Without a doubt MWM is the creator of the most definitive body of MRA work on the entire internet. Most of his work was assembled over a seven year time period with him being the one man production team. Only two and a half years ago did he start to release his work in segments to be presented collectively as his full documentary on his Youtube channel.

MWM is not only the go-to guy for all MRAs that want to turn their friends, family and coworkers onto men's right issues, he is consequently the MRA that many in the MRM credit with their taking of the "red pill." His achievement is unparalleled in the MRM and we are honored to have him with us!

Now is your chance to call in and chat with MWM along with James and Bob so do not waste it! As you can imagine this show intro does NOT do MWM justice but your calls will so we will be anxiously waiting for you to call in.

The show airs live on July 17, at 8:00 Central Time, US, which is 2:00 a.m. July 18, in London and 11:00 a.m. July 18 in Brisbane. If you have not yet requested membership in the Stickcam Room, you can do so through the link below.

The MRA members on the MensRights subreddit have linked to my Blog again, and now they are spamming me with hate as if I had asked them to post it there. It has been posted there 3-4 times this week.

I want you to tell them to stop posting my Blog on that subreddit. I am not interested in the Men’s Rights Movement, or MRAs, and I do not want their attention or their outrage.

Please, tell them to leave me alone. I am not interested.
I don’t want their attention on that god damn subreddit.

Thank you.

Are you still advocating sexually targeted murder and mutilation?
If so, then its obvious you do want their attention.
Try publicly renouncing the desire to murder people based on their sex, that might make them leave you alone.

You’re done?

Unlikely.

Your blog remains up, along with every one of your postings calling for murder, mutilation and mass murder. You have not even taken the minimal step of publicly renouncing a desire to murder human beings based on their sex.

In addition, your youtube channel remains online, along with every video of yours calling for male targeting murder, mutilation and extermination.

I expect you will have men who object to your campaigning for their murders continuing to tell you of their objections in direct terms until you at least present a plausible posture of non-genocidal intent.

It appears that the mighty professor PZ has taken it into his head to attack me again, this time in response to my rhetorical question: “How can an imbecile command such high public regard?”

It is not his first such, but as usual, he does it in his own inimitable style; all invective, no substance. The champion and star of Free Thought Blogs apparently named his blogging site as such to indicate free thought so long as it exactly conforms to his dictates.

But my rhetorical question of imbeciles referred to the writing of an ex Bangladeshi “human rights advocate” on the un-funny topic of acid attacks in some parts of the Islamic world. According to the good professor, in my article, I “started ranting about how evil Taslima was.”

I’ll admit I did use a fair few adjectives, but evil wasn’t one of them. It is a bit too biblical for my taste.

I’ll admit another thing, which PZ surely knows as well. Invective laden prose is fun to write. But the problem of lost credibility emerges if invective is as far as you go. This is why my recent indictment of Taslima included the statement:

“Obviously, everything I’ve just said is no better than unworthy characterization. We will have to look at Taslima’s essay directly.”

I then proceeded to address the body of her article in it’s several problems. Principal among those is the un-examined, but continued portrayal of the violent criminals who burn the faces of human beings with thrown acid using the undifferentiated category “men.” She didn’t identify religious fanatics, nor individuals deranged by ideology, not even women, who are the usual perpetrators of acid attacks in at least one country where such attacks are carried out.

Nasreen listed Cambodia among places where acid attacks occur, but somehow, in her simplistic caricature of “men attack women,” neglected to mention that Cambodian wives conduct such attacks, sometimes against their husband’s girlfriends, and less often against the husbands themselves. The phenomenon is just a bit more nuanced that Nasreen’s:

> Men throw acid on us with the intention of injuring and disfiguring us.

Along with the claimed motivation by Nasreen including:

> ..for speaking too much, for laughing loudly and for pure fun.

This lack of nuance and insight into cultural forces from a supposed expert is boggling. That is, it’s impossible to understand unless a motive other than reducing or eliminating acid attacks is considered. If the author's motive is to vilify men, and deify women, she does a good job, allowing that her readers must also lack in nuance of understanding.

Of course, I said all this two days ago in my article Taslima Sells Hate Wins Praise. PZ is obviously encouraged to read that one again, since what he seems to have taken away from his first try was "ranting about how evil Taslima was."

But why should I care to parse Nasleen's bad prose, and why correct a established gender ideologue of dubious ethical reputation? Is it because I object to the ongoing public vilification and demonization of men? Yes, and saying so, I can already hear somebody typing somewhere that men are butt-hurt at being blamed every time "men" throw a flask of acid into a woman's face.

Except that it isn't just men doing the throwing, and it isn't even just women being burned. But maintenance and escalation of the "men bad, woman good" narrative isn't even the biggest problem.

Rather, it's the fact that anyone trying to solve a problem as serious as acid attacks, but working from a broken model of that problem has no chance of success. Worse than that, if the model used is that "the half of the human race with penises are all simply amoral, sadistic psychopathic monsters" is chosen in full knowledge of it's falsehood, then the "activism" to reduce or eliminate acid attacks is nothing more than activist theater.

This is the same phenomenon domestic violence service agencies demonstrate when their public messaging claims DV is simply evil men, beating innocent women. This Duluthian view is false too, and similarly doomed to be ineffective against real world domestic violence.

The conception of evil-violent-man and innocent-abused-woman is at odds with the majority of reputable research on domestic violence [1][2][3][4][5][6], which indicates reciprocity of abuse, and that women in violent relationships are "as violent or more violent than their male spouses or partners"[1].

However, as always, a narrative with female victims and male aggressors is a guaranteed sell when raising money, so that's the story told. And the operators of DV shelters and other agencies appear to not care, as long as the money keeps flowing.

But according to PZ, an odious twit (that's me) "started ranting about how evil Taslima was" on the "phycho" MRA site, AVfM. I wonder if phycho is the professor's clinical diagnosis? Since he's a biologist and not a psychologist, probably not.

But do I believe he really missed the point in my dissection of Taslima's ideological portrayal of "bad men" by such a wide margin?

Nope, I don't believe it.

He also made a point of characterizing me, the odious twit (ad hominem), and my article ranting about how evil Taslima was (straw-man), and explicitly stated there would be no link. And thus, no convenient way for PZ's readers to see the veracity of his characterizations, or lack thereof.

It almost seems like purposeful dishonesty, and cowardice. Where is any address of the actual substance of the argument?

But speaking of links, Professor PZ did remember to link to his own previous article attacking me, which he titled using my online username, as well as first and last name, and a few invectives for good measure.

I'm slimy, and a psychopath before we even get past the URL. Is this how other public academics address people they disagree with? I'll admit I've seen Professor Richard Dawkins use "murderous", but he was describing a collection of clerics of a sect of Islam which has demonstrated just how appropriate an adjective that was.

However, PZ, unsatisfied with imputation of sliminess and psychopathy, included:

"nutcases, clueless, goon, despised, pseudo-scientific pontificator, misogynist (woman hater), bozo, scumbag, sociopath, sleazy, pretentious, liar, humorless, mentally deficient, and fuckbrained asshole" in reference to a video of mine, critical of Rebecca Watson over her posturing as a sadistic sociopath. I did in fact miss a cue in her performance indicating her act was an act, and several days later uploaded my recognition of the error. A video which might even annoy our PZ, since admitting mistakes is something properly evil MRAs should never do, eh.

So PZ clearly dislikes me, which is understandable once we forget he is an adult and a professor of science – since I am routinely critical of an ideology he publicly subscribes to, on the grounds that it is based on hatred and violence. But that is what makes him such a puzzling fellow. His is a professor of biology, a science built from evidence, starting from questions and considering all evidence. By contrast, ideologies start from a "Truth" and select evidence to conform to that truth. The ones in which that "truth" include an invisible all powerful creator, we call religions.

Demonstrating this contrast, on February 6 he posted a blog entry rightly criticizing the publisher of Jezebel.com for their magical thinking concerning homeopathic medicine. This is medicine diluted to non-existence, where the mixture is nothing but water.

Myers said:

> It's the people who try to justify everything with their biases and gut feelings and falsified opinions that have gotten us in our current mess.

But he doesn't seem able to apply that lens to his own gender ideology. A dogma in which female identity is intractably tied to victimhood, and where rational criticism must never be addressed, only shouted down. Thus the heavy use of invective, the gleeful and public maintenance of lists of the excommunicated, and relative absence of address to arguments made whenever PZ sees what doesn't conform to his feminist ideology.

This was demonstrated recently by Myers as he reversed his promise of content and editorial freedom to the science blogger Thunderf00t, throwing the recently invited new member of freethoughtblogs off the rigidly ideological blogging site for criticism of that gender ideology. Although Thunderf00t should have known in advance what would happen – it was a particularly clear demonstration of dissenting opinion not tolerated despite the lofty “free thought” name of the site.

No debate or discussion over whether TF was right, or wrong, or wrong in some of his details, nope. The answer is clearly to banish him. In fact, Myers goes to considerable lengths to maintain public listings of those he has excommunicated from his little utopia.

And continuously glaring, how can a professional science educator support an ideological view of gender politics, when he is on record having said: “It’s the people who try to justify everything with their biases and gut feelings and falsified opinions that have gotten us in our current mess.”

And yet, he is avowedly a proponent of that hateful, violent regressive ideology of gender which differs from an ancient religion in few details. Almost all the trappings are present. Refusal to address arguments with anything except personal attacks, censorship, censure black-lists and lately, whispering campaigns. This religion even has it’s most fanatical followers promising violence against the outcasts and heathens. Witness Pam O’Shaughnessy’s eugenics advocacy, the recent femitheistDivine’s mass murder fantasies, and the arguments from feminists including PZ against stopping the ritual mutilation of boys. The grounds for this complaint being that stopping child mutilation is a zero sum game. Any focus on protecting infant boys would (somehow) harm infant girls.

> There is no comparison between FGM and circumcision, and it is annoying to see boys intruding on a thread about a serious political and social issue to insist that everyone look at their little boo-boo.
> Yes, I am belittling your loss, because compared to what mutilated women have lost, it’s goddamned trivial.

In fact, Myers is simply belittling any human damage which doesn’t negatively impact the preferred gender, based on Simone de Beauvoir’s formulation of women as eternal victims.

Frank Salter wrote this month for Quadrant[7], an online journal of ideas, literature, historical and political debate published in Australia:

“The absence of self-critical perspectives in gender studies centres indicates a robust level of solidarity or policing, also evident in the media. There appear to be few alternative theories or ideologies on the curriculum, certainly none that take biology seriously. It is what one would expect from a ‘tribal-moral’ community as described by Jonathan Haidt[8] in the case of American social psychology.

I conclude that biology is generally overlooked in women’s and gender studies in Australia. A probable contributing cause is that much of the field is monopolized by a radical ideological orientation which rejects inconvenient facts.”

A bit like a religious ideology.

Of course Myers might imagine he has a trump card in the format of a video depicting me laughing like a badly acted bond villain at the prospect of personally stopping a rape in progress. Numerous copies are still floating around the stupider recesses of youtube, complete with a crashing and booming Beethoven soundtrack – added by me when I first recorded it, as a cue to viewers to recognize hyperbole and grand exaggeration of my frustration with online feminists at the time of that recording. The exaggerated callous laughter, that's another tip for the viewers too.

However, Myers in his 5 decades of accumulated wisdom seems to think this bit of hyperbolic venting on my part reflects some kind of sinister deeper belief held.

My views on victimization of violent crime are not standard views, mainly because I've thought more about my acculturated assumptions than most people. But they're also a bit more nuanced that the bad-acting super-villain impression PZ thinks is some sort of gotcha.

So I re-ask the same rhetorical question I used near the beginning of this discussion. Do I think PZ takes that video as realistic representation of my views?

Of course he doesn't, he's not a child. For that matter, he also has over 200 online articles to choose from and more than 100 videos – which collectively focus on non-violence more than almost any other topic, and which lately have been building a philosophical foundation for ethics based on first principals.

However, PZ has on occasion posted responses to my articles – and it's nice to know he's such an avid reader. His problem seems to be either an inability or unwillingness to actually address the substance of any argument. I guess characterizing, name calling, belittling and accusing of malice of intention is easier when you're a busy academic pseudo-celebrity. It just doesn't do much for your credibility. The tactics our PZ prefers, taunting, name calling, invective, black listing, lynch mobs, whispering campaigns and the like, these are the practices of a cult.

So PZ, I'm glad you're such a regular reader of mine, I wish I could return the favour. Sadly tho, your torrents of unsupported invective and puerile authoritarianism don't much interest me. Without substance behind it, it makes for rather tedious reading.

However, I'll leave PZ with a challenge.

Address the substance of anything I've written in my last 100 articles on this site in a manner befitting an academic celebrity and intellectual. Show me where I'm wrong, and change my opinion. And do it without recourse to the usual tactics of censure, identity-politics and attempted shaming tactics.

I absolutely swear my opinion is readily changeable, provided a strong, reasoned argument can be made. Do it like a grown up. That's my challenge to you PZ. Act like a man, for a complete full article. If you can do that absent of the usual puerile drivel, I'll publish a permanent article right here on AVfM announcing to the world that you changed my mind.

I also have a question. What evidence would convince you, professor, besides the continued repudiation of violence and address of basic human rights issues in the movement's activism and rhetoric, that this is a human rights movement? That's a real question, so what evidence would convince you?

And if you can't form a strong argument, or answer that simple question it will be obvious just which adjectives apply to you, professor.

[box type="note" icon="none"]
Addendum: I have learned that since Myers made his dismissive remarks about the ritual mutilation of male infants, he has since reversed his position and argued against that practice. While this may be a legitimate change of his view based on evidence, it might also be simply a self-interested change in political posture.

Fuck their shit up

July 18, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

As anyone not recently under a rock is aware, Dr. Greg Canning resigned his teaching position at James Cook University in protest of that university's failure to investigate the activities of gender ideologue and pro-violence bigot, Betty McLellan. McLellan also has a teaching position with JCU, exposing her virulent ideas to many impressionable youth.

Dr. Canning's complaints to the school's administration were initially ignored, till he pressed the issue and was finally told (in so many words) that James Cook University is unconcerned with bigotry and sexually targeted violence, as long as it is only happening to men, male children and male fetuses.

Predictably, the media in Australia turned the story of his resignation over to the usual suspects, who promptly began to paint Dr. Canning as a misogynist who can't handle a woman with an opinion. That the woman's opinion in question happened to involve demonizing half the human race and supporting calls for mass violence doesn't appear to matter.

I won't bother with a point by point refutation of Tory Shepherd's latest round of propaganda journalism. I have already done that here, and so has JtO, here. Our own Uncle Bern weighed in on it here.

The more important matter here is the continued attempts to create a red herring out of AVfM, intended for sale to the general public. As John pointed out in his article, Shepherd (or her editors) gave a subheading to her piece which read:

Hate site's motto is 'F*king their st up

Misuse of the transitive verb aside, and ignoring the fact that even when properly quoted it is not the site's motto (which is "Take the Red Pill"), the use of that phrase in the sub-header was calculated to make AVfM appear to be a hate site. It is intended to make us look as though we have violent leanings; that we are a threat to the personal security of feminists, and indeed to women in general.

Their hope is that this puts us on the defensive and that it will send a convincing message to the public at large that we, and of course by association Dr. Canning, are dangerous.

On a slow day it might be fun to re-explain all this for the benefit of those who are entering this forum for the first time because of the lies told by Tory Shepherd, but I have a better idea. I have a personal, deeply personal message for her and for two others of her ilk associated with this "story."

Tory Shepherd, I am here to fuck your shit up.

Betty McLellan, I am here to fuck your shit up.

Michael Flood, I am here to fuck your shit up.

And in case any of the three of you are as stupid as you sound, I mean it literally. I want your shit fucked up in a permanent and irreversible way. I want the harsh, unforgiving light of truth to shine on you and other hateful swine that spread bigotry and violence under the guise of advancing the cause of women. I want the public to see (which they can HERE) the hateful, pro-violence cult of monsters Betty McLellan supports at Radfem.com.

I want the public to see (which they can, HERE) the disgraceful nature of Tory Shepherd's dishonest, yellow propagandizing, which she pawns off as journalism in order to protect advocates of violence and hatred.

I want the public to see (which they can, HERE) the outrageously deceptive and dishonest tactics of Michael Flood, who, after taking on the false identity an estranged father, gained access to the organization Fathers4Equality and sent abusive emails to Australian MP's in their name. As is summarized on their website:

> He then proceeded to misuse these facilities and send out offensive letters in the name of Fathers4Equality to every member of the Australian federal parliament, in an effort to discredit and undermine our efforts and reputation.

Do I want to fuck these peoples shit up? Oh yes, I certainly do. And it has already begun to happen. Just a very few years ago the men's movement was sequestered away from even having a strong presence on the internet. We were a ragtag group of social renegades that mainly talked amongst ourselves because the rest of the world was caught headlong in a sweeping tide of feminist agitprop.

Fast forward a really short bit of time and we just witnessed a university professor, an esteemed medical doctor, who resigned his position in protest of what anyone can learn by clicking through the links provided in this article. We are also seeing a rapidly growing effort to attempt to shut us up, including the efforts of the SPLC, which you can read about here.

They are destined to fail.

This, and by that I mean the truth, is fucking their shit up. It is happening in the best possible way and all their powerless wailing and lies about FTSU meaning violence won't stop it.

The growth of this movement depends, wholly and completely, on our ideas being exposed to rational people who value fairness and justice. We are now getting that exposure, and it is scaring the living shit out of the likes of McLellan, Shepherd and Flood.

That fear looks damned good on them.

For those men's advocates who are always encouraging us to tiptoe around on eggshells because of what people may make of our ideas, or how they will twist our words, this should be a lesson to you.

Nowhere is there a more upstanding, decent and productive member of the human community than Greg Canning. I have never read a word of his that was not thoughtful, intellectually diligent and honest. He resigned a prestigious post, making a significant personal sacrifice in order to call attention to a very serious problem at James Cook University and academe in general. He did so with spotless decorum, befitting a human being of his caliber.

His reward was to be called a woman hater and a whiner, and of course to have all of his concerns totally brushed aside…for the time being. If they didn't lift and twist something from AVfM to use against him, they would have lifted and twisted elsewhere. It's what they do.

Folks, it does not matter much whether we push the envelope to the edge or whether we take painstaking care to reach the ridiculously unreachable goal of speaking hard truths while offending no one. We are dealing with liars and bigots. They have no sense of honor or decency. When I call Michael Flood a sociopathic pig, it is not an adolescent ad hominem used in the absence of substance, but an unavoidable conclusion rooted in the reality of his conduct as a human being. All you have to do is read about him.

We are not compelled to play nice with these hateful ideologues any more than we would feel compelled to politely discuss race relations with the Ku Klux Klan, or debate reproductive rights with people who bomb abortion clinics.

Our one and only job is to fuck their shit up; to make them suffer the pain of truth, and to keep doing it till they have no place to hide.

We are making progress. We see it in Radfem's ouster from Conway Hall. We see it in the emergence of a never before seen scrutiny of VAWA and most importantly in the fact that men are starting to come out of the closet as human beings, taking a public stand against the hatred that has come to be a social norm.

The only thing we can do wrong at this point is change. If anything, we will benefit from becoming even more intense; more unyielding.

All we have to do is fuck their shit up, then wake up tomorrow and do it again. They are powerless to stop it.

Does Tory Shepherd actually support mass murder?

July 18, 2012 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

Tory Shepherd is back on the attack. As usual, without plausible deniability of possible misunderstanding.

Earlier this week, Dr Greg Canning emailed several of the principals of AVfM, including myself, informing us of his upcoming interview with Australian blogger Tori Shepherd. He requested that what she wrote following that interview be addressed with a degree of decorum, acknowledging the effort at understanding made by Shepherd in taking the time to conduct an interview.

However, after publication of her article[1], he sent another email, which included "Let her rip gents , sorry I was naive to suggest remaining polite to her."

Certainly, Shepherd's article is an example of yellow journalism, but rather than impugn the author's character, I will simply examine what seems clear in the article's purpose.

Lets start with the title. "'Carnivorous men' versus 'lying bitches' in sex war." The term "sex war" is certainly flashy, lurid and sensational, but not informative.

Shepherd refers to an established, moneyed and politically powerful ideology of gender, subscribed to by Betty McLellan, who wrote that men are carnivorous and necrophiliac. Surprising, since as an academic she should know humans are not carnivores, but omnivores. The necrophiliac claim might just be projection.

Mclellan also appears quite confused about the nature of violence, indicating concern over it's gender in a remark about "male violence." She appears to lack some basic understanding. Violence and rape don't have a gender, just as infanticide doesn't have a gender. Also, robbery doesn't have a race, and fraud doesn't have a religion. Of course, if one were attempting to cultivate public hatred, crimes might be rhetorically associated with characteristics of human identity to considerable effect.

As example, today's reporting on news.com.au from 18 July referred, correctly to violence by women, and not "female violence" which might have irresponsibly suggested that something about stomping on a teenager's head was innately feminine.

Referring back to Shepherd's mischaracterization of Dr Canning's views, "lying bitches" might have be pulled from from a reader's comment on one of more than 1200 articles on AVfM. But that phrase forms no part of this human rights movement's standard rhetoric, which if Shepherd were a journalist, she would know.

Shepherd's article includes a sub-heading imputing hate, and further implying a reliance on rather uninformative invective:
"Hate site's motto is 'Fking their st up' "Linked to site to name, shame "bitches"

The site's motto, which is printed directly under A Voice for Men is "take the red pill." This is a metaphor for preferring a possibly uncomfortable reality over comforting illusion.

But motto or not, Shepherd doesn't even get the verb tense right. It's not the transitive,

Tory, it's the imperative. Not fucking, just fuck, you see? (Sigh, must I do everything for you?)

In addition, she makes a reference to a registry of criminals, aggregated from online news reportage. Unfortunately, Shepherd insists on referring to these individuals as "bitches". By contrast, the registry lists them by category of criminal offense.

Shepherd also notes that Betty McLellan is a contributing author on a site called Radfem Hub, apparently unaware of the indictment of Mclennan in that admission. RadFem Hub is the online collective whose members, a collection of lawyers, authors, teachers, child care workers and social workers cheered and lionized fellow contributor Pam O'Shaughnessy's published desire to eugenically exterminate the male half of the human race. In the comments threads – there was also advocacy for child murder, sex targeted infanticide and the murder of women who failed to see the rightness of these violent intentions.

Shepherd refers to AVfM – which exposed, and opposes this murder advocacy as a "hate site". It is a peculiar form of journalistic integrity which can paint opposition to mass murder as hate. Is it possible that Shepherd herself sees merit in the plans of radical gender ideologues to murder children and plan for long term eugenic extermination of humans based on their sex? I wouldn't bet on no. I dislike the idea of murder, particularly of children, and so I don't defend advocates of murder and child abuse in my writing.

The Australian blogger does manage to get a few things right, areas of concern of human rights activists in the MRM include the incentivized rise of false rape allegations, so easy and consequence free a hotel maid ended the career of the former chairman of the IMF, based on an accusation now proven false.

"She lied about sex. She lied about money. She even lied about lying. That's the conclusion of Manhattan Prosecutors"[2]

A practice in the grievance industry of perpetuating a factually false picture of domestic violence is another area of concern, serving the dual purposes of vilifying men, and tugging the right emotional note to access everybody's wallet for donations – the standard Duluthian story of violent men beating innocent female victims has the further problem that it is guaranteed to perpetuate domestic violence. Addressing a social problem from a dysfunctional, broken model is guaranteed to fail. Something the DV services agencies almost certainly know. But it keeps them funded, so who cares right?

It is apparently too difficult to grasp that men – including MRAs would like to see a more effective model for reducing and eliminating domestic violence.

In 2010 Christina Hoff Sommers described the persistence of the grievance industry's mythology in the following terms:

"We're not talking about a few errors. We're not talking about occasional lapses. We're talking about a body of egregiously false information at the heart of the domestic violence movement. False claims are pervasive. False claims are not the exception, they are the rule."

Shepherd also says in her article that Dr Canning "does, however, talk about false rape allegations on the site, a topic that is a core issue to AVFM." , by "talk" , she implies "writes". But Dr Canning has not written about false rape allegations, only about false accusations of DV. Obviously though, rape has much more emotive potential than ordinary violence for the purpose of selling advertising on news.com.au. Also, if you're accustomed to tossing empty accusations around freely, blurring one category of crime into another is no big deal.

I have a question though, aren't the editors of "news" publications supposed to fact-check before they publish? Also, isn't rhetorical discipline something taught at journalism school?

Speaking of which, the term used by Shepherd to describe human rights activists she apparently disagrees with as "extremists". Obviously, opinion journalism laden with empty invective, accusation and characterization, and lacking substance to justify such prevalent ad-hominem does betray the lack of a legitimate counter argument. However, "extremist" is of another character, it is a clear imputation of violent capacity. Recall as well that RadFem hub – where the eugenic extermination of male human beings is promoted and cheered – that's not a hate site, but AVfM, where violence is explicitly rejected – in Tory's world – we're a hate site.

I'm going to borrow from my own recent writing to draw an informative parallel with the foreign policy of the United States of America. Every 3 to 8 years, the US positions itself to invade, bomb, and strangle another country through trade embargo. In essence, the US is making a new war on somebody, somewhere a couple times each decade. However, before any of the poor and working class kids get shipped off to foreign climes to shoot a bunch of the locals, an information war emerges through America's information/entertainment networks. Colloquially called news, the infotainment machine churns out a stream of characterization, vilification, straw man arguments painting the country about to be invaded as an imminent, and dangerous threat. And thus, public support for ensuing military aggression is fabricated.

That's the likely reason for Tory's use of "extremists" to describe bloggers in a human rights movement. The word carries all the imagery of AK-48 armed Shiites and suicide bombers in the the most violently inflamed parts of the world, and this Australian columnist uses it to describe a human rights movement for whom aggressive activism amounts to putting up posters which include the phrase "had enough of this shit yet?"

How better to facilitate a climate in which violence becomes acceptable, than by painting the intended targets of that violence with an inflammatory label like "extremists."

If Tory Shepherd had done the research being an actual journalist entails – she would know that violence by proxy is identifiable by the tactics she is pleased to employ in her squalid opinion-reporting.

To the question of, does Tory Shepherd support eugenic extermination of humans by sex, I will add a new question. Does Tory Shepherd acknowledge that when her ideological beliefs are challenged, her preferred solution is violence through proxy?

But returning to claims from Shepherd again, in citing her, I've replaced her most dishonest and irresponsible use of "extremest" with "activist", for obvious reasons, and replaced her use of "men" with "human", because it is not clear she understands that one group is a subset of the other.

Human rights activists "claim women often invent rape, either because they regret sex or because they want to frame men."

They are not the only ones making such a claim.

A longitudinal study[3] conducted by Professor Eugene Kanin concluded that over a period of nine years, 41% of rape allegations studied were fraudulent, concocted by the alleged victim to either create an alibi, seek attention and sympathy, or to seek revenge. There is also the McDowell Study cited by Warren Farrell inThe Myth of Male Power, which concluded that of 1,218 reported rapes on Air Force Bases around the world, 45% were discovered to be fraudulent.

Of course, if Tory Shepherd were a journalist, I would not be required to do her research for her. I will be sending my invoice to Tory's publishers, since I appear to be stuck doing her job for her.

"The Baltimore Police Department has for the past four years recorded the highest percentage of rape cases that officers conclude are false or baseless of any city in the country, according to The Baltimore Sun's review of FBI data"[4]

"Dundee woman to await sentence for false claim of rape"[5]

"Woman jailed for 15 days for false rape accusation."[6]

"A 23-year-old Washington woman who admitted she lied when she said her father raped her won't be facing any charges."[7]

"A teenage girl whose false rape allegation led to an innocent man being beaten up and another man sent to jail was let off by police with just an £80 fixed penalty notice."[8]

Tory also apparently doubts a statement made by Dr Canning in her interview with him: "Women, literally, get away with murder"[1]

Do I need to actually paste another list of news clippings into the body of this article? Really?

Casey Anthony, and Crystal Dawn Mckenzie, for starters. Register-her also has a category for murderers, although in observance of lack of conviction, it is listed "killers". In many cases the victims are children. That site, however, does not have a category for "lying bitches", since mainstream media doesn't publish reporting on that particular social faux pas.

To my previous two questions:

Does Shepherd see merit in the plans of radical gender ideologues to murder children and plan for long term eugenic extermination of humans based on their sex?

Is Tory Shepherd's preferred solution to cognitive dissonance cultivation of violence through proxy?

Now I will add a third question:

Is Tory Shepherd capable of separating reality from her own fantasies? I'll hazard a guess the answer to this is no, which throws doubt on the choice to pursue a career in -ahem- journalism.

Of course , The Australian blogger also mentions past disagreement between the gender ideologue Dr Micheal Flood and Dr Canning.

Floods take on the problem of false rape accusation is that it dis-empowers victims and protecting perpetrators. When accusations are false, and they often are – the claim of "perpetrators" is completely specious – since excluding the accusers, there are none in a false accusation. However, this rhetoric is the standard politically correct line of police departments whenever they request the public to not make false accusations, because it dis-empowers the real victims of rape. No mention is ever made of the destroyed lives of the falsely accused. No mention of families torn apart, children denied access to their parents, and the outward spreading splash damage which reverberates through the lives of relatives and friends for decades after a false accusation. No, just that it dis-empowers actual rape victims.

According to Shepherd, "Flood also said the internet could be a dangerous place for women, particularly feminist women."[1]

In other words, the internet is where bad ideas come to die.

Flood's words: "The internet has provided a forum for more extreme and vitriolic beliefs" were of course, not referring to the calls for mass murder of men and boys by feminists, nor of enforced castration. No, he also didn't mean the long-term feminist goal of reversing the burden of proof in criminal trials to a pre-magna-carta: – assumed guilty, and must prove innocence.

Nope, when Flood talks about "extreme and vitriolic beliefs" he's referring to human rights activists who rigidly and strictly reject violence.

Although, flood almost manages to separate women – a group of people, from feminism, an ideology formed from bad ideas, when he says:

"..anti-feminist men can voice the most hostile and toxic kinds of attacks, particularly against feminist women."

With just a little more thinking, Dr Flood might manage to separate the gender ideology built on hate and violence – from people identifiable by their sex as women. It's an easy distinction to make. One is a group of people, many of whom are entirely lovely. The other is an ideology. They can even be told apart by their different spellings.

But this leaves me with one more question to add to my list of three.

Does Tory Shepherd think that women; a group of people, and spelled starting with a W, and feminism; an ideology built from hate and violence- which starts with F, are actually the same thing?

If so, this might explain why opposition to an ideology of gender is categorized by her as “hate”.

This will be added to the previous three questions, which are:

Is Tory Shepherd capable of separating reality from her own fantasies?

Is Tory Shepherd’s preferred solution to cognitive dissonance cultivation of violence through proxy?

Does Shepherd see merit in the plans of radical gender ideologues to murder children and plan for long term eugenic extermination of humans based on their sex?

Addendum: Readers of this article who share the author’s disagreement with the stated views of Australian blogger Tory Shepherd are encouraged to contact her by email or through comments on her articles, sharing the specifics of that disagreement.

Kindly do not extend that sharing of views to include threats of violence, or damage to property. Behaviour which falls squarely into the category of rad-fem idiot-fuckery. Let’s not become what we’re opposing.

But seriously, she didn’t even get the site’s moto right. It’s: Take the red pill, Tory.

The radfem conquest of Sweden

July 19, 2012 | by James Williams | Link | Original Link

When I was a young boy I asked my parents what there was to stop another Hitler coming to power. They assured me that there were various democratic processes that would safeguard against such a thing ever happening.

Many years on and due to life's experiences, I have been brought to the conclusion that a psychopathic power will not be prevented by democratic processes from gaining control so long as they don't wear a funny mustache.

> "It cannot be bargained with. It cannot be reasoned with and it will never stop, ever!"

That is a quote from the movie Terminator. Though taken from a fictional story it has some degree of aptness as regards the stance of radical feminism's ambitions based on an unswerving hatred and intended harm that is the trademark of their mental condition.

Radical feminism has declared its psychosis by expressing its desire to destroy the male gender or to harm as many males as possible. As with all extremism, it does not matter about the quality, majesty or beauty of those who are targeted, nor their obvious innocence in the eyes of most normal people. The psychopathic mind creates its own logic. It attaches blame and vilification to those it chooses to demonize and persecute. It does so without remorse or compassion and those that appeal for mercy or compromise cannot expect any.

Some hope that a solution can be found by working together. However, the feminist's imperious influence which has moved them into controlling funding sources; colonization of body politic thinking; plus their dominance in mainstream media and charitable institutions gives them such a powerful position that there is no reason for them to bargain away any concessions to the inferior sex. Feminism acts like a shark consuming and campaigning to change society into a society where misandry is the norm and men are the despised underclass.

To see what sort of future we may expect I looked to Sweden (population 9.5 million) to see how that country was conquered by Radical Feminism.

I recently bought a kindle version of a book by Oscar Swartz called "A Brief History of Swedish Sex: How the Nation that Gave Us Free Love Redefined Rape and Declared War on Julian Assange" It cost just £5 from Amazon.

The book gives a chronological account of how Sweden was transformed from being a so called utopian 'liberal democracy' into a modern day totalitarian witchocracy. It is a destiny that Australia is frighteningly staring down the barrel of unless the political and legislative classes there can miraculously find the courage to stand up for common sense.

Sweden is a showpiece example of how ridiculously scary Radical Feminist rule is and how Sweden is an international embarrassment. Hotel workers there are trained to spy on their guests in case they should indulge in any untoward sexual activity. To be male is to be regarded by some as equivalent to Taliban terrorism. A girl being teased on a school bus can try to claim rape because she thought the boys' willies stood up.

Leading Swedish Radfem academics, Professor Christian Diesen and Eva Diesen from Stockholm University published a book calling, not for 200 men to be convicted of rape each year but 25,000. "The average Swedish man should ideally spend a year of his life in gaol [jail] due to poor sexual interaction with women."

In the blind insanity amongst the political classes the drive for 'one upmanship' has left Swedish citizens with no electoral choices as the different political parties seek to show off who can be more feminist by calling for ever stiffer penalties against men only. Sex is not illegal to sell, only to be perceived to buy.

The dark tide of tyranny, directed at a single sex has created a misandric paradigm that can only be described as psychotic as the Nazis or Stalinists ever were. Sweden is a dream society for radfems where a man, accused of rape, has to prove his innocence. Anyone with an ounce of logic will know that to prove a non-event is extremely difficult.

Below is an extract from Oscar Swartz's book. It is an account of what happened to 18 year old Joakim who fell out with his girlfriend. He is now one of the 200 men being convicted of rape each year, most on bogus charges.[box type="alert" icon="none"]

25 September 2010. Teenage couple breaks up

Joakim, 18, spends an evening at his computer. He is in his boy's room in his mother's four room apartment. As usual he has spent some time with his girlfriend. She often stays over at his place as she has a lot of conflicts with her parents. The pair has sex practically every time they meet, oral as well as vaginal, which is no secret to the mother as the flat is not very sound proof. Sweden is still quite tolerant in these matters: Young people can have sex at home. The girlfriend herself says that they have a good relationship and that they like each other. They watch movies, meet friends and make trips on his moped. This evening she goes to bed while Joakim stays at his computer.

Before he goes to bed, he gets horny and wants to poke some fun at his sleeping girlfriend. He swings his penis in the air in front of her face and let's it caress her between the lips to wake her up. She does, but dizzy with sleep she asks what he is doing, pushes him away, turns over and falls to sleep again.

Next day the girlfriend is picked up by her mother who brings her shopping for a journey she actually doesn't want to make: Going to Finland with her parents on September 27 – 29. She would rather have stayed with Joakim. He calls her 2-3 times every day from his mother's phone on her Finland tour to keep the girlfriend's spirits up. When she returns from Finland she spends the night with him and they have sex as always.

On Saturday October 2, Joakim had to see his grandparents. He had promised to call his girlfriend the minute he returned home. He did not however, thinking it was too late. She is disappointed and wakes him up by a call the following morning and complains. The quarrel ends by Joakim saying that she has 24 hours to decide whether to continue seeing him. She says she does not want to stay together. Joakim returns her belongings.

5 April 2011,

Joakim sentenced to prison for rape The sentence against Joakim, 18, is passed for the events on September 25, 2010. He gets four months' imprisonment for rape and is convicted of paying damages to his ex-girlfriend. The girlfriend considered Joakim being the one breaking up although he only took her at her word and handed back her belongings.

The subsequent day she met her social worker to talk about her problems with her parents that she so far had been able to flee from to Joakim. She wondered what would happen if she would now report that Joakim one week earlier had woken her up with his penis between her lips. The social worker checked with the Police who said that in legal terms it could be a crime. The girl then reported her former boyfriend Joakim to them and asked for large damages. A chat conversation had been saved and used as evidence in court: "i put my cock in ur mouth once for 3 sec when u slept (…) did i force u to have it? it dont count as trying rape, just if i had continued, i stopped at once, i fucking tested it one time"

Three seconds of bodily touching between two persons in a relationship who normally have sex – including oral – every time they meet is however regarded as a serious crime in Sweden. It does not matter that they after this incident had sex as usual as soon as they were reunited after her trip to Finland. In the judgment one can read:

"Through the information it is proven that Joakim NNN at the time has put his erect penis in A's mouth through improperly exploiting that she due to sleep was in a helpless state. The district court also finds that there has been a question of a sexual act that with with regard to the nature of the violation and the circumstances in general, is comparable to sexual intercourse. Joakim NNN is therefore guilty of rape (…) Rape according to Chapter 6, Article 1, second paragraph of the Penal Code carries a penalty of imprisonment for at least two years and a maximum of six years. If the offense under the circumstances is to be regarded as less serious, the sentence (…) is imprisonment not exceeding four years. If, in view of the circumstances , the crime is considered less aggravated, a sentence to imprisonment for at most four years shall, according the third paragraph, be imposed. (…) In this case, it has been the case of a short-term events. Joakim NNN has suspended his act as soon as A woke up and made it clear to him that she did not accept his actions. No violence or threat has been present. The District Court therefore finds that Joakim NNN shall be sentenced for rape under Chapter 6, Article 1, third paragraph of the Penal Code."

If the proposal from the Center Party (c) in the Parliament on March 2, 2005, had won, 18-year-old Joakim would have been sentenced to two years' imprisonment for his three-second contact between his and his girlfriend's bodies that he immediately interrupted when she woke up, pushed him away and turned over to sleep again. If the current development of Justice policy proceeds it could very well be that ordinary bedroom behavior between two partners can lead to two years' imprisonment. The ex-girlfriend demanded that Joakim pay 75,000 SEK (10,440 USD) in damages for the violation and 10,000 SEK (1,400 USD) for pain and suffering. The judge lowered this to 25,000 SEK (3,480 USD) and 5,000 SEK (700 USD) respectively. In the publicly available judgment the name, personal registration number, and address of the sentenced perpetrator Joakim is obviously written out. There is however no information whatsoever about the girlfriend, since her name is classified as secret, as always in rape cases in Sweden. We cannot even know her age. Due to her school situation (High School) she should be between 16 and 18. Age is not a case. She was in no way underage since the age of consent is 15 in Sweden."

AVfM Radio: The value of male sexuality

July 19, 2012 | by AVfM Radio | Link | Original Link

What is the value of sexuality? How to we determine the social value of gender, whether male or female – and how do those coins compare to one another?

How closely tied to the energy economy of our bodies production of gamete cells is our relative sexual value as social entities? How much of the encumbrance of adornment in the form of jewelry, make up and affectation of attire is socially economical in a trade off for status? Does the ideologues of gender recognize the selective power afforded to individuals for whom gamete cells are biologically expensive? Will a coinage of human sexual worth ever be formally recognized in our courts?

These questions, and several others will be addressed on AVFM Radio tonight by John the Other, Girl Writes What, and Typhon Blue.

The value of male sexuality

July 20, 2012 | by Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) | Link | Original Link

Quick. What's the usual script we have playing in the back of our minds regarding hookup culture? You know, that awful symptom of the cultural degradation of women by men exploiting female sexuality for a cheap thrill?

It probably goes something like this.

Woman: "I'm a precious flower of womanhood who just happens to be hanging out in a bar in a bikini top completely by accident; I just floated in on the breeze."

Man: "Hark, precious flower of womanhood, let me crush your innocent and beautiful spirit with my filthy sexual arsenal! Ka-POW!"

Woman: "Oh, I am despoiled! Truly hookup culture is an exploitation of me and my pure-as-the-driven-snow sisters!"

We have this attitude toward hookup culture because we are convinced that male sexuality has no value. Not even no value, we think male sexuality has negative value.

Men sow their seed hither and yon; women guard their vaginas like Fort Knox.

But is this true?

Let's think about it logically. With each act of sex a male ejaculates semen into the female. This is an investment of physical resources that takes time for the male to replenish. So male animals are limited in how often they can have reproductively viable sex. Female animals, on the other hand, are not. The sex act has zero cost to them.

Now, the reason this obvious truth is invisible to us is because we lump in the cost of carrying young with the cost of sex. Yes, carrying young is high female investment but the sex act itself is higher male investment.

For humans who are often trying to avoid the hassle of pregnancy, this makes some sense. For female animals, it makes no sense. The whole purpose for a female animal, in going into heat, is to get pregnant. Because that's her instinctive imperative, the hassle of pregnancy is irrelevant to her cost of sex.

In fact, for female mammals, the real risk is investing resources in sub-par offspring. Because of this it's in their best interest to have sex with as many males in as short a time as possible. Multiple male partners improve both her chance of conception and the quality of the conception via sperm competition. This is why the majority of female mammals are polyandrous—they mate with multiple males.

It is not, however, in the best interest of the male animal to mate with as many females as possible.

Why? Because, quite simply, his sperm is in limited supply. He wants to prioritize delivery of sperm to a.) high quality females and b.) less mated females.

Our 'common knowledge' about so-called male promiscuity is better termed common stupidity.

Further, the relative costs of sex and the priorities of both males and females explain why a male mammal might evolve to pair bond.

A pair-bonding male has maximized his access to a less mated female. He does trade off in terms of access to a higher quality female than himself—higher quality in terms of status and fertility—but he is less likely to obtain this higher quality female and, overall, he's better off as a pair bonder then a promiscuous breeder.

What's less understandable is why a female animal would evolve to seek a pair-bond. She gains nothing at all from restricting her sexual choices.

To see why a female mammal might pair bond let's take a closer look at human sexuality. Human males are unique in the animal kingdom in that they retain an interest in sex throughout the female's cycle.

Some biologists conjecture that the human mating pattern—retaining an interest in sex outside of fertile times—is a way for pair-bonding to become more attractive to the male.

But what if it's the reverse? What if male human sexuality is designed this way to keep sexually carnivorous females interested in just one male?

Human women are rather poor breeders over all. It takes a lot of 'tries' for a woman to get pregnant. Compare this to female animals that have one day of receptivity and most of them are pregnant by the end of that day.

What's happening with women is that they are conceiving, nearly every month, but the conception is usually flushed out due to chromosomal errors. Estimates put the number of blighted ovum at 80% of all conceptions.

This may be due to a lack of sperm competition; instead of filtering out the bad through sperm competition, the bad is transferred to conception resulting in a high rate of malformed zygotes.

But why would this wasteful system have developed in the first place?

Well, for starters it requires human women to secure access to sperm at least once a month twelve to eight times a year to achieve one viable conception. At that point developing an ongoing relationship with someone who can provide her access to sex is looking pretty damn attractive to our female hominid ancestor.

And then we add in the fact that human males are so goddamn finicky. When our female hominid ancestor finds one that's actually responsive to her—remember, we didn't evolve with porn, Viagra or tremendous social shaming to create artificially inflated male sexual receptivity—she's likely inclined to keep a tight hold because of the scarceness of the sexual resource he's providing her. Which she's suddenly evolved to need a lot of over an extended period of time to get pregnant.

Bada-bing-bada-boom. Pair bonded female.

However that pair bonded human female probably still has urges to get her monkey on.

Ironically when we look at hookup culture through the lens of human sexuality – which female mammals actually have, as opposed to the absurdly idealized Common Stupidity that fantasizes that only men do — it becomes quickly apparent that it's HOG HEAVEN for a woman's inner-ape.

Hook up culture gives the chimp-within every woman the impression she has unlimited access to sperm from males who are higher status and higher fertility then herself.

By contrast a male mammal preferentially wants to breed with a). higher status females and b.) less mated females, to get the best bang for his genetic buck.

Remember that stereotypical hook up scenario presented in the beginning? The predatory male inflicting his horrible sexuality on the pure and virtuous female? In the average hook up culture scenario reality is the exact opposite.

Women are exercising their animalistic desires while men are suppressing theirs.

Let's strip away the Common Stupidity and listen in on the reality of the hook up scenario.

Woman: Hi, I stink of numerous other men's intimate attention and I'm about half as attractive as you. Shall we go through a social dance in which you pretend that you're getting something worth having from me?

Man: My natural instincts tell me to hold on to my sexual resources for high status, unmated females, but you're granting me access to the one thing I've been trained all my life to respond to like a performing monkey. Do you mind if a part of me weeps silently while we have sex?

Woman: Whatever. As long as I get my ape on, I couldn't care less.

Hitting out

July 21, 2012 | by Andy Thomas | Link | Original Link

It was the mid-1980s, and I was fourteen years old. I'd recently seen the movie An Officer and a Gentlemen, and became interested in karate as a result.

Now, I ask you, what teenage boy wouldn't want to do karate after watching that movie?

I think the scene where teenage Zack gets beaten up by a Filipino gang did more to get young boys involved in martial arts than anything else at the time. It certainly worked on me, and I started attending a local karate club shortly after. I became reasonably good at karate over the next year or so.

I'm not sure whether, if I'd have continued, I would have become exceptional or anything, but I was keen and that's what mattered. And I certainly looked up to the instructor of the club—he was a strong male role model for me, and I would have followed his every instruction without question. If he had told me to jump off a cliff as part of a martial arts training exercise, I would have done so without too much hesitation.

But there were some unhappy aspects of my childhood. I didn't mix too well, and in some ways, the truth was that I lonely and isolated. I spent most of my time reading science books, programming computers and listening to classical music. In fact, I thought that everybody my age did those kind of things, but later, I would learn that this wasn't the case. An interest in the opposite sex didn't happen for me until I was seventeen years old, but around the age of fourteen to fifteen, the only things I cared about were computers, electronics and science.

So getting involved in martial arts was an important break for me. It gave me an interest that was not solitary in nature, and it did a lot for my self-esteem. But then one week, a sequence of events would have unfortunate consequences for me. These are memories I've not been back to for a very long time.

The club I attended practised the Shotokan style of karate, and during training sessions, we would often find a partner and spar with each other. I liked sparring session best of all, because it was competitive. It was kind of like play fighting I guess, but it wasn't full contact and pretty harmless. However, I recall that in one of these sessions I was tapped on the shoulder by a woman who had been sparring with someone else behind to me. She told me that I had caught her hand with a stray kick. I hadn't realised, but she seemed OK, so I apologized and thought nothing more of it at the time.

Later the same week, there was another, but unrelated incident. An older woman attended the club one evening. She was in her forties perhaps. As far as I can remember, it was the first and only time she came, and as we often did, we paired up for a sparring session that evening. I found myself in the unfortunate situation of having to pair up with her.

Looking back now, it's obvious to me that a genuine desire to learn karate was not the real reason she was there. I suspect that there had been some anguish in her life, and perhaps she was there because she wanted to learn “self defence”. I don’t know, but whatever the reason, the only thing she wanted to do that night was to hit out at a male—any male. And a fifteen year old boy would do.

She came at me, her face contorted in rage, wildly swinging hook punches. This wasn’t karate at all! Confused, I simply moved around and avoided all contact with her. At the end of the session I went to shake her hand, which was the custom, but she walked off toward the instructor. A few seconds later, he called me over.

When I got there, I caught the end of her calmly explaining how I had hit her. It wasn’t true, but I never got the chance say a word.

Without, a second thought, the instructor turned to me and “punched” me in the stomach. He held back the blow, so the effect was more one of shock rather than physical harm. He said something about not hitting women and told me to get back in line. I just kind of accepted my “punishment” because I didn’t really understand what had just happened. I remember thinking it was a bit unfair, but I don’t recall reading too much into it at the time. I was more confused than anything. I never saw her again anyway, but things didn’t end there.

I turned up for training at the club, as usual, the following week. What I didn’t know then was that the first women, the woman who I had accidentally clipped with a stray kick the week earlier, had spoken to the instructor since. She had, apparently, received a fractured bone in her wrist. I say “apparently” because I hadn’t known about it—I only learned that information quite sometime later through a chance encounter. However, on the basis of what he heard, the instructor had decided that he was going to teach me a lesson, I guess.

Toward the end of the class, he interrupted training and asked me to come out to front, where he had pulled out a table. He told me to get on it and to start doing press-ups, which I did. This went on for quite some time, and I began to struggle because the sweat that was dripping from me on to the smooth table surface was causing my feet to slide uncontrollably.

Next, he suggested that we spar—just him and me—in front of the class. As a lanky teenager against a fast and powerful adult black belt, I stood absolutely no chance. Time and again, he punched me in the forehead and my legs buckled underneath me, and each time he dragged me up by my hair and forced me to carry on.

In reality, the attack was controlled and I suspect that his targeting of my forehead, rather than landing punches on my nose, was deliberate. Nevertheless, it was a public beating and a humiliation that was intended to be some kind of example. Eventually it ended, and so did the class. In the changing room later, a guy told me that he thought what had just happened was “wrong”.

I cried while cycling home that night, without actually knowing why.

I went back to the club a few times, but my heart was never in it after that and I soon stopped going. I switched from karate to running, fell back into solitary activities, and spent my evenings with computers, electronics, physics books and science fiction. People were too difficult, confusing and painful for me.

I had lost something important that night.

Afterword. I originally wrote this as an experiment in challenging society's attitudes toward males. However, the account is entirely true—it happened to me. But it's not your sympathy I want, but for you to ask yourself a few questions…

In the text, I qualify the woman's actions with, "I suspect that there had been some anguish in her life." Maybe you felt a little sympathy for her, despite her anger? I certainly did, and in fact, it felt almost obligatory for me to put in some kind of compassionate justification for her behaviour in there. But then I asked myself, why? Would I have been so considerate if she had been a he, for example?

Ask yourself this…

What would your reaction be on reading a story in which a 40 year old man turns up to a karate club one night and deliberately attempts to punch a 15 year old girl in the face?

No doubt you would simply regard him as a monster, and nothing more. Please don't misunderstand me; this isn't about a bad woman or a bad man, it is about the double-standards in our attitudes.

Moreover, were the actions of the club instructor in my story not really based on misguided notions of chivalry, rather than any rational assessment of the situation? Is it not true that it is often males who display prejudice to other males, but it is not actually regarded as prejudice in our society? Would he have been so willing to beat up a 40 year old woman, had he known the truth, I wonder? (I'm not suggesting that's what he should have done.)

Finally, I also wanted to communicate that men and boys have feelings—we hurt. Not just physically, but emotionally too. It seems that this needs to be said, because male suffering often goes unseen and unacknowledged. In fact, hostility toward males is normalized in the media to such an extent that males are seen as legitimate targets of aggression. How often do you see TV shows or commercials where a man gets slapped in the face or kicked in the groin, and invited to laugh?

The Commissioner for Discrimination Against Men

July 21, 2012 | by Greg Canning | Link | Original Link

The Australian Human Rights Commission's vision is:

> Human rights: everyone, everywhere, everyday

The "Sex Discrimination" section headed by commissioner Elizabeth Broderick states on its web page;

> Gender equality is a principle that lies at the heart of a fair and productive society. It is also the key goal of the Sex Discrimination Act 1984, which aims to eliminate discrimination and sexual harassment and promote greater equality in all aspects of the Australian community. [1]

One could be forgiven for thinking that "human rights for everyone" and "gender equality in all aspects of the Australian community" would mean gender equality for women and men, but you would be dead wrong.

Men are largely excluded from the "everyone" or as an "aspect of the Australian community" worthy of the commissioner's attention as her record of lack of advocacy on behalf of men clearly shows.

When questioned about this anomaly by a colleague Broderick appeared to take delight in pointing out to him that legislation governing whom the commission is to serve does not make explicit mention of men and therefore she was not obliged to address any general concerns regarding discrimination against males…. or words to that effect.

However the legislation does explicitly mention women, indeed the first aim of the Sex Discrimination Act 1984 (The Act) is "(a) to give effect to certain provisions of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women and to provisions of other relevant international instruments;"

If men are considered "persons" (and it's far from clear that Broderick gives them this acknowledgement) then some of their rights are covered under aim (b):

(b) to eliminate, so far as is possible, discrimination against persons on the ground of sex, marital status, pregnancy or potential pregnancy or breastfeeding in the areas of work, accommodation, education, the provision of goods, facilities and services, the disposal of land, the activities of clubs and the administration of Commonwealth laws and programs;

It is true that individual men can make claim regarding discrimination on the grounds of their sex in any of those areas mentioned.

Aim (d) of The Act states:

(d)"to promote recognition and acceptance within the community of the principle of the equality of men and women."

Australia is renowned as the land of a "fair go" for all, but not in Broderick's estimation. She is still somehow able to rationalize that advocacy for only one gender is consistent with the aims and of The Act.

Whereas "eliminating all forms of discrimination against men" is not specifically mentioned in the act, if the commissioner chose to embrace Aim (d), "the principle of equality of men and women," she would have legislative latitude for advocacy for men's issues as well as women's. Instead she rejects men's concerns, and hypocritically sets herself up as a prime example of gender discrimination, the antithesis of the essence of The Act, rather the champion for gender equity she should be.

It is not surprising that my representation to Broderick earlier this year endorsed by many prominent advocates for men's, father's and children's rights failed to penetrate her closed mind. She was asked to consider 4 key areas in which men suffer disadvantage and unfair discrimination in contemporary Australia. These included educational disadvantage, health disadvantage, gender bias in the family court and lack of acknowledgement and services for male victims of violence. [2]

In response she chose not to mention any of these issues and proceeded to enlighten me on the impacts she was making on behalf of men's wellbeing as a spinoff of focusing only on women's issues.

Broderick is an ardent supporter of The National Council's Plan for Australia to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, 2009-2021[3] – a document that proposes a group of draconian anti-male measures including the introduction of differential laws for men accused of (i.e. without proof of wrongdoing) domestic violence, under a broadened definition which includes many subjective and non-physically violent behaviors commonly manifest by both genders in relationship conflict. But she fails to identify the conflict in promotion of discriminatory laws and her role as "Sex Discrimination Commissioner."

Admixed with other bureaucratic palaver in her response, she highlights her "Male Champions of Change" initiative as a great achievement in gender equality. [4]

For those not familiar with the Male Champions of Change, Broderick enlisted the services of some 23 male CEO's and enticed them into joining her push for parity representation of women on Company Boards.[5]

Swane O'Pie, in his excellent book Exposing Feminism: The Thirty Years War Against Men (the UK edition titled Why Britain Hates Men)[6] discusses at length the feminist move from equality of opportunity to numerical equivalence of outcomes, and how this creates an easily sold illusion of discrimination when none actually exists, leading to special treatment and privileges for women via affirmative action, women's programs and quotas.

It is interesting to note in line with changing feminist doctrine the Australian Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission (HREOC) in 2009 changed its name to simply the Australian Human Rights Commission. Broderick's aim apparently, to argue for "equality of outcomes" (not a human right but a Marxist ideal) and for special privileges, rather than the human right of equality of opportunity. [7]

O'Pie cites Catherine Hakim's research and theory[8] which contends that the "work ethic" of women can be classified into three groups. 1. Family Centered (17%) – women who are happy to be homemakers and would prefer to devote all their time and energy to that endeavor if possible. 2. Adaptive women (69%) who want to combine work and family and prefer lower stress part time employment to facilitate this and 3. Work Centered (14%)– women whose main focus in life is their career, many of whom are childless and feminist.

These categories remain remarkably constant across different demographic groups within the UK and other European counties. By contrast, most men are work centered, as societies gender roles expect them to be. Most women also expect this, earning capacity being the prime consideration of hypegamous women seeking partners.

Pushing for gender equal representation at company board level and ignoring women's own work choices is only addressing the interests of a small minority of women who, despite already having the opportunity, now want special help to compete with a much larger pool of men desirous of those positions. Indeed, achieving equal representation of women at board level would be proof positive of active discrimination against men, hence I propose that Broderick be better known as the Commissioner for Discrimination Against Men.

Broderick's discrimination against men is manifest, but even so she is not averse to driving the point home with petty vindictiveness. The Commissioner for Discrimination Against Men declined to add a single web page, promoting International Men's Day to the Australian Human Rights Commission's established extensive web infrastructure because and I quote:

> Since the Commission's resources are limited, we unfortunately, do not have the capacity to assist with or facilitate the development of a web page for International Men's Day.[9]

Anyone with a passing knowledge of IT issues will understand that the cost involved would be negligible, so the claim of limited resources is false.

What Broderick is really saying is "FUCK YOU", I don't have to do anything to help men and I won't.

Well, Elizabeth, in my view and in that of most men who bother to think about it, you are disgrace to your official title and the office you hold. You will be known amongst men and women who value gender equity as the Commissioner for Discrimination Against Men.

Congratulations and fuck you, too.

With kind regards,

Greg Canning

Vladek Filler back in the news

Since we started AVfM we have never used the feature section to run links to other news stories. Today is an exception. Most of you will be well aware of the saga of Vladek Filler, the Ellsworth, Maine man who was completely railroaded by the corrupt prosecutor’s office that employs Mary Kellett.

Filler was prosecuted, convicted, had the conviction overturned due to prosecutorial misconduct, was retried and then acquitted of sexual assault charges stemming from a false allegation from his then wife, Ligia Filler. That false accusation was knowingly prosecuted by Kellett, who violated numerous legal canons in the process.

The story is back in the news today, with reporting on Kellett’s upcoming hearing at the Maine Bar of Overseers for prosecutorial conduct. What you will read at the link below is only part of the story. There will be more to come on this travesty of justice in the coming weeks, here at AVfM and on AVfM Radio.

Publisher's note: This article was written after Krista Jane Heflin faked her suicide. Nonetheless this was my reaction to her assumed death by her own hand.

Five days ago in Minneapolis, Minnesota a 20 year old woman, Krista Jane Heflin, took her own life with a gunshot. It appears, though we do not have 100% confirmation, that this is the same person who went by the name Femitheist Divine on a blog and on a Youtube Channel; a hateful and clearly disturbed individual, who, like scores of other similar persons, found refuge in radical feminism.

The events preceding her death were marked by a significant amount of public conflict with MRAs. She came under accurate and well-deserved fire for making posts that advocated murder, supported gendercide, eugenics and other forms of virulent misandry; the trademarks of both radical feminism and psychopathology; two barely discernible things.

Much will be made of that conflict. In fact, I assume we can all start the countdown till the first feminist or sycophant blog post comes out blaming the MRM, especially this site and its readers, for her self-destruction. Rather than try to understand her demise, and prevent more like it, they will simply exploit the suicide in a sick game of futrelian one-upmanship. They will pile on her corpse and pick her bones clean like vultures in order to enable the same kind of hate she expressed on her blog and in her videos, and to blame the people that would stop that hate peddling if they could.

One has to wonder why society does not see a man or woman who holds such hateful views and wishes for the extermination of half the world's population as a potential threat to themselves and others. How is it that views like hers, when wrapped up in feminism, are somehow not seen for what they are, the ranting of a lunatic who should have a proper psychiatric evaluation, not a YouTube channel and blog?

There are few certainties that will ever emerge from this story, other than the fact that a misdirected, mentally ill kid wound up on a slab in the morgue. Another is that a two year old girl is now without a mother. We can only hope that the child winds up with better, more stable parenting than she would have ever gotten from Femitheist Divine. I won't even bother asking, or trying to deduce, where the father is in this picture.

I have three hopes in this screwed up mess of human tragedy. One is that we always remember that Krista Jane Heflin is dead because of Krista Jane Heflin. She chose to die as surely as she chose to hate and call for the deaths of others. Feminists are gearing up now to crow otherwise. Let them crow and attack their words head on with everything you have.

Also, MRAs need to remember what happened when one of our brothers became despondent and made plans to end his life recently. We pulled together to help him, even as we witnessed feminists celebrating his despondency and trying to goad him into taking his life. For pity's sake, people, let's leave them as the sole inhabitants of that low ground. They are much more at home there than we are.

The last thing is that we mustn't fail to see the similarities between Femitheist Divine and the women who inhabit dens of violent insanity like Radfem Hub.

When we try to understand the depravity of people who would murder half the human race, who would seek to engineer us like strains of corn to fit their Utopian ideals, who would throw young boys through windows to their deaths and selectively abort on the basis of sex, we can get a clear picture of who they are through Feminist Divine's articulate and concise self-diagnosis as a borderline personality disorder.

I don't know if anyone could have helped this young woman. She was devastatingly sick and possibly beyond reaching. But the real problem is that this type of person does not always limit their violence to the self-inflicted variety. Heflin threatened to harm her child before taking her own life. If she had, it would not have been the first time something like that happened. These individuals are dangerous by their very nature.

That is why it is so important that we continue to confront virulent misandry and to educate the public about personality disorders and how to deal with them.

We probably don't write about it near as much as we should, but there is a clear link between BPD/NPD and phenomena like Radfem Hub. Indeed those traits are a familiar theme throughout "mainstream" feminist establishment.

I am not blaming the death of this woman on feminism. I will leave that sort of disingenuousness to the likes of Tory Shepherd. But what I will say without reservation is that the closer you look at modern feminist ideology and personality disorders the more you see they are woven together in a fabric of human pathology. Tory Shepherd is just another Krista Jane Heflin with a stronger will to survive, and more ability to harm others in the name of a virulent cause.

AVfM News and Activism show 12: an inside look at AVFM

Maine raises the bar on corruption

July 24, 2012 | by VFM News and Commentary | Link | Original Link

Maine Courts allow false evidence and Holocaust analogy to convict Vladek Filler

Per DA Carletta Bassano's demand Filler to be held at undisclosed jail during Kellett's August 30-31 disciplinary hearing.

Last week, Maine Governor Paul LePage retracted his statement and apologized for insulting Holocaust survivors with his "Gestapo" comment. Meanwhile the Maine Supreme Court approved a prosecutor's Holocaust comment used to convict Vladek Filler for a misdemeanor assault claim made by his wife.

This was a case where previously Department of Health and Human Services, 2 Guardian Ad Litems, 3 child therapists, and 2 district court judges all concluded the accuser's claims lacked credibility and the children were placed with Mr. Filler for protection from Mrs. Filler's abuse. Investigations and findings were ignored by prosecutor Mary N. Kellett and for 5 years and through 2 trials her office relentlessly sought to force a conviction and imprisonment of Mr. Filler through prosecutorial misconduct.

That malicious prosecution of Vladek Filler exposed crimes and modern day Witch Trials being committed against numerous other fathers and men by prosecutor Mary Kellett even while she faces disbarment for her misconduct in the Filler case.

Because of findings of her misconduct in the first trial and her appeal, her colleague Paul Cavanaugh handled the retrial and the second appeal. Cavanaugh inappropriately took issue before judges with Bar complaints filed against Kellett for the Filler case, internet publicity of her misconduct, calls for her removal, and with Mr. Filler gaining sole custody of his children. These issues had nothing to do with the already discredited claims brought against Filler, but it revealed why Filler was being maliciously prosecuted.

At the retrial, Cavanaugh told the jury that Ligia Filler Barrientos' effort to gain child custody from her husband was like the book and movie Sophie's Choice where she was the Jewish Sophie in the Auschwitz concentration camp forced by a Nazi to choose which of her children she would sacrifice to him.

In reality Ligia Filler Barrientos lost custody of her children due to her domestic abuse and violent psychotic episodes. Even falsely accusing her husband of sexual misconduct could not regain her parental rights, but brought a 5 year long criminal prosecution of Vladek Filler. Throughout the 5 year prosecution Filler won and maintained sole custody of his children only to be compared to a Nazi child killer before the jury.

Ironically Filler was born in Ukraine and lost numerous family members in the Holocaust. His Jewish grandfather was a WWII hero who died in battle defending his children from the Nazis. But none of this stopped the State of Maine from comparing a loving and protective father to a Nazi child murderer and misrepresenting a child abusing female as a Jewish victim in the Holocaust.

In defense of his analogy before the Maine Supreme Court, prosecutor Paul Cavanaugh argued that his Sophie's Choice example was so common that it would be like using "LOL" on the internet.

As Maine's Governor LePage did, so must Carletta Bassano's district attorney's office apologize to single fathers and victims of the Holocaust

As Maine's Governor LePage did, so must Carletta Bassano's District Attorney's office apologize to single fathers and victims of the Holocaust for comparing a known female child abuser to Sophie's choice, a selfless father to a Nazi, and the sacrifice of children to "LOL".

The Maine Supreme Court got it wrong and found no violations in the State's use of false evidence of a bruise, or with comparing a falsely accused father in a custody dispute to a Nazi child killer. And other far more serious misconduct in the "retrial" was not addressed at all by the Supreme Court.

At trial, repeatedly over objections the prosecutor was allowed to present fraudulent evidence and elicit false testimony. Defense was repeatedly barred from mentioning accuser's admissions, documents, photographs, and police reports from discovery to address prosecution's misrepresentations.

The 2nd trial judge Robert E. Murray consistently denied defense motions, and over objections allowed prosecution to present false claims and evidence to the jury. Defense was even barred from citing State's own discovery documents and police reports in response. The jury was not allowed to know the truth of Ligia Filler's perjury, her admissions, her being a known child abuser, her long history of psychiatric treatment, and false allegations of abuse against other men. Instead, through prosecutorial misrepresentations the jury was repeatedly misled to accept the opposite facts than what the case record and evidence showed.

In the middle of the 2nd trial the judge did not allow Ligia Filler to be confronted on cross examination with her handwritten list of plans and shocking admissions in her letters. With the jury kept out of the courtroom, Ligia Filler admitted she wrote a list in Spanish detailing steps she was planning to take in April 2007 prior to making claims of assault against her husband. As a result of new evidence of her perjury, Vladek Filler was threatened by prosecution with arrest and seizure of all defense documents and exhibits. Prosecution set out to obtain a warrant to seize defense's trial records during the trial.

Ligia Filler then had an episode outside the jury room and told the prosecutor she did not want to return to the stand and be confronted with more of her writings. Rather than stop the trial, the judge assured the prosecutor that defense would not be allowed to present evidence not previously disclosed to prosecution. That was an open violation of defense's legal right to present such evidence but was done to persuade Mrs. Filler to return to testify without fear of perjury.

Ligia Filler testified that she was "pushed" from a bathroom on April 20, 2007 and that assault prompted her to leave and contact police to "get" custody of her son from Vladek

Filler and have him deliver to her. She testified there was no other physical contact with her husband. When police arrived on April 22, 2007 without her son, she collapsed in the driveway and was carried in to her friend's house. Over objections prosecution was allowed to elicit testimony by asking Ligia Filler to "explain" a photograph of her bruise which appeared 4 days after the alleged "push" incident. She stated she didn't know what the bruise was when it appeared but still offered her speculation about possibly getting hurt on a kitchen chair. Defense attorney Stephen Smith objected, citing the case record and prior testimony failed to show even a casual connection of the bruise to allegations against Vladek Filler. Allowing a photograph of an unrelated bruise and its speculation was unfairly prejudicial to Filler.

The judge further barred defense from asking questions and presenting police reports which noted that Ligia Filler changed her story and that her physical examination days after the alleged incident showed no bruise on her arm, explicit denial of bruises, and a different story. One police officer testified he examined her and there was absolutely no bruise on her arm on day 3. A second police officer testified she met him on day 4 and showed him a bruise; didn't know how she got it; didn't claim she was pushed on a chair; and that the chair theory was his idea so he photographed her sitting on it showing her bruise.

In closing arguments prosecution was allowed to present different 'facts' and testimony than what was in evidence. Cavanaugh repeatedly made new and different claims to the jury of how Ligia Filler was assaulted and bruised contrary to the testimony at trial. He pled with the jury to sympathize with Mrs. Filler for losing children's custody to Mr. Filler and blamed police for failing to get her "boy back".

Cavanaugh asked the jury, "Can you imagine, do you have life experiences, common sense, what that mother must have been going through?" The jury was kept unaware of Mrs. Filler's child abuse and of Mr. Filler's legal struggle for their custody. Cavanaugh simply told the jury that Mrs. Filler was in a situation with her husband like Sophie from the book and movie Sophie's Choice. That Vladek Filler gained custody of the children simply because he "won the race to the courthouse. He got the kids."

Cavanaugh asked the jury to discount police's testimony and the State's burden of proof but instead just "Imagine if Mrs. Filler is telling the truth and police did a bad job… don't hold him accountable for what he did because the police didn't do their job[?]"

The retrial of Vladek Filler was reduced to the State telling the jury not to acquit due to absence of evidence but instead "imagine" evidence and emotions to convict him.

Evidence clearly shows that Vladek Filler is an innocent man who has been maliciously prosecuted, falsely convicted, and vindictively punished with 21 days in jail. Justice was denied to Mr. Filler and his two sons who suffered domestic violence only to endure over 5 years of prosecutorial abuse of the Hancock County district attorney's office.

As the study released this year by the Center for Public Integrity showed, Maine's judicial system is one of the top 5 most corrupt in the nation, and the Filler case is a prime example of that.

On July 16, 2012, district attorney Carletta Bassano filed a detailed personal request with the court for Vladek Filler's arrest and imprisonment. An order was issued to jail Mr. Filler precisely during the time he is to testify at assistant district attorney Mary Kellett's August 30-31 disciplinary hearing. It is clear evidence of an effort to silence Vladek Filler by detaining him so he would not be able to give testimony of the crimes being committed by Carletta Bassano's office. Vladek Filler will be held at an unknown location and given the crimes committed against him, his safety is in danger.

Two recent–and related?–internet bullying incidents

July 25, 2012 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

A shitstorm started a few weeks ago in the video gaming community when a woman named Anita Sarkeesian posted this video:

[youtube http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=l8I0Wy58adM&w=425&h=315]

A virtual tidal wave ensued, with a bunch of trolls attacking her, most of it very angry, totally inappropriate and some downright sick. Now, having been the target of a lot of internet venom in my time, including out-of-context quotations of my work, threats, name-calling, and harassment, I don't find any of that acceptable.

In some cases it works out well for the intended target, as it did here: Ms. Sarkeesian wound up getting way more money than she originally asked for from people who, presumably, were in part showing support for her against the harassers. She almost certainly feels vindicated. I would; trolls don't get their just desserts anywhere near often enough. If the goal was to change people's minds about Sarkeesian's work, it was a horrendous backfire wasn't it? In gamer terms, those who went after her got "pwned," and deserve to be mocked for it. You couldn't have done her a bigger favor.

Lost in all this, though, was that there are perfectly reasonable, rational people who have problems with the starting presumptions of Ms. Sarkeesian's project. A reasonable, rational, and non-hostile response, for example, is this one by Sarah Kite Tales:

[youtube http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=ZueOCLGt1tw&w=425&h=315]

As to why Sarkeesian got swarmed by angry responders, there are some of us who wonder if there wasn't something a little more complex than simple "misogyny" here. I have my own guesses, but until someone finds a few of these trolls and manages to pin them down–in person or on the phone I mean–and ask "OK, what exactly got you so upset that you used that kind of language?" we won't really know. We'll just assume won't we? Bad habit, that.

My own guess is that there was some misogyny there, but some of it was probably more visceral anger, which leads to the question: anger at what besides "women?" Well, the fact is, a lot of young men these days feel pretty kicked around by current culture and for a lot of them, escaping into video games is one of the only outlets where they feel like they can enjoy themselves and be good at something without feeling guilty or inferior. Having something they love attacked feels like something personal, I think.

You may not agree with my analysis, but it says something that I already expect that, if I'm not ignored completely for saying this, I'll probably get sneering contemptuous responses from those who wish to lecture me on how our society supposedly elevates boys–even though so much objective data shows that today's young men are struggling badly, very badly indeed in many cases. Is it wrong to think that maybe, consciously or subconsciously, some young men are just very tired of being lectured and demonized?

Coming close on the heels of all this, I noticed that a young writer for a gaming magazine called “Destructoid,” on his personal Twitter account (on which he had a total of 50 or so followers) said something obnoxious about a celebrity with millions of fans–and got fired for it when someone retweeted his message. His tweet was picked up and passed along by multiple people, and eventually made it to people like Wil Wheaton who, with his own 2 million followers, went on a tirade about the young man’s remark, misogyny, and video gaming culture. The result being, the young man was fired.

Apparently, the term “booth babe” is now so offensive in our so deeply misogynist culture that we think nothing of just ending a young man’s career for saying it. Fascinating: we hate women so much as a culture, we fire people for insulting a lady’s honor?

Anyway, because of the sexism, the rampant, horrible sexism, he needed to be fired. I’ve even had friends I respect and admire defend this: ending a young man’s career. Firing this virtual nobody. For tweeting to all of 50 or so followers that a beloved celebrity is a “booth babe.”

By the way, I am an enormous fan of that so-called “booth babe” (especially her work on “The Guild” and “Dr. Horrible”), but so far as I’m concerned, this was one of the worst cases of internet bullying I’ve ever seen. No, not by the young man who tweeted something rude to his small group of followers, but the avalanche of bullying from erstwhile defenders of a celebrity with millions of fans–including bullying by another celebrity with millions of fans of his own–against a virtual nobody.

They got him fired. Which so far as I’m concerned is at least as bad as anything that Sarkeesian suffered, only, she got a ton of money and he’s now on the unemployment line. Here I think the vlogger known as InuitInua says it best:

[youtube http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=SrhQhI1pVG4&w=425&h=315]

So far as I can see, this kid was a revenge target for those still fuming about what happened to Anita Sarkeesian. The only difference being, she’s going on to bigger and better things, whereas the internet bullying he suffered only landed him on the unemployment line.

Sexism, anyone?

Update: The number of reasoned responses to Sarkeesian’s point of view is growing. Here is one particularly good take on what’s troubling about so much of Sarkeesian’s work:

[youtube http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=LpFk5F-S_hI&w=425&h=315]

Dean Esmay has been writing on and off about gender issues for more than 10 years. He blogs frequently on multiple topics at his blog Dean’s World. He encourages people who dissent from Ms. Sarkeesian’s point of view to deconstruct her work rationally.

The Dr. F Show is back, and if you are part of the feminist mindset of hatred with a "number 11 crease" on your forehead then I am sorry about that.

For everyone else who are normal and are of blue or purple pilling then strap yourself in for two interviews and the usual segments of outgoing calls, 'Post of the Week' and 'The Black Knight Corner.'

Our Greg Canning will be bringing us to speed with the nonsense up north, and I want you to meet Mr. Ram Goetz. He's a film producer on a mission to make a film showing us abuse towards a bloke in a relationship.

In the meantime, you can go to here for a heads up about this. I sure did and I am now a slightly better person than I was already.

Listen in 11 A.M. Melbourne time this Thursday, or 8 P.M. Central American time on Wednesday.

If you think you can't listen to the show then you better hide your chooks mate.

A voice for liars and cowards

July 25, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

There is an MRA in Edmonton, Alberta. For now we will call him Mr. X. Like a growing number of other MRAs, some of whom were inspired by the incessant and ballsy work of John the Other and KARMA MRA MGTOW, he has taken the AVfM message to the streets of his city, placing AVfM posters at strategic locations.

The results have been more than interesting.

Recently, CBC reporter Nadia Stewart spotted one of the posters and made contact with AVfM News Director, Robert O'Hara, expressing an interest in doing a story on us. In turn, Robert put Stewart in touch with GirlWritesWhat, as she lives within reach of the Edmonton area and would make a fine local spokesperson for this site. We are waiting to see what comes of that.

The posters have also drawn attention in another way. A group of "concerned" Edmonton residents have formed a Facebook page, ever so creatively named "A Voice for Reasonable People," and are organizing to monitor the AVfM posters going up and starting their own "counter-poster" campaign aimed at painting AVfM and MRAs in general as, you guessed it, violent, hateful bigots, out to abscond with poor wimmens and tie them to train tracks or something. So far, they have managed to muster 77 likes on their page.

> This page is for organizing a reasonable, positive, and non-violent response to the appearance of A Voice for Men in our fair city (aka Edmonton).

Personally, I kinda like the ring it has to it. The term "the appearance of A Voice for Men in our fair city," is especially compelling. It reminds me a little of "the appearance of blacks in our white neighborhood," or "the appearance of little red blisters on our genitalia."

I would recommend, however, that the VfRP group shoot a little higher, and attempt to promote the appearance of honesty and integrity in their little clique of liars and cowards.

Groups like this fall generally into two categories. They are either ignorant, which can be remedied with a little education and communication. Or they are ignorant and disingenuous, which, like little red blisters on your genitalia, can't be cured with anything, except, perhaps, two red pills and some tincture of FTSU. VfRP quickly demonstrated they fell into the latter category.

Posting on their wall was open, so I took the opportunity to make a comment when I found the page, saying: "It is a good idea that you have organized a non-violent response since AVfM is a non-violent organization." End of comment, and I made no others.

Of course, the comment was removed after a short time, and the following was posted by their mod:

> We do believe some congratulations are in order, lovely reasonable peoples: our little group has attracted the attention of Paul Elam & co. (whom those of you who've visited A Voice for Men will recognize as the founder of that charming little piece of the internet).
> Unfortunately, Paul's version of being reasonable has necessitated that we block him from the page. As a rule, we prefer not to block people. However, no where [sic] is it written that our inclusive, open, reasonable, positive, and safe space has to put up with spam, trolling, and abuse. So we won't.

It is nice to see these people have boundaries, even if they manufactured my violation of them out of thin air.

In fairness, there are some other MRA comments there that have been allowed to stand. Perhaps they saw Pandora's Box opening and decided to manufacture some inclusiveness. Who ever knows with these people.

As always, we prefer to focus on the larger lesson here. Mr. X, one single man in a large city, has managed to draw the attention of a major media network, and caused a group of citizens to mount a panicked and dishonest campaign of disinformation in an attempt to counter a message they don't and probably can't understand. That is one man, by himself, with some simple paper and glue.

You don't like the poster?
Obviously, Mr. X IS tired of this shit. Now imagine ten, or a hundred more, getting just as tired as he is. Thanks to Mr. X for taking a stand, and to A Voice for Reasonable People, for sloppily spreading lies that make it easier for us to let the truth stand out. We will wait and see where the CBC goes with this as well.

In the meantime, never underestimate the power of one.

Fear and the blue kool-aid

Prior to writing this, I had the pleasure of watching a video in which a collection of young and apparently dim-witted individuals recited a list of everyday social situations, along with reminders for men in those situations to not commit the violent crime of rape.

When your dropping off your date at night, don't forget to not rape her, mmmkay?

Whether this is hateful towards men, or just stupidly inane is an open question. To imagine that anyone besides a mental defective thinks men, or even a significant fraction of men are a bunch of rape-inclined predators needing a reminder to not rape beggars belief. But, we currently live in a social climate where the asinine and powerfully hateful message of a "friendly reminder to not rape," is socially normal, and material of this character gets regular air play in our mainstream media.

Another public service announcement currently getting play on Canadian television, called "it's a girl" depicts a baby shower, attended by an ethnically diverse group of middle-class women. This shows the audience of this PSA that women are united as a social class, and united in the message this PSA is delivering. One gift package passed over to the bulging new mother is unwrapped, revealing a sinister black object on a lanyard. The gift giver explains to the gathered women, and the audience that the gift she's brought for the soon to be born infant girl is a rape whistle. Text appearing on screen sells us the lie that fully half of girls in Canada will be raped in their lifetimes. The implication being that a corollary 1/2 of all Canadian men are rapists who lack only opportunity.

Aside from being factually and numerically false by more than 2 orders of magnitude, this is not a message about averting criminal and sexual victimization, rather its is entirely about acculturating girls to fear and hate men, and teaching men and boys they are amoral, violent criminals. Messages of this character are normal.

Similarly, we are regularly treated to the awareness-raising efforts of half-educated champions for that most euphemistic of goals, "women's equality" such as Anita Sarkisian, she being the women's studies indoctrinee who swindled the public out of over $200,000 in donations for the purpose of lecturing the video gaming community that the players and developers of video games are no more than a collection of sexist, bigoted woman haters.

This attribution of malice based on the fact that as elements of a genre of fantasy entertainment, the female characters in video games often portray exaggerated sexual characteristics, such as improbably large boobs, and tight fitting or revealing costumes. But Sarkisian collected 200 grand to make sure male gamers and developers knew just what sort of low level scum they really are, while somehow failing to notice the equally unattainably hyper-masculine, hyper-muscular physiques of male game characters, or the fact that in all entertainment, male characters are killed, dismembered and disposed with such abandon that a culture of anti-male dehumanization has as viable a case as Sarkisian's female sexualization trope.

But who cares about male objectification, right? As long as Anita gets her 200 grand and male gamers learn what human garbage they are.

It doesn't stop there. On any particular night television audiences are treated to women belittling men, slapping them, kicking them in the groin – all of which stands for comedy. Violence is apparently only violence when it targets women. It's proof, in the world of scripted comedy, that men are an inferior species. They are stupid, sex obsessed, violent and regressive in comparison to the beauty, grace, good humor and general superiority of women.

We also now enjoy a culture in which women and girls engage in violent, abusive, antisocial and criminal behavior. Our media, rather than using simple descriptive adjectives such as those just listed, refers to such women and girls as if they are adopting masculine behaviors. The attachment of male identity to social pathology is just one more point of data on a line relentlessly demonizing, marginalizing and criminalizing the concept of masculinity.

How about sexual dismemberment, and a culture which when reporting on the pre-meditated sexual mutilation and dismemberment of a man, treats it as slapstick comedy? But when one voice of reason, from Sarah Gilbert, pointed out that a female victim of equivalent mutilation would not be laughed at, the consensus excuse for mockery of a mutilated human being was, "it's different." This is an explicit statement of separate standards of human consideration for male and female human beings.

When discussion turns toward education, in a climate which after 40 years of engineered female advantage in the education system, outcomes of 60 – 65 percent female graduates are treated by equality-seeking feminists not as a gross and growing imbalance to be repaired, but with triumphalism. The system dis-enfranchising men, socially and economically marginalizing them, is celebrated as a victorious and appropriate tool of growing fiscal and cultural subjugation.

And these few examples are just a tiny sample of the climate in which we now live; one in which men are pigs, men are stupid, men are violent, men are all potential rapists, men are the problem, masculine sexuality is violent, and masculine identity is openly described as a force of anti-female violence and bigotry. This is the world we are living in.

However, recognition of this social climate is relatively easy. What is more difficult to grasp is the prevalent public response to it. Men, in the majority, are aware of their own untermensch status. But why do most of them not stand up in loud, clear objection to what is an obvious and multi-generational trend of ever growing sexual apartheid?

To understand why most men, who despite a sharp awareness of their own barely human status in society do not repudiate this climate of hatred, an understanding of male public identity is necessary.

In the world of social identity, women enjoy innate ownership of personhood. This is to say, a woman does not have a requirement of performance, behavior, or utility on which her social identity hangs. Women are seen as people, or as complete human beings simply by existing. This is a hold-over of ancient hominid instincts which were based on the survival economy of reproduction in pre-technology human history.

A reproductively viable female had an individually higher group-survival value than any single male. Indeed, in the small family units of a pre-technology human cultures the loss of a reproductively viable female might mean the loss of reproductive capability of a genetic or a family line. By contrast, from a group survival perspective, the death of one or more male individuals would present a relatively much lower hazard to the continued reproductive viability of a family line. In fact, males within a group would only achieve reproductive opportunity by being of obvious utility to the group, or to the reproductively viable females in that group. The highest achieving males in a group would have reproductive opportunity, the lower achieving males would not. Male social identity within family groups then depended not on simply existing, but on performance.

These instincts, however well they served pre-technology human cultures, remain with us now, but are unaddressed in the socialization of men and women in a food-abundant, safe, modern world.

Women retain the social identity of "personhood" simply by existing, men by contrast must earn a social identity through group female consensus. A man is a good man based on his utility to women, or to higher status social entities than himself. In fact, a man's social status as a human being hangs in large part on his ongoing approval by women. If and when he ceased to be of positive utility, or of perceived utilitarian value – his human worth as a "person" evaporates.

In any group larger than 2 people, a man and a woman in social conflict will drive group sympathy instinctively towards the women, and group hostility instinctively towards the man. The most level headed, non violent and logical man, when faced with the visible anger or accusation by a female becomes, through group consensus – a bad, evil, enemy man. No longer a person, just a brute to be socially punished with exclusion, and often, punished with violence by the proxy of other conforming males in the local social group.

Unlike feminine personhood conventional masculine "personhood" is afforded to men by consensus of whatever local social group is locally relevant. This can be a family group, a collection of work colleagues, or even the line-up at the cash register of a grocery store.

This, by the way, is why most men don't complain, and don't speak up, in spite of awareness of our culture's escalating climate of male marginalization and censure. They know their social identity hangs of a consensus of approval from emotionally-instinctively-reasoning females, along with other conformist males.

In fact, conformist males – who instinctively understand their own status as "good men" depends not on fairness or rationality, but a combination of utility and of conformance with feminine groupthink, are driven in their behavior in large degree by fear of their own social censure. This fear is what drives the aggressive policing by males of nonconformist male identity and behavior. Within the men's rights community, conformist males engaging in such policing and social enforcement are called white knights. The term is resoundingly condemning, and implies a knowledgeable collusion in male social segregation and male marginalization.

In order to cling, out of fear for their own conditional identity as a socially acceptable "real man" – white knights, or conformist men will climb over each other's bodies to attack any man who dares to stand up in defiance of this very old, but escalating climate of anti male hatred. This is the childishly simple game of the good man versus the bad man.

Knowing men as a social class carry all the cache of garden slugs, white knights, or conformist, and chivalry practicing males will attack any self defining men and non-conformist men as a tactic to deflect censure and the social stink of "all men are bad" away from themselves. By attacking men who field criticisms against the rising climate of anti-male hate, these chivalry practicing conformists attempt to distinguished themselves as "not one of those bad men".

It appears obvious that these chivalry practicing men harbor no real belief in the recycled claims of misogyny, or any of the other boringly predictable ad hominem arguments fielded against self actualizing or non conforming males. And this is how opposition to the populist, but violent and hateful ideology of feminism is transmuted into a portrayal of hatred, violence, and various imputation of masculine criminality by so-called men's rights activists.

Chivalry practicing males, by throwing non-conforming men under the bus, are attacking who they know they can get away with attacking – in an attempt to seek the approval of a collective female consensus. And they do this out of fear for loss of their own public identity as a "good man".

White knights attack who they know is telling an uncomfortable truth, and they do this out of fear of loss of their own status as "worthwhile" humans. In the face of a growing public body of writing and evidence there is vanishingly little rational excuse for this socially toxic chivalry, it is easy to think of white knights as ethically bankrupt cowards.

However, even as such men are a continued encumbrance to attaining some semblance of parity with women in the legal rights of men and boys, these fearful white knights still need a way to overcome their fear and recognize that self defined masculine identity, apart from the consensus-based conformism they're accustomed to.

How this can be accomplished, providing a path for self-possessed male identity, while being attacked by the same white knights whose fear of consensus censure drives their toxic chivalry?

Individually, there may be no practical approach, and treatment of white knights with an absolute lack of mercy does appear to be the most useful tactic. For all the social pressure to on men to conform to a narrative in which masculinity is criminal or negative, to buy into this, sacrificing other men for the transient approval of a corrupt public ethic is nothing except cowardice deserving of contempt.

However, it might be that disdain toward chivalry – as if it is a behavioral atavism as regressive and socially corrosive as racism, that this is exactly what's called for to allow those few early adopters to make the cognitive leap necessary to shed a instinctive but toxic pattern of thought. Racism was once, not too long ago, not only socially normal, it was socially correct. However, while we still posses the hominid instincts for the primitive tribalism expressing itself as racism, we recognize it as toxic, and for the most part, we oppose it.

Chivalry is just one more regressive and socially corrosive atavistic behavior. Once, not long ago, a group bias and open contempt and social violence was acceptable towards visible ethnic out-groups. Racism still exists, obviously, but we understand the problem through the ethical principal of universality. Now our instinctive sexual group preference in matters of justice, access and acceptable behavior needs to reflect an ethic of universality too.

Continued indulgence in sexually selective chivalry, and the policing of nonconformist male identity, must be recognized and treated with the open scorn and contempt which open racism now elicits. The male enforcers of chivalry, while they too are trapped in atavistic thinking and a public personhood which hangs provisionally on group evaluation of their utility, are best served by treatment with scorn for failing to define themselves – and letting fear rule their thinking.

The growing culture of self-defined male identity provides a cleared psychological space for men to self actualize, and this is a culture toxic to what is commonly called a blue pill or a collective consensus ethic of male public identity.

Three cheers for three male corpses

On July 20, in Colorado, an individual named James Holmes attended the screening of Christopher Nolan's third bat-man movie, armed, and allegedly shot approximately 70 of the other attendees, killing at least 14 of them.

By now, this event has gotten so much coverage, and with so much editorial spin, that besides the attendees it is doubtful anybody has a clear picture of what actually happened. And given the reliability of human memory of high stress events like violent crimes, also doubtful the surviving attendees have a realistic picture.

However, the mainstream media is making great cake out of the actions of three particular individuals who were present at that screening; these being men, the same sex as the guy with the gun. These men, rather than killing, chose instead to die. In particular, three men, in the heat of the moment placed themselves between their girlfriends and Mr Holmes, the alleged shooter, protecting them from death at the cost of their own lives.

Our media is now calling them heroes. So what did they actually do that was – not "heroic", since that word carries far to much emotional charge to be useful. I'll say what these three formerly living men did was follow their hominid instincts; the same instincts, by the way, that every man has. That instinct is to prioritize the physical survival of women ahead of their own survival.

I'll say that again – while we read our news and listen to commentary from every smooth faced liar, telling us how masculinity leads to violence, war, rape, every possible negative outcome – all because of penises – let's pause and take a note that every man (excluding the occasional mental defective such as James Holmes) has the instinct to protect women ahead of himself in times of crisis. I'll even bet that James Holmes, if he'd been in the audience rather than shooting into it, would have more likely thrown himself protectively in front of a woman than not. I say this because in men, this is instinct. It's a feature of male behavior which helped our species survive famine and predation throughout our developmental pre-history.

This, by the way, is the same instinct causing news readers to regurgitate the phrase "women and children" every time a group of human beings come to harm and at least one of them has a vagina – in order give the story extra-special pathos. As if the world is populated by first rate humans, and also disposable factory seconds, differentiated by Y chromosome.

These three particular dead men who used themselves as bullet shields to protect their girlfriends, they are heroes. At least, according to the myth making of enforcers of social conformity like William Bennett in his evangelizing article on CNN.com.

What Bennett and other priests of public conformity are doing is re-enforcing the mainstream narrative that a good man is one who suffers, or who dies for the benefit of a human with a uterus. The converse case would be if these guys had conspicuously acted to protect themselves, escaping from the shooting while less agile or alert and slower moving movie goers died? We'd be listening to the preening, strutting, amoral whores of the mainstream media describe them as cowards and shirkers; failed men for not doing their manly duty by dying for the convenience of others.

But let me be explicit about what I see happening. Our mainstream, which is to say, our corporate media – that which bends and fawns for access to the corrupt elected officials and modern robber barons of corporate statehood – is telling you, young man, that in order to be worthwhile, a real man, you'd better be prepared to die without complaint for the child, or the little old lady, or the drug addled slut in the next seat. They matter more than you. Your best and most honorable path ends in you on a slab in the basement of your city's morgue.

According to ideologues like William Bennett, honor and heroism stands on the fatalistic belief that a man has a responsibility to protect a woman, even to the point of death.

That's what you're for gentlemen; provide, protect, and when convenient for other people, die.

This is of course instinct. It's wired into all of us. All of us with male identity, of course. But you know what else is instinctive? The urge, when faced with competition for resources, opportunity or status to pick up a rock and crush the skull of whoever stands in your way.

And somehow, despite the instincts of a million generations of our cave-man ancestors – almost all of us manage to make it through our variously stressful lives hardly crushing a single skull every month or so. However do we do it?

The instinct – expressing itself variously as chivalry or as fatal self sacrifice — is just one more that no longer has any discernable benefit. It is an encumbrance to any real pursuit of a civilized society in which one class of humans is not legally and socially elevated over another. But Bill Bennett would wrap neanderthalish and fatalistic self sacrifice and devaluation of male identity in the pious cloak of Honor. This much prized Honor being nothing except a perverse system of mind control to compel men to make decisions leading to their own deaths, dismemberment, poverty, incarceration and, service to those who devalue male humanity in favor of male utility.

Anybody telling young men their value is as disposable appliances and corpses on which other people's convenience, comfort and corporate profits run, deserves all our scorn and contempt. Bill Bennett deserves our scorn and contempt.

"..men need heroes to imitate whom they can relate to in everyday life […] They need heroes like the Aurora three" [1]

No.

Men are not humans of lesser worth. They are humans. Those three men are not heroes, they’re just dead. The calculus of death, where one life is traded in celebration for another by preference of a vagina, is pathological and regressive. It must be recognized as the sickness it is. Those who lionized these men, whose fatal and unexamined instinct led to self-destruction; those who held them up as a heroic example to follow, are cordially invited to go first — or to go fuck themselves.

AVfM-Radio: What’s in it for women?

July 26, 2012 | by AVfM Radio | Link | Original Link

If you ask an opponent of the men’s rights movement, or a gender ideologue – what’s on offer to women from Men’s Rights Activists, the answer is predictable. A return to back-to-the-kitchen, or the right to beat your wife, or subservience – or simply hatred. And as predictable and monotonous as this answer is – its also stupid, so stupid that adults repeating it really should feel shame that thier faculties of reason are so bent and broken.

But what if you go to the source, and ask a Man’s Rights Activist what the MRM offers women?

It might be that the real answer is what feminism has always promised, but never ever had the intention of delivering.

Equality, the real thing, legal and social. This is the real -no-kidding deliverable for women from the “So-Called-Men’s-Rights-Movement”.

And if you don’t believe it, just ask any of the adult, self actualized and highly respected women in this movement, starting with TyphonBlue and GirlWritesWhat, along with AVFM-Radio’s token white man, Johntheother.

Call in and ask, Thursday night : 310-388-9709

Suicidal? Forget Men’s Health Magazine

July 27, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

I just went poking around the forums at Men’s Health Magazine, figuring I would take a look at what that group of blue pill men are doing in their feminist owned and operated little sphere.

Unfortunately, it didn’t take long.

I quickly found a post that was full of unambiguously suicidal statements, then I read in absolute horror at the reaction to them. Better to show you than tell you.

“Shoulda bought condoms”? That is how a human being responds to someone saying “I may as well be friggin’ dead,” “I am going to ing lose it, hey had enough of everything,” while making other direct references to suicide?

The man is literally broadcasting that he feels suicidal and he is getting a lecture on rubbers and child support, no less in a forum that purports to focus on the health of men.

I registered with the site so that I could send this guy a PM and inquire if I could help. It seems as a new “member” that I do not have permissions for sending a PM.

I left a comment on the thread, which is awaiting moderation, but something tells me it will not be approved. I will wait a while and then go back in. At the very least the person denying my comments can get the message that someone needs to attempt contact with this man. If no one at Men’s Health Magazine gives a damn, they should at least allow someone else to try.

The post looks to be a week old, so it may be too late, or the crisis may have passed. But if anyone else wants to join me in trying to make contact with this man, please do. Thanks.

The MRM: What's in it for women?

July 27, 2012 | by Paul Elam and John the Other | Link | Original Link

At A Voice for Men we often talk about the importance of the good women that have aligned with our cause, speaking out against misandry eloquently, from a woman's perspective. We have sometimes wondered how they manage it, especially given they are in a community of men, many of whom bear not only the scars, but often the fresh, bleeding wounds of treachery and betrayal…at the hands of women. It is a rough place to be, yet women like Dr. T, GirlWritesWhat and others do it, day in and day out, with more conviction and dedication than some men who call themselves MRAs. It is quite something to watch, but it does leave the question of why hanging in the air.

What does the men's rights movement offer these women, or any others for that matter?

We talk a lot about offering hope and a kind of intellectual sanctuary to men in a world of universal hatred towards them. We also talk about the culpability and complicity of men and women who blindly promote misandric violence, treating it as a social necessity, legitimate retribution, or worse, comedy. But again, where in all this dialogue and calls for change, is a direct benefit for women? We assume that this is a question that demands from us an answer, especially given our constant calling out of the lopsided, elitist nature of feminist doctrine.

We have grown rightfully tired of empty platitudes about how helping women really helps men; how the feminists have everyone's interest at heart and other tidbits of unmitigated bullshit.

To understand the answers here, we must first understand the real negative effects of traditional sex roles on women, and the effects of the feminist ideology that purportedly intended to ameliorate those negatives, but instead exacerbated them.

As we can see on any battlefield, collapsed coal mine or sinking ship, gender roles have limiting and destructive elements. Though historically the consequences of those roles on women were less deadly, they were, nonetheless, restrictive. This is especially evident once we passed the point in time when those roles were required for the survival of the species. There is clear evidence of this in our history.

Ostensibly, feminism was intended to allow women to break free of those restrictions and pursue more self-directed and personally fulfilling lives. In part, that happened. No one can argue that women now have unprecedented personal freedom, at least in western culture, and they have the technology that men have provided to aid them in whatever ambitions that freedom leads them to choose.

We fully agree that this is much preferable to a life role designated by your sex at birth. This is especially true given the dependence and lack of autonomy inherent to the role of a traditional woman prior to feminism.

The fundamental problem, however, is that feminism, rather than foster true independence and self-determination, simply traded one form of childlike dependence for another.

The mandates of modern feminism amount to a regressive rerun of old school gender roles. Feminism, in reality, has been enormously successful, but not at liberating women. Its success has been in turning the state, and social consciousness, into a protective, surrogate patriarch, requiring its adherents to infantilize women with much more excess than was ever accomplished in more traditional times.

We coddle women in courts and manufacture excuses for their actions in everything from child abuse to false allegations. When they fail we help them find someone to blame; when they succeed at matters where we expect routine successes, we heap praise on them like developmentally disabled children. We feign respect where it has not been earned, and withhold disrespect where it is righteously merited. Where they cannot compete, we rig the rules so they can. Where they can compete, we rig the rules so they can excel.

We listened to their outrage at having been historically treated like children, and then treated them even more like children, socially and legally, because they insisted it was the answer to treating them like children to begin with.

Feminists have succeeded in brow beating the culture into participating in the illusion that women have been freed, even as they are treated as incapable of sustaining their own personal agency or even being accountable for their own actions. Feminism, for all its possible potential, has become a movement of entitled teeny boppers, shrieking and stomping to be seen as adults. And we have, much to our collective shame, given them precisely that.

And so again this brings us to the question. What does the MRM have to offer women?

We promote accountability, self-ownership, agency and fully realized adulthood for women in a culture silently colluding to regard them as toddlers without volition. In short, the MRM offers women the equality promised, but not delivered, by feminism. And it does so because it advocates that equality for men and women alike. It is the grown up, real world version of equalitarianism.

What we offer women is respect.

We respect people based on accomplishment. We respect those who hold to ethical principals in the face of aggression and abuse. This is the adult respect we mean when we say that respect is what the men’s rights movement offers women.

But it isn’t just a free piece of candy for anyone with a uterus to lord princess-like over members of the disposable sex. You know, the ones accounting for 4 out of 5 suicides, 93 out of 100 workplace deaths, and 99 out of 100 military deaths.

Respect is earned. But it’s there for any woman (or man) prepared to abandon the status of consequence immune, volition-free, victim-child, and who engages in ethical, self-owning adulthood.

Dr. Tara Palmatier is a highly respected woman in the men’s rights community. She has earned that respect. This is true despite the allegation that we hate all women. But we ask you to ponder some questions about the good doctor.

Do you think she is respected because she is a woman? Do you think she is respected in spite of the fact that she is a woman? Is she respected for her physical attributes, or simply being in possession of a vagina, or because MRAs are afraid to not respect her because all women should be respected?

The answer to all these questions, of course, is no. Dr. Palmatier is held in high esteem because she is a human being with personal agency, and who acts with integrity, accountability and competence. And it is because she foregoes any notion of female privilege. It is a common theme we see most all the women who identify as advocates for men.

Feminists, and a healthy number of traditionalist women as well, have roundly complained of being sexualized, patronized and marginalized in the company of men. Do you imagine that Dr. T, GWW, Erin Pizzey, Christina Hoff Sommers, Typhonblue or the other women involved in this movement feel like they need to make that complaint? Or do you think they feel treated as equals in the company of all these supposed misogynists?

Perhaps if you have doubts you could ask them. That is, if they are not too busy giving their opinions to men who hold those opinions in high regard.

What else is on offer? How about individuality? That means rather than being a conformist follower of whatever prevailing trend, impulse, fad, or unexamined bias is fed to their peer group through opinion journalism, music, or other infotainment, these women put forth their own original thoughts, create their own ideas and defend those ideas in public, even in the face of tactics of applied shame, imputations of malice and other forms of coercion.

So, what else does the men's rights movement offer to women? How about esteem as a human being, from both men and women, as well as real self-esteem? Not because they happen to have a vagina, or a pair of fatty glands on their upper torso, or because some schmuck pretends to respect them so he can try to get between their thighs, or because they are regarded as a historical victim, or because their peers are afraid to dissent, but because they are fully adult, intelligent and independent human beings.

How about the thing so long promised by that ideology which is so prevalent, but never delivered, except in the socially engineered forced outcomes of affirmative action and female favoring advantage in law, employment, education and elsewhere?

Equality, the real thing. That's what the men's rights movement offers to women. Setting aside the flattery, the one-sided, selective examination of reality from those pious frauds flying the flag of feminism, the men's rights movement is the only place in our culture where real equality is actually the goal.

But it's not free. You have to earn it by accepting the burdens of self-ownership. Abandon the easy out of victimhood, discard the emotional masturbation of women-are better-smarter-wiser-more-human-than-men rhetoric. You have to recognize that far from being the helpless, wind-blown porcelain petals this culture teaches women and girls they are, think, speak, and act in your own interest, and in the interest of your fellow human beings, with full acceptance of the short and the long term consequences of your actions.

And then, you'll have our respect – that's right, the respect of misogynistic men's rights activists, horrible woman-hating John the Other and Paul Elam. You'll have the real, true and actual respect of all adult men and women – as well as yourself — not because you're a special princess or a sympathetic victim or an emotional toddler who is managed and manipulated by empty lies and flattery, but because you earned it.

What does the men's rights movement offer women? It's simple for those who have the personal values to grasp it. The answer is everything that was ever important.

Man, Woman, Truth Radio: Big Brass Balls

[box icon="none"]

After an extended absence, Man, Woman, Truth Radio will return to Blogtalk Radio on Monday, July 30, at 9:00 pm, Eastern Time. U.S., which is July 31 at 2:00 am in the city hosting the Olympics and July 31, at 11:00 am in Brisbane.

On this show, we will be talking about big, brass balls, and the men who can employ their use with lazy, high-conflict, manipulative women who have a tendency to suck men dry, but not in a good way.

For a teaser and tidbit, here is an excerpt from a recent article by Dr. T, regarding a man, Earl, who reached his limit of Crazy and Lazy, and decided that he was not going to take it anymore. He told her so in the following words in an email.

'For 15 years I have worked exceptionally hard to put your happiness and well-being before my own. Today that changes. I am not putting myself before you, but I am now putting myself equal to you. For 15 years I have financed and supported you while you have chased one dream after another without ever truly financially supporting yourself, your daughter, or this family. This ends now. You are welcome to chase your dreams, but like everyone else on the planet, if your dreams will not support you, then you better get a job.'

'We have mixed our finances together since the day we got married. Today that ends. From here on out, we are separating our finances. You will use the money you make to cover our food budget, gas for your car, your medical co-pays and any personal expenses you may have in a given month. In September, you will take over the cable bill. In December, you will take over the energy bill, and in March, you will take over the cell phone bill. This is exactly 1/4 of the bills that we pay every month. You will need to either make your business work very fast, or get a job.'

'If you have to work on weekends, that is fine, but that is my time to relax and enjoy life. I will be doing so. Preferably with you, but if not, I will do it without you. Life is too short for me to watch it pass by while you work in your office at night because you spent all day on Facebook.'

Earl follows that with telling us this:

After that she cried a bit about not knowing how she was going to get a job because she 'tried that already' or 'no one will hire me for what you want me to make.' I calmly explained to her that all I'm asking her to do is get a $12/hour job. She has already had 4 jobs like that over the last 4 years that she has quit. I am no longer going to be the one that is punished because she does not go to work. It was her decision to quit those 4 jobs.

I pointed out that most adults who do not work, do not eat. This seemed to upset her. I let her anger be the sign that she was tipping out of control and used that as a weakness. I then related a Bible parable about a man stealing from his employer instead of working, which resulted in him being kicked out of his employer's home. I told her I do not want it to come to that, but if she continues to not produce, she can be kicked out, too.

This really shocked her. She was incredibly docile all weekend.

I am going to keep this up until she gets and keeps a job, or until she leaves. I hope she does not leave, but I am no longer paying for her to stay with my happiness.

Bring the crazy. I am prepared.

Earl sets a sterling example of the resolve it requires to take this kind of decisive stand. Paul and Dr. T will talk more about this case and others where men choose to draw a line from which they will not retreat. They will also discuss the things that prevent a lot of men from having healthy boundaries with women, as well as the dangers of Crazy upping the ante when she is confronted with boundaries, and words like "no."

They will also be taking your calls at 310-388-9709. Show followers may also Skype in to speak with the hosts.

How to conceal regressive hatred

July 28, 2012 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

The following paragraph is a question, posted by a woman to the aggregator site, reddit.com. To be fair to the woman who posted this question, she is most likely honest in her intention. However, the question illustrated social assumptions which merit more detailed examination than what I posted as a comment reply to that question.

The Question:

[box type="alert" icon="none"]

Give a girl some tips: What's a better way to tell my girlfriends "Don't make guys feel creepy for no reason"?

This question comes up because a girlfriend of mine lives by herself, far away from family and she doesn't know her neighbors. Her new (male) next door neighbour knocked on her door and offered to take her trash (which was outside) to the dumpster along with his. She didn't open the door for him, she only told him "no thanks". He took the trash down anyway. He seems like a nice enough guy, but she feels that she's in the position to not give him even an inch, because she has to watch out for herself. I totally agree with her, I mean, everybody has the right to not talk to somebody, especially a stranger. But I found myself trying to explain to her how important it was to just not make him feel like a creepy guy. I think this is important because if she does, and he really is no trouble, then this might discourage him from being gentlemanly in the future. What is another way to express this sentiment to girlfriends? How can we ladies still keep our distance without, you know…making you feel like a creepy guy?

My response to this question was as follows:

[box type="download" icon="none"]The question is mis-phrased. What you're actually asking is – how to continue to operate in a state of high paranoia and total distrust – treating all men as potential predators – without tipping them off that you're treating them as predators. The answer is to stop buying into fear. Men are more likely to be victims of violence than women, in all areas of life – yet women are more likely to live in a state of fear – its your fear, deal with it, or don't, but treating all men as possible rapists/creeps/predators is YOUR issue for you to get over. Or you can keep on behaving like that, and enjoy the social isolation you will create for yourself.[/box]

However, this answer will, because of the perceptive filter most people see through, be misunderstood. So, I'll try to rephrase that answer, being more explicit than what I posted as a response on reddit.

An individual subject to bigotry against his or her ethnicity is under no obligation to accommodate the fear or the emotional issues of a racist. In spite of who suffers as a result of racism, the responsibility rests not on individuals victimized by racism, but on those who adhere to a bigoted view of the world.

It is the racist's emotional problem, not the "nigger's".

I know that word is offensive – that's the point. A hundred years ago it was commonly used, because a substantial fraction of the European descended Western world looked at visible ethnic minorities with an ignorant distain. And now, racism is rightly vilified as a regressive, atavistic social toxin.

This is the same problem faced by a woman who believes herself correct in treating men with suspicion, fear, and ignorant contempt she probably doesn't even admit to herself. Her question, posted in the forum of Reddit, looking for a way to conceal her acculturated hatred and fear – while continuing to treat human beings with distain and contempt – and imagining herself correct to do so, but also realizing that humans treated with such hatred will reciprocate with distance and contempt of their own. And they will be right to do so.

In addition, the woman posting that original, misguided question included the following:

"But I found myself trying to explain to her how important it was to just not make him feel like a creepy guy. I think this is important because if she does, and he really is no trouble, then this might discourage him from being gentlemanly in the future."

In other words – how to conceal acculturated contempt for men from them, while continuing to use them as a convenience and utility.

How big a dose of self awareness this particular female bigot is capable of swallowing at one sitting is a matter for speculation, but I sincerely hope men still working from a blue-pill-view of the world learn to recognize their own social position as a hated and feared utility to be exploited by women whose goal it is to not shed their bigotry, but simply conceal it. And when that hatred is recognized, for men to simply refuse any accommodation towards anyone who doesn't regard them as a fellow human being.

So what is the answer for that semi-aware woman, asking how to conceal what she imagines is socially correct fear and hatred? Just as it was for our culture as it grew out of a once-acceptable racism, is to grow up, and to dispense with fear and hatred based formerly on skin colour, and now on sex.

And for those who promote and foster this hatred, now against men, the appropriate response is exactly the same treatment a healthy society affords to open racists.

A pictorial review of Hamilton, Ontario

July 29, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Hamilton, Ontario is part of a bustling industrial area situated on the west end of Lake Ontario. It is part of the region known as the Golden Horseshoe, which boasts almost 9 million residents – over 26% of Canada's population. One of those residents is our own Danny Boy.

Danny Boy has a lot of posters, and a bucket of glue, and a refreshing, devil-may-care attitude. He is putting all of them to good use. Very good use, if you don't mind my saying.

Since a picture is worth a thousand words, let's give you a few thousand words worth of this tenacious MRA's good and highly inspirational work, which marks the third major Canadian city, after Vancouver and Edmonton to be the lucky recipient of a poster campaign – in as many weeks.

Without further adieu, heeeeeeere's Danny!

Click on all images to enlarge.

Does this look familiar?

The angle gives it a slightly Hitchcockian feel, doesn't it?

Just the truth, hanging out at the corner.

Let’s see, beer…or FTSU….beer…or FTSU? I’m so confused!

Look, it’s the TV car!!

On top, our graphics. At bottom, the latest “Take Back the Night” rally.

It says, “POST IT HERE” He did.

What, did you think we were done, TV people?

It appears that one short feminist did not like this poster!!!

Better find one that is a little taller. (Paul's favorite pic)
Our deepest appreciation for Danny Boy, who sends us a message with these wonderful images.

"I am up here in Hamilton, kicking ass and chewing bubblegum. And I have run out of bubblegum."

[box type="download" icon="none"]
Publisher's note: Download the "Tired of this Shit," poster HERE. And you can download another poster HERE. It is customized for Vancouver, B.C., but you can edit it for your own fair city in Canada, or anywhere else in the world.[/box]

Male disposability, then & now, in one image

July 30, 2012 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

My lovely wife and I watch a lot of documentaries on Netflix. Recently, watching a short and enjoyable British documentary called "Stephen Fry in America," which first came out in 2008, I caught sight of an image that riveted me. It was on-screen probably all of 3 seconds, but I stopped my Netflix stream, rewound, and took this screen shot, which I reprint here under fair-use rules for educational purposes under US copyright law:

Click to enlarge

Stephen Fry is a perfectly decent and funny British actor/comedian documentarian who, in this lovely little BBC series (which we very much enjoyed by the way), he travels through all 50 of the United States, exploring various parts of the country with no particular agenda except to get to know America, and Americans in all their diversity. This particular screen shot was captured in an episode where he was visiting a West Virginia coal mine.

I probably don't have to tell you that coal mining is one of the hardest, most hazardous jobs in the world, or that the number of men who've died in that profession over the last century or two is staggering. Yet still they do it. And as you might expect, safety is an issue for these "workers" (i.e. what we used to call "workmen" before we decided to make their sex invisible), but notice how, even here, they feel it necessary to tell these men to be safe not just for themselves–that is apparently not good enough–but because their families depend on them.

And historically, most men I would guess have just unthinkingly accepted that: of course you risk your neck because your family needs you. That's what being a man means right? For centuries, maybe longer, men have just accepted that reasoning without complaint, and we still do. Still, today, in 2012, we unthinkingly, even in one of the most hazardous jobs imaginable, think it best to remind men to be safe not because they are valuable, but first and foremost because others depend on them.

There was a time 30 years ago when feminists called that sort of thing a "click" moment; we call it a "red pill" moment I guess: you see it and things like it your whole life, and it's never dawned on you that men were just expected to put themselves second.

And historically, maybe it had to be that way. Maybe the human race would not have survived if we were not that way. But isn't it fascinating how the normal instinct we have is to admire and call it noble to tell a man to be safe not for himself, but for his family?

But look more closely and here you will see a statement of our modern age. Someone took a marker, and at the end of the words "they're counting on you" scrawled in the letters "r money."

And we laugh right? Everybody laughs and laughs. It's so funny. Funny because it's true, right?

Right?

Nowhere do we stop and think about the reality that underlies this “funny” graffiti: almost certainly scrawled by a man, or men, who working day after day in one of the scariest, toughest, most stressful jobs there is, whose wife and kids left. Who he maybe never sees anymore, who have reduced him to nothing but a paycheck and can put him in jail if he quits that job because he doesn’t want to risk life and limb and sanity anymore. Because if he quits, he has nothing else to do and may just go to jail.

So, so funny, right? Plus the stupid mug, he must have had it coming right? Women file 70% of all divorce claims, and that only happens because the drunken wife-beating loser louts had it coming, right?

They say that pain is the essence of humor, and I believe that’s true. But then there’s the moment when you should slap yourself on the face and remember: no it is not fucking funny. In today’s world, what many men live under is little better than indentured servitude. Even the simple gratitude that used to come with this sort of self-sacrifice is now instead an obligation, an obligation with a gun to your head, and makes you the butt of a joke or an “obvious loser” with “issues” if you dare complain about working yourself to death to support a family that’s abandoned you.

Ha. Ha.

Look at that image again. Male disposability as it once was 50-100 years ago–and how much worse it often is now. How often nowadays you’re either a paycheck for someone else, or you’re useless. You and your life otherwise are often squat in this culture.

But take solace man: The President is a man! Corporate CEOs are mostly men! So obviously this is your privilege, to work your life away in solitude in a coal mine. How dare you complain about anything, loser?

And I guess if we object in any way to this sad state of affairs for millions of men, it means we hate women right? I mean, that naturally follows, for there’s no other reason for some “loser” to complain about it, right?

Yeah. Contemplate the image, and think of it as your moment of zen. Am I wrong, or does it say everything you need to know about the state of millions of men–yesterday and today in one quiet little image?

I need the men’s rights movement because…

July 31, 2012 | by Roger Smith and JtO | Link | Original Link

[box type=”download” icon=”none”]
Early in 2012, a feminist campaign emerged online which included a series of photographs. Each picture was of a young man or woman, presumably students at university and college. Each young man or women holding a sign which began with “I need feminism because..”

The reasons following these declarations were varied, and mostly incoherent.

- A woman in her 40’s : I need feminism because I have no other choice;
- A 23 year old man : I need feminism because I contribute to rape culture;
- A 29 year old woman : I need feminism because man is woman and woman is man;
- A man in his early 30’s : I need feminism because it shouldn’t be odd when a guy buys baking ingredients;

These are just a few examples, but the implied message of this campaign being that the gender ideology starting with F is the solution to every issue on every pictured sign. Even without any knowledge of feminism’s central dogmas – this is obviously an irrational claim, whether implied or explicit.

However, the mention of rape culture scores close to the heart of that ideology. Feminine victimhood, masculine guilt, and the never ending re-writing of law, domestic policy and acceptable public ethic in pursuit of that grievance’s redress.

In contrast to the irrational, scattered, but occasionally truthful hatred of the depicted reasons of the “I need feminism because” campaign, one man wrote a list of reasons for his need for the men’s rights movement. He posted this list online, where I read it. No attempt at description of those reasons will be made. They are listed below.

[/box]

- I need men’s rights because when she changed her mind the next day, I went to jail for 5 years;
- I need men’s rights because I was the victim of abuse but nobody believed me;
- I need men’s rights because I am less likely to go to college, and if I do, I will make less money than my female contemporaries;
- I need men’s rights because the president sees the shrinking number of men in colleges across America as “a great success”;

- I need men’s rights because people question if I am a predator when I am alone with my child;
- I need men’s rights because a man’s appearance, height, and weight has a greater affect on his income than it does for a woman;
- I need men’s rights because saying “it’s impossible to discriminate against men in our society” allows people to discriminate with impunity;
- I need men’s rights because traditionally masculine characteristics are virtues not flaws;
- I need men’s rights because the likelihood of my death coming by suicide is four times higher than it is for women, though I receive little support;
- I need men’s rights because it is not considered bigoted or sexist to deny me a male safe space at my college by those who have possessed their own safe spaces for decades;
- I need men’s rights because it is assumed that a meeting of men in a male safe space is automatically going to devolve into hateful sexism and violence;
- I need men’s rights because broad gender-wide slurs against men are socially accepted;
- I need men’s rights because my life, career, reputation and connection with my family can be easily destroyed by a single, false and anonymously whispered accusation;
- I need men’s rights because when women stumble blame rests on society, but when men stumble it is their fault;
- I need men’s rights because in my physically demanding career, I am expected to do much more work for “equal” pay;
- I need men’s rights because it is fine to call me a “dick”, a “cock”, or a “prick” on the street or on television; a woman must never be called a “cunt”;
- I need men’s rights because talk-shows think it’s funny if I am wounded or sexually mutilated by a woman;
- I need men’s rights because while the rape of a woman is properly regarded as a crime, the rape of a man is funny;
- I need men’s rights because mutilation of male infants is considered normal – and those arguing for the protection of male infants from mutilation are regularly slandered as anti-semites and bigots;
- I need men’s rights because my sexuality is routinely characterized as violent pathology, rather than as a natural part of my human identity;

- I need men’s rights because women assume it’s my fault if I am assaulted by a woman;
- I need men’s rights because people think it is irresponsible to have me work around children;
- I need men’s rights because I have the right to the same sexual sovereignty given to women;
- I need men’s rights because I believe that the feminist idea that a woman in the United States is equally oppressed as a woman in Afghanistan or Saudi Arabia in cruel and insulting;
- I need men’s rights because I should not be ashamed of my sexuality;
- I need men’s rights because women who find me unattractive will shame me can call me creepy for politely interacting with them, and they will be praised for this cruelty;
- I need men’s rights because I was sexually harassed by several drunk women twice my age and everyone at the party thought it was funny;
- I need men’s rights because my size and strength is commonly used to pretend that I am violent, which I am not;
- I need men’s rights because if I am small or weak doesnt mean I have a Napoleon complex;
- I need men’s rights because the type of car I drive does not give you the right to shame me or belittle me;
- I need men’s rights because I have the right to associate with other men without legal action forcing me to allow women, too;
- I need men’s rights because if I am assaulted by my spouse, and I attempt to seek help, I risk arrest, imprisonment and life-long censure – even if I do not defend myself, even I am seriously injured while she is untouched;
- I need men’s rights because I earned my accomplishments; they were not given to me by a fictitious masculine conspiracy;
- I need men’s rights because I have a right to be a father for my own children;
- I need men’s rights because, as a man, I am much more likely to be physically assaulted than a woman;
- I need men’s rights because I will be chastised as a coward, and a failed man if I do not sacrifice my life to save a woman in a time of crisis;

- I need men’s rights because laws exist that demand harsher penalties for men for the same crime;
- I need men’s rights because I have no lobbying voice in congress;
- I need men’s rights because, as a man, I am more than 9 times more likely to be killed at work than a woman;
- I need men’s rights because I am more likely to die young, and much less money is being spent on my health problems;
- I need men’s rights because, if I am killed in an accident, people will care less than if a woman or a child is killed. News readers make this clear every time they utter the phrase “women and children”;
- I need men’s rights because society believes that my life is worth less than a woman’s;
- I need the men’s rights movement, because I am a human being.

And finally, I need the men’s rights movement, because when I attempt to address any of these issues, my co-workers, my government, my media, my peers, my family, and the larger society I am a part of rises in unanimous voice to condemn me as a monster – simply for claiming my humanity.

Tiffany Marie Smith behind bars

September 1, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box icon="none"]

Tiffany Marie Smith, the ex-wife of men's advocate Gordon Smith is now sitting in jail after having been arrested on three counts of false accusation and one felony count of making a false statement to police investigators.

She was arrested this morning in Dover, Delaware by the Dover Police Department.

Her arrest came at the end of a Kafkaesque saga for Mr. Smith, who was arrested 8 times on a total of 13 allegations from Tiffany Marie, all of which stemmed from a bitter custody dispute. During that time, Gordon Smith was arrested once at gunpoint, jailed several times, forced to wear a GPS monitoring device around his ankle, and was in fact arrested twice when the monitoring device proved that he was nowhere near Tiffany Marie Smith at the times she alleged he violated a protective order. The allegations involved a range of crimes. including sexual assault, physical assault and terroristic threats.

The ordeal has cost him untold thousands in legal fees and severely compromised his professional life.

As a result of her arrest, all of the seven remaining charges against Mr. Smith were dropped, and his legal fight for his freedom is over.

It appears that the writing was evident on the wall to police officials, and the prosecution against Mr. Smith folded after the Dover State News (DSN) picked up on the story from A Voice for Men. DSN reporter Craig Anderson covered the story involving a felony charge against Gordon Smith being dropped, and reportedly began investigating other aspects of the case due to AVfM's coverage.

An elated Mr. Smith had a message for readers of AVfM, who reacted to the story of his struggle by pressing it to officials and to the media.

"Words cannot describe the emotions I feel for every one of you at AVfM who made phone calls and sent emails and prayed for me during this time."

More information will follow on this case after the holiday, when state offices are open.

Special recognition to Dean Esmay for his tireless work on this story. PE

Update from Dean Esmay Official statement from Dover, Delaware police department:

"Tiffany Smith 29 reported several domestic related crimes to the Dover Police and Delaware State Police over a period of time in August in which she stated she was victimized by her ex-husband Gordon Smith 47. On August 18 the Dover Police arrested

Mr. Smith on several charges relating to a domestic incident. After the arrest Tiffany Smith continued reporting that Mr. Smith was stalking her and on one occasion had physically attacked her. A joint investigation by Dover Police and the Delaware State Police found that Tiffany Smith falsified all the complaints she made against Mr. Smith. Tiffany Smith was arrested on three counts of falsely reporting an Incident and one count of providing a false statement. All charges against Gordon Smith have been dismissed at the request of the Dover Police Department."

Special recognition to the Dover Delaware Police for having the guts and the decency to do their jobs and do it right and to pressure the Delaware State authorities to do the their jobs. Special thanks to Dover PD Lieutenant Alan Rachko, who wins the Big Brass Balls of the year award in my eyes. –DE

Police cowardice in Vancouver

In an age of universal deceit, telling the truth is a revolutionary act.~ George Orwell

For the past several weeks, John the Other and several other members of the organization VancouverMRA (VMRA), have been peacefully posting posters that target issues affecting men and boys in western culture, and that display the URLs of this website as well as their own web presence.

The posters have been routinely vandalized by a group of individuals, and, in one circumstance, one of these individuals assaulted a safety officer of a construction site who instructed them to stop tearing down the posters at that location, which was within his authority.

Vancouver Police were summoned to that incident, the police responder being Officer Desmond Roberts, badge number 2776. No arrest was made for the assault, at the preference of the victim. According to those at the scene, Roberts instructed the individuals tearing down the posters to cease doing so, and also indicated that there would be an investigation into A Voice for Men to determine whether it is a hate based organization. One member of VMRA, JtO, was instructed by Roberts not to engage or antagonize the individuals tearing down posters, but did not instruct him to stop placing them.

The instructions to the vandals in this incident, to cease tearing down posters, indicated Roberts had an understanding that the charter-protected postering would continue.

Several follow up phone calls to the Vancouver Police to inquire about the status of that investigation have gone unanswered.

Today, another equally serious incident occurred. JtO was back placing posters, with the permission of the same safety officer at the previously mentioned construction site. He was confronted by a group of approximately 20-30 hostile individuals, some of whom brandished box cutters, and who began tearing the posters down.

JtO immediately called police to the scene. The responder in this case was Constable Darren Ramdour, badge number 2534.

After interviewing individuals at the scene, Ramdour instructed JtO to cease putting up the posters, threatening him with arrest if he did not comply. Ramdour's assertion was that by lawfully and peacefully putting up posters, JtO was a threat to the peace, not the mob of vandals wielding box cutters.

One has to wonder if this is typical of Vancouver law enforcement. Is it their standard operating procedure to side with criminals and to criminalize a victim, simply because they lack the courage to enforce the law?

I think this question is best put to Chief Constable Jim Chu of the Vancouver Police Department. The incident number for the case is 12-140147.

The actions of Constable Ramdour in this circumstance were that of a coward, or of a police official so inept and incompetent that he is more of a threat to the rule of law than an officer who is just cowardly. If this is allowed to go unchecked, the result will be a free pass to rule by mob in the city of Vancouver, the only prerequisite being that the mob in question must be opposed to the human rights of men and boys.

Let us hope that this is just one officer who is an embarrassment and a disgrace to his profession, and not the kind of police work that will be supported from the top of the chain of command at the Vancouver PD.

It is also something about which the media should be advised and encouraged to investigate.

War is peace, Ignorance is strength

September 2, 2012 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

And censorship is free speech.

Activism on behalf of the human rights of men and boys is difficult for several different reasons. One of the most obvious is a public narrative which takes the following form.

1. We live in a patriarchy;
2. Therefore women, and not men are oppressed;
3. Men are elevated and advantaged;
4. Therefore anyone advocating male human rights is really driven by misogyny;
5. And so, men's rights organizations are hate organizations.

And besides, Morris Dees and Arthur Goldwag of the Southern Poverty Law Centre said so. So there!

Following the inept grasping after relevance and funds by the SPLC, and after the wider media including Reason Magazine[1], American Spectator[2] and even Business Insider[3] called them irresponsible fearmongers – Goldwag has backpedalled and claimed that no no, they're nota hate group, no, oh no, that's not what we at the oh-so-responsible and prestigious SPLC meant at all.
To quote Goldwag himself:

> It should be mentioned that the SPLC did not label MRAs as members of a hate movement; nor did our article claim that the grievances they air on their websites – false rape accusations, ruinous divorce settlements and the like – are all without merit.[4]

In the same statement, Goldwag also makes vague suggestions of violent intent – but as ever, fails to substantiate them.

However, for some people, the SPLC said it once, and thus, it must be true; The men's rights movement – or maybe just AVfM is a hate group.

Furthermore, because we are, by this so-called logic a hate group, public censorship and censure of any public posting or speech of this so-called hate group is correct, proper, and admirable.

And after all, it's much easier to justify hatred against a group, to silence them, threaten them with violence and generally spread poisonous lies about them as long as we cling to the notion that they are the bad people, and we are the good people. It makes us feel good when we're the good guys and by golly it makes us feel damned near heroic when we gather together with 25 to 30 of our closest friends into an angry mob, armed with paint scrapers and box cutters and swarm a postered construction hoarding, tearing down and erasing any and all postings which offend our group consensus of who's right and who's wrong. Not just wrong posters, wrong thinking, wrong speech and wrong people. This kind of group action makes us feel like defenders of justice, freedom and uplifters of the downtrodden. Where's my cape?

Except for the minor detail that the angry mob in question is engaging in the silencing of unpopular opinion: The silencing of dissent. It's the most totalitarian of all impulses. On September 1, 2012, when verbally challenged on the issue of censorship – one bright spark quipped that the Canadian Charter listing of freedom of expression as a fundamental freedom" only applied to government censorship, and not, apparently to groups of cutter wielding vandals in the midst of destroying posted political speech on private property.

That's right, the Canadian charter of rights and freedoms, section 2 listing fundamental freedoms – in the mention of freedom of expression, really means that only the government cant censor free speech. A mob, a collective, a corporation, a person with a paint can – all that's fair game. If you see something which offends your eye, paint it black. Of course, none of that is actually mentioned. The charter simply says:

Everyone has the following fundamental freedoms:

- freedom of conscience and religion
- freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication;
- freedom of peaceful assembly; and
- freedom of association.

I guess the bit about this only applying to government-sponsored censorship is subtext, eh?

Another point of apparent confusion, is that the construction company owns the plywood hoarding on which the contested posters were hung, and the construction company, through their safety officer had granted both permission to apply posters, and rejection of anyone's right to tear postings down. Of course, such minor details like property rights and fundamental human rights like free expression don't matter when you're a member of the Justice League, busy battling evildoers.

Let's, just for a moment pretend that the movement engaging in activism, and focusing on human rights concerns impacting men and boys, was in fact, a hate movement, or that groups within it were hate groups. Let's pretend that this site and it's members are a hate organization.

Everyone has the following fundamental freedoms:

(a) freedom of conscience and religion;

(b) freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication;

(c) freedom of peaceful assembly; and

(d) freedom of association.

If we're a hate organization, we still own the fundamental freedom of thought, belief, expression including freedom of the press and other media of communication, such as posters on private property placed with the express permission of the property owner's employees.

But lets dial the what-if back to reality. The men's rights movement is a human rights movement, and AVfM is an extension of that human rights activism into the media. The continued repetition of imputations of hate, or of misogyny or whatever other ill-conceived boogeyman-image by those attempting to silence, censor, to intimidate and to physically harass individuals in this movement advocating the human rights of men and boys, and clearly denouncing hate on the posters being torn down – appears from here to be the behavior of what would classically be called a hate group.

"You don't fear and hate women do you? No, because you are a decent human being".

This is rhetoric taken directly from the posters which, according to opponents represent the hatred informing the men's rights movement and AVfM.

By this logic, assuming the claim of "hatred of women" we, by our own posters, are declaring ourselves to not be decent human beings.

Are these people just fucking retarded?

Or, are they so deeply submerged in their own ideological view of reality that the glaring contradiction of their own claim escapes their notice; hate coloured goggles worn so that no matter what reality offers in evidence, offering the conclusion that is both the beginning and the end point, MRAs are woman haters. I wonder if the two women who co-host AVfM-Radio's weekly show with me have figured out that we hate them yet?

And in this upside down view of reality – an angry mob of 30, armed with box cutters, becomes a group of concerned, civic minded responsible citizens. And a short, balding man with a poster reading "men's rights are human rights" is a terrifying threat to public safety.

In this bizzarro-world, vandalizing and defacing and destroying human rights posters isn't censorship. No, tearing down a poster denouncing hate and advocating human rights – that tearing down and silencing is the protected political speech, but the poster itself – isn't.

September 2, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

The events headlined alongside this post are, at least on the surface, a mixed bag. On one hand we have a magnificent example of a victory in activism with the arrest of false accuser Tiffany Smith. On the other we have a Vancouver police officer bending to the will of a mob — effectively joining them — in an effort to silence advocates for men and boys. But there is a theme running through both of these events, and it is echoed here in grand fashion in this recent video by Daddy Justice.

There is something changing in the air here, people. You are witnessing it with the work of Dannyboy in Hamilton, Ontario; with JTO in Vancouver; with the new group of MRAs in Seattle that are now taking the activism to the streets; with the defiance of men like Greg Canning and KARMA and Dr. F in Australia, and others that are starting to build into numbers that already make it impossible to credit everyone. You see it in the growing numbers of women that are standing tall by our side.

That change is starting to be felt in places like The Dover State Police, by the Women’s Departments at Monash and other universities, by our elected officials and our judges and our police commissioners; by our prosecutors and our educators and our journalists. That change comes with a clear message:

The days when those of you who step on the backs of men with impunity are coming to an end. The days of you operating a hateful agenda that destroys families and children and human rights for the sake of elitism and bigotry are headed for a reckoning.

The days of your lies and distortions being passed off on the world without anyone raging the truth back in your face are over.

The silence you have long relied on is now a thing of the past.

Men are waking from their long slumber. They are wiping the sleep from their eyes and seeing the sorry road that they have taken in the full light of day. And they are recognizing that just like parasites feeding off the blood of their hosts, you have been feeding, leeching, off their good will and their patience and good graces. And they are going to rise up against the evil that spills from your mouths, from your pens, and gavels and microphones….and destroy it.

All your hatred for and exploitation and abuse of men and boys will be strangled till lifeless and discarded in the graveyard alongside other past forms of human foulness.

The time for your unchecked bigotry is over.

Today, we are in ten cities. Tomorrow we will be in a hundred. And we will continue to grow and scream the truth at you until your stench has been cleansed from the miasma shrouding the horrible world you have created.

No matter how you try, no matter how many you hurt in your efforts, you cannot beat the truth or stop it or sway it from its path forever.

Your lies have had their time. Their disgusting legacy is written in the lives of shattered men, in broken families and in hobbled boys who never had a chance to stand as men. But that time is passing.

Rage back, as you will. Inflict your harm an do your ill deeds to those who stand against the malicious schemes of petty ideological tyrants. In the end your efforts will fail. You have only two choices. Be freed by the truth, or destroyed by it. The truth cares not which you choose.

Nor do we.

Judge Stewart Austin orders graves desecrated

---

In a decision of unprecedented sadism and cruelty, Australian Judge Stewart Austin has ordered that a divorced man not only loses his family farm, but his parents graves be dug up, too[1][2].

According to court reporter Louise Hall:

"The man, given the pseudonym Mr Moss by the court, had to demolish the memorial garden he had established, which included removing headstones over buried urns containing his mother's and father's ashes."

That pseudonym, assigned by the court, apparently out of compassion for him, after appropriating his parent's family farm, giving it to his ex wife, and ordering him to dig up and move the graves of his own parents — all within 14 days.

After the death of of his father in 2002, Mr Moss spent a decade building a memorial garden around the grave site on the family farm of his parents. In 2008, his mother was buried in that garden alongside the grave of his father. Newcastle family court judge Stewart Austin noted that the former wife of Mr Moss hadn't been gainfully employed since 1994, but because she was "enmeshed" in the local community, and lacked the resources to acquire a farm of her own, the Moss family farm would be given to her, and the graves of her ex husband's parents would be dug up and moved to accommodate her ambition of a hospitality business. Clearly, in Australian family law, divorced men are simply resources from which the courts redistribute property.

Rationalization provided by Judge Stewart Austin for this shockingly cruel and bizarre judgement — the appropriation of an ancestral family home and the desecration of a parental grave site — was that because the graves could be excavated – they should be.

For the former Mrs. Moss, unemployed for 18 years, the Newcastle family court judge determined that rather than a monetary settlement, she would be best served by approproation of Mr. Moss's family farm and the demolition of his parents grave site. The Newcastle family court website lists "respect for the needs of separating families" in their mandate, but it appears that sadistic cruelty of erasure of family connection to fathers and paternal grandparents for children of divorcing couples is a motivating for factor in Judge Stewart Austin's decision.

However, his decision may be simply a side effect of a long term program developed by the careered bureaucrats of the Australian civil service, identified in a document called "The Plan".

Interestingly, after reporting and analysis of this document by AVfM in January of 2012, the PDF version of this document was either moved or removed from it's previous public accessible location at:

http://www.facs.gov.au/sa/women/pubs/violence/np_time_for_action/national_plan/Documents/The_Plan.pdf

http://www.avoiceformen.com/wp-content/uploads/sites/2/2012/09/The_Plan.pdf

This document informs an ideologically driven view of Australian families in which men as fathers and husbands are simply erased from consideration as a real part of what comprises a family. In the language of this document, the term "women and their children" is used throughout – in a narrative which men do not exist except as malefactors. The Plan also discusses domestic violence at length, but does so from the "gender" ideological view of the totally discredited Duluth Model, which only recognizes male violence and female victimhood. Only women are abused, only men are abusers. This of course guarantees that efforts to resolve domestic violence using this model will fail, and the victim service agencies will continue to expand their budgets.

The Australian public sector is populated by ideologues with an agenda. This agenda has been published for private citizens to find. The document, produced by a public funded organization called The National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children is simply named "The Plan"

The document, discussed previously[3] on AVfM includes 204 pages of recommendations for ways to violate and discard the human rights of men in Australia, and it appears obvious that family court Judge Stewart Austin's addition to this inhuman aim is his contribution of cruelty, malice and sadism.

Judge Stewart Austin works from the Newcastle Family courts, located in New South Wales[4].

September 3, 2012 | by Greg Canning | Link | Original Link

Australia's White Ribbon Campaign has continued it's tradition of feminist inspired male loathing by targeting the release of its latest research paper *Fathers, Fathering and Preventing Violence Against Women[1] to coincide with, well naturally, Fathers Day. What better time to blame and shame this tiny minority of men than the day designed to celebrate the positive contribution to their families and society made by the vast majority of good and decent fathers?

Perhaps they were just following the lead of British Prime Minister David Cameron's notorious 2011 Fathers Day speech where he claimed absent fathers should be "stigmatized" by society in the same way as drink-drivers.[2] Note that in the UK an "absent parent" is a legal term with the same meaning as "non custodial parent" or "non resident parent" in other jurisdictions, so Cameron chose to engage in the ubiquitously popular western sport of male bashing by targeting absent fathers rather than absent parents, with the implication that all such fathers were absent by choice — which is a gross misrepresentation of the situation.

To write their latest feminist propaganda White Ribbon Australia engaged yet another "F" word, in the personage of David Flynn, who now competes with Flood and Fischer for prime status within in the elite ideological feminist enclave that is the Victorian DV Services and Academia. You can see Flynn in action spruiking[3] his misandric nonsense for Vic Health on YouTube. [4]

Here are just a few of the false premises on which this paper bases its necessarily false conclusions.

It adopts a social constructionist's viewpoint.

While the nature versus nurture debate will no doubt continue for a long time to come, it seems to be only feminists who continue to assert the extreme polar view of social constructionism of maleness and femaleness. Most non- ideologically motivated scholars will agree that both contribute significantly to the human condition and the conflict revolves around the relative contributions of each.

Flynn states "fatherhood is socially constructed, not biologically determined" and that "gender inequalities in the family are maintained and reinforced and any power inequalities are ignored or dismissed as 'natural'. The prevention of men's violence against women, however, requires us to name these power inequalities for what they are."

No mention is made of the "natural" position of power within the family domain, traditionally and still assumed by women, or the sexual, economic (spending) and emotional power they wield over men in relationships.

It is based on the sex based Duluth paradigm

As with all feminist dogma this paper only focuses on "violence against women" and ignores the fact the reciprocal violence has been repeatedly shown to be the most common form of intimate partner violence. Respected researcher Donald Dutton was prompted to call his 2007 paper on the subject "The Duluth model: A data-impervious paradigm and a failed strategy." [5] Feminists have ignored repeated calls for a sex inclusive approach. One such call was put forward in the excellent recent paper by UK researchers Louise Dixon and Nicola Graham-Kevan in their paper Understanding the nature and etiology of intimate partner violence and implications for practice and policy published in the Clinical Psychology Review in 2011[6].

Flynn however demonstrates a shameful lack of inclusivity that extends beyond ignoring mere male victims, to female victims of abusive same sex partners. Only female victims of male perpetrators are afforded care and consideration under this comprehensively repudiated model.

Flynn maintains, "Most importantly gendered[sic] power inequalities are a key underlying cause of men's violence against women." He then of goes on to cite the "gender" pay gap, unequal division of domestic labor, men's access to power in status in the world of work outside the home and other feminist myths to argue for the so called male privilege and entitlement that is supposedly genetically transmitted on the y chromosome.

> "Male privilege' refers to the benefits and advantages that men receive, purely as a result of being a member of the dominant gender[sic]."

and

> "If men have an expectation and belief that they will be dominant over women – a sense of entitlement – then they are likely to choose behaviors that are violent or abusive in order to obtain and maintain dominance, power and control."

The paper attacks masculinity as inherently evil and denies a need for male role modeling. Flynn falsely states that "Masculine culture rewards men who are solid economic providers," when he should be stating the majority of women are hypergamous and sexually select such males. Indeed, the need for men or fathers in family life is portrayed as redundant.

> "The concept of a 'male role model,' therefore, is built on the assumption that femininity is subordinate to masculinity and by implication, that women are inferior to men."

And

> "[…]ideas about masculinity are intimately connected to both physical > and non-physical forms of violence against women."

And

> "Some fathers are physically violent to their partners and ex-partners. Many are emotionally abusive and controlling. Many more continue to enjoy the privileges that come with being the dominant gender,"

Flynn would get on well with biology professor Greg Hampikian author of a recent misandric opinion piece in the New York Times, "Men, Who Needs Them?"[7] Which asserted men will soon be unnecessary for the continuation of womanity and concluded that women are only likely to "keep men around" because they are "entertaining."

Flynn argues for androgynous parenting rather than mothering and fathering. Conjuring up images of socialist utopias where the state is responsible for child rearing with the nature being nurtured out of children both in the home and via state controlled childcare and education centers, creating a willing, complicit and docile populace.

> "There is no 'one way' to father and no special 'male role' for fathers in the family."

It goes on:

"Cultural ideas of gender and parenting tend to assume that women and men are naturally, fundamentally and inalterably different from one another."

"The widespread belief among men, that we do make a unique contribution to parenting, says a lot about us, our sense of entitlement, and our desire to feel 'important."

"Perhaps it is a reaction to the unique contribution that mothers are able to make to children – through pregnancy, childbirth and breastfeeding – that we feel impelled to demand our own comparable uniqueness."

So women, it appears, are biologically unique but men are a needless optional extra.

It falsely links "violence against women" with child abuse, despite the evidence that violence between parents is most commonly bidirectional and that any violence witnessed by children is detrimental. Suffice it to say that no mention is made of protecting male or female children from the predominant child abusers, women, or the protective value of biological fathers in intact families.

"But by deliberately targeting a woman's mothering, men are being violent, not just to the women themselves but to their children as well."

"Exposure to domestic violence is increasingly considered a form of child abuse"

One would have to search far and wide to find a more grotesque and comprehensively demeaning piece of misandric nonsense than this discussion paper, perhaps not unsurprisingly White Ribbon Keeps coming up with such goods at taxpayer's expense. I call that shameful. So in order to bring some balance to the situation, I suggest White Ribbon also make the following recommendations for women and mothers.

Women can help to prevent family violence by:
1	Being non-violent (This includes in addition physical violence, emotional, sexual and financial abuse, and use of children as weapons to punish non custodial fathers.)
2	Respecting fundamental human rights of the father and the children of the relationship and not interfering with their rights to meaningful and ongoing relationships even after separation and divorce.
3	Stopping child abuse, elder abuse and lesbian IPV types of abuse predominantly or entirely perpetrated by women.
4	Sharing financial decisions and resources equally rather then maintaining the strangle hold on most family spending and coercing your male partner into working harder and longer to support your spending and lifestyle.
5	Promoting gender equality by negotiating the division of labor both inside and outside the home, and realizing the in the end paid and unpaid work balances out for the good of the family
6	Rejecting Feminist Dogma and gendered paradigms of understanding violence and joining with other men women and children and saying in a loud and unified voice, "to family violence, and all violence Australia says NO"

False accuser Cathy Tretola and two white knights

Click to view video here > Crazy Landord Cathy Tretola

Two days ago a video was posted to YouTube showing a chaotic scene where Catherine Tratola, owner of the Brookside Manor, a hotel in in Quincy, MA, barged into the room of one of her tenants, assaulted him repeatedly and screamed rape several times.

Tretola was accompanied by two unidentified men and the incident was recorded on video by the victim of the attack. It clearly showed that there was no attempt to rape or otherwise assault Tratola.

The video went viral on Youtube, but was removed this morning with a message informing viewers: "This video has been removed as a violation of YouTube's policy prohibiting content designed to harass, bully or threaten."

This is likely because the name of Tratola's business was posted in several comments and resulted in the assault by Tratola making its way to customer review sites like Yelp.

But the video clearly shows that the actions to harass, bully and threaten were from Tratola and her accomplices, not from their victim and not from the YouTuber who posted the video. YouTube got this one wrong.

This video shows a business owner that is clearly a threat to her customers and to public safety. We are putting it on record here, along with the particulars on Brookside Manor, as a public service to anyone who may research this establishment on the internet before deciding to stay there.

AVfM News/Activism- the MRM grows teeth

Tonight we are going to be joined by other members of the AVFM team to talk about recent events regarding the MRM, its growing presence and the effectiveness of Men’s Rights Activism. Our poster campaigns are gaining media attention around the world making us increasingly hard to dismiss as a do-nothing fringe group. Likewise, with the recent developments in the Gordon Smith case in Delaware and the pending disciplinary hearings for Mary Kellet in Maine are validating the fact that our activism has teeth.

Joining us will be Paul Elam and JTO and anyone else who wants to call in. This is an important episode for MRAs to listen to if they want to get in line with the direction that the MRM is going. We are going to talk about strategy and goals so don’t miss this opportunity to weigh in and speak your mind.

The show airs live tonight, at 8:00 Central Time, US, which is 2:00 a.m. September 5, in London and 11:00 a.m. September 5, in Brisbane. If you have not yet requested membership in the Stickcam Room, you can do so through the link below. The call in number is 310-388-9709 .

Second-wave feminism is dying (slowly)

September 4, 2012 | by Elly Tams | Link | Original Link

Shulamith Firestone, radical feminist and author of Dialectic of Sex, died last week. And, it appears she died having lived her last years quite isolated and miserable.

The accounts of her death remind me of the latest film by Carol Morley, Dreams of A Life. More than a "true story," Dreams… is a documentary about a British woman who, like Shulamith, was found dead in her flat. But not days or weeks after she died. This young woman was not discovered till THREE YEARS later.

Shulamith is part of a generation, which happens to be my parents' generation, which is on its way out. My stepfather died eighteen months ago. My Dad goes to more funerals than weddings. I feel death hanging over me in a way I never did before.

And with the demise of this generation, comes the demise of its ideologies and politics. Shulamith joins a growing roster of 'dead feminists' that includes Marilyn French, Andrea Dworkin and Mary Daly.

These women were part of what we call "second wave" feminism, which was at its peak in the late sixties, early seventies. I have a very strong, VERY ambivalent relationship with second-wave feminism, because I was born into it. My mum did not go to yummy mummy cafes and pilates classes in her spare time when I was little, she went to Women's Liberation conferences and "consciousness raising" groups. I am still recovering, literally, from childhood trauma that I can't separate in my psyche from that period of feminist history. And when I was still a feminist I was often lonely and isolated, even when surrounded by my "sisters." Shulamith's life and death reminds me that feminism is not a "cure all" or a guarantee of being successfully integrated into a group who share an ideology. It isn't a guarantee of anything at all.

I am not celebrating individual deaths. Unlike feminists such as Cath Elliott, who cheered when Sebastian Horsley, who she believed was a “misogynist” died, I feel sad when anyone shuffles off this mortal coil. At the risk of mixing my quotes up too much, do not ask for whom the bell tolls and all that.

But I am glad that second wave feminism is a dying creed. The “sisters” who in my view invented concepts such as “patriarchy” and “all men are rapists” and the idea that one solution to gender inequalities is eugenics, have a lot to answer for.

A couple of years ago I might have finished this piece on a positive note, saying that the new generation of “third wave” feminists are changing things, and making feminism into a more positive, more diverse, less man-hating movement. But as most readers will know, I won’t do that now.

Third wave feminism in some ways takes the basic, misandrous tenets of second wave feminism and turns them into “memes.” Any thought or philosophy is removed and all we are left with is a bunch of white women screaming “RAPE CULTURE!” and “STREET HARASSMENT!” and “MISOGYNY!” Technologies producing social media sites such as Facebook, Twitter and Tumblr have meant political campaigns become very simplified and do not allow for intellectual debate. All you have to show your support is press the “Like” button. This “dumbing down” of feminism makes it particularly crude and lacking in rigour.

On some particularly dark days I even miss Andrea Dworkin!

However there are positive aspects to our contemporary world, in which radical feminism is seen by many as a joke. It does not have quite the power it did when I was a kid. But its younger, more manicured, less well-read sisters are dangerous. And I am stuck with them till I die.

Adios, c-ya, good-bye man-o-sphere

Recently Roosh wrote an article proclaiming that the MRM was dead. It was the kind of piece that even 6 months ago I would have likely allowed to immediately bait me into a response article. And it was so full of fallacy and self-promoting claptrap that I would have had some fun doing it.

But that was 6 months and about a million years ago.

It was at a time when I still felt connected in some way to the phenomena we sometimes call the man-o-sphere. We were, in days past, a loosely associated collection of thinkers and writers, who at times shared some mutual ambitions to improve the state of men and boys, and often tore at each other like siblings reared in a whore house. It was stimulating and often messy, but it helped pass time in a world where waiting on progress for men was like waiting for a raise from a cheap boss.

But in case anyone hasn't noticed, things in the sphere have changed a lot in recent times. Ferdinand Bardamu, after letting In Mala Fide devolve from a rigorously thoughtful source of counter-theory into a cesspool of white supremacy and anti-Semitism, mercifully checked out for good.

What remains, with some few exceptions, are not worth mentioning by name. There are some collections of decent writing, squandered by rudderless, self-serving management with no interest in activism. They serve a purpose, but not a cause.

And then there are the PUAs and Gamers, about whom this will be the last time I write, or that will ever again appear in an article on this site. They are comprised mostly of men who bear the deepest afflictions of a fatherless culture. Abandoned to feminist governance by their male elders and bereft of masculine guidance, they have been dropped into the solipsistic void that was the only existence feminism ever could have offered them outside direct servitude. Stripped of values and consciousness and the ability to be circumspect, they have turned feral; so unable to form community or embrace brotherhood that they have shrugged off the desire for either.

I don't blame them, given the way they were fucked out of relevance. They never had a chance. They are the walking wounded; the children left behind from a sexual war in which their fathers refused to fight. I have been personally wrong to have engaged in conflict with them when I could have, should have, been working harder to provide them an alternative.

I aim to remedy that mistake.

The very expression, man-o-sphere, implicitly paints an image of connectivity; of shared purpose and identity. Aside from distaste for feminism, which anyone capable of critical thought will share, there is no real or abiding connection; no universality or even commonality, and that lacking manifests in how we tear ourselves, and each other, down, and always have.

In the comments of the Roosh piece I mentioned at the start of this article, there came a summation from zed, who has studied this society longer than most all of us, and longer than some of us have been alive. It is most sobering and well worth posting here.

> I see this same argument raging a couple of dozen places around the net right now. It appears that men are Balkanizing into half a dozen "tribes" of mutually hostile social, cultural, and political values.
> It is that phenomenon alone which accounts for the fact that no coherent Men's Rights Movement has ever gelled. Terms get flung around with no agreed-upon definition behind them. If MRAs were a political party, we have spent the last 40 years arguing over what our platform should be.
> For someone who understands politics, that should not be surprising. The favored method of the human race throughout history for resolving such conflicts over what people believe is to reach for the guns – and before guns were invented, spears, knives, swords, and clubs.
> In the US, slavery existed for 300 years before it got ended by the bloodiest war in US history. It took a lot of Abolitionist Activists dying to even reach the point where the war broke out.
> Pointing out that MRAs have not made much progress because they have not already solved the problem politically without having to resort to the ultimate form of activism – war – is silly.
> There have been tons of good MRAs over the years doing what they could to make a difference – without guns. Every last one of them got taken down by the very men whose rights those MRAs thought that were fighting for.

> A guy like Paul Elam stands up, tries to do something, and "men" from all over the place attack him because 1) he is not doing things exactly like they would do them, if they had done anything, which they never do, and 2) he hasn't already solved the problem so they wouldn't have to be bothered with it.
> I quit being any sort of MRA because I got so sick to death of having to argue with men over how to split a hair 10,000 different ways. I got so sick of listening to armchair quarterbacks bitching that the free beer wasn't cold enough, that I quit serving it at all.
> With a handful of people and a little spare change, Paul Elam has launched the most successful Men's Rights initiative to date. Do "men" appreciate that? Hell no!
> Instead of pitching in and adding their own "activism" to his effort, men just pick at him and piss him off enough that he feels the need to come over here and defend what he is doing to the very group he is doing it for.
> If "men" were a football team, the opposing team would not even have to put anyone on the field because they spend all their time and energy tripping their own ball carriers instead of blocking for him.
> What I don't get about "men" is why – if they are so certain that their way is the right way – they don't just go do it and leave everyone else alone. Instead of spending their time doing what they claim they believe in, they spend it attacking every man who is not a clone of them.
> There are lots of good MRAs, but there is no MRM. Men won't allow one to get formed, because every time some MRA starts to get some traction, other men take him down.

While I appreciate zed's very kind words about me, that isn't why I reposted his thoughts. I did it because reading them was a personal turning point. It was the point that just accepted the fact that a handful non activist, essentially blue pill bloggers, and their blue pill acolytes, are as useful to the idea of an MRM as eggshells in an omelet.

The man-o-sphere is worthless to men's rights activism.

The man-o-sphere itself is a misnomer, a façade hidden behind an illusion. Looking for unity or support or action in that non entity is nothing more than looking for water in an empty bucket. Similarly futile is the idea that friction or conflict with those ghosts is detrimental to the cause. It isn't detrimental because these men have nothing more to do with the cause of men's rights than feminist bloggers or volleyball coaches. Pearl clutching over a badly needed division between them and activists is foolish. They are just another, and a comparatively minor, source of attempts to bring us down. We do not have to be bothered with them, even if we are advocating on their behalf.

If there is a real men's movement that will spring from the online world, it is here and nowhere else.

In fact, we already see it happening. But continuing to buy into the false unity of a non-existent entity will only slow us down.

I have always taken care, and still to, to point out that AVfM is not synonymous with the men's movement. And after mulling this over one more time of thousands, I am really glad that I have taken this approach.

I don't know what the men's movement is, in all honesty. I don't even know that it exists. But I do know what AVfM is. And I know we have created a culture here that is moving toward a bona fide movement. I know we are prone to occasional squabbles, but the circular diatribes outlining 10,000 ways to split a hair, the ones that drove men like zed to wash their hands of other MRAs, are not part of the program here.

We have succeeded here because we do not allow other men to come in and drag us down with whatever they imagine their justification or "better way" to be.

We don't allow our writers or supporters or other activists to be personally insulted. We invite everyone with better ideas than ours to prove it by doing them, or to find the donation button so we can do it, or hold their silly tongues. We systematically ban people who are not here to support our growth because that is the only way among men it can be done.

We recognize, as zed surely does, that the majority of men will always be their own worst enemy, so we let the minority of men (and women) who are cognizant enough to overcome that stupidity to carry the leverage of authority here.

And it is working. We now have a robust community of men and women who are starting to make it happen on the ground.

Now we can move ahead with that, the few with a fighting chance at changing the world in spite of the many, by refusing to try to drag dead wood with us as we go.

September 5, 2012 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

Finally on September 1, 2012 Tiffany Marie Smith, serial false accuser was arrested. Two proven false reports in 2010 that the Delaware Department of Justice were aware of have still been ignored, but finally the Dover, Delaware Police did the right thing and took police action on her most recent spate of false reports.

Tiffany Marie Smith began her criminal false reports with simple lies, going back to January 26, 2009. Her lies were not investigated by Delaware State Police (DSP) Troop 3 before they ran to the obliging Magistrates at Justice of the Peace Court (JP) and got rubber-stamp warrants. Tiffany was thus encouraged by how easy it was to use the police as a tool to harass and cause fear and alarm and financial and emotional damage to Gordon Smith. She escalated beyond simply lying to police to producing false evidence, conspiring with others to commit her crimes and sustaining injuries to frame Gordon Smith.

January 11, 2010, Tiffany called 911 and reported that Gordon crouched by her car in the parking lot and that she was frightened. The reality was that she had come in a friend's car and arrived before Gordon. He didn't know what car was hers and had gone outside, after meeting her at a fast food restaurant to play with his son. He went to the parking lot to wait for his ride and when he went back in she told him she had called the police. (911 on speed dial) A simple lie didn't work, that night, with the local town police department, so the next day she expounded on the event in a petition for a ex-parte Protection From Abuse order. ("ex-parte" meaning Gordon was not allowed to be present to defend himself.)

January 13, 2010 Tiffany reported to police that a call had been placed by Gordon that he did not place. She showed Delaware State Police an incoming call in her call log from a blocked number and played a voice mail allegedly from Gordon. He never found out if it was someone else on the voice mail recording or if she fabricated evidence by recording a prior message and playing it back into a new message to frame him. It wasn't him that called her. Tiffany had graduated from depending on simple lies to creating false evidence.

That case never went anywhere because he was arrested for violating the ex-parte protection order (PFA) when he had not been served the order and didn't know it existed. It was supposedly a "clerical error" that he was entered into the criminal information system as having been served. Gordon was arrested and taken to Vaughn state prison for twenty hours despite being bailed out within about an hour of his incarceration in prison and despite family court employees realizing the error and trying to get him released. The record was expunged but the nightmarish experience can not be expunged from his mind.

January, 26, 2010 Tiffany made another false allegation based on a call from a blocked number. This time Capitol Police didn't hear the voice mail allegedly left by Gordon but based the charge on the phone log of when the call was received. This was the first proven false report because at the time Tiffany called herself or had someone call from a blocked number, Gordon was in the courthouse, the Kent Family Court, on video surveillance, in a room full of other Respondents, under the watchful eyes of court employees, Bailiffs and Capitol Police. He was not on a phone at the time Tiffany Smith received a call from a blocked number. That is a false report to police. Deputy Attorney General Chris Parker did not drop the charge until the day of trail. Tiffany had moved to Georgia and didn't come back to testify to her false report, although she is no stranger to perjury and has been proven to lie under oath. She knew by then that Gordon had been at the courthouse and could prove he didn't call anyone. Deputy Attorney General Parker did not have Tiffany charged with a false report. Parker fined Tiffany $50 for failing to show up for court to testify. This was the first false police report that could be proven to be a knowingly false report to police, but Tiffany Marie Smith has not been charged for it.

July 16, 2010, Tiffany calls Delaware State Police (DSP) Troop 3 and reports Gordon called her and she had told him not to call but he had been making numerous calls and sending text messages. They get a warrant for phone harassment. They did not check her phone log because he hadn't called or texted her in weeks. Or did they check her phone log and find calls or texts that did not come from him? (Here's an app for bogus evidence.) Gordon had not talked to her since June 28 for her to have the opportunity to tell him not to call. Delaware State Police called Gordon after getting the warrant to tell him he was wanted. Gordon told them he made one phone call and there was no Protection From Abuse prohibiting him from calling the custodial parent of his little boys. He told Delaware State Police that he was on his way to Georgia and would come in to be arrested on the warrant after he got back to Delaware. (See: Injustice in Delaware, Part I)

July 22, 2010. Tiffany had gotten an ex-parte PFA after the July 16 phone call and warrant. Gordon was in Georgia and didn't know about a PFA order. He had not been served yet. That day he went to Wal-Mart and picked up money sent by moneygram from FLAIR to cover expenses and got a ride with two other guys going to Washington, DC to attend the annual Family Preservation Festival.

Tiffany called DSP Troop 3 and showed them a letter that she said she found on her porch. She didn't know what Delaware State Police knew, that Gordon was in Georgia. The letter said "Bitch you filed a PFA, I'm going to fuckking kill you and the boys" (In court she testified it said "my boys"). The Delaware State Police knew Gordon didn't write the letter and did not apply for a warrant for Gordon. They also didn't investigate it as a false report. (Attempt to frame-1st threatening letter) Tiffany was now producing or causing to be produced fabricated physical evidence for police. This is another escalation in her efforts to have Gordon falsely arrested and imprisoned.

August 9, 2010 Tiffany calls DSP Troop 3 at 1:02PM an reports that she just saw Gordon and a friend at her home in Hartly, Delaware at 1 o'clock. Delaware State Police get a warrant for violation of a protection order. Gordon is arrested at which time his friend produced a receipt signed by her and time stamped 12:41 that shows they were in Camden, Delaware. The fast food restaurant they ate at is 28 minutes from Tiffany's house per Google maps. (Second proven false report) Tiffany was not arrested for this well documented false report. It would have been a slam dunk conviction. She and her sister Morgan Evans and then boyfriend Bill Merson lied to Delaware State Police and in court testimony. The physical evidence, receipts and video, contradicted their lies. Evans and Merson were never arrested for conspiracy, being accessories to the crime of false report or felony perjury. This is a further escalation in her criminal activities to involve third parties and this is the second false report that is proven with physical evidence.

August 12, 2010 Tiffany sees Gordon and a friend at Walgreen's. She and her then-boyfriend, Bill who lied about the August 9 incident, go to Dover Police Department and report that Gordon saw them driving by and followed them on foot to Walgreen's and that he and and a friend followed them in a car when they left the store. Dover Police get a warrant for felony stalking and violation of a PFA. Gordon is arrested. In reality Gordon was meeting a friend at Walgreen's, where his friend wanted to stop to make a purchase for herself. He was surprised to see Tiffany come up the aisle. Gordon and his friend went directly to the Dover campus of Wilmington University where they had to submit a form before 5 PM. He didn't see Tiffany's car in the parking lot when he got there and in fact she, apparently, was in her boyfriend's truck which Gordon had never seen and couldn't identify at that time.

September, 2010 Tiffany reports to a local police department that on June 25 Gordon sexually assaulted her. The officer investigates and calls Gordon to discuss the criminal complaint. The officer determines that there is no probable cause to arrest Gordon. He does not arrest Tiffany for filing a false report.

Then we come to the recent false reports; July 28, 2012 Tiffany reported that Gordon said the would kill her. August 13, Tiffany reports threatening note, August 18, Tiffany reports threatening note, August 24 Tiffany reports threatening note, August 28, Tiffany reports physical assault. All false reports. Police have charged her with only three of these five falsifications.

Now that Tiffany Marie Smith has been arrested for three false reports, some think that the story is over. But we are not yet at a happy ending. The Delaware Department of Justice has still to this day refused to have Tiffany Smith arrested for the verifiable false reports of January 26 and August 9, 2012. The false report of August 9 involves multiple counts of crimes and additional parties that are criminally culpable.

Delaware State Police took the August 9, 2010, false report to Deputy Attorney General Chris Parker and he turned his back on the obvious false report. He failed, in his official capacity as Deputy Attorney General to Beau Biden to protect a citizen from harm. He is the same Deputy Attorney general that prosecuted Gordon on the false report of January 26, 2010. Parker knew or should have known that charge was a false report, with Gordon on video not making a call at the time alleged by Tiffany that he had called her in violation of a protection order. Parker should have had Tiffany arrested then. If the Department of Justice had done their job then Gordon would never had to experience the recent hell he has been through since July 28. They failed in their duty.

This is not just a woman who lies about incidents which never happened. This is a woman who frequently fabricates evidence that on the surface, barring contradictory physical evidence, establishes probable cause for arrest and could cause a false conviction. Falsified evidence could have resulted in Gordon going to prison. That, had Gordon not had his own civil rights violated by being put on "probation" and GPS monitoring despite never being convicted of anything, she might have gotten away with. This is a woman who has been proven to conspire with others to lie to police and testify falsely to frame an innocent person for crimes he did not commit.

Tiffany Smith is a very dangerous woman.

In New Hampshire, prosecutors know how to deal with women like this–see New Hampshire vs Ruggiero. In New Hampshire they take them off the street. That is known, in criminology, as direct deterrence. It also sends a message to others doing the same thing or contemplating similar crimes. That is known as indirect deterrence.

Tiffany is in Delaware where they have so far given her a pass on crimes that in New Hampshire would have already sent her to prison. Will the Delaware Department of Justice finally hold Tiffany Smith accountable and punish her for her crimes, or will she get a slap on her wrist and be free to resume her crime spree? Will they look back at the proven false reports from 2010 and finally charge her for those crimes? Will Attorney General Beau Biden's office drop the ball again? We will be watching to answer those questions. We don't have justice in Delaware yet.

A note to MRAs. Gordon Smith is not just another blue pill man in trouble. He is one of us. He is also one of the founders of FLAIR and has worked diligently to reform family law as well as being an activist supporting reform to VAWA. He has a legal defense fund to acquire counsel for his upcoming trial, since at this point all the police action against him has destroyed his professional life and drained him financially. If you can, please drop something into his fund so that he has a chance at qualified representation for his continuing legal battles to see his children, see Tiffany Marie Smith fully answer for her crimes, and recover from his devastating financial losses. Give here.

Mr. theOther, I quit.

Two weeks ago, I spoke to Derek Bedry, a "reporter" for openfile.ca, by phone. He alleged he was doing a story on the posters going up in Vancouver. We chatted for an hour on topics ranging from judicial reform to the effectiveness of polemical writing in human rights activism. Following that call, I might have said he is a journalist. Now, I'll say simply he writes for openfile.ca

To call his article a hit-piece is inadequate. To call it a bizarre and hyperbolic fantasy is inadequate. To be entirely honest, as I write this, I don't know what to make of Bedry's writing. Excrescence might be a suitable term.

But in keeping with Bedry's spirit of utter departure from reality, I will refrain from any attempt to polish this turd, and hand the floor to my intern, Molly Sãmmichhãmmer. Molly has been of invaluable service to me in her capacity as my general assistant, gopher, and sammich maker, and it's been a delight to hear her softly snoring from her basket at the foot of my bed since I took her on a few months ago. So without further preamble, here is Molly:

Thanks to Mr. Bedry's stunning investigative skills, I have discovered, to my considerable shock and dismay, that I am a novice member of an organization with terrorist ties and rape apologetical leanings. It's all right there in Mr. Bedry's opening:

"A poster campaign by a newly formed Vancouver branch of the Men's Rights Movement (MRM) has residents in targeted neighbourhoods taking to the streets and the web in opposition to the organization's links to terrorism and rape apology."

These are very alarming claims. So alarming, I immediately searched the article's body and footnote for links to the sources of these claims. Alas, I was somewhat dismayed by the fact that, no source for these alarming claims are offered anywhere in or near the article. But no matter. Mr. Bedry is a wonderful man, with his community's best interests at heart. I know this, because he says so, and given that he's such an upstanding, fair-minded citizen with such a strong sense of civic duty and justice, in his opinion, I'm prepared to take him at his word.

In fact, on further thought, I should probably thank him for not providing those sources, as it would be very uncomfortable indeed were I to check them and discover that I am, unwittingly, one of these terrorists. Suffice to say that I'm horrified to have learned that I've been making sammiches and folding the underpants of a known terrorist for the last 11 weeks! I plan to call the police about it, and the coast guard, the moment I'm done clearing away his supper dishes and fetching his slippers!

Mr. Bedry goes on to present a self-shot photo of a poster torn from a privately owned construction hoarding. Mr. theOther informed me that he has the permission of the owners of the property to post his misogynistic material. Who would have believed we would have a misogynistic construction company working in THIS neighbourhood? The caption states that “area residents, offended by their message, tore them down”

Offended by what message? Bedry doesn’t say, but I’m very sure it must be something AWFUL. In fact, when Mr. theOther was occupied in the washroom a moment or two ago, I leafed through his poster pile on the coffee table and found what seems to be the offending poster, which reads, in part:

“Men’s rights are human rights.” Shocking rhetoric indeed. Admittedly the contested poster also reads:

You don’t hate African Americans do you?

No, of course not, because you are a decent human being.

You don’t hate Jews do you?

No, of course not, because you are a decent human being.

You don’t hate gays or lesbians do you?

No, of course not, because you are a decent human being.

You don’t hate women do you?

Of course not, you are a decent human being.

You dont hate men do you?

Do you?

Men’s rights are human rights.

Still, it’s one of those trick endings that make you think it’s saying something it’s not really saying. You THINK it’s saying “Men’s rights are human rights”, but what it’s really saying is that women aren’t people. Clear as day, for anyone with eyes to read. I’m actually beginning to think it was a mistake to come work for Mr. theOther. He’s a tricky sort, for sure, even if my basket is very comfortable.

This is the poster under dispute. The poster which Derek Bedry’s reportage notes does “not believe the posters meet the community’s standards”. Very mild language on Mr. Bedry’s part, if you ask me–this is hate speech, pure and simple. The more I read of this article, the more convinced I am that the phrase, “men’s rights are human rights” not only does not meet the community’s standards, it does not meet the criteria for simple human decency.

I find myself vehemently agreeing with the poster-tearer-downer who was quoted, “Obviously [sex equality] is a discussion we need to have out in the open, not with finger-pointing and trying to tear each other down.” It’s clear to me that Mr. theOther is trying to tear these poor people down, whose only crime was tearing down posters which they find offensive. In fact, in protesting the tearing down of his posters, Mr. theOther is virtually censoring these people!

The sentiments of a second poster-tearer-downer echoed the first: “It’s really just an echo chamber of misogyny and hatred of women in general” echoed Jamie Jim Jimmy James Russel.

I’m starting to become very upset with Mr. theOther. He had me fooled into thinking I was part of a movement for equality, and here he is, censoring the echoes of these concerned citizens by exercising his right to speak! Sometimes a person's right to speak must be suspended, Mr. theOther, when more numerous and mainstream folks feel their voices are not being heard.

Mr. Bedry also reveals: "The MRM is known worldwide for it's connection with acts of mass violence."

Bedry's scrupulous research also such identified Men's rights notables Anders Breivik and Marc Lepine. I have since heard that other links to famous undesirables have been uncovered, to Charles Manson, Tim McVeigh, Jack the Ripper, Charton Heston, Mecha-Godzilla, and Ron Jeremy.

This clearly demonstrates the complete evil of bloggers and poster hanging misogynists in the MRM. Although there are rumors that Osama Bin Laden was sympathetic to the MRM, he didn't make the membership requirements, as he's not a privileged white male. However, his clear (possible) sympathy with MRM issues is damning indeed.

These are all very bad fellows, many of them unshaven, and I'm glad somebody finally told me. I'll be seeking help soon from the police, and possibly the Coast Guard. The sooner these devils are behind bars, where they can't put up any more posters, the better.

I've forwarded this article to Mr theOther's AVoiceforMen Radio co-hosts. Girl Writes What, who as I type these words, sits in a skype video window in the corner of my screen, drinking somewhat immoderately, and clutching her ample, heaving, generous and milk-white bosom at hearing the news of her affiliation with known terrorists, expressed gratitude to Mr. Bedry and his poster-tearer-downers at removing the scales from her eyes. She now sees Mr. theOther as the misogynist people-tearer-downer and censor-by-free-speecher that he is.

Dr Tara Palmatier, who co-hosts Paul Elam's Weekly radio show has been dispatched a copy of this article, and a fainting couch. Well intentioned bystanders have loosened the good doctor's bodice and are applying tincture of harts horn beneath her delicate nostrils.

Typhon Blue, when reached for comment reported she had long suspected AVfM founder Paul Elam, and my ~~master~~ boss Mr. theOther – were both lurching hateful and violent misogynists. However, Typhon, in the interests of science, is determined to continue writing for the web site, and co-hosting AVoiceforMen Radio. A brave frontierswoman, clearly.

Bedry also notes the connection between Thomas James Ball and the MRM. Although unknown to virtually everyone in the world prior to setting himself on fire in an act of vile terrorism that caused much upset, inconvenience and discomfort to public officials, AVFM's posthumous publishing of his manifesto is clear evidence that they were in cahoots with him all along. I am equally certain, upon further readings of Mr. Bedry's article for the purpose of my critique, that appeals to violent protest and revolution within Thomas Ball's manifesto were redacted by computer glitch or administrative error.

Obviously it was not intentional, and this is a continued technical problem on the site, as the true intentions of AVfMs editorial mandate are to instigate violent overthrow of the government, and the rape and domestic enslavement of all women. Sammiches don't make themselves, you know.

For real academic expertise on the men's rights movement, Mr. Bedry interviewed feminist law professor Janine Benedet, who noted the MRM's recent success equalizing the legal process for fathers in divorces and custody battles. However Benedet regarded the MRM's attention focusing on keeping rape law consistent with criminal law as "disturbing". Adherence to legal due process is of course, creepy, in cases of rape. Any decent person can see that!

Benedet also stressed the importance of resisting the men's rights movement: "These groups are working really hard to turn back the clock"

Mr theOther, who has not given me an official comment to use in this article, did mutter under his breath: "Why isn't she wearing her house frock, the ignorant, impertinent slattern?" Or at least, that's what I imagine he muttered. It's just what a misogynist like him would say.

Another concerned citizen made it clear that the community knows how to deal with men who claim to not be rapists or monsters. Sylvania MacFurlong stated "I think we're responding with outrage, tearing the posters down, having a really visceral reaction to this." Clearly, the tearing down of posters in protest to Mr. theOther's attempts to silence and censor the mostly feminist community by protesting their tearing down of his posters, is the only rational response of concerned community members. "Because they are woman haters," MacFurlong added "a big part of activism in Vancouver is trying to build an alternative."

We certainly need alternatives to the claim that "men's rights are human rights"! Mr. theOther, you ought to be ashamed to say such a thing!

Vancouver's Commercial Drive neighbourhood is renowned for a welcoming, diverse and broadly accepting community. That diversity can only be protected by tearing down posters that upset the majority of the community. Any decent person can see that.

Mr. Bedry, I applaud your tireless efforts to inform the public about this menace to the common good. And I shall both call the police AND terminate my employment with Mr. theOther, as soon as I'm done running his bath.

AVfM Radio: the cost of violence

September 6, 2012 | by AVfM Radio | Link | Original Link

The cost of violence is what makes it repellant. We imagine–as so called civilized human beings–that it is the negative outcome of our own potential violence on our potential targets that we seek to avoid when we reject violence both in principle and in practice. But this may simply be post facto rationalization. Rather than a higher sense of morals, it may be the cost in hazard of direct initiation of violence that shaped our civilized aversion to it, as well as the psychological ease with which we justify, excuse or simply don't even recognize as violence the initiation of violent force through a proxy.

Girl Writes What, John the Other and Typhon Blue will put the gloves on (the latex surgical gloves) and take a look at the finer details of the use of force's in enforcing often violent social norms, authoritarian coercion and rigorous preservation of an existing status quo.

Somewhere in England, something is…happening. It is there, just in the corner of your eye, nagging at you like something scratching in the night. It is at your feet, in the wrinkled folds of a dead leaf, or in the scent of a fresh bloomed flower. It is nestled in the pages of books on feminism, all of them, that line the shelves in the public library, and on the riveted steel underbellies of railroad trestles. It is on the concrete blocks of foundations and on the hardened faces of brick walls.

It is an idea that is rising up from everywhere, and nowhere. It is spreading, though the infrastructure of human consciousness. It is plain, and obscure, both disturbing to the comfortable and comforting to the disturbed. It is a source of anxiety for those made anxious by change, and by truth that is disconcerting, no matter how obvious.

Storms are not the breath of the gods. Disease is not the calling card of evil spirits. The world, no matter how some will wish, is not flat.

And feminism…is a hate movement.

The writing is on the wall now, from the US, to Canada, to Australia, to the UK and beyond. The truth is growing and moving through the collective consciousness like a mist, permeating everything, impossible to turn away from, and to deny. Pass it around, gents and ladies. A revolution in human thought is emerging.

An industry of human damage for cash

Barry Nolan seemingly wants domestic violence to continue without amelioration.

Or, possibly, he's simply too stupid to be taken seriously. However, I don't think that's the case.

At the start of September 2012, Nolan published an article in Boston Magazine, opening with an item of naked fear mongering.

> Angry, radical men's groups believe males are being victimized by out-of-control judges and politicians. They're wrong and they're dangerous and they need to be stopped.

There's that emotional hot button again, the claim of danger and the cultivation of fear.

Contrasting Mr. Nolan's idiotic lies, a small detour into another oppositional ideologue's attack on the MRM is worth revisiting.

"It should be mentioned that the SPLC did not label MRAs as members of a hate movement; nor did our article claim that the grievances they air on their websites – false rape accusations, ruinous divorce settlements and the like – are all without merit." [1] (emphasis mine)

Arthur Goldwag managed dropped this admission in his backpedalling after being pasted by Reason Magazine, Business Insider and the American Spectator for the SPLC's irresponsible fear-mongering about the MRM of last year.

Barry Nolan's moronic fantasy that men are not "victimized by out-of-control judges and politicians" depends on a readership completely out of touch with the universally known reality of anti-father bias in family courts.

According to Nolan about the MRM : "They're wrong and they're dangerous."

I guess old Barry doesn't have any male friends, or perhaps, none of them have been divorced. Must be a small circle he travels in. Of course, Nolan's piece vacillates several times between sanity and hysteria. He describes several father's rights activists who, concerned by the anti-male bias they've witnessed in the family court system, each regularly participate in meetings of the Massachusetts Governor's Council.

And hold on to your socks, these terrifying father's rights activists oppose anti-father policies and rulings. Oh no. Quoting Nolan, "One thing the Fatherhood Council is particularly concerned about is restraining orders, which it insists are used in a way that's biased against men."

Nolan paints a picture in which this claim is outlandish. An outrageous fantasy of restraining orders issued frivolously, abused, weaponized against innocent men.

He apparently counts on a total disconnect from reality in his readers. Mis-use and abuse of restraining orders is so well known that a google search returns scores of articles on the topic[2][3][4][5]. The problem is an old one, and even fellow bostonian and libertarian feminist Cathy Young[6] has written about it.

Nolan's commentary on the political success of men's and father's rights activists steers the predictable course of reiterated feminine victimhood, and the tiresome lie that the small successes of these activists have an aim of placing women into danger.

The Duluth Model, a popular approach to domestic violence, relies on a false and cartoonish model of partner violence, that violence has one sex, male, and that victimhood has the other sex, female. The pretend picture of women only victims is of course very effective as an emotional fund raising tool. However, opposition to a model which recognizes only half the perpetrators and half the victims is doomed to inadequately address the problem, but it will keep filling shelters with victims.

A one-sexed one directional approach to domestic violence makes about as much sense as fighting a building fire by only spraying water on north or south facing walls, and letting west and east facing walls burn freely.

The recently stalled renewal of VAWA has in Barry Nolan's narrative a motive of justified battery against women. In reality, the bill was stalled due to the republican party's apparent objection to the inclusion of lesbians, gays and bisexuals, but it is the abrogation of legal due process – and the incentivization of fraud by both claimants and prosecutors — which men's activists most strongly object to. The previous version of VAWA has so much legal and financial fraud built into it that identifying one set of problems is beyond the scope of any single online discussion.

Observing that domestic violence in the real world is most commonly reciprocal, Nolan manages to spin the fact that in female initiated violence women are most often injured, as if this is justification for injury. The abject depravity of this characterization exceeds description. Quoting Nolan: "In other words: She was asking for it, officer."

