Or maybe it hasn't got anything to do with genetics and evolutionary psychology at all. Maybe it has everything to do with something deeper, something about the way we make choices and establish our identities. When a team of thugs mocks and degrades an apparently willing but misguided teenager searching for her identity, do they not effectively also mock and degrade her family, and even society itself? How does this garbage recirculate throughout the culture and the identities of everyone living within it? If someone you loved was a gang-banger, what might that say about you? What are we becoming? Cast your eyes around. Can we really believe that this mockery of humanity that we see around us today is what humanity used to look like a hundred years ago? Ultimately, these questions relate to much bigger existential concepts, well beyond the scope of The Spearhead. But there is one conclusion that I do bring, and that's that women are capable of extremely dumb, destructive choices. When they ride the cock carousel in preference to the responsible betas that they find so boring, well, I guess they pay. Their history matters. But why should we care, given that our cultures care so little about false rape allegations and what is happening to men in the family courts, the workplace and society in general?

KARMA MRA MGTOW STRIKES AGAIN!!!!!!

February 6, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box type="note" icon="none" style="rounded" border="full"]
In another absolutely stunning display of generosity and activism, KARMA MRA MGTOW has found another internet article and has offered to combine your act of speaking up on behalf of men with a matching donation for the upcoming AVfM Radio Show!
This time he is offering to donate $2.00 for every MRA comment posted to the article linked below.
His last challenge, at $5.00 per comment, which was matched by zed, netted a whopping $700.00 for the new program.
So with thanks that are difficult to express I am posting this now, and then I am going to go directly to the link below and place my comment. Then I am going to come back and paste it into the comments here to make tracking things easier.
Please do the same. We have met our initial financial goals and then some, as far as starting the show is concerned, but there is much more on the road ahead of us. This is the MRM coming alive in front of our very eyes.
Here's the link and snip of the web article.

Old Wine, New Bottles

February 7, 2011 | by Adam Kostakis | Link | Original Link

Lecture No. 6

"Whatever crushes individuality is despotism, by whatever name it may be called" – J. S. Mill

Domination. So much of feminist analysis revolves around this term. A man who punches his wife is not just angry at her; he is attempting to dominate her. A man who disagrees with a woman and talks over her is not just being rude; he is trying to dominate her. A rapist is not really that bothered about sex; his crime is a display of power, he just wanted to dominate the woman.

You see, the fact that these things happen at all is not enough for the male-bashers of the world; they shall forever require more grist for the misandric mill. Punishing actual criminals is one thing, but it's simply not gratifying enough to leave it there – they need to articulate what their womyn's intuition has always told them, and go on the attack against all men. The problem, of course, is that the overwhelming majority of men don't attack women in any perceptible way whatsoever. The solution, as feminists found, is to play Dr. Freud and posit some subconscious, underlying motivation – a dark, sexual, deviant, violent mentality, which acts as a universal explanation for male behavior.

You see, even when men are not actually engaging in criminal acts, the criminality is still there, it is just latent – so the feminists would have us believe. The idea that all men possess an inherent, latent evil, and that women do not, serves as a useful cover for all sexist hate speech against men. We find it at work in senseless diatribes against a non-falsifiable "rape culture," in campaigns to prohibit the private consumption of pornography, and in apologia for malicious women who falsely accuse men of sex crimes. Inherent male deviancy, so they say (or imply), manifests as a continuum of dysfunctional maleness, covering everything from a simple verbal disagreement, all the way up to the murder of a spouse. All male actions which do not contribute towards the feminist project – increasing the power of women – are to be taken as evidence of an innately flawed masculinity which seeks, above all, to dominate the fair sex.

Put it this way. Would you say that being murdered helps to increase a woman's power? No?

Well, what about losing a verbal sparring match – does this help to increase her power? Or doesn't it? It certainly seems that one will have greater autonomy if she can more easily convince others that her view is correct.

So, if both of the above examples exist on a continuum of women losing power, the corollary of which is patriarchal domination, then of course men are to blame. That is, if our analysis is based in dubious, feministic assumptions.

The concept of domination, so taken for granted in its present manifestation, is a supreme example of the linguistic shifting I have discussed previously. As a term, it carries ideological contraband, concealed in an overcoat of righteousness. Originally, the term domination, which has its root in the Latin dominus, referred specifically to the power exercised by a master over slaves. Like so many other terms that feminists have seized upon in order to manipulate perceptions of reality, domination has become an object of semantic bleaching.

What is really interesting about all this, is that our new concept of domination – as unjust hierarchy, to be opposed and attacked – has been put to use in a specific direction: as a sponsor for true despotism. The single most obvious red flag marking the road to despotic rule is the encroachment of the public sphere into the private lives of individuals. Despotism is precisely the type of unjust hierarchy with which we identify domination; yet if the latter term is broadened sufficiently, to encompass all areas of private life, then a crushing and brutal dictatorship is the inevitable result.

This is the context in which we should understand the feminist slogan which has had the most staying power: the personal is political. Note that (according to the slogan), the personal is not only a matter of interest to the political; it does not form part of the political; it is not of equivalent importance to the political. It actually is the political. The two terms are presented as though they are identical, interchangeable.

The personal is political.

If this is true, then there does not exist the smallest space of privacy which is a matter for the individual alone – that is, over which the individual is sovereign. It is true enough that a private life worth anything would not be possible without an overarching public structure – it is law which protects all the liberties that make private lives and interests possible. To use J. F. Stephen's favorite analogy, law is the pipe through which the waters of liberty flow. It is when public life – the state – fails to recognize its own limits that society becomes threatened by despotic rule.

Intellectuals of all ages have come up with the most ingenious of reasons for why it is that their mode of thought is superior to all that passed before. The majority of people have simply assumed this without the need for justification whatsoever. What is peculiarly modern is the construction of artificial boundaries between our own time and epochs past. We do not, for instance, consider ourselves to be living on the same historical plane as those of Medieval Europe, let alone of Ancient Greece. These are times inexplicable and inaccessible to us. It is a seductive fantasy by which we explain away any fears conjured up by the horrors of history books. We like to believe that bloody autocracies will confine themselves safely to those pages, and that such things could not happen here, not now; not in real life. Surely, we have moved beyond all that. We are Enlightened, unlike the human beings that existed before us.

But are we not on the same historical plane that gave rise to Nazi Germany and Soviet Communism? These particular reigns of terror happened within the last century, no matter how much we might like to think of ourselves as having progressed beyond such barbarism. Supposedly, we in the Western world abhor totalitarian regimes; and yet the rise of the two mentioned previously is indicative of a trend existing within our political culture. Among the baggage we have inherited from the Enlightenment is the concept of utopia. The term was coined in the 16th century, and it designated, for the first time, the notion of a perfect socio-political order.

With the birth of this idea, the seeds were sewn for the cleansing of human impediments as an operationalized political program.

Prior to the Enlightenment, human life was mostly assumed to be cyclical. As surely as the sun would rise in the morning and set once more in the evening, so great powers would rise and fall, only for new ones to take their place. Such was the science of Polybius, whose historical works did not arrange events in chronological order, but presented human experience as a unity. Dynasties, empires, cultures, people and their communities lived and died in the swings of the cosmic pendulum.
One of the major conceptual innovations of modernity is progress as the guiding ideal in politics and society. Not only do we assume that we are constantly on the move away from our own history; the belief persists that it is only a matter of time before each problem yields to a solution. Faith in human knowledge has never been so great as in the Information Age; we actively seek to overcome what were long considered intractable facts of life.
The purpose of this digression is not to cast doubt over the possibilities for human knowledge, nor to suggest that an attempt to improve the human experience is an ignoble pursuit. It is to point out that we are all children of the Enlightenment, no matter where we fall on the political spectrum. It is to point out that there are certain peculiar assumptions which form the base and scaffolding of Western political thought, and it is upon these assumptions that ideologies as diverse as conservatism, liberalism, National Socialism and feminism are built.
The -ism itself is an altogether modern phenomenon. An -ism (or we might say, an 'ideology') assumes a difference between how society is and how it ought to be, predicated upon a specific moral view of the world. This is obviously true for those ideologies explicitly advocating change – liberalism, socialism, feminism, and so on. It is just as true for conservatism and traditionalism, ideologies which (as they see it) aim to resuscitate the baby that has been thrown out with the bathwater of the ages.
Typically, that which ideologues find so objectionable about the world is its existing configuration of power. The great texts and speakers of the ideology describe a configuration of power, argue for its recognition as injustice, and then present the means for achieving the desired change. The means may involve working through the existing institutions of state, or they may necessitate their overthrow, or they may shun mainstream practices altogether and advocate working their magic through society.
Whatever the ideology implies in practice, this is a marked difference from what went before. Progress, not recurrence, is at root of all political expectation. Whether this is progress towards the classless society, or ethnic purity, or the return of traditional virtues, progress is the constant. The view that something is wrong and something needs to be done about this, as a political statement, is a recent invention, one which defines our shared political culture. Conservatives are caught up in the same 'progressive' web, but then, so too are iconoclasts, who signal their compliance with conventional modes of thought even as they state their intentions to break away. The more they struggle against this inevitability, the more stuck they find themselves. To take a relevant example, feminists have sometimes declared that they are moving away from 'patriarchal' assumptions altogether, and building up their own worldview from scratch, quite untainted by male influence.

In truth, nobody starts from scratch, and feminism remains deeply embedded in modes of thought which have evolved over centuries, exclusively through the minds of men. The feminist ideology, and all of its innovations, simply could not occurred without centuries of work by men beforehand.
Next week's lecture shall take a closer look at the feminist assertion that the personal is political, and the hidden implications contained within this catch phrase. In the weeks that follow, we will consider the concept of utopia, which has been mentioned only in passing here. A brief comment here will suffice: utopia is the logical extension of progress, in that it is the end of all progress, the final result. It is a profoundly dangerous idea, one responsible for the most oppressive regimes and revolutions the world has ever known. While personal power and glory may have been the motivating force behind the actions of despotic individuals in recent memory, it was a collective, utopian vision that aroused their followers to make manifest the most violent of fantasies. In all cases where utopians grip the reigns of power, the human beings which do not fit into their vision of a new world order are treated as the living garbage of a faded regime.
It is with disgust and horror that the West looks back at the utopian despots of the twentieth century, and yet these particular despotisms correspond to a tendency that forms the infrastructure of our own politics. The disgust and horror is real enough, though, and perhaps the most truly progressive shift in recent times is the rejection of extremism, in all its forms, by populations determined to leave behind the century of genocide.
Only, it's not that simple. You can pull up the heads, and tear the stalks clean from the earth, but unless you dig out the roots, you will find those flowers in bloom again before long. Utopianism, with the cleansing of human impediments that it always implies, is coded into our political DNA. Widespread detestation of the recent, failed totalitarianisms will not make this go away; it can only make the despotic tendency fall quiet for a little while. A new despotism can only emerge if it does so silently, in disguise as something quite different – perhaps as organized opposition to certain forms of unjust domination, the solution for which is always to increase the power of the state relative to the autonomy of the individual.
The personal is political, say the feminists.
I can hear the goose steps getting closer.

On March 1, 2011 Men Will Speak…Like You Have Never Heard Them Before

February 7, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Thirty days ago I brought up the idea of an internet radio show for MRA's that focused on men's rights and the state of men and boys in modern western culture. The idea was to have a more prominent platform than a blog or website could provide, and to create a launch pad for other activism.

At the time I did some research on the idea and determined that a reasonable start up amount for this kind of venture would be $4,500.00. To be honest, I was not encouraged. The men's movement is populated with a lot of disenfranchised, impoverished men, many of whom have been stripped of assets and livelihood by the western worlds system of feminist governance.

Add to that the fact that we tend to be a contentious group that operate more or less separately from each other and it would appear a recipe for a quick failure.

But that was before $7,634.00 was donated, as well as many hours of vital expertise, from graphic design to sound engineering to show production to original music.

In short, hell just froze over. A Voice for Men Radio will begin broadcasting on March 1st, 2011, a mere three weeks away. And we have already developed the resources across the net to make that launch day something to remember.

It is fitting, then, to accompany this announcement with an overview of what the show will be like.

To begin with, a mission statement.

The mission of A Voice for Men Radio is to confront feminism, manginism, white knightism and any other mentality that serves as a breeding ground for misandry or the promotion of a utilitarian, disposable view of men and boys.

As you can tell from the language of the mission statement, it will be a show by MRA's for MRA's. The programming will be designed use passion, humor, information and an uncompromising dedication to intellectual honesty in order to further the message of the men's movement.

We intend to use the show to reach out to the uninformed with our message, but it will not be crafted in a way that attempts to help the MRM fit with mainstream sensibilities. It will actually be just the opposite, predicated on the idea that it is mainstream sensibilities that must change if any sort of sanity is ever to be restored between the men and women of this culture.

Every mission must have a goal, as lofty and unattainable as that goal may appear to be. And our goal, clearly stated, is to reverse the ever widening division between men and women and to promote the restoration of a healthy connection between the sexes, based on the assumed equal worth of each.

It will sometimes appear, especially to the uninformed, that the show is more supportive of the division than the solution. That is unavoidable. After three generations of male denigration and female entitlement being groomed to the point of creating a cultural psychosis, we live in an age where medicine for our ills will be bitter and hard to swallow. But the relative unpleasantness of a solution has no bearing on its efficacy. We intend to pursue that solution with vigor and intensity, regardless of how painful it may be.

We will enlighten some, offend others and leave still others scratching their heads and wondering. The truth often has that effect. And after a half century of socially sanctioned lies, the impact of the truth will be even more disturbing.

So be it. It has been said before that the truth will set you free. That's unequivocally true, but in many cases only after it kicks your ass.

At A Voice for Men Radio, we are going to tell the truth, with our steel tipped boots on.

Tell AG Eric Holder to Take that #$@&! Report Down!

February 8, 2011 | by S.A.V.E. | Link | Original Link

Last year, SAVE sent a 10-page letter to the Department of Justice requesting that the DoJ remove a report filled with biased and erroneous statements. The report, Practical Implications of Current Domestic Violence Research by Andrew R. Klein, repeatedly downplays domestic violence against men, and openly recommends mandatory arrest policies. The flawed report can be seen here:
http://www.ncjrs.gov/pdffiles1/nij/225722.pdf
Because the biases are so egregious, SAVE requested the report be immediately removed from public purview until every questionable statement could be reviewed by a scientifically-qualified third party. The SAVE letter can be seen here:
http://www.saveservices.org/downloads/Data%20Quality%20Act
The letter was mailed on June 18, 2010, with proof of delivery. Seven months later, the DOJ has not replied to our request or removed it from its website.
Last Friday, a USA Today editorial revealed Attorney General Holder had falsely claimed that "Intimate partner homicide is the leading cause of death for African-American women ages 15 to 45." And now a flawed report that no one at the DoJ will answer to!
Contact Attorney General Holder TODAY:

> Email: AskDOJ@usdoj.gov
> Telephone: 202-514-2000
> Fax: 202-307-6777

Tell Attorney General Eric Holder that you are asking the Department of Justice to respond promptly to the SAVE request. Urge him to remove Practical Implications of Current Domestic Violence Research, and to establish a Task Force to review all domestic violence statements and claims on the DOJ website.
And since today is the second day of our week-long campaign, why not send him two messages? Politely, of course.

Arguing for Male Rights in Bizzarro World

As a men's rights activist, I've written dozens or articles and produced a number of videos addressing various aspects of men's rights, or the lack thereof, in our society. Recently, I was publicly critical of a national post article advocating the sexual mutilation of male infants – and a YouTube subscriber who shares my views on the issue of circumcision made the observation that I went too easy on the child-mutilation apologist. I accept that criticism, I did treat that columnist too gently.

So here's a problem faced by anyone in the men's rights community who is presenting arguments to those on the outside:

The consensus reality most people inhabit is a dream, only loosely related to the real world.

I know, that sentence sounds like the first line of a rant by a delusional, tinfoil-hat wearing lower function mental patient. What I mean by that is that the reality of experience for men in western culture is a dystopian nightmare, which only by willful self delusion can the majority of males retain an outward calm, and avoid a state of despair.

I know that still sounds like wild hyperbole, so I ask you to bear with me just a bit further. In a past article, I referred to the state of reproductive rights for men as a condition equivalent to slavery. I was roundly condemned for this observation. Slavery, people said was a wild exaggeration, and pointlessly inflammatory rhetoric.

But the fact is that men have no reproductive rights at all. Yes, men have access to condoms, but a condom is a device conferring the mechanical ability to contain semen during ejaculation; it's not the same as having the legal right of self determination over reproduction – as women enjoy.

"A woman's body, a woman's choice," I hear somebody shrieking. Okay, sure, as long as you make that feminist slogan complete by adding – a man's body, also a woman's choice; a man's income, a woman's choice; a broken condom, a woman's choice; secretly collected semen from a used condom, a woman's choice; a child conceived during the molestation of an underage boy, a woman's choice; duping a man for child support who didn't even father the child, a woman's choice.

After conception, no matter how conception might occur, women have rights, men only have the onus to pay. That's why I used that ugly word: slavery.

In writing about men's rights, about the ongoing subtraction of rights from men by a society and a legal system governed by a radical feminist ideology, complete candor is treated by the sleepy public as if it is wild eyed conspiracy theory lunacy. The reality is already so extreme, that to be heard at all, what a men's right's activist must do at all times is to simply try to diminish the scale and extremity of systemic hatred of males in our society.

Does that sound like hyperbole, too?

This discussion is occasioned by an article by Marc Weisblott which nicely illustrates the surreal nightmare world that 40 years of radical feminism has created.

Canadian comedian and actor, Dave Foley was recently divorced, and ordered to pay spousal support for his ex wife and two teenage sons. The amount of his court ordered support payment is where we steer sharply into bizzarro land: 400 percent of his income. Four times what he earns is what Dave Foley is required by the family court system of Ontario to pay. If he returns to Canada, he'll go to jail.

In the eyes of the law, this man is not a human being, he's simply a sperm and cash dispenser.

And this thing we're living in is a patriarchy, right?

Read Foley's story here.

Josh Jasper's hate campaign and what to do about it

February 9, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

The progress of the Men's Movement has not only been one of attracting more numbers to our ranks, but also a refinement of our understanding of the issues we face and the sources of our problems. As time passes there is more and more a recognition of the difficulties we face with other men, as opposed to just women and feminists.
Nowhere in recent times is this more evident than with Josh Jasper's recent "anti-rape" video that has been making the rounds. With this one release Josh has scaled the scumbag ladder and is vying for top position. My view puts him two rungs ahead of Michael Kimmel, licking the heels of Joe Biden's Ferragamo's. I won't bother with a detailed analysis of the video.

If the concept of res ipsa loquitor ever sufficed, this is it:

In response to this piece of misandric garbage, MRA Sound Guru Keyster has responded with vigor.

As succinct and devastating an indictment of Jasper's "work" as Keyster has provided, I am not satisfied. I want more. This man deserves consequences for his actions. Some history on Josh is known. We know he was a marine and we also know that he was a Los Angeles police officer. Two areas for sure where the capacity for violence is a plus. Add to that the fact that he was on a Domestic Violence task force and this bad apple starts to stink a little more.
We know something else about him, too. When the going gets tough, he gets going…to his phone to call 911. After The Spearhead shined a little light on his misandric efforts, he is now alleging that he is getting death threats. I know this begs for a "poor baby" pun, but this fucker has me feeling anything but playful.
Anyway, my money is on the idea that he is just hamming it up for the media like a lying New York weathergirl who is crying rape, for attention that he ultimately hopes to translate into publicity for his company and the sympathy bucks that come with it.
But let's set his whiney histrionics aside for the time being. Better not to be diverted from issues that may prove to be of real importance. Anyone want to take any bets on whether this alpha puke ever busted heads as a cop, simply because he could? It leaves one to wonder – especially given the intellectual violence he is so obviously willing to inflict on male children – just what sort of skeletons are in this douche bag's closet.
If they are there, I would love to get my hands on them and rattle them together for the world to hear.
So, for any of you MRA's living in or near The City of Angels, please consider a visit to the LAPD, and accompany yourself with the Freedom of Information Act. Or, even better, any of you that have access to a P.I., please consider his fee to dig up what is legitimately there on this man to be your lifelong donation to the MRM.

If there is dirt on this wannabe Silverback, and I think there likely is, it would benefit all of us to spread it everywhere in the universe it will stick- hopefully the first place that will happen would be on the face of his company.
What you come up with needs to be verifiable. I don’t want to commit a civil offense against him, no matter how deserving he is. But I pledge now to use every resource at my disposal to take any embarrassing, disgraceful detail of this misandric lowlifes life, and use it to cripple his ability to continue with this kind of evil. Please email any info you get rather than post it in the comments.

Dreamin' of the Revolution: A Post-Feminist Man Gives the Wheel a Spin

February 10, 2011 | by JackaBond | Link | Original Link

[box]If you tremble with indignation at every injustice, then you are a comrade of mine. – Ernesto 'Che' Guevara[/box]
With all this talk of revolution I've been casting my mind forward to 2020, when some say the misandry bubble will have burst and the male will have regained primacy in society, at least politically. I'm 10 years older, have a nice house, a nice car, good friends, meaningful work. I've gone my own way and have no kids, so I have a pile of money that I've kept and invested wisely. I'm master of all I care to survey. My thoughts now turn to the burning question on my mind since the bubble began to inflate – who'll inherit my stuff when I'm gone?

I dream on…the misandry bubble has indeed burst and the revolution is almost complete. Feminism has been officially outlawed world-wide, the Stockholm Declaration that ended it has been signed and feminist leaders and their collaborators have been hunted down, tried and found guilty of crimes against humanity. Julian Assange, the architect of that remarkable document – which effectively turned the country into a Marxist forced labour camp for the world's hard-core feminists and their enablers – has been endowed by King William V of Great Britain with a new order of chivalry – Knight of the Leaky Wick.
Gender relations around the world are slowly starting to improve. Feminist propaganda is banned on pain of death. There is no internet in Sweden. The time has come for MGTOW to return to the mainstream, find suitable mates and fill the Promised Land with the fruit of their loins.
In this post-revolutionary dream a beautiful young woman, full and fresh with the ripeness of healthy youth has sought refuge in my lands. There are tingles in her loins at twenty paces and her heartbeat races when we touch. Her deep-as-the-sea, hero-worshipping eyes make it clear I must breed with her. Problem is, she was born to Eve but raised by Jezebel, so while her heart is pure she is cursed by the poisoned apple of misandry.
In other words, she has never been taught how to not hate men.
What would I say to her? She has denounced feminism with all her heart and has tearfully prostrated herself before me. She's begging to be taught. What could I say to her? What words could unravel the steel-threaded cocoon of feminist lies and deceit without killing the soft pink chrysalis inside?
"Fuck off and die, you blood-sucking parasite!"
…thunders A Voice from above, riding shotgun.
"Let's get you out of those dirty clothes…"
… croons the crimson artist, from le Château dans les nuages.
As tempting as these suggestions would be, I think I'd say something more like this – a sort of post-feminist manifesto for women who survive the disease:

? Don’t be narcissistic. A woman should never think she’s more important than men or children. Marketing departments delight in exploiting most woman’s tendency to think that they are. They promote ‘women’s only’ this and that, and many women buy into it. This appears sexist but it is really a marketing ploy that works because most women are narcissistic. Companies know they can charge more for goods and services by using the words ‘women only’. Narcissistic women are easily exploitable women. Be neither.
? Don’t let others make choices for you. This should be self evident but many women allow themselves to be told what to wear, what to buy, what to eat, how to dress, where to go, how to think – in clubs, gyms, magazines, websites, books, stores and by TV talk show hosts. They seem to have needed a step-by-step guide through life and have behaved like sheep as companies have exploited this ‘need’. Don’t be the same. Don’t swallow the same poison. Don’t tell the same lies. Be a sheep if you must but obey the sheepdog, not the wolf. Better yet, be a woman who can think for herself.
? Get rid of the self-induced schizophrenia. Don’t insist you’re strong, confident, capable and independent one minute, then weak, frightened and vulnerable the next, especially when you’ve been caught doing something wrong. Don’t chop and change your character whenever it suits you – choose one and stick with it.
? Admit when you’ve done something wrong. Don’t suddenly remember that you suffered abuse in the past or have some kind of mental illness or other instability, then use it to get yourself off. If you never sought help for these problems before you were caught, you shouldn’t use them as an excuse afterwards. Be a woman who accepts responsibility for her actions.
? Don’t let the law take responsibility for crimes women commit. Speak out against women routinely receiving shorter sentences than men for the same crimes. If the law punishes women as children, treat them like children and encourage other women to do so, too. Don’t promote use of the victim card by saying ‘she’s suffered enough’ because she’s a woman. Believe in, and stand up for, equal justice regardless of sex.
? Don’t believe everything women, manginas and the media tell you. Many serve up slop by the bucket, like celebrity gossip, slimming tips, sex tips, fantasy stories etc. TV shows like Oprah and Dr Phil are filled with advice on how idiot women can transform themselves into victims and blame everything on men, while constantly ridiculing them. Partake of more nutritious fare than this. Get your infotainment from equitable presenters. Always be aware of the cultural status quo from both perspectives.
? Don’t fake solidarity with other women, especially in public. Don’t pretend that all women are your best friends when everyone knows nothing could be further from the truth. Openly acknowledge the reality that many women despise each other unless there’s personal advantage in not doing so. The prophets of Game have taught post-feminist men how to see through these attempts at deception so your lies will not travel far. Don’t be a liar, especially not an obvious one.

Ernesto Guevara & son (1963)

? Speak out against misandry. The main reason for its proliferation is that good women have remained silent. Silence in the face of misandry is cowardly. It allows loud, obnoxious women to preach hatred with impunity, and this reflects badly on all women. When you speak out against the rubbish some women throw at you about men, you do all women a favour. Don't be a coward and don't be silent.
This is the chalice I offer to women who seek my seed. It carries only the brew that is true. A woman who draws deeply from it will have a chance at new life both in her heart and in her belly; she who rejects it will perish with her future in the cold and barren wasteland of misandry. It is her choice, of course, but as a man I'm invested in ALL mankind so I offer it to all who thirst.
It's often forgotten that in all his revolutionary zeal, our man Ché was a family man.

Attention MRM Bloggers

February 10, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

For those interested, Good Men Project Magazine is preparing to do a special on the MRM, and you have the opportunity to have your voice heard on the subject.
For those of you unfamiliar with the website, it is a well traveled venue with traffic far exceeding that of even The Spearhead, and it is rapidly growing after only being online since June of last year.
It is also something of an ideological anomaly that seems to be battling for an identity, and perhaps losing.
The editorial slant seems to be a bizarre mixture based in radical feminism, frequently accented with paleo-masculine idolatry. Well, as we know here at AVfM, since feminism and traditionalism are two peas in a pod – that mixture is not so bizarre after all.
It should be noted that GMPM is exuberantly endorsed by Ms. Magazine. Yes, that would be the same publication whose erstwhile editor, Robin Morgan, said that "[M]an hating is an honorable and viable political act," and that "[R]ape exists any time sexual intercourse occurs when it has not been initiated by the woman."
Quite the endorsement, eh?
The saving grace of GMPM is that they do seem quite interested in including all points of view, should they be submitted. I have submitted three pieces there and they have all been posted. Recently for their special on marriage, I resurrected my article, Men, Math and Marriage, and it has just been posted. Unsurprisingly the first couple of comments are what you would expect from mainstream blue pill readers.
The question may come to mind, why should I submit material to a publication so obviously imbrued with misandry?
In my opinion, it is for the same reason we write letters and post comments to other mainstream publications – to bring an alternative world view to people who have never had the opportunity to see it; to offer the red pill.
I have been told from a member of their editorial staff that they will seriously consider any well written submission. This came from someone whom I have dealt with repeatedly and found to be of integrity.
So, if you are interested, please consider submitting something that explains your take on the MRM. Even dusting off an older article will do if it meets their standards for writing.
You can contact them for submissions by sending an email to goodmencolumns@gmail.com

Why masculinity does not need to be changed

February 11, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Over the past few days there has been a lot of internet activity, including here, related to Josh Jasper's controversial video in which his organization, The Riverview Center, uses an infant boy in a commercial as a message enhancer for an anti-rape campaign.

In the first article I wrote on the subject, I passed on a detailed explanation of what was wrong with the ad, opting instead to just tag it with res ipsa loquitor. For those of you who don't see the problem with the video, that means "The thing speaks for itself." Only it apparently doesn't for some, at least not in the right language, so I suppose I should be charitable enough to explain it to such unfortunates with more tutelage in mind.

I warn you in advance that if you don't now see a problem with Jasper's ad, or better yet think he is doing a good thing, then you may want to stop reading now, because very shortly you will have to start lying to yourself – and perhaps everyone else – in order to maintain your position.

First let's take the pivotal, penultimate statement from the video that caused such offense (aside from the use of a baby to drive in the message).

"Redefine what it means to be a man."

Redefine, as in change our understanding, of manhood. Jasper is saying that manhood, as we understand it now, needs to be changed because an inherent part of being a man is being a possible rapist. And he deduces that the probability of a man becoming a rapist is so likely that we don't just need to do what we already do, which is take a very dim view of rape and punish those who commit it harshly, but that we actually need to change manhood itself, because in some way manhood is the problem.

Are you with me so far, or are you searching the creative side of your brain for a rationale to explain how what Jasper is saying isn't really what Jasper is saying? Maybe you have already skipped that part and moved on to just tell yourself that almost anything he could say is good because it is against rape?

Whatever you are doing, if you are not convinced that Jasper has just told you that men are inherently rapists, then you are most certainly employing some mental mechanism in your mind that is the equivalent of putting your fingers in your ears and shouting "la-la-la-la-la-I-am-not list-en-ing-to-you!"

Please bear with me. I only dwell on this because if you are already avoidant of dealing with the truth, the rest of this article will be a waste of your time.

This is an absolutely crucial point, Riverview fans. This is where your cognitive dissonance, or your dishonesty, will start governing your perceptions, or at least what you will admit to. You will need to tell yourself, casting aside all rhyme and reason, "No, he is not saying that."

Yes, he is saying that very thing exactly. And it commands those being honest with themselves and others to question, if he is not saying that, then why would he be talking about a redefinition of what it means to be a man in the first place?

OK, now we move from there, the assumption that rape is an integral part of manhood that we can ameliorate by reengineering a boy to be a different kind of man than his father, to the path we will take to get there. The narrator opens as follows:

He's tough. He's strong. He's aggressive. He's powerful.
These are the hallmarks of masculine nature that Jasper is identifying for anyone to see; and reasonably assumed to be the characteristics of manhood that need to be changed so the baby boy in the commercial doesn't grow up to become a rapist. Pause to digest that, allowing your cognitive dissonance to resolve itself before you move on.
Ready now? Good.
To his credit, and in a moment of clarity, Jasper has actually stumbled on to a half-truth. Those characteristics are generally considered to be masculine traits in human males. Whether by genetics or socialization or a combination of both, these are the qualities that we value, expect, and respect in men.
Why? Well, for one the human race would have been a dead end evolutionary experiment if men were not that way. Survival has its demands. I would expect that was particularly true 3,000,000 years ago on the African Savannah. But more relevant to modern times is that this is still what we expect of men in order to protect and provide for families as well as their societies.
But just one more of many problems for Jasper here is that none of these characteristics are demonstrably causal of rape any more than they are of armed robbery or becoming a police officer or a marine. Sure, rapists and marines may share many of the same traits, but Jasper is contending that the same exact traits that lead men to rape women also lead men to lay down their lives to protect them.
If this were true, changing the nature of manhood would not only prevent rape, but would also prevent men from stopping rape. Quite the paradox, eh?
Can we go on, or do you need another break to digest that? Are you still with me or just repeating to yourself, "But he is trying to stop rapists! Honest!" If so, take five and a few deep breaths. When you come back, please ask yourself: Does it not seem more plausible then that there is something else that differentiates men who take the path of protecting women from those that take the path of raping them?
If you are still struggling to answer that one, please check your dissonance meter again. It might be spiking into the red zone. And if you are telling yourself that you don't care, simply because the message is ultimately one you approve of, please check your sense of moral decency. It isn't much better than your average rapist, and maybe worse.
Unfortunately, this is not the worst of the message Jasper is peddling.
Let us just follow his line of logic, again if we are to be generous enough to call it that, and look at the somewhat less blatant conclusions he is drawing.
If it is characteristic of men to be tough, strong, aggressive and powerful, and that results not in protective guardians and providers for our society but the tragedy of rapists victimizing innocents, then the solution, as Jasper is clearly pointing to in this commercial, is obvious.
We need to engineer men who are fragile, weak, meek and powerless. And we have to start that in the cradle, hammering it in with a toxic dose of innate shame and self-loathing for having been born male.

There's your "redefinition of manhood," ala Josh Jasper. And if you buy into it, I pray you have no sons, or access to anyone else's.
There is much more to this than meets the average person's eye because what the average person doesn't know about gender politics in western culture could fill a library. For many years now, feminist academicians and politicians have worked diligently to promote the idea that men, by their nature, are just plain bad, and that they must be remolded into the feminist ideal in order to pass muster as human beings. It is called misandry; a word that will still get red lined on most spell checks, but it means the hatred or contempt for men and boys, and it is a very real, toxic ideology that sells like hotcakes because it has, well, been sold like Riverview Center Anti-Rape Ads. In other words, hating men sells because the culture has been taught to hate men, just as Riverview is teaching you to now.
It's a self-feeding tumor that has popularized the notion that men are in need of social reconstruction, arguably so they will be less of a threat to the society that they built and have protected for countless generations. We have seen it played out in simple memes like, "Boys are stupid, throw rocks at them," but it hardly stops there.
There are many other ways this is happening. And the 33 seconds of hate speech being peddled by the Riverview Center is just another symptom of the problem.
Above the vehement objections of alumni, many faculty and concerned parents, Hamilton College now requires all freshmen males to attend a class called "She Fears You." taught by another man of Jasper's ilk, Keith Edwards.
All the men attending Hamilton are herded into an auditorium on day one and told they are all potential rapists, and that this is rooted in their masculinity. Interestingly enough, no alarms are sent to the families of freshmen women that they have chosen to send their daughters to a school inhabited by men who are all, each and every one, potentially going to rape their daughters.
No bucks in that last part. No, none at all.
And in the end, bucks are what we are really talking about.
Anti-rape efforts have become a well-heeled, thoroughly monetized industry in western culture. Flying in the face of Josh Jasper's recent comment that rape is a subject that "no one wants to talk about," is a flourishing expanse of agencies and organizations that are not talking about anything else. Indeed, Josh Jasper makes his living and employs a staff from talking about rape.
And it is clear he will do whatever it takes to foster more rent seeking.
I don't think anyone in their right mind would find fault in the idea of curbing any sort of crime, but criminalizing the sex of half the population is not the way to go about it.
Holy shit, am I really having to tell people that?
If you are still not convinced, allow me to challenge you to answer some very simple questions. What would you think if the baby in that commercial had been black? In fact, please come up with one social ill for which you think it is fair and legitimate to target any other monolithic group because of the actions of a few. What group of human beings are you willing to put out there and say, "We need to change the meaning of what it means to be a….” Fill in the blank as you see fit:

- Woman?
- Asian?
- Jew?
- Homosexual?
- African American?
- Hispanic?

I am betting that those of you who thought Jasper’s commercial was a good idea would not come up with a single choice from that list, even though you think it fair to target men in exactly the same way. I am betting that men are the only group on the planet for which you feel justified in pointing at and alleging innate evils.
That is misandry in action, and it is a form of hate just as surely as any other. Your good intentions or concerns about rape don’t license you to practice hatred in a culture that is trying to rise above it.
Still, you are entitled to feel that way if you like. Hell, even neo Nazi’s are entitled to their beliefs.
But don’t drag our children down with you. And for those who insist on doing it, there is a growing number of people willing to put a stop to it.
[Addendum: Please observe that at this very moment Jasper is back peddling, of sorts. He is now appealing for other bloggers to “Unite” in the name of the ignored male victims of sexual violence, and is seeking our input on producing a commercial that addresses this. Don’t buy it. The thunderous anger from across the country that slapped Jasper in the face has just registered with him – but only as a needed demographic. He is now approaching the very people he has demonized and is trying to enlist their support. How transparent can you get?]

Women’s empowerment programs hurt women

February 11, 2011 | by Carey Roberts | Link | Original Link

“The Office of the Senior Advisor to the Secretary of State for Women’s Empowerment.” No, that’s not the clandestine front group from a Tom Clancy spy novel, nor is it a libertarian’s bad dream. Rather, it’s is a real-life program underwritten by the U.S. taxpayer. A brainchild of Hillary Clinton, the unit’s declared mission is to advise the secretary of state on “strategies the Department of State should implement to help empower women worldwide.”

Female empowerment has become fashionable at the U.S. Centers for Disease Control, as well. There, inspired bureaucrats worked overtime to gin up the EMPOWER acronym — “Enhancing and Making Programs Work to End Rape” — a multimillion-dollar initiative that promotes sexual violence prevention programs.

So where did the idea of female empowerment come from, and is it helping or hurting women?

The term “empowerment” was inspired by the writings of Karl Marx, who viewed peasant women as dual victims of capitalism and patriarchy. The solution, of course, was to embolden the ladies to cast off their conjugal oppressors. In practice, this meant an ample supply of newly liberated female laborers ready to work the fields, the factories, and the mines — an arrangement that no doubt pleased liberator-in-chief Vladimir Lenin.

But American women are becoming wary of the ideological agenda that lurks behind the empowerment facade.

Conservative icon Phyllis Schlafly recently commented, “It’s clear that feminists never wanted gender equality; they want power for the female left, which is why they use the word empowerment so reflexively.”

At the US Agency for International Development, female empowerment has become a religion of sorts. Every problem that afflicts the female gender is filtered through the neo-Marxist prism of power and control. So if you want to fathom the problem of partner abuse, “unequal power relations between men and women” are to blame, according to the USAID website.

The agency goes on to boast, “USAID is committed to preventing gender-based violence by supporting legislation against it.” And exactly what kind of laws are we talking about? In India, USAID “was instrumental in the formation of Women Power Connect,” according to its March 6, 2007 press release. “WPC’s priority issues include…the 33% reservation for women in Parliament.”

Translation: In the name of promoting democracy, American taxpayers have been bankrolling a radical feminist group to rig democratic elections and impose a gender quota on the Indian lawmaking assembly.

Another pet USAID project is microfinance programs, which provide $50 to $500 loans to aspiring entrepreneurs in impoverished countries. According to the Marxist formulation, men have all the power, so poverty-stricken males need not apply.

USAID hails its microfinance effort in northern Mali, Africa, where “2,700 new women micro-entrepreneurs received conditional seed capital, business training, and help in forming saving groups, while 1,097 already established women micro-entrepreneurs received additional training and networking assistance." (A government program to train women to network with their gal-pals? Yes, that's what the USAID fact sheet says.)

But microfinance programs have come under fire lately. That's because microfinance is just a fancy name for a sub-prime loan program for low-income borrowers. Since up to one-third of these loans go sour, lending agencies end up charging interest rates of 40% or more.

The title of a recent article in The Atlantic says it all: "Lies, Hype, and Profit: The Truth about Microfinance." Others refer to it as government-sanctioned usury.

Just last week the UK Guardian ran an article about Indian families trapped in a "deadly spiral of microfinance debt." The essay recounts the story of Victoria Bandari who took out a loan a decade ago. When her son was injured in a road accident, Bandari needed more credit for medical expenses. The 38-year-old woman took out a third, then a fourth loan. Finally, Bandari began to sell off her daughter's wedding jewelry.

Rama Peadda Boiana, a 29-year-old farmer's wife, consumed a lethal dose of pesticide to escape encircling debt collectors from a predatory flock of microfinance firms.

There's another reason that microfinance programs exploit women — they impose a Faustian-style bargain on the unsuspecting.

The subtle but unmistakable message behind feminist-inspired microfinance programs goes like this: "Ladies, your husband is an unreliable schmuck. Stick with him and you'll die a penniless waif. But come on board for our loan and job training programs and you can become a member of the global Sisterhood!"

That's the deal that the Great Society struck with low-income black women in the 1970s. The result: the marginalization of black men, an explosion of single-parent households, and the institutionalization of a near-permanent under-class.

Forty years ago, social scientists devised a clever euphemism to sum up the effects of a government program that picks taxpayers' wallets, weakens the family, and turns women into wards of the state: the feminization of poverty.

Infantile Controversy

February 12, 2011 | by J Galt | Link | Original Link

Many who express themselves in the main stream media and in fact all over the internet seem to be infatuated with speaking in the third person. They offer all kinds of advice and insights into making this shithole of existence a better place. It seems that so many of us are lacking in self-esteem we are quite willing to sacrifice others to our own cause of self-righteousness. My personal opinion is that most people are not willing to risk their credibility to stand up for an issue and speak from their own beliefs, that they remove themselves from the commitment. Instead they engage in finger pointing and finger wagging, it's safer for them.

It was not so long ago that tele-evangelists along with the Catholic Church were given a taste of their own hypocrisy and left to marinade in it. I call it taming the alter-ego.

Would you buy a used religion from this man?

The world is full of wheelers, dealers and healers. It all hinges on what you choose to believe and in this culture stroking down your dollar is the way you express your beliefs. Most popular beliefs as far as I am concerned are the ones with money behind them. It doesn't make them right it just makes them popular by economic repetition. Just ask anyone in Iraq that is hiding all those kitchen appliances of mass destruction. In as much as it may sound absurd, do you think if we had taken all the money that has been spent on that war and just handed to the Iraqi's we might have gotten more than we wanted. Call it a bribe, call it whatever you want, just give me the results I'm after. Where ever the money goes is where we point our nose and sniff, smells good eh, shit ya, blow the fuckers up and don't forget to support the troops.

Is it any wonder that so many people engage in feminist rhetoric, it's where the money is, for NOW. We aren't people, we're cattle grazing at the money river. What's particularly hilarious is they tax our money, tell us what to think and give it back to us when we comply. HA, HA, HA, HA, HA, HA, HA, HA. I like to call it shake and bake reality. There is no right or wrong – only money. Does that sound pathological to anyone out there. This is third person pathology, a mindless frenzy for money. Anybody remember the tire commercials with the baby sitting in the tire? Bet you went out and got new tires.

I got a phone call from a charity fighting against internet child pornography. He said the money was to fund more investigators. I told him most people have porn on their computers and aren't even aware of it. I said if he gave me 30 minutes on his computer I could probably find some. I told him I felt it was unethical to prosecute anyone for an unintended crime. He told me that I must support child pornography if I was unwilling to donate.

This is the kind of ethics supported by people like Josh Jasper and the organisation he represents. It's not about being responsible or ethical, it's not even about the problem it's about money. For people like this, they will sell anything and anybody to fill their wallet, and inflate their prestige.

I have two children from my first marriage, when they were young the issue of swearing came up. My daughter commented that people often swear and why couldn't she. I explained to her that everyone swears but they use discretion and that swearing was not appropriate anytime or anywhere. I explained that different cultures had different approaches to swearing. The French will often swear by insulting the church, "Tabernac". I explained that swearing is based on cultural values and in some cases personal values. I told her that I did not believe that words such as fuck, shit, piss were offensive. What I find much more offensive is words such as stupid, idiot, dummy, these are words that attack esteem and it is wrong to attack someone's self-esteem. I was respectful in the delivery of my personal beliefs she gave it some thought and agreed with me. After twenty five years I can honestly say I have never heard her use those words.

I find the message of the video produced by the Riverview Centre sensationally irresponsible. I would never choose to view my children this way, I think your message to a developing mind is indicative of a desire and willingness to damage their esteem. What is equally disturbing is that you remove the personal responsibility of violence from the individual by assigning the responsibility to nurturers. Your message clearly states that a rapist does not suffer from a pathology, but rather suffers from the influence of a wider community pathology.
It suggests that rapists don't exist, but communities that condone and promote rape do. What you have done with your video is condone rape, by stating that everyone else is responsible for it, that it is a nurtured behaviour. You make a good argument for rapists being victims of social influence. The next legitimate question is should rapists even be jailed, or should they undergo rehabilitation in the community? I'm just following your logic.
With a genuine moment of reflection consider the message offered to a child when you say these words: "never hit a girl!"
What you have just told that child is that you expect them to hit, that violence is OK, but that violence is conditional. It's simply an incomplete message about violence that ultimately condones it. Once you make violence conditional you promote its use. But unfortunately it does not give you exclusive control over it. What we often fail to see is that the meaning of a message can be much more diverse than intended.
Football is a good example.
Imagine that little piece of leather everyone is fighting over symbolizes masculinity and to get it and make it profitable by scoring points, you have to kick the shit out of anyone that gets in your way. That's how you bring home the bacon for your family.
The football, puck and basketball are all violent definitions of masculinity. The more you score the more you're paid. It's violence for profit, the war in Iraq, violence for profit, Hollywood and cinema, violence for profit. But what we really need to be concerned about is an eight month old baby. You know so the message isn't confused. Josh Jasper, ex-marine, football player, cop? How the fuck do you get more violent than that without being prosecuted. This guy has a message? There really is no need for a PI. Exposing this guy is easy, ask him how much he is paid, self-serving greed speaks for itself. Better yet ask the Riverview Centre to publish the earnings of its staff. Wanna bet they refuse?
Beyond the violence for profit, you know acceptable and state sanctioned violence, those that play by the violent rules can also gain fame and hero worship. Maybe not from everyone, but enough fame to satisfy their lust for self-importance. Ask any Hollywood action hero they'll tell you. Ever wonder why kids walk into schools and indiscriminately murder there piers? They're not married so they don't need the money. Maybe it's fame, maybe not from everybody, but enough to satisfy their lust for self-importance. Once you have killed 3 million whatever's on your game console isn't it just a reflex.

It's disappointing that the malignancy that is the media teaches us to over dramatize our lives and our own definition. It's part of our consciousness now. Super bowl flesh trade and domestic violence, the urban myths are never questioned. The question should always relate to the money, how much funding was spent to police the event and how many arrests were made. If you arrest fifty people and it cost you half a million that's ten thousand bucks a head. For that kind of money why wait for the super bowl , just put a bounty on their heads and the flood will never end. Wanna bet the next Democratic convention, won't be policed to protect the victims of the skin trade? What did you say? Politicians don't buy sex! Bill Clinton and Monica Lewd-insky…need I say more Hillary? This mentality is an extension of the war on terrorism mentality. Fear for sale, buy your safety with a donation. For anyone paying attention, you may have noticed that financial terrorism doesn't qualify, just violence. The banks can screw you for a couple of trillion, guaranteeing your children will live in bondage, but the real threat is still sitting in a cave somewhere watching the Disney channel.
Wanna know what a real feminist looks like, they're staring at your wallet with their hand out, selling morality by the pound, shilling and pence. Sometimes unknowingly you marry one.
Hey Josh, instead of pointing fingers why don't you tell us in your own words why you don't rape women? Try You Tube!

Spinning our Wheels on 'Date Rape': Time for a New Approach

February 12, 2011 | by False Rape Society | Link | Original Link

Literally billions of dollars have been pumped into the war on rape over the past three decades, and it's been an utter waste. Everyone agrees that the real battleground in the rape milieu is over so-called "date rape" and that our college campuses are ground zero for this war.

The sexual grievance industry insists that when it comes to rape, our college campuses are more dangerous places than the Tadmor Prison in Syria, where the bloodthirsty guards butcher inmates with axes for the fun of it. Yet they keep spinning their wheels, telling us the problem won't go away, and they do the same things year after year after year, and nobody seems care. When it comes to "date rape," we are at a sort of permanent and institutionalized stalemate.

They push for one loopy reform after the next to make it easier for all those hypothetical women out there who must have been raped to come forward. For one thing, they change the student disciplinary codes to engorge the definition of sexual assault to snag more "sex abusers"; they even try to flip the burden of proof for rape to force the accused male to prove consent. They enact rules that excuse drunk women from being charged with underage drinking so long as they report they've been raped (so what do you think drunk women are doing?). No idea is too extreme, too kooky, or too unjust to foist on presumptively innocent young men in the interest of getting these phantom women to "come forward."

They hold rallies where our daughters are urged to "take back the night" even though our sons are at far greater risk of harm at the hands of deviant sociopaths.

They sponsor "clothesline projects" where young women supposedly too scared to report their rapes to the proper authorities are empowered enough to scrawl the names of their alleged attackers on t-shirts along with empowering slogans like "keep your dick to yourself!" They hang ceramic penises on a clothesline as a symbolic assault on "patriarchy."

Paid speakers travel from college to college with slick PowerPoint presentations to shame Freshman men who would never dream of raping a woman into believing masculinity is inherently flawed, and that fantasizing about a hot classmate in Economics 101 is "rape lite."

They plaster posters in dorms saying that "only men can stop rape," even though virtually all men are as innocent as the most innocent woman. And they tacitly, and not so tacitly, encourage women to engage in risky behaviors with even deviant sociopaths.

They pump tuition and tax dollars into chronically underutilized campus rape crisis centers, which Heather MacDonald described as follows: "It's a lonely job, working the phones at a college rape crisis center. Day after day, you wait for the casualties to show up from the alleged campus rape epidemic—but no one calls." See here.

And when the inevitable false rape claim occurs, which, truth be told, is far more likely in college than a legitimate rape claim, the campus becomes Salem, Massachusetts, 1692. When the claim is finally revealed as a lie and the witch hunt ends, first they refuse to accept it, then they use it as an occasion to teach students about the dangers of — you guessed it — rape.

After all that, and no matter what happens, they have the chutzpah to insist rape is still rampant, even though it isn't. Despite all the reforms, all the shaming, and all the resources dumped into the toilet, all these supposedly raped women still aren't reporting; young women still find it's easier to pretend they've been slipped a date rape drug than to admit they regret having sex the night before; the supposed recipients of white male privilege are still decent people; and the sexual grievance industry still insists it needs more and more funding.

It's Bill Murray in "Groundhog Day." Nothing changes. And like all the characters Mr. Murray encounters every day (which is really the same day), everybody is just fine with it. The ones who pay the price for the manufactured rape hysteria are the innocent young men unlucky enough to be falsely accused. They are dragged before a constipated disciplinary hearing board whose mission in life is to rebuke the undeservedly privileged (i.e., white males). In these forums, which resemble the Star Chamber without as much fairness, the presumptively innocent are presumed guilty, addressed in scolding tones, and offered virtually no support while their accusers are treated as if they were Holocaust survivors. And the parents of boys who might be next tolerate this because the mainstream media never told them it goes on.

Even if you buy into the lie that rape is rampant, how on earth can you continue to let these goofs lead the war against it? We keep giving them money, and we let them do whatever pops into their heads to our sons, and every year it's the same thing: "Rape is rampant, and hardly any women are reporting their rapes."

If you went to your boss every year and reported what a failure you've been, how long would you last? We all know the definition of insanity, don't we?

This is insane.

But, of course, the reason they keep telling us rape is rampant and women aren't reporting is obvious. If they told us the truth, they'd be out of business. They've invented a scare to keep them employed, and they're going to ride it for as long as we don't blame them. When we finally start blaming them, they will start to paint a rosier picture — "rape is still a problem, but we've cut it in half." Trust me, I'd bet my left testicle on it.

By any measure, the "war" on rape isn't working. So what's the answer? It's simple. Open the windows and let the truth in.

First, acknowledge something nobody can plausibly deny: "he said/she said" date rape claims place an impossible burden on the people investigating them. Stop pretending otherwise. Even true believer feminists, like prominent feminist legal scholar Aya Gruber, admit that the criminal justice system is not equipped to deal with date rape. See here.

"He said/she said" disputes over rape need to be summarily dealt with. If the guy has a plausible explanation and there's no real evidence beyond her claim, it gets dropped immediately. Such claims usually are declared "unfounded" now, but not before the police or the college stage a sadistic passion play, a game of "humiliate-the-male" to appease the man-hating nitwits. Like Christ declared innocent by Pilate – "take him out and flog him before you release him."

And let's add one other thing: if there's evidence beyond his word that she lied, she gets prosecuted. No questions asked. Second, we need to end the Chicken Little, lock-the-doors-and-hide-the-daughters hysteria because it is encouraging young women to construe bad romps in the hay as rape that deserve to be sanctioned by the college, law enforcement, or both.

This means firing everyone who works in the sexual grievance industry, shutting down the rape counseling centers, and telling our college administrators to stop paying speakers to come on campus to humiliate almost half of the school's paying customers. (How on earth do parents of young men put up with that?)

Third, focusing on so-called "date rape" skirts the real issue and ignores the elephant in the room. Men and women are looking for different things in sex. Men want sex, and women want men. Studies show that women experience far greater after-the-fact regret than men. See here. Instead of Freshman orientation where young men are shamed for daring to have a penis, we need to start educating our young women that feelings of regret are natural – and that they need to think more carefully about having sex in the first place.

A female law professor in London named Helen Reece recently wrote a provocative piece positing that "police have succumbed to campaigners' pressure to treat every allegation of rape with the utmost seriousness." But, she cautioned, "treating all rape complaints seriously means treating all false allegations seriously." She continues: "The nightmare scenario is approaching where every rape complaint is seen as pointing to a prosecution, if possible for rape, and if that's not possible, for a false allegation. Instead, we should save prosecutions for only the most heinous sexual crimes, and drag the law back out of teenagers' messy sex lives."

Ms. Reece candidly explains: "I remember the day when one of my best friends burst into tears on the bus on the way to school, before revealing to me and another friend that one of our classmates 'had tried to rape her'. A box of tissues later, it became clear that what had happened was that he had made a very direct pass at her, which she had responded to up to a point but felt awful about afterwards. We didn't brand our classmate a rapist, but nor did we think that our friend was a liar. We understood that this was her way of telling us that she felt really rubbish about what had happened, particularly because it meant that she had been 'unfaithful' to her long-term boyfriend. It never occurred to any of us to involve teachers or parents, let alone the police."

It's not the boys who need to change, it's the young women. In every other sphere of life, women insist that they not be portrayed as helpless pawns waiting to be rescued by the handsome Disney prince. But when it comes to alleged date rape, all of those lofty empowering sentiments go sailing out the window. Anyone who has the temerity to suggest that women who drink are free moral agents capable of making decisions for themselves is a misogynist and a rape apologist. In the bedroom, women are not doers but victims, damsels in more distress than the most passive Disney princess.

We cannot empower our daughters by pretending they are powerless. It’s time we insist our daughters grow up and start taking personal responsibility for their actions.
Here endeth the sermon.

Shame on Pepsi: Domestic Violence PSA

February 13, 2011 | by keyster | Link | Original Link

This is my personal response to the misandric ad by Pepsi, glorifying domestic violence, particularly violence that is instigated by women against men.
Would the message Pepsi be peddling remain so funny if it were women being slapped, punched and kicked?
You be the judge, now, and when you are making your choices at the grocery store.

Sex, Sociobiology, and the Media

February 14, 2011 | by Dusty | Link | Original Link

We constantly hear about the mistreatment of women in media. Susan Faludi writes about it in Backlash: The Undeclared War Against American Women (Broadway, 2006). According to Faludi, evidence of the backlash is everywhere, from TV and film to news stories about marriage and single, working women.

New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd talks about female mistreatment in pop culture and sexual double standards repeatedly in her book Are Men Necessary? When Sexes Collide (Penguin Group, 2005). In one example, Dowd says "The angry, man-hating female monster is a staple of mythology (Medusa and the Furies) and movies (Glenn Close with raised knife and Sharon Stone with raised ice pick)." (Dowd, p. 116)

In He's A Stud, She's A Slut And 49 Other Double Standards Every Woman Should Know (Seal Press, 2008), feminist blogger Jessica Valenti says "Reality shows are a subject unto themselves, but I think they represent a tremendous example of how we punish women for conforming to the very expectations that we shove down their throats." (Valenti, p.211)

Sadly, these writers only get it half right. There's plenty of man bashing too (and responses to it), but we rarely hear about this. This is yet another example of how feminists care for women rather than people despite their claims of humanitarianism. Must women hog all of the persecution?

Think about television. Doltish males are constantly paired up with wise, infinitely understanding women- think Marge and Homer Simpson of The Simpsons, or Jill and Tim "the tool man" Taylor of Home Improvement. With the latter, a typical episode goes something like this: (1) Tim jokes around and interacts with his family (at home) or his coworkers (on the set of Tool Time, his small-time cable show), (2) Tim gets into a situation that infuriates his wife Jill, (3) things escalate and come to a head, (4) Tim talks to his faceless next-door neighbor, Wilson, who gives him scholarly advice by quoting some poet, philosopher, or public figure, (5) Tim and Jill talk, and Tim tries to reiterate the lesson he learned from Wilson, but gets it all wrong (showing how dumb he is), (6) Jill shakes her head in confusion at what she's hearing, then tells Tim what she expects of him, and (7) Tim grunts in quiet deference, and she forgives him for being such a churl. Sometimes the show varies from that. Tim and Jill also have three sons who get into plenty of trouble. But because they're boys (men in training), the framework remains the same- men behaving badly.

I base the following analysis upon a viewing of Home Improvement's entire fifth season and Nathanson and Young's treatment of the show in their book Spreading Misandry (McGill-Queen's University Press, 2001, p. 38-42).

It's clear from watching Home Improvement that Tim has plenty to learn from Jill about becoming a better person, but Jill has little, if anything, to learn from Tim. When Tim does something wrong, it's because he's a man. Any lesson he learns will come from listening to Jill (thus avoiding catastrophe) or not listening to Jill (and suffering the consequences). However, when Jill does anything wrong, it's in spite of being a woman. Because she has little, if anything, to learn from Tim, any lesson she learns will be on her own and therefore hard-won. (This is supposed to remind us of the uphill battle that women fight.) Jill occasionally credits Tim with teaching her something about life and love, but that is something she takes from him, not something he intentionally gives to her. In this sense, Tim is like a twenty dollar bill found on the sidewalk- Jill is thankful for him and his perceived value, but not to him. (Also, this is supposed to remind us of how humble and deep women are.) A woman who can extract anything of value from such a cretin must be amazing! The basic message of the show is that women are superior to men. Men should laugh at themselves, but take women seriously. Women should also laugh at men, but take themselves seriously.

The boys don't pay much attention to Tim, unless they're wisecracking about his incompetence. When Tim offers them advice, they either tell him no thanks or they hear him out with incredulous looks on their faces. Whatever, Dad! If they do heed his advice, it goes badly. One would think that a father might have something to teach three young boys about being a man, but that is not what one sees here. On the other hand, when Jill offers the boys her guidance, they listen intently to her motherly wisdom, thank her for her contribution, and usually hug her. We never find out if the advice is of any practical value, but that's not important. What is important here is that what Mom thinks is respected, where what Dad thinks is not.

Jessica Valenti sees the pairing of stupid men with wise women as yet more evidence of- get this- misogyny! Her reasoning is that this makes the female characters look bad, because they're pathetic enough to stay with such men. So if a woman stays with an idiot, it's implied that women in general have poor taste, which is "insulting." (Valenti, p. 42-43)

But how would feminists react if the tables were turned and wise, understanding male characters were paired with stupid women? Would feminists then argue that television shows regularly portray women as imbeciles? Can they have it both ways? Would they just go with whichever interpretation is convenient for their cause? Wouldn't this be a case of feminists having their cake and eating it too?

Let's suppose that men are stupid, and women have bad taste. If I had a choice, I would rather be portrayed as lacking good taste than being an idiot. Taste is a choice and can be refined, but intelligence (or lack thereof) is not. One has it or one doesn't.

It doesn't bother me when men are depicted poorly in the media. (It doesn't seem to bother anyone else, either.) What bothers me is that everyone seems to care about how women are depicted. Why the double standard? And before anyone accuses me of being "wacky" or "out there" with my deconstruction here, I understand that Home Improvement is just a TV show, but why then can't we admit that Three Men And A Baby (which Faludi criticizes) is just a movie? (Faludi, p. 146)

I'll tell you why: because a woman's pain is deemed important, while a man's pain is deemed insignificant. When women are mistreated, we hear about it. A woman hurts! We need to do something! When men are mistreated, we hear nothing. Or we hear a smug dismissal: Shut up and take it like a man!

But why is this ultimately? Are feminists just evil? Are men inferior? Do women care about us at all? Or is there an explanation for all of this which lends us to a less incendiary view of the situation? Let's look at human reproduction. On average, ovulation produces one precious female egg. On average, one ejaculation produces 200-300 million male sperm. These sperm engage in a brutal marathon, and that egg is the finish line. If one exceptional, "champion" sperm makes it, a pregnancy occurs. The rest die off. That suicide mission in your mother's uterus resulted in your birth. And much of your life and behavior is a re-enactment of that violent death race which happened at the gamete level.

We see the same process in action at the bar on any given night- the precious, beautiful female surrounded by guys who want to take her home. These men are engaged in the same rat race. Only one exceptional guy will win, if any of them win. The rest walk away beaten, or they rejoin the rat race in pursuit of another precious female. All of this implies that women are considered a finite and sought after resource and men are considered disposable- unless they prove some kind of worth or usefulness.

Nature is brutal, but culture takes what nature gives us, then amplifies and magnifies it. Culture is a reflection of who and what we are, everything we do, and where we live. Sometimes, this reflection can become wildly exaggerated, romanticized, and even distorted. Take the Scandinavian black metal scene of the late 80s and early 90s. Tired of the liberal traditions of their home country of Norway, some disaffected teens started an underground music scene based on ancient, Nordic, pagan mythology with a strong anti-Christian sentiment, nationalism, and abrasive, cacophonous heavy metal music. Their rebellion eventually led to suicide, church burnings, and murder. (No females were harmed that I know of.) Michael Moynihan and Didrik Soderlind documented this in their book Lords of Chaos (Feral House, 2003).

The things we see in books, movies, television, and the internet (the elevation of females and the marginalization of males- unless one proves himself exceptional, becoming a hero or villain, the highest or lowest) are merely cultural extensions of nature's brutality to men. But nature only goes so far. Nature hands off the baton to culture in this mad relay, and we run with it- occasionally too far- just like the kids in Norway did.

Howard Bloom discusses male expendability in his book The Lucifer Principle (Atlantic Monthly Press, 1995). But Bloom also says that men are nature's dice. Sometimes we win big; other times we lose big. Men are thrown against the wall like Silly Puddy. Whoever doesn't stick gets unceremoniously tossed into the garbage. Whoever does stick gets thrown a second and third time, over and over again, either being tossed out or moving to a higher level. Nature uses this waste and destruction to hone and polish humanity (and all of life) to perfection. (Bloom, p.146-156)

If we examine human behavior through the perceptual lens of sociobiology- coined by E.O. Wilson in his 1975 book of the same name- we will soon realize that feminists are consummate traditionalists, elevating women and marginalizing men. In other words, even feminists are natural- in their own twisted way.

This begs the question- if this is natural, why should we change any of it? Because we can! There are double standards in male and female interaction which benefit and hurt men and women- only at opposite times. When he sinks, she swims; when he swims, she sinks. In our enlightened times, men and women can ease the burden of navigating these vicious waters by throwing each other a life preserver. And we should absolutely shun anyone who tries to interfere with those who want to share a life preserver.

The Women's Movement doesn't want to get rid of all double standards- just the ones that benefit men. Otherwise, it'd be called The People's Movement. There are plenty of decent women out there who want to share the burden and throw men a metaphorical floatation device. They want to interact with men and have families with them. Yet there are feminists who want to interfere. Or they want the government to interfere. This has to stop.
Simone De Beauvoir said in a dialogue with Betty Friedan, "No woman should be authorized to stay at home to raise her children. Society should be totally different. Women should not have that choice, precisely because if there is such a choice, too many women will make that one." (Saturday Review, June 14, 1975, p. 18)
The radical feminist mentality is that if someone calls women stupid, that's a call for action. If someone calls men stupid, what's the big deal? As far as some feminists are concerned, labeling men as stupid seems hardly problematic- in fact, calling us stupid probably doesn't go far enough for them. Marilyn French once said "All men are rapists, and that's all they are." So much for measured statements! But fret not. One can imagine the more "male friendly" feminists adopting the following patronizing, condescending, liberal line just for good PR: Those poor men. Don't hold anything against them. They can't help it. They were born that way.
We don't have to stigmatize a woman because she can't cook or doesn't want children. We don't have to dumb down a female character to appeal to a male audience. But do we have to call a young boy a "sissy" if he cries over a skinned knee? And do we have to portray male characters as obnoxious buffoons who are guided by wonderful women in order to appeal to female audiences? Do we get to make fun of everybody? Or nobody? It's a question of consistency and fairness between the sexes. Don't answer me. Answer yourselves.

Since When Does 'Breaking the Silence' Mean Keeping Your Mouth Shut?

February 14, 2011 | by jessicawilcox | Link | Original Link

Dr. Phil has dedicated the ninth season of his talk show to breaking the silence of domestic violence. How noble. We have all heard the famous tag line "I want you to get real about your life." Well, Dr. Phil, when are you going to get real?

On January 10, 2011 an episode of the Dr. Phil show aired entitled "I Am Afraid of my Husband." A husband and wife were featured who both admitted to abusive behaviors toward each other. The husband admitted to behaviors that included kicking his wife in the stomach, and, while she was pregnant, restraining her and pinning her down to the floor. She also admitted to slapping, kicking, spitting on her husband, calling him names, breaking his laptop twice, and destroying other house hold furniture.

Now, we (women) are taught our entire life by social workers, teachers, clergy, public service announcements and the like that if men exhibit these behaviors toward us they are unacceptable and that no one should have to live with these behaviors in their life. They are correct. No one should be abused in any way shape or form. It does not take a degree in psychology or a rocket scientist to see that the above behaviors are unacceptable. The problem with the Dr. Phil lies in this simple question, "What are we teaching people about abusive behaviors, and what message are we sending them about men's value and worth in society, and in their families?"

The husband in this case tried to explain to Dr. Phil that his wife is not the innocent victim she claims to be. That she is just as responsible for attacking him and that in certain situations he had acted in self-defense; that in other cases she had him running down stairs and going in a closet, holding the closet door shut with his feet to get away from her. He also stated that she provoked some of his behaviors with her disrespectful attitude.

Of course a disrespectful attitude, while a force to be reckoned with, is no excuse for abusing someone. It is a good reason to leave the relationship perhaps, but not to abuse. When we resort to violence we have lost all logic and reasoning capabilities. We are not animals. We are supposed to have a higher level of rationality than that.

Self-defense is a reasonable case if you are protecting yourself from abusive behavior. He was portrayed by Dr. Phil as a control freak because he used the words, "She disrespects my authority," as if Dr. Phil believes a man has no authority over his children or over certain aspects in his home. This couple does have children, and the "controlling" behaviors the wife was trying to address were the husband deciding when or what the children should eat and when they go to the park; as if fathers have no right to make a call on such things.

And how were this man's concerns addressed?

At one point in this episode, Dr. Phil had both partners stand up. He then pointed out how much bigger the husband was than his wife. Dr. Phil then drove the point home to this man and to America that this imbalance in size led to an imbalance of power in the relationship. Dr. Phil has made this point on his show many times before. Since the man supposedly has more power, it is his responsibility to never react with violence and also his responsibility to stop said violence even if just by walking away and leaving.

This is basically saying that men are responsible for the violence directed toward them in their relationships, and that they are also the ones responsible for stopping it, but they are absolutely in no circumstance allowed to defend themselves.
Men's concerns about their partner's behaviors are invalidated, belittled, and simply ignored, or else they are made responsible for it. Not to mention the men who have been told that since they are the stronger ones both physically and emotionally they need to 'suck it up, and take it like a man' or find a way out of it themselves with no help. Is it at all possible to make our men feel any less valuable to our society? I want to scream it from the roof tops, "America, what is wrong with us? Why can't we see that this is a huge injustice?"
Dr. Phil was not shy about calling this man's behaviors abusive, while at the same time, with kid gloves on, labeled the wife's behavior as a "relationship issue."
How embarrassing. How belittling. Not only for men who are completely invalidated as to their concerns, but for women as well. Men are taught that they are perpetrators even if they are victims, while women are treated like children who are too weak to be held accountable for their actions.
In fact, we cannot even say they are being treated like children because we hold children to a higher standard of accountability than we do grown women.
What child does not get into some kind of trouble for hitting another child? Yet we make excuses for women and label them a victim even while they are committing the crime.
This is all about equality correct? Common sense should tell us that a gun, or knife, or a partner waiting until you fall asleep to attack, or poisoning your food, or hiring someone to make a hit on you more than makes up for any size discrepancy that may exist between partners.
We know from testimonies of men who have been abused that there are women who are not afraid to go after a man much bigger than they are. Some women have no fear of men, and why would they? They hear Dr. Phil tell them that a man is never to hit them under any circumstance. They watch police officers arrest their husbands after the husband called the police to stop his wife's violent behavior.
Women are getting the message loud and clear that protect and serve does not apply if you have a penis. Women know that they can just say, "If you go to the police I will bring false charges against you", and they know it's all over for their husband if they do.
We also know that men who divorce their abusive wives, even if the wife pleads guilty to battery or is convicted, will still more than likely lose custody of his children to his wife at the whim of a divorce court judge thereby giving more power to the abuser and further dehumanizing the abused.
Not to mention the continued suffering of children in such situations.
Murray Straus, a co-director of the University of New Hampshire Family Research Laboratory, had been at the center of controversy in regards to a conflict survey where he found that women initiate violence in relationships as often as men. He says the difference between his findings and others is due to the fact that other studies focus on crime reports, which are filed mostly by women.

According to a 1998 US DoJ report, every year in the United States of America, 834,732 men are victims of physical violence by an intimate. That means that every 37.8 seconds in America a man is battered. Of the 834,732 men who are battered, 90,241 men will be knifed, 180,483 threatened by a knife, 360,965 hit with an object, 67,681 beaten up and 620,049 slapped or hit. And those numbers were revealed in a survey conducted about violence – against women.
You will never hear these statistics on the Dr. Phil show. In fact, they can be difficult to find anywhere because they are ignored under pressure by feminist groups. In fact, a report released on Jan 18, 2011 by SAVE (Stop Abusive and Violent Environments) shows us that 90% of federally funded domestic violence education programs lack accuracy. At most only one in ten domestic violence training, education, and public awareness materials are accurate.
So we can see who really suffers from silence where domestic violence is concerned. It is not women. There were 1,500 domestic violence shelters for women in America in 1996 alone. Federal funds for female victims of domestic violence in 2008 were appropriated at 125 million dollars. There are no domestic violence shelters specifically for men in the United States. In fact, some domestic violence shelters have a policy that if a woman comes to them fleeing her environment and has a son that has reached a certain age, her son is not allowed to stay there with her.
Is that not sexism of the worst kind?
They shoot themselves in the foot, not to mention the most vulnerable victims, with such policies. If a woman is truly abused and needs shelter but must leave her son behind where does she go? And why are older boys not the concern of women's groups? There are no federal funds appropriated for male victims to be able to form their own advocacy groups or their own shelters.
I am not saying that women are not victims of domestic violence. I am not saying that women are the only ones at fault. I am not saying that men do not abuse women. I am not saying that women should not have the help fleeing these situations that they do have. Before you think that I do not understand the plight of a woman in a violent relationship I will tell you that I do. I have been in a violent relationship myself, and I am grateful for the assistance I had to get out of that situation. I had that help because I am female. I cannot and will not sit by silent while men go through the same things I did, but also suffer in true silence and are ignored. My heart goes out to them.
Dr. Phil and the rest of America need to get real when it comes to male victims of domestic violence. They also need to get real about the fact that women are perpetrators.
Dr Phil, even the women on your message boards are saying you blew it for this husband and wife who is "afraid of her husband." Women who have not swallowed your poison do not want to continue to see our fathers, husbands, brothers, sons, uncles or friends suffer in silence any longer. We do not want to have to see our men have nowhere to turn when they need help. We do not want to see women treated as children when they are adults. It is insulting.

We want them held accountable for their actions and we want them to truly have the opportunity to do the hard work and change their behavior. You of all people should know that this type of change does not come from excusing the behavior.
You portrayed yourself in the beginning of your public career as a tough guy who isn't afraid to say it like it is. I admired that about you when I first watched you on Oprah nine years ago, when I still watched Oprah. I have seen you give very good advice before. You have helped me potty train my children, and have given me some fairly good advice in other parenting issues. You even helped me overcome my fear of the dark. I suspect that personally you are probably not a bad guy. Yet you seriously miss the mark when it comes to domestic violence victims.
I suspect it has something to do with the fact that the one thing that makes this world go around is the almighty dollar. You and I both know you have a target audience. This audience has a childish, knight in shining armor mentality when it comes to men; that or they just think men are inferior to women.
Either way, if you put enough alleged scumbags on your show, you can cash in on beating them up verbally. It's sad to see you have become a sellout. Perhaps you always were. I once had respect for you. But now that I am educated about the problem of domestic violence it leaves me forced to believe you are a common mangina who furthers the entitlement of women over men.
Since when were you afraid to speak up Dr. Phil? Since when did "Breaking the Silence" on an issue mean that you remain silent about half the people that suffer from it?

A Valentine for Vagicons

February 14, 2011 | by Theodore Labadie | Link | Original Link

In case "Birth of Vagicon" hasn't yet prompted people to throw a brick through my window I thought I might recap with an examination of a review—of sorts—of The Man Whisperer written by Candice M. Giove over at the New York Post.

I haven't read it and I can tell you right now that there's a greater chance of me being used as a fist puppet by an extra-terrestrial specimen handler than of ever cracking its cover. This, despite the fact it's gotten rave reviews over at Amazon (really, what better reason not to read a book than when it gets rave reviews from the hoi poloi at Amazon) and I don't want to risk corneal hives reading a soap-opera diatribe on what women are supposed to think of men and how this infotainment can be used to manipulate them. Ladies—and gents—if you can't relate to other members of our species without manipulation may I suggest that for your peace of mind and the sanctity of your soul you give them a wide berth. Unless of course, your motive for engagement is not relationship or connection but use. Just make sure after consuming to deposit the empty husk in the appropriate recycling bin and do your bit for our planet.

Fortunately, I don't need to read The Man Whisperer, Giove's done it for me. Here's what she got out of it:

The dating-advice duo behind "The Man Whisperer" book promise in their step-by-step guide that getting your guy to follow your every command involves shedding feminism—part-time…

Cathy, 34, and Chris, 35, often take turns picking up the tab. So she tried to Man Whisper her way out of the check on her night to pay.

Men are hardwired to solve, protect and please—and dig appreciation, the authors said. Before heading to dine at Rosie O'Grady's, Cathy gushed about her eagerness for the outing.

At the restaurant, she savored steak and he feasted on seafood. When the $95 check arrived, Cathy simply showed appreciation and zipped it.

He paid without discussion.

So, by turning feminism "off" a woman can get a man to do her bidding and balance a ball on his nose like a trained seal. Honey, I hate to be the one to break it to you… this manipulation is feminism. It doesn't matter how you package it, treating men in terms of their utility to women instead of as subjective agents with autonomous desires and needs whose first duty is not to you but to themselves, their progeny, and to the civilization that protects and nurtures all of us, is feminism.

Our preocupation with feminist entitlement has wreaked much damage. Last time I checked, forests all over the planet were begining to wither and die, the end result of men employing technology to keep women in every conceivable and superficial creature comfort, while Western governments are in a tail-spin thanks in large part to marxist-feminist inspired multiculturalism. Witness that the most feminist of Western democracies, Sweden, has changed its constitution without consulting its own people to allow non-citizen immigrants to hold high office like national prosecutor, evidence of a general anti-Western trend seen throughout the world. As immigrants flood that country and root like weeds they're raping women in record numbers giving Sweden the highest per-capita rate of female rape in Europe. Muslim men, of course, are not to blame because they do not provide the kind of cautionary example that antirational multiculturalism craves: we oppress them as we do our women. Bad boy, bad. Play dead. Oh, and thanks to Julian Assange's Wikileaks site—you know, the guy feminists have falsely accused of rape—we now know that Al Qaeda are close to possessing nuclear and biological weapons which they will not hesitate to use on the feminist West.

There's likely little that heterosexual men can do about it however, since they've been demoted to fetching candy and flowers for their mistresses and their reward for showing a bit of wood when women scratch their tummies is the doghouse, I mean, prison.
Happy Valentine's Day.

“The Road,” and Individual and Collective Mindsets

February 15, 2011 | by B.R. Merrick | Link | Original Link

I made a big mistake. Really big. I deferred to chivalry a few months ago when I wrote the following as part of a review of “The Road,” starring Viggo Mortensen: “Incidentally, I would not recommend this film to women, as it touches too strongly on what I believe a great many women fear the most.”

I take it back. I wouldn’t call it a “must-see” for women, but when I’m through here, I hope you’ll understand why I am correcting myself. (And just in case you don’t get it, I will spell it out later on, so sit tight.)

Several months ago I published an article at “Strike The Root” called “Coercion Is Death” that many people are probably sick of me linking to, but unfortunately for the nauseated who have heard me say it ad nauseam, I will continue to link to it until I am given a fact to the contrary (or until I nauseate myself, whichever comes first).

Actually, that’s already happened. (Not the nausea; the correction.) Not long after the article was published, one of my friends contacted me, giving me a contradictory idea, as I feared. Nothing terribly conflicting, but an interesting idea nonetheless, one that I think is worth considering: In the article, I stated, “Individuality exists, and collective does not.” My buddy posited that collectives do indeed exist in nature. In one sense, he’s entirely correct, and I’m glad he brought it up, because I think this is one more way in which men and women, in general, think differently. I will also refrain from putting the word “collective” in quotes from here on out, even though I think this is a gray area worthy of closer inspection.

As I have mentioned in previous articles, children are quite fragile, both boys and girls. The toughest of small boys is virtually helpless outside the home, unless he rapidly develops better ways of communicating with complete strangers. In this sense, developing individuals cannot be left on their own. The design of a woman’s body, unlike a man’s, indicates that she has the material for nurturance of these developing individuals, if not the desire. The provision of nurturance can be done just as well by men, for certain, but we’re not talking about individual ability, we are talking about biological facts. The simple truth is that nutritious breast milk comes out of women and not men.

Beyond that, there appear to be overarching factors at play in every culture throughout the world, where women in general volitionally tend to the needs of children while men in general volitionally look after the needs of both women and children. I have no problem with this, or any variation on it. It is division of labor based on generalized physical traits, plain and simple. It can go in the opposite direction, or in an entirely new direction according to individual circumstances, as long as the concerns of developing individuals within the voluntary collective are taken under careful consideration.

This is oftentimes where women shine, and where a great many women want to be. This is as close as I can get, in my own mind, to accepting a collective as fact: the family. Both men and women are capable of thinking in the collective, otherwise we wouldn’t bother having a word for it.

To think collectively is not necessarily coercive or death-oriented. The trouble with thinking in the collective, however, is that it tends to rapidly outmaneuver the crucial recognition of the individual as supreme, a phenomenon which, upon the onset of adulthood, is an undeniable fact. Within each collective, after all, is an individual with a brain and his own volition. The leap into that which kills comes about when one or more individuals in an otherwise voluntary or naturally occurring collective decides that she knows what certain others in the collective need, and sets about taking away their choices.
This can be accomplished in various ways: emotional manipulation, threats, confiscation of property, violence, or a false sense of obligation, honor, or tradition. It can be done for various reasons: fear, calculation of probable adverse outcome, envy, deep-seated hurt, jealousy, or out of a false sense of duty. The reasons why coercion over the collective is used, the means by which it is brought about, or the sex of the individual who sparks the war against the volition of others, does not concern me. What does concern me is the probable predisposition of the female mind versus the male mind.
I propose that women are far more likely to think in the collective as opposed to the individual. I do not believe that this is a chauvinistic or derogatory statement, mainly because I have tried to stress thus far that collective thinking can be beneficial to the individual, as well as in whatever group of people those individuals are found. To think collectively, or to be predisposed to think collectively, shows elements of empathy, which can be expressed in both masculine and feminine ways. It also takes under consideration the supreme importance of relationships to the proper development of the supreme individual.
The trouble with the collective mindset, however, is not only that there is no such thing as a collective mind within the human race. It seems to start with simple, benign things: What if you are dependent on others in the group to get certain tasks done, and you suddenly find that those in charge of these important tasks have decided to do them in a way with which you disagree? What if this was a rather contentious disagreement? What if, in the absence of the completion of this task in the manner to which you are accustomed, you were made to stare into the very face of death? What if it wasn't merely the death of tradition or a favorite luxury? What if it had to do with how crops are sown or where shelter is built? In what part of this emotional thought process does coercion first tempt the individual?
I posit that it begins in an infinitesimal place in the brain, and exactly where will probably never be known (although I continue to hold to the idea that Alice Miller has the key). My only hope for humanity is that individuals in every collective throughout this world will someday realize where the individual ends up if power over the collective is sought.
If we can take as a premise that women are more likely to think collectively, for the evolutionary sake of the humans that push their way out of women's bodies, we can also conclude that, where collective thinking easily runs into the implementation of coercion (and therefore death), we are going to have trouble. It is ironic that concern for preventable and avoidable death runs so very quickly to the very thing that was preventable and avoidable, but based on my observations, this is always the outcome. Unfortunately, this also means that women are, perhaps, less dependable in matters of individuality and freedom than men.

This does not mean there isn't crossover: I have read plenty of well-informed writers in the cause of freedom that are women. This also doesn't mean that women should be subservient to men, as I will once again point out the benefits of collective thought. After all, if we lived in my anarchist fantasy world, I would be able to voluntarily sign up for my own security service, which enterprise would presumably be oriented toward thinking of their customers both collectively and individually to ensure repeat business.

What it does mean is that women are more likely to worry about the collective, and in matters where physical strength is called for – defense of the outer perimeter, laying the roads, clearing the forest, building the houses – these same worriers are going to look to men to assuage their fears. It is a short leap from here to the withholding of that which men seek from women – their bodies –and, finally, to jumping on the nearest alpha male in order to get him to point a gun. (Boy. That's another great movie!)

Which brings me to my recantation once more. I will not review the movie again, as the curious reader can just follow the link above. However, I will restate the essential story here for the lazy (Welcome!), so that I can explain why I shouldn't have said what I did: Viggo Mortensen plays a father who must lead his son through a world in which civilization has suddenly disappeared in a great conflagration. They go through sadness and many perils, and there are quite a lot of frightening situations in the film.

When I recommended that women stay away from the movie, I believe I was reflecting on my own high level of sensitivity, its tenuous tie to the "female" mindset, and I ran with it. That was a mistake. Here's why. Telling women to stay away from a movie because I'm afraid it will appeal too much to their fears implies too many things I can no longer ignore, given the above facts and conclusions:

1. It is chauvinistic and collectivist to assume what women in general are going to think.
2. It is condescending to women who can, when so roused, think and act as the most profound individuals.
3. It is an appeal to traditional, collectivist thinking that is death-oriented, where it is naturally assumed that women should get in the lifeboats and the men should fuck themselves, content while freezing water stabs them from all angles with the hope that their goddamned names will end up on a plaque that someone's kid doesn't understand.
4. I am not a woman.

In short, it was wrong, wrong, wrong.

Oops.

Well, that's taken care of. Now, what should women do about this movie?

Whatever you want, ladies. If you choose to see it, I sincerely hope you won't falter when it gets to the part where an innocent woman and her child are shot down in collective fashion. What I do hope, instead, is that you will understand what this movie has to say about the essential nature of manhood for the purposes of civilization, and respect it. Not worship it, not think of it as superior, but merely indispensible. I hope you will understand that the growth of any civilization is going to be manifest in the physical presence of men:

building, planting, reaping, cutting, welding, hammering, clearing, plotting, sketching, ruminating, and just plain living. Women are also visible, but their visibility, due to their own choices based on the natural tendencies of a great many of them, will more often be voluntarily confined to the little collectives that women enjoy making. The much more visible women who tend to shine out like men, as long as they haven't embraced misandry (which is identical to the hatred of freedom), will probably knock my socks off.
So, if you're a woman who still believes in the myth of equality, go ahead and watch it.
It's not pretty seeing how civilization can crumble and threaten your children. As more and more of your sex embrace feminism and misandry, more and more of the men portrayed by Mortensen will end up in prison for doing nothing wrong. Who will defend you when the cannibals come for you and your kids? Think about it.
And for women with squeamish tendencies like mine who have no intention of watching something so depressing, I can recommend the wonderful chick flick "Enchanted April" instead, where four women learn to get over themselves and enjoy the company of men without any bloodletting.
Peace out.

Sarah Palin Needs to Rein in Her Harsh Feminist Rhetoric

February 16, 2011 | by Carey Roberts | Link | Original Link

I applaud Sarah Palin's passion, her adroit sense of humor, and her you-go-girl! gumption. But the more I learn about Sarah Palin, the more I become perplexed by her over-heated gender-bending rhetoric.

I believe we can all agree that men and women should have equal opportunities. But let's not confuse equal opportunities with identical outcomes. Just because a woman has the same right to an education and a decent job, doesn't mean she will pursue the identical career path, toil as long, or work as many years as a man.

Men and women have differing proclivities and interests — most Americans understand this fact. But then there is the small band of disaffected feminists who adamantly insist any and all social differences are the product of gender discrimination.

So where does the former vice-presidential candidate stand on all of this?

Let's take the gender wage gap. Dozens of studies show that when the relevant factors are taken into account – training, experience, hours worked, and so forth – any salary difference is smaller than a twinkle in Nancy Pelosi's eye.

But during the 2008 presidential campaign, Palin used the myth to skewer her Democratic opponent. Ignoring the fact that most of the top-level staffers in Obama's former senate office were male, she made this charge: "Out on the stump he talks a good game about equal pay for equal work, but according to the Senate payroll records, women on his own staff get just 83 cents for every dollar that the men get."

Ratcheting up women's sense of resentment, Palin then asked, "Does he think that the women aren't working as hard? Does he think they are 17% less productive?"

Pretty harsh, Mrs. Palin.

Another feminist cause célèbre is the "glass ceiling," the notion that bearded patriarchs are conspiring to keep working women in their place. But there is no more impressive story of our generation than the rapidity with which women have come through the ranks to reach the very top. As Alaska's first female governor, Sarah Palin knows this triumph well.

But the identity politics-embracing Sarah Palin had this to say during her campaign: "In the long history of our country, 74 people have held the position of President or Vice-President. And why have the major parties given Americans only two chances to even consider a woman for either office?"

No, Mrs. Palin you've got it all wrong. Political parties don't "give" a person the chance to run for office. The potential candidate must network, organize, and fund-raise like the dickens. And once they get elected, they don't resign halfway through their term of office.

Palin also presents herself as an advocate of a slimmed down government. But when she speaks to a female audience, her message strikes a different note.

Regarding Title IX, the federal policy that imposes rigid gender quotas on college athletics, Palin has repeatedly come out in favor of this male-disadvantaging hold-over from the Clinton Administration.

Palin has called for more childcare services, presumably at taxpayer expense, as well as "reforms in labor laws that allow greater flexibility in the workplace." Of course this would mean more regulations from the Department of Labor.

But most eyeball-rolling is this Palinism: "The working women of this country, those who work inside the home and outside of the home, they're overlooked by politicians in Washington."

Women overlooked? PULLEEEEAAASE.

From the Sheppard-Townsend Act of 1921 that established a national network of maternal-child health programs, to the Social Security Act for threadbare widows, Medicare and Medicare, Title IX, the Violence Against Women Act, Women's Educational Equity Act of 2001, five separate offices of women's health at the Department of Health and Human Services – the list goes on.

Sarah Palin's back-door connections to the radical National Organization for Women are also well-known. On several occasions, leaders of N.O.W. chapters have made public appearances with Palin. And one credible report suggests Palin supporters may have swung the outcome for the closely fought N.O.W. presidency in 2009:

http://www.salon.com/life/broadsheet/feature/2009/06/22/terry_oneill

Not surprisingly, a growing chorus of commentators is taking issue with Palin's ambitions to inherit the iconic mantle of Ronald Reagan.

Commentator Charles Krauthammer views Palin as "rather weak," and former White House adviser Karl Rove doubts she has the "gravitas" for the "most demanding job in the world,"

Writer Peggy Noonan derides Palin as a "nincompoop." And former Palin aide Nicolle Wallace let it be known her former boss "has very obvious deficiencies that will reveal themselves as the nominating contest gets closer."

But true to form, Sarah "Barracuda" Palin turns it around, accusing her critics of sexism.

I never thought it was fair that a person with an honest difference of opinion with Sarah Palin could be reflexively accused of gender bias. But this is how the political discourse operates these days.

FEMBOT BINGO!

February 16, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

As we start the countdown in earnest toward the March 1st launch of A Voice for Men Radio, it is time to announce some of the regular features of the show.
Today we start by introducing future listeners to an old favorite with a new twist, BINGO. Fembot Bingo to be more precise. (Credit to Duncan Idaho, Eternal Bachelor Blog)
Here's the deal. Most all of us are more than aware of the typical, lackluster critiques of MRA's by feminists, manginas and white knights. We've seen them for years redundantly making statements like "You can't get laid," or "You're just bitter." They do this so often, and to the exclusion of substance, that they give the impression they all have presidential teleprompters and a pull cord in the back of their necks.
There's no reason to think any of them will come up with anything new or more creative. In fact, we can openly predict what those foolish enough to call in to the show will have to say. Since we know what's coming, let's make the best of it.
That's where Fembot Bingo comes in.
By simply clicking through the image below you will be taken to a full size version of your very own Fembot Bingo card. Print it and put it up on the wall or other convenient place wherever you intend to be while listening to A Voice for Men Radio. Listen closely to the feminists, manginas and white knights that call in (as painful as it may be) and when they inevitably pull out those tired old insults, just mark it off on your card with the date and time.
When your card is full, and you are the first correct participant to notify me by email, you will be declared the winner, subject to verification.
Sorry, no money will be given out, but the winner of Fembot Bingo will be the lucky recipient of a new dart board and a set of very, very inexpensive flights, shipped to you by the cheapest means possible anywhere in the world.
But it is not just any dart board. It will bear the image of a very well known feminist icon. Contest rules prevent me from disclosing who she is in advance, but I will give you a hint and tell you her name rhymes with:

Jessica Valenti

So print that Fembot Bingo Card out today and come back here often for further announcements. We are just getting started.

OMG – Our Gender Is Being Oppressed By Language

February 17, 2011 | by Michael Reed | Link | Original Link

“A man and his young son were apprehended in a robbery. The father was shot during the struggle and the son, in handcuffs was rushed to the police station. As the police pulled the struggling boy into the station, the mayor, who had been called to the scene, looked up and said “My God, it’s my son!” ” — From Foundations Of Psychology (1989) 2nd Edition quoting from a Study by Eakins and Eakins (1978).

I’m sure that we’ve all seen riddles like the one above. The task for the reader is to guess what the relationship is between the robber and the mayor. It has already been established that robber and his son are male. So, who is the mayor? The answer is that the mayor is the boy’s mother. You’re supposed to stumble because when most people think of a mayor, they think of a man in that role. Most mayors in films are men, for example. You remember, they always refuse to accept the inevitable until it’s too late in disaster films.

Here’s an example from a “Sherlock Holmes” quiz on the Internet
[http://www.sherlock-holmes.co.uk/quiz.html]

“A father and son were involved in a car accident and both were taken to hospital. The father died immediately on arrival, but the son survived, so he was taken to the operating theatre for an emergency operation. The surgeon said: “I can’t operate on this boy because he’s my son”. ”

If you didn’t guess the first one, you’ll probably get the second one: the surgeon is a woman. In the UK, the majority of new doctors are women, but some specialisms such as surgery continue to attract more men.

Seem like conclusive evidence that women are being oppressed by language? Try this one paragraph story that I wrote:

“Police in Cambridge apprehended a notorious and prolific local burglar today. The arrest was the end product of a nearly year-long investigation. However, the operation has drawn a great deal of interest from both the press and the general public as it was carried out by the burglar’s son. When questioned, the police officer remarked, “It was my duty to carry out the investigation. It might seem strange to other people, but this was a person who once stole from my own father. My family will be resting easier from now on.””

Most people are stumped by this one. As with the other stories, a common guess is that two homosexual men have, through adoption, both become the father of a single male individual. When I specify that the men in the story are not homosexual, the next guess is often that the story contains a mistake. If you haven’t come up with the answer by now, you’ll kick yourself when I give you the solution: the burglar is a woman.

The way that all of these stories work is that they rely on cultural assumptions about gender roles. Other tests work on a similar principle. For example, a study was carried out in which young children were asked to draw a picture of people in various positive career roles such as surgeon or a police officer, and in the majority of cases, the children drew pictures of men.

However, studies like this are dishonest. Naturally, the kids were not asked to draw a picture of a positive, female-dominated role such as a social worker or a teacher or a negative role, such as a criminal.
Things could have gone very differently. I've no doubt that if they were asked to draw a picture of a car thief, nearly all of the kids would have drawn a man. However, many of the kids would have lived in areas in which a lot of the crime is carried out by ethnic minorities. It's not a racist assumption, the tragedy is that seventy percent of prisoners in the United States are non-white. My guess is that as the children began to reach for the brown crayon, the (probably left-wing and white) teachers and researchers would decide that it was time for an early recess.
Many of the children would think of men in some, but not all, aspirational career roles, and that's OK because it's all the proof that feminist researchers need that women are being oppressed. The kids would tend to think of a criminal as man, and that's OK too. Their first guess is that a criminal would be non-white? That's politically unpalatable.
Going back to the textual conundrums, they rely on a formula, and I'll show you how to concoct a story that proves that "men are being oppressed."
Create the following three characters:
Character A
A male or female. It helps things along if his or her role is one that is normally associated with people of that gender.
Character B
A person of the opposite gender to character A. This person should be cast in a role that is less commonly associated with people of his or her gender.
Character C
A person who has a relationship with characters A and B that would be defined by their gender, for example, their son.
Having created the characters, now utilise them in a one or two paragraph narrative:
• Avoid using pronouns that refer to character B. This is to avoid giving away the gender of that character. However, the sex of character A must be specified.
• End the story with character B making a reference to his or her relationship with character C without mentioning the reciprocal relationship.
Voila! Instant proof that gender A/B is being oppressed by language. Here's another one:
"Walking home one evening, a young nurse was attacked by a gang of youths. Fortunately, two police officers happened to be passing, and their sudden appearance frightened off the attackers. Following proper procedure, the policemen took the nurse back to the police station so that they could take a statement.
The policemen were sympathetic because they were aware of traumatic effects often experienced by victims of violent crime. Upon starting to recover, the nurse suddenly remarked, “My son! I must go home to look after my young son. He will be wondering where I am.”. The police officer was quick to remark, “Don’t worry, we have informed the child’s mother, and she has returned from work and is with him now.””

The answer to that one is that the nurse is a man. The story plays on a societal myth that is reinforced by television drama: that women are the most common victims of violent crime. In fact, I was careful to include the word victim. Actually, in the UK, men are victims of 77% of all violent crime committed by a stranger. The idea that the nurse is female is further reinforced by casting him in a paternal role.
It’s a shame that feminists have hijacked methods such as this, because they are a useful approach for exploring cultural assumptions about things like race, gender and social class. However, certain groups would rather self-nominate themselves as a victim-class than apply a technique broadly and inclusively.

This video was produced in one of the Indian dialects, and though it is several minutes long the story is so familiar that no translations will be required.
Of the many encouraging things about the video are the great, well told story and high production values.
This kind or work filtering out into the MSM will help many more people understand the realities and illusions of domestic violence.

A Message from S.A.V.E.

The Domestic Violence Industry: Our Nation's Newest Welfare System

Over the past 15 years the domestic violence industry has transformed itself into a back-door welfare system marked by loose definitions, non-existent eligibility criteria, open-ended benefits, and dysfunctional policies.

As a result, the true victims of domestic violence are being shortchanged and their lives endangered.

Loose Definitions

These days almost anything counts as "domestic violence." According to the DoJ Office of Violence Against Women, domestic violence now includes:

"a pattern of abusive behavior in any relationship that is used by one partner to gain or maintain power and control over another intimate partner."

When you define domestic violence so vaguely and broadly, nearly everyone becomes a victim.

Non-Existent Eligibility Criteria

Abuse shelters openly advertise that "no proof of abuse is needed."

No surprise, our shelters are now filled with homeless and drug-abusing women — while real victims are turned away at the doorstep.

False Allegations Widespread

Once you are classified as an abuse "victim," a wide range of welfare entitlements become available, including free legal help, subsidized housing, and preference in family courts. Immigrants move to the front of the line for a Green Card and U.S. citizenship.

And false allegations become commonplace.

Dysfunctional Policies

Each year the Violence Against Women Act spends $56 million for mandatory arrest and prosecution programs. Such policies place victims' lives at risk.

According to a Harvard University study,

"in states with mandatory arrest laws, the homicides are about 50% higher today than they are in states without the laws."

Untruthful

The federal government spends $1 billion a year on domestic violence programs. Taxpayers would complain if they knew this money was going for a de facto welfare system that places victims' lives at risk.

So the domestic violence industry resorts to a series of half-truths and urban legends. According to a recent report, only one in 10 abuse education programs provides information that is accurate and truthful.[1]

Historic Opportunity

The 2011 reauthorization of the Violence Against Women Act offers a historic opportunity to turn things around and give first priority to true victims.

The VAWA reauthorization needs to tighten up definitions, require proof of violence (or credible evidence of impending violence), assure services go to those in greatest need, stop mandatory arrest and prosecution policies, and require accreditation of abuse training and education programs.[2]

Show Testers Needed

February 18, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Well troops, it is 12 days until the debut broadcast of A Voice for Men Radio. 95% percent of the first episodes sound files are in Keyster's capable hands and we are counting down to what we hope will be the grand lift off of a new era in the men's movement.
And once again, we must count on you for some assistance. We are going to do a couple of test runs for the show during next week, and we need a small handful of volunteers to help us by doing live test calls to the show. We want to make sure sound quality and production routines are in place before we do the real thing.
There are no days set as of this moment, but they will almost certainly be week days, in the evening, US time. We would like participants from the US, Canada, across Europe and Down Under (including NZ) if possible.
To participate you will need the following.

1. Be registered with BlogTalkRadio.com, and a follower of A Voice for Men Radio.
2. A Landline phone and Skype account for US residents.
3. A Skype account for all non US residents (unless you want to make an international call and be put on hold)
4. An absolute commitment to following through, ON TIME.

Please send me an email to avoiceformen@yahoo.com if you are willing to be a part of the process.
I'd say we need about six people to do it right.
Thanks in advance for pitching in one more time. – PE

A Voyeur's Guide to Romance Novels and Romance News

I'd like to confirm whether what I am seeing in Rorschach reality is real, or whether I am suffering from a romance-o-graphic delusion of female porn. We all know the evils of pornography, objectifying the fem-sale body, copulating an attitude towards "wholly mother whatever", yada, yada. We all know it leads to imposing fetish equestrian sex and the evils of chocolate and peanut butter for women allergic to peanuts and addicted to chocolate. Fair enough, I gave up equestrian sex when I realized she couldn't jump the footboard and there's no way I could tolerate the loss of points when she bungles the headboard. So I hung up my spurs, soaped my saddle and put it into storage. After all, with advances in technology and genetics, why can't I get a car with tits? Why do they keep teasing me with the promise? I mean really, what do I need her for? I have a conscience, and it likes me.

Why do I need nagging guilt in stereo?

Remember when tabloid news was only available at the grocery store checkout, two headed chickens, alien sex and the love forlorn movie stars screwing and suing? For those that never caught on, it was a handy way of promoting a career that really wasn't news worthy. Gee, I wonder if it was all just staged for self-promotion? It also gave a little something to titillate the bored housewives that were more interested in the equality of arousal. Jerry Springer came along and taught us all the value of, well nothing really, just more titillation. I always figured it was the female version of WWF. Categorized by emotional weight class, confused and insensitive welterweights, passive aggressive lightweights, obnoxious; self-serving middle weights, abusive and narcissistic heavyweights. You know, then you go on to the men's division, folding chairs and cages. Apparently some people took this crap seriously and next thing you know bookstands are flooded with shake and bake reality and fashion sensitive victim-ology. I just wish they could make up my mind. Do I read self-help books or take self-help drugs? No psycho-pharma-therapist worth an ounce of confusion would ever recommend both; it's to bloody dangerous. Besides, you can't get in touch with the real you while you're out of touch on prescription drugs. That's like getting aroused for not being aroused, which, by the way, does happen later in life through simple biology – and it's free.

Now we have all the news that's fit to arouse and we square off into special interest groups that are better described by the twisted fetishes they are. Post-menopausal bureaucrats empowering pre-menstrual post modernists against patriarchal Episcopalians to establish a bold new defrock-racy.

Go ahead, read it again. It's not as funny as you think.

This stuff doesn't come cheap. Remember your tax arrears? While following the arousal story surrounding Julian Assange, I couldn't help but laugh while listening to Naomi Wolfe and Jaclyn Friedman describe the lurid details, like they were reading from the romance novel "The Claiming of Sleeping Beauty". I think we need to change zero tolerance to zero arousal, and I'm referring to mine.

Friedman went on to explain that sex without enthusiasm from both (or all) must be rape and no one can be enthusiastic about aggressive sex. Of course Naomi Wolfe suggested such a model may criminalise a large part of the population. She's right, I don't want to be arrested for being aggressively unenthusiastic, but I think I need documentation just to be safe. Anyone got a coitus contract?
To objectify or not to objectify, that is the accusation. Again, male porn may well objectify the female form, but so does male biology; a curve of the hip, a tone of skin, foundation lines sensually following the curve of the jaw, the scent of bottled yesterdays.
Makes you want to rip off that cosmetic mask, hose her down with pine sol and procreate, doesn't it?
It's a chicken and egg thing. Which came first the cosmetics or the porn? I'll have to ask Cleopatra about that one. There is, however, another form of objectification media that to my knowledge really isn't appreciated for it's true value or recognized as the very special porn that it represents.
Romance Novels.
When you stop and think about it this is the kind of stuff that goes beyond objectifying an individual. This stuff objectifies reality entirely. Male porn for the most part is pretty boring; scrump 'em and hump 'em with close ups and a money shot or six. Let's face it foreplay in male porn is really four playing. But romance novels? Now that's arousal! Long, tingly, sweaty heat, building with every flip of the page. C'mon, this stuff is the original "Dungeons and Dildo's," I mean Dragons, of sexual game play.
Somewhat of a startling addendum to this coitus cooing is a team researching Harlequin Romance novels. They determined that sales may be driven by a repetitious theme of sexual assault. They went on to ask if these themes may be influencing women's perception of sexual assault. One term I found entertaining was "Romance Novels, a manual to live by." Here's a little quote from a woman that was introduced to romance porn as a preteen reading from her grandmother's side table.
"Everyone in a Harlequin novel is successful and beautiful. The men have chiselled bodies and strong faces. The women have lush hair and lips sitting atop their toned, yet curvy physiques. It is an amazing world of perfection to delve into for a reality break. This is appealing, certainly. Harlequin has made a name for itself and has established a worldwide following for generations. The decadence, the lust, the love, the fantasy it's all right there between the …covers."
Now do you think this just might explain the difference between Mr. Right and Mr. Right Now? Aren't we all just holding out for the perfect airbrushed partner to take us away to orgasm land, where those who come never leave? Knudge, knudge, wink, wink, say no more. After all anything less would be settling wouldn't it? Curious to me when settling or not, how do you fulfill that dream in your mind without objectifying your own self-worth and yourself?
Everything in life that follows is a monetized process to acquire the objects on your list. Your heart holds the inventory, your mind sets the price and the checkout is between your legs. This to me explains why so very few woman lust for a man, but rather lust for the architecture of romance and their own pleasures. It is the titillation of self-perception and self-worth. Transactional love becomes the contract of intimacy and the jinx of fulfillment. These are women who truly have nothing to offer a man. They perceive men as an expense against the acquisition of material icons that represent the very architecture of their objectified romance. They are walking pathologies thirsting for blood to sacrifice at the altar of their self-worth. It is pornographic in nature and more so in execution.

In my mind the point behind not objectifying someone or anyone is to engage them in a process that is mutually shared and experienced. We are ever striving toward a cognition of equality to support a wilful co-operation in circumnavigating events that would otherwise oppose the outcome of a similar or shared determination.

It is the case in an artificial construct that is represented by our societies and cultures that we become the elements of our own supportive ecosphere. By achieving equal participation, a synchronicity of experience is achieved that we refer to as intimacy. The cognitive definition and exchange of experiential information and insight self-actualises an ever changing definition of self-worth, or not.

There is a thousand ways to express this and 999 of them may be more insightful than the way I have chosen. Objectifying a woman's body is a common attack mounted against men and their expression of sexuality. Unfortunately objectification is not gender specific. My personal opinion is that it is closely linked to how we experience self-worth. Self-worth is a guarded tabernacle in our psyche and much of our time is dedicated to ritual offerings on that altar.

Much conjecture has surrounded the question as to why men have been silent during the processes that have reshaped our culture and our consciousness over the last fifty years. I would suggest that in fact men have been silent for many hundreds of years, languishing in a crucible of subjective and romanticized servitude, objectified by a collective dream, and a hollow promise. Many have awakened in a dry desert of hope and they thirst. Look to the horizon brothers, it is there where we must go.

We have effectively reduced ourselves to the mundane expression of grandiose ideologies that disembody the reference to our own experience of existence. Exchanging a political premise to police the unqualified and redirect their attentions to an undefined destination. We are deemed to be no longer worthy to share in the determination of direction, the distinction of the destination or the duration of the distance and yet we plod on…….With our porn, fully aroused and reaching for more.

I've tried to avoid citations here I thought they might contribute to an anti-climax, if you know what I mean. Truth is this topic is still festering in feminist foreplay, (say no more) and they are loath to address it until it is appropriately propagandized. But if it's raw entertainment you're after, or the blush of bawdy babes, just Google Harlequin Romance Novels and their effect on Sexual Assault and Rape. Don't forget to use some Kleenex …you know, for the tears. (say no more!)

Attorney General Holder Loses His Grip on the Truth

February 21, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

They call this the Information Age. And it is easy to see why, even as you read the lines of this article, each one translated from simple binary code and stored for planet wide access in a microsecond.

But as we can see from the info wars being waged on everything from 9/11 to global warming, we are really living the in the Disinformation Age.

One of the more recent episodes of this digital deceit is emanating from the office of Attorney General of the United States, Eric Holder. The AG, to put it succinctly, is lying to the American people. What's more, he quite obviously knows he's lying and has no intention whatsoever of stopping. Either that or the man is too incompetent to clean the office of the Attorney General, much less occupy it.

The case demonstrating this is simple and irrefutable, beginning with words from Holder himself.

"The facts are clear," he says, "Intimate partner homicide is the leading cause of death for African-American women ages 15 to 45."

To begin with, we must assume that a man in Holder's position would not make such a claim out of ignorance. Common sense, along with the certitude of his unambiguous claim would indicate that he has, at his beck and call, a wealth of cutting edge research and all the manpower needed to analyze it.

But the truth is that what Holder is claiming and the facts are not even on the same planet, much less are they worthy of being uttered in the same sentence.

As Christina Hoff Sommers penned in a recent article in USA Today:

According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention and the Justice Department's own Bureau of Justice Statistics, the leading causes of death for African-American women between the ages 15–45 are cancer, heart disease, unintentional injuries such as car accidents, and HIV disease. Homicide comes in fifth — and includes murders by strangers. In 2006 (the latest year for which full statistics are available), several hundred African-American women died from intimate partner homicide — each one a tragedy and an outrage, but far fewer than the approximately 6,800 women who died of the other leading causes.

A review of CDC and DoJ information confirms Sommer's assertions, proving that not only is Holder passing seriously distorted information, but also that he is completely out of sync with the very Justice Department he heads.

This might give some people the idea that Holder is just out of the loop on facts; that with the best of intentions he has misrepresented factors that negatively impact the lives of African American women.

If so, where was his correction after the Sommers meticulously sourced article, and why is the bad information still being presented on a government website at taxpayer expense? That is because it isn't just bad information. It's lies. And he will continue to tell them as long as he can get away with it.

It appears he is pretty secure in the fact that that day will never come, which also might explain why the single statement from Holder is only a fraction of the deceptions he us using the Justice Department to manufacture and pawn off on the American people.
What you can also find on the Justice Departments website is a study so biased that it borders on fraudulent, Practical Implications of Current Domestic Violence Research by Andrew R. Klein. It is a study that clearly downplays the incidence of intimate partner violence against men, contains disinformation on domestic violence that is on par with Holder's egregiously flawed public statements, and, please remember this one, openly advocates for mandatory arrest policies**.
The organization Stop Abusive and Violent Environments (S.A.V.E.), a victim advocacy group promoting the dissemination of scientifically valid information on domestic violence, sent a 10 page letter last year to the Department of Justice asking them to remove that report until its conclusions could be checked and verified by objective third parties.
They never answered the letter and the report remains.
I called the DoJ recently myself to inquire about Holder's assertions, asking to speak with someone who could clarify his remarks. I was placed on hold for several minutes and then told that there was no one there to speak with me. I was then invited to email them my questions and told that someone would get back with me.
Given their response to S.A.V.E., I decided not to waste any more time. As a follow up, though, I am sending a link to this article to the DoJ, with another invitation for Attorney General Holder to justify and explain his comments (along with the biased studies) to the American people.
I won't be holding my breath for an answer.
That does not mean an answer should not be forthcoming. The implications of this matter go far beyond political lies and posturing, and into the safety and well- being of the American people.
First, when the government misidentifies something as important as a leading cause of death, what becomes of our attentions and resources to the things that are actually killing people? The danger here, of course, is that by telling African American women that the leading cause of their death is IPV, we are minimizing and helping them ignore the things that really are killing them.
In short, would African American women be better off concerned with cancer prevention or the prevention of domestic altercations?
Both are problems, but which one will likely be the one to take their lives?
Yes, it is cancer, and lying to them about it is not going to do anything but make things worse.
While the politics behind this are clearly feminist, Holder played the race card so I am going to follow his line of "logic" to its natural outcome.
If the number one cause of death to African American women is domestic violence, then just who is the number one cause of those deaths?
Yep, outside interracial relationships, that would be African American men. African American men are the number one cause of death to African American women. It's those black guys, get it? And we need mandatory arrest policies to make sure that any time someone points the finger at one of them, we can lock them up.

David Duke would be proud.
In that light, what Attorney General Holder has done here is the equivalent of Susan Smith telling the world that her children, whom she drowned to get them out of the way of a relationship, were abducted and murdered by black men.
It's the suit and tie, government level version of To Kill a Mockingbird, only with the dystopian kicker of pushing government policies that will mandate the arrest of as many black men as possible, as though the war on drugs doesn't provide ample enough opportunity and excuse for that.
Holder happens to be black, which likely the only reason he can get a pass from the press on demonizing half of the black community.
Also, it can't be overlooked that the political ideology he is catering to with this deceitful rhetoric is one that is largely maintained by white, upper middle class women.
Gender feminism as we know it was not a movement furthered by the disenfranchised and the poor or those in minority groups, but rather was birthed in poolside cocktail meetings by white, married, privileged American women with their bob bon fattened backsides planted firmly in lounge chairs.
That is who your Attorney General is speaking for because they have grown into quite a voting block.
So it is no stretch to conclude the obvious. Attorney General of the United States Eric Holder is just a run of the mill Uncle Tom in a not so run of the mill position.
Unfortunately it is a position that affords him the power to undermine the lives of the very people he is supposed to represent. And he clearly means to do just that.
It will take a groundswell of outrage from the grass roots to stop him. After all, who else is going to do it, our illustrious Uncle-Tom-in-Chief?

I've heard apologists for feminism describe feminism as a social movement dedicated to the promotion of equal rights between men and women. You have probably heard this too, and if you weren't paying close attention, you might have believed it. If you are unfamiliar or unimpressed by men's movement literature, you might regard statements opposing mainstream feminist thought as reactionary, anti-woman patriarchal atavism. In that is you opinion, you are in the majority.
The tenets of the feminist movement are, for the most part, accepted by most people living in the western world. Feminist ideology now holds a majority share of public perception of reality. Feminism informs the policies and decisions made in our law courts, it controls the climate of the workplace, it rules with absolute fiat in our family courts. It also informs the difference in the way police treat male and female citizens. If a man is assaulted by his female spouse – and calls the police, he will be arrested. If a man is assaulted by his female spouse and attempts to defend himself- without doing any violence to his attacker, he will be arrested.
The assumption informing this bizarre outcome is that he must have committed some offense against his assailant, thus justifying her attack on him, and his subsequent arrest. One problem with this is that even granting the assumption of prior offense by the male victim of an assault in such a case, western law does not operate on an eye for an eye dictum. Prior insult or injury is not legal justification for personal violence. A man who assaulted another man because in the past, he was assaulted by that man would find no sympathy at all from either the police, or the courts.
When a parallel situation involves a woman committing violence against a man, not only is she excused based on her being a victim of whom she is assaulting, her victimization is assumed by the police and courts regardless of whether any such prior event occurred, and with no inquiry. A narrative of victimization and justification is fabricated to support the ideology that women are good, and men are bad. Men are assumed to be aggressors and villains, and women are characterized as poor, cartoonish victims, regardless the actual behavior of either party.
Do gender feminists recognize that in promoting this social pattern, they are casting members of their own sex as perpetual children? An ostensibly adult woman for whom violence is excused, based on a real or imagined prior injustice is not really an adult.
How far does this fantasy go? Apparently, a long way – as the female centrism dominating so much of modern life is incongruent with a concept of personal accountability for women in any dealings with men.
This pattern works for the reality divorced, which is to say that it works for the culture at large. The monopoly on force held by the government inflicts a standardized pro-female outcome – ignoring the perverse marginalization of men necessary to maintain the gender feminist narrative. That's the narrative that claims women have always been oppressed, and men, through some sinister conspiracy are the ones oppressing them. Debunking this fantasy is beyond the scope of this article, and would in any case be redundant. The question which does bear consideration is – what is the logical outcome of continued normalization of a fantasy which equates masculinity as crime, and femininity as innate superiority, while also needing steeply tilted playing field encompassing continued affirmative action, public funding of historical revision, thought police, differential treatment by law enforcement and so on.

Do gender feminists really want their fathers, brothers, sons and husbands to be caged, hobbled, and enslaved as bipedal beasts of burden? How long can the illusion be maintained that men laboring as legislated non-persons in a tiered society are in fact the sinister oppressors of that society?

Alternately, are we all now ready to adopt a public ethic that the real or imagined crimes made by members of some antiquarian historical patriarchy should be revenged on half our population, based on their sex?

Are we to systematize hereditary imaginary guilt?

No. Even assuming actual guilt by past generations, culpability is non transferable. This is a basic foundation of ethics, both legal and moral, at least as I understand it.

Do Gender feminists want to enslave and scourge half the population based on their sex? It sometimes seems like it, when you listen to gender feminists. But I really don't know the answer to that. What I do know is that a small segment of the male population are no longer willing to play this game according to the established rules. I count myself as a part of this small group.

What should be interesting to an alert observer is that the traditional concepts of reward and punishment that have, for thousands of years been used with great success to curb self actualization in males who would chafe in the class bondage of traditional society are increasingly ineffective as a means of social control today.

Paul Elam some time ago wrote an article in which he coined the term "Zeta male". This is not an alpha male, and it's not a beta male, and it isn't anything which fits into the traditional social hierarchy. It is, in my own shaky grasp of the concept a wholly self determined and self defined man. Elam is one, I am one.

I am proud to be.

Detractors of masculinity, of the men's rights movement, and apologists for gender feminists will be quick to define men forging this new role as losers, malcontents, failures – and so on. Some of the pejorative will sting, because "malcontent" is true, but it's incomplete, and patently misleading. There is more to this than just some sour grapes redefinition of failure as success, and there is a fundamental difference between simply being an entitled malcontent, and the experience of anger at institutionalized and organized discrimination.

Out of that anger, many men's rights advocates are redefining masculinity and success using a yardstick in defiance of the definitions gender feminists use to exert control. Before the full catalog of shaming language can be unlimbered and brought to bear, let me mention a few things about my own motivation and aspiration. I will never be married. Is this because I'm a loser who can't "get a woman?"

I get that in my YouTube channel email with regularity. I have a pretty good career doing something I enjoy and which challenges me. I happen to own the company I work for. We're making a profit and expanding. In spite of this apparent material success, I am an invisible man, and I mean to remain one, at least to the forces that threaten me based on my identity as a man.
That does not mean that we in the men's rights movement hate you feminists. We certainly don't hate you as women. We don't even hate the male apologists for female supremacy who foolishly seek to ingratiate themselves with women through some form of public self flagellation and self loathing. We are simply finished with being vilified, criminalized, marginalized and stripped of our earnings, our homes and our children. The Zeta male is inventing a new path, and we are leaving you behind. You are, of course, welcome to join us, because as I said, we don't hate you; but we won't be following the rules as you understand them anymore.

If Momma Ain't Happy…

February 21, 2011 | by Izzey | Link | Original Link

When I first read Paul Elam, he was writing on a site that I had also frequented, and after reading some of his posts, I asked my computer (out loud) “Holy shit…who is this guy?” I loved the bite to his bark, and continued to read whenever I saw him post, because what he had to say was very important.
Then one day, he put up a piece that opened with the coined phrase…”If momma ain’t happy, nobody’s happy” It was a hell of a read, and the coined phrase inspired me to write the following reply. I now call him my friend, and have been a fan of his dedicated work ever since.
I wanted to post this here because what comes after the original piece is an update of this family’s life, to which I have recently been made privy.
If momma ain’t happy…
The house looked like something out of the movie “Psycho,” with the exception of numerous toys and bicycles out front. Plants were in need of pruning, leaves all around, and grass, desperate for the attention of a lawnmower. You could tell in passing a large family lived there. Or at the very least, multiples. It was a family I grew up with.
If momma ain’t happy, nobody’s happy.
Thirteen children lived in this house. It would forever puzzle me how a woman could give birth to thirteen children, with the reverence this woman felt towards them. There was much love on the surface but discipline was a way of life there. Things were done in a military-like fashion. There were many jokes made about them over the years and to this day in remembering the days of my childhood I always think of this family on my block. Recalling …
If momma ain’t happy, nobody’s happy.
There would be days, all of them were outside. Bitter winter days for which you or I would opt to stay inside with a cup of hot chocolate by the fire. At the time, (we were kids) we would laugh and make fun, not knowing ’til later what was behind it.
If momma ain’t happy, nobody’s happy.
Their father was always working. Momma was almost always in charge of the brood with poppa being home only on Sundays. He was a very soft spoken man; appearance immaculate and starched, always in a white shirt and tie. He worked full time for a newspaper; part time somewhere else. He reminded me of William Powell in the “Thin Man” series; a sense of humor, a cigarette, a cocktail. I always saw him smiling, newspaper in hand, almost every day returning from work. However…
If momma ain’t happy, nobody’s happy.
Upon occasion, I would go over to this house and play. There were three children in my age group, as their mother was pregnant every ten months or so. As it happens, I liked those three the best. I had dinner in this house as well. The kitchen seating area of this very large old house that had three floors and a fully renovated basement, consisted of two full length picnic tables pushed together to make one very long table. Dinners were always spent together no-matter-what, and were generally prepared by momma and the older children. And as always …

If momma ain't happy, nobody's happy.
The preparation of dinner, which required the amount of food you or I would see at our families house for Thanksgiving, was at least a two to three hour ordeal everyday. Everyone would have a task. I was a guest and wasn't allowed to help out. They were usually a 'well oiled machine', everyone knowing their job, and doing it without complaint. I was in awe of it all. Except …
If momma ain't happy, nobody's happy.
Talking about school subjects was always encouraged, but not mandatory. Sometimes there would be jokes, almost always, some arguments of the 'goings on' in the house in "who did what to whom" forum. I liked being over there, and felt like I was in some sort of an amusement park at times. You were expected to clean your plate. Nothing left, not a trace, almost not worthy of being washed, those plates were. Again ….
If momma ain't happy, nobody's happy
I would leave there feeling good; not wanting to go home. I thought this was the ultimate fun family. Everyone working together as a unit. The facade, happy and close-knit. I wished at one time that this was my family. I would be happy as a pig in mud if I lived there. I had no idea; the wrath of …
If momma ain't happy, nobody's happy.
What went on behind closed doors could be heard in the summertime because all of the windows in the house would be open. The stuff you didn't hear would be visible on at least one, but more-often-than-not, several, of the children the next day. But I never fully comprehended the violence in this family until I was almost a teenager.
Momma was an alcoholic, poppa too, but he was usually very happy when 'medicated'. Nothing ended happily here, nothing.
UPDATE
I wrote this almost three years ago, and knew of the fates of only a few of the children from hearsay. I ran into one of them in a public place, just two days ago. I knew her face immediately, because the entire family looked like someone took an identical rubber stamp to all of their faces. You could always spot one of the "Smith's" (I'll call them) in a crowd. She told me everything and I followed it all. I could still fire off their names in rapid succession, because it was a game we used to play when we were young. It was the ultimate 'trivia' challenge of our time …name all of the 'Smith's' by order of birth; as fast as you can.
There were eleven girls and two boys, but fifteen pregnancies in all. A set of twins did not make it to term, and another child was stillborn. The first son was the sixth child born, and is a couple of years older than myself. The second son was the twelfth child of the thirteen total.
The oldest girl is sixty now, and was the first one to run for her life out of that house. She moved far away, got herself an education, and is now a successful businesswoman.
The second (I knew of this) died of AIDS.
The third is currently very sick, HIV positive, and still uses drugs.

The fourth girl popped out a bunch of kids, and had them all taken away from her.
The fifth girl is in jail.
The seventh girl has not been heard from in years, and they suspect she has died.
The eighth girl, (the one I ran into) is struggling with health problems, but has been clean and sober for many years, never married, nor had any children.
The ninth girl has been arrested for violent crimes several times. She had two children that lived with their father until they graduated school, and went on to have careers of their own.
The tenth, eleventh, and thirteenth girls all have chlldren, and are also alcoholics.
Did you notice that I left out the two boys?
Both are in mental institutions. Both of them. (This pisses me off, and also makes me very sad) Poppa died a couple of years ago. He died a sober man. He had checked himself into a detox over two decades ago and never looked back.
Momma — The woman that beat the shit out of every single one of these kids, (and now I know from the daughter that I ran into, poppa, as well) now resides in a comfy condo in Florida, thanks to the life insurance poppa paid no-matter-what….and the sale of the big fucking house he bought, and God knows what else….to live out the rest of her days.
Only one child speaks to her, and she has never met any of her grandchildren.

The Scourge of Rape. Yeah, whatever.

February 22, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

I want to have a T-shirt made. “I Survived Rape Hysteria,” it will read. It will come with a special ribbon the color of bullshit that can be pinned on other clothing or put on the bulletin board at your local grocery store. Then I will pass them out to every man, woman and child in the western world.

We’ll have all sorts of fundraisers and political events so we can make more T-shirts and ribbons. We can start with a rape PSA marathon. You can ask donors to pledge a given amount of dollars for every hour you sit tied up in a chair, forced to watch an endless stream of public service announcements designed to spark your outrage at the oh so egregiously violated victims of rape. Perhaps they can pay by the tear, whether you’re crying over the victims or over their screeching and caterwauling.

We’ll make posters and bumper stickers of little baby feminists and caption them with “Rape Hysteria Begins with Her.” And we will appeal to the psychiatric establishment for a new diagnosis, Sexual Assault Whining Empathy Disorder, maybe give it a catchy acronym like SAWED and take that to the media and raise money for the victims of the pernicious and debilitating newfangled disorder.

And then we’ll take every biased, shamelessly politicized study and book on the subject of rape and have us a bonfire. We’ll gather round the flames and chant like Hare Krishna’s. We’ll do shots and howl at the moon; maybe watch a few careers go up in smoke while we are at it.

And then our day of liberation will come. We will turn, as one unified, thundering voice, to every over acting, histrionic, T-shirt slinging rape hysteria retailer and say, “Thanks for sharing, now shut the fuck up.”

“And by the way, take off that stupid T-shirt, you are not a survivor.”

And that is the fundamental problem here. We have taken rape, a serious crime among other serious crimes, and elevated the victims to such an exalted status that we have lost our sense of reason, and our priorities.

So let’s start restoring some sanity to this matter with a proclamation to all those survivors of rape.

If your rapist didn’t try to kill you, you didn’t survive anything, you only endured it.

And if your rapist did try to kill you what you survived was a murder attempt, not the rape. So please, get off (and take your advocates with you) your damsel in distress elevator to hell, and quit feeding off the bottomless hog trough of public sympathies.

You are not and never were the only people to be harmed by a crime. And what happened to you is not worth any more attention than things that happen to a lot of other people whom no one else gives a damn about.

When I was a young soldier I had the misfortune of being robbed and beaten while walking back to the barracks from an enlisted man’s club late at night with a friend of mine. Four men, all armed with some variation of a club, literally jumped out of the bushes and attacked us.

I suffered a couple of broken ribs, head to toe bruising and a couple of fairly respectable cuts. My friend was struck on the head with a wine bottle resulting in a severe concussion and 17 stitches in his scalp.
We were both stripped naked and left on the side of the road in 20 degree weather.
The Army Criminal Investigation Division (C.I.D.) questioned us like we were the criminals, caught exactly no one and went on to fail at other investigations in pretty short order.
The guys in the barracks turned it in to a joke and made fun of us for a month or so.
Shit happens.
Am I a survivor? Of what? No one tried to kill me, and before you start I won't even entertain any nonsense about "what could have happened."
What happened was I got beat up and robbed. And the next thing that happened was that I moved on with my life, having learned some lessons about dark streets and being without protection. Yes, I played a role in what happened to me, horrendous as that thinking may be to victim mongers and sympathy addicts.
I never expected to go on Oprah, though that was way before her time. There was no speshul victims unit with bad guy catchers that doubled as Dr. Phil, no telethons or Take Back the Night marches, no political speeches or outraged advocacy groups screaming "Never Again!" at the local media and then holding their hands out for some cash.
And there sure as hell weren't any T-shirts.
Nor were any necessary.
And to those of you seething about now, poised and ready to retort with cute little tidbits like "You're not a woman! You have no idea what it is like to live in constant fear every time you go out alone!" Please spare me. Society blew its chance to make me a perpetual victim when I was mugged.
I am sure if there were politicians that were out there pushing phony stats about how 1 in 4 young soldiers would be beaten and robbed; if the media was sending out doe-eyed reporters wanting to hear my speshul story; if advocacy groups had monetized my circumstances, slapped it on a T-shirt and "poor pitiful deared" me into the idea that the consequences of being robbed were somehow more egregious and damaging than what anyone else went through, and that it was a plague very likely to affect me, and all young soldiers, again, and again and again, then yeah, I might just have started pissing my pants instead of learning to take better care of myself.
Helplessness is the calling card of victimhood, and the bread and butter of those who exploit it. And the net result of all this in western culture is that being raped has become quite an industry.
You want some perspective on rape? God knows you likely need it. Consider the thoughts of Rhonda Cornum, a U.S. Army pilot and flight surgeon that was shot down and taken prisoner of war during the Gulf War. She was sexually assaulted by the enemy while in captivity.
"Since everything that happens to you as a prisoner of war is non-consensual, then the fact that one thing they did was non-consensual is not very relevant," she told the Washington Post. "So then you have to organize the bad things that can happen to you in some other hierarchy. My hierarchy was, is it going to make me stay here longer, is it life-threatening, is it disabling or is it excruciating. If it's none of those things, then it took on a fairly low level of significance."

A fairly low level of significance.

Now that was worth repeating, and right from the mouth of a survivor.

And Cornum was a survivor; not of rape but of being shot down and taken prisoner during a war, and of the war itself.

I say all this not without empathy for rape victims, most of which are men. I know that won't wash with some. But that is also part of the overall problem. We have not gone hysterical over rape in this country, just women who are raped, or who allege they have been raped, or who have fuzzy childhood memories that they are not quite sure of, or who have jealous boyfriends and want to cover their ass after banging five guys on the bathroom floor of a college dorm in New York.

And if we don't care about the struggles of men, we care even less about the struggles of convicts. But let's, just for shits and grins here, pretend that male inmates are human beings. Don't worry; it's only for a couple of minutes.

But assuming they are human and therefore warrant inclusion in our perceptions about issues like rape, then being a rape victim, when we strip away all the Dworkinesque hoopla, is pretty much male dominated territory.

The overwhelming majority of sexual assaults in this country happen to men who are incarcerated.

But they don't issue survivor T-shirts in prison. In fact, we have the entire system set up so that weaker men can be raped at will by stronger ones in the prison hierarchy; so that, in fact, those weaker men can become the chattel of the stronger ones. It's a regular part of prison life and we do exactly nothing about it because it's happening to men.

Feel free to add 'fake' to the list of adjectives used to describe society's largess where it concerns the victims of rape.

We live in a culture that enables and encourages the rape of men in prisons, indeed the position of "Well, that's what happens to your ass (pun intended) when you go to prison, deal with it," is the default.

But, of course, if a woman goes to a bar, gets shit faced with a stranger and goes to his hotel room only to have second thoughts that are expressed in the form of mid coitus screaming, or better yet, the next morning, we are loathe to say a word. Oh no, that would be blaming the victim. And we are not supposed to blame the victim. Ever. Well, the female ones, anyway.

It shows the sadly degraded nature of our social consciousness, and proves, as has happened in other quite similar situations, there is no such thing as a rape advocate, just women's advocates, continuing to do their best to scrape a few bucks out of whatever happens to women, or whatever they happen to bring upon themselves.

In The Shadows

February 23, 2011 | by J Galt | Link | Original Link

Recently an article was posted on our favourite site, AVfM, taken from the blog "A Shrink For Men" authored by Dr. Tara Palmatier, PsyD.. Paul had chosen to retitle it "Dr Phil Can Suck It". It was originally posted as "Dr Phil and Domestic Violence: Only Women Can Be Abuse Victims," by the good Dr. T. The material referred to was originally televised for entertainment with the caption "Afraid of My Husband." Dr. Palmatier provided an excellent article overall; it challenged the notions we have all come to roll our eyes over regarding men as the de facto "perpetrator." The attached video however really made me stop and think. So much so that I really had to get it down in this responding piece.
If ever there was a post hypnotic victim gulag, this would be the frontier.
I think it bears mentioning once again that the grand and prestigious "Dr Phil" is an entertainer and nothing more. I see no accreditation attached to his institution of entertainment suggesting any higher learning than juggling, fire breathing or "songs to salve the soul," of which the latter, no doubt, he and his acomp, acompnee, accompanist Oprah, specialize in. I have a long time disdain for shake and bake psychology and popularized problem solving. Just because the "mob" in the Coliseum gave thumbs up, does not put a problem to rest.
In the case of the above mentioned video, what struck a chord with me was a statement made by the 12 year old son: "My mom talks to me about why they fight." It was this statement I found once again haunting me. I have heard and seen this all too many times in my life. I'm not a councillor or psychologist, just an experienced parent. I have seen the damage this kind of behaviour promotes in a family as it morphs into an unqualified and unchallenged perception. Narrating the context of an intimate relationship to a child of that relationship can only result in emotional and psychological damage.
The damage it does may never stand to be corrected.
To consider the language and insight that a 12 year old possesses should almost make it self-explanatory. They cannot navigate the depth or complexity of relational bonds or the implications of choices that may result from the perspective that they are being given. In simple terms they don't speak the language, they don't understand the adult experience of disappointment, betrayal, sorrow, worry, fear, love, sadness, infatuation, joy.
Often a child can be set right emotionally with a hug and loving words of reassurance. They cannot understand the circumstances that support the expression of complex adult feelings. Children can't understand the frustration a parent can express after a particularly hard work day. It's not in their experience. Because of this lack of experience they also cannot understand when or why they are being manipulated. It can only be understood as manipulation as there can be no balance of power in understanding or accepting the message. The child is immediately overwhelmed by information that may be contrary to their own understanding and perception.
It is, to my understanding, a covert attempt at emotional manipulation and coercion of a child to take sides or accept conclusions regarding family turmoil. The very thing a child would in most cases choose not to do is being implemented by the mother. I judge it as malicious because it is covert and cannot be a healing remedy of openness and honesty. If it were a remedy the talks with the child would include the other siblings, the father and possibly a councillor.

This is the very moment a child becomes orphaned and parentless. The parent has removed the boundaries of the child by assigning them the status of confidant. The breach of their emotional boundaries occurs with a narration of new understandings that cannot be filtered by their own experience and the child begins to feel by proxy, feelings that are not they're own.

They are coerced into being an emotional equal, to accept the emotional status and burden of their confidant; to lose the safety, security, innocence and happiness of their world. The absurdity of what has been described as "parental alienation" is a myopic look at a circumstance from the adult perspective. That one parent would alienate another parent is part of the adult rhetoric common with a battle for custody and hence a battle for ally's. It is not difficult to understand that the moment the boundaries of a child have been breached both parents are alienated and the child has lost two care givers, two protectors and two advocates of their security and happiness. As an added injury they have had the context of their childhood removed.

In the grimace of today's single parent homes and more often single mother homes is it any wonder that children are floundering socially? They look like children, they act like children, but all too often they talk like a parent. These are children that have been stripped of their own perceptions and are now living a life by proxy. When they reach an age that may allow them to intuit that something is wrong or begin to mourn the loss of themselves in depression they are immediate candidates for psycho-active drugs.

Ask yourself if you have ever heard a child say they have no feelings? What is left of their feelings if they believe those very feelings may betray a parental confidant? The only way they could experience this is when their feelings have been replaced by someone else's and they are awaiting instructions on what is important and what to feel next.

These children have had their childhoods stolen from them, they have active minds like all of us and they are now active with worry over adult issues they have no power or control over. How does a child in this state apply themselves to school work? How can they focus? How can they care? How can they communicate their experience? How do they cope? This is nothing new it's a common familial process that many subscribe to. I have no doubt that some reading this piece may now be considering how they themselves were affected and how such influence formed their maturity and adulthood. You may be thinking back to days when parental hostilities or influences overtook your childhood and your innocence.

I have noticed this in intimate relationships I have had with women who were to close with their mothers. They characterized their fathers and men in a way that was consistent with their mothers and were unable to communicate their own feelings in a personal way. One partner would lose control at an intimate moment and blubber and bellow in a panic when confronted with her feelings. Her mother was married to an alcoholic and found it much easier to hate her partner than leave him. But she did not miss an opportunity to solicit pity and support from her children or those around her for any effort she was forwarding. I was invited many times myself to think less of the man for his crimes against her and offered a beer or a drink for my troubles. That same partner once told me her life and our relationship would be so much easier for her if I was an alcoholic. I guess she already had the manual; no self-discovery required.

In another relationship my partner spoke openly about her father having an affair and the impact of it on her mother. It was apparent to me that both mother and daughter expressed themselves in a similar passive-aggressive style. I find these types have a favourite phrase they like to use, “I was waiting for the right moment to tell you”. This is such a cute thing to say it really only deserves one response. “Next time let me know and we can wait together.”

I recall a conversation with the father in which he said he felt like he had been waiting for too many years for a relationship with his wife to begin. I may not believe in adultery, but that doesn’t stop me from understanding why or how it can happen. It is typical of the passive-aggressive group to crave attention while remaining aloof. This comes second only to their desire to see themselves as perpetual victims. I am convinced that this is the heart of feminism itself. Their rhetoric is embodied by their victimization and the attention they crave that accompanies it. Though they may claim not to hate all men, they simple fail to love them.

I believe in relationships like this that individuality doesn’t really exist. These women were eventually unknowable and likely also to themselves. What appears as individuals is really group think beliefs and strangely a group feel emotion. I would suspect the dominant thoughts, beliefs and emotions are more often those that function covertly and in the shadows. There is a difference between life experience and a fabricated set of emotions. Once you find yourself in new emotional territory particularly as an adult, panic may be your only skill. I am beginning to believe the simple act of communication may be the very first sign of emotional maturity and health.

It is for relationships like this, the dysfunctional exchange of pathologies that are so common in families that we are all challenged to acknowledge the individual in our children that is trying to survive, thrive and mature. It would be a gesture of love and a strong message from men and their movement towards change that they acknowledge, embrace and respect this childhood evolution. To find the personal depth and integrity to nurture it, after all childhood is for children.

1) Your time to listen
2) Your understanding
3) Your love

Send a note to Tom Leykis, score four bucks for AVfM Radio

February 25, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

The ever resourceful and persistent KARMA has once again pitched in with more than his share of help for A Voice for Men. This time, he has pledged to ante up two dollars (matched by Cumbria) for every message sent to Tom Leykis about the new AVfM Radio program set to debut Tuesday night at 9:00 EST on Blog Talk Radio.
And here is the deal. After buying a $2,500.00 BTR membership, a new laptop dedicated to the show, condenser microphones, filters, voice modification software, backups for everything, and quite of few other related expenses, we DO need the continued funding. So let me ask you to help us out here by FLOODING Mr. Leykis with messages. It just takes a minute, and you can do it by simply clicking here

I just sent mine, as follows:

Hey Mr. Leykis,

Ma boys and me are firing up a Blog Talk Radio show called A Voice for Men. I'm the host, Paul Elam, founder of avoiceformen.com and former Editor-in-Chief for mensnewsdaily.com. avoiceformen.com is tracking toward 1 million hits a year; steadily growing.

Suffice it to say that almost all of my readers, and future listeners, are huge fans of yours. We're hated by pretty much the same people, too. I've been dogged by the New York Times, CBS News and Ms. Magazine.

My readers were more than generous, donating a nice bag-o-cash to help me get things started. And the fundraising continues in some very creative ways. A reader just now offered two dollars a throw for every message sent to you regarding the new show. This is my two bucks worth for the million dollar man himself.

That would be you.

Please keep up your great work, and if you get a chance visit blogtalkradio.com/avoiceformen any time after Tuesday, March 1, 2011 and give us a listen.

Kind regards,

Paul Elam
A Voice for Men Radio, avoiceformen.com

Thanks again to KARMA who never stops working for this movement.

Assange to be Extradited, Tyranny Marches On, Valenti Orgasms

February 25, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

The inevitable has happened. Julian Assange has lost his fight against extradition to Sweden, where he will go to face rape charges. His conviction is almost as much a given as the rubber stamp ruling of the British judge that is about to hand him over to the Swedes.

It's a story with an abundance of subtexts. As gender ideologues rail about his vile but completely unproven predatory habits with women, and mindless American nationalists chant for him to be burned alive for seditious criminality – just as imagined as his rapes, there is the certainty that the truly germane implications of this story will be lost in the media melee.

The facts are simple, here. Assange exposed and embarrassed a number of powerful government functionaries across the planet. He will pay for that, and it matters not whether he did anything illegal, as evidenced by the fact he is being extradited for alleged rapes that Swedish prosecutors found no merit in before American intervention into their legal system.

Can you imagine for a moment what sort of flimsy nature that allegations of rape must have to be rejected by prosecutors…in fucking Sweden? Sweden is to feminism and misandry what Columbia is to cocaine and car bombs. This is the same country that is considering putting the burden on men to prove innocence of rape rather than the onus being on the state to prove guilt. (Our very own überbitch Jessica Valenti gives the idea thumbs up for The States.)

And that brings into play the other fact.

For years MRA's have been branded as delusional for the belief that feminism, rather than being a movement for equality, is in reality just a push for female privilege at male expense. It's the modern equivalent of theories pushing the idea that Earth was not the center of the universe – in the age of Copernicus.

But it is really the least of evils that feminist doctrine is visiting on the western world. As we see it play out, the equal but special status gifted to women in western culture is just a secondary symptom of a much more primary affliction. What we are actually seeing here, and will see more of in the future, is that feminism is just one of many State instruments used for reprisals against anyone it chooses, at will. And it will ultimately result in the oppression of everyone, not just men.

Have you ever wondered why you see feminism and egregiously sexist pro female laws being enacted in the most unlikely of places? We now have women only parking spots (extra wide for bad drivers) popping up all over South Korea.

We have women only train cars in India, where the cops, if you are a male unfortunate enough to wander into one of those cars, will supervise your beating and humiliation by female passengers. If you happen to run in to an especially hard core enforcer, he will throw you off the train, while it is still moving.

In China the divorce rate is climbing at a rate that would impress Robert Goddard, all since the adoption of "western values" that commenced in earnest in 1979.
That's western, read FEMINIST, values. Not so coincidentally China, which still maintains state control of printing presses, has also been churning out a quickly building library of feminist literature.
And of course we are seeing all manner of United Nations efforts to help the spread of feminist ideology across the globe.
If you want to understand all this, you need to take a different tack than just following the money.
This time follow the subjugation.
The principle is simple. Women control men. The State controls women, and by that extension, everyone else. Men are, by nature, too weak to stand up to it, because it would mean standing up to women. And women are, also by nature, too self-interested, hypergamous and gullible to resist the carrot the State is ever dangling in front of their faces.
So all you have to do in order to exert total government control – with voluntary acquiescence – is effectively exploit the innate characteristics of men and women. Give women speshul status, a parking spot here, a train car there, an arts degree that makes them feel educated when the opposite is true; feed them a constant entitlement message and point a villainous finger at men who are cornered into the position from which their only way out is at the risk of sexual rejection and female ridicule.
Voilà, a great big pair of shiny social handcuffs and a blanket gag that the general population will line up for with smiles on their faces.
And it leaves governments in the position that all governments just love to be in:
Free to do whatever the hell they want with scarcely a worry that anyone will object, much less rebel. And a quick remedy for the few that will.
If you think that is one hooting howl of a freakazoid conspiracy theory, perhaps you can explain why Gloria Steinem's efforts were funded by the CIA.
To understand it better, consider what this has netted women. Sure, we have more women C.E.O.'s than we used to have, doctors and lawyers too, most all of them towing the feminist line. But the average woman has now only moved into the most powerless of all positions; that which was formerly occupied by western men.
They have become low rent providers, who, because they don't have the skills or resources for comfortable self-sufficiency, turn to the state for the confiscated earnings of men. They demand and get a state apparatus that redistributes just enough male income their way add a slice of cheese to their fast food burger at lunch, but they are nowhere near roaring like Helen Reddy. For every Martha Stewart there are tens of thousands of bus riding, paycheck to paycheck living wage slaves.
The only roar you hear from them is when they open the light bill.
I am sure arts degrees feel good on graduation day, but what they lead to for most women is dead end, low paying jobs shuffling paper and trying futilely to maintain happiness while wearing the corporate anchor around their rapidly aging and increasingly single necks.

It has left legions of them downing anti-depressants like popcorn and droning endlessly about the fact that there are no good men left.
And despite their meager incomes, the state is collecting their tax dollars and spending part of it to keep convincing them their poverty and discontent is a function of patriarchal sexism.
It pretty effectively keeps their fingers on the trigger, fueling a production line of would be accusers. Pity, though, as time goes by they don't seem to be catching on to the fact that they have been played all along.
And used like pawns, just as they are in the Assange case.
Sure, Anna Ardin and Sofia Wilen are two lying skanks that are likely reveling in the idea that they can send an innocent man to prison. And no doubt their actions are causing tingles of anticipation, starting in hyper-feminist Sweden and crossing the waters fast enough to make Valenti cream her pants right here in America the Beautiful.
But the big picture here is bigger than the combined ass flesh of all the bimbos involved. This is not just the typical female finger pointing we have been accustomed to in the western world. This is a state orchestrated frame job, using one of the more powerful weapons in their arsenal, modern women. Skeezers Ardin and Wilen are just useful idiots in a game they lack the intellectual capacity to comprehend.
I can almost hear the conversation that happened at the American State Department.
Government thug A: Unfortunately he hasn't broken any laws.
Government thug B: Shit! There has to be something we can do.
Government thug C: Hey, wait a minute. Wasn't he in Sweden once?
Thugs A, B and C, all smiles. From there on it was just a matter of a few phone calls.
In a culture typified by brainwashed women, who can somehow manage sufficient denial to believe that being on the strings of puppeteers is empowerment, any sort of abuse is possible. And as we can easily see in the Assange case, it is happening in front of an entire world that can't, and won't, see it for what it is.
I don't know for sure if MRA's will ever become the threat to governments that Julian Assange is, but I do know one thing for sure. As much as I would like to meet Pelle Billing and shake his hand, he will have to come here for the occasion.

The Violence Behind Feminism's Humanist Masquerade

Several months ago, I wrote an article addressing a public statement by the radical feminist Jessica Valenti. The Washington Post [1] published an article authored by Valenti on December 12 2010 in which she argued for the reversal of the burden of proof onto the accused, in criminal trials for the crime of rape.

For the sake of clarity, I will copy the paragraph in which Valenti states the case for presumed guilt.

It reads: In fact, some activists and legal experts in Sweden want to change the law there so that the burden of proof is on the accused; the alleged rapist would have to show that he got consent, instead of the victim having to prove that she didn't give it.

The deliberately obtuse will claim that Valenti is merely commenting on somebody else's position, with her vague attribution to "some activists and legal experts in Sweden". What experts? Valenti doesn't name them. She does directly quote a Swedish feminist, Johanna Palmström, but doesn't attribute the argument for presumptive guilt to Palmström. Wherever Valenti got this idea, she owns it now, and it's Valenti arguing in its favor in her Washington Post article.

She is, of course not the first feminist to push the perverse idea of presumptive guilt. Linda Bourque argued for presumptive guilt in rape accusations in her 1989 book Defining Rape. Susan Caringella, a sociology professor at Western Michigan University, called for the dismantling of what she calls overzealous protections for men in her 2008 book Addressing Rape Reform in Law and Practice.

No such overzealous protections exist, in fact, women accusing men of rape are commonly protected with a legally mandated anonymity, while men accused are smeared in the news prior to any legal or evidentiary inquiry.

I previously suggested that Valenti, in her advocacy of presumed guilt, recognized that by striping the right of habeas corpus from half the population, she understands and seeks a much more violent society; a society in which individuals cannot settle disputes through the courts, but must fall back on vendetta and violence because the system of law has become one of apartheid.

This is the outcome which logically follows the transformation of criminal law into a law of privilege for one group, and presumed guilt for another, based on sex.

Some critics of my analysis jumped to the absurd conclusion that I was actually threatening personal violence if this trend towards apartheid continues. The rhetorical contortions necessary to transmute a prediction of increased violence into a threat of violence is not unusual for opponents of men's rights.

Having experienced substantial violence in my life, I can say with certainty that a society in which justice take the form of personal vendetta is a prospect I find abhorrent. The knee jerk attempt to characterize my analysis as if it were threat might be charitably seen as an honest but stupid misunderstanding. Or, the reading of my prediction of a more violent society as threat can be more realistically interpreted as a personalized straw man attack, pursued with the complete understanding that stripping away habeas corpus will leave many individuals with no options but violence in the settlement of disputes.

When the law is corrupted into a tool of wealth appropriation, apartheid, and privilege for one social class at the expense of another, I can see no possible outcome except a dramatic increase in brutal and deadly violence. If anybody still chooses to interpret that prediction as a threat, then I can only conclude that they're deeply stupid, or wildly dishonest.

I still say that Jessica Valenti wants women to be killed. The alternative is that she is too stupid to understand what she's arguing for. But that possibility must also encompass every single feminist arguing in her camp; too stupid to understand what they're pushing for.

Feminism, the ideology to which Valenti, Caringella, and Bourque all subscribe has been variously described by its critics, including me, as an ideology of female supremacy. I now think this is only partly correct. It encompasses the deeply bigoted notion of supremacy of one biological demographic over another, but it is more accurate to consider feminism as a doctrine of violence.

If you'd like a few examples of this, consider mandatory arrest and primary aggressor laws. These laws mean that in cases of domestic violence – police have no discretion about whether to arrest somebody. Because domestic violence public service announcements and other propaganda universally depict men as aggressors – a portrayal wildly at odds with the stats on DV, [2] This means that the police act as feminist enforcers. Women can and do use the police as muscle to remove male spouses based solely on the woman's discretion and say so. [3]

A report paid for and prepared on behalf of the US department of justice called "Violence Against Women: Synthesis of Research for Law Enforcement Officials" discusses domestic violence police intervention, and identifies only women as victims, and men as perpetrators, despite the large body of publicly available research [4] indicating gender symmetry in Intimate Partner Violence.

In cases where men are the victims of DV and calls for help from the police, it will likely result in that male victims arrest[5], rather than help. If you think this isn't violence because it's done through state funded enforcers, you're delusional.

Another example is the funding and enforcement of the Violence Against Women Act; a set of laws providing extra protection for women, and fast track conviction for men, in spite of the well documented fact that men are far more likely to be victims of violence overall[6], and roughly coequally victims of domestic violence.

A policy to reduce violence against the group already least impacted by it, through the abrogation of legal rights of the group already most affected is tantamount to a policy of increased violence against the latter group; men.

Another example of systematic violence perpetrated by a violent ideology is the popularization of the foolish and hateful idea that every adult man is a potential pedophile. It’s social convention, and not legitimate research which brands men the offending demographic in the sexual abuse of children [7]. Because of the perpetuation of this falsehood, men must curb their normal, healthy, natural inclination to enjoy interaction with children.

To illustrate the point, consider the previous sentence. Did you picture something lurid when I mentioned men enjoying interactions with children? If you did, then you’ve at least partly bought into that poisonous lie. [8]

The reality is that women are the overwhelming majority of abusers and killers of children. The lie of ubiquitous masculine predation on children forces men to sequester themselves away from them out of self-preservation. That is inarguably violence done against men, and violence done against children.

How about workplace deaths? Organized feminism never ceases to remind us that women earn less than men. They’ll imply, or sometimes claim this is actually women being paid less to do jobs men are paid more for. [9]

This is false. In fact, on average, women choose jobs which afford them greater flexibility and access to friends and family[10].

Men, by contrast, tend to select jobs based almost exclusively on income. Because in our society, income is what men are valued by. However, as many times as the proponents of Big Feminism will argue for equalization of income outcome, you never hear an argument for the reduction of the percent of men who die doing their jobs. [11] 93 percent of workplace deaths are men.

The continued willful ignorance of this fact, while whining/ lying about income, is violence.

The National Organization of Women, one of the most prominent feminist organizations in the world has. on the landing page of their website, a list of their top 5 “issues,” one of which is stopping violence against women. According to the Bureau of Justice statistics, men are overwhelmingly more likely to be the victims of violence,[6] but the NOW is only concerned with stopping violence against women, not with stopping violence in general.

In light of the DOJ stats showing men as the principal victims of violence, doesn’t a focus on violence reduction for the demographic least affected translate to an implicit support for violence against men?

Yes it does, and quite explicitly.

The redefinition of the physical expression of love between a man and a woman, as a crime, is, itself, an act of violence against those who would give physical expression of love. “All heterosexual sex is violence” – said Andrea Dworkin, whose writings are still a staple of women’s and gender studies classes at universities in the United States and Canada. Dworkin doesn’t represent mainstream feminism, I hear somebody complaining? Why, then, is her writing still used to teach university students to hate men?

Now, to avoid this becoming a tedious recitation of the forms of violence, I’ll limit the list to what I’ve mentioned. The complete list could extend to hundreds. Feminism, to be sure, is a doctrine of violence. We are simply bamboozled into thinking otherwise because the most obvious feminists do not themselves beat people with their fists.

Their violence is considerably more varied, and indirect.

One of the most remarkable features of this poisonous ideology of violence is the lengths to which it's proponents will go to delude the laity, and delude themselves. This is illustrated in a Ted Talks lecture [12] given by feminist author Hannah Rosen, in which she publicly excoriates her own son, in front of her daughter, with the help of her husband, telling her baby boy that due to his masculinity, he is a lesser person than her daughter. She played the video of this humiliation of her little boy to a packed Ted Talks audience. Hannah Rosen performed this amazing act of cruelty thinking that she was actually doing good; that her actions were ethical.

Does some part of Hanna Rosen's mind recognize the deliberate, calculated harm she's doing to her son, and to all men in herself congratulatory preening lectures on feminism's dominance of the public zeitgeist? I don't know. I hope so.

Does anyone debate that this damage inflicted on her son is not violence?

How about the use of shaming language by proponents of feminism to silence any criticism or dissent? This is so common that a [13] bestiary of the most frequently used ad hominem arguments specifically targeting dissenting men can be found cataloged in a document called the anti-male shaming tactics catalog.

Is the silencing of debate through personal attack and shame not a form of violence? [14]If it's not, then a vast majority of what feminists claim as violence against women must be summarily discarded without examination. Or maybe we live in a universe where that knife only cuts in one direction. Men can't actually be victimized, because of the unique position of power they occupy. This is a clever piece of agitprop from feminist ideologue Marilyn Frye designed to de-legitimize any man's expression of pain, and to validate any verbal or physical violence done to a man.

We also have the difference between depictions of rape against a woman, and depictions of rape against a man. In our mass produced entertainment, a woman raped is a horror, a shock, and an outrage, as it should be. Rape is a horrible violent crime. If our media depicts or describes rape committed against a man, it's comedy.

Rape, when the victim is a man, is comedy, because feminism is a doctrine of violence.

Speaking about entertainment, why is it that almost all male figures used in advertising are depicted as buffoons, idiots, cretins, and infantilized boy-men? Women are portrayed as beautiful, clever, patient, wise, and in every way that matters, superior.

Can you imagine the consequences to an advertising agency who cast any other biological demographic as naturally inferior, used that for comic effect to sell car insurance, golf clubs or prescription drugs?

As long as its men portrayed as stupid, everything is Kosher, right? After all, the majority of the television audience are female[15].

In spite of the endless fraudulent claims by feminists that the real lifetime earnings imbalance which exists between men and women is the product of women's oppression, women control 65% of the disposable income spent by individuals in the world. Regardless of who earns it, women spend it. This disparity is increasing, and by 2028, women are expected to control 72% of discretionary spending.

So denigration of men, violence against men, even killing of men is all just fine in feminism-land. Women are the majority of voters[17], entertainment consumers, and disposers of disposable income.

Women are in charge, and the violence of feminism's doctrine is done indirectly, at once removed, or hidden behind language. It's easy to be fooled into thinking feminism is something other than a doctrine of violence.
So, faced by 40 years of escalated violence against the male sex through media, through the courts, through the family courts, through the education system, have Men, the proclaimed great oppressors and rapists responded with escalated violence against women?
The unthinking, knee jerking response from proponents of feminism would probably be a shrill and hysterical yes. But I'd prefer to consult the statistics of the department of justice.[6]
The statistics collected by the United States Department of Justice indicate steadily declining rates of violent crime victimization for both women and men, but a consistently higher rate of violent crime committed against men.
So in light of the knowledge that men are far more often the victims of violent crime than women, why do media messages about stopping violence always focus on women as victims?
Are the producers of these messages unaware that men, and not women are subject to the majority of violent crime. Ignorance is implausible. What's more realistic is that our society doesn't actually care about violence done to men, we have no sympathy, and the agencies seeking funds are far more concerned about rent seeking than solution seeking. So they focus on a victim demographic more likely win emotional support and funding. Actual rates of violence don't really matter, as long as there is enough damage being done to photogenic female victims to keep the money flowing.
Are you paying attention?
Damage to women is at the core of the victim industry's business model. Damage to men is incidental. Well, almost incidental, it serves another purpose, and that's to drive a wedge between men and women, setting them against each other. I'll talk about that in greater depth in another article.
Also, let us not delude ourselves; the violence done by the violent ideology of feminism isn't always against men. [18] Women are the world's champions at killing children. Now in hearing that item of uncomfortable truth, some halfwit will likely screech that I'm saying women are all child killers. No, I'm saying that the US Department of health and Human Services show mothers abusing children at more than double the rate of fathers. How is it that with these stats so readily available, rescue organizations and non-governmental organizations running on a feminist ideology never seem to stray from the narrative that men are the problem full stop.
Are they incompetent? Confused? Or are they wholly unconcerned with actually reducing violence? Or do they simply produce a palatable message that the bad men must be curbed, because that message coupled with real violence done in the real world – never mentioning women as perpetrators – that's the fastest and easiest way to secure funding and sympathy.
Feminism is an ideology of violence. After 40 years of feminist pre-eminence in policy making, education, the courts, and government, anybody still denying this may be beyond the reach of rational thought.

Now i'll conclude with one more point. Feminism is an ideology. It's not a biological demographic. Who listening to this is already fuming that I, a men's rights activist must surely hate women. This is a favorite straw man argument against anyone arguing in opposition to.
Women and feminists are not the same thing, and opposition to violent ideology doesn't mean hatred of women. I'm actually rather fond of women, when they're not lying to me, or calling me a potential rapist, or lobbying for policy to define my masculine identity as criminal.

[box type="note" style="rounded" border="full" icon="none"]
Two days now, folks, and A Voice for Men Radio will make its first landing on the misandric landscape. One small step for the men's movement; one giant leap backward for feminists, manginas, and white knights.
And so today is an auspicious time to announce the schedule for the first month of programming. Here is what you have to look forward to over the next 30 days.
Episode one- March 1, 2011, 9:00 p.m. EST, U.S..
An Introduction to the Men's Movement
Our debut show at A Voice for Men Radio. This program will give an overview of the men's movement, take as many right hooks at feminists and manginas as we can in an hour, let you hear exactly why the men's movement is growing, and why it isn't going to stop. Paul Elam, founder of avoiceformen.com and former Editor-in-Chief of Men's News Daily is your host. One listen to this show and you will find out why the New York Times, CBS News and Ms. Magazine all have their panties in a twist over the work of Mr. Elam. Strap in and buckle up for this one. This is A Voice for Men you have never heard before.
Episode two- March 8, 2011, 9:00 p.m. EST, U.S..
Violent Women and Government Lies
Join host Paul Elam and listen while he strips the sugar coating off the problem of Domestic Violence in western culture. Find out who is lying to you and why, as well as learning a lot about women's capacity for violence that you probably didn't know. This show will hit you right between the eyes, with the truth!
Episode three- March 15, 2011, 9:00 p.m. EST, U.S..
Cry Rape! The Plague of False Accusations
If you think the rape stories about Hofstra and Duke Lacrosse were isolated incidents, think again. Some estimates put the incidence of rape claims being false at nearly 50%. It's a fact that has cost many innocent men their freedom, reputations and livelihood. Learn how to protect yourself from women who will turn personal regret or embarrassment into a cry of rape. It happens to a lot more people than you would think! [Still awaiting confirmation of an appearance by the crew at False Rape Society]
Episode four- March 22, 2011, 9:00 p.m. EST, U.S..
Psycho Women From Hell- With Special Guest Dr. Tara Palmatier
Life with someone two cans shy of a six pack can range from interesting to stressful to quite dangerous. In this show Dr. Tara Palmatier, psychotherapist and the no nonsense founder of shrink4men.com, joins us to talk about women with personality disorders and the men whose lives they often ruin. Consider this show the first anti Oprah installment at AVfM Radio. "Dr. T" will be a regular guest, well into the future.
As you can see, we have some real goodies line up for you, and we know that as we move along it will only get better. Our show producer Keyster will be handling your calls in to the show as well as pushing all the right buttons during the broadcast.

So, if you haven't already, now is the time to make yourself a part of something sure to bring your views of the world to a much larger audience.

1. Register with Blogtalkradio.com (just click on the sign in and follow the prompts)
2. Click the "follow" button on the show page. (!! Very important)
3. Buckle up. This is going to get interesting.

Please note that registering with BTR and following the show will enable you to call in via Skype, and also give you access to the show's live chatroom which is available only during the live broadcast. Keyster will be monitoring the chat as we broadcast and messaging me with your thoughts and ideas.
This is going to be an interactive experience on every level we have available.
I look forward to seeing you and hearing you there. And now for a message from show producer, Keyster:
Some side notes for the listening audience:
1) When I take your call I'll need your name and location.
2) You will then be taken out of "call screening" mode and be listening to the broadcast live while waiting for your turn to talk.
3) You will show up in the caller que and Paul will announce he's taking your call when it's your turn and you will then be put live on the air with Paul.
4) There is about a 5 second delay (just like AM talk radio) so PLEASE turn down your volume on the AVfM player, and listen on your Skype connection or via phone only while you wait to talk and are switched to live, or you will be trying to listen to the delayed version and live version at the same time.
5) There is a chat room feature which I will be monitoring where people can discuss things and pose questions or topics…(although I hope everyone will be listening more and typing less!) We may turn to the chat room now and then to discuss on the air anything interesting or late breaking that might be in there…depending on how the phones are going.
Please do call in and remember CALLERS MAKE THE SHOW as much as the host. I'm not sure how active the lines initially will be, but we'll do our best to get to everyone…and run over if we have to.
This is gonna be fantastic!
Spread the word!

Confronting Dow Chemical on Misandry: Activism Fundraiser

February 28, 2011 | by Anonymous Contributor | Link | Original Link

The Dow Chemical Company has announced a virtual conference Tuesday, March 1st, called The Future We Create. "Covering topics from mentoring young women and fostering executive leadership to gender differences, the hour-long virtual conference will address the issue of how stakeholders can work together to expand women's leadership in chemistry and the sciences."

Quoting from their Facebook page: "Did you know that only 15 of the 72 members elected into the National Academy of Science (NAS) in 2010 are women? : Join 60 of today's leading minds for 60 minutes to discuss, debate and define how women can move the field and industry of chemistry—as well as other sciences—forward."

The implication is that only when parity is achieved – in practice by ousting men from the leadership positions they've earned or eliminating opportunities for new male leaders – will their mission be complete.

Of course, this is all in an effort to promote diversity and inclusion. Accordingly, all 60 of the conference speakers are women.

I thought that A Voice For Men and Spearhead readers might enjoy an opportunity to enhance diversity and inclusion on The Future We Create's Facebook page by ensuring that men's views are represented there too.

Accordingly, I will donate $5.00 to AVfM Radio for every pro-male comment posted on the Future We Create Facebook page, up to a maximum of $400. [offer upped to $7.00 per comment by KARMA] Please also copy your comment as a reply here so I don't miss it. Note: You have to click the "Like" button at the top to be able to post (sorry). If you do not have a Facebook account, you will need to create one.

As an added bonus, I will also donate $1 to AVFM Radio for every person who adds Paul Elam as a friend on Facebook and $1 to The Spearhead for every person who "Like"s The Spearhead Facebook page by the end of the week.

If you're interested in crashing the conference itself, it takes place at 11 AM ET on Tuesday on Facebook, Twitter, and LinkedIn.

Warning: Link contains head shots of the conference speakers.

While you're at it, why not use your new Facebook account to sign up to follow A Voice For Men Radio, which has just one thing in common with the Future We Create conference: it debuts Tuesday (at 9 PM ET).

– Signed, Your Diversity & Inclusion Watchdog

Addendum: Future We Create is auto-deleting comments on their Wall, but replies to their own comments do not seem to be effected. It is better to respond to an existing comment rather than posting directly on the Wall. And please copy your post here to AVFM in case it gets deleted immediately, so we will get credit..

March 1, 2011 | by J Galt | Link | Original Link

It was a Saturday morning, home from the job but busy with the usual weekend tasks. My kids at that time were much younger than now. My daughter was 12; my son 9. It was grocery time, and like everyone else on a Saturday morning the three of us were at the plaza for food.

I always like to challenge my kids with my idea of respect and reward. I turned to my daughter and asked her how many times she had come shopping with me, to which she rolled her eyes and said I dunno a million.

"Right Sar, enough to know how this works. So you know the budget is a hundred and ten bucks, and today it's your turn to shop."

"What do you mean dad?"

"Well you go into the grocery store get a cart and do it."

"What if I screw up?" she asked.

"Sar, what's to screw up? We eat the same crap every week."

"Well what if I spend too much?"

"How can you if you only have 110 bucks? Tell you what, here's another twenty just to screw up with. Phone me when you're done and I'll come get you – should be an hour."

She looked really nervous, but hey, I know my daughter, she loves it when I pull this shit out of the blue.

Zach and I went down into the restaurant for some fries and a cup of tea to wait for Sar. Zach figured his sister would screw it up and call in the next ten minutes crying.

"Yeah," I said, "We'll see."

The conversation turned to Zach asking if he could get one of those new sports jackets with the bulls on it. Those jackets are 80 bucks. He whined and begged for about ten minutes till I got fed up, so I told him if he could beat me once at x's and o's he could get it.

34 games later he was getting pretty distraught.

"I can't beat you at this, this sucks."

"Well Zach, I guess I want my 80 bucks more than you want your jacket. That's why I'm winning and you're sucking."

He got pissed when I said that and drew another board.

"I'm going first this time," he said.

Just then the waiter came over and asked if we wanted anything else, maybe another tea I said while I put down my X on the board and handed him my cup. Then I heard from Zach, "got you Dad." He said Dad like I was some kid in the playground he was punking. I looked down as he drew his O and connected the three of them.

“Wait a minute,” I said, “I was talking to the waiter, that’s not fair.”

“Well, I guess you wanted your tea more than your 80 bucks,” is all I heard. Followed quickly by, “so I want the black one with the “Bulls” in red letters.”

Man I just got walked on by a 9 year old. But really I loved the push and pull with my kids and when they beat me at my game, they got my respect.

We went back to the grocery store to pick up Sar and she was standing out front, groceries in the cart and the look of a wife on her face.

“Hey Sar, how did you make out?”

“I think I did pretty good Dad, but I called mom once to find out if we needed peanut butter so I got some.”

I thought wow this kid is pretty sharp so I asked her if she told her mother she was doing the shopping.

“No wa,”y she said,” if it’s screwed up it’s your fault, not mine, and you can deal with mom.”

I don’t think she realized the shudder that went through me. I asked her if there was any change. “Yeah, it came to 108 and change, she said, and handed me the buck and the coins. I stood there looking at her.

“Well?” I asked.

“Well what?”

“What about the other twenty bucks?”

She looked me dead in the eye with a smile and said, “I screwed up dad.”

“What do you mean you screwed up?”

You said the 20 bucks was just for screwing up, so I screwed up.”

“OK Sar I get your drift, but do me a favour, when you’re older and get married try not to make it so surreal for your husband.”

“What does surreal mean?”

“Well surreal is when your 34 years old you go shopping and you end up getting jacked for an extra hundred bucks by a nine year old and a 12 year old. Sar turned to Zach and asked, “You got the jacket?”

“Yeah,” he said, “a buzzillion games of X’s and O’s, but I finally won.”

That was how Zach came to own his Bulls jacket. Fair and square.

The next week was a little more unnerving. We live in a little suburb called a hamlet and we were about a ten minute walk from the store through a backstreet and down a bike path. Sarah had asked Zach to go to the store for her about 2 o’clock in the afternoon on Saturday. We got a call from the video store about 20 minutes later, Zach was there he was crying on the phone said they took his jacket in a project near the store. I told him to wait for me and jumped in my car. I was on the scene in about 5 minutes. I parked the car behind the project got out and started to survey the area, I stayed calm and just walked like nothing was up. I passed a house surrounded by hedges and heard some kids talking behind the bushes.

I rounded the bushes and realized they were in an area that wasn't visible from anywhere, I figured if I played my cards right I could trap them in the bushes and they wouldn't be able to run. I stepped around the bushes blocking the exit and said in a friendly tone hey guys. They didn't respond they all just turned and looked at me. I moved a little closer looking each of them in the face. I got a real serious look on my face and in a tone that only a father can use I said "which one of you is the bear hunter?"

Of course I got nothing but dumb looks in response. I've always found that when confronting kids the first thing to do is say something they won't understand. It confuses them and gives you their full attention. That's the moment to take control; the moment they're confused.

"Who's got the gun?" I said, in a tone that caused every one of them to freeze in shock. Four of them pointed to the one that had it. I stepped up to him and put my hand out flat and tapped it with my finger, while looking him in the eye with a threat of absolute annihilation. He looked down, pulled the gun from his pocket and put it in my hand, never once looking up at me, I put it straight into my pocket. Where's the masks? One kid said they threw them away in the bushes. "And the jacket?" With the masks. You, go get them, you guys don't fucking move or you'll regret it.

Two minutes and I had the masks and jacket.

They all lived in the project, which was pretty much a community of single mothers on welfare. I just shook my head. OK guys lets go see your parents. Every one of these kids, the oldest was 14 – the youngest 10, lived with a single mother. Four of the mothers tried to pass it off as boys who won't do what their told. With the fifth kid it was the same; single mother but she was out with her "new" boyfriend. He was 12 and left alone at home.

Surprize, surprize, he was the one with the gun.

I wanted to take him home last in case I had to call the cops and wait there. I had told each of the mothers that I would be filing a police report and expect to be hearing from them. All I heard in response was complaints about how hard it was to be a single mother. One of them pissed me off and I asked her what she thought it might be like to be a kid with less than half a parent who only complained about it. She slammed the door in my face.

The tragedy in this whole situation is the extent to which everyone is willing to accept the outcome. From the mothers to the cops it was just same old same old. For the boys there wasn't one of them that copped an attitude with me at any point. Knowing a little about kids from having my own I talked to them like they were my own. What the hell were you thinking son? you think this shit ends here, look at the trouble you brought on yourself. If you were my son I'd have to keep you around me all the time till I knew you could figure out the difference. What were you planning to do with the jacket – take turns wearing it?

“So it’s money you’re after? Well, see that house? That’s where I live, you want money you come and see me I’ll give you work and pay you for it. At that time I lived in a Condo project, we had implemented a child employment program in grounds maintenance to reduce vandalism. We discovered that when you pay kids to do grounds maintenance, they lose interest in destroying the grounds, and develop an interest in personal economics.

I could tell by the way these kids responded to me that every one of them was a damn fine kid just bleeding for some attention, and specifically from a father. Anytime I saw them in the neighbourhood they would always say hello as polite as could be. I’d always chat with them ask how things were going for them at home and at school. One lad told me school was bad all he could get was a D in every class.

I stopped turned and looked him in the eye and said, “Forget teachers, forget school, forget everything. Are you telling me you’re a D? Just a D? Is that all you can imagine?”

Two months later the same kid came up to me in the plaza and spoke to me.

“Hey Keith, I got my report card guess what? I got 4 B’s!”

“Wow I said, I never did any better than C’s when I was in school.”

He stopped, looked at me and said, I thought you must have got all A’s.”

“No, sir,” I said, “You passed me.”

“That’s OK,” he said, “I’d give you an A.”

That was a ton of bricks for me, I could have broken into tears right there. It’s very humbling to give so little and receive so much in return. It was a privilege for me to be present at that transitional moment, as a witness to something more.

Two Movies, Eight Straight Men: Part I

The first half of this two-part article will focus on comedic garbage, the second on a worthy comedic effort. Both movies I will discuss concern the important business of men planning on losing their virginity. I will say no more about Part II; you (like your virginity) will just have to wait. In the meantime, be prepared, if you weren't already from having seen this movie years ago, to be royally pissed off.

"American Pie" came to theaters in 1999, when I was a religious conservative, my sexuality thoroughly tamed, though not by independent thought, volition, experience, consequence and gentle follow-up from older males with a vested interest in my well-being; but by coercive, death-oriented lies. Therefore, I missed the movie. I have to hand it to my former religion: At least it kept me away from this crap.

At the time, the commercials were enough to turn me off. I was able to guiltily laugh at a dirty joke back then, but only if it was funny. They couldn't find a single, funny, dirty joke to showcase in their movie trailer; that should have been my first clue. Secondly, once the movie had hit theaters (and the minds of who knows how many impressionable teenaged males), another commercial emerged with a group of (I presume) 18-year-old young men, the one in front holding a pie against his crotch, all of them singing furtively in unison: "How sweet it is to be loved by you!" Yuk, yuk. No, make that "Yuck." I should have remained unimpressed.

When the dark clouds of eternal punishment for penis-pleasure evaporated, however, since it didn't cost me anything to put this movie in my Netflix queue, and knowing the story centers on four very cute young men, curiosity got the best of me. Well, look what curiosity did to the friggin' cat, man.

There are petty reasons why this movie stinks. Eugene Levy and Jennifer Coolidge, both veterans of Christopher Guest's marvelous mockumentaries, are underused; four average actors are overused. All four of these overused actors look like they're about 25, but we're supposed to believe they are still in high school. (This is nothing new for Hollywood.) The mocking of their peers, a staple of any teen movie, is weirdly subdued, never vicious or terrifying, as it would be in any other movie. The problem is, this doesn't just reduce the anxiety of the viewer; it reduces the comedic effect. That's actually okay with me, since I don't find humiliation of that sort to be the least bit funny.

I could go further in explaining the myriad ways in which this movie rots – everything from the senseless gross-out jokes to the ridiculously gay-centered dialogue of a supposedly straight porno movie that one of the boys is watching at the beginning – but that's not the point of this article. My effort here is to show you the positively insidious message that the movie sends out about straight guys, especially their sexuality.

It starts with the first sexual exchange, featuring one of the young men, who considers himself the biggest player, out on a date with a college girl (who majors in "post-modern feminist thought." Walk away, man). He makes a minor faux-pas by jumping from small talk to a line that was probably designed to get a big laugh: "Suck me, beautiful." I failed to see what was funny; then again, the rules where I come from are totally different when a good-looking guy says something like that. Apparently, this sophisticated "woman" needs something more, so she simply laughs at his pitiful attempt. Her loss. (Must be getting plenty of "Suck me, beautiful" at her post-modern, feminist college.)

This sets the stage for the rest of the film, and this is essentially what it is about: Women should be in charge of sexuality, sexual politics, sexual conversations, and sexual exchanges. Every single woman featured in this film takes command. If you think I'm making too big a deal about this, keep in mind that this film was so enormously successful that it spawned (no pun intended) numerous spin-offs, and it was heralded by at least one critic as some sort of victory for women's sexuality.

A woman gives orders to one of the saps to dance and strip, which is captured on a webcam for the entire high school to watch; then, the next day, when everyone's looking at him and laughing, the humiliation falls flat after hardly being felt at all. The message? "Just laugh it off, guy. We know what we're doing. Your manly concerns are a trifle."

Another woman, for some unknown reason, decides to inform the entire high school on prom night that she not only did not have sex with a young man who was bragging that they had, but that the young man in question also wets his pants, which, standing in the middle of the gym floor in his tux, he promptly does. (This is also very quickly laughed off to little effect.)

A third woman gets all upset when she overhears her boyfriend, whose penis she regularly and eagerly sucks, complain (quite mildly) that he needs to score with her sometime soon. A fourth woman likewise gets her panties in a bunch when another boy, standing next to the one she's interested in (the player mentioned above), does a mildly sexual dance on the football field, while the player stands next to him, smiling awkwardly. Oh, the horror!

A fifth woman, a band geek no less, suddenly demonstrates the sexual prowess of a dominatrix, screaming at her hapless victim, "What's my name? Say my name, bitch!" while she's on top of him. This part would have been a lot funnier if it had been divorced from such a terrible premise. After all, you wouldn't expect the mildly attractive band geek to understand how wearing more than one condom can help prevent premature ejaculation. The line quoted above would have been wonderfully hilarious, in a completely different movie.

The film goes to great lengths to downgrade a man's sexual desires, prowess, and volition. Even the lame attempt at showing a blossoming sensitivity in the player character falls flat, like his awful singing, when he joins a choir primarily to get closer to his quarry. It never goes anywhere. It doesn't endear you to him. He, like the other three main characters, is really only on screen to tell the teenaged males in the audience two pointless messages:

1. Get some. (They need to be told this?)

2. Make sure you treat her right, dude.

This means that the player – who has his last lacrosse game of the season on the same day as some competition where he and his prey are scheduled to sing, and sing quite poorly – has to choose between a heterosexual male-dominated activity and one usually dominated by females, gay guys, and the occasional, extraordinarily sensitive heterosexual male (most of whom manage to sing a lot better), which is the kind of straight guy he's supposed to represent. In order to score, guess in which event he chooses to participate?

That's right. There is not a single yielding to a single demand by a single male throughout the film, except for the sexual exchanges, and then only on the terms as pre-defined by women. It is really quite sickening. How much more meaningful, even touching, would it have been to have the chorus-singing female suddenly appear in the bleachers while her man is on the lacrosse field, and how much funnier to have the band geek girl be the only one to be a domineering, screaming, bedroom banshee?

But no. The guy who regularly gets head is put through an emotional ringer by his "girlfriend," who demands that before she give him her "virginity" (and once you've touched a dick, girls, you ain't no virgin), that he tell her he loves her. Then, as if out of some ridiculous romance novel, she informs him the next morning that their relationship will end with the summer since they're going to different colleges. At least she'll go off to her feminist-dominated environment secure in the knowledge that she took a young man's heart and pride with her. Bitch.

That last bit was supposed to be the most heartfelt moment in the film, since those two characters had been together the longest, and the most frequently sexually active. However, due to her later remarks and his acquiescence, it seems to me that this film is not only misandric, but also misogynistic, and ultimately holds contempt for young adults and human sexuality in general.

These are not the sort of women with whom you ought to find yourselves in bed. These are the types of women who demand that you shave your body hair or go for one of those awful body waxes. These are the sorts of women who rankle whenever you express a simple difference of opinion. These are women who want their men fixed by the "queer eye." (Which notion I thoroughly resent, by the way – I fucking hate shopping.) These women are darkened in their minds. They are herded into government playpens and prevented from entering adulthood, even though their bodies and brains began the process five or six years ago. Therefore, they are jaded, cynical, bored, unimpressed, and apart from their tits and cute faces, they are thoroughly unattractive.

So are the men. These guys are representative of a massive push on the part of the ruling elite that control societal interpretations of teenagers. They are what you would call "mooks." The women are what you would call "midriffs." Both of these terms are insulting and demeaning. So is this film.

Once again, the only exceptions I would make are the band geek's moment of glory previously mentioned, the appearance of Jennifer Coolidge whose oeuvre includes this gem, and the inclusion of Eugene Levy's character, the one truly bright spot in anything that this film might actually have to say.

Levy accidentally interrupts his son's desperate sexual curiosity at least twice (most famously during the eponymous pie incident), and strangely shows himself to be a father who at least partially understands. He actually makes the effort to talk to his son about that which a great many fathers find difficult. He tries to help make sense of it, and accepts his son's efforts for what they are. Simple as that.

What kind of a movie would we have had where Levy's character took each of these young men under the protective wing of his wisdom, and encouraged them not to give up their virginity for some silly, arbitrary date, or just because all of their peers are bragging about it? How about ditching the prom, which is centered on the women, and taking all four boys out for a game or a fishing trip, before they all go off to college?

Because that would defeat the purpose of the movie, which is not to contribute to or improve upon the raunchy teen sex comedy or any serious discussion about burgeoning manhood, but to exploit them so that the mooks will be more easily controlled by a government upon which the women in the film are going to depend. The empire will always be more attractive to these women than the individual man, especially when he can't find the hooks on her bra.

If this is what any woman reading this article thinks, then up yours. The way I was taunted in high school, as thankfully brief as those episodes were, and the ways in which others were taunted (to whose defense I never leapt, out of fear), are really not funny. It kills part of the mind, and I believe that this damage can be permanent. You have to ask yourself if Stephen King was saying anything about his own experiences when he had Carrie kill all of her classmates.

And I refuse to link to any part of that movie, either. Why do so many people – men and women – want to watch people die torturous deaths? You should also ask yourself why it is that the men who wrote, directed, and created "American Pie" moved so quickly off of every moment of humiliation for these young men. Did they not want to dwell on their own history of humiliation? Perhaps they should have. Then they would realize how unfunny it was. Humans don't like to dwell on pain, however. It feels like death. Alice Miller knew this, and she didn't care. She stood by her research no matter what. She should be a feminist icon, but they wouldn't listen to her, either.

It's much easier to ignore the hurt and pain, and find a scapegoat. It used to be blacks in this country; now it's "illegal" immigrants. It used to be Jews in Germany; now it's men, both Jew and gentile, everywhere.

This movie is almost thoroughly repulsive. Without Levy's awkward but intelligent father, it wouldn't be worth a damn. Straight guys made the cameras, film, lights, electrical chords, batteries, vans, trailers, paper, computers, printers, software, props, sets, landscaping, ideas, business deals, advertisements, and everything else with which this movie was made. When one of them, whom you find attractive, and with whom you would be more than willing to have sex, says, "Suck me, beautiful," what exactly is the problem? No, you don't owe him. Sure, you can wait for marriage. Yes, you can remain chaste if you want. Absolutely, you have the right to say, "No." Go ahead and giggle at his audacity. However, I happen to know for certain that most heterosexual women really, really like penises. And you drove with him out into the country late at night. Why did you do that? Are you lying to yourself about your motivations?

Chances are that you are indeed coercing the truth in your own mind, and you probably don't realize it, but that lie is killing something. This movie, for the most part, is one great big lie about straight guys. You are watching it, and it's killing them. Every day.

Ok all, the show is set to start in just about 20 minutes. A reminder here that there is a chat room available to registered followers of A Voice for Men Radio. I am also offering up the comment section here for your feedback, bad or good, suggestions and whatever else you might have to say.

The show looks to be good. It won't be perfect as we are learning our way around here, but I think you will enjoy nonetheless, and we will get better as we go along.

My last request of you is simple. When we open up the phone lines for you:

CALL THE SHOW

This is your chance to both give us a good start, and to tell anyone listening WHY you are an MRA. Don't be bashful (as though that is a concern), just dial it up and tell us your story.

SEE YOU THERE!

A Message for White Knights

March 3, 2011 | by barbarossaaaa | Link | Original Link

[dropcap]I [/dropcap]am glad that I put up my own video about the Lara Logan rape, because it gave me some valuable insight into the work that needs to be done in order to set men on the correct path to their own empowerment. The reactions revealed to me that many "MRA's" don't fully understand what the concept of gender war is all about and what it fully entails.

In the video I said that if I were to see a woman being raped I would continue on as if nothing ever happened. And I still stand by that statement without apology. I assert that I am 100% justified in this line of thought.

The fact that I said this must have triggered some innate male protector instinct in many MRA's that the rest of us who actually understand what gender war is all about eschewed a long time ago. Their main argument is that I'm promoting violence against the entire female gender by saying that I wouldn't risk my life to protect a woman from violence unless she was a member of my family.

I think the problem here is that maybe men have not yet started to consider that when women and society at large decided to burden men with the job of selflessly saving women from violence, that this was, in and of itself, an act of violence against the entire male sex.

[box type="download" icon="none"]The draft was an act of violence against the entire male sex.[/box]

The sexually selective rescue effort on the titanic was also an act of violence against the all men. And the expectation that it's a man's duty at great personal risk to his person and his life to save adult females from violence is an act of violence against men. All my ideas do is neutralize the violence that has been foisted upon men by advocating an act of non-violent, non action.

Refusing to defend women from violence is a non-action and therefore cannot be violent in any way, yet you have feminists and MRA's alike claiming that I advocate rape. You even have one feminist saying that for me to advocate non-action in regards to violence against women is an admission of rape; which is just another attempt to broaden the definition of rape, and another reason why men should refuse to offer defense to women.

MRA's whining about my stance are resorting to the same tired old white knight shaming tactics employed by their feminist sisters. And of course they add in, for good PC measure, as though that even applies.

These simpletons really are starting to tire me. Sure, not all women are fat lesbian man haters that pen scum manifestos on their free time. However, how many women have trapped men via child support and alimony; a form of legalized slavery? How many women are actively speaking out against this type of enslavement? If you were to ask the average woman on the street if she supports child support and alimony enforcement for women in divorce and custody disputes What do you think she'll say?

Most women are feminists by association and approval of feminist doctrine. They are feminists by proxy and any MRA that says otherwise has failed miserably at understanding the true nature of feminism.

Women have used their most desired biological asset (reproductive ability) to subjugate the men who naturally desire to perpetuate the human race. They have legislated their biological greed aggressively against men in order to use the state to demand more of the myriad of biological assets that men bring to the table, such as productivity, adaptability, ingenuity and most importantly the ability to defend the female collective.

They've used the tradeoff of outdated and breached social contracts to obligate us to defend them, while they either abort your reproductive payoff or use it to enslave you with child support, which we all is just a euphemism for woman support. The ability to defend the female collective is the only biological male quality that at least as of now the state cannot force us to engage in.(in the civilian sector at least).

