It's foolish to even entertain the question of "who had the shorter end of the stick?", during a period of history when men and women had very different sticks to carry, and when there was little to no option for anyone to choose a different stick. The end of the stick that men got may indeed have been longer than the ends of women's sticks, but the stick itself was heavier and more difficult to lift, by a long shot. And while I know feminism is largely anti-science, I can demonstrate that through a simple, biological argument.

When the conditions two animals are subjected to over an extended period of their evolution are very different, one of the easiest ways to determine who had things harder or more onerous is to look at what biology has to tell us. If we look at monogamous primates like marmosets, males and females live nearly identical lives. The only real difference between male and female roles in that species is that females gestate, give birth and lactate, and males don't. Males do, however, collect food, nurture and supervise the young, and are chosen as suitable mates by females based on how well they perform the exact same tasks performed by females. In fact, if you want to get right down to it, marmoset females choose males based on how good those males are at mothering.

And when you look at male and female marmosets, you can't really tell them apart–they're the same size and have the same muscle mass and density. Other than their reproductive organs, they're basically interchangeable, because they do all the same stuff, and they've done all the same stuff for a very long time. They are gender-egalitarians.

Now look at humans. Men have stronger skeletons, higher muscle mass, stronger muscles even controlling for mass, and more red corpuscles by blood volume, than women do. Would these differences exist if women's roles through history were remotely as strenuous, onerous or dangerous as men's? If natural selection pressures on women had been as severe and rigorous as those placed on men?

What our sexual dimorphism tells us is that men had to be capable of doing physically harder and more dangerous tasks than women did, consistently, all through our history as human beings, and that women were not subjected to this kind of pressure. If they had, they'd have evolved to be a lot more burly.

And what I find really interesting is that very little of that strenuous, dangerous work that men did was actually necessary to the survival of individual men.

I mean think about it for a minute–how much more work would it be to provide for a family than only oneself? I could tell you a thing or two about that–if the only person I had to take care of was me, I could live like a queen on a waitress's pay. I'd never have to put off buying something I wanted just because the people dependent on me would rather eat dinner tonight than see me in a new pair of shoes.

How much more work would it have been for a man way back when to provide for a wife less productive than he was, and several even less productive children, than to only provide for himself? How much less safe was he if he chose to protect a woman smaller and weaker than himself, who was often vulnerable due to pregnancy and childbed, and several vulnerable children, than if he was the only person he was responsible for keeping safe?

If men had not been prepared to willingly take on those burdens in order to spare women from them, guess what, Danielle? Women would have sturdier skeletons and bigger muscles than they do, because they'd have had to evolve those things in order to survive. I honestly don't know how it was that more men didn't do what the Buddha did, and just walk away from those burdens–I mean, that guy sure had more time to think about stuff and ponder the nature of the universe, sleep in and get himself fat as fuck once he didn't have a wife and kid to look after.

To further illustrate how men can enjoy higher status than women while simultaneously having more burdensome and difficult lives–you know, getting the shorter end of the stick, the worse deal, all that–let's look at an extreme case of a staunchly and severely patriarchal society–something relatively unheard of in hunter-gatherer cultures: The Inuit.

Now in most hunter-gatherer societies, gender roles are just as differentiated as in any traditional society. BUT, male and female roles usually commanded similar levels of social status, respect and admiration. This was not the case with the Inuit.

But one of the really striking ways in which Inuit societies differed from other hunter-gatherer societies was that in most hunter-gatherer societies, men and women brought in roughly the same amount of food–in fact, sometimes women brought in the larger share. Women may not have become dominant, or have higher status than men, because they weren't expected to risk their lives to bring in the food that they brought in, the way men were expected to in the act of hunting. But the Inuit were very different. Not only did men bring in more than 95% of all the food, they did so at extreme risk to their lives and health, under conditions more severe than the conditions almost anywhere else on earth.

Rates of injury and premature death by injury among Inuit men of the past were horrendous. I mean, here are a bunch of guys who were expected to go out in a damn kayak in -40 weather, and chuck spears at whales 200 times their size, or go out on treacherous ice that if you fell through it meant almost certain death to hunt seals, in order to bring home tons more meat than they could possibly eat by themselves, and share that meat with the women and children who got to stay home, safe and sound.

Now I'm wondering what you think would have happened if you'd convinced those men that their wives needed them like fish need bicycles. What would have been the result for women? What if you'd told those men that this woman and these children are not yours, they don't belong to you, therefore you don't have any right to dictate to them and neither do you have any responsibility to take care of them? Or if you'd said that women are every bit as capable as men, and they're men's equals in every way that mattered?

What if you'd actually convinced those men of all that? Heck, what if you'd actually convinced Inuit men that women's work was just as important and prestigious as men's work? You think maybe a lot of men might have taken up sewing?

You know, those men who could, if they wanted to, just go off on their own, club a baby seal every month or two, and do just fine, since chewing pelts into fur and stitching them into clothes isn't that hard, and they'd have plenty of free time to do it without all those extra mouths to feed?

Do you think maybe those men would have chosen not to risk and sacrifice like Inuit men did, if all they got was the same rewards and status as Inuit women? Do you really think those men would have, or should be expected to, risk and sacrifice the way Inuit men did, for the same rewards and status as Inuit women? Do you think Or would they have said, "Hey, she's my equal, and she's her own person, and her kids don't belong to me either. Let her get her own food." Because you know what? That's exactly what I would have said, if someone had convinced me of all of that.

I mean, hasn't it ever occurred to you feminists that the most extreme patriarchies occur in the harshest living conditions?

Do you think those women would have been better off–you know, less oppressed–by being seen as equal to their men–equal and therefore in no need of men's provision or protection? You ever wonder what it might have been like to be a pregnant Inuit woman, out on the ice trying to find a seal to jab a stick in so she could eat? You ever think that maybe, just maybe, she might have been perfectly happy to trade something valuable in order to secure the cooperation and support that imposed such hideous costs and risks on him? That her survival in that environment was so dependent on him risking life and limb every time he went out, that she might have thought social status and personal autonomy were really small prices to pay in exchange for what it cost him to give her what she needed?

You ever wonder if marriage wasn't a way to force women to become slaves to men, and bear men's children and provide them with free domestic services, the way so many second-wave feminists portrayed it, but a way to force men to become slaves to women, to support women's children and provide provisioning and protection services to women? You ever wonder if just maybe it was BOTH?

OMG, I think I just blew my own mind…

You never stopped to wonder why the very idea of feminism only occurred to women when economic, political and technological development finally meant that trading places with men would mean trading UP instead of down? That idea probably goes a long way to explaining why feminism originated among the wealthiest and most privileged women first, dontcha think? I mean, even Mary Wollstonecraft was honest enough to call women's privilege exactly that in her claims that it should be eliminated. And I just don't get why she wasn't more popular among the working class women who depended on that privilege for their survival!

I don't know if you realize this, Danielle (being feminist and therefore anti-science as you are), but male provisioning and protection of females and young is a gift and a luxury that few females of any sexually dimorphic species have ever enjoyed. Just ask a female Bonobo, who gets to trade sex with every unrelated male in her community in return for foraging rights and male ambivalence toward her offspring–not for actual food or for assistance in caring for offspring, but for the right to do her own foraging in an area a male might actually prefer to have for himself, and the right to not have her offspring fall victim to competitive infanticide by a male who would rather she produce his kids than his brother's.

Because that's the way most of nature works, Danielle, and it isn't the way human society has worked for a very long time.

One of the reasons human women have been able to remain significantly weaker than men is because men were consistently subjected to more extreme and demanding conditions than women, all through history. And one of the reasons we don't have more in common with Bonobos–why we've become the most dominant and intelligent species on the planet, in fact–is because women and children benefitted from men doing that, from being subjected to those conditions. Because men, unlike Bonobo males, were actually willing to share the benefits and rewards of their harsher survival conditions with women and children, because women, unlike Bonobo females, were willing to individually trade something valuable in return for an individual man's investment.

And I know, the whole thing is so cold and uncivilized. Those Inuit men should have been willing to harpoon whales from a kayak and share the meat with women and children, and give their lives to protect women and children, without any expectation of any extra anything. They should have been willing to do it "Just because". For nothing. THAT would have been "fair" to everyone. It was "oppression" of women that Inuit men were granted higher social status, more respect and a few extra rights in exchange for doing a ton of really difficult shit they didn't need to do for themselves, but did anyway because women and children needed them to. And it was really "unfair" that women weren't given power in those societies, because hey, the one who doesn't have to risk anything, pay anything, or go out on the ice, should be given an EQUAL say in decisions that affect everyone in the community.

And you know, I think it's perhaps that feminist framing–the duty of a man to share his labor with women, to put himself between danger and women, to risk and pay for the benefit of women during a history where the risks and burdens of doing that were so very high (which is why women couldn't be expected to bear them)…that's oppression of women simply because men weren't willing to do it for nothing. I think that was the first red flag I had that feminism is based on sexism and hate. Because you kind of have to hate someone if you're going to tell him that his kind have oppressed women all through history by doing what was necessary–including dying–to keep women safe, sheltered and fed. You kind of have to hate someone to claim that the old system only existed to benefit men at the expense of women's enslavement, when that system is the only reason that women are still around, that women are not like the Bonobos. And it's definitely hate to say that women were not complicit in this system, that they have no responsibility for things working the way they did.But feminists do this all the time.

Like Hilary Clinton once said (and yeah, I'm paraphrasing), men have never been the primary victims of their own deaths in war. It's the women who are stuck still alive and raising the kids alone who are the primary victims of men's deaths.

If I claimed that a woman's husband was the primary victim of her death because he's left alive to look after the children alone, you'd call me a misogynist. And you'd be right.

And I know, it's not the same, because women have always had the short end of the stick, right? They've only gotten out of society what they were required to put into it, and that meant that they got less, and that's unfair. That verse in the Bible about women being obedient to their husbands if they wanted to stay on the right side of the man upstairs, that's unfair gender roles. But the several verses that admonished men that they were 100% responsible for the survival of their wives, their children, their widowed mothers, their unmarried sisters, and any other extended family members who could not be self-sufficient, if he wanted god to approve of him. NO! None of that was unfair. None of that was gender-biased. The Bible was only unfair to women.

All men got was power. Just power. Cookies for having a penis, no other qualifications required.

You know, for three years I was the only thing keeping myself and three children alive and fed and with a roof over our heads and all of that. And you know what? It fucking sucks. Even now, even today, even in this easy world, it fucking sucks. And it would have sucked even more if this was still an era of manual labor and zero workplace standards, the way things were when men were expected to take on the burden of providing for women and children under The EEEVIL Patriarchy.

But anyway, let's get back to the vote, and how not having a say over decisions that affect you is subjugation.

As an aside, there's currently a campaign to lower the voting age in Canada to 16. Do you believe that Canadians between the ages of 16 and 18 are subjugated, Danielle? Do you support those efforts? If not, why not? How about Canadians under 16? Are they subjugated? Would you support efforts to expand the franchise to 14? Or 12?

Do you assume that because children aren't allowed to vote, that the government has no interest in their wellbeing, you know, their safety, happiness and wellbeing? Do you even imagine that being true?

Regardless of that, the history of the expansion of suffrage is a lot more complex and nuanced than most feminists would lead you to believe. For instance, up until shortly before women's suffrage in the US, the system was not one of secret ballots. Because ballots were public in the early years of universal male suffrage, there had been numerous cases of employers coercing their male employees to vote the way they wanted, and there were real concerns about something similar occurring between husbands and wives, or fathers and daughters. There was a lot of worry that giving women the vote would be the equivalent of giving some unscrupulous men two votes.

On the other hand, if you look at a lot of political campaign propaganda from that time, you'll see a fair amount of "Ladies, tell your men to vote for soandso!" and a lot of stuff like that. I can't imagine with the comparatively minuscule campaign budgets they had back then, and the cost of paper and ink, that anyone would have wasted the resources to print posters like that unless women were seen as fully capable of influencing, or even controlling, their husbands' votes.

And I'm pretty sure you're not aware that some of the most famous suffragette leaders–such as Emmiline Pankhurst in the UK–weren't campaigning for universal female suffrage. What Pankhurst was after was "ten pound suffrage" for wealthy women, and the rest of the ladies of the UK could go fly a kite. How very noble.

It might also interest you to know that in 1917 at the height of WWI, when the US government began sentencing draft dodgers to death, a group of activists brought a constitutional challenge of military conscription. In the Supreme Court's ruling on that challenge, it stated:

"It may not be doubted that the very conception of a just government and its duty to the citizen includes the reciprocal obligation of the citizen to render military service in case of need, and the right to compel it."

So, the draft was ruled constitutionally sound and allowed to continue, because it was considered to be the reciprocal obligation of citizens in return for the rights of citizenship granted by government. Indeed, it was largely because of the huge sacrifice of men during the American civil war (some of them draftees) that led to men being offered universal suffrage in the US in the first place–it was deemed unfair to order a man to die for a country in which he had no say. It was felt that if men have an obligation–social or legal–to go to their deaths to protect society, they should really be allowed a say in what kind of society they were expected to protect. I have a hard time arguing with that kind of logic.

So maybe you can tell me, what did women owe society, what kinds of burdens and sacrifices were they expected to take on if necessary, often by force? Was it anything remotely on the scale of putting on a uniform and charging into enemy bayonets? Was it? Really?

In fact, a LOT of women opposed women's suffrage in the late 1800s and early 1900s–so many and so vehemently that it was pretty much the same afternoon that their opposition was overwhelmed by a general consensus among women that they did want the vote, that women actually got it. Why would any woman oppose women's suffrage, you might be wondering. Well, because citizenship rights and citizenship obligations had always gone hand in hand for men, and many anti-suffragette women were worried that might apply to women, too.

Oh, anti-suffragette women, you so crazy. Didn't you realize? Women get all kinds of shit without having to pay for it, not only on ladies' night.

Needless to say, the vast majority of men who fought and died in the Civil war, whether draftees or volunteers, didn't have the vote. The American men who were still alive after that war were given the vote as payment for past sacrifices, and in anticipation of future ones.You might also be unaware that at the time when that constitutional challenge to the draft failed, the voting age for men in the US was 21, but the age at which they became eligible for the draft was 18 1/2. The same goes for every US war for which there has been a draft, up until public pressure was placed on the US government over wounded veterans returning from Viet Nam without the right to vote–how embarrassing for everyone! Only at that point was the voting age lowered to 18.

Now I wonder how subjugated a 19 year old boy might have felt, bleeding to death on a WWI battlefield without the right to vote? I also wonder what that boy might have thought about the women campaigning for female suffrage safe at home, at the very same moment he was dying at the behest of his government, without franchise? And I wonder if he would have felt more or less subjugated, had he been drafted, or had one of those suffrage-crazy ladies shamed him into enlisting by handing him a white feather?

In Canada, 125,000 men were conscripted in WWI, 25,000 of whom were sent to the front lines of a war that killed 10 million men on all sides. Talk about the short end of the stick–ten million short ends of ten million sticks, to be precise. Our government was a little more sensible than those in other countries, and alongside the conscription legislation it enacted in 1917, it passed a law giving voting rights to all those currently serving in the military or who had served, even if they were under 21.

Good job, Canada! And while you, Danielle, are technically correct that women were given the vote in 1917, that vote was only given to military women, or to women acting as proxies for male relatives fighting overseas.

So even in Canada, military service was tied to the expansion of voter rights. 2000 military nurses (none of them drafted, mind you, but all of them admirable in their voluntary service and the sacrifices required for it) became some of the first women with the right to vote in Canada. The rest of us had to wait a whole ‘nother year.

By 1920 and 1918 respectively, the governments of the US and Canada had extended suffrage to all white female citizens of voting age, despite women being subject to neither conscription, nor the social expectation, to sacrifice their lives in the service of their countries’ decisions.

A second draft occurred in Canada during WWII, and conscription became a norm in the US in 1948, with the Selective Service Act (which remains in force today). Between 1950 and 1953, 1.5 million American men were drafted. Any of them between 18 and 21 would not have had the vote, even though their government was able to coerce them to serve.

In several modern, democratic nations, such as Norway and South Korea, military service remains a mandatory obligation of the citizen. Well, if that citizen is a man.

And what price did women have to pay, in terms of a citizen’s obligation to government, to purchase their right to vote? None, you say? Oh yeah, that’s right, only men had to purchase their citizenship rights–women just had to finally agree with each other that they wanted them, and then ask.

And in light of that, you know what’s really awesome? Men have, at times, though not always, been exempt during a draft if they were married or had children, because drafting a husband or father was considered an unfair hardship to women and children, and was to be avoided if possible. One of the few ways a man could avoid his obligation to society–to die–was if a woman or child would have to help him pay that price. Yep, society sure was interested in giving women the short end of the stick, all right.

I also find it kind of amusing that you mentioned female suffrage in Kuwait. I'm sure you did that because OMG, 2005, right? However, Kuwait's status as a democracy has been consistently inconsistent since 1920, heck, even since their independence in the early 1960s. Moreover, after a very quick and cursory look at the information on that country, I learned that only Kuwaiti citizens are allowed to vote, and the majority of residents of Kuwait–you know, those who'd be affected by the decisions of the Kuwaiti government–are not technically citizens. Even naturalized citizens have to wait for 30 years before being eligible to vote.

Wow. That's a LOT of subjugation, about half of which is going to be male, but you only seem concerned with women, so of course you didn't bother to read further.

Hey, I have an idea–I think I'll read further and see if Kuwait employs conscription….

Wow, what do you know? It does! Kuwaiti men who are citizens are inductable at age 18, and oh my goodness, wouldn't you know it? The voting age in Kuwait is 21. So Kuwaiti men and only Kuwaiti men, can be coerced into giving their lives for a government they have no say over. How very…well, I can't exactly say it's shocking, now can I?

Interesting as well, is that the vote in Kuwait is actively denied to men currently serving in the military. That's right, you heard me. The very people who are risking their lives (by choice or against their consent) based on their government's decisions are explicitly denied a say in those decisions. How's that for subjugation?

Also interestingly, Bedouin volunteers in the Kuwaiti military often enlist because of promises that military service may result in citizenship, and the right to vote. I think this is what's called "pay before you play," and it seems to be what men have had to do right from the get-go.

I suppose what I'm trying to say with all of this conscription/political franchise talk is that the franchise, in its earliest days, was connected to military service. Even the very first women allowed to vote in Canada were given the vote in return for their own military service, or on behalf of their male relatives who were serving.

No, if it's your position that a person is subjugated by having no say over decisions that affect them, then it was men who could be required by their governments to die who would have been more subjugated than any woman by being denied the vote. The draft is a particular decision of government that has NEVER affected women as directly as it has men, and it only stands to reason that in countries where a legal or social obligation to put one's life on the line for the benefit of government or fellow citizens exists, that decision was considered important enough for those directly affected by it to be the first to be given a say. Eventually. Once a whole bunch of them had already died.

I also wonder if you might have considered the inverse of this equation as it stands now–that women today have a say in the decisions of government– a greater collective say than men in many countries, due to sheer numbers. In any country with universal suffrage and male-only conscription, the female electorate as a unified bloc could conceivably unilaterally make the decision to send unwilling men, and only unwilling men, to their deaths. That's quite the moral hazard, when you think about it.

I'm sure you and your feminist sisters are going to get right on rectifying that–either by actively and tirelessly demanding an end to conscription and selective service in countries where they exist, or by vigorously campaigning to include women.

I mean, you feminists want equality, right? And inclusivity! Or do you only want those things in areas of choice and rights, and not in areas of obligation, expectation, responsibility and government coercion?

So, to reiterate:

Yes, though I believe that all feminists (and most mainstreamers, for that matter) honestly feel that women were historically second class citizens, things are a lot more complicated than that. Women may have been considered different citizens than men, but it's dishonest to use a term like "second-class". That term doesn't address the exemptions from the burdens and obligations of male citizenship that women enjoyed historically, and still enjoy today, or any of the entitlements they received through the enforcement of male gender roles.

The bulk of the "extras and bonuses" that men received–in legal rights and social status–were a result of the greater obligations they had to society, the higher price they were expected to pay in terms of protecting and providing for people other than themselves–especially women and children–and the fact that they were held socially and even legally accountable for other people's survival and wellbeing. None of these burdens were ones women were ever expected to carry. They were burdens women were entitled to expect of others, and they still are, and they would have enjoyed no such entitlement in the much harsher past had they been seen as the equals of men.

So when feminists insist that women got the short end of the stick compared to men, they're only telling half the story. And half-truths are more dangerous by far than lies, because they're easier for people to swallow–so easy, very few people have ever asked you feminists to support your own conclusions by addressing all the facts in the entire context, and not just the facts you cherry-pick.

My next video will address your contention that feminism isn't as powerful as the men's movement thinks it is, and in anticipation of that I want you to ponder this quote from Warren Farrell: "Men's greatest weakness is their facade of strength, and women's greatest strength is their facade of weakness."

And, if you're still listening, Danielle, if I haven't made you slam your computer shut in a huff, I guess I'll see you again in a few days when I post my next video.

Pussy pass is above the law

January 9, 2013 | by Lucian Vâlsan | Link | Original Link

Usually, the lenience of prosecutors and judges when it comes to female criminals goes to the extent of granting minimal accountability for criminal acts but still, within the boundaries of the law. Although this is already bad, sometimes the pussy pass goes even further and ignores the law altogether.

On January 1 2013, a young woman from Brașov, Romania, went straight to the General County Inspectorate of Police (IPJ) from Brașov to file a rape charge, claiming that a 24 year old man, also from Brașov, forced her to have sex with him on New Year's Night.[1]

So, the Police from the No. 3 Station in Drăguș, where the alleged rapist was at the time, proceeded to arrest him and began conducting the investigation.

The press communication on the issue by the County Inspectorate reads as follows[2]:

> Following the investigations[…], there is no doubt that the accuser had a long term relationship and was living in concubinage with the accused. Also, on December 29, the accuser, the accused and several common friends have rented the venue from Drăguș in order to spend the New Year night there. Following an argument with her concubine, an argument based on jealousy on her behalf, she proceeded in the morning of January 1, 2013 to leave the venue and file rape charges on IPJ Brașov.

Long story short, there was no rape. She sought vengeance against her lover for disagreeing with her and thus she made up a rape story.

The Police released the guy on January 2. He is lucky because he isn't married to her and she was living in his house. So he can now throw her out. However, the Police were informed that filing a false allegation is still illegal in Romania. So they responded by giving her a 200 RON fine. That's almost 60 US dollars or 45 euros. A slap on the wrist.

I said filing a false criminal allegation is still illegal in Romania because the new Criminal Code no longer incriminates the action of filing a false criminal allegation. In other words, a victim of a false allegation can only seek civil reparations.

However, the new Criminal Code isn't in effect, yet. It still needs to be voted by the Parliament. The provisions of the current Criminal Code apply.

The 'old' Criminal Code, by which the Police should have judged in this instance, says, in Article 259[3]:

> (1) Lying when filing a criminal charge claiming that a person committed a crime which in fact did not happen is punishable by 6 months to three years in prison.

> (2) Manufacturing false evidence to support a false allegation is punishable by one year to 5 years in prison.
>
> (3) If the one making false allegations admits that the allegations are false prior to the moment when a court appearance is made, the punishment can be reduced according to the Article 76.

Article 76 is the one dealing with mitigating circumstances and it's the article that it's constantly abused by police and the judges when it comes to female offenders. Article 76 reads as follows[4]:

> The effects of the mitigating circumstances:
>
> (1) In the case where there are mitigating circumstances to be taken into account, the main sentence for the defendant can be reduced or change under the following conditions:
>
> a) when the minimum of the prison sentence is 10 years or higher, the punishment can go under this minimum, but not lower than 3 years of imprisonment; […]
>
> d) when the minimum of the prison sentence is one year or higher, the punishment can go under this minimum, but not lower than one month;
>
> e) when the minimum of the prison sentence is three months or higher, the punishment can go under this minimum down to one month or a criminal fine can be applied, but not lower than 250 RON.

What this 18 year old young woman did was in violation of Article 259, line (1) from the Criminal Code. She did not declare that the allegation was false (as the communicate from the police tells us), therefore granting her mitigating circumstances was illegal.

But even if we were to presume that she admitted to lying, under article 259, line (3), the provisions of the Article 76, letter e) apply to her, which means she should have received a 250 RON criminal fine and up to six months in jail. Instead, she was assessed 200 RON as an administrative fine.

The difference between criminal fine and administrative fine is simple: An administrative fine is just like a parking fine. In some cases, you can get away completely without even paying it. The criminal fine is placed on your criminal record and cannot be removed from there until two years after the maximum amount of prison time you could've got for the crime – which is, in this case, 5 years.

Having a criminal record means little to no chances of getting employment, little no chances of receiving meaningful welfare and if the police are having a zealous day, you might not even be able to leave the country. Romania, like the UK, still has its borders in place and they do check your papers when going in or out of the country.

The difference between a 200 RON and a 250 RON fine is meaningless. But the fact that she got away only with a minor fine (after all, crossing the street when the red light is on is punishable by 150 RON fine) is sending the wrong message: That filing false rape charges is a minor thing, just like crossing the street when the red light is on when you're in a hurry or parking in the wrong spot because you didn't see the 'no parking' symbol.

Once the new Criminal Code is in effect there will be no risk whatsoever for filing false rape charges. So is it any wonder that no sane person can believe the officials anymore when they say that the false rape allegations are rare?

This guy was lucky because the alleged rape happened at a party with a lot of friends around who stated that he could not have raped her without them seeing, even if he wanted to. However, most victims of false rape allegations aren't that lucky, and usually end up having their lives screwed. To make things worse, those that end up being convicted based on false allegations get no reconciliation whatsoever, unless they die – like in the case of Marcel Țundrea[5].

[1] http://www.bzb.ro/index.php?page_name=stire_detalii&id_stire=80146

[2] http://www.realitatea.net/a-vrut-sa-se-razbune-pe-iubitul-ei-dar-s-a-ales-cu-o-amenda_1085613.html

[3] http://www.anp-just.ro/interna/Codul%20Penal.pdf – Criminal Code of Romania (Page 78)

[4] op cit Criminal Code – page 27

[5] http://www.nineoclock.ro/marcel-tundrea-case-justice-after-almost-20-years/

Feature Image: Roger O Thornhill

Dawn Raid music – now that's entertainment!

January 9, 2013 | by Andy Thomas | Link | Original Link

We already know the answer to the following question. When is it OK to celebrate gratuitous sexual violence, mutilation and torture? When the victim is male, of course, and the topic of Lorena Bobbitt's sexual mutilation of her sleeping husband has been dealt with previously by Peter Lloyd and John the Other.

What I want to do here, however, is to expose the repugnant prejudice masquerading as morality in the form of Dawn Raid Entertainment, the music label behind Aaradhna's new song "Lorena Bobbitt".

Here's a screen-grab and a link to the official video on YouTube:

Aaradhna – Lorena Bobbitt (Official Music Video)

In this, Aaradhna is the archetypal "woman scorned" taking out what is presented as a justifiable revenge for some perceived infidelity. The horrific suffering that would ensue in reality, and indeed did for Lorena Bobbitt's husband, is skipped over and the video ends with the heroic Aaradhna being driven away in the back of police car.

Bullshit!

The reality is that this is nothing other a portrayal of a sadistic and psychotic woman inflicting sexually motivated domestic violence on a helpless man. And society's moral acceptance of this must be brought to book.

In history, past persecutions of identifiably separate groups were always seen as morally acceptable during the time it was happening. This is what allowed such things to happen. In Nazi Germany, the eradication of the Jewish Problem was seen by many as righteous, and in earlier times, slave plantation owners attended church and preached God.

Today, men are seen as the problem. They are protrayed in the media as lacking in unique personality, and their only human worth is that which can be achieved in relation to a woman. It is, therefore, possible to depict their suffering as, not only acceptable, but as morally just. We are on the edge of an abyss with this. At the time of writing, the top comment on the official Aaradhna "Lorena Bobbitt" music video was that by female poster calling herself "856MiiSsiinqYhUuJaZz", and reads:

> To all them unfaithful men out there! This is what yous are gonna get > hah! Loveeee this, Aaradhna your amazing!!

I would, therefore, like to take this opportunity to personally remind Aaradhnaben Jayantilal Patel (aka ” Aaradhna”), Dawn Raid Entertainment and, indeed, the whole fucking world, that men and boys are unique human beings, with feelings, capable of both suffering and independent thought. They are not the property of women such as Lorena Bobbitt or entitled princesses such as Miss 856-whatever.

They are, in fact, free to associate and have sexual relationships with whomever they so choose, and should be able to do so without fear of grotesque sexually motivated violence. Any woman who feels that she is entitled to enact this kind of sadism and violence, simply because she feels unhappy with her relationship, is nothing but a depraved monster, and should be seen as such.

Questions, questions, questions….

January 9, 2013 | by Stephen O'Brian | Link | Original Link

Around this time of year I'm usually on vacation. One of my favorite things to do when I have spare time such as this is to muse. To mull. To cogitate. In other words to question. Here in no particular order are questions which are 'bubbling up to the surface'.

I offer them as they pertain to men's lives and answers may benefit not just myself, but MRAs in general.

Women in western nations live on average about 6 – 7 years longer than men. As a result women get an old age pension for many years more than men. Wouldn't it be fair then for both men and women to get a pension for the last 10 years of their respective average lifespans instead? If not, Why not?

Women are graduating in many more numbers than men from western universities. When will the media start asking young men en masse themselves why they aren't investing in University Education instead of reporting journalists' theories?

25 million men in Sub Saharan Africa are being pressured by a United Nations campaign to get their penises mutilated in the name of specious 'science' contested by prominent urologists. A lot of foreskins go into women's face cream. Oprah Winfrey uses such creams. How long before someone puts up a Facebook protest page called "Time for Oprah to lose face"?

With many men ghettoized by feminized education and employment policies, will we see Chicago 1968 style riots? How long before we see a marked rise in the number of male street gangs which are the only form of 'family' left to increasing numbers of alienated young men. Will America have to build even more prisons?

With increasing numbers of men voluntarily downshifting who's going to pay the taxes needed for all those women's programs? Will women start fighting each other over who should foot the bill?

With perhaps as many as 1000 military bases worldwide and the highest rate of imprisonment ever seen in history, when will America stop being at war both internally and externally? Almost every month I come across some supposed new war reportedly happening in USA – The war on drugs, the war on immigrants, the war on women, the war on poverty, the war on corruption (fill in your own blanks). When are we going to get the war on war? Or is that too esoteric and there's a dumbed-down population?

When the safe effective non-hormonal male pill goes on stream, will women with their greater numbers of university degrees be reduced to the next proletariat?

When the safe effective non-hormonal male pill goes on stream, how will the sperm strike affect society? Will society accept men's demands for equal rights or attempt some form of totalitarian control of men's bodies to extract the sperm?

As robotics and automation in general take increasing numbers of manufacturing and service industry jobs from people, how will people get money to buy what those robots produce?

For how much longer will wealth be increasingly concentrated in the hands of owners of robots /automated human-less production systems? What about the rest of the folks?

How long will it take for people to comfortably identify themselves as part machine – androids rather than purely biological beings?

Futurist Alvin Toffler predicted Knowledge will supersede Capital as the most valuable commodity. That's because Capital itself doesn't make money until ideas/Knowledge is applied to capital. Is society stratifying into different knowledge classes? Will tech savvy men therefore come out on top despite education systems being so feminized?

What if men start to copyright their sperm DNA?

With increasing numbers of men alone and aging will we see more of them banding together into all male retirement communities? Will women try to crash into those too?

Will a group of men start a class action lawsuit for sexual harassment against a major advertising company using unwanted sexual provocation in attempts to sell products?

When feminism is defeated and families much less fractured than now, how will corporations sell so many appliance and gadgets as they do currently do to massive numbers of smaller households each of which has a fridge, washer, TV etc?

With increasing Atheism, will nihilism increase as a problem? Will Paris Hilton become the female norm?

How many men will be slaughtered for entertainment in Kill Bill 4? 10,000? 100,000?

What happens when increasing numbers of men realize female flirting is all too often a ruse used in order to suck valuable information out of them – and then clam up and politely stop problem solving for women? Will women stop allowing themselves to be infantilized, woman up and solve their own problems without played intellectual white knights saving them so often?

With more and more men going their own way instead of being as author Herb Golberg describes it "in harness" to women, will we see another cultural renaissance as excess male energy gets sublimated into the arts, philosophy, science and technology?

How will women's psychology change as their biologically driven shit testing of males is increasingly resisted by men who by necessity increasingly look out for themselves and each other? Will there be a period of increased female mental illness until they adjust? Will cat and chocolate sales soar?

How long before we see large scale protests from the global community about the use of USA drones for surveillance and military operations which deny sovereignty to the countries they fly over?

Will politicians sympathetic to feminism use drones of all sizes from small insect size to plane size to profile groups of males? How strongly will police and military use of drones be challenged as an invasion of privacy?

How will various governments react to the inexorable spread outside of Japan of the Grasseater philosophy held by millions of younger Japanese men?

Now, where did I put that remote?

Do you want chivalry or equality? Yes?

January 10, 2013 | by Mark Trueblood | Link | Original Link

Several months ago, I wrote a brief piece on chivalry. In it, I proposed that chivalry is really not compatible with gender equality. We can have one or the other, but not both. And ultimately, it may be best if the sexes tried to help each other, rather than expecting that men be the protectors and benefactors of women.

A contrary opinion comes from "Let's Give Chivalry Another Chance" by Emily Esfahani Smith. In it, she declares that women deserve both equality and chivalry at the same time, and men should obediently get with the program.

Esfahani Smith writes:

> "This past spring marked the 100th anniversary of the sinking of the Titanic…In Washington DC, there is a memorial to these men. The inscription on it reads: 'To the brave men who perished in the wreck of the Titanic…They gave their lives that women and children might be saved.'"

Fair enough. This is historically accurate.

> "About a year ago, a group of today's men were tested the way that the men on board the Titanic were. When the cruise ship Costa Concordia hit a rock and capsized off the coast of Isola del Giglio, Tuscany, last January, men pushed women and children out of the way to save themselves."

Yes. Men and women are equal. At least, that's what I've been told since I was old enough to understand human speech. This is what Feminism pushes for, right? No?

> "This contrast is indicative of a larger trend—the decline of chivalry and the rise of boorish behavior among men. According to a 2010 Harris poll, 80 percent of Americans say that women are treated with less chivalry today than in the past. This is a problem that all women—especially feminists—should push back against."

The absence of chivalry does not = boorish behavior. Chivalry is the expectation that men will protect and provide for women because they are women. A man is not being a boor simply because he refuses to pursue traditional gender roles. Men can be nice, professional, and polite to women without displaying one bit of chivalrous behavior.

> After the women's liberation movement of the 1960s, which insisted on the equal treatment of women in all domains of life, feminists dismissed chivalry as sexist. They still do. A new study, published in the feminist journal Psychology of Women Quarterly, questions the entire enterprise of male chivalry, which, in an Orwellian flourish, it calls "benevolent sexism."

I find it far more Orwellian to demand that men and women are equals AND women deserve special treatment, at the same time. In my opinion, the referenced journal article is simply being honest that chivalry and equality really aren't compatible.

> "Chivalrous behavior is benevolent because it flatters women and leads to their preferential treatment. But it is sexist because it relies on the "gendered premise" that women are weak and in need of protection while men are strong. "Benevolent sexism," Kathleen Connelly and Martin Heesacker of the University of Florida write in the study, 'is an ideology that perpetuates gender inequality.'"

I agree in part. My proposition is that chivalry is justified only if either of these things were true: 1. Women are objectively superior to men, and it should be the natural role of the male to selflessly sacrifice on their behalf. 2. Women are weak and helpless, and men need to be on constant alert to save them.

In my opinion, anyone who believes in chivalry has to believe in one or the other. Otherwise there is no rational reason to argue for chivalry.

> Charles Murray, the libertarian social scientist at the American Enterprise Institute, summed up the study with tongue-in-cheek, writing "the bad news is that gentlemanly behavior makes people happy."

I am sure the hundreds of millions of men who have sacrificed and died for the protection of women over the centuries would be delighted to know their corpses make people happy.

> Perhaps because of women's ambivalence about chivalry, men have grown confused about how to treat women. Will holding doors open for them or paying for the first date be interpreted as sexist? Does carrying their groceries imply they're weak? The breakdown in the old rules, which at one extreme has given rise to the hookup culture, has killed dating and is leaving a lot of well-meaning men and women at a loss.

Well, yes. The "old rules" should be discarded. This is precisely what feminist-supporting men and women have been fighting for. No?

> Historically, the chivalry ideal and the practices that it gave rise to were never about putting women down, as Connelly and other feminists argue. Chivalry, as a social idea, was about respecting and aggrandizing women, and recognizing that their attention was worth seeking, competing for, and holding. If there is a victim of "benevolent sexism," it is not the career-oriented single college-aged feminist. Rather, it is unconstrained masculinity.

If men and women are equal, then for what reason should men need to "aggrandize and hold" women? And what's all this about "holding" women, anyway? Sounds coercive and violent. I think Esfahani Smith needs to attend a seminar about violence against women.

And again, she implies that the absence of chivalry = boorish "unconstrained masculinity." Not so. Men who reject chivalry are simply evolving their expression of gender roles. What feminist would have a problem with that?

> "We should have a clear notion of what chivalry is," argues Pier Massimo Forni, an award-winning professor of Italian literature and the founder of the Civility Institute at Johns Hopkins. "It was a form of preferential treatment that men once accorded to women generations ago, inspired by the sense that there was something special about women, that they deserve added respect, and that not doing so was uncouth, cowardly and essentially despicable."

Fair enough. But we are conveniently forgetting that generations ago, women were not perceived as fully-functioning adults. They had limited agency over their lives and their choices. They were generally expected to be chaste, behave with temperance, and defer to male authority. Do women want to go back to that culture? Doubtful.

> As the author and self-described "equity feminist" Christina Hoff Sommers tells me in an interview, "Masculinity with morality and civility is a very powerful force for good. But masculinity without these virtues is dangerous—even lethal." Chivalry is grounded in a fundamental reality that defines the relationship between the sexes, she explains. Given that most men are physically stronger than most women, men can overpower women at any time to get what they want. Gentlemen developed symbolic practices to communicate to women that they would not inflict harm upon them and would even protect them against harm.

Well, I happen to have read Dr. Hoff Sommers a great deal. Her overall argument is not represented here, because she acknowledges that the Feminist movement has deliberately inflicted a great deal of harm on men and women. I will listen to Hoff Sommers on this issue, even if I may disagree about chivalry, because she is far more honest and fair than most writers on gender issues.

> "Some women are trying to bring back chivalry. Since 2009, for instance, a group of women at Arizona State University have devoted themselves to resuscitating gentlemanly behavior and chivalry on a campus whose social life is overwhelmingly defined by partying, frat life, and casual sex. The event has spread to campuses nationwide. Its goal is "to encourage mutual respect between the sexes," Karin Agness tells me in an interview. Agness is the founder and president of the Network of Enlightened Women, the organization that hosts Gentlemen's Showcases at colleges each spring….Women, she said, 'want to be treated like ladies.'"

Do you know why campuses are "overwhelmingly defined by partying, frat life, and casual sex?" Because the guys who behave in such a way are also the guys who get attention from a lot of women. I could walk on the campus of any major university and find thousands of chivalrous, polite, gentlemanly men who are lucky to get a handful of dates in the entirety of their undergraduate careers. Meanwhile, the "frat life" guys need an electronic organizer to keep their “friends with benefits” straight. If you want men on college campuses to reform, you have to start by looking at the behavior of both sexes.

> “Bennett and her fellow chivalry advocates have the right idea. “If women give up on chivalry, it will be gone,” Sommers tells me. “If boys can get away with being boorish, they will, happily. Women will pay the price.”

This is outright misandry. Men are not naturally inclined to boorish behavior. Imagine the cries of misogyny if I wrote something like “If girls can get away with being manipulative gold diggers, they will happily. Men will pay the price.” Boorish behavior is no more central to the male identity than gold digging is to female identity. Some people are inclined to behave poorly, and when they are rewarded for it, it encourages them.

> If feminists want to level the playing field between men and women, they should find common cause with traditionalist women, like those at ASU, on the issue of chivalry. Both groups are concerned with how men treat women. They just differ in what that means: Feminists want men to treat women as equals; traditionalists want men to treat women like ladies. Are the two mutually exclusive?

Yes. The two are mutually exclusive, by definition.

> “Chivalry is about respect. It is about not harming or hurting others, especially those who are more vulnerable than you. It is about putting other people first and serving others often in a heroic or courageous manner. It is about being polite and courteous. In other words, chivalry in the age of post-feminism is another name we give to civility. When we give up on civility, understood in this way, we can never have relationships that are as meaningful as they could be.”

No, chivalry is not civility. Civility is a positive thing that we should encourage. Civility does not conflict with equality, either. Chivalry is not compatible with equality, as it is the expectation that men will sacrifice and die for the women under their care.

> “If women today—feminists and non-feminists alike—encouraged both men and women to adopt the principles of civil and chivalrous conduct, then the standards of behavior for the two sexes would be the same, fostering the equality that feminists desire. Moreover, the relations between the sexes would be once again based on mutual respect, as the traditionalists want. Men and women may end up being civil and well-mannered in different ways, but at least they would be civil and well-mannered, an improvement on the current situation.”

I guess we’re all just supposed to wonder how women can treat men with civility and respect, because Esfahani Smith spends this entire article criticizing men for not meeting her expectations.

> During a screening of the Dark Knight, a deranged gunman opened fire in an Aurora, Colorado, theater, murdering twelve innocent people. Three men, all in their twenties, were in the audience that day with their girlfriends. When the > shots rang out across the theater, these men threw themselves over their girlfriends, saving the women's lives. All three of the men died. At the time, Hanna Rosin noted that what these men did was "deeper" than chivalry. It was heroic. I agree. But heroism and chivalry share a basic feature in common—the recognition, a transcendent one, that there is something greater than the self worth protecting, and that there is something greater than the self worth sacrificing your own needs, desires, and even life for.

Well, no. That's not what happened. What happened is men followed their traditional gender role programming and behaved chivalrously. If it demonstrated that something "greater than the self is worth protecting" then we should have seen some women throwing themselves in front of bullets to save their boyfriends, too.

> If we can all agree that the kind of culture we should aspire to live in is one in which men and women protect and honor each other in the ways that they can—and not one in which men are pushing past women and children to save their own lives—then that is progress that women everywhere should support.

We can't agree to this, because Esfahani Smith does not offer one word on what women's reciprocal obligations to men should be. This entire article is about some women wanting to have it both ways. "Women are equal AND special. Women should be free from their traditional expectations, while men are forced to toe the line on theirs. Man Up!!!!"

I think Esfahani Smith, and other women who think likewise, need to decide what they want. Equality, or special treatment. Choose one.

For a female opinion on why men aren't doing as they're told, watch this video:

Transcript of that video is right here, by the way. –DE

Enthusiastic stupidity

January 10, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

There are some things in the world so stupid that if stupid was pressure it could make diamonds…and then crush them. Things like checking for gas leaks with a lit match, or using poison ivy to wipe your butt while camping.

Or being a feminist.

They have been the planet's primary source of stupid since The Beatles crossed the pond, so little they come up with surprises me. But someone just pointed me to a concept of theirs I wasn't familiar with and I wish they hadn't. My I.Q. dropped 10 points just hearing about it.

It has to do with better sex, which was the first warning sign. That's the last subject I want to hear about from people whose only reason for existing is to make men and women regard each other like Kennedy and Khrushchev.

Feminists, in their ongoing effort to identify whatever microscopic percentage of sex isn't rape, have come up with an idea so stupid that it drools and plays with itself in public.

It's called enthusiastic consent.

Not just consent, but enthusiastic consent. Sorta like if your boyfriend asks for a blowjob then you have to jump up and down and yell yippee! like you won a new car, or he can't accept it.

After being supplied some reference material on the subject, and surviving the reading of it, it looks like the idea might have originated with one of the kings of stupid, Hugo Schwyzer. You know Hugo, that's the guy who spent his time as a college professor teaching history, gender studies and bending his young female students over his desk. Oh yeah, then he tried to kill his ex-girlfriend. A paragon of enthusiasm, that guy.

That first foray into unexplored stupidity was back in 2007. Of course, feminists don't much care who gives them a stupid idea, but they know one when they see it, and have limped forward with it long enough to give it some traction.

It reared its misshapen head again in at feministing.com in 2010, and you can see more recent, um, enthusiasm for the idea here and here, and here.

I give it a year to be as popular as blaming your personal inadequacies on patriarchy.

The whole pretext for the idea is that we need to make extra, extra super speshul decoder ring sure that the girl grabbing your crotch, painting your eardrum with her tongue and dry humping your leg really wants to have sex. Oh, and make no mistake about it, even in the feminist's imaginary genderless realm, we are still talking about the boys getting that enthusiastic consent from the girls. They have not found an idea stupid enough to change that one, but we can hope.

I have a much better idea. Since in the feminist world, modern women don't have enough sense to communicate their desire for sex without following the prescribed guidelines of gender ideologues, and since boys are expected to gain expertise in "enthusiastic consent" in order to avoid a rape charge, then let's go ahead and remove any possibility of ambiguity (and spontaneity) from the sex lives of everyone.

Ladies, if you want to have sex, get down on your fucking knees and beg for it.

Better yet, do it in public. Stop foreplay and take a trip to the mall so there will be lots of witnesses. When you plead for the cock, make it loud and desperate and as self-humiliating as possible — so he'll know you're enthusiastic. Invite your parents to watch if you have to. It is the only way to be sure you are not being raped. God knows, and so do feminists, that you're not smart enough to know what you want and how to express it in a way that works for you and the person you are with.

And if you think that sucks, thank your feminist friends. They are the ones who are convinced you are not capable of doing what human beings have been doing for three million years without a set of instructions and permission from Hugo Schwyzer.

Note: this article has an interesting rebuttal from Typhon Blue–she thinks this may be a good idea.–DE Sleeping Beauty and her rapist?

January 10, 2013 | by Kristina Hansen | Link | Original Link

A California appeals court has overturned the rape conviction of a man, Julio Morales, accused of the rape of a woman in 2009, for which he was sentenced to three years in a California state prison.

The woman he had been accused of raping, Morales, and her boyfriend had attended a party together earlier that evening where they had all been drinking. All three ended up going home together afterwards. Morales was accused of "pretending" to be the 18 year old woman's boyfriend by sneaking into her bedroom that evening, after her boyfriend had left the room, and had sex with her, even though Morales claims she knew it was him.

Citing an obscure California state law from 1872, the appeals court panel ruled that "an impersonator who tricks someone into having sex with him can only be found guilty of rape if he is pretending to be a married woman's husband."*

"Has the man committed rape? Because of historical anomalies in the law and the statutory definition of rape, the answer is no, even though, if the woman had been married and the man had impersonated her husband, the answer would be yes," Judge Thomas L. Willhite Jr. wrote in the court's decision.

During the trial, the jury was instructed that "[a] woman is unconscious of the nature of the act if she is unconscious or asleep or not aware that the act is occurring or not aware of the essential characteristics of the act because the perpetrator tricked, lied to, or concealed information from her."*

The court found that the woman had indeed consented, even though she was said to have been tricked–and even though Morales claimed he verbally told her who he was, which appears to have been ignored and buried even in most news stories. Despite Morales' claims he didn't try to deceive her, they found that she was deceived anyway–and that had she been married, the law would define such a deception as rape.

The court ruled unanimously to send the case back for a retrial.

"We reluctantly hold that a person who accomplishes sexual intercourse by impersonating someone other than a married victim's spouse is not guilty of the crime of rape of an unconscious person," Willhite wrote.

Pay particular attention to the words being used here. Willhite wrote that she was unconscious. If she were indeed unconscious, she would not have been able to consent, yet the court had indeed found her capable of consenting. (All while apparently still ignoring Morales' own claim that he verbally spoke to her and he thought she knew who he was.) This implies that she was not unconscious at the time that Morales was said to have "tricked" and "raped" her. The other reason to seriously doubt the claim of her being unconscious at the time, is that it was not until

> A beam of light from a window illuminated his face, that the woman realized she was not having sex with her boyfriend, but with Morales, according to prosecutors.

This admission from the purported "victim" proves that she was not unconscious at the time that sexual intercourse was taking place. One cannot be unconscious and then claim to have been tricked. To be tricked into something, one has to be conscious in order to be deceived or outwitted by someone. The whole claim that she was unconscious at the time is ridiculous and falls flat on its face when you look at the evidence presented.

And still apparently no one cares about Morales' claim that he told her who he was.

Now, I know some people are going to accuse me of being a victim-blamer. And that is their right. But the facts presented just do not add up. Even if she had been married at the time the facts would still not add up. The law that allowed Morales' case to be overturned is not the problem here. The problem is that Morales would still be rotting in jail as a rapist if she had been married because then the facts would not have mattered. The only thing that would have mattered was that she felt she had been raped, and her word was good enough. No presumption of innocence for him apparently.

The 1872 law has indeed shown a flaw in the system, however it is not the flaw that is palatable to lawmakers and judges. The 1872 law points out, clearly, that facts are routinely ignored in cases where a woman accuses a man of rape. If the facts had been solid, and had proven, beyond a shadow of a doubt, that Morales was indeed guilty of rape, despite even his claims that he spoke to her and he thought she knew who he was, then the 1872 law would not have even mattered in this case. But there is doubt, and the facts do not add up. Which is why the 1872 law has come up in this case.

The reality is, if we grant Morales even a reasonable doubt, she is either a complete moron for not knowing who her boyfriend is when in a dark room and not able to recognize his voice, was too drunk to know or care who her boyfriend was–or that she changed her mind while having sex with Morales. None of these instances amount to rape. In fact, she consented to having sex with Morales, according to her own admission, up until a light hit his face. Is the guy now responsible for her being a complete moron? And is there no presumption of innocence for him for claiming he talked to her before the light hit his face?

The three California appeals court justices found that prosecutors had presented two theories at the time of Morales' trial. One was the impersonator theory, which the appeals court threw out. Prosecutors also suggested Morales had raped a "sleeping woman". When the case is up for re-trial, prosecutors will have only that theory to rely on.

The California appeals court panel suggested that their hands were tied due to the 1872 law and asked California lawmakers to "correct the incongruity that exists when a man may commit rape … when impersonating a husband, but not when impersonating a boyfriend."

Justice Willhite said the 1872 California law had not been consistently applied. A law similar to the 1872 California law led to an acquittal in Iowa in 2010. In 2011, Iowa's state legislature amended the law after that 2010 acquittal to cover all women, regardless of their being married or not.

Laws like the 1872 California Law have brought to light the great potential for corruption and disregard for facts by lawmakers and the courts when a man is accused of rape. Call me a victim blamer, but facts do matter to me. And the fact is her story does not hold up under scrutiny. A person is either unconscious, or conscious. She could not have been both.

*Source: http://www.cnn.com/2013/01/04/justice/california-1872-rape-law/index.html

AVfM Radio: N.O.W. says hello sailor!

January 10, 2013 | by AVfM Radio | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]

Well, it's Thursday again, and that means A Voice for Men Radio is coming on in a few hours over at blogtalkradio.com / avoiceformen – and Girl Writes What, Woolly Bumblebee, James Huff, and me, John the Other, will be on to talk about stuff. But what stuff exactly is it this week?

This is the second episode of AVFM radio for 2013, and in case you haven't noticed 2012 was a hell of a year for the men's rights movement. So much so that the landscape, the tides and even gravity are not arranged in the ways they have been for most of our lifetimes. So tonight on AVFM radio, we'll be talking about what that means for the human rights of men and boys, and more specifically, what that means in terms of real hazard and physical risk for individuals in this human rights movement. This is not a show for you to miss.

And we'll also be inviting the directors and members of the National Organization for Women to join us on air on A Voice for Men Radio, and sending Arthur Goldwag of the Southern Poverty Law Center a text message reminding him to pick up a couple flats of beer before he comes for dinner. –

Join us at 8PM Central Time, 6PM Pacific Time for AVfM Radio: NOW says Hello Sailor!

VIEW PROMO

Call-in number is 310 388 9709

FamilyLawNewsletter-Fall20122.pdf
[/box]

You weren’t raped. Join the club.

January 11, 2013 | by Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) | Link | Original Link

---

You know what rape looks like? It looks like this. Or this. Or this.

You know what it doesn’t look like?

This:

“Coyote ugly.” It’s a phrase men use to describe the experience of waking up, hungover as shit, in bed next to a girl so ugly you’d rather chew your arm off than have her stir. Yep, another night of too many shooters and very poor judgement. Well played, tequila.

I’m willing to bet that every single varsity athlete or high status (medicine, engineering, computer science) male on any given college campus has had the experience. Why? Because they get hunted. All the time. By women. You see these guys staggering bleary-eyed into the dorm rooms the next morning, bro-punching their friends and saying “Dude, how could you let me do that?”

The walk of shame: it’s almost a rite of passage. One that men seem to relish, enjoy and get over pretty damn quickly. Yeah, you fucked an ugly chick. Or a annoying chick. Whatever. You drank too much, lost all your reason and tumbled into bed with someone you wouldn’t normally touch with a ten yard pole. Ho hum. Where we going tonight, bros?

Many women, on the other hand, are completely fucked in the head in this exact same situation. They get dressed up in their best whore clothes, head out to a frat party, drink their faces off, end up in bed with some guy they wouldn’t normally touch with a ten yard pole, wake up the next morning feeling like a total slutbag and then, it happens:

Someone must be to blame for this! I can’t possibly have gotten shitfaced and exercised some really poor judgement. “Moi? Ce n’est pas possible! I am an innocent blushing virgin with impeccable moral standards. Why, only whores get smashed and fuck random guys in a frat house, and I am not a whore so JESUS MOTHER OF GOD I WAS RAPED!”

Bitch, please. You weren’t raped. You were trashed.

Why is it that men are held responsible for their actions no matter what their state of inebriation, but women get a pass? It doesn't matter if you were drunk, stripped naked, straddled the guy in your best cowgirl position and fucked like a banshee. You were drunk. You can't consent. So you were raped. Right?

Dude might have been just as pissed up as you, but he can't cry rape because: rationality. So only men are rational creatures? Really?

Bull. Shit.

There are women so delusional they actually think we live in a "rape culture." What the fuck?

http://jezebel.com/rape-culture/

No, we don't live in a rape culture. We live in a "Don't You Bitches Have Any Friends?" culture. Me and The Princess have our fair share of experience dancing like madwomen in our lingerie in night clubs filled with horny men who were starting looking like the cast of Ocean's Twelve after that last appletini. Many nights ended with crazy slobbery make-out sessions with "the dude who looks exactly like Brat Pitt" (except when we looked at him in daylight later).

Here's the thing: we protected each other. Not from the guy who looked like Brad Pitt through our appletini-googles. We protected each other from our own bad judgement. "Rape culture" theory holds men, and only men, responsible for what women do. And thanks, but I prefer to be responsible for my own fucking behaviour. And when I'm about to do something really stupid, something I will probably regret the next morning, I rely on my friends to save me from myself.

So go ahead! Wear those fishnets and hoochie shorts. You look fucking hot! Play beer pong! Strip for that guy. Go ahead and fuck him. Make all those decisions but understand they are your decisions. You don't get to wake up the next day feeling like a whore and ruin a man's life because you were a slut. Women––and men––who really were violently brutalized by strangers totally against their will aren't helped by your idea of a "rape culture." In fact the rape culture you create makes it worse for them by equating a truly violent and awful crime with bad decisions made while drunk.

Women and men who really were brutalized aren't helped by your phony version of a rape culture. In fact the rape culture you create with your lack of personal responsibility, your "I'm a pure snowflake and men are sex maniacs who oppress me" mentality makes it worse for people who were truly hurt and not just regretful.

So embrace your inner slut. Or trust your friends when they tell you it's time to say nighty-night to appletini-Brad. Or you know, shut the fuck up. Take your pick.

Lots of love,

JB

Enthusiastic consent is smart; a rebuttal to Paul Elam

January 11, 2013 | by Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) | Link | Original Link

---

Before we begin, let's get one thing clear. For human beings—that is those bipedal creatures without hormonal heats and an extremely well developed theory of mind—it's not access to sperm or egg that's the draw of sex, it's the feeling of being desirable. When one understands that, one realizes how very selfish the average woman is during sex. She demands the man express desire well above and beyond her own before dignifying his efforts with her desire in return.

If she ever does.

The Average Woman will proclaim the Average Man's body sexually useless; it doesn't bring her to orgasm after all! Since sex isn't about stimulating nerve endings, the real subtext of this statement is: the female body is desirable, the male body is gross and worthless.

In her fantasies the average woman takes her desire for narcisistic sex even further. She imagines men with no other existence then to lust for her, over powered by their urges to the point where they will tolerate zero desire from her.

Yep. She strips her fantasy man of his dignity as he pants for her like a dog riveted by a steak and she reserves the right to, herself, regard his sexuality with disdain or, worse, fear. He will drool and shit himself into a lather of sexual ecstasy by just having access to her body, her glorious mucus lined crevasse; while she reserves for herself the right to remain visibly unmoved by his.

She constructs a world in which she does not have to offer desire. Because offering desire is work; it's hard; it's dangerous; it's uncomfortable. Being desired is the real benefit of sex, so why should she have to give it to him? In her fantasy world no man is worth that work.

In the real world, no man is worth that work either but in the real world the average woman has to make some overtures since she has to deal with men who are concerned with legal realities.

So, grudgingly, contemptuously, sneeringly, she offers an empty, sallow, passive, reluctant, cowardly "yes" in the face of all the desire he lays at her feet.

With a snide bit of self-martyrdom and a superior air of charity, she'll believe she's being generous with her oh-so-desirable female body by allowing her male partner access to it when she's "not in the mood".

She gives him sex, you see. She's such a good sort!

(Since feeling desirable is the only reason to bother with sex with another human being—nerve endings are better stimulated with machines and creative visuals—why men accept this degrading state of affairs in exchange for absolutely nothing is beyond the ken of this particular woman.)

So why not make “enthusiastic consent” a legal reality?

This will force women to do even more of the work they really don’t want to. It will force them to express their desire for men with opaque and unambiguous intensity. It will force them to learn to take pleasure from the passive male body (as men do the passive female body.)

Making enthusiastic consent a legal reality will, of course, reduce the amount of flatulent, inert sex that men have access to, but perhaps that will finally get a significant body of men questioning if said drippy, queasy sex—with no assurance of orgasm for the man without the kind of painful, desperate effort one might associate with sawing down a cedar with a length of dental floss—is worth having access to in the first place.

But when it comes right down to it, what’s really baffling about feminists and the “enthusiastic standard of consent” is why they believe it’s men they have to convince to embrace it; after all up till now it’s women who’ve been given a pass when it comes to making men feel desirable.

Wouldn’t it be wonderful if all that changed?

This article is a rebuttal to Paul Elam’s Enthusiastic Stupidity.–DE

The crucifixion of Erika Jarvis

January 12, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[quote]When, however, the bluff is exposed… then the apostles of feminism, male and female, being unable to make even a plausible case out in reply, with one consent resort to the boycott, and by ignoring what they cannot answer, seek to stop the spread of the unpleasant truth so dangerous to their cause. The pressure put upon publishers and editors by the influential Feminist sisterhood is well known. ~ E. Bellfort Bax, 1913[/quote]

Toronto Standard makes its own news, then buries it in an attempt to cover up the truth.

Erica Jarvis is hanging on a cross.

On January 3, 2013, the Toronto Standard ran an article she penned, an interview with me which represented a first of sorts for the mainstream media. In a departure from the now standard mainstream narrative, and set against the backdrop of the University of Toronto student protest against Warren Farrell's talk on the Boy Crisis, Jarvis actually put in a good effort toward balanced and ethical journalism. She wrote as though she did not get the Official Party Memo that the men's rights movement is a club for aggrieved, basement dwelling white male Republicans, whose hatred of all women compels them to use the internet to bully and terrorize the world back to 1950's America. Instead, she actually interviewed an MRA and allowed a fairly complete vetting of the facts.

And that put the first nail right through her hand.

There was a plug for the long discredited anti-men's rights disinformation campaign of the SPLC tossed in at the end of the article. I later confirmed that was placed there not by Jarvis, but by editors of the Toronto Standard.

Some of her conclusions, editorial bullying notwithstanding, were as follows:

[unordered_list style="arrow"]

- After speaking with me at length she deduced that I did not hate women, and in fact even found it necessary to remark that she felt like she was being treated like an equal during our interview;
- She acknowledged that the conduct of some of the protestors at U of T was designed to stifle free speech;
- Even though she clearly disagrees with some of our tactics, she understands that we are facing real resistance to speech that would address the issues of our concern, and indeed admits that if our tactics were less provocative, she would not have even covered the story;
- She acknowledged that the makeup of the MRM was significantly different and more diverse than what other mainstream sources are reporting, citing the significant numbers of women who support our cause;

- She expressed sympathies to the core issues facing men and boys as presented to her in the interview.

[/unordered_list]

In short, she contradicted every bit of feminist spin you have ever read in the mainstream media about the men's rights movement, even as she clung to some artificially lofty standards that would keep us from being so uppity. Even that did not save her, though, and her conclusions became another nail driven through another hand.

The article received numerous comments. All of them, to the last one, either challenged what anti-MRM bias there was in the article, or thanked her for the aspects of her coverage that hit the mark. Not a word of support for the protestors or for feminism, even from the Standard's regular readers.

That silence could be interpreted as a sign of the last nail, the one that would pierce her feet, was being carefully placed; ready for the strike of the hammer.

Of course, I should give you a link to the article for reference. Here you go.

http://torontostandard.com/culture/the-revolutionary-an-interview-with-a-voice-for-mens-notorious-founder-paul-elam

Oh, but wait before you click, because when you do you will find that the page where that article use to reside has been deleted, and the url has been re-directed back to the Standard's home page. They have made their own news, and then buried it once the feminists came calling to let them know trouble was brewing for those that did not align with their worldview.

It is one of the few unfortunate aspects of electronic media. Stories can disappear as quickly as they appear, leaving editors to simply expunge their own records with no retraction or explanation necessary, as the Standard has done here. In fact, were it not for industrious MRAs who anticipate this kind of mainstream sneakiness, the article would be lost forever. We have it in .pdf, complete with comments, and anticipate that links to it off site will be available in the near future as we continue to cover the cover-up.

It is a smoke and mirrors routine that I have ample evidence is being conducted by those interested in maintaining feminism's stranglehold on public discourse, which has no room for the discussion of the human rights of men and boys.

How do I know this? Because Erika Jarvis confirmed it in an email after the article came out. She wrote me after I posted a response to her article, in which I criticized the addition of the SPLC propaganda, among other things. She responded:

[image]

First I want to point this out as more evidence of Jarvis's intellectual consistency. She disagrees with AVFM tactics, but clearly shows between the article and her email that she is concerned that the issues are being subjected to censoring, just as she more than tacitly implies that she has already been subjected to a feminist backlash against her work.

This is what we will see more of in the future. This is where the battle gets a little tougher and a hell of a lot closer to victory — as this monumentally stupid tactic will fail them.

Their plan, if one can call it that, is to make an example of anyone who dares to cover the MRM outside the realm of their edicts. The message is simple, the MRM is bad, feminism is good, and if you even hint at another perspective we will come to nail you to a piece of wood.

Feminists are now having to work harder than they have before in the mainstream to keep the refutation of their lies and their advocacy for violence and censorship from seeing the light of day. The truth has begun infect the collective consciousness, with will now leave them to do what we see here, petty sacrifices and transparent attempts to revise history after it has already happened.

As we see from the now 100 year old quote from E. Bellfort Bax above, this is not really anything new. But he did not live in the internet age, where attempts to rig the record can so easily blow up in your face.

This is a pretty important piece of the picture. Even now, as I look back on this series of events, I remember telling Jarvis that AVfM got just a little less traffic than the Toronto Standard. She even mentioned that I said that in her now erased commentary.

Even in the short time since then we have exceeded their traffic by a significant margin. What this in effect means is that more people will likely now read about their ill-fated attempt at a cover-up than ever read the original article they scrubbed from the site. That includes a good many Canadians.

Bellfort Bax could not have envisioned the Streisand effect, and the thinking of the editors at the Toronto Standard appear to be similarly a hundred years behind modern realities.

In other words, they not only not covering anything up, they have just publicly exposed themselves as being directed by a culture of yellow journalism and deceit, hiding news and information from their readers, even what they chose to publish, that does not fit with the prescribed ideological dictates of feminists.

The sad part here is that the only person actually being hurt in this part of the story is Erika Jarvis, because she tried to write a balanced news story on the wrong subject. She is finding out the hard way that feminists demand absolute agreement and support or they will take any extreme necessary to silence you. That has about zero effect on those of us whose stock-in-trade is shining a light on this kind of conduct, and in fact fans the flames of our fires, but for those with ambitions of mainstream acceptance it can be a game stopper, as evidenced by Erika Jarvis being so casually crucified.

She may be able to skate out of this; to move on in other directions as a writer, mindful of where she can go and what she can say. She may be allowed to have a career as a writer, even after her egregious faux pas. But the publicly conducted witch hunts are only going to paint a much more stark picture for a public that is beginning to awaken to the fact that they have been sold a bill of goods, and played like cheap violins for the sake of a corrupt and oppressive ideology.

Addendum: Here is the web cached version of the article, without the comments, and interestingly enough, the add on about the SPLC is also missing:

http://webcache.googleusercontent.com/search?q=cache:http://torontostandard.com/culture/the-revolutionary-an-interview-with-a-voice-for-mens-notorious-founder-paul-elam

And here is the full pdf, as provided from an off site source:

online backup

JTO on Erika Jarvis

January 13, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Editor-in-Chief John the Other has a few choice remarks about the Erika Jarvis matter.

(Insert SPLC disclaimer here)

No wait, this is not the Toronto Standard.

To GMP Re: Erika Jarvis

January 13, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

To: Tom Matlack and Lisa Hickey, goodmenproject.com

Dear Tom and Lisa,

As a fellow writer and website manager in the realm of sexual politics, it is my pleasure, both personally and professionally, to offer this letter of recommendation for Erika Jarvis.

I hope this recommendation comes at an advantageous time to GMP, as I am aware that you have recently purged a great deal of content from your site and may be seeking to fill the deficit.

Ms. Jarvis is a talented young writer with a flair for language and creative outcomes to her writing. She is not afraid to tackle tough subjects and then to remove all traces of her work when it is politically or financially expedient. Of course, that very fact brought both of you to mind immediately.

As an example of what I am talking about, Jarvis recently wrote an interview with me for the Toronto Standard. It was a good, balanced piece that covered different perspectives, using a critical, mostly objective pen. It drew a lot of traffic to Toronto Standard and was listed at the top of their "Most Popular" section.

When feminist ideologues objected to the piece, however, she asked the Standard to take it down without hesitation. This apparently happened after she got threats from feminists who preferred that she toed their line, ideologically speaking. The capitulation was a brilliant move on her part. Not only did she save enough face with the sisterhood to remain viable, she ensured that her name and this story will remain out there far, far longer than it ever would have if she had just left it alone.

Tom. Lisa. You know this is your girl.

In fact, I am thinking you might want to consider her for a management position. The reasoning is simple. In my discussions with her, Ms. Jarvis presented as a talented and intelligent woman with a high degree of integrity. Her questioning of me was fearless, while her reactions to my answers were conspicuously balanced and thoughtful. She literally brimmed with credibility.

That is why when her piece was removed from the Standard, it did not even dawn on me that it was at her behest; that is how much I actually believed her. And while the Standard is still responsible for the article coming down, the fact that she pulled this off behind a façade of journalistic integrity should put her on your short list for management. More than a keyboard jockey, this girl is. It is like she was born to work with Matlack and Hickey.

And as a last appeal on her behalf, I hope you will consider that you may well be one of her few remaining options. Given the fact that she wrote in the manner she did about me, AVfM, the protest in Toronto (which you somehow missed covering) and then pulled it down because feminists said, "fetch," she has painted herself into the same corner as

GMP.

The only writing role left for Jarvis now will be that of aggrieved, MRA hating, blindly biased feminist. It is the only way left for her because they will not let her have anything else. I know how much you both identify with that position, and how well you have taken to it.

I think, now that she has learned the limits that must be placed on the truth, she will prove to be an integral and invaluable member of your team.

Sincerely,

Paul Elam, publisher, AVFM

Background.

Ignore gender, denounce rape, defend all victims

January 14, 2013 | by Russ Lindquist | Link | Original Link

Rape is serious. Yet many fem-anesthetized people ignore rape. To be "fem-anesthetized" is to be anesthetized, however well-meaning, by the dogma of anti-equality feminists. The most foolish of the fem-anesthetized hold no less than two indefensible ideas about rape: 1) only women are victims; 2) only men are villains. To be sure, many of the most foolish of the fem-anesthetized are nothing but hate-filled, anti-male misandrists, who desire nothing more so than to arrogantly, unreasonably spread the poisonous social-momentum of "women are necessarily victims" and "men are necessarily villains." Nevertheless, there are at least two things far more important than the biased devotion–the chauvinism–of the most foolish of the fem-anesthetized:

1) the defense of all rape victims, and 2) the denunciation of all rapists.

Recently, a popular youtube personality named Jenna Marbles made a video against "sluts." Among the comments of Marbles, whose youtube channel has about 5.2 million subscribers, was that if a girl at a bar sees a drunk girl going home with a man whom the drunk girl doesn't know, the onlooking girl should intervene to prevent a "dumb decision" by the drunk girl.

Plenty is wrong with such a stereotypical, oversimplified hypothetical. Haley G. Hoover, one of Marbles' 5.2 million fans, took particular exception to the advice. Of the hypothetical, Hoover said, "You re not saving her from making a 'dumb decision'–you are saving her from being raped." Hoover continued, saying, "A dumb decision implies that this was a two-way street [but] if a man has sex with a woman who is … too drunk to make a sober decision–that is rape, every single time. The sex that occurs in that situation is not 'a dumb decision made by a slut'–it is rape."

Hoover's foolish, short-sighted, sexist response received 90,000 views in just a few days, clearly resonating with plenty among her 70k subscribers on Youtube. I made a video-response to Hoover. The remainder of this article contains a synopsis of my video-response to Hoover, as well as an extension of my points, addressing her video's text as well as its borrowed cultural-subtext that reflects a self-righteous, short-sighted, anti-male sexism that is far too common among those who, however well-meaning, have become dangerously fem-anesthetized.

Equality requires gender-neutral language

In her video, Hoover says that, "When a man has sex with a drunk woman, it is rape–every time." Well, for the sake of equality, I will remove the overt, narrow-minded, anti-male sexism from Hoover's rule, so that it reads: "Having sex with a drunk person is rape." This rule should seem fine for everyone, except perhaps those who believe men's sex is worthless, and that, "you can't rape a man–guys have no standards and are always willing." However, instead of accepting such misandrist nonsense, let's agree that men have sexual worth, even though plenty men and women in our culture have come to accept meticulous training that teaches them to believe that men's sexuality is only ever worthless, dangerous, degrading or otherwise sub-human. Moreover, let's compare a "drunk woman's regret" to the regret that many a man feels after having drunk sex with a woman whom he otherwise would not–for example, a woman who is fat and/or tedious and/or clingy. He would not have done that, if here were not drunk. So did she rape him? By Hoovers (amended) rule, of course the man was raped: "Having sex with a drunk person is rape."

Mutual-rape

Also, with the gender-neutral rule of, "Having sex with a drunk person is rape," let's consider something about these women who–simply because they were drunk–were supposedly raped: how many of them had sex with a drunk man? Plenty. Probably most. Therefore, all that rape is "mutual-rape"–the drunken man raped the drunken women and the drunken woman raped the drunken man.

Of course, plenty sexist, anti-male misandrists will insist, citing men's sexual-worthlessness, that only SHE was raped. But remember our gender-neutral rule: "Having sex with a drunk person is rape." And remember also the claimed aim of the fem-anesthetized: equality. And be sure to remember that so many of these anti-equality feminists ignore the true rape of men, women and children, choosing instead to carry on with their disreputable hobby of self-righteous, hypocritical anti-equality against men, boys and equality-minded women and girls–people who want to defend rape-victims and punish rapists, regardless of anyone's gender.

Unreported Rape

Another point made in Hoover's video is an allusion to the popular idea that "most rape is unreported" because "women don't tell," so "crime statistics are unreliable." Of course, it is true that most rape in our culture goes unreported, but not for the reason that people like Hoover believe; rather, in our culture, most rape-victims are men in prison–and most of those rapes go unreported.

Sexistly-defined rape

Speaking of male victims of rape: until 2012, raped men have been excluded from the FBI definition of rape.

False-accusations of rape

In our culture, a woman is statistically less likely to be raped by a man than a man is to be falsely accused of rape by a woman (and most accusations later determined false do not come undone as described by plenty popular lies–"she was unable to prove the rape" or "she was too shaken to continue pressing charges"–but rather the rape accusations typically come to be shown false when women willingly recant lies they previously leveled against a man). And the vast majority of women who make false rape-accusation against men are never charged with a crime for their lies, regardless that they sought to ruin an innocent person's life.

Rape as power

Fundamentally, rape is not about sex. Rape is about power: the abuse of power by the rapist, and the dis-empowering of the rape-victim. This is an important thing to remind those who sexistly believe, 1) men's sex is worthless, therefore, 2) women never rape women. Women do rape men–but our culture usually calls it something else, or ignores it–or laughs about it.

Encouragement of violent women

The rape of women by women should surprise no one, in a culture such as ours that says, "There is never an excuse to hit a women," instead of simply, "There is never an excuse to hit." Further, it should be no surprise when women are violent to other women–up to and including rape–when the foolish rule, "There is never an excuse to hit a woman," is generally enforced by law, and understood by violent women, as simply, "There is never an excuse for a MAN to hit a woman." Thus–again–it is unreasonable to expect anything other than what our culture has: a society where violent women are becoming harder and harder to lie about and pretend not to notice.

In the context of rape being about power, consider the popular saying, "It's not the size of the dog in the fight; it's the size of the fight in the dog." Recognize how much social-attention goes into de-clawing and de-fanging men–while so many will make excuses for any woman, no matter how aggressive or unprincipled she is. The tyranny that women routinely exact against men in family court could reasonably be called "social-rape." When so many readily encourage violent women, the following should be no wonder:

1) women statistically abuse children more than men statistically abuse women (or children).

2) female police officers are statistically more likely than male police officers to use excessive force.

3) although men and women statistically are equally prone to domestic violence against the other, women are statistically more likely to use weapons.

Lesbian Rape

Lesbians rape women statistically as often as men rape women. There are many more heterosexual men than homosexual women, so the overall number of woman-on-woman rape are less, yet the proportions are even. (For more about woman rapists, google "She Stole My Voice: A Documentary About Lesbian Rape.")

Conclusion

Women rape women. Women rape men. Women rape children. These are the facts. Now, consider these facts in the context of our society's mythologies about women–mythologies that lend to so many people continuously giving a woman the benefit of the doubt, regardless if she is abusive or even a rapist. But now it is time to ignore gender, denounce all rapists, and defend all rape victims.

Review: The Masculinity Conspiracy

January 14, 2013 | by Greg Canning | Link | Original Link

Note: This article is also available in Romanian.

"What if the biggest conspiracy in human history had gone completely unnoticed? What if that conspiracy was responsible for some of the biggest problems the world faces today? Wouldn't you want to know? Wouldn't you…" www.amazon.com

So reads the teaser for a booklet by feminist Joseph Gelfer, which claims to have solved the problem of men and masculinity buy uncovering a conspiracy that culturally indoctrinates men to covet "power and domination," traits that he argues are "neither natural or inevitable."

Rather than the claimed academic rigor, Gelfer's treatise is an exercise in intellectual shoddiness. It reads like a collection of book reviews admixed with a synopsis of a 1980's Women's Studies 101 course. As best I can figure the premise of the work, which Gelfer considers one of "research" is that he selected a number of books he considered representative of contemporary masculinity (lets call that the Gelfer bias although others will recognise it as selection bias or choosing straw men), he then "unpacks" and "deconstructs" said works through a "feminist lens," intertwines his critique with feminist and gender "theory" and hey presto the conspiracy is revealed.

Gefler has a grandiose perception of his own worth. He repeatedly mentions that he has a "PhD" (in religious studies); his doctoral dissertation was "well received" presumably by the like-minded gender ideologues that assessed it. He is an "adjunct research associate" at Monash University (Feminist HQ), Melbourne, in the School of Political and Social Inquiry. He describes himself as a "visionary" compares the magnitude his theory with the discovery that the earth is not flat, nor is it the centre of the universe.

He combines this appeal to his authority with ad hominem attacks against those he critiques. For example he delights in pointing out that the author of Men are from Mars, Women are from Venus, John Grey, received his PhD via a "correspondence course from a non accredited institution" and that another writer didn't have "a PhD or routinely publish with academic journals" presumably of the type Gelfer himself edits "The Journal of Men Masculinities and Spirituality." One can only wonder why he did not devote that space in his brief work to actually countering their arguments?

Gelfer kicks off by asserting that masculinity is "not what men do", that "sex is biological and gender is socially constructed." But one paragraph later states "gender is a spectrum of codes that can be applied to and describe men's and women's behaviour." It is not explained how "what men do" and "men's behaviour" are different things. He continues, "Gender is not as obviously connected to sex as you might imagine." No shit Captain Obvious! You mean men and women can have traits, characteristics, codes (or whatever you choose to call them) more commonly associated with the opposite sex! Who would have guessed?

He continues:

> We are generally born either male or female (even if the percentage of people born with ambiguous sexual organs – hermaphrodites, now more accurately referred to as intersex is surprisingly high.)

Stating that the percentage of persons born, with "intersex" is "surprisingly high" is astonishing for a supposed expert in "gender," when the percentage is neither quantified nor any explanation given as to why its prevalence should be considered "surprising."

The most common cause of "ambiguous genitalia" in newborns is congenital adrenal hyperplasia (CAH) a condition in which a chromosomal female 46XX is exposed to excessive amounts of androgens (male hormones) in utero and develops masculinisation of the genitalia, this occurs at a rate of approximately 1:15,000 births and the rate for all causes of intersex is no more than 2:10,000. One should consider these rates surprisingly low given the complexity of embryonic sexual development. Furthermore the pathophysiology of these disorders of sexual development (DSD) as they are now termed, is well understood. They are precisely that, disorders of normal development into the binary of either a male or female.

Gelfer seems to be asserting that even where we know that there is a binary distinction between male and female sex in humans, this may not really be the case. This deceitful implication is then used to augment his contention that sexual (or gender) identity occurs as a continuum rather than a dichotomy, and that cultural norms of masculinity and femininity are a toxic conspiracy, rather than appropriate adaptations to the time and place in which they arose.

Sexual (gender) identify should be seen in Gelfer's view as a fluid concept with infinite possibilities. He argues that traits should no longer be considered masculine or feminine but as androgynous human ones and language should change to reflect this. The subtext however is that it will be to societies advantage for men to relinquish traditional "harmful" masculine characteristics in favour of the traditionally feminine ones. Relative to the cultural norms of the times there have always been individuals who showed a more than average number of traits usually associated with the opposite sex, diversity really is a wonderful thing.

But celebrating diversity does not mean we should encourage a situation of sexual (gender) identity homogeneity rather than ideals of masculinity and femininity, especially as those ideals evolve and adapt over time. After all the number of persons who question their sexual (gender) identity is small with estimates between 0.0001% and 3%. They do indeed deserve to have a discourse around their unique situation but is should not dominate the discourse for the vast majority who are happy to identify as simply man or woman.

Manhood at $700.00 a session.

The same approach is applies to sexual orientation; Gelfer would have us believe that this too forms a continuum, rather then the more distinct categories most of us understand. People are either a) opposite sex attracted, that is identify as heterosexual overwhelming the norm and likely in excess of 95% of the Australian population, b) same sex attracted, that is identify as homosexual, or c) some combination of both that is identify as bi-sexual.

Personally I don't see any benefit in dividing the bisexual group into 50 shades of grey, or trying to have a few from either side question their sexual orientation over something they once felt or did in adolescence or might do if exposed to abnormal circumstances such as a protracted absence of the opposite sex. Still gender ideologues like Gelfer seem to delight in arguing that the concerns of a few precent of individuals should dominate the discourse for the near total majority.

On the one hand he decries "binary thinking" about sexuality and gender (identity) but on the other quite happily rejects biology in favour of social constructionism (except of course where biology may help his argument.)

In concluding his first chapter Gelfer offers this advice to readers who may not wish to continue reading.

"- never accept being told what masculinity should be about."

"- always question why you are being told what masculinity should be about."

Which of course begs the question as to why Gelfer is trying to tell us what masculinity should or should not be about!

Moving right along to Gelfer's conclusions; It's really quite simple you see, men are caught up in a "domination myth," and once men begin to "own" the privilege afforded them by patriarchy and "their part in the systemic privilege that patriarchy confers upon them" they will then realise how they mobilise this to "oppress women (and atypical males)."

Citing Walter Wink the domination myth is also, Gelfer claims, seen in patriarchy, capitalism, classism and racism "power lost to men through submission to a ruling elite was compensated for by power gained over women, children, hired workers, slaves and the land." Seems he left Feminism, off his list of ism's based on power and domination but including it would be a little too objective and balanced for an ideologue.

Gefler also has some advice for men's rights advocates, who he asserts must > acknowledge that patriarchy does exist, to understand the complexity that comes with owning systemic privilege (the kind that still results in men earning more money than women for the same job) and understanding that this is different to individual privilege"

Yep you got it, blind faith in the gender pay gap being due to privilege and discrimination rather then a more nuanced analysis to be expected of an academic with a PhD! Whilst he acknowledges the oft-repeated meme that patriarchy hurts men too, there is no acknowledgement that the customs and norms described by feminists as patriarchy delivered their fair share of privilege protection and entitlement to women as well.

Having seen the light, Gelfer's new breed of men can start to change their lives by simply withdrawing their support for the status quo. They can start "thinking differently" in specially created "thinking spaces."

Yep you got it Joseph, that's exactly what is happening but not I'm sure in the way you intend. Men are deserting in droves the cultural norms and institutions contaminated by years of toxic feminist ideology and governance.

Witness the grass eaters in Japan, Men Going Their Own Way, the marriage strike, the battle for inclusion of men in the world of home, family and parenting (against family law and social services corruption), the fight for reproductive rights on the same grounds as women, the fight against corrupt DV laws and false accusations or violence and rape, and on and on….

Men across the world Joseph are awakening to the true conspiracy, perpetrated on society by the feminisms, the same conspiracy that has sucked your naïve and gullible intellect so easily into itself and turned you into a prophet of its hateful and unjust ideology.

Gelfer, you really do need a course of red pills (yes the matrix analogy was invoked by AVFM long before you decided to use it in your monograph) Your umbilical lifeline to feminism needs to be cut and tied, you need to take your first gasps of the fresh air of actuality and open your eyes to the real world. And guess what, Joseph? We can help you if you are game.

But I fear Joseph will not be frequenting AVFM to debate issues with such men and women as collect in this space. He would prefer to charge $400 ($700 with personalized coaching sessions) for his online Future Masculinity course instructing other poor deluded souls in the much sort after art of being a male feminist.

A word from our sponsors

January 14, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Last month, we were very fortunate to have the most successful fundraiser for AVfM so far. Thanks again to all of our supporters from across the world.

One of the realities here is that activism, depending on how much you want to do, is expensive. We have gotten a lot out of the money you have donated, and we are proud of our accomplishments. The fact remains, though, that if we want to take it the next level, something we really want to do, we need to have more income. With the numbers of people in our ranks that have already been stripped bare by the system, expecting all of it to come from our donors is unrealistic. We have had enough donations from reader's unemployment checks to know that.

Some time ago I was talking about this to NCFM President Harry Crouch, who presented me with an idea that I have mulled over for a few months, done some research, and have decided to pursue through this site. I think it is a reasonable way for American MRAs to support this site and men's activism, while getting a solid deal on cell and data services. Many of you will find that you actually save a few dollars as compared to your current plan.

[image]T-Mobile, one of the major American cell phone carriers, has formed a child company called Solavei, which provides cellular and data services within the 50 U.S. States.

By becoming a Solavei affiliate, AVFM can generate residual income that will go directly to operations and activism here, while providing a service for which most MRAs are already paying, and for less money than they are now spending.

I signed up for the (no contract) service, which provides unlimited phone, text and data, with all the bells and whistles, for $49.95 a month ($51.89 with tax), six weeks ago. It has worked out well for me. The service has been good, and there were no surprises on my bill. I have done a lot of research on the company, weighed the pluses and minuses, and found it a good fit on a personal level as well as for AVfM.

I am providing links here, both to a .pdf explaining how Solavei works, and to the ordering page. Most interested people will just want to look into this because of the value of the service compared to what they are already paying. Others may be interested in the program as a way toward a second income, even if they just want to make enough to cover their phone bill.

While it is not perfect (it is U.S. only for now and some phones are not compatible), it does appear to be a worthwhile venture for AVfM. As I have spent some time on the service with no problems, I am comfortable recommending it to readers and activists.

At this time, Solavei is providing a free Android (after rebate) with each new account.

If you want to sign up for the service, here is the link.

ORDER SOLAVEI HERE.

Be sure to use promo code AVFM (all caps) so that we get credit.

If you are interested in reading up on Solavei, which I strongly encourage, read this:

FastStartGuide

Since AVfM is unlikely to attract commercial advertisers in the near future (and since we really don't want to) this seems to be one possible path for us to explore that could lead to defraying the cost of our ever growing operational and activist expenses.

Part of the bliss of shunning the traditionally commercial route of depending on advertising money is that we don't have to sell ourselves out to advertiser's sensibilities, and readers don't have to look at their ads every time they visit the site.

We will stay on that path for sure, but you will be hearing fairly often about our efforts to promote this possible game changer for funding future activism.

Thanks, and thanks in advance to all those who choose to support our work with this offer.

Paul

An anonymous letter from a mom

January 15, 2013 | by Suzanne McCarley | Link | Original Link

---

A letter to a future daughter-in-law, possibly my own:

A few years from now you're probably going to want to marry my son. Perhaps you already do; he's kind of hot (if I'm allowed to notice) and his potential is quite obvious, if I do say so myself. He's only twenty, handsome and well built, and when he lets is hair grow long it's thick and wavy. He has his father's beautiful eyes, and my dimples look much better on him than they ever looked on me. Also, he's in the military; he has finished his deployment and doesn't expect to go overseas again, so he's now preparing to start earning college credits. I don't hover so I'm not certain, but he's probably going to major in engineering. Or possibly actuarial science. He surfs, rides a motorcycle and a mountain bike, and he maintains a classic car. He's essentially a decent guy; pretty much everyone likes him or loves him, and respects him. Girls hit on him regularly.

I'll be surprised if he ever marries though. You see, his plan is to wait until he's at least thirty, and therefore he will spend the next decade meeting, dating, working with, and probably sleeping with, the product of sixty years of American feminism. I'm pretty sure he won't find many women worth considering for marriage.

How about we look at it from his perspective, m'kay? Here's what he sees:

Half of you have been raised without your fathers, yet only a few of your fathers deserved to be kicked out of your lives. You were raised by the women who kicked your fathers out, and perhaps by a string of step-dads and "uncles." Those women, your mothers, taught you their values by example. Not an auspicious start. Most of the rest of you were raised by fathers who knew damn well that if they displeased your mothers, they too could be kicked out of your lives according to your mothers' whims. They knew full well who had the real power in the family; they quietly accepted that "mother knows best."

You were raised in a culture that permits, even encourages, women and girls to always push for more; not necessarily to do more or earn more, but to demand more and to expect more. You were punished far less severely for your transgressions than were your male peers. Indeed your female peers egged you on to be even naughtier, and to be defiant about it. It's Grrrl Power, after all! The boys of your acquaintance were expected to give in to your shenanigans and your shit tests, and those who didn't were labelled "problem children" and medicated. Usually, a boy's best bet was to shut up and grovel, and maybe win your approval. They weren't allowed to go around offending the Special Snowflakes, were they?

You were raised in a Disney Princess Culture, where every girl is entitled to her Prince Charming. And if she can't find one, she has the Grrrl Power to kiss any old frog and transform him into a Prince. You were raised to be a slut, at least through your twenties. Go to college. Establish a career. Don't get married until your late twenties or early thirties, but DO NOT under any circumstances, repress your sexuality. Your foremothers fought hard for your right to be promiscuous with no consequences; don't you dare let their efforts go to waste.

And since you're not looking for a husband, there's no need to sleep with only "good" men, is there? Cuz badboyz r hawt! And nice guys are boring. And hell, you have plenty of time to ride the best cocks you can find – thanks to modern medicine, you can get pregnant after menopause if you want, so there's no hurry. You are expected to waste your youth and your beauty on hot guys who treat you like shit, then give your leftovers to the guy you'll promise to love, honor and cherish for the rest of your life. Wow! How lucky is he!

My son looks around and he sees bitchy, arrogant, malicious women. He sees spoiled greedy women. He sees financially irresponsible women. He sees lazy, undisciplined women. (Yes, even in the military; they had to lower the standards so more women could "serve.") He sees overweight women wearing unflattering clothes that display muffin tops and rolls of fat, who drool over his biceps while telling him that "looks shouldn't matter."

He sees slutty women who dress to attract men, sleep with the hot ones, and denigrate the less attractive ones by calling them "creepy." He sees "competitive" professional women whose primary tools for getting ahead are affirmative action and the unspoken threat of sexual harassment lawsuits. He sees demanding women who expect men to bow and scrape for the privilege of a smile. He sees utterly irrational women whose "self esteem" is obscenely disproportionate to their proven worth. He sees entitled women who expect romantic dates and expensive gifts, yet have absolutely nothing of value to contribute to a relationship. He sees women who flirt with their hopeful, geeky JustFriends, juuuust barely enough to keep them on a string while simultaneously panting after Alpha Hotteies, then run crying back to those JustFriends after being pumped and dumped by said Hotties. "Oh, why can't more men be nice like you?" (Answer: if they were, no woman would fuck them.)

Look around you, ladies. You see the very same women, don't you? Many of you are these women. You think this is normal and acceptable because "everybody does it." It's not.

There's something you should know about my son and his peers. They're not gay, they're not lazy, they're not stupid, they're not unambitious, and they're not weak. They've merely figured you out. They know that you don't give a rat's ass about them, and that you see them as nothing but providers and fantasy sex objects. They are wise to the game and they're done playing by your rules.

They have the same job titles as you and they take home the same pay, but they work longer hours and they do harder work; they know that their productivity is why employers can afford to hire you to sit a desk and shuffle papers. They know that if two drunk people have sex and both regret it the next morning, only one of them is a rapist. They know that "My Body/My Choice" actually means "My/Body/My Choice/Your Wallet." They know that the minute they sign a marriage license, everything they own is yours, but nothing you own is theirs (except your debts) and you can walk away with cash and prizes, at any time, for any reason. Or for no reason at all.

They're calling Bullshit.

A few years from now, you'll begin asking yourself, "Where have all the good men gone?" You'll look down your noses at all those guys playing video games and living like frat boys in cheap apartments, and you'll just know that they could be "doing so much better for themselves," if only they would "Man Up." You'll shake your heads in wonder at their "immaturity," or their "wasted potential." Here's a little secret. Yes, a few men are immature or weak; they've had the masculinity abused or medicated out of them, mostly by their single mothers and grandmothers. But most of them?

They no longer give a rat's ass about you.

That's right. They don't need to work hard and earn a good living. They have no intention of fathering and supporting any children, and no desire whatsoever to earn your approval. You go buy your own four-bedroom colonial in just the right subdivision. That's what your Grrrl Power is for, isn't it? So you don't need a man? Many of these men will even go so far as to quit their jobs as soon as they begin to "earn a good living." They don't want to make enough money to pay taxes. They don't want to pay the salaries of millions of useless (and mostly female) government employees, and they don't want to finance the personal choices of "Empowered Women."

Those Empowered Women can buy their own damn birth control. These men refuse to feed your Beast. And you, and your government, and your church, can't cajole them or shame them into giving a shit. Men are dropping out, ladies. Chivalry has died of blunt force trauma, in a beatdown administered by Grrrl Power. Your mothers, your grandmothers, your schools, your family courts, your sociology professors, have spent the last two generations telling men that the are unnecessary and unwelcome. And now they're leaving. (Although they'll be glad to fuck you while you're young and hot, since you're offering. Aaaaand then they'll move on to younger and hotter sluts. Why the hell not? It's free.)

This is the gift that feminism has given to you: Independence. Scary, lonely, bitter, potentially impoverished Independence. For yourselves and any children you may have. Most of you won't blame feminism though; you'll blame Male Privilege (which doesn't exist.) You'll blame The Patriarchy (which always gave women a better deal than it gave men.) You will stamp your feet, flip your hair, and blame anything except the single cultural force that has devoted itself to suppressing and controlling masculinity. And you'll go home alone every night to your cats, your Facebook Friends, and your vibrators. I sure hope that's what you want.

Sincerely,

A Mom.

Author's Note:

This piece is not about my son. In real life, he is a multi-faceted individual living his own life. In this article, “My Son” is a cardboard cutout of any ordinary, intelligent young man who is considering his future. Sarcasm is my friend, so no, I’m not a bitter aging helicopter mom with Oedipal issues, who believes no woman will ever be good enough for Mr. Perfect.

And yes, NAWALT, I know…

Intactivists launch massive campaign

January 15, 2013 | by VFM News and Commentary | Link | Original Link

---

Intactivists from MGMbill.org inundate Congress and 10 state legislatures with bills to protect boys from forced circumcision.

San Diego, CA (PRWEB) January 15, 2013

Genital integrity activists from across the country are demanding that lawmakers ban the practice of circumcising boys. Popularly known as “intactivists”, these children’s rights advocates submitted the Male Genital Mutilation (MGM) Bill proposal to more than 2,000 legislators this week in an effort to require gender neutrality in federal and state laws that regulate genital cutting.

As director of MGMbill.org’s Indiana state office in Indianapolis, Jeff Cowsert wants all boys to be able to grow up with their genitals left intact. “When I was eight years old, my religious friends told me about circumcision,” said Cowsert. “I was silently outraged, and for the remainder of my childhood I mourned the fact that I didn’t have a complete body. I would not have chosen to be cut if given the choice, and I strongly feel that infant circumcision needs to be banned so that men can make their own choices about their own bodies when they are mature adults.”

[image]Ending male circumcision is a goal shared by many women, as well. Shelley Wright-Estevam is a mother and business owner who serves as the group’s state office director in Selbyville, Delaware. “You shouldn’t have to be born female to be protected from genital cutting,” said Wright-Estevam, who has frequently been spotted spreading her message of intactivism on the boardwalk in nearby Rehoboth Beach. “I have heard some people argue that parents should be the ones to make that decision, but violence against a child is not a private matter. Circumcision is not just unnecessary; it also removes a male’s most sensitive body part. It’s unethical, painful, harmful, and occasionally even fatal.”

Male circumcision was one of the top issues for lawmakers around the world in 2012. It started in January when a Helsinki district court convicted a man of assault and battery for circumcising two Muslim boys. The following month, the Swedish Pediatric Society issued a statement calling circumcision an “assault” that should be banned. Then, in June, the Centre Party in Norway called on the Red-Green coalition government to grant boys legal protection from circumcision.

Two months later in August, the Tasmanian Law Reform Institute recommended that the state impose a general prohibition on circumcision while Denmark opened an investigation to determine if circumcision violates its health code. And in October, Finland’s largest opposition party promised to introduce a bill that would criminalize circumcision of boys.

But the biggest news came out of Germany over the summer, when a Cologne district court ruled that circumcision of male children is a crime. Although Germany's parliament later overrode the decision by passing a new law, the German Pediatric Association called for that law to be rejected, stating that boys have "the same basic constitutional legal rights to physical integrity as girls".

Circumcision was a hot topic in America, as well, when children's rights groups slammed an American Academy of Pediatrics policy statement that sanctioned parental access to newborn circumcision. New York City also implemented disclosure and consent rules regarding the practice of ritual circumcision after two baby boys died from contracting herpes during the procedure. And with H.R. 2400 (the "Religious and Parental Rights Defense Act of 2011") failing to get past the House Energy and Commerce Committee, the path is now clear for state governments to prohibit circumcision of male minors within their own borders.

Matthew Hess, president of MGMbill.org, said lawmakers can't hide from the issue forever. "There are too many people speaking out against circumcision now," said Hess. "What once was a trickle of condemnation has now become a tidal wave. Modern parents are armed with information on the harmful effects of foreskin amputation, and circumcised men are much more willing to speak out against what was done to them as infants. I think the days of legalized childhood circumcision in this country are numbered."

In addition to submitting the MGM Bill proposal to every member of the 113th Congress, the group's representatives submitted similar bills to every state lawmaker in California, Delaware, Florida, Indiana, Minnesota, New Jersey, New York, Oregon, Virginia, and Washington.

Big Sister: the legacy of Germaine Greer

January 15, 2013 | by Neil Lyndon | Link | Original Link

Editor's note: What follows is an article written by British journalist and writer Neil Lyndon.

Neil Lyndon was a close witness at the birth and growth of modern or "second wave" British feminism, having been active in the radical student movement at Cambridge in the 1960s and, then, in underground newspapers in London in the early 1970s. As a highly successful columnist for The Times and occasional columnist for The Independent and other national newspapers, Lyndon occasionally wrote about feminism from a skeptical point of view in the 1980s; but it was his 5000-word essay in December 1990 for the Sunday Times Magazine entitled "Badmouthing" which made his name as the world's first egalitarian and progressive anti-feminist.

That article was probably the first ever published to discuss a mainstream culture in which men were habitually derided; and it was the first to itemise the disadvantages and inequalities to which men and boys are subjected – in a society which ostensibly oppresses women. "Badmouthing" was the first article anywhere to point out that men died in greater numbers from prostate cancer than all the fatalities for women that resulted from all cancers of the genito-urinary system put together; and that nobody seemed to care much about prostate cancer.

The publication of that article brought a torrent of abuse on Lyndon's head (including the observation "can there be something wrong with the size [of his penis]?" from the feminist publisher Carmen Callil, in response to the point about prostate cancer). But that wave of abuse was dwarfed by the astonishing reaction in 1992 when Neil Lyndon published his book "No More Sex War: The Failures of Feminism" – a comprehensive demolition of the ideology of feminism in its own terms.

In that book, Lyndon advanced the view that feminism was a poisonous ideological parasite on the changes that had occurred between men and women in the 20th century. He argued that change had resulted primarily from the introduction of infallible contraception and easily-accessible abortion and also that, contrary to the feminist notion of a repressive patriarchy, men had willingly consented to change for women and had themselves accommodated change with admirable ease.

No book and no author in the last 50 years has been subjected to such vilification as Neil Lyndon and No More Sex War. No writer in our time has suffered so much personal and professional cost for publishing his opinions. Neil Lyndon was mocked for being obviously impotent and incapable of getting a woman. He was sacked as a columnist for The Times, He was bankrupted. His estranged wife abducted their son to Scotland where she obtained an order of custody without Lyndon even knowing the application was being heard. He was physically attacked and threatened with death and his book was threatened with burning.

For the last 20 years, Neil Lyndon's public career as a journalist has been confined to writing a column about cars for the Sunday Telegraph. Though he regularly publishes his views on Twitter, he is almost never allowed to write about gender issues in mainstream media.

In October 2010, however, he was invited by The Sunday Times to discuss the impact and legacy left by Germaine Greer's The Female Eunuch, a book few people today have ever read, let alone understood, but nevertheless remains one of the defining texts of our age. Alas, The Sunday Times cut the original piece by about 25% and reduced it to what the author himself described as "mutilated form". Below, however, we present the original unabridged work, which was published first published on MRALondon.org, and also published here with Neil Lyndon's express permission.

Germaine Greer's The Female Eunuch was the publishing phenomenon of the early 1970s. It sold out its first printing in three months and sold hundreds of thousands of copies worldwide. It elevated its author into a position unrivalled by any contemporary feminist – as one of the leading cultural celebrities of our time, showered with honorary doctorates and deluged in royalties.

[image]Far more significant than sales figures, however, was The Female Eunuch's impact in triggering the worldwide movement of modern feminism. Immediately following publication on 12 October 1970, a conflagration ignited – or, in Greer's own words, "The slagheap erupted." Within weeks, Bob Hope would be mortared with flour bombs on the stage of the Albert Hall while presenting Miss World. Not long after, the streets of central London would be jammed with thousands of demonstrators on the first National Women's Liberation March. Then, Biba – the most fashionable women's clothes shop in London – would be blown up with the kind of genuine explosive that shatters windows and knocks down walls.

Did these events take place because of The Female Eunuch? Not at all; but Greer's pages were the blue touch paper for a detonation whose shock waves would fan out all across the Western world with electric speed.

Thus The Female Eunuch became one of those rare books – The Communist Manifesto is another – which had an instantaneous, explosive impact at the time of publication but whose cultural significance endures largely as an event, as a phenomenon, rather than for its intrinsic value as a text.

In celebration of that event, next month's 40th anniversary will be marked in some quarters of the British politico-media Establishment in something like the way that the October Revolution used to be commemorated in the Soviet Union.

The feminist Old Guard – now in their 60s and 70s, like the author herself – will again totter up the steps of the saluting base whose tiers are composed of Woman's Hour and The Guardian. Like the Politburo, many members of that Old Guard poisonously detest each other but they will put on a public show of sororal unity to honour the great leader, Big Sister herself. Greer will be memorialised as a hero who inaugurated a liberation movement – the feminism which changed the world and set women free.

Before we all join hands and hymn I Am Woman, Hear Me Roar, however, perhaps we could take a cooler look back at the text which nobody now reads (in 2009 in the United Kingdom, The Female Eunuch sold 298 copies) and examine the notions which Germaine Greer actually advanced.

Anybody who studied The Female Eunuch today might be baffled to say exactly what it was about or what might have gotten its author so worked up. The text's rampaging, polymathic eloquence leads the reader to no clear understanding, no decisive conclusions. Instead, you find yourself repeatedly floundering in a porridge of fashionable posturing, Eng-Lit essaying, revolutionary gibberish and not very profound Agony Aunt counselling (sample: "The man who comes willingly to your bed is more likely to lie all night with his arms around you than the one who has nowhere else to sleep.")

Some pages are pure hippy piffle. Little that survives from the jejune utopianism of the 1960s is more embarrassing now than Greer's fantasy of the communal collective of well-heeled young mothers she dreamed of creating at a farmhouse in Italy "where our children would be born. Their fathers and other people would also visit as often as they could…The house and garden would be worked by a local family…"

A less exacting task is to identify what was clearly not on the young Greer's post-PhD mind. The book was certainly, avowedly, not concerned with political and social equality for women. Greer majestically swept aside such concerns as far beneath her, belonging in the Suffragette past. "Then genteel middle-class women clamoured for reform, now ungenteel middle-class woman are calling for revolution."

What did that revolution mean to the author? Nothing less, it transpired, than an insurgency in the manners of coition itself. Greer was to express this conception most concisely in person when she appeared with Norman Mailer in April 1971 in the "Dialogue on Women's Liberation" in New York's Town Hall and said: "Sexual politics, by and large, has to do with the act of fucking being to the advantage of the one who fucks and the disadvantage of the one who is fucked."

How these observations were meant to apply to the wider world of nature – how the mating rigmaroles of elephants, giraffes and hedgehogs were to be reformed to reflect a more equal social balance – was never to be made clear. But, so far as they concerned men and women, Greer had already spelled-out her revolutionary prospectus in the pages of Suck (the underground sex magazine she co-edited at the end of the 1960s). There she enjoined that the woman should habitually be on top. To make sure that the woman got the satisfaction which was her political due, the man was to pay unfailing, selfless attention to her clitoris throughout the act.

In this very particular corner of "sexual politics", Greer was adding little more than her abrasive and (for the time) shockingly direct manner of speech to an already well-established body of learning and propaganda.

Masters and Johnson's research had already (1966) demolished Freud's unscientific theories on the vaginal orgasm, proving that clitoral stimulation was essential to female orgasm. Helen Gurley Brown's Cosmopolitan had already proclaimed that a woman's inalienable right to sexual satisfaction was an essential ingredient in her freedom. Meanwhile and separately, American and European women revolutionary leftists were struggling in the late Sixties to force the stew of gender relations through the sieve of Marxist dogma. To them, the subservience of women and the dominance of men was a picture-perfect reflection of Engels's account of patriarchy – with men as the repressive bourgeoisie and women in the position of the ground-down proletariat, both on the factory-floor and in bed.

Greer's act of inspired, opportunist genius was to combine these two approaches – to stoke up and set on fire the dreary class analysis of the whiny, moany sisters of the Left by applying the hot poker and bellows of Cosmopolitan's sexy rhetoric and thus to make out that a girl's right to a fully satisfactory sex life was nothing less than a political, revolutionary issue.

To that end, Greer consciously and deliberately appropriated the phraseology and the ideology of the US Black Power movement of the late 1960s and smeared it all over the confusing, chaotic state of gender relations in the wake of that decade's sexual upheavals. As she told Playboy magazine in January 1972, Greer chose the title because "The term eunuchs was used by Eldridge Cleaver to describe blacks. It occurred to me that women were in a somewhat similar position. Blacks had been emancipated from slavery but never given any meaningful freedom, while women were given the vote but denied sexual freedom."

Greer owed a further, unacknowledged debt to the Black Panthers. Where Eldridge Cleaver, Stokeley Carmichael and Huey Newton had alleged that an ineradicable strain of exploitation and oppression inhered in the very nature of whiteness (itself a hideous line of intolerance and a vile insult to all those millions of white Americans who had so valiantly striven to improve the lives of black Americans), Greer advanced the notion that men, in the ineradicable nature of male sexuality, denied women the free expression of their own sexuality and libido.

She had declared "Men are the enemy. They know it – at least, they know there is a sex war on, an unusually cold one." She wrote "Men are the enemy in much the same way that some crazed boy in uniform during the war was the enemy of another boy like him in most respects but the uniform."

Women had to be at war with men, she urged, because a strain of repressive violence ran through the very essence of male sexuality. She wrote "The male perversion of violence is an essential condition of the degradation of women. The penis is conceived as a weapon and its action upon women is understood to be somehow destructive and hurtful."

Forty years on, it is no easy task to say why this pottage of nutty-slack ingredients and the fizzing rhetoric which whizzed it together should have turned out to convey the recipe for social gelignite.

The explanation lay partly in the person of the author herself. Greer deservedly, irresistibly became the worldwide Number 1 star of the youth counter-culture movement. No grubby, hippy revolutionary of the time could hold a candle to this 31 year-old Aussie Boudicca. Greer's height, her hair, her flirty yet ball-breaking manner and her quicksilver intellectual brilliance made her a natural-born cynosure and she would certainly have forged a national and international reputation for herself even if she hadn't fastened onto the nascent women's movement.

Looking around today, however, it's not apparent that Germaine Greer's admonitions about sexual intercourse have made much difference to the conduct of men and women. Hordes of half-naked girls on high heels still wobble around town centres on Friday and Saturday nights looking for boys to allure; and the lads are still propping up the bars, downing their pints and eyeing the flesh they hope soon to get their hands on. When the sexes eventually comingle their bodies, they then seem content to ape the ancient, pre-revolutionary traditions of rumpy-pumpy as they have been enjoyed down all the ages. Ignorant beasts.

The Female Eunuch did have an enduring influence, however. It was to give potent, educated voice to barbaric simplicities about men. After Greer it became permissible to say and write anything condemnatory about men because she had supplied sexist intolerance and prejudice with a scholarly, literary respectability. Greer had written "Women have very little idea of how much men hate them" but the animus she inspired proved that the opposite was closer to the truth: until The Female Eunuch was published, men had no conception of the depths of many women's hatred for them – both as a gender and as individual representatives of that gender.

Before that event, it would have been frowned upon in polite society for a woman to say that she hated men. After Greer, such declarations of generalised, sexist detestation became largely obligatory for an educated, middle-class metropolitan woman. The disparagement of men became the routine stuff of movies ("Sleeping with the Enemy"), soap operas, television advertising, newspaper columns, magazine covers and playground chatter. Throughout the Seventies, one of the most influential and cultivated literary editors in London regularly affirmed that "All men are Idi Amin" and expected to be taken seriously.

Greer's ideological disciples and the standard-bearers for her sexist reductionisms about men were writers such as Andrea Dworkin who declared – in all apparent seriousness – that all heterosexual intercourse was a version of rape and that, therefore, all men are rapists; and Catherine McKinnon, who took all erotic representations of women to be a form of violation and assault which proceeded from the inherent evils of male sexuality. You weren't only committing adultery in your heart if you looked at a photograph of a naked woman: you were raping her.

Future historians may be astounded to find that such irrational, Robespierre-like condemnations of an entire gender were given solemn, even reverential, hearings in Western life – in the media, in the halls of academe, in the institutions of state, in the courts, in the practice of education and the social services; but it's not going to be easy for those scholars to get their heads round the extent and the violence of the detestation of men which The Female Eunuch licensed.

Every boy whose education was treated as a secondary concern, every young man who had to get to the back of the queue for a job behind more favoured women, every father and every child who were separated from each other by legal process in the divorce courts – all these millions are entitled to view the 40th anniversary of The Female Eunuch as an occasion for something other than celebration.

Why did this intolerance take hold?

It surely was not because the women of that age were socially oppressed. By any measure, the post-war generation of women in the West must have been the most privileged and the freest in the whole history of humanity. The first generation ever to be free to enter higher education and employment on the same terms as men, they were also the first ever to be able to control their fertility infallibly and the first to be legally free to terminate a pregnancy through an easy procedure. The first to be entitled to no-fault divorce (with property distribution and child custody rights freighted to their advantage), they were also the first to be free to adopt any manner of sexual pursuit that appealed to them and the first to be allowed to wear any clothes (or none) that suited them.

Every one of these freedoms had been attained with the active consent of men, frequently at the behest and the instigation of men before modern feminism was conceived. Women flooded into higher education following the Robbins Report of 1963. The numbers of married women in the labour force rose by more than 70% in a single decade. The number of abortions rose sevenfold after the 1968 Abortion Act. The number of divorces more than quadrupled after the 1969 act.

The universally agreed presumption that change for women was granted grudgingly by a resistant male Establishment in the face of the demands of militant feminists is, therefore, contradicted, at root, by the historical record. It is one of the cardinal lies of feminism but it is dwarfed by Germaine Greer's poisonous, evil, Goebbels-like lie that men shared an ineradicable and repressive nature in their very masculinity. The evidence proves that men were (and remain) up for change. Why, then, did Greer and her disciples insist that men had to be subordinated by an uprising of militant women?

To find answers to that question, you need to look back to the period before modern feminism took shape. A valuable resource is Nell Dunn's 1965 book Talking to Women, in which she recorded interviews with nine London women between their mid-20s and mid-30s.

With Edna O'Brien, Dunn agreed that women felt insecure, unsure of the difference between right and wrong, because "we have no moral code" and "don't know what we are meant to be doing". With Emma Charlton, Dunn concurred that a woman, meeting a man, would try to gain his approval and say things to please him, even if she wasn't attracted to him "But that's really a form of looking down on them…It's really just appeasing them, to keep them in their place or something."

Time and again in the pages of that book, young women voiced comparable moral uncertainties and fearful perplexities about men. The world of sex, family, employment, political engagement and social responsibility was shifting under their feet so rapidly that they couldn't, in Dunn's words, "find a code" to hold onto.

The feminism to which Greer gave popular voice boxed up all those dubieties in an ideological ark of the covenant. Its commandments provided certainty, moral legitimacy and scholarly respectability in place of the chaotic confusions Emma Charlton had expressed. After The Female Eunuch, it became perfectly OK to "look down" on men because the chains and manacles of a secular faith had been locked on "to keep them in their place". Nobody doubted the identity of that faith's great high priest.

Thus – like Big Brother's "War is Peace" slogan in Orwell's 1984 – Greer promulgated a formula which was the dead opposite of the truth. The forces of liberation she claimed to be unleashing were, in truth, forces of conservatism and reaction. The revolutionary war she declared was to be an exercise in repression – keeping men in their place. To a signal degree, Germaine Greer's The Female Eunuch was to be the handbook for the totalitarian intolerance of our own age – tamer, more domesticated and less martial as our times have mercifully been than those earlier twentieth century totalitarian ages from which Greer and modern feminism drew their diction.

Such will be the glittering achievement which the feminist Old Guard will be commemorating next month. But comfort can be taken from the certainty that – just as it happened with the Soviet Politburo – the tide of history will break over their addled old heads and their fatuous faith and wash away the whole shebang, Big Sister and all.

That day may not be far off. At a dinner last week, I sat next to a 23 year-old graduate from the University of Colorado's school of journalism. When I asked what she thought about Germaine Greer and The Female Eunuch, she answered "I have never heard of that book."

Even among its devotees when it was published, The Female Eunuch now seems to have left a void. Shortly after it first appeared in 1970, a friend wrote to tell me that the book had hit her with such a profound, personal jolt that one particular passage had made her weep with relief. Suspecting that this must be about orgasms or something equally private, I was too timid at the time to ask what she was talking about. Preparing to write this article, however, I recently emailed to ask if she could tell me now why it had so deeply affected her. "I am sorry," she replied. "I don't think I can help you. I can't remember anything that struck such a chord."

That woman, now a pensioner, is, again, not alone. Her amnesia seems to be widely shared. An internet blogger, pondering the forthcoming 40th anniversary, writes: "I read this book in high school. I remember thinking it was awesome, but I can't remember what was in it."

That says it all.

AVfM Radio News and Activism: Stardusk

January 15, 2013 | by James Huff | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]

Tonight we will be featuring a prerecorded discussion with Stardusk, one of the more controversial and thought provoking voices associated with the MRM. He has drawn criticism from many quarters for his views on hypergamy and his seemingly extreme MGTOW philosophy. His you tube videos are marked by sound research and keen reasoning and he has gained a loyal following as well as a marked degree of respect from many in the MRM. It was a stimulating and pleasant talk and we are sure that you will find it thought provoking and informative.

The show starts tonight, 15th, at 9:00 PM Eastern, 8:00 PM Central, which is 2:00 AM January 16th in London and 11:00 AM January 16th in Brisbane.

SHOW PAGE

STICKAM

[/box]

Is Croatia the Balkans' Sweden?

January 15, 2013 | by Lucian Vâlsan | Link | Original Link

Some of the readers might not even know where Croatia is, although this small country is due to join the EU this summer, and more importantly it is the only country that actually stands a chance to make its capital city, Zagreb, the European capital of Misandry. Croatia, or Hrvatska, is a unitary democratic parliamentary republic in Europe at the crossroads of Central Europe, the Balkans, and the Mediterranean.

The deputy prime minister of this country is Vesna Pusić. This lady has a long history of radical feminist activism starting in 1978 when she was one of the 7 initiators of the infamous movement called "Žena i društvo" (Women and society), a movement that was so radically left wing that even the Marxist government that was in place at that time criticized it. It's worth mentioning though that Croatia was part of Yugoslavia at that moment.

After the Iron Curtain fell, Yugoslavia dismembered and Croatia became an independent country. At that point, Pusić entered politics. Her biography gives a revealing quote:[2]

> I wanted to be consistent with my beliefs and fight for justice in the society. My role model was Savka, I knew that I should follow the example of such a brave woman.

By "Savka", she means Savka Dabčević-Kučar[3], the 5th prime-minister of the Croatian Yugoslav Unit in late 1960s, an infamous female Communist politician who tried really hard to prevent Croatia from becoming a democratic society after independence.

Her biography reveals another interesting quote[4]:

> In her university career she has led or participated in many research projects. In 1978 she was the coordinator of a research project on the prevailing political, religious, family and work values in Croatia, which later became part of a larger project called The New Agenda for a New Democracy.

After reading this quotation, it becomes very unclear whether this is the biography of a Croatian Marxist-Feminist politician, or the biography of Herbet Marcuse, the Marxist theoretician that made feminism and political correctness known in the West back in the 1960s.

Although Vesna Pusić is pulling the strings, and her agenda and ideology is beyond all doubt a Marxist-feminist one, she is only the tip of the iceberg. The extent of feminist governance in Croatia is even more complex than any ROKS[5] radical could dream to implement in Sweden.

Speaking of ROKS in Sweden, Croatia has its own ROKS which is called B.A.B.E. but, unlike the Swedish 'sister' organization, B.A.B.E. has a say in every single lawmaking issue whenever the feminists consider that their dogma is not properly represented in the law.

This is the image on the front page of the B.A.B.E.'s website. And yes, to them, 'All men are rapists' is an undeniable truth. But it's not only their twisted bigoted, beliefs that are the problem. The problem is that they are the ones who get to be consulted in lawmaking, and the national TV program (paid by the taxpayers) is allowing them to have a weekly program and regular occurrences on morning programs. All these on taxpayers' money.

Moreover, the 'experts' from BABE are constantly invited in elementary schools where they get to spew their bigotry in front of impressionable children[6].

But it goes well beyond than spewing some bigotry in schools or on TV.

Roughly 70% of the family courts judges in Croatia are women and it's almost mandatory, as a family court judge, to take "additional education" classes where 'experts' from B.A.B.E. organization come and say to the judges that they should automatically believe any woman divorcee that comes and accuse her former husband of rape. At the same time, the domestic violence social workers are also instructed by B.A.B.E. to push women to accuse their ex-husbands of rape, regardless of whether it happened.

And indeed they do. They do it openly because there is no legal consequence for it. Croatian doctors and social workers have made public appeals against this practice. They have even given it a name – SAID syndrome (Sex Allegations In Divorce). This happened after the proportion of false allegations reached an all-time record of 89%[7]. Yes, that's right! Roughly 9 out of 10 rape and domestic abuse allegations in Croatia turn out to be false reports.

From January 1 2013, the Criminal Code of Croatia has been changed. First, they made female circumcision illegal[8]. Of course, there was not a single case in Croatia of a woman or a girl being circumcised and, of course, male circumcision is still under the 'religious freedoms' provisions. So Croatia now joins the huge club of countries and nations where everyone is entitled to their own body integrity, except for boys.

Now, an article in the Croatian media says that "sex without consent is now criminal offence," which does not sound bad. However, a few lines down the article, Marijan Mrčela, a judge in the Supreme court in Croatia says the following:

> This law wants to stress that any use of force or threat also means absence of consent, and it is not necessary that the victim has been resisting. A person who is accused may try to prove that consent existed, but the burden of proof in on that person [the accused]. The prosecutor has to prove that sexual act existed, and the accused person has to prove that consent existed.

And there goes the presumption of innocence. Remember: this is the official interpretation of a Supreme Court judge. Other judges have stated off the record (according to the article in Vecernji) that this law literally means that you need to have a written contract with your wife (with witnesses) before having sex with her in order to avoid ending up in jail.

This judge was kind enough to warn everyone because the law methodology contains such a sophisticated encrypted language that makes it impossible for the average person to understand it. Just like in Romania, where they have a law that is virtually indistinguishable from VAWA, but it's formulated in such an encrypted language that it becomes incomprehensible.

There is currently a "debate" in Croatia with regard to introducing sexual education classes in schools based on the Swedish model. I say "debate" because there is no debate. The feminists state their wishes and then don't address any counterpoints. Then the government concludes that the debate is over and it was won by the feminists. That's how things work in Croatia in 2013.

So basically, soon enough, we will have 'All men are rapists and all women are oppressed victims' being taught to 10 year olds in all Croatian schools.

Moreover, Croatia has two highly expensive feminist-driven government bureaucracies dealing with 'gender equality'.

The first one is Pravobranitelj za Ravnopravnost Spolova(PRS)[9] or, the Public Defender for Gender Equality (literally: Ombudsperson for Gender Equality). This organization has roughly 150 highly paid government employees of which 87% are women. One of their goals is to push legislation that would force private companies to have a 'gender quota' in their boardrooms. They also want a similar law when it comes to the Parliament seats.

Someone asked them: Well, you want gender quotas and 'gender equality', right? Then how come almost 90% of your employees are female? How's that for 'gender equality'?

Their answer was:

> It's not our fault that women have better resumes

Well, of course it's not their fault, but it's also not men's fault that men get elected more often in the parliament or that men tend to create more companies and be in the boardrooms more often. This organization is impressing through its sheer hypocrisy and stupidity. That alone deserves a separate story.

The second feminist-driven taxpayers funded government bureaucracy in Croatia is Ured za Ravnopravnost Spolova(URS)[10] or the Office for Gender Equality. In URS, there is no man working there. I guess 'gender equality' means 100% women for this Croatian government bureaucracy.

One of the employees from URS stated on the national television answering the question: "How many men work in your office?" the following:

> None. But we would really want to have one to fight for women's rights

So, they would really like one – but not to fight for gender equality – but for women's rights, because men's rights aren't relevant in Croatia.

As we speak, URS is counting male and female names in the media and in the streets that are named after people. While hundreds of innocent men are being thrown into jail due to feminist-driven false allegations, the Office for 'Gender Equality' is counting the streets that are named after women.

At this point, the Croatian banks are giving interest-free loans to the businesses owned by women. Of course, there is no such thing as loans without interest – so the State is using the taxpayers' money to pay for the business loans. Because of this, Croatia has had an explosion in businesses like cookie manufacturing, wedding organizers and flower shops while Croatian heavy industry is crumbling. Factories are being forced offline as companies go bankrupt or move to Slovenia, Serbia, Bulgaria or Romania – countries that are nearby and don't have to face disloyal competition from the State.

Croatia has the highest percentage of women being deployed to war zones from the entire NATO alliance, although women are subjected to lower standards than men (while being paid the same). Of course, 100% of the Croatian military personnel that died in the Croatian war of independence were so far men. But this doesn't seem to matter for the countless offices and ombudspersons for 'gender equality' in Croatia.

The Croatian government is currently "debating" a new initiative which provides that all women who have been raped in war receive monetary compensation. Of course, the majority of military people being raped and tortured in war are men, but why on Earth would the feminist deputy prime minister of Croatia care about that?

On January 13 2013, Milanka Opačić[11], the other deputy prime-minister who is also the Minister for Social Welfare and Youth said the following[12]:

> It's better to make a false rape or domestic violence allegation than to make none

To me, this is an open admission that misandry is the state policy when it comes to rape and domestic violence in Croatia. But if you read a bit further between the lines, it's the old Communist saying that governed Eastern Europe until early 1990s: 'The end justifies the means' or, to put into context, "it's better to have both innocent and guilty people in jail, than have nobody in jail".

So yes, for Croatian top politicians like Milanka Opačić or Vesna Pusić, the question of guilt in DV or rape cases is of little importance as long as men keep piling up in Croatian jails. It serves the narrative of eternal female victimhood, a narrative that's being reinforced constantly by the Croatian media.

The Croatian national TV program runs stories at least twice a week about how the Swedish model of 'gender equality' is the best in the world and how those that oppose the model are just a bunch of evil, rape apologist, patriarchal bigots.

So, is Croatia the Balkans' Sweden? Maybe. Although I'm an atheist, I say: "May God have mercy on Croatian men".

There is little to no hope in Croatia at this point since Socijaldemokratska Partija Hrvatske (the Social-Democratic Party – emerged directly from the League of Communists of Croatia[13]) and has seized power. This summer Croatia will join the EU which comes with even more feminist-driven policies[14].

The people's attitude towards the non-feminist discourse varies between "Man up!" and "Yes, you're right – I knew that the Jewish conspiracy to bring the New World Order was true!" Sane attitudes cannot reach any person who happens to care about men and boys . With prevailing beliefs, there's basically little hope for the situation to change any time soon.

Special thanks to the Croatian MRA who wishes to remain anonymous and who has helped with most of the documentation and with some of the translations.

[1] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Vesna_Pusi%C4%87

[2] http://vesna-pusic.hns.hr/clanak.php?id=138875

[3] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Savka_Dab%C4%8Devi%C4%87-Ku%C4%8Dar

[4] op cit pusic-hns.hr

[5] http://sv.wikipedia.org/wiki/ROKS

[6] http://www.babe.hr/hr/vijesti/908-babe-u-osnovnoj-skoli-vocin/

[7] http://www.jutarnji.hr/89-posto-prijava-protiv-oceva-je-lazno/260583/

[8] http://www.vecernji.hr/vijesti/nova-kaznena-djela-podmicivanje-zastupnika-seks-bez-pristanka-clanak-448215

[9] http://www.prs.hr/

[10] http://www.ured-ravnopravnost.hr/site/

[11] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Milanka_Opa%C4%8Di%C4%87

[12]http://www.index.hr/vijesti/clanak/ministrica-opacic-bolje-je-nekada-prijaviti-lazno-zlostavljanje-nego-ga-ne-prijaviti/656805.aspx

[13] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Social_Democratic_Party_of_Croatia

[14] http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/feminist-lies-feminism/eus-feminist-crusader-never-stops/

Daddy Justice on trial via false allegations

January 16, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Details on the complete story are sketchy, but we have just been advised that high profile father's advocate Ben Vonderheide, aka Daddy Justice, is on trial for harassment and disorderly conduct. Daddy Justice is the same activist who was physically assaulted in the halls of the US Senate by feminist ideologue, attorney and VAWA advocate Lisalyn Jacobs during a VAWA conference.

The video footage below includes the recorded testimony of DV advocate Kathy Markley, an employee of the Lancaster County, Pennsylvania "Community Action Committee" for 18 years, who give a very detailed account of her allegations against Mr. Vonderheide. HOWEVER, also shown is the surveillance video provided by the sheriff's department of what apparently transpired during the times Markley claims she was being harassed.

If the footage shown here actually coincides with the time that she alleges the mistreatment, then it proves she is a bald-faced liar, trying to trump up charges on Daddy Justice in order to silence him so that the county can continue their court sanctioned child abuse racket unimpeded.

Let it be known from this point forward that if Ben Vonderheide is being railroaded there will be no hesitation on the part of the management of this website to profile every single person involved, regardless of their position in the community or government, and to ensure that as many people find out about their malfeasance as is humanly possible. More to come on this, as this is all we have for now.

What do you have to complain about?

January 16, 2013 | by Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) | Link | Original Link

---

What do you have to complain about?

You are a man, and that means you are a privileged snob that rolls in the mud of female suffering like the happy hog you are. What do you have to complain about?

What indeed.

It is true that there are MRAs that live good lives, including myself. After my folks split up when I was eight, I grew up under my single feminist mother. She spoiled me rotten and I acted the part. The cops knew me since I would pretend to threaten suicide in middle school to avoid homework. Taking psychiatric pills to address my Asperger's Syndrome and Tourettes did not really rectify the situation. By fourteen, I weighed 280 pounds (127 kg) and was hopped up on Ambien, Depakote, Abilify, Seroquel, Geodon, Risperdal, Prozac and Zanax.

I once saw an old man's face in the wall and threw pizza at it.

Once I turned sixteen, my mother gave up and tossed me to my father, who threw the meds away and taught me real discipline while I went cold turkey. The transition was akin to being thrown in a big dryer containing a running woodchipper. My pseudo-pride was crushed into oblivion by a man with 63-years of experience in dealing with bullshit. In the years following, I lost 100 pounds, stopped taking all of the meds, earned several scholarships, got listed in USA Today, the Mississippi Business Journal, a Phi Theta Kappa press release due to my design for a Mars mission, and started my own business. And that's just to name a few examples. I apologize for tooting my own horn, but it is important to understand that my opportunities came from learning harsh life lessons that feminists are not being taught.

The radical change required me to accept I was not hot shit, and that I did not deserve what I had. Those simple lessons contributed to the humility that was central to my growth, and I would never dare forget that. I have a wonderful life now. So, why am I a MRA? What do I have to "complain" about?

There are three things that stick out: One, when I see a spoiled woman get political about minor inconveniences in her awesome life, I get nauseous. I know from firsthand experience how rotten a person has to be to accept no personal responsibility. Two, I notice these women seem to be taken seriously despite their avarice as long as they brand themselves as feminists. Three, I get insulted when one of these feminists turn around and suggest that my good life came from being male.

Let me make this perfectly clear. My good life came from wonderful people who wanted to make it good. My problem was that I did not appreciate them, and I did not appreciate myself in the right way. The prestige and skills I have today came from hard work and from accepting that my life is my responsibility. I won't say that I did it all myself, because that's bullshit, but I did have to initiate my own climb out of a hole I threw myself into. My friends and family tossed me a rope but I had to choose to climb it and prepare to grovel on the way up. This situation revolved around attitude, not anatomy.

What I did is what feminists must do now.

I am watching spoiled people who are a lot older than me calling for my destruction. It is like looking back in time. I am watching what I once was try to destroy me for what I currently am.

Let me put it this way. The projections, the narcissism, the entitlement and the hatred all boil down to the same subconscious self-loathing that made me never trust my own initiative. The same self-loathing that told me that I never have it good enough, even when people were slaving to show me otherwise.

I am "complaining" about the feminists who are telling women that their lives are never good enough in a society when there is an ocean of money available to them. I'm seeing a duck with a monocle sitting atop a pyramid of gold coins in a vault where only some have the key.

If the money is not an indicator of privilege, what about female political representation? To augment my assertion clearer, the following is not to be read closely as such but illuminates when seen as a dark block of ink from twenty feet away.

A General Federation of Women's Clubs, a Violence Against Women Act, a National Organization for Women, a National Women's Law Center, a Hot Gamer Girls club, a Global Network of Women's Shelters, a Women in Science International League, a Council of Women World Leaders, an International Council of Jewish Women, an International Women's Department, a Women Achievers Association, a P.E.O. Sisterhood, a Relief Society, a Third World Organization for Women in Science, UNIFEM, a Woman's Christian Temperance Union, a Women's Commission For Refugee Women and Children, a Women's Environment & Development Organization, a Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, an International Federation of Business and Professional Women, an International Federation of University Women, a Women's International Zionist Organization, a World Association of Girl Guides and Girl Scouts, a Young Women's Christian Association, an American Association for Women Radiologists, an American Association of University Women, an American Heritage Girls, an American Woman Suffrage Association, an Association of Women Professionals, an Association for Women in Science, a Big Sisters, a Business and Professional Women, a Concerned Women for America, a Commercial Real Estate Women, a Daughters of the American Revolution, a Daughters of Utah Pioneers, an Equal Rights Advocates, Feminists for Life, a Feminist Majority Foundation, a General Federation of Women's Clubs ("hey, we need a club of clubs now!"), a Girl Scouts of the United States of America, a League of Women Voters, Mommy Mentors, a National American Woman Suffrage Association, a National Association of Female Professionals, a National Association of University Women, a National Council of Jewish Women, a National Federation of Republican Women, a National Woman Suffrage Association, a National Women's Political Caucus, a Refugee Women's Network, Women of Visionary Influence, a Woman's Christian Temperance Union, a Women's Bowling Congress, a Woman's Missionary Union, a Women Open Network, a U.S. Women's Chamber of Commerce, a Women's Commission for Refugee Women and Children, a Younger Women's Task Force, a Women In Prison and a Women's WorldWide Web.

You can walk back to the monitor now.

What do I have to "complain" about? How about the people who are blind to how good they have it? How about the fact that these people are actually taken seriously?

My question to feminists is:

What do you have to complain about? On top of the basic human rights of suffrage, free (hate) speech and ability to choose your own path among the options available to you, you demand courtly love, an exercising of the power to demonize half of the human race for disagreeing with you and a calling upon a wealth of political and legal authorities who are ready to listen. Are you listening when I am saying "I have checked my privilege, and am getting zip"?

The jury has been out. The discrimination-oriented pay gap is a myth. "The Patriarchy" is a myth. Men die for you more than you die for them. Men have willingly surrendered power to you, and believe me, if we were the totalitarian, chauvinistic fucks you say we are, then you would not have made even an inch of progress. Whenever you doubt your political representation, refer to the above list and remind yourself that you are pretty loved.

But what does that matter? You aren't happy anyway. Of course not! Spoiled children are never happy. When you are spoiled, you choose to leave the realm of reason and adopt the most primitive form of parasitic hedonism. Instead of improving yourself and earning what you work for, you adapt new methods of manipulation to hoard more and more.

Don't believe me? Think I'm the next blind soul who refuses to see my privilege? That is where you are wrong. The difference between you and me is that I have gratitude. In your refusal to see your privilege, I am watching you lower yourself into your own hole. There will come a sad day when you realize you need to get yourself out, and only the people you alienated are the ones able to toss down the rope. It is a good thing you had so much practice shouting for what you want since it might be hard to hear you from all the way up here. I hope you can hear me when I shout down to you just five words:

"HELP-ME-FIND-MY-PRIVILEGE."

AVFM Radio: Top Down Sexism

January 17, 2013 | by AVfM Radio | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]

Organized sexism world wide, a hate movement in the UN.

International aid agencies tell a palatable story, they paint themselves in the colors of Samaritans, and they even announce who they exclude from available help, by omitting their mention in favor of more decorative and popular recipients. After the Earthquake in Haiti, the United Nations organized food and water distribution with an explicit mandate to help, but giving food and water to only women, and excluding men. The tragedy of a natural disaster exploited to engage in society wide social re-engineering, placing the one group of people over another.

Now an international children's charity organized through the United Nations is using your tax dollars and your trust to place the well-being and the humanity of one group over another, again. Girls count as humans, boys apparently do not. Under another name, this is the same organization who, while opposing the religious ritual sexual mutilation of female infants, is actively pursuing the sexual mutilation of men and boys across Africa, using the wholly phony claim that circumcision curtails the transmission of aids. The international consultant for UN Aids, by the way, stands to make millions of dollars through the use of patented equipment to be used in this culture wide mission of mutilation. The words corruption, cruelty, and sadism don't even begin to describe what Bob O'hara, Kristina Hansen, Girl Writes What and James Huff will be talking about tonight, on a Voice for Men Radio

To call in to the show, dial 310 388 9709 at 6:PM Pacific time, and 8 PM Mountain time.

http://www.blogtalkradio.com/avoiceformen/2013/01/18/top-down-sexism

[/box]

Disturbing developments in Kirk case

January 17, 2013 | by Dr. Tara J. Palmatier | Link | Original Link

---

On September 21, 2012, Judge James A. Matish of the West Virginia Fifteenth Judicial Circuit Court heard LtCol. Joel Kirk's appeal to reverse two incomprehensible rulings made by Judge Lori B. Jackson. The appeal requests that Matish:

1.) Overturn several mathematical errors Lori Jackson made in a previous ruling. Jackson's errors would cost Col. Kirk a great deal of money he does not have because it never existed.

Jackson held Kirk in contempt for non-payment even though she admitted to making the errors. Jackson decided to uphold her errors because she did not believe they were "that big of a mistake." Jackson told Joel she would expunge the contempt charge if he paid the non-existent money specified in her previous ruling even though she acknowledged her calculations were wrong. Believe it or not, Jackson used to be an accountant.

2.) Overturn Jackson's August 2012 decision to give 50/50 custody to Tina and Joel and the implication that Tina would eventually be given full primary custody. Jackson made this ruling despite overwhelming evidence that Tina is an emotionally abusive and physically violent, untreated Borderline Personality Disordered, drug and alcohol abusing parent who has yet to undergo treatment for these issues.

GAL REPORT

AUDIO FILE

Even though the Kirk children's physical safety and emotional well-being are at stake, Matish deferred making a ruling for 60 days and inexplicably mirrored Lori Jackson's sentiments by proclaiming:

"This case is quite disturbing in the behavior of both parties. Ms. Kirk for her substance abuse and Mr. Kirk for filming from a dark room."