Not in other words. Only in Barry's words.

Nolan lists a number of successes in the activism of Fathers and Families and the Fatherhood Coalition, but lacking a rational rebuttal – elects to cultivate fear. Opposition to unjust and easily abused legislation is characterized by Nolan as removal of women's protection against violence. Naming a Massachusetts statute, Nolan portrays it's accurate description in the colors of hysterical hyperbole.

> The fundamental idea behind 209A is that men are inherently batterers and women are fundamentally victims.

Absurd as such a view on domestic violence sounds, like many other laws built on the Duluth model of DV – this is an accurate picture of much current DV legislation

Barry Nolan also goes goes back to the source of sensationalist fear-mongering at the ever-more-credible SPLC, noting that "men's groups are having successes like this all over the country. Citing Rita Smith of the National Coalition Against Domestic Violence who apparently told the Southern Poverty Law Center's Intelligence Report that such groups have 'taken over the courts' ".

This bit of hyperbole aside, father's and men's rights groups have succeeded in gaining a legal voice, which is appropriate in a functional society. Compared to previous exclusion of anyone besides gender ideologues, this is a great improvement, but the legal travesties played out against men like Vladek Filler and Gordon Smith are sadly typical in a deeply broken legal system requiring continued attention.

Nolan manages to portray small successes opposing legal corruption in terms of imminent disaster. "They [men's rights activists] have been able to get custody evaluators, mediators, guardians ad litem, and child protective service workers to believe that women and children lie about abuse."

Imagine the horror, the evil, frightening and dangerous MRAs convinced CPS workers and court officials that some women lie about abuse. Of course, we all know women do not lie, they simply cannot lie, because they're not really human beings, but perfect pure creatures of divine aether.

The bad men must be stopped! Legal reforms in which men and fathers are afforded consideration as humans with rights must not continue! Somebody, think of the children!!!

But like a good-cop, bad-cop routine, where both rolls are played by the same hammy actor, Nolan breifly takes the responsible citizen tack, creating plausible deniability for himself. Claiming in a moment of apparent opposition to his earlier fear-mongering that "It's true that the family courts should be better staffed, and better trained to sort out the truth, assess the risks, and ensure that kids are kept safe, happy, and healthy. And men's groups certainly have every right to try to change the law. That's how democracy works". And of course, there is no "war on men".

In the next paragraph of course, the fantasist is back. Nolan claims that: "women's groups" need to wake up and get involved, which they've apparently been slow to do.

There are two lies here, one of which is obvious. The known anti male bias in family courts didn't happen by accident, it is the result of decades of vigorous activism. But Barry's second lie is the use of the term "women's groups". The implication is that women's and men's interests exclude each other, and that fathers or men's rights activism is hostile to women, or children or their human rights.

Doubling down on the implied lie, Nolan cites Toni Troop of Jane Doe Inc., a Massachusetts domestic violence advocacy group using the Duluth model of DV. According to Troop: "People see through their rhetoric and their repeated attempts to undermine safety for the real victims of domestic violence."

I was not, until reading Nolan's excellent and completely truthful reportage that the men's rights movement, or indeed, my own activism was built on "repeated attempts to undermine safety for the real victims of domestic violence".

Well shit, I guess we should all stop doing that, and instead, take up hobbies. Knitting sounds nice.

Nolan re-iterates his double lie that the human rights of women are in danger from MRAs, and that gender ideological activists haven't dominated family law and domestic violence law for decades.

"More women's and mothers' groups need to start attending these meetings and demanding a seat at the table"

The unstated equivalence is that gender ideologues and women are the same thing. Women happen to be people identifiable by their sex, the doctrine commonly using the label of feminism is an ideology; a thing formed from ideas. Ideologies and people aren't the same, but Nolan apparently can't tell them apart. Many father's rights activists happen to be women.

And in case he hasnt made himself clear yet, Barry quotes Mr VAWA himself, repeating Vice President Joe Biden's flowery and dishonest emotional hype.

> Violence against women reflects as much a failure of our nation's collective moral imagination as it does the failure of our nation's laws and regulations…it deserves our profound public outrage.

As ever from ideological thinkers, in mention of violence or of domestic violence, the limiting clause is invoked. "against women".

Although Nolan himself noted earlier in his article that DV is commonly bi directional and reciprocal, the fiction to be preserved is that women are the sole victims, and men are the sole perpetrators. This is the Duluthian view – the one guaranteed to tap into protective instincts from men and generate donations, but also guaranteed to continue the problem of violence by addressing it with a nonfunctional model.

According to Nolan, it's time after 20 years of VAWA to become outraged "again". In fact, it's 20 years past time, because those who've controlled the policies of family courts, of VAWA-funded laws and who've shaped decades of public messaging on domestic violence with a known fiction did so to keep the funding. And that has kept the violence flowing.

That is the result when ideology is placed in primacy over evidence, and violent behavior is enabled and justified by gender ideologues whose salaries depend on perpetual female victimhood, and the narrative of "male violence". Giving the problem of partner violence a sex is a sick game of pretend, and it produces real human carnage.

The outrage Barry Nolan calls for is entirely appropriate, but misplaced, and decades late to arrive. And the fear he seeks to cultivate is appropriate for those whose comfortable jobs depend on maintenance of a one sided fiction of male evil and the saccharine sickly fantasy of women as not fallible humans like the rest of us, but perfect, sweet eternal victims.

And to the politicians, the court employees and officials who continue to operate from ideology rather than evidence, and maintain a corrupt, broken system pouring damage, pain and destroying lives of individuals and families, Yes, Nolan is right when he says be afraid.

Cutting to the chase

September 6, 2012 | by Peter Lloyd | Link | Original Link

Why the latest severed penis crime proves that domestic violence against men STILL isn't taken seriously (and that women are no less dangerous).

Earlier this week, MailOnline detailed the story of Huaman Julia Muńez: a Peruvian woman arrested for cutting off her boyfriend's penis and flushing it down the toilet.

Her defenceless victim, 46 year-old Ramon Arias Apayco, suffered the violent assault while sleeping in a hostel.

Currently in intensive care, he will no longer be able to urinate without medical intervention, enjoy sex or father children. The reason? Infidelity. And suspected infidelity at that.

Immediately, the story went viral. News sites across the world re-reported it – some sympathetically, others with glee, as if this terrible assault was karmic revenge for all the hideous sex crimes committed against women since the beginning of time.

It's not. It's an extreme form of sexually-related domestic violence – and something which is increasingly common for men across the world.

Last year, Katherine Kieu Becker was arrested in California for drugging her husband's dinner, tying him to their bed and severing his penis before destroying it in a garbage disposal unit. When police arrived she told them "he deserved it". Why? Because he'd asked for a divorce.

In December 2011, 70 year-old Virginia Valdez was detained in Los Angeles for savagely attacking her husband's genitals with industrial scissors. She will now answer to charges of assault with a deadly weapon, spousal abuse and mayhem.

Prior to that, in 2004, Liverpudlian Amanda Monti was jailed for ripping off – an attempting to swallow – one of her ex-boyfriend's testicles, simply because he rejected her advances at a party.

And in April this year, Sinead Walker from Bath was arrested for trying to tear her ex-partner's penis from his body with her bare hands. The unprovoked attack, which was also reported by the MailOnline, happened while her victim was already making a desperate 999 call for help.

Although these cases seem rare – and people will argue that they pale in comparison to attacks suffered by women – the reality is very, very different.

In Thailand, rates of penis removal are so high that doctors are having to specialise in re-attaching severed organs – assuming that patients don't die of blood loss first. If these victims were women with destroyed vaginas, there'd be an outcry.

This is mine. Especially as these vile crimes have nothing to do with self-defence or survival. They're about women assuming a right to avenge a broken heart.

The same mis-guided belief, I assume, that violent men feel when they throw acid in their ex-girlfriend's face.

The difference is, however, that society rightly condemns violence against women – but not men.

I was a 12 year-old boy in 1993 when Lorena Bobbitt became an icon for slicing off her husband's penis because: "He always have [sic] [an] orgasm and he doesn't wait for me to have [an] orgasm. He's selfish."

The price she paid for this? Not a single day in jail.

The message it sent out? That men deserve everything they get for having the bad taste to be male.

As a child, this incident – and how she escaped justice – resonated with me. Not least because it was celebrated. Intelligent female figures like Jo Brand joked about the matter, creating a culture which cheered violent women.

As someone who was bullied by girls at school (because they knew I ethically couldn't – and wouldn't – hit back), I could see the manipulation of my gender on a micro and macro level.

Nineteen years on and nothing has changed. Men – like the boys who will grow up to be abused men – are still fed the same sexist mantra that I was at 12: 'hell hath no fury like a woman scorned'.

This is particularly dangerous when women they'll share a bed with believe it.

Twelve months ago, while talking about Katherine Kieu Becker's case on live television, Sharon Osbourne claimed that it was "fabulous". The next day, she was forced to apologise trough gritted teeth – but clearly had no idea why her comments were so wicked in the first place.

And this is the root of the problem: dangerous ignorance.

Not least because official statistics prove that men are almost equal victims of domestic violence.

According to charity Mankind Initiative, for every three victims of partner abuse, two will be female, one will be male. Likewise, one in six men and one in four women will suffer domestic abuse in their lifetime.

Despite this, the lion's share of resources – including government funding – only ever serves females. In fact, most shelters actively turn men away.

Don't believe me? Ask Erin Pizzey – the woman who, in 1971, founded the world's first-ever domestic violence safehouse. A heroine, she herself had to flee Britain after radicalised feminists sent her death threats for saying that men also suffer abuse. Something which is backed up by fact, after fact, after fact. And death, after death, after death.

The added proof that lesbian relationships experience near-identical rates of violence to heterosexual ones is further evidence that women also communicate with their fists.

But society continues to fail us by turning a blind eye. Apparently, us men already have it too good. Try telling that to Ramon Arias Apayco and his family who were weeping on Peruvian TV.

Yes, my comments will be ridiculed and rejected, but all inconvenient truths are at first. My main hope is that all victims will be offered the protections they deserve: regardless of gender.

Hopefully, in light of this week's latest tragedy, the law will deliver a clear message that domestic violence is no less horrendous when the attacker is female.

But, if it fails to – like it famously did in 1993 – then myself and other men's activists will have to step in and fight back.

After all, that's basic self-defence.

Things might be different tomorrow

September 6, 2012 | by Rod Van Mechelen | Link | Original Link

Sometimes we need to remind ourselves what wonders the future holds in store for us to keep from getting too depressed and worn down by the bigotry and problems of the present.

Paul was awake. Like a light switch. One moment he was deep in REM, the next his eyes popped open. Idly he toggled on his intraocular display and checked diagnostics. It showed all systems nominal. Even after almost five years, Paul still took youthful delight in the capabilities of his cerebral cortical implant. The spintronics chip in the implant was no bigger than a hair, yet it had more computational power than a thousand of the old personal computers at the beginning of the 21st Century. Five years since he had gotten his implant and it still seemed like the stuff of science fiction. Waking up fully refreshed and ready for another 23-hour-day after only an hour of "sleep" was no fiction, however, and Paul had work to do.

Uplinking to the web, he pinged JtO and found him already at the studio.

"Hey buddy," JtO responded, "are you going to sleep all night?"

Paul smiled. Nobody needed much sleep anymore. "I'll be over after I shower."

"Shower?" JtO snorted. "Decadent beast!"

Paul chuckled as he broke the link. Nanoengineered graphene clothing made bathing unnecessary, but he allowed himself the luxury of a real shower every few days. As he relaxed in the hot spray he toggled on the intraocular display again and picked out working grays to wear for the day. The 3-D printer was just finishing as he stepped out. Dried and dressed, he went to the kitchen and gulped down the nutritionally perfect smoothie that was waiting for him there.

Ready to go, he ascended to his living room and out the front door, where he paused to admire the heavily forested landscape. Ever since monolithic domes became popular replacements for the relatively flimsy and wasteful stick frame houses, millions of people had opted to put the bulk of their living areas underground. Many neighborhoods now looked more like parks or even pristine wilderness than sprawling suburbs.

Paul considered then discarded the idea of running the more than 10 miles to Karen's GWW Studio Productions facilities. With the youthful and athletic physique afforded by modern longevity technologies, he often went running for hours at a time just for the joy of it. But today he was in a hurry, and activated his Lit C-17 Motorcycle. As the gyroscopes hummed to life and the stand retracted, he opened the door, settled himself in the comfortable seat and glided down the driveway.

Over the years, Lit had gone through several series, but the C-17 was his favorite. Unlike early versions, it could seat two abreast, and with the custom installed ultracapacitors fully charged by the onboard E-Cat reactor, he had an effective range of 20,000 miles between "fill ups."

Once on the highway headed toward town, he let the autonav take over. He was in a hurry, but if he cranked it up to 300 KPH he was liable to flash though town before he could stop. And besides, he wanted a few minutes to review the night's work ahead, and brought up a visual of the preparations to be made for the morning shoot.

Following the Singularity, all forms of bigotry-including what used to be considered politically correct prejudices like the feminists' sexism-had fallen into disrepute. In the almost 30 years since then, few remembered what it had been like for the early proponents of Equalitarianism. Their names were remembered. Men like the gentle but redoubtable Warren Farrell, the irascible Richard Doyle, Fred Hayward, David Ault and many others. Women like Christina Hoff Sommers and Cathy Young, Lisa Scott, Typonblue and GWW, whose studios they were using. But to most people, with the exception of present day mogul-celebrities like GWW, they were little more than names in the archives. AVfM intended to change that with a docudrama about the early days of what later historians called the Equalitarian Movement.

Much had changed during the century from the 1960s to the 2070s. It all began in 2014 when biotech companies first subdued and then began to take control of viruses. After they eliminated all of the viral diseases, they began to engineer viruses to extend and enhance life. Next were the breakthroughs in spintronic chip technology that led to the creation of VI: virtual intelligence. It fell short of the original goal to create a self-aware artificial intelligence, but people still thought of them as self-aware, and often treated them like real beings, if not friends. Virtual intelligence was that sophisticated.

The VI's were capable of intuitive leaps by design. This, coupled with breakthroughs in ultra-capacitors and what used to be called "cold fusion," gave scientists the resources they needed to make more breakthroughs in just a few decades than in all of human history prior to that time. Like the Zero Point Module, matter transmutation, the elimination of hunger, poverty and disease. Together, these caused a counter-intuitive decline in the global population that eventually became permanent as billions moved off planet to colonize the solar system.

No longer saddled by the need to engage in the "daily grind," it didn't take long for humans to gorge themselves on gizmos, gadgets and distractions of every kind. But after a while it all got to be too much and most sought to use the array of advances to cut down the clutter of daily life, celebrate simplicity and engage in more fulfilling pursuits. Among other things, this produced the development and widespread adoption of the cerebral cortical implant.

Paul smiled at that. With an effective IQ now of over 800, it was almost hard to remember why some things used to matter so much.

In a world of abundance, when anybody who wanted could join a colony to suit their beliefs, or start one of their own, or even fly off into deep space for the modern equivalent of a "walkabout," war was a thing of the past. Politics, a hobby for some, was largely ignored by the majority. Oh, nation states still existed, but their focus was more cultural than political. And since most adults had a cerebral cortical implant, which could translate any human language, communication no longer posed a barrier.

Paul broke out of his reverie as the C-17 angled off the highway. He disengaged the autonav and drove the few remaining blocks to the entrance of GWW Studio Productions, and pulled into a parking space next to JtO's classic C-14. After GM filed for bankruptcy and "cold fusion" and ultracapacitors made gasoline engines obsolete, the Lits became very popular.

Karen's GWW Studio was one of the few facilities in town to have several buildings above ground. They were necessary, she had once explained to him with an expression of wry patience usually reserved for a parent explaining the obvious to a small child, for the outdoor scenes in her many dramatic and documentary projects.

After sunrise, they were going to need that for a depiction of one of the many feminist protest marches. This one was of what had been called a "slut walk." Paul laughed. The idea that women might need protection from men was a concept foreign to anybody born after the Singularity, when it was no longer possible to lie about criminal behavior. And with life expectancies now being counted in centuries rather than years or even decades, the concept of modesty had changed so radically that the word "slut" had lost all meaning. He had no doubt that most would view the slut walk scene with the same amusement that audiences of a bygone era had enjoyed as they watched Charlie Chaplin elude the Keystone Kops.

"Yes," he thought as he descended the stairs to the front office, "life is good."

This kind of future is possible. We face many challenges. The most daunting, however, are social, cultural and political. Scientists and engineers are making incredible progress to develop most of what I describe in the short scene above, although I'm not yet persuaded that the zero point energy module is a reality or that there is such a thing as the LeClair Effect that can be used to transmute water into other elements. And I stole the idea for a cerebral cortical implant from one of my favorite authors, L. Neil Smith. But as for the rest, most if not all are likely to begin coming to market this decade.

Will you be ready? That is one of the big questions. We are so accustomed to thinking in terms of scarcity and the apparently insurmountable opposition of the feminists' hate male campaign, not to mention the innumerable wars raging around the world, that such a future seems implausible, if not impossible.

Confronted by the imminent probability of a global depression, the pervasive sexism and other uncertainties, it's easy to lose sight of the possibility that tomorrow might be different. It will be different. Will those differences lift up human kind, or will it lift up only a few? That is another big question, and one we will eventually have to answer.

I prefer to view the challenges as opportunities, the possibilities as exciting, and being here to witness and be a part of such a pivotal time in human history as a blessing. The future is what we make it. So let's make it a good one, and try to have fun while we're doing it.

The weekend’s here. Swagger, brothers. Swagger.

September 7, 2012 | by Stephen O'Brian | Link | Original Link

---

The sound is made by just 3 guys. We are sonically in your face – wall of sound — chainsaw wailing guitar, piercing electro synth and pounding rock rhythms.

You want Swagger? We’ve got it covered.

The idea of using my musical ability as an MRA has been percolating in my hind brain for a couple of years now. As a daily reader and occasional contributor to A Voice for Men, listening to AVfM Radio and visiting other MRA sites regularly means that Men’s Rights is constantly on my mind. So, my MRA consciousness is bound to surface somewhere in any art I embark upon.

I confess I didn’t design this music video consciously as an MRA message, but being an MRA in a way that’s what it largely turned out to be nonetheless.

When my band (3 guys) had finished first playing and recording this song live we had one of those moments musicians often have of looking at each other awestruck with a kind of mutual admiration which said “Jeeze, did we actually do that? Cool guys!”

Teamwork. Synergy. The sum is greater than the parts and all that. It’s a guy thing.

Then I got to work on putting video imagery next to the music we’d created. When they saw the video for the first time we were gob-smacked again. It’s chock full of images men can relate to – a guided missile, eagle and cheetah hunting, jet aircraft and a high powered motorcycle at full throttle, runway dance swagger, military teamwork and bravery, high tech playfulness, raw wilderness, cutting edge scientific research, urban spaces constructed and running at full tilt and moving at a blistering pace into a future city of lights. It’s what men do. It’s cram packed with stuff feminists shit their pants over – unapologetic swaggering masculinity.

I dig it. It’s ballsy.

Don’t like it sisters and feminized brothers?

Tough. Go create your own whimpering wheedle victim sound.

I strut on guitar and love it. Nowhere do I feel more alive. Swagger.

I’ve been playing guitar for many years – self-taught. Swagger.

My guitars have helped me cathart during times of feminist insanity more times than I can recall. I truly don’t know how I would have made it this far without playing guitar. For my guitar doesn’t make maddening “man up” BS demands and treat me with misandry as a disposable utility. My guitar is a vehicle for channeling myriad feelings including outrage, pain, loneliness, exuberance and yes, ballsy swagger. I thoroughly recommend guys taking up electric guitar and getting primal as a healthy move.

It’s a workout – physically and emotionally.

The thing I love about playing and recording music, then adding video imagery is the way the music can cut right through allot of intellectualizing (which I don’t knock as it’s important and I do plenty of it at times too) and straight to what's washing around in the limbic system. Also it's the old thing of a picture tells a thousand words – well, with a bit of judicious video editing to which I'm still quite new, that can be multiplied many times over.

I agree with wholeheartedly Dean Esmay – "music is the language of feelings and sometime we just have to express ourselves".

I'd love to collaborate online with other MRA musicians as part of a team to produce an MRA album. It needn't be all outrage, as I know tenderness, loss and whimsy are important parts of who we are, too. I don't sing, but recording is easy for me as I have a well-equipped home studio – guitars, synths, drum machines, samplers, sequencers and mixing software. Transfer of sound and video files via internet is fairly straight forward with Drop box and the like.I welcome requests to do such.

However, if all this video does is inspire one person to create powerful music and video imagery with a solid MRA message, then job done as far as I'm concerned.

MRM. Men's Rights Music! A new genre?

Swagger Brothers, Swagger.

Thanks to Dean Esmay for his inspiring post –

Rebecca Watson, hero and mathematician

There are a few kinds of whores in the world. To begin with there is your typical whore, the Main Street walking, garden variety anybody's whore, consistent with the imagery the word conjures up. Almost always this is a woman. This is also, interestingly, the one variety of honest whore. A review of the others will explain.

We'll start with your corporate whore, the morally unctuous sleazoid that readily sacrifices values and human decency in order to ascend the corporate ladder. Historically, most corporate whores were men, but we have pretty much reached a whorish sexual symmetry since women set out to prove that they could be as soulless as the most soulless man, and succeeded.

Next, there is your stupid whore, the individual that sells out their ability to reason and indeed to add 2 and 2 if it creates cognitive dissonance with respect to their subscribed belief system. It is not dishonesty in the truest sense of the word. It's more like a mental defect – a sort of retardation — that prevents them from confronting inconsistencies in their chosen ideology. The stupid whore constantly confuses speculation with fact and indoctrination with enlightenment. They conflate the way the world is with the way they think it ought to be, and it always makes them look, well, stupid (think most members of the two mainstream political parties, most feminists, most religious zealots, a growing number of Atheists, and maybe most of them). Again, with this type of whore we see a more or less even distribution of the sexes.

Next is what is dubbed as the lying whore. This is the whore that dogmatically clings to a set of beliefs that they know little about, haven't investigated and don't completely, or even remotely, understand. They choose what they believe because they imagine it serves them to believe it whether it makes any sense or not. They will go ahead and add 2 plus 2, insist the answer is 5, and convey that to you with a doofy, hubristic grin on their face.

We have to keep in mind that 2 plus 2 is not the operative equation for the lying whore, because this kind of whore has already determined the answer regardless of the question. In other words, they start with 5 and employ it with whatever equation is presented. 2 plus 2 equals 5. 5 times 2 also equals 5, as does 137 divided by 4.6. The square root of 76,458 is also 5. It goes on and on.

You see, this kind of mathematical wizardry is employed by feminists, both male and female, that estimate every social malady ever documented stems from patriarchy, and conclude that feminism is about equality and is good for men, too.

Like the corporate whore, they know they are lying, but they do it for what they think is a cause, not because it might earn them a rung up on the corporate ladder. Sometimes a lying whore can also be a corporate whore, at least those that are better at multitasking, but their primary interest is whoring for the cause. This kind of whore rounds out the distribution among polemicists, feminists, fundamentalists and PZ Myers.

Last, we have your stupid, lying whore. Now, it must be made clear that this is not just a lying whore who also happens to be a stupid whore, though that also happens. No, this is a different subspecies of whore altogether. The stupid, lying whore is the whore that rigorously abandons intellect, rationale, evidence, decency and compassion, and also fosters much deserved hostility toward themselves, in order to further something; not a cause or an ideology, but themselves.

The stupid, lying whore will not be satisfied with touting the latest collective disinformation. That only serves shared political objectives, and utterly fails to put the focus on them personally. The stupid, lying whore cannot sit long without telling, well, ah, stupid lies, even doing so to play on the gullibility of their peers, whose personal attention and sympathy they seek as much as from the rest of the world.

Speaking of stupid, lying whores, let's discuss Rebecca Watson's latest article at Skepchick.org, a blogging community of women (and one token dude) who write about science and skepticism, as long as it does not contradict feminist ideology.

Rebecca has written something called, Misandry: A How-To. The article itself is not about misandry, or, obviously, how to do it. It is about how she and other women who trash and demonize men regularly are helpless victims, getting nasty emails and tweets from some people who don't like it.

Once such comment came from an individual who penned, "Hope Dawkins will bestially rape you…in the elevator to hell." This of course references the fact that Richard Dawkins views Watson as a bit of a moron, as well as the fact that she was once so offended by a man in an elevator for inviting her to coffee that she did a YouTube rant on it directed at everyone on the planet with a penis.

Another comment suggested she kill herself, but not before being raped, and that she was a "jokey cunt."

There were literally like 6 whole examples of nasty remarks from people who don't like her, and indeed some were less than sophisticated and intelligent. They were spread out as screen shots in between her pointing to other feminist women who just could not bear the pressure of similar treatment, and a nice story about how she once valiantly saved a cat, despite the protestations of her less than sympathetic, obviously male boyfriend, and how that proved she was the kind of person that always stepped up.

2 plus 2 equals Rambo for kitties.

So, Rebecca Watson has put the world on notice. She is going to continue to write about science and skepticism as long as it agrees with artsy feminist mythology. Torpedoes, twitter and cat hating boyfriends be damned, she is not going to stop.

She is a brave, relentless woman who stands fearless in the face of taunting tweets, caustic comments and evil emails. Triple alliteration on the house.

But one does have to wonder what she would be like under real pressure. I have a keeper file of death threats, but I never wrote an article about them. I have been hounded recently by half the media hacks in Canada, who wrote hit pieces on AVfM before ever talking to me, and only made contact as a fishing expedition for something to twist out of context as icing on their cake. This website and myself personally, have been attacked as agents of hate by the SPLC, who no more investigated their claims than Barry Nolan looked in to the MRM before declaring we were dangerous and had to be stopped.

One of our own, Dan Moore, was invited to kill himself by feminists, after it was discovered that he was suicidal.

Difficult? Sometimes. But it does not even compare to John the Other facing a gang of 20-30 assholes on the street, some wielding box cutters, outraged at him for putting up posters that said, "Men's rights are human rights." These are the same ignorant fucks that are currently online bragging at Athiest+, calling themselves the Femistasi. Anyone care to consider the math on that?

2 plus 2 equals stupid, lying, whining whore. What John and other MRAs are starting to encounter every day, and the future of what is to come, makes getting bestially raped by Richard Dawkins sound kinda funny. We just don't get the luxury of playing the damsel in distress in a ploy for support, nor do we want it.

Watson is taking lessons from Anita Sarkeesian, who after clutching her bosom and threatening to faint when she expertly orchestrated and played up hateful reactions to her hateful project aimed at painting women as patriarchal victims, was rewarded with huge cash for the project.

2 plus 2 equals cha-ching.

It is the politics of victimhood, and you can already see other feminists and obsequious male sycophants pooping on themselves to lionize Watson as a feminist hero, pushing on against the forces of evil, bringing social progress against the grain of a misogynistic world, which she proves by waving some shitty things a handful of internet trolls said to her like they were daggers pointed at her heart.

She is not the empowered, independent woman promised by the feminist revolution, but a fragile, pitiable waif, powerlessly wailing that not everyone in the world likes her. She has no conception that we live in a world where no matter what you have to say, if you say it to enough people, you will piss off some wackos. It comes with the territory. It always has.

Title IX coordinator protects abuser, abusive policy

A&M-Commerce Adopts Anti-Male Sexual Misconduct Policy

Recording here: Interview, Title IX Coordinator Michele Vieira

On April 4, 2011, the Department of Education's Office on Civil Rights (OCR) issued the "Dear Colleague" letter, which contains guidelines that eviscerate the due process rights of men and boys accused of sexual misconduct, to colleges and universities across the United States [1]. Most egregiously, the directive mandates that schools adopt the "preponderance of evidence" standard in adjudicating complaints, lowering the standard to convict the accused (an act which leads to expulsion, a permanent career-destroying black mark on their record, as well as ostracism from one's community) to a likelihood of 50.01% – or "slightly more likely than not" – that the alleged conduct occurred.

In addition, it allows accusers to appeal the findings of the hearing, in effect allowing them to make double jeopardy accusations. Unlike most policies established in a civil society, the directive was issued in the still of the night, with no chance for public examination or debate. And to back it up, Russlynn Ali, Assistant Secretary of the OCR, threatened schools with loss of funding if they fail to adequately address complaints by the OCR's standards [2].

Controversy arose as universities scrambled to comply with the directive. Law Professor Cynthia Bowman of Cornell University remarked, "To impose those consequences on someone requires a rigorous standard of proof and many due process protections to ensure fairness. Indeed, there is general agreement among faculty at the Law School that the procedures being proposed are Orwellian [3]." Former Department of Education attorney Hans Bader remarked, "Innocent people get found guilty of harassment because the school realizes the only way it can avoid liability is to punish everybody in sight."

Even Brett Sokolow, founder of the National Center for Higher Education Risk Management (NCHERM) said, "It's such a fear-based reaction that a lot of colleges now are expelling and suspending people they shouldn't, for fear they'll get nailed on Title IX [4]." Organizations like The Foundation for Individual Rights in Education [5], Stop Abusive and Violent Environments [6], The American Association of University Professors [7], and numerous others, including A Voice for Men [8] and Community of the Wrongly Accused [9], have all sharply criticized the directive and called for it to be rescinded. They have been met with a wall of silence.

While we continue to advocate for the civil rights of the wrongly accused in education, in the meantime men and boys – especially the students – are vulnerable. In addition to the great work being done to raise awareness of the directive, I believe we must also work creatively to provide influence that helps protect them right now. In the spirit of thinking globally and acting locally, in April of 2012 I met with the Title IX Coordinator Michele Vieira and the Assistant Dean of Students Robert Dotson at my alma mater A&M-

Commerce, where I had studied for both my bachelor's and master's and taught freshman composition and argumentation, but had suddenly dropped out of the master's program without public explanation two and a half years ago.

My goal in the meetings was not to argue or debate, but to ask for clarification on university policy, and ask them to adopt the model used Princeton University (which Russlynn Ali indicated she "wasn't necessarily opposed to" [10]), which uses a higher "clear and convincing" standard for adjudicating complaints, but allows for a parallel process using the preponderance standard for support services. I knew, however, that we do not have the luxury of underestimating the entrenched interests that perpetuate the inequities facing men and boys in education, nor would those barriers be overcome by mere asking. And that is exactly why I recorded the entire conversation with Michelle Vieira, in the hopes that it may be a resource for the wrongly accused, as well as those who advocate in their behalf.

I will speak briefly of my meeting with Robert Dotson, if only for the fact that I am unable to provide a recording of it, that many of his answers were the same as Michelle's (and many others were nebulous responses), and that little else is eventful in our conversation. Most importantly, he clarified that many universities were already unofficially using the preponderance standard before the directive, and that the numbers in the campus crime reports reference the number of "proven" assaults rather than complaints (which would have included wrongful accusations).

At the end of our meeting, I asked him to adopt the sexual misconduct model used by Princeton. While he encouraged me to send him an email about it, he ended our conversation by literally saying, "I don't know – I'm a preponderance kind of guy. It's hard to teach an old dog new tricks." I knew immediately from that statement that it would be no further use to speak with him on the matter. When it comes to adjudicating accusations of rape, I don't see myself as a preponderance kind of guy. On the contrary, I see myself as more of a due process kind of guy. And regardless, nothing could be achieved without the Title IX Coordinator, anyway.

Given that our mission is equality and justice for men and boys, it is the meeting with the Title IX Coordinator (Title IX of course being a law on gender equity in education) that most directly concerns us. Given that we not only cover some basics, but that she also makes several statements that should be alarming to the uninitiated, I encourage everyone to listen to the full interview.

One of my concerns was clarification over the university's definition of sexual assault, given that I have heard many definitions advocated which would classify myself as a victim (which I do not believe I was). I have, for example, had sex when I didn't want, but went along with it to please my partner (to which she answered "no"), after drinking alcohol moderately ("no" again), and after I was asked repeatedly (to which she answered "possibly"). It bears mention, however, that it doesn't matter what the university's definition of rape is if the standard of evidence is so low that it requires no evidence at all. "Really, when you boil it down to it, it's who can tell the best story," she

But should that really be the case, especially when the standard of evidence is little more than a coin toss? It is well known that even innocent persons may embellish or lie in their statements, usually out of fear, uncertainty, or to cover up something else. The reality is that if administrators happen to catch two out of three embellishments by an innocent student but only one out of three made by his accuser, the student wrongly accused student a very high chance of being found "guilty" and having his life destroyed.

Another concern was that the figure cited from a Justice Department report by Russlynn Ali that 1 in 5 college women are victims of attempted or completed sexual assault [11] is being used as a justification for the draconian measures she proposes. While the disclaimer that it is not an official document is stamped on every page of the report, Michelle Vieira agreed with the figure. What she perhaps does not realize is that the definitions of sexual assault to which she earlier responded "no" are often the very definitions used by ideologically-driven researchers in their tabulations of campus sex-assault victims to reach their 1-in-X figures.

Dissenting Feminist professor Christina Hoff-Sommers deconstructed the infamous 1-in-4 study by Mary Koss, wherein a quarter of the women classified as victims did not themselves think they had been raped, and 42% of the "victims" went on to have sex with their "attackers" again [12]. In the article "The Campus Rape Myth," Heather McDonald reports that in a similar study, 65% of the "victims" "did not think that their experiences were 'serious enough to report'" and "generally did not state that their victimization resulted in physical or emotional injuries [13]."

The 1-in-X statistics do not match up with campus crime reports. For example, A&M-Commerce crime statistics report an average of one sexual assault a year [14]. But somehow we jump from that number to one thousand. Even factoring in under reporting (a reasonable concern), the numbers just don't add up. And even if they did, what does that say about the administration? Shortly after the interview, A&M-Commerce closed down Binnion Hall because of a water leak [15].

If the administration truly believed that there is an epidemic of rape which would translate to roughly 3 rapes each day (and in turn justify the evisceration of due process rights), wouldn't it make sense to advocate closing down the campus – or at least the dorms – until the problem is resolved? Or is a water leak more important?

My next concern was false accusations, which she answered of her own initiative:

> We have had occasion for someone to accuse someone of sexual harassment or assault and we find that they were just mad because they got a D in the class. And they go through a nightmare while we do the investigation. And the sad part is, the person who did the accusing didn't even get a slap on the wrist. They just walked away. We don't have anything in place in this university to address false accusations.

This is one of the main reasons I dropped out of the master's program at A&M-Commerce and abandoned my dream of becoming a professor of English. Why should I spend another 5-7 years finishing my masters and getting my doctorate, put myself in tens of thousands of dollars of student loan debt, subject myself to the brutal job competition in an age when the supply of teachers is high, the demand low and tenure is being phased out -when academia affords me no such protection?

I was a master's student who loved to learn and a teacher who loved to teach, the president and treasurer of the campus English honor's society, a member of the editorial board for the campus creative arts journal, and a frequenter of symposia and many campus events. I was well-liked and respected by faculty, students, and peers. In short, academia had become my life, and life was good. But when I saw what was happening behind the scenes, and the "go along to get along" culture that failed to speak out, I decided that I didn't want to be a part of it. When the April 4 Directive hit and administrators across the U.S. chose to cave in rather than challenge it, I knew I had made the right choice.

In her book Heterophobia, dissenting Feminist and former Women's Studies professor Daphne Patai documents cases where administrators use the weight of Title IX to justify denying due process to even tenured faculty accused of sexual misconduct [16]. East Georgia College fired Thomas Thibeault for questioning the fact that the college's sexual harassment policy provides no protection from false accusations [17]. Similar cases abound.

In academia, indifference toward the needs of the wrongly accused is pervasive. Michelle Vieira admits as much, saying "we find that, in discussing it with lots of other universities and colleges, as well as even in secondary school systems, they don't have anything to respond to false accusations either." It should go without saying that men and boys deserve better.

Ironically, she does mention that the university did move to protect a teacher – not an innocent one, but a professor who exhibited harassing behavior that was recorded and uploaded to YouTube.

> A student recorded it and put it up there. We've taken it down five times now.

I didn't probe too much into it, but I am curious: what if others had experienced harassing behavior from that professor who would only have come forward if they knew others who had the same experience? If parents knew their child had been in that professor's class, wouldn't it be good for them to know so they could ask their child if he or she had experienced something similar? If under reporting is such a problem, and if the professor is truly guilty, why suppress awareness of harassing behavior?

But perhaps the most telling part of our meeting was when I asked her, "Aside from regulations, speaking from your own perspective, do you think the preponderance standard is justified?" At this she winced slightly, and exhaled a "whew," as if to say "that's a tough one." Instead of answering, she averted her eyes from me and looked down at her desk. What followed was 20 seconds of dead silence -a silence that was perhaps more revealing than any words she could have spoken – after which she said "I don't think I can fully state exactly what my opinion is on that."

At the end of our meeting, I asked that the university adopt the "clear and convincing" standard after the manner of Princeton University, a request I drafted in writing and sent to Ms. Vieira, who forwarded it (as she told me) to her boss Dr. Edward Romero, the president of diversity at A&M-Commerce, and Dr. Joni Baker, the director of diversity for the entire A&M system. You can see these, and other relevant emails, on my blog [18]. After waiting for a while for a reply, I emailed Dr. Baker, asking to meet and discuss the nature of my request.

After receiving no response (something tells me I would have if I were a representative of the AAUW), I sent an email to Ms. Vieira, wishing her a pleasant summer and asking in kind terms to meet one last time. It was my hope that we could work together to solve the civil rights issues facing the wrongly accused. As an alumnus, I could say things that would be difficult for her to say, and we could use the story of my dropping out, combined with the pressing crisis of educational underachievement among male students, to demonstrate that the time had come to make a change.

The wisdom passed down to us from generations of civil rights activism, of course, is that we never need permission to stand up for civil rights. As Martin Luther King, Jr. said, "One has not only a legal but a moral responsibility to obey just laws. Conversely, one has a moral responsibility to disobey unjust laws." The same holds true for all codes, customs, policies, and directives. But unfortunately, my request was met with silence, under the apparent presumption that the matter will go away.

That was a mistake.

There is a lesson I hope we MRAs take from this as we move from our studies and openly advocate equality for men and boys. You'll hear in the interview that it wasn't hard for me to talk to Ms. Vieira. Her demeanor was kind, and we exchanged many laughs despite the seriousness of the topic. But there is a line that is drawn in the sand between the needs of men and boys, and the policies and functionaries which put them at a disadvantage.

Given that my current specialization is education, I have my own due diligence obligations toward investigating and deconstructing the barriers that deny an equitable education to our sons. We have learned through painful experience that if we have to wait for it to become politically convenient for education administrators to break ranks and take a public stand for the civil rights of men and boys, it will never happen. We no longer have time to wait on them, nor reason to assume things will work themselves out on their own. And what administrators must come to terms with is that this situation is none of our doing.

Now everyone will be able to hear the Title IX Coordinator's silence, her reservation, and finally her inability to bring herself to answer me in the affirmative when I asked her "is this policy justified?" Prospective and current teachers will hear that A&M-Commerce has nothing in place to protect them from false accusations. Parents will hear that the administration has a history of suppressing awareness of professors harassing students. And the wrongly accused will be given links to resources that aid them in a fight that is surely stacked against them [19].

While attending a required sexual harassment seminar as an instructor at A&M-Commerce, I was given the litmus test for avoiding behavior that could be construed as harassment: if you have to ask whether a form of conduct is objectionable, you probably should not do it. A similar litmus test can be applied to administrators who employ or enforce low standards of evidence to find students and teachers guilty of sexual assault: if you cannot look in the eye someone who has been a student and instructor at your university for over eight years and tell him what you are doing is justified, you probably should not be doing it.

September 10, 2012 | by Robert St. Estephe | Link | Original Link

The topic of "careers in widowhood," has a long, weird, violent and richly instructive, if not sufficiently advertised, history. Since disposable males, by definition, don't matter, the history of serial Black Widows and the males they habitually dispose of has, we should not be surprised, not attracted any sustained and studious attention – up to now, that is Now available online is a recently complied list of Black Widow Serial Killers (women who murdered two or more husbands or paramours). It is the first of its kind. Yes, despite the fact that there is a whole mountain range of material available on male serial killers, the female serial killer still suffers from a severe "recognition gap" for her contribution to the history of criminal deception wanton violence. The Black Widow list has now passed the 100 count (108), and includes mostly previously ignored cases, yet definitely still far from being a complete list of cases that are to be discovered in old newspapers, court documents and historical chronicles.

Cases collected so far date from the second millennium BC to the present and it includes serial husband-killers from 23 countries: Armenia, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, China, Colombia, Czechoslovakia, England, Ethiopia (Abyssinia), France, Germany, Hungary, Ireland, Japan, Maldives, Philippines, Russia, South Africa, Sri Lanka (Ceylon), Spain, Switzerland, Thailand, United States. A sub-category called Champion Black Widow Serial Killers (four or more husband-murders) stands, at the moment, with a count of 22.

A sub-category, Aristocratic Female Serial Killers, includes sixteen aristocrats. One of these noble ladies, Empress Taitu Betul of Abyssinia (modern Ethiopia), represents the most prolific Black Widow discovered so far, having racked up an impressive score of ten widow-whacked spouses.

Of the 108 listed murderesses of two or more husbands [updated count is 168, as of Nov. 2013], 47 of these women additionally murdered another person or persons: children, other relatives, in-laws, friends, neighbors or others. Tillie Klimek, for example, a still fairly well known Chicago serial Black Widow, cast her fatal net wide, polishing off nine people and left five survivors of murder attempts in addition to taking out four husbands and getting caught working on husband number five.

Creative killers

A number of the repeat self-made widows under examination were unusually reckless, in that they managed (after already being caught and prosecuted for husband-whacking) to commit an additional act of murder.

For instance, the take story of the "Brazilian Black Widow" (whose name is not yet determined) who wouldn't let having a less than stellar reputation stop her from doing what she did best. A convicted double husband-killer, she was sentenced in the 1920s to Brazil's remote South Seas island penal colony, Fernando Noronha Island. The isle's inmates were, nevertheless, permitted to marry one another. While serving her long sentence, the devil's island widow married a fellow whom not too long afterwards she evaluated as in need of a bumping-off. This widow's story was discovered by a foreign scientific researcher as he toured the island with a guide who felt the need to steer his tired and thirsty charge away from the woman's cabin where he was tempted to request a drink of water. The writer of the following account then head the guide's reason why:

"That unfortunate man came home one night, slightly under the influence. She tore his clothes off him, and tied him up. Then she criss-crossed him with the thin side of a razor, and rubbed salt in the wounds.

"She turned him loose, naked, to hop around with pain. She drove a red-hot poker through his skull, which seemed to be carrying it quite far enough. She ended by tying him to his donkey and starting him back for the grog-shop where the ether woman could usually be found. She couldn't read or write so that her method of sending word that she was through with him.

"The second husband was killed in a much more humane manner. The terrible woman drove a stake through his middle into the ground. To his feet she hitched a donkey, and whipped the little animal round and round, as if her husband were some new form of merry-go-round. He soon died from such treatment.

"For that second murder," continued the red-mustached exile, "she was sent to this island, out of the world, where she married one of the prisoners who fished each day for the governor's table.

"The woman one day came to the conclusion that he was using his fishing as an excuse to stay away from her. The next morning she caught him asleep, tied him to his bed, and then poured boiling water on him a little at a lime and beginning win his feel, until he passed out."

Lizzie Halliday, of Sullivan, New York, was one of the most savage of all serial killers. Wild Lizzie committed a triple murder in 1893, shooting to death her husband and two women in a single day and making shoddy effort to hide the bodies. After the killer's arrest it was revealed that she had been suspected of several previous murders, including that of several previous husbands, one spouse having survived a poisoning, plus a step-son and a peddler. Declared by the court to be insane she was sent to be kept at Mattewan Women's Hospital. During her tenure in the hospital she continued her rages, directed towards the lives of the only two women who pitied and befriended her. In 1895 she attempted to murder attendant Catherine Ward, by strangulation. In 1906, she murdered hospital attendant Nellie Wickes, stabbing her in the face more than 200 times with a pair of scissors. Lizzie came to be known by the moniker "the worst woman on earth" because of her passion for killing those who loved her.

Another Black Widow of particular note was an Armenian immigrant to California named Maria Torosian whose six husbands had "died mysteriously." Mrs. Torosian raised a daughter, Eliza Potegian, who followed in her multi-widowed mother's bloody footsteps.

Mom's string of six dead husbands came to light only after the record-breaking wife of six had hung herself – just after daughter Eliza was nabbed by the cops on suspicion of having serially wiping out husband and step-kids. Mr. Potegian, a successful vintner, died first. Then the widow, after finding that the deceased had willed his property to his children Margaret (18) and Gordon (21), promptly eliminated these obstacles in her quest for possession of the vineyards.

An 1881 case exhibits an efficient labor-saving mindset. Mrs. Gossau, a Swiss repeat widow, employed the time honored device of proxy violence favored by savvy predators. She had her paramour assist her in ridding herself of her first husband, only to execute the executioner following their marriage-made-in-hell.

Thrice-widowed Jane Taylor Quinn of Chicago was a cool customer: clam and calculating as they come. Her arrest in 1911 after her third husband got himself killed led to curiosity about the fates of the first two short-lived spouses.

The arrest of Mrs. Quinn after the death of her third husband was made by the police, who thought they had a strong circumstantial case against her. Her first husband, John McDonald, died at London, Ont. in 1901, under mysterious circumstances. Her second spouse, Warren Thorpe, was found dead in bed on the morning of June 13, 1903, a bullet wound indicating murder. At that time Mrs. Quinn was charged with the murder, but was acquitted. John Quinn, the third husband, was shot to death as he lay in bed on the night of November 4, 1911. There were powder burns on his night shirt. The revolver from which the shot was fired was found later in the Quinn bathroom, which appeared in a towel which was identified as one Mrs. Quinn had been seen to carry into the bathroom. The revolver was identified as one belonging to a roomer in the house who had mislaid the weapon from his bureau drawer about a week before the tragedy.

Mrs. Quinn, never for a minute losing confidence of her acquittal, thanked the all-male jury warmly as they packed her on her merry way on June 1, 1912.

The failed Quinn prosecution was added to the long and rapidly growing list of Chicago female homicide cases resulting in non-convictions, which by 1914 had become a national scandal.

Illinois State's Attorney Maclay Hoyne, declared to reporters that:

"The manner in which women who have committed murder in this county have escaped punishment has become a scandal. The blame in the first instance must fall upon the jurors who seem willing to bring in a verdict of acquittal whenever a woman charged with murder is fairly good looking and is able to turn on the flood gates of her tears, or exhibit a capacity for fainting."

Prosecutor Hoyne aggressively lobbied the state legislature with a bill that would permit women to serve on Illinois juries, believing that male chivalry was so hopelessly entrenched in Windy City males that there was little point under existing conditions bothering even to go to trial against a female homicide defendant.

Lonely hearts, sudden deaths

Some Black Widow Serial Killers fit neatly into the "lonely hearts killer" category. These trollers for love victims used old-fashioned personal ads in newspapers (and more recently the internet) to hook their prey. Oklahoma-based champion Black Widow Nannie Doss related that she was merely looking for true love as she pursued her romantic career, bumping off a series of four failed husbands in the course of her quest for a Mr. Right worth being left breathing. The "Giggling Grannie" – as the papers christened her after her gleeful demeanor in the court appearances – failed, nevertheless, to explain the deaths of five others: her mother, her sister Dovie, a 3-1/2-year-old) grandson Robert and a mother-in-law.

Nannie poisoned her final husband twice because "he was so mean to me." Once she poured "a lot of poison on his prunes." After eating them he went to the hospital for 23 days. The day after he returned, she was quoted, she gave him a tablespoonful of poison in a cup of coffee. Doss drank the coffee and died the next day at the hospital, she recalled. "He sure did like prunes," said the murderess. "I fixed a whole box and he ate them all." Crime chronicler Harold Schechter, one of the most insightful writers on serial killers summed up Doss's motive in crystal clear language (avoiding the psychobabble favored by the "gender" talk types) stating simply that "She killed because she liked it."

Mysterious Belle Gunness of LaPorte, Indiana, who was the most prolific of these lonely hearts ladies, known for her "murder farm" which came to light in 1908. Estimates of the farm's death toll range from 16 to 120.

"Personal – Comely Widow, who owns a large farm in one of the finest districts in La Porte County, Ind., desires to make the acquaintanceship of gentleman with a view to joining fortunes. No replies by letter will be considered unless the sender is willing to follow an answer with a personal visit."

The wife-seeking men who answered her ads and made the fatal mistake of making "a personal visit" to her corpse-seeded farm were stripped of as many assets as possible and later drugged and in those cases when the victim did not die from her soporific brews the large and muscular Belle would bash the supplicant's sleepy head in with her handy axe.

There is, in writings on crime, a commonly made claim asserting that female murderers are inclined to be "merciful" in their preferred killing technique, preferring, as the feminist social scientists like to assert, to use "soft" methods such as painless poisons or smothering. It is said by these writers the fair sex is, when murdering, more compassionate than the male. Most poison deaths resulting from the murderous acts of female serial killers are excruciating painful and the other brutal methods used by female serial killers: strangling, stabbing, chopping, shooting are not any softer.

Tennessee lonely hearts murderess Ada Wittenmyer got away with murdering two of her four husbands before getting caught in 1984. During Ada's trial her cellmate was called to the stand to relate what the personal-ad murderess had told her of her scheme:

"She said she was going to go through life finding men with money and poisoning them, using the lonely hearts club ads. She said that she enjoyed to see them in pain from the poison."

A psychiatrist assigned to the murderess while she was serving her prison term said he believed she was schizophrenic, but Roger Hensley, one of the two husbands who were fortunate enough to be married Ada before she developed her husband-killing business model said he did not believe she was mentally ill. "I lived with her off and on for nine years and she has always known what she was doing," said Hensley. "She is just mean … She was kind to people, but then she would turn around and be worse than heck."

Ada's final mark, Henry Joneson, a successful but lonely Canadian rancher, got lucky. His mail-order fiancee was already a prisoner before he got cheated out of some of his hard-earned cash. Joneson sent 12 letters and a $1,150 check to Mrs. Wittenmyer before learning that the address she had given him was the prison and not the retreat she had told him it was.

In 2009, a new personal-ad murderess who almost rivals the infamous murder farm proprietress Belle Gunness, was nabbed in Japan. Kanae Kajima, dubbed "Konkatsu Killer" by the media for the konkatsu (marriage-hunting) sites she used, bagged seven victims in her love-lure killing career.

She met her victims on internet dating sites and poisoned them with carbon monoxide by burning charcoal briquettes after giving them sleeping pills. Kijima reportedly set up each death to look like a suicide: In the latest case, she's suspected of putting a sedative in one man's beef stew then poisoning him with carbon monoxide. The trial featured two opposing narratives: prosecutors said she killed the men so she would not have to pay back the money they had given her. Kijima's lawyer said they had either committed suicide because broke up with them or died by accident.

Kanae Kajima raked in $2.2 million from her racket. On April 13, 2012 she was sentenced to die in payment for the vicious acts of her cold-hearted man-hating career.

Black widows who murdered husbands for other women too

It should not come as any surprise that among the large number of women during the past five centuries who practiced the craft of homicidal poisoning for profit that a good portion of them applied their art within their own households. In Eastern Europe, from the late nineteenth to the mid-twentieth centuries husband-killing syndicates were uncovered and prosecuted with great frequency. Hungarian double widow-by-design Kathi Lyukas of Szerdaltely, who was hanged in 1882, represents an average example of numerous professional female serial killer-for-hire cases of this region.

Her customers were chiefly wives who had got tired of their husbands, lovers, who thought the removal of a rival would facilitate their own purposes, and even some children purchased the cakes that by offering them to elderly relatives they might the more rapidly come into the possession of their property. Lyukas killed two husbands of her own, and was accused of 26 other murders, six of which she confessed she had

Cases like Frau Lyukas's continued popping up every so often in that part of the world over the years and decades. It was in 1929 that a voluminous series of poison murders in Hungary's Tisza Valley garnered international attention. Over a hundred women were arrested. Of these, 46 were charged. The conspiracy, centered in the village of Nagyrev, was widespread and sported at least three self-made widows among the scores of women arrested for poisoning not only no-longer-wanted husbands, but also other men, women and children, most of the victims being family members. Ringleaders Julia Fazekas, "The White Devil of Nagyrev," and Suzi Olah each chalked up a pair of husbands of their own among their huge cache of profit-producing of victims.

Mrs. Fazekas, who moved through the village like a veritable she-devil. According to the court testimony, it was she, who, for years, had instigated murder, by selling the flypaper poison solution to wives who wanted to get rid of their husbands. And, in the end, just as she was about to be arrested, she swallowed a big dose of the fatal poison herself and died.

As Suzi Olah's sister, Lydia, made her case to the police she harnessed a rhetorical flourish and mastery of rationalization worthy of any Ivy League "gender studies" professor of the present day who makes a living spouting off post-modern critical theory palaver. Lydia defended her actions by confidently asserting:

> We are not assassins! We did not stab our husbands. We did not hang them or drown them either! They died from poison and this was a pleasant death for them!

The husbands, nevertheless, had been poisoned with arsenic the women had extracted from flypaper, and arsenic, though traditionally popular with murderers remains, as WikiDoc reminds us, "not a particularly efficient toxin, leading to a slow and painful death."

While MRA pioneer Sigurd Hoeberth was still operating his Vienna storefront headquarters for his Liga, the world's first men's rights organization (founded in 1926), he posted news reports on the Tisza Valley mass murders that became public in 1929 in the group's window – along with other news pertaining to the men's issues, promoted in the Liga's newsletter – for passers-by on the busy commercial street to see. In America the public became acquainted with the Hungarian husband-killing syndicates, which continued to explode into the news through the 1930s, in such illustrated Sunday supplement articles as "How Wives Gained Power by Mass-Murder of Husbands."

Marie Aszendi was one of the numerous customers of Fazekas/Olah poisoning ring. After Mrs. Aszendi's arrest she admitted to killing two husbands, asserting she had been a victim of a thrashing at the hands of her first husband (precipitated, she admitted, by her husband's learning of her sleeping around). Her excuse for murdering the replacement spouse was that he was planning to divorce her. Ms. Aszendi was, like the "third wave" feminist of today's sexual landscape, very much concerned with her attractiveness to the opposite sex. And the desire to put up a good front is the motivation is why she decided her son had to be erased from the picture. As she told the court he had to go "because he made her look too old."

Suzi Olah's reputation lived on long past her suicide. Four decades following the Tisza Valley mass murder scandal, a feminist writer was – apparently – so admiring of the Olah sisters' accomplishments in the "gender justice" realm, that the women's lib essayist seems to have adopted the name as her pseudonym "Suzie Olah" for an article. "The Economic Function of the Oppression of Women," published in Shulamith Firestone's cutting-edge essay collection that came out in 1970: "Notes From the Second Year: Women's Liberation: Major Writings of the Radical Feminists."

Husband-killing syndicates are still with us as is made clear by a recent case in South America. The "Black Widow Gang" of Medellin, Colombia erupted in the international news in June 2011 with the arrests of its kingpin, Mauro Gomez Cataño, and six others, including the two "lonely hearts" lures, and Sandra Nataly Giraldo.

It was when young Emilsen Rojas claimed the body of Diego Hernandez, 60, who had been drowned after having been thrown into a reservoir, and she had attempted to collect a large insurance payment, that the insurance company began to investigate. The police joined in, eventually uncovering an organized operation, whose method was to arrange a marriage or legally binding cohabitation, purchase life insurance, and then after the honeymoon, the victim would be "accidented." The "brides" received a fraction of the gang's take. Police investigated five specific homicides and expect there are more.

If the gang had not been so boldly transparent in letting Rojas handle the pay-off so clumsily the gang's husband-killing game, a type of enterprise notoriously hard to detect, would have gone on, and on and on.

"Having it all"

One of the most pernicious of the numerous feminist theories to have infected the social sciences is the notion – based upon a distortion, or misunderstanding, of early laws on a man's legal responsibility for wife and child – that fathers harbor cruelly proprietary attitudes towards spouses and children while women, as passive victims of "patriarchy" do not. Yet abundant examples exist of divorcing mothers who murdered their children for the specific motive of preventing the other parent from obtaining custody – and even to prevent the father from having "visitation." Such cases, labelled by this author as "Maternal Filicide: Spousal Revenge Motive" are in the process of being posted online.

The "proprietary" fixation we observe in many maternal filicide cases is exemplified, in spades, by the amazing story of a Romanian aristocratic heiress, Vera Renczi, residing in Yugoslavia in her spacious Berkereckul chateau. The story of her astonishing career of slaughter broke in 1925.

A handsome young woman of wealth … is accused of murdering thirty-five husbands and lovers, simply "because she could not bear to think they might love another woman."

"Why did you kill all these human beings?" he asked.

"They were men," she answered. "I could not endure the thought that they would ever put their arms around another woman after they had embraced me."

It was shown that the woman was possessed by the passion of jealousy to a degree never before recorded.

"But," the judge stammered, "you also murdered your own son."

"He had threatened to betray me," said Madame Renczi. "He was a man, too. Soon he would have held another woman in his arms."

[/box]

Beautiful Vera ended up spending the rest of her natural life in prison

With Empress Taitu Betul of Abyssinia (modern Ethiopia) who reigned from 1889-1910 we find a well worked-out philosophy of how to get ahead employing the serial Black Widow method with military precision. The six maxims attributed to Taitu reveal a mind fixed upon ruthless self-advancement, rivaling Machiavelli's most brutal adages while focusing squarely on the relations of the sexes as means for purely political ends. Here you have the bloody Empress' six maxims of women's empowerment:

- If you would gain a throne and hold it, fear not to make of human skulls thy stepping stones.
- As a woman dealing with men, let dissimulation be thy watch-word. Let no man know thy secret thoughts and ambitions.
- If another woman stand in thy way, take her to thy bosom; if a man, beguile and marry him.
- Harden thy heart to all pity, all remorse; then shall thy mind and heart be free, without scruple, to gain high aims.
- A heart that is without tenderness of mercy alone can inhabit a body able to endure and to suffer all.

Taitu Betul proved with actions and words that she was indeed a paragon of the "strong woman."

"Sheer delight in homicide"

In 1903 an East Prussian woman by the name of Caroline Pryzgodda was caught in the act of trying to murder her fifth husband with poison. Frau Pryzgodda's career exemplifies, in its eerie cruelty, the typical female serial killer (whether she be a husband-killing specialist or not) who frequently stays near by her suffering victim unflinchingly for an extended period of time while coolly observing his excruciatingly painful decline. In this case each of the four husbands were deliberately poisoned so as to take a full year of horrible suffering before they were finally finished off.

The trial of Caroline Pryzgodda, charged with poisoning four husbands and with attempting to poison a fifth, was concluded at Allenstein [in the village of Bobbau]. The prisoner being found guilty of murder, was sentenced to death.

The evidence showed that all the husbands were healthy young men when they married. Each in succession suddenly lost his health, complained of terrible pains in all his limbs, violent headaches, loss of appetite and growing weakness. The wife administered arsenic to each of the victims in small quantities, mixing it in meat, soup and various dishes. She watched them one after another literally sinking into the grave, and their sufferings left her unmoved. She calculated how long the poison would take to complete its fatal work, and all four husbands died about a year after she began administering the poison.

The motives of the murderess remain a mystery, but it is stated that a fortune-teller once informed her that she was destined to have six husbands before attaining happiness with the seventh. It is suggested that the woman shared the superstition common in East Prussia, and got rid of her husbands to fulfill the prophecy.

Several experts entrusted with the task of examining the prisoner's mental condition came to the conclusion that she murdered her husbands from sheer delight in homicide.

The Pryzgodda case following the original news reports has, like the majority of cases on the Black Widow Serial Killer list, never been mentioned anywhere in print again in the in any English-language publication despite its obvious value to criminological studies.

If women ruled the world, there would be less violence.

Oh, yeah, sure.

Feminists love to make broad generalizations. They claim that they can be sure that when a wife kills a husband, it is always almost a justified "act of self-defense." The public frequently hears such generalizations, yet a more detailed look at a sufficient quantity of individual husband-killing cases will wash away forever such vague magical thinking promoted by the hoaxing propagandists of "gender" ideology. Faulty generalizations based on cooked statistics are then turned into public policy, resulting in social disruption, chaos in the courts and tyrannous governmental mission creep.

The next time you hear someone say that most women who kill their husbands are, by "gender" definition acting in self-defense, you might want to counter this nonsense by declaiming that "the era of the misandry apologists is over."

For misandry is now gradually becoming socially unacceptable among normal people, and with this welcome change will arrive a growing unwillingness of the public to accept having taxes and college tuition fees extracted from them only to be invested in deceptive propaganda by the hoax factories operated by social engineers who have created the “social construction” known as political correctness.

The cases reviewed in this article are but a fraction of collected Black Widow Serial Killer cases. And that larger portion is itself but a fraction of the total reported cases, most of which have yet to be mined from sources not yet digitized. In turn, the quantity defined by the total that will eventually turn up in printed matter is again but a fraction of identified cases around the world from past times, many which are not going to be found in preserved records. Further, the total number of identified cases (including those not archived) is yet again only tiny fraction of those cases that have actually occurred.

We must keep in mind that the vast majority of victims of female serial killers are identified incorrectly as having died a natural death. This is in stark contrast to victims of male serial killers, who are almost always correctly identified as homicide victims, regardless whether or not the investigator is able to determine the perpetrator is a serial killer. Because the females of this criminal species keep their crimes under wraps – unlike their counterparts of the male sex, who seem to want the public to know about their crimes – the female serial killers get away with murder at an enormously greater rate.

We seldom saw an organized “woman-hunt” resulting from the discovery of a pattern of murders hypothesized to be the work of female serial killer. A female serial killer seldom becomes a major media sensation for the simple reason that their crimes rarely come to light until after a solitary death – the most recent – is determined to have been a murder. Only then, in the vast majority of female serial killer cases, are the perpetrators identified – in retrospect – as multiple murderers. The chase narrative, typical of the male serial killer case, is where a great deal of the media excitement over serial killer cases is generated.

The old news you have read here in this article is in a very real sense now new news. Spread the word that what we believed once is now no longer believable. Spread it far and wide. Together we can help along “herstory” in its slow-motion scandalous collapse.

I was honestly hoping that my 500th post to this website would be a memorable one, and it appears that the blogging gods have indeed decided to smile upon me for this auspicious occasion.

First, I am proud to announce that A Voice for Men will now be bringing you weekly video news reports on what is happening in the AVfM world. Nurdy Dancing, fellow angry white male and all around oppressor, has joined the AVfM team to bring you onsite news dedicated solely to matters AVfM. They will be located in a post to the main articles, like this one, and in the featured video spot at the right of the page.

As if this were not great already, one of the subjects of Nurdydancing's first weekly report is one near and dear to the heart of MRAs. Many of you will remember the recent coverage of the MRM posters going up in Vancouver, as reported by Derek Bedry of openfile.ca. It was Mr. Bedry that made the false allegations that MRAs were linked to terrorist organizations, mass murderers and other social miscreants. Of course he did so without any proof, and without even addressing the posters that were supposedly so objectionable.

I could tell you more, but it would be more fitting to let you hear about it from AVfM newscaster, Nurdydancing.

At this time I should update the report in the video. We will be making an announcement about the new activism committee later in the week. As reported, we will be continuing and expanding our outing of corrupt public officials and false accusers. But I suppose we should add to the list journalists who actually create the news they are reporting on, and con the reading public into thinking they are an objective professional reporting the facts.

We understand that some AVfM readers my want contact information for the editor of openfile.ca, as some readers may want to question that news source as to why one of their reporters is engaged in such malicious deception of their readers for the sake of his own political activism. They may want to ask why anyone reading a site employing Derek Bedry should believe anything that openfile.ca publishes.

What's next openfile? Are your reporters going to steal cars and then report on the crime problem?

Here is the contact info for openfile.ca contact@openfile.ca

News and Activism: Misandry in Education

Tonight we have as our guest The Common Man from the Youtube channel The Common Man Media. Formerly known as Gogononstop, TCM has been a member of the MRA you tube community for years and has been one of the most energetic proponents of the rights of male students in our education system. Covering topics from misandry to lack of due process when it comes to sexual assault cases on campus (specifically the “dear colleague letter or April 4th directive) he has gained a reputation as an expert on the subject of what has become known as the War on Men and Boys in our education system.

We will be talking about the recent interview he secretly recorded with a Title IX Coordinator at Texas A&M featured on AVFM. We will also be talking about the crisis of men and boys in our education system in a broad sense so if you are interested in this very, very important subject please call in.

The show airs live tonight, at 8:00 Central Time, US, which is 2:00 a.m. September 12, in London and 11:00 a.m. September 12, in Brisbane. If you have not yet requested membership in the Stickcam Room, you can do so through the link below. The call in number is 310-388-9709 .

September 11, 2012 | by Aimee McGee | Link | Original Link

When the MRM posters started going up in places around the world, I had a funny niggling feeling we might have a problem on our hands here in England. After a useful chat with my house-mate about the posters in relation to planning law, I started digging around on the Internet.

Fly- posting without a permit is illegal under the Highway Act 1980, the Town & Country Planning Act 1990, the Anti-social Behavior Act 2003 and the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Act 2005. Most local councils have a zero tolerance policy on fly- posting.

There is no formal definition of fly-posting. However, it is generally taken to be the display of advertising material on buildings and street furniture without the consent of the owner, contrary to the provisions of the regulations. In practical terms, fly-posting can be divided into three broad types, each with particular characteristics and problems of control, the kind of fly-posting that the MRM participates is defined as “posters,” displayed by pressure groups or political bodies. These are generally ad hoc and sporadic with no clear pattern to their location.

Legal measures used by local authorities and the police to prevent fly-posting include: On-the-spot fines of up to £80; use of fixed penalty notices, prosecution in a magistrates’ court; use of Anti-Social Behaviour Orders (ASBOs) [or whatever the current government is calling them] Charging the offender for the cost of removing the posters.

Reading into a document I shared with the London MRA group (The Control of Fly-posting: a Good Practice Guide), there is a key point we need to be aware of – we can approach site managers etc. where there are hoardings, but we may be told they already have an agreement with the local council as part of their site management that they will not allow fly-posting or they have to pay for the cost of removal of fly-posting. So the example set by our Vancouver brothers may not work for us.

Interestingly enough, there are a few councils (Manchester and Nottingham are named specifically) who have taken a pragmatic approach to addressing the problem of fly-posting by having permitted sites, but they are technically in breach of the legislative framework themselves. Still, it is worth working out if you have this option in your local area.

So here is where that leaves the English MRAs when we want to promote our message:

- Urban75,a UK based activism site suggests putting “not for fly-posting” at the bottom of any posters you stick up, so it is like the organisation we are advertising is not responsible for the actions of some activists. This is a weak defence and one I would not want to argue in front of a female magistrate. Just remember, England is the home of the surveillance society, and I know 4 CCTV cameras within 200m of where I am typing this in a small East Anglian town, so you stand a good chance of getting caught on camera, which can be used later in a prosecution.

- All MRAs should ask their local council if there are permitted sites locally. These are likely going to be near Universities and/or Arts areas, so might be a good option. There may be a cost involved, I only found one reference, which was suggesting £1.50 per A3 poster.

- An alternative to fly-posting is handing out flyers. If you go this route, you need to check with your local council about getting a permit to do so. Permits will cost money in most cases, and require you to wear a badge to show you are an official holder of a permit. You can still be fined for littering, if lots of people drop your flyers, so be aware of this loophole.

- Urban75 suggests human billboarding – you've seen them in Speakers' Corner (another place we could try), or advertising golf sales, but this would be an effective way to get your message across, although the 2 people rule and wearing your helmet cam might need to be an essential safety feature, in this personal form of advertising.

- Small discrete stickers i.e. the QR or with AVfM's URL on them, stuck in places such as bus stops, train waiting rooms, rest rooms. This is still technically fly-posting, but there seems to be much more tolerance about this kind of size. I have learned some mighty interesting things in the past from stickers in the ladies toilets, that have led me to look up things like alternatives to disposable sanitary items.

- Community radio stations have small coverage, as do local papers, but press releases on things like international men's day, might well be used to fill space, and can get people visiting AVfM. I have experience in writing press releases, and would be happy to work with others to learn this art. Many local papers will be interested if you can provide photos of an interesting event that shows community engagement on a practical level. While we are thin on the ground this might not work, but as we become bigger and can form MRA groups within localities we could use this to our advantage.

Before any of us go out, we should be introducing ourselves to our local police force – and I mean the local one. Don't just go to the main offices of your local constabulary, also go to the nearest police station to where you are going to be active. Local beat constables and Police Community Support Officers (PCSO) are potentially useful allies. PCSOs are often getting experience prior to joining the force, so exposing them to the MRM might help them pay more attention in their training around domestic violence (It is worth noting that the majority of constabulary forces in England now use MARAC,which is gender neutral).

Know your rights, including the stop-and-search powers and your rights on arrest (This is an excellent summary). Having been on various committees through my work, where there are serving police officers, I have been told again and again that being polite, well presented and non-violent will go a long way in reducing your risk of getting arrested.

Also, if they think you are at risk of being assaulted by an angry crowd, the police may arrest you and release you without charge, just to get you out of the situation safely. Go along with this, and hand over the copy of your recording to the police, particularly if you have captured any images that suggest someone is armed. That is going to give that person a really big problem to deal with, particularly if the evidence is backed up by CCTV.

I know that we are going to have to fight to get our voices heard. I know a fair number of activists working for other causes with arrest records already! What I want the English MRAs to think about is how we can best get across our message and avoid having to pay fines or bail for our members.

Please, if there are Welsh, Scottish or Northern Irish MRAs out there, could you post what rules apply to you – this kind of local issue is devolved so we can not apply this information across the whole of the UK.

Has feminism gone too far? A debate

Date: 23 September 2012 3 PM PST

Location: 1315 East Hastings Street, East Vancouver, B.C.

A Father's Story[1] and A Voice for Men presenting:

Has feminism gone too far?

YOU are invited to answer that question. Yes it has, or no, it has not.

That is the question asked in September of 2012, by a woman of integrity and courage. She posited this question as the premise of a public debate. It was to be discussed by three individuals from the contention that yes, feminism has gone too far, and three individuals arguing that no, feminism has not gone too far.

Unfortunately, following the announcement of this scheduled debate on the social networking site Facebook, that woman was rewarded for her attempt at public discussion by a torrent of abuse and threats. Some individuals apparently did not want a debate. Not only did they not want to participate, they wanted nobody else to either. Under the weight of abuse and threats, that woman whose integrity and courage moved her to propose a public discussion – cancelled the event.

Understandable as the cancellation was, it was also disappointing. But there's good news.

The debate is back on!

With very special thanks to the East Vancouver Debating Society, A Father's Story [1] and A Voice for Men will be presenting the re-scheduled debate: "Has feminism gone too far?"

Chris Marshal the manager of CC Motors will be graciously hosting this event at his business CC Motor Cars[2] – where his concept on business is that a good deal is one where buyer and seller is happy.

The debate will be held on Sunday 23 September 2012, 3PM at 1315 Hastings St in East Vancouver, B.C.

The debate format will be three speakers presenting arguments affirming the debate proposition and three speakers presenting arguments against the proposition. Each speaker will have 5 minutes to present an opening argument, alternating between for- and against postions. Following opening arguments, each speaker will have 5 minutes to address presented arguments. A third round of discussion will allow 3 minutes to address counter arguments, and final statements will be formatted within 3 minutes per speaker, for a total of four rounds of discussion for all speakers.

Following the scheduled debate, speakers will address questions and commentary from audience and observers for 55 minutes.

The debate will be moderated by a controller – and recorded on video to be shared online in full.

Note, this event is intended as civilized, civil, and friendly discussion, and sharing of views. Although individuals may feel very strongly about their own positions, participants and audience members will be expected to behave with cordiality, and courtesy.

A Facebook page for the event has been created here.

To participate as a speaker or to inquire about attendance – please email questions and commentary to events@avoiceformen.com

Child abuse from the bench

Decorated combat pilot and His Children Brutalized by West Virginia Family Court Judge Lori B. Jackson

When United States Air Force (USAF) combat pilot Lieutenant Colonel Joel Kirk was a young boy growing up on the banks of the Chattahoochee River in rural Georgia, his father took him to see the Blue Angels perform. This was a pivotal moment in the young Lt. Col.'s life. Attending the airshow inspired him to become a military pilot. Lt. Col. Kirk didn't dream of becoming a pilot because he wanted to fly fast planes or because he thought it would be cool. He dreamed of becoming a pilot for his father.

In the Lt. Col.'s own words:

"In 1979, I sat on a hilltop across from Dobbins Air Force base with my father and watched the Blue Angels roar overhead. I remember the look of amazement in my father's eyes as he gazed skyward at the powerful jets. Here stood my hero, my guardian, my mentor in admiration and awe of something higher. I knew at that moment what I wanted to do."

"I knew that some day I wanted my father to look up to me as I looked up to him. I wanted to make him proud. I wanted to show him and my entire family that I was worth the time, love and energy they invested in me. I didn't want to gain wealth, cars, houses or land. I just wanted to be a man of honor and integrity. My grandfather served in the army during World War II. He was at Normandy and the Battle of the Bulge. I wanted to be like these wonderful men. "

Lt. Col. Kirk worked very hard and graduated university in 1991 at the top of his class, Magna Cum Laude, and became a commissioned officer in the United States Marine Corps (USMC). (Yes, you read right; Kirk has served in both the USMC and the USAF.) Three years later, he realized his childhood dream the day he received his wings.

He writes:

"In January of 1994, my father walked onto a stage in Pensacola, Florida in front of hundreds of people. On that stage, my father, a farmer from Duck Hill, Mississippi, pounded a shiny set of gold wings onto the left side of my dress blues. The tears welled up in his eyes on what was only the second occasion I had seen him cry, the first being my sister's wedding day."

"I did it! I made it! The relief was overwhelming. I had struggled so hard and accomplished something only 1 in 100,000 people ever do. But even more importantly, I made my father and my family proud."

The young officer was living his dream.

Kirk and Father – Getting his wings

Enter Tina Taylor, a very beautiful and very destructive personality disordered predator whom he eventually married and with whom he fathered two beautiful children — a son now 14-years old and a daughter now 12-years old. Today, Tina Taylor Kirk has destroyed nearly everything the Lt. Col. has worked so hard to achieve and is poised to abscond with his military retirement after years of unspeakable abuse and multiple betrayals, at least three affairs that have been documented (2 with other enlisted men and 1 with a mutual "friend.")

Far worse, Tina Taylor Kirk continues to abuse and terrorize their children; aided, abetted and enabled by West Virginia Family Court Judge Lori B. Jackson, Ms. Kirk's three pro bono attorneys Thomas G. Smith, Esq. (Smith, McMunn & Glover, Clarksburg, West Virginia), Jamison H. Cooper, Esq. (Cooper Law Offices, Bridgeport, WV), Afton Leanne Huston, Esq. (Smith, McMunn & Glover, Clarksburg, WV), and Clinical Psychologist, Edward D. Baker, Ph.D. (Fremouw-Sigley Psychological Associates, Morgantown, WV).

This story does not have a happy ending, but hopefully the exposure on AVoiceforMen.com, Shrink4Men.com and other websites, blogs and news outlets will help to bring about a just ending and conclude the ongoing judicial and financial abuse of Lt. Col. Kirk and the judicial and maternal abuse of the Kirk children.

Growing men's rights activism track record.

Over the last year and a half, AVFM, in unofficial conjunction with the National Coalition for Men (NCFM), S.A.V.E. (Stop Abusive and Violent Environments) and the men and women who support these sites and organizations, have established a growing track record of powerful activism. Through our shared commitment to equal rights, justice and protection for all, we have managed to expose the gross prosecutorial misconduct of Ellsworth, Maine Assistant District Attorney Mary Kellett.

Kellett will soon be facing the Maine Board of Overseers of the Bar for her breach of ethics in her malicious and frivolous harassment of Vladek Filler. Just this summer, AVFM, NCFM, S.A.V.E. et al championed the cause of Gordon Smith of Delaware. For some time now, Mr. Smith has been the victim of his ex Tiffany Marie's Smith's relentless and escalating false allegations of domestic violence and the complicity of Delaware law enforcement and its judiciary. Last week, the Delaware State police finally arrested Ms. Smith for her multiple false allegations and shameless harassment campaign. This story isn't over yet as Ms. Smith was released on bail and, it is believed, continues to pose a serious threat to both Mr. Smith and their children of whom she still has custody.

Over the coming weeks and months, we will be turning our attention and activism toward Lt. Col. Joel Kirk and his children, who have been horribly wronged by the very system that Lt. Col. Kirk has devoted and risked his life to protect.

War is hell, and so is being married to and sharing children with an alcoholic, emotionally and physically abusive, Borderline Personality

Disordered woman.

Before citing the many injustices, unethical, outlandish, biased and potentially criminal acts of Judge Lori B. Jackson, Thomas G. Smith, Esq., Jamison H. Cooper, Esq., Afton Leanne Huston, Esq., and Dr. Edward D. Baker, Ph.D., it's necessary to provide some history and context. The Kirk marriage has a little something for everyone: false rape allegations, false domestic violence allegations, physical and emotional spousal abuse, child abuse, alcohol abuse and addiction, serial infidelities, financial fraud, identity theft, pathological deceit, and much, much more all perpetrated by Ms. Kirk.

Lt. Col. Kirk met Tina Taylor in 1991, three months into his Naval Aviation Training. He graduated Marine Officer Basic Training (otherwise known as TBS) near the top of his class, was flying Marine Aircraft and generally at the top of his game. It was instant attraction at first sight and the young officer believed he had met the woman of his dreams. In reality, the future Ms. Kirk is the stuff of nightmares.

Six months later, the Lt. Col. discovered Tina was engaged to a Navy pilot in California the entire time they were dating in Florida. He was devastated. Friends of Tina came forward after she left for California and revealed the truth about her promiscuity, drinking, smoking and drug use. While the Lt. Col. believed he had dodged a bullet, he says there was still a part of him that felt he was meant to be with her. Even after her fiancé called him warning him to "quit stalking" Tina or he would "regret it." It would appear Tina lied to this man rather than admit she had betrayed him with the Lt. Col.

The false allegations started early on in their relationship and are just a glimpse of the hell that would later ensue. Their relationship should have ended then, but Tina resurfaced 2 years later.

The Borderline Boomerang and the never-ending, waking nightmare.

After receiving his Gold Wings in 1994, young officer Kirk was stationed in Southern California with a Replacement Air Group flying CH-53 Sea Stallions, even though he had requested to be based on the East coast to be closer to his family. If only the powers that be had honored his request the Lt. Col.'s life may have turned out very differently.

Soon after arriving in California, Tina tracked the Lt. Col. down and re-entered his life. She claimed leaving him in Florida was a mistake and . . . wait for it . . . that her boyfriend/fiancé was "abusive" and "threw her out onto the street." She apologized for her past behavior and claimed to have found God. This activated the Lt. Col.'s knight in shining armor instincts. He rushed in to save his dubious damsel in distress and fell for her all over again.

It was only a few weeks after their reunion that the Lt. Col. discovered Tina's relationship with the Navy pilot wasn't over. After much denial and obfuscation, Tina finally admitted she was still seeing the man she claimed abused her, but only to "finalize" the relationship. Against his better judgment, Lt. Col. Kirk took her back.

He explains:

"I had never seen crying and pleading like Tina engaged in back then. "Please take me back. Please!" "It was a mistake!" "I was just finalizing our breakup!" "Please!" I was conflicted for weeks with myself about what to do. This woman had nearly cost me my dream career in Pensacola and was begging me to jump back in to the fire."

"It was very difficult to believe her at this point. I enjoyed a very sheltered childhood in a small town and was not fully aware of important warning signs that would have spared me a lot of pain. I had no knowledge of Borderline Personality Disorder and sociopathy. I came from a place where everyone trusted each other, from the best guys in the world in my Marine Officer Training, to my relationship with Tina. I never saw her coming. In my entire life up until that point, I had been taught to always forgive and forget and did not understand that some people are just untrustworthy and best avoided."

"Looking back, I still don't know how I rationalized taking her back, but I did. I took her back and it was at this point that I made the most critical and life-changing decision I would ever make. I married her and that has brought me more pain, agony and distress than any and all combined combat flying would ever do."

Lt. Colonel Joel Kirk
For those of you reading this who are unfamiliar with Borderline Personality Disordered individuals, you may wonder how a man as intelligent as Lt. Col. Kirk could have been so easily taken in by a woman like this despite the many warning signs. It is all too common for young, idealistic and, in many ways, naïve men from close knit families and traditional backgrounds like Lt. Col. Kirk, to be beguiled by and fall in love with women like Tina Taylor Kirk. Nice and trusting guys make perfect cannon fodder for this kind of female predator.

Lt. Col. Kirk is a decorated pilot. Over the course of his military career, he has been a Marine Pilot, a Combat Forward Air Controller (FAC) and a Marine Instructor Pilot. He is still an active Air Force Pilot. He was commissioned during Desert Storm. He served in Operation Northern Watch (Iraq), Operation Noble Eagle (U.S. after 9/11), Operation Iraqi Freedom (Iraq), Operation Enduring Freedom (Afghanistan), and Operation Joint Force (Bosnia).

He has been deployed 7 times for wartime contingencies and received 6 air medals for his service. He has flown nearly 200 combat missions and served over 500 hours in combat and 4,000 flight hours in six different airframes, both rotary and fixed wing. Yet, because of Judge Lori B. Jackson, an either extremely incompetent and/or extremely corrupt West Virginia Family Court judge, this brave and decent man has had to stand by and allow himself and his children to be abused by their mother, a woman who offered to sell the children to the Col. for $288,000 during mediation, which is documented in a letter written by Ms. Kirk's attorney, Thomas G. Smith, Esq.

If you would like to read it (Children for Sale).

Notice how Mr. Smith tells the Lt. Col.'s attorney how generous Ms. Kirk is for offering to sell the children to their father for a paltry $144,000 apiece, and immediately reminds the Lt. Col.'s attorney that mediation negotiations are inadmissible in court. It would seem that even Mr. Smith knows how reptilian his behavior is.

Harrison County west virginia Judge Lori B. Jackson knowingly places children in the custody of an abusive, alcoholic, borderline personality disordered mother in the "best interests of the children."

After over a decade of abuse and betrayals with more enlisted men (a very big no-no in the military, as in a career ending no-no), false rape allegations, $250,000 of debt incurred by and because of Tina ($40,000 of the debt was fraudulently incurred via credit cards she opened in her name during a separation that he now has been ordered to pay, while living it up with her boyfriend/alleged rapist and the rest was from two mortgages also incurred jointly by Tina) and other horrors, Lt. Col. Kirk wanted out.

He wanted out for years, but knew he would face tremendous bias in Family Court, even with over 1300 minutes of audio recordings of her abusive rampages. He had to leave the children with their abusive mother while deployed in two-month intervals, which was bad enough. He was terrified of what would happen to the children if they were left with her all of the time.

Then, one crazy summer night in 2009, Lt. Col. Kirk seemed to have a way out drop into his lap. I have tried repeatedly to write a short synopsis of what occurred that evening, but am unable to effectively convey the sheer insanity of what transpired.

Lt. Col. Kirk recounts the events of June 28, 2009:

"On the outside, Tina was mother of the year. At home, her head spun around on her neck while she turned green and vomited — and I mean all the time. I prayed for something or someone to save us. On June 28, 2009, Tina's 40th birthday, she drank at least 5 too many martinis, all while the children and I pleaded with her to stop. She went into a rage that surprised even us veterans of such activity after years of her abuse."

"From painful experience, the kids and I had learned to stay away from Tina when she was drunk and/or on the attack, to egress, and not to engage because it made her worse. If we couldn't get away, we just went fetal and took it. Never ever did we fight back."

"That night, I was trying to study for my annual check ride the next morning—a vitally important yearly test. We had spent Saturday and most of Sunday celebrating Tina's birthday. Because it was her birthday, our video camera was lying on the table, so I filmed her. I filmed a raging Borderline abusing her family. She did not know I had come into the adjacent dark room because she was so wasted."

"My son fled to a neighbor's house for help, telling the neighbor, "Mom is going to kill us." My son was 11 when this happened. He ran down a pitch-dark gravel road in flip-flops over 2 miles for help."

"When it appeared that my wife might physically harm our daughter, I stepped in and set the camera on a table. It filmed me calmly asking my daughter to go outside so she wouldn't have to suffer anymore of her mother's verbal tirade. I knew Tina would then shift her rage to a new target, me, and she did. When she tried to incite me into an altercation, I knew I had to leave. I retrieved the camera, grabbed a bag of clothes and walked out the door with her cursing and screaming at me all the way."

"I thought I had turned the camera off, but luckily I had not. I knew my son had fled. I also knew my daughter was outside, but not where (I have 100 acres). I got in my truck, backed out and stopped at the barn to see if the children were there. Our daughter came running and jumped in the truck."

"We started down the driveway and as we did, we felt a tremendous crash on the back of my SUV and heard a scream. I stopped immediately and got out. As I walked to the back of the vehicle, I saw Tina on the ground screaming and yelling like a demon. She had attempted to jump on the back of a moving SUV and fell flat on her face."

"I asked her if she was okay and discovered very quickly that was a bad move. She came after me. I ran back to the truck, jumped in and locked the doors. She then proceeded to dismantle the side mirror from the truck and attempted to break the windows, cutting her hand in the process. There was blood everywhere."

"She screamed for my daughter to unlock the door, but she refused to do so. I still did not know where my son was, so I was scared to leave the property and did not want to move with Tina hanging on to the truck. Because we didn't have cell phone coverage where I had stopped, I left our daughter in the truck, stepped out and ran to a reception area to call the police. They arrived on the scene at the same time as my son and the neighbor. Tina then went after all of them."

"As she was being arrested, she screamed that I had abused her. She told the officers to look at what I had done to her. I showed the police the video and Tina was charged with domestic assault and taken to jail. Once on bail, she filed a protective order against me for assault, detaining her and the children and that she was in fear for her life. She filed an ex parte motion that the children were in immediate danger and needed to be removed from me."

"The Judge granted the motion and Tina came to court with pictures of her injuries and claims of abuse. I came with the video from that night, the testimony of our children to the court appointed CPS worker, the police and the neighbor witness. I was given sole custody of my children on her motion to remove them from me. No reprimand for her false allegations was given. If I had not had the presence of mind to film the events that occurred that night, I would have lost my kids, my job and everything."

"I called HOPE, a Domestic Violence center in Harrison County, and asked for help. I was told Tina had already reported a claim and that they could not speak with me. Within a week, there was a letter from HOPE stating that my ex was a victim of a dominating, controlling husband. She had never mentioned that she was the one arrested for Domestic Assault and they never bothered to verify what she told them with the court or the CPS worker. I knew right then I was in for a long haul."

"Guardians and child counselors were appointed. Therapeutic visitation was arranged. At the very first meeting, Tina attacked the children in front of the Guardian and the counselor while in session. My children hid and the Guardian escorted my ex out and filed an immediate NO CONTACT order. I was relieved. I thought finally, "That should be enough." Oh, was I wrong."

Psychological evaluations were ordered. The services of Dr. Edward D. Baker, Ph.D. were retained. He diagnosed Ms. Kirk with Axis II Borderline Personality Disorder and Axis I Alcohol Abuse and diagnosed the Lt. Col. with Personality Disorder NOS (Not Otherwise Specified). Being entrusted with 25 million dollar aircraft necessitated that Lt. Col. Kirk be psychologically evaluated throughout his entire military career. Dr. Baker's opinions are unsupported by 25 years of meticulous military testing.

Some of the more absurd findings by Dr. Baker include that Lt. Col. Kirk exacerbated Tina's Borderline Personality Disorder because he was "too moral" and that she drank and had affairs to ease her pain from the marital conflict. This is ridiculous. It would be laughable that Dr. Baker believes a man not wanting his wife to cheat on him with multiple partners, to not abuse their children and not drink herself into oblivion while endangering the lives of herself and the children is "too moral," if his findings were not used by Judge Lori B. Jackson and Ms. Kirk's three attorneys to enable her continued abuse of the children and the Lt. Col.

Dr. Baker also determined that filming Tina was "abusive" because the Lt. Col. seemed more interested in making her look bad than nurturing the children. These are just the "highlights" of Dr. Baker's biased and empirically baseless interpretations regarding the nature of Borderline Personality Disorder, marital infidelity, addiction, domestic violence and child abuse. Lt. Col. Kirk suspects Dr. Baker had decided the outcome of his report before he even met with him. The report itself is littered with factual errors and gross biases, but more on that in future articles on this topic.

The children were also evaluated by multiple professionals and found to be credible witnesses. During their evaluations, the children provided detailed accounts of their mother's abuse. Statements from the children's evaluations include:

[box type="alert" icon="none"]

- "Dad just sits and takes it and mom just keeps after him."
- "Mom abuses dad and hits him."
- "We hide from mom until dad gets home."
- "The night mom got arrested on a scale of 1-10 was a 10, but we have 9s a lot."
- "Mom does not help around the house and when dad is gone we have to take care of ourselves."
- "Our father does everything."

[/box]

Originally, the court ordered that the only way the children could safely travel for visitation with their mother was if she had a Breathalyzer interlock installed in her vehicle. Within 5 months, Tina removed it without consent of the court and was held in contempt.

Judge Cornelia Reep was the original judge involved in the Kirk's divorce and custody dispute. She watched the video, read the reports and awarded emergency physical custody to Col. Kirk without hesitation. Three years and hundreds of thousands of dollars later, Ms. Kirk strategically obtained new legal representation, while stiffing her first attorney for thousands of dollars.

Judge Reep had represented Tina's new attorney during his divorce when Reep was a practicing attorney, which caused her to recuse herself from the case. Judge Lori B. Jackson took over and things changed dramatically for the worse. As it turns out, Judge Jackson should have also recused herself from the case as her husband is best friends with Tina's attorney, Thomas G. Smith, Esq. This would also appear to be a conflict of interest.

The details of Judge Lori B. Jackson's malfeasance are long and will be detailed at greater length in future articles, so let's begin with the basics. For starters, Judge Jackson:

- Is in the process of reversing custody. She ruled that although Ms. Kirk was drunk, hysterical and abusive, she still showed good parenting instincts unlike Lt. Col. Kirk who, although sober, acted just as irrationally by video taping the abusive episode instead of trying to calm down a drunk, raging, violent Borderline. A videotape, by the way, that Judge Jackson has gagged from public view.
- Determined that the children had been unfairly separated from their mother because of court proceedings and not because of Ms. Kirk's volatile and abusive behavior and alcoholism.
- Determined, without a shred of evidence, that the children would be harmed if they were not returned to Ms. Kirk's care because Lt. Col. Kirk is "equally dangerous to the children." Bear in mind, Judge Jackson viewed the video filmed on June 28, 2009.
- Determined, without a shred of evidence, that since Ms. Kirk had been the primary caretaker of the children prior to separation, that, by law, she should be entitled to that again despite her well-documented abuses. In reality, Lt. Col. Kirk has long been the children's primary caretaker, even with his deployments.
- Determined, without a shred of evidence, that Ms. Kirk had passed up employment opportunities by being married and should, therefore, be reimbursed. In reality, Ms. Kirk worked for all but 5 years of the marriage until the children were weaned. She holds an associate degree in business, a degree in holistic nutrition and multiple fitness training certifications.
- Determined that Lt. Col. Kirk showed a lack of concern for their daughter because he "locked her in a truck" and did not console her when she was upset, even though it is impossible to lock someone in a vehicle without power locks. Clearly, the Lt. Col. and his daughter were in the vehicle to keep Ms. Kirk from attacking them until the police arrived.

- Determined that Ms. Kirk's expenses exceed her income, so Lt. Col. Kirk should pay her and that all credit card debt, even the debt she ran up during her affair while separated, was marital and Col. Kirk's responsibility.
- Determined that the divorce was "equal fault."
- Determined that anytime Lt. Col. Kirk deploys for more than 72 hours, the children will be in the full custody of Ms. Kirk. Keep in mind they have been living with the Lt. Col. and their grandmother for over three years and in the Lt. Col.'s home for the last seven years.
- Determined that all of the Lt. Col.'s estate, including pre-marital assets (funds that the Col. has had since childhood and kept separate) was to be divided. West Virginia is an equitable distribution state not a community property state.
- Created money that does not and has never existed in an effort to pad Lt. Col. Kirk's credit side of the distribution ledger. This way, Judge Jackson could show unequal distribution and extort money from the Lt. Col. through a court order to pay Ms. Kirk an exorbitant amount of money. The amount created was over $70,000. This was even upheld in the last contempt hearing in which Judge Jackson ordered the Lt. Col. to pay even though she admitted in court, "That is clearly a mistake." The Lt. Col. has an appeal schedule on this matter later this fall.
- Awarded Ms. Kirk the Lt. Col.'s retirement, half of the marital assets, no responsibility for child support, $45,000 in spousal support already paid in the last three years and $12,000 more over the next three years regardless of remarriage. All marital debt, about $400,000, was given to the Lt. Col. Ms. Kirk, again with two college degrees, and who worked for all but five years of the marriage, was imputed at minimum wage for calculations that leave the Lt. Col. with over $1,000 a month in support payments to her for what will soon be 50% custody. This does not include the $800 a month in child support he was ordered to pay.

Judge Jackson's rulings have nearly destroyed the Lt. Col.'s ability to support his children. He was also ordered to pay the bulk of the court-appointed Guardian Ad Litem fees. For over three years, he has paid Ms. Kirk over $1500 a month in pay and benefits while he had sole custody of the children and serviced 100% of the marital debt. Ms. Kirk has had no legal fees since stiffing her original attorney. Her lawyers work pro bono. Ms. Kirk also quit work after separation under the guidance of her first attorney in order to throw off the chart for income and place the lion's share of burden on Lt. Col. Kirk.

Mission accomplished.

Judge Lori B. Jackson basically ignored three years worth of recommendations by court appointed officials who were charged with determining the “best interests of the children.” All of these officials, with the exception of Dr. Edward D. Baker, agreed that the children should not be placed in the custody of their mother. However, even Dr. Baker agreed the children were truthful in their accounts when he interviewed them. Numbers of reports were submitted to the court attesting to Ms. Kirk’s unfitness as a parent and Judge Jackson has neither acknowledged their existence in her rulings nor has she stated why she disregarded them.

Judge Lori B. Jackson completely disregarded the children’s counselor’s recommendations and continues to disregard the children’s own custody requests to live with their father.

Judge Lori B. Jackson disregarded the detailed written report and recommendations of the Guardian ad Litem formed over her extensive three-year interactions with the children and thorough investigation.

Judge Lori B. Jackson disregarded the report by Children’s Protective Services.

Judge Lori B. Jackson has yet to acknowledge Ms. Kirk’s diagnosis of Borderline Personality Disorder and its implications on her fitness to parent.

Judge Lori B. Jackson appears to have based her rulings simply on the word of an established mentally ill liar and the dubious opinions of a Psychologist who claims that Ms. Kirk’s many abuses, infidelities, alcoholism and rage were due to the effects of a “volatile marriage on her frail psyche.” It is also possible that there are relationships and/or political favors occurring behind closed doors, but don’t expect to see the truth or, for that matter, justice from Judge Lori B. Jackson.

More articles on Lt. Col. Kirk’s case are soon to follow by Paul Elam, others and myself. We ask that you consider supporting Col. Kirk when the time comes (and it will very soon!) by writing letters, posting respectful and civil comments on any news publications that carry this story, blogging about his story and/or simply by keeping Col. Kirk and his children in your thoughts.

Meanwhile, I have one question for Judge Lori B. Jackson, the pro bono attorneys, Thomas G. Smith, Esq., Jamison H. Cooper, Esq., and Afton Leanne Huston, Esq., and Dr. Edward D. Baker, Ph.D.:

Would you feel comfortable leaving your children in Tina Taylor Kirk’s care for a week? For a day? For an hour?

Didn’t think so.

The story of your enslavement

September 12, 2012 | by Stefan Molyneux | Link | Original Link

This is the story of your enslavement; how it came to be, and how you can finally be free.

Like all animals, human beings want to dominate and exploit the resources around them. At first, we mostly hunted and fished and ate off the land – but then something magical and terrible happened to our minds. We became, alone among the animals, afraid of death, and of future loss. And this was the start of a great tragedy, and an even greater possibility…

You see, when we became afraid of death, of injury, and imprisonment, we became controllable — and so valuable — in a way that no other resource could ever be. The greatest resource for any human being to control is not natural resources, or tools, or animals or land — but other human beings.

You can frighten an animal, because animals are afraid of pain in the moment, but you cannot frighten an animal with a loss of liberty, or with torture or imprisonment in the future, because animals have very little sense of tomorrow. You cannot threaten a cow with torture, or a sheep with death. You cannot swing a sword at a tree and scream at it to produce more fruit, or hold a burning torch to a field and demand more wheat. You cannot get more eggs by threatening a hen – but you can get a man to give you his eggs by threatening him.

Human farming has been the most profitable — and destructive — occupation throughout history, and it is now reaching its destructive climax.

Human society cannot be rationally understood until it is seen for what it is: a series of farms where human farmers own human livestock.

Some people get confused because governments provide healthcare and water and education and roads, and thus imagine that there is some benevolence at work. Nothing could be further from reality. Farmers provide healthcare and irrigation and training to their livestock.

Some people get confused because we are allowed certain liberties, and thus imagine that our government protects our freedoms. But farmers plant their crops a certain distance apart to increase their yields — and will allow certain animals larger stalls or fields if it means they will produce more meat and milk.

In your country, your tax farm, your farmer grants you certain freedoms not because he cares about your liberties, but because he wants to increase his profits.

Are you beginning to see the nature of the cage you were born into?

There have been four major phases of human farming. The first phase, in ancient Egypt, was direct and brutal human compulsion. Human bodies were controlled, but the creative productivity of the human mind remained outside the reach of the whip and the brand and the shackles. Slaves remained woefully underproductive, and required enormous resources to control. The second phase was the Roman model, wherein slaves were granted some capacity for freedom, ingenuity and creativity, which raised their productivity. This increased the wealth of Rome, and thus the tax income of the Roman government – and with this additional wealth, Rome became an empire, destroying the economic freedoms that fed its power, and collapsed.

I'm sure that this does not seem entirely unfamiliar.

After the collapse of Rome, the feudal model introduced the concept of livestock ownership and taxation. Instead of being directly owned, peasants farmed land that they could retain as long as they paid off the local warlords. This model broke down due to the continual subdivision of productive land, and was destroyed during the Enclosure movement, when land was consolidated, and hundreds of thousands of peasants were kicked off their ancestral lands, because new farming techniques made larger farms more productive with fewer people.

The increased productivity of the late Middle Ages created the excess food required for the expansion of towns and cities, which in turn gave rise to the modern Democratic model of human ownership. As displaced peasants flooded into the cities, a huge stock of cheap human capital became available to the rising industrialists – and the ruling class of human farmers quickly realized that they could make more money by letting their livestock choose their own occupations.

Under the Democratic model, direct slave ownership has been replaced by the Mafia model. The Mafia rarely owns businesses directly, but rather sends thugs around once a month to steal from the business "owners." You are now allowed to choose your own occupation, which raises your productivity – and thus the taxes you can pay to your masters. Your few freedoms are preserved because they are profitable to your owners.

The great challenge of the Democratic model is that increases in wealth and freedom threaten the farmers. The ruling classes initially profit from a relatively free market in capital and labor, but as their livestock become more used to their freedoms and growing wealth, they begin to question why they need rulers at all.

Ah well. Nobody ever said that human farming was easy.

Keeping the tax livestock securely in the compounds of the ruling classes is a three phase process. The first is to indoctrinate the young through government "education." As the wealth of democratic countries grew, government schools were universally inflicted in order to control the thoughts and souls of the livestock.

The second is to turn citizens against each other through the creation of dependent livestock. It is very difficult to rule human beings directly through force — and where it can be achieved, it remains cripplingly underproductive, as can be seen in North Korea. Human beings do not breed well or produce efficiently in direct captivity. If human beings believe that they are free, then they will produce much more for their farmers. The best way to maintain this illusion of freedom is to put some of the livestock on the payroll of the farmer. Those cows that become dependent on the existing hierarchy will then attack any other cows who point out the violence, hypocrisy and immorality of human ownership.

Freedom is slavery, and slavery is freedom.

If you can get the cows to attack each other whenever anybody brings up the reality of their situation, then you don't have to spend nearly as much controlling them directly. Those cows who become dependent upon the stolen largess of the farmer will violently oppose any questioning of the virtue of human ownership — and the intellectual and artistic classes, always and forever dependent upon the farmers — will say, to anyone who demands freedom from ownership: "You will harm your fellow cows."

The livestock are kept enclosed by shifting the moral responsibility for the destructiveness of a violent system to those who demand real freedom.

The third phase is to invent continual external threats, so that the frightened livestock cling to the "protection" of the farmers.

This system of human farming is now nearing its end.

The terrible tragedy of modern Western economic systems has occurred not in spite of, but because of past economic freedoms. The massive increases in American wealth throughout the 19th century resulted from economic freedom — and it was this very increase in wealth that fed the size and power of the state. Whenever the livestock become exponentially more productive, you get a corresponding increase in the number of farmers and their dependents. The growth of the state is always proportional to the preceding economic freedoms. Economic freedoms create wealth, and the wealth attracts more thieves and political parasites, whose greed then destroys the economic freedoms.

In other words, freedom metastasizes the cancer of the state. The government that starts off the smallest will always end up the largest.

This is why there can be no viable and sustainable alternative to a truly free and peaceful society. A society without political rulers, without human ownership, without the violence of taxation and statism…

To be truly free is both very easy, and very hard. We avoid the horror of our enslavement because it is painful to see it directly. We dance around the violence of our dying system because we fear the attacks of our fellow livestock.

But we can only be kept in the cages we refuse to see.

Wake up…

To see the farm is to leave it.

Do women need men need women?

Thy husband is thy lord, thy life, thy keeper,
Thy head, thy sovereign; one that cares for thee,
And for thy maintenance commits his body
To painful labour both by sea and land,
To watch the night in storms, the day in cold,
Whilst thou liest warm at home, secure and safe;
And craves no other tribute at thy hands
But love, fair looks and true obedience;
Too little payment for so great a debt.

– Katharina, the shrew from The Taming of same.

Hey, I didn't say it; she did. Well, okay. She's fictional. Actually, Shakespeare said it. Alright, well, he didn't "say" it; he wrote it. And no, I don't believe that women should be subservient to men, although I hereby give license to all my earthly enemies to try and make it look like I do.

A modern woman may read the above lines, see the words "thy lord… thy keeper,/Thy head, thy sovereign" without being able to see further, and consequently join the feminist cry of "Patriarchy!" However, it should be clear to the intelligent reader (whose sex shall remain anonymous) that the main portion of the above quote, indeed, of the entire monologue, deals with making the simple mental effort – one that appears to be beyond the scope of a great many modern women – to remember what men actually do when they're not harassing, raping, or otherwise lording over their women.

I believe that one of the major contributing factors in modern-day social ills has to do with subdividing the community, something which I hope to delve into in later articles. Subdivision against one's will, as in sending boys and girls to a school where they don't want to be, sending Dad and Mom on long commutes miles away from the house, and continuing this process ad infinitum across the human community, means ultimately that we will all be certain to know each other a great deal less. The one we're most surely to know the least is the taller, heavier, hairier, bass-resonant creature, trained in keeping his emotions to himself and communicating only when necessary. Suddenly, everything he does, all that "painful labour," becomes ephemeral and unimportant, since it happens far away from the senses and thought processes of the beneficiaries.

This is, I believe, at least part of what led to a silly poll I saw at the gym on one of those women's shows. I don't know if it was "The View" or one of the others. (To me, they're all "The View.") Based on the poll I saw, I can tell you that "the view" is looking bleaker, if not stupider. The poll simply stated: "Do women need men?" 40% responded "Yes," and a full 60% responded “No.”

It’s become so routine for me to hear cultural misandry and feminist-infused cultural doctrine that I was prepared to wave this off like so many shit-obsessed flies. Then something amazing happened on one of the other TV screens. The poll, it seems, was displayed on “The View” at the same time that an all-news station was reporting more than 100 earthquakes throughout Southern California the previous day. No major, stop-the-presses quakes. Apparently, these sorts of small quakes are quite normal in that part of the world, but so many in a 24-hour period was considered newsworthy. The televised report went on to mention that a great many water and gas lines were ruptured during the quake. That’s where the idiotic 60% need to be directed, I thought. Do women need men? Well, ladies, you do if you want your Southern Californian water and gas turned back on. Would you like to know why?

Because you never, ever, ever see women fixing the water and gas lines. When you do, it’s an anomaly. Anyone who dares shout “Patriarchy!” at this should be aware that Betty Friedan wasn’t looking out her suburban living room window pining to dig in the dirt with the construction boys. As far as water and gas lines are concerned, women have never had to be. All they have ever had to be, as Shakespeare pointed out centuries ago, is grateful.

60% of these “View”-watching, heavily subdivided layabouts have forgotten how to express any gratitude at all, apparently. That “60%” was displayed on a pixilated television screen that was conceived and designed by many men, from older television screens that were conceived and designed by men now deceased. The characters 6, 0, and % were chosen out of innumerable visual aids available on modern computers, all of which were conceived and designed by men. The raw materials requisite to make every single machine that displayed that “60%”; the rockets that propel the satellites into space; the satellite dishes; the cables that connect those dishes to those televisions; the electrical power to make the machines work; the cameras that recorded that women’s program; the lights that lit the set; the set; everything, everything, everything the women – enjoying the program from home or starring in it – participate in and gab about incessantly has something to do with some man somewhere first figuring it out, then standing “To watch the night in storms, the day in cold,/Whilst thou liest warm at home, secure and safe”; yet that is as nothing to millions of unthinking participants.

A stupid, thoughtless, pointless poll like that can be easily displayed on one television screen while a report on an accompanying screen merely implies the fact – the undeniable fact – that it’s going to be “blue collar” boys out in the California heat making certain that water and gas are restored to the creatures who don’t need them. The men, I meant; not the water and gas. Hell, we need water and gas.

Much of my problem with the poll actually lies with using the word “need.” As I have pointed out elsewhere, all needs are based on desires. Therefore, whenever we use the word “need” we should make every effort to remember that somewhere, however loosely connected, we are implying some sort of desire. I would like to ask the poll-takers what the lack of desire is behind that lack of "need."

Regardless, I would have to agree with the 60% and say, "No," women don't need men. But my interpretation of the question is undoubtedly too broad for the poll-takers, and too literal. You see, it all depends on what you want. What do women typically want from men? Let's list the personal wants first:

Sex
Procreation
Companionship
Physical protection
Financial resources
Wisdom
Division of labor
Stability

If you've got yourself a man, new or used model, then you undoubtedly have some combination of the above. Subtract physical protection and financial resources, and the man will most likely have some combination of the remainder in his association with you. Well done, if that's what you want, or if you want anything at all.

But there's a community outside your front door. Your sense of it, due to its subdivided nature, may be muted, but it's there, whether you want (need?) to think about it or not. Do you want (need?) to be able to walk out your front door not only feeling safe and secure, but also feeling engaged in your community to some extent? Then let's expand the list further:

Physical protection within and without the community
Division of labor at the macro level
Paved, relatively flat surfaces for travel
Electrical power Shelter
Consumer goods
Communication capability
Transportation vehicles
Regular food supply
Access to and ability with various natural resources for furtherance of the above

If you've got yourself a herd of males, then you most definitely have some greater combination of the above than you apparently ever even bother to think about. If, of course, that's what you wanted, way back when you said you didn't need men.

Unless you're a hermit. Are you a hermit? Then for all of the above in both lists, the answer is "No." You, as a hermit, don't need a man to _____. Enjoy your newfound freedom as a hermit (or is it "hermitess"?). In fact, here's a list of things you'll "need" in your life without men. For all those who would accuse me of misogyny, I hope that my affirmations below of women's magnificent abilities will dispel those arguments:

- Women know how to make fire.
- Women know how to hunt.
- Women know how to fish.
- Women know how to skin dead animals.
- Women know how to make tools from rocks.
- Women know metallurgy.
- Women know carpentry.
- Women know how to pour concrete.
- Women know how to read.
- Women with natural leadership ability can help coordinate the other hermitesses to get all of the above done.
- If any individual woman does not know how to do one or more of the above, she can quickly learn, because she has a human brain.

If, ladies, that is how you wish to live, without men as any sort of necessity, then go to it. I myself have never hunted, am quickly bored with fishing, and skinning anything is beyond my ability to stomach. Furthermore, if I can't light it with a match or a lighter, then that fire is going to remain unlit. Therefore, beyond my feeble abilities at a handful of the above, I am also quite lazy. I see that list and can think of not one single thing I want to do very much, and certainly not on a daily, do-or-die basis. I'm pretty sure that most female readers feel the same, unless there's an avid hunter or fisher among them.

We could call up the hunter, e-mail the fisher, find a carpentress, get a book on pouring concrete, and start making lists, ladies. We could do it. But think about it: How many of you really, really want to? Furthermore, hunters and fishers eventually like to go back to the hunting cabin to turn on the electric light and play cards. It is in that precise moment that a little gratitude ought to be in order, or you can forget about cabins, electric lights, and printed playing cards.

Because, you see, this far after Betty Friedan's righteous anger and the Second Wave, women aren't flocking to the occupations required for the backbone of civilization to remain aligned and sturdy. Men fill these occupations, and only in part because it's expected. I seriously doubt that many construction workers would really want to leave that work behind to crochet or knit. Construction work is not pleasant work, but there is the camaraderie, the paycheck, the chance to be outside on a nice day (or a horrible one), the opportunity to build and maintain muscle, the methodical and pleasing effect it can have on the thought process, etc. You also get to build something, which is cool.

This many decades after "NOW! My Body, My Choice! Take Back the Night! Slut Walk!" and the like, if a group of women actually built something straight from the raw materials all the way to the gables on the roof without a single man's assistance, two things would happen: 1) We'd fail to acknowledge that what they accomplished was due not only to moxie, but to the information provided by men who had previously accomplished something similar; and 2) We'd have to have a big, big celebration that everyone who's anyone would have to find out about and participate in; and which would eventually become a national holiday and a staple of Women's Herstory Month. Otherwise, "Patriarchy!"

If civilization is what you want, then men are what you need. Nature is fun until you have to rely on nature for survival. If you do not wish to do that, and you're the sort of woman who wants a high-powered job to feel fulfilled as a woman or a human being or whatever, all you will ever do is that which so much of the rest of humanity, including me, does: You will climb a set of stairs built on the backs of men. The only difference is that it is you, not I, who claims not to need them.

It is unconscionable for a woman to stand and proclaim "The End of Men" in a studio built by men, with cameras invented, maintained, and improved upon by men, connected to power sources that are kept running by men, all the while using a language hammered out and spun to dizzying heights by the thoughtful processes of countless male writers. It is equally dumb to flash a silly poll denigrating everything that makes knowledge of the poll results possible to millions, and expect us all to laugh heartily along.

Think about it: A worker for "The View" picks up a headset designed by a man, connected to a computer fixed by the IT guy, and sends a ring signal out of the building built by "blue collar" butt cracks, into the home or the very pocket of the poll voter. Throughout this process, one sex has most definitely been required to be not only present, but physically and mentally active to a high degree, in order for 60% to completely ignore that same sex, and we're not talking about ignoring women.

Now for the bit that ought to sober any female reader. Let's look at what men typically want (need?) from women on a personal basis:

Sex
Procreation
Companionship
Wisdom
Division of labor
Stability

Not too much different from what women usually want from men. But what will men require of women if they want community, or civilization itself? It's an exhaustive list, but here we go:

Thank God you're still wanted, ladies.

In spite of the fact that she's female, it seems that every gay man alive wants Judy Garland. She belted out a torch song in "A Star is Born," a song that, in my opinion, simply torches all other torch songs. Her soon-to-be mentor and suitor, Norman Maine, played by James Mason, walks into a dimly lit, low-ceilinged nightclub, where he watches Esther Blodgett (Garland), surrounded by male musicians moving rather seductively to the rhythm, in a highly sexually charged scene, singing a song about "The Man That Got Away." It's a fantastic film and an electric song. It was probably composed with Garland in mind. (Boy oh boy, is that how she sings it!) The movie mainly concerns the rise to stardom of Blodgett (who is turned into Vicki Lester by her brilliant husband), due only in part to her extraordinary talent as an entertainer. Mostly, it was due to Maine's tireless efforts, in spite of his faded career, depression and alcoholism. The movie ends tragically, but there, to an expectant crowd of admirers in a theater, Vicki meekly steps up to the mike to tell it like it is:

"Hello, everybody. This is Mrs. Norman Maine."

With a single song and a single line, Judy says it all.

Hey, Chicago!

[box type="note" icon="none"]

Straight from the Windy City, E. Steven Berkimer, the new activism coordinator for A Voice for Men and, co-founder of The False Rape Society and The Community of the Wrongly Accused (COTWA), has issued a challenge to MRAs in the Chicago area.

He thinks that the recent trend in "on the ground" activism found in cities like Vancouver, Hamilton, Edmonton, Seattle and Melbourne would be enhanced by being joined by Chi-town.

He is asking anyone in or near that great city to make contact so that they can form a group to go on poster runs. It is a good idea. Chicago is the third largest city in the United States, with a very dense population center. Posters for the MRM placed there would be sure to have an impact. That impact, as seen in other cities, has gone something like the following.

1. Posters, filled with incendiary rhetoric, like being against domestic violence and discrimination, go up in densely populated areas.
2. Self-appointed saviors of humanity come out with box cutters, deface and remove the posters, cry a lot, and claim to be traumatized by the evil messages.
3. One of the box cutter wielding crybabies makes contact with someone in the mainstream media, who makes contact with AVfM, demanding to know why we hate women so much and asking if we hunt endangered species, eat babies and sell crack at the playground.
4. We answer their questions honestly, explaining that we are just trying to raise awareness about a more complete view of domestic violence and discrimination.
5. The mainstream reporter then publishes an article written before they talked to us, about how we post hate messages, hunt for endangered species, eat babies and sell crack at the playground, but does not show their readers the posters, or explain why they are supposedly hateful.
6. Then I get an email from another concerned MRA that says, "Hey, I want to get in on this, too."
7. Go back to item 1.

With each one of these cycles, site traffic goes up. Support, even from the blue pill community, becomes more apparent, the mainstream hacks get slaughtered right in their own comment sections, and more people with brains actually come here and figure out just how full of shit the crybabies and hacks really are.

I like the arrangement. We post a few 8 ½ by 11 pieces of paper, and our opponents do the rest of the work.

Anyway, if you live in the Chicago area and you want to be part of a team decorating a few traffic areas with enough truth to gag Oprah, please send an email to Steve at activism@avoiceformen.com.

I know he would love to hear from you. So will the rest of Chicago.

AVfM Radio: The Golden Bridle

The golden bridle. When we talk about the carrot and the stick, this would be the carrot. It’s the positive inducement to men, to comply with the prevailing status quo, even when their role in it is draft animal in a yoke.

We’ve talked a lot on AVFM about the traditionally acceptable role for men, that of provider, protector, all around utility dispensing labor, cash, protection, and absorbing and dispensing violence on behalf of others. And weve talked previously about the fear of lost public identity which motivates men to stay on that figurative treadmill. But tonight, although we’ll be straying into discussions of the social penalties of nonconformance, we’re really talking about heroes.

What can possibly so valuable that men throughout history have willingly died, been mutilated, surrendered consideration as human beings entirely in exchange for it? What is the golden bridle

Do women need men need women?

The dishonor of Judge Lori B. Jackson

September 14, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Dear men and women of the men's movement,

We have arrived at a moment that will define this website and, I dare to say, this movement for years to come.

As you recently learned from Dr. Tara Palmatier, a family tragedy has unfolded in the state of West Virginia. It is a story so dark, so utterly unjust, that it is hard to describe without the use of metaphors that would seem hyperbolic. Those metaphors would, in reality, be inadequate. Lt. Col. Joel Kirk of the United States Air Force, a decorated combat pilot, and his two children have been trapped in a legal nightmare so twisted and so inhumane that it defies description. The facts in this case reveal a presiding family court judge bereft of not only sound judgment and reason, but of human decency.

Judge Lori B. Jackson, of the Eighteenth Family Court Circuit for Harrison County, West Virginia has used her gavel, her authority under the law, to sadistically bludgeon Lt. Col. Kirk, and has sentenced his two children to being placed in the custody of their mother, Tina Taylor Kirk, a proven and even more sadistic abuser.

As Dr. Palmatier pointed out in her article, Judge Jackson had a mountain of evidence before her, including reports from psychologists and the court appointed guardian ad litem, that concluded beyond any doubt that Tina Taylor Kirk is a severely emotionally disturbed woman, who, especially when abusing alcohol, was given to repeated episodes of extreme rage that frequently resulted in the severe psychological and physical abuse of her children.

The evidence, clearly at Judge Jackson's disposal during the divorce, also demonstrated a mother who regularly endangered the lives of those children, driving while intoxicated with them in the car.

Despite the staggering amount of evidence that the children were unsafe with their mother, and being routinely abused by her, Judge Jackson reversed an earlier judge's order awarding the father custody, and with full knowledge returned the children directly into the hands of their abuser, along with the bulk of Lt. Col Kirk's assets.

It was a judgment from hell, and hell it has been, for those two innocent children and their father.

It is very important here to make the attempt to impart to you the real magnitude of what these children have had to live with. Dr. Palmatier brought you, directly from the mouth of Lt. Col Kirk, one particular incident involving a drunken, raging Tina Taylor Kirk, who after frightening her son into fleeing the home, threw herself onto the back of an SUV in which Lt. Col. Kirk and his daughter were also attempting to escape.

Now I want you to hear the story as it was conveyed in the voices of Tina Kirk and her daughter in a recording of that incident. The incident was recorded on a video camera. While the video content of the recording was placed under a gag order by Judge Jackson, we are free to bring you the audio portion. For the sake of brevity it has been edited to remove distortions, unintelligible audio and prolonged periods of silence. For the sake of accuracy, we will also provide you the unedited recording.

Please be warned in advance. This audio is very disturbing. Listen at your own discretion.

Here is the edited version.

Here is the complete recording.

And why did all this start? Because Tina Taylor Kirk could not find her cell phone.

This incident, which was also a part of the guardian ad litem report to the court reveals a misquote from the article by Dr. Palmatier. When questioned about this incident, and asked to rate the severity of what happened on a scale of 1 to 10, the son, as reported by Dr. Palmatier, answered:

"The night mom got arrested on a scale of 1-10 was a 10, but we have 9s a lot."

That is not an entirely accurate quote. What the boy actually said was:

"That night was probably an 11, but Mom gets to 10 a lot."

In the interest of full disclosure, you can read that for yourself in the guardian ad litem report, which we provide for you here. The document has been redacted to conceal the names of the children for obvious reasons.

Ad litem report

This report, page after page, documents the chronically abusive behavior of Tina Taylor Kirk toward not only her husband, but her children; of them being choked and hit and slapped and berated till they crawled under their beds for safety; of being abused to the point of living their lives in fear, listening for the sound of their fathers car pulling into the driveway, because that sound meant for a time they would be protected from the monster in their home.

The report documents Tina Taylor Kirk's attempts to intimidate and threaten personnel charged with investigating the well-being of her children, her attempted coercion of her children into lying on her behalf, trying to force them to mold their reality to cover her lies and to fit her embittered and malicious agenda. It is all laid out in clear, heartbreakingly painful detail.

It is a horrifying document, but it did at least hold the promise of a way out for those battered children. In its pages it contains the justification, indeed the moral imperative to ensure that those children are not abused in this way again.

But the real value of that document hinged entirely on the competence and moral capacity of whatever authority was entrusted to take action on it. In this case, that responsibility was unfortunately placed in the hands of Judge Lori B. Jackson, who reviewed the same evidence you just did, and then, for whatever reason suited her at the time, dropped both of those children directly in the grease.

Then she ordered that the video, which because it is visual proof and, therefore, particularly damning, be forever withheld from the public. Make of that decision what you will.

The facts in this case are evident. The worst of them is that an abusive, mentally unstable parent has found a friend and enabler in a state functionary who has reversed her sacrosanct obligation to act in those two children's best interest, and instead condemned them, wantonly, to continued violation at the hands of their abuser. It is unconscionable. The only question that remains takes us back to what I said at the start of this letter.

What are we going to do about it?

We sure as hell have to do something. Knowing what we know and doing nothing would demonstrate near as much depraved indifference as the family court in Harrison County, West Virginia.

To be clear, I know this is an uphill battle. The hubris that leads to these kinds of decisions is born of a sense of impunity that is neither irrational, nor unwarranted. As we have seen in case after case, officials in family courts across this country and beyond are accustomed to absolute control and complete immunity from public scrutiny and forced accountability for their misdeeds. They operate in a system that sustains its corruption and egregious conduct by its own unfettered authority, leaving them all but impervious to the desire for justice and the mandates of the Constitution.

But we also know another reality. Whenever enough people speak truth to power, and are unyielding, even the mighty can feel the impact.

In the case of Vladek Filler, a man falsely accused of rape during a bitter custody dispute, and prosecuted by viciously unjust prosecutor Mary Kellett, we made a difference. After AVfM secured over a thousand signatures on a petition demanding Kellett's disbarment; after we inundated politicians and news media with letters, emails and phone calls; even after Mary Kellett sought to have a gag order put on this website because of our activism, she now prepares herself to face a disciplinary hearing at the bar for her misconduct. Her license to practice law is now rightly on the line.

The other case we took up was that of Gordon Smith, a Delaware man arrested 8 times on 13 false allegations from his former wife, Tiffany Marie Smith. At the time we met Gordon he was still being thrown in jail regularly on bogus charges and was still facing time in prison for crimes he did not commit. We went to work for Mr. Smith in much the same way we did for Mr. Filler. As of today, Gordon Smith has been cleared of all charges. Tiffany Marie Smith has been arrested and is facing felony prosecution for her misdeeds.

I do not claim that AVfM was the only reason that these cases improved for these two men. But anyone following the cases knows that we played a very significant role in the outcome. We made a difference, maybe the difference, and we can do it again.

So, on behalf of the entire editorial staff of AVfM, I am calling on our supporters again. It is time to put the A in MRA again, and to do it now. After all, what advocate for men could possibly remain silent in the face of this opportunity to right a wrong and to strike a blow directly at the heart of the most pervasive source of discrimination against men…the family courts?

And, I ask you with no reservation at all, who deserves this more than Lt. Col. Kirk and his children?

Here is who you contact, and remember, courteous but firm:

Injustice in Delaware – Part V

September 14, 2012 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

In the first article in the series Injustice in Delaware, Paul Elam asked if in Delaware they were a little slow or a little malicious. They must be a little slow. The powers that be can't reasonably have such malice for Gordon Smith that they would jeopardize the safety of his two small children. Can they?

Tiffany Marie Smith cut herself with a knife, or had someone cut her, and laid in a ditch. She faked a supposedly brutal assault. She was injured and suffered pain and disfigurement at her own hand. When Tiffany Smith was in the Emergency Room giving a false statement to Delaware State Police, they knew it was a false report because Mr. Smith was on GPS miles away from her faked attack. Why didn't they have her sent to the psych ward for a 72 hour commitment? If cutting yourself to frame someone isn't the definition of "danger to yourself and others" what is? The state police let her go home to the children and apparently took no further action to report to the Department of Services to Children Youth and Families (DSCYS) that the children are in the custody of a seriously mentally unstable woman and should be removed. Calls have already been made to the Department of Services to Children Youth and Families, and they insist they will not act unless police ask them to intervene. The police in the meantime have the power tget the children removed, they can even do it themselves, at any time, as law enforcement officers, yet they refuse to act, with the excuse that there's no "proof" that the children are in any danger–danger from a psychotic who will injure herself just to make false allegations.

Noted psychologist Dr. Tara Palmatier wrote:
"Tiffany Smith fits the profile for the kind of high-conflict false accuser who may very well do harm to their children. I also hope that the DA gives her the maximum sentence."

Tiffany Smith escalated her false reports from mere lies to faking blocked calls, to fabricating phony threatening letters, to faking a physical assault. Psychologist call this "decompensating." She still has not been charged for any of these crimes, only of her most recent ones. Nevertheless, after recently being charged, Tiffany Marie Smith's mental condition was obviously worsening to the point where she became dangerously unstable.

Even after being arrested on a felony and three serious misdemeanors, she was released essentially without bail; she was charged with $5,000 "unsecured" bail, which means neither she nor anyone else had to actually put up any money, she'll just owe money if she doesn't show up for her scheduled court date in October (which her attorney can likely get a continuance on). As of this writing, Tiffany Marie Smith is now at large. She has apparently quit her job and police cannot find her at her residence and no one who knows her will say where she is. Neither police nor anyone else have been able to locate her.

Tiffany Marie Smith, current whereabouts unknown
The children's father, Gordon, has now been back to family court twice, including on an emergency motion, and had authorities and judges routinely put off doing anything, opting for later hearings and continuances; the situation was not, and is still not, deemed an "emergency." As of this writing, Gordon still not has even seen his children, despite multiple efforts to establish contact. When will it be an emergency for Delaware authorities? When Ms. Smith straps the children in the car and drives into a lake, or kidnaps them to hide in another state? If the Commissioner didn't see fit to give the children to their father why didn't he order that they be removed to DSCYF custody for their own safety? Why have the police, the family court and DSCYF not done something to protect these children who at ages five and six are too young to protect themselves? Do we have to wait and see if this dangerously unstable woman who injured herself injures her children or worse? Yes, in Delaware they must just be a little slow. They can't just be malicious, sexist, and incompetent can they?

Beau Biden, do you even know how to run an Attorney General's office?

For previous updates on criminal rampage of Tiffany Marie Smith and her victimization of her former husband Gordon Smith and his children, read Injustice In Delaware Part I, Part II, Part III, and Part IV if you missed them. See also Open Letter to Delaware State Police, and State Attorney General's Office by John The Other and Nurdy Dancing, Cop 101 Lessons for Delaware State Police by Dean Esmay, and Tiffany Marie Smith Behind Bars by Paul Elam, John the Other, and Nurdy Dancing to review the story so far on the criminal rampage of Tiffany Marie Smith and the irresponsible behavior of Delaware authorities, who finally only recently took action, and since then have reverted to a state of utter inaction.

A note to MRAs. Gordon Smith is not just another blue pill man in trouble. He is one of us. He is also one of the founders of FLAIR and has worked diligently to reform family law as well as being an activist supporting reform to VAWA. He has a legal defense fund to acquire counsel for his upcoming trial, since at this point all the police action against him has destroyed his professional life and drained him financially. If you can, please drop something into his fund so that he has a chance at qualified representation for his continuing legal battles to see his children, see Tiffany Marie Smith fully answer for her crimes, and recover from his devastating financial losses. Give here.

Ethics of hypocrisy part II: feminist therapy

In The Ethics of Hypocrisy I argued that being an advocate of the ideology of radical feminism was incompatible with claiming expert status in discipline of ethics. How can man hating radical feminist (Dr Betty McLellan) who involves herself with a group promoting male eugenics and gendercide as solutions to their perceived problem of maleness, also hold a university appointment as an authority on "feminist ethics." What sort of ethical framework could she teach young and impressionable students in the social sciences? In this article I explore further details of McLellan's deluded perspective and academic shortcomings.

In the introduction to her 1995 treatise of on "Feminist Therapy" titled *Beyond Psycopression[1], McLellan states of her years of study in the USA that a "31-year-old deaconess from the Methodist Church in Australia turned into a feisty, furious feminist!"

McLellan's staff page at the James Cook University[2] lists one of her qualifications as "Dip RE, Melbourne, 1965." That is a Diploma of Religious Education. If the ethics of male hatred is difficult to reconcile with secular standards of morality, it is even more difficult within a theological framework. Nonetheless McLellan's radical feminist ideas were nurtured at the Claremont School of Theology[3], where she undertook her doctoral studies in the field of pastoral counseling.

Pastoral counseling is an integration of traditional religious beliefs and teaching with contemporary counseling and psychological skills, used by ordained persons or others authorized by a faith group to offer help to those in emotional distress. Dr Betty's Doctoral dissertation in this field was titled Lesbian Identity: A Theological and Psychological Inquiry into the Developmental Stages of Identity in a Lesbian.

While the requirements for conferral of the degree of PhD vary considerably between countries and institutions, a doctorate generally requires undertaking research that is original and makes a significant contribution to the body of knowledge in the field of study of sufficient standard for publication in the peer reviewed literature. McLellan's dissertation however is devoid of any academically or statistically legitimate research and is quite frankly an embarrassment to the institution and assessors who accepted it.

The stages in the development of a lesbian identity proposed by McLellan are a simple adaptation and blend of Kubler Ross and Erichsons' well known schemas. The research methodology used is said to be descriptive and analytical, which one should interpret in this case as meaning her thesis is based upon opinion and conjecture. To test her "model" McLellan held brief preliminary interviews with a grand total of seven lesbians selecting 4 for a "more detailed" interview and then choosing only one of these as a "representative case" against which to "test" her hypothesis. So we have a sample size of 1 selected as the most likely of 7 to fit the hypothesized model!

She then proceeds to state her "conclusions," several of which commence with the phrase “in at least one instance …” and finally declaring “ there is a strong possibility that what was found to be true in the representative case will be found to be true in other cases when further research is done”(read when some actual research is done). How’s that for feminist twisted logic and double speak! I recommend that in order to grasp the intellectual emptiness of her thesis that you read the abstract for yourself here.

McLellan was either uninformed regarding basic research, statistical methods and selection bias, or more likely she simply chose to disregard these cornerstones of empirical analysis. It’s difficult to imagine a post graduate research student in any other discipline ignoring these basics. Still, such undesirable traits do seem to afflict a good many so called “academic” feminists.

As a general rule University Academics at Professor level are involved in ongoing research within their departments, with the expectation of publication of research findings in the peer-reviewed literature. McLellan’s James Cook University webpage lists her “research interests” as Women’s Studies, Feminist Ethics, and Mental Health. A comprehensive database search of McLellan as an author however, revealed a grand total of zero peer reviewed research publications. Rather than research, McLellan has continued the precedent set in her doctoral thesis of writings based on “feminist analysis,” that is, Betty Boo’s own bigoted radicalized and politicized opinions.

McLellan has authored several books, three of which expand on her views of “Feminist Psychotherapy.”[4] She practices “psychotherapy” in Townsville and appears not to belong to any professional association; unsurprisingly there is no professional association of feminist psychotherapists in Australia.

While there is a small amount of peer reviewed literature on Feminist Psychotherapy, these papers appear to mostly be theoretical discussions and critiques. Searching the Medline and PsyhARTICLES databases I was unable to locate any clinical trials or empirical research regarding the effectiveness or outcomes from this type of “therapy.”

What one can quickly glean from reading the online samples of McLellan’s books is that Feminist Psychotherapy is informed by an intense anti-male bias. This discriminatory ethos against the male sex collectively is also fully apparent in Dr. McLellan’s public speeches and writings including her letters to the editor of our local newspaper the Townsville Bulletin, as previously detailed.[5]

It appears that McLellan rejects all that is known about the complex and multifactorial nature of the etiology of mental health problems in favor of a simpler explanation, From “Beyond Psychopression”

> In contrast to other therapies that see women as “sick” or as being “responsible for their own problems,” feminist therapy holds the view that every woman who comes for therapy has been and continues to be oppressed, and is in need of liberation. It is from that basic assumption that therapy proceeds.

The ideological view that women's metal health problems stem predominantly if not exclusively from "patriarchal oppression" and that in any case of any conflict between the sexes it will always be the male who is responsible has no empirical basis and is likely to be highly destructive as a foundation for therapy. Ignoring any degree of personal accountability for one's circumstances is likely to simply feed a harmful collusion between client and therapist especially in the areas of depression, borderline and narcissistic personality disorders.

McLellan considers blame a central issue for feminist therapy and not unexpectedly there should always be a man to blame.

> Blame is crucial to the success of therapy in many instances. Feminists call it naming, finding the courage to name those who perpetrate injustices against us.
> Naming and blaming our oppressors is essential if we want to rise above the effects of the wrong they have done to us. Consequently, naming and blaming are important issues for feminist therapy.
> One of the characteristics of blame in therapy is that we have to work with a woman till she gets the blame right.

Not a skerrick of evidence is presented as to the therapeutic value of getting the blame right. The retrospective attribution of blame simply infantilizes the client, and denies them the agency to take control of their life.

A further tenet of feminist psychotherapy is the need for female clients to become politically active in the struggle to free women collectively from "patriarchal oppression." Soliciting clients to become involved in the therapist's own passion for a radical anti-male ideology could never be considered an ethical pursuit and is clearly an abuse of the therapist's position of power in the client-therapist relationship.

Again from "Beyond Psychoppression"

> This call for a radicalised feminist therapy to be located within the bounds of the feminist movement comes from my understanding of the implications for women of living in a war zone. We do live in a war zone and there are daily casualties. Our feminist analysis of society leads us to say often enough that the numbers of attacks, woundings, murders of women by men, the daily harassment, intimidation, exploitation of women by men, are all clear evidence that women live in "occupied territory." Men are at war with women, and women and their offspring are the victims.

It is noteworthy that McLellan explicitly advises feminist therapists not to keep client records. This is an incomprehensible recommendation, as not only would it hinder the therapist from being able to recall the complex details and relationships of many clients over time, memory alone would be an inadequate basis on which to prepare reports or to transfer care to another therapist. Naturally, without records claims against the therapist for malpractice would be indefensible.

The foregoing examples are sufficient for any reasonable person to see that McLellan's ideas are extreme and at the fringe of both empirical and popular understanding. Even McLellan acknowledges this:

> Some women will choose not to seek help from a therapist who is known to be a feminist for fear that she has an "agenda," or is "biased." She is biased, of course. She is biased against the oppression of women and against the agents of that oppression. And she does have an agenda. Her agenda is to help women uncover the truth and to work to make changes in their lives, so that mental health will become a reality.

I can't sum it up any better than Dr Tara Palmatier, who wrote:

> What McClellan proposes is infantilizing, enabling, growth retarding, and dangerous. It encourages the recipient to stay in an arrested state of early child to adolescent stages of development. It's perverse.

That such individuals remain protected from scrutiny and conformity with current professional standards, behind the cloistered walls of institutions of higher learning, is simply scandalous.

Derek Bedry confirms he did not tear down posters

September 15, 2012 | by Molly Von Sämmichämmer | Link | Original Link

Derek Bedry didn't do it! – confirmed by Derek Bedry.

On September 9th, AVfM reported on the apparent participation of a "journalist" in a self-identified "femistasi" group action of 25 to 30 individuals tearing down posters reading, in part, "men's rights are human rights". This same journalist who conducted a telephone interview with the poster of those posters, which read "men's rights are human rights". Bedry then wrote an open-file article[1] claiming MRM connections to terrorists, specifically a man in Norway, and a mentally ill student at L' École Polytechnique in Quebec who, in 1989 murdered 14 women and 2 men, before committing suicide by shooting himself, twenty-three years ago.

Derek Bedry's openfile article illustrated the clear connections between a Norwegian mass-murderer, a murder-suicide in Quebec 23 years ago, and the human rights group formed in Vancouver in the summer of 2012 without even a single cited or mentioned source.

In his professional capacity as a "journalist", Derek Bedry is obviously not the man who looks exactly like Derek Bedry, captured on video tearing down human rights posters, of which Bedry photographed the remnants. Mr Bedry himself has made this clear, in an addendum to his September article identifying the connections between Norwegian and 23 year old french canadian crime, and attributing a motive of sex-crime apologetics, and connecting all this to the newly formed human rights poster-hanging activists in Vancouver, BC.

[image]The previous reporting on AVfM, identifying Bedry's participation with armed vandals actions, tearing down posters, and censoring For The Greater Good was obviously incorrect. Bedry apparently did not tear down the posters which he photographed after they had been torn down, featuring the self credited photo with his own article. We know this, because he, or someone else, said so in an addendum to his article.

It is obvious now, after denial by Bedry (or his editor), that the man who looks just like him, depicted in cell-phone video tearing down posters which Bedry – in an unrelated incident – photographed at the site for his article that Derek Bedry's professional credibility should not be questioned, and we are very sorry for misidentifying him, tearing down the posters he photographed after they were torn down.

"We're very, very, very, very, very sorry, for impugning Mr Bedry's character, and his journalistic integrity. And I'm sorry, too," said John the Other.

We sincerely hope Mr Bedry will forgive the misidentification of himself in cell phone video depicting a man exactly resembling him tearing down posters which Mr Bedry photographed in their torn-down state for his article.

In addition, Mr Bedry is invited to participate in a scheduled debate on September 23, addressing the topic of : Has feminism gone too far?

This is a question which was asked early in September, by a woman of integrity and courage. She posted the question as the premise of a public debate.

In the original event's plan, three individuals from each side would argue that no, feminism has not gone too far, or yes, indeed, feminism has gone too far.

Sadly, after publication of this planned debate on Facebook, the original organizer was rewarded for her attempt at public discussion by a torrent of abuse and threats.

Apparently some individuals did not want a debate to take place. Not only did these bad-sportsmen not want to participate, they wanted nobody else to either. Abused and threatened, that woman whose integrity and courage moved her to propose a public discussion cancelled the event.

Disappointing as that cancellation was, the good news is that the debate is back on!

With a very special thanks-you to the original organizer,

A Father's Story [2] and A Voice for Men will be presenting the re-scheduled debate:

"Has feminism gone too far?"

Chris Marshal of CC Motors[3] will be hosting this event at the location of CC Motor Cars.

The debate will be held on Sunday 23 September 2012, 3PM at 1315 Hastings St in East Vancouver, B.C.

In acknowledgement of the obviously mistaken identification of Derek Bedry's alleged participation in organized censorship and vigilant removal of hateful, traumatizing posters reading "men's rights are human rights" Mr Bedry is cordially invited to argue for the continued legitimacy, urgency and necessary future escalation of feminism – in the September 23 debate at 1315 East Hastings: Has Feminism Gone too far?

We look forward to a lively and informative discussion with Mr Bedry and other proponents of feminism's need to go farther than censorship, armed mobs and fantasy-as-journalism, on September 23, 2012.

Additional details of this debate were published on AVfM here[4].

Note, this event is intended as civilized, civil, and friendly discussion, and sharing of views. Although individuals may feel very strongly about their own positions, participants and audience members will be expected to behave with cordiality, and courtesy.

A Facebook page for the event has been created here[5].

To participate as a speaker or to inquire about attendance – please email questions and commentary to events@avoiceformen.com

Mr Bedry has not, at this time, denied authorship of the article credited to him on Openfile.ca, although further updates may be forthcoming.

Publishers note: After a lengthy investigation, we have determined that it was not John the Other placing the posters up in Vancouver, but simply a man who looks exactly like John the Other, wears his clothing and who happened to be seen at the construction hoarding with posters in his hand on the day in question. Once again. John the Other did not put up those posters. Because we said so. PE

September 15, 2012 | by Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) | Link | Original Link

Welcome to 'Shamus Tacticus: A field Guide.' My name is Typhonblue and today I will be presenting a somewhat rarified and fascinating specimen of the species Shamus Tacticus—colloquially known as 'the Shaming Tactic.'

Without further ado, I present today's shaming tactic.

> Men use women as masturbation sleeves.

This shaming tactic can be employed in plural: All, most or many men use women as masturbation sleeves or in singular, one particular man is using women as masturbation sleeves.
This particular Shamus Tacticus arises out of cross-pollination between several subspecies:

- Shamus Virilius Violentus—male sexuality is innately degrading to female.
- Shamus Objecticus—men routinely view attractive women as sexual objects rather then as sexy subjects.
- Feminius Alluricus – An inflated belief in the attractiveness of women.

Gentle audience, pull on your laboratory gloves and get out your scalpels, because we are going to dissect this specimen of Shamus Tacticus.

First we look at its inheritance from the subspecies listed above.

This particular shaming tactic relies for its power on Shamus Virilius Violentus—the idea that a man can 'use' a woman sexually without her simultaneously using him as well. This concept rests on a foundational belief that men take sex from women, that their sexuality degrades women and thus that their sexuality is a form of violence done to women.

It is refined by Shamus Objecticus—the belief that men are somehow prone to viewing attractive women as objects rather then women who are sexually attractive. We can see the evidence of this in how human males, when encountering human females in a mating arena, will simply select their chosen female partner and remove her from the area as one would a consumable from a store. No courtship, no attempt at seduction, no proof of worth on the part of the male, not even a word exchanged.

It is further reinforced by Feminius Alluricus— The belief the female body is so fantastically attractive to the male that the complete absence of movement, interest or engagement in a female sexual partner does not cause him to wilt faster then a plastic bag in a blast furnace.

Now that we've examined the taxonomy of this particular Shamus Tacticus, let's look at its anatomy directly and observe its uniquely nuanced self-contradiction.

If a woman were no better then a masturbation sleeve, why wouldn't the man actually use a masturbation sleeve? He doesn't have to seduce it, pay for its meal or risk it giving him an STD. What this is actually saying is that the man has just had crappy sex that's, when you count in the additional costs of sex, worse then masturbation. His partner, apparently, still got sex out of the deal. Net win for her. Or, if she was using him as a masturbation aid, then… at most this is a lose-lose for both of them. Go back to your vibrators and fleshlights, I suppose.

In conclusion, since it's not possible for a man to use an active, involved female sex partner as a masturbation sleeve because she's, well, active and involved, what this Shamus Tacticus actually is saying is that men somehow degrade women because women are bad at sex.

I hope you enjoyed this installment of 'Deconstructing Shaming Tactics.' Thank you for listening; please tune in next time, when we will present another weapon in the endless arsenal of Shamus Tacticus.

MWT Radio: Interview with Lt. Col. Joel Kirk

On Monday, September 17, 2012 at 8:00 PM CST, a special edition of Man, Woman Truth Radio will air on BlogTalk Radio. Joining co-hosts Dr. Tara Palmatier and Paul Elam will be US Air Force Lt. Col. Joel Kirk currently of Harrison County, West Virginia.

Many listeners will already be familiar with Kirk's bizarre, Kafkaesque odyssey through the Harrison County Family Court, presided over by Judge Lori B. Jackson.

Jackson has made a shocking ruling in Kirks ongoing divorce case, reversing a previous judge's decision to award full custody to Lt. Col Kirk, and has given custody to the mother, Tina Taylor Kirk, despite the mountain of documentation provided that proves Ms. Kirk has regularly abused the family's two children.

This episode will be an in depth interview with Lt. Col. Kirk, allowing him to directly tell listeners about this tragedy, and about his struggle to secure the safety of his children and obtain some semblance of justice from the family court.

After the interview there will also be a discussion of activism efforts on behalf of Lt. Col Kirk, and you will be told how you can help.

The phone lines will be open at 310-388-9709, or registered users may skype in to speak to Lt. Col. Kirk.

The show airs at 8:00 CST, US tomorrow, September 17, 2012, which is 2:00 AM, September 18 in London and 11:00 AM September 18 in Brisbane.

AVfM announces committee formation

Over the past two years A Voice for Men has evolved into an ever more sophisticated instrument for activism on behalf of men and boys. Most of our work has focused on changing the public dialogue in matters of sexual politics; to in effect end the hegemony over the narrative long enjoyed by feminist ideologues. While we are not hanging out a "Mission Accomplished" banner, it is fair to say we have made visible headway in moving toward that goal.

They know we are here and they know we are not going to shut up. That is why you see feminists increasingly panicked about our presence and about our growth, and why they are awkwardly scrambling to bring an end to it.

The work we are doing to inject balance into the social discourse has also had another effect: Activism on the ground. Anyone following this site, or even taking a stroll down certain streets in cities like Vancouver, and others, is taking notice that a long awaited rebuttal to cultural misandry is finding its legs.

It is only a matter of time before those legs will be sprinting.

In that spirit, I am proud to inform members of the MRM that we are taking activism to yet another level. Our recent, promising returns from publicly intervening in the corruption of a misandric criminal justice apparatus has given birth to the idea that this type of activism should be the centerpiece of what A Voice for Men does. We have reorganized accordingly.

The Judicial Accountability Committee, henceforth referred to as JAC, or, The Committee, has been assembled to make this type of activism the predominant mainstay of AVfMs efforts to effect change where it is needed most.

The six member panel is co-chaired by Dr. Tara Palmatier and myself, and also includes AVfM editors James Huff, Dean Esmay, John the Other and AVfM News Director Robert O'Hara.

The purpose of The Committee is to identify, screen, fact check and organize highly assertive activism in cases that typify the pervasive problems of corruption and misandry in our criminal and family courts. We will not just be targeting the larger problem of that corruption and misandry, but the individual government functionaries responsible for it happening.

Our courts, when operating according to the intention of their design, serve the dual purpose of securing justice for victims while protecting the rights of the accused. They are the arena of power where all of our constitutional rights, as well as our sense of public safety, hang in the balance.

As is evidenced repeatedly though the pages of this website, much of the responsibility those courts have to the people has been swallowed up in a sea of politics, ambition, corruption and hubris, resulting in abuses that have become the rule, rather than the exception.

Meanwhile, our only other avenue to checks and balances is a mainstream media that has devolved into a useless cesspool of commercial interests with no inclination rock the boat by covering what is happening.

It is the objective of The Committee to prod that coverage from the media, and where it cannot be prodded, to replace it. Either way, the silence in the face of what is happening must come to an end.

Currently, The Committee has taken on the case of Lt. Col Joel Kirk, a US Air Force fighter pilot whose children have been placed into the hands of a documented child abuser by order of family court Judge Lori B. Jackson in Harrison County, West Virginia.

In this and in all future cases, The Committee will be bringing all of AVfM's resources to bear in efforts to bring as much public pressure, embarrassment, negative press and legal consequences to the person or persons responsible for the abuses.

This is also our opportunity to announce that men's activists can help us make this initiative more successful. By signing on as a committee affiliate, you give your pledge to join all the cases set forth in the future by the committee. That means a simple but firm obligation to join us in "minimum action" by making contact with each cases media and government agencies via email and phone (where possible). Each affiliate will blind carbon their emails to The Committee and notify us as to what phone calls you made and to whom.

Please do not sign on as an affiliate unless you plan on following through 100%. We must know the numbers of people we can count on to take actions in conjunction with each effort.

You will also be placed on a private mailing list and be apprised of current committee strategy (within reason) and advised or progress before it makes it to the site or radio programs.

If you have ever wanted to be part of an organized effort to advocate for men and boys in an area where it is desperately needed, this is your chance. The work is simple, and not particularly time consuming for affiliates, but again, I stress, this is not for armchair quarterbacks. Team players only, please.

You can add your name to the list of the committed and be placed on the mailing list by sending an email to thecommittee@avoiceformen.com.

Poster directed at college administrators

September 17, 2012 | by Pierce Harlan | Link | Original Link

I would like to see a poster like this splashed across every campus of every college that has kowtowed to the Department of Education's directive to lower its standard of proof for alleged sex offenses to "preponderance of the evidence." Some students who have no idea that the standard was lowered would see the posters and ask "why," and it would initiate a much needed dialogue:

NOT BEING SURE CAN RUIN SOMEONE'S LIFE

Consent to engage in sex must be clear and unambiguous. A man should never proceed if he is only 50.1% sure that his partner consents.

Then why is this school allowed to expel a man accused of sexual assault when it is only 50.1% sure that he is guilty?

Stop the witch hunt. Raise the standard of proof for alleged sexual misconduct to the same level as other offenses.

Is there gender bias in appointments in the NHS?

September 17, 2012 | by Aimee McGee | Link | Original Link

Listening to the podcast of AVfM radio this morning at the gym, I heard the voice of Peter, who I had met yesterday in London. He had relayed the story about his doctor's rudeness, but I had not made the connection to a policy statement about appointment length until I heard him speak to the team on the radio.

Working in health myself, and having experienced the 5 minute appointment scam that makes up a lot of care in the UK, when I got home I immediately searched, using the kinds of words I knew would throw up any guidance on gender based appointment length in NHS settings. I didn't find a gender based commentary, but there was a big cluster of news articles in 2010 on the drive in the NHS to save money by shortening GP appointments, so it would not surprise me if this is where it is coming from.

Those of you who don't live in this country need a bit of an explanation of how the NHS works to help you get what is going on. General practitioners are the primary care physicians in the health service here. The vast majority of initial contact for health care is done via your GP. This is free at point of contact. However, GP surgeries are effectively private businesses, who contract to the local commissioning body (which is regionalised to within a local authority boundary e.g. London, Cambridgeshire, Peterborough) to deliver primary care services. As long as they meet their contract they get paid. And rather well, with the typical GP earning around £80 – £100 K and many of them working part time. This is their salary after paying for the expenses of running their business and the staffing, but before tax and pension contributions.

As you can imagine this set up makes for a lot of reasons to find as many ways of getting bums on seats as possible; as surgeries are also paid to achieve certain targets with key disease conditions on a capitation basis. One way this is done is to devolve care down to nurse practitioners (qualified nurses with specialist additional skills, often able to prescribe), practice nurses or health care assistants. Another way is to use telephone triaging. A third is having short appointments, where the doctor is almost writing the script for a medication before you open your mouth.

In fact, Peter mentions one important contract variation around appointments in his commentary – the appointment for pregnant women being 30 minutes. This is completely correct and is part of the contractual agreement for pregnancy services. The vast majority of GPs will not do this themselves, but will pay their local health trust to provide a community midwife to deliver this service, and it is quite common for the community trust to have a community midwife and a midwifery healthcare assistant delver these services in a central point in a town for several GP surgeries. The actual face to face time with the midwife may be reduced to 20 minutes, with the first 10 minutes care being the measurements taken by a relatively unskilled and low paid HCA.

So, how can we work out if there is a misandrous policy on appointments? I've contacted Peter and asked him if he could get more information from his GP surgery regarding this.

If he gets lucky he might well be slipped a document which will blow this wide open…we are all trained up on our rights as whistle-blowers in the NHS as mandatory training, but I don't think I would feel confident on a lowly paid admin job to whistle-blow on my employer who probably earns 6-8 time what I do.

There is however another way that might work. Our Freedom of Information (FOI) legislation might help us expose an example of institutional misandry. Under the FOI legislation the responsibility of public departments can be summarised as follows

- a general right of access to information held by [the public body] subject to certain conditions and exemptions
- a duty on us to inform any person who requests information whether we hold the information; and to communicate that information to the applicant unless one or more exemptions apply.

There is a list of exemptions available here for anyone interested in further reading here.

So, failing the option of getting the data via the surgery, then an FOI response would be revealing, regardless of what information comes back. The only problem here is who owns this possible policy – is it a Department of Health policy, or one which belongs to the local NHS trust. I think some digging might be needed.

A disclaimer here: many people reading this will think that this article gives a good set of reasons to avoid moving to a state run healthcare system. I still support accessible healthcare for all, but would prefer to have some elements of means testing within the system. People don't value what is given to them free. Needless to say, my opinion is not popular either, but I would prefer to tell patients the cost of their failed attendance, so they truly understood the nature of the costs in the NHS.

September 18, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

In keeping with our occasional need to break formatting protocols and bring you a video in the feature article section, here is a speech given by Cenk Uygur. I don’t agree with this guy a lot, but I thought he was in perfect form here, and that this message comes at the most auspicious time, just before another election in which the brainwashed masses actually think they are going to make a difference.

Another Open letter to Delaware State Police

Tiffany Marie Smith, pictured above, has yet to be charged with several crimes she has committed. Her current whereabouts are unknown. Neither she nor her accomplices have been arrested on the charges documented below, despite the proof the Delaware police already have obtained for themselves, and have been provided with multiple copies and reminders of in case they somehow "lost" them. Catherine Gibson, a close friend who's been of significant assistance to Gordon, and is herself a victim of Tiffany Marie Smith's multiple criminal false reports, has submitted this open letter to the Delaware State Police naming not just Tiffany Marie Smith but two co-conspirators.–DE

Why is the Delaware State Police still ignoring an obvious false report? When someone is on video surveillance, someplace where they are clearly seen to not be doing what they have been accused of doing at that time, when that video indicates that person was indeed nowhere near where they were falsely reported to be, and the police have verified for themselves that the video is legitimate and from a third party independent disinterested source–why would police ignore all that? It's a false report, which is a crime. Why don't they arrest the person who made the proven false report? Those were the circumstances August 9, 2010 when Tiffany Marie Smith called the state police at 1:02 PM and reported that Mr. Smith and a me, a friend of Gordon's, had just been at her house and that he was in violation of a protection order. I was with Gordon, and we have it on tape from the Taco Bell security cameras which showed where we were at that time (nowhere near her) when she made this false report, and the police know this and have it in their own reports, where they went themselves to verify the business security cameras that showed it was completely physically impossible for us to have been anywhere near Tiffany Marie Smith's home. The police have that, along with our time-stamped receipt from that location, and they have the recorded fact that we were then subsequently at a Delaware State Police post right afterwards, also at the time we were falsely accused of being at Tiffany's house "harassing" her. Is it Delaware State Police opinion that Gordon and I invented a new sort of time machine or some sort of cloning technology, and this is why you are not arresting Tiffany Marie Smith when your own records clearly and overwhelmingly demonstrate that she repeatedly lied to your faces?

False reports to police are not victim-less crimes. Any person who is falsely accused, in a report to police, is in jeopardy of false arrest and false imprisonment. At a minimum the falsely accused suffers damaged reputation and the report is in police files. This wastes police time and wastes taxpayer resources. Police are devoting their time and resources to the false report when other citizens could be in real need of police assistance. There is a cost to society to allow people to make false police reports. Unpunished, the criminal false reporter is likely to repeat the crime in the future, which we know is exactly what Tiffany Marie Smith continued to do to.

agency, 3 days later and another to a third police agency, a month later. It wasn't until she went on a rampage and filed 5 more in a month, between July and August this year, that Dover city police put a stop to it. Caught before and never punished for it, the criminal Tiffany Marie Smith continued to use police as a tool of criminal harassment endangering Gordon Smith's liberty and safety. The false arrest of Gordon Smith at gunpoint could have ended fatally for a man who was never guilty of any crime. You have more than enough here for "probable cause" for arrest. You have such overwhelming evidence in your hands that you pretty much have an automatic conviction on your hands, and you know it.

When the receipt was produced, on August 9, 2010, showing that I, Catherine Gibson, reported to be with Gordon at Tiffany Smith's house, could not have been there that was probable cause to arrest Tiffany Smith for a false report. DSP should have dropped the charge on Gordon Smith completely, rather than reduce the charge, and they should have immediately arrested Tiffany Marie Smith. When the receipt was confirmed by the video Tiffany, her sister and boyfriend should all have faced multiple charges. That would have brought an end to Tiffany Smith's career as a criminal serial false accuser. This means Gordon Smith's not Tiffany's only victim, so am I. I wish to press charges. Why are you not allowing me to do so?

That was not the first obviously false report to police. The first proven false report was January 26, 2010. It was Capitol Police that dropped the ball on that one. Gordon Smith was on video surveillance in the family court building when Tiffany falsely reported that he called her from a blocked number. Had he not been on video, not making any call, at the time she alleged it would have been her word against his. But he was in court. On camera. At the exact time when he was accused of making a phone call he could not possibly have made.

The false report, to the Delaware State Police on August 9, 2010, was a more serious false report because it involved two others, who also lied to DSP, saying that Mr. Smith committed a crime. It was crucial that he had the physical evidence to show that he was innocent or he likely would have gone to prison for a crime that was a complete fabrication, by his ex-wife, her sister and then boyfriend. Click here for proof of that false report. These documents are from state police files. Are the Delaware State Police so stupid that they can't find "probable cause" to make arrests? Not likely, so explain why you haven't made arrests for these crimes?

Delaware State Police are within the statute of limitations for these crimes that have gone unresolved. When the false report was investigated, Tiffany Marie Smith, along with her friends Morgan Evans and Bill Merson, stuck to a story that the physical evidence of the receipt and video police obtained themselves clearly contradicts. The three of them conspired to have Gordon falsely arrested. Morgan Evans and Bill Merson are accessories to the crime of the false report to police. Then they committed felony perjury, testifying, in family court, to the same disproved false report. The Delaware State Police were negligent in their duty and obligation to the public, in particular Mr. Smith. Tiffany engaged in criminal harassment, falsely reporting an incident to police, criminal solicitation, conspiracy and felony perjury under the Delaware Code.They need to address that situation and arrest Tiffany and her co-conspirators now.

According to the Delaware State Police website:

"The citizens we serve have an expectation that those who are vested with the responsibility of enforcing the laws of this state, as well as civilian employees, will hold fast to the standards of professional and individual conduct to preserve the respect, confidence and cooperation of society. With this in mind, we encourage you to contact us with any compliments or complaints you may have about the Delaware State Police."

The head of the Delaware State Police is Colonel Robert M. Coupe (robert.coupe@state.de.us). I would like him to explain to us and the citizens of Delaware why his department has not made arrests for this incident. Tiffany Smith is a pathological liar. 14 false reports six of which were to Delaware State Police and she was only charged with three that she made to Dover City Police. I want to know why the Delaware State Police have given a pass to the serial false accuser, poster girl of false allegations and perpetrator of multiple crimes for this incident.

The Dover Police lived up to the expectation of citizens that laws be enforced. On September 1st they had determined probable cause and obtained and executed an arrest warrant for Tiffany Smith. How many more false reports would Ms. Smith have made to Delaware State Police if Dover police hadn't done their job? It is past time for the Delaware State Police to step up and do what they should have done months ago and make arrests for the August 9, 2010 false report?

Delaware State Police can be contacted at ~~(302) 739-5901~~: (302) 697 4454. The Delaware State Police Office of Professional Responsibility can be reached at 302-739-5990. Delaware State Police is led by Colonel Robert Coupe, who can be emailed at robert.coupe@de.state.us. In any contact you make, I recommend referring to Delaware State Police Report 03-10-025226 and ask why Tiffany Marie Smith and her accomplices have not been arrested and charged yet, and why there is not a warrant out for these people's arrest.

A note to MRAs. At this writing Tiffany Marie Smith's whereabouts are unknown and Gordon Smith has still not been allowed any contact with his children. He has a Legal Fund for his continuing legal battles; as of this writing he needs $90.00 to file another emergency motion. Since at this point all the police action against him has destroyed his professional life and drained him financially, if you can, please drop something into his fund so that he has a chance at qualified representation for his continuing legal fight for the safety of his children, see Tiffany Marie Smith fully answer for her crimes, and recover from his devastating financial losses. Give here. $90 is the current goal. –DE

Tonight we have as our guest Elaine Lisner of the Parsemus Foundation, an organization dedicated to alternative forms of contraception outside of the influence of large pharmaceutical companies. Of the many initiatives currently being undertaken the Parsemus Foundation’s primary focus is on the development of Vasgel or RISUG (Reversible Inhibition of Sperm Under Guidance) as an effective, safe, reversible and affordable method of controlling male fertility. Trials are currently under way and it is hoped that soon Vasgel will be approved by the FDA for use in the United States so it can be brought to market.

Male fertility control is a crucial men’s rights issue so please do not miss this episode where we will be talking about the history of Vasgel, why it hasn’t yet been brought to market and the future of male fertility control.

The show airs live tonight, at 8:00 Central Time, US, which is 2:00 a.m. September 19, in London and 11:00 a.m. September 18, in Brisbane. If you have not yet requested membership in the Stickcam Room, you can do so through the link below. The call in number is 310-388-9709.

Tina Kirk “grieves” losing custody

September 19, 2012 | by Dr. Tara J. Palmatier | Link | Original Link

On August 10, 2009, when Kirk vs. Kirk was still in the hands of the Honorable Cornelia Reep, the Guardian ad Litem submitted an Emergency Motion to Restrict Visitation against Tina Taylor Kirk for her continued physical and emotional abuse of the Kirk children.

Prior to this emergency motion, Tina Taylor Kirk had been given therapeutic supervised visitation for one hour each week with both the children’s court-appointed counselor and the Guardian ad Litem present. However, during the first therapeutic visitation, her behavior so upset the children that the Guardian filed an emergency motion to restrict visitation. This motion reduced Tina’s weekly one hour of supervised visitation to zero access.

The motion restricted visitation as follows:

1. Any and all therapeutic counseling sessions as previously ordered are suspended until further order of this Court.

2. The petitioner is barred from attending any and all events in which the minor children are participating in at this time.

3. The petitioner is barred from any and all telephone contact with the children at this time.

When the motion was filed, Tina Taylor Kirk stated on the court record and in writing that she was receiving treatment for alcohol abuse at Celebrate Recovery, a “Christ-centered 12-step recovery program.” She also testified throughout the entire court proceedings (before these photos surfaced) that she had not drunk any alcohol since June 28, 2009, the night Lt. Col. Kirk captured his wife’s drunken and violent rampage against him and their children on film. Tina continues to claim she rarely drank alcohol even before that night.

In addition to her own claims of sobriety, Tina Taylor Kirk went therapist shopping and found a couple of counselors who were willing to testify that she was suffering from depression because she was wrongfully separated from her children and abused by Lt. Col. Kirk. Both Dr. Edward Baker, Ph.D. (the psychologist who diagnosed Tina with Borderline Personality Disorder) and her attorneys claimed the only reason Tina drank was due to a toxic marriage — especially when the Lt. Col. was home and “causing conflict.”

Dr. Baker and the attorneys also alleged that the Lt. Col. set Tina up the night he filmed her and that he was more interested in “catching” Tina on film than “nurturing” their children. Dr. Baker is correct that the Lt. Col was not “nurturing” his children in the June 2009 video. Lt. Col. Kirk was protecting his children from their drunken, out-of-control, raging, violent Borderline Personality Disordered mother.

The images featured below were taken at a bar believed to be in Charlotte, North Carolina approximately 5 days after Judge Reep ordered the motion to restrict parenting time. The Kirk children unwittingly discovered these photos much later (after visitation was reinstated with their mother) and gave them to their father.

The kids accidentally discovered these photos on a camera memory card they believed belonged to them at their mother's home during a visit just this past year. The kids took the card back to their father's house. The three of them were going on a planned vacation and, naturally, wanted to snap some family photos. The children asked their father to see if the card had any pictures on it lest they delete photos they wanted to keep.

As image after image loaded onto the screen, the children became more and more devastated. The first words out of the son's mouth were, "Who are those men?" The daughter saw the date-stamps on the photos and said, "Hey mom's in a bar and it's right when she left here.'" The kids were heartbroken as their mother had been telling them for years how devastated and depressed she was that she was separated from them. She had also been telling the kids that she had not had a drop to drink since the night of June 28, 2009.

In their innocence, the children discovered a date-stamped pictorial trove of the alcohol-fueled antics of Tina Taylor Kirk, her "grief counselor" (and BFF drinking buddy), the friend's boyfriend and numerous unidentified men. These images were taken only 5 days after Judge Reep ordered the motion to restrict Tina's very minimal parenting time to zero time.

Good and loving parents, when faced with the loss of their children, are typically distraught and desperate to regain contact with them. They would meet any requirement, no matter how Draconian, set forth by the court in order to be reunited with their children.

In the months following June 28, 2009, the Lt. Col states he was in a great deal of emotional turmoil and was devastated by the destruction Tina inflicted on their family. He states, "In the months that followed, you had to peel me off the floor – and I had custody of the children! Still, I was not out celebrating. I never celebrated. I was shattered."

Tina told the children that she was equally shattered by her separation from them, but the photos below tell a different story. See below.

Are the images featured in this article indicative of a woman who is heartbroken and devastated by the loss of her children? Or do these images portray a middle-aged woman out on the town getting her drink on with friends?

Please remember, these photos of Tina Taylor Kirk and friends, knocking back beer after beer, were taken only 5 days after being ordered to have no contact with her children. Tina and friends are drinking it up, riding a mechanical bull and hugging and kissing each other, the friend's boyfriend and several unidentified men.

As a point of interest, Tina claimed the woman partying with her in the photos was acting as her "grief counselor." In reality, this woman, also through lies and false accusations, just so happens to have destroyed the career of her Marine officer husband who was an elite presidential helicopter pilot. (The Kirk's had been friends with the couple for many years.) This same friend is thought to have advised Tina to file a Protective Order against the Lt. Col. because it would "go a long way in court," sent her $6000 to fund her divorce and has been coaching Tina every step of the way in her campaign to inflict maximum damage on the Lt. Col. and their children. Ironically, this woman is currently studying to be a Christian marriage counselor. Heaven help her future clients.

Again, Tina Taylor Kirk was ordered to have no contact with her two children for an indefinite period of time only days before these photos were taken. Instead of appearing sad and bereft, as any decent parent would be if in her shoes, she appears to be whooping it up and celebrating. One thing's for certain, she certainly wasn't "celebrating recovery" from alcohol abuse when these photos were taken despite her claims to the contrary.

These photos also disprove Dr. Edward Baker's unfounded assertions that Tina was depressed and that the Lt. Col and their "toxic marriage" was the cause of Tina's alcohol abuse. Tina appears quite inebriated in these photos as evidenced by her dilated pupils, the number of men and women she is hugging and kissing and, of course, the bottles of beer in her hand. Since the Lt. Col. was in the marital home with their children in West Virginia on the evening of August 15, 2009 and early morning hours of August 16, 2009, one wonders whom Dr. Baker might allege set up Tina that night?

Throughout the Kirk divorce and custody dispute, Tina Taylor Kirk has shown herself to be a malicious and cunning pathological liar and a vicious and unrepentant child and spousal abuser. Yet, with an abundance of documentation that would be enough to quell the doubts of even the most woman-biased skeptic, Judge Lori B. Jackson has chosen to ignore the Mt. Everest sized pile of evidence of Tina's many crimes, abuses, alcohol abuse and lies. Judge Jackson continues to enable this child abuser and, in the process, has become a child abuser herself.

The distraught Tina Taylor Kirk copes with the loss of her children

Morris Dees is the founder and driving force behind the Southern Poverty Law Center. I first became aware of him in my early twenties, after the fund-raising company for which I worked accepted the SPLC as a client. Morris Dees was sold to us as a champion of civil rights. I bought it. I was proud to work for them and I raised more money for them than I'd ever raised for any other client – until it came to my attention that they didn't really need the money as much as I'd believed. [1]

In the years following I put the SPLC out of my mind completely. A little while ago, I started hearing the SPLC mentioned when opponents of men's rights decide to smear AVfM as a hate group- one of the hate groups SPLC fundraisers use to sweet talk their way into to wallets of poor, elderly contributors and wealthy supporters alike. I love a scam case as much as the next gal so, with the help of a colleague, I hunkered down and did some digging.

I found that there are already so many articles and blog posts concerning the hypocritical nature of this organization that I almost didn't bother to write this article at all – But my colleague managed to get her hands on a copy of Morris Dees divorce documents. One read through those forms left me wondering how, in this day of tabloids and shock television, Mr. Dees manages to maintain his knight-in-shining-armor image.

These documents read like the script of a Lifetime network movie. Morris is portrayed as a run-of-the-mill, evil male monster. There's allegations of child molestation, spousal abuse and unconventional sexual behavior described in enough detail to upset most anyone. The document is so sensational that I hesitate to believe most of the details. The sole source of the information seems to be a very angry soon to be ex – spouse, who, considering the probable payoff, had every reason to lie. If the allegations brought against him by his ex wife are actually false and if Dees lost any money in this apparently very nasty divorce, it seems to me that he should be supporting men's rights, rather than idly allowing the organization he founded to attack men's rights activists. Call me old fashioned.

The only reason I mention these documents at all, and posted them along with the other sources[2], is because one of the milder events detailed makes an excellent analogy for what appears to be Mr. Dees' approach to business.

The event occurred on July 3, 1978. Morris Dees met with both his wife and his mistress and asked each one to tell him how much she loved him. Upon hearing their statements he told them that he couldn't live without either of them. Seeing that he meant to carry on with both of them, his wife forced him to choose. In the end he chose his wife but continued to sneak around with his mistress.

Analogy for what, you ask? Allow me to explain.

In many of the biographies about Morris Dees publicly available online, it is said that as a teen he was punished by his father for using a derogatory term in reference to a black man.[3] In his own autobiography Dees' admits to having earned money doing legal work for the KKK in 1962.[4] The information surrounding the former incident of racially bigoted behavior suggests that Mr. Dees' father taught him that being a bigot was wrong, but if that were the lesson learned would the latter have occurred?

I think that the lesson teenaged Morris Dees took from his father's punishment was something more along the lines of; If you're going to be a bigot you'd better not be obvious about it. On close inspection, the Southern Poverty law Center isn't quite as concerned with the plight of black people as they'd have us believe.

Supporting this observation is an incident in 1986 when the SPLC's entire legal staff quit in protest of Dees' refusal to address any of the issues presenting real problems to the black community. Gloria Browne, a lawyer who quit a few years after the incident in 1986 criticized the SPLC for "cashing in on white guilt and black pain." Former black employees complained that the Center was run like a plantation. [5]

All of this information is publicly available as the SPLC continues ride it's reputation for fighting racism. Although their impact in civil rights is relatively small when compared to other civil rights charities, the SPLC's income dwarfs those of its contemporaries. That fact has been pointed out several times.

Question: How do they do it?

Answer: Silence.

In 1995 the Montgomery Advertiser ran a series of articles examining the SPLC's fund-raising tactics and vast wealth. The articles were nominated and became finalist for a Pulitzer Prize.[6] Those articles are now very well hidden if they are available at all. When confronted with his divorce documents, which he tried to have legally sealed, Dees simply refuses to respond. All criticisms of their financial workings are met with silence.

Remember that analogy I mentioned? Now consider the fact that the SPLC's 'work' on the side of civil rights is supported by contributors -over two hundred million dollars to date[7], while Mr. Dees' efforts of behalf of a Klan member brought him only what would amount to tens of thousands in today's dollar value. Clearly the 'Champion of Tolerance' image loves him far more than that of bigoted Southerner.

When it comes to the criticisms and accusations directed at Morris Dees and the Southern Poverty Law Center, silence is just good business. After all it just isn't wise for a man to argue with his mistress within earshot of his wife.

Feminist fear dialed up to frappe

September 19, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Well, for the first time ever we get back to back video features. No, we ares not getting lazy, it is just the way the chips fell today.

In this one, we bring you John the Other, who finds himself eating a little crow after defending the “integrity” of a woman who has scheduled a debate as a part of the East Vancouver Debate Society, on the topic of feminism. She had invited MRAs to be half of those presenting, feminists the other half.

As JTO shows you in this video, the woman went from seemingly honest and balanced, to half truths, to full fledged lies, to whoppers the size of Montana, all to appease the feminists that did not want her to have the debate to begin with.

I have lifted the relevant links from John’s low bar for your convenience.

Kanamara Matsuri

September 20, 2012 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

A giant 8 foot penis is joyfully carried through a crowded Japanese street by a dozen happy teenage girls. No, this is not a scenario from an odd mix of a pervy Macy's Parade flotilla and the supple nymphs in "Bilitis." It's real and the annual event is called the "Kanamara Matsuri."

The Kanamara Matsuri, which translates to "Big Iron Penis Lord," is celebrated during the first week of April in Kawasaki, Japan and it's been around since the 1600's. Interestingly, such phallic processions were once very widespread, but it appears Japan is one of the few remaining places daring to place a penis at the center of a public celebration. Almost everywhere else the penis is today seen as a dreaded object of violence and oppression, a thing in need of castration, sterilization, circumcision and, most importantly, suppression from view.

If we go back to Ancient Greece, Rome, India, Egypt -in fact anywhere at all- we find adoration of the penis (and vagina) a comfortable norm. To give but one example, so welcome was the penis that Ancient Egyptians had no mother earth but instead a 'father earth' named Geb, a nurturing god portrayed reclining on his back with a huge erect penis. His was a benevolent phallus that brought fertility to the land, nourished its people, and bestowed prosperity and harmony to the world.

In Ancient Rome we have examples of phallic charms called fascinum, which were often winged, and were ubiquitous in the culture from jewellery to bells and wind chimes to lamps. The fascinus was thought particularly to ward off evil from children, mainly boys. Pliny notes the custom of hanging a phallic charm on a baby's neck, and examples have been found of phallus-bearing rings too small to be worn except by children. [1] It's not important here to delve into the entire history of phallic representations, but what is important is to know that there once was a time when the penis did not equal oppression. Why is it important to know this?

When we stop to remember a time before the scorched earth policy of feminism emolliated our respect for the male form, we thereby 're-member' ourselves and how we once were. Once we remind ourselves of this we are inspired, even angered, to drop our chocolates and flowers and pick up a blade and hack and thrash our way through a great tangle of confusion and doubt to our way back home- to the penis as symbol of beauty of form and masculine identity.

The penis as symbol of beauty of form has only recently been quashed as a concept and is never really discussed in our gynocentric universe. In fact, it is disparaged. I think it is time to change this, but first we must see through the feminist inspired bad press about the phallus.

Feminists have characterized the penis as an object of violence, oppression and viral dirt. To them it is synonymous with a deadly snake. But not to be satisfied with their maligning of the male body feminists have gone further by claiming that all of society is suffering from a toxic "phallocentrism," which is defined as, "a doctrine or belief centered on the phallus, especially a belief in the superiority of the male sex."[2] Phallocentrism is further defined as "any perspective usually considered characteristic of patriarchal systems."[3]

But does such a dreaded symbol actually exist today, and if so where? It appears feminists have not stopped to notice that the actual phallus of phallocentrism has suffered a universal repression within the very culture claimed to be dominated by the penis. Therefore the hatchet job they continue to do on our penises, both metaphorically and literally, might better be redirected to their deadwood ideology before another generation of boys is alienated from this essential feature of male identity.

The time has come to drop our complicity with anti-male narratives and learn again to love the male form. We need no longer view the penis through the gynocentric lens of (a) only gay men talk about the beauty of the penis, albeit as an emblem of homosexuality, or (b) straight men view the penis as an instrument of action packed machismo- the façade of "tough." Take for example our usual heterosexual talk about genitalia; prick, balls, nuts, dong, boner, cock, tool, weapon, suck, blow, wank, shoot; and gash, snatch, twat, hole, cunt, bush, clit. Psychologist James Hillman invites us to compare this kind of language "with the marvelous language of foreign erotica: jade stalk, palace gates, ambrosia… A Chinese plum is to be deliciously enjoyed; our cherries are to be taken,

Clearly we Western males have internalised feminist characterizations of the male member by continuing with this derogatory language of penis = violent = male.

“Suppose instead we were to call him, as he once was named, Jolly Roger or Little Johnny Jump-up, or Happy Prince, smiling wand, black magic, little brother, or Purusha who is smaller-than-small and bigger-than-big.”[4] There is no need to impose images of violence on the penis.

We might even begin to think of him as man’s best friend- a precious facet of my body and dignified symbol of my masculinity.

Imagine if we transformed our cultural obsession with penis porn into penis art, crafting representations in plastic form to be put on display like those bare breasted, pregnant and vulvad’ female sculptures that dot our landscapes and galleries. By ditching the false dichotomy of beautiful-gay-penis versus machismo-straight-penis we might begin to relate to the penis as a representation of male identity, no longer divided into gay and straight only, but reborn as a complex symbol of men’s multifaceted natures. Imagine, the phallus standing as a dignified symbol of our masculinity, much like the breasts and pregnant bellies benefit women everywhere as symbols of pride and identity.

September 20, 2012 | by Mykeru | Link | Original Link

Hello everyone. All you haters and misogynists, all you insightful cynics that see the dark, sinister monolithic forces that control our lives when the rest of us, frankly, just don't get it, and the women who are so unenlightened that they have not yet gotten on the one true path of helplessness and self-absorbed neurosis.

And damn you, sick, depraved bastards that don't hate, that naively think there's enough equality to go around for everyone and are so deluded to think we're all in this together.

But mostly remember the one truth that binds the Internet together: stupid people don't get sarcasm.

So, I've been working on the next video following, This is Atheism Plus fully intending to beat the Atheism Plus as Oceania horse three feet into the ground. Which isn't easy as I like to use found footage and have an aversion to just throwing up a still image and talking over it.

Uh, like I did in the video version of this.

But mostly, it's hard to stay ahead of the curve of crazy that is Atheism Plus. Every day there's something a little more demented, mean-spirited and just Orwellian coming out of that camp.

I follow Integralmath, who simply must be a glutton for punishment. Every time I think I have a clip that expresses shear lulzy craziness, he points us in the direction of something that makes me think that, eventually, Atheism Plus is going to go all Heaven's Gate on us.

And there's something to that.

You ever notice when cults absolutely jump the shark? They don't just disappear in a puff of illogic. There's any number of doomsday cults in the past century that have done their little calculation and then waited on a hilltop for the world to end, with or without humping like jackals first. I wouldn't think that was optional.

Anyway, then the moment comes that the earth just refuses to end, Jesus doesn't come back but the Mayans do appear to say, "Yeah, we stopped our calendar at 2012. You think we could carve that shit into stone forever? If we had dry erase boards, you wouldn't even be here." At that point some people in the cult do wander off in search of a fucking life. But not everyone does. They go back over the math, find out they didn't carry a one or have some other rationalization for failure and so they are left with believers a little more hard-core than before. This process can actually repeat several times, each time leaving a smaller, harder nugget of pure crazy representing the cult.

So every day as Atheism Plus continues the cycle of purity tests and purging, ferreting out privilege and chastising backsliders they work towards collapsing into a singularity of pure smug butt hurt.

And it’s really hard to keep up with that.

So, I’ve been reading the comments on “This is Atheism Plus” regularly. I was reading them on my Droid during lunch and noticed a shift in the rote detractors. Now the accusation du jour is of “male privilege”, specifically that we all don’t understand male privilege.

You know something, they’re right. I don’t.

I am privileged. But not because I’m male, or even because I’m white — although i can buy into that a lot more even if actual white supremacists would lump me in with Romani, Spanish, Latinos and other “unassimilated ethnic groups” as they put it. I’m privileged because – like everyone else– I’m standing on the shoulders of my predecessors. And if you follow that back far enough you will reach a point where kings, compared to us, lived like shit.

And really, I suspect there’s a lot more “privilege” in the ancestry, male and female, of people named Meyers, Watson, McCreight (rhymes with wrong), Dillahunty, Benson and so on.

My father joined the Air Force at 17 to escape from Brooklyn. He had to have his parents sign, giving him permission. I was in his little tiny bedroom in Fort Hamilton Parkway years after, the apartment above a florist shop, and saw the model airplanes he built hanging from the ceiling. Not plastic models, mind you, but balsa wood and doped fabric. That’s why he joined the air force. Of course, they made him a radio operator and he spent his time in another tiny room in Okinawa transcribing Chinese and Russian coded messages. He’s the reason I know the arcane language of Morse Code. After he got out of the Air Force he got a job with Consolidated Edison as a C Mechanic and also worked his own electrical contracting jobs. He worked 30 years at two jobs, one of them was rotating shift work. As a kid I was often sent to wake him up in the afternoon so he could go work the 4 to 12. I thought it funny that I could wake him up from a dead sleep and ask him his Air Force serial number and he could rattle it off.

