thinking people away from the grip of feminism. However, those facts are only in the beginning stages of being woven into a story, one that might, in time, become an epic like the Bible or Mahābhārata.

Axiom: ONLY STORY CAN DISPLACE OR ABSORB OTHER STORIES.

Facts be damned.

Until a new mythology rises to challenge the hegemony of feminist myth, non-gynocentric men are destined to wander the planet like lost souls in search of a place to call home. For many men, the dominant mythology of our time has erased our story, and with it our existence in the world. Campbell talks to this problem when he declared "Myths are public dreams, dreams are private myths," concluding that when your personal understanding of life doesn't align with the dominant public myth, your path in life will be painful:

> "If your private myth, your dream, happens to coincide with that of the society, you are in good accord with your group. If it isn't, you've got a long adventure in the dark forest ahead of you."[4]

While that sums up the experience of red-pill men today, all is not lost. A growing number of voices have declared the mythology of feminism overripe for change, that it is rotting to the core as a guide to civilization, and there are in fact compelling stories poised to replace it. Before we look at alternative stories that have potential to help men and women live more harmoniously, lets first survey how the feminist mythos coincides with other mythological traditions.

As with the great civilization-building and sustaining mythologies of the past, feminism has narrated; 1. an Eden story of how ancient men and women co-existed and organized their society; 2. a fall from grace, 3. a set of laws to guide humans away from their fallen ways, and 4. liberation and future utopia.

Each of these four elements, which could be expanded to dozens more, appear in feminist mythology as follows:

1. Once upon a time, much of European society was matriarchal, peace-loving, agrarian, and Goddess worshiping, with men serving as the labor force.[5,6]
2. Patriarchal tribes from the North invaded and suppressed this idyllic Eden, supplanting it with a hierarchical, patriarchal, and woman-oppressing culture.[5,6]
3. Proto-feminists of the Middle Ages, followed by modern feminists, rebelled and challenged the grip of 'the patriarchy' and its institutions to allow women out of the wilderness and into the center of society. They created romantic love, and instituted laws, one by one, that would not only give women equal power to men, but would "compensate" women for previous losses of power.

4. Women would once again rule, as a female aristocracy, with men learning to be obedient, loving and dutiful servants, inaugurating a golden age.[7]

While these beliefs sound fanciful to the rational mind, they are documented and widely believed myths underpinning the feminist movement. With the enormous currency of feminist mythology in modern society, it constitutes 'the story' that we are all, to some extent, 'in.'

Indeed there's no outside of mythological perspectives — culturally we are all living inside them in one way or another. Those of us with a bent for factual accuracy prefer to align with stories that are truer to science, with narratives that are compatible with the facts without departing from them as myths often do. But whether we enjoy them, or rail against them as childish fantasies, the fact is that mythologies full of kooky flat-earth ideas have guided civilizations for millennia without being based on facts at all, and yet the societies they governed continued to flourish regardless.

Mythologies clearly don't need to be factually correct to guide societies. They need only provide a shared operating system that glues people's otherwise separate minds into one harmonious whole.

Those of us with a penchant for scientific fact can hope that a new mythology incorporates more factual data than the flat-earth science of the current gynocentric mythos — one eminently more suited to the scientific age in which we live, and one that many more people could believe in.

To prepare ourselves for inevitable new mythologies, it helps to first become aware of the dominant myths already governing our society. And as Gianni Vattimo once advised, the post-modern paradox of social-mythology is to wake up and realize that we have been dreaming, and yet continue dreaming anyway;[8] ie. we realize we still need stories to live by but we can consciously choose the guiding narratives we wish to align with instead of going along with them unconsciously.

As men's rights advocates, that raises questions about our own 'mythologies.' What are they? Have we sufficiently developed and articulated them? In light of the four elements of religious mythology listed above, lets list a rudimentary, rough sketch of the MR story to date. Before I do that, I hasten to add that this sketch is not prescriptive and may be at odds with narratives already held by devout Christian, Muslim, or XYZ-believing MRAs. However this mythological sequence focuses solely on the gender relations problem as it has been articulated by many MRAs today:

1. A strong candidate for an MR 'Genesis story' is the story of human evolution, a compelling mythology about our remote past and how we clawed our way out of the jungle to build the wonders of modern science and civilization. That story comes with scientific observations and anecdotes about human biology in action – how early men and women displayed different sexual and survival strategies, and how human offspring were protected due to biological imperatives. Its a story of cooperation between men and women as they dreamed the human adventure forward.
2. The 'fall' took place as that delicate equilibrium between men and women was unraveled by the arrival of the new gender relations mythology called romantic chivalry, AKA gynocentrism. This period marked the moment of enslavement to a sexual relations model designed to tilt maximum power to women, with men slaving as Moses did for the Egyptians, and it presided over the destruction of the delicate family unit.
3. Over the centuries men (and women) of iron will and good conscience mounted a resistance to gynocentrism and a desire for Exodus – to wanting to walk away from gynocentric-feminism as free men;
4. Finally, men and women began to live the GOOD NEWS of the MR Testament: liberty, equality of opportunity, compassion and multi-options for all – this time including men.

These four sub-narratives form a larger corpus that we might call a mythology, one that would improve on the current toxic mythos of feminism. As mentioned it is given for illustrative purposes only and is not prescriptive; any new mythology will arise organically like a nighttime dream and flourish within the culture, and like dreams we never know when it will arrive or exactly what shape it will take. But the dream, the myth, will arrive…. of that we can be sure.

If we continue to expand this collection of stories, elaborating them in greater depth, continuing to tell them, and telling them again, more compelling with each recitation, then just maybe our society will have a necessary stone to jump to.

Welcome to the New Platform for A Voice for Men

Paul Elam · 8 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Gents and Ladies,

Welcome to the next iteration of the A Voice for Men website. We've had to grow and change over the past 10 years, both as an organization and as an online platform. Sometimes, as in recently, those changes have been challenging. Technical advances on the site that worked for us at one time have recently become burdensome and inefficient. So, we've basically rebuilt the site from the ground up.

One of the many tasks we've engaged in this process is the importing of AVFM's massive library of articles. Due to technical constraints, this will be a somewhat manual process, one month at a time, covering the past 10 years. This is a necessary evil, so that AVFM can return to what it was always meant to be, a website for the average man, owned and operated by average men.

We'll have to ask you to pardon our dust as we move ahead with the new construction. There will be some glitches on the site to resolve. We will endeavor to complete the construction at the least possible inconvenience to you. And we hope that you will enjoy the fresh new look and the smoother, faster operation that comes with a more agile platform.

Thanks for your patience and once again, welcome!

The feminist War Against Justice

Maybe part of the cultural punishment is that some innocent men will be hurt.

*jay25, reader comment[1]

No, we haven't gone too far, nor far enough. … The only way to change the equation is for men to begin paying that price, guilty or not.

*los angeles reader, reader comment[2]

Feminism is a partisan movement on behalf of females. Advancing the status and circumstances of women is its first and only priority. One problem with single value movements, such as feminism, is that it disregards other values that are important. For feminists, every other value may be suppressed in aid of female supremacy. Most notable, at this moment, is the feminist suppression of justice.

Justice is not problematical for radical feminists because they already know who is innocent and who is guilty: women throughout history are innocent victims of male oppression. As one enunciation of this understanding puts it, "Male privilege, male hegemony and male chauvinism has been around for millennia all the while women and girls carrying the burden and paying the price for doing nothing but being female."[3]

Feminism sees the world as divided according to gender category: male versus female. The mandate of feminism is to advance the interests of females by undermining the status and power of males, and replacing them with females.[4] For example, in 1999 Mary Daly[5] argued that the population of men should be radically reduced: "If life is to survive on this planet, there must be decontamination of the Earth. I think this will be accompanied by an evolutionary process that will result in a drastic reduction of the population of males. People are afraid to say that kind of stuff any more." Sally Gearhart[6] proposed a way to do this: "It's not genocide, exactly. … A 75 per cent female to 25 per cent male ratio could be achieved in one generation if one half of a population reproduced heterosexually and one half by ovular merging".

Susanna Danuta Walters[7], professor of sociology and director of the Women's, Gender, and Sexuality Studies Program at Northeastern University, as well as the editor of the gender studies journal Signs, has a more modest proposal: "So men, if you really are #WithUs and would like us to not hate you for all the millennia of woe you have produced and benefited from, start with this: Lean out so we can actually just stand up without being beaten down. Pledge to vote for feminist women only. Don't run for office. Don't be in charge of anything. Step away from the power. We got this. And please know that your crocodile tears won't be wiped away by us anymore. We have every right to hate you. You have done us wrong. #BecausePatriarchy. It is long past time to play hard for Team Feminism. And win." (Demographic note: no one living today, or ever, has been alive for "millennia," or has suffered or benefitted for millennia.)

Feminism thus construes females not as complex and often conflicted human beings, but as pure and good victims; it construes males as bigoted, brutal, evil oppressors. Note that both females and males are reduced to their gender, with no distinctions made amongst them. Feminism addresses people according to their gender categories, not to each individual's multiple dimensions and multifarious characteristics.

Reducing people to categories and dealing with them as such is a time honoured, or time dishonoured frame of reference. History is replete with examples: tribe vs. tribe, Persian vs. Turk, Persian vs. Byzantine, Arab vs. infidel, Chinese vs. Turks, whites vs. blacks, Germans vs. Jews. The other is treated as inferior or subhuman or evil, and thus any attack is allowed, any atrocity celebrated. This is the model adopted by feminists: women vs. men.

The feminist war against men pursues many strategies. One is to demand equal gender representation in all important organizations: parliament, courts, universities. But only where women are under-represented; where women are over-represented, feminists have no objection. Females are over-represented among university graduates and increasingly among university professors, deans, and high administrators. The Principal of McGill University brags that female deans are now the majority.[8]

Another strategy is to claim that male oppressors have corrupted public culture in favour of male supremacy and brutality. Feminists, especially those in universities, now are unanimous that we live in a “rape culture.” This makes no sense, because culture is a set of rules and goals, and Western culture (unlike some others) forbids rape, councils against it, and punishes it severely.[9] But it neatly frames all men as brutal rapists, driving home the point that men are evil. And it frightens females, drawing them into the safe haven of feminism. The claim that we have a “rape culture” is false and dishonest, but has proven effective in advancing feminist ideology.

Even more effective than imaginings about “rape culture” are the accusations and allegations of misbehavior directed at particular men.[10] Here feminists can attack men through the resources and coercion of institutional regulations and laws. And the feminist position, much repeated, is that all accusations by females must be believed. This was stated explicitly by Democrat Presidential nominee for the United States Hillary Clinton, past Secretary of State, who demanded that AEvery survivor of sexual assault deserves to be heard, believed, and supported.@[11] The Canadian Prime Minister, Justin Trudeau, a self-identified feminist, insists that we must Abelieve all allegations.@[12] New York University’s “Wellness Exchange” advises about rape allegations, “Believe Unconditionally.”[13] President Obama’s Department of Education instructed colleges and universities to give the benefit of doubt to any accusation of sexual impropriety or violence.[14] Colleges and universities obeyed to a fault, severely punishing accused males without an assumption of innocence or due process or convincing substantiation. Feminists applauded. The courts of law did not.[15]

Notwithstanding rebukes from the courts, accusation and allegations go viral. The process is foreshortened; now we go directly from allegation to condemnation, from accusation to verdict of guilty, and from asserted guilt to punishment. Left out entirely are due process, substantiation, and evidence. At best this is a kangaroo court; at worse, a lynching.[16] In July 2018, a female violinist claimed that the Concertmaster of the Cleveland Orchestra had “forced himself” on her in 1998.[17] With no presumption of innocence, no investigation, and no trial, the Concertmaster was suspended from his job. After all, in our feminist era, what a female says must be true.