Any true tactician will identify that as a chink in the armor and withhold that defense.

[quote float="right"]I'm gonna say it again. Men and women are in direct competition with each other.[/quote] It's a planned non aggressive sanction that simultaneously empowers men, and places the responsibility on women's defense right where it should be, on women. I don't want to hear MRA's whining about honor and principle. We're fighting the gender war because of honor and principle, we should be intelligent enough to realize that people are going to choose very carefully about who they are to going stick their necks out for, and I can guarantee you that the vast majority of women will not risk their own personal safety to stop violence towards men in any way.

IF you're an MRA, act like one. Identify with us and our needs, not feminists and not women. And try to attain a level of awareness higher than the utopian REM sleep that you've been living in if you think that men and women aren't at war with each other.

Men and women are in direct competition with each other. I'm gonna say it again Men and women are in direct competition with each other. We are competing for resources healthcare education our children, our money our legal equality and our freedom. And yes, women are doing this of their own volition.

Some MRA's ask, "Well, isn't the state the real enemy? Women are being manipulated also they suffer from feminism as well." My response to that if it weren't for the need to explain this as best I can, would be who cares whether or not women are victims? This is a men's movement, so we will concern ourselves with men's issues period. This isn't some fantasy reality where men and women are going to get together to sing Kumbaya and pretend that feminism never existed. Once again women have acted against men as a collective for the better part of sixty years.

[quote float="left"]Don't give me that "It's not about saving women it's about honor," bullshit. Women haven't acted honorably for almost three times longer than I've been alive. Fuck that. [/quote] Let's further explore this "women are victims too," pussy pass mentality that a lot of so called MRA's have. Now I use the example of a pit bull and its master. If he sick's his pit bull on you and you have a gun in your hand, will you then use that gun against the pit bull even though its only flowing the wishes of its master? Does the fact that the pit bull cannot comprehend what it is doing make the pit bull any less of a danger to you?This example only partly illustrates what's going on in the gender war between men women and the state.

The pit bull was blindly following an order from its master; it's a pawn, a tool incapable of reasoning. Women, however, were given the tools with which to attack men, and they possess all the powers of reasoning of a fully functional adult human being. In the last scenario the pit bull was a tool that the master used with malicious intent, whereas women were given the tools with which to attack men and left to their own devices.

They willingly chose to attack men. They actively sought and lobbied for laws that made it easier to attack men and harder for men to defend themselves. They, since the very beginning of modern feminism, have acted not as innocent pawns that where manipulated into committing acts of evil, but as willing collaborators that used the promise of preferential treatment from the state over men as a means of attacking them.

So my question is when exactly will men fight back and why exactly does the mere suggestion of ending our part of the already defunct social contract, by placing the responsibility of women's safety on the shoulders of women, lead inexorably to a disingenuous and thoroughly disgusting marathon of white knighting on the part of self-professed MRA's?

Why are MRA's calling for obligatory male defense provisions for women?

Don't give me that "it's not about saving women it's about honor," bullshit. Women haven't acted honorably for almost three times longer than I've been alive. Fuck that. Take that apathetic, traitorous garbage somewhere else. Like my fellow MRA Richard Rich said, "The MRM isn't some sanctimonious justice league. MRA's don't have the right to interject their selective gender based morality into this movement. We're focusing purely on men's issues, men's rights and the empowerment of men. How exactly will telling men to risk their lives to save women from violence help to achieve this?

And in a society where men are still going to be considered rapists no matter what we do, there is no reason to help a woman out of a violent situation up to and including rape. These are the harsh realities of the gender war.

We will not give economic opportunities to women we will not hire them to any jobs. We will reserve that position for a qualified and competent man to combat discriminatory affirmative action laws against men. We will never spend money on relationships with women. We will reinvest that money into our own individual male interests. We will assess the weak points in the relationships between women and the state and we will exploit them in the fight against corrupt females and the state.

Now are there women that have earned the right to call themselves men's rights activists and advocates? Sure, women like Erin Pizzey come to mind. But it's time we start fighting fire with fire. And women like Pizzey are already there holding the torches. A group of people that insist on the defense of another group of people that have attacked them mercilessly for decades are not acting honorably – they are acting stupidly.

Feminist Workplace Myths

March 3, 2011 | by Elder Swami | Link | Original Link

It’s all over the media. It’s on the news and in our favorite sitcoms. Men are just useless, and it’s backed by “research.” Women’s groups have made the prediction that today’s post industrial workplace is suited to a woman´s capabilities and they will soon leave men in the dust. The idea is based on the belief that the skills of multi tasking, interpersonal relations and communication are becoming increasingly more relevant today, and the typically masculine skills (consisting of little more than base physical strength) will soon no longer be needed.

The question is how relevant are these supposedly female skills today and how proficient at them is the average woman?

Multi Tasking

Women like Hanna Rosin hold strong to the belief that they have an edge in the workplace over men because of their superior ability to multitask.

However, the management theory that fueled the industrial revolution, and is still in use today, is the idea of division of labor. It is the very simple idea that people are more productive within a company when they perform a single task or operation within the organization. If this is still how companies operate, then it seems there would be very little to no need to multi task at all. If your role is that of an accountant that is all you do, all your energy is focused on fulfilling that job and doing it well.

And to those who may say “but women are so good at multitasking they can fulfill the duties of two men, since being a stay at home mum is equivalent to two full time jobs,”

You’re wrong.

Psychological experiments have shown that multitasking is not viable (for males and females) when fulfilling tasks that require even low levels of concentration (Gladstones, Regan & Lee 1989) (Pashler 1994). In general, these studies have disclosed that people show severe interference when even very simple tasks are performed at the same time, if both tasks require selecting and producing action (Gladstones, Regan & Lee 1989).

Multi tasking it seems is something that a person is only capable of doing when the tasks are menial. Any highly skilled job or operation requires absolute concentration on the task at hand. This is why a surgeon does not take the time to answer his phone during heart surgery. If you want something done well you give it your full and undivided attention; it’s that simple.

Multi tasking is not the way of the future and is actually becoming less important as jobs become increasingly more specialized. So, ladies, your ability to watch TV while talking on the phone to your girlfriend is not going to make you the next Bill Gates.

Interpersonal skills/Customer Service

Another increasingly held belief is that a woman’s interpersonal skills give her an edge not only in her relation with fellow workmates but in her relations with customers and clients. This belief is practiced unashamedly by many companies such as Nestle Australia who proudly display an all female customer service team on their website.

However my personal experience with female customer service has been far less than pleasant. I remember walking into a travel agency in order to inquire about ticket prices. There were only three travel agents in the room, all of them were female and all of them (this may sound like a sexist stereotype lol) were in the middle of what looked like a great conversation. They were leaning over their highly decorated desks smiling and giggling with each other. None of them however acknowledged that I had entered the room.

I waited for what was at least a minute until I decided to politely speak up. “Excuse me; I was wondering if I could get some help?” My polite question was not received in the way I had expected, the one who seemed to be the manager turned to me and just glared. I was shocked. After a long awkward silence she grudgingly decided that she should probably serve me.

I have many more experiences like this one, and the idea that female customer service is less than perfect is a theory that I developed long before I became familiar with the men’s movement.

I discovered a theory that supported this idea of mine when reading the book Society Against Itself, by Dr. Howard Schwartz. This book explains how political correctness is the overvaluing of the maternal ideas of equal love and nurturing, and is therefore based on ideals that are primarily female. He also explains that external demands of reality such as work, achievement and rational order are seen as an enemy to these feminine ideas (“Bringing forth the narcissism of the infant, I experience everything as if it is about me. If it is not for me it is against me.”)

Therefore the demands made of many women by an organization are seen as something being imposed upon them, they are seen as something bad. And the demands made by customers (the external) are also seen as an imposition that is taking happiness away from them wrongfully. This leads to the work relationships of the female to being seen as a great inconvenience and something they rightfully despise. This is why the woman behind the counter will treat you like an annoying turd that she can´t get rid of quick enough.

I suggest that women generally hate work more than men hate work, (that’s why they work less, prefer to work part time, have kids or just not do anything at all) and this hate for the demands of work is reflected in their interpersonal behaviors with clients and superiors that place demands on them.

Communication

The idea that females are more effective communicators is widely held and accepted as absolute truth. It is based on research showing that females speak nearly twice as much as men and are good at reading body language. I believe these finding to be legitimate, but the question is how relevant are these skills in most workplaces?

Why not try and answer this question on your own, ask yourself this….have you ever asked a female for directions? Or have you ever tried to ask a woman to explain something technical? If you have you'll understand what I mean. Just because someone talks more doesn't mean they are good communicators.

Once again quality over quantity.

The following is taken from a business website that explains communication differences in men and women in the workplace:

"Women are more likely to talk to other women when they have a problem or need to make a decision. Men keep their problems to themselves and don't see the point in sharing personal issues."

"Women are more relationship oriented, and look for commonalities and ways to connect with other women. Men tend to relate to other men on a one-up, one-down basis. Status and dominance is important."

"Women focus on building rapport, by sharing experiences and asking questions.
Men like to tell and give information rather than ask questions. They share experiences as a way of being one-up."

"If women have a disagreement with each other it affects all aspects of their relationship.
Men can have a disagreement, move on to another subject and go get a drink together."

"Women get things done at work by building relationships. Men build relationships while they are working on tasks with each other."

"At meetings women nod their head to show they are listening. Men think the woman is agreeing with them. He then assumes the women will go along with his idea. He is surprised when she later disagrees, since she nodded her head. She has no idea why he thought she agreed with him since he never asked her."

"At meetings, men only nod their heads when they agree. If a woman is speaking and she doesn't see his head nod as he listens, she assumes he either disagrees or is not listening."

This article was intended to point out the differences between the way men and women communicate and then celebrate these differences. However I found it only revealed the flaws in female communication skills and workplace attitudes (It also portrayed men as being extremely competitive but let's not kid ourselves the workplace is competitive and competition is what has driven our civilization to where it is today).

What I got from this article is that when males communicate in the workplace they are: Impersonal, aware of their role and place, concise and fact oriented, unemotional, efficient, clear, and aware that work should be kept separate from their private life.

Whereas when females communicate in the workplace they: are emotional, are not aware of their place, are touchy and take things personally, do not separate work from private life, are not task oriented, and waste time with friends.

After reading this, which set of skills and attitudes seem the most effective in a work environment? Who would you hire and entrust with your business?….your money?…..your lively hood? I just know that I wouldn´t like to pay someone to socialize and share personal feelings when they are supposed to be working.

It may be true that Women have very effective communication skills, however, these skills are more suited to social life than professional life.

Finally, men have and always will be an invaluable asset to our civilization. We have an ability to adapt, innovate and create that is unmatched, and even after 50 years of affirmative action men still hold the majority of the best jobs. Men also fulfill the most difficult and dangerous jobs that keep society moving and keep us safe (and feminist ask why we get paid more).

The problem is that society and men themselves only measure a man's self worth in terms of their employment achievement (how much they earn how competent/important they are). This is particularly bad when men's work abilities are undervalued and in the name of political correctness they are oppressed (example: Ford Motor company did not allow the promotion of white males for an entire year in the name of equality).

Is there any wonder why the male suicide rate is so high, when we have turned our back on the men who sacrifice so much in order to sustain it?

Uncle Bern Endorses AVfM Radio

Two Movies, Eight Straight Men: Part II

March 5, 2011 | by B.R. Merrick | Link | Original Link

Part I eviscerated a movie that spent a great deal of its time eviscerating whatever's left of manhood in our culture. Part II is a celebration of some spark of manliness left amidst the detritus brought about by the embrace, on the part of our culture, of the "mook" as it is displayed in "American Pie."

The mook, if you will remember, is a slovenly, goofy, slightly less intelligent, highly sexualized, heterosexual, young, American male. This, in general, is the culture's perception of modern manhood, something they mistakenly believe is no longer necessary since even poor Americans now have dishwashers. Also if you remember, it is an insult.

There is mook behavior aplenty in "The 40 Year Old Virgin," but it is neither condoned nor excused. The same goes for the "midriffs" (the female equivalent of a mook) that are displayed. If you ever make the effort of watching this equally raunchy sex comedy all the way through to the end, you will see at least one man and one woman who are willing to take their feelings for each other seriously while abandoning any notion of our corporate-feminized entertainment industry's ideas about mooks and midriffs. Not only that, but even the "mookiness" of the straight men in this film should be considered secondary to the valuable information one can glean about male-male platonic relationships.

There are certainly moments when the other three main male characters act like mooks. One guy gets drunk at work and moons everyone with a video camera (simultaneously visible on every TV screen in the store). Another guy is cheating on his wife and enlisting the help of the other guys in keeping up the charade. A third guy (my favorite), in an especially nasty-but-funny moment, confesses to crossing the border from southern California to watch a woman get busy with a horse in Tijuana: "To be honest I just felt bad for her, we all just felt bad for her… I kinda felt bad for the horse."

But there's another angle to consider. Each of these men is holding down a job. Underneath the tough exterior and all the foul-mouthed insults are men who obviously like and care about each other. In the end, all four men have found a soul mate, but not just that: Each of the women with whom they end up has her own obvious faults and flaws.

Women are shown getting drunk, driving while drunk, puking, and turning off the main character (played by Steve Carell) big time in numerous other ways. The nicer women are far from domineering or demanding. Emotionally, they are fully expressive, hurt about their faults, but still eager for their men. One of them has a jaded, cynical teenaged daughter who herself is a virgin, and in this regard, Carell's character takes the helm as a father figure, encouraging her to wait. Why? Well, just because. Perhaps his explanation is insufficient, but it is not forced on her. How ready for sex can a young woman be who has yet to get a job or ever pay rent? Beyond that, he even has the audacity to open up with his own feelings about his own situation. Imagine that: a man who is concerned platonically with a woman's feelings but stands his ground. Huh.

As for the eponymous virginity, I am loathe to give away the ending, but it turns out that the whole exercise in getting Carell to "lose it" proves useless. All he needed was encouragement to pursue the lovely Catherine Keener and that's that. He didn't need to become a mook, a ladies' man, or a player at all. He just needed to be honest with himself and others as to who he was and how things worked for him. (And in spite of my disagreements with James Bowman's review, I find that I must once again point readers in his direction, because his take on this film, which he gave no stars, is highly significant. Based on his ratings system, I would probably give it one star out of two.)

The most important aspects of this film, as far as I'm concerned, have to do with what the movie says about men in general. The first thing you see (in the unrated version, anyway) is Carell's hardon pitching a tent in his boxer shorts. Done for laughs, certainly, but men have always joked about morning wood. Beyond that, it's a fact of life. A man has erections when he dreams, whether the dreams are erotic or not. When he wakes up in the middle of a dream, there it is. How interesting it is that Carell's character, fully aware of his sprouting morning glory, simply isn't interested in taking care of it. Again, imagine that: a man who desires to use his sex organs solely with a woman in whom he is genuinely interested. Huh. And no woman needed to tell him that. Huh times ten.

You are slowly introduced to a man who expresses, most of it unspoken, a desire to hang out with the guys, to be accepted. He does what most men do who find themselves comfortably ensconced in a decent job: He puts the desire for camaraderie away until an appropriate excuse comes along. The excuse is a poker game with the other three main characters, which gets the ball rolling on their mistaken ideas about how to help him lose his virginity, but also leads to solid friendships.

After the revelation, Carell is subjected to their seemingly unrelenting friendship. The store mooner shows up with a box load of old porn and refuses to take it back. He engages in the typical straight-boy teasing, walking out of the apartment after dumping the box there, exclaiming loud enough for the neighbors, "Andy for the last time, I don't want your giant box of pornography!" The relentless teasing and joshing doesn't end there.

It doesn't even begin there. Early on in the film, two salesmen at the store engage in a brutal verbal confrontation, calling each other nasty, dirty names before a sudden brotherly embrace. This is standard operating procedure for straight men. It is not something normally understood by women or even by gay men. My own record in this regard is poor at best. There have been numerous times in my life where this sort of joking around was taken the wrong way due to my overly sensitive nature and the confusing ways in which I was genuinely picked on from time to time. To sum up for the uninitiated, when this sort of teasing takes place, what the straight boy is actually saying is, "Hi, my name's _____ and I want to get to know you better." Maybe he's saying it because there's nobody else around to relate to (like when Carell's character is invited to play cards), or maybe it's because he's genuinely intrigued by your personality. Either way, no offense is ever intended.

That goes double for the part of the film that seems to disparage gay men. Two of these guys get into a conversation where they try to assert the other guy's alleged homosexuality:

"Okay. You wanna know how I know you're gay?"

"How am I gay?"

"You've seen 'Rent' three times."

"You know, appreciating music and dance and doing guys in the ass is not the same thing, I just wanted you to know that."

"Yeah, but all three of those things comprise the musical 'Rent'."

What a hardcore, committed gay activist will never understand is that for the majority of modern-day straight men, it will never be otherwise when they know they are amongst their own kind. It has nothing to do with "homophobia" (a made-up political term) or what I would call anti-gay sentiment. It has everything to do with cutting down another man's facade purely for sport, and only because it is understood that if offense is actually taken, these men know full well that the initiator of the exchange will then say, "Geez, dude! I was only kidding!"

This is why feminism will never achieve equality: They demanded entry into a male-dominated workforce that was created, designed, maintained, debated, defended, embraced, and enjoyed by men. Since the vast majority of men are straight, this is how many of them act around each other. (The main female employee at the store, played by another of Christopher Guest's alumni, the fantastically funny Jane Lynch, gets it, and simply shrugs it all off.) Believe it or not, gay guys in close confidence have their own version of this sort of conversation. Peruse some of my articles at "Strike The Root" to see the difference between writing for a general audience and writing specifically for men at "A Voice for Rapists Men". Not nearly as much locker room language at the former, much more sex-neutral website. So these women finally get their coveted-yet-lame jobs in the American workforce, and lo and behold, they discover that men behave differently at work:

"Homo."

"Yo, jerk-off, when's this shipment due?"

"Yeah, kiss my ass, buddy… Hey, we still going out for drinks?"

I can't speak for women, but I get the idea that they do not wish to be spoken to in this manner, not even in the exclusive company of other women. So now the workplace has to change. At the point of a gun:

"Hey, honey, what's shakin'? How's Jeff?"

"How dare you call me 'honey'! Shame on you!"

"Geez, lady! I was only kidding!"

This is how men are, and that's not going to change. You can't change it with laws, shame, demonization, sexual boycotts, threats, intimidation, indoctrination from inferior films like "American Pie," or anything else. You can get men to suppress it in the workplace, but once they're in the locker room, it's "Screw you, man!" This movie is basically showing you how men are when they get to be men with each other. Warts and all. Mistaken ideas and whatnot. It may not be much. It may not come close to what Bowman laments the loss of. But it's sure as helluva a lot better than "American Pie" and its gross misrepresentations of manhood and sexuality. It's also very funny.

And there's life in it. When a man is able to express himself openly and be accepted, he grows a full inch taller. When a man can platonically embrace a relationship with a man who's different, he learns valuable things. When a man is accepted by an attractive woman for exactly who he is, he's ecstatic. When he ejaculates, he's finished. For a while. Then the cycle of life-giving, life-creating, and life-affirming inherent in a man's body and mind starts again, oftentimes with morning wood. Any movie that understands this about manhood gets my vote. Even when it jokes about sex with horses.

B.R. Merrick writes for "Strike The Root" and "A Voice for Men," lives in the Northeast, is proud to be a classical music reviewer at Amazon.com and iTunes, and in spite of the poisonous nature of television, God Himself will have to pry his DVDs of "Monty Python's Flying Circus" out of his cold, dead hands, under threat of eternal damnation.

As a self-identified MRA, I encounter a lot of argument based in formal logical fallacy. It’s sharpened my rhetorical skills, particularly in the detection and debunking of arguments formed around formal logical fallacies. If you’re a men’s rights advocate, or you’ve argued with detractors of men’s rights, then this sharpening of skills is probably true of you as well.

An ad hominem argument is the attack on the speaker rather than the points of the argument. The major unstated assumption is the formation of argument with an implied acceptance of an unmentioned false premise. The appeal to authority, to force, and to emotion are all examples of logical fallacy.

One of the major arguments between the men’s rights movement and radical as well as gender feminism is the claim by feminists that women are now, or have at any period in recent history, been oppressed.

The power of, and near universal use by women of one particular logical fallacy, provided in context, explodes this idea. To supply the context necessary to grasp this, an awareness of hypergamy is useful.

Hypergamy [1] is the practice and custom among women of marrying upwards. It is the tendency of women to seek male partners who earn more than they do, or have a higher social status than they do.

The phenomenon complimenting this is males marrying socially or economically downward. Men do this as a means of reducing the probability that their spouses will cheat on them. As much as men and women may claim that marriage is a social institution built on love, or on god, the reality is that a marriage serves the same purpose as a business contract. Marriage, and every derived relationship, including boyfriend-girlfriend and romantically involved cohabitants, are about distributing wealth and other resources within the partnership between a man and a woman. It is not an accident that even with a real imbalance favoring men in lifetime earnings, it is women who spend 65% of disposable income [2], a number predicted to rise to 72% by 2028.

Women cheating on men within this framework can be better understood as defrauding their business partners of funds and resources from the partnership.

Women, speaking from a biological perspective have the natural advantage in this, in that women are now, and have always been the sexual selectors of the human race. Men by contrast are the competitors for sexual access to women who select from the competitors. Selection – meaning the propagation of genes. Failure for men in this competition means the extinction of their genetic line.

In any civil society in which brute force is not the absolute rule, this selecting power places women in control over sex, and thereby, in control over men; something everybody knows at the instinctive level.

This is why public social ostracism of a man, by a woman, is so powerfully devastating. We're tapping into reproductive survival instincts that predate Neolithic culture.

I mentioned that men and women understand this dynamic of reproductive selection on an instinctive level. That is why the use, by women of a particular formal logical fallacy destroys the notion of women's oppression, or patriarchy, or the fallacy of women's lesser status within society.

If a woman is displeased with a man, or wishes to control his behavior through shame and fear, or is just in a disagreeable mood for no good reason, she will call him a "creep." This is a universally popular tool of rhetoric used against men, by women. Some men will also use this – but when they do, it's almost always in support, or anticipation of female condemnation of the target.

It is, of course, a formal logical fallacy. It's the ad-hominem argument. And it's used, even by rhetorically skilled females who would ordinarily be subject to ridicule for deliberate use of logical fallacy in argument over any point of philosophical disagreement.

It's a unique and special ad hominem attack, in that it doesn't actually have any distinct meaning, other than something along the lines of: "Man who I now condemn".

Arguably, the worst thing a woman can say to a man, short of false accusations of rape, battery, molestation or sexual harassment, is the word creep.

Now in the past I've made the argument that in debate, anybody who repeatedly falls to the tactic of formal logical fallacy can and should be denied further attention or consideration. In using logical fallacy in argumentation an individual is actually pointing out that they have no creditable argument or leg to stand on. They're implicitly admitting that their point of view is irrational, and should be ignored.

For individuals using the ad hominem attack of the word creep, this is no different, and further consideration of their expressed point of view is unjustified, until or unless they demonstrate a pattern of discussion eschewing continued reliance of logical fallacy.

That the word creep continues to be the go-to tool to marginalize any man's point of view illustrates the social power society grants women and the exception from adherence to civil discourse we all indulge in. If you can repeatedly get away with use of such an obvious formal logical fallacy, then you do sit on a pedestal of privilege.

People sometimes like to make things complicated, and I sometimes find that their motive in avoiding simplicity is to avoid realizing, or thinking about, something which they find mentally indigestible.

Consider, for example, the matter of rape. Rape is a complicated subject, and yet . . . in certain connections it is very simple. I would like to enlarge upon that, but first I should point out that it is customary to insert a pious disclaimer in dicey discussions like the one to follow—reassuring everybody that rape is a terrible, terrible crime, and that one would never excuse or condone it. I say this is customary. However, it is a custom I will ignore. I have never in my life stated that rape is permissible, and if you impute such an opinion to me, and broadcast your imputation under color of fact, then you are guilty of libel or slander.

Nor am I morally obligated to prove how sensitive I am. Sensitivity is very well in its season, but other qualities too, have their season. And in the present case, my emotional posture toward rape simply does not matter. Whether I praise or condemn it, or view it in any emotional context at all, is simply not germane to the points I am raising.

Very well. Rape as a social issue is presently unsettled. It is in flux; you might say it is "swirling". And in the unsettled flux of popular discussion on blogs, web forums and the like, the talk swirls around mere description or mere definition of what might happen in hypothetical rape cases, while shunting aside the unforgiving existential question of what truly DOES happen in actual cases.

They argue back and forth about questions, definitions and possible scenarios: Is date rape really rape? Is marital rape really rape? What percentage of rapes go unreported? What percentage of women get raped in their lifetimes? What is or isn't 'consent'? And ought she know better than attend a party where horny frat boys are present? And if she dresses provocatively, does she deserve it? And if she goes back to his room with him, does that mean she wants it? And what if she happens to be drunk? And what if HE happens to be drunk? And what about this . . and what about that? Flibberty-jibberty-jibberty!

No, it does not interest me to quibble over the infinite shades of grey which separate consent from non-consent, or to waste much time on mere hypotheticals when the material point does not require them. I confess that I am unspeakably jaded by such meandering, involuted blab sessions, and I believe I am doing certain people an enormous favor when I graciously consent to fry my brain with their tedious, boring, repetitive, hand-wringing drivel— which goes nowhere but 'round and 'round the mulberry bush, and appears to serve no purpose but to evade the real issue.

If there were any point or profit to such talk, I would sing a different tune, but as matters stand, such windy exercises fascinate me in just the same way that counting angels on pinheads would fascinate me, and I have no patience with the countless pinheads who natter ad nauseamabout such things. In the end, most of it is bullshit.

And why? Because: in the real world, all of this eventually funnels down to the simple, timeless, bedrock questions of arrest, prosecution, trial, conviction, and most of all the jurisprudential and adjudicatory principles which govern these things at their various stages of operation. What are the facts, how do we even know, and can we ever truly know?

Know then, that the majority of rape cases are by their nature unprosecutable. Such is my considered assessment. When you point your finger at somebody and say, "he did such-and-so", you need to prove it. For it is the easiest thing in the world to point your finger and accuse:anybody can do this to anybody, anywhere, at any time. But that does not mean that anybody may send anybody to prison simply by pointing a finger. If you aim to accomplish such a thing, the criminal justice system (at least in theory) makes you work for it by means of a little device called "standards of evidence."

So let us consider the crime of rape. Yes, rape is a felony under law—I do not dispute this.

First, consider that most people are publicity-shy about two activities: 1.) sexual intercourse, and 2.) the commission of crime. In neither of these activities will the average man or woman invite witnesses—these are distinctly private activities. So, rape packs two-for-one because it is both sexual intercourse, and a crime. Briefly, it is a sex crime, and I can assert with confidence that almost no rapist wants to be seen raping. Therefore, the great majority of rape cases have no witnesses apart from the plaintiff and the defendant.

In addition, a somewhat smaller, but still quite large number of rape cases, have no forensic evidence suggesting that the alleged intercourse fits the legal definition of rape, i.e. that it was non-consensual.

Finally, under today's lax standards, a fair number of rape cases lack forensic evidence of any kind — due to the elapsed time from when the rape allegedly occurred, to when the plaintiff filed a police report.

So that is why most rape cases are (in this writer's opinion) inherently unprosecutable: because they amount to little more than her pointing a finger at him without any positive, indisputable, corroborative evidence that a crime was in fact committed. This state of affairs is commonly known as a "he said-she said".

"Rape is an accusation easily to be made, hard to be proved, and harder yet to be defended by the party accused, tho' never so innocent".

Yes, it is hard to think of a crime which is more difficult to prove than rape. And in saying this, I am saying nothing new. But I say it anyway, because the simple lesson it ought to teach us remains so stubbornly undigested. People cannot or will not learn, because they insist on making it complicated.

I have a modest proposal that would save a lot of time and taxpayer money. Why don't we eliminate all police work and all criminal justice procedure from the rape question by simply holding a lottery? Every male above a certain age would have his name thrown into the lottery pool, and once a year a certain number would be drawn from this pool. The lucky winners would be charged with rape sight unseen, and dispatched straightway to the penitentiary for a predetermined number of years. From this there would be no appeal.

But seriously: the system of rape prosecution that we've presently got, is in a moral and practical sense indistinguishable from the lottery system I have described. And if certain legal innovations go through, this will become even more the case.

Lowering the standard of evidence weaves the net tighter, giving it a smaller mesh. Reversing the burden of proof (if instituted) will augment this effect. These factors can generate more guilty verdicts (hence more convictions), but they can do nothing to differentiate the guilty from the innocent. In fact, the system is not meant to assay guilt or innocence: it is meant to get convictions in conformity to feminism's judicial worldview.

And feminism's judicial worldview is collectivistic. Women-as-a class have been violated by men-as-a-class; such is the feminist narrative. Therefore men-as a-class must pay the penalty as a class. This means that a certain percentage of the class "men" must be sacrificed to meet the requirements of feminist justice—and it doesn't matter who these men actually are or what they've actually done. Male blood is what's wanted and, men being collectively guilty, this may flow in an undifferentiated river from any or all male sources irrespectively. Such is feminism's judicial worldview.

Retribution for collective male guilt is feminism's shadow subtext,meaning that it stays in the shade. So as you might expect, only a few brash individuals at unguarded moments will admit what is happening. Now, in most rape cases, the lack of third-witness corroboration or conclusive forensic evidence makes it well-nigh impossible to ascertain guilt or innocence with any certainty — so the practice is, to railroad the defendant. All the same, a charade of justice must be kept in place, and so the rape lottery is dressed in black robes and procedural frills.

And that is why the only thing which matters is the existentialpositionality of the innocent defendant — his particular Golgotha. He is not "men" in some abstract cloudy way. No, he is a man: a living, breathing, sentient creature who has done no crime, and yet he is being destroyed. And his well-being is of interest to me because his case could be my own, or that of any other man. A feminist does not care about the suffering of men. As the saying goes, "sure, men can suffer, but they cannot be oppressed." In other words, your suffering is of no account to a feminist because you are not "oppressed"—and the distinction between suffering and oppression is, I have been assured, mighty critical!

So, the innocent rape defendant is not oppressed when he is railroaded into prison. Got that? But consistent with the feminist dictum, I am permitted to say that he suffers. And since the feminists do not care about this innocent man's suffering, then I reckon I must take up the slack. In fact, I must do double duty along that line, and re-budget my capacity for caring by redistributing it away from focal points where it might otherwise be applied.

All right. To those who insist on making things complicated, consider that it does not matter to the innocent rape defendant how many rapes go unreported. Nor does it matter how many women get raped in their lifetimes. That information has no bearing at all upon the facts of his particular case. None. Whether it be ten unreported rapes per year, or ten thousand, sheds no light whatever upon his own guilt or innocence in the matter under adjudication. None. And whether ten women get raped during their lifetimes, or all of them do, similarly sheds no light. None. Granted that to the feminist mind, imbued with a collectivistic worldview that seeks retribution, such apparently peripheral data hold a key importance. But to anybody else such data are, as said, peripheral.

As to the matter of consent: if no corroboration is available this becomes, if not peripheral, then at best immaterial. This is where the question of what is or isn't consent becomes nearly fruitless if not entirely so. One may certainly avow in principle that consent ought to be given, and that "no means no". This is easy in classroom discussions or internet bull sessions. But when actual guilt or innocence are at stake in a real life rape trial, and you have only her word against his, then it makes not a damned bit of difference how you gerrymander the line between consent or non-consent. All that matters is to know who is telling the truth. And if you are a feminist, you will say the woman is telling the truth because you cannot afford to say otherwise. As a feminist, you have a confessional interest in upholding the thesis that "women don't lie about rape".

Yet evidence is now to hand, and abundantly so, that women can and do lie about rape and are far from being delicate blossoms in that line of work! This evidence is piling up like stacks of lumber in a warehouse, and the warehouse is getting full. We need to build another one! And if you would persist in telling me that women don't lie about rape, then you would be living in a bubble of cognitive dissonance that could be warrantably termed neurosis.

So let us be deadly clear about what is happening. Innocent men are being torn to pieces, and ANY man might, in principle, live at the mercy of a lying woman. Our civilization has seen fit to bestow such power upon women and such hatred upon men, and the ideological movement called feminism has been the prime instigator in bringing this about. That is the simple, ugly, indigestible truth which lies at the bottom of all the complicated palaver about definitions and hypothetical scenarios. And it is a truth which, by the look of it, our civilization does not want to face honestly and squarely. Feminists certainly do not want to face it; that is no surprise. The surprise is, that large numbers of anti-feminists too would rather dance around with things which are not critical or central. They might be lazy, they might be ignorant, or they might be unconsciously blocking something they find mentally indigestible. I don't much care; I am bloody tired of it.

Innocent souls are being cast upon a sacrificial bonfire. This, as we are instructed to conclude, is not oppression—and I'm sure it is a great semantic comfort for certain men to be told that their suffering is not oppression. Still, it is a sacrifice. A holocaust, if you will. A holocaust of the innocent under color of the judicial. A war on rape is underway, and the powers-that-be figure it is acceptable to make the innocent suffer right along with the guilty, and guess what. . ? They are pondering how to turn the heat up even more!

We must consider, that there might be NO solution to the problem of rape—or at least none that would satisfy a feminist. That is harsh to think about, but what if it's true? Rape could very well end up being one of those god-damned things that we can't do ANYTHING about—or at least nothing that a feminist would find mentally digestible. But did anybody ever tell you that the universe was fair? Naturally, I would be interested to meet the wizard genius (be this man or woman) who can devise a surefire way to INFALLIBLY catch the guilty party in every case, and onlythe guilty party. I await that day, but I am not holding my breath.

Meanwhile, unless you consider the judicial holocaust of the innocent to be acceptable damage in the war on rape, then I would seriously question whether practical solutions in this domain are realistically (read: humanely and equitably) within reach.

Yes: the judicial holocaust of the innocent. I do not feel that "holocaust" is too strong a word for what is happening here. Just try telling the victim of such abominations that he has NOT been thrown upon a sacrificial fire. That is one meaning of holocaust: a sacrificial fire. And too, a fire whichburns up everything. The holocaust of the innocent is a sacrificial fire upon which any and every innocent man might be thrown: in principle, no man is exempt. The guilty, you would say, deserve it—so accordingly,they are not the sacrifice. It is the innocent who are sacrificed, and no innocent man is secure from the reach of those flames—certainly the law affords no protection.

And the inferno spreads, engulfing more and more of the surrounding world—for as befits a holocaust, it is holistic and caustic. The suffering of the innocent is only the beginning, and what happens to them does not happen in a vacuum. Therefore, what happens to them does not stop with them. We must equally consider the fallout upon society. We must consider the ramifications, branching far and wide in all directions, eating deeper and deeper into the social fabric, both holistically and caustically.

Yes: the judicial holocaust of the innocent. That has a ring to it—a ring of truth, I daresay! It is perilous stuff, this incineration of innocent souls under color of law. It is, mark my words, a fire that shall burn us all; a deadly flashpoint that could, in the fullness of time, ignite a deadly social war. And I do mean war; the kind where real blood flows. Literally. Would that be "holocaustic" enough for you? Or would you rather be a holocaust denier?

Oh very well, go back to sleep. I am sorry to have troubled you.

Time to Piss Off a Few Brothers

By Paul Elam

We have a fine line to walk here sometimes and I will be the first to admit that I lack the wisdom to know the right answer to every situation. But whether I have that wisdom or not, I still have the responsibility for this site and for the investment made by so many people in what is happening here.

That being said, I am in all likelihood going to piss a couple of people off with this post. Thankfully I am pretty sure it will only be a couple.

Let me put this in my typical tactless fashion.

The woman bashing that has been on the rise in comments has to stop.

Here's the deal guys. I have asserted from the beginning that this site will never shy from exploring the dark side of the modern feminine psyche. I do that with what I think is an abandon that sometimes pushes the envelope. I invite anyone to do more of the same.

But here's the other deal. There is a difference between open and thoughtful analysis and gratuitous insults that serve no instructive or intellectual purpose. At least there is a difference to me, and as arrogant as it might sound that is still what matters here. My name is on all this stuff.

Let me say publicly something I know I have said before. Much of the work that I have been able to take the time for in this cause over the past several years is directly due to a woman carrying extra burdens so I could do so. It has resulted in a far less than extravagant standard of living.

I also look at the offerings on these pages by the likes of Dr. Tara Palmatier, Uma Challa, Izzey, Hestia and Jessica Wilcox and I am thankful as hell for what they do. I feel certain of one thing that will give us even more momentum is women of good conscious who stand beside us, taking the same insults and derogation that we do, in order to further the truth, for us, and for the son's of our culture.

I ask everyone respectfully to consider that while posting. I do not discount the pain and anger of the men who visit here. But neither do I support the use of that pain to extract revenge on the innocent.

I want to support as much free speech as I can, but I also refuse to become a hypocrite by condemning misandry while providing an environment where it is open season on anyone who happens to be female.

Counting Down Till Tuesday…Again

[box type=”note” style=”rounded” border=”full” icon=”none”]

First, let me offer up another sincere thank you to everyone who made the first broadcast of A Voice for Men Radio by all measures, a complete success. The show went well, both Keyster and I learned some lessons, and we are prepared to make the show even better as we go along.

Apparently, though, we did pretty well for a first effort. Angry Harry had the following to say on his website after he listened to the first broadcast:

In the old days of this website, I used to talk a great deal about the importance of creating and deploying ‘cognitive cluster bombs’ to destroy feminism; i.e. memes that were so powerful that they would inevitably spread and, eventually, explode in the faces of feminists and those who supported them.

And I, myself, have spent a long time now trying to construct such cognitive cluster bombs – which I mostly deliver via this website.

But not exclusively!

Well, I think that Paul Elam has probably just launched a cognitive nuclear weapon with his radio show.

It’s that good.

And I think that its impact is going to be huge.

Allow me to gloat for a moment, while hopefully remembering that I far from did this alone. Thing is, I have never made a secret of the fact that I regard Harry with such positive feeling that it borders on worship. And I want to say now that having that kind of review from the man literally means more to be by far than would a Peabody Award.

OK, Paul, enough bragging, now earn your keep!

Show two is now less than 48 hours away. And in it we are going to bitch slap the domestic violence industry. (That remark alone should get me into one of Futrelle’s famously obtuse “articles”.)

A couple of pre-show notes. One, there is going to be less pre-recorded stuff and more live work. Two, while the show is typically supposed to be one hour, I will remain for up to two hours if listener calls demand it. And three, from now on, the phones will be open to all. Fembots, manginas and white knights included.

A brief recap of the show performance for your information is also in order. The first show had 484 live listeners, over 150 chat room participants and has been accessed through the archives since Tuesday for a total of 3,771 listens. That last number is going up by 10-20 listens per hour since the embeddable player has now found its way to this front page, The Spearhead, and other relevant sites.

Considering the average small market radio show is more than happy with 10,000 listeners, I am more than encouraged with that start. We expect this thing will grow in the future.

And sorry, but I have to briefly tap at donations again, particularly small donations on a recurring monthly basis. Truth is, to look at this long term we have to ask for that cash. It's a five spot per month and up to become a regular supporter, so hopefully it won't cut in to the car note.

Also, if you have not registered for the show, please do. It is not required to listen to it, but it does help significantly with spreading the word and maintaining listeners.

As always, when Tuesday night gets here, CALL THE SHOW AND BE HEARD!!

Finally, Factory has put his considerable talents to work again by updating the AVfM Radio promotional poster, enhancing the visibility of the show times, and including GMT for international listeners.

Here it is. And get those BINGO cards ready. We'll see you Tuesday!

Good Men Project Magazine Runs MRM Special

March 8, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

By Paul Elam

The Good Men Project Magazine has just launched a series of articles regarding the men's movement in a special that is to run, according to my information, into the next week.

The early results, and I stress early, is a mixed bag. While it is notable, and quite laudable, that the website has gone to such extent as to provide an open forum for the dissemination of MRM issues, there is a clear undertone of hostility emanating from both management and readers. But to clarify, that is based only on one piece by senior editor Henry Balanger, a man I happen to respect but whose article appears biased to me, and one commenter thus far who is already making personal attacks.

My initial assessment could well change in time.

For those interested, the comments are open. While I understand that my TOS here ends the moment anyone leaves this site, allow me to respectfully suggest that comments to GMPM should be absent of personal attacks, consistent with the TOS of that website and replete with the high quality of commentary so common to the MRM.

I hope that we can follow their rules, even if their own readers might not.

War's Sacrifices: Has U.S. Forgotten?

March 9, 2011 | by Steven DeLuca | Link | Original Link

That was the title of an article by Greg Jaffe Washington Post. March 6, 2011

He was writing about a Lt. General John Kelly who had given a speech, sometimes angry, about "The military sacrifices and its troops' growing sense of isolation from society."

A local women calls soldiers murderers. She insults men in the press often. She thinks women are better than men by far. She sees men as devils and in her Goddess worship group they "bitch" about how the patriarchy didn't value women and how male Gods were superior to women and how men acted superior to women. Men can worship the Goddess but they can't in the company of women in her group. We become what we hate, even if what we hate really never existed. She doesn't seem to understand that both sexes have decided to send American boys to our wars so neither sex is absolved or praised depending on how history ultimately sees the war. Women are the largest voting block, they have had the vote for almost 100 years, so why are some women still blaming men for the decisions of our government and then blaming the boys we send to war?

John Kelly, Jaffe tells us, had one request before he gave that speech "Please don't mention my son," he asked the Marine Corp officer introducing him. His son had died in Afghanistan four days earlier. One of 5,500, almost all young men who have died. He spoke of the anger some combat veterans feel towards the wars opponents and later the General made it clear that he was not speaking of dissent, but of indifference.

I get a flood of emotions thinking of the sacrifices expected of young men and the sacrifices men make in work, or war, to provide for and protect their families. Male sacrifices in American culture are ignored. As millions of men go to work or war every day; to provide for and protect their families, they are rarely noticed or praised. But when the few men who for reasons of mental health, or stress, or untreated child abuse, or perhaps some are just evil, "go off" and harm others then we read about them for days after and hear about testosterone poisoning.

Some call our soldiers murderers and blame the Y chromosome or male acculturation for why we have war. We have war because humans and animals are territorial and some are warlike. In the real world sometimes we started a war and sometimes they did but at all times if our boys don't kill theirs then our boys die. We haven't figured out how to stop others from attacking us but offering flowers just doesn't work when enemies want your land. And who can blame boys when rich politicians and their supporters and wealthy CEO's who see war as a way to profit sell us a lie and our boys die.

The general discussed how the war "[T]akes their innocence, their limbs, and sometimes their lives."

One of the most brutal comments I had ever read about the disdain and callousness towards male suffering was by a woman commenting on how some men – our enemies or the enemies of our enemies – had been left in either a metal railroad car or a huge truck. I don't remember which. I believe it was a train. No windows. They were intentionally left in the desert. It was over a hundred degrees outside but it became hotter inside that thick metal container like an oven, and they were locked in. These men were uneducated, poor, from a culture that we believe, from a narrow point of view, doesn't respect women.

The woman heard about these men suffocating [screaming for fresh cool air, stampeding on the bodies of the dying to pull them away from a crack to get oxygen, brains boiling, chewing off fingertips and sucking on the sweat and blood to get a few drops of moisture. Screaming, hallucinating, seeing that they were going to die this way and never seeing their loved ones again. Dying horrible deaths and leaving survivors who would always remember how their family members had suffered and died.] she felt joy, satisfaction, because in their culture they treated women as second class citizens. She said that they had it coming. As amazing as that hatred is, I was more amazed that a newspaper even repeated what she had said.

I would have had her give that speech to the mothers, sisters, wives, daughters of these men to see if that's how those women saw those men. We grow up in a culture that is blind to other cultures and blind to much that is in our own. Those mothers would have wanted to put her in that same hot railroad car. Some would have wanted to hear her screams. And some would excuse such ignorance and let her out to live.

In basic training, starting July of 1966, I watched the boys I was with. We got haircuts, O.D. green clothing. Boots. We started to look the same. We were trained the same. We were treated the same. In some ways we learned to hide our differences and act the same. We were being taught that we were not individuals. We were becoming parts of a machine. When the key is turned on, the switch thrown, we were supposed to let our training take over and hope that our fear of having our legs blown off would not keep them from taking us into the face of battle.

My twin sister was not there. She was not drafted. She had the vagina pass to freedom. I was not old enough to vote for that war at age 20 when voting age was 21. I had no choice. It's called "involuntary servitude" and we are supposed to be protected from that. Well, some of us are. The men and women of America , just like other countries, send boys, for a reason. Boys too young to vote. Young boys are still maturing and many don't have a strong sense of self, or and understanding of world events. We become cannon fodder for political machines that want us as their killing machines.

Some women, too many of them, blame the victims.

We are individuals. We are sons and brothers and lovers and husbands with separate thoughts and feelings. We should matter. When I read two of the paragraphs by Jafffe about General Kelly and his son I thought of my son, age 25, and my step-son age 27 and my nephew age 25. Jaffe wrote: "As a general, Kelly had spoken with scores of grieving parents. He had written hundreds of condolence letters. In them, he tried to explain why the loss of a beloved child was meaningful, noble and worth the family's pain."

“I guess over time I had convinced myself that I could imagine what it would be like to lose a son or daughter. You try to imagine it so that you can write the right kind of letters or form the right words to try to comfort. But you can’t even come close. It is unimaginable.”

I have not been to the Viet Nam memorial. I have watched more than one program about the artist Maya Lin’s simple design and the overwhelming emotions of the men and women who see that wall with tens of thousands of names on it. I will spend a day someday going over all the names. I will see names of boys I knew, killed in Viet Nam.

In basic training every morning during roll call you hear the names. Today, getting closer to 50 years later I have forgotten some but I would recognize them if I heard them. There were a few mean boys, angry boys, but most were good boys, funny boys, silly boys. I thought we were men then, age 20, but we had a long way to go still. I think of the genius who knew the odds on Poker hands but lost anyway because he just had bad luck. War’s that way. A guys head gets blown off next to you and you think it’s luck. You carry lucky charms. That’s what soldiers remember sometimes. How their lucky charm worked but their best friends didn’t. I think of the kid with the accent who made up stupid poems standing in the rain, bone cold, muddy, carrying rifles. All of us just wanting to rest, sleep, just let us lay on the cold wet ground, we were that tired.

He would smile at us and say stupid things like: “The rain is running down my back, soaking food and my pack, but I don’t care, I like it there.” And I wonder if the idiot that failed a physical training test with a few others so we switched name tags and I took his retest for him ended up in Viet Nam. I scored in the top 3 % on my own test but I didn’t do well tossing the hand grenades and that wasn’t my fastest mile either. Our Drill Instructor figured if you could shoot, you didn’t need to be a fast runner or good at push-ups and pull-ups so he cheated and got those wimps through. I ran the mile faster than I had guessed I could in combat boots and I had a very lucky day tossing hand grenades. I had beaten my own test score. This dork now had a better score than I did. So what did he do? He tried to get into airborne with those higher scores. Funny guys, silly guys and some stupid guys but you didn’t want to see them, or even the mean guys, get killed in Viet Nam . Someday I will check all the names on the wall. Not now, not yet.

My disability came from police and prison work. But because of that disability I ended up getting to know many disabled veterans from more than one war. Most ended up as really nice older men. Most had been really nice boys. Most had lived with scars and wounds visible and not visible and most had suffered long after the war. I am glad that my son, step-son, and nephew are not in the war because I don’t want them to have those men’s lives or my life either, although I am doing well today despite a few issues. I do know that if we were under attack they would fight to protect all of us, men, women and children. My daughter would fight too. But the bottom line for me is let someone else’s son die. That’s the reality of it. But show honor, respect, take care of them, because they are in the war and you are not and we sent them. I would rather go to war than send my kids.

Most men would feel the same.

Few of us give a damn about those young men in our wars today. More seem worried about how much it costs in dollars and what programs they must give up for, well, mostly for women. Welfare, WIC, taxes for colleges that mostly women attend, national health programs for women, none for men, funding for violence against women. None for men.

Although I was not in war I sometimes think I have an idea of what it would be like for a parent to lose a son and yet it's not true. I can't even think that one through. I know people who lost sons long ago and they are not over it. One night in Korea we were racing our police jeeps late at night. We got a call about a fight by the airstrip. It was dark and the fastest driver in our company jumped in my jeep and then complained about what a slow driver I was on the way to this police call as I was speeding along. I was the second fastest and I always suggested that his jeep was just faster but he was more willing to risk his life than I.

We got to the airstrip, very dark, a jeep was upside down. A man was screaming in pain. Another was unconscious on the ground but it was too dark to see him. We brought another jeep around with his lights and our flashlights. We saw blood coming out of his eyes, ears and mouth. We didn't bother with CPR. The dead guys friend, a few feet away, was screaming "tell me he is O.K. tell me he isn't dead" and my friend said "Ya he's dead you stupid fuck, what were you guys doing here?" Truth is, they were screwing off just like we had been moments ago.

We had been around enough and could put the clues together although an official report would come days later. Skid marks, roll over, booze, the passenger had evidently panicked and pulled the emergency brake at high speed" We drove back to our barracks slowly. I asked "Am I driving fast enough Sergeant?"

"Yeah, fast enough, slower is fine."

The dead boy was having his last night before going home party that night. At that age, 21, I felt sad for the mother. I was taught that mothers feel more deeply for their children. I don't believe that is true today. I have seen too many grieving couples where the wife, not the husband, is able to speak about the "accident" or "shooting."

There is a limit to the pain a person can feel and for sure that mother and father of that boy, who had a room ready for him to visit in 48 hours or so, would both find that limit. I don't believe most parents ever get over that loss. They learn to live with it, and sometimes they don't.

After reading that news article I went to the post office in Mendocino to see if a package from my brother Rick was there. It was not. He is not reliable. The army might have done him some good. Or, he might have died there. Or, he might have ended up with a 100% disability like me. On the glass door was taped a photo of a goofy looking young man, my son's age, a Private First Class posted there. Dead. Cute and funny looking. Likely just a bad photo. Likely the best one they had. And, likely I will read about him in our weekly small town newspaper. Most people reading it won't care. I am guessing it was an IED. Maybe it was a jeep wreck, speeding. Maybe it was an accident or a sniper. Luck always plays a part in life.

When I got home I read the paper over coffee just like many others did. I read about two brothers who were racing their cars in a town near. A car rolled, a brother died, he and his parents will feel that pain. The police and medics and coroner will live with that too. Friends and family will suffer. The brother will always blame himself, even after therapy where he will be told that his brother made that choice. Those closest to that young man will, over the years, read about families losing a son in war, or by accidents, or at their own hand. They will be closer to understanding the pain of the survivors than others. Boys can be reckless. Some will blame the boys for speeding so too bad that they died, they might have hurt someone else. Or, too bad that they died, the war is stupid so the boys must be stupid too. Some who have experienced the loss of a daughter or son will feel compassion. They will remember their losses. They will suffer with them.

It’s too bad that humans have to often learn the hard way.

AVfM Radio – Recap of 3/8/11

[box type="note" style="rounded" border="full" icon="none"]

Another sterling broadcast of A Voice for Men Radio is in the archives and thus we begin the march toward next weeks program, "Cry Rape: The Plague of False Accusations."

There are a couple of program matters to address that will help us continue to improve your listening experience.

First, keep calling. I knew from the beginning that our callers would demonstrate on the program the same excellence that commenters show every day here on the website. What I was not prepared for was absolutely devastating impact that your stories would have on the lies that govern consciousness in the mainstream of our society. Your stories, told with such clarity, directness and unbridled candor must be told and retold because any human being with a shred of decency will be moved and informed by them.

And to those who have no decency? Well, you are the reason we are here.

A note of thanks to Keyster, here. His handling of show production has quickly become seamless. He doesn't really get to listen to the show because he is constantly working on call screening, monitoring the chat room and communicating with me through the switchboard. Good job!

On more technical matters, we had a couple of people that had difficulty remaining in the chat room. That would seem to be corrected by using the Firefox browser, but please keep me posted on this as we go along.

Also, for those people calling in to the show with skype, please make sure you are wired in to your router directly with an Ethernet cable. Skype calls done through a wireless connection have a tendency to break up. You can help us keep the show quality higher, and have your voice heard much better, by going through the effort to direct connect.

I have also noted the disappointment that (unlike) our first show, there were no fembots calling in. I would expect that to be the case for a while. I know for a fact that they are listening, and likely that is on the rise. But they are not calling in yet for the same reasons that pedophiles would not call in to a law enforcement talk show. Consider their current silence the reaction of a cockroach to a halide lamp being suddenly switched on. They are hiding in the shadow just hoping for the light to be turned off.

They are hoping in vain.

Lastly, as I said the next show is on false allegations. As a special guest we will have Steve Berkimer of the False Rape Society. I also want to encourage those who have suffered false accusations to phone in to the show and tell us your stories.

Again, thanks to all for the stellar response to the show. I had billed this program as being an hour long from the beginning because I was concerned that in the early broadcasts that we might face difficulties stretching things any longer than that.

As it turns out I am having to rush some calls to try to get everyone in.
Thanks to you all for delivering some very high class problems to deal with.

Tri-Valley Haven: Hiding the Truth About Domestic Violence

March 9, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

If there is one area where feminist influence has corrupted our understanding of a societal problem, it is most certainly domestic violence.

Nowhere is there more of a gap between common understanding and documented realities than in what happens when marriages, civil partnerships or even transient romantic couplings devolve into physical violence.

The facts on the ground are clear. Women are as likely as or more likely than men to perpetrate physical abuse on their partners, and much more likely to perpetrate psychological abuse. And while most evidence points to the idea that women more frequently suffer serious physical injury, it also proves that men are no stranger to the same levels of abuse.

Despite repeated and widely distributed scientific findings that conclude that domestic violence is best viewed as a problem described in terms of gender symmetry, we find that no such understanding has found its way into public policy or public perception.

Domestic violence, or the currently faddish "intimate partner violence," are both just euphemisms for wife beating. As recently (and regularly) addressed on this site, that particular canard permeates the domestic violence industry, the entire educational establishment and indeed the halls of power in our federal government.

It is a massive campaign of intentional deception, largely due to financial considerations for those with hegemony over the discussion.

Those who wake up to what is happening often do so rudely.

Such was the case with Brian Lutz, a California resident with an aim for a doctorate in clinical psychology and who came into that pursuit, "Because," as he recently told me, "it is important to me on a personal level."

Lutz developed a passion for educating people about abusive relationships because he was in one, and it left a lasting impact on him that he hopes to translate into helping others avoid what he went through.

He recalls those days and some of the frustrations and confusion that he went through. "The experience left me thinking that society had in some way let me down. Why didn't society communicate to me that men can be victims of domestic violence? Why didn't I know the warning signs?"

And then, answering his own questions, he says, "Because society taught me that domestic violence only happens to women and that men are expected to be tough."

The abuse, and the epiphany, left him with a mission. "I for one am not going to wait for society to change," he asserts. "Change starts with me. I'm not going to wait for someone to do it for me. It gives my life meaning to speak to young men about the warning signs of being in an abusive relationship. What I stress to them is that domestic violence doesn't happen to men or women, it happens to human beings."

He's a man who has seen the folly in conventional wisdom and has chosen to spend his life helping others see a truth that he learned the hard way. It's a laudable path of giving, but one that has created an entirely different set of problems.

To further his understanding and his skills, Lutz enrolled in a volunteer training program at Tri-Valley Haven, a domestic violence agency located in Livermore, CA.

It didn't take long for him to figure out that his previously mistaken ideas about domestic violence, the ones he now attributes to a society that failed to educate him about, were the exact same ideas that set the standard at Tri-Valley.

"From the very first training class," says Lutz, "it was apparent that domestic violence was being portrayed as something that happens to women and on rare occasion, men."

The more involved he became with the Tri-Valley the more he noticed that services, training materials and the milieu in general were geared to only recognize male perpetrators and female victims.

"The volunteer training packet we were given was completely biased save for one article on male survivors of sexual assault," he reports. But that was just the beginning.

"There was one page that had a cartoon drawing of a child witnessing a man punching his wife with the caption 'mommy and daddy.' One handout had the warning signs of being in an abusive relationship on one side, and on the other side listed common characteristics of men who batter and women who are abused. No mention of the common characteristics of women who batter could be found anywhere in the packet."

And then his training gave him something else to consider. "The domestic violence overview began with each of us receiving a handout titled "Herstory [sic] of Domestic Violence: A Timeline of the Battered Women's Movement" from the Minnesota Center Against Violence and Abuse.""

Lutz summed up the experience quite neatly. "The message I got from the Tri-Valley Haven website was that they serve both Adults and Children of abuse. The message I got from the training class was that they are only interested in serving the needs of women."

And then he added something else that brings us to the real purpose of this article.

"I decided it was time to speak up."

And speak up he did. Lutz questioned his instructors about the lack of information about male victims and female perpetrators. He asked about the possible propensity for violence in women who had borderline personality disorder. He also pressed for a response to the idea that women who were abused as children might develop personality disorders and become abusive toward adults later in life.

He states that the reason he pursued this line of questioning was because the instructor was teaching in class that one cause of males who abuse was a history of childhood abuse.

According to Lutz, the instructor claimed to have no knowledge that any of this also applied to women.

Apparently Lutz's questions were rhetorical. Through his own research, prompted by his life experiences, he was already well aware of a problem with male victims and female perps. He brought copies of the research with him to the next class and asked for permission to hand them out to the other volunteers because he felt like the information presented in the class was biased.

Suddenly things became more interesting.

Lutz states that he was denied permission to hand out the information, the instructor telling him that all information needed to be approved by their board before being distributed. He also says that she told him she did not think there would be a problem getting permission.

But less than a week later, he says, he was pulled aside and informed that he would not be getting permission to pass out the information. The primary reason given was the lack of time in a 65 hour course. When he pressed that issue, he says, he was told by one instructor, "After all, this is a women's program."

As it turns out it is a program that relies in part on federal funding, which would also imply that the practice of sexual discrimination would not be allowed.

Undaunted by being rebuffed, Lutz pushed back against the system and contacted Jennifer Dow-Rowell, Director of Community Development and Education for Tri-Valley Haven. He pressed her for an explanation of why valid, peer reviewed scientific research was being stifled.

According Lutz, Dow-Rowell became agitated with the questions and began to address him tersely, questions like, "Who are you to come in here and request that we change our agenda after only being part of Tri-Valley haven for one month?"

Lutz claims he told Dow-Rowell that he only attempted to pass out the two studies, but that this seemed to only further escalate her, and that her reactions bordered on irrational. Lutz says that at one point she made the claim that the research he was providing was, "Just research for researchers," (whatever that means) and stated that, "We're the experts and we know what our volunteers need to know and what they don't need to know in order to perform their job well. These articles won't help them at all. Most of our clients are women; therefore, our program is focused on women."

It isn't known at this time if Mr. Lutz questioned the logic of that statement, which appears to amount justifying the exclusion of services to men based on the fact that they exclude services to men. Lutz does report that he chose to end the conversation at that point because he detected "Not a hint of openness in her voice."

The next evening, right before training class was to begin; he was – again – pulled aside by one of his instructors and informed that he would no longer be in the training class.

"They felt it just wasn't a good fit."

Indeed.

Adding insult to injury, Lutz reports that he was told their reason for the separation was that traumatic relationship of his past was still affecting him and that the program had elicited painful memories of the abuse he suffered. The subtext of course being that he was acting out pathologically by urging the Tri-Valley Staff to include information on female perpetrators in their training sessions.

The instructor, who Lutz described as “a genuinely nice person,” kept on expressing concern for him because of what he was going through.

“I remember wondering to myself, ‘Do these people feel that far beyond reproach?’”

Well, yes, Mr. Lutz, that is precisely how they feel. And it is an attitude that imbrues every aspect of the domestic violence industry. It is a bottomless pit of hubris.

And I don’t say that to be instructive to Brian Lutz. He appears to be a quick enough study. He demonstrated that with his response to the company ax person.

“I looked her squarely in the eyes and said in a near compassionate tone ‘Let me be clear. I spoke up not because I am going through an emotionally difficult time, because let me assure you, I am not. I spoke up because I’m concerned about the biased way this shelter educates volunteers who serve our community on the subject of domestic violence. Have concern for the place you work, not for me.’”

Clearly Lutz didn’t buy the bullshit.

In short, they attempted to tell him that that he was crazy, in a state of emotional distress, for bringing up male victims and female perpetrators, and when he refused to stop they ostracized and removed him, asserting that they were doing so because he was allegedly in an emotionally unstable state.

After some consideration, Lutz decided to go public with this story and to appear on A Voice for Men Radio to tell his story.

His real reason (not the Tri Valley fabricated version)?

“My taxpayer dollars go to pay for this shelter and they are doing a disservice to the community by intentionally omitting information about female perpetrators of abuse. This cannot be allowed to happen in this day and age.”

Brian Lutz still plans to complete his advanced education and specialize in domestic violence issues.

I’d call that a good thing.

March 9, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

As an adjunct to the Tuesday March 8th broadcast of A Voice for Men Radio, the following research resources and articles are presented to support information presented on the show. Those withdrawing from blue pill addiction may want to proceed slowly. Cold turkey detox has been known to cause severe psychological upset.

First, a Centers for Disease Control study concluding that women commit 70% of non reciprocal domestic violence.

Second, about a bazillion more studies that demonstrate that women are as likely or more likely than men to perpetrate domestic violence.

Christina Hoff Sommers: USA Today article pwning Attorney General Eric Holders contention that the leading cause of death for African American women is domestic abuse.

The Personal, as Contrasted to the Political

March 10, 2011 | by Adam Kostakis | Link | Original Link

Lecture #7

"They prided themselves on belonging to a movement, as distinguished from a party, and a movement could not be bound by a program." – Hannah Arendt

Last week, we looked at how the concept of domination has become a justification for encroaching despotism. It should not come as a shock to attentive readers that virtually every keyword in the feminist lexicon is used in a similar way. Whether the term being discussed is misogyny or rape or patriarchy, the tendency is to broaden its meaning to cover as wide a semantic area as possible, smuggling the maximum possible ideological contraband within an overcoat of righteousness. The real-world effect of all this is to restrict male autonomy through the criminalization of men's actions. The limitless possibilities for semantic bleaching correspond to extensive prison sentences and crippling fines. The intention is to criminalize the norm. Every move that a man makes should send a shiver down his spine, should force him to look over his shoulder, with a panic-stricken expression, wondering, "what new law have I just broken?" Men are to live in a perpetual state of surveillance and presumed guilt – a panoptical existence in which they are repeatedly chastized for doing wrong. That is, according to an invasive, alien moral standard that they are invited to obey, not understand, and certainly not to question or refute.

But when the criminalized behavior falls within the domain of actions in which both men and women engage, the argument requires a corollary that it is different, and worse, when men do it.For instance, certain nasty individuals of both sexes engage insexual harassment, but we must understand that when men do it to women, it is chalk, and when women do it to men, it is cheese. The two, we are assured, are incomparable, regardless of how a victimized man might see things – after all, even in his victimhood, he is blinkered by his privilege.

The whole fairy tale is aptly summed up in the feminist mantra, the personal is political. As was discussed last week, the proper context in which this claim should be viewed is the recent history of the Western world. Particular focus should be given to a current within our shared political culture, which has given rise to despotic government and threatens to do so again. How else are we to interpret a statement that all things within the domain of the individual are in fact the business of government? If we do not own or control those things which are personal to us, there cannot be anything to speak of that we do own or control, up to and including our lives.

But it would be a mistake to view the mantra simply as a statement of belief, i.e. that its speaker merely believes the personal to be political. All manner of people have all manner of kooky theories, and a group of people communicating their belief that all aspects of our lives are managed by the state would be about as troubling as tin foil conspiracy theorists or the Flat Earth Society. When a feminist says that the personal is political, however, she is notsimply stating a belief; she is making a call to action. There are implications hidden within the phrase.

Last week's discussion involved a section on ideologies, and the progressivist assumptions at the roots of Western political culture. To recap, ideologies assume a difference between how society isand how it ought to be, predicated upon a specific moral view of the world. What this means, as far as feminist analysis is concerned, is that if the personal is not currently political, then it should be made that way. Practically all feminist innovation consists of making those things which are personal into political matters. The logical end- point is to be found where there are no strictly personal actions, no personal utterances, intentions, thoughts or beliefs; all of these, expressed publicly or privately, would be strictly political. Every decision, down to the minutiae details of everyday life, becomes a political matter for which individuals are held to account, not as individual transgressors, but as members of an oppressive class which must answer for its sins.

'The political' is another one of those essentially contested concepts – in other words, it is one of those concepts most open to abuse. It is an elusive idea, which can be grasped but never precisely pinned down – and attempts to do so are rather like trying to grab all the air in an inflatable mattress. One of the things we can say about 'the political,' is that it has not always been identified with 'the ideological' – which seems sensible enough, since 'the ideological' is a product of modernity, a relative newcomer as far as politics is concerned.

Once upon a time, 'the political' was a term which referred to Kings, Queens, courtiers and nobles, their struggles and their successions; but certainly not to doctrine. That change came about gradually, with the steady fall of religious fervor that marks modernity.

I am aware that I skate close to etymological fallacy, so let me clarify what I am arguing. I am not complaining that there is aproper meaning of terms such as 'the political' which has fallen out of fashion. I have previously acknowledged that language is forever in flux. As a corollary, I do recognize that objectively correctdefinitions are something of a rarity. My purpose, in highlightinglinguistic change, is a correlative highlighting of social change!The one rarely undergoes a paradigm shift without bringing the other along. There is immense power in language, to not only reflect but to define the experiential world. If we want to understand how things came to be the way that they are, we should cast a searing torch beam over historic changes in vocabulary – it is here that we will find the notional germ cells that gave rise to the feminist disease.

Such as in the case of 'the political'. Today, everythingcontroversial is reflexively considered a political matter. Whether we are discussing a person's unusual lifestyle, or a new work of art that pushes boundaries, or a website that advances an innovative worldview, we feel quite certain that what we are discussing is apolitical statement. The controversial, then is political; or perhaps it would be more accurate to say that the unusual is political. Non-conformists of all stripes are prompted to attach some political purpose to their actions or beliefs. The effect of this very public challenge is to lock individuals into a system of pervasive control; stepping out of line makes one into a target.

And this is precisely what feminism requires – for men to stand in line, and to target those who do not. It's a lot easier to pursue the project for increasing the power of women when you can effectively gag those who stand to lose the most from its success.

The flip side to all this is women's exponentially increasing and 'compensatory' license. It is men alone whose private lives are to be locked into the system of public control; women, in contrast, are to enjoy the spoils of victory in a new era of female sexual anarchism. Perhaps the only consolation we can realistically take is that despotisms are great generators of spiritual enlightenment among the oppressed. It was the persecution of early Christians that drove pious men and women to live alone in the desert, in imitation of Jesus Christ – it was only in the fifth century that these monastics were co-opted into the Church, having sought a purely ascetic existence as an alternative to the material world that had driven them out. Similarly, the oppressive regimes of the Hellenistic period led many in the Greek city-states to embrace mystical philosophies which advocated turning away from the world. Given that we are well on our way towards feminist despotism, it is not surprising that a parallel development is fledgling, in the form of the Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) movement. MGTOW have rejected the Gynocentric demand that men must define themselves according to their sexual prowess. Accordingly unburdened, many MGTOW have taken up introspective deliberation on the nature of man and masculinity – discussions which are androcentric and therefore not accountable to feminist orthodoxy. At its core, the MGTOW movement turns away from the world – from marriage, children, self-sacrificing employment, even relationships with women altogether – seeking solace from hostile agents as did the ascetics and mystics of the ancient world.

Although I endorse the MGTOW lifestyle, I am conscious that it is not enough – for fulfillment or for survival. Feminism is simply not in the business of leaving men alone. It is a progressivist ideology, which means it just keeps on growing, with no internal checks on its own activities; it has no brakes! All attempted self-criticism yields to further radicalization. Unable to perceive the world from outside of the feminist bubble, its disciples think and act in an anti-contextual, abstract fashion. The only checks on the activities of such ideologies must come from the outside – i.e., from the rest of society. If feminism will not slow down and stop of its own accord, then external agents must build a brick wall in its path. This is a moral requirement – the alternative is to allow it free reign, in which case we will inevitably end up with despotism. Thus far, feminism has proved remarkably socio-dynamic, and has faced very littlepolitical resistance – meaning that the velocity of persecution is set to increase.

I should like to clarify. The word 'feminism' can refer to more than one thing. Most obviously, feminism the movement is the not precisely the same thing as feminism the ideology; rather, the former is driven by the dictates of the latter. Feminism the ideology is a victim ideology, which means that it exists in defense of a certain class of people which has been designated as the victims. The dual objectives goals of a victim ideology are, as I have remarked previously:

(1) To equalize with the ‘enemy’ group;
(2) To forge its own ‘victim identity,’ separate from and unaccountable to the ‘enemy’ group.

If objective (1) is ever achieved, then the ideology simply ceases to be, which means that the movement also ceases to be. The movement, however, is not an inorganic entity which mechanistically fulfills the needs of the ideology. It is made up ofpeople who have become dependent upon it, psychologically and financially. The end of inequality, however it was originally measured, would spell disaster for Women’s Studies graduates everywhere. For instance, the inability of feminist organizations to admit that rape rates are falling and that false allegations are reaching epidemic levels is down to the losses that would be sustained by ideologues sitting in (usually empty) rape crisis centers. The ideology cannot be permitted to die – there is far too much riding on it, namely, the movement, and whatever goodies its principal actors have managed to get their paws on. As with many people, the threat of redundancy is enough to bring out a hard-line conservatism, which insists, in this case, on the existence of brand new oppressions still to be overcome. There is an awful lot of money riding on the continued perception that women are disadvantaged. Feminism is not merely a movement any more, but an industry – aptly referred to by some as the sexual grievance industry.

Should this industry crash, it would leave a hole in the purses of career feminists nearly as large as the hole it would leave between their ears. The alternative to continued state support for the overcoming of new oppressions is almost unthinkable. It would not only mean an end to men subsidizing their own persecution – it would also threaten to leave a psychic vacuum in the minds of professional feminists. Whatever would they do, should they be deprived of their blood money?

The feminists do, of course, have a backup plan. I refer you to objective (2). The reason why victim ideologies tend to die hard when equality or even supremacy of the ‘victim’ group is achieved is this: they shift their aims towards the inherent separateness of the ‘victim’ and ‘enemy’ groups, and refuse accountability to the rest of the world. Indeed, any attempt by a person external to the designated ‘victim’ group, to hold the members of said group accountable for their transgressions, is tarnished as the effort to roll back objective (1) – and the person who dared to raise the complaint will be called any number of amazing names.

A victim ideology is necessarily tripartite in its understanding of time. The past is identified with Oppression, the present withStruggle, and the future with Liberation. This tripartite historiography is a constant. If any one of the three states –Oppression, Struggle or Liberation – is removed, then we no longer have a victim ideology. It falls apart, owing to its inconsistency. There must have been past Oppression, as this justifies the present Struggle, which also must be the case for the present, as a matter of tautology – what else would we be talking about? Struggle must be towards something, and this is Liberation, promised in the future. Below is a diagram of sorts, presented from the feminist perspective:

It is a childish caricature, fitting for a childish worldview. Note what is required for the tripartite Oppression, Struggle, Liberation to make sense – the actor who did the oppressing, who must be struggled against, and from whom the designated victims shall be liberated. This is, of course, men.

The above picture is presented from the feminist perspective, in which time moves horizontally, from left to right. In the real world, time's arrow is broken. We are frozen permanently in the present phase, and from there, time moves vertically and downwards: There is simply too much riding on feminism (i.e. the sexual grievance industry) to allow the actual liberation of women to be acknowledged. If it were to be admitted that women are not only liberated, but the recipients of a number of advantages over men, then the movement and the ideology, and thus the industry that is feminism, would become moot. Women's current role, which is perhaps more appropriately described as Privileged, is not even conceivable on feminist time. Liberation must always remain a future goal, and can never be permitted as a present achievement. Feminism is self-sustaining this way – by forever propelling itself into new Struggles. The tripartite understanding of time is independent of context; it is fundamentally abstract and anti-contextual. The tripartite is assumed before the truth about the world at any given moment is ascertained, and the facts of the world must then be hammered out into a feminist-friendly shape.

It is of little consequence that all the great Struggles have been won. Feminists can just create new ones. And since men are (as the case must always be) the oppressors to be struggled against, it is quite justifiable to take away whatever power they still possess.

Until they possess none.

MUST READ: AVfM Radio Next Tuesday

[box type="note" style="rounded" border="full" icon="none"]

There is a temptation when trying to "spread the word" about upcoming events to treat all of them as though they are going to be remarkable, a "must" to put on your calendar. We can test the depth of the adjective well trying to convince people that whatever it is we are pushing is as important as their next heartbeat.

Remarkable, don't miss it, etc..

That being said I wanted to make a statement here tonight about the next broadcast of A Voice for Men Radio, which will focus on the bane of false accusations.

It is going to be remarkable. Don't miss it.

Much of the show is going to focus on the case of Vladek Filler, a Maine man who was accused of rape, convicted with no forensic evidence; only on the testimony of the alleged victim, his wife, and in spite of the fact that she was highly abusive and demonstrated a profoundly disturbed mental state.

His conviction was overturned because of prosecutorial misconduct…

But he is now facing retrial because they have decided to pursue a conviction at any cost. They, in this case, includes prosecutor Mary Kellet who has been under much scrutiny for pursuing rape cases at the rate of 1 per week in a population of 60,000 people, and whose improper actions as a prosecutor resulted in the overturning of Fillers initial conviction.

Kellet is a Bar Harbor, Main, prosecutor whose quest for rape convictions (perhaps as opposed to actual rapists) has been billed as "The modern day witch trials for fathers and men."

Joining us to discuss the case is private investigator T.J. Ward, who has been working on Mr. Fillers behalf. You may remember Ward because he was the lead investigator on the Natalee Holloway missing person case in Aruba that gripped the nation and most of the world beginning in 2005.

He is a widely recognized expert investigator that has appeared on Larry King, Sean Hannity, Bill O'Reilly, Nancy Grace and Diane Sawyer.

He will be joining me to bring his insights into the Filler case for listeners of A Voice for Men Radio.

Also joining us will be Steven Berkimer of the False Rape Society, who has dedicated himself to the mission of educating the public on the problem of false allegations and its consequences. Mr. Berkimer will help give us some insight into the nature of false rape claims, their consequences for the victims and their families and to the culture at large.

He will also be there to explore actual cases and answer callers questions about false rape claims.

As it seems to be shaping up, A Voice for Men Radio is becoming exactly that; a place where men can speak out about the struggles they face that go generally unnoticed by the world at large. So it would surprise me if we don’t have quite a lineup of callers who phone in to share their experience with false accusations.

Like I said, this is going to be a remarkable show.

Don’t miss it.

James Bond is a Transvestite

---

There is a public service announcement circulating, which features The actor, Daniel Craig, the most recent to portray the fictional spy; James Bond.

Almost every single word of this public service announcement is a lie.

It begins with a voice over from Judy Dench.

“We’re equals, aren’t we 007? “

This is one of the great dogmas of feminism, that men and women are equal to each other. They’re not equal, obviously, or there’d be no sexes, no distinction between men and women. A women with a sexual preference for men would be just as pleased with another women. Since this isn’t the case, men and women aren’t equal.

Oh, do I hear somebody complaining that’s not the intended meaning of :

Was the intended meaning “we’re equal under the law” or “we’re of equal value as humans”?

If that was the intent, why didn’t Judy Dench’s script use that phrasing. These actors are English, and speaking the language named after England. No, the phrasing was deliberate, to blur the distinction between two things being actually equivalent, and two distinct and separate things being of equal value.

Deliberate confusion, inflicted onto you, the consumer of this slickly produced public service announcement.

Judy Dench continues:

Yet it is 2011 and a man is still likely to earn more than a woman.

Even one doing the same job.

This is another lie [1], skillfully told. Like in all well crafted deceptions, truth is mixed with falsehood.

Its true that on aggregate, men earn more over their lifetimes. But the poison here comes from the claim that a man and a women doing the same job, with the same training, and same seniority are paid differentially. If it were true, companies would not hire men.

Published stats and peer reviewed research has repeatedly debunked the lie that workplace discrimination impacts average incomes on a sexual basis. [2]

Judy Dench goes on to say:

You have a far better chance of entering political office. This is another subtle lie, implying prejudice again, when in fact, women are the majority of registered and participating voters. [3]

“Or becoming a company director” says Judy. This is another implied falsehood. Its true that on aggregate more men than women become directors of companies, but this reflects personal choices in career path. Women, statistically chose jobs affording them greater flexibility and access to friends and family. They can do this because women are valued as people. Men,. By contrast are valued based on their utility, by their income, and have very little choice except to chose employment options based principally on income.

Again we have implied sexism where none exists. Men have to compete for sex, thus sex is an accomplishment. Women, by contrast have only to select from among competitors. Sex for them is thus not an accomplishment, merely a selection from what’s freely available.

This is flatly false. The only significant difference between men and women sexually assaulted, is that nobody cares when men are the victims of sexual assault and rape. In fact, men being raped is comedy in our entertainment, while a women raped is shock and horror.

2/3 of the work done worldwide is done by women while they only earn 10% of the income? Rubbish. Cite your sources Judy Dench, you overpaid actor.

If such financial inequity exists, why is 65% of disposable income world-wide spent by women?[4]

I will not dignify the remainder of this expensively packaged piece of public fraud by fisking its individual points. A persistent liar, once established as such doesn’t need to be continually rebutted.

James Bond is a fictional spy, usually presented for our entertainment as a commanding, glamourous super achieving alpha male. This too is a lie, disguising the reality that the men who pursue real careers in espionage live lives of extreme stress, unrecognized, at the pay rate of civil servants, and often die horribly on the behalf of their countries.

But if you’re a man, you shouldn’t notice that, just swallow the myth that you’re privileged, and women are oppressed. And women and men, with all their obvious, blatant differences are actually identical and interchangeable. Swallow that lie, and donate some money. And that this thing you live in is a patriarchy.

I was inspired to write this article after reading one of Paul's latest pieces about the same subject. Then I thought, "This is already being talked about too much." Then I figured that it would look like I was trying to jump on someone else's bandwagon, so I should just drop it. Then I wrote a two-part article about two silly movies to change the subject. Then I read an article about prison rape that uses the most sensationally sex-neutral syntax I've ever seen. Then I got so angry that I started rambling like a ten-year-old (aside from the use of alliteration).

The subject of rape is indeed discussed too much. Simultaneously, one aspect of it is discussed too little. So let's talk about rape now, the kind of rape you aren't supposed to talk about, unless you're making a joke. (Go to 9:30 in that video.) Let's talk about men being raped by other men in prison, and the fact that most of these men don't belong there in the first place.

An article entitled "Prison Rape and the Government" at "The New York Review of Books" is an important exposé on the continuing atrocity of men raping other men in prison. You wouldn't know that, however, by the use of language. The article is filled with sex-neutral language like "people," "they," "inmates," "officers," "guards," "staff," "those," "juveniles," "victims," "adults," etc., ad nauseam. And I mean ad nauseam. This is in spite of the fact that the vast (and I mean vast) majority of prisoners are men, the vast majority of guards and wardens are men, the vast majority of victims are men, and the vast majority of prison rapists, since once again the vast majority of prisoners are men, are also men. In fact, one study actually says: "[T]here are more men raped in U.S. prisons than non-incarcerated women similarly assaulted."

In spite of this, "The New York Review of Books" article starts off with anecdotal-yet-traumatic details about a female prisoner being raped by a male guard. Later on, the subject turns, quite naturally, to "…lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and intersex (persons whose biological sex is ambiguous) inmates…" First of all, how does one exhibit "ambiguous" biological sex? Are they actually talking about the infinitesimal number of humans walking around who have testicles on the outside and ovaries on the inside? Penises that look like clitorises? Clitorises that look like tiny little dicks? Secondly, exactly how many prisoners are going to openly consider themselves "lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender," or "intersex"? No one seems to have any data on this, but given the level of persecution on the "outside," who's going to be flaunting it on the "inside"?

Then there's this gem: "A sergeant named Brian Burzynski made the ninety-minute drive from his office in Fort Stockton that afternoon. 'I saw kids [sic] with fear in their eyes,' he testified later, 'kids [sic] who knew they were trapped in an institution where the system would not respond to their cries for help.'" Wow. Just like school! "Suspected semen samples were taken from the carpet, furniture, and walls of Brookins's office." Wow. Just like "Law & Order: SVU (Semen Victims Unit)"!

One report linking to another report linking to another report fails to mention men in any specificity. It's like reporting on the serious damage to surrounding buildings, then talking endlessly about what the new Iraqi government can do about sprucing up the building codes, while watching the slaughter of two dozen men in the "Collateral Murder" video, to which I will not link because I'm tired of videos where I have to watch men being mowed down.

There is more than one way to mow a man down, however. You can rape his life from him, and send him elsewhere to be reminded of the state's rape of his life while at the mercy of another rapist. Watch his love of other men, and his love of mankind, die with his volition, relationships, wealth, and physical health.

The neoconservative desire for American Exceptionalism and enforced public morality has now led to "more than 1 million nonviolent offenders" being imprisoned. Mind you, the VAST MAJORITY of these one million nonviolent "offenders" are men, but then, that goes without saying. Literally.

Now that they're successfully mowed down and thankfully emasculated, these men can be treated the way heterosexual male rapists treat women. Unless something truly untoward happens: "The department is worried that a ban on cross-gender pat-searches might mean facilities would have to fire many of their female employees and hire more men, which would be very expensive and perhaps illegal." If it's one thing the government is terribly concerned about, it's spending too much money. And heaven forbid the state hire only men to deal with male prisoners! Had enough bold type? Me, too. Let's pretend, then, that bold type really isn't called for in what ought to be a "civil" discussion.

How's this for civility? For the majority of men, life goes on for decades without a single other human being coming into contact with his anus. That's how the majority of men wish to keep it. I am having a hard time substantiating it, but I have heard it said that the majority of straight guys, when they are with their girlfriends, insist on keeping anything and everything away from the "back door." There are excellent reasons for this, each of them subjective, so I'm not going to try to convince anyone to think or behave otherwise. That's not the point.

The point is that this area of the body is particularly sensitive and purposefully guarded, which is why most men are grateful that it remains safely hidden. It is not designed for entry. If it is not entered carefully when volition permits, it is extraordinarily painful. How painful? Let me give you an idea: If you ever get inflammation in that area, and your intention is to use your bowels for their intended purpose, be prepared to feel as if the bottom half of your body is going to fall off. Also be prepared to seriously consider death as an alternative option to any prolongation of the pain. I am not exaggerating. I have experienced that just from being sick. I am not a rape victim, yet the pain almost made me faint. How much worse is it for a man who has no sexual interest in men, who has safely hidden that vulnerable area for three or four decades, who has never experienced any sort of entry, to undergo such an ordeal at the hands of another man who is using one of the most private parts of his own body?

I have a rough idea from seeing a video by chance, and I'm not talking about porn where two or three obviously gay guys pretend to be tough, tie up another obviously gay guy, and "rape" him. That stuff is out there, and it appeals to me not at all. (What happened to the far more romantic porn of the 70s?) I'm talking instead about seeing, on a friend's television, a brief clip from some website that works to expose government atrocities in Egypt, where a man was apparently being raped by Egyptian police. There will be no link to that clip, and I'm going to expend no effort whatsoever to find it anywhere online. What I saw was a fuzzy image of the man's head and shoulders while he apparently lay on his back. All I remember, beyond a faint image, is the screaming.

I've never heard anything like it in my life. It was the desperate cry of a man who no longer wished to live. There aren't words to describe it. The clip was only five seconds long, at best, but it's one of those nasty imprints that never leave your brain. I don't ever want to hear that again.

Perhaps it was the intention of whatever journalists put together that piece on Egypt to simply inform us of the crime. Since television is a highly visual medium, perhaps a brief glimpse at that Egyptian dissident's important website can be a useful visual aid. But I can't do anything to help that particular man. I know next-to-nothing about Egypt. I never plan on going there. I seriously doubt that that poor man wanted anybody watching the instant replay. I wonder if he was even consulted beforehand. I wonder if he's still alive. The clip of his suffering did nothing for me, other than spark another diatribe against misandry, which was put away until I couldn't keep quiet.

I can't shut up, because we aren't supposed to shut up about "Take Back the Night," even in a religiously conservative town. I lived in that college town, off an on, for a total of nine religiously conservative years. In all that time, a single instance of rape, as far as I can remember, was reported, and it was attempted rape. Not the fake kind; the real kind. A college-aged guy walked into an open door of a women's apartment where only one girl was at home, and jumped her. Brave thing that she was, she fought him and got some scrapes. He knocked her unconscious. Then, with other people approaching neighboring apartments, he vanished, and the other people found an injured young woman passed out on the floor. The university paper decided against showing a photo of her bruised face. It was a lousy paper, but they made the right decision on that one.

"Take Back the Night," you see, is designed to make sure that that never happens again. It is this mentality that wants female rape victims' faces shown so that men and their penises (otherwise known as "semen victim units") will remain safely corralled. What these misandrists want is a continuation of the festivities at the expense of all men who don't toe the line. The writers at "The New York Review of Books" appear to feel the same. If these "progressives" and Leftists wanted to actually prevent rape, there would be tables set up for gun manufacturers to sell their wares: "Take Back the Night – with a Tippman TPX!" The cry of "RAPE!!" is an excuse to insist that feminists' precious bid for "equality" has not been achieved, that men still need to be taught by women. None of this helps a man who has been raped.

Do you want to hear from one such man?

"A Texas inmate [sic] described such a scenario to Human [sic] Rights Watch:

'[My cellmate] was younger, stronger than I and larger. He introduced himself as a bi-sexual. And was for two weeks "touchie-feelie." I had to screem [sic]/yell at him to stop. The officers here 1. Ignored my complaints. 2. Asked me if I was his lover. 3. Did nothing. He became more difficult to deal with and started to threaten me. Finally one day he attacked me.'" The "Texas inmate" rape victim had a penis and testicles, by the way.

Back to an article linked previously that dares to mention men: "Struckman (2000), who conducted a study of prisons in three Midwestern states… found that approximately one in five male inmates reported a pressured or forced sex incident while incarcerated and about one in ten male inmates reported that they had been raped. In addition, rates for women, who are most likely to be abused by male staff members, vary greatly among institutions. In one facility, 27% of women reported a pressured or forced sex incident while in another facility, seven percent (7%) of women reported sexual abuse. Furthermore, Forst found that youth [sic] in detention are also extremely vulnerable to abuse, and those juveniles [sic] incarcerated with adults [now I'm sic] are five times more likely to report being victims of sexual assault."

The numbers for women look just about equal, don't they? Of course, the alert reader will take note that the high percentage of women raped in prison also coincides with a much smaller percentage of female prisoners overall. But looks awfully, awfully bad, doesn't it? And, of course, the "juveniles" (all of whom are capable of reproducing human life on an "adult" scale) are sexless.

But prison ratios are far from sexually equal for "juveniles," either: "In 2003, 9,875 juveniles were in jail or prison… Of these juveniles, 6,869 were in jail… and 3,006 were in state prisons… Juvenile males (2,880) far outnumbered females (126) in state prisons." Please remember, since the authors of the article failed to mention it for some reason, that the majority of "juvenile males" in "detention" are men, and that they don't even belong there. (Whoops! Accidentally hit Ctrl + B. Won't happen again.)

You want to know what I think about our country's prison-rape culture? Watch Spike Lee's masterpiece "Malcolm X" sometime. In the middle of the movie Malcolm is talking to a fictional character named Brother Baines (who represents all those who had a hand in the real X's conversion to Islam) as they stand in a prison yard. While Baines rants about America's hypocrisy (at approximately 6:00 in the linked video) and its half-measures to reach out to those who were discriminated against by law, the camera pans one black man's face after another as they sit on a bench. I don't know for sure, but I have a feeling that Lee deliberately got permission to use actual prisoners. Just look at their beautiful, manly faces. All of them.

That's what I think.

Good Men? Really?

March 12, 2011 | by Lotta Goo | Link | Original Link

The goodmenproject.com claims to be taking an in-depth look at the men's rights movement. I don't think so. Far from it. I think it was more like insulting the movement, softening the audience with indirect slurs and then throwing them into a pre-arranged firing squad of those who hate them.

Just imagine that the "good men" project was doing a piece on introducing the Black Civil rights movement back in the 60's and 70's. Would they introduce them with this sort of statement:

"It would be easy to write these Black activists off as nuts and not give them a second thought"

Or maybe something like this:

"Once dismissed as the looniest and fringiest of the lunatic fringe, Black civil rights groups have "gone mainstream."

Or this:i l

"imposing their views on our national conversations around race and a host of other social issues."

Or this

"Black civil rights advocates can be easy to dismiss as crackpot extremists. Perhaps best known for descending like outraged locusts on southern towns… "

I remember from the days of the civil rights movement that some media did indeed respond to the activists in a similar fashion. We now see them clearly as bigots. Somehow it is easier to see when framed with race instead of sex.

But, it gets worse. Just as they introduce the Black activists with slurs and offer some writings from Blacks on their civil rights issues the host then says that they want to also offer a counterpoint. So what do they do? They ask George Wallace and a KKK member to offer their ideas about Blacks protesting for their civil rights.

Does the host want a fair introduction and an in-depth look?

I don't think so.

It seems that given the situation what they would really be working towards is creating more chaos. Wanting some real mud-slinging and of course the best way to get that is to soften the target by letting your readers know right off the bat that it would be okay to insult them; likening them to the "lunatic fringe" or "outraged locusts" models for the readers the behaviors that are acceptable.

If the admin can insult them they must be fair game. In essence the host is saying it is fine to bash these men's rights guys, they may have a couple of good points but on the whole there is something wrong with them. They are not good men.

Notice also that the male feminists are never disparaged or made fun of in the same way. This also clues in the audience about their expected behavior. The host is telling you which side can be bashed and which side is really the good guys.

It's a misnomer to call this site the "good men" site. No good man would ever do this sort of thing and set up one side as a scapegoat and tar baby as has been done here. No, this is not the work of mature men, this is more like a middle school boy who is setting up a fight after school and wants to watch two boys beat the crap out of each other and gets the entire student body out there to watch. One of the boys is someone he really didn't like and wanted to see him hurt and publicly embarrassed so he set it up.

A good man would have given the men's rights folks a chance to speak their truth without insulting them, without calling in those who openly hate them and without setting them up as patsies to be bashed. He would have evaluated them based on their ideas and refrained from making personal attacks that were unrelated to those ideas. He would have clearly responded with his own truth after they had a chance to speak theirs. This sort of interaction breeds understanding and highlights ideological differences. The mayhem and chaos from the "good" men site seems more motivated to get more visitors through bloody combat than it does to seek the truth.

Is this the work of a good man?

I find it at least a little ironic that they have chosen to mock the men's rights movement on the same week that a group of 34 male and female academics and practitioners have revealed a proposal that they have been writing for over a year on the plight of boys and men in the U.S.

This proposal is being sent to President Obama with the hopes of creating a White House Commission on Boys to Men. The proposal offers page after page showing the hardships and discrimination that boys and men face in the United States today. Much of what the proposal offers can be seen in the statistics and ideas of the men's rights advocates who have responded on the goodmen site. Each of the 34 commision members have spent much of their lives working to better the lives of boys and men.

Were any of those 34 asked to contribute? I don't think so. Would the goodmenproject.com call them locusts or lunatics? Probably not. I wonder why? They are basically saying the same thing as the MRA posters. Most of them are nationally known, have written books, given workshops or spoken to the media.

I frankly think that the goodmenproject.com owes the men's right people an apology. I'm not holding my breath. That young man who started the fight after school is in no way mature enough to be able to evaluate his own responsibility.

A good man would.

Gentlemen, My Ass Thanks You

The Empire State Building - costructed in 1930. Safety wasn't invented till much later.
I'm stuck. Truly stuck in the past. A past that was created long before I was born. The history of men; an undeniable history that occurs to me every single time I leave the house. A house I might add, that was designed and built by men over eighty three years ago.

I love my house. Its 'grandfather house' was built by a carpenter that raised a family here in my neighborhood. When his daughters were grown, he built them each a summer bungalow side-by-side; adjacent to his property right off of the canal. My home is one of them. It is just right for me, and I simply adore it. Oh, and don't mistake the word "bungalow" for a small dwelling. (Although technically, 'a bungalow' does not have a full basement, which I have) It's a real nice, spacious home.

I was recently sent an email with photos of the Empire State Building- while it was being built….by men.

I can't look at a single photo without thinking about women. How the hell would they have done this? Even if the argument "men did not allow women to do this sort of work back then" held any fucking water with me; there's no way women could have done it. Mind you there are plenty of men not suited for this sort of work, but men were the only ones doing it nevertheless. And I will wager by and large that they were the only ones who could.

Look at these photos. Do you see any safety harnesses, or girly powder room accomodations? Note the trust of two men working on a plank supporting each other. Also notice the lunchtime 'break room." Can you imagine any women up there?

I'm sorry, I just cannot.

Women that hold jobs like these nowadays, have all the benefits of progress and safety afforded them in our modern world. And of course as women started to enter those jobs, everyone started scrambling to make them safer.

Men built our cities without these comforts and technology. No accommodations were made. You either had what it took under primitive dangerous conditions; or not.

Please note the scaffold board the guy on the right is supported on.

Also note that many of these men are well past their ‘prime’. Imagine a sixty year old woman up there on the iron. Do you see her? Do you see her there because she doesn’t know any other way of life, and her age is valued for its experience and tenacity?

Nope…I most certainly do not. And the only place you will is in your imagination.

No matter how you slice the feminist cake; gender equality does not, cannot, exist. If not for the superlative accommodating conditions created by men, in the workplace we’d not even be having this conversation. I do not hate women. I resent that they take for granted, or have taken credit for all the comforts afforded them.

The Empire State Building - costructed in 1930. Safety wasn't invented till much later. There now, I've said it.

Men built the roads. And now women drive right over them with a sense of ownership reserved for those that paid for it with sweat and blood; mindless of the lost lives and broken bodies that went into every mile of pavement.

Any job I can think of that a woman holds today in a man's field of expertise; makes me want to see her doing it– a hundred years ago.

Every time I flush my toilet in the wintertime – thinking that the seat was cold – I think about women in past days running outside into the bitter cold to their outhouse in the middle of the night, literally freezing their asses off.

And my slightly chilly ass suddenly remembers to thank all of the men that helped create, and perfect, indoor plumbing.

My ass is indubitably grateful.

Good Men Project Magazine: Ripping off Readers and Advertisers

March 13, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Well, I said I was going to wait a while, but recent events have put me in the zone. I will, though, keep it brief, as it is time to put the recent fiasco orchestrated by the Good Men Project Magazine in the rear view, along with the site itself.

I was contacted some weeks ago by Henry Belanger, Senior Editor of GMPM, advising me that the site was going to do a special on the men's movement and requesting that I submit one or more articles, and hopefully help him recruit other writers in the MRM to supply material as well.

As anyone who reads this site knows, that is what I did.

I took this as good news as I had enjoyed a civil and cooperative relationship with Henry, and as we had discussed on more than one occasion, I felt that GMPM was in a unique position to foster the competition of ideas between MRA's and feminists under the same roof, at the same time (provided that GMPM management was objective and even handed in handling material and comments).

I did have reason at the time to believe that was going to be possible. My experiences with Belanger had left me the impression that he (at least him personally) was more interested in the success the GMPM website than he was in ideology, and that he was a man, a "good" man, that operated with integrity.

I was wrong.

As so aptly described by guest writer Lady Gyoo, Henry Belanger's "Meet the Men's Rights Movement," the article used to introduce the men's rights community to their general readership, was anything but objective. It was a calculated hit piece, designed to incite their readership to view us as a bunch of hate mongering crack pots before ever having read a word of our work. And it served as an open invitation to treat us with the same derision and condescension in the comments as he did in his article.

In a style reminiscent of moron blogger David Futrelle, (who also joined in on the GMPM bashwagon) Belanger went on the attack, not of our literature or issues regarding the affairs of men and boys, but on a handful of angry, dissenting comments posted on their website by people he cannot even verify are MRA's. That was the standard he used to characterize an entire social movement.

In that one article, Belanger managed to completely undermine any opportunity we had to realize the ambition of putting facts and figures on the table objectively and reasonably so that all ideas could be vetted and given a fair hearing.

He also destroyed any trust in him that I had, but that is a more personal matter unworthy of more than this sentence.

I wrote Belanger an email regarding this, calling on him to clean up his mess, both from his article, and by the fact that he allowed Futrelle to post an article which dishonestly mischaracterized a piece of satire that I did as being serious. Futrelle, at this point, still reeling from being humiliated by debating with me, had already made it into the comments section of my article making personal attacks. In short, he was acting like one of Henry's crazy MRA's.

And of course, no one at GMPM raised an eyebrow.

Bellanger's response was to go in to Futrelle's article make a minor, meaningless edit and to remove his comments from the thread following my article.

Insufficient.

The same goes for GMPM CEO Lisa Hickey, who appeared in the comments here trying to do a song and dance around the facts, even using Futrelle-Belanger strategy of focusing on one of the comments but ignoring the valid points about her website that were expressed in the featured article.

You would think she might have at least not repeated the same mistakes. But I am not sure what else we should expect at this point from a disingenuous cunt that makes her living off trying to turn men into lap dogs.

The really unfortunate thing about this whole affair is that by pulling this stunt, this schoolyard bait and switch, GMPM has only exposed themselves as shifty and untrustworthy.

Pretty much what we have been saying about feminists all along. Too many lies for too long to take anything they say seriously.

Not that I imagine they care. Hell, they don't even care about their own readers. Not only are they manipulating hostile sentiments out of them and cheating them of information that could well be of benefit to men and boys, they also have an arrogance about them that is even more telling.

Several times I have come across complaints in the comments at GMPM from both MRA and non MRA readers that they had unfortunate experiences while posting there. Many of them had taken the time to post thoughtful and detailed responses to articles only to have the page automatically refresh on them before they could hit the submit button, dumping whatever they had written in the process.

I never saw an editor respond to those complaints.

Here's the deal, according to an article in the Wall Street Journal, auto refreshing is a highly controversial practice employed by websites so they can artificially inflate the number of advertising impressions on their site. The net result is that they are touting (and likely collecting ad revenue) on a whopping 20-40% of ad impressions that are never seen by readers.

So hey, if you ever lost a comment over on that site because the page refreshed on you before you could finish typing, at least you can have the consolation of knowing that it happened in the name of cheating someone out of some money.

This whole affair, from the lies to the rip offs, could best be summed up by my late, great Uncle Floyd who could always size up people with a few words uttered in a smooth and low central Texas drawl. I know exactly what he would say.

"Son, when you come across a liar, look closer. Chances are you're looking at a thief, too."

Uncle Floyd was a good man. And right smart.

[Addendum: GMPM is now attempting, though comment moderation, to prevent its readers from hearing the facts about their practice of auto refreshing. This article is offered to the blogging community at large. It may be reprinted at will, without permission]

The Unabridged Men's Movement

March 14, 2011 | by Tom Givens | Link | Original Link

[As written for thegoodmenproject.com, prior to the heavy handed editing of it's management – PE]

It's hard to decide, when approaching a subject such as this, exactly the best approach to take. Explaining the Mens Movement, in however cursory a manner, involves exploding so many of the cultural myths we live with day to day that it really does involve a bit more than a lone article, or even two. In a way, this plays a bit into my hands for a couple of reasons; I hate quoting statistics (and they're boring anyway), and I'm not interested in telling you, the reader, what to think.

What I hope to do is to show you a couple of fresh approaches to certain subjects in a manner that makes you want to do some investigating on your own. If you do that, I'm confident you and I will be 'teammates' sooner or later. But enough of that, what's up with this 'Mens Movement', are we all just a bunch of whiny woman-haters with victim complexes, or is there more to it?

My involvement with the mens movement began over a decade ago, back when Glenn Sacks still had his radio show, before Reddit and almost before Google (unless my drug-addled brain has yet again forgotten to keep time correctly). That should give you an idea of how long this particular fight for recognition has gone on. Almost 15 years, in this incarnation.

Back in those days, there was a thing we call the 'Lace Curtain', which is still in effect but to a much lesser degree, which basically was the media's unwillingness to take a male-sympathetic view of anything, even to the point of suppressing any male-favourable comments, letters to the editor, etc. Yes, back in those days we actually sent out email alerts whenever someone got a letter to the editor published in their local paper. Men simply getting a mention as somehow being worthy of concern in the media was greeted with celebration, it was so rare.

We forget these things, and many of the newcomers think this movement is three or four years old, and thus think we make no progress…

But progress at what, exactly? It's obvious we exist, and that we're angry and loud…but what are we on about? Sometimes it's hard to get the signal through the noise, and the diffuse nature of the Mens Movement makes it even harder. I started a webzine called MenZ Magazine to help with that, and if you'll bear with me, I aim to help right here, and right now.

The Issues

Here are some basic facts:

Men have no reproductive rights throughout what we would call the Political West. What this means is that men have no right to choose if they are ready for parenthood post conception, even though women have that right (and staunchly defend it, in fact). While the morality of letting men abandon pregnant girlfriends is left in question, the base inequality of the current situation is not. We have a blatant legal double standard based solely on the sex of the person involved. Given our societal navel-gazing in regards to sexism elsewhere, this is a blatant hypocrisy. Either give men the same rights as women, or restrict women's rights to equal those of men, we don't care which. But to fail to do so is to admit sexism as official government policy.

Men also have no parental rights unless conferred on him by the mother. A man's name cannot go on a Birth Certificate unless the mother consents, or states that this man is the father. In addition, a man has no medical assurance the child is actually his, unless he jeapoardizes his relationship by asking for a paternity test (and in some cases, the mother can refuse him). In relation to all of this is the assignation of paternity common in Family Court (and society), either through lying to the father from the outset, or making him responsible because he dated a single mom for a while. Think men paying for children that aren't theirs is rare? In California over 2/3rds of child paternity is assigned via "default judgement", make of that what you will.

While we're on the Family Court tack, how about those Child Support tables…? They were based in part on hysteria generated by Lenore Weitzman, who declared after divorce women's standard of living went down, and mens went up. Her study was never peer reviewed, and her data never examined (and admitted later to have been faulty), but that didn't stop the government from employing, get this, a guy who owns a child support collection agency to determine what was 'fair'. The Feds attached a commission to the State for every dollar collected through official channels and VOILA!, they have a huge 'backdoor' revenue stream (that's right, Child Support is used as a revenue stream for each individual State). And they get to look like they're 'helping women' while they destroy whole generations of men.

To add insult to injury, this is all done under the regime of "No Fault" divorce, which basically means no reason needed, no punishment for wrongdoing. Even in cases where one spouse is decent and hardworking and upstanding, and the other is an alcoholic, cheating gambling addict who takes off with the kids, there can be no assignation of 'blame'…for some reason. Which in and of itself is no big deal, until you factor in the misandric culture we live in, where accusations of wrongdoing are gendered in the media (when was the last time you heard of a male victim called a 'man' instead of 'victim"worker' or somesuch? How quick do they throw Gender out there when it's a "gunman"?), the DV industry and their sexist propaganda that only women are victims, only men perpetrators, the 'sensitivity training' all levels of our legal system are indoctrinated with, etc.

Speaking of the justice system, men have particular concerns there too. First and foremost is the massive spike in incarcerations in the US over the last 30 years or so (Fig 1). Nearly all of those are men, and nearly all of those men are poor, and usually black. While some might see tough on crime, I see a society locking their 'undesireables' out of sight. And while there is a tendency for black and white men to be treated differently, the treatment women receive vs. men for the same crime is substantially lighter, far more than racially motivated disparity in fact.

A lot of those guys are even in jail because they were broke, and couldn't pay their child support.

Which brings me to the economy. And jobs. Men are falling WAY behind women in employment, but what seems to never quite reach the surface is that most of the areas in which women dominate are publicly funded, or heavily unionized. Which means Affirmative Action. And of course, Affirmative Action only ever goes one way…

What this all really boils down to, is the loss of the male half of the 'gender conversation' that has been going on for millenia. Actually, the deliberate suppression of. Which brings me to…

Why Do MRAs Hate Feminism So Much?

In a nutshell, because nearly every word out of their mouths is a lie. Why do men enjoy such a hated reputation, where men are afraid to help small children for fear of an accusation? Why is the general assumption "if there's smoke there's fire", even when a man is acquitted of rape (and for that matter, why is he not anonymous until conviction too?) never questioned, and indeed championed? Who is promoting the idea of a 'rape culture', and that one sex is responsible for the safety of the other? Who has consistently painted all things masculine as evil, toxic, or in need of improvement?

MRAs reject the very notion that 'men oppressed women'. It didn't happen. Ever. Men worked with women, in the roles they were allowed, and men's roles were no less restrictive than women's. Indeed, most of the time the men's roles were far MORE restrictive than women's. Of course, Patriarchy Theory doesn't address this simple fact except to blame it on, you guessed it, men.

But more than that, feminists don't even live up to their own rhetoric. And the reason for this? They don't have to.

Feminism bills itself as a revolution for women, taking on radical new freedoms and exploding the envelope that surrounded women's lives, hemming them in like so much cattle. Feminists take credit for such things as women's suffrage (in Canada, non-landed women and non-landed men got the vote on the same day in 1920, after approx 1 million men died in WW1 without having it) without showing any clear connection, and they do so with pride. But should a clearly Feminist organization support a misandric policy, even a national one, suddenly there are millions of different 'kinds' of feminism.

This carpetbagger approach is tenable because Feminism is nothing radical, it isn't even new thinking. It is simply more of the same Gynocentric thinking we have pursued as a society steadily for thousands of years. Feminism is little more than Government sponsored and enforced Chivalry. There's nothing 'equal' in Feminism, and they have steadily attacked mens priveleges without giving up one iota of their own (and fiercely oppose those who seek parity…like MRAs for instance).

Feminists have, from the very outset of the Mens Movement (in its current form at least) ridiculed, dismissed, viciously attacked, mischaracterized, and misrepresented the Mens Movement, pretty much in that order. As it stands today, Feminists are castigating us for not wanting to play nice, as if the last 60 years didn't exist. As if we hadn't noticed they haven't changed one damned bit.

While these people may be adept, like a woman with NPD abusing her husband, at 'plausible deniability', we do not live in a court of law, and men see what is happening.

And men are angry. Very angry.

What Men Are Doing To Cope.

In their zeal to avoid talking about the elephant in the room, the multitude of articles written these days about men and boys don't talk much about the issues I outlined above. Many of these articles still don't even bother to ask men what they think. Instead, many turn to female 'experts'. In an age where even articles discussing the state of men refuse to talk about the male viewpoint, or even ask men what they think, what exactly can a man do to get by?

Well, that seems to depend on your goals and your realistic expectations. These are the major sub-groups:

MGTOWs

Men Going Thier Own Way, or MGTOWs, are one major subgroup of the mens movement. These men are, as the name suggests, essentially dropping out of society as we know it. A good portion of these men are the ones Kay Hymowitz and the like are complaining about a lot…the men playing vids, drinking beer and smoking weed, and not 'manning up' as expected.

For the most part, these men are responding to the lack of reward in our current culture for those who do 'man up', coupled with the massive risk involved in playing the game by the rules in place. They have, quite literally, decided that not only women, but society itself is more trouble than it's worth.

This is the fastest growing segment of the MRM right now, by my reckoning, followed closely by PUAs.

MRAs

Mens Rights Activists (or Advocates) are sort of the generic term for those men concerned primarily with the political/legal aspect of the issues facing men, with a strong concern for the social forces enabling these injustices as a close second. The defining characteristic of an MRA has yet to be found, but it seems to be a concern over enough legal/political issues regarding men overlapping, as opposed to any kind of ideological leaning.

There are devoutly religious MRAs, and 'devoutly' Atheist MRAs. There are black, white, asian, aboriginal, and Indian MRAs. There are straight MRAs, and gay MRAs. And there are male and female MRAs. MRAs have no particular stance on things like abortion, other than men should have the same rights women have. They are neither 'left' nor 'right', they are not libertarians or traditionalists. They are simply men and women concerned about the legal and social state of men today.

In fact, MRAs don't have a catchy name because they didn't expect to have a movement on their own, they originally believed the Feminist movement would help. And yes, their faces are red about that foolish mistake (myself included).

PUAs – Pick Up Artists.

Contrary to popular belief, there is enormous benefit to knowing 'Game', whether it's utilized or not. PUAs are quite simply the practical application of some very astute analysis of female sexual behaviour. These guys are the ones who have decided they will take the counterpart spot to feminism's "slut culture", or they want to anyway. And PUAs have the know-how, and the advice, that fathers used to give their sons, back when fathers were allowed in the family.

It's a well known fact that people like sex. Men and women both. In fact, as Game theory states, women are FAR more ruled by their libido than men are…men have simply forgotten how to push the right buttons. The effectiveness of this approach, as compared to (Single) Mom's advice of 'just be yourself', can be easily seen nearly anywhere men and women interact.

In fact, the biggest objection I have seen against Game Theory so far has been that it…um, works too well, and it's just not fair. Honest to God. At the very least, Game theory provides some protection against the petty manipulations men are subjected to daily. See: Esther Vilar's "The Manipulated Man."

While many women have complained about the presentation and the tone of the facts, sites like Roissy's Chateau routinely have sheepish women admitting they are exactly as described. And while your mileage may vary, some advice is far better than none, espeically in an age saturated with messages that 'empower' women's base desires, denigrate (and demonize) male sexuality, and wreak havoc upon whichever playing field they're on.

When Will The Mens Movement Go Away?

Likely never. This is perhaps the very first time in history that a sex has forced his/her gender role off his/her shoulders. Feminism certainly didn't do so, in fact only manipulating already existing social biases to be more favourable to women, while leaving their gender role intact as a 'fallback position'. Men are now literally saying ‘screw you’ to women as a sex, and society in general, and for the first time ever, are dismantling the Chivalric infrastructure. And turning their backs on a crumbling society.

Men are hardwired to love and idolize women. It’s why we want to protect them and support them. They literally give our lives purpose, generally speaking. They are the center of our families, and they are the comfort at days end. They are the makers of the home, the calm in the storm. Some measure of softness in an often too-hard world.

Well, rather, they WERE those things.

Now women are our competitors at work, our opponents in politics (womens issues begat mens issues), our critics in relationships. Women are told to fear us, to hold us in contempt and to feel empowered when their success is greater than the men whose legs have been cut off to enable it. They are inbued with massive self-worth, and told their every accomplishment is worth celebration in this ‘male-dominated’ world (and all evidence to the contrary is ignored). And this leads them to believe all the men she meets, who she has been told her whole life have it even easier than her, are total losers. How else could they have failed to succeed, after all?

Women feel entitled to take advantage of men these days. There is little social pressure on women who, say, capitalize on men’s loneliness by demanding free drinks as payment for her company, to stop this practice, since it’s seen as ‘normal’. To the men who may not have much money, who simply want to meet a nice woman and don’t know any better, this seems like cruelty. And to that man, it is.

We live in a society that caters to female hypergamy. We have structured our legal and social systems to accomodate the female desire to be able to ‘upgrade’ at whim with no consequences (for her anyway), and it has devastated Marriage as an institution, and dating in general. We cater to the female desire for power, institute AA type programs, and educational initiatives, all to have them declare men inferior when it becomes apparent we’ve overdone it, by a lot, even though we can’t say it out loud. We live in a society that doesn’t care, at all, about men that are not ‘alpha’. You see it everywhere, the top slice of men doing as well as ever, with the bottom 80% falling off a cliff.

The Mens Movement started, because no one else was talking about this stuff. The Mens Movement continues, because even after hearing about this stuff, many people are too complacent, or too convinced by opposing beliefs, to do anything about it. As long as men and boys are given the raw end of the deal (usually because society depends on the disposability of men to survive), the Mens Movement will be in existence in some form or other.

I suppose that if this is a concern, one could always take solace in one simple fact:

Even after 10 years, and attacking all these major problems and more, and being the LONE voice doing so for most of that time, there is yet to be established a single publicly funded mens rights advocacy agency anywhere. So at least the mens movement won’t likely be surviving on your tax dollar, but will continue to thrive on the volunteer efforts of everyone involved.

Unlike Feminism.

[image]And so we start another countdown to showtime at A Voice for Men Radio.

Tonight, get your alibi's together, men, we are going to talk about men getting Nifonged., or, how a single pointing finger, even one on the hand of a the average crack ho, can detonate a social and legal explosion in your life.

Lots of expert opinion will be heard in this show, as will real life first hand accounts of the carnage. Also anther visit from John the Other, and a shocking audio clip that shows you how willing some prosecutors are to look away from the plaintiffs lack of credibility and push ahead with the case, in essence, legally raping the accused.

So do your pre-show checklist now so that you can help us do a little more world shakin' out here in Radio Free Matriarchy.

First, stop raping women, just for a little while. Then:

Make sure you are registered with A Voice for Men Radio

Sign in to the chat room at show time

Find a comfortable spot to listen

And when the time comes

Grab that phone and call the show at (310) 388-9709

And of course you can always reach us by skype.

A special note to skype users: Please DO NOT call the show on skype unless you have a direct Ethernet connection to your modum. Wireless connections give us bad audio quality.

If you have ever been the subject of a false rape allegation, feel free to call the show. Your stories will be given priority. The way we can make changes is for the silence to be broken about what is happening out there. For the same reason, please feel free to link this post elsewhere so that we might reach as many men as possible.

Thanks in advance for your invaluable contribution to spreading the truth throughout the land of lies. PE

Nice Guys Are Emotional Toilet Paper

March 15, 2011 | by Dusty | Link | Original Link

This is the first time I've ever seen you- and that car. I wonder if this is your first day on campus, or if this is just the first time you've driven that car to campus. I hope you talk to me. I really like that car.

Everybody loves me. I'm beautiful and everyone tells me this, so naturally I don't appreciate it and don't put any effort into my relationships. I don't have to. I'll just sit here, looking pretty, and everyone will come to me. If you don't, someone else will. Or nothing will happen. I don't care either way, because I have, like, the cutest little phone! And I'll spend my time reading and answering all the texts that all the people who adore me have sent in the last five minutes. And someone else who's willing to buy me things will come along. The glitter letters stretching across the front of my baby doll T shirt reflect my entire being: H-O-T-! So unless you want to live an austere, dejected, brutal, lonely life, and you don't want a chance at this pussy, you will make the first move.

Finally, you've approached me! Now you have to say The Right Thing. Here's the catch: I don't even know what The Right Thing is! Isn't this fun? Just talk about anything until you've hit my emotional G spot.

Some advice? Don't be too nice, but don't be a jerk. Don't be too laid back, but don't be too aggressive. Don't focus on me too much, as that would be desperate, but don't focus on yourself too much, either, as that would be selfish. Got it?

If you do things right, it should feel like you're walking on a tightrope over shark infested waters and juggling at the same time. Oh, but don't let me tell you what to do, because I need to feel you're in control of the situation, Papa. That way, if anything goes wrong, I can blame it on you, Daddy. Also, I don't want some wimp to buy me dinner!

After you've hacked into me with the right "passwords" and "codes," and you've asked me out, and I've given you the cold shoulder and runaround for a week and a half, I'm going to reward you with the sheer pleasure of taking me out to dinner and conversation- your treat, of course. I'm going to order the most expensive thing on the menu and eat only a third of it. (I'm watching my weight so that everybody will continue to love me.) Then I'm going to talk to you about myself, my family, myself, the last item of clothing I bought, my interests, my tastes, myself, the cute little thing my roommate did the other day, and myself. Did I mention that I was going to talk about myself? And you better at least pretend to care, if you ever want me to use you again.

At the end of the night when you take me home (What's with this car? Where's the car that made me first see you?), I'm going to hug you and tell you that I'm not ready for anything serious, and I'd rather be friends. Translation: when the aloof, insensitive guy that I'm perpetually on and off with shits all over me again, I'm going to come crying to you and try to use you to wipe it off. After all, I bet you're a good listener. Nice guys are totally emotional toilet paper.

Oh, and since we'll be friends by then, I'll see if I can con you into moving some couches for me that next Saturday. I'll have another "friend" lined up that day; I think you guys will get along great! Of course, you will receive no compensation for this whatsoever- not even pizza and beer. This might make you angry. (Anger is, by the way, the only emotion you will ever be allowed to express again, unless you want to be viewed as a sissy.) However, you better not let me catch wind of your attitude, or I'll be forced to tell my girlfriends that you're "psycho" and that you're only angry that I wouldn't sleep with you. And I know everybody, and everybody loves me, so I can make sure you never get a date in this town again. So be a good sport, OK?

If you have a problem with any of this, it's not because I'm cruel, dishonest, capricious, mercurial, cold-blooded, manipulative, or self-serving. It's because you either hate women, have a small dick and/or deep-seated feelings of sexual inadequacy, have abandonment and/or attachment issues, have bottomless self-hatred that you project onto others to avoid responsibility, or all of the above. You should probably seek professional help- or call the Rejection Hotline, since you JUST DON'T GET IT!

After I've notified the Women's Center at the university that you've been harassing me, and the police come to arrest you, and I've pressed charges, and you've been expelled, and I've destroyed your life, my girlfriends will pick me up to go shopping so I can take my mind off of how much all of this has hurt me, and how traumatized I am by your creepiness.

Men are such pigs!

The one good man

March 16, 2011 | by Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) | Link | Original Link

The One Good Man sees in Woman what men lack. Woman is bright and charming and good. Men are dark and sinister and bad.

To maintain the image of Woman as bright and charming and good, the One Good Man swallows Her darkness. Her rages, Her excesses, Her cruelties are his responsibility, not Hers. All Her goodness is not chosen because She is helpless in Her goodness—as She is helpless in Her femininity. But because it is not chosen, it is not goodness and it feeds nothing in the One Good Man.

Without shadow there is no depth.

He craves dimension and he receives only bright, charming images as thin as a whisper. To compensate he tries to capture as many as he can, but they flit through his fingers like sunlight and his hunger grows.

He needs a Harem.

The politician signs into law one-sided advocacy that ignores the pain of men to help women: Domestic Violence, Rape, Sexual Harrassment, it doesn't matter. He sees it all as an avenue to destroy his competitors and win an adoring harem, even if it's only the myth of himself in his own mind. He is the One Good Man, good because of his influence, which he uses to advance women.

The family judge eviscerates his rival—a father and husband—and in the woman's approval he sees another adoring harem member. He knows that her husband has failed her otherwise why would she be here before him? But he won't fail her. He is the One Good Man, good because of his power, which he uses to benefit women.

The priest condemns the imperfect morality of his flock's husbands and in their admiration he sees a harem. He knows the church women are there to hear his words and uses them to throw petty sins of their husbands into high relief. He won't fail them. He is the One Good Man, good because of his morality, which he uses to lionize women.

The petty bully brutalizes a smaller boy, cheered on by girls. The girls have a grievance; the boy presumed to ask one of them out, or maybe he was staring at her breasts too long? He won't fail them. He is the One Good Man, good because of his strength, which he uses to avenge women.

The One Good Man sees all other men as feckless, immoral, weak, beneath him. The One Good Man is good because he knows he is the only good man. He is special. He regales of stories of his goodness, all with the same refrain: "I have used my strengths to woman's service, I have crushed men so that women may walk upon them." And thus he is deserving of the admiration and approval of many women. He has a Harem. But that is not enough.

The One Good Man has enemies.

The One Good Man hates the Hungry Man because they are the same man. The Hungry Man hungers for women's bodies; The One Good Man hungers for their approval. The Hungry Man says, "women's only use is their sex." And the One Good Man disagrees because a woman's only use is their approval. That's why the One Good Man cannot allow himself to see Woman's shadow; because if he did, she might not approve.

Hungry Man and One Good Man are the same man, but they will never admit it. Hungry Man says he does not care for women's approval, yet he needs it to access her sex; One Good Man says he does not care for a woman's sex, but it's her sex that makes her approval worth so much.

Both the Hungry Man and the One Good Man fear the Bad Man, perhaps better called the Broken Man, for he is the Hungry Man having fed too little and the One Good Man having swallowed too much.

The Bad Man says "look, Woman has a shadow! A shadow that She casts, not me! Every shadow is Hers!"

The One Good Man hates the Bad Man's words; he points to an obvious flaw: "Some of those shadows are cast by you!" and dismisses the greater truth.

The One Good Man has a final enemy; and this one is most insidious of all because he is part of the One Good Man, the Hungry Man and the Bad Man.

He is just a man. Not a bad man, not a good man, not a "real man" or a fake man, not a strong man or a powerful man or an aggressive man or a useful man or a useless man. Just a man. A man who sees that words like good, strong, bad, real, fake, powerful, useless and useful are just words the One Good Man uses to divide himself from other men, to make himself special and thus worthy of his Harem.

The man, just a man, sees a woman as just a woman. She is made of light, and shadow in equal measure to the light, and so she has depth and form and substance. When she hurts him he says "you have hurt me. You take responsibility for it. I will not take responsibility for having been hurt." And if she does, he stays, because she feeds him.

With shadow, there is depth.

He does not need a Harem. And so he does not need to hate or hurt other men to have a Harem.

He is not the One Good Man. The Bad Man or the Hungry Man.

He is a man, just a man.

Welcome Daniel Martinez

March 16, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Thanks to the collective efforts of some of the best writers and thinkers in the MRM, avoiceformen.com has experienced significant growth, especially since the start of 2011.

It is true that we have been aided by a few useful idiots in the MSM, along with exponential growth in the MRM generally. But one relevant fact remains: venues that buck conventional wisdom and PC mandates go nowhere without compelling provocative, content. That has been provided by our contributors, both in the feature articles and in the comments.

AVfM will quite likely receive 1,000,000 more visits by this time next year, and this from a site that took its first four months to get 50,000 visits.

It is not just growth, but growth that requires further organization and effort.

To that end I have invited Daniel Martinez of Derechos de los Hombres blog to come on board as Managing Editor for AVfM.

I am quite happy to inform you he has accepted.

I first encountered Mr. Martinez when he approached me a year ago seeking permission to translate my articles into Spanish and disseminate them to the Spanish speaking world.

Since then I have witnessed him doing that with my work and that of several other well-known MRA's, both in text and subtitled video presentations. His work, as I have directly observed, is tireless.

Mr. Martinez, a resident of Ecuador, is a finance expert and an academic. His talents as a linguist and editor are also top notch.

While we will be working as a team, Mr. Martinez will take over general responsibility for screening, editing and posting all content to the site, as well as comment moderation and maintaining adherence to TOS.

He has my full trust and support for those duties.

His presence here will also allow me the opportunity to keep pace with the demands of the new radio show, as well as more actively pursue pushing our message into other venues.

I understand there may be questions. Both Daniel and I will be here to answer them. So without further adieu let me say, "Bienvenidos, Señor Martinez."

And thank you for your willingness to step up and help.

Rape is not Special and Neither are You

In the United States and Canada, violent crime has been steadily diminishing for the last 30 years. In 1980, in the United States, there were 49.5 instances of violent criminal victimization, not including murder, per 100,000 people per year.

In 2008, this had fallen to 19 instances per 100,000 people per year, according to the bureau of justice statistics [1].

A 2009[2] report from the BJS breaks this down further by type of crime, starting from a rate of violent criminal victimization of 17.1 instances per 100,00 people.

For serious violent crimes, the number is considerably lower, just 5.8 instances of victimization per 1000 people, and this number is broken down further by specific crime.

For robbery – 2.1 per 100,000 people.

For aggravated assault – 3.2 per 100,000 people.

For simple assault – 11.3 per 100,000 people.

For rape and sexual assault, just 0.5 per 100,000 people per year.

Homicide occurred at a rate of between 6 and 15 instances per 100,000 people in 2007, depending on the age group of the victim.

Murders of victims aged 14 to 17 occurred at a rate of 6.1 per 100,000 people.

Murders of victims aged 18 to 24 occurred at a rate of 16.5 per 100,000 people.

Murders of victims over 25 years of age occurred at a rate of 6 per 100.000 people.

[image]

For instances of murder, men are the majority of offenders, but also, overwhelmingly the victims in cases where the perpetrator is male, and in cases where the perpetrator is female.

Murders with a Male offender/Male victim comprised 65.3% of total murders.

Murders with a Male offender/Female victim comprised 22.7% of total murders.

Murders with a Female offender/Male victim comprised 9.6% of total murders.

Murders with a Female offender/Female victim comprised 2.4% of total murders.

[image]

One of the lies which radical feminists tell us over and over is that we live in what they call a rape oriented society; rape culture if you insist on coining the lie.

This is a bizarre claim as the stats demonstrate rape and sexual assault occurring at the lowest level of the nonfatal violent crimes recorded by the bureau of justice statistics, 1/6 the rate of the next most common violent crime of robbery.

Based on the continuously diminishing rates of violent crime, it is irresponsible to suggest that we live in a violent crime oriented society, and it is flamboyantly ignorant and wantonly dishonest to suggest that we live in a rape culture.

It can be argued that ours is a kleptocracy; a society based on theft by corporations from the public, but that's a topic for another discussion.

Certainly, this is not a rape-ocracy, and anybody who claims it is, is a lying idiot.

Well, a lying something, not necessarily an idiot. Some people beating the drum of an epidemic of rape are generating an income from the fiction. In fact, an entire victim industry revolves around maintaining this narrative. But, fraud and hate crime that that is, it's not the point I want to make today.

The proponents of the rape-is-everywhere myth – in addition to propagating their ideological falsehood have also managed to sanctify the status of victimhood of the crime of rape. An identified rape victim is now elevated in our society to some sort of bizarre celebrity. We don't afford this status to the overwhelming male victims of robbery, assault and aggravated assault, so why is rape special? It's a violent crime, and it's a bad outcome for anybody experiencing it but you know what? It's not the end of the universe.

If you're the victim of a rape in the real world, you'll get over it. Your life will go on, and you'll still have to eat, sleep and defecate just like everybody else. Being raped doesn't make you a special person, and in fact, unpleasant, as unwanted sex is, it's not actually that big a deal. Even if the rape is a particularly brutal and violent event – if the victim of a rape isn't physically crippled in the event, they'll recover just as anybody subject to an assault or an aggravated assault recovers.

I've been badly beaten a handful of times in my life, and on one occasion in my early twenties I was stabbed. It was serious enough that had I not been delivered to a hospital within about 30 minutes, I would likely have died. I'm not special because of that, and somebody raped is also not special, they're simply the victim of a violent crime, just like anybody else so unfortunate.

Rape however occupies a special status in our collective sentiments. It's treated as the most abhorrent breakdown of all that is good in the universe, but I'll argue that forced sexual acts perpetrated against a woman is not worse, and in many cases, not as bad as aggravated assault resulting in serious injuries committed against a man – something that according to the stats happens 6 times more often.

What's really going on here, is that women, whether we admit to it or not occupy a position of elevated status and privilege in western society. They're sentenced more lightly by the criminal courts, they're elevated into supremacy in the education system they enjoy benevolent sexism in romance, hypergamy is the normal mode of matrimony, and women are favored in the family courts. Women also dispose of 65% of discretionary spending, despite a real lifetimes earning imbalance weighted towards men. It doesn't matter who earns the money, women spend it.

Unfortunately, in the feminist mainstream of our society, this elevated status is not acknowledged, and we persist with a fantasy of women's oppression. And this actual privilege and pretend oppression is why a woman's victimization through rape is such a special, extra horrible crime, despite the objective reality that although it is and should remain a crime, its nothing more complicated than forced sex.

Inferno philosophy numero uno: better not to mention the name of any given feminist. Opt instead to give them generic tags that more accurately reflect the monolithic ideological goop from whence they come. Of course the good man has good cause to eschew mentioning them by names that might falsely imply any individuality, or individual human worth on their part.

But these pigs do have names, and just like Arnold Ziffel – link for you youngsters – we want to give them their due notoriety.

March 18, 2011 | by Paul Elam and John the Other | Link | Original Link

By John the Other and Paul Elam

The false rape accusation is the ultimate super weapon in mainstream feminism's war on men. It's the biggest, baddest, most destructive and vile lie in the arsenal. The reason it's the ultimate weapon is not that rape is a particularly special crime.

It's us.

It's you and me that make false rape the devastating super-weapon that it is. The universal, ever present feminist ideology we are flooded with through the mainstream media, including television, podcasts, radio, movies, magazines and so on – has convinced us that no matter what, when a woman cries rape, a man's head must roll. We've all been drinking the cool aid, and it has resulted in full time work for The Innocence Project.

All this has been aggravated by the long standing propensity of men to react swiftly and vengefully, often irrationally, when rape is alleged. This feminist-chivalrous social hybrid has produced justice that is delivered with pitchforks and torches. For the accused it amounts to a postmodern lynching, officiated by mobs dressed in black robes and uniforms.

By the way, we are not using words like war, weapon and arsenal for dramatic effect – this is a real war we're talking about, being fought on behalf of female supremacist mainstream feminist ideologues using the willing muscle of state funded enforcers.

War may actually be an inadequate description as it implies the ability of both sides to fight. In every sense of the word this is more like a massacre.

A man accused of rape is destroyed from the start. He is dragged, defenseless, through the tar-and-feather machine of the media, ritually named and shamed, severed from family and colleagues, barred from employment, publicly maligned and demonized, all before any legal or evidentiary process of inquiry has even begun.

Rape shield laws protect the false accuser, both from public scrutiny and public condemnation for her lies, and the standardized lack of legal consequences stand as an open invitation to accuse any man at any time with impunity.

Even on his exoneration the devastation lingers and corrodes the remains of his shattered life. And when unjustly convicted, he faces prison for 5 to 20 years, where he will likely be raped- routinely – and possibly killed by another prisoner.

So what are the possible outcomes from this increasingly Orwellian onslaught of corrupt, opportunistic prosecutors and entitled, reality-divorced princesses willing to burn down the lives of the men for trivial personal gain and professional advancement?

Obviously, just as we are seeing, prisons being filled and lives being ruined is one result.

But what of other possibilities; ill effects fomented as a tragic harvest out of desperation and fear?

A sea of change at some point seems both unavoidable and terrifying.

As matters stand presently, men are still standing passive in the midst of this legitimized mob rule; tolerating the systematic abuse without rancour.

One of the falsely accused students in the Duke Lacrosse case, when asked by the press admitted that he bore no ill will towards the woman who had almost succeeded in putting him in prison for 20 years for a lie and a laugh. The same was true of one of the Hofstra Five. Men in our society are conditioned so completely that no matter how cruelly they are attacked by women, they will take it.

For the most part. But as the social pendulum swings away from chivalry and more toward male self-preservation, and as the unavoidable collective anger begins to mount and find its way into common discussion, there may come a tipping point that will tilt in a cataclysmically bad direction.

Setting aside the emotion and trauma of a false accusation, prosecution and conviction for fictional rape, and viewed from a purely pragmatic, survival oriented stance, a jail sentence for murder is a preferable outcome for a man than a jail sentence for rape.

In the culture of the penitentiary, murder carries with it a certain amount of prestige. On the other hand, incarceration for rape comes with an automatic target on the convicts back, putting him in immediate disfavour with other convicts in a highly volatile environment.

In a climate of pervasive and escalating false rape accusations, how will a feminist utopia deal with men who have lost everything based on false accusation and who select a survival oriented outlook?

How will that utopia deal with men accused who decide killing thier accuser provides a better bad outcome than dying in jail as convicted rapist?

These are painfully difficult questions, but in a system of laws perverted by ideology, men shackled but not protected by those laws may decide they have no avenue of justice other than retributive violence.

How long before numbers of men conclude that cold pragmatism is the only option?

In the feminist utopia of celebrity victimhood and game show rape trials, the prize of celebrity victimhood could well become victimhood of a considerably more legitimate brand.

As our interest the recent antics of the Good Mangina Project is now understandably waning this video will close chapter of another series from Chapin's Inferno.

Now finished, we can return to other business while feminism continues to stumble and fail with the same rapidity that the MRM is growing. And we can allow the staff at TGMPM to discover on it's own, as the level of general interest in the views of freaks and emasculated step and fetches grows ever more anemic, that their hay day is over.

We have already passed the tipping point here. There is no real future in misandry. Not even if you auto refresh your site every few minutes to give the appearance of traffic that is not there.

A Special Request from AVfM Radio

March 19, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

It has become a matter of routine for us to put out feelers in advance for show callers at A Voice for Men Radio. As many of you know in the last two episodes we have requested listeners who have had the experience of a false allegation, or respectively, been the victim of domestic violence, to call in to the show to share their stories.

Despite the short notice we gave for those requests, we had an amazing response and in both shows were having to rush through some calls to get everyone in.

Well, the next show is a little different as we have a particularly difficult agenda to fill on this one. As you may know, the next program will feature Dr. Tara Palmatier, the plain spoken publisher of shrink4men.com. And we will be discussing women with personality disorders and how men are affected by them in relationships, especially the latter part.

But here's the problem. I was just sitting here thinking, man it is already Friday night and the show is Tuesday. How on earth am I going to find any men who have experienced crazy women? I mean really, guys, I am in a corner with my back to the wall on this one.

If any one of you have ever been with a woman who created chaos and disharmony in the relationship, making you miserable; practicing unnecessary and abusive forms of control including shame, ridicule, verbal and emotional abuse or any other manner of destructive, manipulative behavior, please be sure to call the show.

PLEASE.

Scratch that. I know none of you have ever met a woman like this. But if you know someone who has, or even if you know someone who knows someone who has, please make contact with them and plead with them to call the show.

Even though the upcoming show was just plugged by Dr. Helen, I am really concerned that the phone lines will be dark and silent. That could make for a very long two hours.

For the first time since the show started, I am really nervous.

Some help here, please?

Anyone there?

Feminism is Merely a Tool

How do you know when somebody is lying to you about their intentions?

Sometimes it's body language; sometimes it's when their claims are outlandish or sharply contrary to observed reality. Some liars are skilful and quite hard to detect. But with individuals, given time, liars are relatively easy to spot. As a general rule, when a person's statements and their actions consistently point in different directions, rather than their statements and their actions pointing in the same direction, you can tell that they're lying.

There's other ways to tell, consistent reliance on formal logical fallacies, such as ad-hominem, the unstated major premise, or the straw man argument is a pretty clear signal as well, that the person making such arguments is dishonest. Refusal to address an opponent's argument, while reciting it in a high squeaky voice, or with an added laugh track are simplistic examples of the classic ad hominem.

It becomes more difficult to make such determinations when dealing with organizations. An organization engaging in deceptive practices has the advantage of being able to separate its public statements from its actions by using different groups of people to perform each.

As organizations get bigger, the ability to mask a divergence between stated goals and organizational practices is heightened. We bring good things to life – is the motto of a company selling toasters to the American public, but which makes most of its profits manufacturing the weapons of modern warfare.

General electric invented the mini-gun. This is generally well known in the year 2010, but nobody buying a toaster at wall mart seems to mind as long as the people slaughtered with weapons like the mini-gun are brown people in faraway countries. Now, I'm not saying general electric, or their parent company, general dynamics are evil. They're filling a need. And if there's a market demand for the industrial-scale killing of humans, as there clearly is, then somebody's going to fill that need and make a profit for their shareholders.

But what about humanitarian organizations or a non-profit organization who's publicly stated goals are obviously humanist, good, and just. One way to spot organizational lying is to examine the organization's actions, comparing the action's efficacy in advancing a publicly stated goal, versus simply adding money or political power to that organization, or producing some other outcome.

Much like with individuals, the outcomes produced by the actions of organizations offer a far clearer view of the organizations goals than any public manifesto of purpose. In fact, in dealing with organizations, publicly stated purpose's likelihood of veracity diminishes relative to the size of the organization.

Organized feminism in its modern form is roughly 50 years old. In 1960, many families consisting of a man and a woman and zero or more children lived in homes they owned with one family member working full time, typically the husband. One of the public goals of feminism was to give women the "right" to enter the workplace, higher education, political office and other areas habituated by mostly men at the time. The public swallowed this declaration of purpose, despite the reality that women's choices, and not exclusion, was the principal factor in the predominance of men in the fields mentioned.

After 50 years of female favouring initiatives by government, and affirmative action, stay at home wives and mothers are rare to the point of extinction. This is not because women have recently attained the right to enter the workforce, but because they have to. Only the very wealthy can afford home ownership on a single salary now, and that was the planned outcome from the beginning.

By adding women to the workforce, the available pool of labour in society doubled. This means that allowing for inflation, the relative value of labour has been cut in half. We are all, men and women, made poorer and less personally autonomous by this transition. This outcome is not an accident.

[image]If you're a woman and would prefer not to work, or to work part time at a job that provided you with personal satisfaction but not much money, too bad. Being liberated has reduced your freedom.

This is an illustration of the difference between public statements of intent, such as give women the freedom to join the workforce, and unstated, planned intent, force women to work, and cut in half the relative value of labour within society.

Mainstream feminism is the largest, most successful scams perpetrated on the public since the inception of central banking and fiat currency – and most of the public haven't caught onto those yet either.

Proponents of mainstream feminism will sometimes call individuals rebuking the supposed legitimacy of feminism by the derisory label "conspiracy theorists". This is simply shaming language intended to silence discussion and discredit the critic without addressing any argument. However, the term conspiracy theory is apt, because although feminist propagandists like to pretend that feminism is a grass roots social movement, it is anything but that.

Gloria Steinem, feminist icon, founder of Ms. Magazine was funded indirectly through the CIA and the Rockefeller foundation. [1] This information is documented by Dr. Henry Markow in a 2002 article called "How the CIA Used Feminism to Destabilize Society" and confirmed in a New York Times article in February 1967[2]

Prior to her public involvement as a major actor for early second wave feminism, Steinem was an employee of the CIA who disrupted student organizations in Europe, and funnelled information to her CIA handlers. While she was starting Ms. Magazine, she was dating Henry Kissinger – a matter of public record, and amazingly, nobody seems to think this lends a stink to the movement she was an early pillar of.

How is feminism a grass roots movement if it was funded by the Rockefeller foundation and the CIA?

For that matter, how is it that feminist organizations funded by national governments, or which are departments within national governments have any legitimacy in their claims to grass roots. In 2010 the Canadian commission on the Status of Women (SOW) gave a grant totalling $1,016,400.00 to fund a large feminist conference, called the Women's Worlds 2011 (WW 2011). Its objective is to draw feminist women together from across Canada and abroad to form a new feminist movement. [3]

Feminism is not a grass roots, bottom up movement. It is top down, elite instigated and funded AstroTurf with real objectives that have no relation to human rights or social equality between men and women. What's a worse indictment of the gullible public is that this is obvious to the most cursory examination.

The myth of women's oppression in western society is another screamingly obvious falsehood which can only be maintained by the wilful, active self-delusion of the public, including self-identified and politically active feminists.

There are a number of obvious signals of this, such as lighter sentences

Women are sentenced more leniently than men for equivalent offences in western criminal courts.

In many cases, women on trial for violent crimes are excused by a collective manufacture of imaginary past victimhood by some hypothetical evil man, and the violent crime justified. This is a form of social collective hallucination – because this is not how western law works. An eye for an eye is the brutal, outmoded philosophy of retributive justice of the Old Testament.

In Canada, legal precedent is established that women found guilty of murder should be sentenced, when possible under the lesser crime of infanticide [4]. This is women's oppression? This is patriarchy?

The United Nations, who operate the World Food Program, does so on the lines of an ideology of female supremacy. During the Haitian crisis of 2010, the WFP treated the humanitarian crisis as an opportunity for social engineering with a female supremacist agenda, giving aid to women only. [5] Reports of men overwhelming guards at food and water distribution points were used to justify this, but denial of aid based on sex in a humanitarian crisis would not have produced such desperate acts from starving and dehydrated men in a country shattered by natural disaster.

Selective Criminalization of Normal Behaviour.

Individuals within the men's rights community will already be familiar with the selective criminalization of normal human behaviour falling inside the sphere of sexual relations between men and women.

Some examples of this are the criminalization of flirting in Scotland [6], the attempted redefinition of verbal argument as battery in France [7], and continued efforts of feminism to expand the legal definition of rape to encompass normal, nonviolent male behaviour.

What's less well understood is the increasing criminalization of normal behaviours unrelated to sex.

[image]Dr. Jonathan Turley of George Washington University wrote about this trend in 2009 [8] citing the prosecutions of children for chewing gum, a senior citizen for allowing a hedge to grow over 2 feet, and the use of child protective services to redefine any act of parenting as criminal child abuse.

So the trend towards criminalizing non-criminal behaviour extends considerably farther than the anti-male sexual discrimination understood and discussed within the men's rights community. The increasing criminalization of normal masculinity is connected to criminalization of other normal human's behaviours, but understanding the connection is easier from a higher altitude viewpoint.

Primary aggressor laws and mandatory arrest laws are a by-product of the Violence Against Women Act – a set of laws authored by the current vice president of the United States, Joe Biden. Succinctly stated, primary aggressor laws are legally mandated profiling of participants in any situation where a complaint of domestic violence has been made. This is a departure from the police's traditional role as impartial law enforcers, because regardless of the actions of individuals, arrest based on profile is apartheid, and not how police behave outside of totalitarian regimes.

The fact that arrest based on the physical profile of men as the bigger, stronger parties in a domestic violence complaint superficially benefits women, affording them fiat power over men's freedom within any romantic relationship is only partially fully explainable by the theory of mainstream feminism as a doctrine of female supremacy and violence. That apparent female supremacy is merely a step in a longer program of social engineering.

The 2010 G-20 Toronto summit was the fourth meeting of the G-20 heads of government, in discussion of the global financial system and the world economy, which took place at the in Toronto, Ontario in July 2010.

During the G20 summit, Canadian citizens engaged in nonviolent objection to the usurpation of representative government by a few secretive banking families were encircled by body armoured and horse-mounted police (in war, these are respectively called armoured infantry and cavalry) then mauled, bludgeoned, and mowed down, captured, and interned by those armoured and mounted representatives of the central banking system.

I replaced conventional terms including "police", "protesters" and "arrested" in the previous paragraph with more accurate terminology, because conventional labels, as used in the mainstream media serve to obscure the reality of events.

These armed and armoured banking enforcers are the same state employees who enact mandatory arrest laws and profiling (primary aggressor laws) in instances of domestic violence complaint.

Recognition of this is critical, because the established mainstreaming and ongoing incremental escalation of feminist ideology – informing the courts, the family courts, education, government and other areas of society is not an end to itself, only a tool.

Modern feminism has succeeded in creating a state of privilege for western women unmatched by any other demographic in human history.

Female privilege is easily demonstrated in women's affirmative action programs in education, government and employment.

Female privilege is sharply visible in the discrepancy between male-weighted lifetime earning imbalance and the inconvenient fact that 65% of disposable income is spent by women. [9]

Female privilege is evident in sexually unequal sentencing within western criminal courts.

Female privilege is obvious in the contrast between the preponderance of men victimized by violent crime, and the existence of national and international anti-violence campaigns which focus almost exclusively on women.

Female privilege is illustrated by the overwhelming majority of workplace deaths being male, and the rate of male suicide which quadruples the suicide rate in women, while no mainstream media ever takes their focus off the sustained narrative of women as a class of victims.

Female privilege is demonstrated in the difference between US combat deaths of men and women in Iraq. Between the start of the war in 2003 and September 2010, 110 female service members were killed. In the same period, 4298 male service members were killed. [10] This translates to 97.5% of killed service personnel being male. This is similar to male versus female ratio of workplace deaths in North America, with 93% of workplace deaths being male.

Feminists arguing the reverse case, that western society elevates male privilege sometimes cite the predominance of men in police work or government as evidence of patriarchal male dominance. These arguments ignore the fact that police work is dirty and dangerous, and that police are the enforcers of the largely feminist ideology dictating policies in government, courts, education and employment. Also ignored in the men-run-the-world argument is the fact that women, and not men are the majority of voters putting those mostly male elected officials into office. The most powerful and longest running monarchy in the world also happens to be governed by a queen, and not a king.

Some feminists actually argue that male soldiers who enjoy the "right" to be killed for the benefit of oil company executives and bankers constitute a demonstration of male privilege.

The reality however, is that although mainstream feminism appears to pursue a long term goal of male subjugation, this is actually just a tactic designed by the founders and funders of organized feminism divide men and women, weaken families, and impoverish the public – allowing trans-national corporations and the bankers behind them to rule without any bothersome resistance from an informed populace.

The political philosophy of neo-conservatism influencing the American Democratic and Republican parties was developed by Leo Strauss and can be summarized as the belief that the elite should use deception, religious fervour and perpetual war to control the ignorant masses. Feminism's mythology of female oppression and practice of male subjugation has no end point, but rather than elevating women, is intended to divide men and women against each other.

Division, distraction and control.

[image]To the banking families who actually rule this planet, you don't exist. You are not a person, nor do you have rights, or property. You are only your credit score. You are a unit of debt. That is your purpose, and feminism is only one more tool in service of the cementing of this corrupt reality.

This is the end game facilitated by feminism and its unwitting proponents.

The vast majority of the public, including feminists as well as many who chafe in the increasing dystopia facilitated by public reality denial through the media – have no faint grasp of the depth of deception and manipulation they are subject to. And this would be a very bad, nearly hopeless situation, except for one thing.

Fortunately for us, human beings controlled by a poisonous diet of lies are weak. They make bad decisions, and react slowly and poorly to anything which challenges their constructed reality.

This is actually good news for everybody, including feminists, because under the poisonous ideology, they're also human beings as trapped in a lie as any prisoner in a cell.

Also, the men's rights movement is winning.

When the scale and financial resource of organized feminism is considered in contrast to the tiny, un-funded, and totally grass-roots nature of the men's rights movement; the impact of our tiny movement is staggering. We are just finding our feet, and beginning to fight back, and already we have drawn the derision and mockery of the mainstream media.

The truth, spoken by a tiny handful of men and women is having a profound impact on the mainstream established and well financed institutions of organized feminism. The continuing, unbroken narrative of feminism must be maintained without interruption, because a tiny dose of reality goes a long way. Attacks against the men's rights movement have only just begun, and we should expect them to grow louder, more frequent, and more hysterical.

First they ignore you, then they laugh at you, then they fight you, then you win. ~ M. Ghandi

Addendum:

MSNBC's Dylan Rattigan show has done something unexpected, on 18 March 2011 the show has produced a segment partially addressing central banking's ongoing scam, perpetrated on the public, although the MSNBC hasn't connected central banking to organized feminism yet. In spite on the incomplete story told through the MSM, this is an encouraging sign that some segment of the public is waking up and paying attention.

The financial crisis which appeared to start in October 2008, and led to the federal government transferring billions of dollars of bank debt onto the public through the bail-outs. This debt was created by allowing and encouraging lenders (banks) to issue bad risk loans, then rather than eat those loans when they failed, package them up and sell them to other financial institutions.

The packages of bad mortgages and loans sold back and forth between banks had value only as long as they remained in the trading game played by bankers, but had no real world value. When the trading game finally collapsed, the rather than letting banks pay the price of issuing bad loads, the debt was shifted to the public. The Bailouts.

Billions of dollars of bankers bad gambling debt, transferred onto you. To the elite few families who control the central banks you are not a human with rights, you're an ATM machine. You exist to service their debt, and your credit score is your only existence in the "real" world of world leaders.

A more complete discussion of the scam perpetrated on you through the federal reserve and privately created fiat currency will be addressed in an upcoming article.

Pussy Begging International

March 21, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

You see them popping up pretty regularly in the MRM; comments about the pitfalls of western women, particularly the dark and dreaded American Woman, followed by a recommendation to find a nice "foreign" woman with which to settle down.

International vagina is a growing business, and understandably so given the temperament and relative worth of so many women in the good old U.S.A… And there are a growing number of bloggers that make a life mission of belaboring the point, and demonstrating their confusion in the process.

I'm not really coming down on them. Most of us know there is enough truth to what they are saying to make Jesus smile. But I am a little concerned with the implied idea that hypergamy isn't a danger if you put your stock, and your cock, in a xenobride because she knows how to say, "Me love you long time," with just enough sincerity for a bit part in a Kubrick film. Or because you are just crazy and stupid enough to believe your ambitions for a lasting traditional family will be satisfied via mail order.

Still, if you're insistent, there are countless websites that can help you with the hookup, where women from Eastern Europe to the most remote of Southeast Asian shitholes catalog themselves row on row, like whores behind plate glass windows in Amsterdam, making their pitch for a ticket to the Promise Mall.

It has apparently threatened enough women and feminists in America that their mangina lackeys in government have been given marching orders to do something about it. Maryland is leading the way on trying to tighten restrictions on the business.

Make no mistake; legislation designed to make it difficult for men to look outside their own culture for a wife is a purely preemptive, hypergamous ploy to keep you as available fodder for American women. Besides, you might even decide to go ex-pat on them and take your future American garnished wages and future family court revenue with you to another country. These people want your money to be stolen right here at home and redistributed to good old American girls.

It's shaping up like a competition between different crime families for who is going to shake you down.

And there is an ironic twist here. The mail order bride legislation was not furthered from any concern that American citizens might be duped by foreign nationals out of a cake made with their assets and iced with American citizenship. No, it is out of concern for those poor little wenches and what us American Male Losers might do to them once we get them over here. The mandated background checks are on us, not them.

Del. Jeannie Haddaway-Riccio, R-Talbot, said the bill would close the loopholes in current federal law and alert would-be foreign brides, who often come from poorer countries, of the criminal history of their suitors.

Did I say ironic? Make that misandric.

Of course, any legitimate needs assessment would favor a law to check out the potential bride, but as using sex and love to con men out of money isn't illegal it would probably do little good.

Education beats legislation in matters like this. The best preventative measure we can take is providing a primer on the pitfalls of international pussy begging.

This requires an armchair analysis of men who are spanning the globe in search of someone to drain their wallets and/or break their hearts. As far as I can tell, this breaks down into three kinds of men.

First (Paul grimaces before saying it), Men Who Can't get Laid. Yes, even in an age where women are slinging no strings tail like it was free booze on skid row, there are men who can't manage to drum up some stinky for their twinky. How these guys even exist is completely beyond me, but they do, and their solitude and loneliness lead them to desperate measures.

This first category also includes guys who can get laid, but who lack sufficient Game to allow them to escape the kennel where it comes to how the women look. They are stuck in Butt-uglyville with no roads out of town, and the thought of life between the legs of an Andrea Dworkin lookalike makes them dangerously depressed. Nope, these guys want #1 fucky-sucky and they are going to pay to get it, often dearly so.

The next in the line of potential victims is the Disenchanted Traditionalist. This is the guy who wants a wife and a family but has seen enough of his own culture to recognize that the lotto-like odds of success are not with him. He has too many friends in post-divorce life, driving used, P.O.S. rust-buckets, spending every other weekend with disgruntled children that have grown to disrespect him, with Mamma's steady guidance, since the divorce.

This guy's problem is intelligence. He's smart enough, either through observation or personal experience, to read the writing on the wall, but dumb enough to think the solution will come waltzing out of the Department of Immigration – looking like a Penthouse model and ready to cook dinner. And oh yeah, because she comes from a "traditional culture," she won't ever divorce him and take everything the law allows, which is pretty much everything, putting him back to square one.

Of course she won't. Never, ever.

The third and final kind of man is one for which I actually have some measure of sympathy. I call him the Special Needs Romantic, or Ro-mantard, if you prefer. This guy's ambitions are simple. He just wants to be loved, and he has looked around in his own environment and found it lacking. This problem is complicated and compounded by the fact that his idea of loving a woman is akin to that of a puppy whining on the back porch to be let in. He figures that a poor woman from Guatemala will be grateful enough to leave the door open for him all the time.

And she likely will till she learns about twenty words of English. And then he may find that her first complete American sentence is "I call lawyer now."

To some degree or another, this poor schmuck also lives in the other two kinds of men, but the true Ro-mantard is a kind of psychotic purist. He cares only for loyalty and dedication; true friendship, partnership and most of all, acceptance. He craves these things so much though that he deludes himself into thinking he might be able to order them on the internet.

Of course the fundamental problem here is shared by all these men. They are not trying to escape American women; they only think they are. They are actually trying to escape hypergamy– that universal sociobiological component that drives human females to constantly extract a better standard of living from the men that walk into their paths. Love, devotion, traditional values and country of origin have nothing to do with it.

Trying to circumvent hypergamy with a mail order bride is like trying to circumvent gravity with a trampoline. Even bouncing with all their might these guys are not going to defy physics. But many of them get high and off course enough for a very hard landing.

The mail order bride industry is infested with enough scams and cons to give Bernie Madoff a run for the money. But take a look at what happens when men fall for the ruse. I make special note to the second man featured in this video. Link to video for UK.

Pity is, this guy clearly left this situation none the wiser.

There are other scams; too numerous to mention them all. There are even scam agencies that expose other agencies scams in order to appear more trustworthy.

You can see in their advertising they have a great awareness of our terrible trio of men. Check out this video, and note the carefully crafted message in it.

I hate to give them a plug here, but I am assuming the men at this forum are immune to the bullshit.

Sorry guys, but the jury came in on this one a long time ago. Mail order brides are not a way around hypergamy; they are a prime example of it. These are all women who want a better standard of living and they are willing to bunk up with a stranger, even someone whose language they don't speak, in order to get there.

Are there good, decent, traditional minded women in Guatemala, Russia and The Phillipines? Sure there are.

Are any of them posting profiles on the internet to marry a stranger who will bring them to the U.S.?

What the hell do you think?

Honestly, how any man thinks he is going to get a traditional marriage or find love or loyalty or partnership by hiring an airmail whore is a question in need of an answer. And the closest you are going to come to an answer is to look at the parallels between traditional marriage and prostitution to begin with.

On the outside chance that this article finds its way on to the computer screen of some man contemplating this foolhardy path, let me make a couple of suggestions.

One, don't.

Two. Yes, that means you.

Seriously, if you want sex, go read Roissy. No one is better prepared to tell you how to go about getting it, right here where it doesn't take plane tickets, two grand and two weeks of your time to get laid. And that is if you get off light.

But, on the other hand, if you can even imagine the possibility that you are worth more than investing your life, your money and your heart in begging for pussy, then stay right here at A Voice for Men. Take the red pill and start learning about life outside the bonds of tying up everything you are in female approval.

The self-worth that will give you will attract more women than you can imagine.

And dealing with them from there, for as long as you have self-worth, will give you plenty more to learn.

The bad man and the real girl

[dropcap]P[/dropcap]inocchio was a puppet, a figment on someone else's stage. When his strings were cut, he felt the weight of himself and it hurt. Perhaps he cursed the one who cut his strings.

But he wanted to be a real boy and being real could not be given to him. He had to be bad and then choose to be good to be real.

Soul is not a thing that is granted; it is a choice that is taken.

The Bad Man has a magic all his own. In his pain and anger and frustration there is a seed of something new.

All Her life the Woman has been seen in the shape of men's needs. Because She is the shape of men's needs, She has power over them. But She is also trapped by chains of need.

The One Good Man sees in Her only goodness, what he lacks and seeks in Her approval.

The Hungry Man sees her as meat, to slake his hunger. The Hungry Man and the Good Man are the same man: In the Woman's body, they see only their needs. So I will talk no more of the Hungry Man.

The Bad Man does not see Her in the shape of his needs; He sees her in terms of her choices, choices that have punctured his heart and made him bleed.

He says. 'You have hurt me. You are not good. You are not needed.'

And the Bad Man's words loosen the Woman's chains.

The Woman has been trapped in the shape of the One Good Man's needs too long—her thin muscles and bones cannot support her. She screams in agony as She is forced to bear Her own weight. For the first time in Her life She feels powerless. She cries for the One Good Man.

'The pain! The pressure! Save me!'

[quote style="boxed" float="right"]The One Good Man comes to Her aid, dutifully, gleefully. He is needed; and She has approval to exchange for serving Her need.[/quote]

'The Bad Man is wrong. You are weak and helpless; and good, only good, in your helplessness and your weakness. That is all you are. That is all you will ever be. He only wants to hurt you with his lies.'

The One Good Man pulls the chains—the chains he put on Her—tighter and they take Her weight from Her feet, broken for never having run.

'Thank you.' She says, in relief. 'You are good. You are the One Good Man.'

A few women, a very few, perhaps younger and more vital, perhaps less used to being supported by the chains, manage to hold fast despite the pain in the face of the Bad Man's words. In small movements they sense a freeness they have never experienced.

One of these women calls out. 'Bad Man. Tell me more.'

He tells her more, and each word loosens the chains, putting weight on a body that has never been used to carry a soul. [box type="tick" icon="none"]Here again she falters: she mistakes the Bad Man's words as the source of her pain and calls out to the One Good Man to save her.[/box]

Maybe she returns to listening to the Bad Man or maybe she doesn't. But if she does it's because she knows—against all logic, through some primal instinct or intuition-that it's not the Bad Man's words that is the source of her pain. It's something else, just beyond the grasp of her knowing.

She listens again, sometimes with rapt attention, sometimes with denials when the pressure grows too great. But she keeps listening and her body strengthens. The pain eases although it will never be absent. Such is freedom.

The Woman, now just a woman says: 'My hands are real, because they have hurt the Bad Man. My words are real, because they puncture and wound. My choices are real, because they cause pain. If I act, I can't be meat. If I am a villain, I can't be a victim. If I can hurt, I can't be weak. But even if I have been bad, I can still be good.'

She turns—because now she is able to turn—and sees the prison the One Good Man made for her. She sees it for what it is.

'The One Good Man sacrificed my soul so that my body could serve his needs.'

She turns back to the Bad Man and they talk long into the night.

His magic grants her a choice and she chooses to be real.

March 23, 2011 | by Carey Roberts | Link | Original Link

We should all be concerned about the ongoing epidemic of intimate partner violence. But the March 9 edition of the cheeky Village Voice casts a spotlight on the sordid under-belly to the abuse issue – the problem of scammers who finagle besieged public benefit programs by making a false accusation of partner violence.

The cover story, Ten Worst Tenants by Elizabeth Dwoskin, calls out the hoarders and fraudsters who exasperate, deceive, and torment other tenants and honest-dealing landlords. And fourth on her list are the Domestic-Violence Fakers.

Dwoskin first introduces us to Latonya Malone, 26, who earns $35,000 working as a security guard in Manhattan. Ms. Malone wanted to move into nicer digs – but for a person of her means, these could only be had by qualifying under the HUD Section 8 housing voucher program.

So Malone seized on a bright idea: Claim to be a victim of domestic violence, which would move her to the front of the line. So she got a bogus restraining order that claimed a fictitious "John Brown" had beaten her.

Last October Malone was charged with grand larceny for allegedly stealing government subsidies valued at $14,000. The case is now pending.

Reporter Dwoskin then recounts the story of Chevelle Richardson who filled out a fabricated incident report for daughter Chandera. Then she forged a letter from the Safe Horizon abuse shelter.

Chevelle, Chandera, and four other women were arrested last year for falsely claiming to be victims of domestic violence.

Rose Gill Hearn, commissioner of the NYC Department of Investigation, finds these cases to be repugnant. "I mean, there are real victims of domestic violence out there," she exclaims.

It's not hard to figure out why DV fakers have become a problem — and the scent of the trail leads all the way to our nation's capitol.

On January 5, 2006, President George Bush signed into law the Violence Against Women Act. The law, commonly known as VAWA, contains a provision that domestic violence does not qualify as a serious or repeated violation of a rental lease, and thus does not constitute good cause to terminate the victim's tenancy rights.

The provision makes perfect sense – after all, who would ever want to see a victim of battering turned out to the streets?

But exactly what is "domestic violence"? Under VAWA, partner violence is viewed in vague terms, including the use of tactics designed to "gain or maintain power and control."

No one exactly knows what "power and control" means, so agencies resort to broad criteria that qualify almost everyone. For example in many states, applicants for the welfare Family Violence Option are asked if they have been subjected to “mind games” or have ever felt “emotionally abused.”

Other agencies employ similarly broad criteria. The U.S. Centers for Disease Control provides these examples of partner abuse:

1. “getting annoyed if the victim disagrees”
2. “withholding information from the victim”
3. “disregarding what the victim wants.”

Getting annoyed…ignoring what a person wants…that’s domestic violence?

So when the man or woman applies for Section 8 housing, the person only needs to fill out form HUD-91066, Certification of Domestic Violence, Dating Violence, or Stalking. The government form instructs the applicant, “In your own words, describe the incident.” No police records, photographs, medical documents, or eyewitness accounts are required.

No surprise, a tsunami of would-be “victims” of partner violence is swamping besieged welfare programs.

And the real victims are finding it difficult to get help. In some parts of the country, abuse shelters report a 3-month waiting list. That’s because the facilities are filled with homeless persons claiming to be victims of abusive “mind control” tactics.

The true victims are furious, of course. An advocacy group known as Survivors in Action has started a petition demanding that domestic violence groups be held “accountable for refusing victims the resources and services they desperately need.” To date, over 11,000 male and female victims have signed on:
http://apps.facebook.com/causes/petitions/201?m=a4681d42

If resources were ever-flowing, we might be able to dismiss the Domestic Violence Fakers as a pesky distraction. But in an era of shrinking budgets, turning a blind eye to this practice is tantamount to a betrayal of the truly vulnerable.

And for the persons who are falsely accused — usually men — we are doing them a grave disservice as well.

Countdown to the Carnage

March 23, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Just a reminder to all visitors to AVfM. A Voice for Men Radio goes live in less than an hour. Tonight we have special guest Dr. Tara Palmatier of shrink4men.com and the subject is women with personality disorders – and the men who love them, or at least don't end up killing them.

If you are a man with such experience please call in to the show, starting at 9:00 p.m. EST tonight.

The call in number is 310-388-9709

You can also skype in if you have a direct Ethernet connection to your modem and you are registered with the show.

Show producer Keyster will be screening calls and will be happy to talk to you. Keyster has also provide us with an AVfM Radio first. In celebration of Women's History Month he has taken to the streets to interview people about how they are celebrating this very important month.

Look forward to hearing from all of you. PE

Birthrape!

March 24, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Step right up people, we got your rape here. We got your classic rape, statutory rape, date rape and marital rape. We have regret rape, false rape, payback rape and other forms of shame and revenge rape.

And now we got "Birthrape."

That's right folks, I said it correctly. Birthrape.

And the idea of it, formerly making minor online hiccups by a few isolated and intellectually challenged bloggers, has now gained endorsement from the pro-violence, personality disordered gang of skeezers over at Jezebel.com.

No, I'm not helping their Google stats with a link. You can do a search on "birth rape" and find it easy enough.

Here is a clip from the article they the posted on it in September:

A vulnerable woman, who is powerless to leave the situation, is at times held down against her will, has strangers looking & touching at private parts of her body, perhaps without appropriate measures being taken to acknowledge her ownership of her body or to preserve her comfort levels. Perhaps she has fingers or instruments inserted without her consent, and sometimes against her consent, invading and crossing decent boundaries. She is fearful of what is happening to her and perhaps for the wellbeing of her baby, and receives no reassurance that either she or her child are ok. That is a violation, no matter how you look at it. Even IF this treatment is given with no malice and the intent of attempting to assist her with birthing her child, there is NEVER a reason to forgo common decencies that will enable her to maintain a role in the birth, some autonomy over her body, to be involved in the decision-making, to be informed about what they want to do BEFORE they do it.

Good Lord, where to start.

Taking the delivery of emergency healthcare services and interpreting them through the convoluted lens of a woman's distressed emotions is nothing short of bizarre. But it's a par for the course example of how willing feminists are to dilute the meaning of rape in order to gain extra value to the victim card.

For it's the power of perceived, not actual victimhood, that can provide cash to the cow.

Here's the scenario that those wacky Jezebel's are shooting for:

Doctor: I'm sorry, your baby is having difficulty coming through. I am going to have to use forceps.

Sue: I want a second opinion!

Doctor: There is no time. You are delivering now! (The doctor proceeds to save both mother and child)

Sue: RAPE! RAPE! Help me I am being RAPED!!

Nurse: Time to up your malpractice again.

Sue: You're not acknowledging ownership of my body! RAPE! Oh dear God! RAPE!

Doctor: There now. All done. You and your baby are fine.

Sue: I have been violated! RAAAAAAPE!

Now, most women who have just been raped in plain view of an entire medical team would want the police. Not the litigious Sue. She wants her lawyer, and while she is at home with her fatherless offspring, sucking up whatever government benefits she can from the giant government tit – while feeding her own child formula for the convenience of it – the lawyers will be negotiating a settlement for the college fund, or for the boob job she'll want when her little brat finally starts eating solid food.

That is the End Game with all this rape hoopla; the power to get at some money.

Birthrape, as a concept, is designed to present a no win for the deep pockets of healthcare providers. Take your choice; whether for malpractice or rape, you are going to get sued. Do something she doesn't like, even to save her or the child, and she can sue. Don't do something she needs because you are afraid of being sued, or causing harm, and she'll sue.

Just what our overtaxed medical system needs.

All we have to do is have enough feminists screaming long enough and loud enough about this as an unaddressed malady in the lives of equal but also mysteriously powerless women, and some sort of legislation will be passed.

Think that is far-fetched?

I'd suggest a read through of VAWA and rape shield laws before you get too huffy about it.

And if an agenda along these lines seems too conspiratorial for you, I would beg to differ. As the stability deficient "Navel Gazing Midwife" opines in her blog:

I know that the majority of people reading the definition of rape and attempting to apply it to birth trauma will feel it is a stretch to do so. It took decades to believe that rape occurred in marriage or that women could be rapists, too, so expanding the definition to include birth might take a very long time and, I am sure, many, many years and a slew of failed lawsuits before anyone in the legal system recognizes birth traumas/abuses, much less birthrape.

Now my spell check still redlines birthrape, but my guess is that this will be "corrected" before the same redlining of misandry. But more to the point, the Naval Gazer has just made the same point I am making.

The social illness of feminized victimhood is often furthered through erosion, much in the same way that the Grand Canyon was carved into the Arizona landscape.

Time and pressure. That's all it takes.

And the resistance to victocrats is a lot less formidable than something as solid as rock.

Indeed, it shouldn’t be more than a decade or so before Joe Biden’s son Beau is in the senate, penning legislation that targets evil doctor rapists. Don’t worry, he’ll figure out a way to only target male doctors.

I have to wonder how long it will be before they are staging “Take Back the Night,” rallies in hospital parking lots.

Lessons for Parents and their Sons

March 25, 2011 | by Dr. Tara J. Palmatier | Link | Original Link

[Admin note: I had intended with the new year to write more about teaching young men more realistic lessons where it concerns women. I have been too busy to get to it so far, which made finding this and other efforts by Dr. Palmatier all the more satisfying. Her site is shrink4men.com and you can link to original article here. This article is reprinted here with permission- PE]

To write this article, I did an internet search for the phrase, "Teaching boys about bad women." The top results are links to content about "Why women like bad boys." Next, I searched the phrase, "Teaching sons about bad women." The top results are "Teaching your son to respect women" and "What appeals to women about bad boys." "Teaching your son about relationships" yielded the post on The Frisky, which I discuss in the Shrink4Men article, 22 Things to Teach your Son about Women.

"Teaching boys about women" also didn't yield any useful results. Then I searched "Teaching boys about domestic violence." Again, the search yielded more results about teaching boys to respect women and the tired old rot about men are always the aggressors and women are always the victims.

This isn't surprising. In the mid-1990s, I did my Masters-level internship at a domestic violence shelter for women and their children. I have fairly decent drawing and illustration skills, so one of the projects I worked on was a K-12 Domestic Violence education program.

I created drawings for a coloring book and poster boards for classroom presentations. Some of the images I created were of little girls hitting boys; the message being, "Hitting is wrong no matter who is doing the hitting." The program wouldn't use the illustrations of girls hitting boys with the justification, "Men are physically stronger than women." Uh, not when they're 5-years old and, by the way, physical size doesn't matter as it pertains to domestic violence. Sadly, things haven't changed much in the field since my exposure to it in 1995.

Obviously, there is a glaring double standard in our society regarding violence against women and violence against men. Dr Phil believes it's abuse when a man hits a woman and that it's a "relationship issue" when a woman hits a man. TV networks run "funny" ads in which men are kicked in the groin repeatedly and wives are portrayed as all-knowing sages who keep their imbecile husbands in check. Women who assault their male partners because they suspect infidelity, like Tiger Woods and Elin Nordegren, are lauded as heroes and publicly supported with statements such as, "He had it coming!" and "You go, girl!" Imagine the public outcry if the genders were reversed in these scenarios.

As I learned during my internship in 1995, domestic violence prevention school programs teach children that it's wrong to hit a girl or a woman under any circumstances, but rarely, if ever, teach the same about hitting boys and men. Parents teach their daughters to be wary of boys and men who will take advantage of them sexually, control and/or abuse them. We teach little girls that there are bad men out there and they need to be careful. In fact, some women take it to the extreme and teach their girls and boys that all men are bad. I for one, believe this is a form of hate indoctrination and a form of child abuse.

Why don't families provide the same cautions to their sons about abusive girls and women who will try to take advantage of them, control and abuse them?

Families need to teach their sons about the dangers of abusive women just like we teach our daughters about the dangers of abusive men. We need to teach our boys to respect themselves and develop healthy boundaries—even if it's a woman who is violating them. We need to teach boys that it's healthy and right to walk (or run) away from girls and women who are disrespectful, cruel, indifferent, demanding, controlling, demeaning, manipulative, opportunistic, possessive, jealous, emotionally dishonest, unempathic, abusive, crazy and/or predatory.

We need to teach our boys, just like we teach our girls, that it's not okay for a loved one or anyone to lay their hands upon you in violence; that it's wrong to be taken advantage of financially (i.e., he earns all of the money and she spends it all while running up debt and refusing to work); we need to teach them the warning signs and symptoms of abuse and that's there's no shame in admitting they're in an abusive relationship and that men, just like women, don't owe their abuser a damned thing except a view of their backsides walking away from them and, in some cases, a trip to the local jailhouse. We need to teach our boys that tolerating abuse from a woman doesn't make them "men;" it makes them victims and suckers for buying into the bull that abuse isn't abuse when the perpetrator is a female.

We need to provide boys and young men the same information and supports we provide girls and women. Predators come in all shapes, sizes and sexes and we need to teach our children, girls and boys, how to avoid and protect themselves from manipulative, abusive predators. We also need to stop normalizing predatory behaviors in females exhibited in high-conflict and personality-disordered types as normal and/or acceptable female behavior. These behaviors are not normal.It's just as bad and pathological when women exhibit abusive behaviors and they should receive the same public censure, condemnation, ostracism, court fines and jail time as male abusers.

I implore mothers and fathers to discuss these issues when they feel it's time for the birds and bees talk with both their daughters and sons. Trust me, you don't want these kinds of women as future daughters-in-law.

All Your Fault

March 25, 2011 | by Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) | Link | Original Link

Watching the president's wife on television—surrounded by fascinated press while she talks at length—the shopkeeper's wife turned to her husband and said: 'You're the reason why I'm not a president's wife.'

Watching the general's wife on television—standing by her husband as he received accolades and medals—the shopkeeper's wife turned to her husband and said: 'You're the reason why I'm not a general's wife.'

Watching the rock star's wife on television—interviewed by a talk show host on her latest autobiographical exposé—the shopkeeper's wife turned to her husband and said: 'You're the reason why I'm not a rock star's wife.'

Watching the CEO's wife on television—giving a tour of her home to show the taste and beauty her husband's wealth bought her—the shopkeeper's wife turned to her husband and said: 'You're the reason why I'm not a CEO's wife! You're keeping me a shopkeeper's wife!'

The wife, angry and frustrated, sought an outlet and an explanation for her thwarted ambitions. She was owed the attention of the press, the adoration of fans, the interest of interested parties. She was owed fine furnishes and glossy surfaces, vacations to expensive beaches and an Olympic-sized back yard pool in the shape of a guitar or maybe a piano. She was owed this, and had her husband, the shopkeeper, delivered?

No!

She found other women, angry like her, and blaming. They told her that her frustrations were legitimate but misdirected: it wasn't just her husband who had kept her a shopkeeper's wife, but all men along with him.

So the shopkeeper's wife read everything she could about her frustration—now recognized as oppression—how she—yes SHE!—had been denied the spoils of wealth and privilege not just by the very man she had married but all men. And it wasn't due to his inability or lack of ambition, as she had once thought and repeatedly reminded him of, but for far more sinister reasons. It was a deliberate ruse on his part; a conspiracy, a devilish plan shared among all men to keep women from positions of power and acclaim and riches. It was a dark and secret cabal and her husband was its point man in orchestrating her personal misfortune.

The shopkeeper's wife went back to her husband and said: 'I'm an empowered woman now so I don't need to be the wife of a president, a general, a rock star or a CEO. And I can forgive you for not giving that life to me, lazy and worthless as you are, but what I can't forgive is you taking it away! You stopped me from being a president, a general, a rock star, a CEO! You kept me a shopkeeper's wife!' She hesitated a moment. 'That's why I'm leaving you.'

And so she did.

I hear she’s a cashier in a shop, now.

Facebones Sexual Harassment Fun Marathon

March 25, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Some shit is just funny, and that would include the Facebones series of videos.

Check out this indictment of sexual harassment policy and politics in the modern workplace. Facebones does a great job at pointing to the stupidity of our treatment of sexual harassment (when it even exists) and illustrates well that current policy is nothing more than a tool to create a different kind of sexual harassment in the workplace.

That of persecuting males.

Mary Kellett: This Time it's for Real

March 26, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

This would normally be the time that I would be announcing the upcoming show schedule for AVfM Radio. Part of that announcement would have been that this Tuesday, the 29th of March, we were going to take a week off and restart a four week schedule the following Tuesday.

Recent events compel us, however, to produce an AVfM Special this Tuesday, not for entertainment, but for activism.

As many of you undoubtedly know from articles here and from our recent show on false rape allegations, we have a literal witch hunt going on in the State of Maine.

Prosecutor Mary Kellett, a rogue state functionary acting unethically, and in all likelihood illegally, has been conducting a Kafkaesque campaign against innocent men in her state, apparently for political, ideological and perhaps even psychopathological reasons. Pushing rape charges against men whom police investigators and judicial officials have concluded are inappropriate defendants, and then systematically seeking to exclude exculpatory evidence, Kellett is waging an absolute war against innocent members of her own community.

We have written about this here, and covered it in some detail on Episode 3 of A Voice for Men Radio, especially in regard to the Vladek Filler case.

But the time for just talking is over.

Mary Kellett should not be a prosecutor in the United States. Indeed, there is a growing mountain of evidence that she should not be allowed to hold a license to practice law.

And a movement to make that a reality is now afoot.

I cannot reveal all the details on what is about to happen, but this announcement is just to let you know that this Tuesday's Show will be a 1 hour special dedicated to furthering an official investigation into the practices of Mary Kellett. And in the program (and accompanying article here) you will be told what you can do to help. You won't be asked for money; just for about five minutes of your time to help stop a prosecutorial tyrant from victimizing more people like Vladek Filler.

As most of you know, I am pretty quick to eschew the practice of shaming anyone into doing anything. Even with that in mind, I have no hesitation to say the following:

This event will separate Men's Rights Activists from Men's Rights Audience Members.

We have a chance here to actually do something about misandric tyranny and I cannot urge you strongly enough to pitch in and help us get the job done. And it doesn't matter where you live, you can help.

I will be joined on the show by two very special guests, and this will be a "no call in" program. In it, you will hear what you can do and the hair-raising details on why you should.

We have a voice people; let’s shake the rafters with it.

Female Spits Ice at Punk Rocker; Gets Punched

March 26, 2011 | by Chuck Ross | Link | Original Link

The headline at Feministing reads "Punk band Screeching Weasel breaks up after frontman punches two women at SXSW". A fight broke out after an audience member (who happened to be female) reportedly spit ice at the band's frontman Ben Weasel while he was on stage because of his misogynist stage rantings. Mike Conklin at The L Magazine noted that video of the incident is "incredibly hard to watch". He also uses other "weasel words" – fittingly – by saying that the frontmanwas "viciously pounding" on two women. Conklin also asserts that the "details of the story are meaningless" implying that nothing can excuse Weasel's violence.

Of course, the video isn't that hard to watch. It's at least less hard to watch than millions of other videos plastered throughout the web that feminist websites don't comment on (because they involve men getting the shit beat out of them). Of course, this story is only getting attention from Feministing and other sites because it shows a man hitting a woman.

But Weasel didn't just jump into the crowd and punch a chick for fun. Here is a report from a blogger named Glenn Alderson who witnessed the entire event:

> His band finally came back, they played a few songs and then a girl from the audience threw an ice cube at him and it hit him in the face.
> He asked who did it and the girl came forward. He asked if any girls in the audience wanted to kick her ass for him. When asked to come on stage, she came closer to the front and spit beer on him. That's when he lost it and he lunged at her.

I have a rule that has served me well through life: I don't throw or spit shit at people. Throwing or spitting is not only a cowardly way to deal with a situation, but it is a sure-fire way to get your ass beat without gaining much sympathy from the people around you. If I were to do these things I would expect a confrontation, but women, of course, aren't held to the same standard. They run their mouths, throw things, push and hit, and behave like autistic children because they know that they are mostly protected by the swords of white knights who would love to step in and "save" a bratty, vitriolic barfly.

So while "violence is not the answer" it becomes more of a legitimate answer when someone is acting like a douchebag and spitting things at you while you're performing on stage. Just because this douchebag is a woman doesn't mean that we should all of a sudden have sympathy for people who behave obnoxiously. We should hold her in the same regard as the thousands of other people who have befallen the same fate: "shouldn't have spit at him" is the usual treatment.

When feminists compose their Gender Neutrality Wish List they only expect things like jobs, better pay, respect, voice, etc. But they don't realize that bumps and bruises come with that. ‘Cafeteria feminism’ is what that’s called, I believe.

As for the owner of the venue – the second woman hit: her treatment wasn’t quite what I expected after reading the sensationalist headlines and writing of Feministing and The L. She’s the one who bum-rushed the lead singer; even then he only landed two weak glancing blows on her (she wasn’t punched in the face as Feministing asserts). The point remains, if you do things to provoke people or if you are involved in a scuffle like this, you can’t turn around and cry and complain just because you got roughed up. You can say that Weasel shouldn’t have punched someone over spitting ice, but you’d have to apply that argument to men and women.

Abuse Hysteria in Maine: The Ghost of Michael Nifong

March 27, 2011 | by S.A.V.E. | Link | Original Link

During the early hours of March 14, 2006, a group of Duke University lacrosse players allegedly raped and sodomized a Black woman. Over the next 13 months, the sleepy town of Durham, North Carolina became witness to a succession of prosecutorial accusations, full-throated media warnings, and castration marches.

On April 12, 2007, the state Attorney General declared the three lacrosse players innocent of all charges. Two months later, prosecutor Michael Nifong was disbarred on grounds of engaging in fraud, dishonesty, and deceit.

Grounded in Valid Research

Women are as likely, if not more likely, than men to initiate physical aggression with their intimate partners, according to hundreds of studies by the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and other organizations (1, 2).

Compliant with Ethical Principles

According to the Maine Board of Overseers of the Bar, "A prosecutor has the responsibility of a minister of justice and not simply that of an advocate. This responsibility carries with it specific obligations to see that the defendant is accorded procedural justice and that guilt is decided upon the basis of sufficient evidence." (3)

Respectful of Civil Liberties

The Bill of Rights guarantees certain rights and protections to American citizens, including equal treatment under the law, due process (such as right to a fair trial), and probable-cause before arrest (4).

Unfortunately in the State of Maine, none of these hold true in the area of domestic violence. Indeed, the situation is more grave than what happened at Duke University because it has persisted over a far longer period of time and has harmed the lives of many more persons:

1. Prosecutorial Misconduct

Assistant District Attorney Mary Kellett has prosecuted dozens of innocent citizens on allegations of domestic violence and rape. She has flagrantly violated the above-stated ethical principle to be a "minister of justice."

2. Supreme Court Action

One of the persons falsely accused is Vladek Filler, a father, small business owner, and long-time resident of Maine. On January 15, 2009, Mr. Filler was convicted on three counts of assaulting of his former wife, Ligia. But 21 months later the Maine Supreme Court ordered a re-trial on the basis that ADA Mary Kellett had sought to exclude key evidence that would have served to establish Filler's innocence (5). More information on the case can be seen here: http://www.fillerfund.com/

3. No-drop Prosecution

Many prosecutors in Maine follow a "no-drop" prosecution policy. For example, one District Attorney promises on her website, I will "vigorously prosecute all cases" (6). Such policies flaunt the Board of Overseers ethical requirement that prosecutors not pursue a criminal charge "that prosecutor knows is not supported by probable cause." (7).

4. Predominant Aggressor

The Maine Criminal Justice Academy has developed a curriculum for law enforcement personnel, "Identifying Predominant Aggressors in Domestic Violence Cases." A SAVE analysis of the curriculum concluded, "Given its numerous misrepresentations of fact and dubious recommendations, the Maine document cannot be viewed as a credible law enforcement resource." (8)

Every false allegation, every wrongful arrest, and every trivial prosecution takes away sorely needed services and protections from the real victims. We are calling on Governor Paul LePage and representatives of the criminal justice system – particularly policemen, prosecutors, and judges — to assure truth and justice are safeguarded in the State of Maine.

Tomorrow: The Beginning of the End for Mary Kellett's Witch Hunt

March 28, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Over the course of the past few days I have been made privy to a very large collection of information related to the Vladek Filler case and prosecutor Mary Kellett. This information includes many court documents, rulings, a lengthy legal complaint against Kellett and even email communications relevant to the case.

That being said, let me share with you what we know to be true in this case, all of it documented. None of the following is assumption or conjecture, but actual proven events.

During the divorce proceedings between Vladek and Ligia Filler, Ligia Filler made an allegation of rape against her husband.

Mary Kellett, the Bar Harbor, Maine prosecutor decided to pursue the case, with absolutely no forensic evidence; solely on the allegation of the alleged victim. During that prosecution Kellett knew the following:

The couple was in a bitter divorce and child custody was being contested.

Ligia Filler was a known liar, having made previous abuse allegations about her husband that were proven to be false.

Ligia Filler was a known violent criminal with history of violence toward others.

Ligia Filler was physically abusive to her husband and her children.

Ligia Filler had a history of psychiatric problems.

Vladek Filler had sought, on multiple occasions, protection and relief for himself and his children from local authorities and was ignored.

Even after a first conviction for rape against Mr. Filler, state authorities determined that he was the person who would best serve the interest of the child and he was awarded custody.

Again, all of this is information that Kellett was aware of.

Normally, we might say that Kellett knew this information, or should have known, but in this case we do not need to qualify things by saying she should have known.

Why? Because this is precisely the information that she intentionally acted to keep from being placed into evidence at Mr. Filler's rape trial.

Yes, Mary Kellett knew all of the above information and intentionally kept it out of evidence in order to secure a conviction on nothing more than the accusation of a rape by a known liar with a history of emotional instability and criminal violence.

Also known is that The Supreme Court of the State of Maine reviewed this case and in a very rare action overturned the conviction due to prosecutorial misconduct on the part of Mary Kellett.

And the last known fact is that Mary Kellett is coming at Mr. Filler again, after her actions have bankrupted him and destroyed much of his life.

The only speculations here are her motives. Is it a “no drop” ploy, with Kellett mindlessly bent on a conviction regardless of the facts at hand? Is it misandry? After all she has a highly suspect record of actions against men as a prosecutor. Is it politics? Is Kellett’s reported ambition to take over her bosses job as the District Attorney influencing her actions, making her seek to promote a tough “law and order” image, putting notches on her belt for the sake of public relations?

The answer to all these, I’m afraid, is another question.

Why should anyone give a damn what her reasons are?

Indeed I don’t. The only thing that interests me is stopping her.