Where’s the privilege?

His father worked in Ace Masonry Supply spending over 40 years sweeping floors and loading bags of cement. When I was in high school and college I worked in lumber yards doing pretty much the same thing. Maybe, looking back on it, so I could understand, just a little, of my grandfather’s life. He died two years after he retired, when I was fourteen. He was in the garden of a house he bought, the house my dad owned first, and dropped dead of a heart attack after spending a day pushing around a wheelbarrow. He couldn’t not work. In fact, at his funeral a bunch of greasy guys from the old neighborhood came to pay their respects. I remember one pinkie-ringed wise guy saying to me “your grandfather was a good man, he always worked.”

Yeah, he worked.

Essentially he got 40 years of hard labor for not committing a crime.

Where’s the privilege there?

And his father? My great grandfather uprooted his entire life and got dumped out of Ellis Island in 1895 with his name Anglicized by some petty official, which stuck for a couple generations until I insisted on the correct way of saying it, and after a while converted my family. He pushed a fucking fish cart in the immigrant slums.

I love old photographs and the first motion pictures ever shot; the too short, over-exposed ones by Edison and the Lumière Brothers. In one I came across a short loop of street vendors in his time and place. It was in Brooklyn [After checking the film at memory.loc.gov, it was actually shot in the Lower East Side of Manhattan, across the Brooklyn Bridge -M] Now, it's hard to tell what was real and what was staged. Even Alexander Gardner staged his most famous Gettysburg photos. But I realize I could be looking at my own great grandfather as some Irish cop twirled his baton, gave him the stink-eye and told him to move along.

And there I missed the privilege.

You know, the elephant in the room of Atheism Plus and fashionable radical feminism isn't gender, or race, or sexual orientation. It's class. It's hierarchy.

They can talk about male privilege because, quite frankly, blue collar, working class men are largely invisible to them. They see privilege because when they look at men, they are always looking up. Men like my father, my grandfather and my great-grandfather don't count. And when, for whatever reason, they become so much as translucent, they are seen as "creepy guys" and potential rapists.

So, I'm leaving work today. I'm a commuter cyclist getting back into that routine after being laid out, yet again, by a car and receiving internal injuries and a fractured heel that wasn't heeling properly because it took two months and an MRI to figure out it was fractured. And I walked on it those two months because, well, the first radiologist said it was just a strained Plantar Fascia tendon and who wants to be a whiner?

I'm leaving and a work crew is trying to guide an 18-wheeler into the loading dock. To do this he's got to do a sort of K-turn across traffic and then back it in.

Now, with the construction the loading dock is framed by chain link fencing so what would normally be a tight squeeze is pretty damn impossible. The driver of the truck ends up with the body of the truck perpendicular to traffic; all four lanes of this city street are blocked. I stop and wait, watching this. Now, working in a lumberyard I drove lumber delivery trucks and drove a boom truck when I worked for billboard companies, and what he is doing is not easy at all. You can't drive a truck like a car not just because of the size, but with the load everything is amplified. I've never forgotten how tenuous brakes are on a fully loaded truck. This guy has got to make small, precise movements, but he can't. With that load he's got to stomp the accelerator to get things going and brakes might as well be marshmallows. And momentum and inertia will fuck up the best of intentions.

I'm watching this guy doing this difficult maneuver and not doing it very badly at all. I'm on my bike standing on one foot next to one of the armed guards who, incidentally, is a woman. Say what you will about relative physical prowess of men and women, they don't make a lick of difference when you have a gun. So I'm talking to her, a conversation of the “I’m glad I don’t have his job” variety when the honking starts. I turn and the southbound cars, which are the ones on my side of the truck that I can see, start honking at the guy.

I went from zero to really annoyed in a fraction of a second. Now, with my mountain bike and yellow and black gear, I’m often mistaken for a bike cop. That is fine with me if it gives someone pause before they run me over again. After the last plowing by a distracted driver I bought an air horn that has a small plastic bottle that attaches to the frame that you pump up to 80 PSI and runs a tube to the horn itself, which is mounted on the handlebars. I turn and coast up to the center divider, because there’s no northbound traffic, and give them a 120 decibel blast. You could hear the half-honks as people jerked their hands off the horn. And, just to be diplomatic, I followed up with a hearty “Ah, shut up!”

I mean, Jesus Christ, what’s the point? Where is the guy and his truck going to go? His fucking up means, at best, taking out a chain link fence or, at worst, making a divot in some Second Renaissance Revival stonework.

The way I was raised the most unforgivable sin was whiny impatience. Luckily, the cure for impatience is simple: All you have to do is recognize that you are not the warm center of the fucking universe and the only list that your convenience appears on is your own. And if there aren’t a shit-load of things above it on your list, that’s because you’re an asshole.

Anyway, the driver completes the maneuver and really, not a bad job.

Thing is, when I coasted up to the line of honk happy bastards I got a look at one of the first-line honkers, a well-dressed woman in business attire, late 20s, maybe early thirties, sandy blond hair. I couldn’t tell if she was particularly attractive or not, because the face she was making was reminiscent of Emperor Palpatine trying to kill Luke Skywalker with force lightning; contorted, hateful – for no other reason than this guy, trying to do his job, inconvenienced her for a minute.

“Who are you, little working man, to get in my way?”

When the truck began clearing from the road, another driver, a business man, made a point of doing this condescending clap in the drivers face.

That may be the only male she sees; the face of privilege.

And I wonder if later this woman would log in to complain about that male privilege and tell us just how rough she has it.

AVfM Radio: How to be a creep

[box icon=""]

We are all creeps now. The word, of course is the definitive and the preferred tool of social exclusion by the good people. The non creeps. If you're one of us, that is, if you're a creep, your opinions are wrong, by definition, you are undesirable, you're not sexy, you're not attractive, and its only a matter of time before vultures begin circling your carcass. But what exactly does the word mean, besides "we don't like you" What is the actual meaning of the modern usage of the word creep?

Tonight on A Voice for men radio, John The Creep, Girl Creeps What and Typhon Crepe Bleu will lift the lid on the conceptual box labeled creep, and examine just what a creep is, and why you're a creep too.

The primary caregiver fraud

September 20, 2012 | by P. Emeritus | Link | Original Link

Imagine a society in which when a couple separates or divorces, it is always the father who receives custody of the children. No matter how caring the mother is, no matter how much she wants to remain part of the children's lives and no matter how much the children want the same thing, she is cut off from them–except to whatever degree the father is willing to let her see them. All this happens, that is, unless the father is utterly dissolute–in which case the courts will then give custody to the mother.

What a terrible place such a society would be! How cruel to women! How cruel to children! What a blessing we don't live in such a society! Actually, up until sometime in the 19th century, that was the pattern in our society. The immediate reason for this system was economic: the best financial interests of the children were seen as being served by leaving them with the parent who had the financial resources–and that was the father. We might give this judicial doctrine a name. We might call it the "Father-Breadwinner" test for determining which parent gets custody of the children.

Then, gradually, things changed. In part, they changed because the injustice and cruelty to mothers began to be recognised. Then, by early in the twentieth century, the situation had been completely reversed: women were always given custody of the children when a couple separated or divorced. This happened, that is, unless the mother was found to be "unfit", in which unusual case the father was awarded custody by the courts. After all, mothers are the natural nurturers, are they not? And fathers are the natural providers, are they not? So just give her the kids and have him give her the money to meet their financial needs. We could also give this doctrine a name. We might call it the "Mother-Caregiver" test for assigning custody of the children.

Then, things changed again. Partly because technology kept eroding away the rigid sex roles, people began to see the injustice of automatically cutting fathers off from their children in this fashion. After all, men are not all alike, women are not all alike. Men, too, can and do nurture; women, too, can and do provide financially. The laws were changed so that either parent could get custody of the children. But the judges didn't change very much. Overwhelmingly, they continued awarding custody to mothers, in spite of the law. We might label their motivating doctrine in this the "Covert Mother-Caregiver" test for deciding custody awards. This regime still exists. Under it, sociological research has found, the large majority of divorces are initiated by women–after all, they are the ones who stand, under this system, to come out of divorce with everything they want.

Out of all of this injustice was born the divorced fathers' movement. It developed largely because, by this point in history, there had come to be so many divorces: far more individuals were suffering the effects of the Covert Mother-Caregiver doctrine than had done so under the earlier doctrines. So, do the activists in this movement want a return to father preference? Interestingly, they do not. A few ideologues on the fringes argue for a return to "patriarchy"; but overwhelmingly, what the fathers' rights activists argue for is a new concept designed to be fair to both parents and to the children: shared parenting after divorce.

The Shared Parenting Ideal

The shared parenting concept is comprised of two parts. First, joint legal stewardship of the children. This involves each parent making important decisions for the children's lives, especially during the separate times when they are residing with that parent. It can be called "joint legal custody"–though as such phrases are standardly interpreted today, far too little decision-making power is given to one of the parents. Second, shared residency, sometimes labeled "joint physical custody". Ideally, this means spending about equal amounts of time with each parent–although in practice, variations from the ideal are often warranted. Some of the experts who have studied the matter urge that at least 30% of the time be spent with each parent. At last, a system which does not rip one of the parents and the children away from each other. Everyone wins–including the children.

During the period of overt and covert mother-preference, modern feminism was born. This movement professes equality between the sexes, focusing on traditional discriminations against women. It professes rejection of gender stereotypes about how men and women behave, recognising that many of the choices the two sexes make merely reflect conditioning into societal roles. How would they respond to traditional discriminations against men, then, including mother-preference in divorce?

Many feminists–let us call them "egalitarian feminists"–have replied that equality means just what it says; hence, they were willing to share their former advantages with men, just as they expected men to do with them. Consequently, the egalitarian feminists embraced shared parenting. Indeed, they could point out, equality in parenting is merely the other side of equality in paid employment. For just as women were traditionally kept out of the paid workforce so they would stay home and care for children personally, men were pressured out of the home and into the paid workforce so they would provide for children financially. In fact, the egalitarians have pointed out, eliminating mother-preference through shared parenting promotes equality for women as well: mothers whose ex-husbands do around half of the childcare will be freer to take their place in the paid workforce. In the US, the National Organization for Women officially endorsed a judicial presumption of joint custody.

Unfortunately, only in the early years was the feminist establishment controlled by the egalitarians. Feminist organizations and government agencies have long since been dominated by the sexist feminists: though they continue using the rhetoric of equality, their actual motive is promotion of women's self-interest (as they perceive it), not justice. Not only have they worked hard to retain traditional discriminations against men, they have often fought to increase them. On the matter of parenting in particular, they have opposed elimination of mother-preference with every weapon they can muster. No flaming male chauvinists could have been more reactionary in defending their traditional privileges than the sexist feminists have been.

One especially revealing Canadian example lies in the efforts the feminist establishment made, a few years back, to retain the governmental parental-leave benefits which had previously been limited to women. To understand this situation, we must be clear that under Canada's system of national health insurance, there are no grounds for having a separate category of leave for pregnancy and giving birth; these can be treated the same as any other type of medical leave, on the instruction of a doctor. What parental leave should be for, then, is childcare–and child*care*, unlike pregnancy and child*birth*, can be performed by either parent. So, then: did Canada's feminists say to Canada's government: "Make whatever money can be spared for this purpose equally available to men and women"? After all, given current societal patterns, equal opportunity for parental leave would still be taken advantage of, to a strong degree, mostly by women. Or did the feminist establishment, committed as it has long been to "affirmative action" in the workplace, say anything like "Set up quotas for parental-leave funding, so we can be sure enough men will take advantage of it"? Not on your Nelly, McClung. "We won't give up a penny of what we've had in the past!", they raged at the federal government. And, of course, the feds caved in, giving fathers a pittance they hoped would satisfy those few in the judiciary who actually think equality means equality.

An American example reveals the sexist-feminist agenda more broadly. Remember Marcia Clark, the O. J. Simpson prosecutor? She needed to put in more time on the job. So did she propose to have her ex-husband, who had much more time available, spend more time taking care of the children? Not on your Emily, Murphy. She applied to get more child support money from her ex-husband, so she could park the kids in daycare and have strangers look after them. When her ex objected to this gross injustice by applying for custody himself, the feminist establishment rose up as one woman and screamed outrage. So there you have it. Sexist feminists, in the familiar phrase, "want to have it all", the children and the money. It follows that they want fathers to have nothing, other than what individual mothers deign to allow them.

De Facto Discrimination

Sexist feminists are not always this blatant in their bias. Sometimes they are much more subtle. To introduce a key example of this, let me review the difference between de jure discrimination and de facto discrimination. Suppose they passed a law which decreed that descendants of slaves could not vote. Now, this would not be de jure discriminatory toward black people. After all, it doesn't even mention race or skin color. And besides, some whites are also descendants of slaves, and so they could not vote either; and some blacks are not descendants of slaves and so they could vote. But of course, the great majority of persons thus prevented from voting would be black. Such a law would discriminate de jure against descendants of slaves–it would treat those persons differently from everyone else, and would do so without any morally legitimate reason. But in addition, it would discriminate de facto against black people, for they would be disproportionately harmed by this unjust law.

Similarly, the old custody laws discriminated de jure against mothers, and later against fathers. Today, the law is de jure gender-neutral. Yet overwhelmingly, it is fathers who lose custody in divorce. Does this mean there is some kind of unjust discrimination against men? Not automatically. For all that statistical fact all by itself can tell us, there might be some legitimate reasons for women getting custody much more often. Other evidence reveals that the judges are in fact strongly biased, overall, against fathers. But that is a subject for another time. Today I want to discuss a criterion for deciding custody which many judges employ, regarding it as not discriminatory toward fathers. Now, at present they have no authorization under Canada's law to use this criterion. But many in the feminist establishment support them in doing so–indeed, they have been pressing for years to have it enshrined in law.

I speak of the "primary caregiver" doctrine: the claim that sole custody–or else "primary control"–should be awarded, and should be given to the parent who has provided the most care to the children during the marriage. De jure, the criterion is gender-neutral; it explicitly mentions neither mother nor father. But is it wrongfully discriminatory de facto? After all, it seemingly would guarantee, in present societal conditions, that mothers would get custody far more often. Is it fair? Or have the sexist feminists and the sexist chivalrists merely discovered a more subtle way of treating fathers unjustly? Let us see.

Cheating Interpretations

To begin, it is worth remarking how specific proposals for determining who is the "primary caregiver" often reveal their authors' ulterior sexist motives. For in telling how to add up the time to compute which parent is the primary caregiver, they often exclude activities which "give care" to a child–that is, which promote the child's wellbeing–and which fathers tend to engage in much more frequently. For example, guidelines for computing caregiving time commonly include that spent shopping for the child–as if shopping counts as "child care" whereas making the money required to do the shopping does not. And they standardly include housecleaning, but not repairs and maintenance on the house, yard and car which benefit the child similarly.

This kind of cheating is not crucial to the issue before us, however. For even if the explication of "primary caregiver" should be limited to direct, hands-on nurturing, the criterion is still sexist. "How could that be?", one may ask. "Not only does the presumption not explicitly mention either sex, but childcaring activities are something which either gender can perform. If fathers have performed them less often, that has been their own choice, not someone else's biased treatment of them." Here again the hypocrisy behind the criterion shows through. For just recall how strongly Canadian feminists objected to fathers getting an equal opportunity for childcare leave paid for by the government. It's a cozy racket: first prevent men from spending as much time with the children, then punish them for not having spent as much time with the children.

The problem goes far deeper than the specific matter of childcare leave, however. For well over a century, social forces have pressured and conditioned fathers to leave the hands-on childcare to mothers–just as they once pressured and conditioned mothers to stay at home out of paid employment. The “choices” men and women have made in this regard have been very far from free choices, even when explicit rules have not coerced them. Recognizing this in the case of women, feminists have not blamed women for failing to “do their share” on the paid-labor front. Instead they have demanded, and gotten, hundreds of millions of dollars for programs to encourage women into, and guide them through, the careers once held mostly by men. But no such efforts have gone into helping men become more socially free to provide, and more capable in providing, hands-on childcare. We don’t hear demands for government programs to get fathers more involved in primary caregiving–just threats to deprive them of their children if they do not.

This point about “affirmative action” programs (to get women into jobs formerly held just by men) leads to another hypocrisy of the “primary caregiver” doctrine. Among the main targets of these job-programs have been women who have already been out of the paid workforce to raise children. Are these women told that their earlier choice is now cast in stone? On the contrary, former primary caregivers are given special help and encouragement to adopt a new role. In stark contrast, the whole point of the “primary caregiver” doctrine is to tell erstwhile breadwinner fathers in divorce that they are NOT now allowed a new role–not allowed to be more of a hands-on caregiver. The message “You made your choice, and you may not change it with changing circumstances” is to be given only to men. (Recall that the mother is to put the kids in daycare, rather than let them be with their own father, during the time when she is at her new job. Also note that in many marriages, the primary caregiver is the daycare!)

Yet a further point can be made about the fraudulence of the “primary caregiver” doctrine. In almost no marriages does the father spend no time at all with the children; in most, surveys have indicated, his direct interaction-time with them is fairly close to that of the mother–and certainly up to that 30% time-level mentioned earlier. (Hence those lists of “childcare” activities that are loaded against male-typical ones.) But the proponents of the doctrine don’t believe in partial credit; to them it’s all or nothing. If you didn’t make it up to that 50% level, you lose custody. This is what logicians speak of as black-and-white thinking. It is the defining characteristic of extremism: not seeing the world in all its shades of gray, just the two extremes. But once we do take account of matters of degree, then even by the “primary caregiver” proponents’ own basic assumptions, an appreciable degree of shared stewardship follows–in flat contradiction of the “primary caregiver” doctrine as they promote it.

The Fundamental Injustice

Even all this fraudulence on the part of “primary caregiver” proponents, however, is not the most basic problem with the concept; it is discriminatory at its very core. The fundamental problem is the criterion’s assumption that men and women must behave just alike, in the caregiving respect, in order to be treated equally in regard to child custody. To begin to see why this is wrong, let us reflect on a parallel idea, one which I label the “primary breadwinner” presumption.

Under this doctrine, upon divorce or separation, all of the monetary assets and property of the couple would go to the parent who has contributed the most financially during their time together. Think about it. Would the feminist establishment consider this non-discriminatory? Not on your Irene, Murdoch. But this time, they would be right. The reason: marriage is supposed to be an equal partnership. In a traditional marriage, the mother's staying at home with the children left the father free to pursue financial gain; hence she has indirectly contributed to that gain as well, and by all rights, it also belongs to her. By the very same token, however, the father's going off to work has left the mother free to care directly for the children; hence he likewise has an equal moral right to the fruits of her labors. The two contributions to the children do not have to be the same in kind in order to be equal in value for the children. (If I were inclined toward irony, I'd call this the "parental pay equity" principle.)

Now we can state more clearly than ever the crass hypocrisy of the feminist establishment in this matter. In divorce and separation, they don't want the mother to wind up with the fruits of her direct labors and the father to wind up with the fruits of his direct labors. They want the mother to get them both: the children, and the money earned for them by the father. As noted earlier, they want her to "have it all". But as has now been revealed, "having it all" means having it both ways.

One final point. In this talk, I have focused on gender equality. That is not the most important issue in custody issues, however; the wellbeing and rights of the children are. Though this is a subject for another speech–at least–one important point can be made here. It is that from focusing on the children, the same conclusions follow: children possess a moral right to have both parents as stewards of their wellbeing. The ultimate fraud of the "primary caregiver" doctrine is its violation of that right.

[box type="alert" icon=""]

Update: Since we originally reported on this event being postponed, Chris Marshall, the father's rights activist who was to provide the facility for the debate, has published on his blog that there was a business disagreement at the root of his removal from that property by police.

It seems clear at this point that the postponement of the debate was not caused by the interference of ideologues, as it was in the first one.

[box icon=""]

Chris Marshall, a father's rights activist and the manager of a Vancouver business where a scheduled debate addressing the question, "Has feminism gone too far?" reported that he has just been fired from his job, and escorted from the premises by Vancouver Police after 30 months of employment. The timing of Mr Marshal's ejection comes 48 hours prior to that scheduled event.

This debate – and its topic "Has feminism gone too far?" were originally scheduled by Vancouver resident Ruth Mason-Paull, in response to ongoing censorship and intimidation against individuals posting human rights flyers on Commercial Drive in that city.

Mason-Paull's original debate: "Has feminism gone too far?" was cancelled by her within 48 hours of it's announcement on Facebook, due to a torrent of abuse and threats from gender ideologues who self-identified as feminists.

Marshall and AVfM's John the Other were both invited to participate in the first scheduled event by Mason-Paull. Prior to the cancellation both men agreed that open discussion was far preferable to the tactics of censorship and attempted intimidation favoured by local feminists, who have also self-identified as "femistasi," a term apparently adapted from Stasi, an abbreviation for the East German Secret Police. The two men took up the project abandoned by Mason-Paull and re-scheduled the debate to take place on 23 September at the location of Marshall's business.

Unfortunately, due to outside interference, the operation is closed for the next several weeks.

Marshall, a well known Canadian father's rights activist is familiar with attempts to censor and silence free expression. Marshall's web-site chronicles a 10 year long struggle to maintain contact with his son. The site, documenting abuse of the boy by judges in the Alberta family court system has been subject to several legally specious gag orders on the illegitimate basis that the online documentation of judicial misconduct somehow constitutes abuse of the boy. Alberta family court judge Ged Hawco is the latest of a series of judges issuing gag orders, and enabling the continued abuse of a small boy by enforced separation from his father.

Paul Elam, when informed of these events remarked:

“Those who believe open discussion can be silenced by intimidation, and who may be patting themselves on the back should all be invited to attend the rescheduled debate which will be announced shortly on this site.”

Individuals who had planed to attend the scheduled September 23 debate are encouraged to watch for updates, as the debate will be rescheduled at a new location and date. However, in light on the resistance among gender ideologues, and the established pattern of censorship, intimidation and threats against the original organizer, a revised premise for the debate is now under consideration.

“Is feminism a hate movement?”

Previous to the required adjustments to this event, commentary on the event’s Facebook announcement from gender ideologues responded to the posted question, “Has feminism gone too far?” with substantial derision and invective, although to the present, no individuals have yet contacted the event organizers to argue the position of “NO, feminism has not gone too far.”

The necessary rescheduling of this debate, under the possible revised topic, “Is feminism a hate movement?” should provide participants additional time to register their participation and defense of feminism by email at events@avoiceformen.com

I see by my sundial throwing longer shadows earlier in the day it is time for the fundraising initiative we undertake every change of season here at A Voice for Men.

This has never an been activity I particularly liked, but it is also something that we cannot do without, given what we do.

I will say that this time I am more excited about it than usual. After two years of slogging through the muck of the current zeitgeist, smacking hornet's nests on sight, pushing the best men's rights literature ever seen on the internet, dealing with legions of winged monkeys, sycophants holding up apology signs for videos like POW's, media hacks and denunciations from once prestigious "civil rights" organizations, we have finally begun to see the realization of what we set out to do.

First, the conversation about men's rights is starting to makes its way to the public table. The proof of that can be found, among other places, in the fear based actions of those trying so hard and so feverishly to shut us up right now.

A huge boost to the effort to change the dialogue that cannot be understated is that we have finally pushed through the lace curtain, and women from all walks of life are filing in to join us, side by side, with the mission. This is a first for the MRM.

Part two is activism on the ground. While still fledgling efforts, MRA groups that are direct offshoots of this website have sprung up in at least four countries, and even in their earliest efforts, they have caused comically hysterical reactions from feminist ideologues who are clearly terrified by the idea that their hegemony over the discussion is under fire. They have reason to be afraid.

I say all this to say that we are still early in the game. While much encouraging progress is being made, we have a long way to go. But, if you will forgive the cliché, Rome was not built in a day. We have many more obstacles than limitations on materials and manpower.

[image]With this fundraiser we announce that AVfM will henceforth issues topical press releases after each quarter, and hopefully more than that. That will be undertaken by AVfM News Director Robert O'Hara. Another expense, another weapon in the fight from AVfM. Regular news releases are very expensive, but they are also a great asset to have in our arsenal.

AVfM Activism Coordinator Steve Berkimer is waiting for funds to order the printing of 10,000 "Men's Rights are Human Rights" AVfM stickers which he will be distributing to men's groups on the streets across the US, Canada Australia and the UK.

As you can see from the fundraising thermometer accompanying this post, our goal is the most ambitious so far. 10,000 dollars. We hope to meet or exceed it within the week allocated for the fundraiser. That is the kind of quarterly numbers we are talking about to duplicate the growth of the first two years and to take this thing to the next level.

We have no one but you to count on to make that happen.

I will close with a word of thanks to all of you who regularly support this site. Every bit of success we have found has been because of your willingness to part with hard earned money to help us find our legs. Now that we have them we want to start running.

Let’s do this thing.

September 23, 2012 | by Aimee McGee | Link | Original Link

what this Quaker thinks the MRM could learn from the Religious Society of Friends

This last few months within the MRM have been incredible and exciting. I've watched with delight as the MRM has blossomed into being a real life movement rather than existing as an online community. I've also been aware this sudden expansion is going to generate a need for organisational and governance structures, if we are to maintain this kind of momentum. This need for organisation concerns me. There is a risk, if we establish hierarchies and processes along traditional lines, it will set us up for internal conflicts and schisms. Equally, poor decisions on organisation and governance could also result in cult of personality and/or burnout for those to whom leadership falls.

The MRM is full of strong individuals and activist personalities, and one of the reasons I feel comfortable on AVfM is because of this feisty individualism. This kind of atmosphere is familiar to me from my faith community. I am a member of the Religious Society of Friends (RSoF), also known as Quakers. Liberal Quakers joke about themselves, saying that if you ask two Quakers for an opinion you will get three answers. Despite this diversity, we have managed to maintain a cohesive organisation, through finding a structure and a decision-making process that is both non-hierarchical and responsive to issues raised from within the community.

Disclaimer: I am not expecting the wholesale adoption of these ideas. Rather I would like to share an alterative model of governance, which has worked for Quakers for almost 350 years. I am aware I am speaking as one individual within the MRM and speaking as someone from a liberal unprogrammed Quaker perspective (some Quakers are conservative and pastoral). I am putting forwards a series of ideas that may seem strange and alien to many of you. Regardless of whether any of these ideas are adopted or not, I would hope that this article provokes some timely discussion on how we organise ourselves within the MRM, as we can ill-afford mistakes that might set our movement back decades, if our structures result in division and infighting.

Quaker governance finds its roots in our testimonies. Amongst the core testimonies is equality. Equality within the RSoF was manifest by early Friends in the refusal to remove their hats and to use the plural pronoun "you", instead of the singular "thee" to people of socially higher status. In addition, they were prepared to withhold tithes, as they saw that tax ending up in the pockets of the clergy, rather than being distributed to support those with need.

Quakers hold to the idea that voting to decide an outcome is both divisive, and fails to recognise the truth that radical and alternative solutions, which address the concerns of all parties, can be found when thoughtful reflection is undertaken. I hesitate to use "god-language" in this forum, but we Quakers say that our business meetings are "meetings for worship for business (MfWfB)" and it is the divine Light that guides us to making the best decision.

Within the majority of the different Quaker organisations across the world, the worship groups, called (in the UK) Local Meetings (LM) are the core decision-making bodies. LMs hold responsibility for approximately 90% of the decisions needed to run the day-to-day life of our community to support and care for our members and attenders. LMs decide where and when the community meets for worship and how locally held money is allocated to different aspects of the community. If the LM owns its own premises, how the premises are looked after and who the other users are will be decided locally.

Within any Quaker meeting there is an appointed clerk (or co-clerks). The Clerk's role is to listen intently to what is said at the MfWfB and to formulate a minute reflecting what they are hearing. If the Clerk wishes to contribute to the discussion in the MfWfB, he or she must step away from the clerking table to speak, so it is obvious s/he is speaking as an individual, not as the Clerk. Once the minute is composed, it is read out to all present, and the question is asked "Does this reflect the will of the Meeting?"

Those in agreement will say; "I hope so". If you disagree, then you suggest how the minute should be amended, and it will be re-drafted after some discussion and reflection on the amendment. As with all offices in a Quaker meeting, the Clerk is appointed for 3 years and can only serve two consecutive triennial periods.

Quaker business practice sounds difficult and cumbersome to people who have never experienced it. Quakers themselves make jokes about minutes that take years to agree – the colour of the meeting room carpet is an apocryphal minute that takes 9 years. Yet this process has proven to be effective and functional within our diverse congregations, and has sustained us through some tough decisions, in our history as a community of activists.

There are a number of positives to this method of conducting business.

First, it takes away the power of voting that can result in division and a sense of "win-lose" forming within a group. Establishing solutions with zero-sum outcomes is what causes schisms within organisations where there are high numbers of activists.

Second, it enforces personal accountability to the business of the community. Quite simply, if you want to be involved in the decision, you need to be part of the process, as a minute can not be overturned unless there are legal or financial implications to the decision that were not known at the time the minute was agreed.

Third, it gives authority to those named in a minute to act on behalf of the community to undertake specified and agreed activities. There is no ambiguity about what is to be done by who and by when, if a minute is written with due care and attention to detail.

How are the other 10% of the decisions get made within the RSoF? Approximately 8-9% of them are made at Area Meeting (AM). AM will hold responsibility for functional and structural decisions that have implication for a geographical group of LMs. As a rule, the work of the AM is done when there is a need for more specialist skills to undertake a task. The statement on safeguarding of children and vulnerable adults is an example of an AM level decision-making.

Our safeguarding statement and procedure was developed a small committee of Friends and then ratified in AM, in a similar process as described for writing a minute. I was my LM representative at AM when the safeguarding statement was read out, and yet at that point I could still stand and request a considerable amendment to reflect that there will be members and attenders in our community who may be falsely accused, a matter included in the final document.

The last 1-2% of decision-making is done at Yearly Meeting (YM) level. My AM is part of the Britain YM, which is the oldest and largest of the YM in the Quaker world. The Britain YM has political influence and financial assets as a result of our industrial (Cadbury, Fry) and banking (Barclay, Lloyds) heritage, plus our long-established history of political activism, which has required the formation of an executive called Meeting for Sufferings (MfS), made up of representatives from each AM, but this is unusual amongst Friends. British Quakers also meet yearly, and any member can attend Y. Commonly 1,000-2,000 people will gather for MfWfB as part of the YM.

MfS and YM always prepare documents in advance to circulate through AM and LM about issues of national concern. Any LM or AM can respond to these issues, by preparing minutes of response. These minutes will inform the processes of the YM or of MfS. Equally, a person in a LM could raise a concern, and if supported by their LM and AM after a process of discussion and discernment, their concern can be sent to MfS or YM for discussion and possible action.

The “big” decisions made by YM or MfS are often the visible and press-worthy actions of the RSoF in the UK. In recent years, Britain YM has declared our support of gay marriage, and affirmed our commitment as to develop as a sustainable, low-carbon community. MfS directs our parliamentary lobbyists in several areas, including support of a legislative change to allow those who entered military service at age 16, to have the option to change their mind on their turning 18 years without penalty.

Not all our decisions as a YM are made easily. Last year, there was a commitment to end trade with, and investment in, companies and organisations who profit from Israeli settlements in the Occupied Territories of Palestine. This declaration gave us considerable adverse press and strained previously excellent relations with the Jewish community in the UK, but follows in a long tradition of Quakers being “two steps ahead” on social causes. Returning to my starting point on testimonies, Quakers have always held to a testimony of Truth, and this can sometimes be uncomfortable, when our truth is out of step with the mainstream.

I believe there are some good things to learn from Quaker experience that could help inform the discussion we need to have as a movement as we begin to create organisational structures.

1) Where possible, care should be taken that decision-making is done avoiding zero-sum scenarios. By avoiding voting, this means that many options will be discussed and a solution that all people can accept will be found. Often where people can not “agree” a decision, they are willing to accept a decision, as long as they feel their perspective has been considered and heard in the process of coming to a way of moving forward.

2) Participation is encouraged by the process of minutes being thoroughly agreed in meetings, and the process of preparing documents in advance enhances personal accountability and allows for informed discussion.

3) Minutes giving both direction and authority to individuals, allowing for clear chains of accountability. Quakers being activists, once a minute is decided usually get on with what is needed pretty quickly afterwards!

4) The local groups must be largely autonomous to make decisions on matters that affect them directly. These groups should be able to prepare responses to concerns that affect the wider organisation. Where local groups identify an issue that may have wider implication, they should be able to transmit that information both upwards and sideways in a structured and efficient manner.

5) For activities that have wider than local impact, or which demand specialist skills and knowledge, geographical clusters of groups can to pool together to have that expertise and work shared

6) To avoid both fatigue in natural leaders or the negative impact of cult of personality within groups, where there is a need for formal office holders, have the jobs for a specified term. This, along with co-sharing of key posts also develops potential new leaders and allows for succession planning.

6) For issues of national or international importance, there may be a need for an executive for some decisions, but there should be the opportunity for all members to participate in decision-making at some point in the year, as the gatherings have a two-fold purpose of building community identity and ensuring ownership of national and international issues.

And the reference to porcupines? Most MfWfB are like herding cats until anything contentious is discussed…then it is like herding porcupines; cat-like in nature and prickly. At our most recent AM, I was the porcupine in the midst. Yet, I felt my voice was heard and my contribution valued. As we were dealing with an issue that will take time to evolve, I will have responsibility to be there for other AM where it is raised, if I want the community outcome to reflect my position. I know already that my questions will be raised at MfS and YM, as the Clerk felt I had raised a significant point that had been overlooked.

We have had two debates on this site thus far. The first was with a feminist quisling over the issue of domestic violence. It was a lot of fun. Well, not so much for the quisling, but for me and for readers here.

The second one was a mistake on my part. I debated a young man on the relative value of pussy-centrism. It took way more time and effort than it was worth, and didn't produce more than a distraction that was probably more boring than whatever we were being distracted from.

Well, I have gone and done it again. Hopefully this debate will serve two functions. The first is as an amends for the last debate, and the second is a vetting of a very controversial idea, even within the MRM.

Jury nullification at rape trials as a way to undermine inequities against men in the criminal justice system's handling of that crime.

Obviously, I will be taking the pro position in the debate, as I have already written on the matter extensively.

My opposition is a blogger that goes by the handle Johann the Cabbie.

I was recently pointed to an article of his which said some pretty disparaging things about AVfM, calling it a "sick, disgusting site," and about yours truly, referring to me as the "shit in charge." But I don't intend to let that sum this person up, especially for the purpose of this debate. There does appear to be more to Johann the Cabbie than a quick, hostile reaction to AVfM.

Case in point, he also questioned whether femitheist Matt Dillahunty, a high profile and popular Atheist who founded a Texas based group called The Atheist Experience, was pussy-whipped. He accurately pointed out that Dillahunty is a really rational guy….unless it concerns feminism.

"The whole gang at The Atheist Experience have abandoned rationality when it comes to feminism," said Johann. This apparently did not sit well with Dillahunty, who posted a long, sneering, nonsensical rebuttal to Johann's blog.

The fact that Cabbie appears to have the capacity for rational thought, even when there is a feminist in the room, and the fact that he writes with an analytical pen (mostly), makes him a worthy candidate for this type of debate.

The nullification question is an important one, especially as it is has fostered so much dissent, even in our own ranks. I think it provides a good opportunity for discussion and deserves an opponent committed to taking the con on other than ideological grounds.

I think it also serves as a way to highlight the growing schism in the Atheist community between feminist ideologues and those who continue to enjoy the rational part of rational thought.

There will be three exchanges starting this weekend, with a 72 hour limit on returning responses. Johann will start.

I respectfully request readers refrain from ad hominem in the comments. Let’s enjoy a healthy and robust debate on a very important subject.

MRM blueprint for bridge building

I had to sit and read the above comment about a dozen times. It seemed beyond incredible to me. It still does. Even now I am having a hard time wrapping my head around it.

The online men's movement I drifted into several years ago was a much different environment. It was mostly, predominately, white, male, protectively heterosexual, traditionalist, pro marriage (between one man and one woman, of course), politically right wing (in the neocon sense), and highly polemic in the political sense.

And it was as stagnant as ditchwater.

Even back in 2008 when I was Editor-in-Chief for mensnewsdaily.com, the erstwhile flagship for the men's movement, the publication was generally inhabited by shills looking to sell disaffected men on Republicans being the Great White Hope for the MRM. And they were buying it while getting nowhere except straight into a brick wall.

Then the crazy fuckers dusted themselves off and bought it again.

But MND did have patently pro male sympathies, and an opportunity, thanks to publisher Mike LaSalle, to put some real men's rights literature into public view, so I served with equal measures of disgust, hope and appreciation.

I always knew though, that if the men's movement was ever going to gain traction it would depend greatly on the voices of women to do it. What's that I hear now? Is that the sound of beer bottles exploding into shards as they hit the chicken wire screen I am standing behind on this stage?

Actually, I don't hear that now, but I would have in 2008 because back then most MRAs were still looking to figure out how to keep men on their white horses and wanted women to look up at them adoringly for it. OK, well maybe I hear a couple of bottles breaking, but not many.

Yes, the MRM has changed drastically in that time. And AVfM has been a very big part of it happening. That is something I will take to my grave with more pride than I can ever articulate. I don't pretend that the credit belongs to me, and that is fine. There are dozens of people now behind the scenes of this website, and while we don't rest on the same page on all issues, each one of us carries the understanding that claiming to be a human rights movement and not including everyone is a deadly hypocrisy that can only lead to a reversal of our recent fortunes.

And failing to recognize the value of women in particular is not only hypocritical, it is also foolish.

I could spell out the litany of political reasons why women should be here, and in great numbers, but I really have another part of this on my mind at the moment.

After getting over a little bit of the shock of witnessing the initial rush of female donors that kicked off our donation drive, it left something else on my mind. I hope I can say it without drowning you in schmaltz.

Feminism, as it has on most anything it ever touched, half-recognized a problem and then promptly screwed the entire pooch on what to do about it. Nowhere is this more evident, nor has it resulted in more destruction, than where it concerns the relationship between men and women.

There were indeed problems out of our traditional past that needed to be corrected. And it does have to do with men and women being cast into sexual roles. Those roles, necessary in an environment where moment to moment survival was never a given, robbed women of agency and piled it on men in the form of self-sacrificing obligation, often till they broke beneath the weight of it.

That was the cost of keeping humans on the planet. It sucked, but it worked. However, in a time when such drastic measures are unnecessary, those roles are as punishing as they are archaic.

Rather than see that simple and obvious reality and pursue solutions that pushed for a balance between agency and responsibility, feminists just pushed for and got more measures to infantilize women and burden men with the responsibility for it. They got there by exploiting the very sex roles they pretended to critique and deconstruct, resulting in two generations of women-children that were trained to hate and fear the men who were expected to enable their petty entitlements.

If there ever was a real problem with misogyny in our culture, this is where it was birthed. At the very least whatever misogyny was there was aggravated and amplified by sexual politics that were absolutely insane.

The men’s movement, among other important things, is a call for both sexes to return to sanity. It is a pathway for men and women to reconnect, free of the constraints of expectations based on sex and unencumbered by the vitriol and sexism that are the driving forces of modern feminism.

The men’s movement is our chance to love each other again.

For that to happen, we must not undo feminism, but simply do what they failed to do. We must see women as responsible adults worthy of earned respect, and men as something other than pack animals placed on earth for women’s convenience. Well, that would pretty much undo feminism on its own, but you get my point.

As we look at the women and men that support this movement and help it grow, I am struck by how much they are the living examples of what freedom from sexual roles portends for the future. I don’t see men puffing up their chests, vying for women’s attention. I don’t see women getting rescued from their own words, or expecting anyone to do that. I don’t see entitlement in these women, but humility. And I don’t see self-sacrifice in the men, but self-awareness.

I don’t see anyone getting special credence for their opinions because they are one sex or the other, nor do I see anyone being summarily dismissed for the same reasons. I don't see women saying stupid shit like "As a woman, I feel…." That is because they talk as human beings, with a high degree of personal agency, not as members of an entitled class who count on their vaginas for credibility or a pass.

I see at AVfM a community of men and women who live by the same rules, who all make it here or don't make it by their ability to articulate their ideas and support them with logical arguments; who are measured by their values and principles, not by the size of their bust or wallet.

Even though there is a glaring problem with female entitlement in this culture, we don't tell women to "check your privilege," before they have demonstrated that they feel entitled to any. We don't even require them to identify as an MRA. Simply human with an affection for truth and justice does just fine.

We do all this recognizing our fundamental differences as men and women, yet we do not let those differences shape our expectations of each other and ourselves. The things that connect us and nurture our mutual respect are sexless.

Does any such thing exist in feminists circles? The question itself is laughable.

In the exact opposite of the feminist norm, we are not burning bridges between the sexes, but building them. And we are doing it together, with women carrying the lumber and driving nails right alongside men who fully value their contribution. It is the most sexually equal place on the internet, and it is starting to hit the real world ground as well.

Yep, things have come a long way since 2008. We are now actually starting to see a movement, and we are doing it in the only way that could ever happen. Together.

If we never accomplish anything else, that will do just fine.

AVfM launches forum for activists

September 25, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box icon="none"]

As was announced earlier this week on AVfM News with Nurdy Dancing, A Voice for Men is launching an activist forum.

Personally, I really love the idea of doing this. There are several good forums on the internet that form some pretty robust red pill communities, but none until now that are geared primarily for activism. That does not mean that you won't be able to join and "just talk" about issues. Quite the contrary, I hope MRAs from across the world come to the forum to meet other like-minded people.

There is a post in the welcome area that specifically addresses the basic forum guidelines, but to put it in more casual terms they pretty much mirror things here. The assigned mods are Stu and DannyBoy, with JTO as Supreme Overlord and Destroyer of Worlds. We have room for one more volunteer if the mood to serve strikes you.

Unfortunately we were not able to integrate the new forum into our theme and run it off the current user database, so you will have to go through the agonizing 30 second process and register an account.

As you will see on the home page, we have categories broken down by region. Hopefully over time this will facilitate introductions of MRAs in specific locales and lead to more activism on the ground.

There is also some male space provided where we ask that men only post.

You will also find some of the features we tried and failed to integrate into the website are available and fully functional in the forum. You will have the ability for private messaging, group affiliation and friendship lists, among other things.

Additionally, as more local MRA operations launch, we will be providing locked areas where they can meet and discuss activism initiatives. Of course we remind all activists that "locked" is a relative word on the internet, as I am sure the bot heads over at Radfem can tell you. J I say that to say in advance, know who you are dealing with as much as possible.

This is launch day, so there may be glitches. Please be patient with us as we feel our way through this and begin to bring added features to the service.

So have at it gents and ladies. Please take a minute to go in, register and announce your presence in the introduction thread that has already started.

For many, AVfM has become synonymous with the MRM. I hope to see this forum reach that same level of recognition in the days ahead.

You will find a link to the forum in the masthead now, or you can just click here.

Enjoy!

Petition to impeach Judge Lori B. Jackson

September 26, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

If you have been following the nightmare story of Lt. Col. Joel Kirk's battle for custody, which for him is an effort to remove his children from the hands of their physically, emotionally and psychologically abusive mother, you know that the family court of Judge Lori B. Jackson is standing in the way of his children's safety.

We cannot allow this to continue without taking action to stop it.

AVfM has elected to start a petition to the West Virginia House of Delegates, which is the governmental body responsible for impeaching judges and removing them from the bench when they violate their legal obligations as members of the judiciary.

Nowhere is this more necessary than in the case of Judge Jackson.

We are calling on all persons to sign this petition. If you are familiar with this case, you are already on your way to sign. If you are not familiar with this case, you can get the details, including the harrowing recordings of Tina Taylor Kirks drunken rage and violent assault on her children at the links below.

For anyone unclear about Judge Jackson's responsibility here, please read the following from the West Virginia Judiciary Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court:

Reports by Family Court. – If a family court has reasonable cause to suspect any minor child involved in family court proceedings has been abused or neglected, that family court shall immediately report the suspected abuse or neglect to the state child protective services agency, pursuant to W. Va. Code §§ 49-6A-2, and the circuit court.

Not only has Judge Jackson clearly violated state guidelines, she has done so knowingly at the expense of two minor children, effectively delivering them into the custody of the person abusing them.

Please sign this petition and pass it around. It does not matter where you live. These children are currently in the care of an abuser, the authorities have failed them and there is literally no one but us to try to help them out of this situation.

This will also be posted to the AVfM Forum and to the AVfM Facebook page.

Thank you.

Please note: There was difficulty with embedding the petition in this article. The image above will link you to the petition page at Change.org. If we can get the problem sorted out we will replace the image with the embedded peition. You can view petition live, here. PE

Circuit Judge delays ruling Kirk custody case

September 26, 2012 | by Robert O'Hara | Link | Original Link

(AVFM News Washington Sep 26, 2012) On Friday September 21, the West Virginia Fifteenth Judicial Circuit court decided to delay final judgment until further notice on Joel Kirks appeal to regain custody of his children. This comes after an activism drive spearheaded by A Voice for Men has given much publicity to the case spurring action on the internet and locally in Harrison County WVA.

Kirk, a Lieutenant Colonel in the U.S.A.F., has been battling with his ex wife, Tina Kirk over the custody of their two children since their divorce after an incident on June 28, 2009 in which he videotaped his wife in a drunken rage attacking his children and himself and in which the police arrested Ms. Kirk. (Details in articles cited below).

Charges were brought up on Ms. Kirk after the incident but the prosecutor decided that the "burden of proof was too high" since there were no injuries in spite of the fact that there was video evidence and eye whiteness reports from both a neighbor and the police concerning the actions of his ex wife.

After a temporary ruling awarding emergency custody to Col. Kirk in the initial custody hearing, Judge Cornelia Reep requested that the Guardian Ad Litem produce a final report within 60 days, before final judgment. Over the course of next three years Ms. Kirks lawyers delayed the report and the final judgment of the court by tactically scheduling, rescheduling, appealing psychological evaluations and other administrative actions, according to Lt. Col. Kirk.

During this time Judge Reep removed herself from the case because of a conflict of interest concerning Ms. Kirks lawyer, whom she once represented during a divorce.

As written by Dr. Tara J. Palmatier in a previous article, the new judge presiding over the case, Judge Lori B. Jackson, also had a conflict of interest as her husband is best friends with Ms. Kirks attorney, Thomas G. Smith Esq.

Judge Jackson made a final judgment in April of this year for 50/50 custody with full physical custody being given to Ms. Kirk in the event that Col. Kirk is deployed. This was after she reviewed the video and numerous reports of Ms. Kirk's abuse of and inability to parent her children from court psychologists and the guardian Ad litem. The ruling virtually gave Ms. Kirk primary custody as Col. Kirk is a combat pilot who was serving in Afghanistan in recent years, with his children staying with his mother during his assignments.

During mediation Tina Kirk's lawyers approached Lt. Col. Kirk with an offer for full custody of their children in exchange for $288,000. He has not entertained this offer to sell the children.

"My son was suicidal," Kirk said, during an interview over the weekend. "Even though my son told the cops that he did not want to be with his mom and he is of age to make that choice now they told him that he had to go because the court ordered it."

During his last deployment in Afghanistan Col. Kirk had to relieve himself from duty and return home because his family situation was too overwhelming for him to conduct combat missions in a safe manner. "I thought I was going to come home to a dead kid and I had to go in and just say that I couldn't do this and I had to go home."

On Friday Judge James A. Matish, who may not have reviewed all of the prior court materials, mirrored Judge Jackson's sentiment by saying "this case is quite disturbing in the behavior of both parties. Ms. Kirk for her substance abuse and Mr. Kirk for filming from a dark room." As indicated above, he has not passed final judgment and it is not yet clear as to when he will do so.

Kirk's objection to the conclusions of the judges is evident.

"There is not one shred of evidence anywhere in the record that I have ever done one single thing wrong. Unless, that is, that you make the leap as these judges have that recording one of thousands of these abusive episodes was wrong."

"Here we have evidence in the record of child abuse, spousal abuse, adultery, substance abuse, false allegation, abuse of the court, contempt of court, perjury, financial ruin and credit card debt. Not hearsay, but hard evidence. Yet I am determined to be equally at fault and am asked to 'just get along for the sake of the children.' This in a hearing where at that very time she argues to enslave and extort money from me that clearly does not exist."

Kirk currently owes $200,000 in legal fees and $40,000 in credit card debt accumulated by his wife.

AVFM News will be covering this story and will give updates as they come in.

AVfM Radio: The Predatory Victim

The power of victimhood is something which victims, particularly self selecting victims, understand. However, this is becoming increasingly easy for everyone else to understand because self selecting victims are a growing demographic with increasing dominance of the social landscape, and their power is to control everybody else through the most ancient and noblest of human instincts, our compassion.

Without directly passing through the pain and damage normally associated with victimhood, the predatory victim is emerging as a new class of tyrant, trashing the human rights of others and masterfully manipulating the use of proxy violence against their victims.

Tonight on AVfM Radio, John the Other, Typhon Blue and Girl Writes What examine the most toxic elements of the current social landscape, and The Predatory Victim.

Why do MRAs bring up the draft?

September 28, 2012 | by Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) | Link | Original Link

A while ago, I stumbled on a video from TheTruePooka attacking MRAs such as myself for "blaming feminists for the male-only draft." This leads me to wonder if maybe there is a problem with people listening when a woman speaks.

Very few MRAs, myself especially, actually blame feminism for something that's been happening throughout most of history, and we don't even lay blame on feminism for being unable to change that situation. I certainly never have.

Feminists DO, however, get criticized by MRAs for their marginalization of the draft and their dismissal of it and other traditional male obligations when they are offensively speaking about so-called historical "male privilege" and "patriarchy." So let me try to spell this out for everybody so we can clear the air a bit.

So, Pooka, it wasn't even 90 seconds into your video when you drop this astounding strawman: "Lately the people who are putting this argument forward are saying it with an implied hostile tone that suggests that America's male-only draft is the fault of women, especially feminists."

Now, I'm not going to say there isn't a hostile tone involved, but I could have stopped watching right there. This is what I don't get at all. I mean, I've had people in the comments of my "Feminism and the disposable male" video accuse me of blaming feminism for male disposability. I'm as perplexed by how they can possibly draw that conclusion from a video in which I clearly state that "male disposability has been around since 'the dawn of time,'" as I am by how the primary reason MRAs bring up the draft escapes so many people.

Now, some MRAs do criticize feminism for not having pushed for an equivalent female obligation to society to the one that acted as the primary justification for universal male suffrage, and for the lowering of the voting age to 18. Many of them feel that the suffragettes should have kicked and screamed a lot harder for such an obligation, especially since when suffragists were agitating for the vote for women, huge numbers of male soldiers fighting and dying in World War I on behalf of countries with universal male suffrage did not have the vote, because they were under the age of 21. Suffragette leader Christabel Pankhurst even took a break from agitating for female suffrage to hand out white feathers to teenage boys to shame them into enlisting in a war that killed millions, many of whom did not have the vote.

To her credit, she also advocated mandatory "war work" for women, but was somehow less successful in that effort, which she seems to have effectively abandoned once women had the franchise. Huh.

And this is where we come to the real issue, Pooka. The real reason MRAs bring up the draft. It's not to blame women, or blame feminists. It is simply, and plainly, a refutation of the feminist concept of historical male privilege and female subjugation. From the website “great war fiction,” regarding Britain’s white feather campaign:

> What is significant about the involvement of the suffragettes is that it makes explicit what was otherwise unspoken – women were claiming the right to inform males of their duty, and were demanding that they fulfill the obligation implied in the restriction of full citizenship and the franchise to males, the obligation to defend their womenfolk.

In other words, the white feather girls and the suffragettes understood that men had political franchise and women did not because men had a duty to go to war to protect women.

I find it strange how the suffragettes seemed to have forgotten that men and men alone had been burdened with this obligation–to protect their womenfolk and act as cannon fodder in the interests of their governments, according to their individual will or against it–long before universal male suffrage was a twinkle in anyone’s eye. But there you have it: Men had the vote and women did not, so men had better be prepared to suit up and do their duty.

When the US government began sentencing draft dodgers to life imprisonment, years in penal labor camps, and death, a group of anarchists challenged the constitutionality of the draft. Their challenge failed. In the Court’s decision, it was stated that:

> It may not be doubted that the very conception of a just government and its duty to the citizen includes the reciprocal obligation of the citizen to render military service in case of need, and the right to compel it. … To do more than state the proposition is absolutely unnecessary in view of the practical illustration afforded by the almost universal legislation to that effect now in force.

In other words, men enjoyed the rights and privileges of citizenship granted by government because they paid for it through the reciprocal obligation of the draft. And the court considered this bargain to be so self-evident, it need do no more than state it.

As late as 1917, the US government was executing men who refused to fulfil the obligation they owed in return for the right to full legal person-hood in the eyes of the state.

Would you trade this for your right to vote? Millions of men did.
Three years later, women won the vote. Without even the obligation to do “war work” like sewing uniforms, or community service like picking up litter from the sides of highways.

Do you get that, Pooka? Three years before women won the vote, the “privileged” class was still being sentenced to death for refusing an obligation that women have never been burdened with. An obligation they bore in exchange for full, but conditional, legal personhood in the eyes of the government.

That was the “privileged class,” Pooka. The “oppressed” class got the vote 2 years after the end of a war where thousands upon thousands of young men died without franchise. And before you argue that women were not “allowed” to make this bargain with the state, I’ll remind you that men were not “allowed” to refuse it.

And I think what really gets me is in your video you claim that Selective Service: you just came to accept it as “part of becoming an adult.” Not for women, only for men.

Now, it would seem to me that a class of people who get something valuable for essentially nothing, for the grand accomplishment of turning 18, might be viewed as privileged, and the class of people who, if they had the temerity to decline the bargain–the whole draft in exchange for citizenship and political franchise thing–got the gallows, are the ones who might have had some problems with society’s conditional view of their personhood.

You spend the rest of your video beating what is largely a strawman, expounding on feminism’s struggle to win women the right to serve in the military and in combat. Up until 1973 in the U.S., that was never a right for men, Pooka. It was an obligation that hung over the heads of young men since before the feudal age. Like the right to earn income women won over the last century was and still is an obligation for men. Like the right to financial independence feminists worked so hard to achieve for women was and still is an obligation for men.

This is why MRAs bring up the draft, and when discussing the draft–or Coverture, or traditional gender roles, for that matter–MRAs seem actively hostile to feminists and resentful of the new position women enjoy in society.

Because oddly enough, for all of feminism’s successes, they haven’t been that interested in acquiring obligations for women, and society isn’t especially interested in imposing them, either–which kind of smells like Female Privilege. The social and legal obligation a man had to provide for the material needs of his family is one feminists don’t seem to want to impose on any those women who choose to make families on their own, or choose to take the leadership of those families by expelling the fathers of their children. On the contrary, organizations like N.O.W. support or ignore the continuation of paternal obligation while simultaneously agitating for continued erosion of paternal rights—that would be the family equivalent of reinstating the draft while revoking male political franchise.

And now we live in a system where the government will deny a father the right to involvement with his children if the mother wants it badly enough, while simultaneously requiring he provide for them, and jailing him if he fails.

Feminists still call this system "Patriarchy," and describe it using terms like "Male privilege" and "female oppression", because the top 1% of society happens to be mostly male. Of the thousands of men who were sent to war without political franchise, two years before women were handed their right to vote for nothing, they apply the minimizing and insulting phrase "patriarchy hurts men too."

That's why MRAs bring up the draft, Pooka. Not to blame women or feminists for America's male-only draft, but to remind them that getting the vote without being required to die for it if necessary is not fucking oppression, and neither is having to wait a mere 50 years longer to be handed something that men were still required to pay for with their lives. That having to trade your autonomy or your life for your political franchise is not privilege–it's a shit deal. So shit a deal I wonder how many men would have taken it if Uncle Sam hadn't been willing to run them up a gibbet if they refused.

And the fact that feminists can incessantly moan about the oppression of women, partly based on the fact that since the beginning recorded history, women had to wait less than 1% longer than men did for their own, obligation-free political franchise, and can be taken seriously by anyone, is the very definition of "social privilege."

A social privilege to not be called on their bullshit even when their advocacy tramples on the rights of others. For crying out loud, we live in a society where a woman whose sole claim to notoriety derives from her complaining that the government–of a country that supposedly values the separation of church and state, no less–won't force the Catholic church to subsidize her sex life, where that woman is given the podium at the Democratic Convention, all while the sisterhood bitches and moans that women have no voice in society.

The very fact that society is willing to indulge this level of cognitive dissonance simply because the lunatics spouting it claim to represent women as a group is a testimonial to Female Social Privilege, Pooka. As is the fact that after less than a year of doing this, I have the largest following of any Men's Rights Movement channel on Youtube.

I watched the video you made about stalking and harassment. The fact that you were prepared to take a punch from a 300 pound man to protect your wife: that's Female Privilege, Pooka, and it's a privilege you almost certainly would not have enjoyed had the situation been reversed. As is the fact that you–someone who claims to be sympathetic to men's rights issues–could spend an entire video talking about stalking and harassment of women, as if it is solely a problem that women have to deal with. That's also about female privilege, Pooka.

You effectively erased and ignored male victims of stalking in your video, and while most victims of this kind of harassment are women, "most" is not "all." The very fact that you would DO that and not realize someone might call you on it shows the privileged position women hold when it comes to society's desire to protect its members. I have an acquaintance with an 18 year old son who could tell you a thing or two about being stalked and then screwed over by the system, if you wanted. At least you and your wife weren't facing felony charges despite a mountain of phone records, alibi witnesses, and email and voicemail evidence proving you were the one being harassed, simply because your stalker was a young woman and you were a young man.

"Male privilege" is a load of shit, Pooka, because none of those perks that men enjoyed through history, none of those perks and benefits came for free, just for having a penis. They were bought and paid for.

So guess what? Whenever ANYONE whines about "male privilege," or kvetches about how women didn't get the vote the same afternoon men did, I'm gonna bring up the fucking draft. And the very fact that you could see that as an attack on feminism so egregious that you'd feel compelled to defend those feminists by beating strawmen, and complaining about how women don't have the right to choose to serve their country, when for most of history men didn't have any choice about the matter once their government called them to serve?

Well, I'd tell you to check your privilege, but that would be stupid, wouldn't it?

SO let's review: almost no one has ever said feminists are responsible for the draft. What they do take issue with is the constant whinging about women not being handed the vote as soon or even sooner than SOME men, without acknowledging historical realities that for men, the vote always came with an OBLIGATION. An obligation society never demanded, and still does not demand, of women.

Feminists demand rights and privileges for women, but do not accept obligation. Instead, they kick the shit out of men and call them privileged even when men had to pay for that privilege with life and limb. Clear enough?

Jury nullification debate – part 1

September 30, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

As promised, this is part one of the debate between myself and Johann the Cabbie on the subject of jury nullification at rape trials. Johann goes first, and I have 72 hours to respond. PE

AVfM Nullification Debate Part I

> With the possible exception of the sexual molestation of a child, rape is a crime that evokes the most visceral of responses from the average person. And for good reason. Sex that is physically forced or obtained by threat of harm sadistically reduces victims to their most helpless state, and leaves lingering damage that may well last the remainder of a person's life.

So says Paul Elam in the opening of his article on jury nullification and rape. This quote, from a man who has publicly stated that it he ever found himself on a jury a rape case that he would vote to acquit no matter the evidence.

He has his reasons, but first, an introduction to jury nullification. Juries in America have the right to disregard the evidence presented and still vote to acquit an obviously guilty defendant. In the 1850's, many juries used nullification to disregard the Fugitive Slave Act. During Prohibition, juries frequently let bootleggers free.

Nullification also has had immoral applications, such as Southern juries refusing to convict white defendants for murders of black victims.

I could consider nullification myself in certain situations. For example, if I ever serve on a jury for any marijuana case, I'd vote to acquit despite the evidence. The government's prohibition of marijuana is wrong and immoral, so a vote for not guilty is necessary and proper.

Elam calls for nullification in rape cases, and he has pledged to vote to acquit on any case no mater the evidence. His reasons are twofold – America's corrupt criminal justice system and rape shield laws.

In his article, he lists the several processes in a rape case, from the police report to the trial, and details all the possible areas that mistakes can be made. He makes a compelling case, but he misses an important and obvious point.

The endemic problems with our criminal justice system do not pertain to rape cases only, but are problems in any type of case, whether it be murder, drugs, robbery, or whatnot. With the highest per capita prison population in the world, sloppy police work, over-zealous prosecutors, over-worked and under-paid public defenders, mandatory minimums, three strikes and you're out laws, a reliance on fallible eyewitness reports, coerced confessions, and a disgraceful class imbalance, America's justice system is woefully broken.

If Elam is to use America's broken system as a reason to call for nullification in rape cases, then why not at any criminal trial? Why not set murderers and robbers free along with the rapists?

And, that query brings us to Elam's second bit of reasoning – rape shield laws.

Elam defines rape shield laws well.

> Ostensibly, rape shield laws were enacted to limit a defendants ability to cross examine a plaintiff regarding her past sexual conduct, the logic being that such information is not only irrelevant, but might prejudice jurors. For instance, if it were brought out that a married woman alleging rape had engaged in extramarital affairs, it might cause a bias in some jurors that strongly disapprove of such behavior and prompt them to acquit her alleged assailant.

He goes on to say that such laws "seem reasonable," and he makes a poor attempt to disprove their reasonableness. His approach is to list two instances where rape shield laws were misapplied. That's all. He makes no attempt to argue against the value or use of the laws. Such an attempt would be doomed to failure, for rape shield laws are important and necessary. Sadly, we still live in a time where many potential jurors could be biased against a sexually promiscuous victim, and those biases could easily lead to the conclusion in the mind of a juror that "the slut deserved it." Back to my earlier query: why not vote to acquit in any and all criminal cases? Elam's reasoning is just as applicable in murder trials as it is in rape trials. But, no reasonable person would wish to set any and all defendants free.

Jury duty is an important and difficult task. If called to serve, one must look at the evidence carefully, disregard emotion and visceral reactions, and determine the facts as best as possible. If reasonable doubt exists, then by all means, acquit.

But, if a defendant is obviously guilty, a refusal to convict is morally unjustifiable.

Some thoughts on our future

Evidence suggests the feminist movement is part of a larger strategy to divide and conquer the general population. It is a hate movement, so we cannot ignore it. Neither can we simply employ the tactics common to mass movements because our real adversaries are simply too powerful. So our activist campaigns need to be flexible and thrifty, but they should also be fun.

Feminists have a lot of fun. Oh, they act angry and outraged. They cry and wail and pout and carry on. But beneath it all is a large measure of glee.

In protest marches, interviews, books, articles, pamphlets, flyers and blogs, they take zero responsibility for much of anything, but blame all of women's burdens on men, and then cackle and crow when men are made to jump and cower like henpecked husbands.

Whenever they bitch and complain, the MSM and lawmakers indulge in collective hand wringing and make it their mission to save women from the barbarian hoards of men. But their crusades are not meant for all women. Religious women, libertarian and conservative women, independent, self-reliant and competent women who do not seek victim status but strive to succeed on their own terms don't count. Only feminist victims matter. At least on the left.

On the right where Victorian views often prevail and male sexuality is considered a lurid weed that infests the sweet gardens of womanly innocence and taints the delicate flowers of feminine virtue, the white knights are ever ready to condemn the actions of men. Anything for a chance to be hailed, no matter how briefly, as a hero, for that is the fantasy boys learn, to seek female adoration through violence employed in heroic endeavors.

Oh, for just one chance to confront the stereotypical sexist jerks that according to the movies haunt every bar so we can knock them down and chase them out and then bask in the fawning adoration of the beset upon women whose virtue we rescued. Yes, rescued from the thugs, but not from us, for they will then cast their virtue aside as a reward for our bravery. That's the myth.

Really, you would think most men would have wised up by now to the fact that there are more white knight wannabes than jerks. And human sexuality being what it is, in places where such scenes unfold the woman, at the end of the night, is far more likely to go home with the jerk than the knight. After which, if she follows the feminist script she will claim her drunken night of rhapsodic revelry was really rape, and thus will her virtue be restored.

Not that she ever lost it, of course! We would never call her a slut, oh no, because we would not want to invite angry mobs of scantily clad women to gather and march down the streets of our neighborhoods. Are you kidding me? Of course we would. It would be like a free show!

Yet politicians treat such antics as serious discourse and legislate to alleviate every feminist complaint no matter how trivial, misandrous or insane. What could be more fun than that? For sane people, a lot, but unfortunately they've got us surrounded and their backers are powerful.

From the Seneca Falls Women's Rights Convention in 1848 to the establishment of the Ms. Foundation in 1973 to the present, American feminists have enjoyed the support of powerful members of the elite, whose purpose it appears is to keep the masses distracted and divided and, thereby, to keep us under their control. To this end, the feminist movement has been most effective.

Whether feminism started as a hate movement is a subject of debate. But by the late 1980s the dominant theme had definitely taken a turn for the dark side. This was perhaps never more clearly demonstrated than by Shere Hite's 1987 book, Women and Love. The title of her book said the subject was love, but throughout the pages that followed what she documented could only be described as hate, and to this day I still think of the book as Women Who Hate, by Sheer Hate.

Regardless of when, exactly, feminism shifted focus from equal opportunities for women to female supremacy and male subjugation, by the late 1990s it had become obvious that they were getting strong support from the wealthy and political elite, and that they were being used as pawns to undermine the family and impoverish the middleclass.

Fathers who were kept busy fighting for the right to be fathers, and men struggling not to suffocate beneath the fear and loathing of male sexuality that settled like a toxic cloud to taint every aspect of western culture, coupled with the countless diversions from gaming to sports to porn available on a thousand cable channels and a million websites were too distracted to notice the inflation eating away at our currencies. EZ credit hid the loss of purchasing power, and so hundreds of millions became slaves to debt.

Chris Duane documents this in terms that are easy for the generations who grew up with the Internet to understand, and unlike most who talk about this he notes the role feminists played. I will talk more about his efforts later. But there were many who gave warning decades ago, the most famous perhaps being Ron Paul. From feminism to the creeping erosion of our civil liberties to the fiat currencies that destroyed the middle class-a growing number of people who think of themselves as middle class are gradually waking up to the fact that they are not-it is all about dominance and control.

We might be tempted to dismiss this as a conspiracy theory, but after witnessing the blatant cronyism that is enriching the banksters at public expense, and in the States the laws that have rendered the US Constitution into little more than a now-meaningless historical artifact, is it really so hard to believe? The Patriot Act was only the beginning.

President Obama won the lawsuit over the provision in the 2012 National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) that allows the White House to indefinitely detain citizens without cause. The National Defense Resources Preparedness Executive Order (NDRP), which has been described as one of the biggest power grabs in history, gives unprecedented emergency powers to the White House. Right now the White House is working on another executive order to take control of the Internet. And the rationale used by Chief Justice John Roberts to decide in favor of the Individual Mandate in the Affordable Care Act by calling it a tax, gives the government the power to tax noncompliance, which effectively allows Congress to impose any kind of behavior they want. Conceivably, we could see the day when each American man is required to pay their spouse or girlfriend "wages for house work," and those who don't comply because they do not have a wife or girlfriend will be taxed for it.

The feminist hate movement's war on men is just one part of a larger assault on our freedom, civil liberties and the family. The feminist fear-mongers are merely puppets of people who are far more powerful…and dangerous. What, then, can we do? Before answering that question, we need to set our goals. What do we hope to accomplish?

Among factions of the MRM are some who believe patriarchy to be a natural part of the human condition. Therefore, they oppose women's liberation and believe the man should always be dominant and women belong in the home. In decades past, that view held more credence in the father's rights movement, which has led to a sometimes uneasy alliance between the FRM and MRM. But a single proposition might unite us, one that is fundamental to our contemporary view of liberty: freedom. The belief that every individual, male or female, should be free to make their own choices and to exercise those choices as far as their aptitude, abilities, determination and efforts will take them.

On a normal distribution curve of typical human choices, most women will gravitate toward investing less of their time in career and more family, while most men will gravitate toward emphasizing career above relationships. Some men and women, however, are better suited to and more inclined by their disposition, intelligence and abilities to make choices more typical of the opposite sex and they should be free to make those choices. This was the ideal millions believed were fundamental to feminism. As it turned out, we were wrong. But it is a goal worthy of the men's equalitarian movement.

Feminists, in one of their more bazaar displays of twisted logic, shrilly condemn as sexist MRAs who support equal freedom to choose, as John the Other's recent experiences with AVfM's posters demonstrate. No doubt, any increase in our efforts will be met with amplified attacks from the hate-male campaign, heightened resistance from the elite in the form of more restrictive laws, more onerous restrictions on our freedoms, and more pervasive condemnations that are as false as they are loud. These work against us.

The deteriorating global economy, on the other hand, can work in our favor. Revenue shortfalls will force governments to cut back on many programs, including those that supplant the male protector and provider roles. But opposition will remain fierce. So any MRAs who engage in the tactics common to mass movements, such as protest marches, posters, passing out pamphlets and even running websites like AVfM, Backlash, GWW, NCFM, Reddit, Spearhead and even Tom Leykis should be prepared for severe retaliation, including arrest, prison time, fines, job loss, loss of property and possibly worse.

Where does that leave us?

First, it is important to cultivate popular support. Demonstrations like Slut Walk and angry mobs like the Take Back the Night marches will not serve us. But good natured humor and fun can be our friends. In his seminal book, The True Believer, Eric Hoffer wrote, “Mass movements can rise and spread without belief in a God, but never without belief in a devil.” To consolidate their political gains feminists had to sustain their movement by fomenting hate. Without it, their movement would have petered out decades ago. We do not want to go down that road. We do not want the MRM to become a hate movement. But we have to recognize that accentuating the positive all by itself is insufficient and would be doomed to fail. Thus, we have to focus on the negative, too. But we can do it with humor rather than hatred. As I wrote several years ago, we should look for opportunities to “laugh like men at the New Rage women.”

This has great precedent. Jonathan Swift is famous for writing Gulliver’s Travels. He was also an essayist who wrote frequently about the social problems of the day, like the “Irish Problem.” Almost everything he wrote on that topic is of little interest, today. But most of us have at least heard of the biting satire he employed in his infamous essay, A Modest Proposal, in which he suggested that the Irish eat their young. The “Irish Problem” persisted, but few polemics had the impact of Swift’s political satire, and we can learn from his example.

Where the feminists have “Take Back the Night” marches, MRAs might hold “Take Back the Night Life” marches. “What do we want? To bogey! When do we want it? Now!” The character Al Bundy from Married With Children had “No Ma’am,” and there is now a No Ma’am blog. Similar tongue-in-cheek efforts could include PC Seldom’s Network to Eliminate Vaginally Elitist Rabble (NEVER). The slogans: “It’s NOW or NEVER” and “Not NOW!”

Other possible slogans?

Feminist Hate is Not Cost-Effective.

I wasn’t staring at your breasts. Why would I want to?

No I wasn’t raping you with my eyes, I was just trying to remember where I left my potassium nitrate.

A woman needs a feminist like a fish needs an enema.

A Man’s Body, A Man’s Life, A Man’s Money, A Man’s Choice.

I’ll pay for your pill when you pay for my beer.

Equal Work for Equal Pay.

Equal Time for Equal Crimes.

Sticks and Stones May Break Men’s Bones, but Only Words can Victimize a Feminist Forever

Math is Hard – Blaming Men is Easy.

Okay, I’m humor impaired, not very good at this and I may have stolen some of those, but you get the idea.

We also need to continue what so many of you are doing already to educate the public and create networks of fair-minded people who are fed up. Some of us already get into a lot of trouble simply for writing the truth, and aren't willing to take it to the next level and get ourselves arrested in acts of civil disobedience. And that's fine. A movement cannot progress without activists, but it cannot survive without advocates.

Finally, as I wrote a while back, we should all get rich. No, I'm not a gadfly spouting nonsense, I'm very serious about this, and spend several hours every week gathering and posting links on my backlash site to articles by financial and investment writers and analysts who give away a good 90 percent of their knowledge and information, and who sometimes even come right out and tell you the name of stocks that might very well make you rich. Not "pump n' dumps" stocks, either, but legitimate investments. Nor even just stocks. The prices of gold and especially silver are poised to go much higher. In fact, in his Sons of Liberty Academy series, Chris Duane argues that a time may come when you cannot buy silver with dollars at any price. He also makes a compelling case for why a time may come when you will be able to buy more than 40 acres of high quality rural property for only one ounce of silver. And so I strongly encourage you to go to YouTube and watch everything on the TruthNeverTold channel, and to enroll in his Academy. It's free.

We have very good reasons to focus on getting rich. Aside from the obvious–life is usually more comfortable, fun and secure when you're rich–being rich would provide us with the means to finance campaigns to counter the feminist hate and anti-male sexism. Think of all the programs on TV that promote negative stereotypes of men and the bias in the news media. Briefly, Spike TV held the hint of a promise to counter all of that. But it turned out to be just another distraction. What could we do to remedy that? Assuming that the Internet remains free enough–and in the US, Congress keeps trying to pass laws to take that away from us–we can use the decentralized nature of the web to overwhelm feminist hate content with something better.

There have been efforts to bring something better to television, like Aaron Sorkin's Studio 60, Joss Whedon's Firefly and Shawn Ryan's Lie To Me. All three portrayed women and men as basically decent human beings, and they celebrated real masculinity. Lie To Me even portrayed the lead character as a divorced dad dealing with sometimes difficult custody issues. Studio 60 and Firefly were cancelled after only one season. Lie To Me managed to hang on for three. All three shows defied politically correct orthodoxy, portrayed real masculinity in a positive light, and spit in the eye of the political elite. Assuming the web remains free enough, we could produce and "air" shows on the web that would not be subject to cancellation for not serving the interests of the powerful elite.

This is important. As wealthy activists we can mount large scale campaigns in the culture war and extend our reach to every feminist infestation. Where their goal is domination, ours is liberation. Where they malign and beat down, we enlighten and lift up. And where they only berate, we will also celebrate.

To those of us who have been paying attention, the war on men is but one front in a larger war on the middleclass, on freedom and liberty, and the effort to make us all slaves to debt. To counter this will require demonstrations and outreach, but we should be smart about it. We need to know and understand the full horror and true nature of the battle in which we are engaged. And to adequately respond, we should work to increase our wealth. So I urge you to visit Chris Duane's TruthNeverTold channel on YouTube. Of course, I would be happy if you visited my backlash site, where I post between 30 and 90 new links almost every day on politics, gender issues, health and getting wealthy. But if I could recommend only two sites, they would be AVfM and the Sons of Liberty Academy as the best to equip you to mount an effective campaign and to win the war of which most people are still largely unaware.

Judge Lori B. Jackson seeks to gag AVfM

As many of you who follow this site are aware, Lt. Col. Joel Kirk and his two minor children have been going through an unjust ordeal at the hands of the West Virginia Family Court presided over by Judge Lori B. Jackson.

In several articles published here, we have presented documentation of the abuse of those two children at the hands of their mother, Tina Taylor Kirk. We have also provided proof, through court documentation, that despite their mistreatment by a mentally unstable, alcoholic mother, that Jackson reversed a previous judge's ruling giving custody to their father, and instead issued an order that effectively gave full custody to their abuser. Simultaneously, Jackson issued a gag order on the video documentation of the children's abuse in order to keep it from public view.

It has been through the activism of AVfM's Judicial Accountability Committee (JAC), that the audio portion of that evidence, as well as all relevant court documents, have been made available to the public through the avoiceformen.com website.

In what we believe is an effort to reverse that activism, and censor free speech, an injunction was filed today with the intent of enjoining both Lt. Col. Kirk and avoiceformen.com from publishing any more references to the Kirk children, and compelling avoiceformen.com to remove materials already present on the site.

Download Injunction

The injunction was filed by Attorney Mary Snead, Guardian Ad Litem for the Kirk children in the divorce case.

At this point we can only speculate why Snead, who was the one who originally documented the ongoing abuse of the Kirk children by their mother, is now seeking to have that report gagged from public view.

Well, actually we can do a little more than speculate given the following actions by Judge Jackson.

In a stunning move, Jackson issued an order that Joel Kirk appear in her court this Thursday, October 4, 2012 at 9 A.M., effectively giving him two days to secure council to represent him there. We happen to know that Judge Jackson is aware that Lt. Col. Kirk's lawyer lives more than a two-hour drive from her court, and that the possibility of getting him there on such short notice would be near impossible. She also knows that there are few to no attorneys in Kirk's immediate area suitable to represent him in this matter.

In fact, she tips her hand and demonstrates this awareness in a handwritten note to Snead on the order, informing her that Kirk would be in court representing himself. She decided, before the hearing was even scheduled, that Kirk would stand before her without legal representation.

In other words, she is railroading Kirk into her court without representation so she can use the full authority of her position, unimpeded, to extract revenge against him for going public with his case.

Download Order

Similarly, Jackson also wants to intimidate AVfM into cowering and surrendering our rights to free speech, as well as freedom of the press.

We have no intention of allowing that to happen.

One thing appears abundantly clear. From a personal standpoint I will tell you, readers, that I no more believe that Mary Snead was the actual source of filing this injunction than bricks float. It is evident, in the power play of local politics, that Mary Sneed has been cornered and is now protecting her standing in her own peer group. I fully believe she acted under the direction of Judge Jackson, selling out the children she once tried to protect as Guardian Ad Litem, in order to comply with Jackson's wish to erase the public record of her malfeasance.

Dr. Tara Palmatier, who has done much research and writing on this story, had this to say:

Ms. Snead claims that publicizing this case is hurting the children. This is absurd. Snead (or Judge Jackson using Snead as her mouthpiece) is asserting that reporting the truth of the children's abuse by their mother is harming them, while neglecting the fact that what is most harmful to the children is their continued abuse by their mother. The logic is completely backwards.

The Kirk children already know the truth about their mother. They are being forced by Judge Jackson to live with their abuser every other week and full-time when their father is deployed. The truth is not hurting the children. Having to live with their abuser after telling Ms. Snead, their therapist and other evaluators the truth about being abused by her is what is hurting the children. Judge Jackson's malfeasance, incompetence and abuse of power are also hurting the Kirk children.

The only people being hurt by reporting the truth about this case are Judge Lori B. Jackson, Tina Taylor Kirk and her attorneys, Thomas G. Smith and Jamison Cooper. It wouldn't be the first time corrupt family court officials tried to silence the truth and protect themselves by dressing it up in "the best interests of the children."

If Judge Jackson truly cared about the welfare of these kids, she would not have given any custody beyond supervised visitation to their abuser. It is also very telling that Judge Jackson completely disregarded Ms. Snead's original incredibly damning report that full custody be awarded to the children's father, yet has made the time to haul the Lt. Col. into her courtroom in less than 48 hours at Ms. Snead's recommendation that the truth of Judge Jackson's rulings be suppressed. Very telling indeed.

As we have from the beginning, AVfM and the JAC will stand behind Lt. Col Kirk and his children. We have not been served any legal notice in accordance with due process and are currently under no obligation to remove or amend any material on this website.

If we do face any legal actions designed to censor our Constitutional right to free speech, we will fight it vigorously. We do not believe that a family court in West Virginia has the injunctive authority to censor a website in Texas for publishing properly redacted court documents even if it attempts to do so under the disingenuous guise of protecting children. Nor do we believe that any laws that may give them that authority are Constitutional.

This is a very important fight. The purpose of AVfM and the JAC is expose corruption and bias in our family courts. If that corruption is allowed to be cloaked from the public view, under the false auspices of protecting children those courts are actually harming, the battle could be lost.

We will provide more information and court documents as they become available.

[box type="alert" icon="none"]To all websites and bloggers. AVfM extends blanket permission to reprint all articles on this site associated with the Kirk story and to download and distribute all the supportive documentation. No need to ask. Just proceed with our thanks, and the knowledge that the truth about our family courts cannot be hidden from the public any more.[/box]

Also, the AVfM petition call for an impeachment hearing regarding Judge Jackson's conduct is nearing the 1,000 signature goal. There was never a more important time to sign if you have not already done so.

If you have signed, please post the petition to your facebook and other social networking pages, to your blogs and websites. There should be many thousands of signatures on this petition, and there will be if enough people of good conscience get involved.

I am Schrödinger's rapist

October 1, 2012 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

Note: "Schrödinger's rapist:or a guy's guide to approaching strange women without being maced" is reportedly written by a Phaedra Starling, who is said to be a Romance Novelist who also practices Jiu-Jitsu. Her essay has been fatuously praised and widely linked by "free thinking" bigots and others for the last few years and still enjoys a wide popularity. It is hard to find an essay more blatantly misandrist. But "Schrödinger's Rapist" is also something else that rarely gets pointed out: it is woman abuse.

I'll say it again so I'm absolutely clear: it is abuse of women. How so? Because it helps reinforce and ingrain an enculturated fear of men. In other words, even though all available evidence shows that men are as likely if not more likely to be the victims of violent assault, including sexual assault, and despite the mountain of data on women's violence against men and boys, this essay sends a relentless message that women should live in fear. Directly, this essay hurts all men and boys who read it and take it seriously. Indirectly, it hurts every woman who reads it and takes it seriously or, worst of all, teaches its message to her sons or daughters. For a logical takedown of this pretentious, irrational, bigoted essay, you might enjoy the analysis of it on YouTube by Mr. Shadowfax (here's Part 1 and here is Part 2). For a rightfully-mocking but complete reading, done perfectly in the style of typical Romance Novel melodrama, see this dramatic reading by The Critical G.

But personally speaking, I think nothing better illustrates this bit of bigoted bile than John The Other's below essay, which he narrates in video form. We hope Critical G and maybe others will also read John's essay. John is, after all, "The Other," and therefore not fully human.–Dean Esmay

Hello, average looking, aging, perimenopausal female hipster. Yes, you with the horn rim glasses. Yes those frames which were chic-retro back in the 90's – yes, you, the one drinking soy-milk latte and clutching a purse-sized single-use can of pepper spray in a white-knuckled grip behind your pant-leg. Yes, hello: I'm Schrodinger's rapist.

Now I know you're neurotic and probably taking mood stabilizing drugs, so you might be a little confused. I'm not an actual rapist–well, I might be–but what I mean to say is, I'm a man, and therefore, only a rapist in potential, since I haven't – you know, raped anyone – that you know of.

And after all, I'm a rather bland looking fellow, even though on the daytime TV you've allowed to shape so much of your concept of reality, they always seem to have an average looking actor playing the sexual predator role don't they? Your fear sells more nail polish, Paxil and granola bars than your confidence does.

Remember, I'm not a real man, I'm a probabilistic man. I'm a cloud of possibilities. So here's another possibility to consider: I'm a peaceful, loving, compassionate human being, and I'm an adult. And despite being subjected to more than a decade of physical, emotional and sexual abuse as a child, I am now totally repulsed by the prospect of violence and abuse – even your hypothetical, probabilistic speculations of violence and abuse.

Repulsed!

Remember, this is all just a cloud of probabilities. But maybe your obsession with your own imminent victimhood at the hands of a hypothetical rapist is not only uninteresting, it's repulsive. And your endless beating of that particular bongo drum makes you a repugnant and unwelcome presence in public life.

Yes, you, Miss LonelyHearts, you who have declared yourself my humble instructor – and who have given to my kindness to children and animals, and to my donations to charity, your approval.

First though, what part of appointing yourself my instructor and judge lead to you also declare yourself humble? What combination of diazapam, seraquel, lorazapam, trazadone and the four Grey Goose martinis you had at lunch led you to imagine your approval or your disapproval was of even slight interest to anyone?

Now, obviously, I don't dismiss out of hand your expressed concerns over the prospect of being the victim of a violent crime. As a man, even a mere "probabilistic" man, I'm sharply aware of the decades of collected statistical data on criminal victimization, and of just who is most likely to be be killed, beaten, stabbed, shot—or indeed, raped. And even you being in the least targeted demographic for every type of violent criminal victimization, I do understand your fear. I even recognize it being constantly fed to you by every single media channel you consume, because you spend more of everybody's money when you're stimulated to a state of high, permanent paranoia.

As a "hypothetical" man, I am a lot less frightened. But its not because I'm bulletproof or water resistant. It's not because I know jiu-jitsu, I don't. It's because I'm also a "hypothetical" adult who has – probably – taken ownership and responsibility for my emotions, and who has chosen, "probably," to not inflict my own stupid neuroses (of which I have many) onto every stranger I meet or pass in the lineup at Starbucks. You see, my instructor, you my judge, you my social arbiter of right and wrong, despite my statistical higher chance of becoming a victim of violence, my apparent lack of fear is my choice.

But enough about me. I am a mere cloud of possibilities to you. Let's return to you – you who have apparently now become a plurality–and let us return to your Royal second point.

Quoting you: you (by which you mean I) must be aware of what probable signals [I] am sending by [my] apparent appearance and the likely environment. We (by which you mean you) are going to be paying close attention to [my] probable appearance and behaviour and matching those signs to the Royal Plural's idea of a threat.

Aren't you, by which I mean, Your Majesties… by the way aren't we a little long in the tooth to be playing make-believe? I am an accommodating fellow, and honestly, who doesn't enjoy a little fantasy role-play every now and then to spice up an otherwise dreary day? Anyway, Your Majesties, you've even said yourself that "fortunately, [I'm] a good guy." At least, the Royal We seems to have already established that.

But now that I have been instructed that there's a problem, "I" am going to go out of "my" way to fix it. It, of course being the problem of your self selected identity as perpetual victim. Well, there's a possibility I might be willing to bend over backwards in accommodation of your choice to live in perpetual fear, and your choice to define every human being you meet into categories of "good, decent victims," and "probable evil rapists." But there's another possibility:

The other possibility, is that as a statistically as-yet undefined male human being, I am entirely unwilling to entertain or to lend support to a fantasy making human beings into enemies, into "others," into categories of "good people" and "bad people" based a facet of their biology.

It might be that a world of paranoia, fear, and hatred, with the arbiters of who is good and who is bad being childish, self-selected victims is not where I, even a hypothetical, statistically probable, possibility of a man – its not a world I want to entertain, or to indulge you in realizing.

It might be that your choice, to live in fear, is simply, your choice to live in fear, and that I will have to politely decline to come to that particular party.

Now, remembering I am no more than a mere possibility of a man, I've also only addressed only a part of my objection so far. But I have looked not only at the rhetoric, but at the actions of feminists, and I see a common theme between feminism and traditionalism. That theme is this:

Women define men.

And being an unrealized possibility of a man, your admonishment to me–a potential or probable man–what coalesces clearly is a hard line intention to define. Not just yourself as victim, but to define me as well.

No.

Did you hear me? No.

Here, you have exceeded your rights. Obviously, as a merely possible man, my potential is open, my self undefined. But it is mine to chose, not yours. Who or what I am, when realized, when observed, when I transit from probability to reality, that is mine. I will decide, you will not. I may, when I've done so, tell you who and what I am. However, I also might not, that is my choice as well.

Do not presume to trespass on my identity. It is my own.

But all of this is just a possibility, of course.

Hello, I'm Schrodinger's rapist.

The below is John's video of his essay. And because every single word of John's essay applies directly to me as well, I now also declare myself to be Schrödinger's Rapist, and will do my own reading of this essay at some point, as I could have written every word of it myself if I were as talented as John. Those who wish to do their own recordings, with due credit to John the Other and without modifying its content, are encouraged to do so. –Dean Esmay

October 1, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

AVfM Nullification Debate Part II

Johann the Cabbie from his first post:

> With the possible exception of the sexual molestation of a child, rape is a crime that evokes the most visceral of responses from the average person. And for good reason. Sex that is physically forced or obtained by threat of harm sadistically reduces victims to their most helpless state, and leaves lingering damage that may well last the remainder of a person's life.

So says Paul Elam in the opening of his article on jury nullification and rape. This quote, from a man who has publicly stated that it he ever found himself on a jury a rape case that he would vote to acquit no matter the evidence.

He has his reasons, but first, an introduction to jury nullification. Juries in America have the right to disregard the evidence presented and still vote to acquit an obviously guilty defendant. In the 1850's, many juries used nullification to disregard the Fugitive Slave Act. During Prohibition, juries frequently let bootleggers free.

Nullification also has had immoral applications, such as Southern juries refusing to convict white defendants for murders of black victims.

I could consider nullification myself in certain situations. For example, if I ever serve on a jury for any marijuana case, I'd vote to acquit despite the evidence. The government's prohibition of marijuana is wrong and immoral, so a vote for not guilty is necessary and proper.

Elam calls for nullification in rape cases, and he has pledged to vote to acquit on any case no mater the evidence. His reasons are twofold – America's corrupt criminal justice system and rape shield laws.

In his article, he lists the several processes in a rape case, from the police report to the trial, and details all the possible areas that mistakes can be made. He makes a compelling case, but he misses an important and obvious point.

The endemic problems with our criminal justice system do not pertain to rape cases only, but are problems in any type of case, whether it be murder, drugs, robbery, or whatnot. With the highest per capita prison population in the world, sloppy police work, over-zealous prosecutors, over-worked and under-paid public defenders, mandatory minimums, three strikes and you're out laws, a reliance on fallible eyewitness reports, coerced confessions, and a disgraceful class imbalance, America's justice system is woefully broken.

If Elam is to use America's broken system as a reason to call for nullification in rape cases, then why not at any criminal trial? Why not set murderers and robbers free along with the rapists?

And, that query brings us to Elam's second bit of reasoning – rape shield laws.

Elam defines rape shield laws well.

> Ostensibly, rape shield laws were enacted to limit a defendants ability to cross examine a plaintiff regarding her past sexual conduct, the logic being that such information is not only irrelevant, but might prejudice jurors. For instance, if it were brought out that a married woman alleging rape had engaged in extramarital affairs, it might cause a bias in some jurors that strongly disapprove of such behavior and prompt them to acquit her alleged assailant.

He goes on to say that such laws "seem reasonable," and he makes a poor attempt to disprove their reasonableness. His approach is to list two instances where rape shield laws were misapplied. That's all. He makes no attempt to argue against the value or use of the laws. Such an attempt would be doomed to failure, for rape shield laws are important and necessary. Sadly, we still live in a time where many potential jurors could be biased against a sexually promiscuous victim, and those biases could easily lead to the conclusion in the mind of a juror that "the slut deserved it." Back to my earlier query: why not vote to acquit in any and all criminal cases? Elam's reasoning is just as applicable in murder trials as it is in rape trials. But, no reasonable person would wish to set any and all defendants free.Jury duty is an important and difficult task. If called to serve, one must look at the evidence carefully, disregard emotion and visceral reactions, and determine the facts as best as possible. If reasonable doubt exists, then by all means, acquit.

But, if a defendant is obviously guilty, a refusal to convict is morally unjustifiable.

Elam Responds

First, a public thank you to Johann the Cabbie for contributing to this debate, and for his willingness to stand up to "gender" ideologues who have tainted the rational thought community with dogma of late, treating legitimate debate as an anathema — while surrendering all pretense of objectivity to feminist ideology.

I think we will see, however, during the course of this debate, that it is not just feminism that is the problem here. While Johann rejects the irrational and convoluted sycophancy of individuals like Matt Dillahunty, and even seems to understand the etiology of the problem, he also engages in a similarly robotic mentality when making his critique of jury nullification in the case of rape.

This is most plainly obvious in his concluding statement:

> But, if a defendant is obviously guilty, a refusal to convict is morally unjustifiable.

The entire nullification argument hinges completely on the idea that obvious guilt is unattainable under the current system, specifically where "rape shield laws," are concerned.

To ascertain guilt, relevant evidence must be weighed. If the accurate weighing of that evidence is not possible because relevant facts have been intentionally omitted, it amounts to nothing more than a magic show; smoke and mirrors from which no true picture can be gleaned. In that scenario, a fair trial is not possible. It is as easy to understand as it is logical.

Translation of Johann's concluding remark*: Yes, I just watched Mr. Teller saw Mr. Penn in half, with my own eyes. Mr. Teller is obviously guilty of people sawing. To say otherwise would be immoral.*

Another part of his rebuttal depends on the implied fallacy that the problems with rape trials are essentially indistinguishable from the problems with other criminal prosecutions:

> The endemic problems with our criminal justice system do not pertain to rape cases only, but are problems in any type of case, whether it be murder, drugs, robbery, or whatnot.

This is just one of many non sequiturs in his argument, and it reveals a glaring failure to understand what rape shield laws are and what they actually do. There is no logical reason, in the face of the evidence, to lump all other criminal court proceedings in with rape trials. They are conducted differently, which is the point of this debate.

All Johann has done here is to momentarily pretend that the rape shield laws he was already minimizing now don't exist at all. Rape trials are just like all other trials, and I am heartbroken over the horrific death of Mr. Penn.

When Johann does take on the rape shield issue more directly, he mounts an unsupported, somewhat emotional defense for the existence of those laws, but fails to rigorously examine, and indeed summarily dismisses, their deleterious effects on the rights of the defendant. Said the Cabbie:

> His [Elam's] approach is to list two instances where rape shield laws were misapplied. That's all. He makes no attempt to argue against the value or use of the laws.

First, whether laws are "misapplied" is only a matter of legal opinion at the moment, usually of one person. If the defendant is too poor to mount a challenge to the application of the law, then he is screwed. We will never know how many men are in prison right now because of "misapplied" laws that should not have been written in the first place.

If a bad law does not exist, it cannot be misapplied. I am sure that Johann would consider a marijuana case in the same light, as would I.

Johann was unsurprisingly critical of my position that rape shield laws were unreasonable, and asserts that "he [Elam] makes a poor attempt to disprove their reasonableness."

There are two important things here. One, the lack of reason (though unreasonable they are) in these politically motivated laws is not so much the issue as is their impact on due process. The moment we systematically deny a defendant the right to include evidence casting legitimate concern on the veracity of an accuser, or on possible motive to fabricate, we have not only denied them a Constitutionally guaranteed fair trial, but we have also eviscerated any opportunity to hold credible the evidence required to conclude guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

More on that in a moment (as if I have not said it enough), but the other fact here is that rape shield laws are not necessary to address the concerns proffered by Johann to begin with. That is right. Even if you take the protection of alleged female victims to be more important than due process, it was still never necessary. Johann states in his rebuttal:

> Such an attempt [to argue against rape shield laws] would be doomed to failure, for rape shield laws are important and necessary. Sadly, we still live in a time where many potential jurors could be biased against a sexually promiscuous victim, and those biases could easily lead to the conclusion in the mind of a juror that "the slut deserved it."

Let me take the more obvious point first, and this also directly applies to Johann's assertion that the problem is not rape shield laws, but their proper application. Trials, at least those previous to rape shield laws, involve the examination of all relevant evidence. Federal Rule of Evidence 402 declares that irrelevant evidence is inadmissible. Federal Rule of Evidence 401 defines relevant evidence as "evidence having any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence more probable or less probable than without the evidence."

Information that is not relevant, as in the scenario presented by Johann, does not require rape shield laws to be excluded from a case. Let me repeat that. Information that is not relevant does not require rape shield laws to be excluded from a case.

Parts of a woman's sexual history may or may not be relevant to a case. If a woman who was allegedly raped also happened to have 80 or 90 previous sexual partners, then that would be subject to being excluded from evidence on the basis of relevance. Being promiscuous is not evidence having any tendency to make any fact of consequence more or less probable.

If however, she had a long pattern of making false accusations against lovers she was angry with, as we saw in the Marv Albert case, then that is relevant as it goes to credibility. Had there been no rape shield law there to prompt that judge to rule against that evidence, Albert would very likely have been exonerated, as most everyone involved in the case thought he should have been.

As we saw with both the cases of Marv Albert and Oliver Jovanovic, relevant, exculpatory evidence was deemed inadmissible directly due to rape shield laws, and it cost both of those men severely, while protecting and enabling two known false accusers.

Simply allowing judges to do their jobs in the same way they do all other criminal matters is the reasonable solution to that problem in a world where no perfect solutions exist. But reasonable solutions have had little chance in an arena now governed by sexual politics. Forcing judges to play political football with court rulings does not help facilitate fair trials.

There is a larger, and I would say fatal problem here with Johann's argument. His insistence on the legitimacy and need for rape shield laws is contingent on the fear that promiscuous women, or women who are portrayed as promiscuous will be penalized due to sexual bias in the jury.

But what of the prejudices that affect men in rape trials?

Take a look at the public reaction in the early days of the Duke Rape case, and Hofstra, and the endless string of men like Kobe Bryant and Dominique Strauss-Kahn who have been demonized and subjected to virtual public lynching by false accusations — because the prevailing public sentiment is to summarily convict men before a trial even happens.

You want to talk bias?

Let's do, and first by stating flatly that sexual bias, which largely favors perceived female victims, does not suddenly evaporate with a jury summons.

If Johann the Cabbie is concerned with the impact on rape cases caused by sexual bias, why is he not advocating for rape shield laws, for the accused?

I will tell you why. It is because he is affected by the same one dimensional, irrational and lopsided thinking that afflicts Matt Dillahunty, just to a slightly lesser degree. He has surrendered reason for rote protective instinct that has no place in our criminal justice system where life and liberty depend on thoughtful analysis and an unfettered pursuit of the facts.

He sees women as primarily victims, in need of special treatment, yet he offers not one shred of evidence of why that special treatment is necessary, effective, reasonable or consistent with Constitutional demands. And he does not even speculate what the real impact of those special rules might be on the people they most affect.

Sound familiar?

Justin Vacula loves Satan and eats kittens

October 2, 2012 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

We were recently shocked and appalled to learn that atheist blogger and secularist political activist Justin Vacula was associated with the grotesque, hideous, deplored-by-all-decent-humans site known as A Voice for Men. This site, run by unapologetic Harrison Ford fan and practitioner of the dark art of psychology Paul Elam, is a steaming cauldron of woman-hating, cheese grating, rape culture, grape vultures, spouse beating, kitten eating, and more. Possibly worst of all, while it has yet to be proven definitively, there is substantial reason to believe that the site harbors among its contributors and commenters unapologetic philatelists and numismatists.

Being patriotic, God-fearing Americans (and patriotic God-fearing America-lovers from Australia, Canada, the UK, and other parts of the world), we believe strongly that the likes of Justin Vacula, who published an obscene, disgusting essay suggesting that some people calling themselves feminists are known to practice censorship, should not be allowed to work side-by-side with the decent God-fearing folk at the Secular Coalition for America.

The truth of the matter is, as everybody at the Secular Coalition for America should know, Justin Vacula has a last name that rhymes with "Dracula" and as such is a very obvious tool of Satan. And in case my fellow Christians who tremble in fear of The Lord in all his Holy Wrath have any doubts, I wish to reveal that last night Our Lord shared with me a Holy Vision:

Jesus Himself personally came to me in a dream to reveal that he can't stand that fucker Vacula. Further, Jesus told me that if America is to get back to being the kind of place the Founding Fathers envisioned when they copied the words of the Declaration of Independence and the U.S. Constitution word-for-word out of The Holy Bible, and get back to determining all our laws by the Writ of Divine Law and Patriarchy Theory, we must oust anyone who would dare to question Holy Feminist Dogma on any significant matter in any forum, but most especially from a site full of kitten-eating philatelists like A Voice for Men.

Then in that same holy vision, my brothers and sisters at the Secular Coalition for America, I must tell you that Satan himself appeared to me and, laughing maniacally, said "you cannot stop me! My agent Justin Vacula will destroy all white privileged heterosexual females who call themselves feminists. And eat kittens while doing it!"

"GET THEE BEHIND ME SATAN!" I screamed, clutching my copy of The Feminine Mystique in one hand and the Holy Bible (King James Version of course) in the other, and used them to beat Satan and his dark minion, John the Other, away. Both disappeared in a puff of smoke, but their laughter still echoes in my ears. My spine is shivering even now brothers and sisters, EVEN NOW! So I know what we must do, and I know you do too!

Secular Coalition for America, you love Jesus don't you? Well Jesus loves kittens, and every time Justin Vacula speaks at a Secular Coalition for America event, or on behalf of the Secular Coalition for America, he eats a kitten! And Satan does too!

You love Jesus just as much as I do I'm sure. Or at least you love kittens, don't you? Don't you? Well the fact is that the people at A Voice for Men don't just eat kittens, they put kittens in blenders and make kitten smoothies! Paul Elam told me so himself! And serves them over ice with his friend Justin Vacula, who sucks them down while kicking puppies!

Here at A Voice for Men, we would never associate with any group that would have anything to do with a disgusting kitten-eating Jesus-hating web site, a site that is known to criticize feminists and conservative traditionalists alike, such as A Voice for Men. No decent human being at all should associate with this site–ever! Especially the Secularist Coalition for America, which stands for the fundamental values we all hold most sacred and holy!

We thus urge all readers to sign this petition, put together by privileged white woman Stephanie Zvan, to immediately ban Justin Vacula from the Secular Coalition for America. If you love America, if you love Jesus, and especially if you love kittens, I say you have no choice but to immediately sign!

I was delighted to see that they allow anyone who signs to comment on why this issue is important to them. Here is what I said when I proudly signed it:

"As Managing Editor of A Voice for Men, I am shocked and appalled whenever anyone associates themselves with a disgusting site full of kitten-eaters and philatelists like A Voice for Men. Ban Justin Vacula from SCA, in Jesus' name amen!"

I urge all readers of this web site to sign this petition immediately. I also note that you are allowed to leave a comment saying why this is important to you, so I suggest that you may wish to add the following reasons for your support:

"Because Jesus hates Justin Vacula."

"Vacula rhymes with Dracula and is thus a tool of Satan."

"Feminism is holy dogma and should never be questioned by any decent God-fearing folk. God bless the USA!"

"No feminist should ever be criticized about anything, ever! Misogyny!"

"God told the Holy Prophets we will never get back to America's true purpose in spreading the Holy Gospel of Patriarchy Theory if we don't ban Vacula from SCA!"

You may of course add your own reasons, but we suggest keeping them tasteful and focused on the fact that Justin Vacula is a kitten-eating tool of Satan who is hated by Jesus. Because that, I think, is the take-home message we can all agree on.

PS: Satan's Minion John the Other also endorses signing the petition. We think this is his effort to trick you into not-signing. Don't be fooled by his demonic trickery! Sign the petition NOW!, and get all your friends to do so. And please feel free to share in the comments here the reason you gave for signing, just as I did, so the God-fearing folk at SCA will know that we totally support the privileged middle class white women of the SCA who are offended when someone dares to be critical of another privileged middle class white woman in America! (Did I say privileged? I meant oppressed middle class white woman. I think. Well either way, does it matter? There are kittens at stake!)

Kirk recusal motion in West Virginia Supreme Court

There are more developments to report in the case of Lt. Col. Joel Kirk, whose ongoing struggle with the family court in Harrison Country, West Virginia, has now come to involve the State of West Virginia Supreme Court.

Yesterday, Lt. Col. Kirk, who is embroiled in a long running custody dispute, filed a pro se (self-represented) motion with the family court of Judge Lori B. Jackson, containing a motion for a continuance on the grounds that he was given insufficient notice to find representation on a hearing scheduled for tomorrow. The hearing was scheduled after the Guardian Ad Litem for the children of the Kirk marriage, Mary Snead, filed for an injunction to prevent Lt. Col. Kirk and avoiceformen.com from releasing court documents pertaining to the Kirks' children.

Kirk was given two days notice of the hearing and lives in a rural area with limited legal resources.

The motion also contained a request for Judge Jackson to recuse herself from the case due to possible bias she may have related to coverage of the case.

Judge Jackson subsequently passed the motion to the West Virginia State Supreme Court for an opinion on the recusal.

This leaves the case in limbo until Chief Justice Menis Ketchum returns from a leave to rule on the recusal motion.

More details will be posted as they are reported to AVfM.

25 ways to make a shame sandwich

October 3, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

I haven't visited the pages of the Good Men Project in quite a while. After all, why should I? I can go a lot of places and order a male-shame sandwich. And unlike GMP, there are a lot of places that will tell me that is what they are serving without trying to disguise it as something else.

But, this morning, I got one of their site emails, and then I made two mistakes. First, I read it. Second, I clicked on a link that was inside. Note to self: Drink both cups of java before dealing with emails in the morning, Paul.

BOTH. OF. THEM.

Perhaps if I had done that, I would not have stupidly clicked on a link and started reading the article 25 Ways to Redefine the Phrase 'Man Up,' by Carlos Andrés Gómez. Perhaps I would not be sitting here with firsthand knowledge of 25 ways to pull your fucking hair out by the roots.

Yes, it is that bad. And gentlemen, consider this a trigger warning. If you already have a receding hairline, don't go to GMP and read that article unless you want to expedite the inevitable.

To begin with, Gómez can't make it through the first paragraph of his preamble without stepping on his dick(eww, how sexist!). In his introduction to how he wants to reclaim and redefine the term 'man up,' he says:

> Almost uniformly, the phrase's meaning has remained the same—a guy isn't "acting like a man" or "man enough" so he is belittled and shamed.

Then he sets about giving you 25 ways you are supposed to behave, or you are not a man.

You just gotta love GMP, don'tcha?

As we sometimes do here at A Voice for Men, conspicuously not named The Voice for Men, it is time to provide yet another public service. Following are the 25 ways that Carlos Andrés Gómez wants to tell you to be a man. We post them here under fair use guidelines. Note, the print in standard font is taken directly from Gómez' article. What you see in italics is the red pill translation of what it actually means, courtesy of this writer.

Be a Peacemaker: Whether it's out at the club on a Saturday night, an afternoon on the block, or at your family reunion, diffuse conflict and be an advocate for the bigger picture. Because what you are as a man, without intervention, is a troublemaker. That is why all you see among non Gómez'd men is conflict and strife. Why, a fella can't even go to church or the grocery store without a brawl ensuing. Just last week I was standing in line for a movie ticket. There was a man next to me. I punched him, cause that is what we do.

Leave the Tears on your Face: Have the courage to express your emotions publicly and unapologetically; it lets younger guys know it's okay to have emotions and be sensitive. After all, look at how emotionless and cold non Gómez'd men are. Think Keating, Steinbeck, Henley, B.B. King, Gandhi, Gibran, Rumi, Whitman, Yeats, Elliot, Kristofferson, Tennyson, Schweitzer and countless others. We will worry later about a world blind to the millions of tear-stained faces of men and boys that are out on display right now for men like Gómez to smugly ignore while he lectures us on matters of the heart and manhood.

Communicate: Openly, humbly, vulnerably, and constructively. Even when you're scared. Even when it's really hard. It's always better than the alternative. See the list on the last item. Read it a few more times if you have to. And then inform the men in the men's movement how people will listen, when they express their pain, and their indignation, when they actually dare to speak on their own behalf. And go to the GMP and read through the countless examples of how that publication humiliates them for it.

Get an Environmentally-Friendly Car (or Bike!): Break a heavy-handed male stereotype, respect planet Earth, and save money on gas. And vote for Obama, and donate to NOW and recycle your trash. Break the heavy-handed male stereotype and buy a Prius! God knows there are no women driving SUV's to the fucking mall.

Be a Great Parent: Try your best, actively listen, teach them all you know, read to them, hug them, tell your kids how much they mean to you. Because we all know that the male standard is to be a shitty father. As a non Gómez'd man, you know it's true. You don't hug your kids, or tell them they are important any more than you break your fucking back to provide for them. Yes, read to them, and not from your porn collection you fucking disgusting pervert!

Forgive: Whether it's the jerk on the L train or your father, make peace and let go. Now there is a piece of sex specific advice! Be a man and forgive, because non Gómez'd men are full of resentment. You can learn how from women, and male feminists. They never hold grudges, not even for shit that happened (or supposedly happened) two thousand years ago.

Seek Help: Same rule applies to directions, carrying a massive oak table, and emotional baggage—it's okay to not do it alone. In fact, we're all better off when we don't. Oh, no sexist stereotypes here, right?

Cook: Embrace the joy and fulfillment of watching a plate of food you made light up a person's face. Yes, of course. Quit yammering for your woman to make you a sammich and get your ass in the kitchen! After all, men don't know how to cook, right? We all have women making all our meals, right? Right?

Embrace Fear: Many of the most profound breakthroughs can happen when we face fear head-on and stop running. That's right, you scaredy cats, man up and face your fears! You guys in the coal mines, quit being such pussies and face your fears! You, too, cops and soldiers and crab fishermen and truck drivers and firemen and high rise window washers. Stop running and man up! That goes double for you MRAs! Quit pussying out and face your fears of a society that rejects you for daring to stand up for yourself. Oh wait, a bunch of you are already doing that. Never mind.

Spend Quality Time with your Family: Put down the paper, turn off the smart phone and go play in the backyard. And quit watching sports and having your own friends. Lay off the personal interests that make any small part of your life your own and that take your attentions away from those that need you to be mindlessly selfless. Just work and spend every other waking moment on anyone but you. Then apologize for working so much, and then go back to work and then spend some more quality time taking care of everyone, then apologize for not doing that well enough. Now that is manhood — Gómez style!

Change a Diaper: Embrace the gift of being able to change a diaper for your child or baby sibling. It's a memory you will always have. Shitty diapers fall under the quality time section above.

Be Flexible: Men are endlessly stereotyped as not being able to adapt—channel your inner Lao Tzu and accept what you can't control, while joyously swimming in whatever current has swept you up. But don't be flexible enough to challenge this bullshit, or to notice that Gómez is stereotyping you as inflexible even as he is calling the inflexibility a stereotype. Just be flexible enough to come home and change diapers after 10 hours on a road crew.

Be Responsible: Whether it's volunteering to be the designated driver, babysitting your little cousin or managing your money, recognize that your precious gift of a life comes with necessary responsibility. Do more! Do more! Do more! Now sit up! Roll over! Beg! Goooooood boy! Sorry, I meant Gooood man!

Lead with Your Heart: Have the courage to show how much you care—about your family and friends but also whatever you're passionate about. Just make fucking well sure that whatever you are passionate about involves changing diapers, giving up your interests and acting like a trained seal clapping for a piece of fresh mackerel. Then don't bitch when you don't get it.

Advocate for Women: Standing up for your mama, sister, and niece, that's the easy part. But what about that stranger your friend is ogling right now? That's right, fuck your father, your brother and nephew. Most of all fuck you. Now go shame that stranger for looking at a woman and having sexual thoughts.

Support the LGBT Community: We're so much better than belittling others for who they love or how they identify their gender. Be sure you do this between changing diapers and cooking for someone else. But remember, only support gay men as long as they follow the feminist dictum to hate men like you and reject everything you stand for. Those that don't are just limp wristed faggots and you can rag on them all you want.

Be Gentle: Sometimes the greatest power exists in a warm hug or soft whisper… other times, simply in a smile. Yes, be gentle, with everyone but yourself. Treat others with tenderness, even as they shame you into compliance with their perceived needs and whims. Be nice to the gender ideologue that sees you as an appliance, and accessory in the lives of others. Blow them kisses and think only warm and fuzzy thoughts. If you must vomit, do so with care and tenderness.

Mentor a Child: Organizations like Big Brothers Big Sisters are always looking for more male mentors, especially men of color. Giving up a couple afternoons a month could literally change a kid's a life for the better. Give, give, give! More, more, more! Teach young boys, by your life's example, to be just as disposable and utilitarian as you are. That is what real men do. And while you mentor young girls, first take care not to sexually molest them. Then give them an example of just how useful you and all men should be for the duration of their lives.

Be Humble: Be brave enough to follow someone else's lead. Recognize that you're part of a much bigger purpose than just you. After all, isn't everything in the world bigger than just you? You will find that groveling and humility go hand in hand. Or was that humiliation? Whatever.

Be Healthy: Exercise, eat healthy, get good sleep, lower your stress, and prioritize happiness. How you do this in a life you don't own is your problem to fix. But fix it you must. To serve others in the Gómez way, you must be healthy enough to carry their weight, your own, and the weight of anyone else in your vicinity, especially those with a vagina. Remember, "prioritize happiness" is not referring to yours. Don't be so fucking selfish!

Hold Yourself Accountable: Don't be too proud to say when you're wrong or take responsibility when you make a mistake. And remember, you are always the one that is wrong. Insinuating that someone else is wrong is a form of abuse. There is an easier way to break this down. You don't have to take responsibility when you make a mistake if you get it right from the beginning that you are a mistake.

Value your Partner's Sexual Needs: Make it a priority to respect and honor your partner's sexual boundaries and celebrate satisfying his or her sexual needs. If you have made it this far down this list and you still have to have this explained to you, then you are really fucking stupid. Remember, as a mere man, your sexual needs and satisfaction mean nothing. Take care of her. Just like in everything else you do in life. Just pretend you're a kitty cat and you have swallowed a her ball. You don't have a purpose, you have a herpose. It's not service, it's hervice. Are you getting Gómez'd yet?

Play, Everyday: I'm not talking about Playstation or X Box here, I mean play. Indulge your imagination and your curious heart. Playing keeps us alive, creative, present, and youthful. And, in the right hands, obedient and controlled. We must be careful to clarify. It is not what you think is play. You must indulge your imagination and curious heart to think of ways to play that are not what you would choose if you just wanted to have some fun.

Say "I Love You": Say it to your male friends, female buddies, family, or whoever is most special to you in your life. Let them know how much they mean to you. You never know when it might be your last chance to do so. Just don't say it to yourself.

Recognize that You Are Enough: This world tries to fool us into believing that we were all born inadequate. Love what you got. Celebrate and cherish it. Know that you are beautiful, important, irreplaceable, and powerful. Just as long as your entire life has nothing to do with your wants, needs, ambitions, aspirations, interests or happiness. Recognize that you are enough as long as you are enough to satisfy someone else's wishes. In one of the greatest ironies of life, a strange truth appears. You are enough, as long as you are nothing to yourself.

Twenty-five ways to rephrase 'man up'; to redefine it? How about 25 ways to put a feminist spin on the same, tired old message, pouring salt in every wound created by every bullshit stereotype ever imagined about men and masculinity? How about 25 newfangled ways to control through shame and belittlement?

And how about one 'fuck you' in response.

Never trust anyone who tells you how to be a man. Ever. For any reason. Never even trust anyone who puts an adjective in front of the word. It is all about control and it always was, whether it comes from the mouth of some alpha wannabe that needs to instruct others on how to self destruct, or from a sensitive new age sycophant that is looking to get approval and admiration from women at the expense of his fellow man.

If you are male, you're a man. Anyone else who tries to tell you otherwise is deluded. We may strive to be better human beings, but it has nothing to do with manhood. Neither does this list of 25 sales pitches. Carlos Andrés Gómez isn't even talking to you. He is talking to the women that read GMP. And he is talking shit.

Second motion to gag AVfM filed

Tina Taylor Kirk and her team of pro bono attorneys have filed yet another motion regarding the information published on A Voice for Men about the Kirk vs Kirk divorce and custody dispute.

This motion references the fact that we have expressed the opinion on these pages that Ms. Kirk is an "abusive alcoholic." While this is unfortunately embarrassing for Ms. Kirk, it is nonetheless a conclusion rooted in the well documented fact that she abuses her children and drinks heavily. Her intoxicated, abusive rampages have been extensively recorded on audio and video. Her behavior was also reported by the children to the court, who also informed the court of the many occasions Ms. Kirk drove with them in the car while impaired from drinking.

Ms. Kirk submitted evidence to the court that she was undergoing treatment for her drinking during the trial. She was also ordered to place a breathalyser interlock on her personal vehicle by the first judge on the case. Ms. Kirk removed that device without permission from the court and was held in contempt.

And now Ms. Kirk, through her attorneys, is asserting the idea that making this information available to the public is damaging to her, and to her children…the same children she has been documented to abuse while drinking, and the same children who Judge Lori B Jackson has ordered into continued vulnerability from their abuser.

Ms. Kirk's attorneys also contend that AVfM releasing the fact that Ms. Kirk has been diagnosed with Borderline Personality Disorder "is an invasion of her privacy, embarrassing and has the ability to tarnish her reputation on a global scale."

They also express concerns over the privacy of the children.

AVfM's position on this matter remains unchanged. The information and documents published on this site were transmitted to AVfM legally, and now that they are in our possession, publishing them is a Constitutionally protected act. The family court presided over by Judge Lori B. Jackson does not possess the injunctive authority to instruct us to stop publishing the documents or to remove anything that is already on the site. We will vigorously defend against any attempt by the state to censor us or otherwise interfere with our Constitutional freedoms. And we will publicize those efforts on this website and other places as they happen.

The overarching concern in this matter is that the children remain in the unsupervised care of an individual who has routinely inflicted emotional, psychological and physical abuse on them.

While the public display of this family's misfortunes is uncomfortable, it could have been avoided with responsible decisions by either the court or the children's mother, or both. Had the court, including the court appointed Guardian Ad Litem, followed the mandates of West Virginia statutes governing family courts by immediately reporting the abuse to children's protective services, and by moving expeditiously and decisively to act in the children's best interest, this scenario could have been avoided.

However, competent decisions made in the children's best interest have still not been made, and they remain vulnerable to the abuse the court was supposed to stop.

We find it incredible that this is also the court now entertaining motions to instruct AVfM to stop publicizing the plight of these children.

The West Virginia Record has also begun reporting on this story, indicating it may be gaining traction in other media outlets.

Judge Lori Jackson & the 1st amendment

Bwahahaha! A judge who appears to have never heard of Freeedom of the Press.

Yes, your Dishonor, please, do seek to enjoin us to take down the information which proves that you sent children to live with a mentally ill, violent child abuser. Also, while you're at it, please issue us an order to stop saying mean things about you, you incompetent idiot who almost certainly shook your law degree out of a crackerjack box. Please feel free to add me to your court order by name, you incompetent, child abuse enabling baboon. I'll make sure copies of your order get published prominently everywhere, along with my opinions on what I think about your order, Your Dishonor.

Lori, your husband is best buddies with the lawyer of the child abuser you recently forcibly sent children to live with, and you yourself are reportedly family friends with the child abuser's best friend. Does this have any bearing on the fact that, despite the children telling multiple agents of the court that she beat them with a belt with metal buttons, tore out their hair, and regularly screamed at them such that they hid from her on an almost daily basis, you intentionally ignored their best interests and expressed desires? I'm not surprised you're embarrassed to see all this in public, or that you're embarrassed that everyone can see the fact that you discarded all the recommendations from multiple professionals and officers of the court, or the fact that under West Virginia law the children are old enough to testify on their own behalf but you refused to allow them to do so even though they were right there and wanted to talk to you. All to protect your friends and family, right? What's a little child abuse between friends? Especially if a woman commits it, she probably had her reasons right?

I'm also sure you're embarrassed that we're exposing the fact that you're now pressuring their Guardian Ad Litem to file motions that include hand-written notes from yourself trying to force the children's father to be represented without counsel. You pathetic excuse for a human being who should never be allowed to sit on any bench outside of a public park. It's amusing that even being pressured by you to fill out this motion, the Guardian Ad Litem dropped the fact that she thinks the children have already suffered terrible abuse and that exposing their suffering to the public, which you have enabled, may just make things worse.

Yeah, worse how? Except for you, you lizard in a black robe.

For residents of Harrison County, West Virginia, who may have accidentally voted for the child-abusing judge Lori B. Jackson, please read this, then listen to this, then, if you would, sign this.

And if you don't live in West Virginia, please feel free to listen, read, and sign anyway. Even if the Dishonorable Lori B. Jackson isn't impeached (which she very well might be), we will make sure Harrison County voters know all this when it's re-election time for you, dear sweet child-abusing Judge Lori B. Jackson of Harrison County West Virginia.

If anyone wants more details, feel free to read this and this and this.

MRA London group has begun activism

October 5, 2012 | by Elly Tams | Link | Original Link

I am delighted to tell the readers/members of A Voice For Men that MRA London is up and running.

In addition to the MRA London Blog, a group of about six to eight people – men and women – have begun meeting regularly in central London over the last couple of months. Although the discussions have been interesting and people have come up with some promising ideas, up until this week we had not done any practical activism. The 'A' in MRA is there for a reason!

So on Wednesday October 3rd the first MRA action took place. As you can see, it involved a 'scale' of a statue and producing publicity for men's rights and A Voice For Men. The statue is in Westminster, right next to the Houses of Parliament, and it is of Emmeline Pankhurst, a key member of the Suffragettes movement. The banner that MRA London activists Archi, Rod, Andy and others put up reads: 'Don't blame me for Harriet Harman'! You may know Harman as one of the Featured Bigots at AVFM. As Harman's AVFM profile says:

'Her main tactic throughout her career has been to tell women persistently that they are forever being abused and cheated by men (sexually, financially, emotionally, physically etc) and that if they support her, she can protect them from these wicked men. Many of the highly unjust anti-male laws that now exist not only in the UK, but across the western world, are the direct result of her deceits and her dishonesty.'

Here is a link to the reprimand from a judge for Harman's misrepresentation of UK rape statistics. There is a bit more information about the MRA action on the AVfM Forums.

Whilst there are arguments to be had about the validity and politics of the Women's Suffrage Movement, the London MRA 'stunt' highlights how the UK government over the years has turned a concern for 'women's rights' into misandry and anti-men laws.

As an ex feminist woman, I am pleased to have discovered the MRA London group very welcoming. This is a message worth telling, not only to MRAs worldwide but also to feminists and those who join them in painting MRA as a "misogynist" and "anti-women" movement. So far, I have found the opposite to be true. If only we could say the same about feminism and misandry!

The next MRA London meeting is Tuesday 16th October, 2pm at Royal Festival Hall South Bank, London. For more details email me at quietriotgirltwitter@gmail.com

A quote from MRA London: Men die at an earlier age than women (partly due to lower health spending and more hazardous jobs) but must wait longer to receive a pension.

Fathers are treated as passing guests in their own families. Children generaly go to the mother on divorce and child support almost always goes the same way. Children are treated as posessions to be argued over rather than human beings who love both their parents.

Men are discriminated against in the income tax, benefits and housing systems. Child benefit is paid to the mother by default regardless of which parent cares for the child. Men are typically sent to prison for twice as long as a woman for the same crime and women are given preference to men in all forms of government employment except for the most dangerous such as the armed forces. You need only visit a government office to know this is true.

The media and education system like to pretend men are useless. Is it a surprise that so many boys and young men kill themselves or simply give up? –Dean Esmay

Domestic violence: The real victims

October is Domestic Violence Awareness Month. Many of the old timers here will remember when I had a debate on DV before this site enjoyed the traffic it does today. I wrote a piece after that debate that I want to resurrect as my contribution to help raise awareness of the issue. We have so little of that these days. I am trusting some of you may not yet have read it, so I am hoping it will provide some food for thought, and something to pass on to other venues this month. PE

For those of you who have read my short bio, you know that I became involved in men's activism because of misandry in the mental health field, where I worked as an addictions counselor for 20 years. The recent DV debate hosted on this site took me back a few years to some very familiar arguments that were commonplace with my peers when I was counseling.

That feminist I debated with reminded me of the ideologues with which I used to work. What he does not know, and doesn't want to know about the subject could fill Lake Superior. And despite his allegations of indifference, even sadistic enjoyment on my part about violence against women, his knowledge about me is equally lacking.

In the world of drug addicts and alcoholics, violence in the home is as common as lost jobs, DUI's and a litany of other life problems. And my experience in dealing with it leaves an impression in my mind vastly different than you see broadcast in public service announcements, and what you hear from gender activists that make their bread and butter from the problem.

Somewhere in all of us, I think, by virtue of systematic brainwashing, is the idea that domestic violence is epitomized by a frail and battered woman, quietly weeping and huddled in a dark corner. We have been trained, through the hypnotic repetition of misinformation, to conjure the image of male monster driven by the insatiable need for control, pummeling his wife or girlfriend because her independence threatens him.

Do such monsters exist? Certainly. I have spoken with many of them. Some are guilt ridden over their actions, some are sociopathic and unrepentant, rationalizing that their misdeeds are justified. All of them are wrong.

But of course to be fair, and more importantly truthful, my memory has no shortage of women who also fill the bill. I have dealt with many who slapped, punched, kicked and clawed their partners out of anger and frustration, and just like a few of the men, out of the sick desire for dominance. The only real difference between the two is that I found significantly less remorse in the women. I have always attributed that to the fact that their violence was never taken as seriously as the men's, and never as stigmatized by social taboo. It didn't make any of them less wrong.

But here's the rub. The use of violence as a premeditated, ongoing tool to maintain primacy in a relationship was always an infinitesimally small percentage of what I saw in the people I worked with. It was the extreme exception that somehow (read feminism) achieved inculcation into public consciousness as the norm, with a male in the role of perpetrator.

From working with countless families affected by the problem, I can tell you what domestic violence really is. It's a couple, one or both of them drunk, escalating a fight till it gets physical. It's two desperate, our of control people, clawing at each other out of fear and rage. It's impulse, reckless dysfunction that as many times as not has the two people in the bedroom enjoying make up sex not long after it is over, and then building the tension between them till it happens again.

It is people who cannot or will not manage conflict in a way that is peaceful, and it does not belong to one sex over the other any more than it belongs to one hair color over the other.

In fact, if you want to understand who is at most risk for violence in the home, take an equally hard look at poverty and drugs, especially alcohol. Looking at anything else first, especially the sex of perpetrators and victims, is fruitless. Unless, of course, there happens to be a buck in it for you or you have a political ax to grind.

In fact, if you want to know the real truth, we have screwed up the whole concept of perpetrators and victims when it comes to domestic violence. What I witnessed over two decades of dealing with the realities on the ground gave me a completely different view than you find in coffee house conversations.

When it comes to domestic violence, the real perpetrators are adults and the real victims are children.

And until we start to understand this, and act on it in good faith, we will achieve nothing more than further pitting men and women against each other, and leaving more children devastated in the wake of their battles.

Children who witness violence between their parents are traumatized by it. And I mean that in the literal sense. I have spoken with countless couples that recounted their battles with each other, sometimes sadly, but often as dispassionately as two people talking about playing checkers. They even laughed, together, at the absurdity of their actions. And let's face it, rather than being there to arrange escape and protection plans, they were there trying to figure out how to stay together and solve problems.

Talking to their children was vastly different. That is where I saw the most, and the most genuine, tears. Usually, all it took was a question.

"What is it like for you when Mom and Dad fight?"

Many of them, when hearing this simple question, which neither parent had likely ever asked, were overcome in a swell of raw, unyielding pain. They often struggled to steady their quivering lips, and fight back tears as they talked. Others just walled off, keeping their eyes down, shrugging their shoulders and forbidding me to enter the world of their pain.

Many of them, though, did tell me their stories. I got to hear how they covered their heads with pillows at night, trying to block out the noise. Others learned to escape in their own minds, retreating into fantasy. Still others tried to intervene, to become the only adult in the house, and to protect one parent from the other. And yes, they were often trying to protect their fathers.

As I did my job and dug into their lives, I found the real legacy of their parent's actions. It came in the form of school failure, fighting, drug use, thoughts of suicide, social withdrawal, hopelessness, despair, anger and fear.

Fear.

And it was an fear they were destined to carry with them; baggage to be hefted and lugged into their adult lives, tainting their image of themselves and others; wrecking their chances to trust the likes of love or put stock in the notion of family. A gift from Mom and Dad in the form of scars.

I didn't blame them for being afraid, or for being angry. When I heard their stories I was angry, too. Sometimes I wanted to grab both parents and smack them myself. But mostly I just sat and watched as they pointed at each other and cast blame.

You know, we put a lot of effort into finding a solution to domestic violence. And we put a great deal of energy into supposedly helping the victims of this social malady. As well we should.

It is the contention of many MRA's, and we are right to think so, that we need to de-gender the problem. We point to the fact that women are, as often as men, the initiators of violence. We lament the fact that social services all but deny the existence of male victims. Again, rightfully so.

But if we are ever to understand and redress the difficulties we face over this problem, I contend that we need to take a more somber and sober look at who is really paying the price for all of it.

And we need to understand that parents with children who have repeated violence in the home are abusing them, literally wrecking their futures, regardless of anything as trivial as who hit who first, or who got the biggest bruise.

What we have now is a system that only takes the petty squabble between two immature people and elevates it to the national level. We have turned our collective understanding of domestic violence into a macrocosm of a childish, vindictive, marital spat, ever seeking someone to blame for being the real problem.

And it underscores the importance of organizations like S.A.V.E. and DAHMW, run by people who are more interested in solving the problem than in simply pointing fingers.

I hope, and I certainly encourage other MRA's, that as we continue quest of cutting though all the garbage science and concocted factoids about domestic violence, that we make it a point to remind people that we are not engaged in a pissing match with women, or even necessarily with feminists. We are really trying to educate a woefully ignorant public about who pays the price for all these lies. I know that wrongly accused men do pay, and it is a horrible injustice, but the real sacrificial lambs are our sons and daughters. They never asked for any of this.

And as I read back through the debate, I found myself at fault for failing to more adequately bring that to the table. If there was ever any doubt about whether or not the debate was worth it in my mind, at least that much has been resolved.

I won’t make the same mistake again.

Gray Ribbon Day

Another video too important not to feature. Kudos and much admiration to Ben. PE

Transcript

What's up, You Tube? I've been really busy lately with schooling; haven't had time to do any videos lately, but I did want to at least stop and hit the high points of the rally I conducted at Mississippi State last Thursday.

As most of my viewers probably know, it was a parody in response to college males receiving anti-sexual-violence and anti-domestic-violence training. I try to get people out of their comfort zones. Some of the highlights included the argument that stereotyping gay and lesbian students as sexual abusers is not tolerated at Mississippi State – so why is naming men specifically as potential abusers being funded by our University public grant money?

Ironically, those who lead our young men into collective apology for male specific misdeeds are generally regarded as progressives, from whom we receive guidance on social issues. An advertisement for an event like "Walk A Mile In His Jockstrap" actually generated some productive and positive discussion, I think.

There are lots of efforts to 'liberate' all persons such as the LGBT community, minorities and women from any form of stereotype. However, when we hear talk about men and boys, it is always about 'fixing' us, telling us how to be 'better' men and boys. How to not abuse women and girls is being sold to us as the only politically-correct male issue.

How helpful is it for a man to stand in high heels and say over an outdoor sound system that he understands that the overwhelming number of perpetrators of rape and incest is men? Where are we as a Nation when the only culturally acceptable way to address men as a group is by simply asking them to 'man up' and be better men? There are no efforts to curb male-on-male violence, for example. In fact, men at MSU are led to speak up for women and defend them with no regard for their own safety.

I actually had a fair amount of supporters, received a lot of handshakes and even a couple of high-fives from some girls around campus who agreed with me. This goes to show everyone that being part of the non-feminist world view has nothing to do with encroaching women's rights or their well-being. Talking about men and boys has absolutely nothing to do with women at all – which should be a no-brainer. Characterizing non-feminist persons for social change for men as 'woman-haters' is far off the mark.

Some arguments that I was faced with include the following: "Well, if men are causing problems for women, we should not hide the statistics. If it is true that most social abusers and physical abusers of women and children are men, then why hide that information?"

And my counter-argument was along the lines of, "Okay, so perhaps I can do some digging, and find some equally inflammatory and half-baked advocacy research, conducted by, say, the Ku Klux Klan, that says that most rapists are Black or Jewish. Would Blacks or Jews say, well, if the statistics are true, that Blacks or Jews are committing the lion's share of incest and rape, then why hide this fact?"

I asked how they know the statistics are true that so many college men are rapists – and was told on more than one occasion that it is based on survey questions and anecdotal evidence, because women don't report it when they're raped, commonly. Is anyone else asking how this even makes sense? Why would a woman who is legitimately raped not report it? Again, this has nothing to do with real victims. It has to do with the fact that people respond viscerally to the term 'rape'! And that term is being used like malware, to tear men and women apart.

Other arguments included the following: "Just one rape is too many. You agree with that, don't you?"

Of course one rape is too many. I should not even have to answer that question. But what does that have to do with me? What does that have to do with an awareness rally? We can curb rape, and also improve the situation for men at the same time. It is not a zero-sum game.

We talk about women's issues most of the time here – actually, make that all of the time. Every time an event is held that has anything to do with gender issues, it is either about 'fixing' men and boys, and regarding masculinity as patently dangerous to women and girls, or it is about women being victims of men. Is this really a mature and responsible way to handle sex issues on a college campus? Simply blaming one sex … and support groups for the other?

I pointed out very clearly that there needs to be strong advocates on the side of women who are real victims, but that message is abundant here – every other day of the school year. And that men need advocacy at least some of the time. We have women's advocacy going on every single day of our school year, with many massively-funded and staffed offices with the stated purpose of insuring MSU serves the best interests of women. They seem to be hostile, judging from my overall take on their activism….

We need a 'Violence Act' not a 'Violence Against Women Act.'

My right to protest was upheld by my college leadership. I was proud of MSU, and everyone who upheld my right to organize here. I was treated with professionalism every step of the way.

But why is my safety in danger when I provide an answer – to White Ribbon Day – that unfairly characterizes women, even though I make it fully clear that I am only conducting an educational exercise, and do not mean much, if any of it, literally? While events that actually do unfairly characterize men do not even require security? It seems that my safety was in danger, but theirs wasn't.

Other arguments I received were, "We have far, far too many women getting sexually assaulted on this campus for you to be out here doing what you're doing."

Okay, first of all, I agree that one assault is one too many. But we had a male student murdered on this campus last semester, too – and just one murder is one too many, also. I think the person that had this argument meant well, and this might not have been the entirety of his argument; but advocating for men and boys and talking about the real challenges that we face, including false accusations, does not trivialize the challenges women face.

At one point I was approached by a self-professed feminist. I listened politely as she told me that we live in a misogynistic culture, in which men call women 'bitch' and 'slut' as if they're talking about the weather. We later talked about Katherine Kieu Becker, and the reaction of the cast and the audience of the women on 'The Talk.'

I had a counselor ask me at one point, "When you've gone to a party in the past, man, and aggressive behavior and fighting occurred, did you see mostly women behave this way, or men?"

And to that I say – it seems that we only want to talk about fixing men, again.

When the counselor said that to me I pointed out that the only time that I've seen men become violent after heavy drinking, there was always women in the picture. I've never seen a fight among drinking men when no women were in the vicinity. This is an issue that involves both men and women, and simply trying to fix men and treating women as victims is not going to work.

Men on this campus are asked to intervene, to defend women at the cost of violence to themselves. The message is clear: Violence that might fall upon a woman, is a much worse problem than actual violence against men, up to and including the murder of male students less than two thousand feet from the Office of Relationship Violence. The campus office could be more appropriately named the Office of Violence Prevention, and could get its funding not from the Office of Violence Against Women, but from, say, the Office of Violence Against People.

Another argument that I received, from a psychologist here at Mississippi State, was, "When women abuse drugs or alcohol they often become withdrawn and depressed, so it is much tougher to identify their needs – making them a priority."

Okay – I think people who have substance abuse problems need priority in receiving assistance – not women, just because they are emotionally more needy. (If that was the argument. I'm not suggesting that they are.)

See, we often hear of all the different emotional considerations that are needed for women, when it benefits them. But then, we hear people turn around and insist that women are equal to men in every way, and there are no emotional considerations that need to be taken whenever they're put in high-stress environments.

I really did not understand why this counselor was trying to steer the conversation to be about some issue that women face, when I was wanting to talk about issues facing men and boys anyway.

I distributed the facts page from the A Voice For Men website as a flyer, and was frequently told that I was distributing false information – to which I replied, "I am not a qualified researcher with the competency to personally validate everything on that sheet. However, everything on there is substantiated by organizations of public trust, such as the Center For Disease Control and the Department of Justice. It is certainly not based on anecdotal 'evidence' or surveys taken by women in battered women's shelters, which is where I hear that some of the information from feminists is gathered. If our information is more substantiated than theirs, then why are we the ones being cross-examined, rather than them? They should be just as vigorously scrutinized as we are, if not more."

Some people seemed to be drunk on their own demagoguery. A foolish person can argue that the theory of gravity is 'just a theory.'

I challenged women on campus to take the pledge: "If it isn't allowed to require sorority girls to walk in men's jockstraps and apologize for paternity fraud, false allegations, and women's-perpetrated child abuse, requiring fraternity men to walk in women's heels should also not be allowed."

I would be horrified and sickened to see our women treated like that. I would want it stopped immediately.

Most students walked right by my pro-male clothesline and never even made eye contact. Several hundred students stopped and looked really, really shocked, but still would not make eye contact with me or approach the area. Most guys did not fully understand my parody, because they did not even remember receiving their constant male-only anti-sexual-violence and anti-violence-against-women training each and every semester, because that does not register with them; it goes right under their radar. I had to remind them of how they were characterized just last week, and the month before that, and last semester. They just don't see what's right in front of their eyes when they're handed those white ribbons.

We have several male-hostile rallies. However, we could do the same thing and hold woman-hostile rallies, and ask women to be 'better women.' It would be hyperbole to conduct a rally, and then follow it with another rally, and then another one, on this campus – about paternity fraud, female-perpetrated child abuse, false accusations of rape and domestic violence, or lying about being on The Pill, while holding zero rallies about men's victimization against women.

Oh, and unfortunately, I was not able to get anyone to take my picture with the exhibit, so all I got are these pictures that I had to take myself. The Campus news channel did come and interview me on-camera, and got a quote from me, and filmed me doing a mock presentation over a microphone for another student who was asked to 'pretend to be interested.' I'm trying to get a copy of that, to possibly post here with permission. Oh, and also the Gender Studies class came over to my table, interviewed me, and said they were going to include our discussion in their research paper they were currently working on.

If I think of anything else that I'm forgetting, I'll point it out in a future video. And I'll see you back here next time – thank you for tuning in.

The Constitutional equation

TWO DEAD CANARIES, TWO CANDIDATES, A COALMINE AND AN ELECTION

In this article we look at the recent controversies regarding Judge Lori B Jackson and Prosecutor Mary N Kellett, and place them in the context of the US Constitution and its relevance in the coming elections. We believe that the candidate that gives these issues their due will gain an upper hand in the debates and ultimately, the elections.

OBAMA AND ROMNEY ON THE US CONSTITUTION

On his official website, Mitt Romney provides his take on the US Constitution [1]. Beginning with his opening sentence, "…its words have meaning", it becomes apparent that he takes the Constitution seriously. Romney's intention is to "…therefore appoint wise, experienced, and restrained judges who will take seriously their oath to discharge their duties impartially in accordance with the Constitution and laws — not their own personal policy preferences."

President Barack Obama also recognizes the relevance of the US Constitution [2], though the specifics of what he actually thinks of it have been somewhat more difficult to track down. In assorted news articles and video clips, he makes references to the document as "extraordinary" and "remarkable" with the occasional qualifiers like "imperfect" and "flawed". But words like extraordinary and remarkable can be open to interpretation, depending on who it is that one is trying to impress.

You can describe one person as extraordinarily intelligent and another as extraordinarily stupid. One decision can be remarkably astute, while another can be remarkably incompetent. So what exactly does Obama mean when he describes the US Constitution as "extraordinary" or "remarkable"? We would like Obama to be more specific and open about this. What is his sincere take on the US Constitution? Barack Obama on The Constitution [3] provides the most detailed overview that we could find, but as this is not the barackobama.com website, it is not a clear indication of what Obama personally stands for on the topic in 2012.

Thepoliticalguide.com makes reference to comments that Obama has made about the Constitution in books that he has written, but his stand is none the clearer. What does Obama's take on democracy as "a conversation to be had" mean? The few references to the US Constitution that we have been able to track down on the barackobama.com website have been made in passing, and not addressed directly. Clearly, he understands that the US Constitution matters, but beyond that?

The Democrats have something of a stronger tradition for systemic thinking. For example, the social sciences (their weakness with respect to rigor notwithstanding), are systemic sciences. When Bill Clinton said “it’s the economy, stupid,” he was demonstrating his appreciation for the systemic problems that impact on the culture. Is President Obama able to express his understanding of the US Constitution within the context of systemic thinking?

The Republicans, on the other hand, have a stronger tradition with respect to religion and faith. Questions of religion are also systemic questions, though the tendency to defer to a Creator creates something of a blind-spot that prevents them from recognizing the practical relationship between culture and moral values. That Romney has committed himself to making a stand for the Constitution and abiding by its principles is reassuring. But does he really understand how and why the principles work?

The Unites States of America is often described as a republic, not a democracy [4]. What do the two candidates have to say about this?

There are sciences available for Americans that synthesize the systemic issues that are relevant to both Democrats and Republicans. For example, the semiotics of perhaps America’s greatest philosopher, Charles Sanders Peirce [5] (who was also a scientist and a Christian), would go a considerable distance in explaining how and why the principles in the US Constitution work, and how they might be reformulated to make the US Constitution an even more remarkable document than it has ever been. This semiotic science conflicts with neither the Democrat interpretations of Democracy and rights nor the Republican interpretations of Republic and religion.

Yet for all the richness of this established science and its relevance, neither candidate has made clear what their understanding of the US Constitution really is. There is no reason for either candidate to shirk the responsibility of demonstrating their understanding of the principles of the US Constitution. It is disappointing that the science of a uniquely American genius has never become a part of the conversation. We wonder if this is an opportune time to introduce the genius of Peirce into the debate.

It is true that the US Constitution, as an imperfect human creation, has its flaws, and Obama is sensible in recognizing them. Slavery in America may indeed be a blind-spot, but in what way? Specifics please. The onus is on Obama, in 2012, to spell it out. Are there biases against African-Americans today that the Democrats are better placed to address, without harming the culture? Does Obama believe that the US Constitution helps or hinders the rights of African-Americans? Why?

Within the US Constitution, there are principles involved, and the candidate who can best demonstrate a proper grasp of what those principles are and how they relate to a culture’s cohesion, sanity, efficiency, fairness and health will gain significant leverage. It won’t be enough for one party to confine their side of the argument to higher moral, biblical values or free-market efficiencies as surely as it won’t be enough for the other party to focus on rights or the fair redistributions of wealth – regardless of where they stand in their claims to respecting the Constitution.

But all this talk about the Constitution is academic, isn’t it? What’s the bottom line? How does this affect us? Let us get specific about the systemic problems, the sorts of problems that the US Constitution and its principles were designed to tackle. By applying the metaphor of the canary in the coalmine [6] we can illustrate our point without getting bogged down in the detail. A dead canary tells us everything that we need to know about the presence of noxious gases that might wipe out a team of miners.

TWO DEAD CANARIES AND A BROKEN SYSTEM

Family court biases against men are now routine, policies that eviscerate the due process rights of men and boys accused of sexual misconduct [7] are being implemented, VAWA insists on protections for women and not men, all the while ignoring women as the primary abusers of children, and so on… need we list them all? All these are designed to make women feel all warm and gooey inside, but they are fundamentally unconstitutional. The breakdown in the rule of law has come to a head in brazen breaches of due process that AVFM has identified in the criminal conduct of Judge Lori B Jackson [8] and Prosecutor Mary N Kellett [9].

The stories around Jackson and Kellett are the two canaries in the coalmine. They provide the litmus test proving that the system is broken and needs fixing. Obama needs to move beyond his take of democracy as a conversation, and make clear his understanding of how it works. Romney, on the other hand, needs to lay on the table his understanding of the constitutional principles and why he respects the Constitution. How do the two candidates intend to fix a broken system in the application of their respective takes on the US Constitution and its principles? More importantly, have either of them identified the problem to begin with, and do they intend to fix it?

What are the implications of the stories behind these two “honourable” – or more correctly, dishonourable – members of the bar/judiciary? Their stories are symptomatic of systemic problems throughout the entire judicial system. That they can make the judgements they did, and at least thus far get away with it, suggests something fundamentally broken in administration and management. Can we confirm that the system is broken? That depends on how Jackson and Kellett are dealt with in the coming weeks and months.

A COUPLE OF PREDICTIONS

To highlight the gravity of the situation that Americans face, we’re going to make a couple of predictions. We have reason to question the ability of the judicial system to provide a proper response in these matters. Jackson and Kellett might be thugs, but the powers-that-be within the bar, the judiciary and their administration, who are ultimately accountable for their antics, are not stupid. If the system is broken and Jackson and Kellett finish up getting away with their misdeeds with a slap on the wrist, then we can be sure that there will be reasons. The powers-that-be won’t be sticking their necks out, taking absurd levels of risk to support corrupt members, for no reason. Even when they take great delight in destroying the lives of men, they will think twice if there is some kind of risk to their livelihoods. They have a lot to lose. Supporting these two shysters, if it should come to that, would come with considerable risk. So what could they possibly be hiding? We anticipate two possibilities:

1) Constitutionality of judgements

They are trying to nip an emerging precedent in the bud. Once this kind of precedent is set, that is, once Jackson's and Kellett's odious conduct goes on the record and is set as case-law precedent, then it sets the stage for calling all their judgments into question. Furthermore, it raises serious questions regarding the constitutionality of all prior judgements of perhaps even others in the judiciary and the rest of the legal system. We should expect that this kind of resistance with respect to Jackson and Kellett will go all the way to the top… to the level of Attorney General. What is at stake is the very integrity of the judicial system.

2) Intractable systemic problems

Perhaps it doesn't make sense to many of us why an agency or government would allow such a situation, as has emerged in the Jackson/Kellett debacle, to arise. To anyone who has been a whistleblower in an organisation and who has had exposure to the way that people behave when their conduct is called into question, there are many possible reasons. Maybe the entire system is so corrupt and so broken that it is beyond repair – hence emphasis on the word "systemic". Maybe people in high places are scared to death that once one domino falls, others are destined to fall. Maybe people in high places are scared to death that their failure to meet performance indicators is about to be divulged. Maybe they are scared to death that a can of worms is about to be opened.

Maybe they are scared to death of being held to account for both the mistakes of the past, and new demands placed on them in the future. Maybe they are scared to death of being ousted from their privileged status as indulgent, opportunistic fat-cats, being denied their freedom to loll about in the mud, and having their entitlements stripped from them. Maybe they are scared to death of the possibility that they might have to work for their livings in the future. There is only one way to test this, of course. Let's see how the system responds to the two dead canaries.

Of course we hope that the system is not broken and that the bar/judiciary and their administration conduct their duties and obligations lawfully and fairly. But in the event that they don't, then our predictions above can provide the basis for further investigations and analysis.

Here's another prediction, more long-range. We take on board Rod van Mechelen's interpretation [10] suggesting a conspiracy towards some kind of New World Order, but ultimately we are inclined to the view that people are not that smart and not that organised. Rather, we proffer that the symptoms we observe indicate a system breaking down, with cowboys in positions of influence jockeying for opportunities. Our reality is not conducive to incubating any kind of conspiracy. To begin with, people are too focused on seeking returns on their investments within timeframes that are too short to deal with 4-year terms of office and compulsory elections.

Secondly, conspirators are too dishonest to trust others purporting to share in their agenda – it is a matter of survival that they project their own dishonesty onto others, lest they too be taken for a ride or get dobbed in. No, the end result of all of this, should current trends continue, we predict, is military intervention and governance by military, perhaps along the lines of a military dictatorship [11] or stratocracy [12]. On a more positive note, at least under such a system, should it eventuate, men would be treated more fairly than they are now, though at the cost of both men and women losing all their freedoms.

DEALING WITH THE CRIMINALS WITHIN THE JUDICIARY

As custodians of their judicial/legal offices, Jackson and Kellett have abused their responsibilities. They've crossed a line. They are the criminals now. In their judgments and decisions detrimental to the best interests of the children beholden to them, they are the child-abusers now. Would these two criminal child-abusers dare to charge us with contempt of court? Would they dare to bring their shenanigans out into the open into the bright, disinfecting light of day? It is these thugs, in their naked abuse of their authority and the trust bestowed upon them by the people, who have shown nothing but contempt for their court and the people.

And if the system backs them up? Then that makes everyone else in the system into criminals too. If this happens, then we are no longer dealing with a judiciary but with a mafia. That's how it is. If it so turns out, then we are dealing with a system that is well and truly broken. It signals the end of the rule of law in America.

Normally, citizens should be judged on the presumption of innocence. But how can the precondition of innocence possibly apply to a judiciary in which we have every reason to have lost confidence, and whose judgements we can no longer trust? By virtue of the assumption that judges are honourable persons, they are granted privileges, entitlements and exemptions, but one of the costs of their swag-bag of freebies, given that there is no higher authority to judge the judges, is the presumption of innocence. When we cannot trust our judges, then we have no basis upon which to regard them as honourable, no basis upon which to defer to them as "Your Honour".

Once they cross the line into criminality, they cannot charge others with holding their cherished courts in contempt. Furthermore, given that judges are disinclined to judge themselves in the absence of media pressure, then charges of media bias prejudicing cases sub judice should have limited applicability in this kind of case – the case would never have gone to trial were the media not involved. Judges' privileges and exemptions, bestowed on presumptions of trust and integrity as is implicit when we address them as "Your Honour", have necessary costs associated with them, especially when said integrity is shown to be lacking. As a prosecutor, Kellett is not a judge, but she is an integral part of the very legal system whose integrity is under the spotlight – the system that is judging itself.

CONCLUSION

We've recognized the presence of noxious fumes in the coalmine. Our test canaries are dead. What are we going to do about it? What is Mitt Romney going to do about it? What is Barack Obama going to do about it? Do either of them recognize the principles that are relevant to the passing of the two canaries, and what has to be done in American culture and the Constitution to be rid of these dangerous, noxious fumes? Most importantly, what are the principles in the US Constitution that might serve to rectify the looming disaster? Irrespective of whether you're Democrat or Republican, man or woman, black or white, the US Constitution and everything that America ever stood for depends on this election.

Which of the two candidates has the firmer grasp of the systemic issues that are relevant to the US Constitution? Romney has made clear his respect for the US Constitution and his intention to appoint judges who take their oath seriously. Obama needs to make clear his own views. And ultimately, both candidates need to demonstrate their understanding of the US Constitution, and how they intend to implement its principles in fixing the United States of America. If, after the elections, Jackson and Kellett finish up getting away with their reprehensible conduct, then the candidate under whose office these two thugs are set free will have failed in his responsibilities as President.

That's why the US Constitution needs to become a part of the conversation and the Presidential debates, so that the American people can make an informed vote. If the next President fails to heed the warnings coming from the two dead canaries, then we have to conclude that the world's most amazing experiment with democracy is finished. It will then be only a matter of time before the military comes to America's rescue to oust those whose power is secured only on the shifting sands of spin, popularity and fashion over discipline, substance and integrity.

We believe that Bill Clinton was onto something with his campaign slogan "It's the economy, stupid." We believe that a similar statement is relevant to the forthcoming elections… something along the lines of "It's the culture, stupid." The question is, which candidate is brave enough to take it up, make it his own, and make the commitments necessary to save America?

Jury nullification debate conclusion

Note to readers: At the outset of this debate there was to be three exchanges between myself and Johann the Cabbie. We agreed in advance that there was to be a 72 hour turnaround limit between responses. I insisted on the commitment to honoring the deadline in advance and explained to Johann that it was important to me that AVfM readers be able to depend on our timeliness.

On his first opportunity to respond, Johann failed to meet the deadline and made no effort to contact me about it. I posted a comment to his site pointing this out to which he responded, in part "I am in breach of our agreement. I offer no apologies our excuses, but I do offer a shamefully belated response."

His response, if you can consider it that, is posted here below, along with my final rebuttal. This has allowed him equal time in the exchange. But this is where I terminate our "debate." I can take Johann's youthful arrogance, but his lack of integrity crosses the line. As he has clearly expressed that he has no regard for being trustworthy or credible, this exchange will conclude this debate with Johann the Cabbie, but I also take this as an opportunity to extend the invitation to anyone with an opposing view, and a commitment to their own word, to have this debate at a later time.

Johann's response:

Times Square attracts the crazies. Nutters pick their spot of sidewalk and spend hours shouting and waving their arms, trying to convince any who pass by that their particular brand of crazy ain't so crazy. After a while, one gets to recognize the regulars – the science of sin guy, the Black Israelites, even some dude playing a guitar whilst claiming to be naked, but really, he's wearing hat, boots, and tighty whities.

Reading Paul Elam's writing reminds me of those nutters. So much so that I wonder how he can get any typing done with all the arm waving and shouting. The man can type at length, but like the Times Square nutters, he produces no evidence to back up his assertions. And just like the nutters, his rants can get rather tedious.

Elam's main contention is that rape shield laws prevent the jury from hearing relevant evidence, so guilt beyond a reasonable doubt cannot possibly be ascertained. And lacking any evidence beyond mere anecdotes, he resorts to making one unfounded assertion after another.

His best attempt at providing some evidence or logic is quoting some federal evidence rules to show that rape shield laws have always been unnecessary. He fails to mention that rape shield laws are designed to instruct judges what is and what isn't relevant in rape trials.

Here, I'll give a list of his evidenceless[sic] assertions:

The entire nullification argument hinges completely on the idea that obvious guilt is unattainable under the current system, specifically where "rape shield laws," are concerned. To ascertain guilt, relevant evidence must be weighed. If the accurate weighing of that evidence is not possible because relevant facts have been intentionally omitted, it amounts to nothing more than a magic show; smoke and mirrors from which no true picture can be gleaned. In that scenario, a fair trial is not possible. It is as easy to understand as it is logical.

There is no logical reason, in the face of the evidence, to lump all other criminal court proceedings in with rape trials. They are conducted differently, which is the point of this debate.

All Johann has done here is to momentarily pretend that the rape shield laws he was already minimizing now don't exist at all.

One, the lack of reason (though unreasonable they are) in these politically motivated laws is not so much the issue as is their impact on due process. The moment we systematically deny a defendant the right to include evidence casting legitimate concern on the veracity of an accuser, or on possible motive to fabricate, we have not only denied them a Constitutionally guaranteed fair trial, but we have also eviscerated any opportunity to hold credible the evidence required to conclude guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

…why is he [JtC] not advocating for rape shield laws, for the accused? I will tell you why. It is because he is affected by the same one dimensional, irrational and lopsided thinking that afflicts Matt Dillahunty, just to a slightly lesser degree. He has surrendered reason for rote protective instinct that has no place in our criminal justice system where life and liberty depend on thoughtful analysis and an unfettered pursuit of the facts.

He sees women as primarily victims, in need of special treatment, yet he offers not one shred of evidence of why that special treatment is necessary, effective, reasonable or consistent with Constitutional demands. And he does not even speculate what the real impact of those special rules might be on the people they most affect.

I'll ignore his arrogance of attempting to place thoughts in my mind and just worry about his complaints about rape shield laws.

Anecdotes are not evidence. In a country of over 300 million people, some will be screwed by society. Some innocents will suffer in the criminal injustice system. Every travesty is a tragedy, but Elam's listing of a few of those travesties is not evidence of an endemic problem. Elam needs to provide some actual data to prove that rape shield laws are a systemic, endemic problem.

Until then, I will continue to view him as one of the Times Square nutters.

Elam Responds:

Given that this debate is coming to an abrupt and unscheduled end I will respond to what little substance was offered by Cabbie and move on to other points I would have made in future installments of this debate.

After we shave off all the name calling and other distractions, and take a look at the one point that Cabbie even attempts in this "rebuttal," we find that he still fundamentally fails to understand the Constitutional and rational imperatives that undermine his position.

His one and only assertion here is that there is no justification for nullification without empirical proof of an "endemic problem" with the misapplication of rape shield laws. In fact, he is saying that without that evidence, the predisposition to nullify amounts to something equitable to chanting about End of Days on the street corner.

This, of course, is neither applicable nor logical. All we must do in the case of criminal trials is prove that the problem is prevalent enough that there is reasonable concern about tainting the presumption of innocence and the ability to ascertain guilt beyond reasonable doubt, broadly speaking. I think the arguments following do that with more than sufficiency.

To begin with, the trouble over rape shield statutes did not originate with me or with the MRM, generally speaking. There have been repeated concerns expressed about the impact of rape shield laws on due process and fair trials long predating anything I have published on the matter.

Columnist Cathy Young wrote an article at reason.com titled, Excluded Evidence, the Dark Side of Rape Shield Laws. In it, she writes the following about the courts excluding evidence of previous false rape accusations from trial:

> Most of the time, however, the burden is on the defendant to show that the value of this evidence to his case outweighs its "prejudicial effect" on the complainant. In several states (including Alabama, Iowa, and Washington), courts have held that excluding evidence of an earlier false or dubious rape complaint by the accuser does not deny the accused a fair trial — even, perhaps, if the evidence is relevant to the question of his innocence.

As far back as 1976, David S. Rudstein wrote, in the William and Mary Law Review, Vol. 18, Issue 1:

> …those statutes that absolutely prohibit a defendant from introducing evidence of a rape complainant's bad reputation for chastity, opinion evidence of her bad character for chastity, and evidence of specific acts of sexual intercourse between the complainant and men other than the defendant on the issue of consent may unconstitutionally deprive the defendant of his rights to a fair trial and to confront the witnesses against him.

In Courting Disaster: Re-Evaluating Rape Shields in Light of People v. Bryant, Josh Maggard wrote:

> Under the most stringent of the rape shield statutes, a defendant charged with murder has more protections and greater leeway with introducing evidence in his defense than a defendant charged with rape. More compellingly, a defendant who rapes and murders a victim enjoys a lesser standard of evidentiary exclusion for the murder than he does for the rape. This should give pause to even the most vocal of rape victims' rights proponents: a legal structure which rewards a crime ending in death with more substantive and procedural protections must, by necessity, be flawed. As Susan Jacoby noted, "the most important change brought about by the women's movement is abandonment of the antediluvian notion that rape is 'a fate worse than death.' Nothing is worse than death.

These and other legal and common opinions have not gone without some reaction in actual courts. As Clare Dyer reported in The Guardian in May, 2001, a British House of Lords ruling challenged rape shield laws there:

> A law that bans juries in rape trials from hearing evidence that the accused had a previous sexual relationship with his accuser breaches his right to a fair trial, five law lords ruled yesterday in a landmark judgment.
> "Good sense suggests that it may be relevant to an issue of consent whether the complainant and the accused were ongoing lovers or strangers," said Lord Steyn.
> "To exclude such material creates the risk of disembodying the case before the jury. It also increases the danger of miscarriages of justice."

And it is that risk that speaks directly to the issue of nullification. These legal rulings, opinions and layman interpretations of rape shield laws also do not serve to provide Johann the Cabbie with the "endemic problem" neatly cited and referenced, so that he may quiet his personal derision and see merit in the nullification argument. Nor will the anecdotes of those concerns being realized sway an individual so predisposed to look only at the concerns of alleged female victims.

What they do provide, however, is sufficient information for reasonable citizens to look at rape shield statutes and determine they are an endemic threat to due process and presumed innocence, by their very existence. Rational thinkers can view this information and conclude there is a problem not addressed by the state that can be addressed through the wisdom and power of the juror, and that it can be done with complete moral certitude.

But here is the kicker, and it is a grand one. If, by some measure of miracle, rape shield laws were suddenly overturned and wiped clean of the statutes, there would still be just cause for nullification. This is a point we would have come to naturally had the Cabbie assisted us with taking this debate to its scheduled conclusion. His failure to contribute notwithstanding, we can get there anyway.

As it stands right now in many, rather, most jurisdictions, the only evidence needed to convict a person of rape is the alleged victim's word that it happened. We saw this in the case of Vladek Filler, before his conviction was overturned. It was overturned not on a lack of evidence, but on misconduct by prosecutor Mary Kellett. Had she not been caught misleading the jury, the conviction would have stood, because all the jury was required to hear was the complaint of Ligia Filler in order to convict. Given that Ligia Filler's propensity to lie was withheld from the jury, it left Mr. Filler wide open to false conviction.

The same was true more recently, in July of this year, for Darrell Williams, an Oklahoma State basketball player, who was convicted of sexual battery and rape by instrumentation solely on the word of his accusers. The Sun Times article title, Conviction but no tangible evidence, tacitly conveyed the injustice, but it did not do the young man any good.

As it stands now, the standard of evidence required to convict a man of rape in a criminal court is utterly indistinguishable from the standard of evidence required to lynch a Black man for rape 50 years ago in Mississippi. It requires only the word of the alleged victim, and the willingness of others to commit violence on her behalf in retribution.

There is no shortage of accusations, and the state has set itself up as the instrument for that violence by proxy, as surly as if it were a legislated lynch mob.

That lack of standards, combined with the effect of rape shield laws to protect the credibility of the alleged victim from falling under direct scrutiny, is the combination of forces that form the perfect storm of unchecked injustice. This is addressed by Bruce Gross, Ph. D., JD, MBA in The Forensic Examiner, in his article False Rape Allegations: An Assault on Justice:

> Although it may not be "politically correct" to question the veracity of a women's complaint of rape, failing to consider the accuser may be intentionally lying effectively eradicates the presumption of innocence. This Constitutional right is especially significant when dealing with allegations of rape as in most jurisdictions, sex offenses are the only crimes that do not require corroborating evidence for conviction. Because there are often no witnesses and no physical evidence (especially if the victim delays in filing a report), the case may come down to the credibility of the accused versus the credibility of the accuser.

The realm of false allegations is intimately tied to the need for nullification, but I will pass on including it as a part of this particular argument.

The fact that sex offenses stand alone as the only crime for which corroborating evidence is not needed for conviction makes them, in my opinion, as a slam dunk for the legitimacy of nullification.

We have another word for "corroborating evidence." We call it proof; the kind we like to have for convicting under the standard of reasonable doubt. As difficult as it is to be the victim of any crime, including rape, are we really going down the path of elevating the victim's trauma to the point it supplants the need for evidence and due process in the course of obtaining a conviction?

Indeed we are. We are, in fact, very far down that road, even with the blessings of supposedly rational thinkers like Johann the Cabbie.

Were there another way to address this problem, I would enjoy entertaining it. The system is far too broken, too corrupt and too politicized for conventional redress. Extreme injustice calls for extreme retaliation. Luckily, nullification by jurors remains available as a legal, moral answer to the states failure to contain its power and to abide by the mandates of the Constitution.

Public support for VAWA reform: survey

October 7, 2012 | by Robert O'Hara | Link | Original Link

In July, Stop Abusive and Violent Environments (S.A.V.E.), an organization dedicated to the reform of domestic violence laws, released the results of a survey designed to gauge public support for recent proposals to reform the Violence Against Woman Act. Here are the results:

Overall findings:

Stop waste and fraud – 69.5%
Stop discrimination – 65.9%
Stop false allegations – 63.5%

The survey shows strong support for reform among key voting blocs including women and young people. One notable finding: About 7 in 10 persons who are a victim of domestic violence or who personally know an abuse victim support the proposed changes.

Survey methods and detailed findings can be found here.

“Even though we have begun the process of reform, America has a long way to go before true victims of domestic violence get priority and damaging false allegations come to an end,” says SAVE spokesman Philip W. Cook. “No one knows this better than the victims of domestic violence themselves.”

The results of this survey show without a doubt that those in who are in control of not only public policy regarding Domestic and Intimate Partner Violence, but over the entire public discourse of the issue are out of touch.

The results of this survey compliment the results of a similar survey conducted by S.A.V.E in which over one in ten respondents reported being falsely accused of some sort of abuse.

The gun in the room

---

Ladies, what are you doing about the gun in the room?

I have recently been party to a series of discussions of the social landscape in which violence occurs. In particular, violence against men, committed by women. Earlier in 2012, a number of politicians and celebrities clotted together to admonish all men that no matter what, the subset of humanity shaped by their Y chromosome, should under no circumstances raise a hand in their own defense against female initiated violence.

That is not the phrasing which was used, of course. Rather, the standard “never hit a woman” line was trotted repeatedly out, along with boringly predictable imputations of failed manhood should any mere male ever dare to imagine self defense was his right.

Or maybe, in the fantasy world of celebrity public service announcements, women are never violent, and physical aggression is a reserve of that most evil aspect of human identity, masculinity.

Despite its nearly constant reinforcement by our media, the fantasy of violence having a sex is one which falls apart at the first touch of examination, or comparison to decades of collected statistics on domestic violence. But simple fact-checking against reality isn’t even where the most egregious problem in this perpetuated myth lies.

The myth that violence has a sex is worse than simple hatred cultivated based on an aspect of biological identity of individuals. It is the maintenance and reinforcement of the falsehood of women as not real human beings. The common phrase “male violence” aside from falsely attaching a sex to something people of any sex do is the much more sinister conception of female identity as uniquely angelic, perfect, and pure.

For those new to this planet , divine creatures of pure grace do not exist. Women, contrary to so much flattering commercial messaging, are simply human beings. They fart, they pick their noses, they deal poorly with conflict, just like everybody else on the planet Earth. Food goes in one end, shit comes out the other. Women are humans, and human beings are twitchy, irascible, emotionally reactive, semi-intelligent animals.

The game of pretend, that they are somehow more innocent, pure, and special is a grotesque farce which excuses and perpetuates ongoing human carnage in the real world. That carnage, by the way, impacts women as well as men. This game of pretend, which among it’s tenants includes one truly depraved idea usually left unstated. This being the idea that woman lack agency or volition.

The idea of feminine innate innocence, goodness, and lovely specialness is just one side of a coin, the other face of which is that women are not fully realized human beings. This is the myth of woman as dolls, as inanimate objects. And sickeningly, because of the way our society socialized little girls, there’s an already huge and growing segment of the female population entirely willing to indulge and maintain this fiction; so called adults who have no apparent agency. They do, of course, but their agency is expressed through another never-to-be mentioned, although screamingly obvious reality that everybody knows anyway. Hypo-agency, or feminine agency by proxy.

Our culture regularly denies the relationship between cultivated perception of hypo-agency, and the proxy initiation of violence on behalf of those we perceive as absent of agency. In every simple interaction between a man and a woman in this culture, that brings us to the question of the gun in the room.

What gun is that?

It is the gun that in western cultures every woman brings to the conversation. It is the gun that if you are a man speaking to a woman — is pointed at you.

Now, in explaining up to this point, I am already familiar from previous conversations with some standard objections. The first being some variation of I don't know what you're talking about, or, you are being ridiculous and hysterical.

The fact is that a woman can, by speaking a few words, summon violence in the form of police or other chivalry-practicing men. The simplest is an accusation of rape, or sexual assault, or downgrading the scale of possible response, sexual harassment, and so on. In our culture, this is a reliable method to summon and point the gun which every woman brings to every conversation with a man. There are some consequences to frivolous use of the gun, but compared to the consequences to the man, the fallout for a woman is minor.

Steven Berkimer and Pierce Harlan maintain a website which aggregates mainstream reporting on exactly this phenomenon, and there are thousands of events reported in mainstream media of the invocation of the gun in the form of false accusations. Mr. Berkimer and Mr. Harlan add new stories, culled from mainstream reporting every week, and do so barely skimming the surface of reporting of women's false accusations and men destroyed.

Yes, there is a gun in the room. To deny it is to admit either stupidity, or dishonesty.

The next most common objection is that most women would never do such a thing. In this, I will point again at the mainstream reporting aggregated on the website of Berkimer and Harlan. Judging from the accumulated stories, numbering in the thousands – all copied from mainstream media – and demonstrating that average women all over the world have been, and continue to be willing to invoke the gun in the room which they own by virtue of their sex, it seems obvious that many woman have no reservations about fielding false accusations. Reading through some of the stories aggregated, she was bored is a pretty popular motif.

So, to anyone suggesting – most women would never do such a thing, in that statement is an embedded admission that the gun is in the room. So I will suggest such individuals kindly shut the fuck up.

The next objection, usually from a woman to whom this is explained is : Oh my god, I would never do such a thing!

Oh, really? If that is the case, why do you have the gun? Why are you silent as the gun is placed in your grasp, loaded, and pointed at every man you may have occasion to speak to?

When public service announcements appear on television, pretending to seek a reduction in the problem of domestic violence – but portraying a false narrative that such violence is the simplistic black and white conception of evil, angry, violent and predatory men, victimizing innocent, doe-eyed and decorative feminine victims, we're loading and pointing the gun. Were reminding everyone from cops to children and putting men on notice that the gun is pointed at them.

When we talk about rape culture – as if it is a real thing – we're making sure the gun is pointed at men. So that any woman anywhere, just making a claim that she's threatened, a claim that she's frightened, a claim that she's sexually victimized, men with uniforms and badges and guns will spring into action – informed and confident that their guns are pointed at the bad man, which is, of course, whichever man she is pointing at.

The ongoing, monotonous and repetitive narrative of female victimization and male predation – that is the aiming of the gun, and it's in the room, in every room, in which a man and a woman may speak, or even look at each other.

And for a female, and an adult in this culture, and who has not acted against this narrative, through action or speech or advocacy – then such individuals are content for the gun to remain, and happy to own the control of that gun, and to have it pointed squarely at every man she deigns to speak to, or look at.

So the question might be asked : Do I want some kind of balancing power? Do I want, metaphorically speaking – my own gun?

No. I've said before, and I will no doubt have to say again, I am repulsed by violence – and have no patience for it. I don't want to pretend to pursue a friendship, or a romance, or a conversation under the pretense that the relationship is based on affection, or love, or respect, while all the time, that pretense is belied by the fact that there is a gun in the room.

The gun in the room is why, among other things I avoid, I don't date in any conventional sense. The pretend incomprehension, the denial, and the feigned mistake of metaphor for an actual pistol gripped by french tipped, manicured fingers – what? I don't have a gun.

That is a killer aiming down the barrel with their finger on the trigger who, just before they shoot, whispers sweetly and softly, trust me.

So the question becomes, to every woman with the sense to understand this discussion. What are you doing to take that gun off the table, and put it away.

And the only answer that wont be a surprise is continued silence.

The Real Housewives of Harrison County

October 8, 2012 | by Dr. Tara J. Palmatier | Link | Original Link

Small towns can be very incestuous. Everyone knows everyone or is only one or two degrees of separation away from knowing everyone. This can pose challenges in legal disputes, for example, in Family Court – especially when a community is so small that it only has two family court judges and a handful of attorneys who all drink from the same well and seem to be more interested in protecting their legal clout and political interests than they are in protecting their clients and serving justice.

This appears to be the case in Clarksburg, West Virginia. If you have been following the ongoing case of judicial malfeasance in Harrison County, you know that Lt. Col. Joel Kirk and his children have suffered and continued to suffer egregious abuses at the hands of Judge Lori Betler Jackson and Tina Kirk's attorneys, Thomas G. Smith, Jamison "Jami" Cooper and Afton Hutson Aman.

Given the evidence [GAL report link] that documents Tina's unfitness to parent, Judge Jackson would have to be deaf, dumb and blind or dangerously anti-father biased or arrogantly corrupt to give any unsupervised access to this known child abuser, but that is precisely what Judge Jackson has done. As for Tina's attorneys, well, one could argue that they're "just doing their jobs," but, in reality, they are aiding and abetting a documented child abuser in her efforts to continue to abuse the children and bleed the Colonel dry. To their credit, Smith, Cooper and Aman did try to deliver the Kirk children from their abuser by offering to sell them to the Lt. Col., their father, for a tidy $144,000 apiece, but that seems more reptilian than decent. [Children for Sale link]

Judge Cornelia Reep originally presided over the Kirk divorce and custody dispute. She reviewed the evidence and watched the video from the night of June 28, 2009 and gave full custody to the Lt. Col. Judge Reep stated that, while she was no mental health expert, it was clear to her that Tina Kirk had serious mental health issues as well as a drinking problem. She also granted a motion to restrict all access to the children against Tina in August 2009 [link] after she attacked the children in front of the Guardian Ad Litem, Mary Elizabeth "Beth" Snead, and the children's therapist.

It would seem that when it became clear to Tina Kirk that she would be unable to play victim and manipulate Judge Reep, she pulled a game changer. She fired her initial divorce attorney and very strategically changed lawyers.

She retained Thomas G. Smith, a personal injury attorney, Afton Hutson Aman, a colleague of Smith's and another personal injury lawyer, and Jamison Cooper, yet another personal injury attorney who operates her own firm with her husband (who has also appeared in court on behalf of Tina) in Bridgeport, West Virginia.

Why would an individual in a complex, high-conflict divorce and custody case hire personal injury attorneys? One would think a person in Tina's precarious position would seek the services of family law attorneys instead of personal injury attorneys.

As it turns out, Judge Reep represented Thomas G. Smith in his divorce when she was a practicing attorney. Subsequently, Judge Reep recused herself. Enter Judge Lori Betler Jackson.

How did Tina Kirk know to hire Thomas Smith? Tina is not a Harrison County native. Presumably, she is an outsider to the area, just like the Lt. Col. Who advised Tina that Judge Reep would likely recuse herself if she hired Smith? Did someone assure Tina that Judge Lori Betler Jackson would be favorable to her, ignore much of the evidence and custody evaluations and hand the children and most of the Lt. Col.'s assets to her on a silver platter? Additionally, who is paying Tina Kirk's legal fees? The Lt. Col. isn't paying them and Smith, Cooper and Aman have refused to turn over her financials. Something stinks in Harrison County West Virginia and it's not the back 40.

Ladies and Gents, the Real Housewives of Harrison County, West Virginia

An anonymous source recently contacted Lt. Col. Kirk and stated that at least one of the women in these photographs, Celeste Clutter, attended Roosevelt-Wilson High School with Lori Betler Jackson and is a very close, long standing family friend of Judge Jackson and other members of the Betler clan who also attended Roosevelt-Wilson High. According to this source, the Kirk divorce and Jackson's involvement in it has been quite the topic of conversation amongst this group of women for the last few years.

If you examine Ms. Clutter's Facebook friends page, there are several Betlers, including Lori Betler Jackson's brother, Doug, who is a police officer and Kristi Betler Schwartz who is believed to be Lori Jackson's sister. Allegedly, Catherine Goings, another Roosevelt-Wilson alumn and vice-mayor of Clarksburg, also runs in this circle of women. Does the woman who works in the Harrison County prosecutor's office who had Tina's assault charges dropped run with this crowd as well? Rumor has it that she does.

Ms. Clutter is Facebook friends with David Stout, Tina's latest boyfriend. Ms. Clutter is also Facebook friends with Andy McMunn, partner in the firm Smith, McMunn & Glover, which employs Thomas G. Smith and Afton Hutson Aman. Andy McMunn is Facebook friends with Jamison Cooper who is Facebook friends with Mary Elizabeth "Beth" Snead, the Kirk children's Guardian Ad Litem. Snead now seems to be backpedaling from her original position when she drafted the report, which was written before Tina retained Jamison Cooper's services.

If Tina was indeed advised by a friend or friends of Lori Betler Jackson to hire Thomas Smith in order to get into Jackson's court, then these photos raise even more questions.

Who are the women in these photos and what is their relationship, if any, with Lori Betler Jackson?

How many of these women are divorced?

If some of these women are divorcees, how many were represented by Lori Betler Jackson when she was a practicing attorney?

How many of their divorces, if any, has Jackson presided over as judge?

Did Jackson perpetrate injustices similar to those she has perpetrated on Lt. Col. Kirk and the Kirk children on their ex-husbands, if any, and children?

Does Jackson preside over some incestuous, small town "Divorce Club" in which ladies who are "in the circle" are given preferential rulings in the face of West Virginia laws and statutes?

Are the attorneys in Harrison County more interested in currying favor with sitting judges than they are in protecting their clients from abusive partners and children from abusive parents?

How far does the judicial corruption in Harrison County, West Virginia go?

This is all speculation, but even a cursory view of the Facebook friends pages of the individuals below show numerous mutual friends and connections. Just in case these individuals make their Facebook accounts private, AVFM has taken screen captures of these pages.

A premium on equality

October 9, 2012 | by Peter Lloyd | Link | Original Link

‘Sorry girls, costly car insurance is the price you pay for gender equality!’ One writer says it’s about time the unfair ‘penis tax’ was abolished.

Jeremy Clarkson once said on Top Gear that the only way young men could afford motor insurance is if they were to cut off their genitals. But by the end of this year, this measure will no longer be necessary.

From 21 December, policy providers will no longer be able to calculate premiums based on a person’s gender – because the European Court of Justice has deemed it ‘unfair’. And it’s women who’ll be affected most by the ruling. In fact, industry experts are predicting a ‘seismic’ impact on feminine purse strings across the country.

Currently, female drivers tend to get much cheaper car insurance because assessors consider them ‘low risk’. This is not because they necessarily have fewer accidents – men and women do, actually, have the same number of crashes – but because cars smashed up by men generally cost more for insurers to repair.

While some people assume it is therefore common sense to charge men more, the reality for safe, responsible drivers like myself – of which we are the majority – is anything but. Just look at the facts.

There’s a whopping 41 per cent discrepancy between the average annual premium for new male and female drivers, according to Gocompare.com – even before they’re on the road.

For young men of 17 and 18, the gap is even wider: an epic 88 per cent. Translate this to cash and men pay an extra £1,776 for exactly the same policy as the girl next door (even if she then goes out and crashes her car the following week).

This isn’t based on anything scientific like driving test score or psychological analysis; it’s just about gender. A sweeping generalisation which, for years, was considered ‘good’ sexism because it favoured girls. Proper Made in Dagenham stuff.

But what has made it worse is that men have never been able to prove themselves before getting stung. In addition, it takes years of having a no-claims bonus to even slightly reduce a man’s policy, while a woman’s could be re-priced from the bargain bin immediately after an accident. But no more.

Figures from the Association of British Insurers predict that female drivers will now see a 25 per cent price hike in their annual policy as the law levels out, while men can expect a 10 per cent reduction.

For the thousands of them who drive carefully and just happen to be 18, the change will be like a lottery-sized win: both financially and politically. For a men’s campaigner like me (with, by the way, more than ten years of accident-free driving under my seatbelt), it’s also the perfect Christmas gift.

But while politicians like Harriet Harman still like to claim that a gender pay gap exists, she happily ignores the life expectancy gap – because women have the advantage. This insurance surcharge for men – what I jokingly refer to as the 'penis tax' – is absolutely no different. But it is, dare I say it, complete nonsense.

Even though my very first car was a modest, second-hand Renault 5 which I started driving in 1997, I still had to fork out more money than a female friend who was bought a brand new, powerful VW by her father.

Even when one of my sisters had to be cut out of a car after she collided with a double-decker bus in London, her insurance remained LESS than mine (even though I had no time to drive because I was working double-shifts in my weekend job to pay for it).

Fifteen years on, I've still never had an accident – but am coughing up more money than that girl at college, even though her car got written off because she was applying make-up while driving.

Don't get me wrong, reckless racers should contribute more if they drive like idiots and put people at risk, but it's a policy that should apply across the board. That said, this isn't the fault of women. Far from it – the fault lies with the system. A lazy, unrefined industry which uses an out-dated, blanket way to calculate risk without seeing its customers as individuals. Something which, for any business, is always a car crash of an approach.

But it managed to thrive for so long because we live in a society that laughs at the so-called novelty of men being discriminated against (just look at those patronising Sheila's Wheels adverts – eugh!).