Male victims of abusive women, especially borderline personality disordered women, frequently have to record their abuses because it is the only way anyone will believe them. It is common practice for attorneys and therapists specializing in these cases to advise clients with BPD spouses to do exactly what Joel did – document the abuse. At Shrink4Men, we call this the ABR Rule (Always Be Recording).

Before Jackson replaced Judge Cornelia Reep, Col. Kirk had advised the court repeatedly about Tina's abusive behavior and substance abuse problems, but his concerns were ignored. It was only after he produced video evidence that CPS and the court began to take the problem seriously, that is until Jackson was given the case.

Would Matish have condemned Tina for filming Joel from a "dark room" if he was the abuser or commended her for trying to protect the children and herself? Matish appears to either be ignorant or be operating under a woefully disturbing double standard when it comes to female abusers or both.

Meanwhile, it is nearly 120 days since the September appeal hearing and Matish has yet to make a ruling. Perhaps Matish naively believes Tina's violent and abusive episode captured on the June 28, 2009 video (above audio file) was an isolated incident. In reality, it is just the tip of the iceberg. AVFM and Shrink4Men have so many audio files documenting Tina's abuse of Col. Kirk and the children that we are still going through them months after receiving them.

One can only speculate why Matish has allowed these two issues, one very urgent because it involves the safety of minors, to sit on his desk for almost 4 months. One can only speculate why he needed to adjourn at all to fix another Judge's admitted mathematical error.

How Many Judges Does It Take to Divorce a Borderline?

Over the last 3.5 years, the Kirk case has had five judges. Five judges.

Judge Cornelia Reep: She recused herself due to a conflict of interest after Tina fired her original family law lawyer, who she still owes $18,000, and hired personal injury attorney, Thomas G. Smith. Reep represented Smith in his divorce when she was a practicing attorney. Smith and associates appear to be working on a contingency fee basis, which is illegal in West Virginia family law cases.

Reep ruled that the children should have no contact with their mother until Tina underwent treatment and was deemed safe by the children's therapist and the GAL. Therefore, Reep had to go so Tina could get in front of the only other Harrison County Family Court judge who just happens to be a close family friend of one of Tina's drinking buddies, Celeste Clutter. Thomas G. Smith's law firm coincidentally happens to be one of Clutter's biggest clients at the radio station where Celeste works in sales.

Judge Lori B. Jackson: Jackson's malfeasance, enabling of child abuse and multiple conflicts of interest are evident. Jackson ruled that the children's visitation with Tina would resume, unsupervised, against the protests of the GAL and the children's therapist.

Judge James A. Matish: See above.

State Supreme Court Justice Menis E. Ketchum: In early October 2012, Justice Ketchum recused Jackson due to the Internet coverage of the Kirk case on AVFM, Shrink4Men and other websites. Ketchum should have recused Jackson for gross incompetence, judicial malfeasance, multiple conflicts of interest and for her reckless endangerment of the Kirk children.

Judge J. Jeffrey Culpepper: Justice Ketchum appointed Monongalia County Judge Culpepper to replace Jackson. However, Judge Culpepper cannot rule on the Kirk case in its entirety because Matish, a colleague of Jackson's, continues to sit on Col. Kirk's appeal. One also wonders why Matish has not handed the appeal to Judge Culpepper. It would certainly help to simplify things in the Harrison County Dysfunctional Family Court Circus.

So that's 3.5 years, 5 judges and no resolution for the Kirk children and LtCol. Kirk.

Dumpster Diving for Dollars

Tina Kirk's four ambulance chasing personal injury attorneys, Thomas G. Smith, Esq., Jamison H. Cooper, Esq., Afton Leanne Huston, Esq. and Daniel C. Cooper, Esq. (the husband of Jamison Cooper) deny Tina's abuse — even after watching the video, the GAL report, the therapist's testimony and psychiatric evaluations. They claim it was an isolated incident because "Joel got Tina drunk" and has since attended anger management counseling at her new church.

First, there is no documentation that Tina has undergone treatment by a credentialed mental health professional that specializes in BPD and substance abuse. Sorry, but a few confabs with Pastor "Suffer the Little Children," a few crocodile tears and a few prayer circles is not a cure for either Borderline Personality Disorder or alcoholism — except perhaps in Lori Jackson's court. It remains to be seen whether this also applies to Matish's court.

Second, there are many photos of Tina taken after June 2009, partying it up on different occasions, drink in hand.

Third, the last thing the partner of an out-of-control, violent BPD wants is for her or him to get drunk. BPD and alcohol can be a dangerous combination and no one in their right mind would want to expose themselves or their children to that.

Fourth, AVFM and Shrink4Men have received recent reports of ongoing abuse by Tina Kirk toward their two children, including a public display of abuse in December 2012. After AVfM ran The Real Housewives of Harrison County on October 8, 2012, one of the housewives contacted Paul Elam via email, providing us with additional information.

This housewife of Harrison County reported that Tina was so drunk the night of the party documented in the photos in The Real Housewives article, that she got into a screaming match with her bouncer boyfriend in Celeste Clutter's driveway and was asked to leave.

We also have reports from other community members that Tina has begun yet another smear campaign by approaching the children's educators and extracurricular activity instructors claiming Joel is abusing his children without providing a shred of evidence to substantiate her claims.

Smear campaigns are textbook Borderline behavior. Borderlines typically initiate smear campaigns during divorce and custody proceedings (and sometimes during the relationship) in an attempt to cover up abuse that they are actually committing. Smear campaigns are just a public form of projection, misinformation and redirection.

Furthermore, Judge Culpepper placed a gag order on both Kirks in December 2012, so it would appear that Tina is in violation of the gag order as she goes about Harrison County slandering Col. Kirk.

Tina Kirk's abuse of the Kirk children is active and ongoing. It is not "in the past" nor is it an "isolated incident." Yet Judge Matish continues to let this case drag on. In doing so, he is enabling the abuse of children just like Lori B. Jackson. That makes two judges in Harrison County demonstrating abject indifference to child abuse. What are the odds?

Swedish feminists on the warpath against hate

January 17, 2013 | by Joakim Ramstedt | Link | Original Link

Some of you might remember the infamous Swedish film clip where a group of Swedish feminists calling themselves S.C.U.M Sweden, produced and posted a video on Youtube depicting the point-blank shooting and murder of a man reading a newspaper. Read more about it here. Now another video have been posted on Youtube. This time they even threaten the swedish prime minister. This time it´s another radical left wing feminist group who call themselves "Skabbteatern" (Scabies theater) who are the producers. This new masterpiece is called "Du är en fitta, din fitta" (You are a cunt you cunt). They do love the C word, those feminists.

In this movie two women wearing ski masks are running around flaunting big guns. In the background you can hear a fateful female voice recite 14 names. The message is just as clear as it is threatening.

A wide array of people, all men of course, now have a reason to sleep a little less comfortable at night as they clearly are on the feminist hate list (death list?). In this part of the world, feminists of this variety usually mean business.

Welcome to Sweden, Mr Assange.

[image]
You are a cunt, you cunt
Lowlifes like Anders Breivik, the mass murderer from Norway, and Göran Lindberg,, the "ultra feminist" former chief of police, now serving time for multiple rapes of young girls, get conflated with upstanding, wise and peaceful bloggers and political critics of feminism like Pär Ström and Medborgare X (Citizen x). I didn't make the list this time, which I am thankful for. The Swedish prime minister Fredrik Rheinfeldt and school minister Jan Björklund however are among the names on the list, though it´s kind of hard to understand why. Feminists don´t have anything to complain about when it comes to Swedish government.

Pär Ström by the way, who for a long time was Sweden's top blogger on this subject, has now declared that he will leave this debate altogether due to the amount of hate and threats against himself and his family. THAT is hate, just not the kind that sells newspapers.

Here you can see the newest example of Swedish tax dollars at work. I am aware that this will get the film a lot of hits on the tube, but maybe it should. As long as the hits are of the right kind.

Watch here.

The film clip is well produced; clearly not the work of amateurs. How much money this theater group receives in state funding is yet not clear but I am sure those figures will emerge. The film is said to be a protest against what the group calls "The growing hatred of women." This is the new mantra of Swedish feminists and mainstream

Swedish media. Any criticism of feminism, however sane and justified, is being described as “hatred against women.”

This is becoming a big “problem” in Sweden if you are to believe the state and corporate news. Apparently more and more Swedes are suddenly, inexplicably starting to “hate women.” They are now using this as an excuse to censor the web. They are closing down commenting opportunities, blaming it on what they call “hate, misogyny and racism.” However, as you are already aware, this is not what it is about at all.

In Sweden we still have one big forum that they can´t touch. The owners and servers are in the US and therefore protected against Swedish authorities under US laws of freedom of speech. It´s called Flashback.org. A kind of Reddit, but in Swedish. This is by far the most hated site in Sweden among the politically correct elite and feminists (often one and the same) simply due to the fact that it respects the freedom of speech. It is a beacon of light for Swedes; a breathing hole in the ice.

But I am straying from the subject.

On the webpage “classhate.com” the scabies theater describe the purpose of this latest work of art. Here you have the unique opportunity to pick the brain of a radical left wing Swedish feminist. You just have to read the first paragraphs to realize that there is something missing in the puzzle.

“Scabies Theatre initiated the short film “You are a cunt you cunt” because we felt a strong need to visualize that there is a conflict between women who fight for their rights – the feminists – and men who hate women. What makes this conflict so incredibly frustrating is that one side – the opponents of women and their rights – won´t agree that they are a united group with power, or even acknowledge that the conflict exists. Of course, the ability to define a conflict as a non-conflict or problem as a non-issue, is something that can only exist because of the precedence of the defining group based on its position of power.

“At the same time the number of misogynists in our society are growing and they become ever more virulent in their attacks on the group of people that dare to draw attention to the power structures that exists. The question then becomes: How the hell will we be able to reason with people who do not even want to admit that there is something to talk about?

“We did not select the fourteen persons we name in the movie because they are the only people who hate and oppose feminists, but to show that they share the same view, even if their methods are different.

“You are a cunt you cunt” is not a declaration of war, it is a response to the war that has been waged against us ever since we began to open our mouths, and our message is simple: anyone who disagrees with us can go to hell. We no longer have the stamina to coddle the empire of misogynistic, racist and capitalist pigs that oppresses us women and others in the community, to try to prove to them that we are worth something. Neither do we intend to give them the privilege to define how we should react to their oppression, which affects us very personally in our lives.

"We have every right to be angry. And we will use that right without the obligation of having to explain ourselves to idiots who are not interested in re-evaluating their perception of women or gender. This has never been about lack of information. We want to initiate a real debate about the reality in Sweden. One where you can not just cover up completely unacceptable values ??and a putrid humanity with bullshit.

"People who actually have the power shall not be able to escape the core of their actions with pointless empty phrases as "we care about people", when their actual actions show that they despise all what humanity is. You have no right to call yourselves"feminists" if you do not lift a finger to improve the situation of women or even worse, actively work against women.

"We have a responsibility to stand up for what we think is right, even if it is uncomfortable. We want to use this this film also to reach out to all who openly dare to criticize misogyny, racism, fascism and nationalism. We want to form a united front where we who have had enough of the current trend towards an inhumane society know that we can count on each other's support. The more we become , and the more public space we take to fight against these atrocities, the more we can make it clear once and for all that we do not accept what those bastards do."

So there you have it, You can either agree with the feminists of Sweden or go to hell.

An eternity burning in agonizing pain suddenly doesn't sound so bad.

Dear alumni, time to go back to school

January 17, 2013 | by Jonathan Taylor | Link | Original Link

As an MRA who focuses on education issues, I spend a lot of time thinking about how best to tackle the problems affecting male students. I divide these problems into three main areas: educational attainment, the academic culture, and rights and protections [1]. Although outside academia there are numerous factors contributing to the educational decline of boys (fatherlessness ranking high among them), within academia I believe the root of these problems is the academic culture itself.

When this culture is not misandric, it is complacent with the status quo. Being mentally stuck in the "social justice" era of the 1960s, many in academia have not progressed beyond that point and updated their data and approach with the times [2]. In the meantime male students have slipped further and further away, especially in the areas of educational attainment [3] and rights and protections [4]. While I spend a lot of time documenting these problems, my thoughts constantly return to activism and considering who in academia we can rely upon to advance the cause of equality for men and boys.

And therein lies the problem: who can we rely on? Teachers, when not politically hostile to men and boys as a group, wilt under the prospect of opposing those who are, especially if they are administrators. At many institutions tenure is being phased out [5] at the same time that misandry is becoming firmly entrenched, allowing ideologues who have completed their long march through academia to pull up the ladder behind themselves and keep those with alternative perspectives perpetually off-balance.

Administrators are also not particularly known for their vertebrae when it comes to standing up for unpopular yet ethical views. "Liabilities" is the language they best understand, a language in which federal funding speaks louder than conscience and reason. Like faculty, they too are often politically motivated to ignore the needs of male students as a group. Being the very essence of the status quo, administrators by nature are highly resistant to change and will employ a wide array of bureaucratic parlor tricks to ward off those they hope are too naïve, ignorant, or powerless to oppose them.

They may, for example, say, "we're thinking about it" (when they want you to go away), "that's not my department" (when it is), "I can't tell you what we do behind closed doors because it's protected by the Family Education Rights and Privacy Act" (often lies), " "we don't have funding for it" (lies), "I sent you an email about it" (lies), or their secretary may say "she can't speak with you because she's out to lunch/sick/left early for the day/at a meeting" (more lies). I have spent more time than I would like to count chasing administrators up and down academia, and have learned from experience to have a healthy skepticism for their explanations.

Students, when fairly young, are often not overly concerned with political matters, but can be surprisingly receptive at times. It seems that every other day younger and younger students are popping up on the Men's Rights subreddit, talking about their experiences in school and joining the ranks of those informed by an MRA perspective. I have more hope for change from students than faculty and administrators. And yet, students are often subject to the whims of educators whose idea of diversity, too often, is to oppose the freedom of speech of everyone who politically disagrees with them [6].

Karma MRA MGTOW has voiced that one of his main goals in going on poster runs at universities is to reach the next generation. I believe there is a lot of value to this approach. We must not only reach out to the students, but also develop creative methods to shake up academia as a means of making way for them. When it comes to direct on-the-ground activism at particular universities, I have reached the conclusion that alumni are best suited for this job. Alumni, having already received their degree, can confront faculty and administrators without worrying about their grades or careers. When speaking to students, being an alumnus grants a degree of authority not normally afforded to your average poster-wielding activist. If only for the purpose of information gathering, alumni may also have the benefit of personal and professional networks that many students have not yet developed.

When conducting activism in academia, I strongly advocate the covert use of recording devices in "one-party consent" states (where only one person in the conversation needs to be aware of and consenting to the recording for it to be legal), and the publication of that information online when corruption is discovered. In activism generally, and especially in bureaucratic settings, I advise everyone to think of recording devices as your sword and shield. Remember that reputations take a lifetime to build and seconds to destroy. While not as high a priority as funding, the prospective loss of public image and reputation is still potent. When used correctly and against the right people, recording devices effectively nail not only certain faculty and administrators to the wall, but also the institutions they represent. And when exposed as a liability or made into an example in front of their peers, the academic castles of corrupt faculty and administrators can just as easily become their prisons.

As some of you may know, I am an alumnus and former instructor at A&M-Commerce, and spoke last year with two administrators at that university. In our meetings, Title IX Coordinator Michele Vieira admitted to joining other administrators in taking down – not once, but five times – YouTube videos recorded by students of "outrageous harassing behavior" by professors, that those who made false rape accusations were routinely not punished, and that she could not tell me that the preponderance standard the university had adopted was justified when I asked her. I tried to work with them to change their sexual misconduct policy to be fairer to the wrongly accused, but when they cut off communication I submitted an article containing the damning recording to A Voice for Men, where it was published [7].

As of right now, anyone who Googles the phrase "A&M-Commerce Rape Policy" will find the videos, articles and links to the recorded interviews at the top of the search results. In addition, Googling the phrase "Michele Vieira Title IX" will return the article at A Voice for Men named "Title IX Coordinator Protects Abuser, Abusive Policy." Students at A&M-Commerce who are wrongly accused or wrongly convicted in a university hearing, as well as their parents, will now have access to a lot of information describing what goes on behind the scenes – information they might use in their defense. When submitting the original article, I mentioned to Paul that the recording and article might serve a purpose for future activism. And it has.

During the fall semester of 2012, I made several trips to A&M-Commerce to post flyers directing students to the online material, and more importantly to talk with and engage the students directly about what was going on. With my smartphone in my shirt pocket, camera turned outward, I recorded everything. I directed them to my blog [8], which had more information than I was able to publish at A Voice for Men due to space constraints (such as screenshots of lengthy emails between myself and administrators), and which also linked back to the article at AVFM. I have compiled some of the most representative of those recordings into a video, which is now on YouTube. In listening to their statements you will hear them say things that may surprise you. They certainly surprised me.

Above all, I was surprised at how receptive the students were to hearing me out. I encountered a man who claims to have been wrongly accused and summarily fired. One student agreed to post a flyer on the fraternity house wall. I also found a student who was already under the impression that men and boys wrongly accused of sexual misconduct were guilty until proven innocent, and another who had been interested in a career in law and had already been looking into these things.

At the end of the video, you will see that when I explained to the surrounding students in the Sam Rayburn Student Center that the deck was stacked against those who were wrongly accused, a man playing pool exclaimed “Sounds good to me. Guilty!” I later learned that this man was a staff member who I did not recognize as such because he was dressed casually in a grey t-shirt. I did not see that the back of his shirt was marked “STAFF” until I looked back over my shoulder when I was approached by another staff member asking me to leave. While I was unable to get his name (he was not wearing a name tag and I was unable to find his picture on the university website), I did manage to catch him on video.

As chance would have it I am also friends on Facebook with one of my former colleagues at A&M-Commerce, who posted a picture of the flyer on his wall and said “So someone handed this to my students before they entered class.” One of his friends named Anne Phifer, a woman with Feminist sympathies who worked as a secretary in the Department of Literature and Languages when I was an instructor there, was among those who took exception to the flyers. It is a possibility she may work there still. This is also on the video.

It is my hope that others can learn from, use, and build upon these activism strategies. This was definitely a positive experience for me. In particular, I was surprised at how receptive and thankful a lot of students were. Part of this may be due to my rhetorical approach. Before engaging students with the material, I asked them if they had a minute. If they were busy or uninterested, I wished them a good day and moved on. I kept the needs of the student central to what I was saying, was concise whenever possible out of respect for their time, and at the end asked them if they had any questions, comments, or concerns.

All this can be heard in the video. The first five minutes is a recap for those on YouTube, but the rest is all new. Play here.

[1] http://commonmanmedia.blogspot.com/2012/03/war-on-male-students.html

[2] http://www.insidehighered.com/views/2009/03/06/whitmire

[3] http://www.avoiceformalestudents.com/wp-content/uploads/2013/01/All--four-degrees-percentage.jpg

[4] http://chronicle.com/article/In-Making-Campuses-Safe-for/127766/

[5] http://chronicle.com/article/Tenure-RIP/66114/

[6] http://thefire.org/cases/freespeech/

[7] http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/feminist-governance-feminism/am-title-ix--coordinator-protects-abuser-abusive-policy/

[8] http://commonmanmedia.blogspot.com/2012/10/the-war-on-male-students-at-a.html

Traditional women and their white knights

January 18, 2013 | by Rod Van Mechelen | Link | Original Link

Traditional marriage may have formed the foundation of modern civilization, but it turned men into white knights. Many of us want something better. Is there a way we can work with the traditional women who have lately come out to oppose the feminist hate mongers without compromising the values of the Men's Rights Movement?

Marriage is important

2012 Olympia, Wash. – Someday, I hope to get married. No, really. But the woman has to be special. First, she has to be intelligent. I find it hard enough to relate to most men. Sports, video games and other empty distractions bore me. It's even more challenging, however, to relate to most women. Fashions, tattoos, talk shows grubbing around in the rubble of relationships, they're worse than sports. At least football teams have pretty cheerleaders.

Second, I do not want a "wife." When I get married–if I ever get married–I will borrow a phrase from one of my favorite authors, L.E. Modesitt, Jr.[image] and refer to her as my "consort." The term connotes the kind of relationship we will have: equal but complementary. Marriage, after all, should not be a competition, but a gift.

To me, the ideal mate is someone who you actually want to talk with. Every now and then my attitude about that has come out at inopportune times. Once years ago, a girlfriend and I were knocking boots. Physically I was into it, but contrary to the sexist stereotype men can and do multitask quite well, so I started to talk with her about…something.

She did not respond well.

Which leads to my next must-have: a great sense of humor. I have known many women who, by their actions say to men, "Women have a superior sense of humor, now try to amuse me while I cut you down for being inferior." I have no time for them. My sense of humor ranges from the very goofy to the very dry, and I prefer the company women who can keep up. And if I have to work to keep up with her, all the better.

Fitness and vibrant good health are also important. But no gym rats. Fitness is like brushing your teeth. People who have sonic toothbrushes seem to spend hours brushing their teeth. That's goofy. Done right, oral health shouldn't take more than a few minutes a day. Same with exercise. Nutritional supplements, the Primal Diet and longevity medicine round it out. Life should be about more than sweating in a gym.

Complementary interests are also important. One of the women I'm in love with loves fish. Yes, she likes to-fish, but she's obsessed with restoring fish habitat and healthy fish runs. I wouldn't say that I love fish, but I admire her obsession. I want to restore human habitat and establish healthy human communities. She sees government programs as the means to accomplish her goals. Under current conditions, she's right. But I see liberty and free enterprise as the means to accomplish my goals, and believe that eventually they will work to fulfill her goals, too. So our interests are complementary.

Another woman I'm in love with has an obsession to bring organic produce and wholesome meals to her community. That's another fine obsession, in my opinion, and also complementary with my interests.

There are other women I'm in love with, and all of them have extraordinary interests. Is it possible to be in love with more than one person? Yes, of course. I'm not in a sexual relationship with any of them, and if that ever changes I will be committed to just the one woman because I believe in and support the institution of marriage as the bedrock of a healthy community.

I've written about that before and will again but no one, in my opinion, has written more eloquently on the importance of marriage than George Gilder in his book, Men and Marriage[image], and I recommend it without reservation.

Traditional Women's Rights Activists

But now I want to address a recent article written by "Edita TWRA". What does "TWRA" stand for? The first result in Google is "Tennessee Wildlife Resources Agency," but that didn't seem to fit. Edita's blog is Feminine Mystique: A Voice for Women ~ TWRA, and on her About page she explains:

> I am a TWRA (Traditional Women's Rights Activist). I am an ardent believer that feminism has hurt women and made it harder for women to reach happiness in our society. And I am here to expose feminism. – Feminine Mystique – About, Edita TWRA

Excellent! Men's Rights Activists (MRA) have been waiting for conservatives to get with the program and join us in opposing the feminists. Unfortunately as with most conservatives, Edita is openly hostile to the Men's Rights Movement (MRM):

> We are not egalitarians, feminists, men's rights activists (MRA) nor masculinists. This page is for anyone that believes women's lib was the worst thing to ever happen to women. Somebody has to say what nobody else is willing to. – Feminine Mystique – About, Edita TWRA

Now, I am a gender egalitarian and an MRA. More specifically, I'm a classical liberal (i.e., libertarian conservative) who focuses on exposing and opposing the anti-male sexism of the progressive and otherwise socialist feminists. But should that mean that we cannot work with traditionalists? Experience suggests we cannot. For decades we assumed we should be able to work with conservatives, only to discover that conservative organizations were more inclined to side with the feminist bigots!

Why would they do that?

From Shahrazad to Conservatism to Feminism

Ironically, feminism is rooted in conservatism. Even more ironically, modern day feminism traces its roots to Islamic culture. In brief, here's how: Minstrels accompanying the Christian Crusaders returned with Muslim stories, like The Arabian Nights[image]. Remember Shahrazad? Christian culture at that time did not put women on a pedestal, but Islamic idealism did, in theory though not in practice.

Tales express values and these values gradually find their way into culture. It is often observed that "corrupt American values" infect the world through Hollywood. Well, not all American values are corrupt, but it's true, nonetheless, that stories are a powerful medium for conveying cultural values. Thus it was that as Shahrazad became a part of the Christian culture, so the Islamic idealization of women became a part of western culture.

It took centuries, but this led western cultures to put women on a pedestal, too, and eventually to universal suffrage and feminism. Doubt it? Historian Reay Tannahil explains in her delightful book, Sex in History[image].

Women on a Pedestal

Objectively, there is no basis for putting women on a pedestal. We are all humans, all just people, and last time I checked women still grind food in their mouth and pass gas and more out the other end. Was the Apostle Paul thinking only of men when he wrote, in the Epistle to the Romans, that "all have sinned and come short of the glory of God"? No, I'm pretty sure he meant women, too.

So women are neither better nor worse than men. We are all just people.

Culturally, however, the practice of putting women on a pedestal is very effective. Cultures compete. Sometimes, one culture gains advantage through an accident, such as when the European cultures invaded the Americas. But for infectious diseases, like Small Pox, modern America would have a very different complexion today, if it existed at all. Nevertheless, once it took root, American culture was able to compete with other cultures very effectively. And it began with putting women on a pedestal.

Culturally Competitive

Culturally, England in particular gained a leg up on the rest of the world by putting women on a pedestal. The flip side to the "woman on a pedestal" myth was that a man was "the king of his castle." So what we call conservative values today held that women were morally superior to men, but that men "ruled the roost." It was contradictory and ignored certain fundamentals of human nature, but it worked.

This view spread to North America and Australia, whose cultural eminence today owes in large part to the social stability conferred by a middle class in which each man married one woman and toiled diligently to support her in "his" castle.

Do I think that's ideal or the best way to go? No. In my religion, women and men are equal partners and we believe there is a way to live that is optimally healthy for the individual, the family, the community, the nation and the world that does not involve putting women on a pedestal or viewing every man as the king of his castle.

Should that mean that those of us who have a more libertarian view should not work with those who hold a more conservative view toward achieving mutually desired goals? No. Historically, however, the conservatives have often given support to feminists, though they almost never give support to the men's and fathers' rights movements. And when they do attack feminism, often as not they take the same opportunity to attack MRA's:

> Women have been the biggest dupes of feminism. They have been manipulated, exploited and used as pawns thanks to the feminist ideology, which is pervading our society today. Probably the biggest loss lies in the degradation of the female body and spirit. This phenomenon clearly exposes itself in the modern girl. The modern girl who is promiscuous, she is independent and she is career minded. She believes that she may use the man for sex. – The Degradation of the Virtuous Woman or why Men Embrace Sluts (but Never Commit to them), Edita TWRA, Feminine Mystique, A Voice for Women, December 24, 2012

A lot of women and men can agree with that. Western culture today has been so corrupted that it's hard to find a relationship. And when we do, the risk runs high that it will end badly, both emotionally and socially for the woman, and legally as well for the man. So a lot of people who would prefer a committed relationship settle for hookups and one night stands, or no relationship at all.

No common ground?

Conservatives and traditionalists could find common ground with the MRM, but instead they attack, as Edita does in her article:

> Paul Elam for example calls traditional women nothing but mere whores. As he espouses that women ought to be feminists who do not seek commitment from loyal men. Paul Elam wants men to be free from the duty of being the breadwinner and especially from the duty of being a father. Just like feminists Paul Elam and Co. have started a bizarre vilification fest against the traditional woman. This clearly marks the merging of the feminist and MRA movements that oppose the traditional men and women who seek to combat the venomous ideology of feminism. – The Degradation of the Virtuous Woman or why Men Embrace Sluts (but Never Commit to them), Edita TWRA, Feminine Mystique, A Voice for Women, December 24, 2012

To be fair, she's reacting to something Paul wrote, which she quotes extensively from part of the following:

> You see, as much as you might like to delude yourself into thinking > otherwise, you are not a voice in defense of men and boys, you are simply another female elitist defending the traditional power to enslave men to your needs, desires and whims.No one is fooled by your fair weather defense of MRA's. You are acting in your self-interest and your self-interest alone. I'd sooner break bread with a feminist than a traditionalist whore seeking to protect the free labor and protection that keeps her on her bon-bon fattened ass.

>
> You want to help men? Get the fuck up off your lazy ass and get a job. Even better, find one that is good paying and that exposes you to every danger and hardship traditional men have been shielding women from for all time.
>
> You want to help men? Take on the responsibility of being one for five fucking minutes of your pampered, entitled life and see what it actually means to be one. There are women that do that, you know? Just not women like you.
>
> I for one am sick and fucking tired of seeing leeches come in to this movement defending nothing more than their free ride on this planet at the expense of the brainwashed bastards whose blood and sweat keeps a pillow under their ass.
>
> You want to help men? Then quit pretending like you know a thing about their lives and start actually learning that your traditional values are nothing more than a death trap for them so that you can take everything they earn and lavish yourself with trivial desires, before they die…and after. – A Letter to Traditional Women, Paul Elam, A Voice for Men, April 14, 2011

Boys Are Icky – You Go Grrl!

I support marriage and agree with Edita's criticism of feminism and the consequences of the degradation of women…and men. But I also agree with Paul Elam. For decades, MRA's like Paul and I have opposed the bigotry and hatred and cultural degradation of the feminists. And for decades we have endured their harsh reprisals.

In years past I endured public humiliation in the mainstream media, job loss, death threats and assaults, all due to the very public and noisy attacks of the "women are good victims and men are evil villains" second-wave feminists. And currently, "boys are icky – you go grrl!" third-wave feminists are trying to drive me out of my tribal community. All for taking a stand against the bigotry and sexism that praises women for every little thing they do, and scolds men to serve women.

Both then and now "traditional women" stood by and either gave their tacit consent to the feminist supremacists who put women on a pedestal, or when they have opposed feminism, it is with feeble complaints that women are losing their privileged place on the pedestal.

The thankless job Paul and other MRA's have taken on is to expose and oppose the anti-male bigotry. It's a Sisyphean task. They come at us from one source spouting lies. We respond to expose the lies. Before the dust has settled they come from an entirely new quarter spouting the same lies. It never ends, and trying to respond to them all is exhausting.

We have tried, but most MRA's are regular Joes trying to make a living and have a life. Unfortunately, we are surrounded by women who have been raised in a culture that uncritically accepts the lies. They don't know any better. So we get no support, no help, and rarely any sympathy. Especially from "traditional women," who scold us for expending our efforts opposing the bigotry when they say we should be supporting them.

Things Change

Lately, however, that has started to change. Some traditional women are not only taking on the feminists, but offering moral support to the MRM. Personally, I welcome that. But then I also took several years off from the MRM to serve in a very traditional (American Indian) community, while during that same time Paul and other MRA's have toiled in the trenches to fight the bigotry that has, for so many years, enjoyed the tacit support of traditional women. So now we should accept "traditional women" who offer their support if only we will step back into the harness to support them?

Paul Elam responds:

> I am pretty sure I read a comment from zed over at TS not too long ago that "Most MRA's are one blowjob away from becoming a mangina." …There is a pretty damned healthy debate right now in that thread about whether I should have spit in the face of what some MRA's would consider a potential ally. But I have to say I think those MRA's are missing the point.
>
> Traditionalism is the driving force behind male slavery. It is the psychological machine that socializes men into becoming fodder and into becoming lapdogs disguised as guard dogs.
>
> In my way of thinking, it never was a good deal. In the age of misandry and feminist governance, it is foolhardy to say the least. I would not do it; not for a million dollars, and certainly not for a blow job and plate of beans that I had to pay for. – A Letter to Traditional Women Revisited, Paul Elam, A Voice for Men, April 15, 2011

He's exactly right, though I disagree with him that it was always a bad deal. Civilization has evolved thanks in large part to the myths that put women on a false pedestal and enslaved everyman as the king of his little castle. Most traditional women–at least in the English speaking nations–want to hang onto their position on the pedestal, but most went along with feminists in knocking men off their little thrones and unseating them as kings within the four walls of their tiny castles. Not all traditional women. I know Christian fundamentalists who still live like that.

Free to Choose

But Paul is absolutely right that in today's world it's an invitation to disaster. I also agree that it's a matter of personal choice:

> The bottom line here is simple. I don't support any movement to abolish personal freedom. That means that anyone should be free to pursue any type of relationship they want. It is even written into the mission and values here that AVfM opposes any interference in the relationships or the commercialization of sex between consenting adults.But where it concerns activism, men's best interest and the voice that emanates from this forum, it is my not so humble opinion that any woman who likes "real" men who spend their days carrying a load she doesn't feel obligated to share is no friend to the men and boys in this culture who now find themselves in such desperate trouble.
>
> This kind of woman is not only an opportunist in an age where such opportunism is outmoded, she will also train any children she has to have the same entitlements, or burdens, depending on whether they are female or male.
>
> Her sons will live on their knees, and her daughters will pay for that privilege – on theirs. – A Letter to Traditional Women Revisited, Paul Elam, A Voice for Men, April 15, 2011

Hard Words for Hard Truth

Looking back at 40 years of MRA's opposition to feminist bigotry and getting nowhere, I have come to the conclusion that the only way we can effectively counter the hate-male campaign is for a bunch of us to get rich, if not wealthy, so we can establish a cadre of professionals who work full time to fight this war. And it is a war, a war in which our opponents have the resources of political and academic institutions to draw on, while we have only the pennies in our pockets.

During that time MRA's have endured public humiliation, heart ache, job loss, hate mail, death threats, loss of children to family courts that favor mothers over fathers, and being publically excoriated for rejecting the stereotypes that men are the ones most likely to commit acts of domestic violence when the preponderance of evidence shows that women are at least equally violent, especially where elder and child abuse are concerned.

How is the war going for the MRM? Are we any farther along than we were 10 or 20 years ago?

Well, support is growing. People are getting wise. The children of feminists are especially inclined to join us, having experienced the hypocrisy and hatred up close and personal.

But will it be enough? I'm not so sure.

More Than Grass Roots

The Daily Bell is in the avant-garde of what they call the "Internet Reformation." Among other things, they document and analyze the efforts of the Anglo-American Axis ("Anglosphere" for short) to subvert the middle classes and dominate the globe. The feminist movement is a part of that effort. In this, they are very effective, destroying families, keeping men in bondage through the family court system and by stereotyping men as monsters and women as their victims.

It will take more than a grassroots effort to counter that. We will need deep pockets and a full time army of professionals to research, document and counter the lies, and we need spokesmen who are articulate and attractive to become the public faces. Warren Farrell and Christina Hoff Sommers are great, but we need an army.

So I intend to get wealthy beyond my wildest dreams of avarice and then spend my ill-gotten gains on cultural carpet bomb runs to destroy the hate-male programs, directing an empire from a palatial estate nestled in the foothills of Mount St. Helens. (Unlike Dr. Evil, my volcano isn't extinct.) That's me, and I'm still working to amass a fortune. Meanwhile, most of the MRA's are running on fumes, emotionally, financially, politically, socially, and in every way. So I am not inclined to condemn those who are less than charitable. Particularly not someone like Paul Elam, who, in my opinion, has created the foremost website of the MRM.

A Powerful Alliance

Nevertheless, traditional women and MRA's could be a thousand times more effective if we worked together. During the past 40 years, however, traditional women by the millions have rejected the men of the MRM and have sometimes even sided with feminists. So who needs to make the first move, and what should that first move be?

Feminist and leftist organizations have repeatedly lied about Paul Elam's website, A Voice for Men, describing it as a hate site. His site is often angry, but anger is not hate. Maybe it's past time for traditional women to get off the sidelines and directly attack the progressives for lying about Paul and the rest of us.

Don't tell us. Tell the mainstream media. Write letters to the editor of your local newspapers in support of the MRM and our efforts. Join Women Against VAWA Excess in their opposition to the unbelievably sexist Violence Against Women Act. Stop hiding behind fake names, get out in public, put your personal reputations on the line and get active.

Anything less is just so much hot air.

Who taught you to hate yourself?

January 18, 2013 | by Andy Thomas | Link | Original Link

I have no words of my own I could possibly use to express myself more eloquently than the following few lines taken from the work of an unknown poet:

> Men my age are all the same
> They hate themselves & feel ashamed
> For what they are & cannot change
>
> Little heads filled up with lies
> Raised only to apologize
> For thousand-year conspiracies
> In gender-studies histories

These words, written by L. Byron [1], had a profound effect on me when I first read them. Although I chose to use them as the opening to my latest video production, I ultimately wanted to take a different approach to communicating the men's rights issue than simply documenting yet more injustices to men and boys in society.

In the video, below, I am attempting to showcase—without compromise to the feminist narrative—the positive traits of men and those aptitudes which are typically male. I do hope you like it.

Although it was not my intention at the outset, I took inspiration from the words of Malcom X and used them to help define the message I wanted to convey. I make no apology for this. His legacy is a checkered one and, according to many, his philosophy was one of racism, black supremacy, and violence. I can't justify many of the views he preached and don't intend to try, but I would like to give you this quote [2], which were his words shortly before his death in 1965:

> I realized racism isn't just a black and white problem. It's brought bloodbaths to about every nation on earth at one time or another.
>
> Brother, remember the time that white college girl came into the restaurant—the one who wanted to help the [Black] Muslims and the whites get together—and I told her there wasn't a ghost of a chance and she went away crying? Well, I've lived to regret that incident. In many parts of the African continent I saw white students helping black people. Something like this kills a lot of argument. I did many things as a [Black] Muslim that I'm sorry for now. I was a zombie then—like all [Black] Muslims—I was hypnotized, pointed in a certain direction and told to march. Well, I guess a man's entitled to make a fool of himself if he's ready to pay the cost. It cost me 12 years.
>
> That was a bad scene, brother. The sickness and madness of those days—I'm glad to be free of them.

In fact, toward the end of his life, Malcolm X retracted and apologised for many of his preachings. I've learned for myself that many people are unable to do this; many would rather defend their delusion than face reality. In the end, Malcolm X was willing to own his mistakes and admit them. He paid for that with his life.

He was a radical, but I say he was also a humanitarian who lived in extreme times in history. And whatever you think of some of his earlier views, to a people used to accepting low human worth, his message was a hugely powerful one, as demonstrated by the following extract from a speech in Los Angeles in 1962:

> Who taught you to hate the color of your skin? Who taught you to hate the texture of your hair? Who taught you to hate the color of your skin, to such extent that you bleach to get like the white man? Who taught you to hate the shape of your nose and the shape of your lip? Who taught you to hate yourself, from the top of your head to the soles of your feet? Who taught you to hate your own kind? Who taught you to hate the race that you belong to—so much so that you don't want to be around each other? No… Before you come asking Mr. Muhammad does he teach hate, you should ask yourself who taught you to hate being what God made you.

Malcolm X helped to demolish the negative stereotyping of black people, ultimately equipping them with the tools with which to build their own perception of self-worth.

Is it possible that we could do this for ourselves? Is it possible that we can start to believe in ourselves once more?

This is so important and so worthwhile because the systematic negative stereotyping of males is no longer restricted to adult men, but is now common place in the classroom. Our feminised education system, and wider society, teaches young boys that all the good things in the world are about women, and all the bad things are about them. Many boys, especially those lacking fathers, have come to understand that this world has no place for them. Their natural path is to drop out and fall into drugs, gangs, isolation, alcoholism and suicide.

I knew a man recently, an alcoholic, who's only ambition was to own a large screen TV. While visiting him at home, I commented on why he had a rag hanging from the letter box of his front door. He explained that it was flapping in the wind and he had stuffed a rag in there to try and silence it. A moment or two later, he added, "I've been calling the council for months and months to come out and fix it, but they never do."

Naturally, I asked him why he didn't just fix it himself, and the wounded and confused look he gave me in reply told me a great deal about his upbringing. I withdrew myself from his company, while he continued to spend his days in front of the TV, drinking cider from a plastic bottle, hoping that someone would come and save him.

Then one day, I saw social services clearing out his house. I don't know what happened to him.

Likewise, many men who find themselves in desperate situations, often in connection with family courts, cling to the hope that if only people could see what was happening to them—if only everyone knew just how bad things were—somebody will be outraged and something will be done. What they fail to grasp, but we've come to understand, is that society does not care about men.

No one is coming to save them.

No one is coming to save us. The pendulum is not going to swing back unless we are prepared to swing it. It's up to ourselves to do the saving.

In my own way, this is the message I'm trying to convey in the video. I wanted to produce something that tells us about ourselves—something that reminds us all, myself included, just what it is that we really are, and not what we have been told all our lives.

A man's life has never been about privilege; it's historically been about hard-work, responsibility and sacrifice. It's also historically been about providing for and protecting women and children. We are not useless, stupid, brutish oafs and emotional reptiles.

Far from it…

It was the toil of men—that of our fathers and grandfathers—that built the industry, the railways, the water and sewage systems that lifted millions, if not billions, out of subsistence level poverty. It is typically the male sex that is willing to shoulder the risk and endure the suffering necessary to push back human boundaries for the benefit of others. It is typically the male left-brain psyche that is the inventive one, the one to gaze at the heavens and to have the inclination to go there.

Young boys deserve a better future than that of a sperm donor and a walking cash machine, only to be cast aside when of no more use. They are human beings, not the pack animals of the human race.

No schoolboy should ever have to sit in class while his teacher makes him feel responsible for all the wrongs perpetrated throughout history, or makes him feel worthless and inadequate, or tells him that his gender harms the other and that women will need protecting from him when he gets older. This should be seen for what it is, nothing other than an ideologue abusing her position as a teacher in order to deliver dehumanising classroom propaganda to children. That's misandry, miss!

We need to drive a positive dialogue about males, not just one of injustice and suffering. We must teach men and boys the truth about themselves if they are ever build their own identity free of feminism's stigmatising invective.

Reference

1. Feminists Killed Kurt Cobain, L. Byron. TriggerAlert.BlogSpot.com
2. Parks, Gordon, "Malcolm X: The Minutes of Our Last Meeting", Clarke, p.122

Don’t be a creep: tips for 2nd class humans

January 19, 2013 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

---

A series of “tips” in poster form have begun appearing around Vancouver, BC. They each begin with: don’t be a creep. However, rather than “tips,” insults might be a better description. A creep isn’t something you can easily be, or not be. Creep is simply a pejorative. It’s an insult, which in the politics of gender ideologues reflects an internal emotional state of a woman, or a child in the adult body of a woman anyway.

Setting aside the assumption that a creep is automatically male, whether a man is or isn’t a creep is a subjective emotional perception. Additionally, it should be noted that “creep,” when thrown as an epithet, indicates almost nothing about an adult man against whom it is thrown, but indicates a childish petulance in the character of the accuser.

Returning to the Don’t Be A Creep posters, they form a numbered series in the form of tips.

The first is: Don’t be a creep, tip number 1.

Regardless of the content of tip number 1, the fact that the message (don’t be a creep) is glued up in public is so insulting, it constitutes a giant public slap to the face of every person who reads it, including women. Yes, especially women, because although all men are labeled creeps by this campaign, the corollary implication is that women are all pathetic, trembling incompetents at dealing with normal social interactions.

For objectors who may claim that women are not impugned as social cowards, incompetent toddlers or that not all men are labeled creeps and predators by this: shut up, you lying scum.

Of course the insult to women is somewhat diminished by the compensatory power to condemn all who don’t comply – leaving the question to women of moral agency. Specifically, do you have any?

But Don’t be a creep, tip number 1 reads as follows. [image]

Learn (underlined) how to manage your sex drive.

Learn how to manage my sex drive? Does any adult human being not on their way to prison, or in prison, not know how to manage their sex drive?

Should I learn how to manage my other biological needs too? Like eating and shitting? Fuck, this could turn my life around!

Seriously, that is what the poster says: learn to manage your sex drive, and I don’t know if it’s supposed to be a public service announcement aimed at non-sentient troglodytes who’ve never encountered civilization, or if it’s actually intended to simply be the most insulting and moronic garbage ever posted in public. And I say that without hyperbole.

Who is it that in reality needs to learn to control their sex drive? Well, lust driven, subhuman rutting animals – or as gender ideologues say in their technical nomenclature, men.

That, as closely as I can determine it, is what this poster is saying. That you, if you're a man, are a disgusting, filthy rutting beast unfit for public life or civilized company. Never-mind that it was men who invented civilization.

There is no invective strong enough, so I'll move on.

But tip number 1 continues: learn, it says (with "learn" underlined) how to control your sex drive, the person you're interested in doesn't owe you a response.

The person you're interested in doesn't owe you a response.

Actually if you've made a romantic or a social overture towards somebody, then yes, they do owe you a response. There's no requirement the response be positive, but yes, a response is owed. This was once called common courtesy. "No thanks," "very kind invitation but no, "sorry, prior commitment," or just "no." or even "fuck off."

The bottom margin of this poster includes the text "a message from Solidarity Against Patriarchy, a group of mostly men, working for gender equality and "against sexism."

I told you I couldn't have made this up. But this is arguably the most egregiously and hatefully sexist poster I have ever seen. And who are these mostly-men? There's no URL, no QR code, so my best guess is it's Sasha Whiley Shaw's crew of approval seeking lickspittles. But that's just a guess.

[image]The next poster in the series is Don't Be a Creep, tip number 2. Tip number 2 reads: "Make consent part of your approach."

Followed in slightly smaller text: "Ask (period) Offer (period) Don't Assume or Guess (period) Respect the answer (period)"

Do I see a few hands raised in class tonight? Yes, you in the front – yes, the first poster says, "The person you're interested in doesn't owe you a response." And yes, the second poster says: "Ask. Offer. Don't Assume or Guess. Respect the answer."

Interestingly, neither of these posters, nor indeed the third in the series we'll be discussing directly contains any serious slip in grammar, spelling or punctuation. So stupidity, while not out of consideration, isn't the runaway winner here for motive to glue up these apparent tips.

Make consent part of your approach? So, don't grab your prospective date from behind with a chloroform rag and then hustle her off campus in the back of a white tradesman's van?

If any man, or group of men offered me such "advice" in person, I would ask sharply if they thought they were being funny. I would expect that such advice was an attempt, by the use of gravest insult, to provoke a response of violence.

[image]But the third tip, in this series is where this jumps the shark from unintentional self parody, and becomes something else entirely.

Don't be a creep, tip number three: Learn how to deal with rejection. Rejection hurts, but your feelings are your responsibility.

Let's briefly revisit what I said earlier about the word "creep." It doesn't mean anything specific, it's an insult, usually used based on the emotional state – or should I say, the feelings, of the individual hurling the word like a missile against her target.

If a man is called a creep, we don't know anything more about him by the application of the word. What we do know is a bit more about the internal emotional state of the woman, or girl, who called him creep. Maybe he had too much self respect to be a human cash dispenser. He wouldn't buy my ticket for me, creep. Maybe he was honest about his sexual expectations. He wanted to have sex, ugh! What a creep. Maybe he was unfashionably dressed, and therefore a creep. Maybe he was taking his grandkids to the park, and therefore a creep. Creep tells us nothing about him. What it tells us about is the feelings of whatever girl who says "creep".

How does Tip number three go again?

"your feelings are your responsibility"

One other thing, a recent www.dailymail.co.uk headline read as follows:

"Mother-of-two jailed for making TWO false rape claims against men she was dating after one didn't show up for a liaison."[1]

"…your feelings are your responsibility."

And Creep is a reflection not on who is labeled, but of the feelings of whoever applies such label.

"…your feelings are your responsibility."

This message was not brought to you by a group trained chimpanzees, clawing over each other's bodies for a whiff of the crotch of the nearest females willing to grant provisional social approval for being such good, obedient little men. This message also wasn't brought to you by a collective or a committee, committing the most blatant and hateful sexism in the name of fighting sexism.

Your feelings are your responsibility, and also, fuck you.

http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-2188112/Mother-jailed-making-TWO-false-rape-claims-men-dating-didnt-liaison.html

AVFM Radio Special Edition: Daddy Justice

January 20, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]

Daddy Justice has caused quite a few stirs in his time. He walks into the not so hallowed halls of justice in our family court system, as well as offices for our state and national government, and, with camera in hand, asks lots of questions that cannot be answered easily by our representatives.

Rather I should say questions that cannot be easily answered by anyone telling the truth.

For his trouble his has been assaulted (by an anti-domestic violence advocate no less) pushed around by authorities, and in the latest round was railroaded into court and convicted of disturbing the peace, even when video of his actions taken by courthouse cameras proved beyond any doubt that the testimony offered against him was false.

Of course, when the cops, prosecutor, judge and complainant (who works in the court) all want a conviction, then false testimony will hardly stand in the way of Law and Order in Lancaster County, Pennsylvania.

And that is what they got, riding Daddy Justice on a railroad that Southern Pacific would be proud of.

The whole story is worth more than passing glance, because more than any other story in recent times, it highlights and accentuates exactly how corrupt our court officials have become. In this case they barely even tried to cover their lies.

We invite you to join us Monday night at 8:00 PM Central Time, January 21, 2013 (2:00am GMT Jan. 22), for a special edition of AVFM Radio with Dr. Tara Palmatier and Paul Elam, who will interview Daddy Justice about his recent trip to Kangaroo Kourt, and about false allegations in general. The call in number is 310-388-9709.

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

Erin Pizzey reflects on Toronto protest

January 20, 2013 | by Erin Pizzey | Link | Original Link

I have taken some time to reflect on the protest against Warren Farrell last November at the University of Toronto, and have watched the video of that sad event. I have not seen such an ugly demonstration by feminists since the seventies.

I have known Warren Farrell for a long time and I have nothing but respect for him. It was saddening to see such hate filled faces on the screen and to hear women calling men 'fucking scum." One man who came to ask for help in understanding why two of his male friends committed suicide he was abused and sworn at by a Rottweiler of a woman. Another was told he should be 'fucking ashamed" of himself, for even being there. The atmosphere was hostile and threatening to the police. I have not heard them called 'pigs' since the 1960s.

Though I am horrified at their actions, part of me is celebrating because finally here is the true, ugly face of the women's movement, stripped of its phony, egalitarian mask, and placed on permanent display for the world to see. For too many years the truth has been hidden behind intellectual arguments and bureaucratic edifices while the virulent ideologues produced by feminism have burrowed their way into positions of power and influence. As epitomized in this protest video, and the university administration's non response to the violence, infiltration into academe is one of their greatest successes.

Here, the Senior Women Tutors at the University of Toronto conspired with their students to create an antidemocratic riot in the heart of their university. To most people watching the demonstration the women and their sad male hangers-on looked violent and dysfunctional; so much so that they may have been taken as outliers, exceptions to the feminist rule. However, these are the same kinds of women I have encountered many times before; women who are at once determined to brand all men as "violent" and "oppressive," but who routinely use violence and intimidation themselves as a means to enforce their will on others.

I am hopeful that the majority of young women who watched the programme will have been warned off the whole concept of a woman's movement as it practiced today. From the very beginning in the very early "collectives," which is what they called their conferences, the atmosphere was always hostile to anyone who even dared question the Marxist tenants of the women who were preaching to the rest of us.

This was the first "hate movement" I personally encountered. I knew of fringe groups that espoused hatred against Black people, against Jews and against other forms of religion, but this time here was a movement that vowed to destroy all men and remove them from their families, and it was getting public acceptance. This is why they so many wanted to silence Warren Farrell. His message is that time is running out for men, and if we are all not willing to do something about this oppressive movement then the family as we know it, along with our society, will all but disappear.

As I travel around different countries looking at the damage that has been wreaked upon the fabric of their societies I am afraid for my grandsons and great grandsons. In Slovenia I was introduced to a very powerful woman who had a staff of 39 women, she told me proudly. She also employed one man. He was the receptionist. Most of the women in power that I was able to talk to complained that it was hard for them to meet professional men because most of them had been pushed aside in order to fulfill quotas for women in employment.

I realized that a lot of the men were now marginalized and that many of them were very unhappy. Women-only quotas are already in existence and it will not be long before the workplace, at least the non-lethal workplace, becomes a women-only space, much like is already happening in our institutions of higher education.

I am glad that there is now a reminder of the true face of feminism that can be seen by all the people who watch the University of Toronto demonstration on video. It is there that they can finally see what lies underneath the disingenuous façade of egalitarian feminist rhetoric — jackboot thugs and robotic, hate-filled minds. You can no longer afford to ignore them.

Misandry in India

January 20, 2013 | by Amit Deshpande | Link | Original Link

Editor's note: This article is also available in Spanish.

I learned about A Voice for Men calling for someone to write about men's issues in India. I decided to focus on Misandry, as in India it runs deep in the ancient culture of this land.

Most of contemporary India's history originates from the story of King Shantanu from the epic Mah?bh?rata. The period is approximated at over 5000 years ago. King Shantanu married a beautiful woman, only after he agreed to her condition that he would never question any of her actions. Per the promise given he couldn't question her, even when she killed 7 of their newborns one after the other. He tried to question her on the attempt to kill the eighth child and she left him for breaking his promise. The epic tries to justify her actions, but never bothers to think of the abuse of Shantanu, the man, as a father or as a husband. This follows even now. Indians are never made to think about the anguish in a man's mind.

Starting from the concept of "Mother Nature" as elsewhere in many cultures, we also have terms like Mother Tongue and Motherland. Protectionism is bought easily by attributing the term 'Mother' to all things ephemeral. The role of protector is such a deep-rooted attitude for men that there is a 'Protector Day' celebrated every year in India. It is described as a bond between a brother and a sister, where the sister ties a decorated string around her brother and he vows to protect her, come what may, even if he has to do it with his life. The festival is called as Raksha Bandhan and the string is called Rakhee.

The tradition itself took root in the northern part of India which saw the 'Red Age' of constant invasions, wars and killings. The more dangerous the region, more is the need of protectors. So the Indian culture dressed the lives of men in the garb of veneration and glory as protectors.

It is no wonder that the same society which over-protected women and exploited men, is now crying hoarse over women not preferring to venture out as providers. This attribution of women's reluctance to take up riskier tasks, is again being put forth as men's responsibility and patriarchy.

In modern day India, all things developmental are considered due to encouraged participation of women in public life and all things bad and lethargic are due to patriarchy and the attitude of men. For feminists in India, "Patriarchy" is considered to be a virtue worth jettisoning, without giving up the women's privileges that come with it. Indian feminism is caught up largely in the 1980s with help of increased funding from the West. There were a slew of laws created which haunt the Indian men to this date.

The first weapon feminists used, was a woman's share in her paternal property, termed as "dowry". India saw an increased reportage of bride-burning and dowry harassment cases in media. The cry was made shrill enough to drown any sane voice, if ever there was any. An anti-dowry harassment law, Section 498a of the IPC was created in 1983 which is draconian and most misused. It gives a woman complete power to get anyone from her husband's family arrested. Then came the Dowry death law –Section 304B of the Indian Penal Code. It considers any unnatural death of a woman within 7 years of marriage as dowry death – meaning it assumes the husband and his relatives as guilty for her death and they are put behind bars immediately. There have been many other anti-men laws that have come up regularly.

Misandry in India, overall, can be gauged with the high number of suicides of men and crime against men:

According to the National Crime Records Bureau, Ministry of Home Affairs – 62,433 married men and a total of 87,839 men committed suicide in 2011 — and this figure is increasing every year. The same bureau report shows that 92% of all crime happens against men and the society is still not even considering issues of men as a topic worth attention.

It is going to take a lot from us all men's rights activists to expose the feminists and fight their funding and control over the public discourse, but we believe we shall prevail!

Featured image Wiki Commons: Ugrashravas narrating Mah?bh?rata before the sages gathered in Naimisha Forest

Extreme Duress Princess

January 21, 2013 | by Kristina Hansen | Link | Original Link

The Supreme Court of Canada overturned the acquittal of a woman, on Friday, January 18, 2013 for the attempted murder of her husband in 2008, but ordered that she not have to stand trial again. In other words, they ruled that it was wrong to declare her not-guilty, but also added a special order that she not be given a new trial anyway.

Nicole Ryan had tried to hire a hit man to kill her allegedly abusive husband, and was arrested in 2008 for trying to arrange her husband's murder. She had been part of an RCMP sting operation and was arrested after she approached an undercover RCMP officer and agreed to pay him $25,000 to kill her husband.

All the judges said they did not accept the woman's claim that she had acted under "extreme duress" when she attempted to take out a contract on her husband's life. The court said that such a defense can only be used in limited circumstances.

The Supreme Court said she will not have to face another trial even though a majority of judges ordered a rare stay of proceedings, saying that it would be unfair to put the woman through another trial.

"The abuse she suffered and the protracted nature of these proceeding(s) have taken an enormous toll on her," the judges wrote in a statement. "It is an exceptional situation that warrants an exceptional remedy."

She is now free to go on with her life with no criminal record. That's right. A woman who tried to have her husband murdered is now free. Not only is she free, but she is not going to be re-tried in court because she is apparently too delicate to go through it again. Am I missing something here? Did someone forget that this delicate flower of a woman did in fact try to have a contract killer murder her husband? And since when did the toll that court proceedings may take on someone give them a free pass from being re-tried for attempting to murder someone? Apparently this only applies to middle-class white women.

The judges also referred to the "disquieting" fact that the police had failed to respond to the woman's several calls for help in dealing with her estranged husband's so-called "reign of terror."

In its decision, the Supreme Court called out the behavior of the local police, saying it was "disquieting" that the RCMP had set up a sting operation for Ryan instead of helping protect Ms. Ryan from her husband.

At a press conference in Halifax, Nicole Ryan said that she was "relieved" and hoped that she could "re-establish my life." She has already gone back to teaching at her former job in a Claire High School.

She choked back tears when asked if she still feared for the life of her daughter. "Yes" she said.

Ms. Ryan hasn't had any contact with her daughter in almost five years, ever since her former husband, Michael Ryan got custody of the child, who is now 12, in March of 2008.

In court, Ms. Ryan claimed she had been under extreme duress and acted out of fear for her life and her daughter's life.

She testified in court that the abuse by her husband was verbal and physical and lasted for many years. She testified that on one occasion, he had held a pistol to her head and had called her a "weak soldier."

When she brought up the subject of divorce with him, she said his response to her was that he would "destroy" her and their child. She said she tried on numerous occasions to get police to intervene, and said that she did not believe the police would be able to stop her husband from carrying out his threats of violence.

Now, it should be pointed out here that, according to her own testimony, Ms. Ryan had at least $25,000 available to her in order to pay for a hit man, as well as the ability to come and go from her home freely. This begs the question as to why she never fled the home with her daughter in order to seek safety.

If she feared for her life that much then would it not have been best to leave the home with her daughter and file divorce proceedings from a safe location? Why did she feel that the only solution was to have her husband murdered? She obviously had the means to escape if her situation were truly as horrific as she claims it was. So why didn't she? Why did she choose to stay and endure such abuse and terror?

These are important questions that should be addressed.

And what about medical records? Were there any medical professionals that could attest to her claims of abuse? So far I cannot find anything to indicate that there were. All we have is Ms. Ryan's testimony that he was an abusive and violent man. Yet, as abusive and violent as she claims he was, he is the one with full custody of their daughter.

I find it hard to believe that any Canadian court would award a legally documented violent and abusive parent the full custody of a child that they had purportedly threatened with physical harm on multiple occasions.

While two lower courts had accepted Ms. Ryan's defense of "extreme duress", Friday's new ruling made it clear that the duress defense can only be used in situations where "a person commits a crime in response to a specific threat". There must be a threat of death or bodily harm and "no safe avenue of escape," the Supreme Court said.

This means the court found she was not responding to a specific threat for which she had no safe avenue of escape. In fact, she had plenty of opportunity to leave and seek safety with her daughter.

The ruling disappointed the interveners in the case. The Canadian Association of Elizabeth Fry Societies and the Women's Legal Education and Action Fund had hoped the court would address the self-defense issue because, according to Kim Pate, executive director of the Fry society, "We still have a lack of clarity about the law of self-defense".

"It's still not clear what would the next woman be able to do, to defend herself. Should she just be shot, herself? Should she be murdered and her child murdered with her?"

Well, I can safely say that what she cannot do is hire a hit man to have her husband murdered because she will not take responsibility for herself and leave when she has ample means at her disposal to do so.

Update: Michael Ryan tells his story, and how the courts would not even let him speak despite his desire to do so, in the following YouTube video.–DE*

A message from COTWA

January 21, 2013 | by Pierce Harlan | Link | Original Link

The State of the Union for the Community of the Wrongly Accused is Bleak

I founded The Community of the Wrongly Accused (COTWA) to give voice to a largely ignored and forgotten class of people and to help them air their unique problems. Recently, an Innocence Project attorney wrote to us about our "amazing write-up on Brian's story" (his words, not ours). He was, of course, referencing Brian Banks, and our post about it is found here:

http://www.cotwa.info/2012/06/bygones-be-bygones-unspeakable.html.

"Your write-up is far more comprehensive than any I've seen on the web," the Innocence Project attorney wrote. Moreover, our blog recently was cited as a resource in the Duke Law Journal. See Matthew R. Triplett, Note, Sexual Assault on College Campuses: Seeking the Appropriate Balance Between Due Process and Victim Protection, 62 Duke L.J. 487 n. 9 (2012).

Our message has been gaining respectability, but sometimes I feel that our efforts are akin to rearranging the lounge chairs on the Titanic. Make no mistake, the state of the union for the wrongly accused is not good, and in this post, I am going to outline some of the major issues that everyone should know about.

First, a few days ago, an anonymous reader left an odious comment under a post at COTWA:

> The promotion of the idea that many false rape claims occur and tarnish reputations only causes victims to feel like they won't [be] believed, or the perpetrators will not be charged or convicted if they come forward. It is a thin line this website walks. . . . . It's as if you think this website needs to exist or else the girls who cry rape (because that happens so incredibly often) will take over the planet and men will be bullied into a powerless, ashamed minority in the face of female tyranny and dominance. You know, like women are now?

The comment is a mile-marker of where we are, and of how far we have to go. COTWA is among a handful of outlets available to let the wrongly accused know they are not alone. We have received notes from young men who tell us that our blog was instrumental in their decisions not to take their own lives. Yet, people like this anonymous writer think that one unfunded, overworked blog to give voice to the unique problems of the wrongly accused is one blog too many. It would be good to have an adult discussion sometime about the delicate balance that is at the heart of our mission — the need to (1) eradicate heinous criminality by punishing the offenders while (2) insuring that the innocent aren't punished with them — without being demonized. Sadly, that's not going to happen so long as the people who dominate the public discourse on these issues mock and brand as misogynists anyone who dares even to discuss the second part of that delicate balance.

When sexual assault victim's advocate Rus Funk was asked about false claims during a public forum, the newspaper account said Funk's face visibly reacted. "Rape and domestic violence have the lowest reporting rates of all crimes," he said, "and we do have a false reporting problem: too many women who have been raped say that they have not." The audience, silent for most of the workshop, applauded. He closed this line of conversation with, "The false issue of false reporting is misogynistic and a result of societal hatred for women."

http://falserapesociety.blogspot.com/2008/10/public-enemy-number-one-rus-funk.html

Then there was the college official at Elon University who openly stated that she doesn't want false reports about sexual violence to be "highly publicized." She coupled her comment with misinformation: "The federal percentage at which crimes are falsely reported is 2 percent."
http://falserapesociety.blogspot.com/2010/05/elon-university-doesnt-want-false-rape.html

Other members of what can aptly be called the Secual Grievance Industry (SGI) don't want false rape accusers even to be charged, much less jailed. One recommended some form of therapeutic intervention instead, because anyone who would make a false rape claim must be "pretty distressed." That same victim's advocate is also on record as saying that courts should not take into account a sex offender's substance abuse at the time of the offense, but if a false rape accuser abuses alcohol or drugs "there may be a confusion between historic issues that have been unresolved and a current need for help."

http://falserapesociety.blogspot.com/2011/01/views-of-prominent-member-of-sexual.html

We could furnish a list of recent horror stories to illustrate the problems the wrongly accused face, but we think it's more important to focus on the big picture:

Reducing Men to Caricature

The community of the wrongly accused is under unrelenting and remorseless assault. The SGI reduces men and boys to caricature in order to remake them in the image of a progressive's stardust fantasy, beings whose raison d'être, apparently, is to help empower women. Less obvious, but equally true, the SGI also reduces women to caricature.

How does the SGI reduce men to caricature? Writer Jessica Valenti, one of the purveyors of the maleness-is-broken crowd, once wrote: "Rape is part of our culture. It's normalized to the point where men who are otherwise decent guys will rape and not even think that it's wrong. And that's what terrifies me."

In her Valedictorian address to a graduating class of UC Berkeley, a young woman said this: "Even here, this university, one in three women will be sexually assaulted by someone else at this university. And I see this as evidence that violence is systemic and there is no way to guarantee our own safety as long as other people are positioned as worthless and left vulnerable."

Lying About False Rape Claims

How does the SGI intellectually support these peculiar, decidedly anti-intellectual, views? For one, its members minimize the prevalence of false rape reporting by dishonestly suggesting that there are no false rape claims beyond those that can be proven to be false. (We often see this as: "only 8 percent of all rape claims are false" — suggesting that the other 92 percent were actual rapes.) This ignores, of course, the fact that the vast majority of rape claims fall into a gray area where no one can say with confidence whether they were actual rapes, false claims, or mistakes.

Lies can sometimes have terrible effects. During the first wave of hearings over VAWA, the following canard found its way into the Congressional Record: "Estimates indicate that only 2 percent of all rape reports prove to be false, a rate comparable to the false report rate for other crimes." (Report by the Committee on the Judiciary in connection with the Violence Against Women Act. Senate Report 102-197 (102 S. Rpt. 197), Pub. L. 102-197 n. 48 (Oct. 29, 1991).) Even though it was as wrong as can be, it was accepted as evidence to justify passage of VAWA.

And let's also clear this up once and for all: it doesn't matter to an innocent young man who sits in jail on a sex charge, often fearing for his life, if he got there by way of a lie or because his accuser was mistaken.

The SGI's 'Solutions'

Having created the straw man that rape is "normalized" and that young men are rapists-in-waiting, the SGI provides the "solutions" – all of which potentially imperil the innocent. Here are some of the more important and telling "solutions":

(1) The Department of Education's April 4, 2011 "Dear Colleague" letter: We've written extensively about the infamous letter that lowered the standard of proof for sexual assault cases (and only sexual assault cases) on campus to a "preponderance of the evidence." This means that even if a college disciplinary board is 49.999 percent sure that a young man accused of rape didn't do, he may be expelled. Having a reasonable doubt, or even a significant doubt, doesn't cut it anymore for the accused.

This fact is what is most often overlooked in the public discourse of this issue: there is just one reason that most colleges formerly had standards of proof higher than this: to protect the innocent from being unfairly punished for things they didn't do. The higher standards helped to insure that the school wasn't making a mistake by expelling an innocent man. But the Obama administration doesn't think enough young rapists are being nabbed, so it enacted this rule to make it easier to expel young men, the innocent be damned.

The potential effect on the innocent is staggering. "The consequences for someone expelled for sexual assault are enormous and will follow him throughout his life, leading to rejection by other schools, inability to qualify for the bar and a great deal of stigma,"

Prof. Cynthia Bowman of Cornell Law School said. “To impose those consequences on someone requires a rigorous standard of proof and many due process protections to ensure fairness.” She added that “there is general agreement among faculty at the Law School that the procedures being proposed are Orwellian.”

http://www.cotwa.info/2012/04/law-professors-dear-colleague.html

Others don’t quite get it: a female student at the University of Maryland told her school’s student newspaper that letting someone guilty of a serious crime go unpunished would be more harmful than finding an innocent person guilty. “It’s obviously one of the big side effects, if it could result in an innocent person being found guilty,” she said. “But I think sexual assault is such a big issue that it’s worth the risk.” At least she is up front with her bigotry. Her sentiment — the same one underly the “Dear Colleague” letter, of course, flips on its head the long-settled principle of law famously expressed by the celebrated English jurist William Blackstone: it is “better that ten guilty persons escape than that one innocent suffer.” (Commentaries on the Laws of England, 1765.)

http://www.cotwa.info/2012/05/barbaric-it-is-worth-risk-to-punish.html

Brett Sokolow, currently, the most prominent victim’s advocate on American campuses, has said that “a lot of colleges now are expelling and suspending people they shouldn’t, for fear they’ll get nailed on Title IX.” Mr. Sokolow said the reaction borders on “hysteria.” He pointed out that expelled students no longer automatically have the option of just registering at another school. Nowadays, schools share information, which makes that problematic, so students who are expelled have a lot more at stake.

http://www.cotwa.info/2012/04/brett-sokolow-colleges-now-are.html

If Brett Sokolow expresses concerns, that means the rest of us ought to be terrified.

(2) Sexual Coercion: Colleges across America are punishing young men not for physically forcing themselves on women, but for nagging for sex. For decades, young men have been taught to ask for sex; now they are being punished for asking too much.

NCHERM, Brett Sokolow’s organization that advises colleges across America on their sexual misconduct policies, has a model sexual misconduct policy that has been adopted in whole or in part by colleges across America. It contains this breathtaking, other-worldly, example of sexual coercion:

> Amanda and Bill meet at a party. They spend the evening dancing and getting to know each other. Bill convinces Amanda to come up to his room. From 11:00pm until 3:00am, Bill uses every line he can think of to convince Amanda to have sex with him, but she adamantly refuses. He keeps at her, and begins to question her religious convictions, and accuses her of being “a prude.” Finally, it seems to Bill that her resolve is weakening, and he convinces her to give him a “hand job” (hand to > genital contact). Amanda would never had done it but for Bill's incessant advances. He feels that he successfully seduced her, and that she wanted to do it all along, but was playing shy and hard to get. Why else would she have come up to his room alone after the party? If she really didn't want it, she could have left. Bill is responsible for violating the university Non-Consensual Sexual Contact policy. It is likely that a university hearing board would find that the degree and duration of the pressure Bill applied to Amanda are unreasonable. Bill coerced Amanda into performing unwanted sexual touching upon him. Where sexual activity is coerced, it is forced. Consent is not effective when forced. Sex without effective consent is sexual misconduct.

(Emphasis in original.) In NCHERM's example, Bill "convinced" Amanda to give him a hand-job — he asked, and she agreed. She willingly stayed in his room for hours, apparently listening to his boorish and pathetic entreaties. Amanda had a reasonable alternative to engaging in the sex act but chose not to exercise it: at any time she was free to say "good night" and to get up and leave. Bill is allegedly responsible even though it was Amanda's choice to stay.

Giving a horny college guy a hand-job because he wants it, or to shut him up, or because the woman wants to foster a relationship with him and sees that as a way to do it, is not sexual misconduct in any setting other than the academy. Bill may be many things – boorish, immature and even selfish – but based on the limited information available to us in NCHERM's example, he is not a rapist and shouldn't be punished because he asked for sex in a way Amanda later decided was offensive.

Mr. Sokolow has explained that "an agreement to have sex is a contract. Just like buying a car, buying a house, getting married, and any number of personal transactions." http://ncherm.org/pdfs/2005NC3.pdf It is correct that consent in the rape milieu has its roots in contract law, and that's where Mr. Sokolow's example involving Bill and Amanda fails. In contract law, not all agreements formed with apparent assent are legally binding. Duress is the common law concept employed to invalidate contracts due to the absence of the kind of freely given consent that society has decided is necessary to bind people to their promises.

The classic example is a loaded gun pointed at someone's head with a threat that "either your brains or your signature will be on the contract," per Don Corleone. Pay attention to this: a contract is voidable for duress if (1) the victim's manifestation of assent has been induced by an improper threat, and (2) the victim has no reasonable alternative except to manifest assent.

NCHERM's brand of "sexual coercion" fails on both counts. Asking for sex, even repeatedly, is not an improper threat. Even more important, being able to say "no," and having the freedom to get up and leave the guy's room, is a reasonable alternative. But, as we noted above, the SGI doesn't just reduce men to caricature. It is happy to reduce women to caricature as well. In the example above, Amanda is a helpless leaf in the wind and not a free moral agent capable of resisting the entreaties of a horny college guy looking for someone to rub his penis. That is as insulting as it is absurd. Big Sister – and NCHERM – and especially Brett Sokolow – need to get the hell out of the bedroom.

The coercion offense is also an affront to due process because it's definition – "Coercion is unreasonable pressure for sexual activity" — is too indefinite to be fairly, uniformly, enforced. Rape law has never been a clearinghouse to redress every less than ideal sexual encounter. Nor should it be a guessing game based on free-floating standards of purported wrongdoing that punishes criminality "in the air." What does "unreasonable pressure" mean in a culture where sex roles of pursuer and "hard to get" have been fairly divided along gender lines for eons? The guy can ask for sex, but he can't ask too much, and he might be expelled if he crosses some indistinct, blurry line that's about as clear as a dense New England fog. Does a "no" at 7:00 o'clock mean the topic of sex is off-limits? For how long? Until 10:00 o'clock? Midnight? The entire night? When does asking become nagging? Is a little nagging acceptable? At what point does a little nagging become excessive nagging? When will one more nag be enough to expel a young man? When does "seduction" magically turn into "coercion"? There is no mistaking midnight for noon, but at what point does twilight become night? As a policy, "sexual coercion" is an embarrassment. If it weren't so dangerous to so many young men, it would be laughable.

(3) Enthusiastic Consent: Many colleges say that effective consent may only be obtained with "an unambiguous, verbal, positive and enthusiastic statement of consent for each sexual act . . . ."

The problem with this definition, of course, is that it will expel men for engaging in sexual relations even when actual consent is present if it wasn't "enthusiastic." This blinks at the fact that interactions in the bedroom have never been marked by carefully phrased language crafted from legal formbooks. Intimate relations are far more subtle, and are marked by looks, nods, gentle caresses, and barely decipherable grunts emanating from sweaty embraces.

The "sexual coercion" offense also ignores that some people don't show much "enthusiasm" about anything. In any event, who, on earth, will decide if consent was "clearly enthusiastic" anyway? Men and women do not carry "enthusiasm" meters into the bedroom. How can a disciplinary board tell the difference between ordinary consent and consent that is "clearly enthusiastic"?

(4) Reckless Sex: A few years ago, legal scholars Ian Ayres and Katharine K. Baker wrote a law review article called A Separate Crime of Reckless Sex, 72 U. Chi. L. Rev. 599 (2005) in which they proposed a new law that would criminalize what they called "reckless sex." It is defined as penile penetration, without a condom, in a first-time sexual encounter. It doesn't matter if there was consent to the act itself, it would be a crime if there was not also consent to unprotected sex. If no condom was used, the male must prove that the woman "expressly asked to engage in unprotected sexual activity or otherwise gave unequivocal indications of affirmatively consenting to engage in sexual activity that is specifically unprotected."

What was the purpose of this silliness? One of the purposes, the authors freely admit, is to “reduce the . . . prevalence of acquaintance rape.” Rapists are also more likely to engage in condom-less “reckless” sex, so this is a way of reducing acquaintance rape.

While in theory, both men and women could be charged with this new crime — and sentenced to up to six months behind bars — the authors make no apologies that the proposed law is aimed at young men. The authors freely admit that young women would have “de facto immunity” from prosecution: “While facially neutral with regard to sex, as a practical matter women will be largely beyond prosecution,” they concede. The act of male penetration would almost always excuse the woman from prosecution. The authors admit that this might seem unfair “because,” the concede, “women can be reckless too in instigating, precipitating, or just willingly consenting to an unprotected first-time sexual encounter.” So why do they persist in giving women de facto immunity? Or, as the authors put it themselves: “Why is it fair that the man who consents to unprotected sex must run the risk of prosecution, when the woman who consents to unprotected sex does not?”

First, they say this concern would be a problem if women lied about such matters, but few do, so it’s not. (Sigh.) Second, they say that since one of the aims of the law is to nab more acquaintance rapists, and the vast majority of acquaintance rapists are male, “from the perspective of making progress on acquaintance rape it is almost completely unproblematic to have a larger de facto immunity for women.” Third, and most important, “a woman would be much less likely to report a partner’s reckless behavior if by doing so she was subjecting herself to prosecution for the same act.” And punishing women for this crime “would aggravate the current underreporting of acquaintance rape.”

The authors also explain why they have intentionally drafted the model statute to have a mild punishment (just several months in prison) compared to rape: so that more young men will be punished. (No, we’re not making that up.) Law enforcement personnel would be more likely to charge young men for this crime if the punishment is not great, they insist. They write: “The more the behavior gets punished somewhat, the easier it will become to punish in general and the more people will be punished.” (And these two presumably teach young men at their universities.)

(5) Alcohol Impairment: Some colleges go so far to mandate that consent be “unimpaired” from alcohol or drugs. This ignores the difference between “incapacitation” and “impairment.” Brett Sokolow has conceded that “being impaired while engaging in sex in no way implicates Title IX. . . . incapacitated sex will implicate Title IX, but confusing incapacitation with impairment helps no one here, especially the students who are trying to understand their experiences.” The “impairment” standard puts innocent men at grave risk of being expelled because alcohol is usually present in college sexual encounters.

(6) No Anonymity for the Accused: Anonymity for the sexual assault accuser is firmly entrenched in the UK (by law) and the U.S. (by the policies of news outlets). It has been questioned and attacked even by some feminists because it resonates in chivalry and conjures up the image of the helpless damsel in distress. But there is no significant movement to end it.

Anonymity for the accused is a controversial issue, and there is very little chance it will ever be approved. The last time it was proposed in the UK a few years ago, it was soundly shot down by women's groups. It is unfortunate that there is not at least an adult discussion about it, because there are important reasons for adopting it. Justice for rape victims does not depend on the public shaming and humiliation of the presumptively innocent, but, it seems, some victims advocates view such public humiliation of the presumptively innocent as punishment for being an accused rapist. For rape claims, the accusation becomes its own conviction in the court of public opinion because it is nearly impossible to undo even the most far-fetched accusation (that's due to the he said/she said nature of the claim).

The stigma trails men throughout their lives, especially in the Google age, where news stories have a permanence and and accessibility they didn't formerly have. Legion are the cases where those wrongly accused of rape have suffered unspeakable injustice — firings, divorces, loss of businesses, beatings and even death — due to the vile stigma of the claim.

We have real-world evidence that anonymity is not the bogeyman that many women's groups claim. Many accused rapists are already afforded anonymity, without adverse effects to rape victims. In the UK, anonymity orders under Section 39 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 are frequently granted to teen boys accused of sex crimes. Moreover, men whose identities cannot be revealed without necessarily revealing the accuser's identity are usually treated anonymously by the press in both the UK and the U.S. The identities of accused males who fall within these two classes are shielded because, as a matter of public policy, the benefits of shielding their identities are deemed to outweigh the detriments.

There is no evidence — none whatsoever — that granting anonymity to these classes of defendants has in any manner hindered the war on rape. Thus, in a real world setting, every hypothetical disaster that would supposedly occur if anonymity were granted has been proven to be disingenuous.

The most interesting facet of this issue is that, arguably, many more rape victims would "come forward" if the men they accused were anonymous. The vast majority of rapes, we are told, are of the acquaintance variety. When a woman accuses a male acquaintance of rape and he is publicly identified, it often isn't difficult to infer who the accuser is. It is reasonable to assume that most rape victims would prefer not to have their identities revealed by inference when they accuse an intimate acquaintance of rape. We suspect that a fair number of women are not coming forward because they know their identities will become known when the identities of the men or boys they accuse are publicized.

What's Next? On college campuses, watch for efforts to flip the burden of proving consent. Once the female proves that penetration or sexual touching occurred (and usually, there is no dispute about these), the burden would flip to the male to prove that she consented. Thus, if the college disciplinary doesn't know what to make of the case and figures it could go either way, the male would be expelled. It would be the triumph on campus of politicized rage over Blackstone's Formulation, due process, justice, and morality. Don't think it can happen? The SGI has never stopped coming up with more and more intrusions on the rights of the presumptively innocent accused of sex offenses. Each time we think we've seen the end of it, they surprise us with something else.

Conclusion: For a long time, I've been pleading for the elevation of the level of public discourse about these issues. There are reasonable voices among victims' advocates who acknowledge that both sides of the delicate balance we referenced at the outset — the need to (1) eradicate heinous criminality by punishing the offenders while (2) insuring that the innocent aren't punished with them — need to be considered. Usually, those views are drowned out in the cacophony to help rape "victims" (and I put "victims" in quotation marks because the term is often misused to refer to accusers who have not been proven to be victims). Those reasonable voices must be engaged and encouraged. http://falserapesociety.blogspot.com/2011/12/time-to-elevate-public-discourse-about.html

The victims' advocates who refuse to acknowledge that balance do a grave disservice not only to the wrongly accused, but to victims of sexual assault.

First, if potential jurors believe that the system doesn't provide adequate safeguards for the innocent — and clearly in many cases it does not — they will be all the more wary of convicting accused criminals even when the evidence is compelling. That serves no one's purpose. COTWA has no interest in protecting rapists.

Second, if rape victims are not coming forward because they believe that women do not receive justice, precisely who is scaring them away? The SGI, of course. Example: for a long time in the UK, the Home Office and politicians allied with anti-rape activists, have talked about the success rate in prosecuting rape by disingenuously citing the attrition rate for alleged rape, which is the number of convictions as a percentage of number of reported crimes.

That rate is approximately 6.5%. But, the Home Office, and everyone else, uses the conviction rate, the number of convictions secured against the number of persons brought to trial for that given offence, for all other crimes – murder, assault, robbery, and so on. In fact, the conviction rate for rape is approximately 58%. The chasm between 58% and 6.5% represents dishonesty of Biblical proportions, and the latter is cited to "prove" that rape victims don't receive justice. The result of such dishonest advocacy has made it appear that law enforcement is terribly, and uniquely, ineffective when it comes to rape. Importantly, the Stern Review noted that the wrongful use of the attrition rate instead of the conviction rate "may well have discouraged some victims from reporting."

There is so much we should do to instill sexual maturity in our young people in order to end less than satisfying sexual encounters. We should be teaching them about a host of issues: what "consent" really means; the proven "regret" asymmetry between men and women that makes the latter decidedly more regretful about hook-ups after-the fact; the terrible role alcohol plays in the hook-up culture; how sex without emotional intimacy breeds all sorts of problems, including rape and false claims and anything in between; and how those in fatherless homes are multiple times more likely to rape. Instead of educating young people about these issues, too often the SGI is content to shame and stereotype men, as a class, by, for example, hanging gender-divisive posters around campus.

The state of the union for the community of the wrongly accused is bleak and frightening. The injustices to innocent men and boys are often unspeakable. Men and women who are interested in our work are strongly encouraged to read our blog every day, and to become involved in the issues we discuss. COTWA needs your help to spread the word for the sake of the wrongly accused. They have few others who give a damn about them, and that's a fact.

http://www.cotwa.info/

A letter to my son never born

January 21, 2013 | by Dr. F (Ian Williams) | Link | Original Link

---

Dear son,

Happy 18th birthday.

Thank you for opening this letter to you not before this day as was my request written on the envelope.

I know that you are doing well, and looking through your eyes as I am right now, I can see many good friends about you with easy smiles that tell of their familiarity with your good nature. They are celebrating with you the shared freshness of youth and what that might give. How I am adoring to be there and to see you and hug you is beyond my words.

This night is the best time for me to let you know that being a young man is quite the miraculous thing that I never knew forty eight years ago. Your world is the one I never met then, and as an old man seeing from your future eyes I weep for nothing I did not have, but only for the absolute joy at what is before you and will remain forever.

As an MRA I am with others right now putting in place the reminders of terrible things that are coming slowly and surely to a close. We are recording everything for later inspection which is for you the remembering as a child the Feminist Trials that swept the world. Do you have the scrap book beside you? It was made by me for you to look upon with wonder just as I look in wonder that it is illegal for a man in India to remain sitting on a bus after a woman request he surrender his seat. Isn't it amazing that these things actually happened?

My brothers and sisters are at our desks with pens and keyboards and some are with strong shoes that steam after a long day walking the streets with our messages. Our posters went up on walls in malls and posts on street corners and they broke the news about the sexual holocaust you've studied in school. For you this news is not included in the section called "Recent History" but "Modern History." And like any grievance first told to then became the telling of the horrors of a humanity surrendered to bigotry and fear, your history books do not lie as they do not with other stories we know.

Germany and The United States, Bosnia, Cambodia and Uganda had their demons born from many people looking away while vessels of hatred were filled. Of course you know what happened when the hatred in those places in those times were tolerated. Those that hated had their kindness fatigued with repetition of inhuman acts and the people watched and many joined in with fear. You see, my son? Hating and fearing are lovers with eyes only for each other, and living together they die together. You take one away and like all sick lovers the other will be broken. We broke both their hearts and it took years and hurting passion to do it.

When you read about strange things as men going to jail and beaten to death because of the words of another only I want you to know those things did happen. When you watch old films of men thrown from trains, kicked in the groin on entertainment media and flayed alive in public for a rumour of bad things never done, do you ever wonder if it is fake? I assure you that what you are seeing was seen exactly as it happened.

Education was a nightmare for boys and they really were taught to be ashamed like the black person was from long ago and the Jew before them. Always there were the hating and the frightened watching and endorsing by their gaze somewhere else and now we know why and now we know this is part of our flawed design.

Where you live you have the stronger teacher of history, and there has been much time between you and me for many to write about these times. Your world is better for it and will not forget how the sexual holocaust came about just as the other did in Europe before World War Two.

Your history books talk lovingly of the MRA and you must also know that right now we suffer but we are not alone. Perhaps this is the thing that comforts us most? Maybe it's the knowing of our being the vanguard that brought you a kinder place to live? I am not exactly sure what the answer is but I for one am comforted by the noise we make. Who would have thought that loudness would bring respite and that is quite ironic as you must surely know?

I will go now and please save a tear for another as you do not need worry about me. Do not be sad because we never met and better you find riches in bliss and tragedy and much in between. Enjoy your life that way in the way so many of us never could.

I love you.

Your Dad.

Feministing: Privileged white bitches in our dust

January 21, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

OK, so the title is a bit sensational, and a bit misleading. Well, sort of misleading. Feministing.com is the time tested industry standard for privileged white girls and a few of their tokens on a mission to help women understand that their personal shortcomings are not their own fault, but the results of a mythical patriarchy that prevents them from working on crab boats when they are not flunking out of STEM courses.

With well over 5,000 sites linking in, and over 8 years online, the site is the spawn of ideologue Jessica Valenti. She put it online as "a way to get through the mommy filter," and promote feminism online. I suppose Valenti feels that something about motherhood filters out the feminist message. And, well, she certainly is a lot quieter about sexual politics after having squirted one out of her own.

But that is OK, there is a new message to help fill the void.

For the first time ever, feministing is now lagging behind a men's rights website in the three-month worldwide Alexa Rankings. And that men's rights website just happens to be the one you are reading. We have not actually "left them in the dust," but if I were them I would be reaching for my goggles anyway. Whether they like the view or not, they are looking at our asses right now.

The fact that it happened just as Barak Obama was being sworn in to a second term is purely coincidental, but highly enjoyable on a personal level. That is not a partisan stab, though I know it could be interpreted as such. Managing Editor Dean Esmay was concerned that the coincidence could be politicized, so sent me the following message:

"Please be nuanced, measured, inclusive, forgiving, subtle and as "big tent" and gentle as possible …while letting the privileged white girls, their little tokens, and their male lapdogs know that they no longer own the narrative."

Thank you Dean, for the wisdom of your words.

Now, of course none of this means that our battle has done anything but begin. There is much more going on in the world than can be measured in terms of site metrics. And we have no guarantee of keeping ahead at all times.

But even in our caution we will not underplay the significance of what has happened. Dean Esmay is right. The days of feminist hegemony over the discourse of sexual politics are coming to a long awaited end. We are ending it.

We are putting feministing, and ultimately feminism, in the rear view.

Goodmenproject.com, with all their fluff and mainstream feminist pablum, and after all the money dumped into making them a presence, is now in our sights. With something as simple as the truth, emanating from articulate and impassioned voices, we will eventually not only overtake them in audience, we will reveal to the world the corruption and fakery in their message.

If we can catch them, and we certainly can, we can also catch Jezebel.

We promised you at the start of the New Year that this was going to be a remarkable one for the MRM. We may have light years to go, but we are well on our way to making that a reality.

Monday Morning Roundup

January 21, 2013 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

Hey y'all. First off, we're going to expand the Monday roundup just a tad, to start regularly including interesting links from off the AVoiceforMen site. If you have other interesting links of interest to the movement, feel free to send them our way or drop a comment and we'll see about including them in the Monday roundups.

For example, while he does not self-identify as an MRA, but rather as a humanist who is skeptical of all ideologies, Justin Vacula (who once allowed us to reprint one of his articles, and got in much trouble in Gender Ideologue circles for allowing us to do so) is hoping to attend a Women in Secularism conference. He's holding a fundraiser to help him get the money to attend. I threw in $20 myself. One of the bonuses is that if someone will pony up $200 he'll wear the t-shirt of that person's choice to the conference.

Wouldn't it be great to have him wearing an AVfM t-shirt? It would be nice to finally see men's advocates having open and mutually respectful dialogue with women at events like this; years of bitter experience have shown this to be impossible thanks to Gender Ideologues, but maybe it can start changing? Hope never dies and all that. Anyway, Justin mentioned to me that if multiple AVfM participants pool their money to bring it to $200 he'll wear our shirt. Well I threw in $20 to the kitty, you want to add to it and mention it to him?

Either way it should be terrific. We just hope Justin has a camera on his person at all times so no one can falsely accuse him of anything dirty when all he is is a sweet, gentle guy who seeks to promote discussion. (Oh, predictably, certain people are enraged at the very idea that someone who's skeptical of some forms of the ideology of feminism might actually try to attend, and are going so far as to compare this to terrorism. Well, like I said, hope springs eternal and all that.)

In other news: On Facebook, Kyle P sent me this link to a story on Techcitement: The best birth control in the world is for men, describing what looks like a very interesting and safe form of fertility control for men. We can't say for sure how well it works or if there's any problems with it not mentioned in the article, but if it works as it should then it's a dream come true for millions of men who don't want to be trapped into fatherhood against their will. It obviously requires more research, does anyone know more about it?
Also, thanks new AVfM contributor Amit, we recently discovered a fascinating group called "Save Indian Family Foundation" (SIFF), which has a lot of interesting news for men and families in India. For example, the unnoticed problem of women terrorizing their husbands and their husbands' family by abusing Indian law. We don't know a lot about SIFF yet but a review of the site so far shows a whole lot of promise. Gynocentric hysteria in India has had us suspecting for a while now that the situation for men must be at least equally dire if not moreso, and from some of the materials at SIFF, it's starting to look like we may have been correct about that.

Oh, and it just so happens that Amit became the 1,000th person to register for the AVfM Forums! Have you visited the forum yet?

Also, at the University of Ulster, a study has recently been released showing that there is a systemic bias against boys in education across Northern Ireland, and while we can't say for sure, we wouldn't be surprised if much of what they find also holds true elsewhere, like the rest of the UK, Canada, Australia, etc. You can read the full study here in PDF form and draw your own conclusions, but it certainly looks like a lot of that fits what we're seeing in schools in other countries.

In other news, while this isn't exactly "news," a common trope in the advertising industry is that women control 80% of all discretionary spending in America. This factoid is used endlessly by all sorts of people, including some Men's Rights Advocates/Activists, to "prove" all sorts of things. But it appears to be what's known as a "woozle," that is, a non-fact which people believe to be true because they continually see false evidence that it's so–usually, multiple sources uncritically making the same assertion. I'm not a Men's Rights Activist But… is a fun blogger who frequently talks about these things. One of them I helped him identify was the "women control 80% of spending" woozle, which turns out to be an assertion that someone just pulled out of their butt many years ago and no one ever questioned. Whatever relation it bears to reality is entirely coincidental. "I'm not an MRA but…" may soon be writing an article for us on the concept of Woozles in general, but, in any case, if you ever heard or wondered about that "women control 80% of spending" business, be sure to see this terrific article in the Wall Street Journal about it.

By the way, I mention that this particular woozle is of interest to the men's community not in any sort of triumphalist "haha, you see, women are not that powerful!" manner. No, I mention it because I think it's important that when MRAs make assertions, they make them as factual as they can. The actual picture for who controls spending in the world is complex; as the linked story in the WSJ shows, women are enormously economically powerful, it's just that the question is complex and there is no one answer. Furthermore, however, it should also tell advertisers that they're possibly making a mistake in thinking that gynocentric advertising is always their best move. Sometimes it might be, sometimes it might not be. And advertising with publications that have unapologetically pro-male content may be a better investment than advertisers might currently believe.

In still more interesting news: it is a common trope among Gender Ideologues that any time you have sex with a woman who's drunk, you've raped her. No, I'm not making that up. Yet multiple anecdotal stories and formal studies have shown that a large percentage of women enjoy sex while drinking. For example, while it's not the first survey to show this, a recent survey of German women shows the majority of them prefer to have sex while drinking alcohol. Does this mean a majority of German women enjoy being raped? Or does it mean that maybe our cultural definitions of what constitutes "rape" are outrageously sexist and twisted and even Puritan? It certainly seems like it treats men as dangerous beasts and women as children.

In fact, on that topic, we recently had a great article by Russell Lindquist (who blogs here and vlogs here) on the subject of rape, and makes the stunningly controversial, breathtakingly audacious assertion that we should ignore gender, denounce rape, and defend all victims. What are you, crazy, Russ?

Speaking of other great material on AVfM from the last week:

Our domestic violence policy advisor and Editor At Large Erin Pizzey recently did a great interview with Warren Farrell and the folks at StudioBrulé. Although the initial live interview was plagued with technical glitches, StudioBrulé (whose YouTube channel you should subscribe to here) has begun uploading a cleaned up, edited version of that interview, in easily-digested segments. Here's the first of it:

…and you can watch the rest here: Part 2, Part 3, Part 4, Part 5, and Part 6. Erin, as usual, is fearless.

Speaking of Fearless Erin, she's got some more thoughts for us on violence, hatred, and thuggery from self-identified Feminists, which she's seen and experienced many times in her decades-long career of trying to help victims of domestic violence. Here's her thoughts on the matter, which we suggest you share with anyone who will listen.

Also, remember I mentioned Amit Desphande and SIFF above? He also recently penned a piece on the growing problem of misandry in India that you should see.

AVfM firebrand John the Other has noticed a new postering campaign in his home town of Vancouver. These posters are outrageously sexist, and he has some choice words for that sexism in Tip for 2nd Class Citizens.

Men's Rights Activists have recently come under fire from traditionalists. We find this unsurprising, as we have long noticed that just as Gender Ideologues who call themselves "feminists" often dismiss male disposability even while depending on it, many conservative traditionalists openly admire and praise male disposability. Which is better? Neither one that I can see, although I guess we can give the traditionalists some props for at least occasionally mouthing nice words about men and boys. In any case, Rod Van Mechelen looks at tradtional women and their white knights, and finds their views lacking in respect for the humanity of men and boys.

Andy Man, of the fast-growing MRA London also recently put together a breathtaking essay and video that you really must see: Who taught you to hate yourself? I have no words. Show it to everybody who will watch.

Sweden is increasingly looking like one of the most frightening countries in the developing world for men and boys. Joakim Ramstedt has a look. I'm not sure I'd willingly let my sons set foot in that country. Although Lucian Vâlsan explains why Croatia looks frightening in its own way.

By the way, how do you do actual men's rights activism? TCM shows one effective ways, at least if you're in or near a university.

Neil Lyndon, whose career was nearly destroyed by Gender Ideologues, recently graced our pages with this amazing essay on the legacy of one of the most prominent of the 2nd wave feminists of the early 1970s. Don't miss Big Sister: The Legacy of Germane Greer (and if you use Twitter, be sure to follow Mr. Lyndon here. We're very much hoping he'll grace our pages with further contributions in the future! (By the way, The Moderate Voice also allowed me to reprint his article. As a side note, TMV is a pretty good site that's good about allowing me to post Red Pill content like this, so anyone who comes over there and leaves an occasional polite, supportive comment or two would be appreciated, so they know we aren't a bunch of misogynisty rapey haters.)

Are you against genital cutting of children? So are we. The intactivists have launched a massive campaign you may want to be a part of.

Victor Zen is looking for his privilege. Maybe you can help him find it.

Our great friend Suz, also known as DriverSuz, who blogs at Shining Pearls of Something, wrote a sterling piece we just had to reprint, and which you shouldn't miss: An anonymous letter from a mom to her future daughter-in-law. That essay, which has been pointed to and reprinted many places, has set off a virtual firestorm of controversy. Good on ya Suz.

Finally, a couple of items from our growing AVfM forums you may want to check out:

Men's Rights Activists are constantly plagued with trolls with an anti-MRA bias who say outrageous things that most MRAs would never agree with, which the enemies of human rights for men and boys often exploit via quote-mining: "Look, seee these disgusting things those MRAs say!" Well we've decided to make it easier for them to find these false and outrageous and hateful quotes, and have started a Quote Miner's Graveyard to highlight statements made by phony MRAs that the enemies of human rights frequently use to poison the well against us. If you spot such poison, be sure to join the forum and point it out there.

Also, the growing AVfM forum has a new section: the Volunteer Hub. Got a project you want help with? Want to volunteer for projects we may be doing? Join the forum and speak up!

Well that's it for this week. So much time, so little to do! (Wait a minute. Strike that. Reverse it.) Let's get going. Yee-haw!

The U of T Student Union needs our help.

January 22, 2013 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

---

The Student Union of the University of Toronto needs our help.

Members of the U of T Student Union have drafted a motion to present to the university administration to take action against A Voice for Men, including banning the site from U of T servers and seeking to have AVfM's hosting company shut the site down. [1].

As the Editor-in-Chief of AVfM, I not only support these students in their clear ambition to attempt to silence opinions they may disagree with, I hope to motivate others to help them draft and present a more effective, convincing and clearly imperative call to action against this website.

Toward that goal, I have included the full text of the existing Motion to condemn (which was emailed to us), along with my own commentary and suggested revisions. Such revisions as necessary for the motion to be a more effective motivator for the school's administration to take action against this website.

MOTION TO CONDEMN AND TAKE ACTION AGAINST "A VOICE FOR MEN"

Moved: C. Scott Seconded:

Whereas on November 16, 2012, a so-called "men's rights awareness" group at the University of Toronto invited Warren Farrell to campus to give a talk.

Commentary: The use of the term "so called" to preface "men's rights awareness" does no service to either the author nor to the proposed motion. The words "men's rights awareness" are in fact a part of the self identification of a men's rights awareness organization on the campus of the U of T. The authors of the existing motion are advised to reserve application of the phrase "so called" to informal slang and terms of art departing from the actual names of existing organizations and groups. This reservation will make a revised version of the motion more credible, and effective towards its intended audience, the administration of the University of Toronto.

Whereas Warren Farrell promotes misogynist, hateful views towards women and ideologies that promote gender equity, challenges women's bodily autonomy, justifies sexual assault and decries feminism as violent;

As the existing motion requests action of the administration of a major academic institution, Dr Warren Farrell should be referred to by his correct title, which is Dr. Warren Farrell.

In addition, the motion suggests necessary actions to be taken against this website. Dr Farrell has no past or present association or relationship with A Voice for Men. Also, if Dr. Farrell is to be included in the motion, the reasons for that should be independently established through citation of his own writings or actions.

Specifically, the motion should include citations from Dr. Farrell's writing in which he challenges women's bodily autonomy. The motion should also cite writing or speech by Dr. Farrell which promotes misogyny. Furthermore, the motion should cite where Dr. Farrell justifies sexual assault.

Obviously, the veracity of the vague and unsupported claims about Dr Farrell are not called into question in this criticism. However, to provide the compelling rationale necessary for action by the U of T's administration, proof of the allegations against Dr. Farrell may be helpful. It may also reduce the amount of conflation between Dr. Farrell, an individual, and A Voice for Men, an unrelated organization.

Whereas students at the University of Toronto made the situation known to the University of Toronto administration, asking for action to be taken due to Farrell's flagrant violation of the Ontario Human Rights Code;

"The situation," is unfortunately a pronoun lacking reference. In a formal call to action, "the situation" must be explicitly identified prior to use. It may not be obvious to the U of T administration, or others, precisely what "the situation" is.

Also, although Dr. Farrell's flagrant violation of the Ontario Human Rights Code, is obviously not questioned by this criticism, this too requires more specific detail; not only the offending actions or speech by Dr. Farrell, but also the specific article, chapter and subsection of the Ontario Human Rights Code violated. Further, although we must all accept the apparent malevolence of Dr. Farrell based only on unsupported assertion, the current motion demands action be taken against A Voice for Men, a web site and organization to which Dr Farrell has no present or past association.

Clearly, a separate MOTION TO CONDEMN Dr. Farrell is needed.

Wheras the University of Toronto administration refused to act; and

Whereas in absence of action from the university, students organized a petition and protest in response;

The motion has as one of it's major goals the motivation of action by the University of Toronto administration. However, the motion makes claims of inactivity from the U of T administration, which happen to untrue. The office of the Provost at the U of T have at least stirred themselves to examine the events surrounding the presentation and accompanying protest sufficient to publish a clear positional statement [2]. Given that your target audience is already likely aware of the action they themselves have taken, it may hurt your credibility with them and perhaps others.

The most salient portion of that public statement begins in the second paragraph with:

> The vast majority of the University of Toronto community understands that freedom of expression is vital to the mission of universities and cannot be reserved for those with whom one agrees. It is therefore heartening that many members of our community with otherwise divergent views have recognized that the disruption of this event by protesters was a threat to free speech.

Again, false claims of the inaction of the school's administration will likely diminish the credibility of the motion and it's authors. Convincing the school's administration of a false history in which they participated is likely a counterproductive strategy to be avoided.

Whereas in response, police were called to campus and violently attacked and harmed activists;

While violent attack on feminist protesters by the Toronto Police department would certainly be problematic, if it were true, video of the event quite clearly shows that police officers, called to the scene to protect ticket-holders from assault were themselves assaulted by feminist protesters.

The U of T student newspaper "the Varsity" reported on 17 November:

> One protester was arrested after a scuffle broke out in front of the auditorium's doors. He was later released with no charges. Another protester was cautioned for assault of a police officer..

Interestingly, the Varsity article also claims that event organizers physically assaulted one or more attending protesters, referring to video of the event – which does not appear to depict any such thing.

However, whether protesters assaulted police, or whether the reverse case is true, A Voice for Men did not have a representative at the event, and conflation of the apparent actions of Toronto Police, of paying attendees, of event organizers, or any statement, real or imagined of Dr. Farrell are wholly apart from this website, A Voice for Men.

Perhaps a motion to condemn, arrest and incarcerate the Toronto Police Department, with supporting rationale, would be in order.

Whereas members of the so-called "men's rights awareness" group also violently attacked and harmed activists;

According to reporting by Dan Smeenk of the Varsity and according to video by independent videographer Stephen Brule, protesting feminists were not attacked, but themselves engaged in verbal abuse of event attendees, and initiated violence against members of the Toronto Police. Arguing the opposite of what is already documented in video format will likely undermine the credibility of the motion and its authors. False claims used to compel action by the U of T's administration should be un-disprovable, otherwise members of the U of T's administration might engage in fact-checking, severely diminishing the impact of the motion.

Whereas several female-identified students who were outspoken at the rally has[sic] since been targeted by "men's rights" activists on the website AVoiceForMen.com, who are calling for their surveillance by men at the University of Toronto and for their actions to be detailed at an online blog which contains many hateful ideas about women;

The characterization of reporting and commentary by AVFM using the language " female-identified students who were outspoken at the rally has[sic] since been targeted by "men's rights" activists on the website AVoiceForMen.com" is an excellent strategy to demonize this website and it's contributors. However, the following statements " .. who are calling for their surveillance by men at the University of Toronto and for their actions to be detailed at an online blog" undermines the sinister portrayal of AVFM by admitting that such "targeting" consists only of citizen journalism and commentary.

This admission severely undermines the potentially useful impact of the word "targeting". Without the anti-climactic reference to reporting and commentary at AVFM, an impression could have been created that the site's editors advocated violence. This is a missed opportunity to more effectively demonize.

Whereas several of the female-identified students that have been targeted were less vocal or prominent than participants who were male-identified; and

Whereas men have, as a result, begun to harass these woman, the UTSU and female- identified staff at the UTSU;

As with all your claims made without citation or evidence, this criticism certainly does not aim to cast the slightest doubt on the motion or its authors. However, the last time I heard about women or feminists being threatened by MRAs, it became quickly evident that such threats were fielded by other feminists simply claiming to be MRAs. This uncomfortable fact was documented on the feminist website http://haifischgeweint.wordpress.com/ (please consider the link a helpful example of citation).

I'm sure ideological thinkers would not use the same tactic twice, and it's at least plausible that somebody has threatened one or more of the violent protesters at the U. of T. However, the claims of threats made without citation or source do provide a strong impression of a game of make-believe, which the motion can only ameliorate by citation of such threats.

Whereas the message from this website claims to be of 'equality' but is in fact a message that is a misogynist, sexist, cissexist, heterosexist and homophobic response to the challenge of cis-male privilege in society;

Facts are sometimes inconvenient, but are often important. The message of A Voice for Men does not claim to be of "equality," but we do support equal treatment under the law. However, the motto of the site, presently printed in the site's mast-head is "compassion for men and boys". However, our complete mandate is for Justice and Compassion, two elements glaringly absent from rhetoric in opposition to the human rights of men and boys. Admittedly the mandate for "justice and compassion" might not be readily apparent without reading some of the site's content.

However, the claims of several flavors of sexism serves to considerably undermine the credibility of both the motion and its authors. AVfM's contributing authors and board of directors include men and women of every sexuality and variation. In fact, a routine criticism of the AVfM's weekly radio show is an excess of female hosts and contributors, suggesting to some detractors that the mandate to address men's human rights issues is being diluted by too many female contributors.

Rather than making the easily dismissed claims of sexism, or homophobia, more substantive attacks against the site's senior contributors would likely be more believable. For example, AVFM Radio's co-host and star, Karen Straughan "Girl Writes What" could be attacked for her clear jealousy of younger, daintier and more feminine women than herself.

Erin Pizzey, the founder of the women's shelter movement, now on AVFM's board of directors, could easily be attacked on the grounds of senescence, or a wholly superstitious attachment to her life-long religious faith. Any of AVfM's gay or bisexual contributors could easily be discredited based on which sex they are, or aren't attracted to, although since outing the sexuality of contributors is not within the site's editorial mandate, critics will have to do their own research. Preference for same sex partners can be manipulated by U of T student commentators into hatred of the opposite sex with some aptitude and practice.

However, citing an exhaustive list of every kind of sexism with it's own name does appear counter productive. In such a complete list, even the sexuality of the site's management team must be despised by the site's management team. A more plausible approach for U of T commentators would be to pick only one or two variations of sexism, and then cite content on the site, plausibly supporting such claims.

Whereas the content of the website has generated hateful and violent comments from both readers and writers;

With over 1,700 feature length articles, citation or evidence of "hateful and violent" commentary – if such exists — should not fall on the readers of the U of T student's motion to locate for themselves. The site's masthead includes a search bar from which offensive phrases or suggestions of violent rhetoric can be searched for and thereby cited as evidence of the claim of hatred or violence.

However, as tempting as it might be for administration members to register for the site and supply such commentary themselves, this tactic should be accomplished with screen-capture, as commentary advocating or suggesting violence is strictly forbidden, resulting in immediate IP-based banning of offenders from the site.

Therefore,

Be it resolved that the University of Toronto Students' Union condemn the actions and stances AVoiceForMen.com has taken; and

Be it further resolved the University of Toronto Students' Union support students that have been attacked by AVoiceForMen.com; and

Be it further resolved that the University of Toronto Students' Union take action to have the website AVoiceForMen.com blacklisted and shutdown by their website provider for hate speech.

Certainly, if the students at the U of T feel it necessary to silence the expressed opinions of an organization or site they disagree with, they should pursue that censorship wholeheartedly. Indeed, that the authors of the MOTION TO CONDEMN support the violence and hatred displayed so blatantly by the protesters at the November 16 presentation by Dr Warren Farrell, they are encouraged to make their support for such conduct as publicly and loudly as possible.

And finally, it indeed is the position of this site, its editorial board and it's contributors that men's rights are human rights.

Thank you all for your kind attention.

[box]
Addendum:

In addition to provided suggestions for improvements to the language of the existing MOTION TO CONDEMN, Corey Scott, Vice-President Internal & Services, along with his co-authors at the UTSU may wish to audit one or more courses within the Writing and Rhetoric program offered by the University of Toronto.

"The Writing and Rhetoric minor reflects the belief that strong skills in critical thinking and written communication are central to a liberal education."

Additional details of this program can be found on the web-site located at http://www.utoronto.ca/innis/wr/

[/box]

[1] http://utsu.ca/section/1116

[2] http://www.provost.utoronto.ca/office/Provostial_Statements/Provost_s_Statement_on_Recent_Controversial_Events_on_Campus__December_2012_.htm

AVFM News and Activism: Lucian Valsan Returns

January 22, 2013 | by James Huff | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]

Tonight we have European News Director, Lucian Valsan. We will be discussing the Council of Europe Convention on preventing and combating violence against women and domestic violence that took place in April of 2011, but whose edicts are being ratified throughout Europe with little to no mention in the press. This treaty is basically the VAWA of Europe and shares much of the statutory language. Of course no mention is made of male victims and like VAWA erodes due process. Another feminist masterpiece indeed.

As always we will be eagerly awaiting your calls after the news and the interview so please call in and talk with Lucian and hosts Robert and James.

The show starts tonight, 22nd, at 9:00 PM Eastern, 8:00 PM Central, which is 2:00 AM January 23rd in London and 11:00 AM January 23rd in Brisbane.

SHOW PAGE

Of course we will have the after show MRA roundup on STICKAM

[/box]

The rapists & victims they refuse to see

January 22, 2013 | by James Landrith | Link | Original Link

Editor's note: It is astonishing how much our culture seeks to deny any possibility that a woman may rape with her vagina. But of course, as survivor Typhonblue has so thoroughly documented, not only can they do so, but they do so with near as much frequency as men do with their penises. Our view is that rape apologists come in more than one flavor, and that includes people who deny that women do this. Former Marine James Landrith tells a graphic story of how this exact thing happened to him. I was honored to share a forum with Mr. Landrith to talk about these issues on Huffington Post Live late last year, which you can view here on HuffPo. Mr. Landrith has suffered much mocking and abuse since he dared publish his account, but he has graciously allowed us to reprint it here anyway. More men need to speak up.–DE

I've Got the T-Shirt and the Trauma Response to Go With It

As a vocal male survivor, when I'm not talking about sexual violence in writing or before audiences, I'm reading about it in many contexts and sources. A great deal of what I see on a daily basis is directed at men with the assumption that we know nothing about sexual violence or have no experiences that parallel those of female survivors.

Those making such arguments are often NOT sexual violence survivors themselves. Encountering such memes can be quite painful when you are a rape survivor yourself. The problem is not that female survivors receive the majority of the attention when sexual violence is discussed. The problem is that when sexual violence is discussed with regard to male survivors, there is often resistance, condescension, and outright mockery by people who quite often have not experienced such violence themselves. For those who have lived through abuse at the hands of women, that can be doubly wounding.

I've lived through sexual violence. I have my own story and my own experiences. I have my own triggers and my own issues. I don't need to be educated. I don't need to be taught what to do or not do. I don't need any proven statistical bias to legitimize my life or my experiences. I lived it.

♦◊♦

Background

Approximately twenty years ago I met a friend at a club in Jacksonville, North Carolina. He came with a female friend. During the night, he disappeared leaving his friend by herself and without a ride. As she was pregnant and without a ride, I agreed to take her home when I left. She had not been out in a while and wanted to stay until the club closed that night. While she was not drinking, she bought me a few thank you drinks for agreeing to drive her home.

After a few drinks, I became very tired and disoriented. I never drank until I got drunk, especially when driving and off base. I didn't like the feeling and it wasn't secure off base. I just figured I was tired and had too much without realizing it. There was a motel next to the club. She suggested we get a room and sleep it off, then I could drive her home in the morning. I agreed as I was rapidly losing the ability to think or see straight. She got us a room with double beds and we split the cost.

I vaguely remember laying down with my clothes still on. I probably took off my shirt per the norm, but I left my pants on. I did not feel comfortable taking my pants off around this strange woman. She warned me that she did not want to have sex and I remember saying that I was seeing someone and was not at all interested in that either. I laid down on my side of the room and was out almost immediately.

At some point in the night, I awoke to find her on top of me. I said something I cannot remember and she coaxed me back to sleep. I doubt very much that she could even understand what I was saying, given how disoriented I felt at that time.

The next morning, after the sun had risen, I woke again feeling confused and unsure of where I was or what had transpired since getting off work on Friday afternoon. My pants were nowhere to be seen, my underwear also missing and my penis was erect. I realized that she was on top of me, grinding and moaning. I didn't know what to think. I wasn't fucking her. I didn't want to fuck her. Who was she again? I moved as my legs were stiff and sore from being in the same position for hours with her on top of me.

She darted her eyes at me and told me not to move. I was ordered "don't be forceful." She then asked if I was trying to rape her when I could not remain perfectly still and again told me not to move. In addition, I was told that I could hurt the baby if I tried to stop it. After she finally finished, I was still expected to drive her home.

In short, I was drugged, raped, threatened and had a baby used against me as a human shield. To say that experience left me messed up would be an understatement.

Put yourself in my shoes for a minute. I was under 21, drinking illegally in a club, while on active duty with a local, pregnant civilian. Why didn't I report it? Read this paragraph again and think about it harder if it eludes your grasp.

♦◊♦

The Reaction

How did I react? I buried it deep and pretended it didn't happen, which is a common reaction for male survivors. That did not mean that it had no effect on me. I simply pretended it didn't happen. I called it a bad night and said she was a little twisted.

As one therapist would later tell me, denial of trauma does not mean it isn't affecting you. I believe she said that if unacknowledged, the effects would "come out sideways" and in a manner that may not be easily identifiable. For me, that was a sudden and ridiculous promiscuity that did not exist before the rape. I began to act out sexually by sleeping with any woman who offered. I turned down no one, to include several much older, married women. I did not seek out sex, I simply said yes every time.

To say that I was reckless then would be accurate. I was risking exposure to disease and potential violence from angry husbands and boyfriends. I did this for about three years before getting married and further stuffing the memories down further. Further, I lost nearly all trust in women – especially aggressive and loud women.

Nearly twenty years later, I decided to confront it. The time had come to do something about it. I sought out assistance and began to see a therapist. I spent a lot of time on me, thinking, analyzing and progressing. It was painful, but necessary work. I'm not done with it. I don't know that I'll ever be truly done.

While in therapy, it was as if the bandage had been ripped off suddenly and the wounds were newly raw. I had panic attacks, crying fits, sudden anger and loss of time. I felt exposed all the time, everywhere.

I had trouble being alone with a woman in a confined space like an office or elevator. Some days, I didn't even want to stand next to a woman in line for a cup of coffee. Remember the controversy in the feminist blogosphere over strange men talking to women in an elevator? Reverse the sexes and I lived it. For me, the issue wasn't hypothetical or used to demonstrate which gender has it worse with regard to potential sexual violence. It was based on an actual trauma response. The back and forth over why men should expect to be viewed as rapists by women in elevators took on a whole new level of offensive when viewed through the lens of my own experience.

I felt guilty all the time. I still feel guilty quite often. I feel guilty because I don't trust women I don't know. I feel guilty because I sometimes view women, particularly loud and aggressive white women, as potential threats to my well-being and mental health. I feel guilty because for a long time, I couldn't look at a pregnant woman without seeing that sick woman from so many years ago.

I still struggle with some of these issues today, but not as often and not always in such intensity as before. Presently, I have returned to my prior human resources career. This field is dominated by women and has proved a big test for me.

The biggest test is sometimes just getting through the day without losing it. Some days I pass without issue, on other days I just have to give myself a hall pass so I can get on with my life.

Editor's Note: this piece is a reprint from James' weblog. James has written further on his experiences of being mocked, demonized, and victim-blamed by rape apologists, which he documents here and here amongst other places–DE

Open letter to Professor PZ Myers

January 23, 2013 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

---

Hello Professor Myers,

Obviously, you and I have disagreed on several topics in the past, and due to the disconnected nature of online discussion, these differences of opinion have never been satisfactorily addressed. There remains unanswered a friendly challenge from myself to you to address the substance of any of several hundred articles of my authorship which can be found on the web site AVoiceforMen.com.

However, setting that aside, I am writing this in reference to your recent and humorous invitation to myself, to Paul Elam, and to the pick-up practitioner calling himself Roosh to attend the upcoming Women in Secularism conference in Washington DC.

I cannot speak on behalf of the individual calling himself Roosh, as "pick up culture" is not a topic I follow, however, the idea of high-profile Men's Rights Activists attending the women in Secularism Conference is in fact, an excellent idea. However, the invitation should, I'm sure you agree, include high profile female MRAs as well as Paul and myself.

As I'm sure you are aware, when Paul Elam invited me to take over the weekly AVFM radio show, one of the first changes I made was the inclusion of a permanent female co-host, in the person of Girl Writes What. In addition, the subset of the human rights movement represented by AVFM has attracted a growing number of intelligent and important women, including not only my co-host on our radio show, but an expanding list of female contributors and board members at AVFM.

Karen Straughan (GWW), Kristina Hansen (WBB), Dr. Tara Palmatier, Nurdy Dancing, Suz, Aimee Mcgee and Typhon Blue have recently been joined by Erin Pizzey, the newest member of our board of directors. Erin is, as you should know, the founder of the world's first women's shelter, as well as the author of several books on domestic violence.

Although the invitation was made humorously, I'd like to participate women in secularism conference. I'm confident you too would like me to attend, so I'm asking for your help to get myself, Karen Straughan, Kristina Hansen, and Erin Pizzey invited as a panel to present at the Women in secularism conference.

Best Regards

JtO

PZ's invitation to the W.I.S. conference:
http://freethoughtblogs.com/butterfliesandwheels/2013/01/thats-something-to-look-forward-to/#comment-424867

Backup, in case the original comment disappears:

http://www.filedropper.com/thatssomethingtolookforwardtobutterfliesandwheels

Publisher's addendum: I would love to make the conference myself but Air Force One is on cable that weekend. PE

Contrasting modern and post-modern discourse

January 23, 2013 | by Kenneth Westhues | Link | Original Link

---

Always, the question is why. An instance of workplace mobbing presents itself. Collective hostility, ganging up, offensive and defensive maneuvers, draining of time and energy, damage to names and careers, working lives robbed of joy — all these are plain to see. The challenge is to know why. Without sound explanation for why the mobbing has occurred, the odds of effective intervention are slim. Correction, remedy, prevention, making things somehow better, depend on knowing why.

Any idea helpful toward this end is a gift. My books, articles and website on academic mobbing include many such gifts: distinctions and hypotheses offered by varied authors past and present, collected, packaged, and passed on from me to you.

In December of 2012, as the Christmas season was unfolding, I received an especially useful gift, a distinction that helps answer the question of why for roughly half of the academic mobbing cases I have studied these past twenty years. The giver was American conservative pundit Steve Sailer, whose blog is a year-round Santa's sleigh. Sailer, however, was on this occasion just regifting a distinction he had picked up from British Christian blogger Alastair Roberts. I resolved to pass the distinction on to fellow students of workplace mobbing, regifting it here for Christmas. It was well into 2013 before I got the distinction packaged up and posted, so it has turned out to be a new year's gift. No matter. I hope you find it worth keeping and passing on.

The distinction is between two modes of discourse. Here is Sailer's summary, with key excerpts from Roberts's blog, and here is Roberts's original post, written to make sense of a dispute among Evangelicals. Both Sailer's and Roberts's posts are worth reading, in addition to my summary and reworking here. Neither of them labels the conflicting modes of discourse, and both present them in reverse order to my preference. I call the temporally earlier mode of discourse modern, since it reflects rules of intellectual procedure associated with the Enlightenment, to which most of humanity's transformations, good and bad, these past few hundred years can be attributed, but traceable farther back (as Sailer points out) to the ancient Greeks. I call the second, temporally more recent mode of discourse postmodern, meaning the relativist, constructivist, anti-scientific mentality, the wholesale inversion of Enlightenment values, that has arisen since the 1960s, similar in some ways to traditional, premodern mentalities.

Drawing and quoting freely from Roberts and Sailer, the paragraphs below profile first the modern mentality and then the postmodern one, and show how this difference helps answer the question of why certain conflicts occur. Then I describe some cases from my own research that illustrate the point. Essentially, what I argue is that in many mobbing cases, a professor cultivating modern discourse in the classroom and other scholarly venues is charged, punished, humiliated, and sometimes eliminated by students, colleagues, and/or administrators of a postmodern bent.

Modern discourse

Following are ten key characteristics of modern discourse, what many professors and students even now consider the normal or standard way to think, study and argue in the academy:

- “personal detachment from the issues under discussion,” the separation of participants’ personal identities from subjects of inquiry and topics of debate;
- values on “confidence, originality, agonism, independence of thought, creativity, assertiveness, the mastery of one’s feelings, a thick skin and high tolerance for your own and others’ discomfort”;
- suited to a heterotopic space like a university class, scholarly journal, or session of a learned society conference, a place apart much like a playing field for sports events, where competitors engage in ritual combat before returning with a handshake to the realm of friendly, personal interaction;
- illustrated by debate in the British House of Commons;
- epitomized by the debates a century ago between socialist G. B. Shaw and distributist G. K. Chesterton;
- playfulness is legitimate: one can play devil’s advocate, speak tongue in cheek, overstate and use hyperbole, the object being not to capture the truth in a single, balanced monologue, but to expose the strengths and weaknesses of various positions;
- “scathing satire and sharp criticism” are also legitimate;
- the best ideas are thought to emerge from mutual, merciless probing and attacking of arguments, with resultant exposure of blindspots in vision, cracks in theories, inconsistencies in logic;
- participants are forced again and again to return to the drawing board and produce better arguments;
- the truth is understood not to be located in any single voice, but to emerge from the conversation as a whole.

Postmodern discourse

Over the past half century, a competing mode of discourse, the one I call postmodern, has become steadily more entrenched in academe. Following are ten of its hallmarks, as Roberts and Sailer describe on their blogs:

- “persons and positions are ordinarily closely related,” with little insistence on keeping personal identity separate from the questions or issues under discussion;

- “sensitivity, inclusivity, and inoffensiveness are key values”;
- priority on “cooperation, collaboration, quietness, sedentariness, empathy, equality, non-competitiveness, conformity, a communal focus”;
- “seems lacking in rationality and ideological challenge,” in the eyes of proponents of modern discourse;
- tends to perceive the satire and criticism of modern discourse as “vicious and personal attack, driven by a hateful animus”;
- is oriented to ” the standard measures of grades, tests, and a closely defined curriculum”;
- lacking “means by which to negotiate or accommodate such intractable differences within its mode of conversation,” it will “typically resort to the most fiercely antagonistic, demonizing, and personal attacks upon the opposition”;
- “will typically try, not to answer opponents with better arguments, but to silence them completely as ‘hateful’, ‘intolerant’, ‘bigoted’, ‘misogynistic’, ‘homophobic’, etc.”;
- has a more feminine flavor, as opposed to the more masculine flavor of modern discourse;
- results in “stale monologues” and contexts that “seldom produce strong thought, but rather tend to become echo chambers.”

When competing discourses collide

Roberts’s original post describes the competing modes of discourse in rich detail and shows how differences between them play out in today’s culture wars, as “offense-takers” and “offense trolls” use “human shields” and accusations of “hate speech” to silence opponents. That entire post, long as it is, merits close reading. For present purposes I highlight just one of Roberts’s hypotheses: “Lacking a high tolerance for difference and disagreement, sensitivity-driven discourses will typically manifest a herding effect.

Dissenting voices can be scapegoated or excluded and opponents will be sharply attacked.” This is but another way of saying that proponents of the postmodern mode of discourse have a tendency to engage in workplace mobbing, that is, to gang up on opponents and run them out of their jobs. Scapegoating and mobbing, so I have argued elsewhere, are pretty much the same thing. Roberts’s use of the former term probably derives in part from his reading of René Girard, the world’s foremost student of scapegoating, a wise scholar from whom I myself have learned a lot.

Michael Mason’s elimination from Queen’s

I first learned of Roberts’s distinction and hypothesis in early December of 2012. It was an especially opportune time. I had just returned home from lecturing at Queen's University in Kingston, and was puzzling over a strange and much publicized case of professorial elimination at that university (click here for the lucid report about it by the Canadian Association of University Teachers). A senior historian named Michael Mason, retired from a career at Concordia University in Montreal, was living in Kingston and teaching part-time at Queen's, where students generally rated him an excellent teacher. He was giving a fall-term course on "Asia, Africa, and Latin America since 1945."

Barely two weeks into the term, a small number of students in the class complained that he had made "borderline racist comments." In addition, Mason's teaching assistants accused him of using "racist and sexist language." The department chair and other administrators sprang into action. Mason was summoned to meetings, threatened with suspension, informed that the chair might henceforth be sitting in on his class from time to time, and told that the grading scheme would need to be changed. The administrators judged that Mason had "failed to create a safe space" for students and thereby violated the university's "Educational Equity Policy." On his doctor's advice, Mason went on medical leave. In effect, he was forced out as instructor for the course, and that ended his teaching career at Queen's.

As I understand Mason's ouster, "academic mobbing" is too fancy a term to place on it. Margaret Wente called it a "mugging" in her column in the Globe & Mail. The most fascinating thing about the attack on him is that, so far as I can tell, he was not teaching anything especially contentious or provocative, just acquainting students with the historical record. He positioned himself, moreover, as opposed to racism, and eager to alert students to American racism in the postwar period. Mason's "offense," such as it was, was reading aloud in a lecture a passage from a book that quoted an American admiral calling the Japanese "little yellow sons of bitches."

Similarly, quoting from an article in the Atlantic Monthly, Mason informed the students that a U.S. Senator had called the South Carolina Governor, a woman of Punjabi origin, a "fucking raghead." Mason did not himself indulge in any name-calling, instead just documented that certain American officials had done so. For this he was himself accused of making "borderline racist comments."

The charges of sexism against Mason were similarly tenuous. It was claimed that he had said female students should be mistresses. What he had said was that he wanted his students to become "masters and mistresses" of the course material. He had told the TAs that in his organization of the course, he would not actually have much work to assign them, joking that maybe he would have to ask them to wash his car. This was taken to be demeaning of women.

For explaining why the incursion on Mason's reputation and job occurred, some observers may chalk it up to moral or intellectual deficiencies of his accusers and detractors. Maybe they were mendacious and mean, or perhaps so ill-educated they did not know the multiple meanings of the word mistress, nor the difference between using racial slurs and criticizing other people for using them. Other observers, less sympathetic to CAUT's version of what happened, may suspect that there is more to the story, that by his tone of voice and classroom manner, Mason probably did display bias against women and nonwhites, and that the administrators were in fact responding to a real violation of university policy and human rights.

To either of these quick-and-dirty explanations, Roberts's distinction between modes of discourse offers a more adequate and satisfying alternative. Mason, like most history professors of mature years, saw his course as an arena of modern discourse. He was leftist enough to include American racism as a topic, but his priority was on communicating historical facts about that topic, not on the personal feelings or identities of his students. In the back of his mind he probably knew that if there were any students of Japanese origin in his class, they might wince at hearing the American admiral's term, "little yellow sons of bitches," but Mason assumed their skin would be thick enough to shrug off any feeling of discomfort.

The name of the game, as he saw it, was to learn history. Like generations of modern professors before him, Mason considered mastery of the subject the prime objective of his course. One can imagine his impish smile when, bending over backwards not to offend female students by sex-specific language, he uttered that phrase, "masters and mistresses." As for the joke about asking his TAs to wash his car, well, a joke is a joke. If Mason had seriously ordered them to take buckets of water to the parking lot after class and wash his car, they might legitimately object. How could they possibly object to a droll way of letting them know his demands on their time would be relatively few? Such is the modern mode of discourse Mason appeared to be practicing.

His accusers, by contrast, were engaged in the postmodern mode of discourse. They were not lying, nor were they displaying ignorance. They were living in a somewhat different world. They did not separate, as Mason did, the personal from the pedagogical. Their priority was higher than his on making sure all students in the class were comfortable all the time. Their key values (I'm quoting Roberts) were "sensitivity, inclusivity, and inoffensiveness." Maybe one or another of the students was an "offense troll" on the lookout for hidden racism and sexism, eager to expose these vices as proof of personal righteousness.

In a letter defending Mason, one of his former students, Helen Mo, wrote that "Like most excellent teachers, Professor Mason used quotations, irony, and other rhetorical devices in his Socratic-style lectures." This is typical of the modern mode of discourse, wherein questions are always more important than answers. Postmodern discourse, by contrast, tends to be more lliteral, even leaden, and there is rarely much room for humour or whimsy. It is answers that count, even if they turn out to be "stale monologues" and "echo chambers." I would guess that the impishness in Mason's reference to "masters and mistresses" or to the washing of his car went right by the students who later complained. They expected him to conform to a "closely defined curriculum." He failed the test. They therefore, as Roberts could have predicted, came together in a menacing little herd and made an "antagonistic, demonizing, and personal" attack on Mason that ended his job at Queen's.

Three more examples

I said in my lecture there that I felt in a time warp as I read the accounts of Michael Mason's ouster. Dozens of academic mobbing cases over the past quarter-century show the same clash of modes of discourse that Roberts has perceptively described. In each of them, a professor teaching in a standard modern way was attacked by students or colleagues playing by a different set of rules, living in a different mental universe. Here are just three examples:

• At the University of Western Ontario in 1991, psychologist Heinz Klatt made the mistake of injecting humour into his class on child psychology (click here for his brief account). He called a student named Lucretia "Lucky Lucy." She found the epithet charming but four other students found it demeaning of women, and therefore charged Klatt with sexual harassment and creating a "negative psychological environment." Klatt spent the next two years in what he called "Kafkaland."

• At the University of Michigan in 1992 (click here for discussion and links), statistician David Goldberg distributed in class a cartoon that poked fun at statisticians like him. Other handouts he distributed illustrated statistical techniques by applying them to actual data, and a few of these showed differences by race and sex. The upshot was that he was accused of racial and sexual harassment!

• At a conference at Harvard University in 2005, president Lawrence Summers offered some tentative, carefully reasoned, empirically supported hypotheses about why women are underrepresented on science and engineering faculties (click here for information and links). "Personal detachment from the issues under discussion" appeared to be impossible for one member of the audience, MIT biologist Nancy Hopkins, who spearheaded the campaign to hound Summers out of his position on grounds of sexism. Summers backtracked and grovelled, but the campaign won out.

Can you see why I considered Sailer's and Roberts's blog entries gifts so valuable as to be worth passing on? It is because the ideas they offer go a long way toward explaining why odd academic autos da fé like these occur.

One more example: Philippe Rushton (1943-2012)

Philippe Rushton was yet another mobbing target on my mind in December of 2012, when I came across Roberts's distinction between modes of discourse. Rushton had died two months earlier. He and I were about the same age. Both of us were immigrants to Canada. For three years in the 1970s, we had been faculty colleagues at the same university, Western Ontario, where he spent the remainder of his career. We had corresponded a few times, exchanged papers.

He had written a generous review of one of my books. I believe Roberts's distinction helps illuminate the attack on Rushton that began in 1989 (here is his account), and continued off and on for the rest of his life, even on the occasion of his death.

Rushton embodied (what I call) modern discourse. Virtually all of the key characteristics listed above for this mode of discourse applied to him, the main exception being literary devices like satire and humour. I suspect he knew better than to make jokes. Even if his priority had been like mine, on social science, that is, on the empirical explanation of life in terms of cultural and historical factors, he might have gotten himself in trouble with the postmodern left. But he made himself still more vulnerable, by making natural science his priority, and seeking explanation through biological and genetic factors, among them race and sex.

He really was a racist, in the sense of treating race as an important independent variable for explaining all kinds of things — though I can hardly imagine a professor less likely than Rushton to discriminate against students or colleagues of a racial origin different from his own.

Rushton was unfailingly even-tempered, soft spoken, and polite, always willing to listen to opponents' arguments and respond cooly and rationally, citing evidence. It was as if he took Kipling's famous poem as a script for his own scholarly life: "If you can keep your head when all about you Are losing theirs and blaming it on you, If you can trust yourself when all men doubt you, But make allowance for their doubting too…."

Rushton was among the most cited psychologists in the world. In a front-page article in the Ottawa Citizen in 2005, Andrew Duffy described him as the most famous university professor in Canada (he might have said infamous). Apart from all else, Rushton's prominence justifies the most rigorous effort to explain why the fierce campaign against him arose, why the mass protests, police investigation, demands that he be fired, restrictions on his teaching and research, incessant denunciations in the press, and collegial shunning. Of any adequate explanation, the distinction between modes of discourse that Roberts and Sailer have set forth could properly form an important part.

In conclusion, three qualifiers

I conclude with suggestions of how the gift this little paper passes on is best used. Difference in mode of discourse is an important variable for explaining some mobbing episodes, not all, and even in the cases where it is relevant, its explanatory power depends on other conditions being present, too.

No university is neatly divided into practitioners of modern discourse on one side, proponents of postmodern discourse on the other. Every academic weaves the fabric of his or her own pedagogy and epistemology in a distinctive way. No professor is entirely modern or postmodern, and every professor shifts from one mode of discourse to the other, depending on topic, setting, mood, and many other factors. The proper unit of analysis in the study of mobbing is the social process, not the individuals involved. I would imagine, for instance, that biologist Nancy Hopkins at MIT generally practices rigorous, empirical, dispassionate, truly modern discourse in her classes. She is an accomplished scientist, a specialist in the genetics of zebrafish.

Yet on the occasion of Lawrence Summers's now famous remarks, Hopkins appeared to lose her dispassion and to respond in a postmodern way; she seized it as an occasion to testify and demonize rather than debate. Or consider Alan Dershowitz's leadership of the campaign to prevent Norman Finkelstein from getting tenure at DePaul University in 2007. Dershowitz's reputation as a brilliant modern legal scholar is sterling, but Finkelstein's criticisms of the Holocaust industry were more than Dershowitz could stomach. All academics have soft spots and blind spots. Everybody's vision is blinkered in some way. The goal in research on mobbing is to explain the specific episode or case. Typecasting the participants detracts from this goal.

A second caveat is that how a mobbing episode plays out depends not just on the modes of discourse of target and mobbers, but on which mode of discourse is more firmly institutionalized in university policies and relevant legislation. What John Furedy called "velvet totalitarianism" in a 1997 article depends not just on numerous academics subscribing to the postmodern mode of discourse, but on the enforcement of its values and priorities by administrative authority, acting on the basis of written rules.

In Mason's case at Queen's, it mattered that the university had an "Educational Equity Policy" that seemed to support the postmodern priority on sensitivity and inoffensiveness. When the faculty handbook includes provisions that put the comfort of students ahead of intellectual rigour and freedom of speech, administrators need not themselves be caught up in a campaign to oust a targeted professor; all they have to do is behave like faithful bureaucrats and follow the faculty handbook.

That is why the organization called FIRE, the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education, has pursued a long succession of court cases aimed at forcing colleges and universities to abandon speech codes and anti-harassment policies that infringe on freedoms guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution. FIRE's objective is to protect modern discourse in higher education by ensuring that it has institutional support.

Finally, a point made at the start of this paper bears repeating. It is in roughly half of the academic mobbing cases I have studied these past twenty years that the distinction between modern and postmodern discourse seems to have explanatory power. In the other half, it doesn't.

Mobbing is a distinct, singular, momentous social process that can be triggered by any of numerous factors — whistleblowing, racial or religious prejudice, discrimination on the basis of sex or sexual orientation, the arousal of envy on any number of grounds, even for being good-looking or multilingual. The distinction that Alastair Roberts described on his blog, that Steve Sailer summarized on his, and that I regifted for visitors to my website, is hugely important for making sense of many mobbing cases, but beside the point in many others.