This is not justice by any historical idea of the term. In procedural justice, “the procedures that together make up a fair trial are justified on the grounds that for the most part they produce outcomes in which the guilty are punished and the innocent are acquitted.”[18] This astonishing idea, that “the innocent are acquitted” is contrary to the feminist view, which is that all men are a priori guilty.

The feminist approach to law as an instrument to undermine and punish men contradicts the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which, in Article 7 says, “All are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to equal protection of the law. All are entitled to equal protection against any discrimination in violation of this Declaration and against any incitement to such discrimination.”[19] Thus the plea to believe whatever a female says is a violation of the human rights of men.

Aside from accusations being assumed to be true, there are several odd features of these denunciations of alleged sexual impropriety. First, there is the anonymity of the authors of many of these allegations, which precludes facing one’s accuser. Although the identity of the complainant may be unknown or inaccessible, the accusation is nonetheless always deemed valid. Second, there is the bandwagon effect of accusers piling on, as the #metoo phenomenon illustrates. Third, there is the miraculous escalation of allegations against a person, with no substantiation whatsoever, from accusations of a consensual if inappropriate relationship, to not being a person that the recipient wishes to engage with, to making someone feel uncomfortable, to undesired invitations, to sexual harassment, to sexual predation, to violent rape.[20] Somehow, once the feminist spotlight is turned on a man, he automatically becomes a rapist. What is remarkable is that this feminist mob hysteria is assumed to be legitimate and true.

Feminist lynch mobs not only destroy men's reputations, jobs, and lives, but also inflict wounds on many women. Benny Frederiksson was the director of the Kulturhuset Stadsteatern, Stockholm's premier arts and culture center. In December 2017, accusations against him were published in the Swedish press.[21] An internal city investigation did not substantiate the claims. Frederiksson was stunned, and decided to take a leave from his job. He fell into a deep depression, and, in March 2018, committed suicide. His wife, Anne Sophie van Otter, world famous opera singer, says it was the metoo movement that expelled her husband from his job, sent him into depression, and caused him to kill himself. "She said a herd mentality had taken hold, threatening 'independent, critical thinking'." According to the Washington Post[22],

'The opera singer fiercely backed her husband's innocence, saying he was a difficult boss — "he could yell sometimes," she said — but that he was blameless of sexual misconduct. "Benny was not a womanizer, he didn't look at women's breasts or behinds," she protested. She judged that it was unwise for her husband to have stepped down so quickly, a view that he came to share, she said. "The atmosphere was extremely charged," she said.' Van Otter said hopefully that "We all have good and bad sides, but we no longer live in the Middle Ages," she said. "We do not publicly pillory anyone and spit on or stone him or her."

In 2015, Professor Steven Galloway, the head of the writing program at the University of British Columbia, was suspended due to "serious allegations," the nature of which he was not told. UBC appointed a retired Supreme Court of British Columbia judge to investigate. The external investigation, which UBC did not release to the public, exonerated Galloway and awarded him $167,000. The University fired him anyway.[23] In 2016, six dozen members of the Canadian arts community and others published "An Open Letter To UBC: Steven Galloway's Right To Due Process." After reviewing events, the letter concluded as follow:

"Professor Galloway himself has been denied the right to speak publicly while his case is being grieved. The University's willingness to allow the suspicions it has created to continue to circulate is surprising and appears to be contrary to the principles of fairness and justice that should guide any distinguished academic institution.

"The University's conduct in this matter is of great concern. We, the undersigned, respect the principle of protection for individuals who wish to bring complaints. We also respect the right of an accused to fair treatment. There is growing evidence that the University acted irresponsibly in Professor Galloway's case. Because the case has received a great deal of public attention, the situation requires public clarification.

"We therefore request that the University of British Columbia establish an independent investigation into how this matter has been handled by the Creative Writing Program, the Dean of the Faculty of Arts and the senior administration at UBC.

"We are not requesting that privacy be violated and understand that there are grievance proceedings in process. Justice, however, requires due process and fair treatment for all, which the University appears to have denied Professor Galloway."[24]

After what happened next, several signatories removed their names from this letter.

What happened next is very informative. One of the signatories, Margaret Atwood, arguably the most prominent Canadian feminist and author, was rapidly vilified[25] as a "bad feminist," by University of Alberta English professor Julie Rak. Dr. Lucia Lorenzi tweeted

"Margaret Atwood. The women who signed the UBC Accountable letter. Donna Karan. The list goes on. That betrayal feels like hot knives." Another critic wrote, "Margaret Atwood's latest op-ed is a very, very clear reminder that old cis women are not to be trusted. They care more about poor widdle [sic] accused men than they do about actual f rape victims. They spend as much time advocating for rapists as they do attacking victims."[26]

In a reply[27] to her critics, Atwood says, with reference to the Galloway case,

"A fair-minded person would now withhold judgment as to guilt until the report and the evidence are available for us to see. We are grownups: We can make up our own minds, one way or the other. The signatories of the UBC Accountable letter have always taken this position. My critics have not, because they have already made up their minds. Are these Good Feminists fair-minded people? If not, they are just feeding into the very old narrative that holds women to be incapable of fairness or of considered judgment, and they are giving the opponents of women yet another reason to deny them positions of decision-making in the world. …

"If the legal system is bypassed because it is seen as ineffectual, what will take its place? … In times of extremes, extremists win. Their ideology becomes a religion, anyone who doesn't puppet their views is seen as an apostate, a heretic or a traitor, and moderates in the middle are annihilated."

Attacks on Atwood and the co-signers of the Open Letter to UBC come not only from toxic feminism, but also from its associated identity politics and its "social justice frame" which denigrates whites, men, heterosexuals, Christians and Jews, and, amazingly, North American Asians as "privileged oppressors." This is now the substance of what is taught in North American colleges and universities, and why indoctrinated university graduate are feminist extremists.

'It is increasingly common for academics to see and teach literature as fundamentally a kind of activism, and their role as critics as an activist one as well," a successful Ontario-based novelist told me. "And there is really a very easy way of determining [a book's value]. It is not by its content or form. It is in the identity of its author. The author's privilege or lack of it is calculated using a simple points system, and the book's worth is then established according to the total. A book by a straight white female author [such as Atwood] is unlikely to be considered useful to social progress, unless that author is seen to have another disadvantage such as a physical disability—and so on.'[28]

Attacks on established authors are nothing new in Canada. 'Our country has long been vulnerable to "tall-poppy syndrome," by which mediocrities in a particular métier will work together to cut down the reputation of an outlier who has achieved success beyond Canada's borders. And thanks to the modern fixation on gender and race, these poppy cutters can now cynically present their scythes as tools of social justice.'[29]

Other senior feminists have rejected the anti-male witch trials and lynchings that are now de rigueur. In January 2018, one hundred French women in the arts signed a petition[30] in which they rejected the #metoo movement, called in France "Balance ton porc" («Expose Your Pig») hashtag. In response to angry objections, Catherine Deneuve followed up with a letter[31] explaining her position: "Yes, I love freedom. I do not like that we live in a time when everyone feels they have the right to set themselves up as judge, jury and executioner. A time when mere accusations on social media lead to punishment, resignation and sometimes – indeed often – trial by media. … I pass no judgment on their guilt or innocence; I am not qualified to do so. Very few people are. And, no, I do not like the mob mentality that is far too common today."

Isn't it peculiar that "great causes," such as purifying the race, establishing the dictatorship of the proletariat, and bringing everyone to the worship of Allah, all dispense with civil and legal protections in the name of the greater good, all end up targeting disfavoured categories of people, and all end up destroying the lives of untold numbers. Sadly, feminism has joined the list of "great causes," targeting men, and celebrating the destruction of their lives.

Amnesia, drugs and rape: Narratives for disaster

Trudy Dare · 9 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

We're all aware of the narrative of victimization via date rape drug. It depends on claims that certain drugs, usually GHB or Rohypnol, cause amnesia. So, rather than explore narratives or he-said she-said in individual cases, let's discuss the tools and effects central to this type of crime.

Two drugs share the nickname date rape drug, Rohypnol and GHB. This reputation as an amnesia trigger is strong enough that Rohypnol has been administered to block patients' memory of a medical procedure.

Rohypnol, aka flunitirazepam, is the best selling benzodiazepine in Europe, even though it has never been approved for sale in the U.S. Even importing it with a prescription has been illegal since 1996.

A Swiss study published in 2016 collected users' descriptions of the effects of benzodiazepines alone and in combination with alcohol and other drugs on memory and behavior. This study mentions both Rohypnol and GHB. The abstract notes Rohypnol's reputation for triggering violent criminal behavior and severe memory disturbances, but also states, "However, data from investigations of this relationship are scarce and have been primarily derived from forensic institutions, where there may be a reporting bias."

Twenty-five of the 41 subjects reported anterograde amnesia, the loss of memory for events subsequent to the trigger of the amnesia (as opposed to retrograde amnesia, a disturbance of prior memories). Subjects also described disinhibited behavior from petty crimes to sex with strangers, cheating on a lover, violence and aggressive behavior leading to injury. They also described negative consequences on personal relationships, and embarrassment when their behavior was reported to them by others. Participants specifically mentioned Rohypnol, and Midazolam (another benzodiazepine).

But here's the most important thing in the paper, at the end, "We were unable to verify objectively either the occurrence of anterograde amnesia or the combination and amount of ingested substances that might have contributed to it, limiting the generalizability of the study." The study also notes there is no clear dose-event relationship. Essentially, data supporting the relationship between benzodiazepines and amnesia is still scarce.

Because of concerns about the potential for misuse, Rohypnol was reformulated in 1997 so that if a tablet is dissolved a blue color will be visible.

The second "date rape drug" is GHB, gamma hydroxybutyric acid, a substance that is in tissue in the human body, most heavily concentrated in the brain. Before made a Schedule 1 drug in 2000, it had been available in the U.S. over the counter, for decades. In those years, GHB was consumed by people with interest in body-building to increase muscle mass, suppress appetite and stimulate growth hormone. GHB also developed a reputation as an enhancer of sexual pleasure.

The 2016 Swiss study of benzodiazepine users says GHB, "has been particularly implicated in triggering violent criminal and sexual behavior, impulsive decision-making & anterograde amnesia. However, there are only limited data available, especially with regard to symptoms of amnesia."

Amnesia is a medical term for memory loss. The Hollywood version of amnesia is the erasure of memory as if it were an old VHS tape. The loss of memory can be limited to a distinct segment of time, or loss of recall for one's entire life perhaps including one's name.

Actual memory loss is much more commonly like a patchy memory. If the memory disruption is caused by a chemical, such as alcohol, bits may begin to return after the alcohol is gone from the body. Talking with others may jog memory. Incomplete memories can also return spontaneously over time.

Amnesia is not only rare, but the empty VHS tape style of amnesia is rarer still.

Amnesia of the type that is part of date rape drug scenarios could be an indication of an emergency. Causes could include head trauma, stroke, infection, inflammation or lack of oxygen from a heart attack or carbon monoxide.