Thankfully, it's all about to change, but it won't be an easy pill for the sisterhood to swallow. Not least because it means the blame for bad driving can no long be placed solely at our door.

Gocompare.com's head of motor insurance, Scott Kelly, said: 'From 21 December insurers will be prohibited from using gender in their pricing. 'But, as our survey shows, there has been no equalization of rates to date, so the introduction of unisex pricing is likely to have a sudden, dramatic impact as insurers seem to be holding off until the last minute.

'We expect that the implementation of unisex rates will see premiums equalised at the higher male rate, rather than at the lower rate for females.

'If that is the case, women drivers will see their premiums rise by just over £300 on average, but for younger age groups the increase could be as much as £2,000.'

This might be an eye-watering amount to shell out before Christmas, but ladies, take comfort in the fact that we've been paying these rates since the beginning of time – whether we're good drivers or not. At the very least, you'll now know what it feels like to strive for a blemish-free, no-claims insurance policy. This can only be a good thing. On top of that, you'll also be buying into something that's now equal and balanced. New and improved.

After all, you can't put a price on fairness – unless you're an insurer, and then it's about £2,000.

AVFM News and Activism: Fidelbogen

October 9, 2012 | by James Huff | Link | Original Link

Tonight after a two week absence AVFM News and Activism will have as our guest well known and much celebrated MRM thought leader Fidelbogen. An essential subscription on every MRA's Youtube account, Fidelbogen's channel enjoys an active audience and his blog is considered amongst the best in the manosphere. We will be talking primarily about his favorite subject- Feminism and how feminists operate, interact with the world around them and also how they actually think. We will also be talking about the MRM, its future and current challenges to its cohesiveness and vision.

Please do not miss tonight's interview with this very important Men's Rights Activist. As always your calls are welcome and your input much valued.

The show airs live tonight, at 8:00 Central Time, US, which is 2:00 a.m. October 10th, in London and 11:00 a.m. October 9th, in Brisbane. If you have not yet requested membership in the Stickcam Room, you can do so through the link below. The call in number is 310-388-9709.

Lori B. Jackson recused from Kirk case by Chief Justice Ketchum

Snead goes double down on motion to gag Kirk, AVfM

In the case of Lt. Col. Joel Kirk, AVfM has been informed that State Supreme Court Chief Justice Ketchum has recused Judge Lori B. Jackson from the Kirk divorce case, and assigned it to Justice J. Jeffrey Culpepper of Monongalia County. The decision also puts a current motion to gag Lt. Col Kirk and A Voice for Men before Judge Culpepper.

This is ostensibly good news for Lt. Col. Kirk, as it has become abundantly clear that Jackson has acted inconsistently with the best interests of the Kirk children by allowing unsupervised access to them by their mother, Tina Taylor Kirk, who had been found by the court to be abusing them.

The grounds for the recusal were based on the negative impact of internet coverage of the case on Judge Jackson's perception of Lt. Col. Kirk.

This has apparently also created a reactionary move from Guardian Ad Litem Mary Snead. After Jackson was recused from the case, Snead filed an almost identical motion (that to gag Lt. col. Kirk and AVfM) in district court, effectively seeking concurrent jurisdiction of two courts in the case, which would keep litigation against Lt. Col. Kirk and A Voice for Men active in a court which is more closely tied to Snead and Jackson's realm of immediate influence.

More details on this will be posted as they become available.

October 10, 2012 | by Catherine Gibson | Link | Original Link

In May of 2008, Kristin Ruggiero used a pay-per-minute cell phone to frame her ex-husband for sending threatening messages. (See: Bogus text messages and a false report gets Ruggiero 7 1/2-12) "She was bitter about Jeffrey Ruggiero moving on with his life, and wanted to gain an edge in family court, assistant county attorney Jerome Blanchard said." Ruggiero jeopardized her ex-husband's career and deprived their daughter of a meaningful relationship with her father. Ruggiero was found guilty of 12 counts of falsifying evidence (one for each phony text message) and one count of giving a false report to police. The prosecutor said, "It's a great day for the real victims of domestic violence". The Judge called Ruggiero a "pathological liar". Not only did they throw the book at her on the original charges, sentenced to 7 1/2-12 years in prison, the states attorney investigated Ruggiero for additional crimes surrounding the trial and subsequently prosecuted her for perjury, witness tampering and related charges. That's how they deter false police reports, falsifying evidence and even perjury in New Hampshire. Not only did Ms. Ruggiero and her accomplices learn a lesson, everyone in that county and many in the state were indirectly deterred from similar criminal behavior.

Last month Tiffany Marie Smith, of Dover, Delaware was finally arrested. She had made 14 false police reports that resulted in nine false arrests of her ex-husband, Gordon Smith, the last one a terrifying experience for him, at gunpoint. She also perjured herself countless times using the false reports and resulting false arrests to obtain protection from abuse orders and file motions of civil contempt of those abuse orders. The woman is a maniacal, devious and evil individual. She used the police and courts for purposes of criminal harassment and as weapons of destruction against her ex-husband for a period of over three years. She was falsifying evidence back in July of 2010, if not before. (See: attempted frame) She was conspiring with others in her crimes against him at least back to August 9, 2010. (See: Tiffany, sister and boyfriend false report Aug. 9) Kristin Ruggiero's crimes pale in comparison.

October 10, 2012, Tiffany Smith is scheduled for arraignment in the Kent County, Delaware, Court of Common Pleas on the charges of filing three separate false reports. She was arraigned last month on the felony misstatement to police in the last false report where she cut herself and lay in a ditch in an effort to frame Gordon Smith for attempted murder and assault with a deadly weapon. She wrote threatening letters allegedly from her ex-husband. Similar to the Ruggiero case but much worse, many more false reports, with more serious charges and over a longer period of time. Mr. Ruggiero was able to resume his career, in the Coast Guard, that had only briefly been interrupted. Mr. Smith has been financially decimated in the last three and a half years and has been unable to find employment befitting his experience and expertise. Mr. Ruggiero was able to be vindicated and resume his life after a period of months where he was jailed for a week and faced the possibility of prison. Mr. Smith waited over three years to be vindicated during which time he suffered some twenty criminal charges and the daily threat that at any time Tiffany Smith could call and get a warrant on him, based solely on an unproven allegation and he could go to prison. Mr. Ruggiero got justice for the hell that he went through and the citizens of the state of New Hampshire got justice for the waste of police and prosecutorial resources and set an example for other would be Kristin Ruggieros. Mr. Smith is waiting to see if he will get justice for the hell he went through.

October 10th is an opportunity for Delaware Deputy Attorney General Gregory Babowal to add charges of falsifying the phony threatening notes, that were underlying in several false reports (see: Tiffany Marie Smith Perjury & False Reports)and harassment. It is also an opportunity for him to charge her with conspiracy and false report to the police on August 9, 2010, crimes that though known by police and prosecutors, and proven by an investigation after the false arrest of Gordon Smith, have thus far gone unpunished. It is also an opportunity for DAG Babowal to charge her with falsifying evidence and false report to the police for the July 22, 2010, failed attempt to have Gordon Smith arrested, with her first phony threatening letter.

Most of Ms. Smith's false reports were she said, he said, and there was not enough evidence to prosecute Gordon Smith but conversely there is not enough evidence to prosecute Tiffany Smith for false reports either. Of the 14 false reports five never got off the ground with police. Of the remaining that resulted in his false arrest, in only six is there sufficient evidence of false reports to take to trial and get a conviction against Tiffany Smith. That is a problem for many other victims of the crime of false report to police. Not enough evidence to exonerate them and remove the cloud suspicion of the accusation and prosecute the real criminals. Not every false report to police can be proven.

When Ms. Smith produced two phony letters, on August 18, Mr. Smith was hit with a plethora of charges, felony stalking and seven misdemeanors. Ms. Smith has only been charged with three false reports, of the five between July 28 and August 28 and making a false statement in a felony investigation. Why weren't the charges of falsifying evidence and harassment included? Already it seems that she's headed for getting off with only a slap on the wrist in Delaware.

Had Tiffany Smith been in New Hampshire and seen what happened to Kristin Ruggiero in 2008 maybe she would not have begun her onslaught, of false reports against Gordon Smith. Maybe she wouldn't have destroyed his career and put him in fear for his life and liberty. Maybe her sons wouldn't have been deprived of a normal healthy relationship with their father in their early lives. Certainly, others that saw Ruggiero slammed by the Courts in NH were deterred and that is a big benefit and it is, as that prosecutor said, "a victory for the real victims of domestic violence". What will happen in Delaware? What lessons will the would be Tiffany Smiths learn?

Not for Gordon Smith but for the sake of all those falsely accused, for men and women everywhere, Tiffany Smith must be prosecuted fully on the charges that she has already been arrested for and additionally charged with falsifying evidence, criminal harassment and with, at a minimum, the false report and criminal conspiracy of August 9, 2010. That is the only way to have justice in Delaware.

Call the office of the Attorney General Joseph Biden and tell the prosecutors that we demand justice. Let them know that people, not just in Kent County or Delaware are watching but people around the world are watching to see what example they set. Will the state's attorney in Delaware condone falsifying evidence, conspiracy and false reports or will they do what the state's attorney did in New Hampshire and show that these crimes won't be tolerated?

(The Chief of Criminal Division in Kent County is Ken Haltom and the prosecuting Deputy Attorney General is Greg Babowal and their phone number is 302-739-4211 and their fax is 302-739-7652. AG Biden's office is 302-577-8500 and the email address for all of them is Attorney.General@state.DE.US

This is the second court appearance for Tiffany Smith. Let's make sure that the current charges hold and additional charges be filed.)

Note from Dean Esmay: At this writing, despite multiple hearings Gordon Smith still has a bogus Protection from Abuse order against him due to legalistic footdraggign. He has still not gotten custody of his children and although he has been granted visitation, other officials are dragging their heels on getting him more than limited visitation. In the meantime, Tiffany remains uncharged with multiple crimes, among which Catherine Gibson is one of her victims since some of the exact same "crimes" Tiffany reported against Gordon were also reported against Catherine. We support Catherine's efforts for justice for herself as well as for Gordon and his children. Tiffany Marie Smith needs to pay the full penalty for her crimes, otherwise Beau Biden and the entire state of Delaware will have established that it's easy to get away with filing false police reports and lying to police investigators if you're a woman in Delaware. Are you listening or what, Delaware?

MRA hunger strike

October 10, 2012 | by Dan Perrins | Link | Original Link

I'm middle aged and am a men's rights activist. I have been active since early in 2009.

I was asked to write about a series of events that happened to me which was part of my activism. It is also part of the reason why I have been diagnosed with what is today called Post Traumatic Stress Disorder or PTSD. In other wars now gone it was called "Shell Shock". It's the same thing but this war is protracted and is older than me.

I refer to the Barton street jail as the "Barton Bellagio" [1] to help diffuse my anger at a corrupt and feminist dictated "justice" system. What follows is my account of my fourteen day hunger strike in response to the "care" I was given by the Ontario justice system.

Please note, my incarceration was due to the allegation of a verbal threat. On August 24, 2010 I was at a neighbour's when I got a call that the police were coming to take me into custody. It really was quite a spectacle to see; five or six police officers with tazers drawn and ready to use them on me. I left my friend's residence and was only fifty feet from my home. There was a smoke behind my ear.

The police ran across the street (one so pumped he tripped and fell) and with tazers still drawn I gave no struggle. The officer who was to transport me to the Hamilton Central police station for processing let me have that smoke before we left. He was decent.

On the journey he asked me what all this was about and why there were so many officers instructed to respond. I said, "everything I am about to tell you is hypothetical," thereby removing any ability of what I said to be used in court against me.

He was still left questioning why so many officers were called to take me into custody. I said to him, "It is because I have been in a war for equality with the 'justice' system for about a year now and I was kicking ass, taking badge numbers and filing complaints."

There are definitely good officers on the force, and there are also some very nefarious individuals. This officer was a good one. The bad ones really shook my mental health.

At the Hamilton Central police station they processed me and I informed them right away that I was now on a hunger strike.

I told them "Don't even bother bringing me a sandwich." They did anyway. It made for a decent pillow and I left it behind when I was taken to court the next morning for my first appearance, a bail hearing, which I did not get.

Apparently, living here in the Ontario community all your life with your family in the same city makes you a flight risk, even if you have no criminal record. So no bail for me as I was deemed a 'bounder.' I was taken from the court room to a holding cell for transportation to the Barton Street Bellagio.

At the jail I was processed further. I was fingerprinted and my medical information was recorded. I was given a shot to test for tuberculosis and given papers explaining what is expected of me and what I was entitled to when incarcerated. They took my picture.

I told the intake person I wanted a few 8×10′s of that picture. “I prefer matte finish and can you please throw in a few wallet-sized, too?” Again I like to use humour to diffuse a situation. I was placed in segregation under medical watch because the hunger strike had begun for real.

I was sent to Segregation, and this is standard operating procedure when a person makes it known they are on a hunger strike. “Segregation” is a place inside incarceration. Criminals who would most likely be injured or killed by other inmates go there. Prisoners who are to be punished go to segregation.

My first few days in Segregation I was denied the general things that prisoners have. Things like two books, one of them for fun and one for spiritual reasons. I had no writing instruments.

After about a day I stopped my intake of liquids. Here’s why: I was moved to a range on the third floor but was still kept locked up in a form of segregation. My whole time there this was how it was and I knew this was wrong.

On the first night when the evening nurse stopped by my cell I accepted a couple of Advils from her. I took nothing else.

On the second night another nurse discovered I had had no water in 24 hours. She rushed me to the medical office and we struck a deal. I would start to ingest water that night but no food. She had me back in segregation but now under 24 hour CC-TV surveillance. That was on Friday.

One of the correction officers, a good guy, was a former marine. I recognized his ring and asked him if he was a Semper Fi guy. “Semper fi” is short for Semper Fidelis [2] it is the official motto of the United States Marine Corps.

He said that he was and “how did I know that?” I said I had friends in the military on both sides of the border. He then did something decent. He asked “Why are you on a hunger strike?” I told him some facts and statistics and said, “I am not in the military but as a citizen it is up to me to protect the rights of those who are serving.” He instantly got it because he was committed to fighting for his country’s constitution. I was doing the same but on a different front. That front was the seedy underbelly of proxy violence men go through every day in the courts.

I thought of the movie “Papillion” [3]. I thought of that little door opening and how food is passed through it. In my case the food just sat there in that little doorway in front of me. I had black tea and coffee. I refused the sugar.

I was moved to the cell right across from the guard’s office in the segregation unit. God bless that nurse she was doing her job and making sure I was being checked in on fairly regularly and I was finally given a pencil and some paper. I put that pencil to good use.

The first thing I did with that pencil was to write quotes from some of history’s greatest thinkers up on the walls that surrounded me. “They can because they think they can”, and “We must vigilantly stand on guard within our own borders for human rights “[4] now looked back at me as silent friends. I thanked John Diefenbaker and Virgil for those words.

That first weekend was not quite over, and the Ontario Ombudsman received a call from me. I told him about the hunger strike and the cruel and unusual punishment being inflicted on me. He learned from me in that call I was denied reading materials and “yard” time.

On Monday I had visitors. First a shrink.

“No I don’t hear voices. I have no imaginary friends. I am not thinking of killing anybody or myself.”

Then, he heard me say this, “I sure am angry about how men are being treated in the ‘justice’ system today.” Before he left I said, “I am using the only tool I have at my disposal.”

Next up was the warden, the captain and the lieutenant. I think a doctor was with them.

When they walked into my cell they looked around. They saw the fifteen or so quotations on the wall. They saw the chess board I had scribbled on my concrete bed with the paper chess pieces I made, and they saw the calendar I marked up on the wall. The look on their faces was not one of fear but more like an “oh shit.” The look on their faces is burned into my brain.

I could almost see the shared thought bubble over their heads, “This guy has no reference books so how did he get the quotes?” There was trepidation in that room and it was not from me.

The conversation consisted of me explaining and invoking my right not to be treated cruel and in an unusual manner while in medical segregation for a hunger strike. I was not there to be punished for some act committed in the jail. I was in there because a protected chartered right, the freedom of expression. I also invoked my right to my two books and my right to get some time in outside. I informed them that as I was representing myself I would need to have access to legal books.

I told them facts on how men are being heinously treated by the “justice” system today.

They promptly gave me a crappy-ass romance novel and a bible making my access to legal books a non-event. I never saw a book on legal matters because they made sure I never did.

I then settled into a routine, I’d wake up have my black coffee and read the bible before meditating for half hour or longer. After this I would read the crappy-ass book and then lunch would come. I would drink the back tea, do some more reading of my crappy-ass book and then grab an afternoon nap. A shower in the afternoon, then a dinner of black tea, more reading of the bible followed by the crappy-ass book. Sometimes ‘lights-out’ would happen and I wasn’t sleepy. Those nights I would drag my mattress to the door to grab the slice of light coming from the space near the hinges. That way I could read until I was tired.

There were quite a few days where I had to appear at court for bail hearings and they didn’t make life easier for me. I was put in the basement of the court house and I swear I could almost see my breath down there.

My matter would be called up I would appear before a justice of the peace or judge bail and it would be denied and so around and around we'd go, however, there were a couple of things of note regarding my court appearances for bail.

One time, standing before the justice of the peace, I started reciting about how the charter[5] guarantees me bail unless there is just cause. (section 11 e) The lawyers in that room, and the other players in the criminal court system knew about my hunger strike and then the justice of the peace said something absolutely incredible.

"I don't give a damn what the charter says"

That was incredible in itself, but then something truly astounding happened. The lawyers (who are considered the officers of the court and are obligated to report when a judiciary acts improperly) stood up en masse and left the court room.

I responded by addressing the justice of the peace with the illegality of my treatment and he barked to the special constables.

"Remove this man from my court immediately."

He had just fucked up and he knew it. He also knew my ability to prove it was zero because of the lawyers and their 'land-rush' to the exit. Accountability dies when ears are absent, and with its death stronger men need brothers. Perhaps it was at that moment I realised that a hunger strike is pain and pain makes you alone. Very alone.

Another appearance for bail was before a judge and once again I recited the charter and its guarantee of bail unless there is just cause. The crown launched their argument and the judge ruled:

"I am not going to deal with this"

I guess she knew the illegalities of what was happening and wanted no part of it.

I was moved around again and given a cell where the sink was plugged up and had what looked like fecal matter floating around in it. I called the ombudsman about this and was then taken back to segregation. Before I was moved I was threatened by an overly "nice" female guard. When she threatened me I went right over to the wall and wrote her words and signed it with the date. I did it right there in front of her so she could see I didn't care about her threats.

Yeah, I get a little pissed about this shit, but hey, I'm male it don't matter right? And I ain't afraid to let those who pissed me off know it right to their face if I can. Actually no, I am afraid but I will do it anyway. This was my anger in action.

When I started getting yard-time I noticed something curious. A guard was appointed to sit with me and he listened very carefully as I spoke of my situation. I spoke about how men are being treated lower than animals and he sat there writing it all down.

At that time my knowledge about men's issues was limited to the criminal side of things. The guard was not doing this for his own pleasure. He was appointed by the crown to gather evidence to strengthen their case in court. I played along and let him write away on statistics, recent court cases and news articles.

The thing is, guards are compellable witnesses for cases and their notes are admissible in court. This one was on a mission. He was their gleaming white knight, and was by his own volition (boot licking for a promotion?) a self-appointed funnel through which reams of data flowed in for the courts to dissect. (Because of this funnel, the courts now knew exactly my position on the DV industry and its corruption via lies and fear mongering.) No other guards took notes, just him, and he was quite fastidious.

One day I received an over-sized set of coveralls and a nefarious guard said “I heard you’ll be putting on weight today.” I told him I was 140 pounds yesterday and my bet is that by day’s end I would weigh 138 and a half. He had a half ass “fuck you” smile on his face and bet my weight would be 141.

So here I was, incarcerated for an utterance not meant and fighting back with a hunger strike and making bets about my weight with a flesh-robot.

On day six the captain spoke to me in his office and he was confused. “Why are you doing this?”

I explain how my eyes have been opened now for over a year about the quiet war on our sex. I explain many things to him right there and it pours out easily and without remitting. I tell him of the numerous complaint letters I have written to many government officials and of reading their replies of no accountability. I let him know of how the family courts rely on many players to reinforce their bond with each other with a quick nod off the radar. I explain how the police, judiciaries, lawyers, bailiffs and judges each grease their appointed wheel and the furnace that powers the big engine is stoked with men. Yes captain, there really is a war going on, and the primary victims are men and boys. He listens to me, he is sympathetic and he understands me clearly.

“My choice is easy and it was simple. Not one more inch will I retreat. I will not leave this mess for the next guy to clean up.”

The application for bail and its subsequent refusal every time was taxing me physically and emotionally while my resolve was gaining strength. Nobody could take that from me. That was mine for keeps.

Every time I was transported down for a bail hearing I would talk to the guys in the transport. I would tell them about the quiet war against men and boys and how vast and deeply rooted the corruption was. I even gave advice about how to spot shifty lawyers and their well-worn tactic of wrangling the law in such a twisted way that nobody of relevance could know what was going on.

One day I came back from court and my cell was being searched and I wondered why they would do this as I was under twenty four hour surveillance anyway.

Another time my lieutenant “buddy” smuggled in an ice cream bar.

“Come on, don’t you want the ice cream?”

I smiled and remembered a story from a few years back. I said “Hey Louie you remember a guard a few years back named Laslo X?” (Laslo had been caught smuggling drugs into the jail some years earlier)

He replied “Yah I remember him.”

I said “I heard he was asking about you, something about a business proposition.”

Stupid asshole, I thought to myself. Do anything for the system and screw anybody who stands up for what’s right. He was pissed and his voice was raised as he walked to the guard’s station.

“They are afraid he is going to turn this into a Bobby Sands[6] situation.”

Ah, now who are “they”? Were they his immediate superiors or the Ontario attorney general perhaps? I didn’t know who exactly, but I knew the “Justice-Hydra” had three heads to choose from – the police, the Crown or judiciary. By this stage I was very well rehearsed with how each of those heads talk. Those three heads talk much of justice, and they always deliver their version of it depending on their motivation at the time.

On the second weekend I was told I was being moved to another floor. They explained that five suicide attempts had been made recently and my cell was needed. They were being unusually decent with me and it set my bullshit-beeper ringing.

I reminded myself to never let my defences down with anyone whose compliance to the law ensures a paycheck.

I was promptly moved up to the third floor and this means the powers at hand cranked “the game” up a notch. You see, the third floor is for those with mental illnesses. I was now in the midst of the drug afflicted and the confused and the very angry. In fact, everyone there was mentally disturbed, and the Alpha males vied for the driver seat.

An Alpha male saw I was not eating anything and he didn’t like that I gave my meals to a different person each time. He wanted them for himself, and my standing my ground caused an incident.

My bullshit-beeper started ringing when out of the blue a Beta male engaged me in a way designed to distract. He was very much “out of character” and his step now fell with mine as we walked. A guard followed closely behind us and in our path was the Alpha, and he was approaching with something cupped in his hand. I did not take my eyes from him as I walked, and at the last moment the “distractor” at my side figured I wasn’t buying it and the two of them immediately left the scene as I entered the safety of my cell.

I have no doubt that I narrowly missed coming to grief with that incident, but who was there to listen to me? Sure, I knew that speaking to a guard would get me labelled as a rat and so that avenue was strictly out, but what about the medical staff? The same medical staff who had falsified their reports about me for two days?

Apparently, I had been looked after very carefully. I had been weighed and all the usual things were done. My blood pressure was apparently taken and blood tests were apparently performed. I have no memory of it, and my “memory” came off second best to some writing on a medical chart.

The next day was the last day of Summer and I was locked in my cell. I was grateful to see (through a tiny window) the annual football match between the Hamilton Tigercats and the Toronto Argonauts before my transfer the next day. This time I was going straight to high security on the fourth floor. They had taken it up another notch.

The fourth floor held those who were violent. I was now mingling with murderers and men who had committed robbery with guns and other weapons and when I arrived they gathered around me and asked questions. I watched one man crafting a makeshift shiv from two pencils bound with paper[7]. While he is doing this he calmly tells me that he heard from a guard that I am a rat.

I did the only thing I could do, and that was to tell them how my unpopular opinions have pissed off the wrong people. They begin to understand more when I explain that my hunger strike has caused those same people to dig deeper into their illegal bag of tricks in order to "win" this game. I could see by the look in their eyes that they were beginning to see me in a different light. They understood that I was not the usual type to be there. I sometimes wonder to this day if some of those that gathered about me still remember my "weird" words about the war on men and boys. Did I ever nudge one onto a path where they now see the world differently? I'll never know of course.

The next day was yet another bail hearing, and by this stage those that were simply annoyed by me were now quite angry. Their voices were much shriller this time, and their words heavier with new threats telling of dire consequences for me if I did not sign the bail agreement. I was not moved an inch by this new development and the Crown knew it.

They played one more card and it worked very well, they ripped into my mother while she was in the witness box. They had me in that court room watching an appointed lawyer tear right through her and they knew I would fold. They were right. I broke down and signed the bail agreement that day.

The bail agreement was that I had to live at my mother's residence and I could not leave the property without her being in my presence.

I do not want it forgotten that the events of fourteen days told here were experienced by a person who did not have a criminal record and was representing themselves in court.

Some days I wish I never accepted the bail agreement and on other days I am thankful for signing it.

Sometimes I say I miss the Barton Bellagio. They were just getting my dry cleaning right. They got the right amount of starch in the collar and cuffs of my uniform, and there was a mint under my pillow with my covers turned down at night.

Sometimes laughter is the best medicine.

Filler faces political imprisonment

October 11, 2012 | by Act for AVfM | Link | Original Link

Vladek Filler has been ordered to report to jail on October 17, 2012. For anyone not familiar with the details of prosecutor Mary Kellett's misconduct and pending disciplinary actions in the Vladek Filler case details can be found here.

For the past 1 ½ years, AVfM, SAVE, NCFM, F&F and many others have advocated for justice for Vladek Filler after his now ex-wife Ligia Filler made false spousal rape and assault accusations against him during their divorce and child custody dispute. Vladek won sole custody of his children but was criminally prosecuted for 5 ½ years by ADA Mary N. Kellett and her office. Maine Courts and the Board of Overseers of the Bar concluded that Kellett engaged in prosecutorial misconduct and her public disciplinary hearing will now be held on October 22-23 at the Penobscott Judicial Center in Bangor.

Kellett and her DA office's misconduct yielded a fraudulent class D misdemeanor assault conviction against Vladek Filler for one allegation that he shoved his wife in 2007. For that conviction, the judge Robert E. Murray sentenced him to 21 days in Mary Kellett's jail and the Law Court refused to address charges of misconduct in the retrial.

Kellett's disciplinary hearing was originally scheduled to take place in August and DA Carletta Bassano wrote a letter to the Court demanding a warrant for Vladek Filler's arrest before he was scheduled to testify at Kellett's hearing.

In July and August AVFM initiated a campaign to contact Maine officials. SAVE Services issued several press releases calling on Judge Robert E. Murray to vacate Vladek Filler's fraudulent conviction and for Mary Kellett'sdisbarment at her disciplinary hearing. After suffering injuries in an auto accident in Atlanta, Vladek Filler was granted a 2 month stay of sentence until October 17, but Mary Kellett's August 31 disciplinary hearing was then unexpectedly cancelled due to what the press called 'witness availability' issues. As Vladek Filler was available, it is not clear whether the suddenly unavailable witness became Kellett herself. But she is apparently available now and her hearing has been rescheduled to take place on October 22-23 in Bangor once again coinciding with Vladek Filler's 21 day detention in Kellett's jail.

Sadly, it does not stop there. Since Vladek Filler was granted a stay of sentence in August, Kellett's colleague ADA Paul F. Cavanaugh Jr. took it upon himself to contact Vladek Filler's healthcare providers in Atlanta apparently to intimidate them in to providing information about Vladek and to accuse Vladek of falsifying medical letters "in an effort to avoid jail." The part about the jail was key in order to spread fear and suspicion among Vladek's healthcare providers. Apparently it worked. According to court documents Vladek was immediately denied completion of ordered medical treatment. Kellett's corrupt DA office has reduced itself to a gang of thugs using the color of law and State power to terrorize and hold key witnesses in their jail.

Mary Kellett

One wonders what the Board of Overseers is willing to do about Mary Kellett and her office's unabated corruption. The answer is not clear. AVfM has learned evidence exists which conclusively proves Mary Kellett's rampant misconduct, withholding of vital facts and evidence and lying to judges and jury members in a ruthless manner that makes Michael Nifong look like a choirboy. The Board of Overseers presumably has evidence that Kellett engaged in very serious misconduct, violated court orders, withheld vital discovery, and ordered numerous police officers to violate defense subpoenas and withhold evidence from Vladek Filler's attorneys. Just those few charges warrant Mary Kellett's immediate firing, then disbarment and criminal prosecution.

Yet the signs and continued misconduct coming out of Maine suggests Kellett's accountability might not be sought to the degree it clearly warrants. Kellett has not even been suspended after the Board of Overseers found back in September 2011 that probable cause exists that Kellett engaged in serious misconduct. In fact, neither Mary Kellett, nor her boss DA Carletta Bassano, nor Kellett's assistant ADA Paul Cavanaugh Jr. have even blushed as a result of the Board of Overseers disciplinary actions, and the Attorney General's office is legally representing Kellett instead of criminally prosecuting her.

This past June, just weeks prior to Kellett initially scheduled disciplinary hearing, she prosecuted two more completely innocent men for sex crimes without any probable cause whatsoever. One man was prosecuted for sexual assault for touching his sister in law's waist which Kellett argued was rape. It took a trial for a judge to finally throw the case out.

When questioned by Bangor Daily News reporter, Kellett was quoted as declaring that so long as her office (meaning she) believes the accuser's story then that alone is enough to obligate her to criminally prosecute the accused. Any lawyer would say that policy is a clear violation of the law and Bar rules governing prosecutor's responsibility, code of conduct, and evidentiary requirements for pursuing criminal prosecutions. Yet Kellett, who apparently never met a woman she didn't believe, openly admits to local newspapers on the eve of her disciplinary hearing that she engages in what is clearly harassment and civil rights abuse of men. Attorney Robert Franklin analyzed Kellett's June 2012 misconduct in his article titled "ADA Kellett Strikes Out in Two More Cases."

The question remains what will the Board of Overseers do about a corrupt prosecutor and a DA office that is so out of control that they openly without fear of recourse corrupt the justice system, local law enforcement, and openly lie in Maine Courts to punish innocent men like Vladek Filler. Who is going to stop their crime spree and hold them to any meaningful account? If the Board of Overseers cannot even remove the likes of Mary Kellett from her prosecutorial throne, then it is clear that Maine is simply not capable of enforcing its own rules to protect the public from corrupt and abusive officials.

Now comes Vladek Filler, a man who after two criminal trials and two appeals still refuses to give up his fight. He has now filed for appointment of counsel for a post conviction motion to vacate his fraudulent conviction and for another stay of sentence so Vladek can complete his denied medical treatment. Now some of you might imagine that DA Carletta Bassano's office would not object to allowing a man they know is innocent to continue to remain free on his $50k bail to get medical treatment for a few extra weeks, but you would be completely wrong. No need to take my word for it, now comes Kellett's assistant ADA Paul Cavanaugh Jr. to make it blatantly clear why Kellett's office is objecting to Vladek Filler's motion for stay of sentence. The objection states:

> [Vladek Filler] has been heavily involved in the bar complaint against ADA Kellett. Her hearing is scheduled for the end of October. Will [he] be well enough to travel to attend the multiple day hearing in Bangor? If so, he is well enough to meet his obligation for this sentence.

The objection does not really center on whether Vladek Filler is "well enough" to be denied medical treatment but instead it centers Vladek being "heavily involved in the bar complaint against ADA Kellett" and asking whether he will in fact appear to testify against her, and "if so" then the DA office is objecting to his stay for medical treatment. You cannot make this stuff up.

It is another arrogant admission by a DA office that is seeking to punish and retaliate against their victim for filing a complaint and appearing to give testimony against a corrupt prosecutor. If any private law firm engaged in such intimidation of a witness there would be criminal charges, but DA Carletta Bassano's office flaunts its unaccountability. So what will the Hancock County Court, the Board of Overseers, and the Attorney General's office do about the malicious prosecution, false conviction, and political imprisonment of Vladek Filler?

This man has been deprived of due process and a fair trial for 5 ½ years and prevented from presenting clear evidence of fraud and misconduct committed against him. If his motion for stay is denied he will be taken and remain in custody as a political prisoner during Kellett's disciplinary hearing without any contact with the outside world for 21 days. He will certainly not be able to speak to reporters or anyone else about how he is being treated in Kellett's jail.

As it stands, Kellett's disciplinary hearing will be held on October 22-23, 2012 at the Penobscot Judicial Center in Bangor Maine. These historic proceeding against a sitting prosecutor are a first in the State of Maine and will be open to the public and the media. Select instances of misconduct chosen from Filler's disturbing Bar complaint will be presented by Bar Counsel J. Scott Davis. Prosecutor Mary Kellett will be represented by assistant attorney general Ronald W. Lupton.

The hearing will be presided over by a 3 member panel that will decide whether Kellett's lying, withholding of evidence, violation of court orders, and ordering police officers to withhold evidence rises to the level for her to be disbarred. AVfM has managed to identify the 3 panel members as M. Ray Bradford, Jr., Esq, Sarah McPartland-Good Esq, and Norman A. Ross. These panel members apparently live or practice law in the greater Bangor and Ellsworth area and according to the Maine Board of Overseers of the Bar's website Kellett's boss DA Carletta Bassano also sits on the same Grievance Commission with all 3 of these panel members that will decide Kellett's fate.

The crimes and civil rights abuse of DA Carletta Bassano's office has caused corruption of the justice system and abuse of countless men and families. It is time for that crime syndicate to be held to account and put out of business.

AVfM is calling on 3 immediate actions to be taken on behalf of Vladek Filler and justice in Maine.

- We are asking supporters to call on the Hancock County Court to free Vladek Filler and vacate his conviction on post-conviction review. The contact info is Hancock County Superior Court, 50 State Street, Ellsworth, Maine 04605 Phone: 207-667-7176 then press "0".
- Call on the Board of Overseers of the Bar and the 3 member Grievance Panel to hold prosecutor Mary Kellett accountable by recommending her disbarment. Grievance Panel Members: Chair M. Ray Bradford, Jr., Esq, Sarah McPartland-Good Esq and Norman A. Ross. Contact info: Board of Overseers of the Bar, 97 Winthrop Street, P. O. Box 527 Augusta, Maine 04332-0527. Phone: 207-623-1121 Fax: 207-623-4175 E-mail: board@mebaroverseers.org
- Anyone in Maine or with the ability to travel there who is sick and tired of the abuse and corruption that this now infamous prosecutor and her DA office has unleashed on men and boys is urged to attend this historic disciplinary hearing in Bangor Maine on October 22-23. Come to show your support for justice, bring signs and statistics and camcorders to witness and document the proceedings for the whole world to see how a prosecutor who lies and abuses her community is dealt with by Maine Courts, the Board of Overseers, and by the Attorney General's office. It is important to show support for Vladek Filler and his 5 ½ year battle with one of the most man hating and corrupt prosecutors in the US.

Picture a walrus, basking on the beach amongst a bakers dozen of doe eyed females. He spots another male at the fringes of his territory and with a tremendous bellow, runs at him.

Ah, there is 'the one good man'! The one man deserving of all women's adoration because he's simply better then all other men, including you, the bad man, the interloper at the edge of the harem.

His quivering women are afraid of you. And in their fear he finds his weapon—self-righteous fury—and the will to do violence against you.

Their fear will also be his undoing. When it's his turn to be the bad man. But right now, you are.

Join us on AVFM radio as we observe the habits and lifecycle of 'the one good man'.

The (current) rules of gender reality

October 11, 2012 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

The Rules are as old as the hills. The rules constrain and dictate our understanding of gender reality. The Rules are rigidly enforced by psychic energies much more powerful than fact and logic. The Rules may be summed up as follows:

Rule One: Toward men and masculinity we direct accountability without compassion, which is ruthless. It is respecting men as autonomous and empowered beings responsible for their own decisions and predicaments, but it is not loving men enough to recognize their true vulnerability to forces outside their control and to lend men their fair share of empathy.

Rule Two: Toward women and femininity we direct compassion without accountability, which is infantilizing. It is loving women as vulnerable beings to be protected, but it is not respecting women enough to recognize their true power, autonomy, and accountability as equal partners equally responsible for outcomes.

Rule Three: Men have the power and women are the victims. For humans with penises, victim is an illegitimate concept. For humans with vaginas, power is an illegitimate concept.

Rule Four: Men are Bad; women are Good. And, therefore . . .

Rule Five: All Fault Is Male.

Rule Six: Females are not subject to critique. A critique of the feminine is “misogyny” and is forbidden.

Rule Seven: In the sexes relationship to each other: men reject victim, embrace shame; women rejected shame, embrace victim.

These are The Rules. We at NCFM break these rules but the rest of the world follows these rules with blind devotion. Any facts or logic that happen to support The Rules are embraced, which allows the Rule followers to believe that facts and logic dictate their beliefs. Any facts or logic that contradict The Rules are rejected, which proves that their gender beliefs have nothing to do with facts and logic. When it comes to gender belief systems, gender politics, gender policies, and gender “common knowledge,” humans are in thrall to the following irrational considerations: sentimentality, instinct, chivalry, Eros, the mere physical appearance and vocal characteristics of men and women, plus the myths and mythos that date all the way back to the mighty Odysseus and the fair Helen of Troy. Against these monumental psychic forces, logic doesn’t stand a chance.

This conundrum is deepened even further when we consider that humans are not machines. Humans cannot thrive on logic alone. Sentimentality does have a vital role to play in the human mind and in the human heart. What is romance without the ritual pleasantries of gender?

As I see it, this is what we’re up against, and it is huge!

Because our message is in accord with facts and logic (in my experience), it's fairly easy to gain some measure of agreement out of most of the people we meet. But, because our message is contrary to sentiment, those same people are rarely willing to commit to our cause. Meanwhile, other people are appalled and would have us categorized as "hate crime"!

But paradigms, even passionately but irrationally held paradigms (i.e., an earth-centered universe) have been overturned in the past. The MalePower/FemaleVictimization paradigm is nowhere near as unassailable as it once was. "Truth will out."

Tim Goldich

The above piece was written by Tim Goldich and is reprinted here with his permission. Our view at AVfM is that these rules he lays out need to be broken. Tim is the President of the Chicago chapter of the National Coalition for Men. He is the author of Loving Men, Respecting Women: The Future of Gender Politics, which we highly recommend purchasing.

The proxy violence of passive acceptance

October 13, 2012 | by J Galt | Link | Original Link

At an earlier time in my life during a counseling session after recounting some of my life experiences I was asked by the counselor why I had never killed anyone. It was a strange question that I felt deserved a strange answer. I told her that in fact I kill myself over and over again every day. It may have been a valid question she posed but I know from my own experience that violence is a choice.

To make an appropriate choice regarding violence I've had to invest enough passionate thought to equal and argue against the passion of rage that shields my fear; obviously it will always be a work in progress. Some may notice in the previous statement that I didn't use the term "right choice" but instead "appropriate choice." Violence in life whether you like it or not is unavoidable. The question will always remain as to whether it is appropriate, and determining that takes education, insight and self- understanding.

Violence is a behavior and an experience that each of us as individuals lives with. Collectively we either agree or disagree as to its appropriateness. This isn't a rant to join the non-violence party; moreover you should as an individual get to know your terms of violence and how you express it. Each of us is violent, IMO.

As a child I was content playing with dinky toys in my backyard, building super cities in sand, alone. My sister approached and kicked my future dinky utopia, annihilating my dreams. She got pummeled as best as a five year old can, obviously not enough to make it into any meaningful statistics or studies but hey I was satisfied. Of course what followed was proxy violence. Daaaad Keith hit me! Thump, whack, waaaaaaa!!!! But hey I got custody of the dinky toys.

Violence is a process; it has a beginning and middle ground and a final aspect that is understood to be dangerous. It is believed by all that the dangerous aspects of violence are only dangerous to the victim and never to the perpetrator. It is less likely I believe that people have any interest in actually ending violence; rather we prefer an organized process to violence, or rules of engagement. Violence is fine if we can justify its appropriateness, apply it with prudence and restraint and never enjoy it.

These simple rules to me are true on both the micro and macro scale. The range in which we justify violence by these rules is applied from moderate corporal punishment against children to the invasion and annihilation of another country and culture. If these terms are met our violence is for sale and we are comfortable in the notion of our own benevolence (or "bene"= good, "volence" = violence).

For my part I'm much more cynical about violence. I see it applied as a method of maintaining the status-quo, maintaining power and a controlling influence, an aggressive self-interest. By these standards I see violence everywhere because these operators have the ability to incite violence. I don't need to see blood to understand the expression of violence, the oppression it imposes and the fear it invokes.

I see it in the rapid dilation of the pupil, the stillness of body language and the silent response of incremental withdrawal. I know that most bruises are not black and blue just black and pasted in our psyche without any corresponding support to heal them. The contradiction they represent internally is the shortcut to fear. Without fear all the conditions to arrive at or avoid violence can't be fulfilled.

Years ago I was admonished by a kindergarten teacher to punish my son for his behavior. During circle time in the class she would read the kids a story and when she looked up noticed my son was not there. Looking out the window she saw him playing outside by himself. No doubt she tore a strip off him at the time, but also required that I do the same: she required that I do violence to my son on her behalf.

Interestingly, had I accepted her narrative, I would have been left to believe that there was no good reason for my son's behavior. What if there was a reason, how would a five year old represent his case? I refused her demand and simply asked "do you think he knew that he was not allowed?" Like a good defense lawyer I played the reasonable doubt card and looked to the next witness to better understand the case. I will explain the rule but I won't punish him for exercising options he believed were available.

There were three things I immediately realized in this exchange:

1) Education is not about submission.

2) Punishment for a victimless crime is less effective than negotiating a collaborative outcome.

3) Moral hegemony is an arousal system for idiots of the collective.

I condense violence to a simple understanding: a requirement to submit. If I were more philosophical I would call it the "entropy of stability." If you want to see where violence begins, look to the circumstances that contribute to instability or the efforts to destabilize. If you believe that violence is washed away by the Duluth Model of Domestic Violence or the family courts, or that feminism has ushered in an era of sensitive egalitarian empathy for equality, think again.

We tend to focus only on the physically aggressive outcomes of violence ignoring the subtle aspects of its beginning and middle ground. It is the beginning and middle ground, where the narrative is assembled, where violence and its proxy are fostered and assigned. It is the narrative that invokes moral arousal and is likely to define the extent of violence expressed.

The moment we base our violence and its requirements to submit on a single narrative, a single perspective, we are not more than objects, economic materials and inventory. No thanks, I'd rather close my eyes and float among the stars.

Some time ago I watched a documentary called "A Class Divided," presented as an experiential example of bigotry and racism, another form of proxy violence. The roles of oppression were implemented and reversed based on the eye color of the students. The film is incredible, the lesson is profound. Jane Elliot is brilliant. However I saw something more in the film that I have yet to ever see mentioned:

The film is an interesting onion of insight; of course there is the obvious message that we affect each other with our beliefs. It is clearly represented in the film that benefit is bestowed to some withheld from others. Please, spend the fourteen minutes to view this clip:

What I would ask you to consider during your viewing is not just the color of eyes used as a metaphor to make the experience of racism interchangeable, but consider gender as the operator that bestows or removes benefit.

Notice also that very common human behaviors are defined with moral judgment and used to dehumanize. Once coupled with a designated difference, we have a power structure that breathes evil and hate. It is a process to dehumanize and a message that damages both sides of its meaning. The bigotry the rules of belief provide conjure a life of their own and they stand taller than the individuals required to submit.

It represents itself as a system of oppression whose purest form oppresses both the perpetrator and the victim with a unique set of values. Who among us can escape the color of our eyes, or our skin, or our sex, or our disability?

To hate in this predefined way is a practice that we should be able to resist. We know it's wrong, but can we afford to be on the wrong side of good and evil within the power structures that govern our lives? Or do we simply choose the lesser punishment of fear? If you're not with us you are against us?

What we are seeing here, should we choose to, is the very machine of our hatred and fear. A method to marginalize and dehumanize that engulfs our innocence, and threatens to conform us to its message with all the power of privilege that it can bestow. In this machine you cannot dissent: you will simply be chewed up as one of the "others."

I have no doubt that the experiment engaged in by Jane Elliot is a strategic device and methodology used by feminists to dehumanize the male gender. It is the very essence of nurturing that feminists apply with such force.

In case you didn't get it, that force I refer to is acceptance.

The good man

He is the one good man.

He's on his knees figuratively speaking, groveling about his apparent privilege. He's allowed to speak so long as he prefaces each utterance with an apologetic seeking of approval.

"Look! Look! I'm using the knotted rope to beat myself! I'm one of the good men! Look! Look! I'm not like those other bad men!"

This slave, this coward, this supplicant seeking approval – he is the good man, and to prove it he will scourge every other man; every other man, who is not, like him, demonstrating that he is one of the good men; on his knees, or already busy attacking other men who don't yet know they should live in a state of ongoing apology for existing.

Now, some will call this apologetic man an unkind word: a "mangina." It is not a word I generally use. Although it is appropriately insulting, it lacks explanatory power. Others will call him a white knight. They're the same creature. A man, surrendering reason, morality, surrendering the right to an identity as a human being, in favor of the consensus identity afforded to him by the group, based on his utility, his conformance, or his affectations of supplication to the preferred members of the group, such as women.

But the underlying motivation for men to manifest the characteristics of snivelling, apologetic supplicants for approval, or the characteristics of amoral, violent enforcers of group think and conformism – are the same motivations. The first is fear of loss of their identities as "good men." This is the cowardice of identity, or the inability or unwillingness to define themselves human beings of worth without regard for approval of the group.

The second reason, which operates in concert with the first is surrender of an internal moral compass in favor of conformity. What's right, or what's true will be what the group says is right, or simply what the loudest drivers of opinion in the group say is right.

But what if the drivers of group opinion are themselves immature, violent, prejudiced, bigoted, or demonstrate other signs of mental illness, particularly, a constellation of qualities associated with high conflict personality disorders? Then the group think, the consensus reality becomes one of paranoia, hatred, and ultimately, violence. The accepted rules of civil society go out the window, because men who lack the courage to self define, but who allow themselves to be guided by fear of loss of their group identity of good men — these men become the enforcers of a public ethic of atavistic group think; us-versus-them along lines of trivial disagreement, social ostracism, fear driven conformism and authoritarian compliance; of hatred, and of violent enforcement of social norms which are fundamentally toxic and dysfunctional.

And all of this is enabled by the cowardice of those males who the group will define as good men. The compliant, the apologetic, and the heroes enforcing the whim of overgrown toddlers with princess complexes.

So we come to the one good man. The one who, by distinguishing himself good, renders all others bad. Look at him, he'll defend the women, he'll defend the children, because those other men, they've failed to recognize the need of all women to be defended. The bad men have failed to recognize that women are fundamentally helpless, weak, in need of rescue, elevation, protection and insulation from any possible discomfort, disturbance or criticism.

He is the one good man.

This is obviously why his violence, enacted or initiated on behalf of those helpless, special fragile flowers he defends, is excusable. Indeed, his violence, which he, being good, might not even enact other than through indirect proxy. His violence is virtuous because he is good. And if you aren't him, then you're a bad man. In fact, you might not even be a human being at all. Better get on your knees, apologize and admit your privilege, if, of course, you ever hope to be good.

If you let fear of loss of status as a good man – lending you to surrender your identity, your compass and any sense of right or wrong, then you simply cling to provisional approval. And you might even get to indulge yourself in some violence on behalf of grown up toddlers who discount your humanity and the humanity of all men in favor of utility and conformance.

But that world of hatred, fear, enemies, in groups and out groups, good people and bad, based on biology or cowardly conformity – that's not where I live, or where I want to live.

Don’t complain about the wiminz

October 14, 2012 | by Aimee McGee | Link | Original Link

I was catching up on a pod-cast from AVfM news and listened so intently to what Fidelbogen was saying about why complaining about the relationship between men and women and specifically about hypergamy is not helping the MRM, that I missed my junction on the M11 and had a 30 mile diversion to listen to more of the programme.

It got me thinking.

I know why men complain about how hypergamy and how many are royally screwed over by women in relationships. As a woman who has had difficult relationships with women myself up until I started on my “zero tolerance for bulls-shit” approach when I was 37 years old, I have some clue just how utilitarian some women can be. I’m also partnered with a wonderful man who is getting six colours of crap kicked out of him by his crazy ex-wife and the family courts.

However, I come back to the maxim in life “chose your battles wisely”. The SO and I could complain endlessly about “fitch base” (our pet name for her), but then she would hold sway over all our relationship. So we let of a bit of steam then talk about things that matter to us. Equally, I can moan and complain about being on the receiving end of social marginalisation by cliques of women at work, or I can go out and have fun on my own terms. If you hate, you let those who wish you harm win. The best outcome is not hating, it is feeling indifference, so you can ignore them.

We need to consider what we can change and how we can act to change it, and the main thing we can do as individuals is change our own behaviour and personal script. Over on a Shrink4Men, lots of the discussion is about “how are you going to change the pattern, because you can’t change the crazy behaviour of your spouse?” While not everyone is in a relationship with crazy (thank goodness), this same applies here, when it comes to deciding what we should address in the realm of interpersonal relationships publically within the MRM.

Coming back to complaining about hypergamy. One of the hosts pointed out that women when reproducing want a stable provider and this is a valid reproductive strategy. As a “non-breeder” I’ve never had need of one, but I do occasionally wish I had greater financial security, so I do get the impulse.

Where the problem lies is not in the need for stable provision, it is the crazy expectations about how much is needed to meet these perceived needs. I often sit in amazement at the amount of stuff generated by a baby shower, knowing in my family “the new baby suitcase” is making its journey around the second generation now. This suitcase is full of little baby outfits that are quickly grown out of. Each mother replaces items that are too worn when it is due to be handed on, and it saves a vast amount of money. There is also the 1,2 and 3 year old suitcases (full of lots of jeans, dungarees and t-shirts because of the vast numbers of small boys in my family). My oldest nephew recently said of the jersey worn by his 3 year old son “Hey, that’s mine” – as he spotted the T. rex with red blood dripping from his fangs knitted on the front (my Mum had an evil sense of humour – that was her creation).

Is the average woman ready to hear and understand about hypergamy? Probably not. However some women (and some men) are increasingly concerned about the commercialisation of childhood, and this is a way into the conversation about expectations and values. Open discussions about the difference between needs and wants in a relationship needs to happen early. Overt materialism is a huge red flag in my opinion. However, perhaps a better assessment of the issue is, you both need to have similar financial goals and aspirations and be prepared to stick with the plan to achieve them together. A mate should demonstrate they are going to follow-through, and anyone whose words and actions don’t match is a risky proposition. I made a similar mistake in my own marriage, so I get how easy this is to say and hard to do.

In my opinion, the real elephant in the room in male-female relationships is about male disposability, specifically if a man loses his utility through age, illness or ill-fortune. That’s the discussion that needs to be bought into the open, because unlike hypergamy one element of changing the male disposability script is about men changing their own attitudes about their value in life.

My father’s second wife is a woman who exhibits hypergamous behaviour. She also has demonstrated she only values my father for his utility, by a living will which states pretty much that his children will have to look after him if he becomes incapacitated. My father is complicit in reinforcing his utility value, because his own living will does not have the mirror statement imposing her care once incapacitated on her children. He intends to look after her no matter what. He will do stuff for her, even when exhausted and in ill health. When he visits me, he struggles to slow down and be looked after, but then settles down and appreciates that he is given space to be free to think, dream and do things at a gentle pace. I’ve often reiterated to him that he is lovable because of who he is, not what he can do. Yet he can’t or won’t break free of the assumption he needs to do things to be loved. As my father is an autonomous adult, he has the right to make that choice, but it saddens me to see this elderly man still “chasing pussy” using a script that damages himself.

There will always be spaces like a Shrink4Men where men (and women) can deal with the interpersonal issues directly confronting them, but I think we need to be smart on the front-line messages of the MRM and exert force and effort where we can get change. Sometimes that change might be something small, or sometimes our efforts together can shift the world on its axis.

The pamper hamper

October 14, 2012 | by Dr. F (Ian Williams) | Link | Original Link

It took three big strong men to carry it into my house and what a glorious thing that was to behold.

I said "Put it right here in my lounge room," as I wanted enough space to walk around it and just take it in from every angle. And so they did, and I stared at it, and I confess I drooled just a little before I waved them out with, "Watch out for Mr. Pringle the poodle on the driveway with your van. He is small and deaf."

I was the winner of the 'Queen-for-a-year-Pamper-Hamper'. It was all mine. Hubby was away at the dreary bauxite mine doing bauxitey stuff. He has his mine, he owns it, and I have my mine here…all mine*.* Oh relax, it's a joke I tell with the "Me Squad," and we always laugh at that one. We girls in the Me Squad, we do.

You see, Chloe has her thing with her man, and how he's a monkey. Prunella makes hers run around for flowers, and goodness knows what else, and Arabella the cut-snake is just mean as mean there ever was. Secretly we are decent, but to show that to our men? Oh, I do not think so. We call ourselves the "Me Squad," and that's another story, so let me get back to me.

The Pamper Hamper seemed to nearly fill my entire lounge. It was sealed with shiny plastic that locked all those good things inside. I could see them in that huge basket just waiting for me to get to and in my thrill I tried to break into it first with my nails, and then my teeth, but I just couldn't get to those things; those very good and civilized things. Knives and scissors are for other people and I never touch them, as is my code. I needed help and I was angry and I felt small and stupid in my rather big smart house. I called out to my neighbor from beyond the ivy and stone fence.

"Myron come here…now!"

God I hate him. He is so pathetic. He runs to me if I call out to him like a dog. I mean, that's why I hate him. If he didn't come to me when I called out to him I'd be fond of him. If he was smarter he'd play the game one plays. The game says he must come to me anyway, but slower.

Well sure enough he came over and he broke the plastic wrapping and I pushed him out the door and told him to take that Pamper Hamper plastic wrapping with him "good boy". 'Slam.' I rushed back to the Pamper Hamper thinking of the envious eyes of the Me Squad. Oh how they would smile, but their teeth would clamp when I showed them the wonderful rare things that were inside that Pamper Hamper.

There were coils of satin and oils of green and gold. There was a mink pocket of lotions and creams and soaps and emollients, and, oh, there was so much more. There was an Organic forest and wheat fusion 'mud-pak', and a spray for parched elbow skin made from the stamen of a Papua New Guinean Orchid and the dried ovaries of the tiny Hawaiian Calypso Moth. There was a tincture for "Champagne Stem Rash" that soothed the thumb and pointer finger and can you believe it, a balm for eyelash follicles made from the crushed gametophore stemsa of a moss and the pulped optic nerve fibers of the Northern Bahian Blond Titi. They both live in The Atlantic Forest in Brazil and they are critically endangered, but not too critically.

I could go on and on about the other things in the Pamper Hamper, like the aloe finger washes for gourmet truffle and beluga pizza nights, and the lithium battery powered helium micro bubble-wrap ankle warmers that smelled so civilised you could eat them, but I won't bore you. Something went wrong and the Pamper Hamper lost its glisten. It's shazam and wow-factor flunked and the posh and woot were gone.

In the Pamper Hamper I found some bubble bath balls and I tried to open one up to check what was inside (I have heard stories from the Me Squad where the greedy soap companies try to cheat you) when something terrible happened. It burst open and my left eye took the brunt of the discharge. What happened next was so quick I almost cannot believe it, but here it is exactly.

I recoiled backwards and hit my head on my 1678 Tompion and Knibb long-case grandfather clock (£ 125, 000) making it fall and crash down on my 1760 Louis Quinze chair, (£ 34,000). The clock and the brace of the chair were destroyed along with it's irreplaceable fabric and that's bad enough, but it got worse.

I fell to the ground screaming in pain in my big smart house, and on my 1804 handwoven Shah Abbasi motif Persian rug (£ 76,000) I writhed around wildly and the heels of my Christian Louboutin Lady Daf Veau Velour shoes (£ 635) dug the glass shards from the case of the shattered clock deeply into it's pile. A heel broke whilst I was in that writhing moment just described.

While I was writhing and crying in pain alone in my big smart house a thought came to me and by habit or talent, the numbers added up there and then – £ 325, 635. That stopped my tears and I thought, "I am not paying for this mess. I'm a trapped soul in a lonely big smart house and nobody really knows the real me. I am in eternal pain because of the burning fire inside me that is never expressed."

The more I thought about how it would automatically be assumed that I was supposed to replace the expenses incurred by that bubble bath ball the more angry I got. I hatched a plan where that hamper would pamper until the dying of my light. I was going to bring back it's pamper and it would be bigger and stronger than ever.

I grabbed my mobile phone and called the cops and sobbed. I told them how they "liked the knockers on the toff guv" and how there was pushing and the how the clock fell. He listened and called out to another in the station to get to my address quickly as there might have been a rape and, "What was the name of the delivery company mam?"

I lay back on my 1804 handwoven Shah Abbasi motif Persian rug and smiled up at the Georgian ceiling rose twenty two feet above me. They would be here in my lonely big smart house in a few minutes with their kits and their cameras and concern and god what a show they are going to see. Mr. Pringle, my six year old deaf poodle licked my hand and I stroked his head and waited for them to arrive.

“You’re a vuvly widdle thing aren’t you Mr. Pringle?”

I knew that the soap company and any delivery company can afford 325, 635 pounds in loose change, but what of the millions more owed to me due to my pain and trauma? I was wondering about how deep their pockets would be and oh, there would be the divorce of course.

“I am not sharing a penny with hubby, am I Mr. Pringle?”

And right then and there, in my lounge room in my lonely big smart house, I looked into that stupid dog’s eyes and I thought of the plan that would have the Pamper Hamper burst as a piñata that could never stop raining if it tried.

“The men were mean when they ran over you with their big van. Remember how I told them not to do that to you Mr Pringle?”

Why American MRAs should register and vote

October 15, 2012 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

It's hard not to notice that Canadian and Australian MRAs have made much more progress than Americans have in a lot of areas, and I don't think this is entirely cultural. Although culture contributes–conservative traditionalism is much more powerful in large swaths of America than it is in those countries–there are also vital differences to how American politics work that tends to slow people down. Although there are quirks in the American system that can, if we educate people enough, make a huge difference. We just have to educate more people about them.

I recently uploaded the following video to YouTube, my first on-camera. As you can tell there was a delay/synch problem and some other quality issues which I'll work on for future videos. In the meantime, I believe its message is pertinent to those here at A Voice for Men; it may help Americans learn more about their system, and it may help non-Americans understand the intricacies of the American system better and thus better able to make supportive comments or suggestions for American activists. I suggest listening to it, or reading the basic transcript, and checking out the links at the bottom of this article:

Hi everybody.

This is my first YouTube video on-camera. Hopefully my scary neckbeard doesn't frighten any delicate ladies and small children.

This is a response to my compatriot John the Other on his recent video on "why you should note vote." It's something of a rebuttal, although my rebuttal may seem a little subtle because I agree that most of the reasons he gives for not-voting are, on balance, correct. I would quibble with a few things but on balance I agree with John on the important thing: it really does not matter much who wins the White House this year, and it really does not matter much whether Party Red or Party Blue controls the US Congress. So the problem is not that he's wrong in any of his specifics per se. But he misses the reasons TO vote.

There are other, easily missed reasons for an American to vote that John misses. Now, John the Other is Canadian, so it's easy for him to miss some of those reasons. But saying he's Canadian isn't actually meant to dismiss him. In point of fact, most Americans miss these reasons too, and they have far less excuse: this is their own government and they don't understand it either. Americans ought to know more about how their own government works than they generally do, and that's a sad thing.

Mind you, I think it's a good idea for Canadians to vote too, but the reasons are different. They're different because the design, and the dynamics, of the Canadian system are quite radically different. Even though both systems are democratic, the design is like the difference between a motorcycle and a helicopter–they're both just very different. So if my Canadian friends are interested in why I think they too should vote, they can let me know. For now, I'm going to concentrate on my fellow Americans and why they should vote.

This has nothing to do with saying you have a duty or an obligation to vote. In fact, I think your right to vote includes the right to refuse. I'll go further, I think that if you're not very informed about politics, you're kind of irresponsible to vote. If you're just blindly following the talking points of Party Red or Party Blue, really, I think you should stay home on election day and find something else to do.

But there are reasons to 1) make sure you're registered to vote at least, and 2) in almost any election, go ahead and vote, even if you're just writing stuff in or leaving most of the ballot blank.

Let me give them to you:

In the American system, we don't just vote for President, and we don't just vote for our US House and Senate members. We vote for a wide variety of other offices, and we also vote for a wide variety of non-offices.

What I think a lot of non-Americans–and sadly, a lot of Americans–miss is that we don't have an elected government here. We actually have a minimum of 51 elected governments–each of 50 individual state governments, plus the Federal government. That's not even counting places like Puerto Rico, Guam, Washington DC, etc., which are a little different but also have their own elected governments. Every American gets to vote for who's going to govern them at a minimum of two levels: at their Federal level, and at their State level.

But wait, I'm wrong: it's actually three or more: we also have elected governments within each County level (or in Louisiana they call them Parishes but they're the same thing), and often, at the town or city level.

I wish I had the artistic skills to show this graphically, but wherever you live in America, you have typically four levels of government. You're going to be voting for at least three, and in most cases four:

Top layer: Federal government
Middle layer: State government
Lower layer: County government
Lowest layer: City or town government, which some voters in rural areas aren't subject to.

Because so many people concentrate on the big top layer positions, like President of the United States, they miss the fact that they can have a major impact on those offices that are at a lower level. A lot of people don't even bother to vote for those local offices, which can be a huge mistake, since those people are elected to represent you at a local level, and are often much easier for you to get to answer your phone calls or even get you to meet with them personally.

Furthermore, although this varies by state, I can tell you that in a lot of states, judges are elected.

Let me repeat that: in most cases, JUDGES. ARE. ELECTED.

At the US Federal level, where Federal issues get decided, judges are appointed by the President, confirmed by the Senate, and serve for life. But at the state level? They're often elected. And that's potentially huge. Locally elected judges are the ones who serve over trials for most crimes, like murder, rape, and theft, and assault.

Get that? Federal judges very rarely hear cases like rape, sexual assault, theft, robbery, murder, and so on. It's almost ALWAYS a state judge who hears those cases. And many of them, depending on the state, are ELECTED OFFICIALS. The same is true for most District Attorneys or Prosecutors. It's stunning how many people are unaware of that.

Also, in virtually all civil matters, including for example Family Law, most of those judges are not appointed for life. They're State judges, and in many cases are directly elected by the voters. In other states, they may be appointed, but even still, they're not appointed by the President of the United States or by the US Congress: they're typically appointed by the Governor and Legislature of that state, or sometimes by an independent panel who makes recommendations to the Governor or Legislature. It varies a little by state. But they're either directly elected, or they're appointed by locally elected officials. Not by the President, and not by the Congress.

In any case, a judge, or prosecutor, can typically be removed from office by impeachment. Who impeaches them? Not the President of the United States, and not the Federal government: the STATE GOVERNMENT DOES. Or occasionally, possibly the county government.

So let's take for example a case that John the Other and I are very familiar with, a particularly odious Lizard in a Black Robe named LORI BETLER JACKSON. The Dishonorable Lori B. Jackson was elected by voters in Harrison County, West Virginia. Now, she's an incompetent, child abuse-enabling baboon who has no business at all being there on a bench. But voters elected her. Which means, VOTERS CAN REMOVE HER.

Now in her particular case, she's not up for re-election until 2016. So she seems safe, right? However, in some states, voters can set up an effort to recall an official and remove them. In some states they can do a recall anyway. You may remember the famous case of how California Governor Gray Davis was removed by a recall election because he was so hated? That's how Arnold Schwartzenegger got to be Governor of California. Well that's a big case: in a lot of states, you can recall a mayor, a city council member, a judge, a prosecutor, or almost any other official.

Now in some states you can't do that. So far as I've determined, for example, in the case of the child abuser judge Lori Betler Jackson in West Virginia, it doesn't look like judges can be recalled. However, in every state that I'm aware of, a judge can be impeached. In almost every state, if not all of them, your state legislature can scrutinize (not the Congress, not the President, the State Legislature) almost any judge or prosecutor and impeach them.

So how would you get a particularly odious person, like child abuse-enabling judge Lori

Jackson of Harrison County West Virginia, or malfeasant prosecutor Ken Haltom of Delaware impeached? Well you would contact STATE LEGISLATORS and tell them you're angry, and why you're angry, and why you want things to change.

And here's where we get to it: if you aren't even registered to vote, why would your state legislator even care much what you think?

Oh yes, in theory, they should care just because you're a citizen, right? You're an American, you have the same rights as everybody else right? Yeah, ok, if you think they should care just because you're a citizen, you're a human being, you're an American, you have the same rights as anyone else, technically you're right. But if you believe that's what's most important you're an idiot.

The blunt reality is they do not give a shit about you. The reality is that for any elected official, especially in America, ultimately, what they care about is STAYING IN OFFICE. No matter how good a person or bad a person they are, no matter how competent or incompetent, the #1 thing they almost always want is to keep their job. Even if they don't admit that to themselves, the fact is that in the back of their heads, in the tiny little lizard brain back here, no matter how honorable and noble they may be, they always have a FEAR OF BEING FIRED BY VOTERS. They don't want that to happen, and they try hard to avoid it.

And what's most astounding is that when it comes to local offices, because Americans are so obsessed with what happens at the Federal level, where individual voters have the LEAST power, they don't even KNOW who their city, county, and state-level elected officials are. They don't even know who the judges are that they've elected.

They don't even know who the judges and prosecutors are that they've elected.

They don't even know who the judges and prosecutors are that they've elected!

This is arguably quite corrupt, and there are things the political parties do to keep it corrupt: they don't actually want you scrutinizing the local officials that much. That way, the local officials can fly under your RADAR and pretty much do whatever they want.

If you're an American, stop and ask yourself this question: do you even know who your State Senator is? Do you know who your State Representative is? I didn't ask who your member of Congress or the United States Senate is, by the way. You don't get any points for knowing that. No, I asked you, who is your STATE government representative, and who is your STATE government Senator? I would guess that 999 out of 1,000 Americans cannot answer that question, and that's insane, because it's public record and it's easily found out. This lack of knowledge by voters is insidious, but it's also potentially powerful.

In the low bar I'm going to leave you some links to find out who your locally state-elected officials are on a wonderful site named Ballotpedia. It's very worth exploring. And in it, you can often figure out just by looking alone just how corrupt and incompetent your state government just might be.

For example, let's look at the state of Delaware, one which is well known to persecute men. Where does most of that persecution of males of the human species come from? Not from Washington DC. Not from the US Congress or the White House. It comes from laws and policies set by the Delaware legislature, and by judges and prosecutors who serve in Delaware, under Delaware law.

And if you use Ballotpedia, you can immediately see one of the reasons why Delaware gets away with this: most Delaware voters are probably unaware of who their state-level representatives are. But these are people who can write laws, or rewrite laws. They can impeach prosecutors and judges.

DELAWARE HAS ONLY 41 MEMBERS. That's right, only 41 people. Those 41 people can create all sorts of laws that only apply to Delaware residents. They can also do things like impeach judges or prosecutors. Well you can't have much influence on them if you don't even know who they are.

Yet as I scroll through the list of elected Delaware House Delgates–again, there's only 41 of them, so it's not very long, it's astonishing to see how this election year looks.

For example, in Delaware district (you'd call them Ridings up in Canada), there's district 3, currently represented by a Democrat named Helene Keeley. Let me be clear, I have nothing against Helene Keeley, I'm just picking her as the first example off of a list of what I'm talking about. She won her party's nomination earlier this year, with no one contesting it. So she won that nomination without contest. And oh, guess what, look further: no one's running against her on the Republican side. Republicans didn't even bother to field a candidate against her, and no independent or third party tried for her job either. Which means in November, she's going to automatically be re-elected. She has to do absolutely zero campaigning. Unless someone parachutes in with a write-in campaign at the last minute, she can walk into election day all by herself, and be the only person who votes for herself, and she still wins by default.

And don't think this is a Democrat versus Republican thing. In the very same state of Delaware, I scroll down here and see, oh look: in Delaware district 12, we have an incumbent named Deborah Hudson, a Republican. Guess what? She ran for the Republican nomination unopposed, which means she got that nomination automatically. And oh look, Democrats did not bother to field a candidate to run against her, and there is no independent or third party candidate running against her either. Which also means she gets to just walk into office. She's been in that job since 1995, and this year at least she's automatically going to be re-elected. All that power, it's already hers, and nobody cares.

How can this happen? Because Americans are by and large too lazy to bother finding out who their locally elected officials are. Or to realize that these officials have a lot of power, and that they are much more accessible to you. These are people who will often take your phone calls personally or who will make an appointment to see you just because they know you're a registered voter (hey, remember where I said it's important to make sure you're a registered voter? Yeah, that's one of the reasons). You might run into them dropping your kids off at school, or at a grocery store, in many states.

Of course, they're going to be more interested in you if you say you're a registered voter. Or you know registered voters in the area. And you're thinking about giving them support. Or not supporting them. And you have some concerns you'd like to share with them.

Let's keep looking at Delaware for a minute: Let's look at District 15 in Delware: it's a heavily Democratic district. Republicans did not bother to field a candidate, but the Libertarians put up someone named Amy Merlino to run there, who probably won't win as it's a heavily Democratic district. And there was a bit of a Kerfuffle in that very Democratic district: in September, two people actually fought over the Democratic nomination there, a James D. Burton and a Valerie Longhurst. And look at the numbers: 483 people voted for James D. Burton and 665 voted for Valerie Longhurst. Now, unless the Libertarian pulls off a major upset in that heavily Democratic district, the Democrat is going to win it. So contemplate that for a minute:

Valerie Longhurst won the Democratic nomination, and will therefore almost certainly be the elected delegate in District 15, having won a grand total of 665 votes. That's not the margin she won by, she won by only 185 votes. No, a grand total of 665 people voted for her, period. And she now will get to do things like write and/or vote for or against legislation. She's also got the power to move to impeach public officials, like corrupt prosecutors and corrupt judges. And she just won all that power by flying under everybody's RADAR because most Americans don't bother voting in primary elections and don't bother finding out even who their state and local elected officials are.

But there's power in that, John: what these local elected officials fear most is scrutiny. They don't want to be embarrassed. They don't want someone who's angry to run against them. They don't want angry voters fishing around for another candidate next election season. And furthermore, a person who got elected by a few hundred people is someone who's likely to take you very seriously if you live there, are a registered voter—or if you just happen to have the ability to communicate with registered voters who live there–and want to talk to them about something. You don't even have to live there, you just have to have contact with people who are registered voters there. If nothing else, they may listen to you just to keep you quiet because they don't like being noticed in a negative way.

You just happen to know some registered voters who are there. That alone is enough to get their interest. You just happen to know some registered voters who are there.

There's other reasons to make sure you're a registered voter, and that you vote. For example, at the state and local level, there are often ballot initiatives you might care about that effect all sorts of things. But by finding out who your locally elected officials are, you can have a potentially huge impact. Do you want to scare the hell out of a judge, or a prosecutor, or a district attorney, or a sheriff, or any other local official? Let them know you're a registered voter, who knows other registered voters, and you know who they are, and you want to talk to them.

I'm going to link a couple of resources in the lowbar to something called USA.GOV, where if you live in America you can find out who your state legislators are by drilling down to where you live. You can find out, and directly contact them using this tool. You can write them, you can call them. I've done it, they answer my calls, they answer my letters, and I'm nobody but a registered voter. Those people are answerable to voters, and given how few people pay attention to them, they are potentially afraid of you. It's not just that you might run against them and take their job away from them–although you could do that–but you could also just embarrass them so that next election season they're worried about keeping their jobs because you embarrassed them and you made people aware of them because you've raised hell using their names when they're normally used to flying under most voters' RADAR.

Now this gets away from the fact that there are often city and county governments too, and that people don't pay attention to those either but should. But this should serve to illustrate for you just how powerful being a voter could be. Fuck the big offices at the Federal level. There is enormous power being exercised at a local level, where corrupt officials can fuck your life over big time and you don't even know who they are. Best solution to that is to be a voter, and find out who these people are. Some of them are great, some of them are lousy, some of them are in between: but if you know who they are, and they know who you are, the power dynamic shifts. It matters.

I have more to say but I think that's about enough for now. But I'm going to tell you an anecdote. A good friend of mine is someone who goes by the name of GirlWritesWhat. John the Other knows her too. She has the #1 video on YouTube on the subject of feminism, as it happens. I'll link it in the low bar. Now I just got off the phone with Girl Writes What and she told me an interesting story: a teacher, who she does not know, recently showed a class of High School students her video in a Social Studies class. Those High School students are all potential future voters who have now in some way been influenced by her. Maybe they agreed with her, maybe they disagreed with her, maybe they debated it. But you know what? If those kids get interested in local politics, long term, they could have a huge impact on the way society is shaped in the future. And that's just one anecdote.

But they make the biggest difference–we all make the biggest difference–if they make it our business to stop concentrating on the top-level government officials who get all the national press, but instead on who those local officials are. Find out who those locally-elected officials are, and be a voter so they know you matter to them. Locally is where real change almost always begins ya know, even if it's not visible nationally.

More later. But please register to vote and check out the links below. Peace out!

Letter to a young man: privilege-blindness

October 16, 2012 | by Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) | Link | Original Link

A young, new MRA recently spent days on Reddit asking feminists to explain to him what the term "privilege-blind" means. Many self-proclaimed feminists are fond of this term, but seem quite averse to anyone who ever suggests that they themselves are blind to their own privilege. Eventually, after watching the endless circular arguments that go on among privileged women talking about how oppressed they are, Girl Writes What wrote a missive to this young man that everyone should read. We reprint it here proudly with her permission and slight modification.–Dean Esmay

What does "privilege-blind" mean?

It means that in the culture, each gender has/had both obligations and entitlements or benefits. When you live your whole life with certain entitlements, you usually don't realize that you have them, or the ways you benefit from them, or that the other doesn't have them and cannot benefit from them.

Most feminists call traditional male entitlements "privilege." They call traditional female entitlements "benevolent sexism" (because, like most people who benefit from their entitlements, they can't really see they have them). They call traditional female obligations "oppression." They call traditional male obligations "rights" (i.e: the right to earn income, the right to be self-sufficient, which was actually an obligation men complied with or else–and still is) or "patriarchy hurts men too."

What feminism has really done in the advancement of women's interests is take men's patriarchal obligations, apply them to women, and cast them as "rights" that women can choose or not as they see fit. It–with the help of advancements like the pill–has also toiled to free women from their patriarchal obligations while holding onto as many entitlements as they can. Like removing the obligation to marry for life or provide their husband with children that are his in a meaningful way, while keeping the entitlement to his financial support.

And please don't get me wrong. I'm not a traditionalist in any way shape or form. But I do live in reality, and I know what's been happening over the last 40 years.

The problem with what's going on now is that as women are released from their obligations (to men and to society), without giving up corresponding entitlements. Things are getting unbalanced. The system we had before sucked for a lot of people, but it was at least equitable for both genders–it afforded enough entitlements to offset each member's obligations. When you remove obligation from one member while holding onto the entitlement, this places more obligation (and less entitlement) on the opposing member.

A great deal of women's traditional benefits used to be provided by men on an individual basis (financial support, partnership, protection, etc), but now men have been kicked out of the house, so to speak. Because women have so much more choice now–because they claimed things like earning income as rights rather than obligations–and because they owe nothing to anything other than personal fulfillment… well, choices cost. They cost economically, socially and politically.

Men aren't being allowed to fulfill those benefits on reasonable terms anymore. Women have broken the old social contract, and when we took away men's benefits without replacing them with others, we soured the terms of the deal for men. Now we need more government, more social and legal enforcement and corporate structures to provide women with help, support and protection, or to extract those things from unwilling men. None of those structures are "non-profit". They take a huge cut before what's left trickles back down. They're a very resource-hungry middleman, so we need more productivity on the ground in order to feed that. Most of that productivity comes from men, one way or another, even though their few remaining benefits no longer make it worthwhile to them.

That means we're trying to chain men even more inexorably to their old obligations. There's a reason everyone in the media is in a tizzy over men not "manning up." Men have always either provided for women and children, or been economic generators for government and corporate coffers. They've always put more in than they've taken out–women drive 80% of consumer spending. Now young men are being asked to put even more in, and get less out.

Let me put it this way: Women make up about 60% of medical students right now. Very progressive. The government spends millions of dollars to train her, because paying to train doctors is a wise investment. Doctors earn out the wazoo. This generates tax revenue and economic activity, which helps recoup the cost, and doctors provide a valuable service to society that helps keep everything stable. Spots in medical school are finite because of the cost of training, and the woman beats out several male candidates for that spot in school.

But what's this? She sees that career as a right rather than an obligation. She has virtually unlimited choice as to what she wants her life to look like. So, like about half of all female doctors, within ten years of getting her MD, she will be working part time or not at all. Her male colleagues saw their career as an obligation, and expected to be working 50-70 hours/week for at least 30 years, providing valuable service to society and generating all kinds of economic benefit.

That female doctor has just taken out of society more than she's put in. Someone not only has to pay for that, and take up the slack. We all pay, with our tax revenue, and by having to wait to see a doctor, and her male colleagues pay in the longer hours many will choose to work to fill the gap she left in her wake. And because women represent more than half of all doctors, the fewer males ones will have to take on even more burden in order to ensure you and I can get an appointment.

And I'm not saying that women shouldn't be doctors–hell, my sister is one. But I AM saying that though women have made inroads into the male roles, they haven't embraced them in any meaningful away, because it actually sucks to work 70 hours a week and barely see your family, whether you're a man or a woman, and society doesn't enforce this role with women the way it does with men.

You won't find a single feminist wanting to talk about this stuff. They won't even accept that women have, and have always had, female privilege. All those spots on the lifeboats while the men went down with the ship? That was just another form of oppression to them.

You're young. You seem exceptionally bright and well-spoken. You have every right to feel dismissed and disregarded by the people on the AskFeminists subReddit, because those people are writers of revisionist history and revisionist reality–emotional reasoners who form narratives to explain their emotions, instead of living in reality. Please don't get sucked in by them.

There are women's issues, but feminism seems to mostly work at cross-purposes to those issues. How can you complain that women are not trusted in positions of political power–how even women won't vote for them–and then in the next breath cast women in this role of needing perpetual help and support just to survive their own lives, all the while whining that their purses are oppressive? I'm a woman, and one of the biggest problems I have with feminism is that it does not give women any credit.

Anyway, I thought I would reach out to you away from the Reddit AskFeminists thread, because I don't want to cause another shitstorm right now. I'm a mother of three kids, two of them boys. My oldest is 17, and I worry about the world he and his brother are growing up in. I know my daughter will be just fine. That's gotta tell you something.

Proof of innocence

October 16, 2012 | by Pierce Harlan | Link | Original Link

Ponder whether it should be harder for a woman to prove that a man raped her than for a man to prove that he did not.

Prof. Nancy Hogshead-Makar, a gender equity legal scholar, and Brett Sokolow, the guru of what can aptly be called the campus sexual grievance industry, have written an extremist and surprisingly puerile commentary that insists, in conclusory fashion, that the "preponderance of the evidence" standard posited by the Obama administration's April 4, 2011 "Dear Colleague" letter is just. See http://chronicle.com/article/Setting-a-Realistic-Standard/135084/.

But first, they got one thing right: "[A]ny assertion that the new directive lowers the previous standard of proof lacks legal support, as no law or court has mandated the use of a higher standard for campus sexual-misconduct complaints. Any colleges that were using a higher standard before last year's instructions were choosing to do so, just as they are now choosing to comply with those instructions."

That is correct. It is for this reason, for example, that Princeton has refused to lower its "clear and persuasive" standard, and even the Department of Education is not alarmed about it. It is startling that at least a few more colleges are not sticking to principle on this issue.

But then, Hogshead-Makar and Sokolow sweep over the rights of the accused like a high-speed rail and defend the "preponderance of the evidence" standard by insisting that it is "the only standard that is equally fair to men and women."

Why is it equally fair? You likely will need to read this next sentence more than once to convince yourself that you read it correctly: "Ponder whether it should be harder for a woman to prove that a man raped her than for a man to prove that he did not."

We need not ponder that question for long because it scarcely survives its statement. Of course it should be harder for the woman to prove that a man raped her, because the consequences of getting it wrong are far more serious for the accused than the accuser. Nowhere do Hogshead-Makar and Soklow even bother to acknowledge this irrefutable fact, much less address it. It is the elephant in the room that needs to be dealt with but isn't.

"The consequences for someone expelled for sexual assault are enormous and will follow him throughout his life, leading to rejection by other schools, inability to qualify for the bar and a great deal of stigma," Prof. Cynthia Bowman of Cornell has said. "To impose those consequences on someone requires a rigorous standard of proof and many due process protections to ensure fairness." She added that procedures proposed at her school in response to the Department of Education's "Dear Colleague" letter were "Orwellian." (Prof. Kevin Clermont of Cornell said that "not all would characterize the procedure as Orwellian; some have used instead the term Kafkaesque.") See http://www.cotwa.info/2012/04/law-professors-dear-colleague.html.

Even Mr. Sokolow, currently the most prominent victim's advocate on American campuses, elsewhere has said that "a lot of colleges now are expelling and suspending people they shouldn't, for fear they'll get nailed on Title IX." Mr. Sokolow said the reaction borders on "hysteria." He pointed out that expelled students no longer automatically have the option of just registering at another school. Nowadays, schools share information, which makes that problematic, so students who are expelled have a lot more at stake. See http://www.cotwa.info/2012/04/brett-sokolow-colleges-now-are.html.

It is axiomatic that a wrongful acquittal is a terrible thing, but it is never, ever the equivalent of a wrongful expulsion. A woman who watches her rapist go free due to a lack of evidence does not forfeit her reputation or her future as does a man wrongly found guilty. Somehow, that is lost on Hogshead-Makar and Soklow.

The Princeton model is instructive. It employs a dual system that protects the accused by maintaining the "clear and convincing" standard, but it also allows the school to find by a preponderance of the evidence that the accuser's Title IX rights have been violated by the school. If the latter has occurred, she should be treated as a victim. This might require, for example, the separation of the accuser and the accused as well as other protections for the accuser that may impose certain restrictions on the accused. But it would not include besmirching forever his reputation, and impeding his education and employment opportunities, by expelling him.

Holding more rapists responsible for their misconduct is a critical and laudatory goal. But Hogshead-Makar and Sokolow blink at the fact that the "Dear Colleague" letter enhances the risk of severely punishing innocent students. Because the crime of rape is almost always committed in private, without corroborating evidence, it is difficult (but not impossible) to prove. The goal of the Obama administration in insisting on a lower standard of proof is to nab more rapists. The problem is that the absence of corroborating evidence to establish guilt or innocence in "he said/she said" cases is scarcely a valid justification for making it easier to punish the presumptively innocent. Just the opposite: it is a sound reason to be ever more vigilant of the possibility of punishing an innocent man for something he did not do.

There is some confusion among some readers about the difference between the "preponderance of the evidence" and the "clear and convincing evidence" standards. "Preponderance of the evidence" allows the school to find a young man guilty even if it is 49.9% sure he did not do it. It allows for expulsions where there is considerable doubt as to guilt. "Clear and convincing evidence," on the other hand, means that there is enough evidence to produce in the mind of the trier of fact, without hesitancy, a firm belief or conviction as to the man's guilt.

If all that's a little too murky, let's put it in concrete terms: "he said, she said" testimony alone typically does not produce "clear and convincing" evidence of guilt, see Mitchell v. Mitchell, 767 So. 2d 1037, 1041 (Miss. App. 2000), but credibility determinations of "he said, she said" cases "are often the very essence of making a finding by a preponderance of the evidence." Beitel v. OCA, Inc. (In re OCA, Inc.), 551 F.3d 359, 372 (5th Cir. 2008).

Under a "preponderance of the evidence" standard, young men on college campuses need to hope they are not wrongly accused by women majoring in theater arts because justice in these cases has been reduced to deciding which party is the better actor.

To illustrate how backward they've got it, consider this: many colleges now apply the more stringent "clear and convincing" standard for lesser offenses (e.g., stealing an inexpensive item) that are typically easier to prove and that do not carry the weighty consequences associated with a finding of guilt in sexual assault cases, but they apply the lesser "preponderance of the evidence" standard for far more serious and difficult-to-prove sexual assault cases. Down the rabbit hole we tumble.

A nasty strain of gender get-evenism seems to underlie the commentary by Hogshead-Makar and Soklow, and that may account for their refusal even to consider, much less protect, the interests of presumptively innocent men who might just be wrongly accused. They write: "Men commit the vast majority of acts of sexual harassment and violence on campuses, and they should not have a systemic advantage that makes it easier for them to do so and avoid accountability."

Why should the mantle of fairness that adorns college disciplinary proceedings be removed only for offenses that are typically committed with penises? Such a position seems sexist in the extreme.*

It is also grossly disingenuous to insist that there aren't enough wrongly accused to worry about. http://www.cotwa.info/2012/07/not-enough-falsely-accused-to-worry.html*

Filler jailed, denied attorney by Judge Robert E. Murray

October 17, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]

I want to give readers an update on the Vladek Filler case, though I have to say from the outset that I am more than just a little bit pissed off. I am, in fact, angry enough to put my fist through sheetrock a few times.

For anyone not familiar with the case, please go to fillerfund.com for background.

Several weeks ago Vladek Filler filed two separate motions in the case involving his conviction for assault of his former wife, Ligia Filler. One motion was for a stay of his 21 day jail sentence so that he could complete medical treatments prescribed by his physician after an automobile accident. The other motion was to have the court recognize his new attorney of record.

"Judge" Robert Murray Jr.

The court sat on those motions for several weeks, taking no action on them whatsoever. Then on Monday, two days before Filler was scheduled to be incarcerated he was told by the court that they would not rule on either motion until they had original written notice of his previous attorney's recusal, delivered to the court, along with other unexpected documentation. In other words, they sat on the rulings till the last minute, forcing Filler to scramble to make compliance.

Filler complied with the court, delivering those materials in person today. The court almost immediately ruled against his motion for a stay, and then decided to refuse to rule on his request to recognize his new counsel. No reason or explanation were given; just not going to make a decision that would recognize Filler's attorney and allow him to act in Filler's behalf. Just a few hours later Vladek was taken into custody and jailed.

Let's be more clear about what happened. First, it was not "the court" that made these rulings. It was Judge Robert E. Murray, the same judge that sentenced Vladek Filler to 21 days of jail for pushing his wife, resulting in a magical bruise on her arm. The bruise was magical because it was not found after the alleged incident during an examination by a medical doctor, but rather appeared in a photo taken four days later by police.

By intent today, Judge Murray sent Vladek Filler to jail while simultaneously denying him legal representation. It is certain that Murray knows that Filler is scheduled to give key testimony in the disbarment hearing of Mary Kellett four days from now. And he knows that he has denied Filler needed prep time with his attorney to prepare for that hearing. Additionally, he knows that there is now effectively no one to monitor Filler's treatment while he is incarcerated in Mary Kellett's jail on the eve of testifying against her.

As usual, the local media is looking the other way and whistling.

I will give them one thing in Ellsworth, Maine. You are better off not to upset the powers that be there. Because if you do, even as an innocent man who beat a trumped up rape charge and managed to put a corrupt prosecutor in front of the bar, you better watch out. Carletta Bossano, Mary Kellett, Paul Cavenaugh and Judge Robert Murray will come around with some fucking law and order you won't soon forget.

The only silver lining here is that these petty tyrants are not the only ones with long memories.

Black man’s burden: myth of the deadbeat

October 17, 2012 | by Dr. Umar Johnson | Link | Original Link

You’ve heard the rumors, for they are everywhere, and although unproven, they still resonate as “facts” throughout much of American society. The untruth that Black men don’t want to care for their children has become a staple in American folklore. Even sadder is the fact that these rumors are not only postulated by the numerically dominant white majority of this country, but are actually created, maintained and reinforced by the Black community itself.

Even President Obama, who rarely makes mention of the unique and unparalleled conditions facing Black men in this country, couldn’t help but join in on the carnage of the Black man’s image by telling Black church audiences during his first bid for the white house that “Black men need to take care of their children.” Obviously, trying to woo Black female voters, the Senator turned President is also guilty of reinforcing the image of the Black man as a “dead beat dad.”

The question put forth to you today is whether or not this unsubstantiated rumor is true? The answer is a resounding “No!” Not only do Black men love their children, and want to be with their children, many go to great lengths trying to secure their “state guaranteed right” to participate in the lives of their offspring, only to be met with constant betrayal at the hands of the all-too-racially & gender-biased family court systems that make up these United States.

As a therapist and facilitator of support groups and training programs for African-American men, I have seen first hand how so many Black men attempt to establish a relationship with their children only to have the proverbial door slammed in their face, even after being guaranteed “paper rights” to see their children, which are rarely enforced by the courts. The illusion and hypocrisy of unenforced “paper custody” decisions made by judges and hearing officers is made evident by the fact that, in many states and counties in the U.S., there is no credible enforcement process to ensure that men see their children when mothers decide otherwise. In other words, as long as primary custodial parents can evade the law by preventing non-custodial parents access to their children, without having to burden themselves with fines, warrants or transfers of custody by the courts, the Black man’s fight to play a meaningful part in the lives of his children will continue to be an uphill battle.

Most Black women love their children and are willing to put personal sentiments to the side for the sake of God’s greatest gift. Nonetheless, there is a growing population of Black mothers who are manipulating the family court system and/or are blatantly in total disregard for it, in an attempt to keep so many well-intentioned fathers from being a part of their children’s lives. The fact that Black parents cannot work out their problems in private without having to resort to intervention from the racist court systems, in the first place, itself is a significant indication that our relationship culture needs to be totally overhauled and reconstructed.

When we talk about the War Against Black Children, we cannot exclude the primary role that their parents play in the psychosocial destruction of our youth. Developmentally and spiritually, the mother, within any species, is usually the main advocate of protection for her young. However, after years of mental conditioning through slavery, today we have some Black women who will consciously deny their children the affection of a loving father for personal selfish reasons.

Behind closed therapy doors, I have had scores of Black mothers, benefiting from years of hindsight and maturation, admit, although all too late, that "yes, I kept my children from their father and I was wrong." Although any admission of honesty must be granted its blessing, unfortunately, the years of damage created by this cycle of ignorance and emotional neglect cannot go unmentioned. So many Black children are literally being destroyed by their custodial parents, and way before the mis-education machine, and psychiatric exploitation cartel, has a chance to get their hands on them.

What are some of the unjustifiable reasons mothers keep their children away from their fathers?

1) Out of Sight/Out of Mind: The pain of relationship rejection causes many Black women to prevent the man access to his children in order not to repeatedly have to face the very person who rejected them.

2) Jealousy For What They Never Had: Yes, I have had mothers admit that not having a loving father in their lives can create a subconscious envy for their daughters leading them to disrupt the father-daughter relationship that they never had themselves.

3) A Woman's Scorn: Revenge is often at the center of disrupted paternal emotional bonds. So many Black women lack the mature understanding that they and their children are not one and the same person anymore. Many women continue, for years after birth, to hold a pathological belief they what's good for them is automatically best for their children; In other words, "If I don't need him in my life, then he/she doesn't need him in their lives."

4) Child Support: Obviously if a man can find a job he should provide for his children. However, with so many Black men being undereducated and incriminated with felonies, it is quite difficult for many of them to find work. What children need most is the loving affection of their fathers. Although it costs to raise children, it doesn't help to keep a father from his child for financial concerns alone. Unfortunately, in many municipalities the court systems have effectively separated custody issues from support matters which now gives mothers the right to collect the father's finances and at the same time continue to keep his children at bay.

5) Keeping the New Man Around: Although I find younger mothers much more guilty of this than older ones, it is also growing in prevalence amongst older mothers as well. So many Black women suffer from the emotional dependency of always having to have a man around to validate their womanhood (a condition often created by their own fatherlessness) that some will go to great lengths to guarantee "the new guy" a place in the sun by keeping the biological father on the outskirts and then trying to force the paramour upon the child as the replacement dad.

Getting revenge against their ex-lovers, at the children's expense, is a frequent theme in many family therapy sessions that often leads to broken relationships later in life after adult children learn that their mothers were the true reasons behind the absence of their fathers from their lives. Many mothers are able to effectively disguise their oppressive tactics against Black men under a false mask of innocence, projecting victimization by the father when in fact they are the victimizers; playing the helpless victim in public who is raising children without the benefit of the father, but is a merciless oppressor in private, deliberately keeping the father from his children.

This Black child custody crisis is not without its impact upon Black marriage. Many Black men, having friends and family already involved in this trifling state of affairs, are fearful of being caught up in a similar situation and are electing instead not to have children, are refusing to get married, and are unfortunately opting for a lifetime of serial monogamy, rather than risking possible divorce and complicated child custody disputes. In fact, even older Black men, many of whom are still married, are beginning to advise the younger generation to consider a life of serial monogamy or companionship with African women who are not American born. The reaction of Black men towards the pain and agony of having their children used against them is also not advantageous towards building and maintaining strong Black families. Thusly, many Black men are rejecting Black women altogether, as poor advice from older men is feeding the stereotype of Black women as vindictive "gold diggers" and "control freaks."

Unfortunately, an increasing number of Black women, spurned on by the "We Don't Need A Man To Raise Our Children" Movement that is growing in popularity in the Black community, are contributing to the war against Black men by spreading untrue myths and rumors about "dead beat dads" while at the same time knowingly being guilty of "hiding the children."

Unfortunately, the dead beat dad myth is so powerful that when others notice the peculiar absence of a caring father from the lives of their children, electing to ask why hasn't he been around, mothers can readily put the "dead beat dad" myth into play by saying "he just gave up," "he met another woman and forgot about my children, or "he doesn't want to be bothered." These lies are often enough to deflect suspicion. Since most already assume that the "dead beat dad" myth is true, a manipulative mother can benefit herself from the myth whenever necessary. The fact that she interrupts visitation, prevents telephone contact, and disobeys the partial custody agreement never figures into the equation. I have found, through therapeutic experience, that when a mother says the father doesn't want to be bothered, this usually means he doesn't want to be harassed with her particular "rules and regulations" that are often designed to complicate the custody arrangement (i.e., visitation on days when he works, visitation only when its convenient for her, cancelled visitations at the last minute when he had plans scheduled with the child, birthdays, holidays, etc.)

women who enter into this game of manipulation and deceit. As a prison volunteer, I am increasingly encountering men who are being jailed for breaking under the pressure of having their ambitions to see their children maligned at every turn, and with an apathetically racist court system that couldn't care less, issuing visitation orders with no teeth behind them, are instead choosing to seek vigilante justice against the guilty parties.

Although unacceptable, many Black men find it difficult to "turn the other cheek" and are putting hands on women, and their property (cars, homes, etc) as retaliation for being kept out of their children's lives. Still further, many grandparents and relatives are standing by and watching this game of cat and mouse, with tongue in cheek, and are putting their relationships with custodial parents ahead of the best interest of the growing children. Even professional Black men, who have so much to lose, are suffering from psychological breakdown, and are being charged with domestic abuse and battery. Attacking any woman should and must never be tolerated, under any circumstances. When Black men resort to physical enforcement of paper custody orders, by attacking Black mothers, this perpetuates another myth, that of the "Angry & Violent Black Male," which is used as cannon fodder by the mother's family as further proof that he shouldn't be allowed to see his children.

Being a felony charge in most states, even threats of retaliation for violation of verbal or legal custody orders is enough to give a Black man a felony record, which doesn't sit well with his child support responsibilities. As you can see, this is a dangerous cycle of revenge and hostility that only affects our children and leads to disastrous psychosocial outcomes for the children involved. It is time for the Black community to stand up in defense of non-custodial parents, whether they be male or female, and fight for their God-given rights to participate in their children's lives. Until we do, the collective community karma of Black America will continue to bring us more unhappy and violent youths.

ADA Mary Kellett belongs to you

---

You may have heard of a man named Vladek Filler. He's the ex husband of a woman named Ligia Filler.

Ligia is now a resident of Maine, who entered the country on an marriage immigration visa, who falsely accused Mr Filler of spousal abuse, and of raping her, resulting in two trials.

Through VAWA, her citizenship in the United States was fast tracked by bringing these accusation, but we all know that even if given incentive, women would never lie about abuse.

However, although she has never been charged, Ligia Filler, aside from abusing the couple's children and Mr. Filler, also threatened to murder him and to murder the police officers who picked her up, promising to dismember their bodies with the help of her relatives.

Both prosecutions brought against Mr Filler were pursued by Bar Harbour Assistant District Attorney Mary Kellett. The first prosecution included no actual evidence against Mr Filler, but, based only on the testimony of Ligia Filler, Kellet obtained a conviction. This was overturned due to Kellett's prosecutorial misconduct. Kellet had suppressed evidence clearly establishing Mr Filler's innocence, as well as tampering with witnesses and instructing law enforcement officials not to comply with subpoenas.

Although the first pass at prosecution was thrown out, Kellet brought a retrial. Vladek Filler was acquitted. But we aren't really dealing with a prosecutor who's motivated by anything as quaint and old fashioned as justice. Ellsworth, Maine County Sheriff's Office Medical Examiner had given Ligia Filler a full physical inspection, following her claims of abuse by Vladek, and found no signs of any physical abuse. Four days after this physical inspection, a photo of Ligia Filler's arm, depicting a bruise, was used to convict him of spousal abuse. And he was sentenced to 21 days in jail.

However, Mary Kellet had by this time come to the attention of several human rights organizations, including A Voice for Men, in part due to the ongoing legal harassment of Mr Filler, but also due to the fact that Mary Kellett's rate of prosecutions for sexual assault and domestic violence was 40 times higher per capita than the national average for a prosecutor's office. Either a horrifying sex crime wave was sweeping Ellsworth, Maine, or a corrupt prosecutor was pursuing frivolous prosecutions to secure the VAWA funding each prosecution brought to her office.

Under VAWA, prosecutions are funded regardless of their success in obtaining convictions, which provides financial incentive for frivolous prosecution, which is evidently what Mary Kellett was doing. This hypothesis is further borne out by her abysmal rate of successful convictions.

The National Coalition for Men (NCFM) and AVFM petitioned the State of Maine's Bar

Association to investigate assistant district attorney Mary Kellet, and an investigation was initiated. However, Vladek Filler was, and remains a key witness in the investigation which is to be held this week.

And this is the week that Vladek Filler has been scheduled by the Ellsworth Main district attorney's office for Vladek Filler to serve his 21 days, that conviction obtained of a photoshop of Ligia filler's magic arm, and to serve that time in Mary Kellett's jail, while he is scheduled to testify as they key witness of her disciplinary hearing. He will be brought to the court room to testify, wearing shackles and an orange jumpsuit. A perfect piece of theater for Kellett's, who now finds herself being defended by no less than a Deputy Attorney General for the State of Maine.

And maybe, if Kellett is just a little more corrupt than we've ascertained by examining her behavior to date, perhaps Mr Filler will share a cell with a violent, unstable criminal primed with fanciful and graphic stories of Filler's abuse of his wife, or perhaps, his children.

And if hearing this summary, the reek of corruption doesn't reach your nostrils – then you are the problem.

Now, in case you didn't predict this, Kellett is cooking up more fraudulent charges against Mr. Filler. And she wont stop. She's financially and politically motivated to keep going, and while she is an assistant district attorney, she's also a true believer in the gender ideology discussed on AVFM. To her, there is nothing ethically out of bounds at all. Whether you look at this and call it corruption, or whether you call it fanaticism, or ideology, it makes no difference. This is a prosecutor in a prosecutor's office so corrupt that the word isn't really strong enough to encompass the scope of the problem.

And you might not care what happens to this man, this Vladek Filler. Some people, I predict, will be saying to themselves, something like; well, maybe he was innocent, but he must have done something.

And if that's you, if that nasty little thought is going through your head, let me give you something else to chew on. That's how klansmen used to justified lynchings, too.

And if this stranger – this Vladek filler – if he's no concern of yours. Consider that the Mary Kellett problem is typical of what's going on in prosecutor's offices all across the country.

You don't know Vladek filler? He's a stranger, okay. Do you have a brother? Do you have a son?

For a lot of people now active in the men's rights movement, they sat quietly as our mainstream spun story after story about how women are under threat, and how the men's movement is a pack of retrograde cavemen whose fondest desire is to send women to the sammich factories, rape them with impunity or whatever other puerile lies are used to demonize this human rights movement. They sat quietly agreeing with all that rhetoric until their son or brother or father or themselves were accused of starring in some absurd, unfounded, countered by evidence fantasy of female victimhood.

And once accused, chewed up by an ideologically driven court system.

Maybe it will be your son's life's destruction that motivates you and wake you up. Or maybe you're more than a reactive primate, and you can put the pieces together in your head before this tears your family apart. Mary Kellett is not just a corrupt prosecutor – running in a system which seems to have abandoned due process, decency and sense – she's now increasingly typical, she represents a corrupt system. And you, as long as you do nothing, are part of it.

So, do you know a journalist? Maybe you are a journalist. Do you live in a state of Maine? Maybe you've got family there. Do you have a job? Make a donation to NCFM or to AVFM. We aren't doing this to make ourselves famous or rich. We're doing it because an ideology of violence and hatred has taken root, among other places, inside the institutions justice. And if you don't want your kids to grow up in a society in which the ones with a Y chromosome are defined as evil, and the ones with a uterus defined as permanent, zero-accountability mental toddlers – then its time to get off your ass, because Mary Kellett belongs to you.

We see a man, alone, hobbled by iron. He's kneeling in the path of a tank, unable to stand. You can see his hands trembling, or maybe he's beyond fear and watching his death with uncomprehending eyes.

It will crush him.

You know it will crush him.

You excuse the sight. If he fights he obviously is a threat and should be destroyed. If he doesn't fight, he's a coward who deserves to be crushed.

You don't even know the context—why he's in front of that tank—but you're sure he deserves it. He deserves it, because he must deserve it.

Join us tonight on avfm radio as we discuss why men deserve to be ground to pieces by the system. And why you're right to turn your head away, plug your ears and just let it happen.

Hey you. Yes, you. Crunch time!

October 19, 2012 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

We're about to do something that so far as we know has never been done before. At least, not quite like this, over an issue like this. You're going to help aren't you?

We need volunteers to put in a couple hours this weekend, for a task to be completed by Monday morning. And we need two or three hours of your time. Not your money, your time and patience.

Here's the drill: you're going to sign up and say "I can do a couple hours work." And that work will be that, you get an email, with some links and a list and some specific instructions. You will be going to various web pages, collecting information, and pasting that information into a text file. There will be a moderate amount of web-sleuthing but really not a lot, as we already have all the links you should need. But you'll be going to several dozen pages (each) searching for info, finding it, pasting it into a text document and then, when done, mailing it back to us.

It will be rather dreary, and your couple of hours of effort will look a lot like this:

Repeat.

It will be boring. It will also be subversive as hell, and may–just may–be a moment that begins to define a new era.

Are you in? It's this weekend and we need a solid commitment. If you're in, click right here and sign up for the mailing list before midnight tonight.

Your name will be kept completely confidential and your email address will be given out to nobody, not even other list members, unless you want it public at a later date. Otherwise, total anonymity for you. Your reward? Knowing you helped make something amazing happen.

Please only accept this mission if you know you can give a minimum of a couple of hours this weekend. If you can't, you can't, but if you can, like I said, click right here and sign up for the mailing list. We can pull you off that list after the weekend is over, or you can stick around and wait for future assignments. Up to you, but either way we need you this weekend, right now.

UK MP takes a stand for male prisoners

October 20, 2012 | by Glen Poole | Link | Original Link

Men face sex discrimination in UK justice system says MP

Male offenders in the UK are being discriminated against on the grounds of their gender according to the backbench MP Phil Davies.

Speaking in a debate of female offenders in parliament this week Mr Davies said:

"There appears to be sex discrimination in the sentencing of offenders, but the people being discriminated against are men not women. Women cannot have it both ways. They cannot expect to be treated equally in everything in society except when it comes to being sentenced by the courts for the crimes that they commit.

"People may want to argue that it is reasonable for women to be given lighter sentences than men, and that it is right that fewer women are sent to prison than men. That is an argument for another day, but at least when we have these debates about sentencing for men and women let us stick to the facts as they are and not what we would like them to be."

The Member of Parliament for Shipley in Yorkshire went on to say:

"Men are treated more harshly by the courts than women. For every single category of offence, for all ages and in all types of court, men are more likely to be sent to prison than women. There is not one blip anywhere. For every single offence, for every age, in every type of court, women are less likely to be sent to prison than men.

"The argument goes that this is all about women; it is not all about women. Let us not focus just on the very small proportion of women who are in prison. Let us also think about all the men, too. The point of this debate is to make people aware that where there are issues they apply equally to men, and that some of the issues are not even issues at all because the facts do not back them up."

Mr Shipley is rated by the Conservative Home Blog as one of his party's most rebellious MPs, has been described by political commentator Peter Hain as "a genuine conservative" and is the parliamentary spokesman for the Campaign Against Political Correctness.

MP Phil Davies

The Men's Network is concerned with helping every man and woman reach their full potential – including offenders – and we have previously highlighted the issues facing the male prison population on this blog (See our short statistical post asking why are so many men imprisoned and our news item about mentally ill men stuck in 'Victorian lunatic asylums'.

What Mr Davies' speech highlights is our collective tendency to view the world through the filter – women HAVE problems and men ARE problems – and he provides some startling research and analysis from the House of Commons Library to challenged the commonly held belief that women offenders are treated unfairly compared to male offenders.

It is not clear, however, whether Mr Davies is genuinely interested in tackling the inequalities experienced by men in the prison system or more interested in winning an argument against those campaigning for a more lenient treatment of women offenders.

The thrust of his passionate speech in parliament – 5 myths about female sentencing – seems to be making the case that 'women are problems too' more than it is making the case that men who offend have problems, too.

And when you consider problems male prisoners are dealing with it seems evident that time spent supporting boys in care, fatherless boys, boys excluded from schools, boys with mental health disorders and boys with learning difficulties has the potential to deliver huge benefits in reducing the male prison population in the long run.

To see the key points and statistics highlighted by Mr Davies in our post outlining his Five Myths About The Sentencing Of Female Offenders.

Thanks to James Williams of Men's Matters for bringing this speech to our attention. You can meet James at The Men's Rights Networking Event and Discussion on the theme 'How Do We Put Men's Issues On The Political Agenda?' on Thursday, November 1 – click here to find out more now.

Has feminism gone too far?

October 21, 2012 | by Sasha Smug-Whiney | Link | Original Link

Has feminism gone too far?

First, before beginning this article, I'd like to, as a woman, thank Paul Elam and John The Other for providing me this forum to air some of my concerns. As many of my colleagues in the British Columbia Teacher Federation (BCTF) and in School District 39 already know, I, as a woman, have long been an ardent adherent of the gender ideology commonly called radical feminism. In June of 2012, I got my first break into the news after being arrested by male police officers for spitting on somebody's car. I was, of course, as a woman, injured in that arrest, as can be seen in the west-coast glam shot taken at 10th Avenue and Main Street in Vancouver. Please note the distress and angst in my face while presenting my wound for the shoot.

On June 29, 2012, outside the courthouse at 222 Main I spoke, as a woman, at a press conference protesting the suppression of my Canadian charter rights of free expression. I even held up my wrist, wrapped in a smartly off-white tensor bandage worn for the occasion.

I also made a statement which was reported by Jeff Greene of the Vancouver Province Newspaper:

> What I would like is to feel safe and secure engaging in political expression, I feel like I've been wronged until I feel like I can protest safely again. […] I don't know how that can be achieved at this point. [1]

However, by September, I felt perfectly safe again. On the first Saturday of the month, I participated in some direct activism, accompanied by 20 to 30 like minded individuals, some of whom had armed themselves with box-cutters. We converged on a construction site where a single individual, a man, had glued up several dozen copies of a poster denouncing hatred of individuals by ethnic, religious or sexual identity, and not only tore his posters down, we made sure he knew he was outnumbered and unwelcome. Alone, this coward was so alarmed at being swarmed by my crew, he called the police himself. Obviously, we were in the right, because postering on a construction hoarding something other than feminist rhetoric is clearly misogyny. The posters actually said that men's rights are human rights.

As if.

I videoed my crew as they eradicated these so-called human rights posters, and when the short, ugly, and obviously woman hating misogynist approached me, I told him to not speak to me, because he hated women. He said something stupid then, like don't impute an opinion to him that he claimed to not hold, and then I told him: "I didn't say anything about you”. Lol.

He had no clue even how to have a reasonable discussion. But I’ve heard descriptions of this event refer to it as vigilante violence, as an armed mob, as well as censorship. These claims are obviously absurd, because we, the majority of 30; disagreed with his posters. Well, not the posters exactly, since they disavowed hated or bigotry, but we knew he was a misogynist, because we’d already agreed on that. Clearly, this stupid, heteronormative, cis-gendered straight white male’s objection to our poster-removal was an oppression of our right to freely express ourselves in silencing his hate-posters. (or anti-hate posters, possibly) Either way, majority rule is democracy, the pinnacle of fairness. We at that moment, we were the majority.

Sasha Wiley – Bandage by Armani
In fact, by passing his photo among the members of our organization, which we’ve given the unnofficial name femistasi, we’re confident we can make sure he does not feel safe or secure engaging in political expression, which, as a democratic majority, is our right. In addition, stupid as anyone who we disagree with must be, they probably feel wronged by organized removal of posters, and and by group intimidation.

The so called MRAs won’t speak up again until the feel like they can do so safely again. If we have anything to do with that, it wont be soon, given indifference of the public to our potential for violence. I don’t know how anybody can feel safe at this point.

Those who disagree should not feel safe, of course. We are obviously right, because we are a majority. And I say that as a woman, an oppressed minority.

This brings me to the stupidest of questions. It’s a question so foolish that so called men’s rights activists have even put it on a poster. Has Feminism gone too far?

Yes, that question. And honestly, this question answers itself. The fact that it is even possible to ask this openly proves feminism hasn’t gone far enough. A totality of control on public thought is where perpetual revolution takes us. And we aren’t there yet. We, and I say this as a woman, have much work to do.

Shaming tactics III: the Patriarchy

October 21, 2012 | by Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) | Link | Original Link

---

Welcome to “Shamus Tacticus: A Field Guide.” My name is Typhon Blue and today I will be presenting a somewhat rarified and fascinating specimen of the species Shamus Tacticus—colloquially known as “the Shaming Tactic.”

Without further ado, I present today’s shaming tactic:

The Patriarchy

This shaming tactic can be employed in the following way: “I can ignore your emotions and opinions because… patriarchy!”

Interestingly this shamus tacticus can also be utilized to silence those women who have lost the competition for “which woman expresses the least empathy towards men.” Empathy towards men being the primary symptom of the “patriarchal thought patterns” that parasitize women’s brains and remove their independent will, supposedly.

This particular Shamus Tacticus arises out of cross-pollination between several subspecies and species.

1. Blatantus Liacus — quite simply, Blatantus Liacus is the perpetuation of complete and utter bullshit.
2. Femicus Paracitis Alluricus – A subspecies of Femicus Alluricus, an inflated belief in the attractiveness of feminine submission or parasitism.
3. Femicus Centrus Completeus – a man is incomplete if he does not somehow center his life around women.

Blatant Liacus enters the fray by describing women in “patriarchy” as property of men rather then their legal wards. To understand the difference consider the relationship between your dog and your child. Your dog is your property; your child is your ward. Women were the wards of men historically; they were not men’s property.

Femicus Paracitus Alluricus adds supposed plausibility to “the patrairchy” as a shaming tactic. It asserts that men have an immense desire for women’s submission.

For most parents who have a severely mentally disabled child, the prospect of being the guardian of someone who will never achieve adult independence is exhausting, suffocating and terrifying. But for some reason men will take enormous pains to arrange society just so they can take complete responsibility for an adult sized female leech for the rest of their lives.

Femicus Centrus Completus, the idea that men wish to revolve around women not unlike the moon revolves around the earth, is foundational to Femicus Paracitus Alluricus because in order to dominate a woman a man must center his entire life around her; and one must assume that a man will sacrifice his own independence to do so, and will sacrifice his independence in order to center women with eager glee rather then the frantic horror of a fox whose foot is caught in a bear trap.

Now that we've examined the taxonomy of this particular Shamus Tacticus, let's look at its anatomy directly and observe its uniquely nuanced self-contradiction.

How is Patriarchy Theory a shaming tactic, one might ask?

For that let's direct our attention to the international study of patriarchy, the CEDAW map. CEDAW refers to the Convention on Eliminating Discrimination Against Women or, less euphemistically and more accurately titled, how "ns are eviler then us white folks."

What you will notice as you analyze the CEDAW map, is that the most patriarchal and thus lest moral cultures are both poor and dark skinned.

Now one might be tempted to say that societies grant women as much freedom as those societies can afford. In poor societies the technologies, including birth control, that liberate women do not exist or cannot be afforded; further poor societies are often violent societies and the political and social limitations on women serve to both protect them and compel men to take the risks that get men killed at far greater rates.

And you might say our own social history reflects this progression. As technologies that created safer and more comfortable societies and lessened the necessary labor in the home were developed and enjoyed widescale adoption women were granted more social and political freedom.

Nah.

The real answer is that us wealthy white folks, and by white folks, I mean wealthy white women are just better people then those patriarchal, girl raping n*r bastards.

So why is Patriarchy Theory a shaming tactic?

Well let's step through it.

Let's imagine for a moment that 'patriarchy' put men in charge. But men wished to take care of women as best they could and when it was technologically feasible for women to be free of the limitations of the home, men endeavored to provide them that freedom.

If we imagine patriarchy as paternalistic but ultimately good-natured we approach ending the dynamic by pointing out that men having to take responsibility for women is exhausting, unfair and limiting to them as well as infantilizing to women and we try to correct the situation like intelligent adults.

But this, this is too reasonable. And this reasonable conception of "patriarchy" just doesn't create the necessary moral opprobrium against men as a group. It doesn't get the dander up; it doesn't whip people into a self-rightous fury; and we all know the hate must flow!

Therefore Patriarchy theory necessitates the belief that not only were women the wards of men in history (not property, wards) but that men actively set it up that way in order to rape, beat and murder women with impunity and secure all the social goodies for themselves.

Patriarchy theory says men are evil fuckers. Not misguided, not part of a society that either didn't have or couldn't afford the technologies that free women and make public life safe and comfortable, not part of a system that just doesn't work any more and forced into a role that they didn't necessarily want.

No.

Men are EVIL FUCKERS.

I hope you enjoyed this installment of "Deconstructing Shaming Tactics." Thank you for listening, direct all inquiries to "shamustacticus@gmail.com" and please tune in next time, when we will present another weapon in the endless arsenal of Shamus Tacticus.

Godiva Chocolate: for ladies only?

October 21, 2012 | by Howard Gordan | Link | Original Link

Having spent the better part of October watching my favorite football team wear pink hats, gloves, shoes, and other decor and seeing the football engraved with a pink ribbon, I can rightfully say women's health is all that matters. I watched my favorite team play in September and noticed not a single blue ribbon or any blue hats or shoes. Of course, going into any store this month had my eyes ablaze in pink products too.

I went to my bank, and saw the tellers adorned in pink. Going to the doctor's office, I noticed tons of breast cancer awareness posters and handouts for those that wished to join one of many walks to raise awareness and funding. My son's elementary school was selling breast cancer month t-shirts and also asking for volunteers to help with funding and awareness by taking part in those same walks. None of the stores, or my bank, or my doctor's office, or my son's school ever had any mention of prostate cancer at all. Even a local restaurant had employees don pink hats and had menu items in pink motif to raise funds for breast cancer, but of course the color blue in September was nowhere to be found.

I started to write and contact several companies that solely sponsored these breast cancer campaigns and ignored men's health. I had a goal of contacting each of these campaign sponsors but quickly gave up under the barrage of the sheer quantity of them. The ones I did contact either ignored my letter or replied that they only sponsored breast cancer awareness either due to it having a special meaning to an employee or owner or due to there being more prominent breast cancer organizations to team up with. It seems to be too much trouble to seek out those organizations that associate with prostate cancer awareness.

That brings me to one of the companies I wrote to; Godiva Chocolatier, Inc. I had noticed in an email sent to me (I signed up for their member list some time ago) that a link brought me to an offer for their chocolates. Their logo included a pink ribbon where the "I" is in Godiva. There was some mention of breast cancer awareness in the email and on the site. So I wrote the following to the company:

Hello. I noticed that you are turning pink and promoting and contributing to breast cancer in honor of breast cancer awareness month. That is great news.

However, what is not so great news is that prostate cancer awareness month was last month and Godiva chose to do absolutely nothing to acknowledge this. No blue ribbon in their logo. No donation to prostate cancer research. No promotion whatsoever.

1 in 6 men will get the disease. 32,000 will die from it every year (about one man every 18 seconds). I personally know of a few men that have succumbed to the disease in their 50s and one who battles it today, at 35.

What reason does Godiva give as to choose only women's health as important enough to promote and contribute to? Are men worthless to the company? Does Godiva find the well-being of men as unimportant? Is men's health something to ignore?

I wish to know how to go about removing my name and account number from Godiva's data base. If Godiva thinks that little of me due to me being a man, then I have no use for being a customer of yours. I always enjoyed your chocolates, but suddenly the chocolate leaves a sour taste in my mouth.

Thank you.

[image]Perhaps a bit forward and a little angry. However, after watching another football game with everything turned pink, I was a bit perturbed. As you will soon see, I was unknowingly dead on with my comments. Again, to reiterate, I do not have any reservations about supporting breast cancer awareness, just lament at the total void of any prostate cancer awareness.

I did get a reply from Godiva and at first glance it seemed acceptable. However, feeling I missed something, I reread it. And much to my dismay, it seems that Godiva has decided that only the concerns of women matter to the company. I'm thinking, "This is a chocolate company. They sell chocolate. Isn't that gender neutral?" However, Nancy Gozzo, Customer Care Supervisor, informed me that they have a Lady Godiva program that promotes causes such as breast cancer one, among others. The Lady Godiva program also recognizes women that give back to the community. This program is 100% about what women do and think. She mentioned that my wishes to have Godiva sponsor a cause dedicated to prostate cancer awareness would be considered, but that it is only what women decide to give importance to that matters.

Her reply outright inferred that because I am a male, my ideas would be "considered". Her reply also stated that Godiva Chocolatier, Inc. only gives awareness to causes that women find important. Here is her actual reply: (Emphasis mine)

Thank you for taking the time to share your feedback on our recent program. With the launch of our new Lady GODIVA Program – a cause marketing initiative – one of our goals is to be able to support a broad range of causes. After a year of the program, we have been able to support a multitude of causes through our local efforts including feeding children and adults who would otherwise go hungry; research for Pulmonary Hypertension; domestic violence awareness; and more. Here is a link to the Lady GODIVA Program website, where you can get more information:

http://ladygodivaprogram.com/honorees/previous

The Lady GODIVA Program is a cause initiative that honors women who give back to their communities and gives awareness to causes that are important to women — which would include prostate cancer as we know so many have had families and friends affected by this disease. As we move forward and build on the Lady GODIVA Program, we will continue to look at a variety of causes to support and will take your suggestion of Prostate Cancer Awareness into consideration.

This is the first time GODIVA has created a large program of support around Breast Cancer Awareness; and this is just one of the many causes that are important to GODIVA that we hope to continue to support. Thank you for your feedback.

Best,
Nancy Gozzo
Customer Care Supervisor

Godiva Chocolatier, Inc.

Perhaps I'm a bit sensitive about the issue, but it appears to me that as a male, my thoughts are just to be considered, since the program only gives awareness to causes that women find important. So causes that men find important have little or no clout for Godiva Chocolatier, Inc.? If we all write in, since we are men, our thoughts can be considered, but the ultimate decision of what constitutes importance must be women-borne. Women must be the ones to decide what's important to Godiva. Men cannot determine what causes are important to men, only women can tell men whether the causes men deem important are actually important or not. Men are also customers, aren't they? But somehow male customers' thoughts are given lower importance than women customers.

I wrote back with this:

Dear Ms. Gozzo,

Thank you for your reply. I think it is awesome that Godiva is supporting those causes you mentioned. Those are great causes.

I wasn't aware that Godiva Chocolates was such a predominantly female-oriented company. While I fully support the causes mentioned, I can't help but wonder why a Chocolate company would solely care about causes only that women deem important. I guess my input takes a back seat to what women want. Perhaps women don't view prostate cancer awareness month as too important since it passed without a mention and breast cancer awareness month took full bloom. Judging by the complete void of prostate cancer awareness programs we saw countrywide in Sept. I don't doubt my suggestion for prostate cancer awareness will be ignored next September just as the disease was ignored this September.

I am rather disheartened that my letter asking about supporting prostate cancer is not worth the screen space it's written on. Actually if 20 of my fellow citizens brandishing the same genitalia as myself wrote in asking Godiva Chocolates about promoting a prostate cancer cause it seems it would be for naught as well since Godiva only "gives awareness to causes that are important to women". It appears men's thoughts about what causes are important don't matter in the least. If Godiva Chocolate Co. were solely geared towards a woman's line or product, I could somewhat understand. However, I may be wrong, but I'm sure much of the product that Godiva sells are purchased by men for themselves as well as gifts for the women that matter in their lives.

I also am a bit disillusioned as to why Godiva Chocolates only recognizes women who give back to their communities. I guess men who give back to their communities are unimportant and should not receive recognition by the company. Had I been aware that only women and the causes they find important count for anything in Godiva Chocolate's company, I would have not bothered to become a member.

In closing, you state "This is the first time GODIVA has created a large program of support around Breast Cancer Awareness; and this is just one of the many causes that are important to GODIVA that we hope to continue to support." What is glaringly apparent is that you could easily substitute the words "GODIVA" with "WOMEN" and your sentence would ring true, while using "MEN" would not work. My ideas of what causes are important can at best just be a "consideration" while it is women that actually decide what's important.

Please remove my name and number from the member database. Thank you.

She replied by removing me, nothing else said. What if Hershey's had a program just to recognize men and the good they do in communities? What if the awareness campaigns and charitable programs Hershey's chose to engage in were based only on what men found important, while women's wishes were relegated to just "consideration"?

There would be an uproar by women asking why women weren't included in the decision making. But I guess it's only sexist if men do it. After all, it was the congresswomen that walked out of the congressional meeting about contraception because only men were there to discuss what was important. Most people agreed with them.

So why is not that same standard used by this company? Why does Godiva have a panel of women deciding whether a man's disease is a cause worthy of promotion (for a supposed gender-neutral company)? Why does Godiva disallow men's desires on this issue? It seems we already know how much importance women attach to prostate cancer awareness: Just look at all the women's groups that held an awareness campaign for it and how many women complain about the chump change the government gives towards the cause compared to breast cancer. Somehow I don't see Godiva with a blue ribbon next September.

Well, my favorite chocolate is dark or bittersweet chocolate. However, Godiva seems to only sell bitter chocolate to me now. Sorry ladies, no more Godiva holiday gifts from me.

Five sentencing myths of female offenders

October 23, 2012 | by Glen Poole | Link | Original Link

Female offenders in the UK are not being discriminated against on the grounds of their gender according to the backbench MP Philip Davies who has outlined, in detail, what he calls five myths about the sentencing of female offenders.

The following article is an abridged version of the speech by Mr Davies and not written by The Men's Network. For background on this story read the news item Men Face Sex Discrimination In UK Justice System says MP.

Five Myths About The Sentencing Of Female Offenders

"There is an old political maxim that if someone tells a lie often enough, people will believe that it is true. I can only conclude that has happened in this case. I heard the lie that women are more likely to be sent to prison than men and that they are treated much more harshly by the courts, and I was taken in by it.

"I presumed it was true, because I had heard it so often, and I thought it was an absolute outrage. I was so outraged by the inequality in sentencing that I decided to do some research into it. As many people know, I spend a lot of time researching matters to do with prisons, sentencing and justice, and I wanted to get to the bottom of why women were being treated so badly.

"Imagine my surprise when, having looked at all the evidence, I found it was not the case that women are treated more harshly by the courts. The unequivocal evidence is that the courts treat women far more favourably than men when it comes to sentencing. I want to expose five myths today……"

The first myth is simple: women are very likely to be sent to prison and are more likely than men to be given a custodial sentence. That is simply untrue.

- A higher proportion of men are given a sentence of immediate custody than women, irrespective of age of offender (juveniles, young adults or adult) and type of court (magistrates or Crown)
- In 2009 58% of male offenders who entered a guilty plea for an indictable offence were given an immediate custodial sentence compared to only 34% of women
- For every type of offence group a higher proportion of males pleading guilty were sentenced to immediate custody than females
- A greater percentage of males were sentenced to immediate custody than females (29% compared with 17%), which has been the case in each year since 2005
- Women shoplifters are less likely than comparable males to receive a prison sentence
- Among repeat offenders women are less likely to receive a custodial sentence
- Women first-time offenders are significantly less likely than equivalent men to receive a prison sentence for a drug offence
- In 2009, a lower proportion of women who had a pre-sentence report that recommended immediate custody went on to receive this sentence than men (83% compared with 90% for males)

- For all other sentence options recommended in pre-sentence reports (Suspended Sentence Order, all community sentences or fines), a higher proportion of males received custodial sentences than females.
- For offenders where probation officers have recommended custodial sentences, a higher proportion of men are given a sentence
- In 2009, women given an immediate custodial sentence for indictable offences received shorter average sentence lengths than men (11 months compared to 17 months for males)
- The average male prison sentence is over 50% more than the average female prison sentence
- On average, males served a greater proportion of their sentence in custody – 53 per cent compared to 48 per cent for females in the quarter ending December 2011
- Women have 50% more chance than men of being released from prison early on home detention curfew

The second myth is that most women are in prison for petty or non-violent offences in fact 22% of female prisoners are in custody for up to 12 months, which covers all cases heard in magistrates courts and some cases heard in Crown courts. All other female offenders are serving sentences of more than one year, which means their offences were so serious that they had to be dealt with by a Crown court. 78% of the total female prison population, are not serving short sentences for not-so-serious offences, as people would have us believe, but are serving much longer sentences for the most serious crimes.

- Just under 16% of female prisoners are serving sentences of less than six months
- A further 6% are in prison for up to one year
- 34% are serving between one and four years
- 28% serving sentences of four years to life
- 11% serving indeterminate sentences
- 5% of offenders are in prison because after previously being released, they have either reoffended or breached their licence conditions

The third myth is that women are often remanded in custody but then are not sentenced to custody.

- In 2009 80% of females were bailed, compared with 62% of males
- 20% of women were remanded in custody compared with 38% of males
- Of those remanded in custody, 66% of females were then sentenced to immediate custody in comparison with 75% of males

When people complain about women being more likely to be remanded in custody and then not sent to prison, it is solely due to women being treated more favourably when they are sentenced. It is not that they are more harshly treated when the decision is made to remand them in custody or give them bail.

The fourth myth is that prison separates mothers from their children:

- It is said that 17,000 children are separated from their mothers
- Two thirds were not living with mother at time of separation
- An estimated 180,000 children are separated from their fathers

My understanding is that a senior civil servant at the Ministry of Justice has helpfully confirmed recently that two thirds of the mothers sent to prison who have children were not looking after them at the time. She apparently said of the women being sent to prison:

"Two-thirds of them didn't have their kids living with them when they went to prison."

If we are so concerned about the children of women offenders, what about the estimated 180,000 children who are separated from their fathers who are in prison? In this age of equality, what about that much higher figure? Should we not be more, or at least equally, outraged about that? If not, why not?

The five myth is that women are generally treated more harshly than men in the justice system:

- Women are less likely than men to go to prison
- Women less likely to be given a community order
- 10% of women sentenced are given a community order compared with 16% of men
- For domestic violence, the community requirement imposed on those who commit an offence in a domestic setting is imposed only on men and cannot be handed down to women
- Women are more likely to receive lower level punishments such as fines
- There is an imbalance in the number of women reaching court compared with men, as more women than are issued with pre-court sanctions

AVFM News and Activism: Dr. Greg Canning

October 23, 2012 | by Robert O'Hara | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]

Tonight we have as our guest Dr. Greg Canning, Australian News Director for AVFM. We will be discussing recent events in the Australian Parliament and the Gillard Government on the whole. Coming from the medical profession where he specializes in skin cancer treatment. Dr. Canning has brought much talent and passion to the AVFM Team and is a top notch MRA who is at the forefront of men's issues in Australia. He wears his concern for men and boys on his shoulder and, like most MRAs, has come under fire for it.

Please do not miss this opportunity to talk with an expert on men's issues Down Under.

The show airs live tonight, at 8:30 Central Time, US, which is 2:30 a.m. October 24th, in London and 11:30 a.m. October 23rd, in Brisbane. If you have not yet requested membership in the Stickcam Room, you can do so through the link below. The call in number is 310-388-9709.

Don’t talk about hypergamy?

October 24, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

It is amazing how much angst that free speech can cause, even in a community of people struggling to be heard on a litany of issues that generally find only hostile audiences. Case in point, hypergamy, or rather whether we should spend a lot of time discussing it in the MRM.

In a recent interview with AVfM Radio, Fidelbogen proffered the idea, and I am paraphrasing here, that we should avoid dwelling on the subject so as not to alienate potential allies we may find in women.

Aimee McGee was intrigued enough by the idea that she penned an article largely expressing the same sentiments that we recently featured here.

Outrage ensued. Monitors were sprayed with coffee and anger. WTF!! was shouted from the rooftops. Blood was found on many a keyboard.

I have left my ideas on the subject on a few comments, and briefly addressed it on a video exchange with Stardusk:

Stardusk response to Fidelbogen

My response to Stardusk

Stardusk response # 2

Final response to Stardusk

Now I think it is time for me to move out of those relatively obscure shadows and have my say on the matter…let the cards fall where they may.

In my admittedly less than humble opinion, Fidelbogen and McGee, both of whom have and will continue to have my respect, are way, way, way off the mark.

I am not going to dig into a possible 3,000,000 year sociobiological history to debate the precise point of the emergence of hypergamy, or even of what working definition anyone but me should use on a day to day basis. What is I will say is that the general tendency of women in this culture to better deal themselves at the expense of men, without inhibition by moral constraints or social prohibition, which is how I define hypergamy, is something we better talk about a lot more into the future.

Barbarossaaaa, who I think presented the most balanced and well-articulated response to the Fidelbogen interview said, and again I am paraphrasing, that we should not refrain from discussing hypergamy simply because it will offend many women.

I would actually take that a step further. We should discuss hypergamy far and wide precisely because it will offend many women. For the hearing impaired, allow me to say this again. We should discuss hypergamy far and wide precisely because it will offend many women.

Of course, the point is not to draw any personal satisfaction from having offended. It is much more functional than that.

A good way to look at this is that by the very nature of our beliefs here, we also offend many, many men. Do we avoid criticizing chivalry because it will offend white knights? Do we hesitate to speak ill of the sycophancy of male feminists? Do we even hesitate to harshly assess blue pill, average men about the ways they follow rote programming to their own unfortunate end?

Of course we don't, because if we did we would lose the very message we proffer in a wash of rhetorical obfuscation.

We have made considerable and roundly successful efforts to secure the support of women in this movement. I proudly offer that no other organization who stays as honest about the real issues as we do has achieved this much success. But just like with men we are centered on quality above quantity. In fact, quantity is meaningless in this arena.

For that reason, men or women who cannot handle the discussions on hypergamy should not find this a very comfortable environment for long. In fact, if they can't handle up front and rigorously honest discussions about the real issues that affect men and boys, then this place should and will make their skin crawl. If we ever get away from that we should be very concerned about what is happening.

I just happen to disagree that one interview and one article from some very thoughtful people challenging this idea is inherently dangerous. For those of you who became outraged, I note with casual interest that the sky has not fallen in.

The fact is that neither the McGee article nor the Fidelbogen interview will have an impact on whether hypergamy is discussed on these pages. It is not because neither person is of importance. They are both valued. It is because the fact is that if you want to make sure MRAs will talk endlessly about something, the best way to get there is to suggest that they self censor. Works every time.

And as we can now see, the thoughtful challenges they posed facilitated renewed interest in the subject, both in the comments and now here. Because of what they said, we now have more active discussion of hypergamy than before. It won't be the last time by any stretch of the imagination.

Also, I have seen it said in the comments and elsewhere that we should instead focus on disposability in the place of hypergamy. Sorry, but that is like trying to discuss the black hair on a zebra without discussing the white. Hypergamy is disposability. Or rather it is a consequence of it, enabled and fueled by it. Neither can really be distinguished from the other in any meaningful way and both need to be part of our discussions.

Understanding this is critical, vital, to helping us inform the young men who visit this site. And by the way, despite the fact I am an old fart, the majority of the readers of this site are young childless men, 18-24; the very population that most desperately needs to know about the possible pitfalls in modern relationships and who stand to lose the most if they remain ignorant. We won't make it a policy here to deprive them of that information simply to appeal to women who need to avoid listening to hard facts.

That kind of woman will only become emotional and intellectual deadweight that will slow us down and force everyone to carry their lazy asses forward in this movement. Sorry, but no can do.

I like the women we have here. They kick ass and take names. I don't always agree with them any more than I always agree with the men, but that is just one of those facts of life things that does not merit an article or for sure a war.

The people, the human beings we have at this site, are by and large the kind of people we need. We attracted them with a fair, uncompromising message, and we will attract more of the same as time goes by. GWW is great, but she is not the only intelligent, articulate woman in the world that loves her sons more than she loves victimhood.

In the process we will deeply and intentionally offend many men and women who want us to play by the rules that directly led us to a sexist society that preys on the rotting carcasses of men and boys. That offense looks good on 'em, I say.

I will be damned if we are going to stop talking about the real reasons we got here, and ignorance of hypergamy is one of them.

The Fraud of Feminism part one

October 24, 2012 | by Ernest Belfort Bax | Link | Original Link

If you have done any reading over at The Unknown History of Misandry, or if you have been part of these discussions for any length of time you have been made aware that opposition to feminism, as well as the idea that it is a fraudulent ideology based on lies and distortions is not new. In fact, as we draw closer to the end of 2012, we find ourselves on the eve of the centennial anniversary of the publication of the first major work of anti-feminist literature. The Fraud of Feminism, by E. Belfort Bax was published in 1913.

It is a fascinating piece of work. Perhaps most remarkable about it is that as you read, you will not find yourself so much transformed back to a different age with different modes of thought. But rather you will read observations and conclusions that will, word by word and line by line, be largely indistinguishable from what what you would see today from any critical thinker when offering a candid review of the essence of feminism. You will see repeated references to the same shaming tactics, lies, distortions, revisions of history, use of proxy violence and methods of manipulating the blue pill masses we continually find ourselves discussing today.

The only difference that a hundred years time has made is that it allows us to bring you this fine work in its entirety on the pages of this site. We begin with the Preface and Introduction. PE

Preface

The present volume aims at furnishing a succinct exposure of the pretensions of the Modern Feminist Movement. It aims at presenting the case against it with an especial view to tracking down and gibbetting the infamous falsehoods, the conventional statements, which are not merely perversions of the truth, but which are directly and categorically contrary to the truth, but which pass muster by sheer force of uncontradicted repetition. It is by this kind of bluff that the claims of Feminism are sustained. The following is a fair example of the statements of Feminist writers: — “As for accusing the world at large of fatuous indulgence for womanhood in general, the idea is too preposterous for words.

The true ‘legends of the Old Bailey’ tell, not of women absurdly acquitted, but of miserable girls sent to the gallows for murders committed in half delirious dread of the ruthlessness of hypocritical Society.” Now it is this sort of legend that it is one of the chief objects of the following pages to explode. Of course the “fatuous indulgence” for “womanhood in general,” practiced by the “world at large,” is precisely one of the most conspicuous features of our time, and the person who denies it, if he is not deliberately prevaricating, must be a veritable Rip van Winkle awakening out of a sleep lasting at least two generations. Similarly the story of the “miserable girls sent to the gallows,” etc., is, as far as living memory is concerned, a pure legend.

It is well known that in the cases referred to of the murder of their new-born children by girls, at the very outside a year or two’s tight imprisonment is the only penalty actually inflicted. The acquittal of women on the most serious charges, especially where the victims are men, in the teeth of the strongest evidence, is, on the other hand, an everyday occurrence. Now it is statements like the above on which, as already said, the Feminist Movement thrives; its most powerful argumentative weapon with the man in the street is the legend that woman is oppressed by man. It is rarely that anyone takes the trouble to refute the legend in general, or any specific case adduced as an illustration of it.

When, however, the bluff is exposed, when the real facts of the case are laid bare to public notice, and woman is shown, not only as not oppressed but as privileged, up to the top of her bent, then the apostles of feminism, male and female, being unable to make even a plausible case out in reply, with one consent resort to the boycott, and by ignoring what they cannot answer, seek to stop the spread of the unpleasant truth so dangerous to their cause. The pressure put upon publishers and editors by the influential Feminist sisterhood is well known.

For the rest, it must not be supposed that this little book makes any claim to exhaust the subject or to be a scientific treatise. It is, and is meant to be, a popular refutation of the current arguments in favor of Feminism, and a brief statement of the case against Feminism. Sir Almroth Wright’s short treatise, “The Unexpurgated Case against Woman’s Suffrage,” which deals with the question from a somewhat different standpoint, may be consulted with advantage by the reader.

An acknowledgment should be made to the editor of The New Age for the plucky stand made by that journal in the attempt to dam the onrush of sentimental slush set free by the self-constituted champions of womanhood. I have also to thank two eminent medical authorities for reading the proofs of my second chapter.

Introduction

In the following pages it is not intended to furnish a treatise on the evolution of woman generally or of her place in society, but simply to offer a criticism on the theory and practice of what is known as Modern Feminism.

By Modern Feminism I understand a certain attitude of mind towards the female sex. This attitude of mind is often self-contradictory and illogical. While on the one hand it will claim, on the ground of the intellectual and moral equality of women with men, the concession of female suffrage, and commonly, in addition thereto, the admission of women to all professions, offices and functions of public life; on the other it will strenuously champion the preservation and intensification of the privileges and immunities before the law, criminal and civil, in favour of women, which have grown up in the course of the nineteenth century.

Ernest B. Bax

The above attitude, with all its inconsistencies, has at its back a strong sex-conscious party, or sex union, as we may term it, among women, and a floating mass of inconsequent, slushy sentiment among men. There is more than one popular prejudice which obscures the meaning and significance of Modern Feminism with many people. There is a common theory, for instance, based upon what really obtained to some extent before the prevalence of Modern Feminism, that in any case of antagonism between the two sexes, women always take the man's side against the woman. Now this theory, if it ever represented the true state of the case, has long ceased to do so.

The powerful female sex union spoken of, in the present day, exercises such a strong pressure in the formation of public opinion among women, that it is rapidly becoming next to impossible, even in the most flagrant cases, where man is the victim, to get any woman to acknowledge that another woman has committed a wrong. On the other hand it may be noted, that the entire absence of any consciousness of sex antagonism in the attitude of men towards women, combined with an intensification of the old-world chivalry prescribed by tradition towards the so-called weaker sex, exercises, if anything, an increasing sway over male public opinion. Hence the terrific force Feminism has obtained in the world of the early twentieth century.

It is again often supposed, and this is also a mistake, that in individual cases of dispute between the sexes, the verdict, let us say of a jury of men, in favour of the female prisoner or the female litigant is solely or even mainly determined by the fact of the latter's good looks. This may indeed play a part; but it is easy to show from records of cases that it is a subordinate one—that, whatever her looks or her age may be, the verdict is given her not so much because she is a pretty woman as because she is a woman. Here again the question of attractiveness may have played a more potent part in determining male verdicts in the days before Feminist sentiment and Feminist views had reached their present dominance. But now the question of sex alone, of being a woman, is sufficient to determine judgment in her favour.

There is a trick with which votaries of Feminism seek to prejudice the public mind against its critics, and that is the “fake” that any man who ventures to criticize the pretensions of Feminism, is actuated by motives of personal rancour against the female sex, owing to real or imaginary wrongs suffered by him at the hands of some member or members of the sex. I suppose it may be possible that there are persons, not precisely microcephalous idiots, who could be made to believe such stuff as this in disparagement of him who ventures an independent judgment on these questions; otherwise the conduct of Feminists in adopting this line of argument would be incomprehensible. But we would fain believe that the number of these feeble-minded persons, who believe there is any connection between a man having independent judgment enough to refuse to bend the knee to Modern Feminist dogma, and his having quarreled with any or all of his female friends or relations, cannot be very numerous.

As a matter of fact there is not one single prominent exponent of views hostile to the pretensions of what is called the “Woman’s Movement” of the present day, respecting whom there is a tittle of evidence of his not having lived all his life on the best of terms with his womankind. There is only one case known of indirectly by the present writer, and that not of a prominent writer or speaker on the subject, that would afford any plausible excuse whatever for alleging anti-Feminist views to have been influenced by personal motives of this kind. I am aware, of course, that Feminists, with their usual mendacity, have made lying statements to this effect respecting well-nigh every prominent writer on the anti-Feminist side, in the hope of influencing the aforesaid feeble-minded members of the public against their opponents.

But a very little investigation suffices to show in every case the impudent baselessness of their allegations. The contemptible silliness of this method of controversy should render it unworthy of serious remark, and my only excuse for alluding to it is the significant sidelight it casts upon the intellectual calibre of those who resort to it, and of the confidence or want of confidence they have in the inherent justice of their cause and the logical strength of their case.

AVfM Radio: Rape Culture

[box icon=""]

We all know the score. Rape. That most evil of all crimes, a fate worse then death, the most appalling thing one person can inflict on another.

Well, let's be honest here. It's the most appalling thing a man can do to a woman, since other forms of rape either don't exist or don't matter.

But have we ever stopped to wonder what our beliefs about 'rape' say about us as a society? What if our conventional understanding of rape is a magic trick, a slight of hand designed to hide a deeper and more widespread rape, a rape of our very identities?

Join us, Typhonblue and Girl Writes What and JTO as we talk about rape… culture.

Andybob’s Corner Vol. 1

October 25, 2012 | by andybob | Link | Original Link

Publishers note: Welcome to Andybob’s Corner.

If you have ever read The Prophet, by Khalil Gibran, you probably understand why the book has become so widely known and revered. Through an uncanny wisdom and skillful, efficient use of prose, Gibran deftly encapsulates many different aspects of common human experience and brings them into the light of understanding. In one small book, fitting easily into the palm of your hand, he cuts to the core of love, friendship, death, grief, marriage, law and other aspects of life that define our existence.

Gibran is who comes to my mind when reading the comments of Andybob here at AVfM. Well, except Gibran never made me pass a mouthful of kung pao shrimp through my nose and onto my monitor.

Our Andybob, a resident prophet among the men and women of this site, has been placing comments here for quite some time. All of them are a cut above. Every last one.

Many of us have pleaded with him for ages to write feature articles, to no avail. It seems that Andybob writes when it strikes him to do so, in a format of his choosing, and prefers not to write more lengthy pieces for publication. Genius is often given to such peccadillos.

And that is fine with us. We will take Andybob as he comes to us.

Also, there is no reason not to bring the mountain to Muhammad. Henceforth, we will occasionally be filling your screen with Andybob’s Corner, a select gathering of comments, all of which were select before we selected them, for a more condensed and intense Andybob Experience. With a word of appreciation for the maestro, we give you installment one. PE

Andybob on:

Rape Hysteria

Questioning the veracity of “rape awareness” must make those who live off it very nervous. One of the most difficult aspects for me to deal with is that most women seem to know that it is a manufactured issue. The behavior and demeanor of most women reveals no fear or wariness of men. Quite the opposite.

They embrace it because it ticks every box. It whips white knights into frenzies of do-gooding; it demonizes men as the source of all societal evil; and, it keeps all of that lovely tax moolah rolling in to combat the ‘epidemic’.

Most importantly, it enables women to wallow in the kind of self-pity they enjoy the most; the kind that permits them to lash out with outrageous accusations and abuse without conscience or consequence.

Rape Hysteria is the Pandora's Box of feminism. It has unleashed the darkest and most perverse collective instincts of women – from their raw hatred of men, to their compulsion to destroy and corrupt all that is true and just. It is the incarnation of the pointless nihilism that is the heart and soul of the feminist movement.

Putting Rape Hysteria under a microscope will have feminists gunning for the MRM like never before because this is their Holiest of Holies. Reveal the web of lies at its core and you prove the depths which feminists will sink to create a hostile world for men – a world full of abusive alienation and hostile accusation.

on Lesbians and sexual politics

Lesbians barged into gay men's spaces in droves jabbing their stubby fingers at everyone. Predictably, they proceeded to boss everyone around, making the gay rights movement about them. Note that homosexuality was a criminal offence for MEN ONLY. Lesbianism was never against the law. They had jackshit to whinge about, but they made gay rights about them anyway, and used it as a propaganda vehicle to support feminism.

Notice that GLTT became LGTT? How's that for petty entitlement? Gay men should have fought back, but, to our everlasting shame, we didn't. The only gay men who remained in GLTT were slimy political types seeking personal aggrandizement, zeta poodle carriers and moronic party boys who don't give a shit about anything except the pattern on the umbrella in their drinks. Of course, the MSM focus entirely on this noisy, spangled disco version of real gay men like me: men who know exactly how greedy, relentless and downright shady those lezziefems are and don't trust them one iota.

On Hypergamy

Hypergamy is feminism's crazy cousin Ralph. No matter how much they try to ignore him and pretend he doesn't exist, he keeps popping up plastered at family functions with $5 hookers in tow. Best to pretend he's from the other side of the family.

We've all seen feminists scoff dismissively at the concept of male disposability. They find it laughably absurd. Not hypergamy. That charge makes their heads spin. Like cousin Ralph, it's more polite to just ignore it.

Why? What is about hypergamy that makes feminists so uncomfortable?

The central tenet of second wave feminism was that lack of opportunities in the workplace forced women to seek financial security through marriage. Feminism was sold as the means by which women could cast off this 'glorified whoredom' and attain a measure of independence (which terrified the patriarchy and kept it up nights, or something).

For most people, this all rang true (except the patriarchy part) which is why it was such an easy sell. As Mr. Augen points out, all loving parents wanted to see their daughters well-provided for – as opposed to begging, whoring or being carted off to the Work House. They still do.

No worries. Lots of feminism will cure the world of hypergamy After all, women won't want to commandeer someone else's assets when they can earn their own – right?

Right?

Oh dear. It seems that feminism's most noble claim turned out to be their biggest lie. Despite decades of feminist legislation and ruinously expensive programmes, hypergamy is actually more deeply emedded in our culture than ever before.

Nobody is more celebrated in our culture than the no-talent bimbo thrusting her siliconed assets at an admiring world as she clutches her clueless millionaire/tycoon/movie star/sports star. She is the strong, independent woman of today, making her own rules, grabbing the best-of-everything for herself while she can. Isn't she great?

Poll females aged 15-25 for their role-models. It won't be Marie Curie or Amelia Earhart. It'll be Khloe Kardashian or Coco. Hypergamy is blinged-to-the-max and proudly in-your-face. Popular culture shamelessly panders to the hopes and apirations of women. Therefore, it is no surprise that every facet of it encourages them to view their lives as nothing more than a hypergamous adventure.

It is important to discuss hypergamy because it is the most accessible way to introduce the concept of male disposability. Public examples abound, and everyone is familiar with at least a few women they know who proudly express hypergamous aspirations.

Who cares if cousin Ralph makes Aunty uncomfortable? He's family.

On Sasha Wiley aka Creepy Bittergirl

Like all self-dramatizing narcissists, this woman's life is an extended performance which has been painstakingly crafted so that she resembles a radical feminist. Ms. Wiley is a poseur – or, as we say in Australia, a wanker.

Even her epic plainness is manufactured. Look closely. That mousy hair has been very subtly tinted. The secretarial glasses may suggest Women's Studies major, but I know Prada when I see it. Check out the lacy bra-strap. Can you say sex-positive slutwalker?

I wonder how long she's been rehearsing the "I feel like I've been wronged" speech. How it must have peeved her that her 'concrete burn' didn't show up on camera any more than her swollen knee or ankle.

Her slam poetry was puerile and derivative – watered-down Plath. It was exactly the kind of tediously pedestrian trash that feminists with daddy issues have been spewing ad nauseum the moment Sylvia decided to get back at poor Ted. What a load of old shit.

I despise this creature for what she did to Mr JTO. That took a disturbing amount of arrogance and contempt. No-one deserves to be immortalized as Creepy Bittergrrl more than Ms. Wiley. Outstanding work.

When will Sylvia Plath finally materialize and tell indulgent no-talents like Ms. Wiley to stop ripping off her poetry? The Vancouver art scene deserves better.

Feminists launch secret weapon!

October 25, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

As I do on occasion here, I am posting a video in the feature section. I post this one because it is important. As difficult and challenging as feminists like Rebecca Watson and Sasha Wiley can be, I was relatively secure in the fact that feminists did not have the mental stability, rhetorical acumen, or intellectual prowess to present a real problem for the MRM.

Until now.

I am worried people. It seems the feminists have either been conducting, or using proxy white knight scientists to conduct experiments on drugs that heighten intelligence and the ability to sway the opinions of millions of people. They have given some kind of drug in mass quantities to a male youtuber, and he now presents as perhaps the greatest threat the MRM has ever seen.

I will be calling an emergency meeting to go over strategy on how to combat this threat. In the meantime, please watch this video. I suggest a box a Kleenex at your side. We are in trouble with this one, folks.

During the course of managing this website I have had exchanges with a few prominent gender advocates that carry an ideological banner. Recently, we got a curious visit from Michael Flood, a sociologist and one of the more strident proponents of feminism in Australia. I say curious because his visit just happened to come on the same exact day that Dr. Greg Canning and myself were interviewed by Guy Mosel, a former men's magazine (now defunct) editor. Yes, the kind with comely, big chested girls on the cover. He now writes freelance and is doing a piece on the men's movement for the Weekend Magazine section of the Sydney Morning Herald. The article is due out the weekend of November 24.

I don't know for sure, but this hardly seems like a coincidence. We will know for sure when the article comes out. My guess is Mosel will present Flood as an expert on the MRM or on masculinity, which he is neither, and us, of course, as regressive sexists, which of course we aren't. If that happens, there will also be a great deal about Michael Flood of which Mosel will be loath to inform his readers.

That's OK. We will.

Back to the matter at hand, Flood showed up here complaining that I did not have my facts straight[1] in a 15 month old article I wrote involving some very harsh – read honest – critique of his work.

My sources on the piece were linked, but there is a possibility that one source had some inaccurate information, which would mean that Flood's conduct, in that specific incident, would be a fraction less unethical than originally presented. You can read the exchange here.

As we are about to see, any ground he gained on that point is imaginary. And with just a couple of quick comments to the thread in question, he showed us why.

In one of those comments, he offered a defense of the White Ribbon Campaign (WRC), a roundly discredited campaign for which Flood is an ambassador. The reason WRC has received substantial scientific and academic condemnation (even as it enjoys political support) is because it presents a model of domestic violence that contradicts substantive research on the subject, and has largely rested its credibility on highly suspect, misrepresented and debunked data. In short, it is politically viable while factually unsupportable. And it appears that for Flood and his fellows that the political viability has overridden any concerns about its statistical validity.

I have elected to take Flood's comment and present it to you here, with point by point refutations. His words will be displayed in italics, and mine in standard font.

[I]n response to the material about the mistaken "one in three boys" statistic…

The White Ribbon Foundation's report An Assault on Our Future (2008) contained a small error regarding one aspect of young people's attitudes towards violence. At one point, the report stated that 31% of young men agreed that 'when a guy hits a girl it's not really a big deal', but here 'guy' and 'girl' had been transposed (National Crime Prevention 2001: 65). Unfortunately, this mistaken statistic was highlighted in a media release (not written by the reports' authors) and thus compounded in media coverage. The error was corrected as soon as it was known and the report was re-released.

A small error? Flood's own study concludes that nearly a third of young men do not see women assaulting them as a problem worth attention. Rather than that being a pivotal, wake up moment for his male targeted campaign, giving him a clear mandate to inform young men that violence against them is also wrong, he simply corrected the faulty numbers after the damage was done, and now calls it a minor mistake.

And let's be honest here. Flood calling it a mistake, even a minor one, is less than genuine. There is no program information, plans of action or any other form of recognition by the WRC that recognizes what the "corrected" numbers directly imply. A large percentage of young men have no sense of awareness that violence against them by a woman is wrong. Rather than address this issue, Flood and the other ideologues at WRC instead went full steam ahead with an agenda to raise awareness of violence against women only, targeting the whole of men as perpetrators.

There is little point in correcting information if you have no intention of putting it into practice to begin with.

This minor error did not take away from the main message of the report: that young people are exposed to violence in their families and relationships at disturbingly high levels….

We need to stop mid-sentence here. There is no message or awareness advocacy from WRC that young "people" are exposed to violence, just young women. All of their literature, "research" information and awareness efforts completely dismiss male victims and female perpetrators. We see the transition of focus toward the gendered model as Flood completes his thought.

…that this violence has profound and long-lasting effects, that violence is sustained in part by some young people's violence-supportive attitudes, that young males have more violence-supportive attitudes than young females, and that prevention efforts can stop this violence from occurring and continuing (Flood and Fergus 2008). The full report is available here:

http://www.whiteribbon.org.au/media/documents/AssaultonourFutureFinal.pdf.

Note the move. Twice in a row he referred to problems experience by young "people." But then, he begins to ease readers toward the intended paradigm of victims and perpetrators that are designated by sex. His first step in this direction is pointing to "violence-supportive" attitudes being more prevalent in young men than young women. He offers a research link, supposedly to a study of his own authorship, but it returns a "Page no longer exists" message at the WRC website.

That's fine for the moment. We can wait to see his his non-reviewed, self-conducted research, and at that point we may even ascertain why it is no longer present on the site.

We can still address part of Flood's gendered notions of violence-supportive attitudes.

First, it would stand to reason that we would infer that at least some portion of what Flood defines as "violence-supportive" attitudes in young men must be explained, in Flood's own words, by the indifference to violence committed against them by women. Even according to the remainder of Flood's position, that constitutes the lion's share of any purported tolerance for violence. It is not, in this case, violence by men against women that is supported, but the reverse.

Flood does offer some "evidence" of the idea that young males have more violence-supportive attitudes than young females, though not nearly in the proportions shown above. For example:

One in three boys (33%) believe that 'most physical violence occurs in dating because a partner provoked it', compared to 25% of girls (NCP 2001: 65).

15 per cent of males (but only 4% of females) agree that 'It is okay to put pressure on a girl to have sex but not to physically force her' (NCP 2001: 65).*

Over one in eight boys (12%) believe that 'it is okay for a boy to make a girl have sex, if she's flirted with him, or led him', compared to only 3% of girls (NCP 2001: 65).

7% of males (but only 2% of females) agree that 'it's alright for a guy to hit his girlfriend if she makes him look stupid in front of his mates' (NCP 2001: 65).

On the surface, these would appear to be some compelling numbers regarding male tolerance of violence toward females. There is, however, a significant caveat. There was no corresponding questions in the reverse of any of these questions, so there is no data here to determine the violence-supportive attitudes of girls. Thus there is absolutely no justification for saying that such attitudes are more prevalent in males.

And how do we know that the reverse questions were never asked? The entire paper, and all its glaring deficiencies were already dissected and debunked by Men's Health Australia (MHA), a magazine which is considered to be a highly reputable source of information about social and psychological aspects of the lives of Australian men and boys.

Let's take a look at an exchange between Flood and MHA regarding the statistics he posted to A Voice for Men just hours ago. In dissent of the findings:

MHA: Because these questions weren't asked in the reverse (e.g. 'do you believe that it is okay for a girl to make a boy have sex, if he's flirted with her, or led her'), we don't know what young people's tolerance is of specific types of female-to-male violence (only of violence in general – see below).

FLOOD: Indeed, in highlighting the mistaken statistic above, Men's Health Australia do[sic] not acknowledge that there is in fact greater tolerance for females' violence against young men than young women. Close to 1/3 (31%) of boys and young men agreed that 'when a guy hits a girl it's not really a big deal' Compared to 19% of females (National Crime Prevention 2001: 65). This may reflect a more general tolerance for violence espoused by young males.

Of course, again, Flood is talking about violence against men, which has nothing to do with WRC, but the greater tell is in the beginning of his comment. He acknowledges that the highlighted statistic is in error; the same statistic he just posted to AVfM as qualified, credible research. In other words, Flood is here at AVfM attempting to pawn off research numbers that have not only been debunked, but which he has already publicly admitted have been debunked to a national magazine.

In fact, his comment here at AVfM appears to be a direct copy and paste from his statement to MHA, except that he omitted the part about the stats being invalid. As we see here, from his recent comment to AVfM:

In fact, there is greater tolerance for females' violence against males among young men than young women. Close to one-third (31%) of boys and young men agreed that 'when a girl hits a guy it's not really a big deal', compared to 19% of girls and young women (National Crime Prevention 2001: 65). This may reflect a more general tolerance for violence espoused by young males.

I strongly suggest that any reader interested in the academic integrity of Michael Flood read the critique of his research in the link below, with particular attention to his exchanges with MHA representatives. It is incredibly telling information.

Even the series of events that finally led Flood to respond to criticism of his work is informative. Per the MHA document, it went like this.

White Ribbon's initial response to our concerns was five months of silence. Once we pursued the matter we were sent a response to our concerns written by Dr. Michael Flood – a White Ribbon Ambassador and Lecturer in Sociology at the University of Wollongong with a long involvement in community advocacy and education work focused on men's violence against women. This response failed to address our core concern: that it isn't necessary for White Ribbon to downplay, diminish or report incorrectly about male victims of violence in order to highlight female victims of violence.

In addition, Dr. Flood's response:

[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- Failed to address a number of our specific concerns about statistical and factual errors;
- Contained more errors than the original document when responding to other specific concerns;
- Resorted to ad hominem attacks in an apparent attempt to discredit Men's Health Australia;
- Failed to successfully challenge any of Men's Health's specific concerns.

[/unordered_list]

MHA CONTINUES:

On 4th November 2010 we wrote an open letter, co-signed by almost 20 professionals and organisations working in the field of family and domestic violence, to the Chairman and Board of the White Ribbon Foundation about these errors and unreferenced claims but did not receive a response.

On 23rd November 2010 we sent another open letter, co-signed by more than 30 professionals and organisations working in the field of family and domestic violence, to the Hon Kate Ellis MP, Minister for the Status of Women. This letter was CC'd to all Federal MPs. It strongly urged the Australian Government to reconsider whether the White Ribbon Foundation are an appropriate agency to be funded to undertake violence-prevention work in the Australian community, and requesting that she personally take steps to ensure that they do not mislead the public – either intentionally or unintentionally – with false or misleading information about violence while in receipt of public funding.

On 24 November 2010, we issued a media release titled Federal funding 'misused' by White Ribbon Campaign.

On 31 January 2011, an advisor to the Minister replied to us, completely ignoring the entire substance of our open letter.

On 4 February 2011 we contacted the Australian Bureau of Statistics (ABS) requesting new data from the 2005 Personal Safety Survey to help us confirm the concerns made in our original letters.

On 4 April 2011, we replied to the Minister, requesting a further response that addressed the substance of our original letter.

On 20 April the ABS provided our data request, however on 3 June they informed us that the request would have to be reissued because of errors in the original data sent to us. The reissued data was provided to us on 10 June, at which time we asked the ABS to confirm the validity of a number of statistical charts and statements derived from the raw data. Most of these requests were confirmed by the ABS by 18 October 2011 but one is still outstanding as of the date of writing this document due to a change in ABS staff.

On 30 May 2011, the Minister's advisor wrote back, merely "noting the issue our organisation has raised."

Having heard nothing from the White Ribbon Foundation, we telephoned their Sydney office on 4 April 2011, and spoke with their National Marketing and Communications Manager, Kate Alexander. She forwarded us a copy of the document A response to criticisms of White Ribbon materials made by Men's Health Australia, authored by Dr. Michael Flood.

Noting that the response document contained as many – if not more – statistical errors and omissions as the original What about the men? White Ribbon, men and violence document, we sought a meeting with the new CEO of the White Ribbon Foundation, Libby Davies, and Ms. Alexander. This meeting took place on 2nd May 2011.

Politically viable. Academically fraudulent. There is sufficient evidence to conclude that Michael Flood has knowingly used a significant quantity of erroneous statistics to promote White Ribbon Day. In short, he misled the public into participating in the project, and the government into funding it.

WRC justifies its existence by reducing the complicated, sometimes intractable problem of domestic violence to a simplistic model targeting men, and only men, as perpetrators, and women, and only women, as victims. This is despite the overwhelming amount of research that concludes men and women are equally prone to commit intimate partner violence, that men are particularly prone to under reporting and that men who are victims suffer a severe deficit in the availability to social services.

Aside from efforts to fund a a manufactured, gender based model of domestic violence, there is also ideological factors that appear to be driving Dr. Flood. While it is well known that he is an avid and active supporter of gender feminism, that is hardly remarkable in modern society, particularly in academe.

What is more concerning is that Flood has given clues that he subscribes to more virulent, radicalized forms of feminism, as opposed to the beliefs of many of his peers. Flood is quoted as saying:

> The idea that radical feminism is essentialist has become a standard claim. However, this is more folklore than fact, and the actual writings of radical feminists show more hope for change and less biological determinism than such claims allow. [source]

This appears to be much more than rhetoric.

Flood is responsible for the establishment of a blogging community, XYOnline. Part of his efforts there are to recruit like-minded ideologues to supply content for the site. So far his chief acquisition is Julian Real, an avowed radical feminist who describes himself as "[A] white, class-privileged, Western academically and non-academically educated, intergender (and, much more importantly, anti-gender) male who is also gay, asexual, Jewish, and a survivor of childhood sexual assault and adult sexual exploitation."

Flood announced his addition of Real to the roster on the site:

> XY now has three bloggers lined up, with one (Julian Real) contributing regularly and the other two starting soon.

Real also manages a blog called Radical Profeminist, where the subject of extermination of 90% of the male population (for the sake of world peace) is openly discussed. While Real appears to have gone in after the fact and posted a disclaimer expressing opposition to genocide, that is contradicted by statements he made in an online exchange with a genocide advocate that was posting anonymously. The exchange went as follows:

Anonymous: Right now, men know how to shut up when I walk in the room. They are just as deadly as ever, but at least the jokes stop. Step one, shut them up, step two, teach the girls to fight back hard, step three execute all rapists, step four reduce the male worldwide population to say 10%. Maybe then we'd have peace in the world.

Julian Real: I'm all for it, as long as that 90% isn't comprised of people who are facing genocide by whites, unless agreed upon by the women of that community, society, or nation.

Michael Flood, a man campaigning to reach across the entire Australian landscape and influence young men, has chosen to share a public stage with a man who when questioned about exterminating nearly half the population is "all for it," as long as the victims are not going to be murdered by someone else first. Well, unless the women say they should be killed anyway.

I am seldom at a loss for words. But I seriously struggle with what to say to this. The depravity is too much, too sickening. Suddenly I am distracted from my concerns about white ribbons and false statistics and sleazing around for a grab at some government funding.

Do I think Michael Flood shares these views? I have no idea, and to tell you the truth I quit caring before I finished writing this article. This is not about domestic violence or even ideology. It is about some very, very sick people who are, regardless of the causes in which they drape themselves, no friend to the society in which they live, or to anyone else. The idea they have access to the minds of young people is frightening.

Rape culture is hate culture

Rape culture is a narrative.

Whether it's one reflecting fiction or fact I'll leave alone for the moment, but even the most earnest proponents of the claimed reality of rape culture cannot deny that rape culture is a cultivated narrative in the public political discourse and the public zeitgeist of western civilization in the 21st century.

Some feminists will claim rape culture is nothing less than a factual representation of the apparently real public environment of sexual predation against all women and girls. Ignored in this definition is the fact that women are not the only victims of rape. It discounts the rape of children by clergy, the rape of men by men, the rape of men by women, the rape of juveniles by their teachers, including female teachers, and the rape of male prisoners by female prison employees, both in adult as well as juvenile correctional facilities. No, for the most earnest proponents of so-called rape culture, it's a description of male sexuality, and in fact male identity, as predatory and criminal. And it is the confining of female identity into the tiny enclosure of permanent victim, and helpless inanimate object.

Rape culture is a belief, not simply in the innate evil in all male human beings, but in the perpetual childhood and lack of agency in women. And this cultural narrative persists in a world in which rape is, by a wide margin, the least frequent type of violent crime tracked by law enforcement agencies. For the stats on that I refer you to the US DOJ statistics.

My personal characterization of what the narrative of rape culture is will probably raise objections from it's proponents, those who believe in the narrative that rape culture is a concrete reality and not simply a fabricated cultural narrative.

Prempting such complaints, I will refer to the writing of one Susan Brownmiller. Brownmiller is a feminist and an author, and among other places, her essays are published in the Huffington Post. And, when she is published by such current online journals, it is always with an obligatory reference to her 1975 book "Against Our Will" [1]. Written in '75 yes, but continuously referenced every time Brownmiller is published in the HuffPo and elsewhere.

The content of that 1975 book is relevant to our culture's current narrative, specifically, the component we refer to as rape culture.

Here is an excerpt.

> Indeed, one of the earliest forms of male bonding must have been the gang rape of one woman by a band of marauding men. This accomplished, rape became not only a male prerogative, but man's basic weapon of force against woman, the principal agent of his will and > her fear.

> His forcible entry into her body, despite her physical protestations and struggle, became the vehicle of his victorious conquest over her being, the ultimate test of his superior strength, the triumph of his manhood.
> Man's discovery that his genitalia could serve as a weapon to prehistoric times, along with the use of fire and the first crude stone axe. From prehistoric times to the present, I believe, rape has played a critical function.
> It is nothing more or less than a conscious process of intimidation by which all men keep all women in a state of fear.

According to this, for a man, his genitals are not a physical connection to sexual identity, or spirituality as manifested in some pagan religions. It is not even an integral part of himself as a physical being. No, in this narrative, a penis is an implement of pain and damage. It's a weapon.

A more vicious and cruel imagining of human beings as other, and as enemy, it's hard for me to fathom. But, it gets worse.

Rape, according to Brownmiller, is nothing more or less than a conscious process of intimidation by which all men keep all women in a state of fear. All men, against all women, in a process of concsious and purposeful intimidation and cultivation of fear.

These are ideas from Brownmillers' writing, which almost every time she has article or an essay published in HuffPo and elsewhere, are promoted.

Brownmiller's definition then is integral to every mention of rape culture.

Understand this. Rape culture is a product of hate culture. Its nothing less than a conscious process of constant imputation of malice by which all feminists keep all men and boys in a climate of permanent accusation.

October 28, 2012 | by Patrice Stanton | Link | Original Link

What can a man do when he has only one thing left for them to take?

People often describe particular creative works of theirs as “labors of love.” I would describe the novel I finished in mid-October, “Web of Lies,” in a different way; as a way of venting my sorrow and outrage. Sorrow over a tragic loss of human-life, outrage at a System running roughshod over those it claims it’s there to protect-and-serve. I’d still like to find one or two men to read it, but once the Beta-readers I have so far have given me their feedback I will begin sending it out in my search for an agent.

What follows this one-liner is the prologue to this 90,000-word paranormal political-fairy-tale: 20 year-old Hennessey Pict is finally ready for her first solo painting show in Dallas, but then her estranged father’s violent death and her life begin to imitate Art…the art of his paranormal comic-book vigilante, Inferno®.

Prologue

Shortly after June 15, 2011, I learned about how one man’s tragedy – which had been playing out in the courts of New Hampshire for ten years – came to an unthinkable end. There, back east, a beleaguered divorced father of three committed suicide by setting himself on fire. And he did it in front of the very courthouse that was scheduled to serve, on the morning of June 24, yet one more opportunity for players within the so-called justice system to hound him. This time most likely straight into their own jailhouse.

Instead, in essence, the man decided he’d already been hounded sufficiently. I believe he felt – as a man and a father without access to his own precious children – that he was already dead.

For eleven days words failed me. Then on June 26 I thought I got it, and wrote on the poster board I keep near my bed:

What can a man do when he has only one thing left for them to take?

After reading the dead man’s 10,000-word explanation I was further confused by the pitifully small media coverage. The thoughtful, articulate man’s very readable, downright journalistic essay contained hard truths, but only for those who would look. It contained truths about his experiences with the powers-that-be who lord it over all of us whether uniformed and out driving the streets, or robed and sitting high on-their-benches in our courtrooms. Most of it, therefore, is relevant to an awful lot of people, not just divorced-men.

While needing very minor polishing, the man’s personal-essay-plus-investigative-journalism was falsely and disingenuously characterized as “rambling.” And, yes, some of the ideas were paradigm-changing. But no, it was not rambling. In my estimation it earned such a label for one reason: to cause its dismissal and "earn" the man the ignominious label of just another Uni-bomber kind of nut job with a "manifesto."

I contend even women – who might typically dismiss men's issues, or see the entire sex as privileged and part of the "problem-of-the-Patriarchy" – upon an honest reading would recognize how children get sucked into this "family" system and thereby are routinely at risk of being decimated. They couldn't fail to see how wives are used as pawns, have their strings pulled by the velvet-gloved side of the iron-fist simply to perpetuate the Big-bucks' Business System that the incestuous abuse/rehab/family court creature has metastasized into.

Yes, for first-timers (yet to take the Red-Pill, so to speak) it's unpleasant contemplating what this man reveals about our system; one we've been taught to believe is "Just." And certainly an even harder reality-nugget to absorb is the palpable hope he has: that his final desperate act, his suicide, would inspire a real-world Justice-seeking League. It was especially frightening, I'm certain, to readers guilty of willfully using that very system to spitefully harm others.

He imagined a movement of real-world men like himself: pushed to their own brink; stripped of all their worldly-goods perhaps even cut out of their jobs, too. He hoped to inspire such men who'd been squashed into mere subsistence by this corrupt system, inspire them to once again take charge of their own lives, to take action towards real change and thereby live again. He hoped they'd become fighters for their own freedom – freedom from the institutionalized and most insidious discriminations practiced against men for simply being men.

Too many in this nation seem unaware that even our own long cherished systems can be corrupted; can become so broken as to leave individuals with no way to redress their grievances. But history is full of examples and to believe we are exempt – "just because" – is to choose to remain naïve. Hennessey Pict, the main character in this novel, starts out like that – well indoctrinated by her vindictive, divorced mother, believing the stories she's been told all her life about a long-gone father who "just walked away."

If burying evidence is evil, what then is disguising evidence? In this real-world example, disguising truths was as simple as mischaracterizing an essay as "rambling." In the case of the fictional Hennessey Pict's estranged father, the disguise was the wholly un-American, anti-First Amendment declaration that his comic-book caused copy-cat violence and therefore his works should be charged, convicted, and then silenced as hate speech.

The once living, breathing, feeling, real man discussed above that inspired me, along with the poor fictional guy whose suicide inspired my fictional cartoonist to create his comic-book series both took their own lives in tremendous acts of desperation.

Art imitating Life imitating Art…

Hennessey's father, cartoonist Trace Pict, dies in a violent accident and it's only then that she gets to read his comic-books. In the very first installment she meets his paranormal anti-hero, Inferno®, who, before taking his own life, poignantly declared:

“They have taken my kids, my home, most of my earnings…every f*ing thing except one – my life. And I’ll be damned to a frozen Hell before I let them take that, too.”

I don’t know if this story can make a difference but I hope somehow it will.

The AVfM editorial staff extends our concerns and heartfelt sympathies to Izzey, a long time AVfM supporter and contributor. As of this posting Izzey is riding out Hurricane Sandy at a Long Beach, New York location, but unfortunately has lost her Long Island home to floodwaters from the storm.

Many of you will recall that it was just August of last year when her home was severely damaged from the flooding generated by Hurricane Irene. She had recently completed renovations, however this time it appears the home is a total loss.

The storm is already causing extensive flooding, prior to actual landfall. It is responsible for 67 deaths so far.

We will keep you posted on her circumstances as they are available.

Best of luck, Izzey. Hang in there.

For many years I’ve been regularly going online at Men’s Rights Advocacy sites and other websites where for safety reasons I write using the pseudonym ‘Skeptic’. I’ve done this out of fear of once again being made to endure the slow death by a million cuts which I experienced during the 80’s, 90s and millennial years.

There’s a back-story as to what that means, and how and why I became a Men’s Rights Activist. No doubt many who read it will relate strongly to events in that story and may even be emboldened to come out as Men’s Rights Activists. I certainly hope so.

This is likely to be quite a long read as there’s much to tell and being both part Romano and a teacher for several decades I tend to be verbose, especially when nervous as I am now. So grab your favorite imbibement and settle back to read a horror story which ends on a final note of human survival and inspired hope.

I was born in the UK, a place I escaped from at the height of the cold war as an unofficial political refugee. Looking backwards with my graying temples I see I was a very naïve and vulnerable young man. Although I’d escaped as far away as possibly from what seemed then like the possible nuclear war epicenter of Europe to New Zealand, I had very little knowledge of my new home and adjusting was very difficult. The fact that folks there spoke English and were English culturally in many ways was some comfort. Even so I suffered immense homesickness, but had some satisfaction in knowing my UK passport had allowed me by to be at the opposite end of the planet from a grim 1980s UK; A place which then had 10%+ unemployment, a nuclear standoff with the USSR, the worst winter in over a century, power blackouts, race riots and the stirrings of a hate movement I have since come to know and loath – feminism.

Ah! The hopeful heart of a recent emigre!

I’d managed to escape by making one of the worst decisions I’ve ever made in my life – to propose to and depart from the UK with the woman I married a few months after arrival in New Zealand. Her immediate family were already settled in New Zealand having emigrated themselves from the UK some years previously. I’d hung onto her skirt tails and hopped the fence on a 747 to Auckland with a tiny bit of cash and a desperate keenness to find work, any work, in order to build a future. I realize now I had jumped out of the frying pan and into a terrible fire of sorts.

Fast forward a few years in New Zealand and I was still married – and going bat-shit crazy. We had by then a beautiful toddler son who I'd helped birth and doted upon. During his earliest years I job-shared with my ex-wife. We managed a home for disabled folks which meant we took alternate days on the job whilst the other spouse looked after our son. At that time, mid 1980s, that was very unusual as the vast majority of Dads went out to work full time and only saw their kids on evenings and weekends. I developed a very strong bond to my son starting from day one when he came out of my ex-wife's body and into my hands. We were inseparable, or so I thought. But I'm getting ahead of myself here, so back to those dreadful days.

During my time in that job I'd done workshops at the local community college – men's groups which helped me open up to the fact of my growing sense of ennui. The job, although spiritually and financially quite rewarding, and by then with a few local college certificates in the likes of communication skills and Grief and loss counseling etc behind me, was going nowhere. No upward mobility which my ex-wife harped on about incessantly there. I realized I needed to step out of it and train further. I made the decision that I'd like us to give up our shared job, to go to university to get a Psychology degree, and then re-launch vocationally. The timing meant a self-imposed 6 month layoff without an income until the new University year started followed by 3 years full time study with only a small student allowance income.

It would be a big squeeze financially, but with some savings was possible. Although she wouldn't admit it up front, her demeanor told me that went down like a cup of cold sick with my ex-wife. Still, there seemed no option but to press ahead and I rationalized that she'd enjoy the more relaxed lifestyle.

By then I was also starting to get small glimpses of the fact that despite freeing myself from grinding job ennui I still had an enormous mountain to climb. For I was still terribly, terribly stuck, by then mired in a quite loveless marriage with a wife who was starting to show increasingly signs of being physically, verbally and emotionally abusive if she didn't get her own way – me staying in harness. First came the shocking threat of divorce issued in front of my best friend. Then the arguments over my 'failure' as a man to be the breadwinner; the emotional and sexual cold shoulder and the picking of fights over trivial issues like finding a parking space whilst out shopping.

These were matters I tried my best to stand up to assertively, but even so I bewildered and accruing hurt after hurt in the process. Then shortly afterwards I recall she telephoned her father telling him god knows what false accusations. For next thing I knew he was white knighting in front of me on our doorstep having driven 200 long and twisting enraged miles from Wellington to be there, then pushing me into the house – punching me, kicking me, screaming at me incoherently as I somehow frantically fled and escaped out of one of the house windows and away across the surrounding lawns bewildered afraid and in tears.

After that I was still chafing at the bit to move forward vocationally, and unknowingly going slowly insane, but was desperately hanging onto our marriage out of a sense of loyalty and fear of the unknown. I see I was still very blindly stuck in a chivalrous script of 'manning up' to save the marriage. So I managed to persuade my ex to move to the countryside, a half an hour drive from a university at which I could enroll. The idea was for us to rejuvenate and refocus. Fresh air, a family vegetable plot, flower beds around the farm cottage we'd rented. I rationalized to myself ……. it could be the answer. It seemed like a good idea at the time……. as I said I was slowly going insane.

Then as you might have already guessed the shit really hit the fan – again, only this time much worse. My ex-wife went full bore bat shit crazy and life became a daily nightmare of being subjected to her tyrannical bouts of abuse which I see in hindsight amounted to her viciously saying "You're a fucking useless loser". In essence all she was saying – you should tow the line, man up, and take care of ME, ME, ME!".

Looking back I see I was just a success object, simply an appliance, not a human being in her eyes. The assaults escalated to the point of having a kitchen knife thrown at me. I still remember (with tears now welling up in my eyes) that knife quivering beside me, the blade deeply embedded in the floorboard not 2 inches from my foot, and somehow miraculously not in my body as had been intended.

On other occasions at that time I was attacked while driving the family car with our son strapped in his kiddy seat behind us. From beside me on the wide couch-like front seat her fists, an elbow and her boot rained down on my head as large delivery and logging trucks came past us in the opposite direction. I still don't know to this day how I managed to control the car and avoid a head on collision with oncoming traffic.

During that period scalding hot coffee was also thrown at me in the kitchen, cups, plates and torrents of verbal abuse likewise hurled in my direction. As I said, a daily nightmare. My minimal and futile attempts at self-defense were absurdly painted as abuse by her and thrown back in my face as excuses for her to go on yet another rampage. Hell.