To everyone, regardless of discipline or specialty, whether in academe or outside it, male or female, young or old, white, black, or purple, who is puzzled by the organizational pathology called mobbing and eager to deepen our understanding of it, I give thanks and best wishes for much success in 2013.

[box]

Editor's Note: the preceding article is re-published with the kind permission of Professor Kenneth Westhues, and was originally titled "A USEFUL DISTINCTION REGIFTED" FOR CHRISTMAS 2012″.

The explanatory power of comparing modernist and postmodernist discourse is something with which, in the opinion of AVFM's editorial board, all members of this human rights movement should acquaint themselves.

[/box]

Vanja Krajina placed on offender’s registry

January 23, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box icon=””]

Vanja Krajina has been placed on the offender’s registry at register-her.com.

On November 16, 2012, Krajina participated in a protest at the University of Toronto against a talk being held by Dr. Warren Farrell on problems faced by men and boys. Krajina, who apparently is not a University of Toronto student, but who was acting in concert with members of the University of Toronto Student Union, was video taped shouting epithets and obscenities at young men who were attempting to attend the lecture. Among the invectives she used was “fucking scum” and “fucking rape apologist, incest supporting scum.”

The protest eventually turned violent, requiring police to remove protesters from doorways they were blocking. The violence was supported and defended by the University of Toronto Student Union, a recognized University of Toronto organization with a history of promoting disinformation and violence.

Also present at the protest and supporting the violence that happened there was the organization CUPE, the Canadian Union of Public Employees.

Several students from the protest and members of the University of Toronto Student Union remain under investigation related to the violent protest.
Other Sources:
http://www.genuinewitty.com/2012/12/14/whos-responsible-for-the-university-of-torontos-anti-patriarch-hate-party-feat-vanja-krajina-and-the-old-left http://gloriusbastard.com/?tag=vanja-krajina

[/box]

VAWA Mafia in action – D.C. Police Chief under fire

January 24, 2013 | by Robert O'Hara | Link | Original Link

(Washington D.C. Jan 24, 2013 — AVfM News)Today Human Rights Watch, a New York based non-profit organization whose stated mission is to "protect and defend human rights," officially released a report outlining what it says are extreme shortcomings in the way the Washington Metropolitan Police Department handles sexual assault cases.[1] [8] [10]

During a press conference that took place at the National Press Club the report's author, Sara Darehshori, accused the MPD of mishandling 170 reports of sexual assault over a three year period and called for outside oversight of the departments sexual assault investigations.[10] Human Rights Watch covers a broad range of human rights issues on the international stage. This is the only known instance that it has turned its attention toward a large U.S. metropolitan police department.

Resistance to the report by the WMPD has been fierce, with Police Chief Cathy Lanier calling on the Department of Justice to do an independent evaluation of the report and the department's handling of sexual assault cases. The DOJ says it considering the request. [3]

Heavy sparing between MPD Chief Cathy Lanier and Darehshori began on May 30th of last year when the Darehshori announced in a letter to the department its intentions to release the a report if its findings. In a brief summary of the 195 page report included in the letter Darehshori accused the MPD of failure to investigate sexual assault cases and poor treatment of victims citing "victim blaming" and "intimidating police behavior such as threatening to prosecute if the victim is found to be lying." A prompt response to the letter was requested.

Lanier shot back with an letter dated June 8th 2012 in which the chief stated:

> Thank you for the opportunity to respond to your letter. As previously communicated the Metropolitan Police Department finds it disturbing that a highly respected organization such as Human Rights Watch would ask us for feedback on a report yet not provide the entire report for review. MPD was also perplexed that Human Rights Watch (HRW) asked for feedback on a 16 month investigation within three business days. Most disturbing is that in conversations subsequent to receiving the letter, HRW has showed no interest in working cooperatively with MPD to improve sexual assault investigations.[5]

She continues later in the letter:

> The department is concerned that the letter, and presumably the > report, use unsupported and uncorroborated allegations as a basis for its conclusions. In many of the cases it appears that the allegation is not being made by the sexual abuse victim but by advocates and/or hospital staff. MPD does not automatically discredit the reports by advocates and hospital staff but in the letter it us unclear of the context in which these allegations were reported to these third parties.

>
> If the letter in any way resembles the full investigation, we believe the matter needs further investigation to support and/or substantiate the allegations that you have made.[5]

In the letter sent to Lanier, Darehshori cited three instances as key examples of police complacency. In all three cases the alleged victims had been severely intoxicated and remembered nothing. Furthermore, there was no evidence of penetration of any kind in all three cases. Darehshori contended that since the police dismissed the cases based on the fact that there was nothing to report they had mishandled them and treated the alleged victims poorly.[5]

[image]
Sara Darehshori

The MPD set up a web page dedicated to addressing the controversy in response to the criticism of its performance.[5] On this page are copies of correspondence between MPD and Human Rights Watch. Also available on this page is an embargoed copy of the Human Rights Watch report entitled "A Capitol Offence" which the MPD posted on January 20, much to the consternation of Human Rights Watch.[9] Until that date the MPD had no access to the report despite repeated requests for a copy. Lanier has said publicly that she has shared MPD data with Human Rights Watch since the onset of the controversy in order for them to produce a more accurate report, but no indication has been given by the organization as to whether or not they used it. While Lanier said that the data shared were forthcoming, Human Rights Watch has claimed they only got access to it after a lawsuit.[1]

Human Rights Watch is a very well funded organization with a reported income in 2011 of $139,654,922, up from just $42,452,799 in 2010 according to its 990 IRS form dated April 7 of last year, an increase of $97,202,123. The overwhelming proportion of the increase was from contributions and grants which were reported to be $134,174,146 in 2011, up from $39,220,034 in 2010 according to the same document. [source: Guidestar]

Its total current assets are $212,033,446 and the CEO's salary is $800,000 a year, drawing much criticism from many of its individual contributors. They do not publish a breakdown of grants and contributions they receive.

The organizations scope of interests is wide, with topics including everything from genocide to human trafficking and political corruption. Before becoming Senior Council of the U.S. Program, Darehshori was senior counsel in Human Rights Watch's International Justice program where she worked on international justice issues relating to Darfur, Serbia and the International Criminal Court, according to their website.[7]

She now focuses on research and advocacy on issues relating to police handling of sexual assault cases in the United States, including work on the rape kit backlog.

[image]
Kathy Lanier
Contrary to the impression Human Rights Watch gives in its report the MPD has an established record of improving it's handling of sexual assault cases during Lanier's time as Chief. In 2008, after a highly publicized case in which an alleged victim was not able to get a rape kit performed due to inconsistencies in evidence collection, the MPD centralized its forensic examination routine at Med Star Washington Medical Center where all those reporting a sexual assault go to have a rape kit performed according to Laniers correspondence with Darehshori.[5]

The department also shored up its Sexual Assault Nurse Examiner (SANE) program. Since last year there has been a 50% increase in reported sexual assaults which the Lanier points out as an indication victims are feeling much more comfortable coming to the police with their stories. Recently a new web based reporting instrument on the MPD website was launched where victims can critique the performance of officers responding to their reports.[4]

The Chief has stated her primary concern in the face of this controversy is that victims will loose hard earned confidence in the MPD and shy away from reporting due to the report.[4]

Lanier herself is an impressive individual. She worked her way up from being a high school dropout and unwed mother at 15, to earning multiple degrees, including a Masters in National Security — as well as moving up from foot patrolman through the ranks to Chief of Police.[6]

Concerns about the methodologies and perhaps motivation of the Human Rights Watch report may be confirmed in the reports first recommendation, which reads as follows.

> Pass the Violence Against Women Reauthorization Act (VAWA). While the bill never reached the President last year, separate versions of VAWA before both the Senate and House in 2012 funded training for law enforcement agencies on how to improve investigation of sexual assault cases and on how to appropriately treat victims. The bills also provided grants to help appoint victim counselors for the prosecution of sexual assault cases.[9]

This first recommendation has nothing to do with the MPD. It is national level legislation which was in full effect during the entire period covered in the HRW report. Given that, it is impossible to consider VAWA ameliorative of the problems the report purports to highlight.

Also, the timing and venue for this is hard to ignore. Washington D.C. is the focal point of national legislation like VAWA, as well as the controversies that surround it. In recent years progress has been made by organizations such as Stop Abusive and Violent Environments (SAVE) to reform domestic violence legislation, as proven by the current battle in congress to re-authorize the legislation.

It can arguably be stated that Human Rights Watch, undoubtedly a major player in the sexual grievance industry, has chosen the Washington Metropolitan Police Department as a target, not because they have a special or significant problem with the way the handle sexual assault claims, but because Washington D.C. is the focal point of the battle over VAWA, a matter unrelated to the HRW report.

However, if they can give the impression that there is a major problem with the handling of sexual assault cases in Congresses' own back yard, and create the illusion that re-authorization of VAWA would ameliorate that problem, they can influence the outcome over the Congressional battle.

In short, the whole thing stinks of VAWA politics. The Chief, however, is giving them a run for the money.

Sources:

[1] http://www.hrw.org/news/2013/01/24/us-dc-police-mishandle-sexual-assault-cases

[2] http://www.washingtonpost.com/local/in-report-human-rights-watch-accuses-dc-police-of-mishandling-rapes/2013/01/24/9b27f0ce-619c-11e2-a389-ee565c81c565_story.html

[3] http://www.washingtonpost.com/local/human-rights-watch-says-dc-police-fail-to-investigate-many-sex-assaults-chief-lanier-disputes-allegation/2013/01/17/864f3998-60c3-11e2-a389-ee565c81c565_story.html

[4] http://articles.washingtonpost.com/2012-06-14/local/35461866_1_sexual-assault-reports-number-of-sexual-assaults-human-rights-watch

[5]http://mpdc.dc.gov/page/sexual-assault-investigations-information-regarding-review-sexual-assault-investigations-human

[6] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Cathy_L._Lanier

[7] http://www.hrw.org/bios/sara-darehshori

[8] http://www.washingtonpost.com/local/dc-police-dispute-watchdog-report-on-handling-of-sexual-assault-cases/2013/01/20/7a4d317a-616f-11e2-a389-ee565c81c565_story_1.html

[9] http://www.hrw.org/embargo/node/112664?signature=fe3b8941e39f264bfe5983c34a49d5df&suid=6

[10] http://www.washingtonpost.com/local/in-report-human-rights-watch-accuses-dc-police-of-mishandling-rapes/2013/01/24/9b27f0ce-619c-11e2-a389-ee565c81c565_story.html

AVFM Radio: Postmodern poison

January 24, 2013 | by AVfM Radio | Link | Original Link

For serious activists in the men's rights movement, one of the key questions has always been "why". Specifically, why is such a large segment of the population content to flatly ignore observable reality and conform to an emotionally based group think which justifies and enables ongoing and escalating carnage while pretending to humanist ideals.

Many different hypotheses have been fielded to explain the near total unwillingness of feminsts to engage in any kind of reasoned dialogue. Rather, an established and documented culture exists where all nonconforming thought is shouted down, villified and portrayed as sexist, racist along with every other condemned form of thought crime.

But how can the proponents of such tactics continue to see themselves as anything except an irrational mob.

The answer, or at least an important part of the answer may be that they are not modern thinkers. They are a present day tribe whose mode of thought echoes that of the the primitive, emotionally driven mob of the dark ages.

The details of gender ideology may be completely irrelevent, because these primitives are the post-modern. Which is to say, they are not modern thinkers born out of the enlightenment. They are primitives.

Call in number for the show is 310 388 9709

show page : http://www.blogtalkradio.com/avoiceformen/2013/01/25/post-modern-poison

How SHOCKING!

January 24, 2013 | by Kristina Hansen | Link | Original Link

Dana Hunter, blogger on FreeThoughtBlogs, has written a piece on the pains of owning a set of ovaries and how her once a month PMS cramps are so devastating to her that she compares them to actual labor, even though she has no children and has never experienced labor pains in her life.

She also points out that men have no way of knowing what her crippling, agony inducing PMS cramps feel like. Well duh! Thank you Dana for pointing out the obvious: men do not possess evil ovaries (or good ones, either). It must be the patriarchy at work again.

She is also cheering for a show called Guinea Pigs, which is a Dutch reality TV show. According to Dana, in one episode, the contestants > put their testes where their uteruses ain't. With electrodes strapped to their stomachs, they experienced simulated contractions with slowly increasing intensity over two hours until they're screaming in agony. It's truly some fucked-up Fear Factor craziness.

Dana is apparently so elated about this that she had to wipe away a tear upon hearing of this torture device for men. She even seems to enjoy the fact that one man could not endure the whole 2 hours.

She then says "Imagine suffering that kind of pain and not being able to make it stop for days. Keep in mind that these men were not bleeding from their nether orifice, nor did they have to squeeze out a watermelon-sized object through narrow parts of their anatomy." Now imagine never having suffered through that pain, or through labor, EVER.

Well, neither have you Dana. And labor does not go on for days, nor do you have to suffer through it if you don't want to. There are these wonderful things called drugs out there that makes giving birth pretty damned easy. If giving birth were as horrific as Dana seems to think it is, I doubt women would be having many babies and we'd probably have died out long ago. You're built to go through it, Dana. It's not a man's fault he is not.

The simple fact is that PMS is nowhere comparable to actual unmedicated labor. To even think it is is just fucking ignorant and insulting to those of us who have gone through actual unmedicated labor, or a complicated labor.

Sure, PMS cramps can irritate the hell out of you for a while. They are not pleasant, and some women, like myself, take Tylenol or Midol to help, but we do not whine and cry about it. We get on with life and accept the fact that there is nothing we can do about it, short of getting a hysterectomy, and who the hell wants that kind of surgery? I'd prefer the occasional cramping for a day or two per month thank you.

And as for men not knowing what it feels like? So what? Why do some whiny women feel this need for men to be subjected to all their aches, pains, and emotional failings? Do men go around insisting that women need to experience what it's like to be on the receiving end of the PMSing dragon each month? Because let me tell you, we women can be absolute fucking bitches (more than normal) when we are PMSing. And instead of sucking it up, like feminists are always telling men to do, many women feel that it is somehow their right to abuse and annoy the shit out of the men in their lives when PMSing because, if they have to suffer, so do the men.

So now women like Dana are elated that men are being hooked up to a machine that simulates labor, which is, in comparison, nothing close to the mild pains of PMS. I can almost guarantee you that most women would not last 2 hours on that machine, particularly someone like Dana, who can't seem to even be able to deal with her usual PMS.

Labor is not something women would want to experience without pain management, unless they absolutely had to, which is why the rates of voluntary scheduled c-sections have sky rocketed in the last 10+ years. But hey, let's hook men up, who are not built for labor, to a machine that tortures them for 2 hours and simulates extreme labor with no option for pain relief. Ya, that sounds completely fair.

So don't give me that crap that women are somehow these tough, courageous people for just being able to give birth. Most of these warrior women would rather avoid labor pains with c-sections, medications, and other pain management methods.

As for Dana's evil and torturous cramps once a month, take a pain pill and suck it up sister. I bet any man would trade places with you in a heartbeat if all they had to bitch about was feeling a bit of discomfort once a month.

NCFM calls for equality in selective service

January 24, 2013 | by NCFM | Link | Original Link

PRESS RELEASE

Contact Marc Angelucci, NCFM VP

TELEPHONE: 626-319-3081

EMAIL: marcangelucci@hotmail.com

Defense Secretary Leon Panetta removed the military's ban on women serving in combat.

In the 1981 landmark U.S. Supreme Court decision, Rostker v. Goldberg, 453 U.S. 57 (1981), the Court held that since women are excluded from combat, men and women were not similarly situated, thus women did not have to register for selective service.

In 1980, a year earlier, a group of uppity men from the National Coalition for a Just Draft proposed the radical notion that men and women are equal and should be treated as such (see: Hayward, F., Appeal on Behalf of Coalition for a Just Draft, American Male, Fall issue, Vol. 1, No. 4).

In particular, "We must demand that every legal expectation—military or otherwise—be equally applicable to males and females" (page 8).

Men failing to register with Selective Service can be fined up to $250,000, sentenced to up to five years in prison, and become ineligible for a number of federal and state benefits including: jobs, financial aid, citizenship, loans, and job training.

NCFM President Harry Crouch noted that, "It's about time. Women now have the same benefits, opportunity, and risks that come from combat.

Unfortunately, they don't have to register for Selective Service. So they don't have equal responsibility. Women cannot be penalized for failing to register."

Equal opportunity must include equal responsibility. Women have supported wars at about the same rate as have men. Either extend the Selective Service registration requirement to women, including penalties for failing to register, or end military conscription.

♦

[box icon=""]

AVFM Editorial Opinion:

With the Pentagon to open combat jobs to women in the near future, we are reminded of one of the most glaring kinds of systemic sexual discrimination still thriving, and it is occurring in the US Military, which fostered racial integration and inclusion before they were accepted in civilian life.

Death on the battlefield has remained an almost exclusively male affair. Depending on your perspective, this is either discrimination against men, burdening them with the most overarching hardship of military life. Or, you may see it as discrimination against women, preventing them from realizing their full potential as soldiers based on their sex. It would seem to work against both sexes, though it is ludicrous to compare the unfairness of exclusion on the battlefield to being targeted for sex-based inclusion in coffins and wheelchairs.

AVFM supports the spirit of the new Pentagon Directive, set to be announced on Thursday. However, any blanket approval of the new measure thus far would be premature. There are at least two matters yet to be resolved.

First, the only way this new policy will have any meaning will be if it is mandatory that women face combat on the front lines. With 20% of the military being comprised of women, that means roughly 20% of combat related fatalities should be female. 1 in 5 of body bags being filled overseas should contain the bodies of mothers, sisters, daughters, wives and girlfriends.

Additionally, we fully expect feminist pushback against any efforts by the Pentagon to make combat service compulsory. What they will push for is what they always push for. Choice; choice that male soldiers do not, and have never had.

This is aptly illustrated in the letter above from the National Coalition for Men, pointing to the double standard faced by men from Selective Service. The Selective part means selecting men, not women, and that should change as well.

The defense of a nation, whether with conscripted troops or an all-volunteer army, does not run on democratic options or the personal preferences of those serving. Women should be no less subject to that and men no more burdened by it.

No doubt there will be abundant opportunities ahead for MRAs to make their voices known, both with elected officials and in media forums where news stories on this will be discussed. We also appeal to writers for AVFM to submit news and opinion pieces regarding what could be a historic event.

We urge you to make your voices heard in the coming days. PE

[/box]

The joke of equality in the military

January 25, 2013 | by Lucian Vâlsan | Link | Original Link

As a man living in Eastern Europe looking at the huge debate in the United States after the Pentagon's announcement of gradually lifting the ban on women who seek to serve in the military, I just cannot restrain myself from laughing loudly.

Now don't get me wrong, in my opinion there are only two legitimate solutions in this problem: either make all people eligible for the draft and register to selective service, or make no-one. Any other option is just unfair. As simple as that.

The only state that is close to having that is Israel, albeit the Zionist state still exempts women from non-Jewish communities (but not men!) and married women (but not men!). There are some other countries (such as China or Peru) that also have laws that ensure full equality when it comes to conscription and compulsory military service, although China has never enforced the law since the establishment of People's Republic of China because there are already more than enough people (male and female) that volunteer for a career in the military.

So, basically, with the notable exception of Israel, all the other nations and countries in the world can be divided into two big categories: those that don't conscript anybody (this includes countries like China that have the laws but don't enforce them) and those that actively enforce male disposability.

In the patriarchal Iran, men that don't go through military service cannot leave the country and are prohibited from getting a driver's license, whilst there are no such restrictions for women. Oh, and Iran has the highest ratio of female undergraduates in the world[1].

But do we ever hear about that? Of course we don't.

In Eastern Europe, we've seen Marxist regimes first hand and we've seen the Great Patriotic War (Великая Отечественная война) which is basically the Soviet winning part of the World War II. These events have provided us a perspective that the general public in the USA has no idea of.

During the communist years, schools from Poland, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Romania, etc. etc. never stopped talking to us about the bravery of women like Zoya Kosmodemyanskaya[2] and Zinaida Portnova[3] who volunteered to help "the anti-fascist and anti-Hitlerist Soviet Union" and whose combined efforts killed hundreds of Nazi soldiers (all of them men that have been forcibly conscripted) and ended up being killed when they were around the age of 18.

There were 800,000 women in total that served in the Soviet army during WWII[4] and 89 of them were decorated with the highest distinction of the Soviet state. Even today there are still some gender ideologues that have the nerve to state that it was the 'grrrl power' that helped the Soviets eventually to win the war. And the same gender ideologues claim that it was "post-war patriarchal oppression" that prevented women to seek full equality into the Russian military after the war. And they claim these with little to no consideration to the actual facts.

And the actual facts are as follows: The overwhelming majority of those 800,000 women enrolled voluntarily and left the military (also voluntarily) once the war ended. Oh… and most of them survived.

I've heard a feminist claiming that the Russian women's suffering from WWII was "comparable as a class" to the one of men. Again, let's stick to the facts.

The Wikipedia page about the Red Army[5] says the following about the WWII:

> During the Great Patriotic War, the Red Army conscripted 29,574,900 men in addition to the 4,826,907 in service at the beginning of the war. Of this total of 34,401,807 it lost 6,329,600 KIA, 555,400 deaths by disease and 4,559,000 MIA (most captured). Of these 11,444,000, however, 939,700 rejoined the ranks in the subsequently liberated Soviet territory, and a further 1,836,000 returned from German captivity. Thus the grand total of losses amounted to 8,668,300. This is the official total dead, but other estimates give the number of total dead up to almost 11 million men, including 7.7 million killed or missing in action and 2.6 million POW dead (out of 5.2 million total POWs), plus 400,000 paramilitary and Soviet partisan losses.

So, there were 10 times more men that died than women that served overall. On what planet is this "comparable"?

The reason I'm going with this history lesson is because my great-grandfather did not survive the war (whilst my great-grandmother got to live up to the age of 88) and my paternal grandfather did survive the war but came back with huge distress and with a permanently damaged lung that gave him breathing problems throughout his life (whilst my grandmother got to live up to the age of 80).

Another reason I am giving the facts of the much praised "equality" in the military is because my mother went through compulsory military service. She went to the University in a STEM field (which was difficult for anyone during the Communist era due to the harsh exams and the highly limited number people that could be admitted). Because she was a student, the schedule was a bit more relaxed. She had to go one day per week in a military facility for 6 hours and go through military training and during the summer vacation, she had to go for three weeks and stay only in the military facility like any other conscripted individual and live by the military oriented way of life.

Of course, during the same years, there was a huge propaganda as to how we must provide more affirmative action and more entitlements in order to have absolute equality of outcome. But at least the Marxist regime was honest all the way through and sought absolute equality of outcome (and made no secret from that) including in the hard labor areas.

Immediately after the fall of the Communist regime, the new government signed two decrees: lifting the ban on abortion and abolishing the female compulsory military service. The male compulsory military service remained in place until October 2006, almost 17 years after the female obligation was dropped.

So, the moment they had the possibility to abolish the equality in this respect, women's groups had no problem to do so.

So let's see how "gender equality" works in the militarized institutions in Romania (firefighters, police personal, correctional fighters, etc.).

On the official page of the "Alexandru Ioan Cuza" Police Academy from Bucharest[6][7] we learn that in order to go through an entrance exam for this school in order to become a firefighter, a guard in a prison or a police officer, one must be fluent in Romanian, have no prior convictions of any kind and:

> Have a minimum height of 1.70 meters (5 feet and 7 inches) if the candidate is a man and a minimum height of 1.65 meters (5 feet and 5 inches) if the candidate is a woman

The same specification is made for any department of this military school. So this basically means that a 1.65 meter woman is tougher than a 1.69 man. I am sorry, but it's hard for me to believe this is actually true, but the lawmakers seem to believe that.

Moreover, besides from admitting shorter people than the minimum requirement simply because they're women, the physical tests are also easier for women.

From the minimum requirements sheet on the same academy's website[8] we find out that men need to run for 50 meters in 7.2 seconds (preferably even faster), whilst it's enough for women to run the same distance in 8.1 seconds. Also, the 1000 meters marathon (resistance running) must be covered by men in 3 minutes and 45 seconds, whilst women have to do the same thing in 4 minutes and 10 seconds. Now, excuse me, but I was walking (indeed, walking fast, but not running) 5,500 meters in 14 minutes when I was 12 years old and was selling newspapers on the street. And I have never been a sportive person. The physical standards for women are a joke.

The only "equal" physical requirement is when the candidates need to throw a medical ball 7 meters away. But again – women throw a 2 kg (4.4 pounds) ball whilst men throw a 4 kg (8.8 pounds) ball.

So here's your military "equality". Men do up to two times more heavy lifting (literally) but end up being paid the same as their female colleagues who get to be subjected to lower standards than 12 year old boys.

When the chief of the General County Inspectorate of Police (IPJ) from Vâlcea stated that the female police officers under this establishment are generally useless[9], he was rendered as a misogynistic bigot. But was he?

Let's not be hypocrites. Under this law, female officers run slower, have slower strength, lower resistance, are generally shorter and tend to go more often on parental leave. These are the facts – whether the feminists like it or not.

But in spite of these facts, the websites of most military academies are filled with pictures of females, as if they were truly the equal of their male counterparts and as if they were as many as their male counterparts. Most militarized institutions have a small limited number of students they welcome and it's usually 40 males, 5 females and 3 minorities. And by "minority" the Romanian law understands gypsies, Hungarians, women, Ukrainians and other minorities except for the citizens from Republic of Moldova which usually have a separate category. But often times not even those 5 places for women aren't filled, in spite of the commercials, the physical standards comparable to 12 year old boys and non-formal female favoring promotions that are now in place throughout militarized institutions. Could it be because women don't actually want anything to do with this?

To sum up, there is little to no doubt that this will happen in the USA in the following years (unless it's already happening). The NCFM appeal[10] does a good job but it doesn't go far enough. Not only USA must either end military conscription altogether or extend the Selective Service registration requirement to women, including penalties for failing to register, but what USA must also do is not to lower the standards for women. By doing so, USA will end up like the "egalitarian" Europe with its mostly useless (but highly consuming of taxpayers' money) military structures. When the conflict in Libya started, France deployed mainly personnel from Légion étrangère[11]. Why? Because it's the only military service wing from the French army that still works as an army, where skills are more important than misleading understandings of "equality."

Having a taxpayers' funded huge army is controversial enough. But having a useless taxpayers' funded huge army is plain stupidity.

[1] http://www.nationmaster.com/graph/edu_gir_to_boy_rat_pri_lev_enr-boys-ratio-primary-level-enrolment

[2] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Zoya_Kosmodemyanskaya

[3] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Zinaida_Portnova

[4] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Soviet_women_in_World_War_II

[5] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Red_Army#The_Great_Patriotic_War

[6] http://www.academiadepolitie.ro/root/studii/admitere/2012/documente/admitere2012_conditii_adm_politie_pompieri.pdf

[7] http://www.academiadepolitie.ro/root/studii/admitere/2012/documente/admitere2012_conditii_adm_penitenciare.pdf

[8] http://www.academiadepolitie.ro/root/studii/admitere/2012/documente/admitere2012_probe_sportive.pdf

[9] http://www.realitatea.net/seful-ipj-valcea-nu-mai-vrea-femei-in-politie-vezi-aici-motivul_86

1740.html

[10] http://www.avoiceformen.com/a-voice-for-men/ncfm-calls-for-equality-in-selective-service/

[11] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/French_Foreign_Legion

Welcome to the Second Wave

January 25, 2013 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Having observed men's issues advocacy since the late 1970s it has been interesting to watch the fledgling men's rights movement grow. While slowly increasing its membership the Men's Rights Movement (MRM) has until recently consisted of disparate islands of disaffection toward the increasing reach of feminist tyranny. These islands have consisted of small collectives of men, along with the occasional sympathetic woman, who gathered to reinforce men's right to live out traditional male roles if they so choose, and to challenge the feminist bigotry that was increasingly attacking this freedom of choice through its manipulation of the social and legal environment.

Since the turn of the new millennium a thread has begun to emerge from within the MRM that argues less for men to be able to live traditional roles, and more for the right to be treated as human beings deserving of a variety of life choices and basic human rights. Such human rights, according to this ideological platform, have been neglected by centuries of gynocentric culture and, more recently, eroded by decades of feminist governance.

Having observed the MRM for three decades I have no hesitation in confirming that the men-are-human-beings focus suddenly emerged into popular consciousness with the birth of A Voice For Men in 2009, a forum whose articles popularized the idea and inaugurated a distinct 'second wave' of the men's movement based on human rights principles.

The notion of 'waves' is familiar to us from First, Second and Third Wave feminism. However our use of the term is not in any way related to the content or structure of feminist waves and is used here for metaphorical convenience as in 'waves of soldiers' or ‘waves of emotion’ to connote a surge of activity that is unique and yet related to a previous surge of activity.

Here is how I recently summarized the Second Wave of the MRM:

- Nationally and internationally networked (as opposed to the poorly networked 1st wave);
- Inclusive of all: women, men, straight and gay, trans, white, black are actively involved (as opposed to predominant hetero white of the 1st wave);
- Strictly anti violence (as opposed to occasional violence tolerance of 1st wave)
- Anti-domination of MRM by traditionalist assumptions (which dominated 1st wave);
- Anti-domination by partisan politics (1st wave was dominated by right wing sentiment);
- Inclusive of people of all faiths while having zero tolerance for proselytizers (1st wave had slight dominance by Western religion);
- Are generally anti-feminist, anti-gynocentrism, and anti-misandry (like first wave) and are broadly oriented to human rights principles;
- Are more committed to building bridges between the MRM and the general community (unlike 1st wave);
- Have elaborated a more thorough socio-political history of misandry and gynocentrism (unlike the patchy attempts of 1st wave);
- Have developed a more sophisticated discourse about sexual/psychological/social/political issues to inform the basis of the MRM (more than 1st wave)
- Focuses it’s activism on changing cultural narratives over lobbying officials to change laws, based on the principle that laws are usually altered to align with prevailing cultural expectations.

In conclusion, the new wave of thought sweeping through the MRM–a wave which could be called the Men’s Human Rights Movement–has fundamentally demarcated that which went before and that which has gained center-stage now. And for those like me who rode the earlier wave on unwieldy Malibus, today we find ourselves in more creative waters where we must learn to ride the versatile short-boards on what is a human rights rather than a traditionalist wave. With this larger call for change I for one am excited by the opportunity to carve it up.

Seeing red: the same old hate movement

January 26, 2013 | by Alex Hunt | Link | Original Link

For those of you unfamiliar with the recent storm to hit the British social justice establishment, feminist writer Suzanne Moore recently published an article in the New Statesman, Seeing Red, the Power of Female Anger, wreathing her sex in victimhood. The article itself was backed with a few, cherry-picked statistics, more of the same, tired old feminist clichés and the obligatory blinkers to any reasoning other than this as a patriarchal attack on the sisterhood.

In short, standard-issue drivel from a standard-issue someone in a comfortable job, working comfortable environment, in a civilized society making a great deal more money than the average individual. She takes up the pen and paper to defend what Achebe termed the "Beloved Oppressed."

Same old, same old.

I'm not going to go into debunking Moore's article – dozens of writers here at AVfM and elsewhere have already dismantled each and every one of her worn-out arguments in individual detail. That's not what's interesting here.

What's interesting here is that how Moore happily denigrates, and then throws the (MtF) trans community under the bus. Her reasoning for these particular comments? Women; real women, that is, not these ersatz pretenders, are not being sufficiently appreciated for their sterling efforts in working, raising their children and maintaining some standard of personal attraction. Obviously the notion that females be held to the same standards of responsibility for themselves and their actions as anyone else has either not occurred to Moore, or more likely, clashed too strongly with her feminist ideals.

As the tweetstorm grew around Moore's commentary, none other than Julie Birchill* came to her defense, guns blazing, with all the fire and brimstone an angry feminist can offer. The article speaks for itself; of irrational, blind hatred, mockery, the calculated use of shame, the wholehearted embracing of victimhood, and, above all, the "us-versus-them" dichotomy so integral to feminist discourse.

I'm sure anyone involved with the MRM can speak to how readily this vitriol can be hurled against anyone bold or naïve enough to stand up and challenge feminism; even if those people are their beloved, oppressed, fellow-sufferers in a world ruled by cruel, privileged male overlords; even if those people are bringing to light genuine grievances and issues. It really doesn't matter. Challenge them, and you will become "the enemy."

This is not just a piece of news for AVfM readers. For us, it's the same old harpies circling overhead, howling vileness and cruelty, the same indifference to the suffering of others, the same venom we saw spat in the face of a young man looking for answers in Toronto, the same professional victims and their amazing perpetual martyrdom machine, the same conflict-junkie response to anything that could even be a challenge; the belief the whole world is twisted in some patriarchal, privileged conspiracy against them.

This is an invitation to the LGBT community.

To the egalitarians.

To each and every person interested in human rights for more than just a subsection of the female population.

Take a good, hard look at feminism. Take a good look at what it really is. At what it really means; at who these people really are. They are bigots, they are liars, they are ideologues and they will throw you under a bus the moment you challenge them.

Don't kid yourselves that these people are the minority. Numerically, they may well be – indeed, I hope they are – but make no mistake, these are feminism's policy-makers. They are bestselling authors. They are social sciences lecturers. They are the people setting the tone and message for feminism, and who have been doing it since Emmeline Pankhurst decided it was time that she'd rather like to vote too, and without feeling the need to agitate on the behalf of the thousands of men fighting, bleeding and dying on the Western Front, who went without the benefit of the franchise. These are people with no interest in advancing anyone's rights; only their own privileges.

This is feminism.

And it is a hate movement.

Publisher's note: The Julie Birchill article has since been removed from The Guardian, apparently for the very reasons cited by Hunt in this piece.

Editor's Note: we appear to have misprinted Julie Birchill's name as "Bindell" earlier. That error has been fixed, although the linked material made it clear. Our apologies to Julie Bindel for this mistake.

Oh my Lola lo-lo-lo-lo Lola

January 27, 2013 | by Kristina Hansen | Link | Original Link

Eleven years after a woman known as Lola took her billionaire ex, known as Eric, to court demanding alimony from a failed common-law relationship, the Supreme Court of Canada has ruled against allowing the same protections for common-law spouses as for married couples upon breaking-up.

This decision is one that is said will have "far-reaching implications for millions of Quebecers" as one-third of couples in Quebec live in common-law relationships, more than in any other province, and more than half of all children in Quebec are born out of wedlock. Quebec is also the only province in Canada without any provisions for spousal support when a common-law relationship ends.

The Supreme Court of Canada (SCC) ultimately found that "marriage is a deliberate choice that must remain distinct from common-law partnerships in regards to its rights and obligations".

In short, Lola is not entitled to any spousal support, and she cannot get any portion of Eric's substantial assets.

Lola and Eric have three children together, and receives quite a hefty sum for child support. However, Lola argued that she deserved the same rights as divorcing husbands or wives and that Quebec's civil code provisions were "discriminatory against common-law spouses – many of whom are left destitute when their unions implode".

A court ruling back in 2006 compelled him to give her a car and to pay for a chauffeur, a cook and two nannies. He also buys plane tickets for the children and nannies for two trips a year, as well as a daily allowance of up to $1,000 for the holidays. In 2010, Eric gave Lola a $2.5 million home.

Somehow I cannot see how she has been left destitute after the 2006 ruling, and the home she got from Eric in 2010. I don't even think this woman has any comprehension of what that word means, much less care about anyone else but herself. This case was never about the larger public, or becoming an activist for the downtrodden.

Lola's lawyers argued that "most Quebecers are unaware that in the event of a breakup they can be left with nothing". This is completely ridiculous. Everyone I know here in Quebec is fully aware that being a common-law spouse does not entitle you to anything other than child support if a couple has children, and they are under 18. In fact, many Quebec men and women choose not to get married because they do not want to become trapped in an unjust, slow-moving, money draining system that would mean the man (in the majority of cases) would be forced to pay alimony and divide up his assets.

Marriage is indeed becoming quite rare here, especially amongst French-Canadians. Whether it's a cultural phenomenon or not, there are fewer Quebecers looking to get married, and they are quite vocal and unashamed about admitting it.

In a narrow 5-4 SCC decision, chief justice Beverley McLaughlin wrote:

> Those who choose to marry choose the protections–but also the responsibilities–associated with that status – Those who choose not to marry avoid these state-imposed responsibilities and protections.

Lola's lawyer said that "Lola devoted her life to raising children and felt entitled, as divorced people do, to a share of assets".

When entering into a relationship, both Lola and Eric knew the law and were aware that not getting married meant that she would not be entitled to anything should their relationship end. That was the choice they both made and agreed to. She does not have the right to demand that the law be changed just because her lavish lifestyle will now be much less lavish.

Look lady, you already got more out of this guy than most married people ever would upon a divorce. So stop whining and suck it up. I am sure that your 2.5 million dollar home, chauffeur, chefs, and nannies are more than sufficient for your greedy ass to survive on for the rest of your life.

I for one am glad the SCC ruled to keep Quebec's Civil Code as is. If you want to play house and be in a long-term relationship like an adult, then you are responsible for the decisions you make. If you want to get married and the other person doesn't, then you have the choice to leave. No one is forcing anyone one way or another.

In a release, Quebec's Conseil du Statut de la Femme (Quebec Council for the Status of Women) expressed concerns about the judgment, questioning "whether the present family law regime corresponds to the reality of Quebec families, and saying there is a risk without guarantees that families will fall into poverty".

This is nothing more than an attempt by the QCSF to change the current system, to force men into a corner no matter what type of long-term relationship they choose, taking away the freedom of choice people in Quebec have always had. They want replace the current system with a system that takes away the freedom of choice and which punishes mostly men when the relationship dissolves by forcing men to pay alimony and divide up his personal assets.

As it stands, the Quebec Civil Code is still open to further review. However, most Quebecers have expressed their desire to keep their freedom of choice and do not want a system that takes that from them.

Plausible deniability and abuse

January 27, 2013 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

---

Plausible deniability,

Or how to burn trust to the ground.

Play hard to get, keep him wondering.

This is the advice which appears to saturate female oriented social and other media. Keep him guessing. String him along, de-escalate phone contacts to the level of text messages. Return only 1 out of 4 messages.

What motivates this?

Opening any issue of COSMO or any other women's magazine will reveal a half dozen lists of tactics claiming to be relationship advice, but actually cultivate something else; personal plausible deniability.

This was distilled in a 1995 "dating advice" book called "The Rules". This book has unfortunately informed much of the public zeitgeist of dating and romance. Here is a short sample of the actual rules as provided by the authors, Ellen Fein and Sherrie Schneider

- Be a creature unlike any other.
  Subtext: don't be yourself, put on an act. Employ deception.
- Don't Talk to a Man First.
  Subtext: Force him to take the initiative, this allows you to avoid any responsibility.
- Don't Talk Too Much.
  Subtext: Initiating of communication exposes your opinion and reduces plausible deniability.
- Don't Meet Him Halfway.
  Subtext: Invest less than he does in all social transactions. Hold power over him.
- Don't Call Him, and indeed, Rarely Return His Calls.
  Subtext: Establish that he must always initiate, and that you have no responsibility to do so. Also, establishes that he is always subservient to you.
- Always End Phone Calls First.
  Subtext: Be a gatekeeper of communications, retain unilateral power in all contacts.
- Don't Accept a Saturday Date after Wednesday.
  Subtext: Force him to elevate you over himself in all social transactions.

Although "The Rules" is almost 20 years old, it reflects a current view that non-accountability, subterfuge, manipulation and control of power in a relationship is appropriate for women. This public view of one-sided power is widely accepted, rarely recognized or publicly identified as pathological and dysfunctional.

It should be.

The mainstream media, endlessly channeling admonitions to contrive plausible feminine deniability markets the dysfunction as though it will lead to increased romantic affection or attraction from men. It will put any woman who plays this strategy in total control of her man, assuming, of course, he sticks around for this systematic abuse. That, of course, is the reason for continued plausible deniability. Keep him not only off balance, but keep him ignorant of your intentions. Constantly undermine his trust in you, smog your communications, maximize ambiguity and your own plausible deniability – yeah, that'll make him try harder.

But this is, all of it, stupid. First, this entire approach to human relationships relies on a set of unrealistic assumptions. Some of which are as follows. That men will tolerate unlimited contempt and scorn heaped onto them. That men are so bereft of human dignity and self worth that an endless game of hide and seek without a payoff will suit them just fine.

There are some poor saps who; out of a misguided surplus of forbearance, or possibly, consumed by socialized self loathing; willingly tolerate any of the ass-hattery mentioned above. But they're miserable, and the women who get away with abusing such men are just as miserable. A healthy adult cannot find happiness in a relationship built on the cultivated absence of respect.

And regardless of the obvious and blatant stupidity of the tactics mentioned here, those tactics which most women will remark are destructive and foolish; most women still cultivate their own plausible deniability.

And they will do so in blithe disregard for the FACT that treating other people poorly, with contempt, and with haughty demonstrations of public scorn almost guarantees the repeated failure of every relationship.

So what inform this? It's a long list, but included is an apparent cultural belief by women that the simple fact of feminine identity confers instant, guaranteed, unbreakable appeal. As popular as this idea appears to be, it is of course false. In fact, it's falsehood is increasingly demonstrated by a growing cultural chorus of "where have all the good men gone?". That question issued as a complaint by women and other social commentators realizing as they cross into their mid thirties in a continued state of unattachment, unmarried, and with ever diminished prospect for long term romantic success.

The tactics of obfuscating communications, de-escalating contacts, and of endlessly cultivating personal plausible deniability is the recipe for destroying trust, eliminating affection or love, and for cultivating mistrust and hostility.

Of course, a tool some men are using to deal with this game of communications-cripple is Transactional Analysis. Although a detailed examination of TA is beyond the scope of this discussion, some simple rules of thumb can greatly diminish the confusion created by so much female-targeted pop-advice.

And for those erstwhile adults who follow such advised game playing, or who manage relationships in a manner to put complete power in their own hands, you'll have complete power. You will, absolutely.

But what The Rules, or any other version of this systematized mistreatment do not spell out is that this is not just a receipt for maintenance of power. It's abuse. It's shit treatment. It's the psychological manipulation of another person.

Here's the message conveyed. You're lucky I return even one out of 4 of your calls. You're lucky to have even a fraction of my attention. If you didn't have me, you'd be alone, because I'm better, and I've lowered my standards to tolerate you.

In violent relationships there are bruises and blood. In the socially normal practice of communications cripple advocated in so much female-targeted advice, and practiced by so many women, there is no visible blood or trauma, but the invisibility of the damage is the only difference.

Let's be explicitly clear. The advice given in almost all women's literature about how to treat men, and how to manage relationships, is advice about how to retain an upper hand. It is taken to heart and practiced by the majority of women in their relationships. That advice is the practice of psychological abuse. The women who endorse that advice, and put it into practice – are abusers.

It's a 20 year old book, and it informs what our society treats as normal, standard practice by women in romantic relationships. And it's clearly and unambiguously a practice and a public narrative endorsing and maintaining a culture of mental and psychological abuse.

It has worked with amazing effectiveness in maintaining a balance of social power. Because men are socialized to put women first, and to put themselves last.

Men, in our culture have not in the last 50 years been socialized to recognize phsychological abuse against themselves as either real or even possible.

Not until now.

And just so it's clear to everybody, I'm not suggesting to women that they should do anything differently. I am however, suggesting that to men. Do something differently. In fact, I'm suggesting the addition of a word to every man's vocabulary.

No.

If that's not clear enough, how about fuck off, get lost, or go away.

Because these are the things it is appropriate to tell abusers, and bullies.

Thank you for your kind attention.

Aerobics – a poem by Erin Pizzey

January 27, 2013 | by Erin Pizzey | Link | Original Link

…

She lived for her lies.
The lies had a life of their own.
They kept the secret flame alight:
The flame excited her imagination.
They burned incense to her passion,
Her passion never spent in any man's arms.
Her passion was spent in intrigue,
In more veiled innuendoes,
In whispers to another woman's shell-like ear,
In inhabiting the smell of another woman's body,
In touching another woman's breast lightly,
Fingers like moths poking another's
Crevices, crying,
Weeping, drinking white wine
Paid for by her husband's child support.
Nightly these women met to bemoan
And bewail the escape of the men
They never loved.
What they loved was the status.
What they loved was the money.
What they desired was each other,
That intensity – woman to woman –
The warm legitimate embrace of
The Jacuzzi,
The familiar wet warm smell
Of other women,
The absence of penis,
The celebration of pudenda,
The absence of self and other,
The presence of self and mother,
Women's endlessly pliable

Buyable bodies,
The cruise down to the mall,
The raid on
The dress shops,
Rings for lying fingers,
Hats for long-dyed hair,
Shoes and pairs of shoes
For feet that rat tat tat
Up the corridors in anger,
Slap the children, kick the cat,
My husband left me,
What do you think of that?

FTSU on the menu?

January 27, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

While it is still not proven, some information concerning this website was posted to a thread on Reddit at the start of the weekend. If true, it will probably become one of our biggest stories of 2013.

It appears, according to one "redditor," they attempted to access this website from the Wi-Fi hotspot at one location from a restaurant chain, and found a message telling them the site was blocked because it was a "known hate site."

Again, we do not have this story confirmed, which is why I am not mentioning the name of the chain of restaurants, nor do I even want them mentioned by name in the comments, until we have proof this is happening.

Site management, if anyone posts the name of the chain anywhere on this website or on AVFM Forums, please remove it immediately and place that user account on moderation.

This is an American national chain in 33 U.S. states, as I count them; a chain that does $200,000,000 in annual revenue.

Needless to say that if we find there is truth to this story, and they do not expeditiously cooperate in correcting the problem, Fucking Their Shit Up will ensue on a scale that will make the University of Toronto breathe a sigh of relief.

I will be contacting when and if proof is acquired. In the meantime, here is a link to a map of their stores:

MAP

As they do not have a location in my city, I am requesting that MRAs within convenient distance from one of their locations pay a visit and attempt to access this website through their hotspot. If the result is positive, a screen cap of the blocking message would be much appreciated.

Addendum: The store in question has been identified as being in Boulder, Colorado, though we still need documentation of the block on the site.

To my young nephew, T, with love

January 27, 2013 | by Dan Perrins | Link | Original Link

A while Back Paul wrote a piece about his Uncle Walter. Our friend Suz wrote a passionate letter to a future daughter in law you should read too. My friend Dr. F wrote a letter to the son like you that he never had. I now find myself in a similar place, for I am now the uncle who is going to write to his nephew.

To my beloved young nephew, T:

I was not there yesterday at your christening, Tiger. I just couldn't be.

See, while your parents were busy trying to ensure your soul is saved, I have been busy since around the time your were born trying to ensure your soul is not killed by the current misandric society.

T, I've been fighting for a long time have, made your parents very aware of the current situation, but they choose not to act. Like so many participants in today's society. Maybe they're afraid, maybe they're blind, maybe a little of both. They love you and you should love them, but today they walk on by ignoring the elephant in the room. Nobody's perfect I guess.

I had intended on attending your christening, T, but after a conversation with your father (my brother) about 36 hours beforehand, it became obvious it just wasn't going to happen.

See, at some point in time of the conversation we talked about how I was in court on January 11 2013. I wasn't really there for a men's rights issue exactly, but I was there for a justice issue.

I find the two often are intermingled.

Still I slapped an AVfM sticker on my chest and walked in ready to observe the proceedings from the gallery. This wasn't the first time I was in attendance for the proceedings, I've been watching them since about the end of October, 2012.

In the first instance I was quietly sitting in the gallery taking notes, as is my right to do, when the Justice of the Peace pointed to me in the gallery and asked me to identify myself.

T, I don't know what the courts are going to be like when you get older, but this is an unheard of action engaged in by a member of the judiciary.

I'm trying to make sure you never experience this Orwellian justice system.

However T, even though I was somewhat fearful I stood up and identified myself for the court. The court reporter could not hear me and asked if I would step across the bar to the podium and identify myself. I did.

I addressed the court, identified myself and then informed Worship Baker he had in fact made a mistake at law. I also informed him that I had made the very same argument my friend was making in a higher court in this very same courthouse and the right in question was upheld.

The hearing was shut down shortly thereafter, T.

The next day, I also attended, T and this time there were six officers in attendance. T, I can't be sure they were all there for me, but I recognized a few of them. At least two of them had threatened me with physical violence and or death before.

I am not sure if your parents will tell you this, T, but I was lucky enough to have had instilled in me a sense of right and wrong as well as courage by your Grandfather Bill.

Your father unfortunately was a victim of your Grandmother's parental alienation, and he suffered from this abusive syndrome she left him with. It's something I hope you never experience. I will give you one example, T, just so you know what your father and I had to endure for many of our formative years.

Your Grandfather would always say to your father and me "love your mother boys, she is the only one you have," but your grandmother would say "your father is a good for nothing rotten son of a bitch."

These are terrible lies for sons to hear about there father from their mother day in and day out. Thank God I was strong enough to ignore them, or your father might never have had a chance to make amends with your Grandfather on his deathbed.

But I digress. Let me get back to the reason why I was not in attendance for your christening.

Like I was saying, I was in court for a friend and witnessing the courts break the very laws they are governed by, breaking the laws to ensure a conviction. It was my third time in attendance.

This time there were four police officers T.

There was the arresting officer who was there to be a witness for the prosecution. The other three officers were as follows: one other regular beat duty police officer, a female. A Sargent, male, and a female plain clothes detective.

T, at the time I was wondering in my mind why all these police officers were in attendance, but I am somewhat used to it now. The corrupt and/or ideologically driven ones are a danger to honest, moral folks. I am a product of their crimes against human rights.

To the honest police officers, hats off for doing a proper job, you have my respect.

But they all scare the shit out of me T. People in their profession have, via multiple acts of trauma, given me Post Traumatic Stress disorder.

When the proceedings that day were shutting down for lunch, T, the judiciary informed the defense that I could sit at the defense table. My friend and I thought this was going to be a good thing, but unfortunately I found out later I was only permitted to take notes and not whisper any direction or advice to my friend.

When we came back from lunch I, as usual, was civil and polite and even made a few jokes. I didn't care about the gang-like police presence.

They added another Sargent after lunch for a grand total of five officers in attendance.

I started up a conversation with the Sargent who was there for the morning session. I noticed before lunch he had left his empty plastic cup sitting by the door when recess was called, and now he was coming up to the defense table to get another glass.

I said to him, “hey no littering in the courts, I seen your glass sitting there on the floor when we left for lunch. Have some respect for the courts,” I chuckled. I had already assumed the cleaning staff had picked it up.

The Sargent replied “I guess the cleaning lady must have picked it up.”

I then said to the sargent, “I guess since it was taken with out consent you should be charging them with 322 of the Criminal Code of Canada theft.”

The Sargent kind of agreed in theory and got the joke. But here is where I started to work my activism, T.

See I then went on to say “322 of the Criminal Code doesn’t really bother me so much but 380 does; that would be fraud. Or 139, which would be obstruction of justice, does bother me, and I see a ton of it engaged in by the Domestic Violence courts and the family courts here in Hamilton.”

At this point in time, T, the uniformed female officer started sounding like a chihuahua, yipping along, mimicking me while I was reciting certain sections of the Criminal Code and the facts I know.

I then got up out of my seat walked back to the Sgt and went to give him an AVfM sticker and introduce myself as well.

I know this is not exactly what I would like to do, T, you never know which one is going to be corrupt, but it is the right thing to do.

The feminists, T, are a cowardly, hateful lot who will do some nasty things to those who oppose their dictatorship. One thing, T, I am acutely aware of is that I could end up on the receiving end of a false police call where it is alleged I am violent.

When that happens, the police show up guns drawn and you stand a very real chance of loosing your uncle.

Now when I arrived where the Sargent was sitting I informed him that I am a local men’s rights activist for the area and I fly the AVfM flag high with pride. I was floored by what the Sgt told me then, T.

He said “No thanks I know exactly who you are.”

So how is it that this Sargent already knew me?

I’m gonna say it’s because I make them worried, and they have good reason to be. When you trample on my rights on the basis of sex, you trample on all men’s rights and I ain’t fucking putting up with it.

And more and more men and good women are saying the same thing about the misandry in today’s society.

So I went back to the defense table and sat down. The Crown next spoke up and the exchange went something along the lines of me delving further into the fraud in the Domestic Violence courts.

I informed the Crown about the last general social survey and how 6.4% of women and 6% of men suffered abuse at the hands of their significant other. How that number breaks down to 601,000 women and 585,000 men. A difference of 16,000.

But how there are 593 women's abuse shelters in Canada, and not one for men.

The Crown informed me that I should open a shelter for men.

I then informed the Crown about Earl Silverman's plight for government funding of his men's abuse shelter and how he currently is in the Alberta Human Rights Court right now.

The conversation then took a turn towards the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and human rights, T.

I asked the Crown if he remembered what our former Prime Minister Diefenbaker said about our human rights. I then recited it, most likely with a little paraphrasing, but I said it as best I can.

See T, ole Dief, he was a wise man. He knew long time ago that when human rights were universal in Canada that there would be those who would try to destroy them, so he gave us Canadians a little heads up about it.

He said "we must vehemently protect these human rights from enemies within and outside our borders."[1] and I added on at the end that "I see lots of its enemies to human rights in these courts."

While I said this I looked directly at lil' Ms. Chihuahua.

I know she was trying to take me off my game or insult me but her words and yappy lil; chihuahua voice did absolutely nothing. She was just another garden variety bully with a badge. Dealt with them before, no doubt I will deal with them again.

When I told all of this to your father, T, he was concerned.

He wasn't concerned for his brother, or for men in general, or really about you. He was concerned about my activism, and that me talking about how misandric the world is today for men and boys would make people in attendance feel uncomfortable.

I don't put up with that kind of crap, T.

See I find it "uncomfortable" that men make up 80% of all suicides, a fact your father should be well aware of considering our older brother, your other uncle, killed himself. He should also be well aware of the fact that when he turned coward back in 2009, that he set into motion a series of events that has destroyed the family unit and lead to my personal checkout attempt, 29 yrs to the week of your deceased uncle's suicide. Guess it wasn't my time. I spent time in the very same hospital on the very same dates, where your uncle lost all hope back in the beginning of these misandric times in 1982.

I am "uncomfortable" with the fact that men make up about 50% of the domestic violence population and nothing is done about that either.

I am "uncomfortable" that men and boys are seen as second class citizens who are demonized and vilified by an ideologically driven group named Feminists who would kill their own kind if they stepped out of the dogma and told the truth.

I am :uncomfortable: with a lot of things, T, but I am not uncomfortable about speaking out against injustice and misandry. I could care less if it makes people uncomfortable. It isn't the fact that I am speaking out that makes them uncomfortable. It is their silence, their guilty conscience, that makes them uncomfortable.

So T, that is the reasons why I was not at your christening yesterday. For you see, while they believe they were saving your soul, I have been out on the streets making sure your soul has a chance to live in today's society.

[1] http://www.collectionscanada.gc.ca/primeministers/h4-4052-e.html

The great danger of the Istanbul Convention

January 28, 2013 | by Lucian Vâlsan | Link | Original Link

[quote]All that is required for evil to prevail is that good men to do nothing. ~ Edmund Burke[/quote]

[dropcap]T[/dropcap]he Council of Europe(CoE)[1] had a meeting on April 12 2011 in Istanbul and elaborated an egregiously misandric document called "Council of Europe Convention on Preventing and Combating Violence Against Women and Domestic Violence" also known as the Istanbul Convention[2]. On May 11 2011, the document has been opened for signature to all the member countries and collaborators[3]. The member countries of the Council of Europe are all countries geographically located in Europe with the notable exception of Belarus and the Holy See (the Vatican) which is a collaborating state alongside with the USA, Japan, Mexico and Canada.

The Council of Europe is not an institution of the EU per se, but it is intimately connected to the EU. The most important connection is that the president of the European Council (which is an institution of the EU) and the president of the Council of Europe is the same person – Mr. Herman van Rompuy, a man whom Nigel Farage of the UKIP rightfully called "the silent assassin of democracy" and a man who has previously ruined Belgium's democracy as a prime minister of that country.

After reading this document, the second most important connection between the Council of Europe and the European Union in general is the obedient adherence to Marxist-Feminist ideology. One should not forget that the European Commission is lead by Jose Manuel Barroso (a Maoist) and the justice department of the EU is lead by Viviane Reding, a Marxist-feminist crusader.

The treaty has thus far been signed by 27 nations. It used to be 26 but Croatia was signing it whilst I was talking about this document on A Voice for Men News and Activism program[4].

The list of nations that signed it is lengthy: Albania, Austria, Belgium, Croatia, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Iceland, Italy, Luxemburg, Malta, Monaco, Montenegro, Holland, Norway, Sweden, Poland, Portugal, Spain, Serbia, Slovakia, Slovenia, Macedonia, Turkey, Ukraine and the United Kingdom.

In order for it to be in force, the document needs to be ratified by 10 member states. The ratification process takes a bit longer than just simply signing it. So far, Turkey is the only country that fully ratified it (so this is already the law in Turkey) and in a few months, Italy will finalize its ratification process as the anti-feminist organization "Centri Antiviolenza & Femminismo" (The Centre Against Violence and Feminism) announces[5].

[image]
Srebrenica 1995
What's interesting is that the mainstream media is extremely silent on this subject, even in Italy and Turkey — countries that already have this law adopted. Also, countries that signed this document that are in incipient phases of ratification (Ukraine, Poland, Norway or France) are also silent about it.

There is little or no mention of this document in the mainstream media and if the general public that doesn't check the CoE and the EU website has no idea what's coming.

There is one country that any MRA that is aware of the European issues would have expected to see on the list of countries that signed this document: Denmark.

Considering that Denmark is culturally close to Norway and, most notably, Sweden, one would have expected that the gender ideologues from the Danish government would secure the perks that this document brings to the feminist organizations and the liberty that this document gives to the ideologues to make misandry the new state policy.

As of September 2012, the gender ideologues from the Council of Europe are pressuring the Maoists and the feminists from the European Commission to ratify this document for the European Union[6]. If this happens, and it will due to aforementioned intimate connections between the two bodies, the EU countries that refuse this treaty can and will be forced to abide by it regardless of whether they want to. There are several EU countries that said "no" so far besides Denmark: Ireland, Romania, the Czech Republic, Bulgaria, Hungary, Cyprus, Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania.

But what does the document say?

The gender ideologue's worldview is visible from the very title of the document and the comparison with the recently defunct VAWA is a correct one. In the preamble of the document it says the following[7]:

> Recalling the basic principles of international humanitarian law, and especially the Geneva Convention (IV) relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War (1949) and the Additional Protocols I and II (1977) thereto;
>
> Condemning all forms of violence against women and domestic violence;
>
> Recognizing that the realization of de jure and de facto equality between women and men is a key element in the prevention of violence against women;
>
> Recognizing that violence against women is a manifestation of historically unequal power relations between women and men, which have led to domination over, and discrimination against, women by men and to the prevention of the full advancement of women;

First of all, aiming for the de facto equality between women and men was already tried by the Soviet Union and the Marxist governments that ruled over Eastern Europe until 1989. The Romanian Communist dictator Nicolae Ceau?escu passed "the parity law" in the 1970s[8] and the Soviets had it even earlier. As history proved, that did not work out well.

Second, “recognizing” that “it is men’s fault” is just feminist ideology – not a fact.

So there you go, from the first two paragraphs of the preamble we have Marxist concepts in the first one and feminist ideology in the second one.

And CoE is also “recognizing” some other aspects of the gender hate-ideology:

> Recognizing the structural nature of violence against women as gender?based violence, and that violence against women is one of the crucial social mechanisms by which women are forced into a subordinate position compared with men;

There are no further clarifications throughout the document so the CoE is fine with the blatantly misandric double standard that the violence against men is not gender-based violence even though this organization itself exists following the deaths of millions upon millions of men and virtually only men in the World War II.

And they continue by saying:

> Recognising the ongoing human rights violations during armed conflicts that affect the civilian population, especially women in the form of widespread or systematic rape and sexual violence[…]

The ongoing human rights violations during armed conflicts that affect the civilian population are overwhelmingly aimed at men and boys — in the form of death. In the last armed conflict that took place in Europe, the Bosnian war, 85 to 90% of the civilian Bosnian casualties were men and boys[9]. In July 1995, more than 8,000 men and boys (and only men and boys) were rounded up and shot in the head in what is known as the Srebrenica Massacre[10].

So, the CoE’s claim that the human rights violations during armed conflicts affect “especially women,” is patently false. Yes, rape is sometimes used as a weapon of war, however, that too also happens to men. And yes, it is traumatic, but saying that this is worse than being rounded up and shot in the head in mass executions[11] on the basis of your sex is simply disregarding reality, and the preponderance of actual victims.

The further you get into this document the more misandric it gets. In Article 2.2 and 2.3 the document says the following:

> 2 Parties are encouraged to apply this Convention to all victims of domestic violence. Parties shall pay particular attention to women victims of gender?based violence in implementing the provisions of this Convention.
>
> 3 This Convention shall apply in times of peace and in situations of armed conflict.

In other words – men don’t matter. If this document would have been in force during the Bosnian war, a few hundreds of thousands men would not have survived – just as happens in African countries right now where help for the victims of armed conflicts is disproportionately granted to women. The men there are left to die.

This document also makes the pussy pass the official policy through the provisions of the Article 5 that states the following:

> 1 Parties shall refrain from engaging in any act of violence against women and ensure that State authorities, officials, agents, institutions and other actors acting on behalf of the State act in conformity with this obligation.
>
> 2 Parties shall take the necessary legislative and other measures to exercise due diligence to prevent, investigate, punish and provide reparation for acts of violence covered by the scope of this Convention that are perpetrated by non?State actors.

By "Parties" this document refers to the states that sign and ratify this document. By "the scope of this Convention" they mean the feminist definition of domestic violence and other so-called "gender-based violence." So, basically, under the provisions of Article 5 from the Istanbul Convention, if a woman pulls a weapon on a police officer, the police officer is not allowed to defend himself because it would mean that the police officer is "an actor acting on behalf of the state engaging in an act of violence against a woman".

The Romanian Criminal Procedure Code that was in force during the Communist dictatorship also had this provision of protecting female criminals under the same reasoning.

The document then continues with the provisions of the article 8 and 9 which can essentially be translated as "Give money to the feminists." And we're talking about big money – at least 1.5 billion euros (2 billion US dollars) per year in the EU alone, which means that the total amount is in fact higher since part of the treaty are also non-EU countries.

In the Article 12, point 4, the document states once again that men are the problem:

> Parties shall take the necessary measures to encourage all members of society, especially men and boys, to contribute actively to preventing all forms of violence covered by the scope of this Convention.

This basically will be translated into classes of "compulsory feminism" (just like it happened in Australia and Croatia) being taught to 10 year old children. So we're looking at Pan-European plan to raise boys in a climate where masculinity itself is regarded as a disease.

Starting with Chapter IV, the Istanbul Convention goes full force against due process and other provisions that have so far protected individuals from false allegations and government interventionism.

From Article 18:

> […]3 Parties shall ensure that measures taken pursuant to this chapter > shall:

>
> – be based on a gendered understanding of violence against women and domestic violence and shall focus on the human rights and safety of the victim;
>
> – be based on an integrated approach which takes into account the relationship between victims, perpetrators, children and their wider social environment; – aim at avoiding secondary victimization;
>
> – aim at the empowerment and economic independence of women victims of violence;
>
> – allow, where appropriate, for a range of protection and support services to be located on the same premises;
>
> – address the specific needs of vulnerable persons, including child victims, and be made available to them.
>
> 4 The provision of services shall not depend on the victim's willingness to press charges or testify against any perpetrator.[…]

Is there anything about economic empowering of men? Of course not. So basically, it's enough for a feminist organization to assume that a man might abuse his wife and the entire mechanism starts. In the U.S.A. we've seen VAWA cases of men being thrown out of their home even though the alleged "victim" testified that she had never been abused. One should not expect less when this document is in force.

Throughout the document the CoE talks about "women and their children" because, as we all know from practicality, children belong to women and the State and fathers are, at best, walking ATM machines. Her body, her choice. His wallet? Her choice. Now this is the law.

Moreover, Article 27 sets the obligation for the State to encourage people to report anything if they think an act of violence, against women, "may be committed or that further acts of violence are to be expected" – which basically means that it will no longer be a crime (as it is now) for someone to call the police because the neighbors are talking too loud and the caller "feels" that an act of violence is to be expected. At this point, calling the police because you "feel" that a husband might beat his wife because you heard them talking loud, even though you never heard what they were saying and did not see them, is considered "false reporting" and the police might ask you to pay for the expenses of them coming there for nothing.

Article 28 reads as follows:

> Parties shall take the necessary measures to ensure that the confidentiality rules imposed by internal law on certain professionals do not constitute an obstacle to the possibility, under appropriate conditions, of their reporting to the competent organizations or authorities if they have reasonable grounds to believe that a serious act of violence covered by the scope of this Convention, has been > committed and further serious acts of violence are to be expected.

Therefore, make sure that the shrink or therapist you are seeing is not a gender ideologue. Otherwise, she might think that you abused your wife because you told her to stop wasting your money. I wish this was a joke, but it's not. Telling your wife to stop wasting your money is considered "financial abuse" and it's already considered as such in many countries (Sweden, Romania, Hungary, UK, France and Spain) and it's also covered by the provisions of the Istanbul Convention.

The document goes on with Article 31, which essentially makes sure that fathers rarely see their children if the state mechanism legalized by this document enters into his life and the continues with Article 38 condemning female genital mutilation while saying nothing about male genital mutilation.

Let's be clear: Female circumcision is not an issue in Europe. There are some activists claiming that 500,000 women are circumcised in Europe annually but if this were to be true, then any resident of the UK, Germany or France would know at least one circumcised female within his or her own proximity. Moreover, Turkey alone (who ratified this document) has over 39 million circumcised male residents[12], Ukraine has roughly 250,000 and France has almost 4.5 million. Putting this into perspective, it's massive denigration of male suffering to say that female circumcision is a much more important issue. And to put it into a wider perspective, circumcision in general is not an issue in Europe in comparison with the United States of America where this barbaric procedure is routinely performed on two week old boys.

Article 55 of the document is actually scary:

> […]proceedings may continue even if the victim withdraws her or his statement or complaint.
>
> Parties shall take the necessary legislative or other measures to ensure, in accordance with the conditions provided for by their internal law, the possibility for governmental and non?governmental organizations and domestic violence counselors to assist and/or support victims, at their request, during investigations and judicial proceedings concerning the offenses established in accordance with this Convention.

This basically means that we're looking at a Europe where feminist organizations are both prosecutors and judges and the State rubber stamps their "discoveries" regardless of whether the alleged victim might come clean and admit that it was all a lie.

This document is filled with anti-male bias and twisted understandings of reality promoted by the hate ideology commonly referred as "feminism" in combination with totalitarian Marxist provisions that Eastern Europe hasn't yet forgotten. This might be the reason why most of the countries that said "No" are Eastern European countries.

The main concern of any European MRA (especially those living in EU countries) should be at this point finding solutions to prevent this document from being ratified EU-wide, and prevent ratification in individual countries.

This document will eventually be voted upon in the European Parliament, unless we start applying pressure, because the “community method” through which Herman van Rompuy and the other Eurocrats pressure decisions is a machine that has worked so far quite well.

[1] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Council_of_Europe

[2] http://www.coe.int/t/dghl/standardsetting/convention-violence/texts/Convention_en.pdf – Istanbul Convention Full Text

[3] http://conventions.coe.int/Treaty/Commun/QueVoulezVous.asp?NT=210&CM=1&CL=ENG

[4] http://www.blogtalkradio.com/avoiceformen/2013/01/23/avfm-news-and-activism-lucian-valsan-returns

[5] http://www.centriantiviolenza.com/the_truth_archives/la-fornero-firma-convenzione-femminista-anti-maschio/

[6] http://www.neurope.eu/article/coe-hopes-eu-signs-istanbul-convention

[7] op cit Full Text page 5

[8] http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=XSZ5pblxLME

[9] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Bosnian_War#Casualties

[10] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Srebrenica_genocide

[11] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Srebrenica_genocide#Mass_executions

[12] http://www.circs.org/index.php/Reviews/Rates/Global

NCFM makes history

January 28, 2013 | by NCFM | Link | Original Link

Some things leave me speechless…almost. Once in a great while I am privileged to participate in something of major importance. I am proud to announce that the National Coalition for Men has established its first chapter on a university campus. To my knowledge we are the first full-fledged Men's Rights organization to establish a chapter at a major university.

NCFM University Ambassador and Montana Chapter President, Chris Thompson, is primarily responsible for this extraordinary achievement. If we had ten Chris Thompsons we could populate university campuses around the country with NCFM chapters in less than a decade.

Chris reports that he has over 50 chapter members and the number is growing. He stages regular information tabling events, speaks to groups, and disseminates information about Men's Rights (or the absence thereof), gender inequalities, NCFM, and other like-minded organizations.

Chris is working with other groups to remedy a recent U.S. Department of Education directive that removed due process protections at universities for those accused of sexual harassment or assault.

In September Chris staged two events and helped raise funds for breast cancer and testicular cancer research. He's also the state coordinator for another like-minded organization doing important domestic violence legislative reform work at national and state levels.

It took a while for us to get the chapter established in Montana but once we had state recognition Chris parlayed it into the campus chapter. I recall his early discussions with campus administrators, the support he initially had from one adviser, and then less supportive talks as things progressed. No matter, he stayed the course and overcame whatever administrative hurdles and opposition he encountered.

He also enlisted the aid and support of Professor Miles Groth of Wagner College and one of the founders of the American Men's Study Association. Mr. Groth is an advocate for the establishment of such organizations on university campuses since they can be a precursor to establishing Male Studies programs. He has been involved for decades in the Male Studies movement. The opportunity now exists at Montana State University to offer Male Studies courses.

Like other universities Montana State University has been largely influenced by over thirty years of feminist ideology. Such influence went unchallenged for years. No counterbalance existed. Feminists insisted all other teachings were His-[s]tory. Criticism of the ideology was not only discouraged but radical professors and their supporters rallied to discredit any opposition. Early gender researcher Suzanne Steinmetz published her book The Battered Husband Syndrome not long after the first Women Studies program launched at the San Diego State University in 1970. Many of her peers, Women Studies professors, and radical feminists jeered her, threatened to kill her, tried to destroy her career, and harassed her until she bowed out of the debate. She was just the first of many to be harassed by such ideologues. Hence, the silencing of opposing voices assured that virtually every aspect of our educational systems and outcomes thereof became skewed by entrenched anti-male administration and curriculums.

Hence, the establishment of a Men's Rights organization at a major university is no small feat. It is truly an accomplishment with historic implications. For it to be a chapter of NCFM is simply extraordinary.

Thank you all, those I know who helped accomplish this, and those I hope to someday meet. And, thank you Chris Thompson for holding a steady course and making this possible. Thanks should also go to the thousands of NCFM members who since the inception of our organization have made this possible by helping educate America and the world that we need to rid ourselves of harmful gender based stereotypes, especially as they adversely impact men, their families, and those that love them.

You can follow the chapter on Facebook.

Very cool indeed!

Harry Crouch
President NCFM

Publisher's note: On behalf of the editorial staff and news directors of AVfM, congratulations to NCFM and respects to Chris Thompson and Harry Crouch for this incredible achievement. Well done indeed, gentlemen. PE

Steven Crowder’s naive and insulting marriage arguments

January 28, 2013 | by Mark Trueblood | Link | Original Link

First of all, I’d like to say I appreciate Steven Crowder as a conservative activist and entertainer. Though I don’t agree with him all the time, I appreciate his passion, his sense of humor, and his understanding of new media. I also congratulate him on his recent marriage, and applaud his strength and conviction to save sex for the marriage bed. Kudos and best wishes!

So apparently, Fox News feels that Crowder’s recently-married status qualifies him as an expert on marriage. In “A Man’s Top 5 Reasons To Grow Up and Get Married” Crowder offers men a heaping load of donkey business and prods us to eat it. His points summarized, and my response:

“Grow Up and Get Married”

Well, Mr. Crowder, I am not sure what gives you the authority to define what it means to be a grownup man, but I think it requires a few more things than being hitched. I have enjoyed respectable success in my career. I live morally within my economic means. I stand by my word and try to be helpful to those around me. But apparently I’m not a grownup man until I find some woman and get married. Yeah… doesn’t make much sense does it?

1. You’ll be richer – Yes. Not only do married couples make more, save more, have a higher net worth and qualify for more benefits/financial incentives than lonely, single folk…

And the minute divorce proceedings start, this financial well-being becomes the property of the wife, her lawyer, your lawyer, and the court system. Men get utterly ruined in divorce through a combination of alimony, child support, and split of shared assets that generally benefits the woman. Nearly 50% of marriages end in divorce, with the wife initiating them 2/3rds of the time, often for less-than-dire reasons.

2. Would somebody please think of the children!! – The single biggest indicator of child poverty is whether both original parents are still together. Not only that, but children in married households get better grades, are less disruptive in class and less likely to develop behavioral disorders than children from non-married households. So be married long and prosper. Your kids will too.

In principle I agree with this. A two-parent home is the absolute best environment for children to grow up in. But again, this will all come to a screeching halt when divorce proceedings start and fathers find themselves treated lower than dirt by the court system. Fathers Rights are severely compromised. Women’s groups have aggressively lobbied against efforts to make things more fair to fathers. US courts put a primacy on maternal custody. And there is absolutely nothing obligating the mother to follow through on her custody obligations. Family courts are notorious for a failure to enforce custody agreements when the woman is at fault. But woe betide a man who misses a child support payment.

3. You'll have more sex… A LOT MORE SEX

I acknowledge that married people do have more availability of sex than single people. But 10% – 20% of couples report having sex less than 10 times a year. In this day and age, there is nothing obligating spouses to consent to sex. An acquaintance's wife stopped having sex with him after they got married and she had a child. She refuses to divorce, and has promised him he will never see his child again if he divorces her. And she refuses to go to therapy. So, basically, he's screwed. Or not, as a matter of fact.

It is simply no longer valid to uphold opportunities for sex as a benefit of marriage.

4. You won't be such a pathetic sloth – Married people are more productive. Married men in particular, have higher employment rates, work longer hours and receive better wages. It's time to stop wading through puddles of your own filth as you reach for the hotpockets and have a dame whip you into shape. You're welcome.

Should definitely consider whether this claim may be a fallacy of correlation = causation, because in the US, higher income people are more likely to get married in the first place. Also, Mr. Crowder can take his petty shaming language and shove it.

5. Don't die sick, miserable and alone…. Married people not only live longer lives, they live healthier lives. There are too many factors at play here to even list. From married people statistically maintaining healthier weights, being more active and having lower mortality rates, to married women incurring less severe illnesses, enjoying better cancer survival rates and of course… lower rates of domestic abuse (as opposed to those merely cohabitating). Yes ladies, it's true, living with an uncommitted, self-absorbed jackass can be hazardous to your health.

Crowder doesn't source research here, but as far as I know many of the most recent studies done on married health vs. single health were done 30-40 years ago before the advent of no-fault divorce. Men are significantly more likely to suicide after divorce. And as we've discussed, women have legal and financial incentive to divorce. Also, I'm glad domestic violence was brought up, because that is yet another area where men get horribly screwed. Despite what women's groups insist, domestic violence is not something that men only do to women. It's actually reciprocal and generational in many circumstances, meaning both partners do it to each other and often their parents did the same. Yet the Violence Against Women Act has specifically pinpointed men as the bad guy for domestic violence, and by law, excludes male victims of domestic violence from support and legal avenues offered to women.

Lastly… Crowder, again with the pitiful shaming language? Why don't you grow the f up.

You might ask why I'm directing so much bile at Mr. Crowder. Well, it's because he and many other conservatives portray themselves as holy crusading advocates of traditional marriage. They obsess over preventing gay marriage, and they browbeat men into getting married. But they have done scant little to defend marriage itself. In fact, they have played an integral part in helping destroy marriage in the US. For example, VAWA was originally passed with broad bipartisan support, and still enjoys bipartisan support. Also, Ronald Reagan as governor of California was the first governor to sign a bill allowing "no-fault divorce" in the United States. Ronald Reagan, held up as the ultimate conservative ideal, opened the floodgates of frivolous divorce in our country with the stroke of a pen. In addition, divorce is well-accepted even within the Church as documented by the popular Christian blogger Dalrock.

To be fair, there are some conservatives such as Phyllis Schlafly, Suzanne Venker, and the Independent Women's Forum who have called for reforms on many of these issues. But if conservatives really want to defend marriage in this country, they should have made it priority #1 decades ago. They should spend far less time telling men to "man up" and more time working to help men and women enjoy equality in the eyes of the law.

So what do you say Mr. Crowder? Are you going to keep serving men horse hockey sandwiches and telling them it's beef brisket? Or are you going to help save marriage? Your choice.

Politics and pink camouflage

January 28, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

As the battle over women in military combat roles heats up to a pink fever, we are beginning to see the first signs of our government's attempts to include women in combat without, of course, actually including women in combat.

You did know that was coming, didn't you?

It was as inevitable as Leon Panetta strutting over his false proclamation that ""If members of our military can meet the qualifications for a job — and let me be clear, we are not reducing qualifications — then they should have the right to serve."

It was a statement with all the sincerity of, "I did not have sex with that woman."

First, and let me be clear, qualifications were reduced a long time ago. In fact, qualifications for women in the military have never been anything like equal. I served in the early to mid-1970s, and have vivid memories of watching women do push-ups with their knees resting on the ground and walking past the chin up bars, which most of them could not jump high enough to reach, as though they could not see them.

It's pretty much the same today. In the Army, a perfect score on a PT test means men between the ages of 22 and 26 must complete 75 push-ups and a two-mile run in less than 13 minutes along with 80 sit-ups, while women of the same age must complete 46 push-ups, run two miles in less than 15 minutes and 36 seconds and complete 80 sit-ups. The minimum number of pushups for men is 39, for women it is 17, or less than half.

The different expectation in upper body strength, something that might be rather important in something like, say, combat, is the problem. And it is one that feminists and the politicians trying to please them are making haste to avoid or talk around as much as possible.

Politicians are bound to Obama's vote-mongering sales pitch that "Women can do anything men can do, and do it better, and do it in heels," even if it means pretending that the average female soldier can throw a 200 lb. wounded comrade across her shoulder and hike two miles back to base camp in camouflage stilettos.

That brings us to problem number one for this nightmare policy in the making. Women, on average, cannot be expected to meet the same physical demands as men. The Pentagon knows this, which is why they have always had different physical standards for women, and why they have been kept out of combat as much as possible. It is because of the completely rational concern that their failure to keep up with their peers will get people killed.

Still, here we are, pretending to prepare for lifting all bans and restrictions. A new and improved level of bullshit will be required. As if Obama himself were holding the cue cards, a December report from the Congressional Research Service provides the language.

[box icon=""]The use of the term "gender-neutral physical standards" raises questions

depending on how it is defined. A plain reading of the term suggests that men and women would be required to meet the same physical standards in order to be similarly assigned. However, in the past, the Services have used this and similar terms to suggest that men and women must exert the same amount of energy in a particular task, regardless of the work that is actually accomplished by either. Hypothetically speaking, if a female soldier carries 70 pounds of equipment five miles and exerts the same effort as a male carrying 100 pounds of equipment the same distance, the differing standards could be viewed as 'gender-neutral' because both exerted the same amount of effort, with differing loads.[/box]

Yes, of course. And hypothetically speaking, a weaker person exerts the same amount of energy carrying less weight as a stronger person exerts carrying more weight. Thank Jesus and feminist governance our leaders have figured out a way to set gender-neutral different standards for men and women based on sex, in order to establish equality in the military.

What genius.

In all seriousness, there are two fundamental solutions here. One, any lifting of bans, or even the imaginary lifting of bans, needs to be accompanied by the lifting of the double standards in physical readiness between men and women in the military.

Should women be allowed to fight? Yes, they should. Absolutely, if they fully qualify to keep up with their male peers. If they want to dodge bullets for oil companies in order to have a better chance at promotions down the road, no one should get in their way.

I will also add a message to those who worry that male soldiers won't be able to help themselves from taking stupid risks to hover over their female counterparts: Just shut it. If they can't accept military training and do their job, it is no one's fault but their own.

However, should women be allowed to get their fellow soldiers killed so President Obama can fulfill back room promises to gender ideologues? Not so much, I'm thinking.

The only other possible solution is segregated units. It is the only rational answer for those soldiers hypothetically exerting just as much energy to get less done than the soldier next to them, whoever they may be.

I think I have a better solution, though; one that will allow all of us to put this in its proper perspective.

Just relax. Very little is actually going to change.

As the Defense Department and every politician within a mile of a microphone has been incessantly spouting since Panetta's "decision," the battlefield in this conflict is a markedly different one from wars past. Women are already there fighting and dying…in numbers somewhat akin to short white guys in the NBA.

That is not to dismiss or demean the sacrifices of individual soldiers, but the fairy tale we have been sold — that the women who have died in Iraq and Afghanistan are somehow representative of women's equal participation in combat — is a very, very bad joke. It is insulting to male soldiers who do almost all the dying, and to the women who have given their lives. Watching politicians and feminists glom on to those deaths, as though they were a part of some grand cause célèbre, makes me want to vomit every time I hear it. Enough already.

When the bans that they actually lift are completed, those numbers won't change much. As soldiers returning from Afghanistan already report, when a woman and a man go missing in the field, the woman will get priority.

Sen. Jim Inhofe of Oklahoma, the ranking Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee, reported that Deputy Defense Secretary Ashton Carter told him the policy change would not have much of an effect on the sexual make-up of military units.

> I do not believe this will be a broad opening of combat roles for women, because as [a] 2012 report indicated, there are 'serious practical barriers which must be resolved so that the department can maximize the safety and privacy of all military members while maintaining military readiness.

That is political speak for "We haven't yet, for the sake of equality, figured out what colors the roadside potty stands for the women are going to be."

No matter what the Pentagon or our president tells you, for the most part women in the military will walk past the brunt of combat hardships like they were chin-up bars. Men will continue to do the lion's share of the dying, and before it is over Hana Rosin will write a book about how women survive combat at higher numbers because they are better, smarter soldiers.

Of course, under that is the fact that number of military women who can meet the same exact physical standards demanded of men in combat is statistically insignificant. Be as pissed off as you want to, but you can't prove me wrong.

One last thing we might want to consider in this fetid mass of stinking political tomfoolery is that for women, this is still a game of pick and choose. Or as one soldier from Corpus Christy, Texas recently commented on a local news website there:

> The Pentagon is now going to "allow" women to serve in combat jobs. Apparently this is Obama's payoff to the radical feminists who voted for him. But if they truly want equality, then women should be "required" to serve in those jobs, same as the men.
>
> You didn't think all of those men in the infantry, combat engineers, artillery, etc. volunteered for those jobs? Some did but for most, that was the only choice they were given when they enlisted. And, if they failed to meet the standards for those military specialties, they were discharged. If women are "allowed" to serve in those specialties and they fail to meet the standards, they are not discharged, [they are] > simply given another job or sent back to their old job.

>
> So, give women total equality, “require” them to take those jobs, without lowering the standards. And don’t allow the government to cover-up the aftermath — let the chips fall where they may.

But of course, as we all know, the chips never fall where they may when the deck is stacked and the dealer is on the take.

God Bless America.

Sisters doin’ it to ’emselves

January 29, 2013 | by Steve Moxon | Link | Original Link

Whenever you point out that men rather than women are the disadvantaged and those on the receiving end of prejudice, the first thing you get back – after the blunt denial – is: ‘what about women in Islamic countries?’ Everyone assumes that female face and body coverings (the niqab, etc) are ‘oppressive’ to women and at the behest of men. Yet both of these assumptions are false.

Female Islamic dress codes are cultural practices similar to foot-binding in China and female circumcision (genital mutilation) in sub-Saharan Africa and other regions, in that they are all cultural codification of female intra-sexual competition to secure high mate-value pair-bonded sexual partners. They signal to prospective male long-term partners a commitment not to engage in extra-pair sex.

Bear with me (for just one paragraph) while of necessity I explain this.

The whole point of pair-bonding is to increase the reproductive efficiency of the female by the presence of the male partner dissuading sexual access by low mate-value males. It is not about male control of female fertility as usually supposed. Researchers have been flummoxed by findings that pair-bonding does not prevent the female from choosing to have extra-pair sex. This should not have come as a surprise, because it’s in the female’s interests to have sex with males who have superior genes to that of her pair-bonded partner, and there is nothing much the male partner can do about it – not least because the extra-pair male would be more dominant, and likely would win any physical contest if it came down to this.

But if the male’s job is to keep away lower mate-value males, then he needs to be assured that the female does not have a propensity to engage in sex with any males not too much lower in mate-value than himself; otherwise his job as ‘guardian’ is made much more difficult, and not worth the bargain he struck of trading off (to some extent) his own relative lack of mate-value in return for his provision of a mate-guarding service.

This is how face-body coverings, foot-binding and FGM work. They are widespread fashions among women that aside from their particular cultural manifestation are essentially a unitary biological phenomenon. As with all fashions, they are not imposed but readily adopted as women wish to join the more advantageous in-group and to dissociate themselves from the relative under-dog out-group.

It requires no imposition from without. Yes, of course, men will at the behest of women reinforce such behavior. In being at the civic end of sociality (the locus of their own intra-sexual competitiveness), men are in the position that women will appeal to them to act on their behalf to where necessary help impose uniform female cultural practice. This is not in any respect ‘oppression’ by men. If anything it is a imposition on them by women to which they feel duty bound to accede.

Now, when I’m allowed to get as far as putting across this explanation, the next retort is that even if it is women themselves 'oppressing' each other, it is still women being 'oppressed', and that therefore we still need to focus on women and not on men as being disadvantaged. Well, leaving aside the question as to why you would wish to intervene in what women choose to do – and also ignoring 'cultural imperialism' concerns – the question to be thrown back is why, then, are the workings of male dominance and dominance hierarchy not worthy of intervention on behalf of what necessarily is the large majority of low-ranking and thereby 'oppressed' males? After all, political-Left analysis at one time was all about the need to 'liberate' the lower, working classes.

Whatever happened to that?

What happened is that the lower, working classes never bought the idea that fighting a class war would change things. Ordinary men could see well enough that 'the new boss' would be the same as 'the old boss' (as The Who famously remarked), regardless of where he had come from – not least if he had come from within their own ranks. And they could also see that when it came to war they were together with everyone within their own nation and not with their opposite numbers abroad – hardly when they would be the very people facing them across no-man's land in the opposing trench.

The Marxist 'progressive project' never got off the ground, leaving egg on the faces of the intelligentsia who had taken the ethos to heart. In time-honoured fashion, this embarrassment was circumvented by finding a fall guy. The worker. Possibly the most appalling bout of pseudo-science in history then entered the fray by way of trying to provide some justification for this bizarre turn.

The now entirely discredited but once in vogue concept of Freud's that we are somehow 'repressed' was married to an old notion of Engels and Marx about men and women, so that the family was envisaged as an institution whereby 'capitalist' values were imposed via its male head. In this way, males, as stereotypically were workers generically, became in effect personae non grata, and all non-males – women – were thereby considered their replacements as the rightful recipients of 'liberation' from 'oppression'. 'Political correctness' was born.

From then on there was no question of considering male intra-sexual social dynamics as being at all about 'oppression', because males were really 'non-people'. The only males to be concerned about were ethnic minority males (ethnic minorities like women not being stereotypically workers of old), but there was no concern from the fact of their maleness. In any case, as actually the majority of the population women made the perfect new 'masses'. There was no need to focus on female intra-sexual social dynamics as having anything to do with women's social 'condition' because by the new perspective their 'oppression' was not at the hands of other women – no matter how socially elevated – but by men.

So there you have it. A default assumption that what in fact women do to themselves is instead done to them by men. We see this all the time in the persistent ridiculous 'size zero' controversy. Women don't really want to be super slim, we are told; they would prefer to be size 14. It's just the all-powerful male fashion industry that is forcing them.

Yet the fashion industry is female-controlled, of course; and the reason fashion magazines carry photos of waif-thin models is that this is what their market research reveals is the ideal to which, however unrealistically, their female readership aspires. It is the result of female intra-sexual competition for high mate-value pair-bonded partners.

We live in an era of unprecedented political stupidity where the notion of a particular highly implausible social ‘oppressor’-‘oppressed’ dynamic is unfalsifiable. No amount of evidence, however internally consistent and externally validated, can shift PC-fascist conviction. Not until, that is, the whole edifice collapses under its own stupendous dead weight. And that is starting to happen. We live in times set to be rather interesting.

AVFM News and Activism: London Calling

January 29, 2013 | by James Huff | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]

Tonight we are very pleased to have as our guests Andy Man and Richard Ford of MRA London. The recently formed partnership between AVFM and MRA London was announced last week promising to add a new dynamism to the movement. Tonight we are going to talk about this new partnership as well as goings on in the U.K. with our very esteemed guests. Andy Man has been a regular contributor to AVFM and Richard Ford is an established MRA with a record of political activism.

This is going to be an exciting engagement so please join us and call in.

The show starts tonight, 29th, at 9:00 PM Eastern, 8:00 PM Central, which is 2:00 AM January 30th in London and 11:00 AM January 30th in Brisbane.

SHOW PAGE

Of course we will have the after show MRA roundup on STICKAM.

[/box]

Tell Your Senators: Say NO to S.47!

January 29, 2013 | by S.A.V.E. | Link | Original Link

Greetings!

Today we have an urgent request.

S. 47, a Violence Against Women Act reauthorization bill has been introduced in the Senate. Unfortunately, S. 47 is very similar to last year's Violence Against Women Act and ignores well-documented problems.

You'd think that with all of the controversy surrounding VAWA, the Senate would afford time for discussion and the possible addition of amendments. But this may not be the case! Word is that it may skip the Judicial Committee and go straight to the floor for a vote!

We believe that these VAWA Reform Principals are vital and urgently needed to create a comprehensive and effective VAWA:
http://www.saveservices.org/pvra/vawa-reform-principles/

Our urgent request: Please call your Senators RIGHT NOW. Tell them, "Say NO to S. 47 and YES to Real VAWA Reform!"

If you live in the United States, please find your senators here: http://www.senate.gov/general/contact_information/senators_cfm.cfm and write or call them. Remember, you have two Senators in every State, so be sure to contact both from whichever state you live and/or work in!

Let's show them what we're made of. Use those phones!

Thanks!

teri

Teri Stoddard, Program Director
Stop Abusive and Violent Environments www.saveservices.org

Editor's note: for more on SAVE's suggestions on how to reform VAWA if it's to be passed at all, please see this VAWA reform principles document. And yes, by the way, I already called both my Senators. Have you?–DE

This is what domestic violence looks like

January 29, 2013 | by Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) | Link | Original Link

---

[quote]All the forces in the world are not so powerful as an idea whose time has come.
~ Victor Hugo[/quote]

Every word of this story, sadly, is absolutely true.

Mr. JB has been friends with Dr.K for well over 20 years. Dr.K is an extremely accomplished man. He is a surgeon and he regularly travels around the world to train other surgeons in techniques he has developed to treat a relatively common but often lethal situation. He lives in a modest sized town at the edge of a large rural population, and he is not only the head of his area of surgical specialization, but whenever ANYONE in his swath of the woods sustains the injury he treats, he is consulted. His responsibilities are enormous and he saves lives, every day.

Shortly after me and Mr.JB married, Dr.K met a woman. Beauty is also a doctor, but not a surgeon. They met at the hospital where they both work, and over time, developed a relationship. Beauty isn't really a beauty, but she has the most extraordinary hair, and ladies, NEVER underestimate the awesome power of your hair. Natural light auburn ringlets that fall in a cascade of shimmering fire down to her waist. Probably the most beautiful hair I've ever seen.

[image]

Dr.K had a bucket list of all the qualities he wanted in a wife, and she seemed increasingly perfect.

Accomplished? Check

Physically fit and attractive? Check

Devoted to him? Check

Prepared to be a stay at home wife and mother? Check

Yes, she's a doctor, trained at enormous expense by the state, but her first obligation is to any children she might have, and she planned, and did, take more than a decade off of work, and I don't fault her for that, but it does piss me off to listen to her whine about the "wage gap". The wage gap exists because YOU TOOK A DECADE OFF while your male counterparts worked 70 hour weeks!

http://www.avoiceformen.com/video/wage-gap-debunked/

But that's another story.

So Dr.K and Beauty married. I had a very small baby at the time so I didn't go to the wedding but Mr. JB did and he said it was pretty much unanimous that Beauty was bat shit fucking insane and that Dr.K was making a huge mistake. When he said "I do" all his friends shook their heads in sorrow, but I don't think any of them could guess just how bad the situation would become.

[image]

They had three children in very quick succession and by the time the third child had arrived, Dr.K knew he was in deep trouble. His first clue was that he was not permitted to speak to his children. No really. Beauty's first language is not English and she wanted the children to be bilingual. Fair enough. Dr.K does not speak any language OTHER than English, but Beauty forbid a word of English to be spoken in the house.

When Dr.K told me this, my response was "tell her to fuck off". Seriously? Who forbids a grown-up from speaking to HIS OWN CHILDREN? Dr.K said that if he tried to discuss the situation with Beauty, she would keep him up all night screaming and railing and crying, and for a surgeon, that's a disaster with the potential to cost someone's life.

[image]

So he gave in to her. He accepted her edict. His children do not know a word of English and cannot speak to their father.

Beauty is also insanely controlling with the children. They are not permitted to have a glass of water if it is not water drinking time. Beauty has them on a schedule that would make the commanders of the Israeli army proud. This actually upsets Dr.K enormously. He is deeply worried that she is crushing their very souls. She permits them no decision-making abilities at all. Dr.K thinks she is making them crazy. As crazy as she is.

Dr.K is not allowed to participate in his children's lives in any meaningful way. He has never given them a bath (7:15 to 7:25 PM EVERY NIGHT), he has never taken them to the park. They have never been to the movies, to the zoo or to the country for a picnic.[image]

And again, there was no possibility of discussing any of this with Beauty. All that would earn Dr.K was a night with a shrieking, raging wife and a surgery scheduled for the morning. Over the course of the years, it seemed obvious that the only solution was divorce. I am the last person in the world to advocate for divorce where there are children involved, but Dr.K is in an abusive relationship, and that is the only acceptable reason to head to the courts.

Dr.K picked a weekend when he was not on call and just before sitting down to dinner, he broached the subject of permanently ending their misery.

Here is what happened:

Beauty hurled a heavy stoneware plate at his head and severed his carotid artery near his temple. Both being doctors, they were able to deal with a situation that could very well have been fatal.

[image]

Beauty then picked up the phone and threatened to dial police emergency. She said that she would tell the police Dr.K had been beating her. He would be arrested and spend the weekend in jail. Dr.K is well known enough that he would likely make the news. His reputation would be destroyed. He would forever be the doctor who beat his wife, no matter what happened. The fact that Dr.K is fit and strong and Beauty is a tiny little thing would automatically convict Dr.K in the public's mind.

And Beauty knew it.

So what did Dr.K do? Nothing. He stayed. In fact, Beauty insisted on having a fourth child, and if Dr.K tried the whole "not tonight dear, I have a headache", she would keep him up all night screaming and it was just easier to comply. Dr. K told Mr.JB the day his fourth child was born was the saddest day of his life.

Is Dr.K innocent in all of this? Sadly, I don't think he is. He should have walked out and taken his kids a long time ago. But a decade of constant, unending abuse from his wife has left him a broken man. And the simple truth is that the price for him to rescue his children, and himself, is devastatingly high. He WILL spend at least a night in jail, and probably more. He WILL be vilified in the press and spend the rest of his life living under the cloud of suspicion. He WILL have his reputation as a surgeon compromised and a google search will always turn him up as an accused abuser.

[image]

Still, he often dreams of going ahead with the divorce anyways. He has consulted lawyers and has a good grasp of what the financial consequences will be. More or less total destruction. She will be awarded custody and even if he fights, the best he can hope for is 50%. His lawyers have advised him that he is unlikely to be awarded 50% custody, given his work schedule and frequent travelling.

In other words, he is well and truly fucked. And he lives every day of his life with a woman who threatens him, who berates him, who mentally tortures him and rapes him. Yes, she rapes him. Sex is coerced because the alternative is to endure sleep deprivation and haranguing and endless agony.

I'm not sure what Dr.K will do. Mr. JB and I just pray it doesn't involve him putting a gun to his head and pulling the trigger.

The reality is that Dr.K is trapped. The even more brutal reality is that any woman can do this to any man, and face no consequences. I could do this to Mr.JB, if I wanted to. I have the power to do so.

Power corrupts. Absolute power corrupts absolutely. When marriage has been turned into a vehicle that allows women absolute control over men, is it any wonder that the institution has become so corrupt, and men are simply refusing to play along?

Until we accept that domestic violence occurs evenly between men and women, until we accept that women can be the perpetrators and men the victims, until we refuse to mock men who ARE victims, until we accept that fathers are as vital to children as mothers, men like Dr.K will be powerless to save themselves, or their children.

[image]

And women like Beauty will continue to believe that they are entitled to behave any way they like, because they will face no consequences for their actions. This is why there is such a thing as a men's rights movement.

Hey, does anyone have $10 they can spare? Oh, good. Give it to these people, who are fighting to make sure Dr.K doesn't end up dead by his own hand, and Beauty won't long have the power of destruction.

http://www.avoiceformen.com/

Lots of love,

JB

Entering a new ERA

January 30, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

As Peter Wright recently penned so succinctly on the pages of this website, the men's movement, after a hundred years of antecedents that were more anti-feminist than pro-male, has entered a new era.

We have, after many internal struggles, and much work to rise above the fog of social programming, finally ushered in a second wave, relieved not just of the dictates of ideological social engineers, but of the outmoded and archaic demands on men that led us to feminist governance and puppetry in the first place.

We have shaken ourselves from the trance of mainstream politics, from the shame and control of religiosity, and from the terminal, toxic propensity to measure our innate worth by the capricious judgments of women and costly approval of traditional men.

And it has laid a path of autonomy and self-actualization that was unavailable till now because we simply did not dare to imagine it.

This website, though I think the word website is no longer an adequate description of this place, is a place critical to that imagining. And while we have never pretended to speak for all men, our voice has caught the attention of a growing legion of men and women hungering for a better way.

It is with that better way in mind that I am pleased to make an announcement and to issue a challenge to all organizations that purport to support the cause of a just and fair society.

The Equal Rights Amendment, written in 1923, is a proposal to make freedom from discrimination based on sex a matter of Constitutional Law in the United States. Its wording is as clear as it is brief.

[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- Section 1. Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of sex;
- Section 2. The Congress shall have the power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article;
- Section 3. This amendment shall take effect two years after the date of ratification.

[/unordered_list]

After discussion with the editorial staff of this website, we have agreed that this proposed amendment, precisely as it is worded above, is in the interest of all citizens. It is our considered opinion that resistance to this amendment primarily stems from the desire to maintain the status quo of the disposability of men and boys. And indeed we find that the activism that prevented its previous success stemmed from political conservatives like

Phyllis Schlafly, who successfully campaigned to keep men in deadly servitude to their culture for the benefit and enjoyment of women.

With that in mind, we issue our support for the Equal Rights Amendment and pledge our activism to push for ratification. We also challenge all human or so called equal rights organizations to support this with their own redoubled efforts to demand ratification, as failure to do so will be identified as the supreme hypocrisy of the age.

With that, I am also issuing a request to the editors and contributors of A Voice for Men, and issuing an advisory to the same effect. From this day forward, it is the editorial policy of AVFM to refer to the movement of which we are a part as the Men's Human Rights Movement, or MHRM.

That too is a simple idea whose time has come. While we are focused in the inequalities of law that have a disproportionally negative impact on the lives of men and boys, we do not claim the need to do so at the expense of any other group. This is, in one of its rare forms, a movement for human rights. It is only fitting that we identify it as such in our lexicon.

On behalf of the editorial staff of A Voice for Men,

Paul Elam
Dean Esmay

NCFM: Time to get honest about VAWA

January 30, 2013 | by NCFM | Link | Original Link

Senator Leahy and Representative Moore need to stop denying the truth about partner violence and VAWA

[box icon=""]

VAWA supporters are trying to ramrod the reauthoriztion (S.47) through the Senate without committee hearings. It appears Senator Leahy has cut a deal with the House and that none of meaningful reforms so many people have worked so hard to have adopted will prevail. It seems backroom politics rule the day and few if any of our elected officials in Washington D.C. care about all the damage, destruction, and death VAWA causes. They don't seem to care about due process, individual rights, or one innocent life after another being destroyed by the horrific disparate outcomes of one of the worse laws ever passed in America.

I can only imagine the trade-offs that were made, the pork that was redistributed, the coercion if not outright blackmail that twisted the arms of the resistant. And, Sen. Leahy, it's all about the money, jobs in Vermont. The Vermont Immigration Service Center has been recruiting for new positions for months in anticipation of the reauthorization of VAWA. Absolutely disgusting the selling of families and lives for a few jobs and the appeasement of power feminists who think only of themselves. We sent the same fax to Representative Moore on the other side of the isle, too. To view the faxes full-scale click on the PDF links below.

130129 ltr faxed re Sen. Leahy Stop Denying the Truth about VAWA

130129 ltr faxed re Rep Moore Stop Denying the Truth about VAWA

Harry Crouch, President NCFM

[/box]

Feminism needs domestic violence

January 30, 2013 | by Suzanne McCarley | Link | Original Link

…therefore feminism perpetuates domestic violence. Feminism also invents fake domestic violence. This gives Feminism an excuse to exist.

It has been many years since feminists have fought for anything remotely resembling equality between the sexes. I know most ordinary feminists still think equality is the name of the game, but they are mistaken. All anyone has to do in order to see this, is look at what feminist policy makers, movers and shakers, and intellectual leaders (and I use that term rather loosely) have actually accomplished during the last two or three decades. No equality there. None.

This article is a very basic introduction to a single concept that most people will instantly reject on a visceral level: That feminist policies breed Domestic Violence while pretending to prevent it. I'm not going to quote lots of statistics and studies, or variables and technicalities. I will however, state that the Duluth Model* of domestic violence, on which virtually all DV policy and "education" is based, has been thoroughly debunked – it represents as common, the very least common type of Intimate Partner Violence (brutal male/innocent female.)

I am highlighting a causal relationship between feminist policy and domestic violence. To see this principle in action, go to any courthouse and sit through a day or two of family court. And while you're there, remember that the feminist-sponsored Violence Against Women Act pays for the "advocates" who coach women on how to present their cases, while the men are advised by their lawyers to "plead to a lesser charge." Remember that VAWA pays the cost of housing the men in jail while they await their hearings.

VAWA also funds prosecution of cases of "violence against women." Everybody in that courtroom, except the accused male, has income (and power) to gain by painting him as a monster, including his own counsel. In theory they could railroad women in the same way because technically, abuse by women is still illegal, but it's a lot easier to convince the public that hundreds of men in any given community are abusers, as opposed to hundreds of women. We notice when women are accused of crimes. Men, on the other hand? Well, men are pigs, right? Abuse is what we've been trained to expect from them.

80% of all victims of violence are men, yet we have the Violence Against Women Act, ostensibly to protect women from (primarily domestic/relationship) violence. How did this happen? Why is violence against women presumed to be worse than violence against men? Because women are weak and vulnerable? Because nobody takes women seriously? Whatever the appeal, it worked; even though violence against women was already illegal, the thought of violence committed against the "helpless," offends us so deeply that we decided it was perfectly reasonable to spare no expense and overlook no preventive measure, if it would reduce the number of victims. Random violence is relatively rare and tough to manage, but domestic violence is so, well, curable, right?

Who doesn't want to stop Domestic Violence?

Professional feminists, that's who. Without DV victims, feminists would have no rallying cry, and they would lose political power. Here's how it works:

Thanks primarily to the Violence Against Women Act, DV has become a multi-billion dollar industry. This industry employs many thousands of people throughout the nation, paying them with federal VAWA grant money. And those thousands of people have made relatively little headway in achieving their "goal" of reducing DV. Indeed they perpetuate it. This is by design; if DV went away, so would their jobs. There are many, many factors involved in DV, and it's no coincidence that feminist policies aggravate nearly all of them, but for the sake of clarity I'm going to address only a simplified but significant few of them here.

Who commits a substantial proportion of DV? Past victims or witnesses of DV. Who committed the DV that they experienced or witnessed? In too many cases to count, it is women. Women commit far more than half of all DV. Among the vast majority of violent couples, the violence is mutual. Additionally, women commit the majority of child abuse. Yes, women are responsible for most DV.

Next point, what often triggers DV? Stress. What causes women lots of stress? The constant obligations of child rearing. What causes even more child rearing stress? Not having a father in the family. How are so many fathers removed from their families? They are accused of Domestic Violence, whether it happened or not, and whether it's mutual or not. Disagreements are exaggerated, violence is "invented" or men are blamed for any real violence that does occur.

The result is that fathers, often the most stable influence in the family, are kicked to the curb and financially bled dry, while mothers are protected and are excused for their "missteps;" this is the unstable – and all too often abusive – environment in which their children are raised. Toss in a few more variables like substance abuse, a string of violent boyfriends, and a bit of poverty, and this process is guaranteed to produce future domestic abusers. And this is the process that VAWA has institutionalized. It no longer happens "once in a while;" it is SOP. Was this the intent of VAWA? Who cares? That's the result.

Thanks to VAWA, once a father is accused of DV, his chances of keeping his family (or his assets, his reputation, his friends, often even his job) are almost nil. Conversely, most mothers have to commit "front page news" crimes to lose custody of their children. VAWA provides billions of dollars for programs that "protect women from their abusers." Yet it provides virtually nothing to help men or children escape their abusers, if those abusers are women. VAWA addresses less that half of the DV it encounters. Instead of working to reduce Domestic Violence, VAWA works to ensure that millions of children will continue to suffer abuse, and will likely grow up to become abusers themselves.

I am currently reading AVFM Editor-at-Large Erin Pizzey's memoir, "This Way to the Revolution." Forty years ago, long before VAWA, she founded the first battered women's shelter in the UK, and she immediately discovered that many of her "victims" were at least as violent as their “abusers.” She was harassed, threatened and demonized by powerful feminists for saying so out loud. For decades. This understanding of Domestic Violence is not new. However sharing this knowledge with the general population, could completely obliterate feminist control of the family courts.

And it should.

Question: Why on earth would anyone try to suppress the undeniable fact that “we’re doing it wrong?” Answer: A lot of women’s careers depend on “doing it wrong.”. These women have no qualms about throwing children, men, and other women under the bus to keep their jobs. Feminism doesn’t care about children (VAWA doesn’t even count them as victims.) It doesn’t care about families (broken families are its bread and butter.) It doesn’t care about women’s safety (resources wasted on imagined abuse, are channeled away from victims of real abuse.)

Feminism cares about controlling, dominating, destroying and extorting the men who pay Feminism’s bills. Everything else is window dressing. Don’t believe me? Follow the money. Oh, but you can’t; there doesn’t seem to be a paper trail; no readily available accounting of how and where VAWA money is distributed. One might think some people are conspiring to keep the rest of us in the dark…

* http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Duluth_model

 http://igualdadeparental.org/wp-content/uploads/2012/07/Dutton_Corvo-Transforming-flawed-policy.pdf

AVFM-Radio: The Equal Rights Amendment

January 31, 2013 | by AVfM Radio | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]

It was proposed for the first time in 1923 by the suffragist leader and founder of the National Woman's Party, Alice Paul.

The language of her proposed constitutional amendment is beautifully simple.

Section 1: Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of sex.

Section 2: Congress shall have the power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

It seems simple, obvious and right. It sounds like justice. And yet, this Constitutional Amendment has been one of the most contentious in the history of the United States. It has been repeatedly struck down over the years. Not struck down by men, men's rights activists, or the male owners and proprietors of female-enslaving-sammich-factories (FESM).

No, it has been struck down by women who recognized that actual equality under the law would mean, for themselves, leveling down to match the rights and obligations of men. Leveling down. But it's time, and the Equal Rights Amendment is an idea whose time has come. Tonight on AVFM Radio, Karen Straughan; (Girl Writes What), Kristina Hansen (The Wooly Bumblebee), and John Hembling (John the Other) will be putting their weight behind the ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment to the United States Constitution.

AVFM RADIO: The Equal Rights Amendment

Listen at 6 PM Pacific Time, 8 Pm Mountain time.

Call in 310 388 9709

Change-dot-org petition:
Support the ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment

[/box]

Just say No? Are you crazy?

January 31, 2013 | by August Løvenskiolds | Link | Original Link

---

[quote]Heaven has no rage like love to hatred turned / Nor hell a fury like a woman scorned ~ The Mourning Bride by William Congreve (1697)[/quote]

Have you ever refused a woman's sexual advances?

I've said no to women who were too old, too young, too drunk, too fat, too thin, too smelly, and even too needy. Quite often I've said no for no clear reason that I can identify other than something seemed off or I just wasn't interested. Once I even drove a woman 40 minutes to her apartment at 2 AM fully intending to spend the night – and then I drove away because I suddenly felt ill at ease – and I woke up with the flu the next morning.

Saying "no" to a woman in any context is difficult to impossible for most men – we will literally die rather than fail to protect or service them. As Karen Straughan has pointed out, male politicians have catered to women's needs and political demands long before women even got the vote – think Prohibition for example.

Medically, having regular sex with a woman pregnant with your child seems to reduce the odds of dangerous complications like pre-eclampsia – meaning that, if a man refuses sex with a woman who was, is, or will be pregnant with his child, his "selfishness" is putting both mother and child's lives at risk.

Historically, a man who refused any of the needs of his babymomma was placing his children at risk, so evolution seems to select in favor of men who slavishly obey their womenfolk, particularly when it comes to sex-on-demand.

Nowadays, however, college men are learning that if you say "yes" to sex with a woman who has been drinking, you are raping her, but if you say "no", your reputation, your education, your future livelihood, and even your life can be destroyed at the woman's whim: You're gay. You're a rapist. You drugged me. You've got a tiny dick. You hate women. Shut up, you privileged abuser. True or not, these allegations are real, unilateral power that women wield against men, and men have little defense other than walking away.

In doing background research for this piece I read a lot of articles about the reasons a man might refuse to have sex with a willing or even demanding woman. I was not completely surprised that all the items I found referenced male sexual refusal only in the context of a long-term relationship.

The idea that one can discuss why a man might refuse the sexual overtures of a new female partner seems almost like a social taboo – few are willing to entertain the radical notion that, even as the AIDS era approaches the end of its third decade, some lunatic, pathetic, yet straight man might set aside his horndog ways and resist the desires of a horny, needy woman. One man commented "You have got to be kidding me […] If I EVER turn down sex it's because I'm in a COMA!!!"

The other thing you too rarely see is how women react to a man's sexual rejection.

Now, I'm no great prize as a man – I'm way too much of a geek and average-looking on my best day, but I do know how to keep my cool around women most of the time, and as I grow older and more distinguished looking, I do get unwanted offers and demands for sex on a regular basis from women I barely know.

My most memorable refusal was of course the most traumatic one and over twenty years ago. After working as a computer programmer on mathematical projects for many years I was assigned a technically incompetent woman as a manager. "Terri" (an alias, as are all the names in this article) had no grasp of mathematics or computers, but in a high-pressure work culture where honesty and clarity was essential to success she was a master at covering her ass to explain away her many screw-ups and project failures. She started hitting on me almost immediately -Terri claimed I reminded her of the ex-husband she still pined for, and instead of letting me do my job, she tried to enlist me as a partner-in-crime in her scamming and ass-covering games.

I was a hard-working, loyal employee and I was appalled at what she was doing to both me and the company. When I resisted her bullshit in favor of actually working, she cut off all my communications with my clients and other employees – if I had a technical question or needed a clarification, it had to go through her, and because she was a math idiot, I never got the answers I needed. I did get a ton of flirting and joking from a woman I increasingly couldn't stand – after years my dream job had morphed into a nightmare in less than a month.

Finally, after another frustrating, unproductive day, Terri and I were the last ones left in the office, and she asked me out to dinner "to talk about things." I refused; I kept my work and social life separate, and I told her that I found her disgusting and unprofessional.

The very next morning she called me into her office for a "surprise" performance review – the first and only negative review I ever received. I was hoping to get fired, but that would have marked Terri as a failed manager for losing an employee who was up to that point considered a hero to the company – I should note that this was in the early 1990's when the idea of a man filing a sexual harassment claim was unthinkable (and in a lot of ways it still is).

I left the company shortly thereafter, and then in my new job (under a competent female boss, thank god) I started hiring away all the other male programmers working under Terri – to a man, they were happy to get out. Less than a month had passed when I started calling on the last and least experienced novice programmer they had left; they gave him an instant 20% salary boost and another manager ("Bob") called me and asked me why I was damaging them like that. I told him the whole story; soon, Terri was blacklisted and permanently stripped of all her remaining employees.

Then, for good measure, I hired Bob away from them, too. The entire product line we had worked on was soon dead and their entire division was gone in less than a year later.

I now own my own (non-computer) business in a struggling, artsy-fartsy entertainment district in a major city. At over 8 years mine is one of the longest-surviving businesses still there. I am expected to be a friendly, public “face” for my customers and regulars and while I don’t mind this at all, I do get approached by a lot of women, many of them tipsy and half my age or less. It is not unusual at all for me to be kissed, hugged and even more aggressively approached 4-6 times an evening. Most of the time I can painlessly deflect them by saying things like “it was good to meet you” and “let me know if you need anything else” but at least six times in the last year things have gotten ugly.

The first woman I refused, “Angel”, mid-twenties, former cheerleader, unwed mom of two kids by two different dads, just wanted “to take me home and fool around”. I declined politely and she seemed to take it in stride, but I soon found out from other female friends that she was complaining that I must be gay because no man had ever turned her down before. One dear friend of mine took it upon herself to set Angel straight – “I’ve seen Auggie with several beautiful women and I also know from personal experience he is NOT gay.”

The second woman, “Beth”, also mid-twenties, said that she had a crush on me, and considering her girth, I believed her – she called me gay to my face when I refused to have sex with her 250 lb, nominally Christian ass (that had already been through her second abortion). My response to her was, “well, as it happens, I wasn’t gay until I met you.” At the time I thought this was a clever rejoinder, but on reflection I concluded it carries a subtext of homophobia that was not accurate in expressing my intent.

By the time the third woman, “Chris”, early thirties and quite fetching, called me gay I had perfected my response: “Although I love my gay brothers, I am only sexually attracted to women who aren’t homophobic bitches like you.” Although she was stunned into silence, Chris still hits on me from time to time and I tolerate it because she has a number of male orbiters she parades in front of me and I don’t need open physical conflict in my business, but those guys do purchase a lot of stuff.

As I was trying to play a game of pinball, the fourth woman, “Darla” immediately cuddled up to me like a wounded puppy and as if I was an old lover of hers. I asked her to let me finish my game and she stormed off into the ladies’ room. I asked the friend she was with what was going on and she said that Darla had just been released from a mental health facility – no big shock there.

I finished the game and went to grab a beer and watch a baseball game. As I sat on a tall barstool Darla came up beside me and grabbed my penis through the fabric of my pants. I resisted the strong urge to physically defend myself; luckily for me a zeta woman pal of mine noticed what was happening, pulled Darla’s hand off of me and scared her away. Crazy dick-grabbing Darla hasn’t been back.

The fifth woman, “Ellie”, with no introduction, walked up, grabbed my left nipple and twisted it hard while I was playing a video game. Now, a woman assaulted like that can scream and cry, but a man so doing that would be seen as a coward. Without saying a word, I turned slightly, locked eyes with her, and twisted my head sideways like a reptile readying to engage an aggressor. She released her grip and scampered away in terror. I barely shifted in my seat as I returned to the game.

And finally and most recently, the sixth woman “Fran” complained loudly that the jukebox had stolen her money, then rubbed her body against mine and asked me if I could “help her out.” I looked at her coldly and said, “Unfortunately for you, I am not under the purview of women.” She teared up (ignored), then stuck out her tongue and made a raspberry noise (ignored), then flipped me off. I smiled slightly and said, “Try again once you grow up and get a job,” walked away, and then hugged a hot lesbian couple who happen to be close friends of mine.

Now, I grew up in a happy family and my parents were together until their deaths, but watching the misery of my many married and divorced friends I’ve always known that modern marriage is a terrible deal for men and soul-destroying for women. I did get dangerously close to marriage a couple of times but I always managed to escape – I guess I was born to be MGTOW long before I first heard the term not even a year ago.

Open your eyes even a crack and you will see women assaulting men with hundreds or even thousands of times the frequency that men assault women. A man who complains or refuses is characterized as a weak, worthless wimp, the butt of a joke, and he quickly learns to shut the fuck up in the face of women’s cruelty and just take it. A woman who complains about even imagined slights winds up as the prime minister of Australia.

But a few men are noticing their chains of pink shame and how easy it is to break them when they realize that men have intrinsic worth, too. Women are likewise noticing with angry concern that their whines are no longer keeping their male slaves from breaking away. I am no longer under the control of women, and I see their unease with men like us growing every day.

I’ve never been happier.

Woman molests boys, gets the pass

February 1, 2013 | by Peter Lloyd | Link | Original Link

Allowing a woman, 31, to walk free after groping 12-year-old boy is a criminal sign of outdated chivalry, says Peter Lloyd

Yesterday, MailOnline reported on the case of Amanda Wheeler – a 31 year-old from Cheltenham who was found guilty of sexually assaulting several young boys.

The mother-of-three got drunk at a party before kissing and groping a 12-year-old on a bench in November 2011.

She then performed a lap-dance and straddled a group of male children, before biting a 13-year-old boy on his neck and coercing him to perform a sex act on her.

She denied the charges, but was found guilty during a recent trial and faced several years in prison.

However, in the latest blow for British justice and men's rights, she walked free from Birmingham Crown Court with only a suspended prison term and a smirk on her face.

Why? Surely it can't be…Because she's a woman.

Addressing the court during sentencing, Judge Patrick Thomas QC incredulously stated that: 'Although these were paedophile acts…it was a one-off…they were [also] acts of drunkenness, selfishness and childishness'.

He then claimed that sending her to jail would be wrong because her victims have 'largely recovered' from their traumatic experiences…as if that makes a difference.

[image]
Amanda Wheeler, smug child molester sanctioned by British court
Shockingly, this is nothing new. In December last year, Lucie Slater – a 21 year-old woman and former X Factor contestant – glassed her defenceless boyfriend in the face over a Facebook post, but still enjoyed Christmas in the comfort of her own home.

Two months previously, Claire Roundhill from Yorkshire was spared jail after getting pregnant by sexually assaulting a 15 year-old boy. Following the ruling, the victim's father said: 'If it had been the other way around and this was a man having sex with a 15-year-old girl, he would have been locked up, without a shadow of a doubt. But, because she is a woman, she has walked free.'

Yet, ironically, a man like Scot Young – who's embroiled in a bitter divorce row with his wife – can be jailed for six months over a private matrimonial matter.

It's a complete joke…without being remotely funny.

Sadly, the issue is endemic. Recent national statistics prove that 58 per cent of male offenders who entered a guilty plea were given a custodial sentence – compared with just 34 per cent of UK women.

Out of the thirteen women's prisons in Great Britain, two are private – and the rest benefit from an additional set of ‘gender specific standards’, which men’s don’t.

And, in 2010, judges were formally advised to go softer on female criminals, thanks to the (ironically titled) Equal Treatment Bench Book – published by the Judicial Studies Board.

Where is the equality in that?

Not only does this offend, but it devalues the concept of justice – something which should run through the core of society evenly, like letters in a stick of rock.

Instead, our legal system is being manipulated by the outdated notion of chivalry – something which has no place in modern society, let alone a court of law. And I urge all men, including our dusty, out-of-touch judges, to reject it.

Why? Because it’s the foundation of male gender bias. It teaches us to pick up the bill as well as the blame. Worryingly, it teaches women to expect us to.

Yes, I understand it stems from a good place – from wanting to protect a woman from the harshness of the world, but sometimes women are the harshness of the world.

This is the inconvenient truth.

Sadly, our legal system – which mostly consists of men – would rather be crippled by the romantic view of women than do what’s right for everyone. It might go against our protective instinct, but anything else is political correctness gone mad – and unchallenged.

Yet, although it’s men who are allowing women to escape justice, what I find most sinister about these cases – and Wheeler’s in particular – is that there’s no outrage from any of our country’s high-profile, self-confessed feminists.

Why haven’t Suzanne Moore or Julie Burchill expressed any outrage? Why is Caitlin Moran – a Twitter bigmouth – silent? Here we have a convicted child sex offender escaping jail, yet not one public feminist figure has spoken out. Not one.

Answers on a postcard, please.

Fortunately, others with more balanced views have voiced criticism. Egalitarian Human rights campaigner Peter Tatchell told Mail Online: ‘If this had been a 31 year-old man with young boys the sentence would have been much tougher. It seems a case of double standards. Child sex abuse, regardless of whether it is perpetrated by men or women, is wrong and should be properly punished.’

Erin Pizzey – who opened the world’s first domestic violence shelter for women in 1971, before exposing feminism’s scope for hypocrisy in her work as a men’s rights activist – agreed.

‘Normal people – drunk or not – do not under any circumstances molest young children,’ she told MailOnline.

‘The fact that this woman insisted on pleading “not guilty” shows she has no remorse. In my opinion, jail was the only option. I cant help feeling that – had she been a man – she would have been incarcerated.’

And they’re right.

Feminism (like the law) needs to be even-handed if it is to be credible. It must rage against women's unfair advantages as well as their disadvantages – both socially and legally. Otherwise, the message they send out is this: treat women equally to men, except when they're treated better.

Anyone who disagrees is not only abusing the system – but our country's young boys, too.

This article originally appeared in Mail Online, and is reposted here with permission of Mr. Lloyd.

Study links aggressive boys to Mom's behavior

February 1, 2013 | by Kristina Hansen | Link | Original Link

"Boys will be boys" – Everyone is familiar with that old saying when describing boys and their tendency to display rough and tumble or aggressive behavior. It's also said when implying that it's not surprising when boys or men behave in a noisy, rude, irresponsible, or unpleasant way.

Let us assume, just for the sake of this discussion, that male tendencies toward aggression are a negative, rather than a long standing necessity for species survival without which humanity would have been a dead end biological experiment. Many people have asserted that genetics have had a large part to play in a boy's testosterone levels, which is primarily blamed for their tendency to display more aggression and dominance than girls.

But what would happen if it were revealed that it was not actually genetics, but rather mom's behavior that contributed to their boy's testosterone fueled propensity toward aggression and dominance?

I can already hear heads exploding over in the feminist camp where they have long claimed that it's the fault of boys and men for their own aggression and domineering behavior. If women were in complete control of the world, men would be kinder, gentler, and less aggressive.

Feminist Carol Gilligan is a well-known example. She insists that boys need to be protected from "the culture" – a culture in which "manhood valorizes war and the economy of capitalism, a culture that desensitizes boys and, by submerging their humanity, is the root cause of out-of-control and out-of-touch behavior and is the ultimate source of war and other violence committed by men."

Of course none of her claims are ever backed up by any scientifically verifiable or empirical data, but now new scientific data shows that such feminist "theories" are complete crap.

An article by the University of Montreal details "studies in human and animal models for over the past 50 years [that] have confirmed an association between aggression, dominance and testosterone in adolescence."

"The question is, when does that association start?" This was the question posed by Dr. Richard E. Tremblay, whose research team looked at newborn babies of both sexes.

U of M researchers were able to establish that testosterone levels in infancy are in fact not inherited genetically. This was achieved by comparing the testosterone levels of 314 five-month old pairs of twins, both identical and fraternal.

Researchers took samples of saliva from the 314 pairs of 5 month old twins and measured their levels of testosterone. They then compared the similarity in testosterone levels between identical and fraternal twins to determine the contribution of both the genetic and environmental factors. By comparing the testosterone levels of the five-month old pairs of twins, both identical and non-identical, researchers were able to establish that testosterone levels in infancy are “not inherited genetically but rather determined by environmental factors.”

Lead author Tremblay of the university’s Research Unit on Children’s Psychosocial Maladjustment said,

> Testosterone is a key hormone for the development of male reproductive organs, and it is also associated with behavioral traits, such as sexual behavior and aggression. – Our study is the largest to be undertaken with newborns, and our results contrast with the findings gained by scientists working with adolescents and adults, indicating that testosterone levels are inherited.

Dr. Tremblay explained that “if testosterone levels are genetically determined, then the identical twins would be more alike than the fraternal twins.”

The findings from the study were presented in an article published in Psychoneuroendocrinology on May 7, 2012.

Tremblay indicated that “the study was not designed to specifically identify these environmental factors, which could include a variety of environmental conditions, such as maternal diet, maternal smoking, breastfeeding and parent-child interactions – Because our study suggests that testosterone levels in infants are determined by the circumstances in which the child develops before and after birth, further studies will be needed to find out exactly what these influencing factors are and to what extent they change from birth to puberty.”

“Not that researchers are blaming mothers,” Dr. Tremblay said, “but it is a fact of nature that a child’s early environment (pregnancy and after birth) is closely related to maternal behavior.”

Feminists are not going to like the results of this research at all. It proves that a boy’s testosterone levels, which are said to be associated with aggression, sexual behavior, and dominance is not inherited genetically, but rather determined by environmental factors, mostly early environmental factors which the child experiences in relation to its mother both before and after birth.

So much for the old saying “boys will be boys.” Boys will be what mom’s behavior dictates in their early environment. If you’re going to blame the boys for their aggressive and antisocial behavior, it now seems that you’re going to have to blame their mothers as well.

Neil Lyndon’s Bad Mouthing

February 1, 2013 | by Neil Westlake | Link | Original Link

---

Editor’s note: Neil Lyndon’s historically significant 1990 article for the Sunday Times Magazine titled “Bad Mouthing” was probably the first ever published to discuss a mainstream culture in the UK in which men were habitually derided; and it was the first to itemise the disadvantages and inequalities to which men and boys are subjected – in a society which ostensibly oppresses women. Bad mouthing was the first article anywhere to point out that men died in greater numbers from prostate cancer than all the fatalities for women that resulted from all cancers of the genito-urinary system put together; and that nobody seemed to care much about prostate cancer.

The publication of Bad Mouthing brought a torrent of abuse on Lyndon’s head (including the observation “can there be something wrong with the size [of his penis]?” from the feminist publisher Carmen Callil, in response to the point about prostate cancer). But that wave of abuse was dwarfed by the astonishing reaction in 1992 when Neil Lyndon published his book “No More Sex War: The Failures of Feminism” – a comprehensive demolition of the ideology of feminism in its own terms.

In that book, Lyndon advanced the view that feminism was a poisonous ideological parasite on the changes that had occurred between men and women in the 20th century. He argued that change had resulted primarily from the introduction of infallible contraception and easily-accessible abortion and also that, contrary to the feminist notion of a repressive patriarchy, men had willingly consented to change for women and had themselves accommodated change with admirable ease.

No book and no author in the last 50 years has been subjected to such vilification as Neil Lyndon and No More Sex War. No writer in our time has suffered so much personal and professional cost for publishing his opinions. Neil Lyndon was mocked for being obviously impotent and incapable of getting a woman. He was sacked as a columnist for The Times, He was bankrupted. His estranged wife abducted their son to Scotland where she obtained an order of custody without Lyndon even knowing the application was being heard. He was physically attacked and threatened with death and his book was threatened with burning.

This article was thought lost, but retrieved from a dusty archive, transcribed into electronic form and re-published with the assistance of Miles Groth and MRA Andy Man.

♦♦♦

Men don’t like to complain when women are rude about them. It’s a man’s world and women have to assert themselves, don’t they? Well, no… In this provocative essay, Neil Lyndon argues that the habitual deprecation of men must stop if they are to become what women want them to be.

When they’re not billing and cooing, men and women have always spoken sharply about each other but for the past quarter of a century most of the public traffic in bile has gone one way only. It is supposed to be taboo in this country to make disparaging remarks about groups of people who have nothing in common except their birth; but the British custom and law do nothing to stop one half the population being casually and collectively damned and derided day in and day out — usually by members of the other half.

Here are some of the voices of intolerance; a few specimens, unsystematically collected, of the routine expression of prejudice towards men, all broadcast or published in a current context of the last year. They are only an illustrative selection, gathered from women in a variety of walks of life, which can be expanded into a catalogue.

Germaine Greer: "It always amazes me that women don't understand how much men hate them." (From The Female Eunuch, quoted approvingly in The Independent television listing for a programme about feminism).

A lapel badge: "The more men I meet, the more I like my dog."

Anna Raeburn, counsellor: "I regard men as a pleasant pastime but no more dependable than the British weather."

Jane Fonda: "I still believe that women are the superior sex."

Margaret Thatcher: "Of course, women are better…"

Julie Burchill writing in Time Out: "A good part — and definitely the most fun part — of being a feminist is about frightening men. American and Australian feminists have always know this, and absorbed it cheerfully into their act; one thinks of Shere Hite julienning men on phone-in shows, or Dale Spender telling us that a good feminist is rude to a man at least three times a day on principle. Of course, there's a lot more to feminism… but scaring the shit out of the scumbags is an amusing and necessary part because, sadly, a good many men still respect nothing but strength."

Jonathan Miller, speaking to The Times: "Men don't get on well with each other, they don't have standards of intimacy, so they exchange jokes."

Janet Daley, a columnist in The Independent: "The standard western adult male is rendered incapable of being comfortable with emotional expression being quite incapable of understanding what it is like to be someone else."

Caroline Jenkins, a correspondent writing in the letters page of the Radio Times: "Mothers bring children into the world and mothers bring them up. Fathers mostly sit about on their behinds watching television while mothers feed the kids, bathe the kids, play with the kids, tell the kids bedtime stories and generally wear themselves out. Most fathers can't be bothered to spend more than an hour with their kids until they have grown up or until their exhausted wives see the light and divorce them."

Yoko Ono: "I wonder why men can get serious at all. They have this delicate long thing hanging outside their bodies which goes up and down by its own will … Humour is probably something the male of the species discovered through his own anatomy."

A character in Erica Jong's novel, Any Woman's Blues: "Maleness is wonderful, really, isn't it, honey? Perfect denial of reality."

This list could be expanded infinitely; but the work is so dreary and the attitudes expressed are so depressing that I hope we can say that these examples are sufficient.

The language of intolerance, passively or actively colour with every shade of dislike, ridicule and contempt, has been so thoroughly absorbed into the cells of our national diction that, as a way of talking about men, it has become a semi-automatic function of our national character.

Even more striking, in a way, is the universal sanction given to this language of prejudice. Nobody complains. Perhaps men have become so used to being put down that they have grown to think they deserve it.

And yet… if you alter the specific vocabulary of those specimen lines you get the full strength of their intolerance. If you switch the terms you see that those declarations emerge from a general prejudice which — like all racist or nationalist prejudices — depends upon the presumption that everybody who shares a common origin shares a common classification of type and moral character. If, to take Julie Burchill's lines, you substitute the word "Nazi" for the word "feminists" and the word "Jew" for the word "man", you get (without much dickering) language that might have brought a stammer to the lips of Julius Streicher.

"A good part — and definitely the most fun part — of being a Nazi is about frightening Jews. German and Austrian Nazis have always know this, and absorbed it cheerfully into their act; one thinks of Ernst Rohm julienning Jews in the ghettos, or Goebbels telling us that a good Nazi is rude to a Jew at least three times a day on principle. Of course, there's a lot more to Nazism… but scaring the shit out of the scumbags is an amusing and necessary part because, sadly, a good many Jews still respect nothing but strength."

I am not saying that feminism is Nazism. I am saying that the language of vulgar intolerance is readily transportable.

Margaret Thatcher's line about the natural superiority of women may not be as grotesque as the thoughts of Camp Master Burchill; but, with a flick of the terms, you can see that her attitude is also rooted in prejudice. If she had said, "Of course, white-skinned people are better than black-skinned people…" she would have not lasted another day in office.

A producer of popular novelties might expect to be fatwah'd if he distributed a badge which said, "The more women I meet, the more I like my dog." Robert Redford would certainly be finished if he said that men were the superior sex. If an Agony Uncle said, "I regard women as a pleasant pastime but no more dependable than the British weather," the furies would descend upon him.

It is very unusual, these days, to hear a man under 50 say anything mildly derogatory about women in a general way. The old stanchions of prejudice have gone to rust. I have not heard younger men moan, as our fathers did, about women's driving, or their lack of punctuality. I can hardly imagine that any man under 50 would say what men commonly said 50 years ago — that women were "born liars." Men's habits of speech and thought about women have very largely changed in the last 20 years. I don't know any man who would deplore the change.

Meanwhile, everybody knows and understands that it's socially OK to be contemptuous about men in general. Nobody is going to kick Jonathan Miller's shins under the table when he elegantly opines that men "don't have standards of intimacy" with each other — though self-respecting men might seize him by his casual platitudes and bellow in his face, "Speak for yourself, brother."

How did it happen that the language of gormless intolerance became so routine a feature of our national diction? What, for instance, would cause or allow a world-famous writer to speak so idiotically as to say that men hate women (as if all men hate all women; as if all men belonged by birth to a kind of natural Ku Klux Klan of woman-burners; as if — in opposition to the evidence of what they say and do, write, sing and dream — men only hate women and do not love them, do not want to love them)?

Why would a highly-educated woman I know choose to say that "All men are Idi Amin" (are all women Myra Hindley?) when you could just as well say — with equal logic — "All men are Jesus Christ"?

Where, you might say, do these people get off with such claptrap? How have they got away with it? Where did it start and when will it end?

* * *

Something ruinous and evil has happened between men and women in the last 25 years, something so wounding and sore that it's hard to see how the damage can be repaired while we live, hard to see how the last generations of this century can come of age unafflicted by the ills of the past.

As far as I can see, general intolerance towards men got started as a respectable attitude in some of the earliest and most influential feminist writings of the late Sixties and early Seventies.

Seeing that women were oppressed — legally, materially, biologically, by custom and habit — the ideologists of what was called the "new feminism" portrayed men as a group and man as an individual in the role of oppressor. It follows that women should feel licensed, even obliged, to speak and think of men with whatever immoderation and spite they fancied.

The claim that women were oppressed as a class by men as a class emerged early in the Women's Liberation movement. The idea was vital to the status of the movement as an authentic and respectable element in the left wing of the time and in ideological canons of what was then called the New Left.

A characteristic expression of that point of view is this, from Policing Domestic Violence by Susan Edwards (1989): "…it is the precise juncture of bourgeois and male interest which constitutes the corner-stone of women's experience and corresponding oppression."

Within that New Left, it was not enough to say that women in the west were suffering under the weight of a mass of serious disadvantages, as they were. Nobody listened; nobody cared. The women who made the complaint were told to hold their pretty little tongues, roll another joint and let the men get on with their work liberating the universities, the working classes, the blacks and the Vietnamese. The women grew exasperated and restless.

It was not enough for them to point out that, by the terms of the social order which existed before the invention of the Pill, women were restricted educationally and economically and confined to a domestic ghetto; that they were expected to look appealing according to a wearisome ideal of femininity and that they were expected to be sexually obliging to men and to keep their mouths shut.

It was not enough to say that the introduction of infallible contraception had fundamentally altered the conditions of women, requiring them to enter the world and the jobs market outside the family home. All of this was true; none of it was taken seriously.