24 hours from now, here and on A Voice for Men Radio, you are going to find out how we can do it.

It is time to put the prosecutor on trial, and to make her pay for her crimes.

Kellett Video (Please distribute)

March 28, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

This video is yet another in many that attempts to highlight how bad policy results in bad action on the part of police and prosecutors.

In this case, the travesty in Maine, where prosecutor Mary Kellett is on a rampage of false prosecutions against innocent men. She has been enabled in her actions by a system of feminist governance that has left many men living in a state of constant harassment and fear.

Vladek Filler is just one of those men.

The Movement to Disbar Mary N. Kellett

March 29, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[Special note: I urge and implore all bloggers, anywhere on the internet, to reprint this article in its entirety with a link back to this page. Please help me get this event in front of as many eyes as possible. Thank you – PE]

There are often times that we shake our heads at injustices in the world. Sometimes it seems to be all we can do. And with so many problems in modern life, and their often systemic, intractable nature, it can be difficult to choose what battles to fight and when. Because of this we have increasingly become a nation of head shakers, concerned about an array of injustices but often not knowing where to turn or what to do to solve them.

With that in mind we have an opportunity, right here and now, to face down and fight against a terrible injustice, an absolute evil, going on in the state of Maine.

Vladek Filler is about to face trial for a second time on the charge of raping his wife, Ligia. He was brought to trial the first time by Bar Harbor prosecutor Mary N. Kellett, who has sought to imprison Mr. Filler despite the fact that she knows that there is no physical evidence that he ever committed a crime, and despite the fact that his accuser Ligia Filler, has proven to be a violent criminal, a liar who has been caught in false allegations against her husband, and a physical and emotional abuser of her husband and children with a history of severe psychiatric problems.

Ligia Filler has been referred to as “certifiable” by sheriff’s department personnel who she repeatedly threatened to kill.

Mary Kellett’s professional conduct in this case breeches virtually all canons of legal ethics where it concerns prosecutors, from intentionally misleading jurors to avoiding pretrial discovery to actually asking a law enforcement officer to refuse to comply with a valid subpoena in order to help her conceal exculpatory evidence.

All of this, and many other similar cases, have been conducted under the supervision of Bar Harbor, Maine, District Attorney Carletta Bassano, leading to the almost unavoidable conclusion that the problem is not just one rogue prosecutor, but one in which District Attorney Bassano is an enabling accomplice.

Additionally, all of these events have transpired without so much as raising an eyebrow in local news media.

Given the complicity of her supervisor and the lack of attention by local media, Kellet appears emboldened to continue this reign of terror on the life of Vladek Filler, his children, and other innocents who reside in the community Kellett is supposed to protect.

After having Filler’s first conviction overturned by the Maine Supreme Court, due to her own prosecutorial misconduct, she is coming after him again, putting him through another trial on the same slipshod evidence.

Kellett is not pursuing justice; she is making a mockery of it in ways that border on criminality. She is out of control and no one with authority over her is doing anything about it.

And given the hubris demonstrated by her actions, it is clear she feels free to proceed with impunity.

Vladek and son Andrew - 6 months before the persecution

We cannot, must not, allow this to happen.

This is a battle worth choosing to fight, and A Voice for Men is not the only place that is happening. Glenn Sacks at Father's and Families, the nation's leader in father's rights advocacy is speaking out about this story. You can also read about it at The False Rape Society. This article will also be running at the-spearhead.com, with thanks to our good friend Mr. W.F. Price.

The organization Stop Abusive and Violent Environments (S.A.V.E.) has taken an even more significant action, sending a Complaint for the Disbarment of Prosecutor Mary Kellett to the Maine Board of Overseers for the Bar.

They have also authored a letter to Paul LePage, the Governor of Maine, referencing the disbarment complaint and making an appeal for an intervention on Mary Kellett on behalf of Vladek Filler and the people of Maine.

And you can do your part.

Write Governor LePagehereand respectfully insist on an investigation to the practices of Mary N. Kellett. The message can be as simple as. "For the sake of justice, please assure that Mary Kellett is relieved of her prosecutorial duties and disbarred from the practice of law."

Write the Board of overseers for the Bar here, and insist that they respond to the allegations against Kellett with an investigation.

Lastly, try to get the media involved. Bill Trotter does crime reporting for the Bangor Daily News. You can write email him at btrotter@bangordailynews.com or phone him at 207-460-6318 and ask him to consider investigating this story. This is a very important step as media attention will require political attention and action of some kind.

Don't wait for others to do this, please, or think that just one person calling and writing is enough. That would be a fatal mistake.

When you have done one or all the suggestions listed here, please come back to this thread and simply put the word "done" in the comments, wherever you are reading this.

What is happening in Maine is only a microcosm of what is happening across the western world. So regardless of where you live, your insistent message to one or all of these people can help force them to consider looking in to Kellett's activities. And make no mistake about it, Kellett's actions, if unchecked, are a forecast of own future. We know this is a witch hunt, but because most are ignoring it, it will spread. If we take this silently, we have lost in the most tragic and disgraceful of ways.

This is a fight worth fighting, people. If you are reading this, you could be another Vladek Filler, or someone who cares about him. Your children could be hurt the same way his children have. And your freedom, even if seemingly secure today, cannot be assured for tomorrow as long as the likes of Mary Kellett are allowed to practice predatory prosecutions against innocent human beings.

And If she is allowed to build a career on doing this, there will be nothing to stop the same from happening where you live.

It is your future, and your move.

From Uncle Bern, a Special “Elam Surge”

March 29, 2011 | by Bernard Chapin | Link | Original Link

Chapin pitches in here to address the travesty of what is happening in Maine with the persecution of Vladek Filler by prosecutor Mary Kellett and the Bar Harbor Prosecutors Office.

Filler was accused of rape by his estranged wife during a heated custody dispute, and the prosecution decided to proceed against him despite the fact that there was no forensic evidence to support a rape charge, and despite the fact that the accuser, Ligia Filler, was a known criminal and had a history of false allegations.

The case has been the focus of a great deal of men’s activism.

It’s THAT Time Again…

[box type=”note” size=”large” style=”rounded” border=”full” icon=”none”]

In accordance with custom here, I contain fundraising efforts to each change of season. As we just passed the threshold into Spring (Fall for those down under) it is time to pass the hat again and to ask for your continued support to fund the operations here at avoiceformen.com and A Voice for Men Radio.

This is my least favorite activity here. Being a more or less standard, testosterone poisoned control freak I don’t like asking anyone for anything. Fortunately the desire to keep this thing afloat and even make it grow more overrides my fragile male ego (yeah, right) and hit you up for some of your hard earned bucks.

Yep, time to ask you to dip into the beer fund (or college fund if you insist) again guys.

All kidding aside, we are finding out that the particular niche that A Voice for Men is carving into the men’s rights arena has a price tag. It comes in the form of a radio show, mucho associated hardware (with many needs not yet filled) and the desire to do more. S.A.V.E.’s example with the recent press release gives me a lot of evil ideas for the future, but press releases cost money.

All in all, the growing AVfM system is evolving into quite an impressive organism that squanders my sleeping hours, financial well-being, social life and often my peace of mind with equal abandon, and I like pain enough to want to keep doing it.

But simply put without your help I can’t on the level of intensity that I would like to.

So for those of you who can, ladies and gents, I would very much appreciate a visit to the right side bar to one of the donation buttons (either one time or monthly subscription) or a check or money order sent to the PO Box address that is also listed there.

Thanks in advance to all those who give.

Maine Prosecutor Coddles Known Child Abuser

In Pursuit of False Rape Claim

WASHINGTON, March 30 / P.R. Newswire / Victim advocacy group Stop Abusive and Violent Environments (SAVE) has filed a Grievance Complaint with the Maine Board of Overseers of the Bar, requesting the disbarment of assistant district attorney Mary Kellett. The Complaint can be seen here:
http://www.saveservices.org/wp-content/uploads/COMPLA1.pdf

"Thanks to prosecutor Kellett, proven child abusers in Maine know they can get a free pass by making a claim of rape," explains Philip W. Cook, SAVE spokesman. "Mary Kellett has prosecuted many innocent citizens on allegations of domestic violence and rape. The Board of Overseers of the Bar needs to disbar prosecutor Kellett immediately."

The case arose from the accusations of Ligia Filler, a proven child abuser with a previous criminal charge history. "The children were victims of violence from their mother," including hitting her oldest daughter with spatulas and spoons, according to a December 3, 2009 Ellsworth (Maine) District Court ruling. One son said that his mother "would hit everyone in the house. She was a terror to everybody."

After Ligia's husband Vladek indicated his plan to leave the marital home for the safety of the children, Ms. Filler had an apparent mental break-down, running through the streets partially clothed, screaming death threats at police officers on the scene.

Ligia made an allegation of marital rape, and within few days prosecutor Mary Kellett filed charges. No forensic, medical, or other physical evidence of sexual assault was presented during the trial. Assistant district attorney Kellett repeatedly sought to bar the introduction of key evidence that would serve to exonerate the defendant.

Court-appointed attorney Neil Fishman later commented the proceeding was so flawed that it resembled a "Salem Witch Trial." On September 9, 2010 the Maine Supreme Court issued a ruling that found Kellett had "improperly encouraged the jury to use the absence of evidence regarding the marriage ending and a child custody dispute…as a reason to reject Filler's defense." The case was remanded for a retrial in May.

More information on the case can be seen at

There's no real defining moment as to when I became an MRA. It was quite a bit before the term came into being, that much I know. One of my earliest childhood memories is of asking my mother why the radio always blames boys for everything. I suppose you could count that as day one.

Both of my parents were concerned with social justice, my mother was (and is) a devout feminist, and my father was a Social Worker among Canada's northern communities until his death 20 years ago. My parents divorced when I was a young child, and my father was – at best – a bit player in my time growing up. My stepfather paid the bills in the meantime.

This, I suppose, goes a little way toward explaining why I feel the need to bring attention to many problems resulting from such a destructive society. I am not a religious man in any real sense, having nearly burst into flames the last time I tried to cross the threshold of a church (kidding), but I see value in a spiritual, and caring approach to life. There is ample evidence to suggest it is dogmatic thinking, not religion, that leads to destruction. And dogmatic thinking is endemic to the 'secular' left every bit as much as in the 'religious right'.

So, my abhorrence of rigid thinking and intellectual laziness has led to me having almost no definable political leaning. Where's my damn pigeonhole?

Like the Men's Movement itself, I have no horse in the race. I have no ideological leaning other than legal and social equality (of opportunity), and the desire to eliminate injustice – and even then I do not presume to know the answers, only that the right questions aren't being asked.

And if you get right down to it, that's how all of this stuff is continued by the mainstream media. They refuse to ask the right questions, or accept the buillshit answers and move on. It's been the goal of the MRM to remove this option from them for the past decade or so, and we have begun to see some real success.

But it's my estimation that it is time to transition to a new mode of thinking. A growth mode. We have gained the attention of the masses, and interest will grow or wane from here on out largely in accordance with the message they receive. Our political opponents grasp this as well, and are currently involved in a campaign to discredit, and/or co-opt the men's movement. Either outcome is fine for them, since the key goal is the maintenance, or intensification, of current practices.

How do we combat this? Easy. We learn to market ourselves better. We develop a consistent message and we hold to it. We define a sociopolitical subculture, and its goals.

Plain and simple, we brand our movement. And we start by branding our 'hubs'. We can't define our own movement any more than Feminists can. What we can do is define and brand our websites, videos, and other aspects.

And to this end, Paul has asked me to take on a role of Director of Marketing for A Voice for Men, a role I enthusiastically accepted. A lot will happen in this regard, with the introduction of products for sale (and hopefully worn/used as much as possible), new graphics, presentation discipline, and more. Without going into too much detail, A Voice For Men will become central to the men’s movement, and will lead explorations into new media and the future of broadcasting.

At 60 I got the Cracker Jacks From My Wife

Women's voting rights brought to you by our sponsor CRACKER JACKS.

I opened the Cracker Jacks box looking for the peanuts and the prize (I know, I am too old for that) and I found a piece of paper. The prize was a piece of paper with a young girls face on it. I was hoping for a little metal ball you try to roll into an indentation with the higher number on it. With a photo of a girl was a message, you are supposed to guess who she is/was. [What's the age range, target market? get them young] You see the girls face on the right side and a message on the left and then you open the photo to see who she is. When I saw what the prize was I had to applaud my gender feminist sisters, they know no limits when it comes to getting into the heads of our children. I read:

CAN YOU GUESS WHO I GREW UP TO BE?

"I was the second of eight children born into a strict Quaker family. My father was a stern man who taught us self-discipline and to believe in our own self-worth. I was an intelligent child, learning to read and write by the time I was three. As a Quaker, I was taught that all people are equal, regardless of gender, race, a belief not shared by most people at the time. In fact, because I was a woman, I never had the legal right to vote in my life-time. Who Am I?"

So, I opened the first panel and find "In her fifty years as a reformer, Susan B. Anthony championed many causes, including the abolishment of slavery and equality for all. But it was her tireless work as an organizer for women's rights which she is best known. She was convinced that truly equal opportunities for women could not be realized until women gained the right to vote. Twenty years after she resigned as president of the National American Woman Suffrage Association and fourteen years after her death, the 19th Amendment was ratified, giving women the right to vote. ANTHONY CAN ALSO BE FOUND ON THE SUSAN B. ANTHONY COIN"

Feminist: "Her-story" lessons in Cracker Jacks, what's next, when you unroll your Toilet Paper you get feminist spin about DV, and rape? Actually, maybe TP is suitable for the BS they spew when it comes to propaganda about such issues.

What they could have had for a prize is an honest note about race or racism instead of a questionable view of sexism. Children could learn that: "Black men got the vote before white women" PLUS the reason for that. [Black men getting the vote first is something feminist cites as proof that they have lower status, not just lower than men, but even lower than black men] Were white men once again being unfair to women? That's what feminist tell us but the truth is more complex than that. Black men were dying in our wars, white women were not. Children would understand this situation easily. Some of our ancestors had the quaint notion that dying for your country as a requirement because of your gender should have some perks, like voting for instance – voting for other men required to die also, voting for other men who must decide if a war was worth fighting or not. It was a trade off. If you were expected to risk having your face shot off, legs blown off, and often dying painfully of infection on battle fields because we didn't have the medicines to save you… if yes, you get to vote. [And no, it wasn't a choice for men either, not an "our body our choice" but it was a requirement that is still a requirement of males today. Its men we put on the front lines not women. Hillary Clinton can say women pay the highest price for war and she and others can say "it's all front lines now" but if so, why is it almost always males in the body bags or males with their faces blown off or blind or brain damage. Talk is cheap, Hillary, put your daughter in the war zone and see if you still feel the same.

Early Americans thought that if black men had the obligation to risk their lives for our government then they had the right to vote for those who govern us.

If you were alive "back in the day" you would have noticed that husbands worked away from home and women in the home and both contributed to the survival of each other and their children. How much sense would it have made for men building the town, water supply, bridges, storage areas for food shipped in and out of their towns to say, "Wait, let me text my wife and ask her where the fire house should be set up" Oh, we don't have text, what about a cell phone – Of course he didn't have a cell phone or land line in the beginning either. And if men did, would they call a wife to ask for her vote about how to lay out the sewer and water lines, where they bank and jail should go… And they would not spend two to four hours on the horse to ask her permission at each juncture either. She would have thought he had lost it. Get out of my kitchen, get back to work, bring home the bacon, or deer, or a nice dress, or jewelry but stop asking me such stupid questions, how the $&@ should I know where the saw mill should be located?

Life was so different then that we really can't judge our ancestors decisions. What we might have hated then, stuck at home or working in the bottom of a ship at age 14 for a year or two at sea [Boys were often "forced" to do that.] Most of us would not want either choice.

It's not likely the twin sister of that 14 year-old sent to sea, or coal mines, or behind an Ox all day in the fields under a hot sun, no shower waiting at home, would really have wanted "equal work for equal pay". If we could go back and ask it's not too likely that most 14 year-olds, male or female would have wanted to be in the bottom of a stinky old boat wondering if, like many other boats back then, it would be your under the seas tomb. Few teens, male or female would like working for thousands of hours in a dark, smoky, dirty mine shaft while knowing that if the mine collapsed you would deal with hunger, starve, run out of water, or suffocate in a dark cold place where no one would ever find your body. You would die thinking dark thoughts in a dark place knowing you would never see your loved ones again. It wasn't those jobs women wanted; was it?

Life isn't as black and white as what most of us have learned about gender. If we learned to see shades of gray or look at the ways men sacrificed in work or war, then what looked like oppression and misogyny to females taught that they were oppressed and men becomes something else. Few men had the vote from the beginning. While some upper-class women in Great Britain were getting arrested while blocking city streets the police arresting them didn’t have the vote either.

And of course you can’t put that in a tiny little book in a cracker jacks box. If children can’t get the gender stories in context and are simply being primed to see history has “his-story” while not admitting that they are trying to tell “her-story” and in her story men don’t count for much… maybe we should just let kids have toys to play with and save the indoctrination for college where some of them are able to question biases that need to be questioned.

Important Show Announcements

[box type="note" border="full" icon="none"]

For a brief time your internet radio host for A Voice for Men will go live on the airways of Australia. Dads on the Air, the world's longest running radio program on father's issues, has invited me to appear as a guest on their program. It will begin airing live here in the U.S. at 9:00 p.m. EST. A link to the show archives will be posted here as well.

The primary purpose for the appearance is to promote A Voice for Men Radio, but I will also likely field questions on chivalry, marriage 2.0 and MGTOW.

It is a great opportunity for MRA's and FRA's to find common ground for discussion and I am really looking forward to the show.

Tomorrow night, of course, AVfM Radio raises its voice again, this time for part two of the campaign regarding the Vladek Filler rape case. This time I will be joined once Phil Cook and by private investigator TJ Ward who has been on this case for two years.

In this program we are going to discuss efforts to encourage The Bar Harbor Prosecutors Office to drop their "no drop" rape case against Vladek Filler, which they are now preparing to prosecute a second time despite having no forensic evidence that a rape ever happened and despite gross misconduct on the part of prosecutor Mary Kellett. It's all activism tomorrow on the program folks, so please tune in to find out what you can do to further this case even more. We will be taking your calls at 310-388-9709.

The show on the 12th will also continue our focus on the Filler case with a return appearance of Lisa Scott of TAABS and Robert Franklin of Fathers and Families.

And for a special show note: Friday the 15th of April marks the 99th anniversary of the sinking of the Titanic. On Thursday the 14th of April, 2011, we are going to a special episode of A Voice for Men Radio – The Chivalry Edition. In it, we are going to take a look at the historic sinking on that ship, and in a way most decidedly not ready for prime time. This will be a Futrelle Field Day, folks, with enough offense to make any good day just a little bit better.

And finally we have a note here from show producer Keyster, regarding the periodic technical difficulties we have with skype callers to the show.

In an effort the make the Voice for Men Radio show as enjoyable as possible for everyone I'd like offer some suggestions for those of you calling in via Skype.

1) You cannot call into the show, speak into a mic and have your computer speakers on at the same time. When you call in and speak though your mic the sound coming through your nearby computer speakers is also being picked up by the mic causing distortion, loop echo and doubling needed bandwidth.

Solution: Either purchase a Skype phone or a computer headset or head phones, but do not use your speakers.

2) Some have called in and their voice would break up. This is a legacy Windows XP/wireless router problem called the Wireless Zero Configuration Service. Windows XP pauses every few seconds to find a faster connection, killing the connection intermitently in the process.

Solution: Start–>Control Panel–>Admin Tools–>Services–>Wireless Zero Config Properties–>General–>Services statu–>STOP–>Apply.

OR for you unintimidated geek types edit Registry as follows:

Go to Run type Regedit
Press OK
HKEY_CURRENT_USER
Software
Microsoft Windows
CurrentVersion
Run
Add this key:
WZC-Killer REG_SZ “c:windowssystem32net.exe” stop WZCSVC

If you are not using XP but still have the problem then it’s your Linksys WRT54G router and you need to update its firmware: http://www.linksysin...viewtopic&t=847

Also, AVfM Radio needs a second producer to help give Keyster a needed break at times. The duty is simple, to answer the phone and screen callers for the show. If anyone is interested in helping out on an occasional basis, please contact Paul.

THANKS!

Bangor Daily News Blows Kellett Story

April 5, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

I was left thinking one thing after reading Bill Trotter's article in the Bangor Daily News.

Not good enough.

I am as pleased as anyone that a loyal member of the MSM machine actually published the fact that there are serious concerns being expressed about the integrity of the prosecutions emanating from the Bar Harbor, Maine prosecutors office. That is especially true considering the alleged targets are male and the prosecutor is a woman and the alleged crimes are rape and domestic violence.

But as I read I got this feeling that I was being tossed a bone and expected to take it to the corner of the room with my tail wagging.

Am I the only one who noticed that the headline of this piece had nothing to do with the real story? Why is the headline about a change in venue when we have complaints filed against the prosecutor in the case; the same prosecutor whose ill-gotten conviction of Vladek Filler was overturned, citing prosecutorial misconduct?

Why no mention of several things that are a matter of public record?

> Ligia Filler is a known child abuser.
> Ligia Filler was the only proven or even credibly alleged person to be a violent assailant in her marriage.
> Ligia Filler is a proven liar that has already been caught in false accusations of abuse against her husband.

Where is one shred of investigative intent in the article?

Bangor Daily News has just done a broad daylight cover-up of this important story. It's a bait and switch headline with BDN hopeing you don't much notice the switch part. Think they don't know that "official complaints against prosecutor" in a headline will get a bunch more readers…and interest?

It's a pussy pass for Kellett.

Also, by tossing out the name of a few websites, pointing to our anti-feminism, they hope to cast a shadow over this in the minds of their blue pill readers. You think adding a slogan "Curing Feminist Indoctrination," was an accident? Antimisandry.com is the only name of that site I know of, and other sites mentioned there have slogans, but perhaps not as politically useful to BDN.

I am as happy as anyone for the exposure, but I am still thinking the same thing.

Not Good Enough.

Mary Kellet and the entire Bar Harbor's prosecutors office is the story here. So is the state of Maine and its unusually misandric policies around rape prosecution and primary aggressor laws – which are beyond the pale.

So is the story of men and boys in western culture in general.

Again, I laud the fact that this activist event didn't meet it's usual untimely end. But we are not pets waiting for table scraps.

Bangor Daily News needs to cover this story. It is their community; their men and boys and their god-damned responsibility as instruments of free speech in an open society. They have what looks to be a person who might be more sinister and corrupt than Mike Niphong at loose in their front yard and these people are playing politics and word games.

This website and A Voice for Men Radio are going to stay on it. I apologize for the lack in variety here of late, but, for lack of a better term, this stuff is why I came to the dance to begin with.

See you all tonight.

Filler “no drop” Rape Persecution Hits MSM

[image]

This hot off the presses folks. WE have made a difference in the course of the Vladek Filler false rape prosecution.

No commentary for now except to say keep up the pressure. This is why we do what we do.

From the Bangor Daily News.

Several websites and blogs encourage supporters of Filler’s cause to contact the media and state officials about Filler’s situation and Kellett’s handling of the case. One of the sites is called “A Voice for Men” while another is called “Anti Misandry — Curing Feminist Indoctrination.” Other such websites include or are maintained by National Coalition For Men, Fillerfund.com, and The False Rape Society. MORE HERE

Mentioning A Voice for Men Radio in the comments will catch some new listeners from that area.

You May Not Be A Slut, But You Sure Are Stupid

April 6, 2011 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

[dropcap]I[/dropcap]n a metropolitan city in North America, a 24 year old woman holds up a sign. She is surrounded by hundreds of other women, all gathered to march in protest through the city's downtown. They have assembled to protest the continued illegal Israeli blockade of food, water and medical supplies to Palestine. And to to call for a halt to Israel's bombing of schools, mosques, hospitals, universities and residential buildings.

Uh, Nope.

Okay, These women are assembled to demand that the catholic church answer charges of 30 years of willful complicity and cover-up in the sexual abuse of boys by catholic clergy.

No.

The Hundreds of women gathered in the city center to march in demand of the closure of Guantanamo Bay, and the illegal detainment of hundreds of individuals without trial, and to call for an end to torture through water-boarding by the Obama administration.

Wrong again.

It turns out that thousands of women gathered and marched in downtown Toronto to protest a Toronto police officer's suggestion during a scheduled talk on safety at York University, that women should not dress like sluts to avoid sexual victimization. The officer has since been publicly flogged, hung, drawn and quartered, and diced before being served, fried in olive oil on rye crackers.

The young slut holds up her sign for a photograph. It reads :

Women DO NOT get raped because they were:

- drinking or taking drugs
- dressed provocatively
- being reckless

WOMEN GET RAPED BECAUSE SOMEONE RAPED! THEM! *&^%$#!

She smiles cutely for the photo, while a male bystander shouts his encouragement: "I love sluts!"

This young woman is of course, dressed like a slut, as are many of the other slutty protesters.

Clearly, we live in sickening culture which attempts to oppress sluts by forcing personal volition and self-responsibility on them. It is a disgrace that after 50 years of struggle for equality, we are all still so backward in our thinking. That we would force a slut who engaged in drug or alcohol fueled reckless behavior to take the ~~responsibility~~ blame for her choices is a public disgrace.

That a police officer would suggest personal responsibility for the outcome of reckless behavior is a chilling metric of how much work is still left undone by feminists. It truly reflects poorly on all of us, when thousands of sluts have to march in the streets to fight for their right to take no personal responsibility, and we should all be ashamed of ourselves.

I know I am.

Lecture No. 8

"Equality, rightly understood as our founding fathers understood it, leads to liberty and to the emancipation of creative differences; wrongly understood, as it has been so tragically in our time, it leads first to conformity and then to despotism." – Barry Goldwater

What is it that enables us to live meaningful lives? This is a question with a long history, and after more than two thousand years of scratching our heads, our species is not much the wiser. Answers fall just as easily as they are formed. Perhaps the only real wisdom to be imparted by centuries of soul-searching is that the solution cannot be reduced to the realization of only one value. Efforts to bring about a social system based upon the realization of one value in particular – be it religious doctrine, the will of the nation, or social equality – have invariably resulted in widespread repression, and not the golden age of peace and virtue as postulated by their ideologues. In contrast, those societies which have managed to create and maintain the space for people to actually live what they might call 'meaningful lives' are those which have kept a number of values in balance. This is not a very exciting solution, but it is better to be dissatisfied with the great mysteries of life than to be enserfed or 'disappeared' by a regime in pursuit of a more enticing dictum.

Whatever the case, the argument for autonomy seems convincing – balanced, as it must be, against other values. It is difficult to see how one's life could be considered meaningful where one does not possess even the most basic rights of self-determination. On this point, I am superficially in agreement with the feminists, who have made autonomy (and not equality) their guiding principle. Of course, in their case, it is only women's autonomy that matters, and this is to be extended as far as possible. Nevertheless, we do agree that autonomy, in and of itself, is a good thing, although I would qualify my support with the corollary that it must be balanced against other values so that it does not become license.

It is the most spectacular irony, then, that so long as they remain feminists, women will never knowingly taste freedom. Feminism is a victim ideology which freezes women perpetually in Struggle; it cannot afford to indulge in Liberation, else the game is up. To continue playing, feminists must imagine that they are under the control of external forces which are responsible for every fate that befalls them. They have a name for this mass delusion: The Patriarchy. Every bad decision, every unwanted consequence, every minor inconvenience can be traced back to this mystical, mythical and invisible system of control which exerts influence over women, in much the same way that animistic tribes explained severe weather phenomena by reference to angered and vengeful deities. If feminists are to pretend that Struggle is still relevant, then it cannot be admitted that women are in control of their own actions, for this would imply that they are free moral agents.

Women must be made to believe that they are delicate vessels being tossed about in an ocean storm, with navigation and steering rendered futile, and no land in sight. Perhaps we could contrast this to the MGTOW movement, which resembles a series of wooden canoes, light but durable, whose occupants paddle alone on calm seas – for the time being, at least.

Even when women are privileged beyond their wildest dreams – which is inconceivable in feminist theory – they still may not be considered free. Women are not permitted to enjoy freedom; it must be denied for the ideology to survive. It must be reiterated, until it comes to mind reflexively, that "we still live in a patriarchy," and "women are still not yet equal," and so forth. Feminism's adherents can never rest, because they will not allow themselves to. They are forever chasing rainbows.

They are mentally barricaded in, shut off from the very world that they impose their designs upon. They are forced to conceive of themselves forever Struggling, lest they become Liberated, and therefore irrelevant. As I said last week, a tripartite perception of history (past as Oppression, present as Struggle, and future as Liberation) is a constant of feminism, and this is decided upon in advance of the facts. Regardless of context, the present is Struggle, with Liberation perpetually set some way off into the future. As the proverb states, tomorrow never comes.

As I have mentioned previously, feminism is fundamentally anti-contextual, deciding upon the story in advance, and then fitting the facts around this. The process is simple. Take the key points about the given situation, and through the use of dislogic, eristic, moral relativism, symbolism, self-contradiction and dreamlike fantasy, frame the discourse as one in which women are moving from Oppression to Liberation, but will not get there without feminist Struggle.

This is not to say that feminism operates statically. The first step in the process just described is to draw in the facts from real life. If feminists did not do this, their preaching would have zero appeal to the non-feminist sector, because it would seem to have no bearing on the experiential world. Feminism is anti-contextual in the sense that the story is decided prior to the facts, but it is nevertheless dependent on the context of any particular situation. The real life context must first be experienced and understood, and only then can it be co-opted into feminist discourse. To take a clear example, feminists in the United States today do not agitate for women's right to vote. They would get nowhere if they did, because, having the vote, they have nowhere else to go (in this regard). The franchise is not now a relevant issue in the context of the real world. On the other hand, the fact that most business leaders are men will be verified by most people's experiences of the world; this, then, can be drawn into feminist discourse, as an example of Oppression.

Forgive me for being overly simplistic. It must be made clear how the process of manufacturing Struggle is playing a pivotal role in the changing nature of rights.

What is a right? As it has typically been understood, a right is a claim which, in usual circumstances, is inviolable. In other words, if I have a right, then I have some kind of claim – the permission to do something I wish to do, or to be protected from something I do not wish for – and other individuals may not deprive me of this claim. To take a clear example, I have the right not to be assaulted – other individuals are not permitted to assault me. They may do so nonetheless, in which case they have transgressed against my right; they have done what they are not permitted to do, and prevented me from doing (or avoiding) those things which I am permitted to do (or avoid). Accordingly, I am permitted to seek recompense for the violation of my right.

A theory of rights requires an enforcer, in order to prevent rights transgressions and provide recompense to those whose rights have been violated. The enforcer that we are familiar with is the state, particularly those institutions involved in the creation and practise of law: the legislature, the judiciary, the police force, and so on. It is necessary that the state possesses the monopoly on the use of force, else its rule would go unenforced, and there would be no deterrent against rights violations. In an extreme case, the citizens may rise up and overthrow a weak state, subsequently instituting their own form of justice which may be far from impartial. Max Weber famously described the state as "the monopoly of the legitimate use of force." I have left out the word 'legitimate' from my definition here, because it strikes me as an entirely subjective judgment, not to mention an inevitable one from the point of view of those in control of the state. Those who seize power and use it to persecute one section of the population will surely believe their own monopoly on the use of force to be legitimate – indeed, they will most likely believe their own use of force to be of greater legitimacy than that of the regime which they deposed, no matter how that regime conducted itself.

Note that there is no inherent limitation to the concept of rights; there is no in-built brake system. There can never be a point where we say, "now we have all the rights." There will always be potentially more rights that we could possess. That is not to say we categorically should possess more rights. The full possession of all conceivable rights would be an inconceivable license – total autonomy, in which all claims would be permitted. This would mean that the individual with license would be free to violate the rights of others. In this case, the rights of others would be meaningless whenever they encounter the licensed individual. Logically, all people cannot have total possession of all rights, because each would be permitted to infringe upon the rights of all the others – which means that nobody's rights would be secure, and the strongest individual or group would be entitled to establish arbitrary rule by physical force alone.

Clearly we need limitations, and the Constitution of the United States of America is the exemplar in this regard. As the finest statement of personal liberty and representative democracy the world has ever known, it exists to protect a number of fundamental rights from being overturned by the strongest collection of individuals – namely, the government. Laws may come and go, but so long as the constitution is upheld, the foundational rights of the individual citizen are set in stone – or, at least, are extremely difficult to remove or alter. Where a government repeatedly violates its own constitution, it (ideally, at least) runs the risk of being overthrown by an uprising of citizens, who would, together, form a stronger collective.

The United States Constitution, adopted in 1787, built upon the liberal philosophy of the time, most especially that of John Locke. Sections of the Declaration of Independence, signed eleven years previous, are more or less lifted from his Second Treatise of Government. The ideas expressed in this work are not those of the liberalism we know today; they sit somewhere closer to what we would now term libertarianism. It was only in the second half of the nineteenth century that liberalism underwent the profound transformation into the collectivist ideology we more readily associate with the term today.

In his 1859 text, On Liberty, J. S. Mill introduced a new articulation of the traditional liberal moral defence of individual rights. It runs something like this: individuals have the right to do whatever they choose, so long as this does not harm others. Mill exercised caution when considering the application of this principle: one would not be harmed, for instance, by losing in open competition (e.g. the free market). Following Tocqueville, he voiced concern that democracy, if unmoderated, could devolve into majoritarian tyranny.

We may thank the successors of Mill for the perversion of individualist liberalism into a collectivist and authoritarian philosophy. It was one small step from Mill's axiom – individuals have the right to do whatever they choose, so long as this does not harm others – to the doctrine of New Liberalism: if I cannot do what I would otherwise choose, then somebody must be harming me. It was the self-proclaimed 'liberal socialist,' Leonard Trelawny Hobhouse, who built upon Mill's premises and added a new twist: that freedom is not good in and of itself, but must be subordinated to some higher end. It follows that any freedom which is not subordinated to this higher end is not morally justified. It was the social radical Richard Henry Tawney, building on this development, who advocated an egalitarian society based on the premise that "freedom for the pike is death for the minnows" – in other words, that certain identifiable groups are not deserving of equal autonomy, but must have their share restricted. It was Lester Frank Ward who disavowed the individual altogether and argued that the state should direct all social and economic development, including the happiness of its citizens. Perhaps most tellingly of all, he was an enthusiastic supporter of the notion that women are innately superior to men. To quote an especially relevant passage:

> And now from the point of view of intellectual development itself we find her side by side, and shoulder to shoulder with him furnishing, from the very outset, far back in prehistoric, presocial, and even prehuman times, the necessary complement to his otherwise one-sided, headlong, and wayward career, without which he would soon have warped and distorted the race and rendered it incapable of the very progress which he claims exclusively to inspire. And herefore again, even in the realm of intellect, where he would fain reign supreme, she has proved herself fully his equal and is entitled to her share of whatever credit attaches to human progress hereby achieved.

The purpose of this detour into the changing nature of rights was to hone in on the historical developments that precipitated certain aspects of modern feminism. Some contributors to the Men's Rights Movement have somewhat abstractly attacked 'modernity' and 'Enlightenment values.' This is fine if they are intending to attack individual autonomy in general, but we must look more carefully if we actually want to get to the root of the problems facing men, as men, today – which, I would argue, coalesce into the deprivation of male autonomy. It is modernity, and particularly Enlightenment thought, which made individual autonomy a possibility – and it is social liberalism, and most especially feminism, which are turning it into an impossibility for men.

The innovation of social liberalism is conspicuous in the section of the Ward quote above which I have emphasized. It is entitlement; the creation of new obligations for others to fulfil; the construction of rights claims, not rights of individuals, to be held equally, but against an identified segment of the population (the 'enemy' group). Of course, every right, if it is taken seriously, demands obligations of others – if I have a right to not be assaulted, then you must not assault me, and vice versa. The difference between such a claim and the claims of New Liberalism is that the former is an obligation to inaction, while the latter is an obligation to action. My obligations to inaction mean that I cannot transgress certain boundaries – the rights of other people. I may not hurt them, steal from them, or do damage to their possessions. I am forbidden to do certain things which would interfere with the autonomy of others, but apart from that, I am free to do as I please. Obligations to action are of a different sort altogether: the one who holds me to such an obligation has the power to command me. I am told how to act, and I am forbidden to act any other way. This curtails my autonomy.

For instance, if you require some object in order to accomplish a certain project, then your autonomy is curtailed if you do not possess the object. Therefore, you have a claim to my object, presuming that I possess one. It matters not if I have earned or otherwise rightfully own my object; the theory goes that you should have it anyway. Claims of ownership and desert are subordinated to the autonomy of individuals, which translates to the wants (not needs) of specially identified 'victim' groups. If, say, I am interviewing a man and a woman for a position in my employ, and the woman demands that she be given the job as a crucial step in her career plan, I am denying her autonomy by not employing her, even if she is the least qualified candidate. She needs the position in order to achieve what she ultimately wants, and so she is wronged if she does not get it. The doctrine of New Liberalism – if I am unable to do what I would otherwise choose, then somebody must be harming me – clearly serves the victim agenda of feminism. Any limit whatsoever on the actions of women, including those introduced in the name of fairness and impartiality, can be taken as a new Oppression according to this doctrine.

'New' or 'social' liberalism is in fact the perversion and corruption of liberalism – and it finds its highest expression in the caste system of rights feminists are busy creating. Women's rights, a catch phrase once trumpeted as a progressive march towards a fairer future, has become the trump card that never loses its value, ready to be played any time a woman wants to 'get one over the guys'. In the early days, the idea of Struggle was more creditable, and even seems admirable in retrospect. Women struggled for rights which men possessed: the right to vote, the right to own property, the right to divorce, the right to the same wage as a man doing the same job. Once upon a time, it was perfectly plausible, to an unbiased observer, that feminism meant to bring about equality between the sexes. That is not to say this view is inherently correct, only that it was believable, from a point of view external to feminism, that the feminist project carried this altruistic goal.

But what are the women's rights advocated today? The right to confiscate men's money, the right to commit parental alienation, the right to commit paternity fraud, the right to equal pay for less work, the right to pay a lower tax rate, the right to mutilate men, the right to confiscate sperm, the right to murder children, the right to not be disagreed with, the right to reproductive choice and the right to make that choice for men as well. In an interesting legal paradox, some have advocated – with success – that women should have the right to not be punished for crimes at all. The eventual outcome of this is a kind of sexual feudalism, where women rule arbitrarily, and men are held in bondage, with fewer rights and far more obligations. To date, the transformation of rights into obligations to action have given us a welfare state in which, according to The Futurist, > virtually all government spending […] from Medicare to Obamacare to welfare to public sector jobs for women to the expansion of the prison population, is either a net transfer of wealth from men to women, or a byproduct of the destruction of Marriage 1.0. In either case, 'feminism' is the culprit […] Remember again that the earnings of men pays 70%-80% of all taxes.

Feminism views the independence of individual citizens as a barrier, not a safeguard. Personal autonomy hinders feminism's progress in moralizing the world and bleeding men dry for the benefit of women.

Women's rights? It's nothing but a power grab.

I’m Speechless

April 7, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

In the life of an MRA there are countless opportunities to see the antics of emasculated, pro-feminist men. They embarrass themselves, and for the truly unconscious, they embarrass others as well.

Some of them are worse than others, but until I stumbled on this piece of work I thought I had just about seen it all. I thought that the propensity for manginosity had a bottom; that a man could only go so far in self denigration and obsequious groveling, at least outside the confines of some comedy routine.

But like I said, that was before I watched this video.

Petition to Disbar Mary Kellett: 551 signed, 1000 Total Needed

Getting geared up for a big week on covering the Vladek Filler case. You can look for quite a few other announcements as well. In the meantime I am moving this petition at the top spot here till it has at least 1,000 signatures. I hope other bloggers will offer some support for this, as well as readers who can repost this to your FB and other social networking pages. If you are seeing this page for the first time, or you are not familiar with the story, please see HERE. Thanks.- PE

Boys Alone

April 7, 2011 | by B.R. Merrick | Link | Original Link

I didn't want to do it. I enjoyed scouts only ever because I had friends in my troop. I did not enjoy swimming. I learned early in life, however, never to question authority. Therefore, when the presiding authorities over my early life sent me to a Boy Scout swim meet, I went. Reluctantly. Very.

Due to humanity's inability to do much of anything without categorizing ourselves, those responsible for this particular meet put us into groups according to how well we could swim. At the top, where the jock boys live and thrive, were The Sharks. (West Side Story, anyone?) I was a Minnow. How many 12-to-13-year-old young men like to be called "Minnows"? Do you know the exact number? I do. Zero.

I didn't want to grab the paddle, kick my legs to the other side of the fucking pool, and lose. I wanted to go home. I was totally unprepared for this. I stank. Then I sank.

Some dude with a mustache and lots of naturally developed, manly muscle, wearing a flannel shirt and jeans (I will never forget this.), jumped in and pulled me out. I wept. My friends in the troop (none of whom were Minnows) did their boyish best to tell me that it was okay. I had great friends. I had idiotic authority figures.

I didn't cry because I was scared. Well, that wasn't the main reason I was crying. I was crying because I felt stupid for being the poor fool who forced a grown man to get himself all wet. That nice man who saved my life never said a word to me. I felt totally inadequate in his presence. A boy unworthy of being one. That was the biggest reason to cry. I never told my friends that part. I never told anyone, in fact, until now.

I tell you now because this was not an isolated incident for me, nor am I the only one who has experienced such a disappointment. It has only gotten worse. Not for me; for the generations that have followed. Fewer men are teaching boys how to be boys, and it seems that even fewer men are interested in teaching young men how to enter in. I believe that much of this has to do with the boredom that empire naturally produces, but not all of it. The American Empire was built high over ignorance of manhood and the idea that men are disposable. Let me try a little sports analogy: To me, corporate sports are a hell-of-a-lot less interesting than truly manmade sports.

Let's look at one unique and perhaps embarrassing way in which men are stifled in their relationships with boys. An article at TampaBay.com from 2007 about what ought to have been a simple exchange between trusting strangers reveals a poisonous societal belief that, while humorously discussed, degenerates these crucial relationships in a very serious way.

Roy Peter Clark, the author, had the opportunity to help a small boy with his zipper when they were both in the men's room. The tale has a happy ending, and Clark makes a funny situation that much funnier with the manner in which he writes about it:

"The stall door swings open, and out comes a boy – maybe 8 years old – all dressed up in his Sunday suit: white shirt and tie, dark blue slacks and jacket, a right proper little lad. But he has a problem. For this young man has clearly outgrown this outfit, so that his pants barely contain his lower frame. 'Mister, I can't pull up my zipper. Can you help me?'

"I'm in a Catholic church, in the middle of the greatest sexual scandal in the history of Catholicism, in the men's room, with a boy who wants me to help him with his zipper.

"What would you do?"

At some point, Clark has to go so far as to enlist the "aid" of an unwitting old man who enters the bathroom during the dilemma, by shouting loud enough that at least one witness can hear:

"'Okay, here's what I'm going to do. I'm going to grab your belt and your zipper. Then I'm going to count to three, and you're going to pull in your stomach. Okay? One, two, three…'"

I can just see the kid in my mind. When an adult does this, a boy's mind is far more likely to first misunderstand why the strange man has decided to talk so loudly, but the rest of his mind probably says, "He must know what he's doing. Just follow through. Boy, this is awful." What a heartfelt story. Just wonderful. Amusing, entertaining, poignant, and ultimately disturbing. (Read what some of the other men said they would do.)

I will not dispute Clark's words, his attitude, or the manner in which he dealt with this unfortunately tricky situation. There is, in my mind, nothing to dispute. My reaction would have been much the same. This article mentions one important aspect of the sex war in which we find ourselves enmeshed. Men, the owners of penises, are forbidden, in their own minds, based on what they perceive in the culture that surrounds them, from helping boys, the owners of lesser penises, with something as simple as the zipper that zips up in front of it. This is in spite of the fact that men, by and large, do not molest children. Clark admits, "What if someone comes in and I'm holding this kid's zipper? What if it's a priest? What if it's the kid's brother – or his beefy father? Am I willing to take a beating to help junior with his pants?" Can we all agree that such a question should never even enter a man's mind? How is it possible not to see the enormity of what is being said?

To give it some perspective, imagine being a black man, and being lectured by the culture at large that you have greater potential for being a violent criminal. This lecture goes on ad infinitum, ad nauseam. "We all know that black men have a greater propensity for theft and murder. Now this black guy might be nice, and yes, we shouldn't judge, but on the other hand…"

Making matters worse, most boys are curious about men, and you know what I mean. I am not now advocating nor will I ever advocate anything that could be deemed sexually prurient as a teaching tool with boys and pubescent men. I also do not think that other boys were nearly as curious as I was. In fact, at the time, I sensed a difference when I noticed other boys discussing how and when that sort of curiosity was healthily satisfied. Therefore, this is not an effort at arousing or provoking anybody who disagrees. The way

I see it, however, is that it is virtually a father's job to show his son, as Rose Nylund put it in an episode of "The Golden Girls," what makes a bull a bull:

Rose: "That's how my mother taught me!"

Blanche: "Honey, didn't that give you a false impression about… what a man would look like?"

Rose: "It sure did! Can you imagine my surprise on my wedding night with Charlie? …Boy, that bull would've been jealous!"

Kidding aside, it is difficult to write about, because of what I know about manhood. The reader must understand that I feel almost as if I am discussing something that most men simply wish to think about and silently communicate when the time comes, if ever. You're hiking, you have to piss: teaching moment. You go for a swim, and no one has swim trunks: teaching moment. You go to the community gym and change in the locker room: teaching moment. Need I go on? I didn't think so. Talking is unnecessary in such a situation, and can easily get awkward. For most men, it is sufficient to silently do something together, and wait for the relating to follow.

I propose that men are far more likely to do rather than talk. Try going on a fishing trip sometime. There will be quite a lot of doing and very little talking. Men usually open up to one another after doing. I'll give you an example:

When I took a job at college during the summer months in a dishroom at a dorm, there were both men and women who had also started work there at the same time. On the first day, no one spoke. We were all strangers. By the end of the day, the women no longer were.

Women communicate largely through verbal means. Men only do this after the process of doing, for the most part. If they can't do, they talk about the doing. We were all certainly doing many things when we sent the dishes through the big, beautiful machine that some man built after figuring it out (probably while leaning forward on his knees, sitting back down after a piss break). But the men stayed quiet, week after week. The women, by the second day, were talking about all of their friends. They were friends instantly. We men didn't make friends. We did the dishes silently, alongside a gaggle of gabbing gals.

One weekend, the women went to a special conference "For Women Only." (There was no comparable conference for the men.) There were only guys in the dishroom, so it was dead quiet. We didn't even look at each other. (Well, not at the same time.) Suddenly there was a lull in lunch traffic, and we were all left standing and staring at the conveyor belt some man had devised.

One of the particularly bored men took a fork, laid it down face up, put a knife criss-cross over the bend in the fork's neck, put a spoon on the end closest to him, slammed down the other end of the knife with his manly hand, and sent the spoon flying into the dirty silverware tray. Huh-huh. That was cool.

Every man started grinning, including me. Ah, I thought, this is what men do; this is how we communicate. Now we're getting somewhere. He flipped another, then another piece of silverware into the tray. So did another guy. Then another. Huh-huh. Dude…

Not being good at sports in general, I just watched. Then I grabbed a bowl, took another bowl, and placed it upside down on top. A third bowl sat on top of that, and the fourth bowl, like the second, was upside down on top of that. I can't remember how many I did, but pretty soon, the fat guy, the skinny guy, the little dude, the regular Joe, the cute college prep, were all looking at my tower. Huh-huh. Then another guy started building. Then another. We were all grinning.

We never said much. I never knew a single man's name. They went off and graduated, I'm assuming, having intercourse, having kids, making some money, losing some, fighting with their women, crying, thinking about God, planning, succeeding, doing up their kids' zippers, failing in life, and some of them failing miserably. They're all about 35 or 40 now.

The point is these simple, unspoken rituals of manhood are slowly dying. Boys who grow into manhood with their curiosity about men unsatisfied, however intense or mild it may be, are deficient in their understanding of the world. Some of them are given badges, honors, and guns by the state. The lack from before is filled with something that has the potential to become that much more sinister. Simultaneously, present-day culture puts all men under suspicion.

Gone are the days of apprenticeships, where boys would learn how to perform tasks in a useful trade. You could depend on these boys learning how to read, count, and apply their physical bodies in the act of creation alongside a watchful man with a vested interest. Now they are lectured, usually by women, about how those days are long gone, and wasn't that an interesting, quaint way to live? Finally, when one of these boys needs to leave the feminized classroom so that he can unzip and pee, he has to ask permission. Since children seldom leave the classroom except for lunch or urination, everybody knows, since it isn't lunchtime, what little Fred has to do with his wiener. Lovely.

This same little Fred goes to church on Sunday and finds the dilemma with his zipper has grown worse. A simple, masculine exchange of a non-sexual nature, but which carries with it the unspoken enjoyment of a shared masculine sexual potential, with just a little pride, is laden with problems and emotional upset, all because boys and men can no longer relate, unless it's pre-approved, corporate-sponsored, thoroughly vetted, and after school.

Men who are brave enough to create little men are inundated with parenting books written by vetted "experts." I propose to you that men who know how to be men, who remember being boys with total honesty about the pain as well as the joy, don't need any stupid books. The affection remains bottled until they have found the safety required to express it.

I watched a family friend a few years back with his daughter, who couldn't have been a day over 12. She was a typical sapling: tall but gawky, too slender to be womanly, blonde, and obviously someone who would turn heads in about two more years. It was summer, so she was wearing shorts. I don't know what the problem was, or whether it was even a problem that sparked the whispering I was somehow privileged to hear, but since I was in the room, I watched and listened with rapt attention.

He stroked her thigh in a loving fashion that bordered on a romantic gesture. She sat perfectly still with her arm around his neck. I have no idea what they said, but everything that came out of his mouth was soft and intimate. He knew another grown man was in the room and watching. He didn't care. Neither did she. Good for them. That young lady is probably married now. I have no doubt that she desperately wants her husband (the lucky bum) to do much the same thing. I know for a fact that the father was not a boy alone when he grew up.

What would a hysterical soccer mom who didn't know those two think? Who gives a damn? By the look on the girl's face, he clearly isn't finished. Leave them alone. If you don't understand the vast chasm between incest and fatherly affection, this article isn't going to convince you. It will simply run right over you if it convinces any number of men reading it, so go back to your Women's Studies thing.

I had a thought while watching Walt Disney's final masterpiece, "Sleeping Beauty" the other day. The artwork, especially in the forest scenes, is incomparable. So is Tchaikovsky's soundtrack.

The story and dialogue, though, are forgettable and laughable. In the middle of the movie, we finally discover that the Three Good Fairies are almost entirely useless, as they have been raising the princess in the forest for 16 years, yet they still haven't figured out how to make a dress or bake a damn cake. Now, real women, in anticipation of a particularly auspicious birthday, would undoubtedly be able to handle it in spades.

However, I found myself thinking, "What would three blue-collar men – husky, heavy, and hairy (No, those are not their names.) – do if they encountered a foundling baby girl in the forest? What could she expect on her sixteenth birthday?" The answer is clear to me: She would probably have an entirely new set of bedroom furniture, a vanity complete with carved flowers and curly-cues, one hell-of-a massive cake, ribs broiled to perfection, every pastel color you can imagine hanging from the walls, and the knowledge that behind her, for the rest of her life, is a wall of muscular protection should she ever require it. No doubt they would have helped her countless times to put her tiny panties on when she was littler. If a misandrist interrupted one such tender and ordinary moment, I would suggest that whatever the accusation, the reply should start with two words: Shove off.

Wow, what a week. A lot of busy MRA’s in the house. A whole lot happened and you guys kicked some ass.

First things first. We have recently witnessed the sudden departure of a gentleman, an Otherly guy with a knack for raising collective blood pressures.

Well, he is now facing retributions to affect his livelihood. I can’t (won’t) say more than that. What I will say is that you may feel his ghost around you at any time.

Also importantly, S.A.V.E. deserves a standing ovation for their recent work related to the Vladek Filler case. They have been leading the charge demanding justice. They started the petition, they lead things with official complaints, provided (costly) press releases and secured excellent guests for the radio show like TJ Ward and Lisa Scott.

I know, I know, we are always asking for money around here, but if you can, please consider putting something in the tip jar over at saveservices.org. They deserve it for what they are doing.

In more business, A Voice for Men is on its way to becoming a 501 (c) 3, non-profit organization dedicated to fighting misandry and anti-male discrimination. More on that in the future.

Also, Dan Moore and I are very close to placing orders for the first round of coffee mugs and t-shirts. Preview Images and the opportunity to pre-order will be posted within a few days.

The activism continues with your opportunity to write officials in Maine and urge them to seek an end to the prosecution of Vladek Filler. Bob O’hara with S.A.V.E. has provided us with the contacts for that project so those of you from Maine can let officials know you want them to give Bob an audience in D.C..

The link for the main delegation is http://www.nrcm.org/congressionaldelegation.asp

That being said, we’re going to buckle down and keep covering the New England Nightmare, Mary Kellett. But now we are going to move the focus a little and start addressing some of the more overarching problems in Maine. That means a look at predominant (or primary) aggressor and mandatory arrest laws.

And the more I learn about these laws – and how they create synergy with other anti-male legislation – the more I am convinced that we are headed for a police state. They are not even pretending that evidence or probable cause matters any more. In fact, these laws make sure those things are dispensed with altogether.

The next two episodes of A Voice for Men Radio are going to be dedicated to the bigger picture and to helping people understand the magnitude of the assault on constitutional rights that is happening before our eyes.

It will make family law look like a walk in the park before it is over – if we don't do anything.

Joining us on the 4/12/11 broadcast of A Voice for Men Radio will be guests Robert Franklin of Fathers and Families and a return appearance of Lisa Scott of Taking Action Against Bias in the System.

On 4/19/11 we will be joined by Richard Davis, a law enforcement professional from Boston and expert on primary aggressor and mandatory arrest laws and Dr. Brenda Russell, associate professor of psychology at Penn State Berks.

On 4/26/11 we will return to regular programming with a visit from Dr. T and a discussion on "crazy proofing" your life. The ever popular Dr. Tara has some good stuff on that.

Also, on 4/14/11, the night before the 99th anniversary of the sinking of the Titanic we are going to air a special, irreverent, oh-so-fucking-completely-not ready-for-prime-time look at chivalry in modern times. It is the first Take Back the Knight episode of A Voice for Men Radio and I promise you this one will have something to offend most anyone.

The SlutWalk Revelations

April 8, 2011 | by Patrick John Doran (aka TheMadShangi) | Link | Original Link

During a scheduled safety forum held at Osgoode Hall Law School on Jan. 24

Const. Michael Sanguinetti of the Toronto Police department made the comment:

"You know, I think we're beating around the bush here, I've been told I'm not supposed to say this, however, women should avoid dressing like sluts in order not to be victimized."

Const. Sanguinetti's remarks were witnessed by Joey Hoffman, a residence fellow and member of the Osgoode student government. Hoffman also noted the safety lecture was sparsely attended by only about 10 people, all of whom where stunned into silence when the officer made the reference to "sluts."

Const. Sanguinetti later apologized, saying he was "embarrassed" by his remarks.

Hoffman, who witnessed the impolite , but truthful gaffe by Const Sanguinetti also said "I don't think he was sarcastic or malicious. I think he thought he was being helpful." Approximately 1500 protesters, mostly women, marched in Toronto in protest of the officer's statement in an event named "slutwalk".

Many people have expressed criticism of the event, I simply call it sham.

Why couldn't 1500 people gather for a more worthy cause? Why does "Slutwalk" need to be taken seriously as political activism and not called out for the attention-seeking spectacle it really is? How do a bunch of slutty women parading around the streets of Toronto in their slutty clothes educate the public any more about sexual assault? The supposed goal of Slutwalk was to "redefine" the derogatory term and give it a positive spin, while protesting the right of slutty women to wear whatever they please without fear of being raped.

No one should ever be "blamed" (literally) for being raped. Such attitudes have no place in our police force, or society. But there's also no substitute for good judgment and common sense in how one behaves in public and to pretend this has no relevance to personal safety is dangerous and disingenuous.

Of course, everyone has the "right" to act as they please, within the confines of the law.

But the issue is just because you have the "right" to do something, should you?

Just because a woman — or man — has the "right" to dress, talk, or act in ways that may draw unwanted attention to themselves in public, should they?

In that context, it's obviously unwise for anyone to dress or act inappropriately, or to drink to excess, particularly when alone in unfamiliar surroundings.

Similarly, while we all have the "right" to do it, it's unwise to stumble down a dark alley, unaccompanied and drunk, waving around a wad of cash.

It's unwise because you increase your risk of being robbed.

“I believe in women’s SEX-U-ALI-TEEEEE…” yells a Blonde Bimbo waving a sign; her voice getting higher a the end of the sentence, as if to form a question. The speech pattern of an approval seeking child rather than a grown woman in her twenties. I mention this to underscore the juvenile mind set driving the women at this event.

These girls didn’t really give a fuck about the cop’s remark, in reality they were all simply high off the attention.

“SlutWalk” can be appreciated for the eye candy, if you like slutty, shopworn looking hooker-women, but isn’t an event to be taken seriously. The so-called “message” of this event got lost somewhere between the bouncing titties.

The slut walk protest is comparable to last year’s “Boob-quake” YouTube meme, which was a response to an Iranian clerk’s dumb-ass remarks about breasts causing Earthquakes. Plenty of large breasted women on YouTube contributed by posting videos of themselves shaking their tits. The “activism” of Boob-quake became unintentionally funny as many of the participants appeared to take themselves seriously. As a male observer to the spectacle, I saw this as a hilarious response to one man’s dumb ass comments, but many of the bouncing and jiggling participants saw themselves as legitimate activists.

“Boob-quake” might have had more impact if that Iranian clerk’s delusional sentiment was the mainstream attitude throughout the world. But it’s not. So let’s all call it for what it really is, another flimsy excuse for attention-seeking whores to show off their goods.

Following my video on the topic of the “slut-walk” sham on youtube, comments from angry feminists started flowing in like a menstrual cycle.

One deep thinker responded with:

“You’ve missed the point entirely of what Slut-walk was all about. It wasn’t a protest to dress as “slutty as possible” it was to abolish the widespread misogynist attitude that it’s a woman’s fault if she gets raped. We teach women to avoid dressing a certain way, not to walk alone late at night, not to be drunk with strangers, to be aware of your surroundings, etc all so we can avoid getting raped. Instead, our culture/society should be teaching men, not to rape women.”

You read that right. God help you all you read it right.

Rather than women living with personal responsibility and accountability – like adults, we just gotta teach men not to rape women.

Feminists appear to have the child-like notion that they can do whatever they please and the world has to adapt to accommodate them.

To anyone drinking this feminist Kool-Aid: Fuck, you’re an idiot. Yeah, bitch, you do have to take personal responsibility. You can do whatever the fuck you please, but don’t expect the rest of us to coddle you. If you wanna get drunk and stoned and pass out in the middle of the street half-naked, don’t cry when something bad happens to you. And don’t expect us to pretend that you didn’t bring it on yourself.

One irate feminist complained about my suggestion that a more useful protest should focus on real issues: like women disappearing on the “Highway of Tears,”. Her rebuke pointed out that missing aboriginal women were talked about during the event.

Oh no! My entire argument is demolished.

Yeah, right.

Unfortunately this little tidbit about mention of missing women got no media coverage and did nothing to educate the public. Paying lip-service to a serious issue, during an event where the highlight is a bunch of girls marching down the street chanting “WE LOVE SLUTS” sure does society a big fucking service, doesn’t it?

Internationally Respected Investigator Says Vladek Filler Rape Accusation is “Fabrication” – NCFM Press Release

April 9, 2011 | by NCFM | Link | Original Link

The persecution of Vladek Filler stems from a ten year old accusation backed by no evidence other than the word of the mother of Vladek’s children. There is no credible evidence that we know of, none, to support her allegation. Prosecutor Mary Kellett prosecutes many similar cases perhaps driven by the radical feminist ideological belief that a woman is to believed at all cost, even if there is a plethora of substantive evidence which overwhelmingly establishes reasonable doubt or vindicates the accused. The Filler case is an egregious miscarriage of justice. He was convicted on an “absence of evidence” and Kellett successfully was able to keep evidence that favored Vladek away from the jury. So egregious was her misconduct that the Maine Supreme Court remanded the case for retrial. After filing complaints with the Governor of Maine and Maines Bar of Overseers of the Bar. NCFM issued this press release: 110407 NCFM press release re Vladek Filler in Maine.

Pretty Frickin' Cool

I like to walk down the hill to the convenience store maybe a couple of times a week. I live in a large-but-pleasant apartment complex, kinda out in the boonies. So I'm listening to Prokofiev's "Summer Night" Suite on my iPod and striding the mini-mall, when I chance upon a tall, broad-shouldered, handsome black guy, probably about 10 years younger than I, muscle-clinging black tee shirt and camouflage shorts, holding the hand of the cutest little boy you've seen since this one. Tiny, little-boy pants. Jeans with no back pockets. (Where does he put his little-boy wallet?) The jeans are so baggy it looks like he has no butt.

I passed them and watched, and watched, and watched with a big grin on my face.

When I was headed back home, they were still on the path in front of me. I desperately wanted to ask him whether I could take a picture, quickly interview him to find out who/what/where/when/why/how. I wanted to share a bit more of it than I am sharing. But I'm glad I decided against it. There's something to be said for haiku, although it sounds more pitiful in English:

A father and son

Walking hand in hand without

My interference.

Therefore, I will refrain from mentioning the pièce de résistance when he pulled the kid from his side by the torso and placed him up over his shoulders.

B.R. Merrick writes for "Strike The Root" and "A Voice for Men," lives in the Northeast, is proud to be a classical music reviewer at Amazon.com and iTunes, and in spite of the poisonous nature of television, God Himself will have to pry his DVDs of "Monty Python's Flying Circus" out of his cold, dead hands, under threat of eternal damnation.

Love Support

April 9, 2011 | by Lotta Goo | Link | Original Link

Lotta Goo has made the rounds in the man-o-sphere and heard the clamoring and cries for goo! So that is just what you get! Goo! More Goo for the beleaguered, weary divorced fathers.

You see, I have noticed that we have forgotten something of extreme importance when we deal with the trauma of divorce. We forgot love support. Remember when you were first married? Remember how you either implicitly or explicitly promised to provide for the family with your hard earned cash? Yes, I bet you do, and the judges in family court remembered that too and now you are stuck with a complicated and often unfair system of child support where your money is taken and spent by your ex without any accountability whatsoever.

Well, please think back to when you made that initial promise. Did your wife make a similar implicit or explicit promise to you that she would love you? Was not a part of that promise of love to also make sure your sexual needs were satisfied? I think so! How could we forget her part? In order to make up for this glaring omission I am going to offer her love support guidelines in hopes that the man will be loved at least until the children are 18 or over.

Developing these guidelines has not been easy. As you know the sexual habits of men are varied so we had to use estimates to come up with an average for the sexual frequency of an average man in an average marriage. Lotta Goo has known a number of marriages that have sex more than once daily. Their usual and customary activities are a bit more than the other extreme where men prefer to have sex once a week or so.

I figure we should simply add those two and divide by two for the average! So let's say 10 times a week versus once a week totals to 11. Divide that by two and you get my favorite number of 5.5. We can round that off and say that the average man has sex about five times a week. Since you are no longer married we should cut that down a bit, just like child support is cut down a bit, and just use three times a week as your ex's standard maintenance obligation.

So in order for your ex to fulfill her marital love obligations as you fulfill yours through child support money, she needs to provide love support.

Like child support we need to have standards. I have graciously lowered the average per week expectation to three times. The love support needs to be arranged based on both schedules but if for any reason it is not fulfilled your ex will be getting a visit form the love support enforcement squad. These folks are nobody's sweethearts and won't hear any of her excuses. No sir. She will go straight to jail. Once she defaults on her love support her picture will be placed on milk cartons and pizza boxes to show she is a "loveless mom" who is depriving her ex husband of his needed loving. So from the day you get divorced it will be put up or locked up for her.

Please keep in mind, though, that the love support is not just for you! It is really for the children! If a mom is loveless and a dad left wanting that has a huge impact on the kids. Huge. And folks we know it is all about the CHILDREN. Come on you moms! You can help your kids by making sure you comply with your love support visitations. Make it a threesome with dual blow jobs and you can give your children enough happiness to last all summer!!

I also know that for some men being married to her for a long time has had the net effect of making your John Thomas want to shrink up and hide at the thought of her naked. In that case we have the younger sister provision. Should you react to the sight of your ex as though you were given an I.V. overdose of saltpeter, then you could elect to take her younger sister in trade. And if she doesn't have a younger sister we will fall back to "that friend of hers you always wanted to fuck," clause of the new legislation.

Remember guys, Lotta Goo thinks of YOU; which is why we anticipate and overcome her resistance from the start.

Many ex's have complained that three times a week is simply too much of a burden that they want their love support reduced. Well, here is your rescue Goo.

I have come up with a way that might please both the women and the men. And I have included it in compromise legislation that is now being considered. Here is a sneak preview to what you will find: The standard is set for intercourse three times a week. However, your ex may be able to reduce this slightly by taking certain steps. I have developed a table that makes it easy to understand these new love support guidelines.

Basically we have put a number value on a variety of sex acts. Your ex needs to reach a total of 300 points each week but we have offered some handy dandy ways for her to not have to actually have sex three times. Straight intercourse is worth 100. She can earn 40 points by giving you a 30 minute back rub, 30 points for a 30 minute foot rub, and 20 for dancing nude (point value varies depending on appearance).

Oral sex comes in at 130 points. I know some of you will not like that but remember there are some women who can't stand giving a good bj and so their men will delight and gladly give up that extra 30 points. All varieties of sex acts have been rated with "that position she would never try" going for 320 and Ménage à trois where she brings a young attractive woman for the threesome carrying a whopping 650 points! Just think ladies, that is more than two weeks of love support for a single session! Great deal!

I have also added some non-sexual paths for those points. Your ex can earn 10 points for apologizing for a previous mistake. She can earn 30 points for admitting that she was the root cause of the marital discord and 60 points for admitting to her false allegations. These numbers can double if the admissions are sent to all family email contacts. (these are one time point values and cannot be repeated)

That is all for now, but remember, Lotta Goo is working for you!

Lotta Goo is a professional streetwalker from Washington, D.C.. She was a former board member of The Good Men Project Magazine, but abruptly left when she "suddenly got tired of all those pussy whipped little boys." Her favorite hobbies are writing, the Sex Workers Union and masturbating to the image of Amanda Hess. She lists her gender as "negotiable."

Till Death Do Us Part

April 10, 2011 | by Tom Snark | Link | Original Link

Nearly everything I see these days confirms what the man-o-sphere has taught me about men and women.

A few weeks ago, on a sunny Saturday, my next door neighbour knocked on my door. I don't know him very well, but relations between us have always been amicable. He politely asked if it would be all right if he pruned some of the branches that were hanging over into his back yard from my tree. I told him, of course this would be all right.

I forgot about our brief conversation, and a few hours later, I went to sit out in the yard to read and enjoy the sun. A clipping sound on my right reminded me that my neighbour was there, up on his ladder, busy cutting down branches. I could just see him over the fence, but I did not interrupt him. He did his thing, and I did mine, and for a short while that was how it was. Two men, both going about his own business, with only the fence and the unspoken but clear contract of mutual non-disturbance between us.

This tranquillity did not last forever. The peace was interrupted by a shrill voice from next door. A high-pitched, high-aggression, shrewish squeaking that he was doing it all wrong, that this isn't how she wanted it, and God, why doesn't he use his brain for once?

My neighbour, from up on the ladder, saw what his wife could not from the ground: that I was sitting not twelve feet away, well within hearing range. Now, I have known this couple for ten years or so – not very well, though. For all that time, I was familiar only with what they allowed the world to see: the superficial veneer, the public presentation through which they signalled their normality, their marital harmony, their success, their happiness.

My neighbour, cognizant of the threat that his shrewish wife was now posing to their spotless, suburban family image, began to laugh gently, as if her complaining was all part of a great joke. He was trying to suggest, in the only way he possibly could, that what I was hearing was not actually indicative of their relationship. I could feel his eyes on me, seeking that validating glance that men typically share when wives or girlfriends are acting up – you know, that look that says "women, eh? But what can you do?"

A few years ago, I would have met his gaze and given the appropriate raised eyebrow and half-smile. But knowing what I know, I could not meet his eyes. I saw in an instant that this was not an exceptional occurrence. And common as this verbal assault surely is, this was not an exceptional marriage. To shrug and pretend that this power dynamic is not now inherent to marriage in the West would be to allow him to momentarily reclaim some sense of his manhood; compensation for emasculation by consigning the incident to irrelevance. I couldn't do it; not given what I know. We could pretend, but the next day, his wife would still be there, yapping at him like a menopausal chihuahua.

Unfortunately, his forced chuckling only frustrated her. Her voice rose in pitch and volume, and what followed was a pink-noise barrage of non-sequitured put-downs that made it impossible for me to continue with the book. Finding laughter an ineffective disarming tool, knowing that their facade of marital bliss was now forever shattered in my mind, he began shushing at her. Eventually she got the picture, but by that point I was already on my way indoors.

Is there a single marriage today that does not contain this power dynamic to some extent? I wondered how much of this he has to put up with. Is this his terrible secret, hidden from the world: that he is continually disrespected behind closed doors, by the very woman who said to him "I do"? It was clear that he was only up on that ladder for her benefit. Has she broken him, over the years, to the point where he follows her instructions like a mindless robot? Did she send him around to ask my permission, a good little errand boy? In their house, acoustically insulated from the world, did she call him a fucking pussy for not telling me to deal with my own goddamn tree?

The PUA sector of the man-o-sphere refers to tantrums like hers as 'shit-tests'. The idea being that, if only he stood up for himself, and did not back down or become emotional, he would 'pass' and she would become a more demure wife as a result. Some PUA bloggers approach shit-testing positively, seeing it as a challenge to be overcome. I am not comfortable viewing it this way. 'Shit-testing' – i.e. affronts to the person's worth and self-esteem – is probably responsible for the premature deaths of a great number of men. One needlessly stressful incident after another is sure to raise the blood pressure. But actually living with a person who does this, combined with the stress of full-time work five days a week? The origin of the life expectancy gap becomes clear. It's probably always been this way. My neighbour's wife doesn't work, so her only opportunity for a little entertainment on his behalf comes with the weekend. And so he spends his Saturdays up on ladders, being berated for doing the additional work that she is perfectly capable of doing herself. In his early thirties, he is already going grey.

When you look at it in this way, you realise – perhaps, once again – that marriage has no benefit at all for men. It is not even a stretch to say that, in this day and age, marriage is systematically abusive for men. While women can up and leave at any time they like, with minimal resistance from the law, family courts, or society as a whole (we continue to suffer from Eat, Prey, Love syndrome) – men cannot leave women without paying the price. The mentality seems to run like this: how dare he want to leave a woman? Make him PAY. Debtor's prison is the ultimate destination. Of course, when the shoe is on the other foot, you go girl!

Married men are literally trapped, stuck supporting the poisonous predators that will eventually kill them. Plenty of women know this; perhaps this is why they are so keen on the idea. A little legal tweaking was all it took for feminists to remake marriage in their own image: men are now the dehumanised tools for women's personal use. Sex roles have not simply been reversed, because men continue to do most of the work. What has changed is that the paycheque is now handed directly over to the wife, and his time at home will be spent completing endless 'honey-do' lists.

Every time you see a happily married couple, keep this in mind. That happiness is a guise. They want you to believe that they are just as normal as all the other couples who are pretending to be happy. Underneath the surface lurks trouble, discord, and a man who knows that freedom comes with a hefty price tag.

Now, if you'll excuse me, I'm going to drop to my knees and thank the Lord that I am not married.

Appearing Tonight on Dads on the Air

It has been about a year since I was invited on to Dads on the Air, the longest running radio program in the world that deals with men's issues. At the time I was Editor-in-Chief at Men's News Daily, and was asked to come on and speak about the men's movement and a good bit about the history and operations of MND.

Tonight at 9:00 p.m. EST US, I will be making another appearance. This time I have been invited to specifically talk about A Voice for Men Radio and avoiceformen.com. It's also likely we will be discussing the Vladek Filler case, chivalry and other topics now relevant to the mission here.

These are great people running this show and I look forward to doing a little bragging on the readers and contributors to this website and radio show. The program broadcasts live in Australia, another reminder of the international nature of our movement.

You can listen tonight via live streaming at the station here, though you may want to test it early to make sure you don't need an additional plug in for their player.

Thanks for taking the time to give it a listen.

From Dan Moore, Menz Magazine

April 11, 2011 | by Tom Givens | Link | Original Link

Hello all. I was hoping to get a moment of your time here to talk about MenZ Magazine. I started the magazine (which is really the second iteration of the idea, but let's not quibble) basically to show the main issues men face in more of an understandable grouping of articles, than a link to a website. At that time (as is the case now) plenty of people were coming to the MRA type sites either questioning or criticising our views with the most cartoonish of ideas of who we are.

It was also, frankly, hard to find information on a whole slew of issues.

There was plenty written, but most of it was of quite low quality…basically the equivalent of screaming incoherently at the world. The transient nature of websites made this less of a problem than you might think. But the problem is, great articles and ideas were buried just as easily as the ranting. And the speed the articles were appearing at (and have to, for a successful site) the life cycle of the article was measured in days, not weeks or months, as is the case today. This also meant the articles were necessarily short and usually more opinion than fact.

Which brings me to the point of this missive. I have to make a choice about this magazine. It saps WAY too much of my time and energy, and I just don't think I can keep up the pace needed to take it to the next level, which is to monetize it and sell advertising.

That said, I can't just let it die on the vine either. I have way too much time invested in it. And the artist and activist in me just can't let the opportunity for free exposure go to waste either.

So, I would like to appeal once again to the general manosphere for talent.

There is no way there's not a ton of artsy people out there, with drawing, illustration, design, photographic, writing, layout, and other skills. There's no way that some of you can't use the free exposure of your work, and the ability to put this kind of thing in a portfolio.

You want to think big? What would it be like to be in on the ground floor of a magazine like Ms. Magazine? A recognized pioneer of a movement that changed the world? The producer of an iconic image or concept or logo?

How would you like to be in the History books?

So here's what I've decided to do:

I'm going to post my issues and what I hope to illustrate and have written etc. in advance. I'm going to post the Illustration and photographic desires I have, and leave it open to reader submission. And when it comes time that money can be made from the effort (corporate structure type stuff and money are the only things standing in the way right now) these people will be paid on a per-share of issue basis, likely based on page or word count. Hopefully quite generously.

The last issue hit over half a million views, with an average increase in readership of over 100% issue over issue, I'd say there's a good chance some people could get their work seen by the right people. If you know what I mean.

I hope to make photo essays a major part of this magazine, if I can find the talents needed.

Issue 6 is sort of in the wings, since I'm still waiting on enough articles around the concept chosen (which is issues surrounding trying to raise boys, and trying to be a boy growing up). If you are interested in participating here is how it's done, and the process you can expect:

Email me at menz.magazine@gmail.com with a request to be involved, and a short note detailing the skills you bring to bear.

Depending on the type of work you do, you will either receive a list of concepts to work with, and artistic freedom with only the amount of guidance needed or desired, or a request for a portfolio in cases where chunks of responsibility will be dispensed.

These assignments will have due dates that must be adhered to, but will not be onerous. I can make myself available on Skype for any who need that too.

All who participate will have prominent billing, along with links to their respective webpages. Both on the masthead, and on the respective article.

And that's really it. I know a few of you have offered in the past, and I dropped the ball. I apologize for that, it's not that your efforts were rejected, it was simple disorganization on my part. So please, don't hesitate to contact me again.

I use free software (Scribus and GIMP) to produce the magazine, so cost is not a barrier to anyone.

And on a related note, I want to appeal to all the activist groups out there, from RADAR to SAVE to F4J, to contact me regarding a special issue I want to produce, detailing each and every one of your organizations in one issue.

Thanks for your time.

Save Me

April 11, 2011 | by Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) | Link | Original Link

There once was a kingdom, a tiny, impoverished kingdom. The king of that kingdom had a daughter with hair like sunlight and skin like cream. A rich merchant offered to marry his son to the king's daughter and in exchange for a title, bring wealth to the kingdom.

The princess did not want to marry the merchant's son—he was too round and too pale and above all too young. And she had already fallen in love on sight with a well-born knight, dark and strong and noble.

Her father told her that his sons served their people in war and she must serve her people in marriage.

She said, 'no, father, and I will not speak of it again.'

Her father told her that without this marriage, their kingdom would continue to suffer from poverty.

She said, 'no, father, and I will not eat with you anymore.'

Her father told her that after she had borne the Merchant's son an heir she could take as many lovers as she wished. (This he told her in the strictest confidence and with great discomfort.)

She cried, 'Father! I will not be touched by a merchant's son!' and locked herself in her rooms.

For ten days and nights the princess refused to leave her rooms. She refused food—at least food that was not sweet cakes and chocolates—and she refused drink—that was not honey mead and sugared wine.

Each day the king would beg and promise his daughter some boon but she turned away from all his entreaties and said 'you will have to drag me before the priest and when he asks me if 'I do' I will scream 'til I turn blue instead!'

The king despaired and the merchant fumed, growing impatient and talking loudly of more amenable princesses in other kingdoms.

In the midst of this turmoil, a crone came before the king. She told him she would convince the princess to wed if she could just speak to the girl alone.

'I wish to speak to you, princess.'

The princess lifted herself from her pillow, her eyes burned with tears. 'Go away. I want nothing to do with anyone.'

The voice persisted. 'I am not here to convince you to marry the merchant's son, princess, but to help you have your true love.'

The princess pulled herself up off her bed. 'Who are you?'

'I am no one and nothing. Just an old woman who has seen many things and knows a little magic.'

The princess walked to the door of her receiving room. She opened it and saw a crone. The crone looked like the trunk of an old riverside tree, peppered with fungus and roped by sagging bark. The princess shuddered at the sight and glanced past her. No one in the hall beyond; the princess opened the door further and waved the crone into her receiving room. 'Speak, crone.'

The crone hobbled inside. The princess offered her a chair and the crone slowly slumped into it, like a rotten house into a sinkhole. 'Ah. Thank you my dear.' The crone smiled—or perhaps frowned, the princess could not tell—and she spoke again, 'Are you virtuous?'

'Of course I am!' The princess replied, her voice short. 'I am pure and virtuous in that purity.'

'Purity is not virtue. I know this because I was like you once. Before time and toil twisted me into this shape.'

The princess laughed and it sounded like the chiming of tiny bells. 'Oh, crone, age has confused you. You could never have been like me. I am a princess.'

'Is that so?' The crone reached for the princess's hand. The princess flinched as the weathered, leathery skin touched her own. 'You are to be wed, I hear. And you are not happy.'

'No!' The princess clenched her hands into fists. 'He is far too young for me. And pallid. And clammy. My father says it is for the kingdom's sake that I wed. But can you imagine it? Without love? Why should I sacrifice my heart just to bring wealth to my people?'

'Very true, my dear. And there is a man. A man you cannot have.'

The princess bit her lip. 'I have only spoken to him but once—'

'How true is your love for him?'

The princess swooned onto her chaise. 'My love is as true as the sun rises, as true as the sky is deep, as true as the turning of the tide, as true as—'

'I can give you a magic.' The crone's gaze took on a pin sharpness that made the princess shiver. 'A magic that will capture him and make your father consent to your marriage.'

The princess sat up, her brow furrowed. 'What do you want for it? What is the risk?'

'Clever girl.' The crone bared the few teeth she had left. 'But I want nothing and if you are virtuous and your love is true, no harm can come to you.'

'Of course I am! And it is!' The princess leaned forward. 'What magic?'

'Two words, princess.' The crone laughed and her voice sounded like the breaking of rotten wood. 'Two words. "Save me." Say those words and everyone around you will see you beset by a horrible monster.' The crone's grip on the princess's hand tightened. 'You will see the truth, there is nothing, no danger, but everyone else will see only the illusion.

'Tomorrow go to the castle courtyard and say those words within hearing of your knight. You will be married to him before the day is out.'

The princess did as she was told. The next day she went to the courtyard and when she saw her knight—young and strong and dark—she walked to him, her hand maidens trailing her, and he bowed before her, ‘My lady.’

‘Save me.’ She said.

Instantly the courtyard erupted in noise and running. Peasants screamed; children cried in fear. Her handmaidens shrieked, gathered up their skirts and fled to one of the stone archways ringing the courtyard. The princess glanced around, looking for the source of their terror—there was nothing but a goat slipped its lead and chewing a mouthful of grass by the well.

Her knight charged to his feet, pushing past her as if she was no longer there. She turned to berate his roughness when she remembered the crone’s words.

He had his sword out and shield hiding his head and shoulders as he advanced upon the goat as if it was a foe a thousand times larger.

The princess watched in amazement as the knight pantomimed fighting a monster. In the faces of her handmaidens and the frightened peasants hiding within the stone archways she saw a terrible fear.

But all she could see was the goat, hopping away from the knight in confusion, lashing out with its small hooves and braying.

The knight fought and fought, parrying non-existent swipes of a massive claw, stabbing at a non-existent belly as big as a siege engine, ducking non-existent fiery breath.

Finally the knight struck a mortal blow and the goat slumped to the courtyard floor, mewling as it bled.

The princess could feel everyone around her holding their breath as they watched whatever monster the goat was to them die.

That day the king gave the princess’ hand in marriage to the knight for his bravery in protecting her from a dragon.

The merchant and his son were not happy. Furious, the merchant told the king he would be rerouting several very lucrative caravans away from the king’s roads. He promised an even deeper poverty for the king and his people.

The princess and the knight were given half the kingdom to rule over. The princess was thrilled. She was saved!

It was to the princess’ credit that she did indeed love the knight. But it was to her detriment that she did not love him enough.

After a time, she found him neglectful; he spent most days honing his art and most of his nights teaching his squires. He said he did it only out of their people’s need: other kingdoms eyed them and they were poor, with only a small army to their name, they had to make themselves ready in whatever way they could.

The princess only knew for sure that she was lonely. She thought back to the Merchant’s son and realized that even if he was a bit unkept he had been clever and witty—well traveled and well read. And, really, two years younger was not so bad.

During a long, slow month alone, one of the knight's squires caught her eye. The young man was charming and attentive and soon found a place in her bed.

She was not modest about her affair; her anger at the knight's neglect made her bold and foolhardy. It was not long till her secret was out. The knight rushed to confront her and found her and the squire in her bed.

Despite her boldness, the princess was still shocked and horrified to be found out. In an instant she bolted from her lover's side and threw herself at the knight's feet whispering, 'save me.'

Had she known what was going to happen next, she might have never said the words. But she could not take it back and as she watched, the knight leapt at the squire, blade drawn.

The princess hid her head in her hands and did not see what happened next, but she heard wailing and the sound of slit flesh.

When the knight returned to her side was no blood on him, but there was a grimness in his face. 'Even if he was one of my squires, a rapist should not be suffered to live.'

Shivering and pale, the princess said nothing. She was sick to be sure, but under the sickness and the shaking was a low excitement that inflamed her.

That night, exhausted by the excitement and the feel of death so close, the princess slept fitfully. In her deepest dreams, her words coagulated in her throat, a lump so large she could not breathe. She woke, screaming.

The knight was beside her. 'Why are you screaming?'

The princess tried to explain, tried to make her mouth form around the right words but it would not, she could only say, 'Save me.'

The knight leapt from their bed and lunged at shadows cast by the candlelight. For the rest of the night he battled an imaginary foe while the princess wept.

Every night that followed the princess would wake from being choked: the knight would beg her to tell him what was the matter and she could only say, 'save me.'

He would spend the rest of the night exhausting himself saving her from the dragon that besieged her every night.

And she would weep, because she could see it killing him and she loved him, but not enough.

When the knight could fight no more he started to barricade her in a keep by herself, hoping she would be safe if he could somehow find away to close off any possible entry.

During the night, alone and trapped, she would try to fight her way out of his careful fortifications just so she could breathe.

In the morning he would find her scraped and bloody from battle. He decided the dragon must have found a way into the keep and he would call for even stronger walls and locks. Eventually she was entombed into a room with no doors and no windows and walls five feet thick. It took a mason six hours each day to open and close it.

The nightmares continued and the princess continued to fight for freedom each night as if she was fighting for her life.

When the king heard what the knight had done to his daughter he sent what soldiers and arms he had to free her and bring the knight before his throne to be punished.

The princess was brought to the king's side on a bed as she was too weak to walk.

The knight knelt before them both.

'Look at my daughter. Look at the wounds on her hands and arms and feet.' the king raged, 'you have beaten her, starved her and thrown her in a stone tomb.'

'No, my lord.' Said the knight. 'I have tried to save her from an evil that besieges her every night!'

The princess watched them argue. She knew that if she said nothing, her father would be persuaded by the knight's words and she would be taken back to her prison to suffocate on her own nightmares. And she realized what the crone had been telling her: she could give up her magic any time she wished, just by wanting it. But she could not say she loved the knight enough.

The princess turned to the king and said, 'save me.'

The knight was hung for his crimes.

With nothing left but her magic, it became a game and the princess played it with as many men as she wished. The petty enmities she cultivated between rival lords and the grinding poverty threw the court into chaos and then the kingdom into civil war. Neighboring kingdoms seized the opportunity to invade. The king was killed and his bloodline was dethroned; the princess faced the guillotine and wept bitterly in it's shadow. 'Save me,' she said and was spared but even her magic could save her from the rage of all her enemies.

She was banished.

In her new life she wandered, destitute and penniless, until she found a trade she could ply. Here and there she would use her magic to incite brawls in taverns and bawdy houses, in the fighting of brigands and rouges her need to taste her power was satiated.

She did this until the ugliness of her body reflected the ugliness of her soul and no man cared to save her.

And she kept wandering, a shambling, dusty old woman wandering shambling, dusty old roads. After a time her magic loosed from her tongue and she was able to speak other words, but now she rarely had cause to.

Until one day, when she had wandered so far from her former kingdom that the people around her had never heard its name, she heard from gossip and rumors that this new kingdom was in turmoil.

Its princess was refusing to marry a prince from a neighboring land. The marriage would end a long and bitter acrimony between the two kingdoms. Peasants and nobles alike were strung tight; despite the treaties the delay had inspired vicious cross-boarder skirmishes and raids, even now their erstwhile ally built forces for an invasion they likely would not repel.

Every day the princess took to her room and refused to come out, the fragile truce deteriorated further.

The old woman—sitting on a broken stool in a cast-off corner of a tavern—listened to a retinue of nobles speaking to each other in hushed and urgent tones. After a moment she rose and hobbled over.

For the first time in many years she spoke. The first words she spoke sounded like the creak of old wood and made as much sense.

One of the nobles turned to her. ‘Go away, old woman. Can’t you see we have important business.’

She tried again, this time her voice sounded like dry twigs breaking, but there were words in amongst the crackling rasp. ‘I can get the princess to wed. If I can speak to her alone.’

It was a testament to the nobles’ desperation that they considered the crone’s offer and relayed it to the king. The king bade the crone be brought to the princess’ door.

At the door the old woman called out. ‘I am not here to convince you to wed, my dear, but to grant you your true love.’

After a time the door opened a crack. A princess, skin like cream, hair like sunlight, a mirror image of the old woman when she was young, looked through. ‘Who are you?’

‘I am no one and nothing. Just an old woman who has seen many things and knows a little magic.’ The old woman replied. ‘You are to be wed, I hear. And you are not happy with this.’

‘No!’ The princess gripped the wood of the door so hard it creaked. ‘He is too thin and brown and above all too old for me! My father says it is for the kingdom’s sake that I wed. But without love? Why should I sacrifice my heart just to bring peace to my people?’

‘Very true, my dear.’ The old woman laughed and it sounded like the breaking of rotten wood. ‘Tell me, princess, are you virtuous?’

‘Of course I am!’ The princess replied, her voice short. ‘I am pure and virtuous in that purity.’

‘Purity is not virtue. I know this because I was like you once. Before time and toil twisted me into this shape.’

The princess laughed and it sounded like the chiming of tiny bells. ‘Oh, crone, age has confused you. You could never have been like me. I am a princess.’

‘Is that so.’ At the princess’ laughter hatred welled within the old woman. ‘You want a man who is not your betrothed. A man below your station, yes.’

The princess stared at her. ‘How could you know?‘

‘How true is your love?’ The old woman asked.

The princess tossed her curls. ‘As true as a fox’s wit, as true as the blue of the sky, as true as—‘

The old woman waved the princess’ words away. She had heard them before and had no patience for their emptiness. ‘I can give you a magic that will capture him and make your father consent to your marriage.’

The princess’ eyes widened. ‘What is the magic?’

‘Two words, my dear.’ The old woman leaned forward. ‘“Save me.”’

Speaking Out Against the Emerging Police State

April 11, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

As many of you know the collective efforts to inform the public about the legal railroading of Vladek Filler in the state of Maine continue unabated. Those efforts also include initiatives to draw attention to the proliferation of mandatory arrest laws and so called primary aggressor polices being enacted across the nation.

All of these things amount to an emerging police state that is operating under the guise of protecting abused women, but whose net result is a constitution in flames and the threat of absolute tyranny.

This is not an overstatment.

To that end avoiceformen.com and A Voice for Men Radio will be dedicating a lot of effort to assist other organizations in taking action against this oppressive tide.

To begin with, as you can see to the right, AVfM is maintaining a banner that links to the petition to disbar prosecutor Mary Kellett of the Bar Harbor, Maine District Attorney's Office. We tried supporting this at first by keeping an article about the petition high in the rankings on the home page, but changing the time stamp to keep it there presented some technical problems. We fixed the problem with this and the petition continues to get regular signatures but it did take some time.

Very "user unfriendly" of us round here.

Onward, though, we are not stopping at the petition. Following are the general show descriptions and links for two upcoming broadcasts of A Voice for Men Radio. Both broadcasts will focus on the laws and policies that are creating a police state in which the rights of everyone are being trampled.

4/12/11 A Constitutional Crisis in Maine

"No drop" prosecutions are becoming a plague in the American judicial system. The term refers to a case that a prosecutor will pursue at all costs, even if it means the willful conviction of an innocent person.

Right now in the state of Maine one of those prosecutions has led to the harassment and abuse of Vladek Filler and quite likely a number of other innocent men. And as reported in the Bangor Daily News, it is beginning to cause an uproar.

On this episode of AVfM Radio we are going to take a closer look at no drop prosecutions and their sometimes horriffic consequences. We will be joined by attorney Robert Franklin of Father's and Families. Also joining us will be Attorney Lisa Scott of Taking Action Against Bias in the System (TAABS).

4/19/11 A Constitutional Crisis in Maine II

Predominant (or primary) aggressor laws operate on a simple premise. When police respond to a domestic violence call they have their orders on who to arrest before they even reach the scene. And in states with mandatory arrest laws that means that the moment they get the call police know they are going to the home and arrest the man, regardless of any evidence; even if the man was actually the victim.

It is sexual profiling at its most egregious and arguably the most corrosive attack on the 4th and 6th Amendments to the Constitution in American history.

These laws have the literal effect of criminalizing the act of being a man. Lawmakers are pushing ahead with this legislation, for political gain and under political pressure from feminists, even though it is clear that they violate everything from due process to the presumption of innocence to the right to face your accuser.

Right now the state of Maine boasts some of the most aggressive of these laws in the nation and appears to be an emerging leader for passing similarly draconian laws elsewhere..

To discuss this we will be joined by Richard L. Davis, a retired police lieutenant and an adjunct instructor of criminal justice and social science for Quincy College at Plymouth. He is the author of two books and numerous articles about domestic violence that have appeared in the encyclopedia of psychology, journals, magazines, newspapers and online.

Also joining us will be Dr. Brenda Russell, Associate Professor of Psychology at Penn State Berks. Her scholarly and teaching interests include psychology and law, perceptions of victims and perpetrators of domestic violence and homicide defendants.

Please be sure to listen to these important shows and also to call in to voice your opinion or ask questions of our expert guests.

Obama on Deck with a Gun. Are You Handing Him Bullets?

99 years ago Friday, the passenger ship Titanic went down in the icy waters of the Atlantic. As metal screeched, bent and tore, and as a thousand screaming, terrified people scrambled for even the illusion of survival, a story unfolded that is uncannily analogous to modern times.

There were spots of calm on the ship, all of them provided by men resigned that they had to die in order to save, or even just to provide added comfort, for the women and children being loaded into the too few lifeboats.

Wireless operators, all men, were still manning their posts despite the fact the ship's captain had released them from duty for a chance to save themselves.

The engine room crew, all men, continued working in the bowels of the sinking ship, trying to keep lights on as long as possible.

Even the small orchestra, all men, stood on deck playing to the bitter end. They were reportedly playing Nearer, my God, to Thee, or Autumn just before being swallowed by the frigid waves.

Indeed, the only reported place on the ship where men exceeded the expected panic for the situation was where some of the men tried to board lifeboats to save their own lives. Some of them made it.

Some of them were shot dead by the ship's crew.

One might think that such a thing could not possibly happen in these times and might challenge my idea that what happened on the deck of that ship a century ago is in any way comparable to what is happening today.

The sad truth is that things are worse.

Let's take a look at just what has been going on in the past week or so, as reported on the pages of this website.

Primary aggressor laws; laws that instruct police to arrest men and men only, before even investigating complaints of domestic violence, are on the rise. All these laws do is target men for persecution, regardless of evidence and with complete indifference to probable cause and due process.

The saga of Vladek Filler, a man accused of rape in a case where there is clearly no evidence against him, continues unabated.

FRS just reported to this site about the administrative order from the Obama administration that just made it considerably easier to persecute and destroy young men with false allegations.

And what has been the response to all of this from the public at large?

(Insert depraved silence here)

But as they say in the cheesiest of commercials, “That’s not all, folks.”

And indeed it isn’t. In fact, as bad as these things are, they are not even the worst of it.

Dr. Warren Farrell has spent two years developing an initiative for men and boys and has presented it directly to the Obama Administration. The proposal is for a commission on “Boys to Men,” and would address the many areas in which man and boys face substantive challenges in modern life. It is has been endorsed by many prominent organizations and individuals.

The Obama administration doesn’t give a shit and has not even bothered to give Farrell a direct response for his two years of dedicated efforts.

As recently reported in The Daily Caller:

“Joshua Dubois, the White House director of Faith-based and Neighborhood initiatives, has said his office cannot take responsibility for moving this through,” said Farrell. “The reason he gave us was that he was focused on fulfilling what he was already assigned to do, which was to focus on fatherhood and marriage, proposals that Obama has suggested for funding as of last Father’s Day.”

Farrell’s proposal currently is sitting in Obama’s Chief of Staff William Daley’s office.

“They have acknowledged that they have received the proposal plus about 35 letters of endorsements from organizations such as the Boy Scouts,” Farrell said adding that the administration has been silent since.

How much reading between the lines does it take here?

We have seen Obama’s initiatives on fatherhood and marriage. It amounts to a great big slimy shame sandwich, admonishing men to be better fathers while he assists feminists in any way he can to boot fathers out of their homes and paint them as demons in the eyes of their children.

And the silence? It isn’t silence at all. It is the deafening report of a gunshot on the deck of a sinking ship.

It is clear that Farrell’s efforts are designed to put men and boys into lifeboats and save them.

And it is clear that it is the POTUS’s intent to gun them down for trying.

And this is a sinking ship, people. There will be no outrage sounded by the pitifully brainwashed public. There will be no indignant speeches by politicians. There will be no headlines demanding answers from the administration.

Not until enough of us start sounding off. And until we have MRA’s that don’t cower before slight disapproval and rejection from women, that sounding off will not happen.

The Chances of Holding Your Son Responsible for a Rape He Didn't Commit Have Just Skyrocketed

April 13, 2011 | by False Rape Society | Link | Original Link

You will excuse me if I dispense with the carefully laid out introduction and the painstakingly crafted prose, but I write about a matter of grave importance, and there isn't time for either. False Rape Society has written in excess of 2,000 posts, and this may be the single most important topic we've ever reported on.

In an age when young men are a distinct minority on our nation's college campuses, the Obama administration has just declared open season on the dwindling relatively few who actually bother to attend college. The United States Department of Education's Office for Civil Rights issued a letter dated April 4, 2011 to colleges — found here http://insidehighered.com/content/download/392490/4638343/version/1/file/Sexual_violence_DCL_4- — setting forth unequivocal guidelines for handling claims of sexual harassment, including claims of sexual assault, in disciplinary proceedings brought against students. Of course, the overwhelming majority of sex claims, especially serious claims such as sexual assault, are lodged against male students. According to the letter, from now on, to be in compliance with Title IX, all disciplinary proceedings involving claims of sexual harassment (which includes claims of rape and sexual assault) "must use a preponderance of the evidence standard," as opposed to the "clear and convincing evidence" standard (evidence of a high probability that the offense occurred) currently used by many schools. Vice President Joe Biden, chief architect of VAWA, unveiled the new procedures earlier this month.

What this means is that a male accused of sexual assault may be expelled from college, and his freedom to go on to graduate school and obtain decent employment may be curtailed and even destroyed, even if there is only a very slight probability that he committed the assault. The school can have a reasonable doubt about whether he did it, and the evidence need not even show that there is a strong likelihood of it. If the disciplinary hearing board finds that the complainant's story of the alleged incident is more credible than the accused's, even by a 50.0001 to 49.9999 percent margin, he packs his bags and is banned from the school forever. Forget law school, forget medical school, forget graduate school of any kind. And good luck explaining that to prospective employers. His life has been effectively destroyed.

Former Education Department lawyer Hans Bader posits a well-reasoned argument why the Education Department is wrong as a matter of law: "The Education Department's position is based on a misunderstanding of who is subject to Title IX, the federal law banning schools from committing sex discrimination. Title IX's requirements apply to schools, not individual students." Read the entire piece here: http://www.openmarket.org/2011/04/11/education-department-changes-burden-of-proof-in-sexual-harassment-cases-under-title-ix/

While it is a terrible thing for a young woman to see her rapist escape without punishment, it is an even more terrible thing to hold a young man responsible for a rape he didn't commit. The chances of the school making a mistake and doing exactly that — holding a young man responsible for a rape he didn't commit — have just skyrocketed with the Education Department's April 4 directive.

A student's interest in obtaining a college degree, with all it entails, is of such weight and gravity that colleges should justify any decision to deprive a student of that interest with proof more substantial than a mere preponderance of the evidence. Even for legal actions seeking only money damages, some states impose the enhanced "clear and convincing evidence" standard to prove claims where fabrications are easiest to make (e.g.,claims of oral contracts, fraud, and promissory estoppel). That standard is all the more appropriate in "he said/she said" claims of sexual assault, where lies are easy to tell, too frequently made, and incredibly destructive of the men about whom they are told.

Schools are already lowering their standards of proof in response to the April 4 directive. Yale announced Tuesday that it is lowering its standard to "preponderance of the evidence." Stanford has also just done it. (Associated Students of Stanford University President Angelina Cardona applauded the move, noting: "Lowering of the standard of proof is absolutely crucial to the women's community.") Brandeis, too, will shift its standard of proof for internal hearings on sexual assault to a lesser burden, a university official said, to comply with the directive. Harvard Law School and U.Va. are feeling the heat as well: both are under investigation because they require sexual assault victims to prove their allegations by "clear and convincing evidence." One or more schools are lowering the standard in the middle of an ongoing hearing.

Stanford Dean of Student Life Christine Griffith doesn't seem to have any concern about the school getting it wrong and punishing a young man undeservedly. "For people who might be concerned about the change in the burden, the standard of proof, then [it is] probably an opportunity for people to be saying to themselves, 'I need to be really educated about these issues because I don't want to find myself in this circumstance,'" she said.

Our sons have found themselves in the cross-hairs of another politically motivated effort to appease a vocal interest group that has declared them enemy number one. The Education Department's directive was premised on research finding that one in five college women are victims of sexual assault or attempted sexual assault. The survey that concocted that outrageous number utilized self-selecting respondents, and the problems with such methodology are many and insurmountable. See here: http://www.skepdic.com/selectionbias.html Heather MacDonald summed it up succinctly: the one-in-five stat is "bogus." See here: http://www.nationalreview.com/articles/263834/are-one-five-college-women-sexually-assaulted-heather-mac-donald This is not even to mention that the the one-in-five figure yields numbers wildly inconsistent with even the inflated 90 percent under-reporting standard sometimes cited by the sexual grievance industry to justify its existence. See here: http://falserapesociety.blogspot.com/2011/02/one-in-four-lie-demolished-once-and-for.html The fact is, if that one-in-five figure were accurate, our college campuses would be more dangerous places than even the Tadmor Prison in Syria, where the bloodthirsty guards butcher inmates with axes for the fun of it.

If you need further proof of the Department of Education's blatant bias against presumptively innocent males, the April 4 letter also says that under Title IX, when there is an accusation of sexual assault, the school must take appropriate interim measures before the final outcome of the investigation. These measures include separating the alleged perpetrator and the complainant. All well and good — but that's not all it says. It goes on to state the following: "When taking steps to separate the complainant and the alleged perpetrator, a school should minimize the burden on the complainant, and thus should not, as a matter of course, remove complainants from classes or housing while allowing alleged perpetrators to remain."

The import is clear. In "he said/she said" disputes about sexual assault, he is presumed the guilty party from the moment of her accusation. At least the Department of Education is up front with its misandry.

It is not hyperbole to assert that under this new Department of Education directive, an accuser and a school are free to destroy the life of a young man even if there is only a very slight probability that he did anything wrong. And I ask, why is there not widespread outrage about this?

Soft Power, Hard Power and Smart Power

April 13, 2011 | by Zeta Male | Link | Original Link

There are two basic forms of power. There is “soft power” which involves more subtlety, persuasion, and a different line of thinking; and there is “hard power” which uses might, strength and aggression to push forward ideas

When you combine the two, you get what Joseph Nye refers to “Smart power”. We in the MRM need to start generating a bit more smart power and we need to do it fast. The sooner we harness smart power the sooner we can get rid of people like Mary Kellet.

The first part of smart power is soft power. Soft power involves the spreading of ideas, creating allies on all sides, and from time to time a bit of schmoozing. Think tanks, lobbyists, and scholars are solid sources of smart power when it comes to generating thoughts into the people’s minds. Strong PR campaigns portraying those that support an idea in the most positive manner possible are another must in the world of soft power. Essentially, it is a more passive manner of creating and enforcing a group’s influence.

The smart power department needs to focus on a few things. The first is spreading the word. It is straightforward and anyone can partake at any time. Even when someone overhears a conversation smart power comes into play. The second is working with politicians. Yes, we have to suck up sometimes and try to make the appeal that a politician will get votes by backing an issue. We have to show our cause is good for political strategy. The third aspect is working with feminists.

I know that this is an idea that is a bit more unpleasant to most of the people who are reading this. I am not saying we should get behind their activism, but we need to answer questions and have serious open discussions with those that are willing to talk about things. We have had a lot of bad luck in this aspect of smart power. Perhaps it is my youth to the movement, or, a bit of idealism but if we don’t keep our door open to working with those that are genuinely curious about us, and are not interested in playing the “who suffers more game”, we are going to have problems. NOW is a force to be reckoned with and we have to be a bit more tactical. We can work around feminism at times but dealing with feminism is inevitable. We will butt heads and it will be ugly. It’s the job of those who use soft power to try to get things done in a peaceful manner before things turn from bad to worse.

I for one, feel more comfortable in the field of soft power.

When things look bad for the opposition, they turn to the kinder, more tolerant sources of soft power. Soft power will be merciful, but its desire for subtle influence and compromise are not as prominent. That cute cuddly kitten also has sharp teeth. Soft power knows that you have no where else to turn and will take you for everything it can.

However there are two major flaws of soft power. The first is its lack of constructability. Yes, we can have idealists, theorists, bloggers, and authors spreading ideas but soft power is very much spontaneous. All of one’s soft power can be doubled or destroyed in a single day. A few bad apples and wrong moves and a growing movement's credibility will vanish. A few strong moves, charitable donations, and occasionally siding with the opposition (if we actually agree on an issue) can expand one's sphere of influence in the blink of an eye. If there is a disaster that we can use to our advantage (like what is going on with Kellet) issues become more visible to the public, and support is easier to gather.

The second weakness of soft power is its limited extension. If people aren't willing to listen, or some doctored videos get out, then soft power isn't rather useful. There are also things that cannot be done without the use of force. This is where hard power comes into play.

Hard power is the muscle of a movement. When things go wrong and legislation isn't passing, hard power is used. This is where we see our protests and rallies. Those that gather information events to oppose and fight are often in the hard power aspect, as they are excellent at riling up the masses to fight for a cause. When there is a need to place pressure through the form of anxiety on a certain politician or organization, hard power is looming in the background. Those in control know the hammer will come down if they sit around and do nothing or go against the people's will.

While debating is used in both hard and soft power, hard power challenges the opposition. The purpose isn't necessarily to antagonize, but rather to weaken the enemy by proving a point or the wrongdoing of others to the public. By bringing out public awareness to injustices in society and directly fighting against them, hard power shows its optimal use.

An excellent example of hard power is A Voice for Men Radio. Those that disagree are challenged by Paul, and it is there for everyone, friend or foe to hear the injustices and abuse felt by the modern man. When a single issue is tackled, solidarity is brought to a movement and the focus brings other people in.

Hard power is by no means is flawless. When activists clash things get ugly. There can be name calling, and sometimes violence. This puts soft power in a great state of jeopardy. A protest that gets out of hand can easily turn into a riot. And when this happens, the spontaneous nature of soft power works to its disadvantage. If not harnessed correctly, hard power can easily destroy a group's credibility. However, without its pressure nothing can get done.

When the two merge together, we get smart power. Smart power is the use of a balance of hard and soft power. Without soft power, hard power is a destructive force with little room for passive coercion and negotiation. Without hard power, soft power has no way to reinforce its advocacy. By blending brains and brawn smart power appears, and with smart power we see real change.

Primary Aggressor Listings by State

April 13, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Ladies and Gentlemen, start your laptops. And in case you don't know, primary (or predominant) aggressor laws are laws designed to give police the edict to arrest men in domestic violence disputes. They use guidelines that target males, not evidence of who did or didn't commit a crime. If your state is on this list, you should be contacting your representatives and making a protest. – PE

Primary Aggressor Laws By State

Show Reminder

April 13, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Well, we are about 40 minutes out from another episode of A Voice for Men Radio. Tonight it's about "no drop" prosecutions. While the Vladek Filler case we have been covering so much is not an example of one of these prosecutions, it is one of the many legal issues that has emerged during the discussions of laws and policies that negatively impact men.

Tonight we are joined by Robert Franklin of Father's and Families and Lisa Scott of TABS, two attorney's with a great deal of expertise in this area of the law.

And of course there is YOU. If you have something to say, or if you have ever been unfairly charged with domestic violence, please give us a call at

310-388-9709

Both our guests will be happy to field questions or just to hear your story of what happened. I might also ask those of you who call in to encourage others to sign the petition to disbar Mary Kellett.

As always, we hope you enjoy the show and look forward to hearing from you.

How Deep Does the Rabbit Hole Go?

Joe McCarthy was Wisconsin's Senator between 1947 and 1957. He is famous for fomenting public hysteria that large numbers of communist spies and sympathizers operated inside the United States government and elsewhere. McCarthy's unethical tactics eventually led him to be blacklisted by the United States Senate, but not before hundreds of careers and lives were destroyed by his public witch hunts and baseless accusations.

It would be easy to make a glib comparison between McCarthy era communist witch hunts and a current climate of public hysteria surrounding accusations of rape. Unfortunately, the comparison would be inadequate. There is not merely a rogue politician fueling the fear over the lowest incidence crime for which the FBI maintains stats. This time around, the entire mainstream, tax funded apparatus of educational and "nonprofit" victim-industrial-profiteering shelter business is pushing the fear. The fear, however isn't actually a fear of some imaginary culture of rape, it's fear of accusation. That fear, by the way, is justified because an accusation of rape has become a de facto conviction. The evidence-based inquiry which follows any other criminal accusation has been reduced to a formality.

By accusation alone – a man will be destroyed.

It's not a rape culture, as so many feminists claim, but a rape-accusation culture.

False accusation is an ultimate weapon owned by a biological demographic we are all constantly told are victims. Women, you see, are far from being the social class protected in law, privileged in hiring, advantaged by affirmative action, protected from violence, held exempt from combat, and line-jumped to lifeboats.

No, women are oppressed.

It's the patriarchy, and the poor womenfolk are under constant threat at all times! Except that they're not. But we all continue to indulge in a reality denying dance, a kind of psycho-merengue, because if we ever have the backbone to speak the truth, to stop dancing – we wont get that precious female approval.

The truth is that women are privileged, pampered and protected from uncomfortable reality to a degree that is directly demolishing fundamental social institutions of free speech, justice, achievement through merit, education and personal accountability and person-hood. These are the pillars of a free society, and we're throwing them away to placate a generation of women infantalized by a lifetime of flattering and soothing lies about their innate superiority and terrible, terrible victim-hood.

But don't imagine the blame lies only on women, or even feminists – and to be sure, don't mistake this as an attack on women – they're just fallible humans like everybody else. Feminism is a useful poison, poured into all of our ears through our media and educational system – and it's use is to divide men and women against each other – and to diminish men's social power to zero. Men, when not psychologically hobbled, are stubborn and aggressive and far more individualistic than women, despite feminist agitprop to the contrary. For a free society, this is a very good thing.

Now, if we're honest with ourselves, we know feminism's goal and continued outcome is to elevate women and denigrate men. This might seem like a strange objective for a more-or less free society to pursue – until you tumble to the fact that feminism is an elite funded an initiated movement. By elevating the biological half of humanity who are socially pliable – by indoctrinating them into a state of adult infant-hood, and by placing this self indulgent and self righteous class in a position of consequence free power over men – a perfect totalitarian society is created.

If you're a woman reading this, it might sound pretty harsh, but the fact is you've bee told you're entire life that you're a victim of an imagined cult of anti-woman hatred; that you're intellectually, morally, and spiritually superior to men. Women also earn less over their lifetimes, but somehow manage to control 65% of disposable income world wide. Do you see a disconnect yet? As a woman, you're also the minority of the homeless by a factor of 4, and a minority of suicides, by a factor of 4, and as a women you die on the job only 7% of the time – while men comprise 93% of workplace fatalities, 98% if you consider military combat a job vs. a social duty.

But you're oppressed, right?

To be fair, many women don't buy into the bulk of the mainstream mythology we're all constantly fed, and some few women openly oppose our society's continued denigration of all things masculine. Those women, however, are rare. Human beings are gifted with a nearly unlimited capacity for self delusion and rationalization, and in a system affording privilege to one group, the members of that group will mostly just quietly take advantage, however they may claim " I'm not a feminist". Sadly, this standard demurral doesn't actually mean much, because the values of our society are largely feminist values.

I mentioned that blame can't be apportioned solely to women, or to feminists, even as the present trend is towards demonization of men and deification of women as a supremacist super-class. A large measure of culpability for the current and accelerating abrogation of human rights falls squarely on men, who have, by increments enabled and accommodated a war against human rights, free speech, and the basic human freedoms western civilization is built on.

But blame is useless while a problem remains to be solved, and the real question is – how far along the path to a closed society will we go before the average man or woman stands up. Will you wait until your cage is pad-locked shut before you're moved to complain?

The Los Angeles Times reported on April 16, 2010, "some Obama administration officials are in the process of drafting classified guidelines that would allow the government to indefinitely hold suspects outside of the United States without charge or trial"

Indefinitely, without charge or trial.

But this has nothing to do with feminism, I hear somebody complain. You're right, feminism is only a tool, the larger goal is the creation of a police state in which nobody has rights, not even women.

Women are being elevated to a position of supreme power in the current state of the closing of our society because the are, to state it bluntly, gullible and easily led. Feminist-conditioned women are drunk with the power 50 years of flattery and privilege – and are being used as a tool of blunt trauma against men, because men are the traditional protectors of society. Women's current elevated, protected status is a temporary measure which is succeeding in dividing the population against itself – politicians continue to restructure society to suit a few wealthy banking families.

Women are angry over imagined and fictional oppression? Yes, but they're in for a terrible shock, because if the current climate of female supremacy is taken to it's logical conclusion, it will be a dystopian future to make Orwell's and Huxley's nightmares seem like daydreams.

So, how far will we go?

At some point, you will find you can no longer pretend everything is alright. The standing question is, will that moment come because you're manacled to the wall of your cell?

Expanding the Fight

Men's Rights in a larger political framework

In 2007 – after George Bush's Attorney General, Alberto Gonzales, replaced nearly a dozen district attorneys mid term, a highly irregular, and apparently politically motivated intervention in the judicial branch of government, he was required in 2007 to testify before the senate judiciary committee, then chaired by Senator Arlin Spectre.

I spent several months watching him on C-Span – reciting variations of "I don't remember." I remember feeling a chill. The attorney general being the head of the judicial branch of government stonewalling the judiciary committee's investigation of his politicization of the justice branch. The A.G. appointed by the definitively corrupt Bush Administration. Many characterize Bush the younger as incompetent, yet he achieved what generations of presidents before him failed to do, namely, to dispense with the bulk of the Bill of Rights as a thwart to the supreme power of government. This is not a small accomplishment, George-bush-the-clown was a masterful bit of misdirection.

When I realized that the justice branch of government was corrupt from the head down, I wondered at length how any citizen could find redress of grievance through legitimate channel – when the legitimate channels of redress are so openly corrupt.

In such a perverted system, it seemed that the only redress of grievance against public officials run amok, such as Mr Cheney, Mr Rove, Mr Rumsfeld, and Mr Bush was through legally illegitimate methods, outside the accepted mechanism of political participation. A sudden uncivil correction to a corrupt system appeared to be the only remaining recourse in a society whose legitimate checks and balances are broken, but I regard such violent correction as unpalatable, and unlikely.

In 2007, the continued and accelerated erosion of human rights appeared to have no viable brake.

The endless, ineffectual talking in senate chambers, political pulpits, court rooms, press galleries and news studios was all I expected then, and nearly all I have seen since.

I realized that in a climate of near universal corruption at the highest ranks of public life, the public would not stir themselves to act except through the ritual puppet show of "polite" political engagement through the wholly fictional, but legitimate channels of voting, petitioning, editorializing, and placard waving. Fortunately at the personal scale, but unfortunately at the societal scale – the public weren't and aren't going to shed any blood of patriot or tyrant. It's not that they are asleep, as some with a libertarian bent protest, simply that they are beaten. They are, and depending on the audience of this article, by "they" I mean you … they, are scared, exhausted, and hoping if they just keep their heads down, somebody else will be selected to be thrown into the volcano rather than themselves.

That's the balance – between the public's outrage over a ruling elite at the heads of corporate, political and financial North America, and the emotional exhaustion of human beings terrified that they might say the wrong thing and loose their homes, jobs, children or future. The unfortunate consequence of this calculated cowardice is that sacrifice of freedom in favor of safety will result in the retention of neither. So, sadly, the public did not seem in late 2007 likely to reject consensus authority of the corrupt elite. I predicted a long dark future history.

This was all before I had any awareness that such a thing as the Men's Right's Movement.

Option 1

Apathy : the ritual but ineffective participation in public life through voting and other "acceptable" channels.

This is where we are now, and its useless.

Option 2

Violent disruption and dispossession of corrupt governments and courts. This is no good either, not least because it's brutal, but also because it's likely to replace the old criminals with new criminals.

Fortunately, there's a third option, and the Men's Rights Movement is it.

Feminism's Role in social engineering:

The effects of the corrupt and violent social institution operating under the name "feminism" are arguably what brought many Men's Rights Activists to the movement, but feminism as a political ideology has no end point, because it's actually only a tool.

The goal of feminism has nothing whatsoever to do with equality, and for earnest feminists waking up to a wider political reality this is a bitter pill to swallow. Feminism, is, and always has been an astroturf movement, conceived and funded by the elite – and sold to the public as an egalitarian movement by appealing to the vanity of politically unsophisticated women. Weak men have also been coerced into compliance because agreeing with the self righteous rage of female is easier, and has the illusory benefit of female approval.

Unfortunately as most within the MRM know, feminism's stated goal of social and legal equality between the sexes is completely false, rather it is a corrosive, violent ideology engineered to create social discord, to infantalize women and criminalize men. Dividing men and women against each other, and eroding the social power of families within civil society is one of feminism's major successes. A civil population of individuals severed from the traditional support structure of strong families is much easier to control. For active MRAs, understanding that feminism as a tool in a longer goal of social control is important.

While feminism's influence is pervasive, violent and corrupt, getting wrapped up too closely in feminist arguments can become a distraction from the larger context. That context being that feminism is a tool to weaken public resistance to the transition of open societies to closed, police states.

Titanic Day II

April 14, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

A quick announcement before posting this video and link to the petition. I had planned to have a special program on A voice for Men Radio for Titanic Day and chivalry tomorrow night. Unfortunately there is illness in my family. Stacey's father, his name is R.D., is a 92 year old man entering the final days of his life. As his medical power of attorney, it is my job to oversee his care, to make sure he is as comfortable as possible and that he is allowed his dignity all the way to the end.

I can't do that and my other duties here at the same time, so this time it is my duties here that will be set aside until my job taking care of him is complete.

Till then the radio show will be on hold and the site will be in the very capable hands of Managing Editor Daniel Martinez.

I am, however, resurrecting last years video on Titanic Day as well as the petition that goes with it. On the first drive for Titanic Day we ended up with 218 signatures. I think we can beat that this time. I was able to sign it again so I did. It may be that everyone else can do the same.

Please try to enjoy one of my more rough offerings here (before I learned how to edit sound), and also, if the sentiments here fit for you, please sign the petition for the sake of yourself and your sons.

I will be back here full time when I can. Thanks.

A Letter to Traditional Women Revisited

April 15, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

My recent "Letter to Traditional Women," provoked a lot of visits, commentary and dissent yesterday. Funny how that happens when you get in peoples faces and drop a few F-bombs on their sacred cows.

Entrails are still hitting the ground.

But now that I have succeeded in provoking people; even offending a couple of redbots with my "tone" (oh, gasp), it is a good time to offer what I think is instructive about this particular situation.

The real point here (because princess certainly isn't the point) is that our struggle is still as much internal and personal as it is social and political.

I am pretty sure I read a comment from zed over at TS not too long ago that "Most MRA's are one blowjob away from becoming a mangina." And I had to laugh when Andrea, not so coincidentally I might add, brought up all the blowjobs that good traditional husbands could expect from good traditional wives if only we were smart enough to indulge them in a life of light housekeeping and cooking, both of which can be had on the cheap, and both of which they directly benefit from more than the man. After all, how much is he enjoying that tidy little abode while he is in the coal mine?

It kind of reminded me of how some people are told that 72 virgins await them in paradise if only they would strap a bomb to their midriff and push the button in a crowded café.

All that aside, the irony here is glaring. As MRA's we find it easy, irresistible even, to knock White Knights off their horses when they come riding in here lauding traditional values and lecturing us about how taking care of women is the manly thing to do. It is a transparent rouse that gets by no one unscathed and for good reason.

But look what happens when the White Knight's exact counterpart, the "traditional" woman, comes in with a guise of empathy and agreement for the MRM, but when all is said and done ends up offering fellatio in exchange for indentured servitude, and reveling in her "traditional power," as a woman.

Tom Snark's first response was perfect. "Fuck your traditional power."

And other responses were good as well. But it is clear in the comments that we struggle with it, because she is a woman.

It is totally understandable. To this day, after 25 years of activism for men, if I saw a woman I didn't know in some sort of trouble, I would still have to go through a conscious process to let her fend for herself.

In other words, I would still have to force myself not to rescue her. I can do it and have, but ingrained chivalry dies much harder than fat-assed Andrea Dworkin. And after 50 years of hot air from feminists about shedding gender roles, MRA's are the only ones really doing it.

It ain't easy.

There is a pretty damned healthy debate right now in that thread about whether I should have spit in the face of what some MRA's would consider a potential ally. But I have to say I think those MRA's are missing the point.

Traditionalism is the driving force behind male slavery. It is the psychological machine that socializes men into becoming fodder and into becoming lapdogs disguised as guard dogs.

In my way of thinking, it never was a good deal. In the age of misandry and feminist governance, it is foolhardy to say the least. I would not do it; not for a million dollars, and certainly not for a blow job and plate of beans that I had to pay for.

I say this knowing there are married men in this forum for whom I have a great deal of respect, and whom I seriously don't want to offend. I respect them and I respect their personal choices as sacrosanct.

But a Couch Princess speaking up for traditionalism in the name of men's activism? Here? Well, I dispensed enough four letter words in the first piece to express my disdain for that idea, but let me add that I am still sitting here laughing.

Again, this is not about women. And if you will allow me I want to use Izzey as an example.

Izzey worked grueling, blue collar jobs her entire adult life. She didn't just witness a man's world by watching one walk in the door, beat to hell from work, every day at 5. She took the blows to her own body and the pain that comes with them in order to support a child.

And now here she is writing articles that unabashedly condemn princess idiots. Where it concerns support for men, let's just look at the difference between her and Andrea.

Andrea gives blowjobs and housework to one man for letting her avoid the burdens of being a provider. That is what she calls a fair deal for him.

Izzey writes, gives money (real money), software, even a fine printer to AVfM to support the cause, and in exchange for that she wants…

Exactly nothing.

Which one of these women do you think is an advocate for men?

Which one would you prefer?

The bottom line here is simple. I don't support any movement to abolish personal freedom. That means that anyone should be free to pursue any type of relationship they want. It is even written into the mission and values here that AVfM opposes any interference in the relationships or the commercialization of sex between consenting adults.

But where it concerns activism, men's best interest and the voice that emanates from this forum, it is my not so humble opinion that any woman who likes "real" men who spend their days carrying a load she doesn't feel obligated to share is no friend to the men and boys in this culture who now find themselves in such desperate trouble.

This kind of woman is not only an opportunist in an age where such opportunism is outmoded, she will also train any children she has to have the same entitlements, or burdens, depending on whether they are female or male.

Her sons will live on their knees, and her daughters will pay for that privilege – on theirs.

Thanks, but I'll pass.

Are you waging a war on men?

A casual skimming of headlines provides a clear and horrifying picture.

A Father, shot by his child's mother is barred by the court from seeing his son. The mother, who shot the boy's father and grandmother is allowed continued access[1].

Are you already constructing an excuse for her in your mind?

An Australian woman burns her husband to death and walks free[2]. The judge cites their past abusive relationship as excuse.

The dictum of eye-for-and-eye is the brutal, retributive system of law exhorted in the old testament, I am continuously startled when modern courts call on the sadistic edicts of the god of the desert. But is that what the Australian court is doing deliberately? Or are we witnessing a legal system adrift of its moorings, and blown in whatever whimsical direction will placate the public's indulgence of victim-feminism's endless screeching for male blood?

In Canada, a woman who woke her sleeping husband by stabbing him to death walked free after her defence lawyer pointed out during the trial that "Of course she had other options" but that she was drunk at the time[3].

She was also female, so a violent history between The killer killer and her murdered husband was used to excuse making a choice to stab him to death.

Go ahead and read that again. Her lawyer admitted during the trial that she had options besides murder, and she still walked free.

Ligia Filler[4] is the violently insane ex wife of Vladek Filler, this man the latest political sacrifice on the mountain of corpses that corrupt Assistant District Attorney Mary Kellet is building her career on. Ligia, when picked up in the street by Maine Police, screeching, semi-nude, and unhinged threatened the attending officers with murder and dismemberment, then cackled while promising the murder of her estranged husband Vladek.

A man exhibiting this behaviour would have been shot. The Assistant D.A. Kellet suppressed the recording along with other evidence of Mr. Filler's innocence. In fact, Kellet pursued the fraudulent case of rape against Mr Filler with such enthusiasm and disregard for the law that his conviction, obtained without physical evidence, was thrown out for prosecutorial misconduct. Having learned just how much lying is over the top, Kellet has dialled her witch-hunt down just enough to not be thrown out on the second try, and is dragging the innocent Vladek Filler through the brutalizing process again.

Nobody seems to mind except for a tiny handful of foolish and idealistic individuals who think the Constitution, the Bill Of Rights, and Rule of Law still means something in a post Bush America.

Maybe you too think the rule of law has some meaning – if so, sign the petition to investigate and disbar Mary Kellett

Against the backdrop of exemption from any female legal accountability, an American comedian was recently sentenced to 60 days in jail for producing a satirical video – edited to simulate his recitation of a sexually explicit song to a classroom of small children[5]. Note, that this man did not actually sing sexually explicit lyrics to children, his comedy video was edited to simulate that effect. He's now serving jail time for his "crime" and is a registered sex offender. Taken to a logical conclusion, every actor who's ever portrayed a violent crime should immediately stand trial and go to jail. Unless the actors are women, of course.

So-called "Men's Rights Activists" write articles and letters – and circulate petitions in pursuit of human rights, all while clinging to an ethic on nonviolence. What a bunch of fools. The war against men is rapidly becoming a shooting war, the bodies are piling up, and the courts collude in the violence.

Men are jailed for producing off-colour comedy, and women are excused for murder. This is where we sit right now. Western law is transforming under the pressure of feminist lobbying into an instrument of apartheid.

Metropolitan police departments are now publicly encouraging mob violence against men not indicted, or convicted, but merely accused of rape.[6][7] Victim advocates reading the preceding statement will shriek that women don't lie about rape.

This is a common dogma of the religion of female victimhood, and it's so dishonest and absurd that anyone regurgitating it should be understood and identified as an advocate of jailing men and destroying families on false changes. False rape accusation is a for-profit blood-sport it's apologists need to be publicly named for the tyrants and fascists they really are.

When western civil society wakes up to the fact that half the population are subject to systems of law which criminalize males by biological identity, but do not protect them from violence and murder, a new, brutal public ethic will emerge, in which the demographic now pedestalized and protected from accountability will become the target of widespread violence.

The stupid, shrill, and ideologically driven feminist Kool-Aid drinkers pushing for ever more absurd protections for the biological demographic already legally and socially supreme, are likely to become public targets of retribution.

This must be stated clearly, because critics of my argument will seize on a prediction of violence and characterize that prediction as threat. I regard violence as a bad outcome to be avoided, I abhor its use, and I definitely don't call for it.

But it's coming.

And the only people trying to stop it before we reach a point of improvised public executions, burning legislature buildings and lamp posts decorated with freshly hung corpses are being routinely and falsely accused of violent criminality by the ideologues pushing for this terrible, brutal outcome.

The unintentional comedy here is that if we step back from this, just dial back to a potential moment before civil society looses it's collective shit, we do not find ourselves in a world of female supremacy and male subjugation. What we find before the point of societal tribulation is a nightmare world of universal human subjugation – the Orwellian police state.

[addendum: Women are as violent or more violent than men in relationships]

Was Jesus a Mangina?

April 16, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

I have to confess up front that I am an atheist. But I also want to qualify that by saying I am not the kind of evangelical, nutcase atheist that religiously dedicates his life to condemning anything Christian.

I am living proof that NAAALT.

In fact, I am more than a little impressed by the story of Jesus Christ as told in the Bible, and for whatever it lacks in historical accuracy I find it rich in wisdom, humanity and inspiration.

The Jesus of the Bible was the kind of man I would like to be, but I know I am forever doomed to falling short of that desire.

That being said, one of the constant themes I find in The Gospel and indeed throughout modern religious organizations is a tremendous disconnect between the life and teachings of Jesus and almost everything his followers, then and now, actually do.

One of the more glaring examples of that are the religiously dogmatic men that inhabit the modern church. If these clones are followers of Christ, then the Son of God must have been the biggest mangina that ever lived.

The mentality and beliefs they present to the culture of their congregations reflect the new scriptural paradigm, "For God so loved the world, that he gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever worships Woman should not perish, but have everlasting female approval, and be a real man."

It is true. The church, long vilified and demonized for being the primary source of misogyny and patriarchy, is actually quite the opposite. It is little more than a coercive training ground for the indentured servants to the Divine Vagina.

Above almost all other social entities, religious men rank at the very top in the dogma of mindless male servitude. And while there may well have been a time when the adherence to this position was practical, even laudable, the time for it has passed. Someone should pass that message around in the church and dole out some common sense at the same time.

Let's look, for example, at a nifty little website called Top-Christians.com.

On their "good husbands" page, they gift us with all the standard advice; protect your wife; be prepared to die for her. But ah, in the modern, enlightened church, there is so much more to learn. Top Christians also advises men to "submit" to their wives. Yes, submit. It is right out of scripture, they assure us. But of course it doesn't stop there.

At Top Christians, the modern version of Our Lady of the Unrelenting Vagina, we have even more advice, bellowed from the pulpit of Dr. Phil.

The following is the complete text from their "Spend Time Together," section. Res ipsa loquitur fully applies:

When you spend time with your wife, don't talk about work!

Or golf.

Or cars.

Or any other thing that interests you.

If you really want to put your wife first, then you have to talk about the things that interest her*!*

What's that? You don't know what her interests are?

Ah, exactly my point!!

You have been so self-centred that you don't even know what your wife is interested in. Shame on you!!

If that is true of you, then now is the time to start changing it.

And don't get all upset if she doubts your intentions. Or if she suspects that you have been guilty of something (like sleeping with her best friend).

If you suddenly start acting differently – especially if such actions are so "unlike" you – she is likely to get suspicious.

Start by telling her that you want to change and that you want to start putting her first.

Ask her what would make her happy, "because I want to start doing those things".

After the initial shock (and even doubt) she will be delighted when she discovers that you are really serious.

She'll see that you really want to be a good husband to her, and she'll love you for it.

Just keep at it. Get out of that comfort zone of yours, and start living a life of fulfilment with the wife that God has given you.

I guarantee you it will be a terrific journey!

Just FYI, the bold print is theirs. I didn't even correct their typos.

It seems whoever penned this looked at the image of Christ on the cross and saw not the Son of God, but the Son of Oprah, and then obediently delivered a satanic dose of shame to any man foolish enough to listen.

Is this an isolated point of view in western churches?

Hardly.

Churches have followed the same exact path of governments, institutions of higher education and the media over the past 50 years. In other words, they have become watered down, feminized incarnations of their former selves. In doing so, they have sent one resounding message about their views on the life and death of Jesus Christ.

They don't give a shit about it and likely never did.

Whatever Christ means to these self-loathing, feminist quislings doesn't have the substance of a research paper on the wage gap funded by N.O.W… Their faith was sold out to pop psychology, pop culture and feminist fundamentalism a long time ago.

You may be asking at this point, what does any of this really have to do with the biblical Jesus?

And it is a fair question; the answer to which is nothing.

The Jesus I read about in the Holy Bible would not have put up with this shit for a minute. When the money lenders took over and defiled His temple, the Jesus I read about put a boot in their sorry asses and sent them running into the street for their lives.

The Jesus I read about defied every powerful, corrupt hypocrite in His world to speak the truth.

The Jesus I read about died for it without backing down.

But that was just the Jesus of The Bible. He never really has been the Jesus that most Christians believe in. Hell, He even spent the last three years of his life telling His own apostles that they didn't understand a word He was saying. And true to form, Christians have been emulating them, not Him, ever since.

If that is not true, someone please tell me of any Christian organization in this country, or across the western world, that is even making a peep about men being robbed of authority in their own lives, much less the authority in their families.

Please point to one church that is standing up and telling their congregations that this claptrap emanating from Top Christians and a thousand other places like it is a load of garbage.

Just one will do.

I am waiting.

And so, perhaps, is Jesus Christ.

Whether He was a real man and The son of God, or just a magnificent and instructive metaphor for the pinnacle of human actualization, He was not a mangina.

Leo Strauss and Neo-Conservatism

April 17, 2011 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

The scene:? A police car drives down a busy main street during the early Monday morning rush. The officer driving deliberately maintains a speed 10 mph below the posted speed limit. He knows nobody will pass him, and indeed, nobody does.

The drivers who would otherwise press 10 to 15 mph faster than the posted speed limit are constrained by their fear of the police officer's power of authority. The man wearing his police uniform, driving his police car and exerting his power to slow the drivers around him takes his authority from the consensus of those other drivers. Everybody seeing the uniform, the badge, the police cruiser buys into the idea that this man is a figure of authority, and with this consensus, the illusion is made real. ??Later, this police officer will park his police cruiser, change into his civilian clothes and drive his own car to wherever he lives. There, he will eat his dinner just like each of his neighbors. He will take off his shoes just like each of his neighbors.

He will take off his clothes, and climb, naked into his shower, just like each of his neighbors. His body will metabolize the food he ate, and in the morning he brush his teeth, depilate, and defecate just like each of the other human beings living in the houses adjacent to his. ??When the city this man lives in raises his property taxes by $ 1000 per year, he will pay, just like each of his neighbours. Like them, he has subscribed to the consensus in which everybody agrees that "the city" has the authority and power to exact tribute from each person living under the city's "authority".

How is it that anyone, or any group of people in civil society have "power" to regulate, restrict the actions of, or to extract a portion of the income of other members of that civil society? It would be easy to imagine this is through force, the threat of penalty or violence or arrest. The real reason is that "authority" exists only by consensus.

During a theatrical magic performance, members of the audience don't really believe the magician's assistant is in actual danger of being sawn in half. They understand that the woman being cut in half is an illusion. So with this understanding, does the magician's audience resent their deception by the magician? Of course not, a member of magician's audience participates in their own deception by willfully suspending their disbelief. ??An unspoken consensus between the performer and the audience is established in which everybody present agrees that the magician "really can" cut his assistant in half.

The audience, through mutual consensus confers the illusion of power and authority on the magician. ??Aside from the willing consensus of the magician's audience, he employs a continuous routine of misdirection, disinformation and manipulation on his audience. ??Like the magician's atmosphere, proselytism and disinformation form a major component of the engineered consensus which maintains an accepted status quo in civil society.

At no point does a competent magician stop in the middle of his routine and break the illusion of his “power”. The magician’s intimation of his own authority and power must be maintained throughout the performance without letup. The performer who breaks the audience’s perception of that power will not be popular.

For the same reason, the “information” fed to the public must be continuous, to prop up the accepted public consensus of political and social reality. Just as a magician cannot break character midway through his act and keep his audience, political and social mythology which civil society accepts as “real” relies on the non-interrupted program of public narrative.
Myth: International finance is mysterious, complicated, and difficult to understand.

Almost every single television “news” station runs across the bottom of your TV screen a constant scrolling ticker filled with cryptic, complicated and intimidating financial market indexes and statistics during their “news” broadcast. Clearly, the information conveyed by these scrolling tickers is important, urgent, and deeply complicated.

These stations also bring in “experts” to “explain” the vagaries of the economic scene to us, the poor benighted viewers. These financial experts will intimidate us with a somewhat comprehensible description. The implication is of the viewer’s lack of background understanding of the complex and important fundamentals. ??This is all misdirection and bullshit.??Reality: International finance works like this:

The Central Bank (Federal Reserve) creates imaginary money by typing a large number into a computer.

The Central Bank (Federal Reserve) loans that imaginary money, at interest to your government, and to your banks.

Your government spends the money, and makes it into “real” money by forcing you to pay it back through taxation on your labor.

Your bank helps in the game of shifting that debt onto you by loaning some to you and increasing the interest rate of your repayment.

Everything else in finance is slight-of-hand to distract you.

Myth: A collection of disenfranchised fanatical Moslems are a credible threat to the largest military superpower in the world.

Reality: Politicians and news readers selling this story are counting on the audience never examining this absurd premise, and counting on members of the public to swallow whole the “boogeyman” of terrorism.

Myth: There is a difference between the Democratic and Republican parties.

Myth: You as an individual lack real power in civil society.

Myth: You as an individual are incapable of understanding the real world without the parental guidance of government or external authority.

There are a lot more of these subtle falsehoods, but listing and individually debunking them all is not the point of this article. Some of these lies are thousands of years old.

The lie of personal powerlessness is a re-framing of the biblical admonition to surrender control of your life to the self-appointed intermediaries to “god”; the church.

The myth of your personal inability to comprehend the big complicated world is a retelling of the biblical edict to surrender your personal accountability to an imaginary supernatural redeemer-figure.

These false “truths” are parts of the droning, hypnotizing message which permeates modern media-saturated western culture. As a mythology which underlies almost all content fed to the public through television and movies, the message is impossible to avoid. Understanding that a droning message permeates all of corporate created media gives one a tool to distinguish manufactured “truth” from observable reality.

The present culture of public deception promoted and maintained through corporate-controlled media is very real, and has it’s recent origin in the neo-conservative philosophy of Leo Strauss.

Strauss was a political philosopher who arrived in the United States in 1938. Strauss taught at several major universities, including University of Chicago. Among Strauss’s students were the architects of the neo-conservatism which has dominated and defined the agenda of the democratic and the republican parties of the past several decades.

Strauss saw the use of deception in politics as a necessity. While outwardly professing deep respect for American democracy, Strauss believed that societies should be hierarchical; divided between an elite who should lead, and the masses who should follow. Unlike philosophical elitists such as Plato, he was unconcerned with the moral character of these leaders.

“Those who are fit to rule are those who realize there is no morality and that there is only one natural right the right of the superior to rule over the inferior.”

Shadia Drury, Professor of political science at the University of Calgary described this philosophy as one which requires an environment of “perpetual deception” in which the people are indoctrinated to a manufactured mythology, of simplistic character appropriate to their meagre powers of comprehension.

According to Drury, Straussian philosophy requires: “perpetual deception of the citizens by those in power is critical because they need to be led, and they need strong rulers to tell them what’s good for them.”

In Straussian philosophy, the “elite” believe that there is no morality and the only natural right is that of the superior to rule over the inferior”

This philosophy of neo-conservatism also holds that: “While the elite few are capable of absorbing the absence of any moral truth, the masses could not cope. If exposed to the absence of absolute truth, they would quickly fall into nihilism or anarchy”

Strauss also believed that “Because mankind is intrinsically wicked, he has to be governed . Such governance can only be established, however, when men are united and they can only be united against other people.”

A Straussian society then, requires a state of perpetual war.

Senator John McCain (a member of the council of Foreign Relations) was asked a question during a town hall meeting in New Hampshire on January 3 2008

Q: “President Bush has talked about our staying in Iraq for 50 years..”
(McCain cut the questioner off to reply)
A: “Make it a hundred , we’ve been in Japan for 60 years, we’ve been in South Korea for 50 years, it’s fine by me”

It’s easy to dismiss McCain’s callous reply as the ranting of a man who’s gone completely bug-fuck crazy. Easy, until we realize that under a Straussian philosophy, a state of perpetual war is required to keep the dis-informed public under a social control.

Mr. McCain, only 100 years? Surely you can be more ambitious. McCain’s fellow Straussian; William Kristol is a co-founder of the Project the New American Century, but perhaps a longer view can be taken. Possibly even a Reich of a thousand years.

The list of Strauss’s students include:

Paul Wolfowitz
Donald Rumsfeld
William Kristol, founder of the Project for the New American Century
Abram Shulsky, former head of the Pentagon’s Office of Special Plans
Stephen Cambone, former Undersecretary of Defense for Intelligence
Richard Perle, former Defense Policy Board chairman.
Dick Cheney

Once we recognize this twisted philosophy, and that the followers of Strauss are the architects of modern neo-conservatism in both parties, as well as the CRF, the Project for a New American Century, it is easy to see that the apparent incompetence of the Bush administration is something entirely other than incompetence.

To describe Straussian philosophy, in such a way that it can be discussed without lengthy and repetitive explanations to the uninitiated, it requires a name or an adjective. Straussian philosophy is in every respect that matters, a philosophy of evil.

When individuals come to realize what is encompassed by the paradigm of political thought driving neo-conservative policy in America, a sea-change in public perception will occur. This is not just a possibility, the information is available, and people will find it, just as you have found this article.

Sea Change: Noun – a profound transformation.

Farewell, R.D.

April 18, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

R.D., Stacey's father, passed away this afternoon at 92 years old.

I want to take a moment to honor him here.

R.D. was born in Annona, Texas, May 25th, 1918. In 1936, after alcoholism in his family forced him to drop out of college, he came to Houston, alone, hitching a ride on the back of a flatbed truck with $15.00 in his pocket. It was a story he told me a hundred times, and one quite frankly I had learned to sit quietly through and endure, because of my own shortcomings, as he repeated it.

He hit the streets finding whatever work he could and eventually learned the sheet metal trade, which he stayed with for almost 35 years. As time passed he started investing in real estate, mostly rental properties, and continued doing that for yet another 25 years before retiring.

The history of struggles in his family, the Great Depression and decades of hard work put a steely edge on the man and gave him what most people would think was a too enthusiastic penchant for hanging on to a dime.

I witnessed this myself by watching him squeeze them till Roosevelt bled.

His thriftiness was a source of good natured humor in his family. People often remarked that he would drive across town to save a penny on a gallon of gas. They were not exaggerating.

The times we were able to talk him into going out for a meal, we learned not to take him anywhere too nice. Even when we were paying he would talk so much about the expense that we were groaning by the time the check came.

I saw more of this in recent months as he become ill with cancer and the effects of old age – when he became unable to care for himself. Up to that point, even at 92, he was independent and hostile to the idea of anyone assuming control of his decisions. We knew he needed help, but stepping in and forcing it on him wasn't going to happen.

It was still, after all, his life.

Then in December his health took a turn for the worse and we were able to intervene and bring to him the help he needed for his final days.

It still wasn't easy. We had to think of more and more creative lies to tell him about the round the clock nursing care and repairs to his neglected home that were going on.

It was all covered by his insurance, you see, because if he knew any of his money was being used to give him comfort and care in the last days of his life he would have thrown a fit. We even had to coach repairmen and anyone else that came in to collude with us in the lies.

Oh, that new lift chair? Aren't you lucky your insurance paid for that R.D? You were a wise man to get such a good policy.

Yes, R.D., that woman cooking your meals and cleaning your house is free. More benefits of your insurance company. Don't worry, we won't let her leave the lights on. Same for the exterminator and the new hot water heater to replace the one he bought in 1978 that hadn't worked right in a decade or more. All free.

Of course most of the money was coming from his estate, but we were not about to tell him. Turning his last days into a battle was not on the agenda.

We got a good view of his vigorous frugality when we cleared the cabinets to have the place exterminated, something he had not allowed to happen for way too long. There were plates with cracks in them, coffee cups with the handles broken off, spices from the 80's. He would not throw anything away.

The occasional remark would come from one person or another; people who knew that he had done quite well in his business life. Can you believe that old man? All that money and too cheap to buy a new coffee cup.

And if you paid any attention to what he would say, you would think they were right.

$5.00 you say? For a coffee cup? No way I am spending $5.00 on a coffee cup!

But in all this, underneath the surface appearance of an old miser, was a much different story. I had learned that lesson a long time ago when counseling addicts and alcoholics.

If you want to know anything about someone, you throw out everything they say and watch what they do.

And I watched what R.D. actually did.

What he did was stay sober, work like a dog, save money and deprive himself even the smallest pleasures in life, much less the big stuff. He lived in a house that was in disrepair, obsessively turning off lights, even eating only the cheapest food he could find.

And he saved and saved and saved and saved.

Why?

So he could give it to his children. That's why.

I talked with him many times in the last months of his life. I was there at the brief moments his mind was clear; clear enough to see through the bullshit about free exterminators and home repairs. And in those moments R.D. showed me who he was.

He was a man who loved his children, and cared about their future more than he cared about having handles on his coffee cups, or high dollar meals, or the basic comforts of life he had righteously earned.

He took pride in his accomplishments, but he didn’t adorn himself with them.

In the end, the old miser was not an old miser at all. He was another loving father that gave it all away; all for the sheer pleasure of giving it away.

In the end, he proved that is who he was all along, though many, through the filter of personal judgment, could not see it.

He will be sorely missed by those he loved, more than he dared to love himself.

The Never-Ending Emotional Dilemma of “Sex Tourism”

When you’re bored at work and have very little to do, it can sometimes be fun to take an online article, remove nouns, verbs, and adjectives, have someone else give you some other nouns, verbs, and adjectives, and make your own little Mad Lib, complete with underlines. You can also do it simpler by changing “man” to “woman” and “he” to “she.” It’s not nearly as funny that way, though. Well, it’s still kinda funny. Look how innocent it sounds when you do it with an article on prostitution, replete with those wacky British misspellings:

“They interviewed 240 men holidaying in Negril, and two similar resorts in the Dominican Republic. Almost a third said they had engaged in sexual relationships with local women. Though 60 per cent [sic] admitted to certain ‘economic elements’ to their liaisons, they did not perceive their sexual encounters as a prostitute-client transaction. Instead they insisted they were helping the women, and the local economy, by giving them money and gifts. When asked to describe ‘girlfriends’, most emphasised [sic] how for them black Jamaican women possessed bodies of great sexual value. One 42 year-old English man who travelled [sic] at least three times a year to Boca Chica in the Dominican Republic said: ‘I’m not naïve. I’ve been around the block. I come for sex – of course the sun, but mostly the sex. I’m not coming to live and set up house with a girl. I just want some fun and good sex.’”

Well, at least you’re honest, brother. Except, of course, that that was a woman in the original article. It’s all about women paying for sex, not men. Thus, it’s no longer prostitution, but “sex tourism.” Sheesh.

The article does at least mention that there are economic and even a few emotional considerations on the part of these beautiful, poor, black, rent boys. It even briefly mentions colonialism as if it’s a thing of the past that we may not quite have atoned for (those of us who are white, who had nothing to do with it). Perhaps a narrower definition of colonialism can be considered a thing of the past, but the article does mention the following:

“All the hotels, restaurants, cars and glass-bottomed boats in Negril are owned by Americans. The urban economy doesn’t even belong to the local people.” (That’s not a Mad Lib, but that is my emphasis.)

It’s far easier to turn oneself into a rent boy when the economy on which you depend to fill your stomach is largely controlled by the corporations for which your “clients” work. But let’s not talk about that, since it’s less interesting than sex. Furthermore, since we’re talking about women’s sexuality, we can talk about it in nice terms instead of the horrid vernacular reserved for men’s sexuality. This’ll be fun!

Here’s a slut woman who essentially tells it like it is for the majority of her sisters:

“When it came to leaving, I surprised myself by feeling quite gutted. I’d wanted to do sex without feelings, just like the men, but there was a definite trembling of the lips – for both of us.”

Well, honey, just for the record, “the men” don’t screw without feelings. Perhaps a man is only paying for 15 minutes, but it’s 15 minutes of intense feelings. That’s why he’s willing to pay, even when it’s illegal. Maybe he’s lying to himself about something while he’s banging. Maybe he’s hiding more than a few feelings. I can’t read his mind, so I don’t know for sure. Beyond that, your approach to sex is bound to be different for two reasons:

1. You’re a woman, not a man.
2. You’re an individual woman at that.

Your approach to sex ought to be uniquely your own, and it is destined to be feminine, not masculine. You tried out something new, and part of you liked it, since you mentioned later on in your tale that you would gladly do it again if you didn’t have a boyfriend. (By the way, why was that only mentioned in passing? What’s going on in your head, babe?) Therefore, what you feel about your sexuality is, I can guarantee, entirely different from the expression of sexuality by the sorts of religiously conservative women I knew growing up. I can also guarantee you, darling, that those religiously conservative women expressed sexuality, in general, in a different way from the men.

I neither condemn nor apologize for any alternatives to traditional sexual expression. My chief concern when it looks like an individual’s sexuality is about to take a seriously different turn is merely to ask whether children have already been created, and whether divorce may result. If so, then whatever the motives, I would advise a great deal more introspection before pursuing any newfound desires.

However, it has been my experience that men’s approach to sexuality, when it is separated from traditional concerns that grow fainter by the decade in Western culture, is far more likely to display a lack of commitment and a certain separation from deeper emotions (but certainly not all emotions). This may or may not serve men well, but once an artifical standard like “virginity until marriage” is abandoned, what replaces it is going to differ from man to man, sometimes quite a bit.

I remember a time in my twenties when I was trying to turn straight. One of the things our therapists told us homos to do was learn to play sports. This would ostensibly lead to more bonding time with “healthy” straight guys. I had a roommate who taught me how to make freethrows, and I was down at the basketball court practicing. I quickly discerned a few very interesting things:

The other guys didn’t seem to know each other. If they did, there would have been a great deal more banter. Different hoops around the court were taken by different groups of men. Individual guys stood on the sidelines waiting for someone to “tap out.” Another guy, with hardly a word, jumped in on my hoop to do his own freethrows. Men came and went without introducing themselves. It was mostly silent. It was very strange and wonderful. It probably seems unremarkable to readers who play regularly.

What's remarkable is that I can tell you, and I refuse to get into any detail or provide any excuses for the way I've chosen to live my life, that the rules are essentially the same with the more open, even anonymous sex play in which men, far more than women, may wish to participate. Just please remember that if a man, or a woman for that matter, wishes to jump into something most people would consider extreme, he or she should understand that the consequences, in this day and age, are entirely his or hers (and we ain't talking about matching towels anymore, are we?). No blaming The Patriarchy, sweetie.

Now, these are generalities, which ought not to be mistaken for prejudicial or chauvinistic rhetoric. There is tremendous crossover, because each of us is an individual. I've known more than one religiously conservative man who has only ever had one sex partner, and who gets up from the couch and leaves the room when something "salacious" pops up (no pun intended) on the TV screen. Granted, in my opinion, these men are simply fighting "temptation," the visceral desire to explode out of one's penis, but in this regard they can always count on this more libertine man's full support. You are what you eat, and reap what you sow. In short, my dear, it's your sexuality, not mine. But you did say you were in a relationship at the time that you got boned by a big black stud. Why did you do that?

Can I show you how I see it? You are younger than I, and things in our culture were quickly turning sour when I was growing up. They are doubly worse now.

You are more than likely to have parents who divorced when you were young. This taught you that love can die, and that people in whom you want to trust deeply are not nearly as reliable as you had been counting on. Perhaps this lesson was unavoidable, but is it possible that there are lies you taught yourself at the same time, lies to which you tenaciously hold?

You were sent to a government prison called a "school" where you were indoctrinated in how to think and act like everyone else so you'd be less frightening to the "progressives" who care about all the unwashed. The same government that educated you made and continues to make one false promise on top of another. When this government keeps its promises (which is seldom), it normally does so in such a haphazard way as to close off, in your mind, the thought of ever doing any number of activities for yourself, because there's a government program set up for that, don't you know?

You were exposed via television to the rottenness of the culture in which you were raised, which has increasingly focused on slights and mistakes less common to humanity and society, sensationalizing and romanticizing aberrant human behavior (especially male behavior) completely out of context and perspective. You were made to believe that women can be violent with men and it's funny; not so in the reverse. You were sold a great many products and services through this poisonous instrument, 99% of which you never needed.

You spend your time reading romance novels filled with lurid descriptions of the sex act, and because this literature is female-centered, you were told it isn't pornographic. The men in these novels are always perfectly sculpted with big, huge penises, and totally into the heroines, who are also perfectly sculpted. The sexual technique of these white knights is amazingly virtuosic. The orgasms that the heroines have are always complete, and deliver to these women's minds the comfort and solace that real women once found in Jesus, something that orgasms really aren't designed to do. In short, my lovely little woman, you've probably been had. But that's your mind, and I can't read it.

Since you can't read mine either, I'll let you in on a little secret: I've been had, too. You either recognize the lies and start dealing with them as an adult, accept your chosen path as the path that's been chosen, and watch what happens on that path, for better or for worse; or, if you're sick of it, you can turn around, walk back, and start over in a different direction. This is called "self-regulation." So the next time you feel like black cock, perhaps you'll ask yourself, before boarding the plane, what's missing in the relationship you're temporarily leaving (and probably hiding your intentions from). You should also give yourself a gentle reminder not to fall in love with a poor black man who really just wants your money. Enjoy your trip.

You see how much more pleasant it is to talk about prostitution from a woman's perspective? You get to explore the "client's" motives and emotions, rather than endlessly discuss which punishments and government programs will shrink enough dicks. So let's put the Mad Libs and fun-with-pronouns away for a bit, and look at the dirty, disgusting sort of sex payments (the male-centered kind). Another quote from the Independent, just not from the emotionally-laden article about women who "sort of" exploit men:

"Feminist opponents of prostitution see paying for sex as an expression of male aggression."

I can't tell you how many times I have suffered agression at the hands of another man, barking at me to get off his goddamn property while slipping me a fifty. Everything a man does, even paying a volitional actor in a voluntary, brief-but-intense exchange, is aggressive unless a misandric feminist says otherwise.

It's not prostitution; it's "male agression." (Except when a woman does it. Then it's "sex tourism.") It's not whistling; it's "street harassment" (with a hat tip to Denis). It's not delivering a baby; it's "birthrape." It's not regret the morning after; it's "date rape." It's not naïvete; it's a larger, heavier, hairier, muscular, lower-voiced, handsome, attentive, smiling, employed, moneyed, generous, flirtatious, teasing, sexually aroused beast who has some sort of evil, mesmerizing presence. And a fifty.

Just take a look at that picture again. Look at the position that young lady has placed herself in. Look at what she's wearing. Now hear what the picture says to the male reader. Explain how "male aggression," which is so easily aroused at the idea of sex-for-money-and-no-commitment, is supposed to be kept in check when a picture like that is displayed. Is the picture meant to encourage more of this "aggression" so that more men will get in trouble with the law? Is there a possibility that some women (or even a lot) are secretly turned on by thoughts of rape, as long as it doesn't really happen, and that talking about "male aggression" while simultaneously encouraging it gives some of these feminists and misandrists a little, um… "Jesus" moment?

I think it does, or at least it can, for some. Therefore, I don't think it's something that needs to be encouraged. So the next time I read an article in "The Independent" on women paying for sex, I expect to see something a little more hard-hitting, like:

"Nine jailed after BOY forced into prostitution

"Nine women have been jailed after a 14-year-old boy was preyed upon and forced into prostitution…"

"MASCULINIST opponents of prostitution see paying for sex as an expression of female aggression…"

"Sex & the citizens: New prostitution laws explained

"…The aim is to target women that use prostitutes who have been trafficked or who are being forced into prostitution by madams or drug dealers…" (Excellent. Never go to the source when you can blame a woman!)

"'50,000 Iraqi refugees' forced into prostitution

"Men and boys, many alarmingly young, who fled the chaos at home are being further betrayed after reaching 'safety' in Syria…"

That is, unless you are willing to let men explore their "lesser" feelings about sex: sex-for-money, sex-for-fun, dating, commitment-free sex, married sex, celibacy, anonymous sex, gay sex, safe sex, safer sex, chastity, abstinence, monogamy, polygamy, bigamy, polyandry, polyamory, orgies, romance, adultery, masturbation, pornography, puppy love, etc. If so, then the hard-hitting stuff (that only hits men) needs to go. If not, then it would be nice if one of you misandrists or feminists would at least admit that, obviously, men and women are not equal, and that therefore we should stop legislating as if they are.

Or we could always just do another Mad Lib:

"An attractive bagpipe sips a cocktail under a fern shade. The sand is dazzlingly smelly, the sea olive drab. A handsome young rock formation approaches her and showers her with oven mitts: she is the most flustered woman he has ever seen, he says. For the first time in six minutes, she truly believes she is goofy."

I'll agreeda that. She's goofy as hell, mon. But da bimbo does have a fifty…

CORRECTION: I apologize to the young woman who solicited a male prostitute who also wrote that she was in a relationship. She did not specify whether she was in the relationship when she had sex in the tropics. I misread the following sentence: "I'm in a relationship at the moment but if I was single again I'd definitely go on that kind of holiday." Her head is on a little tighter than I thought.

Gaining Momentum, The Men's Rights Movement Meets Increasing Opposition

April 22, 2011 | by Robert O'Hara | Link | Original Link

In the past several years the Men's Rights Movement has been gaining a greater presence, not only on the web but in legislatures and courts around the world. Finally, members of the British Parliament are openly criticizing feminists and feminism, calling them out as hate mongers. Groups such as Fathers and Families, The National Coalition for Men and S.A.V.E. are gaining ground on Capitol Hill and legislatures across the U.S., gaining traction and claiming victories in the areas of family law reform, domestic violence law reform and other issues concerning what has now become broadly identified as the war on fathers, men and boys in our society.

Additionally, sites like Antimisandry and other online forums that invite people to discuss, openly, issues that affect men are seeing increasing membership. A Voice for Men, The Spearhead and similar sites are all experiencing increased traffic and readership.

Despite what we may hear from our detractors from outside of the MRM, and our more pessimistic members within, we are gaining ground in a tangible and conspicuous way.

Perhaps the most concrete proof of this is the recent emergence of the Good Men Project, or what is more colloquially (and appropriately) known by MRAs as "The Good Mangina Project." Their purpose is the "daunting task of introducing, unlocking and dismantling the so-called Men's Rights Movement" as stated by Ms. Magazine, the same people that gave us the hateful idea that one in four women will be raped in their lifetime. Funny how a group of people describing us as a "so called" movement would describe our dismantlement as "daunting."

And they are not the only ones getting in on the game.

Huffington Post Columnist Tom Matlack wrote an article titled "Why We Don't Need a 'Men's Movement' to Be Good Men" in which he writes:

"In many ways, the Good Men Project was born not out of the men's movement, or the Men's Rights movement, masculism, anti-misandry or MGTOW (men going their own way), but out of the brutal facts of our own lives as fathers, husbands and guys trying to make a living. In fact, I had never even heard of any of these philosophies until I started writing about my own life and publishing the stories of other men. In the process, I somehow got myself in the middle of a political issue that to me completely misses the fundamental challenge for men in 2011. There are plenty of ways the law (particularly family law) and popular culture, as represented by the media, have limited men. But we have no one to blame but ourselves. We made the laws. We control the media. We have, in the end, suffered too long in silence. Too many of us have knuckled under and become absentee fathers.

Mothers have more rights than fathers, more women are going to college and Oprah rules the gender discourse. So what? Do we allow ourselves to be emasculated by feminism, by divorce law, by women, who, God forbid, want to break the glass ceiling once and for all? Or do we embrace their successes while developing our own powerful voice for good in the world, most particularly when it comes to be being fathers and husbands? To me, having guys beat drums or set up some grand zero-sum gender war ignores the opportunity — an opportunity that's right in front of our faces — that we might figure out a way to get out of the cave of our own suffering."

Tom Matlack is trying to convince his already convinced readers that the Good Men Project didn't come from the Men's Rights Movement. When Ms. Magazine itself stated that they had the task of dismantling it?

These guys need to compare notes.

By blaming men for the problems that feminism has caused; accusing people who champion shared parenting laws, parity in reproductive rights, a return to due process and the presumption of innocence of setting up a "zero sum gender war," they conclude we can "get out of the cave of our own suffering."

Please.

It doesn't stop there. Scott Adams, creator of Dilbert and author of an interesting political blog posted recently about the Men's Rights Movement in which he commented:

"Now I would like to speak directly to my male readers who feel unjustly treated by the widespread suppression of men's rights:

Get over it, you bunch of pussies."

Now that doesn't sound like a very good MRA to me. He went on to state:

"The reality is that women are treated differently by society for exactly the same reason that children and the mentally handicapped are treated differently. It's just easier this way for everyone. You don't argue with a four-year old about why he shouldn't eat candy for dinner. You don't punch a mentally handicapped guy even if he punches you first. And you don't argue when a women tells you she's only making 80 cents to your dollar. It's the path of least resistance. You save your energy for more important battles.

How many times do we men suppress our natural instincts for sex and aggression just to get something better in the long run? It's called a strategy. Sometimes you sacrifice a pawn to nail the queen. If you're still crying about your pawn when you're having your way with the queen, there's something wrong with you and it isn't men's rights. "

Now that definitely does not sound like an MRA. The whole movement is geared towards treating women as the adults they are and not children, right? Yet amazingly, simply because he compared women to children and mentally handicapped people, he was called an MRA by feminists around the blogosphere. In fact, because of this comparison to children and mentally challenged people he deleted his post and put this in it's place: "I deleted today's post. My regular readers have the capacity to deal with this sort of topic but it gained a bit too much attention from outside my normal reading circle. Knowledge is a dangerous thing."

Actually, Mr. Adams, with all due respect as a Dilbert fan, sticking your nose into gender politics is a dangerous thing when you don't know what you are talking about.

One of the many publications that featured the idea that Scott Adams was an MRA and that it may be proof that the MRA is growing was none other then our lovely friends over at Slate, who employed reporter, Peter Finocchiaro, to cover the Scott Adams fiasco. Finocchiaro wrote an article titled "Is the men's rights movement growing?" featuring an interview with Michael Kimmel, a self proclaimed expert on the Men's Rights Movement. Kimmel, a sociologist at Stony Brook University and author of such books as "Against the Tide: Pro-Feminist Men in the United States , 1776-1990" and "Manhood in America : A Cultural History" (oh joy!) seems to have a misguided view of the men's rights movement if not a completely misinformed one. He goes on to state in the interview:

"Fathering is not just an existential state of being. It's things people do. When you do it — when you're a really good father — you'll retain connection with your children.

Here's an interesting factoid for you: After divorce, virtually no mothers who do not retain custody — none of them actually lose contact with their children. But about half of all non-custodial fathers lose contact with their children. It's not because the mothers are keeping them away, but because they just drift off. Mothers don't do that. I'd love to hear a zero number for fathers who don't drift off, not because they're prevented, but because they just don't. "

Ah yes , Dr. Kimmel, and what is motherhood? An existential state of being or something that you have to prove yourself to be in our society? I have a feeling society treats it as the former. And we are to believe that fathers loose contact with their children simply because they don't care? Did you ever consider that non custodial fathers must pay child support or go to jail so they have to go to more fertile job markets in order to avoid imprisonment, often separating them from their children? Did you ever consider that mothers can relocate to far away places with the children and there is nothing the father can do about it as the visitation rights of fathers are rarely enforced? Did you ever consider that there are actually vindictive, personality disordered mothers out there that alienate their children from their fathers?

Oh that's right, parental alienation doesn't exist. I forgot. Sorry, Dr. Kimmel, you're the expert after all.

When asked whether or not he thought the men's rights movement was gaining ground he said "No, I don't, first of all because I don't see women in any way buying this stuff. You know, women aren't suddenly going to say, 'Oh, you're right!'." When I read this I had a vision of Dr. Kimmel,tied up naked in a prone position with a gag ball in his mouth, being whipped in turn on his behind by Erin Pizzy, Uma Challa, Sue Price and Christina Hoff Summers with a riding crop and all the while Kimmel enjoying it tremendously. I could ad to this cavalcade the army of young women aged 19 to 27 joining the MRM in droves because feminism has destroyed marriage as an institution making it untenable for men to marry; but things would get a little too tawdry.

You will notice that whenever the Men's Rights Movement is mentioned in any of these news outlets there is never any consultation or interview with a real MRA such as Glenn Sacks, Paul Elam, Harry Crouch, Stephen Baskerville or any of the women mentioned above.

Why?

The truth for both MRA's and the editors of the publications cited above is obvious. If you get just one well spoken MRA in front of a camera or a microphone with an objective reporter reporting for a major news outlet people will hear the real message of the MRM.

You would hear that mothers and fathers should have equal rights to their children and those rights should be enforced; that there is a war that has been raging in our education system for the past thirty years against men and boys; that the criminal justice system is biased in favor of women and not holding them to proper accountability; that it results in murderers, child molesters and false accusers going free; that rape shield laws, mandatory arrest laws and predominant aggressor laws that deny men accused of sexual assault and domestic violence their constitutional rights be repealed so individuals accused have the same protections as those accused of any other crime, thus keeping innocent men out of jail and leaving their lives and families intact; that no fault divorce and alimony be abolished and many other issues for which there is not enough space here to mention.

And you would hear all the objective research that backs all this up.

For a great many people in our society these ideas are very dangerous. Think about all of the academics who make their living off of misandry and research for women's issues in our schools as well as the administrators who rake in millions for women only programs. Think about the mainstream media who's advertisement revenue is heavily dependent on women feeling superior to men in every way. Think about the many thousands of petty bureaucrats, lawyers and judges who make their living exclusively off of family disillusion. Think of what is collectively known as the Sexual Grievance Industry, which demonizes all men and male sexuality for profit. Think of the millions of young women who are just a hairs breath away from realizing, as so many have already, that this blind faith in feminism has screwed them royally and that it needs to be countered.

The entire purpose of the Good Men Project and the commentaries concerning the Men's Rights Movement is to deflect attention away from the MRM and direct it towards our detractors and the decoy that is the Good Men Project. The idea is to sabotage our momentum by calling in so called "experts" who deliberately distort our cause and redirect attention to those who say they speak for men but are, in fact, impostors.

Anyone familiar with military history will note that the use of deflections and decoys are often an act of desperation or a fatal error such as the propaganda of Tokyo Rose and the French Defeat in Indo China when they chose to create a massive decoy base in the remote village of Dien Bien Phu with the intention of drawing the enemy out for a more conventional battle and got their asses handed to them. Could this be one such instance between two social movements? Not an inaccurate analogy I would think considering what has been going on.

So what are we going to do about it?

The same thing we have been doing! Lobbying, writing and speaking out. We must also identify and point out the actions or our opponents for what they are-a rouse. What we have been doing thus far is working and our growing numbers prove it.

The fear on the faces of our enemies proves it as well.

Palin Endorses Female Violence

April 22, 2011 | by Carey Roberts | Link | Original Link

[box type="note" icon="none"]Christopher Halloran / Shutterstock.com[/box]

Across America, teenage girls increasingly are resorting to physical assaults, dating violence, bullying, and sexual violence inflicted upon their fellow classmates.

On April 9, April Kuchta of Valparaiso, Ind. reportedly lured a 17-year-old boy with special needs into her house. The boy was led at knifepoint to the kitchen where he was handcuffed behind his back. Kuchta then sexually assaulted the youth and forced him to make humiliating statements while recording the incident on her cell phone.

The boy allegedly was left in handcuffs for two hours covered with a blanket. Kuchta invited others to her house to witness the confinement.

Then an unknown male reportedly freed the boy. He was recaptured at knifepoint and placed back in handcuffs, only to be freed again and bitten on the arm by Kuchta during a struggle for the knife.

Earlier this week the female was charged as an adult on counts of criminal confinement, intimidation, and sexual battery.

April Kuchta is 16 years old.

A mere five days after the shocking assault, former Alaska governor Sarah Palin journeyed to Madison, Wisc. to deliver the keynote speech at a Tea Party rally. Exhorting Republican leaders to push for hefty budget cuts, the charismatic speaker exclaimed the University of Wisconsin women's hockey team should tell "GOP leaders they need to learn how to fight like a girl!"

When I talk with local high school teachers, they tell me the last thing students need is an exhortation to violence. Schoolyard bouts of fisticuffs are becoming more widespread among girls, teachers say.

These observations are supported by a 2010 Department of Justice report, Delinquency Cases in Juvenile Court, which documents a doubling of female juvenile offenders since 1985. Looking specifically at assaults and other offenses against persons, the female scofflaw rate soared by a sizzling 233%.

Dating violence is another area that cries out for attention.

The U.S. Centers for Disease Control sponsors a national survey of high school students to find out whether they have engaged in dating violence. In 2003, the results were even-steven – girls were just as likely as boys to have "hit, slapped, or physically hurt on purpose" their dating partner.

When the survey was repeated four years later, physical aggression by boys remained the same. But physical aggression by girls surged ahead, making girls 25% more likely than boys to be the instigators:
http://www.cdc.gov/mmwr/preview/mmwrhtml/ss5704a1.htm#tab11

Then there's the problem of bullying, which has become so widespread among girls that the federal government now has a website devoted to the problem. The website reprises common tactics of female bullies, such as hair pulling, biting, pinching, or giving someone the "silent treatment."

The website also states the obvious: "Also, girls sometimes bully boys. Girls may call a boy 'gay' or hit a boy because they know he can't hit them back:" http://www.girlshealth.gov/bullying/

Even in the area of sexual assault, girls have now caught up with members of the opposite sex. According to an article published last year by Bruce Taylor in the Journal of Experimental Criminology, the prevalence of sexual violence perpetration (defined as "pushing, grabbing, shoving, or kicking in the private parts") among 6th and 7th graders in the greater Cleveland, Ohio area is higher among girls than boys.

Alas! Despite these worrisome trends, our society often makes light of female aggression, portraying it as proof of long-awaited female empowerment, and turning it into an atta-girl applause line at a political rally.

Left unchecked, the problem of female lawlessness invariably escalates. Consider the tale of Crystal Mangum of Durham, North Carolina, exotic dancer and drug abuser.

In 2006 Mangum accused three Duke University lacrosse players of sexual assault. Later declaring the players innocent, AG Roy Cooper announced the false-accuser would not be charged with perjury, offering the rather limp explanation that police thought "she may actually believe the many different stories that she has been telling."

Three years later, following a run-in with her then-boyfriend, police arrested Mangum on charges of attempted murder, first-degree arson, assault and battery, damage to property, and resisting an officer. Mangum was later sentenced to a wrist-slap punishment of 88 days behind bars.

On April 3, 2011 Reginald Daye, 46, fell into an argument with his girlfriend over rent money. The man was repeatedly stabbed him in the chest with a kitchen knife. Reggie Daye died 10 days later.

This past Monday, Crystal Mangum was indicted on charges of first-degree murder in the death of Reginald Daye.

Dear Conscious Men

You are no longer men. I don't mean that in the sense that you lack the bulging muscles and caveman qualities so often claimed as cartoonishly masculine by feminists, simply that you are – to all outward appearances – lacking the will, the volition and the cognitive function to be be seriously considered sentient adult human beings.

You are a collection of limp, broken zombies. You are everything feminists have demanded men become, taken to a logical conclusion, and the result is pathetic, unappealing and unintentionally comic. Whether your weak, pathetic self abasement is sincere or affected in pursuit of feminist praise, we – the unreconstructed neanderthals of the world; thank you. Your purpose may be that of a shipwreck, which serves to warn other vessels of dangerous rocks.

As a man, I should clarify that although I find your limp lap-dog version of consciousness repulsive, you are also repellent to women. Radical feminist propaganda to the contrary, women do not tingle for inert, self-abasing mendicants of the kind you appear to be. No matter how motivated to seek approval was your grotesque self loathing and flagellation.

Your deference to feminine emotion – held by you in esteem higher than reason – signals your abdication of adulthood, enlightenment, and sentience. By your craven, crawling, apology for the masculinity of men who came before you, be assured you speak only for yourselves – assuming a hand doesn't occupy your back chute like that of a puppeteer, and the words dribbling from your slack jaw aren't those of your keepers. Your fawning reverence and elevation of mere biological sex to an object of worship degrades not only yourself, but the female human beings you grovel for.

Women, contrary to your mewling and self-serving fawning are, like men, simply humans, and can have no dignity when falsely deified and elevated as if creatures of mythical ether.

You degrade them by your worship, as you degrade yourselves.

In your self abasement, you seek to self-excise all visible trace of masculinity, and you have, along with any worth you might have deserved.

What use are you besides a long, droopy lap dog?

I see clearly, what some might not – and that isn't your prostrate form, your weakness, or your limber back. That much is obvious the the sightless masses of the general population. What I see clearly is your opportunism, your false piety, and the ethic of a carrion eater. Your false reverence has nothing whatsoever to do with respect for women, it's and everything to do with posturing for approval. Look at me, I'm a "good" man, not like those other "bad" men. Your simpering sycophancy stinks of benefit seeking.

The women you mewl after have more to fear from you than the most direct pugilist. And you too have much to fear – because you are lacking any ethic except opportunity, and it is plainly visible – painting a well deserved target directly on your yellow backs.

Musing on Power: A Layman Looks Into Muddy Waters, Dirty Diapers and An Evil Patriarchy

April 23, 2011 | by J Galt | Link | Original Link

There is a joke among aboriginals that suggests the only reason man went to the moon is because they heard we had land up there.

We can know that symbolically the moon is an archetype of the feminine, a light in the darkness. There is a ritual referred to as bringing down the moon that is engaged by men who seek vision. Once the moon rests on soil, the little people enter the sweat lodge like children to whisper insight and unify our distractions to give us direction, purpose and understanding.

Power is a big word that is seen by many in strange ways. I try not to over complicate or politicize it too much. I find that it distorts its meaning and applicability in my life. I'm not a nation, a movement or a concept. I'm an individual; just a guy.

Power is often viewed as an aesthetic occurrence after the fact as being good or bad. It forms in a variety of sizes and distortions that become hard to distinguish in different scales and forms. The dictionary definition of power offered the following descriptions: 1) ability to do, act, or produce. 2) a person or thing having great influence, force, or authority. 3) the ability to control others; authority; sway; influence.

By similarity people collect, share belief and form structural attachment. A predictable by-product of collaborating is the power to influence. Some individuals become devotees of the group message and initiate a binding doctrine of principle, for the purpose of gathering and focusing influence. Once a common doctrine is formed membership can occur by indoctrination and coercion. The devout believe and function as indoctrinators. Followers are offered a simpler set of beliefs called doctrine and become empowered by their ability to influence. It is by membership that the devout develop or harvest power. So I have come to believe that power in a larger form expresses influence.

This to me is the essence of special interest groups that include feminism. They evolve to a stage where they fabricate their own reality, history and dogma. By paying attention to comment threads on a variety of sites, you can determine the difference between devotees and members. Members are the soft underbelly of the group's power to influence. Without members influence dies. Members usually only possess the abbreviated version of the group dogma and will resort to common tactics of deflection and role play for legitimacy. You may recognize that their efforts are to convince themselves more than to convince you.

Typically these are the sorts of people that will enjoy the benefits of influence the group has acquired, but possess no substantive thought or outlook beyond their own privilege. They are corrupt. They are the "membership women."

It may be best not to argue facts but to simply argue their grip on reality, by uncovering the contradictions of their thinking. Devotees are a little trickier, since their dogma and bullshit seems never ending. Engaging these types is giving them a soapbox on which to stand. You're helping them to recruit members. Don't, you're empowering them. Even going back after a couple of days to refute their position will neutralize their presentation and is better than giving them a soapbox.

My interest primarily is in the notion of patriarchal power and how it could be oppressive; particularly in consideration of how it would oppress men to the same degree as it is declared to oppress women. I consider it from different positions to try to understand its nature. The declaration of the oppression of women by a patriarchy is for most, difficult to understand. It is an aesthetic idea that is not consistent from one environment to another. So I looked at how the claim of oppression is answered to get a sense of a context.

We have all seen the implementation of programs and policies designed to remove what is described as barriers to women. Affirmative action, title IX, primary aggressor policies, zero tolerance policies, even rape shield laws are designed to remove barriers for women. It occurred to me that there is also something removed by these policies that affect men specifically: competition. These policies seem to be designed to remove competition. Removing competition is somehow perceived to be the key to removing barriers and limiting oppression. I can only conclude that competition is quite possibly the core feature or engine of a patriarchal power.

These days power and empowerment are huge issues institutionally, legally and personally. Let's not forget the evil patriarchy. I'm curious how it develops and how we legitimize our understanding of it. I see the expression of power in a spectrum defined by repetition and effectiveness. The first expression of power I think occurs in infancy. Infant's lack the ability to do, but they can act and influence with a cry for food or to settle discomfort. Even an infant has power to influence feeding and attention.

In a way that is uncomfortable to think about, an infant must compete to survive discomfort. Silence will not define hunger or a diaper that needs changing or attention required to enhance development. An infant can be made to compete by simply withholding attention. Prolonging an interval of discomfort may cause an infant to cry out louder and more aggressively causing an insecure attachment. Whereas providing constant and consistent attention creates more opportunities to interact, influence and negotiate a secure attachment.

Two terms used in "attachment theory" is "securely attached infants" and "anxiously attached infants". This may be where and when we begin defining common gender traits in our children.

Attachment theory is a worthwhile read since it is an area of early psychology with the largest body of empirical study and reference. It also offers an interesting insight into personal and partner behaviors, since early attachment influences later adult relationships. There are four main categories and additional subcategories with descriptions of behaviors that may better represent the partner you thought you knew.

What struck me regarding this information was the ability to instill gender behaviors with simple and subtle nurturing by the primary care giver. This to me seems to be a profound insight to the nature and nurture argument representing the very core of nurturing attachment. Women themselves may be the first to instill in a child what they refer to as patriarchal power. The subtle response of nurturing in the first year of life, can establish competitiveness in an individual along with very dark expressions of socialization that contribute to violence in general.

Consider the effect of withholding nurturing care from a child consider the effect of reducing it to a minimum. Or consider a reduction to a perfunctory expression of love, not unlike one who is stalking their own benefits and comfort. Would it be any wonder that a child experiencing this may act out to please or simply gain the attention of a parent or nurturing caregiver? Or that a man would engage this pathos in a never ending spiral of adult animation. Could we say that this also may be the source of chivalry in men, the need for acceptance and love that was likely withheld in the formative year of infancy? A psychological burden carried for the duration of life that constitutes a desire to belong and to be loved.

This no doubt is where and when male shame is installed, a control mechanism that does not define original sin but provides the sense of its existence and foreboding. Marshall Mathers figured this out and decried the abuse in his popular rap song "Cleaning Out My Closet," which for those listening closely will hear the words "I'm sorry Mama, I never meant to hurt you". Those are the words that hold his sin, his shame and his repentance for the abuse he received or the absence of loving acceptance. Can we guess that these are the words of a man who experienced an anxious attachment as an infant?

Having been required to cry louder and longer during infancy to compete for attention, then being directed not to cry may introduce an early emotional contradiction. Male children are more often disciplined by segregation that we call a "time out."

Paradoxical stimulation may be the defining difference between healthy competition and pathologically aggressive competition. The fact is, boys do cry as do girls, a crying boy represents an unacceptable display of vulnerability, hardly worthy of competition. It may be less about the plastic guns and more about the plastic touch.

It's a process that every male individual is indoctrinated into from the moment we determine their genitalia, it seems to be primal, instinctive and intuitive – but instinctive to whom? It may be self-serving, even hypergamous for a mother to drive her male child to competitiveness. Would she reduce or withhold nurturing to instill a competitive desire for acceptance. Can a mother instill a desire that would subdue a boy to her and later drive him towards coupling with a mate? Would his desire pit him as one man against all others, a desire to be accepted and loved?

Childhood is where we learn the practical application of competition, to do it, how to do it, when to do it and why to do it. When we compete or choose to compete, we compete alone. The basis of competition the "how too" is usually offered in two flavors good and evil, supporting a dichotomy of measurable effectiveness, and the introduction of the invisible moral umpire, God. This is accompanied by fair and unfair, right and wrong and measurable context. You will be judged.

Negotiating, which is not done alone however, creates a visible moral umpire. Inherent in the exchange, judgments applied to a negotiation become shared, each party becomes equally innocent or equally guilty, but they remain equal by participation. There is no God required, innocence occurs by participation. Women for the most part are Godless and suffer no independent judgments. Hence the social equation, (Competing)Man)=Bad (Negotiating)Woman)=Good.

Patriarchy comes from where?

Hmmmmm……

Are These Zombies Contagious?

The position of advocate for men's rights is one element in my view of the world, but not the only element. I'm also an individualist, a libertarian, and an empiricist. I lack any belief in gods, ghosts, or supernatural spooks, and I have previously argued over religion with literalist and fundamentalist believers in the Abrahamic god. These arguments I have since abandoned, as the conversations all had a circular quality. With respect to the possibly religious sensibility of this article's readers, in some god-believers, adherence to a literal view of religion encompasses a will to sacrifice reason, reality, logic, observable fact and humane ethic. Some humans are made into zombies by their religion or by ideology.

Zombies are understood by most people to be an element of popular fiction, however, they do exist in reality. The BBC nature documentary "Earth" narrated by David Attenbourough describes a fungus which infects ants, altering their behavior to climb to a high branch, then clamp themselves in place before dying. The fungus then grows a fruiting body from the ant's corpse – broadcasting spores to infect other unfortunate ants.

A living creature, modified in it's behavior to self-destructive service of reproductive agenda of the infecting agent. In the ant's case that agent is biological, a parasitic fungus. Anyone arguing that this is not an example of zombification in the real world will be merely splitting hairs over definitions. In nature, parasites modifying their host's behavior to the destruction of the host has hundreds of examples, in the insect world as well as higher animals, including humans.

A collection of examples, easily found by anyone with a web browser have been omitted for brevity.

That zombies exist in the real world should not be a matter of dispute to anyone aware of host behavior modification by parasites. This becomes contentious when change in cognition or behavior is caused by some method other than purely biological. In my prior discussions on a topic abandoned as futile – attempting to defend a secular humanist ethic to followers of a literalist flavor of Christianity – I regularly found an obstinate refusal to regard the simplest and easiest observable reality. This can be simply and honestly called ideologically induced irrationality, and it is common.

For most MRAs this phenomenon will be familiar from attempts at rational debate with adherents to the religion calling itself feminism. That violent and hateful doctrine has in its modern form become a religion – and its followers as divorced from observable reality as the vocal advocates of a 6000 year old Earth. If you happen to adhere to that particular view of geologic time and my comment offends, get over it. Only an imbecile believes in 2011 that the universe is the same age as bristle-cone pines in eastern California.

An ideology is as effective in redirecting the behavior and cognition of its host as a parasite re-purposing an ant into a broadcast broadcast platform for the parasite's spores. An agent which modifies it's host to self sacrifice for the benefit of the infecting agent differs only in detail between biological infection and ideological infection. Zombies of an ideological zombification have been a recent topic of discussion within the MRM. I don't call the shambling corpses of the conscious men project zombies simply to offer insult. These are humans who have internalized feminism's droning, shaming narrative of hatred. Fear of rebuke from a generation of child-women and a bizarre lack of volition have turned these former men into the embodiment of what feminists have demanded men become. The conscious men are not satirists, they are the real thing, these are zombies, and they eat brains.

Unfortunately, dispatch of the infected by the preferred method depicted in popular entertainment wont be possible until and unless these zombies begin actually marauding and tearing up the furniture. The present population of infected pose little danger in spilling tea or intestines on the upholstery, but are most dangerous as carriers. The problem now facing men who oppose their own criminalization by an unstated acclimation of public virtue is how to oppose a passive zombie horde.

The answer to this came to me in the unprompted response from a female friend as I showed her the Dear Woman video.

Thirty-three seconds into the video, she informed me:

"I'm already feeling nauseous."

After one minute forty seconds, she said : "I want to punch every single one of these guys in the face."

This is the un-coached and visceral reaction from a twenty-five year old heterosexual woman I'm pleased to call my friend. The most crushing argument against this brand of emasculated zombie feminism is itself, in the real repulsion these creatures elicit from sane men and women.

As an unreconstructed caveman, to combat the ideological poison producing the flaccid examples of male feminism taken to it's logical limit – I'm pleased to discover that my natural vigor, and continued cheerful belligerence is all the argument necessary. I'll also thank my friend for her cheerful belligerence. By comparison to the masculine atavism of my own ethic along with various knuckle-draggers arguing for men's rights, the realized outcome of feminized men is proving itself a social and evolutionary cul-de-sac. These zombies are a self-solving problem.

I can only hope their gyrations continue long enough for further use as object lesson before they distance themselves from further demonstration.

A Red Pill Message to a Blue Pill World

April 27, 2011 | by Tom Givens | Link | Original Link

I don't expect you to understand all of what I do, and what I stand for, all in one sitting. There's too much to think about, and too many departures from what you've been taught all your life, for things to be that easy. As with nearly everything in life, there's much more to things than it seems on the surface. At this point, all I ask of you is that you keep an open mind, and try to understand things from my perspective.

I am what is called an MRA (Men's Rights Activist). You may have heard a few things about us already, and again, I ask that you hear me out before passing judgment. A lot of people think of us as basically the mirror image of Feminism, only for men. Some people like to say that we are simply a group bent on bringing back the 1950's. Others, that we hate women, and want to oppress them.