A severe amnesia requires medical evaluation, ideally by a neurologist, with a physical exam, check of reflexes, sensory function, balance, judgment, and short term and long term memory. Other necessary information is the time the memory loss started, the trigger, family history, personality changes, language difficulties, difficulties with self care and seizures. Dementia, Alzheimers, depression and brain tumors must be ruled out. EEG, MRI or CT scans or blood work may have to be performed.

Amnesia is serious business.

Another problem that goes along with the disrupted memories is that the blanks may be filled in with false information, in a process called confabulation. The amnesia sufferer is not intentionally lying, and is unaware that she is confabulating. This phenomenon has disturbing implications in situations where the amnesiac's story will have real world effects on another person's life, such as in a criminal trial or a campus proceeding that may lead to suspension, expulsion and/or ruination of a person's reputation.

A second disturbing implication is what happens when a woman enters a police station and reports that she has missing memory, and believes she has been drugged and raped. Considering the serious nature of the medical conditions that cause amnesia, and the fact that the person doing the reporting is reporting memory deficits, one would think that an examination at an emergency room would be the first order of business. But you would think wrong.

John Gordon Jones, Andrew Luster and twins George and Stefan Spitzer were all prosecuted, and all but Jones, convicted, based on an individual woman turning up at a police station and reporting she had no memory of the night before, but suspected herself of having been drugged and raped by a particular man. Luster's initial accuser was immediately asked by police to place a call to him to try to record incriminating admission. A woman making a similar complaint about George lead to a search that turned up Rohypnol for which his dad had a prescription and video tapes showing George and Stefan in sexual activities.

The frequency of drugs being deployed to inflict harm on an unconscious and unaware person are very rare. Testimony given to the U.S. Sentencing Commission by Jodi L. Avergun of the Dangerous Drug Section of the Criminal Division at the Department of Justice in 2004 noted the following:

> How large is the problem of drug-facilitated rape, and how often is GHB the tool of sexual predators? Reliable data are simply not available. Because GHB cannot be traced in blood or urine after about 8-12 hours, even tests conducted the day after the incident are too late. The effects of GHB are such that many victims cannot recall or do not realize what happened. However, we can hazard some idea of the scale. Some estimate that drugs are used in 15-20 percent of sexual assaults."

Considering the resources available to the federal government, especially in light of the widespread fear inflicted for the most part on young women, and the potential for dire consequences for the lives and freedom of men, saying "we don't know" in the place of data is remarkably irresponsible.

In 2004, there actually was some pertinent data available . Results of a study initiated to collect evidence of the presence of Rohypnol use to facilitate rape were published in 1999. During 24 months during 1996-1998, police, emergency rooms and rape crisis centers forwarded urine samples associated with allegations of sexual misconduct involving misuse of a drug. This was less than one sample per state per month.

Samples were tested for 20 drugs and alcohol by Gas Chromatograph Mass Spectrometer. The most common result was found in 422 samples: a negative for all the drugs and alcohol. Second most common was a positive for alcohol (some had other drugs as well). GHB, which became a Schedule 1 drug in 2000, was in 45 samples. Rohypnol, the initial focus of the study, appeared in 6 samples, of which 4 were positive for at least one other drug and/or alcohol.

According to the researchers, "These data clearly indicate that there is no evidence of widespread misuse of flunitrazepam in sexual assault. Alcohol remains the substance most frequently associated with this type of crime." Also, the study states that, "Despite the widespread media interest, there has been little proven evidence and no systematic investigation of the incidence of drug use in the crime of sexual assault." This used, "a highly specific and sensitive GC-MS analysis which has a detection limit of less than 1 ng/ml. This procedure can confirm the presence of flunitrazepan metabolites in the urine at least 72 hours after ingestion of a 1 mg dose of the drug." Almost all of the samples were processed within the first 24 hours after the drug was ingested, and only a tiny fraction of the samples were tested after 72 hours.

In the discussion section, the researchers also note, "Despite media reports, these results do not support the labelling of flunitrazepam as a `date rape drug'. The incidence of samples positive for flunitrazepam was very low, and the trend for detection, if any, decreased over time." The paper closes with a mention the usefulness of this particular drug for patients with sleep or anxiety disorders. "For these legitimate users of the drug, flunitrazepam remains a valuable, safe and effective hypnotic."

According to a 2006 paper on GHB submitted to the World Health Organization, effects of intravenous GHB can begin within 5 minutes, unconsciousness lasting 1-2 hours or more, "….after which there is a sudden awakening." This doesn't work for the narrative.

The most common internet search results I saw while preparing this essay were consistent with the date rape drug narrative, and incompatible with what actual data collected that does not conform to the narrative.

It's not impossible for a man to go to a public place, choose one woman among numerous strangers, slip something into her drink and propel her from the scene without being noticed by anyone, have sex with her and arrange for her to be in a situation where she will be unable to recall enough information to identify the perpetrator.

Even if a woman initiates a police report like reports that have led to prosecutions in the past, including a lack of memory, belief she was drugged and raped, a urine test is for Rohypnol or GHB is positive, and his DNA on her person or clothing, it's not case closed.

Perhaps this woman is suffering a medical condition causing amnesia. Her testimony would be unreliable. Shortly after she and the man engaged consensual sex and drugs, an unrelated medical emergency damages her memory. It might be nice if police acted on the potential for serious health problems as vigorously as they seek a warrant.

Another cause for reasonable doubt is that a woman who willingly engaged in sex and drugs woke up with a patchy memory of the sex, but no memory of when she did say, "Yes, please," to GHB or Rohypnol. If the authorities are willing to believe that one of these drugs can completely blot out awareness and ability to refuse consent, they should be willing to entertain the possibility that her memories, while compatible with the popular narrative, are not what actually happened.

Reported memories could be colored by embarrassment. The 2016 study of benzodiazepine-users mentioned feeling that their behavior under the influence, described to them by others, was incompatible with their normal behavior and self-image, causing distress, shame and embarrassment. Suppose a woman is feeling out-of-sorts in the morning, with blurry memories, and familiarity with the date rape drug narrative. Suppose she gave him her phone number, and he didn't call her. Suppose she ruminates, or discusses her feelings with friends familiar with the narrative. It's a short trip from "not like me" to "I could never."

It's because of the murkiness of human experience (that can be exemplified by not just the narrative, but that events driven by this narrative that have put real men in prison for decades), that the elements of due process are so very important. Innocent until proven guilty, scientifically sound evidence, appeals, and especially reasonable doubt are very serviceable as a counter to mob emotions and demands for quick action. But most of all, any case that springs from a narrative like date rape drugs, is a case in which the most important job of the jury is to make their ruling based on the explanation of events that is consistent with innocence.

Jaye's Red Pill documents social failure to promote gender equality

Douglas Galbi · 9 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Warning signs of collapsing public reason are readily apparent, particularly in the U.S. Yet distinguishing bluster and posing from what truly matters isn't easy. Women and men have lived in intimate, enduring relationships with each other for as long as the human species has existed. Relationships between men and women truly matter. Cassie Jaye's new film documentary, The Red Pill, provides a horrifying look at how lies, fraud, and anti-men bigotry at the highest levels of society have perverted ideals of gender equality and deeply damaged women and men's relationships.

A Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (CBC) news report illustrates the extent of the problem. To understand The Red Pill and "the culture of men's rights activism," the CBC interviewed a professor of Women's Studies at the University of Calgary. This news report thus drew together vitally important public institutions — a major broadcasting entity, a news report, and a professor at a public university. From the perspectives of many reasonable persons, the CBC "news report" was an outrage and a farce. It utterly misrepresented The Red Pill. The CBC failed to address serious issues affecting men and boys, and women and girls who care about men and boys and whose lives are intimately entangled with theirs.

To understand vitally important issues, you cannot count on leading public institutions to inform you. You must investigate for yourself. A good start is to watch The Red Pill. There are a wide array of options for buying, renting, or streaming The Red Pill. Watch it and learn about issues central to women and men's relationships.

After you've watched The Red Pill, study how mainstream institutions currently work to advance ignorance and anti-men bigotry. Karen Straughan, a heroic and intellectually brilliant analyst of men's issues, provides insightful commentary on the CBC news report. Paul Elam, who has worked tirelessly over the past decade raising consciousness about men being deprived of human rights, brings to the CBC news report justified anger and warranted mockery. Relative to the CBC and a professor at the University of Calgary, Karen Straughan and Paul Elam have very little institutional authority. Yet in reason and in sense of justice, they tower above many of today's powerful institutional authorities.

The failure of the CBC news report seems to me to go deeper than Karen Staughan's and Paul Elam's critiques indicate. The University of Calgary professor emphasized that The Red Pill movie is "dangerous" and "scary." Within the U.S. today, a woman merely stating to criminal justice authorities that she "feels afraid" of another person is enough to have that other person's basic civil liberties suspended under domestic violence emergency law. In fact, the totalitarian regime of domestic violence emergency law is invoked an estimated 1.7 million times per year across circumstances that are far from any reasonable understanding of an emergency. In reality, claims that women are scared have already gutted the U.S. Constitution. The University of Calgary professor's claim of being scared should be understood within the context of totalitarian suspension of basic civil rights and liberties.

Given that the commanding institutions of society are forcefully arrayed against them, justice-seekers depicted in The Red Pill show heart-warming moral courage. Harry Crouch, President of the National Coalition for Men, comes across as a quiet, modest, ordinary human being confronting extraordinarily difficult circumstances. Erin Pizzey, a pioneer in starting a domestic violence shelter for women, refused to demonize men and paid a heavy price for her basic human decency. Fred Hayward tells outrageous and poignant stories about his love for his son and how he lost him. While serving his country as a soldier, Carnell Smith was attacked with a fraudulent paternity claim. His country did nothing to help him. He has worked energetically to help his country to understand the injustice of paternity fraud. If civilization endures and advances, such men and women will be celebrated as social-justice heroes.

The Coalition to Create a White House Council on Boys & Men sponsored a screening of The Red Pill in Washington, DC, on March 7, 2017. In March, 2009, President Obama created to great acclaim a high-powered White House Council on Women and Girls. The need for a White House Council on Boys and Men is much greater. Yet creating one would generate not acclaim, but withering criticism from entrenched interests at the commanding heights of public life. Any smart president would be no more likely to create a White House Council on Boys and Men than any smart politician would challenge men not having equal reproductive rights and reproductive choice, anti-men sex discrimination in child custody and child support, the vastly disproportional incarceration of men, the predominance of violence against men, and many other major injustices in men's lives.

Watching Cassie Jaye's The Red Pill will raise your consciousness about injustices against men. It will also help you to understand just how badly leading public institutions are performing. Understanding truthfully where we are is a key step in moving forward.

What football teaches boys, and the value in learning some barbarism

Anwar Y. Dunbar · 9 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Author's Note: The point of the following essay is not to belittle single mothers and boys raised primarily by women. Its focus is to ultimately ask questions about what happens when boys transition into manhood without the qualities they need as men. It further visits where they learn these qualities; qualities that are arguably under attack by society today.

My first two submissions on A Voice for Men (AVFM) were very well received and I'm thus back for a third. With me working on a book, running my blog and now having a YouTube channel of my own, it's taken time to prepare and submit this third piece. It comes at an ideal time as we're early in the football season at all levels. While it's considered by many to be a 'barbaric' sport and there are health concerns surrounding it like Chronic Traumatic Encephalopathy (CTE), in the following essay I will discuss why it's a valuable learning tool for the boys who participate in it whether they go on to play big time college or professional football.