Somehow amidst all this mayhem I frantically managed to ask for and get from her a 'cool off' period. It was hastily arranged. She went away for a few days to stay with family in Napier, only to come back sadistically taunting me with news that while away she'd slept with some other guy. Of course she excused herself by saying it was because I was an inadequate lover and she was 'lonely' out in the countryside. Never mind that it was difficult to emotionally connect with and feel aroused in the presence of a woman who might kill me at any moment. Reduced by such abuse, and caving in, I agreed to move our family into a nearby city where services were more plentiful, the university was closer, and I thought this would ease her stress/loneliness and we could re-bond as a family.

How very little did I know.

Despite moving into a leafy suburb with kindergarten and other services nearby for her to take advantage of, the daily attacks continued and grew more intense. I was by now so depressed that I was numb and literally inert most days. New Zealand, having no men's shelter, I finally took hold of what remained of myself and sought refuge in the only place I could think of that dealt with what I had some inkling I was experiencing – psychological shattering. I signed in as a voluntary patient at a nearby psychiatric asylum.

Very remote, peacefully set in rolling countryside, it was a refuge of sorts, where for two weeks I remained firmly staunch, not telling anyone my ordeal in group therapy sessions such was my intense sense of failure and shame, and fear that they wouldn't believe me in any case. As a volunteer patient I wasn't diagnosed, yet I can say with absolute certainty I was by then emotionally very damaged, eating and sleeping poorly, quite depressed and anxious. My ex-wife had done a great job on me emotionally.

Upon returning to the family home the assaults on me continued, but even worse was yet to come. Then my ex-wife started assaulting our son. That was more than I could bear. The day that started I took my son and fled. With nowhere else to go I crashed for a few days on a friend's living room floor. I sought help from the local family court and was directed to a lawyer. I'd never seen a lawyer in my entire life prior to that, but with a hopelessly naive general impression of lawyers and courts gained through the media, I expected my son and I would be helped. I met a lawyer. I didn't know it then, but she was a hard-nosed feminist.

I'll never forget sitting in front of her with fresh red swollen claw marks etched diagonally across my face from eyebrow to jaw from the latest beating at the hands of my ex-wife. Our son, then barely 5 years old sat in my lap, my arms protectively around him. The very first thing she said to me was "What did you do to deserve that?" in a sarcastic tone which clearly implied I'd received some kind of just punishment! Our client –'professional' relationship didn't work out. Surprise, surprise.

Then the inevitable false accusations from my ex were filed in the 'family' 'court'. Each time the 'family court' took an eternity to hold 'counseling sessions' and finally a 'hearing' with a 'judge' for us to try reaching settlements regarding property and visitation. Visitation itself was a joke with my son's access to me on countless occasions easily sabotaged with absolute impunity on the flimsiest of excuses by my ex-wife. The only recourse to which was going to a 'family court counseling session' with my ex-wife to address the issue of parental alienation – after at least a 6 week long heart rendering waiting period.

Desperately attempting to get access to my son in the face of horrific false allegations, I even agreed to supervised access to prove the allegations were unfounded. It was a most painful humiliating experience where for one short hour a feminist 'social psychologist' with a cold stern face and a clipboard in full public view watched my son and I play in a playground scoring points on her checklist for how much we were in her view 'bonded'. You can easily guess her recommendations to the 'family court' I'm sure.

Excuse me, I'm taking a moment to breathe deeply before recounting more…….

Needless to say the feminist system had done its job as it had to countless other good fathers I later came to know. I'd been totally asset stripped via the 'court' to the point of having to sleep on a mate's garage floor for 3 weeks whilst getting food from a foodbank and scraping together the financial bond for another apartment. Meanwhile my ex was living in a large lakeside villa with her new man, swanning around the luxury home in chiffon, sipping chardonnay, and going off to Fiji for annual holidays. All during this time of course my son was being so thoroughly indoctrinated to hate me by my ex and the apparent zenith of 'All males are patriarchal oppressors' cultural zeitgeist of the time.

Inevitably, like so many other children of that time he eventually chose to avoid me altogether. New Zealand, despite its small population has hundreds of thousands of children who have NO contact whatsoever with their fathers.

I saw my son in person at about age 10; 5 years of despairing sporadic sabotaged scraps of visitation after his mom and I had separated. I know very well what the parental alienation so many good fathers speak of means now. It is etched on my heart forever. Years of subdued rage and living a double life ensued – by day with my degree having been attained in Social Sciences – a professional healer; By night – submerged in the shadows of despair – keeping the lid as best I could on my near suicidal self by self-medicating on cheap wine and cannabis.

During this time I'd managed to get a series of jobs in the group counseling field. Incidentally I could write an entire book about the disgusting gender feminist manipulations and weird characters I encountered getting the Social Sciences degree and in the subsequent social work I did for about 15 years thereafter in New Zealand. But that's for another time.

Vainly I rationalized that if only my son saw the great people work I was doing with drug addicts, sex offenders, domestic batterers and other violent offenders, criminals in general and mentally ill folks, then he'd see what a really great guy I was……. and surely he'd come looking for me. All to no avail……how terribly, stupidly, pitifully, pathetically, naively I fooled myself.

I finally gave up on the idea of my son returning to me, and decided to get out of the psychic sewerage work I was doing and retrain again, this time for something healthier. I then put myself through one more dangerous bout of sliding past feminist academia, got my Teaching Diploma, then ASAP escaped a New Zealand still mired in feminist Duluth model dogma and underhand misandric whispering campaigns to go teaching overseas. I've been away from New Zealand ever since. That's twice now I've become a political refugee.

During my time in self-imposed exile I then subsequently discovered Angry Harry, the earlier version of Men's News Daily, The Spearhead, A Voice for Men and a growing number of other MRA websites. Through exposure to such male affirmative, or as we say red pill culture I gradually healed and felt more and more validated, understood, inspired, enlightened and emboldened.

So there it is.

My name is Skeptic.

I am a human being.

I am a Men's Rights Activist.

I am a loving father.

I am a survivor of spousal abuse, parental alienation and feminism.

I am an English New Zealander.

I am a political refugee taking asylum away from new Zealand and other Western feminist nations.

I am a teacher and doting elder to hundreds of children.

I will return to New Zealand/Aotea Roa someday.

I will be providing a link between a Voice for Men's growing international MRA collective and the small but passionate New Zealand Men's Rights Movement.

I will be exposing prominent New Zealand gender feminists and their white knight enablers whenever I can to an international audience through a Voice for Men.

I will also continue to expose them where you can see postings which show Men's struggle in New Zealand for the last couple of decades and meet some fine fellow MRAs at – http://menz.org.nz/

Lessons from a men’s divorce seminar

Lessons from a men’s divorce seminar

I’m not a lawyer nor have I ever played one on TV. I did however attend a free two-hour divorce-prep seminar one Thursday evening in October. Of course it was a Marketing outreach for the sponsoring law firm. I got that (and so do you) but the difference between this “free offer” and so many others, regardless their subject matter, was its uniquely man-centric, extraordinarily detailed content. I, at least, walked away with specific legal information and insights far above my expectations. That take-away went well beyond the value of the time spent in and traveling-to-and-from that hotel meeting room. The evening’s program – and undoubtedly a great deal more – are available in a book entitled, “The 10 Stupidest Mistakes Men Make When Facing Divorce: And How to Avoid Them,” by Mr. Joseph Cordell, founder of the sponsoring firm, Cordell and Cordell, which has 60 offices in 25 states.

“As a woman” I made certain in advance that I’d be allowed to attend as it was clearly directed towards men divorcing or considering-divorce. I also informed the firm’s representatives of my purpose: to write about the 10 Stupid Mistakes, for the benefit of men unable to attend their current slate of seminars. So on top of the top-notch quality of the notes I left with, I must add that the folks I met over the phone and in person that night – including the owner/founder of the law firm, Joseph Cordell himself – could not have been nicer or more gracious. In fact after giving each part of the after-action survey my highest marks I could only come up with a single one-word suggestion: “snacks.” (Because sign-in began at 6pm and the program finished just before 9pm.)

Several members of the firm took turns, tag-team style throughout the evening, to present these Stupid-Mistakes. I have taken the liberty of rearranging their order, turning them into “positive actions,” and separating them into three action-phases. I call Phase I, Prepare; Phase II, Persevere; and Phase III, Prevail. (NOTE: numbers in parentheses are those given to the 10 Mistakes by the firm in the formal presentation; the evening kicked-off with #10 and worked backwards.)

Phase I: Prepare

What can you do before the SHTF?

1. (10) Participate as fully as possible in your children’s lives. Future visitation may in part be determined by how involved with them you are now and have been “in the past.” If this moment is still “the past” (in terms of a possible or probable divorce) then wherever practical consider getting in on more, more, more: daily care, school drop-offs & pick-ups, doctor visits, etc. Ask yourself how you would “prove” the level of involvement you have right now as well as what you’ve done with them in the past. Who, in your kids’ lives, knows you? Who routinely sees you with them? Consider how your post-divorce work schedule and living situation would restrict or more easily allow future

Visitation/Habitation arrangements. Remember, "It's not about what's perfect, it's about what's better-than-the-competition."

2. (9) Position yourself in your home & Preserve your parent-child relationship and your finances. Even if you do not have kids, plan to stay put. (If you've already moved out, these guys say move back in. Quick!) If anyone moves out it should be her. And if you are a parent, moving out automatically cuts down your access to your kids to what's convenient to your spouse. You'll get visitation when she wants and at the same time you've skewed the ultimate custody determination in her favor: the new norm or "status quo" will be you-gone-from-the-home/you-minimally-in-the kids' lives for perhaps six months to a year before the court date.

Moving out also means double the household expenses. Judges typically expect the man to pay the bills, even if he's not living in the home. Beware leaving your soon-to-be-ex spouse in charge, if payments are late it will most likely be on you to fix things – or risk those consequences as well. Besides, have you made copies of all your important papers secretly and then squirreled them away outside that home? Do you have a current inventory of personal assets; who has what? Note that possession is often times more than 9/10ths of the law. Possession now can literally mean ultimate ownership after the divorce. This does not mean, however, you should hide things. You need to be honest and specific about the things you want to keep.

3. (4) Pause & Protect by keeping your cool at all times. Do not let your buttons get pushed because you know full well she knows how to push them. It is way too easy for a woman to fabricate grounds for Protective Orders and get you kicked out of your own home. These actions will of course have an impact at the divorce trial but their immediate impact will have you out of the house (with only the clothes on your back) and if there are kids, who knows what they will think of you – or what she will tell them about you – once you are gone. Looks like it may need to be a total walking-on-eggshells existence for quite a few months at least.

4. (3) Be the Peacemaker & Protector of the kids. Should you choose later on to have an independent council appointed to represent your kids, the presenter suggested thorough consideration of the role and the impact that individual might have. While they will represent the children independent of both your and your spouse's attorneys, the impact of their findings on your case could be considerable. How much confidence do you have in what your kids would say right now (about you, you and your spouse, you and them, and more) to such an appointee?

5. (1) Preempt by filing first for the divorce. (Note: I don't recall their use of a martial analogy, but I think it's apt.) The law firm rightfully left this strategy for last. It was only by that end point that they'd effectively painted a clear, of course very generic, overview of the various "battles" that make up the entire divorce-war. Just as no one would file for divorce without council likewise one ought not to file without understanding the entirety – and enormity – of tasks to be accomplished before that formal shot-across-the-bow "reveals their hand."

Generals don't typically reveal battle plans and neither should men considering divorce. By filing first you get several advantages not the least of which is to put your wife on the defense with that element of surprise. Of course there's also the "asset protection" this affords: including perhaps stock options, end-of-year bonuses, and general income protections. It could also mean the "reveal" doesn't occur while the wife and kids are away at the grandparents. Lastly, and most surprisingly, was learning that he/she who files first gets to go first in court. And they also get to have the last word as well. We were reminded that "judges are human, too" and their concerns and conditions (getting over a cold, bad mood, etc.) are likely to affect the proceedings. The anecdote given was of a tired, hungry judge being kept into the lunch hour: he/she decides they'd "already heard enough" when the second party's council had only barely taken the legal-stage, so to speak. Advantage to the first party…hopefully, you!

Phase II: Persevere

Remember: you're in it for the long haul…

1. (7) Poker-face at all times. Well, within reason. But these are the days when your mantra needs to be, "Silence is golden." So repeat: "Silence is golden." "Silence is golden." Especially if you're the type who likes to have the last word. (Silence is golden.) Do not allow yourself to be disarmed by innocent-seeming or offhand divorce-related comments. Why? To avoid getting provoked (getting buttons-pushed) into talking about your case and thereby revealing – valuable or even trivial – things about your lawyer's strategy. Remember that mantra…especially knowing there will be a point where just getting her to shut up will certainly evolve into wanting to "stick it" to her and her lawyer. You're the one wanting to come out on top here, so forgive me if this sounds all O.J. but, If you want to win, you must rein it in.

2. (2) Principled words and actions. Failing to tell your doctor things can get you a bad diagnosis; failing to reveal relevant information to your council or to the opposing council in depositions or in the courtroom can lose you the whole divorce shebang. The lawyer presenting this stupid-mistake likened such divorce related lies (or "omissions") to potato chips by using the Frito-Lay® "bet you can't eat just one" tagline. The first lie will always require another then another and so on. So just don't do it. Forensic accountants will find your money and good opposing attorneys (like your wife will probably have) find bad people. And with one measly lie uncovered you'll automatically be Bad. You will lose credibility and so will your attorney. You'll basically lose the chance to make your case because in essence the judge will quit listening to your points. The lawyer-lecturer made it very clear: the woman can lie a few times (see Phase III: #1, below) and be forgiven, while you, a man? Do it once and you're thrown off the field.

3. (8) Pow-wow in advance with your lawyer for everything "testimonial." This is for things prior to the actual final court date: Depositions, Preliminary Hearings, etc. Depositions are apparently very critical events and lacking specific preparation can lead you into fatal errors. If you reveal too much you will weaken your case and help your opposition. Your council will probably advise what the lecturer did: stick to simple answers and nothing more. But to do so you have to have a clear grasp of the facts. You need to know events, dates, and details as well as how to gather pertinent documents that will support what you are saying. When kids are involved you must also know your position on key welfare issues mentioned earlier including: daily care, health, education, special needs, and others. Critical forethought must be given to the practical division of all these areas of decision-making.

Such testimonial events also allow your council to: understand the accusations against you (I believe this is if you haven't filed first), follow-up on still unanswered discovery questions, and to simply "fish-around" for information. The latter will be reeled-in from a spouse whose lawyer has left her less-than-prepared-for-the-deposition! The key take-away quote in this stupid-mistake came after the speaker mentioned how easy it can be to resent even the thought of alimony or maintenance payments for your soon-to-be ex. He conveyed that, for appearances, you may need to seem to "concede" that some amount would be appropriate. He said, "You want to appear the reasonable one: she's the fruitcake!"

Phase III: Prevail

Stay strong even on the way to the downhill slide and into court.

1. (5) Perfect your finances. Your financial statement, as presented in your divorce proceedings, is the single most important document in the entire trial according to these professionals. They clearly illustrated the often cavalier attitude men have to these papers. They went so far as to joke that some men spend more time reading the Sports' section than they do on the divorce's money-business. These are the same folks who wouldn't dream of short-changing an income-tax return (even given the low likelihood of an IRS audit) yet they give short attention to laying out their marital financials where there's the absolute certainty-of-review by opposing counsel.

So in this phase you'll have another mantra to repeat and remember: "earn versus pay-out." More income than expenses is apparently not good, so check for all payments. They mentioned credit card expenses in particular; that they may be referred to on forms as "installment payments."

It was at this point in the evening, regarding the financial statements specifically, that this firm, with its extensive experience, made the following very clear distinction: that "as a man" you can't lie or make an error even once, whereas the woman – your adversary – may be able to squeak by with 3 or 4 missteps. Yes, this is unjust (and for me, downright evil). But besides the fact that this means you must detail (i.e. remember & list) and then perfect your expenses, it also means it's a place where your adversary is extremely vulnerable. The speaker claimed there's a 90% chance they'll have an error on their form. And since there can be NO math errors all your side has to do is find it (or them). So do yours over and over…and use a calculator. Oh, and please prepare a "typed" statement rather than simply filling one in by hand.

2. (6) Precedents can be set by settling for (bad) Temporary Orders. The lawyers reiterated it was never a good idea to waltz into any divorce-related meeting, whether a deposition or preliminary hearing without advance preparation. Another point made more than once was that judges don't like changing the so-called status-quo: if you've chosen to move out and the kids have been "succeeding without you in the house for x-months," that's the new status-quo. If your spouse is given "temporary" control of a joint business until the actual trial and everything's hunky-dory by trial time, that's the new status-quo and you might never go back to controlling the business again.

The power of precedents and the it-seems-to-be-working-as-is status-quo look to be very high in divorce matters. So never approach such hearings nonchalantly and question severely the council that pooh-poohs your desire to be informed and prepared. If a preliminary decision does go against you this firm suggested you may then have legitimate grounds to move the final divorce hearing closer.

Lastly, they offered a bonus: an eleventh stupid-mistake.

3. ("11") Predetermine child support. "Fully utilize helpful rules governing child support calculations." In other words don't just settle for whatever pie-in-the-sky dollar figure that your adversary throws at you. A quick search for the guidelines in my state, Texas, shows: 1 child=20% of non-custodial parent's net income; 2=25%; 3=30%, and so on; medical expenses are additional.

Wrapping it up.

I sincerely hope you never face this kind of legal battle but, if you should, the folks at the sponsoring law firm, Cordell and Cordell, truly "get it" when it comes to men and divorce. If they have an office near you they should certainly be at the top of a check-them-out list. That Thursday evening the firm's dozen employees (most of them lawyers from the Dallas and Fort Worth offices) exuded a quiet, confident demeanor that screamed battle-hardened Competence. Seems to me that's precisely what you'd want on your side in any courtroom, but as a man it's what you absolutely need in the "family flavored" kind.

Publishers note: The link to Cordell & Cordell is provided for reference purposes only. AVfM does not endorse their services. Approach all attorneys with caution, understanding that during a divorce your wife is not the only threat to your financial well being. PE

More on why you should probably vote

October 31, 2012 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

A couple of weeks ago, I made the case for why I believe American MRAs should at least be registered to vote, and probably should vote, even if they leave much of the ballot blank.

Leaving parts of the ballot blank is completely allowable and, in my view, totally ethical. You can also write in candidates–even if you know they won't win, you'll be sending a message, however small. I, for example, am leaning quite heavily toward writing in Bugs Bunny for President. Your choice is your own, and I have no interest whatsoever in swaying your vote there (although really, isn't Bugs a lot smarter than your average politician? I'm just sayin'.)

However, the following video demonstrates, in amusing fashion, one of the reasons I urge you to vote, which I hope serves to drive the message home:

Just so you know, that was put together by (most of) the cast of "The West Wing." Now, whether you liked that show or not is unimportant. I don't care whether you loved it or hated it or were indifferent. The commercial is funny and it drives the message home: in much of America, you get to vote for judges–and, while they don't say so, in some states you vote for Prosecutors/District Attorneys too. You also get to vote for state and county legislators who have oversight over judges and prosecutors, and the ability to impeach incompetent or corrupt public officials.

In some places, those are partisan elections, and in some, like my own state of Michigan, they are non-partisan. If you're in one of those states where they're non-partisan, odds are high you've been voting a long time and don't even know you've been leaving the non-partisan section blank. What you may also not have noticed is that in some states, judges are elected in a partisan fashion. But even if you're in a state where they're partisans, it matters: if you're a Republican but you know there's a misandrist Republican running for judge or prosecutor, don't just punch the Republican line; make sure not to give that judge or prosecutor your vote. If you're a Democrat and you know there's a misandrist Democrat running for District Attorney, don't vote for them. And so on.

Mostly, what I'm urging you to do is look for candidates lower on the ballot, and do some research on them. There's no crime in leaving sections blank if you don't know anything about those candidates, or if you hate them all. Fine, leave it blank, or write yourself in. But finding the ones who matter to you, even if they're only on your side on one or two issues that matter to men and boys, is a good idea. Especially because so few people pay attention there, your voice can have a disproportionate impact, no matter how small. Plus you may be able to sway a few other voters once you've done your homework.

Homework? Where do you do that? I know no better starting place than this: BALLOTPEDIA (click here, look for your state, and proceed to research).

Lucky me, a local father's rights activist has let me know the local circuit court candidate

I need to look for, and furthermore, by complete coincidence, the above video also told me who I need to support for Michigan Supreme Court (yes, I live in Michigan). They're talking up this one woman as an example in part as an ad for her, because she's the sister of a cast member. But I'm no sap, right? I thought, "yeah, OK, I'll look, but you may have just told me why I should not vote for her." I'm not that easy to fool.

But surprise surprise, this research led me to conclude that I definitely need to vote for her and even go so far as to say that, if you live in Michigan I think you want to vote for her too. Know why? Just look at this right here (click, click, please).

This woman created the Michigan chapter of The Innocence Project, which has so far taken on 19 cases, 2 women and 17 men. Most have been freed. In fact, she headed up the first group within the Innocence Project that goes after NON-DNA EVIDENCE cases. She's gotten men out of jail not by looking for DNA evidence, which is easy ("that's not his sperm after all" being a pretty easy way of doing things) but instead she specifically constructed her group to go after cases where DNA was not a factor. Instead her group concentrates on prosecutorial misconduct, witness tampering, recanting witnesses or accusers, and so on. She goes after the hard ones, in other words, and often wins.

Bang. She got my vote right there. 17 men who got hope back due to her. But as a bonus, I went through all her campaign literature looking for other red flags, and while the evidence there is not conclusive, there is a positive sign: she talks a lot about Domestic Violence and her opposition to it. But here's the kicker: I looked, and looked, and looked, and I could find her only talking about two things: family violence, and its effect on children.

Not one single reference, anywhere, to "violence against women." None. This is remarkable in a political climate where "violence against women" seems like an automatic vote-getter. Except: she doesn't do it. She never says it. She says "family violence," and she says "child abuse." I don't know, she may still have some misandrist impulses, but I know someone who's voluntarily worked hard to get 17 innocent men popped out of jail, and who's willing to just change the language on domestic violence to gender-neutral terms, is someone who needs my support–and yours too, if you live in Michigan.

By the way, this weekend letters went out from A Voice for Men and the National Coalition for Men to hundreds of candidates running for office in Delaware, Maine, and West Virginia, asking them to take a position on the cases of Tiffany Marie Smith, Mary Kellett, and Lori Jackson, respectively. This was only possible thanks to the efforts of more than a dozen volunteers, as well as myself, Paul Elam, and John the Other. If you use Ballotpedia and you live in those states, you can write those candidates yourself about those cases. And if you're in a different state, you can write to candidates in your state before election day ask them where they stand on issues like domestic violence, father's rights, false accusers, and so on. You've got time, and you can make your voice heard: politicians are generally most intensely interested in what you think when they're worried they might get voted out of office–and my experience is that at the state level, a lot of politicians are not even used to being noticed or contacted. Change that, why don't you?

If you're an American, what are you waiting for? The election is this coming Tuesday. Go find out who's running for office in your state, and Fuck Their Shit Up by asking them some questions and, y'know, voting. It's what the First Amendment is there for ya know. (No, really. See that bit right at the end there about the right to petition the government for a redress of grievances? Yeah, it's there for a reason).

November 6 is coming. Do that violent perverted misogynistic thing you do so well by doing one of that most subversive and terroristic of all things: investigate your local candidates, and vote.

Just do me a favor and think of Dave Futrelle and Surly Amy when you do.

Civil forfeiture is theft.

The most contentious civil forfeiture fight in the nation will be the subject of a week-long trial starting Monday, November 5, 2012, in Boston. Throughout the week, the Institute for Justice, which represents the property owners in the case, will expose the ugly practice of civil forfeiture—where law enforcement agencies can pad their budgets by taking property from innocent owners who have never been convicted or even charged with a crime.

The trial will start at 10 a.m. at the John Joseph Moakley U.S. Courthouse, 1 Courthouse Way in Boston. The case of Tewksbury, Mass., motel owner Russ Caswell and his wife will be presided over by Magistrate Judge Judith G. Dein in Courtroom 15. At the heart of the trial will be the protections.

Raising a feminist son

November 1, 2012 | by Greg Canning | Link | Original Link

The Femfax Media E-Zine DailyLife seems to be favored territory for many feminist ideologues to promote their biased views under the guise of journalism. Readers of AVFM will be familiar with the deceitful bleatings of Clementine Ford. [1]

Let me now introduce you to Kasey Edwards, a "best-selling author of four books" who would like to educate the presumably uninformed consumers of DailyLife about "Raising Sons that Respect Women."[2]

The title immediately raises two questions in my mind. First, Edwards seems to be suggesting women deserve respect simply because of their biological sex, as distinct from respect for persons based on their humanity. Why not "Raising Children to Respect Others?"

Second, is she is implying that son's need to be raised differently from daughters? Does not the feminist social constructionist view maintain that androgynous parenting ignoring biological differences is the path to equality of the sexes? Oh, I forgot, that only applies when it suits; apparently a little affirmative action is needed here.

Setting the scene Edwards pays homage to the usual core feminist myths; presumably to establish the false victimhood that in the contorted feminist psyche makes women more deserving of respect:

The disappointing progress for pay equality, female representation in leadership, childcare, domestic violence (need I go on?) tells us that men are unlikely to change their behaviours and attitudes simply because we ask nicely, or even if we're not nice about it.

Notice how the perceived causation of these complex and multifactorial myths are reduced by Edwards to the simplistic "behaviours and attitudes" of men, otherwise more commonly referred to as patriarchy. She continues;

Men will stop obstructing the path to equality when they understand that it is in their best interest to do so.

You, Ms Edwards are, I'm afraid, mistaken. Western men are crying out for true sexual equality. It is feminism that obstructs that goal with a continued gynocentric focus aimed at retaining female privilege while advocating for legislation to strengthen female advantage.

What is, however, in men's and societies best interest is to highlight the ideologically corrupt double standards and sexism at the core of feminism and to work toward true equalitarianism, were the interests of both sexes are always considered and balanced.

As is often the way, Edwards reduces her advice to a handful of simple items that will fix the problems with our boy children, her "six-step guide to raising a feminist son and why your son will thank you for it."

1. Watching www.sexy-sluts-horny-pussy-make-me-your-whore-bitch.com is not sex education

Please, Ms. Edwards, tell me who is suggesting that it is? Personally I know of no one, man or woman, who would even contemplate visiting porn sites as a substitute for parental relationship and sex education. Perhaps you do or know of some research that suggests it is so?

But it's not really about sex and relationship education is it! It's your way of maligning male sexuality, and boy's healthy interest in sex and the female body. Yes, boys look at porn; their first introduction to it, though, is not the Internet but the daily parade of scantly clad or unclad women provocatively taunting them via every form of media to which they are exposed.

The sexualization of our children begins long before they are capable of accessing the Internet, and the women who sell their body imagery for commercial gain, be it in mainstream advertising or via the music or porn industries, are just as accountable for the modern addiction to appearance and superficiality of relationships as anyone. When young men's natural but continually demeaned sexual interest meets that of the empowered, me focused, sexually liberated grrl's who revel in dressing as sluts it hardly a recipe for success, is it?

I have raised two sons and a daughter; my focus for sex education was on respectful relationships in both the boy-girl and girl-boy directions, with acknowledgement of the intrinsic differences between the sexes. Both face very real dangers in their interaction with the opposite sex. The dangers for girls are well know but less so for boys for whose lack of choice in reproduction, the risk of false allegations and the risk of physical and emotional abuse remain ever present.

2. How to use a vacuum cleaner 101

Feminist misrepresentation and research bias on division of domestic labour is well known. Typically they include only childcare (which is attributed to the mother at times when both parents are present) and traditionally female oriented chores in their analyses and neglect the more male orientated domestic and yard chores. Further they repeatedly fail to note that division of labor is generally agreed upon between couples who are largely happy with the split regardless of whether it is along traditionally masculine and feminine lines. [3]

No one doubt we should bring up our children to be self reliant and capable of looking after themselves domestically.

Edwards laments:

> Raising a son who needs a woman to look after him is creating a rod for another woman's back in about 25 years time.

Yet it seems to me that it is over indulgence by mothers (and the lack of fatherly discipline in single mother households) that is most to blame for boys (and girls) lack of skills in these areas. It is women who create the rod for other women.

Edwards's most perverse contention however, suggests that boys should learn these skills because their partners will more likely "be in the mood" and they will "get more sex" if they do, and that speaks more to Pavlovian abuse of female sexual power than respect in relationships.

3. "You are not what you eat (or your thigh or stomach circumference either) Ban any fat chat or discussions that reduces a woman's worth to her beauty or physical appearance."

Edwards can't seem to overcome her ambivalence on this issue, initially admitting that women themselves are appearance and weight obsessed and their "self-talk" is detrimental to children but soon passing the blame to men for appreciating beauty in women. She incorrectly attributes pointing out Julia Gillard's "fat arse" to "daddy" when the most notable example of this was by Australian feminist icon Germaine Greer.[4]

Suffice to say as parents we should encourage in our children a healthy diet, regular physical exercise and an acceptance of the diversity of body shapes and sizes that comprise reality. We should not accept unhealthy weight or obesity and discuss these openly with our children as we would any other health risk.

The real concern for our kids comes from the women driven, thinness obsessed fashion and beauty industries. Protecting our kids from the influence of this multibillion-dollar disgrace is in my view far more important than dad's attraction to, or compliments afforded, a beautiful woman.

4. Girl isn't a dirty word

Perhaps Edwards needs a refresher on the stages of human development, otherwise she would know that for a period in pre-pubescence, both "boy" and "girl" are dirty words to the opposite sex.

Nonetheless I agree with her we should challenge gender stereotypes but only while acknowledging innate and biological differences in abilities and interests that exist to varying degrees in our children. We should encourage our children to fulfil their own unique potential, neither forcing them to conform to or go against traditional gender roles; let them find their own balance of masculine and feminine traits that suit their personality. We should also be wary of institutions such as the feminized education system that would impose a gynocentric or androgynous schema onto our children.

Meanwhile one expects that Edwards daughter will graduate from home, skilled at changing car tires, unblocking drains, lifting and moving furniture, heavy garden digging, dealing with snakes and spiders and investigating suspicious noises in the night to name a few of the male oriented tasks strong independent women should be capable of, right?

5. Real men do cry

Given there is no such thing as a "real man," just men who more or less fit someone else's conception of what manhood is or should be, this statement has no meaning. There is however no doubt, that men do cry and always have.

The comparison of the presumed validity of the occasions on which men in general shed their tears as compared with women is another matter. One might argue that the balance point is somewhere between overly stoic and overly emotional. Some men could benefit from crying a bit more easily as some women might benefit from not crying as much in trivial circumstances. Encouraging our sons to express their emotions goes hand in hand with encouraging our daughters not to be overly emotional.

Edwards seems to think RUOK (are you ok) day is directed solely at men. She is wrong. It is a non-gendered campaign about mental health and suicide awareness in general http://www.ruokday.com/

"dedicated to inspiring all people of all backgrounds to regularly ask each other 'Are you ok?"

While men remain truly over represented in suicide statistics, outnumbering women by 3-4 times in most western nations, would it not be gratifying to see women attempting to understand the complex social and emotional determinants of this plague of modern men, and offer not tears but some real compassion toward correcting the root causes?

6. Fathers have a role to play

They most certainly do, and thank you Kasey from breaking from the feminist mantra to say so. The first obstacle to overcome of course is to allow men the opportunity to be involved in their children's lives. Women are reluctant to allow men into their traditional turf of childcare and women rarely desire men who may desire such involvement.

Currently, thanks to feminism, fathers are viewed as either obsolete (see White Ribbons opinion here) or optional. Single motherhood is encouraged and supported via legislated payments, removal of fathers from families and alienation of their children via the corrupt family court system is rife. All this has led to an epidemic of fatherlessness and a generation of lost, undisciplined boys.

It has been the traditional role of fathers to enforce respect for women onto their male offspring: the "don't speak that way to your mother" and "never hit a girl" sort of idioms my generation grew up with. I am happy as a parent to have encouraged my children to have initial respect for all individuals and continuing respect where respect is due. Just as status and authority are no guarantee the person holding them deserves respect, nor is an individuals sex. Respect must be earned and indoctrinating our son's into feminism will not achieve it for women or themselves. The way forward is equalitarianism. Tim Goldich puts it "loving men and respecting women," concepts modern feminism, with it's focus male hatred and female victimhood, knows little if anything about. [5]

AVfM Radio Men should be more feminine

November 1, 2012 | by AVfM Radio | Link | Original Link

Men, you need to get in touch with your feminine side. What this means is, be more compassionate, demonstrate more empathy towards other people, get in touch with your emotions, and generally be a better human being. This is the message we are routinely bludgeoned with, and mostly, although empathy, compassion and self awareness are certainly good things, this message is at it's base, a message of hatred towards men. It assumes that masculinity and compassion, or empathy, or self awareness are alien and contradictory concepts.

A Voice For Men co-hosts John the Other, Girl Writes What, Typhon Blue and Paul Elam will be running the chainsaw through this normalized message of hared and scorn, and dynamiting whatever is left over. AVFM will be proposing an alternate suggestion, simply that the world, becomes collectively more masculine. By which we mean, more compassionate, and with greater empathy, and justice.

It is time to stick it to ’em

November 2, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

We have just taken delivery of 5,000 4 x 4 AVfM stickers. They are full color, designed for outdoor use and have tenacious sticking power. We would like to see all of these stickers put to good use across the planet.

We paid top dollar for these babies, not so we could resell them, but for some street level activism. That is right, you cannot buy the stickers. WE WILL NOT SELL THEM TO ANYONE. They are free, at least in terms of money. They will be distributed to MRAs who are doing or who are interested in doing some on the ground promotion for the site.

You first qualify for getting them by putting up five (5) AVfM posters in any public area and sending us photo proof.

You can download from a selection of posters here:

http://www.avoiceformen.com/posters/

Email the pics of your poster work to the attention of AVfM Activism Coordinator Steve Berkimer at activism@avoiceformen.com. When he receives that he will mail you 25 of the stiickers. Put them up, photograph a few of them (2 or 3 pics will do), send those pics to Steve and tell him to send you another 25.

Limits will be raised for those that demonstrate enthusiastic efforts.

The 4 x 4 size of the stickers affords you a lot of flexibility in where you decide to put them. The industrial strength fuck-you adhesive makes sure they stay put. Seriously, these things are supposed to stick to a surface harder than a feminist sticks to bad stats. They can go anywhere, from the wall of a men’s (or women’s) room to the inside cover of a magazine in a doctors office to a light pole on the street corner to the windshield of your bosses car (just kidding about the windshield, sort of). Put them up most anywhere and then watch the flying monkeys have fun trying to take them down.

If you have already been out there doing posters, no need to send proof. We know who you are. Just let Steve know you want some mailed to you.

Here is a peek at the stickers.

Posters and red pills

November 3, 2012 | by Roger O Thornhill (George Kaplan) | Link | Original Link

I was looking forward to Easter again and oh, the chocolate fuelled joy of childhood. This joy came to an end at that time because of something I witnessed at just six years old.

In the kitchen I saw my dad through a crack in the kitchen door and he was putting out carrots for the Easter Bunny. But hold on a minute, why was he grating the carrots and sprinkling them in a line across the kitchen floor towards our back door? Something was up and I sensed it in an unfocused way.

It was unbelievable, my six year old mind could barely compute the enormity this deception. My entire life I'd been lied to. Every Easter had been a fib. If they were willing to lie to me about this, well, what else were they covering up?

Ok what about Christmas? Surely not? A fat jolly old man that delivers toys to every child in the world in one night is infinitely more plausible than a rabbit who delivers chocolate eggs. Rabbits don't have thumbs and aren't tall enough to open a door, so what other lies was I being told by my parents? What other whoppers would I discover out there in the big wide world?

Fast forward to the 90's and on a TV set I saw what I thought was a humorous news story about a Men's Movement.

The forgettable presenter of a forgotten current affairs programme sniggered at the story and openly at the men.

"What have Men got to complain about?" "We've got it all!"

Right before my eyes I saw some men hunched around an fire beating bongo drums. Yes, I was astounded to see them chanting but more than that I was saddened. Depressed even, and thinking that this was quite mad.

"Men have come farther than that surely?" I thought, "Is that what I need to do to be a real man? Immersed in an ignorance wrapped by my youth the truth of this news story eluded me of course.

I cannot forget those dreadful drums and the fools that pawed them.

Over the years I had sipped the fresh and liberating waters of feminism but had never finished a glass. The product is so superbly presented that its siren call had me come off second best I am afraid. Not only that, but I didn't even know I was drinking it most of the time, but I got wiser when the water began to stagnate. Its after-taste was not something I wanted or indeed expected.

In the seventeen years after the bongo (and pig fat) incident I had lived with and loved different women and managed to escape with my sanity, my belongings and my money.

There was luck and a lot of cunning on my side. I kept going back to relationships because that's what you did, and I was keen to learn from my mistakes and make it work with a woman, the right woman. I was looking for Miss Right to be my equal partner in a relationship because that's what women and Men were, they were equal. Right?

Equal for sure, but why all the tears and tantrums? Isn't this what little kids do? I always thought it odd that only children and women cry. The tears of a woman over a trivial matter have always strengthened my resolve to not be manipulated. I've always said of myself " I'm amiable, but not malleable!"

Now I am no marrying type and have no paternal instinct, and I'm always amazed to see it in others. For me there is an upshot and it's about babies.

When I think babies I think of orphanages. Why make your own little human when you can find one that really needs a home? I now know it's a major thing to make a miniature person to end up being an amazing thing.

One day earlier this year I read an article on the website of a regional tabloid here in my city. The article was about a barrage of posters going up on poles and walls at a big University. Something evil was going on that's for sure. This story sounded delicious and I wanted more.

Surely it was a comedy piece. "We believe in free speech, but we're going to take down the posters" said a head that spoke from that big university.

It made me remember the excrement that oozed from the Radical Feminist posters that were plastered everywhere in my University days. I thought "It's about time Men fought back."

It made me recall the men beating those drums in the night, "Shit those guys were kinda right on some stuff!" Lose the bongos (they don't do it for me) and I see now that they got the bit about the need for a Men's Movement.

So my next stop is at avoiceformen.com. Once there, I looked about for the bongos and the blokes "jacking off" around the fire. Nope, none here and what a damned relief I can tell you.

For some time I lurked here at AVfM and I was so new I didn't even know what I didn't know. I read as much as I possibly could and after a few days I had read a vast number of the existing articles and was now waiting for some new ones. I then visited the other MRA sites linked to AVFM and I found them informative, although some do nothing for the cause they purportedly support.

What was being said struck me and it was being said by men and women. Women at AVFM? I couldn't believe they were vocal here. What was their true motivation?

I was suspicious to say the least but now I know better. These were simply women who had unmasked the great scam of feminism before me and before I had figured it out. It was just a matter of different timing is all.

Now I began to realise that I had lived my adult life unaware of how the odds were being quietly stacked against me in the name of equality. Women and Men were writing articles and making videos enlightening me of this fact at AVfM.

It left me dumbstruck when I first heard Women talking honestly about the pitiful state of our society. "Fuck, they see it, it's not just a group paranoid Men raving away in cyberspace whilst beating drums!" "This shit is for real." The vague thoughts I'd had over the years about such matters were based on something that was actually real after all.

Having been led to believe all these by the media and society that I needed to atone for my sins against women. I've never beaten or raped anyone but I've loudly defended myself verbally so does that count? In fact, what the hell were my sins now I thought about it. Show me my sins.

How was this atonement to be achieved, by making it equal that's how. Let's cut women slack and let them change a flat tire, walk on the outside of the footpath, carry heavy things, open jars and kill moths. I was aware of the double standards to this "equality" but it was just in the periphery of my awareness only.

The enormity of learning more about how I had been ripped off by the F-Scam depressed me for a day or two. I didn't venture back to AVfM for that time.

I was disorientated and in an eerie and unfamiliar landscape. I wished I had a bongo drum to beat as this would have made me feel better. Something was affecting my mind and my vision.

Then I started reading the comments made by AVfM and I read them slowly and carefully. By this stage I had run out of recent articles to read and I wanted up-to-the-minute information on new victories against this war. I was too hungry perhaps?

Within the articles and comments there was humour, sadness, empathy and camaraderie. I cried laughing and cried a tear reading about the lives of others and the life destroying family justice system. Where were the comments about the joys of beating drums and rolling around in moss and taking a dump in a hollowed gum tree stump?

The resolve of the people who contribute, comment and share their lives at AVfM constantly amazes me. The next thing I did was register at AVfM and I left a few comments here and there. I felt awe for the people who contributed articles and their grasp of the subject material was inspiring, not to mention it was formidable.

What I learned was that there is a war going on that wasn't being televised or published in any newspaper? It made me think, "How unbalanced do things have to become before the average person notices?" What was going on? Was this another version of Santa and that rabbit but this time for adults?

The next thing I saw appear was the AVFM forum. I registered there and contacted a local MRA who was a regular contributor of humorous and incisive articles and illustrations.

He was generous with his time, patience, knowledge and encouragement. I thought about what I could offer in return, to contribute something that I can do? I leapt at the chance to assist with realising a creative idea for an AVfM project.

He kindly introduced me to the VOIP system and so on to other AVfM contributors. Once again I was met with warm camaraderie. I came up with a few ideas for some posters that I've submitted for review. I've also given some minor assistance with realising some design concepts for other MRA's.

You creepy, kitten blending, basement dwelling folks of both sexes just happen to be the friendliest people I've never actually met. The best thing is that there seems to be more of you everyday. Quite frankly, I want to meet you.

It's strange how the more I read at AVfM the clearer my vision gets and the louder my voice has become. From bongos to red pills I think we've made quite the jump, don't you?

Reapsow Radio Interview

November 5, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Just a brief announcement here. Tomorrow at 5:00 PM Pacific Time I am going to be interviewed about AVfM and "other things" on Reapsow Radio, an internet based program hosted by Reap Paden.

I have to admit I was not familiar with the show, so I went there and checked it out before accepting the invitation. While I was there I listened to most of an interview with the savage, penis uttering misogynist Mykeru, who cruelly parodied the defenseless, altruistic and fashionably bandaged Creepy Bittergirl. It was a great interview and still available for you to download.

After the interview is archived I will come back here and post a link to it in the comments. Thanks.

J. Scott Davis takes a dive for Kellett

November 5, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

The case of Vladek Filler comes before the bar with all sides trying to sink it.

As many of you who have been following the case of Vladek Filler are aware, he was released from jail recently, three days short of having to complete a 21 day sentence for assault. Filler was convicted for assaulting his former wife, Ligia Filler, in a case that had received a great deal of public attention due to the unusual conduct of the prosecutor in the case, Ellsworth, Maine Assistant District Attorney Mary Kellett.

After one conviction against Filler for sexual assault was overturned due to prosecutorial misconduct on the part of Kellett, Filler filed a bar complaint against her for a number of irregularities in her actions, including, but not nearly limited to, making misleading statements to the jury, withholding exculpatory evidence and instructing police officials to not comply with subpoenas issued by the court.

Bar Counsel J. Scott Davis conducted an investigation on Fillers complaint, found there was probable cause to conduct a disciplinary hearing which could result in Kellett's disbarment and referred the case to the Maine Bar of Overseers of the Bar with that recommendation. A hearing was conducted, but not concluded, on October 22 & 23. Both hearing days ran over the time allotment and the three member bar panel opted to give each side in the case 21 days to submit final arguments in writing.

On the surface it would seem that the wheels of justice are finally turning on this case, but an examination of the conduct of Bar Counsel Davis, information from witnesses to the hearing, and, importantly the first public examination of Vladek Filler's original bar complaint, portray something different. What you are about to read is markedly different than what has been presented by the local media in Maine, and paints a chilling picture of conspiracy and corruption permeating the local legal establishment.

It adds yet another bizarre chapter in Vladek Filler's saga with the Ellsworth District Attorney's Office, which includes prosecution on frivolous charges, prosecutorial misconduct, efforts by that office to gag AVFM and other publications from reporting on the case, ADA Paul Cavenaugh harassing Vladek Fillers medical providers – undermining his medical care, Filler's strategic incarceration to coincide with the bar hearing against Kellett, a State Deputy Attorney General sent to Kellett's defense, and Judge Robert E. Murray calculatedly refusing to rule on Filler's request to recognize new counsel, ensuring Filler would be jailed with no representation while the hearing was conducted.

From the time of Vladek Filler's first arrest to the writing of this article, this story has more smoking guns than a Quentin Tarantino movie. And it appears that the upcoming ruling by the bar panel is just as scripted as anything you would see from Hollywood.

This particular episode has a flashpoint; two minutes of what was essentially a very tense standoff between Filler and all else involved in the last moments of the hearing. The Ellsworth American, who had a reporter at the hearing, reported it this way:

> The panel allowed Filler, who testified on Monday, to take the stand again Tuesday at the close of the hearing. This was done at the objection of Lupton [Kellett's attorney], who said Filler should make any arguments through the bar counsel. Both panel Chairman M. Ray Bradford and Lupton chastised Filler for straying off topic and not answering directly during his earlier testimony. Bradford allowed him two minutes. He didn't get the full time; Bradford had to rein him in again, bringing the hearing to an uneasy close.

If you believe the Ellsworth American's account of events at the hearing, or most any other local media source, we have an impulsive, uncontrolled Vladek Filler, contemptuously disregarding instructions of the Panel and unable or unwilling to directly answer questions.

However, a closer examination of the conduct of Bar Counsel J. Scott Davis paint a different picture of those short two minutes; that of a Vladek Filler quickly and assertively taking action because Davis, the man who was representing his case against Kellett, was taking a dive.

Bradford had to rein Filler in, for sure, but not because he was out of control. He had to rein him in because Filler was using his two minutes to get every issue Davis failed to raise at the hearing on the record. The effort to prevent Filler from getting this information on the record appears to be as much or more the actions of Davis as it does Bradford.

Comparing the original Bar complaint to what Davis later chose to charge Kellett with in his Petition shows how grossly watered down the charges ended up being. This Petition was filed by Davis after Filler spent some 8 hours on the phone with him outlining the case and providing Davis with precise transcripts, documents, and numerous audio recordings showing the full extent of Kellett's misconduct.

Kellett's misconduct that was documented in Filler's complaint, but Bar Counsel Davis did not pursue:

[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- Withholding exculpatory videotaped interview for over one year in order to bring fraudulent indictment for sexual assault which was not provable.;
- Covered up exculpatory evidence and gained numerous discovery rulings blocking defense from vital facts and evidence. If the video tape had been provided prior to all those hearings, it would have allowed the defense to obtain very different rulings;
- Kellett and her assistant, Detective Stephen McFarland, submitted into discovery

Ligia Filler's select and mistranslated e-mails, after having Ligia Filler select only the ones that weren't harmful to the case;

- Submitted some 80 pages of falsified pornography print outs that did not come from the family's computer, after the crime lab found no pornography and the computer investigator concluded Filler's computer was clean. The trial judge eventually threw out the fabricated evidence, but took no action on Kellett;
- Kellett's assistant, on videotape, refused to allow Ligia Filler to give him her medical records release because they didn't want to provide them to defense;
- Kellett, on the record, lied to one Superior Court judge and asserted a privilege over Ligia Filler's private records (illegal and against Ligia Filler's wishes on video tape) in order to block those vital medical, examination, and psychiatric records from being released to defense;
- Kellett, on the record, lied to the trial judge stating she desperately tried to get these "extraordinarily important" medical records released to defense and even considered filing separate requests with the court for Ligia Filler's records, but the court denied them to her and to defense. She had in reality asked the court not to release them;
- Kellett told John Lorenz, Ph.D., the children's Guardian Ad Litem, that she had a journal written by Ligia Filler describing sexual abuse by Vladek Filler and lobbied the GAL to accept that women don't lie about rape and to allow Ligia Filler (a documented child abuser) to gain custody of the children. This journal story troubled the GAL so much that he contacted Filler and his attorney Dan Pileggi. Pileggi met with Kellett's own investigator, Det. Stephen McFarland, who then informed him that the journal didn't exist.

This is not a complete summary of Kellett's misconduct, but a sample. The details of these and other incidents of Kellett's corrupt actions are outlined and documented in Filler's original complaint to the Bar, available for download at the bottom of this page. Davis chose to pursue only those elements of the case most conducive to a favorable outcome for Kellett.

Bar Counsel Davis also engaged in some very questionable conduct in his gathering of testimony from witnesses on the matters he did choose to pursue.

Regarding the charge that Mary Kellett did not comply with requests and a Discovery Court Order for Ligia Filler's important April 11, 2007 written witness statement to Ellsworth Police, Ligia Filler's 911 recordings of April 22 and 24, 2007, Ligia Filler's psychotic incident of April 24, 2007 video taped by the Washington County Sheriff's Deputy, and discovery records from Gouldsboro Police:

[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- Bar Counsel did not call any police officers who were involved to testify. Those who appeared to testify for Kellett were not properly questioned about the evidence they had in their possession, such as withheld video recordings which were ordered for production;
- Bar Counsel allowed a full day of Kellett's witnesses to claim there were technical problems with production of video/audio recordings, when in fact the police officers admitted these recordings were made, did exist, were under Kellett's control or available to her, but were not provided to defense by Kellett as court ordered;
- Bar Counsel allowed Kellett and her witnesses to claim, without objection, that there were not specific requests for Ligia Filler's written statements to the Ellworth Police Department. These statements were vital proof of Ligia Filler's lying about being abused by Vladek Filler. They were explicitly requested in writing from Kellett, were Motioned for by defense, and were court ordered. However, Bar Counsel failed to point out to the Panel that statements by Kellett and her witnesses were inaccurate;
- When Filler used part of his two minutes to begin reading the explicit request by Pileggi for these records (which were later Ordered for production), both AGG Lupton and Bar Counsel Davis began yelling at Filler to stop and not to read the discovery request (Filler ignored them and read it in to the record);
- Bar Counsel did not present Vladek Filler's audio recordings of phone conversations with two police officers from two different departments who were prevented by Kellett from releasing discovery records and recordings;
- While being yelled at Filler, in the two minutes of allowed testimony, quickly detailed how vital those recordings are, how he was told by one officer at a hearing that the records that were promised were ordered by Kellett from production, and how it is vital for the Panel Members to listen to those phone recordings which Bar Counsel did not play for the Panel. They agreed to listen to them after the disciplinary hearing;
- Bar Counsel played a small portion of 911 calls by Ligia Filler (and her daughter) which was requested and ordered but not provided by Kellett. The recording he played is of disturbed sounding Ligia Filler crying and asking the 911 operator to help her find an unknown cat. What the Bar Counsel didn't play was Ligia Filler's numerous other 911 calls in that series with her making allegations and urging police to take custody of the couples 10 year old son from Vladek Filler;
- The recordings also contained Ligia Filler's daughter Natasha calling 911 about her mother being "crazy" and on her way to her step father's house after not sleeping for days, and of her mother "waiting" to get Vladek Filler criminally charged and convicted in order to force her brother into her custody. This series of recordings were not provided by Kellett in violation of discovery requests and a court order. But the Bar Counsel only played the missing cat part of the 911 recording for the Panel to suggest that's all the recordings contained;

- Bar Counsel allowed Kellett to testify, without challenge, that she never told a Gouldsboro Police officer to withhold evidence from Vladek Filler and not comply with his subpoena.

[/unordered_list]

Filler pointed out that this contradicted what Kellett told the Bar Counsel in her written reply to the Bar Complaint. Members of the The Panel evidenced some concern at this. One member asked "Where is Vladek Filler's original complaint?" It turned out that Bar Counsel Davis had not provided The Panel a copy of the original complaint or the rebuttal material and exhibits. Filler insisted on and got into evidence all of his complaint filings and Kellett's replies. The Bar Counsel, however, persuaded the Panel not to view Filler's numerous document exhibits which were attached to the complaints.

Filler is currently petitioning the Panel to allow him to directly submit his own closing argument in writing in this case, as opposed to going through Davis, but so far has not received a reply.

The Bar Panel has four basic options available in order to dispose of this case. One, they can find that Kellett did not violate bar rules and dismiss the complaint. They can dismiss the complaint with a warning to Kellett. They can publicly reprimand Kellett. Or, finally, they can recommend to the Law Court that Kellett be suspended or disbarred.

If they recommend to the Law Court that Kellett be suspended or disbarred, then the case goes to the Supreme Court for a full trial outside the probable sphere of influence of the Ellsworth Prosecutor's Office. If that happens, justice has a shot.

We are estimating here in advance that this is not likely. With Bar Counsel J. Scott Davis virtually working as co-counsel for the defense with Lupton, and the facts of this case having such a hard time making it into the view of the Bar Panel, the fix appears as though it is comfortably in.

What we have here is a dog and pony show designed to show the world that the State of Maine actually does self-police of its state functionaries, without, of course, doing any real self-policing. It's a stage production designed to counter the well-deserved scrutiny that the actions of prosecutors like Kellett have engendered from a public that is starting to wake up to the fact that something is rotten in that state and it's not the lobster rolls.

They will more likely than not slap Kellett on the wrist and close the curtain on the matter so she can get back to terrorizing the citizens of Ellsworth for the VAWA funds without interruption.

The only hope that this matter will be forced into the hands of real justice came from Vladek Filler, who, while incarcerated, bullied, threatened and ridiculed, stood up for two minutes and refused to be silenced while he forced the Panel to accept into evidence what everyone else involved with the case has sought to exclude.

They now have that evidence, and everyone knows it. You have that evidence, too. It is just a click away.

And so now the hope, the spark of life that Vladek Filler bravely kept alive is in our hands. In your hands. And the only thing that will extinguish that small ray of light now is if we choose to fall silent before this unconscionable injustice.

AVFM News and Activism: Filler Revisited

November 6, 2012 | by James Huff | Link | Original Link

[box]

Tonight on AVFM News and Activism we will dedicate the guest portion of our show to covering current developments in the Vladek Filler case. Joining us will be Paul Elam and John the Other to talk about the abhorrent legal maneuverings of J. Scott Davis and what can only be described as an all encompassing ring of corruption in the family law justice system in the state of Maine. Now, more than ever, aggressive activism is needed to expose and put to an end the destructive reign of Mary Kellett and the band of cronies that make up the press and legal establishment in that state.

Please call in and voice your support for this effort and share your thoughts.

The show airs live on November 6trh, at 8:00 Central Time, US, which is 2:00 a.m. November 7th in London and 11:00 a.m. November 7th in Brisbane. If you have not yet requested membership in the Stickcam Room, you can do so through the link below.

To the nice feminists

November 7, 2012 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

[dropcap]L[/dropcap]et's talk for a moment about nice feminists. They come in a variety of flavors, but these are the ones whose goals, although pursued under the banner of feminism, are reasonable, and indeed, virtuous. The decriminalizing and normalizing of prostitution is an example. While many people both inside and outside the men's rights movement dislike the idea of prostitution, it wont be done away with by keeping it illegal. It is simply thus made more dangerous and harmful for everyone involved, both for the provider and the consumer. Okay, great, and there are other issues. Porn, for example, is argued for as a legitimate form of employment – for surely it is every woman's right to get naked and be paid to have sex, should she chose to do so.

Okay, that's really the same issue, but surely from outside the camp of feminism – outside the radical camp, outlside the liberal camp, outside the "I want to be paid for sex" camp.

Now, from outside the camps all flying the flag of feminism – is it unkind, unfair and/or uncalled for to universally condemn the ideology as a monolith, without regard for just which of the 364 flavors we're talking about when we use that endlessly flexible label of feminism?

No, and I'm going to explain for those who might pursue legitimately humanist goals why I will continue to talk in condemning tones about the ideology calling itself feminism, and why I don't care what sub-species of that ideology to which you may happen to subscribe. And if what I'm about to tell you upsets you, too bad, woman or man up as the case may be.

I agree that there are self-described feminists whose goals are legitimate. I agree that de-criminalizing matters of personal choice and bodily autonomy are important and worthy goals. And to the extent that I can I will support and promote those goals, independent of whatever political label under which you or anyone else pursues them.

However, the humanist, liberal, sex positive, nice guy version of feminism you practice – and if i didn't cover your particular flavor, go ahead and add it in — that humanist feminism is not the same ideology taught in university gender studies courses. It is not the feminism which informs the policies of United Nations aid agencies who render assistance to only women and children, and not to men. Your humanist version of feminism is not the one which specifically excludes male gang-rape victims from receiving medical aid, shelter and rehabilitation in places where male targeting gang rape are standard practices of war, such as in the Congo. That feminism is not your humanist feminism. Neither is your feminism the version of that ideology which informs a multi-billion dollar industry which produces egregiously and grotesquely misleading misinformation designed to acculturate hatred and fear in women towards men; which teaches girls to always be victims, and never be self actualized adults.

That is not your humanist feminism either. Your humanist feminism is not the ideology informing almost all domestic violence shelters, and public messaging on DV, selling a totally false story that domestic violence is just evil, violent men, beating on just sweetly innocent and decorative female victims. Your view is not one of demonizing men in our culture so as to guarantee to enable more domestic violence because it works from a totally broken model.

Your flavor of humanist feminism is not the one informing a collection of lawyers, social workers, educators, child care specialists, psychologists and other professionals to collaborate on a blog and cheer for plans to eugenically exterminate the male half of the human race.

So yes, I understand, your feminism has admirable goals. You are a teeny, tiny, unfunded, un-organized minority. Yours is not the feminism that informs domestic policy, writes white papers for the UN or eradicates due process on college and university campuses. That's the other feminism; that's the big, funded, established, and politically powerful version of the ideology. That is somebody else. Right?

But when you pursue your noble goals under the banner of feminism, even when you prefix it, and say liberal feminism, or humanist feminism, or sex positive feminism, you are giving cover to those who openly call for the extermination of men.

I'll say that again. When you pursue your noble goals under the banner of feminism, even when you prefix it, and say liberal feminism, or humanist feminism, or sex positive feminism, you are giving cover to those who openly call for the extermination of men.

And that's why I don't care what flavor of feminism you practice. You're using the same brand name as murderous, eugenics enthusiast, destroy due process sexual apartheid gender ideologue elitists for whom violence isn't just an unpleasant option. Violence, when contemplated against children, or men, especially when doled out by state functionaries is what gets them wet. That's the big, funded, organized and politically established collective with which you identify by name.

I know, you're a humanist. You're not murderous. You wouldn't dream of using violence to attain your goals. However, your chosen ignorance of or indifference toward the depraved ideologues who have appropriated the label you share neither excuses nor exonerates you. So, fuck you anyway. If you self identify as a feminist, you're flying under the banner of a totalitarian, violent, amoral murderous ideology of sexual apartheid and hatred.

If your goals are legitimate, pursue them. You'll have my total support. But if you fly the flag of hatred and violence, do not expect me to pat you on the head and say that's okay, I know you're one of the "nice" ones. Fuck you, grow up, and stop pretending there's no problem flying the same flag as those who use hate and fear and bald faced lies to advocate for eugenics, mass murder, elitist legislation, victim identity and the marginalization of men and boys.

I thank you for your kind attention.

Movember & IMD 2012

November 7, 2012 | by VFM News and Commentary | Link | Original Link

---

Well, it has been settled. The federal government will continue to ignore men's health issues for at least another four years. Fortunately, election month in the U.S.A. is also Movember, a movement to increase grass roots awareness of men's health issues. It is also the month that International Men's Day has its annual commemoration. Here is a Movember video and you can see one for IMD that was already in our featured video section before this was posted.

Also, some very supportive people have taken the time to select AVfM as their chosen cause for this month. Both of the following videos were made and sent to me unsolicited. I offer them here with respect and thanks to Wooly Bumblebee and The Critical G. If you have not subbed to their channels, please do. They are part of the growing chorus speaking to the issues we tackle at AVfM.

AVfM Radio Tonight: Hypergamy

[box icon=""]

Did you ever notice the tendency in most women to constantly crave something a little, uh, better when it comes to the men in their lives?

Do women stand on the lookout for men with more money, power, prestige, social standing or sex appeal than the men they already have?

Yes, as a matter of fact most of them do.

Tonight,, Join Girl Writes What, TyphonBlue and Robert O'hara, who is standing in for regular host John the Other for all the hype on hypergamy, that dirty little secret that seems to catch most men blindside because they don't know what they are looking for or why they should.

The show starts tonight, November 8, 2012 at 9 PM Eastern Time, 8 Central, which is 2:00 AM Nov 9 in London and 11 AM Nov. 9 in Brisbane.

The call in number for the show is 310-388-9709.

Andybob's Corner #2

November 8, 2012 | by andybob | Link | Original Link

Gather round, boys and girls. Bring your cups of hot chocolate and pillows; lots and lots of pillows. Cozy up by the fire and listen to it crackle as it warms the air. Pay no mind to the night outside. The light in here is all we need.

Andybob, the Minister of Truth, has come to visit. And when he speaks, everything that crawls on the ground or goes bump in the night falls to stillness in the shadows; hoping, praying, ne're to be seen. PE

For this edition of Andybob's Corner, AB speaks to:

Whether we should call ourselves MRAs.

The term 'Men's Rights' knocks people off their feet in the right way. It is clear, concise and self-explanatory: nobody needs to be told that MRA's are in opposition to the feminist trampling of men's rights.

As such, it piques the interest of men getting ulcers from the blue pill. The term itself invites curiosity:

"Why do men need to fight for rights?"

"Well now, let me explain…"

The reaction of feminists has ranged from silent trepidation to outright unhinged fury in a way that some cozy, cuddly, non-threatening PC term never could.

Watching feminists react with visceral rage to the very concept of men having rights is very instructive to male onlookers and deeply embarrassing to the ever-present NAWALT brigade.

I am not a branding expert or a PR guru. But neither am I a recruiter for the Moonies. I balk at the notion of stroking, manipulating and condescending to win over "joiners."

While I am cognizant of our media-drenched sound-bite culture and our need to negotiate it, I think it is a mistake to underestimate the power of being honest and direct. I disdain sugar-coating our message with PC drivel. Consider the failure of 'The Good Men Project.' This cesspit of watered-down, wishy-washy, feel-good wankiness has drawn nothing but universal contempt. No thanks.

Ours is a fight for justice, fairness and honesty. Let's represent these hallmarks of human decency as accurately as possible.

On NAWALT

"Most women in the real world have sons and fathers and brothers and have no real desire to see men treated unfairly." ~ Mr Paddleship

Mate, take a seat. I'm afraid I have some bad news.

They don’t care.

There are four main categories of women:

1) Women who care about the men in their lives, but never make the connection that their naked misandry contributes to the misery of these men. Most of those women who whooped and cackled when RegisterHer lifer, Sharon Osborne, expressed delight when an innocent man was genitally mutilated belong in this category. They would not have cackled quite so much if someone had brutalized their sons. Other women’s sons? No problem. It has ever been thus: white feather campaign in WWI.

2) Women who may pay lip service to caring about the men in their lives, but in reality see them in the same way they see all other men – as utility objects to be manipulated and exploited. Such women don’t think of the men in their lives at all, except when they want something from them.

3) Feminists. These range from the mild (man-hating bigots), to the radical (man-hating bigots who advocate genocide and eugenics).

4) Women MRAs. These are rare women (I’ve never seen one, even in captivity), who regard men as actual people with collective and innate value. I can count them on two hands with fingers to spare.

Men have been struggling for many decades now with nary a peep from women. There is a reason for this.

They don’t care.

Feminism has provided today’s pampered princesses with the privilege-stuffed, consequence-free Nirvana that they believe they’re entitled to. Do you really think they can be swayed with reason and logic? Have you ever tried to discuss men’s rights with women? They will show concern for some imaginary, hypothetical female from some Third World country before they give two shits about the son, brother or friend standing in front of them. It literally knocks the breath out of me when I experience it first-hand.

“Doing so only turns this into an Us vs. Them situation.”

This is an “Us vs. Them situation.” Peruse some feminist blogs. You may think these women are just lunatics, but many of them are influential, well-placed lunatics. Guess what? They hate our penis-swinging patriarchal guts and write widely-read screeds planning and celebrating our destruction. Our relation to them is adversarial, whether we like it or not.

We are in a battle against a powerful, well-financed and establishment-supported entity which has succeeded in stealing our rights in every sphere. This has been done with the silent collusion of vast numbers of women. As such, a few “derogatory remarks” are the least they deserve.

I agree that we should not go out of our way to alienate potential allies. However, your belief that we will succeed by approaching women with reason and logic – and being nice to them – demonstrates a stunning naiveté about our predicament. You need a little tête-à-tête with Pamela O’Shaughnessy.

Your approach makes you sound like a sane person who wants to be fair and do the right thing. You sound like a typical man. Feminists see this as a failing to be used against us – and they have done so with devastating results. It's time to re-think your strategy.

On Clementine Ford and the Shaming Tactic of Crying Misogyny

"You just hate women, so I'm not listening! La la la la la la!"

This could very well be the official Swan Song that feminists warble as the edifice of feminism crumbles around their ears. It doesn't take too much set off this kind of response. Sometimes it is when they realize that you can easily mock the sacred myths enshrined in their Women's Studies courses. At other times, it is when it dawns on them that their shaming language is as toothless as Germaine Greer.

Ms. Ford is a typical feminist trying to pacify her disquiet that there is opposition afoot. It could be an increase in the number of ant-feminist comments she's heard/read as she goes about her smug little life, or perhaps the unnerving experience of confronting a full-blown red pill man. Something has her stewing in her own bile. Her attempt to reassure the sisterhood that their web of indoctrinated deceit will triumph is safe is asinine, pathetic and very, very childish.

When "la la la…" is no longer a viable response to the kind of opposition we promise to deliver in deadly ripostes, what will become of these man-hating narcissists? Bitter 30-something women like Clementine Ford will have fewer legs to stand on than Heather Mills. How satisfying it will be to see them knocked on their bony, entitled arses.

Imagine a society of contempt

November 9, 2012 | by Zerbu | Link | Original Link

Some women believe that the criticism of some women from the MRM seems a bit harsh. I have publicly discussed men's rights issues, as well as posted links to articles, videos and other content regarding men's rights issues, in comments on articles and in chat rooms. Many of these discussions, as well as the content that was linked to, contained criticism of modern feminists, as well as some traditional women. Although the criticism was only of the particular kinds of women, it often created a lot of negative reactions from female readers, claiming that the message was either a little harsh on women, or horrible misogyny.

So you think some criticism on the behaviour of those women, which does not claim that there are no exceptions to the criticism, is that horrible?

I ask you all for a few minutes to imagine a society where criticism of your sex is openly given on a daily basis, not just in one group, but all around society. And this criticism is not used as a logical debate, but as a form of hate and contempt. It is viable to be heard at any public place you visited, and that includes the workplace and classes at school and college. Not only do authority figures not do anything about this contempt, but they may join in or even take the lead! All while contempt of the opposite sex even a fraction as bad would be prohibited.

As a matter of fact, imagine that the contempt for your sex is not just in general society, but is even broadcast in the media. Imagine news reporters and journalists are actively bashing your sex, and talking about how inferior you are and how superior the opposite sex is, and celebrating any time the opposite sex is ahead of yours, even in cases where the only reason for that is that they have been given advantages through affirmative action. Also, imagine that all good deeds done by members of your sex, but not of the opposite sex, is hidden behind a job title, and bad deeds done by members of the opposite sex, but not of your sex, are also hidden behind a job title.[1]

Imagine that in the media, characters of your sex are constantly being depicted as bumbling fools, while characters of the opposite sex are constantly depicted as the smart, intelligent, take-charge decision makers, who have to keep the characters of your sex under control, while the characters of your sex are revolving their lives around seeking the opposite sex's approval.[2]

Imagine that song lyrics, including those from famous artists, are openly claiming inferiority of your sex and/or superiority of the opposite sex, and this is positively referred to in reviews as "empowerment" of the opposite sex, while any hate or narcissism is completely ignored.[3]

Imagine that when physical violence is inflicted against someone of your sex from someone of the opposite sex it is automatically believed that the person of your sex deserved it, while any violence from your sex, no matter how provoked or an act of self defense is unjustified. Imagine that all focus is put on stopping violence against the opposite sex, even if your sex is the majority of victims of physical violence.[4]

Imagine that it is acceptable for a crowd of people of the opposite sex to laugh when someone of your sex is sexually mutilated.[5]

Do you think the society you are imagining sounds horrible yet?

Imagine that radical hate quotes against your sex are not only allowed to be publicly broadcasted, but the people creating those quotes were considered leaders in empowering the opposite sex.[6]

On top of all that, imagine this society, despite all this, believes that the opposite sex is the one that is being oppressed and held down by people of your sex. And all of what has been described above is not only prevalent in society, but reversing the sexes would cause a huge uproar.

For men, the society described above should be very familiar, because it's no different than the society we actually live in. For women, however, such a society would most likely be a huge, unjust, terrifying shock.

So, to the women reading this, do you still think that the criticism of these women is too harsh? Try being a man (or, for that matter, even a young boy) and having to endure all the contempt that males face their entire lives for just a few minutes of yours, then you'll realise what contempt for your sex really feels like. You might even realise how rare and minor is the logical criticism given by the MRM.

From woman to man to red pill

November 10, 2012 | by Steven | Link | Original Link

Note: This article is also available in Spanish and Portuguese.

I never thought my transition from female to male would lead me to the Men's Rights Movement.

I never even knew such a thing existed until a year after the fact. My transition was not about sexual politics, but about achieving personal brain-body congruence. I was correcting an internal dysphoria that had persisted since age 7, when I angrily declared to the boy next door that I was "Super Boy and not Super Girl," and staunchly defended my decision to enter the boys' restroom to a stressed-out elementary school teacher.

At 11 I begged my mother to let me cut my hair as short as possible and was thrilled when our dentist mistook me for a boy. In short, everything I was inside; everything that I could sense and attach to my identity, was male, even as my body said otherwise.

That conflict intensified harshly. The next year I tried to cut off the breast stubs that grew on my chest with a steak knife, and expressed a strong desire to get breast cancer, "so that I can get a double mastectomy like Grandma!" When I was 16 I developed anorexia in order to stop my periods and shrink my breasts as much as possible.

My distress never had much to do with social roles, and for the most part I did not transition in order to gain any perceived social privilege. I played with Barbie dolls and dressed up as a princess (though I always added a sword just to prove I was a tough princess). Xena was my role model.

From a young age, though, I did express extreme anger at not being able to enlist in the Army as an infantryman, and was enraged when a friend's grandmother presumed that I did not know how to put gas in a car because I was a girl. Any time a man showed "chivalry" towards me, such as offering to help me carry something heavy, I was insulted and angry. I also experienced howls and whistles on a daily basis from men in cars when I went out alone for walks.

"Well, I must be an extreme feminist," I remember thinking. "Because feminists are the only other girls who seem to get as angry at these things as I do."

I got the double mastectomy I'd always wanted the day before I turned 20. By this time I had learned of the existence of female-to-male transgender people and knew that this described my condition almost perfectly. I had gotten to the point where it was either get a sex change or kill myself.

After having my breasts removed I began administering weekly testosterone injections. My voice dropped and I began to grow a beard. At this time I began to be taken as male in social settings.

The first thing I noticed was that the cat calls from cars as I walked down the street came to an end. No longer feeling sexually threatened was a huge relief, although it also led to me to another most interesting observation. I wondered if I made an ugly boy since I no longer received daily assurance that I was sexually desirable. It actually took a while to get used to not being seen as the physically attractive sex. My gain became an unexpected loss and I began to realize there are some things on the other side of the fence that you cannot see until you cross over and stand there.

Standing there, as I do now, provides a very different view of life, and of men, than I ever had. Until I got here, there was much I was unaware of, like the previously unseen objectification of my body as an appliance.

It took a while to get it. I was pleasantly surprised when a female friend asked me to help her move furniture shortly after I began hormone therapy. At this point my muscles had developed somewhat in response to testosterone, but I was still within the female range of strength. Nevertheless, I was able to move the furniture (though I'm sure she could have done so herself). I felt very manly and tough. Wasn't it wonderful that people now presumed I was strong and capable rather than weak and in need of chivalric protection?

I was happy, celebrating the fact that I was no longer seen as just a piece of meat–although later I realized that now society either uses me or ignores me, because I'm not attractive enough to be a piece of meat. I'm instead just an ugly, hairy beast with a wallet and a pair of muscular arms. Or, I might say with some measure of irony, a piece of meat that doesn't even rate a cat call.

I have also found it very difficult to get used to always having to take action and make decisions. Men are expected, forced rather, to be the active agents of society. If there is a problem, men are expected to take the initiative to solve it rather than seek help or advice or take advantage of social services.

In straight relationships, the man is expected to approach the woman, initiate conversation, and move the relationship in the direction he wants it to go while simultaneously being extremely careful to monitor her unspoken cues to ensure he is not being rapey or creepy (and if he fails to correctly read those cues, he risks being put away in jail and raped himself).

Even in gay male relationships, no partner takes the "female" role: both are expected by the other to approach, initiate, take charge, and make decisions at least half of the time.

Being an active agent 24/7 is not a privilege, but a very tedious and stressful responsibility. Having it suddenly forced upon me without being trained for it since birth was mentally and physically exhausting.

The burden of all that hyperagency has a huge downside. Sometimes men need help as well. When they do, people are very reluctant to come to their aid and do not hesitate to make fun of them for needing assistance. There are virtually no domestic violence shelters for men, nobody cares if a man is homeless, or out of work, or if he is mentally ill and needs care and concern, because he's a man, damn it. He's supposed to be strong and capable, all the time, or else he's useless and might as well not exist (just like an older, unattractive and overweight woman is seen as useless).

According to feminism male privilege guarantees that he has it so much easier than women. They laugh at the notion that it might be difficult to be a man in this society, because they can't see the other side.

Well, I've stood on both sides of the fence and, without bias from either, I can safely say that "male privilege" in this day and age is bullshit. Women face a lot of threats, to be sure; but men face many of the same exact threats without the social and legal support that women have. Men's issues are for the most part not even acknowledged to exist.

Due to stress from college and bullying (which, oddly enough, came only from within the campus' LGBT/feminist community) I required a brief stint at a mental hospital last summer. I was at a very low point and began whimpering during my intake evaluation, at which point the doctor told me, "You're a man, right? That crying is pathetic. Man up!"

Man up. It suddenly hit me that most men are probably told this phrase hundreds of times throughout their boyhood. At one point I would have given anything for people to encourage me to toughen up like Xena. Now I realized that sometimes, men, like women, just don't feel tough and need the same love and care that women do when they are hurting. Why is this so hard for society to accept? Both men and women can be tough most of the time, but everybody has points in their lives in which they need to be taken care of by others.

Nevertheless, I stopped crying immediately (which testosterone makes physically easier to do), having been reminded that it is now socially unacceptable to show my feelings, even when being admitted to a mental hospital. I didn't mind that much. After all, it's a man's responsibility to always be strong and capable, right? I was a man, damn it, and right embarrassed that I'd failed to behave like one.

After a year of these experiences, and a year of listening to extreme feminist doctrine at my liberal arts college (which schooled me on the inherent violence of male sexuality, "rape culture," "trigger warnings," "safe spaces," etc.. it seemed to me that many of them wanted to be seen as weak, delicate flowers rather than as strong and capable women), I began to change the way I saw things. I took the red pill, you might say.

Since women now share traditional male "privileges," they also ought to share traditional male responsibilities; that is, to carry their own weight and acknowledge guilt when they are guilty, and to respect and care for the men in their lives like men respect and care for them.

Current feminist doctrine wants to retain traditional female privileges (in the form of the Violence Against Women Act, courts favoring mothers over fathers and ex-wives over ex-husbands, etc.) as well as all the traditionally male rights they have rightfully earned over the last hundred years (ability to enter virtually any career they wish and fully participate in society). It is a human rights victory worthy that women now share traditional male rights, but it is unfair that they are not willing to give up traditional female rights in return, because this now puts men in a disadvantaged position.

Remembrance Day

November 11, 2012 | by L. Byron | Link | Original Link

In addition to the obvious – the 32 million people blown apart or mutilated in WWI, almost all male – I would like to suggest a couple more things to remember on this day of recollection.

One is that as many as 9 out of 10 British men who died in the trenches did not have the vote. Due to age, class and property restrictions, the great majority of those who died didn't even have the right to put a cross in the ballot box of the country sending them to their deaths. Men, as a group, got the vote the same year the majority of women got the vote: 1918. It was the same year the men who were left alive came home from the war.

It's good to remember that universal suffrage only came about because those men, with more righteousness than perhaps any other cause in history, demanded it. To not have granted it might well have ended in revolution and the abolition of the monarchy, as had so recently happened in Russia.

It's wise, too, to remember that the enfranchisement of women came in only on the coat-tails of that and that the war-work at home by women was stated as its justification. The suffragettes, universally seen as hysterical terrorists at the time, had little or nothing to do with the extension of the vote to women and indeed their violent actions almost certainly put back that inevitability several years.

It's good to remember that all men and women alive in Britain today can thank those men, who fought and died for the right we have to vote.

Now could also be a time for us to remember the universality of male disposability. In every age, in every nation, it is now and always has been the men and boys who are sacrificed in their hundreds, thousands or millions on behalf of the women and children back home. For the good of all others, the young and the old:

[box icon=""]

So Abram rose, and clave the wood, and went,
And took the fire with him, and a knife.
And as they sojourned both of them together,
Isaac the first-born spake and said, My Father,
Behold the preparations, fire and iron,
But where the lamb for this burnt-offering?
Then Abram bound the youth with belts and straps,
And builded parapets and trenches there,
And stretchèd forth the knife to slay his son.
When lo! an Angel called him out of heaven,
Saying, Lay not thy hand upon the lad,
Neither do anything to him, thy son.

Behold! Caught in a thicket by its horns,
A Ram. Offer the Ram of Pride instead.

But the old man would not so, but slew his son,
And half the seed of Europe, one by one.

Anger management

November 11, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Old timers, like those that have been here from the beginning, will have read this before on MND. It never made it here. It is a piece of fiction I wrote years ago that I recently took off the shelf, dusted off, and did some touch up work on. As I said when this first went out, it is based on a true story. Actually, it is based on too many of them. PE

Tobi Pitts leaned forward in her seat, clasping her hands together with her forearms resting on her knees. She looked at Howard with tired green eyes that were sunken into a patchwork of premature wrinkles and thin make-up. Her hair was a mass of bleached, neglected curls that hung by the sides of her face like twists of tattered rope.

"I can't make you say a word, Mr. Franks, and I understand why you may not want to," she said. "But the court did order you to come here, and I do think it's in your best interest to talk about why that happened."

Howard scanned the room. There were eight other men in the circle. Eight strangers, presumably with eight stories of their own, none of which he wanted to hear. Some were watching him, like Tobi, with eyes that pried and speculated, as though waiting for facts to weigh and judge. Others seemed determined not to look at him, not out of courtesy, but out of a kind of pity; the way you don't look at someone with a deformity or a hideous facial scar. He looked back at Tobi and found her unblinking gaze still on him, patient as alabaster. He drew a breath and locked eyes with her for a moment.

"I see," he said. "My best interest." And then he allowed the room to sink back into silence. Tobi kept watching him.

One man, three seats to Howard's left, cleared his throat and adjusted his tie. He had the meticulous look of a newscaster, complete with the chiseled, aristocratic profile of a graciously aging Adonis. His hair was a highly styled crown of silver-gray perfection that looked as though it had never felt the wind. He regarded Howard from behind a pair of designer glasses that were polished to a sparkle, even in the soft light of the room.

"Howard," he said, clearly stepping in to end the standoff, "My name is Rob Watson. Believe you me I feel for you. I didn't want to talk when I got here, either."

"Most of us didn't," he said, making a slight sweeping gesture at the rest of the men. "But once I got over that I learned a great deal, and it really helped. And it turned out I really needed some help."

Watson paused, as though offering Howard a chance to speak.

Nothing.

"Anyway, one of the things I learned about was why I ended up here. I gave my wife so many beatings I couldn't even begin to count them. I knew it was wrong, but that didn't stop me. I used to blame the drinking. In here, I learned where it was really coming from. I was addicted to power. I was so afraid of losing control of my wife, of her being an independent person, that I acted like…well, like an animal. It's a sickness, but it is more than just that. This is something men have been doing to women for thousands of years. In here, right in this room, I learned what the problem is and what to do about it. And it has changed everything I have ever thought about what being a man is supposed to be.”

Howard studied the other men in the group. He noted some smirks and the look of disgust on some of the faces. Those looks seemed to deepen the more Rob spoke. The room was quietly cringing, as though something rotten was fouling the air.

Rob continued talking, but Howard began to lose track of his words. The grief that had become his constant companion welled up in his chest and threatened to spill out on to the floor at the feet of these strangers. He choked it back down and did his best to return his attentions to whatever it was that Rob, whom he had already decided he didn’t like, was saying.

“So,” said the dapper man three chairs down, “I hope you open up a little, buddy. Remember, we’re all the same here.” He then pointed at Howard with his hand formed into a mock pistol, winked and clicked his tongue. With that, an actual groan escaped the lips of one of the other men, but Howard did not see who it was.

“Forget him,” said a heavyset man sitting directly across the circle from Howard. He had a cheerless, sullen face, stubble cast across his cheeks like a dark mood. “If you don’t talk they’ll use it against you in court.”

Howard pondered that for a moment and finally spoke again.

“They?” he asked, “Don’t you mean, her?” And he tilted his head in Tobi’s direction.

The big man grinned knowingly and shrugged his shoulders.

“It’s all the same,” he said.

“No, it’s not,” Tobi interjected, with more than a hint of aggravation in her voice. “Mr. Franks, I am a therapist, not a judge. I don’t tell the court anything you say in here. That’s held in confidence. All I do is report whether you have attended and whether you are cooperative. Whether you believe it or not, I am here to help you.”

Howard regarded her for a moment and leaned forward slightly.

“And what is cooperative, Ms. Pitts? Am I uncooperative if I don’t spill my guts to you? Perhaps put on a little dog and pony show?” he asked, cocking a thumb back at Rob Watson.

Tobi swallowed. Her fingers, once woven loosely together, tightened and began a slight tremble. A rose hue painted itself across the skin of her face and her eyes hardened. Howard looked at the big man, whose expression now simply pled caution. Silence again filled the room. This time it was a silence as taut and bloodless as Tobi’s fingers.

Howard raised his hand and bowed his head pensively. The misery in his chest rose up again and felt like it was cutting its way out with a dull, rusty knife. He had to steady himself before he could speak. Finally, he began, with a whisper.

“Six weeks ago I had a family. Twelve years with my wife, Kate, and two beautiful daughters. I had a good business, with what I thought was a decent enough business partner and no reason to think I would ever end up here." Howard lifted his head and made direct eye contact with Tobi.

"Then my father died. It was not unexpected, he'd be fighting cancer for three years. Kate convinced me that it wouldn't be best to pull the kids out of school and fly them to Baltimore for the funeral. I agreed and went on my own. I was gone for four days."

Howard didn't notice it, but at this point all of the other men in the room were watching him. Each of them leaned forward, listening.

"When I got back I stopped on the way home to buy some flowers. Just something for Kate for carrying the weight while I was gone. But my credit card was declined. I called the bank and was informed that all my accounts were closed. All the money was gone."

Rob Watson interrupted. "Oh man, here come the excuses. I can see it already."

"Shut the fuck up and let him talk." the big man demanded. Watson scowled, but shrank back in his chair.

Howard shook off the interruption and continued. "I went home and nobody was there. I found the kids with her mother. And her, she was…"Howard raked his fingers through his hair and took a deep breath. "She was with my business partner. They had taken it all. The money, the business, all of it, gone."

"I caught up to them at his place. Can you believe it was her that answered the door? She was wearing this silk robe I gave her last Christmas. I just stood there dumbfounded for, I dunno, what seemed like forever. When I could finally make myself speak all I could do was ask her why. Why had she done this? She told me it was because I was a loser. She told me she was a woman with needs and that I never, from the day we were married, met them. She told me the kids would be better off without me and that any more contact with her or them would have to be through a lawyer."

"Then she told me something else."

Howard closed his eyes and seemed to drift for a moment in the vacuum of the silent room. He opened them again and found the group transfixed, leaning forward in their chairs, as though teetering toward whatever he would say next. And when he spoke, it was not just toward Tobi, but all of them.

"She told me that she would kiss me goodbye but she didn't think I'd like the taste of another man's cock on her lips."

A single tear slid from Howard's eye and tracked down the side of his face. There were a few quiet mutterings in the room that Tobi silenced with single, dark glance at the group.

"I lost it," said Howard, clinching his hand into a fist and beating it against his knee. "I punched her in the face, hard, and broke her nose. Of course I went to jail, and that's how I wound up here, Ms. Pitts. Another wife beater for your version of history."

Tobi glowered. For just a moment she looked explosive, dangerous. She hung her head for a moment, hiding her face in her hair. When she lifted it back up her expression was flat and detached. And then she asked, in the equally flat and detached tone of her profession, "Are you saying she deserved to be assaulted, Howard? To get a broken nose?”

Howard thought for a moment and replied.

“No, Ms. Pitts. I am saying she deserved the beating of a lifetime.”

The entire room now took on a life of its own. The other men shifted around in their chairs. One of them muttered, “Fucking-a-right.” Another followed with, “Yeah.”

Tobi rushed to speak but Howard cut her off.” I’m not done,” he said, His tone was final and unyielding. “You wanted me to talk and I am talking. You just listen.” He settled himself for a moment, and then said, more softly, “Please.”

Tobi gently bit her lower lip, then gave Howard a reluctant, almost unperceivable nod.

“You’d think this, being here I mean, would be the worst of it, but it’s not. After doing flips for weeks to try to see my daughters, last week I was allowed to talk to my oldest, Lisa, on the telephone. I was thinking the whole time that as bad as things were that I could live with it, that I could manage a way to move forward if I could just be with my children again. I was so happy to have Lisa on the phone. I couldn’t wait to tell her how much I missed her and that I couldn’t wait to see her. I didn’t even care that the social worker was listening in to the call.”

“But you know what she said when I told her how much I wanted to see her? She said…” He paused, drew a sharp breath and tried again. “She…said…” He faltered again, and then, whatever Howard had used to hold himself together failed, and the façade collapsed. Tears streamed from his eyes. His breathing shuddered and turned to great, heaving hitches as he cupped his hands over his face and sobbed. He had to force out every word, one at a time, to finish his story.

“She said, ‘I can’t see you till your better, Daddy. Mommy said you’re sick.’”

Veterans Day

November 12, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

In terms of views over the years, this is one of my least popular videos. I often think I should have written the script differently, or perhaps put the emphasis on different matters. But each year on this day and on Memorial Day I find myself rolling this old clunker out because I have no other words to say.

I love our veterans. I honor their sacrifices. But I loathe beyond description the vile machinations of those who turn our sons into corpses, both dead and living, for the sake of imperialist and corporate interests.

I have often heard feminists and others opine that with women at the helm, war would be a thing of the past. I suppose they forgot about Hillary Clinton, Indira Gandhi, Golda Meir, Margaret Thatcher, any number of female European monarchs, or indeed the white feather doling harpies of Britain that coerced peaceful men into war with the power of shame.

Women, like older, rich men may be even more likely to support the bloodshed, and for the same reason. Because they don't have to pay the price for it.

Being an MRA means fighting for difficult, sometimes impossible dreams. But if I can be permitted to dream for a moment , let me say that if you want an end to war, put the men's activists in charge. We are the only ones that care enough about men to put a stop to it.

Monday Morning Roundup

November 12, 2012 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

Happy Monday! Here's a look at some things you may have missed on A Voice for Men if you haven't been around for a few days.

AVfM founder Paul Elam and Mike of Mykeru Media were recently interviewed by the folks at ReapSow Radio. You can listen to that right here.

Paul Elam has also dusted off, polished, and brought back out a classic short story he wrote that is fiction. But one wonders how "fictional" this story really is, given the realities it so graphically described.

Typhonblue has revealed that she has a cousin who has recently become informed about The Patriarchy and realized that men make her sad. Poor dear. She obviously needs a White Knight Male Feminist to protect her! Be sure to go offer your comfort and protection to her right here. I want a Raven Moon Dragon t-shirt–I mean it!

AndyBoby's Corner has a new installment here.

We are still awaiting further updates on the case of corrupt prosecutor Mary Kellett's office in Ellsworth, Maine and efforts of others to cover up her corruption. Don't think we've forgotten you, Mary, or you, J. Scott Davis, and especially don't think we've forgotten you, Carletta Bassano, because ultimately virtually all of this is your responsibility and you know it.

Moving on: Steven, a Female-to-Male Transgender man, discovered the Red Pill. We happen to know this particular article caused a firestorm on multiple parts of the internet, with feminists and some (some) in the "LGBT" community very angry about it. Somehow we're not surprised, since the privileged white females who typify most self-identified feminists often seem to think they own gay and transgender people as part of their own cause, and are angry at any who won't toe the line. Be sure to check out From Woman to Man to Red Pill.

Feminists of the NAFALT variety ("Not All Feminists Are Like That," i.e. we're not all nasty hateful bigots) often get their feelings hurt when Men's advocates say intemperate things about Feminist ideology. John the Other has a response which they need to put on their big girl panties before reading: To the Nice Feminists.

Some great new posters are available (some blunt, some subtle) from Roger O. Thornhill, and we happen to know he's got more on the way. And by the way, want some cool stickers? The first ones have been mailed out, have you tried getting your own yet?

PZ Meyers is at it again, issuing personal attacks without substance while ignoring actual data that flies in the face of his conclusions, and ignoring challenges to back up his statements with fact, reason, or logic. John the Other reminds him that he still has not acted like you'd think an honorable academic would act. Well, did someone say PZ Meyers was an honorable academic? We guess that's up to him to demonstrate.

Don't miss Dr. Greg Canning's take on the obscene boy-humiliating child abuse found in a recent article entitled “How to raise a Feminist son.” You know, if Feminists want to scream NAFALT every time someone criticizes their movement, doesn’t it fall on them to say and do something about this crap?

And finally, we’ve begun a new video series of our large and growing Honey Badger contingent. We hope you’ll check out and enjoy The Honeybadger Files, Episode #1: The Wooly Bumblebee.

By the way, volunteers who helped us with our election project should expect an update from me soon, and episode 1 of “Tales from the Infrared,” AVfM’s new radio show that looks at Geek Culture from a Red Pill perspective is now in production and should be ready to air on Wednesday night. Stay tuned!

Update: Izzey is back, a little worse for the wear but functional. Go give her some love!

Oz to launch false accusation app

November 13, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

In one of the most brilliant and compelling rape hysteria propaganda bits I have seen since the odious term “rape culture,” was coined, Australia’s Centre Against Sexual Assault (ACASA) has just announced that it will be launching a free app, ostensibly designed to help police evaluate patterns of crime against women.

A more complete description, provided by theage.com.au, puts it in crystal clear language:

> The new app will allow users to use their mobile phone to anonymously post details about threatening sexual behaviour, including the time and place it occurred and a description of alleged offenders. The data collected will then be given to police.

There now, all comfy?

What this amounts to is an accusation app, placed in the hands of anonymous women, who have no responsibility whatsoever for the accuracy of the information they report. Its potential for abuse is overwhelming, a concern acknowledged, and shamefully dismissed by ACASA branch head Carolyn Worth.

”We’ll only refer incidents that have similar times, locations and descriptions,” she said. ”Police still need evidence.”

Right. So someone would have to use the app against a person two or three times to put an innocent man in the hot seat. Of course, that would never happen. Right, Carolyn?

Right?

I will not dwell on the obvious blatant sexism of efforts to only address crimes against one sex, or the implied endorsement of violence targeting males. Given the pernicious nature of this initiative, we are obviously past any point of civil dialog on the basics of sexism.

This is an anonymising system, engineered to profile and legally harass the members of one group. If there ever were something of such blatantly designed for Orwellian mis-use, deserving to be undermined, FTSU style, this is it.

On the suggestion of JtO, I encourage all Australians to download this app, as soon as it becomes available, and to flood it with erroneous information. In fact, make abuse of the app a daily ritual in your life. Australian men and women who value their own human rights, as well as those of their neighbors are advised to organize through facebook or other social media, and also advised to attack the innocent, both men and women, by coordinated profiling with this free, anonymising application.

Remember, there are no controls over this information. You can profile anyone you want. I suggest starting with Carolyn Worth. Profile your dog. If his name happens to be Michael Flood, all the better. Hell, I don't care, profile me. Just hammer them with false reports till it completely pollutes all the data they are gathering.

Don't fall for the lie that this is about protecting women, or any other Australian citizen. It is about creating license for state functionaries, on the say so of anyone, whether a victim or just someone with a vendetta, to undermine the rights of male citizens in Oz and to create more propaganda to be used in fundraising efforts for outfits like ACASA.

But you do not have to let them enjoy the use of this irresponsible technology without serious problems. Just 10 citizens making a few reports a week, will completely pooch their already screwed-up data.

We do not yet know of the viability of citizens in other countries joining in on this but will find out and report back. If we can undermine their efforts from across the planet, by all means let us do it, with insistency and purpose.

It is up to you. Make abusing this app in different ways a part of your daily routine as an MRA. Just a couple of thousand concocted reports (much like many of the "legit" ones surely coming in) per year and we can effectively make this program more hassle than it is worth.

For those of you concerned about the false accusation flavor of this, just take them at their word that this is only about trends and not individuals. If they are lying about that, it is not your problem.

This program is Orwellian in the most literal understanding of the word. It is up to you to do something about it.

As far as we have been able to ascertain, there is nothing illegal in our actions, and no way to stop it from happening. AVfM will be tracking developments in this case and doing everything we possible can to undermine the use of this app to target innocent men. That means the app has to GO.

AVFM News and Activism: Bernard Chapin

[box icon=""]

Tonight on AVFM News and Activism we have none other than Bernard Chapin of Chapin's Inferno who will be talking about the election last week and give his analysis of the political landscape. We will cover how gender played a big role in the results and what it means for men and men's rights in the future. A staunch conservative, Chapin as long argued that the war on men is an all but entirely partisan one with the Democratic Party being the primary agent against men. Many MRAs disagree and we are looking forward to an engaging debate with Chapin and of course with callers.

The show starts tonight, November 13, 2012 at 9 PM Eastern Time, 8 Central, which is 2:00 AM Nov 14 in London and 11 AM Nov. 14 in Brisbane.

Addendum to this post:

After trying tactfully to allow people to speak but remind them that this is not a place for partisan bickering to drag on into a destructive and smelly fiasco that derails us from what this site is about, I see the trolls are starting to invade with nice little tidbits about which party votes for terrorists, etc., etc., blah fucking blah.

Comments are closed on this article, and if anyone tries to carry this bullshit on in another place on this site I will start using the ban hammer like I had cancer and swinging it was the fucking cure. I don't give a fuck who you are.

Take that shit to a blue pill venue. PE

Polling British candidates on men's issues

November 13, 2012 | by Aimee McGee | Link | Original Link

What the Police and Crime Commissioner Candidates know about gender issues (or why I am moving to Devon & Cornwall)

About 4 weeks ago, with all the US Election fever, I got interested in the whole issue of communicating with candidates to determine their sympathies on gender issues. Posting this on AVfM, I was fortunate that SeaforthCJ was foolish enough to get excited about the idea as well. Had we known how much effort it was going to take, I suspect we might have faltered, but that is the nature of activism!

For those of you who don't know anything about the PCC elections, this is the short definition of the role, as outlined on the home office website

> Police and crime commissioners' role
>
> Police and crime commissioners (PCCs) will ensure the policing needs of their communities are met as effectively as possible, bringing communities closer to the police, building confidence in the system and restoring trust. More about the role of the PCC.
>
> PCCs will make and influence key decisions that will impact on how your local area looks and feels – from CCTV, street lighting and graffiti to tackling gangs and drug-dealing.
> Their job is to listen to the public and then respond to their needs, bringing more of a public voice to policing and giving the public a name and a face to complain to if they aren't satisfied.

SeaforthCJ happens to have computer talents and managed to get an email address for around 150 of the candidates through some clever programming and we did searching for an additional 40 manually, 6 of these remained elusive but were mostly candidates associated with far-right organisations.

We sent a standard letter as follows via these emails or via the contact forms on websites:

[box icon=""]

Dear Sir or Madam,

We are approaching you as a candidate for the office of Police and Crime Commissioner (PCC) in your local constabulary area.

Below is a series of questions, which we would appreciate you responding to. These questions are being asked on behalf of a number of activist groups in England who are committed to gender equality and your responses will help inform those who read in our online communities as to who they feel will best represent their concerns

- How will you oversee the Multi Agency Risk Assessment Conference (MARAC) process to ensure gender neutrality is upheld in its administration and decision making processes?
- What training will you require the force you serve to undertake to increase their knowledge of gender reciprocity in domestic violence?
- Your role will involve working with partner agencies on crime reduction. How will you ensure that there is representation on men's issues in your meetings?
- If you became aware of perception bias towards a belief that women should receive lesser punishment for the same crime, how would you address this issue?
- How would you respond if you discovered that there had been persistent refusal in your force to investigate allegations of female-on-male sexual assault?

We appreciate the time you are taking to respond to these questions, and would be happy to provide you with information on any issues raised by our questions. We will also send a link to any articles we publish on our online forums in relation to responses we obtain from the PCC, should you respond to our questions.

Yours faithfully

Aimee McGee John C Forth

Cambridgeshire Merseyside

[/box]

I would say we were pretty transparent in our approach. This meant I had to laugh on reading two of the responses.

One sent emails wanting to know more about us…and then sent manifesto details which were of no relevance to the questions. Clearly when the candidate for Essex joined the English Democrats, he had all independent thought switched off. The Kent candidate for UKIP needs to learn to edit forwarded emails. His campaign manager saying "strange for you piers.. ahhh the life of a PPC !!!!" above his response gave us a good laugh, and gave him a thumbs down, even though he said he would consult with us to learn more on the issues.

This gets us down to the serious stuff. We have had a shocking lack of responses from most candidates. Now, bearing in mind that we may have become spam, and there will be a lot of email traffic, it does not bode well that two polite, well-spoken individuals get less than a 13% response rate less than 1 week out from the election. Worse still, I'm still waiting to receive my first response from ANY of the candidates in Cambridgeshire (curses, means I might have to do my own research!). At least SeaforthCJ got two responses in the Merseyside.

We had two responses from men who clearly "get" that there are men's issues related to policing and crime. Mr. Calderwood, an Independent running in the Devon and Cornwall area, is clearly a smart cookie. We wish him good fortune.

"the detail of the information with your question is very impressive and I hope other candidates will study it as so many are not experienced in the field and will not know much of the nuts and bolts of police investigation of domestic violence. I know from the debates, discussions and questions and answers that many candidates share and believe in the myths you highlight about female sentences, etc…"

In Lincolnshire, Mr. Hardwick, another independent candidate did some research on the MARAC process and his response speaks for itself. We hope this is the start of a red-pill journey for him and wish him good luck in his campaign.

"First, let me say that I was surprised to find no reference to gender neutrality in MARAC arrangements in this area. Maybe I didn't look hard enough, but if it is the case that gender neutrality has been either ignored or side-lined then this is a matter of some concern that, should I become PCC, will be addressed….<SNIP>… I would regard it as my duty to ensure that partner agencies and the police were suitably trained."

There was a middle range of responses, all assuring us of their gender neutrality, but to credit some of them, they have in previous roles been proactive in looking at issues around gender. Both Mr Ellis (Staffordshire – Conservative) and Mr Williams (Surrey – Independent) fell into this category.

Mr Longmore of West Mercia another independent candidate actually raised these issues on the hustings and said, "There is certainly an issue within West Mercia where male victims of domestic violence and sexual assault are not getting the support services required"

Two female candidates have replied to date. Ms. Jones (Merseyside – UKIP) stated she felt that the equality agenda had gone too far. Ms Robinson (Cumbria – Independent) felt we raised important points. Other notable mentions in this category of polite non-response stating their gender neutrality include: Mr Smith (Devon and Cornwall – Independent), Mr Alam (Cleveland – Independent), Mr Hogg (Devon and Cornwall – Conservative), Mr Goodall (Hampshire – Lib Dem)

Mr Reid (Mersyside – Independent) has a background in the law but his quote following suggests that he potentially has a gynocentric bias towards female offenders.

"I reject gender discrimination in sentencing – however I accept there are sometimes good reasons for women to be treated differently. Sometimes, rarely, they are treated more harshly than a man might be – in both serious and minor offences. We need an open debate about all of these issues, not one reflecting only particular perspectives."

Mr Chisnall (Sussex –Independent) was aware of the Men's Network in Brighton, but demonstrated he completely missed the point of concern about sentencing disparity

" If you wish to win hearts and minds I would suggest you concede that women are disproportionately not present amongst many groups in our society. I would find your argument more persuasive if you were arguing for more women police officers, more women in the judiciary and more women in the PCP, rather than more women in prison!"

It is clear that some people are following party political lines and not committing to anything in their campaigning, so they were not willing to put anything that could be viewed as controversial in their responses to us. In this category there was Mr Howson (Thames Valley – Lib Dem), and Mr Williams (Devon and Cornwall – Labour). Even Mr Smith (Essex – UKIP) appears to have a party line he is concerned about

"I have some understanding of the issues which you have put to me but I do not believe a PCC should commit to such campaigns."

Overall, we only had one candidate say anything that I felt like writing back and giving him a bit of a grilling on what he was saying Mr. Rhodes (Cumbria – Conservative) quoted the following

" I am of course aware of the problems associated with women offenders. The fact that 37% of women in custody attempt suicide is something that we all have to be aware of. It is no more or less important than the fact that the figure for men is 26% = except that as a proportion of prisoners it is singularly higher."

Quite simply I would love to go back to him and ask the following question – how many of those who attempt suicide in prison actually succeed? If it reflects the population statistics, the higher rate of attempts by women will be diminished dramatically by the actual deaths of the men.

So where does this leave us on the matter of who to vote for on 15 November 2012?

1) Vote. Even if you deface your paper. Political representation matters.

2) For most areas, you are on your own – but if you have independent candidates, I strongly suggest you contact them yourself and ask questions – as you can see we got the best and most thoughtful responses from Independent candidates. I will be doing this in Cambridgeshire.

3) Let's all shift to Devon and Cornwall – five of eight candidates responded. I 'm pleased to see this level of engagement.

I think more importantly than anything else is the follow-up from this article. I am keen to hear from English and Welsh MRAs who would be willing to be "out" and willing to provide information and advice to incoming PCCs on Men's Issues in relation to policing. Several of the candidates who responded asked for local contacts if they were elected, and I would hope we can find people in the MRM who are willing to act in this capacity. Please use our dedicated email address to get in touch if you feel you could fulfil this role: anonymousmensrights@gmail.com

If we get any more interesting responses, I will do my best to update this post on November 14, as long as life doesn't get in the way of good activism.

(We are hoping to get this out to as many MRAs in England and Wales as possible. If you want to re-post this, please contact me.)

Notice on Filler case

[box icon=""]

As you will read in the letter available for download below, the deadline has passed for the submission of written final arguments in the disciplinary hearing for Mary Kellett, the Ellsworth, Maine prosecutor who headed a campaign of legal tyranny against Vladek Filler and a number of other men in that area.

As we have reported earlier on AVfM there is considerable concern about not only the quality of representation Mr. Filler's case was afforded by Bar Counsel J. Scott Davis, but also the severe mismatch between the evidence now being reviewed by the Bar Panel and the evidence that was available regarding the extent of Kellett's misconduct.

We are asking all concerned parties to make email contact with the entities below with a personal message, politely worded, stating your concerns about this case. Importantly, please LINK the letter issued by AVfM and the copy of Vladek Filler's original Bar Complaint against Mary Kellett in your mail outs.

We will also be sending out this request to the roster of volunteers for the Judicial Accountability Committee, but this post is being made to encourage the participation of general readership. In this case, the more of these contacts that are made the better.

Thanks to everyone in advance for assisting us with this action and helping us attempt to push for justice that has been long denied Vladek Filler and his children.

Note: Please be sure to link the following two documents in your emails. The Complaint is too large for most mail programs to send as an attachment.

AVfM Radio: Tales from the Infrared debuts!

November 14, 2012 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

We're pleased to announced the inaugural episode of A Voice for Men's new radio show, Tales From The Infrared: Geek Culture from a Red Pill Perspective!

Airing at 8pm Central Time, and created and co-hosted by myself and Typhonblue, with this episode's Special Guest Host PwynySlastation01, this show is a significant departure from other shows in the AVfM lineup. The goal of this show is to lighten up, have fun, and explore something other than deep politics or psychology. We still talk about activism, but we mostly hope to provide an escape from that and into something involving laughter and fun. If you like video games, science fiction movies and TV shows, pop psychology, Youtube videos, comics, literature and other entertainment media and want to see it discussed from a Red Pill perspective, this is the show for you!

We will not be taking calls during this inaugural episode, but still feel free to call in to listen if you like, and we will be hanging out in the Stickam room after the show for anyone who wants to talk to us, make suggestions, or yell at us.

In a bit of a departure from our other shows, we also provide you with links you can use to follow along with the show and see what we're seeing, or check these resources out after the show! See the links below before, during, after the show so you'll know what we're talking about!

Post-US Election Update

November 14, 2012 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

It starts little, and then it grows, and grows, and grows…

A few weeks ago we issued an action alert calling upon volunteers from the A Voice for Men community to help out with a joint project with the Judicial Accountability Committee and the National Coalition for Men. And boy did you guys deliver. We were inundated with so many volunteers to help we actually had to turn people away or set them on "alternative" or "standby" status!

We and our group of volunteers gathered the names, phone numbers, FAX numbers, and email addresses of literally hundreds of people who were running for office to alert them to the cases of serial false accuser Tiffany Marie Smith in Delaware, corrupt prosecutor Mary Kellett and her entire office in Maine, and about the child abusing Judge Lori B. Jackson of Harrison County West Virginia. Gathering the information volunteers were able to provide, Paul Elam, myself, John the Other, Harry Crouch from the National Coalition for Men, and others were able to produce the following letters that were delivered to damn near a thousand candidates who were running for office in these three states of the US. Depending on which state they were running in, they all got copies one of these three letters:

Letter to Delaware-Candidates

Mary-Kellett-investigation-letter

To-West-Virginia-Legislators

In each case they were contacted politely, wished well in the upcoming election, and encouraged to make a statement about the case. We expected most to politely decline to make a statement, and most did, although a few responded, some ambivalently and some with cautiously positive words. We did not honestly expect more than that, since the men's movement is still growing and unknown by most people, and we are frequently horrifically slandered by those who do know us. One of our missions is to make sure that changes. While the Frankenstorm coincidentally hit those states in the leadup to the election causing a distraction, we know we got the direct attention of many of them and many others who've now been elected will at least know who we are, and we know for a fact that some of them are already talking to their fellows about it (because they told us so). We'll be in a position to approach more of those who actually were elected after the new legislative sessions begin next year.

Yes, that's right folks, the violent kitten-eating terroristic Men's Rights Movement has done that most dangerous, radical, and subversive of all things: petitioned public officials for a redress of grievances, and encouraged people to vote in the elections. (Minor side note: in my own home state of Michigan, a candidate for the Michigan Supreme Court who is known for working tirelessly to free men who are falsly accused was elected to the Supreme Court, and another judge who was endorsed by the leadership of a local Father’s Rights groups was elected to a circuit court bench. The winds of change are in the air, and the times, they are a’changin’, my friends.)

While a number of our volunteers choose to remain anonymous, we wish to acknowledge the efforts made by Suzanne McCarlely, Clarence Woodworth, Geoff Stone, Raz, Scott Jackson, Al Martin, Andy Blitzer, Coldfire, Palemale, Paul Elam, Harry Crouch, John Hembling, Keisha Post, Tara Palmatier, Gordon Finley, Greg Canning, Karen Straughn, Roy Den Hollander, Robert O’Hara, James Huff, Kristina Hansen, and all those other volunteers who prefer to remain anonymous but were willing to step up to the plate and help FTSU.

Thank you all and look forward to further political action updates as the new year begins.

It starts little, and then it grows, and grows, and grows…

AVfM Radio: Her body, her choice

Her body, her choice. Her body, her choice.

Anyone who questions this particular mantra is most definitely a villain; a cackling cad in a cape, twirling his mustache as he ties a crying damsel to the train tracks.
But there are some unexamined assumptions at the core of "her body, her choice" and foremost among them is that, somehow, society respects men's bodily autonomy more then women's. Let me say that again. Society respects men's bodily autonomy more then women's. Heh. Yeah.

Join JohntheOther, Typhonblue and Girl Writes What as we take a look at "her body, her choice" and ask ourselves, "what about his body, his choice?"

Pankhurst: The white feather betrayal of history

November 15, 2012 | by Andy Thomas | Link | Original Link

This article and accompanying video were produced in support of a protest taking place in London in November 2012. Stay tuned for an update.

[dropcap]I[/dropcap]n modern culture, the story we are given is a simple one—in the past men had the vote and women did not. For example, on the topic of "Women and the Vote", the UK Parliament website states simply and without qualification[1], "Before 1918 only men were allowed to vote in parliamentary elections." Indeed, the picture we are generally presented with (such as this poignant example from the BBC) is a very distorted one. According to this popular narrative, the suffragettes led by Emmeline and Christabel Pankhurst fought a noble campaign for female suffrage and, after a valiant struggle, were ultimately successful. And curiously, the campaign of intimidation, violence and arson they waged largely goes without criticism.

The reality was much more complex, however, and many important historical perspectives have been airbrushed from of our collective memory. For example, the simple fact was that at the start of the 20th century, most men also did not have the right to a parliamentary vote. But this is rarely mentioned.

Only wealthy property owning men could vote in parliamentary elections, and prior to the 1832 Reform Act, only 2% of men in the UK had such a vote[2]. As of 1903, this had risen to one third[3], but the fact remains that, whilst Mrs. Pankhurst and her supporters were fighting for their right to vote, the overwhelming majority of young men sent to the trenches in 1914 lacked any political franchise. Unlike the suffragettes, however, they were fighting for the their lives rather than the vote.

The suffragettes, fronted by the organisation founded by Mrs. Pankhurst and her daughters—the Women's Social and Political Union (WSPU)—weren't the only group of the period campaigning for suffrage. While other groups supported universal adult suffrage, such as the Labour movement, the suffragettes advocated a separate bill for wealthy women with property, i.e. women such as themselves. It is somewhat perverse, therefore, that the suffragettes have become synonymous with universal suffrage when this simply wasn't the case at all.

The following extract from the Socialist Standard[4] in 1908 makes clear its opposition to their proposals.

> "Men vote at present under the £10 franchise. The suffrage is thus upon a property basis with plural voting for the wealthy. Therefore, according to the proposals of the women Suffragists, only those women having the necessary property qualifications are to be allowed to vote. This excludes not only all those single working women unable to qualify because of their poverty, but it also bars practically the whole of the married women of the working class who have no property > qualifications apart from their husbands'. Further, it increases enormously the voting power of the well-to-do, since the head of the wealthy household can always impart the necessary qualifications to all the women of his house, while the working-man, through his poverty, is entirely unable to do so."

John Bruce Glasier, chairmen of the Independent Labour Party, wrote in his diary after a meeting with Emmeline and her daughter Christabel that they were guilty of "miserable individualist sexism", and that he could not support their organisation.

[image]Throughout the first decade of the 20th century, Emmeline and Christabel Pankhurst waged a campaign of intimidation, violence, vandalism and arson. Shortly after the outbreak of war, however, they agreed to cease their militant activities and the WSPU was promptly awarded a grant from the government[5] for the sum of £2,000 (not an insignificant amount back then).

Emmeline Pankhurst also declared her support for the war effort and began to demand military conscription for men (which was not introduced until 1916).

Furthermore, the suffragettes were among those who handed white feathers to males not in uniform, including teenage boys as young as 16. Sylvia Pankhurst wrote in her chronicle, "The Suffragette Movement"…

> "Mrs. Pankhurst toured the country, making recruiting speeches. Her supporters handed the white feather to every young man they encountered wearing civilian dress, and bobbed up at Hyde Park meetings with placards: "Intern Them All."

Being both socialized to serve their country and subject to such stigmatizing female coercion, many males felt no option but to enlist in a war that would killed millions of them. A poignant example of this is given by the following incidental comment found in a book of the period about the lice and fleas that afflicted soldiers living in squalid trenches[6].

> …the half-hysterical ladies who offer white feathers to youths whose hearts are breaking because medical officer after medical officer has refused them the desire of their young hearts to serve their country.

While her suffragettes carried placards demanding the "right to serve" by undertaking war work, Mrs. Pankhurst proclaimed that "The least that men can do is that every man of fighting age should prepare himself to redeem his word to women…"

[image]Some 8.7 million British men redeemed themselves in the trenches of the First World War. For them, it wasn't a right, but an obligation. Some 704,803 men from the UK were killed and a further 2.2 million wounded[7], with many losing limbs. The overwhelming majority of these never had the vote, but they were expected to lay down their lives nevertheless. There are few references to the average age of the British soldier and, in any case, many teenage boys lied about their age in order to enlist. However, of those executed for failing their obligation to redeem their word, as Mrs. Pankhurst put it, the average age was in the mid-twenties[8].

Contrary to popular perception today, the suffragettes did not have widespread support at the time, especially given their proposal for limited female suffrage and advocacy of violence. Nevertheless, Emmeline Pankhurst wielded considerable influence amongst society's political elite and from 1914 onward the government, being primarily concerned with the war effort, considered that the WSPU would be useful in helping to breakdown union resistance to women filling the roles left by men in the workplace.

It certainly cannot be denied that, in times past, society placed gender specific burdens and expectations on men and women. Many argue that given the brutal hardship of life, far from being detrimental to women, such distinctions were largely beneficial. However, with the advent of industrialisation throughout the 19th century, society was changing rapidly and things also had to change as far as society's roles for men and women were concerned. But did the WSPU campaign of intimidation and destruction hasten female suffrage, or delay it? Speaking in 1913, Prime Minister Lloyd George, exclaimed…

> Haven't the Suffragettes the sense to see that the very worst way of campaigning for the vote is to try and intimidate a man into giving them what he would gladly give otherwise?

At the conclusion of the war, women over the age of 30 became eligible to vote in parliamentary elections. Rightly or wrongly, it was argued at the time that the age restriction was necessary to avoid a gender imbalance in voting given that so many young males had lost their lives. By 1928, however, universal suffrage for both men and women over the age of 21 became a reality.

Today, next to the Houses of Parliament in London, stands a bronze statue of Emmeline Pankhurst. Located at the right-hand side of the half-rotunda extending from the base, there's a dedication to her daughter Christabel. In fact, Emmeline had two other daughters—Sylvia and Adela, both of whom were equally instrumental in the formation the WSPU. However, you will find no reference to either Sylvia or Adela at Emmeline's statue, and on gaining an insight to the Pankhurst family life, it's hard not to feel a degree of compassion for them…

In real life, Emmeline was an abusively controlling mother and her children were born into an emotionally toxic environment. Sylvia wrote in her chronicle of Adela…

> The desire was a reaction from the knowledge that though a brilliant speaker and one of the hardest workers in the movement, she was often regarded with more disapproval than approbation by Mrs Pankhurst and Christabel, and was the subject of a sharper criticism than the other organisers had to face.

Clearly, Christabel was Emmeline's protégée and nothing Sylvia or Adela could do would have ever met with their mother's approval. After their father's death in 1898, Adela gave a similarly desolate account of family life…

> Mother was now involved in public work. We had no friends, we played no games and went nowhere… she took no interest in our affairs. Christabel seemed at a distance, Sylvia hopelessly depressed… Public life was a relief to her…

Emmeline and Christabel were enthusiastic advocates of violence but, as female members of the upper-class, they were relatively immune from harm themselves. With the increasing and widespread use of arson by the WSPU, both Sylvia and Adela distanced themselves from such tactics and rejected their mother's politics, eventually becoming estranged from her. Fearing Adela would criticise the WSPU in public, Emmeline had Adela sent to Australia in 1914 on a one-way ticket. She never saw her again.

The forced feeding of suffragettes in prison is widely held up today as an example of their bravery. Although Emmeline and Christabel urged others to do so, neither of them were willing to submit to it themselves (only Sylvia had the courage to do so). Tended by servants and chauffeured to rallies in a motorcar, Emmeline Pankhurst's life was one of privilege—she never had to face the horrors which she readily advocated for others. It is a travesty that this women is so idolised by our modern political establishment, and her ideology so misrepresented in our culture.

Chicago, it’s my kind of town

November 15, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

From the windswept streets of Chi-town, home of wicked-good pizza, Chicago Dogs, Uncle Bern and Da Bears, our own Steve Berkimer has been pounding the pavement with evil, kitty blending intent.

He has been putting AVfM’s sinister message out to the unsuspecting public, furthering our plans for world domination. It is enough to warm our cockles and make us snicker as we twirl our moustache and conjure up more ways to get our oppressin’ on.

[image]
Steve Berkimer
We behold the beautiful, delicious terror of his deeds. What used to be a simple brick wall is now a wall of death. A once plain and innocuous window transforms into a gateway to hell. A bus stop becomes a hate stop and steps that used to lead to just another sidewalk now ascend to the height of evil.

The horror of the truth becomes clear.

JTO’s fake skin sloughs off to reveal his true self, reddened scales, breath of sulphur and all. Dean Esmay laughs, and the slithering tongue of a serpent unfurls from his mouth. Typhonblue screams and pleads for someone to save her, but not even Mykeru can muster a response.

The plan is in place. It is too late to stop it now. Sometime soon another unsuspecting man or woman in Chicago will notice something in the window while riding the “L.” Or perhaps they will see it when they go to get the latest copy of The Chicago Sun-Times.

“What is this funny lookin’ sticker?” They will ask themselves. A Voice for What?

And then they will pull out their smart phone and scan the QR code that will change their life forever. And they will end up here, just like Roger Thornhill did after viewing one of our posters, helping us take over the world before they ever knew what hit them.

And you can join the plan, too. Just make contact with the dark and sinister Steve Berkimer at activism@avoiceformen.com. Tell him you want help spread the message, like peanut butter on a sammich. He will send you the stickers, free. It will only cost you….your soul! Bwahahahahahahaha!

Size matters, but not just for men

November 16, 2012 | by Peter Lloyd | Link | Original Link

This article was originally posted at mailonline.co.uk, and is re-posted here with permission of the author. PE

A scientific study claims to have settled the age-old debate on whether penis size actually matters.

As reported by MailOnline earlier this week, research in Scotland claims that women who have frequent vaginal orgasms are more likely to credit larger penises for them.

Stuart Brody, a psychologist at the University of West Scotland, surveyed 323 women on their previous sexual encounters and whether length influenced their ability to climax.

Apparently, the women who reported the highest number of vaginal orgasms were more likely to rule that bigger was better. Brody told Live Science: 'This might be due, in part, to greater ability of a longer penis to stimulate the entire length of the vagina, and the cervix.'

However, it's not all so damning. Apparently, if the above is true, it only applies to some women and some orgasms, some of the time.

But it does pose bad news for the sisterhood, because if the size of the penis matters, then surely the vagina must too. After all, friction is friction – and women's bits vary as much as ours.

But it's all quite funny, really. When I read yesterday's article, I laughed out loud. Not because the study was so astonishingly one-sided, but because it reminded me of a sketch from U.S. television show Curb Your Enthusiasm.

Called Big Vagina (its contents aren't entirely suitable for a family newspaper but it can be found on YouTube), it offers a new gesture for men to adopt in response to women's cruel use of the 'inch' gesture with their thumb and forefinger.

Given society's on-going pre-occupation with size, perhaps we should take this gesture and introduce it into popular culture – all for the sake of fairness of course. Then, we can all laugh at each other together. What fun.

But let's not stop there. Don't breasts need to be the perfect size, shape and pertness too, right?

Naturally, I'm being facetious, but it proves my point: this sort of mocking of the opposite gender cuts both ways.

After all, men can put a master key in a door, but if the lock's too big then it won't open. And that's not our fault.

Even the Karma Sutra explains that there are three sizes of penis and three sizes of vagina; the perfect combination on which depends on personal preference. Something else which trashes yesterday's conclusion.

So maybe Brody isn't right. With all due respect to him, this study was anecdotal and led by a psychologist, not a medical doctor. It's mere opinion. Hardly a robust scientific discovery.

A very good reason why we should all shrug it off. Not least because all this self-entitlement about other people's bodies is vulgar.

That said, the size debate does need to stop. Why? Because we don't need an answer – it wouldn't change anything – and it's mainly promulgated to (quite literally) belittle men. Sadly, because we're too polite to contest it, it's allowed to thrive.

But no more. Not only is it factually incorrect, it's also dangerous for our young men to hear. Last month, a 17 year-old boy emailed me via my website. He'd quit his rugby team, stopped going out and refused to date girls – all because he thought his penis wasn't 'good enough'.

This boy (who actually had nothing to worry about, but then again none of us do… all penises are sufficient) had been conditioned to hate his body from everything he'd seen and heard over the years.

This is no longer just a matter of physiology, it's a mental health issue too. And given that us men are more prone to depression, suicide and early death, the women who wiggle their little fingers should grow some compassion.

This includes celebrities. Because, if somebody such as Ed Sheeran stood up and mocked the opposite sex's private parts, like Katy Perry and Christina Aguilera have, his career would be over.

Likewise, if a scientific study looked at the tautness and depth of female genitalia, it would be lambasted as obscene.

That's probably because it would be. It might also make a lot of women feel pretty rubbish, which is what I found most disturbing about the response to yesterday's story; so many commentators took great delight in the knowledge it would hurt many men. How sad.

Publishers note: The responses, mostly from women, to Mr. Lloyd's article, were predictably callous and shaming. Perhaps they might benefit from reading a few ideas from MRAs? You can join the "conversation" here.

Are all feminists Morans?

November 17, 2012 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

Caitlin Moran is a London Times columnist and author of the recently published “How to Be a Woman”.

She was recently interviewed for New Yorker magazine concerning her views of the continued “relevancy” of the gender ideology of feminism[1]. Also, Caitlin Moran is a dunce. Sure, I could have been clever and used a synonym rhyming with Moran, but it was too easy.

The article redraws several points made in Moran’s “how to be..” notably, that only 29% of American women identify as adherents to the ideology-starting-with-F. This number prompts Moran to ask, in apparent pique: “what do you think feminism is, ladies?”

This photo was altered to make the subject appear less like a smirking Disney cartoon villain

Without pretending to speak for any of said ladies, non-feminist or otherwise, a good many quite likely think feminism is a dogmatic ideology built on hatred and violence.

After years of addressing this gender ideology and it’s adherents, I’m inclined to think the answer to “what do you think feminism is”? would be a religion of hatred, and from an informal survey of my female colleagues, I know I am not alone in this assessment.

Moran indulges in some begging of the question[2] with her statements “What part of ‘liberation for women’ is not for you? Implying liberation for women and feminism are the same thing, and glossing over liberation from what? She mentions freedom to vote, but passes over the purchase cost men alone have paid historically to earn their vote. Moran mentions the legal innovation of women not being owned by the man they marry. Except that woman have never been owned, no matter how many historical revisionist ideologues claim it.

Moran is also the apparent developer of a new technique of hyperbolic obfuscation, which although she hasn't published it in the form of a book, we'll call Moranology. She provides an example of this technique while discussing her related book, Moranthology.

"The idea of not being able to control my own fertility genuinely terrifies me. That one mistake might change your life. That everything I am, and do, could be ended by the repeal of laws our mothers fought so hard for, that women had waited for the entire span of humanity to come about. Because that's what the anti-abortion movement would want: a situation where no woman is ever allowed to make a single mistake without bearing the consequences for the rest of her life. Just like we used to have, until very recently.

"Imagine a parallel in the lives of men. You go out one night, get drunk, and lose, badly, at poker. You wake the next morning, and someone turns up on your doorstep with a twenty-five-year-old man called "Ray," tells you, "You're now financially and morally responsible for this man for the rest of your life," and then walks away, leaving you with Ray. That's what not allowing women to rectify—quickly, safely, and legally—an accidental pregnancy is like. Except the Ray version is still easier, because he's a fully grown man—not a tiny baby you have to labor out of your body, and breast-feed, and tend to at 4:30 A.M., and give up work for. Maybe risk your life or your sanity or your continence for. The unkindness of not letting women decide when they want to be parents takes my breath away. Not only for the simple inhumanity of the act but also because I feel it demeans parenting."

"It suggests that these people think you can parent terrified, unwillingly, exhaustedly, when you simply don't wish to. And maybe some people can. But I believe in giving a parent-child relationship the most favourable start possible. And that favourable start begins, for me, with deciding that you want the baby in the first place. Not hoping that you love it nine months down the line, after the government has invaded your body, forced your hand. Women have always aborted. Women always will. No kind government would make a thing that will inevitably happen dangerous, and illegal, again."

Yes, this is an interview published in the online edition of The New Yorker, and not The Onion. I checked. Twice.

Moran has exactly described the reality of men's total lack of reproductive rights, but in an apparent departure from the land of reason, sanity and reality, prefaces this all with the phrase "Imagine a parallel in the lives of men."

She then fictionalizes men's real, present reality of no reproductive rights, by casting the scene as a gambling debt, rather than forcible financial participation in fatherhood, which is what many men face in the the real world.

Is New Yorker magazine satirizing feminism? Or are Caitlin Moran and the online journal's editor actually in such denial of reality that they have exactly described male reality – but failed to recognize their own writing, and have re-cast it as a hypothetical. Imagine if men had it like this?

They do, you morans.

More feminist violence on the way

November 18, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[quote]To attempt to silence a man is to pay him homage, for it is an acknowledgement that his arguments are both impossible to answer and impossible to ignore. ~ JBR Yant[/quote]

If you have been around AVfM or other men's rights websites for very long, you have likely seen feminism referred to as an ideology of hate, with violent leanings. It is a charge quickly pooh-poohed, and often openly ridiculed by gender ideologues who would prefer that you view the men's movement as the real source of hate and potential violence.

This is their stated position, despite a long history of violence and hateful rhetoric stretching back for more than a century of activism "on behalf of women."

As recently reported in an outstanding article here by Andyman, we discover that the Women's Suffrage Movement, long touted as a righteous push for across the board equality by fair minded women, was actually a matter of highly organized and systematic violence including arson and physical assault. We also learned that their platform was not one universal suffrage, but of preserving the right to vote for the elite and affluent land owners, much in keeping with the traditions of the system, against which they claimed to be rebelling.

A general understanding of history also compels us to understand that women like Planned Parenthood founder Margaret Sanger was not so much an advocate for women's reproductive autonomy as she was a genocidal racist intent on wiping African Americans and other "inferior undesirables" from the American landscape.

She was, in effect, a predecessor to the now emergent Radfem community of women who openly advocate for the extermination of half the population, eugenics and male enslavement to a system of feminist governance.

In more recent times we know of the struggles of Erin Pizzey, the founder of the world's first shelter for abused women, and how, when her research came into conflict with the modern feminist narrative of women only victims and male only perpetrators of domestic violence, she was stalked, received multiple death threats and even changed the continent on which she resided to escape harassment and threats.

Similarly, when world renowned domestic violence academicians and researchers Richard Gelles, Murray Straus and Suzanne Steinmetz conducted research concluding sexual symmetry in the incidence of intimate partner violence, each of them received death threats. Bomb threats were phoned in to the schools at which they were scheduled to present their findings.

This is the track record of gender ideologues who call themselves feminists and who claim to represent a peaceful movement for the empowerment of all human beings.

This does not include the proxy violence of state functionaries that feminists have inspired through biased, sexist legislation, but their own direct violent actions targeting individuals whose only threat to them is expressing views that do not meet their approval.

With the exception of the Suffragettes, most of their violence has taken the form of threat, rather than the actual acting out of physical hostilities. We do have exceptions like Valerie Solanas, the much revered murderess of "Scum Manifesto" fame. Also, we have to note the box cutter wielding members of Atheism+ and their public display of destruction of property and intimidation in order to silence the idea that men are human beings who deserve equal rights.

But these have been the exception rather than the rule, which has been to either make threats or to enlist others to conduct violence on their behalf.

However, any ideology predicated on the justified use of violence to attain goals that are considered essential will always devolve into violence as a preferred method of expression.

And this has begun to manifest in 2012.

Last Friday, Warren Farrell, author of the seminal book on men's issues, "The Myth of Male Power," spoke at the University of Toronto. His subject matter was concerns over the deteriorating state of men and boys in education, male suicide rates and the phenomena of young men's "failure to launch," or, more accurately concerns over why young men are remaining in the home of their parents far past the time they would be normally expected to move out and take ownership of their lives.

While these are very, very important subjects, they pale in comparison to many of the subjects covered on this website. The reaction of campus feminists at the University of Toronto was violent.

I will speculate at this time that there is a reason why Warren Farrell's appearance on a major university two years ago would not have resulted in this near riot. It is because of A Voice for Men and other sites like it.

More accurately, perhaps, it is because we have been so successful in getting the MRM message on the public table and the reaction of feminist bloggers like Amanda Marcotte, Jessica Valenti, PZ Myers, Matt Dillahunty and David Futrelle has been to encourage violence against it. It has been because websites like Jezebel.com, The Good Men Project, and organizations like the SPLC have done the same.

By feeding the already violence prone ideologues that further feminist doctrine a steady diet of histrionic distortions, irrational fear and calculated misrepresentations of the men's movement, they are inspiring many of these people (most of which are naïve and impressionable young people) to react, even to the presence of the very tame and soft spoken Farrell, as though he were a Grand Dragon of the KKK.

Since none of the afore mentioned bloggers, nor the management teams of those websites (e.g. Lisa Hickey and Tom Matlack) and organizations like the SPLC (Arthur Goldwag), have any moral compass directing them to correct their own actions, this will undoubtedly worsen in the future.

Recently Girl Writes What informed us that there are now some colleges and high schools starting to use her videos in classrooms. It is a great move forward because it means that the real MRA message, not some watered down version of it, is starting to make its way into the academic world. It may not be long before she is asked to speak, and woman or not, her message will not be near as palatable as Farrell's. Which is to say that her message is the one that needs to be heard in those places.

Physical violence against the MRM on the streets is on the way.

And all of this is happening because websites like A Voice for Men have put men's issues on the map.

While we are not going to stop (in fact, we take this as a cue to ramp up our operations) I do want to say on behalf of the management team here, that this is also the time to more tightly embrace our views of non-violence and peaceful protest. As you saw in the video, it is better to let them prove their hatred and tendency toward violence completely on their own.

If they are to be cracked on the head, let it be with a police baton, and not because any of us took action against them. Let them sit in jail cells together, and not alongside MRAs. They will do the dirty work of taking themselves down, as long as we are smart enough, and principled enough, to allow it to happen. And it appears at this point all we have to do to ensure that is to keep doing what we are doing.

After all, we don't have to use dishonest propaganda to paint them as violent bigots. All we have to do is point at their actions.

Lucian Vâlsan named European News Director

November 18, 2012 | by Robert O'Hara | Link | Original Link

We are delighted to announce Lucian Vâlsan, a Romanian MRA, as the first European News Director for AVFM. Europe is a very important theater for men’s rights and Lucian is more than competent as he speaks eleven different languages and has a keen eye for red pill news in Europe.

His introductory story about politics in Romania is just the first of what is sure to be a great collection of journalistic articles giving readers an insiders perspective of the state of men and men’s rights on the European continent. Definitely a much needed addition to the AVFM team, Vâlsan will be a sure fire deliverer of news from the European mainland and will add more globally encompassing content for AVFM readership.

Please join us in welcoming him.

Romanian Marxist feminists on the attack

November 18, 2012 | by Lucian Vâlsan | Link | Original Link

Since the fall of the Communist dictatorship following a bloody popular revolution in December 1989, politicians (be it militant feminists or indifferent to the topic) were reluctant in openly admitting being Marxist, since it's been less than 25 years since we've all suffered under a real oppression directed towards everyone.

Thus, feminists in this country kept their beliefs to themselves and acted rather stealthily and only small segments of the media openly advocated explicitly feminist themes. But, as of 2005, things have gradually changed for the worse, and from 2009 to the present there has been a deteriorating of the situation and Romania is much closer to the US in terms of misandry than it has ever been so far.

We now have an almost identical Family Law Code with the US (and the misandry levels in the family courts are identical to the US), we have laws that are indistinguishable from VAWA (except they are in separate laws and hidden behind a more complex language and thus incomprehensible for the average Joe). We have more than 100 DV shelters (at a population of 19,6 million); at least 80 of them are funded through taxpayers' money – and the number is rapidly growing. Needless to say there is not a single shelter that admits men and boys over the age of 14.

So in this context, Gabriela Crețu is running for the Senate in Bârlad constituency on behalf of the Socialist Party.

She openly admits in her CV that she is a Marxist feminist and that she pursues gender politics and gynocentrism[1][2]. She also openly supports a prominent gender ideologue who stated the following about fathers in Romania (after a father's rights organization has mildly stated that there is 'a bit of misandry' in the family courts):

> They demanded all these all the while in the domestic space from the majority of the Romanian families, men themselves act like children, being incapable of taking care of themselves, so how could they be trusted to take care of children? If their wives are missing from home, they almost starve to death and go to work in dirty or inappropriate clothes. These are the fathers to whom this organization says they should be trusted with child custody in divorce cases.

When that gender ideologue was called out for her hate speech, she deleted her blog post. But the Internet doesn't forget, and doesn't forgive.

This woman also openly praises Salvador Allende[3][4], a ruthless Communist leader who pursued the same collectivist policy, with nationalizations and suppressing individual liberty, that lead to thousands upon thousands of innocent deaths under an oppressive dictatorship.

After she pursued gender ideological politics in the European Parliament, now, Gabriela Crețu has launched a book advocating for the principles of the New Left[5] soon to hit the universities on a large scale and it's already considered an important book in the Gender Studies classes (yes, we also have those).

Now she's running for the Romanian Senate[6] in a town that has been constanly voting for the Socialist Party in the last 20 years.

It took them 50 years in the US, but they're close to the endgame in Romania, after only 7 years of pushing the feminist ideology. This is one of the attempts from us, the very few red pill people, to attempt at least to inform people that these issues are not at all restrained to the English-speaking countries.

And this is only the beginning in here. They have achieved in 7 years here what they could not in the first 20 years of activism for the gender ideology starting with "F' in the West.

13 reasons it’s unlucky to be male

November 19 is International Men’s Day: a time to promote male role models; to celebrate men’s contributions to society; to focus on men’s health and well being; to highlight discrimination against males; and to improve gender relations and promote gender equality.

As someone who wants both my son and my daughter to flourish across all areas of life, I am frequently reminded that our society and media do a particularly poor job of highlighting and addressing areas in which males face disadvantage. Thankfully we have women’s offices, ministries and NGOs working tirelessly to improve the areas in which women still fare poorly. This is not the case for men.

We seem to have a cultural blind spot around men and gender politics. When a man has a problem, it is frequently seen as his own fault, whereas women’s problems are more often attributed to others or to society. For example, we hear that men are to blame for their own poor health (“men don’t go to the doctor”), whereas young women’s high levels of eating disorders are blamed upon the cultural pressure to be thin.

The portrayals of men in modern day media are often negative – as violent murderers, wife bashers, sexual abusers, deadbeat dads, and bumbling idiots – even though, in reality, only a small proportion of men act out these roles and behaviours. This compounds the lack of compassion for men’s issues.

Our society often assumes that ‘men have it good’ and only women carry the burden of gender-based disadvantage. The evidence strongly contradicts this. Here are 13 areas in which men and boys need our help. I would ask that you picture an important male in your life as you read them – be it your son, brother, husband, best mate or father. Many thanks to Glen Poole from the Men’s Network in England for the idea for this article.

1) If we want everyone to live longer, healthier lives, we must address the appalling state of men’s health. Males have much higher illness, injury and death rates and die almost five years earlier than females, yet public research funding for male health is less than one-third of that for female health. National health expenditure is one third higher for females than for males. The problem is not that resources have preferentially gone to women, but that health service provision has been less than adequate at identifying and addressing the health needs of males. Health services in many instances serve women and children well but men poorly, in terms of access, availability, suitability of service delivery environments and service delivery methods (men are greeted and treated from a female model of service delivery). Health promotion messages aimed at males are poorly targeted and often demeaning or derogatory. Until 2010 Australia had no male health policy or longitudinal national male health study.

2) The health of boys also needs attention. After the first year of life boys have a death rate 35 percent higher than girls. In all areas of health status (death, disability, handicap and illness), boys fare worse than girls. Generally, more boys than girls have mental health problems, including conduct disorder, disruptive or antisocial behaviors. Young boys are the predominant reported victims of physical violence, emotional abuse and neglect from adults and carers. There is no secondary school testicular cancer self-examination component of sexual health education for boys despite the fact that incidence rates of testicular cancer for males aged 15 to 39 are more than double the rates of cervical cancer in females of the same age group. Up to one in seven boys experiences child sexual assault before the age of 16.

3) The male suicide rate is a national disgrace. 1,814 males killed themselves in 2010: more than the entire road toll. Divorced men are three times as likely to commit suicide as any other group.

4) Men are raised to be disposable. We socialise boys to take more risks and place a lesser value on their health and safety so that men will take on the dangerous but essential jobs: firefighting, logging, heavy trucking, construction, mining and the military. In a gender-equitable society we would raise both our sons and daughters to share this work. In Australia however, the most deadly, dangerous, unhealthy and risky work is carried out overwhelmingly by males, and the highest occupational health risks, mortality rates and disability levels are experienced by poorer men. More than twice as many males as females experience work-related injuries and illnesses, and over ninety percent of work-related deaths are males. Australia also remains a signatory to the international convention exempting “able bodied males” between 18 and 45 from the ban on forced labour. We hear a lot about the “glass ceiling” when it comes to women’s employment but very little about the “glass cellar” when it comes to men’s.

5) Men are more likely to be homeless. Males are one third more likely to be homeless compared to females, and twice as likely to be sleeping rough (homeless).

6) If we want everyone to live lives free from violence, we must address violence against men. The overwhelming burden of disease from violence worldwide is born by males. Men make up three-quarters of suicides, two-thirds of homicides and three-quarters of war-related deaths. In Australia, young men are three times as likely as young women to be victims of violence, however, there are no public health campaigns to address this serious issue. Men make up one third of victims of family violence, however there are barely any support services for these men, nor treatment services for abusive women. Some argue that because men are most often assaulted by other men, the violence they experience is somehow less important. However, it shouldn’t matter who the perpetrator is. Talking about the gender of the perpetrator diverts the conversation away from addressing the needs and experiences of male victims of violence. We don’t trivialise the experience of lesbian victims of domestic violence in this way by saying “but lesbians are most often assaulted by other lesbians.”

7) If we want to give every child the best possible start in life, we must look at the way schools are failing boys. Fifty percent more Australian females than males graduate from our universities each year. In NSW, the difference between boys’ and girls’ average Tertiary Admission Rank is almost 20 percent. Boys have significantly lower levels of achievement in literacy than girls, are significantly more disengaged with schooling, and drop out more often. They report significantly less positive experiences of schooling in terms of enjoyment of school, perceived curriculum usefulness and teacher responsiveness. Boys are subject to more disciplinary actions during schooling, are more likely to participate in subsequent delinquent behaviours, alcohol and substance abuse, and during adolescence, are 4–5 times more likely than girls to suffer from depression and commit suicide. Boys are nine times more likely to be referred to pediatricians for behavioral problems, including Attention-Deficit Disorder.

8) There is a critical lack of male teachers. The proportion of male teachers is at a record low and continues to fall. In 2011 just 30 percent of all full-time equivalent teachers were male: 19.3 percent in primary schools and 41.8 percent in secondary schools. Males make up 2 percent of preschool teachers and 4 percent of childcare workers. The lack of male teachers may be a strong factor behind the high dropout and low achievement rates of boys. With so few male role models and mentors it's no wonder that boys disengage.

9) If we want to ensure that every child has the best possible relationship with both parents, we must remove the barriers separating fathers from their children. Fathers are removed from their children against their will and through no fault of their own. The majority of fathers are not granted reasonable access after contested legal proceedings costing thousands of dollars. Many fathers are advised not to proceed with custody applications in the first place. False accusations of domestic violence or child abuse are not infrequent in attempts to ensure custody of the children. Non-custodial parents, usually fathers, are then subjected to a system that forces them to pay "child support" without any system to make sure the money they pay for the benefit of their children is actually used for such. The system then refuses to enforce their ability to see their own children and the children's ability to see their parent. Parental alienation, whereby children are taught to dislike or fear the non-custodial parent is also not uncommon.

10) There is an epidemic of fatherlessness. Of the five million children in 2009–10, 864,000 (17 percent) lived away from their father. Of these children, 48 percent saw their father at least once per fortnight, while 24 percent rarely saw their father (less than once per year or never). Almost half never stayed overnight with their father. In 2009–10, there were 366,030 non-resident fathers. Research from the USA shows that violent crime, drug and alcohol abuse, truancy, teen pregnancy and suicide all correlate more strongly to fatherlessness than to any other factor. The majority of prisoners, juvenile detention inmates, high school dropouts, pregnant teenagers, adolescent murderers, and rapists all come from fatherless homes. The connection is so strong that controlling for fatherlessness erases the relationships between race and crime and between low income and crime.

11) If we want parents to be the best they can be, we must do more to support fatherhood. Until the 1970s dads weren't allowed to be present at the birth of their own children. Since then the role of the Australian father has changed from sole breadwinner to sharing the hands-on parenting and earning roles with his partner. Fathers are more likely than ever to require time off work to look after their children's needs but government legislation and workplace cultures haven't followed suit. Men are still expected to put in long hours and not take time off for family responsibilities. Women may sometimes find it hard to find an employer that gives them the job flexibility to care for their young children, but most men find it almost impossible. Discrimination complaints by men because of their parental status have more than doubled in the past decade. The current inequitable parental leave schemes, favouring mothers, reinforce fathers in the traditional 'breadwinner' role rather than supporting them as being 'hands-on' dads (which the research shows gives better outcomes for children). Many fathers feel excluded by staff and services that appear to be focused solely upon the needs of mothers. Ante-natal courses for new fathers are currently run at only a handful of hospitals despite the fact that up to 10 percent of first-time dads suffer post-natal depression and in most cases their symptoms go untreated.

12) Males lack reproductive rights. Upon becoming pregnant, a woman can choose to have the baby, have an abortion or put the baby up for adoption. A man has no legal right to choose whether to become a father or even to be notified that he has become a father, even if the pregnancy came about via deception (e.g. by falsely claiming to be on the pill or utilizing discarded or stored semen). Men also lack the range of contraceptive options available to women.

13) We need to do more to protect baby boys from infant circumcision. Each year almost 25,000 boys under the age of four are subjected to painful, sometimes dangerous and life altering surgery without their consent or medical cause. All six major medical societies of Australia have declared that circumcision of newborn males should not be routinely performed. The Royal Australasian College of Physicians has expressed concern that neonatal circumcision may violate human rights. In their statement the ACP disclosed the traumatic nature of circumcision, recommending that parents should be given more complete facts about the procedure. Circumcision has serious risks including infection, hemorrhage, scarring, shock, penile disfigurement, penile amputation, and even occasional death. The complication rate for this unnecessary procedure is estimated to be 2-10 percent. Three Australian states and two territories have laws that protect little girls from this sort of procedure but there exists nothing to protect little boys.

Gender equity is not a zero-sum game: this International Men's Day, let us remember that looking after men and boys does not take anything away from women and girls. If we want to create a world where each child can grow to fulfill their greatest potential, we must care equally about the needs and human rights of both genders.

Monday Morning Roundup

November 19, 2012 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

We know most of you start creeping away on Friday afternoon and we don't see you again until Monday, and sometimes even during the week you don't catch everything, so he's some interesting things you may have missed from the last week:

As one of those people who puts the "Activism" into "Men's Right Activist," Aimee McGee has a report on extensive activities undertaken by herself and John C Forth to contact numerous political candidates in the United Kingdom on behalf of men and boys. See Polling British candidates on men's behalf for more.

Editor-in-Chief John the Other notes a column by a narcissistic and silly person who tries to make us imagine what reproduction would be like if men had it a certain way… and she misses the obvious fact that she has described pretty close to exactly what it actually is like today for men. Don't miss Are all feminists Morans? (No, that is not a mis-spelling.)

In Size matters, but not just for men, Peter Lloyd notes one of the most appalling and cruel double standards men and boys are faced with around the world that we rarely or never tolerate when it comes to women.

A Voice for Men radio debuted a brand new show in its lineup on Wednesday with Tales from the Infrared: Geek Culture from a Red Pill Perspective, which is meant to be a lighthearted and fun show that, while it still goes into some heavy areas, strives hard to be a break from the siege of cultural misandry–and to insinuate the Red Pill into modern Geek Culture. The announcement includes links on every story or item covered in the episode.

While very few Men's Rights Advocates and Activists would deny that women should have the right to vote (and the AVfM editorial staff certainly takes no such stance), there is an astounding level of mythology surrounding the fight to give women the vote in the 19th and early 20th Century; that fight, and its advocates, were not always the righteous angels of perfection they are often portrayed as. Don't miss Pankhurst: The white feather betrayal of history by Andy Man.

Our Thursday night episode of A Voice for Men Radio hosted by John the Other, Girl Writes What, and Typhon Blue took on the issue of reproductive rights for men in a no-holds-barred manner, and we were surprised at the size of our audience and the response to that episode, including our first call from a young person, a 13 year old boy. Is there some reason to suspect we're a growing movement attracting more and more young people to a cause they find relevant?

With the younger crowd coming on, it is a good thing that sexual savant Raven Moon Dragon offers some dating advice for the uninitiated.

American Men's advocates have been watching in dismay over the last year as Australians, Canadians, and UK citizens lead the way in papering the world with the MRM message. Now Chicago has been added to the list of American cities spreading the word, joining Seattle.

Those egalitarian, Kumbayah singing peaceniks, also known as feminists, are at it again up in Canada, this time at the University of Toronto, where they actually stopped singing Kumbayah and starting singing Let's Get Physical to Toronto Police because they did not want anyone to be allowed access to listen to a lecture being delivered by Warren Farrell.

Whassup with Canada these days? It used to be a peaceful country till the feminists started stinking the place up. Paul Elam was inspired to give his take on the illustrious history of feminist violence.

In better news, the Monday Morning Roundup will be the first, but not by any means the last place that readers here will learn of the new website, A Voice for Boys. Other than having a really great name, this website, which is "dedicated to educating, empowering, building self-esteem and confidence in boys aged 13 to 20, as well as offering help and support to them if they need it," is a badly needed addition to what is happening online in the world of men and boys. AVfM stands ready to help them promote and further their mission in any way we can.

Finally, today, November 19, 2012 is International Men's Day. We urge all men and women to celebrate today by taking a moment to observe the work of those doing advocacy on behalf of men and boys, and to take another moment give the raspberry to those getting in the way.

AVFM News and Activism: Lucian Vâlsan

Tonight on AVFM News and Activism: News from Romania!

Valsan Lucian joins us for his first time as the new European News Correspondent providing a much needed perspective from an important battleground for men's rights. We will be talking about Feminist politics in Eastern Europe and Feminism's overt association with Marxism in that part of the world. We are delighted that AVFM has a competent and passionate MRA joining our growing news team and look very much forward to hearing more from him in the future. We hope you'll join Robert Ohara, James Huff, and Valsan Lucian tonight on AVfM Radio and join the discussion about international politics and gender issues.

The show starts tonight, November 20, 2012 at 9 PM Eastern Time, 8 Central, which is 2:00 AM Nov 21 in London and 21 AM Nov. 21 in Brisbane.

My name is Frank

November 20, 2012 | by Dr. F (Ian Williams) | Link | Original Link

---

Meet Frank. He wrote the following introduction recently on the AVfM forum and it needs repeating. I have no idea who Frank is and after reading his words I asked, and received, his permission to post it here. I have changed absolutely no words. His writing comes from his heart with no attention to presentation or process.

Whoever you are Frank, thank you. Please come forward and tell us who you are. This piece will then be at home right next to your name where it deserves to be. Dr. F

Hello, My name is Frank

I'm sure you may have noticed that already. I consider myself more fortunate than most of the folk here. I can't tell you a blue to red story. As far as I can tell I've always been red. That is unless my blue to red moment happened in early childhood. Or perhaps it was my teenage years, around the time my father died.

The story I can tell, is the story of Frank. Most would find it boring, or average, or even just normal. Not to say that normal is a bad thing. Normal is what we are. Like it or not, you are normal, so am I.

Most of my childhood memories take place at my grandmother's house. It seems I either spent a lot of time there, or that those were my only memorable memories. My earliest though, is of my father. I was about six. At the time my father worked as a laborer at the local Nickelsaver, a classified ad in newspaper form. He loaded ridiculously heavy paper rolls into printing machines when he wasn't maintaining and running them.

I went to visit him at work once. I remember feeling welcome with the office staff, all women. But my father, obvious even to me, was not. I don't think they liked the sweaty working type stinking up their air conditioned office. It was the first time I had seen the difference between men and women in the workplace. These days I'm one of those men dealing with the same type of office folk. It makes more sense to me now.

When I was around ten my parents divorced. Well, my mother divorced. My father didn't, till his dying breath he still loved my mother. I don't doubt that he loved his children more, but he didn't know what to do about it. He spent every moment he could with us. He taught me everything I know whether it be about life, love, hard work or simply perseverance. Without him, I simply would not be the man I am today.

I can’t tell you what my mother did for a living when I was just a lad. Truthfully it doesn’t matter to me. But I can tell you how she treated my father. Like a burden. What confused me as a child is how he always seemed to be a chore for her when he was the only one I ever saw doing something. I watched for years as a child, never understanding but always witnessing, as my father suffered at the hands of the woman he loved. My father always told me, if there was one thing that would make his life worthwhile, it would be if his children ended up better off than him.

I am better off than him.

He died of cancer at age 39. I was 15. I later found out he was not in fact my father.

I often wonder what makes a man love? I don’t think the question can be answered. What makes a man suffer so well for a child that is not his? Another unanswerable question. These thoughts only make me miss him more.

As a child I learned that there is no payoff from women. I didn’t have the specifics, or the wealth of knowledge contained in sites like AVFM. But it was obvious to me that marriage was a bad idea. So were children. It saddens me that I will never have children. They would not be mine to raise anyhow. It would not be up to me to make sure they ended up better off than me. And I trust no one to do it for me.

A few years ago I stumbled on AVFM, I don’t remember how. And the more I read, the more what I already knew became clearer. What I already knew now had words, reasons, articulated notions that made perfect sense. It was like coming home. How I missed the home I never knew I had. I fuckin’ love you guys. Now I know Why I never married, why I wanted children but knew I would never have them. I know why I don’t trust women, why I stay clear of casual hook-ups yet stay at arms length in relationships as well. What you gave me was clarity, and I cannot thank you enough for that.

Like I said before, I consider myself more fortunate that most the folks here.

My name is Frank. I’m a thirty year old single white working class male with no children. I think it’s unfortunate that the only thing in that statement that will ever change is the age.

Stay strong and fight on. You guys and gals are true heroes, or at the very least what heroes should be.

MRM: It is not for the spineless

November 20, 2012 | by Tom Givens | Link | Original Link

As the Men's Movement grows, both in size and in social awareness, there has been a similar growth in the calls for moderation, for a publicly palatable presentation of men's issues. Nearly universally, these calls come from those who are new to the movement, or of a Socialist ideological bent. And there is good reason for this commonality, the same reason why following this approach is foolhardy.

Men are controlled in society primarily through the use of the stick, rather than the carrot. Anyone with a Y chromosome growing up in the political West is familiar with the concepts, if not particularly aware of them:

[unordered_list style="green-dot"]

- Get a good job, or you won't get a quality woman. Break your back every day to ensure she can sit on her ass if she chooses to, and do so while also taking on half of the household responsibilities. Don't even think about making less than last year. Man Up motherfucker!
- Your sexual desires are dirty, disgusting, sexist and Patriarchal. You should be ashamed of yourself for being attracted to a woman based on her looks. That's objectification! Your natural impulses are oppressive, evil, 'sick', or even violent, and they should be suppressed at all costs. You should never judge a woman for her sexuality or sexual history. Anything she chose to do was her right to do as a woman. If you ever engage in sexual activity that is not 100% enthusiastically consented to – in the Legal sense – then you are a dirty rapist scumbag. No, you do not get to know what 'consent in the Legal sense' actually means. Stop whining about 'fairness'. No one ever said life was fair. Now get back to twisting yourself in knots trying to live up to these expectations, or you'll never find True Happiness.
- Of course we provide extra incentive and help to designated groups. They start from a position of dis-empowerment and need a little more to make up for it. No, we don't apply this same principle in all cases, because some designated groups are more designated than others, if you know what I mean. Men, for example, and more specifically white men, make up almost all of the world's richest elite (we only count the elites that have a job title, but don't bother with that), so while there are some disadvantaged white males, as a group they still have privilege. So we can't help them – it wouldn't be fair. What's that? You think actual need is more important than serving political ends? What are you, some kind of sexist bigot?

I'm sure you get the picture. One thing that seems to be a common thread among these social narratives is the acceptance of men, by women, for sexual relations. That, in essence, is the stick being used to beat men with. And it's an obviously powerful one given that all the narratives outlined above, especially the Grand Kahuna narrative (female sex objects, male success objects), which is shamelessly hypocritical, yet widely supported.

This is cognitive dissonance on a massive scale, and in my view is akin to a deeply held and dogmatic religious belief shared by an overwhelming majority of a society, infecting nearly all of its power structures. So, how does one fight this sort of entity?

The key to winning this fight is a bit of guerrilla tactics, combined with a multi-pronged approach. And like any tactic designed around using the enemy's strength against them, our best approach is to make criticism of our goals an open admission of hypocrisy on theirs. In short, as is the case with nearly the best method of attacking them is to use their own projections against them.

[unordered_list style="arrow"]

- "Patriarchy Theory" is nothing more than women's dependency and chosen lack of agency projected onto men. Ditto for women's "oppression"
- "Rape Culture" is nothing more than women's narcissistic fantasy of sexual irresistibility projected onto men;
- "The Wage Gap" is women's collective frustration with their inability and/or unwillingness to compete in high paying professions, projected on to men;
- "The Glass Ceiling" is an imaginary barrier erected by women as an excuse to fail;
- "Hate Speech," is the ultimate feminist projection, rooted in their denial and inability to logically counter criticism and dissent;
- "Feminism" is infantilizing misogyny, an ideology that sees women as incompetent and weak, and assists them in targeting male scapegoats for their failures.

[/unordered_list]

Obviously, the minds that swallow feminist bullshit are damaged in some way, are they not? Or perhaps you think they are merely misinformed, and once they learn the truth they will fight for what's right?

There's a problem in this kind of thinking. Actually, two. First, women tend to get their 'facts' from what is called 'Social Proofing'. Basically, a popularity contest for ideas or actions. If a lot of other women like it, then it must be good.

The other problem is the male compulsion to please females. Rather, the distortion of the compulsion to attract females.

This leads to a startlingly simple to state strategy, sure to be far harder to implement than it may seem:

Make women feel 'unpopular', or 'unattractive', when engaging in undesired behaviors…but do it in a way that makes them want to fuck you. And anyone who knows anything about women will tell you, one naturally leads to the other. This is not "Game." It is sexual politics on a personal level.

I don't think I need to go into basic Sexual Marketplace ideas here, but it should be obvious that the Rebellious persona is a hell of a lot more compelling than the Conciliator persona. All feminist babble and bullshit aside, 'damn the torpedoes' attitude is far more attractive to women than a soft, respectful tone will ever be. And any woman will tell you, when a man asks for permission he loses her respect to some degree, when he 'takes charge', on the other hand….

Regardless, any examination of the history of the men's movement should, by now, reveal two things to you. One, moderation is patently ineffective. Two, aggressive and uncompromising and corrective assertion of the truth, with total indifference to who it offends, works.

It works so well that they have started to foster their own undoing with violence in the street. We need to stay directly in their faces, and disabuse ourselves of the myth that a lot of women are not turned on by it. For a lot of them, it soaks their panties. You don't have to even care about that to find it useful.

The forgotten victims of family violence

Each year in Australia 39 men are killed in domestic homicides. Another 43,700 men experience physical assault from a current partner, previous partner, girlfriend, boyfriend or date.

"Each night when she came from work I would be tense and nervous. I didn't know in what way she was going to abuse me," says Matthew, a man who was regularly abused by his partner in his own home.

This Friday the annual Walk Against Family Violence is to take place in Melbourne culminating in the Not 1 More rally in Federation Square. This event will remember the victims and survivors of family violence, and celebrate our commitment to creating a world without violence.

But the only victims of family violence recognized by the walk and rally, supported by the Victorian Government, are women and children. None of the names to be read out at the Federation Square ceremony on Friday are those of men killed by their partner or another member of their household.

"Anyone would think the reason is that male victims of family violence don't exist or are few in number," says Senior Researcher for the One in Three Campaign, Greg Andresen. "The Not 1 More website lists the annual deaths from family violence as 60 women and 20 children."

"This is a distorted perception of the true picture of family violence. One third of adult domestic homicides are men. One third of victims of domestic assault are male," he says. "Forty five per cent of family-related child homicide incidents involve female perpetrators."

The One in Three Campaign also provides the following sobering statistics:

- Young people aged 12 to 20 are just as likely to have seen their mother/step-mother hitting their father/step-father as the reverse
- One third of patients presenting with injuries from family violence at Victorian hospitals are male
- Calls to Victims of Crime Helplines in Victoria by male clients increased 300% between 2009 and 2010.

In August the NSW Government Legislative Council's Standing Committee on Social Issues released their report on domestic violence trends and issues in NSW. The report found that male victims have been much less visible and able to access supports than should be the case and that the experience of males is equally as bad as that of other victims.

Mr Andresen says, “Let us remember the tragic deaths from family violence and continue to shine a spotlight upon the ongoing abuse behind closed doors. We call upon the rally organisers to remember all victims of family violence. Abused men like Matthew and the families and friends of the men killed each year deserve nothing less. Everyone deserves protection from violence and abuse regardless of their age, race, religion, sexuality or gender.”

Becoming ambient

November 21, 2012 | by Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) | Link | Original Link

I would like to address a recent video by Barbarosssaaa in which he talks about hypergamy. Barbarosssaaa's video was prompted by certain remarks I made during my guest appearance on AVfM radio. I make my present statement not simply to clear up misunderstandings, but because the topic in question has importance in its own right. It is a conversation that needs to happen, and right now seems a likely time.

My remarks on AVfM triggered a flurry of reaction, generally negative, among MGTOW types in particular. My words evidently touched a nerve — a nerve I didn't rightly know was there. And it caught me by surprise. At a certain point in the interview, hypergamy cropped up as an offshoot of a larger topic. And I briefly mused that hypergamy should go onto the back burner in terms of what the general public hears people like us talking about. This was an off-the-cuff remark, a passing remark, and the conversation quickly moved right along.

For me, it was an off-the-cuff remark. But for some people, it was a matter of weighty import. It appears that I touched upon something mighty close to the center of their discourse, that my speech was loaded in a way I didn't realize.

So I reckon the best plan is to hit the reset button. Therefore, to all concerned, I say this: Talk about hypergamy, talk about Briffault's law, talk about evolutionary psychology, talk about reproductive strategies, talk about the mercenary nature of women, and all that sort of thing, to your heart's content. Go to town! Talk a blue streak! Knock yourselves out! And don't let me stand in your way for one split second!

All right?

All right, I think we cleared that one up, didn't we? So let's move right along.

My statement at AVfM was a policy recommendation, directed first and foremost to myself, and secondarily to anybody who might share my way of thinking. There's no way in hell that the whole wide world will act upon Fidelbogen's recommendations, but there is at least a chance that a meaningful fraction will do so. And that's enough for me.

All right, now let's talk about hypergamy, Briffault's law, evolutionary psychology and so on.

In the end, this all boils down to a very simple question:

What is the primordial nature of woman?

Are women fundamentally mercenary creatures, governed by the imperatives of reproductive strategy? ARE they? Well, some would say they are and others would say otherwise. Yes, I grant you it's an important question, and if the truth can be found, we ought to find it. Intellectual honesty, and the spirit of science, demands no less.

And yet, for political purposes, this question does not interest me. My approach to all of this is ethical and philosophical. To me, hypergamy theory would have the value of a predictive model, something to filter and forestall female behaviors that might prove harmful. That indeed would be its purpose, if it has any purpose at all.

Now, I too wish to filter and forestall harmful human behaviors — which, needless to say, includes the female kind. However, my take on hypergamy, Briffault's law and all the rest of that, is purely agnostic. I declare no opinion on these matters, because I do not claim to know.

That's agnosticism for you!

So, when it comes time to filter out harmful female behaviors, I use a simpler method. Simply stated, I hold women morally accountable. And if they don't measure up, I filter them out. So, any harmful behavior that might arise from the dark workings of primitive programming, would be "cut off at the pass" by my system of ethical standards and security clearances. There is a word for this sort of thing: "civilization".

I should add that this would work for anybody — even if they secretly do believe in hypergamy et al. Just calibrate your tests and standards according to your theoretical model, without talking about your theoretical model.

But as for me, I'm agnostic. Hypergamy theory might or mightn't be true, but either way my bases are covered. I know exactly what I don't want in my life, so I make my calculations and set my filters accordingly. And once again, I do this simply by holding women morally accountable — just as I would hold MEN morally accountable. Equality, anybody?

And that is why I don't publicly talk about hypergamy and such. Because I don't need to. Nor do I need to self-censor. Every word out of my keyboard (or my mouth) is precisely what I honestly do think. At no point do I ever feel like I am biting my tongue. Nor do I walk on eggshells. I stomp them consistently, thank you very much, but I do insist that it's an art.

Now, there are well-considered politic reasons why a person might choose not to speak publicly about hypergamy and such. For starters, you are making it easy for people to call you a "misogynist" or whatnot. And do I personally give a snap if somebody calls me that? No, not personally. I've been called a misogynist plenty of times for no clear reason, and I've got a mighty thick skin for it.

But look, here's my game: I make it hard for them. I make them WORK for it. For the plain truth is that I never make anti-woman statements. I attack feminism savagely, ferociously. I call it a social cancer and all manner of bloody awful things, but I never say bad things about women.

That puts the feminists in a moral bind. "Misogynist" is the worst thing they can call anybody, and they want to call me that too, but in order to get away with it they must dig deep into their brains and be highly creative — which puts them in a mentally strained position. I force them to rationalize their words both to themselves and others, but I give them precious little raw material to work with, which taxes their sanity even as it erodes their credibility.

So in this way, little by little, I draw them onto thin ice. It becomes ever more difficult for them to justify their position, both outwardly to the world, and inwardly to themselves. And this drives them to increasingly desperate and silly outward behavior. In this way, they discredit themselves by making a public spectacle.

Now just picture such operations multiplied by the power of numbers and the strength of organization. I am constantly imagining such a thing; the thought almost never leaves me.

And is the juice worth the squeeze? Oh yes. The juice we can squeeze from them in this way is worth every precious drop. So that is why they mostly stay away from me — because they'd rather stay out of the wringer.

And what is more, any juice they could squeeze from me would not be worth their trouble. So the only ones who attack me are the fly-by commenters, the crap-and-run commandos, the ones who know they'll never sit in the cross-examination chair.

And yes, I am famous for getting onto the SPLC hate list, but the people who posted that list are a tiny clique of intellectual cowards. They are NOT the general public, for the general public would never throw a second glance at somebody like me. Furthermore, the general public has no idea what the SPLC is up to, and the SPLC knows this, which is why it has the gumption to do what it does.

So in summary, I am not a hypergamy theorist because I want to focus on other issues, because I want to take a philosophical-ethical approach to the problem, because I want to take a political-pragmatic approach to the problem, and because I want to project a separate identity and a separate brand. I would like to discuss the final item on that list.

I think it would be good for us if we were not monolithically branded as hypergamy theorists. That was the spirit in which I made my controversial remarks on AVfM, and if I'd had more time I would have delved into it.

If we are to be monolithically branded at all, let this be only in the sense that we are pro-male and not feminist. That's it. These two things will group us as a political community just as far as we need to be grouped, but no farther. Beyond that, we should split into separate groups that will register separately on the world's awareness.

What's killing us right now is our lack of message clarity, arising from our lack of signal differentiation. Two or three months ago, I compared us to an untuned orchestra with no conductor and no common music. I suggested that we are transmitting a bloody lot of dreadful noise which the general public cannot be expected to understand. And so I concluded that the general public has "understood" us in a false, chaotic way which sets us back.

We are transmitting so many signals from a confined space, that the result is nothing but noise. I propose therefore that the orchestra must break up into many different quartets and combos. These new groups must leave the narrow concert hall and disperse through the big broad city where each can set up on its own corner, play its own music, and attract its own crowd.

That doesn't mean we are quarreling with each other. It means that we want to establish the purity of our separate messages, with enough distance so they don't run together into a slurry. That is why we spread out into the big broad city. In this way we become not a "movement" in the customary sense, but a social organism, or if you will, a social environment. That is what it means to "go ambient". Rather than being a point on the terrain which the public can point a finger at, we become the terrain itself by spreading ourselves all over it — and you cannot point your finger at a terrain because you cannot point it everywhere at once.

Speaking for myself, I know I don't want to be stuffed into the same bag with a bunch of people who talk about things which I, myself, don't talk about. It's not that I oppose what they are saying. Maybe I do, or maybe I don't, but the point is that I am SILENT about those things — or nearly so — for reasons of strategy.

So I'd rather my own message didn't get lost in the general buzzcloud of other messages, and I know that other messengers would feel likewise if they gave it some thought. Yes, I believe it is in the interest of all to establish signal differentiation — because different people with different strategies should attack the problem from different directions.

So in the end, we must force the general public to recognize our diversity, and stop thinking of us as a point source or a target. In this way we spread out and merge with their world. That is, we go ambient. And we make clear that separation between us and them is artificial — that we ARE them, and they ARE us — flesh of our flesh, blood of our blood — and that feminism is something radically separate from all of us. And so the binary of non-feminist v. feminist will settle into place as a foundational pattern of life, and feminism will be isolated and pushed to the margins.

To encourage that future, I would make many pathways available to the many publics. Since a lot of people, men and women both, don't wish to hear that they are driven by primitive biology, I will indulge their sense of lofty morality or appeal to their fear of consequences. Meanwhile, Barbaarosssaaa and others of his school will administer their blunt medicine to all with the hardihood to listen. In the end nobody self-censors, and all roads lead to Rome.

As a parting thought, I note with interest that Barbarosssaaa declines to call himself a non-feminist. Well, since I am pretty sure that he would also decline to call himself a feminist, what does that leave? Yes Barbarosssaaa, it looks like you are a non-feminist whether you like it or not. Unless you prefer to be a feminist? Well no, I didn't think so.

But fear not. Non-feminism is a wide open frontier territory with room to spare for any non-feminist man or woman who wants to carve out a homestead. We are all non-feminists, after all. Or do we prefer to be feminists? Well no, I didn't think so.

Danielle Sandhu: Lies and violence at U of T

November 21, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

From the mission statement of A Voice for Men:

To promote the legal and nonviolent antagonism of all agents of misandry, from members of academe, to holders of public office, to law enforcement and other state functionaries, to popular bloggers and to corporate agents who promote misandry for profit.

As we have demonstrated over the years here, we take this specific part of our mission very seriously. There are many good reasons for this, primary among them is the fact that many of these hate driven ideologues think better of their activities when their true identities are put on display for the public to see.

We found this to be true with Simon and Schuster author Pamela O'Shaughnessy, who penned diatribes on targeted male eugenics at Radfem Hub under the pseudonym Vliet Tiptree. That nom de plume has all but disappeared from online writing as O'Shaughnessy was forced to assume other identities to keep her actions covert.

Another example was some of the women involved in a Swedish Production Company that was promoting the male targeted violence advocated by feminist murderess Valerie Solanas. We have reports that at least one of them became fearful of the public exposure and has changed her path away from the promotion of hatred and violence.

Another case involved Christine Armstrong, who works, or perhaps worked, for a battered women's shelter, The Lighthouse, in Robertsdale, Alabama. Armstrong, under a pseudonym, used to post at David Futrelle's blog, included the inference that yours truly fit the profile of a rapist. We tracked down her identity and posted it here are AVfM. She quickly disappeared from Futrelle's site. Futrelle himself forbid his readers to discuss her, and an examination of The Lighthouse's website no longer contains her name.

There have been other examples, like Creepy Bittergirl, exposed as Sasha Wiley by first Mykeru, and subsequently this website, who is now making the Watsonesque claims of internet bullying, seeking sympathy and support, like a damsel in distress, from other hate mongers.

I am sure you are getting the point. There are two general reactions to putting the light of public exposure on to these ideologues. I wish I had better clichés than light switches and cockroaches, but better to be clichéd than inaccurate.

But we cannot always count on the typical response. There are occasional examples of Periplaneta Americana that are light tolerant, and even seem to enjoy it, as well as the opportunity it presents to make them the recipient of male protection and coddling. One such specimen may be Danielle Sandhu, President of the University of Toronto Students' Union, who was promoting a violent, illegal protest against a presentation at that university by author Dr. Warren Farrell, claiming that he defends rape, incest and violence against children.

On her Tumblr page, she claims that she “has worked to lobby municipal, provincial and federal governments for access to high-quality, public services including education, transit, healthcare, and childcare for all members of the community.”

Well, all except half. All, except men and boys. And when that half of the population dares to assert needs and areas in need of amelioration, she launches a campaign of violence and false accusation in order to demonize that half of the population back to the sidelines, where she clearly thinks we belong.

This is the kind of bigot representing the students at the University of Toronto.

John the Other provides a treatment of her activity in this video.

Also, Dr. Warren Farrell addresses the protest in his own words in this interview.

As for what we do here, things have not changed. Another Marxist feminist bigot, Danielle Sandhu, has been identified and presented to the world in the light that most accurately shows her true colors. And henceforth her actions will be monitored and reported here, as well as to the growing numbers of MRAs that reside in the Toronto area.

Unlike the ideologues we expose on this site, we need not advocate or endorse violence. What is important here is to maintain record of these individuals the same way any concerned community would with pedophiles and other violent offenders. Tis better to have these individuals in a place where they can be watched, especially by young men who attend the University of Toronto, a school that has obviously lost its way on the meaning and spirit of equality.

AVfM Radio: the hormone of violence

[box icon=""]

Tonight on A Voice for Men Radio, we'll be talking about the hormone of violence. The thing that makes human beings violent, emotionally unstable, self serving deceivers, and prone to use force often through indirection. That thing responsible for the common knowledge that man are the cause of all war and conflict, and that obviously, if women ran the world, there would be no war.

Whoops, wasn't this show supposed to be about testosterone, which according to a number of recent scientific studies has the effect on human behavior of increased fairness, honesty and compassion?

So what is it that causes violence and aggression then?

Tonight on a vice for men, join Girl Writes What and John The Other as we discuss the hormone of aggression and violence.

New Posters for Fall fun

November 22, 2012 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

Greetings. Today in the United States we are celebrating Thanksgiving, which is traditionally, and effectively, a four day holiday. So if our friends outside the United States wonder why we seem so quiet here, now you know why. On a personal note, I would like to say I am very thankful today for all of you who make our activism possible.

Speaking of which, I would like to remind those of you who are in college especially to remember that college environments are supposed to be places where the free flow of discussion and ideas take place, but wherein quite often feminist ideologues–especially on campuses with a "Women's Studies" or "Gender Studies" departments–exert an ironfisted control over free discourse, demanding special privilege and consideration for themselves, pretending to speak for and represent all women, and treating men like patriarchal scum or useful idiots. If you're currently in university, this may not be a bad time to explore some of our posters and see if there are places you can (legally) put them up that may attract attention to both men and women who think there's something wrong with the way we talk about human rights issues, especially when it comes to men and boys.

We respect and are grateful to all who've made posters for our campaign, but of late Roger O. Thornhill from Down Under has been churning out a breathtaking array of just plain gorgeous posters lately. He keeps sending them to me and I keep saying "yes Roger I'll get them up, yes, I promise, yes, yes," and then I get distracted. Well now I'm fixing that. Here are no less than six sterling efforts by Roger:

Same old crazy batshit witch

Outdated feminism (an old boot)

Feminism not as useful as an old victrola

Feminism: same old broken record

Honeybadgers don't give a shit

Honeybadgers don't give a damn

Update!

Missed one! Here's a particularly comedic one!

Eek! A Mouse!

The first four are obviously meant to be provocative to the gender ideologues who most need challenging on college campuses. But may I suggest the last two (which are identical except for one word) may be appropriate in places where the only reaction you're seeking is curiosity? "Honeybadgers" are the informal nickname many of us have given to women who break the mold and refuse to kowtow to feminist ideology–or even conservative traditionalist ideology for that matter–who like and respect men for who and what they are and refuse to damsel and play victim in the world just because they're girls.

There is much debate in men's rights circles as to whether women in the movement can be trusted. My general answer to them is: women who damsel and insist on their own delicate sensibilities being respected when someone uses rough language or makes a generalization they don't like really are not trustworthy. Sorry ladies, but if that's who you are, then you aren't trustworthy. If you want to run with the boys, you don't demand that the boys change their rules just to comport to your comfort level. But if you actually give a damn about boys and men and their steadily deteriorating condition in the world where feminists treat this all like a zero-sum game, and you can get in there and mix it up in an argument without demanding special protection or privilege for yourself, I think I speak for the entire AVfM editorial staff when I say "welcome aboard, we want you and appreciate you." And if you know a woman who isn't going to damsel, isn't going to stamp her feet and have a hissy fit because someone somewhere made an intemperate remark about women, and who can engage effectively with others on these issues (like AVfM contributor Girl Writes What, whose work is now being picked up by a number of university professors for discussing in their classrooms), by all means when they ask you about the poster tell them about us. Or just let them check out the site on their own and decide for themselves what they think. If nothing else, useful discussion may ensue.

Anyway, whether you like these posters or prefer others, you'll find a large and growing collection of terrific efforts right here.

Happy Thanksgiving everyone!

Becoming rock ‘n’ roll

November 23, 2012 | by Stephen O'Brian | Link | Original Link

---

Fidelbogan wrote an article recently entitled, Becoming ambient. I voiced several objections which still stand. But there’s something deeper and musical I’ve had to burrow down into and now wish to express, which drives me to disagree so vehemently with becoming politically ‘ambient’ as he puts it when it comes to speaking about hypergamy.

am·bi·ent adjective

1. Being of the surrounding area or environment: The tape recorder picked up too many ambient noises. The temperature in the display case was 20° lower than the ambient temperature.

2. Completely surrounding; encompassing: the ambient air.

3. Creating a certain reaction or mood, often a subconscious one, by being wherever people tend to be: ambient advertising on a shopping cart.

4. Pertaining to or noting sounds that create a peaceful and relaxed atmosphere.

5. Pertaining to or noting close and constant social contact and communication fostered by the Internet or the use of digital devices: social-networking sites that enable ambient intimacy and awareness.

Rock ‘n’ Roll isn’t ambient like Brian Eno’s music. It’s the opposite.

Rock ‘n’ Roll isn’t background. Rock ‘n’ Roll is in your face, bombastic and unapologetic.

Rock ‘n’ Roll doesn’t hide or merge in.

In fact it actively seeks to stand out, to be heard and seen, boldly.

Rock ‘n’ Roll doesn’t censor itself or hold back words for fear of offending, but is often deliberately provocative.

Rock ‘n’ Roll doesn’t try to be sophisticated or overly intellectual, strategic and planned. It’s raw and unpretentious, spontaneous and some say primal.

Great Rock ‘n’ Roll has changed the cultural landscape time after time. Great Rock ‘n’ Roll speaks to every basic human emotion – longing and desire, sadness and loss, whimsy and madness; but not defeat and definitely not calm acceptance of the status quo.

If need be Rock ‘n’ Roll says fuck you and fuck your shit. Repeatedly.

Rock ‘n’ Roll is almost entirely quintessentially male.

 It is perhaps the greatest modern artistic and political melding of two potent cultural forces – Black African and Anglo-Celtic, fired in the kiln of 20th century America, lost and subjugated by commercial forces to retreat for a time, then found again, cherished, resurrected and polished by English musicians who re-imported it to the USA during the last great Western cultural revolution – the 60s. The rest, as they say, is history.

I'm thinking of some great rockers in their heyday – from Chuck Berry through to Johnny Rotten and Kurt Cobain, Jerry Lee Lewis through to Joey Ramone, Little Richard and Gene Vincent through to Frank Zappa, Marilynn Manson and Eminem.

Would any of them today balk at discussing any aspect of feminism, women, hypergamy, disposable niggerhood, alienation from family, culture, mainstream politics and nationhood that concerned them? I doubt it.

They all got through to masses of people with their message and changed things socially forever despite seemingly swimming against the prevailing cultural tide.

Chuck Berry said in effect, "Fuck you, I'm gonna play with white musicians and to white audiences AND I'm gonna whip up sexual frenzy, too".

Johnny Rotten said, "Fuck royalty and any class system of privilege."

Kurt Cobaine said, "It's better to burn out than fade away."

Jerry Lee Lewis said, "Screw you record companies. I'm gonna write my own songs."

Joey Ramone said "It's about being an individual and going against the grain, and standing up and saying 'This is who I am'."

Little Richard said "I don't think you have to be effeminate to be sensitive"

Gene Vinent said, "I'm a crack shot and I've won medals for shooting. But I don't think I could shoot a person."

Frank Zappa said, "Without deviation progress is not possible."

Marylyn Manson said, "My goal isn't to make money, it's to try and survive and make a point."

Eminem said, “You don’t get another chance. Life is no Nintendo game.”

It waxes and wanes in popularity somewhat as producers, artists and public connect and lose each other. Yet it remains, constantly present and widespread as it has done for 60 years now.

It is everywhere – on the radio and TV, in the malls and stadiums, on our smartphones and media players, in our schools and offices, clubs and parks. In millions of heads and hearts.

And here’s the thing.

Rock ‘n’ Roll is the ubiquitous background of all our lives.

Rock ‘n’ Roll is ambient.

EU’s feminist crusader never stops

November 23, 2012 | by Lucian Vâlsan | Link | Original Link

Viviane Reding, an obnoxious EU politician, has been on a crusade for enforcing EU-wide quotas in board-room and non-executive positions of at least 40% women in private companies.

In other words, she couldn’t care less that Europe (specially eurozone countries) is in recession and it’s heading rapidly towards generalized bankruptcy due to numerous regulations and failed policies applied by the Eurocracy. All she cares is the number of females in top positions. Needless to say, she never said a word about parity in lower positions.

As seen time and time again, it’s ok to have 98% men that work with toxic waste and building our highways but it’s not ok to have an overwhelming male majority in a company’s leadership.

A month ago, it seemed that the Eurocrats haven’t gone nuts altogether as her proposal was rejected on reasonable grounds like breaching economic freedom and the fact that it is not the EU’s business on what employers or shareholders get to promote to the board[1]. In fact, what happened in October was just a change in the language so it would seem less radical, less feminist and less unreasonable.