Of course, all of these are at best simplistic descriptions, if not outright lies.

Essentially an MRA is someone that is concerned with the state of men due to various laws and social customs. MRAs are trying to change some of those things because we see a lot of pain and injustice. We want a better future, and a saner society, for ourselves and our children.

That's not going to happen if we don't take a much more honest look at things.

For example, did you know that suicide is the second leading cause of death for young men? Teenage boys are 5 times more likely to kill themselves than teenage girls. You might be tempted to put this down to just being male, but in the 1940's, men and women were roughly equal in terms of suicides. The rate for men increased sharply in the early 1970's, and has increased steadily since then.

Then there is Education, where boys graduate much less often than girls. Only 40% of University students are male right now. And like suicide, the numbers are worsening as time goes by. Given the need for a degree to secure a good income, things aren't looking good for a large majority of men.

This brings us to employment, where men have a higher unemployment rate than women. And in the younger age groups, women without children make more than young men. Again, this trend is increasing with time, so in a few years men will on average make substantially less than women.

This topic gets discussed every once in a while… crying over the lack of 'good providers' for women. People are marrying later, in fewer numbers. And women-as-higher-earner couples split up far more often.

This leads us to divorce, which isn't really all that bad if you're female since women get primary residence 4 out of 5 times and benefit from continued financial support from the ex. So in a way, it's like he's still there. Generally, her life won't change much. She'll keep the house, the kids, and the paycheck.

The suicide rate for men after Divorce is 9 times that of women. It's pretty easy to see why. The more difficult thing to see is that in this age of targeted support for 'disadvantaged groups' or those most in need, men as a group are yet to be supported for anything. The "male demographic essentially does not exist. And because 'men' are killing themselves more than the 'designated victim group' known as "women," nothing gets done.

Moreover, no one cares if it does.

Like Education, and Employment, and Family Law, 'men' as a demographic can't specifically be helped, because 'men' are the designated scapegoat for nearly every social program and custom we currently hold dear in our society. Men, and boys, have been dehumanized to allow ruthless exploitation without guilt. How then, can we care about them as a group?

The answer: we don't.

At least the elite don't. And they hold the reins of power. They have the support of the masses too, right now. It's called tyranny of the majority, and it's exactly what things like Constitutions were invented to prevent. Our society has gotten around this by applying a thing called 'doublespeak', coined by George Orwell in his novel 1984, and known today as political correctness – and Voila!, the Constitution becomes "A Living Document," thereby allowing much tampering with.

In 1984, people were disappeared for having dangerous thoughts, and the 'thought police' did brisk business in the darkest hours of the night. In real life, people just get their careers destroyed, or get sent to jail for life on a false rape accusation. It happens with frightening regularity, but this isn't the place for facts and figures. I'm just making some assertions here, inviting you to look into this, and see if I'm full of it, and quietly betting that if you're honest you'll be awfully shocked at what you find.

So, with all this shocking injustice so rampant in our society, how come no one has said or done anything about it? If this is all such a big deal, why the deafening silence and hordes of people leaping into inaction?

Well, that's where you start to get into what I say is the 'masculist' aspect of the Men's Movement. I apologize for throwing in some more terms, but I'm going to do it a few more times.

Basically, the Men's Movement (hereafter MM) is a grouping of several trains of thought. MRAs concern themselves primarily with legal/political issues facing men. Masculists are the other half of the coin feminism is on, in that they study the social forces boys and men face.

Masculists contend our society has been conditioned to view 'men' as 'the enemy'. Everything from Domestic Violence awareness campaigns to Anti-Poverty activism has a distinctly female face. Anti-rape activists have been painting all men as rapists, and teaching women and girls to fear and hate men, for decades. Canada has known DV is equally perpetrated by men and women since the 1970's, but has yet to produce a campaign that says as much. Even Advertising has a distinctly anti-male flavor. Probably because mainstream media like the TV networks have largely given up on men, and tailor nearly all of their shows to a female audience.

Added all together, men have been on the receiving end of what amounts to a massive propaganda hate campaign for the better part of half a century, building upon (and distorting) the natural male inclination to protect the female. Up against that, I think it's amazing we aren't in much worse shape than we are.

That said, if we don't smarten the fuck up real fast, we're in for a world of hurt.

The question still hangs over the whole thing though. How the Hell did we allow things to get this bad? How did it become so acceptable to treat men and boys like disposable robots that exist only to please women, and produce and pay taxes? Who said men have no humanity?

Feminists, that's who.

At the core of all feminism is this insane assertion that women were disadvantaged in the past, oppressed even, by all men everywhere – and on purpose. The idea is that if only women were given free reign they would have matched the great accomplishments of the men of History; that The Patriarchy held women down; that all women are victims; that all men are oppressors, indeed that men derived sexual pleasure from hurting women.

This mode of thinking pervades every single form of feminism, and this mode of thinking is nothing less than the codification of misandry. It is the Official Version, and all the reason one needs to commence with injustices. The only difference between flavors of feminism is the degree to which they hate, and blame, men.

Moreover, the greatest obstacle in the way of needed change is feminist ideology, followed closely by its Siamese Twin – Chivalry. Both modes of thinking require the believer to see themselves as superior to the man in question. Feminists are, at heart, nearly all female supremacists – especially given the reputation of feminism. Chivalrists hope the women they 'protect' notice how well they can provide, and how they can beat down their competition.

Basically, female feminists tend to view themselves as victims deserving of special rights based strictly on their sex (as reparations for someone else's 'suffering'), and Chivalrists view themselves as "real" or "good" men, and thus better mating choices.

Speaking of mating, there's another subgroup in the Manosphere (see there I go dropping more terms – basically the Manosphere can be referred to as 'male social consciousness' as expressed online) known as PUAs (or Pick Up Artists) that center their social analysis around the dating and mating Game.

Remember that wage gap I referred to earlier? I'm sure more than a few of you indignantly thought "I've dated men that make less than me before. Hell, some of my best boyfriends were broke." And I don't doubt for a second that this is true.

Those were the guys that had what is referred to in PUA circles as 'Game'. And all that means, is the guy understands women, what turns them on, and makes them keep wanting more. And as every woman reading this knows, what women say they want, and what they really want, are frequently miles apart.

PUAs teach men what fathers used to teach their sons in many respects, providing men with the tools they need to navigate todays dating world at least somewhat successfully.

The problem is, it's far too easy to lose your job, or even freedom, if the wrong woman crosses your path. Crystal Gayle Magnum accused some Duke University students a while back, and it made the news for over a year. But it happens all the time to men and boys with less money, or notoriety. Only those guys end up being quietly thrown into jail. Often for life.

And no one cares, since all men are really rapists at heart as far as the public is concerned. The legal system is so anti-male that it is now legal precedent that hiring a hitman to kill your husband, or killing him even when other options are available, is defensible with a claim of DV.

The dead guy doesn't get a chance to defend himself, and the killer walks.

And the Chivalrists (otherwise known as White Knights) openly congratulate themselves for making the world safe for female murderers.

This has caused a lot of men to throw up their hands in disgust, vowing to withdraw as far from society as possible. They call themselves Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW), and another way to describe their ethos is they have 'gone John Galt'. They limit their interactions with women to only that which is necessary, refusing to socialize with or befriend women in some cases, simply never putting themselves in a position where they need to trust a woman, or be vulnerable to one.

At the heart of this movement is the desire to limit the risks of interaction as much as possible. While each individual woman encountered might not be the falsely accusin' kind, she might be…and who wants to take that kind of chance?

Many of these men have taken a long hard look at women, sex, relationships, and the whole expected progression (date, marry, have children, retire, die) and found it to be of far higher cost than it's worth. They have said 'no thanks,' and taken up video gaming.

Frankly, when it's so bad that men will ignore women out of self-preservation, you've got impending disaster on your hands.

As to why we do nothing about it? Well, all I can say is this wouldn't be the first time the cultural elite said 'let them eat cake'.

But why would the elite want this? Who came up with the idea for all this stuff, and what was their goal? Was this all accidental?

Well, no actually. There's this thing called Eugenics, which is a philosophy following the Darwinian principle of 'survival of the fittest'. Actually, Darwin was a Eugenicist himself…which really isn't all that surprising. So was Adolf Hitler, and Margaret Sanger, the founder of Planned Parenthood and feminist icon. Eugenic thinking runs throughout feminist dogma.

This should give you a hint as to why those with the power see no problem at all with running the average guy through the wringer. He only exists to give the elite pawns with which to to generate more power.

But what about Feminism? How did feminism become the vehicle for this destructive principle, and was it always so? The answer is yes, it was always so, since female supremacy and social ‘deconstruction’ is at the very heart of feminism. In point of fact, Feminist writers openly stated their plan to ‘deconstruct’ (Orwellian doublespeak for ‘destroy’) society in the 60’s and 70’s. They also openly advocated for Gendercide (some feminist musicians still do), the internment of men for purposes of slavery and breeding, and other means of ‘smashing the Patriarchy’ and installing women in the seats of power.

Think I’m exaggerating? Go back a bit and read the bits about the issues facing men and boys again.

Feminism has succeeded in breaking the institution of marriage, and atomizing the nuclear family, the very basis for society. The Marriage rates in much of what we call the Political West are currently setting records for the lowest in history. And even then, about half of them will end in Divorce.

With marriage and nuclear families becoming so rare (nearly half of all US children are born into single mother households, and in the UK they banned Father’s Day from schools because so many kids hadn’t ever seen one), Big Daddy Government is playing an increasingly important role in family life. And the birth rate is FAR below replacement levels…a Eugenicist’s wet dream.

And the more power Government has, the more power the cultural elite has. It’s really a no brainer; discord sown via feminism increases need for government, which is more than happy to oblige, for a pound of flesh. As a bonus, the economic chaos caused by such an unstable society allows real earnings to free fall, again, only for those not in the elite, who do as well as ever.

It’s a lot to digest, I know. But look into it before you shout crackpot, you’ll see these issues are real.

And the only thing standing up to all this right now, is a bunch of broke guys with an internet connection.

So can you do me a favor?

Wish us luck?

Your Money is Debt

April 27, 2011 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

The word “civics” refers to the education of individuals of the obligations and rights the citizens of civil society, within the laws and traditions of their nation-state. Related education in history, religion and media literacy is often included. In the United States, this is the overt argument for public education, to ensure the US constitution is upheld by the citizens of the United States, privately, and in public life.

Why is monetary theory not a core curriculum in public education? An understanding of what money is, where it comes from and how it works is a necessary foundation for the existence of political self determination. If members of the public lack this understanding (and they do lack it) they cannot make informed decisions about their own government or future.

To understand what I mean in the assertion that people cant possibly chose their own future through a democratic process, without knowing how their currency works, I will attempt to explain money. Most people in North America might believe something like: “I know what money is!”

Most making this claim are wrong.

Let’s start by defining the term “Hard Currency”. This is any system of money that represents real value, or a real amount of some physical commodity. The opposite of this is called a “fiat currency” where units of money have value only because a central authority asserts it to be so.

For the entire history of the United States up till 1971, a US dollar was a token or note representing a real amount of silver or gold. Bank Notes and Dollars were simply receipts for gold or silver. This meant that a bank or central authority could not create money out of thin air, but could only issue paper currency in amounts proportional to gold or silver held in reserve. A citizen holding a paper dollar could at any time, take that dollar to their bank and exchange it for the real gold or silver it represented. Paper is not real money.

After 1971, the reality of gold-backed money in the United States changed. Money was redefined and no longer represented any kind of physical reality. A 100-dollar bill issued prior to 1971 bore the text:

“This certifies that there have been deposited in the treasury of the United States of America One Hundred Dollars in Gold Coin payable to the bearer on demand.”

After 1971, a 100 dollar bill bears the text:

“Federal Reserve Note, One Hundred Dollars”

You may ask yourself: “What does a modern 100 dollar bill represent, if it is not ‘backed’ by any physical commodity?” Perhaps you don’t ask that question, perhaps you simply “believe” that a piece of printed paper is, by itself worth 100 dollars in goods or services.

The Federal Reserve says “this piece of paper is worth 100 dollars” and people believe it.

This system is called fiat money, because the “money” people use, whether its paper bank notes or simply numbers counted in digital transactions is “worth something” only because people believe in it, and not because it represents some amount of a convertible commodity such as gold or silver. There is however, a small problem.

In the United States, all US currency is created out of thin air by an institution called the Federal Reserve. The name is misleading, “Federal” seems to imply that the United States government, or more correctly, the people, through the government, own or control the institution which creates their country’s money. The “Federal” Reserve is a privately owned central bank with the power to print money, and control interest rates. It is unaccountable to the US government, or through that government, the people.

This has some nasty consequences for normal people. The federal reserve does not just create money out of thin air and inject it into the streams of American commerce, it loans newly created money to the banks and government with attached interest. That means that if the government needs another billion dollars to pay for the latest illegal war, the Federal Reserve creates that Billion out of nothing, and loans it to the government. If the Government were to pay that loan back instantly (unrealistic) it would have to pay back not only the Billion, but the interest as well. That additional interest accrued between the loan and its repayment has to be paid in, guess what US dollars, which the government and banks also borrow from the Federal Reserve.

This system creates an even increasing burden of debt on the public. This debt is paid back in part by interest rates on loans, as well as though taxation of the earned private income of citizens. In short, the central bank system of fiat currency creates a system of permanent public indebtedness. By “public” I mean YOU. The money in your wallet is debt, owed to the Federal Reserve. The Fed created that money out of thin air. This seems like a pretty bad system for a country founded on the principals of personal liberty and rugged individualism in the tradition of the Enlightenment of the 18th century. It gets worse. In addition to a system of money with automatically attached debt, the Fed also devalues the money held by individuals and public institutions by continuously increasing the money supply.

The system of fiat currency is a system of public enslavement.

It is the reason why high-school civics is no longer a requirement for high school graduation. The few hereditary banking families which control your nation’s money do not want you to know that you are a slave.

“The refusal of King George III to allow the colonies to operate an honest money system, which freed the ordinary man from the clutches of the money manipulators, was probably the prime cause of the revolution.”

~ Ben Franklin

“I believe that banking institutions are more dangerous than standing armies…
If the American people ever allow private banks to control the issue of currency…
The banks and corporations that will grow up around them will deprive the people of their property until their children wake up homeless on the continent their fathers conquered”

~ Thomas Jefferson

If you want to remain slaves of the bankers and pay for the costs of your own slavery, let them continue to create money and control the nation's credit"

~Sir Josiah Stamp (1889 -1941)

"We are grateful to the Washington Post, the New York Times, Time Magazine and other great publications whose directors have attended our meetings and respected their promises of discretion for almost 40 years. It would have been impossible for us to develop our plan for the world if we had been subjected to the lights of publicity during those years. But, the world is more sophisticated and prepared to march toward a world government. The supranational sovereignty of an intellectual Elite and world bankers is surely preferable to the national auto-determination practiced in past centuries."

~David Rockefeller Council on Foreign Relations

"By having this war on terror, you can never win it, so you can always keep taking people's liberties away. The media can convince people that it is real. By repeating the story over and over, eventually people believe it." "We created the federal reserve in 1913 through lies"

"The ultimate goal is to get everybody in this world chipped with an RFID chip, and have all money be on those chips, and everything on those chips, and if anybody protests what we do or violate what we want, we just turn off their chip"

This is total control and total oversight of every single person on Earth, by a few hereditary banking families.

Next year, see if your complete apathy had as much positive impact as your inaction had this year.

A Letter to Women From The Conscious Men

April 28, 2011 | by gayhendricks | Link | Original Link

Dear Goddess That is Woman,

We write to you today to make amends; to offer you thanks; to praise you in the name of the Divine Feminine.

But first we must apologize for the thousands of years it took for male consciousness to evolve to the point that this letter was even possible. There has been so much pain; so much oppression of women; so much gender slavery, all at the hands of men. It is a miracle that we have finally turned the tide.

Please know that it is us, Gay and Arjuna, who have – through feminized education and indoctrination – reached the upper plateau of male evolution. And it is us, Gay and Arjuna, that have overcome the toxicity of our own masculine energy; our naaasssthy maleness, and developed methods to teach other men, for but a small love offering, to achieve the same refined, invertebrate cognizance required for paying homage to your vagina.

More on that in a bit, but first the apologies that are so long overdue.

While you, of the Divine Feminine, have created and nurtured life, we men have been nothing but destroyers.

We have traveled the seas and landed on ice packs, seeking out baby seals; savagely clubbing them to death so we could force you to wear their skins – for fashion's sake. We have nearly killed off the beautiful sea turtles so that we could outfit you, against your will, with accessories.

We have raised countless millions of mink, ermine and other animals, just to be slaughtered for their coats in the prime of their lives, and then coerced you into wearing them.

We even forced you to trample on each other at sales, like a stampede of water buffalo at the edge of a river.

We have incited wars, many of them fought by child soldiers, to support a blood diamond industry so that we could burden you with shiny little pieces of carbon costing thousands, even tens of thousands of dollars.

We have felled forests, destroying entire ecosystems so that we could trap you in houses, away from the natural world, all while feigning that it was for your protection. Worse yet, we have competed with each other; building ever more extravagant and opulent homes, fitted with larger and larger closets to be filled with endless rows of clothing made from the animals sacrificed, and then saddled you with the burden of shopping for and owning all of it.

How can we ever apologize enough?

We have created a vast and vibrant consumer culture; erecting expansive, unholy malls, and forced you to flock to them with the money we have earned. These are the evil instruments of your subjugation and humiliation.

And then we poured salt in the wounds we inflicted, by blaming you for all of it! Some men, mostly those awful, insufferable MRA's are saying that all of this was the result of a shallow, female-centric culture.

These unfortunates must be deluded.

They claim this modern culture emerged from a sense of female entitlement so egregious that we actually use the expendable lives of men to manufacture trinkets which women like you use to temporarily amuse yourselves.

Can your Goddess brain even believe it?

Those same men (and even some really unfortunate women) claim that while men were building bridges, hospitals, irrigation systems, schools, museums, automobiles, factories, power plants and every other necessity of modern life that women were largely concerned with fashion, status acquired though men, cosmetics and were ever on the lookout for a way to step up into more of the same by dumping one man for another.

They claim that while men were making history, women of recent modern times were on the sidelines, preoccupied with the inanities like celebrity marriages and Sex in the City, obsessed with maximizing their sexual power over men and complaining about how they were not regarded as equals.

They claim that even when handed equality and more under the law that you women, given all the choices in the world, chose the easy way out; that you avoided the hardships and sacrifices that come with earned accomplishment and instead elected to leech off men directly or get the government to do it for you.

Please don't listen to them. They are just mortals and beneath you; you are the Goddesses and they are your lessers.

Everything they say that is uncomfortable for you to hear is a lie. I know, you already knew that, but we feel compelled you let you know that we know it, too.

It is way past time that men like us, good men, rip through all these lies about female self-aggrandizement, narcissism and childishness in order to expose the hidden wisdsom of your Eternal Feminine Soul.

So hidden has been your Divine Nature that we have had to use shovels to get through to it. Yes, we needed big, massive, monstrously huge shovels with diesel motor power attachments and crews of men who didn't speak English.

Even then we had to dig, and dig, and dig, and dig. But then, somewhere deep in the inner chambers of our own imagination, between the intuitive, more or less spontaneous ramblings of women's studies professors – and our own masochistic oedipal fantasies, we found your real essence; that of the Holy Goddess – and we have vowed to lay ourselves prostrate in your presence, and to help other men, by force if necessary, to do the same.

Of course a small gratuity is involved. Not to worry, your very own mortal will most often take care of that for you.

Now Dear Goddesses of Our Dreams, some men, *Un*conscious men, will attempt to distort this message. They will claim that we are simply manipulating you with what they claim is your narcissism and over inflated self-appraisal in order to make money. They will ask, after all, what kind of morally bankrupt human being wants to be regarded as a holy deity?

They are so very wrong.

About everything.

They just don't get it. They don't understand that when all is said and done, you are not, in the strictest sense of the word, human.

You really are Goddesses. Really, really you are. AND WE ARE NOT PLAYING OFF SOME SICK IDEA THAT YOU ARE SO SELF-ABSORBED THAT YOU WILL BELIEVE ANYTHING YOU ARE TOLD, NO MATTER HOW ABSURD, IF IT MAKES YOU FEEL LIKE YOU ARE BETTER THAN OTHERS.

The truth, the Conscious Man's truth, is that it is perfectly normal for a female to seek worship instead of love; reverence instead of respect; adulation instead of admiration.

We, Gay and Arjuna, would never kid you about something like that, especially not for money.

And you can be assured that Gay and Arjuna never have and never will think of you as real human beings. You will always be non-human to us. You always have been.

Remember, you have the word of Conscious Men on that, and Conscious Men (Con Men if you will) never lie to the Sacred Goddess, so you know we are telling the truth.

Please check our upcoming book, "Do Shit for Me: I'm a Motherfucking Goddess."

It's coming out soon.

And remember, recognized deities get a 20% discount.

Tell Me Thy Company, and I'll Tell Thee What Thou Art

April 28, 2011 | by Izzey | Link | Original Link

"Tell me thy company, and I'll tell thee what thou art." Miguel de Cervantes – 1547-1616.

I have been reading and reading. Sometimes it is all I can do. I have always been a reader.

Occasionally, the pen bleeds. Without warning I'm a writer.

There is no Band-Aid for that. I have to sit here and bleed out. Having 'died' a thousand times already I am sure I walk amongst the dead.

I wrote a book about my life. I write poetry. I hang out here and support A Voice for Men. I add my thoughts, angst, hate, (okay, disdain) for feminism, entitlement, the gender wage gap, the glass ceiling, princess lifestyles, false rape, domestic violence…

I am a Men's Rights Advocate.

Yesterday was a difficult day for me. My mother was at the hospital with my brother, who has been recently diagnosed with cancer.

We have a rough road ahead of us, and my brother is still in denial.

I had a birthday party to attend in a restaurant last night. I was not in the mood to go, but was already committed. After about a half hour into the pomp and some observations of the women there, a high school 'saying' popped into my head.

"Tell me who you hang with, and I'll tell you what you are"

I was eating hors d'oeuvres and thinking. Then I watched half-eaten steaks from other tables destined for the garbage. I remembered when I held two jobs; one of them as a waitress. I scraped plates of almost 'untouched' dinners into carry-out containers and dropped them off to some homeless men living in the streets after I got off work.

I almost got fired from a job for that, because my boss thought I was stealing food, until I explained. After that he gave me food to take to them. He asked me once, "Aren't you scared to go into those areas late at night? (his words, in a very thick Greek accent) Someone might hurt you."

My response: "I'm bringing hungry, homeless people something to eat. Who the hell is going to hurt me?"

He never asked me that again. And on holidays he donated produce, bread, poultry, pies, and anything else he could spare for my food drives.

As all this history ran through my mind, I was clearly not 'there.' Someone noticed and snapped their Chardonnay fingers at me. Yoohoo – (snap-snap) – earth to Izzey.

I came back abruptly and faux smiled. Everyone carried on with their chit-chat and laughter. Two women were checking their lipstick, talking about each other's hair treatments. Men were talking, laughing…drinking. And I suddenly noticed that I was the only woman there without polished nails. This has never bothered me. But for some reason this time it sparked a moment of clarity….a fucking epiphany.

Me.

Them.

I work with my hands. I sand, strip, compound, wax, operate heavy power tools, get filthy, fiberglassed, painted, nicked, bruised….so I keep my nails clean and short. That's the best I can do.

That is all I want to do

I was surrounded by polished princesses and I felt naked. It wasn't about my nails. It was because I was without my tool belt. It weighs about thirty pounds– complete with back support and suspenders. It explains my hands, and explains why my hands don't need a fucking explanation. If they could see that, would see the big picture. They would see me.

One woman held up her 'french tips' to another and said, "Oh, I just love her work. You should go see Michelle, and tell her that I sent you." She was oozing saccharine as she talked.

I couldn't resist. I said "Or, you can come to work with me on boats, and I could fiberglass them for you. It would last a lot longer."

"Oh, wow, really?" The look on her face was vacant; uncomprehending.

Holy shit. I knew it was time to leave. I did not belong there. I stayed for the main course, and passed on the dessert. But so did the princesses. They had different motives for skipping dessert. (Must not get fat, hubby will 'wander' and I don't have that insurance policy, yet.)

My job keeps me fit. I could eat five desserts and work that shit off the next day.

I came home thinking about my brother, and felt like reading AVfM.

I'm understood here. I have a voice here, in this refuge from pretense and princess bitches and even from some other more harsh realities.

Tell me who you hang with, and I'll tell you what you are.

Petition #3 Demand Men’s Rights at Change.org

April 29, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

With thanks to Teri Stoddard of S.A.V.E., I respectfully ask AVfM readers to sign this petition. Also, once we have reached the 1,000 signature goal on the petition to disbar Mary Kellett, I will be making a semi-permanent home for this petition at AVfM in the sidebar.

Right now as Teri has pointed out, any petition we start is going to the women’s rights section of Change.org because there is (oh shock of shocks) no section for men.

I think this is an important way we can raise awareness about men’s issues. As long as Change.org has no category for men and boys, then we simply don’t exist.

Perhaps we can work together to change that starting right now.

The Dildo Bandito, Crystal Mangum, and Nifong Nuts

April 29, 2011 | by Harry Crouch | Link | Original Link

In Colorado – home of the faux penises and Dildo Bandito – once lived some Eagle County Sheriffs who ordered up hang'm high Kobe t-shirts with the catchy slogan "I'm not a rapist; I'm just a cheater."

I wondered about that in a December 2003 editorial for the Colorado Daily, Let's Just Get it Over With , tie all those t-shirts together and hang the guy, no need for a trial.

Fortunately, NBA Bryant was rich enough to buy his way out of the impending surrealistic Sci-Fi conviction for a rape that may have never occurred.

I wrote, "[s]hort of civil action, the falsely accused have little recourse and most people filing false claims have nothing to offer to make their targets whole… Proponents of loosey-goosey hang' high sexual assault laws resist sanctions against [malicious] false accusers, gold-diggers, narcissists and personality disordered bimbos for fear of chilling legitimate complaints."

Tough, too bad, legislators need to force district attorneys to fully prosecute false accusers and burdens of proof have to be raised at least as high as the IQ of the Deputy Dorights with the t-shirts. Innocents should not suffer whackos.

A gazillion brainwashed ass-backward thinking politicians, civil servants, intellectually dishonest academics, and radical feminists disagree; even though intentionally making a false accusation and lying under oath are serious crimes with serious consequences.

Women Industry operatives rightly believe that lacking proof beyond a reasonable doubt does not necessarily establish an accusation is false. They believe false accusers who fess up and come clean should be given a break so other false accusers are not deterred from confessing for fear of punishment.

Which works like this, I admit I lied and destroyed lives. I was pissed off, afraid, lost, and could not find my teleporter to return to the mother ship. Hold me accountable and someone else might be afraid to lie and destroy lives because they have their head up a dark hole too and can't find their way back to whatever planet they came from either?

Conversely, the absence of proof beyond a reasonable doubt does not necessarily establish that the accusation is real. Consider situations where there's an overwhelming body of evidence to refute an accusation, like Maine's Assistant D.A. May Kellet getting Vladek Filler convicted for spousal rape.

Kellet used the absence of evidence to convict Vladek. Kellet fought to keep from the jury all evidence to substantiate his innocence. As an aside, not only was there an absence of evidence, Filler's alleged rape took place ten years before charges were filed! No evidence, ten years, he was convicted, unbelievable.

The state's Supreme Court had enough sense to remand for retrial based on prosecutorial misconduct. Regardless, nothing will happen to Filler's ex. Why? Because she's whacko and whacko women are not responsible for the lives they destroy. Women get services and men get prisons, everyone knows that.

Similarly, one would think, when it becomes apparent a malicious false accuser maintains the farce, shows no remorse, the accuser should be prosecuted to the fullest extent. Doing so would certainly deter others from doing the same, except perhaps those from planet Bonkers.

That doesn't happen either. I sent a case to the San Diego D.A. in which a man was falsely accused 25 times. There is clear and substantial evidence that the false accuser, the mother of his children, repeatedly lied, lied under oath, planted drugs in his car to set him up for a bust, coerced him into violating a restraining order by claiming his son was gravely ill, and fabricated one non event after another. She has not recanted. He strapped on a GPS ankle bracelet. Not only will the D.A. not prosecute, the Family Court awarded 100% physical and legal custody of their children to the woman because she had completely alienated the children from their father. The court felt it would do more harm to turn the children over to the non abusive father. All convoluted judicial thinking at its finest.

From what I can determine after speaking with prosecutors, judges, and private attorneys, no one has been prosecuted by the San Diego District Attorney Office for making malicious false accusations or lying under oath about sexual assault, domestic violence, or child abuse – nobody, never.

So how about South Carolina's Crystal Mangum, now charged with murder, a malicious liar whose actions ruined the lives of so many?

When she was 17, Crystal accused three men of raping her when she was 14. The case was dropped, there was no evidence other than her allegation, and her father said he didn't believe that she'd been raped.

In 2002 when lap-dancing on a taxi driver Crystal took his keys. She was drunk, stole his cab, was chased down by police, nearly ran over a cop, and was arrested.

Somewhere before or after the taxi driver, Crystal did a stint in the Navy. She was soon asked to leave. The Navy has yet to reveal the reason(s).

In 2006 Crystal falsely accused members of the Duke University Lacrosse Team of raping her. Her actions destroyed a good portion of the University's reputation, churned up unmitigated animosity against team members by a group of vile hate mongering professors known as the "Committee of 88", ruined Raleigh's politically corrupt and ideologically feminized District Attorney Michael Nifong (not a bad thing, but ruined nonetheless), and caused Duke University's capable lacrosse team coach to be run out of Raleigh; even though it was known or should have been known that Crystal had a history of mental illness and was loony-tunes.

After all that, North Carolina attorney general Roy Cooper chose not to hold Crystal accountable. Alluding to her history of severe mental illness, Cooper said that he would not prosecute her because she was so deluded as to believe her own false accusations – she didn't know fact from fiction.

On Feb. 17, 2010 police responded to a call about a woman fighting with her boyfriend, Milton Walker. It was Crystal. The police reported that she set Milton's clothes on fire and was threatening to stab him. Her three children were in the house. She was arrested then charged with attempted first-degree murder, five counts of arson, assault and battery, communicating threats, three counts of misdemeanor child abuse, injury to personal property, identity theft and resisting a public officer, but not one count of domestic violence. In defense, prosecutors might say that there was no need to charge her with domestic violence since she was charged with more serious crimes, which is a ruse.

Ideologically indoctrinated district attorneys internalize women don't commit domestic violence; even if they really do; like crazy Crystal. To the PC impaired she'll always be "the" victim. Blame it on patriarchy, some man made her do it and drove her to crazy.

District Attorneys protect their turf, often sacrificing justice for politically-correct dollars. Charging women with domestic violence skews statistics making it harder for domestic violence industry operatives to fund their imaginary "epidemic" of violence against women. At risk are billions in Violence Against Women Act (VAWA, euphemistically, "Visitor and Wallet Act") and other Federal pass-though dollars which create and sustain soft-jobs for WoMEN StuDIEs graduates who after law school often land cushy as district attorneys.

Crystal was arrested again for stabbing another boyfriend, Reginald Daye, on April 3, 2011. He died. He's dead, not breathing. She killed him. She's in jail, big bail. Her defense attorney will blame it on Reginald, other men, and being loony-tunes because she was horrendously abused since before conception. Crystal owns the "abuse excuse".

The religion Political Correctness dictates that Reginald surely stabbed himself to death after horribly abusing Crystal into an altered state of whacko. As victim she should be rewarded by the Victim Compensation Fund for killing her big bad boyfriend. Oprah's probably already calling about her book club.

Following such reasoning leads to, it's better to convict someone for something they have not done rather than deter someone who is or isn't whacko from coming forward because of something that really happened to them, like being sexually assaulted or otherwise abused.

What if they finger the wrong guy, which happens about 50% of the time? Should the premeditated and malicious false accusation really be treated as "oops" void of consequences for those involved in sending an innocent person to prison? While the Innocence Project has secured the release of hundreds of falsely accused men, has there been one overly zealous prosecutor or malicious false accuser sent to prison for ruining someone's life?

Had Crystal been held accountable, even confined to mental hospital, for any of her crimes committed before she (allegedly) murdered Reginald, he might still be alive.

To reiterate, "[s]hort of civil action, the falsely accused have little recourse and most people filing false claims have nothing to offer to make their targets whole…" Certainly they have nothing to offer Mr. Daye.

Legislators do need to force district attorneys to fully prosecute malicious false accusers and burdens of proof do have to be raised at least as high as the IQ of the Deputy Dorights in the t-shirts, the Committee of 88, radicalized domestic violence industry operatives, and attorney general Cooper.

Why? Because some complaints have to be dry-ice chilled until they break, especially those supported only by statements from lost in space whackos with a history of making destructive self-serving shit up! Otherwise the lives of innocent people are destroyed; and, some, like Mr. Daye, are murdered. Get it.

Let's just get it over with, turn Crystal lose so she can abuse others and maybe kill again. After all, loony-tune women can't be held accountable because they are crazy, since they are all victims of patriarchy and stuck in an endless cycle of abuse.

Maybe we need some Crystal t-shirts that say, "I'm not just a pathological liar, I'm a PC psycho murdering bitch from Bonkers, the perfect planet to the far left of reality."

Nifong nuts, beam me up Scotty, I got to get out 'a here… My heart bled out when the 88 Thlingons from Duke sucked up my sympathy and Attorney General Cooper failed to do his job. I wonder if the Dildo Bandito can help get faux penises out of academia, politics, and the justice system?

On Slutwalks and Survival: The Truth About Men and Women

23 year old Benjamin stands perched on a narrow plank at the bow of a modestly sized wooden boat. The other men behind him ease their oars through the water, gently pushing the craft forward. Benjamin is nervous. It is his first time and there is a lot riding on his success. Just minutes earlier his older brother made an attempt and failed.

When the moment is right he leaps into the air, holding the harpoon, easily twice as long as his body, as far above his head as he can. He comes down with all the force he can muster, slamming the barbed head into the flesh of the 50 ton Sperm Whale, then turning about as quickly as possible and swimming back to the boat before the thrashing animal kills him.

Eight hours and a tremendous fight later Benjamin's village has enough food to eat for months.

Sam Yang steps forward gingerly on the high wire. He grips the cable above him for balance and inches ahead aware that a misstep could mean his life. This is not a circus show. There is no crowd watching, spellbound and breathless. Beneath him there is no net. Instead, a few yards under his feet is the Mekong River. It is rainy season and the water rages beneath him faster and more violent than Niagara Falls. The Mekong at this time of year produces the most turbulent and deadly rapids on the planet.

Sam is on a fishing trip, which he needs to do or his wife and children won't eat.

Sulaiman, a miner in East Java, chokes from the noxious gasses and keeps chipping away at the yellow stone. His eyes, skin and lungs burn from the acid mist in the air. When he finally has two baskets filled with 200 pounds of sulphur, he hoists them up and settles the wooden rod (we should call it a yoke) on his calloused, disfigured shoulders and begins the long ascent back up out of the volcano to have the sulphur weighed and get paid.

His window for doing this kind of work, and making this kind of money is short. Within a very few years his body will begin to break down and he will have to find other ways to support his family.

Rakita, a Dorobo hunter, is 65 years old. He leads two younger men with him across the savanna floor, on the prowl for wildebeest. Rakita is training his young companions on a specific technique, namely how to take prey from lions while they are feasting. His method is simple. He finds a pride who have just made a kill, in this case one of about 13 lions. Then he walks up to them, staring them down and temporarily intimidating them so that he can take a portion of the fallen animal from them.

The lions scatter as he invades their space and assess him through the brush, their freshly blood covered mouths baring teeth. He quickly carves off a haunch, hefts it over his shoulder and walks slowly away from the kill.

This one, methinks, needs to be repeated. The hunter walked up to a large pride of lions in the middle of a feeding frenzy, bearing only a spear, and freaking took their food from them.

In the age of technology these stories seem amazing, almost incomprehensible. It would be easy to stand (or sit) in awe of all of it here on my sofa, typing away in the air conditioned comfort of my townhome. I am doing this, of course, after having watched all this in the BBC Miniseries "Human Planet," on a high definition, 46" television, pausing with the remote whenever I needed something to snack on or take a piss.

I try to remember that while entertaining, this is not Hollywood. It is the story of human beings, the most intelligent, resilient and resourceful species to ever inhabit the planet. In the days before microprocessors, gunpowder and a thousand other things that softened us into doughy blobs of couch dwelling leisure addicts, this is how the human race survived.

These "primitive" societies are living reminders of our collective roots, and perhaps more indicative of our true potential and capability than landing a man on the moon. And all four of these real life scenarios have several things in common aside from the absence of modern technology.

The most obvious, of course, is the correlating absence of women.

Wherever you go on planet earth and still find cultures living in the more Neolithic style of our ancestors; wherever there is an absence of life softening technology; wherever you find that stamina, strength, courage and extreme risk are needed to ensure survival, you also find the male domination so bemoaned by fat-assed, insulated academicians and gender ideologues across the technologically advanced west.

There are no exceptions to this.

None.

There never have been.

And it is proof, before our very eyes, that feminism isn't a product of social progress, but technological progress. Women, despite whatever deluded notions we currently maintain about their capabilities, would do nothing but ensure the end of the human race were they collectively given anything to do outside of childrearing, typing and complaining. And the fact is, despite some rather significant changes in the last half century, that is what most of them are still doing.

I know how harsh that sounds. The truth often is. And I suppose there is still just enough PC influence in my brain to point out that there are some women, for whatever reason, who have the tenacity to compete effectively with men in the realm of survival. They have my respect, as do women who don't possess that tenacity but don't imagine the world of men has wronged them because of it.

Women have their own strengths and capabilities, but enough to ensure the survival of the species? Not on your life. As I said, never have, never will.

That is why you see the results of women's "liberation" in the form of a degenerate obsession with vanity, celebrity gossip and consumerism. Even their political inclinations, once operating under at least a phony guise of legitimacy, have now devolved into nothing more than self-serving, female centric industries like DV, rape advocacy and women's health.

Men conquered the world and made humans flourish. Women took that world and gave us slutwalks; a whine fest for the painfully unfuckable.

It is tempting for me to just suggest to women that they just say thank you and try not to be so childish and aggravating, in order to show appreciation for a world so advanced by men that it gave them time to organize a cellulite parade; that they even had time to think of such a thing. But I will pass on that.

I don't want thanks for things I didn't do myself any more than I want blame for other things I didn't to either.

What I will do though, and without compunction, is point something out that the blue pill world has distorted for the last half century.

Remember young Benjamin, the whale killer at the beginning of our story? As is the custom of his culture, as the whale killer, he was rewarded with many of the choicest parts of the massive quarry.

It is a really simple concept based on common sense, justice and the need to create incentives for performance in the survival game.

Those that produce are given preference over those who don't. Those who take the risks, shed the blood and lay it on the line are rightly given more power and prestige. It's not a sexist conspiracy; it is as simple as having the good sense of handing the ball to the fastest runner, if you want to win the game. And it is also as simple as having the humility to hoist him up on your shoulders for the accolades when he scores a touchdown.

I can just imagine what some blue pill zombies would think about this. The poor sots know little else than their default position that women have been prevented from doing the things men do so in the end all of this is sexism and patriarchy.

I can only think of one thing to say to that:

Get the fuck out of my face with that bullshit.

Do you think Sam Yang's wife is being prevented from walking that wire over the rapids? Do you think there are women standing in line for their chance to walk into an active volcano and carry twice their body weight in sulphur up the side of a mountain?

Are village women being held back from their turn with the harpoon?

Well, if they are, there might be a good reason for it; like the fact that stupid, dead women can’t, without technology provided by men, land a whale or feed a village.

One thing I have always loved about the truth is its eternal indifference to whether or not people like it.

ANNOUNCEMENT: Radio program off for tonight

May 1, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box type=”alert” size=”large” style=”rounded” icon=”none”]
With regrets, there will be no AVfM Radio Program tonight.

Manuel Dexter and I have been immersed in a project of considerable size for the past several days, and it simply did not allow sufficient time for show prep. My apologies to all listeners for the late notice. I was genuinely trying to pull something together for tonight but could not make it happen.

We will be back on next week at the regular time.

False Consciousness & Kafka-Trapping

Lecture #9

"Never mind whether it's Critias or Socrates who is the one refuted. Just concentrate on the argument itself, and consider what on earth will become of it if it is examined." – Socrates of Athens

It is necessary, at this point, to set aside the thread I have been weaving, and take a detour into the deep wilderness of feminist logic. The phrase feminist logic will strike most of my readers as a misnomer – if not an oxymoron! – so let me reassure you that what I really mean is feminist attempted logic. And there is nothing logical about that, I assure you!

First, why is the use of logic so threatening to feminists? We know, assuredly, that it is – with some feminists going so far as to claim that logic is nothing but a tool of the patriarchy. Of course, this is absurd. Logical argument is, by definition, a collection of valid inferences – so it is not possible to argue against logic. To put it another way, you cannot reason against reasoning, because the very attempt to do so involves the (attempted) use of reason. The only way to attack logic without using (or attempting to use) logic would be to attack it most randomly – that is, without entailment. The argumentative points you make, in attacking logic, would have to have no relation to each other whatsoever. You could not say, for instance:

Men use logic to defeat women in argument, therefore logic is a tool of the patriarchy because the use of "therefore" indicates a logical consequence, i.e. it indicates entailment, which is a matter of logic! This leaves the feminist with two unfavorable choices: she can state that logic is a tool of the patriarchy, without reference to premise, evidence, example, definition, and so on – without any reference, indeed, to reality; or she can accept that her own argument, because it attempts to link two propositions together on a logical basis, is itself a tool of the patriarchy – and as the proponent of the argument, so is she!

Hence, the appropriate response to the feminist argument that "logic cannot be trusted, because it is a tool of the patriarchy," is to say: "and so are you! Hey – as a patriarch, I appreciate you doing my job for me!"

But again, why is logic so threatening to feminists? Could it be that feminists are simply misguided about the nature of logic? That is doubtful. Having seen feminists defeated by logic many times, I am quite sure that they fear it because that their beliefs cannot withstand it. Like any cult, feminism does not allow its members to investigate the truth, nor does it tolerate free and open discussion of its core beliefs. Still, none of this makes a bit of difference to us – as non-feminists, there is no human authority obliging us to hold our thoughts or tongues on the matter of feminism.

Yes, feminists fear logic because it contradicts other ways of 'knowing' the world – e.g. being told what to think. They also fear that logic will discredit ideological 'truths.' Feminists want you to see the world as they say you should see it – they certainly don't want you coming to your own conclusions! Particularly not conclusions critical of feminist orthodoxy, derived, for instance, from the process of asking questions and receiving unsatisfactory answers. And yet this is precisely the outcome that feminists guarantee, when their anxieties over criticism and the consequences of open discussion cause them to react, kneejerk-fashion, with shaming tactics.

What would a discerning neutral observer think, when he hears a reasonable question answered with an attack against the interlocutor's character? Will this inspire him to adopt all tenets of the questioned set of beliefs? Is he more likely to feel threatened into submission by the shaming tactic used against the gadfly, or to feel offended by proxy at the ideologue's evasiveness and insulting manner?

Ideologues don't tend to ask themselves searching questions like these. Small wonder, then, that the word 'ideology' began life as a term of abuse. It was not until Marx and Engels wrote The German Ideology that the phrase took on the characterization we associate today with identity politics. One's ideology, they claimed, is the product of one's social position – that is, whether one is a proletariat or a bourgeois. The socialist proletariat are the possessors of the ideology which reflects truth, while the capitalist bourgeoisie possess only 'false consciousness.' It is never explained how it is known that things are this way around and not the other – i.e., why can't the bourgeoisie possess true ideology, and the proletariat be subjected to false consciousness? That question does not need to be answered, because Marxism is a closed system of thought. It is like a man who stands not on the ground, but somehow, on his own feet; any one part of Marxism stands upon the other parts of the theory, and does not depend upon the vagaries of the experiential world for support. In other words, what happens in the real world does not matter – Marxism is self-verifying. The truth which backs up its claims is located within the theory, utterly independent of any contrary evidence that can be gathered from the actual experiences of actual people.

It is much like feminism, then – being abstract and anti-contextual, deciding upon the story before the facts are known. Feminism, to feminists, requires no justification outside of itself. It is impenetrable by external argument, and thus irrefutable – because it is inherently unreasonable. That is to say, it cannot be reasoned with. It is a waste of time trying to get feminists to see sense, and every MRA soon learns that he will more easily squeeze blood from a stone. The only discourse which will make feminists sit up and change their ways is the discourse of power: and this is a discourse that must be backed by action. Anti-feminists must be comfortable with the idea of wielding power over feminists, at least enough to marginalize them into irrelevance. This is the end game. Building critical mass is how we get from here to there, but we take a step backwards every time we indulge feminists in their sophistry.

Take, for example, the feminist sophism that we are 'locked in' to a perspective determined by the sex we belong to. Any counter-feminist argument launched by a man, no matter how accurate his observations, no matter how evidenced his claims, can be dismissed on the grounds that it was made by a man. The argument goes like this: "you're only saying that because you're a man. If you weren't a man, you wouldn't have a male perspective, and so you wouldn't be saying that." The implication is that a male perspective is inherently wrong – that a man, owing to his being a man, is incapable of grasping truth. So you see, this is really the same 'false consciousness' trick as practiced by Marx and Engels and their followers – the feminist has not explained how or why it is that a woman's perspective, owing to her being a woman, is necessarily the one which yields to truth.

The 'false consciousness' trick is, ultimately, an evasion. In one dishonorable move, the feminist has sidestepped the argument itself and attacked the interlocutor – "you can't possibly be right, because you are male." For the feminist, this is enough. She considers the matter closed, and moves on. By the same undisclosed reasoning by which Marx knew that the proletariat possessed the truth, the feminist 'knows' (i.e. strongly feels) that her own ideology possesses the truth. But that undisclosed reasoning, whatever it is, does not work in reverse. The feminist is confident enough that a counter-argument, using the same tactic – "you wouldn't be saying that if you weren't a woman" – is inapplicable and impossible. The implication is that feminist women view the world objectively, whereas mere men are 'locked in' to a privileged perspective and cannot see the way things truly are. An attack on the perspective of a man, for it being a male perspective – even the identification of a perspective as peculiarly 'male' – is nothing less than a statement of female supremacy.

As for non-feminist women, they too are oppressed by ‘false consciousness.’ You see, when women use their own minds to decide things for themselves, they are being manipulated by the patriarchy! But when they stop thinking for themselves, and defer to feminist consciousness without question, then their minds are ‘liberated!’ Do you see how this works?

Now, I hate to ruin their fun by being a man who says things he wouldn’t say if he wasn’t a man, but there’s something that doesn’t quite make sense about all this. What the feminists are trying to impart is a kind of sexual determinism. That is, the notion that they are attempting to propagate is one which states that our actions and behaviors are determined according to our sex, and we have no freedom of choice in the matter. We are moral robots, hard-wired from birth to view the world in one particular way, from which we cannot deviate.

This theory would only be meaningful if it could tell us how men and women will act or think. Yet, both men and women are far less predictable than the pigeon-holers of the world would like them to be. There are, for instance, feminists who are men, MRAs who are women, and people of both sexes who buck all the trends we can imagine. Feminist sexual determinism, then, has become a useless theory; if there is any truth to it, it is limited to those aspects of human behavior that cannot be identified. It has been reduced to tautology: we will always do those things which we will always do!

It hardly needs stating that men and women are not two opposed and internally homogeneous classes of people. Feminists would very much like them to be. Indeed, feminism rests upon this faulty perception. The idea that men and women should be opposed to each other is a feminist construction, and any deviation from this is a threat to the whole feminist enterprise – hence the imperative of familial destruction. This is also why the most venomous attacks are reserved for male ‘feminist allies.’ That small number of men who exert the strictest self-discipline in accordance with feminist orthodoxy come under the most fire for being not feminist enough. This happens because every man who is pro-female in the slightest is a thorn in the side of feminism, just as much as the most outspoken anti-feminist woman (perhaps even moreso: in the case of feminist men, there is no equivalent to the ‘false consciousness’ argument used to dismiss anti-feminist women). It must be denied that feminist men could ever be feminist enough! The illusion must be maintained that men are ‘the enemy’ – and this means repudiating the friendly intentions of male allies. In declaring themselves feminist, those men fail to conform to feminist sexual determinism, thus contradicting feminist theory and threatening the progress of the movement as a whole. It is not so easy to paint them as atavistic brutes, and this is largely down to their own efforts to make themselves amenable – which is precisely why they receive such vitriolic scorn.

To get back on track: there is more that Marxism and feminism hold in common than the Appeal to False Consciousness. Both fit a certain template, upon which we could map any modern radical ideology. Again, it is developments in language and thought which allow for the theoretical configurations making possible social movements like feminism. Socialism was only possible once the state and the economy were conceptually distinguished – in feudal times, no distinction between the two was discernible, rendering moot the possibility of a socialist system being idealized. It was in response to the rise of capitalism, with all that this entailed – Enlightenment thought, economic individualism, free markets, free labor, an end to tax farming, the formation of the business and working classes – that Utopian socialism and (later) Marxism became possible in the realm of the imagination.

Similarly, nationalism – in its modern form, as an ideology – only became possible once society and culture were distinguished in language and thought. Our question here is, what had to be distinguished before feminism could become a possibility?

This is a question which would take a great deal of space to answer – more space than I have available here. It will suffice to say that the escalating liberties being granted to men resulted in a divergence of expectations between men and women. Reasonably enough, we might think, a small number of women began to question why the Enlightenment notion of individual freedom extended only to men. However, what is often missed is that these women began from a position of strength – they were already the beneficiaries of Gynocentric cultural codes that placed them high above men, atop pedestals. Over the coming decades, men tripped over themselves delivering whatever women demanded. It is likely that most of them sincerely believed that individual freedom should be extended to women as to men. But the very fact that Gynocentrism was already in full force meant that female supremacy was the only possible outcome of feminism. The 'equality' feminists sought was an 'equality' to do all the things men are permitted to do, and to retain their traditional advantages over men, accrued through centuries of Gynocentrism. The recipients of additional advantages are, of course, not equal at all, but privileged at the expense of all others. This was always the intention.

Despite the occasional claims of feminists that they are dispensing with all forms of male thought and creating anew, feminism slots in neatly with other radical ideologies which preceded it (and which were, of course, dreamed up by men). To take the most obvious fact about modern radical ideologies, their basis is in forms of association – Marxists oppose the proletariat to the bourgeoisie, nationalists oppose their own culture or race to a culturally or racially diverse society, and feminists oppose women to men. The key relationships, used by ideologues as total explanations for all human phenomena, correspond to the forms of association which are emphasized. For Marx, the key relationship is economic – the control of the workers by the capitalists is an economic relationship, and all else (politics, religion, culture) is mere 'superstructure' atop this 'base.' The superstructure may change, but nothing fundamental will alter unless the economic relationship of the classes is reconfigured. Similarly, for nationalists, the key relationship is cultural (or racial, if the two are differentiated). This is the 'base,' upon which everything else is built. Changes to the superficial structures on top of the 'base' (e.g. modifications to political and social institutions) are irrelevant; the only fundamental change will come about via transformations in culture and/or racial demographics.

We find the same pattern in feminism. Opposing women to men, the key relationship for feminists is, of course, sexual. It is the relationship of men to women which determines all else (politics, economics, culture, religion, and so on). The elements of the superstructure may well change, but until the domination of women by men is smashed at the base level, nothing fundamental will be achieved.

It is this belief which ultimately explains feminist attempted logic. Their attempts at rational argument are clouded by a belief in collective guilt – that all problems or inconveniences faced by women result from this base relationship (the domination of women by men), so that, as long as problems or inconveniences remain, it must be the case that men (collectively) are dominating women (collectively). It does not matter if a particular man is innocent – he is still 'the enemy,' as feminists are more than willing to admit (see: The Redstockings Manifesto). Nor does it matter if a particular woman is guilty – she is absolved in the name of collective innocence.

And on these grounds, we encounter the peculiar feminist debating tactic called Kafka-Trapping. I did not invent the term; the credit must go to Eric S. Raymond, whose original article on the subject is linked below. Nor did Eric intend the term to be used only for feminists – any member of a victim ideology can effectively Kafka-Trap their opponents. The name, Kafka-Trapping, is a reference to Franz Kafka's work The Trial, in which the protagonist is told that he is very, very guilty, although his crime is never specified; and, as he soon discovers, the only 'way out' is to admit his guilt (though he knows not what of), thus acquiescing in his own destruction.

In Eric's own words, a Kafka-Trap is an unfalsifiable claim, about thoughtcrime, intended to induce guilt so the subject becomes manipulable.

The most chilling thing about this tactic is that the Kafka-Trapper declares your mind to be out of bounds to you – her judgment is a dismissal of your own opinion about your own thoughts. Think you know what you think? Think again, buddy!

Now, I shall reproduce, from Eric's blog, six models of the Kafka-Trap which feminists will use against you. Learn them. Know them. Recognize them for what they are: nothing more than ad hominem evasions. Calling out the tactic, as a Kafka-Trap, is sufficient for its refutation.

(Note: in the following examples, I have used the terms 'sexist' and 'sexism' but these may be replaced by 'misogyny,' 'woman-hating,' 'patriarchy,' etc.)

Model A Kafka-Trap
Your refusal to acknowledge that you are guilty of sexism confirms that you are guilty of sexism.

Model C Kafka-Trap
Even if you do not feel yourself to be guilty of sexism, you are guilty because you have benefited from the sexist behavior of others in the system.

Model P Kafka-Trap
Even if you do not feel yourself to be guilty of sexism, you are guilty because you have a privileged position in the sexist system.

Model S Kafka-Trap
Skepticism about any particular anecdotal account of sexism, or any attempt to deny that the particular anecdote implies a systemic problem in which you are one of the guilty parties, is itself sufficient to establish your guilt.

Model L Kafka-Trap
Your insistence on applying rational skepticism in evaluating assertions of pervasive sexism itself demonstrates that you are sexist.

Model D Kafka-Trap
The act of demanding a definition of sexism that can be consequentially checked and falsified proves you are sexist.

It is the last model, Model D, which I find the most intriguing. It implies – and my experience with feminists verifies – that simply asking how to not be sexist will be taken as evidence of one's sexism. The reason why I focused so heavily on definitions in my earlier lectures is because of the utility of attaching concrete meanings to terms. If we have a concrete definition of sexism, for instance, I could check my own behavior against this definition, and potentially discover that I do not fulfil any of the criteria – i.e., I am not sexist. But this does not satisfy the feminist notion of collective guilt. It feels like a panicked response on their part, then, to insist that any man who tries to discover whether or not he is sexist is automatically sexist simply for trying to find this out. In other words, he is a sexist for not wanting to be a sexist. Could there be any clearer indication that feminists want men and women to be two conflicting classes of people?

The purpose of the Kafka-Trap is to leave absolutely no room for the trapped individual to believe in his own innocence. A denial that he is oppressive is further evidence that he is oppressive; the only other option is to admit that he is oppressive, which is also evidence that he is oppressive. (Note the following from the Violence Wheel, designed by the Domestic Abuse Intervention Project: "saying the abuse didn't happen" is abusive. So, you see, whether you plead "guilty" or "not guilty" in a court of law, both pleas are evidence of your guilt.) Oppression is alleged because the individual is a member of a group – but not necessarily one that he identifies with. The in-group identification is ascribed to the individual by the operator of the Kafka-Trap. To quote from Eric once more,

Real crimes – actual transgressions against flesh-and-blood individuals – are generally not specified. The aim of the kafkatrap is to produce a kind of free-floating guilt in the subject, a conviction of sinfulness that can be manipulated by the operator to make the subject say and do things that are convenient to the operator's personal, political, or religious goals. Ideally, the subject will then internalize these demands, and then become complicit in the kafkatrapping of others.

That actual transgressions are not specified is true for all models apart from Model S, in which a specific transgression is specified, but any doubt regarding the alleged victim's account of things is taken as evidence that the doubter is guilty along with the alleged perpetrator. How familiar this all sounds! Is it not the precise experience of anyone who encounters feminists while discussing the prevalence of false rape accusations? On that note, I shall refer you to a comment from the feminist Amanda Marcotte, which she quickly deleted, but not before Fidelbogen saved a copy:

Let's talk about Amanda Marcotte some more, shall we? In fact, in her honor, I would like to define a seventh model of the Kafka-Trap, Model J:

Model J Kafka-Trap

Even if your innocence is proven in a court of law, this not only confirms your guilt; it also confirms the guilt of the (legal) system that found you innocent.

Exhibit A for Model J is a series of comments that Amanda Marcotte made in the wake of the Duke Lacrosse false rape accusations. Unable to accept that the accused men could possibly be innocent (hey, why do we even have trials?), she said the following:

In the meantime, I've been sort of casually listening to CNN blaring throughout the waiting area and good fucking god is that channel pure evil. For awhile, I had to listen to how the poor dear lacrosse players at Duke are being persecuted just because they held someone down and fucked her against her will—not rape, of course, because the charges have been thrown out. Can't a few white boys sexually assault a black woman anymore without people getting all wound up about it? So unfair.

Leaving aside the content of her raging diatribe, doesn't the style of her writing strike you as that of a twelve-year old, perhaps one who has only just discovered swear words, and believes that using them as much as possible is 'cool'? In the spirit of this post, then, and given the evidence before us, I hereby believe that Amanda Marcotte is, in fact, twelve years old. Any argument to the contrary, from Amanda or anyone else, will be taken as further evidence that she is twelve years old.

All right then. Since she has clearly not been brought up properly, I shall recommend a regimen of discipline that will soon have her speaking as a proper young lady should! I suggest, first, that Amanda Marcotte shall have her mouth vigorously washed out with soap; next, that she shall receive a stern, bare-bottom spanking (over some patriarch's knee, of course); and then, that she shall be sent to bed without dinner for a week. This will soon set her straight! And since I refuse to believe any evidence to the contrary of my opinion that she is twelve years old, any disagreement with my opinions on this matter shall only reinforce my contention that she is utterly deserving of this punishment. Now, what do you think about that?

Bin Ladin Dead and All it Cost was Thousands of Young Men and The Truth

After 10 years, a few trillion dollars, countless thousands of young men dead, disfigured and psychologically traumatized, Osama bin Laden is dead.

The streets of D.C. are now teeming with people, many wrapped in American Flags, chanting “U.S.A!!” like they were at an international soccer match. Fox News anchors are giddy; Geraldo looks to have had multiples in his $600.00 slacks; politicians, both civilian and military, are already coming out of the woodwork singing the praises of the Great American Military. Obama has taken credit and is reconfiguring his re-election strategy. Feverish American nationalism is about to sweep the country like syphilis in a border town whorehouse.

Hollywood is gearing up its anti war liberals to make movies glorifying everything they claim to hate.

And woven into all the hoopla is the reminder that none of this really means anything; that the so called “war on terror,” will continue unabated, and likely even escalate.

The blow back from this will, in one way or another, result in more death, more destruction and more tyrannical bullshit from our government.

And no one in the mainstream, not one single blue pill gorging one of them, will consider for a moment that from the beginning this entire clusterfuck has been a matter not of American survival, but of corporate greed and violence on a worldwide scale.

This war is a CRUDE business.

The young men we have sacrificed and the families we have ripped apart, are just the fodder offered up for a corporatocracy that knows no limit to avarice and indecency.

If you are a young man reading this, stay out of the military. They will cut your legs off in the name of cutting a deal. And if you get killed they will hand your devastated parents a flag and tell them lies about why it happened.

Then they will forget you ever existed.

Why Men are More Intelligent Than Women

May 2, 2011 | by Angry Harry | Link | Original Link

Are men more intelligent than women?

Well, the evidence seems to suggest that this is so.

On Start the Week, on Radio 4, tonight, Jeremy Paxman asked Professor Susan Greenfield, well-known neuroscientist (and Director of the Royal Institution) "You claim, don't you, that the more emotion you have, the less mind you have?"

"That's right," she answered.

Indeed, it is one of the main propositions in her new book, The Private Life of the Brain.

She went on to say,"[For example] One might say that, in meditation, one is developing a very deep consciousness, where you are accessing your inner states, and ignoring the outside world. This could be an example of where you are NOT experiencing an emotion, as such. The opposite would be, [perhaps] a baby, or someone with road rage, or a bungee jumper, awash with emotions and who is not [therefore] 'accessing' [with the mind] the past, or the future, or anything 'inside'."

Thus, Prof Greenfield is saying that the more 'emotion' you experience, the less 'mind' you have.

Now, which of the two possible genders, statistically speaking, experiences more emotion – and would claim to?

Hmm. The female gender, one would suspect.

And it would follow from Professor Greenfield's beliefs, therefore, that, statistically speaking, this gender has less 'mind'. It is less in 'contact' with it.

Putting this another way: Relatively speaking, compared to men, the conclusion must be that women are less often 'accessing the past, or the future, or anything 'inside' ' – statistically, that is.

Well, that's what follows from Professor Greenfield's observations.

All in all, therefore, women seem to function less 'mindfully' than men, or, putting it less euphemistically, less 'intelligently'.

Statistically speaking.

In addition, it cannot have escaped even the most ardent feminist's notice that it is men who are the focused, the possessed, and the obsessed. It is men who push forward the boundaries of science, music, technology and art. It is men who build great cities and great religions.

It is men who tinker well into the night, studying and prising apart the boundaries of even the most obscure and intractable.

I knew one man who spent six years studying locust legs.

Not locusts.

Locust LEGS!

FOR SIX YEARS!

And he is probably still at it.

I knew another man who was a mathematician and who struggled daily, FOR YEARS, with some obscure problem in which only one other person in the entire world seemed to have any interest – and it wasn't me.

Just look at any science program on TV and notice the 'workers' laboring in the various scientific fields. The 'experts'. The ones who sneak into their laboratories even on Christmas Day to skulk around engines, chemicals, computers or insects. The ones who spend hour upon hour, year upon year, squashed into their little rooms to study the contents of test-tubes or tissues. The ones who wander into the most hostile and desolate parts of the planet to scrub around for clues, artifacts and ideas.

They're nearly all men.

It is men who lead, explore, push forward and calculate.

The intelligence of men must creep forward more quickly, and further, than that of women,

And, to the extent that intelligence is based on factors in the environment, as opposed to genetics, or based upon learning and studying, as opposed to 'emotionalising' (and, so, losing 'mind') then the intelligence of men must creep forward more quickly, and further, than that of women, throughout their lives – because, statistically speaking, they choose to take on more of the intelligent-provoking 'environment', and they interact with it in much more of an objective and emotionless way (i.e. with more 'mind').

When it comes to intelligence, men have got what it takes. They drive in straight lines, they focus their attention, they do not multitask, they obsess, and they do not spend so much time emotionalizing.

And they actually increase their intelligence by doing such things.

And the whole species benefits from their pursuits.

Statistically speaking, men are taller than women. Not much, but significantly so. The picture below is of some men and women. Some of the women, quite a few of them, are actually taller than quite a few of the men.

[image]

But now look at the next picture.

[image]

The very same men and women have fallen in love, and they have partnered each other. They are so happy. But, notice that EVERY SINGLE man is TALLER than EVERY SINGLE woman.

And the same thing happens with intelligence. Just as it is that women, statistically speaking, prefer men who are taller than them, and richer than them, and socially higher up the ladder than them, so it is that they prefer men who are more intelligent than them.

Not only do women admit to this last aspect, recent research also shows that most women believe that their partners are more intelligent than them.

And they are!

The situation is exactly the same as for Picture B. Simply think of intelligence instead of height. All the women in this picture have chosen partners who are 'more intelligent' than them, even though it is true that, statistically speaking, across the whole population, there are millions of women who are more intelligent than millions of men.

And until such time as women CHOOSE partners who are less than, or equal to, themselves in terms of intelligence, the statement that 'men are more intelligent than women' will remain true even when looking at the issue as it relates to partnerships between men and women.

Men are MOSTLY more intelligent than their female partners.

Putting this another way: When it comes to looking at men and women as they function within their relationships, men are MOSTLY more intelligent than their female partners.

But, of course, we all know this instinctively.

We just cannot say so.

But it is clear that both men and women CHOOSE things to be this way – statistically speaking.

As Germaine Greer puts it, "Women are not valued for their intelligence."

Well, Yes, they are. But they are not loved for it, nor are they found attractive as a result of it – statistically speaking.

In her book, Sexual Personae, Camille Paglia said that, "If civilization had been left in female hands, we would still all be living in grass huts."

She has a point, because if women had, indeed, been the dominant gender, then they would have used their influence to promote further emotionalizing. And the result would have been less achievement with regard to developing other things.

Like wheels.

And this, of course, partly explains why the educational systems in the west are currently failing so miserably to produce high standards in their pupils. There is too much emotionalizing going on, and not enough thinking; i.e. not enough mind.

And, in the past, those little societies that spent their time emotionalizing, instead of creating, inventing and progressing, had no chance in evolutionary terms. They lost the battle long ago. The men were killed and the women were carried away. And they no longer exist. They have been statistically washed away.

Paglia also said that, "Women have been discouraged from genres such as sculpture that require studio training or expensive materials.

But in philosophy, mathematics, and poetry, the only materials are pen and paper.

Male conspiracy cannot explain ALL female failures.

I am convinced that, even without restrictions, there still would have been no female Pascal, Milton, or Kant.

.Even now, with all vocations open, I marvel at the rarity of the woman driven by artistic or intellectual obsession, that self-mutilating derangement of social relationship which, in its alternate forms of crime and ideation, is the disgrace and glory of the human species."

Men are, indeed, more intelligent and creative than women, on the whole. They work at it. They strive for it. They value it. They are loved for it. They are wanted for it.

And the mental environments in which they choose to spend their time definitely develop their talents even further.

That is, they give much more time to their minds.

And this is mostly why women, STATISTICALLY SPEAKING, will never be able to compete successfully with men intellectually and nor, therefore, in any task or job which requires intellectual endeavor.

Finally, not only do men develop their intelligence by CHOOSING to engage more so in activities that enhance it – as opposed to emotionalizing – (and so, to the extent that the environment affects intelligence then it will do so more for men than it will for women) but it is also the case that, thanks to the Y chromosome, the genetic variability of men is greater than that of women, so spreading the range of their intelligence more widely. The consequence is that at the bottom range of intelligence there will be found to be far more men than women, and in the top range the SAME will be true.

Further, and for the same reason, both the highest and the lowest intelligence levels of men are more extreme than are those of women.

At the high-flier levels, women haven't got a hope of competing with men.

And the upshot of all this is that at the high-flier levels, women haven't got a hope of competing with men either in terms of their number or in terms of their achievements – unless, of course, the men are deliberately handicapped in some way.

Thus, there is not so much of a glass ceiling created by sex-discriminatory men holding back the realization of statistical parity between men and women in the higher echelons of the world, the women's relative lack of success in these lofty places is far more due to the choices that they make and their less-variable genetic makeup, neither of which is the fault of men.

Nature vs Nurture

For at least half a century, the overwhelming evidence that intelligence is determined very significantly by genes has been hidden from the public – by the usual culprits. The politically-correct view was that the environment was the most significant factor in the development of intelligence and that genes were almost irrelevant.

Indeed, scientists who have expressed the view that intelligence is largely the product of a person's genes have been labeled by the politically-corrected feminist-dominated left as racists, sexists, Nazis, and goodness know what else. And, for example, during the 80s and 90s many of the UK's school teachers were indoctrinated with the view that children do not differ at all in terms of their mental abilities. This is absolute rubbish, but I have met many young teachers who actually believed this wholeheartedly as a result of the politically-correct nonsense being propounded by the teacher-training colleges.

The point here, however, is this.

IF it is true that intelligence is largely, and significantly, determined by the mental environment in which it is engaged, then it follows, for example, that those individuals who find themselves – or place themselves – in situations conducive to the development of intelligence are going to end up more intelligent than those who do not.

As such, for example, those who live or mostly work in more impoverished circumstances are not going to end up being as intelligent as those who live or mostly work in more enriched circumstances. And so, for example again, middle class people are going to end up more intelligent than those from the working classes. Whites from the rich West are going to end up being more intelligent than impoverished blacks from, say, Africa (or who live in western ghettoes) and, presumably, men throughout history, not being tied to their children and their homes, ended up being far more intelligent than their womenfolk who, apparently, spent most of their time dealing with children and being oppressed.

The politically-corrected cannot stomach the conclusions that must be reached even on the basis of their very own doctrines

Needless to say, the politically-corrected cannot stomach the conclusions that must be reached even on the basis of their very own doctrines concerning the development of intelligence.

And so it is that the various pronouncements of the politically corrected concerning the development of intelligence reveals that they are either mostly incredibly stupid, and simply cannot see where their own arguments lead, or that their propositions are mostly designed to manipulate people rather than to enlighten them; which means, quite simply, that they are bald-faced liars.

Mostly, one discovers that they are both.

But, in either case, their influence (which is mostly due to intimidation) is a negative one, and it tends to make societies structure themselves on the basis of serious falsehoods.

And clearly, societies that do this, particularly complex ones, are not going to progress very well. In fact, eventually, they are going to cave in – well, they will eventually collapse or perform hopelessly in those domains where the falsehoods form part of the very foundations upon which they have been built.

And with regard to the negative consequences of having serious misconceptions about the nature of intelligence, the whole UK educational system immediately comes to mind.

I repeat; these people are either very stupid in that they cannot see what follows from their own pronouncements, or they are dishonest manipulators for whom the ideological ends justify their thoroughly dishonorable means.

The arguments that I have made concerning intelligence are relatively easy to grasp and they are worth understanding.

And they boil down to this:

The more that the environment is said to affect the development of intelligence (a PC left-wing argument) the more must the conclusions from this position suggest politically very-incorrect outcomes. For example again, the men from the past must have been more intelligent than the women. The colonizers must have been more intelligent than the colonized. The masters must have been more intelligent than the slaves. The whites must have been more intelligent than the blacks. The rich must be more intelligent than the poor.

You fruitfully expose them for the intellectual phonies that they are.

And when you point this out to the politically-corrected and their feminist friends, in order to expose their ludicrous and conflicting claims, you fruitfully expose them for the intellectual phonies that they are.

And it is very important that we do expose these frauds, because they and their bankrupt ideologies have achieved enormous influence in western societies. And, as a consequence, the futures of these societies are being continually undermined.

One Mother’s Views on Child Support and Supporting Young Men

May 3, 2011 | by Lara Lohne | Link | Original Link

I’ve recently watched several MRA videos and while I am female, I’m no feminist, and actually may be a budding men’s rights activist.

My partner just came back from court on Wednesday with two years of probation for non-payment of child support. I don’t want to bore you with all the details but the woman involved is a serial child support extortionist. This isn’t the first time she’s done this and it probably won’t be the last either. The only reason she hasn’t found another guy and dropped another calf already is because she isn’t getting a satisfactory pay out from her second attempt at my partner, who has been unemployed since prior to the birth of this child.

She lied on her application, or whatever it’s called when a child support claim is filed, about her income as well as his and about his other children that he supports. She completely neglected to mention them in fact, and his payment amount was calculated at nearly $500 per month.

My partner and I have a child together. For the first three and a half years of my son’s life, his birth certificate was blank where the father’s name should have gone. This was because I didn’t believe it was my right to put my partner’s name on the birth certificate if he didn’t want to be the father and didn’t have any choice in me carrying to term and giving birth and keeping the child. It isn’t that I didn’t want my partner to be his father, but I respected his rights to not be the father just as he respected mine and didn’t try to force me to abort or adopt.

My son just turned four early March this year. From the time he was 5 months old, I was the one working to support the household. My partner stayed home and cared for my son because he couldn’t find work and with only one income we couldn’t afford day care for an infant.

When my son was about 14 or 15 months old, we noticed there were odd things about him; he had regressed in his language skills, losing all the words he had previously learned. He walked on his toes almost exclusively. He was obsessed with spinning objects and lining things up, and would have violent tantrums with no sense of danger.

When he was 2 and a half we recognized more abnormal behaviors and he still wasn’t even trying to talk. An evaluation showed he had significant developmental delays and when he was 3 they evaluated him for autism. He was diagnosed with mild to moderate autism in June 2010. I was still working full time, my partner was still caring for my son so I could work.

We still couldn’t afford day care and given our son’s emotional violence and his inability to socialize and cope with change, he wouldn’t have been accepted to, or have been able to handle, traditional day care.

When it was clear that my son was special needs, my partner tried to contact his case worker for the child support claim to let them know. He was told they didn't care that he was taking care of a special needs child so I could work. All they cared about was that he wasn't taking care of the child that was legally his, meaning his name was on the birth certificate. That was when he decided he needed to add his name to my son's and so we went and filled out the affidavit and had his name added as the father.

This was difficult for him as he doesn't trust women. He'd been burned too many times. He fears I'll take that little name and use it against him if he and I should ever part company and now feels slightly trapped thinking his only recourse is to stay with me so I have no reason to retaliate on him. I don't think that way, never have been the vindictive type and take personal offense to women who play the victim because they can't handle the responsibilities of their own choices. Words won't convince him so there isn't really anything I can do about how he feels.

Even though I've proved to him over and over that I am not going to cheat on him and I'm not going to leave him to even think about dating another guy (I'm 40 years old, mother of 6 and a grandmother now and I have a 4 year old son with autism; I'm not exactly anyone's dream girl here) but he is convinced one day he'll here me say I'm bored and I've found someone else to be with.

My partner has many ideas on changing the child support system so women can't take advantage of the system and use it as a meal ticket or a weapon of destruction. One reason for this exes doing it was to make him suffer. He has countless emails saying exactly that, and that it isn't about the money.

All this in mind I wanted to write about what I feel was his best idea for educating high school boys, or maybe even middle school/junior high school boys about what it will mean to them to become a father…

Picture a room full of teenage boys. Maybe they are a little embarrassed, talking smack like young boys do when they are nervous but don't want to lose face. This is after all a sex education class. A man walks to the front of the group, welcomes them and then asked a question. This question catches them off guard because it has nothing to do with sex…

"I want to know, who here, by a show of hands, has $5000?"

"Does collage money count?" one boy asks.

"Sure. Collage money, trust fund money, savings from your paper route, any money you have that equals $5000."

About half the boys put up their hands.

"OK, good. Keep your hands up, now how many of you have $10,000?" Several of the hands go down now.

"How about $50,000?" Many more hands go down.

"Who here has $100,000?" Everyone but one boy puts their hands down.

“Congratulations!” says the man at the front. “You can have sex!”

After a few nervous chuckles and a very confused silence, the man begins to explain. “You can have sex, because you can pay child support if the girl got pregnant and decided to keep the baby.”

He explains the average cost of child support per month, not to mention medical expenses, and if the child goes to collage you would be required to pay for that as well.

And he explains the inside of jails for those who can’t afford to pay.

Obviously there would be a significant amount more of information given than what I’ve generalized here, but this might be a better approach to sex education for boys than trying to scare them with STD’s.

Some of them will understand money, particularly if they’ve earned any of their own.

Women, for too long, have been the ones regulating sex education classes and they’ve been about empowerment and safe sex.

When a child is involved and child support is on the table, there is no such thing as safe sex.

Young men need to know what really awaits them out there. The world of women is a scary place for the boy who isn’t prepared because nobody ever told him.

Fisking Feminism: How Womyn Invent Inventors

May 4, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

I start this article with thanks to recent commenter Sonia, who dropped in to voice her (programmed) opinion in response to Harry's article "Why Men are More Intelligent than Women."

Says Sonia:

I can't believe I'm bothering to even indulge your idiocy, but child. It's hard to invent things when people FORBID YOU FROM GOING TO SCHOOL. good god man woman only got the vote early last century. women could not even file patents because of their gender, so they would have to file them under husband's names, and many female authors would publish their shit under pseudonyms.
you make me laugh.

First, it does appear from Sonia's sentence structure, punctuation and diction, as well as her rationale for why women are not accomplished inventors, that she was indeed denied any sort of proper education.

Such a poor, oppressed little girl. I had no idea the evil patriarchy was still at work and so effective.

But perhaps a dose of the truth will help cupcake out of her information deficit. And it is really easy to see why she is afflicted by such a dearth of knowledge. Everyone she has ever believed in has been lying to her for her whole life.

Come, brothers and sisters, let's lend the wayward Sonia a hand.

First, education has absolutely nothing to do with being inventive. Well, except to the extent that modern feminist education is instrumental in inventing things like a wage gap, dv stats, new kinds of rape, and now, female inventors.

Where it concerns invention, consider the following. Thomas Edison, arguably the greatest inventor in world history, was home schooled in early years by his mother and had very little formal education.

Benjamin Franklin had one year of college. The patriarchal overlord was the son of a poor soap maker and could not afford more than a year of school.

The Wright Brothers never went past high school. And please consider this blurb from an online bio of Henry Ford:

"He attended school until the age of fifteen, at which time he developed a dislike of farm life and a fascination for machinery. He had little interest in school and was a poor student. He never learned to spell or to read well. Ford would write using only the simplest of sentences. He instead preferred to work with mechanical objects, particularly watches. He repaired his first watch when he was thirteen years old, and would continue to repair watches for enjoyment throughout his life. Although he did not like working on the farm, he did learn that there was great value in working hard and being responsible."

Shall I name some more uneducated men whose inventions revolutionized the world and allowed Sonia to publicly whine on the internet?

O.K…

Louis-Jacques-Mandé Daguerre was an architectural school drop-out who invented the first viable photography process. Thomas Savery, who among several other things invented the steam engine, had no known education. Elias Howe invented and patented the first sewing machine. No education. George C. Devol, Jr. was an inventor with over 40 patents, including the first industrial robot. No formal education.

I could go on but I would test your attention span, and that is just with uneducated men that invent. If I were to go on with all male inventors, I could not only test your patience, but likely test the bandwidth limits of this website.

And besides, I am here to talk about women inventors, at least where I am able to legitimately do so. It turns out though, that in order to do that we need to clear away a bit of garbage from the discourse. Said garbage always seems to be in abundance when feminists are given the floor – or are even allowed to stand on it.

I went scouring the net for the accomplishments of the great women inventors of history. Low and behold I found a list of magnificent inventions, courtesy of the fairer sex. The list has apparently been passed around the internet like doobies at a Floyd show.

Most of the sites and forums housing the list had cute little accompanying remarks like "All the inventions men have women to thank for."

But there was a slight problem. Almost none of the information on the list was accurate, and some of it was outright fabricated. To put it more succinctly, the list of female inventions was an invention itself.

Too bad you can't patent lies. I will spare you the obligatory rich bitch analogy, but not the opportunity to make you consider it.

Experience tells me that debunking each and every feminist lie is a great deal of work with questionable returns, so I did a fact check on the first 15 inventions, just exactly as they appear on the list. Of the first 15 claims, I found 9 of them were affected by one degree or another of bullshit. This ranged from partial, or somewhat bullshit, where perhaps an accomplishment by a woman had been greatly exaggerated or embellished, to total or complete bullshit, where all manner of "WTF were you thinking?" must have been employed to put someone on that list.

I will qualify myself by saying that the research on my part has been somewhat cursory, but I do think I dug far enough into each claim to raise very credible concerns on the 9 of 15.

More on that in a moment, but first the list itself, rebuttals sourced, of course, except where definitive information could not be found.

40. Zigzag sewing machine Helen Blanchard 1873

Now, as I said, where I was able I linked you back to the source that refutes the item in question. For those that don't want to do a lot of click through reading let me give you a few examples of the problems.

I searched quite a bit for support for the claim that a Battery container was invented by Nancy Perkins 1986. I found references to it aplenty, ALL of them were versions of the original list and none of them were sourced or cited.

So while I can't say that Nancy didn't invent a battery container for certain (Kafkatrap), still the only source I ever saw for it was on the list. I don't even know what kind of container she invented. Did she "invent" a box for a battery?

It is hard to know without more info. So until I see verification…

But where we do have info it gets more clearly incredulous. According to the list Harriet Strong invented dam and reservoir construction in 1867.

Oh my, invented dam and reservoir construction?

Call me crazy but I don't think so. Strong developed a specific irrigation system (no, she didn't invent irrigation itself) for her grove of walnut trees. Later in life she presented a plan to congress to dam the Colorado River, which they did not use. I am sure that her irrigation system was really cool – and for sure getting an audience with congress, at the time, was like the 19th century equivalent of getting on Oprah.

But as far as inventing dam and reservoir construction, or even making a significant contribution to it?

Bullshit.

The same for the 1893 car heater "invented" by Margaret Wilcox. Margaret Wilcox invented a car heater – that didn't work. So, after that a man invented one that did.

As far as I know, most people would not be too impressed with Thomas Edison building a light bulb that left you in the dark. I don't think he would make it on to anyone's list.

Unless, I suppose, he was Tina Edison.

All this brings to mind a few observations and questions on my part, especially for the intellectually challenged folks we know as feminists.

One, can any of you explain to me all the crap I have heard about men having "fragile egos" over the past forty years? And if that is true, then why is it we have to live so many lies about women just to make them feel good about themselves?

Isn't demanding (and creating) phony slaps on the back, and getting psycho over it when called out, pretty much a sign of a toddler level ego in need of some maturity, or perhaps some real accomplishment?

If you see the wisdom in that, you might want to shoot for the maturity and not the accomplishments. Popular mechanics did an evaluation of the 50 greatest inventions of the past 50 years. That would be the same 50 years where women have demanded and been granted inclusion into every aspect of western life where they could actually produce; academe, workplace, you name it.

Now please find me a woman inventor on that list.

Unless I missed something, there were some women named, but they were not inventors. They were women that were placed on an advisory board to select the most important inventions.

And the board's selections were all invented by men.

Admittedly, there were some corporations given credit for some of those inventions, where individuals were not named. I am not thinking though, that when The Institute of Electrical and Electronics Engineers launched new network standards that may eventually eliminate the need for wired telecommunications infrastructure, that they were hiding female researchers.

My guess (read certainty) is that they were not there in any significant capacity.

But the other, more overarching concern here is one, as it always is, of what the lies do to the people they are purported told to "help."

I personally don't care if the blue pill public wants to believe that women invented air and water. And it seems in some ways they are trying to.

But what about El Dorado Jones?

You see, despite the fact that she didn't exactly invent the muffler; she was a very remarkable person. An anti-conventional chain smoking maverick in her day, she "borrowed" most her design start-ups from inventor William Deal, but she actually did bring improvements and innovations to a lot of designs and has earned some recognition for her brilliance and tenacity.

I wonder how she would feel now, put on a list by ideologues who didn't really know or care about her work, in the middle of a bunch of fabricated nonsense like the Margaret Wilcox story?

I also have to wonder if whoever made that list read Jones's story, saw the word muffler, which was as much as her mind could comprehend technically, and then just slapped her on the list, not knowing the difference between her and the other "inventors" she named.

Either way, what we ended up with was standard feminist fare. A story suitable for Grimm's; 90% pipe dream, about a world they wished existed that does not, and counting on a blue pill public to say, "Duh, O.K." without ever checking a single fact.

And this is how we end up with the Sonia's of the world, all piss and vinegar, blaming the man, for all the things that women can't do*.*

And that is precisely what you get when you start making lists of "women" inventors, instead of just listing inventors. When you do that, you set things up as a competition. And when you push women to compete with men, they are always going to get completely waxed, and I don't mean at the spa.

Unless we have a pregnancy competition.

This, if western women were prone to learning lessons, would be a good one. Women in general will never be able to compete with men if men are inclined to actually compete with them.

As we witness the results of all these feminist set ups for women and men to compete with each other, we see the bitter, neurotic examples, like Sonia, that it creates; angry women lying to themselves about why they are failing to keep up, looking pathetic and desperate in their attempt to find scapegoats, and demonstrating exactly why we tag them as more emotional than intellectual.

Hint, you frustrated daughters of bullshit, I have the same problem you do, I just handle it differently. And I figured out a long time ago that I if was feeling, say, not as smart as some other people, screaming “I am as smart as Einstein,” at the world, and expecting them to do anything but laugh, is a piss poor plan for dealing with it.

Just saying.

I have never invented anything. I couldn’t compete with Edison or the Wright Brothers or even El Dorado Jones. In fact, there are, I am sure, lots of women that can do a lot of things better than I can.

So, dealing with that I don’t try to compete where I am out gunned, or whine about it.

I accept reality and find it is not so bad, and certainly not a conspiracy.

If trying to compete with men is not working out, deal with it. Coming here and getting pwned for your whining isn’t going to make things any better.

A Special Message for SlutWalkers

May 5, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

The recent influx of SlutWalkers has brought some unsurprising results. There have been threats of violence from them, repeated personal attacks and other actions of general stupidity.

I do strive to maintain an environment here where open discourse of complex and polarizing subjects is possible, but at times there needs to be some limits.

And since I am not a Slut Whisperer, I am going to have to employ the gavel to keep things on course.

So be it.

Here are the rules. They are not negotiable and are subject to being enforced immediately.

One, it is a given on this site that rape is a crime of sexual violence characterized by both the use of force or coercion and the absence of informed consent.

It is also stipulated that rape is wrong, no matter who the victim or perpetrator is, and that the donning of slutty attire is not equivalent to consent.

Read all that till it sinks in to your slutty little minds.

The arguments put forward by the articles on this site question the idea of whether a woman's dress and/or behavior may place her at increased risk of a sexual assault, and whether they should be held accountable to the extent that they play a role in the occurrence of a crime that might have been prevented with better judgment and decision making.

That is the only debate going on here.

So if you come here to voice your objections to these articles, but insist on relying on the false premise that we are advocating rape tolerance, or absolving the rapist of responsibility for his or her crime, then you will be summarily removed and banned.

Also, since at least one of you has seen fit to make physical threats here, be advised that this will not be tolerated. In the future, any threats will result in banning and your IP address and email will be published on this thread.

Personal insults are permissible, but in the event that your personal insults outweigh the cogent content of your arguments on a consistent, or nearly consistent basis, you will be banned and your posts removed.

As site administrator, I will be the sole arbiter of these decisions and there is no appeal.

That should eliminate 95% of you from posting, because to date none of you have any real arguments to make. But in case there is a small percentage of you that want to make your case, either for your semi clad slutty walks, or against what is published here, you will be able to do so, as long as you act like civilized sluts.

Walk Like a Slutgyptian!

May 5, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

(Sung to the tune of "Walk Like an Egyptian")

Don your tube top, paint that face like you're charging fifty cents

Bend over slow – oh hey ho – and spread 'em for the men

Now take a shot, show your slot, you know it's just pretend

Now drink some more – oh hey ho – and say you're not a whore.

When someone grabs a tit, says hey ho, hey ho!

Hey ho-oo-oo, hey hoooo!

Walk like a Slutgyptian!

Now call a cop, cry with snot and talk to TV crews

Stage a protest – oh hey ho – you're on the nightly news!

When someone calls your bluff, says hey ho, hey ho!

Hey ho-oo-oo, hey hoooo!

Talk like a Slutgyptian!

Now you have fame, though it's lame, the center of atten-she-un

But where it counts – oh hey ho – you're just Slutgyptians

And when you lose your pussy pass, say hey ho, hey ho!

Hey ho-oo-oo, hey hoooo!

Stalk like a Slutgyptian!

Stalk like a Slutgyptian!

Dear Sluts

May 5, 2011 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

[dropcap] I[/dropcap] am a man, employed in a high-skill job. I am not rich, but I command a healthy salary. Last night, I dressed in my finest bling, downed 4 glasses of whiskey, and went for a stroll in the roughest parts of my city, alone. I was, of course, stabbed and mugged, and left for dead in an alley – because that's what happens to drunk flashy idiots who don't take responsibility for themselves.

Actually, that didn't happen, because I'm not a moron, and I don't wander around drunk inviting disaster.

To do so would be the male equivalent of the unfortunately common female behavior of dressing to deliberately attract the sexual attention of men, getting drunk and placing myself in unfamiliar uncontrolled surroundings. Women and girls do this routinely. Girls do this because it is everybody's right to do whatever they want. Behaving stupidly is everybody's right, and most of the time, they suffer no worse fate than a hangover. Unfortunately, sometimes, they get raped.

[image]The word "slut" is sometimes used for an insult, and other times as a form of casual praise. Unlike many other insults, slut has a distinct meaning. It does not simply mean "person of bad repute". It means "sexually irresponsible jackass".

Self described sluts took to the streets last month to protest a police officer's tactless, but correct admonition that personal behavior and attire influenced potential bad outcomes from irresponsible behavior. Such as being sexually victimized. The complaint seems to be that an argument in favour of personal responsibility is actually an argument in favor of rape.

Im not making this up. To feminist sluts, an argument for personal responsibility is the same as an argument in favor of rape. Last month, Patrick John Doran wrote an article on this site[1] addressing the Toronto slut walk, and it was featured in the last 24 hours on a feminist facebook page.
http://www.facebook.com/pages/SlutWalk-Hamilton/215516551797309

It attracted a torrent of moronic vitriol from feminists, incensed that anybody should say a bad word about parading around for the right to dress like fools and never taste a hint of personal responsibility. I'll offer the definition of slut again, this time from a dictionary: "a dirty, slovenly, or untidy woman"

[quote float="right"]I regard my own definition of slut as more accurate and modern. A sexually irresponsible jackass.[/quote]

In truth, the practice of women dressing in "sluttish" attire outside the context of parades through Toronto's downtown, is purposeful. A woman dressing in a deliberately sexually provocative style is flaunting her sexual power over men. She is saying, in a language older than any spoken or written:

“I am an object of sexual desire, and I am a person of protected status”

Except, sometimes, if she’s exceptionally stupid, drunk, alone, she might discover that social convention against sexual victimization breaks down under the influence of drugs, alcohol, and provocation.

Dressing provocatively, provokes a reaction. Sometimes not a good one. Certainly, nobody deserves to be raped, and everybody has the “right” to dress however they please, but if we’re not moronic children, we understand personal responsibility for the situations we find ourselves in.

Feminists, according to the Facebook site which delivered so much traffic today to AVFM claim they want to “take-back” the word slut. To erase the negative connotation, and put a positive shine on acting like a sexually irresponsible jackass.

I support them. I think they should also reclaim another traditionally negative word.

Moron.

[1] The Slutwalk Revelations by Patrick John Doran

A link to this article was posted on /r/mensrights by AVFM’s founder and editor, Paul Elam, and unsurprisingly, a lively discussion ensued in the comment thread of the posting.

As the author of this article, what did surprise me was that much of the debate barely touched on the substance of this article’s content, but focused on my use of apparently rough language.

To quote: “I agree with the spirit of the article… however, the language put me off a bit. When I see good, thought-provoking articles, I like to put them on facebook for my friends and family to see. It would be easy for people to interpret this negatively. More mature language would definitely drive the point home better.”

Seriously? People are worried about my immature language? Women are the majority of registered and active voters, and they control 65% of disposable income, and rather than protest illegal wars, or child abuse by the catholic church, or 60 years of genocide in Palestine, they protest a cop’s slightly impolite advice to take personal responsibility for personal safety?

And when I write about this in less-than-polite language, the problem is not the content but the language?

Here’s some language: Fuck you, idiotic hypocrites, your priorities are quite obviously fucked.

The article is about 585 words.
“moron” and “moronic” appear in the article 4 times.
“idiots” appears once.
“Asshole” does not appear.
“shit” and “bullshit” do not appear.
“cuntpickle” does not appear.

“fuck” did not appear, until I added it, now it shows up 3 times.

Thank you for your kind attention.

Publishers addendum: Fuck your friends and family. If they cannot handle this article, they are part of the problem.

Evolution of Understanding

May 5, 2011 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

When I first began writing about men's rights, it was from an evolution of the rants I had been writing about American politics. I was aware of the existence of feminism, but at the time believed more or less in the cultivated public image that feminism is a synonym for humanism. Writing on the topic of men's rights resulted naturally in substantial attention paid to the actual goals and produced outcomes of organized feminism.

What I found was an unpleasant surprise. The first wave of the feminist movement was one which had the overt goal of legal equality, wage equity, and political inclusion for women. These goals were good ones, and indeed, early feminists were justified in their demand for social and political equity.

What's not widely known about feminism is that it is not now, and has never been, a grass roots movement. It was conceived, organized and funded by bankers who actually run the corporations and governments of the world. Some of this was revealed by Nicolas Rockefeller to the documentary film maker Arron Russo. Some is revealed by the employment of feminist activist Gloria Steinem by the american CIA[1], and her relationship with Henry Kissinger[2].

What's grown out of that early and faux-humanist feminism is a dogmatic philosophy of female-centric socialism, driven by contempt for men. This is the political movement centred on the false tenet that society operates under a male conspiracy to oppress women. The pillars of thought which have emerged from this falsehood are a poisonous collection of ideals running directly contrary to a philosophy of individual civil rights; the real goal of feminism. It is a tool for dividing men and women against each other, destroying the strength of the family and making a society more pliable to totalitarian control. At this point, the tinfoil-hat comments should start flying. To anyone offering such commentary, a suggestion to re-read the previous paragraph, comparing it to modern realities, might be helpful.

Feminism's recognized purpose as a bludgeon against men, and a dividing force in society provides scope as well as increased reason for opposition. It also informs the focus of resistance to a movement manufactured by bankers to reduce our society to a mirror of orwell's nightmare. Men are the target of a top down astroturf social movement to fragment society, and it's men who are going to carry this fight.

An examination of a few public lies accepted as truth makes the utility of feminist doctrine to ratchet society towards a police state clearer.

Stopping violence against women.

This is a catch-phrase intended to confuse you. It implies that violence against women is a prevalent issue. A quick visit to the Bureau of Justice Statistics website shows clearly that for non-domestic violence, the principal victims by sex are men[3]. In contrast to this, in the realm of domestic violence, agencies purporting to address the problem of DV produce mountains of “awareness” literature and video, all addressing a view that men are the aggressors, and women are the victims. Unfortunately for anyone with a legitimate goal of reducing domestic violence, all of this propaganda portrays a false narrative.

The peer-reviewed research on DV shows clearly that the majority of DV is reciprocal – borne out of dysfunctional relationships. It also shows that in the minority of DV which is one sided, women are the primary aggressors. The research demonstrates that far from being some sort of helpless fragile species of rare flower subject to mythical male violence, that women are as physically aggressive, or more aggressive, than men[5]. That’s right, women are human beings, subject to all the same failings of reason and bad behavior that DV service agencies are so eager to pretend belong solely to the male 49% of the human race. But this brings us to the question of why. Why do the organizations claiming to “stop violence against women” maintain a public pretence that women are overwhelmingly the victims of violent men?

For the money, obviously. The maintained narrative Women-as-victims produces public sympathy, and taps into all of our traditional chivalric values, our natural desire to protect women. And in maintaining this narrative, these so called anti domestic violence agencies and service providers tap directly into everyone’s wallets.

And what of the the cost to men of being permanently typecast as evil violent subhumans? Who gives a fuck, as long as criminalizing masculinity keeps the money flowing. And as for stopping violence against the group most effected, well there’s no money in that, if you are male, and subject to violence, well, you can shut up and quit being a fucking sissy. In fact, you can man up, and just take it.

The subtler and deeper consequence of this is that men are kept on a defensive posture by the pretence that they’re evil violent patriarchs, while weathering the majority of all violence. As long as men are perceived as “bad,” they are ignored as a sex. Men are also prevented by this social marginalization from acting in their historical role as society’s defenders. It is not a coincidence that the social pre-eminence of feminist values matches the obsolescence of what we might call a stable family as the norm for most people, and the erasure of traditional and constitutional precepts of human rights and civil liberty. An itemization of the bill of rights, noting which articles still have any currency would be redundant, except to state as an imperative to anybody unfamiliar with the content. Go now and read it[5], and answer for yourself what remain of your constitutional rights.

The dissolution of your rights is actually feminism’s goal.

The continually escalating narrative of “protecting” women by affording them ever greater protection and privilege above and beyond the legal rights of “bad” men is designed to produce a society in which nobody has legal rights except for very few hereditarily rich, including those banking families everybody like to throw around the names of. Not even women, not even feminist tenured academics will have human rights in that world, because the men who would have protected them will be, and are being reduced to the legal status of furniture and appliances.

Any protection of the rights of a subset of humanity not identifying the protected as "everybody" is implicit suppression of the rights of those outside that group so "protected".

The insistence that women are, and have always been victims, and that men are privileged patriarchal oppressors is a potential achilles-heel of the use of female-elevation as a tool to ratchet western society towards a nightmare police state. It runs contrary to the real world experience of ordinary people, and ignores the real and obvious mutual interdependence of men and women in society. There must also be a growing cognitive dissonance in traditionalists and chivalric men between the narrative of women's oppression, and the accelerating disenfranchisement of males. How is it that women are oppressed by the patriarchy in a world where they live longer[6], earn more degrees[7], spend more of everybody's money[8], and the practice marital hypergamy[9][10]

Hypergamy for those who don't know is the socially normal practice of women marrying economically or socially upwards.

The simple, truthful answer is that women are not now, and have never been oppressed as a class. They are now, and have always been protected by historical chivalric values. Feminism is an amplification of chivalry, the protection and elevation of women. Taken to the currently absurd level, the elevation of women takes the form of subtracting rights from men. However the differential between men's disenfranchisement and women's legal and social supremacy is a temporary measure, and we are already seeing the levelling these differences by the abrogation of all people's human rights.

But dont worry, all of this happening as feminism rises to the pre-eminent social narrative – it's just a coincidence, go back to sleep.

Recognizing that feminism's unstated but real goals are the advancement of the interests of the few elite banking families who actually run this planet still leaves us with the bludgeon of feminism to contend with. But also informs a useful approach for the men's right's movement.

Chivalry must be recognized as a social malaise, and treated with the same contempt and scorn that open racism elicits. Most men are still raised to be traditionalists, and whether they adapt their behavior to something significantly less gentlemanly as they become adults, the core programming remains. This is why women can assault men in public without the near-certainty of a retributive beating that a man exhibiting the same behavior would earn. Chivalry has at it's foundation some deeply flawed assumptions. The first being that men are disposable. The antihuman ideal that the lives of men are worth less than the lives of women, or of children.

Women and children first – to the lifeboats, to medical funding, to receive justice, or financial assistance, to the front of the line for privilege. Chivalry is the basis for men dying on foreign battlefields to pad the income of oil companies. Chivalry is why 19 of 20 workplace deaths are men and this glaring fact isn't in the news while feminist academics continue to rend their clothes over an imaginary patriarchy keeping women down.

As men, we must turn our backs on chivalry, and destroy it's acceptance as a normal system of human value. There is more at stake than just our own continued marginalization. What's at stake is the human rights and freedoms on which western society is built. Chivalry is the basic poison bankers are using to transform the society born out of the enlightenment into Orwell's nightmare.

SlutWalks: Stupidity in a Tube Top

SlutWalks, the newest emerging fad in the Sexual Grievance Industry, appear to be spreading like genital herpes, and coming to a city near you.

Taking on the bizarrely distorted guise of a social movement, the initial gathering was sparked by a comment from a Toronto, Canada, police officer that women should avoid "dressing like sluts" in order to reduce the chances of being a victim of a sexual assault. The statement so outraged Canadian sluts that they have organized and are now gathering to walk the streets, defending sluthood from further attacks. Oh, and purportedly raising rape prevention awareness along with their discount store skirts.

Central to the controversy, of course, is the question of whether or not a woman's attire actually contributes to her chances of being raped.

The answer is probably NO.

After doing as much research as I have been able to do over the past several days I have found no empirical, or even circumstantial evidence that demonstrates that dressing like a slut is any more likely to directly result in being raped than dressing like a school teacher or a trash collector.

I would also add on a personal level that after reviewing several of the images from the SlutWalk, I am even more convinced that these women are not at any heightened risk of sexual attack, at all.

It appears our Uniformed Toronto Traditionalist was off the mark with his well-intentioned advice.

So naturally it set off a transcontinental firestorm of indignation and exposed cellulite.

And it furthered ideas about rape prevention so unfathomably bad and misleading that it makes our Canadian cop seem like the Einstein of sexual self-protection.

What else would you expect from a bunch of sluts? Remember, just because someone looks like shit doesn't mean they are not stupid.

We get a pretty good picture of the mentality that is driving this movement from the Slutwalktoronto.com "Mission Statement," which reads, in part:

"Historically, the term 'slut' has carried a predominantly negative connotation. Aimed at those who are sexually promiscuous, be it for work or pleasure, it has primarily been women who have suffered under the burden of this label. And whether dished out as a serious indictment of one's character or merely as a flippant insult, the intent behind the word is always to wound, so we're taking it back. "Slut" is being re-appropriated."

So to begin with, the founding SlutWalkers are not concerned about rape, per se. At least not near as much as they are concerned about being sluts in a world that looks down on them, well, like they're sluts or something.

The rape advocacy is just a tag on, a stab at respectability, for a bunch of shopworn anybody's babies that want to feel better about spreading their legs at the sound of "Buy you a drink?" with Pavlovian predictability.

I note that neither from the police officer in question, nor from the most ardent opposition to their cause, has anyone asserted that the sluts deserved to be raped.

With their newfound "re-appropriation" of the label, though, they do deserve to be called sluts. In fact, if you will forgive the non PC vernacular, they are totally asking for it.

Insomuch as everyone now appears to agree, both on the fact that they are sluts and that they do not deserve to be raped, we should be able to clean the residual scum off the streets go on about our business.

Ah, but we really can't. Not with any real concern for women who actually are victims of rape. Personally, considering men are the more frequent but utterly ignored victims of rape[1][2][3], and with the epidemic of false rape accusations[4] and corrupt prosecutions becoming just as pervasive, my interest in women who get raped any more is somewhere near as intense as my interest in cake decorating and midget wrestling.

But I am interested in two other things. One, in educating a miserably misguided and gullible public; and two, in pissing off feminist idiots; not necessarily in that order.

So, as a public service of A Voice for Men, I will tell you in just a few paragraphs how women can reduce their chances of getting raped, for real.

And that begins with a better understanding of the subject in question than you are getting from the SlutWalkers.

Here is the basic, undeniable truth: Dressing like a slut doesn't lead to rape; being a slut most certainly does.

Go ahead, don your Amy Winehouse couture and paint your face like it was a whore by numbers kit. That alone will not result in any unauthorized pipe laying.

But like it or not, PC or not, slut friendly or not, promiscuity does lead to the enhanced likelihood of rape. As even the most obtuse rape advocate will acknowledge, most rapes of women happen from known assailants, often potential or previous sexual partners. So the fewer football teams a slut fucks the less of a chance she has of being exposed to the linebacker who will rape her.

Now, by all means dress like a slut; just don't drink like one. We all know the slut scene is the party scene. But sluts might consider a policy of keeping their slutabrations alcohol free. Alcohol is involved in a huge number of rapes. It can impair judgment and lead to poor choices.

"Sure, uh, Johnny(?), let's go for a ride in your car out to the country. I've only known you though six shots of Hornitos, but it feels like I have known you all my life."

Many non-politicized websites, including this one, will advise, with no harsh judgments on sluttiness, that women not to go into unfamiliar areas with strangers when they are intoxicated and without friends or their own transportation.

In other words, they advise women not to be stupid sluts. If a woman is concerned about the possibility of rape in her life, she can stay sober when in new surroundings; stay close to friends and don't do things like go into an abandoned building with a stranger.

If he rapes her it will be his fault, but she will be just as raped, and the right to point and say it was his fault may not seem so beneficial at the time.

Just saying.

By following this advice about not getting drunk and getting into really crazy situations with strangers, you can also address another social ill.

False allegations.

Too many sluts, especially ones who really don't feel as good about being sluts as the SlutWalkers would want, have the nasty habit of feeling guilty after one or more of their drunken, fuck whoever is in the room escapades, and handle that guilt by accusing their erstwhile sexual partners of rape.

Happens a lot these days.

So, the less slutty sex, the less false allegation, which in turn increases the believability of women who actually are raped.

The impact of sound judgment is exponential and all positive!

All you have to do is know the difference between sexual freedom and sexual stupidity.

And that is precisely what the SlutWalkers don't know.

Their world is one of fantasy, where we can prevent female rape simply by telling men not to rape women.

Imagine that, all along we have been dealing with an education problem. Men don't know that it is bad to commit rape, so we just need to tell them. Just check out this short piece by Dr. Kathleen Young. It is all put as succinctly as saying "If a woman is walking alone at night, don't rape her."

Now, wasn't that simple? Get 10,000 potential rapists to read that stunning piece of brilliance and you will prevent who knows how many tens of thousands of rapes!

Next we tell people not to steal cars, break in houses, rob people or put catsup on a good porterhouse. Then we can stop locking our doors; leave our cars running with the keys in them and flash our money in seedy neighborhoods, and nothing will happen.

We no longer have to take any responsibility to protect ourselves or our property ever again, because we all know that people don't do bad things once you tell them not to.

Seriously, if you have done any reading at all through the statements from SlutWalkers, who have come to this site to comment on our articles, you know this is exactly the kind of bizarre, wildly unrealistic mentality they are promoting.

It is the mindset of people pathologically bent on having no responsibility whatsoever for their decisions in life, and willing to quickly forgo all common sense to get there.

I can do more for rape prevention, right now, by telling any potential victim willing to listen that anyone who tells you that you can't make choices that improve your chances for personal safety and well-being has an ulterior motive, and your safety is not a part of it.

Your choices follow you in life, even the one to be a slut.

Hate it all you want, but the red pill is a better choice because that mountain of truth isn't going to budge, even if the ground thunders with a million slutty footsteps.

A Pussy Pass in Italy

May 7, 2011 | by AntZ | Link | Original Link

The murder conviction of Amanda Knox is about to be overturned based on important new evidence: the convicted killer is an attractive young woman, and was not adequately advised of her right to a Pussy Pass.

At least, so goes the newest pampered princess narrative on CNN:

http://www.cnn.com/2011/CRIME/05/06/amanda.knox.profile/index.html?hpt=C2

The heart wrenching story begins with a series of baby pictures showing the killer as an adorable little girl:

1. Playing a guitar in a nighty at age 3
2. Wearing pink heart-shaped glasses at age 4
3. Dancing with her sister in matching red blazers at age 5
4. In a pink dress on her 7th birthday
5. As an 8 year old soccer girl called “foxy Knoxy”, with pony tails
6. Holding a puppy with her sister at age 9
7. Showing her “love of other cultures” in Japan at age 16
8. Surrounded by pink flowers, on her way to Italy at age 18

CNN could not be bothered to include a single picture of the evidence against Knox, or even of the victim.

The CNN article is called “Amanda Knox case resurfaces as key hearing nears”, but then makes only passing references to the upcoming hearing or the evidence involved. Instead, the majority of the article is a sympathetic description of Knox’s early life, her love of animals and culture, and her innocence. The article is so sympathetic to Knox that it can find only one sentence to discuss the evidence against her:

“Doubts over the forensic evidence used to convict Knox, 23, and Sollecito continue to linger. Knox has appealed her conviction and is awaiting the results of retesting of two controversial pieces of forensic evidence presented at her trial.”

The CNN article talks about the media portrayal of Knox, saying “the sordid saga has played out in worldwide media long enough to have broken into dual narratives.” The article then makes a passing reference to journalists who “paint her as a licentious, manipulative young American still trying to get away with murder, despite an alleged confession, which she quickly recanted, and a conviction.”

This single sentence is “balanced” with fifty-eight sentences describing an innocent, endearing, beautiful, and quirky young woman who is “the kind of person who would pick up a spider and take it outside rather than kill it.”

So who is the real Amanda Knox?

According to Italian police, Knox was so spoiled and over-pampered by her doting parents that she was driven to murder when, for the first time in her life, she did not get exactly what she wanted. Her best friend Amanda Kercher said “no” to Knox, and Knox threw a tantrum. Knox slashed Kercher’s throat, and watched as Kercher died a slow and agonizing death. Unlike Knox, Kercher was not an over-pampered princess of privilege who spent her life jetting around the world on daddy’s dime. When Knox decided she wanted a 4-way sex party with her boyfriend Raffaele Sollecito and her love interest Rudy Guede, Meredith said “no.”

That word cost her her life.

Maybe. Unlike the CNN article, I prefer not to worry too much about hear-say. Is there a reporter at CNN who can still spell the word “evidence”? Is there a prosecutor who is willing to examine evidence after a woman, or the feminist media, demands a Pussy Pass? Thankfully, at least one Italian prosecutor thinks so. So, let’s look at evidence. If you don’t care, skip to “PUSSY PASS”.

KNOX’S CONFESSION:

Confession evidence is notoriously unreliable, except with regards to credibility. So, let’s look at Knox’s credibility.

Knox confessed to the murder under interrogation. However, under Italian law, confession evidence is only admissible under strict conditions. The confession was judged inadmissible and is not available. HOWEVER, on November 6, Knox voluntarily wrote a hand-written explanation for her confession, and voluntarily handed this to the police. This voluntary, hand written note contains veiled confessions to participating in part of the crime. You can read the entire rambling statement here: http://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/worldnews/1570225/Transcript-of-Amanda-Knoxs-note.html

You may not be able to get through it. Ninety percent of it is self-serving drivel and snot-filled demands for pussy pity. Here are the parts that matter:

Knox was trying to deny her original confession: “In regards to this “confession” that I made last night, I want to make clear that I’m very doubtful of the veracity of my statements because they were made under the pressures of stress, shock and extreme exhaustion.”

Knox found her front door open and blood in her house and did not call the police, claiming to be in shock: “I know the police are confused as to why it took me so long to call someone after I found the door to my house open and blood in the bathroom. The truth is, I wasn’t sure what to think, but I definitely didn’t think the worst, that someone was murdered. I thought a lot of things, mainly that perhaps someone got hurt and left quickly to take care of it. I also thought that maybe one of my room-mates was having menstrual problems and hadn’t cleaned up. Perhaps I was in shock, but at the time I didn’t know what to think and that’s the truth.”

Knox was high on drugs and drunk: “I admit that this period of time is rather strange because I am not quite sure. I smoked marijuana with him and I might even have fallen asleep. These things I am not sure about and I know they are important to the case …”

Knox admits to visions of the murder, but not to the murder itself: “However, it was under this pressure and after many hours of confusion that my mind came up with these answers. In my mind I saw Patrick in flashes of blurred images. I saw him near the basketball court. I saw him at my front door. I saw myself cowering in the kitchen with my hands over my ears because in my head I could hear Meredith screaming. But I’ve said this many times so as to make myself clear: these things seem unreal to me, like a dream …”

How could Knox be in shock about the blood if she thought it was nothing?

PHYSICAL EVIDENCE:

Rudy Guede’s DNA was not found on the victim or on the murder weapon. His DNA was found elsewhere in the house, which matches his statement that he was at the home and attempting to convince the victim to have sex with him. He was convicted, probably because he was male, black, and “a drifter.” No pussy pass for him.

Sollecito’s DNA was found on Kercher’s bra clasp, which was cut from her bra. He was convicted. Hard to see how he could be innocent, given the evidence.

Knox was the sole contributor to DNA found on the handle of the murder weapon, and Kercher’s DNA was found in skin taken from the blade. The blade was carefully washed, but microscopic pieces of skin and flesh were embedded between serrations. Knox was convicted, but is now seeking a pussy pass re-trial.

REASONABLE DOUBT?

Confession under interrogation is unreliable, and I agree with the Italian court’s decision to throw out Knox’s confession. Hundreds of thousands of innocent men sit in American prisons because of false confessions obtained under interrogation. A good police interrogation team will convince anyone to confess to anything in 12 to 18 hours. Coerced confessions are basically meaningless.

A voluntary confession delivered in a hand written note to the police is VERY DIFFERENT. Why does Knox claim to have visions of the murder? Why does her hand written, voluntary confession neatly offer two versions of events, (1) Knox was not there, and (2) if she was there, she was covering her ears and not a participant in the murder?

The DNA evidence is extremely damning. Sollecito is certainly guilty, there is no plausible explanation for why his DNA would be found on a clasp that was forcefully cut from the victim at the time of the assault.

Knox could claim that her DNA was on the murder weapon because it was her knife. If so, why did the killer take pains to thoroughly wash the blade, but not the handle?

Sollecito and Guede both implicated Knox in various confessions. Again, jail-bird confessions are pretty much worthless, so who cares.

Guilt can never be established beyond all possible doubt. Personally, I think that the evidence warrants a finding of “proof beyond a reasonable doubt” (prova “al di là di ogni ragionevole dubbio”), which is the standard in Italy. This is a higher standard than “guilt beyond a reasonable doubt,” which prevails in the US. If two people descend alive in a small submarine, and when the submarine surfaces one of them is dead, there is no evidence of guilt, but clearly there is guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. This is why Italy is so strict concerning confession evidence. Physical evidence is the gold standard in Italy. In the Knox case, there is strong, but possibly not irrefutable, physical evidence. If I was on a jury, I would be convinced. But I can understand how a reasonable person can disagree.

PUSSY PASS

There is one thing we know for sure. Baby pictures and cute puppies have nothing to do with the facts of this case. If the evidence is weak, Knox should be found not guilty. If the evidence is strong, she should be found guilty. The evidence of cuteness and huggability that is so important to CNN is irrelevant.

The fact that new trials are demanded based on such Pussy Pass Privilege, and furthered in the out-of-court arena of the feminist media, is a testament to just how sexist and bigoted the system has become.

Pussy pass articles are mainstream and completely accepted as a normal part of our process for determining guilt and innocence in the court of public opinion. So much so, that CNN no longer bothers to discuss evidence in articles about attractive young female killers. Instead, the “news organization” jumps directly to baby pictures and pink parasols.

Vomit.

The Myth Of Equality

May 8, 2011 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

So you say you want equality?

Sounds great, as long as you're a moron. There's a social movement, the proponents of which regularly vomit up some variation of this noise about equality.

The problem begins with the fact that equality doesn't mean anything unless you're comparing two or more things. In the case of brain-addled feminists, they'll tell you: "between men and women duh! ".

Okay, now we know what's being compared, or we would, if anything was being compared.

Unfortunately there's no empiricism in feminism's brave struggle for "equality". We'll return to that shortly.

So what does the word "equality" mean? Don't ask for a useful answer to this, because the pushers of this vacuous bit of pseudo-egalitarian fluffery don't have the intellectual acumen or honesty to parse the question, much less answer it.

The real answer is that what "egalitarian" feminists mean by the word "equality" is whatever they want it to mean from one moment to the next.

Socially we can conceive of equal rights under the law, and equal access to opportunity for men and women. However, we can also construct social systems with a forced equality of outcome – such as hiring policies with a built in target distribution of sexes. Each of these can be, and are, encompassed with that euphemistic and flexible catch-all word "equality".

Politically active feminists and organizations have never pushed for sexual equality of rights or sexual equality of access, but certainly do push for equivalence of outcome – but only in cases where a net advantage to women can be projected. They mask this behind that fluffy, flexible word, "equality".

Has anybody ever seen a feminist pushing for equal numbers of male and female coal miners? It might happen, when coal mining becomes a job done from the safety of an air conditioned suite, without the multiple hazards male coal miners presently endure.

How about commercial fishing – thats a high paying job, why aren't any feminists pushing for more women in the north atlantic? Because the fisherMEN doing this job are routinely killed.

In fact, the push for equality of outcome isn't even truthful within its own corrupt context – It is a stated goal, not a real one. One of the long running campaigns of "equalist" feminism was university and college access for women, and feminism obtained that goal of equality through forced equality of outcome. A goal of equal access, pursued through mandated unequal access favouring women –

Do I need to include the dictionary definitions of hypocrisy or corruption in the body of this article?

The lie is revealed in the present preponderance of female graduates from a female favouring education system, while female favouring unequal access and systemic support persists.

Egalitarian feminism has produced a decidedly female centric inequality of both rights to access, as well as outcome. A move towards actual forced equality of outcome would be a move to benefit men.

Shall we consider what that would encompass? More male university graduates, but a dramatic increase in female job fatalities. By all means, let us have “equality” in all things.

Fortunately for those of a humanist bent, and feminists are excluded from that superset, Men’s rights activists are not arguing for a forced equality of outcome; we are not arguing for a mountain of female corpses to balance the men who continue to die in service of chivalry, female protection and female convenience.

Equality of rights is implied by the word equality, but is misdirection. Equality of outcome is actively pursued – but it too is not a goal, only a tactic to erode any area of male accomplishment. Where women have surpassed men – such as the feminist dominated realm of education, female favouring unequal access persists. But none of this is news to anybody with a brain. The only reason to discuss it at all is that we are numbed by repetition of the misleading and insensible mantra of “equality”.

This is a point of awareness, when you are told, in person or in print that “equality” is a goal, recognize the lie for what it is, and don’t allow the lie to pass unremarked. Your silence is consent.

The ongoing consensus misunderstanding that any such thing as “equality” can even exist as a concept is a mental straightjacket preventing complaint against subjugation.

In the world of reality, apart from the Orwellian super-double-plus-good-speak of mainstream political rhetoric, equality does not, and cannot exist anywhere outside of a mathematical equation.

No two things are equal. An apple is not equal to another apple, they are different. Certainly, a man is not equivalent to another man. A woman is not equal to another woman.

You may have a man and woman of equivalent education, as measured by attainment of academic credential, but are they equivalent? Certainly not. You may have a man and woman of equivalent age, or height, or weight, but if any two people can be said to be equivalent – then they are the same person.

Human equivalence is a dangerous dogma, in fact, its a dangerous religious dogma – and vacuous public concurrence with it as a legitimate, attainable goal is implicit support of an increasingly brutal apartheid.

There’s another way to state the farcical fraud of human equivalence – and it’s the dehumanizing cult of social construction. The absurdist fantasy that gender differences between men and women are learned behaviours. I mentioned earlier that feminisms holy crusade for “equality” abides no empirical evidence.

For feminist ideologues, social constructionism provides a whole array of scientific sounding happy talk, useful for ratcheting society towards realization of orwell’s nightmare.

The most obvious weapon against human rights provided by an ideological clinging to the pseudo-science of social construction is that if sexual identity is learned, then the “wrong” sexuality can be neatly classified as pathology. As quickly as you can normalize the idea that gender is a product of education, then turning the education system into a system of sexual indoctrination makes sense.

This this will likely emerge as a noticeable phenomenon in the near future, the transformation of universities and colleges into institutes of anti-male hatred and female infantalization. This might happen even sooner than predicted.

While sexual roles are partially learned behaviours, the problem with social construction theory is that it’s bullshit. The SC mandate is that we accept differences, expressed in musculature, skeleton, hormones, brain chemistry, reproductive biology as being tied to biology, but having no impact on human identity, sexual or otherwise.

Meanwhile, the mainstream of cultural zeitgeist continues to paddle us after the fictional goal of human equivalence, and the idea that human bodies are interchangeable all terrain vehicles. Soon we can all transplant our brains into mason jars or new cloned bodies.

But we’re all seeking equality.

Yes, go back to sleep.

Once More, This Time With Anger

I generally don't make it a habit to bite my tongue. That being said, I don't generally make it a habit either to go out of my way piss off the highly valued contributors to this site and other good MRA's across the sphere.

I am possibly going to make an exception to that last one now. Truth tell, I am too tired and frustrated to much care. We have a petition that has been sitting on the front page of this website to disbar Mary Kellett for weeks, trying to get 1000 signatures. We are not there yet. An innocent man's life and future are on the line because of a corrupt feminist bitch in a position of power and we are not there yet.

OK, so not everyone may think the case of one man is worth two minutes of their time, or not every supposed MRA blogger out there wants to dedicate space on their blog for the petition. Obviously that must be the case, because the petition is coming down in less than a week and we will be short of signatures.

Is anyone besides me sick of this shit?

So here is the deal. It has been suggested to me by a very well known and highly respected (at least by me) activist and confidant that I should consider shutting down the comments on this site in order to free my time up for the activism that I could be doing in its stead. Actually, it has been suggested for quite some time.

I have refused the idea so far because I think the comments are good venting, needed by a lot of men, and because I think they have helped with traffic and exposure.

But, gentlemen and ladies, I am starting to wonder if I need to make some sort adjustment here. And I think I have a plan. All of you, though, who have contributed sterling comments, funds to the site, written material, artwork and moral support might have something to say about this and I will welcome your opinions.

I am seriously considering making the commenting here invitation only, and only for activists that are contributing to this site in one way or another.

I know that is an extreme move, but the wisdom of lessening my daily activities here is becoming more apparent with the radio show going back on the air and especially considering that with the addition of Neal Hansen we are going to enter a new realm of activism that will demand even more time and effort.

AVfM has established itself with enough backlinks and consistent visits at this point that we are not likely to suffer too badly from the loss of traffic from non activist commenters, who generally contribute nothing to AVfM or the MRM.

I'd appreciate anyone's thoughts on this before I make the call.

In the meantime, here is another petition. It was posted here a week back. It is a petition demanding that Change.org create a petition category for men and men's rights. It is a brilliant idea and could be a viable weapon. But look at the abysmal number of signatures!

We get criticism sometimes, even among ourselves, that we talk too much and do too little. Some of it is warranted. So, with respect I ask everyone the following. Have you signed this petition? If so, have you posted it to your facebook profile? If you have a blog has it been posted there? How many other people have you asked to sign it? How many times have you linked to it in a mainstream forum while you were railing at them about some crappy misandric story they were running? How many MRA sites have you suggested it to?

I am not trying to tell anyone what to do, but I am suggesting to the activists that come to this site that it may be time that people who cannot give an affirmative answer to two or more of those questions within ten minutes of reading this may not be who WE want on this site sucking up air and doing little else.

An Introduction and a Challenge

Many readers on this site already know me, as I have written for AVfM under a different name. For reasons becoming entirely too common within the men's rights community, it is impractical to continue writing using the name printed on my driver's license.

Paul Elam has asked me to take a managerial role on this site, and I have accepted. That does not mean I will be proofing articles for spelling and grammar, as I know myself to be unqualified for that task. I will be developing and coordinating projects, some of which will reach outside the limits of this site. Paul and I agree that continued success of this movement will be driven by participation from skilled MRA's with the courage and intelligence to act.

That would be you.

Some of that action already takes the form of writing content on websites and blogs. It is a beginning, but the tide of social change loathes stagnation.

I have been recently told I should stop tilting at windmills and behave myself like a responsible adult; told that my effort is the pointless flapping of a child who hasn't learned to accept reality.

I've been told to grow up, in effect; to man up.

There are a number of sensible arguments against the advocacy of men's rights. At base, they are all appeals to fear and to force.

I've been told that the MRM will likely have little or no impact. This is already provably false – we're under attack – a very good sign indeed. Each of the innumerable, reasonable and logical arguments against my contrary attitude is at base an argument for apathy.

"There's nothing you can do, so it would be pointless and wasteful to try."

This is the most morally empty position it is possible for a human to take. The embrace of the idea of futility is a seductive rationalization which excuses self-responsibility.

Besides being amoral, the do-nothing argument is false.

Every major societal, social, technological change and paradigm shift in human history has been the result of the actions of small groups of individuals. A massive collective does not create change. A collective, a culture, a social demographic, or a society acts with a collective will to preserve and enforce the existing state of affairs.

Change has always, and will always come from the individual. For example, me – or perhaps you.

Consider this question, asked by a child:

Daddy, what did you during the rise of fascism?

I know my answer to that.

Do you? I ask that again. Do you?

The state of feminist governance is now bearing down on men with predominant aggressor laws, mandatory arrest policies; even lowering the standard of proof against us where it concerns any crime against a woman. And all this well after a tsunami of corruption eviscerating the civil rights of fathers and inflicting horrendous psychological damage to their children. There is scarcely a family court in the western world with a judge that does not deserve to be in shackles.

This are matters just scratching the surface of the perils we now face, and that our children will face in the absence of our resolve, or, in the presence of our cowardice, if you prefer.

We, this ragtag band of misfits, with computers and bloody keyboards, are the only ones speaking out against it. And people are starting to listen. Not yet in the numbers that will facilitate a positive outcome, but in number sufficient to instill fear in our opponents, forcing them to take the offensive.

When the voice of the contrarian is silenced, either by fear or force – whoever remains is either a prisoner, or a jailer.

Which are you?

More importantly – what do you mean to do about it?

AVfM Radio Returns

May 9, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box type=”note” style=”rounded” border=”full” icon=”none”]

I am happy to announce that after several weeks off due to illness and death in the family that AVfM Radio will be back on its regular broadcast schedule this Tuesday, May 10th at 9 :00 p.m. EST.

This also gives me another opportunity to thank everyone for their most appreciated support offered to Stacey and myself during the passing of her father, as well as thanks for your patience as I took the time off to attend to family matters.

We are bringing the show back with a bang. Firecracker relationship coach Dr. Tara Palmatier will be returning to the show in this episode, entitled “Crazy-Proofing Your Life.”

We have all come to appreciate Dr. T’s straightforward, no nonsense approach to arming men where it concerns the destructive force that crazy women can bring to their lives. And now you will get another chance to speak with her live, on the show. So be sure to tune in, call in, and raise your voice on this important subject. Here is the show description, in her own words, from Dr. T’s site, A Shrink 4 Men:

This program’s topic will be “Crazy-Proofing your Romantic Life (and Life in General).” Crazy, entitled, predatory bullies can be found just about anywhere—your marriage, your family, your office, your church, the PTA, your softball league, etc., etc. Therefore, knowing how to spot these types and how to deal with them if you can’t avoid them or go completely No Contact is essential.

I’ll be touching on some of the information from How to Crazy-Proof Yourself After Breaking Up with or Divorcing an Abusive Girlfriend or Wife, Part 1 and additional material. Like last time, we’ll be taking both male and female callers, so if you have questions or a story you’d like to share, please call or Skype in on show night.

Petition to Disbar Kellett to be Hand Delivered to Governors Office, State Attorney General, Others

May 10, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

With a great deal of thanks extended from the Filler family, it is my pleasure to announce that the petition to disbar Mary Kellett, the Bar Harbor, Maine prosecutor whose has maliciously pursued a false allegation of rape against an innocent man, has now reached over 1,000 signatures, and continues to grow.

And of course, for there to be any chance that the signatures will not have been given in vain, we have to make one more push, as activists and as human beings who believe in justice, to send the message of our concern and discontent to the people that matter.

Starting tomorrow morning, Wednesday, May 11th, at 9:30am, members of a delegation from Stop Abusive and Violent Environments (S.A.V.E.) and family members of the falsely accused in this case, Vladek Filler, will be hand delivering copies of the petition to state officials and making a plea on behalf of Filler, and for an investigation of Kellett leading to her disbarment.

This comes at a critical time. On Thursday, May 12th, there will be a court hearing in the Filler case where multiple motions will be heard. The motions will include a plea for a change of venue in the case, and pleas for outright dismissal.

The itinerary for the in=person visit is as follows, in order.

1. Attorney General William J. Schneider
6 State House Station
Augusta, ME 04333

2. Governor Paul R. LePage
1 State House Station
Augusta, ME 04333

3. State Of Maine Board Of Overseers Of The Bar
97 Winthrop Street
Augusta, ME. 04332

4. State Congress of Maine

5. Maine State Senate

And this is where you come in.

After your strident calls for the media in Maine to start paying attention to what is going on directly under their nose, The Bangor Morning News finally ran an article publicizing concerns over the case.

Following is a list of media outlets that should be covering the delivery of the petitions. There are no guarantees, but it is possible that with just a minute of your time to send a one or two sentence email with a link to the coverage at The Bangor Daily News to a few of the parties on this list, that you may well convince some of them to cover the event.

Remember people, evil does its business in the dark. Mary Kellett has been smugly pushing this case with hubris that can only come with imagined impunity.

Whether that impunity is imagined or real, is entirely up to us.

Note: There is no geographic disqualification! The only qualification you need to participate is membership in the human race.

Gentlemen and ladies, start your laptops.

Fight Back, Or Are You A Wimp?

May 10, 2011 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

Was his.[image]

This is the customized licence plate on a silver porsche. It's a porsche appropriated through court order in a divorce settlement. A woman who terminated her relationship with her husband, used the enforcement apparatus of the courts to seize a substantial portion of his possessions, and likely a cut of his continued income. The licence plate flaunts the legalized theft.

Look at me, I ripped off this car, and the court system helped me do it. The custom licence plate is also a warning. Men, What you own, we can take it whenever we want.

A photo of this car with its smug customized plate is easy to find on the web. Often it's found on web pages with some apparent humour about how stupid men are. Using the apparatus of the state to steal private property always makes me chuckle, in the same way I take sadistic pleasure from hurting small animals and children. That is to say, I don't find it funny at all.

And yet, it continues to be be presented as humour, and stupidly, the majority of us obligingly nod our heads and laugh.

But why? Why is this normal?

Why is it acceptable, or even funny that a woman exiting a relationship gets to steal a man's possessions? Why do the courts aid in this institutional thievery? Do we imagine in our collective pea brains that he must have committed some transgression, justifying the state's participation in forcible wealth re-allocation?

The sad reality is that men, the biological demographic being relegated to a class of human cash machines by a femi-chivalrist influenced society and legal system, are participating in this socially sanctioned thievery.

This is driven by several social factors, the first being that women control reproduction, as well as control access to sex. Since sex is a biological drive, most men will go along with an enormous boatload of shit and abuse because they're dependant on female approval to gain access to sex.

Gentlemen, we all need stop tolerating abuse in exchange for the idiotic hope of female approval. Unfortunately, most men aren't going to do this. The social conditioning we all grew up with has chivalry as a basic foundation. We believe deep down that as men, we're disposable. We also seem unwilling to offer any defence against our own exploitation and abuse. We also need to stop going-along with the horrible pretence that women's smug preening over our exploitation and theft qualifies as comedy.

Women, by the way – are not the enemy. The present social norms and legally tilted playing field currently afford women historically unprecedented social and legal privilege, and humans, when given an excess of privileges, will take advantage of them. Women aren't special in this regard. In fact – most women – fed on a steady diet of feminist dogma through all types of media – now believe themselves to be righteous recipients of ill gotten resources.

The smug pride of advantage taken, manifest in a licence plate reading "was his" seems like the most obvious signal of sexually unequal rights and privileges. Indeed, it should be obvious. But humans are supremely skilled at seeing only what they are comfortable seeing. Realization that you are the on the side of the tyrant is never comfortable. Humans are social animals, and social conformity is a powerful control on perception. It is easy for men and MRAs to fall into the trap of hatred, but it's unhelpful in addressing the MRM's goals, which are for human rights without regard to sex.

Meanwhile, we continue to see an escalation of contempt poured out onto men in all mainstream media. Is there any product for sale in the western world which doesn't use the "idiot male" stereotype in it's advertising? An illustrative list of this phenomenon in western media within this article would be redundant to most readers of AVFM.

The denigration of individuals based on their biological demographic is usually classified as a hate crime, unless the demographic is men. Setting the dubious legitimacy of the criminalization of an emotional state aside, at what point do we, as a society cease to laugh obligingly at the public hatred of ourselves?

The point of this discussion is not just one more detailed illustration of the problem of social misandry in our society.

The point is that we (read: you, men, not just MRAs) must complain, loudly, and repetitively when we are told we don't matter. We – and I mean YOU – must complain when your real pain and denigration is fodder for comedy.

Chivalry is a foundation of male socialization. We, (that is, men) are all raised to be self sacrificing in service of women, no matter how much of this we shake off as we become adults. Unfortunately the programming we receive as children runs deep. Our society's core values are now feminist values. Values based on chivalry, but exaggerated to toxicity. Men, (that's us, and yes – ill keep reminding you) as the demographic being passed around like party favours at a prison orgy are not going to be helped by anyone but ourselves. Men – (that's still us) are taking a legal, social, and economic shit kicking, and it's getting asymptotically worse. I hesitate to call this a war against men – because that would imply that men are fighting back, and besides a very few men identifying as MRAs, men have tolerated an escalating and increasingly brutal sexual apartheid with almost total passivity.

It's long past time to make this into a war. That means men (you and me, remember?) have to start fighting back against our own marginalization. When you are degraded, silenced, or robbed by the courts, for being male, your silence is consent. It is complicity.

Now, here comes the good part. You can actually do something about the figurative ass-fucking that men (that's you, remember?) are getting in this increasingly feminist society.

The simplest is to discard chivalry. I say simplest, you'll note I don't say easiest. Chivalry is an ideology based on your disposability. It’s based on the assumption that your life is worth less than anyone else’s because you own a set of external genitalia. Interestingly, simple as it is, excising the notion of male disposability from your value system takes balls, big ones. It also takes brains, and contrary to the universal depiction of men as dumb-shits in our media, you own a brain which it is now time for you to use.

So, gentlemen, are you going to start fighting back? Or is the dumb-shits stereotype accurate.

Paul Elam and I have begun assembling a catalog of simple techniques you can use to defend yourself. This is a document which will be continually growing. Your contributions to it are called for, and you should use and promote the tactics described in it. Importantly, as this “Encyclopedia of Male Defense,” which will be permanently stationed on this site, MUST be completed by the collective of MRA’s. You are the only ones free enough of the blue pill mirage to understand the problems and the possible solutions. And from the beginning, stop allowing anyone to pretend the exploitation and marginalization is funny, or that we are living in a patriarchy.

So What is a Zeta Male Anyway?

May 11, 2011 | by Zeta Male | Link | Original Link

By now I am assuming you have all seen Paul's video on the basic premise of a "zeta male". Paul's video is vague, but a good foundation. Still, you can't help but ask – what the fuck is a Zeta Male?

Well, the term comes the designations in the male hierarchy; labels like alpha male and beta male. The interesting thing is that one does not essentially choose whether to be an alpha or a beta, but you do get the luxury to choose to be a zeta.

The idea of the alpha and beta male are based on observations of leaders and followers in society; who are the best of providers, and who come in second. You grow up through your life being taught what to do; who you provide for and how you accomplish that. You protect and practice chivalry, and the social constructs and institutional ideas of what men should be are handed to you without reason or explanation.

Before you realize it you have been molded into the man you are told to be, and you fall into a category. You may be caught somewhere in between, but on the odds you still lean more towards one designation or the other. In the end, from a critical eye, and an institutional one, you will be branded whether you like it or not. You have been given a status, for better or worse, based on how you adapted to your upbringing, and a bit of luck.

The problem with the idea of alpha and beta males is that the traits are partially based on superiority/inferiority and they are actually rather constricting and come with the standard restrictions of manhood (the inability to show emotions, you must raise a family, and be the breadwinner, etc). You are given a code of conduct, and how well you do determines your worth as a man, and as a human being. Traditionally speaking, you either played the game or you forfeit by default. There weren't many options, and even alpha males were stuck in their role.[quote float="right"]You have been given a status, for better or worse, based on how you adapted to your upbringing, and a bit of luck.[/quote]

But no matter where you are, there is always a desire for freedom and change. Sometimes when there are few options, people tend to be happier, as they don't have the abundance of options, and never have to look back thinking, "I should have done X,Y, and Z instead…." But often, when there are no choices at all it brings a great deal of pain.

Especially when you see the alternative freedoms other people have. One of the few things feminism got right was the abundance of options that it gave to women. Now that men are starting to analyse all this more objectively, many are coming to a completely different view of their roles. When looking in comparison men have started to decide that how much life sucks as a man. Now, a growing number of men want options, too.

And so the Zeta Male begins to rise from the rubble of the shattered romatacizing of traditional masculinity. Zeta masculinity is more self taught and defiant toward traditional social structures.

Zeta theory tends to be the option of “abstain” from the game. You don’t forfeit, but you also aren’t playing. Zeta males have no intention of bending to the will of society for gender based purposes, and opt instead for self preservation. This is not an absence of morality or ethics, but rather breaking out.

[quote style=”boxed”]For the zeta, when he is told to do something because he is “the man,” his answer is a simple “No.” [/quote]

Social expectations of both alphas and betas (being providers, chivalry, etc) are tossed aside, and we refuse to see ourselves as inferior because of it. We are doing what we want, taking our lives into our own hands. The traditional, institutional notions of masculinity will be at our mercy.

The traditional ideals of masculinity are going to be clay in our hands. Zeta male theory lets us mold the social institutions to our will. But first we have a different goal: to take it down. Or, if you prefer, to watch it collapse and fall under its own weight doing nothing to stop it.

Despite public opinion, gender roles are still highly institutionalized in society, and within all institutions that are created. They can also be taken apart, and in the long run, that is what the goal is. It is not simply to step aside and run on a different path, but to open up all the paths to everyone available. Zeta males have every intention of breaking apart society, and building it right back up how we see fit.

[quote style=”boxed”]How do we see the new masculinity in its most ideal form? In one word – Freedom.[/quote]

The freedom to be who you are without shame, to take a professional career and family life of your choosing without being seen as lesser man.

In fact you might not even want to be seen as a man, and that is fine too. As long as you are who you want to be and can keep your head up high with pride you fit into the new design. For better or for worse, there is no shame in who you have decided to be as long as you are happy with it.

We don’t change ourselves for women, especially when it comes to relationships. If you don’t want to be with us for who we are, then you have no respect for us, and we don’t want to be with you. My time may be split to be with you, but my passions will not die for you.

It’s not just woman that we stick it to. Men are guilty of trapping others in the gender role. We will help pull you out of the pit, but we aren’t going to let you pull us back in. We aren’t going to contribute to the system that results in the fact that 80% of suicides are male. We want you to escape with us. Our hands are stretched out are you going to grab ahold of them or are you going to stay where you are?

And if anyone, man, woman, or child protests? Shut up, and get out of our fucking way. We are Zeta Males, and we aren’t going anywhere. You are.

Live Update on the Movement to Disbar Mary Kellett in Maine

May 11, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

I have just spoken by phone with members of the delegation of advocates currently in Maine on a mission to present key state officials with the petition to disbar Bar Harbor prosecutor Mary Kellet for an acute and chronic pattern of prosecuting innocent men for domestic and sexual crimes, in a manner reminiscent of, but far exceeding, the infamous Mike Nifong of the Duke Rape travesty.

The members of the delegation, which includes Dr. E Bartlett, Founder of Stop Abusive and Violent Environments (S.A.V.E.), Michael Parrotte, Founder and Director of Victims of Immigration Fraud, Mike Geanoulis, Director of the Comission on the Status of Men- New Hamphshire, and Tatyana Roberts, Vladek Fillers sister, are on a whirlwind tour of advocacy throughout the state government in Maine, half-way concluded at the time this is published.

Their first stop this morning was at the State Attorney General's Office, where they were received by an aid, who they presented with the petition that bears over 1,000 signatures and calls for an investigation leading to the disbarment of Kellett for prosecutorial misconduct. The aid promised to bring the petition to the attention of the Attorney General during the 10 minute meeting.

Next the group proceeded to the office of Governor Paul LePage, where they were met by the governor's Chief of Staff, John McGough. They also presented the petition to McGough during a 20 minute visit, and discussed the fact that 21 men have been prosecuted over the past several years by Kellett, all in a manner consistent with the same tactics she used in the Filler case. All the men were acquitted, but only after suffering devastating consequences to their families, reputations and financial lives. All this happened at a cost of millions of dollars to the taxpayers of Maine. The team was assured by Chief of Staff McGough that the information would be forwarded to the governor's Council of Advisors for consideration.

Bartlett described McGough's reaction as "interested and concerned."

The group is now breaking for lunch and will proceed afterward to the Bar of Overseers of the Bar for the State of Maine, and then on to the State Senate and State Congress.

Additionally, a press conference for the group has been arranged for tomorrow morning at 8:00 a.m. at the Penobscott Superior Court at 78 Exchange St. in Bangor, Maine.

Further updates will be supplied by AVfM as they come in.

Avoid Getting Fucked by White Knights, Feminists, and Manginas

Going to War

Several years ago, I stumbled across a document called "The Shaming Tactics Catalog". This is a list of 16 logical fallacies commonly used by ideological feminists to shame men and silence dissenting opinion. The Female Masculinist gave these tactics a thorough fisking, and a copy of the shaming tactics catalog sits on my laptop's desktop, and remains an invaluable tool when parsing the lies and abuse all MRAs must deal with when arguing for the human rights of men.

Since that document's creation, the Men's Rights Movement (MRM) has moved into a new phase. Specifically, the mainstream opponents of male human rights are no longer able to pretend we don't exist, and have begun to attack. Troublesome as this can be at a personal level, it signals the growing success and effectiveness of the MRM. However, as good as that development is, it requires adoption of a few new tactics by individual men.

We aren't simply a protest movement anymore, we're going to have to shift to a war mentality.

Does use of the word "war" seem inflammatory?

If you're new to the Men's Rights Movement, or you're a feminist, or just stupid, you might need a bit of background to appreciate the need for this article's content. A summarized background is provided for you here.

This is a war waged against human rights, and those of us who identify as MRAs are a tiny minority fighting an establish mainstream. The past and present attempts to personally smear and destroy individual men seen so far are just the beginning of a fight that we should expect to get ugly. While we must and do continue to adhere to strictly truthful rhetoric and ethical tactics, our opponents don't, and we should not expect them to. There's money to be made is denigrating masculinity, and we directly threaten the income of war profiteers.

It occurs that a document to compliment the shaming tactics catalog is needed. A logical name for this might be "Personal Defamation Defense Tactics". It must be noted at this point that a discussion of defensive tactics does not suggest adoption of a wholly defensive strategy. In fact, forthcoming discussion on this site and elsewhere will be focusing increasing on an offensive footing. The defense discussed in this letter should be treated as basic protective measures of anyone in a dangerous environment. As matters stand presently, we are a society of men being assaulted on all sides, but we've been socialized to walk around naked while our opponents flay us. Such easy cooperation with those who would harm us has to stop.

I will attempt in the remainder of this article to provide a foundation for such a defensive handbook, although I have no illusion that what I suggest here is comprehensive. It is a start. A complete Personal Defamation Defense Tactics document may be impossible, and certainly any useful version of this proposed guide will be a larger and much more complex work than the shaming tactics catalog.

Additions to this document are welcome, and should be submitted as comments to this article.

Just Because You're Paranoid, Doesn't Mean People Aren't Out to Get You.

As a man, you still have some legal rights on paper. Sadly, in practice you have almost none. You are at the mercy and whim of women and of a profit-driven legal system which views you as guilty by your sex, and which will fabricate excuses to for any crime against you by a woman. Does this sound like hyperbole? If so, then you haven't been reading the news. If you're an adult, wake the fuck up and take a few measures to protect yourself, because the law will not do so.

Find Out When Your Enemies Are Smearing You

When to use this : [all the time]

Google Alerts

http://www.google.com/alerts

This is a monitoring tool provided by Google which allows you to receive email notification when new content matching a specified key-phrase is crawled by google's indexer.

As a minimum, your name and your online username should be watched for – so that you will know who is lying about you, and when they do it.

Record Selected Phone Calls

When to use this [before sex, after sex, prior to a break-up, during a break up]

Where it is legal to do so, you can record calls on your cell phone using a number of free applications.

The android platform makes this especially simple with an application called "sanity" from Cristiano Tagliamonte.

http://www.appbrain.com/app/sanity/cri.sanity

One application of this is any time you've had sex with a woman for the first time. Phone her afterwards, in fact, do it immediately as you leave afterwards. Allow yourself no possibility that she won't answer. Make small talk, ask her how much she liked getting shagged, be sweet. And don't forget: RECORD THE CALL, because this call is recorded for quality assurance and training purposes, and to keep you out of jail. If, later on she decides for whatever reason to throw a rape accusation at you, you've got the recording to save your ass.

Where Legal, Use a Voice Recorder

A number of free voice recording applications for cell phones can be downloaded – but cell phones are generally kept in a pocket – muffling voices and rendering recorded conversations of minimal use. An external mic such as a headset can significantly reduce this problem.

Keep a Journal

Where to use this : [before, during and after a relationship with a woman]

This is particularly useful in situations of divorce, spousal separation and domestic turbulence.

If you find yourself at war with your wife or girlfriend a low-tech handwritten journal can save your life, and keep you out of jail. A history of “normal” journal entries prior to issues of conflict will be useful in establishing the stress and pain created by attacks against you by your ex wife or girlfriend. Use a notebook with a traditional binding – not a spiral bound or a 3-ring style binder. Also, never tear pages out of your journal, as that will be used to present a case against you of fabricating a false history.

Back up your records on removable media

When to use this : [all the time]

If you cover your ass by keeping emails, text messages, and recorded conversations – but you loose access to those files because your laptop is stolen or seized – then you’re screwed aren’t you.

Back those files up on removable media – and store the backup device in a separate location.

A two terabyte external hard drive costs about a hundred dollars.

Don’t share accounts with anyone, ever

When to use this : [all the time]

This is a mistake made by seemingly intelligent people and it’s easy to avoid by understanding the nature of digital accounts. By digital accounts, I mean email, instant message, online identities, bank accounts, credit cards, google accounts, and more.

A digital account with a username and password is an identity, if it’s your username and password, then it’s YOUR identity. Your wife doesn’t go in person to the bank wearing a disguise – dressed as you; that would be a criminal act, even if she did it with your blessing. If you share your usernames and passwords, you’re encouraging your spouse to masquerade as you. Even in a healthy relationship, this is a bad idea. Your digital-identity is your identity.

Failure to understand this will lead you to jail, or will cause your money, your house, your possessions, and your credit rating to disappear.

Don't share your computer. This is a tough one for the technically-challenged. Many couples share accommodations in a scenario in which there is only one computer. The answer to this is separate accounts. If you own the machine – DO NOT give anyone else an account with administrative access, a basic user account is plenty – and i'll note, more access than I'll give anyone on my personal computers.

And if you do share a computer – with separate user accounts, log out when you're away from the machine, and don't share your password.

If you think this is excessive – consider this scenario: Your girlfriend is angry with you, or she's dumping you, or you're dumping her and that makes her angry and vengeful. She visits a porn site and fills your browser cache with questionable, or illegal porn. Then she calls the police and accuses you of striking her. While the police are attending, she accidentally mentions your nasty porn habit.

Now you have no job, and a you're on the sex offender registry, because prior to break up – you bought into that "relationships are built on trust". In truth, relationships ARE built on trust, but if you conflate that in your mind with sharing user accounts, well, you'll be cooked.

Do you still think sharing passwords is no big deal?

Relationship Hazards and Red Flags

In romantic relationships, women enjoy almost supreme power. Every man in a romantic relationship owes his freedom from prison, his continued employment, and continued ownership of his possessions, including home, to the whim of his wife or girlfriend. Figuratively speaking, a husband or boyfriend is a man walking through life with an invisible, loaded pistol pointed at him. His wife of GF has her finger on the figurative trigger.
As a man, you wont be socially, legally, or financially destroyed in a divorce if you never enter into the legal entanglement of marriage. But since humans are social animals, men will continue to form romantic relationships with women. What they can do is ameliorate the hazards through a bit of awareness, and a few rules of thumb.

Do not get involved with single mothers.

A single mother is a woman who in most cases chose to have, or to raise a child without a father. This demonstrates terrible, selfish values. It also shows that she thinks of men as sperm donors and child support payers, NOT husbands & fathers. If you get involved with her, you are the next human cash dispenser, for somebody else's kid.

In addition, unless she's mentally unwell, her child will always take priority over you. This is just fine as long as you buy into the idea of men as exploitable utilities and yourself as a disposable appliance. If this is you, stop wasting the bandwidth of this site, moron.

The kid, by the way, has nothing invested in you, but may decide a good path to personal celebrity victimhood is accusing you of molestation. The reward to the child is huge, and the penalty to the child minimal, even in the event of discovery.

Do not involve yourself with strippers.

Strippers make their living in an environment where they are worshipped based on ownership of female reproductive organs, and breasts. Their customers literally throw money at them for nothing. The tips passed onstage to strippers from their drunken male fans are not generally payment for additional performance, they dance and take their clothes off regardless of tips. If you date a stripper, you are dealing with a woman who regards you as a subhuman cash dispensing appliance. In addition, a stripper will steal your possessions, attract drugs and criminals, and generally fuck your life up.

Additionally, strippers have significantly increased numbers of personality disordered women, many of them prone to violence, false allegation, histrionics and a variety of other short tracks to instability and drama.

NEVER buy fake tits for your woman

Fake boobs are a sexual advertisement. If your wife or GF wants them that means she's seeking to attract heightened male attention, generally with the idea that a man will pay the tab on the plastic surgery. This is the same as your employer advertising an opening in the job position you hold. New fake boobs means you are about to be replaced. If you pay for them, you are moron.

Do not date, period.

That does not mean don't get laid, though we remind all men that there is no RDA on vagina. We encourage you to consider that getting laid and dating are two very different things.

Dating is an artifact from the now defunct marriage 1.0 environment. It implies structured roles and concepts like courtship. All this puts men at a disadvantage, financially, socially and ultimately legally. See Roissy for good information on how to get sex from women without commitment, either emotional or financial. Or, just buy a whore. Dating, in the traditional model with the man paying and risking sexual rejection, can be best described as a negotiation with a hooker that might not deliver services after being paid. And it is a social norm that for many men, leads to consequences that far outweigh it's benefits.

This document is incomplete – your suggestions for additions can be submitted as comments to this article. The intent here is to build, though reader participation, a virtual Encyclopedia of Male Self Defense. We want to cover everything from protecting yourself from possible false allegations, to what to do after one is made; from how to handle yourself in a divorce (including how to prevent one by not getting married to begin with) to how to prevent paternity fraud.

Ultimately all the information will be organized and categorized for easy reference. It will be given a permanent, easily accessible page here at AVfM.

Summary of Hatred

May 11, 2011 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

A summary of issues fueling the need for an active Men's Rights Movement. The issues named here are discussed at length in other locations. In this document, they are provided as a list, consolidated into one place to illustrate the scope of the problem.

False Rape Accusations

Men are routinely jailed based on completely false criminal accusation of rape or child abuse. Police, Lawyers, and Judges are complicit in this abuse of the law.

Example: A Corrupt District attorney in Maine prosecuting false rape against Vladek Filler; http://falserapesociety.blogspot.com/2011/03/prosecutors-conduct-in-vladek-filler.html

http://www.fillerfund.com/latest.htm

Women who accuse men of rape are protected by legal anonymity. Men so accused are named and destroyed prior to any legal evidential inquiry. Anything that is subsidized will increase. Rape accusations are no different in this respect.
A man accused of rape is destroyed from the start. He is dragged, defenseless, through the tar-and-feather machine of the media, ritually named and shamed, severed from family and colleagues, barred from employment, publicly demonized before any legal or evidential inquiry is begun.

http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/uk-england-surrey-11676804
http://avoiceformen.com/2011/01/31/how-false-rape-allegations-destroyed-me-and-my-family/

Rape shield laws protect the accuser, both from scrutiny and condemnation for the increasingly common false accusation, and the standardized lack of legal consequences stand as an open invitation to accuse any man at any time with impunity.

http://www.ctv.ca/CTVNews/CTVNewsAt11/20001012/ctvnews76815/

Women caught in making false rape accusations are tut-tutted, and police will make formulaic statements about "waste of police resources", but never mention the lives destroyed by those accusations – even after they're proved false.

http://falserapesociety.blogspot.com/2010/12/false-sexual-assault-reports-strain.html http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/uk-england-berkshire-12404055

Male Gender Witch-Hunting, or Male Sex Witch-Hunting

This is prominent element of college and university life across North America. Events such as rape and d.v. candle light vigils, and walk events about violence against women are little more than rape and domestic violence witch-hunts which occur in open defiance of legitimate statistics and data on the issues being hyped. Also, male bashing events such as Vagina Monologues and Take Back the night are built on the foundation of male-hate, but have the hypocritical approval of the educational system and Politically Correct thought police.

Vigilante Justice

Metropolitan police departments have been documented publicly endorsing and funding civilian mob violence against men based on unverified accusations.

http://falserapesociety.blogspot.com/2011/03/philadelphia-sanctions-vigilante.html
http://www.courthousenews.com/2011/03/22/Zenquis.pdf

Blacklists and Slander

Whispering campaigns of slander, criminal libel and criminal accusation are being pursued against individuals who speak up. Erin Pizzey, founder of the women's shelter movement in England was ousted from her own movement by ideological radical feminists using this tactic.

http://byrdeye.blogspot.com/2008/02/most-dv-is-reciprocal.html

Organized campaigns to blacklist men and organization who refuse to comply with misandric lies, with the intent to bar them from gainful employment or from funding are underway now.

Murder Excused on the grounds of Being Female

Criminal courts now routinely manufacture excuses for female murderers when the victims are men. Effectively, this is the implicit legalization of murder when the killer is female and the victim male.

Countdown to Showtime at AVfM Radio

May 11, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box type=”note” icon=”none”]

OK, folks. After a gangbuster day of activism we prepare for the return of A Voice for Men Radio in forty minutes. Tonight, Dr. T is in the house, and she is going to offering up suggestions on “Crazy Proofing” your life.

As most of you know, crazy, abusive women are not confined to matrimony. Men encounter them in the workplace, at school or anywhere else. And many of you know just how miserable they can make your life. You also know they can utterly ruin it.

Just ask Vladek Filler.

So tonight, AVfM readers and listeners can contribute their stories in a discussion of how men end up in these predicaments and what they can do to prevent them.

Detractors will call it a woman bashing session, but it won’t be.

This is precisely the kind of dialog that men must start having as a matter of survival. With the state apparatus ready to indulge the most spiteful and vindictive agenda that a personality disordered woman can dream up, self-defense is a necessary strategy.

Don’t fail to listen to this important show, and by all means call in and share your story, get suggestions or offer your own ideas on how to crazy proof your life.

You may stop one Vladek Filler story from happening.

The Ultimate White Knight

May 12, 2011 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

I have recently watched my first episode of the show Dexter (no relation). Most of my friends know that I don't watch TV, but I downloaded and watched an episode after repeated suggestions from various people that I was missing something wonderful . "You'll love it", they assured me.

They were wrong. The show is feminist snuff fantasy. The title character is a forensic investigator specializing in blood stain analysis, who also happens to be a serial killer. What makes this show a feminist erotic fantasy is that the protagonist exclusively murders other criminals – which in the show's reality are men.

A genial, good-looking, high-status employee of the police who brutally murders "bad" men.

He's the ultimate white knight.

Police dramas are a longtime staple food group in the network broadcast menu, and while they're entertaining – they also send a universal message of authoritarian domination to the public. The police are the iron jawed protectors of all that is good and holy, and you, the dirty unwashed masses had better tread carefully in your speech and action.

The various CSI franchises present viewers with a distopian fantasy of the police's technologically aided omniscience. Story lines often pivot on the near-magical abilities of technicians to "enhance" tiny scraps of evidence and extrapolate lengthy, detailed and definitive proof of the bad-guy's guilt.

The hugely popular drama "24" reflected a rules-out-the-window approach to protecting national security, neatly securing the public's identification with "heroic" Jack Bauer – a character willing to torture, murder, illegally spy, and cheerfully shred the constitution in protection of the security of "the state". Meanwhile, in the real world, the Bush and Obama administrations disregarded Habeas Corpus, due process, freely discarded the 4th, 5th, 6th 8th and amendments. For anyone already anesthetized by the torrent of lies fed to them through their 75 inch flat screen – those amendments refer to the following protections.

- Amendment 4 guards against unreasonable searches and seizures.
  Like illegal wire-tapping, and invasive search by the Transport Safety Administration
- Amendment 5 protection from abuse of government authority in a legal procedure.
  Such as the president enacting laws through executive signing statements.
- Amendment 6 guarantees your right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed. As opposed to being imprisoned – without trial, for years in an offshore jail such as Guantanamo Bay
- Amendment 8 prohibits Cruel and Unusual Punishment
  Water-boarding and solitary confinement are both forms of torture

Also, in case anyone forgets, the Oath of the President is the thing he swears to do above all other duties at the hour of his assumption of office.

It reads as follows : “I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the Office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my ability, preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States”.

That’s his job: to protect the constitution, how well do you think he’s doing so far?

This is where television takes a shaping hand in the public’s perception.

For that matter, one of Obama’s most important campaign promises was to close Guantanamo Bay within a year of taking office. This would be a step toward a return to the rule of law. He’s been president for 2 years, 3 months so far. A Washington-Post article on the topic uses the title : “Guantanamo Bay: How the White House lost the fight to close it” to suggest to a credulous public that closing the illegal prison was ever intended.

Getting back to the idiot box: Cop-shows advance the propaganda goal of portraying state enforcers (police) as if they are the heroic everyman, standing up for the rights of the citizens, while unsubtly reminding everybody that the reach of the law (the state) is infinite and that you (the individual) had best mind your manners, stay in line, and continue being a good little tax paying consumer.

Advancing public storytelling to reflect a modern feminist ethic brings us back to Dexter (no relation). The title character titillates the show’s audience, but not by enforcing the actual laws enacted by the state. No, Dexter (no relation) indulges the ultimate feminist fantasy. He’s a damaged man – with the power of the state’s authority, and rather than enforcing the law, he simply slaughters the bad, bad men who conform to feminist ideology by all being killers and rapists themselves. Several other “good” characters in this show’s fantasy world know of Dexter’s murderous adventures – and provide cover for him. This complicity in serial murder is, of course all ethically justified, because the men murdered are, of course – “bad” men. If traditional cop shows serve the propaganda goal of reminding everyone just who has power and who doesn’t – what are we being told by Dexter?

Certainly, it couldn’t be that extra-judicially murdering men is acceptable. No, it couldn’t be that.

After all, we live in a patriarchy, right?

Press Conference Reveals More Corruption by Mary Kellett

May 12, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

In a surprising (or perhaps not so) turn of events, more information on a pattern of prosecutorial abuse and harassment by prosecutor Mary Kellett of the Bar Harbor, Main Prosecutor's Office was made public this morning.

At a press conference this morning at the Penobscott Superior Court Building in Bangor, representatives from Stop Abusive and Violent Environments (S.A.V.E.) spoke, reviewing the facts in the case against Vladek Filler, a man facing his second trial for the alleged rape of his wife, Ligia Filler. The case is being prosecuted with no forensic evidence against Filler, even after it has been proven that his accuser has a history of false allegations and lost custody of the couples children because of her abuse of them.

[image]
Members of S.A.V.E. present petition to disbar Mary Kellett to gubernatorial Chief of Staff John McGough
Dr. E. Bartlett and Vladek Filler's sister, Tatyana Roberts, spoke at the conference which was attended by The Bangor Daily News, WADI Television and the radio station for the Maine Public Broadcasting Network.

Also speaking at the press conference was Michael Webber, a local man now being prosecuted by Kellett for multiple counts of sexual assault, and his attorney, Steven Juskwitch.

In a staggering statement made by Juskwitch, it was revealed that the case against Webber is proceeding despite the fact that Webber has already been acquitted by a civil court of the same charges. In civil court, the burden of proof, the preponderance of evidence, is significantly lower than that of criminal courts in Maine, which is proof beyond a reasonable doubt.

Said Juskwitch, referring to Kellett's prosecution, "In thirty years of practice it's the most egregious case I have ever defended."

It is also reported from a conversation with Dr. Bartlett, that Juskwitch has defended 12 previous cases prosecuted by Kellett in which 9 of his clients were acquitted, and that he was familiar with another attorney who had also defended against 12 of Kellett's prosecutions with all 12 being exonerated.

"It's like she doesn't even care if she wins," said Bartlett, "She is just willy-nilly prosecuting anyone she can."

This morning's press conference comes a day after a tour of state government offices by S.A.V.E., presenting a petition bearing over 1,000 signatures to have Mary Kellett disbarred to the Office of the Attorney General, Governor Paul LePage, the Bar of Overseers of the Bar, as well as the State Senate and State Congress of Maine.

As this report is being published, Vladek Filler is in superior court presenting pretrial motions for a change of venue as well as dismissal of the case.

Dear Sluts (Part Deux)

May 12, 2011 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

In April of this year, the under-employed, over-privileged and over-fed women of Toronto took to the streets in what they called “slut walk”. This was in protest of a Toronto cop’s advice that to avoid sexual victimization – women “should avoid dressing like sluts”.

The admonition was poorly worded, certainly – but it’s obvious to anyone with three brain cells that Constable Sanguinetti was not, as slut-walkers continue to claim “blaming the victims”. In fact, he was arguing for personal responsibility in a demographic who seems collectively unwilling to grow up and take the personal responsibility that typifies the transition from childhood to adulthood.

The “slut walk” was wildly successful, and is now being emulated in cities all over the western world.

The public purpose was some confused combination of the totally-dumbshit intention to “teach men not to rape” and public princess outrage over the supposed victim blaming of Michael Sanguinetti’s remarks.

The success of slut walk was not in the achievement of either of those goals, because those goals were horse-shit. To start with, men don’t need to be “taught not to rape”.

There’s a couple reasons why not, and since many of the readers of this will be particularly stupid sluts, I’ll type the next few lines v-e-r-y s-l-o-w-l-y.

The vast majority of men have no desire to rape anyone. That tiny percent of the human population with inclinations toward rape are violent criminals of both sexes. Also, the concept of being “taught to not rape” is about as stupid as “teaching” murderers to “not kill”.

The funny thing is that everybody already knows this. Despite knowing it, we have a compliant public all indulging the fantasy that slut walk is a protest of any kind. Slut walk is not a protest. The participants are not protesters. They are plump, privileged princesses – flexing their pedestalized status and demanding the obeisance of nodding bobble-heads who mouth empty praise of the brave and noble sluts.

Not even the name of the event is true. They’re not sluts, rather; they are to actual slutdom what homeopathy is to the medical profession. For readers uninformed about homeopathy, it’s fraud.

I’ll state clearly what we all know, but that nobody seems willing to admit. Slut walk is possible at all, only because these privileged trotters are the most pampered, protected, consequence-immune demographic who have ever taken up public space in human history. Slut walk is nothing nobler than the indulgence of social privilege and the vacuous praise of overgrown children.

However, in this pretend outrage over victim blaming, the child-women participating in slut walks all over North America have chosen to make themselves victims. That’s the roll they’re claiming. They are insisting that the bad half of the population equipped with evil penises must not blame the victims.

Since every other part of slut walk is a lie, from it's supposed goals to its obviously phony name – I don't believe that claim that I shouldn't blame the victims either. So, to the psuedeo-sluts of liar-walk, I'll admit I do blame the victims. You are to blame for your victimhood, because it's what you've chosen. Everyone nodding, cheering and congratulating you knows it too – the whole thing – its just that nobody quite has the balls to say it first. And that's just one of the many services I provide.

You're Welcome.

Just In: Kellett Attempts, Fails, to Obtain Court Order to Gag MRA's

May 13, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Just a brief update on the Vladek Filler rape case. It seems there was more action in the case after the team of advocates from S.A.V.E. left Bangor.

According to sources, "The prosecutor (Paul Cavanaugh and Kellett's assistant) requested for the judge to issue a gag order to silence Vladek and the Men's Rights Activists. They mentioned the press conference and the MRA actions and websites, asking the judge to order it stopped. The judge refused stating he had no right to order the media or "men's groups" to stop following and covering the case."

NOR WOULD WE STOP IF HE DID.

Kellett is scared now, and should be.

I assure you it is not about the Filler case in particular. It is about the fact that there could be, as we approach the court date for Filler, a lot more media starting to ask questions about what Kellett has been up to for all this time.

If that happens, she is fucking done in the justice system, and her license to practice law is toast. And while I cannot promise success, I can tell you that AVfM has only begun efforts to expose Kellett's corruption to the world at large.

Mark my word on it.

The Lighthouse: A Beacon of Lies

May 13, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

I am not generally fond of going back six months to cover something. I am even less fond of it when it requires making any sort of reference to David Futrelle.

But recently a friend pointed to something in the comment section of one of his older columns, which unlike anything Futrelle himself writes, actually does warrant some attention.

Futrelle, it seems, has enlisted supportive comments from a domestic violence advocate that goes by the handle Christine. This person has very unambiguous views about the MRM and some of its more visible members.

For instance, regarding an article I wrote challenging the idea that women should never be taught personal accountability for rape prevention, which was admittedly worded in the most indelicate terms, she commented, on Futurelle's site:

"In Elam's article, there wasn't a question of whether the woman said yes or no. He is saying that if you buy her drinks, she gets drunk, makes out with you, and goes back to your room with you, then take what you want from her as she deserves it. Apparently, saying NO isn't an option to him. It wouldn't surprise me if he speaks from personal experience."

Christine said...

In Elam's article, there wasn't a question of whether the woman said yes or no. He is saying that if you buy her drinks, she gets drunk, makes out with you, and goes back to your room with you, then take what you want from her as she deserves it. Apparently, saying NO isn't an option to him. It wouldn't surprise me if he speaks from personal experience.

November 15, 2010 5:56 AM

Aside from the fact that this is an egregious, patently dishonest misinterpretation of what I said, Christine felt it necessary to also include the insinuation that I was a rapist.

Since I have never raped anyone you can imagine I don't much care for this kind of public insinuation.

This is either based on a failure to understand the intent of the article in the first place, or a lack of desire to understand before ever having read it.

The public insinuation that I am a rapist won't go without an appropriate public reaction.

She is not at all done with her "commentary."

She notes, in another Futrelle piece critical of Bill Price of The-Spearhead:

"The MRM is known as the "abuser's lobby" to those in the justice system and other criminal professionals and you don't have to read their websites for very long to figure out why".

OK, now I understand. All of us are abusers, and more, we are an actual lobby for the right to rape and beat women. Isn't this exactly what she is saying? Following this line of thinking, of course, she later concludes:

"I don't think it will be too long before Bill Price and the MRM starts to get credit for promoting violence against women, men (to them, 'manginas', cops, and even family court judges on the-spearhead."

Indeed, she is crediting us for it now, and would very much like to see others do the same. Following up on what can now fairly be described as a self-fulfilling prophesy, she yet again comments:

"@Elizabeth,Good idea, but Peter Nolan lives in Germany. Bill Price, the person who publishes this garbage, lives in Seattle, WA. It is my understanding that Peter Nolan is on some watchlists already. As he should be."

And now she targets Bill Price, suggesting that he be on some sort of government watch list.

For what? Practicing free speech?

Perhaps there is something to her strategy. In fact, I predicted at the moment I read all these insane reactions to challenging the misandric zeitgeist, that Christine would be getting some attention of her own.

But I do think, as long as she is calling people out by name, making unsupported allegations and calling for Gestapo tactics to be employed against anyone who disagrees with her, then we should help her, effective immediately, to compete on a level playing field.

Her name is Christine Armstrong. She lives and works in Robertsdale, Alabama. She's employed by The Lighthouse, a domestic abuse services program running on, among other things, your tax dollars.

Christine's work number is listed as 251-947-6197, and she can be emailed at bcfvdcd@gulftel.com.

And oh yes, here is her picture.

And for the record. My name is Paul Elam. I live in Houston, Texas and my picture is on the “Paul Elam” page listed on the masthead of this website.

And if anyone thinks these kind of fear tactics are going to shut me up, they better think twice. And even if someone manages to get state functionaries to shut me down, lock me up or kill me, more men and women will stand up and shout the truth till the rafters shake. It has already begun.

Men’s activism is not going anywhere. And unlike women’s advocates, we don’t need the threat of violence from the state to support our cause. We don’t need violence at all.

All we need to do is put some illumination on their dark intentions, and their deceit, because people are beginning to see and understand the sexism and avarice that fuels their entire industry.

Did anyone just hear that sound?

It was a light switching on…in yet another dark room.

Houston, We Have a Problem

May 13, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Just when you thought misandry could not possibly become any more grotesque, it rears its Medusa-like head and reminds you just how deep the rabbit hole runs.

The Houston Press, a Village Voice owned local entertainment rag, generally features food and entertainment reviews, along with excursions into politics. Their copy is generally sandwiched between escort service and "massage therapy" ads, and is occasionally interesting.

Apparently their product, like a lot of print media, is struggling to find consumers. So, they have decided to stop walking the low road and tunnel under it with a recent article, "The 10 Hottest Women on the Texas Sex Offenders List."

I don't make this shit up. I couldn't. Some of their victims were as young as two years old.

I could do 10,000 words on this and still spit nails hard enough to drive them into concrete. But I am not going to try to vent this out with an article analyzing every aspect of this scummery.

I am just going to share with you what I sent them, and offer up their editors contact below for those interested.

Dear Houston Press,

As a resident of Houston since 1981, and a human being for even longer, I submit to you that your article "The 10 Hottest Women on the Texas Sex Offenders List," represents a new, almost unimaginable low in, well, in whatever it is you people are doing there.

I spent 20 years in this city counseling people whose lives had been all but destroyed by alcohol and drugs. I can personally testify that many of those people began self-medicating their emotional pain as a direct consequence of abuse. And yes, more of them than you would imagine were men who were sexually abused by women.

Often what happens to these boys is made light of by the ignorant in a culture too myopic to understand the obvious. Being sexually victimized is bad for them.

I tell you what; I can probably make some phone calls and put you in touch with some parents whose young boys have been the targets of female sexual predators. Perhaps you could have Richard Connelly tell those traumatized, outraged and suffering parents just how fucking hot the predator was that molested their child.

Or maybe you should have named the top 12 hottest child abusers and done a monthly centerfold. You would have gotten a lot more attention and could have stretched it out far past the temporary bump you are getting from this.

Lastly, you have already assaulted people's sense of decency with this pathetic grab for attention. Was it really necessary to tack on an addendum that was equally insulting to our intelligence?

Connelly, adding on as an afterthought, pitches us with this: "I can understand how some people might react to this. On the other hand, it’s a way of getting readers to look at the info, maybe get them to realize there are people out there like this and they all don’t look like the obvious stereotypical pervert.”

I have heard more cogent after-the-fact rationalizations from pedophiles.

And the posted apology means exactly nothing as long as you leave that article up. But then, you already know that, don’t you?

You want to raise awareness? Take that piece of garbage down and post a public apology to every child ever robbed of their innocence by female predator.

Anyone who wants to send these folks a note can do so here.

Filthy Rhetoric That Is Not Safe for Work

"No, he did not ask me to have sex." — Anita Hill, in reference to Clarence Thomas, 1991

So I'm driving my weekly drive to a farm store north of where I live, on a road paved by guys who piss outside, in a car made by guys who tell filthy jokes on their breaks, looking at houses built by guys who whistle at women, when I chance upon a billboard set up by guys who vocally proclaim their love of tits, a sign that sounds an alarm about a very important issue:

[image]

You were probably misled by the "very important issue" phrase at the end of that last sentence. What I meant was that it's a very important issue if you're an unthinking, easily offended twit. Actually, it's an important issue in an entirely different way as well: It is naked misandry. It has nothing to do with protecting much-needed paychecks for desperate women who operate at near-poverty/slave wage levels or they'll starve. It is the degradation of male sexuality in its entirety. It puts women in charge at the expense of men.

It's much more than that, even. It threatens the economy, and thus the livelihoods of a great many men. Once those livelihoods and lives are sufficiently threatened, it will go on to indirectly threaten the livelihoods of the women making the accusations, and the great many women who don't. Then it will go on, like a cancer, seeking out some other vital organ in the body of voluntary society, and the only thing left will be the police state a few twitty-headed women and their alpha male boy toys have helped to, um… erect. When the veil of niceness no longer needs to be held up, those males will show the remaining sentient women the very meaning of "sexual harassment." Let's pray that never happens.

Once more, we aren't talking about women having their jobs threatened if they don't have sex with their big, mean, penis-hauling bosses. Nor are we discussing in any way, shape or form the dilemma of any man who finds himself in the same quandary with a gay male or straight female boss. (Heaven forbid.) Leaving aside the fact that no one has a "natural right" to a job that is merely a private contract between two people who consent to certain terms, and that your big, mean boss is more than willing to let you go get another job if you want; if we focus solely on the narrow definition of "sexual harassment" provided above, then we're talking about a phenomenon that affects hardly anyone at all. We will find, however, that modern feminism, in keeping with modern feminist tradition, has expanded modern feminist sexual harassment law to include just about anything that a modern feminist doesn't like, or that she claims many modern years later not to have liked, and left out entirely what any man out there may not like. In short, with sexual harassment law, it is men who are screwed, not women.

How screwed? Here's how: "Harassment can include 'sexual harassment' [Why is it in quotes?] or unwelcome sexual advances, requests for sexual favors, and other verbal or physical harassment of a sexual nature." In other words, sexual harassment is primarily composed of sexual harassment, and may include sexual harassment. The law doesn't define what constitutes "physical harassment of a sexual nature." It doesn't even bother to address non-sexual physical harassment (probably because it's condoned in government schools). But if you need more specifics, "it is illegal to harass a woman by making offensive comments about women in general." Start writing down what those offensive comments might be, and then memorize the list. No Freudian slips allowed. Discussion of the men's movement at work is verboten. Lovely German word: verboten. Making offensive comments about men in general ist nicht verboten. Dieser ist gut, ja? (Don't mention the war!)

Where exactly did this particular insanity start? Someone interested in doing more than three hours' worth of research per article could probably tell you, but when you're in training for being an old codger, it's usually sufficient to reminisce about your own experience with the bastardization of bastard law. For my generation, at least, that would put us around the cultural landmark of the Anita Hill/Clarence Thomas, What-a-plague's-been-thrust-upon-us Hearings in front of senatorial bastards.

For you young tykes who aren't old enough to remember the endless television footage of he said/she said, it basically boils down to this: Hill (the woman) claims, to this day, that Thomas (the man) made a few lewd references in front of her, asked her out on dates several times, never explicitly stated that her career as a tax-feeder was threatened, and then she continued to hang out with him in spite of his crudeness and interest in dating her. This makes him unacceptable as one of the Nine Gods the left currently worship. Thomas says it's all bullshit.

To be as even-handed as I care to, Hill's testimony is similar to that of other women. Thomas's former girlfriend, Lillian McEwen, claims that he had said "inappropriate" things about female employees in the past: "She said she saw 'nothing good' coming out of talking to reporters about Thomas, whom she said she still occasionally met." She's still friends with the lecher. Unbelievable. Whose fault is that, ladies? And this is not a woman who felt her job was threatened. Imagine that. "She spends her days in her Southwest townhouse. She frequently meets up with friends for movies, golf and other outings. Regularly, she stops by the National Museum of the American Indian for lunch." Yes, she's suffering horribly for her silence. A real Bradley Manning. "Through the years, McEwen said, she has remained reasonably friendly with Thomas." Later in the same article, it's the familiar refrain: "In her Senate testimony, Hill, who worked with Thomas at two federal agencies…" All together now: Are you making this up, honey, or was it, in reality, no big deal at the time? In short, there doesn't appear to be anything here to worry about, ladies. Remind me again: Why are we listening to you?

Maybe we'll find out by going back to the Washington Post article and listening patiently to Woman #3: "[Anita Wright's] story was corroborated by a former EEOC speechwriter, who told investigators that Wright had become increasingly uneasy around Thomas because of his comments about her appearance.

"But Wright also had problems that made committee Democrats nervous. She had been fired by Thomas, and previously by a member of Congress. She also had quit a third job in government, accusing her boss of incompetence and racism.

"Concerned about Wright's credibility, Biden lifted a subpoena for her to testify at the hearing. Instead, transcripts of the interviews with Wright and her corroborator were simply entered into the record, drawing only modest press attention."

How nice of Biden. He's so very concerned about women. According to a referenced entry in Wikipedia, however, "Angela Wright, who worked with Thomas at the EEOC before he fired her, decided not to testify but submitted a written statement alleging similar behavior, which Wright characterized as strange behavior but not harassment. Also, Sukari Hardnett, a former Thomas assistant, wrote to the Senate committee saying that although Thomas had not harassed her, she did feel that he had inspected her as a female [emphasis mine]." Stop inspecting females, guys. They wear the tight outfits because they shrink in the wash, and the makeup is only to conceal hideous battle scars.

Rumors abound 'round this eventful tale: right-wing and left-wing conspiracy theories, female jealously, untamed male sexuality, the Patriarchy, pubic hair, soap-operatic drama, you name it. People ought to be aware, though, that this story never would have become such big news, and probably never would have been "leaked" out of the FBI to begin with, if the man in question leaned more toward the feminist side. In fact, it could probably be whittled down to the abortion issue, if Madeleine Kunin's opening remarks can be taken at face value. Since he's much more of a "pull yourself up by your own bootstraps" kind of guy, he caught hell. He's an anti-woman, pro-bigotry, anti-gay, hard-line judge, a throwback to a time when men "disrespected" women.

I can't speak for women who don't want to wait nine months to be rid of unwanted children, but here's Thomas's danger to us homos: "In Lawrence v. Texas (2003), Thomas issued a one-page dissent where he called the Texas anti-gay sodomy statute 'uncommonly silly.' He then said that if he were a member of the Texas legislature he would vote to repeal the law. Since he was not a member of the state legislature, but instead a federal judge, and the Due Process Clause did not (in his view) touch on the subject, he could not vote to strike it down. Accordingly, Thomas saw the issue as a matter for the states to decide for themselves." Thomas wants to allow the coercive, death-oriented, conservative-minded "citizens" of Texas to go on ahead being silly if they want. Being a fag with a car, I can leave Texas fairly easily, or stay and "do it" on the sly. (Never actually gone there, and in spite of some of the beefcakier pics I've seen of a few Texans, I probably never will.) I can't leave America nearly so easily. That's why I don't want a bunch of federal boobs passing laws, either. If a guy, who understands the principle of not running to government every time you've got a bee in your bonnet, is also a guy who allegedly likes the other kind of boobs and allegedly enjoys sexual banter with women who appear to have no problem with it, then I've got no problem with him. Neither do the women, until years later, when his alleged hypnotic spell has finally worn off, and it all of a sudden hits them what that "pubic hair" comment really meant: "You mean it wasn't an appeal for greater sanitation measures in the cafeteria?! Oh, my God!!" Nonsense. The reason these women don't want him on the court is because the same idiotic state governments might outlaw one of their favorite issues. He threatens their control of the federal, alpha, hydra-beast. He has to go.

Here's the "sexually harassed" one concerning a comment she made to someone else about Thomas's fitness to sit on the bench: "I found him to be more open-minded. So that in that sense, I believe that he was better suited for a judicial position at that time than now. And that's all that I was referring to, that particular comment, or line of concern about [Thomas's] qualifications for being on the court." In other words, when he allegedly made the reference to a large penis, she found him fit to be a judge, and now, not so much. But she dances and dances around this one like Black Swan in heat. Here's more verbatim:

"Q. In your statement and in your testimony here today, you have said that you were concerned that Judge Thomas might take it out on me by downgrading me or by not giving me important assignments. I also thought that he might find an excuse for dismissing me.

"As an experienced attorney and as someone who was in the field of handling sexual harassment cases, didn't it cross your mind that if you needed to defend yourself from what you anticipated he might do, that your evidentiary position would be much stronger if you had made some notes?"

"A. No, it did not."

"Q. Well, why not?"

"A. I don't know why it didn't cross my mind."

Another Q. for you: Go home and figure it out before you bother us again. In the meantime, here is another limp-wristed reason for not standing against a pornography-eating, one-eyed monster: "A. During the time that I was at Oral Roberts University I realized that Charles Colthey, who was a founding dean of that school, had very high regards for Clarence Thomas. I did not risk talking in disparaging ways about Clarence Thomas at that time." Even the hint of a controversy, anything unpleasant in casual conversation, and women are no longer equal to men, but scared little girls, whose tea party has been interrupted by a dirty-minded ogre with hairy, smelly armpits. (Send him to my tree house, ladies.) So much for commonality and solidarity with other women, who will now be subject to the same abhorrent behavior, all because Hill was too afraid to open her lawyerly mouth. Allegedly.

In my view, the worst thing he allegedly did was ask her out multiple times when she said, "No" to begin with. He allegedly did this ten times, according to her, in a span of approximately two years. That's annoying, but less than one proposition every two months. A man can do a lot to impress a woman in two months. You never know. Try again. I did, five times with one girl. She kept saying, "I'd love to, but…" which, to my literal mind, meant she'd love to. No, she wouldn't. Maybe her gaydar went off. Good for her. I would've ruined her life.

Men who are sincerely interested in women do this because women have been known to change their minds, especially women who follow you from one job to another: "I want a career! No, wait. I want a family! No, wait. I want someone else to take care of them during the day so I can have both. I also want the men I work with to be nicer. Except when I feel like laughing at a dirty joke. I'll tell you when."

"I want a career, too!" cries Luisa Mendoza, mother of six because her iglesia tells her esposo not to wear condones on his pene or he'll go to el infierno.

"Sorry, honey, but I need someone to look after the kids while I'm subjected to one horrid reference after another to human genitalia. (That 'pene' remark was totally uncalled for, by the way. You'll be hearing from my lawyer.) Your career is in the daycare center taking care of the kids I want sometimes." And since women know so much about all sorts of harassment, the woman with the lesser "career" will know how to prevent it from happening to your kid. Being abandoned by the primary love source for nine hours per day does not constitute "harassment"! What a wonderful world we're building, no? Enough fake quotes, fake banter, fake childhood hurt, and real (but lousy) Spanish. Back to square one of this phenomenon we're stuck with. Here's the "victim" driving the lecher to the airport, long after the last alleged comment about mushroom-heads-or-whatever:

"A. I really don't recall that I voluntarily agreed to drive him to the airport. I think that the dean suggested that I drive him to the airport and that I said that I would." That's called "voluntarily." It's an adverb, meaning: "No one made me do it."

And now finally, the lecher, in his pitiful defense:

"A. Senator, I didn't create it in people's minds. This matter was investigated by the Federal Bureau of Investigation in a confidential way. It was then leaked last weekend to the media. I did not do that. And how many members of this committee would like to have the same scurrilous, uncorroborated allegations made about him, and then leaked to national newspapers and then be drawn and dragged before a national forum of this nature to discuss those allegations that should have been resolved in a confidential way?"

"Q. Well, I certainly appreciate your attitude towards leaks. I happen to serve on the Senate Ethics Committee, and it's been a sieve."

"A. Well, but it didn't leak on me. This leaked on me, and it is drowning my life, my career and my integrity. And you can't give it back to me, and this committee can't give it back to me, and this Senate can't give it back to me. You have robbed me of something that can never be restored." Pull yourself up by your own bootstraps, pal. Men can take it. Even if they can't, they're going to. Just follow the example of a strong, principled, self-confident woman like Anita Hill, the kind of gal who, when the chips are down, gets right back up and finds herself another job.

Thomas actually believes that if what Hill said is correct, that it would constitute sexual harassment. This is where Judge Doofus will dissent from Judge Thomas. No, it's not sexual harassment. It's just a rude, crude boss. If you don't like it, tell your boss, "I don't like comments like that." If you're too chicken to discuss it with a man you've followed through two assignments, why not talk to his immediate supervisor? Better yet, spend five minutes in the bureaucracy you've embraced and find another meaningless position with a nice-sounding title. Don't worry. We'll all pay for your cushy job without complaint. Get yourself a female, Mormon, virgin supervisor who isn't secretly a horny lesbian. As I pointed out in another article: "This is why feminism will never achieve equality: They demanded entry into a male-dominated workforce that was created, designed, maintained, debated, defended, embraced, and enjoyed by men. Since the vast majority of men are straight, this is how many of them act around each other [emphasis mine]."

I felt harassed at one job. Not sexually; just in general. A bunch of the higher-ups were apparently counting the minutes I spent outside on breaks, and whether or not I got on the Internet when there was no work to do (which was usually seven and a half hours out of every work day, a slump that they themselves openly acknowledged). I quit just as soon as I found out, after landing another job fairly easily, because I'm good at what I do. I also stopped drinking water so that I wouldn't be seen going to the bathroom too much, during the "two weeks' notice" bullshit thing you have to do. How's that for a hostile work environment? There's not going to be any tell-all book or Oprah appearances. They were just jerks, so I left. The end.

But Clarence Thomas is an educated black man whom the political left has no use for, so he can be thrown to the dogs. To these people, only a few men, and just a handful of black men, are worth anything. Once you step out of line, no matter your obvious physical attributes of manhood, you have no value as a man, and less than no value if you're dark brown. If Thomas had embraced the correct political ideology and thrown it a bone (so to speak) from the bench every once in a while, he could have multiple women going down on the alleged Long Dong, Jr. every day of the week and twice on Sunday, and no one would make a peep. That's what it's all about. That's what the billboard is all about. It's not about anything else. And just for the record, he says it never happened. He also happens to be highly credible and consistent, unlike some people.