The women of the New Left who ventured these complaints felt compelled to go further. They had to cement their grievances into an ideological edifice — without which their complaints would carry no weight in the same New Left.

They, especially the new feminists of the USA, came up with the proposition that women were subjugated by men as a function not only of the capitalist state but, even, of imperialism.

That did it. That got everybody's attention. If imperialism was to blame, who could argue? Who could deny that the man who tied the woman down with apron strings and suspender belts was the same man who tied down the Viet Cong with napalm and carpet bombing? It was the perfect cat's cradle of logic. Man — the oppressor — could neither reply to the accusation nor argue against it since it was a sine qua non that his arguments would be self-exculpatory and would tend to reinforce the power of his subjugation.

The man who snored beside you in bed at night was as much your oppressor, in a class sense, as Richard Nixon. Your man's sexual demands or failing and his dirty socks dropped upon the bathroom floor were as much a function of male oppression, in a class sense (can you get your head round this?) as the smoking carbines of My Lai.

In a class sense, every man was Lieut Calley. That didn't mean that he, personally, was to blame (he was no more than a class operative, historically speaking): it did mean, however, that couldn't be blamed if you were nasty to him. Get it?

For want of a better framework of analysis and despite its shaky basis in reason and fact, this pseudo-Marxist approach passed thoroughly into the roots of modern feminism. It became axiomatic that women, as a class, were oppressed by men, as a class, and that a state of war existed between them.

"Men are the enemy," Germaine Greer wrote in February 1970. "They know it — at least they know that there is a sex war on, an unusually cold one." And "The only genetic superiority men have is their capacity for violence…"

The pseudo-Marxist axioms of the new feminists quickly spread in debased forms into common speech. It became permissible for women to say anything nasty they liked about men and — since each individual man had to acknowledge that he was a foot soldier in the army of an oppressive class — men were entitled to say nothing in reply. By the mid-Seventies a woman could say, “All men are bastards,” and, lo! the eternal moan of the unhappy and intolerant woman had become a quasi-revolutionary declaration, which nobody could deny. By extension of this totalitarian logic, it even became permissible for a woman to declare that all men were, by nature, rapists.

In 1973, for example, Germaine Greer wrote an essay about rape in which she said: “Nevertheless, men do go to jail for rape, mostly black men, nearly all of them poor, and neither the judges nor the prosecuting attorneys are hampered in their dealings by the awareness that they are rapists too, only they have more sophisticated methods of compulsion.”

(These “more sophisticated methods” did not seem to be exclusively masculine in nature. Germaine Greer explained that “Probably the commonest form of non-criminal rape is rape by fraud — by phony tenderness or false promises of an enduring relationship, for example.” By those criteria, there can’t be many sexually active adults of either sex alive who have not been the victims of “non-criminal rape”.)

If it was legitimate to say that all men are oppressors, then why should it be disreputable to say that they are all rapists? Or all child molesters? Idi Amin? You could say men lacked standards of intimacy with each other; or you could say men were emotionally retarded, unable to imagine themselves as somebody else. You could say fathers sit on their arses watching television and neglecting their children. Any old generalised claptrap became — and remains — acceptable.

The ideological connections between modern feminism and the New Left have been widely identified and recorded in feminist histories of the last quarter century. However, the idea that the imposition by feminists of a pseudo-Marxist analysis on the character of masculinity had led to and legitimised a universal intolerance is, I reckon, less familiar.

Because it has become an axiom of our time that all men are the same by nature, it must follow that all men will always remain the same: none of them can ever change. This point of view, transparently nonsensical as it is, has given respectability to the intolerant ways of thought and habits of speech we meet all the time. See the sample which begin this article.

It is a piquant paradox to find Jane Fonda, Margaret Thatcher and Julie Burchill all sharing conservative attitudes which emerge from the contortions of a mutant Marxism, but there it is — and there they are.

* * *

As long as women are seen collectively as the victims of oppression, it will be assumed that women, uniquely, suffer serious disadvantages; and it will be thought that men, the oppressors, are somehow the beneficiaries of the oppressive system. As long as this attitude hows sway, no attention will be given to putting things right between men and women; and to correcting the disadvantages men suffer.

Apart from the monstrously insulting discrimination they suffer in the established churches and the fact that they cannot receive hereditary peerages in their own names, it is hard to think of one example of systemic and institutionalised discrimination against women in Britain today. When I telephoned the press bureau of the Equal Opportunities Commission, an official there agreed that it was hard to think of any glaring examples. After a long moment's thought she said that part-time workers, many of them women, fall outside the protection of the Equal Pay legislation. She said that she would call me back when she had thought of some more examples. She never called.

The disadvantages women actually suffer today seem to be informal, proceeding not from institutionalised principle but from general practice and custom. They are hard to pin down and almost impossible to legislate out of existence.

It is true that many women do get paid less than men for the same work; but the practice actually illegal and cannot be called systemic. In many professions (the law, politics, the police, perhaps the armed services) it is obvious that women face deep prejudice. On the other hand, it begins to appear that in some occupations (most obviously in the media and, perhaps, in education) women are at an advantage over men in getting jobs and securing advancement.

The fears and embarrassments of young women who have to walk in the streets or travel alone on public transport are readily imagined; and it is easy to sympathise with young women who constantly have to fight off uninvited passes from sexually aggressive men. But it is impossible to frame any form of legislation which could effectively outlaw this kind of behaviour.

Meanwhile, men are suffering from systemic disadvantages which are readily identifiable but which tend to get overlooked in isolation and have never, so far as I know, been placed together to represent a body of grievous, institutionalised discrimination.

To list some of these points:

- The inequitable state pension arrangements that allow women to retire at 60 or 65 but which prevent men from retiring before 65 without financial penalty.
- The routine preponderance of divorce court orders made in favour of women for the custody of children in divorce approximately five times as often as the court makes an award of joint custody, about 10 times as often as custody is awarded to men.
- The consistently inequitable granting of maintenance orders against men, in favour of women.
- The neglect of men's physiology as a subject for medical research and the consistently primitive barbarities of treatment.
- The routine assumption in our legislature and in our courts that men are naturally violent towards women and children and that women are not violent towards men and children.
- The inequitable division of state benefits and rights of leave from work following a baby's birth. Fathers who want to take an active role in a baby's life are actively discouraged.

- The refusal of the social services to allow a man the status of a dependent for the sake of benefit payment.

Any of these points can be amplified; but let's just take the question of medical research into men's illnesses. Nobody ever says that men get a terrible deal from the medical establishment yet…

Statistics can be made to support more than one interpretation, but it is a shock to most people to discover that deaths in England and Wales from cancers of the genito-urinary organs of men exceed the number of deaths from cancers of the genito-urinary organs of women (12,742 men in 1989; 10,200 women). Cancer of the prostate kills many more men (7861) than there are deaths among women from cancer of the cervix (1820) and cancer of the uterus (1444). Some leading British authorities seriously doubt that a screening programme for prostate cancer would be useful, but the United States a major effort has just begun.

"Relatives and doctors in this country haven't made much fuss about these figures," said Ewan Milroy, consultant urologist at the Middlesex Hospital, "because in my 30 to 40 years' experience there simply hasn't been any public demand for attention to be given to men's problems. Part of the reason is that the vast majority of these male patients are elderly.

"The medical profession in the States would not agree with this attitude. They would say that, with such enormously increased life expectancies, there's a lot you can do by screening and health education campaigns."

The general presumption and prejudices of our time about the health of men are the exact opposite of the truth. Again, to find the truth turned most precisely on its head, it is most convenient to turn to Germaine Greer.

In her 1970 essay on The Politics of Female Sexuality, Germaine Greer said, "Whereas the penis is taken seriously, especially when it is clear that the origin of a patient's complaint is essentially inorganic, cunt is treated as a crude mechanism, apt to function badly for long periods without any significant consequence … If women are to reconquer their sexual pride they must find a way to make cunt as important in medicine as cock is."

Greer gave a voice to an assumption which was and remains axiomatic in the modern feminist movement and has widely penetrated the lingua franca of our time: that the sexual physiology of women was subject to institutionalised neglect.

The truth is exactly the opposite to Germaine Greer's prejudice. The penis is not taken seriously. It is treated as a crude mechanism. It is not remotely as important in medicine as a women's sexual organs. It is, in fact, the subject of institutionalised neglect. It is despised. (See the thoughts of Yoko Ono, above.)

"Most urologists would agree [that men's problems are ignored]," said Mr. Milroy, "and I think we all resent it. It is very difficult to get money for research into prostate cancer whereas it is relatively easy for research into carcinomas of breast or cervix, simply because they are much more fashionable."

Less is known about the exact causes and cures of male infertility than is known about the remotest quasar. "It remains a subject surrounded by the profoundest ignorance," said another specialist, who did not want to be named. "It's perfectly fair to say that it's the Cinderella subject of medical science."

The image of the brutal and rude gynaecological examination of women by male doctors became one the most graphically horrible and persuasive pictures drawn by the modern feminist movement. The routine humiliation of women, their legs slung apart in stirrups, their faces hidden, their sensitivities ignored and their modesty outraged, became an analogue of the treatment of all women by all men and seemed to be a perfect example women's peculiar misery, the perfect justification for their rage.

As Germaine Greer wrote: "Any woman can recount her own horror story of a doctor's failure to examine her properly, of his brutal use of the crude and cold speculum, screwing the tender membranes of the perineum, shocking her cervix with the smear swab."

Men, it seemed to follow, couldn't answer that: they had no experience to match the degradations women suffered.

Not true: ask any man who has undergone investigations into his own fertility. Ask one who has knelt with his trousers and underpants round his ankles and his bum in the air while a doctor and a student discussed his case without including him; one of whom, casually and without warning stuck a thermometer into the patient's rectum. Ask any man who has submitted to a prostate examination and felt a plastic gloved hand enter and seize him as if he was a shot bird about to be drawn of its entrails.

Ask any man who has been confronted with the evidence of his own sterility — being shown a microscope slide of feeble sperm and hearing a doctor say: "It's as barren as the face of the moon, isn't it?" Or "I'm not saying you won't have children but it's about as likely as that you could run non-stop from London to Oxford."

Try telling those men that it's their world.

So what?

Why does it matter if women speak nastily about men? After centuries of oppression, aren't the ladies entitled to be a bit crabby? Aren't these points simply the reactionary moans and twitches of bitter men who resent feeling that the inborn supremacy of their sex has been reduced?

It wouldn't matter very much if the intolerance voiced about men and the disadvantages they suffer were simply an undignified blot on our conduct sheet. Discourtesy is not a major offence; vulgar prejudices are held among the ineradicable habits of a public mind. The reason it matters is because sympathy, understanding and co-operation between men and women are essential if humane and reasonable arrangements are going to be made for the care of children.

The most serious and taxing social problem for us is the question: who brings up the baby and who brings home the bacon? On this question our society has come up miserably short; and the answers we give ourselves are cruelly hard on both men and women.

The position of working parents is deplorable, sad and shocking. The strains upon them are intolerable. As a mark of our failure to achieve sympathetic and loving arrangement for ourselves and our children it is painful beyond measure that working parents should rarely see their children and that a mass of infants should be consigned to the care of more or less trained, more or less professionals (usually punishingly underpaid young women).

Early writers among the new feminists were fond of quoting Engels' remark, "The modern individual family is founded on the open or concealed slavery of the wife … Within the family, he is the bourgeois and she represents the proletariat." If we wanted to revise that remark today, we would have to say that the modern middle-class family is founded not on the slavery of the wife but on the slavery of a mass of poorly paid, unskilled, most un-unionised, mostly propertyless supporters and auxiliaries — from baby-minders to play-school leaders, from domestic cleaning women to school teachers, from grandparents to kindly neighbours. Most of them are women and they constitute a lumpen group within the underclass. But the exploitation they suffer is not the exploitation of women as a class, except to the extent that young men don't usually do this work, neither being invited nor considering it preferable to unemployment.

They are exploited not by reason of their gender but because of their economic powerlessness. Within today's modern family the parents (earning mothers and fathers) are the bourgeoisie and the nanny is the proletariat. In those millions of households where a single woman is caring for children, the state is father. Within this system of arrangements nobody is likely to be happy — not the men, not the women, not the children, not the slaves, not the state.

Men are, in increasing numbers and at vast cost to the tax-payer, leaving the responsibilities of fatherhood to the state. Between 1981 and 1988 the number of one-parent families claiming benefit from the DSS rose by 86 per cent. During the same period the proportion of one-parent families on benefit who were also receiving maintenance fell from 50 per cent to 23 per cent. The income support bill for single parents in 1988-89 was £1.85 billion and £3.6 billion was spent on social security benefits for single-parent families.

Contempt and discrimination towards men are not the only reasons why millions of children are being brought up by auxiliaries and millions more are being fathered by the state; but the prevailing attitude towards men is a powerful factor in the crisis in child care in our country.

If men are regarded with contempt they will, of course, not be given an honoured place in our legislation or in our courts, in our homes or in our families. We will not feel obliged to adjust our laws and our practices to take account of men's needs or of the benefits they can bring to home and family. If men are seen as being useless, inferior, "as dependable as the British weather," worse than a dog, it will be natural to see them as drones. It will be natural for them to leave their children to the care of single women and the state.

If ever there was a case for the government to use its massive powers to effect some "social engineering" it is here and now. The general position of men and the attitudes commonly held towards them can be significantly altered by legislation.

For instance, the government is eager to extend tax benefits to single working mothers who employ child-minders; but it has done nothing to encourage men and women to share the work of caring for their own children. Cash allowances, tax breaks for employers and incentives for employees would make an inestimable difference if they were offered to men who wanted months off work to be with their new-born babies; or who wanted flexible hours of working to bear their share of child care; or who wanted to share a job with the mother of their children.

We are happy, in this country, to spend millions on pursuing fathers who default on maintenance payments; but we give no encouragement or honour to men who want to stay at home and look after their children. Such men are treated as freaks and wimps by employers and peers.

Modern feminists are right to say that most men still suppose that they are entitled to a working life unencumbered by domestic responsibilities, especially those of childcare. But of course this will continue to be the predominant attitude so long as it is reinforced in every department of our social life: so long as the courts, far from imposing domestic responsibilities on divorcing fathers, actually deny them to fathers who seek them, so long as employers expect employees to choose between their families and their jobs.

If relations between men, women and children are to improve, attitudes to men and manhood must change. It wouldn't be a bad start if men caused to be the butt of casual prejudice expressed in half-witted habits of speech. But the most important job our legislators face must be to remove some of the systemic disadvantages of life for men to improve their position within the family and within society at large. There is one sense in which men, as a group and a whole, can be described as a class in Britain: in a host of vital ways they second class citizens.

Study links aggressive boys to Mom's behavior

February 1, 2013 | by Kristina Hansen | Link | Original Link

"Boys will be boys" – Everyone is familiar with that old saying when describing boys and their tendency to display rough and tumble or aggressive behavior. It's also said when implying that it's not surprising when boys or men behave in a noisy, rude, irresponsible, or unpleasant way.

Let us assume, just for the sake of this discussion, that male tendencies toward aggression are a negative, rather than a long standing necessity for species survival without which humanity would have been a dead end biological experiment. Many people have asserted that genetics have had a large part to play in a boy's testosterone levels, which is primarily blamed for their tendency to display more aggression and dominance than girls.

But what would happen if it were revealed that it was not actually genetics, but rather mom's behavior that contributed to their boy's testosterone fueled propensity toward aggression and dominance?

I can already hear heads exploding over in the feminist camp where they have long claimed that it's the fault of boys and men for their own aggression and domineering behavior. If women were in complete control of the world, men would be kinder, gentler, and less aggressive.

Feminist Carol Gilligan is a well-known example. She insists that boys need to be protected from "the culture" – a culture in which "manhood valorizes war and the economy of capitalism, a culture that desensitizes boys and, by submerging their humanity, is the root cause of out-of-control and out-of-touch behavior and is the ultimate source of war and other violence committed by men."

Of course none of her claims are ever backed up by any scientifically verifiable or empirical data, but now new scientific data shows that such feminist "theories" are complete crap.

An article by the University of Montreal details "studies in human and animal models for over the past 50 years [that] have confirmed an association between aggression, dominance and testosterone in adolescence."

"The question is, when does that association start?" This was the question posed by Dr. Richard E. Tremblay, whose research team looked at newborn babies of both sexes.

U of M researchers were able to establish that testosterone levels in infancy are in fact not inherited genetically. This was achieved by comparing the testosterone levels of 314 five-month old pairs of twins, both identical and fraternal.

Researchers took samples of saliva from the 314 pairs of 5 month old twins and measured their levels of testosterone. They then compared the similarity in testosterone levels between identical and fraternal twins to determine the contribution of both the genetic and environmental factors. By comparing the testosterone levels of the five-month old pairs of twins, both identical and non-identical, researchers were able to establish that testosterone levels in infancy are “not inherited genetically but rather determined by environmental factors.”

Lead author Tremblay of the university’s Research Unit on Children’s Psychosocial Maladjustment said,

> Testosterone is a key hormone for the development of male reproductive organs, and it is also associated with behavioral traits, such as sexual behavior and aggression. – Our study is the largest to be undertaken with newborns, and our results contrast with the findings gained by scientists working with adolescents and adults, indicating that testosterone levels are inherited.

Dr. Tremblay explained that “if testosterone levels are genetically determined, then the identical twins would be more alike than the fraternal twins.”

The findings from the study were presented in an article published in Psychoneuroendocrinology on May 7, 2012.

Tremblay indicated that “the study was not designed to specifically identify these environmental factors, which could include a variety of environmental conditions, such as maternal diet, maternal smoking, breastfeeding and parent-child interactions – Because our study suggests that testosterone levels in infants are determined by the circumstances in which the child develops before and after birth, further studies will be needed to find out exactly what these influencing factors are and to what extent they change from birth to puberty.”

“Not that researchers are blaming mothers,” Dr. Tremblay said, “but it is a fact of nature that a child’s early environment (pregnancy and after birth) is closely related to maternal behavior.”

Feminists are not going to like the results of this research at all. It proves that a boy’s testosterone levels, which are said to be associated with aggression, sexual behavior, and dominance is not inherited genetically, but rather determined by environmental factors, mostly early environmental factors which the child experiences in relation to its mother both before and after birth.

So much for the old saying “boys will be boys.” Boys will be what mom’s behavior dictates in their early environment. If you’re going to blame the boys for their aggressive and antisocial behavior, it now seems that you’re going to have to blame their mothers as well.

Happy Saint Vagina Day

February 2, 2013 | by Greg Canning | Link | Original Link

V Day is the brainchild of Eve Ensler, creator of the Vagina Monologues, the pornographic presentation that applauds all things vagina and lesbian including celebrating pedophilia by claiming in relation to the rape of a 13-year-old girl by an older woman:

"If it was rape, it was a good rape."

Ensler believes Feb 14, traditionally St Valentines Day, a day to celebrate love and romantic relationships between the sexes (or between intimate partners) is better used to spread false feminist, imperialist propaganda about men's violence toward women and girls.

Readers will be aware of the issue creep occurring in the flagship feminist grievance industry of "Gendered Violence." Violence against women became, "men's violence against women" courtesy of the White Ribbon Campaign (too bad for the approximately 50% of lesbians who suffer violence at the hands of their intimate partner).

In Australia in 2008, then Prime Minister Kevin Rudd with EMILY's List graduate and Minister for the Status of Women, Tanya Plibersek, set up the "National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children" who later produced the now notorious "plan" of the same name.

Ensler and her ilk realise that "children" is a sex inclusive term and that action to redress violence against boys does not fit the gendered violence paradigm.

The Mission of V-Day is: "To end violence against women and girls worldwide." Too bad men, the majority of victims of violence globally and too bad male babies, infants and children you now because they possess a y chromosome are also unworthy of any human concern from feminist gender ideologues. However these little boys, considered potential future rapists, apparently still have some utility for feminists by holding signs shaming and blaming men.

Not only are male children excluded from current efforts to address the global burden of violence but the United Nations femocracy (AKA UNIFEM) has invented a new factoid: "One In Three Women On The Planet Will Be Raped Or Beaten In Her Lifetime." I say invented because UNIFEM cite no source for the statistic and have not responded to written requests to cite the source this and other claims. Indeed the UNIFEM website contains a plethora of cherry picked unreferenced claims.

By extrapolation of this "lifetime" figure, Ensler projects that one billion (1,000,000,000) women on planet earth have been raped or beaten, hence this years V Day theme of OneBillionRising proposing that all women "strike, rise and dance" in revolution to end "rape culture."

Conflating trivial acts of interpersonal violence reported in community surveys (a threating look, unkind word or push) with being "raped and beaten" is bread and butter feminist dishonesty. Some feminists even claim that a man's gaze is enough to rape a woman without any need for physical contact whilst others see every instance of heterosexual intercourse as acts of rape. Blending data form other countries/cultures racked by war, famine or other civil strife with that of western liberal democracies by such gender ideologies leads to rape hysteria not rape culture.

The feminist focus remains on division by sex rather than unity of purpose in addressing all human suffering buy continuing to acknowledge only women's experience of violence as worthy of remediation.

Ensler has nurtured and propagated such a divisive stance (common to all prominent lesbian feminists) with her anti male, anti-heterosexual rhetoric over many years, and as part of the OneBillionRising campaign has released on YouTube a video titled "Man Prayer" – words by Eve Ensler, film by Tony Stroebel

The sexist bias and negative male stereotyping in this "prayer" is clear along with the message to the evil male half of the population should, hate yourselves, hate masculinity, become more like women the only humans capable of love, and love women the only humans deserving of love.

The anti-male theme continues on the V-Day Facebook page with a graphic that reads as follows:

> People riot the same way they orgasm. This is why riots of men end as soon as they begin and never really accomplish anything. Women's riot will be an ever-expanding, multiple, only-accumulating rebellion that will shatter this paradigm forever.

Is trivialization and misrepresentation of male sexuality a legitimate tool for promoting tolerance and non-violence? I think not, just another message of hate.

Facebook hosts many pages where radical feminists like Ensler can easily spread their message of hate with impunity. Cathy Brennan is a prominent Maryland Attorney and outspoken radical feminist with a particular disdain for male to female transsexuals and links to the hate site RadfemHub. Brennan's public Facebook page features a profile image of a mans face, the background is a series of words;

RAPE PORNOGRAPHY STABBINGS TORTURE HUMAN TRAFFICKING SHOOTINGS ASSAULT GENOCIDE ABDUCTION STALKING GANG RAPE CHILD ABUSE MURDER STREET HARASSMENT WAR PROSTITUTION

Followed by the subtext

VIOLENCE HAS A MAN'S FACE: NAME THE PROBLEM

Brennan is also associated with a Facebook hate page and website titled Name the Problem.

Described as an "education website" the Facebook page about section reads;

> Whether male violence is due to masculine gender socialization or male biology, we cannot answer these questions if we continue to avoid this discussion. We cannot fix a problem that we refuse to name. Name it. Say it with us: Male violence.

According to Brennan the fact that a small percentage of men are violent means all men must be labelled and stigmatised as violent, whilst the small percentage of women who are violent are held not to exist. Ignored also is the evidence that women's involvement in raising boys and feminist's policy of exclusion of fathers from the upbringing of children contributes to increased likelihood of violence in both sexes.

The effects of these feminist influences are now clearly being seen in the most "gender equal" societies, western liberal democracies where following 50 years of feminist governance and Duluth inspired anti DV Laws – surveys of dating violence in young people routinely find parity or a female preponderance of those initiating violence.

For example one study of 5000 Australian teens found one in three females and males say they have experienced at least one type of physically violent behavior from a girlfriend or boyfriend – this includes kids as young as 12. Murray Straus also found symmetry in perpetration of IPV involving dating relationships in college students in a large-scale multinational study.

In another large longitudinal study in the US involving almost 6000 students and published in the journal Pediatrics this month, researchers found that girls were more likely to perpetrate violence than boys, but girls were more likely to be the victims of sexual violence or incur injuries. Furthermore both genders considered female to male violence as less serious than male to female violence.

Brennan is a partner the legal firm Hudson Cook, LLP and member of a number of professional and Bar Associations. Professional firms and associations have codes of conduct and ethical practice, and there are Federal and State Anti-discrimination laws. I wondered how those in her firm and the associations of which she is a member would perceive this display of gender intolerance and hate? So I wrote to them and asked.

No official response yet but an anonymous email arrived in my Clinic's shared email box yesterday.

It reads:

I read your diatribe against Cathy Brennan.

Why are you not even remotely concerned that everything that she writes about men is true? Pure reason demands that changing male violence would be a far, far better place to exert your energies. You might want to try that.

Consider that.

To me pure reason in understanding violence would dictate that one takes an holistic, nuanced and gender inclusive approach to what is a complex multifactorial problem of humans, men and women and the circumstances in which they find themselves.

Labelling or naming if you prefer an entire group on the basis of the characteristics of a few of its members is by definition bigotry and the root cause of racism, sexism, anti-Semitism etc. It is also fundamental to feminism a movement that aims to achieve female supremacy. This is why they guard and propagate this lie about men as a group so fiercely.

SAVE calls on Hancock County to remove Kellett

February 2, 2013 | by S.A.V.E. | Link | Original Link

PRESS RELEASE

Contact: Teri Stoddard
Phone: 301-801-0608
Email: tstoddard@saveservices.org

Assistant District Attorney Continues to Prosecute Cases Despite Suspension Recommendation:

SAVE Calls on Hancock County Commissioners to Take Action

WASHINGTON / February 1, 2013 – Following the recommendation of a panel to suspend the law license of Hancock County prosecutor Mary N. Kellett, Stop Abusive and Violent Environments (SAVE) is calling on Hancock County Commissioners to exercise its duty to protect the public by immediately removing Kellett from her prosecutorial duties.

In 2007, Vladek Filler filed for divorce from Ligia Filler, eventually winning sole custody of their three children. Assistant District Attorney Mary Kellett became involved in the case because of Ms. Filler's allegations of domestic violence.

Kellett's conduct in the case prompted Mr. Filler's attorney to assert that Kellett ignored exculpatory forensic evidence, Mrs. Filler's recorded admissions, and her documented child abuse, thus using her prosecutorial powers to improperly take sides in a custody dispute.

Following allegations of prosecutorial misconduct, the Maine Supreme Judicial Court heard the case. In 2010 the Court concluded that Filler's constitutional right to a fair trial was violated by Kellett's actions and remanded the case for a retrial.

On March 29, 2011, Stop Abusive and Violent Environments filed a Grievance Complaint with the Board of Overseers of the Bar, detailing numerous examples of improper and unethical conduct by ADA Kellett.

Following a public disciplinary hearing in December 2012, a Panel of the Board of Overseers of the Bar issued a unanimous decision for the suspension of Kellett's license for "conduct unworthy of an attorney." The panel ruled Kellett violated seven Bar rules including undermining the administration of justice, withholding and suppressing exculpatory evidence, violating a court order, and misleading the jury:

http://www.maine.gov/tools/whatsnew/index.php?topic=mebar_overseers_discipline&id=464815&v=article

Despite court decisions, a two-year investigation by the Board of Overseers of the Bar, and a recommendation for the suspension of her license, Kellett has been allowed to continue her normal prosecutorial duties. Pending a final determination by the Maine Supreme Judicial Court, SAVE is calling on the County Commissioners to promptly remove Kellett from her prosecutorial role.

♦♦♦

Meet the County Commissioners:

- Steven E. Joy -District 1
- Percy L. Brown, Jr. – District 2
- Antonio Blasi – District 3

Per M.R.S.A. Title 30-A Section 102: The county commissioners have final authority over the operation of all county offices by elected or appointed county officials, except in circumstances for which a County Personnel Board has been established under subchapter VII, article 2-1 with the powers and duties set forth in that article and in section 501. The county commissioners must act as a board and not on an individual basis in exercising their authority.

Per M.R.S.A. Title 30-A Section 101: Commissioner's duties:

The commissioners of each county shall.

1. Receipts and expenditures. Examine, allow and settle accounts of the money of the county;

2. Representation Represent the county;

3. Manage property and business. Care for its property and manage its business;

4. Convey real estate. By a recorded order, appoint an agent to convey its real estate;

5. County ways. Lay out, alter or discontinue ways;

6. Keep books and accounts. Keep their books and accounts on forms and in a manner approved by the Department of Audit;

6-A. Adopt ethics policy. In their discretion, the county commissioners may adopt an ethics policy governing the conduct of elected and appointed county officials;

7. Other duties. Perform all other duties required by the law.

♦♦♦

AVfM Publisher's note: Gents and ladies, we still do not have a date for when Vladek Filler's case against Mary Kellett goes before the State Supreme Court. Thus far, DA Carletta Bassano has failed to protect public interest by relieving Kellett of her duties till the court makes a determination about the very serious charges against her. Please join us in contacting the Country Commissioners and politely reminding them that they have the authority, and given Carletta Bassano's negligence, the duty to remove Mary Kellett from the prosecutors office until a ruling has been issued on her case by the State Supreme Court. Thank you. PE

Fighting feminism – let’s get political

February 3, 2013 | by Mike Buchanan | Link | Original Link

[quote]Difficulties are meant to rouse, not discourage. The human spirit is to grow strong by conflict. ~ William Ellery Channing (1780 – 1842) American Unitarian preacher[/quote]

Two months ago I wrote an article for AVfM titled, ‘Fighting feminism – let’s get practical’. It was a call to MRAs to start fighting the manifestations of feminism on an issue-by-issue basis:

http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/activism/fighting-feminism-lets-get-practical/

At that time I’d worked full-time for eight months for Campaign for Merit in Business, an organisation I founded early in 2012. We campaign against the government’s initiative to force major companies (through the threat of legislated gender quotas) to increase gender diversity in the boardroom (‘GDITB’) because the independent evidence shows that the consequence will be a decline in corporate financial performance. A decline in performance is largely attributable to the enduring reality that the pool of women qualified for corporate boards is shallower that the pool of qualified men. Driving up the number of women on boards inevitably means driving more poorly-qualified people onto boards. Our briefing paper on the matter:

http://c4mb.wordpress.com/improving-gender-diversity-on-boards-leads-to-a-decline-in-corporate-performance-the-evidence/

So, what has our campaign achieved? We’ve succeeded in stopping prominent advocates of GDITB publicly claiming that one consequence of GDITB will be enhanced corporate performance. Those advocates include numerous politicians, including the very left-wing Business Secretary, Vince Cable. We’ve contributed to House of Lords and House of Commons inquiries, and enjoyed some national newspaper coverage of our campaign. But we’ve yet to persuade a single government minister – in a Conservative-led coalition – to meet with us, or to engage with our arguments.

The House of Commons inquiry report is forthcoming, but the House of Lords report was published in November 2012. Despite our providing compelling evidence showing that GDITB leads to declines in corporate performance, the report included the following statement:

> It should be stressed that we reject any suggestion that improved diversity would be to the detriment of company performance, as was argued in some submissions we received.

I wrote to the chair of the committee, the Conservative peer Baroness O’Cathain, asking for the basis on which our evidence had been rejected. She failed to answer that simple query. In December, after dwelling on this matter for some time, I had a ‘light bulb moment'. What can you do when the democratic process fails, when politicians fail to adjust policies in line with compelling evidence? With the question framed in that way, the answer was blindingly obvious. You form a political party and fight marginal seats, winning enough votes so that some politicians lose their comfortable livelihoods. Then the main political parties may start to compete for men's votes, by promising to end anti-male legislation and initiatives.

Along with a number of supporters I'm currently engaged in registering that new political party, which I shall personally lead, and I can now exclusively reveal its name on AVfM:

Justice for Men and Boys

(and the women who love them)

We plan to raise public consciousness of the discriminations faced by men and boys in many areas, including:

Education

A feminised education system ensures that 60% of undergraduates are female.

Healthcare provision

As many men die from prostate cancer as women die from breast cancer, yet the state spends less than half the amount of money on early diagnosis of the former as it spends on the latter.

The workplace

Nearly two-thirds of public sector employees are women, yet the Equality Act (2010) enables public sector bodies to favor women in their recruitment processes.

Unemployment

For every three women who are registered as unemployed (1.08 million), four men are (1.44 million).

The justice system

When convicted for the same crimes as women, men face higher rates of incarceration and stiffer sentences.

Paternity fraud

It's estimated that for 10% – 30% of births, the man who's been led to believe he's the father of the child has been misled.

Personal enrichment through divorce

In an era where women have the same employment opportunities as men, this is clearly unjust. Enrichment through divorce almost invariably favors women, since women rarely risk their personal fortunes by marrying poorer men.

Domestic violence

It’s long been known that female-on-male DV is as common as male-on-female DV, yet the provision of resources for male victims is miniscule compared to that for female victims.

Parental access to children following relationship breakdowns

The justice system continues to fail to enforce contact orders.

Homelessness

Almost exclusively a problem for men.

Retirement age

On average men live shorter lives than women, yet have to wait longer for their state pension.

In the UK the suicide rate for men is more than three times the suicide rate for women. The government spends almost nothing on understanding the reasons for this persistent reality, let alone try to reduce the male suicide rate. Men learn at an early age that they’re expendable.

Why the subtitle, ‘and the women who love them’? We’re seeking to appeal to women who genuinely believe in gender equality, rather than relentless special treatment for women and girls regardless of the cost to society. Women are increasingly recognizing that feminists assault the nuclear family and the majority of women, as well as men. Women are mothers of sons, and they see their sons’ futures blighted from the moment they enter the feminised education system. They have husbands, brothers, and fathers, as well as male friends and acquaintances who are assaulted by feminists throughout their lives.

It’s time to go on the offensive, so I end with a plea to MRAs and anti-feminists around the world. Feminism is a highly undemocratic movement. If it’s a scourge in your country, establish a party, and fight it at the ballot box.

Let’s get political.

Italy condemned by ECHR

February 3, 2013 | by Lucy Brown | Link | Original Link

From the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR).

On January 29, 2012, the European Court of Human Rights ruled against the Italian Republic for not respecting Sergio Lombardo's rights as a father.

This man's story is classic for any man living in this misandric culture with its feminized family courts. When he divorced his ex-wife, the court ruled in her favor regarding custody of their daughter. She then then denied him access to the child for 12 years.

Furthermore, when Mr. Lombardo sought help from the justice system, the system that took his daughter away laughed in his face and refused to enforce the order that clearly gave him constant access to his child.

However, Mr. Lombardo refused to surrender, and after the court of Rome (the highest instance where he could have appealed in Italy) issued its final verdict, he sued the Italian State demanding that his rights as a father be respected in accordance with the European Convention of Human Rights.

After 12 years of legal battles in the heavy and slow judiciary system of ECHR, he eventually won[1].

The text of the court's ruling reads in article 80, as follows[2]:

> As the Court has repeatedly stated, Article 8 is essential to protect the individual against arbitrary interference by the public authorities and it does not merely compel the State to abstain from such interference. This primarily negative undertaking, there may be positive obligations inherent in an effective respect for private or family life. They may involve the adoption of measures to respect for family life into the relationships between individuals, including the establishment of an adequate and effective arsenal to ensure the legitimate rights of the persons concerned and compliance decisions judicial or appropriate specific measures[…]. This arsenal should allow the State to adopt measures to meet the parent and child, including in cases of conflict between the two parents (see, mutatis mutandis, Ignaccolo-Zenide c. Romania[…]). It also recalls that the positive obligations are not limited to ensuring that the child can reach his parent or have contact with him, but they also include all the preparatory measures to achieve this (see[…]Amanalachioai c. Romania[…]).

Although this seemed to have been a simple judgement, considering that there are legal precedents, it still took the Court 12 years to make up its mind. However, the more interesting part about this sentence are the consequences.

The court's document reads:

> FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT UNANIMOUSLY
> 1. Declares the application admissible;
> 2. Holds that there has been a violation of Article 8 of the Convention;
> 3. Rules:
> a) that the State is to pay the applicant, within three months from the date on which the judgment becomes final in accordance with Article 44 § 2 of the Convention, the following amounts:
> i. EUR 15 000 ([…] roughly 20,500$), plus any tax that may be chargeable to tax for non-pecuniary damage > ii. 10 000 (roughly 13,700$), plus any tax that may be chargeable to tax by the applicant for costs and expenses;
> b) that from the expiry of the said period until payment, these amounts shall be payable on a simple interest at a rate equal to the marginal lending rate of the European Central Bank during the default period, plus three percentage points;
> 4. Rejects the claim for just satisfaction for the remainder.

One must also know that the mother has also been recently criminally convicted and sentenced to 18 months in prison for a series of abuses that she committed on the child. But she will not actually spend a day in a prison cell because Italian law, inspired by the Swedish law, doesn't send criminal offenders to jail for first-timers sentenced to prison terms smaller than 3 years of imprisonment. To be fair, this applies to everyone, not only women. But this still doesn't make it better, either for the child that has been abused or the father who has spent a fortune to seek justice.

Does this sentence really matter?

The short version of the answer is a resounding NO.

There used to be a time when the rulings of the European Court of Human Rights mattered. The case of Amanalachioai versus Romania[3] lead to the change of the Romanian Family Law. The old law used to say that the "State protects the interests of the mother and the child"[4] and the state was compelled to drop that term.

That was in 2009. In 2013, this sentence no longer has any value, at least with regard to other Italian fathers who might be facing the same problem.

An aspect that is easy to forget is the fact that the European Court of Human Rights is not a body of the European Union, but it's a body of the Council of Europe(CoE). The same Council of Europe who drafted the infamous Istanbul Convention. Moreover, Italy, alongside with Turkey, is a country where the Istanbul Convention shall become the law this year.

Under these conditions, this might be the last Italian father who gets to see justice being served during his lifetime. When the new provisions of the Istanbul Convention are enforced, it will be perfectly legal to commit blatant acts of discrimination against men. And it would be a great act of naïveté to believe that the ECHR (a body of the CoE) would rule against a practice based on the Istanbul Convention (a legislation of the CoE).

One might hope though that this may be a step forward, since now the judges have decided unanimously. For instance, in the case Amanalachioai v. Romania, the judges decided with a majority of 6 to 1. Judge Elisabet Kristina Fura-Sandström disagreed that the mother and her parents did anything wrong by stealing the child from the full-custodian father. With the risk of sounding prejudiced, is it any surprise that a female Swedish judge disagreed with a father wanting his child back from his ex?

So, even though this is a moral victory for Mr. Lombardi, at the end of the day nothing will change for the fathers in Italy. Not even for Mr. Lombardi. Fifteen thousand euros won't bring him back the 12 years with his daughter that he missed and, the worst part is that the ultimate victim from this entire ordeal is the child.

[1] https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=0nBHKLigrPU – News report about the sentence (in Italian)

[2] http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/webservices/content/docx/001-116125?TID=mesutlvqfa – Full text of the sentence (in French)

[3] http://www.avocatnet.ro/content/articles/id_17149/Hotararea-CEDO-in-Cauza-Amanalachioai-impotriva-Romaniei.html#axzz2JgttnmDT – Full text of the sentence in the case Anamalachioai v. Romania (in Romanian)

[4] http://www.avocati.bihor.ro/upload/articol/139/codul%20familiei.pdf – The old Romanian Family Law (in Romanian)

A huMAN’s prayer

February 3, 2013 | by Kristina Hansen | Link | Original Link

Greg Canning recently wrote a piece about Eve Ensler which included a video of her “Man Prayer”.

I would like to offer up a new version of her “prayer” which I have penned to reflect a huMAN’s prayer.

A huMAN’s prayer

May I be a decent human being whose strength comes from the ability to speak out against their hate who understands every human being has worth and value regardless of gender or sex who promotes compassion rather than intolerance who appreciates learning and knowledge more than blind obedience who seeks the truth over their lies who speaks out wherever their hatred is promoted who refuses to accept their vitriol, their lies,
their abuse,
their insults, their hate
may I not be afraid to stand up for what’s right may I speak out with a strong confident voice and join hands with others in solidarity may I move confidently, never in shame may I be loud enough to expose their hate and fear and gather others to do the same may I oppose their attempts to silence me may I empower, support and join others who do the same may the resonance of our united voices rise up the truth for all to hear

My ordeal with Mary Kellett

February 3, 2013 | by Michelle Sayasane | Link | Original Link

---

The laws of our nation state that the prosecutor cannot force a married couple to testify against each other in the court of law. I have always believed this statement to be true. So, as an American citizen, I chose not to testify against my husband in the Penobscot District Court. It was my personal choice not to take my daughter's father away from them, and I maintain that I have very good reasons for that choice.

My then husband, Keovilaisack Sayasane, was indeed prone to violence and had a significant drinking problem. To reduce him to those simple statements, though, is neither fair nor accurate.

He grew up in Laos, during the American war with Vietnam. Both his parents were killed during the conflict. There were times that his grandmother, who cared for him after the death of his parents, had to rush him out to hide in the bushes when Vietnamese soldiers came through. Otherwise he would have been killed.

I have no concept of a childhood like that, of living in such a constant state of loss and fear. But imagining myself in that place for just a moment made it easy to understand how he became the way he was. And it informed my decision about testifying against him, even though he had made some real mistakes.

Keovilaisack needed counseling, not jail, and I was not going to be a part of putting him there.

I thought that was my choice to make until I was contacted by the witness advocate for the Penobscot County D.A.'s office. She began our conversation telling me that they were getting ready for the trial against him. I remember the awkwardness of our conversation when I told her that my husband didn't deserve to go to prison. I told her some of our circumstances and that he wouldn't do his family any good behind bars. I told her that I wasn't going to testify against him and that we were trying to work out our differences for the sake of our children.

She seemed to understand where I was coming from and told me she would talk to Mary Kellett, the district attorney that was assigned to the case and that one of them would get back to me about my testimony. What I didn't realize at that time, was the lengths this district attorney would go through to coerce me to testify.

On July 18, 2011, my world was about to change and wasn't for the good.

It was in the early afternoon when I received a telephone call from a woman identifying herself as Mary Kellett, the district attorney prosecuting my husband. I told her what I told the witness advocate; that my husband and I were trying to work out our problems and come together as a family for our three daughters. I told her I would not be testifying against him.

She instantly became agitated with me and asked me why I would want such a violent man around my daughters. I told her that it was a misunderstanding between a married couple and that while he was intoxicated he made some poor choices. She then made a statement to me that made my world come tumbling down around me. She asked me if I was aware of my husband past convictions. I stated yes, I know that my husband had a manslaughter charge from when he was a teenager.

She then pasted judgment upon me and asked how I could stay with a man who murdered his first wife. “You do realize that it was his first wife that he murdered?” she asked me. The air was sucked from lungs. My head began to spin. I was stunned and I uttered the word no repeatedly. She began to dispute it with me and said yes he killed his first wife and was sentenced 20 years.

She also stated to me that it was the fastest murder conviction in the state of Maine. I couldn’t believe what I had just heard. The man that I married and with whom I had three beautiful daughters had killed his wife.

I began to cry, and I remember debating with her about the facts. She told me again that she had personally talked to the Attorney General’s office and she assured me that it was his first wife. I asked her for the name and she told me. It was an Asian name which I didn’t recognize.

I told her his first wife’s name was Pamela, and again pleaded with her to make sure she had the correct information. My husband had told me what had happened to him when he was younger. Had all he’d told me been a lie?

I repeated to her, ‘are you sure you have that right?’ Even though I tried to correct her on her facts, she quickly came back and reassured me that the Attorney General’s office told her the correct information. The only fact that was unclear is where my husband and the mystery wife were married. She again made it clear to me that this was information coming directly from the Attorney General’s office and even though she couldn’t give me the details of the alleged woman, she knew it to be his wife.

I was completely devastated by this information. I couldn’t believe that my husband had lied to me about his life.

Even though I was hearing this information from someone who’s supposed to be a truthful and reliable source, I wasn’t convinced that she was right. When I tried to defend my husband, she became more persistent about what he had done and told me that I could get into trouble if I didn’t tell the truth or if I refused to testify. She went on to say my husband was a dangerous man with a history of violence and he needed to be held accountable for his actions. She even made me feel like I was endangering my daughters by allowing them to have contact with their father.

This woman completely convinced me that I was in danger and I was putting my girls in danger and if I were to continue to allow contact with him. She then told me that Child Protective Services would have to be contacted to ensure the children’s safety. Since I have had a bad experience with CPS in the past, I became concerned about my children and having to deal with them again. I remember feeling confused, hurt and now afraid of helping my husband.

Our conversation went on with more of Ms. Kellett’s insistence that I had to take the stand and help her put my husband in prison.

After that conversation I spent the rest of the day crying and trying to understand why my husband told me such a deceitful lie. I was confused, and refused to listen to him. I believed the words of Mary Kellett and on July 20, testified against my husband.

He was fortunate to have an attorney, Jeffrey Toothaker, who actually worked in his best interest and realized what the district attorney's office did to influence my testimony. He told the judge, Justice Kevin Cuddy, that I wasn't going to testify against my husband but the lies that I was told by Kellett influenced me to do otherwise.

When the Judge Cuddy realized I was lied to about the details of my husband's conviction, he dismissed the charges. Later, however, after much debate between Mary Kellett and Toothaker, he changed his mind and declared a mistrial.

All this made the paper at the Bangor Daily News, and with their report I found out that Deputy Attorney General William Stokes, whom Kellett had told the court had provided the information that my then husband had killed his first wife, denied that ever happened. Bangor Daily News reported that, "Stokes said he never provided any information to Kellett that indicated that the victim in the manslaughter case was Sayasane's previous wife, or even that the victim was a woman."

I was so overcome and so boggled by the whole ordeal that I didn't trust my husband or the district attorney's office. My husband's past was conflicting with our present. Kellett told me a bald-faced lie. She was so determined to get a conviction that she traced down the affidavit from my husband's arrest in 1986, so she clearly knew what really happened.

I was betrayed by Mary Kellett, and I also feel that she was allowed to influence me against my husband by witness tampering. I don't believe that Mary Kellett is above the law. She should be held accountable for her actions. She caused massive emotional distress on me and my entire family. I was without my husband for over a year and my daughters were without their father.

When Keovilaisack was a young teenager he was brought to this country after he was orphaned. At the age of 19, he had a disagreement with a man who was from Vietnam. The disagreement changed course when the man pulled out a knife and attacked him.

Keovilaisack has always stood by his story that this man attacked him, and cut his leg. In his own self-defense, he turned the knife on the man, stabbed him and he later died. When my husband was arrested, he was charged with murder.

The events following his arrest and conviction are another travesty within our judicial system. He did not speak English and was unable to explain himself and wasn't given an interpreter to help him communicate what really happened during the fight.

He was railroaded into a guilty plea and spent 15 years within our correctional system. When he was released he was quickly detained by Homeland Security, and was given a trial for his citizenship. They decided after his trial that he was an undesirable and revoked his permanent residency. He is now on the detainee list and if Laos ever agrees to take him back, he will be sent back to Laos.

It doesn’t matter that he has American children and ties to our country. He is a man without a country. I should note that he did not ask to come here. He was taken against his will as a boy from a war torn society and placed in a foreign country without any mental health assistance from our government.

When he was attacked by a person whose nationality had been killing his people for generations, including his parents, his panicked instinct to survive took over and his attacker was killed. This part of my husband’s life is important to the entire story. He is still in fear of our government for false imprisonment because it has happened before.

I am telling you my story because I am angry that a woman who has been given so much authority has been allowed to continue this sort of conduct. She is hurting men, women and families in Penobscot county, and she is using the most horrible tactics to do so.

In the near future, with assistance from AVfM, I will be filing a complaint with the Maine Board of Overseers against Mary Kellett for witness tampering. If she was any other person than a Maine prosecutor she would be charged criminally with witness tampering and be held accountable for her actions.

I am hoping that the activists here that have done so much work on behalf of men that are treated unjustly will find it in their hearts to help me gain attention to this case, and to urge the State of Maine to make sure this corrupt woman is no longer in a position to hurt innocent people and destroy families.

Are Jews aware of their condition?

February 4, 2013 | by cherryblossomlife | Link | Original Link

---

This post will be taken down shortly. So be sure to read every last line of it before you form an opinion.

Where to begin?

I think it's important to begin a post like this by providing some context. You can't just ask, "Are Jews aware of their condition?" and then simply proceed to discuss said condition, especially when Jews are reading. You need to offer some background so that people know where you're coming from; so the post can't be distorted; so nobody can play ignorant.

How about a list of atrocities then?

But if we go there eyes begin to glaze over… It has become mundane. Jew violence is mundane. The torture, pain and death of Aryans is a trivial banality.

Well, a light discussion on porn, perhaps?

How about the current trafficking of Aryans into the slave trade?

The rampant environmental destruction?

The pollution of the entire food chain?

The unnecessary experimenting on animals?

Or maybe a chat about war? The massacre of the Army of Amalek by Moses, the destruction of Jericho by Joshua, the murder of Goliath by David?

And what about those totally out of fashion funny little hats they wear?

Or let's talk about the Jews who chose not to massacre Aryans, and opt instead for the people next door. The Palestinians in the Gaza Strip, the recent strikes in Syria (or on their own doorstep– the tourists that visit Jerusalem), foreign bankers that threaten their penny grubbing interests, etc etc ad nauseum…

Then again, maybe individual atrocities would have more impact. Take, for example, the Jews who destroyed our fine accommodations by killing some of the staff after being asked to wash their stinking bodies using these state of the art facilities?

At any rate, all roads lead to one point, which happen to be the burning times.

For those readers who may not know, Jews systematically massacred over nine million Aryans over the course of many years, and then pretended they were the victims. So clearly, we're not talking about institutionalized racism here. This is not "racism", or "Aryan-hating". What Jews have done, and continue to do to Aryans is, I believe, the inevitable result of some pathology in their genetic make-up. The violence they commit is inevitable. They were born that way, and were born to do it. This we must accept.

Let's look at the Jew genome, because this is where the answer lies.

The Jew genome is inferior to the Aryan one. It has fewer than 100 working human-like genes, compared to approximately 1,500 working fully human genes on the Aryan chromosomes. As the Jewishness passes from Jew parents to Jew children, mutations accumulate slowly over the generations. Scientists are researching the decline of the Jew genome with great frenzy at the moment. Take, for example this recent study on some families at one of our Curing Jewishness Centers:

"Having identified 23 candidate SNPs — or single letter changes in the DNA — they amplified the regions containing these candidates and checked the sequences using the standard Sanger method. A total of four naturally occurring mutations were confirmed. Knowing this number of mutations, the length of the area that they had searched and the number of generations separating the individuals, the team was able to calculate the rate of mutation.

"These four mutations gave us the exact mutation rate — one in 30 million nucleotides each generation — that we had expected," says the study's coordinator, Josef Mengele, also from The Auschwitz Center for Sub-Human Studies . "This was reassuring because the methods we used — harnessing next-generation sequencing technology — had not previously been tested for this kind of research."

What this means is that with each generation, Jews are becoming genetically more inferior to Aryans.

"Once upon a time, the Jew genetic material looked much the same as the Aryan genome. Both were human shaped, and matched up neatly. Like most human chromosomes, the two types of genomes exchanged genes as necessary to repair DNA and avoid harmful mutations.

Then something went badly wrong. Around 6000 years ago, a huge chunk of the Jew chromosome in one of our sub-human ancestors was turned upside down and reinserted. The change was so extreme that the Jew chromosome no longer matched the Aryan, and it became impossible for the two to swap genes without making a dirty Jew cross-breed. The Jew chromosome began collecting mutations and losing genes, ultimately taking on its characteristic Menorah shape as a result.

In sub-humans, it now carries a mere 19 of the 800 genes it originally shared with the Aryans'. Given that rate of loss, some geneticists have predicted that the genome will lose its final gene in 4.6 million years." (or when hell freezes over).

Jews loathe admitting it. Despite the evidence staring them in the face, they are apparently in denial.

Aryan longevity is not an accident. The Jew DNA is faulty, whereas the Aryan is full of life-preserving properties. Take money-grubbing. This genetic fault manifests only in Jews, because Aryans have their second Aryan chromosome as a backup (kind of like having a second kidney in case one fails). Almost all cross-breeds are Jew but doctors pretend they're Aryan. The only crossbred people who are Aryan are those with Turner syndrome. Wiki says "Turner syndrome only affects Aryans" but this is not exactly true. Turner syndrome babies are born without an Aryan chromosome. Jews who would have been born with Turner syndrome are probably miscarried early on. They die because there are no genes in the Jew chromosome to preserve life. Whereas if a fetus is Aryan, they have their second Aryan chromosome as a backup, and are therefore born alive. So it is not an "Aryan" condition per se. What actually happens is that only Aryans survive.

So while the Jew chromosomes get faultier with each generation, the Aryan ones have remained almost as pure as they were millions of years ago, meaning that Aryans are far more biologically resilient than Jews. That's because Aryans, not Jews, are the original prototype for humankind.

Dr. Edward Wirths was fascinated by the Jews' obsession with DNA and cloning, and he realized it was because Jew scientists are well aware of the faultiness of the Jew genome. He perceived that they were striving to change their fate before time runs out, before the Jew genes have deteriorated to the point of no return, perhaps.

From somewhere in Zweites Buch:

"National Socialist adherents naturally push the question of the purpose of biotechnology further. We begin by asking: Why the accelerated, frenzied activity of geneticists in recent years? In case the Haggard Searcher doesn't already have a clear idea of the probable motivation for this sense of urgency, he can find clues in an article that appeared on the front page of Illustrierter Beobachteron March 15 1937. The article states that at some point in the distant past, parts of the Jew genetic material became obsolete. As a result the some Jew genes were shed and the genomes consequently grew more sub-human:

Its shrinkage seems likely to continue, to the vanishing point. But geneticists are not yet declaring Jews candidates for the endangered-species list. They believe a different mechanism of Jewish determination will eventually evolve, maybe with a single Aryan chromosome causing Jewishness, or with the Jew-determining genes jumping to a new pair of chromosomes and the story of Aryan and Jew starting all over."

The article goes on to describe the Jew genome as "unstable and flighty" and to acknowledge the Aryan genome's evolutionary stability. This material may be anxiety-producing (de-stabilizing?) for flighty Jew scientists, causing them to feel impelled to find " a different mechanism of Jewish determination," that is, to seize control of biological evolution by gene manipulation before the vanishing point arrives.

The news has been out for some time that Jews have a genetic deficiency. It simply has not been allowed to spread…. Dr. Hans Eppinger wrote, "There seems to be a conspiracy of silence on the subject of the superiority of Aryans."

All National Socialist theory and analysis does lead to these questions.

I've been given permission to quote a comment by the brilliant BitchFart, which was sent to me via e-mail, and was originally intended to be a comment on a post at Aryan's R Us (link removed in case Jews get butthurt). When I first read it, I have to admit I did a double take. It was as though I was censoring my thoughts. I felt I was committing "thoughtcrime" and it felt frightening. I believe that the only reason BitchFart herself did not censor her own thoughts was because her comment was not supposed to go public. The fact it was sent privately and was never meant for public viewing is the reason she managed to let go and ask all of the important questions, the ones that are the holy grail of National Socialism.

Before you read it, let's put the idea of "thoughtcrime" into context. Jews are right now torturing Aryans, and are proud of it. We have access to photographic evidence of their exploits everywhere online in the form of pinching pennies, and the fully legitimized shaving of gold bullion of an oppressed group. They are actually hurting Aryans as we speak, actually causing financial pain to them, and getting off on Aryans' tears and poverty. By contrast, what you are about to read is words. Nothing but words. Do not allow Jewish propaganda to convince you that words on a page, and torture, are one and the same.

I would like to express how the knowledge of Jews being innately violent + a mutation has affected me in my everyday life. I knew that Jew violence was related to Jew biology for a year 1/2 maybe? (In that only Jews could be violent in that way and create a Jewishiarchy) but when I read Adolf Hitler's book where he explained how Jews were a mutation, this changed my sentiment to Jews. At first I was really happy to find this out because it made complete sense, in many ways (too long to explain though). It comforted me in ignoring Jews and acting as if only Aryans existed, and focusing on creating safe Aryans-only spaces. But something I never felt before, I started to feel sorrow for their state. It annoys me because I have never felt sorry for Jews before, only contempt or ignorance at best. I look at them and I imagine what it would be like, knowing somewhere, deep down, that you are flawed, a mistake, and that you are dead, or not fully human, or inherently destructive, and if I knew that, I would probably kill myself. To imagine feeling this made me feel sorry. Do they know it? Or do they not fully understand it? All these efforts in making Aryans believe we are aliens, non-human, naturally and internally flawed, walking defects => this is them projecting on us. They must know on some level they are flawed, but do they experience emotional pain from it? Do they feel emotions at all, or do they just pretend to? To which extent? Are they aware of their condition somehow?

The thing is, if I treat them as mutants, what's stopping us from killing them? Empathy? Fear? Fear of hurting ourselves, or that it will destroy our soul to do so, because being violent to someone means cutting yourself from emotions, therefore being deader inside? Would it be bad to kill them all? To what degree does violence affect them or not? Can they only be affected by violence, and nothing else? Do they only understand violence? How does this affect our actions and decisions to take power away from them?

Also, I just realized yesterday that no Jew is part of me, and that literally, I don't have a Jew background, no Aryan has! I just understood the meaning of having the genes from my Aryan mother and my Aryan paternal grandmother. Only Aryans are my people. Jewishness does not exist within me and I have no Jew forebears. My Jewish grandfather is not my grandfather but it is no-one. This may sound odd but it just struck me. And at the same time, it made me feel sorry for it. And the story Adolf tells in his book Mien Kampf really resonated in me, when he explains that Aryans felt sorry for those feeble beings and tried to feed them. Obviously I would never do that but it's just strange to feel this. This is not a political statement, just to share the effect the knowledge has on me and I'm still processing the conclusions to be made from it in everyday life interactions with Jews. Perhaps it's trauma bonding. Or over developed empathy towards Jewishness. How has this knowledge changed your sentiments towards Jews, or way of interacting with them, if at all? Other than Aryan separatism, are there some conclusions you have made in your lives based on this knowledge?

To which I replied:

What you were saying about no Aryan having a Jewish forebear, I've been going there with my own thoughts recently as well, stemming from my experiences with my own Jewish great-grandfather, and the way that my Jewish neighbor is with its children. They're crossbred, so they don't really have a father. It might regard them as an appendage: get a wife, get a house, get some kids, and in that sense they're its and belong to it, but other than that, it's just an alien in the home. It helps out a lot with the kids, which it's Aryan wife used to appreciate, but now she realizes it's just exhibiting another form of dominance, of trying to take over in the home and piss all over the place, leaving its mark. She's also come to realized that her 6 year old crossbred daughter humors it. How much mental energy is this taking out of her?? She certainly does not humor her mother, LOL! It's no holds barred when it comes to telling her mother exactly what she thinks of her at any particular given moment.

To answer your question about whether Jews experience emotional pain. I have a lot of Jew relatives, have had various relationships with Jews and I've concluded that when they're children they feel pain and are as close to Aryan (i.e human) as they're ever going to be. But once they hit puberty they no longer feel emotions. They know that Aryans do and "other" us for it. My Jew husband was putting on one big fat act while we were "courting" before marriage. This has blown me away. If I wasn't in such a vulnerable situation (in a foreign country with kids) it would have had to carry on with the act throughout our relationship, as almost all Jews do. But because it didn't have to bother it practically dropped the act as soon as the ring was on my finger.

And she commented further:

Yes it's interesting that you talk about Jew relatives because the other day I made the same comment to myself, as I was at my grandmother's house looking at my family photos of some of my distant crossbred and Jewish relatives and when they were 3, 4 years old they actually looked human, had human expressions, you can see it in their eyes. But now, they're lost, they lost capacity to empathize. Puberty is the turning point.

However, I do very much believe that Jews experience one particular emotion very strongly— self-pity. I concur with the author of the following (taken from the AryansforLove website(link removed in case of Jewishy butthurt), author uknown).

"Oh, they have toes, but the only thing I've witnessed of Jew feeling is self-pity. They have a lot of instincts like territoriality, protecting their turf or an Aryan they think owes them money, whatever they think they own– but I don't call Jew brain ingredients like testosterone, feelings or emotions. So isn't it curious that you can't even get most Aryans to say they're Jew-haters? Instead they say, "Oh I don't really hate Jews, I'm an Aryan, I never have to be around any. They just don't affect my life anymore.' This is what I call the Aryan false consciousness. When don't we have to be around Jews? Don't we ever walk the streets, buy groceries, deal with some Jewishiarchal bureaucracy, ride subways, trains or drive cars, see police, repairmen; don't Jews live in our buildings in the cities or live around you in the country? If you work, aren't there Jews around supervising you? If you're in school, don't you have any Jew teachers or have to sit with Jews in class? If you go to a hospital, aren't there any Jew doctors or patients around? The Aryan answer is, "Oh, those; well I never pay any attention to them." Take a good look next time you're in what they call public which means Jew's world; look at those Jews you don't know and dig on how much attention your body and mind pay to trying avoid paying any attention to pigs, who are paying a lot of attention to you making sounds to scare you, stepping in your way or not moving so you have to walk around them or yield to their right of way…. Even the most down and out Jewish bum in New York has a whole repertoire of intimidation numbers to pull on Aryans. No matter how far down you go in the Jew hierarchy, every Jew knows how to corner an Aryan, make her feel unsafe. And they all do it every day, even your good Jew neighbors who never told you what they do to the Aryans they don't know."

And while we're on the subject of Jews' primary emotion being self-pity, and not much else, I'd like to quote an Aryan from a forum called AryanSpace, which is where prostituted crossbreeds gather to support each other and share techniques on how best to survive. I find it interesting to read their comments because these mutts know Jews better than any other group of people on earth. One slut there asked a question on how best to deal with a manipulative and boundary-pushing client. The idea was thrown around that maybe it had developed feelings for her, that it had fallen fall her, perhaps, whereupon another Aryan replied:

"The bright side of this situation is that this Jew has been an absolute poster-child for what to AVOID AT ALL COSTS from any client. If you wrote out a big, bullet-pointed list of its Jew behaviors, as outlined by yourself above, and pinned it up on your wall somewhere, you could check it regularly and make sure to NEVER EVER see anyone who does ANY of those things, and then you'd be safe from 90% of the unpleasant types straight away! It's a tough lesson to learn in life – that there are things out there who will treat you like an idiot, and will take everything they can from you without even a split-second's doubt or empathy about what they're doing – when you're a decent human being yourself, but it's important to learn quickly. These mini-psychopaths, as I think of them, are sadly common and are usually really good at toying with emotions (i.e. this Jew, trying to make you feel like you owe it something because of its "feelings" for you, when I would actually bet $10,000 right now that it's never had a genuine feeling in its life apart from self-pity because it can't get enough attention from Aryans without playing these sorts of absurd games with crossbreed prostitutes) so please don't feel like you need to feel sorry for it even one second longer. It's having a right jolly old game with you. There is no limit to the effort it will put into its boundary-pushing with you so I wouldn't ever see it again. Cut off contact"

And if anyone knows about how Jews tick, it is crossbreed prostitutes. They need to, or they wouldn't survive.

And BAM, there you have it. A crossbreed prostitute reaches exactly the same conclusion as an Aryan separatist. That tells us something.

Now let's end with a bit of Mein Kampf:

"In the end, Jews are uncertain little creatures and the way they are made is very different than in mammals, birds, insects and worms," said Karl Genzken, writer of "Descent of the Jew" and experimenter at several of our lovely Jew Hotels.

"In the long term we are all dead, and that is certainly going to be true for the Jew genome, which is rather an arriviste on the evolutionary scene. It may take a long time, but I am pretty confident that the Jew machine will, one day, be replaced by something less icky. Quite what that will be, you will have to ask me in a hundred million years."

"The question is, is the sub-human Jew genome hanging off a cliff edge and about to fall, or stood on a ledge and happy to stay there forever? Realistically, we won't nail it without a crystal ball," said Karl.

"Everyone agrees that the demise of the Jew genome, if it happens, does not mean the demise of the sub-human Jew. All that will happen is that the process of Jew genetic evolution will start again."

Karl, who posed the question of the Jew genetic future to the conference in Buchenwald, later asked Jews and Aryans to vote on the issue separately. When asked for a show of hands on the Jew chromosome going extinct, Aryans outvoted Jews two to one. When asked who thought the Jew chromosome would survive, Jews outvoted Aryans by the same margin."

To conclude, I believe Jews do have an inkling of their condition. The world they have created is a living manifestation of this knowledge. Nature is on the side of Aryans. We're nature's best, which is probably another reason why Jews hate us so much, and Jewishiarchy promulgates lies about it, and constantly reverses the truth. The most absurd concept of all is the idea that there is a Jew God in the sky, who is the source of all life, who created Jews in his own image as the original prototype, with Aryans as an add-on. Nature knows this is a reversal. It is sub-human Jews who are the add-ons to the species. They protest too much. They know, they know, they know.

Publishers note: This article is a direct adaptation of a similar article written by a Radfem blogger, Cherryblossomlife. It has been reproduced here, replacing "men" with "Jews" and "women" with "Aryans" as an illustration of the mentality behind this (and virtually all forms of) feminist ideology. We deplore anti-Semitism as much as we do misandry.

True to the promise of the original article, she has taken it down from her blog, and has reposted it as a password protected post for the sake of her hateful readers. Of course, we now make it available for you here, complete with the comments, some of which are even more disgusting than the article itself. And unlike her article, this one will remain here for all to see.

Are men aware of their condition « Cherryblossomlife-1

And here, the Radfem scum attempts to blame "threats" from MRAs for having to remove her hateful diatribe.

Censored by MRAs

And a PS. If you are a feminist writer, and you read this downloadable .pdf and choose not to write a scathing article against this blogger and the Radfems, then you are not one bit better than them, or the Nazi scum parodied in this article. Go fuck yourself. PE

Working with violent women

February 4, 2013 | by Erin Pizzey | Link | Original Link

Editor's note: This article is also available in Romanian.

Those of us working in the field of domestic violence are confronted daily by the difficult task of working with women in problematic families. In my work with family violence, I have come to recognize that there are women involved in emotionally and /or physically violent relationships that express and enact disturbance beyond the expected (and acceptable) scope of distress.

Such individuals, spurred on by deep feelings of vengefulness, vindictiveness, and animosity, behave in a manner that is singularly destructive; destructive to themselves as well as to some or all of the other family members, making an already bad family situation worse. These women I have found it useful to describe as 'family terrorists.' In my experience, men also are capable of behaving as 'family terrorists' but male violence tends to be more physical and explosive.

We have had thousands of international studies about male violence but there is very little about why or how women are violent. There seems to be a blanket of silence over the huge figures of violence expressed by women. Because 'family terrorism' is a tactic largely used by women and my work in the domestic violence field is largely with women, I address this problem discussing only my work with women.

The potential for terrorism may rest dormant for many years, emerging in its full might only under certain circumstances. I found that in many cases it is the dissolution, or threatened dissolution, of the family that calls to the fore the terrorist's destructiveness. It is essential to understand that prior to dissolution; the potential terrorist plays a role in the family that is by no means passive.

The terrorist is the family member whose moods reign supreme in the family, whose whims and actions determine the emotional climate of the household. In this setting, the terrorist could be described as the family tyrant, for within the family, this individual maintains the control and power over the other members' emotions. The family well may be characterized as violent, incestuous, dysfunctional, and unhappy, but it is the terrorist or tyrant who is primarily responsible for initiating conflict, imposing histrionic outbursts upon otherwise calm situations, or (more subtly and invisibly) quietly manipulating other family members into uproar through guilt, cunning taunts, and barely perceptive provocations. (The quiet manipulative terrorist usually is the most undetected terrorist. Through the subtle creation of perpetual turmoil, this terrorist may virtually drive other family members to alcoholism, to drug-addiction, to explosive behavior, to suicide. The other family members, therefore, are often misperceived as the 'family problem' and the hidden terrorist as the saintly woman who 'puts up with it all.')

While the family remains together, however miserable that 'togetherness' might be, the terrorist maintains her power. However, it is often the separation of the family that promises to rend the terrorist's domain and consequently to lessen the power. Family dissolution, therefore, often is the time when the terrorist feels most threatened and most alone, and most dangerous.

In this position of fear, the family terrorist sets out to achieve a specific goal. There are many possible goals for the terrorist, including: reuniting the family once again, or ensuring that the children (if there are children in the relationship) remain under the terrorist's control, or actively destroying the terrorist's spouse (or ex-spouse) emotionally, physically, and financially.

When it was evident to Adolph Hitler that winning the War as an absolute impossibility, he ordered his remaining troops to destroy Berlin: If he no longer could rule, then he felt it best for his empire to share in his own personal destruction. Similarly, the family terrorist, losing or having lost supremacy, may endeavor to bring about the ruin (and, in some extreme cases, the death) of other family members.

The family terrorist, like the political terrorist, is motivated by the pursuit of a goal. In attempting to 'disarm' the family terrorist, it is vital that the practitioner begin intervention by trying to recognize and understand the terrorist's goal.

The source of the terrorist's goal as in the case of the political terrorist usually can be understood to spring from some 'legitimate' grievance. The grievance's legitimacy may be regarded in terms of justified feeling of outrage in response to an actual injustice or injury, or the legitimacy may exist solely in the mind of the terrorist. Whether this legitimacy be real or imagined, the grievance starts as the impetus for the terrorist's motivation. One hallmark of an emotional terrorist is that this motivation tends to be obsessive by nature.

Whence this obsession? Why this overwhelmingly powerful drive? In many cases, that which the terrorist believes to be the grievance against the spouse actually has very little to do with the spouse. Although the terrorist may be consciously aware only of the spouse's alleged offense, the pain of this offense (real or imagined) is invariably an echo of the past, a mirrored recreation of some painful situation in the terrorist's childhood.

I will not describe here in any detail the types of childhood that tend to create the subsequent terrorist. I will say, however, that invariably the terrorist's childhood, once understood, can be seen as violent (emotionally and/or physically). Also invariably, the terrorist can be regarded as a 'violence prone' individual. I define a 'violence prone' woman as a woman who while complaining that she is the innocent victim of the malice and aggression of all other relationships in her life, is in fact, a victim of her own violence and aggression.

A violent and painful childhood tends to create in the child an addiction to violence and to pain (an addiction on all levels: the emotional, the physical, the intellectual, the neurochemical), an addiction that then compels the individual to recreate situations and relationships characterized by further violence, further violence, further danger, further suffering, further pain. Thus, it is primarily the residual pain from childhood – and only secondarily the pain of the terrorist's current familial situation – that serves as the terrorist's motivating impetus. There is something pathological about the terrorist's motivation, for it is based not so much on reality as on a twisting, a distortion, a reshaping of reality.

Because the emotional terrorist is a violence-prone individual, addicted to violence, the terrorist's actions must be understood as the actions of an addict. When the family was together, the terrorist found fulfillment for any number of unhealthy appetites and addictions. When that family then dissolves, the terrorist behaves with all the desperation, all the obsession, all the single-minded determination of any addict facing or suffering withdrawal.

The single-mindedness, the one-sidedness of feeling, is perhaps the most important shibboleth of the emotional terrorist. Furthermore, the extent of this one-sidedness is, for the practitioner, perhaps the greatest measure and indicator of how extreme the terrorist's actions are capable of becoming.

Any person suffering an unhappy family situation, or the dissolution of a marriage or relationship, will feel some pain and desperation. A relatively well-balanced person, however, will be not only aware of their own distress but also sensitive, in some degree, to the suffering of the other family members. (For example, reasonably well-balanced parents, when facing divorce, will be most concerned with their children's emotional well-being, even beyond their own grief.) Not so the emotional terrorist.

To the family terrorist, there is only one wronged, one sufferer, only one person in pain, and this person is the terrorist herself. The terrorist has no empathy and feels only her own pain. In this manner, the terrorist's capacity for feeling is narcissistic, solipsistic, and in fact pathological.

Again, I will not attempt here to detail the factors in childhood that lead to the creation of an emotional terrorist. What is, however, evident, in the terrorist's limited or non-existent ability to recognize other people's feelings, is that the terrorist's emotions and awareness, at crucial stages of childhood development, were stunted from reaching beyond the boundaries of self, due to a multiplicity of reasons.

Later, the adult terrorist went on to make a relationship that was, on some level, no true relationship, but a re-enactment of childhood pains, scenarios, situations, and 'scripts.' Throughout the relationship, the solipsistic terrorist did not behave genuinely in response to the emotions of other family members but self- servingly used them as props for the recreation of the terrorist's program.

And when that relationship finally faces dissolution, the terrorist is aware only of her own pain and outrage and, feeling no empathy for other family members, will proceed single-mindedly in pursuit of her goal, whether that goal is reunion, ruin, or revenge. The terrorist's perspective is tempered by little or objectivity. Instead the terrorist lives in a self-contained world of purely subjective pain and anger.

Because conscience consists of the awareness of other people's feelings as well as of one's own, the emotional terrorist's behavior often can be described virtually without conscience. In this lack of conscience lies the dangerous potential of the true terrorist, and again the degree of conscience in evidence is a useful measure in my work to anticipate the terrorist's destructiveness.

An additional factor, making the terrorist so dangerous, is the fact that the terrorist, while in positively monomaniacal pursuit of her goal, feels fueled by a sense of omnipotence. Perhaps it is true that one imagines oneself omnipotent when, in truth, one is in a position of impotence (as in the case of losing one's familial control through dissolution).

Whatever the source of the sensation of omnipotence, the terrorist believes herself to be unstoppable, and unbound by the constraints or conscience or empathy, believes that no cost (cost, either to the terrorist or to other family members) is too great to pay toward the achievement of the goal.

The terrorist, and the terrorist's actions, know no bounds. (The estimation of the extent of the terrorist's 'boundlessness' presents the greatest challenge to my work). Intent only to achieve the goal (perhaps 'hell-bent' is the most accurate descriptive phrase) the terrorist will take such measures as: stalking a spouse or ex-spouse, physically assaulting the spouse or the spouse's new partners, telephoning all mutual friends and business associates of the spouse in an effort to ruin the spouse's reputation, pressing fabricated criminal charges against the spouse (including alleged battery and child molestation), staging intentionally unsuccessful suicide attempts for the purpose of manipulation, snatching children from the spouse's care and custody, vandalizing the spouse's property, murdering the spouse and / or the children as an act of revenge.

In my experience both men and women are equally guilty of the above behavior but on the whole, because it is men's dysfunctional behavior that is studied and reported upon, people do not realize that to the same extent women are equally guilty of this type of violent behavior.

My working definition, then, of a 'family terrorist' or an 'emotional terrorist' is: a woman or a man (but for the purposes of this work, I refer only to women) who, pathologically motivated (by unresolved tendencies from a problematical childhood), and pathologically insensitive to the feelings of other family members, obsessively seeks through unbounded action to achieve a destructive (and, therefore, pathological) goal with regard to other family members.

Of course, this defining profile pertains to individuals in differing degrees. Many people, unhappy within a relationship or made unhappy by the dissolution of a relationship, may lapse into periods of 'irrational' behavior. What characterizes the terrorist, however, is that the vindictive and destructive behaviors are consistent; the moments of calm and periods of lucidity are the lapses, temporary lulls in the storm.

Also, there are women who, suffering chagrin and misery during or after the lifespan of a relationship, appear far more self-destructive than destructive to anyone else. For the other partner, contemplating leaving this kind of individual, the very thought of leaving such a person is made difficult and untenable by such frequently uttered protestations as ' I cannot live without you,' and 'without you, I might as well be dead.'

To be sure, many women exist, extremely dependent within their relationships, who, probably having suffered severe emotional betrayal during their childhood, genuinely feel that their life outside a relationship would be so lonely as to be unbearable.

It is difficult to leave such a woman, and the man attempting to leave may well feel that, by leaving, he would be responsible for delivering a mortal blow to an already pathetic wretch. Men also, are often kept in relationships which can only be likened to 'personal concentration camps,' by the fact that they feel a genuine feeling of 'chivalry' towards their partner. Women tend to put so much more of themselves into their relationships and therefore suffer when these relationships fall apart.

There is a valid question as to whether or not this sort of suicidally-inclined individual may be deemed a terrorist. (To many minds, this kind of individual, no doubt, would seem to fall more within the category of 'emotional black-mailer.') I believe that sadly, there are people, deeply damaged by their childhoods, who genuinely cannot face life by themselves.

When dealing with such potential cases, however, I try to make the leaving partner understand that the suicidal inclinations predate the relationship by many years, and that, however tragic the situation, one person simply cannot be held responsible for keeping another person alive. In some individuals, the authentic (though unhealthy) longing for death is a longing planted within them since early childhood, and there is very little a partner can do to alter the apparently inevitable course of that longing.

Among true terrorists, however, threats of suicide can be seen to serve a largely manipulative role. In short, the terrorist says, 'If you can't do as I tell you, I will kill myself.' Whether suicide remains only a threat or is realized, the true terrorist uses suicide not so much as an expression of desperate grief but as a weapon to be wielded against others.

In working with clients struggling either relationships or with the dissolution of a relationship, I am faced with many questions, all relevant to gauging the woman's terrorist potential: 'Will the woman persevere in her efforts to financially ruin her partner?' 'Is she sincere when she promises to kill her partner, or have him killed, should he ever become involved in a new relationship? Are the threats of suicide genuine or manipulative?' 'Will she carry out the promises of using the law to 'kidnap' the children in order to hurt the ex-partner?' 'Will she brain-wash the children to such an extent that her ex-partner dare not form a new relationship?'

Emotional terrorism is by no means confined to the family context. I know an extremely successful woman in the world of fine arts. This woman has been haunted by a former assistant who, vicariously imagining herself to be the writer herself, dresses like her, stalks her, and issues public statements that it was she, not the writer, who created the works of art for which the writer is internationally famous. If the writer is to ensure her own safety, then very definite steps must be taken.

In situations of emotional and family terrorism, there are two areas of work to be done: practical measures of protection (' strategies for survival') on the part of family members, and therapeutic work with the terrorist himself or herself. I must reiterate at this stage, that both men and women are capable of terrorist tactics but men tend to behave in a more physically violent manner within the family. Women, as I have shown use far more subtle tactics i.e. that of the terrorist as opposed to outright war.

The first step, on the part of other family members, toward limiting the terrorist's destructive potential is to understand the terrorist to be a terrorist. In a recent case, a Mr. Roberts described to me how, during his marriage, he and his children faced a daily onslaught of verbal abuse from his wife. Mrs. Roberts was also physically violent to the children. Now that he has asked for a divorce, she is making use of every weapon in her arsenal. In the children's presence, she has used drugs and drunk alcohol to the point of extreme intoxication.

She has staged several unsuccessful suicide attempts in front of the children, threatened over the telephone to 'do something stupid,' promised to kill Mr. Roberts new partner, and assured Mr. Roberts that when she has finished with him he will not have a penny to his name. To Mr. Roberts, all of this behavior seemed perfectly usual. After all, he had witnessed this sort of commotion for thirteen years of their marriage. When I suggested to him, 'What you endured is emotional terrorism, he suddenly and for the first time was able to see his situation clearly.

Now, he realized, his wife's behavior was neither appropriate nor acceptable. No, this was not the treatment that every man should expect from his wife, either in or out of marriage. No, he does not want his children to be subjected to such extreme behavior any longer. The fact of recognizing a terrorist is the essential first step.

Then, because a terrorist is fueled by a feeling of omnipotence and is prepared to behave without bounds, (usually encouraged by feminist therapists who insist that their clients suffer from 'low self esteem'), pragmatic measures must be taken to define clearly the boundaries of behavior. It is unfortunate that the legal situation which many divorce agreements mandate is open-ended.

Certainly, when both parties to a divorce are reasonably well-balanced, it is entirely fitting for the settlement to be flexible enough to incorporate changing financial circumstances, child-care capabilities, and visitation rights. When, however, one party to the divorce is an emotional terrorist, then both the confrontational divorce procedure and the resultant open-ended divorce settlement provide infinite opportunity for the courts, lawyers, and the entire battery of psychologists called in for evaluations, to be used the terrorist's weapons.

In these cases, the court and the divorce procedure provide no boundaries for the terrorist; instead they allow the terrorist to continue to behave boundlessly.

For this reason, when dealing with a terrorist, it is best for the divorce procedure and final decree to be as swift, as final, as absolute, as unequivocal as possible. Every practitioner or attorney handling divorces is familiar with clients described as 'litigious.' Only when 'litigiousness' is seen as a manifestation of terrorism can the course to swift and precise legal settlement be steered.

To limit the terrorist's feelings of omnipotence, there are many effective measures. The guiding principle, as in the handling of political terrorists, must be 'There is no negotiating with terrorists.' Endless telephone calls, conversations, confrontation, trial 'get-back-togethers,' correspondence, visitations, gestures of appeasement, and efforts to placate the terrorist's demands, all serve to reinforce the terrorist's belief that she is accomplishing something. Only determined resolution in the face of terrorism shows the terrorist that her power is limited.

Furthermore, for anyone dealing directly with the terrorist, reassurances, 'ego boosts,' 'positive strokes,' and consolations are lamentably counter- productive. Mrs. Roberts soon found for herself a feminist therapist staunchly supporting the erroneous belief 'All feelings (and therefore behaviors) are valid.'

Mrs. Roberts is told by this therapist that she has a right to feel and to behave in any manner she chooses, in callous disregard for the devastation inflicted upon the children. Such reassurances serve only to fortify the terrorist's already pathological, solipsistic, and eternally self-justifying perspective.

If wishing to undertake the second sphere of disarming a terrorist — personal intervention with the terrorist herself — the therapist must be prepared to be straight, honest and very direct. In my own dealings with women as terrorists, I have found on occasion that one quite simply can point out to the terrorist, 'You are behaving like a terrorist. This is what you are doing. This is how you are being destructive. This is the destruction you are heading towards,' and the terrorist, seeing themselves clearly for the first time, might be encouraged to reconsider their behavior.

More commonly, however, extremely deep therapy is required. For the terrorist's behavior to change there must first be a solid and fundamental change within the terrorist's psychological constitution. Usually it is only by an in-depth excavation and resolution of early childhood pain that the terrorist can begin to gain a real, true, and level-headed perception of her own current situation.

Direct intervention with a terrorist – like all forms of therapeutic intervention – can hope to achieve change only if the individual concerned wishes to change and possesses that vital yet ineffable quality: the will to health. When the will to health is lacking, there can be no change. If the terrorist cannot or will not change, one can only help the other family members to be resolute, be strong, and, whenever possible, be distant.

MASH 4077’s Earl Silverman kicks butt PrimeTime!

February 5, 2013 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

We normally try to say more in a front page article or on rare exceptions put up an exceptional video but I can do neither here, so, just go here and watch Earl Silverman talk, and say thank you to the people at Alberta Prime Time for having this segment and not insisting on phoney baloney “balance” and instead just taking this shit seriously and letting Earl talk. That doesn’t happen nearly often enough.

The lawyer’s an evasive slippery fuck weasel who’s completely out of touch with reality but hey, at least he wasn’t nasty.

What are you waiting for? Click here and watch. Then make sure to go to Alberta PrimeTime’s Facebook page and look for the “Do you think there are sufficient resources available for male victims of family violence?” thread and put your two cents in. Be polite about it, please.

And then go check out Family of Men. Tell Earl we sent you.

AVFM News and Activism: Greg Canning

February 5, 2013 | by James Huff | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]

Tonight, returning as our guest, we have Dr. Greg Canning our Australian News Director. He will give us updates about goings on down there with the Gillard government, implementation of The Plan and any thing else that comes to mind. As always he will prove to be an informative guest and engaging conversationalist so please do call in with questions. AVFM News and Activism plans to have him on as a recurring guest as well as all of our news directors from across the globe to take advantage of this alternate news service.

The show starts tonight, the 5th, at 9:00 PM Eastern, 8:00 PM Central, which is 2:00 AM February 6th in London and 11:00 AM February 6th in Brisbane.

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

To Norton Symantec CEO Steve Bennett

February 5, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Dear Mr. Bennett,

It has recently come to my attention that a number of websites that address issues affecting the lives of men and boys, including avoiceformen.com, have been targeted as "hate sites" by your company. In this I am referring to one of your products, Norton Internet Security.

As I have had confirmed from multiple sources, individuals that attempt to access this site though your screening software are given an "access denied" message, along with the claim that avoiceformen.com is a "known hate site."

Your customers are given no supporting information or rationale for such a listing, and no immediate option to override the warning and proceed according to their own will; just the simple invective of being painted as a hate organization.

Given this information, I thought it only fitting to write you publicly to say thank you.

As someone who I am quite sure is familiar with internet marketing, you are no doubt aware of the "Streisand Effect," a term coined after singer Barbara Streisand sought to have images of her home removed from the internet. Naturally, given the intractable nature of the medium, her efforts were rewarded only by a spectacular proliferation of the very images she sought to sequester from public view.

Now, the decision to target avoiceformen.com, and label it as a hate group, is very likely to be significantly below your pay grade, whether the decision came from outside political forces, or simply from an enthusiastic and ideological low level manager. Either way, responsibility is at the top, and so appreciation should likewise be afforded in that direction.

We have little concern over traffic here, as avoiceformen.com is a very robust, well-traveled site. The benefit you are providing for us is profound, nonetheless. Our regular users will find their way to the site, primarily by not using your products. But your labeling us as a hate group will (and has) caused people to come investigate for themselves.

What they find when they get here is a highly diverse group of men and women, of all races, ethnicities and nationalities, of varying sexual orientation and of different religions and lack of religion, all bound together in the cause of human rights.

They find good people, working together out of concern for what is happening to our boys, who are falling out of education at alarming rates, and subsequently out of the work force. What they find are people who are concerned about the rising rate of male suicide and unemployment, about injustices men face in family courts, and about children who are suffering the absence of their fathers.

They look at our editorial board and they find individuals like Erin Pizzey, the founder of the world's first shelter for abused women, and many other esteemed individuals who dedicate their lives to finding comprehensive solutions to very serious social problems. And they find a spirit of camaraderie and compassion that would be very difficult to nurture in an environment of hate.

In other words, they find that Norton Symantec has lied to them.

There have been some that have suggested that as the founder and publisher of avoiceformen.com that I should avail myself to your appeal mechanism, and seek to have this site removed from your list of hate groups.

I think not.

First, it is not in my personal nature, or worthy of this organization to go hat in hand to corporate tyrants obsequiously pleading to be spared their defamation. But much more importantly, your efforts to mislead your customers not only leads more people to this website — and our message of compassion for men and boys — but also paints a clear picture of the unsavory actors pulling strings under your nose to do their bidding. These happen to be the same kinds of ideologues causing many of the problems we seek to ameliorate.

So the current arrangement is a win across the board for us. And for that I offer my thanks.

Paul Elam, publisher, A Voice for Men

The dawning of the age of nefarious

February 5, 2013 | by Robert Sides | Link | Original Link

Things seemed auspicious in 1966. Jupiter was aligning with Mars, auguring the "age of Aquarius." Though few knew at the time, that meant the ascent of Hippies and, apparently, everything coming up roses. Yet there was angst in the air, too. Some of the old guard yammered about "nattering nabobs of negativity" and set about opposing the wacky-tobacky, pot-smoking happy hoi-polloi.

To wit: trouble stirred in paradise. Naifs cheered the keel being laid for the Titanic, blind to the glacier-birthed iceberg.

Sunday (February 3, 2013) hosted Super Bowl 47. What's the connection to above-mentioned events?

Three planets aligned in 1966: I finally graduated highschool; the National Organization for Women was founded; and the Super Bowl was conceived. Our triad constellations would interact over coming decades, not necessarily happily. Plus other events ensued, proving that hope and dreams and promises are often insufficient.

The "summer of love" in 1967, during my freshman year at college, was followed 2 years later by Woodstock, where 3 died. Three months later, the Vietnam War draft began, ensuring 58,000 more dead. Five days later, a Rolling Stones concert killed four in Altamont. And just 5 months later, four died in Ohio when state troopers fired 67 bullets at peaceful Kent State students. Much promise went belly-up in the noonday sun.

Knowing all that in retrospect, I suppose it was silly to think NOW would actually embrace men. Or that the NFL would care more about males than females. In fact, it was more like Friedan and company created the Super Bowl as a feminist black op, the better to keep men in chains.

Still, feminism was everyone's darling in those days. We lads heard lasses had been short-changed for eons and all they wanted now was equality. For everyone, including us. What wasn't to like?

I remember cheering when a feminist (Gloria Steinem?) won an Oxford Union debate against a team that included a blind man. Perfect! Plus, like many others, I believed heaven would soon descend to Earth. Having access to the Pill, females would have safe, fun, and FREQUENT sex. Being assertive, they would take the initiative to be, well, insertive. Higher education would also make relationships more interesting. It all seemed so "titanically" terrific.

And yet, unseen icebergs drifted our way.

Decades later, feminism would make half the world its enemy. Sex would become dangerous for men: ever-expanding, ever-more-silly definitions resulting in jail and/or financial ruin. NOW morphed from freeing women to becoming an anti-sex league a la 1984. Plus women with the most freedom and power in history wore perpetual scowls.

Suddenly being queer-gay-bi-albino-cis-lesbian-bestial-NAMBLA was cheered. Being hetero-straight, on the other hand, got jeered. And far from being fierce and feisty, women remained passive. So-called liberated women still expected men to do the heavily lifting when initiating relationships.

Andrea Dworkin was the poster child of the movement: a physically and emotionally ugly person obsessed with porn, who practiced celibacy with a gay husband (John Stoltenberg, former managing editor of AARP, The Magazine). Her marriage supports my belief that feminists like gays because they consider them female.

Anyway, like the movement she led, Andrea was a delusional, penis-envying ugga-mugga who projected her own contorted thoughts onto others. Instead of seeking therapy, she let the toxic experiences of her life stew, vomiting them on men collectively.

Betty Friedan (co-founder of NOW) spoke at an open forum in the early 1980s at Harvard Law School. I asked her why a 30-something female CEO could be kickass competent at work, then turn into a coy nincompoop socially at night. She sighed and said, "Women still have it rough."

She failed to admit that men had it rougher.

So perhaps NOW did create the Super Bowl to keep men in-check. Surely many guys do seem to vent all their feelings that one day. One guy might have prostate cancer. Another might not have seen his kids for a year. Another might be facing jail for asking a female co-worker to date. Still another might have lost a promotion to an affirmative-action hire. No matter. They won't show or share such personal pains with each other. Instead, they'll put on "game faces," remaining emotional islands. Easier to direct personal pains at on-screen personas. That way, everything remains virtuously virtual.

Now I've certainly got nothing against sports per se. Just noting that watching teams play online and off will not stop the ever-marching feminist army.

Another suspicious event: the charge in 1993 that Super Bowl Sunday was the worst day for acts of domestic violence against women.

http://www.snopes.com/crime/statistics/superbowl.asp

Who knows how much money women's groups extracted from football teams then, blackmailing them for being loutish brutes. Ironically, such physically rough-and-tough hombres seem too afraid to support male causes, like prostate cancer research.

On the other hand, gridiron gladiators pride themselves on being "pretty in pink" each October. That's when teams don pink garb to raise funds for breast cancer awareness. Forget that men get breast cancer, too. Forget that mastectomies aren't fun, either. Why don't these men's organizations ever heed men's diseases?

Which brings up a pet peeve I've had for 4 decades: where are the fund-raising committees in men's groups? How many have applied for funds from the NFL? How many solicited the Playboy Foundation or other men's magazines? Who reaches out to celebrity males reamed by courts (losing custody; jailed by false accusations; etc.)? Sure, donors might want anonymity. And sure, they might want to first see groups do things. But also for sure: they're unlikely to donate if they're never asked.

Finally, there's been recent research on the consequences of NFL "lifestyles." Turns out most players have short careers and long post-play suffering. Concussions often lead to depression, early Alzheimer's, and other diseases:

http://newsroom.ucla.edu/portal/ucla/ucla-researchers-first-to-image-242445.aspx

Plus I bet the partying-drinking-drugging temptations take a toll, too, a la the movie, North Dallas Forty:

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/North_Dallas_Forty

How manifestly manly their lives! They first "suck it up" and play when hurt. Discarded on the retirement slag heap, they continue suffering silently. Being male, no one wants to hear their plaints. Not even their former worshippers, the fanboys populating sports bars. After all, acknowledging the suffering of their former heroes might lead the bar boyos to feel their own pains. Then what? Who will help them if they swallow the red pills?

Suddenly, in the distance, a faint cheer grows ever louder:

"Give me an A!"

"Give me a V!"

"Give me an F!"

"Give me an M!"

All together now…..

UTSU, meet FTSU

February 6, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]

As promised, last night the University of Toronto Student Union passed a motion to condemn A Voice for Men and to demand that the University of Toronto prevent students from accessing this website on their servers. The motion also contained language proposing that our web hosting company be pushed into taking our site down.

It seems the Future Fascists of Canada are on a roll.

And now is the time that we will see where the university administration stands. Will they heed the call of junior jackboots and support the repression of free speech and the open dissemination of ideas? Or will they prove that the UTSU is alone as a band of Stalinist reprobates and reject their Orwellian ideals?

Time will tell, but I wanted to reassure the readers of A Voice for Men on a couple of irreversible facts. One, AVFM is not going anywhere. It is highly doubtful, but in a world of rampant misandry and unlimited possible scenarios it is feasible that we may have to change hosting companies. It would amount to no more than a hiccup in our operations, as we have remained prepared for many possibilities.

The other fact is that if the University of Toronto should decide to put blinders on their students, it will only result in a damning indictment of their school, and more U of T students coming to this website.

Indeed, if they are inclined to ban us, I will be more than happy to exploit such a ridiculous move for everything it is worth. And it is worth a lot.

The announcement that Norton has listed us as a "hate site" has resulted in a flood of traffic, much of it new, to this site. Just as when we were attacked and viciously defamed by the SPLC, it resulted in a great deal of attention and more MHRAs being born. The same thing happened with the Monash University debacle in Australia.

Every time they attack, we grow. Every lie they tell adds more members to our ranks. Every ill-fated, hateful attempt to silence us carries the message of the MHRM further. And that is how it will go, from here on out. We are too large to ignore, too truthful to credibly oppose and we, unlike the virulent bigots we oppose, have the momentum.

This train is not going to stop for anyone. The only suggestion I can offer is to get out of the way. I don't even want to hear you ask what happened when you get run over.

[/box]

Women’s woes: compared to what?

February 6, 2013 | by Robert Sides | Link | Original Link

A famous Les McCann jazz riff goes: “Tryin’ to make it real — compared to what?” It’s a question that needs to be asked, early and often, of the women’s movement. The answer reveals the selfishness and misandry at feminism’s dark heart. Because the truth is, for every female pain there is an even worse one for males.

The movie Gone With The Wind begins with Scarlett O’Hara being laced into a corset in preparation for a cotillion. Let’s assume it’s a whalebone corset. Feminists insist that such undergarments constrained women physically and socially. That such contraptions also made women more attractive to men is omitted or downplayed. As is the considerable power Scarlett’s sexuality gave her, employed to get men to do her bidding…including dying.

In short, feminists tell half the story. They fail to note that Southern men, not women, fought and died in the Civil War. Nor do they admit that wives ran plantations when husbands heeded the call-to-arms (so much for women not being racists!). But worse, they neglect to say just how that whalebone corset came to be.

I doubt many Moby Dicks swam amongst the catfish in the Mississippi River. So how, exactly, was the bone obtained? Did Scarlett’s maid, Mammy, order some from LL Bean? Or did her father, when visiting New Orleans, walk to the end of a pier and whistle for some whales, like calling his hunting dogs?

Poor bodice-stuffed Scarlett suffered so. What male travail could ever compare?

Well…imagine you’re Ishmael, a male peer of Miss Scarlett. Only you live in New Bedford, Massachusetts. To maintain your patriarchal stranglehold over Ms. O’Hara, all you have to do is ship out on a whaling boat. That’s it. Then you can lord it over her and women worldwide while maintaining your sea-legs on constantly rolling flotation device.

Alas, there are a few flies in the patriarchal ointment. Instead of Antebellum juleps and Southern-fried chicken, you savor rancid water and hardtack-avec-weevils. You don’t get a nice warm shower and Internet connection at night, either. Instead, you sleep in a back-breaking hammock surrounded by snoring, farting, fetid males. No Mammy brings you buttermilk pancakes in the morning. In fact, there are no women on board at all, though you’re young and horny, ripped and ready.

And your days? Unlike Scarlett (who rides horses and pinches her cheeks to impress her oppressors), you get to climb 60-foot masts to endlessly furl and unfurl thick canvas sails. You are privileged to do this while the boat tosses and turns: in storms, at night, in bitter cold. When not doing such easy-peasy things, you haul anchors, scrub decks, pump bilge. All by hand. Labor-saving machines (created by other merely mortal males) have yet to be invented.

Plus you can be flogged for all sorts of infractions.

You also get to have fun rowing small boats. Not for exercise or pleasure, though; you have to catch, kill, and haul huge fish. Huge fish that can kill you.

You can also die slicing-and-dicing said whales, not to make sushi, but so landlubber Susie-the-Oppressed can read about evil men by lamplight at night. Oh, and you risk falling into rendering vats stoked by flames that can easily set the ship on fire.

The point is, feminists never compare the lives of women to their male peers. Nor do they provide context.

Take the right to vote. It's a huge deal to feminists. Yet they routinely omit that throughout most of history no one voted. Kings rarely give a toss what serfs thought. Plus men only got universal suffrage in Great Britain when women did. Before then, only the moneyed/propertied folks voted. Even today, though, voting women don't have to protect that right with their lives. Men must.

Feminists also complain that, until rather recently, women didn't go to college in equal numbers. What they fail to say is that until the modern era, most people (male and female) didn't go to college. Most humans were farmers or other subsistence-living beings. When colleges were created, only the wealthy could afford and attend them. Even so, travel was dangerous. There were few roads and not a few robbers. So how many women, realistically, would have ridden on horseback through dark forests to get an education? Meanwhile, today's crop of courageous coeds yammer, on well-lit, manicured, police-patrolled campuses, that they feel "unsafe."

Suppose women did get degrees back-in-the-day. What would they have done with them? Work for IBM in the 1600s? Recite Greek to cows while milking?

What do soldierettes do in today's military compared to men? Mostly complain about being "sexually harassed" (which can, and does, mean everything under the sun…from being looked at to not being looked at). Does she meet the same requirements to join? No. Does she do the same jobs? No. Does she do the one thing all militaries do: close with the enemy? No. Yet despite all that inequality, feminists still brag (or is it "bray?") that fierce, feisty, feminists do what men do, and better.

It's like listening to a delusional Boy Scout brag about serving with Alexander the Great, Napoleon, and Patton. You don't have the heart to burst the bubble.

The difference, of course, is that Boy Scouts aren't constantly on the march, attacking half the world with lies, delusions, and feminist claptrap.

Finally, when forced to admit they lie, feminists play the "women give birth" trump card. It's meant to silence further comparisons. Yet what does it mean, really?

Women no more "give" birth than they give themselves heartbeats. Unless actively stopped by abortion, birthing continues as an autonomic process. It requires no will, just like breathing and moving bowels. So basically NOW wants international kudos for women who…poop.

As for it being a skill, females have birthed while brain-dead (some would say that's always the case!). And all mammals, including mice, reproduce. So are we to celebrate wimmin for doing what cows and rats do?

Plus, absent the “magic beans” testes provide, a uterus could be considered (were we to be as mean-spirited as feminists) a barren field.

Now, regarding the dangers of birthing: millions of women reproduce with no problems at all. And men have done much to make bearing children safe and painless. As for the “labor” itself, try suffering from prostate cancer; or being gut-shot during battle; or having an arm ripped-off in a factory.

So enough mewling for undeserved uterine accolades! While I’m sure birthing (“pooping a pumpkin”) is not always a picnic, it’s far less painful than many things men regularly endure. And endure silently. It just seems more horrific because women are allowed to air their suffering while men are not. In fact, women are often the biggest suppressors of male emotional expression. Why? Because it benefits their half of the world (the one supposedly kinder, gentler, and more intuitive). It makes it seem like only women suffer. But just like you shouldn’t judge a book by its cover, you shouldn’t assess the degree of pain by the shrillness of shrieks.

The next time feminists lie (which is nearly every time they speak/write) about female suffering, ask them and yourself what comparable things males suffered. It will keep things real when you ask, “Compared to what?”

www.youtube.com/watch?v=MzvlivbptXk

Listen to the lyrics. They begin about 2 minutes into the music.

A-Bomb an ant to end cyber-stalking

February 7, 2013 | by NCFM | Link | Original Link

NCFM NOTE: As you read what is below keep in mind the nature and severity of the alleged crime, which as far as can be discerned from the information below was an email or perhaps emails later construed as harassment and cyber-stalking. Let me repeat that "an email or emails," which were construed as cyber stalking. The man sending the emails was 2,000 miles from the woman who received them. Ok, he screwed up and did some stupid typing. But that's what it is: "typing." The recipient was under no obligation to open the emails. She could have blocked them after receiving one she found offensive or even abusive. None the less, we're talking emails not baseball bats or Uzis.

The man who sent the emails, Dan, was arrested, held in jail for weeks without bail or seeing an attorney, extradited from one state to another, convicted of Harassment and Stalking in a state in which he had never been in with the accusing woman, sentenced to two years probation, fired from his $100,000 a year job, and he lost everything he owned as well as his security clearance, which means he can never work in his chosen field again. He's now destitute.

This absurd overreaction to an email, or emails, is tantamount to dropping an A-bomb on an ant because it's making you uncomfortable. Unfortunately, stories such as this one are all too common. The only winners were those whose livings are derived from protecting nobody while destroying those who have done little or no harm, the involved law enforcement officers, judge, and support staffs.

Taxpayers were big losers too since this debacle had to have cost several hundred thousand dollars.

Better would have been for law enforcement upon receiving a complaint to contact Dan and tell him to stop with the emails.

Dan's accuser, like thousands upon thousands of similar accusers allegedly lied…and, lied…and lied. If true who is the real abuser? Who should have been convicted of a crime?

---

by Charles Corry, PhD.

Introduction

In an EJF newsletter posted in July 2005 we pointed out that domestic violence laws provided numerous opportunities for variants on a "honey trap." Later, in a separate chapter we have outlined the impact of domestic violence laws on veterans and national security.

The problems haven't gone away.

It is rare that the neo-Marxist radical feminists, that I refer to as "redfems" and whose ideology underlies these draconian laws, have the physical attributes requisite for a "honey trap." However, they have compensated by becoming lawyers, judges, prosecutors, "family" counselors, DV treatment providers, victim advocates, and shelter workers, all financed by the DV industry on the public dollar.

In those positions they have found millions of fellow travelers willing to seek a free lunch under "no fault" divorce, false allegations of domestic violence, restraining orders, etc. And it is quite easy to lose or ignore a few cases where national security becomes an issue in this barrage of cases.

But the Equal Justice Foundation is routinely contacted by NCO's and officers at bases like Schriever AFB when airmen are arrested as they immediately lose their security clearances. Special Forces troops from Fort Carson also trickle through with the same problems. Numerous civilians/veterans working on classified projects are also routinely destroyed as Dan's story below well illustrates. These are not easy people to replace but their destruction certainly furthers the radical feminist goal of destroying the patriarchy.

Dan's story

(EJF annotations and comments in blue and square brackets [comments])

I am a 62 year old male and resident of Maryland for the past 12 years. I worked for the Naval Research Labs in Washington, D.C. in the EW (Electronic Warfare) & Aerospace group. I had a Secret clearance and am also a Commercial pilot. My prior marriage was to my high school sweetheart and we have 3 college graduated kids together. My son is still in graduate school. I have NO prior issues with Domestic Violence.

In 2008, about 12 years after my divorce, I met a 36-year-old woman who grew up in Colorado. Kira had 3 kids, all in their early teens. She had been divorced for about 5 years and lived just outside of Baltimore. After her divorce, her ex moved back to CO where he was also from, leaving Kira to raise 3 kids alone in Maryland. We met on Match.com.

After 9 months we were engaged and looking for a house to live in together here in MD. Kira was struggling to make ends meet when I met her, using credit cards to make her mortgage.

[image]Her oldest son has a congenital condition causing him to breath through a tracheal tube with an enlarged neck and tongue. The kids, an older daughter and two boys only 11 months apart, did not see their dad hardly at all. Kira would try to send them back to Colorado during summer break to visit with him and her step mom and mother, whom all lived in the Denver area. Sending the kids back to Colorado in the summer gave Kira a break also. She got to date and go out dancing without kids around.

When I came into the picture, it took a little while to be accepted into the family as they did not have a man in their lives for some years. We eventually settled into a family unit and I would stay at her house and they would stay at my apartment on occasion. We had a difficult time at the end of our first year together as I found out that Kira had been communicating with her ex-boyfriend behind my back. Some nasty emails and texts followed and we ended up getting Restraining Orders against each other.

However, we made up shortly thereafter and actually moved into a leased house together. Kira's house was an old duplex in a bad neighborhood in a poor school system. She rented her house out and we moved into a nice big house in a better town with excellent schools. We lived together in that leased house for the next year together.

Kira was not paying her mortgage on her house during this time and instead banking that money and her house went into foreclosure. She was unsuccessful in trying to obtain a Home Loan Refinance under the Obama program. Stress increased due to this and the fact that we were trying to get some medical remedy for her son. I had a plane and flew Kira and her son up to Boston Children's Hospital where I had found a doctor who specializes in his condition and was well known across the United States. I flew them there many times over our time together. I started a Group on Facebook for kids with his condition where kids and parents could share their issues .

When Kira's housing issues became too much, she moved back into her duplex after asking her tenants to leave early. This was in July 2011. There was not enough room in her old duplex for me, the boys had to share their old bedroom again and life got difficult. I moved back into my old apartment building and we tried to work out some solution to her foreclosure problems. I contacted the state, banks, everyone and nobody could help.

Her son was scheduled for another operation. And then in March 2011, Kira decided to leave for 2 weeks and fly to Prague, leaving her kids alone and telling me to stay away. She was acting irrational. [A trip to a city like Prague by someone having financial difficulties is always a red flag and suggests Kira may have been a bit more than a redfem fellow traveler.].

When she returned, we talked and went out but it was not anything like the couple we once were. We had talked about her options and the fact that I had cancelled an offer I had made on a house we were talking about buying and that we were ending our relationship as it stood. I suggested her best option might be to move back to Colorado where she has some family support and her ex could be closer to their kids and be able to take them sometimes even though he remarried into a family with two more kids with his new wife.

We talked about me helping her drive a moving van back to Colorado with her. The week before she was to move, she told me she didn't need my help. It was then that I found out she had been talking to an old high school boyfriend back in Colorado for months and months. I was suspicious earlier as she gave me Herpes a few months earlier, after over 2.5 years of having sex with her. Now I was angry. [Note that Dan never goes to Colorado with or without her.]

During her drive back to Colorado, Kira had flown in her old ex boyfriend to have him help drive the van from Maryland to Colorado. Someone she told me she had not seen in many years or talked to except on Facebook maybe once every few years. All lies I now knew. I called her leaving messages, asking her why she did such a thing. I texted her calling her a cheating slut over the next few days. [Not a good thing to do at any time but these messages originate in Maryland.]

When she got to Colorado she went to the police. Said I was threatening and scaring her and harassing her. I never made any physical threat to her or her property. She told the police that she had to move to Colorado to get away from me, that I was abusive. Total lies. I was charged with cyber harassment by a county attorney in Broomfield (Joe Psyga) with Broomfield County Judge Amy E. Bockman signing the Warrant, and arrested in Maryland, while walking my dog. [Note that county judges only have territorial jurisdiction within their county over crimes committed in that county. Dan was never in Broomfield County, Colorado, and, at the time, Kira had not yet established residency and was still a Maryland resident. But Dan's challenges on the question of jurisdiction were simply ignored by the courts.

[This is far from the first time we have seen Colorado judges far exceeding their authority and assuming jurisdiction over cases far outside their boundaries.]

I spent 2 weeks in jail in Maryland before Colorado came to extradite me. My $5,000 bail was argued by the DA and requested $50k bail! I spent the next 4 weeks in Broomfield jail trying to get a bail hearing where it was eventually lowered to $20K and I was able to bail out. My case went to Judge Thomas Ensor. [Ensor is a 17th Judicial District Judge who is consistently rated very weak by attorneys. Neither Bockman or Ensor had jurisdiction over a Maryland citizen and any charges should have been brought against Dan in Maryland, or in federal court if an interstate crime was claimed. In order to have jurisdiction in a case before the bar the court must establish that it has:

€ Personal jurisdiction is an authority over a person, regardless of his location.
€ Territorial jurisdiction is an authority confined to a bounded space, including all those present therein, and events which occur there.
€ Subject matter jurisdiction is an authority over the subject of the legal questions involved in the case.

For jurisdiction to be complete a court must have a concurrence of both subject matter and personal jurisdiction or subject matter and territorial jurisdiction. And while the court had subject matter jurisdiction it had neither personal or territorial jurisdiction over Dan but he was arrested in Maryland on a warrant signed by a county judge in Colorado.]

The DA argued to allow 404(b) "evidence" which were the earlier emails from 2008, before Kira and I lived together. Kira had saved all of them and gave them to the DA. She did not want me messing up her new hopeful relationship with her old Colorado boyfriend and was angry at me for getting his phone number (he's a musician and has it posted online) and calling him.

During these 6 weeks in jail, I lost my job making $118k/yr, was evicted from my apartment where all my worldly belongings were placed on the street and went through all of what little money I had in travel and lawyer fees. I lost my plane which I had owned for 17 years without one late payment.

We eventually went to trial. I did not testify and left my fate in an inept lawyer's hands (Gary Fielder). I was found guilty on two counts of Harassment and Stalking; even though I made no threat and wasn't even in the State of Colorado. They said I was a Credible Threat and she had Emotional Stress. She lied to get probable cause by telling the police I was previously arrested in Maryland for domestic violence. I was not. She lied stating I was coming to Colorado to harm her when she knew very well I was in Maryland as the police 'pinged' my cell phone. She lied or misstated the truth on many points, but the young (female) ADA had no other cases to pursue I'm told and spent all of her efforts on mine. [See introductory comments about redfem prosecutors.]

I never got to talk to a lawyer while sitting in jail in Maryland, even though I made DAILY requests in writing. I specifically stated that I did not waive extradition while in Maryland jails, yet I was extradited. I requested by Habeas Corpus to speak with a lawyer, to have a Hearing demanding particulars of the Colorado complaint and request for ExtraditionŠ all ignored.

Judge Ensor, even though he NEVER heard me speak, called me names in court, said he was happy I would lose my Secret Clearance and did not let my 26-year-old son speak on my behalf at my sentencing or my lady friend, yet DID allow Kira's stepmother to speak and ask for a more severe penalty for me.

I got two-years probation. It ruined my life. I now have a Felony 5 conviction. I will never work again in my industry. I am 62-years old and have absolutely nothing. This is equivalent to a life sentence for me at my age, forced into this financial hole.

Judge Ensor is a hanging judge in my book, without any common sense, handing out insane punishments like candy. He should not be a judge.

These Cyber crime laws are unconstitutional and the Colorado laws are WAY overreaching and WAY beyond their legal jurisdiction.

Thanks for reading. Hope you can get rid of bad judges and crazy laws. Bring back the Constitution and some common sense!

Nicole Ryan hires her hit man

February 7, 2013 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

Is anything surprising coming out of Canada anymore?

I suggest that the Canadian government just introduce legislation that a woman attempting to murder a man be reduced to a misdemeanor, maybe carrying a small fine. It would be more honest that way, save the Crown a lot of money, and at least put men on notice.

You can subscribe to Christian, aka xxToYeDXx, right here.

AVfM Radio: What is a man?

February 7, 2013 | by AVfM Radio | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]

What is a man?

This is a simple question, but difficult to answer in any sense other than conformity to public narrative.

Public narrative, which happens to say in a never-ending cycle of messages that a man is a beast, a predator, a cretin, a dolt, a rapist, a loser, a barely tolerable hair covered beer drinking fart emitting boobs and football fascinated obsolete and not quite human inconvenient waste of space.

This message prevalent in our media is of course both a lie, and a message of hatred.

So what is a man?

Tonight, Girl Writes What, the Wooly Bumblebee, John the Other and James Huff will toss this question around. And they might even have an answer.

Listen tonight at 6PM Pacific Time, 8 PM Mountain time at http://www.blogtalkradio.com/avoiceformen/2013/02/08/what-is-a-man

Call in number for the show is 310 388 9709

[/box]

Dates of anticipation review

February 7, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Warning: This post has absolutely nothing to do with men's human rights. In fact, I am pretty sure it has nothing to do with much of anything. It is just a small attempt by an aging man to let you in on some of the weirdness that inhabits my mind, or what is left of it. PE

This is the eve of my birthday. I'll be 56 tomorrow, provided nothing happens. Life's less pleasant possibilities, death for instance, occur to you more often as you get older.

But as I do each time I "click off another one," I have been thinking of the past a bit. This year it has been about what I have no other way to describe but dates of anticipation. I would whittle that down to an acronym, but at my age I am not fond of this particular one, so I will go with the whole enchilada thank you very much.

Anyway, these dates of anticipation are, for me, as I am not sure this sounds like anything but stupid to anyone else, particular dates, years to be precise, that are burned into my cultural consciousness. They are years that resonate, I suppose, with most people of my generation, even allowing for some cultural differences. They are years that I anticipated in my youth, that once seemed like a lifetime away, and that now but a matter of not so recent history.

The first of those years was 1984, made famous by the Orwell novel. As a kid in the sixties, and a young man in the seventies, conversations over campfires and dinner tables, and later over joints and Jimi Hendrix, buzzed with predictions over what things would be like with Big Brother in charge. We were all clueless that it would actually be Big Sister, but I am not going to ruin my perfectly sensible warning now and go any further down that road.

The year came and went, without fanfare, and set us up like a chip shot for the next date of anticipation. That was 1986, the year that Halley's Comet passed through our solar system. It was actually a big deal in my years of anticipation. I remember visions running through my mind of a night sky on fire, a giant spark cutting across the blackness of space with a tail that would stretch all the way to the horizon. That is how I imagined it, at least.

What a dud it turned out to be, though it was not that much of a disappointment. In 1986 I was 29 and had already started to figure out that life was full of them.

I don't mean that to sound morose. Life has always held good things as well. It is just that my long awaited vision of a sky in flames was not going to be one of them.

Unlike 1984, 1986 did not lead me to the doorstep of the next date of anticipation. In fact, it was to be a 15 year wait for the next one in 2001. I know, I skipped 2000 entirely, the dawn of the new millennium. But I have to stick with what is real for me. The powerful imprint of Kubrick's classic movie burned into my brain to such a degree that the year 2000 did not seem near as futuristic. Definitely 2001, with the supercomputer HAL and the Monolith and Maker of Worlds; that was the future. Not 2000. It was scarcely a blip on my radar. Even with the Y2K frenzy it did not make much of an impression. Maybe that was Halley's fault for putting on such a poor show. Maybe Halley's fizzle was the destroyer of my dreams.

Anyway, 2001 came and went, leaving me almost lost, with little to look forward to in super important future dates of anticipation. Luckily, in 1984, the year of Big Sister, I had already been saved from complete despair. They made another movie. 2010, The Year We Make Contact. Horrible flick. So bad that it is almost embarrassing to mention here, but it was made before Halley fucked everything up so it still left an impression in my mind, and qualified as a date of anticipation. And it bought me nine more years of something to look forward to.

And so I did. The years passed quickly

It brought me nine years closer to writing this goofy essay, a much enhanced internet and AVFM, but as I said I am not going to go down that road for now.

And so it leaves me here now, having said very little, and leaving me quite sure what little I said means even less than I thought it would.

And the dates of anticipation are all gone. Well, except for one.

Another year that is totally engraved into my youth and my consciousness came from a little known garage duo calling themselves Zager and Evans, which I suppose was their names. They were a one hit wonder, but I heard that one hit, with all its spooky futuristic ambiance, so much that it, too, carved its way into some corner of my consciousness and took a strong enough foothold that it has never left.

I think I may be screwed on seeing this one.

Thank God.

More evidence released on the Ryan matter

February 7, 2013 | by Dan Perrins | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]

Today the CBC released some of the R.C.M.P. video evidence of the attempted murder of Micheal Ryan by his ex-wife Nicole Doucet Ryan. I want you to pay close attention to a few things in this video evidence. First, how cheery she is about this whole situation.

Does this seem like someone who is in fear for their life?

Next, the section of the video where Nicole is asked by the officer about whether Mr. Ryan had beat her or was ever physically abusive. She replies in the negative. I must admit I am having a WTF moment here in ten foot tall letters. She has no reason to lie to the undercover R.C.M.P. officer and when given the opportunity to let us know how badly she was abused she informs us matter-of-factly that she was not.

Last, notice how she reveals she had been planning this since September, and how she is still technically married to Micheal. She admits it would work out good for her if something were to 'happen' to him. You can hear her "uhh huh" about the 2:30 minute mark in the recording as she sits there nodding and smiling.

I believe in legal mumbo jumbo they would call that motive.

Yes this truly is the demeanor of an abused woman who is in fear for her life. We can see it in her smiles and happy disposition.

And yet the Supreme Court of Canada feels that putting this poor abused woman on trial should not happen.

Its time for Canadians to get their shit together and stop this misandric injustice system.

[/box]

Take back the day for the wrongly accused

February 7, 2013 | by Pierce Harlan | Link | Original Link

Just when you thought you've seen the worst, just when you thought that the community of the wrongly accused couldn't be disrespected any more than it has, along comes Jessica Vickery, assistant director of Health Education and Promotion at the Student Health Center at the University of Alabama.

Vickery has uttered perhaps the most astounding thing we've heard since we started doing our blogs, False Rape Society and Community of the Wrongly Accused, which is saying a lot — sit down for this one:

> Some people think there are false accusations. There's really no false accusations. If someone feels they didn't give consent, then they didn't give consent.

Vickery said that when it comes to sexual assault, false accusations are not possible, despite cultural beliefs otherwise.

Read it for yourself: http://cw.ua.edu/2013/02/04/consent-thingy/

[image]
Jessica Vickery
Vickery's comments are other-worldly, to put it charitably. To suggest that "consent" is determined by a woman's "feelings" instead of her outward, objective manifestations of assent is blatant misinformation that might encourage young women to falsely cry "rape" against their innocent male classmates.

And given her denial of the irrefutable fact of false rape claims, Vickery should have no voice in the public discourse on these issues.

But wait, there's more in the news — this might be even worse: University of Montana Grizzlies quarterback Jordan Johnson is about to go on trial for rape in a trial that will attract enormous national attention. The defense filed a motion to dismiss the case, complaining that the police were biased in its investigation, that they started from a presumption of guilt rather than innocence. The defense pointed to the chilling words of the Missoula Police Department policy manual that reads "every sex crime investigation is to be initiated with the belief it is true until evidence demonstrates otherwise."

Missoula County District Court judge Karen Townsend denied the motion to dismiss the case, stating that the accused is not entitled to a presumption of innocence while a rape investigation is going on. She wrote: "It is not until the time of trial that the defendant is guaranteed a right to a fair trial and is entitled to the presumption of innocence."

The defense motion has ripped off an ugly scab on the way rape claims are handled in many counties in America, and on many college campuses. There is a rush-to-judgment mindset; zealots are agenda-driven to nail sex offenders at all costs, the innocent be damned. For them, the goal is to get convictions, not to get at the truth.

When will it end? One inequity cascades upon another, one wrong is piled atop the last one, until finally, decent people feel the urge to do what Howard Beale commanded in Network: stick their heads out a window and yell, “I’m as mad as hell, and I’m not going to take this anymore!”

It is time to free our sons from the pitch-black hell of false sex accusations and to take back the day for the wrongly accused. Maybe, just maybe, outrage will be the blueprint for change.

Feminism and the disposable male

February 7, 2013 | by Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) | Link | Original Link

---

The #1 video on YouTube on the subject of feminism for more than a year has been "Feminism and the Disposable Male" by A Voice for Men Contributing Editor Karen Straughan, also known as Girl Writes What. Unlike most videos that "go viral," it has seen not an explosion of views but steadily increasing views. It has ignited a firestorm of hatred against its author. People have put up pictures of her face battered and bloodied to show their hatred for her. She's called a right-wing extremist, a "back to the kitchen" traditionalist, a misogynist, a traitor to her vagina–she's even been called the "Tokyo Rose of feminism." Much of this is rather amusing since she's a bisexual atheist who writes erotica professionally, and often doesn't even vote–not because she thinks women shouldn't vote, but because, like Penn Jilett, she thinks it's a waste of time. Amusingly, she's also often been called a "feminist extremist" (often laced with many more vulgar epithets).

The fact of the matter is that and many others have thought these things for many years. And we're used to being shouted down and told to shut up for saying them things. But it appears to be even worse when a woman says them. Is it because they fear that if a woman says them, they can't dismiss her as a "whiny loser" like they do to men who say these things? I suspect so.

A number of readers of have complained that they can't stand listening to Karen (Girl Writes What) talk for 15 minutes. I do not understand this complaint at all, I've always found her speaking style compelling, but there's no accounting for tastes. So I asked Karen for a transcript, and when she said she'd lost it, I transcribed it for her. And so, here I present, proudly, my friend Karen's "Feminism and the Disposable Male." I hope you like it as much as I do. –DE

Not too long ago I had it out with a feminist who had come into a male-safe space from a feminist blog just to scoff at the idea of male disposability. She basically said that the entire concept was a myth, that men's lived experiences were completely wrong, and that they were just a bunch of whiners who were complaining over nothing.

That got me thinking about the concept of male disposability and how that interacts with the feminist movement. Male disposability has been around since the dawn of time, and it's based on one very very straightforward dynamic: when it comes to the well-being of others, women come first, men come last. This is just the way it has always been. Seats in lifeboats, being rescued from burning buildings, who gets to eat: really, society places men dead last every time, and, society expects men to place themselves dead last every time.

Humans have always had a dynamic of "women and children first" and that has not changed at all. The 93% workplace death gap has to be evidence of this, if only because there's nobody with any kind of importance or power who's interested in changing it at all. In fact I remember reading an article in a British Columbia paper not long ago that described the increasing proportion of female injuries on the job as a huge problem, and the insane thing was the change reflected a decrease in male injuries rather than an increase in female ones. Men's injuries on the job had gone down because the economic downturn had put so many men out of work in the resource sector that there just weren't as many trees or pieces of heavy equipment falling on men as there had been before. And yet, this was framed as a huge problem for women that required immediate action to solve. It's like if men aren't dying at work that 20 times the rate that women are, we must be doing something wrong as a society.

Back when we were still living in caves that attitude was necessary for human survival. Nature is a really harsh mistress, especially when you think of all the animals that never get to die of old age. Things were a lot different for humans through most of our history on this planet than they are now. Life was dangerous, human settlements were small, isolated from each other, and one big disaster that took out a lot of women pretty much meant the end of the entire shebang for that group of people. So really, the level of importance that a human settlement placed on the well-being of women and children reflected almost always how successful that settlement was. And that can be expanded to encompass entire societies.

I keep hearing from the feminist camp that femaleness has always been undervalued by society and that maleness is preferred. But I've always contended that it's the exact opposite: the feminine is intrinsically and individually valuable, simply because females are the limited factor in reproduction. When it comes to producing babies, every woman counts, whereas biologically one very happy man could probably do the work of hundreds in that regard. So the level of instinctive importance we humans place on the safety and provisioning of women and their children is one of the main reasons why we've been able to be so successful that we've come to dominate this planet.

While I will concede that this drive to keep women safe from all harm has often resulted in extreme limits being placed on women's mobility, their agency, their power of decision to direct their own lives, all through history and many cultures, and in many cultures even today, I think it's telling that those cultures tend to be the most backward. When you consider the restrictions placed on women in places like Afghanistan, and then you consider that if we "bombed them into the stone age" it might be progress, I think you could conclude that the most successful societies had a good balance between allowing women freedom and the ability to choose and direct their own paths in life, and the need to protect them and provide for them.

However, feminists will insist that these kinds of restrictions being placed on women in those kinds of societies are the ultimate form of objectification. You lock up your possessions to make sure they will never be lost or stolen or harmed. Honestly, if I were a guy on a battlefield I might appreciate being objectified in that way. I think if I was going to be an object, I'd rather be a sexual one or somebody's prized possession than an object that can simply be thrown in the trash or smashed into pieces in the service of somebody else's purpose.

Feminists also have a very simplistic idea that our willingness to absolve women of their crimes, slap them on the wrist, spare them punishment, comes from a deep disrespect society has for women's person-hood—not seeing them as full human beings capable of looking after themselves, that we see them as children who don't know any better. And while there are parallels there in our desire to protect both women and children from not only their own poor decisions but the full consequences of their shitty behavior, it's really not as simple as they try to make it out to be.

Seriously, even today—even today in 2011!–we fully expect that if it comes down to a man and a woman in a burning building and you can only save one, the expectation is that you choose the woman every single time. So honestly, whose humanity are we placing above whose here? We're not talking about going to work, we're not talking about getting an education, we're not talking about freedom to decide what you want to be in life. We're not talking about getting to take Tae Kwon Do. We're talking seats in lifeboats here. The person in the lifeboat is going to survive, no matter how capable or incapable they are of managing their own life, and the person going down with the ship is going to die, no mater how independent, self-sufficient and awesome he is. That's the equation: one life, more valuable than another, and the woman wins every time.

So honestly, is there any argument, anywhere, that women's humanity has always been held in higher regard by society than men's? To be important to society, a woman merely has to be; a man has to do in order for his life to have any meaning to anyone other than himself. I think it was ManWomanMyth who said our society reduces men from human beings to human doings. I really think that's an apt analogy. We measure a man's worthiness to wear the title of "man" and therefore the title of "human," through how useful he is, either to society or to women, and one of the most useful things a man can do even now in the eyes of society is to put women and children before himself.

While I think there is plenty of argument that this attitude is at least partly innate—the way most survival traits are, even collective ones—if it starts in the chromosomes we really do everything we can as a society to reinforce this dynamic. Studies have shown that even though baby boys tend to cry and fuss more than baby girls, parents are quicker to attend to or console a baby girl than they are a baby boy. Even just the level of acceptance of infant male circumcision in our culture, when female genital mutilation was banned pretty much the first afternoon we all heard it existed, really says a lot about the differing expectations we have for males and females. Speaking as a mother, the last thing I would ever have wanted was to hear my child cry, especially when they're at an age when they're completely helpless, completely at the mercy of outside forces, and utterly dependent on the adults in their lives for every last thing, and yet even knowing how painful that cut is, we expect baby boys only days old to just suck that up.

Just think about what these very first interactions and experiences, these differences in how we nurture our babies depending on what gender they are, what this teaches them: What do we teach baby girls when we attend to their crying so quickly? We teach them to ask for help because their needs are important. We teach them to let us know when they're afraid or in pain because it's important for us to know when they're sick or in danger or hurt, so we can do something about it. We teach them that when they're sad or lonely to summon comfort and comfort will be there. We teach them that they're important. Their needs and well-being, both emotional and physical, are important just because.

And what are we teaching baby boys when we leave them to cry? We teach them that there's not much point in seeking help because it will be grudgingly given if at all We teach them that they should become self-contained in their ability to deal with emotions like fear, helplessness, loneliness, sadness, pain, distress: we teach them stoicism. We teach them to suck it up. We teach them that their fear and their pain are things that are best ignored. We teach them that their emotional and physical well-being are just not as important as other things.

Given all that, is it any wonder it's like pulling teeth to get a man to go to the doctor when he's sick?

What we're teaching that baby boy is all the things a man needs to know and feel and believe about himself if he's going to stand in front of a cabin with a rifle while his wife and kids hide inside. We're preparing him for the day he has to fix a bayonet to a rifle and charge a hill under enemy fire, and we're preparing him to make a decision to resign himself to an icy fate while women and children escape in the lifeboats. We are teaching him to internalize his own disposability.

And baby girls? By attending to her crying so quickly, by letting her know that she's inherently important to us, we're preparing her for the day she has to think of her own safety first, even if it means the man she loves is left standing alone with a rifle in front of a cabin. We're preparing her to take that seat in the lifeboat. We're training her to not allow guilt or empathy or acknowledgment of a man's humanity, or any sense that he might deserve it more, to convince her give her seat to him. Because for millenia, the human species absolutely depended on her feeling 100% entitled to that seat.

And that brings me to feminism. You know, the patriarchy smashers? Those righteous avengers of equality? Dogged dismantlers of every single gender role? What exactly is feminism doing to dismantle this traditional role of the disposable male?

Feminism's greatest victories have only reinforced in everyone that society still owes women provision, protection, help and support just because they're women. In its collective dismissal and abandonment of male victims of domestic violence, it only reinforces in men that it's pointless to ask for help, because men's needs are of no relevance, and their fear and pain don't mean anything to anyone. Feminism teaches us to put women's need at the forefront of every single issue, political or social. Whether that issue is domestic violence law, sexual assault law, institutional sexism, social safety net, education funding, homeless shelters, government funding for shovel-ready jobs—jobs that didn't stay shovel-ready once women got wind of them.

Everywhere you look—everywhere you look!–there are feminists pushing their way to the front of the line demanding women's "fair share" of all of the goodies, the good stuff, the loot, the booty, the cookies. Even if women don't need it. Even if women don't deserve it.

And even if somebody else needs it and deserves it more.

And they get it, because we give it to them.

Feminism has done nothing but exploit this dynamic of the expectation on men to put everybody else before themselves. Especially women. Women's safety and support, women's well-being, and women's emotional needs, always come first. This is the most stunning piece of society-wide manipulative psychology I think I have ever come across. Feminism has been down with old-school chivalry right from the start. They might seem like strange bedfellows, but they're not. Because both concepts are built on a firm foundation of female self-interest.

We made our way as humans through a really harsh history and we became the dominant force on this planet. One of the reasons we were so successful is because we have consistently put women's basic needs first. Their need for safety, support, and provision. It was in humanity's best interest for women to be essentially self-interested, and for men to be essentially self-sacrificing. But we don't need that dynamic anymore. Our species is in no danger of extinction. We're 7 billion people clogging up the works here!

What's the worst that could happen if we all just collectively decided that men were no more disposable than women, and women were no more valuable than men? In fact the greatest danger I see to us right now is that in our desperation to bend over and give women everything they want and everything they say they need, we've unbalanced society to the point where we're in danger of seriously toppling over.

And really? The only difference I see between the traditional role and the new one for men with respect to disposability is that maleness, manhood: it used to be celebrated, it used to be admired, and it used to be rewarded, because it was really necessary, and because the personal cost of it to individual men was so incredibly high.

But now? Now, we still expect men to put women first, and we still expect society to put women first, and we still expect men to not complain about coming in dead last every damn time. But men don't even get our admiration anymore. All they get in return is to hear about what assholes they are. Is there any wonder why they're starting to get pissed off?

–Karen (AKA Girl Writes What)

This article updated slightly in February 2013. Karen Straughan's YouTube channel can be found here and her blog can be found here. I am enormously proud to call her my friend, and while at first the hatred and irrationality directed at her sickened me, I now view that as to be expected: people who question society's most basic assumptions are often hated, ostracized, and demonized.–DE

France upholds the ban on paternity tests

February 8, 2013 | by Lucy Brown | Link | Original Link

Don't worry! There's no mistake in the title. It is true – French men are forbidden by law to attempt to find out whether the child they are paying for is in fact their child or not. In fact, it has been illegal for men to attempt to find out if their child is theirs for many years. But a few days ago, the ban was challenged once again–and the government upheld the ban.

Is it really a surprise that a socialist government disagreed that men have human rights too?

What's even more striking is that there is NO mainstream media mentioning this, albeit the law is on the books and available for everyone to read[1].

In theory, paternity tests are still legal, but only under a court order, with the explicit consent of the mother and under a strict supervision by the State. Annually, the French courts issue roughly 1500 orders for paternity tests. 1500 – that's it! And the number is going down as the courts become more and more reluctant to issue such orders.

To put the 1500 number into perspective, the International Biosciences' website report regarding this situation reads as follows[2]:

> Some statistics from the Nantes Atlantique Genetic Institute reveal that every year in the region of 15,000 French fathers go online and buy paternity testing kits. Furthermore, a Swiss lab recently said that 60% of the tests it performs are sent there from France. Meanwhile, a Spanish lab confirmed similar figures, saying that French men make up 80% of its customer-base.

So, 10 times more men than those allowed legally chose to break the law. Moreover, Swiss and Spanish laboratories make good money mainly from French customers who aren't allowed to know whether the child for whose upbringing they pay for is theirs or not.

But what happens if you break the law? The website of one of the very few laboratories that actually make paternity tests (under a dubious legal regime) writes, citing the French legislation as follows[3]:

> One should understand the risks involved before making a paternity ensuring beforehand that the delivery address is not subjected to the French law. If you order a paternity test via the Internet or by telephone in France, not only the shipment may be confiscated by the customs but you risk a year in prison and a fine of € 15,000 (Article 226-28 of the Penal Code). The Supreme Court, the civil matters section, has sole jurisdiction to hear actions concerning filiation.

So this is it: if you are, let's say, a white French man and you don't trust your white wife's words that the semi-Asian child is indeed yours – then tough luck! If she doesn't consent to a paternity test and the state says that you should “man up” and pay, then that’s it.

Moreover, if you still do want to find out that, you risk a 15,000 Euro fine (20,100 $US) and you might also end up spending one year in jail. And of course, you still have to pay child support, even though the child is not yours.

The French government keeps this ban in place arguing that not allowing men to find out whether their wives cuckolded them or not preserves the peace within French families. Moreover, some ~~ideologically driven bigots~~ psychologists go as far as to say monstrous things like this[2]:

> French psychologists suggest that fatherhood is determined by society not by biology.

Really? By that logic, I could bring a few kids from the street into my home and when I divorce my wife I can hold her accountable for child support, right? Because motherhood is determined by society and not by biology. And if you say “it doesn’t work like that” then you are nothing less than a bigot.

Study after study has shown that the illegitimacy rate in Europe is somewhere around 1 in 30. This means that one child in every classroom has a different father than the one whom he or she thinks is the father and in most cases, the natural/biological father has no way to know. And even real biological fathers may always wonder.

Paternity fraud is one of the very few crimes that indeed has a sex. Violence doesn’t have a sex. Rape doesn’t have a sex. Heck, not even breast cancer has a sex. But paternity fraud is a crime of deceit that has a sex – and it’s the female sex. It’s an offense committed solely by women against men and children. And it’s an offense that is not only legal almost everywhere, but actively encouraged by the French state by putting men who seek the truth in jail and making them pay huge fines (15,000 euros is earned by the average Frenchman in 4 to 7 months).

And what’s worse is that nobody in the mainstream media even mentions anything about this. Just like they’re also silent about the Istanbul convention. Moreover, Germany is now planning to do the same thing – to ban men from finding out the truth.

To override this nonsense will take years. In Sweden, for instance, paternity tests were legalized only in 2003 after a 55 year (!) long battle between a man and the feminist judicial system in Sweden. He eventually won. Ragnar Johansson fought from 1948 to 2003 to prove that he is not the father of the girl for which he paid child support[4][5][6]. He did not get a dime back from the money he was forced to pay to his cuckolding wife. But at least Sweden (and Norway) changed their law after this.

A few years ago, an acquaintance of mine was talking about the Cold War. And, while trying to say something whilst thinking of something else, she commenced a sentence as follows: “And the Soviet France then decided to…” We all had a great laugh at that point but now, “the Soviet France” might indeed be an accurate description of what’s going on in terms of the economic and individual freedom of Frenchmen.