For those familiar with European politics, or with politics in general, it shouldn’t be any surprise that the European Socialist Party endorsed this measure, albeit Viviane Reading is part of the European Poplar Party which is suppose to be a right-wing pro-business party. The group leader of the Socialists said the following:

> It would be very sad and regrettable if the European commission were unable to present a strong proposal on promoting gender balance in the senior management of companies because of pressure from business and prejudice.

So, in their view, greedy capitalists and prejudiced people are the only ones that would oppose such a bill. The harsh economic climate of Europe actually had no place in this debate, unless it fitted the narrative. Corina Crețu, the vice-president of the Socialist group actually said:

> In the current financial and economic context, we have to make full use of our workforce and their skills.

Now, let’s get it clear: Nobody said that we shouldn’t make full use of our workforce, regardless of the economic context. It was said though, that it’s none of EU’s and other unelected bureaucrats’ business to dictate what people running companies have between their legs.

If she reads the articles provided below, nobody is actually talking about the fact that this proposal is inherently discriminatory. Why not have 10% quota of left-handed people in the board-rooms? After all, they represent 10% in the real world, so they should be 'represented' in high corporate level too, right? Or why not have a mandatory 20% quota of German speaking people? They do represent 20% of the EU population, so why not?

Of course, when you put it this way, it seems quite obvious that affirmative action of any kind is indeed state-sponsored discrimination.

But when it comes to women, Eurocrats have a European Court decision that was made 15 years ago that introduces a blatant double-standard in the legislation[2]. Of course, at that time, they said it will not affect private companies – but, of course, this is not the first time when an unelected Eurocrat lies to the public. After all, they tricked Britain into joining the EU with an incomplete question in the referendum.

One month later, however, this bill passed the European Commission and it will be mandatory soon enough[3]. Of course, officially, it still needs to pass the European Parliament, but no-one is actually expecting this bill to be rejected.

The EU's decision making process is just like the old USSR's process. In the USSR, we had the Politburo that had the sole right to propose legislation and the Supreme Soviet was just rubber stamping any decision that the Politburo made. In the EU, we have the European Commission which has the sole right to propose legislation and the European Parliament which just rubber stamps anything these unelected officials 'propose'.

Viviane Reding said after the bill passed[4]:

> The Commission's proposal will make sure that in the selection procedure for non-executive board members priority is given to female candidates – provided they are under-represented and equally qualified as their male counterparts.

If we were to replace 'female' with 'white straight Christian males' or with 'non-Jews', then everyone would scream rightfully: 'you fascist bigots!'. But somehow, this doesn't seem to apply when the law is not fascist in the racist sense, but rather in a gynocentric sense.

So, by December 31 2028 (or earlier, in 2020 or 2018 in some cases), our most important job creators must change their entire strategy because a feminist crusader and her fellow Orwellian Eurocrats said so.

This means that in some companies, almost all female employees will get to be in the boardrooms regardless of their competence. On the Socialist Party website it says:

> Companies with a workforce that has less than 10% women to be exempt.

This means, that a company that has 10% female employees (like construction companies or the companies that build highways), must still have at least 40% female members in the boardroom. This means that for the simple fact that the employee has a vagina, soon enough that employee will have a de facto competitive advantage by law.

Five years ago, this woman attempted (and succeeded) to cap telecommunications' companies profits[5] because she felt that her phone bill was too high.

So, for the moment: Vivian Reding 2 – Free market 0

Papering over inconvenient crime

November 24, 2012 | by Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) | Link | Original Link

According to the Executive Summary of the 2010 CDC National Intimate Partner Violence Survey Report[1]

Nearly 1 in 5 women (18.3%) and 1 in 71 men (1.4%) in the United States have been raped at some time in their lives, including completed forced penetration, attempted forced penetration, or alcohol/drug facilitated completed penetration.

> Regardless of the lifetime numbers, the more reliable previous year figures on tables 2.1 and 2.2 (pages 18 and 19) show rates of rape for women of 1.1% and rates of "made to penetrate" for men of…huh. Wouldn't you know it? 1.1%.

Unfortunately, lifetime stats are the least accurate, which is why reports like this almost always include previous 6 or 12 month figures.

From the full report's definitions:

Rape is defined as any completed or attempted unwanted vaginal (for women), oral, or anal penetration through the use of physical force such as being pinned or held down, or by the use of violence) or threats to physically harm and includes times when the victim was drunk, high, drugged, or passed out and unable to consent. Rape is separated into three types, completed forced penetration, attempted forced penetration, and completed alcohol or drug facilitated penetration.

Among women, rape includes vaginal, oral, or anal penetration by a male using his penis. It also includes vaginal or anal penetration by a male or female using their fingers or an object.

Among men, rape includes oral or anal penetration by a male using his penis. It also includes anal penetration by a male or female using their fingers or an object.

Being made to penetrate someone else includes times when the victim was made to, or there was an attempt to make them, sexually penetrate someone without the victim's consent because the victim was physically forced (such as being pinned or held down, or by the use of violence) or threatened with physical harm, or when the victim was drunk, high, drugged, or passed out and unable to consent.

Among women, this behavior reflects a female being made to orally penetrate another female's vagina or anus.

Among men, being made to penetrate someone else could have occurred in multiple ways: being made to vaginally penetrate a female using one's own penis; orally penetrating a female's vagina or anus; anally penetrating a male or female; or being made to receive oral sex from a male or female. It also includes female perpetrators attempting to force male victims to penetrate them, though it did not happen.

This is already problematic, since it lumps in both attempted and completed "forced/nonconsensual sex" by penetration of the victim (I use the quoted term, because both rape and being made to penetrate fall into that category and have basically identical definitions, yet the survey chose to apply two different terms), and then claims that 1 in 5 women and 1 in 71 men have been raped in their lifetimes.

Not the case. 1 in 5 women and 1 in 71 men reported having experienced completed or attempted rape, as the survey defined rape, in their lifetimes.

If they'd used an egalitarian definition of rape–that is, if they had included "made to penetrate" in their definition of rape, the lifetime numbers (less reliable than previous year ones, remember) would have been 1 in 5 women and 1 in 17 men experiencing completed or attempted rape.

Regardless of the lifetime numbers, the more reliable previous year figures on tables 2.1 and 2.2 (pages 18 and 19) show rates of rape for women of 1.1% and rates of "made to penetrate" for men of…huh. Wouldn't you know it? 1.1%.

A cluster of studies on gender and sexual violence show that women are about as likely as men to use aggressive strategies, including coercion, force, and drugs/alcohol, to get sex from unwilling partners. One study determined that 15% of female subjects had admitted having done so, or having attempted to do so, to get sex from an unwilling man. Other surveys and studies have found higher rates.

In addition, a number of studies on gender and perceptions of violent victimization indicate that men are more likely than women to forget or recontextualize as consensual sexual violence perpetrated against them (even in childhood), and that perceptions of the severity of female violence (by witnesses of both sexes) decreases over time. One study found that only 16% of men (compared with 64% of women) with a documented history of child sexual abuse reported it on a survey designed to capture victims of child sexual abuse. (Sorry, I don't have the link on hand, it was Ahola, et al.)

These two phenomena likely account for the much larger disparity between the previous 12 month and lifetime numbers for men who were "made to penetrate" than exists between the 12 month and lifetime numbers of rape for women. Extrapolating from the previous 12 month numbers, the lifetime rates for women should be slightly higher, but for men, they should be MUCH higher. Incidentally, 79% of men who were made to penetrate over their lifetimes (page 24) reported a single female perpetrator.

Men recontextualizing sexual violence against them (especially by women) as consensual complies with the cultural narrative of "men are (sexually) aggressive/women are (sexually) passive" as well as "men are perpetrators/women are victims".

That narrative is certainly evident in the figures the NISVS chose to highlight in their executive summary (the largest female victim/male perpetrator and smallest male victim/female perpetrator numbers), and which acts of sexual violence they chose to "recontextualize" as "something other than rape" in their survey definitions (that is, the most common form of rape suffered by men, primarily perpetrated by women, and for which there were NO reported female victims at all).

Rape together but pay separately

November 25, 2012 | by Lucian Vâlsan | Link | Original Link

Women get 40% lighter sentences in criminal courts in the US. But this figure is also valid in almost any European country, regardless whether we're talking about a EU member state or not.

In Romania, the Criminal Procedure Code explicitly states that female offenders that are serving a life sentence can get parole if they've served at least 20 years in prison and have a minimum age of 60, whilst male offenders in the same situation need to have a minimum age of 65.

This principle of gender equality with respect to the law only in terms of rights and not in terms of obligations and responsibilities is omnipresent throughout the Romanian jurisprudence.

The same principle of blatant misandry and no accountability applied last month in a case from Hunedoara following an ongoing instance of child abuse perpetrated by a male and a female.

The local press' article reads as follows[1]:

> The Hunedoara court has decided to issue a preemptive arrest warrant on the name of Alin Sav, the 27 year old man prosecuted for rape and producing child pornography. The man, alongside his wife that is also a defendant in this case, has corrupted a 13 year old minor with which they had sexual intercourse. The girl was then blackmailed not to press charges. The judges from the Hunedoara court have decided to issue a 29-days preemptive arrest warrant for Alin Vasile Sav whilst his wife, Cătălina Sav, will be prosecuted in a state of liberty because she has a 3 year old child that she needs to take care of.

In Romania (and in general in all countries that use the Roman jurisprudence) there is no institution of 'bail' and it's up to the judge whether the alleged offender awaits trial in prison or out and whether the offender poses a risk to society or not.

Apparently, there's nothing wrong with leaving a child rapist out near another child. Nobody in Romania (except me on my blog[2]) said anything or even lifted an eyebrow following this decision. If there were two men and one of them were to walk free because he has a child, everyone would have rightfully asked: 'What the hell are you doing?' because everyone could've seen that it is irrelevant whether the individual has a child. What's relevant is whether that individual broke the law.

I called this woman a child rapist because the article from the local press gets stranger. And it reads as follows:

> Initially, the minor was persuaded by the couple to have sexual intercourse with Cătălina Sav. These acts took place in a house owned > by the offenders on the country side. 'They promised the girl that they will make pornographic material that they will use to make a lot of money' said Victoriţa Povarnă, who is the prosecutor in this case. 'The girl bought their story as her family was in debt, but the couple then used the recording to blackmail the girl.' – added the prosecutor.

Therefore, the first act of statutory rape (or sexual perversion with a minor – as it's called in the Romanian Criminal Code) was committed by the female offender. Moreover, these videos are now in the hands of the Police, videos that depict Cătălina Sav and the 13 year old girl having sex.

Consequently, rationally speaking, there was a huge probable cause to put them both in jail awaiting trial. Furthermore, they have both been charged of exactly the same offenses.

But, somehow, when a female rapes a kid it's not 'THAT serious'. Moreover, the articles from the local press tells us at the end how much does Alin Sav risk to spend in prison but it doesn't tell us how much Cătălina Sav risks. Maybe the journalists are already aware that Cătălina Sav might not go to jail at all or, best case scenario, will get a 5 year sentence in a minimum security prison and will get out after 2.

There were numerous similar cases in Romania in the last 10 years and only one of them ended with the female offender serving equal time with the male offender. Basically, virtually every female rapist walks scott free regardless of evidence or the provisions of the Criminal Law.

It's been more than 29 days since that article in the local press was published. Alin Sav is still in jail and the trial was postponed whilst Cătălina Sav is still out there in the world. Albeit there is a video of her committing sexual perversion with a child, nobody questions whether she is indeed the appropriate person to take care of another child.

The Earth Mother is one selfish bitch

November 26, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

I must be cursed. For whatever reason, I was born with a visceral aversion to stupid, self-deluding crap. It is part of what makes me an MRA. It is also what makes me want to run a chainsaw through the endless piles of bullshit that some women pile up and feed from like hogs at a trough.

One of those piles of said bullshit was something I overheard recently in a coffee house conversation. One woman was telling another how much better the planet would be in the hands of women; how men have so much to learn about "going green." Then she proceeded to brag about how she put aluminum cans in a different trash container than leftover food. It was an inspiring conversation.

Women being men's environmental superiors is not a new concept. A search on women and the environment will take you to a garbage scow full of similar ideas.

I was reminded, as the two bobbleheads deepened their dunces diatribe, of the same baseless, cloying sentiments expressed by the "Conscious Men," who in their groveling homage to femininity video, titled "Dear Woman," opined, "I honor your deep connection to the earth."

Excuse me? Deep connection? To the earth? The earth we live on?

The fuck you say.

Let's take a look at western women's "deep connection" to the earth. I mean, outside the worldview of two latte lappers who were more likely than not completely clueless about how a single thing on the planet with a moving part works, including SUVs, one of which they climbed into after polishing off their caramel macchiatos.

First, and speaking of SUVs, the last time I checked fossil fuel was not produced for exclusively male consumption. In fact, I am pretty sure I see women living in lit homes full of appliances and driving around in gas guzzling Behemoths of vehicular overkill all the time. The malls here in Houston, designed as they are most everywhere else, almost exclusively for female shoppers, are full of them.

That is not to say that the parking lots at football games are made of row upon row of hybrids, but I can see well enough to know that men have nothing on women for fuel consumption except to the extent that a lot of women's transportation involves a man at the wheel of his car. Apparently, proxy pollution doesn't count.

Besides, we are just getting started here.

Let's consider those shiny little (and sometimes not so little) pieces of compressed carbon that are so beloved by women that they are considered a "girl's best friend."

But instead of focusing on the stones themselves let's think about the 4,000,000 men and boys that have died in diamond wars for the benefit of western female fashion. Let's think about the millions more that are displaced. And let's think about all the mutilated boys and the slave labor, and the fact that even to this day you cannot walk into a jeweler in the U.S. and be certain that you are not buying a diamond that was dug from the ground by a kidnapped boy working at gunpoint.

All for the sake of women's vanity and social prestige.

When men go for big ticket items to flaunt status, it tends to lean toward high end cars, maybe boats and planes if they are successful enough. Do those things leave a carbon footprint? Yeah, but they don't leave blood stains.

And, as it turns out, most people buying diamonds (which is mostly women or men buying them for women) don't give a shit.

In 2004, Amnesty International and Global Witness conducted a survey of 246 diamond retailers in 50 cities across 18 states. 83% of the stores reported that customers rarely or never inquire about conflict diamonds, and there were 110 stores that refused to take the survey.

We have a still robust market for making tiaras go all glittery, and the cost of it is written in unspeakable suffering and mass graves. I am sure the Earth Mother is beaming with pride. Or is that a diamond pendant she is wearing?

I wished it stopped with that, but it only starts. The following video is not one that I can recommend you to watch. In fact, I seriously warn you against it. If you are a person that has to watch something because someone suggested you don't then proceed carefully. I don't issue trigger warnings because someone uses a word that rhymes with rape. This video is genuinely horrible.

But it is another testament to women's fashion. It was filmed in China, where more than half of their fur exports are to the U.S. fashion industry. And yes, while some diamond wearing femme libs have spoken out against wearing animal fur, the simple fact remains that the demand for pelts from animals that are killed exclusively for their fur, and solely used for fashion, is an almost exclusively female domain.
Lots of men wear leather, but most all of it is from animals that are also killed as a food source. Men do not create a significant demand for the death of animals so they can be trendy.

If the Earth Mother is crying about this, I hope it makes her mascara run, because that is another problem. Cosmetic make up, another almost exclusively female consumer market, a product for which the only purpose is to enhance sexual attractiveness, has another not so environmentally warm and fuzzy side effect: The extreme torture of animals for testing purposes.

When a woman paints on that eye shadow, or enhances the color of her lips, or adds a little color to her cheeks to mimic sexual stimulation and availability, she is not only increasing her chances of attracting a man with a big fancy car that will buy her diamonds, she has already assisted in the abuse of animals.

And as with diamonds, in the end there is nothing more than lip service paid to the problem.

In doing the research for this article I came across from an online make-up consultant who decided to dabble in human decency. She penned precisely the kind of article I would have expected expressing her concerns about the horrors being suffered by animals so that some cosmetics could be tested for human use. But coming to the bloody meat of her position in the penultimate paragraph, she said:

> I agree that animal testing is wrong, however I don't feel that passionate enough to boycott all the brands that test on animals or even go out and protest. What are your opinions? Please share.

And if you will allow a lowly comment mine, the following exchange she had with a reader who commented on the article sealed the deal.

Cat Lady 2 September 2012 21:41

I'm also not a fan of animal testing. At one point I did go a little crazy about it and starting using Lush products. Now I think it's just me but they absolutely ruined me skin. It was awful. Even their body scrubs make me break out in hives.
So then I decided that I'd try Clinique. However, I can't find out whether they do test on animals or not? In a way I really don't want to be feeding companies that test on animals. But I also like having clear skin and nice make up :/

I think Clinique are okay, they don't test on animals to my knowledge but don't quote me, I might be wrong.

Lush have so much perfume in their stuff I am not surprised it ruined your skin!

I agree, i also want good skincare and nice makeup =/

In other words, despite the admittedly half ass, but still bullshit social consciousness posturing, the priority of "looking good" and being comfortable was all that really mattered. These women were not looking for a solution to the problem. They just wanted to tell people that they loved animals and look fabulous while doing it. When the looking fabulous part became compromised, the animals paid for it by being tortured.

These few areas I have covered are really just anecdotes; little microcosms of a much larger picture that does not get one bit prettier.

The thing that drives the bulk of pollution, wars, white collar criminality, cruelty to animals, human slavery and the like is consumerism. Consumerism, especially the market of unnecessary, embarrassingly vain and useless goods, is a woman's world. It is primarily the consumption of fashion, via cosmetics, plastic surgery, excessive clothing, jewelry and other vanity items. Women drive a world of pain and damage to the planet. And men, to their shame, do the heavy lifting to get it done.

I cannot think of a single item consumed by men en masse, with high social acceptance, that does not also have utilitarian value. e.g. leather items come from food source animals. Essentially it is not that much different from Native Americans using buffalo hide as well as the meat.

And many of the things men do consume that might appear on the surface to be excessive are things that women size up and measure them by in the process of sexual selection.

Most money is still earned by men. Most money is actually spent by and on women, mostly on consequence-ridden products whose only use is to bolster their egos. That is about as green as a fucking oil spill.

The sex driving the world's ridiculous over consumption, and therefore decimation of everything, is not men. In fact, women's level of over consumption is so outrageous that they cannot even maintain it with their own resources. It takes both sexes to feed the excessive appetite of the one. Where it concerns diamonds for engagement rings, we have even developed customs and formulas to guide men on what percentage of their yearly income should be used to make her finger sparkle with sufficient luminosity to enhance her social status.

If we wanted to save the environment, be less cruel to animals, have less wars, less slavery and less forced labor of children then the best first step we can take is to start raising girls to get over their vanity and their entitlement. We would also do well to teach our boys to assist in the process.

I don’t want any more Lip from you.

I don’t want any more Lip from you.

As my nieces enter their senior years at high school, I am becoming more apprehensive about the possibility that they may soon be entering a feminist-infested university. I can already see Betty McLellan extending a withered claw of welcome as she prepares to turn my engagingly elegant ballerinas into sour, hoodied creepybittergirls in the space of one semester.

How many times would I be able to turn down invitations to watch them compete in ‘Womyn in the Yartz’ slam poetry competitions without letting it slip that I would rather swap spit with Sheila Jeffreys – with Michael Flood looking on? In my desperate need to reassure myself that it was possible for a young woman to attend an Australian university without turning into an angry, pinch-faced crone, I began to do some research.

What I discovered was largely predictable, at least to AVFM regulars. On campuses throughout our parched continent, it’s raining rape: rape culture, date rape, rape apologists and rape enablers. However, there was at least one surprise. I discovered the existence of a large demographic, comprising modern, moderate feminists whom I shall call, Feminartsies.

A Femimartsy is a hip-hop-happening modern gal who eats out a lot. She’s in the seventh year of a three-year Creative Writing degree and really hoping to finish any year now. Her career goals include enjoying totally unreal hobbies and maybe getting a job one day doing something arty – and fun.

They are all feminists, of course, because they’re all tragically oppressed. Of course.

Ladies and gentleman, I give you Lip – an online magazine run out of Melbourne University by a student called Zoya Patel who takes pride in “modelling [sic] her life off B-grade 90′s film stars. Winona Ryder is her idol.”

Indeed.

Joining her are a gallery of stunningly maudlin twenty-somethings who describe themselves in what they must imagine to be fey and ironic witticisms:

Jess Barlow (Web Co-ordinator/Special Projects Manager): “…she loves being able to go to work in her pyjamas…”

Ruby Mahoney (Editorial Assistant): “[She] is writing a screenplay about vincibility and flying home in the winter.”

Erin Stewart (Literature Editor): “Erin is diplomatic yet emotional, insane yet sensible, a strict grammarian who likes to verbify nouns and split infinitives.”

Kaylia Payne (contributor): “she dreams of one day having a job where she doesn’t need to wear shoes to work.”

There is no harm – if you are lucky – in being young and silly. However, there is a great deal of harm in telling lies, promoting hypocrisy and advocating violence against men. It didn't take long to discover that Lip was full of it – in more ways than one. Here's an example:

"They're depressing statistics. After reading them, I get the urge to put on my pointiest high heels and go out and kick men. This wouldn't do much good but it would make me feel better." Coco McGrath, In Defense of Women only Literary Awards.

What statistics could possibly have prompted such an outpouring of violent gender-specific rage? They were statistics provided by some 'women's group' that included the fact that there are more male reviewers of books than female reviewers of books. No, really – that was it.

Of course, the moment I blogged an objection to Ms McGrath's promotion of violence, a white knight rode in to tell me that I was a "pugnacious and malicious individual" with a "deep pathological hatred of women." None of these women authors have ever stepped up to account for their bigotry because there is always some horny dude just chomping at the bit for a chance to impress the ladies. I have no doubt that this young hopeful was rewarded with yet another frustrating night alone with his tube of E-Z Glide.

When that doesn't work, why not try a bit of homophobia? Feminists just love to hear white knights accuse 'misogynists' of being fags who need "lavender-scented tissues" to dry their eyes. The editor actually expresses her total bewilderment to my response: "I can't find the homophobia of which you speak."

How about some hypocrisy? Editor-in-chief, Zoya Patel, hates the word 'feminazi'. Apparently, it is awful when people she calls "sexist" call her something in return.

Just awful.

"It's a term that people use when describing a woman who is an outspoken feminist, and is probably about to tell them something they don't want to hear (usually that they're sexist)."

Lip on-line magazine may be tarted up to appeal to the more fashion-conscious Feminartsy crowd, but it spouts the same misandry-drenched bigotry as the most radical feminist website. The fact that the blogroll on the sidebar boasts Bitch Magazine and Feministing should have been a giveaway.

As for my nieces, I am just going to have to make sure that I counter any attempt to indoctrinate them with as much logical advice and loving guidance I can muster. I'd better be up to the task, because the alternative would be absolutely unbearable.

Meanwhile, the search for those "nice feminists" continues…

Pankhurst: White Feather Day

November 27, 2012 | by Andy Thomas | Link | Original Link

On 12 November 2012, MRA London staged a protest at the Pankhurst Statue next to the Houses of Parliament in London in order to provide an alternative perspective on history.

This was not a protest against female suffrage—far from it. We believe in equality between men and women, equal rights and equal responsibilities. For a discussion and supporting video of this alternative perspective, see our recent article on this.

In brief, the event was intended to raise awareness of the following historical truths…

- At the time Pankhurst was actively campaigning, most men did not have the vote—only wealthy men with property did. Nearly a million British men died in the trenches of the First World War, many millions more were maimed and disfigured. The overwhelming majority of these did not have the vote, yet we no-longer seem to feel that this is relevant.
- Emmeline and her daughter, Christabel Pankhurst, demanded the vote not for all, not even for all women, but only for wealthy women such as themselves.
- The campaign of intimidation, violence and arson they waged is glorified by the establishment today—nothing less than crass hypocrisy and should be seen as such.
- At the time, there was widespread opposition to the suffragettes because of their use of arson and violence, and because the working classes were excluded from their proposals.
- And finally, the suffragettes were among those who handed white feathers to males not in uniform, including teenage boys as young as 16, to coerce them into enlisting in war that would kill millions. This has been quietly forgotten.

At the time, another Pankhurst daughter, Sylvia, wrote in her chronicle…

> "Mrs. Pankhurst toured the country, making recruiting speeches. Her supporters handed the white feather to every young man they encountered wearing civilian dress, and bobbed up at Hyde Park meetings with placards: "Intern Them All."

Shame on you Mrs. Pankhurst! We'd like to propose that the 12th of November become known as White Feather Day.

18 wheels, a million white knights

I learned a lot about the behaviors and motivations of men and women as a counselor. But I actually learned more about the sexes in the few years I spent in the blue collar world of truck driving.

It's a difficult job. And being the slightly half-baked sucker for a challenge that I am I elected to specialize in heavy haul operations, dragging the components needed for drilling rigs from Houston into the mountains of Colorado and Wyoming. There is something about driving loads that exceed 100 feet in length, that weigh more than 100,000 pounds through mountain switchbacks and down miles of winding 10% grades that will make you get in touch with your inner masculine, whether you want to or not.

I have heard that about 15% of truck drivers are women. My guess is that among heavy haulers, less than 1% are women. Personally, I never saw one. Not that I am complaining.

Another thing about driving heavy haul, and other "over the road" trucking, is that when you are not on a job you spend a lot of time waiting for one. It could be hours or days before you have something to do. Most of that time is spent in truck stops.

And if there were ever a place on earth where the fundamentals of men and women are on clear display, sans the socially engineered façades typical to the white collar world, it is the American Truck Stop.

Those truck stops are dense concentrations of isolated men (and women) who primarily talk to each other on CB radios. Go in to any one of them at any time of day or night and you will likely hear a cacophony of different conversations, all taking place at once. For most people it takes time to train their ears to sort out what is going on. To the uninitiated it just sounds like a hopelessly garbled mess.

Now, to help you understand the dynamics of this particular sub culture, it requires me to make some observations about the women. I do so not to be cruel, but to give you an accurate picture of things; to help you get the right image in your mind of what is happening.

With very few exceptions, female truck drivers don't look much different than a lot of male truck drivers. Well, perhaps their beards are not quite as thick.

Sorry, I am sitting here trying to remember other physical qualities that made female truck drivers look different than male truck drivers. The only thing I can come up with is that some of them had breasts that actually protruded out further than their stomachs. Some of them. But of course, some of the men had similar physiques to that, so we are back to square one.

Anyway, the point here is that the typical female truck driver looked pretty much like you would expect, especially if you were expecting Andrea Dworkin in a greasy shirt and sweat pants.

But you would never know it from the behavior of the men.

An example. Experienced truck drivers know the main arteries of the interstate system like the back of their hand, but once they are in cities finding things can become a good bit more difficult. You will often hear drivers get on the radio asking for local directions. Sometimes they will get them, sometimes not. Sometimes a driver will ask every couple of minutes till he tires out, trying to get someone to answer him.

But let a woman get on the radio and ask for directions and suddenly every other driver out there is an atlas on wheels, and you won't be able to hear one of them clearly because they are all trying to talk to her at the same time.

Once her need for directions have been satisfied, you will almost without fail hear the obligatory attempt at CB courtship as a follow up. Some guy will happily chime into his microphone, "You sure do have a pretty voice."

Now, it makes no difference at all whether she sounded remotely female or like Jabba the Hutt, the observation that she has a pretty voice is a standard addition to the conversation. And, not to be outdone by the first silver tongued devil, another radio Casanova will try to up the ante.

"Yeah, you sure got a nice voice. I just love a woman with a nice voice!"

Again, it is perplexing. While some female truck drivers do have "nice voices," in that they are actually discernibly female, frequently their voices are as much a match for the men's as their physiques and facial hair.

This sort of 'circling of the vultures" around anything mimicking the feminine is standard industry fare in the world of trucking.

Another example. Truck drivers, especially new ones, have very, very hard lives. Most of them work as company drivers for large conglomerates that pay them like shit and work them like dogs. They are often broke, or living off pay advances from their employers just to remain fed and to stay in luxuries like cigarettes.

For many of them, there are times when the advances run out, along with food and everything else. They won't see another dime till they get dispatched on another trip. Often you will hear them on the radio, trying to sell items out of their truck; televisions, coolers, CB radios, DVD collections; anything to put something in their pocket and their stomach. Sometimes they make a quick sale. Often they get mocked, ridiculed and taunted. Frequently they are met with the same silence as when asking for directions.

I never heard a woman driver trying to sell things out of her truck. I'm not saying it doesn't happen, just that I never encountered it.

What I have heard on more than a few occasions is a woman get on the radio and make some noise about going inside the truck stop for a bite to eat. I have also heard that followed up by at least one, and often a slew of guys trying to scream over each other on the radio to offer to buy her that cheeseburger and fries.

Now, there are a handful of truck drivers out there that have done their best to stay ahead of the curve. They employ technology to give them a little advantage by using voice changing devices to alter the sound of their voice on the radio so that it sounds female.

That’s right, you need to find directions to that warehouse where you have to deliver? Just change your sex to the oppressed, put down female and other drivers will damn near fist-fight each other to help you out.

Want to know where the highway cops are? Most of the time, even as a man, someone will eventually tell you. But if you sound like a woman, your waiting time for a response will be cut to a New York Second.

Plus you will get compliments on how pretty your voice is.

It does not come cheap. You can have a CB expert tinker with your radio and add a voice changer, but they are not very good. Some guys, wanting the job done right, fork over the $300.00+ for an audio-vocal processor with “formant” and other controls.

Now imagine that, all you have to do to have all the information and assistance you could possibly want on the road is to sound like you have might have a vagina.

And all you have to do to experience the most abject in human indifference and callousness, is to sound like you don’t have one.

Ah, but how can this be? As my Other friend often says, we all live in a patriarchy.

Another women’s studies graduate

Another Women’s Studies Graduate: Sexiest like this SOB

Believe it or not, I periodically receive “hate mail” in the form of blog comments and emails from angry women and, to a lesser degree, whackadoodle men white knighting for Borderline women. Most of the time, I give these missives a cursory review and then file them into my Mixed Nuts folder.

However, every now and again, I receive very special comments that are, at the risk of being redundant, very speh-shull. For example, the following comment washed ashore yesterday afternoon. Let’s take a look!

[image]

My first thought was, “Ohhhhh, she’s trying to call me a sexist!”

My second thought was, “I wonder what Women’s Studies program ‘Tiffany’ is a graduate of and if she graduated Magna Cum Loony?”

Regardless of Tiffany’s alma mantra, I would like to see my new favorite feminist, Raven Moon Dragon, tackle the dangers of being a sexiest.

Happy Holidays, everyone!

AVfM Radio: Rape Fantasy

November 29, 2012 | by AVfM Radio | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]

We live in a society that exists in a very strange dichotomy where it concerns rape. On one hand it is a criminal offense that sometimes leaves lasting psychological damage to victims, regardless of their sex. On the other hand, for a great many women, likely even the majority, the fantasy of rape is a source of intense sexual arousal.

It is an area where the lines seem to blur and a split occurs, not in the social or legal arena, but between the mind and the body of woman being raped.

One psychotherapist, a victim of rape herself, reported that not only did she experience an orgasm during her rape, but that some of the clients also reported similar experiences.

What does this say about the human condition? Is sexual aggression hard wired into the species as a part of reproductive strategy? Is the rape "fantasy" just a deeply embedded remnant; an expression of the common sexual psyche of female humans?

It is a tough subject, but it is on for tonight on AVfM Radio. And tonight the show will be hosted by Girl Writes What and Paul Elam, teaming up together for the first time to take their shot at cracking this very tough nut.

The show starts at 8:00 PM Central Time, 9:00 PM Eastern. The call in number is 310-388-9709.

Time for goddess to woman up

November 29, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Ladies, and yes this one is written directly to women, I have some things to say to you.

But before starting, a preface of sorts. I have to talk about a fundamental problem first. Before we can communicate in way that will work, we first have to figure out a way to overcome a set of social rules that dictate I am not supposed to say things that upset you.

Men are not supposed to upset women. Husbands are not supposed to upset their wives. Politicians try vigilantly not to upset women voters (and even women non-voters). Advertisers tell you all the time about how much you deserve the best in life, which they are happy to provide.

Most men who are interested in you sexually are telling you what you want to hear all the time, which you know about and enjoy to one degree or another. The men who stay with you end up doing it to keep the peace.

As a man, I am not supposed to write things that upset or offend you, or it makes me a misogynist.

Because of all this and much more, it is a rigged game trying to work with you to solve problems in the first place. The rule is I can't fix a problem with you because I can't tell you the truth if it is uncomfortable for you. As long as I remember that, there is no problem.

There's not one shred of decency or sensibility about this kind of human arrangement, and you certainly must know that on some level.

I know the tone I use to write offends some women into quickly disengaging; women who might otherwise have given the information a second look. It is unfortunate, but the fact remains that the problems I just described are so ingrained, so ensconced in the culture, that the only way I know of to get people to pay attention to this stuff at all is the way I do it.

So, what I have to say is only going to appeal to deeply honest women who make it a habit to put on their big girl panties every day.

And by the way, I say I know what I do works because AVfM attracts support from educated, talented and brilliant women from all over the world. And I would wager my last dollar that all or most of them would tell you that this place is remarkable because it actually is an environment where women are treated as equals. No lip service, just action.

These are women that can hear women (and men) being critiqued, honestly and without sugar coating, and not internalize it, or, as we say in more plain English, make it about them.

I know, that was a lot of words without even getting to the meat of the article, but they might come in useful before this is over.

With that, ladies, what I really have to say to you is that your collective environmental values, the preponderance of what women find important as consumers, is a fucking joke. The overwhelming lot of you seriously need to wake up.

I recently penned an article, "The Earth Mother is One Selfish Bitch," in which I pointed out a few, very few, ways women's consumer habits damaged the environment, cause war, animal cruelty, slave labor and displacement.

Comments and emails pointed to other things I left out, like the horrendous polluting impact from make-up production, skin creams made with human foreskins and rampant shopping addiction.

Now I could go into quite a diatribe on those things, but at this point any more proofing of the fact that the modern female psyche is a consumer machine is beating a dead Gucci. And besides, it gets us no closer to calling on women to woman up and start acting like there is an actual living earth outside the walls of the mall, and their romanticized self-delusion that they are, as a class of human beings, ecologically sensitive.

That increased awareness would seem particularly important given that women ultimately control the human impact on the environment.

My research on this subject brought me into contact with something unusual; a feminist that I actually agreed with, and strongly, on a very significant point. Her name is Stacy Malkan, an ecofeminist. She had the following to say, and I cannot fault a word of it.

> Women absolutely have the power to control the nature of every consumer product on the market. So how are we going to do that? … We can marshal our power to give the chemical industry, the plastic industry, the beauty industries a make over. And the oil and war industries too. Until there are no more toxic chemicals in babies, until we create new economic systems that are compatible with life.

This is absolutely spot on. There is no exaggeration. It's actually understated. The truth in that first sentence is devastating and complete. "Women absolutely have the power to control the nature of every consumer product on the market."

Unless that is a lie, and it clearly isn't, that means whatever direction we take environmentally is directly in the hands of women.

This economy, this demand driven economy is controlled by women. As a group they possess the awesome power to decide much of what the industrialized world produces, and in what way that is accomplished. But collectively, the only thing they have put on the agenda is an ego feed.

Women do have the power to reshape the economy into one much more compatible with life, and less with war, pollution and human suffering. But even most women claiming environmental consciousness squander that power like trust fund babies while they play with crystals, chant, and then go fully participate in an economic system that is driven by their vanity and impulsive immaturity.

It is a system that produces many times more damage than it has to.

Some women, the Earth Mother types, also spend time adorning themselves in the patronizing remarks of other, profoundly less rational ecofeminists, like Vandana Shiva, who claims that “women have a special connection to the environment through their daily interactions with it that has been ignored.”

Yeah, so many aspects of women’s lives that have been ignored. That’s the ticket.

I have heard for fucking years how men have messed up the planet on our own, as though the oppression of women was the only thing keeping them from diving on the grenade to save the planet from our vile hands.

Please get out of my face with that Bullshit.

I know men. Most of them are happy with very basic things. Most want a decent, safe home, a nice ride, some electronics, a woman, and hopefully room in one of the closets for their clothes. Everything else is gravy, and most men don’t demand too much gravy out of life.

Women, on the other hand, run through absolutely obscene amounts of money on vanity and hoarding. Many a western man can tell you that he has to fight tooth and nail in his own home for any space to call his own because the placed is jam-packed with inconsequential bullshit that she rarely or never uses. And he will tell you the lack of space does not slow down the shopping.

Oh, and ladies, I know there are exceptions to this, but I think I will concentrate on the rule just a little longer. The reality that comes with that rule is that all that shit, that childish hoarding of meaningless relics from compulsive shopping comes at cost that exceeds what is on the price tag. The world is breathing, eating and drinking and dying in the toxic runoff from all of it.

It is time to check your privilege, women, and start acting responsibly with the power you collectively wield as this species’ primary consumer. Don’t just conveniently ignore the fact that having that power makes this shit your problem to fix.

I have been talking to men for years, encouraging them to stop enabling your incessant need to consume, and to refuse financial responsibility for your consumer habituation. I have told them to boycott diamonds and all other extravagant and vain indulgences of your desire. Some of them have listened to me. But a hell of a lot more of them will listen a lot more closely to you.

Take what Malkan said to heart, and reshape all those industries. Help us clean up the mess we have made tending to you. Learn to live with less. Don’t create a demand that poisons rivers and the air for the frivolity of putting on your morning face.

For pity sake grow up and get over your need to constantly consume.

And finally, for the first time in history, start showing us that feminism is actually producing the kind of women it has always promised; grown-ups that are equal to men and have something positive to give the world. Quit proving how much that feminism has failed at that promise.

Are you woman enough to do it?

Female Sexual Predators: Dean on HuffPo Live

The video of this show is now up at the bottom of the page for immediate viewing.PE

Apologies for the short update, but I wanted to alert everybody that I will be appearing today on this segment on female sex predators on Huffington Post Live at 5pm Eastern on Mike Sacks' show. Feel free to tune in. If you miss it live I am given to understand that the link will still work to see the recorded session afterward.

Some links people may find useful:

Cenk Uygur & The Young Turks pat a victim on the back, says the victim was asking for it. The case of Amie Lou Neely.

A victim who wasn't believed, a common trait, since most victims of female sex predators are not believed, even though female sexual predators are acknowledged to be at least 25% of the sex predator population and due to under-reporting 25% is almost certainly a low figure.

How sexual predation is considered a bonus when a boy is the victim of a woman.

Also see how female predators groom their victims.

A survey of multiple studies on the growth of female pedophaelia (note: much reason to believe that this "growth" isn't growth at all, just somebody finally deciding to start taking it seriously and really looking for it.)

A site that seeks to increase awareness of female sex predators.

The cultural siege on men which says that sexual predation is a predominantly male trait is continually eroding. And that's with good reason: because it's sexist rubbish.

Update 2: How could I forget to mention the men paying child support to their rapists?

GREAT SHOW. WATCH IT HERE

To Art Professor Pete Smith

December 1, 2012 | by The Cul-De-Sac Hero | Link | Original Link

Dear Art Professor Pete Smith,
Obviously, you are a better judge of silly than I am, because, well, you are an Art Professor. Moreover, you are the art professor overseeing the studio where the silliness pictured here passes as art and apparently earns credit toward an art degree of some sort at the Ontario College of Art and Design.
I have to admit, I didn't know who Olivia Benson was. At least your student who created this work is aware of her misandry, but I am not sure why she seems so proud of it. So, when you comment on my blog post about the things I saw in the window of your studio and wrote my arguments of as silly, I guess I am going to have to acquiesce to your authority, somewhat. It's true, I didn't spell stencil right and I guess that was silly. My only excuse is that I was a little tired when I posted. Well, that and the blogger spell check is kind of a joke. That is two excuses. Well also, I haven't owned a stencil set since grade 8 when I dropped visual art, but I digress.
I don't think rape, sexual assault, aggravated assault and genital mutilation are silly topics. I also don't think it is silly to incite violence upon a person or group of people. It is not silly to paint certain groups in a bad light because of their sex. That is just wrong. You shouldn't say that "nice guys" steal or "nice guys" murder or "nice guys" assault people or commit any other crimes. That is simply not true and it is also stereotyping.
In reality, "nice guys" don't do those things because they are not nice things. Bad people do bad things. Nice people who turn around and do bad things stop being nice, by definition. All of society is hurt when you denigrate a certain group of society like nice guys. It can make that group feel as though they are unwanted by society and lower their self-esteem. This has the terrible affect making them dislike society and drop out or even act out against it. They might stop being nice and that is not silly at all.

So, you must understand that when I walked by the window of the OCAD studio that you oversee at 205 Richmond Street and saw one of your student's works stating, "CAT CALLING IS PERMISSION FOR ME TO RIP OF YOUR DICK AND FEED IT TO YOU. OPEN WIDE ?." I certainly did not think that it was silly. I did not really know what to make of it. Was it a bad joke?
I did not even realize that this studio was part of a school. I thought it might be a private art studio. I tried to figure what kind of person would create such a display. I tried to give the person every benefit of the doubt and imagine a way that a good-hearted person could post this sign.
What if people were cat-calling her (assuming it is a she) from the window? I could imagine that happening and it would be rather upsetting to most people. But, looking at the posters on the wall, I felt that it could only be the work of an activist. Regardless of the bad feelings it can cause, I really don't think that a cat-call warrants sexual mutilation. I mean, ripping someone's penis off could very well leave him bleeding to death. That's some severe punishment for what amounts to a display of public rudeness.

[image]

The "Kill Your Rapist" poster was a little offside. I mean, rapists of both sexes are bad people and deserve to be punished, but your poster seems to implies that everyone has a rapist or should go get raped so they can kill him. I admit, I don't think I understand how it is supposed to prevent rape. It seems rather shocking at first – I feel that getting attention is the primary goal – but it kind of seems like an empty threat in the end. Do I have to apply and pay tuition to learn this or is there an essay available to explain the deep meaning behind this message?
Then, the next day a different poster appeared. It said "Nice Guys Rape". I wondered what that could mean, especially when it was displayed next to the "Kill Your Rapist" poster. I don't think that nice guys rape, as I explained earlier, because rape is not a nice thing. To call nice guys rapists is not only an oxymoron; it points to a deep seated hatred and animosity toward men in general.
At this point, I began to suspect that your student was using one of the conflated definitions of rape so common in feminist circles. I have often read feminist rants that speak about sexual assault and rape as if they are the same thing. They also use exaggerated statistics to make it seem as though rape is more common than it really is. Also, since this person seems to think that a man should have his genitalia mutilated for saying something wrong, I wonder what line she thinks needs to be crossed to justify murder. I feel like men are being unjustifiably backed into a corner.
I cannot stress enough how badly I feel for victims of rape. It is sad that human nature allows such sick things to take place. It is also sad that some people get away with it. Therefore, it is sadder still, in a way, when other people lie about it.
For activists to further their cause there is always a temptation to embellish. This ambiguous incentive is one of the reasons I have avoided calling myself an activist until now. You see, these posters compelled me to take action. Therefore thanks to your student, I have now become an activist. So, as a fellow activist, I'd like to discuss this calmly and openly.
I think that the enduring pain of rape can become overwhelming for the victims' lives. But, that rage is not the reality for the majority of society. It could very well be that the author or artists or whoever the persons who wrote these messages calls herself, identifies as a victim and projects her anger outward towards society.
This is not healthy.
If indeed she is a victim of rape, it is not due to some rape culture or patriarchy imposing its power over her. All I can say is that I hope she finds an outlet to channel her anger and pain in a way that leads to healing. If these posters are that outlet, then I say fine, let's just say that the cat calling poster was just pushing the boundaries a little too far. Testing the boundaries is necessary in order to learn where the boundaries are. This is a good learning experience and I hope the feedback helps. Frankly, I do not think that one person's internal pain gives one license to hurt or call for violence upon other people indiscriminately, even if feels cathartic.

[image]
Click to enlarge

Some of the other posters I mentioned are borderline hateful. At the very least, they suggest that a very dark, angry heart is behind them. I hope, gradually, the artist can move to a more positive space one day, whatever has caused her to be so angry.
The problem I see is one of scrutiny. You see, feminism, as a movement has a lot of good will from people supporting it. Females, in general, are looked upon in a positive light within our species and I find that it is more difficult to criticize a woman and, by extension, feminism. To be a girl or a woman is to enjoy a certain amount of protection from life's harsher realities.
Feminism has enjoyed a lot of shielding from critics because of political correctness, allowing the more outrageous ideas, arguments that would not survive serious criticism, to thrive. Any healthy philosophy has to welcome criticism to better shape its tenants. However, feminism has been protected by identity politics.
Whenever someone criticizes feminism, they are accused of hating women. Whenever someone criticizes theory about rape culture, they are accused of hating and hurting rape victims or being rape apologists. It was clear to me as soon as I saw the posters that the author has suffered from a lack of scrutiny. Your comments make it clear that you did not expect anyone to challenge them. It is just not acceptable to incite violence, regardless of our bad feelings or their cause.
Free from scrutiny, feminists are emboldened into thinking that their beliefs are unquestionable. This is why I believe that your student, and yourself since you supervise the studio, may have believed that the posters were not offensive and could be posted in public view. This is why I had to post the pictures of the display on my blog. See, most people don't understand the context of the messages and would have written them off as just another nutty radical and walked by. But, I am the Cul-de-sac Hero. I have the power of scrutiny.
When I use the Internet, that power is magnified indefinitely. I posted the pictures so that these messages could be scrutinized by a wide audience. This is how you found my post and commented that I was being silly. See, I welcome criticism. I was hoping for a little bit better criticism than you and your friends provided. But, I'll take what I get, even if it sounds like Graham Chapman from Monty Python. The "bat-shit crazy" part, is that your student's window display justifies the whole men's rights movement and shows that more work is needed to fight marginalization and demonization of men in our society.
If you continue to be an Art Professor and an arbiter of silly, I suggest that you steer your students toward the silly subjects. Puppies are silly. So are monkeys. I don't have any more suggestions, but of course, I am not an Art Professor of the silly studio at 205 Richmond Street in Toronto. If, on the other hand, you want the studio to be taken seriously outside the cushy environment of academia, I hope you begin to teach your students that words are serious and to use them with care.

Sincerely,
The Cul-De-Sac Hero
P.S. Before I go, I would like to offer some positive criticism, if I could. I like the poster that says “How Do You Protect Yourself At Night?” I get it now that I see it combined with the glittery baseball bat. I find this message empowering. It gives women control of their own safety.
This is a vast improvement over the standard message from feminists that “men can prevent rape.” While I have thought about it, there is not much I can do to stop other men from raping. Of course, all of my friends know that raping is not allowed under any circumstances. No one I know has ever been in a position to prevent a rape because none of my friends would ever rape. But, we can’t follow all women around to make sure that no men are raping them. It is just not feasible and, frankly, unsafe.
Mind you, I wouldn’t suggest arming yourself with a bat to feel safe. Walking through dangerous neighborhoods is rather dangerous, even when armed. Weapons like baseball bats can be taken away and used against you. It is still risky; however, any self-defense is better than no self-defense.

Stickers in shitters!

December 2, 2012 | by Shithouse Bandit | Link | Original Link

---

G'day blokes and sheilas. As you can see by the fact that my name is at the top and bottom of this page, I am the Shit'ouse Bandit. That does not mean I steal things out of shit houses. Matter-of-fact, I leave things in them, and not just what the regular bloke leaves in there when he pays a visit!
I am leaving a message for my mates in the Top End, (that's Queensland in Australia) and I'm telling them that their rights are, in fact, human rights, and I'm directing them to this website.
Now, I gave this shit'ouse business a lot of thought, and I came up with a bloody good list of reasons as to why stickers in shitters are a top-shelf idea.
So point your skull-globes[1] at this lot mate:
[unordered_list style="green-dot"]

- Stickers in male shitters wont be ripped down by female feminists;
- Shitters are places of respite for blokes to relax, gather thoughts, get refuge from a nagging missus and ankle-biters[2] (and of course places to murder a brown snake);
- It targets precisely the audience AVfM is attempting to help. Blokes in need of taking a load off;
- The public dunnies are cleaned only once per week see, so stickers will last at least that long – possibly longer as cleaners are so lazy they wouldn't work in an iron lung;
- Shitters are places where men actually stop and focus for a few minutes while they do their business (unlike on public lamp-posts that people walk past in a hurry);
- It's easy to paste stickers without being detected;
- Large numbers of blokes visit public restrooms.

[/unordered_list]
Now that is really the short list. I can think of a lot more reasons for gangs of shitter bandits to roam the Australian landscape on a Walkabout[3] in search of a shit'ouse or two that could use a little colourful sprucing up, if you know what I mean.
Enough of all that now. I want you to get a sample from a couple of nice shitters I recently visited. And I don't mind saying that the stencilled version was a Shit'ouse Bandit original. I'm hoping it meets your approval, same as the others, aye?

Author of “Dear Colleague Letter” steps down

December 3, 2012 | by Robert O'Hara | Link | Original Link

[box]Washington, Dec. 3 2012 (AVfM News) On Friday, November 30 Russlyn Ali, head of the U.S. Education Department’s Office for Civil Rights and author of the infamous “Dear Colleague Letter” stepped down from her post. The letter, otherwise known as the April 4th Directive, threatened withdraw of all Title IX funding to institutions that did not comply with a new set of guidelines concerning sexual harassment and sexual assault complaints which severely eroded due process protections for the accused party. There has not yet been any official announcement from the Department of Higher Education of her departure or who her successor will be.

The letter was met with a considerable amount of protest from groups like the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education, Stop Abusive and Violent Environments and the American Association of University Professors. It is not yet clear as to whether or not the reason for Ali’s departure from the OCR has anything to do with push-back from the Dear Colleague Letter. While it is not at all unusual for people heading government offices to step down after a four year term, there is, however every indication that directive made her very unpopular in the Higher Education community.

In an article published in the Cronicle of Higher Education, the premier trade publication for college and university administrators, the excesses of the OCR during her tenure were highlighted and author Erick Kelderman stated :

> To many in higher education, Ms. Ali became the unwelcome face of an agency aggressively extending its regulatory reach in enforcing federal rules against bullying, gender discrimination, and sexual harassment.

Education Week, another trade publication serving higher, primary and secondary education announced her intention to step down on Thursday of last week and also outlined her less than four year tenure there.

> For folks in districts, an inquiry from OCR is a dreaded occurrence, and, in the view of some, it became even more so in the nearly four years Ali has been in charge.

….wrote author Lesli Maxwell in the article announcing the development.

There is no doubt that throughout our education system the DE’s OCR has for long been seen as a heavy handed and intrusive entity and that its use of Title IX funding as a bullwhip to intimidate institutions into stepping in line with its often unpopular policies has been met with much resentment.

F.I.R.E’s Senior Vice President Robert Shibley issued a statement regarding Ali’s stepping down:

> While we wish Ms. Ali the best, we hope her successor will end OCR's silence regarding widespread concerns about the fundamental due process rights of students and faculty members.

F.I.R.E., the AAUP and SAVE have written multiple open letters to the OCR demanding that the directive be repealed but there was never any public response to their demands. The OCR has also failed to discuss publicly the directive and the issue has been ignored by all but a few media outlets, the most notable of which being the Wall Street Journal which published a critical commentary written by Peter Berkowitz last year.
As mentioned above, there is no indication to specific reasons for Ali stepping down, however, if it can be established that she is resigning in any part due to criticism of her April 4th 2011 directive then it will mark a milestone in this type of activism and a watershed moment for the improvement of the lives of male college students.
While there still is no official announcement on the DE website, Seth Galanter, who has been a deputy assistant secretary in OCR, has been promoted to replace Ali as acting assistant secretary.

Filler's sister speaks to the Bar Panel

December 3, 2012 | by Tatyana | Link | Original Link

Dear Grievance Panel,
Vladek Filler is my brother and he is a good, honest, and caring man who fought to protect his sons. He lived through domestic abuse, 5 ½ years of prosecutorial abuse, legal black mail, fraudulent convictions and false 21 day imprisonment. His reputation and good name has been ruined by criminal misconduct of prosecutor Mary Kellett.
I attended Mary Kellett's October 22-23 2012 disciplinary hearing and paid close attention to the testimony and the evidence in the case. I am writing to you because I am very concerned that attorney Kellett's serious and malicious misconduct, as alleged and painstakingly documented in Vladek Filler's 3 part Bar Complaint, has been omitted and even covered up from open discussion.
I urge this Grievance Commission to review Vladek Filler's entire 3 part Complaint with exhibits and consider the evidence of misconduct that has been admitted in to evidence by the Panel but not adequately addressed or argued. This admitted evidence must be given full weight to protect the public from Kellett's practice as a lawyer and a prosecutor. Given the available evidence of very serious misconduct a recommendation for mere reprimand or suspension would be grossly inadequate in protecting the administration of justice.
Many discovery records in Vladek's case which were denied, delayed, and withheld by Mary Kellett show that her office was fully aware from the beginning that Ligia Filler made numerous exculpatory admissions, even on recordings made at the DA office, that numerous felony rape charges brought by Kellett were unjustifiable making them "unprovable[i]".
Kellett went forward with multiple felony indictments while concealing and misrepresenting crucial evidence and admissions before the Grand Jury and numerous Judges to prosecute an innocent man. Even after the Law Court ruled against Kellett and after the Divorce Court ruled that evidence of spousal rape could not achieve preponderance given evidence to the contrary, Kellett still announced she would retry the case to meet a beyond a reasonable doubt standard.
The record of malicious misconduct and misrepresentation in light of incredible exculpatory evidence was detailed in Vladek's 3 part Bar Complaint and its exhibits which I strongly urge this Grievance Panel to carefully review and consider before condemning any more innocent people in Maine to such prosecutorial abuse.
At the disciplinary hearing, former Federal prosecutor George "Toby" Dilworth testified that he reviewed the trial record and found Kellett misled the jury, violated Judge Cuddy's Ruling, presented her own testimony and allegations not in evidence, and shifted the burden of proof on defense.
Dilworth testified "[Kellett] objected to the evidence of [the child custody dispute] and then used it at closing… She excluded it and now was using it as a sword." Dilworth then detailed what appears to be criminal misconduct by Mary Kellett of being fully aware of the importance of the police evidence she withheld which was "critical to defense". He stated "[this was] exculpatory information-statement of the victim of the rape.. this material must be turned over…even if the judge did not order Ellsworth American records this material should have been turned over [by Kellett]."

Defense attorney Daniel Pileggi testified "I was surprised that prosecutor in this case intervened [to order Officer Wilmot not to provide his report and Ligia Filler's statement]. I was frustrated, this was recoverable, it is clearly discoverable, and this information was directly related to the defense case. I did not understand why it was not provided." This was exculpatory evidence Kellett withheld to this day despite Pileggi specifically requesting Ligia Filler's statement[ii], despite Wilmot's report explicitly stating witness statements were collected and scanned, and despite Judge Anderson Ordering Kellett to turn this and other specifically requested material over to defense.
Kellett's claim to the panel that defense never request Ligia Filler's written statements was clearly false, as Daniel Pileggi's September 6, 2007 written request, subsequent requests, Motion for Discovery, and subpoena indicate. Kellett further claims that she instructed Officer Wilmot to withhold these subpoenaed exculpatory records from defense because she asserted it was her responsibility as a prosecutor to invoke a privilege on behalf of a private citizen, Ellsworth American's editor Stephen Fay, out of concern for his privacy.
At the February 15, 2008 hearing, as detailed in the Bar Complaint, Kellett also objected to, and asserted a privilege over release of Ligia Filler's exculpatory medical examination records even against Ligia Filler's own attempts to release those records (which yet another withheld discovery video tape later revealed[iii]). Kellett blocked medical records from release then proceeded to selectively use them to misrepresent her conduct and those records to Judge Cuddy and to the jury at trial. There appears to be a pattern of misconduct to suppress and misrepresent exculpatory evidence in order to punish an innocent man. Is evidence of such prosecutorial misconduct only worthy of a "reprimand"?
Former prosecutor George Toby Dilworth reviewed the trial transcript and the case record and testified that "[Prosecutor Mary Kellett was] Rule 16 non compliant. [Kellett acted to] 'Intentionally violate a rule of court.'…Bar Rule 3.6d…'advising someone at your direction not to comply.'…Bar Rules 3.7 criminology statistics…Bar Rules 3.2f4 and 3.1a are the real problems…Bar Rule 3.7e shifting burden…exclusion of evidence at closing is just as harmful to defendant and it's the last thing jury is hearing…Bar Rules 3.2f4, 3.2f7i…Facts are not in evidence Bar Rules 3.2f4 and 3.2."
Attorney Dilworth's testimony suggested that Mary Kellett engaged in intentional misconduct and violation of Court's ruling.
As with Ellsworth Police Officer Chad Wilmot, Kellett discussed with Gouldsboro Sergeant James Malloy, the specific police reports he was subpoenaed to produce to defense. In her response to the Bar Counsel she admitted to advising Malloy that he was not obligated to turn what was clearly discoverable records over to defense despite Malloy voluntarily offering to fax these records over to defense (per admitted April 2009 audio recording of Sgt. Malloy). Here Kellett, who was herself legally obligated to turn these same April 24, 2007 discovery reports over to defense was advising Sgt. James Malloy against providing these subpoenaed records to defense unless the Court compelled him to do so.

Attorney Daniel Pileggi repeatedly requested discovery from Kellett in writing and after 1 1/2 years and a Court Order, Kellett still refused to provide numerous records including Ligia Filler's recorded exculpatory statements made in 911 calls and video on April 24, 2007. In fact, Deputy Travis Willey clearly testified he had this video, previewed it, apparently possessed it even after trial and in the audio recorded phone conversation in May 2009 (5 months after trial) admitted that no one ordered him to produce anything to defense and that he could not comply with defense subpoenas without Kellett's permission.
Dan Pileggi testified that he eventually learned this court ordered video tape was destroyed which only happens when the prosecutor specifically does not instruct police to produce it. He further testified that he was never provided and never heard before the played 911 recordings of Ligia Filler which he would have used at trial. Pileggi requested these recordings as they should have been part of automatic discovery.
Judge Anderson even issued an Order for Mary Kellett to provide all these April 24, 2007 recordings of Ligia Filler but Kellett never provided these vital recordings which contained stunning admissions. The 911 recording obtained by Vladek after trial clearly showed Ligia Filler was willing to say just about anything to get police to help her regain custody of her son.
The 911 recordings featured Mrs. Filler's own grown daughter from another relationship admitting that she told her mother she was "crazy", that her mother failed to get custody of her brother because he wished to live with his father but that she was "waiting" to get his custody anyway by using criminal charges against his father. Expert witness attorney Dilworth testified "I find [the 911 audio tape] to be very important…All prosecutors save 911 tapes in domestic violence cases…[Vladek Filler's attorney] Daniel Pileggi certainly needed this [911 tape] for his defense."
If misrepresenting the facts and evidence, violating discovery rules, ordering police to withhold subpoenaed exculpatory evidence from defense, and violating a Court Order, are not prosecutorial crimes against an innocent man, then what is?
Does such misconduct only warrant a reprimand?
Is the prosecutorial assault on Vladek and his two son's liberty and reputation not worth prosecutor Mary Kellett's law license? Given the evidence cited in the Bar Complaint there are apparently dozens, if not more, victims of Mary Kellett's misconduct. Allowing Kellett to continue her law practice in light of available evidence of her intentional misconduct is in itself unethical abuse of her victims and the administration of justice.
According to Mary Kellett's own testimony before this Grievance Panel, she continues to maintain she did nothing wrong and if given a chance would do nothing differently in the future. Based on her own statements, would reprimand or suspension change her beliefs or her future conduct?
In June of 2012, while awaiting the scheduling of her own disciplinary hearing, Kellett prosecuted two more innocent men for sexual crimes[iv]. One of the prosecuted men was yet another father who was winning a custody dispute with his wife but was unjustifiably prosecuted for sexual misconduct. Kellett's prosecution had a direct effect on his divorce hearing.

Asked by the Bangor Daily News, Kellett stated that so long as she and her office believe the accuser then her office is obligated to prosecute the accused in order to address the complaints. Is that not an admission of ideology based misconduct and a violation of evidentiary threshold required by the Bar Rules for criminal prosecutions?
Mary Kellett continued to conduct and promote such prosecutions irrespective of the strength or weakness of the evidence or of her own pending disciplinary hearing.
Defense attorney Daniel Pileggi, based on his personal knowledge of Kellett's interference in the Fillers' DHHS child protection case, Guardian Ad Litem's investigation, and misrepresentation of evidence, as detailed in the admitted Bar Complaint, made a very profound statements on the admitted trial record that "the district attorney [Mary Kellett…] has taken sides in a custody dispute. [The State of Maine with all its power and authority represented by Mary Kellett] has ignored a doctor's testimony, the only doctor that we have. [The State represented by Kellett] has ignored a series of interviews with Ligia Filler in April 2007 that rose to the crescendo of child abuse – child abuse[!]" (Trial Transcript Page 458). Dan Pileggi openly suggested Mary Kellett abused her State prosecutorial power, ignored evidence of truth and of accuser's own exculpatory admissions, in favor of helping a female child abuser regain child custody from an innocent man.
Based on such evidence it appears prosecutor Mary Kellett willfully, despite medical evidence, DHHS and GAL findings, and accuser's own taped admissions brought false class A felony rape charges and withheld evidence of innocence to send an innocent man to prison in order to send his children to their child abusive mother.
Does a reprimand or a suspension hold Kellett to those higher standards given the nature and evidence of misconduct? The only just and ethical remedy is a recommendation for attorney Mary Kellett's disbarment. The Law Court will be required to review the evidence and make a final decision, but to allow Kellett to only be reprimanded given the admitted and available evidence would be unjust, unethical, and a failure of the Board's responsibility to protect the public.
According to a recent Center for Public integrity non partisan report,Maine is named the number 5 most corrupt state for failing to hold its public officials to ethical standards. As a prosecutor granted extraordinary power over people's lives, Mary Kellett is required by rules to be held to higher standards than private attorneys.
In July of 2012 the Maine Board of Overseers of the Bar reprimanded Machias attorney Jeffrey Davidson for making an inappropriate rape joke to a female police officer. The Board found that his use of the "word 'rape' in this setting was unsettling to [his acquaintance Lt. Mary Zidalis] as well as unprofessional and prejudicial to the administration of justice"[v]. If the use of the word "rape" in a joke was found to be prejudicial to administration of justice warranting a lawyers reprimand, then what is the appropriate penalty for prosecuting someone for 5 false counts of rape after withholding evidence of their innocence?
After advising numerous police officers to withhold subpoenaed evidence and refusing to comply with a court order for clearly relevant and exculpatory evidence? How does Mary Kellett's intentionally misleading, false, and deceptive statements to judges, the jury, and to the Law Court compare to other attorney's misconduct and prejudice to the administration of justice? How does prosecutor Mary Kellett's "disingenuous"[vi] and unapologetic stance before the Board of Overseers of the Bar reconcile her misconduct in seeking to punish an innocent man with up to 152 years in prison?

This kind of abuse of power and of citizens is the reason prosecutors like Mary Kellett must be held to higher standards as the law and ethics rules stipulate and demand the Grievance Panel to do. Laws, ethics codes, and the US Constitution are there to protect people's Rights and now this Grievance Panel has the duty and responsibility to stand up for those laws, those codes of conduct, and for our Constitution by recommending nothing less than attorney Mary Kellett's disbarment.

Above all other duties, the Bar Rules and Grievance Process are intended to protect the lives and rights of people from irreparable harm caused by the kind of misconduct of which attorney Mary Kellett is accused. No attorney is more worthy of disbarment than the one which maliciously betrays evidence of truth and violates rules to deprive people of their liberty, reputation, and Constitutional Rights.

The available evidence and testimony demonstrates that Mary Kellett knowingly and maliciously violated rules for her own philosophical and ideological reasons. That is what has been presented by Vladek Filler's complaint, supported by his testimony, and the testimony of former Federal Prosecutor George T. Dilworth, and defense attorney Daniel Pileggi.

I urge this Grievance Panel to step up to its ethical responsibility and do right by the people of Maine, by Vladek Filler, by his family, and by all the Maine prosecutors and attorneys who are now looking to the Board of Overseers of the Bar to unconditionally honor and enforce the same rules and codes of conduct which they are required to abide by.

[ii] Beginning onSeptember 6, 2007, defense attorney Daniel Pileggi began specifically requesting in writing the April 11, 2007 Police report and Ligia Filler's written statement. Weeks later he filed a discovery non compliance motion for these same reports and written statements. OnJune 3, 2008, Judge Anderson granted the motion for these and other records and recordings and Ordered Mary Kellett to provide them to defense which she did not.

[iii] Mary Kellett denied and withheld repeatedly requested May 25, 2007 video taped interview of Ligia Filler for a year until June 2008 when defense specifically proved to Kellett that her office made the video and again demanded a copy. The video revealed shocking exculpatory admissions by Ligia Filler proving Kellett knowingly obtained false indictments for rape, withheld medical evidence, and misrepresented facts to numerous judges.

Bourne kitchen's burn

December 3, 2012 | by Dr. F (Ian Williams) | Link | Original Link

---

I'm no rich bastard but I'm wealthy in other ways. In fact, those that know me on the other side of the monitor will tell you that I am one of those chaps who take an unusual delight and joy in the world around me in many ways. For free mind you.

A great pleasure of mine is to take a walk around my neighbourhood and take in the rush of life around me or its intriguing slowness. The soft fluffy gardens of the houses, the piquant smells of newly dropped eucalypt bark as it warms in the sun and the sounds of people going about their way doing as they do on their streets. There is another pretty suburb quite close to where I live, and it has all those things I mentioned just now and I am very glad I do not live there.

You see, if I took a walk along the streets of Clifton Hill my walk would be wrecked. Even if I avoided seeing that thing that wrecked my walk, it would still be wrecked in the same way you cannot relax in a hammock if you know that there's a big spider somewhere in the tree above you.

Unlike a spider, a great can of bug-spray won't "fix" the poster that Bourne's Kitchen's paid an advertising company to produce. It's a poster for mums to playfully tap their blokes on the arm and giggle, "It's you silly." It's a poster for a sassy on-the-go chick with pink patinerd chrome balls to whip her fist in the air as she drives past with a "You HONK go HONK girl! HONK-HONK." (It goes great with "Who let the Dogs out.")

My real problem is not with those folks with brains that have been air-brushed in, but with the little kid who tugs on the leg of the "dog" and says "Hey Dad. "Look up at the window. Is that you dad?"

One can only imagine how lonely dad must feel when asked such a question. Who does he talk to when he is another sheep dipped in a shame that only misandry gives? What makes it worse is that dad, more likely than not, will be shamed in a way without focus. Without any words he could ever hear, there is a curious dialogue in his mind. "There it is again, that unremitting throb of pain. It's louder this time."

There is nothing more divisive than a pain with no finish. It takes us from our families and our friends and it always isolates us in the end. Make no mistake about this, a pain that never breaks will always bring loneliness, and in a world where undiagnosed misandry slams as hail, men can be robbed forever and well beyond any poverty.

Back to the kid asking his dad about the misandric poster in Clifton Hill. Now under the circumstances it's a fair question and it needs to be answered, and if not by dad who has been thrown into this disgrace, then by BK who did not stall when their printer chugged and spat out this ~~massage~~, message. So I'll ask them because they can give the answer. To Bourne's Kitchen – Is the image of a simpering, ineffectual and lazy unshaved male the image you see as dad?

Pretty simple question you bet. I suspect the outcome will be just as it would be for someone at SETI. There will be no answer at all, or a very complex one. While we sit back and hear the static from the ether we can ask ourselves some questions that BK's marketing team missed on purr-pous.

After the viewing our poster of a woman roughing up her man-person-thing (MPT):
1 – "Would any MPT want go into your display kitchen?"
2 – "Why would a MPT want to leave your competitor?"
3 – "How does this appeal to the average MPT?"
4 – "Who does this appeal more to? the young MPT or the older MPT?"
5 – "Will this cause dissatisfaction with some valued customers?"
Those five questions (that absolutely must have been asked by the marketing team) I can answer with four, "I dunnos" and one Yes". Take a guess Bourne Kitchen where the outstanding answer is. If you still can't figure it out I suggest you think about it to the tune of, "One of these things is not like the other." while playing "I Spy" as a contingency plan.
Please know, that while the team in your dispatch office are fist-ramming cinnamon swirls in their gobs between Tetris and the out-tray, that many MPTs out there looking at your vertical slices of misandry are blushing not in shame but in anger. Catch up. You're supposed to be the ones telling us what we want, not us telling you what we don't want after you have produced it.
A question BKs marketing team did not ask is this,
"If a MPT is annoyed at our advertising campaign will they crack open their wallet inside our kitchen display or outside our kitchen display?"
Their website is a fruit salad of tastes and colours and it looks pretty good if you only flip by it. If you stay for more than eight seconds as I did you won't forget the double whammy of the bathroom. A picture of a toilet revolves on an image carousel and the words with it tell more about their business than any crapper my bum ever shook hands with. "Hurry. Become a V.I.P customer and get the royal treatment." That bit is for the blokes and this next bit lower down on the image is for their women customers, "Hurry. Become a V.I.P. Customer for a chance to win 1 of 10 Jurlique Body Pamper Packages."
I'm being sexist I admit. I mean who am I to make the assumption that blokes are not into pampering packages? (Come to think of it, I'm pretty pumped about a free voucher I got from the "Nail Wax and Polish While-You-Sip-From-A-Cocoanut" salon on my street.) I still do wonder about who BK is really targeting and why.
It seems to fit that their target sex is female. After all there is an image of a feisty woman giving a man an ultimation and damn! There I go again. I just made another sexist assumption. Please forgive me as I gave away my large plasma TV only three years ago and all those ~~missages~~ messages for women on the entertainment shows, and news segments, and magazine shows, and documentaries, and films, and advertisements, and community announcements are still with me. Let's face it, Women beating on men is hot because everyone says that women beating on men is hot.
Ok, so big deal. So what if BKs target demograph is women? That rhetorical question I'll answer anyway with a great big fat arsed:
"It matters when the collateral damage of your advertising campaign is the quiet shame felt by men who accidentally consume their images."
Alright, that's it for now. I'll step down from my soap box and use what's inside it for a long hot shower (not one of yours BK) before going to bed, but before I do I leave this last thought and it’s addressed to me and you who consume too much eye-and-ear filth. And as for the Bourke Kitchens out there who produce so little richness for a poor man’s world? You can read over the shoulders of the good men who have kept you in business for 25 years.

Dear Man,

I know that sometimes you hurt like hell as I do, and I know the mute button of life is your friend. The folk at Bourne Kitchen are not our enemy. Their poor ways come from the ignorance of the unkind and this is the face of our enemy, just as it is theirs also.

I say get back into the mind you love and close your front door from the outside. Now go for a walk with no iPod or phone and switch off life’s mute-button. Walk alone for a time and then maybe you might find, if just for a while, a solitude that no loneliness or the “Bourne Kitchens” of the world can ever reach..

Monday Morning Roundup

December 3, 2012 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

Something remarkable happened Friday afternoon. So remarkable we have to urge everyone at A Voice for Men to check this out and show some support for (believe it or not) the Huffington Post. Mike Sacks featured a half hour segment on male victims of female sexual predators, without any sneering, dismissal, marginalization, or attempts to change the subject to Bad Men and the Bad Things Men Do, or any attempt to change the subject to female victims (who do not deserve marginalization but are featured almost everywhere in popular culture already).

Featured in the discussion were Curtis St. John of MaleSurvivor.org, James Landrith, who published his own story on The Good Men Project (yes, we often give TGMP grief here, but kudos to them for publishing James' piece), and AVfM Managing Editor Dean Esmay. Yes, I have some ego in this, but I can't let it go, this is too important. This was a group of men talking like men about their experiences and not as weeping victims but in the more typical way men react to brutality inflicted on themselves, and yet still taken seriously by a major media outlet. We want to thank Huffington Post and Mike Sacks for sterling work here, and hope you encourage them to be brave enough to feature more stories like this. You can watch the video here:

…and we would encourage you to click here and leave HuffPo some positive feedback, hit "like," retweet, etc. to expose others to this and to encourage the HuffPo people and their advertisers to take men's issues seriously in this fashion. The story was on a Friday night, typically low in viewership. Well now let's surprise them with a Monday morning surge of interest, eh?

When you're done with that, we would also recommend reading Manufacturing Female Victimhood and Marginalizing Vulnerable Men by AVfM contributor Typhon Blue, and spreading that article around to help change the cultural zeitgeist on rape, helping people understand that female predators and male victims are far less rare than we are usually led to believe. You may also want to read Keith's Story, as well as check out a number of the links that were left in the chat session at HuffPo Live. Seriously, just clicking there to show your support will help send Huffington Post and other outlets that there is good reason to take men's issues more seriously. We are an audience and we do count.

In other news, we notice that our friends at A Voice for Boys are continuing to expand what they're doing with their site. Show them some love and pop over there.

Also, feeling like stirring up some shit? Check out a related project, Who Needs Feminism?. I've already submitted my picture, have you?

Meanwhile, other things you might have missed lately include:

AVfM Contributor Girl Writes What has a new video on the evil, pernicious threat of "Nice Guys." With a transcript! Check it out here.

Kitten-eating Men's Rights supervillain Paul Elam penned quite a piece recently on women and their supposed closer connection to nature that you might want to point out to anyone who tries to tell you that men cause most of our environmental damage.

Andybob, The Gay MRA from Australia (too bad “Australia” doesn’t rhyme with “Gay” and “MRA” but hey, we can pretend) returns with a look at violent thugs writing for a cutesy artsy girly magazine Down Under.
We missed White Feather Day, the day that commemorates how women used to shame men into dying for the vote, but don’t miss the White Feather Day observation writeup by Andy Man.
Speaking of female predators, our European News Director Lucian Vâlsan notes that Europeans are as soft on female rapists as Americans are.
In case you missed it, we have some awesome new posters you may want to check out and post in a few places where they just might be seen by people who give a damn about men and boys.
And while we’ve got other stories and video this week on the violent ~~Feminist~~Stalinist thugs at the University of Toronto, we’d be remiss in not reminding you about violent thug leader and liar Danielle Sandhu. She shouldn’t think we’ve forgotten her and her heel-clicking fascist sexist garbage-spewing. We haven’t. You shouldn’t either.
The One In Three project in Australia continues to make progress, by the way.
Once in a while a comment appears on A Voice for Men that makes us sit up and take notice. Dr. F did so recently with My Name Is Frank. If you didn’t read it, you should.
And finally, it’s worth remembering that The MRM is not for the spineless, because they’ll spew hate at us no matter what we say. Remember that the next time someone tells you our rhetoric is too harsh: for 40 years being polite just got us shoved aside. And they continue to lie about us without shame and with the most vile of false allegations. Remember that.

The curtain closes on justice

December 4, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

The last time I reported to you on events in Ellsworth, Maine and the bar proceedings against Mary Kellett on behalf of Vladek Filler I used the term "The fix is in."
Well, folks, the fix is in.
It is not that you need a crystal ball to see the rampant back slapping and corruption pervading the legal community in that part of the country. All you need to do is take a look at the major players in the case and their conduct toward Filler and each other.
Here is the cast in this cheesy, off Broadway production of Justice, Ellsworth Style.
First, there is ADA Mary Kellett, the sociopath prosecutor whose main interest in life is incarcerating anything in jeans.
There is her boss, played by District Attorney Carletta Bassano, who quietly administers a legally organized racket for the VAWA funded "no drop" prosecutions that Kellett pursues.
Then there is Paul Cavenaugh, cast as the First Assistant District Attorney for the office, errand boy and pinch hitter that steps in when Kellett's misconduct draws too much heat.
Next we have corrupt Judge Robert E. Murray, playing the role of the trial judge at the Filler rape and assault charades, whose main prop is a gavel that doubles as a rubber stamp.
We then meet the other characters in the final act of this three part play; an assortment of bit players. First there is J. Scott Davis, Bar Counsel (our pick for a plastic Tony) whose character pursues a case against Kellett for breaking every legal canon in existence, and for being a filthy scumbag in general.
Davis is "opposed" by Ronald Lupton, who is an Assistant State Attorney General sent down from the capital to safeguard Maine's reputation as one of the most politically corrupt states in the union.
And then there is the three member Bar Panel, whose names don't even rate being mentioned in the credits. They are more like props than players; mannequins set behind a desk; looking official but serving no real purpose because the outcome has already been determined.
The same can be said for every member of the local media "covering" the case.
As the curtain closes, and Mary Kellett gets her laughable slap on the wrist, most of the audience will yawn, file out of the theater in search of cheese covered wacky fries and something very, very strong to wash them down with.
At least, that is what we will be telling you in a few weeks when the Bar Panel issues its "ruling."
The play will be reviewed by Bill Trotter of the Bangor Daily News in the form of a "story," or "coverage" if you prefer, but "story" is really the better word.
How do I know all this? Well, because I have seen the script, of course. And I am going to share part of it with you today.
Bar Counsel J. Scott Davis' final written argument to the Bar Panel on Kellett's case, pleads for the swift justice of a reprimand against her. (That is Ellsworth-speak for "Good job, Mary, now go get those VAWA Bucks by fucking with some more innocent men!”)

He also sent at letter to Filler, dutifully explaining why the mountain of evidence against Kellett that he refused to address in the case would also not be included in his final arguments, and why he wasn’t going to allow Filler’s presentation of that evidence to be routed to the Bar Panel through his office.
The explanation ran something along the lines of ‘Well, I didn’t bring up all the really damning evidence against Kellett at the hearing, so why start now?’
I will give the production some points for creative presentation. It is a comedy in which almost no one laughs, and a tragedy in which almost no one cries. It is both phony and credible, deadly serious and a monstrous joke. It is at once surreal and concretely realistic, and it tells the story of the worst of our supposedly very best people, and the best of our supposedly very worst.
And when you read the story in the Bangor Daily News a few weeks from now about how Mary Kellett got a reprimand for her little misunderstanding, you will be able (if they allow comments) to link them back to this piece on AVFM, where we report the news before it happens.
When all is said and done, this is not just a low budget stage play, but a dog and pony show designed to keep the real circus of corruption and avarice alive. Its only real saving grace is that it has inspired some members of the audience to bring a surprise or two to the epilogue.
I’d say more, but I didn’t give a spoiler warning.

This is feminism

December 4, 2012 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

---

On November 16, 2012 – Dr. Warren Farrell spoke at a scheduled presentation at the University of Toronto, the name of the talk being Transforming the Boy Crisis.
It is not a secret that a now feminized education system is utterly failing boys and men. This is so well known that even feminists talk about it at length. Feminist commentator Hannah Rosin launched her own fame in 2010 by openly gloating about this, treating the increasing male marginalization with a distinct flavor of triumphalism.
In 2012, Obama, the American Feminist Head of State, announced in June "more women as a whole now graduate from college than men," The president added,

> This is a great accomplishment—not just for one sport or one college or even just for women but, for America. And this is what Title IX is all about.

It remains difficult to find a reading of this statement other than the purposeful exclusion and marginalization of men.
Dr. Farrell, a former member of the board of directors of the National Organization for Women in New York, correctly identifies the trend as a problem, and addressed it at his November talk at the University of Toronto. But not without opposition. None of this is new information, even to feminists, who still doggedly continue to claim they represent and strive for equality.
However, after years of study and criticism of this ideology and its proponents – with a learned expectation of nothing except lies, slander and violence by feminists, the exhibited behavior by the self identifying feminist protesters of Dr. Farrell's talk has been a revelation.
Obviously, Danielle Sandhu – the former president of the TSU Student Union has outed herself as a political conformist, opportunist and hate driven ideologue. After student feminists assaulted Toronto Police attending the event to protect ticket holders from assault by gender ideologues, Sandhu gave an on camera interview claiming Dr. Farrell supports, incest, rape and violence. These claims are so outlandish that they pale only in comparison to additional video of the same event. This footage shows a yet to be identified woman verbally harassing a young man, likely a student attending Dr. Farrell's presentation.
Her words, her facial expression and her body language provide a crystal clear demonstration of the established power, privilege, sadism and deep hatred underlying modern, mainstream feminism.

> You should be fucking ashamed of yourself. You're fucking scum. You are fucking scum. You fucking rape apologist, incest supporting, woman > hating fucking scum. You're fucking scum. Yeah, just another one.

The speaker of these extraordinary accusations turns her face upwards towards the young man being accused, and her face shows her physical pleasure and she studies the pain in her victim's eyes. She is flanked by Toronto Police, who despite being assaulted by other attending feminists, will protect her from any harm.

She knows the man she is excoriating is none of the things she describes. Her words are not truly intended accusations. Her words are intended as a scourge. Her body flexes as she repeatedly pronounces her target "fucking scum," punctuating her rhetoric by its cadence. Her total confidence is not bravery in the face of a malicious, violent sexual predator, it is the supreme confidence of a member of the social elite.

To hurl such abuse at individuals as vile as she is claiming would be physically dangerous – even in the immediate proximity of a phalanx of Toronto cops. She is in no danger, and it shows clearly in her posture. She is simply delighting in her power, her elevated and protected status, her conformism to popular ideology – and her ability to do harm in plain sight with no consequence.

She is her own generation's brown shirt, and she knows it.

The man she harasses is in clear and obvious pain. In his early 20's the violent condemnation from a superficially attractive young woman causes him pain he feels physically. This is clearly visible on his face. He is untermensch, and he knows it in his bones.

This event is not unique, of course. It is simply a recent and unusually clear exposition of the nature of the prevalent ideology of gender in our society. It is the same ideology taught in gender studies classes and funded by public money.

"You fucking rape apologist, incest supporting, woman hating fucking scum. You're fucking scum."

The only thing she really knows about the man she addresses with this torrent of abuse is that he is not what she claims, and that she can hurt him with impunity. She is clearly sadistic, unable and unwilling to recognize the humanity of anyone who does not slavishly and blindly agree with her own religion of hate.

In Vancouver, the same style of knowingly false rhetoric was tossed easily off by knife-armed feminist enforcers under the direction of Sasha Wiley Shaw, a politically active member of the British Columbia Teacher's Federation.

In Wiley Shaw's words to me: "Don't talk to me because you hate women." On my objection to her imputing a motive of malice to me, she immediately replied "I didn't say anything about you."

Except, of course, her 2 seconds earlier accusation of hatred of women, while her box-cutter armed enforcers removed posters which read in part: "You don't hate or fear women do you? Of course not, because you are a decent human being." This was followed by the poster's concluding statement that "men's rights are human rights."

When not actually torn down, those particular posters were, in several months of postering, stencilled with a monosyllabic spray-painted rebuttal.

Wrong.

And this is feminism.
Neither Whiley Shaw, nor Danielle Sandhu, nor the yet-to-be-identified Toronto feminist delighting in her malice have any belief in their own accusatory, vicious language. It is simply the most harm they can do in public. They are limited only by their own imagination and ability, not by any concept of what is true, or by a moral compass. Their belief in right through the power of brutality, threat, censure, and the truncheons carried by Sasha Wiley Shaw's praetorian guard are a crystal clear broadcast of the character of their ideology and goals.
Oh yeah, I know not all feminists are like that. I keep being told this, so it must be true. I just wonder, where are they, and why do I not hear them stridently denouncing this virulent conduct by their fellow ideologues?

Peering through the madness

December 4, 2012 | by Jim Muldoon | Link | Original Link

On Sunday, November 25, 2012 the Australian 60 minutes program examined the case of the Italian family that has been in the news in Australia for more than a year. Amazingly, the reporter Tara Brown did not jump on the present media bandwagon of regurgitating the mother's claims of abuse while ignoring her shenanigans in and out of court (60 Minutes, 2012).

For the first time ever a major news team actually spent more than five minutes looking for the story instead of sycophantically following the feminist agenda. What they showed was not so much that the father should be believed, but more that the mother and the other members of her family definitely should not.

The real difficulty of this story is that there is so much madness in it that you sound mad yourself. Those who have had a psychopath in their life will understand. My ex was one such nutbag.

Let me explain. Before the program went to air, the mother's mother took Channel Nine to court to stop the broadcast (Deery, 2012). She claims that she was harassed into the interview. The quote that got my attention was this:

> She [the grandmother] said after originally declining to take part in the segment the director had demanded a medical certificate from her doctor.

Now, for those of you who have not had a nutter in your life, your brain will do the same thing is does with optical illusions. It will read that sentence and try to somehow bend and twist it into the real world.

With the nutter in my life, this type of nonsensical statement was common. There was no truth in them. No such conversation actually took place. These were spur-of-the-moment digressions with two ulterior motives.

The first is camouflage. The answer to a simple question like, "Did you consent to the interview?" becomes a series of questions about medical doctors, certification, the legal powers of TV directors, and that's only the beginning. Try to follow any one of those threads and soon you'll be thrashing out what kind of medical conditions could actually prevent an otherwise willing adult from participating in a interview. And if that's not working for her she'll suddenly switch to Aunt Myrtle's dispute with the telephone company or some unrelated event in 1990.

Rational dialogue becomes impossible, and the truth shrivels and dies in a miasma of lies and illogical conclusions.

The second is that the conversation becomes so absurd that you'll stop asking questions. At that point you've just accepted that she was coerced into the interview.

Even if you shoot the logic down in a master display of perseverance, logic and memory there will always be others who lose track. At some point, usually much later and in response to the next set of camouflage, they'll pipe up, "But wasn't she forced to do the interview?" And around you go again.

The whole story is peppered with this madness. Consider this summary:
The mother, who could tell the Australian embassy of abuse, did not mention it in the Italian Family Courts. Instead she consented to shared custody.
But practically straight away she, and her mother in Australia, started telling the Australian Office of Foreign Affairs and the Australian embassy in Italy that the father was abusive and they had to get her out of Italy. This went on for three years.
For three years. No deaths, no hospitals, no doctors, no arrests, no charges, no witnesses. Nothing.
She claimed she went to the Italian police about the father. The Italian police say they have no record of any such complaints. The doctor, whom the mother claimed could testify that she had been abused, denied that she had any such information. The man whom she befriended, met in secret, kissed, but did not have an affair with, didn't come forward with any information.
And, of course, if you're not going to swallow any of that, she claims the father had known all along that they were going to live in Australia. He actually consented and then changed his mind.
It's not limited to the mother and grandmother either. Consider this summary of the Australian embassy staff's actions in Italy.
For three years, while this alleged abuse was continuing, the embassy staff saw no reason to involve the Italian authorities. They went twice to her home in Italy to check out her claims of poverty. Both times they found her claims to be false. Yet apparently that was no reason to doubt the claims of abuse.
They knew that she had duped the husband into signing for the children's passports, but still accepted the application. They never warned her of the ramifications of the Hague Convention. They also never warned him, even though they understood the criminality of the act.
The mother might have been surprised by the two year ordeal of courts and the children being forced to return to Italy, but the embassy staff would have known better.
It seems that they were relying on the ruse that, if he was dumb enough to sign the papers, then it's not the embassy's fault that they assisted in what turned out to be a crime.
If they believed her, how could the embassy think that leaving the children with the abuser for three years, having them go through an ordeal in a foreign country's courts, and then be dragged back to live with the abuser, was much better than reporting the matter to the Italian police.
If they didn't believe her, why didn't they report it to the police?
And if only the madness would stop there. As previously reported on AVfM, the reason for the nationwide hunt in Australia for the children was because the children's grandmother had threatened to murder them (Blueface, Grandma threatens to murder children, 2012).
Yes, the nice lady on the couch who kept interrupting but didn't want to participate in the interview. Yes, she who was forced to participate because she lacked the necessary medical certificates.

Despite this being the most sensational part of the story, not one word of this threat was publicised in the Australian media.
Consider, also, the Family Court sending a clear message to Australian mothers for many years that this type of behaviour will get results. Two recent examples of this are Summerby & Cadogen (Family Court of Australia, 2011) and Gaylard & Cain (Family Court of Australia, 2012).
In both cases it was crystal clear that no abuse took place; the courts issued orders that the children should see their father; and the mothers unreasonably refused to comply with these orders.
In both cases the courts subsequently made the mother's illegal behaviour legal by banning the father from their children's lives.
In Summerby & Cadogen the magistrate offers this non-explanation:

> It may be thought that the result arrived at demonstrates either an acceptance of the mother's position, or a surrender to her unreasonable refusal to permit a relationship between the child and her father. Neither of those conclusions is correct.

He goes on to say:

> The orders [which stopped the father from seeing his daughter] should not be seen as any vindication of the mother's actions.

It's a bit like listening to a more sophisticated version of the grandmother, isn't it?
In his world, it is purely coincidental that mother's plans to punish the father are completed by the court's decision. In his world, the mother who lied about the abuse won't see an un-vindicated verdict as a victory. In his world, the mother won't teach the child to hate the father because of this lack of vindication.
And in his world the next crazy won't use the same tactic because, although the father was punished, it lacked vindication.
How much this type of verdict influences the next crazy can be seen in Gaylard & Cain. The mother was warned by a psychic (and no, I did not misspell psychologist) that the father would abuse his daughter. With this logic she simply refused to let the father see his children, defying court orders time and time again. She got her way in the end.
In June this year I gave seven reasons why this case showed the Family Court is corrupt (Blueface, Altobelli's Dilemma: The Failure of Australian Family Law, 2012).
Yes, this was the case where the psychiatrist reckoned that the mother had a special distorted lens. This lens was only distorted when she looked at the father. In all other aspects her lens worked just fine. He reckoned that somehow this lens would repair all by itself if the court gave her the children and backed off.
And of course getting your own way to repair your distorted lenses is not the same as a surrender to your unreasonable position.
In this Italian case, the Australian courts hands were tied by the Hague Convention. Unless there was clear evidence of abuse the children had to go back. Nonetheless, they insisted that the father gave an undertaking that he would not pursue charges back in Italy before allowing the children to return.

That's right! The court that decided she behaved illegally didn't want the matter to go to court in Italy just in case they thought she behaved illegally. Because that, obviously, would be wrong.
In most cases like these the fathers back off. Sometimes it's the emotional pressure put on the kids. Sometimes it's the emotional pressure put on themselves. Sometimes it's the crippling legal costs. Mostly it's some combination of these. They then do the "noble" thing and walk away, knowing that their ex will use this as evidence to the children that he never really loved them.
The Australian media hoped this was the case when the Italian man returned to Italy in August this year before the final hearing.

> The Italian father embroiled in an international custody battle has left Australia after giving up hope he will win his legal fight to get his daughters back to Italy.

crowed the Sydney Morning Herald (Marriner, 2012). The report explains that the father faced, at that time, yet another hearing and yet another expert to examine the children. According to the paper:

> It is understood that the father has spent €120,000 ($142,000) on the custody fight and has been on unpaid leave from his job for months.

Given that the father now has his children the obvious conclusion is that the Sydney Morning Herald was at least buying if not peddling this dishonesty.
There can be little doubt that had this case been played out in Australia without the international dimension, the man would banned from seeing his children. For example, if she moved them from Melbourne to Brisbane, and played the exact same games she would have won, albeit un-vindicated.
The same father who now has his children at his home in Italy would be sitting on the court steps with his head in his hands wondering how this could have happened to him. Meanwhile, his children would be taught to hate him even more.
And that is exactly how this mother, her family, the Australian embassy, the Australian courts and the Australia media wanted it to end.
Madness.

To The University of Toronto Student's Union

December 5, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Dear University of Toronto Student's Union,
My name is Paul Elam. I am the founder and publisher of avoiceformen.com, and the founder of AVFM Radio.
I am here to issue you a promise, or depending on your preference, a warning.
Your recent campaign of lies, hatred and violence in response to Dr. Warren Farrell speaking about problems faced by men and boys is unacceptable in any decent society governed by the rule of law.
It is the intention of A Voice for Men, LLC, an organization promoting the basic rights of all human beings, to make this kind of destructive activity on your part as painful and consequence heavy as possible.
I recently watched the verbal and physical harassment of students who came to Dr. Farrell's talk to learn about problems like male suicide and male disenfranchisement in education. I watched as they were called scum and rape apologists and incest supporters by shrieking ideologues with spittle flying as they harassed and assaulted these students. Young men harassed for attempting to educate themselves about a very real Boy Crisis in this culture.
I watched as police were assaulted and mocked and ridiculed — called "pigs." I watched as doors were blocked, hateful slogans chanted and every possible attempt to censor made to prevent Dr. Farrell's speech and to undermine the freedom of students who wanted to hear him.
Rather than showing concern for this violence and hate, you followed up with more of the same. On your website, you cite avoiceformen.com as "Anti-woman," and incorrectly claim we editorially labelled one of your hateful ideologues as, "the personification of Princess Cupcake", "an utterly vile creature", and "Hitler's Barbie."

Seeking this undesirable's identity

Those statements were cherry-picked from reader's comments. While angry reactions like this are understandable following your outrageous conduct, they do not reflect the editorial position of AVFM, which is simply that the woman in question is hateful, abusive and a violent ideologue.

She is also the focus of ongoing inquiry, whose identity will be discovered and put on public display. Her conduct will follow her wherever she goes for the foreseeable future. She is not the only individual earning such inquiry and publication.

Like the early mission of the SPLC in opposition to racism, AVfM's mandate includes identifying and exposing agents of hate, violence and bigotry, and all who threaten the peaceful and legally protected exchange of ideas.

We are not interested in the peace of mind, or in protecting the public image of offending individuals and organizations.

Since you at the University of Toronto Student's Union have elected to follow a path of hatred, violence, censorship and sexism, your members and governing staff now demand inclusion in our efforts to address the serious social pathology of sexual hatred.

By operating a hate group under the banner of a Student Union, you present a virulent threat to the free exchange of ideas, and indeed to every student at the University of Toronto.

The time when such activity is conducted without challenge is over.

We are beginning with the activist bullying and piling hatred and lies on a student for attempting to hear Dr. Farrell's talk. We have her image and know her general location. We will identify her and profile her activity and name for public view.

We will not stop there, or just with her. And while we will not publish our complete intent, we are dogged in our efforts.

I wish we could make allowance, or offer sympathy for your distorted views. We cannot, and will not. We have no more sympathy for your agenda of hatred and exclusion than for a plantation owner's rationale in the Antebellum South for justified ownership of another human being.

Also, we will never undermine your right to free speech. But when you attempt to silence others, as you did with Dr. Farrell, we will act.

Men and boys are human beings, worthy of rights, worthy of academic investment and interest. They are human beings who deserve ameliorative help when their circumstances dictate that is necessary. They do not need permission or approval from anti-male ideologues. You are not the arbiters of who deserves human rights, or who does not.

We will no longer tolerate the activities of organizations and individuals who undermine these basic truths.

Victim Feminism Speaks!

December 5, 2012 | by Elly Tams | Link | Original Link

The Second Sexism is just victim-envy, according to feminist Suzanne Moore, columnist for The Guardian. (Note: the long-time nickname for The Guardian is "The Grauniad" or just "Graun.")

I was thinking it had been a while since Suzanne Moore had written a spectacularly crass, polemic, anti-men spiel in the Graun. As that is her raison d'etre, there had to be another one on its way and there was.

The commenters below the line pretty well demolished Moore's "arguments" about men claiming status as "the new victims" due to their "victim envy" of women. She referred to a new book about men that the Guardian/Observer had already laid into once:

Lagging at school, the butt of cruel jokes: are males the new Second Sex?

Regular commenter Ally Fogg (web site here) asked Suzanne if she had actually read this book and got no reply. My guess is no. She was just re-hashing the Guardian/Observer "line" on it.

My comment was brief but it raised an important point. I responded to this horrendous paragraph in Moore's piece:

"Still, we all get bamboozled with the choices women now have. Despite everyday stories of violence and abuse against women, we are now to refer to prostitution as 'sex work.' I still await the dinner party where middle-class parents tell me: 'Tom is doing his law conversion but even though Charlotte hasn't done her Sats she already says she want to do sex work! We always knew she was entrepreneurial." (my emphasis).

I said:

"As a woman who refuses the role of 'victim' I find this article insulting.

"How can I assert my agency with people like Ms Moore demanding that I fit into the 'poor little victim' box like a good little girl?

"I am not a victim. And I will fight feminism all the way.

"Oh. and sex work is called sex work because 'prostitution' takes away sex worker's agency. They don't want to be victims either it seems."

There is something ironic about feminists, great believers in women's power to "smash patriarchy," turning certain groups of women into powerless victims, objects even. Sex workers, trans women, Tory feminists, women who have cosmetic surgery, women who wear too much make up, women who wear too little clothes, women who fuck too many men, they all know what it is like to be objectified and belittled by The Good Feminists.

It is actually quite a "patriarchal" or "matriarchal" approach to take. "You are a victim because I say you are, and since I have a column in the Guardian I get to have the last word on the subject."

Except, thankfully, in the internet age, Suzanne Moore and her cronies don't get to have the last word.

At the end of her article she mentioned how on International Women's Day feminists on twitter silenced men critics, with the witty hashtag #whatabouttehmenz . But as Mark

Simpson wrote in his article about misandry being the acceptable prejudice, this is a very sexist tactic:

> Quiet Riot Girl has kindly brought to my attention the vogue online for dismissing anyone who suggests that men might face sexism as well as women with the retort: "whataboutthemenz?" And it seems it isn't just feminists using this school playground approach.
> It's a rather telling phrase because it tries to project the childishness of the people deploying it against the ones they want to shut up. Ironically, it also seems to depend on the "patriarchal" notion of shaming the whining boy who doesn't just sup it up "like a man."

Simpson's work is also important in challenging the lazy white middle class "victim feminism" spouted by Moore et. al. because he documents just how much gender roles and gender relations have changed in recent years. The metrosexual revolution he has written about is the result of a post-industrial society, where men aren't "patriarchs" anymore (if they ever were). Men have suffered huge job losses, the destruction of "manly" industries such as mining and steel work. And have become "like women" in how they now care much more how they look, because many of them can't take so much pride in what they do as they might have done in the past.
Another commenter under Moore's diatribe quoted a slightly less cliched feminist, Ros Coward. Her book Sacred Cows inspired the wrath of Beatrix Campbell who said she felt "betrayed" by Coward. But sometimes "betraying" the "sisterhood" is the only decent honest thing to do. As the commenter at cif said:
From Sacred Cows by Ros Coward:

> The combination of feminism and changes in the economy have shattered the easy way in which men could assume that their masculinity entitled them to a superior position. The uncertainty which men have been feeling and the effect of this on the socialization of boys show how inadequate it is to assume the all-importance of gender division, categorizing men into powerful positions and women into subordinate ones. […] Now we have to acknowledge that gender is one among many divisions in a truly uneven and heterogeneous society. [emphasis added]

Coward wrote that in 1999. It's odd that she did so, while all Moore manages now is to shout 'tripe' and claim gender trumps everything else.
Note — This piece is a reprint, first published earlier this year on Dr. Tams' Graunwatch.–DE

AVfM Radio: Street Fightin' Woman

Dear feminists,
I see you, and I hear you, and I notice the knife in your hand, and the machine gun drawn on your placard. I get it, you're not kidding, and I know you are not speaking metaphorically. You want to kill. We all get that you are entirely serious. But your violence – as you obviously dial it upwards will not be met. It will not be answered and you are uninvited from the rumble.
But where are you going with this brutality? Do you really want this to devolve to a street-fight? Really?
John the Other, Girl Writes What, Paul Elam and James Huff will not be at the rumble, but they'll all be on AVFM this week.

Yanking off the hood

December 7, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

As we have already made a part of public record, AVfM is conducting outreach and investigation into the identities of the persons involved in the violent protest against the rights of men and boys orchestrated and conducted by the University of Toronto Student Union and other antisocial elements within that institution.

To that end, one individual has already been identified, and you will be seeing a story on her here in the near future. Our search for the woman highlighted in the video of the protest continues, with some leads.

As happens with each time AVfM undertakes such an operation, I have encountered some objections from a small number of people who claim to identify as MRAs. They do not come from people I recognize, or that to my knowledge are visible in the movement, but their objections are consistent and impassioned.

Most of it boils down to generalized hand-wringing; fears of 'stooping to their level' or 'surrendering the high ground.'

I have also gotten other objections, such as the idea that putting a public spotlight on these ideologues amounts to "online bullying," as I recently heard from one dissenter.

I find none of this to be convincing, and I am not swayed in the least. But I do think, given the gravity of the work we do, that answering the concerns with my own name attached to it is in order.

First, this is not surrendering higher ground. Quite the contrary, shying away from outing these violence promoting ideologues is the approach that lacks a moral compass.

Let us consider the woman at the protest who was issuing epithets, punctuated with flying spittle, at the young man who sought attendance to the Farrell lecture. This was conduct that one detractor attempting to dissuade me from action, called "misguided." She was aggressively harassing and degrading a stranger, based on his sex, and for wanting nothing more than to hear about issues affecting the group to which he belongs at an institution of higher education.

Now, imagine a white student talking that way to a black student for attempting to attend a lecture on problems faced by that community. Or, better yet, a man standing there screaming "fucking misandrist scum" "pro false allegation, pro child abuse fucking scum," at the top of his lungs, at a female student, blocking her from passing through a door where she was merely attempting to hear a lecture on women's issues.

Would that be "misguided"? No, it would be outrageous and criminal, and the only video we would have seen of that would have been the young man being placed in cuffs and tossed in the back of a squad car. I would have agreed with the arrest.

I submit there is only one possible reason for this kind of mindless minimization of the actions of the woman in the video, even from someone claiming to be a men's advocate. Misandry. Ingrained, socially learned misandry; the very thing the men's movement is supposed to be fighting.

I also submit that any men's activist who demonstrates such complicity, enabling and rescuing of this kind of criminality is not holding the high ground anywhere except in his or her imagination. There is a distinct difference between high ground and a high horse. Some so called MRAs would do well to learn it.

Would we call the public identification of racists who harass other people based on ethnicity, or actual misogynists engaging in similar conduct with women, "online bullying"? If you think that, I would say you have mental health issues that need to be addressed…or intelligence issues that defy amelioration.
If we are going to defeat misandry in this culture, it must begin with accepting once and for all the innate value of men and boys as much as we do any other identified group. Failing to recognize their right to be free of this kind of harassment, or by minimizing the severity of it, or by calling for a somehow different, lesser reaction to the bigotry and hatred they face is a failure in and of itself.
It is a failure of principle, a failure of understanding and a failure to the men and boys we purport to defend.
Additionally, I reject the notion that we are in any way, "lowering to their level." To do that we would have to try to censor their free speech, advocate for the better treatment of one sex over the other, promote ideology based on lies and hatred and gleefully persecute anyone called us on it.
We would have to be the ones on a college campus harassing people for trying to address the concerns of their group.
Gender ideologues absolutely hate the light of day. They hate it shining on their ideas and on their lies. Many of them also don't want it shining on their identities. They seek anonymity for the same reason Klansmen wear hoods.
We have a moral imperative to deny them the protective cloak of remaining incognito. Otherwise, we are helping them sink to their level, stay there, and do more damage.
I'll be damned if I will be a party to that.

Fighting feminism: let's get practical

December 7, 2012 | by Mike Buchanan | Link | Original Link

[quote]One hears that the ‘women of the United States’ are up in arms about this or that; the plain fact is that eight fat women, meeting in a hotel parlor, have decided to kick up some dust. ~ HL Mencken 1880-1956[/quote]
[dropcap]P[/dropcap]ublic awareness of the damage wrought by feminism is increasing with each passing year. While this is heartening, it hasn’t – so far, at least – impacted greatly on the numerous manifestations of feminism, which leads me to pose an obvious question. How might we more effectively fight feminism?
We need to recognize the deeply undemocratic nature of feminism. The rise of feminism as a major political force – over the past 30 years in particular – has been facilitated by the feminist strategy of operating ‘below the radar.’ I have friends and acquaintances who remain blind to the catastrophic impact of feminism in the modern era, despite my best efforts to enlighten them.
I’m 54 and I can’t recall a penetrating critique of feminism on a mainstream television or radio program in the UK in my lifetime, nor in ‘serious’ newspapers or magazines. We shouldn’t be surprised that the level of public understanding about the nature and impact of feminism, while improving, remains low.
Feminist agendas are developed and driven by activists who are wildly unrepresentative of women in general. When women blithely call themselves ‘feminists’, what do they mean by the word? If they use terms like ‘patriarchy’ you know they’ve been brainwashed, but most women define their personal feminist ideology (if they do so at all) using expressions such as ‘equality between men and women.’
But do they mean equality of opportunities, or equality of outcomes? The first is the equity feminist position, the second the gender feminist position – I refer the reader to Christina Hoff Sommers’ Who Stole Feminism? (1996).
In my view, fewer than 10% of women hold the ideological positions of gender feminists, and fewer than 10% of them are developing and driving feminist agendas in either a professional capacity, or as activists. Combining the two figures leads us to a stark realization. Fewer than 1% of women are driving feminist agendas.
From this point forward the reader should understand the term ‘feminist’ to mean “gender” feminist.
Despite their claims, feminists haven’t fought for the transfers of economic and political power from men to women which have taken place over the past 30+ years. They’ve manipulated a small number of powerful and influential male collaborators (white knights, sycophants, call them what you will) into handing over power, or enabling that handover, through tactics which are ultimately rooted in shaming men. I doubt if these collaborators represent more than 1% of men. They’re found in all walks of life – politics, state agencies, journalism, business, medicine, law and education.
Feminists lack any democratic legitimacy. The British prime minister, David Cameron, the leader of the Conservative party and leader of the Conservative-led coalition government, is clearly a feminist – all his speeches and policy directions have been reliably women-friendly and feminist-friendly. The British government continues to drive 'improving' gender diversity in corporate boardrooms.

Feminism is being driven by a tiny minority of women, and is enabled by a tiny minority of men. An extraordinary state of affairs in developed democracies, and one which has implications for how feminism might be fought.

Let's get practical

First, the bad news. It's not possible to defeat feminism as an ideology. Now, the good news. It doesn't need to be defeated, only thwarted, and that is possible. If there's to be a war on feminism it will have to be fought one battle at a time, like all wars.
While public understanding of the damage wrought by feminism is rising over time, even a major increase in that understanding won't stop the tiny minority of women demanding more power, and the tiny minority of men giving it to them.
Feminism has many manifestations which damage the interests of men – and sometimes women and children, let's not forget – and they need to be fought individually.
I'm increasingly convinced that if the MRM is to make more progress, more speedily, MRAs will have to become less ideological and more practical. MRAs need to spend less of their limited and valuable time and energy debating with other MRAs. They need to step out of their 'comfort zone' more often. They need to spend less time debating with feminists, online and elsewhere. Experience tells us that feminists cannot, and will not, be persuaded by rational arguments.
More MRAs need to dedicate themselves to fighting on single issues, moving from being 'generalists' to 'specialists'. There are, of course, many such issues. Obvious examples are the differential treatment of men and women with respect to parental access rights, domestic violence, unemployment, homelessness, suicide risk, drug addiction (including alcoholism), incarceration and sentencing and education.
By focusing and collaborating on single issues, MRAs could become more effective. In April 2012 I realized that no individuals or organizations were campaigning against the initiative to 'improve' gender diversity in corporate boardrooms, despite the growing evidence that the 'improvement' leads to declines in corporate financial performance.
So I launched the Campaign for Merit in Business. While we haven't yet won the battle to persuade the government to drop its threats of minimum quotas for women in corporate boardrooms, the battle is well and truly underway. The lessons we're learning from this single-issue campaign will hopefully be the subject of a future article on AVfM, but one of the early lessons was that our opponents had no robust defenses, only ideologically-driven supporters, albeit powerful ones.
We've publicly challenged all of their arguments, and shown them all to be questionable at best, and ridiculous at worst. We've exposed many of their claims as lies. By contrast, not one of our key arguments – for example, that 'improving' gender diversity in boardrooms leads to declines in corporate financial performance – has been challenged.
If MRAs shift their focus from fighting feminism as an ideology, to fighting its manifestations, they may find they have a number of influential allies. One of the reasons we campaign against 'improving' gender diversity in boardrooms is to attract funding from business people wishing to counter this ideological assault on the business sector. The CBI, the major employers' organization which should be countering the assault, is itself a proponent of 'improved' gender diversity on boards. The current President of the CBI is a FTSE100 company chairman, Sir Roger Carr:

http://fightingfeminism.wordpress.com/2012/04/15/toadies-and-their-daughters/

Let's go on the offensive

How do you know when a feminist is lying? Her lips move.
Feminists have no rational arguments. They have only lies and distortions to 'justify' their actions, which helps explain why they're permanently on the offensive.
For many years MRAs have heroically countered those lies and distortions, but with little impact on the public consciousness (largely because the mass media is reliably feminist-friendly). The feminist mission is damaged both by free speech, and by feminists' efforts to prevent free speech. MRAs need to stop being defensive, engage less with feminists, and spend more time addressing the reasonable men and women who are willing to listen to their arguments.
While men have legitimate reasons to be angry at the feminists' assaults on their rights, there's an obvious problem when men publicly display anger. It plays into the feminist stereotype of men being predisposed to anger and violence. The more than men remain externally calm when provoked by angry feminists, the better. But maybe that's easier for me than some.
I'm British and therefore genetically predisposed to remaining calm in the face of offensive people… even those most offensive of people, feminists.

Naming, shaming and ridiculing feminists

Feminists' power stems from their relentless shaming of men as a gender. The idea of gender-wide shame is ridiculous to me – has any woman ever accepted it for her own gender – but shame is a powerful emotion. Feminist activists and ideologues should be ashamed of themselves, and we can help them realize it. The AVfM search for the identity of the feminist protester screeching at a man wishing to attend Warren Farrell's talk at the University of Toronto is a good example of this tactic.
We also need to subject feminists to ridicule. I think the following is a gem:
http://fightingfeminism.wordpress.com/sometimes-for-the-sake-of-your-sanity-you-have-to-laugh-at-them/
Anti-Feminism League presents 'Harpy' awards to prominent feminists, including one to Cherie Blair, the wife of the former prime minister, Tony Blair:
http://fightingfeminism.wordpress.com/2012/06/20/cherie-blair-qc-wins-a-harpy-award/

Naming, shaming and ridiculing feminists' male collaborators

We need to name, shame and ridicule the male collaborators who hand over power to woman. Anti-Feminism League presents ‘Toady’ awards to such men. The 2012 ‘Toady of the Year’ award was won by the prime minister:

http://fightingfeminism.wordpress.com/2012/03/08/the-foundation-of-the-anti-feminism-league-and-the-award-of-toadies-to-david-cameron-and-the-chairmen-of-33-major-british-companies/

Celebrating people who contribute to the fight against feminism

We need to celebrate these people publicly. A Conservative MP, Philip Davies, made an outstanding contribution to a debate in the House of Commons about the differential treatment of men and women by the judicial system, earning him a ‘Winston’:
http://fightingfeminism.wordpress.com/2012/10/20/rt-hon-philip-davies-mp-is-awarded-a-winston/

To summarize my key points, I believe MRAs should:

Spend less time fighting feminism as an ideology, and less time debating with feminists.
Spend more time fighting the manifestations of feminism – collaborating with other MRAs on practical single-issue campaigns.
Name, shame and ridicule feminists.
Name, shame and ridicule feminists’ male collaborators.

Who is Emma Claire and why is she so hateful?

December 9, 2012 | by Agent Mauve | Link | Original Link

Allow me to start by once again acknowledging the small minority of “MRAs” and their bedfellows, the vast majority of feminists, who steadfastly believe that people should be allowed to spread hate, bigotry and violent ambitions under the cover of anonymity, as long as they are female and/or feminist.

We have heard you, and we are unimpressed with your willingness to enable social decay. Perhaps though, as the lot of you continue to paint virulent feminists as a red herring, or imaginary villains concocted by MRAs as a scapegoats and boogeymen, you will take note of how easy it is to track these people down and document their actions, as well as their patently hateful rhetoric.

Now, for the rest of you, we begin to deliver on our promise to begin outing the identities of the individuals involved with the violent protest against the freedom of speech of Dr. Warren Farrell, and the freedom of University of Toronto students who wanted to attend Dr. Farrell’s sponsored lecture on the difficult issues faced by boys.

While we continue efforts to identify one particularly virulent participant in that protest, the investigation has uncovered information on some others.

We begin tonight with one Emma Claire (pictured above and apparently at 48 seconds into the video), a U of T student who was present at the protest, involved in its planning and participated in the destruction of posters announcing the event that were placed on campus. She also incited others to do the same using twitter.

I present the evidence against her courtesy of Agent Mauve, whose short description is in the bio section at the base of this article.

We start with her obvious knowledge of the event in advance and clear intent to illegally interfere with its promotion by organizers.

Click to enlarge

Remember folks, feminism helps men, too.
At this point, we do not know the identity of Damey, Alec, or the person referred to as “I,” but we have added their names to Agent Mauve’s list of leads on people known to have participated in attempts to censor Dr. Farrell.
But before we go further, let us give you a little perspective on the ideas harbored and proclaimed with some degree of public pride by Claire. We begin with something that could easily be construed as the clownish antics of a college student. It is the simple proclamation that all men should be killed and a salute to Satan.

Click to enlarge

Of course, as I said, this is just youthful foolishness, surely she does not believe in Satan. But as her expression becomes less obviously comical and she gets into actual issues, we find that for Ms, Claire, many a true word has been said in jest.
The first is perhaps Ms. Claire’s revelation of what qualification a student organization must have in order for her to consider membership. Consider this post from her twitter account.

Click to enlarge

On either taking or otherwise obtaining this photograph which features material that libels Dr. Farrell as a man perpetuating a culture in which the sexual assault of women by men is normalized and tolerated, which is patently, categorically untrue, Claire finds herself the qualifying conduct. She finds her deal breaker in the vicious and dishonest character assassination of an individual who has dedicated a lifetime to helping children in trouble.

And we make note for future reference that she finds that type of home at the organization known as U of T Students Against Sexism, who apparently produced the product Claire found so attractive.

And while it may seem superfluous to even posit the question now, we have to wonder what, precisely, would lead someone be attracted to that particular set of qualifications. Some might argue again, that this is just a matter of ignorance and youth; that she is actually convinced Dr. Farrell is Satan incarnate, that he hates women, that he wants them to be raped with impunity by any man who so desires.

And she might believe all that, but the cause is not youth or ignorance. I will let her explain to you why.

Click to enlarge

She doesn't just hate men; doesn't just want them dead or silenced or marginalized or ignored. She at least entertains the idea of permanently marking her skin with that hatred, like a convict signaling gang affiliation.
Are we starting to get the picture here of what kind of human being Claire is? I think so, and I think Claire is the one telling us, over and over again.
Let's take a look at what is driving this woman. And remember, she is just part of a culture that embraces and gives refuge to this kind of thinking. She is not on the fringe of anything. She is an involved, activism oriented student, given free rein by her peers and the administration of the University of Toronto to engage openly in speech that would get her expelled, even arrested, were it directed at anyone but men; to participate in the destruction of private property on university grounds, and on those same grounds to attempt to illegally silence the voice of an activist for human rights.

Click to enlarge

Emma Claire is not going to stop. And no one at the University of Toronto is going to stop her. We can figure that one out by the fact that they chartered clubs to enable that kind of conduct.
For that reason, we bring her to public attention here at AVfM.
Additionally, over the next two days, she will be listed on register-her.com as a known bigot, and her image and name will find a place on our display of featured offenders.
If this makes anyone at the University of Toronto uncomfortable, we hope they will show the wisdom of preventing the need for this kind of action by launching an investigation into that protest and properly disciplining any students or faculty who violated U of T policies and/or Canadian law.
In the meantime, we will show you a reminder of how Emma Claire feels about her actions, after she has had time to reflect on them.

Click to enlarge

Actually, a proper legacy cannot be rendered to the world simply by being seen and unnamed on a video that does not reflect near enough of one's ideas and actions. More is needed.
So this will be the beginning of Emma Claire's real legacy; where she can revel in the full and permanent notice of her deeds, and the lesson she is providing to the world about the nature of feminism, and the etiology of hatred. And so that anyone who ever does an internet search on her name again will be aware of it.
Legacy sealed.
Another offender in this outrage in Toronto will be featured here within three days, also courtesy of Agent Mauve, whose work in this is ongoing.

Climbing out of the crazy-tree

By now, almost everyone reading this will have seen video footage of the girl shouting, “you’re fucking scum” at a young, sober-faced man in what appeared an obvious attempt to provoke him into a posture of self defence. She will probably have a nickname soon, like creepy-bitter girl or something similar. And seeing footage of her all-but-spit on that young man, somebody she knew nothing about, while hurling the most vicious accusations she could muster – it is easy to fall into disdain and contempt, and even well deserved loathing for her. How could anyone in a first world country demonstrate such public, unashamed but undiluted and unjustified hatred? What kind of monster is she? That narrative is easy and obvious.

However, another question has been on my mind. How does an individual climb down out of the crazy tree after a public display like the one we all watched outside the Warren Farrell talk at the U of T?

Obviously, the crowd chanting “no hate speech on campus” lost the thread of their own narrative when they changed their chant to “fuck Warren Farrell,” No hate speech on campus except by them, maybe that’s what they meant. But the attempt to intimidate, to physically threaten, to silence, to suppress counted on an “all or nothing” strategy. The outrageous and overt display of hatred and violence by these campus feminists and “socialist workers” members had an effect running in the opposite direction to what they intended.

In attempting to silence and suppress the humanist message of Dr. Farrell, the violent thugs (feminist protesters) became the main story. Their utter contempt for the basic human rights of anyone who doesn’t slavishly agree has done more damage to the feminist brand name than any dozen articles by opponents of that violent and hateful ideology.

But what about violent-hate-girl? Where does she go from here? In fact, where does anyone go when they find themselves on the wrong side of a human rights movement? What does a person do when they’ve publicly pooped their pants in a manner as spectacular as violent-hate-girl?

The men’s rights movement can’t be silenced or made to go away. This much must be obvious even to the most adamant of this movement’s opponents. We are, in fact claiming an ever greater share of public attention. The arguments and rhetoric of the movement can now be found all over what now passes for mainstream media. Like every other true human rights movement in history, we are winning.

So how, if you are an individual who has invested themselves in is now screamingly obviously a position opposed to basic human rights, and invested in perpetuating the role of women as permanent victims with a political angle using that victimhood as a lever of totalitarian power.

When you’ve outed yourself as violent, hate propelled ideologue, one which looks to an outside observer like a vicious sociopathic predator, how do you go back to being a moral human being?

I don’t know. But I wish her luck.

Kellett faces suspension

December 10, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

We have just been informed that the Bar Panel for the Main Board of Overseers of the Bar have sent the recommendation to the Maine Supreme Judicial Court that Hancock Country Prosecutor Mary Kellett have her license to practice law suspended for prosecutorial misconduct.
The panel found Kellett, in her prosecution of Vladek Filler, guilty of "failing to make timely disclosure of the existence of evidence, suppressing evidence, trying to mislead a jury, failing to employ reasonable skill and care, engaging in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice and engaging in conduct unworthy of an attorney."
This is according to a just released announcement by the Maine Public Broadcasting Network.
The ruling means that Kellett will face yet another hearing at the Supreme Judicial Court to determine what amounts to the future of her legal career.
More details on this will be made available as they come in. In the meantime, we are cracking open a cold one here.
Or three.
Score one for justice, for a change.

Monday Morning Roundup

December 10, 2012 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

Fresh from the hunt and color me Mauve
Enjoy this titbit there's more on the stove.
To the bigots and violent whose work I decry
I'm coming for you, and now I must fly.

Welcome back fro the weekend. You missed some interesting stuff if you're just joining us from this weekend.

A number of amateur and well-paid professional liars (who profit greatly from their lies) are claiming that Paul Elam recently "doxxed" (i.e. revealed the confidential personal information) of a Toronto college student. This is a lie of course. But what did happen this weekend is that a bigot who publicly posted her own name and photo bragging about her censorship and hatred of men was pointed out by Agent Mauve, who brings an intense dislike for the behavior of gender ideologues and some serious social network research skills. Says Mauve, "I want to be the Simon Wiesenthal of the MRM." Mauve, working with Paul Elam, merely brought to our attention another of the recent bigots who slandered Warren Farrell, practiced censorship by tearing down posters and encouraging others to do the same, and violently blockaded and verbally assaulted anyone who tried to hear Dr. Farrell speak. The first such hatemongering bigot who publicly identified herself while spouting her hatred and aggressive ignorance was Danielle Sandhu, whose Stalinist tactics we pointed out a couple of weeks ago. The next bigot to publicly out herself, publicly bragging (with her own name and face) about tearing down posters, encouraging others to tear them down, threatened to attend events to disrupt them, and bragged proudly about having a "legacy" of being part of the violent thuggery against Dr. Farrell, was Emma Claire, who we profile right here, thanks to the work of Agent Mauve.

Predictably, we are accused of somehow defaming or slandering her, as well as unveiling her confidential information. How exactly you defame someone by quoting their exact words in full context, or "reveal" the "confidential" information of someone's public Twitter account with their own name and face is yet to be explained by any critics. Also, how there is anything inaccurate in our reporting is also yet to be explained by critics. Other than spouting insults, neither the critics, the professional liars, nor Emma Claire has given any other public statement, although Emma Claire herself remains welcome to do so if she wishes. In any case we stand by our reporting, and intend to report more on the activities of vicious, violent, hatemongering thugs who violate Human Rights Codes, the Criminal Code of Canada and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in Canada (and who break the laws and violate fundamental human rights elswhere).

For more on why we are no longer standing silent and why we are identifying violent hatemongering bigots, see also Paul Elam's Yanking Off The Hood.

In When I think about you I cut myself, Casimir Strasdauskas writes of personal pain and anguish. If this were a woman writing these same words, the pity would pour in from all corners. When a man does it, we expect him to be pilloried as a dangerous creepy weirdo. That's misandric culture for you. But not here. Thanks to Casimir for the bravery of sharing his pain, and we hope it helps him heal his wounds, physical and mental.

British MRA Mike Buchanan wrote an interesting piece on how to get practical when fighting against gender ideologues. The short take: arguing with them has proven futile for decades. Time to get practical, narrow down to specifics, and to start naming and shaming the bigots. Hard to argue with that.
Typhon Blue graced us recently with a reprint of an article that's caused quite a stir on other web sites (like The Moderate Voice and The Good Men Project). Her crime? Looking hard at the statistics on sexual violence by women and how they're skewed badly to make more men look guilty and more women look innocent. With of course, facts and references, which some parties have claimed are somehow warped or distorted but none have yet explained how with any specifics. That's pretty hard to do when someone's got rock solid references and, y'know, can do basic math.
Dr. Elly Tams also graced our pages again recently with a look at some more odious man-hating tripe from Suzanne Moore of The Guardian. Not to be missed. If Not All Feminists Are Like That, why aren't they decrying this woman?
Jim Muldoon from Down Under also brought us an excellent expose of an Italian man brutalized by the Australian family court system and a complicit media. Not to be missed.
There's more of course. There's always more. Scroll down the front page, and also be sure to check out some of the neat stuff in our video section.
And by the way, a teaser: an exclusive interview with Domestic Violence icon Erin Pizzey is on its way, and she may be gracing our pages with an article or two. Stay tuned, and Happy Monday!

Marc Lépine is a feminist hero

---

Taslima Nasreen, an award-winning writer, physician, secular humanist and human rights activist, is known for her powerful writings on women's oppression and unflinching criticism of religion, despite forced exile and multiple fatwas calling for her death
And Taslima Nasreen is selling hate. Not just hate, but also fear, conflict, pain, and lies. She's an ex Bangladeshi, possibly an apostate Muslim. Certainly based on her country of origin, she is familiar with the social impact of that religion in its various flavors.
Her byline on Free From Thought Blogs provides all this background, which is what makes her most recent offering such an odious indictment of character. She's banging on the Gamil Garbi drum.
This name, Gamil Rodrigue Liass Gharbi wont be immediately familiar to most readers. That's the name he was given by his father. The name familiar to most people, the western name he assumed is Marc Lépine. And when we talk about him using that name, Marc Lepine, we are talking about one of the heroes of western feminism.
He's the man who, in on December 6, 1989 (that's 23 years ago) shot and killed 14 women and 4 men at Lecole Polytechnique in Montreal, Quebec.
Marc Lépine is Taslima Nasreen's hero. But he's also a fictional character.
I do not mean the shooting and massacre did not happen, or that there was no individual named Marc Lepine. I mean simply the story now universally known is a fictionalization. Marc Lepine was a man, and a sparkling pure demonstration that men are violent, that women are victims, that men hate women, and that probably it would be best for everyone if all male children were locked into cages at birth so that their razor sharp teeth and bullet-emitting penises couldn't ever harm another innocent woman ever again.
That's the fantasy.
The reality is that the man who became a feminist hero grew up within a family twisted by instability and violence. They moved frequently, and much of Lépine's early childhood was spent in Costa Rica and Puerto Rico, where his father – a non-practicing Muslim worked for a Swiss mutual funds company. The family returned to Montreal permanently in 1968, shortly before a stock market crash led to the loss of much of the family's assets. The father was an authoritarian, possessive and jealous, and was frequently violent towards his wife and his children. Marc Lépine's father had contempt for women and believed that they were only intended to serve men.
Understanding this throws a bit of light on why he took up an assault rifle and murdered 14 women. But that's not the public narrative, that a MAN (evil) shot women (good) because he hated feminism, (and therefore, hated women). That simplistic lie is the story we are bludgeoned with every year.
This crime occured 23 years ago. Taslina Nasreen has just done her level best to attach to the men's rights movement; the child from an abusive upbringing, who, so lost and distorted by belief system inculcated by an abusive parent ended up shooting and killing 14 women, then himself.

Taslima Nasreen is trying to draw an equivalence between this fatally damaged and abused individual, and a human rights movement.
Taslima is from an Islamic nation herself, but omits any mention of Gamil Gharbi's upbringing. The story she tells of the feminist hero Marc Lepine is a simple one. It is, in fact so simplistic that it is false.
Her article's title also conflates the name of an ideology of gender with a group of people identifiable by their sex. Women are not a thing formed from ideas, they are people. Feminism is not a sex, or a group of people, it's an ideology.
But according to Taslima "Feminism is hated because women are hated."
No, feminism is opposed because it is increasingly obvious to the public that it is an ideology of hate and violence.
Taslima Nasreen paints herself as a human rights activist. But that, too, is a lie.
She is selling hate.

The missing vital cog

December 11, 2012 | by Jim Muldoon | Link | Original Link

In last weekend's Australian, Angela Shanahan writes about the hypocritical positions taken by women's magazines regarding marriage (Shanahan, 2012). She is to be congratulated for an honest look at what feminism actually does, rather than what it proclaims.
She notes that these periodicals promote

> …insouciant treatments of lesbian partnerships, promiscuity for both sexes, and mouthing of empty feminism, as they wallow in the latest shrill accusation of misogyny from the Prime Minister…

She then goes contrast this with the sector's fascination with the latest royal pregnancy, noting that "their biggest bucks are actually made from the aspiration to something as sweetly traditional as a white wedding and a first baby."
It has to be good for the men's movement when statements like these are made in the mainstream media by a leading journalist:

> But still the wearying "you can have it all" mantra of Helen Gurley Brown is cynically fed to a naive love-hungry readership. The magazine industry's archly superior view from the metropolitan heights is steeped in callow sexual mores and bathed in the righteous glow of empty feminist ideology.

There is a lot to Shanahan's insights into marriage. I think that the term "traditional marriage" refers to a time that never was, but certainly have to agree with Shanahan's view:

> Because marriage and family are not made in heaven; they are made on earth of hard slog and values like unselfishness and scrupulous sexual fidelity of both partners.

No, the real world should not impose on their princesses-in-waiting. These publications thrive on what Peter Allamano dubbed The Bold, Independent Woman of Today (Allamano, 2012). These BIWOTs are beautiful, elegant, confident, strong women. Of course, these women cannot possibly be this way on their own. It can only come as a result of purchasing the various advertised products.
A woman who is not salon-perfect, painted, jewellery adorned, perfumed, deodorized and sanitized is not a real woman. And even with all the gunk on her face and body she is not complete. She needs all the relationship advice books she can get, and the accompanying keep-fit DVD. And, of course, be familiar with all the latest feminist thought on why more women should be running major corporations on a part-time, single-parent friendly basis. But she's also reminded that with the wrong accessory or last season's colours she will instantly lose the dream. They both feed the neurosis and offer the cure, which only fuels the next day's neurosis.

Shanahan rightly points out that this view of women, and many women's acceptance and conformance to this view, is actually bad for women. What happens, she says, is that young women, caught between the impossible fantasies of the fairy tale wedding and the sex-in-the-city you-go-grrl with a new man every week, essentially gives up any thoughts of marriage and just has children anyway. Often, this is to multiple fathers.
"None of this is good for the children, and it's disastrous for women who lurch from one bad relationship to the next."
Shanahan is on the money with these statements, but is still a red-pill short of reality. There is one vital cog missing in the rose-coloured picture of bliss.
Yes, I'm talking about the lucky guy. Him who is waiting for her royalness at the alter. Him, whose complete ensemble including wedding ring, monkey suit and haircut cost less than her left shoe. He who gets a walk on part on her special day.
He-who-gets-to-pay.
According to these magazines, men only exist, in an almost cardboard cut out form, to fulfill these fantasies. For her, he has to be rich, even royal, handsome, strong, passionate, faithful, kind and environmentally aware.
For him, she just has to be herself.
Of course, by "herself" they mean with all the aforementioned products so professionally administered that he-who-hardly-matters is convinced she has that natural look.
Take Woman's Day's own view of The Royal Couple of the Hour, or Wills and Kate as we who like to pretend we are on familiar terms call them.
For Kate, she "…will not only become the wife of Prince William, she will also take on the new title of Her Royal Highness The Duchess of Cambridge (Woman's Day, 2012)".
Implied in the titles, of course, are the palaces, estates, servants and a credit card that never runs out.
As for William,

> … more attention is being paid to one of Kate Middleton's most stunning qualities – her hair.

Yes, the marriage literally changes Kate's life in every imaginable sense. William gets a wife with hair.
But, I am also talking about those "multiple fathers" that Shanahan mentions almost in passing. Yes, the sperm donors. Passion with a wannabe goddess supposedly on the pill, and it only costs 18 years of child support.
For after all, what are multiple fathers if they are not a means for a BIWOT to diversify her income streams?
Some real fortunate guys actually marry her majesty, pay for the horrendously expensive wedding, the exorbitant honeymoon, her legal fees for the divorce, alimony and child support. All in one blissful package.
There is an extra special something that befalls a chosen few: False accusations of abusing her and the kids.

And, in almost every one of these never-to-be-forgotten romances, the woman will have hair.
There's no mention at all that some of these men might, in fact, have their hearts broken. Not because her magnificence no longer deigns him suitable, but because he can't see the kids he loves. Those kids who also love him.
I'll be the first to agree that all of this is bad for the children. There is no doubt in my mind that is bad for the women who slavishly seek fulfilment through constant use of Creme de Foreskin.
Yes, it is even bad for women in general.
I can't help pointing out, though, that it is also very, very bad for men.
So, it seems Angela Shanahan and others are starting out on a path. They have noticed the smell and are prising open the lid. Even though we're still not getting much of a mention, her forthright condemnation of feminism has to be good for men in the long run. For this she should be congratulated.

Sophia Guo: U of T bigot

December 12, 2012 | by Agent Mauve | Link | Original Link

As we have promised in recent days here, AVfM has continued its mission to investigate and identify the culprits behind the violent protest of Warren Farrell's lecture at the University of Toronto last month.

That protest resulted in assaults, both on the persons and on the freedom of movement of students who wanted to attend the lecture. It included the vandalism of private property and interference with the free speech rights of Dr. Farrell as well as students attending the lecture.

Thus far to our knowledge the U of T administration has failed to conduct even the most rudimentary of investigations, and is not interested in disciplining the offending individuals who were involved in the illegal actions.

The administration's failure to appropriately act on this matter amounts to complicity and encouragement for this kind of conduct, and forces the conclusion that an atmosphere of brute intimidation and censorship is precisely what they want to foster at U of T.

This is unacceptable.

Given that the university administration has now proven to be just as culpable as the offending activists at the protests, we will continue to expose and illuminate as many responsible individuals as possible.

We continue with Sophia Guo, a U of T student and activist shown early in the video, saying "These so called men's rights groups are actually hate groups."

Even though such a statement, however lacking credibility, is certainly within the realm of free speech. Even the ironic fact that her words had to be captioned on the video because of the loud chanting of "Fuck Warren Farrell!" from her peers doesn't change the fact that she is free to express her opinion.

But Guo, using the Twitter identity of wowidec, actually took things a step further, publicly admitting that she was among the activists who vandalized promotional posters for the lecture that were placed there after Dr. Farrell was invited to speak.

This is where Sophia Guo crosses the line from exercising her own free speech and into the abridgement of the free speech of others. This antisocial expression of her political views is unacceptable in a society that is both based in the rule of law and on the principles of free speech.

The question now then arises, what sort of ideology, what worldview is it that motivates an individual like Sophia Guo to decide that the free speech of an identified group of people, in this case men, should not be allowed? What is her perception of men, broadly speaking, that would foster the idea that she could justify taking such license with their freedoms?

We find a chilling example of that in one of her Twitter communications under the wowidec handle.

Click to enlarge

So, to Sophia Guo, the knowledge that men are one third as likely as women to attend college — but three times more likely to take their own lives — is summed up in a single word.
"Good."
This is the idea of "gender equity" that seems to form the collective groupthink at the University of Toronto, with the full participation of the faculty and the administration. And it is not entirely surprising. One might expect this sort of moral degeneration in an environment dominated by feminism, a gender ideology based on hatred and elitism. And it shows, with pristine clarity, in the words and actions of students like Sophia Guo.
Like the individual we reported on earlier, Emma Kadey, Sophia Guo shows a bigotry toward half the human population that is socially reinforced at the U of T, and sanctioned on all levels. Or, as one young woman said at the protest, "I came as a part of my women's studies group."
Guo gives us a virtual library of her sentiments on men and boys. We provide some samples here, but to place more of them would just be redundant.

Some ideas on who is supposed to enable her drug use.

And finally, in a campus environment where false rape allegations carry a lot of weight, Guo prescribes a solution for those unfortunate enough to be accused.

Click to enlarge

Guo has made other statements, many of which we have preserved from her now defunct

Twitter account. They are perfectly legitimate expressions viewed under the absolute lens of free speech. But they are also perfectly clear demonstrations of her attitude as a bigot. In the coming days, Sophia Guo will have her profile as a bigot placed at Register-her.com. But she will not be alone.

We will continue to work until we have identified every violence promoting, property destroying, bigotry spouting ideologue associated with that protest and placed them all on the pages of AVfM, as well as Register-her.com

We have a long way to go.

Tip of the hat to Agent Umber for the significant assist on this work.

Scorched Earth

Scorched Earth is an expression descriptive of a style of military campaign in which all the assets and resources of a territory or a nation are targeted, regardless of partisanship or civilian status. It is generally prohibited by international conventions of warfare, although it is still practiced in some cases of modern warfare. The ignition of oil wells in Kuwait during the retreat during the Kuwait war of the 1990's by the former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussain is an example of the tactic in modern application.

Outside the context of armed conflict, the term Scorched Earth refers to the tactics of some political or religious organizations of slander, black-listing, whispering campaigns, harassment, and the use of fraudulent criminal accusations to destroy the lives, families and careers of political opponents. The cult of Scientology became infamous in the 1980s for routine use of scorched earth tactics against the critics of that cult.

The pseudo-religious cult of hyper-victimhood-feminism emerging from the online communities of Free Thought Blogs and Atheism Plus is also a fertile ground for the use of scorched earth tactics against the lives, careers and families of critics of the interconnected cultures of a popular blogging site run by an American college instructor and it's associated online community, whose members self identify as Atheism Plus.

The members of these associated groups appear to be unaware of their growing public fame as a malevolent and semi-criminal culture metastasizing from within a formerly humanist and secular scientific community of intellectuals and religious skeptics.

One prominent member and public speaker in this pseudo-cult regularly opens her hour long lectures by bragging about how she and her followers harassed and slander a critic out of jobs and career. Such stories are told without apparent recognition that normalizing such conduct is antithetical to an open society. From the outside, it appears that in the community where these tactics are practiced and then broadcast, that at no point has anyone stood up and said " wait a minute, this is not morally acceptable conduct". Or, "why are we acting like a collection of sociopaths with no visible limits on civilized behavior?"

It was the public's notice of and reaction to the "fair game" policy practiced by the church of scientology which drove public reform of some such behavior within the cult, and informed the criminalization of the organization in some nations, including Germany.

At what point does the public wake up in recognition of a cult of hate engaging in such practice? One of the individuals apparently taking pride in such conduct enjoys a continued public speaking career, based almost entirely on her status as the "victim" of being uncomfortably invited, during an elevator trip between floors of a hotel for late night coffee by a socially awkward conference attendee. That invitation, which now appears to have been invented by the "victim" in service of her narrative.

But victimhood, or the cultivated perception of it is at the core of the scorched earth approach to silencing criticism for the collection of middle-class, privileged but uninspired victims at the center of an anti-social cult apparently unaware and uninterested in the relationship between actions and their wider consequences.

Several months ago, I addressed an article to a victimhood-obsessed pseudonymous sociopath. In that piece, I wrote:
"I am entirely unwilling to entertain or to lend support to a fantasy making human beings into enemies, into "others," into categories of /good people and bad people based a facet of their biology.
It might be that a world of paranoia, fear, and hatred, with the arbiters of who is good and who is bad being childish, self-selected victims is not a world […] I want to entertain, or to indulge you in realizing."
However, it seems obvious that such a landscape is where we will all be living if the normalization of the conduct discussed here is not actively rejected by more than just a handful of so-called Men's Rights Activists. Just a little further down the present path is a society in which disagreement over whether basic human rights should apply to this group or that based on ethnicity or religion, or even sex is settled by an armed mob in the street.
Conform to whatever populist group-think of the moment grips public imagination, or face the vigilante justice of an angry mob.
Of course for the difficult-of-thinking this discussion might appear hypocritical. In fact, a substantial handful of voices, allegedly within the MRM, have already claimed that the public identification of promoters of violence, hatred and censorship by the board of directors of AVFM constitutes exactly the scorched earth policy being denounced in this article.
Addressing those criticisms directly, such comparisons are moronic. The individuals so far identified are not the subject of whispering campaigns, nor false accusations, not subject to any threat of violence. The statements being attached to their names are their own utterances, taken in as much of the original context as possible, and were attached to their own public personas on various social media websites prior to re-publication by this site and elsewhere.
In fact, a culture in which, for a certain subset, violence, promotion of hate, criminal libel, false accusation and other violent and pathological behavior is regularly given a pass or excused – that society will become one in which such social pathology becomes common. Does somebody imagine this will be good for anybody, even for the group on the apparent top of such a pile?
We can steer our culture away from this trend, or we can watch as the world gets more pathological, antisocial and violent. I trust it's not necessary to explain, as to an idiot, which of these possibilities I prefer and am working for.
The organized, purposeful and indeed gleeful attacks on the livelihood, careers, family and lives of individuals based on disagreement of political opinion can't be tolerated in a society still pretending to enlightenment. The promotion of violence by a subset of a society, without consequence, indeed, with an attendant narrative of justification – that's a recipe for a violent, closed and regressive culture.

Some early Christmas cheer

Mr. A enters the room with a satisfied smile, warms his back by the blazing fire and turns to face his friendly audience to hail forth a hearty commentary –

"Absolutely ace!"

Mary Kellett is getting slam dunked for her moronic criminality.

And she thought she could hide it forever in this day and age too! Hah!

Just in time for Christmas. Another notch on the belt for the AVfM community.

Cheers! Yes, let's drink to that.

Pass me another glass would you?

I want to toast the outing of the University of Toronto bigots as well.

This cake tastes wonderful, doesn't it? Richly spiced, and nicely filling too!

Oh look! The word misandry is turning up in more and more online newspapers, videos and blogsites!

Care for some more sauce on that pudding?

Nice to see the increasing proliferation of Youtubers producing MRA videos as well, don't you think?.

Looks like 2013 will only see exponential growth for us.

It's hard not to feel smug isn't it?

What a wonderful feast we're having."

It was grand to recently see the comment thread on Emma Claire (Kadey) growing beyond my capacity to keep up with my e-mail service telling me there was yet another posting on it.

I glowed with satisfaction seeing comment after comment knowing each comment meant another and another and another link to her name for search engines to drive it up to the very top of their search lists.

In my mind's eye as this happened was a kind of glorious circling of the wagons in defense of men. The occasional deranged feral feminist did try to break into that circle with sick infantilizing ideas about 'harassing' 'girls' by publicizing their inhumanity and hatred.

But wonderfully every time such ill-conceived nonsense was beaten back and made to look stupid with an ease and fluidity which added extra glisten. And all of it beaming outwards, outwards, outwards….. to an ever expanding readership as it was all ticking and whirring away like merry-o being stored on servers globally for posterity as a rich database detailing yet another aspect of feminism's depravity for generations to come.

And the cast of characters in this alternative media show(down) with feminism was perfect.

There was Warren Farrel, the epitomy of Mr Nice guy. The soft spoken erudite perfect sort to be contrastingly juxtaposed next to the mob of incoherant snarling vitriolic bullies who required police control.

Then following up there was the femme fatal figure of Emma Kadey, whose bright red lipstick you could easily imagine containing poison from which to seal the kiss of death. And those sick smug eyes glaring at herself narcisistically in the camera lens of a self taken photo.

Very Betty Davis film noire.

Eyes which viewed the world as a place in which to exercise feminist inspired male eugenics, nazi style no less.

Then there were the police caught in a maelstrom, the likes of which they had obviously never experienced before, battling to deal with a baffling mix of faux sensitive hysterics and over aught patronizing white knightery which went way beyond anything the most white knight amongst their own ranks could ever conjure up.

Pure Jerry Springer, this one.

There was also the sensationalistic script replete with all the most up to date buzz phrases too – rape culture, incest apologist, hate speech, advocacy, trolling, and even a new one for us to mull – doxxing. Impressive script writing – sort of a cross between Californication and those more high brow think tank shows which analyse current affairs.

We even had our very own secret agent too – Agent Mauve, who moves through shadowy corridors capturing corrupting evidence with which to take down the bad guys. Beautiful.

It had it all – sex, violence, political intrigue, espionage, philosophical musings, rapid fire repartee, wizened witticism, bravado, lunacy, lunacy and more lunacy.

All in all a damn good show which has all the factors for being a smash hit.

If this goes on for much longer like this I only think some Hollywood types might come sniffing around and actually serialize it.

We've seen odder things happen right? So why not?

Anyhow, overall the best damn Christmas season advertising for the Men's Rights Movement I could wish for. Santa was very kind to me this year.

What excites me a great deal is knowing the power of the internet, and of MRA internet users – thus the increasing ease of spreading media which outs these bigots.

It is only going to increase exponentially too!

Feminists don't have a hope against such collective power, as everybody with a smartphone video camera becomes a news reporter.

Forget the fear of CCTVs some folks have. That's small fish, and growing smaller every day.

Consider this. Everybody is becoming a walking CCTV these days.

Heck, I have 8 year old kids in some of my classes using such technology already.

I've been reading online recently about data transfer speeds of 10 Gigabytes per second inexorably becoming commonplace.

10 Gigabytes a second – Wow! Knock me down with a feather!

Now I'm not really techie enough to know when and where and how soon exactly.

But I do know this much – as we are finding with the Mary Kellett scenario, and the University of Toronto and other recent situations, our ability to record, report and transmit is making the MRM an inevitably increasingly potent force against feminism.

And for that I'm grateful and inspired with optimism.

On that cheery note I wish everyone a truly Merry Christmas. from an MRA.

"MMMMMmmmmmm! So tasty!"

Well done folks!

That turkey got basted perfectly!"

AVfM Radio: what are feminists so frightened of?

December 13, 2012 | by AVfM Radio | Link | Original Link

What are you so frightened of. This is a question directed mostly towards feminists. Your compatriots in the activist arm of your gender ideology, which might include you, are publicly crapping their pants. I know they're pretending to oppose such monstrosities as child rape and wife battery – but when this takes the form on screaming abuse at young and vulnerable men you've never met – the illusion rather refutes itself. Similarly, attacking Warren Farrell if he's a promoter of violence does suggest to outside observers that you've lost the plot. Its obvious to those with an understanding of human behavior that your escalating hatred, violence and hysteria is fear driven, and the fear isn't of being raped or assaulted, its of loss of the totality of control feminism has long enjoyed. It's fear of accountability.
It's likely the fear, misplaced as it is, that as the men's rights movement achieves a growing success, that we will respond with the retributive violence and hatred that you seen in your own motivation and tendency. Thankfully, we wont, which doesn't mean terrible violence isn't coming. But it's your camp bringing it. It's your violence, its your hate, and it's your fear we'll be talking about tonight on A voice for men Radio.

Vanja Krajina: University of Toronto

December 13, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

The University of Toronto last month hosted a speaking engagement by Dr. Warren Farrell, who addressed what he has coined, “The Boy Crisis.” The talk covered growing concerns, at least for those who value the welfare of boys in our society, with subjects like suicide, academic failure and the phenomenon known as “failure to launch.” This is when young men remain living at home past the age of legal adulthood, with no visible path into full autonomy and responsibility.

Campus feminists so vehemently objected to the presence of Dr. Farrell, and to the idea that exploration of those issues would be conducted outside the realm of feminist ideological control, that they staged a protest, which ultimately became violent, and abusive toward the young men who were trying to attend.

A video was made of a clash that ensued between protestors and the police, as well as showing the mistreatment and harassment of the young men attempting to hear Dr. Farrell speak.

One woman protestor in particular was featured in the video aggressively screaming epithets at a young man attempting to enter the lecture.

> You should be fucking ashamed of yourself. You’re fucking scum. You are fucking scum. You fucking rape apologist, incest supporting, woman hating fucking scum. You’re fucking scum.

To the young man’s credit, he did not react to the provocation, but simply asked police if there was somewhere he could wait where she would not follow him around and continue the verbal assault.

When the police got him in through the door, the woman continued the tirade on the police officer who got him through.

> You should be fucking proud of yourself. These are the fucking men who are going to rape people.

Apparently the woman in the video not only has a license to publicly assail people for exercising their rights to free speech, but she also has a crystal ball into which she can see the actions of future rapists, which of course includes you and me and any other man (or probably woman) who is concerned with the issues facing men and boys.

 Her name is Vanja Krajina, and this is apparently not her first interaction with police. She was arrested and charged with conspiracy to commit indictable offence during the G20 summit weekend in Toronto in June of 2010. She was quoted as saying that a Toronto Police Officer told her, “I don’t know why we let people like you immigrate into our country.”

Indeed.

Some of us do not know why people like her are allowed by college administrations to harass their students and abridge their free speech rights, either. But that is precisely what has happened at the University of Toronto, where authorities have proceeded as though the assaults, vandalism and student harassment never occurred.

There is much here that demands better understanding, and it appears as though it will be left up to citizen reporters to find out about it.

This is not the end of reporting on Krajina, on this sad event at the U of T, or on the atmosphere at that school of tolerance for bigotry and violence.

Krajina apparently had a twitter account (which comes up on a Google of her name), which has now been shut down. But there appear to be traces of her in multiple net locations. This should be quite enough for our rainbow coalition of agents to do their work.

And we will continue to do ours to bring all of this to the light of public attention, including her listing on Register-her.com.

University of Toronto hate party

December 14, 2012 | by Greg Renouf | Link | Original Link

Who’s Responsible For The University of Toronto’s Anti-Patriarch Hate Party? (featuring Vanja Krajina & the Old-Left)

There’s a global controversy brewing around the University of Toronto right now. It all started on November 16th when a group of radical feminists, anarchists, and some students (who said they were sent by their Women’s Studies class) showed up to blockade people from entering an auditorium.

On the other side of the situation was a man named Warren Farrell, and a crowd of people who paid for tickets to enter the event. Farrell is a writer and activist who has written seven books on the subject. He was one of the most vocal men in support of second wave feminism, and was also on the board of the NYC chapter of National Organization for Women (NOW) from 1971-1974. Over time, NOW became more radical, and Farrell fell out with them. He later became recognized as a major figure in the Men’s Movement.

Farrell is a controversial figure- particularly with people in Canada’s Old-Left- the anarchists and (fringe) feminists have no patience for this guy. What they did gives us a very good example of the world they’d like to see in the future. And, I can assure you, it’s a future that very few of us want to see…

The radicals, as they do, were yelling out accusations that Farrell promotes and celebrates rape, and that the people who were going to attend his speech were sexist ‘rape apologists’. They blocked the doors, yelled bad words and insults while aggressively (and physically) confronting with the police- and some of the Old-Lefties began targeting and insulting the ticket holders.

It’s a scene we’ve seen many times before in Vancouver and Toronto- an act of mob bullying…

There were many familiar faces in the mob. Currently, the most prominent face is someone identified as Vanja Krajina- one of the people arrested at the G20. According to a story in the McGill Daily, Krajina was a ‘legal observer‘ at the G20 who was improperly arrested (as many people were thanks to the presence and actions of the anarchists). She had a bottle of saline for her contact lenses, and a vinegar soaked bandanna. She was charged with conspiracy to commit an indictable offence and conspiracy to use explosives.

Obviously, if the charge was based on what she was carrying on her person, she wasn’t carrying any explosives. We don’t know what information the police had, so we can’t judge whether she was part of a conspiracy. She has, however, commented on this site before defending Alex Hundert- a convicted G20 ringleader who is currently in prison for teaching Ontario’s youth how to ‘de-arrest’ people from the police. On a side-note, Hundert has been steadfastly supported by well known feminist Judy Rebick.

Krajina has also been actively fighting with Jonah Schein’s beloved Ontario Coalition for Poverty (OCAP)- a ‘militant’ group who are closely tied with the unions, Common Cause, and the city’s ragtag groups of anarchists. Here you can see her having a temper tantrum after City Councillor Kristyn Wong-Tam refused to accept an audience with anarchists whose home burned down on anarchist anti-nuclear campaigner “Flagpole” Alex Balch’s beloved George Street.

[image]
Click for full view

It’s not that hard to imagine why Wong-Tam didn’t want to include the anarchists in the meeting- they have a history of causing disruptions, breaking things, and disrespecting everyone around them.She’s obviously learned the lesson that politicians like the NDP’s David Eby, Jonah Schein and MP Andrew Cash still need to learn. This is not the sort of behaviour that’s conducive to building a solid and civil society.
Anyhow, back to the incident at UofT. There was a video taken during this debacle (at the bottom of this article), and it’s caused quite the stir in the online world. Krajina is one of the major stars of the video- she was obviously there for more than just blocking the doors. Instead, she started stalking some of the ticket holders, swearing and yelling insults at them.
Here’s what she said to some poor ticket holder:

> You should be ashamed of yourself- you’re fucking scum. Fucking rape apologist, incest supporting, women hating, fucking scum.

She then displayed that she has an abysmal understanding of logic:

> Why do you pay money to to fucking for, a fucking rape apologist if rape apologist if you aren’t, fucking, one!

At 1:21 on the video you will see Marque Brill from the Ontario Coalition of Poverty (OCAP)- he’s a leader with ‘Black Bloc’ types who busted Toronto up during the G20. According to CausePimps.ca, Brill is a paid protester, he’s OCAP’s webmaster, and he was involved in the contemptuous takeover/shutdown of Ryerson University’s CKLN radio. There’s also an interesting story about his dodgy use of someone’s credit card. CausePimps also says he’s a close associate of Andy Lehrer– a man who followed me on Twitter shortly before I published this story, then unfollowed me shortly after.
[image]
At 2:08, on the far-left side of the video, we can see Julian Ichim – he’s one of Toronto’s least savoury anarchists who recently participated in interrupting Remembrance day with a couple of Afghani radical women. Canada’s radical website rabble.ca promoted the two women after they did this. Judy Rebick was a founder of Rabble.ca- they’ve been known to publish outright slander.

Amanda Lickers is on the video at 2:18. More recently, she was a speaker at Zach Ruiter's anti-nuclear meetingover the GE-Hitachi plant in West Toronto. That's the anarchist-led meeting MPP Jonah Schein and MP Andrew Cash attended together.
Anarchist CUPE leader and schoolteacher Ashleigh Ingle shows up on the video (for real this time, I promise) yelling out at a cop at 3:14 in the video, later, at 3:31 she yells out "fucking pigs" to the cops. In-between you will see her right up-front as the lines of radicals pushed their way into the police. It's my understanding that she's a PhD student at the UofT- it looks like she is going to have some explaining to do. (She also wrote an interesting article about the Canadian Federation of Students recently).
It seems that may just happen. The UofT's Provost's office published a letter about this incident today– it appears that he's frowning about the events that occurred at the university that night. Here's what he had to say about them:
"The vast majority of the University of Toronto community understands that freedom of expression is vital to the mission of universities and cannot be reserved for those with whom one agrees. It is therefore heartening that many members of our community with otherwise divergent views have recognized that the disruption of this event by protesters was a threat to free speech."
And they're right. The entire premise of the protest was to shame and stop people from going into Farrell's speaking engagement. The people behind the protest feel that Farrell doesn't have the right to speak his mind. If you watch Farrell's lecture, there's nothing he said that matched what the protesters said about him. There was nothing said that could be construed as hate speech- at least, not inside the auditorium.
The Old-Left dominated University of Toronto's Student Union made a statement about the event- framing Farrell as a monster, and the protesters as heroes. They labelled the protesters as conducting an 'information picket' in-front of the event- despite the fact the video shows they were (admittedly) blocking people from entering the event. Their level of misrepresentation has only been beaten when the Quebec student union KLASSE lied about the number of people at a student protest (a lie brought to us through Rebick's beloved Rabble.ca).
One of the reasons that this story has become so big is because it was picked-up by a popular Men's Movement website called A Voice For Men. They were, justly, disgusted by what happened at this protest- they, as well as the Provost's office and most reasonable people understood that there was an injustice here, and they've shared the story with the world. This site is very popular.
There's a very heated discussion going on in the comments for this article- and it appears that many people are out for blood. There are some good, and some bad assumptions and plans being made. One of their reader's natural instincts is to make an example of Vanja Krajina. It wound't be the first time this happened.
Probably the most well-known instance of this was with Vancouver Schoolteacher Sasha Wiley-Shaw (Why is it always teachers? Should we be concerned about that?) in Vancouver. Wiley-Shaw first came to public attention misrepresenting the injuries she sustained while being arrested at the Casseroles protests in Vancouver where they 'marched in solidarity' for the Quebec student strikes. More recently, she was caught on a video cutting-down positively worded Men's Right's posters on the side of a construction site in Vancouver. (The posters were placed with permission)

A video was made about Wiley-Shaw by Myerku Media– he assigned her the nickname Creepy Bittergrrl. The video made a number of very valid points, and was right on-the-money in many ways. It was a very well-produced video too- with the exception that it includes a couple of animated dildos. So, it was a bit controversial. Wiley-Shaw is now a globally known name. People are speculating that Krajina is about to suffer the same fate. Personally, I believe that would be energy misspent. Yes, there should be a discussion about the individuals involved- they were engaged in a public demonstration where there were dozens of people taking pictures with cameras and cellphones. But, overall, the focus should be on the core problem- the bullies who have been terrorizing people on the streets of Toronto. This was not an isolated incident- it's an ongoing pattern.
The University and City of Toronto has a serious problem on it's hands- and, it's not just this city, the same thing is happening in Vancouver, Montreal and universities across the country. The people behind this, and similar, events have been getting increasingly bold in their attempts to 'Rabble' up trouble in our cities. They've beencausing immeasurable harm to Canada's indigenous communities, nuclear power activism, Gay Pride marches, Israel/Palestine marches, Remembrance Day ceremonies, the G20, The 2010 Olympics, the Quebec Student strikes, and so much more.
What happened at the UofT that day is just one side of how this group of bullies operates. Their violence extends long past the protest. They engage in coordinated character assassinations, cyber bullying, calls to friends and family, and physical attacks. People who disagree with them are often left having to literally watch their backs while they walk through Toronto's streets.
Ashleigh Ingle's ex-partner, Brandon Gray once described how one of these organizations worked like an obedience cult. They don't just rip-up the people they are opposing- they are also continually mauling non-conformists within their groups. These groups prey on the young, naïve, poor, indigenous, new immigrants- whatever's the flavour of the day. They leave a long trail of damaged people in their wake.
The UofT has a number of organizations that have become toxic like this over time. Ingle was an officer in the radical CUPE 3902- a union representing UofT academic staff. The Graduate Student Union's building has become a centre of activities for many on-campus anarchists. And, now, the undergraduate student union is writes a press release defending the people who were blocking free speech.
This is happening at universities across the country- there was a similar incident at Vancouver's Simon Fraser University when some people wanted to open a Men's Centre. Many people believe that the glue that holds the radicals together across universities is the Canadian Federation of Students. It's common knowledge that their politics don't match the will of the average student- the CFS has been accused of hijacking social movements for some time now.
The problem here is bigger than a few individuals who misbehaved at a protest. The problem is that Canada hasmany members of our government, academic faculty, mass media, and non-profits who have been aiding, promoting and/or encouraging people to behave this way.

If I've been a bit hard on people like Judy Rebick, David Eby, Sid Ryan, Professor David McNally, Professor Jim Deutsch, Antonia Zerbisias, Andrew Cash and Jonah Schein it's because I so desperately want to see one or more of them take leadership and stop all of the carnage. Bad things are happening, individuals are getting hurt, causes are getting hurt- truth and honour are becoming a thing of the past.
So, who's going to take this on? Any volunteers? Who's brave enough?

Some weekend thoughts and two bullies

December 14, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Just a note to wish everyone a good weekend. It has been a very busy week for the men's movement, and for AVfM in particular. We have every reason to believe that next week will be even busier, as the backlash for publicly profiling the violent ideologues at the University of Toronto will likely pick up a little steam.

I was interviewed by Sarah Del Giallo of the National Post yesterday regarding the series of articles we have run. One of the questions she posed was more of an observation that the people at U of T we have profiled were all women. I explained, quite honestly, that we dealt with the information that came in to us as it happened, and that as our ongoing investigation uncovers the identities of men engaged in illegal activity at that protest, we will cheerfully give them their due attention on this website.

Some of that information has started to come in. But as always we want to appeal directly to readers to add to the portfolio with whatever information you can gather that we can confirm as accurate.

In that spirit, I offer you this snip from the now viral video of the event.

[image]

It is a picture, courtesy of our friend Scatmaster, that really does say 1000 words. The man who you see from the back is the one that was trying to attend the lecture to find some peace with the fact that two of his male friends had committed suicide within a very short period of time. Note the looks on the faces of the men blocking his way. Note the intimidation and threatening posture of both of them.

They are blocking his free entrance through a doorway. Their action is illegal, and in my personal opinion, cowardly and despicable.

And in the video you can see the gleeful taunting and clapping of the already identified Vanja Krajina as the dejected young man is lead away from the thugs by police.

These are two white knights acting as feminist muscle against a man for the egregious offense of wanting closure on his grief and loss.

These are precisely the deplorable type of individuals who need to be publicly named and shamed for their actions.

My wish for everyone's good weekend was sincere, but there is obviously still much to do.

Dropping the “F” bomb at CATO

December 14, 2012 | by Robert O'Hara | Link | Original Link

On Tuesday, December 11, I attended an event at the CATO Institute in Washington D.C., featuring Greg Lukianoff, President of The Foundation for Individual Liberties in Education. He was giving a talk on his excellent new book “Unlearning Liberty: Campus Censorship and the End of American Debate,” which every MRA interested in the state of our education system should read.

Several weeks ago a very good friend of mine who had recently taken the Red Pill and is now a fan of AVFM, it’s radio shows and contributors, told me about it so I bought the book and read it in preparation for the event. I was very excited as The FIRE is a very important organization that deals in large part with the very same issues that MRAs concern ourselves with regarding our education system.

The book thoroughly handled what students face in regard to free speech rights on campus as well as deliberate efforts to indoctrinate them in ideologies they may not agree with-including, but not limited to, feminism. Covered were the “Power and Control Wheel” at Michigan State University, the April 4 directive and many other examples of the erosion of free speech, right to due process and the caustic atmosphere on college campuses that demonstrably affect male students.

In fact, I believe as many others do, that many of these polices target male students in a deliberate attempt to marginalize males and masculinity.

The zeitgeist currently in place in our education system, primary through post secondary, is authored by a radical feminist agenda hell bent on putting male students at a severe disadvantage. The impetus for this has been, among other things, the red herring issue of the wage gap and the myth that men and women have the same tastes, proclivities and aptitudes when it comes to academic pursuits.

And, of course, a whole lot of good old fashioned hatred.

I arrived at their facility on Massachusetts Avenue not far from the Washington Convention Center at 11:30am as they suggested in order to get a good seat at the event. The CATO Institute has a stellar reputation as a congenial place to exchange and explore ideas and they definitely lived up to it within the first five minutes I walked in the door. The people were friendly, well mannered and carried themselves with a non pretentious brand of class which I warmed up to immediately.

I was given a name tag prepared for me with the registration info I had provided online with my name, title and the words “A Voice for Men” written prominently below. As I put it on I felt an apprehensive sense of pride knowing that I was about to present myself conspicuously as an MRA, something that most MRAs find hard to do for understandable reasons. But of course that was the entire reason I was there.

The theater style room in which they hold their speaking events was modest but impressive. It was well accoutered with an appropriate sound system, a well lighted stage and an impressive set of presentation screens in back of the podium and panelist seats. The room also had an array of cameras, the main one being in the back to record the speakers and others on either side of the stage to record audience questions.

"Nice" I said to myself "I am going to ask an awkward question about feminists and feminist ideologues in our education system and everyone who watches the CATO institutes vids is going to see me do it. Yea!"
The presentation was excellent. The host was flanked by Greg Lukianoff on his right and two free speech activists on his left. Lukianoff was summoned to the podium to give his presentation which summarized his book very nicely. Afterward, the two student activists spoke about their experiences and I found them very impressive as well. The entire event is worth spending the 81 minutes watching it as it is a brilliant analysis of why our education system is producing dolts who cannot think critically and those that dare try are targeted like ground moles on a miniature golf course.

Q & A time came and I was anxious to get my questions across. After several others spoke up they announced that they had only enough time for one more question and thankfully they chose me. I made sure to call out feminists directly and brought up the specific example of events and the University of Toronto where Warren Farrell spoke a few weeks ago.
I asked that if in light of those events and the long history of feminist thuggary and brass intimidation in our education system, when, and or if, the higher education community would come to grips with and acknowledge the hatefulness of feminism- in so many words of course. I also asked if the stepping down of Russlyn Ali bode well for the possible repeal of the Dear Colleague Letter.
I knew that asking these questions would, at the very least, bring on an air of unease but was pleasantly surprised by the electric atmosphere that it induced. I could hear people squirming in their seats and I swear I heard one person actually hiss. On review of the video I saw one woman vacating the auditorium in back of me. I don't think she was leaving for the ladies room. Mind you this is at the CATO institute.
Lukianoff was clearly uncomfortable with the first question. He referenced the happenings at Michigan State and the April 4 directive in a passionate way but did not dare say the word "feminist," and asked me if I had actually read his book to which I answered "yes."
I want to assert that I totally understand his discomfort with my question. In fact, I knew that my line of questioning would elicit such a response. Mr. Lukianoffis a brilliant man who deserves all the attention of MRAs and those concerned with men and boys in our education system.
However, he failed to directly answer my first question. And there is a reason for that:

Because he was scared.

I understand. I really do, as do most people reading this now do. But someone has to publicly call out this hateful ideology. I did this using my own name and my title affiliation with a Men's Rights organization.
Now, I am not preaching or claiming some type of moral authority by doing so. Their have been far too many MRAs that have paid a terrible price for their activism for me to even consider that. All that I am saying is that the time for silent and anonymous activism is going to have to come to an end soon and it may as well be sooner than later.

After the event ended and I stood up thinking that no one would take an interest in what I had to say, I was immediately approached by three individuals saying that they really appreciated what we were doing even though they had never heard of A Voice for Men.
One man said that he was interested in starting something in West Virginia concerning divorced men. Another simply said "you are doing a great thing, but man do you have a long way to go" and another man, who I would later share lunch with, only wanted me to tell him all about what we were doing.
All of this happened within ten seconds of me getting up to approach Lukianoff so I could tell him how much I appreciated FIRE and the book he wrote while giving him am AVfM business card. Mr. Lukianoff seemed somewhat annoyed by my approaching him after a brief conversation with my new friends, but that was ok. I gave him the card while telling him how much I admired FIRE and him as an individual. I do not expect an email back from him.
Next came a most pleasing experience. A FREE LUNCH!
Upstairs was a large glass encompassed room where fresh sandwiches were served along with potato chips and soda. That may sound a bit cheesy but I assure you it was quite tasty and well presented. I told the staff that they did a very nice job and they responded with pride: "we do it up right here." I liked that, and again, I appreciated the spirit of the CATO institute and their hospitality. This is a rare organization that I think people should support.
I looked across the room and in the very back I saw one of the men that approached me beckoning to join him. I was delighted. Seated at the table were him and two other women. I sat down and he and I chatted about men and men's rights issues as if he were a long time contributor to an MRA blog. He was definitely one of those who had taken the red pill but just now realized that there was a movement behind that pill. I recognized the glow in his eyes as I have seen it so many times when I talk about men and men's rights to other people who are ready for the message.
And make no mistake, there are so many people ready for the message if you will only speak it.
One of the women sitting there stuck out her hand and introduced herself. I obliged with my hand and introduced myself.
She said "I have a son who is 15 and I think that he is one of those boys that you are concerned about." She had a tender, worried look in her eyes and I understood immediately where she was coming from. I asked her "is your boy in trouble? Has anyone in the school he is in targeted him because he is a boy."
"No" she said. "It's just that because he is a boy he feels that all of the girls have an unfair advantage over him and he tells me about it. It's like he will always come second and there is nothing he can do about it."
She displayed a mothers concern in her face and I felt for her and her son. I understood exactly what they were going through- the typical experience that a 15 year old boy goes through in our public education system and parents who feel helpless to do anything to help their own children.

We talked for a time and I exchanged cards with her. Things wound down and people returned to work or whatever they were doing before . I bid farewell to them. I was thankful that I had met them all as they were all very good people.
I am not trying to compare what I did with what JTO has done in Vancouver or what other MRAs have done elsewhere in the world, putting themselves at personal risk and professional dissolution. But I have to say that we must come out of our shells soon. Anonymous activism in the MRM has to come to an end. It just wont cut it anymore. I totally understand why some may wish to be anonymous, but seriously, we got to present ourselves directly as who we are and not phantoms in online forums.
Do not tell me that there are not opportunities for advocacy in your location. And do not tell me that if you speak our you will always be shunned or demonized. You may well be, but people are just as hungry for our message as they are uncomfortable with it. In fact, our mission is inexorable. The price for failure is too high.
If there is a school board meeting your town or hall meeting in your locale, participate and bring up the Boy Crisis, however subtle or overt. If there is some town hall meeting with local politicians vying for power confront them with a specific mens' rights issue. You may or may not be surprised by the response, but you will never find out by remaining silent.

Mass shooting in Connecticut school

December 14, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]
This morning a tragedy has happened in Connecticut. A shooting rampage has occurred at an elementary school there and current reports state that 27 people, including 18 children are dead, with an entire classroom still unaccounted for.
At this time the editorial staff of AVfM extends their deepest sympathies to the victims of this tragedy.
We are also unfortunately forced to pause and consider that elements in the feminist community will, as they have done historically, attempt to spin this horrific incident into something inspired by or connected to the MRM.
We urge MRAs not to react to this kind of provocation, and to just focus our attentions and sympathies on the victims of this sad event.
Paul Elam, on behalf of the editorial staff of AVfM
Addendum: After encouragement from a long time reader who commented for the first time, suggesting that I close comments on this thread, I am forced to agree. By the time he made the comment, David Futrelle was already using comments from the thread in order to push his lies, standing on the bodies of those dead children and over the sobbing of their traumatized, grieving parents.
With apologies to readers, I cannot enable that any further. Comments are closed.

NCFM demands congress end war on men

December 15, 2012 | by NCFM | Link | Original Link

Letter from NCFM Adviser Dr. Gordon E. Finley

The "War on Women" essentially is a power and control grab and guilt trip diversion by the National Organization of Women (NOW) cartel. No one is waging war on women. However, it is impossible to rationally conclude that political forces are not waging "War on Men."

The Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) is center stage to the War Against Men. NCFM Advisor Phil Cook and I over a decade ago discussed what I call the Women Industry Wheel (WIW), though it might be more aptly called the Women Industry War Wagon Wheel (WIWWW).

Phil thought VAWA was the hub of the wheel while I still think VAWA is the grease that keeps it turning. The hub, in my opinion, is radical feminism's "politically correct" influence and resulting control of our educational system, especially in higher education. Looking at things rationally, Women Studies, female oriented graduate schools, misuse of Title IX, and so forth, though such influences are broader and more debilitating mechanisms of social control and cultural revision.

Every American and millions of others around the world have been impacted by VAWA directly or indirectly. If you think not, then take a few minutes to think about that which you take for granted regarding relationship violence, that which you have been taught to believe as true. Think about it in the context of those you care about, know, or have heard about, who have been involved in a situation involving family violence. It is precisely that reason – every American and more being impacted – that pressures applied by a group of independent men, women, and family organizations finally were able to apply the brakes to slow VAWA down long enough to check the grease.

For the first time in the history the reauthorization of VAWA is stalled in Congress.

As I type, Congress is in the final throes of the current session and headed for holiday recess. Washington wants to go home. It's rumored that secret negotiations are taking place; specifically it is rumored that Vice-President Biden – father of VAWA – is putting the bum's rush on House members to pass the reauthorization before the recess. Hence the letter above to Congress.

Hopefully the letter will remind our all Senators and Representatives that everyone bleeds, everyone needs services, and everyone needs protection from violence, even violence committed by women.

There is no more absurd legislation than VAWA. As Dr. Finley says in the letter above;

> …the ideological foundations of VAWA discriminate against men. Conceptually, VAWA is based on the Duluth Power and Control Wheel model, which falsely presumes that all domestic violence is perpetrated > by evil patriarchal males against virtuously innocent females. There is no research support for this false gender ideology.

If you took the time as I suggested above to think about what you think you know about VAWA and relationship violence, including those you know or may know of who have been impacted by it, know this too… The Duluth Power and Control Wheel and associated programs condemn the use of guilt, power, and control. Exactly the same concepts used today by NOW and their cartel to continue to wage their war on men. The identical power and control tactics are used by VAWA supporters to bully Senators and Representatives into compliance.

Such bullying mocks claims of evil patriarchal males and virtuous innocent females, but yields insight into the darker power and control psyches of radical feminism. They have to keep the wheels of the War on Men wagon freshly greased at any and all costs.

VAWA is a farce of incredibly dangerous proportions in its present form. Let us hope that our elected officials are not bullied into reauthorizing VAWA this session, especially if it continues to discriminate against half our population. Better to wait until the next session when more considered and well reasoned negotiations might result in a non discriminatory version of VAWA, a version that protects all of us.

Please call your elected officials and demand it.

It could happen.

Harry Crouch, NCFM President

To a stoic and patient man

It's been a busy week, and indeed a busy month for the men's rights movement. The public displays of hatred and violence by feminists at the University of Toronto talk in November by Warren Farrell continues to deliver insight into what's motivating an apparently violent and hate driven opposition to anyone attempting to address the human rights concerns of men and boys; concerns so real they're gloated over by lionized gender ideologues like Hanna Rosin.

For reference, Rosin launched herself to international fame with a preening, strutting presentation given at the Technology Education and Design conference called Ted Talks, in which she celebrated the escalating exclusion of men and boys in what is now a feminized education system.

And that's what Dr. Farrell was addressing on November 16 to the roar of a crowd of feminists – remembering that feminism is all about equality, screaming – among other things, "Fuck Warren Farrell," and the repeated claim that in spite of acknowledgement of the reality the core issues even by opponents of this human rights movement, that we're secretly lobbying to legalize rape, and grave robbing for carnal purposes, and promote violence and round up all the wimmin-folk and send them to the sammich mines.

But burned into all of our memory is the image of a comely young woman screaming and spitting at a 26 year old man she didn't even know that he was "fucking scum, fucking rape apologist incest supporting scum." Like the other violent, hateful, hard core opponents to the recognition of male human beings as human, as deserving human rights – this spitting and cursing hate monger has been identified. Vanja Krajina is her name.

And as we've published the names of other young, violent individuals who would condemn boys and men to continued marginalization and institutional prejudice – we are being criticized, excoriated and vilified for doing so, because public sentiment might fall against those who publicly cheer for the suppression of free speech, who openly gloat about the dis-enfranchisement of male students, and who hide when challenged by their own lies about the true human rights goals of the MRM.

That's called accountability, and it's a good thing.

In fact, the 26 year old man who weathered that torrent of "you are fucking scum" from the young and hateful Vanja Krajina wrote an open letter to her, which I will summarize here, and then address.

He forgives her. He acknowledged that she wasn't just having a bad day, or operating from misunderstanding – and that she really and truly meant to do him harm. But he forgives her, and even invited her to reach out to him, offering a clean start, total absolution and let's be friends. He points out, quite correctly that as an adult, a world traveler and a man, he is not much harmed by the hurled insults of an entitled elite.

I certainly admire this man for his forbearance and mature disposition. Indeed, I have great respect for him. But he is incorrect on two particular points. The first error being that for Krajina and her ideological comrades – it is not only self possessed adults like our stoic young man who must weather the abuse of violent and hateful opponents of basic human rights.

It is every young boy in our society, growing up and being educated in a system which regards masculinity as a defect, as a pathology. Yes, our stoic, self possessed traveler of the world and student of life can shrug off such abuse, but what about those who can't, such as children whose identities are forming in such a toxic climate of hatred?

The other problem with automatic forgiveness and the benign offer of an open door and a clean start for our young hateful woman, and millions of her ideological fellows, is that this forbearance, this forgiveness, this indulgence is what created her.

It is this kind of enabling that created two generations of women for whom no accountability was ever attached to speech or action. It is how we arrived in a world which young, attractive, middle class women can be reasonably expected to be, behind their smooth youthful faces, the proponents of a violent, irrational hatred. It is how we have helped foster a determined entrenched, and publicly supported opposition to the universality of human rights, freedom of expression, and support for the hatred of an entire sexual demographic – simply because they have a Y chromosome.

The absence of consequence, the absence of even a concept of personal accountability – and the endless willingness to forgive, to smooth over, to accommodate generations of horrible bigots is exactly what made their bigotry flourish.

This is the enabling and indeed aiding and abetting of hate and violence. And with all the respect in the world for that young man for his forbearance, and for what appears is a motivation of kindness and tolerance, he has added to the problems face by other men and boys.

The endless excusing of what really boils down to an embedded, ideologically driven hate and learned sociopathy by individuals like Krajina – cultivated by a lifetime of enabling, forbearance, and detachment from any personal accountability, is a problem as significant as the hate itself.

The price to be paid for continued forgiveness, continued tolerance of more hatred from the adherents of the gender ideology with a half century of rising dominance isn't simply the verbal abuse that the average young man can shrug off. It is the immersion of children in this hate, and an increasingly dysfunctional society, in which hate and violence in support of populist mob prejudice is not just normalized, it is characterized and treated as something good.

Happy birthday radfem scthhum

December 16, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

It is the holiday season. It is a time for giving; a time to open our hearts to being generous and thoughtful, especially toward those who are in some way deprived.
It is also a birthday celebration of sorts. Today marks the one year anniversary of the outing of all the radical misandrists at Radfem Hub.
For those new to AVfM, this was a shining moment for feminism. It was the day that Agent Orange presented documentation to the world of the hateful, murderous, gendercidal, child abusing fucking sthhcum that infests the feminist community.
It was the day the truth about what feminism has ultimately fostered could no longer be denied.
The problem was in the sheer volume of documentation (all that hate takes a while to produce). It resulted in a huge collection of documents that could best be described as their version of femi-leaks.
Damning as it is, it was just too cumbersome. So, being the civic minded individuals they are, Agent Orange and his team have compiled the AO Files into a much more manageable format, complete with highly detailed, searchable .pdf's.
This year, it is the gift that keeps on giving.
And giving.
And giving.
Kinda like feminism itself.
Happy birthday radfem scthhum. And Merry Christmas to each and every one of you lowlife motherfuckers.

Jezebel's Kate Harding joins the MRM

December 16, 2012 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

---

Well, almost.
TLDR;
[box icon=""]
Kate Harding, a feminist contributor at Jezebel has stated the following.

- Jezebel contributor Kate Harding has admitted the major issues addressed by the men's rights movement are legitimate and correct;
- Jezebel contributor Kate Harding is pretending that feminism has not opposed the human rights issues of the MRM she now acknowledges as legitimate;
- Kate Harding of Jezebel admits that the MRM is a strictly nonviolent movement;
- Jezebel contributor Kate Harding has attempted to claim that she, and feminists in general are responsible for the current successes of the MRM in mainstreaming many of this movement's issues, including father's rights, reciprocity in DV, the invisibility of violence against men, etc;
- Kate Harding, and likely the editors of Jezebel are also evidently frightened by their loss of the feminist monopoly on public gender discourse, as evidenced by a public temper tantrum laced with repetitions of: "Fuck you MRAs".

[/box]

Feminists are now claiming credit for MRA successes. Kate Harding, a commentator on Jezebel.com, has a few warm words for all of us in the men's rights movement.
Fuck you, she says.
She gives herself an out, wrapping her diatribe in plausible deniability by announcing that it is the site's "first annual week of desperate emotional cleansing and unhinged psychic purging."
If Harding needs to practice some necessary mental hygiene, (she does) I'd much prefer it not be attached to the human rights movement of which I am a part.
However, putting aside the excuses for incoherence, the first paragraph of Harding's absurd rant encapsulates an emerging change in feminist tactics.

> Fuck you, first of all, for making it nearly impossible for decent men struggling with abusive partners or unfair custody arrangements to get the help they need and deserve. You have forever tainted those issues with your rage-filled, obsessively anti-woman horseshit, to the point where it's become difficult for any rational, compassionate person to > trust a man who claims he's been screwed over in family court or abused by a female partner, even if he has.