"Football is a barbaric sport!" Some of my earliest childhood memories are my mother's words about American Football. My parents divorced when I was three years old and so I didn't take to baseball, the sport my father specialized in. Due to life circumstances, there was also limited interactions with my Uncles, four out of five of whom were sports experts. They probably would've exposed us to the many little leagues around Buffalo, of which there were many. Consequently, I didn't get a lot of exposure to football as a child and I likewise considered it an evil, barbaric sport.

That changed in middle school when my best friend received the game "Tecmo Bowl" for his Nintendo Entertainment System. Playing it, I started learning football's rules and nuances: what an interception was, what a run vs. a pass play was, what a quarterback was, what a 'sack' was, etc. I began gleaning that there was a tremendous amount of thought and strategy involved aside from the game's perceived barbarism. Around that time, both my brother and I were given a Sega Master System or a Sega Genesis and started playing the original "John Madden Football" which continued my football education.

Something else happened, our hometown Buffalo Bills became competitive. The Bills sucked for most of my early youth, but they were gradually built into a championship contender who now knocked on the door of the "Super Bowl" in the late 1980s. In 1991, they finally broke through and made it to Super Bowl XXV in Tampa, FL.

Those games on the Bills' march to Tampa were literally the first two to three football games that I'd ever watched on any level. At that point all I knew was that the Bills were winning, but not much else. I saw the hitting, the tackling and all the things that made it appear to be barbaric. Again though, it was also a cerebral game. The coaches and their coordinators were literally playing 'chess' with one another, attempting to counter and stymie the other's moves. The players learned whole playbooks and made decisions 'pre-snap' and then in real time during plays. There was also picture study during games, and film study prior to and post-game.

But where am I going with this discussion about this barbaric sport? As I said earlier, I didn't get into it until later in my youth. I fell in love with basketball first which turned out to be a contact sport in its own way, though it didn't have that reputation. During my stint on my high school basketball team, some of my teammates were also football players. As a matter of fact, when I looked around Western New York, I saw that many football players hung up their cleats after their last games and ran for the hardwood.

One teammate in my sophomore year stands out to me. He was nicknamed "Spankey". I didn't know if he was named after the "Little Rascals" character or not, but I suspect it was something else. Either way, Spankey had an ‘extra gear’ in his personal motor, and he was fearless. Some would say he was a little crazy too. He wasn’t afraid to hit someone else, or to get hit on the football field or on the hardwood. I had another basketball teammate named “Cal” in the class behind me who was also a football player. He was fearless just like Spankey.

My high school basketball coach encouraged all his players to play fall and spring sports to keep us in shape for basketball. At the start of my junior year, I decided to go out for our high school football team. Now mind you, Western New York high school football was nowhere near the level of the high school football in Florida, Texas, California or Ohio, but playing on the gridiron wherever you played meant something.

How did I do at tryouts? Well, unlike on TV, they weren’t much of a tryout. Our football coach knew that I played basketball and was willing to let me walk on after I took my physical and went through the mandatory number of practices without pads. I was excited that I was going to be on the football team. It was going to be cool to wear a helmet, shoulder pads and cleats like Bo Jackson, and I was going to catch some passes like wide receiver Jerry Rice on TV.

The first and only piece of equipment I got was my helmet. Let me tell you that I have the utmost respect for football players, just for running around with those helmets on for hours and hours especially in the warm weather states. When I put my helmet on, it felt like I was wearing a set of weights on my head. Running around with it felt so unnatural, and I remember my neck struggling to keep my head steady.

My dreams of running and catching passes quickly dissipated when the coaches timed me in the “40-Yard Dash”, simply known as “The 40”. I clocked a slower speed (closer to five seconds) which got me assigned the center position on the offensive line, which I didn’t appreciate at the time. It was also my first time doing any of the drills and they were all foreign and unnatural for me. I didn’t have cleats yet and I recall my feet slipping on the grass when trying hit the sled.

My basketball teammate, Cal, mentioned above let me know that I wasn’t fond of contact at least initially. On ‘seven on seven’ drill where I played defense, I recall attempting to ‘rush’ the passer. I didn’t have any pads on besides my helmet. Cal played offense and blocked me with his hands and or forearms on my ribs which took my breath completely away and put major doubt in my mind about playing the game.

The day I decided I didn’t want to play anymore was a Saturday morning, a cold autumn Western New York Saturday morning. I might have stayed up too late the night before, and I wanted to stay in our warm house. I took the bus and the train to downtown Buffalo. When I got off the train, I felt the wind literally blow right through my body.

I might’ve been wearing shorts that morning instead of sweatpants which didn’t help. I quickly decided that I wasn’t going to LaSalle Park on the Niagara River with the rest of the team. I turned around and went home to our warm house. That Monday, I turned in my helmet and set out to run Cross Country as I’d seen my brother do. I’d grown up seeing my mother run so that was a little more normal for me.

“ANWAR YOU’RE A QUITTER AND YOU’RE SOFT FOR RUNNING CROSS-COUNTRY!” One day as our Cross-Country team warmed up next to our school, the football players emerged and headed over to their practice. Spankey saw me and verbally ripped me in front of my new teammates. I wasn’t going to trade jabs with him. As I said before his ‘motor ran hot’, so I just smiled and shrugged it off.

“YEAH WELL AT LEAST WE WIN!” One of the captains, named Darrell, surprisingly gave it right back to Spankey on my behalf. They were in the same graduating class. To my surprise, Spankey just kept walking with his helmet in tow, and didn’t confront Darrell. I wondered if I could’ve gotten away with such a rebuttal. I was surprised and thankful for Darrell sticking up for me which was brave as he was wiry, and only a fraction of Spankey’s size.

Well, let’s go back to Spankey’s words. Was there some truth to them? Yes. I did quit the football team when it got hard. My heart wasn’t in it, and I did it (and Cross-Country) to stay in my basketball coach’s good graces. In hindsight though, by not staying the course, I missed out on a lot of growth and toughening which is ultimately what this story is about. By the way, while I thought Cross-Country would be the safer sport, I did get hurt running a race which contributed to ruining me and my teammates' basketball season. Go figure.

So, what do boys learn from playing football and why is it important to learn some barbarism? My answers are as follows and they may all overlap:

Physical Toughness– In my opinion the football players are the toughest of all the athletes, maybe rivaled by boxers and martial artists of all kinds – the mixed martial artists (MMA) particularly. They hit, they get hit and they play their sport mostly outside in some very, very adverse weather conditions – both hot and cold depending on the geographic region. In order to do this, they must have lots of toughness and perseverance.

Mental Perseverance– Practicing every day, building your body up, playing with pain and playing outside in the elements takes mental toughness and perseverance. You must learn how to keep going even in the most adverse conditions.

Mental Discipline and the ability Compartmentalize– This is related to mental perseverance. Many football coaches are known for yelling and cursing at their players, at least they used to be. Some would argue that today's kids are soft and can't take it. Players who play for such coaches must be able to not take the coaching personally and to focus on the objective. Many kids buckle when coached in this way, but the strong kids shrug it off and keep going. The same is true for getting beaten on a play and mentally rebounding, quickly.

A coach once told me that he could tell how boys on his team were raised by the way they responded. He could tell who had men in the house and who didn't. Likewise, just as in my case, I have a cousin and a Godson who both started the game, but eventually quit it. Just like me, they both coincidentally needed the second two above-mentioned qualities described, and they either didn't have consistent male figures around, or the relationships with the men who were around were estranged. I believe that a man would've challenged them both to not quit and to finish, just like one would've challenged me.

If you haven't seen it, look up Marshawn Lynch's encounter with the single mother whose son was misbehaving at his football camp. She reprimanded Lynch for trying to discipline her son. The sometimes-volatile Lynch made news by asking the woman, "Is there a man around that I can talk to?" Lynch's assumption was that a man would understand letting his son take the ass-whipping from his coach instead of babying him.

In this era of 'equality' of the sexes, the argument can and will be made that girls need these same qualities too. While that may be true in some instances, we also must look back at the qualities and attributes that men are graded on, and what we use to qualify what's 'manly' and 'masculine'. Some of it involves displays of power and strength, just like in the wild. Some would call this "Toxic Masculinity". I'll further argue that men who don't show those qualities are frowned upon, and have a hard time garnering the respect of most women long-term and other men.

An example is the proverbial noise downstairs when a man and woman are in bed sleeping at night. Which of the two is expected to go investigate the noise? Which gender makes up the bulk of our law enforcement whose job is to protect and serve our communities? Which gender has traditionally made up the bulk of our military forces which is charged with protecting our way of life here in the United States? Which gender is expected to protect the other on the streets should danger arise? In a more humorous sense, which gender is frowned upon they don't get up and use their strength to help the other gender carry the proverbial grocery bags and boxes into the home after a shopping trip? I could go on, but you get my point.

This is just some food for thought in this era where the qualities of men are being scrutinized and nefariously engineered and reshaped. Yes, I'm looking at you, Gillette. I, coincidentally, recently listened to a podcast by Curtis Scoon and Jason Whitlock. Jason speculated that the recent attacks on the NFL were rooted in efforts to destroy what it stands for and it's displays of masculinity.

Another friend says she would like to see football broken up and replaced with soccer so that girls can have a share of the money that the sport commands. My position is that it's the hitting, the barbarism and the shows of athleticism, in addition to the chess match taking place in every game, that attracts us. This all comes from the male sex.

I'm going to close by saying that football isn't the only vehicle for boys learning the qualities described. Martial Arts such as Jiu Jitsu, Judo or any means of fighting can provide much of the same thing. Martial artists are just as strong and tough. As I was completing this essay, my mother pointed out that me and my brother did take Isshinryu Karate just before middle school. We both go to the level of yellow belt. We were in part inspired by the movie, The Karate Kid. For myself at that age, I can say that I didn't understand the context of it, and I didn't understand how to finish things.

In writing this essay, I'm not endorsing violence against either sex by any means. There are certainly numerous examples of violent men in society and in some instances, we're seeing more and more violent and uncontrollable young men. For many, their uncontrolled barbarism is rooted in their being emotionally fragile and lacking two of the three the qualities described above.

We need to give a lot of thought about how they got that way, what can potentially rehabilitate them, and if not, who will protect others from them. Lastly, we need to consider how our modern social experiments have contributed to society's current circumstances, and rethink what is 'toxic' in masculinity and what isn't. In closing, some barbarism is good and necessary for men to become the 'best' they can be, right Gillette?

I want to thank Paul Elam for starting AVFM and AEFM, and for all the other men's channels for creating their content. They provide key information that many of us weren't taught at home. Many of us 'Blue Pill' men left our homes blind, and without this information, we would've never known what was going on or why – this is the essence of the 'Red Pill' movement.

I now have my own YouTube channel, "Big Discussions76" where I discuss topics like this and many others. I also have my own blog entitled, "Big Words" where I write and publish content from guests discussing: Education, STEM, Financial Literacy and other topics. Please stop by. You can follow me on Twitter at @BWArePowerful, at the Big Words Blog Site Facebook page, and on Instagram at @anwaryusef76. I'll close this with one of Paul's usual endings and say, "Thank you for reading my essay, and I hope you enjoyed reading it, even if you didn't."