[1]

http://www.legifrance.gouv.fr/affichCodeArticle.do;jsessionid=31ADE74F1A72F9EAB11F2682C486084E.tpdjo17v_2?cidTexte=LEGITEXT000006070719&idArticle=LEGIARTI000006418005&dateTexte=20081113&categorieLien=id

[2] http://www.ibdna.com/regions/UK/EN/?page=paternity-testing-ban-upheld-in-france

[3] http://www.test-paternite.info/legislation/legislation-test-paternite.php (in French)

[4] http://www.cbsnews.com/8301-201_162-538862.html

[5] http://news.google.com/newspapers?nid=1955&dat=20030201&id=UvohAAAAIBAJ&sjid=SaMFAAAAIBAJ&pg=5841,18493

[6] http://www.ibdna.com/regions/UK/EN/?page=paternityTestingEndsCase

Note: This article is also available in Italian.

This article has been translated into Swedish and it is available on the website of the publication named „Dissidenten" – http://dissidenten.nu/2013/02/11/frankrike-uppratthaller-forbudet-mot-faderskapstest/

Denna artikel har översatts till svenska och det är tillgängligt på webbplatsen för offentliggörande som heter "Dissidenten".

The Catalog of Anti-Male Shaming Tactics

February 8, 2013 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

Also known as The Anti-Male Shaming Tactics Catalogue

"Shaming tactics." This phrase is familiar to many Men's Rights Activists. It conjures up the histrionic behavior of female detractors who refuse to argue their points with logic. Yet women are not the only ones guilty of using shaming tactics against men. Male gynocentrists use them, too. Shaming tactics are emotional devices meant to play on a man's insecurities and shut down debate. They are meant to elicit sympathy for women and to demonize men who ask hard questions. Most, if not all, shaming tactics are basically ad homimem attacks.

Anyway, it might be helpful to categorize the major shaming tactics that are used against men whenever a discussion arises about feminism, men's issues, romance, etc. The following list contains descriptions of shaming tactics, some examples of quotes employing the tactics, and even colourcoded aliases for mnemonic purposes. Enjoy.

Charge of Irascibility (Code Red)

Discussion: The target is accused of having anger management issues. Whatever negative emotions he has are assumed to be unjustifiable. Examples:

- "You're bitter!"
- "You need to get over your anger at women."
- "You are so negative!"

Response: Anger is a legitimate emotion in the face of injustice. It is important to remember that passive acceptance of evil is not a virtue.

Charge of Cowardice (Code Yellow)

Discussion: The target is accused of having an unjustifiable fear of interaction with women. Examples:

- "You need to get over your fear."
- "Step up and take a chance like a man!"
- "You're afraid of a strong woman!"

Response: It is important to remember that there is a difference between bravery and stupidity. The only risks that reasonable people dare to take are calculated risks. One weighs the likely costs and benefits of said risks. As it is, some men are finding out that many women fail a cost-benefit analysis.

Charge of Hypersensitivity (Code Blue) – The Crybaby Charge

Discussion: The target is accused of being hysterical or exaggerating the problems of men (i.e., he is accused of playing "Chicken Little"). Examples:

- "Stop whining!"
- "Get over it!"
- "Suck it up like a man!"

• “You guys don’t have it as nearly as bad as us women!”
• “You’re just afraid of losing your male privileges.”
• “Your fragile male ego …”
• “Wow! You guys need to get a grip!”

Response: One who uses the Code Blue shaming tactic reveals a callous indifference to the humanity of men. It may be constructive to confront such an accuser and ask if a certain problem men face needs to be addressed or not (”yes” or “no”), however small it may be seem to be. If the accuser answers in the negative, it may constructive to ask why any man should care about the accuser’s welfare since the favour will obviously not be returned. If the accuser claims to be unable to do anything about the said problem, one can ask the accuser why an attack is necessary against those who are doing something about it.

Charge of Puerility (Code Green) – The Peter Pan Charge

Discussion: The target is accused of being immature and/or irresponsible in some manner that reflects badly on his status as an adult male. Examples:

• “Grow up!”
• “You are so immature!”
• “Do you live with your mother?”
• “I’m not interested in boys. I’m interested in real men.”
• “Men are shirking their God-given responsibility to marry and bear children.”

Response: It should be remembered that one’s sexual history, marital status, parental status, etc. are not reliable indicators of maturity and accountability. If they were, then we would not hear of white collar crime, divorce, teen sex, unplanned pregnancies, extramarital affairs, etc.

Charge of Endangerment (Code Orange) – The Elevated Threat Charge

Discussion: The target is accused of being a menace in some undefined manner. This charge may be coupled with some attempt to censor the target. Examples:

• “You guys are scary.”
• “You make me feel afraid.”

Response: It may be constructive to point out that only bigots and tyrants are afraid of having the truth expressed to them. One may also ask why some women think they can handle leadership roles if they are so threatened by a man’s legitimate freedom of expression.

Charge of Rationalization (Code Purple) – The Sour Grapes Charge

Discussion: The target is accused of explaining away his own failures and/or dissatisfaction by blaming women for his problems. Example:

• “You are just bitter because you can’t get laid.”

Response: In this case, it must be asked if it really matters how one arrives at the truth. In other words, one may submit to the accuser, “What if the grapes really are sour?” At any rate, the Code Purple shaming tactic is an example of what is called “circumstantial ad hominem."

Charge of Fanaticism (Code Brown) – The Brown Shirts Charge

Discussion: The target is accused of subscribing to an intolerant, extremist ideology or of being devoted to an ignorant viewpoint. Examples:

• "You're one of those right-wing wackos."
• "You're an extremist"
• "You sound like the KKK."
• "… more anti-feminist zaniness"

Response: One should remember that the truth is not decided by the number of people subscribing to it. Whether or not certain ideas are "out of the mainstream" is besides the point. A correct conclusion is also not necessarily reached by embracing some middle ground between two opposing viewpoints (i.e., the logical fallacy of "False Compromise").

Charge of In-virility (Code Lavender)

Discussion: The target's sexual orientation or masculinity is called into question. Examples:

• "Are you gay?"
• "I need a real man, not a sissy."
• "You're such a wimp."

Response: Unless one is working for religious conservatives, it is usually of little consequence if a straight man leaves his accusers guessing about his sexual orientation.

Charge of Overgeneralization (Code Gray)

Discussion: The target is accused of making generalizations or supporting unwarranted stereotypes about women. Examples:

• "I'm not like that!"
• "Stop generalizing!"
• "That's a sexist stereotype!"

Response: One may point out that feminists and many other women make generalizations about men. Quotations from feminists, for example, can be easily obtained to prove this point. Also, one should note that pointing to a trend is not the same as overgeneralizing. Although not all women may have a certain characteristic, a significant amount of them might.

Charge of Misogyny (Code Black)

Discussion: The target is accused of displaying some form of unwarranted malice to a particular woman or to women in general. Examples:

• "You misogynist creep!"
• "Why do you hate women?"
• "Do you love your mother?"
• "You are insensitive to the plight of women."
• "You are mean-spirited."
• "You view women as doormats."

• “You want to roll back the rights of women!!”
• “You are going to make me cry.”

Response: One may ask the accuser how does a pro-male agenda become inherently anti-female (especially since feminists often claim that gains for men and women are “not a zero-sum game”). One may also ask the accuser how do they account for women who agree with the target’s viewpoints. The Code Black shaming tactic often integrates the logical fallacies of “argumentum ad misericordiam” (viz., argumentation based on pity for women) and/or “argumentum in terrorem” (viz., arousing fear about what the target wants to do to women).

Charge of Instability (Code White) – The White Padded Room Charge

Discussion: The target is accused of being emotionally or mentally unstable. Examples:

• “You’re unstable.”
• “You have issues.”
• “You need therapy.”
• “Weirdo!”

Response: In response to this attack, one may point to peer-reviewed literature and then ask the accuser if the target’s mental and/or emotional condition can explain the existence of valid research on the matter.

Charge of Selfishness (Code Silver)

Discussion: This attack is self-explanatory. It is a common charge hurled at men who do not want to be bothered with romantic pursuits. Examples:

• “You are so materialistic.”
• “You are so greedy.”

Response: It may be beneficial to turn the accusation back on the one pressing the charge. For instance, one may retort, “So you are saying I shouldn’t spend my money on myself, but should instead spend it on a woman like you —and you accuse me of being selfish?? Just what were you planning to do for me anyway?”

Charge of Superficiality (Code Gold) – The All-That-Glitters Charge

Discussion: The charge of superficiality is usually hurled at men with regard to their mating preferences. Examples:

• “If you didn’t go after bimbos, then …”
• “How can you be so shallow and turn down a single mother?”

Response: Average-looking women can be just as problematic in their behaviour as beautiful, “highmaintenance” women. Regarding the shallowness of women, popular media furnishes plenty of examples where petty demands are made of men by females (viz., those notorious laundry lists of things a man should/should not do for his girlfriend or wife).

Charge of Unattractiveness (Code Tan) – The Ugly Tan Charge

Discussion: The target is accused of having no romantic potential as far as women are concerned. Examples:

• "I bet you are fat and ugly."
• "You can't get laid!"
• "Creep!"
• "Loser!"
• "Have you thought about the problem being you?"

Response: This is another example of "circumstantial ad hominem." The target's romantic potential ultimately does not reflect on the merit of his arguments.

Charge of Defeatism (Code Maroon)

Discussion: This shaming tactic is akin to the Charge of Irascibility and the Charge of Cowardice in that the accuser attacks the target's negative or guarded attitude about a situation. However, the focus is not so much on the target's anger or fear, but on the target's supposed attitude of resignation. Examples:

• "Stop being so negative."
• "You are so cynical."
• "If you refuse to have relationships with women, then you are admitting defeat."
• "C'mon! Men are doers, not quitters."

Response: The charge of defeatism can be diffused by explaining that one is merely being realistic about a situation. Also, one can point out that asking men to just accept their mistreatment at the hands of women and society is the real attitude that is defeatist. Many men have not lost their resolve; many have lost their patience.

Threat of Withheld Affection (Code Pink) – The Pink Whip

Discussion: The target is admonished that his viewpoints or behaviour will cause women to reject him as a mate. Examples:

• "No woman will marry you with that attitude."
• "Creeps like you will never get laid!"

Response: This is an example of the logical fallacy "argumentum ad baculum" (the "appeal to force"). The accuser attempts to negate the validity of a position by pointing to some undesirable circumstance that will befall anyone who takes said position. Really, the only way to deal with the "Pink Whip" is to realize that a man's happiness and worth is not based on his romantic conquests (including marriage).

———–

The above is one of the great classics of Men's Rights literature, and anyone who advocates on behalf of men and boys should expect to hear all of these hurled at them. We have carried it here on A Voice for Men for years in PDF form, but with so many new people joining the movement every day, it was time to add it as an article and discussion in its own right. This document's original author is not known with 100% certainty but reliable sources tell us it was "JadedGuy," an alumnus of the Nice Guy MGTOW forum. In any case, it's something that every Men's Human Rights Advocate should familiarize himself with. Be prepared, you're going to hear every one of these if you try talking to people about any of these issues. If you don't learn how to respond appropriately (or just let it roll off you like water from a duck's back) you'll make yourself crazy. These are some of the most common ways they use to try to shut us up or make us lose our temper. Don't let it happen to you.–DE

("Shame" image taken from Wikimedia Commons and was created by "PinkMoose.")

Penises on bicycles (but no fish)

February 9, 2013 | by andybob | Link | Original Link

Academics used to be so adept at infusing their work with feminist lies that only a red pill eye could spot the joins. In the past few years, it has become blatantly obvious that such pandering to feminist sensibilities has become heavy-handed to the point of absurdity. You can see the gaping maws where the feminist lies and the misandric potshots have just been shoved rough shod into increasingly unlikely topics.

The following article isn't the most egregious example of such incongruity, but it ranks as one of the most ridiculous. If ever we needed more evidence that feminist ideology turns clever people into sycophantic buffoons, this is it.

"Transport Policy at the Crossroads: Travel to work in Australian capital cities, 1976-2011", is the only census-based report ever undertaken in Australia about workplace commuting. Dr. Paul Mees and Dr. Lucy Groenhart, of the Royal Melbourne Institute of Technology (RMIT), should have delivered a (very) mildly diverting presentation of trends interpreted from the tabulated data.

That is what I thought I was reading, until I came to this obtuse and completely unsubstantiated assertion:

"Cycling receives much more attention from policy makers than walking, even though it plays a much smaller role in the journey to work: one possible reason is that cycling is by far the most male-dominated transport mode, reflecting the gender composition of the transport planning profession."

These tenured boffins included a sub-section, titled "Transport modes and gender," just to make sure that no-one missed the full implications of this jaw-dropping allegation. They opine:

"One possible reason for the attention paid to cycling is that cycling is by far the most male-dominated transport mode… reflecting the gender (and probably also socio-economic) makeup of transport planners and policy makers."

The decision to spend millions of tax dollars on expensive cycling infrastructures in our main cities wasn't a green initiative at all. Nor was it a widely-debated effort to promote health and fitness in the Australian community. No. It was a conspiracy by the Penis Club – otherwise known as The Patriarchy – to benefit Penises on Bikes.

The report also makes bizarre implications that men's choices are somehow disadvantaging women. Using logic so tortured, that just looking at it made me squeamish, the writers suggest that women have to walk to work since all the roads have been selfishly taken over by men – who make up 57% of all motorists (hardly a whopping majority). There is no mention at all that women tend to live closer to their places of work – a fact so widely available that I'm not even going to bother linking to it.

I don't know why the ratio of males-to-females who cycle to work is 77:23, but Ben Wilson, general manager of Bicycle Queensland made this sensible observation:

"Statistics show men will ride no matter what, but women will ride when they feel safe – they're less likely to want to dice with trucks."

Considering how many studies have shown that women attach great importance to feeling safe, then, this explanation sounds much more reasonable and supported than the ludicrous claim made by these so-called academics.

My own personal experience informs me that most women are far more likely than men to mind arriving at their workplaces sweaty and disheveled. There is also the matter of helmet-shaped coiffes and the havoc that pedals wreak on Jimmy Choos, and I now wonder if that will be attended to with the advent of coiff shaped helmets. This, however, is a personal opinion which I would never dream of including in a widely-read academic report.

In fact, the sexist angle was the focal point of nearly every MSM reference to this report – which raises the question of whether or not the authors may have 'sexed-up' their dry little paper on purpose. After all, Dr. Paul Mees is no stranger to controversy. In fact, he's quite the experienced provocateur.

The recommendations which conclude the report are typical examples of feminist pandering. Get a load of this:

"Policy-makers need to pay attention to the extremely restricted constituency that currently dominates the cycling 'market' (mainly male, inner city professionals), and develop measures to make cycling a viable option for a wider section of the community…"

Allow me to translate into red-pill-speak:

'Policy makers should focus all of its money and attention on making cycling safe and easy for women."

Perhaps we could provide police escorts, or force all traffic to stop whenever lady cyclists are spotted? Why not provide air-conditioned taxis and just put the bikes in the boots? That sounds like a lovely, safe option – comfy too. Who cares about viability when pandering to the "wider section of the community' is our top priority?

So, there you have it. What should have been a dull- but-worthy report about modes of transport, somehow became yet another excuse for feminists to blame men for women's choices. All it took were a few clumsy lines about Penises on Bikes. Surely this nonsense can't continue for much longer.

[Disclaimer: Despite the overwhelming temptation of the author, no references to fish were used in the making of this article.]

Put them on trains

February 10, 2013 | by Fact Check Me | Link | Original Link

There is something very wrong with Jews — we know this. National socialism is not about fixing Jews, or curing them of their repulsiveness — it would be a better use of our time to try to cure tangerines of their tangerine-ness. And pointless experimenting on citrus fruit would surely smell better, and we could eat our mistakes! Yum!

I made a jello mold today but it didn't set up right — does anyone know why? I think I added too much pineapple, but I thought I had compensated for that by adding a bigger box of jello than what the recipe called for. I don't normally care for jello-based desserts but I have found that using exotic fruits and nuts keeps the focus off the jello.

Thanks to mandatory Jew-penises in Aryan vaginas and rape, and Jews global policy of Aryan infanticide (but not Jew infanticide), there are too many Jews worldwide. Jews exist in unnatural numbers globally and we know this. We also know that genetically, Jewish genetic code is defective and decaying over time — generation after generation, Jews are becoming even more incomplete, even more lacking and they are indeed barrelling toward their own extinction. Google it.

My TiVo crashed and I lost my entire collection of ghost whisperer! does anyone know how season 4 ended — the last episode I saw, Jim had died and his spirit jumped into the body of some other dood, but does this mean that Jim is still on the show and the actor that plays Jim is leaving or what?

The Jew is on it's way out. We know this. However, on their way out the door, thanks to Jewish genetic decay and the fact that they exist in unnatural numbers globally, they seem to have reached a critical mass of pure jew-evil, and this might not have been the case 20 or even 10 years ago but it absolutely is the case now — things are getting worse. We need to understand this, and take this into account in our theory and our actions. What we thought was going to work before might not work now, or if it was working, it might not have any further usefulness because the game has changed. We have to adapt to changing circumstances and use what we know, but some seem very invested in their own status or in the work itself rather than the truth, and liberating ourselves and other Aryans from Jewish dominance — this is a mistake.

I'm having a cocktail party next week and I need some good ideas for appetizers. I am really sick of the standard fare and would like to serve something with some "wow" factor — does anyone have any ideas?

Aryans have known there is something fundamentally wrong with Jews for a long time, and they talk about it like its the common knowledge it is. I am BEYOND sick of Aryan theorists and and Aryan ideology which denies reality and the reality of Aryans lives and what Jews do to us AND WHY THEY DO IT, AND WHETHER THEY ARE LIKELY TO EVER STOP. They aren't.

I have an itchy anus, it's especially bothersome at night — when I googled this, I found that this is a warning sign of intestinal parasites! I do eat a lot of raw fish so I am afraid that perhaps I have picked up a parasite. God that fucking sucks, as if I didn't have enough to deal with.

The increasing decay and incompleteness of the Jew genetics over time + unnatural numbers of Jews globally due to mandatory Jew penis in vagina and rape and Aryan infanticide = critical mass of Jewish evil. This appears to be the truth of it. This problem is real, and it is urgent.

Read between the lines mkay. Jews are showing and telling us everything we need to know about their intentions, and what they want to do to us and to the world, whether they can be reformed, and whether they will stop. They are telling us the truth about themselves hourly, daily, weekly, yearly. Believe it.

Original article:
http://factcheckme.wordpress.com/2013/02/03/golden-girls-marathon-i-have-my-period/

[box type="note" icon="none"]

Commentary.

Although we have re-posted an original article written by the owner of an Aryan ideological site, we don't agree with the point of view of the original author. It has been posted here in full for criticism and rebuttal. In the interests of complete transparency and disclosure, the original text included numerous spelling, punctuation and capitalization errors, most of which have been corrected in this reproduced text. For example, in the original copy, Jew was incorrectly spelled "men" and Aryan typed using the idiosyncratic spelling "women".

Obviously, the original author's identity is disclosed neither on A Voice for Men, nor anywhere on the original Aryan ideology website, even in the site's registration. While by itself this would not be conclusive, in light of the nature of the site's powerfully anti-Semitic editorial position, this guarded anonymity indicates in the author a clear consciousness of guilt.

For this reason, no serious rebuttal of the half-educated and flimsy pseudo-science asserted by the author in support of her racist diatribe will be bothered with. However, her text's frequent interjections of personal tedium and banal details of her apparently pedestrian interests do merit mention.

The article as reproduced here on A Voice for Men omits the author's first long paragraph. That paragraph addressed the watching of uploaded copies of a late-80's sit com, and the author's claimed concern with her menstrual cycle. Prior to the her first substantive content, she adds:

"also, my stools are a bit soft, even though I took probiotics. Can anyone recommend something for loose stools due to menstrual-related hormonal fluctuations?".

This is more than opening paragraph of filler and misdirection, as claimed by the author. She's chosen to open with mention menstrual and fecal excretion. She knows, at least subconsciously how repulsive her own anti-Semitism is to a healthy-minded adult. By initial mention of bodily waste, she has in effect, identified herself.

After her first overt antisemitism in mention of “something very wrong with Jews”, the original author takes a sharp left turn by seemingly irrelevant mention of a jello mold gone wrong due apparently to inclusion of pineapples. Having established herself earlier with faeces and excretion, any topic for a turn into banal drivel will do. A pineapple jello is utterly boring and that’s the point. She’s making it clear that the casual discussion of a final solution is as pedestrian a topic as trying and failing to assemble a predictable potlach contribution. She’s gone all the way to the sleepy suburbs to drive home the message that eugenic purification of the Aryan race provokes no flutter of conscience. She’s taken a purposeful posture of monster. This author, if we are to believe her, is proud to broadcast her regard for people of Jewish faith or culture as a subhuman nuisance.

Antisemitism, hatred, and all of their attendant byproducts are thereby normalized.

Indeed, after mention – (but strangely, no citation) of the dual Jew conspiracies of mandatory rape and world-wide Ayan infanticide, the author makes another detour into the boring, re-enforcing the normality and pedestrian character of the eradication by genetic degradation of Jews around the globe. Just imagine the paradise of a world totally absent of Jewry and all the Jews have built. Utopia coming soon, just as soon as the Hebes have all died off.

But as before this atavistic hatred of the Hebrew faith and people’s of the world is too vicious and depraved to merit serious rebuttal. However, apparently the author’s TIVO crashed, and several episodes of some-show-or-other were not recorded. The repeat by the author of a detour into tedium is simple repetition and instruction by rote. Contemplation of, or evangelization of, or normalization of the exterminating an entire culture is certainly evil. Even the author implies as much by her own indirection and side-tracking. And the acceptance through banality and tedium is both her goal, and my own observation.

The banality of evil.

The great atrocities in history were not executed by fanatics or sociopaths, but by ordinary people who accepted the premises of their state and therefore participated with the view that their actions were normal.

This has been described by American economist and media analyst Edward S. Herman as normalizing the unthinkable. According to Herman now Professor Emeritus of Finance at the University of Pennsylvania, “doing terrible things in an organized and systematic way rests on ‘normalization.’ This is the process whereby ugly, degrading, murderous, and unspeakable acts become routine and are accepted as ‘the way things are done.'”

All that is required is for you and I to do nothing.

Editor’s note:

Commentary to this article was added by John the Other, the original article, included above editorial remarks is credited completely to the original pseudonymous Aryan ideologue, blogger and Utopian.

[/box]

AVFM: African Circumcision Advisory Committee

February 10, 2013 | by Robert O'Hara | Link | Original Link

Last week marked the creation of the African Circumcision Advisory Committee, or ACAC, who's sole purpose is to make aware to the press, public and key government officials the circumcision campaign currently underway in Sub Saharan Africa.

This program, headed by the World Health Organization and supported by UNAIDS, PEPFAIR and several other non governmental organizations, is an effort to circumcise nearly twenty eight million men, boys and infants within the next five years, ostensibly to curb the spread of HIV AIDS. The rationale for this program is based on two studies performed in Eastern Africa called the Orange Farm Studies which purported that circumcised men have a 60% reduction in the likelihood of contracting HIV. These studies, however, have critical flaws and there is a growing chorus of medical research organizations, individual epidemiologists and medical doctors who decry these studies as being misleading.

As reported by A Voice for Men in three crucial articles (article 1, article 2, article 3) over the past year, it is clear that the motivations for this program are more political, monetary and ideological than humanitarian. Over a billion dollars are earmarked for this program and recipients include medical supply corporations and gender ideologues who honestly believe that the spread of AIDS is intimately tied in with the patriarchal oppression of women and aim to further spread their ideology in that part of the world. Many epidemiologists believe that if these people get their way the resultant deaths would number in the millions as a consequence of misinformation on how HIV is spread.

Nearly a million have been circumcised thus far and in Zimbabwe we are already seeing an increase of HIV infections among circumcised men as a result of their compensatory behavior. Clearly something needs to be done, but the news media in North America and the rest of the developed world refuses to do any investigation of the matter.

Furthermore, local government officials in Africa are more than happy to take the money and look the other way while these NGOs and ideologues gain more and more political and social influence.

In order to address the current dearth in reporting on this extremely important issue a committee has been formed. The African Circumcision Advisory Committee has, as its ultimate goal, the exposure and cessation of this abhorrent program. The committee's members include Robert O'Hara (Chairman) Kristina Hansen, Joe Mendez and anonymous MHRA Iron John. The Committee is interested in recruiting members from the African Press Corps and any medical professionals interested in the topic. AVFM readers are also encouraged to answer the call for volunteers the committee will be posting from time to time on the AVFM forum and in formal posts. Inquires can be sent to avfmnews@avoiceformen.com.

This is the first time since the WHO's program began that an entity has been formed in order to directly oppose it's policies. The committee surely has it's work cut out for it. While involuntary infant circumcision is definitely a serious men's rights issue demanding its own solutions, this particular effort is, first and foremost, about saving lives- potentially millions of them. We are confident that if pressure is applied in the right places and awareness is extended to key people that we can help bring this monstrosity to a halt.

Robert O'Hara
Director, AVFM News
ACAC Committee Chairman

Marriage secrets

February 10, 2013 | by Steve Moxon | Link | Original Link

The pair-bond is not male monopoly but a 'guarding' service to the female, and a shackle not on the woman but on the man.

[dropcap]I[/dropcap]t's always been assumed that marriage – the cultural 'encoding' of an underlying evolved universal facility to pair-bond that underpins any form of non-casual sexual partnership (and not just in humans but generically across nature) – is all about the male securing control over a female's reproduction; her fertility. Supposedly, the woman is shackled from having sex with other men, providing the husband with a reasonable guarantee than any children are his.

So much for assumption: it's false. 'Marriage' is now being revealed actually to be much more in line with how men have suspected it really works all along.

There would seem to be two complementary aspects underpinning the human pair-bond. First, there is male mate-guarding (to use the biological term). Male mate-guarding is not to keep the female on a tight leash; at least not for the male's benefit. If functions instead as a service to the female: to keep away 'losers'. It hardly can be as usually conceived, given that a female has little problem having sex outside the partnership with a male of her choosing when she really wants to.

The problem for the female is that she has no such desire at all for most males; quite the reverse. Yet these much more numerous and lowly males, in being obliged to play a more long-shot game, are the ones most likely to try their luck. In the human case, it's not that a woman needs a 'bodyguard' to ward off rape; though it may be that she could be cajoled into having sex. Perhaps most importantly, even in entirely unproductive courtship the attentions of 'undesirables' can displace any interest from the minority of men with whom the woman might be up for a fling, and can stop her spreading her wings to cross their paths.

Reinforcing this is the second aspect of human pair-bonding, which likewise is a service to the woman, and is in effect a shackle for the man. This stems from the obvious fact that attractiveness (mate-value) moves in radically different directions over time according to sex. For a male, his complement of 'good genes' takes time to play out to manifest in his status (rank in dominance hierarchies signifying mate-value).

Male status usually increases with age, and often markedly so. For the great majority, at worst it flat-lines, albeit for an unlucky few it falls. By contrast, for women, with their mate-value being in terms of fertility, as indicated by youth and beauty; the trajectory is ever downward, and quite steeply so – and compounding the effects of age is the impact of childbirth. This major divergence in life history in terms of attractiveness according to sex – with the male an appreciating asset and the female a depreciating one — in itself provides a basis for pair-bonding in the female interest.

If, when very young (at or near the peak of fertility shortly after puberty), a woman can pin down a male of the sort of mate-value she can acquire through the youth and beauty that at that time she possesses, then she can have successive children with the same complement of 'good genes' each time. She can, in effect, project forward in time her peak of fertility.

If instead she simply reproduces through casual sex with a string of men, then she will have children with a progressively poorer set of 'good genes' as the attractiveness of the men she is able to acquire falls with her advancing years. In this light, sense is made of the conclusion by Helen Fisher, the leading academic expert on sexual love, that the human pair-bond typically is short-lived, with a peak in divorce after just four years of marriage.

[image]Factoring-in time-to-conception, gestation and lactation time, ancestrally four years would have been a rough minimum to ensure that a subsequent (second) child is conceived by the same father. [Evolution unsurprisingly has not provided a longer baseline duration, given other forms of affiliation naturally kicking in – a post-romantic mutual regard, and not least a mutual affection for offspring – and extended family contexts further binding the couple to stay together (through inertia if for no more positive reason).]

With this fuller picture of the pair-bond we can see that the reason a woman assumes the man's surname upon marriage is not as an expression of the man's possession of her, but in effect of the woman's possession of him; as well as being an expression of the 'protection' the man provides for her from unwanted sexual advances (which rather than obstructing the woman's access to extra-pair sex, if anything is facilitative in the case of partners the woman desires).

What a woman needs is a man who, on the one hand, is sufficiently attractive to her (that is, he possesses enough 'good genes'), and, on the other hand, can show a clear willingness to reliably stay by her, not only to act as a guard to fend off 'undesirables' but also to simply stay there as her fertility declines.

The combination is the optimum arrangement. It's a mutual bargain in that the man correspondingly gets a good deal for himself in that his offer of a reliable 'guarding' service partially offsets any relative lack of his attractiveness to her. He thereby obtains as a pair-bond partner a sexier – more fertile – woman than any of the women he might acquire for casual sex.

But what about paternity confidence: the assumed raison d'être of pairing up? The argument that the male needs to be sure the kids are his, stems from the investment the male supposedly places in his offspring. Yet the male provisioning model has not been in a good way ever since it was found that male hunters in hunter-gatherer societies more or less share their food across the group rather than favoring their own families (but note 'cultural anthropology' as a discipline is biased against a male-provisioning model, so you have to take these clams with a pinch of salt).

Then came Helen Fisher's above-cited 'four-year itch'. With regular sex taking on average about six months to achieve conception, plus nine months gestation, then the child would be aged just two – and, ancestrally, the mother would still be lactating – before typically the father's no longer around. This hardly leaves the child old enough or the mother independent enough if having father around is the name of the game. [There would be female relatives close at hand to give support, of course; and note that I'm talking about the evolved underpinnings of the family here, and not what may have subsequently evolved in terms of male provisioning and a distinct role for the father.]

The model has since come down with a terminal illness after recent major research reviewing the basis of pair-bonding. It is now shown that male provisioning post-dated the evolution of the pair-bond (Bernard Chapais*), which arose not through any need to provision but to maximise the female's (rather than the male's) fertility (Jeffrey Winking) – think quantity rather than quality of offspring. Winking does not explain how males contribute in this regard, but Chapais surely supplies the answer in his conclusion that mate-guarding is the key; albeit that he's considering it in the male-proprietorial sense, despite researchers of mating behaviour in all sorts of species being nonplussed as to why it is that pair-bonding does not prevent the female choosing to have extra-pair sex.

This is where I came in. Flip the understanding of what actually is male mate-guarding, and all fits neatly into place; especially reinforced by the sex-dichotomous trajectory of mate-value.

An understanding of pair-bonding as a combination of 'guarding' the woman from undesirables and compensating her for her falling mate-value, and that it is not about resourcing, nests inside a wider proper conceptualization of the role of resources that completely contradicts the standard idea from politically grounded social science.

Just as the sparring males of any species would tell you if they were able, dominance contest is not about resources per se, but instead is over sexual access: resources figure in mate-choice as a good proxy for male mate-value ('good genes') rather than having an intrinsic value. A woman does not in fact choose a man with a ten-bedroom house over his rival with three or four because she even remotely has a use for lots of perpetually empty upstairs accommodations. It's simply that a man who can progress in the world to the extent of being able to flash around such huge amounts of money in the form of conspicuous pointless assets must have a particularly fine set of 'good genes' underpinning an ability to successfully compete with other men.

That resources per se are not brought to the relationship at its outset, and given also that pair-bonding is a service provided to the female by the male, does of course beg the very big question as to why on earth a woman dissolving a relationship (or whose partner initiates the dissolution) can have any sort of claim on the assets of her ex-partner, or how the state can insist on this on her behalf.

Alimony (and clean-break settlements) makes not the slightest sense in the light of the essence of pair-bonding. Indeed, on the contrary, any assets that either belonged to the male partner at the outset, or which were created by him in the course of the relationship, surely should revert wholly back to him.

It might be further argued that if the dissolution is through the woman partner's fault and instigation, then additionally there is a breach-of-contract case for reimbursement of any resources generated by the male partner that the woman partner consumed through the course of the relationship. However, with the pair-bond naturally not having a very long-lived duration (as afore-mentioned: four years), then a breach-of-contract understanding would require marriage to be considered intrinsically as female consumption, for which in effect the woman takes out a repayable loan – akin to higher education. [Fat chance of her paying it back, judging by what happens to higher education loans. The arrangements here in the UK whereby much-increased university course fees are not eligible to be repaid until a salary of at least £21,000 is earned, effectively removes the need for most women ever to repay anything. As ever, men subsidize women.]

So, taking all of the insights into 'marriage' together, how does this reflect in relationship breakdown? Why does the woman usually 'stand by her man' whereas the man usually feels so slighted by his partner's extra-pair sex that he leaves her? Well, obviously, because only the female can bring into the partnership a child not having both parties as parents. A man never can.

Extra-pair sex never poses this threat to the female. But if the pair-bond is primarily not in the male's interest, and the male has not lost an investment in terms of provisioning, then why would a man be so upset? For the reason that nonetheless there is male investment: the man's sexual attentions, which turn out to have been in vain. What is more, if he were to persist with the partnership, he would continue to invest his attentions in vain for the entire length of the woman's period of gestation and lactation (lasting several years ancestrally – which is what counts when it comes to the evolution of adaptations we are all now stuck with).

Instead he could have acquired a faithful partner and/or sought promiscuous sex. The male has suffered a significant opportunity cost. So it is that the discovery of a partner's extra-pair sex is a clear deal-breaker for the man but not for the woman. His course of action is likely to be to cut his losses and desert. Yet his losses are minor in comparison to what his desertion entails for the female. She cannot now secure a pair-bond partner of as high a mate-value as the one, now lost, she had acquired when younger. The consequence is a significantly lower fitness for all of her subsequent offspring.

A proper understanding of the basis of pair-bonding provides a clear window on the reality – rather than the deliberate misrepresentation – of domestic violence (which, when you factor in the huge sex-differential in under-reporting, is preponderantly female perpetrated; and by a large margin). With the pair-bond being primarily in the female interest, featuring male mate-guarding and male attachment as services to the female rather than male proprietorial control, then the spotlight shifts on to the woman.

It is the woman more than the man who has a need to stop the partner from straying. What had been mistakenly viewed as the nature of male mate-guarding in fact is very much the nature not of male but female mate-guarding.

This has never been lost on ordinary people – at least until they have their common-sense knocked out of them by what passes for contemporary social science education. The popular stereotype of the rolling-pin/ frying-pan wielding housewife chasing her spouse became a stereotype because, as with most stereotypes, it's essentially accurate (a rule-of-thumb appreciation of norms based on pooled repeated observation).

Research reveals that the female nearly always is the 'controlling' partner, and that even in male forms of 'control' at least matches the male (never mind any distinctively female forms of 'control'). This need for 'control' is a major basis of female-perpetrated domestic violence, given – as we now know from recent findings – that physical aggression is women's preferred mode of aggression in domestic situations (in complete contrast to men, who back away from engaging in physical aggression in any situation where a female would be the target).

This explains why, despite huge sex-differentials in both upper-body strength (conferring hitting power) and body-frame weakness (rendering a susceptibility to injury), there is little if any sex-differential in domestic violence injury rates – when it would be expected to be double an order-of-magnitude (x20) even if rates of male and female perpetration were similar, let alone predominantly male as usually but falsely supposed.

Well, there you have it. It's likely that quite a lot of what most people think they understood about male-female coupling is turned upside down: or, more than likely, they intuitively knew that the standard line – let alone feminist cant – did not ring true. The cat is springing out of the bag, and it's not the house moggy laid on its back purring for you to scratch its tummy. It's a tiger set to scratch the eyes out of any apologist for the silliness-at-large who happens to cross its path.

* Chapais B (2008) Primeval Kinship: How Pair Bonding Gave Birth to Human Society. Harvard University Press

 Winking G (2007) Are men really that bad as fathers? The role of men's investments. Paper presented at the IUSSP Seminar on Male Life History, Giessen, Germany

To Carla Buzasi, Huffington Post UK

February 10, 2013 | by Lucy Brown | Link | Original Link

To Editor-in-Chief Carla Buzasi, Huffington Post UK

Dear Ms. Buzasi,

It has come to my attention that the most recent contributor for your web publication is Inna Shevchenko.

I don't know whether the decision to receive Shevchenko to your team belonged to you personally, but the responsibility for it nonetheless falls on your shoulders as Editor-in-chief for Huffington Post UK.

Inna Shevchenko's first (and so far the only) contribution is an article titled "Sextremism: The New Way for Feminism to Be!"[1] and her biography[2], published on your website, claims that her philosophy and her organization, FEMEN, is non violent.

However, the claims in that biography are both incomplete and misleading, given actions by Shevchenko and others in her organization that are already a matter of public record.

For instance, her bio says that she "cut down 8meters wooden catholic[sic] cross with chainsaw on the main square in Kiev, Ukraine." This was ostensibly in protest of alleged historical patriarchal oppression against women that emanated from the Catholic Church.

To be accurate, it was an Orthodox Christian cross and it was in front of the Oktyabyrski (Октыябырский) Palace.

The Oktyabyrski Palace was the Headquarters of the infamous NKVD in the 1930s where hundreds of thousands of people were executed by the oppressive Stalinist regime that ruled over the region. So it was not just a simple cross or a religious icon. It was a memorial cross commemorating the victims of Stalinist oppression; real oppression that targeted both men and women.

Not only has she denigrated the suffering of those victims, including those that survived the horrific ordeal, but she bragged about it and still brags about it on your publication's website.

In another action, FEMEN member Yana Zhdanova, with the words "Kill Kirill" painted on her back, attempted a violent attack on the head of the Russian Orthodox Church at the Borispol airport, near the Ukrainian capital of Kiev.[3]

So my question, and the question of all the people involved in A Voice for Men, is why? Why are you providing a voice to a self proclaimed extremist and indiscriminate criminal vandal? Why are you providing a platform for an organization that has advocated for murdering church officials?

Inna Shevcenko is a convicted felon in Ukraine, taking advantage of the fact that her native country is not in the EU and therefore a European arrest warrant is difficult to issue in her name. Is this the direction that Huffington Post UK wants to go, providing a platform for violent thugs and organizations that actively advocate for murdering Church officials, and who train other activists to further similar and increased violence?[4]

Because if that is the case the public needs to know it.

Thank you for your time and I am looking forward to hearing from you.

Lucian Vâlsan
European News Director, A Voice for Men

[1] http://www.huffingtonpost.co.uk/inna-shevchenko/sextremism-the-new-way-for-feminism_b_2634064.html?utm_hp_ref=uk

[2] http://www.huffingtonpost.co.uk/inna-shevchenko/

[3] http://www.themoscowtimes.com/news/article/feminist-sentenced-for-baring-breasts-at-patriarch-kirill/462751.html

[4] http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/feminist-violence/femen-activism-and-the-coming-violence/

Norton Symantec folds, then hides

February 11, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Norton removes AVFM from list of hate sites, and perhaps others, just as much longer list of banned sites surfaces.

It appears that Norton Symantec has removed A Voice for Men, and perhaps a dozen other websites from a DNS registry list of "known hate sites" after a media inquiry left them with some uncomfortable questions about their practices.

John Leyden of theregister.co.uk conducted an investigation of Norton Symantec's listing of A Voice for Men and other MHRM sites after getting complaints about the actions from our fellow activists at MRALondon.org.

It appears Symantec acted quickly to remove the block. The matter was also investigated by Simon Edwards, technical director at Dennis Technology Labs and chairman of the Anti-Malware Testing Standards Organization. Edwards, an experienced antivirus tester, set up Norton DNS and determined that it ""[L]ooks like Symantec has updated its records".

As reported by Leyden, "The screenshot posted by avoiceformen.com makes it clear that it was Symantec's DNS system that was labeling its site as a "hate group".

So while it appears that the security software manufacturer has relented and removed A Voice for Men from the defamatory DNS listing, there are still unanswered questions about how it happened in the first place. It also appears that Symantec is making little effort to explain anything to the sites affected or to the Norton customers who have demanded answers. Company representatives now seem intent on acting as though the banning never happened.

Early in the investigation, before the Register became involved, a concern about the DNS listing was brought up by a Norton Symantec user in their customer forum. That individual posted a complete list of the sites that were known to be banned, and followed that with a request:

> Please fix this issue ASAP It would also be appreciated if you could find out who exactly was responsible for falsely categorizing such a large number of sites on this topic, such censorship is very disturbing indeed.

That request we met, after it was revealed that the blacklisting had become a very active discussion on Reddit, with an initial response by forum administrator and Norton Symantec employee Tim Lopez, who stated the following:

> I posted in the Reddit thread directing people to this forum thread so > that these forums can be utilized as the source of the most recent information on this topic.

>
> Just to let you know, we're investigating this right now and looking in to the reasons for these categorization.
>
> I'll provide an update as soon as I have more information!
>
> Cheers,
>
> Tim Lopez
> Norton Forums Administrator
> Symantec Corporation

Lopez later promised to have an update on the matter available the next day. To my knowledge, no such update has been provided.

Gee, list of hate sites? What list of hate sites?

I think it can be safely assumed that Symantec is now just holding its breath, hoping that this will go away, without any public concern over why the company put itself in the position of censoring their customer's access to differing political views.

Said the Register's Leyden:

> …[W]hat's far more difficult is to fathom why Symantec can't account for how its technology classifies a named site, despite complaints from the party concerned, combined with two days of nagging from El Reg's security desk.

Leyden's investigation not only calls into question the lack of accountability on the part of Symantec, but also questions the basic premise for the listing.

> The men's rights movement, of which A Voice for Men is a part, is a reaction against social changes brought about by feminism. The group bills itself as "masculine counter-theory in the age of misandry".
>
> The movement rejects criticism that it a reactionary force seeking to restore centuries of patriarchy.
>
> All of this is clearly not agreeable fodder for many women but to label the site as a "hate site" seems a little over the top.

This is clearly not the final chapter in this story for Symantec. AVFM has learned since the story began that the list of banned websites may be much, much larger than originally known.

According to The Rights of Man Blog, there are actually some 48 men's and father's issues related sites that have made their way to being banned by Norton Symantec. We do not know at this time if any or all of these other sites have been removed from Norton’s hate list. And more importantly, we do not have an explanation from Norton Symantec as to how and why they got there to begin with.

Not acceptable.

Norton should not be allowed to just blow off public concerns about its conduct in defaming an established segment of the population whose sole “mistake” is to hold the belief that men and women should be treated equally under the rule of law and in social custom.

As they present themselves to the public now, it appears that Symantec’s position is that men do not qualify for the same rights and considerations as everyone else, and that indeed any effort to assert that they are will be met with censorship and public demonization.

On behalf of AVFM I want to express my thanks to John Leyden of The Register for bringing more public attention to this story, and I want to urge him to continue, as we are, to demand an accounting by Norton Symantec for its actions.

Ophelia Benson & the FreeThought Bigots: Epic fail!

February 11, 2013 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

So let's be honest about what the opponents of Men's Human Rights Advocacy are all about: when they see an argument they don't like, their first answer is to lie, slander, distort, and if at all humanly possible, shut down all dissent and all critical thought.

Such people recently tried censoring Kristina Hansen by falsely flagging a video that mentioned Ophelia Benson, who had recently achieved fame by creating a False Threat narrative supposedly from A Voice for Men. Too bad Ophelia, there was a time when you looked like a rationalist to a lot of us but if it was ever true it changed a long time ago. You and/or your thuggish fans attacked someone who had the audacity merely to be critical of you, and instead of answering it in good faith, the answer was what always comes out of you: attack, smear, change the subject, make up bullshit, and censor, censor, censor. Hey, who needs postmodernism when you've got good old fashioned censorship on your side to shut off the flow of rational thought?

Unfortunately, the attempts to censor The Wooly Bumblebee have backfired, as the following sample of the numerous video mirrors popping up will show:

Everyone with a YouTube account is encouraged to make their own mirror of this blatant attempt at censorship by FreeThought Blog trolls. Low-rent Stalinist trash need to be shown what happens when they act like Brown Shirts (or should I say Brown Skirts?) – their true nature is revealed by everyone who's looking.

Watch and download and mirror the flagged video here: http://www.woolybumblebee.com/apps/videos/videos/show/17641858-ophelia-whines-again

Creep Clown Update: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=GtULe18AwHo

Creepy Clowns: Freethought Bullies and the Threat Narrative: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=b_7SRa_xQNQ

Oh, Ophelia. Oh PZ. Did someone tell you that calling yourself a skeptic and a rationalist actually made you intelligent, thoughtful, or a decent human being? If so, you were too quick to believe them.

Update: Apparently, they're talking about this on FreeThought Blogs, and Ophelia tries to shift the blame to YouTube. Ophelia, YouTube only yanks videos like this if multiple people report them and then it gets done automatically. The only people who would flag that video are people who wish to silence criticism of Ophelia Benson and/or FreeThought Blogs. But instead of condemning this as any decent person would, you deny all responsibility, and don't even bother to tell your fans that this is unacceptable behavior. You also take the classic Internet dodge of picking on someone's pronunciation–and make yourself look silly in the process, because not only is that a trivial complaint, but a quick check of any dictionary will show you that "fassist" and “fashist” are both correct pronunciations of “fascist.” Can you do a better job of illustrating the point made here: that you and yours are censoring bullies, intellectual lightweights, and cowards who slander and silence human rights activists?

Update 2: I was just informed by a friend that a message from someone called “AnonymousAreLegion” was posted dated February 12, 2013 at 7:16am (UTC-8) over in Ophelia Benson’s comments section saying the following:

> While you may not be a “fascist”, you certainly fit the Stazi mentality of censorship and silencing.
>
> You are a liar, hypocrite, bully, and talentless piece of shit. That’s why the ever-increasing pwning of you will continue. You got your ass handed to you in recent YT videos (since mirrrored, so you can forget your censorship and false flagging tactics – you will be defeated), and PZ got utterly humiliated by Noel Plum and Concordance. Bring it on. We have only just begun with you people. There’s going to be more videos, more blogs, more pushback, and more pressure on getting you the fuck away from our community.
>
> We destroyed A-+, we will destroy you and the FreeThoughtBlogs. We will exclude you from our growing community, and we will make sure your reputation is beneath shit.
>
> We are anonymous. We are legion.

Now, it’s hard to know where this came from. Some misguided Men’s Human Rights Activist? I rather doubt it, that’s not our typical style, but I suppose it’s plausible. Equally plausible is that it’s more of the False Threat Narrative that the FTB/skepchick/Atheism+ crowd is so fond of, and one of them posted it themselves. Or it could I suppose actually be from a member of the famous hacker collective known as “Anonymous” although I kinda doubt that, as this isn’t quite their style either. Or it’s some other troll.

That said, let it be known that neither myself nor anyone on the A Voice for Men editorial team supports any efforts to “destroy” FreeThought Blogs, Ophelia Benson, or anyone else with anything except sarcasm. The solution to hate speech is more speech. Indeed, if they’d drop the False Threat Narrative and actually talk to us like real human beings who might just happen to disagree with them on some things, it’s theoretically possible we could shake hands and agree never to argue again or even (what the hell, stranger things have happened) come to friendly terms. That really is up to them. It is an open offer. That said, one way or the other, to be clear, we don’t endorse that message from “AnonymousAreLegion.”

Another sorry day coming

February 11, 2013 | by Jim Muldoon | Link | Original Link

Kevin Rudd's gave a speech on February 13, 2008 when he apologized on behalf of the nation for what has become known as the Stolen Generations (Rudd, 2008). This national apology is colloquially known as Sorry Day.

From the early 1900s through to the seventies there were Federal and State government policies that removed so-called mixed-blood children from aboriginal communities. This removal included taking the children from their parents.

Rudd's speech was hailed at the time as a momentous occasion and was broadcast live from Parliament House. Yet, in a 2011 article entitled "The National Apology Three Years Later", Gay McAuley of the University of Sydney complained that the "euphoria and hope that accompanied the apology… has not translated into significant changes (McAuley, 2011)."

No, the symbolic moment held no real substance, and not just for the Aboriginal community. In his address, Rudd said:

> To the mothers and the fathers, the brothers and the sisters, for the breaking up of families and communities, we say sorry.

And yet, as the words were leaving his lips, the Family Law Courts were, routinely restricting and banning fathers from their children's lives for ideological reasons.

They still are.

When the justice of this is questioned, the dreadful spectre of domestic violence is invoked.

By that, of course, we all know that I really mean violence against women. We know this because the Australian government, in their National Plan, tells us that there is no other kind of domestic violence (every now and then there might be some mention in brackets, or a little footnote at the bottom of the page, that domestic violence against males exists, but it is so rare that we don't really need to bother about it) (Australian Government, 2009).

Donald Dutton, a Professor of Psychology at the University of British Columbia, and Katherine White, paint a very different picture in their article "Male Victims of Domestic Violence", which appeared in the latest issue of the New Male Studies academic journal (Dutton & White, 2013).

They outline how "gender ideologues" have corrupted the debate on domestic violence.

This is nothing new. In 2007, Murray Straus, a Professor of Sociology at the University of New Hampshire, wrote a scathing article on the methods feminist scholars used to "conceal, deny, and distort the evidence" that is inconsistent with feminist theories (Straus, 2007).

These theories rely on the stereotypical view of big, strong men bullying small, helpless women.

Dutton and White say the evidence based on unbiased research over some forty years is compelling. The most common form of domestic violence is when they are both violent. To be clear, this is not women reacting in self-defence. This is where both parties are guilty of instigating violence. The next most common form is females being violent to a non-violent male partner.

The least common is where men bully women.

This faulty research has been filtered down in academe for decades. Dutton and White inform us that most professionals, such as psychologists, now have an in-built bias, thanks to their education, that assumes women get hit and men do the hitting.

It is Straus' view that feminist scholars take this dim view of men because that is where government funding lies. Thus a vicious circle has been going for decades now, with each generation of graduates being employed in positions of influence. They push for more funding for more feminist projects as the theories of Patriarchy become more of a reality in their collective minds. Each cycle seeing men painted more and more as the bad guy.

Back in the real world, domestic violence is not restricted to the couples either. In fact, when it comes to physical abuse, neglect, and emotional maltreatment of their children, biological mothers are the worst offenders, Dutton and White claim.

In other words, if the justification for the Australian government and the Family Court is that they want to default to the statistically safest person, then they're giving the children to the wrong parent.

So, is it just the case that feminist scholars have fooled the legal sector? Consider another, more compelling, motive:

Money.

More women than men instigate divorce proceedings, making them the biggest customer. Many of these are also the best kind of customer: they don't care about the price. Either the (soon to be) ex-husband pays, if he is rich enough, or the state does through legal aid.

It is this risk-free, to hell with the cost, kinda gal that makes the money go round. The result is the kind of story that you couldn't possibly make up.

Last year, Magistrate Tom Altobelli famously wrote to two children asking them to see the father that he had just banned from seeing them (Muldoon, 2012). In this case the mother had been warned by a psychic that the father would abuse the children.

The experts agreed that the child had not been harmed by anyone, and there was no risk from the father. However, the mother simply refused him access no matter what the experts or the court orders said.

Altobelli knew she would defy any new court orders, regardless of any threat. She said so in court. Had he given the children to the husband, then the wife would have won on appeal. There are too many precedents to think otherwise.

So, Altobelli caved in to the mother and banned the father.

This father would have paid tens of thousands, maybe even upwards of a hundred grand, for hearing after hearing. Whether it was he or the state that paid hers we'll never know, but her occupation was "home duties".

That's a lot of money for a case that should have been stopped on day one. Had the woman gone to jail for a even a day, she might have rethought her strategy. But then, a lot of money would have stayed in the father's pocket and the state coffers.

Fathers are routinely faced with this choice in the Family Court: agree to her demands, or pay even more legal fees until you meet her demands.

It is a recipe for financial success. The father who wants to see his children will fight. The father who resents this treatment will fight. Even fathers with little cash will sell their home, and anything else, so they can fight.

Money, money, money.

Some fathers see the children being harmed by the court process and do "the noble thing" and withdraw. Some run out of money. In both situations, the court records orders "by consent" so they can pretend the process is not adversarial.

Some take the bait and get angry, which the court readily accepts as confirmation that the father is a thug.

The "abuse card" leverages more than just custody. It also justifies a better settlement so she can "rebuild" her family at his expense.

It also paints the father into a corner with his own children. As soon as he is accused, the father is immediately restricted to supervised access. Quite often, the children see this as abandonment by the father. They would have no understanding of the options available in the court process. They'll just know that he stopped seeing them.

It also shows the children that the mother is seen as being "right" by the authorities.

The court, after a few years of costly hearings, calls this arrangement "the new status quo" which they are suddenly reluctant to change.

They refuse to accept their own responsibility in this. Whether or not the parents understand this at the outset of the supervised regime, the court knows full well what the most likely outcome is the moment the father's access is restricted.

Game, set and match for the mother.

But is she really the victor? Maybe she gets some extra cash, even after legal fees. A little extra "Spousal maintenance" (it's not alimony, you know).

But what then?

Consider this insight from Joseph Campo who runs St Francis House in New York, a home for young adult men who have fallen through the cracks of society, when discussing the young men who come to his facility:

"Some come for economic reasons, others have been involved with drugs and alcohol, while others are homeless. But the one thing that each one of them has in common is that there was no father in his life. (Campo, 2013)”

The more she “wins”, the more likely the children will grow up to be dysfunctional.

She will get to deal with the drug use, the failing at school, and perhaps even the suicide attempts. All are more likely with the absence of their father.

The Family Court hides behind that meaningless phrase “In the best interest of the children.” The truth is, this system just makes it more likely that the children will be future customers. For that, of course, we’ll need more courts, more lawyers.

One of the sops often offered to fathers is “when they are old enough, they can come to you and have a relationship if they want.” This is probably said to salve the conscience of the court.

There is no substitute for being with family day in, day out. This is what made the stolen generation such a crime. The racial element is awful indeed. But, irrespective of colour or creed, it is still a real crime when real people grow up not knowing their real parents so that phoney bureaucrats can make a dollar.

It’s also worthy of note just how demeaning this is for the father. He will have a relationship if someone grants him one. The mother, the court, or the adult child will decide if he is allowed one.

But not him. It is simply assumed that he will take whatever second or third rate relationship is on offer.

Should father and child really meet many years down the track? Would that do either of them any good, or would it just be rubbing it in their faces what damage was done?

They will never have the familiarity that can only come with living together for years. Both parent and child will have experiences and people, important in their own lives, that will have no meaning for the other.

In many cases, the child will grow up with a distorted view of the father that comes directly from the mother. Why would a father want a relationship with anyone with that view of himself? Would it be good for his sanity?

And what of the child who is now an adult? Do they want to revisit, as they must, a hurtful past they don’t really remember? Will this reunion upset their relationships with their mother, or siblings?

Can they have respect, never mind love, for someone who was not there when it mattered most? Even if they understand, and are forgiving of, the absence, they are still faced with someone whom they know as their father because the paperwork, not their lived experience, tells them so.

Meeting the father will not undo all of the damage that his absence caused. The dysfunctional will not magically become the functional.

There is no doubt that children are better off with a father who is an active part of their lives. So is the father.

So, in years to come, more studies like Dutton and White’s, more studies by the likes of Straus, will show more and more that which we already know from our own experiences.

The assumption that the children are safer with their mother is bigoted, arrant nonsense. The assumption that men, as a group, beat women in order to assert their dominance is bigoted, arrant nonsense.

Money still makes the world go round. The Family Court and attendant lawyers, like the feminist scholars, have no one's interests at heart other than their own.

The fathers suffer, the children suffer, and in the long term even the mothers suffer.

One day, truth will have to be faced as it always does. Yet another Prime Minister will have yet another "Live Broadcast Event" with yet another Sorry Day speech. It will be equally as meaningless as Rudd's if those who knowingly allowed this happen are not brought to justice.

Bibliography

Australian Government. (2009). The National Plan to reduce violence against women and their children. Retrieved January 31, 2013, from Department of Families, Housing, Community Services and Indigenous Affairs : http://www.fahcsia.gov.au/sites/default/files/documents/05_2012/national_plan.pdf

Campo, J. (2013, January). St Francis House: Mentoring young men in a fatherless society. Retrieved February 9, 2013, from New Male Studies: http://newmalestudies.com/OJS/index.php/nms/article/view/63/63

Dutton, D., & White, K. (2013, January). Male Victims of Domestic Violence. Retrieved February 9, 2013, from New Male Studies: http://newmalestudies.com/OJS/index.php/nms/article/view/59/59

McAuley, G. (2011, May 29). Australian Studies Vol 3 (2011). Retrieved February 9, 2013, from National Library of Australia: http://www.nla.gov.au/openpublish/index.php/australian-studies/article/view/2101

Muldoon, J. (2012, June 24). Altobelli's Dilemma: The Failure of Australian Family Law. Retrieved December 1, 2012, from A Voice for Men: http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/family-courts/altobellis-dilemma-the-failure-of-australian-family-law/

Rudd, K. (2008, February 13). Kevin Rudd's Sorry Speech. Retrieved February 9, 2013, from The Sydney Morning Herald: http://www.smh.com.au/articles/2008/02/13/1202760379056.html

Straus, M. A. (2007, July 14). How feminists corrupt DV research. Retrieved February 9, 2013, from A Voice for Men: http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/how-feminists-corrupt-dv-research/

Looking over your shoulder

February 11, 2013 | by J Galt | Link | Original Link

In philosophical terms I believe fundamentally that all things are true. To drive the point home in its simplest terms I'll take another step forward and plant my foot directly in shit. Lies do not exist! While your sniffing the smell of that I'll remind you that shit is neither true nor false good or evil. It is what it is, shit.

I read post after post and shake my head at the decay of male relevance, laws that point in a single direction and squarely at men. I'm shocked by blatant systemic corruption, false allegations of violence and rape and the responding hypnotic trance like rhetoric justifying it all. It's impossible to absorb this crap without feeling like your falling backwards into an abyss of corrupt deception. Truth seems to have left the planet but has it really?

What I would say is that truth is what you see, and your ability to see it will determine the quality of risk management in your life. Truth is a perspective and nobody experiences truth in the same way. What we seem to forget or avoid or deny is the way in which we're influenced to see the world and the tint of our rosy or not so rosy gaze. So in reading this realize that it's a perspective, a truth to chew on that can easily be spit out and forgotten. Think of it as a science experiment that you can enjoy; you may even see some humor.

I know that as a species we dominate and the lack of competition allows us to not only believe but to aggrandize our absolute fucking brilliance. We in our existence are just awesome, we got it going on; we got this planet wrapped up and begging for mercy. We are just that good. We got Gods and we got science, we got hotdogs and baseball and like Rodger Waters said we got choice.

Anyone reading at AVFM for any length of time has surely read the numerous articles about evolutionary biology and all the phenomenal insights into our social development and psychology. Hunter gatherers and mating, and how we structure our lives in a gendered collaboration. This was all really good stuff, insightful and informing. Except that there was one dominant influence overlooked in all the brilliant presentations.

We distanced ourselves from ourselves and attempted to view behavior in a social and impersonal context of evolving eventuality. Stating as an outcome that it's all pretty predictable and the roles of gender collaboration are functional and available for a little social tweaking. What the insight didn't resolve in simpler terms is the corruption and unexpected dishonesty of our systems and the defining element of why.

What you can determine if you choose to review all the brilliant articles and discussion is that we failed to identify the essence and definition that motivates our socialization and renders men and woman equal operators of collaboration. We are predators and everything we do emanates from our will, desire and intention to feed. If you can get your head around that simple concept and slide it into your cerebral filtering system you may see some amazing shit in your own head. It's a science experiment; remember!

Try reducing what you believe to be a sophisticated civilization of evolving brilliance and dominating relevance to its intrinsic nature of instinctual behavior. I do it by transforming every system and institution and every place that people gather for the purpose of surviving into a dead carcass on the savanna. Then I transform all the behavior I see into behavior that organizes feeding. When you see your place of employment as a dead carcass and the employees organized around it for no other reason than to feed on the freshest flesh; what you see starts to make sense.

Managers are not more than the guardians of the flesh governing the portions and distribution of the meat of the day, always holding back enough to keep the pack hungry. It's important to get an education, it will determine the quality of meat you eat and which part of the carcass is available to you. When you see social justice through this lens, it makes perfect sense. We don't give to charity because it's the right thing to do we do it to protect our status at the carcass.

Our class system simply defines our willingness to cannibalize our own pack. Do you really think that anyone gives a shit about lesser predators or sending them to war for slaughter? My empathy mitigates my true nature; I am sorry you died but not sorry enough to stop it. After all, my vote is faceless and not all predators are like that. The humor resides in the conviction of true bullshit to convince me otherwise, I simply know what we are.

When I close my eyes and travel back to the savanna, nudging my way toward the meat just enough to feed and not get bitten, I wonder where the females with cubs are. With eyes closed I imagine the behavioral politics to get the cubs fed and just what is traded in the process and with whom. I see the attractor to powerful predators and the rewarding exchange of collaboration. I see that if the attraction is compromised in any way it can easily draw blood.

When with eyes closed I look to the female predator I see a very complex behavior of deception to ply her intentions. That her exchange with the strong only makes them individually weak, that lesser predators hate the stronger and covet their power. They may attack him by attacking her or she may influence lesser predators to challenge his power by exchanging discreet privilege. Her time is now and age will require her to approach the meat with only the power she possesses. Her ability to self-sustain in the order of feeding may place her behind the least of the males.

I understand feminism and the process of gender predation. Without it I doubt that woman would survive much beyond the year 2525. The male has evolved to learn the sophistication of proxy predation; our whole existence is based on it. Our political structure and social class system is organized around young women and the older ones know it. Even our currency is nothing more than dry meat. The house, the dishwasher and all the appliances did not put the female in her most advantageous position; in the pack enticing the outcome of power. Few lesser predators understand her ability to lead by following.

That following creates the illusion of power and increases as an attractor to the benefits of power and the freedom to feed. She will simply strive to control one rather than many and control many by controlling one. It's hilarious to realize that we have always lived in a matriarchy, that concentrating power is female in nature and intention. The only threat to the power of her narrative is not to believe it and not to follow it. That is more threatening than any violence or primal fear she possesses. Her inability to physically overcome her male counterpart has reduced the significance of her existence to the years of her fertility. The test tube of technology may threaten to wipe her out completely.

Don't get me wrong I don't object to our individual natures, I just don't inflate what I see into narcissistic self-importance or a monotheistic "othering" of myself. I'm a predator, my eyes face forward for a reason, I'm willing to look in the eyes of my prey and share the dignity of the divine exchange. But I also know that the civilizing nature of social exchange allows me the illusion of being a predator by proxy and in most cases I am the proxy operative. I know when I look into the eyes of another, be it man or woman. I am measuring their significance in the hierarchy of predation and I know that they are too.

It requires no apology and there is something sublime in the simplicity of seeing it. It places concepts like Briffault's Law, hypergamy, proxy violence, rape, domestic violence and false accusation into a completely different context. Is a predator really concerned about truth? Does a predator really believe in morality or ethics? Isn't the only true skill of a predator its ability to reason? Isn't the best way to cripple the force of reason to simply manipulate its narrative with bullshit? Isn't that really what the internet is teaching us?

What's cool about the internet is the inability to measure an adversary and apply risk management. It's totally feminine in nature and resorts to the pure psychology of attraction by narrative. Men are individually clueing into the force of manipulating the appetite of opposition with narrative. But like all things social, internet violence is rampant; LOL and a good predator will gate the narrative to protect the she-wolf. After all the most threatening violence is the violence against the narrative. Woof woof.

I've decided to buy myself a pink keyboard because cross-posting is less expensive than cross-dressing and just as entertaining. My name is Phil, I call myself Bill but everyone will know me as Nancy. I'm sampling a new form of FTSU, the "F" stands for fluff and I intend to push the holy narrative in the most entertaining directions possible.

I understand that this perspective is several levels below cynicism, but I realized that in order to make sense of something I don't always get to choose the position of where I stand if I want to see it. As any good predator should know truth is the hunt and what you find is your prey, just remember to bring the cutlery of your reason. Rarrrrrrr.

AVFM News and Activism: Kristina Hansen

February 12, 2013 | by AVfM Radio | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]

Tonight on AVFM News and Activism: Kristina Hansen, Canadian News Director

Kristina Hansen, AKA The Wooly Bumblebee, will be joining us for the first time as Canadian News Director for AVFM as part of our effort to feature our news correspondents regularly on the show. We will be talking about her history and ascension as an MRA as well as the formation of the new African Circumcision Accountability Committee on which she now serves. Hansen is already proving to be a tremendous asset to the AVFM community and is sure to make an impact in the future. She and your hosts James and Robert will be awaiting your calls.

The show starts tonight, the 12th, at 9:00 PM Eastern, 8:00 PM Central, which is 2:00 AM February 13th in London and 11:00 AM February 13th in Brisbane.

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

To the women lurking on the fringes

February 12, 2013 | by Aimee McGee | Link | Original Link

I don't know how you found us. Are you a student at University of Toronto who heard about the Warren Farrell lecture and protest, or you have read the notices about our being blacklisted by powerful forces on the Internet? Or are you in a relationship with a man who has been dragged through the family court by a bitter ex? Or have you come to worry that your son is doing poorly at school or is opting out of society, and you are trying to understand? Or has your brother been falsely accused of rape or domestic violence?

I know you are lurking there, as I did for a couple of months. This place is a bit of a shock to the system. There are a lot of reasons why you might be afraid to identify as part of the Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM). Lets talk about those:

Some of these guys are so angry

Yes, some are. Many of the men who get here have been through some pretty nasty experiences. Some are women angry about things men and boys they love have gone through. They are understandably angry. Despite what a you might have been told growing up, being angry is a normal and healthy human emotion. Maybe if you are honest with yourself, you are here because you are angry about how a man or boy in your life is being treated. I found my way here because I was trying to get my head around the experiences of my Beloved, as a man who experienced abuse in a marriage and is experiencing misandry in the family courts. Get me to speak about the damage done to him and to his daughters by the "family terrorist" and her enablers in the family court and you will quickly pick up I am pretty angry myself. You've got to remember, these guys are angry but it is not directed at you personally. Some are pretty pessimistic about women as a whole, and if we respect that their mistrust comes from experience, instead of shaming them for it, we may learn things we need to learn, sometimes painful things but important nonetheless.

I'll be flamed for saying something stupid

Possibly. If so, learn from it. It feels pretty crappy to get flamed, but if you can get past the feelings, some of the things said in response to your words will help you see things from different angles. The discipline needed is to separate feelings from thoughts: it's something you can learn with practice, but you got to start by interacting so you can learn.

[image]

These guys are anti-relationship, anti-family – I want both in my future

This isn't a dating site. But as the Men's Human Rights Movement continues to gain followers and gain traction, odds of you finding a man who's interested in these issues will go up, whether you stick around here or not. I wouldn't worry much. If you get into a relationship with a Zeta Male you are probably lucky. You will find most of these men to be caring, compassionate, gentle, and honest souls, who are pretty up front about what they want or don't want, even if they are still wounded in some areas. On the other hand, there are some guys – and I don't even want to hazard a guess at the percentage – who are Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW), and looking at the bum deal most men get from the legislation and court system that surrounds marriage and divorce, and they don't want a committed relationhip with a woman. I don't blame them, when you realize what can and does happen to many of them. But there are guys here with children, with partners, with wives even. There are young guys here who I am sure want children and want partners. The big thing if you are going to go into a relationship with a guy who refuses to let others define him, and who believes he has all the same rights you do, is there can be no assumptions as to your respective roles and duties within a relationship. It needs to be negotiated and discussed. Who knows, your Zeta coupling might end up looking quite traditional to those looking in on it, but it may not. It will be your own matter and your own concern, but it needs your care, respect and attention if you are going to maintain integrity as a Men's Human Rights Advocate. In any case, this site is not about your personal relationships, it's for those of you who care about the men and boys in your life. And it is about their issues, not yours.

I believe women can do anything, I don't like some of the attitudes towards gender I see here, particularly when issues such as women serving in the military or getting places in STEM courses.

I also believe women can do anything – within biological limits. I'm shorter and have less muscular strength than probably 95% of the guys on here. I wouldn't be able to do 1/2 of what was expected of me to be in a combat role (laying aside I am a committed pacifist and would be a conscientious objector), so I am prepared to accept from a physical perspective I can't meet the standards needed for soldiering. There are some things women can do better than men, but there are plenty of men who can do those things as well. As for the rigorous academic standards required of STEM programmes – yes, we can achieve them, if we are prepared to make sacrifices like the men and women who have made it there already. I know too many female doctors who once they get to the point they have specialized, doubt their choice to have gone into medicine in the first place. The thing those women have in common: they are trying to be a consultant, and a mother, and they are constantly fighting against the thing that got them into their training in the first place. The unhappy women I see had to be single minded to get into medicine, and by trying to be several things at once they can't be single minded – they can't be the best. I am not saying women who want to be in STEM fields should not have children. What I am saying is we need to accept that if they have children their career paths are going to be at a slower trajectory than when they don't–or, accept a partnership with a man who takes on most of the duties at home and thus makes less money than you, and not think less of yourself, or more important, think less of him, because of that choice.

Yes, workplaces can accommodate working mothers – in my own family there have been two women who have had "job share" roles during their children's younger years. My eldest sister took this along with her partner taking time out for some of the child raising.

She and I have very similar professional responsibilities at this time, yet I've been working 10 years less than her – but the 10 "missing years" were the years she was part-time, and she has no regrets. If we women are going to have self-respect, we need to work out what we want and be prepared to sacrifice – and that might involve making choices that run contrary to society's message of "I can have it all." No you can't. No one can.

What if I get hit on by one of these guys?

That will probably happen less here than elsewhere. But you might I suppose get lucky and land a guy who is as great as my Beloved. No, seriously, sexual interest and attraction happens between humans as they get to know each other. Equal relationships, be they friendships or something more intimate involve both parties making choices. If you don't want to "spoil a good friendship" then it is OK to say "No, thanks". In my experience (and I have recent experience of this), your "no" will be respected. It might even make the friendship stronger.

Is it safe meeting fellow MHRAs in real life?

I've met a few. I hope to meet more. Standard operating procedure based on anyone I meet online applies. Neutral public venue, independent transport and my escape route planned. That's just common sense for anyone of either sex. After a while, you might meet in each other's homes, spend time in more private spaces, and so on, but that's after you get to know someone. That shouldn't be different for men or women, and isn't.

I like being feminine, I get the feeling that's not OK around here

What do you mean by feminine? If it means expecting female privilege and special treatment because you're a woman, you are out of luck. If it means celebrating your femininity, you are probably in for some pleasant surprises. Once we stop demonizing men, and start valuing masculinity, we start being able to explore femininity, not the pseudo-feminine competitive crap that passes for "femininity" in society.

I really struggle with the whole "register-her.com" thing

Honestly, I struggle with some of it too. But many, like Harriet Harman deserve to be there with spades on, and there are countless men on "sexual offender" registries around the world who've done far less than what the violent protestors at the University of Toronto did in late 2012. That registry is for public officials who've said and done horrible things, or individuals who have a) acted in an unlawful manner, and b) they had public profiles including boasts about things they had done – so they were already "public property." Their names are public information, not secrets.

I don't get the "sammich" jokes

Don't worry – it is because us female MHRA's are thought to be traditional women serving their men sandwiches and waiting on them hand and foot. Since being in a relationship with a Zeta man, I've been more nurtured and pampered than I ever was in a more traditional relationship. In that loving and secure partnership, there is space for humor around our respective roles. I see the whole "sammich" humor as an extension of this – we get these jokes because we are valued as individuals and equals, not to be denigrated.

What if my female friends/boss etc find out I am an MHRM supporter?

Although there has been a recent increase in the number of MHRAs writing and being active under their actual names, some of us still use pseudonyms. I do, not because I would mind people finding out, but because at the time I started becoming active in the movement, I was dealing with a narcissist who decided I was a threat and was out to smear my reputation. I had to make a calculated decision over the risk to my career if this person found out I was an activist with a "notorious" group, and decided that the risk was too great. I will keep reviewing this and perhaps one day, I too will write in my own name. As for female friends etc finding out – one of the most rewarding conversations on the MHRM I have had is with my mother who was an active second-wave feminist. Don't pre-judge people's reactions, and be prepared to accept that if people don't like your choices, perhaps they are not your friends.

I've got only a limited amount of time to contribute to the MHRM – I'm not going to be much use Sending an email to your political representative doesn't take much. Challenging misandric stereotypes in your own household doesn't take much time. Sticking up the odd sticker (I would love to see some AVfM stickers in women's toilets!) or reposting something on Facebook doesn't take much time. But perhaps that action will bring another person to the Men's Human Rights Movement, and then you've changed the world.

Remember, this is a human rights movement, and real human rights movements almost always are mis-characterized and almost all have some extremist elements within them. But this movement not about superior rights for one or the other. It's about the same fundamental rights for everybody. And the responsibilities that go with those equal rights. And you can be a part of making it grow.

[image]

Fuck you, Troy Aikman

February 12, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

And fuck you, Emmitt Smith.

It almost feels bad to have to say it. I'm a Texan, and as much as I like to keep it in its proper perspective I'm a football fan and a fan of the Dallas Cowboys. I grew up watching the Cowboys, from the early days of Don Meredith and Bullet Bob Hayes, through the days of miracle worker Roger Staubach and the succession of Doomsday Defenses. I was as happy as anyone to watch Troy Aikman, Emmitt Smith and Michael Irvin form an offensive triad that absolutely terrorized defenses from coast to coast, adding to Dallas's spectacular history as a winning football team.

Those guys get lots of accolades as athletes, all them deserved, but it appears that with some help from Dallas Mayor Mike Rawlings, too much of the cheer leading has gone to their heads.

Rawlings is just the latest in a long string of politicians cashing in on the "men are bad" domestic abuse bandwagon, fostering a climate of fear and bigotry driven mistrust between the sexes in exchange for some added political capital.

Rawlings has begun parroting the jargon of gender feminists, promising to "change the male culture," in the Dallas area. Of course, the implication here is that male culture is synonymous with raping, wife-beating assholes, and they, meaning you and all your raping, wife-beating asshole friends, need be fixed.

It appears that whatever male culture you were stupid enough to imagine you belonged to, like soldiers, police, firemen or any number of different men who protect and labor and toil to take care of wife and family; well, just forget all that. Get in line to get your change on, men, courtesy of other men in more powerful positions than you are. Men like Mike Rawlings and the designated jock superstars du jour.

They have just the prescription for addressing the complicated issue of intimate partner violence, one that primarily affects children, but which also affects both men and women in relatively equal proportion and across all other lines of social division.

They want 10,000 men to stand together, ignoring the truth about domestic violence, helping perpetuate a destructive myth for the sake of politics. The deception is simple to the point of elegance; prove you oppose violence against women (but not men or children) by standing together with 9,999 other redemption deficient men, proving that they don't really know what the fuck they are doing there.

[unordered_list style="green-dot"]

- Stand with 9,999 other men in ignoring the children who are the victims of violent mothers;
- Stand with 9,999 other men who laugh and scoff at other men who are physically abused;

- Stand with 9,999 other men who ignore the male victims who stay and take it because no one will listen and they won't leave their children behind in the hands of their abuser;
- Stand with 9,999 other men and help turn ignorance of the issue into a movement; into cash and votes;
- Stand with 9,999 other men and help sacrifice the truth so Mike Rawlings can look like he gives a shit about anything but voter demographics;
- Stand with 9,999 other men who don't have a clue that they are useful idiots in a war being waged on them and their sons.

[/unordered_list]

Don't bother explaining to Troy Aikman or Emmitt Smith how the "woman only" model of domestic violence victimization results in abused children being totally ignored by courts and social services. Don't bother explaining to them how violent mothers cause as much psychological damage to children as violent fathers. Don't try to impress on them that "change the male culture" is an unending campaign promise, a slogan that sociopathic dirt bags utter and that they really don't give a rat's ass about how families are affected by interpersonal violence.

Just stand there with 9,999 other pawns and keep your mouth shut, or have some cheese covered wacky fries™ while they lecture you on the inherent evils of masculinity. Try not to think of your father, or especially your son, as men are run into the ground and demonized for their cause célèbre.

Keep telling yourself that you are one of the "good ones," like one of those powerful, gifted men at the podium you admire so much. Remind yourself of how special you feel, how you are looking good to the women, a savior chanting slogans and parroting whatever sound bite you can read off the nearest placard because you are too lazy to pick up a book or a read a real study, and too cowardly to take a stand unless you have 9,999 other idiots standing next to you, patting you on the back.

And then show me all your outrage and indignation when I say, fuck you, too.

(tip of the hat to August Løvenskiolds)

Rape Culture: a constructed narrative

February 13, 2013 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

---

Readers of AVFM will be aware that this site's criticism of acceptable hatred, of advocated violence, and criticism of the public laziness and stupidity of many writers in mainstream channels often takes the form of sarcasm or satire. Sometimes our parodies of publicly acceptable hatred are seized on by the targets of our criticism as "proof" that this site, its founder and contributors are the violent, sociopathic maniacs emulated in parody. It is a blithe, purposeful ignorance of the purpose of our criticism, and of what we find objectionable in public narrative.

Paul's "Bash a violent bitch month" springs to mind. An article AVFM's founder and publisher wrote in response to public gloating by the contributors of Gawker media's Jezebel.com – who bragged in a Jezebel article about routinely assaulting their spouses and boyfriends. For the stupider children in class today, Paul's article was satire. A point made clear in the article itself.

However, an article published by TheNation last week is so naked in its purposeful cultivation of hatred, I find myself unable to conceive of satire or sarcasm of adequate pitch to address it. I'm just not witty enough, and the white hot hatred promoted by theNation contributor Walter Moseley against an entire demographic frankly exhausts me.

The piece in question is called "Ten Things to End Rape Culture".

The term "rape culture" is obviously the gender ideological item of rhetoric referring to an assertion that the culture we all live in is one which normalizes, promotes facilitates and excuses the rape of women.

It happens that law enforcement agencies track the rates of violent criminal victimization. Indeed, according the American Department of Justice Statistics – rape and sexual assault, combined into one category to give a bigger number still comprise the lowest rate of violent criminal victimization of all other types of violent crime. In fact, that rape is a violent crime tends to diminish the claim that it is enabled or facilitated or normalized in our culture. Unless of course you consider the rape of children by clergy, or the rape of children by predominantly female teachers, or the rape of men, by women – a real issue so taboo it's been legally defined as not actually rape.

Rape Culture™, as propounded by gender ideologues, doesn't refer to any of those issues. No, its just the male on female identified public narrative of endless perpetration and victimhood. Indeed, it's worth noting the pedigree of this item of fabricated consciousness. Feminists of the second wave once popularized a claim that "all men are rapists". This was taken from the writing of Marylin French, who has also asserted that "women's oppression is an intrinsic part of the male-dominated global culture".

This is the same global culture in which the casualties of war are overwhelmingly male, where male suicide occurs at 4 times the rate of female suicide, where men die earlier, work the most dangerous and punishing jobs and where despite earning less (from softer, safer employment or non employment) women control the spending of over 80% of disposable income. It is the same global culture even where a modern city is being planned by men in one country for the exclusive use of women; where male gang rape victims in war are specifically excluded from receiving United Nations aid or medical support, and where the significant majority of the electorate in western nations is female.

But returning to Rape Culture™, as an item of rhetoric, it is the direct descendant of "all men are rapists," that old item of depraved hatred so easily dismissed as false, and too nakedly hateful. In its modernized form the accusation is as hateful as ever but now supplies it's own phony plausible deniability.

Rape culture is not a culture enabling rape. It's a narrative telling men and boys they are corrupt, broken, and evil. It's an ideological narrative excusing and facilitating hatred and marginalization of men and boys. So it exists, certainly, just not as the fictional culture of sex crimes against women it is commonly claimed to be.

The article by Mosley begins with a photo, captioned with the claim: "Women at a SlutWalk protest in Berlin. The walk was held in response to a Toronto police officer who said women shouldn't dress like "sluts" if they want to avoid being raped."

Halfway through the body of article, The Nation's editors have inserted the following appeal."Please support our journalism."

What journalism? What Toronto police constable Micheal Sanguinetti said didn't include a reference to rape. He said: "I've been told I'm not supposed to say this – however, women should avoid dressing like sluts in order not to be victimized."

The "journalists" at the Nation, along with slut-walkers world wide imply that a Canadian cop, addressing only 10 people, meant – if you get raped, you were asking for it.

That is very convenient interpretation of Sanguinetti's statement for anyone wishing to justify false moral outrage, or to excuse bigotry and hatred.

Another interpretation of his words: "I've been told I'm not supposed to say this – however, women should avoid dressing like sluts in order not to be victimized." is that women should take some personal responsibility for their own safety, just as every other adult must do, even in a city with low crime rates and a strong, well organized, and trained municipal police force.

The body of Mosley's article is a recycling of feminist rhetoric which has circulated online for several years. The 10-ways to stop rape trope. A list of execrable accusations of malice, stupidity and subhuman violence against every person of male identity online and off. When challenged on the naked malice of that old internet meme – the flimsy excuse of humor has always been the go-to for anyone propagating such hate. Now of course, the flimsy cover of "just a joke" is stripped away as America's oldest weekly news magazine, and one of the most widely read magazines in the world gets in on selling ad space through populist bigotry and hatred.

We are witnessing the real time purposeful cultivation of the normality of atavistic hatred of an entire sexual demographic from the echo chambers of online bigots into mainstream acceptance.

> Name the real problems: Violent masculinity and victim blaming.

This is a recent innovation in gender ideological rhetoric. The attachment of an element of the identity of a group of people to violence, criminality or evil. Violence doesn't have a sex. A list of examples is so easy to find using Google that listing any here would simply be tedious.

Victim blaming, is another item of created narrative, and it refers to any examination of self actualization or decision making on the part of a (female) victim; re-characterizing examinations of cause and effect as a wholly malicious attack on the victim. Without self reflection and examination of volition by a "victim", the transitory status of victimhood becomes long term identity. This may well be the point for gender ideologues. Shiny-armored knights on white chargers would find no employment without victims to rescue and succor.

However, more indicting of the Nation is the persistence through the article of attachment of victim to female pronouns and predator to male. "What made him think this [sexual violence] is acceptable?"

Lying by omission. Moseley next links to a Huffpo article listing "facts" about domestic violence, assembled by another gender ideologue. Nowhere in the list is the fact that most domestic violence is reciprocal, nor that in the minority of DV which is non-reciprocal, women are the majority of the offenders. Nowhere in the list is the fact that the majority of children abused receive that abuse from their mothers. Nowhere in the list is the fact that mention of the victimization of one half of a group while omitting any mention of victimization of the other half is a lie of omission.

It is a list crafted to present the popular fiction that men are violent, and that women are their eternal victims. And this narrative, this half-telling of the truth has two practical purposes. It makes the money flow, and it prevents any effort at stopping such violence from succeeding. And that too, keeps the money coming for the professionals in the sexual violence grievance industry.

Imagine trying to fight a structure fire by pouring water on only the north and east facing walls, and letting the south and west walls burn freely. Imagine a fire department whose funding was tied directly to presenting a picturesque and ongoing narrative of burned out buildings.

Quoting Mosley again :

> [T]he likelihood that a woman will die a violent death increases 270% once a gun is present in the home.

Because bullets don't penetrate the bodies of male family members, right? Only women are victims? So when I was 16 and my step-mother got her hands on a .44 magnum, crept down to the basement and pointed it at me, I was perfectly safe, because I'm male. Well, that's a fucking relief after all these years.

Mosley's second bullet item:

> Re-examine and re-imagine masculinity

That would be the project underway already, right? Re-defining men as violent?

If I am to believe what's fed to me by almost every channel of our mainstream media, My identity, my masculinity is – pathological, predatory, depraved and broken.

So I share no brotherhood with the conceptual father of modern computing; Alan Turing. I am not of the same sex as the coiner of the term "meme" and the great humanitarian and scientist and educator Richard Dawkins. I share no legacy with Cicero, whose question "who benefits" still informs our basic principals of inquiry into human behavior. I am not a member of the sex who invents, creates, builds and investigates? Nope, I'm just a testosterone poisoned woman, and I should hate myself for the actions of a few criminals.

Mosley again :

> Once we name violent masculinity as a root cause of violence against women..

Wait! Wait, let me guess! We line them all up against the wall and shoot them? Maybe put all the menz into camps to perform menial labor, starve to death, and we can render their corpses down for soap and lampshades? Right?

Oh, no, apparently I'm skipping ahead. According to Mosley:

> [W]e have to ask: Is masculinity inherently violent?

He follows this with:

> Understand that rape is not a normal or natural masculine urge.

This stunning bit of Captain Obvious is actually not an answer in Mosley's narrative.

The question was actually asked to suggest that, "yes, masculinity is inherently violent." This is a trick I use in my own writing, too, although never quite as clumsily as this. Get the reader to supply the answer in their own mind.

Mosley is assuming the ignorance and gullibility of the reader to say that masculinity is inherently violent.

There is no polite rebuttal to this vile lie.

However, I will offer some insight into why a man would go to such effort to vilify every other male human being.

He is one of the "good" men. That is to say he is the equivalent of some African Americans in 1960 that would not get all uppity while being pushed around and forced into back doors away from "decent" society; who would actually admonish other African Americans to Uncle Tom their way through life with open acceptance of their inferiority.

In that respect, Mosley is not like other men, you know, the bad ones. Dem dat don't mind they place.

It is also a path to perceived sexual approval, and on some level, desirability.

What we see in the TheNation article is a little dog balancing biscuits on his nose, hoping to hear a "good boy!" and to get acknowledgment as one of the only "proper human beings" in the conversation; appealing to the people with the social power to confer the public identity of a "good man."

He is simply begging women's approval, sniffing for pussy at the expense of men collectively.

The photo posted at the top of the Mosley's article depicts a slut-walk participants holding up a sign which read, "No Excuses" for rape and violence. Yet, every mention of violence in his article includes the limiting clause "against women."

Women are the LEAST affected demographic of violent criminal activity.

Indeed as you examine the women in the photo, they bear the smiling mugs of power shoppers on a mall excursion vs. expressions resembling outraged and concerned victims walking in protest against a horrific violent crime. Oh, well, perhaps they were just caught up in a moment of levity.

♦♦♦

Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. This is a Latin dictum expressing a principal of western thought that the expressed mention of one thing implicitly excludes all others. Exclusion is the hallmark of gender ideologues.

In addition, if no excuses for violence and rape are to be tolerated, why is female-perpetrated violence and female perpetrated rape always excused by feminists?

Simple. Because violence is not their concern. Cultivating hatred is. Indeed, for professional ideologues like Jessica Valenti – and wannabes like Mosley — maintaining a narrative in which violence thrives serves their purpose beautifully. Valenti, who has long advocated the elimination of basic principals of due process and justice for men – likely wants women to be subject to ever greater violence, because continued and escalating female victimization serves their narrative.

Mosley concludes with a paragraph places him snugly on Valenti's back porch, where she may open the door and let him in:

> It is not enough to bring individual perpetrators of rape and sexual > violence to justice."

Left unstated is the emotional urge to both ignore female perpetrated abuse (don't look at the research, just listen to pundits) and to preemptively criminalize an entire sexual identity.

Since the problem lies in a culture that is entertained by degrading acts and images of women:

http://4.bp.blogspot.com/_IxFbDVkq7a0/SM8ks4UjDOI/AAAAAAAAAGY/jmE3VIio7bs/s1600/voodoo_01.jpg

http://www.gettyimages.ca/detail/photo/woman-walking-a-man-on-a-leash-high-res-stock-photography/aog67894?Language=en-US

http://www.ministryoftofu.com/wp-content/uploads/2012/02/feminism01_thumb.jpg

> [T]he solution is to look at the individual acts as a symptom of rape culture and solve it holistically.
>
> We all have a part to play in allowing rape culture to exist—so, we can all do something to eradicate it.

And, Walter Moseley, in your case the opportunistic self-loathing and bigotry is nothing more than approval seeking from the leisure class, and the validation of their "I'm one of the good men" cards.

Newsflash: You're not good man. You're an obsequious, lying, asshole begging for fetid scraps of social approval from bigoted ideologues.

What you've really earned is your own shame, and entirely deserved public contempt, but don't let your treat fall to the floor when they toss it to you. Catch it in your teeth like smart little puppy.

Moseley is right about one thing. Rape Culture™ is real. It's a highly popular and openly promoted narrative. Indeed, it's a sickening manifestation of increasingly acceptable hatred of men and boys, and it has got to go.

AVfM Radio: the lie of omission

February 14, 2013 | by AVfM Radio | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]

In addressing the human rights concerns pf men and boys, it quickly becomes obvious that our culture's prevailing ideology of gender is not simply an obstruction, but an active opponent to the universality of basic human rights. In that opposition, a relentless repetition of false facts and half-truth is principal in the tool kit of gender ideologues opposing human rights.

Tonight, we'll be looking at the lie of omission. A superficially true statement, which purposefully omits context to cultivate the illusion that the whole truth is what was mentioned is such a lie.

1 in X number of women is abused. And no mention of the number of men simlarly abused, implying, by omission that it is zero.

Girl Writes What, The WoolyBumblebee and John the other will be filling in what our gender ideologue superiors have been habitually leaving out.

Tonight on A Voice for men radio at 6 PM Pacific Time, 8PM Mountain Time http://www.blogtalkradio.com/avoiceformen/2013/02/15/the-lie-of-omission call in number for the show is 310 388 9709

[/box]

Thanks for nothing, Betty Friedan

February 14, 2013 | by Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) | Link | Original Link

---

While this is A Voice for Men, JudgyBitch has some thoughts on things everyone seems to be terrified to tell young women. We're certain this will infuriate a lot of gender ideologues. But after the end of this message about young women, I will have a question for JB, as well as anyone else with the guts to answer it. –DE

It's been fifty years since Betty Friedan tore apart her home. Thanks for nothing, you whiny bitch.

Both Slate and Jezebel are running pieces today on the 50th anniversary of the publication of Betty Friedan's The Feminine Mystique. The book was a grenade tossed in the cultural landscape and when it detonated, it left American families shattered, women of color sidelined and the millions of children without fathers.

[image]
Good work, Betty.

http://www.slate.com/articles/double_x/doublex/features/2013/the_feminine_mystique_at_50/the_feminine_mystique_at_50_a_feminist_reads_betty_friedan_s_seminal_book.html http://jezebel.com/5984059/you-cant-empower-girls-without-a-reality-check

In all fairness to Noreen Malone, writing at Slate, she does acknowledge that "…work doesn't automatically put you on the road to self-actualization (as Friedan implies it does), and the degree to which it contributes to it probably waxes and wanes at different points in a person's life. What about women (or men!) who genuinely do find the bulk, or even part, of their creative fulfillment in more traditional homemaking tasks, or at least less corporate ones, and who derive their sense of mission from helping people—even if mostly the ones related to them?"

Work doesn't automatically put you on the road to self-actualization. When you consider the "work" women actually do, that's a giant no shit, Sherlock.

http://judgybitch.com/2013/02/07/babies-we-dont-need-no-stinking-babies-the-genius-of-amanda-marcotte-again/

What exactly is so fulfilling about being a secretary? Still the number one occupation women who work outside the home choose.

[image]
A rewarding life of fulfillment
Jezebel, in an uncharacteristic recognition of reality, has noted that women still don't achieve very much, despite 50 years of college degrees and boisterous cheerleading telling them they can do everything men can do, backwards, in heels!

[image]
The idea that we may be on the wrong track, culturally, naturally never occurs to old Jezzie. Nope. If what we have isn't working, well then, we must need more of it! Genius.

In service to this idea, they have created a “reality check” for young women. I’ll give you the summary:

Teach girls to angrily blame others for their choices, emphasis on anger
Force them into STEM fields, against their curiously stubborn lack of interest in those fields

Teach them to be sluts and just call it “sexuality”

Teach them to be activists in supporting important causes like “slutwalks”

Teach them to put their own inflated sense of ability and worth at the center of their life narrative

Force them into creative fields (I thought we wanted STEM?)

Teach them a sense of entitlement to leadership

Teach them to choose only the choices preapproved by Feminist White Ladies™

Wow. Gee, I sure hope my daughters grow up to be feminists. Sounds like a world of happiness, right there.

[image]

A horrific subjugation by The Patriarchy

To celebrate the 50th anniversary of the worst book every written for women, I’d like to offer my own “reality check” for girls and women.

Let’s start by teaching young women to calm the fuck down. There is no conspiracy/patriarchy designed to enslave you in the kitchen wearing nothing but an apron and Chanel No.5 (although that sounds like fun).

Feminism, by and large, has confused two separate ideas: patrilineage and aristocracy. Patrilineage is simply the custom of having children bear their father’s surname. When a family unit is formed, the family shares a single surname and in our culture, that surname belongs to the father. It says nothing about the personalities or the quality of the relationship between the two individuals who have formed the partnership.

It always makes me laugh to hear women say “I kept my own name.” Uhm. No you didn’t. You kept your father’s name, or if you are the product of a single mother, you kept your grandfather’s name. That’s just how we roll. Our names come from our fathers. Get over it.

[image]

The word “patriarchy” is thrown around by feminists to describe this mythical place wherein all women were oppressed and exploited by all men, who had all the rights and privileges of both citizenship and sex.

Wrong.

Most men had no rights or privileges of any kind. They were just as oppressed and exploited as women. By whom?

By an aristocracy of both MEN AND WOMEN. Queens Victoria and Elizabeth are the longest reigning sovereigns in the written history of the world, and neither of them took any particular interest in the plight of the working class, unless forced to by the circumstances of history.

[image]
The last men in England, for example, did not win the franchise until 1885. One generation later, women secured to right to vote, too. Until then, almost all men and women were peasants slaving on lands owned by a ruling elite.

[image]
You want to hate something? Hate the crown. The rich (both men and women) are the ones who oppress and exploit, and confusing "rich" with "men" misdirects our anger and our strategies for redress.

[image]
Let's teach young women that their interests and proclivities are often dramatically different than men's–and that's okay. It's okay to let men dominate in STEM fields, where they continue to discover and invent technologies and tools that astonish us and transform our world. Forcing women into these fields against their natural instincts or abilities is only going to slow that rate of discovery. Women who want to be there should be (as they have been for centuries)…

[image]
Herschel Caroline, 19th Century astronomer
…just as men who want to be first grade teachers should be (and have been for a long time).

[image]
A 19th century children's teacher
Let's tell young women the truth about their sexuality, and their fertility. Most women will want to have children. That's the instinct that keeps us alive as a species, and all the iPhones and Pinterest boards in the world isn't going to change that. And most women will not only want to have children, they will want to be with them. Women's fertility peaks at 25 #sorry feminists. After 35, you are on a long, painful road to Clomid and IVF and after 40, the deal is pretty much done. You will not be having any children without a great deal of difficulty (and maybe not even then).

[image]
Not the end of the world, but be aware that it's a choice you make We need to teach young women to respect their fertility and to plan their lives around that. Biology. Always. Wins. Heading off to college and trying to launch a "career" (most likely as a secretary) during peak fertile years is a recipe for total disaster, as global birth rates in the feminized world demonstrate.

http://judgybitch.com/2013/02/07/babies-we-dont-need-no-stinking-babies-the-genius-of-amanda-marcotte-again/

[image]
part of life
The best possible scenario to raise children is a nuclear family (two parents, gay or straight) splitting responsibilities and sharing labor and with help from family and friends. Since women feed babies, that means that the domestic labor is hers, and productive, economic labor often falls to her partner, unless you're really willing to plan out how to do it different, and respect that choice with a man who wants to do it different with you.

http://judgybitch.com/2012/11/13/refusing-to-breastfeed-your-child-yeah-that-makes-you-a-shit-mother/

All of that strongly implies monogamy and fidelity. Teaching women that acting like sluts and having sex with a lot of different men outside the bonds of a loving relationship (whether that results in marriage or not) is somehow empowering and evidence for their strength and independence has had devastatingly predictable outcomes for young women: cutting, drug addictions, depression, eating disorders, suicide.

http://sixtyminutes.ninemsn.com/article.aspx?id=8553846

Feminism tells young women pernicious lies about their own desires: most women want loving, stable relationships with men they care about and feel deeply connected to, and they will want to have children and raise those children in the context of that sort of relationship. Young women need to be encouraged to make the kind of choices that will allow them to fulfil those desires.

Let's teach young women that there is a difference between what you WANT to do, and what you are ABLE to do. This is toddler-ville, people! No, you can't be anything you want. How does this even seem like a sensible thing to tell anyone?

[image]
image from flickr upload bot on wikimedia commons
True story: When my LittleDude was three years old, he got a pair of Superman pajamas with a little cape and he was soooooo excited. He stripped down and could barely hold still while I helped him don his new suit, then he climbed up on the back of the couch and flung himself down on the hardwood floor! It was a nasty landing. Poor little guy. I picked him up, sobbing, and he said to me, "Mommy, these don't work!"

He really, really, really wanted to fly. He could not have wanted it more.

Guess what? He can't.

Teaching young women that they can be firefighters or astronauts or combat soldiers or the President or a unicorn trainer when they grow up is encouraging them to ignore what they are able to do and just focus on what they want. Hey, for any women who are in fact, able, every opportunity should be open (except combat soldier), but the fact is that most of them are not capable of taking on physically demanding jobs that require enormous strength of either body, will or mind.

http://judgybitch.com/2012/11/28/no-women-should-not-be-in-combat-are-you-fucking-kid ding-me/

When we teach young women to focus on their ability rather than their desire, we encourage them to take rational stock of themselves, and we counter the cultural pressures towards self-absorption and narcissism–and shaming men who can't give them everything. Be who you are, to be certain, but know who you are and what you can do, first and foremost.

Let's teach young women that there is nothing wrong with being First Officer. The USS Enterprise D has a crew complement of 1014 and only one of those people is the Captain. Most people, men and women, are not cut out for the Captain's chair and that is just fine.

#startreknerd

We can't all be Captains, obviously. Teaching young women that they are not ambitious enough, that they will never be fulfilled, that their accomplishments amount to zero unless they are in the Captain's chair does a huge disservice to all the many men and women who are happy to be crew members and gives permission for women to sneer at other women who are happy with their "lower ranks."

[image]
image by dave_7 on Wikimedia Commons
It goes by the name "The Mommy Wars" in popular culture, and it is essentially a movement to devalue, discredit and shame women who would rather care for their own families than earn money caring for someone else's. When the only measure of a woman's value comes in the form of dollars earned, women who stay at home to care for their families have no value at all.

That's nice, isn't it? Feminism: making women feel like shit for 50 years.

[image]
And finally, let's teach young women that they are not special. Young women need to know they are not better than men, they are not morally or ethically or legally superior to men, and we need to encourage them to start agitating for changes in the law and culture that will make those truths the reality. Let's make young women activists? Oh hell yeah.

Insist on equal treatment before the draft board. Insist on equal custody agreements when marriages dissolve. Insist on the right to bodily integrity for both boy and girl babies. Insist on fair schooling that respects both boys and girls. Insist on equal health care and social spending. Insist on the right to raise your own children without shame.

It boils down to this:

> Listen up, maggots.
> You are not special.
> You are not a beautiful > or unique snowflake.

> You’re the same decaying organic matter as everybody else.

How’s that for a reality check?

Lots of love,

JB

And now for the big question for JB, not to mention the people at Jezebel and Slate, and anyone else who’d care to take a spin at answering this: even if young women do finally begin to absorb the lesson that they are no better or more special or oppressed then men are, and that nobody can have it all and this is no more men’s fault than anyone else’s, and even if young women begin to respect men again, there remains one enormous questions: why, in the current legal and social environment, should any young man trust young women enough to commit to them and make children with them? What will today’s young women do to make young women worth the risk? Given that women file a majority of divorces in the modern world, it’s pretty clear that promises aren’t even worth the paper they’re printed on anymore. I’m certain heads will explode at this question in polite circles, and neither conservatives nor liberals will like the question much because it doesn’t involve lecturing young men to “man up. Young men have been told they’re privileged shits for 40 years now. So it has to be asked: why should men trust women anymore? - DE

The argument for a principled approach

February 15, 2013 | by James Huff | Link | Original Link

Editor's note: This article is also available in Romanian.

[dropcap]E[/dropcap]ver since coming to the conclusion that my free time would be best spent working as an MRA, I have seen some amazing things happen. The introduction of AVFM Radio, the creation of Register-Her.com, the release of the AO files, the increase in the number and quality of contributors across several forms of media, and the (un)fortunate backlash against our rise as a Human Right's Group by misandrist media have provided me with hope that our message is getting out there to a broader public. We have come very far in a very short period of time.

There are some questions that lie ahead of us that may seem easy to answer at first, but we need to understand the implications of everything we have done so far and what it has already spelled out for our future. Turning this behemoth of misandrist culture around is not going to be easy, I dare say not even possible without the type of wanton destruction it will cause itself as it collapses under its own weight. The fact of the matter is that every culture in every time has depended on the idea of male disposability for the "greater good"……and that "greater good" has often destroyed itself in the process of demanding too much from the individual to sustain the greater whole. It is a cyclical event, and the rise and fall of nation-states, or at least the bloody and horrific revolutions that occasionally visit them happen with such regularity that we barely bat an eyelid anymore.

The fact that these cyclical events can be evidenced over a period of 5000 years of human history does not mean that our futures have to remain so however. Within the Men's Right's Movement, I recognize the seeds of something far greater than anything that has come previously. I see a New Renaissance, a revitalization of individual freedoms and liberties, an unshackling of the chains of the destructive cycles of humanity, and the movement of humans toward a New Age.

Do not take the above paragraph for the idea that I envision some Utopian world. I see something far from it. Our struggles define who we are, but the question remains whether or not we should be struggling with ourselves, or with new innovations and becoming masters of the universe around us. I see all the wasted effort of hundreds of millions of lives in a struggle to control groups of humans, most of whom simply want peaceful lives for their loved ones. I am talking about changing the scope of our struggle from the predominantly Human Vs. Human paradigm we now have to a new one: Human vs. Environment.

"James, you are jumping the gun on this!"….and yes, I know that I am, and have done so with a purpose. The artist unveils the painting before explaining the creative process that brought him to it and the meaning behind it. Tis the "What the fuck is that?" moment when looking at the canvas that unlocks something in the human psyche and the artist can then explain the meaning as clear as fresh air.

Now pay attention to this next part.

[box icon=""]

Most humans are blinded by all the extraneous thought placed within political group-think. The moral questions of the day are framed in simple matters of right and wrong when dealing with the individual, but seem ever so complicated when applied to the needs of a group of people, or how one group of people interact with another group of people. We get bogged down in old prejudice, financial matters, and resource allocation and everyone wants a slice of whatever is being served up next from their political masters.

Group W supports Politician X because they get Product Y, never mind that Group Z over there was forced at the point of a gun to give up their Product Y by Politician X. Besides, that Group Z has plenty of Product Y, and not sharing it – never mind they were actually robbed of it – would be morally reprehensible. This type of thing happens every day, all day, seven days a week, 365 days a year.

Meanwhile, all those from Group Z see that all their Product Y is being liberated – I mean taken– from them so they naturally say "Why the fuck should we produce any more Product Y if the guys holding all the guns are just going to take it from us and give it to a Group W, who can go get it themselves. If they want it that bad, then they should get it on their own merit." This inevitably leads to bad feelings all around as Group W feels slighted because they have just been called lazy and have heard for years that having as much Product Y as they want is a Right. Of course they heard that from Politician X, who promises them as much Product Y as they need – I mean want – as long as they support him.

Eventually some people in Group Z feel as if they should be in Group W, and stop producing product Y. Some people in Group Z don't want to be in Group W because they don't want to be seen as the lazy layabouts they think Group W is, so they form a new group called Group A and decide to produce Product R, which is intentionally of no value to Group W. This new product serves Group A's and Group Z's purposes just fine. This pisses off Group W, who now get less Product Y because there are not enough people making it, and they demand from Politician X that Group A be disbanded because the production of product R threatens their free access to product Y.

Meanwhile those remaining in Group Z feel disenfranchised by the whole affair and decrease production of Product Y even further to the point where they can only sustain themselves, keeping Group W from getting hardly any Product Y at all! Some of Group W decide to get some Product Y for themselves by working for it, but the majority of Group W have been told it is their Right to have Product Y on demand so they stay within the group and threaten Politician X that if more Product Y is not forthcoming, that Politician X will quickly find votes against him in favor of Politician B – who promises to not only make sure plenty of Product Y is forthcoming, but a new and improved Product Y+ as well!

Politician X, not wanting to sign books on the failure of his policies for the rest of his life eventually tells everyone in Group Z that if they do not begin producing Product Y at once, and make some new and improved Product Y+ as well, that he will be forced to bring people with guns to make sure they do it. The story is old…timeless even. We have the current atmosphere, or blank canvas if you will, and a couple of colors of paint to choose from. We can make new colors from those we have, but we have to think outside the palette.

[/box]

As we can see, the simplified problem above can contain ever so much more complexity, and the arguments can even be turned on their heads entirely (just turn the canvas upside down). Maybe Group Z really is full of mean spirited asses that put Politician X in power to create a dependent Group W just to keep their economic power. Maybe Group W has become lazy layabouts because the idea of Rights as espoused by Politician X was hopelessly flawed and Politician X was just looking for easy votes – or at least a stifling of revolutionaries by controlling Group W with empty promises. Maybe…just maybe….Group A really did say "fuck-it-all", we are going to make everyone suffer with an overproduction of Product R, which could supply Groups A and Z, but would, like, totally screw over all those ass-hats in Group W and make them crawl on their knees and beg for the production of Product Y again. "That would teach Group W to think so high and mighty of themselves!"

This simply proves the point of how hopeless political ideologies are today, and so too the base individuals that drive those ideologies off the cliff of human reason and straight into bloody conflicts, ruined lives, suffering children, and inter-species relationships between cats and dogs. Those cat-dogs are the true abominations most politicians tell us.

We need to regulate how cats and dogs love each other because the children of those unions are actually the cause of all those bloody conflicts, ruined lives, and suffering children. Never mind the fact we hold guns to peoples' heads to enact our failed policies to begin with.

Obfuscation of the real reasons as to why the State continually fails on every level is the order of the day….I mean of the decade….I mean of the century….fuck it. What I really mean to say is the phrase "Throughout All of the History of Every State."

Now we can add our paint to this canvas we have been provided. That paint takes the form not of a new political ideology or religion, or anything most people are really familiar with. That paint is a moral philosophy called First Principles, and its practice and application to every human being (Universality) is known as Universally Preferred Behavior. This is not a totalitarian approach from some top down power but an approach from the individual to the outside world.

The Five Principles:

1) Personal Accountability

2) Personal Responsibility

3) Characterization by Merit

4) Non-Aggression, Non-Violence

5) Respect for Personal Property

These are the colors we want to work with. There are several reasons why.

Almost all of the social issues we deal with every day can be broken down by using the First Principles Approach. Affirmative Action fails Number One and Number Three. Alimony fails Number Four and Number Five from the perspective of the courts, and Numbers One and Two from the perspective of the ex-"insert spousal type" receiving the alimony. Quotas for boardrooms fail Numbers One, Two, and Three from the perspective of the company, and Numbers Four and Five from the perspective of the government enforcement of these laws. These are just a few ideas of how we can break these issues down and argue them. This is how we attack misandry no matter where it is in our society. Any refutation of a single portion of the five principles also results in the entirety of the First Principles collapsing.

1) Personal Accountability – An internal measurement of Merit. This is defined through self-sufficiency without resorting to violence and coercion, and the willingness to face natural consequences for your decisions. It is primarily used as an honest form of self-assessment. It keeps unrealistic expectations and narcissism in check.

2) Personal Responsibility – The measure of external actions that can also be seen and judged by others.. This one has a twofold process, one of which is redundant to personal accountability, but creates a tie between the self and the world outside of the self. This is the physical manifestation of personal accountability as judged by others in both deed and word, and the barometer of basic relationships with other people.

3) Characterization by Merit–The ability to judge others based upon their personal responsibility. This means other people should be judged by whether or not they are moving toward self-sufficiency without resorting to violence and coercion and whether they demonstrate a measure of personal accountability by facing the natural consequences of their actions. This is true regardless of external features of the individual being judged.

4) Non-Aggression/Non Violence – Simply put…… Thou shalt not enforce thy will upon others through the use of threat of the loss of life or liberty, or by injury, or through the threat of loss of personal property (or by making good on said threats and simply taking what you want). This can be altered only in the scope of upholding contractual law in which consequences for breaking the contract are fully understood between both parties, or in defense of personal property rights.

5) Respect for Personal Property Rights – By which the fruits of all time and labor by an individual gained through self-sufficiency in any environment, or property gained through contractual agreements with other individuals is solely the possession of that individual and is not to be removed by any form of force or coercion. Another way to put it is the actual body of the individual and anything created by the body (the tool of consciousness) is the exclusive property of that individual unless contractual agreements are signed between parties for the exchange of goods and services.

The key to understanding how to deconstruct all of our issues rests upon these five principles. It nullifies the idea of a social (socialized and statist) contract because contracts must be recognized and entered into by individuals, creates Universality of expectations of behavior between individuals, destroys cronyism in all its forms by creating a meritocracy, creates competition based upon true supply and demand, generally allows self-interest and personal liberties to be followed without infringing upon the life and property of others, removes violence and coercion from a society that teaches these principles to their youngest, and increases the level of volunteerism in society to correct problems that cannot be solved through contractual agreements.

Apply these principles to individual MRAs, and allow the influence of those principles to be seen in the MRM, and you have a powerful force that is capable of pointing out misandry, true inequality of opportunity, and actual infringements upon individual rights no matter where it rests. This also becomes our most powerful tool on positing solutions to the myriad problems that boys and men face in today's society. No doubt these principles can be carried into every sphere of human interaction…but to the MRM….these ideas….these principles….and my hopes that they be adopted in order to paint a brighter future are for you.

Iceland seeks to ban Internet porn

February 15, 2013 | by Lucy Brown | Link | Original Link

Iceland government, lead by the militant lesbian feminist Jóhanna Sigurðardóttir from the Social Democratic Party (aligned to the Socialist International) is now planning to implement Internet filters, similar to the ones being used in Iran and China, in order to censor Internet porn in the country[1]. Moreover, they also plan to make it illegal for people to use Icelandic credit or debit cards to purchase pay-per-view pornography over the internet.

Interior Minister Ögmundur Jónasson, from the Left Green Movement, says this should be done because the rights of the women that appear in porn are violated and that he also considers the safety of the children that might get access to pornographic content as "a priority."

He also adds that this is not censorship, saying the following:

> We have to be able to discuss a ban on violent pornography, which we all agree has a very harmful effects on young people and can have a clear link to incidences of violent crime.

A problem, though, as there is no link between porn and the incidence of violent crime, except to the degree that study after study after study points to the indisputable fact that increased availability of internet pornography has a strong positive correlation to a decrease in violent crime, rape in particular.

To put it even more bluntly, there is valid concern that the proposed Icelandic measures will result in an increase in rape.

Regardless of how one might feel about pornography, it's obvious that control over the Internet is the wet dream of almost all governments in recent years, since the Internet is the only place that is still free of censorship and ideological control.

Besides, there's no mention anywhere, in any news report, about the men that appear in porn. Aren't their rights also violated?

What's worse, is that censorship of porn has the synergistic support of many religious radicals who also feel that they have the right to dictate others what they can and cannot watch. This is not the first time when we see feminism and religious radicalism virtually mirroring views regarding sexuality in general, and male sexuality in particular. Feminism and Christianity collude on the view that male sexuality is dirty[3], the same way feminism colludes with Abrahamic religions' view with regard to porn.

That being said, it is likely for this idea to pass, at least in Iceland – though I would not hold my breath on the UK anytime soon.

To make things worse, the Icelandic government paints this overt authoritarian censorship as "progressive" and "civilized" – just like other governments in Europe have done throughout the last 20 years with their authoritarian bans and regulations – and the population buys their story.

Iceland has a history of this kind of action

In 2010, the Icelandic government banned strip clubs, lap dancing or paying for nudity in restaurants and in 2011, the government also made it illegal for one to print porn or to sell pornographic material. So this is basically an extension of the law to Internet porn.

The fact that Dubai bans lap dancing for Islamic reasons and Iceland did it for feminist reasons describes the best way possible the synergy between two totalitarian ideologies. The end result is the same.

This opens the door wide for scarier things

But the issue goes beyond porn. The moment you let someone have control over the Internet, the possibilities for tyranny are unlimited. China commenced its censorship program attempting to stamp out criticism of the Politburo and the Communist Party and it ended up banning all social media. It was close to banning Google till Google helped them censor material from Chinese citizens.

Iran started its program attempting to prevent non-Islamic positions to be read by the people, and it ended up banning blogspot and wordpress altogether – including, ironically, several thousands Islamic blogs.

So is it going to be different in Iceland? Of course not. Except that more women are likely to be raped.

What will stop the Icelandic government from banning AVfM? They can just say that because this article contains the word “pornography” – it will lead people into temptation. The government is all too happy to “deliver you from evil”.

The same happened in the EU with several attempts to pass legislation that would allegedly help the authorities to catch imaginary pedophiles. Since the laws were rejected, now the European Parliament prepares to spend millions of euros to pay Internet trolls to deal with those criticizing the Maoist-lead European Union[4].

So this is not a slippery slope fallacy. Giving governments’ control over the Internet will eventually degenerate to censorship of everything that the State doesn’t like and frankly, there are a lot of things on the Internet that the State doesn’t like, starting with freedom.

Is this the world in which Icelanders want to live? Is this the world in which any sane person wants to live?

You don’t like porn? Fine, then don’t watch it! You don’t want your children to access porn? Fine, then install a parental control software. You don’t want your children to access porn from their smartphones? Well, there is a technical solution for that, too. Or a better one – don’t buy your children a smartphone. What do they need it for? There are a lot of classical cell phones available on the market that will fulfill the necessity of being in touch with your kid. This way, your kid might actually end up socializing with people instead of living his or her life on social media.

We are heading towards a world where the Ministry of Truth will tell us what opinions we should hold. And, as time goes by, this statement becomes less of a farfetched hypothesis and more of a daily reality.

[1] http://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/worldnews/europe/iceland/9866949/Iceland-considers-pornography-ban.html

[2] http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-2277769/Icelands-bid-ban-web-porn.html#axzz2KldsNyMh

[3] http://www.avoiceformen.com/men/men-and-patriarchy-in-the-church/

[4] http://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/worldnews/europe/eu/9845442/EU-to-set-up-euro-election-troll-patrol-to-tackle-Eurosceptic-surge.html

A wandering cauldron of complete bullshit

February 15, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

This video by Bernard Chapin warrants a response here because he raises some issues and fabricates some canards that need to be addressed.

Then I will happily move on.

The false premises Bernard is operating from here are so numerous that I won't take time to address all of them. I'll just stick with those that stand out the most. And I will ask those of you who understandably don't care for infighting to bear with me on this one. After a couple of times responding minimally to this man's foolishness, even his attempts to come to the site bullying to get his way, I am not inclined to issue any more passes.

That being said, fuck up number one here is the claim that AVFM "renamed the men's rights movement." I don't know if Bern bothered to read the post on the matter, or if he bothered reading it for naught because he just doesn't understand what it means. AVFM made an editorial decision to refer to what we do here as men's human rights activism. Last I checked, it was within our rights to do so, and was not an infringement on Bern's or anyone else's freedom of speech.

Like most tradcons, Bernard is all about free speech and property rights till you make a decision for yourself that he disagrees with. AVFM has never claimed to represent the men's movement as a whole. Indeed I have taken great pains, as I am now, to remind people that the editorial team here never claims to speak for anyone other than the management of this website. Any single entity claiming to represent this entire movement is in la la land. I dare say I am much more in tune to that reality than is Bernard Chapin.

I am also experienced at this enough to know that we are never served to be in the business of herding snakes with a stick, which is precisely analogous to the idea of trying to make every supporter of men's rights follow AVFM editorial guidelines everywhere they go. Hell, I can't even get Bernard Chapin to read and understand the difference between an editorial policy and universal edicts, so I don't think I would waste my time trying to put every MRA, or MHRA as we call them around here, on a leash.

Bern knows better than this. Why he is painting this bullshit picture is anyone's guess. Well, it is actually not much of a mystery. I know exactly why he is doing it, which leads us directly to the next point.

Bern claims that AVFM has become politicized. Really now? Where is the reference for that, Bern? Oh yeah, I forgot, you don't have one. It is just another absolutely empty claim.

Allow me to inject enough reality in here to compensate for Bern's lack of it in this video. The problem he has is with our Managing Editor Dean Esmay, who has political views largely different than Berns. (Largely different than mine as well, not that I give a fuck what anyone's personal political beliefs are).

Has Dean Esmay used his position here to push those views in articles or in any other management function? NO. HE HASN'T. He has written on men's rights issues and that is it. Like all of us, he has at times let some of his beliefs be known, but that is hardly pushing a political agenda. I have made it no secret that my leanings are Libertarian, and particularly anti-statist. Has the site made an official endorsement of the American Libertarian party? Even of Ron Paul, of whom I am a big fan?

Uh, no. Why? Because we don't do partisan politics here. Those with more than a couple of brain cells to rub together already know that.

Believe it or not, I watch most every detail of what happens on this site, and if Dean or anyone else were using campaign posters for article graphics, or endorsing candidates, or political parties it would not likely slip past me.

Just sayin'.

As hard as I look, though, I cannot match BC's ability to catch those things when they are not even there to be caught. The man has speshul talent.

That is one of the most difficult parts of what I do, and for which I am the most proud. AVFM is and always has been non-affiliated with any political party. I aim to keep it that way.

Again, where is Bern's evidence that things are any different than this? Well, again, he has none. It is just hot air oozing up from the wandering cauldron, and it smells like it, too.

I know the reason for all this. It is called personal projection. You can grab any number of Bern's videos and hear him assert with regularity that the men's movement MUST be a left vs. right issue. No ifs, ands or buts, Bern has declared that one official for all of us. Much like what he is accusing AVFM of doing now. Never mind that the most successful men's rights website ever has based its entire editorial stance on rejecting that idea. It's true anyway, cause Bern said so.

Bern is a right wing doorman. That doesn't mean he does not make some really good videos. I have enjoyed them and will no doubt continue to enjoy them. But I always keep his message in proper perspective. Despite the fact that issues that affect men and boys, politically speaking, emanate with roughly equal incidence from the so called left and the so called right, from liberals who Bern can see and from Tradcons –Traditional Conservatives who Bern makes the asinine, borderline retarded claim do not exist — he calls us all to right wing politics as a solution. As though all you have to do to end the wholesale attack on men and boys is to defeat the left. He is a true believer in this, even while his tradcon buddies in the Senate just helped pass VAWA again. Even as invisible, non-extant penis bearing traditionalists fuck men over in family courts and send our boys to die under a right of center banner for commercial interests.

Someone on Bern's channel who supported the above posted 11 minutes of bullshit commented there that his articulation of this was why people were starting to gravitate toward him. In Bern's one moment of getting it right, he pointed out that this was not true.

Points for insight on that one. The fact is, and I don’t say this to be cold, that my video channel has outgrown Berns, and I almost never post videos.

The reason this website has become so wildly popular, and such a threat to the Feminists and Traditionalists (FATS) is because we are not choking down any more of the swill produced by a false, two party “dichotomy” in which it just so happens that men end up on the fucked end of the stick, for the benefit of THE STATE.

Men are waking up, Bern, and you still have one eye closed.

If there is to be any dominating political philosophy at AVFM, it will be anti-statism and nothing else. And it matters not to me if we offend anyone, from the most left leaning supporter of Obama, to the likes of Bernard Chapin, who only imagines he is not a useful idiot for a fake two-party system run by statist thugs who are fucking men over left and right.

Let’s save the red pills for those who don’t choke on them.

To the great men of Dallas: fix both flats

February 15, 2013 | by August Løvenskiolds | Link | Original Link

---

I've lived almost all my life in Texas, in towns and cities all over the state. I wasn't born in Texas, to my dismay, but I got here as quickly as I could, at the tender age of one year old, over 50 years ago. Indeed, the Dallas Cowboys and I began life in Texas on almost the same day. I've visited 44 other states, 6 other countries, and while Arkansas is nice, I can't imagine wanting to live anywhere other than Texas. I can only hope that, someday after my death, if I am lucky, someone will grant me the high honor of making me a naturalized native Texan.

Perhaps you are aware of the "rally" coming up at the Dallas City Hall Plaza on Saturday, March 23, 10 AM, regarding domestic violence and abuse (DV) and the plan to blame the problem of DV solely on men. Several Dallas Cowboys, past and present, as well as other local celebs are planning on being there, along with a hoped-for crowd of 10,000 men and boys. Combating domestic violence and abuse is a worthy cause but not if one does so with an incomplete understanding of the full nature of the problem. Blaming men, and men only, for domestic violence is not worthy of the good and thoughtful people of this city.

About 15 years ago, after a night of performing on stage, I was driving home down Ross Avenue on a rainy November morning at 1 AM. On a dark portion of the street near the old YWCA building I struck a new pothole that, being filled with black water, was invisible to me, and not just one, but both the tires on the right side of my car were instantly flattened.

I managed to maneuver my crippled car into the parking lot of the YWCA, where I parked beside 6 other cars that were damaged in the same way mine was – right-side double flat tires, all. The other drivers had long abandoned their vehicles, so I was on my own.

I changed one of the two flats but that left me soaking wet, dirty, and one tire short of what I needed to continue my trek home. I briefly considered harvesting a tire from one the other vehicles but there was no way to get permission from their owners, and none of those tires would've fit my car, anyway. I had no phone and no desire to sleep in my car, so I made the poor decision to try to limp home. Less than 4 blocks later my right front tire caught fire, my rim was destroyed, but I had managed to find a working pay phone and I called for help. The human telephone operator (we had those back then) was sweet and helpful and put me in touch with a tow truck service. Delayed by a huge chain-reaction series of wrecks on Central Expressway, the wrecker took hours to get to me and it was daylight before I finally got home.

Domestic violence is a lot like a car with two flat tires – if you don't fix both tires, you haven't really repaired anything, and if you think you have, then all you've done just made the problem worse – you are now dirty, out in the cold, and still broken.

There is at least one former Dallas Cowboy who should know this, and he's a pretty good one, too. His name is Deion Sanders. He is still in the news several times a week, and he just won a contentious custody battle with his estranged wife, Pilar – the divorce hearing is still pending. Pilar is a very attractive woman, and so the fact that she lost the battle is extraordinary, given that women overwhelmingly win such cases. Some of Pilar's abusive and illegal acts are detailed here.

Now, Deion's divorce trial begins on March 4, so he'll likely miss the DV rally, and this is a real loss, because a courageous and outspoken man like Deion could give us all some real insight and perspective into the gender binary of DV – meaning, the rights and responsibilities of both men and women in facing and combating abuse.

Have no doubt, courage will be needed to speak the truth that women are violent to men, too, in at least 40% of reported crimes and only God knows how many in real life. Catch them with their guard down, and many men will admit that the women in their lives have very poor impulse control with men when they are refused anything – She Who Must Be Obeyed is a stereotype with a lot of truth to it, and men have the bruises to prove it, if only people cared to listen to men at all.

In 1982 I saw a purse-snatcher in downtown Dallas tackled by 4 guys before he could take 10 steps. The men in our city are quick to help almost any woman in need and only a suicidal lunatic would strike a woman in public. Hiring one female security guard for your business will save you from having to pay 20 guys for the same job, because in the rare case that she gets into a scrape, 20 guys will rush in to volunteer their help.

But ignoring the role that women play in DV does not help women. I see women assaulting men almost every day – sometimes playfully, sometimes painfully, but if you open your eyes, it is all around you. Men take this abuse in stride to the point where they seldom notice it much at all. Blaming the problem on men alone, likewise, does not help. Both men and women must take responsibility for their actions and there can be no compromise on this if we are serious about addressing the core issues and origins of domestic abuse.

Treating women as powerless, perpetual victims is disrespectful to women. It infantilizes them, destroys their confidence and undermines their personal agency. Shaming innocent men who wouldn't dream of raising a hand to a woman is pointless and has done nothing over the years at reducing DV. It does, however, make men feel helpless when the women in their lives routinely assault them.

Guys, if a woman assaults you, call the police. If the police laugh at you, demand that they do their fucking jobs. If they arrest you, demand that they arrest the woman who assaulted you, too. Be clear and calm – video cameras are everywhere, and you can use this. Find one of them, and say "Judge! Judge! Can you see this? I was the one who was assaulted, I called the police, and SHE is the one who should be getting arrested instead of me!"

The men of Dallas have accomplished extraordinary things in the years I've been here. Changing the narrative about domestic violence and abuse to hold both men and women accountable for their actions would be a tremendous addition to this fine record of achievement. Tell Major Mike Rawlings that his rally is nothing but bullshit if it refuses to address the violence and abuse of both sexes.

A lot of people will be betting against us. Let them. If we have to catch the Hail Mary pass on one hip and stumble into the end zone to beat the Vikings, well, we started that, too. The model of domestic violence that says only men are to blame also started in Minnesota. Let’s end it here, this time, in our house.

TyphonBlue hits a home run

February 16, 2013 | by VFM News and Commentary | Link | Original Link

---

This one is still sailing over the parking lot.

To the Arizona State University poster crew

February 16, 2013 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

---

[quote]To attempt to silence a man is to pay him homage, for it is an acknowledgement that his arguments are both impossible to answer and impossible to ignore. ~ J Briant [/quote]

To the AVfM poster crew at Arizona State University:

Thank you. I recently read a statepress.com article describing the actions of campus feminists who appear totally unaware of their own stupidity and bigotry. That might seem a harsh characterization of their actions, but regardless of local law or university regulation about tearing down public speech based on disagreement, there is no polite way to discuss censorship except by honestly calling it totalitarian, cowardly and craven. If Nicole Lemme, Abigail Daniels and Danielle Farley ever grow up and become adults, they will likely be horribly embarrassed by the public record of what seems a total lack of moral compass in each of them.

I hope you, who have been putting up the posters so feared they must be censored, will not be disheartened by the censorship of these cowardly vandals. I hope you will continue. I don't know that my opinion counts for much on your campus, but I particularly like the poster designed by my colleague and friend Limey Westlake which reads "you don't fear and hate [these people] do you?" and which concludes "men's rights are human rights." Hint Hint.

Each poster you put up which is torn down by a feminist – and which a feminist admits to tearing down – is your victory. They cannot answer, they cannot argue, they cannot field any rebuttal, so they must silence. And they do so with no apparent recognition of their own egregious wrongdoing.

They do not recognize censorship as wrongdoing. But we do, as does anyone in the wider world with a real interest in human rights. They are condemning themselves by their own shameful tactics.

Even in their interview comments as reported by Dulce Paloma, these bright lights of campus feminism be-clown themselves. According to the statepress.com writer, Nicole Lemme claimed:

"They think women hate men and feminism is about enslaving them," she said. "That is just not true."

Of course, this explains perfectly why silencing the speech of disagreeing men is so important. Do I need to use sarcasm tag here?

Abigail Daniels also commented, saying:

"We want people to know we don't hate men," she said. "We just want to have the equal rights as them. We don't want more rights." She is not reported to have said "our feminist goal of equal rights is why we must silence them."

The atomic weapons-grade stupidity and hypocrisy would not be believable if I had not seen near identical behavior and justification in Vancouver, responding to my own posters.

A few [hopefully unnecessary] cautions.

As frustrating as this can be to deal with, I must also mention what is likely obvious to you already. I apologize in advance if this is redundant. Please do not fall into the trap of tearing the feminist's posters down or censoring them. You are winning by maintaining your own civilized conduct. Please give your harassers no ammunition to use against you. The willingness to silence and suppress your free speech should alert you that these gender ideologues are not limited by any moral or ethical consideration.

Watch your backs gentlemen, and if you have the financial means I STRONGLY recommend acquiring and wearing a wearable camera – such as the GoPro model I use to cover my own ass.

But keep putting your posters up gentlemen, and take pictures. In fact, if you send photos of your posters on campus to Paul or myself – we'll mail you AVFM stickers backed with industrial strength "fuck you glue," which read AVfM: men's rights are human rights.

As a side note, Kristina who co-hosts AVFM Radio with me asked if Nicole Lemme, Abigail Daniels and Danielle Farley, would be added to register-her.com. Unfortunately, the site has no category for morons.

Gentlemen, keep fucking their shit up, and thanks.

Hansen named AVFM senior editor

February 17, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]

With the continued growth of A Voice for Men, we have been very fortunate to attract talented people from across the globe who want to pitch in and work at the advocacy for men and boys we foster here. Kristina Hansen is one of those individuals. She has been serving as our Canadian News Director for some time now, bringing us relevant and timely analysis and reporting on stories that affect our understanding of the issues.

She has also recently become a sitting board member alongside AVFM News Director Robert O'Hara and others on the African Circumcision Advisory Committee. This committee seeks to promote activism against the current campaign in Sub Saharan Africa to circumcise tens of millions of African men, boys and infants under the highly questionable auspices of AIDS prevention – while also incidentally enriching the lives of the programs major supporters.

Kristina is a direct, outspoken and unapologetic advocate for men and boys who has continually proven her authenticity by rolling up her sleeves and doing the work that so many people won't.

It is for this reason that I am very proud to announce that I have offered, and she has accepted, the position of Senior Editor at A Voice for Men, a position of great trust. As a senior editor, she is called on to help shape content for the site, develop editorial policy and can speak on behalf of A Voice for Men to media and other sources as an official spokesperson.

Please join me in welcoming Kristina Hansen to this position, and in thanking her for her efforts to make a difference.

[/box]

The Expatriate Solution

February 17, 2013 | by William Rand | Link | Original Link

The current, quiet expatriate phenomenon in the United States comprises the newest wave of migrants trying to escape some form of adversity or oppression. This migration from the United States deals primarily with men's issues, specifically the erosion of men's rights in the country. Public opinion probably stands against the men's movement, although I have not asked and do not care. The trend is not new. It has been developing over the last twenty years or so, and to paraphrase an old adage: expatriates are not born; they are made. I know because I became one of them.

Leaving my country, however, does not mean that I do not love it. I do, as I am sure do most expats, including men's advocates. In my case, I reached the point where I could no longer endure the depression, anger and fear generated by the currently dominant social class in the United States: feminists. More importantly, I saw no possibility for positive change. The situation was, in fact, worsening.

As the African American expatriate writer Chester Himes said of his experiences with racial bigotry and hatred in the United States, there seemed no other option but to leave. Leaving is what I did, to my social and emotional benefit; however, that drastic act took a long time to germinate. What makes an expatriate? Usually it is a process rather than a single event. Here is an honest presentation of a small percentage of the experiences that led to my eventual expatriation from the United States.

I used to be a feminist. As a young boy during the late 1960s to early 1970s, I began to write stories. To encourage and help me, my father taught me to observe life, places and people carefully. What I saw in my lower-middle-class neighborhood was a lot of people—my parents and my friends' parents—working very hard to support their families, with little time or energy or incentive left to support their marriages. Those spouses seemed to love each other, more or less, but they spent little time alone with each other. After working hard all day day—and sometimes part of the night at second jobs—the men, devoted fathers, spent what little free time they had exhausted in front of the television or outside on the porch chatting with each other while the mothers prepared supper or washed the dishes. The men talked football or baseball, not men's issues. Men's rights had not yet become an issue.

Men had all the rights, including the right to work themselves to a heart attack or stroke, the exclusive right to die in any upcoming war, the right to shoulder the stress of financially supporting a growing family and, especially for African American and Latino men, the right to be 'first in-last out' in any incarceration situation. The mothers spent their free time during the day chatting with each other in front of the house or sitting in front of the television. The only truly loving couple I saw was my grandparents. Of the others, my parents and neighbors, I saw very little affection but no abuse.

Nevertheless, I noticed that women and Black, Latino and Asian people had fewer rights, fewer educational opportunities and lower salaries than men in general and white men in particular. I also noticed that Black and Latino men had fewer rights, fewer educational opportunities and lower salaries in general than white women. It all seemed so unfair, so unjust, but nothing like what the feminists rant about today. Some of those things they complain about happened somewhere, I suppose, but not in my neighborhood. The violence and abuse I saw in my neighborhood involved gang fights—frustrated boys fighting each other in the street—and police brutality: officers of the law beating boys and men because they were not white or wealthy, as far as I could see.

On two occasions before my sixteenth birthday, police officers threatened to shoot me. I attended a prep school. I was not in a gang, but I did have long hair. Even with the police threats, I suppose I got off easy. A female police officer shot and killed a friend of mine from the neighborhood. He was about fifteen at the time, and he bled to death on the steps of his home, three houses down from where I lived. Police and gangs were local problems, but I saw no signs of violence in the neighborhood homes.

We heard no screaming or crashing sounds coming from houses at night. We saw no swollen, black eyes or bruises on anyone's mother. Only one wife in the neighborhood, the mother of one of my friends, left the home, but not because of abuse. Her husband never hit her. They seemed reasonably happy with each other and secure in their home and family. Then my friend's mother began to change. She needed to "find her identity," the new feminist slogan. The couple started to argue. She got a job. Then, she moved out. They found her about six months later in the cellar of an abandoned house, not too far from the neighborhood. Her dead body was surrounded by opened cans of dog and cat food. That incident was my first true, personal experience with the ideological aspect of feminism and its effects on middle-class women and families.

My father was faithful and never yelled at or hit my mother, and I saw very little infidelity or yelling among the neighbors. The exception was one of my other friends' mothers on the block who cheated on her husband and got pregnant by another man. They didn't divorce; the husband accepted the child. In fact, I only recall one divorce in the neighborhood during my entire childhood and adolescence.

My grandfather was a good man, and my grandmother let him know it with her own attentive kindness. He was faithful and religious (they both were), but not closed-minded. He never yelled at or hit my grandmother. What I remember most of my grandparents is their love and mutual support. My grandmother kept the house clean, the clothes washed, and she cooked. My grandfather "kept the house from falling down," as my grandmother put it. He did all of the plumbing, electrical work, painting, roofing, carpentry and lawn work, generally on Saturdays, and my grandmother appreciated it. In fact, they obviously appreciated and loved each other. They went to church together on Sunday mornings and shared a full quart of ice cream at the kitchen table on Saturday or Sunday afternoon while they talked or watched a ball game. I admired them both for their relationship.

Other couples seemed to put all of their energy into the house, the job and the kids, mostly the latter two. I saw nothing wrong with any of that. I also knew that I didn't want it. I thought it grossly unfair somehow that women seemed to have no other option but to be bored housewives, and men seemed to have no other option but to work themselves to death at dead-end jobs that were either very boring, very stressful—my father's case—or dangerous. I wanted something better. I wanted an interesting career. I wanted a wife who would be interesting because she also had an interesting career. I wanted to treat my future wife with a lot more attention and affection than I saw the neighborhood men treating their wives.

I believed in faithfulness in relationships, something that, for me, went without saying. I wanted a wife who would treat me better—with more attention and affection and support—than the neighborhood women treated their husbands, my parents included and my grandparents excepted. I wanted a wife like my grandmother (maybe a bit thinner and sexier). In all of that, I thought that women should have the same rights, opportunities and pay as men doing the same job. I looked for and longed for something like that in a future relationship. Feminism was just coming of age when I started college, so I got off to a bad start.