Kate Harding is trying to position feminism as the driver behind the accomplishments of the men's rights movement,such as bringing to public notice the anti-father bias in the family courts. According to Harding, we are screwing up the noble efforts of feminists to bring attention to men's issues.
You read that right, the feminists have figured out they are losing ground rapidly. In response, they are trying to put themselves in front of the parade. They are literally switching sides, and hoping nobody notices.
I suppose we should invite Kate Harding to join the AVFM's and the NCFM's Judicial Activism Committee. Perhaps she can help us in the disbarment of the next corrupt family court prosecutor.
Hi Carletta.
I couldn't make this stuff up, and no, AVfM has not recently partnered with The Onion.
According to Harding:

> That's the thing, MRAs. By and large, American feminists are really into equality, involved fathers, justice for all, dismantling bullshit gender roles, and helping folks leave dangerous relationships. We would be the natural allies of MRAs, if MRAs were sincerely committed to the causes with which they claim to be chiefly concerned.

Silly me, and here I was thinking that feminists opposed the decades of struggle of men's and fathers rights activists for legal recognition and equality under the law.
Oh, wait, they do.
Quoting Gloria Woods of the Michigan chapter of NOW:

> Michigan NOW opposes forced joint custody for many reasons: it is unworkable for uncooperative parents; it is dangerous for women and their children who are trying to leave or have left violent husbands/fathers; it ignores the diverse, complicated needs of divorced families; and it is likely to have serious, unintended consequences on child support.[3]

In other words, fathers gaining shared custody might impact the amount of money divorcing wives can shake them down for. Stop the bad menz!
But surely, the feminist position of the 1990's was just a blip in an otherwise egalitarian movement, right?
Barry Nolan, a Boston columnist and feminist wrote this earlier in 2012:

> Angry, radical men's groups believe males are being victimized by out-of-control judges and politicians. They're wrong and they're dangerous and they need to be stopped.[1]

According to Nolan, we're wrong, dangerous, and we need to be stopped. Mary Kellett, the Ellsworth County Assistant D.A. recently recommended for suspension by the Maine Overseers of the Bar probably thinks so too, as does her boss, Carletta Bassano. Contrasting Mr. Nolan's idiotic lies, a small detour into another oppositional ideologue's attack on the MRM is worth revisiting.

> It should be mentioned that the SPLC did not label MRAs as members of a hate movement; nor did our article claim that the grievances they air on their websites – false rape accusations, ruinous divorce settlements and the like – are all without merit.[2]

That's what Arthur Goldwag of the SPLC admitted in the middle of his backpedaling after publicly crapping the bed in an inept attempt to paint AVFM as a hate organization. I don't know if the SPLC is still publicly partnered with radicalhub – where Pam O'Shaughnessy's 4000 word cheerleading for male exterminating eugenics is still proudly hosted.

But according to Kate Harding of Jezebel, "By and large, American feminists are really into equality."

Of course they are. And now that we're winning, Kate and her comrades would like to quietly change their stripes to match ours, and pretend our fight was theirs all along.

Of course, in her enthusiasm to type the phrase "fuck you" as many times as possible, Harding makes a huge number of concessions, not just admitting most of the broad arguments made by the MRM are entirely legitimate, but actually trying to claim support for them.

You're a bit late to the party Kate, but come on in, put your beer in the fridge.

Unfortunately, although conceding the legitimacy of the arguments of this movement, she's not quite ready to let go of her feminist tendencies to field straw man arguments; to mischaracterize and attribute sinister motives to MRAs. In fact, although seeming to position herself to claim credit for successes of MRAs, she takes several paragraphs to outright lie, presenting feminist-distorted versions of many issues discussed in the men's rights movement.

Harding claims that addressing the male half of victims of domestic violence, or the substantial fraction of sexual assault and rape impacting males constitutes "trying to make it all about [men]".

Considering that feminists discussing violence seem incapable of doing so without the limiting clause "against women", the accusation "Fuck you for showing up every time women speak, especially about rape and abuse, and trying to make it all about you," seems more like projection than observation. In addition – the mention of "every time women speak" is a well-worn rhetorical trick. It is the conflation of feminism (an ideology) and women (a group of people).

Apparently, Kate Harding is not aware that these two things are not interchangeable, and that a growing number of the women she attempts to lay claim to are rejecting her violent, hateful ideology of gender. In fact, a growing number of women are MRAs.
Harding also characterizes any mention of the feminist hero Marc Lepine not conforming to feminist narrative as "derailing". Unfortunately, Lepine committed his public muder-suicide 23 years ago in the Canadian province of Quebec, due at least in part to his own dysfunctional and abusive upbringing.
Hanging his behavior on the door of every male human being is an act of nearly transcendent dishonesty and depravity, and attributing his actions to men, or to the MRM is frankly craven. Pointing this out, or pointing out any of the relevant details of Gamil Garbi's life which influenced that unfortunate outcome is "derailing" according to Harding.
Any examination straying from approved, sanitized, women-are-victims-men-are-evil standard narrative, that's not allowed.
She also demonstrates difficulty with her reading comprehension. MRAs, according to Kate Harding, want a cookie for not killing anyone. While it's heartening to see she finally grasps the fundamental ethic of nonviolence of the MRM, we don't want cookies, we want the basic human rights which women in the 21st century take for granted. Equal provision as victims of violence, basic reproductive rights, the restoration of presumption of innocence in the courts, recognition as human beings apart from male utility as providers of labor and money for other people's benefit, and as designated sponges for and dispensers of violence. Those things are not a cookie, Kate.
However, in spite of her many lies, and her tendency to impute motive, Harding is at least mouthing the words of agreement with many of the issues of the MRM.
Unfortunately, she disappoints in her claims that the violent and hateful screaming abuse at the November 16 U of T event have now received death threats. This is a case of the Jezebel who cried wolf.
To understand the "cried wolf" reference, a little back story is necessary.
In the summer of this 2012, I was personally invited by email to participate in a debate, proposed and organized by Jessica Mason-Paull on the topic of "has feminism gone too far?"
I Accepted immediately, but within 24 hours, Mason-Paull had cancelled the event, after receiving death threats for daring to propose such a blasphemous topic.
Jezebel published that those threats had been from MRAs after it was already published by feminist blogs in Vancouver that they had made those threats themselves, posing as MRAs, to silence and intimidate Mason-Paull (and to silence others).
Harding, now writing for Jezebel claims: "Fuck you for making rape and death threats against young women who dared to protest a speaking engagement."
Do I believe there's internet trash talking from uninformed bystanders? Certainly.
Do I accept the claim that a Men's Rights Activist is making death threats? No, because it's nonsense. In fact, it's such obvious nonsense I wonder that Kate Harding is not embarrassed by her own much recycled damselling.

In addition, Kate's claims about Dr Warren Farrell – as an advocate of incest are simple lies. Farrel did 7 years of research on that topic, and one of his most surprising findings was that in some cases, sexual contact between parents and children were seen by those children as positive. He was as shocked and surprised as anyone else, and he documented those findings in the neutral language of a professional scholar. He certainly did not advocate any such contact, nor did he claim "little girls would enjoy being raped by their fathers."
The sordid characterization of such claim reflects the leanings of Harding, and of the source she cited, notably not the published work of Dr. Farrell.
Strangely, Harding precedes each item in a long list of well-documented problems addressed by MRAs with it's own "fuck you". Despite her article's early acknowledgement of the legitimacy of many of the causes of the MRM, she lists many more, pretending they are fictional. Almost as-if she's providing an invitation for a MRA to cite examples of each item she pretends doesn't exist. I suppose, under the editorial guidelines of Jezebel, she can't just come right out and advocate the MRA position directly.
For example:

> Fuck all of you for doing your very best to propagate myths that make it harder for women to be safe—that we're a bunch of lying temptresses who bang hapless men and file bogus rape charges for the lulz

Yeah, that never happens.

http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-2204712/Woman-falsely-claimed-raped-men-regretted-having-sex-jailed-years.html
Harding continues:

> …or that we get into perfectly even fights with our hardworking, loving husbands, then call the cops and have them arrested because we're spiteful bitches.

I don't know whether Harding or anyone else is a spiteful bitch or not. But her disposition, bitchy or otherwise, is irrelevant when considering human behavior across a wide culture. Almost all domestic violence programs, including that informing the procedural guidelines for police responding to domestic disputes uses the Duluth Model as a theoretical foundation. The Duluth model is a pseudo-academic item of feminist fantasy, dressed up in scholarly language, but claiming that all violence is male, even female perpetrated violence. The result of this being that in many cases where men are the victims of domestic violence, or if they are accused of participating in DV – they are arrested based on profiling by an anti male ideology, and not based on evidence or traditional police work.
For Kate Harding to paint over this is simply absurd. She is a joke.
She doesn't come right out and use the word "Sammich" but she comes close.
According to Harding:

> [MRAs] are chiefly concerned with one thing, and one thing only: Putting feminists in their place. Which is in the kitchen at best and in the ground at worst, if you ask these unapologetically misogynistic bags of rot.

Sadly, she appears to have grown so careless that she's gotten sloppy. We (apparently) want to put feminists in the kitchen?
"..Putting feminists in their place. Which is in the kitchen at best.."
I thought the standard lie was that we want to put /women/ back in the kitchen? Feminists and woman aren't the same thing, after all. One word refers to the followers of an ideology, the other identifies people by sex. I certainly don't want Ideologues in my kitchen, or anywhere else in my home. And If we really did hate women as much as it's claimed, how would that work with keeping them in our kitchens? If I hated some group, wouldn't I want to keep them away from me?
But she's not done yet. If not in the kitchen, we want to put "them" (feminists? Women?) in the ground.
Ooh that sounds scary and dangerous, but didn't Harding come right out and admit earlier in the very same article that MRAs are explicitly opposed to violence? Well, not quite, but she came close, saying "because you […] want a fucking cookie for not killing anyone."
As before, it's not a cookie we want. But public recognition as a strictly non violent human rights movement is progress, now that Kate Harding has acknowledged it, albeit grudgingly.
And in an article with entirely too much nonsense to parse it all, I'll skip to one other item of note.

> Your feminist enemies don't hate men; we only hate men who proudly stand up for the rights of abusers, rapists, and deadbeat dads.

This claim illustrates something truly sinister in feminist rhetoric and thinking. The idea that an individual accused of a crime is simply guilty by virtue of the accusation. That's the word "rapist" in Harding's piece, accused, therefore a rapist. Oh yeah, and what about female rapists? While we don't think kindly of them, they're still humans with rights.
Similarly, "deadbeat dads" is another vicious item of invective too often applied to men punished and maligned not because they are irresponsible shirkers but because they have been stripped of their incomes, homes and children and encumbered with an onus to pay exceeding their income.
And yes, we even stand firmly on a principled defence of the rights of abusers. ‡‡ Like the young woman who screamed "fucking scum" at a man attempting to discover answers to why his two friends had commuted suicide. It is her right to broadcast her opinion to the world, and we may criticize her, we would never consider silencing her – or denying any human right to anyone.
Finally, according to Harding:

> The simple fact is, most men don't beat, rape, or resent caring for their own children, and thus have no need for the kind of support and "activism" you specialize in.

Actually, this reality, admitted by Harding – that most men are decent human beings – informs the urgency and the need for what we do. There aren't many of us (MRAs), but that's changing rapidly, and we will not stop. Especially since it's obvious now who is winning: the side actually arguing for human rights. Even feminists like Kate Harding are now trying to switch sides.
And obviously, if Miss Harding would like to publicly and clearly adopt a position in favor of the issues she's admitted, the real concerns of this movement, (reform in the family court, in government or education) she's welcome to contact this site's editorial board as a prospective contributor.
[box icon=""]
Summary:

- Prominent feminists are now aware of the growing success of this human rights movement, and publicly recognize the legitimacy of the core issues of the MRM;
- These feminists are now scrambling to pretend that they, and their movement have not opposed these human rights issues;
- In fact, feminists are now likely to claim that the successes of the MRM, which we achieved despite continuous and relentless opposition from feminists and their organizations – feminists are now pretending these were their fights all along;
- Feminists – including Kate harding of jezebel are now pretending that the MRAs who achieved the small successes towards human rights for men and boys are (according to feminists) /hindering/ the brave, noble and egalitarian feminists pretending now, to have always supported these issues they now publicly recognize as real;

- Although feminists are now pretending to have been on the side of human rights all along, they're as yet unable to stop lying about MRAs, and falsely attributing a motive of evil to us. Baby steps for them, baby steps;
- Kate Harding is invited to contribute as an author at AVfM.

Over the bodies of dead children

December 16, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

It was inevitable, I suppose. As soon as I saw the tragic story of the Sandy Hook School mass shooting on the news, and even through my shock and horror at the evil that swept through that small New England town, I knew I could set my watch and wait till someone attributed this to a problem in masculinity, if not the MRM itself.
I did not have long to wait.
Even while the young bodies were still warm, examiner.com writer William Hamby, who calls himself a "former evangelical Christian and secular activist" penned an article, Connecticut shooting, white males, and mass murder, in which he infers that the cause for the mass murder was frustration by white males that they have lost their power. Of course he ignores any of the evidence already available, such as the young killer being mentally ill and that he targeted mostly white children at the school after killing his mother. Hamby ignores this in his "hypothesis" and then moves straight on to quoting Michael Kimmel, pointing the finger at evil white men.
I chose at the time not to write about this on the AVfM home page. Hamby is a little known, misguided hack with no real audience. His blog draws almost no traffic. So I posted a comment to his article and fed that to the AVfM Facebook page.
[box icon=""]
Comment:
This is quite possibly one of the most disgusting bits of claptrap I have read this year. And that is saying a lot. I am ardently opposed to what the ideology of gender feminism has become, but I would not lower myself to stand on the bodies of dead children and push that agenda over the wailing of their grief stricken parents.
The early indications in this tragedy already point to severe mental illness of the shooter, as has been taken from statements made by those who knew him best. And that would certainly pair well with his horrible actions. But the fact remains that we don't have an inkling yet of what created this madman. And the piece of rubbish you posted takes us nowhere near closer.
Inferring from this horrific incident that it stemmed from loss of white male privilege, and tossing out a politicized, voodoo hypothesis of a couple of gender ideologues as though it were legitimate research makes you look less like a secular activist and more like a glassy eyed ideologue who disposes of science the moment it interferes with your worldview.
You are not a "former evangelical Christian." You are just someone who transferred his faith and dogma to a different deity.
A truly pathetic and toxic article.
[/box]
Apparently that was enough to inspire sufficient "likes" to my comment, and other comments in dissent of this idiots opinion that it angered him (He is both white and male, btw, so be careful here).

He has written a second article on this, Surprising responses to suggestion of White Male crime problem, expressing shock at all the outrage he encountered, and offering a veiled threat to take a "hard look" at the men's rights movement.
I hope he does not have guns.
Anyway, even all this would not warrant attention on the home page here. He is just another bigot with a laptop and lot of bad information.
But now Bigot-in-Chief Michael Kimmel has shown up in the second article to help this aspiring misandrist stoking the fire, as well as stroking Kimmel's notoriously massive ego.
Kimmel leads off his comment with the predictable:

> Thanks for the shout out. I'm not surprised you've heard the virtiol[sic] of the Angry White Male Chorus.

In this, and the rest of Kimmel's comment, he seeks to maintain the myth that the MRM is composed of exclusively whites and males, and thus possibly a part of the problem that Hamby is manufacturing.
I trust there are those who read here, women and men of color, that will not mind taking a moment to go in here, find Kimmel's comment, and publicly out this lying bastard.
Thank you.

Monday Morning Roundup

December 17, 2012 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

Hope you had a good weekend. Here's some stuff you may have missed:
If they ever told you that radical feminists who hate men and boys are not in positions of power and authority that can allow them to take their hatred into the real world in ways that have real consequences, or that they don't exist at all, please be sure to check out the recently updated, much more easily searchable RadFemHub archives from Agent Orange. Yes, we're sorry to burst our bubble, but these haters not only exist, but they're people in tenured academic professions, childcare workers, politicians, and others with political clout. And they hate your sons, brothers, and fathers. Look for yourself.
Our good friends at Jezebel have recently decided that they were for men's rights issues all along, and that it's men's rights advocates who are at fault for men's issues in suicide, homelessness, genital mutilation, family court abuse, debtor's prison, marginalization of male victims, and victims of false allegations. But John the Other congratulates Kate Harding of Jezebel for at least acknowledging that these issues are real and legitimate, even if she thinks it's feminists who've been working on them the last few decades. She is invited to join A Voice for Men as a contributor to help us spread awareness of these issues.
Also, apparently, members of an anti-violence, non-violent human rights movement are apparently now responsible for a mass shooting. Oh wait a minute, no we aren't. But racist, sexist bigots think we are. They also think we're all white and we're all male. Thanks for that, bigots.
In the meantime, Dr. Gordon E. Finley and Harry Crouch of the National Coalition for Men urge all people to write to the U.S. Congress to end the basic civil rights abuses and trashing of the 14th amendment inherent in the so-called Violence Against Women Act (VAWA), which does little to nothing to help violence against women and in the process encourages violence and more against men and boys. They don't, unfortunately, tell you how to find your elected officials. That's OK, I will: Click here to go to govtrack.us, where you can look up who your Representative and your Senator is, if you live anywhere in the United States. If you don't know who your Senators are, or who your representative is, why don't you know? And why haven't you written them? Even if they don't respond, even if they dismiss you, the more of us who write to contact them the more they'll know men's and boys issues matter, and that drives us closer to the day when men are treated as full human beings due the same rights and respect under the law, and the same compassion and consideration as women and girls.
A woman who viciously verbally assaulted a man in Toronto was recently the recipient of a kindhearted effort by the man she assaulted; he made her an open offer of some sort of rapprochement. John the Other thinks him misguided and foolish. Some agree and some don't. Feel free to voice your own position.
Independent reporter Greg Renouf, who says he supports some aspects of feminism, has a report for us on some of the haters who practiced vandalism, assault, intimidation, and censorship at the University of Toronto. Knowing who the enemies of basic human rights for men and boys are is helpful in our view.

And, as usual, we have some cool new entries in the video section, so have fun perusing some of those.
Also, while the folks at Jezebel get hysterical with incoherent rage, we have something refreshing this week: a critic of A Voice for Men who, while we think she gets some things wrong or unfair (we do a lot more real world activism than she thinks) at least gives men's rights some respect, and points to a project that Men's advocates ought to support. Without endorsing her criticism of us (which we think comes from not having explored the site sufficiently, or just not liking our pungent language, or taking issue with a few of our commenters), we do support the project she mentions, so check out her entry on a birth control pill for men, and how you can support that effort. And if you would, try to make her understand that we don't hate her and that we do more around here than sit around bitching about women and indulging in conspiracy theories. Maybe John the Other will even have an answer for her. My own view? Rational critics who don't spew hatred at men are welcomed, even if they are critical of A Voice for Men itself (hey, we aren't for everybody Naomi, but at least try to get it right: we really DO do real world activism, FYI).
Also, the folks at Who Needs Feminism dot ORG (not .com, .org) are still putting up some terrific stuff, some very funny and some very gutwrenching. Check 'em out.
Tales from the Infrared was back for a final episode for the year last week; it was a good show if I do say so myself, with a lot about video gaming especially but lots of other geeky stuff. And the radio crew at AVfM Radio had a great show on why some feminists seem to be very afraid of the men's rights movement. Short take? They're losing their monopoly on the man/woman/female/male discussion and have to put up with other voices, and they don't like it much. Well tough noogies, because we're here to stay. We also had a great show with PatrickHenryist that you probably want to make time to listen to!
Oh and by the way everyone? The Erin Pizzey interview? The one we promised last week? It got delayed in production, but should be out tomorrow or Wednesday. You won't be disappointed, it was worth the wait. I especially hope that the folks at Jezebel read and watch it, and folks like Naomi Chambers for that matter. But we'll see.
Have a fun week everyone.

The most important experiment ever undertaken

December 18, 2012 | by Stephen Jarosek (aka Codebuster) | Link | Original Link

The Nazis were renowned for their famous but useless experiments on human beings. We, however, are much more fortunate, for we now have the results of a much more important experiment on humans, and from which we can draw powerful, practical inferences. Of course this experiment, as any experiment conducted on humans that results in the trashing or loss of lives, has come at great cost. But I think it's been worth it, and I think you will agree.

It's a conversation with the universe that we had to have… should it culminate in our extinction, may something of what we've learned pass on to the greater unified whole. And well it should, for there are lessons here that are relevant to every culture that can possibly exist across the width and span of the universe.

Wars come and go. Every culture has them, and most every culture pretends to learn from them with their sanctimonious appeals to "learn from history." And in spite of their repetitious, inane blather, every culture continues to repeat the same mistakes. Such is the human condition, with wars being their most predictable outcome.

But the experiment that I am referring to is a one-off. It probably won't be repeated, at least in our corner of our galaxy, and at our global scale. But this experiment is different to all the others, because it takes us beyond the human condition, to confront something more profound. For we must now ask ourselves, in what ways are we different to the animals? This experiment that I am referring to goes some way to addressing the following questions:

1) Is human behavior programmed into the genetic code, or is it cultural?

2) Does the genetic code wire the brain, or is it experience that wires the brain?

3) What is the relationship between biology and culture?

4) What happens if we tweak biology? What happens if we tamper with it, and change the nature of experience? What happens if we introduce new experiences and new choices, and what if these radically different options "wire the brain" in new ways, ways that are alien to what we've ever understood and assumed about "the human condition?"

5) What are the repercussions of tampering with biology? What sorts of predictions can we make?

The experiment that I am referring to is the introduction and normalization of our contraceptive technologies into mainstream cultures… that is, cultures comprised of human brains.

We are living in an era of emerging awareness of how brains work. Norman Doidge (2008) has provided a compelling analysis with clinical examples, showing us that the brain rewires itself with experience. These ideas have important implications for the role of culture in rewiring human brains, for ultimately almost all human experience is derived within the context of culture:

> So a neuroplastically informed view of culture and the brain implies a two-way street: the brain and genetics produce culture, but culture also shapes the brain. Sometimes these changes can be dramatic.
> (Doidge, 2008, p. 288)

There is little in this dry, concise summary of Doidge's principle theme to really fire us up, but its implications are fundamentally paradigm-busting. Because men and women make different choices from their culture, these ideas have important implications for the evolution of gender roles within culture, and how men's and women's brains are wired. For example, men's predisposition to favor analytical/spatial oriented activities, like map-reading, and women's predisposition to favor communication oriented activities relating to language use, impact on how the brain is wired and how functional specializations develop within the brain.

This is supported in studies such as that of Haier et al (2005), where it is was found that men's and women's brains differ in the distribution of white (glial) and grey (neural) matter, with intelligence tests showing that on average, men used 6.5 times as much grey matter as women did, but that women used 9 times as much white matter as men did.

From the perspective of the point being made in this post, it is important to emphasize that this glial/neural wiring does not "determine" gender differences in behavior, but evolves as a two-way interplay between male/female biology and culture. By way of example, think of your brain as a colony of neurons and glia, and then think of how a termite colony or a city evolves. The functional divisions in the city (industrial zones, commercial districts, class-differentiated residential zones, etc) evolve more by way of interactions with the environment than by interventions from town-planners.

Throughout his Appendix 1, Doidge (2008) provides a rounded, well-paced introduction to this neuroplastically informed view of culture, and his reference to Michael Merzenich, from an interview by Stefanie Olsen (2005), provides a clearer appreciation of the relevance of his thesis to the modern context:

> The Internet is just one of those things that contemporary humans can spend millions of 'practice' events at, that the average human a thousand years ago had absolutely no exposure to. Our brains are massively remodeled by this exposure–but so, too, by reading, by television, by video games, by modern electronics, by contemporary music, by contemporary 'tools,' etc.
> (Doidge, 2008, p. 306)

Of course our contraceptive devices must surely be factored in with the modern technology in respect of which Merzenich is quoted. And how our contraceptive technologies are implemented is differentiated according to sex and gender. So what might some of the implications be?

Clearly, the choices to which we have been exposed over the past 50 years are unlike anything that has ever gone before. Chateau Heartiste (CH) (2012) agrees, and makes his point with reference to an excerpt from paragraph 17 of the Encyclical Letter of his Holiness Pope Paul VI:

> Not much experience is needed in order to know human weakness, and to understand that men — especially the young, who are so vulnerable on this point — have need of encouragement to be faithful to the moral law, so that they must not be offered some easy means of eluding its observance. It is also to be feared that the man, growing used to the employment of anti-conceptive practices, may finally lose respect for the woman and, no longer caring for her physical and psychological equilibrium, may come to the point of considering her as a mere instrument of selfish enjoyment, and no longer as his respected and beloved companion.
> (Pope Paul VI, 1968, par. 17)

CH makes the following important observations:

- Just as contraceptives predispose men to devaluing women, so too, they predispose women to devaluing men – CH takes pains, however, to emphasize that it's beta men that are being devalued when women exercise their preferences for "risky sex with caddish alpha males on the make." As we shall soon see, CH's beta qualifier is problematic;
- CH guesstimates that his aggregate sexual experiences would have amounted to about one tenth of his actual record, were it not for the ready availability of reliable contraception;
- CH's eminently sensible inference is that, in the absence of reliable contraception:

> A world in which women had to grapple with real, palpable fears of STDs, pregnancy and subsequent abandonment is, not to put too fine a point on it, a really shitty world for womanizers and serial monogamists and uncomplicated lovers of the art of seduction itself. I imagine I'd have to gasp start promising marriage or some such claptrap to any woman I wanted to bang, just to loosen her up enough to unhook her bra.

In other words, the ready availability of reliable contraceptive technologies throughout culture impacts directly on the choices that men and women make… and therefore, on how men's and women's brains are wired. That CH's sexual exploits would have been truncated by 90%, by his estimate, implies a serious variation in lifestyle attributable to the contraceptive pill.

Of course CH's anecdotal opinion does not constitute the sort of empirical verification we require of falsifiable science, but what we are discussing is not amenable to traditional analytical methods. Because the subject matter has such serious implications, however, these questions do need to be addressed. We can't put them to the side while we wait for genocentric science to "catch up."
Let us review. By diminishing the inconvenience of ill-timed pregnancy to almost zero, the contraceptive pill impacts on cultural logic principally in the following ways:

- The commoditization of sex. Sex has been removed from its principle role relating to reproduction. Rather, sex has become mainstreamed as a leisure activity, a commodity, a form of entertainment, something with value to which a price can be attributed. In the space of less than a couple of decades, the porn industry has progressed to now providing easy access to cheap porn online. This relentless immersion in a sea of pornographic images, online, on billboards, in newsagents, continues to remind men of their "needs," rewiring the brains of men who become ever-more convinced of the "needs" that are said to be programmed into their DNA. And it continues to rewire the brains of women who come to believe that all men are rutting, drooling hound-dogs who are only ever after one thing. And as the rewiring proceeds, we forget that women also have within them the capacity for overwhelming sexual arousal that is in no way less than the primal motivations of men. All this, ultimately, thanks to our contraceptive technologies;

- With sex having become a leisure commodity with a price, the manner of sexual transactions has been radically transformed. Shysters, conmen, prostitutes and gold-diggers increasingly influence the cultural playing-field and new cultural options become validated. A line is crossed. What was previously forbidden by culture becomes a cultural norm. Culture is a whole, and it adapts. The trickle becomes a flood, and groupthink, with its obsession with fads, idolatry and hedonism, becomes the new norm. With new cultural benchmarks, peer pressure replaces family values. Game becomes the province of shysters and conmen along with the needy and the desperate, while hypergamy takes on many of the characteristics of prostitution in its opportunism, crassness and arbitrariness. As culture transforms to the new standard, its character changes, and opportunism based in self-interest would seem to be its most enduring feature;

- As a commodity with both monetary and cultural value, sex as a leisure activity, kick-started during the sexual revolution, played a crucial role in the rise of feminism. The relationship between the success of feminism and the rise of our contraceptive technologies is not an accident. By commoditizing sex, feminism mobilized chivalry and prostitution in new ways. Feminism is both chivalry and prostitution, in that it depends on female sexuality to get its way. Feminism is chivalry in that it is simply a restatement of our established tradition of pedestalizing women and it is prostitution in that it relies on chivalry to extract freebies for women at the expense of men.

If we have our reservations about religion, with its abstract, otherworldly references to impractical concepts like heaven and hell, then what we are witnessing today is the transformation of culture to a kind of hell on earth. You cannot get more hands-on than that.

Cultural wholes

It is beyond the scope of this article to discuss cultural wholes in detail. Nonetheless, these are important ideas that we need to at least touch on. We need to understand that every culture is a whole in the sense that every culture stands for something. What the culture stands for is what gives it its "flavor". Throughout history, people have tried to provide an interpretation along these lines, trying to provide a definition of cultural essence.

Elias Cannetti's (1973) discussion of national crowd symbols is about as sophisticated an interpretation that we might hope for, given the dominance of our genocentric paradigm. He provides compelling examples in his descriptions of national crowd symbols as they apply to English, Dutch, German, French, Swiss, Spanish, Italian and Jewish cultures.

What a culture stands for, what gives it its flavor, is its history. This includes its interactions with its environment, for example, the meanings attributed to the sea that surrounds a culture (as in Canetti's portrayal of the English crowd symbol), or the forests that define its order (Canetti's portrayal of the German crowd symbol).

Applying Canetti's idea of national crowd symbols to the United States, we find that the American founding fathers and the US Constitution, slavery, the abolition of slavery, immigration, religious values, idealism, falsifiable science (and the genocentrism that is its legacy), idealism and so on, all came together to account for a flavor that is readily identifiable in mid-twentieth century America and the American flag. This America we might associate with individualism, innovation and standing up for what you believe in. Feminism, liberalism and its associated groupthink all came together by the twenty-first century to transform America to something unrecognizable from what it once was. This contemporary America of today we are more likely to now associate with groupthink, self-interest (as opposed to individualism) and supplicating acquiescence. These transformations are taking place throughout most of the western world… pretty much every culture is in the process of being transformed into a new whole that is increasingly unrecognizable to what the culture once stood for.

Cultural transformations blend the old with the new. For example, the undercurrents of collectivism, authoritarianism, acquiescence to authority, misogyny and misandry that characterized Australia at its inception are alive and well today. Indeed, the current leftist paradigm that is sweeping the world resonates with something from Australia's authoritarian, collectivist past of which both dominant political parties in Australia (Labor and conservative-Liberal) are manifestations. Australia provides rich, fertile soil for the feminist agenda, regardless of which party is ascendant – one in the context of Marxist feminism, the other in the context of conservative chivalry with a collectivist bent.

Every normal, well-adjusted person in a culture accepts what their culture stands for.

They embrace their cultural identity and if they did not, then they would not be “normal” as their culture defines “normal”. A culture that accepts feminism and incorporates it into its legal and social structures stands for a collective ideal. That collective ideal we might interpret as liberalism. Every normal, well-adjusted person in a liberal culture incorporates liberalism into their identity. They “like” being liberals. They speak like liberals, in the accent of liberals.
Of course there comes a point of cultural absurdity where people begin to question their cultural norms. What was once blindly accepted as normal becomes absurd, and those ingesting the red pill begin to realize that the old normal becomes the new insane.
Enter AVfM, stage right.
So what does all this have to do with our contraceptive technologies, the sexual revolution and cultural decay? Let us take a look at the alpha/beta distinction that is routinely being played out at the House of Chateau.

Alpha/beta unity

The alpha/beta distinction is one that does not apply as a universal across all cultures. There are cultures where the image of the strutting alpha versus supplicating beta really doesn’t resonate in the same way that it does in the secular Anglosphere. During the European Renaissance, for example, we doubt that the dominant alpha deriving his sense of worth from how often he gets laid would have much staying power.
In fact, truth be told, the classic PUA-guru stereotype, average in stature, appearance, purpose and ambition, would probably have Renaissance-Euros scratching their heads in bemusement, wondering what all the fuss was about. Digging a bit deeper, we would find that legends like Giacomo Casanova(Wikipedia, 2012) would probably have borne little resemblance to our contemporary ideal of the exciting, bad-boy alpha. Why? Because they come from cultures that stand for concepts that are entirely alien to the genocentric/ materialistic/ hedonistic/ secular paradigm that currently dominates mainstream thought.
For example, of Casanova’s time studying law at university, Wikipedia observes “…he had become something of a dandy—tall and dark, his long hair powdered, scented, and elaborately curled.” We get the impression that Casanova was an exceptional individual, one who Wikipedia describes as “[having] an intense appetite for knowledge, and a perpetually inquisitive mind… valued intelligence in a woman… a man of far-ranging intellect and curiosity.” With his training in law and his connections among the powerful and the elite, he probably had more characteristics in common with the gayest in our gay communities rather than bearing any resemblance to the rebellious, bad-boy reprobate/frat-boy that characterizes contemporary hookup culture.
The fictional operatic character, Don Juan/ Don Giovanni (Wikipedia, 2012), typically portrayed as a “young, arrogant, sexually promiscuous nobleman” predisposed to duels and to networking with the rich and famous, is similarly quite alien to the PUA stereotype. As a fictional character, he may bear little resemblance to the reality, but he would certainly be a manifestation of the cultural values aspired to at the time.
No matter which character we analyze from centuries ago, fictional or otherwise, one is left with the impression that they tend to exceptional individuals that stood for higher values, holding to notions of courage, guts and honour – they were a very different breed to today's paper-Lothario/court-jester whose validation is contingent on obtaining sex from women by performing tricks. One famous PUA-guru reminds me of my accountant. Another reminds me of my car mechanic. Both are about as formidable as Wayne (from the movie Wayne's World).

Casanova's chronicled lifetime exploits, numbering anything between 122 and 200 (as variously reported), pale to insignificance in comparison to the thousands that some contemporary movie and rock legends, like Jack Nicholson, Mick Jagger or Warren Beatty, are said to lay claim to. If we accept these sorts of figures as reasonable, it does raise the question… how can you become a proficient, talented performer when you must, on average, be fucking a different woman most every other day of the week, at a minimum (divide 5000 by 365 over, say, 20 years of productivity)?

Why bother? Doesn't it get old? At what point does the whiff of yet another vajayjay make you want to retch? How many coyote moments must you chew through? How can one even be bothered to clutter his life with the menagerie of mediocrity that a different woman every other day of the week would seem to imply? After all, they cannot all be "nines" and "tens" because one city – nay, ten cities – only has so many "hot" women. What's the significance of a culture predisposed to accepting these legendary tallies and touting them as achievements? What exactly is the nature of this obsession with quantity that we might ultimately attribute to our contraceptive technologies?

Having clarified my scepticism, I should add that during my time playing in a band, we were followed around by a smattering of groupies. Women would make themselves available, and those in our band that would regularly partake of what was on offer frequently enjoyed a brief, animalistic release that was more of an obligatory drill than an exciting thrill.

Driving back home one night after a gig, for example, I parked our car on the side of the highway to rest, when our guitarist would unceremoniously drag his compliant groupie from the back seat, without conversation, and take her to a nearby bush and dump his load into her. A few miles down the road, we'd drop her off, and none of us would hear from her again. Very Bang Bus, to say the least, only it was no act. In her compliance and his indifference, it wasn't rape, but it certainly was not something to write home about, nor share with her grand-children in her old age. What did she get out of it? Boasting rights?

She laid a band guitarist, of course! A very average base guitarist, I might add. But more authentic rock legends surely have an easier time of it, given their frequent, fleeting stays in accessible hotel rooms with bevies of women queued up for their chance to sample fame, and for them there is no shortage of opportunity. Sure, for the most conspicuous among alpha rock legends, the thousands are easily achievable… but from our perspective… why bother?

And when his thousands of copulations become something of an undifferentiated blur, it's hard to imagine anything coming close, for a woman, to an exciting rape fantasy being realized. But maybe herein lies the typical groupie's cognitive dissonance. Perhaps what she is secretly hoping for, in her attempt to realize her rape fantasy, is that she alone, from among all his conquests numbering in the thousands, is so desirable that he becomes overwhelmed in his passion to the extent that he cannot help but ravish her. Yeah, right. In her dreams.

Novelty and excitement amid a sea of mediocrity

If we accept the thesis that central to female sexual arousal is the thrill of the forbidden (meaning the cultural forbidden, where it is culture that establishes what is known and permissible about the world), then whence do women have this need met? Can an aging rock legend, or any other uber-alpha tallying 5000 paramours or more, make a woman feel like she's doing something novel, exciting and forbidden? Can he fulfil her rape fantasies? Or will the cold, clinical and indifferent approach of someone who's had thousands before her leave her feeling anything but sexually violated and aroused?
Well, she may feel violated, but perhaps it's not quite what she had in mind. Her fantasy of being ravished by a high-voltage rock legend craving release for his uncontrollable urges will more likely fall flat. Her post-copulatory experience will likely leave her feeling more like a used tampon or a mechanic's oil-soaked rag tossed in the corner than a desirable beauty spent after a torrid ravishing.
She might be able to claim bragging rights, but at what point does the excitement of what she had imagined in her rape fantasies kick in? We can only imagine that her experience would be one of disappointment… bragging rights notwithstanding.
Perhaps the solution to her impending disappointment is not an uber-alpha with the predictable grind of thousands of paramours, but an uber-thug predisposed to unpredictable mood swings and maybe even denied access to any paramours at all. Much has been written about women's attraction to dangerous criminals and rapists who have been convicted, and the word to describe this proclivity is hybristophilia.
Julie Bindel's (2012) thesis is that the women who fall for convicted criminals are, contrary to media portrayals of them as unhinged, "… well adjusted, with good social skills." Among her examples, she cites the story of "bright, articulate and immediately likeable" socialite Rosalie, who had gone on from her marriage to socialite lawyer Victor Martinez, to marry convicted rapist and serial killer of women, Oscar Bolin. A contrasting turn of events to say the least, given that in her second marriage, any thought of throwing parties for politicians and celebrities was no longer an indulgence that she would have access to.
Bindel quotes from her conversation with Dr Lorraine Sheridan, a forensic psychologist with the Sellenger Centre for Research in Law, Justice and Social Change at Australia's Edith Cowan University:

> Women who get into relationships with death row prisoners often have much in common with those who spend their lives creating shrines to and writing to celebrities […] These women have a relationship, in their perception, with an exciting, high-status person […] The death row > romances take this a step further, in that they are able to have a reciprocal 'celebrity' relationship. There's also the factor of having nabbed an ultra alpha male, one who has carried out the greatest of violent acts.

At one level, all this seems to corroborate the alpha/beta dichotomy that the PUA community takes for granted. But at another level, there seems to be something missing from this picture. The incarcerated criminal of Rosalie's second marriage is not strutting about like a conquering alpha. Rather, he is rotting in a cell, his spirit bowed and subdued. Psychically, he must surely be a castrato, and his wife would seem to have him right where she wants him, under her control in a prison cell – writes Bindel:

> Yet there is something grotesque about the way they objectify these men in cages and are able to exercise absolute control over them.

Who would have thought? Is there something about our zeitgeist that is leaving women somehow unfulfilled? One thing we can say for certain… Rosalie's incarcerated alpha Oscar Bindel is no dandy Giacomo Casanova.
From a broader perspective, our inferences are consistent with those of Otto Weininger (1906), who observed a relationship between criminality and prostitution. The shared principle being that there is something about female sexuality that in moral conduct is drawn to the formidable and the possible in man, but in immoral conduct is drawn to the dangerous and the degenerate. Thus the thrill of the forbidden is related to the thrill of throwing it away.

CONCLUSION

There is a wealth of inferences that can be made from an in-depth analysis of the experiment that is our contraceptive industry and its impact on culture. Such an analysis, were it to be conducted by a reputable academia with due rigor, has within it the potential to seed an entirely new paradigm. Obviously we cannot but scratch the surface here. So we'll conclude this post with a point-form summary.

- Our contraceptive technologies are responsible for options that were never available prior the sexual revolution. As a consequence of these new options, our brains are wired in new ways to account for new desires and motivations that never existed before;
- Our contraceptive technologies, as derivatives of the genocentric paradigm, are an integral component of the sexual revolution. There can be no sexual revolution without some form of reliable contraceptive technology;
- Feminism is an integral component of the sexual revolution. There can be no sexual revolution without some form of feminism. Why? Because the sexual revolution is driven by primal impulses that shift the balance of power. Men, as the source of contrived, market-driven demand, have “needs” that must be met, while women, as the source of supply, can only respond to so many needs, there are only so many women to go around. The thrill of the forbidden provides the basis for these primal impulses, and when women no longer experience the thrill of the forbidden, that is, when the forbidden becomes mundane and men become undifferentiated, always-available drones that inspire neither passion nor fantasy, women will hold the balance of power in their control of supply. Feminism represents the power vacuum into which those who are in control of supply will drift;

- But isn’t it possible at all to have a sexual revolution… in the sense of the promiscuity and the porn industry characterizing our zeitgeist… in the absence of the sort toxic hatred exemplified in feminism? No, I would argue that it is not. In the context of any form of sexual permissiveness, the primal motivations of the human sex drive will always provide the basis for self-interest and the pecking orders that are destined to crystallize out of them. For example, the alpha/beta distinction held by PUAs is false and has no basis in objective reality. Such distinctions are an inevitable outcome of self-interest;

- Our contemporary experience of feminism and its relationship to our contraceptive industry provides tangible evidence of the reality of hell. It takes vague, abstract, religious references alluding to angels, God and Satan to provide a hands-on interpretation of heaven and hell in the context of cultural health and well-being and cultural decline. There are indeed consequences for tampering with natural law, and consequences for bad choices;

- Abortion has progressed from being an option of last resort to an instrument of convenience that provides everyone with greater agency over their lifestyle choices. This amps the dumb materialism of the west to new highs. Irrespective of what beliefs we might hold as to when life begins or even the morality of snuffing it out, that a mother would kill her own crosses a line. Irrespective of whether life is deemed to start at 5 hours or 5 weeks or 5 months of gestation, what kind of love can a woman who would kill her growing fetus in the interests of lifestyle choice have for her offspring? Just because our cultures have incorporated abortion as mainstream does not make it right – our cultures are the experiment, and our indifference is a part of what we are investigating. Yet, for all our comfortable acceptance of it, it is well documented that psychological sequelae can persist for years following an abortion (Mail Online, 2005). As they say in the movies, the first time you kill someone is the hardest, and it gets easier as you go along. But just because it gets easier, just because your neural wiring adapts to enable you to accept it, does not mean that you’re going to get away with it scot-free;

- The Nazis loved their children and their opposite sex. Pictures of Hitler abound where he is in the company of fawning women and their beaming children. Communists and Stalinists loved their children and their opposite sex, as did North Koreans, or pretty much any other totalitarian regime that understood the importance of investing in their children's futures. Even racist fringe-dwellers like the Ku Klux Klan were capable of loving their own kind. Only feminists can incorporate the hatred of their children and their own kind into their ideology. Only feminism, as a totalitarian ideology, is willing to routinely harm its sons, husbands, fathers, brothers and uncles, disadvantage them, put them down and deny them opportunities at every turn. Feminism is a viciously toxic, hateful and ugly ideology that does not refrain from negativity of the most damaging kind;

- Our experiment establishes that when nature removes the consequences of childbirth from women's choices, their choices will retreat from the formidable and the respectable towards the mundane and the desperate. Proximity and arbitrariness rather than quality and agency become the primary variables impacting on choice, with shallowness displacing authenticity in both men and women. Social proof, negs and cocky one-liners become the PUA tactics of choice that have women, if not swoon, then at least enter into the proximity wherein they might realize their arbitrary, dumb choices. The dudes of Wayne's World are now in the running, they stand a chance, while less shallow men, disinclined to compete against the tiresome Garths and Waynes of our zeitgeist, might prefer the solace of going their own way. The exceptionalism that distinguished Giacomo Casanova and Don Juan from the masses becomes a distant memory. Quantity trumps quality. Mediocrity becomes the new standard-bearer and groupthink the source of motivation;

- It is according to the above terms that human brains are now being wired, and human motivations are now being formed. Welcome to hell on earth, the hell of which feminism is an integral part. The first word that comes to mind… holocaust.

Can you raise a mass murderer?

December 18, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[quote]Hush now baby, baby don't you cry
Mama's gonna make all of your
Nightmares come true
Mama's gonna put all of her fears into you
Mama's gonna keep you right here
Under her wing
She won't let you fly but she might let you sing
Mama will keep baby cozy and warm
Ooooh Babe Ooooh Babe Ooooh Babe
Of course Mama's gonna help build the wall. ~ Roger Waters[/quote]

A few days have passed since the unthinkable happened at the Sandy Hook School in Connecticut, snuffing the life out of 28 human beings, most of them children.

America has proceeded to analyze with what typically passes for circumspection in this country; that is political posturing, grandstanding and the not so uniquely American tendency to exploit any given tragedy for a particular cause.

We have seen the shooting spree blamed on race, masculinity, guns, lack of guns, video games, lack of prayer in schools, permissive culture and a failure of school security, just to get us started.

Underscoring all this fodder for politicians and cable news programs, has been the more reasonable investigation into the mental health problems of the killer, though that seems a given considering the nature of his acts.

Sane people don't slaughter roomfuls of children.

It is the nature of that illness, I think, which needs to be investigated, and just as importantly any factors in his life which may have exacerbated his condition. My concern is that the wrong questions are being asked, possibly leading to some very unfortunate conclusions.

We see this already with the autism advocates having to make public pleas for people not to infer from this incident that Autism is a precursor to mass murder. Their concern is legitimate, considering the number of autistic children and adults in this culture that might become the targets of misguided people out of fear and ignorance.

Still, there are some questions that need to be asked in the aftermath of this tragedy; some of them very tough. But they need to be asked anyway.

We know some basic facts about the killer. He was a 20 year old male who was socially withdrawn and isolated. He had a history of mental health issues, some of which were manifested by periods of complete withdrawal from his surroundings and difficulty experiencing pain. He apparently required special supervision while working with soldering irons in a school shop class because he could burn himself and not feel it.

As a result of his mental health issues his mother pulled him from mainstream education and into home schooling. He acquired a GED, but apparently had no direction in life that would take him out of the home and into more autonomous living.
It also can be reasonably speculated that his mother, Nancy Lanza, had mental health issues of her own.
On the day of the killings she was his first victim, whom he shot in the head, not once, but four times. What sort of rage drives a young man to kill in this way?
Is it not fair to question, then, whether the obvious rage he felt toward his mother played a role in his other actions that day?
We know some things about his family life. He was a product of divorce, and the father was largely absent from his life. His mother received a very generous divorce settlement, which included a large upper middleclass home and somewhere between 200 and 300 thousand dollars a year in maintenance and child support.
We do not know precisely why the father, who lived within a reasonable distance, was so rarely around his children. We know he had remarried since the divorce. Was it that he was a neglectful father who just didn't care?
Or perhaps he's a man who divorced a very troubled woman and considered a home and a quarter of a million dollars a year a fair price for escape.
We have indications that the mother was still angry at the father over the divorce. According to a landscaper who worked for the mother, she was "still reeling from it."
So, now, we have an emotionally disturbed young man, largely cut off from the society in which he lived, by his mother, who then became his primary, if not exclusive source of contact with other human beings. No school, no real friends; 20 years old with a GED and no job. Not much of a future to look forward to.
And there may been pressure in the home to keep things just that way.
It appears that more questions should be asked about the nature of the mothers relationship with her son. They apparently lived life quite isolated together, even sharing adjoining bedrooms. Even though Nancy Lanza was aware her son was autistic, she was reportedly quite disturbed by the aversion to physical affection so common with that condition.
A family friend, Rich Collins, stated, "She would get very upset that he wouldn't let her hug him."
It must be asked. How upset? It must be asked to what degree this woman's personality, her possibly unhealthy need for affections he could not give, played a role in the pressure cooker that was obviously forming in his mind. We need to know how much of a demand she may have placed on him to fulfill her emotional needs after divorcing his father.
Could that kind of trigger play any role in making him angry enough to shoot her in the head four times?
And keep shooting until he finally killed himself?
As has been revealed in many media sources, Nancy Lanza has oft been characterized as a 'survivalist nut' who stockpiled food, water and guns, and was either a member or avid follower of the Doomsday Preppers.
In a conversation with WHDH-TV, Nancy Lanza's sister confirmed the speculations.

> Last time we visited with her in person we talked about prepping and you know, are you ready for what can happen down the line when the economy collapses," said the gunman's aunt, Marsha Lanza.
> The reporter asked, "Survivalist kind of thing?"
> "Yea," said Marsha Lanza.

It appears that at least part of the mother's idea of how to handle this situation was to keep her son sequestered with her in a home that was building into a fortress full of deadly weapons.

And by all indications she taught her isolated, mentally ill son how to use them. He certainly did not get access to them or learn to use them with such proficiency on his own.

One might also have to wonder why someone living above the standard of 99% of the planet, and who did not even have to work for that standard of living, was so obsessed with weapons and future catastrophe.

And yes, we have to question whether her actions in some way led to a horribly self-fulfilling prophesy.

Did Nancy Lanza's decisions, emotional instability and poor judgment ultimately play a role in all those dead children?

We do not know for sure. But we know enough to ask these questions. And as the days ahead pass, and more information comes to light, we will find out whether these questions hit home.

Mass demonizing of male sexuality in schools

December 18, 2012 | by Lucian Vâlsan | Link | Original Link

Less than a month ago, I said on AVfM News and Activism that it's only a matter of time until the mass demonizing of male sexuality shall commence in Romanian schools. Well, the feminists were indeed fast.

Romania is the second country in the EU (after the UK) when it comes to the number of abortions and teen pregnancy. The government had decided that it was time to introduce mandatory sexual education classes in schools. However, in the mean time, there was an economic meltdown to be avoided so the issue was postponed.

Feminists have offered their precious "help" on this issue and the teachers were all too happy to accept it since it would save some money.

But at what cost the savings?

Their project consists of a website that is due to be heavily promoted by the teachers, both directly to the children in classes, and in PTA meetings. The promotional article in Bucharest News reads as follows[1]:

> The staff of the website is formed from Adriana Radu [the initiator of the project], the team of the FRONT organization, an organization that owns the platform feminism-romania.ro, Ioana Nanu, a teacher of Romanian literature on George Coșbuc High School [...]. The staff has started making the videos and the website shall constantly be updated starting next February.

The demonizing of the male sex and calling father's rights organizations as 'a bunch of patriarchal rapists' is more than common on feminism-romania.ro platform. These same people will write the texts for the new website; one that is already championed by several politicians (needless to say – politicians from the Socialist Party).

Aside from the fact that the main supporter (providing funding and logistics) for this project is an anti-male organization, another serious concern is the fact that although there are still more than two months until their project will be fully active, they are already promoting it with blatant lies. For instance, in the same article from Bucharest News, they say:

> Adriana also explained that the biggest problem is that due to the lack of sexual education in public schools, Romania is now amongst the countries with the highest teen birth rate (with over 22 thousands births in 2010).

Well, that figure is false. Indeed, Romania did have a huge number but the exact figure was 18,483 – feminists have increased the number significantly.

They aren't even hiding the fact that they're promoting feminist ideology:

> There is also a huge problem in the fact that the teenagers are taking their information about sex from pornographic movies as in these clips one can see a negative and violent attitude towards women coming from men.

The irony is that their opinion coincides with the radical religious fanatics and, despite this obvious fact, they created a shit storm against a pro-life organization that promoted a similar message earlier this year.

The initiator of the project also admits that she came up with this idea following a sexual education program for women that she attended in Germany.

In Romania, the German model in everything is seen a priori as 'good' though we should probably think twice as Germany has a long history when it comes to misandry and demonizing the male sex. For instance, in German kindergartens the boys are literally forced to urinate while sitting and, recently, the German parliament overturned the Cologne Court's decision that made male genital mutilation illegal[2].

Besides promoting the ideology of hate starting with an F, this project also aims to promote sexual irresponsibility among girls while using the government to hold boys accountable for their individual actions.

At the beginning of 2012, there was a case in Craiova City (southwestern Romania) where a 14 year old girl gave birth to a child following a relationship with a 14 year old boy[3][4]. Although the two were roughly the same age (he is two months older) and their families were fully aware of their relationship and the entire process was fully consensual, the girl was treated as a 'victim' and the boy was arrested and treated like a criminal and to this day it's still unclear what will happen to him.

This case, with both parents being under the age of 16, is the first since the fall of the Communist regime, when birth control methods were less available. But these kinds of cases are bound to increase following this project because the feminist organization promotes, among other things, that it's the girl's right to get knocked up whenever she wants and with whom she wants, regardless of what other people say. And, of course, it's the man's obligation to assume responsibility for her unilateral actions and decisions, and it's the government's obligation to provide for her free education, free healthcare and money[5].

What's even more sad is the fact that home-schooling is not an option in the EU (or in non-EU countries) and this means that the negative impact on boys shall be more severe than the one in the US.

Men too selfish to get "the snip"?

December 19, 2012 | by Peter Lloyd | Link | Original Link

What a load of bullshit! A male writer argues that the problem is much bigger than that.

Yesterday, the Daily Mail published an article on the free-falling rate of UK vasectomies and implied that modern men are to blame.
In 2001-02, there were 37,700 procedures across England and Wales, compared with 15,106 in 2011. There's been a 16 per cent decline in the past two years alone.
According to the feature, which was written by Tom Rawstorne, many women across the country blame the decline on men being "selfish."
They also assume that male fertility is a ticking infidelity time bomb – something which should be treated as highly suspicious, not a natural human state.
I disagree.
The truth is that modern life, and medicine, has simply out-grown the vasectomy.
What was once a lifestyle choice with a life-long partner – maybe even an overstated gesture of commitment – has now become a permanent mistake if you're one of the 132,000 men who get divorced each year.
In fact, recent statistics show that one in ten men will actively regret their decision to have a vasectomy.
Add to this the stark reality that relationships frequently break down sometimes leaving fathers with little or no access to their children, and there's even less incentive to go under the knife.
Understandably, rather than be alone, men want the possibility of starting a second family elsewhere. This isn't selfish, it's pragmatic. And if family law wasn't so sexist, it might not happen at all.
From this perspective, men rejecting sterilization is a good thing: it's about reproductive emancipation.
Just like the contraceptive pill gave women greater choice and freedom for when NOT to have a baby, shunning the vasectomy does something similar for men in reverse.
It allows them a lifetime of choosing WHEN to have a baby. It extends choice, freedom and opportunity – for both them and their partners.
Besides, many vasectomies can't be successfully reversed (only half result in a pregnancy after two years – and chances diminish year-on-year), so referring to it as 'the snip' is deceptive – the procedure itself might be straight-forward, but the effect it has on the body is sometimes traumatic and can be permanent.
There are also rumours it can increase rates of prostate cancer.
What yesterday's article also failed to mention is that it's the government's scant regard for men's healthcare that's killing vasectomies from the inside-out.
[image]
Peter Lloyd

National funding cuts have made the procedure either unavailable or severely restricted on the NHS, meaning that it's only an option for people with money. Given that we're in the grip of a double-dip recession, that's not many.
Add to this the £3,000 cost of a private reversal and you're looking at a pretty impressive price tag.
The real issues is that the scope of men's birth control is both a joke. While women have the pill, the coil, the diaphragm, the Femidom and the morning-after pill (that's before we even get to the much more complex options of abortion and adoption), men only have two choices: a condom or a vasectomy. Aside from the fact that one faces extinction, they're both extremes of the same scale.
Given that we're on the cusp of 2013, this is no longer acceptable.
Yes, women have more options because it's easier to control one egg than a million sperm, and also because it's them who carry the baby, but men are equally accountable once it's born. And this is where the discrepancy lies.
Paul Elam is a men's rights activist and the publisher of U.S. website AVoiceForMen.com. For him, men have as much riding on pregnancy as women do in the long-term, but not nearly as much control.

> Men are generally forced into a passive role in the reproductive picture, he says.
> They compete for sexual selection and wait to be chosen. When they are chosen and engage in sex, they then wait to be informed of the possible consequences. They wait to be told if the baby will be carried to term, or will be aborted.
> They wait to be told if they will be allowed to participate in the life of the child. They wait to be told what they will have to pay, how much and for how long, regardless of whether they want – or intended – to be a parent.
> The implied agreement when having sex is that men have no say in the outcome, and that if they don't like it they should abstain. In most areas that implied social agreement is backed by law.
> Greater birth control options are needed for men to control the outcome of their sexual encounters.

And, as much as there are irresponsible men out there, he has a point.
Rather than scolding men for avoiding sterilization in a world of short-term relationships, let's put pressure on pharmaceutical companies to produce greater male aides. After all, recent scientific breakthroughs across the globe show wonderful promise in this area.
According to Dr Phillip Hodson, a Fellow of the British Association for Counselling and Psychotherapy, greater male contraceptives would also help women enjoy intimacy more.

> If there were better options, women would almost certainly feel less > pressurised by men's sexual demands, find it easier to get aroused, enjoy foreplay more, experience better hormonal health and in general regard intercourse as less risky, he says.

> Women would love it…and men would feel very reassured to know they were not going to father unplanned offspring.

It's a win-win situation. But the benefit would also extend beyond the bedroom. It would create social sea change, too. Better male contraceptives would slash unwanted pregnancy rates overnight.
They would also see less children being raised without fathers, which is a contribution to boys being dysfunctional when they're older (crime levels, poor educational success, unintentionally becoming young fathers themselves).
In effect, it would break the cycle. And most of us are ready to do that.

Refuting 40 years of lies about domestic violence

December 19, 2012 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

Editor's note: This article is also available in Romanian.
Erin Pizzey was born in 1939. In 1971 she founded the first nationally and internationally recognized women's shelter (or "refuge") in Chiswick, which is part of London in the UK. Her organization expanded to include many houses and a large growing organization, now known as Refuge in the UK.
It was soon after founding her organization that she began being subject to public protests and death threats.
A key figure in the women's movement of the 1970s, she eventually fled her native England with her children after the protests, threats, and violence culminated in the shooting of her family dog. However, she never stopped her work advocating for victims of domestic violence, and eventually returned to the UK.
Erin is a bestselling novelist and the author of many non-fiction books. Her first book, Scream Quietly or the Neighbours Will Hear is, along with her fearless public advocacy, widely credited with making Domestic Violence a national and international issue.
Her work continues to this day. She is widely loved.
She is also widely hated.
She is a supporter of the men's movement, and it is hard not to consider her the first Honeybadger. It was my honor to speak to her in early December 2012. –Dean Esmay

Transcript follows:
Dean: Good morning Erin, how are you?
Erin: Good morning, It's very cold.
Dean: It's very cold is it? Well, it's early December, I guess it is cold; you're living in London these days, yes?
Erin: Yes I am.
Dean: So, you have recently, in the last year or so, published a book called "This Way to the Revolution – a Memoir" from Peter Owen Publishers. What can you tell me about that book, Erin?
Erin: I've always tried to tell the truth about the beginnings. I was one of the first people in England to get involved with the Women's Movement and what I saw there, I knew perfectly well was going to be extremely destructive. And, when I began to stand up at these great big Collective meetings – and interestingly enough there were a lot of women from America who came over with initial instruction to show the British women how to be radical feminists. They're a pretty frightening crowd and I got screamed at a lot partly because I said many women like myself, who are married, with or without children are perfectly happy to have the choice to be able to stay home. So, in the end last year actually… it took me ten years to get this book published, it was turned down by every major publisher in this country. And, finally, Peter Owen, who is a fine very small publishing company, agreed that they would publish. And they've done a wonderful job of it. And it is, it's the whole truth about what went on behind the movement… the feminist movement.

I'm sorry, were you saying something?
Dean: So you say the feminist movement, the women's movement… I confess I haven't read the entire book yet, but I've at least read part of it and it's certainly very interesting. Would you say that you considered yourself a feminist in the very early days?
Erin: I considered myself like many women across the world, I considered myself an equity feminist. I believed in equality for everyone. Now there were issues that needed discussing, but as soon as I saw, because you have to remember my background, my parents were caught by the Communists when I was nine and I didn't see them for three years – they were under house arrest…
Dean: Your parents were caught by the Communists?
Erin: Yes in 1949, my father was in Tientsin in the Foreign Office…
Dean: In China?
Erin: Yes, China and they had marched up the driveway and they were arrested. They were very lucky, my parents, because they were just under house arrest. Most of the others were put into prisons. And I had one very close family member who came out completely insane from what happened to him. So, I had no love of Communism from the very beginning. From what I saw when I was in these great big collectives was really Marxism. We were all organized into groups in our own homes and told that we must have consciousness-raising sessions. And I remember the woman who came to our consciousness-raising and when she finished, I said this has nothing to do with women, this is actually Marxist. I said so we're supposed to go to work full time and put our children into care provided by the state – like the Communist government – and why are we calling this liberation? And so very quickly I was booted out and went off to open a community center for mothers and children. And then I knew, once the donations came in, once the press picked it up–because the local paper–because my refuge by that point was full—I knew very well the sound of the feminist boots coming down to actually hijack the entire domestic violence industry and turn it into a billion dollar industry. Which they've done.
Dean: Well those are very powerful words and statements. I understand you were born in China, yes?
Erin: Yes.
Dean: So you and your family were there when they turned communist.
Erin: No, I was born in China, but then my parents were re-posted to China when I was about eleven years old. They were reposted to Tientsin and that's where they were incarcerated.
Dean: Oh I see. Yet, I can already hear some people objecting. I've met a lot of women who consider themselves feminists in some form or other and they look at you like you're from Mars if you say this business about it being Marxist in origin or…
Erin: Yes, but most of them don't even know anything about the beginning of this movement. And the thing I have to point out, very simply, the beginnings of the women's movement happened way back when a lot of women were fighting for the rights of people, of Americans, to end the apartheid that was going on at that time. When they had finished marching for the civil rights movement—There's a whole storied history that you can read it. They came back and decided that the leftist women wanted their own movement. So instead of it being Capitalism, which everyone was against in the left wing movements, they simply changed the goal posts and said it was Patriarchy. Everything was because of men, because of the power that men have over women. And then the second part of their argument was that all women are victims of men's violence because it's The Patriarchy. And that is such a lot of rubbish. Because, we know, and everybody in the business knows, that both men and women in interpersonal relationships can be violent. And that's in every single study all across the Western world. All this time – 40 years – we've been living a big lie led by these Feminist women who essentially have created a huge billion dollar industry all across the world and they have shut the doors on men. No men can work in refuges; no men can sit on Boards; boys under the age of twelve often can't go into the refuges. A mother has to make a difficult choice of what she should do.

Dean: Here in the U.S. I've at least come across a few shelters which employ men in some fashion…to act as guards at the doors or…
Erin: That's not working in refuges; that's standing outside.
Dean: Standing outside or picking women up and driving them places…yes.
Erin: Not as staff though; not working in the refuge. In my refuge, half the staff are always men because they're so important for children who haven't known good, kind men…and some of the mothers.
Dean: I understand. That makes good sense. I see from your memoir for example, that in the early 60's you had to show proof that you intended to get married just to get contraception from your doctor.
Erin: Yes.
Dean: Women couldn't apply for mortgages… and so I presume it's that sort of thing that made you interested in the Women's movement in the first place.
Erin: Yes, absolutely. And I had such a vision, and partly the refuge because–I know all about violence. Both my parents were violent. My mother was particularly violent to me because I looked like my father. And the other two; my twin sister and my brother were much more like her. And my whole concern is, it is generational violence, and if we don't save this generation of children we simply have more and more violent people. Because, until we understand we cannot blame men for everything. Women have to look at themselves and be honest about their own violence. And also, to understand what you do to a child's brain when you actually fight each other, scream, yell and hit children, it causes brain damage. And we know that now from MRI scans. They can see what it does, particularly to the frontal lobe, the right frontal lobe, which is the seat of all our emotions.
Dean: There was a psychologist in Canada who recently published a piece asserting that the stereotype that we seem to all accept now of the helpless, innocent woman who is beaten on by a brutish, thuggish man and needs to run away represents perhaps only 4 or 5 percent of all domestic violence cases and that almost all other cases are more complicated than that. Would you agree that that sounds about reasonable?

Erin: Yes, of the first hundred women who came into my refuge, sixty percent were as violent as the men they left. Or, they were violent and the men weren't.
Dean: They were violent and the men weren't?
Erin: Yeah! And that's why I tried to open a house for men almost immediately after I opened the refuge for women and my problem was – and this was a great shock to me – I was given a house at a Peppercorn Rent by the Council; and then I asked men who had actually given money for my refuge for women and children (they were millionaires) to give me some money for the men's house, and none of them would give a penny!
Dean: I happen to know that in Canada there's exactly one men's shelter and it can't get any funding. It's almost impossible…it's running on a shoestring budget. I'll have to make sure to let people know about it after I finish talking to you. But I see from your memoir you actually said your first experience of wanting to open a shelter for women was that you encountered a woman who was beaten and bloodied and bruised. And you said you immediately flashed to your own experience of having been beaten by your mother?
Erin: Actually no, it was worse than that. It was a bit like Psycho. When my mother died of cancer, I was seventeen – my twin sister and I, and my brother was fourteen – my father refused to bury her body, and he had it in the house on the dining room table. And we had to go and look every night, it was hot there, it was about six days before he allowed her to be buried. This is the point though: everyone in the village knew what was going on. The woman across the road who was a family friend, I ran across and begged her to help me. She didn't. The doctor was called by my father and he came out and examined my mother's dead body and came out and said, "This shouldn't be happening to a dog." He did nothing. So I sat there at the age of seventeen thinking "I have asked for help, but nobody, nobody will help three terrified children." So when Kathy said to me – used the words, "No one will help me…", that's when I knew I had to take her in and look after her.
Dean: So you feel you were abused by both of your parents.
Erin: Yeah, all three of us were.
Dean: Oh…I'm sorry that happened to you.
Erin: No, you have to remember that's why I know what I know and that's why I can do what I do.
Dean: So it would be your firm opinion then that work by researchers like Murray Strauss and whatnot that…
Erin: Yeah and Richard Gelles
Dean: …that most domestic violence is…
Erin: Consensual.
Dean: Concensual, mutual…
Erin: One way or another. There's no pattern for this because each person is unique, and why and how they make relationships is unique. But they do need… if they, I think… I've said this often to very violent women: "Look you're with a very violent man – that was your choice. But now you want to break that cycle, think of him as your heroin pusher. If you stay away from him, just like cold turkey, long enough, that need for him will die." Freud said a long time ago that in time to come all emotions will be found in chemicals of the brain and he's so right. And, that's why I call it an addiction. Just the same way as an alcoholic is for his bottle, a drug addict the needle, and a violent relationship for some people. But, it can be broken.

Dean: What about women who are the predominant aggressors? You've run across those as well, I take it?
Erin: They were in my refuge. And we had long-term therapeutic care. We had the mother house, the big mother house, and then we had shared accommodations in houses. And we also had many houses across England. And the Palm Court hotel, that was the second stage. That had seventy four private suites. And we started that, and you could stay there as long as you liked until you were ready to move back into the community.
Dean: I find when I speak about domestic violence issues, and I have written and done some work in this area for more than ten years – you were a bit of an inspiration there by the way – in any case, people–and sometimes it's people who call themselves feminists, but often it's people who call themselves conservatives or maybe even Tories (like you'd call them) or just everyday, not very political people–either become enraged with me or look at me as if there's something very silly about me when I say there is a serious problem with violent women and that perhaps a quarter of domestic violent relationships, it is the woman who is mostly the violent one and probably in half or more it's both of them who are violent in one way or another. You're nodding, I think you agree that that sounds about right?
Erin: Yes.
Dean: But, people become either frightened or enraged or laugh when you suggest that there are violent women. Where do you think that comes from?
Erin: Most people who are violent don't think they're violent because it's been their reality from a very early age. That's why I don't even go out to dinner now. I sit down at the table and I can look at people mostly and know what they've been up to. A lot of it's defensive. A lot of it.
Dean: What do you mean, it's defensive?
Erin: They know within themselves how they behave and they don't want to hear about it.
Dean: You mentioned feminism is a sort of liberal leftist movement which I think it was originally; although you do have women who consider themselves…
Erin: Yeah, at some point, try and read Susan Brownmiller's book, because she sent me her books on rape in the very beginning. I couldn't read them, bless her heart, but she has since recanted. And that was an amazing thing. I was also at the American Embassy when Betty Friedan recanted what she'd said and she said, "I apologize. We, as women have gone to the male, for the throat over economics and that isn't what we should have done. We should have built the relationship between men and women."
Dean: Betty Friedan said that?
Erin: Yes, she did, in the American Embassy about 1980, '81. And I just remember looking at her and thinking, "look at the damage you've done with what you've said over the years!" It's all very well everybody recanting, but, the damage is done.

Dean: Well, and where is the knowledge that they've recanted? Susan Brownmiller published a simply horrible screed about rape and how…
Erin: No she has since then written a book…we're friends, I know her…she's since then wrote a book and just said, "I was wrong."
Dean: Really?
Erin: Yep.
Dean: That's actually good for me to hear, because her original writings on rape about it being this… I don't know… men have been raping women for millions of years and… very upsetting stuff! It's good to hear that you're friends and that she's recanted her views on that. I'd probably like to talk to her some time. But, it seems to me as if people either want to see women as exclusively victims or as somehow angelic figures.
Erin: That's mostly men. Women know. We know each other. And privately, they'll say what they really believe. But an awful lot of men will not hear a word about violent women. They like women on pedestals. It makes them feel safe.
Dean: So then, it's not just the feminists, although the feminists appear to be part of it. The feminists get angry and the men become derisive or protective. They don't want to believe there can be violent women. Seems like.
Erin: No, but once you start saying that any group like radical feminists, "look, we have a problem that we need to resolve among women." You're talking about almost saying, possibly, there is a million dollar industry out there, you have to share it with men because men and women can equally be violent," and you're actually talking about money and they aren't going to give up on that. They've built an empire over forty years, very, very powerful. And we have women in very powerful situations, Canada, Australia, and here, because at one point officials list that the Attorney General in this country was a woman–Harriet Harman is a woman who does huge amounts of damage. And she's been the Women's Minister. And I have awful problems with her and several others because they are now very powerful. They're powerful in the judiciary, they're powerful in Social Services… particularly in Canada, that's one of the worst countries in the world.
Dean: Harriet Harman, she's a Member of Parliament there in Britain, yes? From what I've read about her, she seems very hateful. She is a feminist, yes?
Erin: Well, I tried to reason with her once. We were both at the conference and I just said to her, "Look Harriet, you've simply got to accept the figures about violent women." She just swung around on me and her face changed. She said, "The amount of men who are beaten up is miniscule." And I just looked at her, and I thought, "There's nothing I can do with you because your mind is closed."
Dean: Well the government's own figures don't even show that to be true, do they?
Erin: Yes, the British Home crime figures show virtually equal between men and women, domestic violence.
Dean: Wow.
Erin: It doesn't matter how often you say this, or you point it out. You tell a lie long enough, Goebbels said, you can brainwash the entire community. And that's what's happened here.
Dean: Now there are those who be accusing you of being a conspiracy theorist or some sort of crazy person to suggest the domestic violence industry is a billion dollar industry.

Erin: That's not too difficult. Just look at the figures, if you can get your hands on them.
Dean: Like what figures?
Erin: How much V.A.W.A., I think that's what you call it, gets every year.
Dean: The Violence Against Women Act in America?
Erin: Yeah.
Dean: Yeah, there's an incredible amount of money the government funds, and it goes to these shelters. And it's not accounted for so far as I know.
Erin: Yeah. But I'll bet a lot of it doesn't get near the shelters. Most of it will go to all the administrative and all the legal battles that the feminists… it pays… look, it's always funded the women's movement. Everywhere.
Dean: Really?
Erin: Yes. That's why I wrote the book. Because somebody's got to say it. Loudly!
Dean: That there is a problem, particularly with the feminist movement at this point because of the money they get from governments and…
Erin: Yeah.
Dean: …private charitable donations?
Erin: Yes.
Dean: Would you say they also rely on people's perhaps instinctive need to protect women without thinking rationally about…?
Erin: Well, now just imagine, I mean, two people on my board–well three or four of them–were millionaires. Yeah, and they were very protective of women. And when you present them with the fact that men equally need protecting, they'd sew up their pockets. What I did then – I couldn't keep the house open because none of us had any money. What I did… a very nice woman created charity shops and we called them Men's Aid and that employed a man to go and see every single man who wanted to see us.
Dean: I see, but you haven't been successful in continuing that sort of thing?
Erin: No, I managed to open the house and some men were ready to come in, but I couldn't get a penny from anybody.
Dean: You couldn't get a penny from anybody – for helping men? Still can't really?
Erin: No you can't.
Dean: It's horrible. Something should be done…. All right, you recently were quoted–I saw this on a video somewhere, and you just said something earlier–the most frightening country in the entire world is Canada?
Erin: Yes.
Dean: Now, that seems a bit hyperbolic, and it might out of context because…
Erin: No it's not.
Dean: Well I think people from places like Saudi Arabia or North Korea might wish to take issue with you. But I take it you mean that in the area of domestic violence, feminism, laws against men, that sort of thing?
Erin: Yes. I do. I did a six week tour, with Senator Anne Cools, all across Canada. And there were some wonderful (there was one in Windsor was wonderful) uh, men's groups, just struggling to keep going. And as we traveled and talked to men's groups, we realized how terribly dangerous it is because it's almost as though the entire government and the judiciary–the same people–had been infiltrated by very radical feminists out to get men. And I talked to people all the way across Canada. You know my mother was Canadian, and I'm half Canadian, and it hurt actually. See I was a child in Toronto, and my feeling as we went through is real fear. I remember I was working with Anne in the Senate and I walked in to the lift, and this man who was in the lift with me was cowering over in the corner. And I came out and I said to Anne, "What on earth was that about?" And she said, "Men are frightened. They just don't know when they're going to be told they're sexually harassing somebody."

Dean: I'm sure there are Canadian and other men who are scoffing at this because they've never gotten into that situation, but I've…

Erin: Those men scoff all over the world, because it's not their situation. Where is the humanity in men for each other? We women have it naturally with each other, but men don't seem to have the same ability to discuss emotional issues.

Dean: That's an interesting thing, because I noticed on Facebook, you said something, I don't have an exact quote, but you were despairing that men's groups never seem to go anywhere or get any traction. Are you still finding that to be true?

Erin: Yes, I do find that to be true. I really do. And it's a great sadness because the only way we're going to heal what's happened between the anti-male, misandry, and ordinary normal people in loving relationships, is for men to take their lead in what's happening and make their opinions known and stand up as otherwise there's this deepening divide in relationships between men and women.

Dean: Well, there is a growing men's movement I think you'll be happy to hear, I know I do a lot of work on A Voice for Men, and with others, and it does seem to be growing all of a sudden. It seems to be predominated by people who are in their 20s, 30s and 40s who grew up in the wake of all the family destruction that we've seen since the '70s. So, I think there's hope there. But I hope people listen to your words and are galvanized by them. Men do need to be less fearful of speaking up. And more compassionate. I mentioned this to you in private conversation, but I'll mention it again: a year or so ago, here in the United States, there was a man named Thomas Ball who was accused of molesting his child [editorial correction: accused of slapping his child once] and went through 2 or 3 years family court hell [editorial correction: it was over 10 years of Family Court Hell], having been accused, and eventually doused himself with gasoline and set himself on fire in front of a courthouse and the press, to the extent they reported it at all, either behaved as if it was a bizarre mystery or, it was a terrorist incident. What does that say about our country when you have that reaction to a man in that much pain willing to do something so horrible?

Erin: All I can say is… for a start, relationships are probably, when they go wrong, the most devastating thing that can happen: the woman usually gets to keep the kids and the man is suddenly out of the family. And he's kept outside. He's kept outside by the law, by the usual people and I think the big tragedy of all this is that at the moment, nobody's listening. But I do take your point about it getting better, because I think your analysis is correct. And I think that there will come a tipping point when we'll get to where the truth of all this will come out and all we can all do, those of us who are working this work, is to keep going and to keep going. And I hope in my lifetime we will see refuge and comfort and care for everyone, particularly children, because it's generational. And if we don't save the children of this generation, we create another generation of violence and desperate people.

Dean: Well, I know that even here in the States it's quite common for most refuges not only to refuse men, but they'll refuse boys if they are over the age of 12 or 13.
Erin: Twelve here.
Dean: Twelve there. So what are you teaching those young boys when you do that to them, do you think?
Erin: Well there was a case the other day – I was talking to the mother. She was completely bloody after she'd been beaten up. She got to the police station with her children. Her boy was 16 and… when women's aid came to collect her, they said, "You can't take your 16 year old son." She said, "What can I do then?" "Well you'll have to make accommodations." She said, "I left my son in the police station for the Social Services to collect him because I knew I couldn't cope after finding my own accommodation and I wouldn't be protected." I said, "You're quite right. How would that poor child… he's only 16 and seeing his mother beaten up, how many times he couldn't count – left." That's as far as I am concerned, cruel.
Dean: It seems to be and also may be teaching him a message to internalize his father's anger and his father's violence and think, "Well this is just what men are." Right?
Erin: Yes.
Dean: On the other hand, I have a good friend, obviously I won't name him…he was in a relationship where his wife was very violent with him and very violent with his children and he stayed in that relationship even though it was going on for years because he feared to call the police for help. He was certain he would be arrested.
Erin: He's right.
Dean: He was right wasn't he? Almost any man would be.
Erin: Listen to this: Who trains the police? Women's Aid.
Dean: Women's Aid.
Erin: Yeah. All across for 40 years, they have been doing educational packages which they then sell to, whether it's to the police or social services, and the message is always there: it's all men, it's all men, it's all men.
Dean: And it's a lie, isn't it?
Erin: It's a massive lie. Yes. And it's a very, very, very – a lie worth telling because you get billions out of this. This is more about money than it is about caring for anybody.
Dean: Because it's both about government funding and charitable funding. Somehow you say, women need help and purses open, checkbooks open. You say men need help and what happens?
Erin: Men don't need help, we all know that men are violent brutes because they've got a Y chromosome and women don't.
Dean: And that's just so horribly a sexist thing to say, isn't it?
Erin: Isn't it? When they picketed, they used to have these pickets when they were picketing me saying, “All men are bastards!, “All men are rapists!” Well my sons aren’t, for a start.

Dean: …and your own mother was quite a violent person, so you said.
Erin: But then you see, both sides – I can trace violence back for three generations. For every women who came into the refuge–and we used to take about a thousand mothers and children at the height of when we were working–We did the first hundred, as an example: we did a three generational questionnaire. And it answered itself. Women who came in who were innocent victims of their partner’s violence didn’t come from violent relationships, but the women who were victims of their own violence, that’s where you saw the generational violence.
Dean: What do you mean “victims of their own violence?”
Erin: Well, look at it this way: Baby P was a big, big case here just recently, a child, a beautiful little boy… was hideously battered by a violent mother and her boyfriend. He was taken into hospital and he died. Everybody across the country was weeping over Baby P, because it made the newspapers. And I said then, “right, when this man grows up, this child, had he been able to grow up, he probably would have been a monster and then you would hate him.”
Dean: I think I see what you mean there. Plus would you say that women who get violent are in many ways victims of their own violence because…
Erin: Absolutely. Yes. What I’m looking for when I take care of people who are victims of their own violence is a way that they can transcend. I was saved by my mentor, Miss Williams; without her; that’s why my original memoir from my childhood was called “Infernal Child,” because I was a very, very violent, dangerous child.
Dean: Were you?
Erin: Yeah.
Dean: It’s almost as if we’re afraid to see women as human beings with the same flaws as men.
Erin: Isn’t it awful? Because it’s so condescending to tell all women they’re victims. I’m not a victim. I made my choices and I take the consequences. And I used to often say that to a woman. I’d say, “Look, you chose that man, you knew he was violent, you chose to have children by this man even though you were being beaten up. Now you take some responsibility for this.”
Dean: Well and one of the patterns I’ve seen and read about is that you’ll get these women in violent relationships and they’ll be the ones who actually start the hitting.
Erin: Yes, they do, because the majority of violent women bank on the fact that most men don’t hit women. And they don’t.
Dean: And most men don’t hit women.
Erin: Yeah then…
Dean: And so then a woman will hit, and hit and hit… and then finally he loses his mind turns and punches her, and now she gets to be a victim right?
Erin: Yeah. Sometimes she doesn’t even have to wait to provoke him to where he loses it. She bangs her head on a wall and calls the police.
Dean: Now that’s going to make some people angry. You just suggested women will intentionally injure themselves.

Erin: And some men. I mean, it's not just women or just men; it's what you learned in childhood. A lot of these women I deal with have severe personality disorders. As do the men. And whoever gets involved with them, even by accident mostly, is going to get… it's a train crash. Because it takes time for the loving partner to realize what they've taken on. And an interesting thing about men, when they see what they think is a very, very – what would the word be? A very fragile woman. And this is a classic. A narcissistic exhibitionist–there's the woman, the whole crowd at the party are looking at her. She's usually very well turned out because she's narcissistic. She looks good and she's incredibly warm. It isn't until he gets deeper into the relationship that he realizes that there's nothing inside that woman. What he saw was… the harmed child in the woman and he wants to make it better. He wants to defend her and take care of her, and then suddenly he realizes that the mask of sanity… he sees through it and it's too late.
Dean: Because everybody else sees her as…
Erin: Wonderful! Life of the party! And he's drawn in by that! Men love to have the woman on their arm that everybody else would love to own.
Dean: Vivacious, pretty, etc…
Erin: Like my mother, narcissistic exhibitionist, and they're very, very dangerous and there's no treatment.
Dean: There was a famous case here in the States, Bobby Kennedy, Jr…
Erin: Yeah
Dean: …got a divorce and his ex-wife, well, shows all the patterns of being either a narcissist or what they call a Borderline Personality. When she killed herself, everybody blamed him. And then it came out that she had Borderline Personality Disorder and Bobby Kennedy, Jr., you know, was at least somewhat vindicated. They ceased to accuse him of being abusive, but nobody really apologized or acknowledged the fact that she had been violent toward him and his children and nobody wanted to… it was like that part of it kind of got elided. "Oh well, she was mentally disturbed," and…
Erin: She wasn't, she had a personality disorder – that's not mentally disturbed. She knew damn well what she was doing. And her final, final act of outrage to make sure he got even more damaged, was to kill herself.
Dean: So you're saying a Borderline personality isn't mentally disturbed?
Erin: No.
Dean: Because, their personality…?
Erin: This is what I'm going to say now and I know its ahead of the game because MRI scans are only starting to be studied: most borderline personality disorders and also narcissistic exhibitionists are damaged, because they have witnessed or been part of violent parenting or dysfunctional parenting. And it's actually damaged the way information goes to the brain. They can now tell you when children who've been exposed to toxic violence and sexual abuse…. they can now see in the right frontal lobe how the neurons, and the damage that's down there… that's all to come because it's now happening and there are big studies going on looking at children's brains who are already violent.

Dean: And yet people still seem afraid of it; they seem afraid of the feminist movement. Do you think the feminist movement can reform itself and become something better or is it time to just…
Erin: No, I think, again this new generation coming up who are in their 20s now have seen a lot of the damage even in their own parenting in feminist households. And I think they will grow up to be far more inclusive. And, I think in about 20 years perhaps – I don't know if I'll still be alive – that we will look at these last 40, 50 years as the dark ages for human relationships.
Dean: Because it should be Humanism that we're talking about and…
Erin: Yes. Love.
Dean: …helping each other…
Erin: Love, compassion… all the things that that… we need, we need to love and be loved. It's as simple as that. And this radical feminist movement really highjacked everything from the equity feminists. Essentially it is a hateful movement. It just hates a whole group of people and wishes them ill.
Dean: You use the phrase, "equity feminism." Are you using that to describe women who think of themselves as feminists, but really only want fairness and equality?
Erin: Yes, absolutely.
Dean: Perhaps even the word "feminism" isn't right at this point for them. They're really more humanists and don't realize it?
Erin: Yeah. I think that's right. But then you see we've had nearly 50 years now of brainwashing, and this lie has been standing out there. But I do see more and more people realize… and there were two conferences in America; one in Sacramento… I went to the one in Sacramento, and it was the first inclusive conference and it was such a joy to be there. Maury Straus was there.
Dean: Really?
Erin: …and Charles Cory… he's wonderful, and Edward. There's a whole load of people who have been there from the very beginning. Then there was a second one in L.A. and one of the women from a University said, "I couldn't let anybody know that I was here from my university or I'd lose my tenure." And she's right, she would.
Dean: Lose her tenure?
Erin: Yep.
Dean: I thought that would be nearly impossible.
Erin: Yeah.
Dean: But, it's almost like this radical feminism is underground, people don't know that it's there. And you try to tell them and [they say you think] it's a conspiracy. But it's not a conspiracy, is it? It's just reality of what's in the university and a lot of these government departments, right?
Erin: That's where it came from. That's where it all started. And it's interesting though because many of those Women's Studies are being shut down.
Dean: Well, it's funny, and they seem to be getting more and more desperate. I mentioned this to you earlier, but not on camera. Warren Farrell, you know him, yes?
Erin: He's a great friend.

Dean: Very sweet gentleman, and, there is a growing movement, A Voice for Men is a big part of it. But Warren Farrell was to give a talk at the University of Toronto and feminists, people calling themselves feminists, so I suppose anybody watching this that says, "Well, I'm a feminist and I'm not like that," well listen up, there are women who are calling themselves, working in your name, and men, doing this. They were getting extremely violent, locking arms, trying to bar people from getting in to see Warren Farrell speak. Some of them wound up getting arrested [editorial correction: I thought there had been arrests. I was mistaken]. Calling people names, horribly abusing men who were trying to get in there. But it was all caught on camera and this time some people were arrested, and I see that as positive in two ways: A) it's getting some coverage and B) the police actually were willing to make an arrest or two. [Editorial comment: I was wrong, there were no arrests that we know of.] Didn't you say early on, 40 or 50 years ago, the police wouldn't arrest violent women?
Erin: No… when I first started police weren't allowed to do anything to protect women, or men, because it was called "a domestic." That's one of the first things we had to change. And now, the problem with that is, yes they can go in and arrest, but, in most cases they will only arrest the man.
Dean: I seem to recall you mentioning something about how perhaps 40, 50 years ago in the 70's there were violent women protesting you and the police told you they were afraid of them?
Erin: That's absolutely right. I was at a luncheon for Women of the Year at the Savoy, and there was all this shouting. I had to get through the pickets. And the funniest one was "Pizzey is the pits!" But they also had the ones, "all men are rapists" "all men are bastards" and I went down to the police and said, "Look, if this was men, you'd arrest them all." And there's a great big copper and I said, "Why aren't you arresting them?" He said, "Well it's women," and there's a terrified look on his face. And I had to have a police escort all around England.
Dean: And you had to have a police escort because why?
Erin: Death threats. Listen, police don't give you an escort, because it costs a lot of money, unless they're worried about it.
Dean: And why were they threatening you?
Erin: Well, for various reasons. I suppose the major one is that I was talking out at the time when the money was starting to come in, and I was telling the truth as loudly as I could. That's probably why. And I must remind you that Senator Anne Cools and myself were to go to Vancouver to speak, and…
Dean: Senator Anne Cools is a Canadian Senator?
Erin: Yes. And she supports men. And… there was death threats and police said to her, "Do you want to go in and get on with this or should you just cancel it?" And we both said, "No, no, were going to go." It was very nerve wracking.
Dean: And they hate you for saying that women can be violent or that domestic violence is often or usually mutual?
Erin: Yeah. And also that I say that it's a fact that it's a multi-million, billion dollar industry. That's one that absolutely outrages them, because they don't want anyone to know how much money they're getting.

Dean: It's funny, and I happen to know that even in the States there is no accounting for where that money goes. I guess it's marked as going to women's shelters and that's it – it's like a black box.
Erin: Well, it's not even going to women's shelters. It's going to keeping the empire going. Great big offices, loads and loads of staff – that's what happens.
Dean: Because the people in most of these houses are volunteers, or being paid hardly anything, right?
Erin: Yeah.
Dean: That's been my experience as well. So, you think the rage comes… Well, I might disagree with you a little, only in the sense that I know there's a lot of money involved, people don't believe it but there is, but I also think there's this… I've seen it in people who have no stake in it, they become enraged with me when I say women are half the problem in domestic violence. That just suggesting women are violent makes people extremely angry, and I don't know where that comes from, but…
Erin: I think you'll find it's particularly those sort of women because they're violent themselves, and they know it. And men.
Dean: And yet what you've just described, too, there's also this also this protective instinct in men. In the men's movement, we call it the "White Knight" impulse – the White Knight impulse.
Erin: Yeah. I call it the… to me it's the… oh what's the word? It escaped my mind now, but there is a gene in men I think, that is put in there to take care of their children, and to be gentle with their women. I think men have that.
Dean: I think men are, contrary to the stereotype, actually, generally fairly gentle creatures.
Erin: I think that's true as well, and much much simpler than women. It's much easier to talk to men, because men… men explode with rage, right? I can deal with that. Well some men. It's women implode. And women will actually, 'tis true, they will sit quietly and they will plot for what they want. And that's very female because you implode with rage. Different chemicals.
Dean: So, you think men and women are wired or are chemically somewhat different from each other then.
Erin: Well, it's been the MRI scans shown men's brains, women's brains… women's brains have scatter all across the brain, because women actually can do many things at once. Whereas a man's brain, when they look at the MRI scan, it's much more linear – straightforward.
Dean: So… interesting, interesting. So we've evolved to be different, and perhaps we've evolved to want to protect women.
Erin: Of course, that's what you've done since the beginning of time. The woman has actually evolved to nurture the children and to nurture a family setup. That's why she collects the food, on the ground food, but not plowing… men go out, from early days, and bring home the bacon, whether it's a piece of bear or whatever. What isn't healthy though, is, it takes… you know in an ideal world the mothering and the fathering under one roof with the children is the best way a child can grow up – being nurtured by each parent. Yes, other people can nurture a child but that biological bond between the mother and the father is the best that you can offer your child.

Dean: I think the nurturing impulse in men is underrated. I think men have a very strong nurturing impulse too.
Erin: They do. No but, interesting is that I lived for six years on a farm in Italy. And the men did all the working outside, they did all the actual backbreaking work on the farm and the women did all the cooking in the home and looking after the children, but the fathers were equally… they're there, the fathers were there all day with their kids. And it was a very happy setup.
Dean: You know it's funny, I've often thought that it's been since the Industrial Revolution that the family has actually really started to struggle because that's where you saw, you know, Father leaves and is gone all day, and comes back after twelve hours, and I'm not sure that's how we evolved. I'm not sure that's really the most natural arrangement. But perhaps I'm getting us off topic. Would you be will to talk to me again and do another interview?
Erin: Certainly. Yes.
Dean: I'm not sure what we should close with here. But do you see reason for hope in the future as to people getting more realistic about what domestic violence is, and women's culpability, and that sort of thing?
Erin: I hope so. I pray every night that this is going to happen. That we're going to recognize that the family is under serious threat and it's everybody's job to do something about it…to come together and make changes.
Dean: All right. Well, thank you so very much for talking to me Erin! Again everybody, this is Episode 2 of the Honey Badger files. My guest has been Erin Pizzey. Her book is, "This Way to the Revolution – a Memoir" from Peter Owen publishers. Thank you so much, Erin. I hope to talk to you again soon.
Erin: Thank you.

I would like to dedicate this interview to Kay Hymowitz and William Bennett, conservative traditionalists who've done so much to say "man up" to shame and demonize young men without saying much to or about women, to female triumphalist Hanna Rosen, to Jessica Valenti and the crew over at Feministing, to Amanda Marcotte, and most especially to Kate Harding and the rest of the crew over at Jezebel, whose tireless work has provided endless inspiration for what I do here on A Voice for Men. I strongly encourage all readers to tweet, Facebook, email, and otherwise spread this interview around as much as possible. Links to a lot of supporting material will be supplied in later updates to this posting. But I more seriously dedicate it to Erin, with love. Please buy and read her book.

I needed feminism because…

December 19, 2012 | by Edward Jessup | Link | Original Link

Hello.
I'm the guy who submitted these pictures to whoneedsfeminism.org. I thought I'd take a few shots that represented my experience of feminism over the years, submit them, and be done with it.
I wasn't exactly expecting 188 (last I checked) re-posts, comments, etc. It seems I may have struck some nerves.
I wish I could say that I was surprised by some of the NAWALT/NAFALT comments, but I'm not. While I agree that a lot of feminists probably aren't "like that," their continued silence and tolerance of the extremist factions within their midst –to me- reeks of ignorance at best, and complicity at worst.
If you are not like that, please consider doing something about those who are like that. They are more vocal than you. You are losing control of your own movement, if you haven't lost control of it already. Read Christina Hoff Sommers. Read Daphne Patai. The extremists in your movement are causing real pain to real people.
Some people responded to my pictures that suggested that feminists "could not have possibly" said or done the things that I claim, or that the people who did were not "real" feminists.
I assure you they did and they were.
So, for those out there who have chosen to ignore or discount what I have said, because it does not fit the mold of what your ideology tells you, I would like to provide some additional background.
Feel free to continue to claim that it was really "the patriarchy" (whatever that is) that really did this to me. I honestly don't care. But if what I say can make someone reconsider, even for a moment, then I've succeeded in helping us all act like human beings towards each other once again

I needed feminism to teach me that my Borderline

Personality Disordered Ex driving me to the brink of suicide was MY fault. I was involved with a woman who was an undiagnosed Borderline. Over the course of a year, she pushed me to this point. I almost stepped in front of a train. Let me repeat that. I almost stepped in front of a train. At the time, I was completing a graduate program at a university that was demographically 80% women, 20% men. That includes faculty and staff ratios, as well.

The university also sponsored many discriminatory events, and workshops that men were specifically not allowed to attend. We were belittled in classes, where we were told that we our "male ways of thinking" were obsolete, and something that needed to be overcome. These "ways of thinking" were responsible for all of the ills in the world. Additionally, as a white heterosexual male, I needed to be more attuned to my inner feminine, and "be a better man" by listening to my partner, addressing her needs, putting my selfish needs last, and practicing self-inquiry to determine how I might be inadvertently causing problems.

I did all of these things (and more), because I loved her. Or, rather, I loved a lie. But that's a whole other story. The surrender of my identity, my sanity, and the narrative of my life were not enough for her. To add insult to injury, as someone who suffered very real psychological, emotional, financial, and physical abuse from her, I found that there were no resources available to me. There were no battered men's shelters. There were no books on abusive relationships involving women abusers and male victims. I couldn't even identify the relationship as abusive, because I'd been taught over and over that this sort of situation doesn't exist.

It must have been something I'd done wrong. This was a few years ago. I am better now. Not perfect, but better, with much thanks to Dr. Tara Palmatier at shrink4men.com, and to the MRA movement for helping me find what it really means to be a man. Did a feminist say to me "It's your fault?" No. Did feminism make sure that resources to help me were scarce to non-existent and that many people (including myself) had never even thought that a man could be a victim in an abusive relationship, and that as a male I was viewed as inherently incapable of anything other than being the abuser? Yes.

I needed feminism to teach me that wanting to date someone of African descent was engaging in 'White Trophy Hunting' and not love or attraction. As an undergrad in 1988-89 or so, I was told this by Elizabeth Richardson Viti of the Gettysburg College French Department, in a one-on-one conversation. At the time, I had started to get to know an Ethiopian student I was possibly interested in dating. From Gettysburg College's website (http://www.gettysburg.edu/about/offices/provost/jcctl/viti.dot):

> Professor Richardson Viti's research interests focus on the contemporary novel, in particular, from a feminist theoretical perspective. This interest has led her to teach a number of classes in what is now the Women, Gender, and Sexuality Studies Program, where she also served as Coordinator from 2005 to 2009 when the program was still Women's Studies.

I am not advocating contacting her, discussing this with her, starting arguments with her, stalking her, harassing her, or anything like that. Honestly, she is so far off my list of "worries" that I find the whole thing comical. I am merely attributing a quote. Leave her be. It is entirely possible her views have changed since then.

I needed feminism to teach me that my 50 year old alcoholic aunt didn't rape me when I was 10. I must have raped her. Thank you, Feminism, for setting me straight on that! Yes, my aunt did this to me. Again, the dominant narrative for most of my life has been "only men rape." Add to this that 99.999% of the books for incest/rape survivors are geared towards women survivors. Add to this that saying "well, just read 'he' for every time you see 'she' and vice-versa" doesn't really cut it.

How am I supposed to gain any actual help from a book that continuously lets me know that it isn't really written for me, and I'm part of the problem? One therapist even told me it "couldn't" have happened. Additionally, after a rather difficult class dealing with trauma in my abovementioned graduate program, I confided in a classmate who self-identified as a feminist, to offer an exception to the "only men rape" narrative. Her response? "That poor woman! How society must have mistreated her to lead her to do something like that!"

I need feminism to ensure that all of the women in my office are empowered enough to talk about their sex lives, stare at and make comments about the UPS guy's ass, and make sure I know they are better than me, until they need someone to lift a heavy box. My last three jobs in a nutshell. Believe me, there's a whole lot more. Some of the guilty parties are PhDs, too. When I brought this up in an employee survey at one job, it was dismissed because "men can't experience sexism” and I “wasn’t used to having my privilege challenged.”

I needed feminism to silence my voice and invalidate my pain so much that I have to sneak off to the restroom to snap these photos. My current job, while better than my last three, still contains elements of #4. Do you think I feel safe doing this out in the open?

I am sure that many people think I’m bitter, or hateful, or spiteful, or whatever. It would be easy to fall into that trap, and after the break up with my Borderline ex, I spent a good two years in the abyss. I am sure there may be others who believe that I’m “just a kid” and don’t know what I’m talking about.

I am 43 years old with a graduate degree, about to get married to a woman who understands that the things that I have been through are bullshit. I am very lucky.

We also have a one year old son.

And neither of us is willing to let any of this happen to him.

Manufacturing female victims, marginalizing vulnerable men

December 19, 2012 | by Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) | Link | Original Link

Toxic victim-consciousness is the process by which women are made into class "acted upon" by emphasizing a disproportionate victimhood where none actually exists or isn't proven.

In "Women Do Not Benefit: The Science," I outlined how toxic victimhood limits women and socializes them to undermine their own achievements. Toxic victimhood promotes the perception that women are "acted upon" rather than actors. When a society is promoting toxic victimhood, there is no need to limit women overtly through legal, financial or social restrictions. Instead women will limit themselves through their own mental foot-binding.

Here I will look at a recent and very successful effort to manufacture toxic female victimhood whole-cloth, the CDC's 2010 National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Survey.

The much publicized figure on rape from this survey is that 1 in 5 women versus 1 in 71 men are victims of rape in their lifetime. (If the rate men are raped is reported on at all.) Let's see exactly how the female-as-victim juggernaught churned this nugget out.

Question: When is Rape Not Rape? Answer: When a Rapist Uses Her Vagina

The first thing to note is that the NIPSVS decided that men being forced to have sex with women isn't rape. Let's think about this again. The NIPSVS finds that men are the majority perpetrators of rape. 98% of female rape victims and 93% of male rape victims had a male perpetrator. A woman shoving her fingers up a man's anus is rape, but a woman shoving her vagina down on his penis is not. The latter is not classified as rape, but as "made to penetrate" and is placed in the category of "other sexual violence". Logically, if you define rape as penetration, but not envelopment, you are going to end up with an arbitrarily large number of male rapists compared to female rapists.

Rape could easily be redefined as forced envelopment, which is exactly as arbitrary as the NIPSVS's redefinition of rape. In that case we would find that 80+% of rapists are female. Which is as fatuous a finding as the reverse.

So why are significantly more men than women rapists and significantly more women raped than men? Because when women rape using their vaginas it's not rape, it's "other sexual violence".

Men are the vast majority of rapists and women are the vast majority of victims because rape was defined in such a way to make sure that this was so.

The Real Risk of Rape in the Last Twelve Months

It should be noted the NIPSVS presents no statistics on male victims of rape through penetration for the last 12 months. This is interesting because the 2000 National Violence Against Women Survey found that 0.3 percent of women and 0.1 percent of men surveyed said they were raped via penetration in the previous 12 months.

The NIPSVS says: “The estimates for male victims raped by other types of perpetrators were based upon numbers too small to calculate a reliable estimate and therefore are not reported.”
The NIPSVS surveyed 18,000 people; The NVAWS surveyed 16,000. Did the risk of rape of men by other men take a nose-dive between the NVAW survey and the NIPSVS survey?
Luckily the NIPSVS did track the risk of “made to penetrate” for men in the last year. It was 1.1%, identical to the 1.1% of women “made to envelop”.
If the act of forced envelopment is correctly classified as rape—namely a woman forcing a man to have sex using her vagina, the vagina being one of the two most commonly used instruments of sex—then you get an equal risk of rape between men and women in the last twelve months.
An equal risk of rape between men and women in the last twelve months.
Why then, is the lifetime risk of rape so different?

Men Rape; Women Are Raped

Researchers into the field of traumatic memory recovery note that the longer the period of time a person is asked recall a traumatic event, the less likely they are to remember it. How this works is that surveys that ask about a traumatic event in the last six months get less false negatives than those that ask about a traumatic event in the last twelve months which, itself, gets considerably fewer false negatives than lifetime prevalence. For men this effect is even more pronounced.

> 16% of men with documented cases of sexual abuse considered their early childhood experiences sexual abuse, compared with 64% of women with documented cases of sexual abuse. These gender differences may reflect inadequate measurement techniques or an unwillingness on the part of men to disclose this information (Widom and Morris 1997).

Only 16% of men with documented case histories of child sexual abuse disclosed that abuse on a survey intended to capture child sexual abuse. Sixteen percent of men compared to sixty-four percent of women.
That amounts to a disclosure rate of child sexual abuse four times higher in women than in men.
Is it any wonder that the CDC’s 2010 survey (correcting for their mis-categorization of female-on-male rape) found that 18.3% of women and 6.2% of men were victimized over their lifetimes?
Comparing the lifetime rate of sexual abuse for men and women is misleading in determining their relative risk of sexual violence, simply because men disclose childhood sexual abuse four times less often than women.
There may be many reasons for this. It’s unlikely that it’s due to sexual abuse being less impactful on men because studies have shown that sexual abuse does have a profound impact on men, and this includes female-on-male sexual abuse. For instance, the link between sexual abuse and suicide attempts is stronger in boys (Rhodes et al. 2001) and sexually abused boys are twice as likely to commit suicide (Molnar et al. 2001) than sexually abused girls. In addition to that, there is a risk factor for sexually abused men to sexually abuse others is if their abuser was female (Salter et al. 2003.)

One possible reason for men not disclosing, or even “forgetting”, is quite simple: our social narrative does not allow for, nor does it depict, the sexual abuse of males. To a degree it allows for the sexual abuse of boys by men, but not boys by women or adult men by anyone.
In a study on the effects of retention interval and gender on the perception of violence, Ahola et al. (2009) found that eyewitnesses rated female perpetrators less violent than male when reporting after an interval of one to three weeks as opposed to ten minutes. Ahola et al. (2009) proposed that over time eyewitnesses reinterpreted the behavior of perpetrators in order to conform to gender stereotypes regarding violence.
Widom and Morris (1997) propose that a similar process is occurring with male victims of sexual abuse (particularly by females) as, over time, they reinterpret their victimization to conform with the dominant social narrative regarding sexual abuse: that it happens to women and is perpetrated by men. They will do this by reframing their abuse as consensual or as a rite of passage or less violent than it was or by “forgetting” it completely. The more time passes, the more our memories conform to the dominant social narrative.

> Gender differences in reporting and in perceptions of early childhood experiences may reflect early socialization experiences in which men learn to view these behaviors as non-predatory and non-abusive. Many of the sexual experiences considered to be sexual abuse (showing/touching sex organs, kissing in a sexual way) may be seen as developmental rites of passage, part of a learning process (Widom and Morris 1997.)

Note that this “forgetting” does not mean that there is no psychological effect; only that the source of that effect is buried, becoming a silent trigger for self-destructive behavior.

The Real Ratio of Male to Female Rapists

If we look at the more reliable statistic, the risk of rape in the last twelve months, and we fix the NIPSVS’s mistake in classifying forced envelopment as “other sexual assault” and not rape, we find that 80% of men report a female rapist and 98% of women report a male rapist. (This estimate is based on the sex of reported perpetrators for sexual assault over a lifetime. There is no reason to think the number of female perpetrators for ‘forced envelopment’ would decline between the lifetime and last year reports: if anything they would increase)
Since there were roughly equal numbers of men(forced to penetrate) and women(forced to envelop) raped in the last year, if we look at a population of 100 rape victims, 50 of which are male and 50 of which are female and apply the statistic that 80% of the male victims were raped by a woman, we get 40 male victims raped by a woman.
That works out to about 40% of rapists being female and 60% being male. A far cry from 95+% of rapists being male.[1]

Instant Female Victimhood, Just Add Media

The cautious and least sensationalistic position to take based on the NIPSVS's findings is that men and women are most likely at an equal risk of rape and that the proportion of male to female rapists is not significantly gendered. [2]
But this is obviously not what anyone really wants to hear. Instead, the NIPSVS manufactured a non-existant female victimhood by first redefining rape to exclude the vast majority of female-on-male victimization. Then mainstream media (and other parties interested in female victimhood) followed up by selecting the statistic most likely to be fraught with reporting error while completely ignoring the more reliable statistic that suggests parity and further ignoring the ratio of female to male abusers (40/60).[3]
And so from a survey that strongly suggests that neither rape victimization nor rape perpetration is significantly gendered, we get a resounding shout of 'MEN RAPE/WOMEN ARE RAPED!'
Men act, women are acted upon.
And the juggernaut rumbles on.

[1] When same-sex rape is excluded the ratio becomes 44/56 male/female rapists. One reason why same-sex rape should be excluded for an accurate picture of the gender proportions of rapists is because male-on-male rape may be inflated relative to female-on-female rape due to the large population of incarcerated and formerly incarcerated men. The greater rate of male-on-male rape may be a byproduct of more men cycling through society's rape-camps (otherwise known as 'prisons') at a greater rate then women.

[2] The moderate skew in favor of male rapists may just be an artifact of using female interviewers. We won't know for sure until a survey is done that doesn't require male victims of female aggressors to disclose their victimization to a female interviewer. Likely the NIPSVS used female interviewers preferentially in order to capture as much female victimization as possible; the logic being that women would be more likely to disclose to another woman.
[3] The 80% rate of female perpetration of forced envelopment is based on the lifetime risk numbers. However, it's likely that the ratio of male to female rapists who forced envelopment on a man does not change significantly between the twelve month and lifetime time frame. If there is any change, asking men to report sexual abuse by females over their lifetime likely undercounts the proportion of female rapists since female-on-male rape is not congruent with our social stereotypes regarding rape and gender. Additional data on this issue is provided by Predictors of Sexual Coercion. Although Predictors only studied college populations, it found a similar parityin rape victimization risk between men and women in the last twelve months. 2.3% of women and 3.0% of men reported forced sex, which gives a ratio of 57/43 female/male rapists.

AVfM Radio: the pussy pass

[box icon=""]
Why do we give women a free pass. Why is it that we excuse women when they murder children, or when they murder men. Why is the grotesque and nearly inconceivable sexual mutilation of a human being funny if the knife is wielded by a woman. Why do we provide a free pass for violence and criminal conduct for a group pf people we all pretend to believe are self actualized adults?
This is not solely the work of feminism, but it is certainly something escalated by that ideology of gender. So what's going on, and why in a feminized society do we give a free pass to women for action and behavior that would be totally unacceptable, behavior that is properly described by the word monstrous , when its done by women.
As rational adults, we excuse outrageous behavior for other people too. Toddlers, and the mentally defective. Isn't the free pass we give women an implicit claim that they're either toddlers – or mentally defective?

Andybob's Corner #3

December 20, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

We are back, lads and lassies. Gather round and get cozy. Here's your hot chocolate and wool blanket. Flames are dancing in the hearth, leaping and pirouetting over crackling oak. A gentle clock strikes the hour as friendly shadows softly saunter 'cross the walls.
We are together again.
And Andybob has come to visit.
Take a sip of your chocolate while he settles into his rocker by the fire. Snuggle in all comfy as he gives the embers a nudge with the poker.
And let's all put on our quiet hats. Andybob has some lessons for us, and we want to hear them clearly. He knows what's best for little girls and little boys. And come to think of it, for the big ones, too.
Andybob on:

…White Knights, Raising Children and Daddums

A father issuing threats of violence against any male who may sully his daughter's purity is expressing white knight indulgence at its worst. Such a man is proclaiming to the world that his little princess has been raised to perceive herself as a perennially blameless victim without agency. She's a nightmare on wheels.
Daddy has also been the test-drive vehicle in which princess acquired her skills in manipulating men to commit violence-by-proxy. She has cut her teeth and sharpened her claws on this gun-totin' buffoon. Unleashing an entitled female who believes she has armed back-up in the event of her being displeased is not a great contribution to society.
Of course, I do not have daughters. So, I don't know how I would react to some long-haired yobo taking my bit-of-a-drongo daughter on a date. In all honesty, probably not very well.
Like most gay guys, my views on child rearing tend to be rather draconian – lots of Edwardian overtones of the speak-only-when-spoken-to variety. My nieces (15 and 16) are very familiar with Uncle Andybob's views on proper behavior.
They include:
[unordered_list style="arrow"]

- Speaking in clearly-enunciated sentences;
- No slouching (the children of gays may grow up insane, but they always have great posture);
- Having at least a working knowledge of all branches of arts and sciences (you don't have to be an intellectual – I'm not – but don't be a dill);
- Showing proper appreciation and respect for their parents (surly, ungrateful daughters are a curse)

[/unordered_list]
I have always told them that they have been raised with every advantage of love and support, so they have no excuse to ever behave like poor white trash. The prevailing culture celebrates and excuses appalling behavior from girls. It is vitally important to counteract this by setting clear and consistent expectations.
I make certain that the prospect of a lengthy lecture from Uncle Andybob provokes more fear and dread than an unloaded rifle ever could. I don't lecture my nephew (only 12) about anything. I just make sure that no hateful feminist ever makes him feel ashamed of being a boy. My brother-in-law is a great dad ready to fight any feminist attack on his son.

…Big Girls Wearing Little Girl Panties

Feminist invective has never evolved beyond the kind of lazy and hysterical peevishness which characterizes this little gem:
"Being an incomplete female, the male spends his life attempting to complete himself, to become female." Valerie Solanas.
Yesterday, I saw a remarkable example of Naomi Wolf's "diminished market value of female orifices" while commuting on a train. I inadvertently sat on the same seat as a woman who was having a very animated conversation with what I assumed was her university professor. She was one of those peroxided, fake-tanned 40-something women who dress like their 16 year-old daughters. She had on low-rise jeans, a sequined top and a pink, blingy handbag. British accent, possibly northern.
[I promise, hand-on-heart, that this woman was studying…Drama.]
She was attempting to coerce the professor into giving her some kind of extension on a drama assignment. In a loud, gravelly voice that can only be achieved by a 3 pack-a-day habit, she began by using her well-worn charms. "Oh go on, Jason [first names with the prof?], please!" She then progressed to trying to get sympathy. "Things haven't been going well lately." Then came a few excuses, "I didn't understand my assignment. I have been sooo busy". Then came guilt (accompanied by some pouting), "My holiday wasn't as long as yours." Then, to my total astonishment, came an offer of a bribe. "I'll give you $300". All this was overheard by the entire carriage – she probably scored an 'A' for voice projection.
Finally, when all of her feminine wiles had been exhausted, she started to get nasty and accusatory, "You've made things so difficult for me." Then came appeals to a higher force, "I'm going to complain about your curriculum". She violently banged the seat beside her when she said this He must have finally hung up on her. Out came her iPad on which she was furiously pounding some kind of message/complaint. Someone called in the middle of this and she said, "Can't talk now. I'm writing to Jason".
My heart sank for Professor Jason. Was she making good on her threat? Was she paving the way for some kind of false accusation? All of this occurred in the space of about nine minutes. I was stunned by the breathtaking speed in which the flirty act devolved into demonic anger as she contemplated the range of options available to her to inflict revenge on her professor – all because she was too lazy to do an assignment on time. Professor Jason must feel like he is walking on a minefield. His classes must be crammed full of entitled women.

I see lots of women like her – angry harridans embittered that life is no longer the all-expenses-paid free ride they have always known. Feminism gives these women the power to exact revenge on those bastard men who just don't appreciate the finer points of mature pussy. Her type will never be reasoned with. Women like her have as much interest in fairness towards men as I have in learning macramé. Avoid them at all costs. Go your own way gentlemen.

…How to Administer Discipline. This Time on Behalf of YOU.

I saw another intriguingly inept attempt to dismiss the MRM. It even mentions AVFM and RegisterHer. Note the assumptions about male privilege – and the commenters who are having none of it.
http://www.newstatesman.com/blogs/lifestyle/2012/05/mens-right-zeitgeist
Here is my response:
"Psychologist Oliver James stated that the reason for this is that men are feeling "sexually threatened"."
You found some pliant white knight to shoot down men for you. How typical. I hope he at least got a pat on the head for his troubles.
Note the ease with which the justified anger and resentment that men feel about the rampant misandry we face under feminist governance is reduced to nothing more than some sneering and unsupported accusation of male sexual insecurity. After all, men don't care about anything else, do they? If you wish to claim some kind of moral high ground, then I suggest you avoid such repellent gender stereotyping. The men and women who contribute to the website, "A Voice for Men", would never tolerate such bigotry.
It is clear that you never intended a fair and balanced approach to the Men's Rights Movement. It was a hatchet piece from the outset. A hell of a week for women? It has been a hell of a week for men, too, but that never even occurred to these privileged princesses. Claiming that women have been "side-lined' without even thinking to mention the brutality heaped upon men for millennium is a good example of how men's suffering is, as usual, either ignored, dismissed or trivialized.
The feminist response to the growing dissatisfaction of men has been shockingly inept. Sending out a pair of clowns like these to laugh at the suffering and marginalization of men is the kind of contemptuous act that has managed to alienate even gay men, like me. Wake up, grow up, woman up, and start treating men with the respect we deserve. Shame on you.

Time to refuel, march on

If you are reading this, it means that the dreaded date of 12/21/12 has arrived, and the planet is still here. We are not done yet, it seems.
Whew!
Aside from the predicted Mayan End of Times, the date also has the more important distinction of being the last quarterly fundraiser for AVfM in 2012. That's a good thing, Unlike the apocalyptic dud that has generated so much buzz for so long, we are actually in a time of monumental transition. Or, at least by the look of things, the beginning of it.
Before I give you my appeal to reach in your pocket for some of your hard earned money and pass it this way, let's take a brief look at what the donations that fund this site have already created.
AVfM, thanks to being a magnet for people rich with both talent and heart, can now irrefutably claim to be the most robust, organized and influential instrument of activism directly and exclusively on behalf of men and boys that has ever existed.
That is not a "Mission Accomplished" banner, by any means. But it is proof that the mission is finally underway.
Aside from the fact that website traffic has exploded in recent months, and that the AVfM radio programs are now on track to reach 40,000 listeners a month in a steady pattern of growth, there are other indicators of our increasing reach.
In the last two weeks I have been interviewed by Canada's National Post and Toronto Observer, and those articles should soon be released. We don't know for sure what their slant on us will be, but we do know that the shock waves we sent through the college communities, particularly in Canada, are still reverberating.
And we are far from done there.
Recently columnist Peter Lloyd, who has remarkably managed to bring a straight up MRA perspective to Mail Online, has referenced this site giving us more exposure, and pushing the MRM message further into mainstream consciousness.
[image]
Maybe it isn't the world that's ending. Maybe it is something else.

He was also gracious enough to include me and AVfM in an article for the European version of Esquire on male reproductive rights that will go on sale at the end of February.
Managing Editor Dean Esmay made a groundbreaking appearance on Huffington Post Live, and for the first time a mainstream broadcast outlet took some of our issues seriously.
We are beginning to tip the scales, folks. AVfM is playing a major role in ending the hegemony that feminists have owned for 50 years on the discourse about sexual politics.
We are arriving, and they are powerless to stop it if we just keep pushing ahead.
Take a moment to imagine the implications of that.
AVfM has also formed a Judicial Accountability Committee, with dozens of volunteer activists, who are acting as a counterpunch against misandric courts and state functionaries. We are getting results there, as most of you know.

I am not much fond of predictions. But I am going to make an exception today. 2013 will be a massive year for the men's movement. I think we will look back and see that the foundation we laid in the years before resulted in tangible progress.
It has always been my contention that in order for the men's movement to gain real traction, we would have to figuratively grab ideologues by the collar publicly and rattle them till a little humility set in; that we must inspire many more people by presenting a widely seen public example of men and women that would not be bullied or shamed into silence, and who would, in fact, stand up and call bullshit on the destructive consequences of the hateful, elitist ideology known as feminism.
I don't have to tell you that the world is noticing.
I also don't have to tell you that doing this requires financial support. Hosting costs, image rights, radio time and legal fees are substantial. They are even more substantial now that we have increased the activism.
The bill from Randazza Legal Group related to the Joel Kirk case alone was almost $2,000.00.
Keep in mind that our attorneys are remarkably fair with us and sympathetic to the fact that we are an activist organization without mainstream financing.
So, good readers and activists, the time has come to ask you again to pitch in for the cause, and help us finish what we started. We are picking up steam, perhaps even more quickly than some would have imagined. But we can't afford to slow down now.
I truly feel we are on the cusp of something great.
We are grateful this year for an early start. A $500.00 donation from the online activism godfather, Angry Harry, and a $1,000.00 donation from a supporter who wants to remain anonymous, are already in.
Thanks in advance to the rest of you who will help us Feed the Fire., on behalf of myself, JtO, Dean Esmay and rest of the editorial staff of AVfM.
The donation button is at the top right of this page, as well as a link to the mailing address through the "Other Options" button.

Donation drive ends midnight on Saturday, December 29, 2012

Generation Z : Boys in Modern Britain

December 22, 2012 | by Andy Thomas | Link | Original Link

The education system is trashing boys in an eagerness to promote feminist ideology. Any male success is now seen only as gender advantage, not hard work or a human right to thrive. Boys are loving, caring, intelligent, funny and innocent, but society rarely gives them credit for this. Instead, they are told that they're stupid, emotionally stunted, depraved and violent, thus sealing a boy's social fate before he even leaves school.
SEE VIDEO
This video describes one boy's personal experiences of the British education system between 1997 and 2006. It was based upon the content of an internet post by the user "Duran" to the antimisandry.com forum. The transcript, which is abridged version of the original post, follows:
I was born in 1991, to a happy family, I had a sister 6 years older than me, and two loving parents, my father was the breadwinner of the family and my mother was a house wife, she used to take me and my sister to school, pick us up when we were sick, basically, all the mum's stuff.
My early school years were great, my education was great, I had maximum grades at that point; I played for my school football team and used to do some boxing. My dad and his dad were both boxers. It was great bonding time for me and my dad in the gym. Life couldn't have better. As I got toward the end of my primary school years, I did start to notice an odd trend, though. My family seemed to be the minority that were like this: When I'd stay over at friends houses, it would almost always be divorced mothers or just simply single mothers looking after my friends. I never paid it much attention, however, as I was just 6-11 years old at the time, but I always wondered, "where's your dad?"about my friends.
Anyway, moving on to my transition into secondary school, this is where things changed, for the worse. Secondary school is 11-16 in England, not sure what it is in other countries. Immediately it began. We were taught, at such a young age, all of the atrocities western men had committed against everyone else. We were literally, I'm not exaggerating here, taught to be ashamed of ourselves and of our gender culture. Girls were taught how great the suffragettes were and that without them they'd still be under the tyranny of evil men. I remember a particular class about this in history. The female teachers and female students were all laughing at the stupidity of boys and men. I remember the female teacher pointing out "all the men had to fight wars, while women didn't, but it was always men that started the wars," while the girls all laughed. I remember looking around at all the boys in my class just sitting there, quietly, blank stares on their faces, saying nothing. Then it hit me like a silver bullet. I was doing the same as them: nothing.
However, after having years of political correctness and self-shame pumped into me by this so called education system, I had no knowledge of how to even discredit them. Everything they said seemed true. If it wasn't for my father teaching me about the great men of our past at a young age, I actually think I'd be another sad fool indoctrinated into feminist ideology.

This experience though, was one problem that I and other boys my age experienced at this point. Another was that not only were we taught to be ashamed of our gender, they went so far as to blatantly make us ashamed of our race. Yes, if you were white and male, oh boy, you were in for a treat. Hours upon hours of all the horrendous crimes our ancestors did to the Africans, the Native Americans, the Jewish people and of course, women, because women were not in any way part of white wrongdoing.
Not one, not a SINGLE mention of all the good we did, only the bad. If they did happen to mention anything good a white man did they never pointed out it was a white man who did it. Only when they shame do they like to point the traits of the people/person they're shaming out.
Meanwhile they had Black History Month celebrating the accomplishments of Black culture and Black people in general, which I have no problem with. I think it's great that people can celebrate their culture, but then it bought up the question, when will I be allowed to celebrate and be proud of my culture? The answer? Never, that's racist and not politically correct, you see. That line of thinking leads to a nation of Nazis, apparently.
Now, after all this, I noticed something change in me. I became apathetic, lazy, unmotivated and my grades went from the top 5% in my country at age 11, to pretty much rock bottom. I remember at age 11 I was predicted straight A* and as for my GCSEs, well, I didn't leave that school with a single GCSE. Not one.
Why? I stopped caring about school, some days I just didn't turn up, I couldn't take it anymore. It was actually horrendous to be discriminated against like that by people who are supposed to be objectively teaching and nurturing me. By the time my dad noticed what was going on it was too late to do anything about it. It was in the last 6 months of school; the school never notified him of my drastic drop in grades and lack of attendance.
These feelings weren't just felt by me either. I can tell you now that 90% of the boys in my year didn't leave with more than 1-2 GCSEs either. A lot of the girls, the majority in fact, left that school with amazing grades. A girl I was fond of left with 3 A stars, if I remember correctly. Oh and my sister finished Primary school with high grades and carried on the trend finishing secondary school with very high grades. all A's and B's. She went on to do A levels and was on her way to becoming very successful, learning multiple languages such as German and Latin when she decided to give it all up to raise a family.
To any of the older generation out there, I'd just like to tell you, this is what it was like to grow up in an education system from 1997-2006. Now I can't say it was like this in every school, as I had no experience in other schools but if generally speaking, every school was the same way mine was, we're in big trouble. I read recently, young men get paid less than young women now from ages 20-29.
My big question is, what is going to happen when my generation has to step and live in their place in the world? From my experience and the facts around me at the time, the majority of boys in my year are either unemployed or doing basic jobs like stacking shelves, digging and other menial jobs.
We've literally created a generation of young men who are self-hating and apathetic without any father figures in their lives, and even the ones who had father figures like me got shafted hard by the education system we had to endure.

Honestly, I'm actually really interested in seeing what happens in the next 20 years. Will feminists ever realize that their self-gratification condemns this generation of men who have been destroyed and ostracized with little chance of their life's potential being developed?
I was one of the few people who wasn't surprised when the UK riots came about. It was just waiting to happen. This is the generation of young men who are supposed to be the backbone to our future?
I am very interested in what the older generation of men think about this state of affairs and how their sons have been treated by the education system and society in general.
Oh and before anyone accuses me of blaming my failings on the education system, my father paid for me to go to an all male school, where I got 7 As in GCSEs on my first year there directly after mandatory school ended, then two years of A levels in which I got all 5 of them. This isn't some blame, pity me game. I'm just generally very interested in what you all think is going to happen if my scenario holds true for the majority of young men growing up?

FEMEN – activism and the coming violence

December 22, 2012 | by Lucian Vâlsan | Link | Original Link

Show producer James Huff said on the Thursday's AVfM Radio Program dealing with the "pussy pass," that feminist rhetoric has become nastier and nastier in recent months.

Indeed, that is an undeniable fact.

However, in real life, the feminist activism is still relatively soft in terms of physical violence. It was amazing how the incident at the U of T shocked the MRM, considering the fact that we have been seeing, here, in Europe, some gruesome acts of vandalism throughout the year 2012 from feminist organizations such as FEMEN and Pussy Riot.

So let's talk a bit about these FEMEN criminals who, due to the pussy pass, have avoided the jail terms that would have undoubtedly be applied had it been men who were committing the same deeds they did. The Pussy Riot organization will be addressed in another story.

What is FEMEN? If you randomly ask people on the street who or what FEMEN is, you might end up getting 'I don't know' or 'Those girls with the topless protests' for an answer. You might as well see some people calling them 'Russian' for lack of a better term.

FEMEN is an organization that was founded in 2008 in Kyiv, the capital of Ukraine, by the former theater student Anna Hutsol. They officially claim to "To develop leadership, intellectual and moral qualities of young women in Ukraine," and "To build up the image of Ukraine, the country with great opportunities for women."[1]

However, just like any other feminist organization, or arguably the entire ideology, what it says on the label and what you find inside the box are two different things.

Anna Hutsol keeps saying that her organization seeks to become the most influential feminist organization in Europe and to organize in the year 2017, a feminine revolution in Ukraine.

They have became known to the public for their topless protests against the questionable morality of the Sharia Law or for the arguably moronic protests meant to push the authorities from Kyiv to install more public toilets in the Ukrainian capital city.[2]

But these are the small things. They became truly known in the year 2012 when the Ukraine hosted, alongside with Poland, the UEFA Euro 2012 football (soccer) tournament which was undoubtedly the most significant public event in Ukraine since the fall of the USSR. The Euro 2012 tournament was marked the moment when they commenced engaging in criminal acts.

At first, they attempted to steal the Euro 2012 trophy and claimed they only want to draw attention on prostitution[3]. Then, they moved to London as the 2012 Olympics commenced and claimed that allowing countries like Iran or Saudi Arabia to compete will eventually lead to sports like 'stoning' and 'speed rape' being added to competition.[4]

Of course, the fact that they attempted to initiate violence with police did not actually appear in any English language newspaper, thus the 'poor little innocent women being victimized by police brutality' could once again be used. If the protesters were to be naked men around an Olympics venue where there are children, nobody would have questioned the actions of the police forces and placing them on a sex offenders list would have been a foregone conclusion.

But all the aforementioned protests still seem rather innocent to a certain degree.

However, in July 2012, Yana Zhdanova, a FEMEN member, came to the airport when Kirill, the head of the Russian Orthodox Church, was arriving in Ukraine and ran towards him screaming 'Get out!' whilst her naked back contained the following message:

> Kill Kirill!

Yes, it was in English and yes she actually assaulted the Russian Orthodox cleric[5]. For that, she was awarded a 15 days jail sentence[6]. Some might say it is enough, albeit I cannot stop for a moment and wonder whether this was enough.

Think of it for a second: Let's say a topless man comes towards Hillary Clinton shouting 'Get out!' whilst his back reads 'Kill Hillary' and motivates his gesture against Clinton as a message against her intention to push 28 million genital mutilations against men and boys in Africa.[7]. Would news reports still be in the 'Fun' section like the other one was in most mainstream European media? Would this piece of news go almost unnoticed? I sincerely doubt it.

But they didn't stop there. In August, Inna Șevcenko took down, with chainsaw, a wooden cross in the center of Kiev that had been erected in the memory of the people that died during the Stalinist oppression. This took place in front of the former NKVD headquarters[8].

That's right, monument erected from private money donated by the survivors of a real oppression, was taken down by an almost-naked feminist, because she felt that the vandals from Pussy Riot had to be set free and thus she is entitled to walk freely with a chainsaw in the center of a European capital city and take down monuments.

700 people were killed in November 1941 in Kiev by Stalin's regime. That's only one month out of a long-time regime and only one city. All those people were killed for disliking the predecessor of feminist ideology – Marxism-Leninism. But those people cannot be commemorated properly because the FEMEN movement says so.

Just imagine someone taking down the Washington monument or the monument that's been placed at ground zero after 9/11. That was the sentimental value of that monument for the Ukrainian people that suffered through real oppression.

The Ukrainian authorities wanted to arrest her but the FEMEN movement organized a blockade[9] and Inna eventually fled Ukraine and moved to France where she opened a 'training center for activists'[10] and she actually has the nerve to claim that she is being persecuted by the Ukrainian authorities.

And these violent thugs are being cried over on in the Ukrainian media because they got alienated by their families once they joined the movement[11]. Would anyone from the media even care, let alone be compassionate, if they were men? Again, I sincerely doubt it.

Some might think that calling them 'violent thugs' is too much, albeit in my moral compass, someone who uses a chainsaw in the centre of a major city to take down a monument is indeed a violent thug. Allow me translate a statement of Inna Șevcenko in the last article cited above:

> I try to shake women in Ukraine and make them socially active. We provoke them, show that women can do it. I generally aim to organize in 2017 a female revolution. Maybe not a matriarchy, but very close to it. Enough with the male sins!

But now they are in almost every European country. On December 12 they protested in front of the Ukrainian Parliament[12] and on December 21 they protested in front of the Egyptian embassy in Stockholm, Sweden (see video[13]).

Sure, to many, they might still seem harmless and some UK feminists dissociated from their claims[14]. However, on January 1 2012, very few people were aware of their existence whilst now they have representatives in almost all European countries and in South America.

They want something very close to matriarchy, or something else.

Hugo Schwyzer: embracing racism, sexism, & cruelty

December 24, 2012 | by Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) | Link | Original Link

Oh, Hugo, you've really outdone your bootlicking little self this time. Have the girls let you in the clubhouse yet? No? Seriously, Hugo, you need to find some boys to play with. In a resoundingly depressing, and disgustingly opportunistic piece at Jezebel, Hugo links the sad shootings of children to one of the ugliest portraits of young men you'll read in the media this year.
http://jezebel.com/5970262/poor-pitiful-dudes-why-you-should-defer-to-men-with-post+patriarchal-depression
So according to Hugo, there is a problem in America with young "white" men (why just white, Hugo?) getting the shaft and falling drastically behind in achievement and status when compared to their female counterparts. Score one for no shit Sherlock. The problem is not that an entire generation of young men (of all colors) are being chucked under the ideological bus, oh no. Rather, they are reacting to this treatment by picking up guns and shooting children, right? Because, hey, that's what men do, right?
There's so much to facepalm over here it's hard to know where to begin. Let's talk about the accusation that it is white men in particular who are prone to pick up guns and shoot people in mass killings. The question is not "is the shooter white," but what proportion of mass killings are carried out by white men relative to their presence in the general population? Seems like the folks at Virginia Tech might know something about white men going nuts and shooting up innocent bystanders, as long as by "white," you mean Korean. There are some other folks in DC that lived through a round of snipers who also might contest the fact that mass murderers are lonely "white" guys.
Why the race-baiting, Hugo? Well, men of color have legitimate reasons to complain that their chances in life might be blighted by the circumstances of their birth (80% to single mothers), their economic status (poor), an educational system geared to ensure they fail, a culture that reviles them and a justice system that is more willing to detain them for years for crimes other folks get away with. And those are legitimate complaints. Although they're increasingly problems for men of all races. To be clear, I am not making excuses for criminality amongst any group, but I am suggesting life circumstances offer some sort of explanation. It is still up to every adult to take responsibility for their own actions, full stop.
But Hugo's article is designed to cast men as whiny suckholes who can't "man up" to circumstances, and who have no legitimate complaints to make. He goes even further, suggesting that young men in particular are not just angry about a school system designed to fail them, the complete demonization of masculinity and manhood and the annihilation of employment prospects for men in particular, but that they are specifically angry at women who supposedly benefit from this "New World Order." And you know what, probably a lot of them are. For bloody good reason.
Here's where Hugo outdoes himself: he cites an article that claims as long as we continue to fuck over young men, we will continue to have mass killings of children and other innocent bystanders – indeed, those sorts of killings should increase, according to Hugo, because: patriarchy. Also because: masculinity.

http://opinionator.blogs.nytimes.com/2012/12/17/guns-and-the-decline-of-the-young-man/
Think about that. According to Hugo, picking up an automatic weapon loaded with flesh shattering bullets and killing six year olds is part of what makes you a man. As long as you are going to define yourself as "manly," you will have to accept that you are willing and able to shoot children.
Hugo is deliberately perpetuating the most destructive portrait of masculinity that he can, in order to justify why he rejects it so resoundingly and to ingratiate himself with a movement that despises men while claiming to love them. Hugo doesn't consider himself particularly manly, therefore he is exempt from his horrifying concept of what constitutes masculinity. He acknowledges that men are getting a shitty deal in the current climate, and then insists that the only response open to them is to pick up a gun and shoot children. Or come to hate masculinity like he does?
Because according to Hugo, that is what masculinity IS. The Sandy Hook shooter was not a mentally disturbed person with a severe personality disorder, raised by a wingnut Armageddonist mother who provided him with wickedly effective weapons and ammunition, raised in broken family with a father he hadn't seen in years – no, none of that mattered. He wasn't in desperate need of psychological help, he was just a man, and killing children in a brutal bloodbath is simply what men DO.
The willful ugliness of Hugo's concept of what men are and what they do is not just outrageous, it's profoundly, disturbingly sad. Inside his insistence that men are angry, unstable, violent brutes hides a wretched reality: men who are struggling with mental health issues, who do have unresolved, deeply troubling feelings and thoughts are told that there is no help for them. There is nothing they can do to assuage the loneliness and pain and despair of their lives. Indeed, if they reach out for help, they are just whiny assholes who can't handle what Hanna Rosen has called The End of Men and the supposed rise of women.
Christmas is almost upon us, and across every western, feminized country, there will be countless thousands of men who will sit out the day alone, deprived of their children and families, grappling with isolation and desolation. The vast, sweeping majority of them will face their demons alone, swallow their anger and hate and the injustice of their lives, try to hang on and hope for the future and carry the faces of their children in their hearts. They will find the courage and strength and stamina to carry on. To persevere, to face the future unafraid, to remain the Captain of their own souls. And for men who find that the burden is too much to bear, that your strength has failed you, that you cannot go on, ignore hateful assholes like Hugo. There is help, and there is nothing unmanly about asking for it. A man who staggers is still a man. And somewhere, there is a shoulder for you to lean on until your strength is back.

Lucie Slater issued the pass of all passes

December 25, 2012 | by Peter Lloyd | Link | Original Link

Last week, Mail Online reported on the case of Lucie Slater – a 21 year-old woman who glassed her defenceless boyfriend in the face.
Ms Slater, a bar promoter from Gateshead – who was a contestant on ITV talent show The X Factor before being disqualified for her actions – launched the vicious attack on her boyfriend William Aitken after seeing a Facebook message she simply 'disliked'.
The assault, which took place in the victim's Northumberland home, last summer, was so violent that it pierced an artery, scarring him for life – potentially destroying his burgeoning modelling career.
It also caused severe blood loss and permanent nerve damage to his face.
Devastated Mr Aitken has described the incident as 'tragic' and 'life-changing from that moment on.'
At the hospital where he received treatment, Slater claimed Aitken sustained his injuries from falling down the stairs, before changing her story and claiming it was an accident involving flying shards of glass.
Perhaps, given the opportunity, she also might've claimed he walked into a door.
After all, for all its subterfuge about television programmes, social networking sites and alcohol, this is nothing less than spousal abuse. A classic case of domestic violence made infinitely worse by the delusion that because it's a female avenging a (perceived) broken heart caused by a man it's OK.
It's not.
Dangerously, this misnomer seems to be backed by both society and the law.

Violent criminal set free by UK court.

Last week, just like his girlfriend had done months earlier, the British legal system delivered Aitken a cruel, underserving blow – this time, by letting his attacker escape jail. Despite pleading guilty to unlawful wounding, thus qualifying for a five-year custodial sentence, Slater walked away with nothing more than a suspended sentence, a two-year supervision order and 120 hours of community service.

In a public message to all violent women, it implied that attacking men is girl power, not a criminal offence worthy of prison time – even when that means thrusting a wine glass into somebody's face and throwing a laptop across a room.

In a disturbing example of modern justice, Slater will now enjoy all the trappings of Christmas without a shred of real, tangible punishment in sight.

No wonder, along with the case of Paul Stratford – who walked free from court after punching a headmistress for reprimanding his unruly son – it sparked the Mail's What Does It Take To Get Jailed? report, last week.

Quite frankly, both rulings are a joke.

But, despite being equal understatements of justice, they differ on one crucial element – bias. While Stratford was likely given leniency for having a dependent child, in my opinion, Slater got off (from a much bloodier crime) simply because she's a woman.

And it's increasingly common.

Last month, Bianca Hendry from Middlesborough escaped jail – despite having a previous conviction for battery – after biting the tip off another club-goer's finger in a dance floor confrontation over 'stares'.

Similarly, on Friday, Victoria Willis from Darlington walked free from court after stabbing her boyfriend with a kitchen knife at their home.

Her punishment? She was given a community order.

Earlier this year, Sheona Keith glassed a male clubber for simply smiling at her – but was spared jail by a judge. Instead, she was given a conditional discharge and ordered to pay £400 compensation by Judge Philip Wassall at Exeter Crown Court.

Had these been cases of men attacking women, then – quite rightly – they would've been given much stiffer penalties. But, in the same week where car insurance brokers are no longer able to discriminate against male drivers, the courts should be applying their policies equally, too.

Thankfully, I'm not alone in my theory of equal equality – some people in power agree, too.

Last October, during a House of Commons debate on the topic of sentencing female offenders, Phillip Davies MP delivered an outstanding critique of the pro-female discrimination endemic throughout UK courts.

A transcript of the debate, which can be found online, is 14 pages long and (as far as I'm aware) the only example of its kind in British politics. As we approach 2013, we truly need more people like him – male and female – to speak up and defend fair justice if society is ever going to be equal for both men and women, boys and girls, victims and the vulnerable.

Part of this involves both victims and attackers realising that women are just as guilty as men.

Last week, newspapers reported on the case of Julie Griffiths – a 43-year-old from Newcastle-Under-Lyme who breached her ASBO 47 times in three months by verbally abusing her husband. The tirades were so loud and mentally torturous that they kept their neighbours awake at night.

Inappropriately, headlines described her as a 'nagging wife', when – in reality – she is an abusive one.

Like Lucie Slater, I doubt very much she even recognises this herself (after all, no females commit domestic violence – right?), but only stiffer legal sentences will change the world's view on violent women. And their view of themselves.

Given that Slater's victim still claims to 'love' his attacker (evidence that men suffer the misleadingly-titled 'battered wife' syndrome too), this needs to happen fast.

Certain newspapers and courts may treat female-on-male violence as a joke, but this is one issue which definitely has no room for a punchline.

I almost rejected the red pill

December 25, 2012 | by Jay T | Link | Original Link

I had several chances to take the fabled red pill and failed to do so. It's amazing how you can look back after the fact and see just how messed up things really were.
I'm the oldest of 4. I have 3 half-sisters. None of us share a father. I was raised almost entirely by angry women. My mother was an abused divorcee'. My aunt and my grandmother were both divorced and both had a big hand in raising us. I have an uncle who I idolized growing up, but he is gay and at times resented his family for not showing him enough support in his lifestyle choice. So all in all, I had very few male role models in my life growing up.
I was told early on I'm the problem because I'm a man. Literally those words. From the ages of 14-16 I can count on 1 hand the number of times my mother used my actual name. It was always when she wanted money I'd earned from mowing lawns. Any other time I was simply called "Male child."
I put every woman I ever dated on monuments so high that I could hardly hear them when they shouted down orders at me. I was the embodiment of a beta male doormat. We all know the song and dance. Nothing we do is for us. I didn't know any different. I thought what I was experiencing was normal. I wasn't raised to question anything. I just assumed that everyone went through what I went through at some point. And since they made it through, I would have to make it through as well. Our lives are devoted to making someone else happy. And I was damned good at my job.
I was with a woman for 8 years. We never married (thank the heavens) but we were engaged for much of that time. Just too poor to actually afford to go through with it. Just to give you all a little insight into the type of woman she was/is, our first fight was a few months into the relationship. It lasted almost 2 months to the day. And it was all because I cheated on her in a dream that she had. For 2 months I had to put up with that malarkey. It went downhill from there quick.
We ended up after about 6 1/2 years conceiving a child, a son. I was working for less than minimum wage at a home improvement store. Part of my pay was made up in commissions from the sales I made. In order to pay for a child and the medical bills I knew would be coming, I started working every hour I could. 15 hours a day Monday through Friday, 10 hours on Saturday, and usually 8 hours of unpaid time on Sunday. Needless to say I wasn't there for much of the pregnancy. And it only took 2 weeks before the accusations of cheating started. It got to the point where I had to (daily) take pictures of myself clocking in and out and send them to her so that she wouldn't doubt I was at work.
Now I don't want to get into the specifics of what happened or why it happened, so I will simply say that due to complications during the pregnancy, our son was born extremely premature, and he wasn't strong enough to survive. He was born, and died on October 2nd. I was able to hold him for 4 hours before he passed. It was the best and worst 4 hours of my life.

After we lost our son, things with my fiancée and I got worse. To the point that if I came home after a 12-15 hour day and got yelled at for 4 hours straight before she passed out, I considered it a good day. The bad days, well you can imagine.
I didn't leave her however. She was hurt and needed a punching bag. I was willing to fill that role until she didn't need it anymore. I could mourn my son after she had done her mourning. Until then, "solider up. No tears. Men don't cry. You'll get your turn, but she gets her turn first." Things I actually said to myself to keep myself in the state of mind I thought I had to be in for her.
It wasn't until she told me that losing our son was my fault that I left. In yet another accusation of cheating she told me that god took our son to punish me for not being faithful. At this point I think it's relevant to share that not a single time in our relationship did I cheat. But she had strayed 3 times without me throwing it in her face.
It's been 3 years since I left her and literally the day after I felt like a weight was off my shoulders. But the blue pill world was still one I lived in. It wasn't until a mutual friend of ours had told me (roughly two years after the fact) that my ex was looking for lawyers to take me to court, that I was able to fully choke down the red pill. Even though I had worked for about 5-6 months averaging 4 hours of sleep/night to pay the bills and set money aside to pay for our son's upcoming expenses…money that she kept when we split.
She was trying to take me to court to pay child support for her pregnancy and the cremation and funeral costs. She wanted 10 grand. It's also relevant to note that the cremation had already been paid for out of my pocket once. Funeral costs haven't been paid, but it's because she refuses to bury him. He's in a small urn at her apartment now. Thankfully, she couldn't find an attorney to take her case. Not because it was unlikely to win sadly, but because she had blown the money I left her with on a small shopping spree with her friends and no one wanted to work for free.
But, it was upon hearing her intentions I started researching my chances of winning my case. That was when the red pill really started to work its magic. Seeing how one-sided the courts are I got scared. Thankfully she's horrible with money, and doesn't work due to her back getting injured at work 2-3 years prior to our split. So the threat there is for the most part gone.
Since everything I've moved on. I took the little bit of knowledge I had and ran full speed with it. I've watched every video on YouTube by GWW, JTO and Patrickhenryist. I've spent about 20 hours a week not counting the videos pouring over statistics ranging from homelessness, to labor and wage gaps, the courts. Just about anything I thought might help in a debate. I've begun local activism. I've placed posters for AVFM in some of the local dive bars around town. I figure that's a good place to look for men who might need help.
I wouldn't wish what I went through on anyone, but in a way I'm glad I went through it. Had I not I would have never ended up on the path I'm on. And scarier yet, I may never have left my Ex. In some ways losing him was for the best. And being able to admit that to myself shows how much I've actually healed.
Well there it is. The first time I've committed my story to words. My hope is that my story

(and the stories of others) help more men realize they're not alone. Feel free to share my story with others who you think may just find real hope and motivation to do things differently.
Update* PatrickHenryist did a video about this, which first brought it to some of our attention. –DE*

Has Amanda Marcotte gotten stupider?

After about a year of no noticeable activity from Amanda Marcotte, she's apparently back, taking another ineffectual swipe at the men's rights movement[1]. However, her aim, like that of Feministe's Jill Filipovic[2] seems a little off. In fact, Marcotte's recent Pandagon essay denouncing the possibilities of success for a "progressive men's movement" seems like an address to a fantasy world extant nowhere but her own imagination.

Progressive, of course, is the popular term for politically-left-leaning. It's a term cultivated to induce listeners to infer that politically-right-leaning must therefore be regressive. It's a neat rhetorical trick, and at its base, dishonest. (I'm surprised, are you?) While the actual men's rights movement is apolitical, having no left or right slant, such exploration of terms necessary in an address of Marcotte's writing, due to persistent terminological inexactitude in her rhetoric.

For example, predictably banging on the feminist bongo drum of rape; Marcotte backhands former Good Men Project contributor Hugo Schwyzer, asserting that what he does is "..perpetuate the myth that rapists are just nice guys who are confused about consent.."

But she breezes past the fact that "nice guys rape" is not a myth to be addressed by feminism, but a feminist talking point. It is a kissing cousin to the political constructs "rape culture" and "men can stop rape" all of which are simple re-toolings of the now defunct "all men are rapists."

That great lie, due to reality pushing back on feminism's modern rhetoric of hate, has been repeatedly re-phrased. "Men can stop rape" is among the recent incarnations of the malignant myth that rape is either normal, or that it is not committed by women. The popular feminist talking point "men can stop rape is also another way of dehumanizing men, of lowering them in moral position, by placing the blame for the crimes of a very few men and women.

Most hilariously, Marcotte looks at the ongoing demonization of the GMP by feminist ideologues as an indication that a men's movement is unfeasible. To understand just how funny this is, a restatement of what might be obvious to some readers is necessary. The Good Men Project is a feminist web-site, founded with initial support from Ms. Magazine, along with the endorsement of a significant number of feminist writers, including Amanda Marcotte herself. She was one of the major contributors at GMP.

The site calling itself the Good Men Project attempted to position themselves as a men's movement site, but in doing so, they couldn't censor comments without giving away the con. As a result, every time they published overtly feminist, anti male garbage, actual Men's Rights Activists flooded the comments threads with oppositional rhetoric. And simply by that persistent refutation of feminism's standard lies, the GMP was driven to fall to infighting. The occasional attempts by the site's editors to field a convincing address of men's issues drove the core writers away, including Schwyzer and Marcotte.

They also promoted enough feminist agitprop that they have no credibility with MRAs.
Now, however, Marotte says “I dearly want men to have conversations about masculinity and manhood” and one paragraph later adds: “I still think those conversations can happen. But not by men organizing a “men’s movement”.
I have no commentary to add to that, so I’ll just carry on.
She numbers her apparent reasons for opposition to men working together without feminist oversight, but first in her list is: “1) We cannot fight the gender construct and gender segregation by reinforcing it.”
Feminism is simply traditionalism dialed up to eleven. The only serious differences between the two are that in traditional gender roles, men were respected for protecting, providing and dying when convenient for others. In feminism’s amped-up version of the same thing, male human value, outside utility, is dialed down to zero, and female infantilization is amped till the needle pins the redline.
Picture a slut-walk as 30-something women chant my-flaunted-boobs-are-not-a-social-signal, carrying signs which read “destroy patriarchy” while the entire parade is protected from city traffic and possible hecklers by armed police officers. You know, police, the armed agents of patriarchy; protecting a parade which aims to destroy patriarchy.
Marcotte then asks what she likely believes is a rhetorical question. “Why do men need a separate movement to deconstruct patriarchy?” This reveals Marcotte’s raison d’être, and says nothing about the men’s movement. It is typically dishonest. She should have put the period after the word movement.
Why do men need a separate movement?
Im glad you asked that, Amanda.

The poster placed by me in Vancouver, BC. After I did so it was defaced by feminists.
The concluding statement of the poster is “Men’s rights are human rights.”
The defacement responds to this statement, with a single spray-bombed word.

Wrong.

This is likely the poster which drove the feminists at the University of Toronto to scream "you are fucking scum" at a man attempting to attend a public talk by the man who has been justifiably called the Mr. Rogers of the men's rights movement, Dr Warren Farrell. Ours is the movement that has feminists screaming "you are fucking scum" at a young man whose views they didn't know, whose name they didn't know, and who, it turned out, was seeking the possibility of answers to why two of his friends had both committed suicide.

Your feminism, Amanda – a hateful, violent, antihuman and disgusting spectacle of public malice is why men need a separate movement.
Thanks for asking.
And that on the heels of this increasing mountain of evidence of feminism's true foundation, that of hatred and violence – Marcotte has the confidence to claim men should abandon their struggle for basic human rights, in favor of service to a depraved cult. This indicates either a bottomless stupidity from Marcotte, or the megalomaniacal scheming of a true sociopath. However, whether stupidity or psychopathy, it doesn't much matter what route a feminist takes to arrive at bigotry.
Marcotte also inanely defines the goals of a men's movement with a fanciful claim that feminism's mandate is "about ending patriarchy and ending arbitrary, stifling gender norms."
This is literally nonsense. Which is to say, it is a statement devoid of meaning. Patriarchy, in feminist parlance, is a boogeyman, endlessly reshaped to serve as a rhetorical device, and "arbitrary, stifling gender norms" is a similarly undefined blob.
Following her first apparent reason for opposition to a men's movement, she also claims that female leaders are anathema to potential men's rights activists. Marcotte clearly has never heard of Girl Writes What, Typhon Blue, Dr. Tara Palmatier, Kristina Hansen, Erin Pizzey, Dr. Elly Tams or any other of the many women who contribute at AVFM. And that is just at AVfM. Marcotte also does not recognize any of the other very high profile women currently challenging gender feminist hegemony of the discourse on men's issues in the mainstream; women like Barbara Kay, Christina Hoff Sommers, Camille Paglia and Katherine Young among others.
I believe I've mentioned earlier on in this article that Marcotte appears to address a "reality" with the peculiar quality that it exists only in her mind.
One of the more puzzling elements of her peice is a pronounced tendency "report" on the MRM in a seemingly blithe unawareness that her pronouncements, once published, will stand in sharp contrast to the increasingly public reality of the actual Mens Rights Movement (the real one, not the one in Marcotte's imagination)
"While it's true that feminist work is often interpersonal with a side dose of self-help, most "men's movement" types seem to think that's all there is to it."
I suppose she's been absent from the scene for some time, perhaps she needs to catch up. However, Marcotte claims it is feminism's policies, and solid, discreet and measurable goals that keep it on track.

Now that women are 65% of graduation outcomes in higher education, there's only 35% to go. Good news everyone!
But, according to Marcotte, inserts mine:

> Reproductive rights [only for women], eliminating sexual and domestic violence [by pretending DV only involves female victims], equal pay [for unequal work], power-sharing at home [assuming any man is stupid enough to marry], gender-neutral Easy-Bake Ovens….

This is apparently what is claimed as a reality check, preventing feminism from devolving into everyone sitting around validating everyone's feelings, no matter how anti-social or reactionary.
In the summer of 2012, the box-cutter wielding male feminist informed me that his feelings trumped my logic as his cohorts tore down posters reading "men's rights are human rights" before all running from the police I had called from my cell. What was that Marcotte said about preventing feminism from "devolving to everyone sitting around validating everyone's feelings, no matter how anti-social or reactionary"?
I couldn't have made this up, and honestly, this isn't even sporting. Didn't Marcotte used to be able to write a rational and cohesive article at one time?

> Any men's movement will fail to have such a reality check, since current policies and social structures already benefit men over women.

Whoops, I forgot about the alternate reality the Pandagon blog inhabits, where men are not 4 out of 5 suicides, where men are not 70 to 90 percent of the homeless, where men raped in prison are not the subject of boringly predictable jokes, where men are not 93% of all on-the-job fatalities and where infant genital mutilation is not called by another word to render boy mutilation socially acceptable so the severed foreskins of infants can be used to produce better wrinkle cream for aging female bigots like Marcotte.
But ingore all that, and the several hundred others items omitted here for the sake of brevity, and just keep telling yourself "current policies and social structures already benefit men over women."
If nobody ever looks at specifics, it's almost possible to believe in such fantasy.
And remember, according to Amanda "The best way to end gender oppression of men is to push for women's equality."
Lets parse that. To end men's gender oppression, elevate women.
So men, in other words, forget that you are humans with rights, forget the hate from feminists, forget the violence used against you, just be a good-man, and do what you're told. And if you don't, even just a little bit, take a look at the Good Men Project for how you will be treated.
Does it seem to you that feminists aren't even trying anymore? Or maybe they really are just that stupid.

Tribute to Uncle Walter

December 26, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

I was deeply moved by Jay T's story. It was a reminder of why we need a voice for men in this world. It also reminded me of my own life, not as the victim of the forces that oppress men, but as a co-conspirator and accomplice in the problem.
It reminded me of a slice of time from my youth, and perhaps offered me a chance for some slight redemption. I jotted down the following as a comment, but then decided I did not want to leave it buried there. PE
Jay T's story is the story of all men. That is not embellishment or exaggeration.
I don't know why, but it reminds me of a moment I had as a very young man. I guess I was about 12 or 13. I was with my parents visiting my Aunt Johnnie. We visited Aunt Johnnie a lot. She made fresh homemade bread and her house filled with the aroma of a bakery every time we were there.
I remember one day walking from the kitchen through the house, just poking around. I passed through a bedroom, where there was a man lying there on the bed. He looked up at me.
It was my uncle, Walter.
He looked aged, and withered; tired beyond the simple meaning of the word. I could tell he had been working; doing something hard. I could not form the thought in my head at the time but I could tell he was doing something that was sucking the very life out of him.
He just lay there on the bed looking at me. He neither smiled nor scowled. There was no discernible expression on his face, even in the road map of his deeply wrinkled brow. You would not even think he noticed I was there but for the fact that he looked at me without blinking.
It seemed fitting, perhaps, as no one else in the house seemed to notice him, either. We were visiting my aunt, not whoever this shell of a man was laying alone in a bedroom. I scarcely remember him other than that moment.
And as to that moment, for some reason it frightened me. He frightened me. I avoided his gaze and looked at the floor. Then I quickly scurried out, finding somewhere else to be in a hurry.
The next memory I have is that of his funeral. My Aunt Johnnie was wailing openly, a relative at each of her elbows, holding her up.
Come to think of it, I do know why I am reminded of this by Jay T's story.
So many invisible men, buried in life by the unending work that defines their worth; buried in back rooms by loved ones and families. Buried in death by those they supported and cared for.
And then buried by the likes of me.
I have not taken a moment to think about my Uncle Walter, one of the many men I never knew, since that day one possible, frightening future of mine lay in solitude on a bed in the small corner of a home, while the kitchen was alive with fresh bread and family.
Whoever you were, Uncle Walter, wherever you are, please know that I am looking back at you now, and I see you.

Feminism's mythology of rape culture

December 26, 2012 | by Elly Tams | Link | Original Link

I didn't enjoy being stalked by my ex-boyfriend, and then having him break into my house, threaten to kill me and then assault me. I didn't enjoy it at all. Sometimes I call that night, over ten years ago now, as "the day I became a feminist." (I've since come to change my mind about that, though this issue was part of that, see Leaving the sisterhood for more.)

I was already a feminist. My Mum and her Mum were feminists. I was born into it. So I never really had to think too much until he stood over me, his hands round my neck, squeezing, telling me what a bitch I was. I never had to think what "being a woman" or "being a feminist" meant. I will give him that. He and his violence really got me thinking.

After my assault, and my lonely journey through the legal procedure that followed, I naively thought I might be able to share some sisterhood and solidarity with other women who'd suffered violent attacks, including domestic violence and rape. But when I have tried to connect with women who campaign on "violence against women," I repeatedly get told that because I have not been raped, I have no right to talk on this issue or to try and empathize with women who have. Rape seems to hold a special symbolic position in the minds of these feminists and is treated as worse — but also somehow better — than all other violent crimes.

The term used to demonstrate the privileged position rape holds in feminist discourse is "rape culture." According to Melissa McEwan:

> Rape culture is the myriad ways in which rape is tacitly and overtly abetted and encouraged having saturated every corner of our culture so thoroughly that people can't easily wrap their heads around what the rape culture actually is.

Far more important than my own feeling of exclusion from feminist campaigns and groupings around gender violence is the countless number of other people who get attacked and killed in our society, who are not acknowledged by the concept of "rape culture." Have you ever heard a feminist say that we live in transphobic assault culture? Or murder of young black men culture? Or homophobia culture? Or even domestic violence culture? I haven't. Incidentally domestic violence is far more common than rape, and can also include rape. But it just doesn't seem to impress the feminists who believe in rape culture. They are welcome to their victim top trumps, but I am not playing anymore.

When I say rape is privileged in feminist discourse, I don't mean that it benefits anybody. I believe that by focusing on the centrality of rape in our culture, feminists are actually making it more difficult for all of us to campaign against all forms of gendered violence in society.

Trying to work out why these feminists do this is difficult. My instinct is that holding onto special victim status has some pay-offs for feminists. They can continue to present gender politics as a binary opposition between men (potential rapists) and women (perpetual potential victims of rape). Basically, the concept of rape culture is misandrist, and it does not allow for the fact that women are sometimes perpetrators of sexual assault, and men are sometimes on the receiving end.

I'd like to quote somebody who left a comment on a previous essay of mine about this topic. This woman is a survivor of rape, so the rad-fems won't be able to dismiss her critique of rape culture the way they do mine:

> This mythologizing of rape is still rooted in the whole "pedestal" complex, IMHO, and thus rapists are EVIL and women who get raped are spiritually/psychologically disfigured for LIFE and blah blah blah. The "rape culture" paradigm, while clearly meant as helpful critique and containing valuable cultural insight, seems to carry on that tradition.

The term "rapist" is one I am not comfortable with using at all, if I can help it. I know I am in a tiny minority, as I see the word splashed across the newspapers on a regular basis, and I hear it being used widely in conversations about rape. The reason I don't like the word "rapist" is that I think it serves to undermine our attempts to tackle rape and sexual violence. This is because it pathologizes people who commit rape, portraying them in our culture as monsters and hate figures. This leads to a situation where we place rapists pretty near the top of a hierarchy of evil characters (maybe just behind pedophiles), so that in fact, it is actually very difficult to prosecute for rape. If rapists are these inhuman monstrous characters, it is not surprising that courts up and down the country are reluctant to convict the thousands of people (not men, people) who commit rape each year.
I have received criticism for my view, particularly from feminists who argue that survivors of sexual violence need the term rapist to enable them to name their attacker, proceed with seeking justice and ultimately to get over their ordeal. But I believe that just as we have changed our terminology from talking about victims to survivors of rape, we also need to change how we label perpetrators. When I hear the word "rapist" I think of a man, and not a man who is capable of change, of reflection. We have to speak about and talk to men who commit sexual assault as if they are able to change, and we also must acknowledge men are not the only perpetrators, if we want to reduce sexual and intimate partner violence in society.
Rape culture is a myth. I reject it outright.
In fact, it's part of why I now am no longer a feminist.
Editor's note: this is a slightly updated version of an article Dr. Tams had published elsewhere, before she decided to abandon feminism entirely. It has mysteriously disappeared from its original location. –DE

AG Biden confronted on Smith case by Sen. Lawson

December 27, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

As AVfM readers will no doubt recall, our Judicial Accountability Committee (JAC) and our associated volunteer activists launched an activism campaign on behalf of Gordon Smith. Smith is a resident of Delaware, and the victim of a spree of malicious false accusations by his former wife Tiffany Marie Smith. This was further complicated by police incompetence and arrogant indifference of prosecutors involved in the case. Gordon Smith was eventually exonerated, and his former wife arrested and charged, partly because of the activism furthered by this website.

Prior to and after Smith's change of fortune, we made contact with dozens of state officials in Delaware about the case. Managing Editor Dean Esmay put in many calls, including one to State Senator David G. Lawson. I spoke with Dean this morning on that exchange. He said:

> Around the time we were doing the mail out to all candidates running for office in Delaware, I also called more than one of those candidates. Only one of them returned my call: Senator Lawson. We spoke for about ten minutes and he made it very clear to me that this issue mattered to him and he planned on doing some work on it assuming he was re-elected.

Senator Lawson kept his promise.

In a letter dated December 21, Lawson did not mince words with Attorney General Joseph Biden:

[box icon=""]

Attorney General Joseph Biden, III
Carvel State Office Building
820 N. French Street
Wilmington, DE 19801

Dear A.G. Biden,

I write to you today with great concern for the abhorrent behavior displayed by your agency toward a mutual constituent, Gordon Smith. Need I remind you, sir, that Mr. Smith was facing numerous domestic violence charges (24 to be exact) that were just recently dismissed due to the finding that the alleged victim was falsely reporting each of the incidents, to which Mr. Gordon was subsequently arrested. My concern is that the Attorney General's office seems that they are patting themselves on the back for releasing Mr. Smith from these charges; however, Mr. Smith continues to be the victim in these cases.

Why? Because of these outlandish charges, which again were proven to be false, Mr. Smith was terminated from gainful employment. The simple dismissal of charges does not assist Mr. Smith in picking up the fractured pieces of his life because he is currently unable to find a job. Those charges remain on Mr. Smith's record, to which he is obligated to disclose. When Mr. Smith tried to address this matter he was met with a rather inappropriate response that he would have to file to have those charges expunged. This is frankly unacceptable; may I remind you that Mr. Smith is unemployed due to the actions of his accuser. Those charges were proven to be false, the Attorney General's office is paralyzed as to what to do regarding the defendant of those false reports, and feels vindicated by simply dismissing Mr. Smith's charges? Attorney General Biden, Mr. Smith need not continue to be the actual victim here. The State should see to it that all the charges against Mr. Smith be expunged from his record at its own expense, especially in light of the State's acknowledgement that each of those charges was unfounded and falsely reported. Let us not continue to see this matter swept under the rug.

Due to the reckless behavior of Mr. Smith's accuser the State has expended an extraordinarily large amount of taxpayers' dollars to which end? To continue to victimize the one that was actually found to be innocent and to protect the one that was found to be falsely expending the State's money? This is not appropriate and the math, sir, does not add up. Chapter 5, subsection 1245, Title 11 of Delaware Code clearly establishes that "…Falsely reporting an incident is a class A misdemeanor…In addition to the penalties otherwise authorized by law, any person convicted of an offense in violation of this section shall pay a fine of not less than $500…which fine cannot be suspended and be sentenced to perform a minimum of 100 hours of community service, and shall be required to reimburse the State, or other responding or other investigation governmental agency, for any expenses expended in the investigation and/or response to the incident falsely reported." Where is the justice for Mr. Smith to allow these charges to continue to exist on his record and no penalty is sought against the accuser?
I anticipate a speedy review of this matter and look forward to your immediate response.
Sincerely,
David G. Lawson, Senator 15th District

Governor Jack Markell
Chief Judge Chandlee J. Kuhn
Superintendent Nathaniel McQueen, DSP

This letter is both a small gesture and a brave, public political statement. And who knows what benefit it will ultimately be to Gordon Smith.
It may resolve a lot of his problems, or it may be a well-intended dead end attempted by a public servant who is actually serving the public.
But what we must take notice of at this point is that our voice, your voice, is finding its way into higher places all the time. We don't have near the public pull of feminists and false accusers, but the fact remains that the days of ignoring us are coming to an end. Together, we are making a difference.
Dean Esmay also had this to say:

> I’m pleased to see he kept that promise, and I hope people understand this: state-level legislators are vitally important to many men’s issues, often more important than anyone elected to the US Congress or the Presidency, and they’re also more likely to return your calls. This guy is taking a chance to try to help make things better for victims of false allegations in Delaware, and all it took was some letters and phone calls. YOU can make this kind of difference, too. It only takes one state level politician like this to make a difference.

I want to echo Mr. Esmay’s thoughts here as heartily as I can. A blind man could see that things are starting to change for us. Everywhere we look the writing is on the wall that we can put the sexual dark ages of the last 50 years to an end, and the agendas of hateful ideologues (and yes, public officials) will suffer the light of truth and scrutiny.
This is not a time for complacency.
2013, folks. It is a year we must crank up the volume. In old school rock ‘n’ roll terms, that means a wall piled to the ceiling with Marshall stacks.
When you see the activism opportunities on the page of this website throughout the next year, please ACT on them. Send those emails. Make those phone calls.
Drive the motherfucker like you stole it.

Children need fathers on Christmas

December 27, 2012 | by Lucian Vâlsan | Link | Original Link

After the Brits found out on December 25 that the tenth most wanted gift by the children is a DAD[1], on December 26, a few Bulgarian fathers took it to the streets with the message: 'Children need their fathers on Christmas'.
The organization named "Бащи за отговорно родителство" (Fathers for responsible parenthood) organized a protest in the Bulgarian capital, Sofia, in which they dressed themselves as Santa Claus in order to draw attention to the constant state sponsored parental alienation that is enabled by the Bulgarian government[2].
Although their protest was not huge, it was very attractive as the dads with signs offered small gifts to random children passing by, reminding them to cherish their fathers.
The situation of separated or divorced fathers in Bulgaria is no different, nor less dramatic, than anywhere else in the European Union, but this is the first time when a fathers' rights group was mentioned in the press. And by 'press' – I mean 'press' as a whole. Even this event got only three articles in the Bulgarian media, one in Serbia and one in Romania. Moreover, the Serbian and the Romanian media who reported this presented it as it's an anomaly to demand equal rights for men, which adds up to the depression that these fathers have to endure thanks to the misandric laws that never stop favoring women.
Vasil Popov from Plovdiv, Bulgaria, told to the Darik News Bulgaria (the only press agency that reported from the protest)[3]:

> Fathers are on the street, because for the most part they are the victims. After separation or divorce, fathers receive a restrictive regime which limits their contact with their children. If the mother does not want to allow child to maintain contact with the other parent, […], she gets the legal right to use the child against him. So she refers to a court order, not the paternal relationship, the relationship between child and parent. Personal relationships should not be regulated by a judicial act.

Basically, the law in Bulgaria presumes the mother to be the primary parent, regardless of whether she's an appropriate parent or not, and the father is deemed as a secondary non-parent. Not long ago, the family law in Romania was the same and it literally said that the "state protects the interests of mothers and children,"[4] while fathers were mentioned only when it came to child support.
It is really sad that these kinds of grassroots movements get little to no exposure.
However, there is also good news: The Sofia Municipality chose to support the message that 'Fathers for responsible parenthood' transmitted[5] which means that public officials of the capital city will petition the government to amend the legislation and give fathers more access to their children. With a bit of luck, next Christmas will find more fathers close to their children in Bulgaria, and this can only be a good thing.
Slowly, bit by bit, country by country, men are starting to see through the lies in the public discourse and are starting to stand up for themselves.

AVFM-R: Identifying hate in public

December 27, 2012 | by AVfM Radio | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]
The recent, and the ongoing public antics of mainstream, politically connected feminists are pushing many people, including public figures, to not only disavow that ideology of gender, but also to make comparisons to other movements, notable as violent, hateful and toxic. Tonight on AVFM Radio, we'll be comparing feminism to the Westboro Baptist Church. We'll also be asking the question, now that the hate, the violence and the malice of feminism is out into the public spotlight, what do feminists do to preserve themselves?

Bigot in a bra

December 27, 2012 | by Peter Lloyd | Link | Original Link

Peter Lloyd responds to Esther Walker's toxic and chauvinistic admission that she doesn't want to give birth to a little boy.

Esther Walker – wife of celebrity food critic Giles Coren – wrote a lacerating opinion piece about her casual sexism towards men and boys.
The article, which no doubt delighted the likes of Harriet Harman and Suzanne Moore, garnered more than 1,400 reader comments and sparked global offence (from both genders) after it poured vitriol on her unborn child for possibly being male.
'I can only deal with one man in my life…?and sometimes that's one too many,' she spewed, probably over some middle class macaroons or an elderflower torte.
'I know very little about boys, but what I have seen I really haven't liked. Boys are gross; they attack their siblings with sticks, are obsessed with toilets, casually murder local wildlife and turn into disgusting teenage boys and then boring, selfish men.'
She then said she would 'die' if her baby was born male, claimed that she was 'deeply, deeply suspicious of little boys,' before describing them as the 'dreaded gender'.
This, ladies and gentlemen, is what I call a bigot in a bra. And, in my opinion, she's a disgrace.
[image]
Esther Walker

As a men's issues writer, and an activist for greater compassion around male-specific problems – including father's rights, the 90 per cent of homeless people who are men and our soaring suicide rates – this baby bias is no different.
In fact, it might be worse – because here we've reached a new low in the socially acceptable hatred of men and defenceless boys.
Yes, perhaps Mrs Giles Coren thought she was being a cutesy version of Caitlin Moran or a maternal manifestation of the fictional Carrie Bradshaw – after all, many people believe women can't ever be sexist. But, whatever her motivation, she's wrong.
Her opinions are a towering, crass example of misandry (the male equivalent of misogyny) which is so embedded in our societies, schools, music charts, television programmes and newspapers that it frequently goes unnoticed.
Often by the people voicing it.
Here we have a relatively intelligent woman, with a loving husband and daughter, who thinks nothing about publicly outing herself as a female chauvinist. What was she thinking? I can only assume she is sleepwalking through the issue of female-on-male sexism.
Besides, wasn't it a man who got her pregnant in the first place? And what's going to happen when her son grows up and Googles his mum?
As someone who isn't sexist (I worked on a feminist magazine for three years) and have a father who is the best man I know, I find her comments particularly cringeworthy.

Not least because I have a remarkable nephew who, like his big sister and their female cousin, is a delight – a person I'm infinitely proud of. Someone I will defend to the hilt against toxic opinions like these.
Like all the boys I know, my nephew is a loving, caring, intelligent, funny and innocent person. But wider society will rarely tell him this. In fact, outside his family circle, he will be told he's clumsy, bashful, emotionally stunted and brutish.
As he gets older he'll be told he's developing much slower than girls; a low achiever in the making.
Unfortunately, this is only the basics. The entire system is at risk of letting him down: schools across the western world are failing boys because curriculums are so heavily feminised, women are earning more money than men per hour and also living longer. Most university graduates are women, they benefit from better NHS funding and frequently enjoy legal leniency over the same crimes. Still not convinced?
One in six victims of domestic violence are male – but are ignored – and many male victims of female-on-male sexual assault are laughed at.
Society is happy to trash males or see them fail because, in an eagerness to 'get' feminism – even the radicalised, extremist strands – male success is now misconstrued as gender advantage, not hard work or a human right to thrive.
Because of this, boys lagging at life is regarded as progress, which – ironically – undermines everything equity feminism stands for. What a mess.
These tragic facts, combined with the sweeping, irresponsible statements of Esther Walker, are the grassroots to sealing a boy's social fate before he's even born. After all, they're made of slugs, snails and puppy-dogs' tails – right?
I, for one, won't take it lying down. I'm about to launch a legal battle with my gym, the Kentish Town Sports Centre, because it bans all males – including young boys and pensioners – for several hours every week to make it a 'safe' area.
The fact that women are not in danger for the rest of the time is an aside; it's a sexism which reinforces that myth that men are born in a dormant state of 'wrongness' and must be controlled. We're not.
Naturally, I hope I win – not just for the brotherhood, but because it will increase the likelihood of me sharing my opinions with Esther and her husband face-to-face.
No, we don't know each other, but we do live a few streets away from each other in North London. Perhaps, after an impromptu chat on the treadmills, she would exercise her brain as well as her body.
Then, in 25 years time, when their son leaves home with an intelligent, balanced wife, Esther will have every reason to be very, very proud of her son – not least because he was smart enough to choose a woman who's nothing like her.
Now that's a clever boy.
This article originally appeared in Mail Online, and was reposted here with permission from Mr. Lloyd.

Bad girls purged from Good Men Project

The Good Men Project has apparently been quietly purging its archives of items written by A Voice for Men contributor Elly Tams (aka "Quiet Riot Girl") and now it appears that they are also doing so to articles written by AVfM contributing Editor Girl Writes What. We are now pledging to re-publish anything the censors at The Good Men Project have decided to deem WrongThink or that they may otherwise have "accidentally" published when they were trying to be open-minded to challenging Establishment points of view. The below was published, and then purged without explanation or acknowledgement, from The Good Men Project. –DE

How Feminism Hates Women by Girl Writes What Part Two: Unwanted Sex vs. Rape
From Wikipedia:

> Actus reus, sometimes called the external element or the objective element of a crime, is the Latin term for the "guilty act" which, when proved beyond a reasonable doubt in combination with the mens rea, "guilty mind", produces criminal liability in the common law-based criminal law jurisdictions of Canada, Australia, India, Pakistan, New Zealand, England, Ireland and the United States. Mens rea is Latin for "guilty mind". In criminal law, it is viewed as one of the necessary elements of a crime. The standard common law test of criminal liability is usually expressed in the Latin phrase, actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea, which means "the act does not make a person guilty unless the mind be also guilty".

Okay, so let's pretend we're talking about me, and what we're talking about is me crashing my car into another vehicle, killing the driver. The act of crashing my car into his and killing him is the actus reus, and let's say that this fact is not in dispute. Once it has been established that I did indeed crash my car into another and kill the driver, an investigation will be done (I would hope!), and the attendant circumstances examined, and it will only then be determined whether I have committed a crime.
Let's say I undergo a breath test and am found to be legally impaired. In this case, I will be found to have the mens rea of recklessness–I engaged in conduct a law-abiding person would have refrained from, and that conduct resulted in a foreseeable death. I may be charged with a variety of crimes, based on my degree of inebriation and other circumstances–drunk driving causing death, vehicular manslaughter, reckless indifference homicide, etc.
Let's say I live in a jurisdiction where it's still legal to use a cell phone while driving, and I was on the phone when I crashed into him. If it can be determined I was paying more attention to my phone than the road, I will be found to have the mens rea of negligence–that is, a reasonable person would have been able to foresee the danger of my behavior and the harm it might cause. I will probably be charged with manslaughter.

Let's say I drove through an intersection where a stop sign had been stolen or knocked over by vandals. If there was a wrongdoer in this case, it was certainly not me, and I have committed no crime.
Or let's say the other driver ran the stop sign. In this case, I have also done nothing wrong, and have committed no crime.
Or let's say I drove over a nail which blew my tire, and I could not regain control of my car in time to avoid the accident. Again, I have done nothing criminal.
Let's say I saw that the other driver was my ex-husband, and I floored the gas pedal, slamming my car into his before backing up and ramming his vehicle repeatedly until the jaws of life couldn't extricate him from the mangled wreckage. Not that I would ever want to do something like that coughcough, but in that case I would be found to have acted purposefully and wilfully to cause my ex's death. And that, my friends, would be capital murder.
So here we have a bunch of different scenarios, all with the exact same terrible result for the victim, all of which differ in their degree of criminal culpability. Only two of these scenarios would qualify as murder, and in three I have committed no crime at all.
So here we have the crux: any situation in which one person kills another is a homicide, but not all homicides are crimes, and not all criminal homicides are considered murder. Whether a homicide is considered murder or not, depends entirely on mens rea–the "guilty mind".
I have often asserted in my arguments online that just because someone feels they have been wronged or harmed by another, this does NOT necessarily mean a crime was committed against them. And by extension, a man should never be considered to have raped a woman if he did not have the necessary mens rea–that is, if he did not actually realize he was raping her.
I am often told in response that ignorance of the law is no excuse, but ignorance of the law has very little to do with mens rea. In the case of rape, mens rea is not a question of whether someone knows that forcing an unwilling woman to have sex is rape, it is a question of whether someone is aware they are forcing an unwilling woman to have sex. But how could a person not know they are forcing an unwilling woman? How could anyone not realize that a woman who isn't consenting is not consenting?
Well, how about if you're naked in bed, engaging in the preliminaries of sex, for which said woman seems enthusiastic, and at no point during the festivities does the woman ask you to stop?
Early anti-rape campaigns focused on a phrase I could really get behind: "No means no." But things have morphed a little since then, into an attitude of, "Anything but an enthusiastic and oft-repeated 'yes' means no."
I have been cautioned by so many people on feminist boards about how very very important it is for a man to check in frequently with his partner, that many women simply don't have the wherewithal to say "no" if they change their minds, but that this does not mean they are consenting. That women have been known to freeze up and the first sign a man might have that he's raped her is the sound of her quietly sobbing after the fact.

Oddly, I hear very little talk about how very very important it is for a woman to actually have the maturity to say “no” if, indeed, she means “no”, before she climbs naked into a man’s bed, however. She, apparently, has no responsibility toward her partner, to prevent him from inadvertently doing something he’d likely feel terrible about afterward. Considering how differently women are wont to behave during sex, it is unreasonable to expect a man to conclude that loud moaning, say, can be translated as “please stop”, or that a lack of loud moaning can be translated as “please stop”, or that twisting and writhing can be translated as “please stop”, or that a lack of twisting and writhing can be translated as “please stop”, or that a grimace can be translated as “please stop”, or that the lack of a grimace can be translated as “please stop”, etc.

So here we have a woman who has changed her mind, and is counting on her body’s signals and her facial expressions to convey this message to her partner, who may have never engaged her in sexual activity before. Because she lacks the wherewithal to actually tell him to stop, and believes he should just…well, he should just be able to tell. The man is on top of her, arguably holding her down, but in his mind he’s just holding her tightly the way his other partners liked him to do.

That the sex was, indeed unwanted, is a fact not in dispute. The feelings of the woman may include violation, trauma, fear, anger, and a deep sense of having been wronged. These feelings are in no way invalid.

However, for the crime of rape to have occurred requires both actus reus (the act of unwanted sex itself) and mens rea (some form of criminal or guilty mind or intent). For the above scenario to be rape, and a crime, the rapist would have to KNOW that he was subjecting the woman to unwanted sex. And if the first clear sign that she’d changed her mind is her quiet sobbing after the fact, well…this is unfortunate, and a terrible situation (both for the woman, who may well be traumatized, and for the man who unintentionally traumatized her) but it isn’t a crime. It is NOT RAPE.

And this is one major issue I have with data on rape presented in studies like Ms. Magazine’s infamous “1 in 4” survey. Because those studies conflate “unwanted sex” the actus reus that constitutes only half of a crime, with “rape”, something that requires both the actus reus of unwanted sex AND mens rea.

Claiming that 1 in 4 college women are victims of rape or attempted rape based on one-sided accounts that conform to specific sexual scenarios is analogous to publishing a report on how many capital murders occurred in the US in a given year, and including accidental homicides, manslaughters, homicides where the killer was mentally incompetent, self-defence killings, negligent homicides, and second degree murders in your tally.

The Ms. study did give mens rea a “nod”, if you will, by asking respondents who’d been subjected to unwanted sex to contextualize what they believed had happened to them. A full 49% of respondents characterized what had happened as “miscommunication”. This would make the unwanted sex in those cases an unfortunate, but not criminal, act. In those respondents’ opinions, the perpetrators did not have the required mens rea to have committed rape, because they were unaware that the respondents were unwilling. And perhaps, being there at the time, the respondents were more in a position to assess the behavior and motivations of their “attackers” than the surveyors were.