Men's Movement: Personal and Political (ICMI'18 Speech)

Paul Elam · 9 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Transcript:

Greetings everyone,

I wish I could have been there in person to deliver this message, but unfortunately that wasn't to be this time. I'd like to thank Mike and the Justice for Men and Boys organization for inviting me to do this talk, and for all their hard work, for the conferences and all they do on behalf of men and boys and the women who love them.

And you know, that work is really a remarkable thing. It boggles the mind when you think about it. We've become part of a philosophy that opposes longstanding and intense social programming to ignore the issues in men's lives in the name of forever putting women and all other groups first. The ideas we embrace are healthy, functional, and corrective to social problems, yet are viewed by the general population as pathological and dangerous.

Thanks in part to the Fake News media, we have been labeled as haters, even though our work demonstrates that we are, in fact, rejecting hatred and hateful ideology.

That's life for MRAs, and more broadly red-pilled people, and its often marked by loneliness, isolation and varying degrees of frustration. Compounding that is the fact that our lives require us to assume the daunting task of rejecting the pathological, unhealthy obsession on the issues of women, known as gynocentrim, in a world that will punish you for shining a light on the problem.

Mind you, I am fully aware that you are hearing me talk about this right now in a country that at one time produced the likes of the great Winston Churchill, but now imprisons people for telling jokes and practicing journalism.

It's hard to forge ahead under those conditions.

Or is it?

Among other things, that's a question I want to explore today, and I'd like to offer some reflections on the modern men's movement; which I see as actually two movements. One personal, the other political.

To do that we have to start with some bad news. Actually, I mean a lot of bad news.

If you're looking for a clear cut, watershed victory for men and boys on any large scale, political or social, you can quit wasting your time. It's never going to happen. There will never be a men's rights victory parade, nor broad legislation that corrects problems faced by men and boys, nor a sweeping shift in public consciousness that overrides the destructive human impulse to regard women as entitled and privileged. An ever fragile, protected class without agency or accountability. The reasons for that are simple and inescapable.

As they say, without men, civilization can only last till the next oil change. Society piles complete and total responsibility on men for its existence. Almost all the sacrifice, of blood and sweat and of life that is required to keep the world turning, to keep us living in relative comfort and safety, is male sacrifice. Women won't do it. Women can't do it.

I know, to say that is heresy, as is often the case with truth today. But truth, as any MRA can tell you, is a cruel master. It is brutal and unforgiving. It cares not for mainstream sensibilities. And it exists in complete indifference to our feelings.

And with the harshness of these uncomfortable truths comes some uncomfortable realities. Like the fact that in society men's vulnerabilities will always be overshadowed by expectations for them to protect, provide and perform. Prioritizing the issues of men and boys, caring about them, will always be perceived as a threat to women, a threat to the state and a certain pathway to destabilizing society. Therefore, the organized correction of men's issues will be treated as strictly verboten for as far as we can see into the future. Just ask the SPLC.

Society, that being men and women working together, forever strives to keep men uneducated and unaware of their own condition – to brainwash men into believing that taking care of themselves is a form of cowardice. Men who are conscious of all this are difficult to exploit, which is to say most men are like hardwood floors. You can walk on them forever.

The modern men's movement is the one and only alternative to that line of dysfunctional thinking, but getting there is not without problems.

Strangely, in a world as polarized as it can be politically, religiously and in most other ways humans devise to square off from each other in camps, the deference to those who advocate for women and chastise men is one area of near unanimity.

The world agrees on what it knows about men. Men don't have problems, men are the problem. Men have too much power and should be on a mission to yield that power to anyone who demands it. Men need to quit pretending they have problems that matter, man up and help others. Hopefully, when men die, they do it in an act of bravery, making sure someone else gets to live. If you think I'm exaggerating, you're not paying attention.

We are all familiar with the ubiquitous superabundance of male shortcomings. Men's addiction to power; their incapacity for love and intimacy; their inability to articulate their feelings to the satisfaction of a feminist mental health industry; their innate and destructive aggression. The list of stereotypes is all but unending, sufficiently dehumanizing men so that they can be exploited without remorse or reconsideration.

Driven by pure social force, diseases, suicide, homelessness, educational failure, addictions, all predominately, overwhelmingly male problems are hidden behind the fabricated, false veneer of men's supposed power and privilege.

Meanwhile, as the world ever sharpens its ability impugn men's very existence, our war zones and blue-collar graveyards still run with the blood of men. The dirty, dangerous work required to maintain our society is written in the cut and calloused hands of men. Even in the sometimes deadly battlefield of the human psyche, where casualties are reflected in suicide statistics, we find that too is a man's world.

And rather than have compassion for any of this, society is more prone to mock and ridicule men who are uppity enough to complain about it.

It's almost enough to make you throw in the towel or raise a white flag. More frankly, all this explains why so many men never join the fight; why we have so few in a movement trying to do for men what most are too timid, too indoctrinated or too self-loathing to do for themselves.

Even then, because men are so awesome and capable on behalf of anyone but themselves; because they are willing to do whatever needs to be done so that everyone else gets a better deal, because we are so dependent on their sacrifices we will always blind ourselves to their suffering. We will always ignore their problems and will likely always shun them for daring to discuss these things. Decades of involvement with men's issues and the lifelong study of human sexual behavior leave me convinced that this will never change across the board for human beings.

But, even in the midst of all this apparent pessimism, the conclusion I have that matters is not one of hopelessness at all. As a matter of fact, it is just the opposite.

The fact is that human males are indeed awesome creatures. Some are capable of casting off the shroud ignorance and hate in which modern society has wrapped masculinity, and rebelling in a healthy way. How many, we don't know, but the very existence of this movement, its refusal to die, demonstrates that truth.

Many men can't be reached, of course. Some are just too steeped in the self-destructive tradition of unconscious, servile masculinity. They are destined to go from cradle to grave as obedient zombies, unable to imagine life outside the toxic role prescribed for them by a parasitic society.

And let's face it, that is the average man. In understanding that the average man, much like the average woman, is a lost cause, we can and should take solace in the fact that the men's movement is a movement for exceptional people. It is a movement that serves as a life sustaining intellectual and emotional refuge for remarkable people in an unremarkable world.

I'd borrow from the social justice crowd and call it a safe space, but safe spaces are built on comfortable lies, embraced by weak people to shield them from the real world. The safety of the men's movement resides in the fact that MRAs have the strength to deal with reality. Our safety is in our values and in our spines, which is why after years of mainstream media attacks and campaigns of disinformation, we are still here with ideas that cannot be killed or ignored by everyone.

If that sounds self-congratulatory, it certainly should. If you are sitting there, as a man or a woman, watching this, knowing that you are cut from a different, more conscious cloth; that you don't fit in the blue pill world and don't want to; knowing that you equally recognize the humanity of both men and women and that you possess a depth of compassion and caring that extends to places and people ignored by the rest of the world, then you are exceptional.

Your character IS the character of the men's movement, the rest of this lying world be damned.

That brings us to the purely personal side of this movement. The fact that one of our most redeeming and valuable features is that we offer men a clear path away from personal destruction. We benefit from one simple truth. The greatest majority of men's issues, including matters of their human rights, can be effectively addressed by men's personal choices.

Matter of fact, that is so important I want to say it again. The greatest majority of men's issues, including matters of their human rights, can be effectively addressed by men's personal choices.

Likewise, the greatest threat men's rights is their own choices, almost always driven by a lopsided and rigged social contract with women.

We understand the pitfalls of that contract very well, especially when codified in law by marriage. False allegations, suicide, parental alienation, ruinous divorces, restraining order abuses, male financial exploitation, destructive, personality disordered women whose evil acts are enabled by society, and the bias that invariably turns against men when they are engaged in conflict with a woman.

Understanding these problems and the readily available solutions isn't complicated once you rise above the blue pill fog. The trick is in practicing the resolve and the courage to carry a message to men, in plain public view, with shameless abandon.

And that message, to its core, is anti-matrimonial. We need to teach men, reaching them at the youngest ages we possibly can, that marriage, as it stands, is cancer. It is painfully easy, and equally obvious to see how so many of men's issues, including suicide, is connected to marriage and divorce. And I am asserting that marriage and divorce each stand alone as separate and distinct problems in the lives of men.

Divorce can wreck a man's social, professional and financial life, marriage can destroy his soul. This isn't a playful joke about the stresses of married life. It is a deadly serious statement about life in a world that socializes women to be opportunistic parasites in the lives of men.

A contract between a man and a woman that starts with the man on bended knee, making a demonstration of his ability and willingness to provide for the desires of the woman, including the frivolous, is the same contract that a leech has with your leg.

Think about that for a moment. Picture that iconic scene of a man kneeling, presenting a diamond in hopes of being loved. If you've any honesty at all, you know his rights are gone, right then and there. He doesn't have to wait for a family court judge to smash down the gavel and make it more official. He is coming to the relationship on his knees, offering sacrifice and hoping for nothing but acceptance of that sacrifice.

It's his mentality as a man, his sense of his place in the world that is the problem. Society teaches men, often savagely, that if momma ain't happy, ain't nobody happy. Women frequently reinforce that aphorism as though it were a god given right.

This is not a shot at women, though. As with every other sociosexual malady in modern times, it is a product of women and men working cooperatively. The men's movement offers an honest, if sometimes brutal critique of both sexes. But unlike feminism, our answers don't come from demonizing half the population while we concoct outlandish theories about why we're not responsible for our own shortcomings and our own decisions.

Most of us understand that true victims are rare. Most of our problems are of our own making. Most of our answers are in the mirror. And that is where this movement becomes highly personal.

One very direct solution we have is men checking out and going their own way, which they are currently doing in impressive numbers. And if you're wondering if I am saying that MGTOW is the men's movement, you bet I am. It's the largest, most functional part of it. It is, in the truest sense, the movement of men, away from toxic expectations, away from rigged contracts and away from ways of thinking that create a belief they are beholden to women as a class.

Men going their own way don't agree to produce children just to have them taken away. They don't get their property stolen by the state and given to a woman. They don't live, as many men do, watching their interests, their friendships and their dreams slowly erode till they disappear.

They don't start contracts on their knees, so they don't end up on their knees, or flat on their backs when its over.

By owning their lives and actions, MGTOW are reminding us every day that there are no victims, just volunteers.

In fact, MGTOW philosophy is so powerful it can also be very helpful to married men, who can still benefit greatly from red pill values, starting by learning to say no to their wives, and yes to their lives, rejecting any punishment for doing so for the abuse that it is. Learning to say, If momma ain't happy, then momma needs to own her shit and live with the fact that the world does not revolve around her desires.

The men's movement, MGTOW philosophy, red pill thinking, whatever you want to call it, is teaching men of all stripes to value themselves. It is showing us that one man at a time, all men can win the gender war, not by attacking women, but by taking responsibility for their decisions, by having healthy values and living by them even when there is a cost.

Now, I know that some people will be listening to this with disappointment. They will recognize, and rightly so, that the nuclear family has long been the backbone of a stable society. They know that the deterioration of the family unit is directly proportional to the deterioration of society.

They will also recognize, and just as rightly, that human beings are driven to pair bond; that generally speaking we do not do as well flying solo as we do when meaningfully connected. They will lament all the loss that this represents, and once again they will be mostly on the mark.

But what I think these people fail to see is that MGTOW isn't an attack on marriage, it's a response to the fact that marriage is now an attack on men. Marriage was broken, fatally, a long time before MGTOW started gaining its current popularity.