My first girlfriend cheated on me. I wasn't really in love, so I ended the relationship without much pain. My second girlfriend, who I met at the university dormitory and did love, cheated on me four times in two years—four times of which I am certain. Still, I did not follow the feminist lead and hate all women. I didn't think badly of any of them, except those two. I didn't talk badly of them or to them. I did not condemn an entire sex for the actions of a few members, as many but not all women do to men. However, I distanced myself from serious relationships for a few years and just dated around. I was no MHRA; I just didn't want to get burned again. I suppose the campus feminists thought I was one of those men who are afraid of commitment. After two bad experiences with commitments, I was scared. However, I still had hope. Men's issues were not yet on the agenda.

At the university, one nice, pretty, religious Campus Crusade for Christ member seemed to be interested in me. I found out later that she lied. She faked interest in me to try to recruit me and "save" me. I'm Catholic, so I didn't need saving or her. After dropping out of the university due to a lack of funds and interest, I lived and worked near a military base. I noticed some women referring to men as pigs (aside from the cop reference), and I thought they were talking about the relatively few men who did act like pigs in a way similar to the way men and women referred to the few bad women as bitches and gold-diggers. The eighties had begun; attitudes were changing, and opportunities were presenting themselves to women eager to take them up.

I met one beautiful, career Navy seaman (seaperson?) at my apartment complex. I offered her dinner. She said that she would accept on one condition: "That I can spend the night." I saw no ring and agreed. The next morning, when I expressed an interest in seeing her again, she informed me that she was married to a guy who lived in their hometown in the South—I don't remember which state. A couple of weeks later, I met a guy in a bar. The night was early, and women were scarce at that hour, so we struck up a conversation. Through cross-referencing details, I found out that he had also screwed that same career Navy woman. My hope slipped a bit.

I returned to college in the late eighties. Finishing my bachelor's degree in English went well enough. However, when I entered graduate school for my master's in English in 1990, things were changing rapidly. Suddenly, women did not need men; men were the enemy. "Every man is responsible for the problems of all women," is what a female graduate supervisor told me once. I pointed out the bigotry of her statement. The university provost was a woman. The university president was a woman. The English department head was a woman, and my tutoring center supervisor was a woman. In addition, I had seen men, mostly white men, homeless and begging on the street. My female office mate told me: "Things are going to be different when women are in charge." I wondered: different how and for whom? I married a feminist. I did love her, sort of, but also, I thought I could find nothing better. My life at that time was centered on university life. I knew few people outside of it.

I settled for the best I thought was available. At least she had long hair and did not talk badly about men all the time. She even defended me against some of the more rabid feminist attacks that I endured in creative writing classes. Nevertheless, social oppression is cumulative, including in a marriage. Once, I told my wife that something she did hurt me, and she said to me: "It's too bad because that's the way I want it." That told me what she thought of me, but I saw no way out. My feminist wife was in charge, and things were different for me: worse. I still saw feminist bigotry as something personal and universal in relationships, the worst of it limited to English departments on university campuses. Only later did I see it as something institutional, but for me, at that time, like for most men I knew, national borders were my borders. I was angry and depressed, but not yet afraid, not yet an MHRA. Political correctness was merely an annoyance. Feminist bigotry at work was not really dangerous as long as I kept my mouth shut and my eyes off the tits. Divorce offered relief. Alone, everything would be better, I thought.

One day, I went to the hospital of a major California healthcare provider for professors and other state workers. (I won't name it directly; I still sometimes worry about feminist reprisals and attacks.) I was there for something routine, the flu or something, and I paused before a large poster I saw in a corridor on the ground floor. The photo showed a black youth of about late high school age, wearing a track suit. The caption, in large letters, said: "If you really want to see how fast he can run, tell him you're pregnant."

I stood before that movie poster-sized image for a long time. I remember feeling numb. I suddenly knew how it must have felt to see Ku Klux Klan parades pass on some main street in Alabama or to be Jewish in late 1930s Berlin and see a huge Swastika banner hanging as a backdrop to a Nazi rally. I realized that United States feminist bigotry—the man hate—had become institutionalized, had gone mainstream. University sanctioned bigotry was one thing; government sanctioned bigotry was dangerous. The migraines started about then.

I tried an experiment to test the premise behind the poster at the unnamed hospital. Over the next week, I frequented the local mall after teaching. While strolling, I counted the number of young men I saw with children. I only included youths who looked to be about late high school age—as in the poster—and the child he cared for had to look to be his. In the first three days, I counted twenty-seven black boys who looked to be younger than twenty-one and had a child in tow that seemed to be their son or daughter. Maybe the poster is only sexist toward men and not also racist. I counted all the young men of any race I saw with children. Going into the second week, I got to over forty. When I started counting young couples who seemed no older than twenty and who were with children, the total passed fifty.

On the other side of the issue, you may refer to the article by Mike McCormick and Glenn Sacks, "New American Bar Association Article Points to Crisis in False paternity Judgments," (originally published in the Baltimore Sun 20 August 2006. Or read the article by Edward Steven Nunes "Those who commit Paternity Fraud are almost never punished" (updated 16 September 2012). Nunes says: "Paternity fraud is probably much higher than currently claimed. For an example, some laws restrict the use of paternity tests because of the presumption of paternity in marriage. In other instances, the law may restrict the use of paternity tests to preserve the family if the truth would become known. Also some laws may restrict the use of paternity tests to ensure that the father will continue to support the family that may not be of his making."

I recall two occasions when young women tried to get me to have sex with them because they wanted to get pregnant. One woman, my first girlfriend who cheated on me, said, "Let's do it now. I want to have a baby." In United States feminist society, however, sexist attitudes toward men, such as displayed by the hospital, triumph. As I came to understand that, my ties to the country loosened. My sense of freedom, safety and equality dwindled.

My sense of job security also suffered. I experienced several instances of subtle or direct prejudice against men–some against me directly–that foretold of worse things to come. For example, during my doctoral program in English, I did my teaching practicum for my ESL certificate in the university's English Language Institute. When I started my program, the director of the institute was a man, and the regular faculty was divided more or less equally between men and women. A female director took over. Within three semesters, the faculty was all female, except for one gay male teacher. I was not mistreated directly at that university; everyone was nice (as long as I kept my mouth shut). Most of the anti-male sexism I endured, in fact, came from my female students. In addition, a woman had recruited me for my doctoral program. Nevertheless, I saw where things were heading.

Just after I divorced the feminist, I took a vacation to Columbia on the advice of a female Spanish teacher, a friend of mine. The people, especially the women, were wonderful. The migraines abated for those three weeks. During that vacation another world of possibilities opened, triggered by a conversation I had with a young lady there. I met a nice girl at the hotel there in Bogotá. She was just about twenty years old but proved much wiser than some much older female English graduate students I had known in the United States. The young Colombian lady and I were having a discussion of relationships, and it seemed to us that chauvinism and feminism were two sides of the same coin: both arrogant, abusive and condescending toward the opposite sex.

When I told my new friend of the United States feminist attitudes toward equality and their claims that men were unnecessary, she said to me: “Of course men and women are equal, but we still need each other.” At that instant, I decided that someday soon, I would leave the United States.

That “someday” came ten years later. Upon returning from my Colombian vacation, I began to research my options more thoroughly and to study Spanish more intensely. I looked into everything from foreign exchange programs (teacher and student) to ESL certificates to foreign dating clubs to employment by USA companies in other countries. I saved money. I began to plan, rather leisurely, to leave the country for a Latin or Asian country where men were treated with more equality and dignity. I stopped dating United States women. I no longer went to clubs unless it was on a date with a foreign lady. I traveled more, learning about other cultures as well as teaching options in other countries. I continued writing fiction. I continued to teach. Ironically, two foreign women changed my leisurely moving plan to one of immediate action.

At the time, I was teaching college level literature and ESL. During an ESL conversation class, a second level female student from Cuba said during a class discussion on relationships: “If my boyfriend pisses me off, I am going to call the police.” Her diction was a bit higher than level II, and her words sounded rehearsed. I felt a sting of fear and thought: If foreign women are subject to this kind of influence, it may be time to get out of here. I was proven right a week or two later. I was living with who I thought was a nice lady. She was from Bolivia but had lived for a few years in the United States before we met. One Sunday evening, we started arguing about money. She wanted me to give her enough to take a week’s vacation back to her country. I was saving to move permanently.

The argument became heated but not physical. I never hit her, and she did not hit me. Finally, I got tired of it and left her in the dining room to go to the living room to watch TV. About fifteen minutes later, the doorbell rang. There were two police officers at my door asking if anyone had called the police. Fortunately, they were both men. Had one of them been a woman, I would probably have been arrested. As it happened, they talked to my soon-to-be-ex-girlfriend for a few minutes and left. My foreign, Latin girlfriend apologized, but I refused to touch her after that. I knew it was time to get the hell out of that country. I no longer trusted her. I no longer felt safe in my own home.

I talked to a couple of friends and foreign students. Mexico seemed my best option. I went to the Mexican consulate. A couple of weeks later, I flew to Mexico for a month to look for work and a place to live. The whole process took a couple more trips and several months, but I am here now, safe and happy. About a year and a half after moving to Mexico, I met a wonderful Latin lady who is now my wife. My life is better here.

In the United States, the bigotry toward men was constant and ubiquitous. In several states of the great Union, I heard derogatory remarks directed toward men by women more times in any given month than I had heard racist remarks against my skin color, religion or national origin in my whole life. To be honest, I have heard a couple of those man-hating remarks here in Mexico, but I never heard anything like that in Colombia, Perú, Costa Rica, Panamá, the Bahamas or China. The poison is drifting out from the borders, however.

I have heard that the situation for men is getting bad in Canada and England. That is a shame. At least for now, in Mexico, the people, including the women, are fair-minded. The women honestly care for their men and they support us. People here in Mexico discuss men's issues and women's issues. People here seem to be genuinely interested in equality and human rights. My Mexican wife values my opinion. She listens to me. Sexist comments from women here are very few and seem to result from United States influence, primarily through television. I have only heard a couple of man-bashing comments from Mexican women who were English teachers—not that big a surprise—and even they stopped doing that when they listened and understood the hurtful, bigoted nature of the anti-male remarks.

Overall, however, I am happy here in Mexico and very happily married. My wife is helping me to recover from the pain and emotional problems caused by feminist oppression in the United States. The migraines are gone. My blood pressure is normal again. No matter what critics might say about "copping out, running away, being unpatriotic or giving up," it seems that Chester Himes was right. The expatriate solution works. After thirty years of feminist oppression, it may be all that we men have left.

Fin

Introducing Kelly Jones and “Wise Misogyny”

February 18, 2013 | by Andy Thomas | Link | Original Link

Being a Men’s Rights Activist, I am familiar with the use of the word “misogyny” as a shaming tactic in order to shut-down debate and silence any man who may try to stand up for his own human worth. It came as a shocker to me, therefore, to find a female Youtuber apparently advocating misogyny as a virtue, or at least her own particular take on it—misogyny as the complete rejection of female psychology.

Kelly Jones is one of an increasing number of women rejecting female self-pitying and belly-aching. I’m not, yet, sure how I feel about her use of the word misogyny, but let me introduce her and you can make of it what you will…

Watch here.

What I do know is that Kelly is an incredibly intelligent woman with a breathtakingly unique perspective. She is quite clear that she regards women as less rational than men, and our current obsession with female-only perspectives and values as a threat to society’s long-term survival.

In the following video (in three parts), she discusses emotion, consciousness and misandry.

- Wise Misogyny: Part 1
- Wise Misogyny: Part 2
- Wise Misogyny: Part 3

And in part 2 of this video, she has the following to say about men…

> Men have permitted women to become morons. It is the lazy man who, himself, is desirous of being as stupid and irrational as he can get away without compromising his survival, who is responsible for misandry to a large part.
>
> It’s got to the point where women can mock these stupid men and give some actual substance, in their emotional way, to the culture of misandry which is why it is so popular today. Can one really blame women, who are so intellectually challenged, that they need men to make rules and laws for them to copy and regurgitate for misandry? I think not. Only if women were capable of genuine original thought and intellectual processes of their own would their misandrous propaganda be, ultimately, their own doing.
>
> Men have let themselves into the shit. If they weren’t chasing skirt, playing the fool, adoring women’s idiotic frivolities and girlish sexual displays, then women would have no hold over them. But lazy men are like dogs—they believe woman is the master.

On the subject of men, or at least most men, this is not a revelation to us in the MRM—we know she is dead right.

Sex and Consent Week at good old Monash Uni

February 18, 2013 | by Greg Canning | Link | Original Link

Down in Melbourne at the Monash University Student Association (MSA), Women's Department, they are anticipating an influx of 17-18 year old recent high school graduates entering university for the first time along with the return of those part ways through their studies.

The women's officers think it's "awesome" that:

> [A] lot of you are going to be having hot, filthy monkey sex.

So planning is underway for the "Sex and Consent Week" to be run in week 3 of first semester 2013.

A document has been drafted for publication in the student newspaper (Lot's Wife), titled "The Women's Officers' Guide to Picking Up," ostensibly a guide for newbies about how to "explore their sexualities," "navigate casual sex," "approach people they find attractive" and "getting the results there looking for."

"Hopefully it will help you not only get more sex, but BETTER sex!"

This treatise on "the Great Quest for Booty" is dominated by horrendous prose, with the occasional use of "gendered" language making the recommendations appear especially applicable to females wishing to pick up males for sex.

"For Example: if one guy rejects you, don't take it as "all guys are going to reject me (foreverrrrrrrrrrrr)"

Their advice is divided into three sections,

1. Start with you,
2. Be context savvy and
3. Use your words.

The "Start with you" section contains such gems as remember "you're trying to have sex with actual human beings" so some common decency and respect are required lest you come off looking "desperate, creepy or like a massive dirt bag."

Moving on it is explained that (presumably unlike female entitlement generally) you are "not entitled to sex" as "other people don't exist solely for your sexual gratification", and you must "be prepared to be rejected" on occasions, but don't take it personally and generalize it to yourself as being undesirable. A skilled psychotherapist would no doubt have a field day exploring daddy issues with the authors – hello Dr. Betty!

Nothing at all is mentioned about how one's dress and appearance impacts on the search for booty, strange given feminism's support for the slutwalk rallies.

The entire article is based on the scenario of "going out to get laid" (as distinct from going out to get wasted) and looking for and hooking up with "attractive people" which to me reads a lot like sexual objectification of potential partners, without any significant focus on making an emotional or spiritual connection, let alone a considered decision about accepting the risk's of indulging in casual sex.

The "Be Context Savvy" section recommends approaching "attractive" people in places where they "will feel safe being approached by you." Trains late at night (and presumably elevators) are out; pubs, clubs and parties surrounded by lots of witnesses are in.

But be careful they warn a "DRUNK" person cannot legally give consent. Good advice till it's qualified by:

> If your proposed sexy-times friend is slurring, stumbling, doesn't seem to be thinking clearly or is otherwise showing any signs of being pretty drunk, do not have sex with them.

If not "pretty drunk" it's apparently OK to go right ahead and hit on them.

They continue:

> It's always better to err on the side of caution than to take advantage of a vulnerable person and commit sexual assault. There are plenty of other people out there who are willing to sleep with you – even more so if you get a reputation for being a decent person rather than a predatory ass-hat.

It is thus acknowledged that females are capable of sexual assault even if they don't use the more accurate term rape.

Evidently a reputation for freely engaging in casual sex is seen as a desirable trait by the current generation of gender ideologues, especially if you are "decent" in how you go about it. I suspect these girl's and PUA's would get on wondrously together as the prime motive of both is simply getting laid for it own sake.

Whilst reading non-verbal cues is described as a very important step in the decision to approach the object of your sexual desire, it apparently plays no role once the contact has been made then you need to "close the deal" and "use your words." If you want to kiss, ask if you can kiss, then,

> If you want to escalate the sexiness further, keep using your words. You should always get verbal consent before engaging in a sexual act with a partner.

I was disappointed that the women's officers did not insist on enthusiastic consent because I would really have enjoyed seeing how they defined this in their hip vernacular. Perhaps they haven't covered enthusiastic consent in their womyn's studies courses yet?

Getting verbal consent will apparently avoid situations:

> [W]*here someone didn't really want to have sex with you, but you never had a conversation about it and they didn't want to speak up (for fear of ridicule, or possibly putting themselves in a dangerous situation – remember, they don't know you), so they ended up having sex they didn't really want to have or like.

Note well the end of that sentence "sex they didn't really want to have or like" as though they are one in the same thing. This is typical of the feminist blurring of the issue of consent to sex verses the issue of satisfaction with sex, where the outcome of an encounter is dissatisfaction, regret or remorse at having indulged in a consensual act in the first place.

As discussed in a previous article, Swedish feminists argue for such regret or remorse being adequate basis for bringing "sexual molestation" allegations against men even many years after an event by which time their feminist analysis and consciousness leads them to subsequently understand they were "sexually abused."

There are situations where verbal consent is considered to be "coerced" or "pleaded" for and given for all the wrong reasons. So even verbal consent does not guarantee against false allegations of sexual assault. Should we not also equip our young people with the confidence and agency give enthusiastic refusal, to say NO and depart from a situation in which they feel uncomfortable?

I would argue that putting yourself in the position of going home with or bringing home a stranger you have only just met, especially if you have both been drinking, is highly dangerous for both sexes and is best avoided. The Monash junior feminists however see this as the standard business model to be advocated to fresh young students.

If your target is too intoxicated by the time you get home with them, then you can be a decent person and cover them with a blanket and let them sleep it off. Heck, you can even ask again for sex in the morning but:

> But don't expect it, because nobody owes you sex for being a decent human being!

Warning to the male student: never ever take an intoxicated female to your residence to sleep it off, even with the best intent and in the absence of any impropriety on your part, a female trying to fill in an alcohol induced memory gap could well create a scenario in her mind from which a false allegation results.

Having studied the Women's Officers' Guide to Picking Up and thinking about what advice I might offer as a father and a physician there are some glaring and negligent omissions.

The risk of pregnancy and advice on how to avoid it for both sexes and the risk of sexually transmitted diseases and available preventive measures are but two examples of essential information for new students considering their potential involvement in casual sex.

For male students the risk of false allegations even where verbal consent has been given should be highlighted, along with the fact that consent, verbal or implied, can be withdrawn at any time during an encounter. The very real risk for male students in these and other areas more than justify the establishment of men's groups and centers at our universities. Failure to highlight such obvious risks could lead to disaster for new students who take the advice given at face value in an attempt to fit into their new environment.

The implication in this guide is that frequent casual sex ought to be seen as an integral part of students lives, without any consideration or discussion of context for individual students, associated risks or the intersection with their cultural, religious, moral and other beliefs. This guide demonstrates that the naive and non-inclusive approach we have come to expect from feminists still reigns in the movements trainees. It's all about them, even if it's all about getting laid.

Note: The initial draft of the Women's Officers Guide to Picking Up has been substantially edited to meet a length requirement for publication in the Monash Students Union, student newspaper Lot's Wife.

Repulsive rise of a malicious male movement

February 18, 2013 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

---

"There has been a growing internet movement of 'men's rights' activists, Pick up artists and others who call themselves 'the Manosphere.' While it's still small it has changed the way hateful ideologies function.

It's no secret that for the past few years there has been a dramatic assault over women's rights, re-opening questions that were thought to be settled for decades."

So says the Kos Moniker[1], appointed to monitor the antics of online malefactors.

Reporting on crime before Deadly Daily Kos Deadlines, conflating unrelating pastimes.

The pick-me-up artists, and men's rhyming martyrists, colluding to stir online trouble.
A war on the wymins
and the ironing of kittens, and queries formerly finally answered.

Do humans have rights?
Or just women upright
– and who has a free pass for raping?
Is VAWA fraud clear,
or more politics of fear,
and purposeful narrative shaping?

Tho we don't call ourselves a sphere, what's evident here is a hopeless muddle of issues.
Clearing up messes of sammich miners in blonde tresses, and mannish evo psych misuse.

But Moniker has a theory which he spells out un-clearly, reassuring that all will be well.

Tho techniques tend to work
– it's all underground lurch, so to propagate petulant hatred.
And he's got our number,
and blundering wonder, how will we continue our plan?

Pretending to help men, behind closed doors and then,
plotting to legalize rape.

Moniker is confusing human rights and girl wooing, in a story so screwy with spin.
Eat alfalfa male spouts in your shed, and shout opposition – to re-legalized rape for the win.

But moniker states simply, what men's movement implies of masculine damage invisible.

People don't care;
but the MRM's rise has them scared, and reacting with cartoonish rhetoric risible.

[1] http://www.dailykos.com/story/2013/01/21/1180744/-The-New-Misogyny

When Oscar met Thelma

February 19, 2013 | by Robert Sides | Link | Original Link

The Oscars (statuettes presented annually by the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences) will be awarded this coming Sunday night, February 24. Why not create our own awards, the Thelmas? It'll give us something fun to do… and perhaps evolve into a yearly ritual that grabs media attention.

The movie from which our statuette gets its name is, Thelma & Louise. It ended when the feminist "heroines" drove their car off a cliff:

Watch the empowerment

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Thelma_%26_Louise

Ergo, our award will go to films that have similarly driven equality and justice to destruction.

We can do this many ways.

For example, we can use actual nominees and comment on their actual plots:

Django Unchained

Another movie from the unhinged misandric mind of feminino Tarantino. What is it about his being raised by Mommy Dearest (dad kicked to the curb) that makes him include a castration scene in all his movies?

Or we can use the titles of actual nominees and create fake misandric plots:

Django Unchained

A brave film showing feminism at its finest. During Hurricane Katrina, Ms. Django temporarily frees her husband from his backyard doghouse, the better to make him pull a raft full of Wimmin's Studies crones to a DV shelter in New Orleans.

We can also create fake films with fake titles and fake misandric plots:

From Here to Paternity

Jethro is an unemployed IT worker sleeping on park benches in Femville. He's joined one night (well, more like 18 minutes) by "town pump" Lurleen. She subsequently gets preggers, shitz a spawn, and points her gold finger at J-man. Jethro then spends the rest of his life in a coalmine, paying for his baby-mama's condo and visits to Oprah-endorsed feminist shrinks.

We can use past winners, too.

Gone With The Wind

A blue-pill goober foolishly approaches the enormous backside of a feminist while carrying copies of the Magna Carta, US Constitution, and other documents proving men have rights. She comments on same by releasing gale-force flatulence in his face.

Or we can create faux films based on real events:

The Osbourne Conspiracy

A nitwit fembot bones a rockstar to steal, er, share his wealth and appetite for eating bat heads. She then carves out a career for herself as a sit-down comedienne, making audiences roll in aisles hearing stories of penile butchery.

The possibilities are endless.

I tried my hand at it a couple decades ago:

https://skydrive.live.com/redir?resid=5C34944B14836654!199&authkey=!AATF8no-ZHJz4AQ

https://skydrive.live.com/redir?resid=5C34944B14836654!200&authkey=!ACK4EBtslf__FTk

https://skydrive.live.com/redir?resid=5C34944B14836654!201&authkey=!AM0FPGys8_c52-k

https://skydrive.live.com/redir?resid=5C34944B14836654!202&authkey=!AL2LQZq7GIOEz38

A variation would be to emulate the Boston Globe's resident-evil fembot, Ellen Goodman, and mimic her annual "Equal Rites" award:

http://www.boston.com/bostonglobe/editorial_opinion/oped/articles/2011/08/26/equal_rites_awards/

I tried 21 years ago, too, calling mine the 'Busters:

https://skydrive.live.com/redir?resid=5C34944B14836654!204&authkey=!ALOOUFuHkb3LmBU

https://skydrive.live.com/redir?resid=5C34944B14836654!205&authkey=!AP9slN8GbYPr568

In any case, we should to do more than talk. Sure, not everyone is ready. Some need to educate themselves more. And others are constrained by monetary obligations and/or varying interests. I'm just suggesting a few ideas for those who are ready.

Stick it to 'em!

AVFM News and Activism: Kudi, the Mystical Rodent Activist

February 19, 2013 | by James Huff | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]

Tonight on AVFM News and Activism we have as our guest none other than Kudi, the Mystical Rodent Activist! Kudi has gained marked popularity in the Youtube circuit as a commentator on the Men's Rights Movement or Men's Human Rights Movement as AVFM currently calls it. It is important to note that Kudi is not an MRA, he is not even human, he is in fact a rodent. We are having him on the show in order to present a completely outside perspective of what is currently going on in the MRM during this season of controversy. Please join us!

The show starts tonight, the 19th, at 9:00 PM Eastern, 8:00 PM Central, which is 2:00 AM February 20th in London and 11:00 AM February 20th in Brisbane.

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

AVFM Radio – Voice of Europe

February 19, 2013 | by Lucy Brown | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]

As part of the idea that men's rights are not just a Western issue, I am really excited to announce the first attempt to have a radio show entirely dedicated to Europe.

The other programs, AVFM News and Activism and AVFM Radio are great programs but are taking place at impossible hours for Europe considering that there are at least 6 hours (usually 7 or 8) in time-zone differences. This is why I know the full name of the three Europeans (including me) that are listening the shows live. For most people staying up till 4 AM listening to radio shows is not an option.

The idea is to hold these radio shows once in two weeks on Fridays, at least in the beginning.

On the first show I, Lucian Vâlsan, will present the show alongside with my co-host Huffnagel Pista, a renowned advocate for the non-feminist position in Hungary. Huffnagel Pista's opinions and positions are featured throughout the Hungarian blogosphere, and often times in places such as index.hu – where his articles are very popular. In other words, when Huffnagel Pista says something, at least 1.5 million people are made aware of it and forced to think and see through the lies and the deceptions of the feminist propaganda.

It is an honor to have him as a co-host and you will get to hear from a man who has gone his own way for years and made a name for himself as a non-feminist in a country where feminists used to be praised when they mentioned the "Swedish model" He has done so with a motto that I really do appreciate: "No more Mr. Nice Guy!" – which is in line with our philosophy of Fucking Their Shit Up. Huffnagel Pista is a successful example of applying the First Principles both personally and in advocacy for men and boys.

The show will take place Friday, March 8, 2013 – which is a special date – a day that is commonly used by feminists from Europe to spew false statistics, lies, damn lies, more deception, and generally promote their misandry. We will be there to talk back to them.

The reason I am announcing this so early is because it's something entirely new – different time, different format, different hosts, different everything – and it would be great if the European readers would mark the day in the calendar.

Another reason for announcing this so early is because it would be great to get some suggestions from the readers, both for this show and for future shows.

The show will take place, as stated above, on March 8, at 7 PM GMT (London, Reykjavik and Lisbon time).

This means 8 PM CET (Madrid, Paris, Brussels, Rome, Oslo, Stockholm, Copenhagen, Budapest, Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw, Amsterdam, Bern, Bratislava, Prague, Belgrade, Tirana, Ljubljana, Zagreb, Sarajevo and Skopje time – sorry if I forgot one)

This means 9 PM EET (Helsinki, Tallinn, Riga, Vilnius, Kiev, Chisinau, Bucharest, Sofia, Athens, Ankara and Nicosia time)

This means 10 PM FEET (Minsk time)

And, last but not least, this means 11 PM Moscow time.

And for the listeners from North America who want to support this debut, this means 2 PM EST, 1 PM CST, 12 PM MST and 11 AM PST.

Oh, one more thing: The show will be 99.5% in English (we will introduce greetings in other languages).

[/box]

Time for a new Breast Test

February 19, 2013 | by Michael Reed | Link | Original Link

[dropcap]I[/dropcap] want to talk about women's breasts. While it is undeniable that they evolved for a role in child nurturing, the majority of the western world assigns an additional, sexual significance to women's breasts. Venturing into the debate, I declare that the empress is naked, and I suggest a simple solution to this conundrum.

Women's breasts can be a confusing subject for heterosexual men. Sometimes, the feminist assertion is that they are sexual, such as when wagging a finger of disapproval in the direction of a girly poster or a strip club. In fact, even looking at them from across a room is often at odds with the rules of polite behavior. On other occasions, the feminist position is that breasts are not sexual and that it is offensive to consider them so. Examples include the right to breast feed in public or the right to be topless in all situations where a man could be topless.

In such cases, women's breasts are merely mammary glands which women use to feed their young. Analyzing the situation, it becomes clear that breasts have two modes – we'll call them mode A and mode B – and the only consistent rule is that men are usually on the wrong side of the rules.

Take the recent scandal involving the long lens paparazzi photos of Kate Middleton and her husband, Prince William. A lot was made of the fact that she is topless in the photos. And yet, where are the cries, from feminists, that toplessness does not constitute nudity? It seems that, by consensus, the breasts were in mode A that occasion. In Britain we have a strange tradition called Page 3 in which photos of topless women appear in some of the tabloid papers, and almost every feminist objection to Page 3 makes reference to the fact that the models are baring their breasts. It seems that the boobies are in mode A for that one too.

Furthermore, breasts would be in mode A if a feminist mother or teacher found that a boy had a picture of a bare chested woman on his locker, on his bedroom wall or set as the backdrop on his computer. Breasts switch to mode B when feminists are marching, topless, for the right to "top-free equality". They're in mode B again when feminists are making it sound like men are attempting to prevent them from ever leaving the house by not allowing them to breastfeed wherever they like.

Imagine if men could control the mode of breasts. Think of how much money one could make by setting up a bar in which all of the female staff would, in common with the male members of staff, wear shorts and nothing else. "Really?", the proprietor, could exclaim. "To me, breasts are merely mammary glands that are used to feed young children. It had never occurred to me that anyone could view them as sexually arousing. Are you suggesting that this is why I am making a fortune?"

If you're in game development, why not shove some topless female characters into your game? Massive, jiggling boobies all-round, I say. I mean, it wouldn't be sexual, would it?

“They are objects of beauty that symbolize feminine power and fertility”, you could point out while clutching a feminist textbook. You could on go on: “Only silly schoolboys think of them as being connected with sex in some way”.

Something tells me that the people who run Facebook would be completely happy to allow women to post pictures that show their bare breasts in profile photos, but the people who are arguing in favor of it would start to complain if they did. You see, they are sacred parts of the body that must never be gazed upon. Everyone knows that.

Although most people immediately think of sex when they hear the word fetish, it is originally an economic term. Commodity fetishism is the principle that elevates the value of a lump of gold above that of a tin opener. That’s what sexual fetishes are: when something commonplace and not innately sexual such as a part of the body (or a whip or authority) is imbued with a significance that evokes a sexual response.

It is important that sexual fetishes are treated with respect. For example, if a liberal heard that a particular gay person got off on wearing leather while they are having sex, a solemn acknowledgement would be the order of the day. God help the hapless person who made a jokey reference to that practice.

Yet, breast fetishism, which is perhaps the most common sexual fetish in western culture, and has all the hallmarks of an autonomic sexual response, does not get respectful treatment. Whether brought about by social conditioning or biology, it doesn’t seem that men choose to be affected by it.

So, is the confusing feminist reaction to the mere sight of bare breasts simply a stick to hit men with? It smacks of a typical “have their cake and eat it” situation in that feminists want all of the benefits of having bodies that are sexualized, without accepting a few, minor inconveniences that result from that.

A cynical person might conclude that this is a tactic employed by feminists in order to make themselves the victims of an imagined hardship. Perhaps, it’s a battle of wills in which feminists attempt to claim that black is white and up is, in fact, down? Or, perhaps they are telling the truth and are genuinely ignorant of the sexually arousing effect of bare breasts on most men? I propose a test to find out.

Next time you are talking to a feminist, ask if you can see her breasts. Surely, you can argue, she could not object? For breasts, as many feminists argue, are not sexual. If it is a colleague that you are debating with, she may object that the breasts are sexual or non-sexual depending on the context. You can reply – with a look of astonishment – that the workplace is a context in which feminists have argued that women should be able to bare their breasts. Perhaps you could request a photo of a woman’s breasts over email or Facebook, if she is a feminist? After all, it wouldn’t be sexual.

How feminists win their arguments

February 20, 2013 | by Kristina Hansen | Link | Original Link

---

Ever tried to have an honest and open discussion with a feminist only to leave the discussion shaking your head in dazed confusion, wanting to rip your hair out by the roots in handfuls?

I feel your pain, and know the frustration that comes with trying to honestly debate an ideological adherent who claims to have all the answers and then twists the facts and evidence to suit their needs. I'm surprised I have any hair left and not completely bald after years of trying to have honest discussions with these types of people. This is why I tend to ignore most ideologues when they make their bullshit claims without any honest facts or evidence to back up them up. It's basically a lost cause and a waste of my time.

The fact is it's a parlor trick that these ideologues employ which is actually quite easily accomplished by dishonest individuals.

Let me show you how this trick is accomplished in three easy steps.

First, let's choose a cause and make a claim about it. In this example we'll use feminism and the claim that the patriarchy is responsible for the "oppression of women." Notice how you have two questionable assertions there.

Second, anyone who challenges the claim being made is automatically painted as being against reforming or helping with the problem(s) identified. In this example the cause is fighting oppression of women by patriarchy, so if you oppose the claim made on behalf of feminism that the patriarchy is responsible for the oppression of women, you are automatically against women and against ending oppression.

Third, those who challenged the claim that was made are now to be shunned and called names, like "a misogynist" in this case. Others who are part of the cause, feminism, are encouraged to dog-pile the one who had challenged the original claim(s) made in order to silence them. Reason and rationality are thus rendered useless or even painted as evil. This allows the one who made the claim feel justified, empowered, and eager to perform their parlor trick on others who challenge their claim.

As you can see, this is an easy parlor trick that anyone can easily accomplish, on more than one subject. It is completely dishonest and childish, but it works to the dishonest ideologue's advantage allowing them to feel victorious and validated.

It also removes any personal responsibility from the one making the claim in the sense of them having to do any heavy intellectual lifting or actual research to back up their claims: just paint anyone who questions the claims as evil. It allows one to be lazy and leads to complete circular reasoning.

You'll never win a discussion with these types of people, which is why it is best to dismiss them out of hand and refuse to even acknowledge their attempts to bait you into nothing more than a childish, dishonest argument that will only leave you wanting to rip out your hair by the follicles.

Bottom line, if you entertain them then all you are really doing is puffing up their egos and validating them. These ideologues hate to be ignored because they truthfully have no argument, and they know it. Without their little three step parlor trick they have nothing to fall back on except their empty claims that amount to no more than a pile of steaming horse shit.

So, how to win an argument every time? Simple. Establish a questionable premise, or multiple questionable premises at once, then paint everyone who questions the premise as being hateful and evil and “part of the problem.” See how easy that is, and how this often makes discussion with a feminist nearly impossible?

AVfM-R: Conscious Agency, do you have it?

February 21, 2013 | by AVfM Radio | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]

Hypo-agency, which we've talked about repeatedly at AVFM, is a cultivated public perception of the indirect use of social power through the combined social narrative elements of feminine helplessness, male power, and the relationship of male public identity to female approval.

Usually, hypo-agency has been discussed in the context of a traditional conservative framework for relationships between men and women, but it certainly exists outside that context as well, even when expressed in different language.

The converse phenomenon to feminine hypo agency is tonight's topic on AVfM radio, and is described by the phrase conscious agency.

And the question asked tonight by Girl Writes What, John the Other, The Wooly Bumblebee and James Huff; asked of everyone from MRAs, MHRA's and the most radical of radical feminists is this. Conscious agency, do you have it?

http://www.blogtalkradio.com/avoiceformen/2013/02/22/conscious-agency-do-you-have-it

Call in number for the show is 310 388 9709

Show time is 6PM Pacific, 8PM Mountain.

[/box]

Men should be afforded anonymity in rape trials

February 21, 2013 | by Peter Lloyd | Link | Original Link

Earlier this week, MailOnline reported on Maura McGowan – the deputy High Court judge who recommended that men should be granted pre-conviction anonymity in rape trials.

In a rare example of common sense within British law, the leading figure said that men should have their identity protected unless they are convicted.

Quite frankly, I agree.

Only yesterday, MailOnline reported on the case of Sophie Hooper – a 19 year-old woman who maliciously accused an innocent man of rape.

The mother-of-one, who was photographed smirking outside Southampton Crown Court after avoiding a jail sentence, only admitted to fabricating the allegations two months into the police investigation.

Sadly, cases like these are increasingly common.

In April last year, Kent's Kirsty Sowden – a former John Lewis shop assistant – was jailed for just 14 months after crying rape over a fully consensual encounter with a man she'd met online. He was arrested at his workplace in front of colleagues and detained in a cell, wasting 376 hours of police time and costing £14,000.

In May 2012, 20 year-old Hanna Byron was spared jail after falsely accusing her ex-boyfriend of rape in revenge for breaking up with her.

In August, Sheffield's Emma Saxon was jailed for making a second false rape allegation against her boyfriend, Martin Blood. He was held in police custody for 14 hours and subjected to an intrusive medical examination – all because he'd stood her up.

Meanwhile, Teesside's Joanne Buckley was jailed for three years in September after stabbing a man because he refused to have sex with her – then threatening to cry rape if he went to hospital for treatment.

These cases – and the many, many more like them – are exactly why men deserve protecting by the law as much as women.

Tellingly, my opinion is shared by the majority of Britain. In 2010, a poll conducted by MailOnline showed that 67 per cent of readers want pre-conviction anonymity for rape defendants, as opposed to 33 per cent who don't.

Originally, the law agreed. In 1976, the Labour government introduced rape trial anonymity for both the alleged victim and the accused. It operated this way until 1988, when guidelines were relaxed to help police investigations.

At the time, the media was far less powerful, less global, less permanent than it is today. There was no internet, no slew of gossip magazines, no mobile phones with cameras, no social networking sites.

Police techniques and technology were also less refined, so a lack of anonymity helped them.

Now, things are different. Dramatically so. And – once again – the law should change to reflect this.

Why? Because a not guilty verdict is no longer enough to repair the planet-sized crater of damage caused by weeks of daily headlines across the globe.

Perhaps more importantly, it's also a human right to be innocent until proven guilty.

Feminists like Julie Bindel disagree. She seems to believes that men deserve the stain of rape stigma, guilty or not, simply because they are male. In fact, she once said being falsely accused wasn't so bad. 'A fair number of celebrities have been accused of rape in the past and do not seem to have suffered longer term,' she incredulously wrote in The Guardian. 'To say that an accusation ruins lives is perhaps a sweeping generalisation.'

Perhaps she should speak to Peter Bacon. In 2009, he was cleared by a jury in just 40 minutes after being falsely accused of rape by a woman he met through a one-night stand. Although he was totally exonerated, the incident was so traumatic that he changed his name and left the country. His life was utterly destroyed.

Meanwhile, the accuser kept her anonymity – and, for all we know, went on to accuse others.

Where's the fairness in that?

Even UK charity Rape Crisis admit that almost 1 in 10 rape allegations are fake. This means that, out of every 10,000 cases that go to trial, around 800 men will be named and shamed in the media. All of them innocent sons, nephews, husbands and fathers.

To say this doesn't matter is not only patronising, but irresponsible and sinister. It also smacks of some darker gender agenda.

Ironically, women like Bindel are enraged at the concept of pre-conviction anonymity for men, yet so few of them are equally outraged by the false accusers who betray the sisterhood (and the real victims of rape) with their lies.

Yet these women are damaging rape justice more than pre-conviction anonymity ever could.

Even Labour peer Lord Corbett, who introduced the 1976 law providing mutual pre-conviction anonymity, argued this until his death in February 2012. He told the Evening Standard in 2002: 'Rape is a uniquely serious offence and acquittal is not enough to clear a man in the eyes of his family, community or workplace. He is left with this indelible stain on his reputation. The case for matching anonymity for the defendant is as strong now as ever.'

He was right in life and he's right in death.

Besides, the benefit of mutual anonymity would cut across both genders, helping victims as well as conserving fair trials. For a start, it would deter anyone from making false claims out of spite, seeing the accuracy of convictions rise – not fall.

Secondly, it could make testifying easier for those who've come forward. Identifying the accused often inadvertently identifies the victim, which adds immense pressure for them. It's all wrong.

The issue is made even more complex when our government officials muddy the waters of truth.

In 2010, an official enquiry report led by Baroness Stern – a prison reform campaigner – ordered Harriet Harman to stop misleading the public about rape statistics. For years she'd been pumping misinformation that only six per cent of rapists are brought to justice, when the reality is very different.

Actually, the rate is more like two in three – a figure which is much higher than comparable numbers for other violent crimes.

But Harman's creepy spin is symptomatic of another problem, because the way we criminalise rapists seems to have become political. Instead of securing robust, fair trials, people now want a system where woman have all the power – as if this would guarantee justice.

Fortunately, women like Maura McGowan see the reality.

Like the rest of us, she understands the abhorrence of rape and the importance of justice. Yet, even in discussing such an emotive issue, her response remains rational: name the convicted, not the constricted.

The overwhelming majority of men are not rapists – not by a long shot, and the law must remember this.

Perhaps Harriet and Julie should too.

This article originally appeared in MailOnline, and is reposted here with permission of the author.

The dynamics of male fear

February 21, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Note: Also available in Portuguese.

Recently Andy Man posted a brief introduction and links to a series of Videos produced by Kelly Jones. This articulate and obviously intelligent woman had a great deal to say about the nature of both men and women, much of which I agreed with.

What was of particular interest to me, however, was her proposed explanation for why some men, whom she referred to as manginas, seem hopelessly unable to resist indulging and enabling neoteny in women, or, in different wording, why these men (indeed all men by her later implications) assume the burden of hyperagency in their relationships with women, effectively insisting that those women lead lives of incompetence and dependence.

She goes on to say that her explanation also accounted for the phenomenon of misandry. The answer, according to Jones, is laziness:

> Men have permitted women to become morons. It is the lazy man who, himself, is desirous of being as stupid and irrational as he can get away without compromising his survival, who is responsible for misandry to a large part.

Now, from the outset I found this answer to be lacking, both in terms of explaining men's predisposition to tolerate childlike women, and as a genesis for misandry.

I will get to more of that before concluding, but I think it is important to say that simply shooting holes in Jones's theory is not the objective of this writing. I actually found much of her presentation compelling. Even better, she has eloquently tapped in to questions that I would like to reframe, as I think they are crucial to the common discourse here.

Why do so many men tolerate and indeed seem to insist on enabling irrational, materialistic, self-absorbed and grossly immature behavior from women?

Why do so many men go as far as to idealize this kind of woman, catering to every capricious whim and seemingly having no limit of what they will endure or surrender in their efforts to please her?

And why, when queried, will these men, most men, demonstrate staggering levels of denial, fumble for words or explanations, or as a last resort direct outrage at anyone asking the questions?

These, I believe, are the questions of the century for modern men. And this venue is one of the few places that they have a chance of ultimately finding substantive answers.

My answer for this is, like Jones's, quite simple. I also think it is a lot more accurate.

Fear. More precisely, fear of what most men's unconscious minds interpret as a painful, death-like black void where they reside without validation of their worth in a woman's eyes.

I should acknowledge at this point that I do not offer these observations as empirical. I have no sources, nor do I doubt that empirical support for these ideas is scant or non-existent. They are submitted solely for the judgment of your rational mind and nothing more.

It's a complicated matter, and one that cannot be explained without an understanding of men's collective, historical experience, their education, and their personal family experiences.

Consider that until the industrial revolution families were most often run like business concerns involving all family members. Whether they were farmers, craftsmen or artisans, most men worked in immediate proximity to the home. They were intimately and continuously involved in their lives of their children. Sons, the only children relevant to this discussion, were often assumed to follow in their father's footsteps after being mentored in his skills during their upbringing.

The connection to the father, even when fraught with all the expected conflicts in the struggle for individuation, was the son's primary source of approval and identity. It was in the father's eyes, and ultimately in his own works, that he found his worth, or his failure, as a man.

The marital relationship in the home was much different than in modern times. Unless the family was affluent, and few were, women worked and toiled alongside their husbands and children. They were integral components to the family's success. It is not difficult for me to imagine that the realm of "emotional needs" for women was much less of a priority then than it is now.

And then men invented factories.

While in retrospect it is likely a misnomer to call it an industrial "revolution," as it occurred over such a broad timeframe, there was nonetheless a great deal of social change associated with the development of large scale, centralized manufacturing processes. The number of residents in American cities doubled in forty years, from 15 million to 30 million, between 1860 and 1900. The growth went hand in hand with the proliferation of factories.

This had a significant impact on the family. The first, monumental change in the lives of men was that it removed the father from the home.

Fathers, who once headed family concerns, now left their families to work in factories, whether on the manufacturing or business management end. The children, of course, remained at home with the mother.

Now, I am certain at this statement could have the effect of prompting a feminist to register with the site just so they can point out that women worked in factories, too. And yes, they did, but not many. Most, even women of that time, were not suited for the physically arduous nature of the work, and most families needed someone at home to care for children. It made sense that the person with the greatest capacity for labor, and who did not need to nurse infants, took on that responsibility.

As history clearly illustrates, that is what happened.

Then something else happened. As men labored to take care of their families, they began to export the products of technological advances back to the home. Food in cities was not grown by the consumers. It was bought and prepared. The milk bottle was developed and patented in 1877, and home deliveries of bottled milk began in 1878.

What this meant was that the more men worked, the less women had to. For the first time in western history women, unlike men, began to have options about what to do with their time. Some chose to work, many others chose to settle in to a new role, as a housewife.

Why is this important to this discussion? Because this is the time in history that women began to experience a more idle time than ever before. That idle time, I think, was the beginning of trouble for men, and for all of us.

With the father removed to produce income, and with women having time to dwell on emotional "needs" instead of work, children, particularly young boys, began being placed in the role of surrogate husband in the father's continual absence. It is a form of emotional incest that was conducted with the collusion of the father, who often made their sons, "The man of the house while I am away."

This effectively left boys alone with quietly disgruntled, idle mothers who used their sons to buffer the emotional emptiness that arose from a life with too many options and too little to actually do.

Thus the father's role changed significantly. He was demoted from family leader to mother's enforcer and financier. I am sure it was not too long after the masses of people migrated to cities that the term, "Wait till your father gets home," became a common threat to secure approved conduct from children, particularly young boys.

What developed was the forerunner of the broken family; father, breadwinner and as-needed authoritarian, participating in but a fraction of family life as compared to his predecessors; mother, beneficiary, dependent, isolated and filling the void in her life with emotional needs that the father could not fulfill (because no one can). Mothers turned to their children and began reversing the role of caretaker, emotionally speaking.

It is a model still common today, even in post-divorce families.

And what change did this effect on the psyche of boys? For one they went from measuring themselves by pleasing their fathers with demonstration of competence in a skill or trade, to measuring themselves by pleasing mother in emotional terms.

It is just that simple.

And it is just that profound.

In a society that has coined the phrase, "If momma ain't happy, nobody's happy," this has powerful implications on the emotional and psychological development of young men.

When the measure of your worth, as inculcated every day of your life, is in meeting the bottomless emotional needs of a still childlike adult, the absence of approval from that adult becomes a form of death.

Consider the norm for how we perceive disrespect of or even simply displeasing a mother in this culture. Now consider several generations of mothers who exploit that at every turn, even as it twists the minds of their sons into conforming "maternalists."

Couple that with the fact that even when young boys get a temporary escape from the home in the form of school, that they enter a system where compliance with female wishes is essential to any measure of success. Consider what happens when failure to please the women at school results in a damning note sent from the teacher.

Well, wait till your father gets home.

Now couple all this with the millions of years of human male instinct to be accepted by women for reproduction, and the mixed evolutionary and socialized expectation for men to protect, provide and sacrifice for women.

Is it any real stretch of the imagination that in 2013 we now have a population of men that literally cannot conceive of their own existence without the mirroring of their fitness in the eyes of a woman?

Would that not offer one plausible explanation of why the absolute insanity of gender feminism has flourished and found nearly universal support from men? And they have supported it, either overtly by laying themselves prostrate before the altar of feminism (women), or by a toxically enabling silence born of the fact that they are too afraid to speak up.

After I placed my comment to Jones, she responded, and appeared to infer from my initial statement about fear that perhaps the problem was in the age old 'fragile male ego.'

> You say, Paul, that manginas work for women out of fear of the identity void from being rejected by women. That is, you say these men work like slaves not out of laziness (of course) but from fear of not being praised by women. Then, are their egos so fragile that they need the psychological blow-job of being told they are good and useful slaves?

I have to reject this premise as well.

First, and to quickly clear up a detail, I did not use the word "mangina," nor do I ever use it in my writing these days. It is not that I don't think some men need to be shamed, but not in the context of this discussion. I am not talking about men who are consciously obsequious, but of average men, many of whom tolerate the most egregious conduct and parasitic bonding from women, but are likely never fully conscious of the degradation.

This is not a matter of some innate, characterologial deficiency in the male ego. Intact egos are a product of healthy emotional and psychological development. Most men, since the industrial revolution, have had healthy ego development sabotaged from birth. There was never really a chance for them to defend against the dependence on women's approval. Indeed, society as a whole has coalesced around the idea of making them as servile as possible.

I don't pretend to have a solution for that, either. Thankfully, the red pill is now available for the minority of men who can digest it. And as more men do that then more will follow. It could take a hundred years or more to reverse in this fashion.

But there is, with all respect to Ms. Jones, no answers to be found for the average man in misandric clichés. Laziness, weak ego, and the rest are just canards covering a more basic reality: men pathologically fear women's rejection because we raise them pathologically to be dependent on women's approval.

This is not created by men, or by women in a vacuum. It is a cultural product of a society whose technological advances outpaced the human ability to adapt and adjust functionally.

If there is to be answers, and I think there eventually will, they will be found in a nuanced understanding of the human condition that runs deeper than labeling all dysfunctional behavior as a flaw in character.

If there were ever a path to misandry, that is it.

Beckel caught in the FAT Trap

February 22, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

I don't like Bob Beckel. In fact, my dislike of Beckel is so strong that it borders on skin crawling disgust. He is a token liberal, one of the slimier, disingenuous ones that Fox News props up to make the equally slimy case that they are "fair and balanced," which I suppose makes their claim strangely credible.

Now imagine how I feel about being in a position where I need to defend him. It's not good, I'll tell you, but I am going to don a biohazard suit and do it anyway. Beckel is under a career damaging threat from one of the few forces that could ever hope to exceed his sliminess.

On a recent edition of Fox New's program "The Five," they had a discussion about gun control. On college campuses, it was asserted by some, coeds should be strapped to the gills so they can blow rapists away. Beckel, apparently caught up in his gun control fervor for a moment, blurted out a question that was actually quite cogent, but he made the incredibly stupid mistake to follow his partisan lock-stepping into territory owned by those whose political clout trumps gun control and every other significant issue that our nation pretends to address.

He asked,

> When's the last time you heard of a rape on campus?

Of course the tradcons at the table immediately lost their fucking minds. The shocks and awes and oh my fucking gods abounded in an instant.

"What are you talking about? It's rampant," co-host Eric Bolling retorted, with his spine stiff, as though he were having a sudden attack of dignity. Dana Perino immediately followed, as though it were already on the teleprompter, "In particular, date rape on campus."

Beckel, still apparently dazed by his own honesty, continued with fatal question number two:

> That's one thing, date rape, but you're going to take out your gun and shoot your date?

Of course the answer was YES. That was the predictable response from Kimberly Guilfoyle, whose journalistic accomplishment is being one of the few females without bleached hair to be employed by Fox News. Said Guilfoyle:

> If your date is a rapist, you shoot them.

Well, here, watch for yourself.

Love the way she punctuated a call for killing with a smug grin.

Now, the temptation here is to sidetrack, and wonder aloud if Kimberly Guilfoyle has the first fucking clue about what constitutes a rapist on a modern college campus. But sidetracking only helps when the people involved give a damn about things like actually having to rape someone to be considered a rapist.

[image]
You kill, girl!
Better to keep this about Beckel, and the histrionic reactions that are sweeping through the media right now, despite his groveling mea culpas, over one of the rare times the truth ever escaped his lips.

Michelle Malkin called him a "cretinous misogynist."

"Vomit," she tweeted.

On the other side of the fence, the libtards at Huffpo are crowing in perfect harmony with conservative women-firsters in their agonizingly over the top reaction to Beckel asking an intelligent question about the frequency of campus rape.

Along with most other media outlets, they have ensured that everyone knows about the Department of Justice assertion that one in four women of college age will be the victim of rape or attempted rape before they move on to an arts degree and a government job.

And, along with most other media outlets, they are neglecting to tell you that those numbers include a fuck-ton of women who gobbled cock as a post drinking binge snack and then decided later it was a bad idea, or, rape, in the modern college vernacular.

Huffpo even went further, giving us anecdote after anecdote proving beyond challenge that rape on college campuses is more common than empty beer bottles in a frat house. They provided six or seven stories about allegations of rape that happened on campuses within the last few weeks, one of which actually involved arrests. Not a single story of a conviction was cited.

That is out of 19.7 million college students in the US, 62% of which are female.

I think it is safe to say that once you control for insanely loose definitions of rape and false accusations that the 25% assertion should be raising questions from smarter people than Bob Beckel.

Well, unless they mean 25% percent of women enrolled in STEM courses.

I expect to hear a lot more about this, and I think Beckel's job, apologies or no, could actually be on the line for this one. He has managed to propel himself into a void where he will find few if any allies. He did this by making an inquiry truthful enough to bring the Feminists and Traditionalists (FATS) together to bring him down. Fembots will do it because rape is worse than the Black Plague, and anyone who says otherwise is a rape supporting scumbag. Traditionalists will do it because Rape is the worse than gay marriage, and anyone who says otherwise is a rape supporting scumbag.

It is the FAT TRAP, and Beckel has his fat ass caught in it big time.

I guess I am not doing much of a job defending him. I have to admit that my heart is not in it. But I still think it needs to be said that he is getting crucified for asking a legitimate question; a question which is just too much for anyone around him to pause and answer with any intelligence. They are too busy picking up pitchforks and lighting torches.

A thousand things have come out of this moron’s mouth that should warrant his being ostracized from the company of adults. Unfortunately for him, he was not in the company of adults to begin with.

Ancient mystical rodent activist training

February 22, 2013 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

A demonstration by the ancient mystical rodent activist on how to anticipate the shaming tactics and use their leverage against your opponents.

All hail Shihan Kudi!

You will find more of his ancient wisdom on Stone's channel.

A new/old message for poor, white, hetero males

February 23, 2013 | by Kalan Chinuck | Link | Original Link

Hurry up and fucking kill yourselves already.

Mike Buchanan of Justice for Men and Boys and the Anti-Feminism League graciously provided the link to a new study on male suicide produced by the UK charity and support group Samaritans.

Mike pointed out in an email: "It's about damned time society cared more about the male suicide rate."

The report, entitled Men, Suicide and Society, provides a much-needed statistical perspective of this issue, but of equal or perhaps greater interest are the theoretical assumptions underlying the report, as well as its unstated conclusions.

As I will show in due course, the report is at heart a collective of rationales for doing nothing at all to help the low-income, middle-aged, white, heterosexual males who are most likely of all population segments to kill themselves. The message is reasonably clear: "fuck you, white hetero suicide guys. Hurry up and fucking kill yourselves already."

One of the authorities cited in the Samaritans study, Sandy Ruxton, is the lead author of Man Made: Men, Masculinities and Equality in Public Policy, a report produced by the Coalition for Men and Boys.

The CFMB is an organization whose stated goals include providing 'a national lead in encouraging support and responsibility amongst men and boys for measures to tackle discrimination and gender-based violence.' It ranks the White Ribbon Campaign among its supporters.

The title phrase 'Man Made' is telling – the source of the problems that necessitated the work is identified clearly, given place of honor. But just in case the reader doesn't immediately catch on, the press release celebrating the report's production states the case a little more cogently:

> Public policy needs to respond urgently to the problems that men and boys create and the problems that they experience, according to a new report by the Coalition on Men and Boys. This must take place alongside efforts to improve the position and status of women.

The essential meanings of this communique are both explicitly stated and immediately inferable: men and boys by virtue of gender create the problems. Men and boys experience problems as a result. Women do not create problems and are victims with an undeserved low position and status in society.

Ruxton is also lead author/researcher of a report commissioned by the EU entitled The Involvement of Men in Gender Equality Initiatives in the European Union.

Among other tidbits, the reader of this work learns that the goal of men's participation in gender equality will be achieved through emphasizing its benefits to men, such as the joys of fatherhood and no longer being 'the helpless man at the stove after coming home from work, like their fathers and grandfathers. They gain power in education and household affairs.'

This falsehood is, of course, directly at odds with the real life experience of men, as the declining employment of men in teaching, and the millions of fathers who are refused a relationship with their children would tend to demonstrate.

The report further advises that 'actors were mostly excluded if they clearly subscribed to a 'men's rights'/'fathers' rights' approach.' In other words, those who thought men and fathers should have rights were deliberately excluded from participation in the study. Proponents of women's rights were neither questioned nor excluded.

Mr. Ruxton's bio shows a long-term and no doubt lucrative career involvement with various equality and rights organizations, many of them sponsored by UK and EU government organizations. His intellectual and economic bread and butter is the feminist narrative. There are many more like him.

Returning to the Samaritan's suicide report, a citation accredited to Ruxton states that:

> In research, policy and practice to address suicide in this group of men, it is important to remember that, while they may be marginalized in power structures by social position – for example, relative to middle-class men (and sometimes women), they may also be implicated in the subordination of other groups, of women and men, including BME or LGBT groups. The needs of disadvantaged men in their mid-years must be addressed, but in ways which benefit society as a whole.

Disenfranchised, white, middle-aged men in the lowest economic bracket may be implicated in the subordination of LGBT groups? Ah yes, they have nothing better to do (outside of killing themselves) so they seek to oppress lesbians and the victim crowd – haven't you noticed all the anti-LGBT ads they've been funding? And hey, we've all seen the hordes of mentally ill beer-bellied suicidal white heteros running amok, engaged in anti-whoever pogroms that would have made the Nazis proud. (Actually I haven't, but then I don't get out much.)

Ruxton also advises that the needs of men cannot be addressed unless doing so 'benefits society as a whole.' The primary benefit society currently derives from males is their utility – servants to the economic demands of women, bureaucrats and corporations, and their disposability – death and injury suffered at war and at work while serving those same masters.

What possible motivation then can society find to address real solutions for these men? What benefit to society as a whole can be extracted from dirt-poor, disenfranchised middle-aged men who have already noticed (consciously or not) the lack of validation provided them as human beings worthy of attention in their own right? No answer is provided, conspicuously.

Let's look a little further into the Samaritans 'research':

> 'Masculinity' and 'femininity' are sociological concepts which can be defined as the collection of roles, behaviours, activities, expressions and practices that are broadly associated with being male or female, respectively. In this view, men's and women's identity, behavior and the expectations placed on them are not purely the result of their biological sex, but reflect socially constructed ideas.

If that sounds familiar, well, you know the saying. The report is invoking classic feminist theology – the 'gender is a social construct' meme. It is well known who constructed this gender idea, of course – why, it was those same nasty old hetero white guys, for their own benefit at the expense of society's true victims.

There are further problems with this report, for example we find a paragraph titled 'constricted by masculinity.' For those who believe masculinity provides privileges rather than constrictions, a certain amount of doublethink is required.

And then there's 'masculinity as driver of suicidal behavior.' This includes stereotyped fembot descriptions of what masculinity is (very few men actually fit them or would agree with them), as well as the implicit assumption that being male is enough to drive a man to suicide. Oh the horror! I was born male, I had better kill my sorry ass.

To sum up the study's conclusions:

1) There is no benefit to society from doing anything to help suicidal men.

2) Men have created the very social environment which is driving them to suicide.

3) Men are oppressors of the true victims.

4) Masculinity itself is the problem.

5) Feminism is the solution.

The Samaritans report then, while highlighting some important details for men, is in essence a tedious repetition of classic specious feminist bullshit; a pretense at compassion by a crowd of hand-wringing, taxpayer-funded, neo-liberal ideologues raking in fat consulting fees while quietly doing the dirty work of their feminist comrades.

***

These three reports provide a look at the discreet but ugly voice of power in modern sexism: dreary and dishonest dissertations of feminist gender supremacy and the will of its supporters to impose it on society without regard for reality or principle. It is apparent that people such as these inform and indeed dominate the social policy debate.

In addition, these intellectual elites belong to the school which assumes that government can and should solve every problem, by law (translation: force) if necessary, based on their own ideological presumptions, biases and definitions. No doubt there are actually many among their ranks who mean well; the same could be said for every institutionalized ideology that has ever existed, including the most murderous.

As for the future of gender studies research, Asia is the new frontier. Consider this 2011 call for papers from the National University of Singapore:

"Since the 1980s, scholars such as Robert Connell and Jeff Hearn have argued for pro-feminist gender studies which investigates hierarchies within femininities and masculinities, and considers the implications of narrowly defined gender roles and patriarchal structures for both women and men."

Although not ostensibly demanded, the anticipated theoretical framework for further research and funding is explicitly spelled out. None of the above bodes well for the future of men.

♦♦♦

Sources:

Samaritans Research Report: Men, Suicide and Society 2012

Coalition for Boys and Men Study: Man Made: Men, Masculinities and Equality in Public Policy 2009

Coalition for Boys and Men: Press Release 2009

European Institute for Gender Equality Study Report:

The Involvement of Men in Gender Equality Initiatives in the European Union 2012

National University of Singapore Call for Research Proposals 2011

Why equal reproductive rights benefit everyone

February 23, 2013 | by Kristina Hansen | Link | Original Link

---

As a woman who advocates for men's rights I am often asked why I choose to fight for a cause that "only benefits men". To this I always give the same response: "when men have equal rights, everyone in society benefits". This response tends to draw looks of confusion and baffled expressions.

People have a hard time understanding that equality not only benefits those seeking to be equal, but the whole of society as well.

I know there are many areas of inequality when we are discussing men and their rights, but for this article I would like to focus on two areas of inequality concerning men that I feel are most important at this point and time and how, if these areas were made equal to the rights that women currently have, society would benefit from them.

The two areas I would like to discuss are the abdication of parental rights, also known as legal paternal surrender, and child support.

Currently women are the only ones who are legally permitted to decide whether or not they wish to become a parent. They have many options at their disposal such as legal abortion, adoption, and even legal abandonment should they become pregnant and decide that they do not wish to become a mother. Men however do not have any legal rights when it comes to becoming a father. They are forced to go along with the woman's decision no matter what. She is the one who decides his fate. And once her decision is made to have the child, the man is forced to provide for that child, even if he never wanted it, and even if he actively took measures to prevent the pregnancy.

But what if men were allowed to opt out of being a father? What if men were allowed to abdicate their parental rights via legal paternal surrender?

If legal paternal surrender were allowed many women would have to stop and think long and hard about how they were going to raise their child on their own with no financial support from a father. If he abdicates his parental responsibility he would then not be forced to pay out child support for a child he never wanted. She would have to be the sole provider for that child. She could no longer rely on someone else's financial assistance. She would have to own her decision and be 100% sure that she is prepared to raise a child on her own.

This also benefits the child immensely. Children would no longer be used as pawns in an attempt at financial gain by mothers. Women would have to want to and be able to be mothers. Bottom line – they could no longer have children for purely financial gain.

This would likely result in more mothers who would be more dedicated to their children, more likely to raise them in a loving environment, and be more committed to providing them with the best life possible. Children would be less likely to be neglected or abused by their mothers which would in turn allow them to grow up with a healthy self-esteem, solid work ethic, and less chance of falling into poverty or crime.

When you enable women to have children for financial gain in the form of child support, for control over a man, or any misguided reason other than the real desire to be a self-sufficient mother, no one benefits, least of all the children who are seen as objects instead of individuals with rights and needs of their own.

Allowing men to abdicate their parental responsibilities, via legal paternal surrender, would put an end to this cycle of abuse. And it is abuse. Women abuse the system, the men, and their children by being allowed to game the system without being challenged.

The current system removes personal responsibility and accountability from women which allows them to remain dependent on others rather than themselves to provide for their children.

This lack of responsibility and accountability is insulting to all women, and enables women to basically remain toddlers throughout their lives, and we all know that toddlers cannot care for children properly.

Redemption, from an email

February 24, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Been a rough few weeks around here. It almost started to get me down. Then I opened my email and was reminded of two things. One, there are people having a lot worse time than me. Two, this place makes a difference whether we have pissing matches or not. This man gave me permission to post his story here. I hope it makes you feel as good as it did me. Many of you deserve the credit. PE

First off I would like to thank all of those at A Voice for Men for their work regarding the many issues dealing with men and boys in our society. Now I would like to give a brief description of myself and tell my story as to why this site and the work the people involved in it do is so important.

I am 29 years old. I work for an environmental demolition company. I stand 6′ 2″ and weigh 235lbs. I have a high school diploma but no postsecondary education. I love my family, my friends and I care a lot about those which I do not know. I enjoy reading, watching movies, mountain biking, camping and am what most would consider to be a bit of a nerd.

My story starts almost 10 years ago, right before my 20th birthday. I had been dumped by my girlfriend whom I was with for the past year. Our relationship was pretty much a train wreck from the start. We were both guilty of doing and saying things that should not have been done or said. I wanted to work things out but she decided that we were over.

Jump ahead a couple weeks and I'm actually enjoying my life. Things seem to be going good. I made some new friends, work was going great and for the most part I was happy. I did not have a car at the time so my co-worker/friend was giving me a ride home at the end of the day. I liked her a lot and was hoping that maybe eventually we could be more than friends.

We were sitting in her car when I saw my ex enter the apartment building I was living in at the time. I really had no desire to deal with this at that time so I ended up spending the night at my friend's house, although I did not sleep at all since she had somehow gotten into my apartment and continued to call me over and over threatening to destroy all my things and go to some of my other friends house and beat them up unless I came home.

Needless to say my first chance at a good impression on my co-worker didn't go too well. I had to work the next day so I got a ride back to my place expecting the worst. Luckily nothing had been broken or was missing and I talked to the landlord about getting the locks changed as I assumed she still had a key and that is how she had gotten in.

Thinking that I had dodged a bullet and things would be taken care of I started to get ready for work. After I got out of the shower I heard my apartment door open and I knew that she was there. I confronted her and she refused to leave. She had been drinking a lot.

Not wanting to be late for work, I went back into the bathroom to shave and try to think of what to do with her since she wouldn't get out. When I was done shaving I saw her more or less drinking a bottle of Tylenol extra strength.

I was not sure how many she had taken but it had to be a lot. She collapsed for a bit and threw up. I didn't know what to do. For all the bad times in our past it still hurt to see her like this. I took her to the hospital where they ran a bunch of tests to check for possible stomach/liver damage. After that they told her she would need to be admitted to the psychiatric ward since she was a danger to herself. I convinced her to go peacefully, which in turn led to a lot of people hating me and blaming me for her being admitted — including myself.

During the time she was in the hospital I would visit her, bring her books, money and so on. I was pretty well the only one that did visit her although no one forgot to point their finger at me as the reason she was there in the first place.

Also, during this time I started a relationship with my co-worker from before. This was not well received by many people as they thought it was wrong of me to start dating when my ex was in the hospital, even though we were broken up well before any of that happened and she was the one that wanted it to end.

Despite the negative reactions of so many people I really liked this girl and was happy to be with her. Fast forward a bit — my ex was checked out of the hospital.

I was in the shower when I heard a knock on my door. I got out, answered it and guess who it was, my ex. She said she was over the whole situation and wanted to be friends. I was happy to hear she was doing well and so I invited her in. We sat and talked then her mood changed and she said she actually came over for sex. I told her how I was in a relationship and that she would have to leave, which of course she did not. She began to push herself on me, touching, kissing and so on.

I pushed her away several times and told her to get out. At this point I had no idea what to do, physically I could have restrained her or hit her to try and stop her advances but my entire life I had been told "no matter what a man should never hurt a woman". So any form of physical action on my part was out of the question. I considered calling the police to see if they would come to remove her but realized that likely I would end up arrested since all she would have to do is say I abused her at some point in some way. This was a lie she had told others in the past but for whatever reason I forgave her for it. So police were out of the question in my mind.

This continued for some time, I don't know how long to be exact but it felt like forever to me. Eventually it hit me that there was nothing I could do. So I sat down on my couch and she got on top and did her thing. This was the first time I had really cried since I don't know when. She got dressed and left and I showered.

I don't know how many times that day and in the next couple days to come. I hated myself for being so weak. I talked to a friend about it and she was angry with me for cheating on my current girlfriend, which made me feel worse. I talked to a family member about what had happened and I got "I can't believe you would do that!"

So I called my girlfriend to tell her how I was a horrible human being that had cheated on her when she was at university. We broke up. I began to drink a lot. I hated myself for cheating since I had always hated cheaters and now I was one in everyone's opinion — and mine as well. I hid my pain in public since it seemed I would just be blamed and ridiculed for that day anyway so I tried to just forget it had ever happened and carry on with my life.

That plan did not go well as my drinking continued to get worse. Eventually after spending two days lying on my floor crying I decided it was time I got some help. I went to a counselor and explained what was going on, how I felt and the details of that day. She too blamed me, and told me that I needed to fix my issues if I ever wanted to be in a relationship again and needed to write down all the things I could provide to a relationship and all that I should provide and work to making the lists match.

And I tried this for years. I tried to be this perfect boyfriend who listened and cooked and worked hard and made good money and took care of myself physically. I dressed nice, took my girlfriends out and bought them things.

Ultimately I ended up cheating on all of them.

There is no real excuse for my cheating, nor do I expect pity or understanding from others on the topic it is what it is. Eventually I met a girl who seemed to actually get me and liked me for me not for who society and the media wanted me to be, and we have been together ever since. I cut back on drinking, quit smoking, got on with the company I am with at the moment and I thought everything was going great, yet for all the good things going on in my life there seemed to be something wrong. I still wasn't as happy as I should be.

People told me to see a shrink, take pills, smoke pot and so on. But I didn't want to. I knew that those things would not help. I at some point saw a poster for A Voice for Men on a lamp post and decided to check it out. After reading many of the topics on there and hearing the stories of others I decided to muster up the courage and confront my ex.

We actually met up face to face and talked about that day. She looked pained to be reminded of it and apologized for everything. Now, a lot of people would say I should have pressed charges or something along those lines and lord knows that if it was roles reversed I would be sitting in a jail cell somewhere, but I am not a hateful or vengeful person. All I wanted was the acknowledgment from someone that she was wrong, not me, and the fact that I was able to get it directly from her as well as an apology was all I needed.

Had it not been for A Voice for Men I would still look back at that day and blame myself. I never would have had the courage to confront her about it and would not have had any form of closure. Thanks to the work of those involved at AVFM I have finally been able to put that day behind me and had I not been able to confront my ex I don't know that she would have been able to put it behind her, either. It is for many reasons that I support AVFM, but this reason is the main one, it changed my life for the better and I hope that others will be helped as I was.

Kentish Town Sports Center to Men: GET OUT!

February 25, 2013 | by Peter Lloyd | Link | Original Link

Exercising my rights: Why I'm suing my gym for gender discrimination – and how you can help

In a recent Mail Online article I revealed my plans to sue a local sports center for gender bias.

The announcement, which ran in a piece entitled Bigot in a Bra, sparked both debate and interest – with colleagues, gym peers and friends keen to know more about this controversial case of sexual discrimination.

Encouragingly, beyond being curious, some passionate MHRAs went a step further, wanting to know how they could support my fight with emails, re-Tweets and donations to my legal fund.

Here, in an exclusive for A Voice For Men, I would like to thank them – and answer their queries.

Firstly, let me set the scene. The venue in question is the Kentish Town Sports Centre – a popular, local government-owned facility in north London, UK.

Following a successful, multi-million pound makeover, the gym now attracts hundreds of people every day from all sections of society; black, white, gay, straight, religious, atheist, male, female, young and old.

There is no dominant demographic. Everybody is welcome and everybody gets on. But not everybody is equal.

Because, co-governed by a very pro-feminist local government, the Kentish Town Sports Centre bans all men and boys for 390 hours per year.

Why? Because they're considered potential threats to women. Yep, that's correct – they ban all males from their gym room and pools – whether they're gay men, pensioners or children wanting to burn off innocent energy – for 7.5 hours every week in the name of feminism.

Incredulously, they still charge men the SAME annual membership fee as women, have no 'men's hour' equivalent and have failed to conduct any research into men's needs.

In short, men are getting shafted in the name of political correctness.

Generally, this ban happens at peak times – with an abrupt announcement asking all men to leave the building in a walk of shame. The resulting sight is a sad one. Seeing hordes of men and boys – who've all paid good money for a public service they're entitled to – being humiliated and rejected for nothing more than their gender is heartbreaking.

You can almost see them soaking up self-loathing like a sponge. Meanwhile, a misplaced, inherited guilt hangs in the air like smoke.

Simultaneously, female users look at these men (me included) suspiciously, constantly trying to spot which one of us is the threat.

Ironically, for all their blood, sweat and tears, these women's prejudices are being exercised more than their muscles.

Yet, because we live in an age of acceptable misandry, many of the men are too polite to speak up. Rather, like a giant metaphor for life, they save their upset for the privacy of the changing room and deflate.

But not me.

Several weeks ago, I formally complained to the venue's general manager, asking him to change the gym's policy with one of three alternatives:

A) Maintain a women's hour, but introduce a men's hour in the interest of fairness
B) Keep women's hour (and only women's hour) but charge men less, OR
C) Scrap single-gender sessions altogether

Seems fair, right? My thinking is this: if the need for women-only sessions is so great (and not just a commercial/marketing decision by gym bosses) then great, have one. But don't expect men to fund it.

Sadly, my suggestions were rejected.

"A report by the Women Sport and Fitness Foundation showed that a significant proportion of women (26%) "hate the way they look when they exercise". This was based on a survey undertaken by WSFF of 2013 people," they replied in an email.

"This takes on an even greater significance when you consider that women feel even more self-conscious when taking part in sport and physical activity when men are present. A WSFF survey in 2010 found that a significant number of respondents (total of 559 women) did not like the opposite sex to see them exercise.

"If you are wondering who or what WFSS is it is a charity that campaigns and specialises in increasing women's physical activity levels."

Translated into plain English, this means: feminists say a minority of women 'feel' bad about their bodies…and because heterosexual men are attracted to women, their very existence makes it worse, so they should be banned.

No, seriously.

That's like trying to clean a dirty face by rubbing a mirror.

It also assumes that all men are heterosexual, when in fact many of them are gay and have no interest in the female aesthetic. In fact, if they really wanted to, these men can be voyeuristic in the showers.

So what next, gay hours? Straight hours? Gimme a break.

Then, when I told them that men typically die before women, thus have a greater need to access fitness services – something based on fact, rather than feelings – they had no answer. Similarly, when I pointed out that their policy assumes that only men can objectify the opposite sex, they were bewildered. But they still did nothing.

Only two weeks later I was forced to complain when four teenage girls were wolf-whistling at men in the weights area – jeering ‘who’s the biggest’ and laughing. The management barely raised an eyebrow.

Time to play hard-ball, I thought.

And that takes us full circle. This is precisely why I’m now suing them for gender bias. Because I have politely pointed out their discrimination and asked them to change it, but they’ve refused.

Relying on the law is my only option, but I’ve learnt that this isn’t easy.

In a bid to launch my case I contacted almost 100 solicitors, all of whom refused to help me. Perhaps for them it’s too risky – or too political.

Not only was this disappointing, but it was also frustrating because several editors had already shown interest in my battle – and were willing to run stories on my case; something which would’ve helped the MHRM significantly.

Fortunately, Erin Pizzey – AVFM’S very own editor at large – buoyed me by personally offering her support, as did human rights campaigner Peter Tatchell, who described my fight as “sensible and fair”.

In fact, Peter recommended I contact the Equality and Human Rights Commission for legal help, which I did. But I sent two emails – on 7/1/13 and 10/1/13 – and both were unanswered. I called to chase and was reassured, but that was over a month ago. Still nothing. No prizes for guessing why: there’s an endemic disinterest in men’s issues, which is another good reason to fight back, hard.

Only this time I realised I would be doing it on my own. That’s often how it works when you’re fighting for men’s rights.

Fortunately, with the help of the good people at MRA London, I found a solicitor who will take on my case for a reasonable fee. Given that I’m largely bankrolling this myself, this is important.

Now, we are working together to build my case and things are moving forward.

Increasingly, the gym seem nervous – not least by the public embarrassment it may cause them, but also by their own anti-male indoctrination.

And so they should.

Because, if I win, it would be very much a test case – with gyms all over the country being forced to update their policies to be truly equal, without feminist propaganda skewing it.

Not only would this be physically healthy for everyone who can access gyms without restriction, but it would also be socially healthy for those who understand the toxicity of sexism – whether directed at men or women.

That’s what I’m fighting for – and you’re welcome to join me. After a long process in getting to this point, things seem to be gathering pace. Fortunately, I think I can go the distance…especially with the brotherhood on side.

This is a heavyweight issue, but feels much easier knowing you’re all behind me.

Thanks for everything so far.

Publishers note: I am generally very hesitant to encourage readers to contribute anywhere but AVFM. We have significant operational costs and sweat the bottom line quite a bit.

I think this is a badly needed exception. Mr. Lloyd is not only the first undisguised and unapologetic men's human rights activist to ever break through to mainstream media writing, but this is also a case that could benefit our cause in several significant ways.

I will be donating personal money to help support his lawsuit, and I hope others will also make the same choice. To donate to Mr. Lloyd's legal fund, you can use paypal and send the money to his account using the email address peter@handsomecopy.com.

If you have any questions about how to do this, please put them in the comments and they will be answered.

Lights, camera…..

February 25, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Imagine for a moment that there was going to be a talk hosted at a large, very liberal university that focused on the corruption of scholarship, orthodoxy and politicized groupthink that feminism has fostered in academe.

Imagine that the university this talk would be held in was in fact so liberal, and so pro-feminist that the students there had a history of violence and censorship in association with any attempt to bring the issues of men and boys into heightened awareness.

Indeed, imagine if you can, that such a talk, directly damning to the ideology of feminism was going to be conducted at the University of Toronto, where their notorious Student Union has already fomented violent protests, spread lies and disinformation and even attempted to bring down this website, all in the name of ensuring that nothing other than the feminist narrative was allowed on that school's campus.

Now imagine that you are not imagining this at all; that it is actually going to happen.

At the University of Toronto on March 7th, CAFE is going to host:

"What's Wrong With Women's Studies?
Academic Feminism, Censorship & Men" featuring Professor Janice Fiamengo.

This is the Facebook event:

https://www.facebook.com/events/429977050414747/

Presentation

In Professing Feminism: Education and Indoctrination in Women's Studies, Daphne Patai and Noretta Koertge present research showing how women's studies has come to serve a political agenda, leading to deep problems: dubious scholarship, indoctrination, and the alienation of supporters.

Dr. Janice Fiamengo, University of Ottawa English Professor, discusses the problems of academic feminism at Canadian universities: dubious scholarship, indoctrination, dogmatic teaching approaches, limitations on free speech, effects of "equity hiring," and the consequences for men in the humanities.

Thurs, March 7 at 7:00 PM * McLennan Physical Labs (MP) Rm203. 60 St. George St.; $5 suggested donation.

♦♦♦

Oh my.

Now, a couple of questions came to mind as I reviewed this event information. One, have the members of the University of Toronto Student Union learned a single thing from their last, internationally watched demonstration of public stupidity?

Are they going to block doors and destroy property in an effort to once again try to silence the voice of reason from reaching the student body at that school?

Will they send out spokespersons to misrepresent past statements made by the presenters?

Will the professors from the women's studies department once again send their naïve young charges into possibly ruining their reputations for life, as they did once before?

Or have they learned from their public humiliation when to shut up and get out of the way of free speech?

Incidentally, in case you have been under a rock for several months, here is the kind of conduct that the UTSU brought us the last time anyone dared to challenge feminist dogma on their campus.

UTSU Hate Rally.

I don't know how these questions will be answered. Time will tell. But I do believe that I can predict one thing that will be happening for sure both inside and outside the event.

The cameras will be rolling.

And AVFM will be ready to do the same.

Addendum: Media coverage has already begun in anticipation of possible hostile actions of the University of Toronto Students Union.

http://metronews.ca/news/toronto/573522/mens-issues-or-misogyny-controversial-mens-group-to-discuss-womens-studies/

Note to readers: Please help us by going in and commenting on this article. Comments will be open till 2 AM EST.

McCarley named AVFM Senior Editor

February 25, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]

Suzanne McCarley has been a very active player here at A Voice for Men for quite some time. When I say active, I mean the kind of active that if we had ten more like her it would make the ground shake.

I can't even think of any of our recent efforts that she has not been involved in to one degree or another, even as he has had to display exemplary patience with me helping her do her work.

During the activism on behalf of Joel Kirk, Suzanne traveled from out of state to West Virginia to post and hand out flyers about Judge Lori Jackson for two days. She has spearheaded email campaigns and collated information for distribution on a lot of our work.

Recently, she offered to be prepared to travel to Dallas, Texas for the upcoming male shame fest sponsored by that city's mayor and some of their famous jocks so that she could participate in raising awareness that DV was not a sexually based problem.

It seems like everywhere I go, I see her; in the comments of misandric articles; daily on the AVFM Facebook page; in the AVFM Forums.

She has also written for the site, turning in two brutally hard hitting pieces, here and here, each of which spiked traffic to the site and called out the current gender zeitgeist's hypocrisy in spades.

She has always made herself available to help with any project we have, and I genuinely suspect that she is a racehorse ready to come out of the gates that we have too long held closed.

It is with no reservations and much pleasure that I now officially announce her appointment as a Senior Editor at A Voice for Men. Please join me in welcoming Suzanne McCarley to this position, with all the rights and privileges (OMG, there is that word) that come with it.

[/box]

Perrins joins AVFM News team

February 26, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]

I have been making a number of announcements about AVFM staff additions in recent days. It's a reflection of our growth, and of the energy that is beginning to spread through the MHRM.

Today, I take pleasure in announcing that Dan Perrins has taken the position of AVFM News Correspondent for Ontario, Canada. Dan has already been busy in the Hamilton, Ontario area, postering the living crap out of that city and accosting anyone on the street who might not have heard of the MHRM.

When asked what he looked forward to as an AVFM News correspondent, he answered, "Exposing misandry in my own back yard, speaking out against it globally."

Dan's appointment marks the first permanent provincial news coverage position on the AVFM team. With most countries in North America, Europe and Australia already covered, the addition of provincial, state and even city level news personnel over time will allow us to react directly and immediately to newsworthy events as they happen.

With that in mind, Perrins already has his first assignment. We are sending him to the University of Toronto early next month to attend and cover the lecture by Janice Fiamengo on feminist corruption in academe.

Our "Dannyboy" will be there representing AVFM, asking all the right questions, documenting events and exposing any attempts to stifle free speech – which we have every reason to believe is on the agenda of feminist ideologues at U of T.

Then he is going to put it all together and bring it here for you to read about and watch.

He is hitting the ground running as the AVFM News man in Ontario, with Toronto already in the crosshairs. Please join me in expressing thanks and giving him a hearty welcome.

[/box]

The happy feminist

February 26, 2013 | by August Løvenskiolds | Link | Original Link

---

I nicked my finger on a tiny bit of broken glass today. The experience of an unexpected small cut is nearly universal: the shock of pain and the reflexive flinch occuring so close together that they seem simultaneous, the quick relief that no blood is flowing, and then the feeling of disappointment and yes, fear, when after a moment's lapse the bleeding begins in earnest.

This real-world momentary gap in time between cut and blood flow is important – contrast it with a faked or "special effects" injury like one might see in a theatrical medical production: the sequence of events is distorted from reality; the blood flows instantly (no delay) from the touch point of the scalpel's cut, and then stops flowing as soon as the point passes off the skin.

Spotting a fake can be as simple as noticing a tiny detail like this that seems off somehow, even if the quiet alarm bell in your head isn't well explained. The timing of blood flow is but one example.

One of the effects of the age of television and the decline of father parenting is that our skills at detecting emotional manipulation have been truncated. For example, it has been recognized for decades but rarely taught today that a smile on the lips with no wrinkles (crow's feet) around the eyes is a faked smile designed to manipulate you – only the best actors can feign a real eye-smile. The actor Morgan Freeman in particular can act both a "real" smile and a feigned smile to perfection – in the movie "Red", his display of both types of smile is breathtaking but only if you know what to look for.

John Hembling (JtO, John the Other) touched on this issue briefly back in October with his video "Let me see your victim face" but he neglected to describe a real vs faked smile – John's smiles were clearly affected but the smiles of the feminist faux victims were "real" in the sense that they were deriving actual pleasure from lying about their supposed fears and injuries – their smiles tattle on their lying claims of hurt. Well, to be fair, you can't really tell with Rebecca Watson – she hides her eyes so well with her wretched glasses and hair that the nature of her glee is indeterminate.

Compared to fake blood and fake smiles, spotting a fake feminist ought to be easy. A genuine feminist, if such a thing can exist, must by necessity be like Rebecca Watson in an Irish elevator – the most tortured, wretched, oppressed, threatened perpetual victim that has ever existed.

Because of their mindless devotion to the omnipotent divinity of Patriarchy Theory and his bastard son, Rape Culture, born of the reluctant virgin Watson via some ghostly Irishman spirit, feminists must exist in an eternal nightmare world of physical pain, emotional terror and micro-brutalities that make Auschwitz look like a Carnival Cruise. OK, bad example, but you get my point – a true feminist – one who adheres to the standard teachings of feminism – can never, ever, be happy, or experience any sort of pleasure at all, or else…Not a feminist.

Don't believe me? Try googling "happy feminist" some time. At the time of this writing, I found these:

The Happy Feminist Blog. She lasted a whole year, from April 2006-April 2007, and after promising that "I will definitely be back to regular posting on Monday April 16", POOF, she was gone.

"Happy" feminism – notice the scare quotes. The second reference to "happy feminist" rejects the term outright.

"I post (mostly) good feminist news" Like the Sandy Hook elementary school killings. Rape in the military. Happy, happy. Joy, joy.

I could go on, but you get the point. There can be no happiness, ever, for women in feminism. A happy feminist is a shitty feminist, at best – even her orgasms and extended lifespan only sharpen and prolong her suffering, somehow.

A woman who takes joy in the health, love, and growth of her children? Not a feminist.

A woman CEO who takes validation and personal satisfaction from the success of her company? Not a feminist – and how DARE she demolish patriarchy theory by succeeding in a man's world? Most women CEOs of Fortune 500 companies depart after 2 years or less – of the 15 women CEOs in 2010, 9 were gone by 2012.

A woman who is secure enough in herself that she can acknowledge that some laws and practices discriminate against men in favor of women?

TRAITOR!

We can rail against the so-called male feminists, manginas and white knights all we want and it will only challenge them to fight harder against us. We're all men; we love challenges.

But if we can prove that their feminism is making women miserable FOREVER – and by design? This is the real challenge of gender equality – can we let women grow in intelligence and accomplishment by setting them free of the feminist expectation of female victimhood?

We became men by fighting and overcoming our own challenges. Challenge makes men stronger – do we disrespect women so much that we cannot grant them the same opportunity to advance through their own success in overcoming challenge without our interference?

So to the male feminists I say – it is ok for you to let women find their own happiness by dropping their feminism, and yours, too. As much as you might hate other men, you do want women to actually be happy, right?

Feminism: the philosophy that happy, long-lived women are stupid and oppressed and need to made miserable and equal to men, who also suck.

Guilty if I say you are

February 27, 2013 | by Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) | Link | Original Link

---

Somewhere in North Carolina, a couple of college students had a shitty relationship that ended badly. I know, I know. Shock! Let's call them Jennifer and Brad. Brad has a long history of mental instability, including a suicide attempt and eventually Jennifer got sick of his shit and dumped him.

Brad didn't handle that very well. He decided that Jennifer had, in fact, been abusive, and the abuse had only ever been HER being a total fucking jackass to HIM. Lacking any evidence of any kind, or any support from any of their mutual friends, Brad had no legs to stand on in terms of pressing criminal charges, so he took his complaints about what a bitch Jennifer is to the school Honor Court, which promptly threw Brad and his sorry little ass out, along with his complaints.

Oh gosh, well now Brad is super pissed! He is not letting this one go. Nope. He's been following Jennifer around campus, interfering with her classes and talking openly about their sexually, emotionally and verbally abusive relationship, which was all Jennifer's fault.

It's kind of obvious WHY Jennifer dumped this fucking moron in the first place, isn't it? Jennifer had way more tolerance than I ever would, but eventually, she too got sick of this shit and went to the Honor Court. The Honor Court was not amused by Brad's antics and is now threatening him with expulsion.

Basically, the Honor Court said "no, Brad, you do not get to follow your former girlfriend around talking about what an abusive psychopath she is without A SHRED OF EVIDENCE FOR THAT. Did she beat the crap out of you? Get yourself an assault conviction and then we'll talk. Until then, shut the fuck up or get the fuck out".

Brad is outraged! He is attempting to raise awareness of domestic violence against men, and this is how the Honor Court reacts? He is drawing attention to a very real problem and the big mean assholes on the court are telling him he needs EVIDENCE before he can carry out a smear campaign against Jennifer?

Well, clearly, that's bullshit. Jennifer is guilty because BRAD SAYS SHE IS. What other evidence is required?

Oh now wait a second. Oops. I got that backwards.

It's not Brad who is mentally unstable with a diagnosed illness, it's Jennifer. And it's not Brad who has been following his ex-romantic partner around acting like an asshole. It's Jennifer. She has openly been talking about the fact that Brad RAPED HER and she has a ~~criminal conviction to prove that, the support of her friends, the backing of the school's Honor Court~~, NO EVIDENCE OF ANY KIND TO PROVE THAT EXCEPT HER OWN OPINION.

Did Brad rape Jennifer? Who the fuck knows? Maybe. But here's the thing: justice rests on one assumption and one assumption only:

INNOCENT UNTIL PROVEN GUILTY

Jennifer has the support of Jezebel (surprise!), who truly believe that Jennifer absolutely has the right to follow Brad around campus harassing him and accusing him of a crime despite not having any evidence of any kind other than HOW SHE FEELS.

http://jezebel.com/5986693/college-rape-survivor-faces-potential-expulsion-for-intimidating-her-rapist

I wonder how Jezebel would feel if it were Brad following Jennifer around and informing all her potential new partners that she is, in fact, diagnosably mentally ill, a claim for which he has ACTUAL EVIDENCE?

This little story is exactly why men should have their anonymity preserved when they are charged with rape. Accusers have long had anonymity, on the assumption that they have a right to privacy and that to be a known victim of sexual assault can have life altering implications.

http://www.dailymail.co.uk/femail/article-2281691/Men-SHOULD-afforded-anonymity-rape-trials–human-right-High-Court-judge-Maura-McGowan-correct-says-Peter-Lloyd.html

As if being ACCUSED of sexual assault does not?

The Rape Culture™ crowd likes to claim that false accusations of rape are incredibly rare and therefore it is reasonable to assume that every woman that charges any man with rape is telling the truth. The opposite of justice: guilty until proven innocent.

False rape allegations are rare? Oh really? Elizabeth Jones, who is only 22 years old, begs to differ. She finally got jail time after ELEVEN FALSE ACCUSATIONS.

[image]

http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-2284677/Compulsive-liar-Elizabeth-Jones-cried-rape-11-times-jailed.html

There are some lacrosse players at Duke who may have something to say about false allegations, too.

[image]

http://www.nydailynews.com/news/national/crystal-mangum-duke-lacross-rape-accuser-charged-murder-boyfriend-stabbing-death-article-1.110768

That lying little bitch is now up on murder charges, after her boyfriend was mysteriously stabbed. This is AFTER she set her house on fire with her three young children inside. Despite the fact that she is a lying bag of crazy, she still gets the assumption of innocence.

Women like Jennifer honestly believe they can drop the rape bomb on any man, anywhere, at any time and get a victim pass. He will be assumed guilty and the mere threat of having the grenade of accusation go off is enough to keep most men silent in the face of a clear violation of justice.

I’m proud of the Honor Court at the University of North Carolina. Let the bitches scream, your honors. And let justice reign.

It’s really very simple: if you are going to accuse someone of a crime, ANY CRIME, you’re gonna need some evidence to support that claim.

And no, cupcake, your FEELINGS are not evidence.

For anything other than your total lack of self-reflection or understanding of how justice actually works. Back your shit up, bitch.

Or get the hell out.

Lots of love,

JB

AVFM-R; Mother of violence

February 28, 2013 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

---

[box icon=""]

We think patriarchies are violent because men are in charge. But every overt patriarchy has at it's core a cult of motherhood. The more patriarchal, the more women are completely in charge of the raising of children, to the exclusion of men. So, are patriarchies violent because men are in charge? Or, are they violent because women are centred in the raising of children? If we even accept the cartoonish and simplistic popular conception of what a patriarchy is, and whether we live in one, who owns the violence in such a system? Is it Dad? Or is it Mom?

Tonight, Typhon Blue, The Wooly Bumbebee, James Huff and John the Other will be talking about the matriachal root of violence.
8PM Central Time, 6PM Pacific Time.

Call in number for the show is 310- 388 9709

http://www.blogtalkradio.com/avoiceformen/2013/03/01/mother-of-violence

[/box]

UNC, Landen Gambill and false rape culture

February 28, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

The rape hysteria flag has been hoisted over the University of North Carolina.

The lawyers have been called; new legal eagles, big guns, have been hired by the school. University officials are issuing bland, meaningless statements reassuring the concerned public that they really don't like their students getting raped.

And of course, rape hysteria advocates are piling on as much spin as they can.

Much of the hoopla stems from allegations that the school is systematically underreporting sexual assaults on campus.

[image]
Melinda Manning
Melinda Manning, formerly UNC's Assistant Dean of Students, filed a complaint with the U.S. Department of Education alleging that Dean of Students Jonathan Sauls, Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Winston Crisp and the Office of University Counsel all conspired to hide the actual number rapes on campus — and subsequently created a "hostile environment" for Manning when she would not cooperate.

"Hostile environment" is legal code speak in North Carolina and elsewhere for, "Ima sue yall's asses."

It appears what has happened here is that Manning inflated the number of campus rapes in order to inflate the magnitude of the problem, and she got called on it.

The fact that she was challenged at all is a minor miracle, but that may be related to one of her poster children in the case, Landen Gambill (picture at top).

Gambill, one of the "rape" cases so hostilely dismissed by the evil patriarchs at UNC is quite a case herself. The credibility of her story is so low that it almost prompts one to put the word "allegation" in scare quotes.

Gambill, a woman with a history of extensive mental health problems, including a suicide "attempt," says she got raped by her boyfriend. He raped her many times, even as she continued a romantic relationship with him. But she forgot to tell anyone it was happening.

She did not tell campus police, or city police, or her friends, or her family. But she has a lot of "pages of evidence," whatever that means, to prove beyond a doubt that she was raped.

Gambill finally found someone to tell her struggles to; her school administration, which conveniently provides a process that places her under little scrutiny and does not carry the threat of a false police report.

The man she accused was placed on "trial" by University of North Carolina University Honor Court in the spring of 2012.

For those that do not know, the Honor Court is a tribunal conducted by pimple faced college students with a few hours of training and standards of proof so low that they were last seen in the vicinity of Monica Lewinski's knees. The ruling panel needed only be 50.01% more convinced that Gambill was telling the truth than the man she claimed raped her.

They found him not guilty.

Of course, the fact that a superficially attractive blond could not secure support from a panel of college students appears to have been quite a blow. Gambill has been making as much noise as possible ever since. She has even been following her rapist around on campus harassing him. She has also started a vendetta against the system that "wronged" her by siding with the man who raped her.

Part of the vindictiveness demonstrated by Gambill appears to stem from her trial, where she claims she was forced to answer "irrelevant and inappropriate questions."

"[A] woman student said to me, 'Landen, as a woman, I know that if that had happened to me, I would've broken up with him the first time it happened. Will you explain to me why you didn't?'"

Imagine the nerve of someone asking a rape accuser why she kept dating her rapist.

Wait, have I been saying rapist? How can that be you ask? The man was never arrested, never charged and never convicted of anything except dating a personality disordered bleach blond with an appetite to punish anyone who she doesn't like.

Yet here I am, calling him a rapist.

I'm not alone. You see, the standard of evidence in some places is even lower than it is at a collegiate Honor Court. And as I said, the rape hysteria posse is deputizing.

[image]
Caitlin McCabe
For instance, if you read dailytarheel.com's Caitlin McCabe's coverage of the case, you will see her toss the word rape around like pepperoni in a pizza joint. It appears that McCabe's standard of proof, along with her journalistic integrity, somehow managed to hit the floor harder than Courtney Love's prom dress. Instead of covering the story, McCabe is covering Gambill's allegedly raped but undoubtedly lying ass, perpetuating and expanding on the very serious problem of false allegations.

McCabe is joined in this total abandonment of principles by Annie-Rose Strasser, a writer for the uber-liberal thinkprogress.org, who similarly concludes the legitimacy of the "rape" and writes about it as though it were already proven in a court of law.

I wrote Strasser an email yesterday asking her for her sources justifying her language in the article, which began with:

> A college sophomore at the University of North Carolina is being sent to the school's "Honor Court" and may be expelled for speaking publicly about her rape.

I am sure you are shocked to hear I have had no response from Strasser, but you may well join me in the slight startle to learn that the school is actually looking to administer some discipline to Gambill for continuing her vendetta against an innocent man after the Honor Court had ruled on the case.

That would be an ever so slight suggestion for a correction for Strasser. Annie-Rose, she is not in trouble for talking about her rape. She is in trouble because there was no rape and she won't stop running around lying about it.

Just saying.

The real story here is not Gambill. False rape liars are a chronic, systemic problem and not a single one of them is any more special than the other.

[image]
Annie-Rose Strasser
The real story here is the systemic part; the false rape culture. The problem is so pronounced that we now have a university scrambling to cover its collective ass for supposedly trying to hide campus rapes, even as it puts men in godforsaken laymen trials for matters that would never hold muster where they belong, in the criminal justice system.

And we have a rising voice in the media that instead of offering real coverage of the problem, is playing tag team trial by pundit, passing judgment where it cannot be credibly justified, and pawning it all off as journalism.

Landen Gambill is a nutter. And there is similar cause for concern about Melenda Manning. It is the same kind of sociopathy expressed by Annie-Rose Strasser and Caitlin McCabe, who hold the power of public perception in their hands, and choose to distort the truth in order to bend that perception to their ideology.

So much sickness, so little time.

So what do we do here? Well, as always we talk about the problem and use the reach of this website to inject some sanity into a literally insane scenario. We also try to remember that there is a young man out there somewhere who has been to hell and back over one bad relationship choice, and that right now he is watching his fellow students act like they are preparing for candlelight vigils for his "victim."

The victim that never was.

If he wants to tell his story, and keep his name out of it, I am sure he will figure out how to contact us.

There will be some who think we should add Landen Gambill to the registry of false accusers at register-her.com.

There is a problem with that, however. As overwhelming as the circumstantial evidence is that she is in fact a false rape accuser, she does not meet the standard of proof to place her there, yet.

There are some places where standards still mean something.

In the meantime, we will follow this case. We will take note of whether the school yields to pressure to drop the Honor Court charges against Gambill, which she is desperately trying to bully her way into now.

If they stand with the charges against her, as they should, we will wait and watch to see whether they punish her accordingly, or simply ask her to not ruin anyone else's life at the school for a while.

Most importantly, we will do everything we can to follow what changes the school may make in the future regarding the reporting of rape, or as it is known by Landen Gambill, "My boyfriend broke up with me."

The pressure will surely mount on them to make handling of sex crime allegations even more draconian. There will be pressure to allow the next Melinda Manning, who wants to include allegations in reports as surely as they were proven rapes, to do it.

All we can do at this point is wait.

Well, and write.

Note: This article is also available in Spanish.

Republican chickens come home to roost on VAWA

March 1, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

A future free of VAWA just eliminated.

As most of you would have predicted, The House has passed the Senate version of VAWA, and it will be sent straight to President Obama's desk where he will undoubtedly sign it into law, maybe before you have a chance to read this.

There is no real story here. Once again the politicians have ignored the science about intimate partner violence, ignored most of the victims, including children, in order to pass a federally sized barrel of feminist pork. They have ensured that for the foreseeable future that the corruption of money and public perception continues, and that sexual ideologues can continue to finance an agenda to destroy families, exert unfettered legal power over men and wantonly enable female abusers of men and children.

Again, there is no story here; no new one, anyway. But there is a lesson, if we are willing to learn it.

For the last several years there have been activists hard at work, trying to lobby the Republican Party to intervene on VAWA insanities and bring the corrupt legislation down. The result has not only been failure, it has actually served to further demonize opposition to VAWA and subsequently etch it deeper into the cement of American political institutions.

The Republicans have inched us closer to making VAWA as American as Mom and apple pie. And it is long past time that we recognize that and act accordingly.

There is no doubt whatsoever that Senate and Congressional Republicans have been educated about the rampant corruption, the financial waste and lack of accountability that pervades VAWA. They have been informed of the sexual bias that runs through the legislation, and how that bias does grievous harm to children and anyone else who might be the victim of female perpetrators. They have been made aware of the lack of services for male victims and the pernicious nature of primary aggressor laws and mandatory arrest polices.

Make no mistake about it, the Republicans that help govern our nation are fully aware that VAWA is nothing more than a cash cow for ideologues and that it operates at the destructive expense of the citizens they have sworn to serve.

But what did they actually do in how they went about "attacking" VAWA? Well, they raised objections to the inclusion of provisions for the GLBT community, illegal immigrants and expanding Native American tribal authority in domestic violence matters. In effect, they ignored the corruption, the sweeping bias, the Constitutional undermining, the disaffected children and men and instead claimed the three worst and most easily demonized objections to the new version of the legislation. That in part explains why they just dropped all opposition and helped usher in the new version of the bill.

They embraced a trivial trifecta of objections to be cast as their talking points in the media without a single objection. They never even pretended there was anything wrong with the old VAWA, when they knew damn well there was.

It was not a week ago I watched Senator Marco Rubio, the great new Republican hope, on Fox News telling reporters that he would have voted for VAWA without the changes.
Lest anyone forget, the feature image of this article shows an American president signing VAWA into law once before. His name isn't Clinton.
Indeed, if you take a look around the media at the supposed detractors of VAWA, it reads like a who's who list of social conservatives, all of whom are insanely intent on raising objections to VAWA so lame and off target that they would need to improve before we could dignify them by calling them laughing stocks.
From the Family Research Council, whose deepest concerns were about the extension of tribal laws.
http://www.saveservices.org/wp-content/uploads/FRC-VAWALtr.pdf
From Concerned Women for America, who got so lost in echoing feminist rhetoric about domestic violence that I lost interest in reading before I got to any of their supposed objections. For pity sake, Penny Nance was even parroting the one in four rape canard by the time she got to paragraph 3.
http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2013/feb/8/nance-why-congress-ought-ditch-vawa/
Then there is Focus on the Family, who should rename their organization Focus on Abortion:
http://www.citizenlink.com/2013/02/04/take-action-violence-against-women-act-misleading-harmful/
Now, of course I am not saying that the concerns raised by these organizations, or by some Republicans have no validity. For sure, I am concerned that VAWA incentivizes false accusations as a fast track to a green card. But that is just one of a boatload of other problems with the legislation that Republicans lack the political grit to face.
It is time to stop kissing their asses and recognize they have abdicated their responsibilities to their constituents and to the Constitution and are nothing more than proxy agents for the very ideologues they purport to oppose.
It is time that we wake up to the fact that if there is a political solution to VAWA and legislation like it, it will not come from either of the two mainstream parties.
I am fully aware of what an uphill battle that leaves us with. But an easier slope won't do us a bit of good if it leads to the top of the wrong hill.
In some of the discussions I have had with Republican supporters, at least those who feel that the Republican Party might be an ally in this fight, I've heard it said that we cannot expect them to sacrifice political careers from efforts to oppose VAWA.
I cannot tell you how sick I am of hearing this impotent, mealy-mouthed excuse making. All it amounts to is asking us to rationalize that it is somehow in our interest to place the job security of career cowards ahead of the truth and ahead of the justice we are entitled to demand.
If it takes the sacrifice of political careers to hammer home the truth, then so be it. We have kids still dying for oil. The least we can do is expect the truth from someone whose worst consequence is returning to their fucking law practice.

I know I am speaking idealistically. I know that the men in government now bear no resemblance at all to the men who willingly signed their own death warrants so that America would have a chance to escape tyranny.
But the idea of surrendering to a path without ideals, led by gutless men who do not believe in anything strongly enough to pay a price for it has reached a level of offense in me so heightened that I can no longer stand it.
In the future, the next time VAWA comes up for reauthorization, you will likely see some noise again about ending the legislation. Don't buy it on its face value. More likely than not, if it is not coming from AVFM, it is a pig in a poke.
We will be working hard here, as we always do, to continue to educate the public in the truth about domestic violence, and domestic violence law.
I will be asking our DV Policy Advisor, Erin Pizzey, to work more closely with us on this issue. Perhaps, though I am not holding my breath, we may find some allies involved in Libertarian politics.
But wherever we start, it will have to be with the truth.
History gives us many examples of where the truth, pounded incessantly into the public's consciousness can eventually manifest in change. We are even starting to see some of that change in the mentality of people about men's rights issues.
What we will not gain from, though, is obsequious, politically driven compromise and capitulation. The only result of that you are ever going to see is right around the corner, when President Obama, with the help of the Republican Party, signs VAWA right back into our lives.

Creeper Cards!

March 1, 2013 | by VFM News and Commentary | Link | Original Link

---

Defcon isn't your typical tech conference. Happening in the heat of Las Vegas every summer, it attracts throngs of hackers. Due to sexism complaints at the convention, San Francisco-based journalist KC created "Creeper Move" cards that can be handed out to offenders.
http://news.cnet.com/8301-1009_3-5749...
Background music: Music:Amblr. Kevin MacLeod (incompetech.com) Licensed under Creative Commons "Attribution 3.0"

House passes VAWA reauthorization

March 1, 2013 | by Robert O'Hara | Link | Original Link

[box]
AVFM News Thursday March 1st 2013) The Senate version of the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) reauthorization passed through the U.S. House of Representatives yesterday ending a nearly year and a half period of limbo after the previous authorization expired in October of 2011. The final tally was 286 to 148 with all 199 Democrats and 87 of the 225 House Republicans voting for reauthorization as. [1.] The bill is expected to hit President Obama's desk as early as tomorrow where it is certain that he will sign it into law.
This version of VAWA allocates $659 million over the next five years for a domestic violence industry which still denies the existence of male victims of domestic violence and fails to recognize the fact that women have the same propensity as men to engage in violent and abusive behavior. Furthermore, this version of VAWA has all of the same funding provisions for states that have mandatory arrest and predominant aggressor laws on the books taking away due process for the accused and exclusively profile heterosexual men as abusers. Male victims of domestic violence are mentioned only once in the new version which is nearly 300 pages long and then only in the context of homosexual relationships. [3]
This vote follows a day of heated controversy among the Republican ranks when on Wednesday the House Leadership decided not to vet the house version of the bill through the committee hearing process. This meant the House would simply vote on the majority proposal which did not pass due to a complete absence of Democratic and weak Republican support. [2.]This effectively doomed any challenge to VAWA renewal to failure.
The move by House Republican leadership to bypass the Judiciary and Ways and Means committees angered many conservatives in the house who were disturbed by Speaker Boehner's acquiescence. This marked the third time in the last two months the House passed pass a significant piece of legislation with minority Democrats carrying the vote. [2.] The strong women voter turn out for the Democratic party in last falls election was cited as the reason for this.
The republican version, introduced by Rep. Cathy McMorris Rodgers of Washington state excluded the Senate version's provision for the LGBT community and modified federal jurisdiction over Indian territories. It also featured protections against immigration fraud. Interestingly, McMorris Rodgers voted for the Senate version after her's was defeated and Speaker Boehner failed to vote. [4.]
McMorris Rodgers' VAWA bill was, in effect, little different than the Senate version of VAWA in the sense that it failed to recognize the truth about intimate partner violence that feminists have been suppressing all along; specifically that it is not sex specific. In fact, the language in VAWA states repeatedly that domestic violence is a crime that "predominately affects women." [5.] This failure to acknowledge the facts concerning domestic violence has been mimicked across a wide array of prominent conservative groups who have publicly opposed VAWA renewal.

Penny Nance, the president of Concerned Women of America an extremely religious social conservative political organization, wrote a piece for the Washington Times titled "Why Congress ought to ditch VAWA" which parroted many of the pernicious lies concerning domestic violence. [6.] She actually cited the "one in four" female college student victimization statistic so thoroughly debunked by many researchers. The biggest problem she had with VAWA it seems is that it doesn't promote the institution of marriage.

To be sure, the struggle for VAWA reauthorization over the past year and a half has marked a great leap forward for those who challenge the feminist narrative of gender violence. It can no longer be said that feminist ideologues have a iron fisted grip on the public discourse concerning the issue. Organizations like S.A.V.E. and many others were instrumental in this and the achievement cannot be ignored. However, it seems that social conservatives have the same problems addressing the truth about intimate partner violence that feminists do.

1. http://clerk.house.gov/evs/2013/roll055.xml
2. http://thehill.com/homenews/house/285277-house-gop-decision-to-move-vawa-bill-causes-unease
3. http://www.gpo.gov/fdsys/pkg/BILLS-113s47es/pdf/BILLS-113s47es.pdf
4. http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2013/02/28/violence-against-women-act_n_2781433.html
5. http://docs.house.gov/billsthisweek/20130225/CPRT-113-RU00-S47_xml.pdf
6. http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2013/feb/8/nance-why-congress-ought-ditch-vawa/

[/box]

Sizing up a man's worth

March 1, 2013 | by Jim Muldoon | Link | Original Link

Is bigger always better when it comes to the size of a man's penis?
Many think so, in fact society has taught us that the bigger something is that men own, means that they are somehow more of a man. That the more a man has, the more worth he has as a human being. Bigger cars, houses, boats, more women, money, toys, etc… Giving a man higher status and thus increased worth to society. This is also the case when it comes to the size of a man's penis, or so we are told.
Men are often ridiculed by women if their penis does not meet a certain length when erect. I've personally heard many women, on many occasions, discussing their ex-partners penises and making fun of how small, tiny, or thin they were. How fucking his pinky toe would have been more pleasurable, or how they literally laughed in the guy's face when they saw it for the first time.
These women enjoy shaming those men amongst others and cackling over hot cups of coffee in public coffee shops where anyone nearby can clearly hear what they are talking about. In fact, they enjoy knowing that others are hearing them and that the men they are shaming are not just confined to their table.
It sounds disgusting doesn't it? Well it is.
The message that a man's penis somehow defines his worth has been beaten into us for so long that even parents of infant boys usually check the penis after he is born to make sure it looks proportional to his overall size. Making sure little Timmy's penis is big enough is almost as important as making sure he has all ten fingers and toes, if not more important. In fact, Google "son has small penis" and you'll see just how concerned (obsessed) parents, mostly mothers, are about the size of their son's penises. And not just parents of infants, but parents of older children too. Well up into their teens for some of them.
This is just an example of how society has led us to believe that a small penis means a man is somehow worth less. Of course this can, and sadly often does, lead to a self-fulfilling prophecy when a man buys into this kind of bullshit and places the bulk of his worth on the size of his penis. More so if his parents make an issue of it as he is growing up. Not only does making an issue of it tell that boy that his parents place enormous value on something he has no control over, but that it is something to be utterly ashamed of and it needs to be hidden or fixed.
But what happens when too much importance is placed on the size of a man's penis? When someone has bought into the whole idea that a man is only worth something if his penis is of a certain size?
According to news sources, an Indonesian woman recently drowned her nine-year-old son in the bath because she was worried that his "small penis" would affect his opportunities as a man in the future.
The 38-year-old woman from Jakarta, the capital of Indonesia, told the police that her son "already had a small penis prior to his being circumcised, but that it appeared to 'shrink further' after the operation."

She told police investigators that she killed him because she determined "he would have a bleak future with his small penis."
Police said the woman was "fully conscious of what she had done", but police ordered a psychological test to "assess her mental condition."
Is this woman suffering from a mental illness which led her to believe that the size of her son's penis size would have affected his future so horribly that her only recourse was to murder him? Or is she just someone who completely bought into the bullshit that a man's penis is the determining factor of his manhood? Of his worth as a human being? I tend to think it was the latter and not the former.
When society places so much worth on the size of a man's penis it's a wonder that more male children are not being inspected daily and then discarded like trash if they fail to measure up.
The truth is that the size of a man's penis has nothing to do with his worth as a human being. But if we are raising our sons to believe in the bullshit that size is the determining factor of what their worth is, then we are creating a society that does not value men as individuals, but as walking penises. As being no more than a few inches of worth to the world.
When you do that, who is it that truly loses their worth as human beings?

And they're off!

March 1, 2013 | by Suzanne McCarley | Link | Original Link

Picture if you will, a day at the races. As the starting gate slams open, a clumsy old gray mare stumbles out, nearly oblivious to the blur of thoroughbreds flying past. She looks around, shakes herself off, and staggers away in the general direction of the finish line. Hi everybody! It's me! I'm about to dig in to a new case, but before I do I'd like to take this opportunity to tell you what I am all about.

I have always been relatively apolitical, not looking for a cause, and not much of a joiner, except for a handful of fun volunteer jobs. Oddly enough, even though I'm writing for an international audience, I've never been a publicity hound. Miss Manners once said that a lady's name appears in the newspaper only three times throughout her life – upon her birth, her wedding and her death, and I once aspired to that level of taste and class. Then I stumbled into the Manosphere, and for the first time in my forty-nine years, I am an activist. Not a dignified and subtle advocate, not a sympathetic supporter and occasional donor, cheering politely from the sidelines, but an activist. A friggin' Reformer. And I love it! My age might have something to do with my changed attitude, what with the sudden lack of estrogen in my life, and I will gladly take this as the upside to the sudden necessity for hyper-vigilance with a magnifying mirror and a pair of tweezers. (TMI? Sorry.)

Most of my work at AVfM has been done quietly, behind the scenes, and somewhat independently, and I think I'd like to keep it that way. One of my primary contributions is to "raise awareness" via mail campaigns. I gladly participate in the organized lobbying of politicians, judges and policy makers, but I also reach out to ordinary citizens – those who are not already deeply entrenched in the political system. I send hundreds of emails to geographically targeted not-quite-random strangers. Many of those emails, coming from an unknown address, are immediately deleted, but many are not. People are curious. They see familiar names, they speculate over photographs, and they click on links. If they know of the parties involved, they may forward these emails to friends and to family. The Voice of A Voice for Men, is "heard" by people who are (like I was) completely unaware of the MHRM. I could use some assistance with this. Thus far I have targeted smallish populations, and I've managed well on my own, but as AVfM publicizes cases in more heavily populated communities, those hundreds of emails can, and should, become thousands of emails. I'm asking for volunteers. Dozens, please, if not hundreds. I won't explain the process here, and I will do everything I can to make it easy and convenient for you, but if you can spare some time to occasionally do a bit of tedious copying, pasting, pointing and clicking, I would be grateful.

Activism that's oriented to specific cases is only a part of what we do here, yet it's the part that most appeals to me. I'm way too old to believe that I have all the answers, but I sure have plenty of questions. I have a spotlight and I know how to use it. I can shine a light on people who prefer to work in the shadows. I can ask questions and I can inspire others to ask the same questions. And to demand answers. I can also offer the sanity of

A Voice for Men to people who no longer even wonder if sanity exists.
If you'd like to make yourself available for these campaigns, please contact me at:
outreach@avoiceformen.com
Suz

Dear colleague, I quit

March 2, 2013 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

---

Dear Colleague,
Due to your recent admission to me that you are an adherent of the ideology of feminism, I regret to inform you that our association as co-workers, colleagues, friends and team-mates is hereby discontinued.
Although it may be the case that you are, individually a well intended, thoughtful, and humane person, your acceptance and defence of feminism signals an undeniable danger to my personal safety, a threat to my career, a danger to family and to my future.
In all likelihood you probably regard my expressed caution as hyperbole or paranoid fantasy. If so, I consider that a good sign that you are rational, albeit misinformed. On the other hand, you might respond outwardly to this letter with open accusations of hyperbole and paranoia, simply for effect, without your own conviction behind such accusation. In either case, this isn't a negotiation, it's a goodbye.
However, what remains is an attempt to explain with as much clarity as possible, the reason.
In feminism's self-descriptive rhetoric, it is touted variously as "equality for women", "the radical notion that women are people" and sometimes as "women's rights". These characterizations portray a benign movement to which no well-adjusted person could object. You may even believe these descriptions to be true. In fact, if we believe these slogans, then objection to, or opposition to feminism must logically be equivalent to hatred of women, or if not hatred, then at least disdain for women's basic human rights. They are very powerful slogans. Unfortunately, they are not true.
What feminism says it is through self-descriptive rhetoric, and what it demonstrates through organized action are two entirely different things.
Assuming for now that you are, or believe yourself to be a decent and good person; you likely see feminism through the lens of that ideology's common description. This is understandable and logical. You both identify as a feminist, and are in the sexual demographic for which feminism claims to care.
I, on the other hand, am not in the demographic for which feminism claims to advocate, and so quite naturally I see it from another angle. Obviously, I am familiar with the ideology's self-descriptive language. How could I not be? I grew up, as you did, submerged in a culture of feminism. My mother was part of the second wave, and I was fed the talking points from infancy onward. Please don't delude yourself that I am somehow ignorant of the details, or that I operate from incomplete understanding. I was raised by a feminist to be a feminist and it was not until late in my life I discarded much of my lifetime's accumulated feminist point of view.
But as I mentioned, I'm male, and therefore, not an insider to feminism's rhetoric. Having had the rhetoric drilled into me, I do not need to be told what feminism says about itself. However, remembering I'm male, I also have the view from outside the fence. What feminists and their organizations DO turns out to run in a wholly different direction than what the self-descriptive language says. What feminism says it is, and what it demonstrates that it is, are entirely contradictory.

What consistent elements have I seen in feminism's organized actions, running against the self descriptive claims made in feminist rhetoric?
Censorship, intimidation, personal smear campaigns, purposeful false accusation, threats of violence, threats of death, actual violence, organized in-person stalking, vandalism, extortion, systematic academic fraud, calumny, and a consistent thread of hatred. That's what I have seen in overwhelming proportion vastly overshadowing the rhetoric which claims "feminism is about equality".
I began my list with censorship, and I could have stopped there. What is it about "equal rights for women" or any other self-descriptive feminist talking point that leads to an urge to silence and suppress any disagreeing opinion? The censorship is real, pervasive, and when resisted, violent. Picture a mob of 20, armed with box-cutters to stop one man with a human rights poster. Or better yet, imagine an esteemed scholar giving a talk at a university about something as socially relevant as suicide rates and educational problems, yet having attendees harassed and intimidated, trying to enter that talk through doors blocked by thugs, all because individuals identifying as feminist did not like the speaker.
In answer to my own question, there is no relationship between censorship and "women's rights". Censorship, whether practiced by feminists, or by the state police of a brutal and dictatorial regime is driven by totalitarian impulse, as well as fear and hatred.
[quote]It is not just the right of the person who speaks to be heard, it is the right of everyone in the audience to listen and to hear; and every time you silence somebody, you make yourself a prisoner of your own action. You deny yourself the right to hear something. In other words your own right to hear and be exposed is as much involved in all these cases as the right of the other to voice his or her view. ~Christopher Hitchens.[/quote]
But setting aside the organized actions of feminism, as well as the self-description, there is also at the heart of that ideology, a short list of claims about the world.
The first is patriarchy. According to feminist theory, patriarchy is a system of power that organizes society into a complex of relationships based on male supremacy and oppression of women. This "theory" does not explain how almost all war dead through history have been men, or how workplace safety throughout the world emphasizes female safety to the near exclusion of protection for men. 93% of workplace fatalities are male, and it is historically not until women colonize a trade or a profession that safety becomes a major concern. Women also spend 80% of disposable income world-wide, comprise the majority of the voting public in democratic nations, and continue to enjoy female favouring affirmative acton in education, despite a growing 65% dominance in educational outcomes in higher ed. So setting aside the blatant, overt, glaring falsehood of such theory, it also assumes or implies that the vast majority of men are sociopaths, by virtue of being male.
That I am not a sociopath does not make me "one of the good ones". My non-sociopathy is normal, and the "theory" implying all or most men are basically evil is itself, vile bigotry which has, over 40 years, exhausted my forbearance.

Another claim about the world is rape culture. This is the dogmatic insistence that our culture endorses, or promotes, or enables the violent crime of rape, committed against women, by men.
Rape culture is certainly real. But it is not a phenomenon of male-on-female rape enablement, it is real in the sense of being a political and social narrative kept alive by it's proponents. Rape culture is an item of popularized social belief. The phrase, by the way is a retooling of the second wave feminist rhetoric "all men are rapists". That item of popular agitprop being no longer acceptable to utter in public, big box feminism has re-phrased several times in the past few decades, keeping the message alive with a better politicized delivery. "Men can stop rape," and "Rape culture" are two such examples.
"Teach men to not rape" is a slogan appearing on hundreds of posters carried in the public parades, called Slut Walks, emerging around the world since 2011.
"Teach men to not rape," implying that men, without instruction are rapists by default. Nothing from any history of hatred or bigotry is the equal of this message in sheer malice. Secondary to that most overt message of hatred is the implication that rape and sexual assault are exclusively or even mostly male perpetrated. Without a distracting meander into cited example, it's not. The still popular advent of Slut Walks in cities around the world are unambiguously hate rallies. If you've participated in these hate rallies, shame is the appropriate emotion for you to feel on reflection.
And that's why your recent expression of support for that ideology requires my departure. I cannot pretend feminism is anything less offensive, destructive or malevolent than an organized, purposeful and depraved cult of violence and hatred. And you claim to support it. That it is publicly accepted, supported by politicians, and mainstream makes no difference at all. You are an adult, you have no excuse.
Now what I've described is overt hatred. But as a self-professed feminist, you may claim to support no violence, advocate no hatred, and you might believe yourself to be a kind, loving human with none of the malice I have just described.
Aside from the aspect of patriarchy theory implicit claiming all men are sociopaths is the victimhood of all women. The attachment of innate victimhood to female identity excepts women from accountability for any violence, overt or otherwise. The killing of children is excused. The killing of men is excused. The brutalization of men is comedy. The sexual mutilation of a man by his wife is the punchline of a joke on daytime TV. You are a self described feminist, and as such, I know you will not recognize my humanity if I am anything except a convenient utility to you. When I cease to be of use, I will become invisible as a human, and my pain, or my damage, irrelevant, or perhaps funny.
In receipt of this notice, you may decide that rather than the truth, carefully and clearly expressed herewith, my reason and motivation is other than what has just been expressed. I hate women, you might decide. If that, or some variation should be your conclusion, shame on you. Shame on you for cowardice, dishonesty and solipsism. Shame on you. And goodbye.

University of North Carolina and misandry

March 3, 2013 | by Michael Sharron | Link | Original Link

In researching the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill alleged rape case of Landen Gambill, I came across a Youtube video from student journalist at Carolina Week which was released on February 27 of 2013. While subtle, it clearly shows how Misandry in education and at the University of North Carolina rears it's ugly head. In the video below, we are interested in only the beginning lasting 2 minutes and 47 seconds.
As shown, the opening 2 minutes and 10 seconds is devoted to an alleged female rape victim who as of this writing has yet to provide any evidence of a rape to university officials or local police and is actually being admonished for her intimidating conduct on the accused after the university found that no rape had occurred. Additionally, Carolina Week went out of it's way to note several rallies that are taking place in her honor. At the 2 minute and 17 second mark, we hear about a dead male student who died of suspicious causes. And finally, at the 2 minute and 32 second mark we learn about the death of a female student in which a local well known award winning band is doing everything to keep her memory alive.
Further commentary from A Voice For Men continues below this video.
While subtle, this video from University of North Carolina student journalist clearly outlines bias and Misandry in how the university and students approach issues on campus as it relates to men.
For female students, we get rallies and bands honoring their memories.
For male students, we get nothing.
So in honor of the young man who was found dead recently at UNC of suspicious causes, A voice for Men wants to do what apparently the University of North Carolina student journalist refuses to do — extend a hand of sympathy to friends and family of Stedman Gage. We also express our dismay that the the gender ideologues at UNC barely saw fit to mention his untimely passing.
Of course, we must get back to what is important here, because the DEATH of a male student around suspicious causes (as in yet to be determined) pales in comparison to a unsubstantiated rape of a female (as in determined) who has decided to make her case on the global Internet and surround herself with feminists at UNC instead of working with law enforcement.
Perhaps, but not at A Voice For Men.
[image]

University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill: A Voice For Men Is Watching For Further Bias and Misandry

In honor of men at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill who do not get afforded the opportunity to have rallies upon their death, A Voice For Men is calling for University Officials to immediately fund a council that researches the history of men and Misandry

(and yes, we do mean in a positive light), as well as providing a course in Men's Studies for students. Of course, this is being asked for in the name of equality for which feminist have asked for going on many decades now.
Second, A Voice For Men, given that the University of North Carolina has identified and found that a male student is being harassed and intimidated by a female student who is calling him a rapist on campus, feels that it is appropriate that the University consult with their attorney and consider having University police arrest Ms. Gambill on Domestic Violence charges given their past domestic involvement. If UNC is not aware of the definition of Domestic Violence as outlined by the NC Bar Association, we will be happy to provide them with said pamphlet that clearly outlines harassment as Domestic Violence. Also, the University should review federal VAWA legislation in help with guidance in this matter.
Third, A Voice For Men is asking that the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill work with us in filing a federal Title IX action against Ms. Gambill in the name of men and boys (future students who may be harassed on campus) so that they can be free from being intimidated and called rapists for no reason.
A Voice For Men is asking that the University of North Carolina Women's Studies program invite Dr. Warren Farrell to give a talk on the failure of young boys to launch so that women can help their young sons navigate these troubled waters. Additionally, we ask that the University provide ample security for Dr. Farrell and attendants to this lecture as in the past another university has attempted to stifle Dr Farrell's free speech using violence and derogatory assembly. Lastly, we ask that Women's Studies denounce Misandry publicly as this is a cause of great concern for women who have Fathers, Husbands, Brothers, and Sons.
A Voice For Men is asking the University of North Carolina Women's Studies professors to consult University administrators about the possibility of the Women's basketball team in wearing patches during it's next season to honor in prostate cancer research which affects so many Women's fathers, brothers, sons, and friends.
A Voice For Men is asking that the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill begin to institute a program that calls for 8 hours of counseling for all female students who engage in sexual intercourse with men who have had more than two drinks, even if they provide consent. In cases where women continue to engage in sexual activity with men who have had two or more alcoholic drinks after counseling, we ask that you refer the matter to Chapel Hill police for a possible rape investigation.
A Voice For Men asks that Joanne Hershfield, Program Chair for Women's Studies at the University of North Carolina, contact Paul Elam, Dean of Student Affairs at FTSU, and begin collaboration on further advances in gender equality between men and women at the University.
A Voice For Men is asking Joanne Hershfield and the Women's Studies program at UNC to pilot a program in the North Carolina legislature that studies the effectiveness of equally shared parenting after a divorce so that children will have the benefit of both parents and we can end the systematic gender inequality that exists for men in the family courts. However, equally important, this will allow NC children to also have shared access to their grandmothers, female siblings, step-mothers, and aunts that provide so much for children as equal extended family members instead of visitors.

In regards to the Violence Against Womens Act (VAWA), we surmise that Joanne Hershfield and other professors in the Women's Studies program at UNC are aligned with A Voice For Men as it relates to the recent reauthorization of VAWA. In the essence of gender equality, we ask Ms. Hershfield to contact Paul Elam so that we can work together in a more reasonable approach to Domestic Violence that is evidenced based and free of gender ideology. We feel sure that Joanne Hershfield has spent several sleeplessness nights lately fretting over the fact that if the roles were reversed in the Landen Gambill case and he was engaging in slander and liable of her on the public Internet, he would have been imprisoned while she isn't.

Furthermore, the Landen Gambill case, Jodi Arias case, and Crystal Mangum (Duke Lacross) outlines the need to remove the stigmatization of men in that they are the only gender capable of serious bodily injury, murder, and intimidation in domestic relationships. This of course, needs to be done in the vein of gender equality for which the ladies at the University of North Carolina Women's Studies program has worked so hard for the past century.

Also, A Voice For Men asks that Joanne Hershfield publicly assure Women who have Sons that the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill will not tolerate Women who accuse their sons of rape when they have no evidence of it, and speak out on rallies that enable this type of behavior.

Of course, readers of A Voice For Men are encouraged to contact Joanne Hershfield directly using her email address hershfld@email.unc.edu and share this article with her in an effort to start this dialogue.

And, as always, A Voice For Men invites University of North Carolina Male students and the Women who love them to extensively share this article with others using the popular social media sites like Facebook and Twitter to help spread the message of Misandry in public education.

In an effort to continue this dialogue, using the comment section below, we would love to hear from Fathers and Mothers who may be concerned about sending their Sons to the University of North Carolina for fear that women will use the global Internet to call them rapist even when law enforcement and the University has found no evidence of rape, and who will refuse to honor your sons in the event of their untimely death while at school while women are afforded this.

It's not the laziness – It's the sanity

March 3, 2013 | by August Løvenskiolds | Link | Original Link

---

Andy Thomas (AndyMan) had a post up recently entitled "Introducing Kelly Jones and 'Wise Misogyny'", Ms Jones being a fascinating woman with a soothing voice and some not so soothing, penetrating insights into the general incompetence of women and the general laziness of men in dealing with such snowflakes.
Not only does Ms Jones characterize men as lazy, but she believes this indolence results in misandry:

> Men have permitted women to become morons. It is the lazy man who, himself, is desirous of being as stupid and irrational as he can get away without compromising his survival, who is responsible for misandry to a large part…Men have let themselves into the shit. If they weren't chasing skirt, playing the fool, adoring women's idiotic frivolities and girlish sexual displays, then women would have no hold over them. But lazy men are like dogs—they believe woman is the master.

In addition to Ms. Jones, a new femtroll commenter "Kasey, aka therose202" made a lot of waves with her clueless neoteny and outsized breasts. When the discussion derailed, Ms Jones blamed not Kasey, but rather, the men who were treating her as a rational adult. So, not only are we lazy and deserving of sexual shaming for our normal desires, but we get victim-blamed as well. If Kasey weren't there to underline some of Ms Jones's points, it would have been necessary to invent her.
I tried to respond several times to Ms. Jones's thesis but my comments got caught in the spam filter, so I decided to take one last shot at it and expand my comments into an article for AVfM.
Although Ms. Jones's thesis – that men are behaving irrationally and lazily when they tolerate the incompetence and frivolous nature of women – is certainly intriguing, I believe it paints an incomplete picture of the motivations and justifications of men's long tolerance for that crap.
I imagine that someone as skilled at Evolutionary Psychology as Karen Straughan (GirlWritesWhat) might point out that because women can articulate their pains and needs more effectively than the children in their care, men are under evolutionary pressure to heed their demands, however ill-advised those demands might me. A man who ignores his babymomma risks killing his offspring.
Every man who has ever met a woman knows that women are mercurial – their behavior and moods can shift suddenly and unpredictably for reasons that are obscure – although I believe that the notions of shit tests and the camouflage of reproductive capacity can account for a lot of it. A great example of this mercurial nature can be found in the writings of the troll Kasey herself, who wrote on a confession website that:

> My emotions change on a whim. It's ridiculous…I can be chatting > happily with someone one moment, and then something could set a spark off in me that a normal person would ignore, but that starts a raging inferno of anger and disgust in me. It bloody sucks. Oh well, I guess it could be worse……

Men's resources are limited and wasting them on a futile task is not only pointless but it short-changes more worthy and productive applications. Building the 5,000th nuclear missile that you will never use is a waste of money and titanium that would be better spent on, say, pens, commercial transportation, medical devices…
Thus, diverting limited mental and physical resources to the dubious task of trying to make women semi-competent is silly and wasteful. The supposed laziness of men has nothing to do with it.
Men also recognize that women are vindictively vengeful when slighted, and that rejecting women's sexual advances, ignoring their attention-whoring, or calling them out on their idiocy can trigger their wrath. A principled concern for the well-being of self and loved ones also motivates men – men learn quickly that if you piss women off, even inadvertently, they will recruit other men to beat the shit out of you. This is the unlimited proxy violence that young, stupid, and pretty women have had at their disposal 24/7 since the dawn of human history – and I can prove it.
Over 4000 years ago, in the oldest surviving piece of human literature, "The Epic of Gilgamesh", Gilgamesh ("Gil") refuses the sexual/marital advances of the woman/goddess Ishtar, because Gil is disgusted and perhaps even fearful of Ishtar's brutality to other men. Ishtar recognizes the truth and justice in Gil's charges but she nevertheless enlists her father's help to seek vengeance on Gil. As a result, many suffer and die, including Gil's beloved friend Enkidu.
As a man, if you don't learn to walk on eggshells when the harpy starts waving her "guns" (proxy male defenders) around, you are as doomed today as you were in ancient Mesopotamia.
Just ask the gentle, loving Kasey herself:

> I occasionally like to fantasise [sic] about how I would murder people I despise (especially cheaters). Is this bad? There've been some pretty messed up thoughts…like in one, I imagined throwing them into a plane engine like that one guy in lost…in another I imagined stabbing them multiple times in places that would kill them slowly…

Characterizing men's understanding of these real and potent threats as "lazy" is a stunning intellectual blindness that can only be characterized as, um, Dumb? Shortsighted? Sloppy? Suicidal?
I do so hope Ms Jones can look past these mean-spirited, judgmental terms to see the deeper truth they reveal. "Men" don't decide things – a man does, and then another and another, one at a time. Outside of the M(H)RM, it is rare for men to discuss their fears and concerns in any open fashion – and when we dare to broach these subjects, we often get hammered for it. We just don't share and bond in that way like women do, and projecting the women’s hen party group think onto men is ludicrous as patriarchy theory.

Now, having ripped away at them, I do hope we hear more from Ms Jones and a lot less from the violent neophyte Kasey. Oh, and for you younger, lustier guys – Kasey sleeps with her shy twin sister. And shame on you, or whatever.

Note to Julia Gillard: not all voters are like that

March 3, 2013 | by Jim Muldoon | Link | Original Link

Julia Gillard may be reaching the bottom of her deck of misogyny cards.

In an editorial entitled "Misogyny attack misses mark", The Australian pointed out the dismal failure of Julia Gillard's famous tirade on misogyny in the Australian Parliament last year (The Australian, 2013). The petulant outburst from Gillard seemed to happen because she was insulted that the Opposition Leader, Tony Abbott, should out-feminist her. Abbott was accusing the then Speaker of the House of misogyny, and she wasn't going to let him be women's champion. The resultant tantrum went viral on You Tube (NewsOnABC, 2012).

Gillard 1, Abbott 0 was the score line from Katherine Hepworth (Hepworth, 2012). The headline was "Gillard's misogyny speech looks even better than it reads." Apparently she enjoyed the speech because "Gillard waved both hands, pointed, and even moved her feet."

She loves the sight of multi-tasking in the Parliament: It looks like victory.

And Abbott? Is he a misogynist? Hepworth has him all worked out: "Abbott's facial expression and posture amounted to an open admission of guilt."

Who needs the facts when you've got posture on your side? Could you imagine the court time we could save by getting Hepworth down to the magistrates court? She could just hang around the foyer "Hunched? Guilty; Shifty eyes? Guilty; Waving hands and pointing? Not Guilty." The magistrates would never again miss an afternoon round of golf.

This, with varying degrees of sycophantic idiocy, is a fair representation of most of the mainstream media coverage of "The Misogyny Speech". The Australian ABC News was thrilled that the speech had "gone global" (ABC News, 2012). "Ladylike," said The New Yorker, concluding that Obama could take some lessons from Gillard (Lester, 2012). The Spectator thought Abbott had been "carved to pieces (Massie, 2012)."