However, the author of the study disregarded these interpretations and applied the term “rape” or “attempted rape” to every incident of unwanted sex where some degree of force was used, such as holding a woman down. And this might be reasonable, if not for the typical mechanics of sex, which often involve, well…a man holding someone whilst simultaneously being on top of them.
Ahh, you might say, but in the Ms. study, about half of the findings of rape and attempted rape involved alcohol or drugs, “administered” to the woman before sex. Here again, I have some issues. Because in the dating and hook-up scenes on campuses, there’s a lot of booze consumed by women, often gleefully provided by young men hoping to grease the wheels of sex. I have some serious doubts as to whether these young men are holding women down and pouring liquor down their unwilling throats. I also have a hard time seeing scores of sober young men pressuring women to drink in the hopes that they will become incoherent and sloppy enough as to be unaware of her surroundings and unable to resist, much less participate in the anticipated sex.
So we have college parties where everyone–male or female–is drinking like mad, all looking to shed their inhibitions, have a great time and maybe hook up with someone. And while providing a woman with enough free beer to drop a rhino may be self-serving on the part of the young men involved and in no way entitles them to sex, I can’t help but think that if these women are somehow unaware that alcohol consumption lowers inhibitions (even sexual ones gasp!), and that consuming enormous quantities may lead them to consent to things they would never do while sober, they probably do not belong in college in the first place.
So let’s explore the role of alcohol in the crime of rape. Let’s be true to the criminal code and say one’s own willful intoxication is no defence, and let’s be totally wacky and hold both genders to an equal standard of accountability.
Young man pours young woman several beers. Young man is unabashed in his motive to get said woman buzzed enough that her judgment will be impaired and he may get lucky as a result. Said woman drinks those beers looking to get wasted, because getting wasted doesn’t just feel good–it frees her up to do things that she wouldn’t while sober, but that she kinda sorta wants to do sometimes and might just do if not for those pesky inhibitions.
So let’s say she’s drunk but coherent, and he is equally drunk but coherent, and both of them willingly engage in sex. In the morning, she rolls over and realizes she just fucked Ron Jeremy’s less suave cousin, and she can hardly even remember how it happened. She’s lying there, thinking, “OMG, he got me drunk on purpose so he could take advantage of me–that’s RAPE!”
Well, yes it is. Sort of. If one can wrap one’s head around the idea that pouring a woman a few beers is the precipitating act proving an intent to commit rape, rather than a generous application of socio-sexual lubricant. I mean, it’s not like he slipped her a date-rape drug. He gave her alcohol, which she willingly drank. If his intention when pouring her those beers was to get her so wasted that her level of intoxication would “seal the deal” and guarantee sex, whether she wanted it or not, then yeah. Rape. But if his intention was to grease the wheels in the hope that she might climb onto his lap and engage in consensual sex with him, has he really done anything wrong? Because at that point, we would have to conclude that any man who buys a woman he desires a few drinks has the intent to rape, don't we? Again, it's all about mens rea–the guilty mind. However, even if we conclude that any consensual sex while falling-down drunk is rape, we must consider the corollary of drunk driving. Charging a sober man with rape because a woman consented to have sex with him while she was drunk would be analogous to holding the sober driver at fault in a collision with a drunk driver.

And if they're both drunk? Though a legal argument may be made that she was too drunk to be capable of consent, well, so was he, wasn't he? And though a legal argument may be made that a criminal's willful intoxication is no defence for having committed a crime…if we are to keep to our completely nutty theme of holding both parties to the same standard of accountability, both parties would be rapists under the law, and both would be accessories to the other's perpetration of rape.

This much should be clear. If intoxication vitiates consent but does not eliminate criminal culpability, then even enthusiastic, consensual drunk sex is a crime–one which two people participated in. If one's own willful intoxication is no defence…well, if she said "yes" while drunk, she participated in the commission of a crime, and is an accessory. Hell, one could argue that her consuming enough alcohol to become so drunk that her inhibitions would be lowered was an act of intent to become an accessory to rape.

Regardless of who feels more harmed by the situation, when both parties are drunk, both parties are equally culpable. Charging a traumatized woman with rape and accessory to rape would be no more unjust than charging a man with the same, even if both had the required mens rea to commit the crime of having sex while too intoxicated to consent.

And this is where the alcohol/drug rape definition departs from reality. Because if we are to criminalize drunk sex, both parties should be charged even if both are pleased with the outcome the next morning, since consent must occur contemporaneously with the sexual acts performed–neither advance consent nor consent after-the-fact are in any way defensible legal concepts. And if one cannot legally consent to sex while drunk, then one cannot legally consent to sex while drunk.

And if the woman was drunk and consented, and the man was NOT drunk? Her drunken "yes" still technically makes her an accessory to a criminal act. By consenting to sex while drunk, she was engaging and participating in criminal activity, and her own willful intoxication is no defence.

A crime is a crime is a crime, even if no one was harmed by it, right? And the only way to avoid criminalizing the act of ANYONE saying "yes" while drunk is to hold both genders to the same standard of accountability for their decisions while drunk.

That is, to maintain the definition of rape as the conscious, intentional and willful forcing of sex on a clearly non-consenting person.

And if that is the only rational definition of rape that can possibly be enforced without applying differing standards of legal culpability and differing standards of conduct on people solely based on what reproductive parts they have, then when it comes to rape as a crime, it is ALL ABOUT mens rea. In which case, incidents of unwanted sex based on a woman's consumption of alcohol/drugs or specific scenarios that do not take into account the intent of the "attacker", cannot be described as rape.

Just like a car accident can't be called murder solely because someone died, not every incident of unwanted sex can be characterized as rape.
Yet we do this constantly. When it comes to rape and rape alone, the legal requirement of mens rea as one half of the definition of a crime is utterly ignored, by feminists, by "experts" and, increasingly, by the law–but only when it comes to women and victimhood. And why? To protect women from their own decisions, from their lack of honesty and maturity, and from the consequences of their own irresponsible behavior.
In other words, reduce them to the level of children under the law, incapable of behaving responsibly or standing by their own choices and actions–whether it is a choice to fuck while drunk or the decision to engage in sexual activity while emotionally incapable of uttering the word "no".

How on earth can this not be seen as misogynistic?

Tiananmen Tom Matlack

December 28, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[quote]He's a walking contradiction, partly truth, partly fiction, taking every wrong direction on his lonely way back home. ~ Kris Kristofferson[/quote]

Poor Tom Matlack. He just isn't getting any love these days.
The embattled founder of the Good Men Project remains on the defensive, and appears to be willing to take a stand against all comers. Tom is having his Tiananmen Moment, standing alone in front of a tank with a handful of groceries from the mini-mart.
I like that in a man. But of course I like it a lot better when it looks like courage instead of stupidity; when the stand means something and when the tank is not the very same one you were driving six months ago.
But that is where Tom is; staring down a monster he created; hoisted with his own petard. If he can stop staring at that tank for a moment, and looks down, he will see two feet, both of them riddled with bullets from his own gun.
I am not saying Tom is not a good businessman. He has a record of success in areas where his opinion on sexual politics and his own bizarre personality were not products he was trying to peddle.
I suppose you can put any manner of drivel on a website (which Tom has done) and with a little luck recoup your half mil of seed money. Maybe even make a buck. Hey, look at Jezebel.com.
Look at the entire mainstream, for that matter.
However, during his time at GMP, Matlack has managed the seemingly impossible. He has, largely by dumping money and copious amounts of feminist bullshit into it, produced a high traffic website – purported to be a positive one about the lives of men – founded on approval from man-hating ideologues and the virulently anti-male content they produce.
Then, because Tom does not understand feminists any more than he does his own manhood, he manages to not just run off most of his mainstream feminist writers, but has them so angry that they are waging war on him and his website even as we speak. All across the grrl-o-sphere, Tom has recently been shat upon by the feminists that used to write for his website.
And now he is publicly staring them down, like he has grande cajones.
All this while still managing to have his name become synonymous with a joke (at best) in the men's movement, the only place there is that is actually having a really substantive discussion about men.
His response to all this is to rely even more on the cartoonish version of manhood he has propped himself up with at GMP all along.
At least that is what is on the surface. That's the best dog and pony show that Matlack could cook up for readers, because the real story of what is happening is just too much of a hit to Matlack's 1950's machismo.
What we are really witnessing here is Matlack extending a hand to his feminist masters and offering another dance, assuring them that he has taken lessons and won't step on their feet again.

In the articles excoriating Matlack, written by mainstream feminists, the message, the demand, is clear. Quit allowing MRAs to have a voice. Don't print their articles. Don't allow their comments. Shut them the fuck up and get back to being what GMP started out to be, a feminist dominated, woman centered men's website.
And if you are paying attention to what is happening, you can already see that Tom's stand in front of that tank is actually on his knees.
I wrote a few articles for GMP when they made the foolish choice to actually talk about men's issues for a while. They had some really catchy titles, but they have all since been renamed to "404 Error – Page not Found."
Yeah, that is catchy, too, I guess, but a little redundant. Still, they appear to like it, as they have similarly renamed articles by Girl Writes What and Dr. Elly Tams.
Oh yeah, Tom, you sure know how to make a stand. Inspiring, brah.
In his latest effort to appear tough while minding well, Tom makes one very interesting proclamation.
He tells us that when he started GMP, "Men's Rights didn't have anything to do with the MRA."
Um, Tom, first, that should be MRM. MRA = Men's Rights Activist, as in a single person. MRM = Men's Rights Movement, as in the collective actions and progress of MRAs.
Now that we have corrected his terminology, let's take a look at the near unspeakable arrogance and ignorance of a statement concluding that men's rights activists, those whose mission in life is to take action on issues of men's rights, have nothing to do with, uh, men's rights.
Yeah, I forgot, at GMP men's rights are only handled by women's advocates.
Of course, this is bullshit. You know it and I know it, and I am pretty sure that even Tom Matlack knows it, even though he had never heard of the MRA, uh, MRM, before in his life.
Here is what I am thinking at this point. Tom is a businessman, and typically a pretty good one. He also feels pretty strongly about being the Dudley Doright of modern manhood, in part driven by his failures to meet Dudley type standards.
Tom woke up one day and thought, "Hoowee! I could make that another bidness! Mo manhood is mo betta money!"
Also telling from his article is something he has alluded to in the past, namely that he, "…started the Good Men Project with the simple premise that [he] had a story to tell about [his] own failures (and successes) as a father, husband, worker and man."
That says a lot about Tom's real motivation.
And he did good for a while. He got all the feminist endorsements, from places like Ms. Magazine. He got the most popular man-hating writers and set about creating a psychodrama of his own perceived failures as a man, projecting them on the world of men at large, which the feminists were only too happy to help him do.
Mo money!
But Tom has a fatal flaw in that he earnestly believes that somewhere underneath our tendency to act out our entitlement grievance by wiping out schoolrooms full of children, beating and raping women whenever possible, destroying the planet, changing the climate, making wars and blending kittens, there is still a Dudley Doright longing to get out. He knows for sure that there is a Tom Matlack trapped in the worthless bodies of all men.

And that is the fundamental problem.

Feminists know damn well that Dudley does not exist. And it will keep coming back to bite Tom on his saddle worn ass because he is all but entirely unconscious of what is happening.

He got into all this never having even heard of the MRM, and is still so far behind the learning curve that he doesn't know MRM from MRA.

It will be entertaining to watch in the coming days. As GMP wipes out all traces of MRA expression on the site, particularly the voices of women who support men's rights, Tom will attempt to negotiate a deal with his masters to give him a small corner of his own website in which he is allowed to express his own manly opinion.

A quisling's agreement if I ever saw one. With enough quiet groveling behind the scenes and storefront actions to further alienate men's advocates, he may get a pat on the head and ceasefire, if not a full truce.

But it will not last on either side.

Tom is impulsive and will eventually say something stupid about men being good. The ideologues pulling his strings (and holding his balls) will not be able to help themselves, either. They will sense the mathematically possible threat of balance to the discussion and go ballistic again.

It will go back to gridlock and tension, all because the truth is that Tom Matlack created a feminist entity to correct his own broken sense of manhood. He is just too stubborn to allow them to do it, and too weak to send them packing.

Knee jerks and angry white men

December 28, 2012 | by Walter Romans (TDOM) | Link | Original Link

Although I occasionally make exceptions, I tend to shy away from writing about tragedies like the one in Newtown. One notable exception was the massacre in Seal Beach in 2011. I wrote about that because I live in southern California near where it occurred. I was hoping to eventually collect enough evidence to discuss the mentality of Scott De Kraai (the shooter) and present a hypothesis to explain his actions and perhaps some of the others like him who commit spree killings.

Alas, the press quickly dropped the story and Scott De Kraai has been all but forgotten. I never did find anything new after the first couple of weeks had passed. So when the massacre at Newtown happened, I followed it a bit, but have otherwise remained rather silent (I did post a couple of comments on other blogs). It is now time to speak up.

Unlike the De Kraai case, where very little was reported that could help a person understand what might have driven Scott De Kraai to murder, there is a bit more to explain why Adam Lanza murdered his mother and a bunch of school children and their teachers. But one still has to dig deep. What passes for investigative reporting these days is to simply parrot whatever tripe the police spew out during their press conferences. So a person can read a dozen different articles about the killings and they will all look alike. I've read nearly three times that amount in my attempt to understand. So what is known about Adam?

Press reports indicate that Adam did not complete high school, but did obtain a GED. He apparently enrolled in college, but dropped out. He didn't have a job. His mother owned several guns, including the ones he used to commit the killings. One source reports that he liked violent video games. He apparently suffered from Asperger's syndrome, a type of autism that can be associated with angry outbursts. He may have suffered from another mental disorder as well. He may have wanted to join the Marines, but was prevented from doing so by his mother because she believed he couldn't handle it. His mother was said to have been concerned about his deteriorating mental health. He is also said to have been very introverted, socially awkward, and repressed which are other characteristics of Asperger's.

Adam's family was very upper middle class. His father is a corporate executive who supported Adam and his mother even after the divorce. She got the family home and he provided income sufficient to allow her to never have to work. His father remained involved with Adam until he remarried and Adam severed ties with his dad over the remarriage. He hadn't seen his father in two years. His mother frequented one or more local bars a couple nights a week. She was generous and bought drinks for other patrons and typically had more than one herself. She was a survivalist, stocking away supplies for Armageddon, including several guns. She taught Adam to shoot and it was her guns that Adam used to commit his crimes. He had an older brother who lived in Manhattan, but they had little contact.

After perusing nearly three dozen articles, the preceding two paragraphs appear to be the extent of the reliable information concerning Adam Lanza. But this has not stopped the parade of so-called gender experts like Hugo Schwyzer and Michael Kimmel, and other writers such as Jamie Peck, Christy Wampole, and politicians, from speculating on the reasons. Of course the speculation is consistent with whatever agenda the speculator wants to push and there is little to no evidence to support any of it. Most of this speculation is filled with racism, sexism, and other hateful bigotry.

One of the most hateful statements was made by Michael Kimmel, a professor at SUNY Stony Brook. Professor Kimmel seems to think that it is the "norm" for men to commit such heinous crimes. In writing about this type of shooting he states:

> In a sense, they weren't deviants, but over-conformists to norms of masculinity that prescribe violence as a solution. Like real men, they didn't just get mad, they got even. Until we transform that definition of manhood, this terrible equation of masculinity and violence will continue to produce such horrific sums.

Wampole and Peck agree, blaming a loss of white, male privilege for the violence. Schwyzer points to a gun advertisement that equates gun ownership to manhood then, like Kimmel, blames a culture of violent masculinity for the violence. Schwyzer was advocating gun control. Peck was spewing racist tripe, blaming whitey, while Wampole was simply being sexist in her bigotry. The former Governor of Arkansas, Mike Huckabee made perhaps the stupidest (but least bigoted) statement about the incident: "we have systematically removed God from our schools, should we be so surprised that schools would become a place of carnage?"

Kimmel begins his analysis by discounting the existing evidence in order to introduce his agenda:

> We still know nothing about his motives, only the devastating carnage he wrought. And yet we've already heard from experts who talk about mental illness, Asperger's syndrome, depression, and autism. The chorus of gun boosters has defensively chimed in about how gun control would not have prevented this… All the while, we continue to miss other crucial variables — even though they are staring right back at us when we look at that photograph. Adam Lanza was a middle class white guy.

That's right, according to Kimmel, the Asperger's, the mental illness, and other factors concerning Adam's life don't matter. All that matters is that he was a "middle class white guy." How much more racist, sexist, and bigoted can you get? To support his argument, Kimmel points to a statement contained in a report from the National Academy of Sciences "Male criminal participation in serious crimes at any age greatly exceeds that of females, regardless of source of data, crime type, level of involvement, or measure of participation" which is likely true when considering violence outside the context of intimate relationships (women commit as much IPV as men and more child abuse). He also mentions statements from the 400 men he interviewed for his book, and then blames fathers, the media, and male culture for teaching boys to become violent.

Of course the only truth in Kimmel's assessment is that Adam Lanza was a middle class white guy. But pointing that out isn't helpful. There are millions of middle class white guys living in America who don't and won't ever commit that kind of violence. I'm willing to bet that none of the 400 men interviewed by Kimmel for his book had or would give serious consideration to committing mass murder. What made Adam Lanza violent are the unique features of Adam Lanza, not the features he has in common with millions of non-violent people. What turned Adam Lanza into a violent spree killer were the very features Kimmel dismisses.
Schwyzer blames "fragile masculinity" and the "frustrated entitlement" of "privileged, white American men" who "imagine that they are entitled to foist their pain onto others." He states that "In killing others before dying on his own terms, Lanza, like so many rampage killers before him, lived out a perverse male fantasy of total control." Unlike Kimmel, Schwyzer provides absolutely zero evidence to support his outrageously misandric statements.
Wampole begins by reeling off the names of other spree killers, then notes they are all male, states that many women suffer the same conditions as these men, adds that women "rarely turn a weapon on others," and is left wondering about the men. Then she proceeds to blame such violence on the decline of young men and easy access to guns. She tosses in a heavy dose of racism. She asks:

> Can you imagine being in the shoes of the one who feels his power slipping away? Who can find nothing stable to believe in? Who feels himself becoming unnecessary? That powerlessness and fear ties a dark knot in his stomach. As this knot thickens, a centripetal hatred moves inward toward the self as a centrifugal hatred is cast outward at others: his parents, his girlfriend, his boss, his classmates, society, life.

Wampole's solution is to become more empathetic as a society to the anger of the angry white man who is losing his privilege. Like Kimmel, she dismisses the actual evidence in the case and prefers to blame a culture and demonize an entire demographic, even if she advocates sympathizing with those demons. Why a prestigious publication like the New York Times would publish the opinion of a French professor (even if she is from Princeton) who is admittedly relying on anecdotal evidence to support her opinion instead of social science is anyone's guess. Perhaps the Michael Kimmels and Hugo Schwyzers were all too busy publishing in lesser publications and no self-respecting sociology professor was willing to espouse the hateful, sexist, racist bigotry required of the position.
While Wampole's lunacy was not apparent to the editors at the New York Times, it was apparent to a writer named Jamie Peck at The Gloss. Unfortunately, Peck either misses or (more likely) ignored her lack of credentials, possibly because Peck lacks any credentials. But as with Wampole, credentials aren't seen as necessary. Peck's most recent articles include such serious matters as the top 10 Photoshop disasters of 2012, reasons no one wants to date Victoria Beckham, the nice guys of okCupid, how to make a Christmas salad, Kim Kardashian's and Britney Spears' bangs, and why it's fun to be a Jew on Christmas. So what motivated Peck to speak out on a more serious matter? From his article, one can only imagine that it is Jamie Peck's heartfelt desire to spew anti-white, anti-male, sexist, racist bigotry. Jamie Peck does not disagree with Wampole's desire to blame white, male privilege for the violence at Sandy Hook Elementary School, what Jamie Peck disagrees with is her assertion that white men deserve any sort of empathy whatsoever. Peck asserts that white men only succeeded "at the expense of women, minorities, queer people, trans people, and anyone else who was not white, male, straight, cisgendered, and able bodied." Peck believes that white males are now and have always been evil oppressors. Peck further asserts

> But while the angry black man was angry about things like, I don't know, the way white people kidnapped a million of his ancestors from Africa and enslaved them, then freed them but made them live in an environment of widespread racism, poverty and oppression, the angry white man is angry about whatever marginal gains people who are not him have made in the past 50 years or so.

Black anger is justifiable. White anger (if it exists) isn't. Period. Jamie Peck should probably stick to writing about meaningless drivel like celebrities, dating, and fashion. What Schwyzer and the others all seem to have missed is that Adam Lanza apparently did not own any guns. The guns were owned by Adam's mother. Adam's mother piqued his interest. Adam's mother taught him how to use them. Adam's mother kept them in a place where her allegedly autistic son could have access to them. The guns were not in the house because of some sense of male entitlement, fragile masculinity, or white male privilege. They were there and they were accessible to Adam because a woman bought them. A woman enjoyed them, and because a woman left them where her mentally ill son could get to them. Kimmel, Schwyzer, Peck, and Wampole have each conveniently ignored this fact. They have also ignored that there has yet to be any indication that Adam Lanza's shooting spree had anything to do with his being white, middle class, or male.

So what should an analysis of Adam Lanza look like. It's hard to say given what little we actually know. We do know that spree killers tend to be white, male, and middle class. But this actually tells us very little. People from other ethnic groups and cultures also commit heinous, violent crimes. We know that this type of crime is typically planned out in advance. Shooting sprees are not usually spontaneous events, according to former FBI profiler, William Tafoya (now a professor at New Haven University). Such sprees are typically the result of well-planned missions and may be the result of "resentment." The shooters "tend to be reclusive, highly intelligent and inflexible, and they don't accept criticism very well." Tafoya adds that "[Lanza's] actions demonstrate an individual incapable of shame, guilt or remorse." I might disagree with this last statement. Comparing Tafoya's analysis to what is known about Lanza and you get a pretty good match. Lanza is described as quite, introverted, and socially awkward. One former classmate stated that Adam appeared to be afraid of people. These characteristics are frequently associated with those who are bullied and picked on. To further support this hypothesis, there is some indication that Lanza's mother took him out of school because she thought the school was an inappropriate social setting. Add in the oddities typical of those with Asperger's and Adam Lanza begins to appear as a likely target of school bullies. This may have led to the possible resentment mentioned by Tafoya.

The Asperger's syndrome may have played another part. It is associated with frustration and angry outbursts. Asperger's sufferers rarely pose a significant threat to others, but violent outbursts are not unusual. Combine this explosive temper with another mental illness and one explosive outburst could have triggered those deep seeded resentments and resulted in Adam carrying out a well-developed fantasy of revenge. This, of course, is speculation. But there is a basis for it in his mental history.

There is also a report that his mother had taken him to see a psychiatrist days before the shooting and may have been planning on having him committed. A neighbor stated that Adam was upset by this and believed that his mother cared more for the school children than she did for him. If this were the case, it would provide clear motive for Adam's anger. It would also blow the angry white male loss of male privilege theories of Kimmel, Schwyzer, Wampole, and Peck right out of the water. It would explain the anger towards his mother that led him to shoot her multiple times as well as the jealous rage that brought him to the school where she sometimes taught. Instead of a loss of white male privilege, it would have been feelings of rejection and abandonment by his mother, the only person left in his life.

The timing of his spree is also interesting. His mother has been described as a survivalist who stockpiled provisions (including guns) in preparation for Armageddon. Is it a coincidence that Adam's shooting spree occurred just one week prior to the end of the Mayan calendar? Could Adam have been influenced by this? I've seen nothing to suggest it. But it's an interesting question. One that I haven't seen asked.

So what led Adam Lanza to go on a shooting spree? We may never know. but it almost certainly had nothing to do with white, male privilege, some sort of toxic masculinity, or any of the tripe spewed from the mouths of feminists and other racist, sexist bigots like Kimmel, Schwyzer, Wampole, and Peck who have political and ideological axes to grind and who find some sort of perverse enjoyment in demonizing men and masculinity. It is far more likely that the cause can be explained by examining Adam Lanza as an individual.

By law, Swedish men are 2nd class citizens

December 28, 2012 | by Lucian Vâlsan | Link | Original Link

On December 20, on AVfM Radio Program, a caller said that men and women are treated more equally in Europe and mentioned Sweden and Switzerland as the prominent examples.
Although I am sure that it was not the caller's intention to spread disinformation, at least as far as Sweden is concerned, I beg to differ on that statement big time.
As a Swedish speaker and a connoisseur of the misandric matriarchal society of the gender utopia called Sweden, I took the liberty to look through the Swedish laws and translate some of them in order to make the readers get an idea of how it is to be a man in Sweden.
The rule of law implies that every citizen is subject to the law, in contrast to the idea that the ruler is above the law, like by divine grace or right (like in Denmark, Spain, etc.). So, in theory, it should not matter whether you are a king (well, it does because the king of Sweden has immunity), man, woman, peasant, CEO, etc. because, at the end of the day, if you break the law you are still being held accountable.
In Romania, we have and old proverb that appeared right after the World War II ended and Stalinist regime was teaching us the Marxist-Leninist perspective:

> Yeah, yeah, yeah, we've heard and know the theory. But practice is killing us!

And indeed, that is the case in Sweden. Sure, the official propaganda of the Swedish government will keep telling you that Sweden is the most equal country in the world. And the press, which is also state controlled subsidized or state enforced censorship, will keep enforcing this lie.
But in reality, men are discriminated against in Sweden since the laws are written. They are not even pretending otherwise.
Let's analyze some of the Swedish laws.
Social services act (Socialtjänstlag)[1] reads as follows:

> Chapter 5
> 11 § The social services duties include working for the victims of crime and see that their family receive support and help.
> Social services shall give special consideration to women who are, or have been victims of violence or other abuse by people close to them and may be in need of support and help change their situation.

So, what this means is that male victims of domestic violence and abuse are a priori deemed as being unworthy of protection, help and support, regardless of whether they might indeed be in dire need of assistance. Remember: This is the law in Sweden!

Let's move on to Registration act (folkbokföringslagen)[2]:

> 2 § A child born alive in this country is registred if the mother is registered, or if the father is registered and legal guardian. A child born abroad by a woman shall also be registered in the population register. Act (1997:989).

Before any comments, please read this passage from Parental act (Föräldrabalken)[3]:

> Chapter 1. Fatherhood and motherhood for children
> 1 § If at childbirth the mother is married to a man, he shall be regarded as the child's father, unless other facts applies from § 2. The same applies if the mother is a widow and the child is born within such time after the death of the child to have been conceived before. Act (2009:254).*
>
> If the husband Approves in writing another man's acknowledgment of paternity, with the provisions of § 4, shall thus be concluded that the husband is not the child's father. Confirmation, however in this case must always be approved in writing by the mother. Act (1990:1526).
> 4 § Acknowledgement of paternity shall be in writing and shall be witnessed by two people. The confirmation shall be approved in writing by the family court and by the mother or a specially appointed guardian for the child. If the child is of age, or is it under Chapter 6. § 2 is not in anyone's custody, the confirmation shall instead be authorized by the child itself.*

So, what this means is that a woman automatically becomes a mother and a custodian for the child or children resulted from birth, whilst a man becomes a father and a custodian only if the mother approves it.
Basically, from a judicial point of view, in Sweden, children literally belong to women and the state.
The same goes with citizenship. The law says the followings:

> Acquisition of Swedish citizenship at birth
> 1 § A child acquires Swedish citizenship at birth, if > 1st – The mother is a Swedish citizen,
> 2nd – father is a Swedish citizen and the child is born in Sweden,
> 3rd – father is a Swedish citizen and married to the child's mother,
> 4th – father is deceased but at his death was a Swedish citizen and the child is born in Sweden, or > 5th – father is deceased but at his death was a Swedish citizen and married to the child's mother.

This means that if a woman gives birth abroad, the child is automatically Swedish. But if a Swedish man has a child abroad, he has to be married with the child's mother and his marriage be recognized by the Swedish state in order for the child to enjoy the rights of being a Swedish citizen.
This is basically state enforced matrilineal lineage. Not even the State of Israel has a law like this (or at least didn't have).
Things get worse when we read Brottsbalk[4], which is the Swedish Criminal Code:

> Chapter 4
> 4 a § A person who commits a crime under 3, 4 or 6. against a relative or former associated person shall be convicted, if each of the acts form part of a repeated violation of the person's integrity and is suited to severely damage the person's self-esteem, for gross violation of integrity to imprisonment for at least six months up to six years.
> If the acts described in the first paragraph are committed by a man against a woman with whom he is, or has been, married or with whom he resides, or has resided with in a marriage-like relationship, shall be supplementary sentenced for gross violations of women's peace for the same act.

And yes, the Swedes have a 'women's peace' law. Do they have an equivalent 'men's peace' law? Or a broadened 'people's peace' law? Of course they don't, because women are the only people worthy of rights and protection in Sweden.
Corollary of this article of the Criminal Code and the fact that you, as a man, cannot and will not be a father unless the woman approves it – you can basically be sent to prison up to 6 years for the simple fact that you wanted to have a phone conversation with your own child. This, in judicial terms, means 'gross violation of women's peace'. That is Sweden!
Now let's take a look on another two laws regarding body searches: Act on shipping protection (Lagen om sjöfartsskydd)[5] says:

> 14 § Body searches that are of a more extensive scope is to be performed in a separate space. Such inspection shall be made in the presence of witnesses, if the person to be examined so requests and it can be done without major disturbance. Body search of the woman must be performed and witnessed only by another woman, if the investigation is not done through the metal detector or similar device. Body searches which are limited to the object that a woman carries with her may be conducted and witnessed by a man.
> Act concerning the treatment of detainees and arrestees, etc.[6]
> 2 b § Body searches or body examination may not be more detailed than the purpose of the action requires. All the respect as circumstances permit shall be observed. If possible, a witness shall be present. A detained must be kept separate from other detainees, if it is necessary to execute a decision on physical > examination.

> Body searches or body examination of a woman can not be performed or witnessed by anyone other than a woman, a doctor or a registered nurse. The following actions may be executed and witnessed by a man, namely,
> 1 body search referred to in § 2, third paragraph, and
> 2 body search that occurs with metal detector or similar technical device.

In other words, men can be subjected to humiliating strip searches by women whilst the other way around is illegal.
Got that?
The laws are exactly the same for the illegal aliens and those suspected to have committed a criminal offense. Let's see them too:
Criminal procedure act (Rättegångsbalk)[7] says:

>
> 13 § Body searches or body examination of a woman can not be performed or witnessed by anyone other than a woman, a doctor or registered nurse. Body searches which only means that the object that a woman has with her investigation and physical examination alone means that blood, breath or saliva sample for DNA analysis may be executed and witnessed by a man.
>
> Aliens Act (Utlänningslagen)[8]:
> 2 § A woman may not searched by or in the presence of men other than physicians or registered nurses. If a search involves only an object that a woman has with her investigation, must visitation be conducted and witnessed by a man.

Then things get better when we read Förundersökningskunggörelse[9] which is the law that sets the terms for those that have to come and testify in court. The law reads as follows:

> 7 § When questioning witnesses a citizen witness support person should be engaged by the Act (1981:324) on citizens witness support, if such is available.
> When questioning a woman, a female interrogation witness must be > hired, if the detainee requests it and it can conveniently be done

In other words, when a woman has to testify in court, regardless if she's a criminal testifying to lower her sentence or get away with it, she has the legal right to conduct gender discrimination in employment in order to accommodate her emotional needs on taxpayers' money.
The anti-male bias is also present in the laws that establish state handouts. The law on income based pension reads[10]:

> 13 § If no notification under the first paragraph is made, the amount shall be credited to the parent whom, for the year that the amount relates, have the lowest pension base under Chapter 4. § 2. If none of the parents have any pension base for that year or have the same base, the amount shall be credited the mother or if the parents are of the same sex, the elder of them.

The state pension system in Sweden is rather complicated but basically, a person contributes to his or her parents' pension based on a complicated formula. This paragraph from the law says that if one's parents did not work in their lives and have a small or no pension, the mother shall get all the money, regardless of what the mother did for the person in question. Basically, if my mother raped me when I was 10 and I grew up with my father who protected me, when I start working, my mother will get part of what I earn. That is Sweden! The same goes on "Lag om allmänna barnbidrag"[11] which is the law that regulates child allowances:

> 4 § A parent who has sole custody of a child has the right to collect general child support for the child. In cases of joint custody, the following applies. The right to collect child support allowance generally belongs to the parent who is registered as beneficiary. Notification shall be made to the Social Insurance by the parents jointly. If no such notification is made, the mother has the right to receive the amount

What this means is that the father never has the right to get the state child allowance as long as the mother refuses to sign it over to him. This also applies in the cases when the father is the full time parent and the single custodian.
In other words, this money belongs by law to the women that gave birth to children.
Of course, by 'Lag om omskärelse av pojkar'[12], circumcision on males is legal because by law, in Sweden, everyone has the right to their own body except boys under the age of 18.
Of course, the same Swedish state, has 'Förbud mot kvinnlig könnstympning'[13], which is the law that prohibits female genital mutilation.
The family law in Sweden (Föräldrabalken) still holds a provision that is actually illegal to hold within the EU:

> Chapter 6
> 3 § The child is from birth in the custody of both parents, if they are married to each other, and in other cases of mother alone. if the parents later marry each other, the child from that time will be in in the care of both of them, unless the Court has previously entrusted custody to one or two specially appointed custodians.

Germany has been condemned by the EU court of human rights for having the exact same law a few years ago and the German Parliament was forced to change it. However, nobody bothered to criticize Sweden for the same problem.
This is not the first, nor the last time, when Sweden is in gross violation of EU's discrimination act and nobody says anything.
Therefore, in the most 'equal' country in the world, Swedish men and fathers are, by law, second class citizens and parents and are less worthy of protection when they suffer from domestic violence.
There is no shelter for abused men in Sweden. There are however more than 250 shelters for women which are run by various branches of the mammoth organization called Riksorganisationen för kvinnojourer Och tjejjourer i Sverige (ROKS), an organization that has thoroughly been infiltrated in the Swedish government and all political parties through which they get close to unlimited state funds. More about ROKS, one can read in the English version of a great article and documentary published by the prominent Swedish MRA, Daddys-Sverige[14].
Just like in any other country in Europe, fathers have no say when it comes to abortions or adoptions. But in Sweden, by law, fathers have no say when it comes to being a father. Not to mention that women who give birth get extra money from the state simply for giving birth, regardless of whether they take care of their offspring.
And I could go on like this for another 5000 words.
There are NO laws in Sweden whatsoever that discriminate against women, or any other groups. Only men are considered less worthy in the eye of the Swedish law.
Some other numbers in Sweden:
[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- 80 percent of the homeless people are men;
- Men are two and half times more likely to commit suicide than women in Sweden. (a 25% larger suicide rate than Romania and USA and 50% larger than India)[15];
- There are roughly 5100 men in Swedish prisons and almost 300 women – which is the most disproportionate inmates number by gender in Europe and an obvious proof of leniency propensity on the behalf of the prosecutors and judges when it comes to female criminals;
- 400,000 children (four hundred thousand in a 9.5 million overall population) hardly ever or never get to see their father.

[/unordered_list]
Despite this cruel reality, the Swedish press never stops complaining about how bad women have it in Sweden. Every single Swedish language newspaper and TV news gives more than half of the space to complaining about how bad it is to be a woman in Sweden. So here it is. Welcome to the most equal (feminist) country in the world.

Reaching out to India

December 29, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

We are aware that there are many significant abuses of men happening in India, and that there is an emerging and rather robust movement there trying to address problems. One of the most egregious of those problems is misuse of section 498a of the Indian Penal Code, which has led to the imprisonment of innocent men, their families and friends, based on false accusations from wives of the accused.

AVfM has done several pieces on the problems with misandry in that country, from women's and police brutality against men for attempting to board "woman only" train cars. We covered one story in which a man was actually thrown off a train car while it was moving, resulting in serious injuries.

We have even seen a story in the Indian press about a politician offering a bounty for women to publicly beat and humiliate husbands who they allege have abused them, or if they think he drinks too much, with escalating payments. More of a beating, more physical damage, means more money.

While we cover a lot about events in harshly misandric countries like Sweden and Australia, it may be that India is the most virulently anti-male country on the planet. It makes sense in a way. The more a culture embraces special treatment of women, the more draconian they invariably become against men.

Unfortunately, there is a naturally occurring gulf between the cultures of the east and west. We still contend with an information barrier that we do not face between western nations. Simply resigning ourselves to that is not an option.

AVfM has been fortunate to have men like Robert O' Hara, Greg Canning and Lucian Vâlsan, news correspondents for the U.S., Australia and Europe respectively. They have helped us shrink our world and build lasting bridges between different cultures, all facing the same problems with misandry.

In that spirit I would like to extend a hand of friendship and a request to the men and women of India who are watching the legal system there attack men and erode Indian families. Please step forward and help us tell the world.

I think it will benefit us all if we have a correspondent from your nation that could bring us reports and updates on events there that we all share concerns about. We here in the west need to pay attention to what is happening in India, and raise as much awareness as possible.

If you would like to help with this, please contact me at paul@avoiceformen.com, and let's get started.

Thank you.

“Misandric Fixation” not found in DSM-V

December 29, 2012 | by Robert St. Estephe | Link | Original Link

---

As the new, and fabulously controversial, drug-dealers’ billing guidebook, namely the DSM (Diagnostic Statistical Manual) version 5 (or “V”), barrels forward toward publication, many observers are speculating about which of the new spectral “diagnoses” of “mental illnesses” – such as Intermittent Explosive Disorder. Oppositional Defiant Disorder. Mathematics Disorder, Sluggish Cognitive Tempo, and Sibling Rivalry Disorder – are to be canonized by the American Psychiatric Association, publisher of the DSM. One can be confident, however, that the designation “misandric fixation” will not be gracing its doctrinal pages.

Q: What is Misandric Fixation?

A: An obsession with eradicating maleness.

Contrary to what we might nowadays suppose to be the case, misandric fixation is not necessarily the result of subjection to ideological indoctrination. Historical cases reveal that the condition can take hold without the subject having been influenced by either Marxist or eugenics ideologies. Indoctrination can, obviously, exacerbate certain vulnerabilities in the subject – weaknesses of character which were pre-existent; yet indoctrination is not a necessary prerequisite to the misandric fixation condition.

By far the most well-known example of misandric fixation is that of Valerie Solanas, author of the 1967 feminist classic, S.C.U.M. (Society for Cutting Up Men) Manifesto. In 2011 public awareness of progressive feminist calls for the achieving of an anti-male utopia (to be manifested itself in violence against children and adults) was revived by the appearance of a Solonas-inspired organization in Sweden and by the disclosure of writings characterized by misandric fixation at a website called RadfemHub, founded by best-selling writer Pamela O’Shaughnessy.

Yet cases of obsession with eradicating maleness have been documented for well over a century, including formal organizations devoted to anti-male ideology. Misandric fixation manifests itself in a variety of forms, sometimes private, sometimes organized, sometimes violent, sometimes exclusionary, and sometimes even pan-species.

Following are but three, loosely related, historical examples of psychopathic women who were champions of anti-male predatory behavior. Two of these femmes fatales, Sarah Hyslop, a matrimonial terrorist, and Josephine Tzany, an avowed man-killer, were focused on a purported revenge motive that compelled each of these obsessive misandrists to “punish” as many men as possible for some perceived slight they claim to have suffered at the hands of a member of the despised sex, an “oppressor” whom none of the subsequent targeted men had even been aware existed. The third obsessive misandrist, Vera Renczi, seems to be an extreme case of a pathological – and homicidal – proprietary sensibility.

The three stories need little commentary. They speak quite eloquently for themselves, as you will see.

Sarah Hyslop – Newspaper story published in 1939:

In the year 1878 Sarah Hyslop, a nervous beauty of Scottish birth, found herself engaged to be married. The spirited girl could hardly sleep for excitement the night before the wedding was to take place in the little chapel at Leith. On the eventful afternoon she arrived at the church dressed in a bridal gown that was the envy of all the girls. She was happy, everything was working out—and then the sinking feeling came.

The groom had not yet arrived. Minutes ticked slowly by and the organist started playing all his selections over again. Miss Hyslop's "friends" whispered among themselves, and her father began to look like a thundercloud. At last, when the last guests had comforted her as best they could and left her alone, the "bride" stared wide-eyed into the empty street. She knew she was the talk of the town because her beau had jilted her at the altar, but she just couldn't cry.

From that hour, until she died the other day, the disappointed girl never wept, according to those who knew her. She didn't, however, retire from the world to be a sulking spinster. Instead she decided that she would turn the tables on men, and for ten years her trophies were their broken hearts. The jilted girl became a jilt and never missed a chance to hurt others as she had been hurt.

Her scholarly father, an official of heralds and arms, begged her to forget the embarrassing incident. Miss Hyslop turned a deaf ear on him, cashed her dowry, and left the community where she was a laughing-stock.

The cheated bride moved into a town at a considerable distance from Leith, and walked the hills in the evening all alone. She spoke to no one, and did not encourage others to speak with her. The schoolmaster of the town was intrigued by the silent stranger. Her pretty face was like a mask and he wanted to know what thoughts were going on in back of it. He found out, to his disgrace. A chance meeting on the road, and they became friends—and before long they were engaged to be married. The day came, but Miss Hyslop didn't. She had jilted her first man, and revenge was sweet, as she recorded in her diary. The young schoolmaster was forced to leave his post because of the scandal.

Miss Hyslop, meanwhile, had gone on to new conquests. Through Scotland, England and France she left a wake of broken hopes and wagging tongues. In one year alone she effected 11 revenge matches. In every case she vanished when the bridegroom and witnesses had left the church.

In 10 years, 52 males had fallen to the girl who couldn't get over her disgrace. But when she threw over the fifty-third man. something happened. He killed himself. And then, too late. Miss Hyslop realized that she loved him. Her first romance that had been blighted in her home town was a schoolgirl affair—it was the disgrace that she minded, not the loss of the man who left her in the lurch. The last mistake of hers was different. She knew her fiancé cared deeply for her, and she felt herself returning his affection. The habit of years was too much for her, however, and the rankle of her first wedding-day still was present. She stayed away from the first wedding she ever wanted to go to, and cold hatred alternated with despair. To avenge the insult from a man she didn't love, she walked out on a man she did.

The next day she heard the awful news. He had shot himself because of her.
Miss Hyslop moved to Nice, and in that gay resort shut herself away from everybody – even her servants. The fortune left to her when her father died was enough to keep her going for the rest of her days. She stayed locked up for 50 years. In her neighborhood the crabbed old woman was known as the “mad Englishwoman” and the “man-hating tigress.”
She hired only confirmed old maids, who had to vow that they would never marry, to serve her. They never could come into her room when she was there. The servant had to knock at the door when a meal was ready. Then the mistress would scurry into an adjoining room, and not come out until three more laps indicated to her that the servant had gone. Her reason for this curious procedure was not explained even in her diary, which told in detail most of her strange history.
When the servants found her door locked the other day and were unable to get in they called the gendarmes, who broke down the door. Miss Hyslop was sitting in a chair, primped up in a bridal gown, and plainly dead. Around her, covering the bed, tables and chairs, were 52 other bridal costumes.
Every day she had worn a different wedding costume, and pirouetted in from of the mirror as the bride-to-lie of the man for whom that dress had been intended. Every time she had laid plans to disappoint another man, she had bought another trousseau, and kept them all as a tally of her “spiritual husbands.”
But she wanted to die in only one of them, her notebook went on – and so when she know her days were about up, she put on the dress meant for her suicide suitor, and stayed in it until she died.
One other mystery she did not explain in her diary, and that was, where she got her money. Miss Hyslop had come into a small fortune at the death of her father, but not enough for her to live on so many years and leave the sum she did.
Police found that the man-hater had left, a will bequeathing considerable property to her servants, on condition that they do not marry, a condition they all have accepted. It has been suggested that the beau who killed himself willed her everything he owned, but if so, the secret has died with the old crone who collected bridal dresses with a vengeance.

Josephine Tzany – Newspaper story published in 1926:
In one sense the kisses of a vampire are poison for her victims, but in actual fact those of Josephine Tzany, a beautiful woman of the Budapest underworld, were morally and physically poisoned, for after poisoning the soul of the victim they brought death as well.
The woman is known as the world’s worst real life vamp with justice, if only half the charges made against her are true. It is stated that for some years now her love affairs have been notorious, and always ended with violent death for the male victims.
At least a dozen lovers have died in her arms in as many years, but she has always come out of the death pact ordeals unharmed.

It is now suggested against her by the prosecution that she has deliberately brought her victims to the point of mad passion for her in which they readily assented to her suggestion of a death pact, out of which she backed after her victim had taken poison. It is declared that in at least one instance she passed the poison from her own lips to the mouth of her victim in the act of passionately kissing him.
~ “I Am Dying.” ~
The drama was enacted in public In one of the restaurants of the city. She entered the building with her latest lover, a well-known military officer, whom she had taken from his young wife. When she had talked to him for some time she .rose to her feet with a cry and swayed as though about to faint.
Her companion rushed to her aid.
“Kiss me, darling, I am dying,” she said in tragic tones. When the lover made to obey she flung her arms about him and kissed him passionately. Locked in a passionate embrace, the two fell on the floor, and when the startled onlookers went to them the woman was sobbing hysterically and the man was dead. He had absorbed the poison the woman had carried on her lips.
The woman herself suffered no ill effects on this or any of the other occasions when she was supposed to have taken poison or administered it in this way to victims.
The accused woman defies the authorities to bring home to her the charge of murder
“I am an enemy of the male sex,” she declares. “Years ago a man wronged me deeply and broke my girl’s heart. I vowed to be revenged on him and his sex. I have kept my word, for I have made men suffer something of what I have suffered. They may say I am responsible for the death of these men, and they may even take my life for what they call my crime. If they do I shall be glad to die with the knowledge that I have paid my debt in full.
“I do not deny that I have derived pleasure from the sufferings of the men they call my victims. I have enjoyed every pang they suffered, every agony they endured. Pangs and agony have been balm to my wounded and bruised heart. My one regret is that I was not able to strike directly at the man who wronged me.”
~ A Home-Breaker. ~
Something of the hatred Josephine Tzany had for men she manifested towards her own sex, for in every case she chose as her lovers men who were happily married to young and beautiful wives.
“When my heart was breaking they had no sympathy, no word of comfort for me,” she declares. I will show them that I have the power to master the souls and bodies of men, that the strongest are weaker than children in my hands.”
“I glory in the fact that I have broken up homes that should have been happy. The fact that the man who blighted my life was married happily did not weigh with him. The wife from whom he came laughed at me when my misery was greatest. I have paid her back in full, and have made others suffer, too. My debt against Society is paid, and I have no further interest in the world.”
~ Gloating Words. ~

She might have added that she had struck at the wife of the man who had wronged her a greater blow than he had dealt, greatly as she may have been wronged. Learning that this wife had a lover she made it her business to find the man out, and once she had him in the toils she did not release her bold until the infatuated man had provided the first victim In the series of strange deaths that have been associated with her love affairs. After that she waited patiently until the idolised son of the wife had reached the threshold of manhood, when she cast her spell over him, and the boy figured in yet another of the dramas of passion and death. When he lay dead in her arms she caused the mother to be admitted to see the havoc she had wrought, and when she came the vampire spoke gloating words that stung. The mother was subsequently taken away hopelessly insane.
The accused woman discusses frankly the different affairs with which she has been associated. She has preserved diaries in which she records with amazing details the facts of each case, describing the sufferings of the victims as each in turn lay writhing in her arms in his death throes.
"I had no compunction about it at all," she says, " for was I not merely viewing the death throes of the viper that had stung me and killed my soul just when it was at its best?"
Since the facts came out she has been the object of one of the most amazing demonstrations of hostility that any woman could be subjected to. Wives and children of some of the victims have turned up at the courts and in public places to denounce her as murderess and home-wrecker, but so far from being moved by their anger, she has laughed at them and taunted them with the fact that she made the man they mourned her abject slave before he passed out of the world.
The latest sensation is that the daughter of one of her victims has challenged the woman to a duel with pistols or swords, and declares that if the challenge is not accepted and the vampire escapes legal punishment she will shoot her dead on sight.

Vera Renczi – Newspaper story published in 1925:
Roumania Servia and in fact the entire Balkans are excited over the preliminary hearings of the greatest female bluebeard of modern times. Madame Renici [Vera Renczi in other sources], a Roumanian, aged 30, described as "beautiful as a picture," charged with killing her two husbands, her ten-year-old son and thirty-two lovers.
The preliminary hearing, which have begun at Berkerkul, Servia, reveals that the prosecution alleges, she killed her 35 victims with arsenic and other poisons in their food. The bodies it is stated, she preserved by hermetically sealing them in zinc cans which she stored in her cellar. Each big can has the name and age of the victim and the length of time he was her lover. The average period which each remained favorite of the beautiful Roumanian was from six to seven months during which they lived in the greatest harmony and happiness, until the loved one would suddenly disappear.
The victims were all between the ages of 23 and 30, except the boy. Fourteen of them were Roumanians.

It is stated that the woman confesses to all 35 murders and in her replies to questions reveals an appalling cynicism.
Asked why she killed so many innocent persons, she replied:
"Out of jealousy, for I know that tomorrow they would run after another woman. So I said to myself they had better sleep quietly in my cellar without having to excite themselves."
She said she killed her son because he knew about the contents of the cellar and she was in constant danger of discovery.

So we see, there three Vampire Monologues, reveal that long before taxpayers were to have their pockets picked to finance propaganda campaigns promoting "third wave" promiscuity and self-centered "empowerment," there were women who had made great progress in developing strategies to resist the oppression of the patriarchal hegemony. Hyslop, Tzany and Renczi were each innovators in their own private "Good Men Projects;" each knew that the definition of a "good man" is a manipulated man and a controlled man. These sociopathic ladies were the equal of any male sociopath of their day.
The cure for this not-at-all-new Misandric Fixation disorder, which now has reached epidemic proportions, is to be found – in the opinion of this writer – not in any of the pills marketed by the orthodox sources that collaborate with the editors of the DSM but rather in the sort of pill, available free of charge to one and all, that is offered by AVfM: the best known cure for misandry in all its manifold guises: the fabled Red Pill.

Author Disclaimer: I must confess that I myself have been diagnosed with the dreaded TCFBBSITDDD ("telling control-freak busybody scum ideologues to drop dead disorder"). There is only one cure for this terrifying social malady: ceaseless and aggressive fighting against tyranny, until a decisive victory against collectivist social engineering has been achieved.

Is chemical castration misandric?

December 29, 2012 | by Lucian Vâlsan | Link | Original Link

On July 1, 2012, a law that allowed forcible chemical castration on child molesters came into effect in Moldova[1].
On Christmas Eve, the Moldavian Court of Justice from Chișinău sentenced a 50 year old man to chemical castration after the court found him guilty of raping his partner's daughter of eight years old[2]. The sentence is not definitive and the defendant has the right to a final appeal on the Supreme Court of the Republic of Moldova. Moreover, as long as the sentence is not definitive, it cannot be applied.
But it's not just Moldova. Estonia[3], South Korea[4] and Poland[5] have recently passed legislations to allow the state to force convicted pedophiles to go through chemical castration procedures. There are also at least 9 states from the USA who have similar legislation. There are also a lot of countries that encourage chemical castration in exchange for reduced sentences like Russia[6], Israel and Argentina.
But what one can rarely, or arguably never, read in any news report with regards to chemical castration laws is the fact that the legal term 'chemical castration of pedophiles' means, in fact, 'chemical castration of male pedophiles'.
In the spring of 2011, a deputy from the Liberal-Democratic Party from Romania wanted to propose the Polish law to be enacted in Romania too. The law did not pass because right at that time, the public discourse was marked by a dreadful case of a mother who had been raping her then 6 year old son for at least two years (probably more). Due to this fact, a lot of people actually asked: 'Do this law apply to her too?' And when the doctors answered 'No' the camp supporting the bill lost its credibility in an instant.
At least for the moment.
But besides the fact that this law applies only to male offenders, which literally places a double standard in the law through which lawyers can argue that when a woman rapes a child it is not 'that bad,' there is also the same question that anti-death penalty activists pose: What if we're wrong?
With all the forensic technology and other modern means that can be used in the investigation, it is still quite possible to mutilate the wrong man. And yes, chemical castration is, at the end of the day, a form of mutilation because the hormones and the formula that's being used are pretty much the same that have been used on Alan Turing[7].
Although hundreds of peer-reviewed articles[8] have been written in the last decade, more and more countries attempt and succeed to pass legislation that allows the state to mutilate men. Moreover, the manipulated masses are pressuring some governments to extend the provisions of this law to rapists. And considering how many innocent men serve jail terms following false rape allegations, there is no doubt that this kind of law would increase the already too large cost of a false rape allegation when the defendant is male.
In addition to that, therapists that work with offenders often contend that the predators drive is to achieve control over the victim and that sex is only one of the means to achieve that. This being said, lowering a predator's sex drive doesn't necessarily correlate with lowering their likelihood to assault, as they can pick another means to achieve control. In other words, even if we were to think in the official blue-pill narrative, this law is useless in reducing the offender's propensity to offend again, while the same time is devastating to those that have been wrongly convicted. It's also quite expensive – around 2,000 euros per year, according to Moldavian specialists[9].

In an ideal, Utopian dream world, where the judicial system never fails and the false allegations do not exist, I might be inclined to agree with such a law to a certain extent and apply it both on male and female serial offenders. However, we don't live in a Utopian dream world and the judicial systems fail all too often. False allegations and convictions in the sex crimes area aren't rare at all.

Not all academics are like that

December 30, 2012 | by Jim Muldoon | Link | Original Link

I noticed some optimism in Paul Elam's recent fundraising article for the year ahead (Elam, 2012). Indeed, I get a feeling that there are some signs of change. I don't see any walls coming down just yet, but I am seeing a few cracks in important places.
What has caught my eye recently is a new international journal called New Male Studies (New Male Studies, 2012). Over this year they have released three issues of papers from academics around the world on what they call the "male experience". Whilst the content is not as spicy, say, as AVfM, (the "fuck" count is pretty low) it nonetheless contains the same basic ingredients. I found myself nodding in agreement with much that was written in the articles; similarly to how I found myself "taking the red pill" when I first came across AVfM.
The importance of this is difficult to exaggerate. For the first time the men's movement can look to authoritative, reliable information in one place on men as a basis for going forward.
It seems to me that much of MRA's energies have been spent in debunking the various myths, damned myths and statistics of feminism. Whilst this is important, and I for one am glad people took the time to do this, it still left us with a few issues.
"Phineas Fembotcrusher" of "the manosphere" may have had reliable and accurate statistical methods proving that Dr. X.Y. Realname, a tenured Professor of Anactual University, was full of shit. But, quoting "Blueface" as your primary source doesn't quite have that ring of gravitas.
Also, proving feminists wrong doesn't, by itself, make anyone right.
However, real academics doing real studies of real issues is a different proposition altogether.
As an introduction, let me give you an insight into an article by Dr John Ashfield called "Towards an Integrated Perspective on Gender, Masculinity, and Manhood" (Ashfield, 2012).
The opening sentence to the article pulls no punches:

> For decades our understanding of gender, masculinity, and manhood has arguably been bedevilled by uninformative pseudo-academic gender ideology.

With this, Ashfield begins an appeal for a fresh look at gender. What he is calling for is an "explanatory and useful" perspective that is grounded in "the reality of men's and women's lived experience."
He goes on to explain that the current academic climate is due for a change. "[T]his fundamentalism is being increasingly eclipsed by compelling evidence from a whole range of academic disciplines, including biology, anthropology, neuroscience, endocrinology, psychiatry, psychology, and others. "
Ashfield points out the obvious fact that inherent differences does not justify discrimination. What it does is provide some insight into, for example, the roles that men and women choose for themselves in society. What he hopes is that studying men with a new perspective might provide for "endeavours of human service and social enhancement that are equitable and grounded in reality."

According to Ashfield, there are a number of topics to be considered in this new perspective on men.

Masculinity is presently seen as a social construct that, because the Patriarchal version is so deficient, should be modified or even eliminated by politically correct social engineering. This view is "detached from biological reality" as it requires "intellectual compromises" such as treating all men as identical in all cases and circumstance.

Ashfield would define masculinity as the blend of masculine potentials that stem from innate male traits that, shaped by culture and circumstance, are expressed in manhood. Manhood, he goes on to define, is the fulfilment of some of these masculine potentials in the adult male as he takes his place within his culture. There is no one manhood, but different expressions of these potentials within different cultures and even sub-cultures.

Ashfield notes that men do not achieve manhood simply by becoming older, but more by taking a meaningful place within society. This manhood is also never fully achieved, because it can always be taken away. Therefore the bestowing and removal of manhood affects men's behaviours and attitudes. AVfM regulars will be aware of shaming tactics and the power they have over men.

A practical example of the benefits of Male Studies is in the area of Men's Health. Ashfield believes understanding manhood is the key to understanding men's attitudes to health and well being. Only when we understand these can we encourage men to better health without the "blaming, shaming, or the patronising statements commonly exhibited in [current] health literature."

All of these topics are clearly worthy of proper, rigorous study.

Male Studies is seen by Dr Ashfield and collegues as being a separate from the Men's Studies that feminists have set up at many universities (Glover, 2012). The difference is distinct and deliberate.

Glover noted at a conference to discuss the curricula for a Male Studies degree course that it was felt by the participants that Men's Studies advocates "resort to purely social constructivist views of gender…often at the expense of honesty. These views have leaked into popular culture helping to contribute to a climate of misandry."

Ashfield himself believes that Male Studies should not allow itself to get bogged in debate with feminist ideologues. Instead they should forge independently ahead in the search for practical answers rooted firmly in reality.

The University of South Australia, with the Australian Institute of Male Health and Studies and the support of a group of American, Canadian, and European academics, are proposing to have a degree and postgraduate courses in Male Studies in 2014.

In his conclusions, Ashfield cites a conversation with a first year social sciences student at university. The student was feeling bullied by the feminist agenda to shame the male students for simply being male. This was what Ashfield explained to the young man:

> Academe in the West, has, in certain of its disciplines, betrayed a sacred trust. It has acquiesced to a bullying pseudo-intellectual, self-appointed gender commentariat.

That, to my mind, is all red pill.
It's beginning to look a lot like Christmas….

New Year's wishes from AVfM

December 31, 2012 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

I have some New Year's Wishes to express, but first some very sincere thanks to offer for who I think are some very remarkable people.
Most of these people, in one way or another, are associated with AVfM. All of them are assets to the men's movement. You will have to bear with the long list. But, hey, it is not my fault so many great people have joined our ranks. My only real concern is that I do not leave anyone out.
My deepest gratitude goes to the following people. There is no particular order, save the first person on the list.
To Angry Harry, for inspiring me to believe that the internet could be used to challenge cultural misandry, and for the hours of counsel, guidance and wisdom. And for tolerating the occasional chip on my shoulder.
To John the Other, for never quitting; for never surrendering. For paying the price to do what he believes in. I am one of the few that knows what that price has been.
To Dr. Tara Palmatier, for taking a courageous stand to deliver mental health services to men where they are needed most; for anteing up when it hurt to do so. And for being my friend.
To Dean Esmay, for his tireless work on the Judicial Accountability Committee, and importantly for having his eye on the future of AVfM and playing such a pivotal role in shaping where we are going.
To Alek Novy and team. Let us never forget that this fantastic website, and all the technical work that goes into it, is a gift for men and boys across the globe.
To James Huff, for taking over the production of AVfM radio programming without anyone asking him to do it, and for doing so many other things behind the scenes. James is an important part of this movement.
To Stu, for a ton of support; for constant fresh thinking and for giving me a place to vent and laugh at 3:00 in the morning when I needed it.
To Robert O'Hara, for leading the way on some of the more major news items of our times, including the coverage of Radfem and the circumcision drive in Africa. For putting his feet on the pavement and taking the message directly to places like the CATO Institute.
To KARMA MRA MGTOW, for demonstrating what one man can do, over and over.
To Dr. F, for providing us with compelling graphics and artwork that serve as a valuable tool to get our message across. For administering the AVfM forum with a firm understanding of what our needs are in that venue, for Andy Vanders and Loy Finley and the desperately needed laughs that come with them. And for the entertaining works of fiction that all too infrequently find a home here.
To Roger O Thornhill, for the great graphic artistry and his unending willingness to take on projects at a moment's notice. For following through on all his promises.
To Girl Writes What, for creating hope and thunder.

To TyphonBlue, for giving us a way to articulate the exchange between modern men and women that we did not have before.
To Jade Michael, for the gift of music.
To Steve Berkimer, for quietly ensuring that our materials are distributed across the globe.
To Harry Crouch, for his words of counsel and experience, and for years of unending work on behalf of men and boys.
To Peter Lloyd, for breaking through the lace curtain of the mainstream media as an unapologetic MRA and for unselfishly bringing AVfM with him.
To Dr. Greg Canning, for more things than I can possibly list here.
To Keyster, for challenging me to think with intelligence and respect.
To Eric Duckman, for taking it to the streets. For not backing down. For not even slowing down.
To Dannyboy, for the very same thing. For being what an MRA looks like.
To the Wooly Bumblebee, for not mincing words, and for starting A Voice for Boys.
To Lucian Vâlsan, for pushing his way in and adding a vital component to the international make up of this movement.
To Piece Harlan, for being a personal hero as well as one hell of an advocate for the wrongfully accused.
To Factory, for staying with us, and for having our backs when the pressure comes for us to soften.
To Robert St. Estephe, for giving us our history; for setting the record straight.
To Andyman, founder of MRALondon, for putting the A in activism across the pond.
To Vladek Filler, for having more guts than any man I ever saw.
To Nurdy Dancing, for being a friend to the movement and a badass.
To Suz, an MRA whose work does not get near enough recognition. I would say more, but I will let it wait for her interview with Dean Esmay on the Honey Badger Files.
To Aimee McGee, another friend across the pond who writes for us from time to time, but who also takes her ideas into real world settings with other MRAs at MRALondon.
To someone I cannot name, who has ensured our economic survival over and over again.
To Erin Pizzey, for a lifetime of courage and dedication.
To B.R. Merrick, TDOM, Andybob, Codebuster and the far too many to name absolutely brilliant and gifted writers who have graced these pages with their work and their forward thinking.
To my partner, Stacey, who has stood behind me and behind AVfM from Day 1, even in the early days when she did not fully understand.
To all the men and women who are out there doing this work.
And finally, with a great deal of fear that I may have left anyone out, to you, the readers and supporters of AVfM and the MRM. You are the community that creates a home for the men and boys we serve; you are the reason we are making it happen.
I wish you and yours the very best in 2013 and beyond.

The misandry choir

December 31, 2012 | by andybob | Link | Original Link

The Sydney Morning Herald has just published a photo gallery of its 20 Most Influential Female Voices of 2012.

It is always astonishing that the media attempts to present such shameless agenda-pushing as straight-up reportage. The reader is meant to assume that the chosen ones were selected by the sheer power of their worthiness. The ugly truth, of course, is that a journalist, probably a shameless bigot like Clementine Ford, liked the cut of their jib. Not something to brag about.

All of these 'influential female voices' belong to shrill feminists. This sends a clear and unambiguous message to the young women of Australia: the only way for them to achieve any influence in society is to embrace feminist dogma and give relentless voice to it. No alternative routes to power and influence are offered or explored. Even the token nods to diversity were selected to reinforce this message. Regardless of their religion (Susan Carland, Muslim), race (Penny Wong, Chinese-Australian) or ability (Stella Young, disabled), women had better belong to the sisterhood.

Not surprisingly, Prime Minister Julia Gillard tops the list. What made her so influential in 2012? "Throughout a difficult and turbulent year she has taught many of us an important lesson in how to stand up to sexism." In other words, she has demonstrated to countless Australian women that making spurious accusations of misogyny to divert attention away from their workplace incompetence pays off handsomely. "For many of the thousands of women who nominated her she is an inspiration."

What a sterling contribution.

Some of the exhibits in the gallery have been previously loaned to AVFM, where they received considerably less admiration. Germaine Greer, incorrigible, septuagenarian ratbag surprised many by wandering onto the list. Dr. Greer enraged feminists by criticizing Julia Gillard's bottom. The fat-acceptance community shares a massive overlap with the feminist demographic – and they are slow to forgive.

Germaine Greer plays the doddery old crank, but she knows what she's doing. Her comment garnered lots of publicity, just in time for her slew of speaking engagements. She took great delight in demonstrating that, because she was a woman, she could get away with her impropriety. A man would have been all but crucified for doing what she did. After all, as the "patron saint of modern feminism", she need only make some kind of yahoo comment urging women to be more "difficult" to have them love her again.

Then there's Clementine Ford. The Sydney Morning Herald had this to say:

> Between her fiercely witty social media presence and prolific posts on Daily Life, Ford has become the go-to feminist for a new generation, unafraid to channel all of her eloquent rage into ground-breaking articles that shape the zeitgeist. Before the dictionary broadened the > definition, before the Prime Minister made her speech, Ford articulated with flashing brilliance exactly what it meant to be a misogynist, and in doing so, changed the national conversation.

Fiercely witty? Eloquent rage? Flashing brilliance? Clementine Ford? This lazy, flat-footed bigot is a disgrace to journalism. In case anyone has trouble recalling why she is so widely vilified within the men's movement, here is her notorious review of Dr. David Benatar's book, The Second Sexism:

This is typical Clementine Ford. There is no wit, no brilliance – just bitter, vengeful rage. The joy she takes in sneering at male pain is nauseating. The fact that such a creature has been selected as an 'influential female voice' leaves no doubt about the nature of the agenda being pushed here. It is a radical feminist agenda saturated in unapologetic misandry.

Three of the twenty women are regularly heard discussing violence against women. Elizabeth Broderick, Australia's Sex Discrimination Commissioner, contributed to the 1 in 4 hysteria by cooking her very own book. In 2012, her department published a 650-page report revealing that the ratio of women who have experienced sexual harassment in the Australian Defense Forces within the past five years is (drumroll please) 1 in 4 (gosh, that was unexpected). "The report calls for a dedicated unit to deal with sexual misconduct." More jobs for Gender Studies graduates – another sterling contribution.

ABC Four Corners journalist, Sarah Ferguson, is described as an uncompromising, brave and smart woman of integrity. She received this accolade for tackling "important issues for women" such as domestic violence and forced marriages for girls as young as 17. While this is admirable, up to a point, one is left wondering if Ms. Ferguson can summon enough bravery in 2013 to start tackling important issues for men such as domestic violence and forced male genital mutilation. If she does demonstrate that kind of integrity, we can safely assume that she will not be making next year's list.

At first glance, Muslim convert, Susan Carland seems like a reasonable woman focused on dispelling myths about Islam in order to build much needed bridges within our community. She actually appears to be someone with whom you could have a pleasant chat.

Then you read that she teaches gender studies, politics, and sociology at Monash University in Melbourne, and her aura of harmless do-goodery instantly vanishes. Ms. Carland may or may not have been directly involved in the frenzied vandalism of AVfM posters pointing out that women are just as likely to initiate domestic violence as men, but she would have been very close to it. After all, the department in which she works was at the center of the dispute.

Where was her influential voice of reason then?

Four of the 'influential female voices' have been particularly vocal about issues concerning women in the workplace. Penny Wong's greatest achievements for 2012 is described as "her vocal campaigning to get more women into board rooms." As we have entered an era in which quotas for such things have already been discussed in earnest (Norway's 40%), this is a very troubling development.

One woman on this list is particularly dangerous: Nareen Young.
She is the CEO of the Diversity Council of Australia, formerly known as the Council for Equal Opportunity in Employment Ltd which was established in 1985 to "demonstrate the business community's commitment to equal opportunity for women." It now passes itself off as an independent, not-for-profit workplace diversity advisor to business in Australia. However, since her appointment in 2007, Nareen Young has ensured that the DCA remains stridently focused on women.
Young is an increasingly ubiquitous presence in the public discourse on Australian women in the workplace. She is everywhere, spouting her dissatisfaction that businesses just aren't catering to the wants and whims of women. Ms. Young summarizes her platform as:

- Women are still undervalued in the workplace;
- Workforce participation for key diversity groups could be much higher (e.g. people with a disability and Indigenous Australians);
- Discrimination and harassment at work are alive and well; and
- Work-life balance is still hard to achieve.

She is given to making jaw-droppingly inane pronouncements, especially when it comes to work/life balance:

> Surely our organisations are sophisticated enough to move beyond assessing a person's contribution at work on how much time they spend in the office, to what outcomes they achieve, regardless of where or how they work.

So, Ms. Young concludes that women shouldn't have to spend their precious time at work if they don't feel like it.
[image]
Nareen Young – CEO of The Diversity Council of Australia

Here is another quote citing the kind of unsubstantiated statistics beloved of feminist ideologues.

> Domestic and family violence is conservatively estimated to directly cost employers over $484 million per annum. The cost of violence against women and their children to the Australian economy is estimated to be likely to cost the economy $15.6 billion by 2021-22.

I estimate that this is likely to be something she just made up.
All of this would be laughable were it not for the fact that Nareen Young has recently begun to support quotas for women in boardrooms.
As the CEO of a powerful entity whose website makes frequent threatening references to benchmarks and compliance, this is a portent of things to come. Fellow 'influential voice', Elizabeth Broderick is certainly on board.
When the Sex Discrimination Minister notes that there will be a turning point in "voices calling for quotas", we can safely assume who these voices will belong to.
The Sydney Morning Herald's gallery of Australia's most influential female voices indicate that feminists are responding to opposition by being louder and less compromising than ever before. It is no less than any of us expected. 2013 is going to be a rocky year.
Happy New Year everyone.

From Erin Pizzey, AVfM Editor-at-Large

[dropcap]I[/dropcap] did an interview with Dean Esmay recently and while we were working together and I spent time looking at the web site A Voice for Men. As I read, I became more and more convinced that I had found my place. After talking at length with Paul Elam, I agreed that I will be able to write and to join in with the many contributors and readers as an advisor and editor on this site. AVfM is an inclusive site and after all the hate filled rhetoric I have endured for so many years I feel as if I am coming home.

It is now two thousand and thirteen. Forty-two years ago I opened the first shelter/refuge in the world in a tiny, derelict house in the streets of Chiswick, West London. In those years I had a vision about a woman's movement that would work for all women in harmony with men.

There were serious issues that needed changing in my experience. I could not get a mortgage as a woman without my husband or other male figures co-signing. When I wished to get married I needed to get proof for my doctor of my intentions before he could give me contraception.

Abortions were illegal and women were driven into the hands of illegal abortionists or other, even more desperate measures. Most of the women I knew in my area and some men called themselves "equity feminists" but I was disillusioned very early on when I attended the "collectives," as their conferences were called.

What I saw devastated my dream.

Those of us on the floor were told that we were to be formed into groups and to choose our names and then to meet in our houses every week. We were to call ourselves "sisters" or "comrades." I was instantly suspicious because I was born in China and my parents were supporters and friends with Chiang Kai-shek. This was at a time when Mao began his long march across China.

[image]Later on in 1949 my father, who was in the Consular Services, was posted back to Tien Sien (now called Tianjin) and both my parents were captured by the communists and put under house arrest. I was in boarding school with my twin sister for the three years they were captured. We heard very little news and for a time we thought they were dead.

When my mother was allowed out with my brother she told us all about the atrocities, the starvation killing millions of people across China that were taking place. In those big collectives we heard the Maoist women giving mind blowing accounts of liberation for women under this happy regime and then the counter arguments about the joys of Russian communism.

Pretty early on I realized that this movement had nothing to do with men and women working together for equality, but all to do with a schism between the left wing men and women. The women decided to move the goal posts from capitalism as the enemy and institute "patriarchy" – men – as the enemy to all women and children. The schism spread and became a gulf between all men and women.

That is when the women who were on the platform and were leading this movement (though they claimed this new movement was leaderless), identified their chief enemy was the structure of the patriarchal family. The new family would now be the mothers and their children. Fathers were now to be disenfranchised. Women, as in Russia and China, would become units of production and their children would be sent to twenty four hour nurseries. The communist doctrine has always been to subvert the women first and then everything else would follow.

This is the history of the so called women's movement. I left and with a small group of women opened a community house that was open to all women and their children and men were welcome by invitation. Very quickly the first women who was bleeding and battered came in to ask for help. Others followed her, but before long we were no longer a community house and our supporters melted away because instead of grateful battered women coming through our doors several of the women were as violent as the men they left and violent to their children.

Very quickly I realized there were two different problems. Women who were innocent victims of their partner's violence certainly needed refuge but with support could very quickly get on with their lives. But the women who were victims of violence from their dysfunctional childhood experiences, and who had become perpetrators of violence, needed long term therapy.

I knew as soon as we began to receive press attention and donations, the feminist movement would move in. Highly organized, but bereft of attention or funding because they were far too radical, they needed a cause that generated funding. The plight of battered women and the feminist stance that all men were oppressors merged to become their mantra: All women were victims of all men's violence.

None of this made any allowance for men or children who were the victims of violence by women, or for female perpetrators that also demanded our attention.

Very quickly they began to set up shelters in America under the banner of that twisted mantra. I was very alarmed and desperate to get anyone to listen to me, which became a source of ridicule. Men laughed at the feminist movement in the early days and when I tried to warn them they said I was paranoid.

Now I believe we are on the cusp of change. Sufficient men and women have realized that this billion dollar industry is a threat, not just to the family that has all but disintegrated, but also to the fabric of our society.

What most people do not recognize is that the actual refuges do not benefit from the money poured into this movement. Most of the money that is completely unaccountable goes into the huge edifice that is publicly touted to concern itself with the role of women.

Agencies across the world, the UN as an example, have been infiltrated with the false new religion and gladly embraced by the women who have managed to create a lucrative women only zone. No men can work in the refuges, no men can sit on any board and no small boys over nine to twelve years old can enter the refuges.

And no men and children who are victimized by domestic violence can get any help.

Click to purchase

The movement to this day remains sealed off to the rest of the world. So many of you who access this web site have probably faced the same hostility to any questioning and have been branded as I have, as “women haters.”

I have been picketed and threatened, others have been threatened with bomb scares, not just because we disagree with the politics of this movement but because we threaten the future of agencies like VAWA that pour millions of dollars into the feminist pockets who can then continue with their promised destruction of our precious democracy.

Democracy is a fragile institution, depending as it does on the will of the people to uphold it. We have been fooled far too long and in writing this manifesto I wish to join you on this web site. I am begging you to become ambassadors for family life and the inclusion of men back into the lives of their families. I say this knowing that if we do not return men to their rightful status as human beings worthy of equal treatment under the law, we will get nowhere.

I ask that we stand together, not divided by gender but united in recognizing that domestic violence is not and never has been a gender issue. Violence in the family is generational and if we ignore the damage done to children marinated in violence we throw away our children’s lives and condemn them to repeat the patterns of their violent parents.

This is the beginning of a New Year. I hope for all of us a recognition that the gloves must come up and action taken. I see our first demand has to be a transparent look at the international funding of this evil empire and thereafter a total dismantling of the big lie.

I am aware that for many the damage has already been done, but all of us have to look to the future and I believe this movement instead of being scattered in small enclaves on the web has to come together so that men and women can speak in one voice. We are a movement of love and inclusion and the future of the family is far too fragile to continue to stand aside and watch it dismantled.

A few more people to thank

January 1, 2013 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

---

Yesterday, Paul wrote a very nice New Years greeting in which he thanked many of the contributors and supporters of AVfM. I can think of a few people I would have added to that list, and I'm sure other readers would each have their own additions. Many people I would have liked to thank will remain anonymous for their own protection. They would be targeted and harassed by corrupt and amoral gender ideologues if they were named. Some might be subject to physical intimidation or violence.

But there is a group of people to be thanked who Paul neglected to mention, and whose ongoing activism in support of this site's mission must be properly acknowledged.

I would like to thank the following individuals for their crucial participation in the ongoing rise and success of the men's rights movement. These individuals are listed in no particular order, but each of them deserves far more than the short thank-you afforded in these few paragraphs.

Thank you to Mary Kellett. It was your dogged, relentless and wholly corrupt pursuit of Mr Vladek Filler which inspired the formation of the Judicial Activism Committee. Now that you've been recommended for suspension by the Overseers of the Bar in Maine, we aren't finished with you or with your boss, Carletta Bassano. The relatively minor impact we had on the prosecutorial establishment in Maine was, for us, a warm up.

Thank you to Arthur Goldwag, and to the corporate and private supporters of Morris Dees' Southern Poverty Law Center. Goldwag first listed AVfM as a hate organization, it led the rest of the world to look closely at us and our message. Previously, a significant fraction of the world had ignored the message of the men's rights movement, and of this site. Mr Goldwag's half-hearted attempt to fund-raise by holding up an unpopular human rights movement as his new boogeyman resulted in the critical and focused attention of a number of significant organizations, including Reason magazine, Forbes, Business Insider and the Nation.

Thank you to Amanda Marcotte, who continues to broadcast her own toxic vision, excluding the possibility that men are human, deserve compassion, human rights or anything except continued vilification, censure and cruelty. While no diagnosis can be made, Marcotte's continued self identification as a feminist, coupled with her highly convincing sociopathy continues to demonstrate exactly the public cruelty and sadism this human rights movement opposes.

Thank you David Futrelle, for whom no lie is too depraved, and whose relevancy hangs entirely on flattering an audience of adult infants, telling them they're victims, and providing a free pass to violent and mentally ill ideologues. Futrelle's ongoing obsession with AVfM continues to be among the most reliable sources of AVfM's growth and site traffic.

Thank you Sasha Wiley Shaw, (creepy bitter girl) whose public antics, fake injury and whose leadership and direction of groups of violent street thugs continue to provide fodder for satire, and an accurate public picture of the totalitarian, brutal, violent and blatant corruption of mainstream feminist ideology. Don't stop Sasha, you're the gift that keeps on giving.

Thank you to Professor Pee-Zed Myers. Your continued doubling down as the public steward of an online cult of mentally disturbed, sociopathic adult toddlers continues to pay dividends to this movement. Your routine but inept swipes at the men's rights movement have brought many in the secular community into beneficial contact with the MRM, and your utter inability to field a coherent, mature or consistent logical defense of gender-supremacist scorched-earth practitioners serves as a clear and ongoing warning to other academics who might otherwise believe in the public claims of feminism. Keep up your tap-dancing professor. Vaudeville is coming back, really soon, I'm sure.

Thank you Danielle Sandhu and Vanja Krajina, two violent and hateful individuals in Toronto whose public excoriation and absurd accusations against attendees of Dr Warren Farrell's U of T talk further demonstrated the truth to the public of just how violent, hateful and totalitarian the gender ideology of feminism is, and how mainstream that hatred and violence is. Good work to Danielle, to Vanja and all their supporters and violent enforcers. Yo.

Thank you to Jezebel.com's Kate-Harding, who likely without meaning to, revealed that mainstream feminists agree with at least a major fraction of the points argued by MRAs, but just cant get past their own hate of MRAs, and their ideological hatred of boys and men to support this movement.

Thank you to the Boston Globe's Barry Nolan, who despite his best efforts to paint the men's rights activists as violent or dangerous, can't help be-clowning himself each time he tries to silence, shame or vilify elements of the MRM.

Thank you to the London Times' Caitlin Moran, who in her efforts to portray a satirical "what if men had no reproductive rights" managed to exactly describe reality, only substituting a gambling debt for the state-enforceable onus to finance a woman's unilateral reproductive choices. But don't worry Caitlin, only humans should have rights over reproduction, and we all know men aren't human.

Thank you Rebecca Kamm of the New Zealand Herald, who in her efforts to oppose male reproductive options, pretends publicly that a male birth control pill is for women, and that men can't be trusted to take it. Ignoring that men taking a pill is for their own control over their fertility and fear mongering to deny men's basic human rights makes fantastic fodder for satire Rebecca. Keep up the hate, lies and bigotry.

Thank you Taslima Nasreen, a fraudulent human rights activist whose sickening but populist public hate is likely to foster more violence, rape and female-targeted acid attacks as her sycophantic radical-feminist enablers congratulate themselves and her for correctly identifying that men are all regressive murder machines. Keep writing Taslima, the world needs to see your ideology clearly to dispense with it, and with you.

Thank you Frida Ghitis, the CNN columnist whose naked hate was published under the entire-sexual-demographic-demeaning title: “Are Men Stupid?” Ghitis’s observation of a male-sexuality hostile world concluded that having or expressing sexuality must be a signal of idiocy, while missing entirely the glaring public zeitgeist demonizing male sexuality and identity. Well done Ghitis, you made the list too.

Thank you to Kyle Bachan who noted in an attack on the men’s movement are reluctant to colaborate with feminist organizations. Thank’s Kyle for omitting the reason for this relucatance, particularly that these organizations persistently attempt to censor, silence, vilify, accuse, threaten, , deny the human rights of men, or who call for the world wide murder of men and boys. Keep punching Kyle.

Thank you Steven Fisher, the Australian male feminist whose white ribbon campaign is the spiritual inheritor of the white feather campaigns used to shame men into dying in the trenches of the first world war. Your toxic and depraved pledge which you coerce, and shame men to deny their own human rights has earned you a special thank you.

Of course, there’s many more who belong on this list, too. And I’d like to have the time to thank all of them, but like everyone else at AVfM, I have a lot else to attend to.

For those mentioned, and for many not mentioned. Our goals are compassion, and also justice, and we will not stop. Those in opposition to the human rights of men and boys likely have reasons. For some, it might be fear of loss of funding, for others ideology might drive your hate and violence. We will not stop, and we will come for you with the cleansing light of public accountability. But don’t stop what you’re doing, don’t even slow down. The thank-you issued to some by name, and to many more whose names weren’t mentioned is not a sarcastic gratitude. We love you. Your conduct, and promotion of hatred and promotion of violence is what drives the need for this movement. Keep it up.

And if you think you deserve personal recognition you didn’t find in this short thank-you note, I apologize. But it’s easily rectified. Just bring yourself to our attention. Demean the rights of boys, or excuse or justify violence, murder or sexual violence when it’s committed by women. Those of you who have advocated for eugenics by sex, or bragged in public about silencing those who work for human rights. Those of you who have heaped scorn on men and boys who have killed themselves. Those who have publicly excused or even praised the rape of children by their teachers. And those who have given a pass to the murders of infants by their mothers. We’ll thank you by name too.

Ultimately, we’ll be coming for every one of you.

Happy New Year.

VAWA dies quietly, for now

January 2, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

VAWA is dead. It suffered the stroke of 2013, when without congressional re-approval, the massive behemoth of legislation that funded the largest feminist bureaucracy and system of corrupt, unconstitutional governance in American history since Jim Crow, it simply expired.

Don't pop the cork on that Veuve Clicquot just yet.

With VAWA Joe Biden being given four more years to promote the subjugation of American men, with a boss that has his back, efforts will quickly be underway to retool the legislation, or rebuild it from scratch, and send it through again, where it will likely find sweeping support.

It is tempting to give the Republicans a tip of the hat on this at least temporary removal from the quick, since it was their work that ultimately blocked the renewal of the legislation.

But rather than tip my hat, I have a question to pose to Republican leadership.

What the fuck is wrong with you people?

Here's the deal, and what really chaps my ass with the Republicans, who have historically supported VAWA, no matter how draconian or unconstitutional, as long as they thought it was legislation supporting the heterosexual white women filing in to the malls (and voting booths) in their SUVs.

When language was entered into proposed reauthorization to include GLBT, illegal aliens and Native Americans, the Social Conservatives managed to muster objections and work to undermine reauthorization.

I can hear the "But, but, buts!" already. Some people will say that this is political strategy; that the Pubs took a viable path to undermine re-passage because they knew they could not do anything as the language of the law didn't force a bunch of Gays, Native Americans and illegal aliens down the throats of entitled, straight white girls.

And they were right. Sadly and shamefully they were right. Just attacking the law on its unconstitutionality, its foundation of propaganda and bad science, its sexist slant and its draconian nature would never have much support from the Republican base because by and large the most people hurt by it directly were men and the non-voting children in their care.

So they appealed to homophobes and white bigots, and temporarily got their way. Stupid.

That is the precise reason that the progress on ridding the world of this very nasty piece of legislation won't last.

It will be rewritten and passed, with Republican support and back slapping.

The one hope we have is that the fiasco the current administration has made of the American economy will in some way water down VAWA in a more crippling way.

And I cannot underestimate the importance of that.

VAWA is the life blood of many man hating, professional ideologues. For many feminist organizations it is their primary or only source of economic viability. A dead or significantly weakened VAWA, is, without question, a significantly weakened feminist governance and influence.

Let us hope that as the new version of VAWA is reintroduced, and surely it will be, that the Republicans are smart enough to go after the money with a chainsaw. If you need to tell your constituents you are doing God's Will by protecting them from Fags, Injuns and Wetbacks, then I suppose you gotta do what you gotta do. I will leave it up to you to wonder about the people you represent.

What I am suggesting, however, is that rationale alone will eventually wind you up with a new version of VAWA that is more pernicious and devious than the original.

You might actually start educating your constituents on what the real problems are with VAWA, especially about the rampant corruption and misuse of VAWA funding by agencies that do not meet any discernible measure of account of how they spend the money.

Remember, even decent God Fearing White Girls don't like corruption and wasted tax dollars.

I know, I am idealistic and rigid. I want VAWA dead, but I want it to choke to death on the truth. That might be akin to winning the lottery and bitching about the taxes, but it is what it is.

I encourage all MRAs, regardless of your political leanings, to make contact with your LOCAL representatives with great frequency when the "new" VAWA begins to rear its ugly head. Complain about the MONEY.

Shall I say that again? COMPLAIN ABOUT THE MONEY!

Ask your lawmakers to explain to you how they can justify such a massive and expensive program, based on ideologically tainted data, with limited to no financial accountability, given the current state of the economy (not that you would support it if we were flush).

Then I suppose we will have to tolerate how those leaders fuck it all up in selling a no vote to their constituents. But if they hear from you about the money, rather than a bunch of xenophobic or homophobic ramblings, you may help teach them how to sell this to the public at large without putting very well deserved targets on their backs.

Here comes U of T junior varsity

January 2, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

It appears that The Varsity, University of Toronto's Student Newspaper, which has been operating for 133 years, has sent a student journalist to asked a lengthy and incisive list of questions about AVfM publishing articles about some of their female students, that would be Emma Kadey, Sophia Guo and Vanja Krajina, and putting them on the registry at register-her.com.

Well, the questions were actually not lengthy or incisive, but we are grading on a curve here. Actually, there were just two questions, and only one of them rated as even relevant in my opinion.

Seeing that it's clear there is a bias in our reporter (ah, even in 2013 it continues) I thought I would share the complete email exchange, including my answers, in advance. When they run their "article" we can compare notes.

Her email:

Name: Taryn McKenzie-Mohr

Email: taryn.mckenzie.mohr@mail.utoronto.ca

Message: To Whom It May Concern,

Happy new year! My name is Taryn and I am currently writing an article for the Varsity newspaper at the University of Toronto regarding Dr. Farrell's Nov. 16th lecture.

I am hoping that you are willing to answer the following questions:

1. Do you have any affiliations with Dr. Farrell?

2. Do you believe that by profiling several of the female students who protested Dr. Farrell's lecture and featuring one of these students on the website register-her.com you have violated their freedom of speech through vilification and intimidation?

If you would like to respond to any of these questions or comment generally I would ask that you contact me by 5:00pm EST on January 4th.

I look forward to hearing from you.

Best,

Taryn

My response:

1. Do you have any affiliations with Dr. Farrell?

No, there is no affiliation between Dr. Farrell and A Voice for Men. I have never even spoken with the man.

2. Do you believe that by profiling several of the female students who protested Dr. Farrell's lecture and featuring one of these students on the website register-her.com you have violated their freedom of speech through vilification and intimidation?

No, listing a criminally acting bigot on register-her.com, profiling their bigotry, does not violate their freedom of speech. It is exercising our freedom of speech. They remain free to destroy private property, espouse hatred and harass young men trying to find solutions to the problems in their lives, though they may think more carefully before doing it, which is a good thing.

Thank you for the reminder. We got behind during the holidays. There are still more bigots from your school to put on the registry, and there may be more, depending on how successful the U of T is at producing more bigots.

Kind regards and Happy New Year!

AVfM Radio: Feminist Porn

January 3, 2013 | by AVfM Radio | Link | Original Link

We've all watched porn. In fact, that claim doesn't need to be stated in the past tense. We all watch porn is also true. Mostly because we're men, and that's what men do – at least according to one or two of the opponents of human rights for men and boys. But women watch porn too, because they've been mind controlled by the patriarchy, or something. Or, possibly because we're all social animals, men and women, and the sight of other members of our species engaging in mating behavior – you know – that which propagates the species – is something we find fundamentally compelling. But in the pseudo modern context of the western world, this is called porn, and radical feminists tell us it's bad, and so are we.

But radical feminists have their own porn. Radical feminist porn depicts an unreal fantasy world too, but not a fantasy world focused on sex. Radical feminist porn isn't about the physical actualization of sex. It's about a different kind of emotional gratification. However unlike sexual pornography, in which both male and female characters portray an unnaturally heightened sexuality, and an artificially exaggerated willingness to get naked and horizontal, in radical feminist porn, male characters demonstrate heightened willingness to kill, and to die for female whim.

And female characters are universally helpless. There's another difference too, when radical feminists watch their pornography, with exaggerated male disposability, hyper violence, and cartoonishly inflated levels of female helplessness and non agency, they don't realize that they're watching porn.

Fortunately, James Huff and Girl Writes What are here to let them know, tonight on AVFM Radio.

Sperm donor forced to pay child support

January 3, 2013 | by Kristina Hansen | Link | Original Link

Sperm donor William Marotta has been forced to pay child support by the Kansas Department for Children and Families to a lesbian couple who found him via a Craigslist ad which the couple had placed asking for a sperm donor.

Angela Bauer, 40, and her partner Jennifer Schreiner, 34, placed the ad on Craigslist three years ago looking for a donor. William Marotta answered the ad and was selected by the couple as their sperm donor.

Marotta provided his sperm to them which the couple used for artificial insemination on Schreiner. Marotta willingly gave up all parental rights including financial duties for the child upon agreeing to be the couple's sperm donor, as he did not wish to be the child's father. He only wanted to help the couple by providing his sperm and nothing more.

When Bauer and Schreiner, the 34-year-old birth mother, reached a deal with Marotta that did not include any payment for his sperm donation, he signed a written agreement that relinquished all parental rights and held him harmless "for any child support payments demanded of him by any other person or entity, public or private … regardless of the circumstances or said demand," it said.

Recently the Kansas Department for Children and Families ordered Marotta to pay support for the three-year-old girl that was born after Bauer and Schreiner requested welfare earlier this year.

The state is said to have forced the women to reveal Mr Marotta's identity after pressuring them to reveal who the biological father of the child was. The state declared the contract relinquishing him of financial responsibility void because the insemination was not performed by a certified doctor.

The couple said they tried to protect Marotta's identity, but Kansas officials told them they would be unable to receive health care for their daughter if they did not reveal the name of the biological father. Feeling pressured and afraid, the couple finally gave Kansas officials Marotta's name as the biological father to their child. The state then argued in court papers that because the insemination wasn't performed by a licensed physician, the contract, in which he signed away his parental rights and financial responsibility towards the child, was null and void.

Bauer and Schreiner, who have now separated since this whole ordeal began in 2010, plan to help Marotta fight the state's decision to force him to pay child support. The couple said they are 'forever grateful' for the child he has given their family.

> This was a wonderful opportunity with a guy with an admirable, giving character who wanted nothing more than to help us have a child.

Ms Bauer, who is from Topeka, Kansas told cjonline.com 'We're kind of at a loss. We are going to support him in whatever action he wants to go forward with.'

This is just one chilling example of how state interference into the private lives of people can have serious damaging consequences. The state basically forced Bauer and Schreiner to divulge information that was assumed to be safe and confidential, by threatening the couple.

But what if the couple did not know the identity of their donor? Would the state have refused medical coverage for their child then? What if they were a heterosexual couple? Would that have made any difference in the state's decision? I tend to think that it would have been a much different situation had the couple not been a lesbian couple.

Now that Mr Marotta has been forced to pay child support by the state, for a child he had given up all parental rights to, and did not want to be a parent to, it sets a scary precedent for other sperm donors who have donated sperm in good faith and assuming that having an agreement in place that relinquishes them of all parental rights and financial responsibility. Unless the woman sees a licenced physician in order to be artificially inseminated, the donor could now be on the hook for child support should the woman fall on hard times and require support from the state.

What this means is that no man is now safe when donating sperm. Many sperm banks will ship sperm directly to private homes where women take it upon themselves to do at-home insemination. And since no licenced physician is used, the sperm donor could be held financially responsible for the child born of his sperm if the woman, at any time, needs to seek state financial assistance.

> Sperm donors who donate through a sperm bank are usually protected by state parenting shield laws. But in less straight-forward cases, such as this one, courts have differed on whether the men should pay up or not.

The child's birth certificate does not include her biological father's name, and Marotta has never had any contact with the child. Yet the state has declared him as a father and forced him to pay for the child regardless of the contract he had entered into upon donating his sperm to the couple.

A Massachusetts court ruled, in 2012, that a Nigerian immigrant had to pay child support for twins who were conceived through artificial insemination a year after he and his wife had separated, the Patriot Ledger reported.

In Vermont, according to NBC News, a man who donated sperm to a female friend was ordered to pay child support because he was said to have maintained a relationship with the children born from his sperm.

And in Washington state, the Court of Appeals ruled in 2004 that a sperm donor cannot be required to pay child support, unless he and the mother have signed an explicit contract. And in Texas, an appeals court ruled in favor of a former policeman who had donated sperm to a woman he had previously known. He had been forced to pay thousands of dollars in child support, for twins born from his sperm, until the court finally ruled in his favor.

When the lawsuit had been originally filed in 2008, Mr Marotta was quoted as saying: “I was totally blown away. I was already married and had moved on with my life.”

If you can’t support us, then get out of our way

January 4, 2013 | by Andy Thomas | Link | Original Link

I have recently be able to resolve a personal dilemma I had been wrestling with for some time. The solution isn’t one I particularly like, but it is necessary nevertheless.

When I took my first faltering steps in the MRM, I initially spent time on various forums where I often found myself appalled by the childish attitudes on display. From the start, I knew in my heart that here was something that I could truly believe in but, at one point, I almost walked away from the whole men’s thing in dismay. I’m glad I didn’t, because it has ultimately proved to be a positive and liberating experience. And I now believe in it more than ever.

However, that there are so many who were emotionally harmed as vulnerable children is not lost on me. There is a sea of lost and damaged men out there. I know; I was one of those and I have the physical scars to prove it.

So my dilemma has always been how to respond to those who represent a “car crash” for us all—those who would selfishly, unintentionally perhaps, derail everything we stand for with their outpouring of misogynistic, self pitying, attention seeking on public forums. Such people are a gift to the feminist media who will triumphantly hold them up as typical examples of men’s rights supporters, especially as we begin to make inroads into the mainstream press.

I have realised, however, that the answer to my own dilemma lay in how the moderators of AVfM’s forum deal with such people. I must confess that, at first, I thought the moderators were being unnecessarily heavy-handed. However, I have come to think differently and I now completely support AVfM’s policy on dealing with would-be trolls.

I only wish there was a better way because I stand for all men and boys. I will also stand for women who have been genuinely subject to injustice and for women who want to be treated as responsible adults rather than spoilt children. But ultimately, what I do I do for the future generations of boys who will one day become men. I put this above all else and, if necessary, I will stand against anyone who represents a threat to this.

I have personally put everything I have into this endeavour—my time and effort, my financial resources, my heart, my soul. I have nothing to gain other than the experience of engaging in life again and my own salvation. So, you see, it is everything and, believe me, I will fight to protect it whatever the cost to myself. I will not see my efforts and the efforts of others splashed to the four winds by selfish and irresponsible behaviour, no matter how damaged some individuals may be.

What we are doing here is more than just some kind of campaign or awareness raising. We are building an alternative culture—a culture fit for the 21st century and a better future for all. And I say that this is something truly worth fighting for. Its organic nature means that it will eventually take on a life of its own and will become difficult for anyone to stop. But until that happens, unless we can effectively deal with those who will hold us back, even if they are suffering human beings, we will forever be condemned to wring our hands while exclaiming, “But what can we do?”

And future generations of boys will be lost.

So with that, I say that if you can’t support us in a constructive and positive fashion, if you can’t put others before your own ego, if you can’t look inside yourself with honesty, if you are not prepared to take responsibility for your own behaviour, if all you can do is to criticise the efforts of others while contributing nothing yourself, then get the fuck out of our way.

We will not stop for you.

Arias plays the VAWA card

January 4, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

The boyfriend of Jodi Arias, Travis Alexander, was brutally murdered in 2008. He was stabbed 27 times, had his throat slashed and was shot in the head. Arias herself was not present during the commission of the crime.

No wait, she was present but it was someone else who killed Alexander, not her.

No, no, wait. She actually did kill Alexander, but she was forced to because she feared for her life. You see, Arias had dropped a camera belonging to Alexander, and he, while in the shower, flew into such a rage that she was forced to stab him 27 times, cut his throat and shoot him in the head with a gun that had been reported stolen by her family a week earlier.

That is the one-two-three of the Arias accounts to the police of her involvement, or lack of it, in the brutal murder. And number three is the story she is sticking to for the trial, which is now in its third day.

Arias is claiming self-defense and is pleading with the jury for a compassionate ruling as a victim of one of the most egregious problems faced by women in western culture — domestic violence.

I would suggest a possible fourth scenario that would explain what happened. Jodi Arias is a violent psychopath who murdered Travis Alexander in one of the most brutal and hideous ways imaginable. When her first two lies were discredited by the police, with pictures of the events, she calculated that her best bet for getting off was to pretend to be a victim of domestic violence who killed in self-defense.

She played the VAWA card.

VAWA, the Violence Against Women Act, authored by Vice President Joe Biden, was predicated on the idea that women, and only women, are the victims of domestic violence and that only men are perpetrators. The Act was based on notoriously biased and often fraudulent data about the incidence, by sex, of Intimate Partner Violence (IPV) and has had the effect of not only monumental government waste, but of grossly distorting the very real problem of family violence in public perception.

With massive amounts of taxpayer funding, VAWA and the gender ideology it monetized, have given people like Arias a shot, or at least the hope of beating accountability for their actions, even the unspeakable violence that ended the life of Travis Alexander.

If you think that is far-fetched, think again.

On March 22, 2006, Mary Winkler placed the barrel of a shotgun to the back of her sleeping husband, a church pastor, and pulled the trigger. She claimed self-defense (after fleeing the scene and demonstrating consciousness of guilt in a variety of other ways), citing that her husband had been abusive to her. Though her claims were never proven, they appeared to influence the jury, which included 10 women. She was convicted only of voluntary manslaughter. She ended up serving 5 months in jail (pre-trial) and the judge permitted her to spend up to 60 days in an undisclosed mental health facility in Tennessee.

After a battle with her victim's family, she was given full custody of her children in 2008.

And she got to appear on Oprah.

Many experts agree that it was the sympathy as an alleged (not proven) victim of domestic violence that garnered Winkler favor with the jury as well as the judge in the case.

So while the vacillating stories/lies offered by Arias, the degree of overkill with which she dispatched Alexander, and the literal mountain of evidence already in front of the jury that this was a vicious, calculated crime, the VAWA card may still have some real effect.

The case also highlights issues of sentencing disparities between men and women in criminal courts, which exceeds the sentencing disparities between Whites and other minorities.

Last night on the Fox News program On the Record with Greta Van Susteren, Attorney Michael Cardoza delivered a sobering appeal to viewers regarding the possible sentencing in this case.

> This is a first degree murder. I think the big question here will be will the jury bring back the death penalty against her. It's been my experience that juries don't like to bring back death penalty verdicts against women. That is where we are not equal in the courtroom, men and women. They'll gladly do it against a man, but not against a woman. Come on guys, it's a first degree murder.

While we should, assuming she is convicted, be very mindful of this case as another example of sentencing bias that favors women, it is more important, I think, to see this case in terms of what it represents about the perception of IPV long fostered by legislation like VAWA.

Republicans managed to stall VAWA into a natural death at the stroke of midnight on New Year's Day. But we are already aware that efforts to resurrect the recently defunct legislation are underway with a high probability of success, especially if the public remains silent.

I will only reiterate my disagreement with Republican strategy so far as to say they are not educating the public on the real nature of IPV in order to cover themselves politically.

But a dead VAWA is a dead VAWA. And a dead VAWA is the only path we have to non-ideological, research based methods of addressing family violence.

I urge you again to contact your representatives and politely insist that they do everything possible to defeat VAWA before it becomes law again. And to thank those that are making efforts to do so.

Sophia Guo placed on offenders registry

[box icon=""]

Sophia Guo is a University of Toronto student and feminist activist who participated in the November 16, 2012 protest against the free speech of Dr. Warren Farrell, an activist for men and boys. Dr. Farrell came to U of T to lecture on the problems of suicide and educational failure of young men.

Guo openly posted on the internet that she had vandalized posters promoting the event, and made several public statements advocating sex based violence toward men and boys. She also, with apparent irony, was captured on video stating that men's rights organizations were "actually hate groups."

Guo's coduct likely stemmed from the climate of violence and censorship toward activists for men and boys so pervasive at the University of Toronto.

The coming military witch hunts

January 5, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

The following was recently reported by the Service Women's Action Network.

On Wednesday night, after much anticipation across the nation, President Obama signed the 2013 National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) into law. In the end, it included 19 amendments to significantly reform Department of Defense sexual assault and sexual harassment policies. This landmark bill has the largest number of sexual violence provisions ever signed into law

Specifically, the law now provides for:

- Prohibiting the military from recruiting anyone convicted of a sex offense
- Mandatory separation of convicted sex offenders
- Insurance coverage for abortions in cases of rape or incest for service women and military family members
- Retention of restricted report documentation for 50 years if so desired by the victim
- The creation of "Special Victims Units" to improve investigation, prosecution and victim support in connection with child abuse, domestic violence and sexual assault cases
- Allowing victims to return to active duty after separation to help prosecute sex offenders
- The creation of an independent review panel comprised of civilian and military members that will closely examine the way that the DOD investigates, prosecutes, and adjudicates sexual assaults
- Required sexual assault prevention training in pre-command and command courses for officers
- Improved data collection and reporting by the military on sexual assault and sexual harassment cases
- Annual command climate assessment surveys to track individual attitudes toward sexual assault and sexual harassment
- A review of unrestricted sexual assault reports and the nature of any subsequent separations of victims who made those reports
- Notification to service members of the options available for the correction of military records due to any retaliatory personnel action after making a report of sexual assault or sexual harassment

- Requirement for DOD to establish a policy for comprehensive sexual harassment prevention and response
- Language that will allow better oversight and tracking of DOD's implementation of sexual assault provisions from prior Defense Authorizations in order to ensure they are being enforced properly

In a normal, sane world, this list might read like a sensible enough policy to deal with problems encountered by service women, as well as service men.

But we are not living in a normal, sane world. We are living in a world where problems involving sexual assault and harassment, or the allegation of the same are politicized, twisted and transformed into draconian measures that will invariably inflict unnecessary harm on innocent people.

We are living in a world where the above list is nothing less than the announcement of an Inquisition Policy in the United States Military.

On behalf of AVfM, I am using this opportunity to appeal to any of our retired/former military readers, preferably of higher ranks, to write an analysis of what they see here, including the implications for military justice, for the pages of AVfM.

If what you see here concerns you, and you served in the United States Military, we invite you to help us bring awareness to the public of what this kind of policy will actually look like on the ground. I can be reached at paul@avoiceformen.com.

Thank you in advance to those who consider helping with this mission, and as always, thank you for your service.

Why we don’t need VAWA

January 5, 2013 | by Walter Romans (TDOM) | Link | Original Link

---

Two weeks ago Melanie Reyes “was arrested for aggravated domestic battery after her boyfriend said she struck him with a baseball bat.” If Melanie Reyes had been a man, she may have still been in jail. If Melanie Reyes had been a man, she may have had a restraining order issued against her. If Melanie Reyes had been a man, she most likely would not have been permitted anywhere near her 6-month old son unsupervised.

If Melanie Reyes had been a man, her 6-month old son might still be alive.

But Melanie Reyes is a woman so the press reports the alleged domestic violence incident as though it may not have happened. But Melanie Reyes is a woman so she was let out of jail (no bail mentioned). But Melanie Reyes is a woman so she was permitted to retain custody of her son. But Melanie Reyes is a woman so she was allowed to take a handgun and shoot her 6-month old son.

Melanie Reyes is a woman and her son is dead. Melanie Reyes is a woman so her son wasn’t protected by the system because VAWA doesn’t protect men and children from violent women.

Melanie Reyes is a woman, her son is dead, and Joe Biden is largely responsible because he and the Democratic Party refuse to recognize that women can and do commit acts of senseless violence and that men are worthy of protection from that violence. Melanie Reyes is a woman, her son is dead, and hopefully so is VAWA.

Gillard’s gendered agenda

January 5, 2013 | by Greg Canning | Link | Original Link

The Labor Government in Australia has been quietly perusing a legislative reform agenda dictated by the anti-male, anti-family, radical feminist principles of Emily’s List Australia (summarized quaintly as equity, childcare, equal pay, diversity and choice), but the devil is in the details.

This agenda can easily be seen in two gender-biased bills passed through the parliament this year.

June 2012 saw the new Family Violence Act come into effect. For the first time family law legislation was passed without bipartisan support, following a stifling of debate and a rushed late night vote in the senate. It was concerning this legislation that MP George Christiansen the member for Dawson made his celebrated “Feminist Trojan Horse” speech.

The impetus for these changes were a direct result of the Labor governments pandering to the entrenched domestic violence industry and sponsoring of the National Council’s review of cherry picked feminist advocacy research that resulted in the biased Time for Action: The National Council’s Plan for Australia to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, 2009-2021

Although the government’s propaganda denies it, this legislation is widely believed to be a recipe for increased use of false accusations of abuse as a tactic by those (predominantly women) seeking sole residency orders (referred to as physical custody in the US).

The legislation dictates that the court must prioritize the safety of the child (read best interests of the mother) over the rights of the child to an ongoing and meaningful relationship with both parents in any cases where there is alleged family violence. There is no requirement for the allegations to be substantiated, and the definition of what constitutes family violence has broadened to include a range of behaviors that to some degree exist in most relationships and are likely to be evident during the stressful events surrounding separation and divorce.

A raised voice or look perceived as threatening toward a mother may now be used as legal justification for the state sponsored child abuse of alienating children from their fathers. The legal liability and punishments for false allegations (rarely ever awarded previously) have been substantively weakened.

The government argued that the changes were necessary because a high proportion of disputed cases reaching the family court that involved allegations of abuse. Yes they do, false allegations are an extremely effective tactic both in the court and in coercing fathers to relinquish their paternal rights under threat of such allegations if their case does proceed to court.

I predict the volume of false allegations will continue to increase, seeing more fathers alienated from their children by order of the court, aiding and abetting the malicious agenda of mothers who see children as their possessions and fathers as targets for their vindictive retribution.

We are told that is does not represent a "roll back" of the share parenting reforms introduced by the Howard government in 2006. However a roll back by stealth is exactly what it is as it gives any mother who does not want shared parenting an easy and risk free method of getting her wish.

On the 6th Dec 2012 the Equal Opportunity for Women in the Workplace Amendment Bill 2012 was passed into law, and will begin to be implemented this year. The bill will see a name change from the Equal Opportunity for Women in the Workplace Act 1999, to the Workplace Gender Equality Act 2012, with a similar change in name for the government agency enforcing the Act to the Workplace Gender Equality Agency.

Whilst the government spin says the name change is "to emphasise the focus of the Act on gender equality, thereby improving outcomes for both women and men in the workplace," don't be fooled. This act is about changing from the egalitarian principle of equality of opportunity to the socialist ideal of mandated equality of outcomes.

Nowhere in the act is there any mention of relieving men of carrying the overwhelming burden of low status, dirty and dangerous work or requiring programs aimed at improving men's work life balance, relieving them of the expectation of being primary breadwinners or encouraging men's family life participation to match the commitment to improving women's workforce participation.

The act dictates a requirement for certain employers (those with more than 100 employees) to prepare annual public reports relating to "gender equality indicators." The exact indicators are poorly defined and apparently will be promulgated at ministerial discretion. Under previous legislation employers were obligated to implement and report on a workplace program aimed at "eliminating discrimination against women in relation to employment matters." The new system will enable enforcement of gendered employment outcomes and will likely result in discrimination against men for companies to achieve those outcomes.

It is not expected however, to see the WGEA active in reducing discrimination against men in female dominated workplaces (The Public Service, Education and Public Health sectors for example) as these government employers are NOT covered by the act, which only applies to NON-government workplaces. How convenient it appears government employers can practice anti-male discrimination with impunity.

The workplace Gender Equality Agency will have an expanded role in "advice and education" functions (read indoctrinating employers and employees on the mandated gender outcomes) as well as monitoring employer compliance with the act.

Whilst it is a lengthy document anyone interested should scan the acts explanatory memorandum, which regurgitates the well-worn and simplistic feminist dogma that informs the act, supported by misleading and meaningless graphics and boxed "snapshots". For example this graph is chosen rather than say, a graph of hourly earnings for employee's performing the same job under the same employment conditions, which of course would show no gender gap at all.

This "snapshot" again highlights a misleading picture.

The difference in starting salaries for graduates is of course not determined by gender alone but by a complex mix of factors. But stating that the starting salaries of graduate nurses or graduate social workers in identical positions were equal regardless of gender would not have quite the same impact, would it?

Of course the preponderance of female graduates seems not to rate a mention despite the widening education gap that is clearly disadvantaging our young men. For example in In 2009 of the 175,070 domestic students completing a tertiary degree 60% were female and only 40% were male, and in 2010 of the students commencing tertiary study 56.2% were female. Where is the policy and legislation to deal with the education gap? There is of course no such policy; indeed the issue still fails to be acknowledged by government despite the overwhelming evidence.

Just this week the new Workforce Gender Equality Agency has misrepresented in the media the 2012 findings of the Graduate Careers Australia's (GCA) Annual Australian Graduate Survey (AGS), as representative of a widespread culture of discrimination against women in the workforce that simply does not exist. Even GCA has criticized the WGEA's simplistic interpretation of their data and disregarding of the explanatory notes.

Julia Gillard has today responded to criticism of the WGEA confirming her government's commitment to providing special advantages for women. She stated:

> The industrial relations system we have now has a principle at its centre, which is that women and what is viewed as women's work traditionally should not be the subject of lower pay rates.''
> We haven't just enacted a bill about it.
> We've actually put our money where it should be with around a $2 billion investment to deal with the long-term disadvantage that social and community services workers are faced (with), basically, because they tend to be women.

With regard to superannuation comparing subgroups of men and women with the same employment histories rather than the totals across all men and women would show little if any difference.

As always policy based on poor analysis of only selected information is bad policy, still it conforms to the ideological underpinnings of Emily's list and has been applauded by gender ideologues.

Prime Minister Julia Gillard's falling popularity subsequent to broken election promises and clearly failing in most policy areas has seen her retreat to playing the gender victim card in her now infamous "misogyny speech." Which whilst hailed as a triumph for women by feminists the world over, it was understood by most Australians conversant with the background and context to represent the hypocritical, last chance strategy of an incompetent and corrupt politician.

It is imperative that Australians who value true gender equity should be informed of the radical feminist agenda behind Emily's list and their influence on Julia Gillard and the Labor Governments plans for Australian men and women. The success of sexual politics in influencing the outcome of the recent Presidential Election in the US is said to support Gillard's change of tactical direction and foreshadows that gender issues will be high profile in the forthcoming 2013 Australian Federal Elections.

A passage from India

January 6, 2013 | by Anil Sharma | Link | Original Link

In response to Paul Elam's request to hear from the men of India, I have the following to say. I am what you may call the average Indian male and I fall into the category that is the most hated, a young Indian male. Now, I cannot really provide you with statistics as I am no researcher, but I can provide you with accurate descriptions of misandry I have seen and experienced throughout the country. I have seen it happen countless times and have been subjected to official discrimination based on my sex as well.

In New Delhi, which is infamously called the Rape Capital, men are treated like beasts. Since the preconceived notion is that men are the perpetrators and a woman cannot lie about being troubled by a man, even the slightest hint of discomfort shown by a woman could mean doomsday for a man. The rapes that actually do happen are mostly at night when girls roam around unguarded in isolated places, but the media portrays it as a crime that happens around the clock in every possible area. I do not know anybody who has known rape victims personally but I know many who knew murder, attempted murder and assault victims. Statistics would easily tell you that murder and assault are more common in New Delhi than rape, and that men are murdered and otherwise harmed much more frequently than women. No one is rioting on the streets about what is happening to men.

It is an attitude you see reflected in many other ways in Indian culture. Our buses have seats reserved for women; the front half. One row is reserved for senior citizens and one more row is reserved for handicapped travelers. Now, the rows reserved for senior citizens and handicapped travelers may or may not always exist. But every bus will have seats reserved for women. I stand up out of courtesy for middle-aged men and women. I believe that they deserve respect as they are an elder to me.

But I have seen girls, young college girls, making old men sitting on seats reserved for women stand up so that they can have the seat. I come home after working for 10 hours in the office. I never get a seat in the bus. The back of the bus is always full and if the front half is empty, I can only sit there for a few minutes unless I am really lucky. As soon as a girl enters a bus, I am out. Due to sheer embarrassment and fear, men continue to stand even when the seats at the front are vacant. Due to this, buses are often very crowded at the back. Men never take the front seat unless they feel really lucky and all the seats at the back are full. A few air conditioned buses do not have reserved seats (I travel in these as far as possible).

You. In the back!

In Delhi metros, there is a coach reserved for women. This coach can remain empty but men cannot enter it. Apart from this, we are also constantly reminded (through announcements) to give our seats to ladies if they are standing. I would be willing to give my seat to an old woman or a pregnant lady. But young women? Healthy college girls?

There is more. I was recently standing in a very long queue to buy an interstate bus ticket. After waiting for more than an hour the queue had hardly moved. Why? A smaller queue had materialized next to our queue. A queue for women only. The tickets were being given to them first. A few women buy, they leave and then more women come, while the men wait. I got my ticket after 2 hours. It was 2am. I wanted to board the midnight bus.

If you try to make people understand that even men can be raped, they don't believe it. It took me some time to convince my friends, all of whom are well-educated. Imagine how difficult it is going to be to make the entire country believe that this crime exists. In India, it is assumed that no girl likes sex whereas sex is all that men can think about.

Most of the discotheques in India are openly sexist. The entry fee structure is usually something like this:

Ladies – FREE/negligible

Couples – 1000 Rs., since you are getting a MAN (rapist, demon, molester) with you

Men – 1500 Rs., or NO ENTRY

The justification? The same as it is in the west. Girls attract crowds. Girls will attract men and men will pay. Okay, so sexism is a business decision. But many discotheques don't even allow men unless they have women with them. Recently, I saw a man trying to go alone inside a discotheque. He was denied entry. So, he went out and asked a random girl to accompany him to the discotheque. Now get this. He was still denied permission because they had seen him before without a girl.

Our Constitution is shit in written form. Check out this link:

http://www.indiankanoon.org/doc/1942013/.

According to our Constitution, nobody can be discriminated on the basis of gender. But, if you read the sections related to dowry, rape, other sexual offences, etc., you'll see that our Constitution itself is hostilely misandrist. The "modesty of a woman" is a common phrase in our laws. It is not even clear what modesty of a woman really is but it roughly makes a woman's body a treasure which every man wants to possess by force (Read Section 354 of the IPC for more information). In cases of adultery, only the man can be held guilty. There were efforts made to make this law gender-neutral. But take a look at the following article which provides 1. the justification for having such a biased law and 2. the reason why it was proposed to scrap the law (it's not because it's against men).

http://indiatoday.intoday.in/story/consider-scrapping-adultery-from-indian-penal-code/1/163101.html

In general, men are considered evil everywhere in the country. Videotapes of women beating men are showcased here and any acts of violence against women (even if its self-defense) are condemned. You already have a lot of videos on your blog. When the Delhi girl was raped, newspapers, magazine articles and Facebook walls were flooded with brutal remarks calling for barbaric punishments like public beating and castration. The physical violence involved in the crime against the man was completely overlooked. Nobody was concerned about the girl's friend (probably her boyfriend). He saw his friend getting raped and he was beaten up by the men, too.

During the protests, a policeman was killed while performing his duty. There was hardly any news about him. Indians are concerned only when a woman is the victim and the concern is doubled if the woman is raped.

A film actor was convicted of rape a few years back. The whole country went berserk. Later, the victim changed her statement and said that she was not raped. This time nobody cared. Many people are still not aware of this development.

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Shiney_Ahuja#Rape_conviction

Yes, in our country some women are raped, tortured and subjected to humiliation. So are men. But we do not recognize those crimes against men. There are no laws to save or help men, only laws to attack them and keep them down. You can see the results of that on our streets in recent days.

But I was already aware. I saw the real problem with my own eyes; in a queue to buy a bus ticket, and in the eyes of old men, forced out of their seats to stand on a bus so that smug, entitled college girls can have a comfortable spot to rest their asses. I seem to remember hearing of similar rules, in one of the darker chapters in the history of America.

U.N. calls for circumcision ban — for females only.

January 6, 2013 | by Kristina Hansen | Link | Original Link

The United Nations General Assembly unanimously approved a resolution on December 20, 2012, calling for a global ban on female genital mutilation, or as others such as myself call it, female circumcision.

It's a centuries-old practice which stems from religious and cultural beliefs that circumcising girls controls women's sexuality and enhances fertility when they are of child bearing age. It's along the same line of nonsensical reasoning that is used for justifying male circumcision when people say it is necessary in order to keep the penis clean, that it helps prevent the spread of STD's, and that it's more appealing or enhances sexual performance.

These are just ridiculous, unproven claims used to justify mutilating someone's genitals. The difference is, mutilating a females genitals is seen as barbaric and needs to be abolished globally. Mutilating a males genitalia? Well the UN has not said a peep about it except in 2011 when the UN launched a plan to accelerate male circumcision for AIDS prevention in Africa.

That's right, the UN encouraged a plan to promote, speed up, and perform more circumcisions on men because > Voluntary medical male circumcision has been found to reduce the risk of sexual transmission of HIV from women to men by about 60% when carried out by well-trained health professionals. Since 2007, WHO and UNAIDS have urged countries with high HIV prevalence and low levels of male circumcision to expand access to safe VMMC services.

Oddly enough, finding any scientific, peer-reviewed, and empirical study that would explain how these results were obtained is no where to be found. I'll leave you to draw your own conclusions as to why.

Although the UN's current resolution on female circumcision is not legally binding, the General Assembly resolutions do reflect international concerns and carry a lot of moral and political weight.

The U.N. said in 2010 that about 70 million girls and women had undergone the procedure, and the World Health Organization said about 6,000 girls were circumcised every day.

However, they neglected the fact that the global prevalence of circumcision in males, estimated using current published data, is roughly a total of 1,306,411,547 men and boys who are circumcised — a global circumcision rate of 37.4%.

The resolution, which was cosponsored by over 100 countries, and adopted by consensus, calls the practice of female circumcision "harmful and a serious threat to the psychological, sexual and reproductive health of women and girls".

Nowhere was it mentioned that the same could be said for circumcision within the male population, or that male circumcision is much more widespread and affects men in much higher numbers than female circumcision. In comparison, female circumcision is much less prevalent or practiced than male circumcision is.

The resolution calls upon the U.N.'s 193 member states to outwardly condemn the practice of female circumcision and to launch education campaigns to systematically eliminate it. The resolution also urges all countries to enact and enforce legislation which would prohibit the practice and to hold any and all violators of the resolution accountable.

According to Amnesty International, female circumcision is quite common in approximately 28 countries in Africa as well as in Yemen, Iraq, Malaysia, Indonesia, and among certain ethnic groups in South America. They say it is also a worldwide concern because it can be practiced by immigrants in diaspora communities.

What they failed to acknowledge was that male circumcision is practiced in almost every country worldwide, and not just in certain countries or communities. Male circumcision is globally practiced and accepted, yet it is just as harmful, both psychologically and physically to men as it is to women. Many infant boys suffer permanent damage, and many have even died from botched circumcisions. These facts just don't seem to matter to the UN or AI.

The most telling thing about circumcision is the way in which society phrases it in regards to females and males. For females it is considered to be 'female genital mutilation', whereas for men it is simply considered circumcision. You do not hear people saying men are genitally mutilated, even though this is exactly what is happening to them.

Amnesty International's U.N. representative Jose Luis Diaz called the UN's resolution "a first" for the General Assembly and "an important moment" for campaigners against "this grotesque practice." He did not utter a word about male circumcision or how grotesque a practice it is.

I find it quite telling and disgusting that, as a man, your genitals being mutilated is of no concern to the world. It's only circumcision, after all. Females, on the other hand, are genitally mutilated and that needs to be condemned.

Police handcuffed by DV policy

January 7, 2013 | by Benjamin Barr | Link | Original Link

Mandatory and pro-arrest policies pushed by radical feminists and the federal government regarding domestic violence have all but eliminated officer discretion on the matter throughout the country. Fear of the potential consequences for using discretion has our officers in a headlock. Few have the moral courage to exercise it resulting in many unnecessary arrests that consequently damage the American family.

Scenario:

A woman has been drinking adult beverages throughout the evening. Her husband and she argue over finances. She tries to walk to the car and he grabs her by the wrist in order to prevent her from driving. She screams, pulls away and falls twisting her ankle in the driveway while the kids look on. The neighbor calls 911. Upon arrival officers separate the couple and interview them individually. The woman is crying. She has a red mark on her wrist and a swollen ankle consistent with her account of events and those of the neighbor, husband and children. The injuries are minor. She refuses medical attention. There is no history of domestic violence on file between the couple and the "victim" does not want her husband arrested. Despite her protests, he is arrested for domestic battery and the enhancement section – in the presence of children.

This scenario illustrates how unnecessary arrests set in motion a chain of events more damaging than anything that took place prior to law enforcement being called: The husband is arrested in front of his family and neighbors. A No Contact Order (NCO) is issued forbidding him from seeing his kids and wife or contacting them by phone or through a third-party. He has to pay for bond or will miss work. He must spend money living out of the home and even more money for an attorney unless he qualifies for the public defender. He cannot possess a firearm or ammunition while the NCO stands.

Peace officers sometimes seize these items stripping the suspect of his Second Amendment right without Due Process; as if a man is less deadly without a gun. The humiliation, family separation and financial burden stemming from this unnecessary arrest are a strain on the family brought about by overzealous arrest policies. Unnecessary arrests damage the American family and contribute to its further breakup. Not to mention the countless number of otherwise innocent men that are processed through the criminal justice system and who will be forever stained and stigmatized with an arrest record that can affect their employment, future job prospects, and other avenues of advancement.

Pro-arrest policies are adopted by law enforcement administrators out of fear of tort claims, fear of the feds de-funding grants and fear of bad press. Fear is inculcated in officers through yearly in-service training. Arresting for the slightest, explainable injury is fail-safe. Officers pass the buck to prosecutors, placing them in an untenable situation. Many of these cases are resolved by a plea to the lesser charge of disturbing the peace. Sometimes defendants take a plea deal only to expedite the reunification of family, the restoration of rights, and reduce the financial bleeding.

Consider this. In 2003, twenty-one year old Angie Leon of Nampa, Idaho, was murdered by her estranged husband, Abel Leon – a known criminal alien. Over a five-year period, Leon had fifty-nine contacts with law enforcement; almost all resulted in arrest. Thirty-five of the fifty-nine concerned domestic violence. Angie told authorities numerous times Leon would kill her. There is no crystal ball. Authorities cannot arrest for something that might happen. After fifty-nine professional police contacts, Angie's murder was not the result of failed police-prosecutor work, but rather of the failure of Immigration, Customs Enforcement (ICE). Nonetheless, Idaho's self-insured communities risk management plan (ICRMP) paid out $925,000 to her mother.

Cases like Leon are referenced in domestic violence training poisoning the well of police discretion. In 2011 there were seventeen deaths in Idaho related to domestic violence. Like Angie, domestic violence laws/policies did not save those victims. In fact, there is no way to know if domestic violence laws and pro-arrest policies reduce the number of injuries and deaths or contribute to them – by holding victims hostage in their circumstances. Could a victim's past experiences with overzealous arrest policies make them less likely to call 911 when all she wants is for officers to preserve the peace while she collects her toothbrush and leaves?

The argument in support of domestic violence laws is built on the premise that the existing misdemeanor and felony assault and battery laws are insufficient given the unique psychological aspects of a (female) victim trapped in a cycle of domestic violence. The state wanted more power to intercede and prosecute on behalf of women paralyzed by fear, confusion and control.

Sometimes the state does know best, but few cases prosecuted as domestic battery fit the kinds of controlling abuse that proponents of the law argued it was intended to address. In these mismatched cases what makes matters worse is when the unwilling victim turns hostile and recants saying she lied to police. This makes it more difficult to prosecute in a true or future case because the victim's credibility is damaged.

In addition, the underlying premise for the law may be flawed. The media ignore studies like Domestic Violence: The Male Perspective, where it states: "Domestic violence is often seen as a female victim/male perpetrator problem, but the evidence demonstrates that this is a false picture." This and other studies show men are as often the victims of domestic violence as women, but they under report.

Domestic violence laws are redundant, gender biased, overreaching and too often bring unjust outcomes to the families they are purported to protect. Compounding this is the fact that the kinds of injuries considered to distinguish a misdemeanor domestic battery from a felony domestic battery is lower – and far more subjective – than the kinds of injuries that typically distinguish non-domestic misdemeanor batteries from non-domestic felony (aggravated) batteries.

The co-existing statutes for traditional misdemeanor battery, misdemeanor assault, aggravated battery, aggravated assault, and stalking are sufficient to address the very real issue of domestic violence.

Repealing domestic violence law is unlikely. The alternative? – Restoring discretion. The relative autonomy of the Office of Sheriff is pivotal in modeling this change. Yes, the feds could investigate and prosecute under federal domestic violence law. Yes, the DOJ could de-fund grants to Sheriffs who stand by their oath and row against the federally adopted, radical feminist narrative. Yes, the press will spin the move toward discretion casting the Sheriff a neanderthal. So be it.

Discretion is not license for peace officers to be lazy and leave when they should arrest. Until crystal balls are issued to peace officers – reason, not fear – should steer their actions in our homes.

Monday Roundup: First of 2013

January 7, 2013 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

So, we're willing to bet a lot of you have been away for the holidays, and may only just be getting back from a very long weekend or an impromptu vacation. So instead of this just being the normal "here's what's been happening the last week," we're going to do an extra special "this is everything you may have missed since just before Christmas, starting December 21" roundup. If you've been away that long, hold onto your hats you crazy varmints, because we got us a damned stampede of exciting stuff. Yee-haw!

Remember the Interview with Erin Pizzey on domestic violence and lies about men and women? Well if you didn't, you need to not only watch and/or read it, you need to get it into the hands of everyone you know, of any political stripe. And just in case you missed it, it's been updated with a substantial number of references, and if you had trouble hearing the audio on it, a new version that fixes some people's sound issues is also available.

That interview was conducted on December 8th, and over the next few weeks Erin, who's said on multiple occasions she despairs of there ever being a coherent and effective men's movement, spent a good bit of time looking at A Voice for Men, and on January 1 she joined our editorial team. Expect to hear more from Erin on these pages in the near future, with reprints of long out-of-print materials (feminist publishers intentionally took her work out of print some time ago) and with new materials as well. Also be sure to buy her sensational memoir on the history of her involvement in the feminist movement and the anti-domestic violence movement. She's a pioneer, a visionary, a tough broad–and an MRA.

Our quarterly fundraiser broke an all-time record. Thank you, thank you, and thank you all again.

European news director Lucian Vâlsan had a report on violent activity by Stalinist group FEMEN in Europe you should see if you haven't.

Andy Man, head of MRA London has shown up to kick butt and chew bubble gum and from what we can tell, he's all out of bubble gum. His takedown of bigoted gender ideologue Germaine Greer should not be missed. Furthermore, more recently, he says to men who are concerned with their own problems but can only complain and only think about their own problems need to lead, follow, or get the hell out of the way. Ditto, as they say.

JudgyBitch has joined our list of female contributors with her first, but definitely not last, article on A Voice for Men, calling out hatemongering sexist, racist bigot Hugo Schwyzer in Hugo Schwyzer: embracing racism, sexism, & cruelty. We kind of like that Judgy Bitch, although we aren't quite sure, she's kinda judgy and kinda bitchy, or so we're told.

John the Other recently asked has Amanda Marcotte gotten stupider? I think he's being kind of charitable, but you know, John the Other is always careful to avoid offending.

Sometimes a posting appears quietly on a forum and the person posting it doesn't know they've just written something not just personal, but that means something to almost everybody in a movement. Such is the case with Jay T, who no less than three AVfM editors all jumped on at once wanting to put it on the front page. Don't miss I almost rejected the Red Pill. One only has to wonder how hard the gender ideologues will work to declare him a hateful misogynistic "loser" so they can avoid listening to his message. We get the feeling that shit isn't going to last much longer.

Peter Lloyd, open Men's Rights Advocate and columnist for the Daily Mail, recently penned a devastating piece on a violent thug Lucie Slater, and the free pass she got for having a vagina after not just injuring but mutilating a man and possibly ruining his career. In another piece he notices a prominent bigot who doesn't like boys. And they tell us there's no such thing as misandry.

We once had high hopes for a publication called The Good Men Project, but it's done little but gone downhill since its inception. Astoundingly, they've been surreptitiously going through their own archives and purging materials not just by the likes of Paul Elam, but also purging things written by AVfM contributors like Girl Writes What and Quiet Riot Girl/Elly Tams. We've taken it upon ourselves to immediately republish any materials they selectively purge for WrongThink. They've been going to far as to attempt to erase evidence that they were ever there, and ignoring inquiries as to where they went. You can find the purged items reprinted here and here. Paul Elam, to our shock, had some pungent words of his own on the matter that caused me to swoon on my fainting couch, so be careful before reading it.

Quiet Riot Girl herself has some thoughts on the growing irrelevancy of The Good Men Project on her own blog as a result of this Orwelleian erasing of a publication's own history.

Remember our campaign to contact hundreds of elected officials before the November elections in America? Well we got a lot of news through back channels on ripples we sent through Maine, Delaware, and West Virginia with that, and at least one Senator was willing to take a public stand. We know others are quietly watching to see what happens.

Did you know that by law, Swedish men are second class citizens? Well, they pretty clearly are.

Scholar Robert St. Estephe has a suggestion for an entry that ought to be in the Diagnostics and Standards Manual for the American Psychiatric Association. They probably won't accept it, but they should.

Chemical castration for sexual offenders: is it man-hating pseudoscience? I have to admit that I didn't really think so until this piece made me rethink.

We had a lot of people to thank for our great developments in 2012, but John the Other has some gender ideologues we really want to thank. I know they've been a constant source of inspiration for me, that's for sure, and I expect them all to keep inspiring me through 2013 and beyond. Unless of course they change their ways. (Bwahahahahaha! I crack myself up sometimes.)

VAWA is dead by the way. But it'll be back like a vampire from the grave in no time flat, we're certain. Maybe they'll get honest and rename its new incarnation "The Violent Women and Child Abuse Enabling Act." That would be more accurate, anyway.

The Wooly Bumblebee, frequently featured on our radio shows and in our videos section, recently penned her first formal piece for us, this time on the fact that even sperm donors are not safe from the claws of the family courts. Great. Anything they can do to beat as many men as possible into the ground, right? She also penned her second piece, this time noticing that the United Nations has condemned genital mutilation of girls but not boys.

By the way, hi Sophia Guo! No, we didn't forget you. Hope you had a happy holiday season!

Are you a male in the US Military? There may be witch hunts on the way for you. Yes, yes, we thank you for your service and all that, but please, don't be caught in possession of a penis and having anything that looks even remotely like normal sexual relations with anyone.

The irrepressible Andybob, who is hated by radical feminists because he doesn't just have a penis, he has a GAY penis, notes the vile choir of misandrists heralded by the Australian media. At times it feels like Australia is the worst place in the so-called Anglosphere for men and boys. But Andy, you really must stop using your gay penis to oppress women!

Speaking of places outside the so-called "Anglosphere," recent news about tragic rapings of women in India had us wondering: is anything bad happening for men in India? A Voice for Men is now reaching out to India to ask. Anil Sharma answered with harrowing details of his own experiences. We remain anxious to hear from other men from India, as growing hysteria of rape of women looks suspiciously like a growing tendency to dismiss, marginalize, and deny the suffering of men and boys and an excuse to beat on them instead. We hope to hear from others in India about what looks like a growing misandry problem there.

Other news outside of A Voice for Men: The NiceGuy's American Women (Mostly) Suck site has been greatly revamped and updated by our friend Solaris and his fine crew. Yes, the title of the site is incendiary–like you never see anything incendiary about modern men on the internet? For over a decade men who've been badly burned by believing lies about women (and about men) have found this a safe haven for blunt talk about what's bad–and good–about women, what to look for and what to watch out for.

If you're a woman who's offended by it, put on your big girl panties and have a look at how some men honestly feel, and ask yourself why. Maybe you'll learn something. We've got a culture that tells men from day one how stupid, smelly, oppressive, and awful they are. Maybe it's your turn to listen and at least hear how men who've been burned honestly see the world. If you just want to sneer "misogynists!" fine, but then please never ask again where all the "good men" have gone. Maybe there's a reason they're gone that you never thought to ask about.

Oh by the way, if you scroll down on the right hand side of the AVfM front page, underneath the notices about The New York Times, Ms. Magazine, and other pages, there's a spinny globe. If you click on it, you'll see this, which is a live update of everybody currently visiting A Voice for Men within the last 10 minutes or so. You may notice that not long ago we passed over 3,100,000 visits (that's visits, not "hits") and in our Alexa rankings are now in the top 100,000 web sites in the world, and closing fast on our good friends at Feministing. Hmm. I thought we were just this tiny little irrelevant place full of sad bitter right-wing middle aged males no one cared about? Wait, this must be some kind of mistake!

Rhiannon and Holly of The New Statesman are utterly terrified of the idea that there might actually be a men's movement out there that matters, and they want everybody to know how it's all just scary awful spooky evil privileged white men. While spreading fear, paranoia, and hatred of us, they accuse us of… fear, paranoia, and hatred. They're also quite racist about it, predictably suggesting it's about "white" men. But instead of going over and ranting at them about it, why don't you–seriously–go talk some common sense into them instead?

You might, for example, tell them obvious things: that criticizing feminism isn't hating women it's criticizing an ideology, and that human rights should not be a zero-sum game and maybe they should stop acting like it is, and maybe they should stop the racist nonsense about this being about "white" men when it's about all men and boys. Or maybe that they should stop acting as if this is about age when boys and men of all ages are affected, or that it's about anything besides fundamental human rights for men and women alike? Just a suggestion.

Oh and by the way, to our good friends at the National Organization for Women? We're glad you've noticed us. We know who you are and now you know who we are. Good. Now you know, and we know you know, and you know we know you know. We're looking forward to chatting. Do you prefer camomile or Earl Grey tea? Can't wait either way!

Our friends at NOW, as well as anyone who is convinced that men's advocacy and activism is merely an internet phenomenon, might want to be aware that the days of gender-feminist bullying and censorship in academia are coming to an end, as men's studies begins in earnest free of indoctrination about "The Patriarchy" and "rape culture." Real academics are finally throwing off the shackles of misandrist ideology, as documented by Jim Muldoon.

In closing, tons of great stuff in the video section, by the way. I was particularly fond of what Correctrix had to say, and Kudi.

Am I the only one who thinks 2013 is going to be a fucking great year, or what? Giddyap!

Update: Hey, don't miss the profile on Paul Elam in the Toronto Standard. Too bad Erika doesn't stick around a little longer and get to know a few of us better.

Can you hear me NOW?

January 7, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

To the National Organization for Women:

My name is Paul Elam and I am a men's rights activist. I have just finished reading a document from your website titled, Fall 2012 – Newsletter of the NOW Family Law Ad Hoc Advisory Committee – SPECIAL REPORT.

Contained in it were the expected canards one would normally anticipate from a feminist organization, such as your attempts to deny the existence of custodial mothers who emotionally and psychologically abuse their children by alienating their fathers. And your claims that it is abused women, and not fathers, who encounter the real sexual discrimination in family courts.

I also noted, with some amusement, that while you continue to define men's and fathers advocacy as a backlash against changing gender roles, you also advocate women be given preference in custody decisions, reinforcing the very same roles you pretend to oppose.

None of that is new or surprising. As an organization with an elitist agenda, deception and hypocrisy are necessary staples in your propaganda.

However, your report did contain something different, and more consistent with the times. For the first time that I am aware, you have launched an offensive against the growing amount of men's advocacy being conducted online; advocacy that is beginning to reshape the public discourse concerning sexual politics, which explains your attack well enough.

You have cited the Southern Poverty Law Center, and parroted them in attacking the men's movement, using the same hyperbolic and deceptive language.

It probably would have been in the best interest of your followers if you had informed them of the SPLC's subsequent back peddling, in which your source Arthur Goldwag acknowledged, after being publicly humiliated for his accusations, that he never called the men's movement a hate movement, and that indeed the MRM had legitimate grievances that needed amelioration.

Of course, that would not serve your purpose, which seems to be that you are gearing up for a battle. And you know it is one you need to fight.

Too bad for you it is not going to do any good.

The fact of the matter is that the only thing that has held up your ideology and your stranglehold on public perception is the fact that people have been too afraid to shine the light of truth on who and what you are. Another fact is that this is changing, and rapidly.

The SPLC cannot save you. Your current reach into government cannot save you. Your diminishing funding cannot save you, nor can your influence on the media and academe.

There is a rapidly growing body of men and women of all colors, religious and nonreligious, gay and straight, Democrat, Republican, Libertarian and Independent, who have simply had enough of your hatred and lies. They have had enough of you.

Why? It is because activists are teaching them the truth. These so called fitful bands of "misogynists" are reaching more and more people every day, with the proof that your agenda is not one of equality, but of one toxic, virulent grab for money and power after another. People are finally starting to learn what your ideology has done to the family and to the minds of our children. They are learning that the war you fostered between men and women has resulted only in losers and carnage.

You can claim that VAWA was allowed to die because of misogynistic backlash, but fewer people are buying it because more people know precisely what a sexist, porcine piece of legislation it is. The children being destroyed by it are starting to grow up and talk.

You can scream and chant all you want that feminism is about equality, but, assisted by a half century of your actions, we are showing people the truth. Feminism has devolved into tyranny. Like all tyranny in human history, it will be opposed.

The world is learning of your complicit silence in the face of the advocacy of murder, infanticide, eugenics and naked bigotry, as we have found and documented in the radical underbelly of your movement[1][2][3]. But it is not just the most seedy and sequestered elements in your ilk that we have exposed.

We have also shined a light on your phony wage gap, your corruption of research and science, your falsification of domestic violence and rape statistics and even how these things have crept into our government, and into our institutions of higher education. The knowledge of those things is making its way into the narrative of our culture.

The days of a public remaining ignorant and silent are over. We will no longer allow that to happen, and there is no squeezing that toothpaste back into the tube.

I have to give you credit. 50 years of hateful elitism successfully disguised as an equalitarian movement is quite an accomplishment. It would be all the more impressive, however, had it not so totally depended on the enabling and sacrifice of the very men from which you claim to have been liberated.

And therein lies your problem. An aggressively growing number of men and women are done with the enabling. They are done accepting lies and distortions. And they are beginning to look at our fragmenting, decomposing society and figure out what, no, who the problem is.

All that was ever needed to destroy feminism and promote true equality in this culture was for the truth to break free from the chains placed on it by a fearful and misled society.

It is happening as we speak.

This is going to be a very important year for the men's rights movement, which means it is going to be a very important year for men and women who want to work together on addressing problems with valid, research based solutions – not as competitors out to demonize and vilify and destroy each other, but as partners in an effort that leads us to mutual valuing and cooperation. They understand fully that the absence of that valuing and cooperation has been paid for dearly by our children, especially our boys.

All this means that it is going to be a very bad year for you. All you offer is fear and conflict and people are finally getting tired of it.

I will close with a bit of advice that I know you are too entrenched to heed. If you want to slow the men's movement, the only way to do it is to emulate the raisons d'être to which you have so far only paid lip service, while pursuing a base and malignant agenda.

You need to act as though you have a moral compass, and that means dropping the entitlement and the hate.

Anything less will result in your extirpation, because it is not the men's movement that is your problem. It is the truth told far and wide in a society that is beginning to hunger for it.

That truth is coming for you, and we will breathe relief whether you accept it, or are consumed by it.

Not the standard interview

January 8, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

I have semi-regular contact with the mainstream media these days. Most recently I was interviewed by Erika Jarvis for the Toronto Standard. Ostensibly the article was about AVfM's activism in the aftermath of violent protest against Warren Farrell, who spoke at the University of Toronto about the issues facing men and boys.

I am pleased to report that the article was something less than a total disaster. In fact, in issuing a grade to Ms. Javis, I am compelled to give her a B+. Keep in mind that this is the mainstream so there is a curve.

Let me explain how she arrived at that grade.

First, calling me "notorious" in the headline was just a smidgen biased, though I admit getting a slightly egocentric chuckle when I saw it. No loss of points, though, as it is often the caprice of editors that determine headlines.

Then there are the real problems with the article. The first point, and a minor one compared to the rest, is that calling our anti-violence policy "ostentatious" demonstrates a lack of understanding of things I already know Ms. Jarvis understands. We have to make a show of anti-violence, because until Ms. Jarvis's article, every mainstream hack who ever penned a word about us either implied or directly charged us with promoting violence. That includes some who have fallaciously linked us to people like Anders Breivik and Marc Lépine.

Four points deducted.

Jarvis loses another four points for perspective. She characterizes a violent protest, in which young men were harassed and bullied, enduring epithets, jeering and public humiliation, for simply trying to attend a lecture about boys, as "impassioned," and the behavior of the protesters as, "not beyond reproach."

As thick as she laid it on my actions at times, she made the bias pretty clear.

Jarvis also compared me to Fidel Castro, "before he came to power: relegated to the political fringes, passionate, and ideologically driven."

What ideology? Deduct four points for baseless conjecture. I don't subscribe to an ideology.

I also need to point to an issue of intellectual consistency. Throughout Jarvis's piece, there is an air of judgment about the tactics I employ, a sort of "Eww, thaths naaasthy!" reaction to it all. It's as though somewhere in her mind a better way to get things done is perched there, waiting to be discovered. Surely someone would listen without all this brazenness and lack of sophistication.

She seems not to notice her own dismissal of that, as she writes:

> It's true I wouldn't be talking to him today if he'd written some > aggrieved, politically sanitary letter to the U of T protesters outlining his complaints.

No, Erika, you would not have. Neither would anyone else. It is the one and only reason we do things here the way we do them. It is not my fault, or the fault of men and boys, that we live in such a misandric culture. When the day comes that the media will contact me because a desperate man self-immolates in front of a family court instead of making every effort to ignore it, then I, as well as many who follow this site, will be happy employ activism more fit for mainstream sensibilities.

When universities start disciplining students for hateful conduct, instead of indoctrinating them into it, the same applies.

Until then, they get FTSU.

Being shocked and judgmental about that is like White America's clueless outrage over Watts in 1965.

Perhaps on some level Jarvis gets that she doesn't fully get it. I don't know, but I am not taking off points on this one. I'll call it an AA curve for the MSM since I am so slap-happy about acronyms.

That leaves us with the now standard reference to the SPLC. It was complete with misquotes from our mission statement and accusations from which the SPLC has long since backpedaled. That one seems to come with each round of media coverage, which is what the SPLC wanted when they created all those lies in the first place.

Thing is, whoever put it there was speaking for the publication as a whole. I can't prove it is the doing of Jarvis, or if some editor at The Standard, paranoid that the article was not negative enough, wanted it tossed in.

It doesn't affect the grade, except to say that if it was from an editor, they get a big fat stinky F for being lazy and dishonest.

That being said, I have to credit Jarvis for her positives. There were a number of them.

One, in her critique of my "Bash a Violent Bitch Month," article, she actually linked to the Jezebel.com com piece and acknowledged they were "swapping stories" (that is feminist friendly mainstream talk for bragging) about being physically abusive to the men in their lives. She also linked readers to the U of T video so they could see the actions of the protesters themselves.

She did make an effort to characterize our conversation, and me, honestly. While I disagree with some of her conclusions, she was open with me about her thoughts, and we talked at some length. I read nothing in her article that surprised me.

I know there will be some here that think I am giving her too much of a pass. I will go ahead and disagree in advance. Instead of the standard spiel about the MRM being a bunch of angry white guys, she acknowledged and discussed the many women who support the cause. And she acknowledged some of the issues we address. Overall, she did well enough to piss off a few feminists, who quickly Tweeted their discontent. I hope it does not cost her too much. We all know how they can get when you actually listen to an

MRA.

I told her during our talks that a hit piece is what I expected from everyone in the mainstream. She answered me by saying that, “This story is too complicated for a hit piece.”

Even with the mistakes, I think she held true to that, or as true as she knew how for today.

AVFM News and Activism: Colonel Absconder

January 8, 2013 | by James Huff | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]

Tonight we have as our guest Colonel Absconder, a relatively new but promising MRA Youtuber. As is our tradition here, we prominently feature You Tube MRAs in order to promote and share Men's Rights ideas and Colonel Absconder is prime for the list. He is part of the school of younger MRAs that bring not only a fresh perspective but one that is crucial to understanding the issues that affect all men. He has been a caller on the show and is a much more than competent thinker and writer.

We will be talking about feminist co-option, misandry and whatever else comes to mind so please call in and join the discussion.

The show starts tonight, January 8th, at 9:00 PM Eastern, 8:00 PM Central, which is 2:00 AM January 9th in London and 11:00 AM January 9th in Brisbane.

Messaging and “moderation” in the men’s community

January 8, 2013 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

The following is a slightly modified piece that was originally performed as a video response to Barbarossaaaa, who recently commented on others on YouTube advocating making the men’s movement more “inclusive” and saying it has an “image problem.” Barbarossaaaa was rather skeptical of the idea, and basically said “carve out your own space and be whoever you want to be,” and noted that more hateful men’s advocates and men going their own way didn’t bother him.

This is something that has torn at me for a long time, and to an extent still does. In early 2002, which means about ~~11~~ 12 years ago now, I started writing a weblog. I gave it a stupid name that was supposed to be a joke, “Dean’s World,” ironically and very loosely sort of based on the “Wayne’s World” movie that had been popular and that name stuck because to my shock it got very very popular. Possibly Barbarossa might even relate to this a little, because while there’s nothing wrong with being called Barbarossa if he ever decides “I don’t want to be Barbarossa anymore, I want to be known as something else,” he almost can’t do that without tearing everything up and starting over.

Anyway, I got stuck with “Dean’s World” and at one time I was up to about 20,000 daily visits, something like 100, 150 thousand daily hits, I got contacted by university professors, political campaigns, the Library of Congress archived part of my blog for the 2004 elections, and so on. It was big.

I mention all this for two reasons. Not to brag, because frankly it’s not that much to brag about anymore. It’s not as popular as it used to be by any means. I mention it first because a lot of the community thinks I’m new to men’s issues. Second, because that experience of being popular and having written on a lot of things taught me some bitter lessons. To make a long story short: I wrote on many things on that blog over the years, many many things: politics, history, religion, science, and many other things. But one of them was always, from the beginning, men’s issues. The issue of domestic violence was always closest to my heart, but other issues like men having rights in reproduction, the way poor men get marginalized, father’s rights, and so on were also always there.

And what I consistently noticed over more than ten years of writing is that when I would write on other subjects, I would get a whole whole lot of attention, but whenever I bothered writing anything on men’s or boys’ issues, 99% of the time I got complete silence. Or maybe one or two supportive or critical comments.

I would also try at times to have conversations with feminists, and talk to them, and while a few were reasonable most were either contemptuously dismissive or even outright bullying and nasty.

[image]I read Warren Farrell‘s The Myth of Male Power around the time it came out, and that’s been almost 20 years ago now, and it effected me. But what impact did it have on the larger world? Nothing that I could tell.

When I finally decided to join the guys over at A Voice for Men, where I'm Managing Editor now, it was a hard thing for me to do. I had to do some soul searching. The fact of the matter is that I've been involved in online discourse for about 30 years, been blogging for about 12, been writing on and off on men's issues for multiple decades if you count my pre-blogging days when I would sometimes venture into online debates, and I finally had to swallow this pill: being nice doesn't work.

I will repeat this for emphasis: being nice, polite, and civil–it does not work.

Nobody listens, nobody cares.

Even if they do politely agree with you all they give you is quiet agreement but then they do nothing. Or they change the subject to try to minimize, or equalize. So if some woman faces street harassment once in a while, or guys occasionally make sexist remarks about women in the workplace, why that's just exactly the same as men having no reproductive rights to speak of (beyond the right to have sex), debtor's prison for guys who can't make their child support and alimony payment because they're destitute, workplace deaths, higher suicide rates, higher homelessness rates, parental alienation which disproportionately effects fathers and their children, genital mutilation… I don't know what's worse, having people deny these problems exist, or the people who acknowledge them but try to equalize or marginalize them so women's issues are "just as bad" or, even more annoyingly, try to say "but it's getting better now."

No, it isn't fucking getting better, not on most of these things. On most of them, it's getting worse. In too many ways to count.

When I joined AVfM, I had a tearing at my conscience because even though in 30 years of online discourse I've occasionally lost my shit and said some blistering things, I've usually apologized for that. I don't like getting in people's faces, and the older I get the less I like doing that. And I'll usually try to apologize if someone points out that I've been over-the-top rude. Sometimes if someone consistently pushes my buttons, or if I'm feeling overwhelmed, I get rude. I'm not a saint, but that's just not my preferred style. I'm sure you'll run into a few people online who only remember the times I was rude to them in particular, but really honestly, most of the time, I'd rather just be calm and rational and give people the benefit of the doubt.

But I've sadly noticed it appears that the only way to get attention on men's and boys' issues is to get in people's faces and say "fuck you motherfuckers," and mean it. Then they at least wake the fuck up. And so when I get people, even close friends, telling me they think we Men's Rights Advocates need to tone down our message, I always say the same thing:

[image]For decades now there have been people talking and writing about these things, including some very very thoughtful, learned, intelligent, and famous people, and we have gotten nowhere. In fact, of trends that people like Erin Pizzey and Warren Farrell first started identifying 20, even 30 or 40 years ago, a few have gotten a little better but most of them have either stayed the same or gotten worse, some dramatically worse. So my real question for these people who say we need to tone it down is this:

“You tell me what works better than getting rude, because being rude has consistently shown better results than being nice and kind and pleasant and rational has.”

Well, rational still matters. But, nice and kind and pleasant? Not so much.

[image]All that said, I’m going to somewhat contradict myself: when you open yourself up to being angry and provocative, you can open yourself up to bringing in people you really don’t want to bring in. You’ll get associated with people you don’t want to associate with. For example, while I have nothing against everyone in the Pickup Artist/Game community, I have no interest in associating with those people at all, and I think much of what they’re doing is selling snake oil: for shy guys who aren’t good with girls, “we have the magic formula for you!” Yeah, maybe some of that works but whatever. There’s also this idiot called Dmitri “the Lover” who is pretty obviously a fake men’s advocate, or ought to be considered one, because he’s got this web site that appears to go back a few years and this asshole writes that men have a right to rape women and slap them around if they get mouthy and a bunch of other stupid shit like that–if you don’t believe me just Google him, I’m not giving you any links.

There’s also the occasional commenter who shows up on my channel, or other channels, or places like Reddit, or A Voice for Men or my blog, saying really outrageous shit. Sometimes it’s pretty obvious that they’re trolls, or sock puppets for radical feminists. In fact I’d be willing to bet you money that Dave Futrelle and other feminists often use sock puppet accounts to say outrageous shit to try to prove that men’s advocates are all misogynists, woman-haters, angry white people and all that.

[image]In fact that “white” part really bothers me. “White?” Really? How racist are you that you think these issues are white people’s issues? No. Sorry, if anything, when it comes to men’s issues, men of color tend to have it a little worse, but even then that’s just a general trend. Race hasn’t got much to do with it. We as men have issues that we face as men, period, it doesn’t matter what our color is. But anyway, we get all these stereotypes about us, and I think if we don’t address them, there are people who might otherwise listen to us, who won’t if they believe the stereotypes.

I’m a big believer in the theory that you can never convince 100% of people of anything. No matter what your position. You probably can’t get 100% of the population to be against paedophilia, there’s probably a tenth of a percent of the general public that thinks that’s no big deal. If I advocated wiping out all life on Earth there’d be someone somewhere who thought that was a great idea. There’s just nothing you can ever get 100% agreement or disagreement on.

So the goal of any movement is not to persuade everybody, it’s to get enough people to get enough critical mass to change things.

Some raise the point that Men’s Rights Advocates haven’t gotten any legislation passed. But I don’t think that’s looking at it in a fair manner. One of the first things you must do with any successful movement is build enough critical mass to get legislation passed.

That takes time, organization, and effort.

[image]For example, in the United States, slavery was ended effectively in 1865. Arguably, with the passage of the 14th amendment around that era, black people should have gotten all their full civil rights within fairly short order after that. But they didn't, did they? They didn't have their full civil rights until about a hundred years later; I'd say that with the passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, that's when you can say they fully had the same civil and legal rights as whites. That doesn't mean everything became equal or racism went away, it just meant all the same rights under the law were extended equally to everybody, formally anyway, even though there's still disparities and discrimination.

So by my math that took ONE HUNDRED YEARS from the end of slavery.

Do I think the men's movement is going to need a century? No. I think we're moving faster than that. But it's still going to take time. And what we're seeing right now is a period of amazing growth in the men's movement. And growth will be fractious and include some pain.

To my way of looking at the history of political movements, when you see factions and schisms develop, that's usually a sign of one of two things: the movement is falling apart, or, it is growing. And I'm pretty convinced that we are in a growth phase right now. In fact I think we're growing like crazy, and crazy growth means that schisms and arguments are going to happen, and some people are going to be left behind or have to go off on their own direction. And so far as I'm concerned, that is OK.

Even if you look at the history of the civil rights movement in America for black people just as an example, you had the followers of Martin Luther King, you had the followers of Malcom X, and you had the followers of other groups like the Congress of Racial Equality, and the the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People which had been around a lot longer than any of those others had been (longer than most of those other people had been alive in fact), and more. You don't need one umbrella group, nor do you need everyone in your movement to agree on everything.

[image]Just comparing Malcolm X to Martin Luther King, there was a huge difference between those two men in their personal styles and even their stated goals. So a certain amount of fractiousness is OK.

My view is that the men's movement's had its Martin Luther King figures for a long time, in people like Warren Farrell and Erin Pizzey. What it hasn't had is its Malcolm X type figures, which basically scare people because they're rude and in your face. They're not violent, they never advocate violence, but, they won't back down. They won't be nice, they won't be ginger in their language, because they calculate that "nice" doesn't work. They calculate that "blunt" is what works.

But, all of that said, in embracing the idea that there are going to be rude and abrasive people, and that rude and abrasive is needed, I have to get back to it: if you want a coherent movement, rather than just individuals all doing their own thing, you must have the ability to say, "This person or set of ideas does not represent us or our values at all." And you must be able to stick to that. You must be able to say things like, for example,

“You hate homosexuals? Sorry, we’re not on board with that, and you’re not part of our party here. You can make your points to somebody else, we’re not hanging out with you.”

You have to also be able to do one other thing: you have to be able to say not just what you’re against. You have to be able to say what you’re for. One of the things that consistently frustrates me about some men’s rights people is that they seem to think that just criticizing feminists or arguing with feminists is going to do anything all by itself. I’m sorry, but it’s not. As many have noted, it’s not even clear exactly what feminism is. Is conservative traditionalism “the other feminism,” as some people claim? Maybe. I think both are flip sides of the same coin, and the actual coin is male disposability. Which to me means the ultimate enemy isn’t feminism, it’s male disposability, and misandry, and the whole set of attitudes that go along with male disposability and misandry.

Furthermore, let’s say you and I agree that the ultimate problem is male disposability–maybe we don’t, but let’s just pretend that we agree on that, and that this and misandry are the real root problem. Once again, what have we done but said we’re against that? Great, we’re against male disposability. As it happens, I’m willing to bet we’re both also against mass starvation, and bad music, and mass murder, and bad weather, and bad breath. I’m going to go out on a limb and guess that we’re all against those things. But so what?

What are we for exactly? What am I for? Maybe you’re not for all the same things I am, but I think if we don’t say what we’re for, all we’re doing is complaining. If you can’t say what you’re for, only what you’re against, you can only get so far with any kind of activism.

Especially on something like this. What are you going to do, ban feminism? If you believe in free speech, you can’t do that, and what good would it do? Male disposability won’t go away anyway. So if you’re going to be an activist, you have to stake out a position on specific things you’re for. Like, “we’re for the right of men to say ‘I won’t be a father. You’re pregnant? I don’t feel ready to be a father, I want to sign paperwork right now that says I give this child up for adoption, it’s up to you whether or not you have it but I will not be that child’s father.” That is a right men should have. We probably a agree that’s a right men should have, but we ought to be able to say that.

We should be able to say that if you make a proven false allegation of domestic violence you should get a criminal penalty for that. We should be able to call for aolishing debtor’s prison: no more putting men (or women for that matter, to whatever extent it happens) in jail because they can’t make these draconian support payments. We abolished debtor’s prison in this country a long time ago, except for men caught in the family court meatgrinder.

Those are specific things you have to stake out a position on and say “Yes, these are the things we’re for. We’re not just ‘against feminism,’ we’re for changing THIS to THIS.”

Otherwise you don’t have a movement, you’re just complaining.

And image starts to matter. Once you are in the business of trying to persuade the general public to change their perceptions, and to get legislation changed, you are going to have to be prepared to “clean house,” at least a little, and identify people or positions that are anathema to you. You just have to. You cannot have an effective Men’s Rights Movement and have in your ranks someone whose basic position is that feminism is a Jewish plot to undermine white Christian men (and yes, there really are fringe loons who say that, they’re a tiny minority but they exist). I mean, I’m sorry, you just can’t have them as part of your group and have the wider electorate take you seriously. You can’t take someone like a Fred Phelps with his “God Hates Fags” bullshit and let him on the bus with you. (He’s not on our bus, but the point is, you can’t cozy up with such people.) You really have to be able to say “Look, we have a big tent here, we have room for a lot of opinions and ideas, but here’s some things that we’re going to have to show you the door on. You can go do whatever activism you want but you’re not a part of what we’re doing or what we’re about.”

And when someone says to you, “aren’t you just worried about the problems of straight white middle aged men?” you have to really have the power to say NO, WE CARE ABOUT ALL MEN AND BOYS OF ALL RACES, CREEDS, COLORS, ORIENTATIONS, WHATEVER, and be willing to say that loud and clear.

I’m even willing to concede that of the problems men face, they probably affect men of different races more, in the aggregate anyway. At least in the United States, black men probably face a lot of these issues harder than white men do, in the aggregate; there are more fatherless families in the black community than the white community for example, at least the last time I looked at the statistics. But that doesn’t mean that the white or brown family that’s fatherless automatically has it better. The bottom line is that by dividing us up by race, they minimize us. It’s racist, really.

Genital mutilation is not a black vs. white issue. Father’s and children’s rights are not a black versus white issue. The opponents of men’s rights constantly try to divide us up by race, and we need to be able to stop them from doing that.

Not that there are many, but I’ve seen the occasional “men’s rights” guy who’s a racist, and I need to be able to say “sorry, I’m not with you.” We need to be able to do that, I think, if we’re going to persuade people and get away from the stereotypes they make about us. For a movement, we have to be able to say “No, we care about all men and boys of all races, creeds, colors, orientations, whatever,” so we make it clear to others not just what we’re against but what we’re for.

Being “against feminism” is incredibly easy, and in American political terms it’s particularly easy: half of America already views feminism with contempt. You can bash feminists all day in right-wing Republican circles and they’ll give you polite applause or enthusiastic fist pumps. But they embrace chivalry and male disposability. So they’re no more friends to men and boys than the radical feminists are. Plus it just alienates people who might otherwise listen to our message on men’s and boys’ issues.

This is why I fully support efforts to shape a message that is “inclusive,” but I mean inclusive of the sense of “these are the things we care about, and if you care about them and are willing to work on them we want you, as long as you don’t try sneaking in some other bullshit about hating this or that other race or sex or group or whatever."

Me? I want a big tent approach, but I think we do need to still have bouncers at the door, who say, "keep your swastika armbands and your other bullshit out of here."

And we need to be able to identify idiots and moles who aren't for real. I am entirely certain, because I see it all the time on places like A Voice for Men, where someone shows up trying to make an idiot comment–someone who is pretty transparently a radial feminist trying to pretend to be a men's rights actvist–saying some inflammatory bullshit about how all women are bitches who should be men's property or other things like that. They're fake, they aren't real, they're sockpuppets for radfems. And they need to be shown the door. Or even on the off-chance that they're real, they still need to be shown the door.

At least, that's how we do it at A Voice for Men. How you do it on your channel or your own blog sites or whatever, that's up to you.

Still, as the movement has grown, we have seen actual real world results. Various men's and father's activist groups have gotten some things done at the local level that I've seen with my own eyes; a father's rights group in America recently hosted debates between judicial candidates running for family court office. That would be unthinkable 10, even 5 years ago. And while we haven't changed any legislation at the Federal level in the US, we have groups like SAVE who are actively lobbying congress as we speak, actually at least meeting with Senators and Representatives, and while they haven't gotten major legislation passed, they have had an impact on the debates affecting things like the Violence Against Women Act. In other types of politics, just on A Voice for Men we helped get a false accuser named TIffany Marie Smith arrested and helped get two innocent men out of jail, and we've helped publicly identify thugs who used violence and vandalism to try to stop Warren Farrell from speaking and got the men's movement coverage in major newspapers because of it. We embarrassed judges in West Virginia and Maine, we helped efforts to get a prosecutor disbarred in Maine, and more.

Agree with any of those particulars or not, that's activism that has made a measurable difference. Not as big a difference as we'd like, but it IS a difference, and it's momentum we can build on.

So it's my belief that as a growing movement, we need to have internal debates, we need to also be able to step up and say "look, these here are not our values," and also, "look, these here are our values (or are at least consistent with them)."

This is why some of us are working now on a document that among other things spells out some broad consensus items that we think most people in the men's movement probably support. It is not a "manifesto," but it's a list of specific items we think most Men's Rights Advocates probably mostly agree with. The Wooly Bumblebee–who, full disclosure, is a friend–was helpful in a specific campaign we did late last year to contact hundreds of elected officials, and has also helped raise money for A Voice for Men, which definitely is an activist site. She has helped with that document, as have some others. By posting this, I'm inviting everyone reading or listening to have a look at that document and give your comments. I invite you and your viewers to look at it and comment on it.

And that by the way is comments. Looking at the document does not mean you agree with everything in it, or anything in it, or that you've signed onto it, or any of that. Merely, you gave it a look and gave input and thoughts. I invite anyone with an interest to have a look; if you're interested just message me your email address.

I believe we need to at least be able to say, "Look, this group or this person, that isn't me or us or what we stand for," and I also do believe we have to go beyond saying "we're against X, Y, and Z, we're for A, B, an C." I think the more of that we have, the more effective our actual activism can be.

So that invitation is open to anyone who wants in. Just send me a message and say "Sure I'll have a look, here's my email address" and you can have a look.

We need to be able in a movement to say what and who we're for as well as against. On the other hand, in a healthy growing movement, there should always be debate, and if there were always lockstep agreement, that would be a bad sign.

[image]

So anyway, anyone who sends me an email address can have a look. It is not a manifesto, it is not something you must sign onto, it's more of an effort to define not just the things we're against, but what we're generally for.

I think that's enough for now. Feel free to contact me if you're interested in giving feedback on the document. There's nothing secret about it, it's open for scrutiny even from critics.

The original audio of this piece is available on YouTube here. The invitation is open to anyone else who would like to see the document, just drop me a note here and I'll send you an email.–DE

Gaps, damned gaps and statistics

January 8, 2013 | by Jim Muldoon | Link | Original Link

At this present time, Academia is failing men in terms of the courses offered, the methods used and the misandry they promote (Ashfield, 2012), (Nathanson & Young, 2001), (Groth, 2012).

Yet, this incredibly important message is being drowned out by the feminist claims of ever increasing misogyny everywhere. This message now dominates our society not because of its validity, but its volume. Government departments and laws have been set up to pacify the shrill declarations of discrimination and oppression, yet this is not an answer.

The only way these departments can survive, never mind grow, is to find more and more examples of these problems that don't actually exist, thus increasing the volume to a whole new level.

How will history judge us in years to come? Will future scholars look at our laws and the documents of the day, and get an accurate picture of what life was like in 2013 in Western democracies?

Will they imagine that 2013 was a terrible time for women? No matter how they tried for equality, they were continually thwarted by the dominant Patriarchy. Will they actually believe that no matter how the majority, that is all the women aided by those "Good" men, struggled, and no matter what laws were introduced, the Patriarchy ruled supreme?

Will they ever ask: if Partriarchy ruled, why did they allow the governments to pass these laws?

Take, as an example, the hysterical article written by Anne Summer of the Sydney Morning Herald about the supposed pay gap that exists between men and women (Summers, 2013).

Summers tell us "the brutal facts of sex discrimination against women in Australia in 2013". Summers, it seems, got the Workplace Gender Equity Agency (WGEA) media release about the "Graduate gender pay gap blowout" (Workplace Gender Equality Agency 2, 2013).

Summers, like Patrick Lion and Rob Kidd in the Murdoch newspapers (Lion & Kidd, 2013), made the mistake of repeating the WGEA alarmist claims that starting salaries for male university graduates are significantly higher than their female counterparts. They should have checked the source of the statistics.

However, Summers goes in harder than the other newspapers, declaring it "a huge wake-up call", "a national scandal" and an example of "sexism and misogyny at work in Australia today".

She informs us "WGEA has done us a great service in compiling and publishing these figures."

The "service" Dr Carla Harris of WGEA provided was to take the statistics from Graduate Careers Australia (GCA) and re-present them in a manner that suited WGEA's purposes. She claimed this information would "shock" and "outrage" female school leavers contemplating university (Workplace Gender Equality Agency 1, 2013).

GCA was certainly shocked by Harris' use of their statistics. So shocked, in fact, that they felt compelled to make their own media release entitled "'Gender Pay Gap' Claims Disupted" (Graduate Careers Australia, 2013). In it they point out:

> It would therefore be unwise to assume on this evidence [(GCA's statistics)] that there is any sex-based earnings disparity that is necessarily the result of workplace inequality.

They go on to highlight their concern

> …that graduate employers are unfairly being painted as discriminating against new recruits in paying one group less than another, which is highly unlikely to be occurring.

"Never mind the quality, feel the statistic," seems to be the WGEA's motto. It's a bad day when the source of your own statistics is telling you you've got it wrong.

The Herald Sun, to their credit, gave GCA's media release the same coverage that WGEA's ramblings got (AAP, 2013). They quote GCA's Bruce Guthrie

> The researcher in question [Dr Harris] has missed some vital paragraphs in this fairly short document which would have explained a lot of the stuff we have had to clarify.

Yes, in order to highlight the "gender gap blowout", Harris had to ignore the bit that says "…there are many factors that interact to produce observed differences in median starting salaries. (Graduate Careers Australia, 2012)" If she had read the description of the "many factors" she would have found that sex discrimination is not on the list.

Now bear in mind that WGEA is a government body that businesses have to report to concerning their "gender equity" treatment of their employees. Dr Harris is their Research Executive Manager. She will be the one analysing their reports and telling Australia businesses if they are being fair with their workers.

What do you think her conclusions will be?

As Dr. Greg Canning points out, "…policy based on poor analysis of only selected information is bad policy (Canning, 2013)." The damage that these people will do will be significant to Australian businesses and the economy as a whole.

Certainly Summers took the bait and ran with it. And here I feel I must give a warning for some our less robust readers: The following logic might hurt.

Summers cries:

> It amounts to a gender tax, with women making a disproportionate contribution to the national economy. (And that's on top of having the kids and doing most of the housework!)

Even in the WGEA summarised version, there are industries where the starting salaries are lower for men. Are those men paying a "gender tax" too?

Summers also seems to be implying that women contribute more to the economy than men by paying this "gender tax". How?

Summers then makes the "disproportionate contribution" even more confusing by adding:

> It is often pointed out that if Australian women's workforce participation was at the same level as men's (79.7 per in cent instead of 65.3 per cent) it would add around 13 per cent to GDP.

Is Summers suggesting that we take jobs from men and give them to women so that we reach a midway point of, say, 72.5% each? Would this cause a 13% increase in GDP?

Or, is Summers suggesting that employers should be forced to take on more women to bring them to the 79.7% level of men? If so, is she telling us that if women getting paid to do jobs that employers don't actually need done, then GDP will go up?

Or, is Summers predicting that a 13% increase in GDP would happen if the male participation was artificially lowered to 65.3%?

Is any of this because the "gender tax"?

Both Summers and Harris show us that economics and statistics can be really simple if you leave out all of the complexities.

However, in amongst all of this, there is a real gap not being discussed: The proportion of the 2012 graduates surveyed was 25,875 males and 41,738 females.

This ratio of 62% female, 38% male, give or take, has been in the GCA's statistics since 1997 (Graduate Careers Australia, 1999). This is, therefore, not a statistical anomaly, but a well-entrenched systemic bias against men.

This is not limited to Australia. Professor Miles Groth points out that in America, male entrance to colleges is about a similar 40%. More alarmingly, though, Groth points out that the long-term trend for male participation in tertiary education is slowly declining. Since the 1980s, when the "magic" figure of parity, that is 50/50, was reached, the American experience has been a steady decline in male participation in tertiary education.

Consider this statement from WGEA's Dr. Harris:

"'It is very disturbing that men's starting salaries have increased over the past year but those of women have not, especially given that women make up the majority of university graduates."

So Harris is aware of the statistic. That is, she knows that women are the majority of graduates. She shows no concern as to why men are a minority, or whether this situation is worsening.

Her only concern is that there are some statistics that, when looked at in isolation from reality, can be used to support the fiction that men are systematically oppressing women. It is this fiction that created Dr Harris' job.

It is the maintainance of this fiction that not only will keep Harris in a job, but will help writers like Summers keep a high public profile. The more men are hated, reviled and feared; the safer and more profitable Harris' and Summers' jobs will be.

It is precisely these attitudes towards men, according to Groth, that is now making men unwelcome in college campuses around the world.

WGEA inform us that they have changed their name "…the Equal Opportunity for Women in the Workplace Agency has been renamed the Workplace Gender Equality Agency." It seems that the name is the only thing that's changed.

WGEA declares its intention to bring "lasting cultural and structural change" because of the "…undeniable social and economic benefits of gender equality… (Workplace Gender Equality Agency, 2012)"

Clearly WGEA intends to ignore the systemic barriers to male education and the long term economic damage that it will do in its blind charge for what they call equality.

If WGEA has to resort to propaganda because the facts don't line up with the narrative that keeps them in a job, then we can only assume that, in their brave new world, some are going to be a lot more equal than others.

In education, that is already the case.

To those future scholars: I can only hope that there are at least some men among you.

Information means power

January 8, 2013 | by Lucian Vâlsan | Link | Original Link

At the end of November 2012, I wrote a greeting letter to the readers of Férfihang – Antifeminista Férfimagazin, which literally means "A Voice for Men – An anti-feminist men's magazine". They published it right away and the feedback was great[1].

But moving on beyond the excitement of the moment, there is a problem that exists in a lot of MRAs and, in most cases, it's not even their fault but rather human nature.

There are still a lot of people that fail to realize that the lack of compassion for men and boys and the ever increasing state-sponsored misandry is a global phenomenon. It doesn't happen only in the US, or Canada, or Hungary, or India or any other country.

Granted, in some countries the situation is worse than in others. Even Saudi Arabia has plenty of misandry issues. One should not forget that Saudi Arabia is building a new city with special provisions and affirmative action for women that want to work[2].

Both my article in Férfihang and the article written by our fellow colleague Anil Sharma[3] have been greeted with reactions like this:

> Holy shit. I didn't think misandry could be any worse than it is in the west.

A Hungarian reader of Férfihang said this, after reading my greeting letter:

> I had no idea that Romania had a problem with feminism.

This is almost a pattern. This kind of attitude coming from blue pill people would not be surprising. But the fact that this comes from people that see through the lies and the manipulations of the feminists and the wide acceptance of misandry, means that it's sill not clear enough that male disposability, female favoring laws and culture, as well as constant pushing for more institutionalized and/or state-sponsored misandry is not a 'western problem' or a 'first world problem'. This is a global problem.

The more people understand that, the more effective the addressing of the problem becomes.

I live at 250 kilometers (155 miles) to the Hungarian border and 450 km (280 miles) away from Budapest. And, despite that, I know more about misandry issues in Hungary than some Hungarians MRAs whilst some Hungarians have no clue about the inherent misandry in most EU legislation (albeit Hungary joined the EU earlier than Romania) and have no clue about the misandry in Romania, despite the fact that there are Hungarian ethnics born in Romania who've written about these issues in Hungarian (thus removing the language barrier).

The most developed Men's Rights organizations are in India. And it's understandable. But some people in the MRM aren't still fully aware of the extent to which the sexual apartheid goes there. And that includes me.

Since it includes me too, it is clear that there is no underlying, targeted criticism in here.

No, this is a call for accelerating the accumulation of knowledge. And this is necessary for each individual that has taken the red pill. Each and every time you hear around you that, let's say: "Indonesia is a patriarchal society" – remind them that a patriarchal society does not allow women-only trains paid by the taxpayers[4]. Also, a patriarchal society would not allow for women to earn 29% more than a man on average in constructions, or 20% more than their male counterparts in fishing[5].

In Philippine, the country that organizes mass male genital mutilation conferences in order to establish new world records[6], men earn 46% less than women in constructions[7].

These are only a few undeniable facts that people are hardly aware of. And despite those facts, we're constantly being told half of the story and, apparently, it works even on some of the people that have taken the red pill.

Taking the red pill is not enough. Constant self-education, pursuit of truth and global view of the issues are essential both in activism and in individual life.

Debate: Is feminism hate?

January 9, 2013 | by Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) | Link | Original Link

Several months ago, A Voice for Men attempted to have a civil debate on the simple question, 'Has Feminism Gone Too Far?'. A woman calling herself a feminist was brave enough to propose the debate, but then after vicious personal attacks by Katie J.M. Baker and other feminists at places like at Jezebel.com, this woman claimed she was receiving threats and withdrawing because of same–first claiming that MRAs had threatened her, but later admitting that it was in fact her fellow feminists who were doing the threatening. Quelle surprise!

There were various efforts to hold the debate anyway, although mysteriously the sponsors of the debate kept withdrawing for obscure reasons. Finally, a few weeks ago, Eric Duckman of Men's Rights Edmonton posted a debate challenge online, but changing the question to one a bit more provocative, but seemingly fitting in the wake of the threats and harassment and continuing mysterious withdrawals:

Is Feminism Hate?

Notice that Eric was even polite and said he didn't think all feminists were hateful. So much for the venom-spewing violent MRAs, right? Anyway, one young woman had the integrity to try to answer the question, and did so in a civil manner, as seen here:

Although it's disappointing that she starts out by claiming she will say no more, at least she put a response out. So I added my own response. It's a bit lengthier:

Here is a transcript of my rather lengthy remarks which some of you might enjoy. It is also posted on my own blog, Owning Your Shit, where part 2 of my response will also eventually be posted. Enjoy!

Hi, everyone, and hello Danielle Paradis. I just wanted to take a moment to thank you for responding to Eric Duckman's challenge to debate him and myself as far as the question of whether feminism is hate. You seem like a really nice person, you seem really sincere and well-meaning, and I don't want you to think of this as a personal attack on you, because frankly, you just seem very nice.

But, there are a few things.

First, you open your video with the quote that everyone is entitled to his own opinion, but not his own facts, and then you went on to say that you would, as a feminist, add "or her" to that quote. I agree. One of the reasons I do is that the primary architects of feminist theory–things like The Patriarchy, Rape Culture and the Patriarchal Terrorism Paradigm of family violence–those architects were primarily women, and they seemed to feel entitled to their own facts, or to something I'll call "selective facts". Given that, adding "or her"? That's a really good idea.

I would also agree with your assertion that a person would be hard-pressed to find any feminist who does not believe that women “have historically gotten the short end of the stick”, that is, that women were historically uniformly oppressed by their gender, and men historically uniformly privileged relative to them.

So that’s two things we can agree on, right off the bat. I don’t think there’s going to be a whole lot more that we’re going to agree on, but at least there’s that.

Now, I wasn’t really surprised at how brief your video was. I mean, all it contained was typical feminist talking points framed as axiomatic, self-evident truths, the veracity of which you seem to feel no need to defend or substantiate. You just state them, and assume that any person would agree with both their accuracy, and the conclusions you believe they support.

Myself, on the other hand, well, I don’t have 100 years of political activism and media representation of my position to fall back on, nor 50 years of the institutionalization of my viewpoints within schools from Kindergarten to university. So this response is going to be too long for one video. Because, you know, unlike feminists, I don’t have the luxury of simply making a bald statement, and then moving on to the next one, without providing rational and empirical support for it. Without actually presenting an argument behind it. See, you can get away with saying, “X is X,” without saying, “…because A, B, C.” I can’t get away with that because my viewpoint isn’t the one that’s been swallowed hook, line and sinker by most of society.

So, in this video, I’m just going to address the first few points you made, and I’m going to have to leave the other points for other videos, because otherwise this is just going to run really long. What I’m going to try to do in this video is explain some of the reasons I believe feminism is wrong. Wrong about the power dynamics that underpin society (historically and today), and wrong about men’s and women’s relative positions in society (historically and today). Hopefully we will then be on our way to demonstrating why I believe feminism is based on hate.

Now, right off the bat, you launch into what is one of the most predictable feminist rebuttals to anything anti-feminism that exists: the question of voter rights. You claim initially that denying a person the vote places them in the position of a second class citizen, that not giving them a say over decisions that will affect them is subjugation, and because this was denied to women, it’s subjugation based on gender. If this is the case, then ALL but a tiny percentage of men were in the exact same boat as all women were, through most of human history. In fact, the amount of time between universal male suffrage and female suffrage in the west amounted to a paltry one half of one percent or so of recorded human history.

So under your reasoning, all men but those in charge (under a monarchy) or the most wealthy (following democracy but before universal male suffrage) were also subjugated by their governments in the exact same way women were.

Now, if that government was headed by a woman, would those men have been subjugated based on their gender? I find it really problematic to assume that because a man is in charge or because a woman is in charge, that that person in charge is not going to care about the opposite sex. This is an absurd argument. It doesn't hold water.

On the other hand, even men with no say whatsoever, men who were subjugated by their governments by being denied the vote, bore a greater and more costly obligation and burden of responsibility to their communities and governments, and even to their families, than women did.