It was broken by feminists, with no fault divorce policies that enabled women to steal men's children, and their property simply because they want to. It was broken by corrupt family courts where the legal profession lines its pockets on the destruction of families. It was broken by traditionalists and their archaic, romantic, and frankly stupid illusions about love, and the ridiculously lopsided and burdensome expectations that it places on men.

Men walking away is the solution, not the problem. If the world wants other solutions, solutions that bring men back into the fold, it should work on them. Not just on fixing family law, but on ending female privilege and correcting the social contract. And it needs to provide a payoff for men, starting with a return of demonstrated respect and thanks for thier contributions. Till that happens, which is a long way off, the only sane path for men is one that leads away from the insanity. Like I said. This is not going to be sweeping, pervasive change. The point that I am making, though, is that each and every man within earshot of this talk, married or single, religious or not, of any race or creed, can use this movement, this way of thinking, to make his life infinitely better. We needn't wait for government, or women, or other men for that matter to do it for us. In fact, waiting for those kinds of external forces to come to the aid of men and boys reflects a lack of understanding of the problems.

And one last note on this very personal movement. Second wave feminists, like all feminists, were wrong about nearly everything that ever issued from their mouths. You know that or you would likely not be at this conference. Either that, or you're possibly a member of the fake news media here covering it.

One thing though that they did get right. They were fond of the notion that The Personal is Political. A hat tip to the fact that especially in the realm of sex-based issues, the politics of it is deeply, penetratingly personal.

The difference is that for women it meant a war against men. And it means the same in reverse for many men new to the MRM, or to disaffected men who are stuck in irrational, unresolvable anger. For them, it is a war against women.

In reality, the men's movement is a war with ourselves. It's a war against our lack of values with women, against our gynocentric ways and against our addiction to group consensus; to the world's abusive, dysfunctional notion of what makes a man. It is a war against our own weakness. And you bet, all of this is personal. And so are our answers, all staring at us right in the mirror when we dare to look.

All this might leave you thinking that any political solutions are pointless. That would certainly be the point of view of some men going their own way. They are simply exiting the system with no intention of looking back. And they tend to view political activism by MRAs as an effort to clean up the plantation so we can get men to willingly walk back onto it and into subservience.

Of course, that is a largely emotional and irrational perspective. I for one, have no intention of ever marrying. I still want to do all I can to diminish the power of feminism, and would find nothing more gleeful than to gut its funding by pretty much any means necessary. That won't end gynocentrism, or make modern marriage more palatable in the short run, but I do think we are at the point politically where we can do great damage to feminists. With the recent meteoric rise of populist movements across the globe, we have the real possibility to attack their funding, something that would serve humankind.

Left wing universities, which is to say nearly all of them, produce an unending stream of gender zombies; embittered, brainwashed women; victocrats of privilege, and malleable, indoctrinated young men whose identity hinges on supporting and enabling women who demonize them. Media pundits fret over imaginary wage gaps, fabricated epidemics of sexual assault and will forever try to top each other in virtue signaling over the latest #MeToo allegation. They will, some subtly, some not, all join in the outrage at men as the root cause of our social ills.

Politicians in the public eye generally follow suit or stand by like sheep as it happens. People who we used to call conservatives, now more accurately called quislings, mask their spinelessness behind a façade of religious dogma and so called traditional-conservative values.

As we look at today's political climate, particularly on the left, we see politics gone feral. In America, we see thinly veiled calls for violence from political leaders, demands that we abolish border enforcement and borders themselves. We see congressmen getting shot while playing softball and the unvarnished harassment of administration officials while simply trying to go about their daily lives. And we see a large part of the culture apparently willing to accept all this as the new normal.

This is a direct result, in my opinion, of widespread father absence. Robbed of the discipline, humility and empathy that fathers engender in children, they grow up noticeably lacking in those crucial qualities. Society suffers from it. That fatherlessness is not just an artifact of the left, though. For fifty years, conservatives have utterly failed to fight back against the left's anti-father, anti-family agenda. In fact, they have become complicit in those objectives.

Why? Because conservative men aren't just weak with feminists. They're weak with women. So weak, they won't fight back as their sons and daughters, as well as their political objectives, are undermined and corrupted.

On that level, even so-called conservative antifeminists haven't made much of a difference. They've been entertaining, but ineffective. They are still self-censoring when it might upset women, which prevents the utterance of a multitude of critical truths. And many are still ultimately gynocentric and weak on the issues. They have lost the battle within themselves. Most never even showed up to fight.

But that is undoubtedly changing. Populist movements are growing everywhere, fired up by people who are done with identity politics, including feminism. We've seen it in the UK with Brexit, even though the UK government now is working furiously to find a way to ignore the will of the people.

The election of Donald Trump in America was much more than a shot across the bow. It was a political thermonuclear detonation. Even an endless barrage of accusations that he is a misogynist, that continues to this day, normally death for an American politician, could not stop him. He gave them all the finger and won an electoral landslide.

Politicians in Australia are starting to fight back, with Senator David Leyonhjelm telling a rabid feminist senator to quote fuck off, in response to her demonization of men as rapists. When the Australian Prime minister played the white knight and demanded that Leyonhjelm, apologize to her, Leyonhjelm called him, among other things, a pussy.

Dorothy, we are not in Kansas anymore.

Therefore, anyone who tells you the men's movement is politically irrelevant is out of touch with reality. Red Pill men and women are poised to play a huge role in swinging upcoming elections, in furthering the political populism that can actually make a difference in policy and law.

Right now, you are at a conference hosted by the founder of the first men's political party in the English speaking world. Since the last conference he hosted in 2016, another has emerged in Scandinavia. If you look now at what is happening in Italy, India, Eastern Europe, Southern Germany and America, all of which will hopefully inspire the UK to regain its momentum back toward sanity, you can see political opportunities that matter.

And one of the greatest opportunities is the growing antifeminist sentiment.

And let us not mince words about this. The war against feminism is a war against the left. And the war against the left is a war against feminism. That is something I would not have dwelled on 10 years ago, given the hapless gynocentrism of the old right. But this is not 10 years ago. Or even 5. This is a new day and a new age of disruptive populism. If you care about men's and boys issues, you can help antifeminists become more effective by educating them about men's issues as well as expanding their knowledge of the mendacity of feminism.

Enlighten the antifeminists. Use them. But do not be fooled into confusing them with advocates for men and boys who fit into our movement.

There are already some who claim to support our ideas, but whose actual motive is to create men and boys who are once again useful to women. These are frequently, but not always women. They will mock third wave feminism, often delightfully. They are entertaining and sometimes enchanting. But at the core of their philosophy is the old, dysfunctional social contract, complete with men's purpose being utility to women.

These people can make convenient allies and are often quite useful in the big political picture. But this movement, and the world at large, still needs what it is woefully short of. Advocates for men and boys. Not cheerleaders for white knights. Not champions for traditional values. Not women who pine for the days when men were men and women were idle.

Not proponents for a toxic social contract between men and women, but true advocates who focus on the needs, wants, problems, aspirations and dreams of men and boys. People who see men and boys as having intrinsic worth. People who will champion the cause of them seeing their own intrinsic worth. People who understand that for women, real equality is a step down from their current station in life. And we need to know, all of us, that a gynocentric core, no matter how innocent or well intentioned, is a disqualifier for that advocacy. Remember, not every antifeminist is Janice Fiamengo. In fact, most of them aren't.

Finally, I'd like to end this talk as I started it, with some thanks for all the people who made this conference possible. To all of you for attending, but especially to those of you in the audience who are more than just antifeminists. All of you who know that trouncing feminists in the arena of idea is like winning a footrace against a paraplegic; those who move past the simplistic pastime of antifeminism to take a stand for the men and boys in this world, even when it makes antifeminists uncomfortable.

I ask you wonderful warriors to please keep making people uncomfortable; to keep reminding a world that does not want to hear it of the radical notion that men are human beings.

Thank you.

Gynocentrism's love affair with gender differences

Peter Wright, Robert Brockway, & Bryan Scandrett · 9 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

1. GYNOCENTRISM (Greek: γυνή, "female" – Latin: centrum, "centred")
■ (a). n. Dominant or exclusive focus on women in theory or practice; or to the advocacy of this. Often practiced to the detriment of non-females.

PragerU are being very intelligent about how they peddle their version of chivalry and service to the damsels. Some years ago, they approached us on face book to run some of their "Man up and get married" material.

Blunt and rude story short, we said "No!"

They now have a much more insidious program going forward to incentivize young boys to run to the plantation in gynocentric service.

It is our belief they intend to make good gains for traditional gynocentrism out of the work of the men's rights movement and antifeminism over the last decade and that is definitely not in the best interests of men and boys.

In this recent video by PragerU we have a neotenous blonde pearl-clutching over violence against women as if she was a feminist… but coming at it from the traditionalist perspective. Listen for the incongruous statements, opening with, "It is now OK for a man to hit a woman!" appearing on to the screen calling you to fight to protect the ladies.

Core to making this approach work is the highlighting of the differences between men and women and blaming feminism for the similarities argument. "The sexes are different. Marvel at it, enjoy it."

We all know that feminism is unbridled gynocentricty and that's a bad thing right? We all know they like to talk about fish on bicycles and fantasize that women can do anything a man can do, better, backwards and in heels.

Men and women have similar talents is the theme.

So it must follow that any argument describing the obvious differences between the two genders must be a good thing right?

Well, not so fast pal. While Occam's Razor is a very useful tool, it's not a universal law and reality is often a good bit more complicated than our initial summation of it.

The map is never the territory.

Men and women are far more alike than they are different, a no-brainer when we consider that around 99% of our genetic code is identical. Humans however seem to highlight and at times exaggerate gender differences, which may be an evolutionary strategy to get us to notice potential mates.

To be clear there are important differences between males and females, but there is no incompatibility between the idea of low sexual dimorphism and data we do have on the differences. Male variability is real for example but most noticeable at the extremes of any data set, and more broadly noticeable in physical and hormonal differences.

At the more subtle level minor biological differences between the sexes could give rise to significantly different results (emergent behaviour). Men and women tend to seek out different types of work. The underlying differences that cause this may be slight when compared to the set of motivations that drive a person but it turns out to be significant to us when we look at societies.

The occasional feminist can be seen to propose that there's no such thing as sexual dimorphism, arguing instead that gender is only a social construct. But to place all feminists into this category is to create a strawman, one frequently appealed to by those who would have us return to a more traditional gynocentric vision of "biology based" gender roles – he labors outside the home, she bakes apple pies in the kitchen. While the overly-simplified charge that feminists “promote sameness” may be seductive, it likely comes with the entrapping antidote of traditional gynocentric gender roles.

[image]To be sure feminists have played the debate both ways – sometimes arguing gender is a result of social construction, and just as often arguing for biology as the basis for our differences. The undeniable fact is all three waves of feminism have evoked women’s smaller physical size, lower strength, pregnancy and lactation, unique endocrinology, reproductive system, menstration, breast health, vagina health etc as reasons for special dispensations (chivalry) in the form of less labour, more comfort, more protection, and more health services (eg. the many ‘women’s hospitals,’ safe-spaces, special seating at venues, financial considerations, and so on). Feminists have always promoted biological differences, or rather exploited them, and their more recent infiltration into the feild of Evolutionary Psychology will only serve to strengthen that trend.