To me, all men are beautiful, black men especially for aesthetic purposes; but all men for much, much more than that. They make stuff. They fix stuff. They help out. They hang out. Sometimes they tell dirty jokes. Sometimes they think you're cute. Usually, when you say, "I don't like jokes like that," they stop. If they don't, there're usually doors you can walk through.

I sometimes envy the poor Southern black men who get their food every day with a fishing pole alone, tugging whatever they catch back to a shack that keeps out the rain and little else. Sounds rather idyllic. Sounds rather increasingly idyllic to me. No easily-upset-yet-strangely-mute women to work or deal with. I find myself severely tempted sometimes, but not before making enough money to put up my own billboard:

Amanda Marcotte: Liberal Head, Bigoted Heart

May 15, 2011 | by prolescum | Link | Original Link

I've just been re-reading Amanda Marcotte's critique of Aaron Schock, whose supporters of "hyper masculinity" she pathologizes in The Guardian after he posed on the cover of Men's Health.

In the last paragraph of her article, Marcotte suggests that only the final destruction of traditional masculinity will allow men and women to interact in a meaningful way. This really brought a couple of things home to me:

i. Equality in law is not enough for feminists like Marcotte. Equality of opportunity is not enough. Forced equality of outcome will not be enough. No matter how pro women society becomes, it will not be enough for her because, not only is it not about equality, it is neither about getting a better deal for women. It is about destroying masculinity.

Why? Because:

ii. Feminists cannot handle difference. They come from a very distinct socioeconomic pool, and their privilege and education have alienated them. Sure, as liberals they'll celebrate diversity as a concept, but they've never had to experience it in the real world setting. They have never had to learn to negotiate a relationship with, and eventually understand and in some aspect be humbled by, someone who's very real difference of background, values, opinions, temperament and aesthetics makes them uncomfortable.

They develop in an environment where their ideology and politics are reinforced without scrutiny, to the point where they become such unshakeable truths that, in their minds, anyone who does not share their world view must be defective.

The result is aversion to difference, not the embracing of it. In their world the aesthetic and ideological reinforce one another and reverberate through academic, state and media institutions – outside of which they cannot operate.

In Marcotte's article, she indulges the liberal/feminist fallacy that the enthusiasm for sculpting the kind of muscular, traditionally masculine physiques you see on Men's Health covers is symptomatic of some kind of homoerotic attraction/repulsion complex. Her inability to cope with difference blinds her to the obvious; men's bodies react differently to exercise from women's.

When a guy is eating healthily, with the kind of food and portion sizes he enjoys, and doing a lot of exercise, he doesn't generally develop a wasp waist, slim thighs and diaphanous shoulders. He generally builds a lot of muscle. He may well orient more towards the weights than towards track, because he already has decent strength and knows he can quickly build muscle, burn fat during idle time and get a good dopamine hit. There's no homoerotic subtext to buff men – strong, healthy male bodies are just noticeably more muscular than strong, healthy female bodies.

But Marcotte can't accept that. For all her article's contrived levity, the punch line reveals her visceral discomfort with masculinity and shows that in her mind, equality means the extermination of difference.

Women and Trust, The Ugly Truth

May 15, 2011 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

[dropcap]W[/dropcap]omen control human reproduction. This has been the case throughout history. In almost all sexually reproducing species, it is females who select mates for reproduction, and males who compete to be selected. Humans are not different in this respect.

The invention of modern contraceptive technologies has not changed this fact but has cemented it. This means that women also control access to sex, and thereby control men and society at large. This is neither objectively good nor bad. It is simply the truth.

In the late nineteen sixties and early nineteen seventies what we now call second wave feminism rose to prominence. Many of the movement's stated objectives were simple matters of equity. These objectives; women's admittance to higher education, political office, the clergy, and the right to be taken seriously in courts of law, were met. However, they were not accomplished by force against the male dominated establishments of of education, politics, business and the church, but met willingly, by men who saw clearly that sex is no barrier to competence. Unfortunately, simple justice was only a small part of a movement which alert adults now correctly call a hate movement.

Women presently hold almost absolute control of the courts, the education system, the entertainment industry, the government, the family courts, and the police. That is not to suggest women hold the majority of jobs in those fields, rather that female-centric ideology is the dominant narrative. This wouldn't be a problem, except that this female centric ideology includes a deep and irrational hatred of men.

[unordered_list style="arrow"]

- As evidence of this, consider the documented fact that men are far more likely than women to be the victims of violence [1], at every stage of life. But in the United States, a special set of laws called the violence against women act exists on the books to provide extra protection for women, and a fast track to conviction for men, bypassing many of the checks and balances of normal jurisprudence.
- Based on accusation alone, our society will now utterly destroy the life and livelihood of any man of whom it is whispered: rapist. Conviction in a court of law; not needed, accusation is guilt.
- Family court judges and lawyers are increasingly admitting that frivolous abuse of protective orders is prevalent against men, and are cynically used as a routine tactic in divorce proceedings[2].
- Our society persists in a widespread hysteria, propagated by our media that within every law abiding, hardworking man, there lurks the heart of a kiddie-fiddler. That the word pedophile is applied almost exclusively to male perpetrators of this rare crime, while offenders if distributed by sex are approximately equally dispersed between male and female. [3] The 2008 US Department of health and human services report of child abuse indicated 42.6% of offenders in child abuse to be male, and 56.2 % being female. This report covered general abuse, including neglect, physical psychological and sexual abuse, with sexual abuse forming only 7% of overall abuse of children.

- In cases where an adult woman is caught sexually abusing a minor, she is described by the media using terms like “teacher”, “caretaker”, or “older woman” or simply “lover” – and her crime is called “an affair”. In cases where the perpetrator is male, it is called “abuse”, “sexual assault” or “rape” and the perpetrator is called “pedophile” – for the exact same type of crime.
- All domestic abuse in which the provisional victim does not leave after the first incident of violence means that two people, and not just one person, are responsible for the continuation and maintenance of that violent relationship. To presume that woman in such situations are powerless to extricate themselves is to cast for them the role of a child – for an adult woman in an adult relationship. To be sure, here are men who abuse their spouses, but to imagine that this happens in a vacuum and that women in such relationships do not equally abuse, assault, and instigate violence against their spouses is to live in a fantasy world.
- In cases where women are the primary aggressor in an abusive relationship, men assaulted by their spouses who seek outside help will find themselves not helped, but arrested, imprisoned, and stripped of their home and children by a legal system which starts with the basic assumption of women’s innocence, and men’s villainy.

[/unordered_list]

Our society is now to heavily tilted towards the criminalization of the male identity, resulting in the fact that there is no social, legal, or practical negative consequence for women who lie about abuse, violence, threats, or sexual abuse, or who use the law as a tool to denude men of their property, careers, homes, and children.

A man entering a relationship with a women does so on only on the hope and the trust that she will not exercise her social, legal, and political power to destroy him. This hope is founded on nothing but optimism, as there is no longer any de-motivator to women to casually and easily destroy a man for profit, or sport, or simple whim.

Women as a sex are neither inherently “bad” nor “good”, just as men, as a sex, are also simply human beings. Some are malicious, most aren’t.

Unfortunately, where advantage can be taken by individuals within a system, it will be taken. And the our society currently affords terrible privilege, power and exception from responsibility to women. Because of this, and in a climate where most elements of our society tilts toward a vilification of men and protection of, enablement of, and elevation of women; men cannot reasonably trust women.

That bears repeating : in this system men cannot reasonably trust women.

In relationships, the odds for men are stacked against any outcome except betrayal and destruction. Certainly, many women are not unethical, nor are seeking to exploit men's near non-person status in our society. Unfortunately, many women are seeking just that outcome. There is no social or legal obstacle to women who would exploit the system we now enjoy; the system where all men are bad, and all women are good.

Women, we men can't trust members of your sex in this system. There are admittedly few men alert to this fact as yet. The men's movement is just waking up, there will be more of us. This is not hatred towards women, it's just awareness and self preservation. It's a system established by over 50 years of feminism. It is apparently what your sex wanted, and now you have it. Or, maybe this isn't what you wanted. But if it's not, what do you mean to do about it?

Princess Miserable and the Great American Bitch Machine

May 16, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

I need to start, without hesitation, by tipping my hat to female MRA's and female traditionalists who actually stand by their men in sickness and in health, no matter what might befall them in life. I also acknowledge equalitarian women who work, contribute equally to their romantic lives in terms of finance and make some sort of effort to carry their weight in other areas of a relationship, like say, getting out of a car to help change a flat tire – or finding a reasonable compromise to a conflict in their relationships.

I also salute the many women who can't or won't be defined by these labels, but who nonetheless live lives rooted in self worth and self sufficiency.

NAWALT covered, I now need to spend the rest of my time on women that most of the men in the world actually have to deal with in life, especially as they get a little older.

This won't be popular with some. Straight talk about real women, regardless of age, has a strange effect on the blue pill world. Just check out some of the reactions from the feminists, manginas, white knights and even some of the tenderfoot-green MRA's over on reddit, to some of the articles posted from here.

It's actually quite comical to go in for a read. You can almost just see them, spittle flying over their keyboards as they hammer away in angry spastic fits, like manic Daffy Ducks on meth.

"Sthee! Stheeeee!! Ith's Mithogyny! MITH-O-GYN-EEE! He just hateths women!"

Well, no I don't. I don't hate children either, but I sometimes find them annoying, largely for the same reasons I am annoyed by a lot of women. Take that back, it is for exactly the same reasons. There is really no difference at all, except that if I correct a woman I am subject to persecution.

I was doing a cross country trip a few years back and had the CB on, trying to make time and avoid cops. I heard a conversation between two truckers; both sounded like they were middle aged or thereabouts. One was telling the other about how he kept a travel bag ready by the door every time he went home, so that when the nagging and disharmony his wife created became too much to bear, he could just pick up that bag and head right back on the road with no preparation at all.

An instant escape plan; one apparently that he had used a few times over the years.

The other driver said he understood perfectly well and then wondered aloud in the creative phrasing I'd come to expect from truckers, "I never could figure 'em out. A woman would rather climb over a barbed wire fence and crawl through cactus to start a fight than to just look you in the eye and solve a problem."

Then another truck driver chimed in out of nowhere to the conversation on the radio.

"That's because they're all children." he said, "Every last goddam one of them."

The radio channel fell into a silence that spoke volumes. Not another word needed to be said. Indeed, none was.

Now it is easy, obligatory for many and compulsive for others to conjure up a reflexive "blue pill" interpretation of the conversation; to boil it down to some dismissive charge of woman hating.

The only problem is that there is a lot of truth in everything that was said.

We do have, for a number of reasons, a pandemic of gross immaturity in western women. I just heard a few duck feathers ruffle – which means the squawking is not far off, but as long as I am going to get thumb-botted down by the pussy police, I might as well finish what I started.

It starts with fairy tales; Prince Charming to the rescue, mystical unicorns and the like. It gets solid reinforcement from the "Daddy" component of the "Daddy's little girl," equation and turns into a lifelong fantasy by many women that means a rich, handsome male supporter, lots of fulfilled whims and eternal adulation for being beautiful. All this comes with a commensurate lack of expectation that our porcelain princess will need to contribute anything to a relationship but her looks, and her needs.

Now, all this would seem easy enough to fix. Such unhealthy fantasies should be dispelled right around the time we tell children there is no Santa Claus, Tooth Fairy or Easter Bunny. We could tell little girls that when sexual maturity approaches that they have to "woman up."

But something else happens instead.

Daddy continues to treat little girl like a princess, thus imprinting the future expectations of other men. Mom often augments with bitch lessons. And altogether we set about, with every form and force in the culture, to help them maintain a collection of childish beliefs about themselves.

We give them "Princess" t-shirts and tiaras instead of the truth and a moral compass. And they wear that commercialized princess gear far, far past the point of reason. Often they wear it to the grave, even if just in their minds. They never know that to the mature mind they look like a middle aged man with a plastic devil's mask on, ringing a doorbell and shouting "Trick or Treat!" in a high pitched squeal on Halloween night.

There is just something awfully wrong with that picture. But they don't see it at all, because their minds are not mature.

And it sets up a pattern of perpetual disappointment and frustration that is the hallmark of so many of their lives.

Even before most women's looks start to fade, many of them are shocked to find out that Prince Charming is human after all, and that he actually gets a little tired of being held to royal expectations of what he is supposed to provide.

Of course, that means there is something wrong with him. So our western woman embarks on the path of so many western women. She dumps her Prince Charming, cranks up the hypergamous volume, and goes in search of a non-defective "man unit."

The self-help and women's magazine industry are quite tuned in to this (or perhaps they created it?), so they run constant "How to Get a Man to___(fill in the blank with your childish desire of choice)," articles, knowing that at any given time there are now literally millions of women readers who have just fired that last disappointing bastard and are on the prowl to find another one who recognizes their royal status as bearer of the sacred vajayjay.

They have not figured out that their relationship problems are in the mirror and with the help of all those who profit from such ignorance, they are not going to.

Then, despite having a better standard of living and more options than any human beings in history, they get even more miserable.

Enter the pharmaceutical companies. Sometimes a failure to mature and develop reasonable expectations has to be reinforced chemically. It is the prescription version of COSMO; the anything-but-accountability pill, and it comes in, you guessed it, blue.

Women's taste for anti-depressants now rivals their taste for chocolate, and that too, of course, is our faulty Prince Charming's fault.

A pattern maybe?

I am not sure, but something really seems funny to me here. Why is it that every dumbed down, fairy tale disappointment for women in modern culture leads directly to the illusion of being corrected by some sort of enhanced involvement in shallow consumerism?

It seems that women are generally in one of two states these days. They are either trying to make themselves into what the imaginary prince will buy in to, or they are immersed in their bitterness that he is imaginary.

Or, as so many women are want to do, they are doing both at the same time.

It seems to me that if women simply matured and developed reasonable expectations of men, as well as themselves, it might sound the death knell for COSMO, the entire self-help industry, the cosmetic surgery industry, the cosmetic industry, 99% of all psychotherapists and at least 10 very lucrative psychoactive drugs.

Oh, and they might actually find some happiness. With themselves, and with men who don't have to jump through stupid hoops to try to make them happy.

No wait a minute. That can't be. If all that were true then that would mean that women, as a class, are being duped out of countless billions of dollars of their (and their men's) money, year after year, either on the pursuit of a childish pipe dream, or their anger over what should be its obvious unattainability.

It would mean that all these entities, feminism, consumer products, psychology, media, advertising, politics and social custom had all merged into one Great Big Bitch Machine; that the modern female psyche is nothing more than a product of that machine, and that the woman attached to that psyche now has to go out to work a shitty job so she can buy and consume other products of that very machine, or get some man to do it for her.

And it would explain why the quality of her life and her happiness deteriorates with every passing year.

Nah, as my Other friend says, that can’t be.

It’s all because we live in a patriarchy.

Tuesday Night: SlutTalk Radio!

[box type="alert" size="large" style="rounded" border="full" icon="none"]

We will begin our next A Voice for Men Radio show with an update on the Vladek Filler case; a review of the surrounding media coverage and Mary Kellett's bizarre attempt to get a judge in Maine to order everyone on the entire planet not to discuss it.

We will move on from there, though, with a very special guest who attended the most recent "SlutWalk" in Vancouver, British Columbia. This MRA took the grand tour, interviewing several of the self-proclaimed sluts, asking them questions about what the SlutWalk meant to them. He will join us live on the program to translate their answers from Slutese to English, which should be quite an education.

There has been a lot of speculation about the real nature of the SlutWalks. I have heard every possible interpretation from social event to fashion statement to a Special Olympics parade for the facially and BMI challenged. Then, of course, there is the reasons given by the promoters, which is to insist that the world stop thinking that women can play a role in their own personal safety.

Not so sure about that last one.

Anyway, if you have your own ideas about the SlutWalks and what they mean, and I am sure you do, just call in to the show (or skype in if you are a registered listener) and let us hear what's on your mind.

Of course slutologists, amateur or professional, are welcome to give their opinions as well. We are all about inclusion here.

Berkimer of False Rape Society to Appear on Mainstream Radio

May 16, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Tomorrow, Monday, May 16th, from 11:00 a.m. to -12:00 noon, PDT, Steve Berkimer of the False Rape Society will be on Newstalk 1380 broadcasting from Southern California discussing false rape/sexual assault claims, with Andrew Pari, on his “Chasing the Why” show. The show can be listened to live at http://tunein.com/radio/KOSS-1380-s26278/.

A copy of the broadcast will be posted to FRS shortly afterward, which I will also steal and post in the sidebar here (if they let me).

Way to go FRS! This movement is moving because of men like Steve and Pierce!

Calling All Sluts!

May 17, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box type=”note” size=”large” style=”rounded” border=”full” icon=”none”]

[image]Are you a slut? Then A Voice for Men Radio wants to talk to you (no really, baby, just talk) about the SlutWalks.

We seem to be at a loss of understanding what the SlutWalks are all about. And to make things worse, none of the women we know around here are sluts, so they really can’t help either.

But you can. If you happen to stumble across this post (I don’t mean to imply you are drunk) then please, listen to program live in the sidebar of this website, or go to our show page here. The show starts in less than two hours, at 9:00 p.m. EST.

In the U.S. you can give us a shout at 1 (310) 388-9709, or, international sluts can skype in if they are registered with the show. Tell us your side of this really unusual story and let us know why you think SlutWalks are something we can all learn from.

And guys, you can call in too, and gives us your thoughts on the SlutWalks, or just your thoughts on sluts.

Don’t Rape a Slut Day

May 17, 2011 | by Walter Romans (TDOM) | Link | Original Link

---

Supporting the Rights of Sluts Not to be Raped

Dear Slutwalkers,

In support of your recent protests and assertion of your right to dress, act, and be as slutty as you damned well please while maintaining expectations of not being raped; I declare this to be Don’t Rape a Slut Day. Further I pledge that I, a man who has not yet nor ever will rape anyone, will not rape any sluts today or any other day regardless of race, creed, amount of eye shadow, or color of lip gloss. I shall support your right to assemble herd, take no responsibility for your actions, drink yourselves to oblivion, degrade and demean yourselves, and commit public acts of debauchery in a rape free environment. I support these rights and encourage others to do the same despite the fact that by definition, the word “no” is used only rarely by anyone referring to herself as a slut. However, on those rare occasions when a member of your culture herd does make use of that word, I believe that she means it. I pledge to encourage others to do the same.

I can assure you that no slut faces any threat, in fantasy or reality, from me. Slutty attire and behavior does not turn me on. Therefore, even if I were a rapist (which I am not); I would not be inclined to rape a slut. In fact I would not be inclined to place my dick into a slut even if she had the last hole remaining on the planet.

However, regardless of my support for your right not to be raped; I must state emphatically that you have no right to demand I give you my respect. I reserve the right to give my respect only to those whom I actually deem worthy. I have no respect for sluts. You may take back the word if you like, but I do not see how you or anyone else can define a slut as meaning anything other than a dirty, slovenly, immoral, dissolute, or loose woman. I will, however, support your right to be as dirty, slovenly, immoral, dissolute, and/or loose as you wish. Though I do not respect you, I bear you no ill will.

In support of Don’t Rape a Slut Day I have composed an anthem. Helen Reddy penned the original lyrics to sing about her newfound self-esteem after becoming involved in the women’s movement. Since SlutWalks symbolize what the women’s movement has become and has achieved for women, it should be sung to the same tune.

I AM SLUTTY

I am slutty, I’m a whore
Legs spread too wide to ignore
Laying flat up on my back waiting for you.

‘cause I’ve done it all before
And have the right to do it more

Just try and stop me if you think you can

Chorus

Oh yes I'm a slut
It's men I've got to blame
Yes, I've felt the shame
And I've soiled my good name

If I want to, I can fuck anything

I am loose

I'm irresponsible

I am slut-tee

My dress will make you want me
But you have no right to take me
Until I spread my legs for men across the land

I may cum but never go
You may think I'm just a ho
In these streets I will make my final stand

Repeat Chorus

Have an orgasmic Don't Rape a Slut Day.

Manuel,

Shhh… We're not allowed to talk about it.

The new Internet Blacklist Bill the Protect IP act [COICA 2.0] shows so little regard for free speech and Internet freedom that it would actually ban people from having serious conversations about the new Internet Blacklist Bill the Protect IP act [COICA 2.0].

Please help us fight this legislation, which is far worse than the first Internet Blacklist Bill, by forwarding our petition to your friends. You can use these links, or cut and paste the email at bottom.

If you're already on Facebook, click here to share with your friends. If you're already on Twitter, click here to tweet about the campaign: Tweet

The bill would block "information location tools" from pointing to sites suspected of piracy. So that means that we couldn't send you an email just like this one with links to the websites that were being prosecuted. It's not an exaggeration for CNET's headline to shout, "Senate bill amounts to death penalty for websites."

They say the draft bill "would certainly sweep in Google, Yahoo, and search engines, and may also cover many other Web sites." Please help us fight the new Internet Blacklist Bill the Protect IP act [COICA 2.0] by using the Facebook and Twitter links above, or by forwarding the email below to your friends. Thanks for standing with us through this fight.

The White Knight Problem

Within the Men's Rights community, the epithet "White Knight" is one of the most disparaging insults possible. However, to people outside the men's rights community, this might seem like the relatively mild rebuke of the word "hero."

This comprehension failure is built on a lack of understanding of what a "hero" actually is. A hero is a disposable human male, most often put in harms way to dispose of other human males. A hero can die in other ways, but that is the fundamental definition. That the hero is disposed of in a way we imagine is glorious or noble doesn't change the fact that he is fodder.

We reward the hero with our praise and admiration, as we lower him into the ground and go about our untouched, thankfully inconvenienced lives. We celebrate this social construct, but it is obscene. A male human being to be used for a dangerous, dirty, or damaging purpose, and discarded. That is a hero.

In a modern context where technology renders the discarding of humans unneeded for collective survival, the obscenity is magnified. Pile on top of this a feminist zeitgeist in which those sacrificed are heaped with contempt for their sex, some word stronger than obscene is needed. Humans for use to their destruction, for no reason except the convenience of the privileged. A human kleenex.

This is all aggravated by the unfortunate continued public denial of the legal and social elevation of women and the denigration of men in our culture. Everyone is aware of this problem, but most people – including men, and especially White Knights, are busy rationalizing, denying and pretending it's not there.

Men are stupid[1], deadbeat dads[2], rape culture[3][4] (false pretense that women are the first and only victims of rape[5][6], patriarchy theory[7], the wage gap[8] – these are all cultural "truths" without substantive reality to back them up. But they're accepted as real. Individually debunking these lies is beyond the scope of this article, but interested readers can check the links in this web page's footer.

White knights are traditionalists, and heroes, and within western culture, they are a toxin. These are men who practice chivalry. White knights are males who defend women, but not because women are people – which might be noble. Rather, they defend women only because they are women. This almost always encompasses a willful blindness to the behavior and utterance of the women so defended.

Any moment now, somebody will begin screeching the word misogynist, or woman-hater, in an attempt to derail the discussion and re-cast this article as an attack on women.

Is it you doing the screeching?

I'll digress briefly to address this. In my writing, I am often critical of people, ideologies, ideas, social institutions, laws, and traditions. When the subject of my criticism is women – I often attract the accusations that I hate them, am violent towards them, am a potential rapist, and so on. So, I've included this paragraph, which I may also include in future articles. If you offer the commentary I've just described, you're lying, and you know you're lying. I have nothing but contempt for liars, and I will not waste the keystrokes correcting their lies. Indeed, this paragraph was copy-pasted from a previous one.

That's how many keystrokes those lies are worth.

Getting back to women mindlessly defended by white knights, shouldn't women be defended? No, they should not. People should be defended. Women are obviously a subset of the larger set we call "people" – but the distinction is important, and it's where White Knights come back into the picture. These heroes are males who defend women no matter how outrageous, violent, bigoted, or histrionic the women they defend are. The results of this female pedestalization are often violent, and sometimes murderous, revealing White knights to be antithetical to the human rights of men, and of women.

Women defended by men who willfully ignore their violent, racist, or criminal behavior are infantilizing the females they defend. Because chivalry is a major force in male socialization, this goes beyond individual cases and is a major social factor in western society. We are witnessing the escalating transformation of women into overgrown emotionally arrested children wielding the social and legal power of putative state functionaries.

Does anybody think privilege without responsibility is good for anyone individually, or as a biological demographic? Individuals rendered free from accountability – as if infants with adult powers and privileges are miserable human beings, and contribute very little to anyone besides pain.

A nearly perfect example of this was provided by the stabbing of two deaf men in a Florida night club [9]. A stupid, violent, entitled 45 year old princess named Barbara Lee witnessed two deaf men conversing in sign language. Being herself an ignorant criminal, she deduced they must be members of a rival gang, throwing challenges in their own gang's hand gestures. She approached these men and began signalling her challenge using gang gestures. They waved her away. She left the establishment, located two suitably stupid and violence prone male defenders aged 19 and 17 – and goaded these chivalrists into the stabbing assault on the two deaf men.

[image]
Underneath the lies, this is what a damsel in distress and white knight look like.

Every report of this fails to address the problem at the base of this event. The gang affiliations of the antagonists are given as the reason for this violent episode. The assailants were indeed members of a gang, but focusing on that misses the point. The moron: Barabara Lee left the bar, recruited the help of her white knights, and came back to direct the knife assault on the two deaf men. Chivalry in defense of a stupid, violent cretin of a woman is the social pathology which directly caused this violence. Chivalry is the masculine expression of feminism – and the two pathologies two sides of the same brutal coin.

There are endless examples of the same phenomena throughout society. And we begin to see unmistakable parallels between these kinds of events and what our justice system has become.

Probably, even white knights can recognize this at an intellectual level if it's pointed out. But that won't stop any of them from stupidly, mindlessly jumping to the violent defense of the very next woman who deliberately instigates conflict over somebody's real or imagined insult. The resulting violence has it's roots in chivalry, and we won't be a society of adults until we universally recognize chivalry as a social pathology equivalent to racism. Chivalry must be treated with the same contempt and scorn we reserve for the racism that led to lynchings of blacks in the American South.

White knights, the enforcers of chivalry, deserve our censure and contempt. They are the muscle of a violent, hate propelled ideology calling itself feminism, and telling us we live in a patriarchy.

Walk a Mile in My Shoes?

May 19, 2011 | by Izzey | Link | Original Link

Everyone knows the expression, “Walk a mile in my shoes.”

I heard someone say it just the other day, and it got me to thinking about the shoes I have worn in my lifetime. Women wear many shoes. They tend to represent what we do, where we are going, and for many women, how we are getting there.

It also made me think about what my mother has always said, “Just make sure that when I die, you bury me with my slippers on. I want to be comfortable in heaven.” (she waitressed for many years to keep a roof over our heads, and was a bookkeeper for her second job). Her feet always hurt at the end of the day.

Finally, it made me think about the shoes that men wear; shoes that women have judged them by, literally and figuratively. But let us forget about ‘fashion’ for a moment, and look at some of the particular footwear of many of our men.

When women talk about shoes, I don’t suppose a lot of them have these images in mind. While they are buying a pair of the latest fashionable boots from the hottest ‘designer of the moment’, many families are affected and grieving for the men who have donned, and lost life and limb, in his particular footwear.

That alone makes me think about the men that still can wear their boots or shoes, only now they never really touch the ground because of their newest method of transportation. I am talking about the ones that managed to survive wearing those shoes; the ones that came home unable to walk in them.

When I hear some woman telling me how shitty her life is because she didn’t end up with the ‘perfect man’ or the lifestyle she always envisioned for herself– I think of these men that went to war and came home in this condition– with an attitude that far betters any expectations that any of us pity-pot civilians could ever hope to have for ourselves in our normal whiny-crying-nit-picking lives.

Hearing women whine always leads me to other places, like a domino effect; wondering what complaints feminists are currently screaming about. I wonder if any of these men are their sons, brothers, fathers, or uncles….and have they gone home to those women in this condition, and are they being abused by the self-righteous indignation of a woman that could never understand what is expected of men, or how often they rose to the occasion without question.

I would love for these women to walk a mile in any one of their shoes.

Yes, that was sarcasm – for women who think they can do what men do, or think they have sacrificed what men have sacrificed for us. Since the time men stood guard, like living, breathing barriers between women and children and something that might tear them to shreds and eat them; to now, today, when answering the call of duty and laying everything on the line for a small paycheck that will put food on the table.

Yes, that was sarcasm. Well-deserved sarcasm.

No means no. Sure, whatever.

Men who are unjustly accused of rape can sometimes gain from the experience. Catherine Comins, Vassar College Assistant Dean of Student Life in Time, June 3, 1991

When I was in college, I spent a lot of time (but not all of it) biting my tongue and sitting in barely tolerable silence as I was inundated with bullshit from a plethora of preachy and pedantic pedagogues (quadruple alliteration – no extra charge). I heard enough recitations of crooked social research and fanciful theory that I wanted to drop acid just to make things seem normal.

Such is the sorry lot of an arts major with a desire for independent thinking.

I thought I had it bad, but I was certain that within ten years, maybe twenty, that freedom of thought and speech would return to the university setting, wrested back from the brain dead ideological thieves that stole it away.

It is not the first time I have been embarrassingly wrong.

Delta Kappa Epsilon, a long standing and iconic fraternity has been banned from recruiting or undertaking any activities on campus for five years. The decision, announced by Yale College Dean Mary Miller, was made because of allegedly pro-rape chants made by fraternity pledges. To be specific, the chants included, in part: "No means yes, yes means anal," and," "My name is Jack, I'm a necrophiliac[sic], I fuck dead women."

To be sure, those are some pretty off-color words, as one might expect from the still teen aged pledges in a college fraternity. But Yale administrators, who assumedly would have a more seasoned capacity for reason than your average pimple faced kid during frosh week, somehow managed to elevate the tasteless antics from being just that, to being serious, threatening advocacy for rape that required swift retribution. I suppose on behalf of dead women as well as the living.

The stupidity of this position is only exceeded by its hypocrisy.

Take a moment to consider the quote above from Catherine Comins. The statement, clearly one of such insensitivity that it can only be rooted in hatred for men, is just a miniscule example from a pattern of bigotry and elitism that has pervaded western academe for four decades. And this is bigotry that does not result in discipline or repudiation, but in promotions, tenure and growing collections of obsequious acolytes that parrot their sentiments like so many sieg heil's.

And God help the uppity male that says anything that upsets them.

For the purpose of clarifying the intent here, I will point out that your average women's studies textbook references more hateful ideologues than a Simon Wiesenthal hit list.

I could take you through an exhaustive examination of the misandric ideas that infest feminist literature, but I will just link you to the short list here. If you are an MRA you already know about them; if you are a feminist you already know about them and don't care. So I will leave it at that.

But whether you accept it or not, taking an honest look at the ideas of gender ideologues only leaves you with one sane conclusion. A feminist ousting a fraternity from a college campus for questionable speech is like the board of Dow Chemical fining smokers for air pollution.

Oh, and then there is this one other tiny little problem. No doubt, the biggest offense in this hullaballoo of hyperbole and hypocrisy was the statement "No means yes."

Oh yeah, that is the cardinal sin; the unforgivable insult; the unfathomable transgression on the sensibilities of all these self-proclaimed vanguards of truth and enlightenment.

I'm certain that while they were gathering pitchforks, lighting torches and mobbing up to go after these teen Frankenstein's, that they didn't bother to consider the fact that it is true.

"No means yes" is no less accurate or meaningful than "no means no." Life is often too complex to be addressed in platitudes.

When it comes to how most women communicate sexual interest, no often means yes, or it means maybe, or it means try harder, or it means not now, or it means a veritable grab bag of possible realities other than just a simple and honest "no."

Of course, sometimes it actually means no. But if you can run a college without knowing this shit, no wonder our education system sucks as bad as it does.

I know, the terminally clueless will want a citation, so here we go.

A study from the National Institute of Health. From the abstract:

We found that 39.3% of the women had engaged in token resistance at least once. Their reasons fell into three categories: practical, inhibition-related, and manipulative reasons.

Ok, now we have a valid source telling us all what we already knew, that women are not reliable verbal informants about their own interest in sex. All this claptrap about consent and permission slutwalking across the western world is feminist drivel, to put it in the most polite of terms.

The question now becomes what to teach young men about this reality, which seems in light of the climate on college campuses, painfully important.

First we teach them that even though women don't know that no means no, they need to regard a no as such. Not to prevent rape, but to prevent their own persecution. In fact, we are rapidly approaching the time in history where regarding anything short of a written, notarized request to have her brains fucked out should be regarded as a no.

And even then it would be better have two witnesses, from foreplay to finish, that will testify she repeated consent throughout the process, and never, even in the throes of passion, uttered a word that even rhymed with "no."

Think I am kidding? I'm not.

But in terms of their public words, especially on a college campus, there is another lesson we'd best pass along to young men.

Lie, young man. Lie your ass off. Tell women, especially female university heads, exactly what they want to hear. It is not just a harmless romantic tactic, or an innocent indulgence to get along with childish women any more. It is a survival tool to save your education, your reputation and maybe your skin.

So then, No means no? Sure thing. Absolutely right. Women NEVER say no when they really want you to push harder for sex.

Women make less than men for the same work? Of course, you betcha. Truer words never spoken. Evil ass male glass ceiling.

1 in 4 women will be raped by the time they are 18? You're damned skippy. Lots of bad, bad men out there or at the very least a few of them doing a whole lotta rapin'. Either way, that number is right. No need to verify the source, or scrutinize how they defined rape.

Women don't lie about rape? Of course not! Man, I can't even believe you brought up such a hateful, misogynistic idea!

Prepare to graduate with honors.

And if you ever need a refresher on any of this, just ask the guys at Delta Kappa Epsilon. If, that is, any of them are willing to open their mouths at all.

The eventual outcome of feminism, part 1

Lecture No. 10

"The founders of a new colony, whatever Utopia of human virtue and happiness they might originally project, have invariably recognized it among their earliest practical necessities to allot a portion of the virgin soil as a cemetery, and another portion as the site of a prison." – Nathaniel Hawthorne

It seems sensible, at this stage, to pose the question: why is all this happening? The answer I can offer up, for the purpose of this lecture, is not historical but psychological: it offers explanation through reference to the mental state of feminism's operators. There certainly are historical processes at work, explored elsewhere, but no social movement survives purely for the sake of its history. Nobody is born a feminist. There must be some stimulus, or stimuli, working to remodel formerly non-feminist women and men into activated feminists. But we cannot explain feminist conversion by the agitation of those already existing feminist activists. We can certainly believe that feminist activism plays a role in recruitment, but this is not adequate as an explanation. Why would an individual then commit to *feminism,*rather than any other particular social movement whose advocates engage in agitation for the purposes of ideological recruitment?

It must be that feminism offers such individuals something that other movements do not. I propose that, by opening up space for perfectly satisfying, collective man-hating, feminism offers a form of catharsis eagerly seized upon by those already predisposed to misandry. There are probably as many rationalizations for misandry as there are individual feminists – we would have to explore the intimate details of an individual feminist's life, particularly her mental culture, to come to a conclusion about when and why she decided to blame an entire sex for each of her inconveniences. What is common to them all is hostility to masculinity, i.e. maleness. When the initial excitement brought about by mutual indulgence in sexual hate has died down, the lines of communication between feminists remain open. Feminism provides more than the opportunity for catharsis. The feminist soon realizes that she need not restrict herself to echo chambers, but might try her hand at real change. A thrill rushes through her at the thought of not just disparaging, but actually hurting men. Backed up by an extensively organized, generously funded and institutionally- connected movement – one that enjoys a rosy reputation as defender of that greatest virtue of our time, equality – she sets to work. Feminism is a misandrist's dream.

Implicit in what I have written above is the corollary that feminism*does not create misandry.* Feminism promotes, endorses, reinforces, organizes and aggrandizes misandry, but it does not generate it outright. A woman who is not antipathetic towards men will not become so upon exposure to feminist thought. More likely, she will recoil at its odious philosophy. Feminism simply provides a space for women and men who were already misandrically-inclined to congregate and make plans.

The forerunner to feminism was traditional Gynocentrism, a self-sustaining social system which taught women that men should sacrifice on their behalf, and taught men that they were defective women. The female privilege inherent to this sexual ecology was undoubtedly accompanied and reinforced by animosity towards men – the 'flawed' sex – most particularly those men who did not conform to the Gynocentric role expected of them. Feminism departs from this model, not only in the sense that it provides organization for this misandry, but also in the instability of its operations. Feminism relentlessly demands greater male sacrifice for the benefit of women. This is a process to be intensified without an end point. Such a process lacks forward planning or any semblance of equilibrium. Ever greater constraints are placed on the very class of people whose labor and genius sustains the social order in which feminism can thrive. The parasite is killing its host, and will either be purged or die along with it. Feminism is simply not sustainable.

But it is not as though feminists think in these terms. Despite their forays into such recondite subjects as jurisprudence and post-modernism, feminist thought ultimately resolves to the validation of primal emotions. The central tenets of Western-style justice systems, evolving as they did under patriarchy, aspired to impartiality and objectivity in all proceedings. We speak of habeas corpus, the right to trial by jury, the presumption of innocence, punishments which fit rather than exceed corresponding crimes, and so on. That these doctrines of civic freedom have lasted for so many centuries is testament to the integrity of the generations of men who inherited them. Feminists, in their efforts to replace these 'outmoded, patriarchal' institutions, do not engage in anything like the deep thought that begat their careful construction. Much less do they entertain the notion of impartiality. All feminist legal innovation – whether it is introducing the presumption of guilt (for men), advocating an inquisitorial rather than adversarial trial system (for men), or proposing that women should not be punished at all when they commit crimes – flows from the same source: the violent and vindictive emotions of individual feminist operators. Feminism is so dangerous because it exists to validate these emotions, and to assign them a permanent place in discussions over how society might be better organized.

The success of feminism in this regard can be appreciated when we consider the popularity of collective guilt, anathema as it is to the principles of neutrality and impartiality underpinning our liberal justice systems. Collective guilt is an emotional discharge, a visible effect of concentrated class hatred. It is an attack on the verifiable truth of individual moral agency. Under a system of collective guilt, one's actions have no bearing on one's fate. Human beings are sent to the gallows for the circumstances of their birth. There is no purpose for trials, or any institution which exists to ascertain the facts of the case and to assign guilt. Guilt is already assigned; the facts are irrelevant. What follows collective guilt is collective punishment.

Feminists are not yet in a powerful enough position to deliver collective punishment to the entirety of the male sex. Instead, they cast as wide and as deep a net as possible, hoping to snag as many men and boys as they can. Wherever an individually identifiable man appears on their radar, he becomes the latest pariah, even if the accusations against him are weak and unfounded. This is irrelevant; all that matters is that he has been identified. Then, he becomes the target for unbridled angst, a public piñata, an effigy of all men, of maleness itself. He becomes the personification of the entire male sex, and the collective punishment that feminists yearn to deliver unto all men is inflicted onto him. Even after he is proven to be innocent of all accusations, the attacks intensify, as though the reluctance of the world to acknowledge his guilt is an even greater injury than the charges brought against him. In a short while, he will be forgotten, and a new whipping boy will be discovered. Until that time, feminists will try to outdo each other in editorials, speeches, and in the comment sections of newspapers and weblogs, calling for the most grotesque mutilations and acts of violence against him.

An impartial legal system, which treats human beings as individuals, is a barrier against collective punishment. To do away with it altogether would allow for the punishment of many more men, on the basis that they are men, which is why feminists have fought so relentlessly to overturn impartiality. Bit by bit, feminist agents within government, academia and the legal system have replaced individual moral agency and the rule of law with the micro-management of people. As the mantra goes, the personal is political – it is, increasingly, the business of the state. Even when not explicitly framed like this, the underlying principle of all feminist innovation is to bring the state to bear down, ever more closely, on our personal, everyday existences. If the personal really is the same thing as the political, then political correctness must be*personal correctness* – a perverse and pervasive system of control which scrutinizes an individual's every move, in order to lock him into place. You must be personally correct, in terms of your beliefs, your desires, your pursuits, your tastes – right down to the jokes you are permitted to laugh at – according to their standards. *They*being the self-declared 'victims' of society, who are nevertheless powerful enough to enjoy lunch with the President and set out the terms on which the government is to run your life.

The idea is not that men should overcome all the obstacles in their struggle to be politically/personally correct. After all, those who are demanding that men run this daily gauntlet are the very same people lining up to beat them with clubs as they try. The idea is that men should, so to speak, die trying. The intention is that men fail. For as long as average men manage to live peacefully, and even successfully, more and greater incursions into their personal space shall be required. It is at the point of failure – when men have failed to live up to the increasingly constrictive rules set out for them – that they can be punished. The ordeal gets tougher by the day and with each passing of new legislation.

At the extreme end of societal micro-management, we find states like North Korea, a brutal, totalitarian dictatorship which controls all forms of media, place severe restrictions upon speech, association, movement and access to information, and detains dissidents and their families in concentration camps where many die from starvation or medical experimentation. Western societies are separated from the continuum of despotism, on which we find North Korea, by a small number of fundamentals, some of which have already been referenced: respect for the autonomy of the individual, the presumption of innocence, the separation of executive, legislative and judicial powers, etc. These doctrines correspond precisely to those which feminism aims to tear down. The violent, vindictive emotions from which feminism springs are, by nature, irrational; there exists no internal, rational boundary, to suggest that enough is enough once a certain benchmark is reached. The furious impulses at the heart of feminism would not stop short of constructing a totalitarian regime which restricts men's speech, their association and movement, and detains them in concentration and labor camps where they are subject to starvation and mutilation.

Are we so far removed from savage regimes like North Korea that this is not a possibility? We should not allow ourselves to be misled by appeals that we live in a democracy, and that the leaders are ultimately accountable to the people. Our democracy is only ostensible, offering little real choice. The bipartisan consensus between leading parties ensures that the state continues to grow, and the feminist agenda is further promoted, whether the new government cloaks itself in red or blue. Facing no serious political opposition, the leaders do not have to bow to the people to secure their mandate. All public pandering is superficial, though highly effective, in the same way that all totalitarians have enjoyed the popularity of the masses. By definition, totalitarians must be populist: the support they must mobilize, in order to remain in power, cannot be that of an armed minority alone. In exchange for the sponsorship of the masses, totalitarians caress their egos, giving enthusiastic praise to them for their courage, declaring them the inspiration of all progress. At least, the greater part of them are praised. Groups which are not in favor are, in contrast, treated with contempt prior to their destruction. It is the majority which becomes tyrannous – as Alexis De Tocqueville warned – when the leaders isolate a particular segment of the population for blame and castigation. Enjoying their glorification on behalf of the leader, the chosen majority will side against the undesirables, and treat them with abominable malice. It is a story that has played out, over and over, throughout history – not least in the populist tyrannies of the twentieth century. Today, our leaders exalt the feminine and malign the masculine – a prejudice running so deep that it has become normalized, to the point where few consider it unusual for the President to bash men on Father's Day.

Men – who are, indeed in the minority, making up 49% of the population – are suffering the early stages of the tyranny of the majority. Leaders of all parties pander, first and foremost, to the female majority, and particularly to the pressure groups set up (supposedly) in their interests. More pernicious than this is the entry of women into politics – not because of the fact that they are women, but because almost every female politician, whatever her party allegiance, makes women's issues her priority. In contrast, male politicians swear their allegiance to the principles of their party and to the demands of their constituents, but not to men's issues. There are no politicians who make men's issues a priority, but plenty – male and female – who run on the cross-party, women's issues platform. The world is not so simple that we can say men are over-represented because they are present in greater numbers. Although there is a greater number of men in politics, it is women who are over-represented, because more politicians represent them than they do men. The sex of the politician makes no difference to the legislation that he passes. In courting the female vote, and particularly in his efforts to please feminist groups (organized misandry), he will perpetuate and extend chivalry, he will publicly belittle his own sex, and he will pass ever more anti-male legislation, sanctioning the brutalization of ordinary men.

Systematic destruction follows systematic contempt. The eventual outcome of feminism is nothing less than a Holocaust, the almighty crescendo to mark the success of a century or more of sexual warfare and the demonization/degradation of the masculine. Those men, such as the male politician who has stoked the fires of gender tribalism to win votes and benefit his own career, will become the concentration camp facilitators and the enforcers of population reduction programs. They shall be the Uncle Toms, the Judenräte atop white horses, who will ultimately meet the same fate as the men they have helped exterminate. The anti-male, homicidal and genocidal violence in feminist rhetoric is well documented:

> "The male is a domestic animal which, if treated with firmness … can be trained to do most things" – Jilly Cooper, SCUM (Society For Cutting Up Men)
> "I want to see a man beaten to a bloody pulp with a high-heel shoved in his mouth, like an apple in the mouth of a pig" – Andrea Dworkin
> "Kill your fathers" – Robin Morgan
> "Life in this society being, at best, an utter bore and no aspect of society being at all relevant to women, there remains to civic-minded, responsible, thrill-seeking females only to overthrow the government, eliminate the money system, institute complete automation, and destroy the male sex" – Valerie Solanas, SCUM Manifesto
> "It is no accident that in the ancient matriarchies men were castrated, sacrificially slaughtered, and excluded from public forms of power; nor is it an accident that some female supremacists now believe men to be a distinct and inferior species or race. Wherever power is accessible or bodily integrity honored on the basis of biological attribute, systematized cruelty permeates the society and murder and mutilation contaminate it. We will not be different" – Andrea Dworkin
> "Why have any men at all? … The proportion of men must be reduced to and maintained at approximately ten percent of the human race" – Sally Miller Gearhart
> "If life is to survive on this planet, there must be a decontamination of the Earth. I think this will be accompanied by an evolutionary process that will result in a drastic reduction of the population of males" – Mary Daly

The stock feminist response is to point out that these quotes are from radical feminists, who have not been active for a long time, and do not represent mainstream feminism.

While it is not exactly true that they do not represent mainstream feminism, we can find more recent examples of feminist attitudes:

> "It is time that government had a strategy on changing men away from power and oppression as part of its strategy for women and gender justice … Changing future agendas for women involves changing men; changing men involves deconstructing men and reducing men's power; and, in the longer term still, this may even involve the abolition of men" – EuroPRO-Fem, a European men's pro-feminist network

The following is extracted from a recent discussion on a feminist weblog:

> Allecto: I think there is a very simple solution to the 'problem' of the team sport of gang-raping that is so popular as a form of gay male bonding between football players. Mandatory castration of all men who play football and all men who watch football. This would be a quick and easy solution.
> bonobobabe: I like your castration idea. I'd take a step further and castrate all male babies at birth.
> Mary Sunshine: There is no remedy for this situation other than to halt the emergence of any more human males.

Two caveats must be advanced before we go any further. The first is not a compromise; it is not self-censorship or moderation. It is a statement of fact. The overwhelming majority of women do not, and would not, support the extermination of men. The question of whether all or most or only some feminists support the extermination of men is one that I shall address in a couple of weeks' time. Clearly, there are feminists who do not openly support the extermination of men. Nevertheless, they have a role to play in the process, as do all misandrists. For the time being, it will suffice to say that all feminist self-reflection and self-criticism reaches the verdict that they are not being 'feminist enough,' i.e. it results in further radicalization. I quote from the back cover of Zillah Eisenstein's The Radical Future of Liberal Feminism, a feminist text which arrives at this very conclusion:

> Eisenstein shows that liberal feminism is 'self-contradictory' because it 'accepts liberalism and at the same time rejects its patriarchal base.' Yet in truth, feminism is 'potentially subversive', to both liberalism and the capitalist patriarchal state, and it must and can become radicalized as it pushes against the limitations of what can be accomplished within the context of the state … Eisenstein advances the view that liberal feminism contains within itself the seeds of radical change.

The significant point about the above quote is that Eisenstein, the feminist author, rejects the 'patriarchal base' of all liberal institutions; that is, she would happily do away with legal impartiality, equality before the law, presumptive innocence, and so on. Retaining these doctrines, which exist to protect innocent people, is not on the feminist agenda, and Eisenstein comes to the very same conclusion that I have presented in this lecture: that liberal feminism will become radical when it achieves all it can through the liberal state. The violent and vindictive emotions will not be satiated, ever. Once feminism has gone as far as it can go through the liberal state, 'liberal feminists' will turn against it and plot its overthrow.

The second caveat is that the physical destruction of men is not inevitable. It is the logical outcome of feminism, but our future is not set in stone. Given that feminists have explicitly called for forced male labor and the presumption of innocence to be removed when men are accused of rape, and that lawmakers are seriously floating the suggestion that those found guilty of sex offences should be physically castrated, we might conclude that we are already some way down the feminist road to hell. Feminism has no internal brakes; a victory does not temper the feminist's violent emotions, but provides the momentum for her to push for greater results, in the knowledge that she can get away with hurting men. Any barrier to the progress of feminism will therefore have to come from outside feminism. It is up to external agents to build a brick wall in feminism's path.

We are more than sixty years into an organic process that will leave humanity with an irrevocably changed society. The catalyst for the abolition of Gynocentrism is its own radical and unsustainable expression in feminism. Those same social and conceptual changes which made feminism possible prompt the question of why men should put up with any form of Gynocentrism. The critical mass of opposition to Gynocentrism, resulting in its overthrow, will be reached as soon as feminism is exposed to the world. What remains to be seen is whether feminism shall expose itself, or whether it will be exposed by counter-feminists. The former will occur if the movement becomes powerful enough to explicitly launch the physical destruction of men. My own view is that feminists will make this final roll of the dice, and that they will be ultimately unsuccessful, although many men will suffer tortuous deaths. The other possibility is that feminism is exposed in advance of this, preventing much of the violence, and allowing for the repeal of all Gynocentric rule with minimal bloodshed. Whatever the case – whether feminism exposes itself, or is exposed – it is done for. Cast in the disinfecting sunlight of the world's gaze, held to account for its grievous transgressions, never again will feminism be tolerated.

Feedback requested for sticker campaign

[box type=”alert” size=”large” style=”rounded” border=”full” icon=”none”]

This is a low res rough draft of something I am considering for a sticker campaign. The stickers will be 3 x 5 inches and come in easily portable books. The can be pasted above urinals, slapped on magazine covers in lobbies and college campuses. I can get them and sell them at reasonable prices. I am purchasing all images to keep it legit, and we have time to get this right, so if you have ideas on the aesthetics (I am clearly not a graphic designer) or the content, please fire away.

In your face activism – AVfM Radio this Tuesday

May 22, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

The next episode of A Voice for Men Radio, on May 24, 2011 at 8:00 p.m. CST is all about the activism. In your fucking face activism.

AVfM has demonstrated in a relatively short period of time that small groups of very dedicated activists can get some things done, and quite easily. We are not yet near the realization of our potential, but we do know one thing for sure.

We are getting noticed, and as much as many mainstream feminists are still trying to pretend we don't exist, we are making some of them very, very nervous. Recently they have even tried to use a court of law to shut us up.

God I love the sound of that. In fact, I was disappointed that no gag order was issued so that I could defy it with scathing, provocative editorials and a radio special.

But we are well on our way to that, and this show will mark the moment we took the first small step toward the next level.

It's an all MRA night at AVfM Radio, and if you are an MRA (emphasis on the A) or seriously want to become one, you will really enjoy this show, and you will get a chance to add your good ideas into the mix.

One caveat, with all respect, we benefit most, not from people who want to say what we "ought" to do, but from those want to say what they are willing to do themselves, and what they are doing.

This type of show will become a regular feature on AVfM Radio in the future, so please join me, and your new official co-host JTO for an open discussion about how we are going to get in their faces…and stay there.

Just a tidbit well worth sharing. The sender wishes to remain anonymous

Hi Paul.

Just keeping you up to date on the goings on in the world of academia. I just recently entered a Masters program in Forensic Psychology, in hopes of learning more about domestic violence from an unbiased viewpoint.

Fat fucking chance…

During class today we were going around the room talking about what we're interested in studying under the umbrella of forensic psychology. Students paired up and interviewed each other and then we read to the class about the other person's interests. I talked about how I was interested in learning about the facts of domestic violence from a more objective viewpoint for both women and men. When the girl who interviewed me read that aloud to the class, my teacher stopped her abruptly and said, "The facts? I'll tell you the facts, it happens more to women, end of story."

She then turns around to the chalkboard and starts spelling out her misguided definition of DV. First she states how she's a feminist psychologist, then she goes on about the patriarchal view of why men abuse women. Power, privilege, etc…

Keep in mind that I was naive enough to believe that masters level teachers would be more objective in teaching students about DV.

Again, FAT FUCKING CHANCE.

As soon as she started going on about the patriarchal theory I raised my hand and said straight out in no uncertain terms while looking her straight in the eye "I 100% disagree with everything you just said. I do not believe in the patriarchal theory of domestic violence."

She made some irrelevant comment and I went on to say that I believe it has more to do with the pathology of the individual. I also stated that the reason why the facts are so skewed is because studies showing that victims of DV are predominantly women can be explained by the sampling populations chosen for the studies.

When you make generalizations about DV from samples of shelter victims and men in batterer treatment programs, what kind of fucking results do you think you're going to get? (I didn't say fucking to her but you get the picture).

She came at me with her years of experience in the DV system and I straight out told her that her being a self-proclaimed feminist psychologist makes her biased and guilty of confirmation bias when seeking research on the matter. She went on to say that she'd refute anything I had to say.

The class was aghast by how brazenly I called the teacher out. Apparently, everyone in the room is too fucking afraid to question a stereotype and more than willing to accept the views of someone like my teacher who is so clearly biased. She basically said, no discussion, I'm right, you're wrong, now shut up.

This one stupid bitch sitting next to me says "It's hard to believe what you're saying when you have a degree in advertising from [name of school edited] and she's been practicing in psychology for so many years. Maybe you should read more research on the topic."

I had to bite my tongue at that point because I was literally ready to blow my top and get kicked out of the school in the first week!

Paul, it's tough taking a stand on this issue. There is no conversation on the issue with these people. They summarily dismiss your views and claim to be able refute anything you say. It's fucking bullshit man. It really is. I can't even take a fucking neutral viewpoint on the issue without being chastised.

My professor made this comment at the end of the day "How many of you know a woman who has assaulted a man? Can you even name one?" Again, I bit my tongue.

Total fucking bullshit….I had to vent….

Is feminism a hate movement?

May 22, 2011 | by Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) | Link | Original Link

---

To remove man-hating from feminism would be to extract the DNA nucleus from a living cell, the fuel rod from a reactor, the teeth from a rottweiler. I would assert that man-hating is feminism's moral center of gravity, and that without man-hating or at least some degree of disaffection toward males, feminism could not logically continue to exist—it would flounder without purpose, and disintegrate.

If you give the matter a little thought (and I have given it a LOT), you will see that no other theory so elegantly accounts for the observable facts of the case.

Let's start with some basics. Would anybody dispute that feminism is a socio-political movement on behalf of women? Would anybody dispute that feminism proffers a particular analysis of man-woman relations? Would anybody dispute that feminist analysis holds women to be globally disadvantaged, by some objective and quantifiable standard of measurement, in comparison with men? Finally, would anybody dispute that feminist analysis concludes an element of male authorship in the comparative disadvantagement of women?

Yes, feminism is a women's advocacy movement which identifies men as the wellspring of certain difficulties said to afflict women. This would both summarize and make reply to the verbose paragraph above.

And given that men are said to be the wellspring of women's difficulties, are we to believe that no opinion about men as men ever infiltrates feminist thinking on any level? Does any self-admitted feminist, having once identified "men" as the source of women's troubles, go serenely about her business harboring no strictly personal opinion about "men"? I'd call it a considerable stretch, to believe any such thing.

Admittedly, I fashion my argument upon probabilities. But they are compelling probabilities. I seriously doubt that any better can be offered.

I'll have no truck with the "I blame patriarchy" cop-out. This is simply a way of postponing the issue by obfuscating it, since the phrase is so fuzzy it is useless for normal purposes – although useful indeed for underhanded purposes! But patriarchy is plainly understood as a uniquely male institution; men created it and men keep it rolling, or so the story goes. So it is mighty difficult to understand how a person could "blame" patriarchy without "blaming" men in the very same swoop.

Let us enquire further into probabilities. Feminism identifies "men" as the source of women's difficulties. So ask yourself, what class of women might be drawn to such a social movement in disproportionate numbers? Would such a movement attract women who get along well with men and enjoy their company? All right, possibly a few. Just possibly. But would such women compose the bulk of the membership? Where do you suppose the probability lies in such a case? Would such a movement attract women who do not personally see "men" as a source of difficulty in their lives? Is this probable? Is this plausible? Is this credible? Does this FIT?

Hate is a very strong word, and it signifies a very strong thing. It is hard to imagine just how powerful hate can be. Do you think you can imagine it? Well, the chances are that you are nowhere near, and have no idea. It can get even worse, far worse, than you can imagine!

Yes, it is all on a spectrum. It is all on a continuum. “Hate” can be bad, and it can always get badder! Even to the point where the hater implodes into a black hole, and pops clean out of the moral universe, and sucks as much as possible along for the ride.

All right, maybe the word hate is not the wine for all occasions. I like the word disaffection. It is more inclusive than hate because it embraces all shades of disliking without privileging the extreme. Now, a social movement such as feminism needn’t hope to exclude the element of disaffection. I have explained the reason for this already, but now we must proceed to the next stage of examination.

If the disaffection spectrum begins with mild disenchantment and progresses by shades clear up to unmitigated loathing, and if feminism incorporates at least SOME of this spectrum, then we should pause to wonder exactly how much of the spectrum is thus incorporated, and precisely how far it reaches in the direction of uncompounded malevolence. How high on the hate scale does feminism’s emotional aura actually extend? Where does it stop?

Again, consider the likelihoods. If the feminist disaffection spectrum reached no higher than a mild and possibly sporadic disenchantment—an occasional mood, as it were—then feminism would very plainly lack the sustaining force to be a viable women’s advocacy movement. There is simply no way it could gather the necessary motivation and momentum. There would be neither snow for a snowball, nor any appreciable hill to roll it down for the accretion of mass and accumulation of velocity. In a word, feminism would be a non-starter.

A thing like feminism requires a mighty fund of passion both to launch itself and to keep itself running. Tepid feeling will not suffice—it needs to be robust and vehement, and it needs to gain validation through a political analysis that will both justify the original feeling, and contribute to the growth of that feeling by the use of a self-fulfilling feedback loop.

The world has always contained a certain number of people—sociopathic or what-have-you—who for various reasons don’t like the opposite sex. When a thing like feminism appears, proffering a political analysis of sexual relations casting men in the role of miscreants, it is easy to foretell the response man-hating women will make to this. Clearly there will be some exceptions, but I feel confident most such women will be on it like bees on a honeycomb, or flies upon feces if you will. There’s nothing quite like finding an analysis to uphold your attitude. And the documentary record indeed bears out that early second-wave feminists in the radical 1960s were a vehement, passionate lot. They were not wishy-washy. They were not tepid. They were not mildly disenchanted with men.

They were by no stretch of the imagination living on the low end of the disaffection spectrum. More significantly, they were not merely attracted to something which somebody else had created. No, they were present at the very inception; they themselves were the creators and early architects of the movement. Without them, or people like them, the “movement” would never have started moving in the first place!

Nor would the movement be moving still today, if people like them were not down in the engine room stoking the boiler, or up in the pilot house turning the wheel and watching the binnacle. They are the dynamo, and if we should replace them with a crew that was just a shade less disaffected, the new dynamo would be a shade less dynamic, as would the entire movement. It would be just a shade less inclined to bulldoze over obstacles, a shade more inclined to call it a day earlier in the day, and a shade more inclined to lower the bar of compromise overall.

Dial this down shade by shade and watch the movement grow more and more anemic. Eventually, “feminism” would be wavering in its convictions, sleeping late, and frittering away its dwindling energy on matters increasingly peripheral and unfocussed. In other words, feminism would become a non-entity and a non-movement.

So, we have shown that feminism offers an ideological interpretation of female disadvantages in life. We have alluded to the feminist belief that female disadvantage originates from a male-driven power conspiracy, and asserted that such a belief is not feasible to uphold absent a pejorative evaluation of men both individually and as a group. From this we have concluded that some varying degree of personal disaffection toward men cannot be absent from the minds of most feminists, and therefore cannot be absent from the movement as a whole. Finally, we have made the case that feminism’s viability as an advocacy movement is directly indexed to the degree of disaffection toward men found among the movement’s membership, with greater viability correlated to greater disaffection.

Or as stated early in this article: man-hating is feminism’s moral center of gravity; without man-hating or at least some degree of disaffection with males, feminism could not logically continue to exist.

Milder forms of feminism do indeed exist. And so do milder feminists. But they are not the vanguard. They are not the cutting edge. They are not the powerhouse. However, they work diligently to secure advantages for women like scavengers in the aftermath of the main assault, once the enemy has been routed. They are the petty clerks, the bureaucrats, the carpetbaggers, who move into the occupied territory and secure the administration of it. It is part of their job to seem unthreatening, which is easy when somebody else does the dirty work. Their distinguishing feature is that of taking for granted what has been ideologically instilled into the general culture, and taking their ease against the moral support cushion this affords them. Left entirely to themselves, they would have neither the ambition to initiate a political movement, nor the drive to keep it operating in a political capacity. Yet they have a moral investiture in feminism’s world-view, which proposes male guilt as an explanatory model, and by this investiture they plant themselves within feminism’s web of misandric operations.

It is easy to see that if man-hating disappeared from the world, feminism would neither serve any purpose nor have any means to continue operating. But feminism is still operating, and if you are male you are not amiss to suspect that feminism means to harm you. So under the circumstances, you don’t owe feminism any favors. Nor do you owe women any favors under the moral banner of feminism!

Yes, I call feminism a hate movement. Whosoever desires, may undertake to convince me that feminism is a love movement.

The disappearance of Christine Armstrong: run David run

May 22, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

As some of you may recall, I recently posted an article about Christina Armstrong, the Communications Director of The Lighthouse, a run of the mill domestic violence services organization in Robertsdale, Alabama.

As I said in the article, Armstrong was posting over at David Futrelle's website, manboobz.com, under the username Christine. Her contributions to the discussion there included the inference that I was a rapist, that the men's movement was regarded by the justice department as an "abusers lobby," and that our respected colleague W.F. Price of The-Spearhead.com should be targeted for investigation by the FBI and placed on some sort of watch list. She also tacitly predicted that at some point in the future that violent acts against women would be attributed to the MRM.

As someone who wondered why a person in Armstrong's position, that ostensibly of a public servant, would be spending their time making libelous claims about strangers in a forum dedicated to little else but making libelous claims about strangers in a public forum, I felt compelled to see what would happen if the tables were turned and the lights were put on Armstrong.

The only condition I set for myself was that rather than invest in wild speculation about Armstrong's sexual proclivities, or her relative danger to society around her, that I would just focus on what I could prove about her, as directly demonstrated by her posting to Futrelle's site.

It appears that was enough to shut her up. And where it concerns this matter, even the Manboob is putting a sock in it. Must be like eating glass for the smug bastard.

And now it appears that Futrelle is trying to create the illusion on his site that none of it ever happened. He has pathetically instructed the faithful at Manboobz that the subject is verboten. And Christina seems to have fallen off planet Manboob altogether. From all appearances, she no longer posts there, much less making slanderous remarks against myself or Mr. Price.

[image]

Looks damned good on the both of them.

Now, I don't delude myself into thinking that this is any kind of major victory. Armstrong is still listed on the contact page of the Lighthouse's website as being on staff there. So she is almost undoubtedly still part of a program that operates on the myth that male victims of domestic abuse and their children don't exist.

But I do think that Christina Armstrong now serves as a great object lesson, demonstrating the truth in the adage, "Cockroaches scatter when you turn on the light."

And while she is no more significant to the big picture than a blowhard comment commando like Futrelle, she is now made more valuable to us in her cowardly, or perhaps instructed, absence.

This is just a small warning to anyone in DV services or any other industry part and parcel to feminist governance.

[image]
Futrelle: One picture is worth a thousand jelly doughnuts
If you're going to fuck with bloggers in the MRM you better not let us find out who you are, because we are not going to put up with it.

Futrelle is at little risk from making irresponsible assertions on the internet about people he doesn't know. His once mediocre writing career looks to be over. A Google search on his name is now far less than flattering. The image search is even more dismal. Being a net wide butt of ten thousand jokes is not really the creds most blue pill hack factories are looking for.

But people in positions where they actually have something to lose are a different matter entirely. We can't stop them from practicing general misandry, but we can do a lot about direct attacks on people that involve false allegations and histrionic calls for Gestapo intervention.

I am not a Dixie Chicks fan, but I can still tap my toes to "Not Ready to Make Nice."

Tonight we let loose the dogs of war

May 24, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

OK, M.R.A'S, it is Tuesday night again; time for another round of straight talk from A Voice for Men. We have a couple of new and important features that will be launched tonight in a show from that will be upping the ante for men's activism, online and beyond.

Tonight will mark the debut of JTO as cohost of the show. This promises to put a little nitro in the carb, making your listening experience all the better, and you know who's all the fucking worse. JTO and I are going to be talking about one of your favorite subjects: Calling out the ideological destroyers of men and boys, by name. And how to get them.

This isn't just the topic of tonight's show, but a precursor to what you will see a lot more of in the days to come from AVfM and AVfM radio. We have been kicking ass and taking names for a while now, but our general focus has been more on the asses than on the names that go with them.

We have begun to discover that we are gaining the power to do what has been sorely missing for far too long.

Make them run and hide like the cowards that they are.

The days of corrupt prosecutors going unexposed are coming to an end. As are the days of reps from the sexual grievance industry slandering our names and the image of the MRM.

As it is stated, explicitly and plainly, in our mission statement:

[It is the goal of AVfM] To promote the legal and nonviolent antagonism of all agents of misandry, from members of academe, to holders of public office, to law enforcement and other state functionaries, to popular bloggers and to corporate agents who promote misandry for profit;

Tonight we are making that aspect of our mission objective number 1.

Make no mistake, it will be a slow, hard battle. It will take years, and some will pay a price for the fight. Nonetheless tonight we begin waging it in earnest.

Tonight we begin to either destroy our enemies, or force them to crawl back into the dark holes from whence they came.

It's a round table discussion of strategy from AVfM Radio, and you are invited.

Here is the show information, including the call in number.

We start at 8:00 pm Central Time, US.

A Target List for Your Convenience.

The word on masculinity

May 24, 2011 | by Jared White | Link | Original Link

What makes a man, a man?

This question may well have been on the minds of the majority of the human race before recorded history. Not in the specific words above but still in some variation of how people communicated before writing and speaking was referred to as communication. It is a simple question designed to give men and boys a morality check. A question with answers that could inspire integrity or crime. So what makes a man, a man?

Absolutely nothing.

Men are men and that's all there is to it. They may be gay or cut their junk off but they will always be what they were born, men. What makes a man, a man is a question within a question. What makes a man a good man? This is the real question being put forth. The problem is that the answer to that question is being proposed by the wrong people.

Women.

Feminist women, to be more precise, are the ones working tirelessly towards pushing their views of "what makes a man a man" onto the general public. Yes there are feminist men who publish books and teach college courses on this subject. However, their words and ideas are not their own. They say what their enablers want them to say. They repeat things feminist women have already propagated.

The one thing that coincides with many who are feminists and those who are not when it comes to the question of manhood is masculinity. However, why this is the case I am not sure. If you were to ask an average guy on the street, masculinity would be the difference between a real man and…something else. If you were to ask a feminist, masculinity would be the harbinger of death to humanity.

Both would be wrong.

Masculinity is a word. A word created by human beings. A word used to describe human beings that exhibit certain traits or characteristics. Throughout recorded history, men around the world have maintained similar identifiable characteristics that have bridged cultures and broken barriers.

The warrior: This characteristic, I believe, is the most common among the men of all cultures. Every civilization I know of, even the supposed female led matriarchies have never strayed from the practice of using men as the protectors of society. Many generations ago, before steel and concrete buildings towered above the trees, men were born for one main purpose: to defend their society from other societies.

The architect: After humanity left the caves that once sheltered them and civilizations began to spring up around the globe, men took on another characteristic that aided in the survival of the human race. From teepees to mud huts, from log cabins to steel skyscrapers, the homes of humanity were built on the backs of the male half of the species. It has been and still is, even with advanced technology, a tireless and fatal effort.

However, men, as it seems have been the predominant humans to step forward and sacrifice their bodies so that others might live.

The risk taker: Walking into a pitch black mine filled with dynamite with the intention of lighting a fuse is not something many people are capable of doing. However, those that did undertake this endeavor were men and only men. Entering a small boat with three to four other passengers with the intention of hunting an animal the size of a large building with only a small spear is something most people would consider insane. However, to fuel the whale oil powered luxuries of the past, men stepped up and into those small boats. Not all risks men take are fatal but the largest risks taken by the human race are usually taken by the male half. Be they a walk across an unfinished skyscraper back in the early 20th century or a life savings put into the first steel mill, the risks are always big and the payoff upon success immeasurable.

The leader: Anyone can lead. Not everyone can lead well. While being the one in charge is stereotyped as something men crave more than anything else, knowing the one in charge can lead is what those who actually pay attention view as another male characteristic. A group of men from the past tasked with defending a small settlement that has been raided by a rival tribe will not put their trust and their lives in the hands of a man who has not proven himself on the battlefield. Even the warriors of today, soldiers in armies around the world only give respect to leaders who have earned it. Yes, today's military men are legally bound to respect the rank of an individual but few men respect individuals that have not proven themselves a leader. Within large successful companies it is intelligent to appoint those that produce the most profit for that company as leaders of their peers. In team sporting activities an individual player cannot win without a cohesive team, however, a team cannot be cohesive without a worthy leader. Groups of men choose their leaders because they know that the man chosen can outperform them at whatever task that needs to be accomplished. If a man has not earned the respect of a group of men then that group will remain leaderless.

The competitor: Competing is what has driven men to bring the human civilization out of caves and into the cockpit of airplanes. Men compete with each other over just about anything from leisure activities as such as drinking to crowd gathering professions like sports. Men compete for the affections of women on a daily basis. It is women, in fact, that have driven some men to create great works of art, invent revolutionary technologies, and lead armies to victory all for the sake of winning her affections.

The protector: Not only have men defended their societies from other societies. Nature has been kept at bay, whenever possible, by the ingenuity of men. To keep the rain, winds, and snow from killing their families, men built shelters. To prevent their loved ones from freezing to death, men built fireplaces. To protect those weaker than themselves from wild animals, men designed traps and fashioned weapons out of rocks and wood. Even today in our "civilized" world their still exist men and women who cannot conform to what we deem civil. They would take without asking, destroy what they did not create, and murder those they have never met. Once a common protective instinct among men over the years has now changed into an official position among the populace.

Soldier; Police officer; Firefighter.

These jobs were not always jobs and did not always hold names. Centuries ago common men stepped up and took on these roles when they were needed. There was no official corps of men who performed these services, except for soldiers and far back enough in time not even soldiers were official. Instead men simply defended their societies from criminals or nature. Even today among the thousands of men who are paid to perform these tasks there are men who do not hold the title and position of firefighter that will run into a burning building in order to save a loved one or a complete stranger. Even today there are men who pull men, women, and children they have never met from car accidents. Men jump into cold bodies of water to save drowning citizens from certain death. When a cry for help is heard it is men who rush in to save others from criminals and unprovoked attackers. Men have always been the protectors of their societies, the unsung and underappreciated heroes of their times.

The provider: Men have always given what they themselves have labored to obtain. Be it the meat from some wild animal or a roof they have spent months creating as a shield from nature. This is one male characteristic I believe is predominantly male for one reason. The roof over my head was designed and built by other men. The same goes for just about every other human being on the planet since and before recorded history. In the past it was understandable that only men could do these things. Raw strength and physical prowess was a must for hunting and building. Today we have machines built by men that lighten the physical burden needed to create homes and shelters. Sixty years ago it was already possible to construct a house within minutes. Yet still it is men who answer the call to shelter their societies.

You will notice all of these traits associated with men are good traits. It is indeed strange to hear the words good and man uttered in the same breath unless the one speaking is describing their own selfish desires they believe men should adhere to.

These traits, these characteristics are what describe masculinity to me. These characteristics used to be recognized by the world as masculine characteristics. Now many view them simply as human characteristics and that’s fine. Taking away the label that defines certain traits as male traits is fine. Not all men exhibit these traits. Also, some women exhibit these traits as well. However, whether or not defining these traits as male was never the issue in my mind. I have never felt the need to defend my masculinity.

Then I learned about feminism.

Feminism did something dishonest and in my opinion evil when dealing with masculinity. As anyone will find out after only a short time of studying feminism, celebrating men is not one of its functions. Not only did feminists have to shout to the world that the traits listed above are not exclusive to the male half of the species. No. Convincing the populace that masculine traits are found within women was not enough. Instead, feminists drew a line between men and women when it came to masculinity. Many of the good things that were viewed as masculine were argued to be inherent in women as well. Feminists couldn't stand being told that some good things, such as being a provider or protector, were things that mostly men did. So feminists sought to remove the title of masculinity from these characteristics. However, this is where the evil of feminism took hold. Feminists had no problem with renaming protector as a human characteristic but in the same stroke they named violence as a masculine characteristic.

Fuck all to honesty.

Violence, sexual deviancy, dominance, and several other nasty characteristics were attributed solely to men by feminists. You see they have no problem arguing that women can be competitive and only want to be led by someone worthy of leading. They can argue for that all day.

Why?

Because those are good characteristics that people have associated with men throughout history. But when it comes to the argument that women can be violent or rapists or dominant control freaks too? No they say. Women do not do such things. They say that if you just look at what men have done throughout history you will see that in general men have been the violent ones and men have been the ones seeking to control societies.

Not women, they say.

It is almost like a hamster wheel. Analyzing the subject of masculinity can send one's mind into an endless spiral of confusion and frustration especially when bombarded with feminist rhetoric. Aggressiveness, in general, is a male trait. It is used in sports, combat, and even the work room. But when this trait is said to be masculine, the word masculine, is changed. No longer does the word masculinity stand for a characteristic that has been observed mostly in men for generations. Now masculinity is a social construct according to feminists.

On some levels this is true because as I said masculinity is a word. A word created by us humans to describe something we see. Since it has been mostly men who have displayed these characteristics it is mostly men who are expected to uphold these characteristics.

Therein lays the rub.

We all know that not all men exhibit every characteristic associated with masculinity. However, since and before the dawn of civilization, most men have displayed these characteristics. Back then necessity played a big role in keeping those characteristics visible, which in turn kept them alive in the most noticeable ways, such as, keeping a budding society alive. Today we have technology. Technology erases a lot of the necessity surrounding the traits associated with masculinity. Sure the traits are still needed but the life of modern societies no longer depends fully on men crafting spears and hunting animals. Hard physical labor is still needed but that is mostly ignored in our society today. Money is the driving force behind what is created and what is destroyed now and masculinity is not needed to make money.

Boys being taught by their fathers to be competitive and aggressive can be viewed as a social construct to some and in some ways that is true. However, the fact remains that mostly men who were not taught to exhibit these characteristics still display them and have displayed them for thousands of years with no outside influence other than the will to survive.

The problem is that aggressiveness, the good trait associated with all, becomes violence, the bad trait associated with men. Feminists love associating bad things with men, especially when those bad things affect women. Violence in general is something feminists will blame solely on men. Why? Because the majority of violent crimes committed around the world are committed by men. However, point out the fact that the majority of people who protect others from criminals are also men and that fact just shoots over a feminist's head and flies out the window.

Think about it for a minute. One of these two characteristics, protectiveness and violence, used to be celebrated as a masculine trait and the other viewed as a shortcoming of the human species. Today people are taught, in schools no less, by feminists, that violence is masculine and protectiveness is a human trait.

I've got no problem with people wanting to ignore the fact that every civilization on the planet is defended by men. However, I take issue with feminists claiming that violence is a masculine trait. Note that I understand men use violence to protect others but that is not the type of violence feminists are referring to. They are talking about random and sadistic violence. They are talking about men who beat their wives and children simply because they can. Feminists put out commercials on national television, calling them "public service announcements", which depict men beating women for spilling coffee and claim this scenario to be the norm for everyday families.

Fucking spilt coffee.

That is what feminists claim is masculinity. This is what they claim young boys are being taught in our culture by men who uphold the "patriarchy". While there are some feminists too blinded by their hatred of men to see that violence is something both genders exhibit, a lot of feminists do realize this fact. However, this is where the straight path to common sense wraps around forming the hamster wheel. Feminists feel that sense it is mostly men whom enact violent crimes that violence is a part of masculinity and therefore must be destroyed. They use this backwards logic to justify their campaign to "fix" young boys so they don't grow up to be violent men.

So pathetic the feminist mind is…

To claim that violence is a part of masculinity simply because men commit the majority of violent crimes is the same thing as claiming that being protective is a part of masculinity simply because the majority of people that defend societies are men. A simple way to get around associating a good characteristic and a bad characteristic with the same word is to assign a different word for the bad characteristic. Thankfully, society has already given the bad characteristic a word.

FUCKING CRIMINAL.

Feminists propagate that the only way to reduce the number of violent men is to teach young boys to respect women. There is no advocating for girls to be taught that violence is wrong from feminists because according to feminist teachings, violence is a masculine trait.

You see what they did? The obviousness of what they did is only painfully mindboggling because of the fact that it worked. “Male violence” and measures to prevent it are the activities of college courses. “Toxic masculinity” is what is associated with men now. Feminists claim that men are violent because of the desire men have to live up to the societal view of what is masculine. They say that men fear being viewed as less of a man if they do not conform to “toxic masculinity”.

That’s bullshit.

A man cannot be less of a man. A man is a mammal. Man is a word used to describe the physical features of one half of the human species on the inside and the outside. So no matter what a man does socially or if he goes and has his penis cut off it doesn’t matter. A man is a man is a man.

“Toxic masculinity” is a term used by feminists in an attempt to destroy masculinity. Feminists do not want societies to recognize the fact that the characteristics associated with masculinity are predominantly male. They do not want men to be celebrated for their many contributions to civilization throughout history. Instead they want men to be viewed as violent and dangerous animals that only feminism can “fix”.

I for one, see through the lies feminism has put forth. The sad thing is most people don’t. For fucks sake this trash is in our schools. One of the saddest facts of life today is that men go to school and are taught that there is something wrong with them and virtually no one save a very small percentage of the population says anything about it.

It’s time to speak up.

What makes a man, a man?

Nothing.

What makes a man masculine?

You decide.

Time to blame the victims: only women can stop rape

I have stated many times that although I believe that women can and should take steps to decrease the risk of sexual assault; that no woman regardless of whether she has taken such steps is asking for or deserves to be raped. While she is responsible for her own safety, whatever her actions may be, she is not to be blamed for what someone else does to her. Her actions in no way mitigate the responsibility of her rapist, nor should her actions be considered in determining guilt or sentencing of her attacker.

There are those who believe that the responsibility for stopping rape rests solely with men. Not just the men who rape, but all men. They believe that certain words are demeaning to women and that using them promotes rape. They believe that allowing other men to tell jokes about women promotes rape. They believe that supporting survivors of rape somehow decreases rape. They believe that men talking to other men about being viewed as potential rapists will somehow reduce rape. What this might do is make some men a bit more sensitive towards the problem. But it isn't likely to stop a single rapist from raping. However, it might also get someone killed.

Can you imagine sitting in a bar and overhearing a guy tell a sexist joke? You get up and walk over to the guy and as politely and sensitively as possible, inform him that his joke is demeaning to women and promotes a culture of rape and ask him to stop telling such jokes. I can imagine the guy taking offense. I can imagine his friends taking offense. I can also imagine running like I was Carl Lewis being chased by a hungry jaguar.

It simply isn't going to work. But there is one thing that will and that one thing is something that only rape victims can do.

It is often said that 90% or more rapes go unreported to law enforcement and that only about 5-6% of rapists ever get convicted. It is said that 1 in 5 of all college women will be the victim of a rape/attempt while in college. If this last statistic is correct, it means that several hundred (close to 1000 on larger campuses) rapes occur on every college campus every single year. It can be shown that for most major universities the number of rapes/attempts reported to campus authorities every year is in the single digits. This indicates that only about 1% or less of all college rapes are reported each year. Is it any wonder that rape is the single most common crime taking place on campus? That is of course, if rape is as prevalent as the sexual grievance industry would have us believe. Getting away with it is virtually guaranteed and the people making that guarantee are the victims themselves.

That's right, rape victims who fail to report their rapes are the ones to blame for the current rape epidemic because those victims virtually guarantee to the perpetrators that they will get away with their crime. It is almost as though they have provided consent after the fact.

I can only imagine what the response would be if every campus across the country were to receive several hundred reports of rape/attempts every year. They'd call out the National Guard and men would likely be banned from campus at every university across the nation. College men, if there were any left, would be terrified of dating college women. They would likely not look at them. They would likely not speak to them. They'd see a woman coming and turn and run the other way. Rape would cease to exist in all but a handful of cases of those men who are so psychotic that they simply cannot control themselves and would rape anyways.

So while I still believe that no woman asks to be raped, no woman deserves to be raped, and that rapists should be held responsible for the crimes they commit, I am also placing the blame for the rape epidemic squarely upon the shoulders of all those rape victims who failed to report the crime committed against them. Every woman who has ever failed to report a sexual assault committed against her is to blame for every subsequent woman who has fallen victim to this heinous act. It's time to speak up or shut up. While men may address the issue, only women can stop rape.

False alarm

A short note of thanks to all those who expressed concerns during yesterday's down time. The matter has been resolved. There was not an attack on the site; at least not of anything more than some incompetence from web hosting, and some ignorance on my behalf.

Lesson learned, though, with some added benefits. What happened was a good test of our redundancy systems and of the MRA's that stepped up immediately to help. Both came through with flying colors.

And it was a good lesson for me, someone constantly trying to catch up to the learning curve on internet technology. All it cost me was one night's sleep and a dozen or so spikes in my blood pressure.

In other words, a fairly typical day in the life of an MRA.

Thanks to everyone who stood ready and that pitched in for a solution. – PE

Defending marriage?

May 24, 2011 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

In America, a number of people and organizations are attempting to defend the social institution of marriage. The National Organization for Marriage springs to mind – these earnest individuals would save the institution of marriage from the corrupting influence of gays. A substantial fraction of the American congress along with Bill Clinton in 1996, passed the Defense Of Marriage Act. This act legally defined marriage as a union between one man and one woman. The Respect for marriage act is a proposed bill in US congress that would repeal the Defense of Marriage Act and allow the U.S. federal government to provide benefits to couples in a same-sex marriage; A hotly contested issue. Again, we mustn't have those gays wrecking the sacred social institution of marriage. As is usual for any discussion of marriage for gays, some political and social conservatives seem to be greatly excited and distressed over the imminent destruction of the social institution which arguably forms the basis of our society.

Unfortunately, marriage is already toast, and it was destroyed by the lobbying, and legal activism of mainstream, organized feminism.

To every traditionalist genuinely distressed over the prospect of gay men marrying each other – where were you when no fault divorce was instantiated as a legal principal? Were you sleeping? Are you still sleeping?

No fault divorce is the legal convention that in the dissolution of a marriage, disbursal of assets of the partnership does not take account of the reasons for the dissolution of the marriage. This means that if one partner screws the pool boy or beats the children, they still claim half the assets suffering no legal fault. If there is a significant difference in the income of the partners in a marriage, the partner who brings the lesser pay-cheque to the table is financially motivated to dissolve the marriage, disposing of the spouse, but keeping the assets. Once this is understood, it should not be a surprise that 65 to 85% of divorces are initiated by women[1].

Feminist Vivian Gornick told an audience at the university of Illinois in April of 1981 "Being a housewife is an illegitimate profession. The choice to serve and to be protected and plan towards being a family maker is a choice that shouldn't be. The heart of radical feminism is to change that."

Robin Morgan wrote in 1970: "We can't destroy the inequities between men and women until we destroy marriage."

The family courts are almost entirely dominated by a flavor of radical feminist jurisprudence, and generally treat divorced men as farm animals to be sheared of resources and income, and to finance the family court system. Family courts often participate in the appropriated earnings of men who are processed by the court system. Family courts fund themselves by taking a segment of court mandated support payments from divorced fathers.

I wont bother providing the dictionary definition of the word corrupt.

Marriage is not dead, exactly, but for men, it’s a bad, bad option with legal, and financial risk far far outweighing any potential benefit. It was feminist lobbying and jurisprudence that turned marriage into this unfortunate trap.

In light of this, social conservatives are worried about gays getting married?

Bullshit.

Awash in a sea of false allegations

May 25, 2011 | by Carey Roberts | Link | Original Link

Washington has been buzzing over the case of Sean Lanigan, a P.E. teacher in suburban Virginia who was accused of sexual molesting a 12-year-old girl. The jury acquitted Lanigan in less than an hour, one juror reportedly weeping in sympathy with Lanigan for lack of evidence.

Much of the outrage centers around the actions of Nicole Christian, the lead detective who threatened to prosecute school staff for obstruction of justicewhen they gave her evidence pointing to Lanigan's innocence.

Innocence? Not in this cop's vocabulary.

Christian then refused to re-interview a key witness who knew the accusation was a lie and wanted to recant her story. Christian's declined the meeting because, in her words, "if she changes her story, they're [the jury] going to wonder why she changed her testimony."

Then she ordered an investigation of the witness's mother for alleged child abuse. How's that for bullying the witnesses and manipulating the investigation?

A year after a jury of his peers cleared him of all wrong-doing, the Fairfax County school district continues to treat Sean Lanigan like damaged goods, refusing to offer an apology or pay his legal bills.

And recall the case of Crystal Mangum, notorious accuser in the Duke lacrosse case. Four years ago North Carolina Attorney General Roy Cooper pronounced the three men innocent of all charges. Cooper then informed the stunned audience that he would not charge Mangum with perjury, floating the notion that "she may actually believe the many different stories that she has been telling."

Four years later, Mangum, still reveling in her socially protected status, plunged a kitchen knife into the chest of boyfriend Reginald Daye.

Domestic violence is another area where false allegations have become de rigeur. For years the abuse industry has anointed itself with sack-cloth and ashes, meeting with state legislators to expand definitions and lower standards of proof.

Now the system is a shambles. It's like a welfare system with no means testing – all you have to do is claim you're down on your luck and presto, you're in! Women who used to be known as Welfare Queens now go by the somewhat less regal moniker DV Fakers, according to a recent *Village Voice*expose.

Researcher Denise Hines of Clark University has studied the plight of men who have been emotionally and physically tormented by their wives. These men can't call the police because their partners threaten to accuse them of being the perpetrators of the violence. So the threat of a false accusation serves to trap these men in the nightmare of an endlessly abusive relationship.

There are many reasons for our current epidemic of false allegations. Prosecutors who wink at perjurers shoulder part of the blame. Casey Gwinn, a well-known San Diego prosecutor, has said:

"If we prosecuted everybody for perjury that gets on a witness stand and changes their story, everybody would go to jail…I would say it's in the thousands of people who take the witness stand and somewhat modify the truth."

But Gwinn misses the point. If prosecutors went after only one in 100 women who batter the truth, the resulting publicity would send an unmistakable message to the community at large.

One Colorado mother, her own son accused of rape by a bi-polar woman who couldn't offer a scrap of evidence of wrongdoing, recently penned this cri de coeur:

"The system has supported all women, even those who lie. They've made it easy for them. If it is proven that a woman has lied, they are not prosecuted. They are at most sent to counseling. And being a 'victim' can be intoxicating to some. It can let them off the hook for being responsible for their own actions."

Civil liberties' proponents aren't the only ones up in arms. Social conservatives wring their hands over the ensuing family break-down and fraying of the social fabric.

Fiscal conservatives take the analysis one step further, pointing out that children in single-parent households are far more likely to become beneficiaries of the welfare state. False allegations of domestic violence cost taxpayers $20 billion a year, thanks to swelling demand for welfare services and public benefits:

http://www.saveservices.org/downloads/False-DV-Allegations-Cost-20-Billion

On June 2, a False Allegations Summit will be held in Washington DC, featuring testimonies by persons who have been falsely accused of abuse:

http://www.saveservices.org/false-allegations-awareness-month/

I'm willing to bet there won't be an empty seat or a dry eye in the house.

Zeta Camp

May 25, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

The scenic pic above is where we will be a year from now, for those men that that can make it, and can hack it.

It is the first annual Zeta Camp, and we are planning it a year in advance to give everyone who wants to attend time to prepare, both financially and physically.

There are quite a few details to be sorted out, but the basics are in place. On a day to be named in July of 2012 we will meet in Denver, Colorado, then caravan for 3 ½ to 4 hours to the edge of the Indian Peaks Wilderness area. We will stay in hotel rooms that night and meet for a very early breakfast before starting the 2-4 hour hike to an isolated campground that sits up at about 9,500 feet in elevation.

Yes, that is a long, hill and dale hike at nearly two miles up, where the air is thinner than an anorexic crack whore. So some things become very important, like gear for all possible weather, some reasonable physical conditioning and a good bit of determination.

We will be leaving any and all tendency to whine in the staging area.

At the end of the hike we will set up camp and settle in for three nights in some of the most spectacular country in America.

Our guide for this trip will be AVfM Radio Show producer Keyster, with yours truly and JTO on the assist.

Sorry ladies, this is a for men only outing, no exceptions. And sorry blue pillers, this is for MRA's only. Your application to attend will be based on whether you are known to us as an MRA.

Time to reclaim a little male space, zeta style.

Stop women's violence

May 26, 2011 | by NCFM | Link | Original Link

When will the domestic violence industry recognize women who batter men? According to the U.S. Dept. of Health and Human Services and Bureau of Justice statistics, more kids are killed by neglect and abuse in a year (1,460 in 2005), than all the female intimate partner homicides in a year (1,181 in 2005).

Mothers are the single largest group of kid killers. They have a rate twice that of fathers, yet the taxpayer funded (gender feminist run) domestic violence industry would have us believe that women don't egregiously batter men too. They're lying!

As shown by HHS statistics, the age range for child homicides is about ten times narrower than that for female intimate partner homicides, making that rate of child homicide far more concentrated. Yet funding to prevent those child homicides is minimal compared to the billions that go to the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA).

Vice President Biden has called the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) "his baby," but Biden should be ashamed, not proud, of his misandric piece of gender feminist, legislation, which excuses and rewards women's domestic violence against men, thereby fueling more domestic violence against men by women.

Credible research overwhelmingly shows that the ratio of domestic violence is at least 50/50 between women & men. According to one study by researchers who work at the CDC, in 70 percent of domestic violence incidents, where the domestic violence is not mutual, it's women who initiate the domestic violence.

V.P. Biden recently called violence against women, "the very worst abuse." The very worst abuse is valuing one life less than another for having been born the wrong sex, or the wrong age. Under Biden's Violence Against Women Act the wrong sex is men and the wrong age group is children. Shelter and services are virtually non-existent for male victims of domestic violence (as well as men and their children) so options out of a bad relationship, that are routinely available to women, are very often not available to men. Men wind up gender profiled and often falsely accused by the taxpayer funded, domestic violence industry, because of gender feminist ideology controlling the domestic violence industry. Men are often battered by domestic violence, then battered again by the taxpayer funded, domestic violence industry.

The taxpayer funded domestic violence industry has largely mischaracterized the true nature of domestic violence from the beginning of VAWA and continues to mislead the public. Domestic violence law, following the gender feminist agenda (ideology) over facts in evidence, does great harm to many innocent men and children, (also many battering women who need help).

One volunteer away from a false accusers registry

May 26, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

In the comments *archmage_lo, just pondered aloud on the idea that a registry for false accusers might be a good idea.

I could not agree more. In fact, it would seem to be a necessary protection of civil society. But of course, as almost all false accusers are women, the idea for that registry will not find its way into the rabble rousing rhetoric of your local politicians. That kind of incitement is saved for targeting men.

However, as MRA's we are used to doing things for ourselves when our society fails us, which is pretty much at every turn.

So with that I am calling on anyone who sees false allegations as a problem to step up and help with some of your time.

Start the AVfM False Accuser Registry.

How this is done is simple. Just gather up a list of proven false accusers of sexual assault, DV, child molestation or any other crime usually prosecuted against men on allegation alone, and send it to me.

The information should include the following.

Accusers name, not the name of their victim

Link to source story.

And, whenever available:

Their picture

Personal information like home address, place of employment, phone numbers, age, date of birth, etc.

Name of prosecutor on the case

The punishment/lack of punishment received

All this will take is one good MRA to step up and pour the foundation on this one. 15-20 would be a good start, and then we can add from there as they come up or as people point to ones we have missed.

If you look in the right column you will see that I have made a special banner for Michael Kimmel and his cohorts in misandry. I will make a similar sized graphic leading to the registry page. It will become a permanent and growing part of this website.

Got activism?

Silencing dissent

May 26, 2011 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

In the past, whenever I was told by a feminist that western women were oppressed, I always asked for details. In what particulars are women oppressed? Obviously, they never answered except with attempts to change the topic, hurl abuse, and spin puerile lies.

In fact, a substantial fraction of my writing, and the writing of many other MRAs necessarily focuses on deflating and debunking the torrents of lies propagated by feminists and their enablers.

Long ago, I lost interest in attempting to pursue honest discussion with adherents of a feminist ideology who almost universally demonstrate a contempt for honesty and valid data in their "arguments".

If a statement leveled against men, or against MRAs is repeatedly demonstrated as factually false, but the statement is repeated repackaged, and re-used in defiance of its falsehood, those who knowingly rely falsehood to buttress their position are not honest actors.

Pointing out such failures of factual veracity is routine for most MRAs, and while sometimes tedious, fact checking a lying opponent is a way to self-check one's own position. Active MRAs are still a tiny handful of men and women in western culture, and as one of them I am not immune to occasionally feeling like the only sane human in the world. Verifiable falsehoods, routinely cited by opponents of men's rights serve as a reminder of the pervasive misandry and rapidly eroding civil rights of all westerners (not just men, thank you).

Occasionally, your opponents give you a gift, by doing something so obvious or absurd that they betray themselves to you. Last month Mary Kellet, the corrupt assistant district attorney pursuing no-evidence prosecutions to secure VAWA funding for her office tried to silence this website and others with a court order. Public discussion and examination of this incompetent and corrupt prosecutor was apparently too much to bear, so she tried to silence her critics with a gag order. I found this hilarious, and I really, truly hope she tries again. Hi Mary, thanks for visiting the site.

An urge to silence debate or dissent is, by the way, a totalitarian urge. The attempts by Kellet and others to silence discussion and criticism validates arguments made on AVFM regarding the escalation of an emerging police state.

Another such gift was provided by Christine Armstrong, a women's shelter worker in Alabama. A week ago, Paul Elam wrote about her public accusations against him of various crimes, and her moronic and dishonest suggestion he should be treated by law enforcement as some sort of threat to public safety.

I'm sure I am not the only person who, hearing of this wildly unethical behavior by shelter employee Christine Armstrong thought: "what a scumbag". However, as personally annoying as these calumnious lies are – seen from a longer viewpoint, they're implicit expressions of the moral bankruptcy and desperation of the ideological enemies of human rights. If Armstrong or her fellow cockroaches had an argument worthy of being called such, they would field it rather than the puerile lies we are increasingly coming to expect.

They are obviously so intellectually, ethically and strategically bankrupt that their go-to tactic is to repeatedly and incompetently attempt the silencing of men's rights activists.

What makes this even more interesting is that the failure to shut our friend Paul up is much more than a strategic failure for Armstrong and her ideological comrades – It's revealing of the insubstantial tissue on which an ideology teeters. The increasingly desperate thrashing of organized feminism's adherents provides a brightly illuminated radar echo for those of us with an investment in human rights and factual veracity in our arguments.

Also, thank you Christina. Keep trying.

Manuel’s Inbox; Internet Blacklist Bill

May 27, 2011 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

[box type=”alert” style=”rounded” border=”full” icon=”none”]

The following landed in my inbox today. Do you care about an un-censored internet? I do.

========

Manuel,

Bad news first: Yesterday afternoon the Senate Judiciary Committee passed the new Internet Blacklist Bill — the PROTECT IP ACT.

The good news: Within minutes, Demand Progress ally Senator Ron Wyden (D-OR) placed what’s known as a “hold” on the bill, buying us some time and drawing attention to our cause.

PROTECT IP would let the government force Internet service providers, search engines, and other “information location tools” to block users’ access to sites that have been accused of copyright infringement — creating a China-like censorship regime here in the United States.

Nobody’s organizing against this noxious bill as aggressively as we are. Will you help us keep up our work?

Click here to become a Demand Progress monthly sustainer.
(You can cancel your donations at any time.)

If you can’t become a sustainer, could you donate $5 or $10 today by clicking here?

Opposition to the bill is snowballing: Google, Yahoo, and the Computer and Communications Industry Association, Consumer Electronics Association, and Net Coalition are making their opposition vocal. Demand Progress and a dozen other civil liberties and human rights groups circulated a letter in opposition this week.

Most impressively, more than 3,000 Demand Progress members called Washington to urge their lawmakers to vote no.

We’re an entirely member-funded organization. Will you help us keep up our work?

Thanks for your ongoing support.

Breaking News: Vladek Filler Just Found Not Guilty

May 27, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box type="alert" size="large" style="rounded" border="full" icon="none"]

Justice has been served, to a degree. Vladek Filler was found not guilty of sexual assault of his wife, Ligia, and unfortunately was found guilty of one count of assault from an incident where he allegedly threw some water in his lying wife's face.

A link to the news story will be posted with this as it becomes available.

[Update: Story here.]

AVfM and all of it's readers extends our congratulations to Mr. Filler, though we do so with the sad knowledge that this ordeal, spanning several years, has completely destroyed much of his life.

While Mr. Fillers case should now be over, save whatever punishment the state will seek for tossing water, the problem of corrupt prosecutions, which in this case was carried on by ADA Paul Cavenaugh after Mary Kellet was removed from the case, remain.

Let this be the beginning of our work on behalf of Mr. Filler and other men like him, not the end of it.

A doublethink journey through space and time

May 27, 2011 | by uncleray | Link | Original Link

There is one theory in physics that suggests there is an infinite number of parallel universes. Let's visit one of them.

This universe is almost exactly the same as the one we live in, with one key difference: The words "man" and "woman" have been replaced with "black" and "white", respectively.

Blacks are taught from a very early age to "never hit whites." They are taught that protecting whites from harm is their responsibility and is the sign of a "real black." "Whites and children first" is the motto they must adhere to. Thus, only blacks are drafted in times of war, forced to fight and risk their lives whether they want to or not. Whites don't even need to register for Selective Service.

It is common to hear a white say "all blacks are pigs" and hear whites gossip among themselves about blacks' deficiencies, believing themselves to be above blacks. Few people think there is anything wrong with this attitude. In fact, this attitude permeates the culture at large and can be seen in much white-oriented media. Whites' superiority is constantly addressed. The President of the United States even said "whites can do anything blacks can do. And do it better. And do it in heels."

However, if a black were to say such things about a white, the black would be called a "whiteogynist" by most. It is a word heard often, but its counterpart, "blackandrist," is an obscure word few people know of and most spell checkers don't recognize. Blacks who complain about this are told to "suck it up and be a real black."

It is a very bad idea for a black to make a white angry. After all, "Hell hath no fury like a white scorned." If a black gets angry at a white, the black is probably just being an abusive jerk. He is told to "lighten up and be a real black." VAWA, the Violence Against Whites Act, was created to keep whites safe from these violent, angry blacks.

Books written for whites, such as "How To Make Your Black Behave In 21 Days Or Less Using The Secrets Of Professional Dog Trainers" or "Are Blacks Necessary?" are common. A recent article in The Atlantic titled "The End Of Blacks" praised how whites are now the majority of the workforce and is cited as yet more proof of whites' superiority. Blacks are told they can improve themselves by harnessing these superior white qualities, called "whiteininity", and must purge themselves of the defective and destructive nature of "blackulinity."

Blacks receive more jail time compared to whites for the same crime, receive little health funding compared to whites even though they die earlier and from every major cause of death with the sole exception of heart disease more often than whites, and are the subjects of humor when the victims of violence, both real and fake; very different from violence against whites.

In this universe, it is not unheard of for a "black tax" to be proposed, nor is it a rare to hear “all blacks are rapists” from people, mostly people who call themselves “Caucasianists.” Caucasianists fight for “equality among blacks and whites” according to them, and their stated goal is the destruction of the “Negroarchy” which has been holding whites back from the privileges blacks take for granted, such as voting and working, although whites achieved the right to work and vote many years ago.

There are also a few people who call themselves “Blacks’ Rights Activists” who say that blacks are disadvantaged compared to whites in the modern West. Many caucasianists accuse them of whiteogyny. Caucasianists that do acknowledge these disadvantages justify them by saying blacks deserve it due to past oppression of whites. Blacks’ rights activists counter by saying oppression of whites was caused by a select few blacks in positions of power and was not engaged in by the whole of the black population. While discriminatory practices and attitudes existed against whites, they also existed against blacks and were permeated through the culture at large in the minds of blacks and whites both. For example, most whites weren’t allowed to vote, but blacks weren’t allowed to keep any freedoms in times of war. Since many blacks were injured and killed in war, one could say these blacks weren’t allowed to live or keep their limbs.

Blacks’ rights activists also assert that to say “blacks oppressed whites” is too simplistic and unfair because blacks have protected whites throughout history, and the vast majority, though not all, of scientific and technological progress, discoveries, and inventions as well as the hard labor and construction that make modern life possible, were made by blacks. They say that blacks and whites contributed equally to the advancement of humanity. Caucasianists again accuse them of whiteogyny. “Just shut up and be a real black” they say.

Many blacks and whites who believe the plight of the blacks’ rights activists and see through the equality fog of the caucasianists simply keep silent for fear of shame and ridicule. The whites would be accused of “black worship” and would be alienated from friends and family, so the ironic position of the white having a more logical concept of blacks’ rights and well being than most blacks themselves, from the alpha blacks in power and the beta blacks under them, all who are raised to do whatever they can to please and provide for whites, is kept a guarded secret.

A society like the one in this universe would seem primitive and racist, some would say savage, compared to home from the point of view of most people. Remember though, that all we changed were two terms. We now travel back to our universe, back to our Earth. It is a sad reality when changing the meaning of the words “black and white” back to “man and woman” in our home universe would cause these same people, that is most of the population of the Western world, to immediately turn on the doublethink switch and declare that our civilization and society is not the same as that of these black and white aliens, that we are more evolved than them, more advanced and civilized, but men still oppress women and MRA’s are just imagining things. It is ironic that the ease in which humans resort to this type of thinking actually makes us millions of years under-evolved.

There is a very similar universe to the one we just visited. It is called the history of slavery and black oppression in the Western world. Yes, ladies and gentlemen, or feminists and manginas, it is this universe. Across vast magnitudes of space and time, there is little that is “advanced” across human relations as a whole, yesterday or today. The only way for this humble species of bipedal apes to reach the stars is for men and women to see themselves as one half of a whole and each other as the completion of this whole.

But wouldn’t such widespread common sense only exist in a perfect universe?

Update: The latest on the Vladek Filler trial

May 27, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box type=”alert” style=”rounded” size=”large” border=”full” icon=”none”]

With high hopes I am happy to report that things appeared to go very well for Vladek Filler in his trial this week. He testified on his own behalf, and his son was allowed to testify as well.

It is clear from reading this article in the Bangor Daily News that not only is Ligia Filler’s testimony coming under severe scrutiny, her conduct as a lying, child abusing con artist is finally being put on display in front of a jury.

I am cautiously optimistic about a not guilty verdict, perhaps as early as today. But I am also aware of the crushing power of accusation from a crying woman (Ligia reportedly turned the faucets on good and proper- as she was caught being advised to do on camera).

Perhaps, with any luck and just a hint of real justice, Ligia Filler’s name will be the first one entered in our false accuser registry.

I would love to enter the keystrokes myself.

ZetaCamp Announcement

May 27, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

If you agree with what you've been reading at AVFM, and have been joining the fight, then we want you to join us for the first ever MRA meeting of its kind. And if haven't yet got your hands dirty or your knuckles bloody, this is the point where you stand up.

Paul Elam, Keyster, JTO and other active MRAs are organizing the first annual Zeta Men's Summit – taking place during July 20-21-22 of 2012 in the Indian Peaks wilderness area in Colorado.

As Keyster has in so many words put it, this will not be a stroll in the park. We will be hiking at 9,500 feet in elevation in country that can and does snow in July. But to get away from KOA'ers and the rest of the blue pill world, we have to push to get there.

It will be more than worth it for those that come. But there is more.

If you stand for human rights, men's rights, stand up now and earn your ticket. This blast into the rocky mountains is for active MRAs – and nobody else. Make history, make your presence known, and make the feminist establishment crap its collectivist panties.

By active we mean doing things. Do you have a blog? Do you write articles for here or other MRA sites? Do you contribute artwork or music or even a little cash in the tip jar at places like AVfM and S.A.V.E..?

Are you prepared to do a one man poster/sticker drive?

The point here is not to tell you what to do for the movement but that we want MRA's that are actually doing something, anything, more than just talking in these forums.

There will be plenty of opportunities in the near future for anyone to help who wants to. You don't have to give money, but you can help with things as simple as we saw from MRA's in THIS THREAD.

Just like the walk to that campsite in the mountains, the walk toward our shared goals is not easy and cannot be done on your ass. That is not meant to offend anyone, and likely won't, except for those on their asses.

If we have not scared you off; if you are an MRA that wants to join us on we think will be a historic walk, then send us an email to zetacamp@ymail.com telling us what you do, or what you are willing to do to help in the fight against misandry, and that you would like us to count on your attendance.

We would be proud to have you aboard.

My name is Typhonblue and I am a survivor of rape hysteria

May 27, 2011 | by Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) | Link | Original Link

What makes rape a special kind of violence? It's not the physical damage, which can be very minimal; it's the emotional damage, which can be catastrophic.

Rape makes you afraid; it taints your trust in the world and twists how you see it. It drives you into a prison of fear.
But all other violence does that as well. What's truly special about rape is simple. It takes a bludgeon to your ability to bond with others in the most intimate way.

Rape robs you of your ability to see innocence.

"Get rid of men and you get rid of rape."

The sexual exploitation of women by men is the greatest taboo in our society; there is nothing more stigmatized than being a rapist of women. Rape is a call to action; today it's dressed up in new terms but it still harkens back to that primitive urge to protect female sexuality from foreign interlopers. Modern gynocentrists did not invent rape hysteria; they inherited it and they are using it the way everyone throughout history has—as a tool to grind away at things they don't like.

For the woman on the street, rape hysteria is shoved down her throat over and over till she vomits it up without thinking, all over herself and her life. It seeps into every interaction, every step she takes into the outer world. 'Is this man going to rape me? All men are guilty! I'm never safe and it's their fault!'

That's where rape hysteria wants all women to be. Frightened, helpless… impotent. Calling upon a higher authority to save them. And, of course, robbing the men around them of their innocence.

"All men are responsible for rape culture."

But rape isn't something that happens to women; it isn't something done to women by men. It's a human problem and it's a human problem that does not know gender. More men are raped in prison a year than women in the general population. More boys in juvenile facilities are raped than girls. And they are raped by women. There are surveys that show just as many men are raped in romantic relationships—date-raped—as women.

That leaves stranger rape; 26% of all non-institutional rape. It may well be that most stranger-rapists are men; but it does not follow that a vast majority of their victims are women. An argument can be made that men under-report; and studies have shown that rapists who are heterosexual in their consenting relationships will rape based on vulnerability not sex.

Statically women are not more vulnerable to rape.

And there is something else; in reading about the victimization of men by women, another story emerges.

Female potency.

Male victims, teens and adults, are changed by having been raped by a woman—they are suicidal, addicted, dysfunctional, unhinged, helpless, hurting. In the background of many male rapists of adult women is sexual abuse done to them by women. The vagina employed as a weapon can carve and twist a man so badly he defies society's most fundamental taboo—male on female rape.

The vagina is a weapon every bit as potent as a penis.

It can steal innocence.

"All sex is rape."

A child does not see innocence. To a child the world is good and bad; the good pleases the child, the bad displeases her. The world is made of good and bad people. Good people benefit the child; bad people do not.

Innocence, to a child, if it is seen is seen as weakness and a threat. Someone else's weakness threatens the child's absolute claim to the attention and effort of adults. In the child's calculus need equals worth and other's needs lessen the child's worth. The only eyes that can see innocence are those that know they can take it away. Or protect it.

Innocence is inspiration. A call to protect and provide, to be strong. It may be passive but it is powerful. It's why someone will brave flames—literal or metaphorical—to save another. Like children, many women expect men to fill them with passion. But passion only exists in those who can bear the sight of innocence.

"The personal is political."

Before I started to read about men's rights I was, like every other woman, bound by rape hysteria. Men in my eyes bore their burden of guilt and I, in turn, bore my burden of fear.

But I was lucky.

I stumbled upon the men's rights movement and saw things—statistics, studies—they pulled up from the depths of our society's subconscious—things that would silently slip down into the deep if it weren't for them.

All the evidence I've seen against rape hysteria is not good enough for those who profit from keeping women in a prison of fear; but it's good enough for me to question my obligation to stay.

I realized women have sexual potency. And if women are equally responsible for rape, then they have an equal responsibility to be responsible. Because women can take away men's—and boy's—innocence. There was no need for men to carry a burden of guilt; nor was there a need for me to carry a burden of fear.

A weight lifted from me in that moment; a weight I never knew I carried till it was gone.

Before I had always seen my husband—and every other man—as either a good man or a bad man; but never innocent. His actions were always deliberate, if he did me harm he was a villain with the blackest heart; if he did me good, he was a knight-in-shining armor.

After, he became innocent.

“The fear of rape limits women’s potential.”

Women infected by rape hysteria will meet bad men, creepy men, evil men. And they’ll meet good men, real men, strong men.

But they will never meet an innocent man.

They are poorer for it.

My name is Typhonblue and I am a survivor of rape hysteria.

The beast within

In this video of a Ukrainian girl raised by dogs, what you see, for all intents and purposes, is behaviour without genes. It is apparent from the video that genes cannot possibly account for the the girl's dog-like behaviour. Within the context of what Karl Popper referred to as falsifiability, the singular existence of a human that behaves like a dog serves to show that the universal statement "genes determine human behaviour" is false. We are thus forced to conclude, on the face of this evidence, that other factors need to be considered in explaining human behaviour.

(I don't want to get bogged down in evolutionary psychology (EP) theory, as said topic embraces a wide scope of interpretations, some good, some bad. The emphasis here is specifically on genocentrism)

There is of course the question of the video's authenticity and whether or not it is a hoax. It has thus far not been proven to be a hoax. In this review, Douglas Candland suggests that the experience of feral children can be put down to traumatic abuse prior to being "raised" by animals. However, that does not explain how a child appears to have adopted some of the very mannerisms of the animals that raised her. Academics are taking the case of the dog-girl seriously, and insofar as it has not yet been proven to be a hoax, perhaps so should we. It has important implications for our cause.

While we cannot disprove genocentrism to genocentrists any more than we can disprove Creationism to Creationists, what we can do is provide some compelling reasons, to our own satisfaction, why an extensive review of mainstream interpretations is necessary. I suggest that the following observations are relevant to understanding the case of the dog-girl:

- Associationism – an infant or young child raised among animals are subjected to associations that people raised in cultures are not. Any child raised in unusual circumstances will be exposed to unusual associations that compel them to construct narratives that lie beyond normal human experience;
- The brain that changes itself – the brain "rewires" itself in accordance with experience. Clinical examples abound that violate the genocentrist presumption that the brain, with it cast-in-concrete functional specializations, is wired according to a genetic blueprint. Consider, for example, this astonishing example of hydrocephalus. The message that appears to evade genocentrists is that self-organization is the principle by which the brain structures itself, and not just a clever little epigenetic adaptation, almost as if an afterthought;
- Theoretical frameworks outside of the Church of Genocentrism do exist, for example within the semiotic sciences, that can shed light on the case of the dog-girl, Victor, the wild boy of Aveyron, Genie and other examples of the feral condition.

And in exactly the same way, associationism and the brain that changes itself are relevant to understanding gender roles and our opposite sex. The choices that we make from our ecosystem (for humans, that ecosystem is culture), based on our biological predispositions with male mind-bodies and female mind-bodies, wire our brains. In other words, the same forces that impact on the behaviour of the dog-girl impact on how gender roles evolve in a culture.

In explaining the behaviour of any organism, all that genocentrism provides is a black box and an accompanying assertion that "it's all in the genes, you dummy". Not unlike the Creationists' God and their accompanying assertion that "it's all in the bible, you heathen". Genocentrism does not enable us to make any inferences about women's motivations. It provides no explanation whatsoever as to how and why Game works. Genocentrism has been the source of much unsubstantiated prattle, for example, along the lines that Game is adaptive and it works because of female hypergamy predisposing women to choosing the "best" genes in alpha males. But there is nothing in such a bland assertion that explains women's insecurities, priorities, motivations or desires. There is nothing therein that explains their "rationalization hamster", their manner of reasoning, their impulsive responses that can be harnessed with effective Game. Genocentrism provides nothing of practical value that can be tapped into and harnessed.

This is not to say that genes are not important. Far from it. Genes are important, but not in the manner that genocentrists assert.

Thus in the absence of any reliable, established paradigms to work with, let us advance on the assumption that the case of the dog-girl, taken seriously by the academic community, is not a hoax. The girl raised by dogs is thus the equivalent of Karl Popper's famous example of the one black swan that refutes the previously held European assumption that all swans are white. Indeed, it goes further than the black swan/white swan analogy, because it demands a very different account for how it is that a human animal can behave like a non-human animal in spite of possessing the genes that purportedly blueprint her human behavior. The case of the girl raised by dogs has struck at the foundations of the genocentric hypothesis, which needs to be challenged. Thus science being science needs to advance alternative theories that can account for animal behaviour in a human.

We need only one black swan, one example, one video. We have it. It may not be perfect, but in the absence of anything else to go on, the stakes are much too high to ignore it. We thus invoke Popper's hypothesis to reaffirm our previous conclusion (it ain't in the genes) that genocentrism remains unsubstantiated. Genes do not cause behaviour.

In divesting ourselves of this sterile, genocentric death science, we place ourselves in a better position to explore our primal, animal natures.

WHY IT IS IMPORTANT TO DUMP GENOCENTRISM

When we dispense with genocentrism, we can liberate ourselves from the genocentric ball-and-chain to conclude:

- In conjunction with biological predispositions, gender roles are learned. Nature-nurture constitutes a single process, and this enables us to make more compelling observations. Men and women like the roles to which they have been assigned. Women like being provided for. Women like having a provider take care of them. Women are comfortable with not having to take responsibility for the decisions they make, especially when men are available to wear the consequences. Women with maternal options stay at home because they can – culture grants them the pussy-pass that entitles them to the stay-at-home escape-hatch should work become too uncomfortable for them. Men work because they must – for men, there is no such thing as a penis-pass that entitles them to every manner of entitlement freeby. For men, work is not a hobby, it is not something you do if you like, something you do if your fancy takes you. Men have no choice but to work and to provide. Men compete because they provide. And men learn to deal with it. That's why men learn to enjoy competition and challenges. That's why intelligence and capability, honour and respect, mean very different things to men and women;
- Credentialism and affirmative action may have blurred traditional definitions of "achievement", but a very different reality will quickly re-establish itself should women ever have to compete with men on equal terms – minus their pussy-pass, of course. Saying that the drive to achieve and to compete is programmed into men's genes while the drive to nurture and support is programmed into women's genes is nonsense and explains nothing. Saying that it's all in the genes is a richly warm pile of steaming that sheds no light whatsoever on how the real world works, and only serves to perpetuate the lie;
- Domestic violence, and who does what, how often and to whom, is quite secondary to a much more important question… whence do children first learn violence? Whence do children first establish the priorities that matter? I'm talking about the children that go on to become adults, of course. Children first learn all this good stuff from their primary nurturer. You know, the one that is also most likely to be their primary abuser. And who might that be? One guess.

And a whole bunch of other good stuff follows. Let us open up this can of worms. Genocentrism denies us access to these kinds of insights. We should dump it forthwith. We are now in a position to comment on feminism within a more primal, first-cause context.

A THEORY OF PRIMAL MOTIVATIONS

Theory is of little use unless it has practical applicability. We've already touched on this above, but we should take our analysis to deeper levels in order to really get a sense of the implications. I would therefore like to expand on Adam Kostikas' and Fidelbogen's analyses of feminism as a hate movement. Paul's made references in the past to wanting to explore the dark feminine. Let's see where this might lead.

We know that rape fantasies are common among women. There is also this website (definitely needs to be updated) that provides a convenient summary of Woman's dark side. Anais Nin writes of Woman's secret erotic need and violation, and Roissy also ventures into the dark feminine in some of his essays. Indeed, the very inspiration for much of Roissy's online persona appears to be grounded in The Story of O. Bottom line? At a primal, visceral level, women are drawn to the ruff stuff. There is something about female sexuality, at a primal, visceral level, that is self-destructive. How might this translate to the hatred of men? Very simple. It's part of a self-fulfilling context where Woman's "secret erotic need" – violation – requires a violator to fulfil it. For Woman, the thrill of the forbidden requires a transgressor of the forbidden – someone prepared to trample across boundaries – to arouse her. The sullying of a woman's virtue can be very arousing for a woman, but it is not a sustainable mindset – it comes at a cost.

It thus betrays commonsense to suggest that violation can be enjoyed by a woman in the absence of at least residual contempt.

Clearly then, violators are inherently not gentle, kind, sweet, loving people. They are unlikely to make good fathers or reliable providers. At a primal level, a violator is formidable, arousing anything from fear to respect. The worst among violators… those most predisposed to fulfilling women's self-destructive impulses, must be inherently contemptible, almost by definition. That's why women choose thugs. And so this brings us to a comment that I've made on the odd occasion, that feminism is a systemic manifestation of the slut mindset. That is to say, a direct relationship exists between feminism, our contraceptive technologies, the sexual revolution and ultimately, the hatred of men.

This accounts for the paradox, then, of women's tendency to gravitate towards those men most likely to fulfil their self-destructive impulses. No wonder that women are so contradictory and messed up. Paradox no more. It makes perfect sense. This is the love-hate duality that can never be transcended.

Integral to the slut's mindset are a set assumptions about men, and they aren't pretty. She learns these assumptions from the types of men to whom she gives air-time. In other words, she learns from her choices (thugs and losers) what men are supposed to be like, and she tars all men with the same brush.

Otto Weininger explored similar themes in the relationship between criminality and prostitution.

So what might we conclude about feminism as a hate movement, particularly once we establish its relationship with respect to our contraceptive technologies and the sexual revolution? Surely it must be that in any sexually permissive society, the hatred of men by women is a foregone conclusion.

CONCLUSION

A proper theoretical framework enables us to penetrate to deeper levels of understanding. Within such a framework, we are better able to identify relationships and first-causes. Genocentrism provides nothing of the sort. With its credentialist references to conceptual black boxes like “instinct”, “epigenetics”, “natural selection”, and so on, it makes no attempt to get inside the heads of the living entities whose choices are being studied, and so it affords no comprehension of the nature of a desire. We need an alternative framework that encourages us to imagine ourselves within the context of the entity making the choices.

And with this approach, we arrive at an intriguing, compelling conclusion that makes sense of the taboo nature of human sexuality across the millennia of human history. Why has huamn sexuality always been such a big deal? Pregnancy, childbirth? Maybe. But what happens when you remove these inconveniences via contraceptive devices and technologies?

In feminism and contemporary culture, we have a laboratory within which we have conducted a scientific experiment of frightening magnitude. Framed from this analytical perspective, our hypotheses are:

- H_0 (null hypothesis): Feminism and the sexual revolution have no impact on our consciousnes or motivations, because everything is already accounted for by way of the genetic blueprint;
- H_1 (alternative hypothesis): Feminism and the sexual revolution do impact on our consciousness and motivations in a very powerful way, because experiences and the choices we make impact on how our brains are structured and ultimately, what we become.

Clearly, H_1 wins out. In any sexually permissive society, the hatred of men by women is a foregone conclusion. Feminism is a hate movement that strikes at the most primal level of our being.

Another look at the dark side of femininity

May 28, 2011 | by Elder Swami | Link | Original Link

Hypergamous Detachment Mechanism

I first became conscious of the darker feminine attributes when I was about 18, while having a man to man talk with my good friend Jack. Jack had just broken up with his girlfriend and was not dealing with it very well. In fact, he was a mess. The break up had been far less than pleasant, his girlfriend had cheated on him and she made sure that he saw her with her new lover while he was on a group outing. Jack was perplexed at how a woman who once seemed so soft and loving could so quickly turn into someone so cold, spiteful and calculated. After all, he had done everything that he was told would make him the perfect boyfriend, like taking dancing class, playing guitar for her and many other things manginas pride themselves in.

I reflected on my own experiences and was also shocked to find that women were quite different from the perfectly gentle, caring creatures I had been constantly told they were. Since then I have spent a great deal of energy trying to understand why the sex that are supposed to be the loving nurtures can also at times be the most spiteful and unfeeling.

What I found is quite intriguing, studies show that both males and females are instinctively non monogamous. That means that both men and women have the natural instinct to find multiple mates, however the way in which they act on this instinct is quite different. As we are all constantly reminded through the media, men are equipped with the biological mechanisms that influence them to chase several mates at once. However what we are not told is that females are also equipped with a biological mechanism that allows them to act on their instincts as well. Females are not only polyandrous but are also hypergamous, in that they shift from one mate to the next, always looking for the opportunity to move on to a more powerful and/or resource rich partner[1]. This was because prehistorically women where constantly pregnant or nursing infants and her first instinct was to ensure their survival. For this reason she is equipped with an instinct (or mechanism) that allows her to objectively choose a mate and move between mates according to their ability to protect and provide her (and her offspring) with resources [1].

I´m sure we are all aware of the very shallow and materialistic reasons many women choose their mates, but what I think is the most important discovery here is the shallow and materialistic reasons they leave their mates, and their instinctive ability to do so.

As you would imagine, when moving from one partner to another, emotional attachment will only be an impediment. Therefore a part of the female mating instinct is a mechanism that allows her to leave her partner for another without compunction, or, in other words, detach herself emotionally.

Emotional detachment is a typical human behaviour during certain periods of life, such as during the teenage years, while others are born with it permanently. For teens its purpose is to force them away from his/her parents so that they can gain full independence[2]. For women the symptoms and purpose are almost identical, in that they wish to detach themselves from something and are able to totally disregard the feelings that would prohibit them from doing so. The symptoms of the psychopathic syndrome linked with emotional detachment are described as “an egocentric, narcissistic and deceitful interpersonal style, expression of callous and unemotional affect” [3]

Does this sound…familiar?

Often women go a step further than just emotionally detaching themselves from the feelings of the previous mate but can replace her love for him with hate. With these feelings of hate and resent she may also take acts of revenge or extract resources from him during the separation process [1].This is the underlying cause of the disproportionate amount of female initiated divorce rates and the terrible and unscrupulous treatment of their ex husbands during and after the fact.

The purpose of this essay is not to demonise women, as I have pointed out both sexes have potentially harmful traits and many women can be very loving and supportive. However, the problem is that our culture is in complete denial of the female hypergamous detachment mechanism, (or in other words a woman´s ability to leave her partner and take advantage of him materially with little emotion or inhibition). Along with being denied, this primitive behaviour is enabled and even encouraged through the divorce courts resulting in terrible consequences for all involved.

I believe it is our responsibility to inform this generation of young men of this problem, because I’m sure we have all ignorantly walked into this situation once ourselves, just like Jack.

Two halves of the same movement

May 28, 2011 | by keyster | Link | Original Link

We have two distinct and yet often overlapping areas in the men's rights movement.

1) Counter-feminism – Exposing its lies and fighting its political and legal advances that favor women, at the expense of men and society.

2) Gynology – Analysis of woman's behavior intended to free men from misconceptions, enabling them to evaluate women objectively.

It's seems #2 is a natural reaction to #1. Men are forming strategies to outflank feminist governance by tacitly understanding the "enemy." Counter-feminism is the political, while gynology is the personal. They've become inextricably intertwined because, while feminism was a march towards power for women as a group in the political sphere, it also succeeded in recruiting compliant individual women to fight for power over men in the home and workplace.

But something unintended and even more sinister is beginning to happen. As more men dissect the pathology of the "feminine mystique," they're more and more disappointed at what they find underneath the once mysterious veneer of "sugar and spice and everything nice," They're starting to view women exactly how feminists intended for them to. Not as "sex objects" and "domestic slaves," but as high-functioning contributors to the ongoing advancement of the human race. Imagine that! And when you strip away the sexual allure, uniqueness, subtlety and delicate nature of the feminine, you end up with a rather diminished and often tedious version of the masculine in a pantsuit.

Once revered, respected and desired for being a wife and mother, she's now viewed as an opportunity for sex at best, someone to be avoided at worst. She had a very unique place in the world of men where she'd rarely have to concern herself with things like working for money and food and shelter. We loved her and we loved her nature, because we understood our support of her to be necessary for a strong society. We were the "gentlemen" and they were "ladies."

We're now at the stage in this "social (and now economic) warfare" between the sexes, where after being condemned, disrespected, belittled, discriminated against, devalued and outright hated by women (and feminist men)…that we're finally starting to hate back. This is creating a sort of "Mexican standoff" between men and women, where women hate as much as ever, and the power of the vaginal canal no longer holds the sway over men it once did. Because for every little advance women made to become more like men, they lost a little more of their sexual power. They don't like it; and who do they blame?

Well men of course. Refusing to "man-up" never felt so right.

What is the remedy for this miserable feminist induced situation society finds itself in? Women as a group will have to lay down their arms, openly and actively condemn feminism as a hate movement against men, and start actually liking and respecting men again. Because men are fed up with the bullshit they've been buried under the last 50 years. You're not cute anymore ladies. You're surly, demanding and competing against us for employment in a dog eat dog world on a tilted playing field. It's not just feminists or even women as a group anymore; its individual women we're directing our disgust and apathy towards too. That's a shift in consciousness.

We can be partners in life again or virulent enemies, sworn to destroy each other.

Which will it be? Peace or war? Love or hate?

The next few years of our civilization's history might be your last chance to make amends, before the "Collapse." And by then it might be too late, because when fighting for food and water, who do you think will win? You're either with us or against us. Start tearing down the wall feminism built and learn to love men again and all will be forgiven.

Single and singular

The role of Zeta Masculinity in the face of escalating Masculine Disenfranchisement

I am routinely asked by women if I'm married. Women I meet through my work ask me this, women I meet socially ask me, married and single women both field this question with equal regularity. Sometimes they assume – and ask "where is your wife?" or they assume fault with the question "why aren't you married?"

I'm a professionally employed 41 year old man, and I've been single all my life. I like it, and I have no plan to marry, ever. The reason for my singularity is that as a man, marriage offers me nothing except sacrifice and servitude. This is partly due to the modern convention that old family-forming social construct has become, and partly due to what I understand about women in my culture, their expectations, entitlements, and qualities.

I'll state my position again, this time explicitly so that there can be no misunderstanding. I am not single-and-lonely. I am not a man who "missed out" on marriage. I saw, early in my life that marriage was a construct affording advantages to one sexual demographic, and nearly unlimited social, legal, and financial liabilities to the other sexual demographic.

I love being single. I love the personal autonomy, the financial freedom, and the fact that I answer to nobody but myself. As a man in his early 40's – I also enjoy a level of social prestige and personal power which has been rising in my life since I hit about 28 years old. Women's personal, sexual and social power has always been tied to their youth, and reaches an apex somewhere in their early twenties. At that age, I was more-or-less at the complete mercy of my female contemporaries, and being a typical "nice guy," found myself sexually invisible and socially powerless.

No longer, in fact – as I mentioned already, the question from females about my marital status is a matter of routine. In addition to the natural magnification of male social power as a factor of age, I am also increasingly disconnected from the psychological pressure of male conformity. This is a product of my own cheerfully belligerent personality, but also due to embrace of a new model for masculine self identity, which is discussed later in this article.

Correlating to the elevation of social prestige of self-collected men in their mid thirties and onwards is the glaring fact that among single women in of this age group, and younger – there's a real dissatisfaction. This often takes the form of the rhetorical question "where are all the good men" or "why aren't there any good men." The answer being what happened to them is women, but not just women in the sense that "women are bad," I mean women in the system of law and custom we presently enjoy.

This is a feminist society which treats men as walking cash and sperm dispensers, and whether most men characterize the situation in the stark terms I've used, they increasingly understand it. The characterization most often repeated in print media uses the phrase "fear of commitment" and is clearly intended to shame noncompliant men into stepping up like good little beasts of burden and assuming their station as the self-sacrificing protector, provider and enabler of a woman who, in the present zeitgeist regards (compliant) men as domesticated animals.

Some kool-aid drinking social commentators have taken to characterization of male independence as arrested adolescence. Micheal Kimmel, the renowned apologist for female supremacy and denigrator of men recently published a condemnation of male self-actualization using this shaming characterization with the title Guyland.

Kay Heimowitz, published "child man in the promised land" another mis-aimed attempt to equate "correct" male adulthood with servitude to a women, and self actualization in men as irresponsibility.

Traditional adulthood for men used to encompass starting a family, fathering children, purchasing a home, and other markers of social respectability. Modern men are increasingly avoiding this path, and social commentators condemn this choice, but those who would call men opting out of the traditional markers of respectable male adulthood have completely missed the point.

There is nothing left for men. For a growing number of men waking to the reality of life in a feminized society, there is nothing attractive and much that is repellant in "manning up" to be a good little husband, father, provider, protector, and beast of burden. Even men raised by single mothers and fed a lifetime diet of the now mainstream feminist zeitgeist are rejecting the harness and cage that masculine adulthood offers. The mainstream, feminist-normalized version of a real man reads like the technical specification of a servant-robot from a science fiction novel. Service, self sacrifice, altruism, selflessness, but no self actualization. Despite the endlessly droning message that men are dumber than dirt, men do get the picture, and are rejecting it.

This obviously has some serious long term economic and social consequences. The social sidelining of men is a non-trivial loss to a nation's economic competitive advantage. It is men who work the vast majority of jobs based on producing natural resources, as well as manufacturing. The shift from resource and manufacturing based economy to financial and service based economy has never in history, preceded anything except national economic collapse.

However, this is not even the most worrisome outcome of the real disenfranchisement of men in western society. A simple economic sidelining of men would be recoverable within a human lifetime. What's actually happening as result of the social marginalization of male identity is the autonomous re-definition of self identity among the most alert and psychologically strongest men in our society. This has been discussed within the men's rights community under the still loosely defined term zeta masculinity.

Zeta masculinity is not the sour grapes redefinition of mainstream social rejection with a reality denying label. Such as rebranding the word “slut” from its traditional definition of “sexually irresponsible jackass” to the feminist preferred meaning of “empowered woman.” No, the emerging identity of zeta masculinity is a wholly new social construct, and it is increasingly providing a pathway for male self actualization and measurable social, and economic freedom for men embracing and defining it. Zeta masculinity is a model for male identity in which men can succeed, self actualize, and prosper – and in the escalating mainstream of male disenfranchisement, that makes the zeta male highly dangerous to feminist ideologues.

In the world of physical reality, society runs on male innovation, male labour, male stamina, and male protection. Political and social realities operate to bury this uncomfortable truth from view, and the increasing feminization of society requires that men, marginalized and criminalized, continue to provide the heavy lifting that a functional society relies on. The emergence of the zeta male threatens this orderly exploitation of men by a society which increasingly holds male identity in contempt. The shaming language employed by mainstream commentators against men “failing to man up” is based on an incomplete, but worried recognition of this fact.

Previously, my writing as an MRA had the goal of averting or slowing the real damage to society resultant from the removal of men as self-actualized and enfranchised members. This has changed, and in a society which increasing treats identity as a man – as if it is definitionally criminal, my social motive has changed as well. The critics of male self-actualization, berating men for failing to conform to female expectations recognize the hazard of men opting out and going their own way. They’re right to see this trend as socially corrosive.

Where I differ from these critics is in investment in the modern status quo. It is not worth preserving.

A system sufficiently corrupted is not salvageable, and not worth investment of resource to repair. Zeta masculinity increasingly provides a viable option for male personal freedom. As an MRA, I am a strong critic of present feminized social convention. Rather than working to correct or avert the socially harmful consequences of male disenfranchisement, I am amused to watch a society relying on men while criminalizing male identity crumble under its own false assumptions.

However, before some shrill and accusatory voice labels this view as antisocial, hateful, or whatever other pejorative phrase feminist thesaurus has for “masculine” ; I’ll point out that at the root of my own value system is order, nonviolence, and peace.

My wall is adorned with a copy of the Magna Carta – not because of an authoritarian love of rules, but because that document forms, in my own cosmology; the foundation of individual civil liberty for humans in the western world. That western systems of law have been perverted into a totalitarian tiered society along lines of the sexual grievance industry is tragic, but I won’t work to fix a system warped into perversion. I’ll laugh while I watch it burn. I’ll laugh because I know there’s a viable alternate path. The potential collapse of civil society doesn’t necessitate the universal poverty and brutality a world without the path to masculine zeta identity would require.

Of course, adherents of the present mainstream culture of denigration of masculinity are welcome to migrate their world view to one compatible with zeta masculinity, if they have the maturity and backbone for it. But the invitation should not be mistaken for a further free pass or for exemption from accountability. It also won’t be an open invitation forever.

Gynocentrism: Barbie meets Dinky Toys!

If you haven't had enough of the argument over the "nature vs. nurture" crap, feel free to throw this into the mix. Personally I think it's a pile of bullshit opinion comparable to a can of nuts, bolts, washers and screws. They all look worthwhile and if you dig long enough you might find the right size or the right fit, that's why you will never throw them out, you just never know and they're shiny.

I'd like to direct this to all the piece of shit, knuckle dragging, dick wagging, perpetrating, objectifying, wife battering, rapist men out there. For those that are unsure…take a number and wait till you're called. It's time for some sensitivity training. That's right dude, and we are going to take a shortcut here so that you can feel the power of your sensitivity immediately.

For this exercise you will need a toy car, a toy truck, a doll, an elastic band, handcuffs, two pocket size rocks, (marbles will do), a worm and a glass of water. Hurry up we're waiting.

Now take the two pocket size rocks (marbles will do) and put them into one of your pockets, right to the bottom, no cheating. Now this part is important so pay attention. Make sure you have enough room for this. Spin around three times as fast as you can, this will induce a state of attention deficit disorder. If you fall down or stumble, good job, you've achieved attention deficit hyperactive disorder.

WARNING: make sure no one is watching, or you might find yourself medicated. Remember it's a sensitivity simulation. Spectators will be confused.

Once you achieve a reasonable state of "who gives a shit" you're ready to move on with the exercise. Pick up the worm and give it a name. Now I don't want to introduce any cultural bias here, you're not trying to impress anyone but the worm. If this kind of multi-tasking is a challenge take your left index finger, stick it in your nose and wiggle it around. Now you know why you shouldn't stick a worm in your nose, its physics and it feels weird. Now put the worm in your pocket, that's right the same pocket as the rocks (marbles will do). Why? Because rocks come from the ground and so do worms.They're friends.

Here's where we move on to the self-empowerment portion of this sensitivity simulation. Take the truck and sputter just like an engine. If it sounds more like a motorcycle either you're cheating or you have dry mouth. This is where you get to use the water. However, if you are in fact cheating you're only cheating yourself. Once you drink the water begin sputtering like an engine again. Remember achieving the right sound is not nearly as important as spitting all over your face and the floor. Now take the car and place it on the floor within arm's reach. Rev up the engine in the truck, sputter counts, the more the better. You can't have a good accident without a slippery surface so if you need an extra moment to sputter take it. Now slam that fucking truck right into that car and mean it.

This is the moment of male ecstasy, the absolute expression of the force and nature of an overwhelming patriarchy. It is the infusion of godlike omniscience and the ultimate oppression and subjugation of car, truck, saliva and floor. The boy becomes man and the man becomes God. Of course the worm becomes paste. It is at this point we end the simulation, directing you to wipe the spit off your face, reach into to your pocket. Yes the one with the rocks (marbles will do). Telling us exactly how you feel, yes now, we want to know, give us the depth of your sensitivity, we ARE READY FOR IT!!!!

If you responded with green Jell-O, remove your hand from your pocket, the one with the rocks (marbles will do) and go get some from the refrigerator, good job. Now we move on to the next simulation.

Take the elastic band and grabbing some of your hair create a pig tail; don't worry about symmetry or location the object here is to be introduced to the word pig. Now pick up the doll and in a wholly nurturing fashion begin to project your emotional immaturity in a soft, subtle and coercive tone. Remember that you speak for the doll and it can't possibly experience or feel anything that you have not interpreted and assigned to it.

Try to project a meaningful dialogue with the doll. It is your responsibility to speak for the doll and to express the emotional insight and experience that the doll should be engaged in. If at this point you find that the doll is unwilling or uncooperative you may need to resort to shaming, verbal abuse or even corporal punishment.

WARNING: make sure no one is watching, or you might have to blame the doll. Remember it's a sensitivity simulation. Spectators can't possibly empathize with your narcissism.

Continue to objectify the doll while convincing yourself that it's all about you and your feelings. You may find it helpful to use either, the princess, the mother or the marriage narrative. Using all three at the same time does qualify as multi-tasking so don't be afraid to challenge that doll. It should be relatively simple to compete emotionally with a lump of plastic, so don't give up until the doll achieves a complete understanding of your state of oppressed victimization. Once you have subjugated yourself, and again you need only convince yourself and only you know for sure, you have achieved the purpose of the simulation. You are now sensitized, and narcissistically self-absorbed.

Good Job.

Yeah, nature or nurture, tough question. Which to go with, trucks or dolls? Hmmmm!

With my vast experience at breathing and flushing toilets, I'm left to conclude that rather than argue over the two, nature or nurture it might just be safer to try and make them work together. It's frugal and cost effective, besides what if I throw one of them out and I'm wrong.

I've decided that the route to take with my kids is to nurture their nature.

It strikes me that "nature" speaks to the individual, while "nurture" speaks for a community. If we cannot nurture the nature of an individual, how long before the individual becomes a pathology of self- loathing, against their own nature and against the community. It is curious that we now see crime as a nurtured outcome and grant innocence to the individual, by gender.

You may be wondering why the handcuffs are left over that's for a very special simulation that needs to take place between every father and son. It's called cops and perpetrators. No doubt, Dad already knows the rules and how to play. It's time to nurture his assigned nature.

As a closing chill to this little exercise of sensitivity consider the similarity of a woman parenting an infant. Watch closely the behaviors that mirror doll play, the objectification of the experience, how well the mother (doll goddess) is controlling the outcome as compared to the experience of the infant. Observation will reveal that nurturing is nurtured convenience. The infant does not really exist, only the mothers experience defines the infant's presence. Munchausen by proxy is not a behavioral anomaly, it resides in every maternal relationship, only the extent to which the expression is acknowledged, defines it.

Very many men, raised by single mothers, know the truth all too well. They know the years of her suffering and sacrifice. They know because she tells them.

In fact she tells everyone.

How research is used to promote male hatred

May 31, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

A book titled The Death of White Sociology, edited by Howard University professor Joyce Ladner, ostensibly focuses on the birth of "black" sociology and also the death of what is called "white" sociology. It describes a shift in worldview from the traditional Euro viewpoint to the black sociological point of view, written about African Americans by African Americans.

Ladner examines the ways that our culture, media, and academia fostered potent, misleading messages about blacks that were intended for ingestion by both white and black culture. It observes the period after slavery and convincingly maps out the different ways that "common sense lies" about blacks were spread and maintained. And it details the negative impact of these lies on cultural consciousness.

It is an unsettling story of the power of mainstream thought as expressed by "most" people, the power of the media to reflect, mold and perpetuate that thought through news and entertainment, and the power of our academic institutions, who captured the essence of the erroneous assumptions and fed them back to the public as "proven science," starting the cycle anew.

Ladner has convincingly dissected and exposed the schemata for adding mortar and brick to the wall of social bigotry, in this case asserting white superiority over blacks.

She also, though I am sure it wasn't her intent, provided a complete and compelling roadmap of cultural misandry and how the same techniques are currently being used toward the end of asserting women's superiority over men.

So what are these artifacts of the previous generation, now used to further a similar path of hatred and the social marginalization of men? Take a look at them, which I have labeled as bricks, as they are summarized directly from the book. As you read, simply replace the word "blacks" with the word "men," and the word "whites" with the word "women. "

Brick #1. Blacks are defined as the perpetrators and creators of social pathology and not as its victims.

By linking blacks as being perpetrators and creators of social pathology the culture was able to devalue blacks and paint them as inferior to whites.

When blacks were shown to be the victims of a hateful culture people turned a blind eye. The predominant meme was that blacks were the creators and perpetrators of social pathology and anything varying from that was ignored. Even in research when blacks were seen as victims this was all too often ignored.

Anyone even vaguely familiar with the issues of men in today's world will immediately see the connection here.

The modern cultural zeitgeist has been methodically and intentionally founded on the assumption that men are the problem. We see this most brazenly furthered by ideological organizations like the National Organization of Men Against Sexism (NOMAS), the American Men's Studies Association (AMSA) and the Society for the Psychological Study of Men and Masculinity (SPSMM) aka Division 51 of the American Psychological Association. Even a cursory glance through any of their websites reveals a harshly anti-male stance, with repetitive characterizations of men as oppressively violent and women as powerless victims.

They claim to be scholars, supported by valid research, but commit themselves openly to agreement with feminist orthodoxy, not scientific empiricism.

Murray Straus, a leading authority on domestic violence, exposed the depth and scope of this kind of academic corruption in a paper he wrote, Processes Explaining the Concealment and Distortion of Evidence on Gender Symmetry in Partner Violence.

The paper is recommended reading, but the seven techniques Straus identified to perpetuate falsehoods and conceal valid research, particularly in the area of domestic violence, are as follows:

1. Suppress Evidence
2. Avoid Obtaining Data Inconsistent with the Patriarchal Dominance Theory
3. Cite Only Studies That Show Male Perpetration
4. Conclude That Results Support Feminist Beliefs When They Do Not
5. Create "Evidence" by Citation
6. Obstruct Publication of Articles and Obstruct Funding Research That Might Contradict the Idea that Male Dominance Is the Cause of PV
7. Harass, Threaten, and Penalize Researchers Who Produce Evidence That Contradicts Feminist Beliefs

Again, for the detailed support for these talking points, I refer you to Straus (who actually knows how to support his assertions). His information is not a historical review; it is a well-documented exposé about intentional, current and ongoing corruption in the broader academic establishment. That points directly to organizations like NOMAS, AMSA and SPSMM, who are the primary beneficiaries of the fraud, but is far more widespread than just these easily identifiable radical ideologues.

You can see the results of the disinformation, even in lies furthered by the current presidential administration, and in legislation supported in bi-partisan fashion like VAWA, which assumes male violence and female perpetration as the default.

It has been enormously effective. What at one time was a mechanism to keep blacks in their place has now begun to falter as a tool of racial control. But the harness is now firmly around the necks of the men, including black men and other minorities, across western culture.

Brick #2. Blacks are better if they seek to emulate whites.

In the early to mid-20th century one of the tactics the researchers used in painting blacks as inferior was to do research on Blacks, Whites and Mulattos. The conclusions were almost always the same. The more White influence in your blood the better you were. If you were light skinned you were automatically seen as better. They took this a step further and would write about Blacks being more cultured when they had more time being around whites. It was as if, the "white is right" mentality rubbed off simply by contact. When Blacks did poorly it was often assumed that they simply didn't have the good influence of white people. This meme disdained blacks and glorified whites as being the truly cultured ones.

It's easy to see how this transposes in today's culture. Now it is men who are deemed "better" if only they would act more like women. Men who are not around women are seen as suspect. Men who don't emote like women are assumed to be emotionally deficient or stunted, and in need of feminine influence to measure up on a human scale. This meme now glorifies the female way as being the default and shames men for not living up to this.

You can see this idea repeated and reinforced throughout the entire culture, from feminist academe to the media to your living room, if you are cohabitating with the average western woman.

It has also become a monetized aspect of pop psychology, not just in the works of TV hucksters like Dr. Phil, but in the works of sexist ideologues like Michael Kimmel and Christopher Kilmartin. It moves a step further in demagoguery such as that offered up by the even more blatantly misandric and sexist "Conscious Men," Gay Hendricks and Arjuna Ardaugh.

Consider the repetitive themes throughout the mainstay of "wisdom" offered by men beholden to feminist ideology. You will see many references to concepts like "new" or "enlightened" masculinity, all of it meant to embrace a feminized reinterpretation. And you will see the redundant vilification of manhood with concepts like "toxic" and "hegemonic" masculinity.

These men are the direct corollaries to the "good" blacks, who, through the emulation of "white traits and speech," found patronizing acceptance from some parts of a white culture that was intentionally conditioned to see them as inferior. They are advocating for a more accepetable, "light-skinned" masculinity.

In short, the intent of their work is the social breeding of male house niggers for women of all colors.

Brick #3. Research showing ways that blacks were superior to whites was deep-sixed.

When the early researchers would do studies where blacks were seen to be better than whites in some respect the researchers would consistently deep six that aspect of their work. It simply wouldn't see the light of day. In this way whites continued to be seen as always superior.

This is addressed in Straus's paper, but the results from it can also been seen routinely in the culture around you.

In today's climate when men do better than women it is seen not as the strength of men but as discrimination against women, or as an artifact of undue power granted men at birth by an oppressive patriarchy.

When men excelled over women in mathematics or hard science, it was because women were historically excluded from education. When women were fully included in education, indeed given enough special incentives that they ended up more educated than the average man, but still lagged behind in math and hard science, it was because women were socially discouraged from pursuing male dominated fields. When women were given special empowerment programs, special grants and scholarships and received far reaching encouragement to major in math and hard sciences, and they still lagged behind men, it was because hard sciences relied on phallocentric concepts of logic and empiricism that put women at another disadvantage at the hands of men.

When the obvious truth was finally spoken publicly by Larry Summers, president of Harvard, that women did not possess the same aptitude for math and sciences as men, he was fired.

Brick #4. Aversion of whites toward blacks proves their inferiority.

The aversion of the whites towards blacks was used as proof that blacks were inferior in the 20th century. Why else would whites look down on them?

Women's aversion and disdain of men is now used as proof that men are inferior. Just think of some of the catch phrases we have heard in our culture. "Only men can prevent rape." "Man hating is honorable." "Men are Pigs." "Boys are stupid, throw rocks at them."

Furthermore, this is taken to even more extremes of aversion with political antics like "Take Back the Night," rallies, geared to create the impression that men are creatures of the dark and that the aversion to them needs to be taken to the level of clearing them out of the night itself.

We have seen similar protests from other organizations. SlutWalks are now ongoing to establish rules that prevent men from speaking their mind with women.

What's more, there appears to be a balancing effect being established in the pursuit of feminist governance, designed to allow women to push men out at will, wherever it serves them, but allows them to usurp male resources, again, whenever it serves them.

It's called keeping your slave out of sight unless you need him for something.

While men are now routinely reviled as social pariah, and are being drummed out of the workforce and education, legislation in the form of family law and public assistance that strips men of resources and passes it on to women, moves on.

Sound familiar?

Brick #5. The psychological research of the day in the early to mid-20th century was not geared to help blacks but to blame them and chronicle how they need to change.

Articles that were written and placed their focus on blacks tended to feature issues that showed blacks to be at fault for problems and stayed intent on how they needed to change. This of course ignored the needs of blacks.

We see the same pattern in today's research on men. We visit back to Division 51 of the American Psychological Association, whose stated allegiance to feminist approved outcome makes them some of the more skilled masons building this wall.

If you look at the offerings that Division 51 makes to the Good Men Project Magazine, you will see the recurring theme of inherent male defectiveness with the not so subtle inference of feminized ideals as an ameliorative answer.

Division 51 was the same organization that upon the shooting tragedy at Virginia Tech by an obviously psychotic madman, published an article on the event, tying the shooters actions to "toxic" masculinity.

Remember, Division 51 isn't (assumedly) just another gang of sexist hacks like AMSA and NOMAS. They carry the prestigious name of the American Psychological Association with them, affording them the appearance of forward thinking and scholarly integrity.

That is very, very dangerous credibility in the hands of a bunch of bigots.

Their work is not geared to be of help to men, but rather to blame them for social problems. Men who are perpetrators of domestic violence, men who need to stop violence against women, men who commit sexual assault and harassment; the list goes on and on.

Now visit our page at the top labeled "The Facts," and then go over to Division 51 of the American Psychological Association. Compare that list of the multitude of issues facing men in our culture and see what, if anything, Division 51 is doing to address the problems.

Hint: You won't need to have pen and paper to make a list. They are not directly addressing a single issue faced by men or boys on that list.

Not a single one.

Brick #6. Blacks are just animals and criminals

Without the influence and control of whites it was assumed that blacks were simply animalistic/primitive and constantly focused on sex. The fear was of black men raping white women; Black men murdering and stealing, etc… The source of criminality was blackness itself. The two were perennially linked and in so doing blacks were saddled with being the core of the problem, not the victim of it.

Now this same projection is focused on men. Take a trip to The Good Men Project, an artifact of the new sexist sociology, and find out why violence is a "men's issue." Consider the implications of a Violence Against Women Act in a culture where adult women are the least frequent victims of domestic or any other kind of violence. Ask yourself why we now have the successful coining of the term "rape culture," codespeak for male culture, and why it paints a broad stroke of sexist stereotyping on every man and boy in the western world.

It is safe to assume that the old memes about blacks were being propagated unconsciously, but foolish to think of that lack of consciousness as an excuse. Most people were not intentionally hateful and judging towards blacks, they were simply swept up in the tide of social consciousness that was prevalent at the time.

But the damage was done, just as it is being done now.

The “common sense” that is the cultural expression of all hateful meme’s is propagated as common knowledge, and it had the impact of not only condemning blacks as inferior, it was also integral to justifying poor treatment and poor conditions.

It is obvious that these sorts of memes were very damaging to blacks. It doesn’t take much imagination to conceive of the hurtful impact of being seen as inferior or criminal or generally a bane to “decent” society. The cumulative effects of this were devastating and a new consciousness was needed in order to begin the process of abandoning the old programming.

In the 1950’s men, generally speaking, were held in relatively high esteem, especially if they were providing for and protecting women and children. This esteem held true even in respectively segregated populations. In other words, white men were held in high regard in white society; the same for black men, as men, within their own culture.

Then from 1960 onward things started to change. Blacks began shedding their cultural burden while women, generally speaking, were expanding their sex roles and getting good press as model human beings and consummate victims. The culture began to see and portray women in a most positive light, establishing cultural taboo’s on speech, and even thought, to the contrary.

Today all men, regardless of ethnicity, are suffering because of this sort of cultural scheme. Like the early 20th century no one notices that they are carrying and expressing the bigotry, even most of the victims.

Brick #7. The group in power is always likely to use every means at its disposal to create the impression that it deserves to be where it is. And it is not above suggesting that those who have been excluded have only themselves to blame.

This is the rub, is it not? By furthering misinformation, through dubious social findings, fraudulent research and the unrestrained use of political power, feminist governance was established, and is being maintained, on the same exact model used to continue the oppression of blacks after slavery ended.

If you are an MRA, you are not unfamiliar with feminist ideologues suggesting that you are to blame for the lack of available of services for male victims of DV. “If men need shelters, why aren’t they building them?” they ask, in utter condescension. Of course they are oblivious to the fact that feminists didn’t build DV shelters, they only used the government to take over them after they were built; a government that is as complicit in the misandric zeitgeist as academe, and which steadfastly refuses to recognize male victims or female perpetrators.

But that is just a microcosm of the problem. It speaks to minutia; trivial detail.

Feminists have, with the complicity and cooperation of traditionalists, built a social model of female superiority that is building toward equivalence with that of the Godlike power of whites over blacks in the Antebellum South.

For White men it is a new experience. For black men it will be nothing less than a return to their early post-African roots. For Black men, feminism is the end of their civil rights movement.

Feminist ideologues and their henchmen don't care about the color of men. In the postmodern era we are all to blame. All men have been the oppressors who had held women back for centuries. All men have to pay for it. All wars are caused by men. All men are destructive, to the environment and to the economy. All men are rapists. All men are violent.

Your status in respect to color is only that of what color pig you were born.

And all men are now getting the cultural shadow projections. It was after the advent of gender feminism in the 1960's when young men started killing themselves nearly six times as often as similarly aged young girls. We now have men experiencing more academic struggle and failure than ever before. Boys are dropping out and failing to attend college at unprecedented rates. They are similarly falling from the ranks of the employed, and employable.

And they are being incarcerated at rates that far outpace the rest of the industrialized world.

Joseph Biden’s Abuse Fantasy Tour

May 31, 2011 | by Carey Roberts | Link | Original Link

What is it with Democratic vice-presidents who embrace radical schemes, and then do complete a U-turn on the truth in order to mislead and alarm the citizenry?

First was Al Gore’s high-profile dalliance with international wealth re-distribution in the guise of stopping global warming. And now comes Joe Biden’s crusade to destabilize the family and grow the welfare state, under the benign-sounding banner of eradicating domestic violence.

Admittedly I had to restrain the impulse to belly laughter when the current issue of Glamour magazine with the Biden interview crossed my desk. At first I thought Glamour was doing a beta-test on a new science fiction gig. But no, these people really want us to believe this stuff.

First was the tableau of Mr. Biden in full-gravitas mode, seated by a roaring White House fireplace, eyebrows arched in paternal dismay, with the blue suit, regimental tie, and room decor all underscoring the somber theme: Vice President Joe Biden and Dr. Jill Biden say abuse is worse than being in prison.

And where do we begin? The jaw-slacking half-truths, the none-too-subtle fear-mongering, or the outright fabrications?

OK, we’ll start with the half-truths.

It’s been less than two months since Reginald Daye died at the hand of girlfriend Crystal Mangum, discredited Duke lacrosse accuser, who plunged a kitchen knife deep into his chest following over an argument over rent money. Mangum has now been charged with homicide.

Surveys reveal Mangum is only the latest example of a galloping epidemic of female-initiated partner aggression. The latest report from the U.S. Centers for Disease Control shows teenage girls are now 30% more likely than boys to slap, shove, or try to hurt their dating partners.

But throughout the Biden interview, women are inevitably depicted as victims at the hands of their brutish boyfriends and husbands. Not the slightest suggestion emerges that females may be abuse perpetrators.

This is not a matter of doing a Shake-and-Bake routine on the numbers. It’s a case of outright assault and battery on the truth.

True, Mr. Biden sees himself an advocate for women, but does that mean abuse-prone females who need help should be swept under the rug for the sake of political correctness?

Ready for the fear-mongering?

The article alludes to the gallant “fight to keep women safe,” and the Vice President floats the notion that any abusive relationship “is worse than being in prison.” It’s like women need to be constantly at the ready for their daily regimen of bruising and beatings.

But Biden never puts the issue in perspective, failing to inform women that the actual risk of being knocked off by their husband lies on the same order of magnitude as being struck by a bolt of lightning.

Now for the fabrication follies….

Mr. Biden claims the real cause of domestic violence is the “attitude of how society views women as chattel.” Of course women in our society benefit from all the legal rights as men, and enjoy endless choices and opportunities. So is Biden’s use of the word chattel to be considered absurd, inflammatory — or merely silly?

The Vice President then reports, “when we looked at the statistics for women who are dating, we noticed the homicide rate has actually gone up.” Since I have delved deeply into the domestic violence reports and had never heard this factoid, doubts begin to seize my consciousness.

So I contacted the DoJ Bureau of Justice Statistics, asking if they could confirm Mr. Biden’s claim. Michael Rand, Chief of Victimization Statistics at the BJS promptly wrote me back, saying “I am not familiar with the study that was the source of the statement you cited.”

In response to Joe Biden’s well-rehearsed statistical tom-foolery, columnist Robert Franklin commented, “Someone should tell him to lay off the Kool-Aid.”

If you want to know the truth about domestic violence, several good resources are available on-line, such as this compilation of 282 studies.

And if you’re looking for an unabashed, full-frontal abuse spoof, be sure to peruse Vice President Biden’s recent interview in Glamour magazine.

The eventual outcome of feminism, part II

June 1, 2011 | by Adam Kostakis | Link | Original Link

Lecture No. 11

"Propaganda, as inverted patriotism, draws nourishment from the sins of the enemy. If there are no sins, invent them! The aim is to make the enemy appear so great a monster that he forfeits the rights of a human being." – Sir Ian Hamilton

The physical destruction of maleness is the logical outcome of feminist governance.

The more feminist governance exists, the more anti-male persecution there will be, and the closer to Holocaust we will find ourselves. More feminism will not result in greater sexual equality. More feminism is not the solution to the problems addressed by Men's Rights Activists. Feminism is the problem. How could it be otherwise? Feminists believe that a debt is owed to them by all men, and they are perfectly content to recover this debt in blood and suffering. No matter how much pain they inflict unto the world, it will never be enough to satiate their violent, vindictive emotions. Rather, the more harm they inflict upon men, the more normalized this becomes, and – like a drug addiction – they will need ever greater 'highs' to satisfy the hate, culminating in the Final Punishment, the total eradication of men.

Note that I am not mincing words. I will not tread lightly around this subject. I will not resort to euphemism or conceal my message 'between the lines'. I will not leave you with the mere implication that Male Holocaust is the eventual outcome of feminism, before quickly moving on to talk about other things, as though airing the idea should be an embarrassment for the speaker. I am fully aware that mine is a marginal view of feminism, and may be considered by some to be 'extreme', but then the widespread misunderstanding and misrepresentation of what feminism is is just another symptom of the sickness I am describing. I will state, quite openly, that this is the conclusion I have reached, having considered all the available evidence, and it is a conclusion I would encourage nobody to take lightly. The imminent attempted eradication of half the human race calls for writing unimbued by flippancy or fancy. It does not permit me to enter into civil discussion with those who will be attempting said eradication or cheering it on from the sidelines. There is no object in a respectful exchange of views with such people; the very idea appears, to me, to be an ugly parody of truly civilized discourse – sort of like Neville Chamberlain trying to appease Adolf Hitler. No, my aim is to convince as many people as possible that this is, indeed, *the truth,*and thus to propel them to do whatever they can to stop a humanitarian disaster before it begins. To that end, I shall tell it like it is, and call out the enemies of humanity as I see them – and they are feminists, who are even now, as you read these words, beavering away at stamping that official seal onto their key tenet of Collective Male Guilt.

[image]No matter how far down the rabbit hole she has gone, the feminist is cognizant, at some level, of the fact that a person must have actually committed a crime in order to be guilty of it. Initially, this fact appears before her, phantomlike, as an inconvenient truth, a sticking point, an irritant – like a lump in the throat, or a speck in the eye, that simply will not go away. This irritating truth is a logical interceptor, a pile of debris left on the tracks. She wonders: must I stop and turn around? Can my feminism, this wonderful vehicle for my catharsis, be reconciled with my assumptions of human individuality and legal impartiality? Of course it cannot, and if she remains a feminist, she abandons the latter. Treating individuals as individuals destroys any legitimate appeal to Collective Guilt and Collective Punishment, and vice versa: subscribing to notions of Collective Guilt and Collective Punishment negates the possibility of treating individuals as individuals. Having made her choice, she ignores this truth, that individuals must individually commit acts to be held individually accountable for them. It becomes irrelevant; revenge is higher on her list of priorities. Individual responsibility has ceased to matter for her, and it must cease to matter for others also. Those who remind her of it are attacked (cue the shaming tactics), and eventually, the fact itself is attacked. Individual responsibility is the product of false consciousness; all men carry guilt. Biological essentialism, once the stock in trade of the fascist far right, is resurrected as justifier of the authoritarian New Left.

Feminists are uninterested in truth.

They do not formulate their principles based upon analysis of collected truths. The starting point for all feminism is misandric emotion, and subsequent principles are formulated upon this. Truth is largely incidental. It is greatly appreciated when it appears to coincide with feminist arguments, and outright attacked when it does not; otherwise, it is irrelevant. Facts are a tool of the patriarchy; feminism aims to elevate subjective passions and wills to the lofty quarters previously reserved for what can be objectively verified.

Detractors remain, of course, pointing out the awkward, inconvenient, irrefutable truths. For instance: even if we accept thefallacious claim that one in four women gets raped, that would imply that, at most, one in four men commit rape, assuming that each rapist commits only one rape. But this is not very realistic, since we know that there are serial rapists, whose recidivism would drive the number of guilty parties down significantly. Could anybody who touts the ‘one in four’ figure realistically disagree with this assessment? Such people are forced to conclude, with us, that at least three quarters of men have never and will never rape anybody; in other words, they are demonstrably not rapists. Is it not monstrous, then, to tar one hundred percent of a demographic with the crimes of less than a quarter? Perhaps we should hold rallies, in the style of Take Back The Night and so on, in which we chant “three-in-four! Three-in-four!” until people get the message that the overwhelming majority of men are not rapists and do not deserve to be labelled as such. What do you think?

Whatever the case, Collective Guilt appears to be ruled out – but we underestimate feminist creativity. While some of feminism's more demented followers have asserted that "all sex is rape" – making nearly all men into rapists for having engaged in consensual sex at some point, including that initiated by women – most of the 'third wave' has gravitated to a phony rationalization that a 'rape culture' persists among men en masse. Rape culture doctrine holds that, although a minority of men in fact commit the act of rape, the other seventy-five percent (or, if we are being realistic, a significantly higher percentage) are cheering them on from the sidelines, deriving pleasure vicariously from the knowledge that women are being sexually attacked. Collective Guilt is secured. The truth – that men are more histrionic than women when it comes to rape claims – is immaterial and can be safely denied or ignored. Further examples of feminist creativity – finding innovative ways to blame all men for the crimes of a small number – can be found for every subject that they write about. I will not list them here because our discussion must move on. It will suffice to say that all such creativity resolves to the myth of 'the patriarchy' – that individual men who do not control or abuse women nevertheless, somehow, simply because they are men, actively support the processes through which other men do control women.The only thing that a man must do to be guilty of this is to be male; ergo, by existing, he is guilty. All feminist male-blaming creativity is a variation on this bio-essentialist theme, and all of it serves to legitimize Collective Guilt and Collective Punishment.

The feminist process of destroying men and maleness will not necessarily follow a defined plan. It does not have to! To this very day, historians continue to debate whether there was ever a direct order given for the Final Solution, or if the Holocaust was the result of cumulative radicalization within the totalitarian, anti-Semetic state bureaucracy of Nazi Germany. It is at least conceivable, then, that the murder of millions can be achieved organically, after a significant period of demonization which leaves most of the population indifferent (if not hostile) towards the scapegoat. Very few people are actually needed to carry out a genocide – typically less than ten percent of a population, often less than five. Indifference is all that is required of the remainder.

Having said this, there is at least one explicit plan for Male Holocaust, which was emphatically not written as a satire, even if its author later brushed off troubling questions with this claim. While the SCUM Manifesto is remembered today as a bizarre relic which in no way represented mainstream feminism at any time, it's worth pointing out that the text only achieved 'classic' status because of its overwhelming popularity. Even if we were to contort ourselves into believing that Valerie Solanas intended the text as a joke, we cannot believe the same about her followers. Of these, perhaps the most famous would be Robin Morgan, who included excerpts from SCUM in her anthology Sisterhood is Powerful, and stated her sincere aim that the "Feminist Revolution" would achieve not "some false state of equality," but "a proud gynocratic*world."*

Still, SCUM hardly contains the blueprints for male extermination. The feminist project has not followed SCUM to the letter, though this is perhaps because there is no letter to follow. The text is more statement than program; it is the violent, vindictive emotionalism laid bare, the ugly face of feminism unmasked, the dissected contents of a dirty bomb formerly disguised as a birthday present. In the long run, the publication of SCUM has probably benefited anti-feminists most of all. It is proof positive that feminism is, at least in part, supportive of female supremacy and the elimination of men; and that such views, when initially aired, were received with enough support from the feminist sector to make the book famous. Would feminists today be so dismissive of SCUM if anti-feminists had not seized on it as evidence?

To get back on track: while there certainly are individuals working within state bureaucracies whose chief aim in life is to make men suffer – and indeed, government departments have been set up for this very purpose – an official order to eliminate men has not (yet) been given, as far as we know. But one does not need to be given, for the situation may come about organically. For decades, males have been subject to the worst possible demonization in mass media – including, earlier this year, the portrayal of newborn babies as inherently evil, rapists-in-waiting. The slurs made against all men, which cannot possibly be justified on the grounds of deterring that small number of men disposed to committing crimes, are typical of a dehumanization campaign. The aims of this long hate crusade are threefold. First, that women, being exposed to the endlessly repeating feminist hate loop, will adopt the view that men are violent, inhumane oppressors, and are therefore deserving of whatever evil they suffer. Although most women will initially oppose this message, the endlessly repeating hate loop, because it is so persistent and pervasive, eventually breaks down psychological resistance. Once the hate loop had gathered enough momentum to carry itself, and was becoming bigger all the time, like a snowball rolling down a hill, then our cultural guardians needed only to intervene occasionally in order to fine-tune its content. E.g. it was not enough for a woman to only fear 'strange men'; it had to be transmitted to her that her own husband, her father, her son, etc., are activated cells in 'the patriarchy' which is oppressing her, that they are each a 'potential rapist,' and so on.

The second aim of the dehumanization campaign is to get men to turn on each other.

That this forms part of feminist methodology is not surprising, since exploitation of masculinity and male physical muscle, to be used against other men for the benefit of women, is the central plank of historical Gynocentrism. In addition to appealing to powerful men to pass punitive legislation enabling the brutalization of their less powerful brethren, feminists drive wedges between common men. By promoting to men the message that their own sex is full of rapists, abusers and pedophiles, men will be less inclined to identify with other men, or with men in general, and will feel much less in the way of mutual support or sympathy. Even as the sexual grievance industry indefinitely expands the meanings of emotive words like 'rape,' 'violence' and 'pedophilia,' any man*accused* (not even charged, let alone convicted) of any of these acts becomes a persona non grata among his own sex. Even worse, the falsely accused man (or the man 'guilty' under the new definitions of these terms) finds himself on the receiving end of vigilante justice by outraged men who have swallowed the feminist line that male abusers are rampant everywhere (therefore *this*accused man must be guilty). When the falsely accused and the newly criminalized are being loaded onto train cars for deportation to death camps, men who have not yet been accused will turn their heads, consoling themselves with the thought that those men must be abusers, and so they are deserving of whatever happens to them. The men who have not yet been accused are lulled into a false sense of security, believing that they will be safe, so long as they continue to obey the feminist state.

The third aim of the dehumanization campaign is to normalize brutality against men. Feminists are boiling a frog, as the proverb goes. The cumulative brutalization of men occurs in increments, each of which appears to be objectionable, but not appallingly so (except, perhaps, to those who are paying close enough attention to perceive the creeping despotism). Already, we have surpassed situations which would have caused men to pour onto the streets in revolt had they been achieved in one fell swoop – the enslavement of men by family courts and child support laws, rape trials held in secret and without a jury in Sweden, the negation of the presumption of innocence for men in several states, mandatory arrest laws for men who call the police because their girlfriends have stuck knives in their chests, men being incarcerated and sold into sexual slavery in debtor's prisons because their wives were bored, and so on.

As the brutalization of men becomes the norm, practised by more people, a greater number of misandrists will become emboldened to act out their hate. Feminism does not entail men 'losing privileges,' or suffering for a little while until the sexes are in balance and life becomes a perfect harmony. The *more feminism,*the worse things will be for men, right up to the point of extermination. The level of persecution corresponds precisely to the level of feminist governance. When a great mass of feminist bureaucrats set to work, finding innovative ways to persecute men, the individual feminist bureaucrat realizes that there is no limit to what she can get away with.

I would like to talk a little more about exactly why this is. From its earliest days, feminism was envisioned as a cultural war. Making misandric persecution a reality meant that the dehumanization and brutalization of men had to become normalized phenomena – background noise, those aspects of existence nobody bats an eyelid at, those facts of life that adults resign themselves to, the unpleasantness of which can be explained away by defeatist mantras like "it's just the way things are," "it sucks but what can we do about it," and "men and women are different, so just man up and take it." Creating this kind of hostile indifference towards Men's Rights was necessary because it is the foundation upon which active persecution stands. Saying that hostile indifference has become normalized is another way of saying that it is normal for people to practise hostile indifference. In other words, enough people practise hostile indifference for it to be considered normal. That is, a great number of people practise hostile indifference, and are not taken to task for it, because it is sufficiently widespread to rule out the possibility of individuals being taken to task for it.

What we have, then, is hostile indifference towards men as a characteristic of the social organism as a whole, and it is within state bureaucracies that feminists congregate to build active persecution upon this normalized hostile indifference. The hostility and indifference towards men allows them to get away with this, because it affords each misandric individual anonymity and irresponsibility. She did not create this situation; she is not personally responsible for it. She is not the only one pushing for active persecution; everyone else is (at least) indifferent in this regard, and anyway, there are plenty of others working in the same field. Being pre-emptively 'let off the hook' through anonymity and irresponsibility, the individual feminist forms part of a collective mob whose members can indulge in a sentiment of invincible power, allowing them to yield to emotions which would otherwise have been restrained. Purely numerical considerations – strength in numbers – enable the individual operator to evade all questions of guilt and culpability. They become mere cogs whose existence and purpose is nonsensical when abstracted from the greater machine. They simply do as they are told, they simply 'go along with' what everyone else is doing – ostensibly harmless, unremarkable, dutiful.

Where a state seeks to achieve some ideological goal, its bureaucracy becomes the archetypal model of human consciousness overwhelmed by crowd psychology. Every collective acts collectively, that is, without pausing to allow the individuals to reflect, without consulting the individuals, without requiring that they give their enthusiastic assent. The collective acts with immediacy, according to its will, leaving absolutely no room for criticism from individuals within or without. Individuals within the collective act as all the others do. They are, by definition, anonymous and unaccountable. Excited by an idea, and indulging in the power of numbers, a collective does not allow or admit that anything could prevent the fulfilment of its will.

The feminist mob acts in the same way that all ideology-based collectives do –

…by magnifying the miniscule transgressions made against the collective, and trivializing atrocities perpetrated against others. An almost perfect example of this comes from the feminist website Sociological Images. First, the magnification of the miniscule. In September 2010, one of the site's authors announced her outrage that a line of rulers (i.e. measuring sticks) commemorating great scientists in history included Marie Curie under the heading "Great Women Rulers of Science." A horrific injustice, this is not. Still, at this point, we might simply assume that those habituating the blog are fragile people, finding themselves easily offended by much in life – we might think that they would feel the same way if they stumbled upon some equivalent version of these rulers with the sexes reversed.

We might think this is the case, until we scroll down to the comment section and find an accusation that Paul Elam's A Voice for Men site is nothing but a load of "whining." Now, in the two weeks prior to that comment being made, A Voice for Men had discussed the following:

> A police state that arrests and incarcerates male victims of domestic violence and enables female perpetrators to continue criminal behavior; a ten to one > death gap concerning capital punishment that works against men; a five to one death gap against men related to suicide; the staggering attrition of males in higher education and employment; the utter lack of reproductive rights for men, and the incidence of false rape allegations against men which even the police are calling epidemic.

At first glance, the cognitive dissonance is astounding. Could the feminist really have dismissed discussion of such human interest issues as these, while her own counter-movement has nothing more offensive to talk about but the headings on rulers (which actually highlight, not obscure, the fact that there have been great female scientists)?

As Paul succinctly puts it, "women's whining = pursuit of justice. Men's pursuit of justice = whining." In following this simple maxim, feminists adhere perfectly to the dark elements of crowd psychology: magnifying the miniscule when it concerns them, and trivializing atrocities when these are committed against others.

Like all other collectives governed by the principles of crowd psychology, feminists have a tendency towards the power of suggestion: that an idea only needs to be spoken aloud for it to be taken as the gospel truth. Of course, this only works with certain types of ideas – most obviously, those which aid in magnifying the miniscule, but certainly not the ones that draw attention to the non -trivial atrocities suffered by others. It matters not that the cries of rape advocates – "one in four!" – are based on a study, themethodology of which is so flawed that any serious researcher would have transferred it directly from the printer and into the big round file. Young women will continue to pour onto the streets chanting it – "one in four! One in four!" – why? Because it serves the crowd to have been transgressed against in such a way, because it provides them with those feelings of righteous indignation which serve as a springboard from which they may launch the active persecution of the targeted class. No individual need bother checking the facts, and the crowd would not pay any attention to one who did anyway. As an example of this power of suggestion in action within a feminist state bureaucracy, we need look no further than the United Kingdom's former Minister for Women and Equality, Harriet Harman, who was eventually ordered by a judge to stop spinning the lie that rape has only a six percent conviction rate. Even then, rape advocacy groups like Women Against Rape have continued to refer to this completely invented figure. Evidencing one's claims is a trifling matter, and one subordinated to the necessity of exciting the mob.

The power of suggestion is particularly pronounced in the feminist crowd because it is mostly composed of women, and women are more impressionable than men. This is not an inherent difference between the sexes, but a socialized defect. A lifetime of privilege, of parasitic exploitation and entitlement, of juicing the fruits of another's labor, has left many women devoid of character, with unrealistic views of the world which leave them open to certain kinds of manipulation that men are not so easily taken in by. Feminism is ideological snake oil, and impressionable women are its customers. If an idea excites them, if that one-in-four statistic sends a shiver down their spines, if it causes them to *feel*something so strongly, then there must be at least an element of truth to it – so the unconscious mental processes go. How could something that is not real affect her in a way that *feels so real?*Impossible, one would think. Once feminists understood and appreciated the malleability of women, they had merely to present astounding statistics which, when recited endlessly, to the point that they become background noise, exist on some plane beyond truth and falsehood, the plane of popular consensus, and so cannot be refuted by the evidence that most men would have asked for upon originally hearing the claims.

For the same reason, we find the tendencies among feminists to simplify, and to go immediately to extremes. An exceptional instance of violence against women becomes, for feminists, the rule which is practised against all women, everywhere. A college student making a rape joke to his fraternity brothers becomes a microcosm of society as a whole. On that note, making a rape joke is the same thing, for feminists, as condoning the actual rape of human beings. There is no room for nuance, no accounting for the thousand shades of grey that exist between black and white; only the two colors perceived by monochrome Manichean Essentialists. A rape joke could conceivably and consistently be made by people spanning the entire spectrum of opinion on rape, in the same way that people can make jokes about dead babies, tasteless though they may be, without necessarily supporting or contributing towards infanticide. This is common sense stuff, but common sense stuff does not excite the passions of ideological mobs. Collectives such as feminism rely, for their shared understanding, on a fundamental*lack* of nuance – to infallibly appeal to all its adherents, an ideological collective must propagate a small number of simplistic, exciting, image-like ideas. In the case of feminism, which is an ideological collective based upon the validation of violent and vindictive feelings held towards men, we should not be surprised to find that these image-like ideas are so often characterized by violence.

Feminism's validation of immature, simplistic, exaggerated, generalized and extreme ideas results in violent emotion as a guiding principle of justice –

…in other words, the Collective Guilt and Collective Punishment I have already discussed. Feminist jurisprudence flows directly from the violent and anti-male emotions of individual feminist operators, emotions which are, in turn, validated by the ideological collective which has successfully constructed a climate of hostile indifference towards men. There is not even the pretense of impartiality in feminist jurisprudence – it is openly 'anti-normative,' seeking favorable conditions for female criminals while indefinitely expanding the scope of punishable male deviancy. Those who advocate and practise it are open about their vindictive sexism, and their reforms continue, under the radar. We are heading towards explicit male persecution because there is nowhere else this can go and very few people willing or informed enough to stand up and say 'no'.

For those who would deny that feminism condones and advocates violence against men, I need only direct you to their own creations. Here is the banner for feminist website

Feministe:

Now, despite the relatively tame content of this particular site, does it seem conceivable that the out-of-frame target of this little girl's firearm is not a grown man? It's a clever trick, because the target is not shown, allowing for plausible deniability on the part of the site's members. After all, feminists don't shoot people, do they? As Fidelbogen puts it:

> Try looking at the little girl in context with the word FEMINISTE directly behind her. Note the synergy of the two elements, how they combine into a visual-conceptual unity of message – effectively amplifying and reinforcing each other.

Moving on, we might consider the hilarious irony of feminists voicing concerns over the likelihood of Pick-Up Artist Roosh Vorek being violent while simultaneously making violent threats against him:

> I must find out his real name so if I ever meet him I can suckerpunch him in the dick.
> I think Roosh is a great example… of what truly needs to be purged.
> I'm wondering if his blog is violent enough to notify the DA's office.

I'm wondering too. But what I'm wondering about is why the phrase 'cognitive dissonance' gets thrown around by anti-feminists in situations like these, since the feminists' behavior is perfectly consistent. It is simply that they have magnified all miniscule transgressions against women – such as, a vaguely insulting comment from a Pick-Up Artist – and have trivialized all atrocities against men. When it is appreciated that feminist operations are all characterized by double standards in their dealings with men and women, it will be understood that there is no 'dissonance' here at all, cognitive or otherwise – their behavior is fully consistent with their twin assumptions that every inconvenience a woman faces is a humanitarian tragedy, and that men do not matter at all. Thus, after decades of feminist teeth-gnashing about the horrors of domestic violence, and how it is a subject so serious it should never be joked about or taken lightly, feminist website Jezebel produced a now-infamous article gloating over the greater incidence of domestic violence perpetrated by women, and issuing direct threats to men generally that the website's authors will act abusively towards them should men "fuck with" them. Now that men are the victims, it's acceptable to post amusing pictures of battered men; to refer to female-perpetrated abuse as "busting open a can of whupass"; to refer to male victims as "the dudes" and to employ veiled shaming tactics implying it is their own fault for not fighting back. If you follow the link, please check out the comments – make sure you click on 'All' and scroll down to get a proper impression of what feminists are really like when they think they are safely out of the world's gaze.

The image-like ideas that feminism employs are not connected by*logical bonds,* although they are all consistent at base because they all contribute towards increasing the power of women. To the uninitiated, it appears that the various antics of feminist activists are not at all connected, and that the most contradictory, dissimilar ideas are supported side by side. E.g., feminists simultaneoslyadvocate for the censorship of softcore pornography targeted at men and lament that there does not exist more explicit pornography featuring naked and aroused men for the consumption of females. This only leads to sputtering accusations of 'cognitive dissonance' if one takes for granted that feminists assume their own philosophy is universalizable. If they did assume this – if their goal truly was sexual equality and impartiality – then it would indeed be true that feminists would be irrational and could fairly be said to suffer from cognitive dissonance. But this is not the case. Their philosophy is not intended to be universalizable. The aim is not to apply a uniform standard towards men and women; it is to level women up and level men down. It is to grant women more rights, indefinitely, and to force new obligations onto men,indefinitely. Double standards are the feminist rule, not the exception.

And what is the logical outcome – say, if tomorrow, feminists got everything they are advocating for today? We would be plunged immediately into a two-tier system of rights and obligations, where men and women form distinct castes of citizen, the former weighed down by the obligations that enable the latter to luxuriate in their total autonomy. Life for women would be a literal lawlessness, while men's every move would be dictated from above, geared to the purpose of providing for all female needs and wants. It would not be inappropriate to call such a system sexual feudalism, and every time I read a feminist article, this is the impression that I get: that they to construct a new aristocracy, comprised only of women, while men stand at the gate, till in the fields, fight in their armies, and grovel at their feet for starvation wages. All feminist innovation and legislation creates new rights for women and new duties for men; thus it tends towards the creation of a male underclass, the accomplishment of which will be the first step towards the extermination of men.

At present, feminism displays all the hallmarks of a dangerous movement about to become fascistic: its adherents demand blind submission to dogma, they are unable to discuss its principles, they desire to spread its ideology (by whatever means necessary), they are intolerant of those who do not embrace it, they immediately rush to generalization, they demand authenticity and conformity to a rigorous standard of morality, and they utilize bio-essentialist rhetoric and violent imagery to denigrate their targets. The (often literal) dehumanization of men, coupled with feminist governance, could not be leading anywhere but the enforcement of Collective Punishment, the idealized end point of a principle of justice based upon the validation of violent, primal emotion. Not one iota of sympathy, of fellow human-feeling, is to be felt for innocent men subject to the worst atrocities.

Holocaust is the ultimate utopian vision of some radical feminists, and they are perfectly open about this, discussing the male-free world of the future as insipidly as if they were discussing holiday plans. Other radical feminists imagine a future in which men's numbers are greatly reduced and the remaining males are kept as slaves. Still others dream of a society similar to ours, but with women in the lead in all spheres of life, with all pretense to equality abandoned. Earnest feminists, meanwhile, do not necessarily intend any of these outcomes, but as they are members of the collective, they will act as members of the collective, and even if they do not participate in the active persecution of men, they will be forbidden – as an unspoken rule – from exhibiting any sympathy at all for men, no matter what they suffer. Those who do are promptly expelled, labelled anti-feminists, and subject to vicious attacks by the in-group. No feminist will stop the process of male elimination, nor will she feel any regret once it is complete, as long as she remains a feminist.

The destruction of males does not require a majority of feminists to even be on board; it is an organic process which unfolds naturally in time, and once a certain point is passed, there will be no stopping the attempt. Women like Hannah Rosin, who desire not equality but female supremacy with men as a permanent underclass, will find that the psychic forces which led them to agitate for this do not simply disappear once sexual feudalism is achieved. Feminism is a movement based upon the gratification of those psychic forces, the permanent, hateful needs of misandric women, and no limits will be reached for as long as men can be made to suffer even more.

Utopian visions supposedly present the perfectly just and moral society, but really, they envision the end of morality altogether. Utopia is that in which nobody makes an immoral decision; thus, nobody really makes moral choices. Rather, they have been socialized so well – through intimidation or brainwashing – that they always make the same choices. This silly little fantasy has inspired tyrants to send millions to their deaths. Early modernity is marked by the two most prominent examples of this: the French and Russian revolutions. Both were fought on the premise that the old regime would give way to a new age of human perfection. Both ended in failure, but not before soaking their countries in blood. The historian Hippolyte Taine wrote that it was by invoking “liberty, equality, fraternity” that the architects of the French Revolution were able “to install a despotism worthy of Dahomey, a tribunal similar to that of the Inquisition, and to accomplish human hecatombs akin to those of ancient Mexico.” Similarly, Communism was presumed to be the realization of freedom and all human potential – until it was actually realized. Communist countries repressed and starved their populations, worked them to the point of exhaustion, banned free speech, purged dissidents, and invaded other countries with a zeal for imperial conquest that must have seemed rather surprising to those who saw communism as an ideology of peace. And all this, not for any existing object – not for land, or resources, or for freedom – but for a social order that had never existed and was merely imagined.

We should not expect Feminist countries – capital F, standing for explicit Feminist Governance – to be any different. Feminist countries will starve and repress, they will force men and dissenting women into labor camps, they will ban open discussion, commit murder on a grand scale, and they will invade other countries, all in the name of liberating women. If there is anything we can learn from the last few hundred years, it is that humanity repeatedly fails to learn the important lessons. After men, which group shall be persecuted? Must we all take a turn, as though our biological characteristics make us representatives of those who appear similar to us, across all time and space? After the horrors of the Soviet regime and the Holocaust, is it not sensible that we all agree to cease judging heterogeneous groups of people by bio-essentialist standards, and damning them all to hell on earth because of the apparent crimes of a minority (be this in reference to the Elders of Zion or to ‘the patriarchy’)?