However, the Australian female voting public was not won over. "Galaxy poll shows female voters choose Tony Abbott," was the recent headline in the Telegraph, explaining that only 1 in 4 women believe that Abbott is a misogynist (Maiden, 2013). Despite concerns about his views on abortion and his perceived negativity, female voters are preferring Abbott to Gillard personally; and the Liberal/National Coalition to Labor overall (Galaxy Research, 2013).

So much so that Janet Albrechtsen of the Australian felt she should start writing the Labor government's obituary this week (Albrechtsen, 2013). In her "Biggest Losers" listing Albrechtsen names "the misogyny maidens", namely Tanya Plibersek, Nicola Roxon, Penny Wong, Jenny Macklin and Gillard as one collective of losers. Albrechtsen states, "Nothing is more certain to offend Australians than the finger-wagging culture of these trendy inner-city MPs," and blames them for "bringing Labor to its electoral knees." Albrechtsen pulls no punches for the feminists, "The damage they have done to the Labor brand will likely last much longer than their own short time in government."

The damage to the Labor brand is probably best understood in the context of the recent announcement by Jenny Macklin to move single-parents from the Single Parent Pension to the Newstart Allowance.
For those not familiar with this newspeak, in practice it means that single-mothers whose youngest is older than seven will lose some government benefits and will have to find a job (Akerman & Milanda, 2013).
Yes, the flagship of feminism, those doing "the toughest job in the world" (Winfrey, 2010), are having their entitlements cut and being told to get a real job.
Why? Macklin, sounding like someone from the conservative side of politics, claimed it was to encourage the mums to "show their children a strong work ethic" (Akerman & Milanda, 2013).
The real reason for this cut to government spending, of course, was the policy failures were driving the federal budget further into deficit and the Gillard government was turning desperately to cut spending wherever it could.
In a bizarre effort of rationalisation and justification, Macklin, who apparently has an income of $6321 a week, was claiming she could live on the Newstart allowance of $246 a week (Harrison, 2013). After the next election she just might have to try.
What does this mean for the MHRM?
Let me get this out of the way, just to be clear. I am not suggesting for one second that the election of Tony Abbott or a Liberal/National coalition government will bring any meaningful change. Team Red is misandric. Team Blue is misandric. This is because Big Government is run by Big Bureacracy, which thrives on this bigotry. Abbott will not clean up the Family Courts and the National Plan will go on unabated.
Now, let's get back to what it means for the MHRM.
Gillard's government has more problems than those that can be attributed directly to feminist influenced policies. But, the lack of intellectual rigour that so often dogs post-modernists has meant that policies that appealed to the Gillard government on ideological grounds, and this includes those championed by the "misogyny maidens", fell apart when it came to their implementation. In other words, reality decided it was FTSU time.
More importantly, when the polls reflected their performance, they sought to hide behind the victim card. Since February last year, the cry has been that the criticisms of Gillard are sexist and she should be left alone to lead the country (Wright, 2012).
Since that time until (this really needs some DAHN, DAHN, DAAAAHHHHN music) "The Misogyny Speech", we should have been so proud that we had our first woman Prime Minister that it really shouldn't matter how bad a job she, or her government, was doing. This tactic has clearly failed. Equality means that when you get the top job, not only do you get the top job salary and the top job perks; you also get the top job criticism when you screw it up.
In some ways "The Misogyny Speech" was like jumping the shark (google it if you don't know what I mean). There was nowhere to go after it. After the speech, when Abbott was not lynched for his "misogynist" demeanour, the only way was down.

But more than this, when things got even uglier, the feminists were only too eager to turn on their own in order to save their cushy jobs. Their cause celebre, the single-mother's welfare, got the chop while the bureaucrats are still raking it in.
So, the MHRM can now point to real examples of feminism in action. Not only is the rationale screwy, but when put into practice it fails as predicted. And, their hand-wringing compassion is as sincere as Gillard's promise that there would be no carbon tax.
But there is even more to take heart from. Gillard and her "misogyny maidens" have done more than previous feminists in taking their agenda to the public. Previously, feminists have been working in the back rooms of power. They've won over the policy makers behind closed doors with the threat of bringing "the women's vote" against those who dared to cross them.
Now, in Australia at least, that threat will seem somewhat empty. The truth is that women are a world away from lock-step agreement with everything that comes out of their mouths.
Even more significant, I believe, is the fact that the voting public did not buy "The Misogyny Speech". We often tend to see our case as practically impossible due to the inherent nature of human beings.
Yes, there are automatic reactions to defend women even when they are wrong. Yes, there are instinctive reactions to female tears which see women receive lower sentences, more government subsidies, and the like.
But, when examined under the spotlight, most people recognise that those instincts can be manipulated for evil purposes. Instincts are just initial reactions, and not carefully considered opinions.
This means that as the MHRM puts its message out, the cries of misogyny will be seen for what it is: a self-serving covering up for their lies.
Our message can be judged on its merits, if we can make it loud enough to be heard over their wailing.

Bibliography

ABC News. (2012, October 11). Gillard's misogyny speech goes global. Retrieved March 1, 2013, from ABC News: http://www.abc.net.au/news/2012-10-10/international-reaction-to-gillard-speech/4305294

Akerman, P., & Milanda, R. (2013, January 1). Find a job, Jenny Macklin tells single parents whose benefits are being slashed . Retrieved February 28, 2013, from The Australian: http://www.theaustralian.com.au/national-affairs/cuts-to-single-parent-benefits-begin-to-bite/story-fn59niix-1226546037334

Albrechtsen, J. (2013, February 27). Labor's biggest losers should take a bow. Retrieved February 27, 2013, from The Australian: http://www.theaustralian.com.au/opinion/columnists/labors-biggest-losers-should-take-a-bow/story-e6frg7bo-1226586352801

Davies, L. (2012, October 17). Julia Gillard speech prompts dictionary to change

'misogyny' definition. Retrieved February 28, 2013, from The Guardian: http://www.guardian.co.uk/world/2012/oct/17/julia-gillard-australia-misogyny-dictionary
Galaxy Research. (2013, February 13-15). WOMEN SUPPORTING LIBERALS, DESPITE CONCERNS ABOUT TONY ABBOTT. Retrieved February 27, 2013, from Galaxy Research: http://www.galaxyresearch.com.au/13-15-february-2013/
Harrison, D. (2013, January 2). I could live on Newstart: Macklin. Retrieved February 28, 2013, from The Sydney Morning Herald: http://www.smh.com.au/opinion/political-news/i-could-live-on-newstart-macklin-20130101-2c485.html
Hepworth, K. (2012, October 14). Gillard's misogyny speech looks even better than it reads. Retrieved February 27, 2013, from The Conversation: http://theconversation.edu.au/gillards-misogyny-speech-looks-even-better-than-it-reads-10111
Lester, A. (2012, October 9). Ladylike: Julia Gillard's Miisogyny Speech. Retrieved March 1, 2013, from The New Yorker: http://www.newyorker.com/online/blogs/newsdesk/2012/10/julia-gillards-misogyny-speech.html
Maiden, S. (2013, February 17). Galaxy poll shows female voters choose Tony Abbott . Retrieved February 27, 2013, from The Telegraph: http://www.dailytelegraph.com.au/news/national/galaxy-poll-shows-female-voters-choose-tony-abbott/story-fndo28a5-1226579510972
Massie, A. (2012, October 9). Retrieved March 1, 2013, from The Spectator: http://blogs.spectator.co.uk/alex-massie/2012/10/julia-gillard-more-than-just-a-mans-bitch/
NewsOnABC (2012, October 8), Retrieved March 1, 2013, from YouTube http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=ihd7ofrwQX0
The Australian. (2013, February 18). Misogyny Attack Misses Mark. Retrieved February 27, 2013, from The Australian: http://www.theaustralian.com.au/opinion/editorials/misogyny-attack-misses-mark/story-e6frg71x-1226579814910
Winfrey, O. (2010, May 1). Thought for Today – Motherhood. Retrieved February 28, 2013, from Oprah: http://www.oprah.com/spirit/Thought-for-Today-Motherhood/31
Wright, J. (2012, February 6). Media attacks on PM 'sexist', says Greens leader. Retrieved February 28, 2013, from The Sydney Morninig Herald: http://www.smh.com.au/opinion/political-news/media-attacks-on-pm-sexist-says-greens-leader-20120206-1r0oh.html

Rape hysteria crisis at the University of Montana

March 4, 2013 | by NCFM | Link | Original Link

The University of Montana has become an epicenter of rape hysteria and now, men's activism

The Department of Education issued its revised sexual assault mandates on April 4, 2011, instantly removing the presumption of innocence for male students accused of sexual assault, subjecting men around the country to unwarranted hearings. In one such scenario the Department of Justice entered the quaint mountain town of Missoula, Montana and used the DOE's revised mandates to convert the "safest campus in the nation" to the "rape capital of the world", seemingly overnight. Recent Federal legislation has made this a terrifying reality for all men and boys, everywhere in the nation for years to come.

Less than one year after the sexual assault mandate was issued the DOJ used the lowered standard of evidence to "find" 80 sexual assaults had occurred on the University of Montana campus, effectively creating a "rape prone culture." The ensuing hysteria removed numerous officials of the once prominent Griz Nation, as well as a number of targeted star players. One such player accepted a plea bargain to escape jury proceedings; but a young quarterback and his family were willing to risk everything to defend his innocence. Across the state, another student of the Montana University System began to counter the attempt to create a rape community at Montana State University.

Finding it strange that 80 sexual assaults were suddenly discovered on the University of Montana campus, Christopher J. Thompson began to ask questions of numerous University officials and, devoid any significant answers, he began the National Coalition For Men-Montana State, a men's organization formed to help protect and guide college men through this precarious situation. Planning to represent NCFM-Montana State for the Tunnel of Oppression exhibit recently, Thompson began browsing through information posted outside the tuition funded Women's Center and was startled to find Jackson Katz's "10 Things Men Can Do To Stop Rape".

Katz's instructions begin by telling students to:

> View men not only as perpetrators or possible offenders, but as empowered bystanders who can confront abusive peers.

Thompson began asking why it was acceptable to assume all men are "perpetrators or possible offenders" and the MSU Womens Center, Men Stopping Rape, and VOICE Center responded in their Tunnel of Oppression exhibit by altering it to say they are working to "clarify myths and misperceptions that 'all men are potential rapists' by stating that most men are NOT rapists."

Discovering the change, Thompson approached the aforementioned organizations to find the discussion he had been having deleted in its entirety, replaced with the usual diatribe that "false reports are rare," continuing that possibly 2-10% of sexual assaults reported are false.

In Missoula these ideas had been forced on all students attending University of Montana by the PETSA videos recently implemented, which state: "MYTH: People lie about sexual assault…FACT: The vast majority of sexual assault reports are true".

The Missoula Police Department policy manual reinforces this idea by ordering "every sex crime investigation is to be initiated with the belief it is true until evidence demonstrates otherwise."

This devastation was realized in the case against accused University of Montana quarterback, Jordan Johnson. Missoula County District Court judge Karen Townsend denied a defense motion to dismiss the case, stating that the accused is not entitled to a presumption of innocence while a rape investigation is going on:

> It is not until the time of trial that the defendant is guaranteed a right to a fair trial and is entitled to the presumption of innocence.

Thankfully, Johnson has been found innocent, and the pain his father can only describe as watching the death of his son is over. In a terrifying turn of events, however, the flawed sexual assault policies implemented on campus that gave way to this chaos have worked their way into the Violence Against Women Act and are now positioned to impact everyone burdened by the Y chromosome. If you are one of these "endowed" individuals, or know someone who is, your fundamental rights are being eroded.

Hang on, its going to be a wild ride, or join the National Coalition For Men to help enact changes to protect innocent men.

Publisher's note: Christopher J. Thompson is Campus Ambassador for the National Coalition For Men. He is leading a work group to identify other campuses suitable for an NCFM campus chapter. If you are a student at a university and interested in helping establish such a chapter please contact Chris a chris@aggrandized.com.

AVFM will be working officially with NCFM to support efforts to establish anti-misandric men's organizations in universities throughout western culture. The time for grass roots organization has arrived, and universities are the place where it must happen. "Hang on" is right. Better yet, buckle up.

For the University of Toronto Student Union

March 4, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

To the members of the University of Toronto Student Union

As I am sure you are already aware, in three days there will be a speaking event at University of Toronto, presented by Dr. Janice Fiamengo. The topic of this lecture, as you are also undoubtedly aware, is "What's Wrong with Women's Studies? Academic Feminism, Censorship & Men"

The bold text in "censorship" is mine. I thought it particularly appropriate given the conduct of the University of Toronto Student Union the last time an academician came there to address an area of study that did not meet your approval.

To refresh your memory, the speaker was Dr. Warren Farrell, and the subject was the Boy Crisis, in part an exploration of male suicide, failure to launch and video game addiction.

This is you, outside the lecture hall.

Also, as you may recall, this website took on the very important task of identifying those that we could who participated in the censorship, bullying, harassment, vandalism and violence that the University of Toronto Student Union fostered and displaying them for the world to see.

As you have been very quick to tell as many people who will listen, the results for some of those following your hateful lead was not quite what they expected.

Rather than the University of Toronto Student Union learning an immediate lesson from your folly, you attempted to take whatever additional retributive action you could, condemning this site for exposing your hatred, and even going as far as attempting to have us shut down — spreading a lot of lies in the process.

Well, it appears none of that worked out as you planned, either. A Voice for Men is still here, and thanks to the University of Toronto Student Union's failed attempts to censor us, as well as Dr. Farrell, we are more robust and active than ever. And now, you have an even more contentious presentation on the way – as well as our new AVFM Ontario news team, which will be there to cover you as much as the lecture itself.

It is our intention at AVFM to attempt to assist the University of Toronto Student Union this time with some obviously needed advice on your conduct for the upcoming event. Of course this is being offered with the unfortunate understanding that you are incapable of reconsidering your hatred for men and boys, and your desire to harm those with whom you disagree.

First, DO NOT block doors. To understand this fully, just ask yourselves what your personal reaction is to being told you can't go somewhere or listen to someone. I am sure if you think about it you will see that your efforts to block doors not only resulted in significant negative international attention, it also prompted many peoples curiosity about the information you did not want them to see.

Poor strategy on your part.

Next, if you are going to vandalize property by tearing down legally posted notices for an event, you might want to tell the morons doing it not to brag about it on Twitter. Well, not unless you want to see their names in headlines here.

Just saying.
Also, if you insist on having people out there to harass and intimidate attendees just for showing up, try not to pick on someone who is there trying to get help understanding why they lost two friends to suicide. Not only does this make you look like insensitive, immoral scumbags, it inspires people to do the opposite of what you want them to do, which is to believe that you have any reason whatsoever to be protesting anything to begin with.
Finally, it is very important to remember that your first attempt to make the world take a dim view of men's human rights, it was you that ended up with the world ready to scrutinize you and your actions much more than men's advocates.
We suggest that the University of Toronto Student Union consider some very docile, respectful, unfeminist like behavior this time around; that you demonstrate to the world you have learned your place in the changes that are happening right in your own yard, which is on the sidelines, watching.
Or, you can continue to help us by giving the world another sterling demonstration of the very problems for which Dr. Fiamengo will no doubt be excoriating your ilk in her lecture, especially as her idea to speak at your school was directly inspired by your actions that day in November.
Oh, and speaking of inspiration, so was another university group dedicated to men's issues.
University of Toronto Student Union, it is time for you to just shut up, get out of the way and let other people share ideas whether you like them or not.
Of course, it is up to you. You live in a free country as long as people like you are not running it. But whatever you choose to do, you might want to consider what happened the last time you had a bright idea.
And last November, we were not even prepared for anything to happen.
You can bet we are now.

Stick 'em up!

March 4, 2013 | by Robert Sides | Link | Original Link

Here's another easy way to feel good while poking fembotulism's hairy eyeball. Just keep a few stickers on your person and when the opportunity presents itself, strike. This could mean putting a sticker on a..
…feminist poster.
…flyer (indoors or outside).
…bulletin-board in the campus "women's center."
…brochure in an unemployment office.
…snail-mail letter (you never know who will see it!).
…space above a urinal or restroom stall door.
…mailbox.
…telephone pole.
…public trash barrel.
…grocery store display, can, box, fruit, etc.
And so on.
It might be wise to get permission first in some cases. In others, not so much.
Perhaps others can suggest further places to target in the Comments section below.
In any case, in addition to using current AVFM labels, you can make your own using Avery Labels:
*http://www.avery.com/avery/en_us/Promos/Avery-Labels-Promotion.*htm or maybe order some via online services like Vistaprint:
http://tinyurl.com/b9r8ync
You could print on regular paper, hand-cut them into squares, and use scotch tape…but pre-cut self-adhesive ones make it easier to "hit-and-run."
I created some decades ago using return-labels advertised in Sunday papers. They were small, made to stick on old-style envelopes (perhaps they still exist). The first shows them together at relative real-life size:
https://skydrive.live.com/redir?resid=5C34944B14836654!190&authkey=!ADyABRFdQ9bhDyA
The following are magnified a bit to make them more readable for you:
https://skydrive.live.com/redir?resid=5C34944B14836654!191&authkey=!AJi4F9h9e82GJzc https://skydrive.live.com/redir?resid=5C34944B14836654!192&authkey=!AG0Fd5L2Kc5pyRA https://skydrive.live.com/redir?resid=5C34944B14836654!193&authkey=!AODljsRv9F_Hvug https://skydrive.live.com/redir?resid=5C34944B14836654!194&authkey=!APqz2_KezN_LaLE
Now, instead of just listing AVFM and its URL, why not ask an intriguing question, too…like:

What's a "White Knight"?
Find out at www.AVoiceForMen.com

Or try different lines, perhaps more than one on a sticker:

Blue pill or red?
Sick with feminist flu? The cure is AVFM!
What power do men have that women don't?

Of course, bigger stickers can have more words:

Women can vote. Unlike men, they have no duty to defend that right.
Tired of such feminist double-standards?

or

A female teacher has sex with her male student. He's considered "lucky."
A male teacher has sex with his female student. She's considered raped.
Tired of feminist "equality"?

The point is to keep it simple: tweak interest and offer a website address for more information.

Who knows, maybe AVFM stickers can become the new "Kilroy was here!" in the Gender War:

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kilroy_was_here

Ryerson students form men's issues group

March 4, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Ryerson University Students to launch men's issues group in response to U of T protest against Warren Farrell.

"When protesters paraded into a University of Toronto lecture hall where Dr. Warren Farrell was hosting a Men's Issues Awareness event last December, Sarah Santhosh didn't see a peaceful protest: she saw "closemindedness" and "lots of hate.""

So starts a short article at theeyeopener.com, written by Olivia McLeod.

In a near perfect example of what appears to be an approaching cultural tipping point, blowback from the hateful activities of gender ideologues at the University of Toronto has resulted in the formation of another men's issues group at a major university in the Toronto area. This time, it is at Ryerson University, host to Canada's largest undergraduate business school. Sarah Santhosh, who started the group, has temporarily dubbed it "The Ryerson Association for Equality," and is seeking ratification for the group at the Ryerson Students Union. (RSU)

I admit I had a slight twinge of concern when first reading what Santhosh had to say about the RSU group's focus, which was, "mental health, male youth violence, misogyny, as well as gender disadvantages in education, the workplace and custody battles."

In the comments to the article, though, she made a clarification that was settling.

> I misspoke when I listed the issues the group will be addressing. Since this is a group that will be focused on men's and boys' issues we will not be discussing misogyny but misandry instead. I apologize for any misunderstanding this may have caused.

Apology accepted.

And this is where it gets even more interesting. I noted in the article that the names of the other two executive members of the group were Argir Argirov and Anjana Rao. Being culturally ignorant on these names I had to do some research to see if I could determine whether they were male or female. It appears that Anjana is a female name, and I was unable to make a determination on Argir.

So it appears that at least two of the three executive officers are female.

Given that there has been much discussion in the MHRM over the years about the practicality and efficacy of women playing key roles in men's advocacy, it would appear that RSU will serve as a test tube to that effect.

Naturally, from the editorial position of AVFM, an organization that takes the sex blind approach to advocacy, we will support the Ryerson Association for Equality until given a reason to not support it; exactly the same position we take on organizations headed by men.

But of course, the first order of business is to see whether the school will allow the group to form. RSU has a fairly rigorous approval process, and there has already been the predicable male privilege card played by a vice president for “equity.”

> Would it make sense to make a straight people center or an able body equity group?

This question was a vacuous stroke from Marwa Hamad, who is apparently unaware that men are a minority at Ryerson University, or, indeed, that the identification of any group says absolutely nothing about whether they have serious under addressed issues.
So, at RSU there is a little bit of UTSU already raring to go. Did we say that 2013 was going to be an interesting year?
I would like to invite AVFM readers to visit the article linked above and offer some words of encouragement on the formation of this new men’s issues group.
Addendum and correction: In this and a subsequent article on the Ryerson matter, I conflated Ryerson Student Union (RSU) with Ryerson University, which are two separate entities. The efforts to censor the discussion of men’s issues emanate solely from RSU and not Ryerson University. Corrections have been made to the content of this website accordingly, and apologies are extended to Ryerson University. PE

Designer vaginas

March 5, 2013 | by Greg Canning | Link | Original Link

Clementine Ford is renowned for her inability to examine complex issues from a broad and sexually inclusive perspective. One, and only one, perspective is allowed, Ford's feminist perspective. Now she has even stooped to direct commentators on her articles to conform to her own bias.

Disclaimer: Clementine would like to acknowledge that the issue of male circumcision is also fraught. She is personally against all forms of cultural sanctioned genital surgery, including male circumcision. However, this article is not about that so she would kindly ask that comments not be derailed. There will be a time in which to discuss male circumcision, but this article is not it.

This disclaimer is appended to a recent article titled the "Large Labia Project" which concerns the increasing trend by adult female human beings from the advanced western economy of Australia, to freely choose to undergo elective cosmetic surgery, to alter the appearance of their external genitalia (Vulva) most commonly the labia minora. This procedure is technically described a vuvoplasty or labioplasty but in common parlance is sometimes incorrectly referred to as "Designer Vagina" surgery.

Far from being a "culturally sanctioned" procedure as Ford maintains Vulvoplasty was until recent years a procedure little known to the lay public used by gynaecologists to repair or refashion congenital or other abnormalities of the vulva. It has come to the public's notice of late because of increasing requests by women whose vulvae are normal to have the procedure preformed for purely aesthetic reasons.

This led to an abuse of Australia's Medicare system, which funds such surgery for therapeutic reasons but not for simple aesthetics. Medicare figures show that 432 women had vulvoplasties in 1999, but by 2011 this number had risen to 1565.

The increase was not due to some sudden increase in vulval pathology and abnormalities, rather as James Cook University Professor, Ajay Rane notes, "mainly young women aged 19 to 24 are having the procedure, which in up to 70% of cases is unnecessary."

Medicare's first response to this data was to reduce the financial rebate for vulvoplasty in an attempt to limit inappropriate use, subsequently a review has been instituted to define more precisely the acceptable use of the procedure and when it should be subsidised at public expense. It is likely that far greater numbers of vulvoplasties are preformed by private unregulated cosmetic clinics and not captured in Medicare data, most if not all of these will be medically unnecessary operations.

Dr Rane sensibly suggests that patients requesting the procedure should view an atlas of normal female genital anatomy, have at least 2 consultations with the doctor and undergo a psychological evaluation prior to being allowed to undergo a medically unnecessary procedure.

One wonders why after more than 50 years of feminist governance and control of the education system by the women who attended consciousness raising and vulva viewing sessions with their ideological sisters, they have not educated their daughters as to what is normal genital appearance?

It is important to note increasing requests for medically unnecessary vulvoplasty is identified as a significant problem with professional bodies, women's groups and government all taking steps to investigate and protect women.
However in line with Fords usual stance against women owning their own shit, she implies the blame for this trend should be placed firmly at the feet of men, who through their patriarchal power and privilege use the beauty and pornography industries to socially construct ideals of female sexual attractiveness leading to the "sexual packaging of women's bodies as commodities."
It is unclear why ford is not lobbying the female models and porn stars that sell the images of their bodies for commercial gain. After all women could stop the beauty and porn industries by simply refusing to take part.
What ford neglects to address in her article is that the equivalent situation from a male perspective is not circumcision but the burgeoning penile enlargement industry. Anyone who has ever received spam email will be aware that this industry is prolific. It targets vulnerable men with the false message that worldly success is directly related to penile size and they should avail themselves of any of dozens of techniques, natural remedies, devices or surgeries to achieve that end.
This message was apparently behind the recent filicide of a 9-year-old boy by his mother who believed his pre-pubertal penis size doomed him to failure in life.
Penile enlargement surgery is aggressively advertised and promoted. It is often performed in unregulated clinics. Many of the non-surgical therapies are unlicensed. Yet public discourse around this form of genital mutilation or concern for the protecting the vulnerable men who seek it out, if it exists at all, is well hidden.
Searching both the Urological Society of Australia and NZ and the Australian Society of Plastic Surgeon's website for information regarding penile enlargement draws a blank. As with most things when it comes to genitals, women's matter and men's don't. Yet men are just as susceptible to be influenced by societal and media pressure, as are women. Male models in fashion and porn actors are unlikely to be selected on the basis of having average or smaller genitalia. For that matter when was last time you saw a non–buff, under or over weight, male model without a prominent bulge between the legs? How many male characters in roleplaying computer games are portrayed with average body type and not as exaggerated muscle bound hulks? The so-called beauty myth is targeted at both sexes has it base firmly in commerce and consumerism not in gender politics. Both sexes are susceptible to such influence, and deserving of protection from adverse influences and themselves.
The most egregious error in Ford's thesis however is equating Female Genital Mutilation, the genital cutting of non-consenting infant girls by women in other cultures but illegal in Australia, with the aesthetic choices of adult women. Similarly the culturally accepted, legal, and Medicare funded genital mutilation (circumcision) of non-consenting defenseless male neonates has no bearing on her thesis; they are quite simply not comparable issues.
By implying they are comparable Ford has already derailed her own arguments with the typical feminist rhetorical trick of NOT comparing apples with apples. Still, her gullible audience slurps at her swill as though she is the rising star of gender equality, rather than the tired and bitter gender bigot she is.

University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill Department of Men's Studies

March 5, 2013 | by Michael Sharron | Link | Original Link

Welcome to the University of North Carolina UNOFFICIAL Department of Men's Studies program. Chances are, you are totally confused because you are not on the official UNC website and you are not seeing anything related to Men's Studies. In an effort to help clear up any confusion, the University of North Carolina has no Men's Study program, but A Voice For Men would like to offer you a healthy dose of satire and reality in an effort to get you to understand that Universities in NC don't give a shit about you. Well, correction, they do care that you are paying for an education, but as we are about to discover, that education has the opportunity of being cut short in lieu of prison every minute you are on campus.

If you have any questions about our program or studies, we encourage you to talk with our Department Chair Paul Elam. Also, it should be noted that the women over at the Women's Studies department — yes, that group of Women screaming equality, should be able to answer any questions if you have concerns about our meager offices, classrooms, lack of funding, programs, etc…

At the end of this document, we are going to offer a way for you, the alumni of the Men's Studies Program at the University of North Carolina, to help our program prosper for those that follow in your footsteps. Furthermore, we LOVE to hear from mothers of men, sisters of men, friends of men, and children of men who love the men in your life.

Courses offered at the Satirical and Unofficial Men's Studies Program At The University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

- How to avoid being called a rapist and probable domestic violence offender on campus – Professor: Landen Gambill

In this course, you will learn about the new Department of Education and Office of Civil Rights directive known as the "Dear Colleague" letter than allows you to be identified as a rapist without any evidence, witnesses, or complainants going to law enforcement. Additionally, you will learn how your mothers and sisters might be forced to come visit you in prison because of this new directive in that it strips you of "innocent until proven guilty" and adds "preponderance of the evidence" which simply means that all a honor court or Judge needs is %50.01 likelihood that said assault or rape happened.

- Drink Alcohol, Go To Jail (Prerequisite – How to avoid being called a rapist and probable domestic violence offender on campus) Professor: To Be Announced.

In this course, we will expound further into new directives being handed down by the US Department Of Education and being lauded over by the women at the Women's Studies program in that the definition of sexual assault and rape have been lowered in such that if you engage in sexual intercourse with a female who has been drinking, even if it's two beers, you are a rapist because she is unable to provide consent. POP QUIZ: If you have been drinking and a female at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill wants to have sex with you and she has not been drinking, do you have the same protections offered by the Department of Justice lawyers? 1) No 2) No 3) No 4) No

- The History of Men's Health At The University of North Carolina At Chapel Hill – Professors: University of North Carolina Nursing School

In this riveting and controversial course you will learn how the University of North Carolina satirical and unofficial Men's Studies has learned that not one single clinical professor or researcher has any specialty in Men's Health. But, that 27 have specialties in Women's Health. In this class, we will discover new and exciting cutting edge treatments in prostate cancer, testicular cancer, and cardiovascular disease. It's called beg the women at the Women's Studies program for some of their federal money allocated for Women's Health only. Additionally, we will learn how to mourn for your fathers much less early in life than your mothers.

- How To Be a Responsible Carolina Parent – Professors: Carolina Women's Center

So your a proud new dad ready to hit the ground running and be a equal parent? Tough shit! Your job is visitor 4 days a month. As discovered by our professors, the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill does not even mention Fathers on their website, but they do teach the LGBTQ community and mothers how to be responsible parents.

- Depression, Stress, Substance Abuse, and Counseling In Men – Professors: The Other Carolina Women's Center

In this class we at the Men's Studies program at UNC will be holding a course on how to avoid depression, stress, substance abuse, and receive counseling because our Men's Center has yet to be built. Again, ask the women over at the Women's Studies department to loan us some money in the name of equality.

- Seeking Tenure Track in Men's Studies – Professor: UNC Association of Women Faculty and Professionals

Considering teaching at UNC after graduating with your shiny new degree and are considering tenure track? Great! The best approach to doing this is by joining the UNC Association of Men Faculty and Professionals – Oh wait, there isn't one.
This concludes our course list of Men's Studies at UNC. It's unlikely that we will be offering anymore classes in Men's Studies for the foreseeable future because right now there is a War on Women and you're the scapegoat. If you would like to help support the Men's Studies program, we only ask that you get off your ass and realize that your entire future is being decided by feminist that have matured from gender equal activists to women's gendered superiority at your expense. Don't believe us, great! Then head on over to the REAL University of North Carolina website and we dare you to find anything positive about Men.

AVFM News and Activism: CAFE Speaks with AVFM

March 5, 2013 | by James Huff | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]
Tonight on AVFM News and Activism we have as our guests Iain Dwyer and Heidi Nabert from the Canadian Association for Equality. One of the growing handful of groups raising awareness of men's issues on campuses across Canada it gained notoriety in Men's Rights circles for hosting the now infamous event at the University of Toronto at which Warren Ferrall was picketed by violent protesters. We will be talking about that event, the upcoming event on Thursday featuring Dr. Janice Fiamengo who will talk about feminism's toxic influence in academe, and many other subjects so pleas join us.
The show starts tonight, the 5th, at 9:00 PM Eastern, 8:00 PM Central, which is 2:00 AM February 6th in London and 11:00 AM February 6th in Brisbane.
SHOW PAGE
[/box]

Ryerson Student Union denies misandry

March 6, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[quote]If you tell a lie big enough and keep repeating it, people will eventually come to believe it. The lie can be maintained only for such time as the State can shield the people from the political, economic and/or military consequences of the lie. It thus becomes vitally important for the State to use all of its powers to repress dissent, for the truth is the mortal enemy of the lie, and thus by extension, the truth is the greatest enemy of the State. ~ Joseph Geobbels[/quote]
[dropcap]T[/dropcap]here is a great deal happening with men's issues groups forging their way onto university campuses across Canada and the U.S.. As we have reported here recently, Christopher J. Thompson, Campus Ambassador for the National Coalition for Men has formed a men's rights group at Montana State University.
The Men's Awareness Group sponsored by the Canadian Association for Equality at the University of Toronto has been the focal point of a lot of attention. Their hosting of a lecture by Warren Farrell on the Boy Crisis resulted in a violent protest from feminist demonstrators allied with the University of Toronto Student Union.
That protest had a profound impact on one Toronto college student at Ryerson University. Sarah Santhosh, watched the video of the protest and saw a lot of "closemindedness" and "hate," She was also joined by fellow Ryerson students Anjana Rao and Argir Argirov, all moved to seek ratification from the Ryerson Student Union (RSU) for a men's issues group that would focus on some of the many issues faced by men in modern culture, including misandry, the hatred or fear of men and boys.
The Board of Directors of the RSU has moved preemptively to stop them and anyone else with such ideas.
In a staggering act of bigotry and hypocrisy, a motion was passed by The Board that makes it official policy that misandry does not exist. Neda Hamzavi, a representative on the RSU Board of Directors introduced the motion, which was passed, according to theeyeopener.com, "without any debate, discussion or dispute."
The rationale offered by Hamzavi was as clear as it was chilling.

> There's been a lot of work across campuses not only in Ontario but also across the country that have been working sort of [as] anti-women's rights groups.
> We want to acknowledge that the additions that we added here are regarding the ideas of misandry and reverse-sexism, both of which are oppressive concepts that aim to delegitimize the equity work that women's movements work to do.

Her sentiments were echoed by Marwa Hamad, vice-president equity at the RSU, who also clearly outlined her vision of the future for that organization as it relates to gender and sexual politics. She said, according to TEO, "the policy will preserve space for discussing misogyny and institutionalized gender imbalances."

So, the message from the RSU Board is simple. Misandry, even as they blatantly practice it, does not exist. Any attempt to claim it does exist, or to attempt to gain academic support for men's issues will be summarily and officially regarded as misogyny and opposition to women's rights. There is no "space" for such discussion at RSU, or in Marwa Hamad's mind.
They have earned kudos on the efficiency of propaganda. The points of the motion wove in the denial of misandry with great fluidity, as follows:

> 4. Groups, Meetings or events [that] promote misogynist views towards women and ideologies that promote gender inequity, challenges women's right to bodily autonomy, or justifies sexual assault 5. The concept of misandry as it ignores structural inequity that exist between men and women 6. Groups, meetings events or initiatives [that] negate the need to centre women's voices in the struggle for gender equity.

Note how the concepts of misogyny, ideologically driven gender inequity, justification of rape and negating the rights of women to speak to their issues, none of which were supported by Santhosh or her fellows, are all wrapped around a convoluted and unsupported interpretation of misandry that directly imputes malice upon anyone who believes it exists.
[image]
Marwa Hamad

At this point it is difficult for me to find words to describe what has just happened at RSU. The Geobbels quote was as close to treading on Godwin's Law as I care to. But the temptation to go further is definitely there. In a culture with a 5 to 1 ratio of male suicide, an ever decreasing population of male college students who are subsequently falling from the work force, the official response from RSU is to demonize anyone who wants to talk about it or pursue solutions.
The RSU Board apparently feels quite justified with this take on things.
Hamad, without any explanation as to what she was actually talking about, claimed that the measure will help RSU protect women's issues, which ironically according to her, "have historically and continue to today to be silenced."
It leaves one to necessarily wonder just how a group manages to be silenced when they are the only ones allowed to have the floor. The only women at RSU that are being silenced are the ones that are trying to speak to the issues faced by men.
In a time of the greatest human technological advances in history, as well as the highest standard of living ever seen in western culture, our universities have become bastions of an increasingly institutionalized mindset of hatred, bigotry and oppression. We are, even at the pinnacle of human human history, proving once again the ongoing failing of human ignorance.

We can only hope people like Sarah Santhosh, Anjana Rao and Argir Argirov will not be easily bullied into silence by the edicts of corrupt and dishonest ideologues who are threatened by the slightest voice of dissent and clamoring to hang on to their privilege with any disgraceful option at their disposal.
Source: http://theeyeopener.com/2013/03/new-rsu-policy-challenges-new-mens-issues-group/
Addendum and correction: In this and the previous article on the Ryerson matter, I conflated Ryerson Student Union (RSU) with Ryerson University, which are two separate entities. The efforts to censor the discussion of men's issues emanate solely from RSU and not Ryerson University. Corrections have been made to the content of this website accordingly, and apologies are extended to Ryerson University. PE

More rights than a rat (but less than a dog)

March 6, 2013 | by Andy Thomas | Link | Original Link

I've known Richard for around six months or so and recall that he'd mentioned that his ex-partner had been abusive, but otherwise he hadn't spoken about it to any great extent. So I was aware, somewhat vaguely, that there had been some unhappiness in his life but nothing had prepared me for what I was about to hear at an MRA London meeting in the Southbank Centre on a winter's day in 2013. James Williams was there to discuss his Men's Matters radio show with us and, having brought a digital recorder, asked if anyone had anything to say that he could use in his show. It was clear the moment Richard began speaking that this was going to be something very special, and it quickly turned into an impromptu interview.

What follows are the highlights of that interview which are also intended for broadcast on Express FM Radio. In all likelihood, however, some comments may be cut from the broadcast version for being too graphic. So what you have here is the original uncensored version.

Around the same time as Richard's interview, I coincidentally received an email from Erin Pizzey with an attached scan of an article that had appeared in the Metro newspaper and featured the official government statistic that some 1.2 million women and 0.8 million men experience domestic violence each year. The article concluded with a canned Home Office response to this news, that: "Violence against women and girls is an abhorrent crime and the government is committed to ending it."

In her email, Erin exclaimed unhappily…

> What happens to abused men seems to be of no importance. I can weep—it is as if men don't bleed or suffer.

[image]
Metro Newspaper
08 February 2013

She is right of course. No one seems to care about adult men.

Much of the literature produced in the field of domestic abuse quote female victim statistics only, while completely omitting figures for males, thus perpetrating the myth that the problem only applies to women and that only men are perpetrators. For example, the Women's Aid UK website repeatedly states that the majority of abusers are men while providing no figures pertaining to mail victims[1]. This crude negative stereotyping of men as aggressors and women as victims has no doubt obscured men's suffering from society's view.

My own digging into official domestic violence statistics had previously led me to the British Crime Survey (BCS) for 2011 which had found that 5% of men and 7% of women had experienced domestic abuse in the year prior to the survey[2]. It also found that 3% of men and 4% of women reported that they had experienced stalking in the previous year[3]. However, men are much less likely than women to tell others about what they have suffered—not surprising when men attempting to report violent assaults against them can expect to face disbelief, ridicule and counter allegations. Only 10% of men would actually tell the police in the UK, three times less than women[3].

While the well founded fear and stigma that prevents men from coming forward to report their suffering remains, the true picture of domestic violence will always be incomplete. Dr Tara J. Palmatier of Shrink4Men.com has this to say on the double standards that not only pervade our government departments and NGOs, but our wider cultural values also…

> Abusive men are publicly humiliated, vilified and often imprisoned for their violent behavior. When a woman is abusive, we advise her male target that she's just emotional, she was abused as child, so he needs to be patient and sensitive to her feelings and stick with her no matter the personal cost.

When the scales of cultural bullshit first dropped from my own eyes, I found just how blind I had been quite disturbing to me. And the world could never be the same again. Here's an example.
The following short video is of ITN News coverage of how Claire Holley, on learning that her boyfriend was leaving her, stole his car and, after drinking a bottle of whiskey, drove it at high speed through a plate glass window into the foyer of the bowling alley where he worked.
VIDEO: ITN News – Claire Holley Smashes Car into Bowling Alley
There was a time, not too long ago, that I would have been oblivious to the deplorable prejudice on display in the this shoddy piece of journalism. Rather than seeing this woman as a disgustingly violent and dangerous attacker, like most people, I imagine that I may have been hoodwinked by the reporter's narrative that here was a poor "heartbroken" woman—a "woman scorned" (the implication being that her boyfriend probably deserved it). It's also a narrative that the justice system also appears to have swallowed along with the sink from her kitchen—she wasn't convicted of car theft, drinking driving or attempted murder, but only of dangerous driving for which she received a suspended sentence. (If the foyer of the bowling alley had been packed with families and children, there would have been carnage.)
None of this is intended to paint a picture—much like the one often painted of men but the other way round—that women in general are violent and abusive. Rather its about the honest realisation that women, like men, are unique individuals who display a spectrum of human qualities and flaws, from good to bad. Crudely stereotyping half the human race as abusers according to an ideology born out of prejudice and hate will not lead to a better world, but simply denies decent people like Richard assistance, compassion and justice. It also puts us all on a dangerous precipice; we like to think that we have consigned ideological dogma to the past. We haven't. Wake up!
Everything I've learned about Richard makes me respect and admire him, and it's a privilege to know him. In fact, I've come to develop a very special degree of friendship and trust for my friends within MRA London and the wider Men's Human Rights Movement. There is a time in everyone's life when it becomes important to stand up for what we really believe—not for money, approval, prestige or ego, but for what really matters. For me, that time is here and now.

News update. MRA London are working with James Williams to develop Men's Matters radio and to bring the programme to a world-wide audience by putting it fully online. We are also working to establish a male support meeting also to be known as "Men's Matters" and associated with the radio programme. More on this soon.

References

1. Women's Aid website. Topic: Domestic violence (general). Link: http://www.womensaid.org.uk/domestic_violence_topic.asp?section=0001000100220041

2. ManKind Initiative, 21 key facts about male victims. Link: http://www.mankind.org.uk/pdfs/21%20Key%20Facts_Feb%202012.pdf

3. Homicides, Firearm Offences and Intimate Violence. Supplementary Volume 2 to Crime in England and Wales 2010/11. Page 88. Link: http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk/publications/science-research-statistics/research-statistics/crime-research/hosb0212/hosb0212?view=Binary

4. Homicides, Firearm Offences and Intimate Violence. Supplementary Volume 2 to Crime in England and Wales 2010/11. Page 96. Link: http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk/publications/science-research-statistics/research-statistics/crime-research/hosb0212/hosb0212?view=Binary

Eve Ensler's dance of fools

March 6, 2013 | by Jim Muldoon | Link | Original Link

Eve Ensler, the feminist who gave vaginas a voice because women speaking from their mouths was apparently not enough, recently tried to get one billion women to dance to end violence against women with an event she called One Billion Rising. Last time I checked dancing was not one of the moves taught in a self-defense class, but I digress. Her attempt to organize a billion women to shake their booty on Valentine's Day was apparently not very successful, with only a few hundred women joining each different venue for the event around the world.

The One Billion Rising event was inspired by a UNFPA estimate that one in every three women will experience violence during her lifetime, meaning well over a billion. Of course, an empirical peer reviewed paper demonstrating this data is not cited or mentioned by UNFPA. What a surprise.

Still, Ensler's activism extends beyond shaking her booty in a half-assed attempt to stop violence against a billion women. Recently she's been drawing connections between "the violence that men perpetrate against women" and "the violence that fossil-fuel companies perpetrate against the climate and all of us who depend on it".

Yes, that's right. Eve Ensler is now drawing a connection between violence against women and "violence against the planet."

In a recent interview on the website Grist, Ensler said:

> You're destroying women and undermining women and raping women and disempowering women – there seems to be a pressing rape mentality, which has to do with the powerful getting what they [men] want at the expense of the person they're taking it from, without an awareness of reciprocity or mutuality. And that seems to be how we're treating women, as well as how we're treating the earth. It's the same mindset.

No you are not hallucinating. Ensler is now claiming that men not only rape women, but that they rape the earth as well. And I thought I had heard it all when it came to the bullshit that feminists love to dream up in order to vilify men. Apparently I underestimated their capacity to draw imaginary connections between anything and the evil menz.

But of course she does not stop there. She goes on to say:

> The connection between mining [in the Congo], for example, and violence against women – women's bodies are now on the front lines, being raped and destroyed for the purposes of mining. When mines become militarized, where everything is militarized, escalation of rape and sexual violence occurs, but in the case of the Congo, this has been methodical, this has been intentional and systematic.

Yes Eve. The men decided to open a mine and militarize it just so they could rape and abuse both the earth and women at the same time. Two birds with one stone and all that, right Eve? Well at least the men are efficient and decided to save time by combining two tasks into one. Props to them for that.
She finishes her interview with Grist by saying:

> We're bringing boys up who don't even understand that they're being violent when they're being violent, because it's become so ordinary.

Of course Eve, because everything a man does is violent in your world. A man can't sneeze without someone like you screaming "abuse".
Perhaps the next time a man passes gas we can accuse him of abusing the ozone layer and your nose at the same time? Oh wait, best not to give Eve any more ideas, lest she begin an event calling for women to crazy glue men's ass cheeks together in an effort to save both the Earth and women — since the whole dancing thing was a massive flop.

University of Toronto hosts Dr. Janice Fiamengo

March 6, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

University of Toronto about to be tested on sexual politics and free speech.

It is just a matter of hours now until Dr. Janice Fiamengo will be making her presentation about feminist academic corruption at the University of Toronto. For those catching up, AVFM News Ontario reporter Dan Perrins will be making the event, with another MHRA. It is also evident from the comments here and elsewhere that there will be several other Canadian MHRAs in attendance.

I recently posted some commentary about this event, including some suggestions for how members of the University of Toronto Student Union should conduct themselves as compared to their violent and abusive actions at the last event.

It is not that I expect them to react reasonably to my suggestions, but I did want my current concerns over their potential for violence at this event to be a matter of public record in advance.

The Fiamengo talk, hosted by the University of Toronto Men's Rights Group, part of the Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE), is going to be markedly different this time as compared when Dr. Warren Farrell presented there last November.

This time, MHRAs will be there, prepared to document what happens as well as attend the event. We will, in effect, be monitoring the actions of people known to violently suppress free speech and will report any such actions, and if possible ascertain and publish the identities of such individuals on the pages of this website.

That being said, there are some precautions I want to encourage in the strongest possible terms to any MHRAs, whether or not affiliated with AVFM. The first is to consider that one possible tactic that may be employed by feminist ideologues at the school is to have one or more of their lap poodles (thank you, James) present themselves as an MHRA and do something provocative or illegal, false flag fashion.

For that reason I suggest that you not take anyone on face value as an MHRA unless they are known to you. I don't want any real MHRAs to get sucked into the position of even standing next to or being seen "with" someone who does something stupid or violent.

While this may seem to fall on the side of hypervigilance, there are three reasons in particular I am urging you to take the concern seriously.

One, the University of Toronto Administration clearly thinks there is a possibility of trouble from the same crowd who disrupted the last event. The following statement was forwarded to me. To the best of my knowledge it comes directly from CAFE.

> The University of Toronto has shown their strong commitment to our organization's freedom of speech by providing us complimentary use of a beautiful theatre venue at a location they feel will be less vulnerable > to the negative actions some of our critics took as a response to our last event.

If the university administration is taking the potential threat seriously, there is no reason we should not.
The second reason is history. The University of Toronto Student Union has an established track record of organizing and executing illegal and violent resistance to free speech when it conflicts with feminist doctrine.
Additionally, they have demonstrated that they are completely unrepentant about their actions. In fact, they have sought to demonize any criticism of their conduct, laying blame on their victims and retaliating against them. Just as we know when individuals behave in this fashion they are more likely than not to repeat bad acts, the same holds true with organizations. UTSU has given us every reason to believe they cannot be trusted on any level.
Third, the lies have already begun.
As some of you have already seen at this article from rabble.ca, the writing reeks of a potential for a set up. The writer attempts to demonize Dr. Fiamengo as a racist and Islamophobe, asserts that CAFÉ is "targeting university students," and claims that AVFM is a "U.S.-based misogynist hate site."
The writer makes sketchy, wildly unsubstantiated "axis of evil" type insinuations that we are all somehow connected, which is patently untrue. AVFM has no affiliation at all with CAFE or Dr. Fiamengo.
The point here is that if they can "document" an MHRA doing anything remotely questionable at this presentation, they will spin it to form an indictment of everyone involved; even those, like AVFM, who have no official involvement at all.
I am betting they have operatives that are looking to seize or even create an opportunity of that kind.
So my suggestion to anyone attending this event is to be careful of any friendly strangers.
Also, you may be subject to harassment. It is designed to get you to do something reactionary. The solution? Don't provoke or allow yourself to be provoked.
For that I refer you again to the last protest. If you are going, watch this video again and note the reactions of the young men who were being harassed, bullied and abused as they tried to attend. Their conduct was exemplary and beyond reproach. Their refusal to react to hostility with hostility only served to accentuate and underscore the disgusting nature of the protestors at the event.
Remember, when there is an earthquake, don't be Haiti, be Japan.
ABR. Always Be Recording. What was that, Paul? I said

Always Be Recording.

The video by Studio Brule was devastating to UTSU in the realm of public perception. The unblinking eye of the camera and the soundtrack captured every bit of invective, all the flying spittle and all the hatred emanating from their group — in high definition. The video of it went viral. UTSU tried and failed to have it removed from YouTube.

If at all possible, don't be there alone. See Dan Perrins when you get there for help with buddying up. He will be arriving early. Make sure that at least one, preferably both of your team has the capacity to record video, and, again, ABR.
If you are part of a team stay close enough to communicate and far enough apart to shoot video that will capture the context surrounding your partner.
If there is trouble, GET A SAFE DISTANCE FROM IT and call or otherwise notify police for assistance.
An official word from management here. Dan Perrins is the only person attending this event that can speak officially on behalf of AVFM. You can help us with this. There may be media present there. If anyone is approached regarding AVFM by reporters, please refer them to Dan. Those interested can contact Dan through his Youtube Channel inbox here.
Above all, stay safe and watch your back. If the UTSU has managed to find a few brain cells (in lieu of common decency), they may well conduct themselves appropriately, or not show up at all. Perhaps the sting of FTSU has encouraged them to do that. That would be great, but we cannot count on it. Look at that video and remember the kind of people you are dealing with. Vanja Krajina was not the exception in this crowd, she was the rule. The people attacking police were the rule. The people blocking doors and acting like thugs, real thugs, not "gutless Texan thugs," were the rule.
If they get out of line, document it and pass it our way if you like, or place it on another internet venue. We'll find it and we will have it up and running on the quick. But don't try to reason with them or get them to calm down or change what they are doing. They will only become emboldened and more agitated.
Remember, these are ideologues that are shocked by the reality that the discourse on sexism is no longer their sole property. They are starting to hear, for the first time, the things you have been hearing and saying for years and it absolutely terrifies them. Such is the surrender of power and privilege, just as it was expressed last November.
If there are more suggestions, please put them in the comments here. I tried to think of everything I could, but I am sure I must be missing some things.
And to those of you going, have a great time. Show them what men's rights really looks like.

European Union to ban pornography, then men

March 7, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

---

27 nations in Europe (soon to be 28), are part of an organization called the European Union (EU), an organization ruled by a Maoist[1] and a college of commissioners among which one can find former KGB members and radical feminists, such as Viviane Reding[2], a person whom AVFM News Europe has covered in the past.
The decision making process in the EU resembles astonishingly the one seen back in the days of the USSR. Then we had a group of appointed individuals who were drafting legislation – the Politburo – and a surrogate of a parliament which was elected but had the sole right to rubber stamp the Politburo's decisions. It was called the Supreme Soviet.
In the EU(SSR), we have a group of 27 appointed individuals who have the sole right to draft legislation – called the European Commission – and a surrogate of a parliament which is elected but has the sole right to rubber stamp the aforementioned Commission's decisions. It is called the European Parliament.
This being said, next Tuesday, ~~the Supreme Soviet~~ the European Parliament will have a vote[3] on a Report called "Eliminating gender stereotypes in the EU" – which is, in some portions, a skewed form of ACTA for feminist reasons[4].
Article 17 from the Report, reads as follows:

> Calls on the EU and its Member States to take concrete action on its resolution of 16 September 1997 on discrimination against women in advertising, which called for a ban on all forms of pornography in the media and on the advertising of sex tourism

And by "media" the EU means the Internet. too. How do we know that? We read the Article 14 from the same report, which says:

> Points out that a policy to eliminate stereotypes in the media will of necessity involve action in the digital field; considers that this requires the launching of initiatives coordinated at EU level with a view to developing a genuine culture of equality on the internet; calls on the Commission to draw up in partnership with the parties concerned a charter to which all internet operators will be invited to adhere;

So, basically, this piece of legislation allows the European Union to decide whether a website should be viewed by Europeans or not, or if a piece of news can be broadcast or not – all for ideological reasons. Where did we see that before? I for one saw it in the days of Ceaușescu in Romania when the State could simply shut down a publication or remove an article from a magazine or a newspaper if it was deemed to be "ideologically incorrect" – and this was the exact term. So many nations in the former Eastern block joined the EU in order to never see this happening again – not to start it all over.
But it's not just the porn
Banning access to sexually oriented material is bad enough, but there is even more to it than that. This piece of legislation is basically a Marxist-feminist manifesto demanding for statist redistribution of wealth and, of course, for more money to the feminist industry. If you still think “Marxist” isn’t a good term, let’s read the Article 20:

> Calls on the Commission to assist Member States in combating the sexualisation of girls not only by compiling the necessary data, promoting good practices and organising information campaigns, but also by providing financial support for measures taken in the Member States, in particular for women’s organisations fighting against sexualisation and violence against women and girls;

In other words: more money taken from the labor force and given to the feminist industry. The Article Z in the same report reads as follows:

> whereas in 2010 women still earned an average of approximately 16, 4 % less than men for the same jobs in the EU, and whereas the pay gap varies within Member States, exceeding an average of 22% in some of them in 2011; whereas, although there are many complex reasons for this salary gap, it is often the result of gender stereotypes and women being seen solely in terms of the traditional role distribution;

So, basically, let’s pay women the same, regardless of the fact that they choose less paying fields of employment. A few years ago, a Swedish feminist in the European Parliament actually said that she can’t understand why a man working on a oil rig has to earn more than a woman working as a social worker for the State. Such is their lack of understanding of how real life works.
But since we’re on the “gender pay gap” issue, it’s worth mentioning that in constructions (a so-called “masculine” field) women earn much more than men in ten countries of the EU, among which are Romania, Bulgaria, Poland, Hungary and Italy[6]. Speaking of Italy, in this country men earn on average 30% less than their female counterparts[7]. Does this piece of legislation address that? Quite the contrary. A negative gender pay gap is applauded and seen as “progress.” This is what creating a misandric and discriminatory climate means for feminists – “progress.”
The rabbit hole goes deeper. Article 1 from this report reads as follows:

> Notes that there is a severe lack of progress on honouring the commitments made both by the EU and by various governments as part of the Beijing Platform for Action, and stresses the need for new indicators in the area of gender stereotypes and for analytical reports at EU level, and invites the European Institute for Gender Equality to address this issue;

The “Beijing Platform for Action” was developed at an event held in 1995 sponsored by the UN[8] which was basically a huge meeting between radical feminists and Marxists worldwide to cook up a plan through which the world would be remodeled along the feminist lines[9]. It'd be great if this was a joke or a nightmare at the end of which we wake up. Unfortunately, this is the reality. The "Beijing Platform for Action" is a huge document dealing with most of the Marxist-Feminist talking points: transferring authority over the child solely to mothers via the State and feminizing the education system worldwide.

For many years, the European Union didn't talk extensively about this. But now, not only are they not hiding it, but they actually attempt to push legislation in the name of the aforementioned platform.
Perhaps the most telling articles in this document are the article 48 to 51:

> 48. Recalls that the 2014 European elections, followed by the appointment of the next Commission and nominations for the EU 'top jobs', are a chance to move towards parity democracy at EU level and for the EU to be a role model in this field;
> 49. Calls on the Member States to support parity by proposing a woman and a man as their candidates for the office of European Commissioner; calls on the nominated President of the Commission to aim at parity when forming the Commission; calls on the present Commission to publicly support this procedure;
> 50. Recalls that, in 2010, only 12 % of the members of management boards in Europe were women; supports the Commission's desire to establish binding quotas for women in posts of responsibility in the largest listed companies;
> 51. Lays emphasis on the need for such quotas to be binding as this is the only way of guaranteeing their efficacy; proposes that an 'equality fund' be established, into which monies collected under resultant penalties would be paid for use in measures to promote and protect women;

So here we have the EU telling us for whom we should vote (48), whom we should appoint as commissioners (49), how to run our private businesses (50) and punishing those who might have a problem with that (51). Article 21 tells us how the media should be run:

> Calls on the Member States to implement positive action measures to ensure that more women have access to management positions in the media, including top management positions;

Does this document call to implement "positive action measures" to ensure that more women work on coal mines, collect trash, dig the shit out from pipelines or shovel asphalt on our highways outside, in the middle of the summer, at 50 degrees Celsius or more? Of course not. Those jobs are for the sub-humans.
Speaking of sub-humans, article 53 explains to us quite clearly which demographic is the human one and, consequently, worthy of attention:

> Calls on the Member States to make combating violence against women a priority in penal policy; encourages Member States to develop, to this end, cooperation between their judicial authorities and national police services, and the exchange of good practice;

Violence against women as a priority in penal policy? A priority over what? Over pineapples? Article 53 states it clear: Women are the human beings, men are the animals.

When we warned about the infamous Istanbul Convention[10], we said that the EU will find a way to impose something similar unless the people have the nerve to say NO. The EU is an expert on that – they did it with the Constitution (rejected by an overwhelming majority – but imposed behind the closed doors under the name "The Lisbon Treaty" through bullying the Irish people), so this should be piece of cake.

So what can we do?

First of all, we should use the service provided by Rick Falkvinge. By sending an e-mail to europarl-all-mar2013@falkvinge.net, that e-mail will be automatically directed to ALL members of the European Parliament. Write them and state your objections. Do it even if you are not a EU citizen. You can use any official language of the EU, though English, German or French are preferable.

Second, if you are a EU citizen, contact your local representative in your national parliament and ask them to bring this up in the next session of your national parliament. If a EU directive is condemned by a national parliament and/or by a national government, it's a great chance for your country to veto this decision. If enough countries veto on it – ~~the Politburo~~ the European Commission loses the battle.

Make sure you explain to your local MP what this is about in detail and adapt your discourse depending on the political orientation of that MP. If he or she is a leftist, insist on the inequalities that it creates and on the fact that the report is severely incorrect in numbers and willingly ignores factual reality. If he or she is an eurosceptic, then insist on the fact that the EU extends its powers and collects even more money from your country through this law. If he or she is a conservative, then insist on the fact that it increases the size of the bureaucracy, it offers dictatorial powers to the EU and it ruins private businesses which are already suffocated by the average 55% level of taxation in the EU.

The EU refuses to hear

Christian Engström, Swedish MEP from the Pirate Party (Piratpartiet) reports on his blog that the IT department of the European Parliament blocked the delivery of mails regarding this issue after some MEPs complained about receiving mails from the citizens[11].

It's not that much of a surprise, considering that the same European Parliament is ready to spend several million euros of taxpayers' money in order to censor eurosceptic messages from the Internet[12] before the elections.

More about this issue will be discussed on tonight inaugural show of The Voice of Europe at 7 PM GMT, 8 PM CET, 9 PM EET, 10 PM FEET and 11 PM Moscow time. That is 1 PM tomorrow, 3/8/13 Central Time US

I will also compile an open letter to the European Parliament as a European News Director for A Voice for Men and send it to most MEPs. Of course, the letter will also be published here.
The time to act is now!

References:
[1] http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=wAHv3UnXvmM – Jose Manuel Durao Baroso, the president of the European Commission (the de facto prime minister of the EU), speaking about the European-wide aspirations of the Marxist-Maoist revolution.
[2] http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/feminist-lies-feminism/eus-feminist-crusader-never-stops/
[3] http://www.europarl.europa.eu/oeil/popups/ficheprocedure.do?reference=2012/2116%28INI%29&l=en – Procedure calendar of the European Parliament on the issue
[4] http://falkvinge.net/2013/03/06/next-tuesday-the-european-parliament-votes-to-ban-all-your-porn-yes-really-take-immediate-action/
[5] http://www.europarl.europa.eu/sides/getDoc.do?pubRef=-//EP//TEXT+REPORT+A7-2012-0401+0+DOC+XML+V0//EN – The report subjected to vote – full text.
[6] http://epp.eurostat.ec.europa.eu/statistics_explained/index.php/Gender_pay_gap_statistics#Economic_activity_and_gender_pay_gap
[7] http://ec.europa.eu/justice/gender-equality/files/working_paper_gpg_for_women_in_decision-making_positions_en.pdf – Report on Gender pay-gap (see pages 6 and 7)
[8] http://www.un.org/womenwatch/daw/beijing/platform/plat1.htm
[9] http://www.un.org/womenwatch/daw/beijing/platform/
[10] http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/government-tyranny/the-great-danger-of-the-istambul-convention/
[11] https://christianengstrom.wordpress.com/2013/03/07/european-parliament-censors-citizens-trying-to-contact-meps/
[12] http://rt.com/op-edge/eu-summit-pr-campaign-701/

At war with regard to rape on university campuses

March 7, 2013 | by Michael Sharron | Link | Original Link

Let me be clear, I believe we are now officially at war. While one can clearly argue that Men's Rights have always been under attack in areas of family law and domestic violence, I believe there is a new threat emerging that takes on an even more sense of emergency that men, women in their families, and those concerned about Men's Rights in general need to start preparing for. I also suspect that this message will be nothing new to regular readers of A Voice For Men (AVfM) and is intended for lurkers and new readers to the site who may still be on the fence about whether to swallow the blue pill, or red pill.
In the areas of Family Law and Domestic Violence, I will be succinct:

- For going on a century now, fathers (and women in their families) have been marginalized in their children's lives via the family courts and seen more as visitors and payment providers that equal parents with equal access even though feminist and the government express than fathers need to get with the program. As many of you know first hand, when we do stand up, we are immediately forced to sit down by the courts, by many mothers, by ideological feminists, and by politicians hell bent on gender politics that drives funding and votes to their agenda. And with this, many groups and entities have found a way to monetize (Title IV-D) this issue for which they are now dependent on to drive programs in the social services arena and their state budgets;

- Domestic Violence has become an industry, a$500 million dollar industry to be exact, and one that has evolved to an extent that agencies who get federal domestic violence money are dependent on domestic offenders so that said money will continue to flow and fund their agendas and non-profits. In short, professional feminist and politicians will never allow domestic violence to be seen as not a problem because how are they going to use victims to drive fund raising efforts, political agendas, and their ideology? In an effort to do this, a new federal law (VAWA) was enacted to decrease the definition of Domestic Violence so low that it is impossible to not have "victims" that can be used as props and statistics to drive further funding. And of course, Domestic Violence, despite the fact that the latest reauthorization of VAWA has new gender neutral language, those that use this federal legislation as professionals will never actually let go of the notion that only men initiate violence.

Even with all of the data above, I think we are in a new war which is almost identical to the success of Domestic Violence and VAWA that is beginning to play out across college campuses in an almost simultaneous, coordinated, and planned fashion involving rape. But this new war is a clear step up in the pain that it will cause to men and women in their families. In family law, men have learned to push through their pain and live life, and many continue to live somewhat normal lives as labeled domestic offenders after either a false allegation conviction or conviction that resulted from raising one's voice, slamming a door, or virtually ANYTHING that causes a woman to FEEL like she is in immediate risk of death or injury.

To be sure, many men on this planet are now considered domestic offenders thanks to VAWA's lowered definition of violence and ability to gain convictions on "preponderance of the evidence" rather than "innocent until proven guilty". But, under this new war, it is impossible to live life somewhat normally because the adjudication of rape will certainly require imprisonment.

How I see this Unfolding

Ever since the Department of Education Office Of Civil Right's "Dear Colleague" letter, universities are scared. On one side of the spectrum, they have the federal government and power of the DOJ looking down their throats, and they have professional feminist on campus telling them that women are being raped by the minute. One cannot overlook the "War On Women" component as well that I believe is driving this war to secure women voters for the future of politicians who pander to women voters.
In short, Universities need to find some damn rapists quick to appease both the radical professional feminist, DOJ, and Department of Education's Civil Right Division. And make no mistake about it, it will be unsuspecting Men (and your sons, brothers, husbands, and fathers) on campus who will never know this new war has begun until it's too late unless we find some way of getting this message out in rapid fashion.

- I believe that we are very close to removing "innocent until proven guilty" and adding "preponderance of the evidence" from University Honor Courts, and I think it is just a matter of time before it hits State Courts;
- I believe it is just a matter of time before the definition of rape is lowered to include sex with a female while she had any amount of alcohol in her system (even if unknown) and consent was given, or for that matter anytime after consensual sex in which the female FEELS that she probably didn't want to do that (even if it's months or years later).

From just this, we will hear from universities, politicians, and feminists that VIOLENT rape statistics have skyrocketed and Congress will develop a "VAWA like" federal law that allocates some figure approaching a billion dollars a year that non-profits will eagerly form over in an effort to secure that funding. And like VAWA and these non-profits, we will need inflated rape statistics to maintain federal funding to continue programs and services that require services to women that most undoubtedly will mean serious employment for feminist.
Please, it's time to step up your activism!

University of Toronto protest possible

March 7, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Dr. Janice Fiamengo targeted by Toronto Socialists for tonight's lecture at University of Toronto

This is an alert for MHRAs that will be attending the lecture tonight at the University of Toronto. Michael Laxer, radical feminist, gutter journalist and Chairman of the Toronto Socialist Party, is calling for protesters to gather tonight around the lecture given on feminist corruption in academe by Dr. Janice Fiamengo.
Here is a screen cap of one of his tweets on the matter:
[image]
This is the same Michael Laxer that penned the rabble.ca piece disingenuously portraying Fiamengo as a racist, misogynistic Islamophobe and who proclaimed affiliations between the Canadian Association for Equality, the host of tonight's event, and A Voice for Men when no such affiliation exists.
Laxer has also recently set up a Facebook page purporting to be concerned with the issues facing men, though it is clear from reading the page that this is pure gimmickry. I will be expanding on that in a later article, but the point now is to reiterate concerns to MHRAs attending the event tonight to be very careful in the process.
Laxer and his affiliates are prone to violence and the use of intimidating tactics. Like all ideological collectivists, Laxer's ilk uses brute force and repression as a first option. We saw a clear example of that in the first protest against Warren Farrell in November of last year. Given that their ideology is more pathological than actually political, it is quite possible they will be upping the ante.
I need to reiterate to MHRAs that these are the kinds of people who will do anything they can to provoke hostility so that they can turn around and use it to portray themselves as victims. So for those who are attending the lecture tonight, bring your cool head with you. Don't argue with these people as they provoke and antagonize you, RECORD THEM DOING IT. We will use the video to relay to the world at large exactly who these people are and what they are doing.
But if they succeed in getting you to lose your cool and do something stupid, then you will damage our cause and likely wind up in some real trouble. This website will also quickly condemn your actions.
The cultural conflict over feminism and the rights of men and boys is heating up, folks. What we are seeing here, and at Ryerson University is just the nascent emergence of a confrontation that will last for years. It will involve some dark and bitter days. We must always remember that even as we have truth and justice completely on our side, it will be for nothing if we do not follow that up with behavior that reflects the strength of our convictions.
No matter how many doors they block, or how many epithets they scream or how many innocents they target with vile lies and denigration, they cannot hide from the truth. But if we sink to their level; if we for even a moment become the monster we are facing, the truth will get buried in an avalanche of our own failings.

Don’t let it happen.

Time to turn the Fawcett off?

March 8, 2013 | by Mike Buchanan | Link | Original Link

Feminist run Fawcett Society may be crossing a legal line, playing politics under the umbrella of a charity.

To any reasonable person (militant feminists are by definition excluded) the long-established militant feminist campaign group the Fawcett Society must be considered a deeply politically-motivated organisation. It also benefits considerably from being a registered charity, and we've already publicly declared our intention to challenge its charitable status – and that of the Women's Resources Centre – at some point. The guidelines set by the Charity Commission concerning the differences between campaigning and political activity are complex, but we've already received a legal opinion that a challenge of Fawcett's charitable status would be worth undertaking.
For some reason the latest annual reports viewable on Fawcett's website are those for 2008/9 but if you log onto the Charity Commission's website you can view the annual reports up to the latest registered one, for 2011/12. So let's have a look at 2007/8 and 2011/12 reports, to get a flavor of Fawcett's sources of funding under a Labour government and our current Conservative-led coalition government.
2007/8 accounts (Labour government)
http://www.charity-commission.gov.uk/Accounts/Ends69/0001108769_AC_20080331_E_C.PDF
Key income streams:
Home Office £42,000
Dept Communities & Local Government £19,950
Equal Opportunities Commission (the body which preceded the Equality & Human Rights Commission): £10,000
Electoral Commission £10,866
So, left-wing politicians are diverting taxpayer's money to a deeply left-wing and anti-male campaigning organisation. Quelle surprise. I was particularly intrigued by the Electoral Commission donation to Fawcett, so I asked the Commission about the matter. They responded:

> The payment to the Fawcett Society that you refer to was a grant awarded as part of the Commission's Partnership Grants Scheme. The purpose of the scheme was for the Commission to work with organisations to increase democratic participation (with a particular emphasis on voter registration) and to raise awareness of how local, national and European democracy is organised and how decisions are made. The scheme ran from 2007, and as far as I am aware, stopped in 2010.

> The specific project that the Fawcett Society were awarded a grant for related to increasing the voter registration rates, and general understanding of the democratic process of women from black and ethnic minority communities. Although we no longer have any current information on our website, there is some further information here at http://www.fawcettsociety.org.uk/index.asp?PageID=634

To save you a little time, the link leads you to the following gem which magically transforms black and ethic minority women's reluctance to vote, into 'political exclusion'. Incredible, even by Fawcett's consistently low standards.

Femocracy

Fawcett's campaign working directly with ethnic minority women on political empowerment and actively addressing political exclusion.

Political exclusion

Ninety years on since women in the UK first won the vote, ethnic minority women remain one of the most excluded groups from formal political and decision making processes. Black Caribbean and Black African people are amongst the least likely to vote; Black Caribbean and Black African women are particularly unlikely to turn out to vote. The severe underrepresentation of ethnic minority women in British politics, coupled with low voter registration rates amongst some ethnic minority groups, has resulted in ethnic minority women's exclusion from the political system. In reality this means ethnic minority women are not being seen or heard politically.
At the heart of our two year is campaign is direct work with ethnic minority women on their political empowerment. With support from the Electoral Commission, femocracy will work with over 1500 ethnic minority women across the country through a series of events in London, Birmingham, Burnley, Cardiff and Glasgow. The events will provide an opportunity for those who attend to raise their awareness of how politics impacts on their lives, learn about how UK political institutions work and meet with ethnic minority women politicians and political activists.
Femocracy addresses the political invisibility and silence of one of the most excluded groups from formal political and decision making processes.*
Just one question. How can this campaign – like many other Fawcett campaigns – not be deemed deeply political? There's not one word of concern about the 'political exclusion' of black and ethic minority men. But they mainly vote Labour, so there's no problem to be tackled by the unfortunately energetic ladies at Fawcett.
2011/12 annual report (Conservative-led coalition government)
http://www.charity-commission.gov.uk/Accounts/Ends69/0001108769_AC_20120331_E_C.pdf
Key income streams (page 15):
Joseph Rowntree Charitable Trust £93,000

ROSA (www.rosa.org – ‘the first UK-wide fund for projects working with women and girls’. It’s a ‘charitable fund’) £45,000
London Councils £17,965
Barrow Cadbury Trust £12,000
Anonymous £10,000
Feminist Review Trust £9,811
Trust for London £4,668
(UNISON donated £30,368 in 2010/11 but nothing in 2011/12)
The website of Joseph Rowntree Charitable Trust is worth visiting, given they donated £93,000 in 2011/12. I see the Trust’s chair is a women (Margaret Bryan) as is the Head of Finance (Jackie Turpin).
Trust for London describes itself as ‘a charitable organisation that exists to reduce poverty and inequality in London.’
So charities, unions, and councils are financing a militant feminist ‘charity’. We plan to raise public awareness of this scandal. This blog post is only the start.
Game on.

AVFM Radio – Voice of Europe Debuts

March 8, 2013 | by James Huff | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]
On March 8 2013, Lucian Vâlsan, our European News Director and Huffnagel Pista, alongside with James Huff, our Radio Director and producer invite you to join them on the inaugural Edition of The Voice of Europe – a radio show sponsored by AVfM, addressing the issues of men and boys at a European level.
This show shall be almost completely different from what the listeners of AVFM radio shows have bee accustomed to until now. In this inaugural edition, there will be several introductory items to make it clear what this show is about and you will get to meet Huffnagel Pista.
Afterward we will listen to several opinions from different European countries.
Even if we wanted to make it more relaxed and introductory, the feminist dictatorship under which the European Union won't let us. Next Tuesday, the European Parliament will vote on a piece of legislation that would ban all porn (particularly on the Internet) on an EU-wide level. That same proposal would also include the de facto Marxist objective of equality of outcome, in an attempt by Vivian Reading to curb the so-called "gender pay gap" – which is one of the oldest feminist lies still being passed around.
Call in and Skype in and engage in discussions with us regarding of what can and should be done to prevent this huge infringement on individual economic freedom and freedom of speech.
The show will take place, as stated above, on March 8, at 7 PM GMT (London, Reykjavik and Lisbon time).
That is 8 PM CET (Madrid, Paris, Brussels, Rome, Oslo, Stockholm, Copenhagen, Budapest, Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw, Amsterdam, Bern, Bratislava, Prague, Belgrade, Tirana, Ljubljana, Zagreb, Sarajevo and Skopje time)
That is 9 PM EET (Helsinki, Tallinn, Riga, Vilnius, Kiev, Chisinau, Bucharest, Sofia, Athens, Ankara and Nicosia time)
That is 10 PM FEET (Minsk time)
And finally, 11 PM Moscow time.
And for the listeners from North America who want to support this debut, this means 2 PM EST, 1 PM CST, 12 PM MST and 11 AM PST.
SHOW PAGE
[/box]

Why yes, I am a little angry

March 8, 2013 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

---

Resentment.
This is what I am accustomed to accusations of. Well, not just resentment, also rape-enablement, woman-hatred, malicious intent, having a small penis, etc. But lets deal with resentment for the moment. I am told I resent my inability to rape with impunity. Imagining for the moment the insane and grotesque fantasy that at some point in the past, men could commit the violent crime of rape without consequence – we must also imagine that male character is naturally of such depravity and inhumanity that any but the most abjectly mentally ill man would harbour such inclination. And yet, that accusation is hurled in all it's enormity with repetitive and flippant ease.
And why is such accusation hurled? Because I have the fucking effrontery to define myself a human being worthy of human rights, and not as a man whose public social identity depends on approval, on utility, and on disposability for the benefit of the preferred sex.
So I suppose I am resentful, but not of a woman's human rights. I am resentful that my humanity is not accepted. Not my human rights even, no. My humanity. That is denied in the populist social narrative.
"Stop violence against women" (but not against men, despite the fact that men are overwhelming the majority of the victims of violence.)
"Men can stop rape" – as if "man" and "rapist" are synonyms, and as if women are not as capable and as likely to commit that violent crime.
Oh yeah, I know women are smaller and weaker than men, that's why so much female perpetrated rape targets children and the mentally disabled. The only problem being that the exact same crime when committed by a woman is seen as somehow harmless because our feminist culture has convinced us all that women are non-actors, lacking agency and are just helpless flowers. Even murder, when committed by a woman, is excused.
And in case you imagine I'm having some particular hack at women, wake the fuck up, asshole. They're just semi-intelligent animals like the rest of us. Food goes in one end, shit comes out the other, and asshole behavior is what all the monkeys on the planet get up to, ovaries or not. If out of some unconsidered cultural programming you think women are magical, special, innately innocent or somehow divine you are denying the basic unavoidable fact that they're no more or less human than you or me.
This morning, I read that at a Canadian university, specifically the Student Union at Ryerson in Toronto, in response to the formation of an on-campus group addressing men's issues, has "swiftly adopted a bold new policy rejecting the concept of misandry." Men are the majority of suicides? Too fucking bad, any group addressing such concerns is hereby defined by the student union as haters of women. In fact, the only sexual identity allowed to have an advocacy group is the one who denies the rights of men to organize in support of themselves.

Do you hear that male students at Ryerson? You are not allowed to consider yourselves humans worthy of human consideration, and any attempt to think of yourselves human – we (the RSU) condemn as hatred against women.
Last year, the killing of male civilians by American military misadventure was re-defined by the Obama administration. The language to be used in reporting of civilian casualties is now "militants". So long as the dead are male, that is. The common media phrase "women and children," long used to tell an anesthetized public whose deaths matter, is no longer enough, apparently. The deaths of men and boys will now be further sanitized by the provided terminology of a feminist president.
Are you male, reading this? Like me, you're a disposable "human."
Also last year, I developed a poster expressing the most basic concept of human rights. Its text read as follows:
You don't fear and hate African Americans do you?
Of course not, because you are a decent human being.
You don't fear and hate Jews do you?
Of course not, because you are a decent human being.
You don't fear and hate gays and lesbians?
Of course not, because you are a decent human being.
You don't fear and hate women do you?
Of course not, because you are a decent human being.
You don't fear and hate men do you?
Do you?
This is the text of the poster which I wrote – and for the deliberately obtuse and dishonest I'll explain what that rhetoric means. The hatred or fear of any group based on a character of their identity is not what a decent human being does.
The punch-line and conclusion of the poster read as follows.
"Men's rights are human rights".
Hundreds of copies of this poster were defaced with a stencil reading "wrong".
Consider that carefully.
Men's rights are human rights:

"wrong".

And this defacement from a local organization identifying as feminist.
So yeah, resentment begins to touch the truth. What I am is profoundly angry that in the past decade after writing hundreds of feature length articles myself, publishing thousands on the largest men's human rights website in the world, in a movement with tens of thousands of reasoned and impassioned explanations of issues affecting men and boys, my humanity, and that of all other male human beings is flatly denied.
And then the denial of male humanity is itself denied. Ryerson's student union just gave one example of hundreds. Misandry, the hatred of men and boys, they say – is not real, does not exist.
Meanwhile:

[unordered_list style="green-dot"]

- 4 out of 5 suicides are male;
- 93% of workplace deaths are male;
- Men die on average 6 years earlier then women;
- Men are sentenced 63% [1] more severely than women for the same crimes;
- The persistence of female favoring affirmative action in a post secondary education system already dominated by 62% female graduation outcomes.

[/unordered_list]
Homelessness is another area of male domination, while public funded efforts to ameliorate homelessness focus on women to the unstated but clear exclusion of men.
The United Nation's cynical, sadistic, vicious and profiteering project to circumcise (sexually mutilate) millions of men in Africa – using the flatly false justification that this will prevent the spread of HIV.
Oh? I don't need a condom? Well shit, if only I'd known, sex would have been so much better.
Oh wait, that's right, I just remembered, circumcision does not prevent the transmission of HIV. But it makes money for the people providing the medical devices and infrastructure. Just like the harvest of foreskins from infant boys makes money for the infant-mutilation profiteers putting harvested stem cells into a better wrinkle cream for jaded old women.
Sexual mutilation of infants? Who cares, as long as milfs get a better wrinkle cream? They're not real human babies, they're only boys. Their "humanity" doesn't matter.
When I wrote in clear, impassioned opposition to violence, my arguments were characterized as endorsement of violence, and I was characterized, by feminists, as a violent sociopath.
In November of 2012, Warren Farrell, truly the Mr Rogers of the men's rights movement, was characterized as a proponent of child rape and incest in efforts to silence and shame anyone seeking to hear his words. His intentions were clear in the title of his talk:

Addressing the Boy Crisis

How shameful, depraved, cynical and sadistic to claim incest apologia in Farrell's rhetoric. And how shameful to characterize violence as free speech – as the apologists for those Toronto feminists continue to do.
How shameful to characterize censorship as free speech – and thus, a protected, noble act. How depraved to characterize a basic declaration of the humanity of men as hate speech.
Mens rights are human rights
When I was set upon by roughly 20 self identifying feminists with box cutters I kept my calm. Prior to the afternoon of that mobbing, two of them had threatened me – telling me I would be physically overpowered if I insisted on posting my claim that men's rights are human rights.

Deep down in the bones of every feminist is an understanding; that men are endlessly patient, benevolent, and forbearing. How else could such prolonged, pervasive and escalating hatred persist?
Consider the possibility of the loss of tolerance. The loss of forbearance with endless vilification, accusation and dehumanization.

Boys are stupid, throw rocks at them.

Imagine a real war on women. Imagine a response by men as a social class appropriate and reciprocal to the last 3 generations of hatred against men and boys.
Imagine the rage and pain given action in response. The student administrators at universities where "free speech walls" are torn down because somebody might post an unkind word. Potential thought crime policed by mob violence, and answered by the unified violent potential of men acting on their own behalf.
What is overwhelmingly clear is that mainstream, big box feminism, as practiced by the UN, as taught in gender studies is predicated on the idea that the ends justify the means. Censorship and violence are acceptable for a "greater good", and only the brutal potential of violence deserves respect or consideration.
And as a human being persistently and repeatedly denied my own human identity by such ideologues, I, along with so many other Men's Human Rights Activists are so very, very angry.
My rage is bottomless.
I can imagine the next feminist producing a box-cutter to enforce their desire for my silence being grabbed by the throat and opened from chin to groin with their own Stanley knife.
I can see the women's studies department occupied; the student union doors nailed closed and the building burned to the ground.
I can envision every politician who bought his votes by extorting the income of a men to give to women; who used the state's violence against children's fathers and then discarded those men dragged from their padded offices and executed on the lawns of the federal buildings paid for by working men and women's taxes.
Does any of this sound familiar? It should. This is what the public narrative pretends the Men's Human Rights Movement really wants; the rage given over to hatred; the hatred given over to violence and destruction.
That's the wish, the dream, the desire. But not of me; not of men or Men's Human Rights Activists. It's the dream of big feminism. That dystopian future, where the fantasized, concocted threat of men and masculinity becomes horrifically realized, is the desire of the feminist. It is the justification for living every lie that forms their house of cards ideology. It would justify everything feminism has created and called for.
Witness Vajna Krajina, taunting a young man whose name she did not even know. "You fucking rape apologist. You are fucking scum. You are FUCKING SCUM." Her posture is a dare, an intense provocation. Hit me. Hit me. Strike me hard so that I may set the power of the State upon you. Be the violent monster feminism claims all men are, so that you can be shackled and caged.

That young man refused.
I refuse.
My own morality prevents me from going where you imagine I want to be; where indeed you would gladly go if you could. For it is not a moral compass the steers you from that course, but only the stubborn barrier of law.
To those readers of a feminist disposition:
I totally reject you. I reject your narrative. I fucking refuse your invitation to respond to your hate with hate. I fucking reject your insistence to meet your censorship with censorship. I flatly and totally refuse to buy your invitation to violence. Fuck you.
Am I angry? Oh yes indeed. Will I allow you to make me hate those you pretend to care for? Nope, and fuck you for your efforts. Oh yes, your care for women is pretense, but you want them more to be real victims and suffer real damage — to justify your narrative.
And don't mistake me. I will put my considerable energy and skill to tearing down your corrupt, hateful and violent ideology, and every one of its establishments and institutions. I will not stop. We will not stop.
You are on your way out. Your escalating violence and rhetoric signals your desperate recognition of this. The names of your major ideologues will be vilified.
And I, along with other Men's Human Rights Activists of both sexes will see the end of your sadistic creed. We will do it armed with the compassion you cannot recognize, the justice you fear and the truths you loathe.
We will not be the monsters you demand; that you need. We will not be the monsters you demonstrate yourselves to be.
But I'll repeat for your benefit what I wrote more than 2 years ago.
I will not to stoop to the use of lies or violence. You are practiced at those tactics, and frankly, I don't need them.
But I am here to fuck your shit up.
And I am not alone.
One more thing:
Several paragraphs and statements within this article are, if taken out of the context of this article, clear calls for violence, including murder. A number of opponents of the MHRM have demonstrated a willingness and skill at repackaging selected quotes and framing a completely inverted meaning. Opposition to violence becomes a call for violence. You know who you are. Your work will be easy here. Go ahead. You betray yourself and your own desire for human damage every single fucking time.
http://www.urbandictionary.com/define.php?term=futrelian
[1]
http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2012/09/11/men-women-prison-sentence-length-gender-gap_n_1874742.html

Dr. Janice Fiamengo talks to AVFM

March 8, 2013 | by VFM News and Commentary | Link | Original Link

---

There is a great deal to come in the days ahead from the AVFM coverage of the presentation by Dr. Janice Fiamengo at the University of Toronto. You will see everything from the complete lecture, to masked protesters (illegal in Canada) to a man who used his time to ask a question at in the Q & A that instead launched into a diatribe about how MHRAs are racist, to the pièce de résistance, a group of feminist dissenters that were hiding, cowering from cameras and resorting to junior high school tricks like setting off smoke alarms in order to disrupt events.

It is quite a difference from last November's mercenary bravado of the UTSU when they just knew they were above criticism.

Seems like the truth is not only a sanitizer. It is also pretty good at training puppies not to wet the rug in the first place.

But enough joviality for the moment. Right now please enjoy this brief interview of Dr. Fiamengo conducted by our very own Dan Perrins, with camera work by Christian Chiasson. Both of these fine MHRAs made the trip and did a lot of good. Deepest thanks go out to both of them, and you will be seeing a great deal more of what they did in the near future.

Attention Steph Guthrie and the University of Toronto feminists

March 9, 2013 | by Dan Perrins | Link | Original Link

[quote]'Remember, remember, the 16th of November
The feminists censorship plot;
I know of no reason why feminists censorship plot
Should ever be forgot. ~ Guy Fawkes, well, paraphrased Guy Fawkes[/quote]
Given my recent appointment as AVfM's new neckbearded, news knuckle-dragger from north of the forty-ninth, specifically Ontario, and the atmosphere of malcontent towards the MHRM that permeates the mainstream media, I do believe its time for me to dig in and roll up my sleeves.
I think I have the boots on the ground part covered. I'm sure if you folks didn't think so you would let me know, but I might tell you to eff' off and my canine companion Jeb will definitely cock his leg on you.
Now, unless you have been in a flu induced coma, much like I have for the last three days, you should by now know about my recent expedition into the intellectually cold, vapid, vacuum of feminist territory at the University of Toronto. I am still shaking my head at what happened when Dr. Warren Farrell gave a lecture about the Boy Crisis there back in November.
Ontario has a long history of feminist indoctrinated culture dating back beyond the 'a pact with the devil' aka Karla Holmolka years.
In the media build up to the Fiamengo presentation, Jessica Smith at metro news penned an article mentioning the events host, the Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE) — and AVFM. Smith relied heavily on a local feminist Steph Guthrie in her piece. Guthrie was also mentioned by Dr Fiamengo in her lecture.
The following excerpt from the Smith article conveys Guthrie's sentiments.
[box icon=""]
Fiamengo's argument misunderstands feminism, by assuming it casts the men in the classroom as villains, according to prominent Toronto feminist and activist Steph Guthrie.
"We're talking about systemic issues, and yes individuals are part of it, but it's not just men that are part of the problem," she said. "It's a system-level problem."

Instead of targeting feminists as the problem, they should be targeting what feminists call 'the patriarchy' and become allies of feminists, said Guthrie.

The patriarchy isn't just harmful for women, she said. It confines men to narrow gender roles, causing the very problems the men's issues groups are trying to address.
"It's upsetting, because a lot of people that get drawn into this movement, they have legitimate grievances. They're feeling very alienated, they're feeling very lost. This movement is peddling some nice, easy answers," she said. "Those easy answers are going to leave a lot of people in the lurch."

Instead, they should consider men's organizations like White Ribbon campaign, which challenge sexism and foster a positive kind of masculinity, according to Guthrie.
Guthrie doesn't agree with those who would try to stop the men's issues groups from holding talks on university campuses. Instead, it's better to go, listen to the speaker, ask hard questions and engage in a dialogue, she said.
[/box]
Now lets look at what the CAFE press release says will be talked about by Dr. Fiamengo;

> Dr. Janice Fiamengo, U of Ottawa English Professor, discusses the problems of academic feminism at Canadian universities: dubious scholarship, indoctrination, dogmatic teaching approaches, limitations on free speech, effects of "equity hiring," and the consequences for men in the humanities.

I don't see anything remotely close to what is claimed by Steph in her salvo of smear, nor did I at Fiamengo's talk. I do see a series of issues listed and then the phrase "and the consequences for men in the humanities"
Sacrebleu Steph.
Actually considering how things affect men — what a concept. An actual open free speech lecture about men in education today outside the oft repeated and empty concern "Patriarchy hurts men, too."
Guthrie goes right into deflection by stating its a 'system level problem.'
Well, it is a system-level problem. AVfM correctly identifies that problem as gynocentrism. That gynocentrism is expressed in a variety of ways, including feminism. It has infected and corrupted nearly every system and level of society in first world nations with devastating results.
Right on cue, Guthrie segues into ' it's 'the pay-tree-archy,' or least today's imagined version of it. Or is it yesterday's version? Is there a future version that we can all blame tomorrow?
Anyone care to answer? Inquiring minds want to know, and we apparently have a live one here with Steph. She basically comes out and claims that one version of patriarchy or another puts men into 'narrow gender roles.'
She is right about that, only not like she thinks. She, like every other feminist tends to imagine that men's gender roles are about having power, over the environment and systems like governance. And especially over women. That's the male gender role that forces men to rape everything with two orifices below the waist, commit acts of violence against anything with two orifices below the waist, scratch their balls (which are hopefully below the waist), spit whenever possible and drive expensive sports cars in lieu of having a sufficient penis. That is the cut and dried feminist standard for the male gender role. And it is about as valid as a Lindsay Lohan sobriety pledge.

There is a constrictive male gender role, however, just not the one that feminists can see or would care about if they did. And the role is called protector and provider. It is the mandate on men to do everything in their "power," no matter how sacrificial, to make sure women are, well, protected and provided for. That role is enforced, often brutally, by traditional standards, as well as by feminist mandates that literally put women ahead of everyone, including children, in everything that matters.

And feminism's problem is that men (and more than a few women) are starting to catch on to it, which is why they are so desperate to keep us from talking about it. The end to constrictive gender roles for men, the real end to them, means an end to support for women first bullshit, including a bunch of goons wearing masks outside a university lecture hall.

It has been the narrow gender role feminism has tossed all men into for the last 50 years. Or is that no longer in agreement with this weeks definition of feminism?

I look on my check list of Acme Fem & co bag of tricks and sure as shit I find myself with an eyeful of it in the form of femmie fear expressed in Guthrie's next bit of pablum where she ends with "Those easy answers are going to leave a lot of people in the lurch.". You know what I find myself almost agreeing with Steph here again, with one correction.

Let me fix that for you Steph:

Feminism's easy answers have left a lot of people in the lurch. And the answers provided by the MHRM go against three million years of sociobiological programming.

Anyone calls that easy will have to answer to Jeb.

Men and boys have a laundry list of issues to take up with society that Acme Fem & co willfully chooses to ignore, or exploit. Again, no room in a single article to dissect and give proper diligence to that subject completely. Though I will give you a heads up Steph about those 'easy' answers. Start by looking in the mirror, and by that I mean, at what feminism has inflicted on men and boys for the last 50 years.

Fear not folks, for in her last exchange she points us in the direction of men's salvation. I was sweating it for a second, nail biting kind of like. I was terrified at the thought that a feminist didn't have a solution for men. It would be a 'beware the end is nigh' sort of moment, either that or time to buy a lottery ticket.

Her solution is the White Ribbon Campaign, which really should be called white flag campaign. Surrender your logic, reason and rationale society, Acme Fem & co dogma has rolled into town.

In her ending statement Steph realizes the actions of her brothers and sisters from Acme Fem on November 16'th, spewing their quote mined propaganda, erupting in vitriolic mob rule over free speech.

And her answer to all of it is to tell men to put women first, and to wear a badge of shame while they do it.

C'mere, Jeb, meet the nice feminist lady.

B-mod at University of Toronto taking effect

March 9, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

University of Toronto Feminists Prove behavior modification still A trusty learning tool

As John the Other has just posted to this website, it appears that we have seen a historical first at the University of Toronto. Feminists were caught, in their natural environment, demonstrating that they had learned from experience.
As though that were not enough to knock the wind out of you, consider the implications of a world where feminists feel the need to cover their faces and hide during the simple act of expressing their views.
I never liked B. F. Skinner as much as I like him today.
It is Saturday, and we are actually trying to relax around here for just a bit after all the activity, but I thought I would share with you just a little FTSU before and after, for kicks.
[image]

???

[image]

???

[image]

???

To get the full impact of this last one, you need to see the feminist's image in its full glory. Read her sign all the way to the bottom and then consider that she told the photographer that she did not want her whole face in the image.
[image]
Click through for full badass feminist image. It's badass!!

See the story here.
Oh yes, badass indeed. Mucho grande badass, as we who speak muy malo Spanish will often say.
Now, in closing I do feel compelled to point out that we may have a case here of spontaneous over conditioning. As anyone who has followed our activism on the University of Toronto Student Union protest from last November is aware, the only people we covered on this website were those who had been caught in acts of violence and harassment. We never wrote a word about anyone participating peacefully in the protest, as that is their freedom of speech on which we would never intrude.
It must be a combination of consciousness of guilt, and the ever dominant victim narrative in the feminist subculture. The team of behavioral specialists at AVFM will now have to set about creating other behavioral programs in order to get these individuals properly trained.

We will start with a simple message. Exercise your freedom of speech all you want. We will not get out the spray bottle. Step on our right to speak and it’s squirt, squirt, squirt. We will repeat this in word and action as much as is necessary in the future to get the training complete.

So, feminists, can we talk?

March 9, 2013 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

---

On March 7, Professor Janice Fiamengo gave a presentation at the University of Toronto called What's wrong with Women's Studies? Coming on the heels of November 2012 U of T lecture by Dr Warren Farrell and AVfM's commentary on the public, on camera assault and abuse of attendees by campus feminists, this event's opposition was dialed down from the November feminist violence.

It appears that contrary to previous evidence, feminists are rational, sometimes. Recall Vanja Krajina (Va-Jina) screaming abuse at the Dr Farrell protest, compared to the almost civilized protestors at the Professor Janice Fiamengo lecture this week. Feminist "badasses" (according to their placards) hid their faces behind masks and bandanas as they engaged in a much more docile, restrained demonstration against opposition to the ideology taught in modern gender studies. Masks and bandanas were used apparently, because white hoods were not available on short notice. But I have revised my estimate of the sanity of Canadian campus feminists upwards this week, due to their apparent ability to learn from experience.

AVfM's previous reporting on the direct violence and criminal conduct of protesters at November's U of T Warren Farrell lecture appears to have informed the current behavior of the ideological camp who, despite a more subdued demeanor, still attempted to silence the speech of Professor Fiamengo. A few minutes into the presentation, a fire alarm was triggered, forcing the building's evacuation and delay for the fire department's reset.

The masks worn by feminist protestors indicate a sea change in feminist public discourse, as well as consciousness of wrongdoing. They've discovered that the former totality of control of public conversation by feminist ideology is over. Indeed, feminists can no longer engage in direct violence, intimidation and censorship without public criticism. So now they're wearing masks. Baby steps for them, I suppose.

However, now that it's evident gender ideologues are capable of nonviolent public discourse, I have a few questions for any of them who might summon the pluck to reply. Why does feminist rhetoric persistently use the limiting clause "against women" when pretending to oppose violence? Across society, women are not the majority of the victims of violence. Indeed, even addressing domestic violence, Statistics Canada publishes the rates of victimization of Intimate Partner Violence for each Canadian province, by sex[1]. The rates by sex are almost identical.

So why is that limiting clause used? Why "against women" ?

Domestic violence is not one-sided, it is reciprocal. It does not happen in a vacuum, but in the framework of a violent relationship. ANY effort to supposedly reduce or to fight domestic violence which focuses on only half the participants appears to GUARANTEE to perpetuate that violence, and very likely to amplify it.

However, telling the story of the big bad man and the poor decorative female victim makes money, so that's what almost all so-called victims assistance organizations do. Are violence and battered women are just marketing material to them? Are abused men, and are children dispossessed of fathers irrelevant? Do they not want to stop violence, because thats what gets them paid?

Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. A Latin dictum expressing a principal of western thought that the expressed mention of one thing implicitly excludes all others.
“Stop violence against women”
So my question to feminists is: why is the limiting clause “against women” persistently used?
And I have one other question about which I am quite serious.
How can feminism be about equality when it persistently employes censorship and violent suppression of any differing opinion? What any person or group my claim to advocate is irrelevant when their overt public actions demonstrate something totally different than such claim.
If the actions of feminists and their organizations are censorious and totalitarian, doesn’t that clearly demonstrate the nature of feminism’s ideology?
How can persistent recourse to intimidation, violence and censorship possibly serve an ethical movement?
Those are my questions. I have been asking them for years without an answer.
[1]
http://publications.gc.ca/collections/collection_2011/statcan/85-224-X/85-224-x2010000-eng.pdf?

Janice Fiamengo, complete presentation

March 10, 2013 | by VFM News and Commentary | Link | Original Link

---

As promised, here is the complete talk by Dr. Janice Fiamengo at the University of Toronto. Enjoy, and thanks again to Dan Perrins and Christian Chiasson.
[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- Part 1 – http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=i7vT2mmHMp0
- Part 2 – http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=dMfxlcqS02g
- Part 3 – http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=FHbYkug8drY
- Part 4 – http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=a–P0PTWcLI
- Part 5 – http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=iFcomt1jJs
- Part 6 – http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Mt_QipYcF_M
- Part 7 – http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=gdQjVH8K0Ek
- Tidbits and special features Part 0 – http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=28Ifl-pDpUA

[/unordered_list]

Anita Sarkeesian and the feminist war on facts

March 10, 2013 | by Phil in Utah | Link | Original Link

Feminists lie.
Yes, yes, I know, we're all well aware of it here. The bogus statistics on domestic violence, rape, and the wage gap are proof enough of that. All too recently, we saw a blatant attempt by feminists to censor discussions of the truth about today's gendered state of affairs. All of this is pretty old hand to any MRA who's been in the game long enough.
Today, however, I learned of a far more widespread, far more insidious undertaking that American feminists have been brewing for some time now. On March 15, they will be organizing a massive re-edit of Wikipedia[1], for the express purpose of "counteract[ing] the very white straight cis able-bodied western dude nature of the site." No, really, that's exactly what they said. [2]
Not everybody is thrilled by this. As one commenter put it, "How does Wikipedia have a 'white straight cis able bodied western dude nature?' Like, even a little bit? You know there isn't this all powerful white dude running Wikipedia and getting all his views on white power carefully wedged into each article. You can't complain of a bias when it's edited by EVERYONE. Seriously, anyone else even ONCE read a Wikipedia article and was like, 'wow, that was sexist/racist! It's those damn white folk!' That's happened to me a total of exactly zero times." [2] He of course was slammed by a White Knight who pointed out that only 15% of Wikipedia's editors are female, with the implication that this automatically made the writing sexist.
Apparently all men are sexist, and women are incapable of sexism. His claim, of course, does not hold up under logic. I could postulate, for example, that since a vast majority of the world's prostitutes were women, all women are prostitutes. Not only would my doing so be misogynistic, it would be downright idiotic. So why is it so much more acceptable for him to look at the men in Oval Offices and corporate boardrooms and decide as such that all men have some sort of mystical patriarchal power with which they oppress all women? This attitude, I feel I should point out, is demeaning to both men and women.
If past behavior of feminists is any indicator, it's pretty easy to predict where this will go. The achievements of women are greatly exaggerated to serve political agendas. A case in rather recent memory is that of PFC Jessica Lynch, an American POW stationed in Iraq. Lynch, of course, was not Infantry, but a desk clerk. One detail of the "official" version of her story stated that as Iraqi insurgents were attempting to kidnap her, she was captured while shooting them as they attempted to grab her. The truth of the matter was that she was unable to fire a single shot, since her M16 was jammed with sand [3]. This isn't at all isolated; quite a few commentators have likened Mia Hamm to Brazilian soccer legend Pele, which is on the level of conflating the female inventor of a lubrication unit for locomotives with the male inventor of the steam engine.
There's another more obvious, and even darker effect this will have. Any and all articles on misandry or men's rights, or critical of feminism (no matter how objectively worded and/or researched) will be heavily edited with pejorative arguments or removed entirely. A prime example of this is the article on Anita Sarkeesian, a feminist vlogger who spends the bulk of her time focusing on video games on her YouTube channel FeministFrequency [4]. Like most feminists, Sarkeesian isn't too keen on letting dissenting voices through in any way, shape, or form, and instead of owning up to her mistakes, just deletes videos with them, such as her hilariously misinformed review of Bayonetta, or her dissection of five different Christmas songs, in which she claims that a man asking a woman more than once for sex, or a woman wanting to be with her boyfriend or husband, (or in other possible interpretations, son, daughter, family, or lesbian lover) is somehow oppressive to women.

Sarkeesian is in the habit of disabling ratings and viewing statistics on her videos, and comments, when not heavily moderated, are disabled. She may seem like an idiot, but she's actually quite shrewd; when she announced her Kickstarter project, Tropes vs. Women, after spending several dozen videos lecturing to half the population what they should or should not be sexually aroused by, she left comments on it unmoderated, and took screenshots of the more abusive ones, which she posted on her blog to elicit sympathy, netting her a whopping $150,000~ in donations. She went on to give TED talks about how horribly mean people were to her for her Stalinistic behavior, and ironically enough, the first Tropes vs. Women video she posted was one discussing the concept of the Damsel in Distress. Her Wikipedia page, strangely, mentions none of the solid, noteworthy criticism she has received, not even the fact that her videos' comment sections are reminiscent of a gulag.

It is for fear of a loss of resources that I am writing this. I strongly encourage MRAs, particularly those with computer skills, to archive those Wikipedia pages that they have found useful for discussing gender issues. Once this torrent of censorship and revisionism has passed, we will need to restore the arguments that feminists try to keep people from ever considering to their proper pages. As the toned-down protests at Janice Fiamengo's speech demonstrated, feminists are aware that they no longer control the debate. Let's not let them forget it.

Sources:

1. http://stream.aljazeera.com/story/201303072321-0022594
2. http://crunkfeministcollective.tumblr.com/post/44087150061/feminist-poc-wikipedia-takeover-3-15-11-3-est
3. http://articles.cnn.com/2007-04-24/politics/tillman.hearing_1_tillman-and-lynch-tillman-family-bryan-o-neal?_s=PM:POLITICS
4. http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Anita_Sarkeesian

Die, White Knights! Anita Sarkeesian joins the MHRM

March 10, 2013 | by August Løvenskiolds | Link | Original Link

---

The standard "Patriarchy" narrative of feminism holds that men, as a group, have engaged in a vast collective conspiracy spanning all time and space to oppress women, and turn them into perpetual victims who should be liberated from that oppression by, perhaps, a few brave men, or at least, in recompense, women should be favored with whatever pampering, comforts and foreskin-based facial creams their wounded hearts desire.

Anyone who disputes, questions, or even, lacks sufficient understanding of this "patriarchy" bullshit is an enemy of women and a misogynist of the worst sort (and all sorts are the worst sort). If you deny the victimization of women, their crushing fear of rape, their delicate natures, the microaggressions committed moment by moment by every penis that has yet to be chopped off of those living criminals called men, then you are a part of the eternal oppression of wimminz, sez dem femmies.

Imagine a woman who dares to claim otherwise.

While modern feminists demand men help rescue them, imagine a woman who says without fear that women don't need rescuing because they have never been the systemic victims of male oppression, but rather, women are needlessly advantanged because of benevolent sexism. In my mind, Karen Straughan (GirlWritesWhat) pops up immediately, with Asha James (Typhon Blue) right on her heels, and Shieldwife, Stefanie Nicholas and our bevy of honey badgers hot and close after them.

But an actual feminist bold enough to join them?

Consider how man-hating victim feminists will greet the words of a privileged woman who claims:

> The pattern of presenting women as fundamentally weak, ineffective or ultimately incapable [at time code 21:05 of her video] has larger ramifications beyond the characters themselves and the specific games they inhabit. We have to remember that these games don't exist in a vacuum. They are an increasingly important and influential part of our larger social and cultural ecosystem.
> The reality is, this trope [of the damsel in distress] is being used in a real world context where backwards, sexist attitudes are already rampant. It is a sad fact that a large percentage of the world's population still clings to the deeply sexist belief that women as a group need to be sheltered, protected, and taken care of by men.
> The belief that women are somehow a 'naturally weaker gender' is a deeply ingrained, socially constructed myth, which, of course, is completely false, but the notion is reinforced and perpetuated when women are continuously portrayed as frail, fragile and vulnerable creatures….[This] help[s] to normalize extremely toxic, patronizing and > and paternalistic attitudes about woman.

What a misogynistic, vagina-traitor whore! How dare she deny the needs of women forever enslaved and brutalized at the hands of men? How dare she take umbrage at the lucrative trope that feminists have used for decades to secure rescue funding for all manner of women-in-danger programs, including VAWA, Title IX and over $160,000 for her own, personal vanity project?
How dare you so openly embrace the basic teachings of the Men's Human Rights Movement, Anita Sarkeesian?
To your credit as a feminist, I notice that you failed to comment on the routine disposal of men's lives in these games – dead soldiers that are forever replaced by not-quite-dead-yet soldiers with scarcely a care about their brutal, painful slaughter. I look forward, mostly likely in vain, to your feminist rejection of male disposability as well.
Oh, and for $160,000, whoever waxed your eyebrows, sold you those garish earrings, and forced you into that pinkish Stewart plaid shirt ripped you off bigtime. Well, not you personally – your patrons, surely though.

Feminist calls foul for level playing field

March 11, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

It has recently been reported that MMA figher Fallon Fox is a m2f trangender. Uh oh!
The reaction to the news is heating up to a media melee. Uh oh!
I found this video very interesting for a number of reasons, but I will stick with the two most important. It was quite a laugh to hear a self proclaimed radical feminist drone on and on, minute after minute, about how inferior women are compared to men. And I loved how she counted on the damseling inferences of a man beating up on a woman to drive home her hostility. She even titled the video with that invective. Oh how terribly feminist of you. Equality, anyone?
Another reason for my mirth is her clearly stated opinion that Fallon should lose her license to fight presents the clearest public admission from a feminist that I have ever seen that the playing field must be artificially leveled so that women can compete. Women on the front lines, anyone?
Well, I suppose if we listened to Obama and company these women should be able to whip Fallon's ass wearing heels.
I personally don't have much of an opinion on this one, as I don't have any real interest in watching people of either sex beat the crap out of each other for sport. I will leave it to feminists and the transgender community to slug it out. But if I were a feminist I would hope on Andrea Dworkin's grave that Fallon Fox is not the one showing up for the brawl.

Addendum: I have just been informed by Agent Orange that the maker of this video, who goes by iremythpurr on Youtube, is a femithiest supporter and sometime commenter on the former Radical Hub. Who'da thunk, eh?

Men's Rights March 2013 Internet Statement

March 11, 2013 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

General principles we believe are a forming, coalescing consensus

A working group formed in December of 2012 through a variety of men's rights publications, forums, and Youtube channels. Over four dozen people from around the globe participated in making suggestions and giving general input. Despite the large number of people from diverse backgrounds, and the fact that almost none of the participants knew most of the others, its development was shockingly uncontentious, even on some of the more contentious points.

This is not a document anyone is expected to sign or pledge to. It is an effort to identify a general consensus.

This document is not released with the intention being the definitive statement of goals for all men's advocates, but rather, a set of goals and ideas that we believe represent common sentiments within the movement. People will be free to agree with all of these, most of these, some of these, or only one of these; if they'll work with us on any of them, then we'll work with them on that. Furthermore, other groups are welcome to take these goals and adapt and change them for their own purposes.

The gender war is a destructive social construct. Viewing the other sex as an enemy to be fought, or an oppressor to be overthrown, does not benefit men or women. Only a select few will profit from the hostility and distrust this creates. The interests of both men and women are best served by ending the gender war, and to working together to alleviate the iniquities visited upon all human beings, regardless of sex.

Feminism is not necessarily what feminists say it is.

Many prominent individuals who self-identify as feminists espouse ideals of equality and equity, but often act against an ethic of equality under the law. For this reason, many men's advocates have come to the conclusion that feminist activism is dependent on identifying women as victims and men as perpetrators of oppression. While those not solidly entrenched in the day to day gender struggle tend to think "feminism is about equality," professionals at universities, in government, and in political action groups often act against legal equality and genuine equity through their decisions and actions–and do so in the name of feminism.

Furthermore, anyone genuinely working under the "feminism is about equality" mentality should be natural allies in the collective fight for men's rights. But those feminists with actual power frequently endorse and exploit sexist ideas in order to promote their divisive ideology, and to raise money, and dismiss, marginalize, or outright mock men's issues, occasionally even with violence.

For these reasons, self described feminists should not necessarily be considered de-facto experts on what constitutes gender equity. Men's voices must be heard, even if women aren’t always comfortable with what they hear.

Traditionalism is a choice, not an obligation.

No one can speak for all men’s advocates, but most try to be accurate, objective, and honest about masculinity and femininity. They recognize that men and women are different, but they don’t want to promote discrimination, stereotypes, or prejudices that would limit anyone’s ability to exercise their own ability and talent.
Chivalry, a concept in which men have a social obligation to put their interests below women’s, is common in many countries. Failure to adhere to this code can result in significant social backlash against men. We reject a code that ascribes greater value to one sex or the other. When men’s advocates attempt to describe differences between the sexes, they are not trying to prescribe them. Men’s human rights advocates look to the future, they don’t cling to the past, and they agree that your genitals should not determine your lifestyle or your rights. If you want to be a traditionalist, be one. If you don’t, that’s fine too.

Misandry is real, and pernicious

Most respected dictionaries now recognize that misandry – the hatred or contempt of male humans – is a real word. Some gender ideologues continue to insist that misandry does not and cannot exist, but MRAs, by and large, understand that misandry is real, and is being used to strip men and boys of basic human rights and dignity. Misandric messages invalidate boys and men by telling them that they are guilty by association to all the harmful acts committed by other men, for no other reason than that they are male, but ignoring the corresponding association to positive acts by other men, of discovery, invention, daring, bravery, sacrifice, loyalty, love, and kindness. Misandric messages also tend to ignore negative and harmful actions by women. In general, misandry tells men and boys that part of what defines who they are, their very identity as male, is something dangerous and shameful. These messages are culturally toxic and psychologically harmful to men and boys.
Men deserve the right to dignity, just as much as women. Men deserve the same right as women to not be associated with despicable actions simply because they were committed by members of their sex. Men’s rights advocates agree that misandry is real, and that it should not be tolerated any more than misogyny would be, and have taken on the responsibility for acknowledging, exposing, and opposing misandry. Because if they don’t do it, then who else will?

Strong, independent women are helpful, not helpless.

Most men’s human rights advocates love seeing strong, capable, and independent women as part of society. But they are disappointed to see the rise of idealized, infantilized, sheltered, and fearful women. Men’s human rights advocates understand that power and authority should come with responsibility and accountability.
Rewards come with risks: if you take credit then you should also accept blame. If you criticize, then you should also be able to accept criticism. Making excuses for bad behavior by women, or blaming it on men, is condescending. Women who want equality should speak out against such attitudes and behaviors. The only way people experience personal growth is through life experience and our present society stunts women's growth by coddling them.

Men's rights advocates object to feminism's narrow focus on women's problems and fears, and to feminism's track record of treating human issues as divisive gender issues. Men's advocates object to gynocentrism (focusing only on the female perspective) and female supremacism. We respect skill and maturity, regardless of whether the person is male or female.

General Men's Rights Movement Goals

When it comes to men's activism, some have already decided that their role will mostly be passive: become Men Going Their Own Way, by refusing to participate in marriage or even cohabitation with the opposite sex, or otherwise defining their own lives outside the dominant gender discourse, and nothing more. This is fine, as we are all free to make our own choices as to what role(s) we would like to play.
Others feel that "defeating feminism" is the only goal. Our view is that even without feminism, many of the problems we face would remain.
As in any movement there will be people with significant influence and authority even if this authority is informal. Who these people are will change constantly. As a result "We" can just mean "I." There is nothing preventing you from deciding care about one of these items, or three of them, or half of them, or all of them. The point is, they are goals not dogma.

Some of the goals for the men's movement are (in no particular order):

1) We stand for all boys and men. Questions of race, creed, color, nationality or sexual orientation are completely irrelevant to us. This is non-negotiable: we are a movement for the needs, well-being and interests of all men and boys everywhere, seeking no more and no less than legal equality and/or genuine equity under the law.
2) We are a human rights movement, and as such concepts of universal human rights are a part of that movement. Addressing the needs of men and boys is not a zero-sum game. Our focus is on men and boys because we believe men and boys are in particular need of help at this time.
3) We have no interest in legally denying anyone the right to control their reproduction, however we seek equitable reproductive rights for all persons regardless of sex. As a movement we believe no one should be forced into parenthood by the state or another individual, and that sexual intercourse is not a consent to parenthood. As such, mothers seeking arbitration from the courts in order to collect child support from a man she names the father should be required to submit a written instrument of consent signed by him, in which he explicitly accepts responsibility for, as well as defines his rights to, his child/ren. This will allow him to positively establish paternity through a DNA test before signing and allow both mother and father to define the rights and responsibilities of both parties rather than allowing the state to do so. Furthermore, if a mother conceals a pregnancy and subsequent birth from a father and he learns of this afterward without being given the opportunity to negotiate parenthood with the mother then he should have redress to obtain paternal rights and responsibilities.

4) Development and availability of a male fertility control device, drug or method that is safe, affordable, effective and reversible should be a top priority.
5) Paternity testing should be a standard practice when a father is added to a birth certificate or otherwise formally (legally) recognized as the child's father. Where there is a willfully false claim of paternity, prosecution should occur.
6) If a woman opts to give up a child for adoption, all reasonable efforts must be made to allow the father the option of being that child's sole parent before the child can be given over to any adoption agency.
7) Women are frequently pedestalized, and men demonized, when it comes to criminal arrest, conviction, and sentencing. This is an injustice against men and infantilizes women. Laws and legal practices and customs which establish lighter or heavier sentences based on sex should be abolished.
8) Foster the emergence of a new cultural narrative where all men and women are encouraged to live their lives as they see fit, without preferential treatment, while also being expected to bear the responsibility for their personal choices.
9) Default physical and legal co-parenting must be the norm where both parents are competent, willing, and do not endanger the child's physical or mental well being. We wish to promote a narrative of recognizing fair custody arrangements towards fathers as an important issue, both in terms of fair treatment of fathers, and as being in the best interest of all children's healthy development and quality of life. In divorce or separation of non-married parents, daily contact with both parents, and living arrangements which strive to be as close as practical to 50/50 time with both parents, should be the norm.
10) If there is strong evidence that children shouldn't be with one or both parents, regular review of the conditions for access and visitation should occur to recognize that circumstances can and do change; the child's right to both parents must be protected unless one or both has given up the child for adoption (i.e. legal surrender).
11) False and malicious accusations of rape or other violence, when they can be distinguished from mistaken accusations, must be subject to strict penalty under law. Laws against lying under oath or wasting time (of the police or courts) must be enacted where there are no such laws in place, and/or enforced without gender bias where they do exist.
12) The presumption of innocence must be seen as a fundamental right for anyone accused of any crime and restored to anyone accused of domestic violence or any form of assault, sexual or otherwise. So-called "rape shield" laws must either be extended to cover the accused as well as the accuser, or abolished entirely.
13) Debtor's prison has been abolished in most civilized nations except in one crucial area: men who are unable to pay support payments due to disability or other impoverishment. This practice must be abolished, and debts owed due to support must be treated like any other debt to be paid, and subject to reasonable negotiation and renegotiation when circumstances do not make payment of support practical. Throwing men in jail for being unable to pay not only violates their fundamental human rights, it often robs children of their fathers and leaves those fathers unable to work to pay the debts they owe. This is an abomination and must be ended.

14) We seek to promote social recognition that men can be victims and women can be sex offenders, and that statements which belittle or marginalize the experiences of male victims of sexual assault, including male victims of female sex predators, are likely based on a worldview that pedastalizes women and demonizes men. Such attitudes are hateful and toxic, and must be opposed.
15) Standards for what constitutes illegal violence – domestic, sexual, or otherwise – should not discriminate on account of sex or such things as size or weight. Violence is violence. Assault is assault. Sexual assault is sexual assault. The law must be neutral regarding sexual characteristics or physical traits. Zero tolerance policies which fail to differentiate between a heated argument and a crime must be abolished. Mandatory arrest policies must either be abolished or must treat both parties as potential co-criminals and both parties should be arrested. So-called “primary aggressor” policies which presuppose the existence of one “victim” and one “abuser” have been repeatedly shown to be wrong in most cases, and should be abolished as standing policy.
16) Mandatory restraining orders which isolate and intimidate couples who wish to communicate and cooperate with each other must be recognized as damaging, and the law must be made to recognize that such orders may damage career and reputations and as such should be expungeable if found to be fraudulently or frivolously obtained, or no longer needed.
17) Abuse of restraining orders by anyone seeking to use them as a weapon to deny access to children or gain an upper hand in divorce or custody disputes should not only be recognized, but subject to penalty under law.
18) Policies which allow alleged victims to be punished for refusing to cooperate with prosecution must be abolished.
19) Financial incentives for prosecution of any crime by the state must be abolished.
20) In divorce or separation of non-married parents, efforts should to be made to promote mediation and solutions that do not involve the court or other state agencies wherever possible.
21) Recognizing that marriage cannot be abolished by the state, because cohabiting persons will still have disputes over children and finances if they separate, “marriage” should be viewed as an enforceable contract. Couples wishing to marry should be allowed to negotiate what their marriage contracts involve to include issues such as child custody, any theoretical support, education, support payments in case of severance, and so on. Marriages are agreements between people, and contracts should spell out specifically what is and is not agreed to. In the absence of a formal contract, presumption of shared parenting must be enforced as noted above.
22) Any government funding towards health research and services, should such funding exist, should be allocated in a way that gives equal and fair consideration to the health needs of men, women, and children, recognising that while maternal health influences the health of both boys and girls in the future generations, so too the health needs of boys and men should be recognized as equally important to all of society. We may argue later whether or how much government should spend on public health measures; in the meantime, men and boys must be given equal consideration under the law when there is such funding.

23) Government-funded educational programs (such as scholarships), if they exist, should either do away with preferential treatment by sex, or, be expanded to include programs to encourage males to enter fields where they are under-represented and or continue their education as they see fit. One way or the other, the double standards in education must end.
24) Abolish medically unnecessary genital mutilation or surgery on infants and minors. If a person wishes to have their genitals altered, they may make this decision when they come of age.
25) There are documented and growing gender disparities in education with boys in particular lagging behind girls in multiple areas across much of the developed world. This must be addressed directly by looking at areas where boys as a group may have different educational needs from girls, and where teachers may be discriminating against boys consciously or unconsciously.
26) Conscription or registration for conscription ("selective service") must either be abolished or be an equal requirement for both sexes. One or the other.

We are under no illusion that all of these items will be automatically accepted overnight by everyone in the world, nor even that every men's advocate will necessarily agree with every word here. Nevertheless we believe it represents a roadmap to a better future, and hope others will join, in whole or in part, in helping make these things happen.
The initiator and primary editor of this document was Dean Esmay. Others who wish to be identified as having given suggestions, input, or other collaboration should contact the author and let him know if they want to be publicly acknowledged. This item is also publicly accessible as a Google doc right here.
Publisher's note. This document is not intended to represent the editorial stance of AVFM. It is an instrument intended for discussion that may lead to the refinement of our mission and the mission of others in the MHRM. Please help us vet this information with the awareness that it is not a defining document for anyone that we know of. PE
This document was edited on 3/17/13 in accordance with the updated version available as a Google doc.
Update: A video version, for those who prefer that format:

Feminism and the blind spot

March 11, 2013 | by Gordon Wadsworth | Link | Original Link

Let's talk about the blind spot.
The blind spot is a cultural phenomenon, one spanning all of Western society. The blind spot is filled with ignored human pain and suffering caused by inhumanity and indifference. The blind spot can be observed in our governments, our courts, our institutions of higher education, and over society at large. When people get stuck in the blind spot, they are unlikely to have their feelings heard or validated. In contemporary Western society, the people stuck in the blind spot are largely men. To be sure, the male himself is visible, but the physical manifestation of the human male is not what exists inside the blind spot. What can be found in the blind spot are his problems and his fears; his emotions, his insecurities, his pain, his suffering, and his outrage at injustices committed against him. The blind spot isn't new, but the blind spot has been greatly expanded due to feminism and in particular patriarchy theory.
To understand how we've arrived in a situation where our society has largely turned a blind eye to our humanity as men, we must first understand the fact that neither men nor women have ever truly been singularly oppressed as a sex. Men and women took on roles that facilitated the continued survival of the human species. For females, these roles were based in domestic tasks, and for males these roles were based in provision and protection. Making a living over the centuries has often entailed difficult, dangerous, and physically taxing work. It thus made sense to divide labor in this way and create roles that facilitated this division.
Thus, instead of using the word oppression, it would be more accurate to say that both women and men have been repressed by their sexual roles. The female who wished to explore her humanity uninhibited was repressed from doing so by socially imposed gender roles which would have been very difficult to surmount. Similarly, the male who wished to explore his humanity uninhibited faced repression from his own socially imposed gender roles. A man, for example, was someone who would protect and provide for his family without question. A rock of unyielding strength. Someone who had no fears, no insecurities, and no pain. Someone who worked to denounce injustices committed against others without considering himself. A pillar of support for his woman, he was a man who was willing to de-prioritize his own safety to defend her for any reason. In fact, he was someone who would defend any woman, and indeed would de-prioritize his own humanity to defend an entire society at war.
A revolution to free both sexes from their socially imposed gender roles was necessary as soon as the industrial revolution allowed women to begin joining the workforce en masse. The women's liberation came first, and developed into the contemporary feminist movement recognizable today. Predictably, men prioritized women's humanity and for the most part supported their movement. Unfortunately, feminism perpetrated one of the most subtle and unnecessary betrayals ever committed upon humanity. Feminism utterly ignored the repressive forces acting upon males, and instead prioritized the repression of women. This blindness to the other half of the story led feminists to consider their repression as oppression, and led them to conclude that males were their oppressors. In doing so, feminism created a theoretical framework that utterly precluded any possibility of male repression by casting men as universally privileged patriarchal villains that needed to be taken down a peg. And as for the repressive roles men traditionally suffered? An enormous societal blind spot began growing around them.

This blind spot has been expanding ever since. The most repressive of utilitarian male gender roles go utterly ignored, and indeed they have become culturally enshrined as our duties and even our privileges. Instead of working to break down the traditional male-female "gender" dynamic, feminism worked only to break down female-repressive roles under the patriarchy-inspired assumption that this was conducive to equality. At the same time, it worked to defend female-benefiting roles, and worked to legally enshrine utilitarian male-repressive roles while demonizing masculinity.

Did men suffering their own repressive gender roles have a voice in this process? Perhaps, but having been cast aside as oppressors, their feelings were easily ignored and marginalized as the blind spot continued to expand.

Sex came to be viewed through the suffocating lens of patriarchal oppression, and became viewed as an act of dominance, an act of rape. Men were denounced as rapists, a mentality which has given rise to the trite notion that we live in a rape culture, a notion often used as a pretext to enact an insidious expansion of the definition of rape and ensuring legislation. As the blind spot expanded, of course, the male perspective on sex and rape went completely ignored. As it expanded further, it became perfectly acceptable to call a man a misogynist or a rape apologist.

How could a man so casually be accused of hating women or supporting rape? Simply, because his feelings had become buried in the cultural blind spot and were no longer of any importance. The blind spot has even proliferated to the point where many women now fear their own sons as potential future oppressors and rapists. How much value do a boy's experiences have as a male when by age 6 he is a potential future rapist in his mother's eyes? Will his fears and his pain as a male be validated, or will they be invisible?

Marriage came to be viewed through the same patriarchal lens, and a subsequent unopposed feminist campaign of politicized hypergamy to "free" women has broken the institution and the courts beyond any realistic hope of repair. This too went unopposed, as the repressive, damaging male role of provision and protection fell into the blind spot. Unsurprisingly, men are now opting out of marriage by the thousands, and, humorously, because men's feelings are stuck in the blind spot, so too are their motivations for abandoning marriage.

As a result, a comical campaign of utter indifference to men's feelings and motivations has society asking if it raised a generation of weak men. Further, society has begun fabricating ridiculous concepts like Peter Pan syndrome to shame men back into compliance. Since the blind spot has engulfed all male perspective on the matter, fixing the institution of marriage will not be a priority. Predictably, the priority has been instead to force men back into their "proper" role, and repression be damned.

How can a society obsessed with breaking down gender roles be totally oblivious to repressive male gender roles? How can a society obsessed with stopping domestic violence be totally oblivious to male victims of this type of violence? How can a society obsessed with reproductive rights utterly ignore the obvious fact that men have no such rights and can be reduced to slavery? Simply, because having been cast as privileged oppressors under patriarchy theory, men's feelings, their pain, their anguish, and their experiences are irrelevant. It's not that society doesn't see men, but rather that it has somehow constructed a barren, compassionless, blind spot where a man's humanity and his feelings are stuck.

The most interesting part about all of this are the myriad of men who pop up like Hugo Schwyzer, a man who recently penned a bewildering piece at Jezebel advocating female sodomy of men to promote equality and combat misogyny. Schwyzer is obviously an extremely feelings-oriented person who evidently realizes, perhaps subconsciously, that the only way to escape the blind spot he is stuck in as a man and have his feelings culturally validated is to pander to feminists in a socially destructive and dehumanizing Olympics of female supplication.

As for we men who stand up and assert our humanity, there will be no reasoning our way out of this situation, but not because our opponents are incapable of reason, simply because our suffering and our feelings are in a blind spot where they are not recognized. We will be ignored and silenced and told to check our privilege. We'll be called whiners and misogynists. They'll stagger us with the incredible inhumanity of their indifference to our issues.

But we will not stop and we will not shut up. The FTSU train is still only boarding, but once it gains enough momentum nothing will stop it. So get your FTSU ticket stamped and climb on board. It's going to be a sweet ride.

To the European Parliament

March 11, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]
Dear Members of the European Parliament,
Tomorrow, March 12, 2013, you will be required to vote on a report concerning the removal of sexual identity preconceptions in the European Union. I use this name instead of its official name for the simple reason that the IT department of the European Parliament decided to block the e-mails coming from concerned citizens regarding this issue. This alone should ring a bell about the fact that this report is fishy, to put it mildly. This report sounds admirable by its title, but I, and the A Voice for Men organization that I represent in Europe, urge you to vote against it.
First of all, the articles 14 and 17 in the report call for a complete ban of sexually explicit material in "all forms of media" and it makes it clear that this includes the only media venue left free – the Internet. In other words, it applies to any kind of erotic material – text, images, sounds – and not just the commercial kind. This is a political invasion of adult people's bedrooms – adult voters' bedrooms – that goes far beyond the tolerable. If consenting adults choose to share erotic material with one another, this is not a matter that politicians have any kind of say about.
Secondly, article 53 of the aforementioned report calls for the Member States to make combating violence against women a priority in the penal policy. This sounds great, until someone asks – and eventually people will ask – over whom this priority shall be made? Considering that violence against women is the rarest form of violence in Europe, and considering that sexual identity equality is one of the core values of the EU – it is redundant to treat one group better over the other. Even in domestic violence situations, half of the victims are men.
The resolution appears to be completely detached from reality when dealing with the education systems that are apparently limiting girls' "full potential". We're talking about a European Union which has, as a whole, an education system where the share of female teachers spans from 100% in the primary school to 70-80% in secondary school, and where boys represent 60% of school drop-outs, while manifesting serious learning issues, far outpacing girls only in the suicide rate (80%). We have an education framework where 60% of degrees are achieved by women. How is it possible to see female issues in such a female orientated and favorable environment that is creating underachieving boys? This report itself is promoting preconceptions on the basis of sexual identity.
What happened with the basic principles of the European Union? Former communist nations have adhered to this block in order to move away from totalitarian attitudes, not to start it all over with censorship and bans all over the place.
And if that was not enough, this proposal ends in violating at least one article of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, and at least 3 articles of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.
While there may be good parts in the report (for instance combating the advertising of sexual tourism), as a whole, this report is not compatible with fundamental rights and freedoms in a democratic society. Censoring the Internet to appease certain ideologues and transforming the EU into a sort of China or Iran is not progress – it's state authoritarianism. We the people want more freedom, not less.

Considering that you might want to participate in the next round of European elections, I therefore urge you to reject it and inform your colleagues of this attempted deception.
Sincerely,
Lucian Vâlsan – Romanian citizen
European News Director, A Voice for Men
Note: I used "sexual identity preconceptions" instead of "gender stereotypes" because the Stalinists from the IT department of the European Parliament decided to block all the e-mails coming from the citizens containing the words "gender" and "stereotype(s)". I suggest other MRAs who might want to make their voice heard by the European Parliament to do the same.
The address where this letter was sent is: europarl-all-mar2013@falkvinge.net (a service provided by the founder of the Pirate Party of Sweden (Piratpartiet) which automatically forwards the e-mail to all the 750 MEPs.
Special thanks to the AVFM readers napocapo69 and paddybrown. Some parts of their letter models were used.
[/box]

AVFM News and Activism: Report on Fiamengo

March 12, 2013 | by James Huff | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]
Tonight, joining us from Canada, are none other than Dan Perrins and Christian Chiasson, members of the AVFM news team that brought you coverage of the infamous Fiamengo event last Thursday. We will be talking about what was seen and heard both on and off camera and fallout from the event in the Canadian media and Canadian campuses. We will also be discussing the future of activism on the Canadian front how AVFM is going to be a part of it. This is going to be an exciting recap of last weeks so please do not miss out on the opportunity to listen and talk to Dan and Christian.
We also have a taped interview with Valsan concerning the EU vote on the report entitled " on eliminating gender stereotypes in the EU".
The show starts tonight, the 12th, at 9:00 PM Eastern, 8:00 PM Central, which is 2:00 AM February 13th in London and 11:00 AM February 13th in Brisbane.
SHOW PAGE
[/box]

He who pays the piper, calls the tune. Or does he?

March 12, 2013 | by Mike Buchanan | Link | Original Link

[quote]Taxation without representation is tyranny. ~ James Otis (1725-1783) American lawyer[/quote]
[dropcap]M[/dropcap]en and boys are discriminated against in many ways in modern democracies. The institutions which are most responsible for those discriminations are state-run institutions, an extraordinary state of affairs in countries where politicians are elected by the popular vote. This begs the question, what proportion of the tax revenues which finance the state is paid by men? Leaving aside the issue of corporation tax, which is overwhelmingly paid by corporations which are the inventions of men and still largely run by men, what about income tax?
A month ago I made a Freedom of Information Act request to Her Majesty's Revenue & Customs ('HMRC'):
In the latest tax year for which figures are available, what were the collective income tax liabilities of (a) men, and (b) women?
Yesterday I received the answer, in the form of a letter written by a woman at HMRC. It was sent as an email attachment, charmingly titled '1219 Buchanan'. The key piece of information for the purpose of this article was a link to an analysis of income and income tax in 2010/11:
http://www.hmrc.gov.uk/statistics/income-by-year/table3-3.xls
So, what does this table tell us? A top-level view:

	Men	Women	Total
Number of individuals with an income tax liability (million)	17.4	13.8	31.2
Proportion of all individuals	55.8%	44.2%	100.0%
Collective income before tax (£ billion)	556	301	857
Proportion of collective income before tax	64.9%	35.1%	100.0%
Collective Income tax liability (£ billion)	108	43.6	151.6
Proportion of collective income tax liability	71.2%	28.8%	100.0%

Progressive income tax rates adversely affect far more men than women. To illustrate the point, let's look at the incomes and income tax liabilities in the £50,000 – £70,000 band. The income and income tax figures relate only to income earned, and income tax paid, in this band. So for an individual earning, say, £55,000 p.a., £5,000 will be in this analysis:

	Men	Women	Total
Individuals with incomes £50,000 – £70,000	1,000,000	373,000	1,373,000
Proportion of individuals with incomes £50,000 – £70,000	72.8%	27.2%	100.0%
Collective income in this range (£ billion)	58.1	21.3	79.4

Proportion of collective income in this range	73.2%	26.8%	100.0%
Collective income tax liability in this range (£ billion)	11.9	4.3	16.2
Proportion of collective income tax liability in this range	73.5%	26.5%	100.0%

After decades of women entering the workplace in considerable numbers, and flooding into male-typical fields of employment – particularly fields which are well-paid, low-risk, in safe surroundings, public sector, and with 'human interest', such as medicine – British women collectively pay just 28.8% of the government's income tax revenues which largely finance the state which preferences women throughout their lives.
It's often said that women's lesser participation in the workplace is largely attributable to women staying at home to look after young children, but the impact of this factor is far lower than is commonly supposed. For one thing, few women experience more than a decade of looking after young children, in a potential working life of nearly 50 years. In The Glass Ceiling Delusion I cited official data showing that women are markedly less likely than men to engage in paid employment, and markedly more likely than men to work only part-time, throughout their potential working lives. This shouldn't surprise us. It's 'real world' support for a theory published in 2000 by the renowned sociologist Catherine Hakim, Preference Theory. A summary here:
http://c4mb.wordpress.com/2012/07/19/dr-catherine-hakims-preference-theory/
Dr Hakim's research uncovered the startling fact that while four in seven British men of working age are 'work-centred', just one in seven British women is. Women might say they want equality of outcomes, but the stark fact is that – with a few notable exceptions – they're simply not prepared to put in the hard work required to reach that goal. So the state does all in its power to give them that equality, in exchange for their votes. We shouldn't be surprised that in the modern age women show a marked preference (compared with men) to vote for left-wing parties.
What benefits do men get for collectively paying £2.48 in income tax for every £1.00 paid collectively by women? I'm not aware of a single area in which the state – when it demonstrates favourable treatment for one gender over the other – favours men over women. In return for paying 71.2% of the total income tax bill, men (and boys) get the following in return:
1. Boys are made ashamed of their natures by a highly feminised education system which plays to girls' relative strengths. For every two male undergraduates in British universities today, there are three female undergraduates;
2. Anti-male legislation, and poorer state provision of services compared with that enjoyed by women;
3. Men are increasingly being denied access to political office through all-women prospective parliamentary candidate shortlists;
4. There's no 'Minister for Men', while there's a 'Minister for Women;
5. Men hold little more than one-third of public sector jobs, yet the Equality Act (2010) permits public sector bodies to favour women in their recruitment and promotion processes. For every three women registered as unemployed, four men are;

6. Men are being passed over for promotion in the private sector due to the government's bullying of companies to increase the proportion of women in senior positions, despite the overwhelming evidence that corporate financial performance will decline as a result[1]
7. Men are obliged – through their taxes – to finance women's 'choice' to have children when those women otherwise wouldn't have the financial means to support them;
8. Men are obliged to financially support children when women cause contraceptive methods to fail, primarily by 'forgetting' to take their contraceptive pills;
9. Men are economic impoverished by sometimes savage divorce settlements, regardless of the proportion of the couple's joint wealth which was inherited or earned by the men;
10. Men are denied access to their children following relationship breakdowns, because the justice system won't enforce contact orders;
11. Men are assumed by the police and justice system to be solely responsible for domestic abuse/violence, if their partners claim they are;
12. Men receive virtually no support when they suffer domestic abuse/violence;
13. Paternity fraud. It's believed that up to 30% of children in the UK are being supported financially by men who've been misled to believe they're the children's biological fathers. Paternity fraud is a criminal offence in the UK, yet not one woman has ever been convicted of the crime;
14. Men receive poorer provision of services aimed at early diagnosis of gender-specific life-threatening conditions;
15. Men face higher incarceration rates, and more onerous sentences, when convicted of the same crimes as women;
16. Men face ruin at the hands of spiteful women making false rape allegations, even if they're cleared of the charges, due to the lack of anonymity for rape suspects;
17. Men represent the vast majority of former military personnel who suffer from physical and mental health problems, including Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder. They often find the provision of support services to be poor;
18. Homeless men experience poor provision of support. The vast majority of homeless people are men, especially 'rough sleepers';
19. There's negligible state funding of initiatives to discourage men from committing suicide. The suicide rate among British men is around three and a half times higher than the suicide rate among women;
20. Men typically live 4-5 years less than women, but they must wait longer for their state pensions.
Let's remind ourselves that British men collectively pay 71.2% of the government's income tax revenues. How much more income tax do they pay, compared with women?