The point we are making is that whether they are biological, sociological or both in origin, the laboring of difference has allowed feminists to win the day because difference garners chivalry – sameness garners no chivalry. Chivalry got us into this goddam mess.

Difference garners chivalry – sameness garners no chivalry

Let that sink in. If we are ever to defeat gynocentrism, it will require a weakening of the appeal to chivalry, which will require a weakening of the appeal to difference by both feminists and traditional gynocentrists alike. If we ever succeed in that goal it will make room for the reality of equality. Equality of opportunity, not the equality of outcome that the feminists so often push for.

And true equality means a step down for women.

Chivalry must die. Entirely.

For chivalry to die, the mechanism for it must be recognised and replaced. And the underlying mechanism for chivalry is the difference between the sexes.

Marc Rudov, one of the most powerful voices ever to speak on gendered issues, was very clear on this as he understood it implicitly:

> I’ve recently published a book about women and know them well. My true education in all things feminine began almost 12 years ago, when I became reimmersed in the single world after my divorce. During this post-marriage odyssey with the “opposite” sex, I learned that women are not so opposite and are, in fact, much like men. To me, this is no longer a debate; it is fact. Now, we hear almost daily from anthropologists, psychiatrists, psychologists, licensed psychotherapists, so-called life coaches, movies, books, magazines, TV, radio, parents, friends, lovers, and standup comics that men and women are wired differently and hopelessly incompatible. We are coached to accept, embrace, and gingerly navigate these differences. Nonsense, I say. If you believe this propaganda, you are part of the problem.”
> “If you’re honest with yourself, you cannot find many real differences between men and women. The differences you’ve always thought about are socialized differences based on myths. If women were as different and mythical as the so-called experts would have you believe, they’d never be able to run major corporations, cities, states, and nations. When we stop behaving according to our socialized programming, our stereotypical roles, we are surprisingly similar. This behavioral shift is the solution for making our romances more harmonious and successful.[1]

The primary difference we regularly point to in justification of chivalry is physical size and strength. But man created hydraulics for a reason.

The image below was once the way a man compacted soil in the construction of roads.

[image]

[image] All Roads Lead To Rome, by Peter Jackson

Today we use these pad foot roller things.
[image]

Women can drive these things.
Women can now construct roads.
Women are the same as men.
Women are equal.

Yes, buttercups, you do have to get up in the cold and dark and go outside to work in the dust and flies, eat your lunch in a construction pit and come home in the dark.

Welcome to equality.
Mind your step down.

Here's an example of a woman that understood better than any woman we've ever met. Her name was Toot's Holzheimer and she lived and died in the man's world of disposability. She had no truck with a badge of feminist power princess, wonder woman, or traditional victim damsel being pushed by PragerU. Just straight up equality.

[image]

Feminism and chivalry have always functioned as a gestalt, as Ernest B. Bax observed over a century ago when he referred to first-wavers as "chivalry feminists." The feminist emphasis on gender differences, especially those implying weakness and vulnerability, evokes chivalry which is then used as a leverage point to secure multiple varieties of power from men in positions of power. The win gained by this ruse ensures feminists and traditional gynocentric women enjoy a quasi-aristocratic status above the rest of society – hence why feminists are usually seen to be comfortable middle to upper-class white women.

Discussions about differences will always result in special treatment for women, and that always means disposability for men. Alternatively, when we discuss that men and women have a massive overlapping area of shared humanity the discussion potentially changes to one of equal value, concern and empathy for men.

The Men's Rights Movement

Neither AVfM nor Men's Rights in general is about promoting traditional gynocentrism. Anything that is based in the statement, "Women will pay an especially high price," is not central to the AVfM mission. Our mission is centered on the male price being paid in an essentially misandric, gynocentric world.

That does not mean we deny that women have issues that stem from their gender nor that those problems should be bereft of compassion. Rather we recognize that both sexes have their own issues that must be addressed in human terms and compassion rather than through a sexist and mono-gendered paradigm as guides the current misandric system of male disposability, absent of compassion for men and boys.

At AVfM we do recognise many men will always seek the companionship of and sexual contact with women, no matter how much bleating the monk MGTOWs want to do to berate us for recognizing it.

And that's the danger of Prager and their slippery sales pitch to traditionalist-leaning men.

It's too deliciously small of a step to gain recognized "manhood," along with admiration and perhaps sexual intimacy for many to resist jumping on the wagon back to the plantation where they will gain their social value and identity in service and sacrifice to the women folk – women who long ago shucked some if not all of the traditional roles that might have gone part of the way to creating a reciprocal exchange.

After all, what more noble cause is there for a man to take? Indeed, what nobler path is there to real manhood? Our answer to that is one where you're not selling your soul in the hope of sexual gratification and a Pyrrhic validation of your masculine worth.

Try some service where you're not trading in the shallow hope of being paid in sweaty endorphins while attempting to force all other men into this deal with the devil and a straight jacket definition of masculinity.

There is no nobility there at all.

They will do nothing for men and boys beyond erecting monuments to those who died in service to women. What they mean to take from those males has no limit. All for a social construct of what it means to be a man. A real man.

And this epitaph will be used as a weapon of shame against any boy with the intellect to question the paradigm of Mayan sacrificial service.

To ensure the sun rises, you must die! Your beating heart must be torn out! Man and boy!

Male disposability as an artifact of the past

Male disposability has a basis in evolutionary theory. When the females of a species invest significantly more energy in to gestation than males, as is the case for humans, then the size of the next generation is largely constrained by the number of fertile females. As a result of this a species can generally tolerate the loss of males more easily than the loss of females. The loss of females will constrain the size of the next generation, the loss of males will constrain genetic diversity.

We humans are now a special case. The Earth carries more than 7.5 billion people today and could be carrying 10 or 11 billion within a few decades. We no longer need the ability to rapidly recover numbers, thus any presumed bias towards male disposability that existed in the past no longer needs to apply. Likewise encouraging women to have babies is an equally retrograde message to those who are making the conscious decision to stop overpopulating the planet.

There are numerous other differences. For example women retain more neotenous characteristics from their childhood than do men. The reasons for this are outside the scope of this article other than to point out that the "reproductive bottleneck" mentioned earlier shows that men benefited from protecting women in pre-modern times. That women would retain child-like characteristics that encouraged men to do this seems self-evident.

To put these sex differences in context we can say that men and women have, as outlined above, more in common than they have in difference, a fact which makes the PragarU-style obsession with difference look all the more pressed. The gender similarities hypothesis as defined by researchers holds that males and females are similar on most, but not all, psychological variables. That is, men and women, as well as boys and girls, are more alike than they are different. A gender similarities hypothesis does not assert that males and females are similar in absolutely every domain. The exceptions—areas in which gender differences are moderate or large in magnitude should equally be recognized.[2]

While the 'gender similarities hypothesis' reviews meta-analyses of multiple studies on gender differences, it is prone to methodological biases like any other research. For example proponents of the hypothesis sometimes understate the extent of gender differences when they do appear,[3] or may otherwise omit factors such as gender differences in the human brain; gender and sex hormones; or gender differences in physical health/illness in their analysis. By and large though it is usually easy to separate the baby from the bathwater.

On the subject of differences, the biological necessity of male disposability is an artifact of the past and that's where it should stay. PragerU has no urgent basis to encourage a return to the plantation for species survival, nor to promote the associated grinding of male lives to dust in the service of the uterus that involves the consequent, necessary lack of compassion for male pain and loss that characterized early hominid societies.

Watching the slickness of their operation, they don't strike me as being slow between the intellectual wickets. It's not in the scope of this article to enter the field of global conspiracies, but suffice to say, where many of you see countries, we see farms with human livestock.

Disposability does require a solid breeding program. There's money in them there breeders.

So who wants to man up?

Quiz: Suffragists, Ku Klux Klan or feminazis? Part 1

Aldir Gracindo · 9 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Some say 1st wave feminism was the "good feminism". Individualist, not collectivist. Not totalitarian, not hateful. Abolitionist. They only wanted freedom, equality, dignity for all. But then, later came the so-called feminazis.

So, this is going to be the easiest quiz on the internet.

Below there are just 7 quotes. Which of them are from a) suffragists, b) KKK members, and which are from c) modern times radical feminists/feminazis? The answers will follow.

Ready? Suffragists, KKK or feminazis? Go:

> 1. Alien illiterates rule our cities today; the saloon is their palace, and the toddy stick their scepter. The colored race multiplies like the locusts of Egypt.
> 2. Better whiskey and more of it' is the rallying cry of great, dark-faced mobs.
>
> 3. The safety of [white] women, of childhood, of the home is menaced in a thousand localities.
>
> 4. I will cut off this right arm of mine before I will ask for the ballot for the Negro and not for the woman.
>
> 5. Mr. Douglass talks about the wrongs of the Negro; but with all the outrages that he to-day suffers, he would not exchange his sex and take the place of Elizabeth Cady Stanton.
>
> 6. We are, as a sex, infinitely superior to men
> 7. What will we and our daughters suffer if these degraded black men are allowed to have the rights that would make them even worse than our Saxon fathers?

Ready or not, the answers are coming next.

Ku Klux Klan nowadays

Answers

1st, 2nd and 3rd: Suffragist Frances Elizabeth Caroline Willard, 1839 – 1898. President of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, founder of the National Council of Women.

Frances E. Willard

> 4th and 5th: Suffragist Susan Brownell Anthony, 1820-1906. Member of the Anti-Slavery Society, president of the American Woman Suffrage Association.

Susan B. Anthony

> Mr. Douglass talks about the wrongs of the Negro; but with all the outrages that he today suffers, he would not exchange his sex and take the place of Elizabeth Cady Stanton.

Suffragists already used the rhetorical tactic of presenting the situation of white women as not only equivalent, but even worse than that of the black slave. That was, on its face, an absurdity. But it's easy to exploit with rhetoric the positive sexism toward women, bringing much greater empathy towards the white woman then the black man. And Anthony was an abolitionist, but… the problem is in that "but", right?

Speaking of the feminist's rhetoric, should Mr. Douglass exchange his sex as any way to prove his points about "the wrongs of the negro"? And isn't it interesting Anthony's attempt to exclude Douglass being born in slavery with the word today? If today he is not a slave but an important national personality, what would he be so upset about, uh? Well… maybe he was concerned with the status of all black people and their future in the US?

Just a reminder of who that Mr. Douglass was, especially for non-Americans:

Frederick Douglass em 1879

> Right is of no sex, Truth is of no color." (Frederick Douglass)

Certainly admirable words of a black people's rights activist, not at all like the New Left, Post Modern, SJW's who drive our hands to our faces today.

Frederick Douglass (1818–1895) escaped his life as a slave in Maryland after 2 failed attempts. It was then hard to believe that someone with his background could be such a brilliant orator, writer, and statesman. He became close friend of personalities such as Abraham Lincoln. He, however, died seeing black people having advanced very little in the civil equality he so passionately fought for.

This is the man who, according to fallacious pioneer feminist icon Susan B. Anthony, "would not exchange his sex" with her friend, Lady Elizabeth Cady Stanton.

Douglass was also friends with Stanton – but then, the proposal for the constitutional amend giving blacks the suffrage before white women came. That was when "suffragist" leaders showed their true colors for the historical record.

Elizabeth Cady Stanton

Quotes 6 and 7: Suffragist Elizabeth Cady Stanton, 1815-1902. Who was another abolitionist suffragist who nevertheless "recognized the facts" about "the beastly negro men".