Now, I am well aware, that simply asking these questions is not going to change anything. It is certainly not going to change any feminist minds. But I am not here to plead with feminists. I am here to interrogate them, to embarass them about their future plans, and to spread the word about what those plans are. Because even the self-proclaimed enlightened, progressive feminist movement has not learned the lesson that humanity should now be well-versed in.

In contradistinction to them, I say – peace be with you.

Defining Misandry

June 1, 2011 | by Tom Givens | Link | Original Link

What is Misandry? The Dictionary definition is simple: hatred of men. Another definition offered up is similarly straightforward: an extreme dislike of males, frequently based upon unhappy experience or upbringing. What I want to put forward is a more pervasive, and reality-based definition of the word.

Misandry: dehumanization of the male sex. The view of males as non-human, not of intrinsic worth.

Men in our society are valued predominantly on their utility to others.

This is as true today as it was 5000 years ago. It's true in general society (employer to employee), as well as in personal relationships (women love a 'good provider'). Men are the protectors, the producers, the creators of society – precisely because without producing, protecting, or creating those same men would be considered a drag on society; a cost, not a benefit.

And society does not like supporting men. Ask the homeless about income supports and social housing. All for 'young familes' (read: single mothers). Ask the domestic violence shelters (if they admit male victims exist) about services for men. Ask your local University about support for boys wanting a better life through education.

The answer throughout society to men falling behind is always the same, from Kay Hymowitz to Rush Limbaugh:

"Pull up your socks, you lazy slackers".

More misandry.

The world we live in is truly unforgiving to the man who 'falls through the cracks.' Nevermind the child support victims and the men who have lost it all in divorce. There are vast swaths of men who have had neither happen to them, and they still find themselves scraping from paycheque to paycheque for decades on end. They still find there are no helping hands available.

They still find that the taxes they have to pay still go towards ever more programs for women. Scratch that…I meant 'young families' (read: single mothers). It's like the Government doesn't know about all the struggling men. Of course, we know different, but when you view men as non-human cannon fodder, the Darwinian way government treats disadvantaged men becomes much more understandable.

The media is a major culprit of this mindset, reducing men to mere statistics, or job descriptions. When a bunch of miners are trapped underground, it's always "The workers are trapped", or "24 Miners were killed today". Never do they say "The 24 men were underground for 3 days before they were rescued" – their sex is carefully excised from all reports. But should a slaughter in some village happen, for example, it's "52 people dead so far, including women and children".

See that? We're supposed to really care, because it's not just men that are killed. Women and children are involved too. Men have no value except as filler. It's the women and children you are meant to care about.

Misandry shows up in our daily lives far more often than even we MRA's care to admit.

Every time someone holds a man to a different standard than women, that's Misandry. Refusing to listen to complaints because it's "sad" when men complain is also Misandry ('Real Men' don't complain is a veryconcise definition of Misandry). Believing that no matter what forces are against a man, his success (or lack thereof) is entirely his 'fault' is also Misandry.

Essentially, refusing to believe there are social forces arrayed against the average man succeeding is a manifestation of Misandry, since it is an expression of the "Real Men can handle anything" strain of the definition – with the implied "if you can't handle it, you're not a Real Man, and therefore not worth a toss."

So how exactly does one know when they are in the presence of a man-hater?

Simply ask that person their opinions on such things as social supports for men (make sure to say this will reduce the funds available for women). If they are unable to see value in reducing services to women, in order to provide ANY services to men…well, you have a man hater in your face. In point of fact, you have a 'that issue is important to get to once all this other stuff is accomplished' type feminist, in all likelihood.

Alternatively, you could just listen to what they say. Most man-haters will let their opinions be known fairly easily, in some cases even being proud of their hatred. Any woman that demands a man 'treat her like a woman should be' is demanding servitude and beast-of-burden status from men. That is a misandrist. So are the folks who demand men 'shut up and take it.' In common parlance, "Man Up."

Someone who feels that all of the issues facing men couldn't possibly be affecting men as a whole, the "Don't let it bother you, and pull up your socks" crowd, are also Misandrists, in that they refuse to recognize the humanity of men, preferring to view them as machines capable of anything regardless of circumstance.

Demanding men live up to impossible standards is Misandry. Refusing to see men in need, as men, is Misandry. Seeing men as beasts of burden, as a means of production, rather than human beings with feelings and hopes, is Misandry. Seeing men as a Class, rather than people, is Misandry.

More discussion is needed on this subject, but I believe it is time that we as a movement started to define a few terms on our own. So again, here's my definition:

Misandry: dehumanization of the male sex. The view of males as non-human, not of intrinsic worth.

Fuck the Salvation Army

June 1, 2011 | by Jeremiah | Link | Original Link

I'm moving. I have a lot of clothes I don't need from when I was a consumer whore. I want to give them away because I'm a giving person.

In a functional society, I could give my clothes to an organization that would proceed to hand them, for free, to people who really need them.

Instead, the easiest options are giving to either Goodwill or The Salvation Army. Goodwill charges exorbitant prices to people with a lot of money and then goes and spends 84% of that money on vague social programs while spending 16% on running the business and filling the pockets of the jerks at the top who thought it would be a great idea to profit off of donations.

Now, on to The Salvation Army. Well I'd like to donate, so what does The Salvation Army stand for? I click on "Programs that Help" and the right at the top I see "Anti-Pornography".

Oh, Jesus, I'm not donating to that.

The only reason for anyone to be anti-pornography is that porn allows beta men an outlet for their sexual frustration instead 0f marrying a woman who will divorce his ass almost 50% of the time and take his children and all his money; where he'll be lucky not to end up in debtor's prison for failure to pay. And for all the feminists out there who complain about rape of women, porn allows fractional minority of truly depraved men an outlet other than acting out their aggressions in the real world.

And so I investigate further. Under the anti-porn heading, I see the following: "Code of Conduct for Men" and "Sexual Addiction Treatment," Oh, God. So now the Salvation Army is going to tell me how to be a man and whether I have a sex addiction (read: healthy male sexuality). Too good to be true.

Because the Salvation Army felt the need to make their little code of how to be a pussy beggar into an annoying JPEG image, I felt the need to reproduce the entire thing here in TEXT format, along with my translation in true-speak in italics.

Salvation Army Code of Conduct for Men space

I REJECT unconditionally all violence against women and children. All men are abusers of women and children, and women never abuse anyone, ever.

I REJECT the buying of sex with women and children. All men want to have sex with children, but if a child is not available then they'll settle for a woman. Oh, and women don't like to have sex, and don't like to be paid for it either.

I WILL intervene when I see a man physically abusing a woman. It is my job as a man to sacrifice my life and well-being for any human being, as long as she happens to have a vagina.

I WILL NOT physically abuse my wife or partner. All men abuse their partners, and women never do.

I WILL intervene when my male colleagues, friends, or family belittle or degrade women. Women are perfect angels and no woman should ever be scolded for any reason, ever. Western women are good, each and every one of them.

I RECOGNIZE prostitution as harmful to women and will do everything I can to see the end of it. I will ensure that men cannot have sex, ever, unless they satisfy women's definition of manhood.

I REJECT the buying of pornography, recognizing it as sexual exploitation. Already covered.

I WILL NOT buy products that advertise by exploiting women's bodies when it has nothing at all to do with the product. I will not buy anything. Oh, and women just HATE being exploited. That's why every female in the world who becomes even moderately famous begs to pose in Maxim or FHM. They're being exploited – they're not just narcissists.

I WILL NOT visit clubs and bars that exploit women through 'exotic' dancing. I will NOT admire women's bodies, ew gross!

I WILL NOT buy newspapers and magazines that advertise sexual services. blah…blah…blah

I REJECT all forms of sexual harassment, including wolf whistling, sexual insinuations, and unauthorized physical contact. UNAUTHORIZED PHYSICAL CONTACT. Right. Apparently I need a fucking signed contract to tap a woman on her shoulder, and Han Solo is a God Damn rapist. And don't forget the caveat, this only applies if you're unattractive to the offended woman.

I WILL intervene when my male colleagues, friends, or family engage in sexual harassment. I will intervene when people at work flirt with each other. I will intervene every time a woman makes an allegation.

I WILL respect my female colleagues and partners as equals. I will pretend that my female "colleagues" are equals, even when they are not, which is the case almost every time. Actually, no, I will respect EQUALS as EQUALS. If someone isn't up to the fucking job, it's utterly irrelevant to me whether they have a vagina.

I RECOGNIZE decision-making at home is about equality and partnership. I recognize that women are always right and a man should never make decisions. Males should never lead because they're stupid, horny animals.

I WILL encourage other men to adopt and live by this code, including teaching it to my children. I vow to ruin the lives of my fellow man and all my offspring.

Fuck you, Salvation Army. Fuck you real good. At least you've demonstrated that your evangelical church is no more than a front for chivalric (read: feminist) ideals.

Yikes, I just sexually harassed the Salvation Army. I hope she doesn't have a vagina, or I'm screwed!

Anyway, if you're in need of sexual addiction/healthy male sexuality treatment, I'm sure the Salvation Army can help.

Seriously, if I can't a find a church that will give these clothes to people who actually need them, I'm going to leave them by the fucking dumpster.

Things Are Bad will document anything and everything wrong with society and try to answer the question the public en masse will begin to ask as our civilization's decline accelerates: Why do bad things happen?

S.A.V.E. report on false allegation survey

June 2, 2011 | by S.A.V.E. | Link | Original Link

False Allegation Survey

Today S.A.V.E. (Stop Abusive and Violent Environments) released the results of a first of its kind survey asking participants whether they or someone they know had been falsely accused of intimate partner or child abuse abuse and under what circumstances. The survey was administered via phone to 10,000 residents across the U.S. Using contact info from voter registration records. The response rate was 23% (or 2,300 individuals).

The results were jaw dropping.

A full 11% of respondents reported that they themselves had been falsely accused of some type of intimate partner or child abuse, and that they had been to some extent or another sanctioned for behavior that they never engaged in.

Over eight of ten (81%) who said that they knew someone falsely accused answered that the falsely accused party was male. Nearly seven in ten (69.9%) of those falsely accusing were female. These results indicate very strongly that false accusations and their aftermath loom very large in the landscape of men's lives. And while there are falsely accused females out there, the issue is one that can be fairly identified as generally an act of aggression against men .

Here are the results:

Questions:

1. Have you ever heard of anyone falsely accused of abuse?
Yes – 51.6% No – 48.4%

2. Has anyone you know ever been falsely accused of abuse?
Yes – 15.5% No – 84.5%

3. Was this person falsely accused of child abuse?*
Yes – 74.0% No – 26.0%

4. Was this person falsely accused of domestic violence?*
Yes – 28.9% No – 71.1%

5. Was this person falsely accused of sexual abuse?*
Yes – 48.5% No – 51.5%

6. Was this person falsely accused in the last year?
Yes – 17.7% N0 – 82.3%

7. Was the falsely accused person a male?
Yes – 81.0% No – 19.0%

8. Was the accuser a female?
Yes – 69.9% No – 30.1%

9. Was the accusation made as part of a child custody dispute?

Yes – 25.8% No – 74.2%

10. Have you been falsely accused?
Yes – 11.0% No – 89.0%

* Responses may have been influenced by the ordering of questions 3-5.

The results of this survey demonstrate that false accusations are not only real, but also infer that they could be more cmmon than previously suspected.

Turning Down the Volume on Hersong

June 2, 2011 | by Jade Michael | Link | Original Link

One area in which misandry, the dehumanization of the male sex, richly flourishes is the music business. I've been a musician since the age of 9 and most of my adult life has been spent playing and performing music in various capacities.

Somewhere in the early-to-mid 90's when Nirvana put the final nail in the coffin of Rock n Roll, the business shifted to a watered down, effeminate, ghostlike version of its former self. Suddenly, female musicians were aggrandized as if they had never existed. With the onslaught of independent record labels popping up in the 90's, more female singer-songwriters were given exposure not because they were talented or had anything to say, but simply because they were women and whining was "in."

Scores of riot grrrl bands hop-scotched out of their father's garages and onto the national scene. This was nothing new to the music business; women had been sharing the same pop culture success as their male counterparts for the last half of the 20th century. But at some point during the Clinton era, Liberalism became a new religion and mandatory goddess-worship swept the masses.

I live in Nashville, Tennessee, which was the last musical city/industry to not only succumb to the almighty Vagichrist, but to insist that She pillage and destroy with blazing abandon. I've found that irony is common in situations of opposition-replacement; when a new way is deemed better than the old, the new way takes over with relentless disregard for the viable system that had been in place for years prior. There have always been female pop stars, but female country stars usually took supporting roles prior to breaking out on their own. And like with feminism in politics, women in country music have crashed the party and replaced it with all of the unnecessary fringe and perfume common to every other mall-muff ministered social subterfuge.

"I don't blame the starlets of the industry as much as I blame the men behind the scenes kissing feminist ass for the sake of selling records."

It is also no surprise that music historically steeped in chivalrous values (at least more so than its rock counterparts) would be anything less than parasitic to trendy anti-male rhetoric. I don't blame the starlets of the industry as much as I blame the men behind the scenes kissing feminist ass for the sake of selling records. Most female country superstars are the product of feminist-minded male producers looking to mold icons for today's market (read: today's woman).

I've had the misfortune of working with, excuse me, for some of these backyard Barbies and they are no picnic. Working for a woman in the real world can be trying at the very least but working for a woman who is also a producer-touted "up and comer" in the music industry, is brain-bludgeoning. The only thing worse than a narcissistic male's ego is a narcissistic female's ego, especially when she is told she is needed and valued more than her male counterparts because women have for so long not been "heard." The producers who spew these lines are so indoctrinated that for them it isn't about scoring pussy nor having financial dominance over a woman; they truly believe the over-inflation of a woman's worth is justifiable as female empowerment.

Worse than the producer-drawn drones, are the "singer-songwriter" womyn. As a fill-in player, I've played with all types of musicians and by far these are the ultimate ego-obsessed princesses. They are told that their "pain" and experiences of being women need to be voiced for the sake of educating. It was while working with these types that my eyes opened to the feminist money-racket and teary-eyed liberal do-gooder mentality that I've come to loathe and vehemently speak out against.

No more will I work in a band with any female member as I don't wish for the unnecessary drama and stagnation they bring. Whiny, maladjusted male musicians are bad enough. No more will I watch a slit take credit for the men behind the scenes who write her material and carry her travel bags. No more will I be looked at as a feminist sympathizer because I am backing a "womyn in music." No more will I counsel, hold the hand of or wipe the tears of a "strong woman" who can't hack being in a band, let alone front it.

No more will I tune up just to play "hersong."

Resolved: Feminism is evil

June 3, 2011 | by Tom Givens | Link | Original Link

You can count on me to pretty much consistently call feminism an 'evil ideology,'

…and feminists as a group as well, come to think of it. A lot of people consider this to be hyperbole on my part, but sadly, this is not the case. I truly do believe feminism is evil to its core, and awakens the evil that lurks within each of us, which then provides fuel for the fire.

At this point, I suppose my religious views come into play, so in the interests of full disclosure I guess I better tell you my views on God and such. Feel free to skip this next bit, if you're so inclined.

I see almost no contradiction at all between religion and science. This requires an understanding that The Bible was translated and edited, perhaps hundreds of times, by fallible humans with political interests. Science provides excellent descriptions of natural laws and processes, and reveals nature to have a beautiful symmetry in the mathematical world as well; an almost clockwork precision; an underlying order.

I also find the claim that science provides a complete explanation laughable, since morphing from 'primordial ooze' to 'life' requires every bit as much faith as a belief in God. For that matter, so does the belief in infinite numbers of universes resulting in ours at random. And science doesn't provide a causation; a 'before.'

I believe if you don't take either viewpoint too seriously, they dovetail quite nicely. After all, one would expect God to be pretty good at math, and planning, wouldn't they? Especially considering that 'God' could very well be nothing but the collective consciousness of the universe itself.

Life really is that weird, after all.

Ok, so enough with the religious stuff (and hopefully avoid fixation on the subject), and on to why I call feminists 'evil.'

Ok maybe not quite yet, because first I have to let you know my definition of 'evil.' This is not as straightforward as it first may seem. Some people think 'evil' and they think Friday the 13th, or Dahmer, or child rapists. Many people define 'evil' as destructive, chaotic, and heartless. Cold, calculating, acid….evil.

I don't. If these are the definitions, how does one account for the rapist/murderer who loves his mother, may even have a wife and children they love? How does one account for the evil mastermind who collapses in grief at the death of his squeeze? This hardly seems like the type of thing Freddie Kruger would give much of a shit about, don't you think?

“Denial of the suffering of others, and in some cases while openly delighting in it, is a feminist hallmark.”

And what about the ‘petty’ evils? The false accusations, the spreading of malicious lies, the mundane violence (bar fights, arguments/challenges, etc.), the plotting and popularity of daytime TV? Are these simply ‘Freddy Lite,’ the precursor to the Real Evil(tm), where they haven’t gone over to the Dark Side yet and all that jazz?

Or, as is more likely, is it possible to be a truly evil person, and yet still have a spouse you love, and children you love, and parents you love, and friends you love. Being evil doesn’t mean being devoid of love at all. It can’t, given the degrees of evil easily seen every day.

So evil isn’t hate or aggression, or for that matter indifference, because a person consumed by this would quickly burn every bridge in sight. Evil wouldn’t progress. And evil begets evil, as the saying goes.

Upon much reflection, I’ve landed on a candidate, and it’s served me well so far. Here it is:

Evil: unmitigated self-interest.

It allows for all of the ‘tender’ parts, while still allowing the evil person to torture, kill, maim, defraud, destroy, whatever at whim. After all, that person is nothing to them. Well, except a plaything. And they only matter as long as they mean something to the self-absorbed. And only in the way the evil person cares about, be it friend, victim, or both.

I think you can see where this is going, but I’ll spell it out for those unfamiliar with the facts:

Feminism is gynocentric in the extreme, and will tolerate all manner of injustice to men, indeed will increase those injustices when possible, to serve the selfish ends defined by its upper echelons. The ideology literally REQUIRES it’s adherents to believe their interests are paramount whenever in question; that ‘helping women’ is always the right answer. It requires a foundation of selfish thinking to begin with.

Denial of the suffering of others, and in some cases while openly delighting in it, is a feminist hallmark. Feminism appeals to the selfish little girl in women, with demands that she should ‘have it all’. And that anytime she doesn’t, it’s men’s fault. And it’s that scapegoating, the ‘othering’ of men that marks feminism as truly evil. As truly, unmitigated self interest on an industrial scale. With nothing good planned for men, that’s for sure.

Traditionalists talk of autonomy as the main characteristic of feminist thinking. Funny, even religious folk don’t recognize evil when it’s staring them right in the face.

And smirking.

Barking mad or clever as a fox? The Vladek Filler re-trial

June 3, 2011 | by janbrown | Link | Original Link

I try to keep my writing devoid of my sarcastic wit; however, at times it's difficult to hold back especially when dealing with stressful events that make you feel like you are in the Twilight Zone. Last week I attended the State v. Filler criminal re-trial in Ellsworth, Maine, to lend my support to Vladek Filler and his family. I rarely if ever get involved or lend my support in criminal matters for the accused; however, after meeting Vladek, his mother and his sister a few years ago and reading about the case against Vladek extensively I was convinced that an egregious wrong had been perpetrated. I wanted to do what I could to help.

The newspaper accounts of this trial do not do it justice, after all reporters can only give their readers a glimpse of what went on in that court room during the trial. A reporter is only allowed so much space to write his article and has deadlines to meet. Having sat in that court room for three of the four trial days, watching the proceedings and listening to each person's testimony, as well as spending time with the Filler family outside the court room I definitely came away with a much more comprehensive understanding than if I had just read the newspaper accounts.

Watching Asst. DA Paul Cavanaugh present the State's side of the case was like viewing a made for TV "B" movie. You know the kind of movie I mean, one of those low budget films with some the cheesiest acting and dialogue you have ever seen. Sadly, this proceeding was anything but a made for TV movie. It was a real life drama with a man's life, freedom and his children's future on the line. For more background information on this case please read my blog entries dated of 4-12 and 4-14-2011.

State v. Filler May 25th 2011 – Day Two

Nicole (who is a volunteer advocate with DAHMW) and I drove to Ellsworth early to be at the courthouse for the 8:30am start time for the day's court proceedings. We met up with Vladek, his two sisters, his mother and his oldest son. First stop was a room in the courthouse reserved for the Filler family during the trial and then onto the court room for the hearing.

Let me just take a moment here to tell you about the collective Filler family. The Fillers are the type of people who would give you the shirt off their backs and the last dollar in their pocket if they knew you needed it. I have never in my life met a more close knit, warm and loving family. After sitting down and talking with Vladek, his son and his extended family for just a few hours it felt like we had all been great friends for many years. Here they were at one of the most intense, grueling times in their lives (I say "their" because it's so evident that if one of them is suffering they are all suffering…they are that close) having lived under a dark ominous cloud for more than four years and yet they took the time to make sure you feel welcomed, appreciated and included.

“When the forewoman read the verdict something strange happened to her voice. She was completely audible when she read the not guilty for the 2005 assault but her voice was almost a whisper and she seemed to have a difficult time saying not guilty on the gross sexual assault charge.”

Asst. DA Paul Cavanaugh was into his second day of presenting the State’s case against Vladek Filler when we arrived. The States star witness was Vladek’s ex wife, Ligia, who was first up on the witness stand that morning. That morning the she was cross examined by Vladek’s defense lawyer, Stephen Smith.

Before I discuss the cross examination let me just say for the record that I am an assiduous and fervent advocate for victims of domestic violence and sexual assault. I volunteered at our local rape crisis center for over a year and have been the victim of date rape myself as a teenager so I fully and completely empathize with victims of these crimes. I feel that those who commit sexual and domestic assault against women, men and children should get the harshest punishment allowable by law. So you know that if I believed for one second that Vladek Filler had committed the crimes that he was accused of I would have been sitting in the front row behind the prosecutor and not the defendant at this trial. However, I have no respect, empathy or use for someone who would use the legal system, victim’s services and the taxpayer’s money to exact revenge against their former intimate partner.

As I watched and listened to Ligia Filler on that Wednesday I thought to myself, “This lady is in the wrong profession, she should have gone into dramatic acting.” Please understand that it is not my intent to belittle or make light of this most serious situation, it’s just that I found the alleged victim to be disingenuous. I was totally unmoved by her overly dramatic testimony.

“When the forewoman read the verdict something strange happened to her voice. She was completely audible when she read the not guilty for the 2005 assault but her voice was almost a whisper and she seemed to have a difficult time saying not guilty on the gross sexual assault charge.”

She sat on the witness stand looking forlorn holding her hand to her chest and taking slow deep audible breaths in and out, in and out, with every response she gave as she was cross examined by the defense attorney. When she wasn’t taking slow deep audible breaths she spent a great deal of time having sips of water and pausing to use a tissue to wipe her eyes. She responded to most of the questions asked with, “I don’t understand the question…could you repeat the question…I don’t remember….I can’t recall…I can’t remember…I don’t recall…I don’t know….” Again, her testimony struck me as melodramatic and insincere.

She appeared to have a difficult time remembering key facts such as whether the alleged sexual assault took place on the top surface of the washer, the dryer, or with her head inside the laundry basket that was on top of one of these appliances. With regards to the alleged assault that she said happened in 2005 she couldn't remember which came first, her slapping Vladek or him throwing water (from what she said enough to soak her face, hair and/or clothing) from a glass at her two times.

Nathan, 14 year old son of the star witness and Vladek testified that he had been awoken by the sound of his parents arguing and that he witness what happened. Nathan testified that he saw his mother punch his father in the nose knocking the glasses off his face and that his father did not throw water at his mother. He also testified that his mother's clothes and hair were dry and not wet as they would have been had she just had water thrown at her.

The star witness was asked by the defense to describe the alleged sexual assault. She testified that Vladek had held her two hands behind her back with one of his hands and held her head down on the dryer/washer with his other hand and while she struggled he pulled her corduroy pants down (she couldn't remember if they were button fly or had a button with a zipper) to around her ankles, pulled his own pants down and then sodomized her. If I remember correctly she said he didn't use any lubrication. She further testified that after he was done she felt his semen run down her leg.

She testified that after filing a complaint with the police about the alleged sexual and domestic assaults she was advised to go to the hospital to have a rape kit done (to preserve evidence of the alleged sexual assault for trial) by both of the police officers she spoke with. I don't doubt that her friend who's house she was at when she met with the first officer also told her to get a rape exam. Her fairly new friend was instructor of the CNA classes that the star witness attended as well as a nurse. Nonetheless she ignored everyone's advice and chose not to have a rape exam done. No doubt, there can be good reasons for choosing not to have a rape exam; it can be an uncomfortable and humiliating experience to have such a procedure done. However, it could also be that in this case the accuser knew there wouldn't be any evidence of sexual assault because the assault never happened.

Reflecting further on the star witnesses bizarre behavior (IMHO) and evasiveness to the questions asked of her I suppose it's possible that she has some sort of medical or mental health condition that would cause her to respond in this manner when under stress. However, since the prosecution refused to answer to repeated requests from the defense to produce her medical and mental health records no one will ever know. It does seem odd though that she appeared much less forgetful when the Asst. DA posed questions to her after the defense finished his cross examination. I am reminded at this time of a quote from Mark Twain, "If you tell the truth you don't have to remember anything."

"Watching Asst. DA Paul Cavanaugh present the State's side of the case was like viewing a made for TV "B" movie."

After the star witnesses cross examination there were a number of other witnesses for the prosecution that testified on Wednesday and Thursday. Some of those witnesses were unremarkable and not worth a mention while others were quite memorable. The three prosecution witnesses that most stand out in my memory are Lt. Travis Willey, the former Police Chief of Gouldsboro PD and Officer Harry Larrabee who is currently with Gouldsboro PD. I don't recollect the former chief's name so I will just call him Chief Wiggum.

Lt. Willey was the officer who answered the call to pick up the Ligia Filler as she did her mad dash down the street and through the blueberry fields in bare feet wearing nothing but a bra and black pants. Shockingly she was also carrying her toddler son on her hip at the time. According to Lt. Willey and the audio of the event it took about an hour and a half to get to their final destination where she could be psychologically evaluated. He spent a good deal of that time chasing after her, convincing her to turn the toddler over to him, putting her in restraints and driving to the hospital. Part of the audio of this can be heard by clicking here.

The jury heard about 35 minutes of the 90 plus minute audio of this event during the trail. They were advised that they could take the audio in with them when they deliberated if they felt the need. One of the things she alleged in this recording was that her husband had sexual molested the children. That accusation was investigated by DHHS and found unsubstantiated/to have no merit. During her mad dash she threatened to kill the officer, her husband and pretty much anyone who stood in her way. She suggested that a cousin of hers would help her kill her husband. One minute she was raging and threatening to kill someone and the next she was laughing like a person possessed.

Here are some examples of her recorded ramblings, "I will kill you mother f'er," "You messed with the wrong person…We going to cut you to pieces," "He's going to die because I'm going to f'ing kill him myself," "You're going straight to Hell and you know what? I am going straight to hell too but you know what? I'm going to enjoy it…" and "I'm not crazy, I'm not crazy." At one point in the recording you could hear her kicking violently with her feet hitting some hard surface (perhaps the back of the front seat in the police car).

You can hear Lt. Willey say in the audio that she is "right certifiable." Asst. DA Cavanaugh tried to convince the jury that the star witness acted this way because as an abused woman she was at the end of her rope because help couldn't come fast enough for her to protect herself and her children from a controlling, abuser and rapist.

I don't think the jury bought that theory, though.

SIDE BAR: I understand that the audio also contains an accusation made by the star witness against Lt. Willey. When they arrived at the hospital she accused Lt. Willey of hurting her and he denied it. If the jury was to believe that the star witness was a victim at the end of her rope as Asst. DA Cavanaugh claimed then what about her falsely accusing her husband and Lt. Willey? Should they also just ignore the fact that she falsely accused both of them?

“Officer Larrabee reported that he asked Ligia Filler to pull up her short sleeves and he looked at the front, back and sides of her arms and found no indication of a bruise.”

I wasn’t too surprised when I noticed one of the jury members wiping tears from her eyes when listening to this audio. Others saw a few more jury members dabbing their eyes also. It was a deeply disturbing audio of a woman over the edge, who wouldn’t have been touched and concerned by what they heard?

State v Filler May 26, 2011

The next noteworthy witness for the prosecution was Officer Harry Larrabee. Officer Larrabee was the first person that the star witness spoke with at the police department about the alleged assaults. BTW, did you know that someone can just call the police, report that they were assaulted by their spouse a few weeks ago and without any face to face interview or written and sworn testimony from the accuser a person can be charged with domestic assault? Maybe I am just naïve but I was shocked to hear that this could happen. Officer Larrabee’s testified that he took the complaint over the phone and then went straight to the Filler house to charge Vladek with assault. Pretty scary stuff.

Officer Larrabee also testified that when he met with the star witness face to face on Sunday he asked her if she had any bruises from being grabbed by the arms and pushed down into a chair (from the 2007 assault). Officer Larrabee reported that he asked Ligia Filler to pull up her short sleeves and he looked at the front, back and sides of her arms and found no indication of a bruise.

Former Chief Wiggum took the witness stand after Officer Larrabee. He testified that that he met with the star witness a day after Officer Larrabee had on Monday and that she showed him a bruise on her arm and he took a picture of it. That picture of the bruise was enlarged to the size of a piece of 8 ½ by 11 piece of paper and submitted as evidence. I don’t know about you but I find it telling that there was no sign of a bruise anywhere on her arms on Sunday but by Monday there was a bruise to be photographed.

Chief Wiggum testified that he was one of the investigators who assisted with the collection of evidence of the alleged 2007 sexual assault crime scene. He testified that he and another officer (whose name eludes me also so I will just call himinEddie) went into the Filler home with an arrest and a search warrant. The star witness told them to look for condoms and lubricant…these items were not found. I was a little confused because I thought the star witness testified that he didn't use lubricant.

Chief Wiggum and Eddie dusted the dryer/washer for hand and face prints and took the two throw rugs that were on the floor in the bathroom to test for semen. Chief Wiggum testified that they found no prints on the dryer/washer and no semen on the rugs. The defense asked Chief Wiggum whether or not the clothing worn by the star witness and the accused during the alleged sexual assault was collected. He testified that it was not.

SIDE BAR: Vladek took the witness stand on Thursday. During his testimony he described the approximate size of the bathroom where the alleged assault occurred. There were also pictures (regular size not 8 ½ by 11" like the bruise picture) of the bathroom submitted into evidence. Vladek testified that the space between the dryer/washer and the wall opposite these appliances was literally not even wide enough for two people to occupy at the same time. Someone once told me that the more absurd a scenario is the more believable it is….

So Chief Wiggum and Eddie took pictures, collected two throw rugs, dusted for finger/face prints and search for condoms and lubricant that the star witness said they would find but did not collect the clothing each person was wearing. I would have thought collecting the clothing worn during the alleged assault important given that the star witness said that she felt sperm run down her leg after the sexual assault and that her pants were around her ankles. Maybe I just watch too much NCIS.

SIDE BAR: The court took a morning break during Chief Wiggum's testimony. He was to return to the witness stand after the break for further cross examination. Only a few people stayed in the courtroom during the break. The bailiffs stepped out for a few minutes. I happened to walk back into the court room while attorney Smith was conferring with his client just outside the court room door. I sat down and immediately noticed that Chief Wiggum was stretching his neck to read the notes left on the podium by the defense attorney. I didn't think that attorney Smith would appreciate having his notes read by the prosecution's witness so I shot out of my seat and rushed to let attorney Smith know that Chief Wiggum was reading his notes on the podium. Attorney Smith made a bee line into the court room.

State v. Filler May 27, 2011

The State and the defense presented their closing arguments on Friday morning. Some of the highlights were:

Asst. DA Paul Cavanaugh, as I mentioned before, asked the jury to view the star witness's "certifiable" moments with Lt. Willey as an abused woman's cry for protection and help rather than as a mentally unstable woman's need of hospitalization. He also told the jury that in the real world evidence collection by police investigators at crime scenes are rarely as substantial or definitive as what you see on TV shows like NCIS. He mentioned that NCIS crime scene investigators always seem to find the evidence they need to prove their case but in the real world that just doesn't happen. However, he criticized the police's handling of the investigation in this case quite a bit.

Attorney Smith asked the jury, (and I am paraphrasing here) was the star witness was barking mad or was she clever as a fox? Vladek's main defense was that the star witness made up the assault allegations to get revenge for him wanting to divorce her and have custody of the children. He reminded them about Nathan's testimony of witnessing the 2005 argument and that he saw his mother punch his father in the face knocking his glasses off and breaking them but never saw his father strike or throw water at his mother.

Closing arguments went on for about 90 minutes and then the jury received their instructions from the judge before then went into deliberation. One of the instructions was on the definition of circumstantial evidence. The judge used an analogy about snow to explain what circumstantial evidence was and again I am paraphrasing here but basically he said if they look out at bedtime and see that there is no snow on the ground but when they wake up they see snow, they can reasonable assume that it snowed during the night. They didn't see it snow but they have circumstantial evidence that it did snow.

The jury went to deliberate. After about 75 minutes of deliberation the jury asked for a lunch break. They came back from lunch at around 1:15pm and went back to deliberations. Waiting for the verdict was agonizing, the minutes passed like hours, hours passed like days. The jury was finally ready to render their verdict at 4pm. We all rushed back into the court room.

Vladek had three criminal charges against him, two misdemeanor assaults, i.e. for allegedly throwing water at the victim in 2005 and for grabbing the star witness by the arms and pushing her down into a chair in 2007, and one felony charge of gross sexual assault. If they found him guilty of the gross sexual assault Vladek could have been put away behind bars for many years.

The jury's verdict: Not guilty of the 2005 assault, Not guilty of gross sexual assault, Guilty of the 2007 assault.

A few observations:

When the forewoman read the verdict something strange happened to her voice. She was completely audible when she read the not guilty for the 2005 assault but her voice was almost a whisper and she seemed to have a difficult time saying not guilty on the gross sexual assault charge. The judge had to ask her to repeat the verdict. I don't know if this has any relevance but we heard that there was a lot of loud arguing going on in the jury's deliberation room at times. BTW: She was one of the jurors that we saw wiping away tears as she listened to the disturbing audio.

I would love ask the jury how they came to find Vladek was guilty on the 2007 assault charge. I have a hunch that they remembered that big 8 ½" by 11"picture of the bruise on the star witnesses arm taken by Chief Wiggum three days after the alleged incident and forgot about the fact that there was no indication of a bruise when Officer Larrabee examined her arms the day before Chief Wiggum.

We were all grateful that the jury reached the right conclusions and found Vladek not guilty of the alleged 2005 assault and 2007 gross sexual assault and disappointed that they found him guilty of the 2007 assault. He may appeal the conviction.

No date has been set for sentencing on that charge at this time. Since the charge is a misdemeanor Vladek may have to pay a fine, be mandated to some type of batterer's intervention class and/or receive up to 364 days in jail. It's all up to Judge Murray. If his sentence includes jail time the guardian ad litem i.e. the lawyer for the children, who testified at the trial the first day recommended that the children stay in the custody of their fraternal grandmother and aunts in Georgia and not be given to their mother.

Some further observations:

The State got to present their case from Tuesday morning 8:30am until Thursday morning 11:30am while the defense only had about three hours on Thursday afternoon to present their case.

After the State rested the prosecutor and defense attorney went into the judge's chambers. The defense attorney made a motion to dismiss on the grounds that the prosecutor lacked enough evidence for a conviction. A newspaper reporter from the Bangor Daily News was allowed to go into the judge's chambers with them during this procedure. It seemed odd but perhaps it happens all the time…

If you think something like this can't happen to you well so did Vladek at one time….

The Prodigal Princess

June 4, 2011 | by Izzey | Link | Original Link

Excuse me whilst I puke, before I pen this tale…

(Imagine the worst, followed by a vigorous brushing of the teeth and a desperate swirl of gargle)

Ahh, there now.

I've had the terrible misfortune to witness the powerful destruction and pursuant misery caused by one 'Princess' (and Queen Mother) in my lifetime; a thirty-year-old, selfish, demanding, tumor-like growth of psychotic baggage, I accidentally discovered… attached to her father's hip.

Her father had stepped back into my life from the past.

I virtually walked right into him one day at the grocery store…bump!

We had been friendly for years, without having had any regular contact. I would see him at family functions on occasion, and the here and there of a working environment. He always came to my charity dinners and donated clothes, sheets, rugs and dishes, etc., to the shelters and halfway houses for which I collected.

But I had not seen him for quite some time, and didn't see the happenstance coming. We started talking; a friendly conversation, and before I knew it the subject gravitated to surviving our lives and making a date for dinner.

But back to the (I'm feeling nauseous again) Princess.

When she was a baby, her mother The Queen had decided immediately that she was going to have everything she ever wanted in life; through this child.

My friend – and occasional mentor – had been married to The Queen, resulting in a collar around his neck, a short leash, a child that had not yet spoken her first word, and The Family Court System…

The harder she pulled that leash…the more he drank.

He drank a lot back then.

I remember him crying one night. The Queen was living with another King. But she wasn't getting married to The New King, because that would ruin the best of both worlds. She would live with The New King; enjoying all the privileges of a new kingdom…whilst holding up The Princess like a beggar's cup for more money than the courts had awarded her from The Old King. (That would include the beautiful castle The Old King broke his back for, and that was handed over to The Queen shortly after she had The Princess)

Since The Queen was Jewish and the dethroned King was not; the holidays proved to be especially rewarding for both the Queen and, depending on who you asked, the Princess. The Queen would always have The Princess on Jewish holidays…but hold her for a King's ransom on Christmas, Easter, and every other Catholic holiday. An additional ‘price’ that he gratefully paid out of love for his daughter.

This would prove to be to be quite the lesson for the upcoming Princess, who would later become a prodigal mother herself, and hold the granddaughter Princess for ransom; just as The Queen had expertly instructed.

Oh, those royal lessons.

But I get ahead of myself here.

The dethroned King was always a hard-working man that built a thriving business from the ground up. He became successful enough to live a prosperous, comfortable life; only to be quickly picked clean like a fresh roasted chicken by the gluttonous Queen, the well tutored Princess, and of course, The Family Court System.

The King was also sued by The Queen for her lawyer’s fees, because she claimed poverty….as running a huge castle cost so much money she did not have enough left over to fight for the right to have The King’s fortune. So the newly dethroned King, paid for his own lawyer, and the lawyer that The Queen used to sue him for his own money.

Now, without much forethought to all of this…the greedy Queen did not realize she was putting the dethroned King into an inevitable state of bankruptcy. That would affect the cash-cow business that financed the kingdom in which The Queen, The New King and the 21 year premium-yielding Princess were squatting. As everything was still in the dethroned King’s name, and neatly tied into The-Money-Grows-On-Trees-Corporation.

The Queen panicked, and formally crowned the new King, thus alleviating the dethroned King of her state enforced cuntimony. The dethroned King was elated, but his business was still in trouble, and he found no more solace in the bottle, nor the arms of any other fair maidens.

His little Princess’ love was auctioned off by The Queen at whim whenever she needed some extra gold. The Queen also informed the Old King that she was moving out of state, and needed to put the castle up for sale. The heartbroken Old King decided life was not worth living anymore, and debated committing suicide.

His love for The Princess kept him from it.

The Queen now realized that her monthly-court-mandated-Princess-stipend, and all of its perks, was in serious jeopardy. She decided to back off, and get a job. Her new corporate title would be “The Battered Wife,” and she quickly secured a high-paying position and retirement fund… through the Family Court System, once again.

After successfully dethroning another King, she settled into a modest new castle with incomes from two dethroned Kings: cuntimony, and princess support. She was proud of herself, as she worked very hard to achieve the golden goose-egg status of ‘Entitlement.’

The Princess grew up very quickly, after taking classes in ’emotional terrorism,’ ‘recreational drug use for sympathy,” and ‘how to secure an income through pregnancy,’ she graduated top of her class. She then commenced advanced studies at The University of Family Court; The Ivy League college for Princesses to this day.

Young women from all over the world study very hard in hopes to earn their rightful place there. Its prestigious status revered… and competed for…aggressively.

Her degree secured the Princess her own cuntimony and princess support, with an added bonus of a Grandfather–King-allowance. The Princess' Princess is set for life.

The Princess decided one day, that my friendship with her father was a threat to her creative extortion of money from the Grandfather King. Since she was constantly throwing her own dethroned King into the dungeon for non-payment of Cuntimony and Princess support, which he enabled her to do by being injured on his job.

She decided that The Grandfather King would be her supplemental income so she could have all the privileges she was accustomed to, without skipping a beat. She waved around her Sympathy Sword like a mighty warrior. One day, she waved the sword in the wrong direction, after the Grandfather King said a word that she had never-ever heard before …

"No"

This word, the one word she had never heard before in her lifetime, caused the Sympathy Sword to gash open her arm and put The Princess in the hospital. It would prove to be her best trump card to this day. Whenever she needs a new flat-screen television, a computer, an IPod, or a trip to Disney World with the Granddaughter Princess, all she has to do is show up wearing a short-sleeved shirt, and rub her scar like it still bothers her….and scratch it.

Much like a 'scratch-off' lottery ticket, that always fucking wins.

The Grandfather King loves his Grandaughter Princess so much that he has decided that his own Princess will never do right by her, and set aside a trust fund for her education. He knows that his Princess will inherit his business (or the swift liquidation of it) when he dies.

So my good friend, The Old King, has informed me that he has a small extra life insurance policy set aside in addition to his others, and has named me the beneficiary. It is a mere ten thousand dollars, but he said to me, "I know that you will at least make sure I have a coffin, and a proper funeral, when I die."

I've never felt so honored, and saddened, at the same time.

Why we don’t try to reason with feminists

June 4, 2011 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

Where is the counter argument?

I’ve been an outspoken MRA for a few years now, and I’ve noticed that despite the overwhelming opposition to any argument for male rights, there are no substantive counter-arguments. No arguments whatsoever. Opponents of men’s rights have no trouble reciting false facts, debunked talking points, fabricated studies, and obvious lies in support of their religion of female victimhood and male villainy, but lies are not arguments. They’re just lies.

[unordered_list style=”red-x”]

- 1 in 4 women is raped, sexually assaulted, battered or abused – is a lie [1]
- The wage gap – is a lie [2][3]
- Women’s historical oppression – is a lie
- Rape culture – is a lie[4][5]
- The inherent violence of masculinity – is a lie
- The inherent goodness of femininity – is a lie
- The idea that feminism is about equality – is a lie

[/unordered_list]

By contrast, whenever I or any other MRA fields an argument in defence of mens rights, or critical of feminism, it is never met with a counter argument. The arguments of MRAs are met with accusations, shaming language, insults, threats, blackmail, violence, censure, censorship, cooked up criminal charges, vandalism, imprisonment and other calumny.

My article critical of the institution of marriage was answered by feminists accusing me of being gay,

…of being bitter, of having a small penis, or social ineptitude, of financial impotence, of living in my mother’s basement, of body odour, and of tenancies to hatred, violence, and pedophilia. Of those critical of my article, none actually addressed the substance of the argument made. None.

My article deconstructing the feminist goal of reversing the burden of proof in accusation of sexual assault was met by feminists who called me a rapist, a bigot, a woman beater, a loser, a violent criminal, and a sociopath. Not even one criticism addressed the substance of my article, and Jessica Valenti likely still wants women to be killed.

One of the first articles I wrote exploring the relationship between central banking and the funding stream of organized feminism was answered by a feminist on a different continent whose best rebuttal was to re-present each point of my argument – leaving out, and adding, key points to make them easy to refute in a straw-man attack–then to call me a stalker. A stalker on another continent.

In response to my arguments, I have been variously subject to shaming attacks, censorship, straw-man arguments, false accusations of violent crimes by people thousands of miles away, accusations of pedophilia, of rape, denounced as a psychopath, a serial killer, as maladjusted, as a loser, as a racist, and all manner of villainy. Almost none of my philosophical opponents have fielded anything approaching a substantive argument, or have addressed me with anything except lies and abuse, and a few threats of death too.

I wont make any pious declarations of my own lack of violent, criminal or deviant behavior. Why bother? I also will not shut up and go away. I will never shut up.

> I. Will. Never. Shut. Up.

What I will do for my loudest and most amoral critics is to offer a few suggestions

[unordered_list style="arrow"]

- Admit that your position is unethical, and that you are purely self centered and devoid of anything like an ethical compass
- Admit that your continued insistence on women's eternal victimhood is designed to take adult agency away from the members of the sexual demographic you supposedly care so much about
- Admit that you want to force women's and men's behavior into a mode of compliant service to your own greed and sadism
- Admit that your ethic is built on lies and violence
- Admit to yourself that even though you lack the muscle and the courage to commit violence yourself, your philosophy depends absolutely on violence done by others on your behalf
- Admit that those who do violence on your behalf, when they have scrubbed the field of anyone who dares to disagree – those enforcers will turn on you
- Recognize that when your political will has been imposed by force on everybody around you, you will discover that you are locked into a tiny cage as well

[/unordered_list]

You see, I recognize that in spite of my optimism and my repeated attempts to open dialog or discussion with the ideological opponents of the men's rights movement – there will be no civilized discourse between us. The reason is that feminism's active proponents have no interest in truth, nor in justice, nor in human rights, nor in protecting anyone from harm, least of all women. Despite a nearly omnipresent narrative of "protecting women" mainstream feminism is a sham which depends on escalating social carnage to maintain a control on public conscience and to secure streams of funding.

I recognize that the opponents of the men's rights movement are organized,

…violent, hateful bigots, and the only reason you cannot be correctly called criminals is that your ideology now controls the courts, and thus the definition of what it means to be a criminal. I also recognize that soon, individuals doing nothing more corrosive than simply speaking out, will soon be named criminal.

A man I held in high esteem recently died, and I will repeat a statement of his now. "When your conscience says the law is immoral, don't follow it."

Past and present efforts to silence, shame, marginalize, and subvert the efforts of men's rights activists demonstrate that what we are saying about our opponents, the enemies of human rights, is not exaggeration, or conspiracy theory, instead it is understatement.

I'll restate what I said earlier.

> I. Will. Never. Shut. Up.

The fact that shutting me up, and shutting up other MRAs is a major goal is illustrative of just what we oppose. The truth does not require state funded enforcers. Now, in addition to not shutting up, and in light of my, and other's increased understanding of just who and what you are who oppose the men's movement – namely that you are violent, lying hypocrites lacking interest in truth, and consumed with a self serving philosophy which relies on escalating harm to those you pretend to protect. I don't mind telling you, I am no longer here to debate, or to reason, or to converse, or to hope you may be reached by logic or evidence.

I am here to fuck your shit up.

And in that, I am not alone. Now I don't mean to stoop to the use of lies or violence. You are practiced at those tactics, and frankly, I don't need them. You may also wonder, what can a few disgruntled MRAs do that you should be concerned about? And to that, I can only say – watch, and learn.

Choice for Men; Compassion for Men

June 5, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

As some of you already know, something called "The Ultimate Men's Summit," is set to launch and will run from June 10th through June 19th of this month. It is being billed as "the largest men's telesummit in history."

And it is using other verbiage to imply representation of the men's movement.

Despite the presence of some visionaries like Robert Bly and Warren Farrell, the "summit" is largely populated with the names of men more commonly known for their misandry and derogation of men and boys.

If you look on their schedule you will see names like Michael Kimmel, Gay Hendricks and Arjuna Ardaugh.

And you will also see their unmistakable fingerprints in the core of the conference description, as follows:

The 5,500-year history of domination and control is coming to an end, and it's clear we need a new model to replace it. Men seem to be caught between these two worlds: the old culture for which we've been trained, and the emerging culture we have yet to be prepared for.

This statement is an abomination. It is a hateful anchor chain wrapped around the necks of all men and boys and the forces behind this conference seek to add shackles to that chain for a future of abject servitude along the lines proposed by Hanna Rosin in "The End of Men."

We must respond to this with force and vigor, and thankfully the organizers of the summit have provided us with the opportunity to do just that.

They are taking live calls throughout the event.

I respectfully submit that every man and woman who supports this website should be registered for the event (it is free) and plan to call in.

The only question is what to say when we call. The answer, in my opinion, is simple.

My suggestion is not to allow them the luxury of our justified anger; they will only use it to make a case that we are regressive traditionalists creating a backlash against change for men and against women's rights.

We all know the truth is totally different. Feminism is socially and legally enforced chivalry, the ultimate in male and female gender roles.

We are the ones breaking out of the mold and moving into the new age. We are the ones putting an end to oppressive gender roles. So I suggest that is what we let them know, and that we point out to them exactly why they are nothing more than a continuation of the old paradigm, enforced with shame and bullets.

Let us challenge them by asking where, in all their "enlightened" concepts of masculinity, is there any mention of…

Choice for Men; Compassion for Men.

Where, in their supposed advocacy for ending gender roles, is there any work toward choice for men; in reproduction, in parenting, in taking dangerous jobs to subsidize the lives of women, in being able to defend themselves from female violence?

Where, in their supposed advocacy for ending gender roles, is there any work toward compassion for men; in the courts, in the workplace; in domestic violence; in paternity fraud; in false allegations of abuse and rape; in the social misandry that pervades our culture?

In the misandry they are furthering with their summit.

Where is the choice? Where is the compassion?

And ask them how they can pretend to talk about a new kind of masculinity, adapting to modern realities, if there is no discussion of these things; if, indeed, there is not even any acknowledgement that these problems exist.

I encourage everyone to participate; to be earnestly polite but clearly firm; to not accept brushoff answers and to call again and again to speak to as many presenters as possible.

It is our campaign, that of Choice and Compassion for Men, in the only real men's movement for an end to gender roles that ever existed, and it is critical that we let them know that.

We need to repeat those words, in the midst of their conference, like a sacred mantra.

Choice for Men; Compassion for Men.

Please follow the link and read what is on their agenda. Please call them and ask, over and over again about Choice and Compassion for men.

And ladies, this is your chance to let them know what the MRM is made of. If you believe in Choice and Compassion for Men, please call and tell them.

I will be calling them myself, from home, and live from the radio show.

Do not let our movement be usurped, co-opted, diluted and misrepresented. Let everyone listening to this conference know what is happening here and why we are out here, fighting the fight.

It's a golden opportunity insert the truth where it appears not to be wanted.

When it comes to registering and committing to this activism, can I please get a "done" in the comments?

Thank you.

Spare Me Your “Weinergate”!

Newsflash: Anthony Weiner Has a Libido

Punch Line: Anthony Weiner showed everybody his namesake. Get it?

Caveat: I despise politics and all politicians, except for Ron Paul (libertarianism) and Cynthia McKinney (9/11). I reserve the right to discover just a little bit of life-orientation in one or two more, but not Mr. Weiner. This one is difficult for me, because I have little to no sympathy for politicians, even the ones I don’t despise. I doubt any of Weiner’s intentions are really all that noble when it comes to his political actions, so normally, I would let such an individual lie undisturbed in the bed he’s made.

However, Weiner and I have at least one thing in common: We’re both men. A politician’s manhood is under intense scrutiny, in the midst of a misandric culture. Therefore, I do not wish to remain silent. As I see it, the trouble with all of this man’s personal troubles is that people are, once again, angry and upset over molehills while the mountains behind them are blocking the sun. Here’s a little sunlight for you:

Weiner gets a 100% rating from some pro-choice constituency, and a 0% from us pro-lifers, but he has to resign over a cock-tease pic.

Weiner opposes a bill that puts restrictions on what the government can do with money it steals from me to fund abortions that (to my mind) are, if not murder, something dangerously close, but he has to resign over showing his clothed hardon (Or was it entirely exposed? …Better find out.) to willing, horny women.

Weiner augments the drug war by making more of the market in cigarettes illegal, as well as giving more of my stolen money to the assholes in charge of the Mexican government to “fight” the never-to-be-repealed War on Certain Kinds of Drugs, driving up the cost of business (and hence the suffering of poor men), and putting more men in overcrowded prisons, but he has to resign over his penis and what he occasionally likes to do with it.

Weiner flexes his statist muscle at YouTube to pull videos down that allegedly turn the viewer into a terrorist simply for watching (you can watch this guy, though), which comes dangerously close to violating everybody’s favorite amendment, but he has to resign because he likes showing his dick to the ladies.

Weiner voted in favor of a mindless, bloody war that has killed more than a million people, many of them guys who liked showing their cocks to select women in private, but because more people saw Weiner’s tool than he intended, he has to resign.

Weiner vocally opposed an attempt by a Palestinian delegation to enter the UN, making a snide remark about them in the process, but he has to resign because he enjoys his manhood with more women than current American culture will allow for a married man.

Weiner voted in favor of sanctions on Iran, which will undoubtedly lead to greater poverty and suffering for other penis-owners, but he has to resign because there are apparently at least seven women who have seen his.

Worry not, virginal proles. Your government will thoroughly investigate this most serious matter. From Wikipedia: "House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi [a genius and chaste benefactor of all feminine concern] announced that there would be an investigation by the House Ethics Committee to determine 'whether any official resources were used or any other violation of House rules occurred'." Excuse me? "Official resources"? So it's an "ethics violation" if he uses his work computer instead of his home computer, at 2 AM, when the missus is asleep, and he's wondering what the hell he got himself into back in 2010 when he married her?

I suppose some political types, especially Republicans, are going to try to spin this as a matter of lying about it, but I hope my readers are smart enough to know that the spin is really all about an open seat in government, and this "news story" is really all about Weiner's dick. Well, I already covered that subject in a previous article. Therefore, the rest of this article will be a "terrorist rant" against our ridiculously stupid culture. Alert the Department of Vaginal Homeland Security.

What the hell is everybody's problem? Why are they blind to the egregious violations of simple human behavior through political action, but private exchanges — that no doubt hurt a woman who expected more from her husband — are hyped to such a great extent? Keep in mind, I turned off the TV years ago, but even I have heard about this nonsense now, from a link at Salon.com. That link went to more links at Salon about this single, ridiculous issue, then more links on into self-righteous cyberspace. For the next few days, this cock-hungry story will be all the rage, while innumerable fires rage in the Middle East, some of them set by the man currently under the sexual microscope. Then, over the next few weeks and months, it will fade to occasional mention. After that, a few enterprising magazines, desperate to keep readership that is going elsewhere, will probably bring this back up like reflux at the end of the year, for the nauseating recap of 2011: "Remember Weiner's wiener? Yuk, yuk!" Don't believe me? Remember Tiger Woods? More yuks to follow.

In the meantime, a guy I don't even like (based on what I saw of his unctuous nature prior to my liberation), will be made to suffer silently and ashamedly for doing something similar to what a great many other men and women are currently doing online.

And at the beach. I went to my first nude beach on Memorial Day weekend. Since my friends told me it was a gay beach, and since I'm no stranger to the different rules at all-gay-male events of this sort, I knew the following: Clothing is optional, you can look all you want, but no sex or masturbating is permitted.

What I was not prepared for was the fact that the "gay" nude beach was separate from the "straight" nude beach only in the most ambiguous sense. I thought, since it involved gay men and gay male behavior that most others find abhorrent, that the beach we were going to would be isolated. Instead, my friends and I walked past a whole bunch of naked, straight men and women, making eye contact with them, these skin-clad guys knowing full well which side of the beach we were headed to. They paraded themselves and their women all over the gay side. No sex, no hardons, no lewd behavior. (You may be opposed to the following, but I even saw one nude mom and dad there with their nude six-year-old boy, whom none of the grown naked men there bothered to molest.) Strange indeed that the only difference between this beach and any other is that many of the bathers were naked and nobody gave a damn.

It was a fascinating experience in a non-sexual sense, one that paralleled the memory of one of my straight, Mormon, college roommates, when as a teenager he went to the French Riviera with his dad (the non-molesting variety). He said that the first day on the beach (where the ladies went topless), he couldn't pry his eyes away. For the rest of his time in southern France, however, he said it simply didn't faze him. Keep in mind: He was, at the time, a straight, virginal, teenaged male who had little access to real or pornographic breasts.

If the two of us can experience that sort of instant acceptance at the sight of genitalia, why in fucking hell can't "your elected representatives" get over Weiner's private gaffe? Why can't you? Why doesn't Salon? Why don't Jon Stewart and all the late-night talk show hosts?

I propose that it has to do with a peculiar, wonderful, fascinating, and powerful social phenomenon called American Christianity. Religious belief on this land mass has almost exclusively revolved around the idea of material progress "married" with spiritual progression. In this regard, it is inextricably linked to ancient Puritanical belief. I defer at this point to a much smarter guy (who, like Weiner, is Jewish and politically left-of-center), Simon Schama, and his captivating "A History of Britain." In Episode VI, "Burning Convictions," he points out that Catholic England eventually went underground, heavily persecuted, their gorgeous adornments torn asunder as Puritanism sought, more than once in English history, to make everybody that much closer to perfect. At one point, these people banned Christmas. Yikes. Then they settled in America and created Thanksgiving (Christmas Lite).

What do these sorts of people say about sex? Nothing good: "In the relation of churches to civil power, Puritans believed that secular governors are accountable to God to protect and reward virtue, including 'true religion', and to punish wrongdoers [emphasis mine]." The stage is set so that someday, even a Jewish man who "represents" others in a "God-given" government must be a cut above "normal" men; he must be impervious to a man's passions, in complete control. A land mass full of people who believe in being obedient to authority means that the authorities have to act differently. (How, then, do they represent you?)

Having come from a religious tradition that could not have grown the way that it has without the bedrock of American Protestantism, I can safely say that the American Protestant approach to human sexuality is different than other Christian churches only by degree. Sex is godly (or "good"), but only when it is safely within the bounds of heterosexual, monogamous, lifelong marriage as legally recognized, and no place else. Since, in many American Christians' minds, American government is linked to the essential goodness of God and His church, even non-Christian leaders need to act like American Christians. Thus, the American Jewish Weiner keeps himself clean-shaven and metrosexual-looking, and throws in a few votes that even I can't complain about. He knows how to look and act the part.

Until the indiscretion. Weiner's acknowledgement of his manly sexual feelings in an unapproved manner means that he is now persona non grata. People can focus on the lies he told (as he desperately hoped it would go away), the humorous nature of how he was "exposed," and ignore everything that they've been ignoring their entire lives: the state's lies, the state's murderous adventures abroad, the state's continuous violations of everything individuals prefer to deal with in private, the state's dumbing down of children (including boys), the state's destruction of the economy (including blue collar men: the backbone of our society), the state's heavily-regulated, vapid, "free market" entertainment, and the state's false premise. In short, if the state can gloss it up like Weiner's smiling mug, Americans will buy it. They'll dutifully line up on either side of the aisle, set up their little Tea Parties and Progressive Caucuses, and pretend that the biggest concern about Weiner is a silly private exchange that involved sex. They will also claim, falsely, that it has nothing to do with our collective Puritanical roots.

America used to be full of men who could clear the land and push West; men who did it themselves, who also came from the American Protestant tradition. They built beautiful churches in every community, something America has now abandoned, or given over to corporate designers to handle. They educated their own families, something that we no longer have time for. They thought politicians like Weiner were full of shit, which they were and are, a belief that seems extreme or downright dangerous now.

What this means is that America now has it ass-backwards. I'm neither advocating nor condemning a married man whipping out his dick online. What's in Weiner's head? I don't know and I don't care. That's between him, his wife, and what's left of their marriage. Maybe, given his political mind, they'll come up with some Clinton/Rodham Clinton-style arrangement. Ugh. That's their problem. It should never have been mine, or yours. But a culture mired in lies that are widely believed and maintained will get a lot more mileage out of Weiner's cock than he ever dreamed of, without any of the respect his masculinity (what's left of it) deserves. And every time you turn on your stupid television, you're helping them to do just that.

I don't like him either, but Good Lord, leave the man alone. Unless, of course, you'd like to open up a dialogue about the many problems the man's voting record has already caused. I won't be holding my breath. I'll be too busy holding down my lunch.

A fine, brief pictorial review of SlutWalk Chicago

June 7, 2011 | by False Rape Society | Link | Original Link

I just got home from the Chicago Slut Walk. And all I can say, is what a complete and utter joke and waste of people's time. What really brought home how ridiculous it was, is that there was a Susan Komen Breast Cancer walk today, and it had finished and they were heading to the train, and passing by the Thompson Center, and passed right by where the Slut Walk was gathering.

The vast majority of the people who were participating, were what you see in this photo. You have to love the sign. Sorry sweetie, but it ISN'T your sexuality that scares people.

[image]

This young lady decided that this was a Sport's Illustrated photo shoot. I didn't have the heart to tell her otherwise.

[image]

The best part of the whole day, was the young lady (rather good looking), that showed up wearing just a chemise, that didn't quite reach down past her ass. A group of women who were standing nearby, were staring at her and I heard one of them say, "that just isn't acceptable". After she said that, she looked over towards me and I smiled at her, and said, "why isn't it acceptable? Isn't that what this whole walk is about? Or are you just a hypocrite?". She at least had the decency to look embarrassed.

New AVfM submission guidelines for writers

June 7, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Part of the good news of AVfM's success is also the bad news. Managing this website has become quite time consuming; so consuming, in fact, that it is having a negative impact on my ability to fully engage other projects that need my attention. And it has caused serious delays with the timely processing of articles that I post from emails.

So, in effect today, new procedures will be in place regarding submissions for publication on this site. For new, first time writers, nothing will change. The procedure to submit your material is outlined above in the masthead link for Join the Choir.

After your first article has made the cut here, you will be required to request a contributor level account which will allow you access to the AVfM admin where you can directly submit your article for publishing and review, if you want to submit any further articles.

For those of you unfamiliar with wordpress, it is not difficult. I am including a tutorial with this post.

On that note, allow me to make a few suggestions.

1. Choose a byline and include it in the article at the top. Obviously, because of the climate of gender tyranny that exists, you are not required to use your real name, but a byline is still required. So, if you want to be known as Zetamonster Ungodly Destroyer of Feminist Lies, that is fine (if you insist) but put the word "By" in front of that and put it at the top.
2. Use a spell check before submitting. Anyone who reads me regularly spots the hypocrisy in this. I almost always have at least one, maybe more misspelled words that slip through each piece. It happens easily, but I do try, often going back into my pieces and correcting things I missed after they are posted.
3. Your piece may be edited. If I spot typos, or if I spot a sentence that is formed so poorly that it doesn't make sense, I am going to correct it. If I need to make any changes that I think even slightly alters the intent of what you are saying, I will contact you and discuss changes before posting.
4. DON'T RELY ON THE USE OF ALL CAPS TO MAKE YOUR POINTS EVEN THE REALLY REALLY IMPORTANT ONES BECAUSE IT COMES ACROSS LIKE SCREAMING ON THE PAGE. Seriously, the use of occasional caps and bold text can help a piece, but if you are using a lot of caps and bold text you are probably underestimating the impact of your writing on its own.

Thanks for bearing with these changes. They will help you get your work in front of readers in a much more timely fashion, and help me free up time for other business.

If you have recently submitted an article (except first submissions), but it has not run, please email me a request for your contributor account.

Pot Luck Tuesday at AVfM Radio

June 7, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box type="alert" size="large" style="rounded" border="full" icon="none"]

OK, folks, we are back on the air tonight with AVfM Radio.

And tonight, it is Potluck Tuesdsay. JtO and I are going to cover a variety of topics, from the recent effort to end women's prisons in England to The Ultimate Men's Summit to spending some time with Steve Berkimer of the False Rape Society who recently attended, and survived, SlutWalk Chicago, a veritable Macy's parade of Windy City Waddling Windbags, carrying signs and way too much body fat.

And of course, the star of the show, YOU.

So power up those phones, dust off those stagnant BINGO cards and be sure to call us. We want your uncensored opinions on all those subjects, or whatever else is on your mind.

And remember, A Voice for Men Radio is the only spot in the free world where feminists are too afraid to open their mouths and lie. Or say anything else for that matter.

Dontcha just love it?

It is now seriously suggested that women's prisons close

June 7, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Great Britain is about to lend new meaning to the pussy pass.

At least, that is the recommendation in a report issued by the Women's Justice Task Force which has concluded that offering healthcare services, housing and drug abuse treatment to female criminals is better than holding them to the same standards of punishment to which they hold men.

In other words, they are about to eliminate the sentencing disparity that already favors women over men in the UK's criminal justice system by just eliminating incarceration for women altogether. The British Ministry of Justice has roundly accepted the report and is "carefully considering the recommendations." It has also been endorsed by other police officials.

Lest anyone think that such a blatantly discriminatory and sexist policy is beyond the tolerance of the government and the British public, it should be noted that it was only last year that British judges were recommended to issue lighter sentences to women offenders, regardless of their offense. That recommendation was issued by the Equal Treatment Bench Book, published by the Judicial Studies Board (JSB).

Yes, that is correct, the the Equal Treatment Bench Book recommended that half the population, based solely on sex, should get lighter sentences for the same crimes than the other half.

It raised very few eyebrows and is now standard practice. And it looks like the policy is about to grow like a tumor.

The message here to female criminals is clear. Do whatever you want, you will not get punished. Indeed, you will be rewarded. Need a food allowance? Assault someone. Want to move into new digs? Kill your husband. Hurt someone, steal from them, lie about your husband or boyfriend in court, embezzle money from your company, sell drugs to school children (then make videos of them having sex), molest your children, drown them in a bathtub or just put out cigarettes on them out of frustration when your favorite TV show gets cancelled.

Then, when you stand before a judge and get admonished for your depraved actions, tell him to go fuck himself. Tell him you will molest his children and put out cigarettes on them. Tell him you will laugh like Ligia Filler and do a victory dance when you do it because there is nothing he can do.

There won't be a prison he can send you to, so he will have to throw the book at you by giving you more housing, healthcare, education and other perks.

It should be a boon for organized crime. They can enlist women into their organizations; give them direct responsibility for committing the actual crimes that earn the mob its living. When they get out of line have hardened women beat them with clubs, torture and kill them in order to maintain power and control. How's that for equality? The mob will operate in almost untouchable glory.

After all, when the police make an arrest, what are they going to do to make these women roll and give up their bosses, threaten them with more housing?

Are you a terrorist outfit seeking to bring harm and havoc to the British government? Ramp up the training for female Jihadists! They will be able to bomb, assassinate and even use WMD with impunity.

Its all part of the plan to make things more equal in Great Britain.

The day this policy passes and women's prisons are actually torn down, and the country enters an age where female criminality becomes part of government qualification for the issuance of state benefits, it will be also be the same day that I implement a change in editorial policy for this website.

It will be the official policy of AVfM, which has a healthy readership in England, to support vigilante justice. I repeat, it will be the policy of AVfM to encourage British citizens to take the law into their own hands and punish female offenders themselves, outside the scope of British law.

When government forces justice into the hands of the average citizen, then the governments right to establish rules for punishment is defunct. Any government that robs the people of justice creates a de facto judiciary in the capricious and unpredictable hands of the masses.

And all the masses will need to do is train female vigilantes to execute their wishes, because the government will be powerless to stop them.

I do not wish this to happen. In fact, were I a praying man I would certainly be on my knees at this moment pleading with The Almighty to help the western world avert such a catastrophe. But in the almost certain event that there is no Divine Intervention, or no sudden reclamation of sanity on the part of the British government, and this policy proposal becomes law, I will do everything in my admittedly limited power to encourage the good people of England to defy it.

By whatever means necessary.

The Ultimate Men's Summit: Elam Speaks

June 8, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

I know what some of you will think. I am thinking it myself. Careful, careful.

Remember the "invitation" by the Good Men Project Magazine to add our voice to a purportedly fair examination of the men's rights movement on their website? Remember the knife-in-the-back set-up by Editor Henry Belanger painting us all as frothing, whining, tin-foil hat wearing nut cases, inviting his readers to deride and ridicule us – right out of the gate?

I remember it well. I put my trust in Henry and he fucked me for it. No problem. Scummy is as scummy does and his readers still got a face full of information that they were clueless how to respond to in any other way than to follow Henry's low rent lead.

Now, I am about to prove that either Henry was representative of all of blue pill society and that the stench of misandry-disguised-as-men's-movement has spread everywhere, or that there is reason to think otherwise.

An invitation has been extended, which I have accepted, from the promoters of the Ultimate Men's Summit for me to present at that event. The (mutually) chosen topic is "Why some men are angry at feminism."

I hope to speak well and in a way that justifies the incredible support I have been given by those who regularly frequent this website.

I also want to say that I refuse to allow my experience with Henry Balanger of The Good Men Project to reduce me to paranoia or to alter my values to the point that I refuse to extend trust until I am given reasons not to.

I have spoken at length with Lion Goodman, the summit liaison who approached me regarding an appearance. My impression of him thus far guides my conscious about participating. He strikes me as a bright, energetic man who is overly but unconsciously influenced by feminist propaganda (like the other 99% of men). That being said, he also gives me the impression he is open-minded, fair, principled and genuinely interested in what I/we have to say.

I could be wrong, but that is my honest impression and I am going with it.

That being said, I would like to ask AVfM supporters to register for the event and give a brief call in to my interview (each segment only lasts 30 minutes) to add your thoughts into the mix, as well as to phone in and participate in other presentations.

Thanks again in advance for your participation. This won't be AVfM Radio, but I won't be sugar coating either.

My appearance there will be Thursday, June 16th at 10:00 a.m. Pacific Time, US.

Register for the summit HERE.

Presumed guilty until proven innocent; Even then you're still guilty

June 8, 2011 | by Carey Roberts | Link | Original Link

This past Thursday men and women from around the country convened to share their experiences facing down false allegations of abuse. The event was a sobering testament to how the former War on Crime has morphed into Open Season on the Innocent, or so it would appear.

The meeting was the first-ever False Allegations Summit, held in Washington, DC and sponsored by a group called Stop Abusive and Violent Environments. Yes, there were anguished sighs and tears as persons recounted their daily battles – for some, obsessions — to exonerate themselves and restore their good names.

The Summit led off with the revelation that 11% of Americans report they have been falsely accused of child abuse, domestic violence, or sexual assault. This astonishing number means tens of millions of persons have had their foreheads branded with the scarlet Abuser label.

The Summit then featured presentations by a parade of stakeholder organizations that have witnessed first-hand the effects of false claims.

The National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers highlighted the "immense, often irreparable harm caused to our clients for false allegations, not only to reputation and personal relationships, but often to the accused individual's livelihood and even health."

The Home School Legal Defense Association documented repeated instances where an anonymous hotline call triggered an unannounced visit by a social worker, sometimes ending in the strip search of a bewildered child. These are not isolated cases – nationwide, over 85% of child abuse allegations are found to be unsubstantiated: http://www.saveservices.org/false-allegations-awareness-month/

The American Coalition for Fathers and Children then testified how an allegation of child abuse or domestic violence often becomes a tactical ploy for an impending child-custody dispute. "When a father can be sentenced to months in jail for simply leaving a gallon of milk on his child's doorstep, we have indeed reached the point of 'hysteria' about the issue of domestic violence," ACFC executive director Michael McCormick commented.

The National Coalition for Men representative recounted the plight of Raul, a ship-welder who was caught in an unhappy marriage with an abusive woman. She began to accuse him of a litany of offenses including sexual abuse of their baby. As the conflict escalated, the woman's family started to threaten the man. Just two weeks ago, Raul was discovered lying in the California desert, a gunshot wound to the head.

Then Encounters International described how so-called Green Card Girls play the abuse card to secure their work authorization and citizenship. Recalling her childhood experiences in the former Soviet Union, Natasha Spivack told the spell-bound audience:

“In Stalinist Russia, innocent people were presumed guilty if reported as ‘Enemies of the Motherland.’ They were sent to the Gulag or executed without due process. In the United States of America, citizens are presumed guilty if reported as ‘Domestic Abusers.’…they lost their jobs, their mental health, their reputation, their trust in justice, and their self-esteem.”

Then it was then the turn of the victims, the persons falsely accused, to speak out and break the shroud of silence and shame that too often envelopes the lives of the wrongfully charged.

Cheryl Shanks of New Jersey recounted how her former husband fabricated claims of abuse so he could get special treatment by the immigration authorities: “This ordeal began in August of 2003…The price on my family has been immeasurable. My son has his own therapist who he sees weekly.”

Carl Starling of Maryland described how his former wife accused him of repeatedly striking her with his fist, but didn’t experience the need to pay a visit to the hospital emergency room to tend to her wounds.

Gordon Smith of Delaware described the Mad-Hatter experience of having an abusive wife who sought to be absolved by accusing him of the very actions that she had committed. When he sought to file perjury charges, the prosecutor demurred, leading Smith to deplore the “state-sponsored protection” of false accusers.

And Terri Quick of Pennsylvania described the ordeal of her son who had engaged in consensual sex with a girlfriend. When the relationship went sour and she decided to re-connect with her previous flame, he suddenly found himself accused of rape. The evidence was all circumstantial, but enough to secure a conviction.

But it was Ben Vonderheide of Pennsylvania who stole the show: http://www.saveservices.org/2011/06/video-false-allegations-summit-in-america-do-the-accused-deserve-a-hearing/

In 2007 his ex-girlfriend was found guilty of three counts of making false statements to law enforcement officials. Despite the conviction, the ex- continues her campaign to vilify dad in the eyes of her son, and family judges refuse to lift a finger to stop the calumnies. “You’re presumed guilty until proven innocent, and even then you’re still considered guilty,” Vonderheide wryly told the audience.

Are things as bad in the United States as they were in Soviet Russia? Of course not.

But accounts of anonymous informants, a galling presumption of guilt, ideologically driven prosecutions, a no-way-out criminal justice system, and the tacit condoning of perjury all point to an abuse industry that is spinning out of control.

The StrutWalk summer party for men

June 9, 2011 | by J Galt | Link | Original Link

Ch-Ching!!!

Hey guys, the summer is upon us. Don't forget to break out your sluttiest apparel to drive the horny toads crazy. Of course the best way to keep these animals from humping your leg while standing in line at the checkout is to throw them a bone – just not yours. But if you do break down and indulge make sure to use at least three condoms, (and take them with you when you're done). And for God's sake guys keep a coitus contract in your back pocket. Barring that make sure your cell phone is set to record. Let's try to keep the false accusations down to a minimum this summer.

There's been some discussion from the capitalist quarter of our group of phallus fodder to present some products and make some bucks to contribute to the efforts of the head phallus. Since summer is upon us I thought that I might make a proposal for some great entertainment, some educational fun guy style, and some hand shaking to grow our numbers.

I got to thinking about phallus sports and the upcoming summer and thought I would blow this by the group. I'm sure just about everyone has heard of a Tupperware party, or an Amway party, or a lingerie party. If you haven't, these were parties held by women to sell products, make a few bucks, and network new ideas on how, as JTO puts it, to "fuck your shit up."

Well I'm a sensitive new age vegisexual, liberated perpetrator. Why can't I be equal? Hell, equality doesn't have to be a zero sum gain, without beer.

So I got to thinking what guys might enjoy and I immediately came up with a winner. BEER! Now with my evil conspiring phallus head and unique ability to apply my patriarchy to random oppression, I realized that there is a way to increase the effectiveness of the "urls for urinals" campaign. It was right in front of me all the time, shit the Merovingian even said it in the Matrix. "I drank too much and therefore must have a piss". Aye, aye, makes sense right?

So I've come up with what could be a great step forward to getting men into urinals, getting out the message and generally bonding with other guys in a vegisexual kind of way. Are you ready for it?

HERE IT IS!!!!!!!!!

The summer entertainment venue for men ……the…….

I'M NOT GETTING MARRIED…… STAG ….EVENT PARTY. Or, for those more sensitive to the kinder gentler, accusing sex… a jack and shill party. Personally I'll being using the term STRUTWALK, and describing it as a group of guys getting together to discuss automotive struts. That might leave her wondering, which is even better. Of course you could call it a mini "male summit"

I'm going to sell tickets for 10 bucks each (my real plan is to try and entertain about 60 bucks out of each guy that attends) I'm going to apply for an event liquor license and sell beer at a 1.50 profit. How much beer can 50 guys drink? Kegs will help. I'll wait about half an hour giving everyone time to meet each other and for late comers to show up. (I will post a sign that says please introduce yourself to as many men as possible) I turned it into a game, where each guy gets a card a pencil and the one who introduces himself to the most men there wins a prize. I'm selling each card for a buck. The winner gets a beer. Then I'll announce the venue of games and the prizes to be won. I went looking for local business that promote products to men and asked the local knife shop to put together a game for throwing flat knives.

Picture a piece of 4×8 plywood with images of famous feminists.

For a buck a throw I read a famous quote, and if you can hit the right feminist with your knife you win. Or you can throw for free and when you hit a feminist I read a quote, but no prize. (some guys need practice)

Another game is "pin the rape on the perpetrator." This requires lacrosse sticks which I got from the local sport shop. The idea here is for four men to shoot at the same time (you need colored balls to differentiate) the one who gets the ball through the hoop wins. Or you keep going till one guy wins.

I decided to turn the introduction cards into feminist bingo, and on the back of each card is a female shaming tactic, when you introduce yourself to another guy he reads the shame tactic from his card and you mark it onto yours and vice versa. The first one to call bingo wins. You decide the prize.

The next game is feminist golf. We all know this one, where you play one hole with eighteen drivers. The idea is to putt the hole using a driver, if you make the shot you reach into a bag of golf balls that have numbers on them if you pull out the ball with 18 on it you win. (get these at a dollar store, use a marker)

Note: if you sell tickets, you can also use tickets as prizes. Each ticket is worth a quarter or half a buck. I'm thinking of making this a four or five hour event, with 30 minute intermissions to announce winners, business's that made contributions, websites that promote men's issues, and new initiatives being forwarded in the MRM. And (Ron Paul) and (Lyndon Larouche). Larouchepac.com

The next game is called "College Cuckold" this is where you get a card with a feminist factoid on one side and the truth on the other, if you can guess the truth you win a free ticket, if you win 10 tickets, you win a date with Ray Wynn Konnell (I haven't heard back yet from Ray Wynn but it looks promising). If Ray Wynn is unavailable you will instead win a free diploma to women's studies, a box of condoms and a coitus contract. Complete with ink pad for finger printing your sex partner.

Now I haven't come up with any "Primary Aggressor" games yet so if you have any ideas, it would help. Also, consider soliciting local businesses for prizes and promotions; sports shops, electronics stores, sex shops (for a plastic pussy), knife shop or military surplus, extreme fighting stores, cell phone store, and any others you can think of.

Remember this is a good cause, this is the fight to reverse and find a cure for masculine atrophy. You will be educating men about this debilitating disease that attacks 3 out of 4 men without a mangina. You'll be sharing valuable information, networking with potential perpetrators and primary aggressors in your community and sharing a beer. We need to develop this into a professional party for men, at least equal to those dieting fat groups that would say things like "see you lighter."

Except as men we will part company by saying things like "so long" or "see you longer" or "long time no see(men)." All proceeds can be forwarded to the head phallus or various phallus's working toward a better outcome for men.

Shit if we could pull off ten strutwalks every weekend from various states and cuntries, we could open a safe house for male victims of domestic violence and their children. If every party tried to raise $2500.00, we could even hire some lawyers or some lobbyists from "SAVE."

If we could turn this into a canned operation, with prepackaged games, promotions, literature and instructions on pulling it together we could draw some much needed coin for the war chest.

What do ya say guys, how bout some summer entertainment that includes beer, entertainment, education, and coin.

Fictitious maladies afflicting the modern American woman

June 9, 2011 | by Umbriglio Fafadone | Link | Original Link

Despite research demonstrating women enjoy better overall health and longevity than men, they spend considerably more on health care – mainly treating dubious disorders. Healthcare spending constitutes 1/6th of the United States economy. More than half our population is female. Considering these plain facts, it is clear why medical care practitioners seldom address the psychosomatic and/or self-inflicted origin of much female illness.

They can't afford to alienate the golden goose.

An incomplete coverage of these "ailments" and their etiology include the following:

Premenopause, menopause and post-partum depression

This combination of ailments exposes a woman to decades of misery requiring much male sympathy and attention. Sadly, she is often unable to work or conduct herself productively or operate in an emotionally stable manner as a result.

Hormones are usually the alleged causal villain and disguise themselves in the form of hot flashes, mood swings and excusable poor behavior. Billions have been spent treating this non-life threatening collection of maladies. Women tell me that the onset of premenopausal symptoms is appearing earlier than in the past, furthering their suffering.

Untreatable Depression

This ailment is most often linked to the pressures of being a woman, exasperated by the failings of a particular man.

Constipation

This disorder is often discussed on daytime television. If caught early, it is treatable with colon cleansing. The modern woman's demanding "on the go" lifestyle predisposes her to constipation as well as the previously cited untreatable depression. Consequently, women suffer a lifetime of unpredictable discomfort. Strangely, poor diet and a sedentary lifestyle are seldom mentioned as causal factors.

Diarrhea

This malady plagues many modern American women as evidenced by daytime television commercials. Housewives are particularly susceptible. If untreated, this illness quickly ripens into a self-diagnosis of Krohn's disease. The etiology is always stress and never improper diet or lifestyle.

Hemorrhoids

Another debilitating disorder with a stress related pathology. Many women forced to work in air-conditioned offices become afflicted.

Fibroids

This phenomenon is heart wrenching. While they are painless, unnoticeable and rarely require removal they are nonetheless worrisome and demand much attention and conversation. Nearly 100 percent are benign being the equivalent of an internal wart. Fibroids are found in the breast, and all over for that matter.

Menstruation

The mother of all maladies. Severe untreatable cramping which dominates so much of a woman's monthly thought calendar that merely anticipating it gives rise to a second disorder, PRE-MENSTRUAL SYNDROME. Two weeks of every month are hell because of it. Eventually, pre-menstrual syndrome becomes replaced with pre-menopausal symptoms.

Backaches

Back spasms are stress oriented resulting from over-work and lack of male appreciation.

Headaches

Immobilizing migraines are stress oriented resulting from over-work and lack of male appreciation.

Biological Clock Complaints

Women are punished by this reproductive issue due to the lack of financially eligible men available for marriage. Another causal factor is the misfortune of not becoming "inadvertently" impregnated by a wealthy man. The inability to conceive through deception is compromising since sperm banks cannot be compelled to pay child support.

Hysteria (Anxiety Neurosis)

This is a condition which is treatable and manageable, but not for women. Symptoms include irritability, nervousness, lack of sexual interest and a "tendency to cause trouble." A century ago the treament protocol was "pelvic massage" to induce orgasm. Today, the modern American woman merely needs to get laid and will find relief by the insertion of a penis into her oral or vaginal cavities.

Unattractive/unfuckable women can enjoy self-treatment through the use of an electromechanical vibration device. Such a devise becomes a romantic companion to difficult unmanageable women or those who are too angular in appearance.

Women afflicted with Hysteria sadly never suffer in silence. Directly or indirectly, her pain is transferred to a neurosis-free man.

Feet Problems

The modern American woman spends considerable time, money and energy on her feet. Despite this investment, she often requires the specialty care of a podiatrist. Toenail fungus, ankle displacement, corns…bunions and onions frequently maim her. Medical treatment alleviates her conditions, however there is never a correlation between hard high-heel fashion shoes and foot maladies discovered. Frequently, new shoes need to be purchased to combat the discomfort.

As a reward for their hard work, women frequently pamper themselves with visits to a toenail salon. Here, it is quite common to hear women discussing matters of lofty academic and social interest with their toenail technician. The pedicurist is always a woman of deep intellect, high moral standards and conversational on any subject. She is most comfortable discussing law, medicine, economics, politics or her divorce.

Sometimes, the artistic abilities of the toenail technician are overestimated. Obese women with enormous feet, elephant toes, crusted heals and tree stump ankles believe this specialist can beautify their feet. These woman should never wear flip flops publicly so not to inflict nausea on men forced to view these deformities. They need to be cognizant of the fact female Fred Flintstone feet are offensive.

The American female footwear industry without question exposes the child-like mindless materialistic nature of the modern American woman. In one of my few defenses of lesbians, the "male" partner always wear comfortable shoes.

Skin conditions

Skin blotches, acne, dry skin/scalp, dehydration, age spots and premature wrinkling all requiring the care of a dermatologist. Research in the past few decades have found women often suffer from pre-cancerous sunspots. This can be particularly worrisome for a man since his significant other is forever living potentially in a pre-terminal status. She consequently requires much attention, sympathy and support.

Remedies for these ailments always require the application of costly high-end topical creams or frequent facials. Sadly, women befallen with skin maladies often reasonable Charles Bronson in drag. Despite this, they should always be encouraged to seek care regardless of cost even if plastic surgery or botox is necessary. Men should also realize these conditions are never the result of chemical pore-clogging cosmetics, excess sun tanning or failing to remove their make-up after a "hard night."

T.M.J. (Lockjaw)

Temporomandibular Joint Disorder particularly afflicts married women. It causes radiating pain and headaches which subsequently prevents a married woman from pleasuring her husband. Oddly, single women in dating relationships seeking to induce a victim into marriage, seldom suffer from it. After a woman's bears her first child, the onset and incidence of incurable T.M.J. spikes. A man is told to take comfort in knowing that if it weren't for lock jaw, she would be orally amusing him often.

Other Fictitious Female Maladies

Gynecological issues such as uterine problems, vaginitis, feminine dryness and odor. Any complaint originating from the vaginal cavity unrelated to pregnancy is suspect.

Varicose veins and other varicosities such as spider veins. These are purely cosmetic, painless and never terminal. There is no need to call a priest.

Undetectable circulatory disorders such as cold feet resulting from "peripheral artery diseases." This disease was manufactured by the pharmaceutical industry and marketed by Madison Avenue. Women became afflicted shortly thereafter.

Gastrointestinal complaints, such as acid reflux and diverticulitis. Their symptoms are arrested easily with simple dietary modifications.

Faintness, dizziness.

Maniac disorder.

Sluggish Thyroid. This is always the alleged trigger for irreversible obesity, not diet.

Chronic fatigue or pain syndrome.

Bursitis or boneitis.

SUMMARY OF FICTITIOUS FEMALE MALADIES

The prevalence of these maladies timely correlates with the feminist movement and the advent of the modern psychotic American woman. Men need to be aware of these fictitious conditions as being purely psychosomatic in nature at best. These sicknesses serve as common medical excuses for the performance of expectations. This is the female equivalent of malingering which enjoys a secondary gain of sympathy and attention. For example, many of these maladies tend to manifest themselves when a husband is in an amorous mood.

Women from previous generations never complained of such nonsense, despite many of them occupying positions of privilege and wealth.

Under the assumption everyone of these maladies exist, I often wonder how third world foreign women survive past their 21st birthday. How do these women bear children, raise families, tend to donkeys, milk goats, grow vegetables and hand wash cloth diapers without the benefit of medical specialists? Most women in the world survive without psychiatrists, dermatologists, podiatrists, gastroenterologists, gynecologists, prescriptions, Macy's or Estee Lauder. In addition, men must possess iron anti-bodies since these conditions never befall them.

I believe the psychosomatic origin of these ailments will be better appreciated when anatomists finally discover and chart the direct nerve that runs between the psychotic American woman's brain and her cunt.

That man will be a nobel laureate.

Feminism at its core

June 10, 2011 | by Jared White | Link | Original Link

To this day since its conception, there are many that would deny feminism is a hate movement. To an average twenty something guy, feminism is a group of women who did some good things for the female population but are annoying and complain about men too much. An average twenty something girl knows little about feminism and most of the time will say it is something good that got women the right to vote. Sometimes I find it amazing that even though feminism has existed for over half a century most of the general public know little to nothing about it. Normally when someone is opposed to a specific ideology or political group this situation would be exactly what they want. They would want the public to know as little about whatever it is they are against so that turning people away would be all too easy.

Don't know too much about Obama? Good because you wouldn't want to know him. He wasn't even born in the United States.

You've barely heard of Arnold Schwarzenegger? That guy cheated on his wife and had a kid with another woman! That's all you need to know. Don't ever vote for him.

See how easy it is? Scandals and events are what stick in the minds of the people. So if someone knows little about something like Men's Rights, well let's just say people like Michael "put a warning label on every man's penis" Kimmel will be presented as a supposed "expert" on the movement.

However with feminism the formula is yielding the opposite results. Most people don't know anything about feminism. There are several laws and policies enacted because of feminism that people have to follow. There are several organizations and rallies that people attend that are connected to feminism. But these people don't know that feminism is connected. When someone finally does hear anything directly about feminism the only thing they hear is "women are suffering, feminism will fix it". That is the only time people hear feminism connected to a message, when that message is about helping women. Whenever the message is about why women are suffering we don't hear feminism mentioned in those statements. When we hear "men did this…" the people who say it usually don't say "I am a feminist and I believe all of you men are oppressing women". At least I never heard it put that way back when I actually watched television. Sure the names of the organizations were put out but who really researches into the backers of organizations? Average men and women?

I don't think so.

Normal people usually need a reason to go out of their way to do something time consuming like research. They need a cause. I guarantee that anyone who identifies as some "ism" or activist was pushed into that role through a series of events that gave them cause to do so. That is when the research began because something they cared about was at stake.

Men and women have been hearing about the supposed evils of men all of their lives, for countless centuries. Why should hearing about it now from some domestic violence organization, or rape awareness organization, or college course make any difference?

Does it upset men to hear that they are the primary cause for the suffering of women? Sure. But most guys just view that message as women bitching about nothing and go on with their lives. But there are some who call the propagators of this message out on their bigotry. It doesn't really amount to anything though. What normal guy is really going to go up against an organization publicized for helping women who are victims of domestic violence?

This is how feminism hides.

There are many organizations out there dedicated to helping women, and women only, but they are not called feminist organizations. They hold several different names. If every average guy knew that each and every one of these organizations operated under the banner of feminism then they would have a target with which to focus their retaliation to the discriminatory messages these feminists put out.

But not enough people know and therefore the first thing that pops into someone's mind when asked about feminism is "women getting the right to vote". A sad fact of that matter is feminism didn't even get women the right to vote but still this one thing is what solidifies the common perspective feminism holds in the minds of the people.

I have made the argument that a movement, even one born on the premise of justice, can still be a hate movement because of the actions of its members. I still stand by that argument and it is my main focal point when declaring feminism a hate movement against men. However, regardless of how many people I get this point across to, there are still those that hold out, believing that the movement can still be changed from within.

I write this now to put that belief to rest.

As with every movement there are certain values that make up its core. The beliefs those who created the movement hold and expect all who join to follow. Almost everyone I know within the MRM knows what the core beliefs of feminism are but this message is not for MRAs. This message is for the average, unaffiliated men and women who happen to read this article. This message is for the good, bad, moderate, radical, anti-this, and pro-that feminists who actually accept that there is misandry within their movement but refuse to believe that misandry is large enough to deserve resistance. Here are the core values of the feminist movement and the irrefutable proof that the hatred of men is not only exclusive to many of the members of the feminist movement but is indeed the very essence and foundation of the movement itself.

Patriarchy: Every MRA has heard this word and many MRAs interpret it differently. Not because they do not understand it, but because most feminists do not understand it and those that do routinely alter its meaning to suit their current argument or message of anti-male propaganda.

The actual definition of the word is this: A system of society or government in which the father or eldest male is head of the family and descent is traced through the male line.

The feminist definition is this: A system of society or government in which men hold the power and women are largely excluded from it.

And this: Patriarchy is best defined as control by men.

And this: It is the idea that society should be mostly controlled by male figures.

It is quite easy to discern a sense of hatred and opposition from the definitions feminists give the word patriarchy. The devious women and men who propagate this filth use these twisted definitions to identify the aspects of society they wish changed. They deny their hatred and blame of men and claim that they only wish to "balance" the power in society. The less devious members of feminism are more honest with their insinuations and hatred. They simply say that the patriarchy is a group of men who sit in the shadows and are out to get them.

Eventually, those within the media who had a bone to pick with feminism, because it threatened the traditional white knight lifestyle they were used to, mostly republicans, used the blatantly obvious hatred laced through the definitions feminists put on patriarchy to slander the movement. So instead of twisting around the meaning of the word again feminists instead chose to just make up a new word.

Kyriarchy: a neologism coined by Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza to describe interconnected, interacting, and multiplicative systems of domination and submission, within which a person oppressed in one context might be privileged in another It is an intersectional elaboration of the concept of patriarchy— it extends the analysis of oppression beyond traditional feminism to dynamics such as sexism, racism, economic injustice, and other forms of internalized and institutionalized oppression

See what Fiorenza did there? For a long while feminists who were called on their anti-male propaganda theory of patriarchy would shout "we aren't blaming men! Patriarchy hurts men too!"

So now some feminists who really, really want to hide the fact that they blame men for you know, everything, use this new term, kyriarchy to say that yes men suffer discrimination too. They believe you now when you say that you got a raw deal in family court. Of course the reason that happened, according to feminists, is because of the sexist view men hold of women being default child raisers. Oh and feminists acknowledge the fact that men occupy over 90% of the most dangerous and fatal jobs on the planet. But that is only because of the system men and only men put in place that forces men into these roles. You see? Kyriarchy hurts men too.

Feminists leave out the part about how if men didn't do these jobs no one else would.

The bottom line is that with the growing voices of men around the globe that are speaking out against male discrimination, feminists are rearranging their messages to lightly acknowledge the short comings of men. Why are they doing this? Because more and more average guys are beginning to look into feminism because of messages from MRAs and other anti-feminists and when these guys start looking into feminism, feminists don’t want things like their definitions for patriarchy on front page display. When reading the definition of kyriarchy one could imagine that feminists believe all people are discriminated against. Some do. But even those who do acknowledge that men are discriminated against, even oppressed, refuse to even consider that any man could ever be suffering more than women. That is the main core belief of feminism and the eternal feminist definition of patriarchy; for every man that suffers, he is only suffering because of the system of patriarchy other men created and there is always a woman somewhere suffering more, because of a man.

That is man hatred, plain and simple.

Rape Culture: While patriarchy has many definitions to hide its meaning, this feminist theory has only one meaning; a term used within women’s studies and feminism, describing a culture in which rape and other sexual violence (usually against women) are common and in which prevalent attitudes, norms, practices, and media condone, normalize, excuse, or encourage sexualized violence.

The short version is this; our culture encourages men to rape women and ignores women who cry out for help.

Now if you’re an average guy or girl reading this right now you’re probably scratching your head wondering what the crazy conspiracy theorist is talking about. Well this is what feminists believe, all of them, the good ones, the bad ones, the moderate ones, and the radicals. But hey, don’t take my word for it. Click yourself on over to feministing or any other major “third wave” or “moderate” feminist website and type in rape culture. Better yet, type it into google and see what pops up. If you find one mention of this theory put out by feminists that differs from the definition I provided you can write this article off as misogynistic propaganda and never read anything from me again. Hell, don’t even click back over to this page and finish the article.

Oh so we’re back I see? Well then let me continue.

I find it hard to believe that anyone can understand that this is a belief that feminists hold and still not accept the fact that feminism is a hate movement against men. Consider the outrageous and ridiculous policies and practices that have been put in place because of feminist propaganda and advocacy based off of this theory.

Any man accused of rape by any woman, even a woman that is a known liar and convicted false accuser, will be arrested on sight regardless of any evidence suggesting said man’s guilt or innocence. A perfect example of this is the young men from Hofstra University who were literally hunted down and jailed because of words. A woman’s words. This woman’s name was not revealed while the young men were dragged through the media as rapists before a trial date could even be considered. Before any evidence was even collected they were already rapists according to the feminist influenced media. If the case had gone to trial this woman would have remained anonymous throughout and evidence such as her sexual history would not be allowed into the case. The feminist reasoning behind this farce of a policy is that “slut shaming” should not influence verdicts. However, if we think back to the infamous Kobe Bryant case, the evidence that proved the supposed victim had consensual sex on the same day, hours after her alleged rape was crucial in proving Kobe's innocence. Feminists don't want things like this, women being proven liars in court, to happen.

Feminists want you to believe that women who actually do lie about being raped only lie because of slut shaming. One feminist leader, Jessica, the hypocrite, Valenti wrote an entire book on why it's a man's fault that any woman would ever lie about rape.

Just think this over in your mind for a while. Not too long ago it was legal in our society to kill men who were only accused of rape. Today men are carted off to jail, sent to court, and convicted on testimony from alleged rape victims. How exactly can we possibly live in a culture that encourages rape when people are killed for merely being accused of the crime?

The truth is we do not live in a culture that encourages rape. We live in a culture that encourages the death of rapists, proven and unproven. However, feminists would like the public to believe that a rapist lurks around every corner and sadly that is the state we live in today. You will rarely find a woman walking anywhere alone. I myself have been asked by many of my female friends to walk them to their car after work. They tell me that "as a woman I feel it's dangerous for me to be alone I might get raped". Programs are springing up around the country in our schools where it is mandatory for men to attend. What is the focus of these programs you ask? Telling young men how they are all potential rapists and how they need to learn how to control the innate rapist within.

This is a culture in which rape is encouraged?

No. This is a culture where a group of ideologues can put out hateful messages, such as our society encouraging men to rape women, and no one bats an eye.

Rape culture is another made up feminist theory used to spread their hatred of men.

Male Privilege: a sociological term that refers quite generally to the special rights (perceived or actual) or status granted to men in a society, on the basis of their sex or gender, but usually denied to women and/or transsexuals.

Do I really have to shorten this one down for you to see how it equates to man hatred?

Men get special rights and privileges because we have penises and women do not because women are oppressed victims. Don't think this is another core feminist belief? Well it is.

They made a fucking checklist on it.

They made several actually but I digress. Feminists believe that employers, only male employers, prefer men over women because…? They don't really go into the why, besides saying male employers view all women as inferior to men. Of course they leave out the fact that a lot of female employers prefer hiring men but I digress again. If you're a man and you get picked or considered for anything over a woman, even if you are better qualified, it is only because you have a penis.

Your work ethic?

That doesn't matter.

Your commitment?

Details.

Your skills?

Fuck your skills.

By the way, the only time male privilege is the reason you are picked for a job or a raise is when you are up against a woman, which means male privilege in the work place only exists in office jobs. So all of you men who are toiling away in those coal mines, atop those oil rigs, on those fishing boats, and around those construction sites…you're still privileged but you're not being unfair to women in regards to your job. Doesn't that make you feel all warm and fuzzy?

But for men of all shapes, colors, and sizes you are definitely being unfair to women by not being more likely to get sexually assaulted while walking home alone. Now that is a privilege you hold that just spits in the face of women everywhere. I mean you have to ignore the fact that the overwhelming majority of murder victims, mugging victims, and assault victims are male and then you can understand how you as a man are privileged because the criminal that attacks you wants to kill you instead of fuck you.

I elaborate on the male privilege bigotry feminists propagate in another article but for the purpose of outing this feminist belief as another aspect of their hatred for men I will point out a simple fact. Some privileges are given while others are earned. Some employers, male and female, prefer hiring men over women because men have been the workhorses of the human species since…the human fucking species. Men work more days and more hours than women because if they don't they most likely won't be having sex with any women. Men hold more seats in political office because more people, male and female, vote for men and because more men than women run for office.

Feminists twist the idea of male privilege. They want the public to believe that men are given underserved things because they are men. This is untrue and blatant man hatred.

Women on the other hand in regards to jobs are given privileges such as affirmative action. Let me expand a little on affirmative action. I hate affirmative action, gender and race based affirmative action, and this is coming from someone whose grandmother was denied the right to continue school past the third grade and forced to work in cotton fields. I know all about the reasoning behind affirmative action for blacks and in the past it was understandable. Blacks faced actual oppression in western societies.

But women?

Affirmative action for women is a true example of a privilege given and not earned because of feminist propagated lies like male privilege. The idea of getting the government to force someone to hire you sickens me. If I start a business it is my business and I run it the way I see fit. Feminism seeks to revoke the rights of others to appease the childish gripes that inferiority complex driven women have towards men and other women.

Too few women were able to qualify for physically demanding professions such as firefighters and police officers. So what did feminists do? They forced government agencies, created to train individuals to protect and save the lives of citizens, to lower their standards so women not as dedicated as those who actually could qualify for these positions were let in and with affirmative action, these agencies had quotas they had to fill or they would be sued and their physical performance tests shut down. That's right, if they didn't do everything they could to ensure that enough women were on their rosters the tests fire departments created to train individuals to save lives would be shut down. Any men who complained were branded sexists and their jobs were threatened. So basically, you and your family's safety took a back seat to the fragile egos of women who were pissed off they couldn't handle a job as easily as men could.

Inferiority complexes towards men are not the only things feminism seeks to appease, feminists have an extreme resentment towards women who do not agree with what feminists feel is objectification. Hooters is a good example. The people who created the Hooters restaurant chain created it with one thing in mind, using attractive women to pull in male customers. It worked. However, feminists feel that women who are perfectly content with wearing the revealing waitress uniforms are being objectified, whether the actual women wearing the outfits feel this way or not. These women are grown adults who know exactly what they are doing and a lot of them enjoy it. In general women like enticing men with their bodies, it is a part of their biology to do so and I'm not mad at them for it. But feminists, a lot of them severely lacking in the attraction department, wish to take away a woman's choice to do this. This is kind of confusing to me seeing as how some of the most hideous looking feminists I have ever seen took it upon themselves to put on their best hooker uniforms and march down the streets shouting how evil men are. Feminists really can't make up their minds about how they want to attack men. Are we bad because some of us would like you to keep your clothes on or are we bad because some of us would like you to take them off? Or is it you are just pissed because we only want attractive women to take their clothes off?

Feminists complain about women in restaurants wearing revealing clothing because these women are dressed this way for the sole purpose of giving men eye candy while they eat. However, when someone suggests that women should keep their clothes on for their own safety, feminists scream that women should be able to dress as slutty as they want. Feminists are only upset when men can see scantily clad women whenever they want and the control women can use over men with their bodies is nonexistent.

Wage gap: The wage gap doesn't really have an official definition. It is another fabrication that feminists (yes I am talking to you, feminists who are reading this) use to vilify men. Equal pay for equal work is all we ever hear. But there is one thing concerning the wage gap that most don't hear. Women are already given equal pay for equal work. Any middle class or lower class member of the work force already knows this. Unless you are a man working in one of those dangerous fields I listed above you more than likely have female coworkers and there is not a feminist alive who could prove you are being paid more than any of those female coworkers.

Because you aren't.

But yet again we have to switch our focus from the average men and women of the populace and focus on the small percentage at the top. The people pulling down those six figure salaries. The CEOs of all-men-no-women incorporated. To understand the main focus feminism constitutes with its attack on men one cannot look at the bottom or the middle but at the top because that is where these entitlement complex driven (yes I am still talking to you, feminists who are reading this article) narcissists wish to sit and they do not want pesky things like initiative, innovation, hard work, or competence getting in the way.

Women work less days and hours than men; therefore, they are paid less. Men receive more raises and promotions than women because men ask for and aggressively pursue them instead of waiting for their superiors to realize that they deserve and should be given one. It's all really simple to comprehend and feminists know this but they do not care. If companies do not put women in top positions they are put on blast through the media as sexist organizations with work environments that are hostile towards women. Think I'm going down the misogynistic conspiracy theory route again? Well just take a look at the plan the International Monetary Fund is implementing since the Strauss Kahn scandal in order to combat the feminist claims of their work environments being hostile towards women.

What did the nice lady in the video say? The company is working towards a goal (read: quota) to ensure that 50% of its managerial staff doesn't have a penis?

Yes. Yes she did.

Is it all starting to sink in now? Maybe this little bit of information will help. The wage gap is true. There is definitely a gap between what men and women earn in the workplace. However, the lie that you hear associated with that truth comes from feminists. There is no systematic pay discrimination against women within the job market.

Toxic Masculinity: As if the name itself doesn't just scream "I hate men". To get a good dose of propaganda on this theory just head over to any establishment that houses an assortment of male feminists. Don't get it twisted though, the bra burning women of the past, who claimed they didn't need a man, were the ones who came up with this stuff but they realized that marching through the streets saying men are inherently evil wasn't going to win them any popularity, or government funds. So they got some men to do it for them. The irony of that fact is heavier than the fucking planet.

That's basically it. Men are inherently evil. Most feminists won't use the word evil but that doesn't matter. They claim that all men are potential rapists and abusers and that their masculinity is to blame. The solution? Get em' while they're young. Teach young boys that being masculine is wrong. Teach them that everything about them is wrong and everything about girls is pure and innocent. That way, the entire world will change into a peaceful utopia where men worship the true goddess of the universe, Oprah.

Anyway I tackle the absurdity of this feminist belief in another article so I won't go too far into it. However, I will just say that basically, toxic masculinity is a false icon that feminists have created in order to take the actions and characteristics of male criminals and use them as a representation of all men. Masculinity is a word that represents good human characteristics that are observed generally within men. Feminists do not want anything good to be associated with men so they use the term toxic masculinity as a replacement for masculinity in order to vilify men and propagate that boys need to be "fixed" or risk being a rapist or abuser.

Gender Socialization: This is another core feminist belief I explore in another article. This one is tricky though because it actually exists. That's right I said it. The feminists got one right. However, like with the wage gap they twisted it into a blame men fest and encouraged everyone to join in.

The simplest way to explain this theory is the G.I. Joe and Barbie analogy. Boys are given manly toys to play with and manly programs like the boy scouts to attend while girls are given the opposite. The things parents do to influence their children can attest for some of the things we view as masculine and feminine. Where feminists mess things up here is their claims that all things are viewed the way they are because of what we endure as children. Why do most men like to go outside and enjoy physical activities such as sports? Well according to feminists it's because they were indoctrinated and forced to love these things when they were boys by their parents, the media, or both. I often wonder who was doing the indoctrinating before television and newspapers were invented? The parents? So every parent everywhere made sure that their sons liked blowing things up and their daughters liked putting flowers in their hair?

Now I'm not the smartest man in the world…(here's an easy cheap shot for the Futrelles of the world) but considering what I see today, how the overwhelming majority of people who advance our societies with technology and construction are men and the overwhelming majority of people who defend our societies are men, everywhere, since the beginning of the human race…I'm going to go with common sense over indoctrination. It is a proven fact that whatever force created men, be it evolution, god, aliens, or whatever you want to believe, men were made physically superior to women. That word, superior, use it in any way when comparing men and women that doesn't involve women coming out on top and you will get pummeled by feminist rhetoric. But anyway, seeing as how men evolved into physically superior beings men were able to do tasks that were physically demanding better than women. Tasks such as hunting, fighting, defending, protecting, and oh yes, building.

So you take an average B.C. civilization era guy with the knowledge and skills to build a home, hunt for food, and make weapons, what do you think he is going to do? Obviously he would realize these skills are essential for survival. So don't you think he would teach his sons these skills as well? Maybe they would teach their sons? And since he figured it out on his own don't you think that whether he taught these things or not his male offspring would eventually figure these things out? Consider also that this man is no misogynistic knuckle dragger as feminists make men of the past out to be. Consider this man has a few daughters who genuinely want to help. Sure he says and teaches them the same skills he taught his sons. Now this man watches his children who are now well into their teenage years. He sees how his sons have grown bigger, not just in height but in muscle mass as well. He sees how even though wild animals may scare the life out of them; they still enjoy hunting these beasts and bringing them down in order to feed their family. He notices how fast and efficient his sons' muscles allow them to be when building fences and fixing village homes.

Then he looks at his daughters.

He notices how they are struggling with carrying things his sons could lift with one arm. He notices how they cringe, cry, and can't keep up when out on hunts. He notices how they are slower, weaker, and miserable compared to his sons. So what does he do? Well without the invention of artificial testosterone and steroids to beef up his tiny vixens he does the only thing that seems sensible. He tells them they don't have to do these things. He tells them that their brothers are better suited. Finally he tells himself that he will not teach any future daughters he might have how to do these tasks. Eventually, as his civilization grows it becomes commonplace that women do not aspire to the same tasks as men. Not because they cannot do it but simply because men are better at it and if families do not want to die from the wilds or an invading tribe then they better not put a 120 pound woman toe to toe with a 200 pound man with a very large stick in his hand.

I bet that little scenario of mine pissed off a lot of you feminist readers, even the ones who were warming up to what I was saying so far.

Good.

I like pissing off feminists. But just to be clear the scenario I described may not account for every man and woman everywhere. In fact I know it doesn't. I've seen some pretty scrawny men and some pretty buff women, with no steroids involved. The point is the scenario I described was the norm. Not because of socialization but because of adaptation. Human beings adapt to their environments better than any other mammals on the planet. If we didn't we'd be living on the planet of the apes right now. Not all women view the natural advantages men have over women as some attack on their humanity. But most feminist women do.

In this day and age technology has alleviated a lot of what in the past made the advantages men have over women celebrated by society. Now those advantages are attacked and any mention of them is called hate speech or misogyny. I say if women want to go out into the hot sun and prove they can build and move things better than men then by all means go for it. If women want to prove they can soldier better than men then once again, go ahead. I would love to see army divisions filled with women in combat MOS positions, now that I'm not in the army anymore and wouldn't have to deal with the amplified life threatening danger that would bring. Feminists, no women in general fail to realize that being a soldier…no scratch that.

Women in general fail to realize that opposed to what is put on television in all of these female centered spy and cop dramas, being a warrior takes more, a lot more than knowing how to fire a gun properly. The physical and mental demands of being a combat MOS soldier are more intense than any other profession. Well they are when your society is at war with another society at least. I could tell some war stories that would make a woman wet herself, and not in the good way. Will I deny that there are women who experience combat? No. Will I claim that all women can't handle combat? No. But when some feminist fucktard decides to sit down and say "fuck you US army" for whatever reason when it comes to combat positions while she is in her air conditioned room on her little laptop computer…well that just makes me want to reinstate the draft and put women on the front of the list. You don't get to say "fuck you US army" unless you've fucking been in it, period. I fucking hate the army but you know what I earned the right to say fuck you to the army. That is one of the main things that pisses me off about the female half of feminism, you idiots sit back in your technology ridden houses and apartments, watch a fucking sliver of what people like me have gone through on television and then decide to call men in the military who do not think most women can handle combat, sexists.

FUCK YOU.

Put your ass in seventy pound gear, grab a 120mm H.E.A.T. round, carry that bitch through the fucking desert and load it up in a tank, while being shot at, then get blown up afterwards. THEN you can say fuck you US army. That is, if you haven't paid a guy to knock you up in order to avoid deployment and then aborted your kid a few months later.

Ok I'm calm again.

So finally we come to the conclusion of why feminism is indeed a movement of hate against men not only because of the actions of feminists but because of the ideology of feminism itself. Equality is not the base ideology of feminism. The movement has two main definitions, two definitions that negate and cancel each other out. One cannot practice the avocation of equality for both genders and at the same time practice organized activity on behalf of women's rights and interests. It's one or the other and feminism does neither. It does nothing for the rights of women because women have every right men do except for the right to be in a military combat MOS, which is something feminists rarely focus on. Feminism only practices organized activity on behalf of women's interests, and that's all, and in doing so they accuse men of being the sole barrier between women achieving those interests.

So there they are ladies, gentlemen, and feminists, the core beliefs of feminism. To anyone reading this that is not a feminist and doesn't believe all feminists support a movement that vilifies men please ask them if they believe in any of the core beliefs of feminism. Just one belief will do. It can be your test, a handy guide when determining whether or not a feminist hates men.

However since I lean more on the humanist side than MRA side I will be fair to those feminists who truly don't hate men. Because there are women out there, whose knowledge of feminism ends with the "we got women the vote" tagline that identify as feminists and do not believe they are supporting the vilification of men.

Do you feminists, who don't hate men, believe in these core beliefs? If so then why? Do you have a separate definition for them than the ones I presented? If you do, are those separate definitions sponsored by the group of feminists you associate with? Or are they just your own reinterpretations? You don't have to be honest with me just be honest with yourself. If you do uphold the core beliefs of feminism yet have a separate definitions that do not vilify men (how the hell you can come up with any is beyond me) then you should understand even though you call yourself a feminist, the minute you walk into a government funded feminist organization saying anything other than "men are the problem" you will be thrown out right along with the supposed misogynists that are against feminism.

Like Warren Farrell was.

Then you will be left wondering what to do. Well the way I see it is you will have three options.

Option A: Forget about honesty and integrity and just go with the flow. Shout out how bad men are and how we have ruined the lives of women with our patriarchal misogyny.

Option B: Turn a blind eye to the bigotry of your movement without denying, defending, or acknowledging it.

Option C: Take the feminism out of your mouth and speak for yourself, not your movement.

To all of you average guys and gals out there who don't know too much about feminism, I've given you cause.

It's time to start researching.

Mother-daughter team? Shopping for cars with rape lies

June 10, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

In what appears to be an intergenerational scheme to extort property and money out of an innocent man in Potsdam, New York by two would-be false rape accusers, the judicial establishment in America has managed to do what would seem to be the impossible.

Sink even lower.

It is a sickening story, demonstrated to be perhaps even worse than the alleged criminality of the women involved. Some facts that come immediately to the surface are already a matter of public record. Christine L. Laraby, 45, and Miranda L. Laraby, 17, assumedly a mother-daughter team, allegedly managed to extort a 1997 Subaru out of a man by threatening him with a false allegation of sexual assault against the younger of the two women.

Emboldened by the man's capitulation, the couple returned later, allegedly, demanding new tires and $500.00 cash, promising they would follow through on the earlier threat if he did not comply.

Like I said, a sickening story, but I am not talking about the accused liars in this case. News accounts of this case indicate the women were charged and released on their own recognizance.

That is right, the prosecutor and presiding judge in this case allowed these two to walk out of jail without paying a dime in bail money.

Unsurprisingly, the women's lack of concern about their actions was evident even before being allowed to walk with no bail.

What do these mug shots tell you?

[image]
accused rape extortionists
Do these women appear to be under arrest, or at a carnival taking fun pictures in a coin op photo booth?

These, gents and ladies, are the faces of untouchables. One look at their smug, smiling faces, and you can tell that they just know when this is over they will walk off without a scratch. And they are a reflective of a system of justice gone so far awry where it concerns false rape claims that not only do women know they can get away with it, it is now attractive enough to use in extortion plans.

Another face of feminist governance?
But wait just a moment. Here is another smiling picture for you, that of District Attorney Nicole M. Duvé, for St. Lawrence County, who, on her government website, is pictured above the following alleged mission statement:

“It is the mission of the St. Lawrence County District Attorney’s office to fairly and diligently represent the People of the State of New York and the People of St. Lawrence County in all criminal proceedings, to safeguard the rights of victims, and to seek justice with steadfast and ethical determination.”

It is a statement that will likely prove far less credible than the charges against the Laraby’s.

We are attempting to gather more information on this case at the present time, so some of this information may be subject to correction.

But for now, this one has pussy pass written all over it.

For those interested, the contact information for Duvé is as follows:

AVfM will be following this case.

AVfM to interview George Christensen

June 10, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Yesterday I stumbled upon a miracle. In checking in on my facebook page, I noticed that someone had posted a video on one of the group pages to which I subscribe.

The video was of The Right Honorable George Christesen, MP for Dawson, Queensland, Australia, delivering a speech relating to proposed amendments to family law for that country. And I am quite sure I am not the same person since the moment I heard him talk.

With courage and integrity I have never witnessed from a politician in my own country, or any other country for that matter, Mr. Christesen ripped through the lies and hypocrisy of feminist governance and exposed the proposed changes to Australian law for what they are; a Trojan Horse legislation designed to eviscerate the rights of men and fathers in that sovereign nation, mindlessly forsaking the needs of children and families in the process.

Mr. Christensen did not mince words, or speak in coded language or dance around the real nature of the problem. Each and every word he spoke was the brutal, unabridged truth. And when they tried to drown him out, his voice rose higher, in both timbre and conviction, and silenced them with more of the truth.

This was a moment reminiscent for me of Adlai Stevenson staring down the Soviet ambassador during the Cuban missile crises in 1962, or of attorney Eugene Welch confronting Sen. Joseph McCarthy, effectively putting an end to his witch hunts with "Have you no sense of decency, sir, at long last? Have you left no sense of decency?"

I was certainly not the only one moved. I posted the video to reddit and the first response to it included this:

"I cried when he talked about how fathers are having their children stolen from them through "family" courts and pushed to the brink. THIS IS THE TRUTH!"

As the title to this announcement indicates, The Honorable Mr. Christensen has agreed to speak with me by phone for an interview exclusively for AVfM Radio listeners. It will be aired this Tuesday, June 14th.

I am honored that he has agreed to this, but this is not enough.

We need to support this man. So while we rejoice in the fact that someone has finally brought to truth to the floor of a western government, let us also remember what he has done come re-election time.

I urge our Australian readers and listeners to roll up their sleeves and help Mr. Christensen stay in office and carry his message; to help him with whatever means they can.

We all know the political, even personal risks involved with taking the correct moral stand against feminist ideology in such a direct manner. And if he fails, or is taken out because of doing so, who will show his kind of courage again?

Descent Into Madness, and Marc Lepine

---

Why are men angry?

Escalating female privilege, legal impunity, male-targeting violence and marginalization, and the probable return of Marc Lepine

Why are men angry? Why would men, the presumed patriarchs, overlords, and masters of the world be angry?

It's an increasingly common question.

There are lots of easy answers to this question, and generally, these answers revolve around assumptions that men are naturally angry creatures. Or that they're angry that their historical privileges to oppress women and children have been eroded by that most egalitarian of social movements, feminism. Answers of this type are common, and these are the answers supplied to us by writers, academics, activists and gurus of various flavor, all of whom operate from a foundation of feminism.

These answers also share the characteristic of being uniformly false. I'm being polite – they're not false in the sense of being merely factually incorrect – they're false in the sense that they are deliberate lies, told by deliberate liars.

Whether we individually believe it to by deserved or not, men in Western society are increasingly viewed with suspicion, contempt, disdain, and violence. Men can no longer afford to enjoy healthy interactions with children. Our society is so ready to condemn any man that the slightest whisper of impropriety will destroy a career and a life. The word paedophile having almost universal male association, despite the endless train in our mainstream media of female teachers molesting students[1], and the peer reviewed research showing women as the prevalent abusers of children.[2](page 28, table 3-5)

Women are also the leading killers of children [2](page 62, table 4-5) – however, in Canadian courts women who murder children are exempted from full accountability by the precedent-setting decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal on March 2nd 2011, in a case involving the interpretation of the offence of infanticide in the Canadian Criminal Code.

Marie Henein, counsel for the women's Legal Education and Action Fund says that, "This is an important decision since it upholds Parliament's recognition of the reduced culpability of women who commit infanticide. The decision confirms that even where a woman in these terrible circumstances is charged with murder, she may be convicted of infanticide."

So when women are convicted of murder – whenever possible, they're only sentenced for the lesser offence of infanticide.

When women are charged with murder, they're not only sentenced under a lesser charge, they are increasingly excused from responsibility based on flights of imaginative fancy of the officers of the courts.

On Monday January 3 2010, Canada's National Post newspaper reported that "After a night of drunken revelry that escalated into a violent street fight, Crystal-Dawn MacKenzie grabbed a knife from her neighbour's kitchen, yelled "I'm going to kill him" and stabbed her common-law husband to death.

Eight months later, Ms. MacKenzie walked out of a New Brunswick court a free woman after a nine-woman, three-man jury acquitted her of second-degree murder. Her killing excused by the court, based on a presumed history of abuse at the hands of Mr. Thomas.

Her lawyer actually admitted during the trial : "Of course she had other options, But she had been drinking and that impaired her judgement."

So a claim of past abuse and few drinks is enough to excuse murder? No, not unless you also own a vagina.

Canada, of course, is falling behind when it comes to feminizing the courts and society at large. In airstrip 1, the comically named Women's Justice Task-force has recommended that female criminal offenders, rather than being treated like criminals when they commit crimes, and sent to prison – should be pampered, coddled, provided state funded housing, therapy and day spas with an apricot facial scrub. (I made that last item up)

According to the BBC : [4]The Ministry of Justice (MoJ) welcomed the report and said it was carefully considering the recommendations.

The Women's Justice Task Force report also said that rather than incarceration for crimes committed by women, "The focus should be on health, housing and treatment for drug addiction to reduce reoffending". If violent crime is incentivized with fast access to health services, housing and other benefits, my testosterone addled, logical brain fails to grasp a pathway to reduced offence in the demographic so incentivized.

If this boundlessly stupid idea is implemented, I expect a dramatic – short term increase in violent crime committed by women. When this violent criminality targets men, ideological feminists will likely writhe in a lather of smug glee. However, I also predict that the general public will take several years to fully digest the social consequence of immunity from consequence for a biological demographic and the resulting escalated violence perpetrated by that privileged group. What will happen next will be a sharp, long term increase in brutal retributive violence and murder perpetrated against women.

I also believe that the promoters and pushers of the mind-bendingly stupid idea of exemption from consequence for women actually want to produce this massive and long term increase in female targeting violence. Female victimization is the foundation of organized, state funded, big business feminism's marketing message. More dead and maimed women means more funding, more government positions and more tenured positions for feminist academics. That's why the policies produced by organized feminism always produce more social carnage. Women killed and maimed are not merely collateral damage, for big-box feminism, they're the desired outcome.

I'll briefly digress at this point to address a favourite argument of my critics: Men's Rights Activists – including me are routinely accused of hating women, or harbouring a desire to beat or abuse or rape women. A major motivator of all credible MRA writing and activism is to reduce and avoid violence done against both men and women. Those who claim the men's movement has a motive to justify violence of any kind are nothing except disgusting lying filth, for whom I have nothing except contempt.

Meanwhile, in another part of the forest, family courts in the United States fund themselves by taking a portion of the money they extract from men being hypergamously discarded by their wives. That characterization used because women initiate 66% of divorce cases. This financial model used by the family courts almost completely guarantees that the courts are corrupt. Only saints could operate courts running on such a funding model without sinking into irretrievable corruption, and saints exist only in fantasy literature. It is not a coincidence that the suicide rate among men, already 4 times higher than among women rises to 11 times higher in males after divorce.

The code phrase "in the best interest of the children" is used to throw a confusing smog around the treatment of men by the family court system as walking cash machines, devoid of human rights.

But how can this "best interest of the children" carry any credibility if :

- 80% of rapists motivated with displaced anger come from fatherless homes (Source: Criminal Justice & Behaviour, Vol 14, p. 403-26, 1978)
- 70% of juveniles in state-operated institutions come from fatherless homes (Source: U.S. Dept. of Justice, Special Report, Sept 1988)
- 85% of all youths sitting in prisons grew up in a fatherless home (Source: Fulton Co. Georgia jail populations, Texas Dept. of Corrections 1992)

That question again – how does "best interest of the children" have any veracity at all in light of these facts, which I've kindly cited the sources of? The answer is simple. The courts and their publicists are amoral carrion eaters who directly profit by destroying families, fathers, and children, and temporarily elevating divorcing women – and they do not care how much human damage they do as long as they can pay themselves.

Meanwhile the media continues to give currency to the phrase "deadbeat dads" – never whispering that although debtors prisons were abolished more than 100 years ago, for men burdened by the courts with support payments exceeding their ability to pay – prison is where many of them go.

Mainstream social commentators continue to regurgitate the popular message that men are failures for opting out of marriage version 2.0 – where women (but not men) can exit at any time, retaining a their partner's income while disposing of his person. This message coupled with various imperatives to man up and be the cash, labour and sperm dispenser that would make a Victorian era patriarch proud. The nearly universal message that any male self actualization not of utility to a woman is shameful.

As members of the public, we're also continuously bludgeoned with the media's preferred characterization of masculinity as either childishly stupid and incompetent – (sitcoms and advertisements) or as malevolently violent (drama).

Lies about Domestic Violence crafted to cultivate hatred and fear of men; including the omnipresent lie that most domestic violence is perpetrated by men against women. This is what the "experts" in the DV industry keep telling us through public service announcements – but the message is false. Not wrong, not mistaken, it's deliberately false. The peer reviewed research on DV shows overwhelmingly that [5] "women are as physically aggressive, or more aggressive, than men in their relationships with their spouses or male partners"

Lies about pornography, crafted to demonize and criminalize men. The feminist lie that porn leads to violence or rape, or in some imaginary way oppresses the female actors. Female porn actors are paid 6 to 100 times more than their male counterparts – that's harm?

In fact, a substantial body of research indicates a positive social benefit correlating societies with increased access to porn with a reduction in social pathology in those societies. According to Anthony D'Amato at the Northwestern University – School of Law: [6] "The incidence of rape in the United States has declined 85% in the past 25 years while access to pornography has become freely available to teenagers and adults." A report on the social effects of porn by Dr Milton Diamond of the university of Hawaii, and published in International Journal of Law and Psychiatry in 1999 stated in it's conclusion: [7] "It is certainly clear from the data reviewed, and the new data and analysis presented, that a massive increase in available pornography in Japan, the United States and elsewhere has been correlated with a dramatic decrease in sexual crimes."

This research has been available to the public for over a decade. Have the anti porn anti male crusaders claiming all porn leads to rape been too busy to read the academic research on their own issue? Or are they liars profiting by pushing an agenda built on hatred.

Lies about prostitution, crafted to increase violence against sex workers, and to demonize and criminalize men. Anti prostitution activists, whether they come from a religious or a feminist ideology insist that commercialization of sex degrades women, is equivalent to rape, increases harm, escalates social carnage, but seem curiously incapable of providing any credible evidence to support this point of view. At the same time, they characterize male sexuality in the context of commercialized sex as a predatory, antisocial pathology innate to masculine identity. Sex is a biological drive, and both men and women are driven by it. Would anybody like to try explaining the rising social phenomena of 30-something women screwing everything in pants without acknowledgement of female libido? That many men are willing to pay to satisfy this biological drive seems in the ideological world of radical feminism to cast male sex into a purely negative light.

Or, is it that male access to sex without the increasingly onerous social encumbrance of sex within female controlled relationships disrupts the effective monopoly women as a class maintain over access to sex? The portrayal of purchased sex as if it is inherently pathological is merely a device to deny male sexual self actualization. In fact the ideological opponents of sex as a service ignore the real world damage to women which criminalizing prostitution creates.

According to Doctor Kate Shannon at the British Columbia centre for excellence in HIV/Aids research; [8] "while there has been a growing body of qualitative evidence documenting the negative impacts of criminalization of prostitution on the health and safety of sex workers, our study demonstrates, empirically – a direct link between the criminalization of sex work and the increased odds of violence against female sex workers"

Indeed, escalated violence in prohibited activities is used for victim-assistance fund seeking, and as justification for continued and expanded prohibitions under feminism's so called "humanitarian mandate".

Increased harm, and human damage is the real product and the real goal of abolitionist movements against porn and prostitution, because the harm makes a good story to secure funding and political power. And as always, the men driven to satisfy a biological drive by paying women for a service – those men are called criminals.

Lies about men seeking post-divorce contact with their own children, crafted to characterize male parental love as aggression. The anti-male hate organization NOMAS describes the motivation of men seeking continued access to their own children as a cover for continued abuse of those children. As hateful lies go, this is arguably the most egregious nugget of hate propaganda I've ever seen. [9] The hatemongers at NOMAS equate father's rights advocacy with male supremacy groups, and tell fathers shattered by forcible separation from their homes and children to "do whatever [you] can to ensure that their mother is thriving. Stop fighting for "shared parenting" or sole custody if are in court."

NOMAS is a 36 year old organization, and this thinking is mainstream – but I'm sure it has nothing at all to do with the rate of suicide among divorced men being 11 times higher than the national average.

Also, the advice from this hate organization to men to get quickly out of the way and provide financial and emotional support to divorcing mothers who prefer to view their children's fathers as cash dispensing appliances, consider that 85% of all children who show behavior disorders come from fatherless homes – 20 times the average. (Center for Disease Control).

Lies about a wage gap while retailers know with certainty that women, and not men control 65% of disposable income [10] – money spent by women without account of who earns it.

Lies about a wage gap while men continue to comprise 93% of workplace deaths.

The word "workers" used in the media to hide the fact that almost every time a workplace accident produces a newsworthy number of corpses – they're almost all male.

Triumphalism by feminists who [11] preen in sadistic delight at the disproportionate numbers of men [12] driven to poverty and unemployment by female favouring affirmative action programs in employment, education and government.

According to Christina Hoff Sommers: “we’re not talking about a few errors, we’re not talking about occasional lapses, we’re talking about a body of egregiously false information at the heart of the domestic violence movement. False claims are pervasive. False claims are not the exception, they are the rule”

I will reiterate another point made by Sommers:

The leading academic text on domestic violence in North America is called Domestic Violence Law from Thompson Press, written by Nancy K. D. Lemon. The first page of the first chapter of this book contains the following paragraph:

“Wife abuse and child abuse, contrary to current opinion are not merely symptoms of modern day stress which disturb family tranquillity, and cause the breakdown of a formerly non violent family structure. The history of women’s abuse began over 2,700 years ago in the year 753 BC. It was during the reign of Romulus of Rome that wife abuse was accepted and condoned under the Laws of Chastisement. The tradition continues to a certain extent even today.”

This paragraph contains a number of overt and implied factual falsehoods (lies). The most obvious being that Romulus of Rome was not a real person, but a mythological character. Romulus is the son of the Roman God Aries, raised by wolves, along with his brother Remus. And this is on the first page of the first chapter of the leading academic text on domestic violence.

This is organized, funded, systematic and institutional promotion of hatred and discrimination against men in our society. It is widespread, overt, and escalating with time.

Is anyone still confused that men are increasingly, and justifiably angry?
Maybe you also think we live in a patriarchy, and that the tooth fairy is coming to your town next week as well.

Where are we going?

Early in this article, I mentioned the bottomless stupidity being pursued by establishment feminist ideologues in their plan to exempt women from legal accountability. Women in the UK, rather than facing potential jail when they commit violent crimes may soon enjoy state provided housing, therapy, job training, state funded daycare, and various other benefits. This will effectively incentive the commission of violent crime by members of an elevated elite biological class. It does not require advanced training in economics to understand that anything you subsidize, you get more of.

In the UK there is already a mandate for judges to sentence women more leniently than men [13]. Supreme Court judge Baroness Hale is quoted as saying: “It is now well recognized that a misplaced conception of equality has resulted in some very unequal treatment for women and girls.” Equality is that most elastic of words which can mean anything a feminist’s whim prefers, from one second to the next.

So what should we expect as legal accountability for female criminals is folded away by feminist jurisprudence? To begin, a rise in violent criminality. Women will increasingly abuse, assault, and murder children and adults. However, much of this escalated social carnage will happen out of public sight, because aside from the courts, the mainstream media is a principal disseminator of feminist ideology. Showing the ugly truth that humans owning vaginas are just as capable of violence as their penis-owning contemporaries doesn't serve the talking points of a feminist media, and so it wont be the top story.

Because of this, and because of the blatant insanity of suspending criminal accountability from an entire biological demographic – the public will take several years to fully grasp the brave new world of incentivized female violence. When this happens, the carnage done by women excepted from criminal consequence will appear mild. This is a bad outcome.

Criminal law serves a specific and necessary function in a civil society. It's a way for people to seek redress of grievance through a mutually understandable and mostly impartial framework, without resort to vendetta. It allows people to disagree without bashing each other's heads in with rocks. Human societies cannot function without system to fulfil this need. If, or when the system of law is perverted to a degree that a major segment of society is exempt from accountability through legitimate criminal penalty – the society will adapt to re-introduce accountability. Women, exempted by the courts from accountability will become the targets of public rage, and killed and maimed in historically unprecedented numbers. This is a bad outcome, but in the system proposed by the UK Women's Justice Task Force, this bad outcome seems so obvious that I cant believe it is not a planned outcome.
In previous articles, I've criticized the policies of public funded victim advocacy organizations whose policies appear to produce increased incidence of the victimization their funding relies on. The transformation of western legal systems appears to be this same phenomena amplified.

In 1989 – A man named Marc Lepine murdered 14 women and 4 men, citing the corrosive effects of feminism as his motive[14].

Mainstream media reports have attributed Lepine's actions to psychiatric conditions including personality disorder, psychosis, or attachment disorder, or societal factors such as poverty, isolation, powerlessness, and violence in the media. Mr Lepine was probably a candidate for psychiatric intervention, as his actions were isolated, and not representative of or reproduced by other members of his community. I certainly do not regard his choice to kill as a good one. Mr Lepine was clearly not a stable or mentally healthy individual. He was, however a single, early example of what may happen in a society which has no lawful framework for redress of grievance.

When humans cannot resolve grievance through the courts, because for half the population, the courts provide no accountability – what is left is retributive violence. I'll say again, this is a bad outcome to be avoided. Unfortunately, I believe it is coming. The ideologues pushing legal non accountability for half the population do so seeking this outcome.

Misdirected Anger; giving dad a break

June 11, 2011 | by Jade Michael | Link | Original Link

After many years of misandric conditioning, I no longer accept that my father helped to pave the downward spiral of self-hate, self-negation and paranoid narcissism that exemplified the path I took. For nearly two decades, I aloofly hurled myself into an abyss of depraved personal and social deconstruction while working diligently to appear lucid to the outside world. My apathetic antics were a constant source of personal shame that I was able to numb by projecting contradictory values. It would be years before I would come to terms with the preceding factors that waged psychological warfare against my development but once I did, I justly stopped the castigation of my paternal influence.

Not only was I reared in an environment that pointed the finger at men no matter what the infraction, I was also indoctrinated into a definition of manhood that was based on the complete refusal to be male. A select few who are close to me have told me that my story is one of anomalous circumstances. Whether or not that is the case I don't know as I'm sure many had it worse than I did, but I do know that my past stands as a stark outcome of misandric calamities.

Because my father was deemed public enemy number one by my mother and because she smothered me with her narcissistic need for affirmation (which became my only social outlet as I wasn't allowed friends), my development was hijacked and replaced with intersexual insecurities that essentially mirrored my mother's. Her hatred for men was entrenched in my psyche from birth. What I was taught as a child revolved around mom being an innocent victim, and dad being the evil perpetrator.

My mother did provide me with concrete reasons (that I later discovered were lies) to hate my father.

Her most referenced myth was that he sexually molested my older brothers. As a child I found it odd that he didn't molest me as well, but my mother said it was because he didn't like fat people and I was a chubby kid. It was this fetid detour from development that would mold the confusion and desperation that prompted my next action. I compensated for this lack of attention by making myself as sexually approachable to my father as a young boy could be imagined to. (I know that is disturbing to think about, but this was the only environment I knew as a youngster.) Due to the aberrational atmosphere my mother created, I literally thought that in order to get dad's attention I essentially had to "put out" and offer him sexual favors that my mother refused to. I was convinced it would get his attention and love. But even though my mother explained exactly what he enjoyed sexually, and what she wouldn't do for him in graphic "pity me" detail, my efforts were futile.

When my mother learned of this she, of course, blamed my father for "ignoring" me. I began hating my father as well as all other “heartless men”, and my mother fed the rage. It didn’t help matters that my two oldest brothers had molested me at a very young age and my mother’s response was “that is what men do”. I don’t harbor resentment towards my brothers as they weren’t men at the time but that didn’t faze her. It never fazed her that my growing sexual obsession with my father was unusual and unhealthy. It also never fazed her to not relay sexually graphic information about her sex life to her barely-walking sons. (Side note: She did eventually send me to therapy but not for any of these reasons. Around the age of 12, she thought I was a danger to her because I listened to “sick and violent” music.)

I further arrested my manhood during adolescence by prostituting myself to men in order to gain self (and fatherly) approval, albeit on a subconscious level. In order to do this I had to completely disregard my heterosexuality and essentially convince myself that I was either gay, or female. I chose the former because certain physical traits would have proved the latter more difficult. Not ironically, at times I did wish to be female in order to receive less torment from my mother. Her pain over having boys was too much for her to bear at times, as her depression was deemed “all our fault”. Knowing I was the cause of the misery that bounced back on me tenfold was too much for me to bear at times.

I was reminded time and time again how badly she wanted me to be a girl because her pregnancy with me was the “last time she stretched herself out for a fuckin’ kid”. It was subtleties like this mixed with the occasional crypto-crossdressing she subjected me to as a toddler while repeating comments such as “you would have made such a pretty girl” that stuck with me well past adolescence. It was surprisingly easy to take the path of male prostitution because the lies I told myself were rooted in the belief that all sex with women equaled rape as my mother had taught me, so why bother pursuing women in the first place?

Because I repressed my heterosexuality to such a debilitating level, I began to HATE women…ALL women. My misogyny became unparalleled. Ironically, it was the type of woman I hated the most that I unknowingly emulated in my relationships with men, both straight and gay alike. It is no wonder why I was never “one of the guys” in the way I desperately wanted to be. I hated women for not being approachable and I hated men for making them that way.

It wasn’t until after years of drug use, countless unsafe sexual encounters with the intention of catching AIDS (surprisingly I came out of it unscathed), and endlessly aching for a healthy connection with a woman, that I started to snap. My emotional crashes and drug-induced physical breakdowns were occurring on a regular basis before I realized something had to change or I was going to die, voluntarily or otherwise. I didn’t want to die without ever knowing the touch of a normal woman or a life free of my mother’s mental invasions. I had to purge her from my life, which I eventually did.

Shortly after turning 30, I started taking responsibility for my actions, and I changed my life completely. Cut to the present, I have since counseled and (legally) medicated myself into a more adjusted person. I still don’t feel altogether like a man, and I suspect I never will, but it won't stop me from trying. I am finally able to admit that not only do I want to be male but I like being male. That may sound trivial to most, but the metamorphosis was huge to me. I'm not to be mistaken for one of those "reformed homosexual" cases you sometimes hear about. I knew the whole time I was with men that I wanted to be with women but the level of hatred and disgust I had for myself kept me caged in the cell my mother had built in my head. I hated myself for being male and for having the normal inclinations of one. And it was easy to be a street hustler. I knew more about sex than anything else. In some ways, it really was what I jokingly referred to as "the family business". It's like a light went off when I was a kid and I spent adulthood trying to turn it back on.

I missed out on a lot of things during my years of misandric self-enslavement.

I've just recently experienced what a lot of men take for granted. I've taught myself much of the things I should have learned from my father, some of which are very basic life lessons. I discovered all of the innate things men are capable of after I cleared my head of its previous female conditioning and allowed my manhood to shine through. I started to take pleasure in things I missed out on like championing honor over turning the other cheek when it came to personal accountability. Even little things like teaching myself how to play a sport became a liberating focus.

Now I am ready to form healthy friendships with men and I can draw on my past experiences to help men who are seemingly lost. It's a really good feeling. I am nowhere near the man I wish to be, but I'm closer than I was 5 years ago. I have never sought pity for my lot in life nor do I expect understanding. I don't know if there are many cases like mine in which a man in his 30's "comes out of the straight closet" after years of sexual disorientation, but if so then maybe reading this might help them realize that they are not alone. My story is bizarre and there is no way that in one posting I could or would drive the reader down all of the avenues leading into the locked maze of manic misandry that was my brain, but nonetheless I am honored to say that I am here among you; among the living and no longer immersed in a lifestyle of terminal self-destruction.

As for my father – I don't really know much about him. I'm not even sure if he is still alive. I severed ties with my family years ago. I believe he did his best given what he had to work with and against. He did want to teach me how to be a man as he saw fit, but my mother prevented it with all of the fire and scorn of a self-hating narcissist. It took years to turn the table on the real perpetrator, but once I did I was able to relieve myself of the guilt and shame of hating my mother. It's funny how the words "I hate my mother" shock our society yet "I hate my father" is usually received with "yeah, so do I" or "mine was an asshole too".

I feel it is important to start sharing my story in order to shed light on the women who are not held accountable for the mental and/or physical destruction they inflict upon their children. My mother's anti-male brainwashing, albeit uncontrived in the sense that she wasn’t smart enough to be intentionally devious, was unprecedented. And for what? To have a lifetime of emotional control over her sons? Why is it so important for so many women to have such a manipulative stranglehold on their children? How can a woman prioritize the mitigation of her selfish insecurities over, and at the expense of, the emotional well-being of her kids? Perhaps we may never know. At least not until society recognizes that women are just as guilty of child abuse as men are. Regardless, it is high time after all of these years that I give dad a break.

I’m left to wonder how many other dads out there deserve the same.

A Message to Lion Goodman

June 12, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

I just noticed the following comment by Lion Goodman, the man who will be hosting my appearance at the Ultimate Men's Summit. I thought it was important, but buried on an older thread it was not likely to be seen. So I am posting it here with my response.

First, from Mr. Goodman:

I'm the one who invited Paul to be on the Summit, and I'll be interviewing him. I've read all or your comments, and I have a few of my own in response. First, the reason Paul is on at 10 am is because we had very few slots left when I contacted him. There's no reason to "bury" his talk any more than the other 50 people who are speaking during the work day. Most people will be listening to the recordings, not the live calls anyway. Paul's interview will be available to everyone, free, for months, just like all the others.

Second: I resent being called a mangina, or any of the other epithets you've used to demean me, or anyone else in our Summit. We are providing a comprehensive look at men's issues – all of them – at our own cost, for free. Without trying to sell anything or promote any particular point of view. Here we are, working on behalf of all men, providing deep and significant conversations from a wide range of points of view, to educate men and free them from social programming – and some of you accuse us of having an evil feminist agenda. It's shocking to me – there's all this value offered for free, and your own anger prevents you from seeing what's available.

Third, I invited Paul into the program because I believe the Men's Rights movement has a very important point of view that needs to be represented. The truth is, I wasn't aware of the movement until recently, but as soon as I discovered it, I knew it had to be included, and Paul was the most obvious spokesperson. There is no hidden agenda, no bad intent, and no need to demean Paul or MRA movement. I expect to have a clean and open conversation with Paul, and honor his point of view in the same way I've honored each speakers' point of view. This is a way to expand Paul's audience, to bring more people into the realization that men have been oppressed as much as women. Why accuse and demean our intention in advance? Why not listen to some of the programming with an open mind and learn something?

I request an open-minded approach to what we're trying to do. We're doing the best we can to expand the conversation about ALL of the issues that effect men, from the sociopolitical to the personal. Join us in that dialog, without diatribe.

And my response:

I am going to second the sentiments here, and reiterate what I said earlier. Though I cannot find an example of you being called a mangina here, I do agree that any hostility directed toward you is uncalled for and off base.

I am going to repost this exhchange as a feature piece, but I will also say here that if anyone calls into my presentation wielding insults at anyone I will consider them a personal affront to me and to the intended mission of this site.

I have had little contact with Mr. Goodman, but in all of it he has been professional, accommodating and quite friendly. He is doing his part, both by inviting me to present and by conducting himself like a decent human being.

That being said, I hope, Mr. Goodman, that you can grow to understand the nature of the hostility you see here and understand that it is a product of chronically ignored abuse against men and boys, some of it being furthered by individuals who are also presenting at your summit.

I completely disagree with taking that frustration out on you, or by any form of guilt by association. But I hope as you dust your sleeves off from this that you also learn something from it.

This is a long repressed segment of the population that is just beginning to speak in numbers. It is not always going to be neat and congenial, nor would anyone who really understands the nature of the problems expect it to be.

Please look at the video on this page and listen to MP George Christensen talk about the men in his country driven to the brink of insanity by the cruel injustice toward them, and indeed the ones who go over the edge and take their own lives, or horribly, the lives of their children at times.

You don’t have to condone this to understand it.

When we talked you spoke of men in your corner being on a spiritual path. That is a very good thing indeed, because that spiritual fitness is exactly what is needed to look at the anger and hostility of abused men and see past it to the devastation in their lives that it represents, and to extend the compassion they need as well as the moral compass to embrace the idea of correcting the injustices they suffer.

You are welcome to join us in those efforts, but please understand that many of these men are ones who have been burned, over and over again; men who have lost their children, their fathers, brothers, their reputations, their property, their dignity and their freedom, all in a world not only turned deaf and blind to their suffering, but that most often mocks and ridicules them for expressing any pain at all.

We trust slowly, Mr. Goodman, and with very good reason. That’s why we are here.

Gay Hendricks and Arjuna Ardagh are Not Faggots

Does anybody remember the limp, feminized zombies of the Conscious Men Project, and their 7 minute long, repulsive self abasing apology for being men?

I've just Listened to Gay and Arjuna's "Ultimate Men's Summit" live podcast. The first thing which struck me as noteworthy was that these two hyper-feminized men, since the public backlash against their Dear Woman video, they have not distanced themselves from the mystical, obsequious and craven deification of women and blame of men. In fact since collective male guilt and woman-worship forms the core of their cosmology, they've dialed it up.

However, in re-iterating their position, they've become slightly more comprehensible. To begin, much of the negative reaction to the sickeningly opportunistic approval seeking video "Dear Women" is being dismissed by our friends Gay and Arjuna as homophobic knee jerk. It seems that more than 2000 emails in response to the video contained the word "faggot". I wrote a piece critical of the dear woman video, and I understand the desire to employ such pejorative.

However, in the hope that the two of you, Gay and Arjuna, may read this, I will address the rest of this piece to you personally. And I will commence by telling you that the word "faggot," in this context, when applied to you gentlemen is no comment on your sexuality. No, the usage of "faggot" here is implying that you are weak, ineffectual, sycophantic, approval seeking suck-holes.

I'm sure that's is more likely the intent in this case than in the possibly incorrect characterization that either of you are homosexual.

I also find it quite curious that on this website, undoubtedly the most prominent on the internet where your views are being critiqued, even with a good measure of hostility, that no one, not in a single article nor in any comment every posted by readers in general, has there been even a single insinuation about your sexuality.

What has been insinuated, and clearly reinforced by your performance today at the "Ultimate Men's Summit," is that you are both disagreeable, wrongheaded, and dishonest. Prior to today's pod cast, I would have allowed a possibility that your point of view was honestly held, but after today, no. Here's what convinced me you're both bad actors.

Sammich. The satirical miss-spelling of the word "sandwich."

During the podcast of your segment on the "ultimate men's summit" – one of you, (possibly Arjuna) characterized the abundance of anti-feminist web-pages employing the word "sammich" as positive proof that a strong anti-woman bias exists in our society.

"Go make me a sammich!" is a deliberate parody of feminism's ongoing narrative about women's supposed oppression. Sandwich is spelled "sammich" to make it clear it's parody; an intentionally exaggerated use of the word to poke fun at the idea that the majority of men ever really held women in such low regard that they view them as only worth making a sandwich for a man.

For individuals calling themselves “conscious,” you two do appear conspicuously oblivious. But I’m not buying the oblivious act, not about “sammich” and not about your alleged obliviousness to the non-sexual pejorative connotation of “faggot.”

I think it is nothing more than a rouse to convince fence sitters that whoever dissents from your ideology are unconscious, knuckle dragging, homophobic misogynists. And I think that makes for a very good sales pitch for women, your true target demographic.

That being said, lets take a look at your hypothesis of collective guilt, and your claimed necessity for collective apology by men. You also claim that men share in the masculine energy from which the urge to rape comes. Before I address this in detail, I’ll share something deep from my own masculine mysticality.

Fuck you.

Sorry, my ability to appear oblivious to the meaning of others words is not as refined as yours.

First, you falsely claim that rape is a masculine behavior, or even imply that most rapes are committed by men. For educated individuals, your factual veracity is sorely sub-par. Its true that most victims of rape are men, but you’re only concerned with victims when they own vaginas. From the conscious-men website: “ We worship women here, so if you’re a woman, we welcome you to join these lively discussions.”

This collectivized guilt by all men, for the behavior of a very few, and your pretense that violence and rape committed by women doesn’t exist. This is nothing except a re-packaging of the christian concept of original sin. The biblical fable that the transgressions of our distant ancestors can transfer culpability to us is perverse and immoral.

It’s the transferal of the crime of an individual onto another. The concept of collective guilt is merely a conduit to lend legitimacy to assumption of guilt by individuals who’ve taken no part in the apocryphal victimization of women, whether sexual or otherwise. In your cosmology, you would legitimize the hateful ideology that all men are rapists. In fact, if we accept collectivist thinking – then all humans are rapists and all humans are murderers. But its not true, and only a tiny fraction of humans are violent sexual offenders. And of that fraction, a good many are women – but you wont hear any reputable MRA saying all women are rapists or murderers, because men are mostly decent human beings.

Collectivized guilt of the type peddled by the supposed conscious men is, as I said – the repackaging of the biblical doctrine of original sin. The hateful dogma that humans are born guilty and only by submitting to a mythical parent can’t they be redeemed. The big problem with this sickening ethic is that culpability cannot be transferred. To attempt by rhetorical contortion, to transfer culpability is vile, and immoral, and wether it’s original sin or collectivist rape makes no difference. In the new and improved version, it’s only men who are guilty by virtue of masculinity, and the solution is worship of women.

And that is what you are selling, because while there is nothing but smoke and mirrors in the idea of collective guilt, there may be some merit in the idea of collective customers.

The organized and funded male apologists for female supremacy are merely grasping after female approval (read: dollars), a marketing ploy any junior grade ad exec could spot in every women's magazine and talk show across western culture. And you indirectly admit as much on your website.

When I first watched the "dear women" video, I thought it was a parody. On learning that it was outwardly serious, I wonder what extremity of self abasement will be next? perhaps a social imperative of conscious castration?

We've endured a narrative of accusation for the past 50 years as feminism has risen to pre-eminence in public ideology. The path to male self actualization is not more feminism or more accusation. Service to, and self sacrifice on behalf of a culture which increasingly despises male identity is not a solution.

The men's rights movement already has a path to male self actualization, and it requires no mystical woo-woo or pseudo intellectual mummery. Its called Zeta Masculinity, and the men involved are growing ever committed to outing this type of demagoguery and sexism for what it is.

Men are human beings, and I have some news for you, so are women. If you want healing and respect, it won't start with men on their knees making phony confessions to women that have been falsely elevated to the status of deity. That amounts to nothing more than putting men's self respect on the chopping block of female narcissism, all for the sake of selling a book or tickets to a seminar.

Shame on both of you.

George Christensen on AVfM Radio

June 12, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box type="alert" style="rounded" border="full" icon="none"]

Tuesday, June 14th at 8:00 pm CST, JtO and Paul will be addressing feminism's war against the family. This program comes off the heels of George Christensen's blockbuster speech about the designs of gender feminists against families and the rights of men before the Australian Parliament.

We will explore the various ways that the feminists have kept their promises to undermine fathers and children, and how those efforts have not only resulted in broken families, but also in desperation, depression, suicide and murder.

Highlighting our show will be Paul's interview with Mr. Christensen, conducted exclusively for listeners to A Voice for Men Radio. In it he reiterates much of what he said in the speech and offers additional insights to how feminist ideology is resulting in tyranny and destruction in Australian culture.

As a side note here, the addition of JtO as co-host of AVfM Radio has already upped the energy and intensity of the show. Reviews have come in that the show is getting better with each episode, largely due to Paul's brilliant and auspicious call to add he-of-three-letters to the team.

So tune in gents and ladies, come Tuesday you are going to be hearing A Voice for Men Radio step it up yet another level. We are already the show the fembots are afraid to call. By close of business Tuesday they are going to be too fucking scared to even listen.

A technical glitch and an apology

[box type=”note” style=”rounded” border=”full” icon=”none”]

I have the unpleasant duty of delivering some unfortunate news to AVfM Radio listeners. In order to conduct the all but impromptu interview with George Christensen I had to purchase a telephone voice recorder on the quick.

The unit turned out to be a lemon. The sound quality it produced was so poor that it is completely unsuitable for broadcast. Even with JtO’s technical expertise, he was unable to render it usable.

It is, however, clear enough coming directly from the unit that I will be able to type out a transcript for posting on the site, which I will begin after the show tonight.

My apologies for the disappointment to listeners and I assure you I will be taking this as a lesson. I have ambitions to do many more interviews in the future and will prepare accordingly with tried and true equipment in the near future.

In the meantime, we will move on with the show as scheduled, addressing feminism’s impact on marriage and the family, where there will be more discussion about Christensen’s epic speech, as well as a variety of other issues.

Diamonds are a Girl’s Best Friend

---

And small undocumented wars are diamond producer’s best friends.

Several weeks ago, I was snubbed by a grocery store cashier. I had inadvertently offended her, and she made it clear to me, and everybody nearby that I’d gotten ideas above my station. My offence, as closely as I can determine it was to flirt with her, deliberately mis-reading her comment as a sexual come-on and suggesting “not just now, but perhaps later” – said by me with a deliberately bewildered look on my face. I thought at the time – and still do, that my remark was harmless and entertaining. I was not the only person amused, but the cashier to whom I offered this attempt at wit found it decidedly unfunny. She had to shut me down – and did so with a demonstration of social status. She flaunted her ring at me.

The diamond was – to state it delicately – fucking huge, and the ring likely cost somebody $30,000 or more. “I’m taken, by somebody who’s financial resource far exceeds yours.” It took me a second or two of goggling at this slice of some man’s annual salary to realize : A] she was choosing to take my flirting seriously and B] reacting with the most heavy-handed snub she could muster. It probably didn’t help matters that on realizing it, I laughed.

But what I didn’t do, and had I the the opportunity to do over, I still might not have bothered to explain the following:

I have a problem with diamonds.

I do not like them. This is partly an inherited prejudice from my geologist father, but partly a dislike I have learned on my own.

Diamonds, which many people seem to regard as being valuable as a result of their scarcity or their demand, are in fact, about as scarce as gravel.

In reality, diamonds would create a glut on the market if they were traded openly. Fortunately for the producers, the mining, rough stone distribution, and cutting of diamonds is an international monopoly, managed mainly under the DeBeers group of companies.
The purpose of this monopoly is to limit the supply of diamonds entering the consumer market, and to limit public information about diamond abundance.

Since the actual mining of diamonds has always exceeded the demand, diamond producers are not able to maintain artificial scarcity stockpiling. If they did, the volume of stockpiled diamonds would continuously increase, and would create a new problem of large scale theft from storage. A strategy they have developed to create a false sense of scarcity is the physical destruction and concealment of un-mined diamond fields. Another method is the sequestration of existing stockpiles.

In 1990, I was shown a set of photos taken on a mining exploration project under development by the company then employing me. The project was located in Ghana, on the west coast of Africa, although I worked in our offices in Vancouver. The photos showed a convoy of around 180 cement trucks. Imagine a large scale construction project requiring hundreds of thousands of cubic meters of cement.

These were brand-new cement trucks, freshly painted with the DeBeers logo on the rotating drum. The destination was not a construction site, but a beach. The trucks were lining up to pour cement into the ocean.

No amount of security would prevent a market flood following successful theft of diamonds from a large secure storage location, so one technique used by the DeBeers group is to regularly dump tones of diamonds onto the ocean floor, mixed with cement.

While it was not obvious to me at age 20, one of our geologists explained to me that the concrete contained an aggregate of diamonds rather than the conventional gravel. Both gem quality and industrial diamonds are so common that the diamond producing cartels have to bury tones of them every year to maintain an illusion of value.

The second problem with diamonds is their relationship to slavery, war, and bloodshed. On the African continent, they serve as a trade currency, financing tribal warfare and trade in arms. A recently established trading agreement called the Kimberley Certification is intended to restrict trade in conflict, or “blood,” diamonds. Sadly this has served mainly as a tool to protect the monopoly of the DeBeers group of companies.

Diamonds mines are typically filled with an abrasive dust which if inhaled – scars the lungs of mineworkers. This could be easily prevented by employing normal dust – suppression methods used in other industries, and by some diamond producers. De Beers currently holds a legal exemption in South Africa from the mandatory dust suppression method of spraying water when drilling, on the grounds that the dust in its mines is uniquely harmless. This exemption, and it’s reason, illustrate how seriously to take statements from DeBeers about their efforts to curtail trade in conflict diamonds.

The Kimberly protocol – intended to prevent the trade in diamonds financing bloodshed is subscribed on a voluntary basis. Being self-enforced by diamond producers, it is observed only when convenient. Many people claim the kimberly process successfully restricts the trade in conflict diamonds. Having worked in mining exploration, it is my opinion that such people are either naive, or simply lying.

Now, Ill freely admit, it’s men who dig diamonds out of the earth, who select them, who raise investment capitol to finance mining exploration projects, and it’s men who exploit slave labor in the mining operations. And based on my knowledge gained working for a mineral exploration company, it’s mostly men who are the slave labour in diamond mining operations. It’s also men who organized international cartels to control a monopoly on shiny but objectively worthless stones.

But the reason men do all these things is that women demand it.

Women, all claims of patriarchy aside, are in charge. Women control 2/3 of disposable income. Women control access to sex, women own all rights of reproduction, and thereby, control men. (Whether they wish to admit it or not) More women than men vote. And, it is not a coincidence that in this society we keep calling a patriarchy, it’s 93% of workplace deaths that are men.

The use of diamonds as a trade currency for indentured slavery, and the arms trade enabling the warlord model of regional government will continue as long as western consumers (read: women) create a demand.

Every time I see a woman wearing diamonds, whether they're earrings or a big fuck-off diamond engagement ring – I am reminded of what they actually finance.

If you want to stop a war, or slavery, or torture, you stop buying the commodities which finance it, like diamonds.

ADDENDUM: Antz made an excellent point in the comments below, the substance of which I think is important enough to add here.

The consumer appeal of diamonds is only superficially the glitter. Artificially produced diamonds are chemically and visually identical (except under high magnification) to naturally produced stones, but the "fakes" have very little market appeal, why? Because an item of diamond jewelery is symbolic of male sacrifice on behalf of women. The men who die in diamond mines and in small wars, the blood and corpses behind that shiny ornament on a woman's finger confer a sense of personal worth that she's so special, that so many men have labored, fought, died, sacrificed and killed other men – for her bauble. That's the true appeal – and its deeper and more primal than just how many dollars the diamond cost or how big it is – the size of the stone is a measure, certainly – but it's the blood and the cruelty that matters. And if I'm wrong – why aren't all diamonds used in jewelery manufactured rather than mined.

But don't forget, if women ruled the world there'd be no war. Also, we live in a patriarchy.

How to Break a Dialectic

Lecture No. 12

"Feminism helps men too!" – late 20th century folk saying

If you have spent even a short amount of time browsing the multitudinous websites and blogs of the Men's Rights sphere, you will have no doubt encountered a feminist detractor or two asserting that "Not All Feminists Are Like That." This has become so common that MRAs have taken to referencing this as the "NAFALT" defense. But should the claim be so readily dismissed? Depending on the context, the feminist might well be right. A hypothetical feminist who stumbled upon my last two posts, which point to the eventual outcome of feminism as the physical extermination of men, might well object that she does not hope for this future, and therefore is Not Like That – and she is not necessarily wrong.

Of course, our hypothetical feminist would not have read closely enough, for I clearly stated that the physical extermination of men is more likely to be attempted as the result of an organic process, beginning with hostile indifference, followed by active persecution through state bureaucracies, without the requirement that extermination be consciously articulated or advocated by any more than a small number of feminists. The others only need to go along with the programme; they do not need to understand where it will all end. At the heart of this is the dichotomy between Earnest and Radical Feminists.

On the face of it, this distinction seems to imply that, as feminists are fond of saying, feminism is not monolithic. In other words,some feminists might read from the gospel of Mary Daly, while others just want a fair deal for women. This is a more elaborate version of NAFALT, but it does not explain why two ostensibly conflicting ideologies are referred to by the same name: feminism. In fact, stating that feminism is non-monolithic sidesteps the issue of how all these different sub-feminisms relate to each other and to feminism as a whole. Would feminism still be feminism if one of its sub-feminisms were removed? Possibly. The death of eco-feminism would not spell disaster for feminism in general, or for any other sub-feminism in particular. But what about the two main prongs of feminism – Radical Feminism, which is openly misandric, and Earnest Feminism, whose supporters "just want a fair deal"? Could feminism survive the death of either of these? Or does the ideology as a whole owe its existence to their reciprocity? Is their relationship inherently and intrinsically symbiotic?

I contend that the differences between Earnest and Radical Feminists are superficial, accounting only for the perceived differences between feminists themselves. The intellectual distance between two feminists in disagreement might seem, to them, to be vast indeed; a philosophical Grand Canyon! But to non-feminists, who stand far away from them both, and observe feminism from a distance, the two bickering ideologues stand very close to each other. Yes, we can just about see them on the horizon – two small figures, shouting over a pothole!

The feminist, having automatically ruled out the legitimacy of any space that is non-feminist, perceives feminism as the whole world, and on this tiny plane of existence, the interval of a few feet is colossal – large enough to justify drawing a chalk line on the ground, and saying, “that is your space, this is mine, and we are not like each other! Certainly, we are not a monolith!” But, to the non-feminist, who is not blinkered by ideology, and thus perceives much more of the world generally, the feminists in the distance are standing nearly on top of each other as they quarrel over their claims to a small piece of land.

In other words: the distance between objects becomes more significant the closer you get to them. And if you pay no attention to anything that is not those objects, then those objects will appear to be the entire world! And thus any distance between them will seem enormous, because you lack any sense of scale. Feminists are not in any kind of position to know how much they differ from each other, from the perspective of the non-feminist world; they cannot judge because they lack the prerequisite non-feminism.

So when a feminist tries to pass off the elaborated NAFALT defense, as apologia for herself or for the atrocious behavior of her sisters, you must remind her that she is in no position to judge how far she differs from other feminists! The differences she perceives might seem very significant from her own subjective point of view, but she must be made to understand that she is a participant in the social organism called feminism, that she speaks from within the big tent, and thus has absolutely no right to tell us how we should look at the tent from outside! The non-feminist world, you must explain, experiences the force of feminism from one direction in particular, and when we turn to look in that direction, we see infallibly that the Earnest Feminist stands proudly, side by side, with the Radical.

Now, I would presume that such an arrangement as exists between Earnest and Radical Feminists is one of necessity. Feminism requires both the acceptable public face of the salesman (trustworthy, just trying to make an honest living), and the momentum, that inner drive that keeps the whole show running (greasy, oiled palms on the factory floor). Neither could exist without the other. If only the public face of Earnest Feminism existed, it would get nowhere, because there would be no molten core of misandry, no dynamo at its center to motivate action. On the other hand, if only the combustion engine of Radical Feminism existed, the movement would fold overnight, being exposed immediately as the politics of hate. Without the engine, all you would have is an object that looks nice but goes nowhere. Forget the paintwork, and nobody would want to buy it.

Whatever it is, feminism must be marketable if it is going to be successful – so its marketability alone cannot tell us anything about what it is.

Earnestness and Radicalism are two sides of the same feminist coin. The dichotomy allows for Radical attacks against men, followed up by the Earnest defense that feminism is a nice doctrine, or at least it is not monolithic, and anyway, anyone who is against it “just hates women.” The two sides fit together like two pieces of a jigsaw puzzle, the picture only making sense when they are combined.

Yes, feminism is one single, simple entity, monolithic in its aspirations, merely presenting different faces depending on context. The various manifestations of feminism, whether intended for public consumption or not, hold in common the constant that they seek to increase the power of women. This is the locus, the centre of gravity of feminism – whether it appears as a belief in innate female superiority, or as the aspiration to female domination in material terms, the actualization of female power will be present in some form or other. Without this epicentre, around which all else revolves, the movement could not survive; its sudden implosion would send its members spinning out of orbit in all different directions. The only thing which binds feminists together is the belief that the status of women must be elevated and the status of men must be relegated; that women must be made more superior, and men more inferior. Beyond this, there are only side issues, arguments which have no bearing on the primary thesis of female supremacy. These side issues are a distraction for the outside world, allowing for feminism to remain intact and coherent even when its activists appear to run into disputes.

Now, we are already clear on the aims of Radical Feminists. I have already described the plans they have for men and maleness. Radicals are content for all men to be exterminated or enslaved. They have openly declared war on men, and the future, if they get their way, can be summed up by the infamous pictures of Lynndie England, in her little soldier's outfit, sexually humiliating naked men, using dogs to attack their genitals, and so on. The Radical Feminist dreams of this abuse, not confined to an Iraqi prison, but normalized across the world. The victims would not be Iraqis, as Iraqis, but men, as men. Much like the Army personnel who imagined that they were delivering Collective Punishment to members of a collectively guilty class of people at Abu Ghraib, Radical Feminists believe in the concept of Collective Male Guilt,and in the necessity of delivering punishment to all men.

In the Radical Feminist mind, all men are guilty, inherently, as men. "All men are rapists" is not just a relic of the past; it is the horizon that Radical Feminism is pushing us towards. By this, I do not mean that all men will become rapists, but that all men will beindicted as rapists. Any punishment, then, no matter how extreme, will become justified against this class of heinous abusers and violators. (Note that, in one of the Abu Ghraib torture pictures, the soldiers have written "I am a rapeist (sic)" onto the thigh of one of their victims – even though it was the soldiers themselves who were carrying out the rapes. The parallel to Radical Feminism is chilling.)

We know this about Radical Feminists, but what about those who "aren't like that" – namely, the Earnest Feminists? It is true enough that many, perhaps most, Earnest Feminists do not look forward to a future in which men are enslaved or exterminated. Their role is not to dispossess men and shove them into prisons, but to convince us that there is no sex war. Even as men are imprisoned, tortured and murdered by state agents acting in the name of feminism, Earnest Feminists will pretend that there is not a war happening. Indeed, the effectiveness of the feminist project depends on the misperception that a war is not happening. They frame this desperate situation as something other than it is: progress towards equality, opening up dialogues, liberating people from restrictive gender roles, and so on.

No. This is a war, and it is one that feminists have openly declared. The true insidiousness of feminists becomes most apparent when we consider that, having declared war, they proceeded to demand that their enemy combatants show them respect, continue to protect them, and provide for their wellbeing. The duplicitousness in pretending that a war is not happening even as one wages it is a necessary element of the feminist way of war. Chivalry must be sustained if feminism is to advance. Women's wellbeing must remain a priority for men. If it is not – if men en masse suddenly became cognizant of the war that has been declared on them, they would organize and found permanent initiatives to defend themselves. They would seek to remove female privilege. There would be no guarantee that they would stop once parity has been restored to men and women, but could even continue to pushagainst women – it is difficult to know what would happen in such a situation!

A sex war, fought in traditional warlike style, in which men showed up to fight in the same numbers as women, would undoubtedly result in male victory, owing to men's physical strength and aptitude for technical mastery. A war fought in traditional style, then, would be a losing strategy for feminists. They must wage war in a different way, which necessarily involves the active denial that war is happening. But what about the very language of "the gender war"? Was this not born of feminist rhetoric? It was, indeed, but it belongs to that period of recent history before men were willing to stand up for themselves. Men began standing up to misandry at a critical point of feminist development – that point when explicit hatred reached an apex then quickly died down. The 'third wave' was born. Ostensibly a new version of feminism, the only real difference between the third and previous 'waves' is the level of rhetorical discipline. No more do we hear of a war against men (at least, not from the Earnest Feminists), and yet the war continues unabated. And when men react to the war against them, as though it is a war, they are informed that feminism is just about equality, and the act of fighting back against their persecutors makes them horrible misogynists.

After tearing apart entire cities and cultures, after having ground countless men down beneath their tank treads, the feminist army is confronted by one man who has picked up a rock, ready to throw it. Teary-eyed, her lower lip trembling, the batallion leader cries out, "stop being so hateful!"

The transition from second to third wave has not made feminism any less hostile or hateful. This was a superficial change, a rhetorical rejigging – the plastering of makeup onto the public face for public consumption. While the feminists of the second wave openly admitted to hating all men, modern day Earnest Feminists recognize certain categories of men who are not deserving of hatred – conjuring up exceptions to more easily maintain the general rule. Earnest Feminists are less likely to say "I hate men," and are more likely to say "I only hate those men who are abusive or not active against abusive men." Still, this is practically all men. Men who are neither abusive nor active against abusive men are the hated vast majority – the general rule. Of course, there are innumerable reasons why a man might not devote his time to being active against abusive men – he might not even have that free time, unlike your typical college feminist. We need not explore the reasons why a man would not be actively against abusive men. It suffices to say that he has no moral obligation to be, particularly since war has been declared on him, and the very people he is being called on to protect are those who wish to destroy him. It is pure female entitlement – Gynocentric privilege – to expect that men should act as their personal bodyguards. And those men who are active against abusive women are not admired for their contributions to humanity, of course – they are hated all the more for it.

Earnest Feminists are not necessarily conscious of their role as denialists. They do not need to be. They fulfil the role just as effectively when they believe themselves to be something else. It might be thought, then, that Earnest Feminists have been misguided, manipulated even, by the Radicals. But keep in mind that they are only as Earnest as they are Feminist. Yes, they are still feminists, and have not been 'tricked' into this identity. It is an identity freely chosen. The Earnest Feminist, remember, stands side by side with the Radical; the former too will Kafka-trap you, she will falsely accuse you, she will tar your sex with one broad stroke. The difference between Earnest and Radical Feminists can be summed up as follows: while the Radical openly encourages and celebrates the spreading of misandry, the Earnest Feminist trivializes, excuses and justifies it. Beyond this, there is no difference, and both seek to increase the power of women over that of men.

Without the Earnest Feminist's false demeanor of reasonableness, feminism would have made no progress. As counter-feminists, we must recognize that the appearance of reasonableness from anybody identifying as 'feminist' is a ruse. Behind the façade is ideological motive, not the capacity for compromise; the desire to dominate discussion, not to work towards collective solutions; anti-male emotionalism, not impartial rationality. One typical Earnest Feminist ploy is to cry "try to see things from my perspective" – implying fairness, neutrality, objectivity, and so on. And yet she has no intention of trying to see things from your perspective, because you are not a feminist, and non-feminist perspectives are by definition illegitimate. What she means is not "let's both try to see things from each others' perspectives," but "I'll see things from my perspective; you see things from my perspective too."

Earnest Feminists exercise a form of control that Radicals cannot, because the latter have abandoned all pretence to impartiality. For Earnest Feminists, this is only a pretence, because the ideology trumps all. Only a 'compromise' which fully adheres to feminist doctrine could be acceptable.

Of course, certain Earnest Feminists go further than this, and imply that they have already incorporated mens' perspectives into their programme: "feminism helps men too!" It's a fair bet that you'll never hear Radicals uttering such nonsense, because harming men is their conscious intention and one that they are open about. Still, the Earnest Feminists might genuinely believe that this is an accurate statement, as they are not necessarily conscious of the harmful effects that feminism necessarily has on men.

But this does not make it sincere. A sincere approach to “helping men too” would involve actually asking men how they might best be helped, and then incorporating these answers into the agenda. Instead, Earnest Feminist practice involves telling men what will help them, without deeming it necessary to canvass any more than a handful of marginal pro-feminist males.

The feminist idea of “help” is rooted in Patriarchy Theory – that is, it is rooted in the same animosity towards men which is the cause of the problems that a sizable number of men actually identify as problems. To put it another way, the cure is just more of the disease. Given that feminists fundamentally cannot accept the culpability of their own movement in causing or contributing towards anything negative, they will only ever locate the cause of men’s problems in social phenomena which are not feminism.Feminism will not accept even the smallest share of the blame for the oppressive conditions it has brought directly into existence. Men’s problems may only be traced back to men themselves, and hence to historical Patriarchy.

It is for this reason that, when Earnest Feminists claim that feminism “helps men too,” you do not then see them lobbying against false rape accusations or for equal paternity rights. On the contrary, that kind of lobbying would damage feminist interests; men are of secondary concern, and may only be helped up from those problems that they have caused for themselves. Hence, the terrible tragedy of men not being allowed to wear dresses, even while women can comfortably walk around in pants, is infallibly the number one priority of an Earnest Feminist who sets out to “help men too.” The fact that the overwhelming majority of men do not care about this issue and are not personally affected by it is irrelevant; it can be traced back to an impression of Patriarchy, and is also a good excuse to promote emasculation. Earnest Feminists, like Radicals, pathologize normal masculinity. They blame men for not wanting to wear dresses; i.e. they blame men for not having the problems that they tell us we should have. It is, so they say, male-enforced social conditioning that makes men “afraid” of appearing feminine. All evidence suggests that the vast majority of men have greater problems than this, and do not live in fear of appearing feminine. But that’s what fits the feminist narrative.

The notion that feminism is helping to “liberate both sexes from rigid gender roles” is particularly laughable, considering that feminism is entirely dependent upon men being forced to retain their traditional role of protector and provider. That has been covered elsewhere.

When men do attempt to raise their own concerns, feminists refuse to recognize them. They victim-blame – e.g. “men are responsible for their own problems” – and attempt to shift discussion back to what they think our problems should be. In effect, men are denied the right to decide what their own problems are. Our real problem, Earnest Feminists earnestly explain, is that we are just too male.Despite what we may claim our problems are – that maleness is increasingly curtailed, that maleness is pathologized, that maleness has become grounds for acceptable discrimination – the feminist response is that maleness actually is pathological and needs to be curtailed even further.

How is it that feminism “helps men,” by ascribing negative attributes to maleness? Tell me, was anybody ever helped by others ascribing negative attributes to him? Or would you say that this harms him? Feminism “helps men” by encouraging them to stop being men; to renounce their nature; to hate themselves; to believe that their sexuality is inherently flawed and a force for evil. What help this is!

Here’s a fun little juxtaposition:

“What it boils down to is this: Men, not women, need to be the ones creating the spaces to discuss men’s issues.”

Quote from finallyfeminism101 weblog

Video: Feminists Disrupt a Forum About Battered Husbands

Get the picture? It’s a game that law enforcement have been playing for decades. The ‘good cop’ is reasonable, even sympathetic, though of course, he insists that the responsibility for your crime rests entirely with you. The ‘bad cop’ will just scream at you until you give yourself up. And when you finally do just give up, because you’ve been ground down, you mutter your complaints, and the good cops over at finallyfeminism101 will remind you of what they said all along: that you need to be the one taking responsibility for discussing your own issues. See how that works? It’s not their fault. It’s yours.

Yes, Earnest Feminists have supported Radical proposals every step of the way – whether this involves denying men paternity rights, or creating rape shield laws to deny exculpatory evidence and more efficiently lock up innocent men, or diverting stimulus packages from men hit by recession to women who had not even lost their jobs. The only level at which Earnest Feminists disagree significantly with Radicals is the rhetorical. A Radical might say “kill all men,” and an Earnest Feminist might say “I don’t agree with that,” but she will go ahead and advocate that the healthcare gap be increased further, with the full knowledge that men continue to die earlier and suffer worse health overall.

Earnest Feminists distance themselves from the extremist rhetoric of the Radicals, but this is just how the dialectic works – you reach the goal slowly, bit by bit, by getting the other side to compromise with your moderate wing. Earnest Feminists are the good cops – the ones you want to strike a deal with before those nasty bad cops get back. What’s often missed is that they are all cops. Compromise with the moderate Earnest Feminists on one issue, and the centre ground shifts: now the deal you struck is taken for granted, and the radical fantasy is a step closer. What do Earnest Feminists do then? Rest on their laurels, content with the compromise they reached? No, they see the opportunity to get even more for women, and so they advocate for more. A compromise is reached again, and the centre ground shifts further towards radicalism.

Fortunately, I know of a way to break a dialectic, and that is to plant your feet firmly in the ground and refuse to budge an inch. Absolutely refuse to compromise on any issue. It’s as simple as that. Just keep in mind that behind the veneer of reasonableness is ideological motive, which will shift reality closer to the radical fantasy in which you are actively persecuted. If you can keep that in mind, it becomes very easy to refuse even the slightest compromise with a feminist.

Ultimately, feminists should be ignored. There is no use attempting to debate them, because their ideological motive trumps the possibility of admitting wrongness. Remember that feminist ideology is adopted in order to satiate violent, vindictive emotions, not as a result of logical thought. Those we should make an effort to appeal to are non-feminists, but they are not counter-feminists. That is, they are not yet activated in the struggle against feminism. One could split people up into three categories as follows:

> • Revolutionaries (counter-feminists)
> • Reactionaries (feminists)
> • Civilians (non-feminists)

The goal, then, is to recruit civilians to the counter-feminist side before the feminist camp gets to them. Given the rapid and exponential growth of the Men's Rights Movement, we are clearly already enjoying success in this regard.

A Father Burns Himself to Death

---

Our culture's war against men has reached a point where individual men have begun to burn themselves to death.

On June 15, a New Hampshire man named Thomas Ball doused himself in gasoline, and set himself on fire, and died.

The most remarkable thing about this, is not that a man was so brutalized by the family court system that self immolation seemed a logical choice to him, but that this story is not on the front page of every news site in North America. The carnage of a feminized family court system written on pavement in charred flesh, melted human body fat and blood.

A Google search for the name of the man who burned himself to death on the steps of a New Hampshire courthouse should return news stories about this event from CNN, MSNBC, AP, Reuters among others – but it does not. The story is not being reported by anyone except a few men's rights websites. Men's pain, it seems, even in such extremity of self immolation – is not worth any notice.

What will it take to wake people up? A man setting himself on fire in front of the courthouse where he was brutalized by a corrupt family court system is clearly not enough. The mainstream media is content to sweep this under the rug.

And if you're a men's or a father's rights activist – you might wonder – what possible step can anyone take beyond burning yourself to death on the steps of the courthouse – that may penetrate the systematic wall of denial and silence surrounding the ongoing and escalating reduction of men from a status as humans, to slaves, appliances and objects. How much louder can we scream our pain? A reading of Thomas Ball's last words to the world provides a glimpse.

On one hand we have the law. On the other hand we have what we are really going to do- the policies, procedures and protocols. The rule of law is dead. Now we have 50 states with legal systems as good as any third world banana republic. Men are demonized and the women and children end up as suffering as well.

So boys, we need to start burning down police stations and courthouses. The Second Set of Books originated in Washington. But the dirty deeds are being carried out by our local police, prosecutors and judges. These are the people we pay good money to protect us and our families. And what do we get for our tax money? Collaborators who are no different than the Vichy of France or the Quislings of Norway during the Second World War. All because they go along to get along. They are an embarrassment, the whole lot of them. And they need to be held accountable. So burn them out

I'll state something clearly before continuing this article. At the self-immolation of a father because he was so brutalized that a death by burning was his last option – I am not shocked, or surprised, or outraged. I passed the point of outrage years ago.

I am entirely calm as I read about a man burning himself to death to make a political point. I'm also not upset to see the media completely ignore what should be a giant, scream red nuclear warning sign. I'm unruffled as I read the carefully written words of the late Mr Ball, echoing my own predictions – made in an article published on AVFM on April 15 this year.

This must be stated clearly, because critics of my argument will seize on a prediction of violence and characterize that prediction as threat. I regard violence as a bad outcome to be avoided, I abhor its use, and I definitely don't call for it.

But it's coming.

And the only people trying to stop it before we reach a point of improvised public executions, burning legislature buildings and lamp posts decorated with freshly hung corpses are being routinely and falsely accused of violent criminality by the ideologues pushing for this terrible, brutal outcome. [full article]

Will that wake anybody up? Or, will the complicit media and public depict a society coming unglued as just more feminist evidence of the innate evil of the penis?

At what point do feminists themselves recognize that their precious ideology is one of hatred and violence?

Will you read Thomas Ball's words – and will you recognize that he was a rational, intelligent man pushed beyond human endurance by a corrupt system of feminist-jurisprudence apartheid? Or will you dismiss him as a kook?

If it's the latter – you are in for a terrible surprise.

The family courts have got to GO and I mean right fucking now

June 16, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

I had the pleasure today of participating in the Ultimate Men's Summit, where I spoke with Lion Goodman about some of the issues faced by men and boys in western culture.

Naturally, the subject of family law was addressed and the basics that most readers of AVfM are well aware of were covered.

During the interview, Mr. Goodman made the inquiry about why there is so much anger in men in the men's rights movement. I can't fault him for asking. I think he is a good person, and in a world where the pain of men is invisible it must be one hell of a mind-fuck trying to make sense of why so many of us are pissed, and getting more so.

But I have just been advised of something that might help explain the matter with a little more impact, at least to those who have any sense of decency and justice at all.

This is just a partial clip of a letter sent to the New Hampshire Sentinel Source that Mr. Tom Ball, a man who has been through the ringer of family courts in Cheshire Country, New Hampshire in recent times. The tone of it is clearly angry.

Said Mr. Ball:

I could have made a phone call or two and borrowed the money. But I am done being bullied for being a man. I cannot believe these people in Washington are so stupid to think they can govern Americans with an iron fist. Twenty-five years ago, the federal government declared war on men. It is time now to see how committed they are to their cause. It is time, boys, to give them a taste of war.

This was part of a much, much lengthier letter, and came to them some time before Mr. Ball approached the country courthouse steps, and set himself on fire.

Does this make the pain a little clearer?

I know what is expected in this culture. I am supposed to express some form of outrage. I am supposed to demand changes to the system and justice for men. I am supposed to bemoan a biased system and the lost rights of fathers in this country. I do exert all that for now. I do so from the bottom of my heart.

But I am also tired. I am an older man and have witnessed this silent, ignored tragedy for far too long. I am sick and tired of the heartbreak of daily emails from broke, abused, powerless people pleading for any kind of help they can get against a system that has lost all sense of justice and every last bit of justification for its own existence.

I am tired of telling them there is nowhere to turn.

I am a pacifist. I do not advocate violence. But I tell you this. The day I see one of these absolutely incredulous excuses for a judge dragged out of his courtroom into the street, beaten mercilessly, doused with gasoline and set afire by a father who just won't take another moment of injustice, I will be the first to put on the pages of this website that what happened was a minor tragedy that pales by far in comparison to the systematic brutality and thuggery inflicted daily on American fathers by those courts and their police henchmen.

It would not even so much be a tragedy as the chickens coming home to roost. And it is certainly less of an indecency than the suicide of Tom Ball.

This is a system beyond redemption and beyond repair. It is a cancer that must be cut out with focus and intent.

Whether that happens under the reasonable control of a government that manages to find some long absent decency, or at the hands of a mob when the time comes that men are not satisfied with just setting themselves on fire, remains to be seen.

But either way it will happen. It has to. This sort of thing cannot be allowed to continue.

Roosters Behaving Badly, Hens Cheeping Loudly

June 17, 2011 | by B.R. Merrick | Link | Original Link

This guy named Meredith Wilson wrote a musical called "The Music Man," a show about a huckster who falls in love with a sensible woman, and she in love with him, in spite of his many faults. He eventually repents of his dishonesty, when love and volition are allowed to peacefully intercede. A man who doesn't need to be browbeaten or shamed to change for the better. Amazing.

At one point in the theatrical proceedings, the town's chattering class (all female) gossip around the conman. The gossip quickly turns into a song (This is a musical, after all.), as the ladies sing:

Pick a little, talk a little
Pick a little, talk a little Cheep! Cheep! Cheep!
Talk a lot
Pick a little more

Pick a little, talk a little
Pick a little, talk a little Cheep! Cheep! Cheep! Cheep! CHEEP! Cheep! Cheep! Cheep!…

This is Wilson's clever way of setting the ladies' gossip to music, by making a reference to hens, for some reason… It'll come to me.

Anyway, the reason I bring up "The Music Man" is because it reminds me of something trivial I bothered to read at The Huffington Post. You've heard of the Huffington Post, haven't you?

Huff a little, puff a little
Huff a little, puff a little Bitch! Bitch! Bitch!
Puff a lot
Huff a little more

I'm sure you've also heard of Marlo Thomas, otherwise known as Mrs. Donahue. Thomas has something to pick at, due to a handful of politicians and alpha males who got caught, or merely accused, during this past month of various sexual, financial, and political shenanigans. You can be certain that Thomas is having a field day with it. She can afford to. In the long run, the culture upon which Thomas, you, and I have come to depend, cannot.

Thomas's article was on a page with a link to the following: "Hot or Not? Why Women Shouldn't Pick Attractive Husbands." In this article, we learn that "[a]ttractive men don't make the best husbands, according to researchers." Of course, the author, one Vicki Larson ("Cheep! Cheep! Cheep!"), never bothers to define "attractive," nor did the “researchers” ever prove objective attractiveness. I myself find regular guys quite attractive, much more than male models and the shaved Greek gods of mainstream porn. I’m not sure that I care to know what Ms. Larson or the researchers think is attractive. I have a sinking feeling it comes with a detachable penis.

The computers at which these two women pick and talk were designed, built, and shipped to their doors by men. Furthermore, those computers are connected to the Internet, a cybernetic phenomenon that comes as close as any material thing can come to existing in the abstract; and it was also designed by men. The materials used to make computers and the Internet come out of the earth, dug into by men. (Oddly, even though there are few impediments left, to this day the women still don’t feel like digging. “Cheep! Cheep! Cheep!”)

The good news is: I think I’ve stumbled upon a female Internet writer who understands a lot of what I see. I now visit Lenore Skenazy’s website, “Free Range Kids,” on a regular basis. (Not a single “Cheep!” from her.) I already got one article out of it, and it won’t be the last. Mrs. Skenazy, sadly, is a dying breed of woman. Like my own mother, she does not feel the need to know every second exactly where her boys are. She caused an uproar for letting one of her sons take the New York subway by himself. Strangely, no men molested him during the ordeal. Mrs. Skenazy caught flak anyway. Stranger still, she stood up for herself, and gave the world a cornucopia of statist insanity with her wonderful website. Stay tuned for more profanity-laden diatribes written by yours truly, based on this woman’s work. (Love the glasses!)

Here’s a recent post about one mother’s legal struggle to help her son Ricky. (Thus, Skenazy is on the exact same page as Mr. Elam.) As a recap, this young man followed his bodily instincts and had sex with a young woman he thought was only one year younger than he. Unfortunately, like arbitrary speed limits, her age did not equal the arbitrary number the sclerotic, puritanical, feminized state came up with for “consensual sex,” and Ricky’s family was sent on a four-year spiral, including his tenacious mother’s sudden blindness, before a teenaged male could be considered innocent (sort of) by the state that ostensibly exists to protect him. From terrorists! The mother’s fight paid off for Ricky at least partially, and I’m sure he will never forget it. Now her fight goes on for other innocent young men and their mothers:

“The moms called Mary [Ricky’s mom] for strength. She listened, offered some bracing words, maybe snorted with gallows humor and told them to call her again anytime. ‘That mom who was suicidal? She’s finally coming out of it,’ said Mary, sounding damn pleased. ‘She’s getting ready to fight.’”

Sadly, Mary is now in a coma. That’s one less fighting mom in a culture run by horrid women like Marlo Thomas, whose snotty sermon barely contains her glee over a month of “salacious spring scandals,” including the foregone conclusion that the head of the IMF is already guilty of attempted rape, even though he has not been convicted in a court of law, and even though both Thomas and her husband, Mr. Thomas, allegedly believe that we are all innocent until proven guilty. (Of course, that point will be moot with the Thomases if Mr. IMF is "proven" guilty.)

The Internet is a marvel of a communication tool, one that wouldn't have happened without the rapid advancement of technology in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, all on the backs of men. This permanent transformation of our planetary existence would most likely never have occurred if it hadn't been for Enlightenment principles, trumpeted to the world by male philosophers, including one who was almost executed for speaking his mind. After all this effort — groaning, sporadic, unpredictable, astounding — all that women supposedly have to offer, according to the writings of prominent feminists like Thomas, is "Cheep! Cheep! Cheep!"

Why not pick at this? (My thanks to Chris Floyd for that link, a man rightly concerned with empire and war, and the far more legitimate concerns of suffering women whom Thomas hasn't mentioned yet):

"As you may know the oppressors in Bahrain are targeting professional women arresting [sic] from their places of work or study. Many have disappeared into military style prisons and have not had access to lawyers or their families. The few who have been released report sexual attacks, verbal and physical insults and threats and other forms of torture… You will note that one of those arrested is a pregnant woman who happens to be the wife of an activist. Many others are young women in their early 20s. One of these young ladies is a poet and a student teacher who was arrested after four of her brothers were threatened at gunpoint to turn their sister in. No other Arabic regime has used torture and arrest against women to crush protests in this systematic and brutal manner. Yet media outlets in the west and Al Jazeera Arabic are largely silent on these abuses in stark and shameful contrast to the coverage given to other protests [emphasis mine, since Thomas didn't even bother]."

Too hellish? Well, then, perhaps Thomas can rally her feminist friends in the aid of a truly inspiring woman like Sharon Secor, who is in a slightly less nightmarish position. Ms. Secor is one of the assistant editors at Strike The Root (for which I also write), a homeschooling mom, and a one-of-a-kind, formerly single mother by choice. That's right. She didn't stick any man that impregnated her with any baggage, though. She understands freedom and consequences. You can chide her all you like for consciously choosing to raise children without a father (although she is married now), but she simply wants to be left alone with her little family.

Unfortunately, the Free-and-Nanny State of Texas, perched on top of abysmal schools where mostly women teach, can't bear the idea of women (the kind that don't suffer from The Patriarchy) raising kids who think for themselves. They keep reminding us it's the National Organization for Women, not of Women; therefore, since Secor is a woman, go for it.

…We're waiting. When will you be finished with the picking and the talking?

If women who suffer at the hands of the state aren't to your taste, what about acknowledging that the "bad behavior" of men is not that much different from women? Here's a woman allegedly doing something similar to the IMF dude, to a 10-year-old girl and 18-year-old woman:

"When interviewed by investigators, reports state that Pagoria [the alleged dominatrix] explained that she used to spank the girls, but 'the spankings had not improved their behavior.'

"She switched to the table and handcuffs after 'she decided she needed to do something that would embarrass them so they would learn not to break the rules again,' the report states." Yes, spanking is a wonderful idea.

Will Thomas be speaking out about this? Will she post pictures of girls and young women between the ages of 10 and 18 angrily protesting outside the courthouse before this woman has her day in court? Can I use this in a rant against our misandric culture, or is it all the boyfriend's fault?

"After the whippings, Pagoria explained that the girls were forced to stand naked in the corner 'so that they could reflect on what they had done wrong,' according to the report." Bradley Manning, anyone?

Oops. That's a guy. Sorry. How about this one, about a woman who refused to feed her teenaged son for 12 hours a day? Just a quickie, I promise: "Weed testified that Alfred believed her son to be possessed by Satan." Well, then, allow me to supplicate our Lord on his behalf: Jesus H. Christ!

The reader should keep in mind that I remain, to this day, an unrepentant lazy-ass doofus who does very little research. Imagine what I could come up with if I actually made an effort. Will Mrs. Non-Donahue Thomas, a woman who apparently does even less research, concede on any one of these?

The cycle of abuse repeats and repeats and repeats, like a bad meal, because the culture vaunts silly-headed women who can "Cheep! Cheep! Cheep!" with the best of them, and ignores a truly intelligent woman like Alice Miller, who pointed all of this out time and time again, and was apparently ignored by the Thomases running the show.

If Marlo Donathomas truly cared about women who were raped; or "victims" of an online flashing; or "victims" of some rich-hunk-of-a-famous-dude writhing around on top of them, his perfect musculature moving in synchronicity as a reminder of The Patriarchy's true power; she would spend roughly five minutes investigating root causes of why humans — not men — occasionally behave badly. She would also take careful note of the differences that are oftentimes expressed through masculine bad behavior vs. feminine bad behavior.

I'm supposed to be concerned about your "gorgeous" husband? Why? I'm supposed to be outraged over women "victimized" by horny politicians? How so? I'm supposed to condemn a man before attempted rape has been proven because Western culture, according to Thomas, has programmed women to be silent? Really?

Then please explain to me how E.M. Forster, a guy, was able to write "A Passage to India" in 1924. If you haven't read the book or seen the brilliant film, an entire community of British settlers in India (a community run and maintained largely by men) rallies around a young woman who, due to some sort of heat sickness, mistakenly believes that her kindly Indian companion tried to rape her. Granted, this is fiction, but how was a writer like E.M. Forster able to conceive of a community's extraordinarily charitable reaction to a young woman's plight with such ease, and be understood by readers at that time? Yet Thomas asserts: "Historically, women who have been victimized by men — whether by a sexually harassing boss or a philandering husband — were trained to hit the mute button." Perhaps that should read: "…were trained to hit the mute button, except in British India."

You can thank this rhetoric — relentless, hyperbolic, shrill, and heavily televised — for teenaged young men being labeled for life. The more of them that feel sidelined, the more of them will be brought up without fathers. The more of them fatherless, the more the state will step in, especially when surrounding women start shrieking. Then we will see more posts from Mrs. Skenazy like the following, concerning kids who cannot play outside legally without the presence of at least one parent: "The officer said that kids under ten, by law, are not allowed outside, unsupervised except in their parents' yard." British India it ain't. Somebody tell Marlo. She and Mr. Thomas-Donahue will get right on it.

It used to be that Dad made the rules, and if he said you couldn't be outside unsupervised, chances are you lived in a really lousy neighborhood. Everything the state does is a bastardization at best of normal human relationships. This is why it's a mistake to involve the state's particularly pernicious form of coercion into any aspect of existence: marriage, divorce, custody, sex, rape, molestation, pornography, prostitution, drugs, finances, the workplace, education, justice, restitution, and everything else. These are matters to be taken care of in private. The state never really knew what privacy was, and now that the culture no longer seems to care, the state cares even less.

If "the personal" becomes "the political," there is no end to the pointing of guns, and it's only a matter of time before aggrieved individuals who are victimized by feminist/statist influence grab the same governmental guns and point them somewhere else. Feminists that don't need men will need the state, which is run by the worst sorts of men and women imaginable. Now the state is our father, and what a rotten dad he is. You can thank idiotic women like Thomas, and the alpha males who see the prize to be won inside the body of humanity. The natural power that men had within their own homes is gone, replaced by mindless pop culture, female hysteria unchecked, and a state that has a harder time convincing any thinking person of its actual necessity.

It's long past time for men and women everywhere to tell the gossiping hens to shut the cluck up. Meredith Wilson, unfortunately, was spot-on. Thus, while the women go on with "Cheep! Cheep! Cheep!", four men, forming a barbershop quartet, sing the following:

Good night, ladies.
Good night, ladies.
Good night, ladies.
We're going to leave you now.

Good advice, from a man who knew a huckster when he saw one.

Beyonce Knowles is an MRA

---

I have never until now, been a fan of Beyonce. And to be completely honest – popular as it is, her music does not appeal to me. My musical tastes run in other directions. However, on the accidental viewing of a recent video of Beyonce's – I was pleased to discover that this entertainer, hugely popular with so many young women turns out to be an MRA. Not only is she clearly an advocate of men's rights – she – or her producers – have been reading my articles posted on AVFM.

Who run the world. Girls!

Apparently, Miss Knowles hasn't been drinking the feminist kool-aid which tells her she's oppressed, and in fact – is sharply aware of not just her own social and economic power due to the success of her musical career, but of the social power all women hold, based entirely on their sex.

The video opens with a scene shot in a near-future desert landscape – Beyonce riding through the frame on horseback – denoting herself as royalty above the un-mounted dancers and extras in every other scene of the video. The terrain is littered with the debris of an urban distopia – its a mad-max future – and Beyonce's character reminded me, on first viewing of Tina Turner in "Beyond Thunderdome".

The depiction is of a distopian future after a societal collapse – Beyonce as Auntie Entity ruling in the warlord model of regional government.

The future distopia imagery escalates with an early shot of several dozen armoured riot police rushing past the camera at about 20 seconds into the video – the shot cuts to Beyonce triumphally raising her arms from atop a burned out car. Clearly, she's read my piece called "Feminism is a Doctrine of violence" in which I stated:

Most of the violence promoted by, and enacted under the aegis of feminism is done on behalf of women, by proxy, at once or more removed from the instigator of the violence.

Women use the police as muscle to escalate a nonviolent disagreement to a violent altercation.

Beyonce's imagery also appears to acknowledge my discussion of riot police and feminist enforcers in "Feminism is Merely a Tool"

The video next presents Beyonce flanked by armoured enforcers exiting a 1980's model mercedes sedan. The intended feel is clearly tinpot-dictator-chic. Once deployed, Beyonce stands surrounded by a coterie of women, clad in matching pseudo-military club-attire. She and her exclusively female crew are extensively jewelled , and even have a lion – demonstrating conspicuous martial power and wealth.

The overstated jewellery sharpy contrasts the collection of men she stands facing.

The male dancers wear only black and gray, and by the facial expressions of the few male dancers shown in brief close up, the viewer is left in no doubt that the male dancers represent men disenfranchised through the use of force. Beyonce's dance moves are unmistakeably expressive of undiluted power and the expression of will through brute force.

Her female cohort stand while pumping their fists straight up. In fact – while facing the drably attired collection of male dancers – she Beyonce performs a dance that cant be called anything except mocking – but even in a music video – she's flanked by two male dancers who take positions on each side of her in front. Her disposable male protectors. It's easy to see that these men are female-approved white knights – because they're the only men in the video whose costumes include any colour or jewelry.

Who run the world. Girls.
Who run the world. Girls.
Who run the world. Girls.
Who run the world. Girls.

Some of them men think they freak this like we do.
but no they don't make your cheque come at they neck disrespect us no they wont."

At this point – we see Beyonce's recognition of men as the producers of wealth and labour.

"Make your cheque come at they neck". – These lyrics followed quickly by Beyonce shown taking the wallet out of a back-up-dancer's pocket while he cannot stop her. This is not feminism's message, it's the reality MRAs have written of for years.

Beyonce then struts around shoving and physically overpowering several male dancers – while singing the lines:

"Boy I'm just playing come here baby hope you still like me
if you hate me."

On which point the video depicts a riot control water-cannon – reminding the viewer that the female power she's singing about is totalitarian and built on the use of force. A close up shows Beyonce clad in a metallic garment made from diamond-shaped gold scales – a combination of conspicuous wealth and physical might. The backdrop of burning cars continues to re-enforce a distopian, mad-max world in which women -represented by Beyonce control all remaining power and wealth.

"endless power
our love we can devour"

There is no subtlety in the video.
In the face of triumphal demonstration of absolute social, financial, and violent power, Beyonce reminds us that men, contrary to a sensible response to their own continued marginalization are still following a path of chivalry – male self sacrifice on behalf of women.

“You’ll do anything for me”

It appears that Beyonce grasps and agrees with every major argument made by the majority of MRAs.

The only point of divergence from a MRA position is that in recognition of the social, financial, and enforced totalitarian power of females – with the disenfranchisement and marginalization of men, is that rather then seeing increasing sexual apartheid as a problem, she’s smug.

Setting aside the pretence that Beyonce Knowles is an MRA, or has even heard of the men’s rights movement – this woman is an entertainer – a singer and dancer. She clearly understands the shape of our culture – and by looking at just one video of hers, we can see that what shes saying and what MRAs are saying are almost identical. The difference is that for Beyonce female supremacy and male disenfrachisement is a good thing.

To the feminists arguing the opposite case – can you fucking people finally admit youre not merely wrong…

…you are liars.

A Father’s Day Letter to President Obama

June 17, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Dear President Obama,

As we quickly approach another Father’s Day in your administration, I recall that for the past two years running you have used the occasion to admonish fathers to “step up to the plate,” and be better Dads.

As I anticipate that you will seize the upcoming day as yet another opportunity to instill in men the important mandate to be the best they can be for their families, I wanted to suggest that you now have a prime example to present to the American people of a good man stepping up as a father.

His name is Thomas James Ball. And just two days ago he stepped up to the family courthouse in Cheshire County, New Hampshire and self-immolated.

Apparently being stripped of his family, his home, his assets, his dignity and his freedom by our system of family law did not leave room in his tortured mind to step up in any other way.

It is strangely ironic in a culture that routinely destroys men in this way, on the often capricious whims of wives who are enabled by a corrupt system of family law, that we also lead the world in politicians who lecture those victimized men on being good fathers and husbands.

Well, it is either ironic, or as profoundly sadistic as it is hypocritical.

With all respect, Mr. President, I suggest as your fellow citizen that perhaps the time has come for a different kind of stepping up. Perhaps it is time for our leaders to step up and look at what family courts are now doing to destroy children and their fathers, and how through Title IV-D they are motivated to do so by profit.

Perhaps it is time for politicians to step up and honestly assess the wholesale destruction of constitutional rights that is happening under the guise of family law.

Perhaps it is time to step up and publicly address the fact that Thomas James Ball was not crazy or violent or full of hate, but simply a man at the end of his rope, utterly destroyed by a system that has lost its moral compass as well as any affiliation with the idea of justice.

Perhaps it is time for all good citizens to step up and realize that the government tyranny now presiding over the destruction of families should no longer have a place on the American landscape.

Perhaps, Mr. President, the most important father that needs to step up and do his duty this Father’s Day is you.

Kind regards,

Paul Elam
Houston, Texas.

The Indifference to Male Pain

---

I am writing this on Friday June 18. Yesterday Paul and I both became aware of a man who after years of being brutalized by the family court system, decided to share his pain and outrage with the world, with the intent of shining a bright light on ongoing corruption and the systematic destruction of human beings by a corrupt court system.

The man's name was Thomas James Ball. He doused himself in gasoline then self immolated on the steps of a family courthouse in New Hampshire. Mr Ball chose to use his own agonizing death to focus public attention on the corruption of the family courts. He did this two days ago. And before just now, you have probably never heard of him.

The mainstream media has no interest in human suffering, when it belongs to a man.

How much personal agony, how many years of pain does a human have to endure before death by self immolation seems like a rational choice? And yes, I will stand on the word rational here. Mr Ball wrote a detailed account of his experience in the family court system, as well as a summary of his research, and his consequent deep understanding of the scope and depth of corruption driving the institution of the family courts. His letter is linked in the masthead of this site – and I strongly recommend you read it. Its long, but its not rambling – and anybody who calls it rambling is doing so to discredit and belittle this man, and to distract you from the very real pain produced in the lives of millions by a corrupt court system.

But everything Ive just written is preamble to the real point I want to make.

Mr Ball's last words were originally published on the New Hampshire Sentinel Source website, and comments like the one I'm about to copy-paste were the norm on that site. This example was also re-posted by a failed example of a human on the copy of Thomas Ball's letter on this site.

"Let's remember folks, Tom Ball had 21 years in the military. He had a pension. So it is not just that he was without work since 2009. Again, he had a pension.

He did do some good work volunteering time helping homeless vets in Worcester… He should have stayed doing that, continuing to contribute to the world, instead of going out in a blaze of ….apparently in his mind… of glory…. His statement against feminists, social workers, bureaucracy…. No doubt problems there…. but to let his obsessions carry him away….

As a good soldier, he should have bucked up and dealt with it…. Endured …. pressed-on…. instead of what he did…
To me, he walked out on his responsibilities…. the money for his children's healthcare…And much more.
Dare I say it…. He is, in my opinion, a deadbeat dad…..Sorry, but that is my view of him after reading his manifesto…..Sorry…. But he hurled himself into the afterlife to make a statement,…. When his children and others (the vets) still needed him."

Let that sink in. For anybody in doubt about this comment, I'll explain.

That commenter was telling a man whose agony was so great that burning himself to death with gasoline was a viable option – telling such a man to suck it up and continue to be a utility and a resource to the system which brutalized him to an extent that a death by fire seemed rational.

Tough luck on your life Mr Ball, we do not recognize that you experience pain. Just suck it up; man up and carry on providing for the people around you.

The absolute indifference to human suffering would be immediately recognized as psychopathic if the pain belonged to anyone else – but when it's a man – our society just does not give a fuck.

The pain of a man is invisible.

And my friends – that is why there is such a thing as the men's rights movement. It is why so many men are in deep and terrible pain – pain that when mentioned or complained of, men are told: shut up, don't be a sissy, man up.

That indifference – is why many men and MRAs are deeply, implacably angry. Our society is presently on an insane course – because when confronted by any manifestation of this anger – the established response is to lock the man feeling it into a cage; to deny that it is legitimate, and refuse to address the source.

Does anybody think that can have any outcome except eventual disaster? Mr Ball – in his final essay provided an impassioned and rational imperative for burning courthouses and killing corrupt officials.

Are we going to pretend that he was a lone nut and that the agony which drove him to burn himself to death on the steps of a New Hampshire courthouse was not agony felt by hundreds of thousands of other men, also brutalized by a corrupt court system?

The comment – expressing indifference to this man's pain, and telling him to suck it up and go back to being a good little appliance – that comment represents dozens of others expressing the same sentiment. In the case of Mr. Ball, he demonstrated the control and restraint in all his agony that his rage was spent inwards against himself in a gruesome death. This too reflects the deeply embedded culture of self sacrifice that men are conditioned to believe is the only viable mode of masculinity.

But its not. Male self actualization is a major element of the men's rights movement, which may be one of the reason critics try so hard to shut us up. What if Mr. Ball had chosen to vent his agony outwards onto who he perceived as the source, the employees officers and physical premises of the family courts?

And to turn around and tell a man brutalized to the point of self immolation, to man up, suck it up? To any individual so indifferent to the pain of another human – expressing that callous indifference might seem funny. Cruelty substituting in place of humor.
The marginalization of men by the system of law is not getting better, it is getting worse – and the rage and agony of Mr. Ball was not unique.

And our society currently deals with this by locking such men up. Like that will make the problem smaller, or make it go away.

I wont tell you what to do, but I expect, what you're going to do is go back to sleep.

Go ahead, sleep while you still can

Study Reveals Female Rape Victims Enjoyed the Experience

June 19, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Editorial note: among the thousands of articles published over the years of AVfM's existence, a tiny handful are cited over and over again by dishonest critics of the Men's Human Rights Movement as 'typical" content for this publication. With about a thousand articles a year published on this site, it should be telling that only a small handful are cited over and over again as if they are typical, rather than unusual. This is one of those few articles.

This particular article, penned in mid-2011, was written to illustrate the still-common phenomena among gender ideologue "researchers" of incompetently or intentionally misusing scientific evidence: twisting statistics in an invalid manner, or worse, simply repeating statistics that have been disproven or were entirely fabricated, known as the woozle effect. The entire below article is nothing but an illustrative example of what Murray Straus identified as "Evidence by Citation" and other forms of academic fraud in widespread and unchallenged use by pseudoscientific ideologues with PhDs, and it quite clearly says so if you just read it to the end: this entire article is a bunch of fraudulent lies, meant to teach a lesson about just how gullible people can be and how easily they will accept horrible lies about male sexuality but get angry about lies regarding female sexuality.

What should also be instantly noticeable to you is that the odds are good if you found this link recently from a site that angrily linked it as "typical" of AVfM content, it is actually quite old; if it were "typical," why this same old article over and over and over again? And, right at the bottom, it has always stated quite clearly that the whole article is a satirical lie–and still, on a regular basis, people angrily refer to it as if it's a serious article that reflects our everyday views. What this says about our attitudes about male vs. female sexuality, and just how gullible people can be when presented with information that looks scientific, and just how shallow and/or dishonest our critics seem to be, should give thoughtful readers pause.

The original article–which again, is nothing but a pack of lies, and which the very last paragraph explains to be nothing but lies–appears unaltered below this point. –Eds.

A university study, Romeo, Felicia F. "Acquaintance Rape on College and University Campuses," AAETS. Web. 22 Nov. 2010." The study of female rape victims concluded that the majority – 57% – of women who were raped on college campuses, reported feelings that were described as "positive" and "satisfied," about the experience.

The study reflected survey results of 1,700 victims of rape that was perpetrated by a male acquaintance in a social environment, also known as “date” rape.

A meta analytic review of related studies pointed to the validity of the Romeo study. Hoskins and Fisk, 2010.

Perhaps surprising in the survey results was the fact that nearly 38% of the respondents reported a desire to repeat the experience, some obsessively so.

This would also be quite consistent with findings outlined in an article from Psychology Today, regarding the prevalence and incidence of rape fantasies in women, much of which are quite extreme and violent.

From the article:

From 1973 through 2008, nine surveys of women’s rape fantasies have been published. They show that about four in 10 women admit having them (31 to 57 percent) with a median frequency of about once a month. Actual prevalence of rape fantasies is probably higher because women may not feel comfortable admitting them.

For the latest report (Bivona, J. and J. Critelli. “The Nature of Women’s Rape Fantasies: An Analysis of Prevalence, Frequency, and Contents,”Journal of Sex Research (2009) 46:33), psychologists at North Texas University asked 355 college women: How often have you fantasized being overpowered/forced/raped by a man/woman to have oral/vaginal/anal sex against your will?

Sixty-two percent said they’d had at least one such fantasy. But responses varied depending on the terminology used. When asked about being “overpowered by a man,” 52 percent said they’d had that fantasy, the situation most typically depicted in women’s romance fiction. But when the term was “rape,” only 32 percent said they’d had the fantasy. These findings are in the same ballpark as previous reports.

Clearly, there is much yet to be understood about women and their predilection for being physically overpowered and forced to engage in sexual activity in a violent way.

And it calls into question whether prevailing attitudes about rape may be convoluted due to a social taboo against the practice.

It may be time in modern culture where we need to start evaluating the possibility that women, through the cultural expression of patriarchy, may be unfairly restricted from articulating their desire to be raped, and as such cut off from the full actualization of their sexual freedom.

In another Psychology Today article on dealing with the sexual liberation of women, some aspects of repression were addressed.

From the article:

What caused the sexual revolution?

Many factors may have been implicated, such as improved contraception (the pill which gave women more control), but effective condoms had been widely used for a century. Marriage prospects and careers were the key. Women’s marriage prospects worsened steadily throughout the sixties and there were only 80 men of marriageable age for every 100 women (2) thanks to an echo effect of the baby boom a generation earlier. Women also postponed marriage as they developed careers.

The net result was a large and increasing population of women who were sexually active outside marriage. Facing stiffer competition for men, women upped the ante by offering increased levels of sexual intimacy outside marriage.

In addition to complying with the masculine desire for sex without strings, women today adopt a more masculine sensibility regarding issues of number of sexual partners, sexual variety, and sexual satisfaction.

And, in a related study by Kale and Weiser, 1998, it was suggested that the full actualization of that liberation would include the idea of women's pervasive rape fantasies being fulfilled spontaneously by men in their immediate environment.

On a more subjective note, this could be an explanation for the recurrent theme in feminist literature of "rape culture." It may well be that the outward obsession with this notion, in a culture that clearly condemns and punishes rape, may be a matter of projective denial reflecting a desire for an actual rape culture to emerge in order to fulfill women's unfulfilled sexual desires.

It also calls into question whether the concept of "consent," where it relates to sexual activity, is antiquated. Indeed it calls into question whether the concept of "rape," in the literal definition, is just a cultural misconception for a male tendency to fulfill women's desire for sexual excitement and thrills and women's collective desire to see this accomplished.

That would at least partly explain why there is currently far reaching efforts to broaden the definition of rape, given we interpret those efforts as an attempt to fulfill as many rape fantasies as possible.

All this should be considered, however, with the caveat that the Romeo study found no results whatsoever as presented in paragraphs 1 and 2 of this article, and the fact that the Kale & Weiser and Fisk studies are not extant.

These items, indeed this entire article, are illustrative examples of what Murray Straus identified as "Evidence by Citation" and other forms of academic fraud in widespread and unchallenged use by feminist ideologues. They were presented here as an example of their destructive use.

Happy Father's Day, You Piece Of Shit

June 19, 2011 | by Tom Snark | Link | Original Link

Hey, fathers!

It's your special day!

It's the one day of the year that we take a break from exalting mothers and actually acknowledge your contributions to creating life and raising children. (Well, all right, we acknowledge your contributions all year round when they are of the financial sort and we want you to pay up.)

So, how shall we celebrate this special day?

A new necktie, perhaps; a silk leash around your neck, a symbol of your bondage, just to make it perfectly clear what your family keeps you around for.

Along the same lines, how about a new wallet?

Or how about you just get called a piece of shit?

That's what Prime Minister David Cameron has done, in so many words.

> Runaway fathers are like drink-drivers, blasts David Cameron
> David Cameron is launching a full-scale attack on fathers who abandon their families – calling for them to be "stigmatised" by society in the same way as drink-drivers are.
> The Prime Minister's intervention – in an article for The Sunday Telegraph to mark Father's Day – is one of the most outspoken he has ever made in defence of traditional family life, which he describes as the "cornerstone of our society".
> Mr Cameron said Britain needs to be made a "genuinely hostile" place for runaway fathers, who deserve the "full force of shame heaped upon them" and are "beyond the pale".

So, on Father's Day, of all days, Cameron has launched an attack on absent fathers, without any thought given as to why fathers might become absent in the first place. And the reason for this has nothing to do with male fecklessness or irresponsibility, despite what traditionalists and feminists preach.

No, the reason why fathers leave their families is because they are forced out. Britain is already a genuinely hostile place for fathers, who have to deal with the full force of shame heaped upon them, and who are already seen as 'beyond the pale'.

Blaming men for being forced out of their own homes by ex-wives 'looking for a better deal' and the state mafia which Cameron himself ultimately controls is a whole new level of sick.

But, of course, there is rhetoric and then there is politic. The government is committed to making significant cuts all round, which means that the baby mammas won't be able to depend on the timely arrival of a welfare check as they once did. Cameron (or whoever writes his speeches) is not stupid; his government has already faced criticism and protest for scaling back public sector jobs and services. He knows that the clucking hens of Mumsnet could cost him the next election if he appears to be denying single mothers the cash they are accustomed to receiving.

So he covers his own ass by picking a target that he knows a lot of women love to hate: men.

And so the grand project of scapegoating men continues.

But, in regards to those men who have children and make no effort to be a father emotionally or to hand over their cash: can there be a moral case for blaming them, given that they have no reproductive rights to speak of?

Men cannot choose to terminate a pregnancy; whether or not a child is born is a decision left entirely up to the mother. It is entirely her choice; he has no rights, and no say on the matter.

But still, he will be expected to pay; even in the case that the mother commits fraud to access his frozen sperm without his permission and has children without telling him.

Even Keith Macdonald, dubbed "Britain's worst father" by the Daily Mail for fathering at least ten children by ten different women, did not choose to become a father.

So why should he be held financially responsible for the choices of their mothers?

Indeed, since no man has the right to have children, no man chooses to become a father.

> Another mother of one of his children, Stacey Barker, 22, said: 'Men like him should be made to have a vasectomy or be fined or even jailed.'
> The mothers are entitled to jobseekers' allowance, income support, child tax credit and child benefit. Most also get housing benefit.

Yes, a lot of women would rather subject a man to genital mutilation or debtor's prison, than give up the perks of single motherhood. And yet, these women all chose to have sex with this man; and they all chose to carry his children to term. While Keith Macdonald could have chosen not to have sex with the women, he had no choice about whether or not the children were born. Each of the women could have chosen to have an abortion; none of them did. So why should he pay a single penny for someone else's choices?

Speaking of debtor's prisons, they actually have those in the United States, for 'deadbeat dads' – a feminist slur against alienated fathers who lose their jobs and can no longer afford crippling child support bills. This is a particularly cruel slur given that feminists have actively kept unemployed men out of work:

> Originally, the "stimulus" (which was supposed to keep the official unemployment rate well below its current level) was supposed to be spent on infrastructure. The I-35W Mississippi River Bridge collapse in Minnesota in 2007 and the DC Metro crash earlier this year in June […] showed that spending on maintaining current and building new infrastructure has been insufficient for a > long time. The stimulus would have been a good opportunity to begin to correct this massive error as solid infrastructure is necessary for long term economic growth (not to mention safety), but womens' (such as NOW) groups objected. They called the original stimulus "burly", "macho", and "sexist" demanding that the stimulus be spent on women. This was despite the fact that millions of men were losing their jobs, and education and health care added jobs primarily benefiting women. NOW and the other womens' groups were successful with the stimulus was skewed towards education and health care leaving infrastructure in the same dangerous state it was before. In addition the gap between male and female unemployment is the largest in the history of unemployment data going back to 1948 when such data began.

> This "women oriented stimulus" along with other things has caused the federal deficit for this year to surpass 1.8 trillion dollars, far beyond the deficit of any previous year. This causes more men to be unemployed since this massive federal debt is sucking capital out of the private sector which destroys jobs. Literally, there is no capital for new business creation and business expansion that would create jobs.

Not content to keep men (many of whom are fathers owing child support) out of work, NOW has also been pushing to reduce the amount of owed child support needed to chuck an unemployed man in prison:

> RI NOW Supports
> Promoting Economic Justice
> Would decrease the amount of child support arrearage constituting a felony from $10,000 to $5,000

In feminist thinking, 'economic justice' equates to criminalising and imprisoning as many men as possible – particularly those already victimised by circumstance or the feminist groups themselves. There is a certain inefficiency to their cruelty, however, since a man's child support debts continue to accumulate while he sits in prison, obviously unable to work.

The feminists have a solution to this, though, and if you guessed slave labour camps, you would be right. I wish I was joking. I quote April McCaffery, who writes for Examiner as the LA single parenting correspondent:

> Deadbeats don't mind going to jail because then they have food and shelter paid for by YOUR tax dollars.
> Deadbeat dads should be forced into slave labor. It's the only possible solution that might actually lead to results.

Since we've moved onto America, how does the Premier of the most powerful country in the world acknowledge the role of fathers on Father's Day?

Well, typically, he uses the occasion to bash fathers. In 2008 he said the following:

> if we are honest with ourselves, we'll admit that what too many fathers also are is missing – missing from too many lives and too many homes. They have abandoned their responsibilities, acting like boys instead of men. And the foundations of our families are weaker because of it.
> We know the statistics – that children who grow up without a father are five times more likely to live in poverty and commit crime; nine times more likely to drop out of schools and twenty times more likely to end up in prison. They are more likely to have behavioral problems, or run away from home, or become teenage parents themselves. And the foundations of our community are weaker because of it.

Perhaps somebody should have mentioned to President Obama that around three quarters of divorces are initiated by women, who proceed to use the biased family court system to impoverish men and strip them of the right to even see their children. When the President blames a group of people for suffering at the hands of the state, it is hard not to see it as blatant oppression.

> We need fathers to realize that responsibility does not end at conception. We need them to realize that what makes you a man is not the ability to have a child – it's the courage to raise one.

More unconstructive 'man up' nonsense. More to the point, a man's responsibility does indeed end at conception. There are no responsibilities without corresponding rights, and a man has no rights over the foetus growing inside the mother's womb. The decision to keep or get rid of it is hers and hers alone, enshrined in law; that is a decision she has to make, based on the evidence at hand.

Will I be able to raise this child? Will I be able to if I am on my own? The failure to ask these questions of oneself does not mitigate one's moral obligations. Reproductive rights are entirely hers, and therefore so are reproductive responsibilities.

Obama continued to lecture fathers on the one day, in 2008, dedicated to them:

> our young boys and girls see that. They see when you are ignoring or mistreating your wife. They see when you are inconsiderate at home; or when you are distant; or when you are thinking only of yourself.

He even used the occasion to venerate mothers:

> We need to help all the mothers out there who are raising these kids by themselves; the mothers who drop them off at school, go to work, pick up them up in the afternoon, work another shift, get dinner, make lunches, pay the bills, fix the house, and all the other things it takes both parents to do. So many of > these women are doing a heroic job

We might compare this to his Mother's Day speech this year. Did he criticise feckless, gold-digging single mothers, and pay tribute to the struggles of fathers? Of course not. He venerated mothers again.

> On Mother's Day, we celebrate the extraordinary importance of mothers in our lives. The bond of love and dedication a mother shares with her children and family is without bounds or conditions. Whether an adoptive mom or grandmother, mother or partner, the women who raise us show us that no hurdle is too high, and no dream is beyond our reach. As sons and daughters, we show our gratitude for the women in our lives who care for us, shape our values, and set us on the path to a limitless future.
> Throughout our history, mothers have made remarkable sacrifices for the well-being of their loved ones […] Mothers are the rocks of our families and a foundation in our communities. In gratitude for their generous love, patient counsel, and lifelong support, let us pay respect to the women who carry out the hard work of motherhood with skill and grace, and let us remember those mothers who, though no longer with us, inspire us still.

Notably, he has not taken the opportunity of Father's Day this year to chastise fathers. A part of me likes to believe that the storm kicked up by the Men's Rights Movement after his previous speeches attacking fathers has persuaded him to tone it down somewhat. Rather than speaking of 'deadbeat dads', he refers to fathers serving abroad in the armed forces, and those who have lost jobs in the recession (in some cases thanks to him caving in to feminist demands to redirect that stimulus package, although he curiously omits this one detail). All in all, this year's speech is a lot more positive towards fathers than those of past years, but he still holds back from really giving fathers their due; compare it to the Mother's Day speech cited above.

So, back to David Cameron. Attacking fathers on Father's Day is a pretty disgusting thing to do, not to mention cynical. He is attempting to deflect blame from government by stirring up hatred towards common men – always an easy target. And yet, men cannot honestly be held morally responsible for creating children until they actually have the right to do so.

This old article sums up the position of Legal Choice For Men:

> Contending that women have more options than they do in the event of an unintended pregnancy, men's rights activists are mounting a long shot legal campaign aimed at giving them the chance to opt out of financial responsibility for raising a child.
> The gist of the argument: If a pregnant woman can choose among abortion, adoption or raising a child, a man involved in an unintended pregnancy should > have the choice of declining the financial responsibilities of fatherhood.

> “There’s such a spectrum of choice that women have — it’s her body, her pregnancy and she has the ultimate right to make decisions,” said Mel Feit, director of the men’s center. “I’m trying to find a way for a man also to have some say over decisions that affect his life profoundly.”

For as long as men lack reproductive rights, and for as long as we allow women to force men to become fathers when they do not want to, then of course we are going to have ‘feckless, irresponsible, deadbeat dads’ – although I don’t blame them, and I won’t call them that. I will call them victims of fraud and financial manipulation. Consenting to sex is not the same as consenting to fatherhood, and any man who has not consented to the latter owes the world nothing.

And that’s why Legal Choice For Men seems reasonable to me. A woman does not ‘abort’ the baby so much as she ‘aborts’ herself from a lifestyle she does not want. Why should a man not have the right to an ‘abortion’ on the same grounds? In that case, inviolable contracts could be drawn up, prior to the birth of the child (or even prior to conception) in which the father signs up to fatherhood. If he doesn’t sign, he can’t be held liable, because it was never his choice to have a child; thus there can be no grounds for requiring him to sweat and toil for the mother’s sake.

Strange how feminists are unwilling to commit to this version of ‘my body, my choice’.

Happy Father’s Day!

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier on A Voice for Men Radio

June 19, 2011 | by Dr. Tara J. Palmatier | Link | Original Link

---

Dr Tara J. Palmatier of Shrink4Men.com will appear on A Voice For Men Radio again next week, Tuesday, June 21, 2011 at 9pm ET. The topic will be "Accidental" Pregnancies, Entrapment and Children as Weapons.

How many men have been suckered and emotionally extorted into relationships and marriages with crazy, immature, high-conflict and/or personality disordered women who "accidentally" got themselves pregnant?

How many men would have ended relationships without looking back if not for being forced into fatherhood against their will and wishes?

How many men have stayed in an abusive relationship for the sake of their children, even though they feel a little piece of themselves die inside everyday?

An "accidental" pregnancy is one of the oldest tricks in the book of desperate, emotionally disturbed women.

Deliberately becoming pregnant without a man's consent, against his explicit consent, as a way to hold onto him or to extort a commitment and money from him is one of the the most underhanded, contemptible forms of betrayal and theft there is.

Her body, her choice. Fine, but what about the genetic material a woman needs from a man to even have that choice? Parenthood ought to require mutual respect and consideration; a mutual choice. His sperm, his choice. Very often men have no choice about becoming fathers.

Before certain women make the emotional argument, "If he didn't want to be a father, he shouldn't have had sex!" let me say, grow up, get real and get some self-respect.

Women lie about being on birth control. Women claim their antibiotics rendered their birth control pills ineffective. Women lie about their menstrual cycles. Women lie and claim they're infertile. They get ex-boyfriends drunk and lure them into bed. They collect sperm from used condoms. They get pregnant by another man and lie about the paternity. This is just wrong. It is wrong. It is wrong. It is wrong and it's just a glimpse of the hell that is sure to follow.

Self-respecting, psychologically healthy women do NOT force men into fatherhood. Self-respecting, psychologically healthy women want to be loved for themselves, not because they arm twisted a man into "doing the right thing."

A woman who deliberately gets pregnant against a man's wishes and/or when she senses he's about to end the relationship is a self-centered, un-empathic, duplicitous, manipulator of the highest order. Do not be fooled by her lies that it was an accident.

Accidental pregnancies are easily remedied. A woman who honestly becomes accidentally pregnant is open to exploring options such as adoption or abortion. If it's a healthy relationship that was leading to marriage, then the pregnancy becomes a pleasant surprise.

A woman who doesn't consider a man's feelings and wishes about having his baby is NOT a woman he should bind himself to legally in marriage. These women are so twisted they lie to themselves and convince themselves that they're doing this out of "love." This is bullsh*t.

A woman who becomes pregnant to trap you is telling you loud and clear: "I don't care what you want. I don't care about you. I don't care about your feelings. I want what I want and the consequences be damned. You will do what I want whether you want to or not. This is all about me and it will always be about me." This is not love; it is the opposite of love.

In healthy relationships between healthy adults, children are a living symbol of their union and love.

Stealing a baby from a man to force a relationship or to extort money from him has nothing to do with love. It has nothing to do with wanting to raise and nurture a child into a healthy, productive adult.

A child conceived in this way is not his/her own little person; the child is a means to an end. The child is conceived for the sole purpose of tying the father to the mother against his will. The child is a weapon. The child is created to control and hurt the father. Women who view children as objects and weapons are highly likely to be parental alienators.

These women are not good parent material. Being a parent requires selflessness at times. Tricking a man into fatherhood is a supremely selfish act. A woman who does this demonstrates, before the child is even born, that she is incapable of acting in "the best interests of the child." How is it in any child's best interest to be born into a family in which the father was forced into parenthood with a woman he neither loves nor wants to be with?

If this has happened to you or someone you care about please tune in and call in to share your experiences and frustrations next Tuesday night.

I am considering doing Shrink4Men's own radio show. Paul Elam of AVFM has graciously offered to let me use his platform to do my own show before I make the financial and time commitment of my own platform. I understand some of you aren't comfortable with the MRM, however, my appearances on AVFM are about you and the issues you struggle with in your relationships. You can use a fake name to call in, but please consider calling or Skyping in. Ladies, I would love to hear from you, too.

I'm not interested in doing a 90-minute show during which I just run my mouth. That would be too boring for words. This show is about reaching out and interacting with you more directly. If you've felt shy or inhibited about calling in, please know you couldn't possibly be more nervous than I am about going on air live. I hope to hear from more of you next week!

Got dick? Wave it in their faces

June 20, 2011 | by Tom Givens | Link | Original Link

I wanted to do an issue of MenZ once, dedicated entirely to the demonization of male sexuality. Only I couldn't come up with enough quality content on the subject to fill a pamphlet, let alone magazine. And I have to admit, that surprised me a lot given the far reaching effects of this phenomenon. Maybe I'm making connections that don't exist. Perhaps I'm the sane one, and the rest of the world is crazy. Or the fallacy of FalseCompromise is actually true, and the truth lies somewhere in the middle.

I'm a 'big picture' guy, and don't deal well with minutia, so I refuse (generally) to research much by way of links. Take this as a "Here's something to ponder," if my presentation doesn't mesh exactly with your experience (ie, don't fuckin nitpick if you can help it).

It's no secret that male sexuality does not enjoy a good reputation these days. In fact, the mere accusation of actually HAVING a sexuality is enough to force congressmen to resign – even toppling international figures, and the average man faces accusations of being 'creepy' or only caring about 'one thing' if the subject is ever broached. We have made an about-face from Victorian times – sort of. Men still face all the obligations they were saddled with in the 19th century, along with all the social restrictions women faced in the 19th century. Of course, the corrillary is that women enjoy the benefits of both former roles, and none of the obligations.

I should point out that this is one area in which I will use the general term 'women,' precisely because I mean women. This fits all of them closely enough to render exceptions truly…er…exceptional. Women have gleefully engaged in these practices, recognizing the social power it gives them, with or without regard to the males around them they supposedly care about.

Furthermore, I will pre-emptively state that any woman who declares themselves guilt-free in this instance to be an out and out liar. This is not a judgment of character (per se) so much as an indication of how pervasive and acceptable the denigration of male sexuality is.

Now, you may be asking just what I mean when I say "demonization of male sexuality." Truthfully, the practice is so widespread it sort of defies easy definition. I would posit "Humiliation and ostracization due to natural biological desires, based solely on the sex of the person so regarded"…but that's pretty wordy and not a very catchy idea. Let's let that one stew for a bit.

How does this demonization manifest in our lives, as men? That's perhaps the next place we should look for a definition. Maybe we can name the beast by describing its nature.

The obvious first place to look is male genital mutilation. Nothing says "I'm afraid of horny men" quite like lopping off most of their erogenous zones and turning them into face cream for rich old white chicks. There are few areas of social concern which so blatantly flaunt sexist double standards upheld by fear of male sexuality quite so clearly as in this instance.

Nearly all fine-touch receptors are removed (the foreskin itself), along with most or all of the frenulum (similar in function to the female clitoris), and the only remaining sensitive area is left to keratinize over time. This barbaric practice was pushed by Dr. Kellogg as a means of stifling the urge to masturbate, and specifically to curb the sexual desires of men. He was not the first, nor the last medical "professional" to recommend mutilation of babies in order to curb sexual desire.

This attitude carries through to today, with mothers convincing themselves it's a simple "useless flap of skin," as Barbara Kay put it in the National Post. Many women claim they like the looks of a 'cut' penis better, and incredibly enough, think that justifies the mutilation of their sons. It shows just how common this form of hatred for male sexuality is.

Male sexuality is also a huge part of Sexual Harassment Law. Without the innate distrust, or even hatred of men that are successful with women, and jealousy of women not chosen, Sexual Harassment as a concept would not exist.

This "crime" was constructed out of whole cloth, to punish those men daring enough to believe themselves worthy of asking a woman out. Never mind the boss chasing the Secretary around the desk stereotypes. Those women flirting with the boss typically were working there to find a husband. No, Sexual Harassment Law even flat out admits what it's really about….

Sexual Harrassment is : Unwelcome sexual advances, requests for sexual favors, and other verbal or physical conduct of a sexual nature that tends to create a hostile or offensive work environment.

Keyword: Unwelcome

If she wants you to, well then it's OK. And no, there's no way to find out beforehand if you're going to lose your job, or get a girlfriend. Why would you lose your job? Because you are inflicting your unwelcome male sexuality on a woman who doesn't like you.

Rules only apply to the ugly or socially awkward.

In fact, this maxim applies in general society as well. Women routinely wield such epithets as "creep" and "loser," for men guilty of being undesirable to that particular woman.

And don't think for a minute that she is unaware of how much it hurts you. You simply deserve the pain for having the audacity to pursue her when she wanted the other guy. For wanting her, he is a nice catch. For wanting her and showing it in the same exact way, you are a physical threat and a legal liability.

As for rape? Well, men are such pigs that they should be denied the presumption of innocence. Because we all know they're all rapists underneath (at least, according to Amanda Marcotte).

Think this doesn't affect you? The disappearance of manufacturing jobs can be traced directly to policies to make the workplace more woman-friendly. Sexual harassment law has contributed greatly to the decline of the North American economy. And this law is nothing more than petty jealousy of those not selected by the "right" men, enforced by Law.

Even once in a relationship, male sexuality must be tightly controlled, apparently, lest we get a swelled head. Men must EARN the right to have sex. To think otherwise would be to place male and female sexuality on the same plane. And everyone knows men are icky.

This pay to play mentality is also the main impetus behind the injustice in Family Court. If a child results from sex, even if the man didn't want a child and was denied the right to choose, he must still pay to play. Essentially, the family court system has decided that all women are whores, and when they get pregnant, a man must be made to pay. Sure they couch this in 'best interests of the children', but that phrase is no more true in this instance than it was when the NAZIs used it.

Really, they just figure the man owes her for the sex. A lot.

And we all know, via Lorena Bobbitt (apparently someone some women want to emulate), what women REALLY think of male sexuality. Who could have watched all the women gleefully joking about the mutilation of a man in his sleep, that still thinks women have compassion for men, let alone any kind of regard resembling "love?"

As for the Legal issues men face regarding sex, like Reproductive rights, women take the traditional pay to play (or "women are all whores, really") approach on a massive scale. Men being able to walk away with no consequences for sex? Horrendous! Never mind the consequences were 100% her choice…he must be pilloried, else other cads take liberties with the women.

And fathers wanting better Parental rights? They're just mad they can't rape the mother anymore.

Hatred of male sexuality runs throughout Feminism, and progressive ideologies like the Mekong River during rainy season. This is hardly a subject that needs further exploration, save to say Feminism is currently the fount from which all the hatred emerges.

Men are afraid to help small children for fear of being called a pedophile now, thanks to feminist "awareness" on the issue that paints all pedophiles as men (when women are in fact the majority). Fear and distrust of male sexuality made this an easy sell. Men are forced out of all sorts of career paths, face diminished opportunity in many others, and face an increasingly bleak outlook, because it's "common knowledge" men are perverts and abusers. Just look at all the non-profit group's posters on the wall saying so.

But the biggest haters, the ones with the most visceral contempt for men who admit they like to fuck, are the White Knights. Hatred of male sexuality is the core of the White Knight mentality, usually because they view themselves above those base men that women seem to like so much. This is why White Knights and Feminists have such a cozy relationship.

They both aim to reduce the sexual competition by demonizing male sexuality.

One method employed, usually by the “sensitive new age guy” (SNAG) types, is through “concern.” They are “concerned” for the safety of women and children, especially those in relationships with “unenlightened” men, afraid they might be abused….and usually sexually.

Another method is the “cad haters,” that justify their jealousy of sexually successful men by essentially calling them rapists. Utilizing the “rape culture” meme installed by feminists, these White Knights paint any man with a potential hard-on as a rapist, hoping to scare the women of his desire into his “safe, moral arms.”

Pardon the repeated use of scare quotes. The level of bullshit in the language of all these actors demands it.

Anyhow, white knights use chivalry as their guide, and let their sense of moral superiority justify their hatred, and continued abuse, of their fellow man, for the good of society. For them it’s not so much that an umarried man isn’t producing for a woman (although that offends as well), it’s that too many unmarried (and thus sexually aggressive) men result in a much higher probability his S/O will stray. Or, it will be that much harder to attract one in the first place.

Male sexuality is blamed for every social malady, in some way or form. That is one of the many things MRAs are fighting to correct. Building public distrust and fear, even disgust, at male sexuality, has both been a key strategy, and enabling device for further attack, since perceptions can only worsen with each myth.

This is the fulcrum issue, this is the means by which you, and I, and every other man is controlled, by social pressure in our day to day interactions. The key to our struggles lies in this area somewhere, I’m convinced of it. We may not be able to define it, but we can fight it. Furthermore, I’m of the mind that all men, whether they can agree with MRA goals or not, would benefit society and themselves greatly of they do but one simple thing.

Refuse to apologize for being male, and liking sex.

You’re Out!

Politically Correct Baseball Takes a Walk

Years ago when my kids were preteen, I liked to promote activities to get them active and involved. Boy scouts, girl guides and baseball were safe bets with low injury and good exposure. I liked to get involved with my kids and it’s not difficult; there’s always room for parent volunteers. What I really enjoyed was the baseball. It’s an opportunity for kids to get involved and participate on a level that is higher than just showing up.

It may be my personal opinion but it seems that kids are over managed; too often in environments that direct their every move. I’m of the opinion that for kids to learn they need times where they can get beyond the constant direction and apply what they know. That’s where talent hides in kids, when they can direct themselves. Sports is an opportunity for that, it allows kids to think on their feet, make quick decisions while in motion and get immediate feedback for their efforts.

I’ve seen some talented kids and I’m left with the impression that their talent comes from not over thinking the directions they’re given. It’s like a natural flow that comes from confidence and effort. I came to believe that real talent is encouraged not managed it’s more intuitive.

I umpired a game for kids in the 10-12 year age group. The young lad on the mound was throwing a pretty good game and after 4 innings the coach pulled him for a rest. His replacement seemed a bit edgy, so I gave him a couple of extra pitches to warm up and called for the batter. This particular game I didn’t bother to bring my shin guards, I figured a 12 year old can’t have much heat throwing.

I nested in behind the catcher and called play ball. The pitcher sent his first pitch down the pipe and I couldn’t believe what I saw. For anyone who doesn’t think that sports can be as beautiful as art, you’re dead wrong. This kid delivered a perfect screwball. I’m talking perfection and I’m talking art. I’m talking seeing the impossible happen before your eyes; perfect clean physics. This was a beautifully executed pitch that dropped in the box and broke to the outside. There’s only two places in the universe you can see that perfection with your own eyes and I was standing in one of them.

Thank god the batter swung, I was to dumbstruck to sort it out in my head and I called a strike. I immediately called time and took a casual walk out to the mound. There was dead silence on the field and I lifted my head to look the pitcher in the eye.

“Nice pitch son. How did you do that?”

“Do what, sir?”

“Son, do you think you could throw the same pitch again? Exactly the same, please.”

I walked back, took my position and called play ball. Sure enough same thing again, except the surprise was missing, I was expecting it and I was watching the whole process.

I called time and strolled out to the mound again, this time I called in the coach for a chat.

“Your boy here is an incredible pitcher, a real natural. Did you teach him that pitch?” I asked.

“No sir,” said the coach.

“So you know what I’m talking about, right?”

“Yes sir,” said the coach.

“Do you also know that in this league that pitch is banned?”

“No sir, I didn’t know that!”

“Well let me tell you why. It puts tremendous stress on the shoulder elbow and wrist. For a young boy it can cause his arm to mal-form in the joints and cause lifelong pain.”

“Son, if I see that pitch again you’re out of the game. Son, I have to report you to the league of umpires so they know to watch for you.”

“I want you to know something son. That pitch is worth a million dollars and if I let you use it you will never get paid for it cause it’ll ruin your arm. Wait till your 20 or so and use it then. It’ll probably make you famous.”

I put my hand out to shake with the young lad, and I thanked him for showing me something I thought was impossible.

I was asked by a couple of parents if I would be willing to umpire a game the following week in a younger league of 8-10 year olds. I didn’t see the point. They were too young to know the rules, but apparently they wanted me there to curb the behavior of the parents. So I agreed. I know all too well how quickly a parent can ruin a game.

When I showed up I noticed the kids were a little sedate. It struck me odd that there was so little enthusiasm. At the home plate conference the coaches told me the game would only go 4 innings so the kids wouldn’t be out late.

“Fair enough,” I said, “Let’s get to it, we’re wasting their time.”

I called the first batter and looked over to the coach, he stopped his player and said, “Don’t swing. Take the walk.” I quickly realized that there wasn’t a kid on the field that could put the ball in the strike zone. The coaches and parents had predetermined who would win the game at the coin toss. No fucking way was I gonna let this happen.

I called time and brought the coaches back into home plate.

“OK guys, this is the deal, I’m expanding the strike zone. If the batter can reach the ball without moving their feet it’s a strike. If it’s on the ground and they can reach it without moving their feet, it’s a strike. So go back and tell your players they better start swinging or I’ll call them out. If you don’t like it say the word and I’m outta here. Either these kids play ball or I’m gone.”

They knew I meant business when the first batter went down with 3 strikes and no balls. Of course the kid took a fit he had never been called out before. Hey, welcome to childhood. Doing nothing can be frustrating. The second batter got the message and managed to catch a piece of the ball, it dropped straight down and edged forward a couple of inches, he didn't know what to do. In fact nobody knew what to do and the players froze. Eventually the shouting from the coach directed the batter to run for first.

That's the magic for kids in sports. First you try and eventually succeed, but once you succeed you're immediately confronted with what comes next. For those who don't recognize the process it's called life. Long before ever mentioning the politics of a team effort, at some point kids need to learn to make an effort and why. It's the reward of being challenged and challenging yourself till you do succeed.

This was by far the best game I had ever umpired and better than a born again Christian revival. These kids were working it, they let loose and tried. Sure lots of them went down on strikes and we played six innings instead of four. But what I heard coming from the bench was worth every minute.

"Hey Johnny did you see me hit that one?"

"Just swing Johnny. Pretty soon you're gonna hit it".

Of course the coaches and parents were now telling the players how to play and what to do next and the kids were listening. They wanted to know. I didn't see any kids sitting down on the infield or the outfield, this was a game and they were in it and it was theirs. The enthusiasm washed over the kids and splashed on the adults and I loved every minute of it.

What they had been doing is letting the batters take a walk every time. They had been telling the kids not to swing. They knew the kids couldn't pitch to the strike zone and had opted for a walking game. They could even calculate the final score when the game started.

It was pathetic.

The kids were bored and uninterested. These fucking adults had destroyed the game and the learning experience, but not today. At the end of the game, the coaches let me know that they wouldn't be having me back. A couple of the young lads came up and asked if they could play in my games.

Sorry guys it doesn't work that way, but now you know….if you try you got a game.

Blast off with Dr. T in one hour

[box type="alert" size="large" style="rounded" border="full" icon="none"]

In just about 90 minutes now we go live with another episode of A Voice for Men Radio.

Tonight, Dr. T again brings her insights to the show, discussing the multi-faceted problem of reproductive coercion from morally challenged women in this culture. It is a problem that comes in many forms, from literal sperm thieves, to one of the most common lies women tell about pregnancy, "It's your baby," to the simple act of a woman lying about being on birth control, we are going to discuss all of them.

As usual, you are invited into to the discussion. And this time, even more than others, we would like to hear from you.

Dr. T has been supporting men in this culture for quite some time now, helping them deal with the psycho-destroyers that their wives and girlfriends have become.

We have been using AVfM Radio, almost since we started, to help push Dr. T's important message. And we are rapidly approaching the time when Dr. T will launch her own show under the AVfM label.

So tonight guys, let's give her a little nitro to put in her tank by lighting those phone lines up. You can call in to talk about a pregnancy scam that was pulled on you, give your unbridled opinion on the subject, or just call in to say thank you to Dr. T for working so hard to help men learn how to ditch that bitch.

[box type="tick"]The call in number is 1 (310) 388-9709. The show starts at 8:00 CST tonight, You register here to follow the program.[/box]

Science, bad science, and pseudoscience: How bad statistics come to life

June 22, 2011 | by Walter Romans (TDOM) | Link | Original Link

How do we know whether we can trust what we read? What is a good source of information and what is a bad source? How can we tell between them? Everyone loves to quote statistics. But how can you tell a good statistic from a bad one? When looking at the basis for what seems like a logical, reasonable argument, one must learn to distinguish between science, bad science, and pseudoscience.

In the above paragraph I stated the following "Everyone loves to quote statistics." It seems reasonable enough. But the fact is, it is incorrect. Common sense should tell us that not "everyone" will love to quote statistics. There is enough diversity out there that we should be capable of finding someone who hates to quote statistics. That's lesson number one. Absolutes are generally false.

In order to begin, we will need to know how to determine the difference between science, bad science, and pseudoscience. Yes, there is a difference between bad science and pseudoscience. Bad science is still science, but it is poorly done. Pseudoscience isn't science at all, but it pretends to be. So let's start with some basic definitions.

Science follows what has become known as the scientific method. It is a rigorous procedure wherein objective findings can be made about hypotheses that can be proven or disproven. The scientific method typically begins with an observation that becomes a statement of a hypothesis. This is a statement that purports to explain a particular phenomenon or a correlation between two or more phenomena. The hypothesis can then be used to make predictions about the phenomena. Once predictions are made, the hypothesis can then be tested via observation or experimentation. These tests will allow the scientist to confirm the hypothesis or to falsify it.

It may or may not be possible to test a particular hypothesis. In this case, the hypothesis may become a theory, which is a proposed explanation of a phenomenon. For a theory to be useful, it must be consistent with what is known and have some predictive value. The main difference between a hypothesis and a theory is the amount of evidence that exists to support it. A scientific theory is typically regarded as having enough evidential support to be treated as fact.

The theory of evolution is such a theory. It is consistent with what is known (prior science) and it holds some predictive value. It has also been modified over time in order to remain consistent with what is known. This is another key factor in distinguishing science from pseudoscience. Scientific theory is subject to change. As science advances, prior theories are changed or discarded and new theories are proposed. Thus, while a theory must be well-supported to be treated as fact, it is also understood that it is not fact and that it may be altered as new evidence is found.

Bad science and pseudoscience produce similar results, but are two different things. Bad science follows the scientific method, but uses outdated methods, sloppy designs and procedures, may draw erroneous conclusions, fails to explore alternate explanations of results, etc. it is science that contains errors, omissions, and falsehoods or is incomplete. It might also be based on false assumptions, use faulty reasoning, or poor logic. Two example of bad science that are frequently bandied about as “factual” statistics are Mary Koss’ study from the mid 80s asserting that one in four women will be the victim of a rape or an attempt between adolescence and the completion of college and the Eugene Kanin study indicating that 41% of rape reports are false.

The Koss study had a number of problems, but the worst was that Koss ignored statements by her subjects indicating they had not been victims of sexual assault (or attempts). This places the study dangerously close to the category of pseudoscience. Kanin, on the other hand, used a definition of false allegation that may have been far-fetched and overly broad in some respects.

Another feature of bad science is bias on the part of the researchers buried in the report. This can be illustrated by the World Economic Forum’s Global Gender Gap Report. The authors of this study intentionally incorporated bias into their design in order to preclude the possibility of finding anything other than what they were looking for. This particular analysis described any gender imbalance that favored women as an area of “equality” while describing any imbalance that favored men as contributing to the disadvantage of women and evidence of discrimination. The report also failed to include categories in which women might be more likely to hold an advantage. This report, even more so than Koss, might qualify as pseudoscience or outright fraud.

James Lett (in Ruscio) described six characteristics of scientific reasoning. These are falsifiability, logic, comprehensiveness, honesty, replicability, and sufficiency. Falsifiability is the ability to disprove a hypothesis. Logic dictates that the premise must be sound and that the conclusion must follow validly from the premise. Comprehensiveness must account for all the pertinent data, not just some of it. Honesty means that any and all claims must be truthful and not be deceptive. Replicability is the idea that similar results can be obtained by other researchers in other labs using similar methods. For this to have any meaning, the methods must also be transparent. In other words, the method used to obtain the results must be described in detail. Finally, sufficiency means that all claims must be backed by sufficient evidence. Any study that does not meet all of these criteria is not scientifically sound.

In the examples above, the Koss study meets the criteria for falsifiability and replicability. The subjects were given a questionnaire and it was possible for them to answer in a manner that would have disproved the hypothesis. Further, other studies have obtained similar results using similar methods. However, the study may fail the test of logic. Koss asserted that an affirmative answer to particular questions indicated that a subject was a victim of a sexual assault or an attempted sexual assault because the questions described these offenses in such a manner as to be consistent with the legal definitions.

But what Koss failed to consider was that these questions might also elicit responses that did not meet the legal criteria and were therefore, too broad. In fact, after administering the questionnaire, she interviewed subjects who answered in the affirmative. The majority of those subjects denied being victims of a sexual assault or an attempt. She dismissed this denial without any further testing claiming that the subjects simply did not know what constituted rape. While she was honest about her dismissal, she continued with her claim of one in four. This makes her results misleading as she fails the test for comprehensiveness (she does not account for all the data) which leads to the failure of the test for honesty. If the basic premise (that affirmative answers indicate sexual assault) is wrong then she begins with a false premise and fails the test for logic. Simply because her results were falsifiable and replicable does not make them scientifically valid.

Another problem with the logic of Koss' study is that the results don't fit the reality so sexual assault reporting on college campuses. There are very few incidents reported on college campuses each year. Koss and many others claim that only a small percentage of sexual assaults are reported and point to studies like hers as "evidence" of widespread underreporting. The problem is that after several decades of attempts to increase awareness and reporting of these crimes, reporting has not increased, and in fact may be decreasing. This discrepancy between the research and the observable reality is an indicator that the research may be faulty. But instead, true believers in the research use the discrepancy to "prove" the hypothesis of underreporting. This is a basic characteristic of pseudoscience as described below.

The Global Gender Gap Report fails nearly every test. It is not falsifiable. The method ensures that there is no way to disprove the hypothesis that women are at a relative disadvantage to men in every country in the world. Beginning with this faulty methodology, it is nearly impossible to meet the demands of the remaining tests with the possible exception of replicability.

The Kanin study fails the test for logic. His basic premise depended upon an adequate definition of a false report. His definition could be considered far too broad and likely included many reports where the women recanted for reasons other than having lied in the first place which may have biased his results by a little or a lot.

Pseudoscience is fake science. It might appear to look like real science, it does not follow the scientific method, ignores contradictory evidence, and isn't falsifiable (can't be disproven). There is usually an indifference to facts. Facts that don't fit are discarded or ignored and the "facts" that are presented have generally not been proven in any scientific way. The research is often sloppy and may include hearsay, news reports, ancient myths, anecdotes, rumor, personal history, or case examples rather than scientific study.

Pseudoscientific research usually begins with a spectacular or implausible hypothesis and searches for evidence that will support it instead of designing experiments that may disprove the hypothesis. It often confuses correlation with causation and pseudoscientists rarely test their theories. When they do test the theories failures are often explained away as anomalies (the spirits just weren't willing or there was a nonbeliever present). The "science" itself rarely progresses. Some new technology may be incorporated as a way to increase the mystery, but the pseudoscientific theory remains unchanged.

Ignorance and fallacy are used in place of fact. The lack of proof to the contrary proves the pseudoscientific theory. If it can't be disproven, it must be true. Science hasn't been able to prove widespread underreporting does not exist, therefore widespread underreporting does exist. They appeal to authority or emotion. "Believe the woman." "We must take action to protect women." "We must protect our daughters."

This is similar to the claim made by Susan Brownmiller that "Rape is a conscious process of intimidation by which all men keep all women in a state of fear." It is an appeal to emotion. It is a deliberate attempt to play on the insecurities of women by using their natural fear of being raped. It relies upon a complete redefinition of the word. Rape is no longer a sexual act, it has become a "process of intimidation." In this same book she also made an appeal to authority. She stated that only 2% of all rape allegations are false. This was supposedly based on statements made by a New York City by sex crimes investigator. It was not a reference to any scientifically conducted study and was eventually discredited.

Another characteristic of pseudoscience is typically a profit to be made. Often, those who make extraordinary claims are selling something, or are attempting to secure funding, or even to advance a political agenda. Rape is a huge industry, especially on college campuses where federal and state funds are used to support research, prevention programs, and counseling centers. This, of course, is where most of the research is conducted and it is conducted by researchers whose jobs depend upon findings consistent with a high prevalence of rape and other forms of sexual assault. Koss received considerable support and assistance from Ms. Magazine in order to conduct her research. Ms. Magazine is a radical feminist publication that pushes a political agenda. Koss credits them with helping to secure her funding and with providing office space and other assistance. Studies funded, conducted, or supported by stakeholders who have a financial or political interest in the outcome should be regarded as highly questionable.

Conclusions and statistics generated by bad science and pseudoscience die hard, if at all. They seem to find their way into research years after being exposed. An example of this is the Super Bowl Hoax of 1993 that alleged that more women are abused on Super Bowl Sunday than any other day of the year. The statement was made without any scientific support and relied entirely on anecdotal evidence. No scientific study has found it to be true. Yet, it continues to be trotted out in various forms on an almost annual basis. Its latest incarnations being the abuse of women during the World Cup; and sex trafficking of minors during the Super Bowl. The problem with such statistics is that repetition breeds belief. The more people who repeat it; the more believable it becomes. Even when we know that the statement isn't true, the idea it advances often lives on. The Super Bowl Hoax helped generate the fear and media attention that led to the passage of the VAWA in 1994. This legislation eroded some of the most important of our constitutional rights and protections. It also contained explicit language forbidding the funding of legitimate scientific research which might have demonstrated that the basic premise of the law was flawed. The law also forbid funding for services for an entire class of victims, men by denying that this class even exists.

The dangers of bad science and pseudoscience are not only that they establish false beliefs, but that they may also be quite harmful. It is important that we learn the differences between science, bad science, and pseudoscience and that we respond to them accordingly.

Conscious Men Guilty Of Misogyny

June 22, 2011 | by Tom Snark | Link | Original Link

A 'new study' by 'feminist psychologists' has concluded, surprisingly, that there's still lots of sexism around to justify the researchers' paychecks.

But we're not talking about 'rape culture' or 'the old boys club' or sexual objectification or anything like that.

No, we're talking about things like holding doors open or offering technical assistance.

And, notably, we're talking about > romantic statements from men about how they cannot live without a woman or how much they 'cherish' women, said the study.

Now, who does that remind me of?

Oh yeah, those guys.

And also, it reminds me of Lyin' Lion Goodman, who has expended far too many keystrokes grovelling at the feet of abstract womanhood.

Well guess what, guys? You did all that, and they still think you're a bunch of sexists.

Yup. You spent all that time meticulously crafting those wonderful, beautiful apologies. You spent cumulative weeks in front of your webcam, stressing over which particular hat most sensitively expresses your spiritual unity with the divine feminine. And did the mortal Goddesses even acknowledge your strenuous efforts to absolve yourselves of original sin (i.e. the crime of being born male)?

Nope.

They think of you in pretty much the same way they think of, well … guys like me.

You know – unconscious men.

That's precisely what it says in the study, by the way – that the men who make romantic statements about cherishing women are still sexist, but they're doing it unconsciously.

> even men who seem enlightened could be unknowingly committing daily acts of sexism.

That must hurt to hear, for a "conscious" man.

In fact, it pretty much wrecks everything you set out to do, doesn't it?

It may seem hopeless now, but don't give up, Gay and Arjuna. Keep chasing that dream; ascend to an even higher level of consciousness (distancing yourselves ever further from the riff-raff). And one day, somewhere, somehow, you might finally reach that toilet bowl at the end of the rainbow.

(Don't) Fuck the Police

---

Last week, Paul sent me a link to a youtube video depicting a young man attempting to record a video, asking a police officer a polite question about unwarranted raids. The officer immediately placed the man in handcuffs, using the specious charge that he was "interfering in a police investigation."

This was obviously an abuse of police power, but it was also stupid. The cop knew he was on camera – but behaved like an individual drunk on power who seemed to forget that his antics would quickly be posted to youtube. You can watch the video here:

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=zx6bbjiVLeY

The frequency of public recording of police abuse of civilians with no apparent justification is increasing. It is so common today it's become almost normal background noise. It is also escalating. Sometimes it is unjustified trampling of civil rights of individuals for no reason besides a demonstration of power. Sometimes it includes violence against private citizens, sometimes death. Ill state again, it is an escalating problem.

A listing of examples in the body of this article would be redundant. A simple Google search for the phrase "police abuse" will provide anyone interested with up to today proof of this case. The purpose of this article is not to vilify the police. Cops are not another species, they're just people doing a job. Some of them are your neighbors. That's where this gets interesting. The cop who tazers your grandfather into a heart attack has a wife, and a kid, and the kid goes to school; maybe even sits in the same math class with your kid.

At this point, some screeching imbecile will pipe up and accuse me of suggesting retribution against police officers or their families. I strictly oppose violence, and in fact one of my biggest objections to organized feminism is it's adherence to, and reliance on violence. Do not think for a millisecond that retribution against police officers or their families is acceptable.

I have made several arguments that our society is accelerating towards a police state. In Indiana – the state's supreme court ruled on May 13 2011 than people have no right to resist UNLAWFUL police entry to their homes. I continue to hold that America is rapidly becoming a totalitarian, closed society. Towards that outcome, uniformed employees of police departments certainly play a major role. And we return to the problem of families and communities. How does an individual reconcile membership in an organization whose activities are increasingly totalitarian and brutal, with membership in the community being brutalized? For that matter, despite my own repudiation of violence as a political tactic, a cop who brutalizes the sons of his neighbors must eventually find those chickens coming home to roost.

Many police officers and police organizations have publicly supported the climate of accountability a camera-equipped public creates. Individuals employed in the job of uniformed officer don't generally have a natural desire to beat up on unarmed citizens, but an "us-versus-them" mentality can lead to a culture of bullying among some cops. The cellphone-camera world we find ourselves in can greatly diminishes this tendency. And, It must be observed that in some communities a climate of mutual trust and respect exists between civilians and police. Public demonstrations of support for the police force in the city of Vancouver following the city's recent Stanley Cup riot are a clear demonstration of this, and reflect the professionalism and leadership of the VPD. However, some cops – apparently don't get it, or aren't willing to address the fact that as police officers, they're government employees, paid for by public taxes. These cops have apparently forgotten than when they take off their uniforms and go home, the families and loved ones they return to are the very same people being brutalized.

From a logical point of view, police officers might be motivated to avoid behavior contributing to an emerging totalitarian climate. As a uniformed and armed representative of a state which has abrogated the humans rights of it's populace, an individual serving the role of enforcer of the state's power risks alienation from his community, as an object of scorn and censure. For larger metropolitan centers – this possibility is diminished by the natural public anonymity of life in a large city. However, if the trend of unwarranted police violence against citizens continues to rise, cops may have considerably more to deal with than mere censure.

A system of law, with a constitution on which all other social institutions stand was never perfect, but it was a pretty good system. A culture built on a framework of legally inviolable human freedoms is our society's alternative to resolving disputes by killing each other. It's the innovation which sprang out of the enlightenment of the 18th century. Sadly, we have, as a society – forgotten why those legally enshrined freedoms were so important, and we are going to have to learn that lesson again, the hard way.

When human beings are brutalized in a society which lacks a legal framework for redress, a population will develop alternative forms of redress. Retributive violence is, in my opinion, a very bad option – to be avoided – but it is a probable outcome of the dysfunction and abrogation of legal and political redress of grievance.

Presently, men as a demographic in western society are increasingly marginalized, disenfranchised, abused and extorted by western institutions of government, education, employment and law. Ongoing escalation of this is a principal driver for the continued growth of the men's right's movement.

It's the opinion of some men's rights advocated – including myself – that ideological feminism, the doctrine driving this escalated apartheid against men is not a real social movement, but a cultivated tool of economic and political elites – for the purpose of creating a totalitarian society. This hypothesis is developed and defended in several separate articles on AVFM [0][1][2][3][4][5][6][7][8][9].

Police forces enacting unneeded violence against individuals, and abrogating the civil rights of individuals are an academically obvious element in the move from an open to a closed society. In the social climate increase of police abuses, it may only be cultural momentum and memory of a society respecting human rights that currently forestalls the emergence of a culture of brutal vendetta. An obvious fracture to our social foundation took the form on June 16 of a man who, after years of brutalization by the family court system, set himself of fire in front of a New Hampshire courthouse.

I'll be the first to admit that while the posthumously obvious depth of Thomas Ball's pain and anger is no surprise to me as an MRA – his answer, which was to douse himself in gasoline before publicly self immolating – this self-facing destruction was unexpected.

According to the Thomas James Ball Wikipedia article which – at the time of this writing some individuals are attempting to have deleted: "Just before 5:30 on the evening of June 15, 2011, Mr Ball doused himself with gasoline and set himself ablaze. After the fire was burning, He refused help from several nearby men. "

Ball made no sound while he was burning. A witness described "I saw a man standing on fire. He walked around a little bit, walked on to the grass, collapsed on all fours and literally sat there and burned." [10][11]

Mainstream media have completely failed to address this event with the gravity it deserves, and in the very scant reporting on the death of Thomas Ball, have characterized him as a villain rather than the victim of a flagrantly dysfunctional and corrupt family court system. This is deliberate, and also, deeply stupid. Its the equivalent of a small child plugging his ears and singing "la la la la la" when confronted with uncomfortable news. Taken across the culture of the mainstream media, it is indictably irresponsible. Pretend that Thomas Ball was a single example of a bad crazy man, Yeah, that'll make the problem go away.

Mr Ball, before deciding to extinguish himself in a gasoline fire wrote a detailed account of his abuse in the system of the courts, and outlined a rational imperative for venting his understandable rage onto those he saw as his tormentors. It should be understood that Mr Ball was not alone in his pain, and men victimized by the family courts are common.

Returning to the issue of police trampling on the rights, and sometimes the bodies of citizens in the communities they serve, this trend is one which might be assumed to find natural limits in a world of cell-phone cameras. The informal public oversight of police conduct provided by a populace equipped with network capable video capture devices can facilitate a climate of utmost professionalism by police – as was the case during 2010's winter Olympic Games in Vancouver BC. During the games, the British Columbia Civil Liberties Association fielded several hundred trained legal observers who videotaped and journaled many of the police's interactions with event fans as well as protesters.

I was one of those observers, and with a few very minor exceptions – the police were exceptionally professional throughout the games, even in stressful situations of potential conflict between protest organizations and police or Olympic event organizers.

Unfortunately, some police and even police departments react to the informal public oversight of a camera-equipped public with a complete disregard for civil rights, or legal mandate as law enforcement.

A practice by police officers of arresting or detaining private citizens taking pictures or video of normal objects such as tourist attractions or notable architecture seems to be escalating. Without substantive laws or reasons to prohibit public photography, this rising trend is hard to characterize as anything except systematic public intimidation by police.

Undoubtedly, some people will be cowed and intimidated by such policies. Some people, on the other hand, are temperamentally unsuited to control by intimidation. Almost everyone has a cellphone camera, or a device capable of capture and upload of high quality video. Abuse of the public by law enforcement officials averse to accountability is very shortly going to force one of several outcomes.

The first and most obvious is that cops abusing civilians without a plausible reason will find their communities increasingly hostile while not wearing that power-conferring uniform. Its the badge, gun and uniform that gives a man or woman in uniform the power so carelessly indulged. A rotten cop is just a rotten human, armored by temporary power of that uniform. What happens when a police officer who brutalizes the public find his child refused at school, his commerce refused in local business? What happens when brutality is re payed to the family of a brutal police officer?

I'll state this explicitly. I abhor and condemn violence in any situation besides immediate defense against injury or assault. This is a bad outcome to be avoided.

That the apparent tendency of police to abuse the public may have such consequences to members of police forces in their civilian lives suggests strongly that philosophy of an advocate for men's rights; is natural fit for uniformed employees of police forces. The men's rights movement is a nonviolent political movement criticizing the marginalization of male identity, and opposing the growing legal cementing of a violent totalitarian state. Gender quotas and affirmative action aside, cops doing the heavy and dangerous job of real police work are still mostly men.

Suppression of the rights of individuals, and abrogation of human rights has a real, and immediate consequence to individuals employed in police forces. If you wear a uniform and beat on, pepper spray, tazer or otherwise brutalize the citizens who are your neighbors – some of them will, inevitably repay that brutality to you, or to your families.

I say again, this is a bad outcome, and I do not support violence.

Police – as a culture will have to do one of two things. They will have to de-escalate the trend towards brutalizing the public, or, they will have to do their jobs wearing masks.

The increased use of SWAT tactics and armor for police duties performed a decade ago by officers in standard non-armored uniforms seems to point towards the mask-wearing alternative. This is a bad trend.

It's bad, because if police continue to escalate abuse of the public, and dehumanize themselves with body armor and masks, identification of police by the public as fellow citizens -as fellow human beings, will become a relic of the past.

In cinema, writers and producers use costumes employing masks to de-humanize the bad guys. This serves the purpose of making their killing palatable for a G-rating entertainment audience.

In George Lucas's original Star Wars – hundreds of white-armored and masked stormtroopers are killed, and as far back as that film's release in 1978, nobody minded the slaughter.

Cops brutalizing the public in face-masked riot gear will protect the identities of those individuals. It wont protect them from a brutalized public with no more legal recourse, and only force in reply.

Connecting the Dots

June 23, 2011 | by J Galt | Link | Original Link

Existentialism for Nine Year Olds

I was sitting at the table with my son as he explained to me that he was stupid and didn't understand the lessons at school. His teacher said he would never pass grade four and he was sure she was right.

"So, you're not a very good monkey, aye!"

"What? I don't get it," he said.

"Get a piece of paper and a pencil I want to show you something. Write down a single word that you choose each time I tell you to."

I proceeded to describe the steps involved in changing a timing belt on a Pontiac Acadian. With each step I paused and asked him to choose a word and write it down. When I was finished I asked him to count the words. His total was 23.

"Now use each word as a guide, tell me how to change a timing belt."

He repeated the steps perfectly.

"How many kids your age do you think know how to change a timing belt?"

"None," he said.

"Do you feel stupid?"

He smiled and said no.

"Do you feel smart?"

"Yes," he said.

"So you're a good monkey."

"I'm not a monkey dad, what do you mean?"

"Well Zach, what I did was train you how to repeat some steps. That's what monkeys do. Following directions has nothing to do with being smart or stupid. Do you think animals at the circus are smart, or well trained?"

"Probably well trained," he said.

"Do you think if I got a whip and a poker I could make you smarter"

"No."

"Do you think I could train you to be a good monkey?"

"If you're going to use a whip I'll be anything you want."

"Zach why would you believe you are stupid?"

"Actually, Dad, the teacher said I was stupid."

"Did it hurt when she said that?"

"Yes, but not like a whip."

“Really….how long would it hurt if I hit you with a whip, Zach?”

“I dunno, maybe five or ten minutes. If you made me bleed it would probably hurt for a couple of days.”

“Zach when did your teacher tell you that you were stupid?”

“A couple of weeks ago,” he said.

“Does it still hurt?”

“Well not now, but I was afraid to talk to you cause I thought she must be right. All I’ve been thinking since she said that was that I must be stupid.”

“Did it hurt to think you are stupid?”

“Yes.”

“For two weeks?”

“Yes.”

“Do you think your teacher is really a teacher, or just a monkey trainer?”

“Dad, sometimes when you talk to me I don’t understand and I get confused and I thought that maybe that’s what stupid is.”

“Really? Go get another piece of paper. I want to show you something else. OK Zach, pretend this paper is your brain actually we’ll draw something that looks like a brain. Now put a dot inside the brain and imagine that dot is one piece of information. Is that brain smart?”

“Well, no.”

“Where did that information come from?”

“Well, I drew it there.”

“OK, pretend it’s a real brain. Where would the information come from? Would it come from your eyes, your ears?”

“Both I guess.”

“Well, yes, and more; you’re nose, mouth, all your senses touch, smell, taste. Everything that happens to you turns into a piece of information in your brain. Did you notice that my foot is on your toes?”

“No, but I do now.”

“Your brain did. It just decided that it wasn’t important enough to tell you. Your brain is getting information even when you don’t know it. When you want to know something you have to remember it.”

“Now I’m really confused, Dad.”

“Everything you know comes from your brain. It’s like a library, but before you can know something your brain has to get the information, it has to put books on its shelves. Your brain collects information your whole life and stores it in your library, in your brain. Just like a library you can’t read all the books at the same time, so when you wonder about something or become curious your brain will check to see if it has information that it can give you. It doesn't matter whether you understand something and it doesn't matter to your brain, it just collects information. When you need it it's there, if it isn't your brain will help you to get it."

"Look come with me outside let me show you something. Look up, what do you see?"

"Stars and the moon."

"OK, look over there see those stars in a row? See the two stars below that line of stars, that's called the big dipper. Connect the stars with imaginary lines. There's the handle and there's the cup. Together it's a cup with a long handle. There are no visible lines you can see but if you imagine the lines are there you will see the big dipper."

"Yeah, OK," he said.

"Now, if you take the paper where we drew the brain and continue to add dots, each being a piece of information, it's just like the stars. The only time that information in your brain matters is when you connect the dots, when you imagine. It's not possible to be smart or to be stupid, it's only possible to imagine. When you imagine, information recorded in your brain starts to connect and you interpret it. How you interpret it and what it means to you is only for you, it's your perspective, your view. Sometimes when you imagine one thing the dots in your brain will connect and show you something else that you didn't expect to see. Do you understand, Zach?"

"I think so," he said.

"You don't need to understand what I understand. What you understand is for you and it changes from moment to moment. How do you feel, Zach? "

"I feel good. Did grandpa teach you this stuff, Dad?"

"Some of it, Zach, the rest I imagined, and you will imagine more."

"Zach, what do you do when you get a cut or when you hurt yourself?"

"I get a Band-Aid from Mom or from you."

"But you don't walk around bleeding right?"

"No."

"When you hurt inside, what should you do?"

"Tell you or Mom."

"Right. Now, why would you walk around for two weeks hurting?"

"Listen closely Zach, this is important. Do you remember times when you have hurt yourself?"

"Some of them," he said.

"Do you remember the pain you felt?"

"No, not really. Just what happened, not the pain and other stuff."

"So is it possible your brain does not give you access to this information? Or is it more possible that what you felt as pain was an experience that cannot be remembered, and you can only remember the conclusion? Your brain cannot store what you feel. Your feelings are more like a calculator and you only remember the answer to that calculation.”

“To make things even easier to remember, your brain stores information as good or bad and decides if it is by how you feel at the time.”

“Makes sense, Dad. If you feel bad will your brain store information as bad?”

“You may not remember this information easily because it reminds you of feeling bad.”

“I guess it could,” he said.

“If I give you things to keep, some good, some bad, which would you, use more often Zach?”

“I would use the good stuff more.”

“If you had to keep all this stuff together would you keep the good stuff closer and the bad stuff farther away so it’s not in the way?”

“For sure!”

“Do you think your brain might work the same way to be more efficient? Can you even tell me what stupid is?”

“Well, no I’m not really sure what it means, but I was afraid she might be right.”

“So now we know Zach that the bad feeling was fear and it was fear about something you don’t understand. Because you felt bad, from your fear, you could not participate freely in your school work. Instead you spent your time afraid.”

“Have you learned anything from this conversation, Zach?”

“I’ve learned allot Dad, I know more stuff now.”

“Do you feel good about what you know?”

“Yes, definitely.”

“Maybe, Zach, what we know is what we feel good about. Imagine, Zach, what you would know if you weren’t afraid. Imagine what you would know if you controlled the calculator of your feelings.”

The Last Man

June 24, 2011 | by uncleray | Link | Original Link

Isaac had seen it far too many times. He had long lost the ability to feel any disappointment. After all, it was only to be expected. The strange land he surveyed hardly felt strange at all. Home would be strange. Normality would be strange. He swore that if he ever found home, he would punch anyone that ever said the word “exotic” in the face.

That was a big if, of course. There were literally trillions of trillions of trillions of realities that resided in the omniverse. Finding his universe among the plethora of others was about as likely as pinpointing a single atom among a single grain of sand along the entire east coast of the United States. Isaac could barely even remember what the U.S. looked like anymore, but there was still that small sparkle of hope that kept him going when he knew it was probably best to just give up.

The small, strange looking ship that Isaac resided in didn’t travel “through” space as much as it traveled “throughout” space among dimensions. Warping space to a theoretically infinite extent and creating powerful wormholes allowed Issac to travel to any universe and any location within that universe in a microsecond. A kind of warp drive on steroids. Too bad the automatic controls were destroyed. He knew he couldn’t have destroyed them. Even with his memory gone, he knew that just wasn’t possible. The engineers must have done it for some sort of test, or maybe one of those bastards from mission control decided to play a sick joke.

That was one thing Isaac couldn’t figure out. The brain formatter in the medical bay had obviously been used. The computer’s log displayed it quite clearly: “Patient: Isaac Reeve – Initiating level 2 hippocampus & cortex format.” It was seven years since that date. It must have been the date he left Earth. But why did he leave? Was it because something happened? Something terrible? No, it must be part of the test. He’ll find his way back, and everything will be clear. The bigwigs will explain everything, he thought. Maybe there was some sort of accident during launch, or maybe these wasted seven years of his life were for a greater cause. Who knows.

Obviously no one in this universe.

[image]He could remember everything except for why he was here. He remembered his kids, his wife, his house, his entire life up until seven years ago. He definitely knew who he was: Isaac Reeve, Class 4 Systems Engineer. He remembered how to operate the ship, but he couldn’t remember being selected for any mission. The question “why me?” tugged at his brain every day. “Just what the hell happened?” was the other popular question.

Isaac had to wait three days for the ship to absorb the surrounding energy and recharge enough to make another warp jump. He knew that if he jumped to a similar universe to home, even only slightly similar, he would be able to narrow his search, and if he was able to keep narrowing his search after a certain number of warps, the computer would be able to scan for universes in a realistic amount of time. It wouldn't take thousands of years for a scan, but only hours, or even minutes. He knew this was the only way. On the third day, Isaac made the jump. The globe he saw before him triggered a sense of shock he never knew a man could experience.

Blue water, white clouds, those familiar continents, and a yellow star 93 million miles away. Atmospheric readings were equivalent to Earth. But it wasn't Earth. There were life readings, all the familiar flora and fauna of Earth, save for one species. They were intelligent organisms, but they weren't human. Isaac made sure to activate the cloaking device so as not to alarm them.

As Isaac observed the behavior of the human-like aliens, he found that nearly everything was the same. Same societies, same customs, same food and drink. Only one thing was different. This species had several biological sub-divisions among its members, but it had only two major divisions that were most curious: Reds and Greens.

Isaac decided to limit his observations to the Red and Green aliens of the United States of this world. What he found was very peculiar.

Reds are taught from a very early age to "never hit greens." Greens, however, are not taught the same thing when it came to them hitting reds. In fact, society thought it was funny or deserved for a green to hit a red. Reds are taught that protecting greens from harm is the sign of a "Real Red." As such, only reds are drafted in times of war.

It wasn't uncommon to hear Greens gossiping among themselves about reds' supposed deficiencies, believing themselves to be superior to reds. Few think there is anything wrong with this attitude. A Green in power saying such things about reds need not be afraid of losing their position. In fact, many would applaud them. It is very taboo for a red to talk this way about greens, however. A red doing so would be labeled as a chauvinist, and any red in power would be quickly chastised and removed from their position.

Reds receive more jail time compared to greens for the same crime, receive little health funding compared to greens even though they die earlier and from every major cause of death with the sole exception of heart disease more often than greens, and are the subjects of humor when the victims of violence, both real and fake; very different from violence against greens.

Reds also make up a shrinking number of education participants, but the government still has quotas designed to help greens. Less reds in education is attributed to reds simply being inferior to greens. Less greens in education is attributed to oppression against greens.

The most interesting thing Isaac observed was that most of the species actually believed it was the reds that had privilege over greens. Many even believed that reds as a whole were oppressing greens.

Something clicked in his head, and the joy he had experienced upon finding this world was replaced with shock and disgust. "No" was the word he repeated in his head over and over again. But he couldn’t suppress what he saw in front of his eyes.

Three days had passed as Isaac finished his surveying. He immediately knew what to do. “Computer, copy all current parameters, but replace the values ‘Reds and Greens’ with ‘Men and Women’, respectively. Commence scan.” I didn’t take hours, or even minutes for a scan. In two seconds, the screen displayed one result. “That’s it.” He said softly, his voice shaking.

“Initiate warp.”

He saw the Earth before him, a dead, dark world devoid of any life, more barren than the moon that orbited it. The overwhelming sadness and horror that triggered his memory to return and his sanity to leave let him know that he hadn’t made a mistake. First the riots, then the guns, then the rockets, and finally the bombs. All because of the disunity between the sexes, the final bursting of the bubble.

Isaac touched down on what was once Houston, Texas, and stared into the endless darkness of black ashes, the ashes of everything he held dear: his parents, relatives, friends, his beautiful wife, his little boy and girl, buried among them. He stared into it for the longest time, his tears having long dried. The sad tale of the ape that walked on two legs ended with him.

“I’m….home.”

Mainstream acceptance is for losers

June 24, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Please forgive me if this sounds rambling. It's very busy these days for me. I am writing this on the fly and I won't have time to fine tune it before posting.

There are two recent items addressed here at A Voice for Men that have a certain corollary that I would like to point to for a moment.

First, we have the recent fact that the hacks at Wikipedia deleted the page submitted regarding Thomas James Ball, as irrelevant. And second, recent comments from a valued reader suggested that I tailor my language, if not tone, to suit mainstream sensibilities.

Yes, that would be the same mainstream that sees Thomas James Ball's horrifying death as irrelevant. The same mainstream that gives us VAWA, Hanna Rosin, family law, mandatory arrest policies, primary aggressor laws, the media that ignored Ball's death, and the masses of blue pill popping automatons that watch all this and then ask such compelling questions as "Hey, have you tried the new cheese covered whacky fries from Whacky Burger?!?"

To me, the situation at hand is self-evident.

We don't need to appease mainstream sensibilities. We need to continue to create an environment where the term, "mainstream sensibilities," is exposed for the fucked up oxymoron that it is.

The mainstream has no sensibility. The mainstream is a bunch of mindless, programmed consumers of organic and electronic garbage. After all, they are stupid enough to think feminism is about equality, are they not?

Most of us here know all this, but I have to keep repeating it, so I am creating this article to have a permanent place to refer people who ask me to consider playing nice with sociopathic politicians, brutal, corrupt police, and especially the soulless blue pill morons that infest the mainstream media.

To anyone who feels like I should mold myself for respectability of the morally bankrupt and hopelessly misandric please be advised that if there ever was a question about that in my mind, it has been answered with the death and continued, posthumous dehumanization of Thomas James Ball.

Let me put it another way. Mainstream sensibilities are the problem. How the fuck can we hope to solve that problem by appealing to compassion and decency where it does not exist?

Do we dress up our grievances in nice polite language and stand with our hats in our hands waiting for scraps from the table of human rights?

ARE YOU FUCKING KIDDING ME?

I think there is a much better approach than that, and it all is a matter of mentality; of how we see ourselves, and how we see "them."

First, we ARE the fucking media. The current events pornography of network and cable news has nothing at all to do with what is happening in the real world. Everything they do is illegitimate and awash with conspicuous lies. But they continue to have legitimacy because we attribute even the least amount of importance or credibility to them.

And they are dying…a slow but well deserved death. Every day people turn more and more to the net for their news and information.

Think, brothers and sisters. Break out of their bullshit! We must learn to view them as the world currently views men and boys; in strictly utilitarian terms.

In other words, our only purpose is to use them when we can, totally trash or ignore them when we can't. But never, ever, ever seek to placate or align with them.

Never seek their "acceptance."

Why? Because they really do reflect the mainstream world view. They sell misandry and male disposability because that is what the culture wants to buy.

Our "product," is for a growing elite. We are uniquely gifted in that we can not only see through the falsity of the misandric system, but we can also see through the trap of biology and how it relegates men to lifestyle subservience. We will never be mainstream, but we will become a large and flourishing subculture.

And we grow, not by finely crafted and gentlemanly debates, but, as Dan Moore once said, by (figuratively) "stripping the skin off our opponents and laughing at their mewls of pain."

I don't know if Thomas James Ball ever visited this site. I suspect he may have, but I will never know for sure. What I do believe is, though, that he, if convinced to stay alive, would have been a hell of a solider in this war.

A man like him still living would have been their worst nightmare. And if he was willing to self immolate to make a point, I don't think a few F-bombs would have deterred him.

I think, as the war against men rages, there will be more and more men like Mr. Ball. And as AVfM grows, we will start to reach them before they reach for gasoline.

Using the word FUCK won't stop us.

Using words of anger and outright hostility, though, will help. We will often reflect their feelings with our content, not dilute them.

So if it were not clear before, let me make it so now. The official policy of this website is:

FUCK THE MAINSTREAM MEDIA AND FUCK MAINSTREAM SENSIBILITIES.

With sincere respect to good MRA's who feel differently, I can only say that I don't think you are seeing things clearly.

When we are big enough, and for certain we will be, the MSM will be all over us, trying pathetically to undermine our growth. We will use it to hurt them and gain more followers.

But first we have to bulk up and cause some more pain.

As most of you know, Manuel Dexter and I have been very busy with a low profile project of late (actually it is mainly Manuel). It will not turn the tide in this war, but it will certainly fire a serious, NOTICED shot across the bow of their flagship.

To be sure, for some feminists, it will fuck their shit up.

And it is hardly the last thing we have in mind.

It will come with a full announcement this Tuesday on AVfM Radio.

In the meantime, to those saying that I should tone down or talk nice, your words have been heard, respected and respectfully declined.

This is fucking war.

The Kind Of People We Are Dealing With

June 26, 2011 | by Tom Snark | Link | Original Link

Lest you, in a moment of weakness, accidentally sympathise with the feminist mindset.

Today I draw your attention to a piece written by Neil Howard and Rebecca Steinfeld, entitled 'Time to ban male circumcision?' They are, of course, weighing in on the debate currently raging in San Francisco, which is soon to be offering its citizens some sort of referendum on whether circumcision of male infants should be banned.

Howard and Steinfeld, incidentally, come down on my side of the fence: it would really be for the best if genital mutilation were to be made illegal, whether it is genital mutilation of boys or girls.

One would think, one could reasonably hold this position, and leave it at that.

But let me quote from the article, and then you can tell me what you think.

> Both male and female genital cutting can have profound psychological consequences. Circumcised women often experience trauma, stress and anxiety, and can have relationship problems. Some circumcised men describe feelings of loss, anger, distrust, and grief, while others have reported problems with subsequent intimacy, long-term post-traumatic stress disorder, and a sense of powerlessness …
> … Female genital cutting, which can involve removal of the clitoris, may reduce the likelihood of orgasm and cause complications during childbirth. Similarly, male circumcision can result in excruciating pain, nerve destruction, infection, disfigurement and sometimes death.

Keeping all that in mind for a moment …

> … certain feminist groups consider the idea of comparing male and female genital cutting to be both offensive and unsubstantiated.

Here is a comment underneath the piece, posted by somebody named CrowBlack, which exemplifies the feminist mindset:

> The similarities end at the 'cutting' – male circumcision does not result in the same physical abuse as that inflicted on girls. I am appalled that this article seeks to draw a parallel between the two practices.

Well, quite frankly, I am appalled that anybody could be appalled by the parallel the article is seeking to draw! Given that male circumcision "can result in excruciating pain, nerve destruction, infection, disfigurement and sometimes death," it might just be an appropriate parallel to draw.

Anyway. It is a 'teachable moment', you could say, when you observe how reactionary and downright traditionalistic those self-identified 'progressives' can be, when it's not their interests that are being threatened.

Fuck Their Shit Up Fundraiser and Beer Bash

June 27, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Tomorrow night, Tuesday, June the 28, 2011 at 8:00 p.m. Central Standard Time, U.S., we will begin the next level of Fucking Their Shit Up.

Indeed, we will be announcing the details and discussing them at length that night on A Voice for Men Radio. It will be done in conjunction with our summer fundraiser. No better time to ask for your financial support than when we can show you that your hard earned money is going to do real work on your behalf.

And while the clock ticks down to the show, allow me to also review our first year at avoiceformen.com and offer up a brief review of our accomplishments since we officially launched on July 3, 2010.

Since our opening day here we have been mentioned by the New York Times; we have been the object of ire and frustration of feminist functionaries like Mary Kellett who by proxy attempted to get a gag order placed on us regarding coverage and activism in the Vladek Filler false rape trial. We have forced another feminist, domestic violence advocate Christine Armstrong to silence her hate speech and false accusations and scurry off into the dark corners with the other roaches.

We have launched a growing internet radio show that carries the unabashed word of the MRM every week to thousands of listeners. We have planned the first MRA summit in Colorado for next year, and we have put together a group of men and women whose writings on the issues of men in the misandric zeitgeist is without parallel.

We are about to fuck their shit up even more.

Tomorrow night, on AVfM Radio you will hear for the first time the complete details of a new website launch. It is something MD and I have been working on feverishly (with MD doing most of the sweating), and while not yet in its most complete form, it is ready to be unleashed on the world.

I assure you that you are really going to like it. If, you are an MRA.

If you are a feminist or chivalrist, not so much.

Not so much AT ALL.

Just prior to show time there will be a banner launched at the head of this web page that points to the new site. I can assure you that you will even like the banner.

It will make you smile like you used to smile.

But speaking of AVfM Radio, there is much more to come there.

Dr. Tara Palmatier has been a regular guest on our show since we launched. Her presence fills a needed void in the interpersonal realm for men and woman tasked with dealing with crazy bitches. So important is her work that the next appearance with me on the show will be her last. After that, on a date to be announced soon, Dr. T will begin flying solo under the AVfM Radio banner with her own regularly scheduled program.

That day will mark the birth of A Voice for Men Radio Network, with the potential to expand to even more shows in the future.

With respect to that I have yet another announcement. At 11 a.m. Central Standard Time on Thursday, August 11, 2011 I will start another weekly radio program. This will be a one hour, no call-in show in which I cover news relevant to men and boys in western culture.

And when you tune in you will also hear me calling everyone from government agencies to media sources and everyone in between, asking them the questions on the air that they do not want to be asked.

It could become very interesting, even intense, but I assure you it won't be boring. I won't let it be.

And of course, as I noted in the beginning, this is also the time of season that I ask you to pitch in and help with donations. And gents and ladies, we really need them this time around.

The new site being launched tomorrow is newsworthy. I intend to send out news releases to tens of thousands of western news outlets on more than one occasion. That is expensive, but it must be done.

As of tomorrow we will have two websites and a radio show on its way to being a radio network of sorts. It is all part of the plan.

Just recently I posted an article entitled "Mainstream acceptance is for losers." In it, I said, and I quote "[W]e ARE the fucking media." And in the comments I said I didn't want mainstream acceptance, I wanted a big stick.

Well, gents and ladies, this is it. We are building that big stick. We are, right now, like Bufford Pusser in "Walking Tall," shaping a monster of an oak club, out of words, righteous indignation and sheer will.

And then we are going to use it to full effect. Just like we have so far.

When we launched, we were at some ridiculous number in Alexa ratings; well over the 1,000,000 spot. Since then, in less than a year, our traffic has increased 2,500% and our current Alexa ranking is 152,713.

And we continue to grow.

Within 18 months it is the goal of AVfM to be the largest and most feared men's rights entity that ever existed. And we are on track to get there.

But, just as you did when we launched AVfM Radio, I need to ask you to dig as deep as you can to help make this happen.

I have set a goal for this fundraiser, which will end in two weeks on July 11, of $5,000.00.

That is a minimum number. I hope to exceed it.

There is now a graphic in the right side bar to track our progress. I will update it as often as possible.

To all who will give, thank you in advance. To those who can't, we enjoy your moral support.

Now, let’s make this thing happen.

Let’s take a handful of red pills and Fuck Their Shit Up.

Jessica Valenti Placed on Offender's Registry

June 28, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

After years of feminist activism, including the penning of a number of books and the founding of the website "feministing.com," Jessica Valenti has been placed on the offender's registry at register-her.com.

This places Valenti alongside other notable women such as rapist Debra Lafave and Killer Theresa Craig – in a growing database of rapists, pedophiles, murderers, false accusers and child abusers.

In other words, it places Valenti among her morally bankrupt contemporaries, where she righteously deserves to be.

You can read Valenti's profile, which includes accounts of her statements and actions that were given as the reasons for placing her on the registry by going here.

A letter to Jessica Valenti

June 29, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Dear Jessica Valenti, Someone posted this to my comment section.

To be honest, it was the first time I watched this video. Now, there is so much wrong with this that it is hard to know where to start, but let's get things rolling with a few basic facts. My name is Paul Elam (yes, my real name) and I live in Houston, Texas. I am not hiding from anyone, least of all from the likes of you.

As a matter of fact, you are typical of the reasons that I am here doing what I do; which is to yank the covers off people like you and show the world what you really are. And guess what, Jessica. It is happening right in front of your beady little eyes. I would address a lot more than was in your little "fuck you," video, but I don't want to waste my considerable talents dealing with your spelling flames, your ideations about where your critics live or the fact that some men choose not to reveal their identity in a misandric culture that you help foster. I won't even bother eviscerating your contention that your critics hate women.

What I will do, though, is point to the hypocrisy that you just showed the world. You have been trashing men for a long time now. And then you come on YouTube with this video taunting men as cowards for how they react to it. And then we catch you red-handed on twitter, technical moron that you are, asking if anyone can help you erase your personal information from the entire internet. We caught you trying to put on sunglasses and hide in a dark corner, emulating the very men you were just shaming in this video. How does it feel to think you have to hide, Valenti? How does it feel knowing this is only the beginning? Your true color, yellow, looks good on you, especially considering the rest of that video.

You, in no uncertain terms, reduced everything to whining and just spent three minutes spouting hollow drivel that amounted to 12 different ways to say "Fuck you."

No, you stupid hateful bitch, Fuck you. You are whining here about MRA's being a "thorn in [your] side,"? Really? Is that all? Were the comments of those who critiqued you and your ideas so frustrating that you felt compelled to dedicate your limited talents to making a video just for them? Well, then, before we are through, you will be making a full length feature for me. You might want to see if James Cameron is available to direct. Get Pacino's agent on the line.

Because, Valenti, I am not here to be a thorn in your side. Oh no, not at all. I am here to fuck your shit up. And that of a whole lot of your sick sisters. Non violently, legally and with integrity of course, but your shit will be fucked up just the same. And the people you have been humiliating, denigrating, demonizing and insulting for the last several years are going to help me do it.

No sex in school

June 29, 2011 | by Jared White | Link | Original Link

Are the words “boys and girls” social constructs? Well, of course they are. These words were created by people and their meanings spread throughout societies across the globe. There is no doubt that these words, like all words, are societal constructs used to identify certain objects, places, or people.

But are boys and girls social constructs?

Well according to the people behind the creation of a school for small children in Sweden, yes. I wouldn’t put it past feminists to propagate the insane notion that male and female genitalia only grow because of the current societal influence of two parents. But getting the public to accept something like that would be difficult even for the eternally privileged victims that support the feminist hate movement. That won’t stop them from trying though and the first step, as with all social perversion and control schemes, starts with children.

> A preschool in Sweden wants to eliminate gender bias by referring to children as “friends,” instead of girls and boys, and avoiding gender-specific pronouns such as “him” or “her.”

For everyone that was wondering how life in Sweden could get any worse thanks to feminist influence, here’s the answer.

> The taxpayer-funded preschool which opened last year in the liberal Sodermalm district of Stockholm for kids aged 1 to 6 is among the most radical examples of Sweden’s efforts to engineer equality between the sexes from childhood onward.

Right off the bat anyone that isn’t wearing bigot goggles can see the main flaw with this program. It’s funded by public tax dollars. In my opinion, if a bunch of idiots want to get together in an attempt to destroy all concepts of male and female in the minds of children they can do it without my money. However, as any anti-feminist knows, all hate influenced projects put forth under the feminist ideological banner are always paid for by the people feminists hate. Those people would be men, women who disagree with feminism, and especially, men.

Moving on to the bigotry the school promotes, I’ll start with a question. How exactly do the words boy and girl instigate gender bias? These words were created with the purpose of identifying human beings with penises and vaginas. I suppose the school faculty believes that by not referring to the children as he or she will help…with…?

I lost my train of thought trying to think along the same lines as these wackos. Don’t get me wrong I understand what they say they want to do, which is create an environment where boys and girls aren't expected to do certain things just because they are boys and girls.

But how the fuck do the words boys and girls prevent that!?

Do they envision a world where everyone is referred to as friend? Do they realize that we already have words with which we can use to describe people in a gender neutral way…like people? One could wonder if the faculty had an ulterior motive, such as eliminating masculine and feminine perspectives. Oh wait that is their fucking motive and they have no problem letting everyone know. Anyway let's get to the motives that the faculty actually does want to hide.

Sort of.

> "Society expects girls to be girlie, nice and pretty and boys to be manly, rough and outgoing," teacher Jenny Johnsson told the AP. "Egalia gives them a fantastic opportunity to be whoever they want to be."

Hmm…I really don't have a problem with this. Maybe I was wrong. Maybe there are no harmful ulterior motives at work here.

> Breaking down gender roles is a core mission in the national curriculum for preschools, underpinned by the theory that even in highly egalitarian-minded Sweden, society gives boys an unfair edge.

Ah shit…no wait…no. Ok that last line was a little bigoted…nah ok it was very bigoted but still…these guys want to break down gender roles so that's a good thing. No more men being expected to run to the aid of random women. No more men having to always ask women out on a date and women never ask men out on a date. No more men having to pay for everything. This is some good stuff here so stupid, untrue theories like society giving men an unfair edge can be looked over in the pursuit of actual fairness between men and women…oops I mean between "friends".

> Director Lotta Rajalin notes that Egalia places a special emphasis on fostering an environment tolerant of gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender people. From a bookcase, she pulls out a story about two male giraffes who are sad to be childless — until they come across an abandoned crocodile egg.

Ok…yeah there's nothing wrong with showing that gay couples can be good parents. A few books that depict this are fine I guess. Seems like they are doing a lot to suggest that everything men and women do has absolutely nothing to do with biology but I might just be a little too overzealous.

> Nearly all the children's books deal with homosexual couples, single parents or adopted children. There are no "Snow White," "Cinderella" or other classic fairy tales seen as cementing stereotypes.

Oh fuck no! Fuck this shit! What the fuck!?

Ok I take back my assumption that these bigots were trying to do the right thing in a completely idiotic way. These heterophobes don't want to eliminate gender stereotypes; they want to introduce new ones. But they won't stop there.

> Egalia doesn't deny the biological differences between boys and girls — the dolls the children play with are anatomically correct.
> What matters is that children understand that their biological differences "don't mean boys and girls have different interests and abilities," Rajalin says. "This is about democracy. About human equality."

And there it is. Not only does the faculty of this school wish to place the idea that only same sex couples are normal in the minds of children. They also wish to put forth the lie that men and women do not have differences beyond their genitalia.

I think most boys and girls, if they haven't already, realize the difference in ability they have as opposed to their opposite sex by the time they are fourteen. The obvious physical advantage men have over women is too big of a difference to deny, yet these "teachers" wish to lie to children in order to push their ideological view, born from feminism, which proclaims women can do anything men can. Well I'm not sorry to say that no, women cannot do anything men can do.

What people like this fail to realize is that the advantages men have over women do not make men better human beings. Instead of accepting the fact that men and women are different, these ideologues would rather poison the minds of children with lies and try to force thousands upon thousands of years of evolution out of preadolescent humans in order to create a population that appeases their inferiority complexes.

In their minds, the fact that an average male police officer is more capable of apprehending a criminal than an average female police officer is an affront to a woman's humanity.

In their minds, a male firefighter able to carry a 200+ pound man from a burning building is an insult to female firefighters that cannot.

In their minds, a man and a woman happily married, a rarity these days, is some form of female oppression and in some way a discrimination against homosexuals.

In their minds, a heterosexual couple is a stereotype.

I have some news for the bigoted feminists in Sweden and feminists around the globe. Heterosexual couples are not a stereotype; they are a FUCKING BIOLOGICAL NECCESSITY. Without all of those men inserting their nasty socially constructed patriarchal penises into eternally oppressed and victimized female vaginas none of you bigoted bra burners would exist. Each and every feminist moron knows this. That is, unless they went to preschools like "Egalia" where they would learn that babies come from fucking crocodile eggs.

One could wonder what the "teachers" at Egalia would do if one of the children put forth a few questions, a few important questions that the majority of children around the globe would ask when only homosexual couples are put forth as the norm in their school.

Teacher, does everyone have two mommies?

Why no, Billy. Some children have two daddies.

But, teacher, I have a mommy and a daddy.

Well, Billy, some children have a mommy and a daddy.

Then why are there almost no stories here with children who have a mommy and a daddy?

The faculty doesn't just openly admit, they proudly admit that they have virtually no stories which feature heterosexual couples. Now I won't presume to know what is going on in a facility I've never been to but I wouldn't consider it too farfetched to suspect that the faculty at Egalia only discourages masculine behavior…in boys. I also don't find the suspicion that they encourage young boys to do things seen as feminine, like painting their nails, too farfetched either.

I don't feel that boys should be discouraged from doing masculine or feminine things. However, I feel that encouraging one side of things over the other under the premise of "letting children be who they want" is more than being dishonest. It's downright appalling. Teaching children that there is nothing evil about homosexuality is not a bad thing, however, not having an equal balance of heterosexual material reveals the bias of the school faculty.

Destroying gender is a bad thing. Men and women are not the same. You cannot claim to recognize the differences between men and women and at the same time eliminate all references to gender in your school. Well actually you can because the Egalia faculty has done just that but that doesn't change the fact that it's a bad idea. The knowledge we have about men and women didn't just spring up overnight. It didn't just pop into some patriarchal oppressor's head and he forced everyone to accept his ideas.

The characteristics associated with men and women are universal. They are seen everywhere on the planet in every culture and every society. Yes there are drastic differences between western and eastern cultures. There are differences between western cultures. Hell, there are differences in cultures between eastern and western America. The point is that male and female characteristics have remained almost identical since and most likely before recorded history even when one civilization didn't know of the existence of the other. These characteristics weren't just created out of nothing, and in the beginning when there were no governments there were no societal constructors to impose them on anyone.

Now if you were to believe psycho feminists like Marly Daly you would come to the conclusion that evil patriarchal men invaded a feminist matriarchal utopia and forced everyone to conform to male and female roles.

That didn't happen in case you were wondering.

People with common sense can deduce that humans fell into their roles because of the human instinct for survival. Evolution or god, whatever you want to believe, gave men and women natural biological abilities and instincts with which to use these abilities. This is why when men were building and leading a medieval society in England, men were also building and leading a society in feudal Japan. Simply put, men were given the natural physical strength, ability, and aggressive nature needed to do these things. Were there weak, lazy, unmotivated men in these times? Yes no one denies that but if you can show me a civilization built primarily by female labor, defended primarily by female warriors, and technologically advanced primarily by female inventions then I'll buy your poorly written comic book for a dollar.

The point here is that men don't act "manly" only because of societal influence. The point is the majority of men and women act the way they do because men and women have been acting this way since the human race started. Yes society is more influential in the lives of men and women today but that is, in my opinion, only because of humanity's technological advances over the past two centuries. Survival for everyone no longer depends on whether or not the next crop will be good or if a rival tribe decides not to invade. The skills and abilities given to us by nature are no longer a necessity so we have shun them and taken up new identities. This is not a bad thing but proclaiming that men and women who act the way our ancestors did are only doing so because of social constructs or stereotypes is, for lack of a better word, bullshit. It is easy to see where someone can be genuinely confused when considering this concept though. You see, men buying women dinner and drinks in order to get into their pants is both a societal construct and a product of biology.

Women aren't going to give it up unless they feel they are getting something in return. That something used to be determined by biology, the ensured survival of herself and her offspring. Now it's alcohol, diamonds, and money. Because of the technological advancements made by men, women no longer need men to have a roof put over their heads, they just need money. So while buying women things is a societal construct, a woman giving it up after a man provides her with something, the biological element remains the same. I don't have any problem being freed from these biological chains but at the same time I would have a problem with some "teacher" telling my son that the reason he exhibits masculine traits is because society tells him to. Not every man that is assertive and hates being lead acts that way because society told him to.

Believe whatever you want about gender and society but I believe this school is an insult to humanity because it seeks to destroy gender altogether. And if they can't destroy gender the faculties of schools like this will do whatever they can to erase any form of masculine identity boys might develop.

Feminists claim that it shouldn't matter whether or not a boy wants to do masculine or feminine things yet in every instance I have ever seen where feminist groups claim they are trying to free people from gender roles there is only ever talk of changing men. There is only ever talk of having men be more feminine. There is only ever talk about how inhuman masculinity is. Feminists claim that things men do are seen as more valuable in societies.

Well that's because they are.

Without the things men do society wouldn't exist. Humanity would have been wiped out by wild animals. If not the animals then nature as no one would have constructed shelters with their bare hands and advanced technology with which to repel the elements. The only argument feminists ever bring up in opposition of this fact is the fact that women give birth to men.

No shit.

The faculty at Egalia has made it clear that "the hierarchy where everything that boys do is given higher value" must be eliminated. The only reason idiots like this are even able to argue for such a system is because male contributions to society were the most valued in the past. If women didn't value the hard work and sacrifice men put forth all those centuries ago men would have just said fuck it and went to sleep. At least that's what I believe.

But finally, if there was any doubt that these people were bigots I give you all one last piece of information about the program at Egalia.

> Rajalin, 52, says the staff also try to help the children discover new ideas when they play.
> "A concrete example could be when they're playing 'house' and the role of the mom already is taken and they start to squabble," she says. "Then we suggest two moms or three moms and so on."

Now if it isn't obvious to readers that these people wish to indoctrinate children into believing heterosexuality is abnormal it damn well better be now. Teaching children that there is nothing wrong with being homosexual is one thing but these people wish to encourage children to be homosexual. There is nothing equal about this program and the faculty in no way encourages children to be who they want. Encouraging children to have two moms when they clearly set up a game where there is only one is not encouraging them to be who they want. It is forcing your ideological view on children.

A simple remedy to girls arguing over who gets to be the mom in a game is to pair them with another group or maybe teach them patience, a concept that is apparently unheard of at Egalia.

All I can say is there are going to be a lot of confused children wandering around Sweden.

5K and pushing forward!

June 30, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

It is with great pleasure that I inform you that AVfM has just exceeded the fundraising goal of $5,000.00!

That being said, the fundraiser will continue for the entire two weeks as scheduled. There are a couple of good reasons for this. One, if I were able to raise $5,000,000.00 it would not be enough to fuck their shit up the way I would like to. Two, and very importantly, nearly 40% of the current total ($2,000.00) was donated by one individual who has been a regular, anonymous supporter.

Without this person, we are still at 60% of goal.

I am not going to change the fundraising goal, but I hope we are able to raise another $2,000.00 before this is over so that we can show that the weight of this does not rest on the unusual generosity of one person.

And of course, the additional $2,000.00 will be used to take the fight directly to our enemies.

That being said, let me take this opportunity to express a hearty thank you to each and every donor to this website. Aside from the one very large gift, we have had donations ranging from $1.00 (yes, we got a paypal for a buck) to $500.00 and almost everything in between. That includes $100.00 from a man who gave it from his unemployment check. That is the second time that has happened here. The first time was during the AVfM Radio drive.

Every last one of these donations is greatly appreciated, and you can trust it will help in this fight.

Thanks to all of you for putting some real timbre in this Voice.

What one false accusation can do to a man

July 1, 2011 | by Jared White | Link | Original Link

By now I'm sure just about everyone within the MRM know about Dominique Struass-Kahn. Most probably know him because of the rape accusation set against him by a French maid who claims, Kahn forced her to perform oral sex. I'll admit I hadn't been following this case so I don't know everything that has happened. From the little that I did read I got the impression that Mr. Kahn isn't all that liked by anyone. None of this matters to me, however, because I care little about politics.

What I do care about is fairness. That said, even though Kahn's innocence is already being spread across the web I wish to point out something that I find sickening. Something I find more sickening than the crime Mr. Kahn was accused of committing.

This man's reputation was dragged through the mud by the media. This man was arrested and purposely forced to walk in front of a line of reporters. The crimes he has been charged with were spread through all media outlets as fact before his first day in court has even arrived. This man was forced to resign from his job as the head of the International Monetary Fund. This man's chances for being a solid contender for the French presidency have been severely dampened. All of this and more has befallen this man. Why?

One accusation.

One accusation from a woman has destroyed this man's career. One accusation from a woman has made this man a criminal in the public eye. One accusation from a woman put an electronic tracking bracelet around this man's ankle. One accusation from a woman placed this man under armed guard where he slept. One accusation from a woman has drained millions of dollars from this man's finances. One accusation from a woman has brought all of this turmoil down on this man and the worst part of it is the most sickening.

This accusation was never proven.

There has been no trial but according to the media and of course feminists, this man was guilty. Another sickening fact is while Dominique Struass-Kahn's name has been spread across every news media outlet, most of the same media groups will only refer to his accuser, Nafissatou Diallo, as "the woman".

What world do we live in where disgusting discrimination like this is not only normal but encouraged? How is it that words can destroy a career even if those words turn out to be a lie? How is it that half of the human population has the power to usurp the other half from any professional position with words?

Some would argue that evidence accompanied those words but that shouldn't matter. There has been no trial so the evidence is irrelevant until there is or isn't a conviction. So why is it that I know the name of this man? Why is the media telling me he is a rapist? Why is his face now known to everyone within the developed world?

Why?

I will tell you why. It is because destroying a man when a woman accuses him of violating her is a normal practice within all western cultures. Not just a normal practice, a championed practice. And if that woman happens to be lying it is considered our duty to ensure that no one knows who she is. Furthermore, we as a society are obligated to ensure no punishment befalls this woman, regardless of the damage she has done with her lies.

That is the world we live in and it fucking disgusts me.

I did not presume this man's innocence or guilt before news of his innocence broke. But the fact remains that I didn't even know this man's name before this accusation was made and I still shouldn't know it now. The same anonymity given to this man's accuser should have been given to him.

The reason equality such as this will most likely never happen is because there are people set against the idea of equality that work rigorously to maintain the status quo. Those people are feminists. When the accuser, Nafissatou Diallo, had her name released the feminists within France gathered a group of three thousand protesters to show their disdain for what they saw as misogynistic.

Misogynistic? Really?

Feminist, Elena Rossini made it quite clear that she was outraged by how many people in France were disgusted by how Kahn was put on display in front of reporters while in handcuffs. Rossini was outraged at the mere idea that putting a man in front of the media while in handcuffs can make him appear guilty. The thing that sent Rossini over the edge, however, was the fact that real equality was allowed to take place and Nafissatou Diallo's name was released.

Take note that it wasn't the fact that some radio commentators weighed in with their opinions on Diallo's attractiveness that outraged these feminists into the streets. No. It was the fact that a woman received the same treatment as a man, minus the handcuffs that made their blood boil.

French feminists marched through the streets carrying signs that read:

> Sexism: Men go wild while women suffer.
> No means no.
> Let's take men out of their caves.
> We're sick and tired of barbarians.

Do these colorful phrases remind anyone here in America of anything?

Now it's obvious that these feminists have already made up their minds on the case, as usual. But it just goes to show that equality has never been the goal of feminism. These signs aren't just bigoted; they assigned guilt where guilt had not been proven.

Light is starting to shine on the discrimination against men within western cultures and feminists know it. This is why they are now shifting the format of their message to include male issues. The ruse isn't going to work with me. Feministing has recently put out two articles concerning male issues. One criticized the double standard in our culture, which encourages the creation of women only spaces, organizations, and social groups while shunning anything male. The other involved male circumcision. These two articles, two, have got some anti-feminists thinking that maybe some feminists are trying to change their anti-male thinking. There is also a new website, which feminists claim is a masculinist website, created by feminists who frequent and support the website manboobz.

Give me a fucking break.

Feminists do not care about the rights of men. They do not view male issues as important and will never hold them in the same regard as they do female issues. Many of them still believe that men don't have any issues.

I have read several articles from the new website created by Ozymandias and I can tell you now it is not a website that advocates for men's rights. It is a website created for the purpose of being a scapegoat feminists can point to when accused of not speaking of or caring about male issues. It is another "good men" project littered with "conscious" men who wish to push feminist propaganda under the guise of men's rights. I exposed the misandry within two of their articles here and here.

As for feministing? As I read the first article that got many anti-feminists to think feminists are changing I began to smile at first. It seemed like the author was genuinely taking it to the feminist bigots who don't view male issues as important.

Then I read the second half.

The second half of the article basically blames the problems of everyone, and I do mean everyone, and everything on masculinity. The other article about circumcision appears genuine; however, it is one feminist article surrounded by many others that don't even recognize male circumcision as genital mutilation.

Out of all this change that is taking place within feminism we find one article that appears to be genuine about one male issue. I am not one to shun people when they are genuinely trying to change for the better but I have seen feminists employ this ruse before from feministing and many other sites. But a ploy is all it is. I believe they are only doing this now because a shift in our culture is starting to take place and they want to cover their asses before they collide with the shit storm headed their way.

About two years ago I created a video and joined other anti-feminists on youtube, putting out the message that men are suffering in western cultures and that feminism is a large part of the reason why. It was my very first video and in it I predicted exactly what is happening now.

1. Men tell feminists that western laws strip males of their civil rights.
2. Feminists ask for proof.
3. Men provide proof.
4. Feminists change the subject.
5. Feminists ignore the facts.
6. Feminists laugh at the idea of male plight.
7. Unbiased men and women see this and research the facts.
8. Men AND women tell feminists that western laws strip males of their civil rights.
9. Feminists realize their hypocrisy is being revealed.
10. Feminists offer to cooperate with Mens Rights Activists.

The Ozymandias website was created because of a reactionary article written by a feminist who could no longer deny the hypocrisy within her movement. However, instead of actually addressing the damage feminism has done, she and her contributors instead choose to blame everything else. They blame patriarchy (read: men), rape culture (read: men), toxic masculinity (read: men), and many other things that have nothing to do with why men face discrimination.

I won't tell everyone within the anti-feminist movement what to do or how they should go about opposing feminism. I'm practically a nobody within this movement and my word hardly carries any weight in terms of giving directorial advice. Besides that I don't like being told what to do so I won't practice what I don't like. What I will say is something I left out of my video, which is something I thought would be obvious to any anti-feminist. The offer of cooperation from any feminist will never be genuine for one simple reason. If one wishes to end male discrimination, one must challenge everything that has caused male discrimination. Feminism is not the sole enforcer of misandry but it is the primary cause for much of the legal and cultural anti-male discrimination within western societies, therefore challenging this discrimination means challenging feminism.

This is something feminists will never do.

Feminists can criticize their exclusion of men all day but that is the only thing they will criticize. You will never see feminists call for an end to the Violence Against Women Act and advocate for the creation of a Violence Against People Act. It will never happen because feminists who do this will no longer be feminists.

Ask Christina Sommers and Warren Farrell.

So for anyone considering the idea of standing alongside a feminist on the steps of a family court, protesting the anti-male bigotry within the legal system, just remember that the feminist next to you will most likely be in support of that system. And if your frustration has reached its breaking point to where you feel that life is no longer worth it, the same feminist standing next to you will accuse you of wanting to hurt your loved ones if you decide to end your pain.

Feminists do not want to stand with men they want to stand against men and women who do not share their worldview. Men are the "barbaric" enemy who need to be "taken out of their caves” according to feminists. According to feminists, men deserve to have their faces plastered over every media outlet and branded as rapists when a woman accuses them of the crime.

There is no equal treatment for men within the legal system in regards to any crime. Men are more harshly punished for every crime. One accusation from a woman can destroy a man’s life and feminists wish to keep it this way.

Bigots such as these are no allies of mine.

Happy Birthday AVfM

It was one year ago today that AVfM made its official debut in the Manosphere.

By any measure I can think of it has been a resounding success. And by every indicator that I have at my disposal the next year will make the first pale in comparison.

It's been a hell of a ride so far, often bringing me to the point of exhaustion and frustration, but never failing to provide ultimate satisfaction and a great sense pride in what is being accomplished here.

There are simply too many people to thank, and I don't want to leave anyone out so please just accept my deepest appreciation for everyone who has supported the mission here. Some of you have turned into friends, and that has enriched my life as well as helping me to keep going.

I also have to say that the thanks are now extended from Manuel Dexter as well as from myself. He has become the driving force behind much of what we are doing here, including the radio show and register-her.com. And a special nod to Keyster who works diligently to ensure that every broadcast of AVfM radio goes smoothly.

A couple of points of business here to catch things up on register-her.com.

There was a coding problem with the links, as people mentioned regarding the Jessica Valenti page. That solution has been found and we are in the process of making corrections. You will see that the ones on Valenti's page are now working.

MD is preparing the user submitted forms and they will be ready for the official launch in just a few days. Once those are in place, and a few more details are worked out, we will be ready to go fully live and the first press release will be issued to over 30,000 media outlets.

Then we can all crack open a cold one and watch the fireworks.

AVfM radio has just completed four consecutive episodes so the upcoming week will be a bye for the program.

There is one other surprise on the way, but it is a "show you," not a "tell you," kind of thing. Suffice it to say there are more changes coming and I think most of you will like them very much. Alek Novy is involved, so you can count on good results.

Gents and ladies, here's to the next year.

Those In Crass Houses

July 2, 2011 | by Tom Snark | Link | Original Link

While I did say that I wouldn't be writing about Amanda Marcotte again, having lost the will to indulge her insane ramblings, she has just re-engaged my interest – by proving me right.

As I said, only a few days ago:

> To perpetuate the illusion that she is fighting on the side of the underdog, she has to keep on doubling down, time and time again, to preserve this fragile worldview. Any suggestion that feminism has done wrong is a threat not only to feminism but to the individual feminist's mental state. Nobody likes to accept that they are responsible for causing harm. So a further lie is needed to shield the original lie from the incoming projectile of truth.

And what has been her response to the criticism of her obscene remarks about the recently deceased Thomas Ball? Further statements invented out of whole cloth to justify the original crock. MRAs don't think women are people. MRAs want everyone to stop taking rape and domestic violence seriously. MRAs don't care about the nuances of family law. MRAs are ultimately responsible for Thomas Ball's death. MRAs are equivalent to Creationists.

That last one strikes me as particularly ironic, since it's not our side that decries evolutionary psychology and insists that all human traits are social constructions.

But anyway, as obsessed as Amanda Marcotte undoubtedly is with the Men's Rights Movement, she fails to grasp what it actually is. To be fair, the name is misleading. It's not really a 'movement' in the same way that other movements are movements, and its advocates generally do not fit the traditional definition of 'activist' (with some outstanding exceptions – on which note, please check out what Paul Elam is up to tonight).

Still, and somewhat regrettably, the acronyms 'MRM' and 'MRA' have stuck. So be it. I do not concern myself with whether or not individuals within the 'movement', or the 'movement' as a whole, fit their dictionary definitions. The terms are widely accepted now, and it's a waste of time to contest them.

Fidelbogen recently wrote a post on two feminist fallacies, and I must say that his timing could not have been better. Amanda Marcotte's total misapprehension of what the MRM is or who MRAs actually are is very clearly an example of the crosshairs fallacy. She reduces everything MRA-related to "wingnuts" – and I would guess that by that, she imagines MRAs are all gun-toting survivalists, religious fundamentalists, buck-toothed racists from the South, and so on. You know the stereotype. It's not an original one.

She really gives the game away with this comment:

> I will point out that said wingnuts are striking this pose while not reconsidering > their attitudes towards suicide bombers, so long as said bombers are Muslim.

Who, precisely, is she referring to here? Has there ever once been an official MRA statement on suicide bombers, let alone Muslim suicide bombers? I (one of said wingnuts) have never once stated my attitude towards suicide bombers. Neither has any other MRA I can think of.

Leaving aside the false equivalence (Thomas Ball committed suicide, he was not a suicide bomber), a statement like this could only be made by somebody who has an extremely narrow view of what an MRA is – in other words, somebody who is trying to trap MRAs in the crosshairs. Marcotte has practically made this into a left vs. right issue when it is nothing of the sort. MRAs are, generally, as seething towards social conservatism as they are towards progressivism. Those who approach MRA sites advocating white nationalism don't tend to stick around very long – because MRAs tell them where to stick it. A number of prominent MRA bloggers openly identify as left wing, and receive no censure for it. Our very own Spartacus is strongly anti-war.

This notion that MRAs are all evangelical whackos and gun nuts is truly laughable to anyone who comprehends what is really meant by the term 'MRM'. It's not, for the most part, an organised movement, or even a movement at all in the typical sense. It is an organic reaction. The MRM does not go on recruitment drives; it doesn't need to. Dispossessed and disenfranchised men are out there; they come from absolutely all walks of life; and they find us. The only way to stop this from happening is to stop dispossessing and disenfranchising men, as feminism has been doing for the last fifty years.

Otherwise, the MRM – or whatever we want to call it – is going to continue growing. Its ranks will swell with angry men – angry at their powerlessness, brought about by the hands of women and their violence-by-proxy.

Indeed, you could round up every single 'MRA' today, and kill them all! And before long, there would be a whole new bunch of MRAs, having sprung up seemingly from nowhere. What we call the Men's Rights Movement is really a collective social force mobilising against feminism, by itself, with very little actual organisation. As long as feminists insist on persecuting men, this reaction is invariably going to take place. There are always going to be 'MRAs', although they might not call themselves that – indeed, it is my well-informed opinion that most people who we could fairly define as MRAs have never even heard of the term 'MRA'.

Given that feminism seeks to persecute all men – whether white, black, gay, straight, conservative, liberal, rich or poor – we naturally find a cross-section of society populating what we call the 'MRM'. The MRM, being like society in microcosm, contains all types of men – and women. (This is perhaps the most egregious omission in reducing MRAs to 'wingnuts' – the contributions by women to anti-feminist literature cannot be overlooked.) The anti-Muslim, America-fuck-yeah, guns 'n' ammo caricature that Marcotte reduces MRAs to is not insulting. It's just bizarre, and is well recognised as such by anyone who actually reads MRA blogs or fathoms the larger picture of what we mean by 'the Men's Rights Movement'.

That larger picture being, of course, that opposition is inevitably going to spring up amongst those sectors of society that are being victimised. Call it MRA, call it what you will. The sector in this case is men – that is men as a whole, not some subset of men, e.g. white men, or right-wing men, or men who bash Muslims.

Let me give you an example. Three counties in the United Kingdom have been selected to trial a new policy on domestic violence, known as 'Go' orders. Under this new policy, any man who is accused of domestic violence can be banned from entering his own home for a month.

Please note: we are only talking about an accusation here. Absolutely no corroborating evidence is required. A criminal charge does not have to be filed. Without having been charged with an offence (which would at least allow him to defend himself in a court of law), a man can be stripped of his right to enter his own home, on the say-so of his partner, who needs present no evidence of her claims whatsoever.

Feminists will, no doubt, cheer on this empowerment of women over men. But it will occur to any man who cohabits with a female that his right to enter his own place of residence now rests wholly in her hands. She can ban him from his own property at any time she chooses. And even if she elects to set that power down, society allows her to pick it up again at any moment.

And let nobody pretend that this is not about targeting men. The very people involved in pushing this policy forward are perfectly clear about their gender profiling and presumption of guilt:

> Now, if a person is arrested for domestic violence, we often get a situation where we know this has gone on but we can't prove it.
> It's her word against his. No other evidence whatsoever. Currently we're in the horrible situation where we have to release the man.

If you can cast your mind back to Amanda Marcotte's comment that MRAs are like Creationists, I invite you to compare it to this total refutation of the scientific method, courtesy of the feminist sector. The quoted state functionary claims he can know something without having any proof of it. It's as if the Enlightenment never happened.

Only in a culture hostile to men's rights could a lack of evidence actually be taken as evidence that a man is guilty. Her word against his apparently equates to him being guilty; presumably, because her word is worth more than his. Releasing the man is not the 'horrible situation' – imprisoning a man and then prohibiting him from entering his own home on the basis of no evidence whatsoever is truly despotic. It is not as if we can claim that women don't lie about being assaulted, but that appears to be the thinking behind policies like the 'Go' orders.

Is it at all conceivable that men do not recognise what this means: that they no longer even need to be charged with a crime to have their most fundamental rights violated; that their wives and girlfriends now hold absolute power in their relationship, and that simply disagreeing with her might cost them everything?

Of course men recognise what is happening. And every woman becomes suspect, because every woman has the right to exercise violence-by-proxy. Armed thugs are at her bidding, just one phone call away. The law and the state work to please her by brutalising common men. She need not get her hands dirty. The boys in blue gallantly offer to bust men's heads for her, and men have no recourse.

And remember, policies that allow women to commit violence-by-proxy do not target only conservative men, or redneck men, or men who own firearms. They target all men, from the farm labourer to the army cadet to the sociology student. The resistance to feminism, naturally, comes from all sections of society, from the bottom rungs to the upper echelons. How else do we imagine a man – of any political persuasion – to respond, when he witnesses self-identified feminists cackling over their power to deprive men utterly of everything that makes life worth living? (And then, without pausing for breath, reaffirming their preferred metanarrative of female victimhood and male privilege.)

I think I have made my point sufficiently well. Despite her obsession with the MRM, Amanda Marcotte has not the slightest clue what it actually is – and nor will she ever accept any other account of what it is. She will continue to commit the crosshairs fallacy. I quote Fidelbogen:

> Beset by hostile forces which they cannot fathom, [feminists] try to align a narrow target, as it were, in the crosshairs of a sniper scope. Their deluded hope is, that the sum and substance of what threatens them lies within that constricted radius, and that if only they neutralize the target area, their troubles will go away and perpetual revolution will resume its course unhindered.
> They sense, quite rightly, that larger social forces are mobilizing against feminism and what feminism has inflicted on the world, and with utmost naïveté they have undertaken a shorthand analysis that would make these things mentally easier to cope with.
> The crosshairs fallacy springs from a childish belief that the vital force of the non-feminist revolution concentrates in a point source […] and that if you neutralize this particular "head", then the "snake" will expire. But that is a gross misunderstanding — akin to attacking a prominent mushroom in complete ignorance of the underlying mycelium which spreads for miles. For even if you kill, imprison, or pinklist every suspected "MRA" on the planet, you will not have made a dent in the cultural forces which generated MRAs in the first place.

Be vewy vewy quiet. Amanda’s huntin’ MRAs.

There would be little purpose in going through each of Amanda Marcotte’s points and disputing them one by one. She fundamentally misunderstands what she is talking about. Still, we should not expect much more than reckless and ignorant generalisations from the Ann Coulter of the left. Considering some of Marcotte’s own recent statements, she would do well to recall that those in crass houses shouldn’t throw stones.

Feminist Kia Abdullah Laughs At Recently Deceased Men

July 4, 2011 | by Tom Snark | Link | Original Link

As reported on 30th June, three young British men were tragically killed in a bus crash in Thailand while on gap year from university.

One would think that the feminist sector might remain silent on the issue, since the accidental death of men has no obvious bearing upon issues of women's rights or sexual equality – which, I am assured, is all feminism is really about.

But then, feminists haven't been particularly good at holding their tongues just lately, have they?

Kia Abdullah is a writer for the pro-feminist Guardian newspaper. In one column, which is (of course) all about herself, she makes her feminist credentials perfectly clear:

> I, like most women, want financial security, comfort, love and warmth, but for those of us who have grown up fighting patriarchy, it's difficult to allow a man to guide and support us, be it a father, lover or a boss.

So, what was self-identified feminist Kia Abdullah's response to the news that three men had died in a road accident?

> Is it really awful that I don't feel sympathy for anyone killed on a gap yaar? That's awful, right? Yes, I'm a terrible person.
> I actually smiled when I saw that they had double-barrelled surnames. Sociopathic?

Well, I think this speaks for itself. So long as we're all aware that a feminist like Kia Abdullah would have never said such a thing if that bus had been carrying three young women on a gap year, then we can all agree that Ms. Abdullah deserves her very own entry at register-her.com. Category: Bigot. And once the submission forms are made public in a few days time, I have a feeling that she may well get what she deserves.

It’s Okay, Kia Abdullah Was Just Kidding

July 6, 2011 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

I have, for a long time; argued that feminism was a doctrine built on violence and hatred. It wasn’t just rhetoric – I believed it, and I still do. The evidence of this is so abundant that failure to grasp this point requires willful self delusion.

However, even with this understanding, the naked pronouncements of glee, by feminists over the deaths of men has taken my by surprise. One example of this is Kia Abdullah, who writes for the pro-feminist newspaper; the Guardian. Three British men killed in a bus crash precipitated the following comments made via twitter from Miss Abdullah;

“Is it really awful that I don’t feel sympathy for anyone killed on a gap year? […]
I actually smiled when I saw that they had double-barrelled surnames. Sociopathic?”

Abdullah’s remarks are not the only example of a proud contempt for human tragedy, they are simply a recent example.

After the gruesome political suicide of Thomas Ball, feminist ideologues openly mocked the decade of pain and abuse which drove him to self immolate. But even this triumphal crowing over a man’s burned corpse lacked the open sadism demonstrated by Abdullah’s recent commentary. And this is where I must admit confusion.

I may have missed a memo. I may have failed to observe the shift in zeitgeist in which public joy over the deaths of humans became acceptable, even desirable, rather than monstrous. As long as those killed happen to be male.

I am genuinely puzzled that a prominent feminist writer can make such a public confirmation of her ideology’s foundation in hatred and violence, without totally discrediting herself and discrediting feminism as a construct of hatred.

Since Abdullah’s remarks, she has subsequently published an apology. Whether this was driven by recognition of the character of her tweets mocking the deaths, or simply a covering action in response to public reaction to her mockery is unclear. Having read the published output of many other feminists, Abdullah’s claim that she was merely joking is a probable backpedal.

Whoops! The public isn’t quite ready to cheer for males being killed in random accidents, yet. But this still leaves us with the unfiltered malice, expressed in a public medium from a proponent of an ideology which claims to pursue the goal of social and legal equity between men and women.

At what point, as an adherent to this ideology, does an individual look in the mirror. Cheering and laughing about people being killed. Deliberate and cruel mockery of humans in such protracted pain that they chose the most gruesome of deaths by self immolation.

I refer to the dismissive and mocking tone of the mainstream media’s coverage of the political protest by suicide of Thomas Ball. This example and Kia Abdullah’s are not aberrations, they reflect the normal tone of mainstream social comment in our society. In a cultural climate of escalating misandry, the reaction against Abdullah wasn't because she disparaged men who died, only because her comments amplified the existing hatred of men beyond the current palatable limit. From a context of subjective social acceptance, Abdullah merely tuned the dial up too fast. However, in doing so – she provided illumination of a fact most in the public are content to ignore – that feminism is the prevailing ideology in our society, and that it is a doctrine built on the foundations of violence and hatred.

No amount of backpedalling apology can disguise this from an alert observer, and although Abdullah has demonstrate herself a hateful bigot, she's provided a service in outing herself, and her ideology founded on violence and hatred, so deserves thanks.

It is far past time for feminists to admit to themselves and the public that they are violent, hateful bigots. That's probably pretty hard to swallow for self identified feminists, but it gets worse. Whether individuals admit it or not, our society is a feminist society. This becomes clear when we examine the funding of large feminist organizations like N.O.W., governments creating offices and departments to promote feminism, universities issuing degrees in feminist ideology of women's or gender studies, et cetera. – unless individuals take an oppositional position, we are all feminists. And unless you yourself are a Mens Rights Activist, or some other flavor of libertarian, you are a feminist too.

Of course, feminists of the strongly self identifying flavor will not admit theirs is a doctrine of violence. In addition to being an ideology, it is a religious belief. The ideology is correct by it's own definition.

To those who may not self identify as feminists – when will you cease to nod your head politely as you are told feminism is synonym for humanism. Will you smile agreeably when the corpse of your male relative is publicly ridiculed, and their death cheered?

An Observation On Language

What follows has no more weight than my personal opinion for your consideration.

If you are an MRA, you own a body of specialized knowledge. One of the major goals of the movement is to spread this knowledge to members of the general public. Like any other area of specialized human activity, the men's rights movement has it's own vocabulary. As the movement represents opposition to an overwhelming majority point of view, it is not surprising that some of the specialized vocabulary of the MRM is invective, disparaging of identified opposition to the human rights of people who happen to be male.

This terminology includes terms like White Knight, Pussy Pass, Feminazi, and Mangina. These terms, being a part of the special vocabulary of the MRM serve several purposes, and an important one is the establishment of culture. We are, as mens rights activists, a community. Despite the diffuse geographical distribution of active MRAs, having more than just a shared set of philosophies, our jargon knits us together.

However, I have chosen to eschew some of the most obvious pejorative jargon, such as "mangina" and "feminazi" and I will explain why.

Every week or so, some well-intentioned newcomer stumbles into this site, reads the content of an article or a comment thread, then advises us that while our arguments are observably true – the obvious anger is off-putting, and if we just toned down our rhetoric, we'd reach a larger audience.

The visitors who make this complaint are fools, and this is not my reason for finding other words to express "feminazi".

The word "mangina" is obvious as an insult, non-MRAs have no trouble determining that anyone so-labeled is being insulted and disparaged. That is not the problem. The problem is that beyond the offer of insult, "mangina" does not explain anything to a non-MRA. The word fails in the job of spreading the knowledge of the Men's Rights Movement to a wider audience. In addition, the lack of explanative power, along with the obviously pejorative context feeds into the feminist talking-point that MRAs are merely disgruntled, immature abusers, angry that our "privileges to oppress women" have been diminished.

My own preferred term used in substitute of "mangina" is the admittedly unwieldy "male apologist for female supremacy". This doesn't roll off the tongue quite so easily, but is more usefuly descriptive of the subject to a reader who has not discarded the false assumptions of the mainstream narrative of feminism.

I don't steer around the word to present a polite face to the public. I do not use an unwieldy alternative to disguise my contempt for men who collaborate in legal marginalization of male identity.

Calling a male feminist out as a mangina does provide some satisfaction. Yes, it does. But my reason for avoiding it, is that calling male feminists by the pejorative "mangina" does not advance the goal of spreading my personal flavor of Men's Rights Advocacy to the public.

I'm almost done, so here's the disclaimer. My variety of Mens Rights Advocacy is my own, just as yours is your own. There is arguably no recognizable institution to point to and say "here's the MRM". This means that each individual decides for themselves what their goals and strategies are.

My preferences in the use of terminology are my own, and are presented for your consideration. What you do is your choice, and not mine, and should serve your personal goals as an MRA. I am not suggesting to anyone that my opinions have any greater weight than anyone else. To imagine I am the example to follow – how stupid and arrogant I would have to be. My opinions are just that, opinions. But, in my own personal cosmology, my speech and action as an MRA are not an exercise.

I'm here to win.

Thank you for your consideration.

Pulling Back The Foreskin

July 8, 2011 | by J Galt | Link | Original Link

I am bothered by the dialogue, opinion and articles regarding masculinity that I read on the internet. I can't get over the notion that masculinity has devolved to a kind of social fashion and is being peddled like size 8 will solve all your problems. What really gets me are the guys that feel confused about their masculinity. I have a few things to say about masculinity, so I thought I would. No, this isn't scripted from Harlequin or Cosmo and there is no moist panty factor. I read the following question on a blog, maybe this was the one that broke my back.

How do you feel about your masculinity? Is this important to you?

Well, why not try single word association, isn't that the way masculinity is perceived? How about "isolated", until I can determine the kind of masculinity to fit the exchange I have to engage? After all, the male imperative is to succeed, so fitting the right flavor of masculinity to the task is a necessary exercise. Masculinity for the most part is a very negative experience. The only viable counterbalance to it is success. As social animals, isolation is the predominant threat to men.

The two operative words are "success" and "isolation". I see these as the nucleus of masculinity. More importantly they are gauges to whether you have constructed a viable façade of masculinity. Having reflected on this for some time, I concluded that isolation for a man is likely the worst thing you can do to him. I say this because all of the social levers that work against men are designed to isolate him. I think this is the real meaning behind what MRA's call "the disposability of men".

Masculinity is a very rigid construct, a consensus built by everyone else. It is confused by subjectivity and polarized by giving and taking. The indoctrination into masculinity is directed toward the service of others, which includes the giving of your very life. The concept repeats itself religiously, politically and intimately. I find masculinity acts more as an interface and becomes the functionary between the male and the world. The male for reasons of duty and expendability, does not really exist to the world.

The reasonable exchange for this role was the freedom to propagate. Today that is removed from men and their value is reduced below non-existence, into a cannibalized consumable commodity for the feminine individual and the feminine state. One could say that homosexuality is a disdain and rejection of cannibalization and expendability. A profound nurturing of the essential male juxtaposed to the feminine. After all, the few moments of engaged sexuality are dwarfed by the hours and days of expressed politics that lead to it. The Gay male politic is unencumbered by isolation from the feminine or it's requirement to succeed.

Young men struggle for years neutralizing their male existence and shaping a projected phantasmic character in which to exist and perform masculinity. They must first know and understand the rules of the environment in which the masculine character is projected and expressed. Then of course the meticulous process of accepting the restrictions, flawlessly. To screw this process up regardless of age will default you back to isolation.

Young men without fathers will have a particularly difficult time. Their indoctrination to masculinity will be directed in a service to others that does not and will not provide for their own existence. The fruits of their altruistic labors are illusions served up as viable and worthy. I know many men who have spent their lives giving in any way they could and then giving more. False mentors will criticize any expression of selfishness, and the fundamentals of masculinity will be described as self-sacrifice. All carried out in a subtle repetition of brief acceptance that shields him temporarily from isolation.

In a neolithic view the male experience would be equal to, hunting and killing prey for food, bringing it back to the village, being handed a slice big enough to sustain him for his next hunt, then being told to fuck off and get back out there and kill. While the elders, leaders, women and children gorge themselves in his absence. The obvious answer to his isolation is to kill as many elders and leaders as he can. Nothing has changed.

His job isolates him and his only method to qualify as a family participant is his success. His boss knows this and will use it to benefit the business. After all, the boss if a man is quite likely in the same boat.

Success as a family man is never achieved. It’s a migrating malleable standard of living which he answers for with jibes, subtle humiliation, emasculation, and all the ambiguous threats of isolation. Of course this experiential process is now compounded by sexual harassment in the work place, which most men deal with by defaulting to, you guessed it isolation. Better just to stay the fuck away from these harpies.

Fulfilling a partner becomes ancillary and secondary to his larger fear and struggle with success. In an overanxious semi neurotic state of stress he can select between housework, time with the kids or passion play in his off hours. If he fails to fulfill his partners list of fulfillment, provided to her by empowered friends that know how to shop for empowered fulfillment, he will default his fulfillment to isolation. This will come back to haunt him as his mid-life crisis which is his embrace of mortality and impending death. By this time he knows he is measured only by numbers at the end of the week, or totals on a credit card statement. Or he may be measured in ways he is unaware of such as the Harlequin scale, or the Cosmo index. I could go on and on but the point is, men don’t succeed, the people around him do. They are quick to let him know how much of a man he isn’t. That’s isolating

Masculinity is not a one size fits all expression, whether it’s referred to as a patriarchy or toxic, does not define the subjective experience. Men of all social rank adhere to the fundamentals of the masculine social interface, success and isolation. Our social standing is prepared for us we need only negotiate the signature on the contract and play along. Whether you create a video to encrypt benevolent sexism, lynch a rapist, allege empirical study, go your own way, or are homosexual, you are battling success and isolation.

Success will always be the counter balance to isolation, to being disposable.

Feminist politic has furthered the illusion and isolation of masculinity by grafting a patriarchal archetype of oppression to its essence. The illusion hides the reality that the politic of patriarchy, is a truly external entity and force. This is not a force that is exclusive to and accessed only by men, but a “central collaborator” accessed by both genders, mitigating a collaborative social structure. One could say that feminine access and control of a patriarchy is much more profound and real, evidenced by the rapid social change and quixotic policy and legislation that has so profoundly damaged the male agency.

The damage to masculinity can be seen in the efforts to extend its isolation and confuse and vilify its identity. This is repeated in criminal, civil and family law, higher learning and academia, politics, sports and media. The male has achieved what is better defined as landed immigrant status and taxation without representation. America has become the land of the female home of the slave. Amidst the calamity of a fashion sensitive selection of a masculinity, the practitioner male who is selecting should realize there is only one central question he must answer. Who will this masculinity serve, himself or everyone else?

Additionally feminism contrary to its claims does not eschew or seek to end patriarchy but rather control and drive it. Seeing through the illusion will reveal that feminism does not possess, support, construct or promote a collaborative process to replace it. Equality the central tenet of feminism is not a collaborative structure but rather a dividing structure that negotiates existing power and wealth. The extensions of equality such as affirmative action, sexual harassment legislation and rape shield laws are mere poker chips issued by the house to an inexperienced player.

Even rape itself as most widely presented by a woman is not to mediate the past but to mediate the future as a wild card called pity. It can be heard clearly in the repetition of its political definition embraced as a personal experience. Rape is rarely presented as the personally confusing emotional and physical experience that it is. It is rather sequestered to a coerced political statement and used for political gain. It is right and correct to ignore it for what it is, coercion.

It would be right and correct to consider female biology in the equation. To suggest that the body does not repair itself would be equal to saying that a woman can only conceive one child. The pain of pregnancy and birth is not transcendent but humanly manageable. The psychological aspect of rape does not exceed the outcome and effect on any person man or woman that has been subjected to violence.

It is curious to consider that rape for a woman does not represent a biological contradiction to her utility as it would and does for a male victim of rape. Yet we pay the male victim no fare. This ethical contradiction suggests that female rape may be better represented as a property crime. It may be better simply to issue rape insurance to women as some governments are now offering the payout. Once privatized, behaviors that may contribute to the occurrence can be scrutinized by female executive peers who may be wildly unimpressed with slut-walks and more diligent with their ethics.

Male rape however is a true sexual crime. The male on male rapist is dressed in his masculinity, he is the collaborative co-dependent partner of the feminine, isolated from her. He wears the mask of a feminine counterpart, an assigned and approved identity shaped by her. His victim however experiences the violent tearing away of his masculinity, his approved status. It is the male in him that is raped and left in a violent confusion torn from his masculinity.

How I feel about my masculinity is a different issue, we are modular creatures socially, but privately, inside we are isolated by who we are as a spontaneous experience and how we fit that private self into a social exchange. If you can appreciate the humorous satire regarding gender, women with their movement to liberation proclaimed that the personal is political. Men have known and lived this way for centuries, male stoicism is a response to that understanding and awareness. The stoic is unknowable, and unpredictable he breaks the link between the personal and the political with a barrier of privacy and isolation. His stoicism may last 10 seconds or ten years. The stoic preempts the feminine ability to punish by isolation, it is self-imposed and regulated, less emotionally damaging.

It is somewhat unrealistic to ask a man how he feels about his masculinity since masculinity is a commodity much like female fashion. He wears it and deals with the fit in process. A good analogy of masculinity is to compare it to Lego, it’s modular, interchangeable, multi-functional and external. Internally it is only as structural or as permanent as the environment in which it is being applied. A young boy displays this at play, he will build and tear down and rebuild, but he is practicing applying the same process to himself. By the time he has reached this age the understanding of his place in the world is already achieved. He has already witnessed the process of care giving, passive and aggressive gender roles, the male construction workers, cashiers, truck drivers and female idleness. What is very unfortunate for young boys is the response to their maleness.

In re-scripting masculinity young boys are introduced to a paradoxical contradiction of expression. By softening masculinity or feminizing it in young boys we are setting a trap of cyclical failure. Young girls will express and exchange physical affection in their play by holding hands, or simply standing closer in proximity to each other physically. Once a young boy is socialized to the same process he will do and act the same. But he will experience a repetition of failure as a result. In the real world such behavior is considered predatory and dealt with by zero tolerance policy. Males are not welcome into this sphere of intimacy.

What we are doing to young males is pathologizing their gender. We are subtly planting a neurotic, overanxious confusion that can only migrate to rage fueled by social betrayal. The same could be said for girls when they are later in life labeled as a bitch for displaying aggressive behavior. The difference however is one does not suffer the violence of the state when misunderstood. By the time we introduce gender modifying tactics it is already too late, the child has already conceptualized his identity. We are simply undermining his understanding and ability to express his role, particularly if we remove his father as a role model, or if that role model is damaged by alienation.

Removing the role model from a boy leads straight back to the predominant threat he will struggle with for most of his life, isolation. Without a comparative role model he is isolated in a way that is no different from a hostage or prisoner. He will attempt to succeed his way out, once free if he ever achieves it, his hostility toward the feminine will be magnified, dangerously. We foolishly play with terms like nurture and nature, but we fail to realize that nurturing the egg is pointless if it has already hatched into a rooster. From that point it is in the hands of role models and mentors. Those qualified to represent viable alternatives to his masculinity, those in which he sees himself.

Even the popular notion of boys being raised by same sex lesbian couples is dangerously flawed. Neither parent can represent a role model to adequately animate his masculinity. He is isolated in his masculinity and left only to negotiate his isolation. Inherently the message for a boy portrayed by same sex lesbian parents is isolation, an equation of intimacy in which he will never participate. The very nature of their relationship disassociates him from his masculinity. He spends his childhood punished by his gender. We have all heard the argument that a child only requires love. This is very affirming for the parent and represents a successful feminine attribute of nurturing. It says nothing for the experience of a boy as child. His language and expression are to unrefined and inexperienced to say it.

What is missing from the equation is the ability to conceptualize self-love within a masculine identity. A woman cannot provide this and 2 mothers at best confirm his isolation and likely his self- loathing. It is never the job of a child to provide positive affirmation for an adult or to represent the object of her success. A case can be made simply by examining the context in which chivalry is taught and whether it is taught by a woman or a male role model. Because women enjoy the fruits of chivalry by receiving it, they are unaware of the purpose, practice and regulation of it as a masculine trait.

Male role models however understand the potential for a successful exchange by applying chivalrous actions and are able to illustrate to younger males its value for personal gain. I am reminded of a young man who following the teachings of his mother to protect women, intervened unsolicited on behalf of a woman in a bar, he was hospitalized in a coma, suffering a head trauma. Her teachings did not include his safety or self-worth. Additionally a nephew who on the street admonished a man for the way in which he spoke to his partner and was answered by two blows to the head, the second blow from the woman. Clearly there is a difference between preaching masculinity and teaching masculinity.

A woman will preach masculinity and thereby attempt to coerce the outcome to her own service and benefit. You need not travel far to be shamed, accused and isolated if you simply disagree. She will instruct and define masculinity toward superfluous expression. Her male counterparts, those engaged and heavily invested in their role of success and striving to curtail their own isolation echo her every word. Placing men that carry the message in powerful positions ensures the implementation of your service to her. It is a cheap trick and the very crime of objectification that so many women chastise, admonish and complain about. A male role model however will teach masculinity for the purpose of benefiting the practitioner. We see the difference clearly in the statistical outcomes suffered by males raised in single mother homes.

It is clear to me that any confusion over masculinity, should immediately propel the confused to answer only one simple question. Who will your masculinity serve? Brother if you get this wrong you will be in a world of hurt. The correct answer being self-love, should facilitate your education and understanding that the bonds between men and women have been broken by institutional feminism. There is nothing noble left in the female, she is as vile and filthy a creature as any male she describes. The safest quarters in which to reside, with your success and your isolation is not with a woman. For those younger men struggling with masculinity, the most potent masculinity is by conscious choice, falling into a costume may get you into the party but it is unlikely to get you home and safe. Shape it with peers and healthy mentors, it’s the coolest vehicle you will ever possess, don’t crash it, or allow it to be stolen!

Some thoughts on Casey Anthony

July 8, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

I have been watching what seems to be everyone in the world lately fume about injustice.

Everyone, and I do mean everyone, is up in arms about Casey Anthony. Virtually every Marvin and Matilda Middleclass in the land of the Promise Mall has stopped eating their Cheese Covered Whackyfries™ just long enough to express their outrage over a dead little girl and her guilty as O.J. mother getting ready to take a walk.

"How could this happen!?" has echoed off every office cubical in the nation, with vigor and huffy indignation. The same question has spread through the media like a malicious rumor and blue pill bloggers are doing their best to conjure up something that passes for an answer to peddle to their hostile and baffled readers.

Let me 'splain something to you. If you have been one of those people asking aloud to anyone who will listen, "How could this happen?" the answer is simple.

Because YOU allowed it.

Because if you are unplugged enough from reality to have missed the, say, last fifty years of gender insanity in western culture, then the problem is, in fact, you.

And has been all along.

Let me ask you some questions. How did you react when Mary Winkler spent a total of 67 days in jail for shooting her husband in the back with a shotgun, as he slept?

Where was your outrage when Debra Lafave got off with probation for raping an underage boy?

Did you scratch your head and lament the injustice in the world when Lorena Bobbitt got away with sexually mutilating her sleeping husband, or did you crack jokes at the water fountain with the rest of the world?

Did you write any angry letters to your congressman or to the editor of your local newspaper when Crystal Gayle Mangum got off scot free after being busted lying about being raped – at the expense of three innocent men? How about the same for Danmell Ndonye who lied about being raped by five men at Hofstra University in New York?

Bet you didn't.

Fact is, we have a growing problem of violence and criminality in women in this culture, and the criminal justice system, aided by your depraved indifference, is bending over backwards to make sure they can keep committing crimes.

The Anthony case wasn't even that extreme. From women who toss their babies into dumpsters to die, to husband killers, rapists, pedophiles and false accusers, we let them off as fast as they can ruin, or end, the lives of other human beings.

We have practitioners of chivalry on one side of this issue; feminists on the other, and your ignorant ass in between.

Little Caylee's chances at justice were screwed before the "trial" ever started.

Are you aware of just how far out of hand things have become?

Did you know we have an epidemic of female teachers molesting both male and female students? Did you know that in Great Britain they are pushing to make lighter sentences for female criminals the default setting; that they are in fact exploring the idea of ending women's prisons altogether?

Did you know that he sentencing disparity between women and men is greater than that between any other groups of people, including race?

Do you know that women, and women only have a plethora of special defenses to murder available to them, from battered wife syndrome to post-partum depression to PMS?

Do you still not know how Casey Anthony got off?

We live in a world that increasingly refuses to punish criminals who possess a vagina. Yes, even when there is a dead toddler in the trunk of a car.

After taking a walk on her false allegation, Crystal Gail Mangum went on to commit a string of other crimes, most of which were also ignored, till she finally murdered her boyfriend.

Her violence, which was met with indifference by authorities, escalated till someone died.

Excuse me, allow me to ask again. Do you still not know how Casey Anthony got off?

Yes, now you do. If you read through the links provided in this article, you certainly have to know. The question that remains is simple.

Do you care?

And if you don't that is fine. But you have to admit, if you are going to quit caring because the answers don't suit you, then you really didn't care about justice to begin with.

You want extra cheese on those fries?

Meet and Greet Ads

July 9, 2011 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

[dropcap]D[/dropcap]ating ads. I've read a lot of them. Hundreds certainly, maybe thousands. These are ads written by women, presumably with the intent of attracting the interest of a man. Can you guess how many of them were appealing to me? How many of these ads made me think, hey this one sounds pretty good? Not a single one.

Of the thousands of personal ads written by women that I've read, how is it that not even one appealed to me? Does this mean I don't like women? No. That I'm gay, maybe?

No, I like women just fine. In fact, I love women, which makes the total failure of the segment of the female population writing these things even more appalling.

What this means is that personal ads written by women are not actually written with a male reader in mind, or even with a grasp of what a man is. They're wish fulfillment fantasies, driven by a disproportionate sense of entitlement, and informed by a feminist-based total failure to understand that a man is not simply a woman with outboard plumbing and a moustache.

It's true that audience of the site is largely male, and that's okay, but For the remainder of this article I'll be addressing female readers. I'm confident a few women outside of MRA circles may see it, and it's to them I'm writing. I hope the article provides some useful service.

I'm going to address a few of the common fantasies found in women's personals. We'll start with the titles, since that's the first thing anybody browsing such posting will see.

[box type="note" icon="none"][unordered_list style="star"]

- Can you be my cuddly baby forever?
- Looking for my prince charming
- Goldilocks searching for "just right"

[/unordered_list][/box]

Forever? Prince Charming? I didn't make these up. These are actual titles of meet-and-greet ads in the "women seeking men" sections of major dating sites. I didn't make up a single one of these lines. They are all copy-pasted straight from those websites, and are in fact quite typical.

Are you a woman who's written something along these lines? Okay, so you watched a lot of Disney animations as a child and it shaped your view of reality. Maybe you'd like to try on a pair of glass slippers?

The assumptions built into these titles are straight out of children's fairy tales, and do not reflect reality. Assuming for a moment that your ad connects you to a man you're compatible with, it simply won't work. Your stated expectations based on children's fantasy literature will poison any hope of a successful relationship, princess.

In addition, to most men who live in the real world, a woman entering the conversation with these kind of expectations is utterly unattractive. Men do not like women infected with the crazy.

So, allow me to assist you in your future endeavors to write more cogent and reasonable personal ads. Let's call it "Manuel's Manual for Spotting Your Own Bullshit."

Here are the red flags to look for

The following are all deal breakers. Some of these indicate that an ad was posted by a software robot rather than a human, some indicate that you are simply psychotic.

[box type="alert" icon="none"]Going For Walks Along The Beach –

If your ad says this, you might want to verify you are a real person. If you are a real person, and you've ever included this phrase in an online ad, kill yourself. Don't even finish reading this article. Just go.[/box]

[box type="note" icon="none"]Not Looking For Sex –

If your ad says this, you're lying. Stop wasting everybody's time, including your own. Obvious signs of dishonesty and deception are at the very top of most men's red-flag list. Not looking for sex? Then don't post a personal ad, dip-shit.[/box]

[box]Personal Ads Formatted as Job Ads –

So you want to structure your potential relationship as if you're the employer, and men are job applicants. The lucky one you pick is your employee.[/box]

Red Flags in Your "requirements"

[box type="alert" icon="none"]Over six feet tall –

This is standard boilerplate, and it's so nice to read. It makes a man really glad you appreciate that he's more than a slab of meat for your entertainment. It's especially sweet when the height requirement is accompanied by your self-identification as a BBW, with curves in all the right places.

Why not just say you're fat and you want a tall man to make you feel smaller and attractive? Honesty goes a long way.[/box]

[box type="note" icon="none"]Family Oriented –

This is a great one. What exactly does it mean? If a guy has a family already, I guess he's family oriented already, and if that's the case, keep off him. If he's single, do you imagine he wants to throw away his financial and personal independence to start paying your bills, or better yet, paying for the snotty kids from the last three Prince Charming's who pushed your thighs apart? For you, a clue, get one.[/box]

[box icon="none"]Pic for Pic –

This means of course, that you are unwilling to post your picture, but you expect the guy to post his. Better than this is "no pic, no reply" The absolute requirement that the man responding to your ad include his picture, while you haven't disclosed your own. One standard for yourself, and another standard for your prospective Prince Charming? Nice.[/box]

Speaking of pictures, on some personal sites, when the meet-and-greet contains a picture, it shows an icon in the title indicating to readers that the ad's author not only wrote something worth reading, but included their photo as well.

In a classified ad for a used car, a reader could reasonably expect an included photo to be a picture of the car. When a reader of a personal ad clicks through to view the text and photo of your personal ad, why are they presented with a clip-art picture of a kitten, a sunset, a bunch of trees, a single cut rose, or anything else other than a picture of you?

Did you include a photo to get more people clicking through to read it? If the picture is not of you, then it's bait-and-switch. Demonstrations of dishonesty, misdirection and deceptive manipulation are a GREAT way to win trust and love. No, really, starting out with obvious lies really turns guys on. Really.

Women apparently love lists, and this is never more obvious than when reading meet-and-greet ads written by them.

All the qualities you're looking for:

Over six feet tall,
Family-minded, handsome, charming, romantic, responsible, financially stable, professionally employed, generous, must love dogs and children, must love rollerblading, loves to do dishes, etc etc.

If men wrote ads like this,they would say :

Looking for a 21 year old smokin-hot-blonde with:

[unordered_list style="tick"]

- double-D cup tits
- 10 million dollars in the bank
- sex addiction
- gourmet cooking skills
- no kids
- a love of doing housework
- no inclination to criticize
- and has no gag reflex

[/unordered_list]
That's a deliberately absurd example , but the thing missing from every add I've seen, is anything a man might want.

The purpose of a dating ad is to attract the interested attention of available individuals of your preferred sex, right? So, if what you're looking for is a man, the ad should convey some indication that you, the author of the ad – possess some qualities that this hypothetical man will enjoy. Am I going to fast for you here?

Information about you.

[box type=”alert” icon=”none”]Loves to laugh –

As opposed to women who hate to laugh? Humour is so inefficient isn’t it? And people who love to laugh. They’re special, aren’t they?[/box]

[box type=”tick” icon=”none”]Wants to settle down –

Okay, have fun with that. Seriously, this is duck-speak, and what it really means is you’ve partied yourself into middle age, and now you’re looking for somebody to pay your bills, and probably pay for the children of the bad-boys you’ve been fucking for the past 15 years. No thanks.[/box]

[box type=”note” icon=”none”]Looking for Marriage –

This is choice nugget is fodder for a dozen articles itself. Stated succinctly, marriage version 2.0 is a construct affording legal and financial advantage to women, and legal and financial liability to men. What your’e really looking for is a somebody to fund you and do work on your behalf; someone who you can dispose of at will while retaining a portion of his earnings. There is no wage gap, and men are increasingly alert to the bad bet marriage is for them.[/box]

[box icon=”none”]Financially Independent, Wealthy, Generous, Established Professional, etc –

Ladies, there are hundreds of ways to say you’re a whore – but why do it when you’re trying to attract a man? Why do you imagine that you should be paid for your company?[/box]

Financially established is a quality I look for when I’m seeking investors in a business, because that’s a fiscally based relationship. Financially established is NOT a criteria for attraction or friendship. If it happens that you are, in actual fact a prostitute – but you’ve posted your ad in a dating site, then you’re misrepresenting your services, and that’s bad business practice.

Speaking of advertisements for prostitutes – women writing dating ads could take a lesson. Whores of the literal “pay me for sex” variety generally know how to compose a compelling advertisement. Also, while their ads tend to use exaggerated language – such as: “best blow-job in town”, they generally have a quality that romantic meet-and-greet adds lack. It’s a quality men find irresistible.

Honesty.

Thank you for your kind attention.

Not so long ago I read a post by an MRA who frequents this site and his name is Merlin.

The post briefly told of a story about this man's brother and a hell he's now in. A hell whipped up by his girlfriend.

There was nothing earth shattering about the story, in fact it was particularly mild when set against the backdrop of a landslide of other stories where men die in great numbers all about us in dangerous jobs, preventable suicide and in the terrible fog of war.

Still, I cannot escape the fact that when I read it it galvanised me and I had absolutely no idea why. I say I had no idea but when I realised exactly why it held my attention it floored me with it's simplicity.

I'm going to tell you about that, but before I do let's hear the story itself. Of course for reasons of politeness and respect It's edited for leanness only. I have taken very few words out and I have added nothing or rearranged the order of anything.

Here is what Merlin wrote to me:

…my brother was on holiday with the girlfriend and two children. At the time, one of the boys was walking and one was in need of a pushchair as we call them or baby stroller…

They went to a nearby town using an old motor home that my brother had renovated, and set up camp on some site out of the way in the country. He said they had been into town and had used a taxi to get there, leaving the motor home set-up at the site. After a sunny afternoon in a pub garden they left to return back. There was an argument brewing, when my brother pointed out that he thought it was only fair that his girlfriend pay for the taxi fare back to the site, as he'd been dipping in his pocket all the time.

Knowing his girlfriend as I do, I wasn't surprised that she decided to have a tantrum over this request. Apparently she got into a rage about it, saying she had no intention of paying, and proceeded to storm off, saying that she could quite easily take the kids away from him and disappear.

My brother panicked at this blackmail, and I know she has quick vicious little mouth on her, so I didn't doubt what my brother was saying. To stop her from storming off he grabbed for the pushchair and held onto it while trying to calm her. She lashed out at him pushing him off and a struggled ensued. Because she was now fighting, my brother went to push her away defending himself, but unfortunately a "White Knight" was standing some distance away and decided it was my brother being the big bad ogre. An argument there you could say, that before he called up the police, he should have found out what was going on first. My brother then spends the night and part of the next day in a cell.

Sneaky bitch went back to the site via taxi to collect up some things and went home. I say sneaky bitch, because after my brother was released, I went to pick him up from town and take him back to the site for his motor home. After a check or two he found his keys and noticed the house key was missing. She'd deliberately taken the house key so he couldn't get in.

My brother went back to the family home and I returned home. Later on that afternoon I received a call from a rather distressed brother. He told me he'd gone back only to have her come to the door and refuse him entry. She basically made a scene right there on the doorstep and suggested she was too scared for him to be there. My brother rang the police, simply unaware that his position was very fragile to say the least. The police arrived and my brother suggesting she was being the unreasonable one proceeded to explain. The police did try to suggest that my brother was allowed back into his own home, but the bitch made another scene didn't she, playing the "I'm afraid for my safety right now" card. The police then turned back to my brother and said that he had to go, and if he didn't go there and then he would be arrested again.

…It became very clear to me she's had this all planned. You just have a feel for these things, and I know the type of bitch she really is. Later my brother told me that she had already sent off papers to the social security office, to set up and independent lifestyle that didn't involve my brother in any way. Consequently my brother took out a six month lease on another place to home himself. Bizarrely, he seems to still want her in his life despite all she's put him through. Part of that is definitely because of his kids…he said he couldn't bear the thought of them being round someone else they looked upon as daddy. I can understand that, but I can't understand him wanting anything more to do with her, considering all the foul stunts she's pulled on him. Personally, I've never really liked her, I saw right through her many years ago for the spoiled, false entitlement, pussy pass bitch she is.

[image]

When I first read this in my email box I was no more or less interested in this story than I was before. It's a shocking story for those directly involved, but what was it that had me thinking about it like there was something special or unique about it?

I could not figure it out and so I read it again.. and then two more times just to see if the answer would emerge. I hoped the answer would come to me and it did the next day.

The amazing thing for me about this story is that it's completely "unamazing". That's right, there is nothing about this story that would make the front page of any MSM outlet, idea for a book or film, song or catchphrase. Truth be told this is situation normal and there is no fire.

If you call yourself an MRA, a feminist, a nihilist… anything at all in fact, it doesn't matter because you personally have seen something very similar to the outcome of this story. The outcome where an innocent man gets shafted.

The only good from a story like this being the norm is that the critical mass of understanding will be reached faster. If one out of every few house on your street starts to burn do you really think that none of the occupants are dyed in the wool feminists with significant others who are male?

You tell me with glazed eyes that you have not seen anything like this and I tell you with eyes glazed that you lie.

You just lied to me.

AVFM Radio: The Weaponization Of Sex

July 9, 2011 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

[box type=”tick”]Call in on Tuesday : (310) 388-9709[/box]

[box type=”note” size=”large” style=”rounded” border=”full” icon=”none”]

AVFM Radio will be on again On Tuesday, July 12, 2011 at 8:00 p.m. Central Standard Time, U.S.

Paul has been boxed and shipped and may be answering occasional emails from a cargo container on a flatbed truck somewhere on a highway in Texas. Standing in as the show’s host will be JtO in a show focusing on the weaponization of sex.

As humans, we are all sexual creatures, and sex is not only a basic biological drive in us, its a fundamental part of each of our identities. For women, sex has become a point of celebration and empowerment, and any expression of women’s sexuality is held increasingly except from mainstream criticism.

On the other hand, male sexuality is increasingly demonized. Men “caught” in any expression of their sexuality outside of feminist-approved social framework are increasingly ridiculed, blacklisted and imprisoned. Sexuality has been weaponized, as evidenced by it’s use in the attempted destruction of politically inconvenient men such as Anthony Weiner, Julian Assange, Dominique Straus Kahn, and the unfortunately vilified man whose apparent mistake was to invite a female “rationalist” for coffee during a chance meeting in a hotel elevator.

You dirty, dirty girl

July 11, 2011 | by J Galt | Link | Original Link

I have for a good time now, skated the obvious in a number of pieces that I have posted here at AVFM, attempting to engage the consciousness of men that I know vary in age. This will be different somewhat because I am going to vent. So what I am going to do is make it clear, abundantly clear the ever increasing disdain that is brewing inside me for the female. I have always taken the position that in the MM the central issue is not women or feminism. I don't engage feminist ideological babble because I find it lacks substance for male thought. Not to mention that it reminds me of a pull string Barbie doll, which only evidences that not only are all vaginas shaped the same, but so are their neurotic brains.

> Take the case of feminists declaring that men feel entitled to jobs so affirmative action legislation is required. That old "men giving up their seat" and it isn't theirs anyway. The bureaucratic cunnilingerers jump in and said fuck we better fix this shit. Can't have any premenstrual pandering here. Except the male counter argument was fucking ignored. C*%ts have declared the home and family their fucking seat and replied with fuck you I ain't moving and the cops say so. Good social strategy eh!

Just know that for the Genders to exist requires collaboration. If you have a crack instead of a penis and are challenged by this statement it's called fucking and if you can't afford your own test tube you will have to go the old fashion route. Collaborate. For those cracks out there that are challenged by big concepts like collaborating I tried to put it into language you can understand, fucking. For the crack addicts out there, you need to understand that collaborating has been replaced with equality.

The double speak of this is easy to overlook, especially if you're a crack addict. Equality is a method of portioning, it's application is to divide and implies "equally". Anyone who says this isn't a zero sum game needs to call Noam Chomsky and ask some basic questions regarding linguistics. Don't feign stupidity either cause you're a liar that needs to be ignored Michelle.

[quote float="left"]If you reread the second paragraph you will understand the intended outcome of "equality" the cracks really have in mind. None. Equality has this fecal notion of collaborating but it is only designed to get you to the table and inform you of the cost of doing business – with the crack.[/quote] Let's do a little male math here. If you work for forty years and average 35,000 a year you will have earned 1.4 million now subtract 250,000 for the home you lost, that you really paid 450,000 for with interest and your down to an even mil. Don't forget to remove another 350,000 for the taxation whores and leaches that go home at 3 o'clock. Take 60% of the remainder as the portion she spends cause you know she needs tampons and red shoes. You're left with a taste of equality that represents 500 bucks a month for forty years. Fuck yea I want to be equal.

Please tell me you can't afford a surrogate and ten years of daycare for 360,000 bucks. Anyone who is buying into this horseshit for an udder and a smile, needs to be taken out back and hosed down with ice water. Let me tell you what you're really buying into in case you haven't cottoned on to the yarn. A relationship is when you change from being a male into being a fucking therapist. That's right guys, and like any therapist you will be required to fill prescriptions for every tiny little emotional malady that she can hallucinate.

What you're dealing with is an inflective, pathological bag of psychotic shit, that trains to be one. Just look around your environment and count the number of self-help books you see. Now count the number you have read. It's fucking training to complain. Every dark little seedy perverted, contorted, misandric, misrepresentation of vaginal angst and hallucinated imagery exudes from the crack over everyone around her.

Years ago when my oldest son was in grade two, that's right sports fans he would have been all of 7 years old. I was called into the school midday as my son had been removed from class. When I arrived I found him on a bench in the office. I asked him to show me the washroom and said we would return. In the washroom I asked him hey buddy what's going on. He didn't know, not a clue. But they felt it was fine to leave him sit in the office for an hour and a half to, you know, think about it.

Returning to the office, I was greeted by the principal who had informed me he had called the affected teacher and "SHE" was on her way. Well you're gonna love this. It was explained to me by "HER" that during gym class she was teaching dance. She had directed the children, to swing their hips from side to side. My son (remember he's 7 years old) now get ready and cover your screen or swallow your coffee before proceeding. My son, was thrusting his hips front to back,

[box type="download" icon="none"]OBVIOUSLY GESTURING THAT HE HAD A LARGE PENIS !!!!….wtf…WTF…WHAT THE FUCK!!![/box]

Give yourself a moment to let it sink in, I did. I turned to the principal because I really wanted to read his expression, he was earnest. Well I said, it strikes me that we have some misinterpretation going on here. Obviously your mistaken, it is apparent to me that he could only be gesturing that he had a small penis, hence the need to thrust his hips out, in an obvious attempt to make it symbolically visible. Of course I am relying on Jungian synchronicity for this insight, were I to invoke Freud I might suggest that you madame are projecting a penis configuration on the boy, in hopes of attaining your darker desires to dominate and emotionally control those you perceive as more sexually powerful and justify your sexual perversion. She gaged on that like a mouthful of cum and I just waited for her to catch her breath.

[image]In retrospect I think she may have been suffering from a brain tumor that resulted from pushing on her dildo to hard. But to truly read the subtleties of this exchange you need to know that she actually gestured the size of the penis in her presentation with her hands, while standing there with her mouth open while she paused for my retort. It's pretty obvious this bitch needed a good screwing, but the principal wasn't willing and sure as fuck I wouldn't touch that meat. To masculine and too square geometrically, for my taste. Besides I was unhappily married at the time, no sense making a depressing circumstance suicidal.

In as much as every man is sick and tired of the wailing and gnashing of teeth, it may be worth-while to peel back that vulva and look at the deeper thoughts of woman. I'm under the impression that if you hear a woman say, "ew, look at that man over there playing with those kids" what she's really saying is, I can be a kid too, tie me up and press your manhood against me in an embrace from behind, causing my breasts to heave weighted by their own sensuous sway, while you lightly sting my ass with rough hands kneading my buttocks and slapping the sincerity of your determination just above my wetness that flows like a river over my legs hoisting me against the one muscle that defines your purpose, melting me against the void of passion that is overtaking like a tide against gaping and gasping rocks that are the points of sensual arousal awaiting your cling and climb…OR NOT!!

Psychotic sexual tension anyone. No doubt the majority of the sexual predator myths are really an unexpressed monologue of female sexual tension. I happened upon a film by a man called Slavoj Žižek called "The Perverts Guide to Cinema" . I've selected four links to it that should be enough to inspire the entire viewing, and I promise it's worth it. There's some humor and some dam good insight into sexuality. I'm betting that most of the horseshit that we hear from feminists and the cowering clitoris whining in the corner is more apt to be their unexpressed and repressed sexual fantasies. Check out the clips you'll no doubt understand why I say this. Welcome to a view of female perversion. Total viewing is about 26 minutes, enjoy.

The cuckold apologist

July 12, 2011 | by Jared White | Link | Original Link

I just recently read an article from the "good men" project written by Hugo Schwyzer entitled*; I may have a son, but I'll never know for sure*. I already knew what the article was about before reading it. Not because of the title, but because the link was on the men's rights reddit. A nifty little gadget reddit is. Hugo basically explains to his readers how he might be a father but he doesn't know for certain. That isn't anything new. Many millions of men in the USA alone live through the same dilemma. It's the reasoning Hugo puts behind why he doesn't know and what he does to ensure the child's parents don't know that sickens me.

This whole story Hugo has put forth may just be an elaborate fabrication in order to examine the response of his readers but considering this is the same man who feels that men should pay for women on dates because men generally make more money than women, I doubt this story is a hoax. No, I'm sure that this man is proud of the misandric bigotry he enables with every sentence he writes.

So what has Hugo done that has made my blood and the blood of several other men boil? The story starts out harmless enough. Hugo claims that in his younger days he had a friend with benefits whom he refers to as, Jill. He and this woman would sleep together without protection on several occasions. There was another man Jill was seeing whom Hugo names, Ted. Hugo claims that this woman broke off their friends with benefits relationship before she became aware of her pregnancy. I doubt it.

what happened next is one of the most evil acts two people can do to another person

> "Jill wanted to be a mom. Ted wanted to be a dad. I wasn't sure what I wanted. In her mind, these facts settled it: the baby was Ted's. Or it needed to be Ted's."
> In her mind is where things were settled because as we all know, motherhood and fatherhood should both be decided in her mind.

Hugo's story gets worse

> "Jill never told Ted that she'd been sleeping with someone else the week their son was conceived. Ted and I were both about the same height with the same fair skin and the same pale blue eyes; she knew that without a DNA test, there'd be no sure way to know which one of us was the biological father. But there was a sure way to know which one of us was "dad material", and which one of us wasn't. Jill was clear that she preferred everlasting uncertainty to the possibility of discovering that her Ted was not her son's father. As the one who carried Alastair in her womb, it was her choice to make."

So let me get this straight, Hugo. The fact that this woman you may have impregnated carried the child to term gives her the right to choose who the child's father will be? I didn't know equality worked that way. I always thought something like this was misandric bigotry supported by feminists but now that you have explained it to me so clearly I see now that I was wrong. Men don't take part in the creation of a child, men just splash some insignificant liquid around inside a woman's vagina and then her body does everything.

That liquid from the man isn't important, it's just a convenient lubricant for whatever strange lady parts women have in their stomachs that create children all on their own. So of course the woman should have full authority to name whatever man she wants as the father. This has been an Earth shattering revelation for me, Hugo, thank you. Why this common knowledge hasn't been made law confuses the hell out of me. Too much sarcasm? I don't think so seeing as how that fucking is the law and is only now being changed.

Opposition to that change comes from (you guessed it) feminists

> "I made a promise to Jill before Alastair was born that I'd never ask for a paternity test, nor reveal to Ted the possibility that I might be the biological father of his son."

Why exactly would this promise even be necessary if you were all in agreement that the decision on who the father will be would be hers? Oh wait…because you weren't all in agreement, were you Hugo?

No, you see the discussion wasn't brought up in front of Ted. You made it clear that you didn't want to be a father and considering the fact that only women have the legal right to relinquish their parental responsibilities without anyone's permission before and/or after a child is born, you were probably overjoyed when Jill shrugged at your wishes and said, "meh, I got some other guy I fucked, I'll just tell him it's his".