> We are, as a sex, infinitely superior to men.
> What will we and our daughters suffer if these degraded black men are allowed to have the rights that would make them even worse than our Saxon fathers?

So, suffragists "only wanted and believed in equality"? You don't say! With "Infinitely superior to men" and White supremacy! Bitch, please.

Don't be mislead by my sarcastic humor. This is ugly, and it is going to get worse.

Eager to see what blend of supremacist "drops of wisdom" I've got under my sleeve for you to sort out in Part 2?

Anthony and Stanton: The dawning of feminist sisterhood.
Well, I have a surprise: Part 2 is right below too. Why not?

Come back later, or see it all right away.

The answers are below.

Ku Klux Klan march on Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D.C. 1928

Carrie Chapman Catt

1st: Suffragist Carrie Chapman Catt, 1859-1947. Teacher, journalist, founder of the League of Women Voters.

> White supremacy will be strengthened, not weakened, by women's suffrage.

Outstanding , Mrs. Catt! Who would not be convinced by this argument for women's suffrage?

2: Suffragist Laura Clay, 1849-1940. Founder and president of the first suffragists' group in Kentucky, the Kentucky Equal Rights Association. Active member of the Democratic Party, she was an important local, state and national leadership. First woman to be indicated as a candidate to president of the United States.

Laura Clay

> The white men, reinforced by the educated white women, could 'snow under' the Negro vote in every State, and the white race would maintain its supremacy without corrupting or intimidating the Negroes.
>
> The 3rd is from Suffragist Rebecca Ann Latimer Felton, 1835-1930. Teacher, writer, prison reformist, first woman senator in the USA. Also, white supremacist and slave owner.

Rebecca Latimer Felton

> "I do not want to see a negro man walk to the polls and vote on who should handle my tax money, while I myself cannot vote at all…When there is not enough religion in the pulpit to organize a crusade against sin; nor justice in the court house to promptly punish crime; nor manhood enough in the nation to put a sheltering arm about innocence and virtue—-if it needs lynching to protect woman's dearest possession from the ravening human beasts—-then I say lynch, a thousand times a week if necessary.

Yes, she was using the "where are the true men" routine. And yes, she was implying that white men lynching blacks, as she wanted them to, was what it meant "to be a man."

4th: Suffragist Belle Kearney, 1863-1939. Speaker, writer, member of the Temperance Movement, teacher, State Senator in Mississipi.

Belle Kearney

> The enfranchisement of women would insure immediate and durable white supremacy, honestly attained; for, upon unquestionable authority, it is stated that "in every Southern State but one, there are more educated women than all the illiterate voters, white and black, native and foreign, combined." By the way, within all the racism in this excerpt, did you notice, the parts where she speaks about how white women were "deprived of education" (yes, that is irony) in the racist, sexist, chivalrous "Patriarchal" southern states? I did. And if you are not so feminist, you are not that surprised by how the "Patriarchy" used to work.

Anna Howard Shaw

5th: Suffragist Anna Howard Shaw, 1847-1919. Doctor, Methodist minister, president of the National Woman Suffrage Association.

> You have put the ballot in the hands of your black men, thus making them political superiors of white women. Never before in the history of the world have men made former slaves the political masters of their former mistresses!

6th: English Suffragists, played by Carey Mulligan, Meryl Streep, Anne Marie Duff and Romola Garai, in the movie Suffragettes, 2015:

(photo: promo)

Emmeline Pankhurst

The phrase, stamped in promo t-shirts above, has an actual historical origin. It's from Emmeline Pankhurst in 1913, when she said:

> I know that women, once convinced that they are doing what is right, that their rebellion is just, will go on, no matter what the difficulties, no matter what the dangers, so long as there is a woman alive to hold up the flag of rebellion. I would rather be a rebel than a slave. I would rather die than submit; and that is the spirit that animates this movement … I mean to be a voter in the land that gave me birth or they shall kill me, and my challenge to the Government is: kill me or give me my freedom: I shall force you to make that choice.

To add some perspective adjustment here: have you ever seen a slave, kept in submission, receive special treatment when committing crimes and then demand that their Masters die and/or kill, to be maimed or to dismember others, for the slave's sake, because that is the least their "owners can" do? Well, there you have it. She would never, possibly, "rather be a rebel then a slave", because she was not a slave; She was a Madam.

Not without reason people speak of something called white feminism. And if you didn't know what that is, here you have the synthesis of the arrogance, the shameless, extremely egoistic, false self-attribution of others' true oppression, by the elitist white feminist. And you also know something else of importance: when it began. "White (racist) feminism", just like "elitist" feminism, "man-hatred" feminism – even though there were exceptions to confirm the rule – is the original feminism, it's core and soul.

And don't forget, Emmeline, among other infamous facts about her, did not fight for the poorer women to have the vote (see 5th paragraph in this article and reference), and most certainly not for slaves.

7th. Suffragist Alva Belmont. Socialite, multi-millionaire and president of the National Woman's Party.

Alva Belmont

> Henceforth women are to be dictators. … The time has come to make this world muddle men have created and strive to turn it into an ordered, peaceful, happy abiding place for humanity.

Belmont's full text shows her sophistry, something like this: 1) There are dictators in the world; 2) And awful things as well; 3) Dictators, as political leaders in general, are almost always men; 4) Therefore, the world is this way because of men; 5) Men have always "oppressed women"; 6) Enough of men concentrating power in their hands; 7) And how will we make this world marvelous? 8) With women dictators, of course!!!

It is the same essentialist and collectivist reasoning of any racist totalitarian, only applied to all men, instead of to ethnicity. It is presented raw, not as sophisticated – deceitful, misleading, dishonest, faulty, spurious, distorted – and backed by a myriad of pseudo-scientific feminist literature as we have today – but it is the very same reasoning of so many feminists today: power "in the hands of of men" (in the hands of one, or 0,8%, is already in the hands "of men") is oppression; the more power in the hands of women, it doesn't matter what kind of women, or how much power that means… is equality, it's the smashing of "The Patriarchy", the end of oppression; it is the best for the world! Or, in that one world, it is empowerment!

Conclusions

Among other self-evidences,

- 1st wave feminists did not want, believe or stand for, "just equality, freedom and dignity for all".
- The feminist leaders of the 1st wave were from socially and financially privileged backgrounds, and in more than one opportunity turned their back on people who were suffering, who they deceived posing as champions for those people. They did it for sheer self-interest and disdain for others.
- Even abolitionist feminist leaders showed themselves to be hardcore hateful racists facing the possibility of black men coming to have the suffrage before they did.
- As women, these "suffragists" believed in female supremacy; as white women, they believed in white supremacy; with the same hatefulness and intolerance of any hate movement. Therefore,
- "Suffragists" does not describe what 1st wave feminist was. To call them just "suffragists" is as misleading as describing Saddam Hussein and Bashar al-Assad as merely political leaders coming from minority groups and full of love for their countries.
- They were far from being a peaceful movement.

Those who might think all that racist and sexist hate are only cherry-picked examples don't know, or did not really pay attention, to the history of the first world congress on "women's rights" in Seneca Falls, organized by the feminists of the time. Furthermore, these are not only some random 1st wave feminists; they are not even only prominent feminists (presidents, founders of women's associations, high society personalities, senators); they are the most prominent. Cornerstones of the feminist movement, symbols and promoted role models such as Susan B. Anthony, Frances E. Willard, Elizabeth Cady Stanton e Emmeline Pankhurst.

The idea of the presentation as a quiz came from this post by cafe.com.

And before someone complains: as racism and sexism are already a wide scope, eugenicist 1st wavers like Emily Murphy, Victoria Woodhull, (first woman candidate to president of the USA), Mary Stopes and the most commented, Margaret Sanger, were not included and appear in other articles (like this one).

In other articles, I intend to speak in depth how 1st wave feminism created an unprecedented form of parental alienation for fathers, their connections with suicides, mass murders (yes, I mean it) and how the now so polemic "gender ideology" – which many believe emerged with the 2nd wave, with the neomarxism (New Left/Frankfurt School/cultural marxism) and/or Simone de Beauvoir (World War 2) – was actually born in the 1st wave.

If you know what I (and others) know about feminism's 1st wave ("that good feminism"?), you will never see it the same way again.

Cheers from Brazil.

Recent stories shine a light on feminist insanity

Mark Dent · 9 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

During the past two weeks I decided to copy links to a number of articles which appeared online and in our local media, all of which were connected to feminism.

Each one is an example of the utter madness, incoherence and hypocrisy underpinning their ideology.

I must confess that I have lost respect for so many people I once admired in recent years. I suppose that's the price you pay for seeing them unmasked and exposed for what they truly are — craven moral cowards and spiteful, embittered losers.

Sir Michael Caine is a man I have always loved on the big screen and as a person. Whenever I saw him interviewed, he came across as a man with both feet firmly planted on the ground with no hint of the prima donna and no holier than thou lecturing-until this week.

[image]
Michael was commenting on the #MeToo movement and feminism in general.
Michael Caine has hailed the #MeToo movement for tackling predatory Hollywood and ensuring actresses at auditions don't 'have to worry about getting raped'.

The 86-year-old movie legend believes that young actresses are better protected from sexual predators following the Harvey Weinstein scandal.

Fair enough. No-one wants to see any woman being sexually abused by predators like Weinstein.

Michael continues:

'I'm a big admirer of ladies, for their causes and everything.'

Caine worked on several films with Weinstein – who has agreed a £35 million settlement with women who accuse him of sexual misconduct and still faces trial for sexual assault – but says he saw no evidence of any inappropriate behaviour.

'I never saw him do anything wrong with women, but when I read what these girls were saying, it was terrible that he did that,' he says in an interview to mark the release in paperback of his book Blowing The Bloody Doors Off.

In the book, Caine expresses his 'regret and shame' at not realising what some of his male peers were doing in Hollywood in his heyday.

Call me a cynic, but I don't believe Sir Michael. Everyone in Hollywood conceded that Weinstein's predatory behavior was common knowledge for years. Michael lived and worked in that environment for decades. He attended all of the parties and rubbed shoulders with all of the big names in Hollywood and actually made a number of movies which were produced by Weinstein. Does he seriously expect us to believe he never heard the rumours and innuendo?

Why have so many actors suddenly seen the light? These same men and women remained totally blinded by it whilst their careers were taking off and the dollars were rolling in? It's so easy to become a man who tells it like it is when you have one foot in the grave and the power and wealth to make any pushback a minor irritant rather than a threat to your livelihood.

What Caine said next summed up the incredible cognitive dissonance we have all come to associate with feminists and any who support their ideology.

'No one ever did anything in front of me. Because I was very pro-feminist, you know. And they knew that, so they wouldn't do anything in front of me… I've always been a man for women's lib,' he says.

'The thing about me and women is that I loved my mother. Very much. So, every woman to me is about five per cent my mother.

'So, they're always treated very well. I have respect and I'm all for equal pay.

'Mind you, I didn't realise pay was worse for them because I worked with Elizabeth Taylor.

'She got a million dollars, I got £150,000. I thought, 'Wait a minute.' I didn't complain.'

Despite his personal experience and understanding of the fact that this constant demand for equal pay for women in the movie industry is based upon a myth, Caine dutifully genuflects and says he wants to see women in Hollywood receive equal pay.

In the next breath he shatters this notion by informing us that a woman, Elizabeth Taylor, received ten times what he was paid when he appeared in a movie with her.