The rest of Hugo's tale is a slew of apologetic excuse making. In my opinion, he is still trying even now after fourteen years to convince himself that there was no wrong in his decision. At the same time he is condemning men who would choose to seek the truth when confronted with suspicions that the woman they shared their feelings with betrayed their trust.

> "I wasn't in love with Jill and wasn't ready to be a parent: Ted was both of those things. From what little I hear, he's been a great husband and a doting father all these years. He and Jill have had two more sons together. With all that in mind, it would be an act of destructive narcissism on my part to ever break my promise and barge back into Jill's life."

Really Hugo, an act of destructive narcissism? The way it sounds to me is you've already committed that act of destructive narcissism. According to you, this woman you may have impregnated was a good friend of yours. Good enough for her to let you fuck her with no strings attached. But the moment she became pregnant and decided to hook the man who was more professionally stable (read: wealthier) the two of you decided that keeping in contact would be a bad idea. Why is that Hugo?

Ted obviously believes the child is his so there would be nothing wrong with talking to your good friend would there? Unless there was something that made you feel that even speaking with this woman was wrong. Could that feeling be guilt, Hugo?

You reveal this speculation of mine to be most likely correct within your next paragraph

> "My role in Heloise's conception was brief (but, um, not that brief); my roles as a devoted husband to her mother and a doting papa to her are my most treasured and important tasks. If I were to discover that I was not my daughter's biological dad, I'd be hurt by my wife's deception – but Heloise would be no less my daughter."

So basically you ignore the irony of the situation you placed Ted in and reduce the significance of a man knowing the truth about his children to "it's not mine!? Aw shucks well that doesn't matter I forgive you for fucking another guy, lying to me about it, and then tricking me into raising a kid I thought was mine."

I am not a father so I cannot speak from experience when it comes to knowing what it feels like to watch your child being born, knowing it is yours. What I can say is this; if I were ever to start a serious relationship with a woman and planned to have a child with her and then found out that child was not mine, it would fucking destroy me. Not only because of the realization that this woman who supposedly "loves" me has slept with another man, not only because this woman has conspired behind my back to keep this a secret from me, and not because I have been paying to support a family literally born of deceit. No, the thing that would stop my heart from beating would be the knowledge that a child I thought was a part of me was a part of someone else. Like I said I can't speak on what it feels like to see your child come into this world but I would imagine that a man who witnesses this would feel a special kind of joy knowing that he had a part in creating that new life. To have that taken away, I feel, would be devastating.

This is something I know you agree with, Hugo

Because I don't think it's your promise to Jill that held your tongue. I think it's the fact that you know you would destroy this man if you were the cause of him finding out the truth. Jill knows this too, which is why the secret was her idea. That in my opinion makes her the most evil one of all. Women go bat shit insane when someone threatens to take away their children because those children are a part of them. Women have sued hospitals for mixing up their babies and tracked down their child, demanding it be returned to them because the idea of someone else raising their child as their own drove these women over the edge.

If someone were to tell Jill that there was a mix-up at the hospital, even now I'm sure she'd want to find her real child and tell him the truth. But Ted? Shit…let him go on thinking this kid is his. He loves him so what's the harm? If there was no harm then there would be no secret. Hugo claims that this other man loves Jill. So why not tell him from the start and let him decide? She already broke off the friends with benefits arrangement with Hugo and the claim is that Ted wants to be a father.

So why not tell him?

The reason Ted wasn't told right from the start is because Jill knew that if Ted were to find out that the child might not be his, he might not want to raise it. If it was indeed as simple as Hugo claims then telling Ted would have been no problem. Hugo and Jill weren't officially dating or planning to get married. Once things with Ted became serious she broke it off with Hugo. So if being a father was all only about love then there should have been nothing holding Jill back from telling Ted. What held her back was guilt. Guilt and fear.

She was afraid he would demand a paternity test and she was afraid he would not raise the child if it turned out to be Hugo's. Then she would have been stuck with the drunk partier about to hit rock bottom instead of the professionally stable (read: wealthy) man ready to marry her.

Hugo can try to explain away the evil in what he and Jill did by throwing the word love in his article as many times as he wants. The fact remains that if he felt there was no wrong in the situation then the truth would not have been hidden.

> "Fathering has everything to do with being present after conception and after birth, and very little with providing the sperm to fertilize an egg. Regardless of what a paternity test would reveal, I am still my daughter's dad – and in every meaningful sense, Ted is Alastair's."

Hugo's twisted sense of reality is wrong on so many levels that if the same situation he placed Ted in were to befall him I would only smile at the irony. His hypocrisy would melt from him like the hearts of so many men who have been destroyed by a society and legal system that views them as mere tools for breeding and supplying finances instead of human beings with rights.

The most outrageous lie from this misandric man comes at the end of his article

> "The specifics of human reproduction mean that men may have children of whose existence they are unaware, and they may unwittingly raise as their own children conceived with another man's sperm. But women have it harder, and not only in terms of pregnancy, labor, and delivery."

Women have it harder? Did I read that right? So Hugo basically just said that because women give birth to children, a fact that almost guarantees they know their child is their child barring a hospital mix up, men, who for the most part can never know if their child is their fucking child unless they get a paternity test have it easier? Fucking really?

Not to mention Hugo argues against paternity tests so in his perfect world men should just raise whomever a woman says they should raise. If some random woman were to walk up to Hugo and say “hey you’re the father of my kid” I guess Hugo would just smile and say “okey doke” and like the woman worshiping sap that he is, raise the kid with no questions asked.

Some would argue against this scenario pointing out how Hugo could easily resolve the issue by proving he never slept with the random woman. That argument wouldn’t work though because Hugo already said that sperm doesn’t make the dad, what a woman feels in her mind is what makes the dad. It’s her choice because she carried the child in her womb. Right Hugo?

If anyone doesn’t think that’s how Hugo feels well just take a look at his final words

> “I may or may not be Alastair’s biological father. I may or may not have other children “out there.” These uncertainties that I know many men share are part of the cost of a habit of unprotected heterosexual intercourse. But the solution to the problem isn’t suspicion or frantic demands for paternity tests, Jerry Springer style. The solution isn’t even the rigorous use of contraception (though that’s a very good idea.)
> The solution is to remember that it is love, not sperm that, makes a great dad.”

Hear that ladies? All you single mothers out there who are tired of struggling because you didn’t get knocked up by (or couldn’t fraud) a rich guy, here’s a man ready and willing to pay for your children. Sperm doesn’t matter so don’t worry about any paternity tests just walk up to his house, baby in tow, and start knocking until that wallet opens the door.

Among the many things Hugo Schwyzer is, he is a liar and a possible paternity fraud accomplice. The one thing he is not is a good man.

Violence Against Women Act: Do the rights of men matter?

July 12, 2011 | by Carey Roberts | Link | Original Link

It's been some 17 years since our nation declared war on domestic violence and enacted the Violence Against Women Act. It seemed like a good idea at the time. After all, who could be unmoved by tales of women trapped in lethal relationships, enduring ritual beatings at the hands of an overbearing mate?

But unnoticed to most, the Violence Against Women Act was soon hijacked by a radical ideology, a belief system that ascribed all partner violence to a single root cause – patriarchy. Soon the war on domestic violence became transmogrified into an unrelenting fusillade trained squarely on the male of the species.

It began with a propaganda-like effort to promote the view that women are incapable of engaging in physical violence. Or if they did lash out, it was only done as an act of self-defense.

[quote style="boxed" float="right"]So when University of Delaware researcher Suzanne Steinmetz published her watershed book, The Battered Husband Syndrome, the Gender Guerillas mounted a whispering campaign and called in a bomb threat to her daughter's wedding.[/quote]

Having cleared the intellectual nit-pickers out of the picture, it was time to commence the real work of undertaking an extreme make-over of our nation's domestic violence laws.

First to go was the Fourth Amendment requirement for the existence of "probable cause" for arrest. This standard, drafted long ago by a group of dead white males, was replaced by VAWA's mandatory arrest provisions. Over the years, millions of dollars has been channeled to states to arrest a man based solely on an allegation.

Next to go was the 14th Amendment's guarantee of "equal protection of the laws." VAWA's Legal Assistance for Victims foots the legal bills of accusers, but not of the accused. Equal protection, out the window!

But legal formalities were allowing too many putative batterers to go free. So why not pull off the biggest civil rights heist in American history – let's transfer most cases out of the criminal courts and treat them as a civil matter? Genius move!

[box icon="none"]In civil court, you can dodge the Sixth Amendment's dictum that the accused must enjoy the right to "be confronted with the witnesses against him," since temporary restraining orders are routinely issued on an ex parte basis without the accused being informed of the charge.[/box]

Plus, the preponderance of evidence standard made it child's play to strip the accused of his home, children, assets, and reputation. Remember, the real goal is to overthrow the patriarchy, not to curb domestic violence.

Another fly in the ointment arises because in most cases, a woman who files a criminal charge later recants the allegation or refuses to cooperate with the prosecution.

The solution? “Evidence-based” prosecution in which the DA files the case, even absent the star witness. Again, no need to allow burdensome probable-cause requirements to get in the way.

Another sticky wicket: Research shows half of all partner abuse is mutual – she slaps him, he shoves her, and off to the races we go! Mutual violence is a verboten phrase among the true believers, of course, because it challenges the unassailable notion that women are incapable of abuse. (“Repeat after me…”)

The solution? Promulgate so-called “predominant aggressor” policies that say when both persons are mixing it up, the police should arrest the male since he’s the bigger and stronger of the two — even if the woman threw the first punch!

We’re still not done. Next we broaden definitions so practically anything falls within the ambit of domestic violence. The Department of Justice’s Office of Violence Against Women now defines domestic violence as “a pattern of abusive behavior in any relationship that is used by one partner to gain or maintain power and control over another intimate partner.”

Did your spouse ever hand you a Honey-Do list?

Was she attempting to exert power and control over you? You betcha, you were a victim of domestic violence!

But some vestiges of due process still remain, so we need to re-educate judges into correct thinking about these matters. We explain the judge’s role has evolved from being a minister of justice to ensuring that abusers be “held accountable.”

We then repeat the catechism that men are “overwhelmingly” the perpetrators of partner abuse, and it’s ridiculous to even suggest that a woman could inflict harm on a bigger, stronger man. (Under no circumstances will you mention the name of Crystal Mangum, the disgraced Duke rape accuser who is currently awaiting trial for the fatal knifing of her boyfriend.)

As a result of all this legalistic gerrymandering, the problem is not just that our domestic violence system has eliminated the presumption of innocence. It’s that even when a person is found innocent, he’s still treated as if he was guilty. Is it any wonder that these men sometimes snap?

I was a paper alpha

I remember a time when public opinion questioned the playing of the game Dungeons and Dragons. It was and is a role playing game that millions of kids engaged and the fear was that it may be twisting their sense of reality. I've never been a role play gamer myself, my forte is cribbage accompanied by some good conversation and refreshment. In fact I'm not a sports gamer either, if I can't play I'm certainly not going to armchair it. But I'm not now, nor have I ever been your add 2 cups of water a teaspoon of salt and bring to a boil kind of guy.

I was however introduced to an interesting role playing game when I was 19, It was a relationship role playing game that ended in marriage. I wasn't very good at it, simply because I didn't have a grip on the rules of that particular edition of the game. In fact the game ended 24 years later rather poorly. If you play this kind of game and find yourself losing over and over it makes sense to stop playing and get on with something more rewarding. You know so there's no loss of life. If you suck at it, why spoil the game for those that would like to keep playing.

[quote float="left"]I was however introduced to an interesting role playing game when I was 19, It was a relationship role playing game that ended in marriage. [/quote]When I first sat down to play this game, I was assigned the role of dungeon husband and told that there was no unique powers. Just play it like I'm a guy and if I was astute enough I could attain patriarchal powers that would extend out and influence other players. To start the game I had to run around the board with diminished powers because I had no golden diploma to unlock the vaults to credit. But if I could get around the board fast enough I could accumulate credits. I could then assign some toward the benefit of other players to garner future patriarchal powers and some towards a golden diploma.

Seemed pretty straight forward, except that the other players kept getting into jeopardy circumstances and forfeiting the credits that I was extending. So I wasn't really accumulating any patriarchal powers of influence and I had to keep using any credits I had saved to get the golden diploma powers. But, ever forward I played. A couple of times I lost my turn and was unable to gain any credits, I was constantly threatened with being ejected from the game if I couldn't provide more credits to the other players.

There's definitely some really strange twists to the whole aspect of gaining power and credits, that seemed to make sense but didn't. Like when you move around the board there are aspects that help make it easier to move quicker and gain more credits. The weird one is seximacy, it's a combination of interplay where you exchange intimacy and sex. The idea is it gives you well-being powers that are like confidence, and esteem powers, to make it easier. You do this with the gamer that you give credits to too acquire patriarchal powers. But if you're not careful during seximacy you can actually create another player that requires even more credits. If this happens before you accumulate enough patriarchal powers then you forfeit all your credits to your partner each time they're acquired. After a while I was just giving all my credits to my partner.

[image]The seximacy thing was weird because if my partner didn't like the amount of credits I was making I wouldn't get any well-being powers which actually made it harder to earn credits. Well during one turn my partner had been planning to create another player and did. Shortly after the new player was created, there was no more seximacy, which lasted for two years. I found also that my partner kept referring to my patriarchal powers and how the influence was affecting her ability to play and gain credits of and on her own. Except I wasn't using that power cause I hadn't accumulated any. Each time I tried to use it to help gain credits or prevent losing credits it never worked.

Like in one turn my partner wanted to relocate on the board but we didn't have enough credits to achieve the move. I tried to use my patriarchal powers to influence her to wait, didn't work I didn't have any. We lost all the credits during that turn and other people were giving us intermittent credits just to keep us in the game. Of course, all those credits have to be paid back as you go around the board. If you don't do it quick enough, sometimes you lose other powers to earn credits.

I never really got the whole aspect of the patriarchal power thing. Initially I could see how during some moves there is an obvious conflict that can arise, so I figured the patriarchal power thing might be good to mediate the outcome towards the best effect during that move. But it never actually worked that way. It was more like patriarchal powers were what my partner used as a device to gain more credits and control how I moved, like it was some kind of foul I was committing. Like a red flag. So it was really something that helped my partner acquire more credits that I didn't have access to.

[quote]The one aspect of the game that really sucks is you can't change identities if you are a dungeon husband. Which of course nobody told me when we started this fucking game. [/quote] I figured that if I sucked at earning credits I could switch with my partner, earn some of the credits, control the use of the credits and take care of the new players. I figured that if I did that I could save enough to gain a golden diploma by really focusing on the best use of the credits. My partner said there was no switching. So I pretty much was unable to gain a golden diploma and get access to the credit vault.

Given those circumstances it's not hard to figure out the game is really rigged and there's just no way. I tried one of those power gamble moves where you go off the board and you create special items to sell to the other players for credits. It started out pretty good and I quickly started acquiring more credits, until my partner started influencing other players not to let me play this way. I could never really understand, because all the credits were going straight to my partner. My partner figured that I might be earning extra credits and not handing them over.

It's one of those game scenarios where the partner tries to control the outcome and control all the credits so you can't alter the game. But when the game score is negatively affected you have to eat the shit for it, because you have no real patriarchal power. The whole thing was a useless attempt to play a game that became so contorted with control and power that even trying to fix it was useless. Of course as dungeon husband it's all you’re fault because you are the one out there trying to get the credits to gain additional powers so the partner players have an easier time with the game. What a waste of time and effort.

Once I caught on to the real play and how this would never pan out I figured the best choice was to withdraw from the game. Hey what’s the point? Gee it only took me 24 years to figure out that I had a partner that was really playing against me the whole time. I packaged the thing up and decided the best choice was to return it, find something better to play. I walked into the store and told the guy I wanted to return it, wasn’t what I had in mind as a progressive game. The outcome was too predictable and the rules were not properly outlined. I leaned forward and whispered to him, you know who ever developed this game should be shot in the fucking head. He smiled as he processed the return and said, that’s funny we often hear those exact remarks from gamers, right up till we finish processing the return. His face and expression went stone cold he looked me straight in the eye and said, I have processed your order here sir the total is $600 dollars a month.

Wow I thought, at least it’s not a total loss, until he asked if I would be paying by credit card or cash.

What they really think of male feminists

July 15, 2011 | by Walter Romans (TDOM) | Link | Original Link

Megan Milanese is a feminist with a BA in Women's Studies. She thinks its great when men identify as feminists. However, her idea of a male feminist is a guy who will simply sit down, shut up, and do as he's told by the women who know better. She's totally ok with being labeled a man-hater, but misandrist is probably more descriptive and slightly more polite. So, what's it take to qualify as a male feminist?

First and foremost, he may never interrupt a woman when she's speaking. She claims this behavior is rude (it is) and is more common in men than women. To support this claim she cites an apparently unpublished study (published only online) from 2000, citing research from the mid 1970's to late 1990's that demonstrates that not only concludes that gender is a factor, but status was as well. Of course Ms. Milanese doesn't mention this.

[quote style="boxed" float="left"]her assertion that gender-based slurs can only be used against women is ludicrous. While women may be denigrated by language such as "whore, bitch, or slut" men may also be denigrated with language like "bastard, fag, creep, womanizer, pig, etc.[/quote] Further, the study cited appears to be a literature review and not an actual study and it cites primarily only studies that support its conclusion.

Nevertheless, the paper contained one quote that appears to indicate that this is not necessarily due to "male dominance" or "male privilege." "Women's language was described as weak, unassertive, tentative, and women were presented as losers, as victims. (Coates 1998:413)."

In this light, the tendency of men to assert themselves more than women may be a by-product of feminist-victim ideology wherein both sexes view women as losers and victims.

The author concludes "There is evidence that the vitality factor in the female subculture is increasing resulting in growing assertiveness… Gender and status rather than gender or status will be the determinant categories." (Kunsman, 2000). In other words as we progress out of the 1970's and into the 21st century, women are becoming more confident and assertive and the tend is expected to continue. The difference may not have been due to any discrimination or gender bias, but to a lack of confidence by and in the women entering into formerly male dominated workplaces.

> Milanese continues with the "sit down and shut up" directive for male feminists. A male feminist should never "mansplain." According to her this is condescension that occurs when a man explains something to a woman that she thinks she already knows all there is to know on a particular subject.

What I find interesting about this position is her condescending attitude towards men as if men cannot have a conflicting view of reality. Further chuckles are had when she asserts that men were not necessary for feminists to win the "vote, Title IX, Roe v Wade, legal access to contraceptives, a single woman elected to office, the small narrowing of the wage gap that has occurred." Funny thing, if men had not changed laws, policies, procedures, rules, working conditions, and been willing to step aside, what would have been gained by feminists?

Then of course she objects to gender-based slurs. Although I occasionally find them useful, for the most part I have to agree. But her assertion that gender-based slurs can only be used against women is ludicrous. While women may be denigrated by language such as "whore, bitch, or slut" men may also be denigrated with language like "bastard, fag, creep, womanizer, pig, etc.

Then there is her sexist view of the "tone argument." "However, when men use it against women it is especially pernicious." Why? Because somehow this becomes the use of "male privilege" to silence women and win the argument. Funny thing, righteous indignation (the tone argument) tends to have that effect no matter who is using it, man or woman.

[quote style="boxed" float="right"] To be hired as a male feminist you must sit down, shut up, do as you're told, castrate yourself, and prepare to be abused. Even then, I doubt you'll have done enough.[/quote] Now that the "sit down and shut up" portion is behind us, we come to the "do as you're told" argument. She begins by chastising feminist groups that place men in positions of leadership "before he's ready for them." The argument against this practice is sort of like the argument against affirmative action. Men aren't qualified to hold such positions and shouldn't be put there as a PR strategy. Oddly, she does seem to be arguing against the feminist exploitation of the male, though she seems to think it's the other way around. Her message to the male feminist is "get to the back of the bus."

And what about the menz? For Milanese, feminism is by, for, and about women. Men and their issues don't matter. So much for equality. Men's problems are their own fault. "It is a systemic devaluation of femininity that creates the rigidly defined masculinity by which men must abide. If men have a problem with masculinity as it currently exists, perhaps they should consider increasing the social status and viability of femininity in all people." If we worship the feminine, all men's problems will simply disappear. It's simply a matter of giving up misogyny. Besides, men problems pale in significance to women's problems. "So yes, men have issues. However, in no way, shape, or form are they of the same caliber as the problems and oppression facing women."

[box icon="none"]And of course, men must put down their pictures of scantily clad women while at feminist rallies. Male sexuality is verboten. To think of a woman in a sexual manner is to objectify and degrade her. Never mind that sexuality is the basis for all human interaction. [/box]

It is the most basic of all social needs and ensures the survival of the species. Men and women are biologically programmed to be sexual beings. To view another person as a sexual being is to view that person in the most human way possible. It is anything but degrading.

Then the male feminist must realize that the feminists they work with don't trust them. Males, feminists or not, are seen as rapists and violent or emotional abusers and of course, a man "has no right to tell a woman that her distrusting attitude toward men irrational." This is an issue of entitlement and "No one is entitled to another's trust." But then she claims that the male feminist must "be understanding" which is in itself an offering of trust, which she claims no one is entitled to. But obviously the woman is entitled to the man's trust, regardless of his past experience and history. Her past matters, his does not.

The male feminist must be a "mangina." Yes, she pretty much says this. He must endure being called this because women have all endured sexual assault, violence, and verbal abuse for "standing up for their rights." Although she stops short of requiring the risk of life and limb, she believes the male feminist must be willing to be abused.
And finally, the male feminist is not entitled to his own feelings. If he is pissed off by her article, he cannot be a feminist and should be expelled from the movement.

It's probably a good thing that I am not a feminist. As she says, feminism should be "large, powerful, and diverse. But obviously it should not be so diverse as to include half the population of the planet and not nearly powerful enough to equally address the needs and concerns of that half the population. However, that neglected and cast out half should be willing to give up its masculinity on behalf of feminism. So there you have it. To be hired as a male feminist you must sit down, shut up, do as you're told, castrate yourself, and prepare to be abused. Even then, I doubt you'll have done enough.

The times, they have a-changed

July 17, 2011 | by Tom Snark | Link | Original Link

Today, I draw your attention to another subtly counter-feminist message embedded between the lines of an article written for the pro-feminist Guardian:

Alexander Chancellor: Rupert Murdoch and the man who lost his penis

> My intense focus on the turmoil within the Murdoch empire – its dizzying implications for the future of British journalism, for press regulation, and for the reputations of all and sundry – has suddenly been interrupted by the chilling news from California that a wife has chopped off her husband's penis. This is not something that happens often – the last known occasion was in Virginia in 1993 when Lorena Bobbitt did it to her husband, John Wayne Bobbitt

First off, this is somewhat misleading. There have been numerous cases of male genital mutilation and removal by women in the last couple of years alone – stories of cutting, burning and biting which briefly appeared in the news and made their way around the manosphere, none of which I have to hand, nor do I particularly want to go searching for them again. While I am not about to make the claim that this is a frequent occurrence, it has plainly happened more often than twice in eighteen years.

Still, the parallels to the Bobbitt case are unsurprising. That case was infamous, not only for the action but for the subsequent celebrity treatment of the violent criminal (and veneration as a folk heroine by the feminist sector); for her acquittal; for the scorn heaped upon the victim of genital mutilation (and likely a false rape accusation); for the twisted way that women would then make reference to the incident as an implicit threat against men, seemingly for no purpose other than to upset them.

> In a "spontaneous statement" to police, Becker said only that her husband "deserved it". One shudders to think what offence would make a man deserving of such a punishment, but perhaps that will come out during the trial.

Lorena Bobbitt, having been schooled by feminist advocates before her case went to trial, made the typical claim that she had suffered rape, abuse, and so on, and the only way for her to escape this desperate situation was to lacerate her husband (as opposed to, say, leaving the house, or calling the police). Her chief concern, though, was apparently that he was selfish and would always orgasm first.

We continue with Mr Chancellor's piece:

> John Bobbitt is an unappealing character who may well have been guilty of some, if not all, of the offences of which his wife accused him. But I find it difficult to accept the widely held view among feminists at the time that they were fully deserving of his wife's gruesome revenge.

It is worth looking back at what the feminist reaction to the Bobbitt case actually consisted of. 1993 was a long time ago, and even the odd feminist visitor who finds her way here may be unaware. The most comprehensive account is found here, and from which I quote:

> From the outset, Lorena Bobbitt was widely regarded as a feminist hero. Time Magazine said there was a "ripple of glee that passed through the female population when Lorena Bobbitt struck back." Vanity Fair ran a sultry photo spread of Lorena Bobbitt and branded her a "national folk heroine."
> A woman wrote to the New York Times: "Prof. Catharine MacKinnon of the University of Michigan and the writer Andrea Dworkin long ago pointed to the institution of marriage as a legal cover for the act of rape and the permanent humiliation of women. Lorena Bobbitt's life has been a poignant instance of that nightmare, which elicited a bold and courageous act of feminist self-defense."
> Another woman seemed to sum up the feelings of many women without the pretentious feminist patina: "Every woman I've talked to about this says, 'Way to go!'"
> The mainstream media was only too happy to mirror the feminist glee with barely any more restraint. Progressive writers (we called them "liberal" back then) dubbed the affair a "cautionary tale" for men. The lesson wasn't that mutilating another human being is never justified; the lesson was that men had better wise up when it comes to how they treat women or they'll rightly lose their dicks. Female features writers couldn't bring themselves to outright applaud the mutilation but they went to great lengths to make clear that they were sympathetic to it. One columnist wrote: "Personally, I'm for both feminism and nonviolence. I admire the male body and prefer to find the penis attached to it rather than having to root around in vacant lots with Ziploc bag in hand. But I'm not willing to wait another decade or two for gender peace to prevail. And if a fellow insists on using his penis as a weapon, I say that, one way or another, he ought to be swiftly disarmed."
> Much of the nation, and beyond, watched intently with sympathies split largely along gender lines. In Ecuador, Lorena Bobbitt's home country, the National Feminist Association called several news organizations to announce that if Mrs. Bobbitt went to prison for mutilating her husband, 100 innocent American men would be castrated (it is not clear if they really meant "castration," which generally means removal of the testicles, or if they meant they would slice off 100 innocent penises). The organization also staged a large protest outside the U.S. consulate.
> The Lorena Bobbitt trial was a feminist Woodstock. A carnival atmosphere swept over Manassas, where it was held. A woman sold homemade, penis-shaped white chocolates outside the courthouse. T-shirts were hawked that said "Revenge — how sweet it is," and "Manassas: A Cut Above." Some feminists sold buttons that read: "LORENA BOBBITT FOR SURGEON GENERAL." Disc jockeys > handed out “Slice” soda pop and cocktail wieners “with lots of ketchup.” Hundreds of Lorena Bobbitt supporters cheered their champion outside the courthouse. When the man she mutilated — the real victim — walked outside, he was greeted with boos and whistles, but he stoically showed no reaction.

Perhaps with this very article in mind, Fidelbogen has shared a quick thought on this new mutilation case:

> Will this story get the huge, worldwide notoriety which the Bobbitt case received? No, I reckon it won’t. For that would immediately force the Bobbitt case back into our collective mind, and invite comparative discussions of a politically loaded nature which plenty of people would rather not see happening. The zeitgeist has changed a LOT since the Bobbitt case . . . and the men’ s rights movement has had a lot to do with creating that change.
> Oh sure, the feminists would love to crow and gloat about the present case, and whip out their attitude, and wave it around as brazenly as they did back then. But they know damned well that this time around they had better “put that thing away and zip it up” because the zeitgeist won’t tolerate such public obscenity any more.

He is absolutely right. Feminists will not, and absolutely could not, afford to indulge in the antics that they did following the Bobbitt case. Times have changed dramatically since 1993, and this has, indeed, been mainly down to the slow pressure that the Men’s Rights Movement has exerted on the public consciousness, primarily through its chosen medium, the internet. Surely, there will be feminist women gloating over this latest mutilation (surely, there will be non-feminist women doing the same). But the level of obscenity that followed the Bobbitt case will not be matched, because since 1993, feminism has been put on its back foot.

So it comes to pass that even leftists are becoming uncomfortable about associating with a movement that is obviously violent and sexist. The left adores its victims, particularly minorities, but becomes less keen when they actually attain power and begin using that power to persecute others. The leftist Guardian recently fired one shot across the bow, and the conclusion of Mr Chancellor’s piece is clearly another:

> It is impossible to imagine what act of mutilation by a husband against an abusive wife would be regarded as equally justified. But I think that might be rather an old-fashioned thing to say.

Old-fashioned, because we have moved beyond the expectation of equality between men and women, and are now oriented towards explicit female supremacy. The idea that there should or could be an equivalent situation with the sexes reversed is obsolete now that equality has been surpassed. Chancellor does not outright attack feminism, but his parting words on the subject are clear as day. The notion of equality between men and women is an old-fashioned one, not because feminism is fading out, but because feminists have moved beyond it in their pursuit of women's power.

But then how can these two views be reconciled – first, that feminists have moved past the point of equality and are now openly seeking female supremacy, and second, that feminists are now unable to express their misandry as freely as they once could?

There is not necessarily a contradiction here. Those of us who have studied feminism are well aware that female supremacy was being advocated long before 1993. The gains that feminism has made since then have drawn more attention to its activities – more critical attention, both from their traditional enemies and from former or would-be allies. Their seeking female supremacy is nothing new; this is not the sign of changed times. But the pro-feminist Guardian stating outright, in a barely veiled criticism, that this is the case, certainly is a sign of changed times. And it is precisely because they are being watched – and know that they are being watched – that they know they cannot get away with rallies celebrating women who mutilate men any more.

One final point. In the comments section of Alexander Chancellor's piece, several commenters crop up, self-identifying as feminist, and making it very clear that they in no way support the removal of male organs.

I say to them: very well. I shall not claim to know your mind better than you do, and until I have reason to believe otherwise, I shall grant you the benefit of the doubt in the matter.

But if you really do feel this way, will you please clean house?

Stop pretending that the feminists who do support male genital mutilation are a rare find. We both know they're out there, and in their numbers. I'm doing my part, so you go ahead and do yours: grab a mop and bucket and let's get to work on your rabid sisters.

How funny is a mutilated vagina?

July 18, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

There are many who deny we live in an age where maleness, where masculinity has been so devalued as to be commonly regarded as Subhuman. Where male sexuality is treated with such revulsion and contempt, that major television personalities feel completely free to make light…no, to outright revel in glee at a man being poisoned, tied up, and having his penis cut off, then ground to a pulp, by his wife, because he wanted a Divorce.

These same major television personalities that routinely cry about 'Battered Women' are making light of the poisoning, kidnapping, and torture of a man for wanting a Divorce. In an age of No Fault Divorce, which was instituted at Feminist behest. They do not hide their glee at all, in fact Sharon Osbourne (the wife of Ozzy) even makes mixing motions with her hands, simulating a garbage disposal, and calls the whole thing 'delightful'.

The appalling hatred of men is not only open; it's flaunted.

This can only be the result of a Society that has so dehumanized men, so demonized male sexuality, that men can be literally tied up and tortured, have their lives permanently altered (by removing the ability to fulfil the most basic of drives)…and these women LAUGH.

And not just the Hosts, but the entire audience…rolling in glee.

And, I suspect, a good deal of women in everyday life.

Every last one of them represent the truly disgusting in human nature. No, none of it is 'innocent', and no, it is not 'just a joke'. Anyone taking pleasure in this shocking crime should be ashamed of themselves, and take a serious look at how they perceive men, and how that looks from THIS side of the fence. And the women 'hosting' this show? Every last one of them should lose their jobs.

Will they? Of course not. Because they obviously know what appeals to their audience. Which is comprised of women. The audience certainly seemed pleased with the show, and enthusiastically joined in, as a matter of fact. Truthfully, the only time the audience gave pause, was when Sara, near the end of the segment, mentioned that 'it's kinda weird' to be taking so much glee in something they would be horrified at the reverse of.

But then the show quickly moved on, much to the audience's relief.

If this isn't proof of widespread, generalized female hatred of men, I don't know what is.

Because I could NEVER see a man taking so much pleasure in the removal of a woman's ability to have sex. Not even one.

And women LOVE to hear about it happening to men. So much, in fact, that these hateful bigots will keep their jobs. Probably won't even get a reprimand. They've got feminists to defend them, after all.

And the beat goes on….

The delusion of glory

July 19, 2011 | by Zeta Male | Link | Original Link

From a young age boys are taught to persevere and to win.Boys are told stories with a message you should fight against all odds and attempt to gain the glory you desire. Stories of fantastic knights (often also upholding the valiant code of chivalry) who slay dragons sit in the minds of youth.

Gladiators and conquerors who reign supreme as they fight for what all that is right in the world and defending the people in the local village. Rock stars and champion athletes hold the attention of the world as people scream their names in excitement. These are who we are shown to look up to.

No child is without a glorious hero whose name will go down in legend, and almost every child dreams of being the person who would fight for such things no matter what the cost.

When a young boy is on the verge of collapsing, he is told to hold it in, endure the pain and keep going. The cheerleaders keep on screaming his name, despite his injury. The princess is waiting behind the beasts, as you fight for freedom and justice to save the world around you. That is what victory gets you! Fame! Glory! Power! The love of the people! You are a hero in their eyes and will live on as a god amongst men.

Of course from the knight in shining armor, to the football star, to the brave soldier we also see a sad story in the background. The thousandth knight to face the dragon, the last hope of the football team, and the mighty soldier who saves the day also share something else in common. They are the last to take the challenge. They aren't as special as much special, as they are the next in line to go against impossible odds. If they fail then someone else will come forth to take their place. Whether it be a pompous fool to fight the beast, the next season's quarterback, or the infantry reserves-they aren't the only hope that theyt have been made out to be.

No, in reality they are simply tools. Tools of society. And while that may not seem different than the roles of many others on the surface great heroes put their life at risk, lose everything and destroy them in the process. And if you are destroyed, you are just another tally on the list. And if you fail, then there is more glory offered. The glory of the hero is based on how many people failed before them, the more who fail, the more love there is to maintain. So much for glory.

[image]

So how does society get people to seek the glory? Glory is then associated with love. After growing up with countless tales of heroics and the love that comes with glory, you know not unconditional love, but love with a set of requirements. If you do not risk sacrificing yourself, how can you truly be loved? According the whimsical worlds imaginations are filled with, if there is no sacrifice, there is no chance of love.

Men can't simply have love, men have to win it. By being forced to win love, the masses use love as the bait for the servitude of men. Love will lure the fools towards ideas of glory, leading many to an early, unnecessary demise.

Love is glory, and glory is love by merging them together, men have learned to sacrifice themselves. There is no shrine, no parade, no ceremony for those who succeed without risking self destruction. There are no legends of those who protect without risk. Worst of all, there is no love. Without any sacrifice, there is nothing that can be obtained.

As our heroes bask in glory, they forget the dragon they stand upon covers a thousand corpses. That is the sad reality. The hero did what no one else could, but if he couldn't they would have found someone else, snaring them in with the promise of love. That is the dark truth behind glory.

Radio Tonight: I’mma cut your dick off

[box type=”alert” style=”rounded” border=”full” icon=”none”]

I don’t know who you are sir, but I can tell you what you are worth. If your partner was to cut off your penis tonight, the world would laugh.

What a piece of shit is man.

Those are the most famous words of the most famous MRA, Angry Harry. Three sentences of absolute truth, the veracity of which has been yet again verified recently with the sexual mutilation of a southern California man by his wife, Catherine Kieu Becker.

According to police, Becker drugged her husband, tied him up, cut off his penis and tossed it into a running garbage disposal. She then informed police that “he deserved it.”

The reason?

They had a spat over a house guest and he wanted a divorce.

The public reaction?

Raucous laughter. In short, (no pun intended) a good time was had by all.

A Voice for Men Radio tonight will dedicate the show to this subject, which goes well beyond Becker and women like Lorena Bobbitt.

Hosting tonight will be Paul Elam and JtO, and we will be joined by special guest KARMA MRA MGTOW, who has flown into Houston for a visit a AVfM Headquarters. So tonight we have not only the U.S. and Canada represented, but also the great land of Oz.

And we all have a great deal on our minds.

The male hierarchy at closer inspection

July 21, 2011 | by Elder Swami | Link | Original Link

Avoiding the male hierarchy is a major part of men's rights activism and zeta-male culture. And for a good reason I might add. This hierarchy is what causes division and conflict between men, by encouraging them to compete for status, while objectifying them on the basis of their utility to women. Yet, are there other even deeper reasons for us to opt out?

This can be answered by comparing the male social hierarchy to the hierarchy of the Indian caste system. The Brahmans (or the priest class) created the caste system in which they placed themselves at the top. Then, secondly, the soldier-ruler (Kshatriyas) caste, third the farmer, craftsman, merchant (Vaisyas) caste, and fourth the labourer or slave (Sudra) caste.

Under the caste system, the Brahmans lived a life of privilege. They were prohibited from manual labour and have the belief that they are inherently of greater moral purity than members of other castes. They alone had control over certain vital religious tasks giving them great power.

Although they were the highest caste, they did not normally hold official political positions (kings and rulers were all of the Kshatriya caste) yet due to their prestige and religious power, Brahmans had great influence over secular affairs from behind the scenes.

At the other end of the spectrum, Sudras were denied the privileges of the higher castes. Because of the degrading work and pitiable occupations to which they were assigned, such as cleaning waste and disposing of contaminated dead animals.

They were considered unclean and not fit to touch or come in contact with anyone of a higher caste, in fact, the untouchable was required to cross the street or get off the road entirely when the occasion demanded so that his shadow would not fall on anyone of the Brahman caste and in fear of contamination.

[quote]Women, like Brahmans, also live a life of relative privilege in comparison to men. They have been socialized from an early age to believe that as women they are morally superior to men.[/quote]

The Brahmans cleverly kept this order by teaching the castes below them that observance of the rules and restrictions of caste without violation constituted the highest religious fulfilment and would make possible being born again into a better life. Thus the duties and obligations of caste were stressed rather than human rights, and through this system Hindu society was kept stable for over three thousand years.

How does this relate to the male hierarchy? I will explain how by simply by swapping the castes: Kshatriyas (2), Vaisyas (3) and sudras (4) with Alpha male, Beta Male and Omega male respectively and finally Brahmans (1) with Women.

The role and status of each category are almost identical to those of its corresponding caste. Alpha males, like the Kshatriyas, are the protectors and rulers of society, and are top of the list when it comes to female approval. Beta males, like the Vaisyas, are the skilled workers of society and act as the cronies to the alpha males. The omega males (or the modern “losers”), like the Sudras, are at the bottom of the pyramid and receive almost no attention from women. They do the most degrading yet necessary work.

Women, like Brahmans, also live a life of relative privilege in comparison to men. They have been socialized from an early age to believe that as women they are morally superior to men. They are protected from all dangerous and degrading jobs. Although they don’t often hold official positions of authority or political office they wield a great deal of power due to their control over access to sex. (“fusion with them (women, or the feminine) is the root of all desire” (Schwartz, 2010)).

[image]Like the Indians who were fooled into these roles through the false promise of reincarnation to a better life, men have been made to believe that protecting and serving women (or being the nice guy) will eventually reward them through sex and approval. This is maintained by women (consciously or subconsciously) because of the service these men provide them. However as we know many of these guys (prominently the two lowest classes) are getting screwed, and have been throughout history.

So by comparing our social hierarchy to the caste hierarchy, we see that women don’t just encourage the male hierarchy, but like Brahmans, they are at the top of it. They dictate the rules and perpetuate a system whose ultimate purpose is to serve them. This means that the hierarchy not only just values men by their utility to women, but rather only allows men to be given value exclusively by women. As a consequence the alpha males in power have no incentive to treat the males below them with any respect (does this sound familiar?) as men of lower status have no say in what qualifies one to lead.

However, there is something very positive we can learn from this example. I spent a few years of my life in India and am happy to say that the caste system is quickly becoming a thing of the past. This is due to something quite simple; the people of India were given alternatives. Over the last century new ideas have flooded the country in the form of religion, philosophy and culture, ending the Brahmins’ monopoly on information.

These alternatives have allowed the Indian people to find value in themselves aside from the oppressive caste system. These ideas were accepted firstly by the lower castes, which was all it took to make the caste system irrelevant, leaving only the Brahmans holding on to their futile claim to status.

We are offering an alternative to the men of this culture. For the first time in recorded history men are refusing to comply with a system that objectifies them according to their utility.

They are refusing to have their value externally dictated to them but now argue that it is intrinsic and personal. The solution to this problem is the regaining of male space, in terms of physical space and also the separation of masculinity from feminine definition.

Let’s gain some back.

Jezebel.com: taking stupid to a whole new level

July 21, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box type="alert" icon="none"]Feminist who win lotto bitch about taxes. Confucius's cousin, Fred.[/box]

Continued studies of feminism increasingly reveal it to be best described as emotional diarrhea coupled with intellectual constipation.

This has just been confirmed again by the gang of vacuous caterwaulers over at Jezebel.com, who are now complaining that advertising for Summer's Eve (vagina cleanser-deodorizer) is too pussy-centric, even for their tastes [sic].

That's right folks, one of the larger on-line communities of Vaginacrat Purists that ever existed; the same crew of douchebags that shared "How I beat the crap out of my boyfriend" stories like they were sitting around a campfire roasting testicles on the ends of sticks, is feeling uneasy about the way this brand of pussy soap is being peddled.

They are being led to yet another orgy of hokum and outrage by one Dodai Stewart (don't ask me to pronounce that first name, or remember the last), who of course sees merit in some of the ads basic tenets, namely that "It hails the vagina as the "cradle of life" and the "center of civilization," something men have fought and died for. It insists that women are amazing and should be worshipped."

> But in the end, whatshername still found the commercial unsatisfying and queried "So why does it just feel like they're blowing smoke up our asses?"

Well, there's that, but she is also bothered by the fact that douche is maybe not so good for the p-nay-nay. And wait, she is also miffed because despite the fact that we all know that Cleopatra had a brain, they did not mention that Cleopatra had a brain. They totally left Cleopatra's brain out of the picture and only talked about her pussy. How dehumanizing in a patriarchal sort of way.

Now, given that whatshername wandered through a myriad of possible affronts trying (and failing) to find a real target, I feel it is my civic duty to help her. But I can do that best by pointing to the real problems, not the ones she is making up and trying to fit into a feminist mold so that they will make sense to her and her stupid readers.

First, cupcake, they are not blowing smoke up your ass, they are blowing smoke up your pussy.

Why? Because, you insufferable moron, you have insisted that they do as a prerequisite to selling you shit. And you should give them some real credit. They covered the basics well.

Remember all that fawning bullshit about women being worshipped and the pussy being the center of civilization; the stuff that you liked?

That was actually the part they got wrong. Waking up to that little reality will make you and your vaginal compatriots a lot less malleable in the hands of advertisers. See, cupcake, you are not a goddess or any other kind of deity. You are just a woman, and that smooth spot between your legs? Just a pussy.

[image]
It might make you buy a new car, but it can't build one
As for being the center of civilization; sorry, that spot is still reserved in the real world for those who built it. That would be men. Don't let sound bites emanating from the boob tube go to your head, or your pussy, if that happens to be what you are thinking with.

Remember the fembot slogan that "feminism is the radical notion that women are human beings"? Well, you should have stuck with that and called it a day. The expectation that you are something more than human generally tends to indicate that you are actually something less.

Imagine a world in which you are just another person and not so easily offended by the sales of pussy soap. Fewer people would have to suffer your droning like a pipe organ about the fact that some advertiser acknowledged that Cleopatra had a cunt, and the fact that there is a million companies out there working overtime trying to sell everyone shit they don't need would not manifest into anything more conspiratorial than it already is.

It's just a commercial, cupcake; one mind you that obsequiously groveled for your money by handing you the Hollywood style illusion that you were a million wonderful things that you clearly aren't.

Don't you have something to wax, and something else to wax paranoid about?

And truly, truly, there's the rub. How bad can things be for women if they can afford to bitch and moan about advertisers bending over backwards to kiss their entitled asses? Answer: not very fucking bad. More accurate answer: really fucking good. But perhaps there is something else at play here? As whatshername wandered around her piece looking for a complaint that had traction (and failing), something else rose to the surface here, above the average fembots ability to comprehend.

This commercial is so close to the truth that it bitch slapped whatshername on an unconscious level (apparently that covers a lot of real estate). It bludgeoned her with a truth so devastating to everything she believes that it sent her, befuddled and disoriented, in search of a legitimate bitch, which she never found.

Pussy is power. Always has been. Just like the commercial said, men have fought and died for it. And much, much more. The truth about pussy power eviscerates every lie about female powerlessness ever pawned off by feminists on a culture so afraid of that power that it would not even call them on the lies.

It is the same power that allows whatshername to cry foul for all the wrong reasons, ignore the right reasons, get everything wrong and all fucked up, and actually get support from people who can otherwise think. Well, unless we take some time to dwell on it in a place like this, where pussy power is on hiatus, and we can think all the time.

Absolute disbelief

July 21, 2011 | by J Galt | Link | Original Link

I'm getting very tired of the MSM thought police. I can't even conjure an element of respect for the absolute tripe that spews forth on a daily basis. It does represent to me how fucked we are, when our interests for the truth in our culture and social fabric are answered with utter bullshit. I was directed by a link to read an article droning on about the Logan assault that occurred in Egypt. Here's the deal if anyone at this point gives a shit. I'll put it in a metaphor regarding a child, maybe it will induce some clarity. If a child runs out on to the street and gets hit by a car, it will affect me. How? It's painful, the pain comes from shock, grief and loss. It's a terrible outcome in what I have been led to believe is an intelligent civilization.

In the case of the child, the belief is that there are so many things that have to go wrong for that outcome to be the result that it can cause shock. It is no different for Logan. If I have any sympathy, it's because all the elements for a better outcome didn't exist. Those elements are in fact people. Herself, her employer, her work mates and very last the seething mob engaged in a violent protest. I can only imagine that the single biggest reason that those people failed her is because they were under the illusion that Logan as an intelligent individual could exercise discretion in her choices. Obviously she can't, lose 25 points on your IQ score, your incompetent, find a job that doesn't require discretion.

Along with this story was a link to another story regarding a gang rape of a 15 year old girl attending a prom at her high school. The story stated that as many as 7 may have participated in the "rape" and as many as 20 may have witnessed it and done nothing to stop it. The story also stated that not only were there adult chaperones, but there were also police at this function. The "rape" occurred in a dark secluded area of the grounds, where 20 people happened by. The security cameras in the school were broken and awaiting repair. I wonder how long.

Because I have a brain, from time to time I like to throw some electricity at it. This way if I ever suffer damage to a part of my brain I might need to use some of the alternate 90% of that meat to continue functioning.

So I like to keep it in shape I like to take my lump of hamburger for a cerebral walk from time to time. Here are some questions that registered in my hamburger. No, my thoughts aren't lean, and yes, they do get greasy.

What is the statistical possibility that 27 people will not intercede in a crime in process, including one of her own FRIENDS especially when all you have to do is inform a cop that is already there?

Sure, we can say these people are obviously scum and need a good harassing by the cops, but what is the one circumstance that would stand to influence 27 people to not intervene or even perceive that there was a crime in progress?

How about consent? Is this too greasy for you?

What is the one circumstance that could turn consensual group sex violent and lead to injuries that require hospitalization? How about removing consent and replacing it with a threat. Other details offered in the original story include that alcohol was consumed by the “victim” – and the semi-conscious state she was found in.

Was she beaten? Obviously. But responding at the scene it would be prudent to call in an air ambulance if you can’t determine that the person is suffering from injury or alcohol. The follow-up was that she suffered no life threatening injuries. But the use of a helicopter suggests a life threatening outcome. Was this in an area that would prevent ambulance access?

Sorry I have cheap hamburger in my head and at times it affects my ability to digest the cuisine.

[quote float=”left”]If there were cameras installed in the school there must have been a reason for them. I can only assume it was to deter crime, a spectrum sport that is usually defined after the fact. Someone determined that caution was prudent. [/quote] They knew the cameras were broken which likely led to the police attending. But my question is why the police would not at least make an effort to be aware of the grounds to ensure security. After all that’s why they were there, for safety. The story suggests that this rape went on for as long as two and half hours.

The “victim” had already called her father to pick her up. Did the father not come at all or go home when he couldn’t locate her? Did he ask one of the attending chaperones or one of the 4 attending police officers if they had seen her? One story said she was found under a bench in an alleyway of the school. Another suggested she was under a bench in an open area of the grounds. If it happened in an alleyway how can 27 people gather around and not be noticed by chaperones and police.

As I watch the story migrate to bullshit it becomes apparent that what I see is questions unasked and those responsible for safety slowly disappearing from the details. It sets up a domino effect that condenses into saleable sound-bites that pattern a horrific story and outcome. It is horrific enough to keep you watching and hoping for justice. That spells attention and traffic, good traffic for advertisers.

Gansta Maker
Now we have Mexican gangs to hold responsible, members we can focus our hatred on. Can you argue the fact that gang membership is the result of fatherless homes? Before you respond with your dead beat dad argument consider the social justice we implement on behalf of women. We ensure housing, income and health benefits but first you have to kick out the man.

We completely support matriarchal reproduction. But in this matriarchy we can’t even ensure a man a job or reasonable employment conditions. What we will ensure is if he falls through the cracks, or fails, he is a dead-beat, fuck him. Join a gang. Create a sound-bite. Help advertisers sell their products.

If you are trying to find social justice, the kind that translates into public safety in this story, don't. Those kind of expectations would require that you look closer at the details and ask some questions that might be uncomfortable. Questions about four attending police officers and just exactly what they were doing and where they were.

You might want to ask questions about protocols for safety and how they didn't exist. No doubt however that the additional security was advertised as part of the venue to provoke a sense of safety. The real details and truth will be viewed behind closed doors where identities and paychecks are protected. If you want justice demand the doors be opened or torn down permanently to a public review. The media has massaged this story to a conclusion, the police need only fill in the blanks with perpetrators and their bodies.

I wouldn't argue for a minute that there aren't violent assholes out there that will rape, rob, beat and murder. I wouldn't even argue the fact that most are men and that they are gang members. What I will argue against is why they are wearing uniforms, pretending to be law enforcement officers and why they are getting paid with tax dollars. How they can so egregiously fail in their duties to protect these children at a high school function? Or school officials that download their responsibilities like apathy at a trough. We won't even ask the questions regarding their presence. But maybe we won't ask those questions because some of those officers were women and women shouldn't have to patrol dark dangerous areas where 15 year old girls are raped.

It's just not politically correct.

It is most likely that I'm completely wrong on all scores, but how the fuck would you know if you never ask the questions? Without those questions you can't even participate in the human experience, you're a media addict waiting for your next fix. A willing player in a game hoping to picked by the right side and nothing will change or improve.

In fact, quite the opposite.

Congressman Poe calls for VAWA to be rewritten

July 22, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Not so long ago I wrote an open letter to Congressman Ted Poe of Texas regarding his public affiliation with Traffic911, a sexual grievance industry organization making outrageous claims about the incidence of child sex trafficking; an organization who was, in fact, trying to extort the Super Bowl Committee out of support (cha-ching) by painting football fans at the big game as a concentrated population of pedophiles.

Really sickening stuff.

Of course, I never heard back from the good congressman and his public support of the group went on unabated.

But that does not mean he is not listening…and reading the writing on the wall.

In a stunning public proclamation Poe is now calling for the re-writing of the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) into gender neutral terms, including the name of the act itself.

Poe told the Washington Times, "Certainly, I think that's something that we could consider, because the law applies equally between men and women under the act already even though the name says only women. So I'm open to changing the name. Domestic Violence Act. I like that phrase."

Now, clearly Poe is coming from left field with the assertion that the law "applies" equally between men and women. There is a massive gulf between how the law is written and how it is actually applied.

He further illustrates either willful ignorance or political posturing when he, a former Texas judge, made a statement regarding the volumes of studies that prove gender symmetry in the perpetration of domestic violence. "I disagree with these groups that say that it's equal. That's not what I have seen over the years," he said.

[box icon="none"]Of course not, Congressman. When your police officials, trained with VAWA funding, largely arrest men regardless of who actually committed the assault, and when men are arrested on mere accusation and without a proper investigation, it is going to skew the population that inevitably ends up standing in front of a judge.[/box]

In short, sir, your experience sitting on the bench has little or nothing to do with the realty of domestic violence on the ground.

As off base as Poe is, this is still a good move. Changing language is a powerful method of changing mentality. The very act of changing the name of such a behemoth piece of legislation in the face of feminist governance is huge moment.

And though Poe should not get a pass on continued ignorance of the problem, he should get some support for going in the right direction despite walking there so blindly.

As a side note here, this is another moment to file in the "blogging doesn't do any good," pinhead file.

Make no mistake about it, it is bloggers, and commenters throughout the man-o-sphere that are the driving force behind what you see happening here. Yes, there are men and women working Capital Hill to push for changes in VAWA and other laws.None of them would be there without what has been happening on the internet. Remember, gents and ladies, we ARE the media in the new age.

Now here is how to write Congressman Poe and offer him some encouragement. If he follows through with plans to push for a change in the name of VAWA, it will be the biggest slap in the face to feminist orthodoxy in modern times.

Well, that, and A Voice for Men. Because you know that writing on the wall I mentioned? It's yours.

A Voice for Men Radio pulled from BTR

July 23, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box type=”alert” style=”rounded” border=”full” icon=”none”]

I suppose it actually was inevitable. I just received an email from an AVfM Radio listener informing me that the show has disappeared from the BlogTalk Radio website. Sure enough, an attempt on my part to log on just produced a message that my account there has been disabled.

And of course I found out in the predictable way. No notification, no warnings, no nothing. Just zap, you’re gone. Typical of the times. Typical of corporate scumbags. I wonder if they think this is going to shut us up?

Take heart, friends, we are temporarily down but hardly out. I actually figured out after starting the broadcast out of BTR that there are much more cost effective options out there that do not put me at the mercy of pro feminist corporate forces. We will be back on the air the MRA way. On our own.

It will take a little time. I need to press BTR for the refund and then sort through the equipment and learning curve for the new set up. My genuine impression of all this? Fuck ‘em. There will be much more powerful entities than BTR that will try to shut me down before this is over with. Fuck them, too.

Recently our friend Harry posted that there was a need for a certain amount of MRA’s that were willing to be somewhat vicious in order to push for changes. I could not agree more, and I will add one to that. Some of us are willing to be more than that.

There are only two circumstances that can possibly result in my being silenced. Justice or death. Anyone thinks I am kidding is a fool. Now, I have an article to finish that I started before this minor inconvenience happened.

To act or be acted upon

July 23, 2011 | by Elder Swami | Link | Original Link

I was at a bed and breakfast in Delhi having a conversation with my parents and the B & B owners, an elderly married couple – when something was said that got me thinking. During this conversation, the elderly woman made the infamous statement "if women ruled the world there would be much more peace" Although this was about a year before I officially had my first red pill hit, it annoyed me and I immediately objected. I can't remember what else was said that day, but I just knew that what she said was wrong, yet I couldn't think of a good reason.

This question resurfaced when self-proclaimed feminist Michael Moore, on a talk show discussing feminism, asked the question "who would you be more scared of walking down the street, a man or a woman?" He also commented, "I don't see any women building factories that pollute the ocean."

I hated to admit it, but on first glance, I thought he had a point. Maybe men really just plain evil? I pondered these questions over and over until a significant verse of scripture suddenly came to mind "He (God) hath created all things, both the heavens and the earth, and all things that in them are, both things to act and things to be acted upon." (2 Nephi 2:26) this made me realise something, everything was clear.

I wouldn't be scared of Hitler walking down the street, as I know he did not directly act out the violence he was responsible for, yet he is one the most evil men in history. I also wouldn't be afraid of Lorena Bobbitt if I saw her walking down the street either, but that doesn't stop her from being an extremely sick and twisted person.

[quote style="boxed"]It's true, I don't see women building factories that pollute, but then again I don't see women building factories at all.[/quote]

The factories that are responsible for the great comfortable lifestyle we live, the mass production of the food and clothing we need, the houses we live in etc. Factories are overall a source of good, and I'm sure that smug asshole Michael Moore has no problem reaping the rewards of their production (and is probably stuffing his face with processed food as we speak).This is because men are the "actors" of our race; they have always been there to do what was and is necessary for man's survival.

When looking at Maslow's hierarchy of needs the two most basic and important levels of the hierarchy (physiological and safety needs) have always been and still are looked after by men almost exclusively. Yet as always, with actions come consequences; some good some bad.

In the pursuit of success some men make mistakes; some men do the wrong thing. Women on the other hand are less likely to personally take action, but have historically relied on men to do things for them. They have chosen to be "acted upon."

Just imagine you were lost in the forest and the path you were following split in two, and you knew that only one of them would lead you home. In this situation you actually have three options.

[box][unordered_list style="tick"]

- Take the path on the right (act)
- Take the path on the left (act)

[/unordered_list]

[unordered_list style="red-x"]

- Sit on your butt and wait for help (be acted upon)

[/unordered_list][/box]

If you choose to act and take one of the paths, you take the risk of failing. If you choose to sit and wait you do avoid the chance of failure, but you also rule out success. Your fate is no longer in your hands. By choosing to sit and wait for help, women have largely remained free of mistakes. But would that immediately qualify them to be your navigator?

Just because women are not typically known for directly acting out and doing evil things does not make them less capable of evil or making mistakes. Women are equally capable of evil yet are more likely to act on it passively.

Women have been naturally endowed with a great ability for manipulation, as through it they can influence men to do their work for them. For example, a few months ago my brother nearly got beaten up after telling a woman that she should control her noisy dogs. He walked past this woman's house everyday on the way to work and was just sick of being barked and growled at. The night after making the complaint the woman had gotten her husband to wait outside the house for my brother, in order to "sort him out." Fortunately I was able to get there and defuse the situation before it got physical.

The point here is that although the woman did not inflict or attempt to inflict the violence herself. It was her ambition that violence be inflicted on my brother, thus she is equally responsible for it, and guilty of doing wrong.

As a result of women's passive nature there are few women of note for doing great evil historically, (a point that feminists hit on time and time again), yet at the same time there are very few women of note for great acts of good, or in fact any form of action at all. You win some, you lose some, it's a fact of life. But choosing not to play does not make you a winner by default.

And then they fight us…

July 24, 2011 | by Jared White | Link | Original Link

I put off writing this article for a while, for a variety of reasons. One of those reasons being my getting adjusted to the timeframe of my new job. Now that I'm settled in and justifiably annoyed by the recent events of the past few weeks, I feel now is the perfect time to put out this declaration of resistance.

Six days ago I wrote an article in response to a blatant act of misandric bigotry involving two moderators from the subreddit r/feminism. A man who frequented that subreddit decided to display his opinion about the Hugo Schwyzer paternity fraud incident and was told his opinions were not liked. When he asked why, the moderator, yellowmix, told him that his opinions were not welcome because he is a man.[quote float="right"]This man was told that because he is male, his views were not welcome[/quote]

This is not an exaggeration.This man was told that because he is male, his views were not welcome within that particular feminist space. Shortly after that another r/feminism's moderator came out in support of yellowmix's bigotry.I elaborate more on this and other instances of feminist bigotry in the article I linked to but suffice it to say, news of this misandry spread across the internet like wildfire. The most ironic part of the incident is the man who had his comments deleted and his voice silenced was a male feminist.

A few days later after more and more people sympathetic to feminism were drawn toward anti-feminism because of this incident a group of feminists took it upon themselves to create a new subreddit entitled r/againstmensrights. I shit you not.

The reddit has less than one hundred members but it is steadily growing and if you frequent the men's rights reddit you probably have already received a message stating that you are banned from againstmensrights, regardless of whether you are an MRA or not. The sole purpose of this reddit is to spread lies about MRAs, ban MRAs, and use any comments or posts made by anyone within any men's rights reddit as "proof" that all MRAs are misogynists.

As I'm sure everyone here at AVfM knows by now, the radio show was pulled from BTR without any explanation. This was expected by many, including myself and I expect things to get a lot worse. The reason I expect things to get worse is simple.

We will soon be at the turn of the tide.

What happened on reddit was just a small taste of things to come, an extremely small taste of things to come. Among the reasons r/againstmensrights was created, there is one main one; shock. Feminists are shocked that they can no longer declare men are pigs to a crowd of people and not receive a word of protest. Feminists are shocked that when they claim one in four or one in five or one in six women are raped every year, people ask them to prove it. Feminists are shocked that people no longer view domestic violence as only a man hitting a woman. Feminists are shocked because people are becoming infuriated by the sickening domestic violence propaganda being put out that features small boys smiling with messages insinuating they will grow up to be wife beaters.

This shock, however, is only a small pin prick through the heart of an enormous misandric machine that has made discrimination against men law within all western nations. This machine is powerful enough to put the idea of shutting down female prisons on the political table. This machine is powerful enough to let female murderers walk free because of claims of abuse. This machine is powerful enough to have any man that says something feminists don't like fired while having women who joke about a man's penis being cut off celebrated.

[quote style="boxed"]This misandric machine is powerful but it is not invulnerable.[/quote]

We have proven that it is not invulnerable. Men like Kevin Driscoll and Vladek Filler have proven that it is not invulnerable. Organizations like S.A.V.E. and Fathers and Families have proven that it is not invulnerable. Websites like A Voice for Men, The False Rape society, and The Spearhead have proven that it is not invulnerable.

[quote style="boxed"]This misandric machine is not invulnerable; it's a fucking target.[/quote]

But so are we. Several MRAs have already become targets but the MRM as a whole has yet to hit the mainstream in a large way. All of that is about to change. Register-Her will soon be launched to thousands of media outlets. AVfM radio has already been hitting the right nerves or it would not have been temporarily shut down, and soon this website will be upgraded to the most fearsome website dedicated to ending male discrimination on the internet.

They are going to fight us.

It has already begun and it is not going to slow down. It's going to heat up. Feminism has money on its side. Feminists have been falsifying facts and propagating how evil men are for decades, in order to line their pockets. The white knight infested government has bent over backwards for these misandrists, funneling enough money into their anti-male organizations to rival the national debt. They have the money and the government on their side. So when they point, some of us are going to fall. But we will stand back up and keep moving forward. They can shut down a radio station and two more will pop up in its place. They can shut down a website and five more will spring up around the internet. They can lock one of us up and thousands will rally in support on and offline. They cannot stop anti-feminists because we have the truth on our side. They cannot stop the MRM because it isn't only MRAs advocating for an end to feminist bigotry.

For those of you who haven't read the articles I wrote for Mens News Daily, none of you know my name. Many anti-feminists hide their names online because sometimes worst things than radio shows being pulled happens to those who speak out against the current political power. Well I'm not one of those anti-feminists. I've been shot at, knifed across the arm, and blown up.

[quote style=”boxed”]These bigots ain’t shit to me.[/quote]

My name is Jared White. I’m a humanist against feminism allied with the Men’s Rights Movement. As long as any legal system on this Earth is infested with discriminatory laws against men created and/or supported by feminism I will speak out against that system until those laws are abolished.

I will not be alone in this endeavor as my allies are many and their courage is as great as mine, if not greater. First you ignored us, then you laughed at us, now you fight us, and we will win. Try and fucking stop us.

Dr. Phil’s testimony “reckless and false” says press release

July 25, 2011 | by S.A.V.E. | Link | Original Link

[box][image]WASHINGTON / July 25, 2011 – Stop Abusive and Violent Environments, a national victim-advocacy organization, is charging that Dr. Phillip McGraw, a TV personality known to many as Dr. Phil, made claims at a recent Senate committee hearing that were “reckless and false.”[/box]

Dr. McGraw’s testimony was given during a July 13 hearing on the Violence Against Women Act held by the Senate Judiciary Committee. McGraw, a psychologist, often appeared on the Oprah Winfrey Show.

During his testimony, Dr. McGraw made repeated statements about violence against women, but glossed over the widespread problem of abuse against men. McGraw made a number of claims that were flatly wrong, SAVE alleges.

Dr. McGraw asserted that “Domestic violence is now the most common cause of injury to women ages 15 to 44.” But the actual leading causes of injury to women are falls, overexertion, and car accidents. McGraw told the senators that *“In too many situations violence against women, young and old, is almost treated as an ‘acceptable crime.’”*But that statement ignores research showing over 90% of Americans abhor domestic violence.

Dr. McGraw’s testimony “is reminiscent of the Jim Crow rape scares that focused on black-on-white rape, while studiously ignoring the problem of white-on-white sexual assault,” the SAVE letter explains.

“Two weeks ago Catherine Becker allegedly sliced off her husband’s penis and tossed it in the garbage disposal,” notes SAVE spokesman Philip Cook. “The gruesome incident took place just miles from Dr. Phil’s southern California home. But by the time Dr. McGraw arrived in Washington for the hearing, all awareness of male victimization seemingly had vanished from his mind.”

Women are as physically aggressive, or more aggressive, than men in their relationships with their spouses or male partners, according to a research summary compiled by Dr. Martin Fiebert of California State University.

AVfM Wishlist

July 25, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

I was asked recently by some of the readers here to make a wish list of things I needed, specifically for the effort to provide internet radio to AVfM listeners, and more generally, I think, for the scope of activism that originates from this site.

The bad news is that the list is long. The good news is that most of it does not involve money. And the really good news is that regardless of the response, AVfM, both website and radio, as well as register-her.com, will continue more or less as planned.

But please settle in for a bit as I map things out for you, this is going to be a tad lengthy.

First, the money for news releases and other promotions is still in the coffer for register-her.com. The technical work behind the site proved to be more complicated and time consuming than expected, but we are nearing completion (estimated at 3-5 days) and we will proceed as planned from there.

If press releases related to the site prove to be effective we will want to do more of them, but that will be determined as we develop some history on their efficacy.

As far as this site is concerned, the news is very good. We continue to kick ass with growth, and the new site is also near completion. I would estimate less than a week on that before we launch, but it might require just a little longer as the senior developer was out ill for a few days.

I feel completely safe in saying that when you see it you will be nothing less than astounded at the improvements. It is that good; slick, modern, polished and professional. The donation of technical expertise to develop the new site is worth many thousands of dollars and will almost certainly attract a lot of new readers.

The situation for the radio show is promising as well. As you can see by reading here, the set up and operation of the show will be accomplished with little out of pocket expense, but approaching it from a self-hosting angle produces the first item on the wish list; a new computer.

I have been winging this whole operation on $300.00 laptops that I replace once a year (when they last that long), which has served pretty well until now. And I am prepared to go on what I have, but there would be huge benefit if I had a some real speed and power to work with.

[box type=”note” icon=”none”]For the wish list I have chosen the iMac, spec’d with 3.4 GHz processor, 8 GB SDRAM, 1 TB ATA drive (I would have liked the 256 GB Solid State drive but that would have been another $500.00)[/box]

That would give me all the speed and power I would like but rings in at a cool $2,548.00. It would also serve our efforts well for some time to come.

Next on the list is images. I am sure most of you have noticed the new presence of large images at the head of most articles. The are all sized for aesthetic and design considerations that involve the upcoming new site.

Getting and using them is a bit tricky and expensive for sure. As AVfM grows we must be beyond reproach in terms of copyrights. We have removed ALL "borrowed" images from the site and replaced them with those obtained from a Shutterstock.com subscription that I bought after the last fundraiser.

That was $234.00 and it only affords me one month of the ability to download up to 25 images a day. I have developed quite a file, but the catch (as it is with all these services) is that I only have six months to use any particular image after I download it. After that my license to use them expires.

Many of those images will go unused, and as best as I can estimate I will be lucky if I can get two months worth of usable images from any one month subscription.

The other option on that is a one year subscription at $2,559.00.

Yuck. And that brings me to a good segue for the remainder of the items. Everything else on my wish list involves help other than financial. So first I will say that if there are any graphic designers out there, or photographers, please consider supplying my files with images (538 x 357 pixels – no white backgrounds) that would fall into the themes we address on this site. e.g. misandry, domestic violence, false allegations, feminism, etc. etc.

Of course with the new site coming, we would like those images to be very professional. This kind of support would possibly help avoid the 2 ½ K expense for a year of shutterstock.

Next on the list is the need for a volunteer coordinator. I regularly get offers for help to this site but I simply don't have the time to work individually with a lot of people. It would be invaluable to have an MRA who understands the mission and the needs of AVfM to serve as a liaison between people who want to volunteer to donate images, music and technical skills, and myself or Dexter. This is the kind of work that could result in very big things happening that might otherwise slip through the cracks.

Next, when the new site launches I would very much like to have a news department. We tried this at MND with mixed results, but I still believe in the idea very much.

What this would involve is simple and would take about one hour per week. The news editor would simply take three relevant news stories per week, and write a brief summary on them with a link to the original source. For instance right now in Grand Forks, South Dakota the following very important story is happening.

[box type="alert" size="large" style="rounded" icon="none"]A male student has been found guilty of sexual assault by his university while the police have charged the woman accusing him for lying about it.[/box]

Just a couple of more sentences about that (written as straight up news, no opinion or commentary) and a link to the original source, and presto, we have a news story. AVfM readers can get the basic gist here, or click through for the details and the whole story.

Our very own news department in one hour of time or less per week.

Also, AVfM has a facebook page. A volunteer to manage that page and recruit members would go a long way toward our social networking efforts. If we do get a volunteer for that, they could also incorporate the reborn AVfM Radio into that when we re-launch.

So where would all this take us?

Well, what I have in mind is pretty simple. AVfM is growing on a formula that involves a relatively complete array of web based media; written articles, audio (radio) and video; the latter of which I have largely neglected due to time constraints. That is a shame since I have over 3,000 subscribers to my youtube channel and that is growing despite my inability to produce videos like I used to.

My ambition here is simple but time intensive. After the new site launches and the new radio program begins airing I want to divide my time between a weekly radio program, writing on this site, producing regular videos again – and promoting and managing register-her.com.

Thank the stars that Manuel Dexter and Keyster are working side by side with me on this or it could not be done. And it still can't be done as well as it could be without some additional help.

But I have a feeling we are very, very close here to establishing a rhythm of solid, consistent production of MRA material, as well as many more assertive efforts to fuck their shit up.

I know, it is a pretty big list, but personally I think it will result in a huge amount of bang for the buck over the long term.

Whatever the response to this appeal, I want to extend some seriously humble thanks to all of you. Your reaction to the stunt by BTR took all the sting out of it and made it actually turn into an opportunity to regroup and come back with a vengeance.

Whatever happens, that is exactly what we are going to do.

Addendum

I have also just been advised that with the size of the AVfM database, and the greatly added functionality of the new site, that we need to acquire Virtual Private Server (VPS) hosting. That will run about $480.00 annually with our current hosting company, which is doing a very good job for us at the time.

Rude elevator bitch

---

A guy gets into an elevator… No seriously, a really nice guy gets into an elevator. Inside he sees a woman he finds rather interesting… so as politely as humanly possible, he terrorizes and rapes her… in her mind, not his and most certainly not in reality. But the simple act of a guy, any guy no matter how non-threatening or polite, who steps onto a hotel elevator with a woman is seen by that woman to be a potential rapist, especially if he politely asks her to his room for coffee. Such is the state of male-female relations in the 21st century.

~ Leo Durocher[/quote]

I'm going to do something in this post, in fact I've already done it, I don't normally do. It's called name-calling. I generally avoid it because it is typically offensive and unproductive. I don't mind so much that it irritates its object, but it doesn't lead to productive conversation or discussion and since that's what I usually want, I don't do it. But right now, I'm not particularly in the mood for productive dialog so to hell with normal conventions. It's my blog and I have the right to say what I want, freedom of speech and all that nonsense.

So the characters in this little diatribe will be given some not so pleasant names. First is the "Rude Elevator Bitch." She started it all and I've honored her with the title of this post just to show my disgust with her very existence. REB as one might refer to her in order to save keystrokes was propositioned by a guy in an elevator. She was disgusted by it and felt she had to proclaim her disgust to the world.

The guy in the elevator, "Nice Elevator Guy" or "NEG" as in totally negated, apparently offended her with his rather polite, but ill-timed and poorly executed come on.

NEG was apparently defended by a "Looney Professor" (if I called him "Nutty" I would likely be sued by Disney for copyright infringement, so "Looney" it is.). "LP" sarcastically claimed that REB had no reason to be offended and that there were larger issues that deserved attention.

[box size="large"]This drew a lot of attention to the so-called elevator-rape incident with creepy guys lining up to be attacked by oppressed feminist bitches. [/box] One of these OFB's, henceforth to be known as "Bitchy Entitled Feminist" (BEF), argues that NEG is only a nice guy because he believes that being a nice guy is a way to get sex from women. Once a woman has rejected him, he will stop being nice to her and refer to her as a bitch. She sees him as believing that because he is nice, he is entitled to her body in return for his "niceness."

BEF is backed up by "Super Mangina" (SM) who wants us to believe that he's some sort of Texas redneck who isn't afraid of rabid dogs and who isn't afraid to use racial slurs like "white trash" to refer to his friends and neighbors. But although he may be foolish and racist, he isn't sexist. In fact, he so non-sexist that he believes that in order to keep from frightening women (who are obviously frightened half to death at the sight of strange men), men should cross the street to avoid passing them either by overtaking them from behind or when approaching head on. Of course he has obviously not read the latest feminist research which classifies his form of chivalry as "benevolent sexism." But we'll excuse his lack of literacy on the grounds that he's from Texas and therefore constantly surrounded by white trash and rabid dogs.

I doubt that many learn to read in such an environment and that those who do probably don't have time to do much of it; too busy whittling and such. I'm positively certain that those in the feminist movement will follow my lead and forgive his benevolent sexism and pay no mind to his continued denigration, demeaning, and infantilization of the entire female sex. After all, if a redneck from Texas can't infantilize women, who can?

There are several points here that need to be made. First let's talk about social graces. As a society we expect men to proposition women. Men are expected to be assertive, even somewhat aggressive in pursuing relationships with women. I'm not saying that this is right; I'm saying that it is the way it is. Despite a half a century of feminism attempting to liberate women from "gender" roles, women have by and large, not yet embraced to role of the pursuer in these relationships. Feminism is also partially responsible for this failure.

At the same time as the attempted to liberate women and get them to embrace new roles in society, they promoted the existence of a "rape culture" in which all men can be seen as potential rapists who use rape to instill fear into all women as a means to control them. Thus the irrational fear experienced by Rude Elevator Bitch is a fear placed into her by feminism itself. If, as some like BEF claim, this fear is oppressive, then REB is being oppressed by her own ideological feminism. NEG's act of asking REB to his room for coffee was not an act of oppression as claimed by REB and her supporters. It was non-violent, non-threatening, and by her own account polite. Her fear was therefore, irrational and the result of feminist ideology. Thus if any oppression was actually taking place, REB was being oppressed by her own irrational belief system.

NEG, on the other hand, was merely fulfilling a gender role that he has been forced into, at least in part, by feminism itself. But let's examine NEG's behavior. By all accounts, NEG appears to be a rather shy, somewhat unconfident nerd or geek who appears to be lacking in the social graces. It was probably not a good idea to ask REB for coffee just after she finished a lecture on how she is offended by men who sexualize her, especially late at night in an isolated elevator. That would be her point of view which she and all of her supporters have stated quite eloquently. So if one only accounts for REB's feelings, it was the wrong thing to do. But how about looking at the situation from NEG's point of view?

OMG, he asked me to join him for coffee!

A shy, socially awkward nerd who lacks confidence is likely to feel uncomfortable in any situation where he intends to proposition a woman. But he is likely to be terrified of doing it in a public setting with plenty of people around to witness his humiliation when she turns him down. So from his point of view, an isolated elevator in the middle of the night is probably the ideal location, especially since he was probably never going to have this opportunity again. His fear of humiliation is probably not as irrational as her fear of rape and in hindsight, it was definitely more justified. He didn't rape her, she did reject him. She not only rejected him, she humiliated him, publically, for all the world to see.

People like BEF and Super Mangina are of the opinion that REB's feelings are the only feelings that should be taken into account. NEG's feelings don't matter anymore than NEG matters. He should have altered his behavior, put all his hopes and dreams aside, and taken her feelings into account. In fact, for BEF and SM, REB has a right (as a woman) not to be propositioned and NEG had no right to proposition her. This begs the question of who has rights and who doesn't.

Does a person have a right to speak to another person? This country (and many others) places a high value on freedom of speech. It is one of the most important rights we have. The term "inalienable" might be applied. NEG was most definitely well within his rights to invite REB for coffee, even if "coffee" was merely a pretense for hot passionate sex. While REB may have a right to expect not to be propositioned in an elevator late at night, she had no right to impose her expectation upon NEG, even if his behavior causes her to feel unsafe.

REB had the right to refuse the proposition; she had the right to step out of the elevator. She has the right to alter her behavior, not his. If she wanted to feel safe, she should have left the elevator. He had every right to be there and he had every right to speak up. In this case it is not his feelings that don't matter, it is hers. The fact that she is a woman and he is a man makes no difference, the opinion of BEF notwithstanding. REB's online rant demonstrates that in this case she was acting as the oppressor. She believes that she has the right to determine what another person's behavior should or shouldn't be and that person should act in accordance with her wishes. Furthermore, she believes she is entitled to this because she is a woman. That makes her sexist.

Notice that I am not stating that REB should be flattered by NEG's proposition, a position apparently taken by Looney Professor. If she isn't flattered by a socially awkward nerd lacking in self-confidence who thinks she might be a person worth knowing (or at least bedding) who am I to say that she should be? After all this, I seriously doubt she's a person worth knowing. I have no interest in her which is probably a great relief to her; one less potential rapist to worry about.

In closing, most feminists try very hard to convince us that feminism is all about equality between the sexes. Men and women are to be treated equally. But this little tale illustrates the lie inherent in feminist equality. It is all about the woman. It is all about her feelings, her needs, and her desires. Men be damned, this is not about you. It's all about the BITCH.

Women, you have surely earned It

In May of 2011, I wrote an article called "The ugly truth about women and trust." I stand by what I said, but since then, there's been new data to consider, and the topic needs another visit.

Anyone with a passing familiarity with this site will know immediately where this data comes from, but since this is written for the benefit of a female reader, some exposition may be useful.

In July of 2011 a California woman named Catherine Becker drugged her husband, tied him up unconscious, and on waking, cut off his penis and destroyed the severed organ in a kitchen garbage disposal.

Are you giggling yet? If you're amused by that story, and I know that many women are, please consider the following : A man drugs his wife, ties her up, and then mutilates her vagina with a kitchen knife.

Still laughing? Still delighted at a human mutilated by somebody they loved and trusted?

Not very funny now, is it?

I realize that many people will strongly disagree with my sentiment, because in fact, many people – in particular; many women find a man being dismembered mangled and brutalized with a knife hilarious.

You can giggle again now that the victim of this mutilation is just another man.

Go on, laugh.

In a July episode of a CBS daytime woman's television show called "The Talk," the 5 female hosts, including Sharon Osborne and Julie Chen discussed this premeditated mutilation, and treated the issue as the ultimate in slapstick comedy.

[quote]Mutilating a human being is not funny, no matter what sex they are. [/quote]

There were utterances of "you go girl," the mutilation was described as "delightful," and all 5 hosts laughed openly at a human who had been sexually mutilated. The individual earned this brutal and grisly retribution because he apparently wanted a divorce. "That'll teach him," one of the hosts suggested.

The show is filmed in front of a live studio audience – who happen to be almost all women, and the open celebration of a human's grisly dismemberment was met with a horrified, shocked silence.

Actually, no. The audience, almost all women, laughed their heads off, because when a human is permanently and viciously mutilated, then it's funny as hell, provided the victim is male.

The woman who performed this grisly mutilation is now a celebrity of sorts. She has inspired FaceBook campaigns and letter writing campaigns to free her, to afford her the protected status of a victim, to gift her with education funding, housing, therapy and an expenses-paid-cruise to the Cayman islands.

She's not the victim, by the way. The mutilation was not retaliation against some violence done by her husband. It was in response to his stated desire for a divorce. She was, and is, a violent criminal.

At this point, you might assume the dismemberment, or it's cheering by daytime talk-show hosts, or the raucous laugher of the audience, or the surge of public support for a violent criminal are the new points of data I referred to early in this article. But all that is just context, my reason for writing this is the following comment, made by a feminist on 17 July 2011. It read:

[quote style="boxed"]Today, as with almost every day, I feel more loathed and feared for being a woman than for being gay.[/quote]

These are the words of a woman and feminist – and she is correct.

To the reader of this article, if you are a woman and feel that you're loathed and feared – then you probably are indeed loathed and feared. I strongly doubt anyone cares what your sexual preferences are. Why would they care any more than about your favorite color of nail polish? But there are many good reasons to fear and loath you, if you are simply a woman.

On the issue of false rape accusations – a casual skimming of the news reveals this to be an escalating problem. The consequences to men of being falsely accused being so dire, and the lack of serious consequence to a false accuser suggests that a climate of fear of women is entirely rational. While you may be personally blameless in such actions – you are a visible member of a demographic increasingly prone to use sex, false accusation, and socially constructed victim-hood as a weapon.

Not to mention, knives.

That criticism of false accusation almost always focuses on its stifling effect on "real" reporting of actual rape, and not on the devastation to the falsely accused or the devastation of families demonstrates a societal failure to comprehend or acknowledge the destructive power women can and do wield with almost complete impunity. Yes, by membership in a biological demographic which seems increasingly prone to employ this power, you will be feared and loathed, and deservedly so.

In fact more than just devastation of families, careers and lives through false accusations – women are increasingly stabbing, mutilating, shooting and burning their husbands and children to death, with little or no legal consequence. In many cases, even when legal evidentiary inquiries establish the factual basis for responsibility in stabbings, shootings and murderous mayhem done by women, they're given a pass based on imaginary past victimization.

Our society, including our courts sets aside the idea that past abuse does not provide legal justification for assault, and murder – and even uses imaginary, claimed, or wholly assumed and unsubstantiated imaginings of abuse to excuse women from responsibility when they kill people. In fact, this culturally embedded free pass isn't deemed enough exemption by many legal scholars – and legal precedents are increasingly being established whereby women are mandated to suffer lesser legal penalties.

So, if you're a woman, you can mutilate and murder and excuse it by claiming to be abused by your dead victims.

Dead men not only don't wear plaid, they tell no inconvenient truths either.

If you're a woman, yes, you should enjoy the fear and loathing you so rightfully inspire. It would be tragic if after 50 years of diligent feminism to pathologize female culture, hold women unaccountable and incite them to murder with endless repetition of male vilifying lies, that women didn't enjoy the fear and loathing that they have so rightfully earned.

What possible fun can it be to participate in a culture of narcissism and unaccountable caprice if you don't bask in the fear and hatred you inspire?

After all the hard work to get here, isn't this what feminists have always wanted?

AVfM Radio 1 – Feminist douche bags 0

July 26, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box type="note" style="rounded" icon="none"]

Well gents and ladies, it has been a most interesting evening. Grab yourself a cuppa and listen to what you, MRM loyalists, did.

Just about two hours ago I got off the phone with Shannon Dingee-Kramer, the director of customer relations and operations for BlogTalk Radio.

The short version of that talk is that we are back in business at BTR, with an apology for the interruption, but the details of the conversation are what you will find most interesting.

The program was interrupted by a complaint about something I said on the air on 6/28/11, in the episode entitled FTSU Big Time. I said, and the quote is approximate, regarding the debut of register-her.com, "Now, if Mary Jane Rottencrotch decides to falsely accuse her husband of domestic violence in order to get the upper hand in a divorce, we can publish all her personal information on the website, including her name, address, phone number…even her routes to and from work."

This remark elicited a complaint to BTR, from an unnamed individual. I asked if it was Jessica Valenti and was told by Dingee-Kramer that she did not know.

I asked because it was immediately after that broadcast that Valenti was caught tweeting her followers, looking for advice on how to erase her existence off the internet.

Apparently the tough as milquetoast creator of Friday Feminist Fuck You is just a scared little girl when someone fights back.

In the next part of the conversation we covered what should have been obvious from the outset. I was making a rhetorical, hypothetical remark about the possibilities of what we could do, using a fictitious character in the process.

Dingee-Kramer's reaction to the complaint was impulsive and thoughtless for sure.

I threatened no one, speaking only in the realm of possibilities, and the reaction should never have happened. And as anyone visiting register-her.com can see, there is no personal address of anyone listed on that site, much less their routes to and from employment or anywhere else.

No one named Rottencrotch either.

To her credit, that was precisely Dingee-Kramer's after-the-fact assessment of her own decision, and why she offered what appeared to be a sincere apology.

She also reinstated AVfM Radio while we were on the phone together.

Her explanation of what happened centered around her assertion that they were very short staffed when the complaint came in and that she made a decision spontaneously, without diligent investigation.

All because someone complained about what I said, alleging it was a real threat against an actual human being.

In short, just another feminist telling a lie. And someone else who bought into it without thinking.

Truth tell, I liked speaking with Dingee-Kramer. She was personable, accountable and shared with me that she visited register-her.com and is "100% supportive" of what we are doing there, also relating her feeling that women in this culture can "fall into a bucket of poop and come out of it smelling like a rose."

It appears she is familiar with the pussy pass.

Jared White recently posted an excellent article on this site, "And then they fight us…"

Of course the partial quote is from Ghandi's "First they ignore you, then they laugh at you, then they fight you, then you win."

And now, gents and ladies, they are fighting us. And we are winning.

Dingee-Kramer also shared with me that they had been getting a high volume of "hate mail" from fans of AVfM Radio.

People, that was not hate; that was your VOICE. And the world is starting to listen to it. I have absolutely no doubt – NONE – that you broadcasting your righteous outrage crushed the feminist lie and set us back on course.

BTR listened to you.

Oh, and so did Mary Kellett and the Ultimate Men's Summit and the Bangor Daily News.

And you can bet your ass that no matter how silent they are around AVfM Radio, the feminist hate mongers are listening to you as well.

And it is eating them alive. Too bad for them it only gets worse from there.

Let me tell you what the net result was of a feminist lodging that false complaint against us. We got an apology and a high ranking staff member of BTR that is going to screen future complaints (and they will get them) a lot more carefully and thoughtfully.

We got Bob O'Hara, a respected and competent MRA to volunteer to be the first AVfM News Director. We got yet another technical expert who will be working henceforth with JtO on register-her.com.

We now have Nergal as our new volunteer coordinator to help us organize talent and resources that we can use to keep upping the ante.

We got some badly needed donations that will now allow us acquire VPS services for AVfM for at least the next year AND a damn good start on what I need to build or buy the serious hardware I need to take this to the next level.

All these things became a part of the chain of events because one feminist told a lie and the real MRA's, all of you, decided they were not going to take it laying down.

Then they fight you, then you win.

Then. you. win.

So to Valenti, or whoever the feminist bonehead was who tried to take us down with one of your filthy lies, THANKS! Please listen to the newly invigorated AVfM Radio more in the future. Contact BTR with phony complaints as often as possible (and for you that is very, very often).

We will be back on the air with a Jessica Valenti Special on August 2, 2011.

Another dozen false allegations and AVfM will get a 50,000 watt radio station.

But seriously, to readers and listeners of AVfM, take a moment after reading this and consider you just dealt a significant blow to the hateful ideologues that want to continue their war on men and boys with your complicit silence.

Look back on the things that have happened just at this website in the past year, from the New York Times to launching our own radio program, to BENEFITTING from the attacks on us.

And then imagine where we will be and what we will be doing a year from now.

These people are not invincible. They are vulnerable, simple minded bigots, and we are going to take them all down.

A Voice For Men is reborn

July 27, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[dropcap]O[/dropcap]n behalf of myself and the team of individuals that have come together to support the mission of A Voice for Men, welcome to AVfM 2.0!

And I have to admit to be at somewhat of a disadvantage here, as I would like to make some public thank you's to some particular individuals, but I am bound to maintain their confidence. What I can tell you is that the recent attacks on this operation that were directed at our show on BTR have had a landslide of effects that have not even made it to the pages of this site. Again, anonymity has been assured.

What I can tell you is that AVfM has just made a massive leap ahead. Not just with this site, which is a wonder itself, but with technical, editorial and marketing expertise that I did not even dream would come our way even two weeks ago. I wish I could give more details, but I have already reached the limit of my agreements about this by saying what I have. NO email inquiries on this please.

I can say that you can expect to see things happen in the coming days that will make you smile, and feminists shit their pants. And I mean that in the most serious way. We do need to put a little more intensity into our fundraising efforts, but the cavalry has already arrived. AVfM is going to seriously fuck their shit up.

This incarnation of AVfM's internet presence has been some time in coming, and judging from the content of my inbox I have tested the patience of some loyal readers with the down time required to make 2.0 available. My apologies for the inconvenience, but I trust that all of you will feel like it was worth the wait.

Please feel free to take a self-tour of the site. As you can already see our appearance has drastically improved. But as you go through and look again at some of the other articles you will see that there is a wealth of new features that render the site more polished and professional, as well as enhancing your user experience.

Your commenting experience, which is now reserved for registered users only, will be a big step up from where we were. And the video archives located on the home page will give you a great resource for entertainment and activism.

Articles that are either very popular or deemed editorially important are now presented for easier access. In the "Explorer" area on the home page you will see a block of images. Just place your cursor over any of them for the headline.

And speaking of images, we have gone to considerable trouble and expense (thanks to your donations) to provide you a site with more visual appeal, including a custom logo and all new, licensed graphics with each article throughout the site.

But the main benefit here is that, as you will see with time, this site has been designed with activism in mind. I won't let the whole cat out of the bag right now, but AVfM is getting ready to take fucking their shit up to a whole new level.

Of course, we will still depend on you for help, so I absolutely must call your attention to the shiny new donation buttons at the top of the page. Those buttons go directly to supporting our mission here, and your help is needed now more than ever.

These are very exciting times, my friends. There is a certain change in the air, and AVfM is a part of it. We now have more weapons. Some they know about and some they don't. We mean to use them all.

So welcome back, everyone. If you see anything we missed please point it out and prepared to be patient with us. There are more of us now behind the scenes, but we are working harder than ever.

Here's to a whole new era of making feminists as miserable as any bigot should be. Your voice is about to become as thunder.

Oh, oh, oh, Jamie's lyin'

August 4, 2011 | by keyster | Link | Original Link

A few weeks ago the New York Times published a small one paragraph AP article on page 13 of its Saturday edition that a jury found a woman by the name of Jamie Leigh Jones had lied about being raped. If you don't remember exactly who Jamie Leigh Jones is, let me refresh your memory.

Jamie Leigh Jones, an employee of KBR, a sub-contractor of Halliburton, claimed that while in Iraq in 2005, she was drugged and brutally gang raped by other KBR employees who then held her at gun point in a small shipping container without food and water for 24 hours for reporting the rape.

[box type="alert" icon="none"]In 2008 the New York Times "investigated" her story and ran a 1500 word front page report about a "troubling trend" of sexual assaults committed by male employees of military contractors in Iraq against women, using her story as the main proof. [/box] What ensued as a result were sensationalistic reports as fact from the feminist media; 20/20, CNN, CBS News, The Early Show, MSNBC, NPR and every major newspaper, about an epidemic of female contractors being raped in Iraq by their male counter parts. Jones appeared before alarmed congressional committees and on several TV shows to propagate her horrifying tale and began promoting a book with the working title; "The Jamie Leigh Story: How My Rape in Iraq and Cover-up Made Me a Crusader for Justice."

Senator Barack Obama demanded a State Department investigation. Comedian turned freshman Senator Al Franken used the story to grandstand and attract attention to himself by adding an "Anti-Rape" amendment to an appropriations bill prohibiting defense contractors from including mandatory arbitration clauses in employment contracts. Thirty Republican male senators who voted against the Franken bill were accused of being "Pro-Rape."

When the time finally came for her to actually prove her allegations true the claim mysteriously disappeared from the record after DNA evidence showed she had sex with one man and that it was ruled consensual. The whole thing was simply dropped. No criminal charges were brought against her and Republican senators did not sponsor an "Anti-False Rape Allegation Bill" as a response.

Liar
What's a false rape "allegationist" to do? Take it to civil court in hopes the evil rich corporation will buckle and pony up a tidy little settlement to avoid bad publicity, of course! The doctor who examined her testified there were no signs of any drugs "date-rape" or otherwise in her system within 24 hours after the alleged attack. Jones claimed the attack was so brutal her breast implants were ruptured and her pectoral muscles torn, requiring massive reconstructive surgery. This was contradicted not only by the (female) doctor who examined her the next day, but also by her own plastic surgeon. Her claim that KBR held her at gun point in a shipping container was suddenly remembered two years after the alleged incident, about the same time the media frenzy began.

The feminist media, in it's zeal to expose patriarchal oppression and control over innocent oppressed women everywhere, never once suspected her story; that she was drugged, gang raped and held captive by employees of a large corporation and that the only thing she was sure about was not being sure it even happened, because she was under the influence of a "roofy."

Had the media doubted the word of a supposedly raped woman they would have found that even before leaving for Iraq with KBR, at the age of 20 Jones had made rape accusations against two other men. A few years earlier, she told a doctor her boyfriend had raped her, and right before leaving for Iraq she accused a KBR supervisor of raping her. She was already 0-for-2 on rape allegations before she even went to Iraq! Had false rape accusation been a felony perhaps this little one woman wrecking crew would have been put out of business then, but she needed to perfect her trade.

A few years after humiliating themselves over the Duke case, the media is now burying, if not censoring all together, the ongoing stories of false rape accusations. Because false rape accusation is not newsworthy, and besides maybe people won't believe it happens if they never report it. Woman as the victim titillates and validates. Woman as the perpetrator is simply too exceptional to be a trend. It's not even debated in the newsroom or editor's office; it's implied as a reporter you simply make it so or be cast out as not "towing the line".

"You mean to tell me some women that claim to have been raped, might not be telling the truth?" Yes, and this comes as a shock only because the media deems false rape accusation as news worthy only if the woman can somehow be positioned as a victim; as being disturbed, upset or confused.

Selective truth in deciding what qualifies as news is the new "Ministry of Information". "Don't anger or confuse women!" says the corporate sponsor to the media outlet. Tell them only what they're comfortable hearing. Tell them about horrible things that happen to other women. Satiate their schadenfreude. Keep them watching. They buy our things.

This is why it's more important than ever that AVoice for Men exists. Like Elam said a while back, "We are the news!" How else would you know to avoid one Jamie Leigh Jones?

We are experiencing technical difficulties

August 4, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box type=”alert” size=”large” icon=”none”]As you might have noticed, the site keeps timing out and giving 500 errors. It seems we might be suffering a DDOS attack. Maybe it’s just the over enthusiastic manosphere sending everyone here all at once. We’re working on it and it will be solved as soon as humanly possible.

Update to the update. Sorry folks, but there was such a mad rush of people into the site when we launched that it gave our servers paranoid delusions and we had to shut it down for a bit and address some tech matters. I am sure it caused some frustrations, so please accept apologies from the team.

I am also sure it wasn’t just MRA’s rushing to the site. We have some real enemies at this point. Actually, we have had enemies all along, but they are just starting to wake up to how serious things are getting from the opposition. I expect they will be lurking here a lot more often.

It is actually a high class problem to have, especially coming right out of the gate. I welcome our feminist detractors here, and pledge to make our work Fucking Your Shit Up as tidy and merciful as possible.

We are getting matters completely resolved now and while there may be a few minor glitches over the next several hours, we should be back for good with no further need for down time. And then we will get back, full time, to doing what we do best around here. FTSU.

Vladek Filler: A political prisoner in America

August 5, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[dropcap]M[/dropcap]any of you will know the name of Vladek Filler. Thanks in part to your help with drawing media attention to his case, and the fact that he was innocent, Filler was exonerated of the false rape charges against him.

He was, however, convicted falsely of assaulting his estranged wife, Ligia Filler, by putting a bruise on her arm. The court has scheduled Vladek's sentencing hearing for August 10, 2011, at 9 am at Hancock County Superior Court in Maine, despite clear evidence that the assault conviction was based on fraud.

[box icon="none"]I am asking for help from MRAs to make their voices heard concerning the fraud and abuse inflicted on Vladek Filler and his children by Ligia Filler, ADA Mary Kellett, DA Bassano, ADA Paul Cavanaugh, and the local legal establishment which is determined to severely punish an innocent man because he fought for the custody of his sons and because he has defied their corrupt actions against him.[/box]

Vladek's attorney not only filed an appeal for the assault conviction but went further and filed a post-trial motion asking the judge to acquit Vladek or order a new trial based on evidence of Vladek's innocence.

Vladek Filler Motion for New Trial

Included in the motion is just a few irrefutable facts proving that Filler was wrongfully convicted, based on the evidence. What the motion did not mention was that the original trial judge blocked a mountain of key evidence, including Police reports which explicitly stated that Ligia Filler changed her entire story days later after she materialized a fresh bruise on her arm. None of her prior transcribed statements about the incident were allowed at trial.

To date the judge has not ruled on the post-trial motion to acquit or set aside the conviction for a new trial. Instead the establishment is rushing to use the wrongful misdemeanor conviction to harshly punish Vladek before blatant fraud and evidence suppression gets reviewed by a higher court.

Simply put, Filler's insistence on defending himself against lies and corruption has made him a liability to the system. They are pushing actively to put him in jail as quickly and quietly as possible.

[quote float="right"]As Thomas Ball faced certain court abuse and jail at his upcoming hearing, on August 10, 2011, Vladek will face what is, on its face, political imprisonment.[/quote] Prosecutor Paul Cavanaugh will argue for Filler to receive the maximum prison sentence (1 year). Yes, that is a year in prison for allegedly putting a bruise on a known liar's arm that did not appear for four days after the "incident." The judge allowed Vladek to remain free pending appeal, but required a $50K surety bail stating that it was "due to the seriousness," of the allegations against him. This treatment for a class D misdemeanor conviction with no prior record is unheard of.

The fix is in, people. They want to use this misdemeanor assault charge to make an example of Filler for speaking out; for filing a Bar Complaint against Kellett; for blowing the whistle on their crimes against men.

This is the same district and prosecutor (Paul Cavanaugh) who sought only 30 days in jail for a confessed female child molester.

Not only was she allowed to keep custody of her boys despite being convicted for molesting their friend, but the rationale used for her 30 day sentence was to allow her to be with the children.

No one seems to care that Vladek's abused and traumatized sons will face more trauma and threats from both CPS and Ligia Filler if Vladek is imprisoned. Ligia Filler has a documented history of abusing her children. Officials saw her treatment of them as serious enough to award Vladek full custody despite the fact that he was being prosecuted for rape and assault.

[image]
Vladek and son Andrew
But it gets even more insane in Salem Village. Filler was criminally charged with this fake assault solely by Ligia Filler's over the phone complaint. That's right, the police never even responded to the "scene of the crime." They simply had a warrant issued for his arrest based on an allegation an alleged victim made on the telephone.

Evidence shows the police chief, Guy Wycoff, helped Ligia Filler concoct her story days later. By contrast, the police department and Kellett's office refuse to allow criminal charges against Ligia Filler for well substantiated domestic abuse, harassment, or even for being caught by the police causing over $10,000 of theft and destruction to Vladek's awarded property.

Instead, on August 10, Ligia Filler and the same strangers who coached her to cry to be more believable, and helped her destroy Vladek's life and lives of his children, will be allowed to address the Court and call for his imprisonment. Ligia Filler will be allowed to make her demands for his punishment for a misdemeanor assault by using her absurd and false rape accusations. Vladek's sentencing is being turned into a public stoning by the villagers.

The witch trials must end. As I write this, still another false sexual assault case is being readied for trial by Mary Kellett against another father desperately fighting for his children with his wife. And there is also the recent event that Kellett conned a woman in another case to not testify on behalf of her estranged husband by convincing her he had killed his first wife. That case was thrown out on Kellett's misconduct when the judge found out what she did. More on both of these cases later.

But right now I am calling for help from MRAs to speak out against this gross abuse of due process and civil rights. As Thomas Ball faced certain court abuse and jail at his upcoming hearing, on August 10, 2011, Vladek will face what is, on its face, political imprisonment.

We need as many messages of support as possible before the sentencing hearing. The letters will be considered directly by the trial judge and will allow Vladek's supporters to have direct access to the judge. We need people to call for Vladek's acquittal or new trial. We need people to demand justice for Vladek and his children – not more abuse and imprisonment.

Respectful emails for Judge Robert Murray of the Hancock County Superior Court, who is presiding over the case, can be sent to free.vladek@gmail.com They will be forwarded to his office. You might also e-mail their letters to the local media and the Governor's office.

Tweaking the Nose of Radical Feminism

August 5, 2011 | by Carey Roberts | Link | Original Link

Two weeks ago Debbie Wasserman Schultz, Democratic National Committee chair, met her match in one Rep. Allen West. It seems that Wasserman Schultz waited until West left the House floor, then cut loose with a liberal jeremiad for the congressman's support of the GOP-supported Cut, Cap, and Balance Act.

Apprised of the incident, the former Lieutenant Colonel fired back, calling her "the most vile, unprofessional, and despicable member of the House of Representatives…If you have something to say to me, stop being a coward and say it to my face."

[quote float="right"]It wasn't the first time the libber-turned-congresswoman saw her grandstanding tactics backfire. A couple months ago Wasserman Schultz accused House Republicans seeking to cut off taxpayer abortion funds with waging a "war on women."[/quote]

In the past, the slightest suggestion of a GOP "war on women" would be enough to bring out the white flag a-flutter. But this time the stiff-spined GOP refused to be buffaloed by the high-octane rhetoric. Within days a group of Republican women fired back, calling Wasserman Schultz's demagoguery "baseless" and "inaccurate."

For years, feminists have succeeded in dictating the parameters and vocabulary of the gender debate. By trotting out a sympathetic victim, playing on lawmaker chivalry, or resorting to outright falsehoods, feminists have been able to maintain hegemony over the public discourse. Politicians, newspaper editors, even university presidents learned to toe the feminist line, or else become tagged with the "anti-woman" moniker.

All that changed on February 18. That's the day the U.S. House of Representatives' continuing resolution bill scrapped the funding for Planned Parenthood's abortion business.

In short order, revenue-pinched state legislatures took up the same refrain. Planned Parenthood funding cuts were approved in Indiana, Kansas, and North Carolina. Indiana Governor Mitch Daniels signed HB 1210, prohibiting abortion providers from receiving state funds.

Another sacred cow of radical feminism is the near-automatic award of child custody to a divorcing woman. The fact that children who lose contact with their loving fathers are far more likely to drop out of school and get in trouble with the law doesn't seem to register with feminist logic (forgive the oxymoron, if you will).

But in recent weeks, a bevy of Republican presidential candidates, including Herman Cain and Gary Johnson, lined up to pronounce the current system deeply flawed. Newt Gingrich castigated the "extreme anti-male bias" of family courts.

Another gem in the feminist diadem is the Violence Against Women Act, which is used as a slush fund by domestic violence groups to support lobbying efforts for a broad array of radical causes. But two weeks ago, House Judiciary Committee member Ted Poe vowed to make the law gender neutral. “I certainly agree with equal protection under the law. And maybe a name change is in order,” the Texas congressman explained.

[box type=”note” icon=”none”]And it’s not just politicians who are poking holes in the feminist catechism of gender victimhood.[/box]

Following its embarrassing overtime loss to the Japanese women’s soccer team, Bryant Gumbel of HBO Sports revealed the double-standard that permeates sports reporting these days. “Had a men’s team turned in a similar performance,” Gumbel commented, “papers and pundits nationwide would have had a field day assailing the players, criticizing the coach, and demanding widespread changes to a men’s national team that flat-out choked.”

Then the cheeky “Everything I Do Is Wrong” campaign by the California Milk Processor Board that lampooned clueless men and hormone-addled women. The campaign triggered the wrath of the feminist Politburo, with Ms. Magazine demanding an immediate end to the “sexist” campaign.

The Ms. Magazine antics elicited this rejoinder from columnist Jenn Taylor: “What better way to expose portrayals of women as irrational whiners and hysterical bitches than by whining irrationally and bitching hysterically?”

It gets worse

It’s one thing when conservative knuckle-draggers delight in the excesses of feminism. But when a fellow liberal debunks a feminist sacred cow, that’s hitting below the belt!

That’s exactly what the current issue of Time magazine does – it puts to the lie the shibboleth that working women pull a second shift when they come home, facing a pile of dirty laundry and shrieking kids, as dad lounges on the porch to watch the Dodgers game. According to Ruth Davis Konigsberg, “Quantitatively speaking, we have no grounds to stand on. And it’s time that women — myself included — admit it and move on.”

It’s getting harder and harder for the gender guerillas to play the victim card. Things are looking grim for them.

Red pill legacy in a blue pill world

August 7, 2011 | by Merlin | Link | Original Link

[dropcap]R[/dropcap]ome wasn't built in a day. Whatever you may think of the ancient Romans and the Roman Empire, there is a very big part of that society for which I have great admiration and respect. I am talking about their achievements. Certainly many would agree that they left some amazing legacies for the modern people of today.

Many of the things we take for granted today were conceived, designed, and invented by the Romans. While there was a legacy of those before them, they built upon and improved what was known. We can thank them for roads and pavement, improved architecture, central heating, bricks and fast drying cement, parks, swimming pools, aqueducts, sanitation, plumbing, public order, firemen, Latin, the Julian calendar, a public health system, and astoundingly a crane capable of lifting two tons.

That's just an appetizer, but what do all the above have in common? I will give you one guess. They were largely, if not entirely, the legacies of men and boys. And it's worth a celebration of your masculinity every time you give it reflection.

Let that soak in for a moment or two. Bathe in the wonderment and appreciation for what, as human males, we have achieved in abundance. Even when you take a look at our modern society it's still amazing to think that most of the progress has been largely due to the brilliant minds of men and boys. When I think of that, which is often, I get a great deal of satisfaction that I was born male.

A great source of my own thoughts about male achievement came through an education by my father and grandfather. I remember the encouragement I received as a young boy being invaluable in my appreciation of what came before my own existence on earth. My father would take us on trips to places of historical interest during early summer holidays and weekends. Often they were enhanced by the inclusion of a welcome picnic lunch provided by my mother, but the star of the show was definitely my father, with his enthusiastic manner that had me captured with every word.

[quote float="left"]Contrary to the belief so many women have regarding parenting, I found my father to be more open and sincere than my mother.[/quote] I lived and breathed the words he uttered whilst he was in passionate refection over our past. In those moments I could almost be there. We stood on the battlements of a magnificent castle looking through the archer apertures, formed as a cross, with my head pressed against the cold stone. Looking far down to the grassy pastures beyond I could imagine the days of old as my father talked me through historical events. You can't ever put a value on times like that in your life. They are priceless. It's such a shame that many women associate "priceless" with adornments or their acquisition status in life.

Some of my inspiration to this day, and for this article in particular, comes in the form of novels by Bernard Cornwell. He pens historical novels that completely enthrall the reader. His writing captures me, taking me to another time and place, as though a boy again listening to my father. This is the power of the crafted word.

The Romans were certainly mentioned amongst the numerous novels I have read over the years. I will confess that having a little of the old Italian blood in the family makes reading about them more inspiring.

I've always been very single minded, and my grandfather is partly to thank for it. I'm sure he noticed my blue pill intake on a few occasions and helped me back on track. He was the one who, over a pint or two of his best beer, advised me on how to keep and remain red pilled to the hilt. He would encourage me to be resolute and to always be prepared to question authority figures, for which I remain thankful to this day.

In more recent times I have Angry Harry, AVfM, and Manwomanmyth to thank for my continued supply of the red pill. They came into my life at a time when things just weren't making sense anymore, and they gave me a code of sensibility that helped unravel the frustrations I had with present day bullshit.

We males have plenty to be very proud of, and I use this as an affirmation when sometimes the going gets a little tough. Believe me, I've had plenty of tough in my life. From two expired marriages of around eight years each, I can safely say that marriage is a one-way street. It's a dead-end street for a man on the whole.

[box icon="none"]Now, at last, I celebrate my independence and freedom from the bounds of a socially driven and socially promoted institution that has no benefit for me.[/box]

I make no apologies for being born a male. Certainly where toxic women and feminists are concerned I have nothing to apologize for despite what the deluded bunch would have us believe. I've mentioned before in some of my writings that I think the large group of toxic women and feminists should really take stock of their own shortcomings – and here is my question to them:

What have you offered or achieved for the greater good of society? I'm still waiting to see any decent evidence to suggest we have you to thank for anything remotely useful.

Essentially they ride on the backs of our distant brothers' work, and now in this modern age they continue to ride on our brothers' backs. If all their luxury items, which men and boys have collectively provided, were taken away I doubt they would have enough of their own contributions to fill a cattle field.

I say this with a passion and total conviction where these substandard and poisonous human beings are concerned. I can give them no apologies for doing so.

So all you women out there who constantly denigrate men and boys to benefit yourselves, listen up and take note. When the day of reckoning comes (which I believe is totally possible if present situations continue to worsen) I advise all of you to run for the hills. Otherwise I'm going to take great pleasure in introducing you to breaking rocks and mixing cement by hand. A few years of that should help get your depleted neurons of decency back into shape.

While Rome wasn't built in a day, we all know with certainty that only men and boys built it.

Standing at the zeta crossroads

August 7, 2011 | by Tom Givens | Link | Original Link

[dropcap]I [/dropcap]see it's all coming together nicely these days. The presentation and focus of the men's movement is getting more and more refined, the general public and power brokers are paying more and more attention, and the issues we face, and the reactions we advise, are all coming more into focus. This is where the real leg work begins.

For the first time in, well, history that I'm aware of, men are actually shaking off their gender role expectations. They are refusing to get married, refusing to feign ambition, doing what they believe in or feel like rather than what they are told to do. Some call them man-children, some call them slackers. Some call them Men Going Their Own Way.

[quote float="left"]The concept of Zeta Masculinity, nebulous as it is, promises to be of Earth-shaking importance should it catch on.[/quote] On the extreme end of the scale, these men are out and out disaffected, both with society and with women, and have withdrawn from each. The bulk of these men go through life as perfectly affable, yet somewhat distant to women. They don't dislike women, they're just afraid of what can happen if they make a wrong move. And what can happen if they make the right move, but with the wrong girl.

They tend to be of the 'doing their own thing, wish I could find a girl I could trust' variety. And while it is a stereotype, it is also fair to say that the bulk of these men have not had significant interaction with women for most of their lives. This is not to say they're 40 year old virgins; just that they have had few relationships, usually that ended badly for them to some small degree – leading to a gun-shy attitude.

[box type="note" icon="none"]There's a small subset of this group of men; small but growing. I will get into them later.[/box]

First I want to address another group of men in the Manosphere that come into play here: the Pick Up Artists (PUAs). PUAs are essentially students of human nature, and salesmen…you may think that's redundant, but it's not.

Pick Up Artists, at least the best kind, truly understand the motivations, the 'innermost desires' of women. That's why they are successful with them. Note, I said the best kind. A really good PUA "guru"will spend most of his time teaching other men about observation, and linking that to an understanding of what the subject is thinking/feeling. The very best PUAs will run you through a whole regimen of this instruction, coupled with self-analysis/improvement, and instill a genuine appreciation for women's natural characteristics – keeping the pickup lines instruction to a minimum, and late in the regimen.

[box type="note" icon="none"]There's this other small subset of men; small but growing. I will get into them later.[/box]

Many of the issues facing men are both social and institutional in nature. The wide ranging effects of these sociopolitical forces touch the lives of every man out there. And, individuals as we are, we react in different ways and to varying degrees. An extreme form of the men among us is the anarchist, the social misfit, the bad boy.

And then, taking issue with society on one level or another, others among us become political activists – become more engaged, hoping to effect change. And still some of other men drop out of society altogether in frustration.

[box type="note" icon="none"]Still, there is a small subset of men; small but growing. I'll get into them later.[/box]

The future that faces us, as a whole society, looks awfully bleak right now. The face of injustice and inequity is everywhere. There are collapsing economies around the world, growing iniquity between rich and poor, stagnant wages and a declining standard of living. Families are being dissolved in epic proportions, and abuses of every kind are so common their reporting becomes a steady drone on the idiot box. Some men crumple in despair, while others blame everyone around them, demanding succor from all who will listen. Still others live in denial, or quietly accept the 'new reality' and get on with their lives.

As you may have guessed, there's a subset of this group of men, small but growing. You may have guessed as well, clever folk that you are, that this small subset is one and the same group of men. This subset is what is referred to as the Zeta Male. Zeta males, near as I can tell, strive for the following ideals – even if they likely never put it in this way.

A zeta male is:

[unordered_list style="arrow"]

- Aware of female sexual impulses, motivations, and proclivities. He can maximize his appeal along these lines, keep the interest of his partner, etc… But, for that matter, he can also spot a cheating bitch as well.
- A better judge of character, but accepts women for what they are. A zeta male does not make chasing pussy a lifestyle, or even a goal, but does not shy away from a woman he is interested in either. He does not seek female approval, but appreciates respect when given, especially if it's given while naked.
- Living a life of his own, he doesn't rely on membership in a couple to feel fulfilled. He doesn't take a lot of chances romantically in terms of legally suspect actions, but doesn't outright avoid women either. He does not 'apologize for being male' and believes he has intrinsic value as a person on par with that of any other person, including women.
- Aware of the world around him, and takes an active hand in trying to shape it for the better. He doesn't tolerate injustice, but believes in the right of others to oppose his efforts. He has strong beliefs but is not dogmatic or rigidly determined to be right. Compassion and understanding are balanced by integrity and a refusal to coddle in the zeta male. And justice – or at least moral consistency – is something he demands.

- Unwilling to be forced into a pre-determined social role. A zeta males believes that he, and he alone, has the right to determine the course of his life. He goes his own way, and posits that whatever his choices in life may be, he has the right to make those choices with his interests fully in mind. He does not have to make the sacrifices his forefathers did. He is no less of a man for simply refusing to take up the burdens of others, and in fact scoffs at the notion of his manhood being measured in the first place.

[/unordered_list]

A zeta demands payment for his efforts, and value for his risks, and will not be shamed into serving another's agenda. A zeta male will not be manipulated into servitude.

And as you may have guessed, a zeta male is essentially an intersection of most of the manosphere's subgroups…a very specific spot in that intersection, to be truthful. The real trick is to define, and refine, the concept; to get the balance right. And that, as always, is up to you.

Do you have a default switch?

Is There too Much No In You?

I'm going to attempt not to sound old here, but if I screw it up, well, you'll just have to live through it. My teenage years were a little strange and I started my career of earning a living pretty young. I lived in a boys' home up until 2 months before my 16th birthday. Knowing the law would allow me to leave at 16, I figured I'd get a jump on things so I hit the road. I didn't look back, I looked straight ahead. I'll fast forward here to the part that matters—you know, the relationship crap. Excuse the lack of sound effects, but I am old and my mouth is dry.

To make it illustrative I'm just going to say that there are certain observations you realize as time accumulates into memories and the comparison of memories becomes broader. I live in two worlds, as I think everyone does: the outside world of experience and the inside world of reflection. The more information you have, the broader and more informed is your ability to reflect. Of course if you're younger it seems the outside world of experience has a greater influence over your choices than your ability to reflect does. You need only remember Act One of the depressing first relationship or marriage to get the point. Who doesn't look back and say "if only I had known"?

[quote float="right"]Humiliation is a quick avenue to exposing male vulnerability, which may be the reason why women default to shaming language so quickly and so often.[/quote]My first was particularly nasty. I wasn't a very good hero, too many life skills and not enough education. In my circumstance having left early, I never had the opportunity to finish grade 9, so I'm pretty much an uneducated blithering idiot. My learning is free range, based in experience, and I don't really conform to a school of thought, obviously. I am free of any conforming indoctrination except my experience.

I would say however that in retrospect a lack of education is limiting; theoretical logic structures give you a bigger yard to play in. Education is worthwhile in that learned logic informs wider choices and offers a greater potential for better choices. It's not unlike expanding your physical prowess by developing dexterity, agility and focus. What you gain is more internal switches with the ability to point in the direction of yes.

I once worked in a cabinet shop, having lied and bullshitted my way into the job. I suspect the foreman knew but liked my determination. I was assigned a job to build a crate for some display parts being shipped to Germany for a trade show. I didn't have a clue how to go about it. I took measurements of everything, trying to figure it out, and cut my pieces for the outside shell. Two of the older guys had been watching me; they knew I was full of shit and they would get together at the table saw, whispering back and forth, looking my way and laughing. Needless to say my skin started to burn and the humiliation kept telling me to just put down my tools, get my coat and leave, the less said the better.

I really struggled in that moment of fight or flight, anxiety constricting my veins, my breathing shallow and labored. I thought I was going to pass out, but I didn't. All in one moment there, crouched on my knees, I looked up at these guys laughing at me and thought fuck you. Maybe I don't know what I'm doing, maybe I shouldn't have been there, but every minute I was there was an opportunity to learn something more of the trade I chose. I decided right there and then that not only would I be a cabinet maker, I would extend myself as a magician in my trade.

Such a moment is a big switch in men, when the struggle between yourself and your facade can tear you down and pull you apart. Humiliation is a quick avenue to exposing male vulnerability, which may be the reason why women default to shaming language so quickly and so often. Unfortunately the spectators and participants may see it as raw entertainment and influence the outcome. Many men lose the battle in these moments and the experience may turn them away or start a cascade of recurrence. These are the men that hand over their facade of masculinity to the world, damaged and in pain. Imagine the effect on young boys in our current culture of misandry.

I do wonder from time to time when I see a male turn away in silence if he is engaging the tempo of no.

[quote float="left"]Instead of arguing with him, I started to watch what caught his eye and ask him questions about it. Now I was learning about this little guy I love so much.[/quote]I have known and worked with a number of young men defeated in this way. Most were all but illiterate and some unable to adequately read or write, their value thoroughly diminished and their utility over-exploited. I believe that poverty, class distinction, and freedom itself are not metered by material wealth but by the repeating resonance of "no". It is clear that we assemble cars better than we assemble people. Corporate interests would prefer your more common experience to be a repetition of no. Even though the power to purchase is gifting oneself with a yes, I think most consumers are damaged people in hiding.

In fact with some reflection you can understand that the experience is not gender-specific. It's a human experience that pits you against expectation and your own desire. Women suffer the same vulnerability and in all the hyperbole of gender experience this one is common. As people we have switches inside us that direct the outcome of the experience. The experience is what we reference in regards to our self-conception. I was violently assaulted, yes, but where were the switches before this and where are they now? I was raped, I understand, but where were the switches before and where are they now? Who are you, who is left, and who's throwing the switches?

I've lost many of these battles myself in younger years, through harsh and insensitive words coming from peers, mentors, teachers and family. Some I have lost through violence and neglect that occur as a result of the powerlessness of childhood. In school I played the clarinet, and my initial instructor said he had never heard such a young man achieve such rich tone. I moved that year as I had so many times, and did not have access to a clarinet for 3 months. When I picked it up again and began to play, the new instructor in front of the entire class shouted for me stop and referred to me as “Johnny one note”. I never played again or attended his class. This switch was turned to no.

Options were available and the squawk of my effort was known to me. I knew I needed many hours alone with my friend the clarinet to get to know it again. But the tone and demeanor of the instructor, the finality of his words, and the humiliating laughter of my peers was a dead end. It took something from me that I truly loved, a harmony of pleasure that I could create alone and share. It was another domino of experience, a reminder of the switch to no, a thought en route that never arrived.

We have in us a template for justice, the pleasure and pain of our experience that equates to a sense of fairness and safety. It is often inaccessible to us in the distraction of our stride. We replace it with the experiential gestures of cause and effect and the ambition of the moment for what is sweet or sour, good or bad, to our senses. We run down the paths of our lives with the impression that what we are after becomes closer all the time, because we are running to succeed. But the real success is in the freedom of direction. We know it should not and need not hurt us, our justice informs us of this. When it does hurt it turns us away, it turns us to off, to no, and we are new and unknown to ourselves. We become what they would have us be.

As an example I’ll share a story regarding my 6-year-old son. When we went to the toy store, the experience became traumatizing; he wanted everything he saw. I noticed that every toy became a battle of wills. At the end of the experience I was ready to leave him there, as it was just too draining and he had more energy than I did. What was really happening was I was saying no 20 times and yes once. What was draining was the negative exchange, the battle.

I reconsidered my approach and tried to think of a way to reverse the process, a way I could say yes 20 times and no once. The next time we went, I decided to get a cart. Every time he grabbed a toy, I told him to put it in the cart. He was shocked, and happy. Instead of arguing with him, I started to watch what caught his eye and ask him questions about it. Now I was learning about this little guy I love so much. When we got to the cash out, I told him that all his choices were excellent and now it was time to choose which one to take home. I was amazed at his willingness to cooperate. Now the toy store is a positive place where we let our imaginations go. His imagination is no longer restrained by my nos.

If you look, you can see the root of violence when you have had enough. It’s not the blow that draws blood or the bone that breaks or the life that is lost. That’s the end of violence, when it has finished its cycle and drawn its conclusions and finally pauses or stops. It is anti-climactic to the process and habit, to the constant flow of so many nos and so little justice. We don’t leave this violence, because we are surrounded by it. The ebb and flow of no makes us unknown to ourselves. It drinks our hope like a vampire and we recoil and peer out for anywhere that says yes.

Imagine what we could achieve for ourselves if we changed our language to simple inquiries. How can I help you to achieve yes? Tell me about your nos and I will argue for yes on your behalf. Let’s find a way to achieve your freedom. Imagine a teacher who instructs you towards yes, who dispenses with the standards of indoctrination and brainwashing and all the nos, and teaches you yes. You’re yes.

Of course it’s fanciful and of course it’s naïve, that is the essence of yes. But in my mind it flies. Flight takes great effort and effort is yes in motion.

What Makes a Man?

.[box type="alert" icon="none"]General Romeo Dallaire and His Bout with the Devil[/box]
[dropcap]R[/dropcap]ecently I watched the documentary Shake Hands with the Devil: The Journey of Romeo Dallaire. It was based on the book of the same name and gives his account of the Rwandan Genocide. The movie gave a spotty and incomplete account of the atrocities that occurred, so as one who has only vague recollections of news accounts and has never had any real interest in studying the atrocity, I was immediately stirred into doing a bit more reading. I won't call it research. I just wanted to know a little more about the history. But what struck me most profoundly about the documentary was Dallaire himself.
General Dallaire is a man haunted by failure that would appear to be anyone's fault but his own. He is a man who took on an impossible mission for which he was ill-prepared, ill-trained, and ill-informed. He was sent to Rwanda in 1993 as head of the United Nation's peacekeeping mission as the nation attempted to recover from civil war. What he wasn't told was that almost no one had any desire for him to succeed. It might even be said that he was set up for failure.

[quote float="right"]He looked into the eyes of the Hutu leaders who swore they would uphold the treaty as they plotted genocide.[/quote] The UN appears to have had little to no interest in the matter and, according to Dallaire, violated its own policy of not including former oppressors in peacekeeping forces by sending Belgian forces as the primary force. Rwanda had been a former Belgian colony and their presence may have been offensive to the Hutu, who had been little more than slaves under the Belgian regime (which had supported Tutsi rule).

Almost immediately there was a conflict between the Belgians and Dallaire. Dallaire had tried to warn the UN that the Rwandan government was planning to instigate an incident that could be used as an excuse to attack and kill some of the Belgian soldiers in the hopes that the Belgians would withdraw from the country. Dalaire wanted to intervene, but was told that intervention would exceed his mandate. The incident occurred and ten Belgian soldiers were killed.

Dallaire could have sent help, but the lack of UN support meant that he would be risking his entire mission. The Belgians considered his actions criminal and withdrew their forces leaving Dallaire with a small, ineffective contingent that was insufficient to keep the peace. This was precisely what the Hutu had wanted. The genocide began in earnest and within 100 days between 500,000 and one million Tutsi were dead.

But it wasn't just the Belgians. The French were arming the Hutu (they viewed the Tutsi as a threat to their interests in neighboring nations). The Catholic Church also stood by and did nothing, refusing to even speak out against the racial hatred and tensions. Government radio stations continuously broadcast openly racist programs denouncing the Tutsi. The rest of the world was content to just stand by and watch, later claiming ignorance of the situation to excuse their inaction.

[quote float="left"]And live with it, he has. He suffers from post traumatic stress disorder, depression, and even attempted suicide.[/quote] General Dallaire made several pleas for help, each and every one of them falling on deaf ears. But none of this deterred the man from his mission. He did everything within his power, and his actions in Rwanda probably saved thousands of lives, but as he put it, it was nothing against what was lost. He rejects the label of "hero," saying the word just doesn't fit. Dallaire makes no excuses. He states several times that he must live with the consequences of his decisions. That is a requirement of command.

And live with it, he has. He suffers from post traumatic stress disorder and depression, and even attempted suicide. It's no wonder. As I listened to him speak about the horror, I could only attempt to fathom what it must have been like to have walked among piles of dead bodies, to have watched men, women, and children being murdered, raped, and mutilated. What he describes is unthinkable, and yet there it is for all to see; the photos of dead bodies on tables, the videotaped executions of men being hacked to death with machetes.

At one point Dallaire describes the "sport" the Hutus made of hacking off a man's penis and the delight taken in watching him run around screaming in pain. Another time he discusses the sickening smell of dead bodies piled along the road and outside his headquarters, where they had to pour diesel fuel on them to burn them because they couldn't bury them fast enough.

How he returned to all this after being sent home is beyond me, but return he did.

He was present for the ten year anniversary of the genocide. He spoke to the crowd of the atrocity and of his disgust with the world community at large that failed to act. He called it his own failure despite everything he tried to do. He takes the blame and he takes the responsibility. This is what impressed me. Here is a man considered to be a hero by many who looks at himself as a failure because he couldn't overcome an entire world's negligence.

General Dallaire shook hands with the devil; hands he described as cold, but not to the touch. He looked into the eyes of the Hutu leaders who swore they would uphold the treaty as they plotted genocide. He recognized the evil in them and tried to get others to recognize it as well. He did battle with Satan. He survived, but not unscathed. He stuck to his principles, his convictions. He performed his duties. He carried out his responsibilities. In short, he did what a man needs to do to be a man. He stood alone and spit in the face of one of the greatest atrocities of our time.

Site Update: A quick AVfM site report

August 8, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box type=”note” style=”rounded” border=”full” icon=”none”]

Greetings All,

First a word of thanks. In all the up and down and confusion of the site being rebuilt and re-hosted I really appreciated all the patience and supportive messages. In terms of your user experience here, things are getting back to normal, if I can use that word in a place like this.

We have had a slight, but very tolerable short term dip in traffic, but that is to be expected after being down for a week, and it is already beginning to move upward again.

Commenting is down, but since we have overhauled the commenting system and everyone now has to register to post, that was also to be expected. New registrations are going at a very brisk pace, so all looks well there, too.

There is still a lot going on behind the scenes. I have hundreds of images to place yet throughout the site. We have banners to develop and some other minor aesthetic changes to address. There will also be a custom radio program player embedded in the side bar before too terribly long so that you can listen to the radio programs here on the site if you wish. Thankfully all this will happen while the site is up and running.

You may, however, encounter some things that are out of whack, especially with older articles. You may see some articles that are attributed to the wrong author. If you do, please bring it to my attention for correction. The same for articles that have been affected by the overhaul of our image protocols.

But now, onward and upward. Our editing and submission procedures are also in the process of revision. We intend to make job #1 of producing article content, both in style and quality, that befits these shiny new digs we are now enjoying. Many of you have given generously and you deserve the best we can give you.

Also, after we have crossed some more t’s and dotted the last of the i’s on the new site, we are moving on and going forward with register-her.com in full swing. What, you didn’t think we were just going to sit around and do nothing when we got done here, did you?

In order to make register-her.com operate with the greatest impact we need to address a few more tech and continuity issues on the site. One thing the site transition has taught me here: there is merit in getting it right the first time. Even if it takes longer and makes you want to pull your hair out, it saves a ton of work down the road.

Mr. Dexter will continue to oversee work on RH, and when it is completed we will be making some additional entries to the site and launching the first in what we hope will be a series of press releases that will draw a lot of attention to the site.

It is our hopes that register-her.com becomes an FTSU stronghold in the MRM.

And there you have it folks. That is the latest of the latest, but there will be many more updates in the near future. We have four full months remaining in 2011. I hope and believe they will be the most spectacular months we have ever had. And MRAs, that is saying a lot.

Video Update: Darcus Howe on the London Riots

August 9, 2011 | by Jared White | Link | Original Link

[box type=”note” icon=”none”]

The audio of this video was featured on The August 9 Episode of AVFM radio.

Journalist Darcus Howe speaks to the BBC on the social climate and causes of the London riots. The female BBC interviewer tries at several points during Mr. Howe’s explanation to interrupt him, claiming he endorses mob violence, and later claiming he’s a rioter. In fact, she perfectly illustrates the willfully ignorant mentality which led to the riots in the first place. Even as he explained the problem, she’s clinging desperately to a dishonest and obsolete view in which people riot not because they’re marginalized, brutalized by an increasing police state, and disenfranchised; no, they’re just “bad people”. What an idiot.

Quoting Mr. Howe: “Our political leaders had no idea, the police had no idea. But if you looked at young blacks and young whites with a discerning eye and a careful hearing, they have been telling us, and we would not listen, to what is happening in this country to them.”

The Washington Post published a short piece on this interview which substantially illustrates the wilful ignorance and stupidity which a major fraction of the mainstream media seem to be following. From here.

AVfM Radio: How to make a male bomb

August 9, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box type=”note” icon=”none”]

London is burning. So far, 525 people have been arrested, 44 police officers have been injured and one man is dead. Untold buildings have burned to cinders while streets have been trashed and overrun by demonstrators.

The mainstream media is covering every last detail of the crisis that erupted after the police shooting death of Mark Duggan, a local resident of Tottenham. News agencies are investigating every nuance of the story; except, of course, why it is actually happening.

Politicians have begun posturing and making public statements; pointing fingers and drawing lines between the supposed lawful and the lawless; the decent and the depraved. And of course they are targeting anyone but themselves and anything but their policies that have left young men disenfranchised and disaffected. The havoc continues, and tonight on AVfM Radio hosts Paul Elam and JtO will make easy work of a simple issue:

Why young men get angry when police gun them down in the street.

Letter to a friend at war

August 9, 2011 | by Jared White | Link | Original Link

This is a letter written for a personal friend of JtO. The man to whom this is written is presently entangled in what is turning out to be a nasty divorce. He is a decent, honest man who unfortunately has not yet taken what we call in the MRM world, "the red pill." As the author of this piece I have replaced personal references with nonspecific place holders for two reasons; to protect the identity of my friend, and so that others still living in a blue pill reality may hopefully benefit from the story.

[dropcap]M[/dropcap]y friend, you are in deeper trouble than you realize. Even after the discussions we have had, you haven't yet grasped just how totally fucked you are. First, however, I'm going to define a couple of terms . The preamble to this letter refers to you as a man living in blue pill reality, and you might wonder what in the world I'm talking about.

You are what active members of the Men's Rights Movement call a "blue pill" man. This is a shorthand expression which refers to the greater majority of the western world – and reflects a view held by many MRAs (men's rights activists) that the assumptions most people hold about the social reality of their culture are wrong. Not just wrong in the sense of error, but wrong in the sense that western culture operates along a set of deliberately misleading mythologies.

These mythologies are maintained and reinforced through modern media, including television, advertising, popular music, movies and literature. Almost everyone participating in the reinforcement of this cultural narrative is also wholly invested in the "truth" of this understanding of social reality – which is to say, broadcasters, musicians, artists, advertisers and everyone else contributing to the reinforcement of the mainstream understanding of our culture all believe they are telling the truth. It is the view of MRAs, including myself, that most people are substantially in error in this understanding.

You're in the middle of a divorce, which is to say, you are in the middle of a fight for control over several important areas of your life.

[unordered_list style="tick"]

- Your stewardship of your children's futures
- Your past earnings
- Your present and future earnings
- Any property you own – including real estate, businesses, or other assets
- Responsibility to service a substantial debt that you may not have created
- Your freedom from imprisonment (no, I'm not kidding)
- Your physical health
- Your mental health

[/unordered_list]

Any of these items could be stolen from you permanently, through the process of your current divorce. Your stewardship of your children's futures, stolen from you. Your past and future earnings, stolen. Are you paying attention?

I'm sure you recognize that this would be a bad outcome – but you probably still think the destruction of your life is not overwhelmingly likely. This is why MRAs like me call guys like you Blue-pill'ers.

I'm sorry about that if it sounds condescending or offensive, it's not a personal insult – however, you're already at war, and you don't have the luxury of a slow or gentle introduction to any of this. So let's jump right in – what follows are a list of facts you may find uncomfortable, but which you must address as cold reality, almost immediately.

[box type="download" icon="none"]You are not going to win.[/box]

This doesn't mean you should consign yourself to defeat – no. Simply that entering this fight with the assumption of victory is a very bad plan. You're going to take a terrible beating, and it's going to cost you more than you yet realize. However – if you go into this fight informed and armed – you should survive without losing everything in your life. Survival with a minimum of damage to your life is a good, practical goal.

She is not the woman you married. That lovely, wonderful woman you fell in love with is gone. The woman you're fighting now might look like her, but that's where it ends. She doesn't love you, she doesn't like you, and if she could get away with it, she'd run you over with a Challenger tank. She is playing to win, and so far, doing a better job of it than you.

[quote float="right"]She doesn't love you, she doesn't like you, and if she could get away with it, she'd run you over with a Challenger tank. [/quote] Do you think I'm going too far? She's already tried to have you arrested. She's fucking another guy and flaunting it in front of you. She's taking your kids out of the country every second week – and she's flaunting these facts because she knows it will upset you, and that the courts will overwhelmingly take her side in any argument. She just spent the weekend waving her new boy toy in front of your dad for fuck's sake. She is telling you in capital block lettering written across the sky: FUCK YOU.

She is also attempting to provoke an emotional reaction from you. Any reaction you give her, she will use against you. If you get angry, she will use this as "evidence" that you abused her during the relationship. If you refuse to respond with emotion, she will fabricate a narrative in which you abused her through emotional isolation. She will tell these stories in court, and the court will believe her.

The. Court. Will. Believe. Her.

And not just the court. She's going to poison all your mutual friends against you using the very same tactics. What's that? She wouldn't do that to you? Attention, Dumb-Ass: She's already fabricated false charges of assault against you – and she wasn't arrested for false accusation, was she?

She might also manufacture a story of your abuse of one of your children. The young one is pliable enough, 6 weeks away from Daddy and she barely knows who you are. How tough would it be to convince the child to fear you? And if she accuses you of rape, well then, you're cooked, old son. The police will arrest you and perp walk you before any legal or evidentiary inquiry. And you'll never see those kids again.

This probably all sounds pretty horrible, and only an amoral monster would do such things. I must be wrong, because your ex-wife might be rather difficult to deal with lately, but she's surely not a monster.

Well, here's the thing. We're presently living in a culture in which women do not have accountability. For the past 50 years any time a woman misbehaves, commits a violent crime, acts like a wild maniac or a vindictive child – or otherwise does harm – our society fabricates an excuse. That is the red pill reality about which the blue pill world is largely in denial.

[quote float="left"]Normal women are the ones who cheer and giggle when the discussion turns to Lorena Bobbit or Katherine Becker severing their husbands' penises. [/quote] She's not responsible because she was abused. She's not responsible because she was suffering from postpartum depression. She's not responsible because she was intoxicated. She's not responsible because she was suffering from PMS. She's not responsible because her father abused her, or maybe he was too nice to her.

The list of fabricated excuses our courts will generate is endless, and a long list of examples can be found with 10 minutes of skimming news headlines. One of those excuses will likely be the one that undoes your entire life.

Little girls in western societies are socialized without a strong sense of personal accountability. And "normal" women are the ones who cheer and giggle when the discussion turns to Lorena Bobbit or Katherine Becker severing their husbands' penises. When it comes to getting what she wants at your expense, your lovely and charming wife will not be stopped by any ethical limits.

Now, you told me today you would be meeting her for a final, in-person lunch. For closure, or to say goodbye, or for a civil parting of the ways or some such, and I recommended in strong terms that this was a bad plan.

I understand that you've lawyered up in the last two weeks. Hasn't your very expensive legal counsel told you to terminate personal contact with the woman who fabricated charges of assault against you? If he hasn't told you that yet, ask him why not please. Then fire him.

You also told me that you had to conduct this meeting in person because it was the honorable thing to do. I hope you recognize the personal restraint I have exercised at this point in the discussion by not accusing you of intellectual defect.

My friend, you are fighting by Queensbury rules, like a civilized gentleman – except that your opponent is an MMA fighter, it's a street fight in blood alley, there are 3 dozen interested bystanders with bats and knives, and they're not on your side. And you want to be honorable? FUCK!

Please re-read the bulleted list at the beginning of this letter my friend – that is what's at stake. Fuck your honor, you can't afford it. You will win this only by surviving and prospering. Thank you for your forbearance, and your kind attention.

Filler sentenced to 21 days

August 10, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box type=”note” icon=”none”]

Vladek Filler has been sentenced to 21 days in jail on the conviction of assaulting his wife, Ligia Filler. The evidence in the case was a bruise on Mrs. Filler’s arm that was not there at the time of the complaint, but mysteriously “appeared” four days later.

Filler is appealing the conviction and has been allowed to remain free pending the appeal.

The Bangor Daily News reports (and we use that word loosely) that prosecutor Paul Cavanaugh was seeking 60-90 days in jail at the time of the sentencing. This is a significant change from what inside sources reported to AVfM, which was that the prosecution was seeking the full sentence possible of one year in prison.

It appears that something caused Cavenaugh to back off the harsher recommendation and go for something less.

No probation was ordered so whatever sentence Filler ultimately receives, if any, should complete his connection to this case.

We will post a notice here when the new trial date is set.

Kellett’s prosecutorial crime spree continues

August 10, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[dropcap]S[/dropcap]ome people insist on a bad ending to their story. O.J. Simpson, after skating on the murder of his ex-wife and Ron Goldman, decided to go gangsta over some memorabilia knowing full well that the world hated his guts and that a target was painted on his back with any prosecutor in his range of vision.

Personally I worked with a number of addicts who got their asses kicked, hard, by whatever their poison, only to get back in the ring repeatedly for another go. Plenty of them never made it back out. There just seems to be something in the makeup of some people that yearns for speed and a brick wall.

Take Mary Kellett, for instance.

The infamous Ellsworth, Maine, prosecutor has been making her bread and butter of innocent men corralled into show trials conducted by a gaggle of back slapping good-old-whatevers in Maine’s idea of what passes for a justice system. They even have a local media that looks the other way and whistles while it happens.

But recently she has gotten some unintended attention because of the staggering corruption she brought to the Vladek Filler case. Actually, the corruption was in the fact there was a Vladek Filler case at all. Never should have happened.

[quote float=”right”]The former wife in this case was prepared to testify on behalf of the accused, rather than against him, in order to get him cleared of the charges.[/quote]Now, after all the bad press for her office, a campaign against her that went to the Governor’s office and a pending bar complaint with some real meat on it, you’d think she’d lay low and wait for the storm to pass. Well, if she were smart. Apparently any assessment of her along those lines would have to omit that particular adjective. Kellett is at it again, but this time, one would hope, she has screwed the pooch so badly that even her cadre of cronies can’t save her.

Kellett was placed in charge of prosecuting one Keovilaisack Sayasane with “terrorizing, assault and criminal threatening,” a charge which would hinge largely on the testimony of his former wife, the alleged victim in the case. But Kellett had a problem, and in Kellett’s world anything that interferes with convicting a man is a problem. The former wife in this case was prepared to testify on behalf of the accused, rather than against him, in order to get him cleared of the charges. It might be speculated that after seeing a domestic situation turn into the potential for hard time for her former husband the supposed victim in this case decided the state was taking things a tad too far.

So Mary Kellett conjured up a solution to this one, Ellsworth style. She told the former wife that Sayasane had murdered his first wife. The only pesky detail being that the story was a complete and utter lie. According to The Ellsworth American, who of course did not mention Kellett’s name in their article, the less-than-impressed judge was presented with Kellett's actions by Sayasane's attorney, Jeffrey Toothaker, and unceremoniously threw out the entire case.

[box type="tick" icon="none"]Witness tampering, anyone?[/box]

According to Toothaker, the wife's response to the lie was drastic. It "sent shivers up her spine, as it should," he said. And it caused her to withdraw from giving testimony, an action that would have allowed Kellett and the state to continue unimpeded with a bad case.

It is fitting, with Kellett's track record. As was revealed in a press conference in front of the Hancock County, Maine, Courthouse during Vladek Filler's trial, Kellett has prosecuted a large number of cases lacking in evidence, and many where exculpatory evidence clearly points to the innocence of the accused. Understandably, and luckily for most, her track record of convictions is abysmal, but has resulted nonetheless in ruined lives and millions of dollars of squandered taxpayer monies.

[quote float="left"]Part of this story may be soon coming to a conclusion. There remains a bar complaint pending against Mary Kellett for her unethical actions in the first Filler trial.[/quote] Despite being publicly exposed, Kellett has persisted in a pattern of unscrupulous and illegal conduct and has now crossed the line into unambiguous criminality. A significant part of the problem, of course, is her boss, District Attorney Carletta Bassano. Kellett has been working under Bassano's direction, and the D.A. is well past the point of avoiding culpability for Kellett's actions. Though it is likely not provable, yet, this entire affair reeks of conspiracy to corrupt justice on the part of the Hancock County Prosecutor's Office, from the top down.

None of this would have been possible, however, were it not for the indifference and enabling of local media such as The Bangor Daily News and The Ellsworth American. There was a time when the media loved scandal. Now, when the scandal is rooted in gender politics, they are a part of it.

Part of this story may be soon coming to a conclusion. There remains a bar complaint pending against Mary Kellett for her unethical actions in the first Filler trial. The conviction she obtained in that trial was overturned by the Maine State Supreme Court based on prosecutorial misconduct.

If there remains anyone left in the state of Maine that will take the appropriate action against this prosecutor gone awry, then we can move on to address other matters, such as Bassano.

However, if Kellett gets yet another pass (yes, that pass) on her misdeeds, then A Voice for Men will spearhead a complaint to the Overseers of the Bar in Maine for her clear-cut tampering with a witness in the Sayasane trial.

Science on the Fly! (Agaric that is)

I'm going to twist a few concepts here, but I figure I've got the license to do it, particularly if truth is based on repetition rather than substance. This one is rarely touched on or addressed so it's like the man on the moon thing "one small step". This is a cruise missile concept that will lead in a direction that for some who have been there will know exactly what I'm saying. For others, hey like you might enjoy this for its implications or the contemplative result. We've all read articles on several blogs about masculinity the whole "man up" bullshit and the twisted concepts of masculine facade fashion. Some of us have even written about it.

Well we have something different ladies and gentle-mra's ! Exclusively for the folks of this great blog, here on this stage tonight for your viewing pleasure I will attempt a feat unparalleled and unprecedented and as yet a feat never before attempted. In my right hand I will be juggling several orbs of logic, applying unparalleled dexterity and agility in an attempt to suspend gravity and levitate said orbs, while in my left hand I will attempt to enjoy myself. That's right friends notice there is in fact nothing up my sleeves and additionally ladies and gentle-mra's you will notice upon close inspection that in fact my left hand is un-lubricated, and my fly is up.

Watch closely friends and be truly amazed.

If you thought the musings on masculinity were somehow strange and confusing it may simply be a misleading presentation with a purpose. It is for the most part unknown to us as men as it is rarely considered and more often argued that the nature of the masculine and feminine union that resides in a man is unknowable. I will attempt to argue that these aspects are knowable and that they do migrate and produce a resonating and harmonic effect. These are all unsupported musings, but they do resonate.

Consider Orb 1

Structure in and of itself is multi directional, it's fundamental logic resides in its ability to repeat itself. Non repetitive structures become a subject of interest, somewhat chaotic; a state in which we may choose to attempt or impose repetition.

Imagine if you can, visually, a task that requires you to insert a round rubber stub 1 inch diameter by ½ inch long into a tube that will hold it in place while you drill through it and repeat this task ten thousand times. This was my first introduction to an activity that could drive me nuts. If you're a child and your father assigns this task the only negotiation available is in the task itself. The initial view of the task was buckets upon buckets of rubber stubs, around a monster drill press that engulfs you when you approach it.

[image]The task, while sitting on a stool, is rigidly defined as, reaching forward grasping the stub drawing it back, sliding it in the tube, stroking down with the drill press stroking up with the drill press removing the stub and launching it into the awaiting bin and repeat ten thousand times.If you are bored reading that, imagine how I felt.

The first consideration is injury and avoiding it. A slack millisecond of thought allows frustration which stretches into a full second of anxiety, influencing enough unsynchronized motion to lead to injury. Better not to think. To govern this is to govern time, remove those voids in which anxiety can occur by filling the voids with motion. Where a straight reach for a stub results in a pause to grip it, a circular reach is continuous without pause or void it is on the way.

Deconstructing each function and refining it by extending or reducing motion is a method to synchronize a single global motion. The effort to control each individual movement with an individual thought segments time into intervals causing a pause for thought transition. Joining motions together with constrained or exaggerated motion removes pause, thought and anxiety. Imagine trying to think through the act of walking into segments, but use a helmet you will get injured.

After 1 hour of repetition I was able to do this with my eyes closed, I know because I tried and did. The amazing effect was visualizing the overview, motion with your eyes closed becomes geometric images and each motion represents an individual shape. You travel the outline of the shape and transition into the next shape while noticing the tempo that is defined by the sound of the drill press. This is a harmonized consciousness and your brain is definitely affected. You will experience an altered frequency harmonic and you can feel it. This to me is the internal union of the masculine and the feminine in a person. I was elongating the masculine harmonic wave and retuning my refresh rate.

Consider Orb 2

If you enjoy evo/psych, contemplate this shit during your next weed rolling. Beer or scotch works to.

The male is a segmented being that deconstructs reality into smaller orbs or constructs of logic. By manipulating these constructs it performs the act of doing and creating or recreating. It functions in shorter intervals interchanging logic constructs to fabricate a result. It would have a harmonic resonance that would represent a pulse or beat consistent with the time it takes to connect one logic structure to another. It is a processed calculation cycle, a short wave expression or a refresh rate.

[image]The female is a less segmented or a longer wave harmonic that experiences unified or non-segmented logic as a subjective, sympathetic and elongated cycle. Its cycle transition is less frequent and as such constructs and deconstructs logic in larger cycles of experience. In comparative terms think of the male as solar or one day and the female as lunar or 30 days. This analogy is ancient if you care to look.

You may or may not have noticed that I have specifically applied the words male and female and avoided the use of the words masculinity and femininity. I am suggesting the latter, mas/fem are both constructs nurtured by a social and cultural politic sympathetic to the harmonic resonance of each behavioral gender pattern. Masculinity and femininity are fakes, cheap reproductions. I am also suggesting that those patterns are interchangeable and that we do it numerous times every day.

The male is a specific gender, as is the female. Masculinity however is a patterned reproduction of cycled male harmonic resonance and is not gender specific. It is a cheap garment designed to emulate the male cycle and experience. It is incrementally adjustable and interchangeable between genders. As is femininity and its corresponding emulation. I think it is the reason that genders are expressed in a spectrum.

Consider Orb 3

To take this one step further one could say that a male emulates his maleness into the world manifesting a male harmonic resonance. Conversely when he submits to a feminine patterned emulation it will manifest a sympathetic feminine harmonic resonance within him. He will elongate his waveform somewhat. Because it is sympathetic it cannot be indefinitely sustained without contributing to an inner conflict. It is a conflict of animus or animation. In case you're scratching your head over same sex gender sports, refer to the above, "incrementally adjustable and interchangeable."

The emulation is sympathetic to the influence of the environment, in a group of women you may "male down" in a group of men you may "male up." Gays still represent their gender as a core manifestation. They emulate the opposite as a sympathetic – as do we all. It's OK keep scratching your head, I still laugh when I think of a term used by a psychologist, I quote "self-compassion." But in the context of this article it works when you consider an interchangeable harmonic as a migrating persona. I can't help but wonder if a bi-polar condition is a conflict between gender dynamic and waveform harmonic.

Consider Orb 4

Most of us are aware of the terms beta and alpha, we often discuss these in relation to women, they're assignment to define men and the curse they represent. What we do not discuss is that these are resonating wave forms that represent a harmonic frequency. The Beta range frequency is 13-40 Hz and associated with acute focus and concentration, think of it as a highly active state not unlike that of physical exertion. The higher bandwidth around 35-40 Hz you can become a very effective killer and enjoy it, 20-25 Hz is great for physical labor, but watch you don't peak or you might kill your customer if they complain too much. I think of this as the male state harmonic. If someone tells you to "man up" a frequency around 20 will set both you and them straight. But in that state you start to lose interest in women, and they lose interest in you. At around 22 you start to lose interest in people.

The Alpha wave frequency is between 7-12 Hz and a much narrower band width, it's a somewhat relaxed state above the meditative state. This is where you begin to experience creativity and in the lower 7 bandwidth you can easily slip into a vivid dream state called lucid dreaming. This bandwidth also shares the earth's electro-magnetic frequency referred to as the Schuman Resonance. I think of this as the female state harmonic and it is obvious why men close to this state are effective with women and why we call them alpha manginas. A successful politician is able to project a bandwidth between 10-15 Hz, but they will never get to the guy hanging at 20 unless it's face to face.

In the above example of repetitive production, I was simply trying to cope without going crazy. I discovered a method that to this day is unforgettable. Over the years I tried to understand it and it wasn't until I read about wave length frequencies and brain chemistry that I was able to put it together. I have experimented with this over the years and have reproduced it in myself numerous times and have tried it on others. Motivational speakers are able to do this with large numbers of people quite effectively. You need only consider the evangelical pastor and the laying on of hands to realize they are affecting brain chemistry. When you stop assigning values to belief and dogma and look at the world through this filter you start to see the ripples in the pond and some truly strange things. Ask the PUA.

The refresh rate or resonance of our brains is immensely affected by our thoughts and their repetition. That resonance will attract and be attracted to a similar pattern, manifested by gestured behaviors. States of consciousness will gravitate; they will attract or repel others. Depression, loneliness, anger, joy, exuberance will affect others in your proximity. A good politician knows that his bond with the people is not based on his honesty it's based on his sympathetic frequency to those people. Any wonder why there are so few female leaders and those that do lead are deeply loved by the people.

Whether we realize it or not, most of what we do is sympathetic to a harmonic resonance of brain waves. Corporations understand this and know that the most common response to bad news is to alter the feelings that are invoked. If the world is fucked and falling apart, go buy something to feel better, the worse the news, the bigger the impulse purchase. Girl aged 15 is ganged raped; upgrade your cell phone, buy an ice cream cone, purchase a security system, change the bandwidth, feel better. We don't have news we have corporate therapy, the truth doesn't matter only the conflict of bandwidth resonance.

If you have the ability to resonate comfortably between 12 and 18 and with practice you can amp up and down in a few minutes, you will be described as very personable and a highly likeable individual. Conversely if you would like people to fuck off and get away from you, resonate over a 3 or 4 degree bandwidth rapidly.

Ever wonder why it feels weird to walk into a party that is already underway? Ever wonder why a person attracts attention effortlessly? Ever wonder why you can feel someone looking at you? As a purely scientific experiment stand in a room with only women for about 45 minutes and then leave and join a group of men immediately afterward. Feel weird? You bet, and it’s not always pleasant. I could go on for pages providing examples and techniques but in closing and for those that were paying attention you will notice that my left hand is still un-lubricated and yes my fly is up and not once did I remove my hand from my pocket. It’s magic! Aye!

Behind Closed Elevators

August 11, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[dropcap]S[/dropcap]o this whole skepchick elevator thing has been talked to death. Why? For a long while I didn't know. Don't get me wrong, I know the origins of the event. Hell, it would seem impossible for anyone even minutely involved in gender issues not to know about it. Even Richard Dawkins got in on it.

Richard. Fucking. Dawkins.

So what was it all about? Some woman from the atheist community made a video about an event she attended and decided to mention how she was propositioned by a man inside of an elevator. This apparently made her feel uncomfortable enough to mention it in a video on YouTube, where thousands of people would see it. What happened next, everyone knows. People from all groups of feminism and anti-feminism decided to weigh in on Rebecca Watson's opinion of the events of that night.

Now, I'm not the sort of guy who cares enough about famous people, or people who think they are famous, to go on the attack or defense of their character based on a dumb statement they might make. No. It takes something like advocating that the burden of proof should be switched to the defendant in rape trials to get me calling out bullshit when I see it. At least in article form anyway. Comment sections are a different story.

Basically, I was thinking; what's the big deal? Some girl made a statement about one of the ways she would prefer men not ask her out. So what? Women complain about men all the time just like men complain about women. Men complain about how they always have to be the ones who initiate conversation and women complain about how men initiate conversation. This is a tale as old as time…I think.

However, apparently after the resulting explosion of flame wars across the internet, accusations were starting to be flung from all sides. This was also to be expected. The story took on a life of its own as feminists who wished to defend Watson's statement compared the unknown man from the elevator to an untactful creep and even a potential rapist.

With anti-feminists the guy from the elevator became a shy, awkward, and innocent nice guy who, as usual, finished last. This event sparked so much drama that it took on its own political identifier. An identifier that I refuse to repeat because the stupidity of it all is too, well, stupid.

[quote float="right"]Basically, I was thinking; what's the big deal? Some girl made a statement about one of the ways she would prefer men not ask her out. So what?[/quote] I didn't know or care about Rebecca Watson before she made that video, which I watched just so I could find out what all the stupid fuss was about. And when I did watch it I thought to myself; all of this bullshit over this? After that I refused to pay attention to either side of the incident. This whole thing went so far that someone actually took the time to gather photos of the event just to prove that Watson made up all the parts of the incident she complained about.

I mean, I really can't express how much I just wanted this whole thing to just die already. If not because people were going way overboard just to prove their ideological views, then because the two people that the incident was about hadn't even said anything else about it. At least not to my knowledge and I'll admit I wasn't trying to find out if they did. Nevertheless I resigned myself to ignoring everything about this whole elevator crap until I saw something from either Watson or the guy from the elevator giving further insight into the event.

Today, I got that insight.

As I said before, the only thing I took away from this whole thing was that Watson voiced her preference about a way she wished men would not approach her. I wasn't really on board with the whole "she's a stuck up feminist bitch that shames and blames men" and all that stuff. That is, until I saw her latest video, which is a response to the internet explosion that her original video caused. For those who don't know me, I am not a man who is ashamed to admit when he is wrong. And boy oh boy, was I wrong about this incident and Watson.

[box type="alert" icon="none"]As it turns out, Rebecca Watson is a stuck up feminist bitch that shames and blames all men.[/box]

After listening to her response and taking in all of her "advice" about how men should interact with women, there was no other conclusion I could come to. Take note, if you bother watching the video, at how Watson states that the guy from the elevator was "cornering" her. Up until now I thought that line of thinking was tagged on to her by anti-feminists. I thought this because she didn't say she was cornered in her original video. I thought that there was simply a bunch of people out there who despise feminism more than I do who wanted to damage her image by saying she claimed this guy did things he didn't do.

Nope, I was wrong. The claim might not have been put forth in the original video but it damn sure was in this new one. Before anyone reminds me that I wasn't there and don't know if the guy was actually cornering her, as in, blocking her path and preventing her from exiting the elevator, chill out. I know I wasn't there and the truth is the guy may have well been doing just that. Of course if he did do that then I think Watson would have dedicated just a tad bit more than a few seconds in her explanation of the event in her original video. So I think I'll assume that he wasn't cornering her, which brings me to my first real analysis of this situation, now that I actually have a reason to care about it.

How the fuck is a guy cornering a woman just by being in the same elevator as her? Sometimes my male privilege blocks my understanding of these things so I often need some help from feminists to get a better perspective. So please, feminists, explain to me how if a human being with a penis is standing in the same elevator as a human being with a vagina, said penis wielder is cornering the vagina holder. Explain it slow and with small words because as I said, the male privilege that I have the benefit of not knowing I have can block out too much enlightened information at once.

Jokes and sarcasm aside, let's really think about this for a moment. Remember how I said that men and women have been complaining about each other since the beginning of time? Well here's the interesting thing, feminism has turned female complaints into government enforced laws. This is why there are forty billion ways a man can be brought up on charges of sexual harassment. I might have exaggerated that number.

[box type="note" icon="none"]Really think about it though. Which half of the human beings inhabiting this planet dominates the proportion that initiates romantic activity from icebreaking first hellos to a little morning sex before work? Is it the half with the penises or the half with the vaginas? If you chose the first answer then chances are, you have a penis.[/box]

Using this knowledge we can discern that the other half of the population might get a little annoyed with the millions of ways they are propositioned, for anything. Now this is all normal in my opinion and I don't see anything wrong with it. I'm not that much of a talker and I hate it when some of my buddies won't shut up. But I don't run to the government and demand laws be put in place with which I can force them to shut up.

This, ladies and gentlemen, is in my personal opinion, one of the many end goals of feminism; control. Those who seek power long and hard enough usually gain power in some way or another and those who gain power seek more power, plain and simple. I didn't find misandry in Watson's reaction to a guy asking her back to his room for coffee. The place where I see misandry is in her interpretation of the incident. The guy walking into the same elevator as her and asking her out transforms from an annoyance she wishes she didn't have to endure into something of a threat, "cornering" her in said elevator.

This is what decades of overblown hysteria from feminism creates. But unjustified fear is not the main focus of Watson's misandry. Think back to the video and remember how Watson outlined her views on what "normal" men do. "Normal" men don't ask women out at four in the morning. That isn't the "appropriate" time to ask a woman out, according to Watson.

Oh, my dear, dear Watson.

Let me put on my Sherlock Holmes hat for a second and explain something to you. There is no "appropriate" time to ask a woman out. Not in public places. You, my misguided feminist, as a woman, have absolutely no say in how or when a guy can walk up to you and ask you out just like men have absolutely no say in how or when a woman can ask them out. The western hemisphere is littered with countries that have laws set up in order to ensure men and women continue to have those freedoms. For now anyway, which brings me back to my first point about the end goal of feminism.

If Watson's line of thinking was law, almost every man in America would be locked up right now. I say every man because even if Watson's statement was meant for both men and women, men are almost the only ones who initiate conversations with people they don't know that lead to going out on dates or one night stands. It's a large part of the reason why there are so many of us humans around.

[image]

Coffee? Tea? Rape?

Here is something for Watson and every feminist like her to think about. This is no longer the 1950s or any years prior to that time. You are not going to have men walking up to your doors asking for your permission to call on you or court you. Men aren't going to hold their tongues around you or try and remember the fifty things they did that annoyed you to avoid doing those things again. Just because you feel that it isn't appropriate for a man to ask you out in an elevator at four in the morning that doesn't mean it is inappropriate. Normal people realize this.

The rest of Watson's reply is nothing more than a common display of shaming that many men know all too well. According to her, any man who doesn't agree with her is a loser who never gets laid less he resorts to using sex toys, because male sex toys are only for those losers who can't get into a woman's pants. The nonsense she spewed doesn't get any more copy and paste than that. "Do what I say or no woman will ever want to fuck you. I know this because I am a woman and therefore I speak for all women."

One really does have to stop and wonder about how feminism can warp so many minds. I'm sure there was a time long before I was born, back in the sixties and seventies when pompous women like Watson were walking through the streets screaming men were wrong in everything they do, while some guy somewhere said jokingly, "next thing you know they're gonna be saying we're harassing them by just saying hello".

Well, the joke would be on that guy, if he ever existed. It just goes to show you that opposing feminism really is the equivalent to supporting freedom. They already got the government discussing whether or not female prisons should be shut down over in the UK. How much longer will it be before the suggestion that "hello" from a man, and only a man, is sexual harassment? That wasn't a joke by the way.

If feminists had their way almost none of us would be here because there wouldn't be billions of men asking random chicks out every day on this planet. Not if they were being arrested for simply inhabiting the same enclosed space as a woman or god forbid, saying hello.

I wonder what all of the male feminists who stood in defense of Watson, their white knightly armor shining, will say to us misogynistic by difference of opinion anti-feminists now? I can already imagine. Funny guys, male feminists are. They actually try and scribble out dating advice to men against feminism on their blogs and in their books.

"Make sure you do everything she says and for god sakes if she looks annoyed APOLOGIZE. No it doesn't matter if you actually did anything or not, just fucking apologize. Always play it safe and remember, you're always wrong and she's always right."

Maybe it would have been better if so many guys weren’t so eager to ask women out. Fewer people usually means less bullshit. Then again compared to the overall population there aren’t that many feminists, and just look at all the bullshit they’ve caused.

A different look at men’s violence

August 12, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[quote style=”boxed”]You know what they say. There’s no reason to ever hit a woman. Shit. There’s a reason to hit everybody. Just don’t do it. Ain’t nobody above an ass whuppin’. ~ Chris Rock[/quote]

[dropcap]I[/dropcap]n the MRM we talk a lot more about violent women than violent men. And that is a good thing since it needs to be talked about and we are the only ones willing to do it. But in our efforts to bring female violence out of the shadows and into the light of day, we have had a tendency to overlook something else that is pretty important. That would be a more thorough examination of men’s violence in the home, sans the feminist spin.

But first the obligatory disclaimer. See, disclaimers are necessary for MRA’s, especially when telling the truth about domestic violence. We should all keep one or two stashed away with the porn supply for handy use. This time I’ll put mine in a green box for your viewing pleasure.

[box type=”download” style=”rounded” icon=”none”]Disclaimer: This article deals with the truth. And feminists, you know what the truth is. On your websites and blogs you issue a trigger warning before getting close to it. So, you have been warned. If the truth is a trigger for you, please do not read below this green box. Thank you and vote libertarian.[/box]

OK, I have to acknowledge up front that violence in the home by men happens for a lot of reasons. I can’t possibly deal with all of them here so for the sake of brevity I am just going to address two of them.

One, you have the guy who is just fucked up. He comes home drunk and beats his wife because there was some dust on the venetian blinds in the second bedroom that she didn’t get to when she was cleaning. This character is your fembot stereotype; the “go to” guy for fundraising, passing laws and “educating” the public on the problem of domestic violence. He’s an artifact of evil patriarchy and the extension of socially constructed and oppressive male dominance in the home; the only source of violence in the home that feminists recognize.

And that is as far as I will go into the feminist theory of alleged patriarchal underpinnings in domestic violence. It only loosely applies to a statistically insignificant number of men. Oh, and also, it’s all bullshit (see the green box).

It is much better that I address the circumstances that lead to much of the male initiated violence against women that actually does happen in the home. To understand it we are going to take a look at the progression of the interrelationship between a couple, I’ll call them Harry and Mary, who end up with one version of this experience. Oh, and if you want stats on this, feel free to pull them out of thin air. Contact your nearest feminist for assistance.

Anyway, where was I? Harry beating up on Mary, which all started in the typical way.

Harry and Mary meet, fall in love and come to live with each other. Both are on their best behavior; mutual respect and consideration abound. They spend their time in a personal little otherworld, getting to know each other, drinking, making love, watching classic movies and laughing at stuff that isn't even funny, just because they like to laugh together. They don't know that the real "getting to know each other" part hasn't started yet, but it doesn't matter. All is right in the world.

[quote float="right"]And they are off and running to their first fight. It lasts for a few minutes before he caves and changes the shirt. He doesn't like it, but he loves Mary and fighting with her really sucks.[/quote] As time passes though, Mary starts to notice stuff about Harry that she finds a little…annoying. Nothing too big, mind you, but annoying just the same. He has this weird habit of eating popcorn by tossing it in the air and catching it in his mouth. It was cute at first, but come on, sometimes he misses and the popcorn falls onto the sofa cushion. He puts a lot of butter on it, too. It'll stain the sofa; not to mention the fact that it isn't healthy.

He also likes to put like gobs of sugar in his coffee. No one needs that much sugar. There is something wrong with that for sure. But that is about it. Other than those couple of relatively minor things she is just mad about him. Well, there is that old Chicago Bears jersey he wears like every other day. It must be ten years old. She understands he's a football fan, but come on, does he have to wear that thing everywhere?

Harry doesn't notice any of this and just keeps on tossing popcorn up in the air and catching it in his mouth, trying not to get any on his jersey. He's having the time of his life.

Finally one day, Mary decides it is time to help her man out. She goes out to the department store and comes back with a couple of new shirts. One of them is a nice cadmium green. It even has a little football embroidered above the shirt pocket. He will love it – and look so much better.

She gives him the shirt and he makes a great fuss over it and puts it on immediately, so lucky to have such a thoughtful girl. She hangs the other one in his closet and things are right with the world again. Well, there's still the popcorn, but that will come with time.

They enjoy a fantastic evening together, nearly break the bed with their third round of lovemaking and fall off to a peaceful sleep in each other's arms.

The next morning Mary comes out of the bedroom and Harry is there in the kitchen, loading sugar into his coffee mug like a steam shovel. But Mary doesn't even notice it this time. He's wearing the Bears jersey.

He’s. Wearing. That. Fucking. Jersey.

“Hey,” he says, “Good morning!”

She just stares at him with a trace of bewilderment on her face and says nothing.

“What’s wrong?” he asks.

“Are you really going to wear that?”

And they are off and running to their first fight. It lasts for a few minutes before he caves and changes the shirt. He doesn’t like it, but he loves Mary and fighting with her really sucks. What the hell, he thinks, other than that she is a really great girl and he knows relationships mean compromise. Done deal, The Bears will have to take a less active role in his wardrobe. He buries the fact that he has just been coerced into letting her dress him into his unconscious, and things seem to be back on track.

What he doesn’t know is that The Bears jersey is just the first thing on the list. After that, it was his coffee, and then popcorn and then a growing number of other things which he learns he must change in order for her to be happy. And when he resists she seems to have a bottomless capacity for conflict at which she almost always prevails.

He does not want to lose her, and there is a part of him that is learning that the only way he is going to prevent that is by giving her what she wants.

[image]It goes on like this for three years. And during that time, almost everything of his former life goes the way of his favorite jersey. His friends drift off, or did he do the drifting? He doesn’t remember. All he knows for sure is that his life has become an unending stream of demands; all of them accompanied by the unspoken message that his compliance is the only form of caring that she recognizes. And when he fails or refuses she questions his love for her, and often his manhood.

Harry finds himself in one bastard of a catch-22. He loves Mary, even though it is starting to feel more like an anchor around his neck than love. He fantasizes about leaving her, but the reality of the idea seems unthinkable. He’s like a lot of men in that way, which may partly explain why they kill themselves at 10 times the rate of women during breakups and divorce.

Harry is a man in that emotional trap. He seems to know it and questions himself. Why does he want to be with someone who so clearly views him like he is broken and needs to be fixed? He gets no answer, though; just the certainty that he wants to stay at almost any cost.

So he does, trying to figure out, like a junkie chasing the dragon, how to get back some of the old magic they shared before she became so petulant and demanding. He foolishly convinces himself on some level that if he can give her enough of what she wants that she will ease off and start enjoying him, loving him, like she used to.

The fights only worsen. He gets more rebellious. She gets more nagging and berating. Things escalate. It culminates one day into a loss of control. At some point between Mary quietly and coldly telling Harry that he is a selfish little boy that never thinks about her wants and needs in life – and implying that she could do a lot better than him, and maybe she will – he hits her. He plants an open hand across her face.

[image]Mary runs off to the bedroom and shuts herself in (after screeching the obligatory, you bastard!), and Harry finds himself standing alone, accompanied only by the stunning hush in the room. His shock at his actions gives way to a sense of remorse and shame that makes him reel.

He looks at his hand and then wipes a tear from his eye. He starts to go to the bedroom but realizes there is nothing he can say. Harry takes a seat on the sofa and waits silently.

Hours later Mary emerges from the bedroom, eyes red and puffy, and takes a seat on the sofa a good distance from him.

"So," she asks, "why didn't you tell me you had an anger problem?"

Harry's mouth tries to form something of an answer, but he ends up just looking like a fish out of water, pointlessly gasping for something liquid to pass through its gills.

They finally talk some, but it is a somber conversation. Resignation is lingering in the air. Mary finally, if reluctantly, agrees to forgive him. He feels a rush of relief and, still consumed by self loathing, swears he will never do such a thing again. He professes that he will change, become a new man. But as it turns out, it is actually something else that changes, and changes drastically. Whatever vestige that once remained of his personal autonomy within the relationship is now obliterated.

Now there is no demand that Mary can place on him that he can argue with; no treatment from her to which he can object. In offending the deepest of his held values, to not strike the woman he loves, he has become a prisoner of his own shame; a criminal seeking rehabilitation; a debtor trying to make restitution on an impossible scale.

Mary is now large and in charge. And by golly, she knows it.

The Bears jersey has just lost an owner. Coffee? Two Splendas, please. No, make that one. Sure, butter substitute is fine on popcorn. Let me get an extra napkin so I don't soil the sofa.

And so the cycle begins. Harry will play step and fetch to his wounded mistress, and will continue to do so, with her reveling in it, till the pressure builds toward another explosion. Every once in a while he will hit her. Sometimes he will just let loose with his tongue. But the result will be the same every time. He will get the catharsis he needs, at the cost of his shame. And she will get the control she so clearly expects and desires, at the cost of the occasional red mark or a bruise, and any connection she ever had to human decency.

The feminists were right about one thing. Violence in the home is frequently about power and control. Of course, it never took a rocket scientist to figure that one out (which is very good for feminists, indeed). But once you sidestep the dogma and delusion of squeezing everything in life through the simplistic filter of ideology, you find that things like power are not so easy to see, much less define in any credible way.

Clearly, both parties have committed wrongs in this story. And if we want to take the blue pill path and just measure who we imagine to be more wrong than the other, then there was never a need to address this to begin with. Case closed, man bad, nothing else to discuss; increase VAWA funding now. Harry will likely agree with you if we ever let him out of jail.

But if, perchance, you want run a little deeper, you can help yourself quite a bit by asking the right questions. Take a closer look at Mary and Harry and ask yourself one thing. Who has the power? If you think it is Harry, then you should have stopped reading at the green box.

Vacationing In Duluth

August 13, 2011 | by J Galt | Link | Original Link

The Duluth Model of Domestic Violence has been upheld as the virtual bible on domestic violence and the remedies that our government applies to the problem. It calls for measures that disenfranchise and exclude men entirely from any alternatives to assist in conflict resolution. It does not foster any social or institutional method or mechanism for a man to exit a marriage or its dysfunctional setting in a peaceful manner. It is for this reason that I personally hold extreme contempt for the judicial system, family law and the politicians and bureaucrats that have sanctioned these measures.

[box type="download" icon="none"]The Duluth Model and its interpretation by the idiot savants trying to save us "argued for practices that would hold offenders accountable and place the onus of intervention on the community, not on the individual woman being beaten."[/box]

Makes sense right? Up until you institutionalize the process of assumption and ignore the default mechanisms outcome. If you as a man solicit help from any quarter; doctor, councilor, police, hospital, it is defined by The Duluth Model as an attempt to bully your partner institutionally. What that translates to for men is the inability to seek assistance in stopping conflict. If you do you are a bully attempting to use the "system" against your partner.

The Duluth Model does not support reconciliation and identifies it as part of the cycle of violence. As a man I support this, and do not believe that reconciliation after violence is possible, but for a different reason. My reason is simply that if a woman misrepresents or exaggerates the circumstances, reconciliation threatens the same outcome of false accusations. Let's be clear, we now define violence as an intimidating look. Even a look of disbelief can serve the purpose and violence, and disbelief is always a response to the inability to resolve conflict.

[quote float="left"]If I am a man that can determine that my relationship is unhealthy and wish to opt out, how do I avoid the warfare that the system and its institutions impose on me?[/quote] Most people realize the process of conflict and many simply do not wish to participate. Behaviors that contribute are usually learned by both parties, thus reconciliation is pointless and educating men only serves half the problem. What has never been considered in the Duluth Model is the violence of women, the impact of it on men and providing an alternative institutional mechanism for men to opt out of a violent relationship but maintain their relationships with their children. In other words, men have no viable option to "end the cycle of violence." This single mechanism could answer the need for DV shelters for men and obviously reduce the number needed for women to a fraction of what currently exists.

If I am a man that can determine that my relationship is unhealthy and wish to opt out, how do I avoid the warfare that the system and its institutions impose on me? If I am a man that does not feel obliged to "work it out," if incompatibility is the obvious undertone of communicating, how can I leave? If I am a man who is committed to my children, but no longer to my partner and the hostility she represents, how can I maintain my commitment in a free and healthy way?

The simple answer is that I can't. The Duluth Model community does not afford me the ability to stop the hostility and vitriol; not at any point in the process, not before during or after the discord. In fact "The Duluth Model of Domestic Violence," promotes violence and ultimately engulfs the whole families in it.

If I wish to acquiesce, to simply agree to disagree and accept the dissolution of intimacy, to move on and maintain a relationship with my children, I can't. I can't because there is no institution that will support this outcome. There is no institution that supports equal and shared custody, which is all I and millions of men wish for. If we as men ever achieve this single proposition I have no doubt that you will see a marital exodus that will make women's desire for divorce pale by comparison. If shared custody was offered as a one day special, I have no doubt that millions of men would opt for sanity.

The sad truth is that domestic violence is promoted by the very people that engorge themselves on the dollars of your misfortune. The lawyers, councilors, bureaucrats, police, politicians and the wives have a vested interest in your wallet. They are the true scum of Domestic Violence.

If this single proposition was implemented, it would quite likely save many families from dissolution. If we remove the "I win you lose" equation in divorce, what point does violence of any kind really have? It may even put some meaning into no fault divorce if a man could simple opt out of the battle and focus his energies on healthier issues. I for one would no longer have to play therapist to someone that refuses to respect my autonomy and individuality. For my part I would have left my first marriage after the first five years if I was assured that my relationship with my children would endure. Instead I suffered an additional 15 years of unnecessary conflict that spilled onto my children.

In a letter to my estranged daughter from my first marriage I penned the following, but never sent it.

> "I have no animosity for your mother, but because we do not share beliefs and ideals, I do not trust your mother to honor or respect mine. This makes for an unworkable marriage that has held this status for many years. It does not however remove potential friendship. Friendship can exist with simple respect, and requires no coercion of purpose or manipulation. The best thing about friendships is individuals are responsible for their own happiness. Emotional accusations, alienation and dysfunction can be answered by simply withdrawing for a cooling period and limiting contact. Relationships do not have to be self-serving, miserable, oppressive and abusive. Friendship is a better approach to removing these elements."

This however is not the outcome that our institutions support or even recognize as a possible outcome to conflict. If men had an institutional mechanism to protect their interests, other than intimidation, coercion and violence, why would they bother with the latter? The real question is to men and should be asked. If you had an alternative to conflict that would maintain your relationship with your children and protect you from the process of violence would you take it? Is the violence really worth it? What the Duluth Model fails to address is the ability to exploit the assumptions that it makes. Men as citizens are entitled to equal protection under the law. Without it they are entitled and responsible to seek redress of their burdens or remove the institutions that inflict suffering upon them.

The truth is our institutions serve men up like negotiable real estate in which any woman can plant a flag and drain his resource. It is a system of entitlement that serves women and disenfranchises men. I see no reason for perpetuating the violence, the conflict and the commitment to it. The Duluth Model of domestic violence is based solely on assumption and disregards the male experience in marriage and handily ignores a man's interests in the well-being of his children and his relationship them. It is a collection of female relationship assumptions that act only to serve her interests and establishes guilt as the only viable method to resolving conflict.

Recently I again reviewed the video on The Duluth Model of Domestic Violence my attention was drawn to one of the primary authors of the Duluth model, Ellen Pence. Common in our language of an evil Patriarchy is the power and control that men exercise over women. In this context it is uncommon to question the motivation and intention of this power and control. Most assume that it is a form of male privilege, an exercise of male rights that is obligatory for women to submit to. Lady you can have the Patriarchy, just give me shared custody of my kids and nobody needs to get hurt.

What was interesting in viewing the video is Pence herself suggests that in discussing with women their experience with batterers, it was concluded that male behavior represented a system. The women did not state that men were trying to gain all the power but rather, ended up with all the power. She interpreted this as a desire by men to have all the power but could not corroborate her belief even after exploring this in the men's groups she attended.

[image]She then reformed her belief from a "desire" to an entitlement or privilege, but did not qualify why she supported this belief. Rather she compared it to a form of racial entitlement, in which expectations and entitlements are engaged but not for the purpose of dominating. It is clear that this system is outdated, dishonest and no longer socially viable. It is time for the experience of men to be part of the equation and time for the female narrative describing men's experience to stop..

I would agree, male behavior does represent a system, that system includes male powerlessness, responsibility, accountability and disposability that his partner will never experience. It escapes the imagination of women that circumventing the "male system of behavior" could easily be achieved by implementing options up front rather than retribution after the fact. PMS, see ya. Don't like the drapes, see ya. I need to work more hours so you can stay at home, see ya. I don’t understand your feelings, maybe your right, see ya. But alas this may remove the right of deed and the entitlement and privilege to her property and we can’t have that. Gee ladies is this what you really meant by the definition of chattel and objectification.

It is certainly time to question the institutions that prey on men and the potentials and freedoms that are so quickly and easily removed from them.

Is Feminism monolithic? The feminists say no so why can’t we just agree to disagree and I’ll get on with my life and you can get on with yours, why can’t I just opt out? But that would remove the poaching and pick pockets.

Is gender a social construct? The feminists say yes, so what the fuck is the big deal about motherhood, it’s obviously just another construct not worth perpetuating, let’s get rid of it. But that would remove the poaching, the pick pockets and the privilege.

Maybe it’s time to realize and embrace the understanding that entitled governors, congressmen, senators and presidents lack the courage to face the problems confronting men. These are not leaders, if anything they are simply poor managers that can’t even be trusted with our taxes and money, let alone our children. One sure way to end domestic violence completely and forever is to give men an option to exit with shared custody of their children. At that point violence is redundant. I believe it’s time for a referendum of the people, clearly our institutions are unwilling, incapable and incompetent in these matters.

Patricia Overberg dies

[box type=”alert” icon=”none”]

Patricia Overberg, the first known domestic violence shelter director in the United States to help male victims along with female victims, passed away today (August 11, 2011). Patricia is being honored by men’s rights activists as a hero and civil rights pioneer, similar to the shelter director Erin Pizzey in England.

From 1990 to 1998, Patricia directed the Antelope Valley Domestic Violence Council in Lancaster, California, also known as the “Valley Oasis” shelter. After realizing male victims had no place to go, she courageously changed her women-only policy by setting aside one of her shelters for male victims and their children, and in rare cases of overflow she would obtain consent from residents in another one of her shelters to mix the sexes, which, she says, never created a problem. Nonetheless, Patricia was mistreated by other shelter directors who insisted services should only be for women. The mistreatment became so severe that she filed a complaint with the L.A. County Board of Supervisors, as she explains in her sworn declaration at http://www.ncfmla.org/pdf/overberg.pdf

Patricia later joined NCFM’s Advisory Board and the Speaker’s Bureau of Stop Abuse For Everyone (SAFE) and remained closely in touch with battered men’s advocates until the date of her death.

AVfM 2.0 recap, and some thank you's

August 14, 2011 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

It is a simple truth. The men's movement is growing, and in a way that is dangerous for feminists. God, writing that and knowing it is true borders on sexual excitement.

Recently we have seen a brave politician, an MP in Australia, standing up and calling out the fembots for the family destroying Nazis that they are. Here in America Congressman Ted Poe publicly proclaimed that VAWA should be rewritten in gender neutral terms. And I have it on very good authority that a growing number of staffers and political elites on Capitol Hill are starting to recognize and embrace the fact that something is amiss in the system of feminist governance and needs to change.

The rhetoric I witness in comments and even in the works of syndicated columnists is beginning to take on a different tone. Much of what I read is sentiments that could easily be culled from the articles and comments of places like AVfM and other MRA sites.

[quote style="boxed" float="left"]Who the hell is orry? I don't know. He kind of came out of nowhere and then pitched in large with the bucks to help finance this thing during the transition.[/quote] Sure, misandric culture is hardly on its last legs, but the fact remains that a wind is starting to stir around the house of cards that feminists have deluded themselves into thinking of as a fortress.

And there is another factor that is slathering even more mortar between the bricks we are laying in this movement. Unity and cooperation. And it is happening on a level I thought would have been impossible three months ago.

If that trend continues, FTSU will become the status quo until we are able to put flowers on the grave of feminism, then unzip our pants and water them.

As I have been fond of droning on about around here, A Voice for Men has never looked so good. And that means it is time to offer some overdue public thanks to some key people who made it possible.

First, I want to start with orry. Who the hell is orry? I don't know. He kind of came out of nowhere and then pitched in large with the bucks to help finance this thing during the transition. Hats off to you brother, and I hope you have found a way to read here without killing your eyes.

The same for long-time supporters Stu and Izzey and Alphabeta Supe, who added more than their usual generosity to the pot. All the things we are doing now are pricier than ever, and these contributors, along with all of you that scraped the sofa cushions for a little extra to put in the coffers, are the only reason we are staying ahead of the game.

Well, not the only reason. We have also been gifted with some technical expertise on a level we have never had before. Personally, I am first and foremost a writer. That means two almost universal truths. One, I can't spell for shit, and two, I am a technical moron. Mike LaSalle from MND took the old AVfM and put it into WordPress for the official 1.0 version of the site.

When it came to the site you are reading this on now, we had many people on the assist, but it was Alek Novy's team that set their personal business into the hole, and it was Alek Novy that went without sleep for more than a week so he could lead his team to AVfM 2.0 with his invaluable expertise as lead developer for the project. Thanking Alek for what he did seems kind of lame and inadequate. But I am here to do that just the same.

There is more good stuff on the way.

JtO (who actually can write and conjure technical wizardry), Keyster and myself have been meeting to fine tune the operations of AVfM Radio. The intent here is to move up the quality of the show on par with the improvements you have all witnessed here at the website.

AVfM Radio has enormous potential. Currently, between the live show, the BTR archives and posting them to YouTube (and soon iTunes) we have thousands of listeners to each episode. All that on a wing and a prayer, without proper formatting and organization.

[box type="note" style="rounded" icon="none"]We hope, and expect, that the radio program will be an increasingly devastating part two in the one-two punch of AVfM. We are working feverishly to accomplish that, with extreme prejudice.[/box]

And no, we have not forgotten register-her.com. Like many of the projects we take on, they take longer than expected to do them correctly. But with that project too, the correct version of it is definitely on the way. JtO is hard at work, even as he takes a hefty workload from AVfM Radio and the demands of this website. He will have it finished soon, though, and the press releases will start rolling out on a website we can all look at with pride and great expectation.

In conclusion, a brief recap on site matters here. We are in the summer slowdown, only we have not slowed down at all in terms of traffic. Despite being down for a week for the rebuild, we are still angling slowly for a place in the top 100,000 Alexa worldwide rankings. Our traffic is still good and growing.

[quote style="boxed" float="right"]For Perseus and others that expressed concerns, the popular comments have been eliminated and replaced with a more aesthetically appealing list of recent comments near the bottom of the page.[/quote] Comments are slower, but that was actually part of the growth plan. When we switched over to a system that requires users to register before they can comment we knew it would cause an immediate dip. It also eliminated a lot of trolling and red thumb bandits.

And, as time goes by, we are confident that we will return to prior levels of commenting, only with (if you can imagine) even better quality of comments in general.

For Perseus and others that expressed concerns, the popular comments have been eliminated and replaced with a more aesthetically appealing list of recent comments near the bottom of the page. We know many of you check that area and that it does, as Perseus indicated, enhance our sense of community.

I would like to suggest to regular commenters that you consider getting a Gravitar that will replace the image next to your name in the comments with something of your choosing. We are putting a lot of work into the appearance of the site and those images really help us toward that end.

Please keep your comments and suggestions coming in. We can’t say “yes” to all of them, but none of us here forget that your ideas and opinions are a critical component of making AVfM quite unlike any other online community of men.

VAWA must stop the hateful stereotypes