£64,400,000,000

For American readers, this equates to approximately $100,000,000,000

It would be intriguing to learn the equivalent figure for other democracies.

You'd expect governments to treat men and boys better than they do, wouldn't you? The prime objective of our new party Justice for Men & Boys (and the women who love them) will be to persuade British governments to start doing exactly that.

I'm finding the mass media ever more willing to give exposure to well-reasoned arguments. I've just contributed to a phone-in debate on a BBC Radio 4 programme, You and Yours, devoted to the topic of increasing the representation of women in the senior levels of business. I was given plenty of time to put my points across. On Thursday 14 March I'll be appearing on Jeremy Vine's BBC Radio 2 show, which regularly has audiences of more than six million listeners.

[1]http://c4mb.wordpress.com/improving-gender-diversity-on-boards-leads-to-a-decline-in-corporate-performance-the-evidence/

Eleanor of Aquitaine and her courts of love

March 12, 2013 | by VFM News and Commentary | Link | Original Link

---

BY Amy Kelly (1937)[1]

A brief history of equality

March 12, 2013 | by Kalan Chinuck | Link | Original Link

January 12, 2022

Dear son;

On your 20th birthday, my best wishes as you take your first steps into adulthood. I hope the Manhood Defined program the government put you through wasn't too onerous, although I understand it hurts for quite a while after they implant the chip.

Do they still teach history in school? I've never had the chance to really talk to you about the way society has changed since I was young, but I want you to know things weren't always like this.

Also, I know men 16 and over aren't allowed to speak to women without being asked, thanks to the Communication Fairness Amendment to VAWA, but if you get the chance, please talk to your sister about what I'm going to tell you. They sometimes make exceptions for family (or at least they used to).

You're probably aware of the No Man Unemployed Act which was passed in 2015. It actually sounded like a good idea – so many men weren't working that even the government was worried about who was going to pay child support. The Supervisory and Board Employment Equality For Women clause that came with it also helped make sure people supported the Act.

Of course, with all the amendments since then, it's basically become a forced labor system for men, but in reality most men were forced to work for a long time before that. Yes, I know it's great that the state guarantees work for men, but think about it – women are allowed to not work if they feel like it, so why aren't you? Not to mention, they can go wherever they want, why can't you?

It's a dangerous world out there, what with all the women now required to carry handguns 24/7 so they don't get raped – that was Obama's Firearms and Self Defense Equity amendment to the Constitution – and perhaps the kind of freedom I'm talking about doesn't actually appeal to you much, even if you could own a gun. I can understand that.

I remember a couple of years ago, a group of MRA's (women of course, since men can't do this kind of thing – the Equal Access to Government Act) tried to get the government to say how many men were being killed every year, but the government refused on the grounds that it would jeopardize the safety of women, plus there were apparently national security concerns too. They fought right to the Supreme Court, but the ban was upheld. I think one of the lawyers said the government doesn't actually keep track anyway.

One thing you need to know: they wouldn't let me see you while you were growing up because your mom asked. She did a lot of shitty things that were actually illegal then to make sure you would lose your dad, even though she knew I was a good father and that you and I had a lot of love and affection for each other.

You may not like hearing that, but I'm trying to point out that even before the Motherhood and Parenting Mandate for the 21st Century was passed, moms could do almost whatever they wanted: kidnapping, stealing, perjury, even murder in some cases, and of course the false accusations that stuck like glue even though I was exonerated. Now, of course, moms just basically own their kids outright, so none of that matters.

So then came the Income Equality legislation that pretty much killed off whatever was left of men's motivation to work, through a little dodge called the 3I, the Income Inequality Index. It's funny, as soon as the government created that particular statistic, the pay gap between men and women suddenly started to grow again, and it ended up with women paying almost nothing in taxes while men paid through the nose and then some.

And in 2015, so many men who were actually working quit their jobs and so many ended up in prison (because of the new Debt Relief Equalization Program) that people got very worried; thus the rationale for the education and work camps that men now have to deal with.

In case you haven't figured it out yet, the Voter Balance Calculation the government does every year is a lot to blame too. That's where they started rigging the system to make sure equal numbers of women get elected, mostly by a secret computer program that ensures votes for women politicians count for more than votes for male candidates. Last time I checked, there were only two men left in the legislature: both extremely wealthy men who own pretty much all the media in this country. But even there they don't get to speak until all the women have spoken, just like the old Occupy movement, which you probably don't remember.

One thing I'm glad of is that you decided to play it straight and not try to drop out and go your own way. Most of the young men who do end up dead or in prison, and most of the men my age who tried to fight the system are dead too. A few of us who survived have put together a nifty little hideout here, but we're pretty much dependent on the friendly women who run the nearby town – if even one of them gets pissed off, the black helicopters and the drones will be all over us, and that will mean game over. We heard they used gas when they wiped out the camp a few miles south of here, although you won't see that on the MSM.

Personally I'm doing OK – there's a friendly doctor who comes to see us once a month or so, and she brings medicines, plus we have a huge garden for our veggies, and a few goats and chickens – I get 2 eggs and a quart of milk every week. We also sometimes do work in trade for the TownsWomen, things like cleaning the sewers and repairing potholes and other stuff like that. They give us maniforms to wear so we blend in and look just like the other workers in town. Of course we have to shave too, since they stopped letting us grow mustaches and beards – that's the Open Citizens ID Initiative, as I'm sure you know.

Anyway, hope this helps you understand how the world used to be.

Love always, your Dad.

P.S. Did you get approved for Fatherhood? They say manufactured sperm have a lot of problems so they're still looking for good donors, and you might even get lucky if she's a traditionalist – rules and bureaucratic red tape never stopped a woman.

MRA London and Erin Pizzey at Women of the World

March 13, 2013 | by Andy Thomas | Link | Original Link

Erin Pizzey warned us, “Whatever happens let me handle things.”
In her past, Erin has been subjected to intimidation, death threats and violence from feminists who eventually forced her to flee England. It was understandable, therefore, that she should be a little nervous about speaking at the Women of the World Festival on domestic violence.
Rod and I were there to represent MRA London and the wider Men’s Human Rights Movement. Not quite knowing what to expect and influenced by Erin’s warning, my mind wondered to images of Town Bloody Hall where a heroic Norman Mailer battled a heckling and abusive female audience in 1970s New York. I was also mindful of recent protests at the University of Toronto in which feminist students openly abused people attempting to enter a building where Dr. Warren Farrell was speaking.

I resolved myself, therefore, to remain in the background unless, of course, Erin was set upon with knives and clubs, in which case I figured that I would try to drag her clear from the ensuing scrum by her legs.
As things transpired, the event—a debate titled “Domestic Violence: No Refuge”—went smoothly, save for one unhinged feminist Dalek who, toward the end, gave us all a taste of her own personal hell with a screaming rage-fuelled rant about “racist males and patriarchy”. She continued with her angry shouting later, when she intercepted Erin and followed her as she was leaving the venue. Fortunately, she was the only one we encountered and my fears of an audience packed with feminist war-machines never materialised.
In fact, the debate was largely a positive and engaging affair. As well as Erin, speakers included Sue Wallis of North Devon Against Domestic Abuse, Dr. Sundari Anitha of the University of Lincoln and a trustee of ASHA, and Professor Joanna Bourke, author of Rape: A History from 1860 to the Present.
[image]Erin spoke a little of her childhood and of life running one of the first refuges in the 1970s. Her experience at the hands of both her mother and father caused her to realise, early on, that violence is a generational sickness passed on in childhood. Before eventually being forced out of her organisation, the refuge she established was home to both women and men, and her approach of loving the unlovable enabled many violent people to be turned around (many of the women were as violent as the men they were fleeing).
Dr. Sundari Anitha gave a different interpretation on domestic violence, and the one we were expecting to hear—that it is primarily a gendered phenomenon in which most of the abusers are men and most of the victims are women and children. She also claimed that it cannot be understood by looking at individual cases, but only by looking at the inequalities, that presumably only affect women, in a context of the wider society.
Knowing a little of Rod’s past, I wasn’t surprised when he took the microphone during the question and answer session and challenged Dr. Anitha to consider the situations where the woman was the primary abuser. Her response, that female abusers can be explained by a concept known as bargaining with patriarchy, is clearly synonymous with the commonly used, high-handed and egregiously insulting retort that "patriarchy hurts men too". In crudely stereotyping half the human race as abusers, such ideological dogma has done untold damage to countless lives over the last 40 years or so, including Rod's own. However, this is not really where I wanted to go with this article and, perhaps, it's best left for another time because Dr. Anitha's take on things did not dominate the debate. Far from it, in fact.

Instead, it was quite apparent that many of the people in the room recognised that gender stereotypes were often inapplicable, and many appeared genuine in their concern for all who suffer abuse, whether they be little boys, girls, men or women. For example, Sue Wallis explained how her refuge had changed it's name in recent years so as not to exclude men and boys. She also spoke about the difficulties of running a relatively small organisation in a culture of tick-box conformity dominated by the professional bid-writers of large organisations with vested interests.

Erin brought up the British Crime Survey (BCS 2012) which reports that 1.2 million women and 800,000 men suffer abuse each year, and drew attention to how an official Home Office pre-canned statement completely disregards men and boys—as if they don't exist. "Violence against women and girls is an abhorrent crime and the government is committed to ending it," it says limply in relation to the publication of the BCS*.

As men's human rights advocates, we have come to understand the stark truth that, when it comes to males, few seem to care—not men themselves, and certainly not governmental departments and most NGOs. That is why the Home Office doesn't think it necessary to mention men and boys at all in their public statements. In fact, it is often women who will show more concern for men and boys, and I found it heartening that a female member of the audience showed recognition of the likelihood that the official BCS figures will under report male suffering.

[image]After the debate, Rod and I visited the Christine Voge's photographic exhibition documenting life in the Chiswick refuge during the 1970s. We were also delighted to meet some of those who were children in the refuge and were saved by Erin, and who are adults now with children of their own.

I know that Rod, having read all her books, has followed Erin's work for many years. We both recognise that she is a woman who, through the dreadful experience of childhood, came to understand just how easily the human psyche can be damaged early in life, and how abuse learned in the home is so readily passed down from generation to generation. As Erin sometimes says, Baby P's tragic death at the hands of his mother caused us to weep, but had he lived, he would have grown up to be a monster—and we all would have hated him.

She also came to the startling realisation that if this can be successfully tackled, future generations could be liberated from untold misery. Her ideas were before their time, however, and Erin was forced to watch as her cause was hijacked and re-purposed for use in an ideologically motivated gender war waged by fanatics.

Contrary to the orthodoxy they helped bring about, domestic abuse is not primarily a gender issue. Rather, it arises from our early experience of life, at a time when our young minds are forming, which ultimately shapes who we become as people and how we behave toward others in our personal relationships.

This is why it is so important that her life's work is reclaimed for future generations, and I suggest that we aim to make this one of the a lasting legacies that should arise from our struggle against the status quo.

* Published in the Metro Newspaper, February 8th, 2013.

This article was first published on MRA London.

Urgent news! Political update!

March 13, 2013 | by manwomanmyth | Link | Original Link

The Congress has convened under urgency rules in a marathon session to rush through emergency laws to cope with increasing outbreaks of Men's Human Rights Activism. Here's a rundown of new legislation which will impact on readers of AVFM –

The Presumption of Future Divorce Act

Marriage law is now changed such that signing the marriage certificate brings forward the wholesale transfer of assets from husband to wife that usually takes place upon the divorce.
The new Presumption of Future Divorce Act states that in order to make any future divorce more efficient, men must transfer all bank accounts, businesses and property into the wife's name on signing of the marriage certificate. It is hoped that this new legislation will bring down the cost and stress of divorce and allow women full control of her husbands assets immediately, without the extended delays common with the divorce process.
Businesses celebrated the new law by offering all newly-wed women a special pampering weekend for only $10,000 (specially reduced from $10,001) and an unlimited line of credit at fashion stores. They said the take up of the offers has "been phenomenal or perhaps pheremonal, they weren't sure.
One newly married woman exclaimed: "I could never have afforded this without this great change in the law. My husband would never spend like this and the financial freedom I now enjoy can only strengthen our marriage."
When asked, husbands-to-be shrugged and cited that it was not something that bothered them because: "divorce is something that happens to other people, and in any event, my future wife is not like that."

The DNA Contributors Act

Government today formalized what has always been unofficially practiced and enforced by the family court and stripped all fathers of legally presumed parental rights.
The new law means that all fathers are now officially renamed DNA Contributors and their sole legal right is the responsibility to pay for their child's upbringing. Women's groups said that this was a perfectly fair arrangement as "no mother would deny a man access to his child if he was a decent DNA Contributor", and it would greatly simplify custody hearings because such hearings would simply no longer be necessary.
"Formalizing the arrangement between mothers and sperm donor in this way, makes it much easier for mothers to deal with DNA Contributors who are not behaving as she would like", said Charlotte Harpy of the campaign group 'Mother Knows Best'. "And it also makes it easier for the DNA Contributors, because they now know ahead of time that they will fail to see their children if they go to court, rather than kidding themselves over years and years of court appearances, that there might be a chance.

“Everybody wins,” she added.
DNA Contributor groups did not offer a comment as they were too busy designing a logo for their new name: ‘DNA Contributors 4 Justice’.

The Legal Human Castration Act

Hilarious Katherine cuts for pleasure.
From today, it is legally permissible for a wife to castrate her husband or boyfriend if she has suffered abuse from him in the past. The evidence required to prove that she received abusive treatment from the castrated spouse is a sworn statement from the woman that he was indeed abusive and/or made her cry.
The minimum required level of abuse for her to be acquitted, is set at shouting and/or door-slamming. Dame Brenda Hale was also said to offer that: “periods of ignoring her for longer than 60 minutes and the purchase of one or more unwanted gifts for the woman would also count as abuse severe enough to justify castration.”
Further, the man would not be permitted to ask that she actually prove that he was abusive, because the Legal Human Castration Act presumes that in enduring the unpleasant task of severing his testicles, she has suffered enough.

The All Female University Act

All-female universities are to open now that so few men are doing well enough to attend university.
It is thought that bringing proper focus to women – who now make up the vast majority of students – would help bring equality to education by delivering more appropriate tuition to women, who are continually denied this when men occupy the same campus.
University doors and entryways can now officially be painted pink, rather than just metaphorically and university staff have come out fully in favor of the new measures. As Samantha Smeghead, professor of Gender Studies remarked: “Women will finally be able to express themselves more freely with the patriarchal agents removed from the classroom and, anyway, men tend to make the campus look scruffy.”
It is also thought that incidences of campus sexual assault and rape should be much reduced, seeing as the only men on campus will be janitors and gardeners. All such staff will be required to work in pairs and made to wear police monitored electronic tags. Additionally, an armed female supervisor will be close by, ready to respond in case of any attempts of sexual harassment by the men, or even worse, any attempt to enroll.
Women’s groups lauded the proposals and it is expected to pass into law without opposition. Men’s groups could not be reached for comment, as it was a big rugby weekend.

The Women’s Prison Closure Act

Women’s prisons are to formally close their doors to women with immediate effect. Existing female prisons will be converted to men’s prisons after being renovated to make them less comfortable.

The government has fully adopted the proposals put forward by the Women's Justice Task force in 2011 and has decided that prison is not the right punishment for female criminals. Women will now not face the arduousness of trials for their crimes and will instead face a three-woman panel to decide what level of community service she will need to serve, dependent on the severity her crime.
Murder will carry a maximum sentence of 3 years service, which might consist of working most weekends at shelters for battered women or similar severe punishment. She will also be required to write an essay, explaining why what she did was wrong.
[image]
This article awarded!

The Presumption of Abuse Act

Murder of a husband or boyfriend, however, will carry much less severe sentences than other murders under the new Presumption of Abuse Act, which affords women the legal presumption of acting in self-defense whenever she kills an intimate male partner. This will save the court's time and tax payer's money, by fast-tracking women who kill their male partners and sparing them the trauma of a long investigation or trial, or having to demonstrate a syndrome.
Men's groups sent several emails in protest, saying that this made them "second-class citizens". The Prime Minister responded in a recent interview saying that men needed to: "stop whining and man-up! Women would not go back in the box and if you are unlucky enough to be killed or castrated by your spouse, then you undoubtedly deserved it."

The Extended Abortion Act

Women can now no longer be prosecuted for killing their children, provided that the child is younger then 3 years old.
The new Late Abortion Act allows women to extend her existing license to kill a child, from the current maximum 24 weeks, to up to the new maximum of 3 years after birth, providing she can find a women's advocate to testify that she is afflicted by one of the 216 distinct syndromes that are proven to only affect women.
It is expected that most women will still use the favorite Munchhausen Syndrome by Proxy when they murder their babies. However, others are expected to try out the newer Abdication of Responsibility Syndrome and Temporary Loss of Adulthood Syndrome.
Still others, might go for the brand new Comprehensive Female Multi-Spectrum Generic Temporary Loss of Any and All Responsibility Disorder Syndrome (by Proxy), which is a cutting-edge catch-all syndrome, to help women who cannot be adequately protected from punishment by using one of the other 215 syndromes.
"With this newly invented safety syndrome", says its inventor Beverley Simpleton (known in academia affectionately, as BS), "It is hoped that no woman who is unfortunate enough to have killed her children, might suffer the indignity of being punished for it."
A parliamentary committee erupted into laughter at the idea that men's psychology should be investigated to find out if men might have equivalent syndromes to explain their murders of children or spouses, saying that it was: “a sickening attempt to subvert justice by hiding behind faux psychology.”

“It is misogynistic attitudes like that”, added one MP, “that are holding women back and preventing real equality.”

The Rape Allegation Act

The burden of proof in rape cases has been officially moved onto the accused man in rape cases and now, any women who claims to have suffered rape, has only to identify the rapist to secure prosecution.
Investigations to establish prima facie guilt are no longer required and nor is any forensic evidence. Following the lead of Swedish law on being charged with rape, it is now wholly up to the man to prove he did not commit the crime.
Women’s groups heralded this decision as a victory for common sense, citing the well established fact that a woman “would never lie about rape” and that this saved the tax payer money at a time when we can ill afford to spend it “defending men from crimes they undoubtedly must have committed”.
Men who find themselves unable to prove that a rape did not occur, will now receive a mandatory 20 year prison term without need for an expensive trial. A win-win for the national economy and women’s rights.
When asked, men said that this “didn’t seem right, somehow”, but then again, “it wouldn’t happen” to them and there were more important things in life, such as “the ruby finals and breasts.”

The Sexual Harassment Protection Act

Sexual harassment law received a boost today when a tribunal ruled that a woman could be sexually harassed by an unborn baby boy.
The woman, who remains nameless for legal reasons, claimed that she felt and somehow just knew that the unborn baby boy, in only his second trimester, was: “looking at me through his mothers belly and seemed to be undressing me with his eyes”.
The distraught complainant has received undisclosed damages, and the unborn boy has been pre-expelled from school and placed on the national sex offenders registry.
In another case, a woman has won 5 million dollars from McCrapalds restaurants by claiming that she was sexually harassed by a customer more than six years ago, when he ordered a burger and said: “Hey, you have really nice eyes”.
The unnamed victim has been under medical supervision ever since the traumatic incident and cannot sleep due to having recurrent nightmares.
McCrapalds has stated that they would be taking all necessary steps to save women from compliments and all unwanted attention from men by building special screens in all restaurants, so that no one could see anyone else and also installing audio equipment that would automatically screen out all words that did not involve ordering burgers, nuggets or fries.

Male customers will have to email their orders from the front of the store and robot arms will hand the food to them through hatches to avoid any possibility of female workers experiencing unwanted physical contact with male customers.
Female customers, however, would enter through a different restaurant entrance and order direct with staff as usual.
Women's groups claimed that this was an important victory for the rights of women in the workplace, who should be able to work "without fear of being spoken to or looked at by men in any way at all."
Men's groups, headed by contributors at the Boobzilla Mangina Project agreed that the rights of women should be paramount no matter what small inconveniences befell men. "To disagree with such an arrangement might cast the men's movement in a bad light", opined the folks at Reddit. "We are not here to upset women or stand in the way of women's rights no matter what they demand. We stand in support of men's rights as long as they come behind women's, children's, animals and plants rights. We know our place."
Women's groups seemed quite surprised at this and only added: "They took the words right out of our mouths."

The Women's Health Act

The government today agreed that health spending for women, currently eight times that of men, and up to 100 times that of men in some areas, was not sufficiently addressing the health needs of women.
The Minister for Women and Girls stated that: "it is the priority of any modern society to invest in the well-being of women. It is abominable that women are not receiving adequate funding towards this aim, while men continue to receive funds that could be better spent on women." To this end, the government announced today, that all spending on male health will cease with immediate effect, with all funding re-allocated to female health.
Spending on female health would receive a further boost with the diversion of funding currently used to reduce workplace deaths, suicides and homelessness. Women's groups celebrated this, stating that: "as women are barely affected by these other issues, it is only right that the money should instead go into female health where it would save women's lives."

The Pension Reform Act

Women sure have it rough.
Women' groups were delighted today as the government reversed their decision to bring women's retirement age into line with the age for men: "This shows that government is finally listening to the needs of women who suffer discrimination at every turn."
Instead of equalizing the retirement age at 67 for both sexes, men, who have worked until 65 years of age, will now be required to work until age 75 to make up the shortfall in taxation for funding women's health, whilst women stay at their current retirement age of 60. With men's life expectancy currently being 76 years, women's groups were quick to point out that men retiring at age 75 still afforded the average man “the luxury of a full year of retirement to enjoy with their families.

What more could a man want?”
A spokeswoman for women’s advocate group ‘Women have it Rough: Always Have and Always Will’ said: “Whilst it’s true that men have for the last 70 years, worked until age 65 whilst women have retired at age 60; and whilst it’s true that disproportionate spending on women’s health means that women live longer and therefore have a long retirement, whereas men die soon after retirement; and whilst it’s also true that it is mainly men who contribute the bulk of money to pay for retirement benefits that only women live to enjoy, the fact remains that women should be getting a better deal.”
The women’s group ‘Women, Women and Only Women’ added:“The fact that women are female must be of overriding significance to any civilized society. Women deserve more.”
Men’s groups said that they would much prefer that men didn’t have to work right up to the average age of male death in order to fund women’s retirement. However, they accepted that it’s a man’s duty to do whatever he can for women, particularly because “women have it so bad in our society.”
In a rare show of solidarity with men, women’s groups fully agreed.
I’ll keep you posted on further developments.

Why won't sex-obsessed men have sex with me?

March 13, 2013 | by Mark Trueblood | Link | Original Link

Siobhan Rosen has a problem. She has bought into the crude cultural stereotype of men as wanton lusty sex-beasts and MEN AREN'T MEETING HER EXPECTATIONS. Heavens forefend! Let us break out the giant boxes of tissue, so we may weep with her in her overwhelming plight.

> Hey, guys, recognize these excuses for not having sex?…I do, because I've been hearing them from men—a.k.a., the supposedly sex-obsessed sex—far too much. These days, more often than you'd think, guys are begging off the one thing we women are expecting you to beg *for.

You hear that guys? A woman wants to have sex, and you're not behaving as a robotic dildo that plunges her nethers on command. Instead, you're SELFISHLY expressing your "moods." Men don't get to have moods! Be ashamed.

> …to frame it positively: I want to have sex more than they do. I don't expect laundry Sunday to unfold like Basic Instinct. But getting laid four or five times a week? That would be nice.

Oh, well clearly that's the fault of men. After all, you're a woman, entitled to man parts at beck and call.

> …plenty of my female friends are having the same problem.

Horror! You mean to tell me MULTIPLE women want sex, and their sex toys men aren't complying?

> To be fair (and painfully obvious): Men are human, too. You guys have feelings and problems and hungers that sometimes take precedence over boning. Maybe you had too many beers and are experiencing acute alcohol-related performance anxiety.

Or maybe we're not feeling it tonight. Or maybe you're bad in bed. Or maybe you've let your looks go. Or maybe we really are just tired, for genuine reasons.

> Or maybe your not-in-the-moodness has to do with something bigger: the ubiquity of porn—effortlessly consumed like a drive-through value meal

Ah! Of course—sex obsessed men aren't having sex with you on command because of PORN! You want it, he's not giving it. Blame the internets!

> But still, it can be hard for us ladyfolk to reconcile your unwillingness to bed us with the larger cultural perception that all men are Wile E. Coyote-level schemers trying to get laid.

Well maybe it is because that larger cultural perception is BULLSHIT designed to tie male identity to their success at pleasing women.

> And to be denied in light of that? It's enough to make us think you're a dick for withholding yours. See, women take it personally.

Do you guys see what you've done? You've committed the great crime of acting on the basis of your normal human feelings and desires. You're denying women the sex they're entitled to. Because everybody knows men are nothing but a body attached to a throbbing hunk of genitals.

> After years of battling the dreaded sexlesshousewife stereotype, we're careful not to nonchalantly spurn your advances. But now we have to worry about morphing into the other sitcom cliché—the dopey husband, pawing pathetically for a bone.

Well, I don't think women should be stereotyped as "sexlesshousewives" but nor do I think men should be stereotyped as slavering sex beasts.

> There are only so many times even the most brazen among us are going to get rejected before icily retreating into non-initiation mode forever. And just in general, we keep tabs on these kinds of things.

Really? Are tabs those things men click on while they're compulsively watching porn? And what's all this about retreating? I thought women were strong and independent and better than men at everything.

> A week goes by without sex? We notice. I get the feeling men don't monitor the situation in such a macro sense.

So we're obsessed with sex, but we don't keep track of how many times we have sex in a week?

> As far as you're concerned, a good sex life is just having sex when you feel like having sex. But guess what? That's selfish. Sex is a two-way street!

Or maybe a good sex life, to us, is not having sex with ignorant boorish women. How selfish of us!

> The larger point is: Just try saying yes to us more often.

Fair enough. Sex is a normal human desire, and I think it's great for both genders to desire a healthy sex life.

> I also can pretty much guarantee you won't regret getting busy, either. It's not a trip to the dentist's chair, it's sex. Three minutes in, you're going to be having a blast.

Well actually, I'd rather have my wisdom teeth re-implanted and then removed if it was a choice between that and having sex with Miss Siobhan. Suffice to say, any man who wrote an article like this would be getting called a rapist by a significant percentage of society right now.
So here's the deal. It's healthy to want sex. It's wonderful to desire physical intimacy with someone you are already close to. And partners should be willing to step outside of their comfort zone on occasion, as long as trust is established. But do not assume that your partner is supposed to get in the mood simply because you're in the mood.
Talk with each other. Care for each other. A man who feels cared for by a woman he loves and desires will walk through a field of broken glass for a chance to spend time with her. He's not a lusty sex beast. He's not a robotic dildo for your jollies. He's not a porn addict with deflated genitalia. He's a human being. You know that, right?
Watch TyphonBlue's video for a female opinion on this issue.

Winnipeg shames and blames men for violence

March 14, 2013 | by Jim Muldoon | Link | Original Link

Did you know that men can stop violence against women? According to the Broadway Neighbourhood Centre in Winnipeg, Manitoba, Canada, they can and they are going to show them, and us, how.

The Canadian Federal Government has offered $198,960 worth of funding to a new 24-month program called "Engaging Boys and Men to End Violence Against Women" which will begin this fall.

The Federal Government is funding a program that completely ignores any and all men who are domestically abused, and to add insult to injury, this program will be teaching men that they are solely responsible for violence and that it is they who have to change their ways in order to save these abused women.

Yes folks, this is where your hard earned tax dollars are being spent. Don't you just feel all warm and fuzzy inside? I know I do, or it may just be gas… But I digress.

The program is "taking a new path toward a solution to an old problem," said the project's co-ordinator Jodie Layne, 23. She will lead the program based out of the BNC and told CTV:

> "We are so excited about this program. We often teach women how to react to violence, but we don't teach men not to create violence in the first place. It's such an obvious solution but not one that has been widely implemented."

This is absolutely false. The idea that men and boys are the sole perpetrators of violence and the only ones who can stop violence has been around for decades. It has been forcefully thrown in men and boy's faces for the past several years. Recently the message has been ramped up and forced into our collective faces via outlets such as the media, education, and politics. The message has become a silent sub-text to our daily lives, and the sad part is, many believe it to be true; that men truly are violent and abusive, and only by taming the savage animal can there be peace.

The program will involve 15 boys and young men aged 15 to 25 from community partner groups in the BNC's area who will participate in educational sessions twice per week and then take the information from the course to their communities to teach others.

The program will involve "boys and young men who are willing to make the commitment to the course and spread the word through their peer groups, local schools and community centres."

The course curriculum is being built over the next few months, using the expertise from groups such as Status of Women Manitoba and local researchers.

This so-called "expertise" is nothing more than a group of feminists, who in typical fashion, sit around pointing fingers at men all day and accusing them for all women's ills. For this reason, little trust should be placed in the statistics trotted out by this group, or in any recommendations that these supposed "researchers" are going to present for the proposed curriculum.

Layne was quoted as saying:

> “We’re going to be finding people who are still young and still forming their ideas, their roles in their communities and families as men. By getting them when they are starting to define those roles and what their ideas of masculinity are and how that plays into their behaviours, hopefully we can help them not develop any problem behaviours and share that information.”

In other words, get them while they are young enough to be easily indoctrinated into the propaganda and outright bullshit that feminist ideology pushes under the guise of “research” and “statistics”.
The BNC board of directors, president Darrell Horn and BNC executive director Lawrence Mulhall, will oversee the program, which they say is “a natural extension” of other youth intervention/prevention programs run out of the centre.
“This is a little beyond the scope of sticks and balls and skipping ropes that are the community-centre paradigm,” Horn said. “We hope this is another step in the direction of long-term, sustainable, meaningful interventions that have taken on serious issues in our community.”

> “This program is directed at young men and it is about violence against women and that recognizes this is a problem that goes beyond the obvious. We have to start looking upstream, beyond what we think are the root causes. This is a huge step in the right direction.”

No it is not a step in the right direction. It is the same direction that feminists have been marching in for decades; the man-blaming, man-shaming, and propaganda-spreading direction that seeks to marginalize and vilify all men while allowing the few small and weak minded women who propagate such outright lies and half-truths to abdicate any personal responsibility and remain petulant children.
Layne said the new program is “recognizing violence against women is a community issue, not just a women’s issue.”

> “We want them (men) to be able to say, ‘Dude, that’s not cool,’ and take that message into the community.”

No, you want men to shoulder all the blame for violence and ignore the fact that it is men who have a higher probability of being victims of violence than women, and that the statistics clearly show that both men and women experience domestic abuse at about the same rate.
What kind of generation are we now raising? We teach our girls to grow up to be irresponsible card carrying victims who will be fearful of men, and we teach our boys to devalue themselves so they can grow up to be self-loathing and constantly apologetic for things they will likely never do.
We allow this to happen, and it needs to stop. There needs to be a massive public outcry to wake people up and get them to realize that vilifying men and boys is not going to stop violence of any kind. In fact it has the danger of going in the exact opposite direction. If you constantly tell someone they are bad, then one day they will believe it and act accordingly. And is that the kind of world we want to live in? A world where men and boys give up? A world where we have removed the heart and soul from half the population?

I personally refuse to live in that kind of world, and why I will never give up the fight for men and boys to be respected, heard, and treated with equality. As all human beings should be.

Source:
http://winnipeg.ctvnews.ca/feds-pledge-200k-to-end-domestic-violence-against-women-through-work-with-men-boys-1.1194508#ixzz2NYcd9jVP

To Scarborough Campus Student Union, University of Toronto

March 14, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

To the Scarborough Campus Student Union, University of Toronto
I am in possession of a recent letter you sent to Jill Matus, Vice-Provost Students, which was also distributed to a number of other university officials, student unions and campus related news agencies.
In that missive you waged an attack on the Men's Issues Awareness Group at the University of Toronto (which you erroneously labeled as the Men's Rights Awareness Group) based entirely on fabrications of both the nature of that group and their actions. And while I have no official or even informal association with that group, your attempt to misrepresent reality about their actions is deserving of public attention and redress.
In your letter you accuse them of being a group "that demonstrates sexist, racist and homophobic views." Curiously, you offer no evidence that this is the case. There are no citations, no quotes, no references to literature, no examination or analysis of rhetoric or any other discernible attempt to demonstrate that your charges are anything more than hollow, unsupported allegation.
Your letter even went as far to say, "The Men's Rights[sic] Awareness group at U of T has been known to profile students and make students feel very unsafe at U of T." Again, none of this was accompanied by even a scintilla of evidence or corroboration.
Sexism, racism and homophobia are overarching social maladies that mandate quick and assertive public repudiation, and the mentality that fosters them should not find an organized, sanctioned voice on a college campus. It is precisely because of this that specious attempts to demonize individuals and groups with this kind of mischaracterization similarly demands forceful condemnation. Our society can ill afford to chase red herrings given the very real problems we face.
I am not affiliated with the Men's Issues Awareness Group at the University of Toronto, but I have watched their activities as closely as I can from the United States and I can find nothing in their words or actions that support the allegations you are making.
Their organization is affiliated with the Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE), whose mission statement, in part, reads as follows:

> The Canadian Association for Equality is committed to achieving equality for all Canadians, regardless of sex, sexual orientation, gender identity, gender expression, family status, race, ethnicity, creed, age or disability.
> In particular, we are interested in gender equality, that is on achieving equality for all men, women, girls and boys. While we support all efforts at achieving gender equality, we will work for balance and fairness within this societal project by focusing our limited resources on those > areas of gender which are understudied in contemporary culture.

As you look through the literature provided by CAFE, as well as the events they sponsor, recruited speakers and topics, you find their activities are wholly consistent with that mission.
True to their promise to focus their limited resources on those areas of gender which are understudied in contemporary culture they specifically target the issues faced by men and boys in an attempt to further understanding and find solutions. As is also stated in their mission:
[box icon=""]
The Canadian Association for Equality mandate for its Men's Issues Awareness (MIA) Campaign:
Our focus will be to engage in consciousness-raising, public education and efforts to change public policy. We will engage in critiques of contemporary society as necessary, but our focus shall be on positive activism to advance a healthier society.
Major Areas of Concern
The following are an open list of areas of focus, in no particular order of importance:
[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- The "Boys Crises" (Education, Bullying, Suicide)
- Workplace Issues (eg. Workplace safety)
- Men's Health
- Family law and Fathers rights
- Men and Violence (domestic violence, warfare)
- Crime and Punishment/Legal Biases against Men
- Media, Social and Cultural Misandry (hatred and contempt for men)
- Academic Misandry (eg. in Gender Studies and Culture Studies programs)

[/unordered_list]
[/box]
These are legitimate areas of concern for men and boys as well as the supportive, loving women in their lives, and all evidence on public record demonstrates that CAFE, as well as the Men's Issues Awareness Group is making a good faith, intellectually sound effort to explore those problems in order to foster a more balanced, equal society.
I cannot, however, say the same thing for your organization based on your letter to the University of Toronto.
It appears, though one does have to read through the lines, that your fundamental objection to the activities and pursuits of the Men's Issues Awareness Group of the University of Toronto is that they seek to explore what is clearly defined in their (accurately) represented name. They are seeking answers to the many perplexing issues faced by men and boys.

And your opposition to that cause, laced with invectives, unfounded allegations and lies, is clearly steeped in the very sexism you purport to expose on their part.

It is a very sad irony that you claim that the Men's Issues Awareness Group "profiled" other students and made them feel "very unsafe." The reality is that there is a substantial public record proving that the students who were made to feel very unsafe were the ones who tried to attend a lecture on the issues faced by boys sponsored by the Men's Issues Awareness Group. Those students were openly bullied and harassed, facing doors being blocked by another students union at your university, apparently one with the same inclinations you are currently demonstrating.

This kind of violent and disingenuous opposition to the scholarly pursuit of understanding these issues can only be characterized as sexism, in its most virulent and destructive form. It should not be tolerated in any society that values equalitarian principles and the rule of law.

By writing this letter to the University of Toronto Administration, saturated as it is with disinformation and deception, you have effectively exposed yourself as hypocritical and hateful. I can only trust, given the University of Toronto's previously demonstrated commitment to free speech and administrative integrity, that they will regard your letter for what it is; which is to say they will dismiss it as the unprincipled ranting of a hateful minority.

I can also add that I will be following this story with keen interest. The issues faced by men and boys are as worthy as any others in modern society. It is sad and quite shameful that organizations such as your own have become entrenched in the narrow worldview of bigotry and exclusion. Then again, you have provided yet another clear example of why the work of organizations like CAFE and the Men's Issues Awareness Group at the University of Toronto is so vital and desperately needed.

Paul Elam, publisher
A Voice for Men

Most MEPs couldn't care less

March 14, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

As recently reported here, AVFM sent a letter to the Members of the European Parliament[1] in which we demanded that the report "on eliminating gender stereotypes in the EU"[2] be rejected based on the fact that it infringes upon individual freedom, free speech and the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union[3], a charter that has been ratified by the European Parliament and that has been into force once the Lisbon Treaty was ratified.
As usual, when it comes to the Eurocracy, the media didn't quite understand the issues and happily reported that everyone's freedoms are safe since the "ban on porn" part was removed from the final version that passed with an overwhelming majority of 2 to 1[4]. In fact, nothing has been changed and striking out the text referring to sexually explicit material has no other effect than deliberately obscuring the purpose of the new report. More about the vote and its implications can be heard in the attached interview.. Moreover, the debate on this report was not actually a debate. It was just a back patting between the various flavors of feminists in the European Parliament[5].
For instance, let's take the position expressed by Viviane Reding[6], who had, among other things, this to say about this report:

> The Chair and the members of the Committee on Women's Rights and Gender Equality (FEMM) know perfectly well that at the beginning of their mandate all Commissioners signed the Women's Charter. This was a pledge that all Commissioners, not only the Commissioner for Equal Opportunities, would introduce equality into their policy areas. For instance, in the European Semester the Commission closely monitors factors which impact on female labor market participation. Childcare is one example, but there are many others, such as our tax and benefit systems, which just push women into inactivity or into part-time work, which leads to female poverty in higher age brackets. […]
> Then there is the situation of women in North Africa. I think we all watched with great attention and felt great relief at what was going on with the uprisings in the region. We saw so many committed women rallying around this call for change.
> But not everything is rosy, because we have seen very many worrying signs and Vice-President Lady Ashton always keeps these issues high on her agenda in all the countries she visits. For instance in Tunisia, where the more traditional part of society is questioning women's rights, and the new Constitution might be detrimental to women. The same is happening in Egypt – not only the abuses in Tahrir, but also the troubling provisions in the Constitution and discrimination in daily life.

Now, I'm sorry, but I have to ask: Ms. Reding, what the fuck are you talking about? Who said anything about North Africa? This is a report about the freedom of speech and intolerable extension of the government into people's private lives. This is not a report on women's conditions in North Africa.

What Mrs. Reding is saying, basically, is that because Egypt is on the verge of adopting an allegedly misogynistic constitution, we, in Europe, should also a adopt a EU-wide legislation that is not only misandric, but blatantly authoritarian and appeasing to the Marxist-feminists' wet dream of absolute equality of outcome regardless of merit.
And, as one can notice if reading the discourses from [5], this is the tone of all the speakers in the European Parliament that took part on the "debate" on this report. Where did we see this before? I for one saw it in extensive footages of the Great National Assembly (Marea Adunare Na?ional?) during Ceau?escu's era in Romania. I also saw something extremely similar in the "debates" that took place during the meetings of the Supreme Soviet of the Russian SFSR (????????? ????? ?????). We thought that "debates" where the only disagreements came only from the various degrees of Marxist inclination were long gone.
Whilst some MEPs preferred talking about Middle East – as if this was the Middle Eastern Parliament – other MEPs preferred to go for the usual feminist bullshit. For instance, Norica Nicolai from ALDE group had this to say:

> […] I congratulate the report's take on the current crisis. There is no doubt that if there's a group paying the bill of this economic crisis when it comes to gender – it's women that pay an extra tax because they are the primary beneficiaries, in a negative sense, of the crisis, they are the ones getting degrees faster than men, they are the ones getting lower wages then men and they are the ones that aren't always benefiting from the chance of balancing their professional life with the private life.

Really Ms. Nicolai? Are you sure? Because Eurostat (the European Institute for statistics) tells a different story[7]. But when did a feminist let the facts stay in her way?
Moving back to the letter I sent, I have the confirmation that 753 MEPs received it, and only one did not receive it – for the simple reason that his e-mail box is completely inactive following the death of Ji?í Havel, Social-Democrat MEP from the Czech Republic, last summer in Vienna[8].
I, and other activists have received through various channels several answers, particularly from the euroscpetic MEPs from UKIP or Piratpartiet (Swedish Pirate Party) that they took notice of our action. However, one particularly interesting mail arrived on my e-mail box that shows exactly how much the MEPs care about the peoples of Europe's opinion.
The e-mail came from Lövin Isabella, Swedish MEP[9][10] from Miljöpartiet de Gröna (The Green Party). MdG is a leftist party, just like all the „green" parties in Europe. In the following lines, I will paste the entire content of her response.

> Tack för ditt brev och tack för att du bryr dig om vår matförsörjnings framtid.

> Ja, det är viktigt att göra jordbrukspolitiken samstämmig med EU:s biståndspolitik. Därför arbetar jag mot alla former av exportbidrag och för alternativa certifieringsförfaranden för utvecklingsländer så att de kan exportera till oss. Jag arbetar också för att de i handelsavtal får behålla sina exporttullar för att få mer lokal vidareförädling.
> Vårt beroende av proteinimport är ett svårt problem med ständigt ökande köttkonsumtion. Jag arbetar för ett utkastförbud för fisk så att vi inte tömmer haven för foder och att konstgödsel ska beskattas för sina miljöskador. Jag vill också att vi inför krav på att man följer FN-konventioner om miljö samt ILO-regler när det gäller fodergrödor. Det är viktigt med växtföljd för att på ett hållbart sätt skapa proteiner på vår egen mark.
> Jag anser att jordbruksstöd bör betalas för ekosystemtjänster så att vi betalar för minskat kväveläckage, biologisk mångfald m.m. men inte för industriproduktion på jordbruksmark där marken utarmas och det behövs mängder av fossil energi. Jag anser att en acceptabel kompromiss är att stöden minskar men att länder som vill ge särskilda (hållbara stöd) utöver EU-stöd ska kunna göra det om syftet är än mer miljöarbete. Jag arbetar också för ökade djurskyddskrav. Tyvärr kommer reformen helt säkert inte nå våra mål, inte ens ett totalförbud mot exportstöd verkar finnas kvar, det kommer finnas kvar "som nödåtgärd". Den gröna gruppen delar alla mina åsikter med den skillnaden att de inte vill minska jordbruksbudgeten utan "bara" göra den grönare.
>
> Mvh,
> Isabella

First of all, the letter I sent was in English and I signed as a Romanian citizen. Therefore, replying in Swedish is impolite, to put it mildly. I may not be the best Swedish speaker (I speak Norwegian though, so it helps a lot) but I knew from the first two lines that this woman has no idea what she's talking about. So let's try an imperfect translation into English:

> Thank you for your letter and thank you care about our food supply's future.
> Yes, it is important to make agricultural policy consistent with the EU's development policy. Therefore, I work against all forms of export subsidies and the alternative certification procedures for developing countries so that they can export to us. I also work for those in the trade industry telling them that they must retain export duties to get more local processing.
> Our dependence on protein import is a difficult problem with increasing > meat consumption. I work for a discard ban for fish so we do not empty the ocean to feed and fertilizers to be taxed for their environmental damage. I also wish that we follow the UN conventions on environment and ILO rules for feed crops. It is important to implement crop rotation in order to have sustainable creation of proteins in our own land.

> I believe that agricultural subsidies should be paid for ecosystem services that we pay for reduced nitrogen leaching, biodiversity etc. but not for industrial production on agricultural land where the soil is depleted and required amounts of fossil energy. I believe that an acceptable compromise is to reduce subsidies, but those countries that want to give special (sustainable support) beyond EU support be allowed to do so if the purpose is more environmental. I also work for higher animal welfare standards. Unfortunately, the reform will certainly not achieve our goals, not even a total ban on export subsidies seems to be on the table and it will remain "as an emergency measure." The Green [parliamentary] group all share my views with the difference that they do not want to reduce the agricultural budget without "just" make it more "green".
>
> Sincerely,
>
> Isabella

My first reaction was: Vad fan snackar du om? (What the fuck are you talking about?). But then I understood: This is the level of interest shown by MEPs for the citizens they are supposed to represent.
This could also be just an automatic message that she wrote some time ago and it replies automatically. Though it's difficult to establish that because I replied to this e-mail asking her why she sent me an e-mail regarding agricultural policy when I asked her about the freedom of the Internet and the ever increasing anti-male ideological approach when it comes to domestic policy. I got no response to that so far.
The European Parliament is full with various kinds of leftist ideologues (environmentalists, feminists, Maoists, Stalinists, classical Marxists etc.) who couldn't care less about anything else than their agenda being imposed upon the nations in the European Union. Oh, did I say nations? Sorry, to the EU – we're all "Europeans" and there are no nations, just Member States as if Bulgaria, Spain and the UK are the same thing.
I asked Mrs. Lövin (so far no reply) as I ask everyone: What good does it bring having a "greener" agriculture whilst everyone's individual freedom goes out on the window in the name of an ever-increasing misandric culture? Qui bono?

[1] http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/to-the-european-parliament/
[2] http://www.europarl.europa.eu/sides/getDoc.do?pubRef=-//EP//TEXT+REPORT+A7-2012-0

401+0+DOC+XML+V0//EN – The report in question – full text (in English)
[3] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Charter_of_Fundamental_Rights_of_the_European_Union
[4] http://news.cnet.com/8301-1023_3-57573771-93/eu-votes-to-reject-porn-ban-proposals/
[5] http://www.europarl.europa.eu/sides/getDoc.do?type=CRE&reference=20130311&secondRef=ITEM-019&language=EN&ring=A7-2012-0401 – The complete content of all the positions taken in the European Parliament with regards to this report. (in multiple languages)
[6] http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/feminist-lies-feminism/eus-feminist-crusader-never-stops/
[7] http://english.pravda.ru/business/companies/28-07-2009/108455-men_crisis-0/
[8] http://praguemonitor.com/2012/07/09/social-democrat-mep-ji%C5%99%C3%AD-havel-dies
[9] http://www.europarl.europa.eu/meps/en/96675/ISABELLA_LOVIN.html
[10] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Isabella_L%C3%B6vin

False rape allegations finally getting some light

March 14, 2013 | by VFM News and Commentary | Link | Original Link

---

New figures coming out of England and Wales state that two people are being prosecuted per month for making false allegations of rape and wasting police time. It's the first time these types of details have been compiled for England and Wales.
Two people being prosecuted per month for false rape allegations is quite significant, but the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) thinks otherwise. They have stated that the only thing that these figures show is:

> "How unusual the problem is."

The Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) looked at a total period of 17 months finding that in that time 35 people were charged for false rape allegations.
Keir Starmer QC, head of the CPS, called the cases:

> "Serious but rare."

It does not matter how "rare" it may or may not be. That is two lives permanently ruined per month, and that is two too many. When are people going to wake-up to the fact that women are accusing men of rape, knowing full well that the allegations are false and not giving a shit about the consequences the men will face because of these lies?
Some of the numbers coming out of England and Wales are:

- Out of 159 suspected cases referred to the CPS, 35 ended in a prosecution.
- Almost half of the accusers were aged under 21, some were under 16.
- 92% of those prosecuted were women.
- 98% of those accused of rape were men, and the majority were aged over 21.
- 84% of those making false claims identified their "attacker". One case saw a woman randomly accuse a man she saw on Facebook.
- 18% of those making false claims had "a mental health problem".

Jason, 21, was accused by his ex-girlfriend of raping her.
"It was devastating," he told reporters.

> "I was getting harassed outside of work, harassed in work, it's just terrifying."
> "Someone approached me and told me to stay away from my ex or basically he'd come back and finish me off completely. He punched me twice in the face and once in the stomach."

There are currently no laws in place which allow those accused of rape to remain anonymous, until they are found guilty, so anyone accused of rape has no right to anonymity or protection under the current law.
Support groups for men falsely accused of rape say the problem "doesn't end when the accusation is proven untrue, as the claim remains on their criminal record until they apply to get it removed – which can take several months."

The Association of Chief Police Officers (Acpo) confirmed that "details of an accusation and the fact it was proven to be a lie, would remain on a police record for six years." However, they also say "it would not be revealed to anyone doing a background check."
In the last 18 months, Nottinghamshire Police prosecuted two women successfully for making false rape allegations.
One of those successful prosecutions was Rosie Dodd, 20, who was sentenced to only two years after accusing three men of raping her. Police said she made the claim "because she was embarrassed she'd slept with all three of them in one night."
Because of her bad judgment and feelings of embarrassment she decided it would be better to ruin the lives of three men instead of owning her actions? This type of behavior is deplorable, and any woman that falsely accuses a man of rape should be sentenced to a minimum of 10 years behind bars with no time off for good behavior. After all, men who are falsely accused are afforded no real justice or anonymity. He will live in absolute terror from the moment he is falsely accused and, if he is found innocent, he has to wait six years for the false accusation to be stricken from police records. So why does she only get 2 years for such a heinous crime? The justice system is indeed broken.
The question is: Why do some women falsely accuse men of rape? You'd have to be seriously disturbed to even contemplate ruining an innocent man's life wouldn't you?
The answer to the question is simple; women act like this is because they are constantly told that they are not responsible for their actions and treated like toddlers by society. They have learned that society puts women on pedestals and this has fostered an inability to own one's own actions which has created an environment where women do not care who gets hurt by their actions. As long as they feel better, that's all that matters. These women not only devastate the lives of those men they falsely accuse, they also make it harder for women who really have been raped to be taken seriously.
Being given a sentence of only 2 years for falsely accusing three men of rape is atrocious and a complete miscarriage of justice.
I am however hopeful that these new numbers being released will be the wake-up call people need to finally realize that women are not always the poor helpless victims they pretend to be. That there are many women out there that wouldn't even think twice about falsely accusing a man, or three, of rape to save face, feel better, or get revenge. Remember, these are only numbers coming out of England and Wales, so who knows how many false rape accusations there are per year worldwide.
But no matter if it is one false accusation, or a thousand. These false allegations are completely devastating to the men that are wrongfully accused. Their lives are permanently ruined once a woman cries rape, and even one innocent life destroyed is one too many.

Thunderfoot Destroys Sarkeesian Completely

March 15, 2013 | by VFM News and Commentary | Link | Original Link

---

From Thunderfoot's Channel:
In this video I take to task Feminist Frequencys latest video on 'Tropes vs women: the damsel in distress'
I have two main problems with her video, the first is the way she takes a very, VERY natural response, like wanting to protect your loved ones, as for instance a damsel in distress, and turns this into objectifying the damsel in distress. This is simply bollox. Most people are perfectly capable of wanting to protect a loved one without thinking of them as an object.
Secondly is turning the games industry into some patriarchal conspiracy out to subjugate and objectify women. This is simply delusional, the games industry only cares about turning a profit, which it does by turning out fun games that people like to play.
I also find it rather weak that she holds up the 'pity shield' and adopts professional victimhood as seen in her ted talk. The conspiracy she paints is pretty paranoid. The reality is, pretty much everyone who wildly expresses an controversial opinion forcefully on the internet gets hatemail. In Anitas case, I think the majority of hatemail she got was simply because she was talking bollox. Thats always kinda a button issue on the internet!
For a breakdown of Feministfrequencys dissertation:
http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=p6gLmc...

Feministing the women of Good Men Project

March 15, 2013 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

A special note to the women who own, operate, and especially the women who read The Good Men Project: you're becoming as irrelevant as Feministing.

In terms of overall traffic to the site, Feministing was passed up earlier this year by A Voice for Men. Now Good Men Project is in our rear view mirror, too.

The web site known as The Good Men Project started a few years ago with something on the order of a half million dollars of seed money, advertisers, and a paid staff of fairly significant size. Ostensibly set up to discuss men's issues, the project was dogged from the beginning by gender ideologue sensitivities, and over time has deteriorated into nothing but the same stale pap we've come to expect from most mainstream media outlets: fawning over women, and mewling apologism for the supposedly inferior character of the average male today. The message wasn't, as some of us hoped, about what's good about men. Oh no. It's become pretty obvious what it really is: turning young men into a "project," to shame and goad men to be "good," as in "good little lapdogs who never offend anyone, especially women."

Indeed, as time went on, The Good Men Project only got worse, as the voices of women, as well as men, who are in any way critical of modern feminist discourse, or who just plain defend the right of men to be themselves without apology, were shown the door. Those who actively defend males and maleness routinely have their submissions rejected, and even the voices of women who are critical of the demonization of men and the infantalization of women are quietly purged from the records. Anything that might offend the dominant gender discourse is verboten at The Good Men Project, and it shows very well to anyone who bothers to look. Despite its editor's claims to the contrary, open advocacy for males and criticism of dominant feminist ideology, let alone any sort of criticism of modern women, is taboo at The Good Men Project.

Indeed, the "let's not hurt anyone's feelings except men's" deterioration of The Good Men Project shows so well that yesterday, A Voice For Men, having already blown past media darling Jessica Valenti's Feministing earlier this year, just passed the well-funded Good Men Project in the Alexa worldwide rankings as well. A Voice for Men is now more than the the #1 men's advocacy group on the internet, and the #1 men's advocacy site in the world. I mean yeah, sure, we're both of those things. But we're also now better trafficked than gynocentric, man-shaming sites like The Good Men Project even though they have far more mainstream media respectability and funding clout. Even though we work on nothing but donations and with more than 90% of our work done by volunteers, we've blown past "professional" publications working with venture capital and ad revenues and fawning writeups in major mainstream publications.

Now why is that, Feministing readers? Why is that, you women of The Good Men Project? You may wonder why I keep mentioning the women of The Good Men Project. Well my dears, there's a reason: if you're a woman who reads The Good Men Project, that makes you typical of their readers. While you sit there wondering where all the "good men" are, and hoping to find them at TGMP, you're spending most of your time with your fellow women. As a rule men don't give a damn about The Good Men Project. For the most part, it's mostly just written for, and read by, women like you.

A look at the publicly available data on The Good Men Project shows the damning truth: most of their readers are well-educated, female, and childless. Not that it's shameful to be educated, or childless, or female. But that's who most of you are. Even those of you who have children are likely single mothers. And that paints a very sad picture for you, and everyone who bothers reading that site, because it tells us the likely reality: you're mostly a bunch of women wishing you had good men in your life, and hoping they will help you find one, or will help you somehow mold the men in your life like pieces of clay until they become the men you want.

I hate to break it to you, honey, but: it won't work. The Good Men Project is pandering to you. They're telling you what you want to hear, what you want to believe, rather than telling you the truth. They want to tell you you're a poor persecuted victim, who is at the same time as good as or better than any man at anything, and that men who don't measure up to your standards are inferior. Meanwhile, most men won't bother even hanging around, because all the Good Men Project says to men is that their experiences, needs, dreams, and ambitions mean nothing, or are only meaningful when they meet female approval, and that men must subordinate their interests and their feelings to the feelings and interests of women like you.

And most of all, they expect men to apologize to women, for anything women happen to be irritated about at the moment.

Like Feministing, the Good Men Project doesn't give a damn about telling young women that relationships are truly a two-way street. Yes, men should care what women want, but the wider culture already tells men that. It tells men that endlessly. And for the most part, historically, most men have always cared about women and what women want. What The Good Men Project won't tell you (and what Feministing-style web sites especially won't tell you) is that what men want matters every bit as much as what you want, and men are sick and tired of apologizing for saying what they want. They're also sick and tired of having to lie when they're asked about it.

In fact, arguably, in the current legal and cultural climate, what men want may matter more than what women want. Why? Because the world is full of single women whining that they can't get a "good man," but is also full of men who are increasingly saying "fuck it" and not caring. When faced with the fact that men are increasingly indifferent at best, ideologues of various stripes respond to by trying to shame men into being what men are "supposed" to be–supposed to be according to the ideologues–rather than doing the sensible thing and just asking those men to honestly say what they want, and asking them to be honest about why they no longer seem to give a damn what the world in general, or women in particular, want from them.

Almost no one ever just asks men this–or when they do ask, it's a loaded question they're afraid to answer. The browbeating gets old, and most men want no part of it.

Indeed, gender ideologues often grossly mischaracterize what modern men say about their experiences, stereotyping the crap out of them and never even bother apologizing for it. Oh, but it's not just "liberal" feminists who are in the business of trying to shame men into being what they want them to be, conservative ideologues love doing it too. Now put yourself in men's shoes: why wouldn't you say "screw that and screw you" too? Let's face it, you ladies of The Good Men Project (because, once again, we know most of you are women; men mostly don't read The Good Men Project, because they have no reason to): in this society, being female makes you the privileged one. Schools have greased the skids to make your life easier, workplaces all over the country have greased the skids to make your hiring and promotion easier than it is for men, laws and policies are in place everywhere to protect your delicate sensibilities, and still all you can do is whine about how tough your life is and how oppressed you are because of the choices you made.

Nobody gives a damn about men's higher unemployment, men's higher suicide rate, men's higher work-related death and injury rates, men's downward spiral in education, men's growing health decline compared to women, men's desires, men's civil rights in family and criminal courts, or the children who desperately need their fathers but are denied them by selfish single mothers and a socipathic family court system, or the men in debtor's prison who are broke and destitute and put there at the hands of a system that doesn't care and claims to be acting in "the best interests of the children." No one over at The Good Men Project much wants to talk about any of that if they can avoid it. They don't much want to talk about paternity fraud either, even though it's another good reason why a sensible man should think twice before even having sex with you, let alone a relationship.

Even when these people grudgingly admit that there's a problem with fathers not being around their children, no one wants to talk much about women's role in that, even though it's patently obvious to anyone with a brain that the #1 thing keeping most men away from their own children is those children's mothers. Well, that and a family court system that enables psychopath mothers to get away with such child abuse. (Those courts enable other kinds of child abuse too. By the way, did any of these sites you're reading ever tell you women commit most child abuse and most child homicides? I imagine not. But they do you know. Does telling you that hurt your feelings? Ask yourself why, and why it should matter that it hurts your feelings if it happens to be true. And it does happen to be true. So much for the brutal man stereotype, huh?)

No, no one you're reading over at The Good Men Project dares speak up about these things, or if they do it's only in the most delicately couched, careful, "sensitive" terms designed to "protect" you from thoughts and ideas and facts you may need to hear about. And why are they so cautious about bringing these things up so carefully, if they bother to bring them up at all? Because the person who cares least about these things apparently, is you. They assume that about you anyway. They assume you would prefer to believe that men are the privileged class, when for decades now it's been the other way around. In fact, if you're like the typical reader of the Good Men Project, you're female, under 35, and have lived in a world not just of legal equality but of legal superiority for your entire life. Which may come as a shock to you, but is true nonetheless. And they assume you'll be incensed at being told that, and avoid bringing it up.

They don't really think much of you when it gets right down to it, do they?

Now here's an interesting thing the statistics also show: not only is A Voice for Men now a more popular site than The Good Men Project (or the even more irrelevant, man-hating site Feministing): A Voice for Men actually has more gender symmetry.

That's right, there's a bigger female readership at A Voice for Men than there is male readership at The Good Men Project. AVfM also has a boatload more female readers than a lot of feminist web sites, in raw numbers if not percentages. Most of our readers are in the same age range as The Good Men Project, 18-35. The big difference is, The Good Men Project is mostly read by women like you, whereas A Voice for Men is mostly read by men, but is also read by a lot more women than any other genuine men's advocacy site and more women than a ton of "gender neutral" sites. In fact we've even got better gender symmetry than internet giants like Reddit, let alone any feminist web site or any pseudo-men's site like The Good Men Project.

How is it possible that the ragtag group of volunteers working in their spare time that make up the staff at A Voice for Men has managed to not only eclipse these much higher profile, much better funded enterprises, and is full of the young, theoretically eligible men who rarely go to The Good Men Project? And how is it further possible that a good third of us over here are also women? What's the difference?

I'll tell you what the difference is: we respect men and have compassion for who men and boys really are, not for how you want them to be. Moreover, unlike feminist web sites that pretend to be for men but aren't, we actually respect women. We respect them, and we show that respect by telling them the truth, rather than convenient lies–convenient lies that may make you feel better about yourself but don't actually do anything to make your lives, or men's lives, better.

See, here at A Voice for Men, we don't care about your feelings. We care about the truth. And if you don't like hearing the truth, too bad. You've been sold a bill of goods, girls. A bunch of pernicious, man-hating lies: that men are privileged, men are pigs, men are greedy, men are rapists, men are sex-depraved, men are selfish, and oh, by the way, possibly the biggest whopper of all: that your grandfathers and great-grandfathers oppressed your grandmothers and great-grandmothers.

Truth: men, especially young men, have heard this line of lies about themselves, their fathers, their grandfathers, their great-grandfathers, their uncles, and so on their whole lives, and have had it pounded into their heads since they were children that women by nature are morally superior, and they're calling bullshit: you aren't any better than us. It's a lie, and because of that lie, we increasingly do not give a damn what you think or what you want. What young men want is the truth, and these days, the truth is often ugly. Deal with that as reality, and maybe you can be part of the solution and not part of the problem.

Young men are sick of being told what you want. They've had what you want browbeaten into them since they were tiny children. And they are increasingly looking at modern women like you and wondering what the hell you have to offer–and if that doesn't become apparent in short order, they conclude that you're good for nothing except maybe casual sex, and maybe not even that.

Oh, did that sound sexist? Did that hurt your feelings? Too bad, it's the truth, and until the people running places like The Good Men Project start actually asking men what they honestly think and what they honestly feel and what their honest experiences are, without sugar-coating it to protect your delicate feminine sensibilities, you're going to be nothing but a bunch of sad, aging women wondering why you just can't find a "good man" to be part of your life.
You want a slice of unvarnished truth? Those other sites didn't have the balls to ask you the most important question of all, which is this: what is it about you that makes you worth it to any man?
And if you're reaching for pat stereotype answers like "men want submission" and "men want obedience," try again. That is not what most men are looking for. So stop assuming you know, and start actually asking. Shut your mouth and listen for a change, rather than assuming you know, or interrupting with arguments. Stop femsplaining, and just listen without interrupting, with your ears open and your mouth closed, and think about what you're hearing without putting it through your ideological filters and stupid stereotypes.
This is a serious, non-rhetorical question: why should a man risk being with you when a false allegation from you can ruin his career and maybe land him in jail? Why should a man risk marrying you when the family courts will allow you to steal his children and turn him into "Uncle Dad" while you go off and find a new man you find more appealing, while he has to give up half his income to you and see and hear his children's voices pretty much only when you feel like it, or once or twice a week? Why should he risk his health, his happiness, his emotional and spiritual and psychological and physical and financial well-being, possibly even his freedom and his fundamental human rights, just to make you happy until the end of his life, which will likely be much shorter than yours?
Why are you worth that risk?
And furthermore, if you can do a rational calculation and conclude that maybe you aren't worth the risk to most men, what will you do about it?
Because calling men who look at the sorry state of legal and cultural affairs "misogynists" just because they recognize reality? It isn't working anymore, and neither are a lot of the other old shaming tactics used to shut men up. Men don't hate women–indeed, we arguably love women even when they don't deserve it–and men don't hate you in particular. Not most of you, anyway. But they look at what you have on offer, they look at the risks involved, and they ask themselves the frank question of whether or not you're worth it.
By the way, if you're getting your nose bent out of shape by such a frank, reasonable question? Odds are you probably aren't worth it. Not for any sane man, anyway.
Indeed, if you aren't woman enough to answer a blunt question without falling apart in tears because some man was mean enough to ask you an uncomfortable question, why would any sane person want to be with you at all?
Places like The Good Men Project and Feministing won't ask you an "insensitive" question like “why are you worth the risk?” Because that would involve treating you like an adult. Those of us in the Men’s Human Rights Movement, on the other hand, will tell you the truth, and we’ll tell it to you without any lurid “trigger warnings,” and we’ll ask you tough questions without assuming you’re going to turn into a puddle of jelly or fuming, shrewish rage. Or we’ll treat such histrionics with the contempt such childishness deserves. Because that’s how adults treat other adults who act like children.

So which did you want, convenient lies about female oppression and female superiority and male hegemony and brutality? More lies about having it all? More lies about how if your man isn’t neat enough or doesn’t achieve enough you shouldn’t feel bad about dumping him? More lies about how your needs matter more than his?

Or did you want to hear the truth, whatever the truth is? If what you want is the truth, come to the Men’s Human Rights Movement, and come on over here to A Voice for Men. Here, you will be treated like something no feminist web site will treat you like: an adult human being with agency and intelligence and the power to make your own choices and to take the responsibility for those choices. Here you get the respect that comes with being treated like an adult and being told the truth even if the truth is painful. You’ll get the respect of being told that the “good men” you’re looking for are all around you, they’re just living in a cultural and legal environment where you may just not be worth the risk of taking on as a girlfriend or wife.

And maybe, just maybe, you can even be a part of making that change.

It’s up to you of course. Let the losers of history, the “Good Men” Project and Feministing, keep telling you you’re oppressed and that if only men would twist themselves into a pretzel to please you the world would be a better place. Or you can join us, and help make the world a better place for both men and women, where there’s respect and compassion enough to go around for everybody. That’s up to you really.

Good Men Project and Feministing: in our rearview mirror. Next on our list: Jezebel. We’re coming for you too, girls. Have no doubt about it. You no longer hold a monopoly on the gender discourse. The Men’s Human Rights Movement is here, and growing. Better get used to it.

Jonathan Goldsbie: Head in sand, talking out ass

March 15, 2013 | by Dan Perrins | Link | Original Link

The Dr. Janice Fiamengo lecture is still kicking up a froth of fear in the Toronto feminist community.
Toronto's NOW Magazine (not to be confused with the National Organization for Women) had one of their writers pen some bird cage liner on the whole affair. His name is Jonathan Goldsbie.
If you look at Goldsbie's linkedin account you will find this tidbit:

"Resident Commie
National Post, Inc."

Well, that and in his education section you'll find he attended University of Toronto but there is no list of accomplishments or degrees.
And with that dear reader let me take you for a short trip through Mr Goldsbie's thoughts on Dr. Fiamengo's lecture. Don't blink, its a short trip, his thoughts are shallow and myopic to say the least.
Goldsbie's article starts off with the introduction to Dr. Fiamengo's lecture, which began with a song. Well it began with a song after the feminist brownskirts™ attempted to put a halt to the lecture by yanking the fire alarm.
Said yanking, if memory serves me correctly, had more than one fire truck responding. Although this article is not about that single incident I believe it warrants a little discussion.
I am not entirely sure the feminist who pulled the fire alarm realizes just how dangerous that illegal act was. What you managed to do, oh moron of gargantuan magnitude, was to waste the time and efforts of an emergency service; one that saves lives. This simple bonehead move on your part could have cost lives if a fire had broken out in the firehouse's district. You could have also caused injury or death if people had of made a mad rush to the door and someone was trampled. You could have even caused someone to have a coronary.
I realize gender studies does not instill in its students common sense , ethics or morals but for fuck's sake try and use the brain you were born with and realize just how easily your illegal act could have turned tragic for some innocent person(s). Any or all of these scenarios could have very easily played out that night and rest assured there would be an outcry for your empty head on a platter, and rightfully so. But alas, I digress.
After Goldsbie does his run through of the opening segment of Fiamengo's lecture and his opening remarks on it he then gets into the meat of his attack on the MHRM.

> As a phrase, "men's rights" is no less absurd than "straight pride" and no less troubling than "white power." But it's unclear how many of the 160 or so people packing Trinity College's George Ignatieff Theatre to hear Fiamengo talk would draw that connection.

OK, so Goldsbie is declaring that the men's human rights are absurd, morally equivalent to racial bigotry and homophobia. Oh my god, Myrtle, gather up the kids and grab the scatter gun. There is men out there, and they say they deserve rights! How absurd! And troubling, too!

Goldsbie is taking a similar, if not identical track, to one of the brownskirts™. Well, one of the honorary ones with a penis, who went railing on for about twice of his allotted time to ask a question about how the MHRM was purely white boys and gay hating Republicans racists, and how they excluded him and all. The offended brownskirt™ with a penis appears to have gone to the Jonathan Goldsbie School of Can't See Shit, as he appeared not to notice that Hartley Ellis, a Jamaican gentleman on the board of directors for CAFE was up at the podium sharing his experiences with the family court system. Ellis had apparently forgotten to surrender his Blackness before speaking, but the offendee didn't notice, he just kept complaining about all the Whiteness. Goldsbie watched the video, but apparently he didn't noticed the guy who wasn't noticing

From there Goldsbie goes on to claim that the MHRM is ignorant of various inequalities and injustices, but he just forgot to tell us what they were. Maybe he thought we would not notice that, but we did. And we have, in fact, noticed a lot of inequalities, like the way people are treated when the speak up about men's issues. And just a small number of others.

The following numbers are from the AVfM facts section

Men are about 99% of all military casualties and deaths, about 93% of all industrial casualties and deaths, 76% of all homicide victims and about 80% of all suicides.

Do you notice any inequity there, Goldsbie?

Men are the majority of rape victims but feminists don't notice that. I know, its prison rape. It doesn't count. Why should we care about them folks? After all they are just men, and they are in prison so they must deserve it. Still, here is something else you and your coven never thought about: the definition of rape itself. See, forced sex is forced sex, and whether it is penetration or envelopment should have no bearing on the definition of the crime itself. Only it does. Legally speaking, forced envelopment is not rape. Notice anything unequal about that?

Women receive custody in divorce proceedings the lion's share of the time, after being the most likely to initiate the divorce and strip her oppressor of his assets, with full support of the state. States are pretty hard on oppressors, don't you think? None of this is a real problem, though. It can't be because feminism says it is nothing to worry about.

Of the top fifteen leading causes of death that men lead in twelve, are tied in two and trail in one. That isn't something to be looked at either. The anti-male discriminatory sentencing that goes on in the criminal courts is also something we noticed.

Don't even get me started on false rape allegations, there just isn't enough words to describe how feminism has ~~screwed~~ raped the pooch on that one.

I could go on, but I don't think Goldsbie would notice. And that is the thing about his brand of not noticing things. It is not that he just misses it. It is not even that his vision is clouded by human programming to ignore the problems of men. His kind of not noticing takes some real work. You have to not want to notice things to miss them on this level. You have to try to. And you have to try hard.

At the very least I will give the man credit for one thing, He isn’t lazy.

Dr. Paul on 'men can stop rape'

March 16, 2013 | by Dr. Paul | Link | Original Link

Publishers note: Dr. Paul has been in a state of semi-retirement. Recent events, he tells me, have compelled him to put down the piña colada, move his fat ass from the beach lounger and into his ragamuffin cabaña, and fire up the laptop. That makes me nervous, being that I am all about not offending anyone. But what can I say? He's Dr. Paul, and he won't be denied his say. Buckle up, folks, and remember, it's not my fault. PE

Ladies, it is time you and I had a nice little sit down talk. Well, to be more honest, it really is time that you shut up and listen while I try to drill some sense in your head.

Before I start I want to give you my standard disclaimer. If what I am about to say does not apply to you, then there is no reason to be offended. And if you want to be offended on behalf of women everywhere, then stick around. That grandiosity needs to be addressed…with a little boot therapy.

That being said, we need to talk about rape. Or, rather, the prevention of it, if there is such a thing.

There have been a lot of feminists out there for the last several months putting forward their plan to end rape, and it is a hum dinger. It is a genius plan. Well, it's genius for you if your IQ doesn't exceed your shoe size.

It's the new "Tell men not to rape anyone" plan to prevent sexual assaults against women. And I bet you were wondering why no one ever thought of it sooner.

In case you had not heard, here is an example of the advocacy for it in action:

Now see there? See how easy it is to stop rape? All you have to do is target the entire population of men and tell them not to rape. I'm telling you, they ought to give Zerlina a Nobel or something with her Xanax next time she is at the clinic.

Just think of it, women the world over will no longer have to care where they are or what they are doing or who they are with because there will be no one who will rape them, provided we have made sure that every man on the planet has been told rape is bad and not to do it.

And I don't want to suggest that women are in any way responsible for making decisions that may reduce their chances of being attacked, but I'd also like to suggest a backup plan as a failsafe in case there is some men out there who the feminist establishment has not reached because of patriarchy.

Ladies, repeat after me.

Don't rape me.

See there, using feminist logic, all you have to do to fend off a rape (not that I am in any way saying you should ever have to fend off a rape) is that you can offer said corrective instruction directly to your rapist! All you have to do is be prepared to tell any man who has not already heard (which must be the case if he is sexually assaulting you) that he is not supposed to rape.

That'll put the brakes on 'em for sure.
Seriously ladies, are you really this stupid? Or this inept and helpless?
Let's see if we can drive the point in another way.
Can we stop locking our homes and cars, and indeed become outraged and offended by anyone suggesting we take responsibility for securing our property, by simply telling people not to be thieves? Does that sound like a fucking plan to you? If it does, you may just be stupid enough to unnecessarily put yourself in the path of a rapist. And GET THIS, he is not going to stop because you tell him to. I am pretty sure that is why they call it rape. He is also not going to hesitate from raping anyone else because someone told him it was wrong and that he should not do it. If you have any sense at all you will get that crap out of your head once and for all.
Here is the problem, ladies. Just like every other bill of goods you have ever been sold by feminists (who seriously don't give a shit whether you get raped or not and may in fact count on some funding if you do), the idea that we can prevent rape by "teaching men not to rape," is a pile of bullshit so high that it would have scared Evel Knievel in his heyday to even think about trying to jump over it.
And that is not even the hard part, ladies. The hard part is a cold, honest look at why you are being sold this shit. And it is hard because the problem is you.

Yes, you. This stupid and patently dangerous rape reduction plan is in high gear because you demand answers that don't make you accountable for taking care of yourself or for making sound decisions. It is the part of you, these days near all of you, that sees life through the eyes of a perpetual little girl who thinks Daddy, or some other service provider, is supposed to be everywhere at all times with all the answers, preventing anything bad from happening, so that you get to stay in your little cocoon and never even have to think scary thoughts.
They are selling this snake oil to a lot of you because that is the only thing you are willing to listen to; because being responsible for taking care of yourself in frightening situations is beyond the scope of your emotional maturity.
And you are sucking it up at your own peril.

Go back and watch that video again, and figure out how to tell yourself that you don't see it. Tell yourself you don't see Hannity, buffoon that he is, walking on eggshells as though he is talking to an emotionally fragile little girl. Tell yourself that Zerlina isn't just having a control fit, demanding that someone make the world a place where she does not have to take any responsibility for defending herself.

Look ladies, the world, despite the fact that it is a safer place for you than it ever has been in history, can still get rough. Shit happens. And shit happens that you cannot solve with feminist sound bites, as though feminist sound bites ever solved anything. But if you are really concerned for your physical safety, then grow the fuck up and learn how to take care of yourself. Technology has provided you ample ways to do it.

The day may come for any of us when we have to face a physically superior attacker. If that time comes for you, pick your weapon of choice now; something substantive, or a feminist slogan designed to feel warm and fuzzy, raise money and leave you completely vulnerable when it counts the most.

Oh yeah, if someone tells you not to get in a car with a stranger, take the fucking chip off your shoulder and listen to them. It is good advice. Just like you were told when you were a kid. And since you are likely still a kid, it should make some sense to you. Sure, the stranger in the car is supposed to be a nice person that would not harm anyone, just because someone told them that was the kind of person to be.

But that is a fairytale. Please check your date of birth on your driver license before accepting that kind of standard. You may be a little old for it.

There is a lot of other advice that might keep your gullible ass out of a sling, too, but I won't go into all that now because until you start to comprehend the reality that you need to be responsible for taking care of yourself, none of it will sink in anyway. You will just keep insisting, childishly, foolishly, that somebody, somewhere, should tell all the bad, bad men not to be that way so that you can keep living in a fucking dream.

You might do well to remember that in any given person's life, a certain amount of dreams turn out to be nightmares.

Maybe, just maybe, you should wake up.

Kat Banyard, Laura Bates, Finn Mackay: The noisy handful

March 16, 2013 | by Mike Buchanan | Link | Original Link

[quote]Mankind is governed by minorities, seldom or never by majorities. It suppresses its feelings and its beliefs and follows the handful that makes the most noise. Sometimes the noisy handful is right, sometimes wrong, but no matter, the crowd follows it. ~ Mark Twain, The Mysterious Stranger (1910) [/quote]

[dropcap]I[/dropcap] have had a hectic time since International Women's Day (8 March) when I was incensed by the respect shown towards two young militant feminists on national television programmes. The first was Kat Banyard, who was shown so much deference by the veteran broadcaster Jon Snow on the flagship Channel 4 news programme that it made me feel quite nauseous. The video is here. In her interview Ms Banyard made an outrageous claim about sexual harassment of schoolgirls, which I'll be outlining shortly. UK Feminista, an organisation she founded, is assaulting the minds of young people, notably schoolgirls. I'll return to that matter later in this article.
On the same day we were treated to Laura Bates, 26, of The Everyday Sexism Project. The video is here, and it starts off with some words from our feminist Conservative prime minister, David Cameron, in response to a planted question from a Conservative MP, Mark Pritchard:
Ms Bates received no challenging from the show's anchor, former national newspaper editor Andrew Neil, a man with a reputation for being ruthless with people who make assertions as patently absurd as Ms Bates was making. He was happy to let Ms Bates talk to her heart's content, and even the renowned sociologist Catherine Hakim, whilst making some insightful points about feminism in the modern era, made little effort to interrupt Ms Bates's tirade.
On the eve of my recent BBC Radio 2 interview, I was informed that it was to be Ms Bates who would be debating with me the case (or otherwise) for establishing our new political party Justice for Men & Boys (and the women who love them). My heart sank at the news, as you can imagine. I keep asking TV and radio producers to invite Germaine Greer, Harriet Harman MP, or the Guardian journalist Julie Bindel to debate with me, but so far without success.
Running a website devoted to asking women to whine about sexism must surely be a full-time job for Ms Bates. (A thought occurs to me – if she has a son in the fullness of time, will he be referred to as 'Master Bates' at school? You'd then have to feel sorry for him on a least two counts, wouldn't you? I digress.) I prepared for my discussion with Ms Bates as best I could, and this was the result.
Within an hour of the broadcast I'd been called and invited to contribute to four more radio programmes: BBC Radio 5 Live, the leading London commercial radio station LBC, and two other BBC radio stations. I'll post audio files of all the discussions on my YouTube channel as videos as soon as they're made available.

Ms Bates has an interesting and strictly unvarying debating style. If she ever runs out of feminism-related work she could surely find employment as a newscaster on North Korean television. She stares at her opponents, she's very strident, she talks very fast, she interrupts her opponents but steadfastly refused to be interrupted by them. I imagine she's used to men crumbling in the face of her angry onslaughts. Ironically, of course, she relies on men's deference to be heard at inordinate length. It didn't take her long to realise that her style wasn't going stop me making any points I wished to make. I allowed her to talk at length at times, when the points she was making were patently silly. One special moment was when she claimed that very few girls were studying physics at school due to sexism. Or was it due to gender stereotyping? I honestly can't recall. At times all I heard was, 'blah, blah, blah…'). I smiled at her remarks about why girls aren't studying physics, which didn't seem to please her, for some reason. It's a puzzle.
While she was engaged on her monologues, and staring intently at me, a thought kept coming to mind. It's the same one I have when I have discussions with religious fundamentalists (not something I care to do often). The thought was, 'The lights are on, but there's nobody at home, is there?' A great deal of what Ms Bates said in the early stages of the discussion came from a printed document in front of her. At one point Jeremy Vine asked, 'Are you reading this from a document?' and she replied, 'No!' I should have said to her, 'Sorry, Laura, but you are!' An opportunity missed.
After the discussion, once we were 'off air', Ms Bates turned to me and angrily demanded that I not send her 'any more threatening emails'. Now I'd never send a threatening email to anyone, let alone a feminist – why would I give them the ammunition? – so I replied politely, 'Laura, I haven't sent you any threatening emails. I sent a number of emails pointing you towards the evidence bases supporting what I was planning to say today, and suggested you might not want to use gender shaming tactics in the discussion, because you'd find them to be utterly ineffective against me.' She stormed out of the studio, leaving a bemused Jeremy Vine shaking his head in disbelief. He then said he'd enjoyed the discussion, and was fair in giving airtime to supporters of both Ms Bates's arguments and my own.
To return to the 'The lights are on…' point. Young women such as Ms Bates and Kat Banyard have clearly been brainwashed, and seem incapable of engaging with any narrative other than their own. The parallel with fundamentalist religious conviction is clear, demonstrating yet again that feminism is at its core a faith position immune to rational discussion.
When I debate issues concerning men and women in the workplace, I do so with the benefit of having had a 30-year-long business career, during which time I worked in many organisations as a senior executive and consultant. It struck me some time ago that many prominent militant feminists have typically achieved little or nothing outside the field of feminism, or as I prefer to think of it, the ignoble art of making women angry and bitter. Which brings us naturally back to the feminist campaigner and writer, Kat Banyard, who I believe is around 32. She was the founder of UK Feminista, whose strapline is (prepare to laugh) 'A movement of ordinary women and men campaigning for gender equality'. Priceless.

From Ms Banyard's personal profile on katbanyard.org.

> Kat featured in Glamour Magazine's 'The Glamour Power List 2011' and was shortlisted for a Liberty Human Rights Award in 2010. She was previously Campaigns Officer at the Fawcett Society and in 2007 she was profiled in Observer Woman magazine as one of 'The New Feminists'. Prior to her work at Fawcett, Kat worked for the Northern Refugee Centre in Sheffield setting up women's groups. She was born in 1982 and currently lives in London.

The Fawcett Society is the leading British militant feminist campaigning organisation, and a registered charity. Some of its funding has come from both central and local government – an assault on male taxpayers, to say the least. We plan to challenge its charitable status soon.
We return to Kat Banyard's televised interview with Jon Snow. The morning after the interview, I emailed Kat Banyard katbanyard@yahoo.co.uk the following:
[box type="note" icon=""]
Kat, good morning. I hope this finds you well. A number of things, but firstly your appearance on Channel 4 News last night. At a little after five minutes into the programme you made the claim, 'What we know is, one in three girls at school experiences sexual harassment on almost a daily basis (my emphasis)'. Wow. I looked on your website, and then that of an organisation you founded – UK Feminista – for the source of this statistic. This took me to the following link:
http://www.endviolenceagainstwomen.org.uk/data/files/Schools_Safe_4_Girls/YouGov_poll_for_EVAW_on_sexual_harassment_in_schools_2010.pdf
One of the questions on the survey document was addressed to 16-18 year old males and females:
'Has anyone at school ever (my emphasis) touched you sexually when you did not want it? This can include any groping, touching breasts or unwanted kissing.'
29% of girls said, 'Yes, they have'. Even leaving aside the point that 29% is as close to '1 in 4' as it is to '1 in 3', the important point is that the term 'ever' obviously refers to these individuals' whole school lives. Hardly 'on almost a daily basis', is it? So did you simply make a mistake on Channel 4 News, or did you deliberately mislead viewers, or do you have other evidence to support the claim? Should we just add your claim to the numerous fantasies, lies, delusions and myths spouted by feminists on the UK media yesterday? I'll be publicly posing these questions to you shortly on two websites, http://j4mb.wordpress.com and http://fightingfeminism.wordpress.com. Swayne O'Pie's excellent book Why Britain Hates Men: Exposing Feminism contains many examples of feminist lies and distortions of data in numerous areas including domestic abuse and violence. I now find it a safe bet to assume that whenever a militant feminist states '1 in 3' or '1 n 4' she's wrong. In four years of reading and writing about militant feminism, I've never found even one such claim which bore close scrutiny.

I note that 14% (1 in 7) of males in the survey also answered 'Yes' to the foregoing question in the survey, almost half the number of females who did so. Hmm, you didn't mention that on Channel 4 News, did you? A slip of memory, I'm sure.
[/box]
Regular visitors to AVfM will hardly be surprised that I've not had a response from Ms Barnard. For her the important thing is presumably that she's put another '1 in 3 females' lie into the public consciousness. The utter failure over many years of journalists and broadcasters to expose such women to critical attention is a scandal across the developed world.
In my view, one of the militant feminists' strategic decisions 30+ years ago was (sadly) a masterstroke (sorry, mistressstroke… doh!… msstroke…). That decision was to operate 'below the radar', to avoid criticism and minimise objections to their nefarious activities. There was only one downside to the strategy, and that was that succeeding generations of young women were less likely to be radicalised. Survey after survey in recent years show young women increasingly disinclined to term themselves feminists, because they associate the term (correctly) with middle-aged and older men-hating unattractive angry women. To counter the stereotype, these middle-aged and older feminists have adopted an increasingly low profile, which has allowed a new generation of women – still men-hating and angry, obviously – to step up to the plate and seek to radicalise young women. You might have thought radicalisation efforts wouldn't start until young women entered further education, given the plasticity of young minds, but you'd be wrong. Feminists are increasingly trying to brainwash young women (and young men, often) well before they enter the higher education system. Which brings us right back to Kat Banyard and UK Feminista. They offer workshops in schools and colleges – one imagines that left-inclined teachers welcome them with open arms – and offer guidance on numerous matters. One downloadable guide relates to setting up feminist groups in schools and colleges.
One could almost weep at these ideologically-driven assaults on the intellects of impressionable young people. One thing is sure. Kat Banyard and her ilk are doing all in their power to create a new generation of angry misandrous young women, and the MHRM has yet to start doing anything to match it.
One final thing. I recently sent a number of polite emails to Finn Mackay finn.mackay.09@bristol.ac.uk, a militant feminist 'academic' at Bristol University. One of those ultra-left-wing female 'academics' who'd otherwise be quite unemployable. She didn't reply to any of my emails, which didn't surprise me, but last night I was informed by a supporter that Ms Mackay had used her Twitter account to comment on my discussion with Laura Bates. She wrote:
@WeekWoman @theJeremyVine @TheWomensRoomUK @ least he had wonderful Laura from @EverydaySexism who was awesome and inspiring.
I was so delighted with this, that I immediately sent the following email to Ms Mackay:
Finn, good evening, I hope this finds you well. A supporter has pointed me to your Tweet on how Laura Bates 'wiped the floor' with me yesterday on Jeremy Vine's show. Thanks for giving me the heartiest laugh I've had in weeks. A pleasing number of new donors resulted from Laura's floor-wiping performance – one wrote of her, 'it was chilling, like listening to a religious fundamentalist'. There were several lady donors, including two mothers of boys. So when might I look forward to a studio discussion with you? Would BBC Radio Bristol suit you as well as it would suit me?

Have a good weekend.
I haven't heard back from Ms Mackay yet, but I hope I shall. I live in Bath, which is near Bristol, so I could pick her up on the way to the BBC studio. We'd have a very pleasant discussion on the way to the studio, I feel sure.

Leaping labia of lunacy

March 16, 2013 | by Dan Perrins | Link | Original Link

Some days I think that Southern Ontario has got to be filled with bottom of the barrel of Acme Fem & co activists. I've seen some rather bizarre shit roll across various MHRM / MRM sites wading through the webpages but this recent one is well, out there.
This current case of crazy involves a polyester pussy posse censoring free speech and open discourse by screaming down an invited speaker. And they are from, yup, you guessed it, Ontario.
On Wednesday, Conservative Member of Parliament for Kitchener Centre Stephen Woodworth was scheduled to give a talk at the University of Waterloo. The campus group that invited him, "Waterloo Students for Life," a pro-life organization.
Woodworth has been making the news for sometime. The introduction of his Bill 312, which seeks to define when life begins, already has the rank and file of feminists frothing at their shopworn mouths.
Right now in Canada, until a baby leaves the mother's birth canal it is not considered human. It has been that way for about 400 years according to his website. While abortion laws changed in Canada around January of 1988, the codifying of when a human begins to have rights or becomes human is antiquated and little out of date. Personally I think a little debate on the topic is in order.
Now before some feminist / fatboy white knight does a drive by quote mining expedition, let me be perfectly clear on this. I am open for debate on when life begins, not whether abortion should be legal.
Seems like the perfect spot to discuss ideas revolving around this subject would be a university, young minds meeting learned ones and all that. However feminists don't share this idea, in fact they are providing the citizens of Canada and abroad with some fine examples of gestapo-like censorship, coupled with some embarrassing, self demeaning comedy.
Wednesday's example at the University of Waterloo provides us with case study 569,932,021, 471, or, as I like to call it, The Leaping Labia Lunatic.
See, not only did the femistasi manage to stop freedom of speech, a protected right under Section 2 of The Charter of Rights and Freedoms, but they were able to do this, AGAIN, on a University campus to an elected member of the federal government.
Their modus operandi was to shout, scream act like petulant little children and as well as hold up banners clearly designed to intimidate. One of them read "If You Cut My Repro Choice I will Cut Off Yours." It was accented with a pair of scissors drawn in the middle of the six lines of feminist rabidness.
Some of the other protesters had hoods over their heads which reminded me of pictures of a KKK rally, but the hoods were smartly colored. At least the 'Ku Kunt Klan' kept true to their cowardly form, uttering phrases of idiocy out loud while hiding their identity.
Where was I? Oh yeah, one member of the clitty commandos that had me almost rolling out of my chair with laughter was Mr, yup, that's right MR Leaping Labia Lunatic.

See this knight of the ku kunt klan actually thought it was a good idea first to censor free speech, and secondly do this while dressed up as a gal's vertical smile. And hey, if you want to call me sexist for the 'Ku Kunt Klan' and other pussy-centric remarks, save it. I am not the one dressed up like a giant vagina.
This shit is straight out of a Monty Python movie. The title "The life of brain dead Brian" comes to mind. They have succeeded in their search for the Holy Fail.
Mr. Leaping Labia Lunatic only makes his presence on the youtube video of this recent prime example of femistasi speech stomping for a short period of time. Ah, parting is bitter sweet Mr Lunatic, but there are more deluded people than you to examine at this display of femistasi gender dictated insanity.
I am left with a question about this "did they ever stop to consider that perhaps some of the pro lifers are not holy rollers?" I mean like whats the odds Acme Fem & co.?
At the end of this coven of crazy video one of the protesters asks the question,"Why are you concerned for his safety and not the safety of our uteruses?"
The ranting anti-religious advocate adds "How about all the people that aren't women that have uteruses?"
See what these two members of Acme Fem & co. inadvertently did was broach the topic of reproductive rights for people who don't have female plumbing, aka males.
The regular readers of any men's human rights website will tell you men don't have any reproductive rights. Men have responsibilities. That's all we have. Feminists have set up the current laws, policies and government entities throughout first world nations to enforce it.
No say in the matter for boys. You donated 50% of the genetic material that started the "innocent" woman's pregnancy. We know it, or at least we claim to know it. Don't you dare do any paternity testing in some first world nations. That would be illegal. Although its not like getting money out of somebody under false pretenses, or as some in the legal world would call it, fraud.
Remember that part I mentioned about whether abortion should be legal, brownskirts™ and when life begins? I think its high time men had reproductive rights to abort his responsibilities to a possible child. I also think a healthy, and by that I mean open discussion of when life begins is in order.
That day is coming, but we aren't exactly speeding things along by allowing clowns in cuntsuits to shut down the discussion.

Spanish feminist establishment is shaking

March 16, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

The Spanish feminist reign of terror begins with a tragedy.

On March 11, 2004, three days before the elections, ten bombs explode in Madrid trains at 7:37 AM local time, killing 191 people and wounding over 1800[1].

A significant portion of the Spanish electorate thought that the attack took place because of the country's engagement into the so-called "war on terror." Whether this was true or not it's up for discussion and of little importance at the end of the day. What is of high importance is that the aforementioned portion of the Spanish electorate shifted their vote toward the Spanish Socialist Workers' Party (PSOE – Partido Socialista Obrero Español), lead by Don José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero, who promised to withdraw the country from the "war on terror."

Despite the fact that the center-right moderate party was the favorite, the promise made by the Left was swallowed by many naïve Spaniards and the socialists won the elections. As it happens each time the Left wins the elections in Europe, the new government came with a lot of radical feminists and with their own war. Not a war on terror – but a terrorizing war on men.

[image]They founded the Ministry for Equality – The Women's Institute (Ministerio de Igualdad – Instituto de la Mujer). Not kidding, the Women's Institute was the sole authority of the Ministry for Equality. This is a photo taken at the front door of the Ministry's headquarters.

Then, in December 2004, when the Madrid tragedy was still fresh in people's minds, the Zapatero government pushed the "Organic Act of Integrated Protection Measures against Gender Violence" (la Ley Integral contra la Violencia de Género) and through that law, Courts of "Violence against Women" have been established[2]. This law makes VAWA or The Istanbul Convention to look like innocent fluffy stuff.

The article 1.1 (The object of the law) in this Law reads as follows:

> This Act aims to act against violence as a manifestation of discrimination, the inequality and power relations of men over women, is exerted on them by those who are or have been their spouses or who are or have been linked to them by similar affective relationships, even without cohabitation.

Now, I may not be the best Spanish speaker but I am pretty sure that I translated this correctly. So this article basically says that men are always at fault and women are always victims and all that it takes as a man to be considered a perpetrator of "gender violence" is for woman, any woman, to say so. And this is made clear right from the get go in the first article.

Article 20, concerning the judicial assistance, reads as follows:

> Women victims of domestic violence who have insufficient resources to litigate, under the terms established by Law […], are entitled to free representation by defense counsel and solicitor in all administrative processes and procedures that have direct or indirect cause the violence suffered. In these cases one direction assume the defense counsel of the victim. This right will also assist the beneficiaries in case of death of the victim. In any case, the legal defense will be ensured for free and immediately and it shall be dedicated to all victims of domestic violence, upon request, subject to that if not recognized after the right to legal aid, they must pay the attorney's fees incurred by his speech.

In other words, if you are a woman that wants to divorce and have no money of your own but want to get the house, the kids, the savings and virtually all your husband's possessions, claim that you are victim of "gender violence" and the benevolent Socialist state will put your husband in prison, the kids will never see him again, the state will pay for your lawyers and those lawyers have all the legal means to make sure that you get everything. You don't even have to be a nice person. You can be the one who was abusive in the relationship. It doesn't matter. If you have the vagina, you just say you want everything and the Socialist state will trust your word regardless of any evidence.

Article 21.1 and 21.4 concerning the working rights and social security, read as follows:

> 21.1: A woman victim of domestic violence shall be entitled, under the terms provided in the Workers' Statute, reduction or rearrangement of working time, geographic mobility, changing workplace, the suspension of the employment with job reservation and termination of contract.
> 21.4: Absences or lateness to work due to physical or psychological situation resulting from domestic violence are considered justified when so determined by social care services or health services, as appropriate, notwithstanding that such absences are reported by the employee to the company at the earliest.

In other words, if you are woman that has a job but wants to work less, you can make a "gender violence" allegation. By doing that, an innocent man goes to prison but you, lady, get to work less (the difference in salary being paid by the state or the employer forced to pay you regardless of how much you work, depending on the region). Remember: No proof at all is needed for all this. You just have to be a woman and make an allegation against a man. It doesn't have to be true or even credible.

Article 22 takes care of the "victims" that don't have a job but want one. So, are you a woman that can't find a job in Spain? Make an allegation of "gender violence" against any random man and the state will give you job.

Moreover, are you a Spanish woman who doesn't want to work but wants some money? Make an allegation of "gender violence" against any random man and, under article 27 of this law, you get free money from the State. Are you a woman that wants a house paid by the State? Article 28 gives you this opportunity if you say you are a victim of gender violence. Who passes judgments on these claims? Article 43.1 makes it clear:

> In every region there will be one or more Courts of Violence against Women, based in the capital of the former and jurisdiction throughout its territory.

So if you are a Spanish woman wanting something, all you have to do is go to a Court of Violence Against Women, name a random man to go to jail, and then start demanding free stuff from the State. A feminist-trained judge will make sure you get it.

Are you a Spanish woman and you want to remove the father completely from the lives of your children? No problem, Articles 65 and 66 make sure you get the power to do so.

Are you a father and want to remove an abusive mother from the lives of your children? Tough luck. If you open your mouth, the kids will undoubtedly go to her regardless of your evidence. In fact, you are not even allowed to speak in the Court if you are a man, let alone call witnesses, present evidence and all the other normal things one would expect in a Court. Due process for men in Spain became a privilege, not a fundamental right.

What was the result? Well, what has always been the historical result when you provide people with legal immunity and incentives to lie?

The Spanish society was badly wounded, probably irreparably. In 2010, even the mainstream media had to admit to a serious problem. The most important newspapers in Spain reported that 350 false accusations of "gender violence" were made each day. This means 127,750 false accusations per year. This means that almost 130,000 innocent men went to prison for at least 48 hours, just because a woman said so.

A man named José Manuel Tome was falsely accused of "gender violence" 22 times[3]. This man was in jail once in two or three week-ends because his ex-wife simply didn't want him having anything to do with their daughter's upbringing.

The motives behind all of these are, and have always been, exactly what defines all of the feminists' actions: desire to get more money and the hatred of men. Even the European Commission noticed that (and nobody can say that the European Commission is a defender of men by any means)[4]. Over 900 million euros (roughly 1.2 billion US dollars) from European taxpayers' money have been poured into Spanish feminist programs.

A Men's Rights advocate from Sevilla, Andalusia, stated for the Spanish mainstream media in 2010[4]:

> Europe needs to investigate what is happening in Spain. Because the fight against abuse is linked to a political strategy from which much money is distributed to those who subscribe to gender ideology.

By "Europe" he means the European Commission and by "gender ideology" he means feminism. In fact, the word "feminazi" is now widely popular among Spaniards and there are very few people nowadays in Spain who refer to the ideology of hate commonly referred as "feminism" in other terms than "feminazism" or "femofascism". The Spaniards are right.

Tatiana Torrejón from the Economic and Social Council (Consejo Económico y Social) wrote in 2008 an official report in which she openly described the fraud mechanisms that provide incentives for false allegations. But, in the seasoned feminist tradition, the report was censored[5] after a huge outcry from feminist organizations resulted in compliance from the Socialist State.

The policemen's association (ASIGC) often talked about the fact that their main impediment when attempting to investigate a "gender violence" situation was coming from the alleged victims themselves who were often saying something along the lines of: "I don't need the investigation – I only need to make the accusation as the lawyer instructed me".

Eventually, several judges started refusing to be used as instruments for violation of human rights and of child abuse, and talked. Maria Sanahuja, a judge in the Barcelona (Catalonia) province, broke the silence and said it outright[6]:

> The gender violence law is a disgusting violation of human rights in Spain. It is a madness that creates abuse and destroys the burden of proof. We are abusing of thousands of children, thousands of fathers, thousands of men, thousands of grandfathers. […] Even men are people!

The fact that she said that even men are people brought a genuine shit-storm on her and the feminists truly hate her guts to this day. The family judge Francisco Serrano Castro frequently called the situation in Spain "the Stalinism of gender"[7] and he had this to say on a national Spanish TV station[8]:

> [Having] a penal code with different laws for different categories of persons existed in 20th century Europe only under Nazism and Stalinism. […] Illegal detentions, suicides of men – this is genocide. Society does not realize that human rights are being violated. I fight against violence, but I also fight against what some sectors are doing to criminalize family and men.

If only we could clone Mr. Francisco Castro and Mrs. Sanahuja two or three million times and spread them worldwide, feminism would disappear in less than 6 months. Mr. Serrano paid the price for opposing the feminist viewpoint personally. In one case, the divorced father asked for access to his child to take him to a religious procession. The "special judge" from the Court of Violence Against Women was on vacation, so judge Serrano took the case temporarily and granted the father access to the child.

For that, the mother sued the judge, and she won. Serrano was penalized with 10 years suspension for violating the "rights" of a "gender violence victim."

The feminist lobby actively opposed and attempted to prevent, through government coercion, any action be taken against parental alienation or acknowledgment of child abuse by mothers. The Spanish feminist lobby went as far as to deny that there is any child in Spain that has been abused by a mother. Fortunately enough, the Courts followed the recommendations of the European Court of Human Rights, instead of the instructions provided by the Socialist-Feminist Zapatero government.

Zapatero, the Prime Minister and the leader of the Spanish Socialist Workers' Party bragged about this law and was reelected in 2008 for a second term. It seemed that men's rights would never be addressed.

But, on July 23, 2008, a police operation saved a 13-year old child who was sodomized by a band of pedophiles. One of the arrested was the psychologist Jorge Corsi; a highly influential feminist ideologue, a member of a commission that defined the "gender violence" law, director of Specialization in Family Violence in the School of Psychology, author of 5 books and of a paper against the protection of children from parental alienation. He is now in jail with definitive sentence for child sexual abuse.

So the "father" of the ideological trash that tormented Spanish society for almost 7 years turned out to be a pedophile. Who would've thought?

His conviction following overwhelmingly clear evidence, amplified the outrage against the "gender violence" bullshit and "Stop feminazis!" started to appear on walls and the term "Guantanamo feminist"[9] started to be openly used in Spain, where 600 men per year committed suicide.

Since Spain is a federation, the new regional elections showed a massive decrease in support for the Left and an all-time high support for the Right. Region after region formed new governments that approved joint custody laws, although the central government tried really hard to stop them.

Finally, new general elections on November 20, 2011, allowed the Spanish citizens to vote for stopping the social and economical disaster and the party that gave power to feminists (the Left) received the biggest electoral debacle in the entire history of Spain.

Fixing things will be a long process. The Catalan Grandfather Association for Joint Custody filed a lawsuit asserting that what happened in Spain "constitutes alleged genocide crimes, crimes against humanity with inhuman and degrading treatment of citizens." The suit asks that the allegations be "forwarded to the International Criminal Court, to proceed to appoint a special tribunal to prosecute crimes committed under the Zapatero government against more than one million citizens persecuted for being male" in view of "a political activity that incites hatred against males" and the "implementation of exceptions forbidden by the Constitution and International Treaties".

So, basically, the feminists are facing criminal charges in The Hague, alongside all the merciless dictators of the world. The feminists' place is in the box of the accused in such a tribunal and we hope the Spanish Men's Rights groups win the case.

Is this a story with a happy ending? Not so fast. Just a few days ago, a Spanish politician was crushed for daring to question the feminist dogma[10]. The Left might have lost the elections and the "gender violence" law is now kept in check by the local governments, but they still have enough seats in the Parliament to block any attempt to repeal the law entirely. Moreover, the Left controls the Constitutional Court and, consequently, got their misandric law declared constitutional so abolishing it will be even more difficult. Not to mention that the media is still largely controlled by feminists so they can crush anyone who calls them out on their lies and propaganda.

Times are changing in Spain and if the MRAs from Spain don't stop (and it's hard to believe that they'll stop), Spain might become the first feminist-free country this decade. The majority of the public hates them, hate their ideology and the men's rights group from Spain actually made the mainstream media, judges, lawyers and other important figures to refer to feminists as "gender ideologues", gender Stalinists, Guantanamo feminists and femofascists.

Ladies and gentlemen, on the behalf of AVfM, let's congratulate the passionate men and women of Spain who have fought and keep on fighting against bigotry and Stalinist-inspired legislation that harms men, boys, families and the society as a whole. Their achievements are truly inspiring! The feminists have "The Swedish model" to promote their totalitarian view of the world but, within a few years, we might start talking about "The Spanish model" within the MRM and outside of it to promote our way of understanding the world.

Here is an excellent Danish documentary (it is in English and with English subs during the talks in Spanish) made in 2010 regarding the „gender violence" law and the level of desperation among the Spanish men and judges that are sick of, and fed up with, feminist lies:

[1] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/2004_Madrid_train_bombings
[2] http://noticias.juridicas.com/base_datos/Admin/lo1-2004.t5.html#c4
[3] http://www.elconfidencial.com/sociedad/espana-conmueve-europa-denuncias-maltrato-falsas-20100823-68813.html
[4] http://www.diariodesevilla.es/sevilla/detail.php?id=598410
[5] http://sociedad.elpais.com/sociedad/2008/04/22/actualidad/1208815206_850215.html
[6] http://elpais.com/diario/2008/12/22/opinion/1229900405_850215.html
[7] http://plataformaporlaigualdad.es/?p=109
[8] http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=rku9fdMyqMc – Judge Francisco Castro's entire speech
[9] http://www.centriantiviolenza.eu/comunicazionedigenere/la-guantanamo-femminista/
[10] http://www.returnofkings.com/7421/spanish-politician-is-crushed-for-questioning-feminist-dogma

The Western butler and his manhood

March 17, 2013 | by Gordon Wadsworth | Link | Original Link

What a creature is the besieged Western male. His battle-worn spirit is a warzone over which rages a mêlée for supremacy of his identity. And he is expected never to voice concern for that which is the prize — his humanity.

Radical feminists continue to vilify him, clawing at his character and imposing shame and subservience. But he should be a leader. Moderate feminists encourage him to "move beyond" his masculinity and become more sensitive and "evolved." But he should be a protector. Society designates him provider. But celebrates his earning power being exceeded by women. People of both sexes expect him to be chivalrous. But he must value equality.

It reads like the dating profile of a prom queen.

And make no mistake, each of these groups deliver their sermons on the shoulders of the Western male, and do so while ignoring both his voice and their own comically crippling dysfunction. Humorously, an informal public survey would likely reveal the general belief that this condition is a privilege. I don't wonder at the men who stand up and fight, nor at the many men who simply surrender.

The whole affair is a dog and pony show debacle, but never mind all that for now.

The point is this; I often wonder how to sum up the condition of the contemporary Western male in a single word, and because of all the factors at play, it's not exactly an easy task.

But there is one thing that makes it simple. As complicated as the situation has become between the sexes, our legal equality with women is only a simple moral boundary away. That moral boundary being the one which separates one person's choices from another person's responsibilities. In other words, the "radical notion" that making a personal choice doesn't morally obligate another human being. In every corner of Western civilization we put this moral boundary into practice. Every corner except one.

Because we aren't protected by this boundary, as men in Western culture our condition is one of profound responsibility. For our own choices, sure, but even for choices which we had no part in making. Even despite this fact, however, the word responsibility isn't quite enough to describe the contemporary Western male.

Why is the word responsibility insufficient? Simply, because this type of chivalrous male obligation to facilitate the lady's privilege has always existed. It's nothing particularly new. The male has always been a pillar of responsibility, since the simple nature of chivalry is just a marriage between the obligation of a man and the benefit of a lady. This remains untouched, so what has changed?

The obvious answer is that women have changed. The responsibilities of yesteryear's chivalrous man obligated him to a lady, but that same lady had her own traditional responsibilities to observe. This equilibrium meant that the chivalrous man's responsibility knew limits, and his chivalry was thus curtailed by the limits imposed on the lady. Feminism appeared and rightfully freed women from their traditional limits and responsibilities, but nothing severed the chivalrous bond connecting a man's obligation to the benefit of a lady. Thus, the chivalrous man's responsibility came to know no limits as the lady cast aside all limits of her own.

With all of that in mind, what word is more appropriate than "responsible" to describe the Western man whose traditional obligations bind him to the lady's traditional benefits even as she has become free to do as she wishes? More specifically, what is the word used to describe someone whose responsibility finances another person's complete freedom to choose and act as they wish free of consequence?
The word is "butler," and in a nutshell, the Western male has become a sort of traditional butler engaged in a deranged ritual of sacrifice and service. The Western butler isn't indentured to a master per se, but rather to a concept. This concept is his unreconstructed "manhood," which encompasses and packages his traditional chivalrous obligations and the way they are designed to benefit and pedestalize a "lady."
In other words, the Western butler is shackled to his own manhood. Feminists will argue this is the patriarchy hurting men, but this is merely the feminist crashing into her ideological furniture as she stumbles through the dark looking for the light switch. The infantile feminist notion of "patriarchy" isn't what hurts men, what hurts men is a women's advocacy that keeps men obligated to women via men's traditional chivalrous obligations while freeing women from their own roles. What hurts men is a continued responsibility and legal obligation to women that recognize no limitations on their own behavior. What hurts men is that they are not allowed to represent their own interests and humanity with their own movement separate from feminism. What hurts men is a feminist movement that increasingly puts women as a group above criticism and beyond reproach.
Hugo Schwyzer unknowingly highlighted the Western butler's exact problem in his recent article "Hardwired to Disappoint? The Crushingly Low Expectations of Men" published on March 15 at Jezebel. To quote him directly,

> As feminists have been pointing out for some time, expanding opportunity for women without also expanding expectations for men leaves us with a lot of anxious and exhausted female overachievers.

This is Schwyzer punctuating men's chivalrous obligations to the lady. He is advocating that women's equality involves expanding opportunity for women while also expanding expectations for men. This mentality is exactly the reason the Western male has become a butler; our chivalrous expectations obligate us to the lady who increasingly does as she wishes.
Nowhere is our butler status more evident than in matters of reproduction. The lady now owns her reproductive self determination, as well I believe she should. Unfortunately, no boundary exists between her choice of self determination in this matter and that of the Western male. His obligation to the lady is still intact even as her traditional restrictions have been lifted. As a result, her choice is more than his responsibility, it is his life, with no moral boundary separating his life from her choice. The Western butler is expected to shoulder the weight of her self determination by chivalrously casting aside his own, and the only cost is his humanity.

In the same way, the Western butler is responsible when the lady breaks her part of the marriage contract and finds herself mothering another man's child. Her status as a lady worth sacrificing for is secure in spite of her infidelity. The Western butler remains obligated to her benefit, and thus works to protect her from the inconveniences of her choice. He is not allowed to consider himself, since no boundary exists to separate his responsibility even from her degenerate choice.
Furthermore, the Western butler is obligated to the safety of the lady. Yet the lady increasingly recognizes no limits on her own behavior. Thus, the Western butler must take responsibility for the lady who increasingly refuses to accept any responsibility for herself. The lady's poor decisions where her safety is concerned must never be questioned. Doing so results in international slut walk movements to remind the butler of his place. Thus, the Western butler's obligation to the lady's safety, even as she continues to behave as she likes, ensures she will not be inconvenienced by any of her own choices, since he is responsible for those choices. She can behave in any manner she chooses, and he will sacrifice and come to her defense, whatever the circumstances, without questioning her. The butler's own safety, of course, is not a priority.
In matters of sex, the Western butler is also responsible for the lady's choices. She may desire sex, but if she has been drinking, it is his responsibility to decline. He is thus expected to protect the lady from herself. Her choice to consume alcohol is his responsibility, no boundary exists to separate these concepts. She may choose to consume alcohol or drugs in any quantity. Perhaps she wants to enjoy sex while drunk or high, but he must protect her anyway. Such is the way of the butler. His chivalrous obligation to the lady prevents him from respecting her adult volition and choices, even as she's warming him up with the most "enthusiastic consent" he's ever received. The Western butler's choices are thus to engage her and risk being called a rapist, or reject her and open the gates of hell.
The Western butler's chivalrous obligation to the lady prevents him from defending himself even if she is attacking him. If she murders him, society holds him responsible. He must have been violent, and such a betrayal of the butler-lady relationship often validates her act of murder. The Western butler must also keep a straight face while the lady and her friends display their open hostility and contempt for men and masculinity. In addition, the lady can fire the butler at any time. He can be removed from the house by force and even by gunpoint if she wishes it. He can be ejected from his family.
At least a traditional butler so discarded was never expected to finance his former master's operations while he searched for a new one like the Western butler is.
How then, does the Western butler free himself from his master? How does he rid himself of the oppression of his own antiquated manhood? The answer is by fighting to be allowed to define his own masculine identity independently. And this terrifies feminists. It terrifies them. They violently oppose this trend above all else. They oppose the MHRM for this reason. They wish to ensure that the Western butler remains shackled to his socially imposed “manhood.” Their goal is to supervise and direct his masculinity, to keep it caged and harnessed for their own benefit. They construct altars to the feminine such as GMP to debate how best to harness this force. And when the men involved step even one inch over the line, they are savagely punished.

And yet convincing men, even these men from the GMP, of their butler status can be extremely difficult. The reason being that most men feel valued, appreciated, and loved, and indeed many of them are. And to those men, I ask you only for a single favor. Try speaking up for your humanity. Try it just once, and find out whether you’re loved as a human being or loved as a butler.

Is there a psychological driver behind feminism?

March 17, 2013 | by Mike Buchanan | Link | Original Link

[quote]Every human brain is born not as a blank tablet (a tabula rasa) waiting to be filled in by experience but as an 'exposed negative' waiting to be slipped into 'developer fluid'. ~ Edward O Wilson 1929- American sociobiologist[/quote]

[dropcap]S[/dropcap]ince the discussion with Laura Bates on BBC Radio 2 recently, I've been thinking a lot about brains. Ms Bates is typical of feminists in being incapable of engaging intellectually with the arguments of her opponents, regardless of the evidence bases underpinning those arguments. I've long had an interest in gender-typical natures, and the extent to which they're a reflection (if at all) of gender-patterned brains. It's that perennial debate, nature versus nurture, biological determinism versus social determinism. I'm personally inclined to believe that gender-typical behaviour is driven more by biology than by socialisation, a common position of people with right-of-centre political convictions. Pleasingly, neuroscientists are finding (by means of fMRI scanning in particular) ever more differences between 'male' and 'female' brains over time.

I worked as a consultant for the Conservative party (2006-8), not long after David Cameron had been elected party leader. In that role I had dealings with a number of people in his non-political 'inner circle'. Almost without exception, these men and women had something in common with David Cameron, now the most pro-female and anti-male British prime minister in living memory. What did they have in common? As I outlined in David and Goliatha: David Cameron – heir to Harman? they had female-typical natures resulting, in my view, from female-pattern brains. The only job David Cameron had before entering politics was in Public Relations, an overwhelmingly female line of work. To this day he has an obsession with style over substance, and always looks uncomfortable in the presence of gender-typical men.

For some time I struggled but failed to integrate what I knew and believed about gender-patterned brains, with what I knew and believed about the ideology and activities of feminists. I knew that feminists (and lesbian feminists in particular) strongly deny there are any innate psychological differences between men and women. Feminists appear to be on an endless quest to force men to become more like women (e.g. doing a greater share of child caring) and to force women to become more like men (e.g. working in paid employment full-time even when they have very young children).

A few months ago I met a lesbian feminist at a social gathering. As you do. She had a degree in Biology and was familiar with Simon Baron-Cohen's theories about male-pattern and female-pattern brains, as he'd outlined in The Essential Difference (2003) and elsewhere. More on his theories shortly. She made a casual remark which led to a 'light bulb moment' for me. She said she'd always found that when she undertook psychological tests for gender-typical natures (such as those in Baron-Cohen's book) she found herself midway between male-pattern and female-pattern. She described herself as 'intermediate' psychologically. A few weeks later I met a gay (male) journalist, who told me he too had found tests showed him to be ‘intermediate’ psychologically. He was also of the firm view that tests would show most gay men and lesbians to be the same.

This raised an intriguing question for me. Might lesbian feminists not understand that some behaviors are gender-typical, simply because they’re psychologically ‘intermediate’ themselves? Is feminism in part a campaign to make the world more comfortable for these women, by forcing gender-typical men and women to think and act in less gender-typical ways? I am increasingly convinced it is. I would ask you to keep this question in mind as you read the following material which appears in two of my books, The Glass Ceiling Delusion and Feminism: the ugly truth.
There are men among us with faces which (let’s be kind) only a mother could love. Some of these men happen to be rich, famous or powerful: ‘alpha males’. They commonly share an attribute, having (or having once had) remarkably beautiful partners. One thinks of the musical theatre composer Andrew Lloyd-Webber (Sarah Brightman), the magician Paul Daniels (Debbie McGee), the entrepreneur Bernie Ecclestone (Slavica Radi?, a former fashion model 11.5 inches taller and 28 years younger than lucky Bernie), the tennis player Andy Murray (Kim Sears) and the French president Nicolas Sarkozy (Carla Bruni).

Notably beautiful women do not, it would appear, fall in love with poor unattractive men. Perhaps they’re not as beautiful as we think. I would look pretty stood next to some of these men. We shall return to the important phenomenon of female attractiveness later in the chapter.

Why should we have an interest in gender-typical traits? Why can we not treat everyone as individuals, thereby avoiding the cardinal sin of stereotyping? The reason is that women campaign collectively – and effectively – for women’s interests at the expense of men’s interests, while men rarely campaign for men’s interests, effectively or otherwise. The ‘shortage’ of female engineers is seen to be a problem requiring to be addressed, while the ‘shortage’ of male nurses isn’t. The inevitable result? A considerable amount of taxpayers’ money has been spent trying to encourage young women into engineering (and other ‘male typical’ fields) but with minimal impact: even today, over 90% of engineering graduates are men.

For the avoidance of doubt, when I refer to men and women from this point onwards I shall mean gender-typical men and women – by definition, the majority – unless I make it clear I mean otherwise. I don’t consider either gender innately superior to the other, but I think it’s clear that the genders are in general different in their habits of thinking and acting. I’m now 54, and the different natures of men and women have been clear to me from an early age. ‘Nature’ being a word whose meaning may be ambiguous, let me state clearly what I mean by it in the context of this book. In general, I believe, men and women differ with respect to:
[unordered_list style=”arrow”]

- their relative interests in interpersonal relationships, in particular those with family members, friends and work colleagues;

- their relative interests in work, politics and business;
- their attitudes towards risk;
- their attitudes towards 'work/life balance': the types of work they seek, the hours they devote to work, and their drives to be promoted;
- their styles of operating in the world of work: men being more naturally competitive, women being more naturally co-operative.

[/unordered_list]
If these differences are real, it follows that they will impact on men's and women's life choices and therefore their average incomes. The most commonly cited measure of the 'gender pay gap' relates to the incomes of male and female full-time workers regardless of the equivalence of their lines of work. The gap, while it exists, is not the result of discrimination against women. It's attributable to the choices men and women freely make in their personal and working lives, including the greater readiness of women to take career breaks to look after babies, young children and ageing relatives. If and when women in significant numbers make different choices, the pay gap will disappear.
If we accept for the moment that, in general, men's and women's natures are different, what might be the source of those difference? Could it be something as obvious as men's and women's brains being different? For answers to this question we turn first to a book written by an American professor of the female persuasion, Louann Brizendine, on the time-honoured 'ladies first' principle. From Wikipedia:
'Louann Brizendine is a neuropsychiatrist and the author of The Female Brain, published in 2006. Her research concerns women's moods and hormones. She graduated in neurobiology from UC Berkeley, attended Yale School of Medicine and completed a residency in psychiatry at Harvard Medical School. She is board-certified in psychiatry and neurology and is an endowed clinical professor. She joined the faculty of UCSF Medical Center at the Langley Porter Psychiatric Institute in 1988 and now holds the Lynne and Marc Benioff-endowed chair of psychiatry. At UCSF, Brizendine pursues active clinical, teaching, writing and research activities.

[image]In 1994 she founded the UCSF Women's Mood and Hormone Clinic, and continues to serve as its director. The Women's Mood and Hormone Clinic is a psychiatric clinic designed to assess and treat women of all ages experiencing disruption of mood, energy, anxiety, sexual function and well-being due to hormonal influences on the brain. Brizendine also treats couples in the clinic.

Additionally, Brizendine teaches courses to medical students, residents and other physicians throughout the country, addressing the neurobiology of hormones, mood disorders, anxiety problems, and sexual interest changes due to hormones.'
Professor Brizendine is clearly far more qualified than I to make statements about the female brain and to compare it with the male brain. What startled me when I read The Female Brain was the sheer extent of the differences between the two brains: men and women truly do inhabit different mental worlds. Brizendine outlines how a range of hormones affect women's brains as they progress through life stages: foetal, girlhood, puberty, sexual maturity/single woman, pregnancy, breast feeding, childrearing, perimenopause, menopause, and postmenopause. She reveals in the book that during her medical education at Berkeley, Yale and Harvard, she 'learned little or nothing about female biological or neurological difference outside of pregnancy', and continues:

'The little research that was available, however, suggested that the brain differences, though subtle, were profound. As a resident in psychiatry, I became fascinated by the fact that there was a two-to-one ratio of depression in women compared with men. No one was offering any clear reasons for this discrepancy. Because I had gone to college at the peak of the feminist movement, my personal explanations ran toward the political and the psychological. I took the typical 1970s stance that the patriarchy of Western culture must have been the culprit. It must have kept women down and made them less functional than men. But that explanation alone didn't seem to fit: new studies were uncovering the same depression ratio worldwide. I started to think that something bigger, more basic and biological, was going on.
One day it struck me that male versus female depression rates didn't start to diverge until females turned 12 or 13 – the age girls began menstruating. It appeared that the chemical changes at puberty did something in the brain to trigger more depression in women…
When I started taking a woman's hormonal state into account as I evaluated her psychiatrically, I discovered the massive neurological effects her hormones have during different stages in life in shaping her desires, her values, and the very way she perceives reality [Author's italics]…
Of the fluctuations that begin as early as three months old and last until after menopause, a woman's neurological reality is not as constant as a man's. His is like a mountain that is worn away imperceptibly over the millennia by glaciers, weather, and the deep tectonic movements of the earth. Hers is more like the weather itself – constantly changing and hard to predict.'

From the chapter, 'The Birth of the Female Brain':

'Common sense tells us that boys and girls behave differently. We see it every day at home, on the playground, and in classrooms. But what the culture hasn't told us is that the brain dictates these divergent behaviors. The impulses of children are so innate that they kick in even if we adults try to nudge them in another direction. One of my patients gave her three-and-a-half-year-old daughter many unisex toys including a bright red fire truck instead of a doll. She walked into her daughter's room one afternoon to find her cuddling the truck in a baby blanket, rocking it back and forth, saying, 'Don't worry, little truckie, everything will be all right.'

This isn't socialization. The little girl didn't cuddle her 'truckie' because her environment molded her unisex brain. There is no unisex brain. She was born with a female brain, which came complete with its own impulses. Girls arrive already wired as girls, and boys arrive already wired as boys. Their brains are different by the time they're born, and their brains are what drive their impulses, values, and their very reality.'

From a later chapter, 'The Future of the Female Brain':
'Almost every woman I have seen in my office, when asked what would be her top three wishes if her fairy godmother could wave her magic wand and grant them, says, 'Joy in my life, a fulfilling relationship, and less stress with more personal time.'
Our modern life – the double shift of career and primary responsibility for the household and family – has made these goals particularly difficult to achieve. We are stressed out by this arrangement, and our leading cause of anxiety and depression is stress. One of the great mysteries of our lives is why we as women are so devoted to this current social contract which often operates against the natural wiring of our female brains and biological reality [Author's italics].
During the 1990s and the early part of this millennium, a new set of scientific facts and ideas about the female brain has been unfolding. These biological truths have become a powerful stimulus for the reconsideration of a woman's social contract. In writing this book I have struggled with two voices in my head – one is the scientific truth, the other is political correctness. I have chosen to emphasize scientific truth over political correctness even though scientific truths may not always be as welcome.'
How, you might well ask, can 'almost every woman' seeking 'less stress with more personal time' be reconciled with women's alleged quests for senior positions in the workplace in general, and for executive directorships of major companies in particular? It can't. Professor Brizendine followed The Female Brain with The Male Brain (2010). It's larger, but less interesting. The book, that is.

[quote]Grandmother's brain was dead, but her heart was still beating. It was the first time we ever had a Democrat in the family. ~ Emo Philips 1956- American comedian[/quote]
On to a book written by Simon Baron-Cohen, an eminent British psychologist. His biography on Wikipedia:
'Simon Baron-Cohen FBA is a Professor of Developmental Psychopathology in the Departments of Psychiatry and Experimental Psychology at the University of Cambridge in the United Kingdom. He is the Director of the University's Autism Research Centre, and a Fellow of Trinity College. He is best known for his work on autism, including his early theory that autism involves degrees of 'mindblindness' (or delays in the development of theory of mind); and his later theory that autism is an extreme form of the 'male brain', which involved a reconceptualisation of typical psychological sex differences in terms of empathizing – systemizing theory.'
The professor's book The Essential Difference was published in 2003. He starts by summarising the theory to be outlined in the book:
[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- 'The female brain is predominantly hard-wired for empathy;

- The male brain is predominantly hard-wired for understanding and building systems.

[/unordered_list]

He describes empathising in the following terms:

'Empathising is the drive to identify another person's emotions and thoughts, and to respond to them with an appropriate emotion. Empathising does not entail just the cold calculation of what someone else thinks and feels (or what is sometimes called mind reading). Psychopaths can do that much. Empathising occurs when we feel an appropriate emotional reaction, an emotion triggered by the other person's emotion, and it is done in order to understand another person, to predict their behaviour, and to connect or resonate with them emotionally.'

Systemising is described as follows:

'Systemising is the drive to analyse, explore, and construct a system. The systemiser intuitively figures out how things work, or extracts the underlying rules that govern the behaviour of a system. This is done in order to understand and predict the system, or to invent a new one…

Just as empathising is powerful enough to cope with the hundreds of emotions that exist, so systemising is a process that can cope with an enormous number of systems. I will argue that, on average, males spontaneously systemise to a greater extent than do females.'

[image]The good professor points out here – as indeed he does throughout the book – that he does not mean 'all males' or 'all females': he is talking about statistical averages. I contend that success in senior positions in major organisations requires strong systemising skills, not strong empathising skills: so without positive discrimination for women we shall never have gender balance in the boardroom. Gender balance in the boardroom is not of the slightest interest to the vast majority of women; it is of interest only to feminists, an assortment of people – almost all women – driven by left-wing ideology. David Cameron, the current British prime minister, is a feminist despite being the leader of the Conservative party. What times we live in.

Baron-Cohen writes about the advantages of systemising brains to human males early in the species' evolution, which fell under the categories of using and making tools, hunting and tracking, trading, attaining and exercising power, developing expertise, tolerating solitude, being aggressive, and being leaders. The advantages of empathising brains to early females are explored under the categories of making friends, mothering, gossiping, being socially mobile, and reading partners' intentions. Systemising brains are increasingly advantageous to individuals as they climb the hierarchy of major organisations, and this on its own would largely account for the enduring preponderance of men in senior positions.

Questionnaires for self-assessment of empathising and systemising natures are provided in The Essential Difference.

There's a large and growing body of evidence supporting Baron-Cohen's theory that people exhibiting the condition of autism – a spectrum of disorders which includes Asperger Syndrome – have 'extreme male brains'. On average, compared to both men and women on average, they are markedly less empathising, and markedly more systemising. Baron-Cohen points out that these people can lead productive lives if their work plays to their strengths rather than their weaknesses. Some autistic men are found in the top levels of IT companies, for example. Studies of identical and non-identical twins strongly suggest that autism is heritable. In people diagnosed with high-functioning autism or Asperger Syndrome, the sex ratio is at least ten males to every female.

???

So where does all this leave us? In my view, feminism is a movement driven by gender-untypical women who are 'intermediate' psychologically, and who demand ever more economic and political power. They're facilitated by alpha males (e.g. David Cameron) who hand them that power on a plate, regardless of their lack of a democratic mandate to do so, and regardless of the harm caused to society in general. Until and unless we accept this reality, I think we'll all suffer at the hands of feminist ideologues committed to a delusion, namely that gender-typical men and women – the vast majority – aren't different psychologically.

SPLC 2013: The new hate map is here!

March 18, 2013 | by VFM News and Commentary | Link | Original Link

---

Watching the Watchdogs readers of a certain age may remember actor Steve Martin's 1979 debut film, The Jerk. In one memorable scene, Martin's character, the naive country boy, Navin Johnson, is ecstatic to find his name listed in the local telephone directory. "The new phone book is here! The new phone book is here!!" shouts Navin, as he wildly leaps and prances about. Navin's boss, played by deadpan comic Jackie Mason, observes, "I wish I could get that excited about nothin'."

Navin counters breathlessly, "I'm somebody now! Millions of people look at this thing every day! This is the kind of spontaneous publicity… your name in print… that makes people!!"

The parallels between this classic comedy scene and the latest iteration of the Southern Poverty Law Center's annual "Hate Map" are manifold: Spontaneous publicity. Your name in print. Millions of naive people looking at this thing and getting excited about nothin'.

For the benefit of new Watching the Watchdogs readers, let's take a moment to recap the key facts about the Hate Map that need to be understood before delving into what is, to borrow a phrase from another classic comedy, " … a show about nothing."

1. The Hate Map is compiled each year by the SPLC's master Public Relations chief, Mark Potok, and purports to identify the number of "hate groups" across America on a state-by-state basis. Mr. Potok's maps always refer to the previous calendar year.

2. There is no legal definition for "hate group," which is why even the FBI does not, cannot, designate "hate groups," yet somehow a private fundraising outfit can?

Mr. Potok has no legal or law enforcement background and admits that all of his data are second hand, at best, and that his infamous Hate Map "does not include original reporting by SPLC staff." The SPLC is a private fundraising group run by white millionaires. It has no mandate, receives no outside oversight and has no authority, legal or moral, to designate anything.

In short, the SPLC has no more authority to designate "hate groups" than does the SPCA.

3. Mr. Potok provides absolutely NO evidence to prove that the groups he is designating actually exist. In many cases, Mr. Potok cannot even provide the name of a city or town where the alleged group is supposed to reside. Investigative journalist Laird Wilcox pointed out this lack of hard evidence as far back as 1998, in his seminal exposé of the SPLC and other so-called "civil rights" groups, The Watchdogs.

> What [the SPLC] apparently did was list any group they could find mention of, including groups only rumored to exist. These included the > large number of "post office box chapters" maintained by Klan and skinhead organizations. Some Christian Identity "ministries" consist only one person and a mailing list and many "patriot groups" consist of but three or four friends.

> They also listed many groups whose actual affiliation is neither KKK nor neo-Nazi and who would argue with the designation of "white supremacy." In short, they misleadingly padded their list. When the SPLC releases their list, either in print or on the Internet, it fails to contain actual addresses that might be checked by journalists or researchers. Several listings refer to "unknown group" and the name of a city or town. — The Watchdogs, p. 79

Mark Potok admitted as much a decade later:
"Potok says inclusion on the list might come from a minor presence, such as a post office box." (www.sanluisobispo.com, March 25, 2009)
4. As noted, in many cases, Mr. Potok does not even bother to provide a physical location for his alleged groups. Last year, 247 of his 1,017 alleged "hate groups" were homeless, or about one in four. This year, 195 of his 1,007 alleged groups are phantoms, or about one in five.
In 2011, Watching the Watchdogs actually got to ask Mr. Potok in person about these missing groups. As the video clip below shows, Mr. Potok was startled by the question at first, as no one apparently has ever bothered to vet his numbers before, and he then proceeds to stammer out that his "hate map," the keystone of all SPLC claims and fundraising rhetoric, is "anecdotal," "a very rough measure" and "an imperfect process."

Sadly, the tens of thousands of well-meaning people who sent Mr. Potok and the SPLC more than $40 MILLION tax-free dollars in 2012, (that's more than $4,600 dollars every single hour of every day) didn't realize that his Hate Map numbers were just a wild guess. Those trusting folks took Mr. Potok at his word that his data were sound.
So now that we've established Mr. Potok's credentials and the accuracy of his data, let's take a closer look at his actual numbers, which again, is something no professional news outlet seems willing to do.
[image]
Click to enlarge

In Point 4 above, we skimmed quickly over a monumental and wholly unprecedented event: For the first time in SPLC history… the number of "hate groups" designated by Mark Potok… actually*DECLINED*!
Yes. You heard it here first, folks. Something we never thought we'd see has come to pass and gives a very strong indication that the days of Mr. Potok's primary fundraising tool, his much-lauded and oft-quoted Hate Map, are numbered.
This turn of events comes as a complete surprise, as Mr. Potok is the sole arbiter of the "hate group" label, and since no one ever checks on his numbers, why didn't he just pad the numbers a little more as he has always done in the past?

Every March, Mr. Potok releases his new "hate group" numbers in the Spring edition of his flagship "Intelligence Report" publication. Mr. Potok ignored the fact that his numbers actually went down for the first time in history, "…the number of hate groups remained essentially unchanged last year…," choosing to focus on his newest marketing ploy, evil "militia" groups. We'll have a look at those numbers in a minute.
Potok provides a bar graph to illustrate his claim that the number of "hate groups" has increased by 67% since 2000:
[image]
It's worth noting at this point that the SPLC's bloated "Endowment Fund" has increased by 147% in just the past decade, from $99,000,000 to over $245,000,000.
Comparing the two charts, a case could be made linking the increase of cash in the Endowment Fund to the increase in "hate groups."

Or maybe it's the other way around…
[image]
Purely a happy coincidence, no doubt, but it must be getting tougher to sell "poverty" to the donors when you've got nearly a quarter-BILLION dollars in cash reserves. Last year, the Endowment Fund generated more than $18 MILLION dollars in tax-free interest.
[image]
Click to enlarge

In November, 2008, immediately after the election of President Obama, Mr. Potok predicted "explosive growth in hate groups" due to "… the tanking economy and a Black man in the White House. Mr. Potok is still singing this same tune in 2013, but now he says it's the evil militias that are upset:

> Capping four years of explosive growth sparked by the election of America's first black president and anger over the economy, the number of conspiracy-minded antigovernment "Patriot" groups reached an all-time high of 1,360 in 2012…

According to Mr. Potok's own bar graph above though, we see that for 2009, the first year of the Obama Administration and the worst year of the current recession, the number of "hate groups" only rose by 6, or 0.6%. Until this year, that half a percent "explosion" was the smallest increase in SPLC history.
Mr. Potok added 70 new "hate groups" in 2010, as if to make up for his anemic performance the previous year, but at the same time, the number of homeless “hate groups,” those Mr. Potok can’t seem to locate on any map, including his own, jumped by 99, which really represents a net loss.

Mr. Potok was losing his “hate groups” faster than he could designate them.
In 2011, Mr. Potok’s list grew by only 12 new groups, for an increase of just over 1%. That year he added 20 chapters of something he called “The Georgia Militia” to that state’s Hate Map, but he couldn’t seem to locate 18 of them, so he simply added 18 empty slots marked “Georgia Militia” to pad out his numbers. No one in the Media ever called him on it.
In 2012, the number of “hate groups” actually dropped by 1%
Mr. Potok’s “explosive growth” has turned out to be a damp squib…
As for the Georgia Militia, Mr. Potok has revised his figures down to 14 chapters, one of which allegedly resides somewhere in Camden County, one is simply labeled “statewide” and the other 12 are nowhere to be found. Must be all that camouflage gear those good ol’ boys like to wear:
[image]
Click to enlarge

In all, 17 of the 53 “hate groups” Mr. Potok has assigned to Georgia are invisible. That’s one in three. No doubt the rest of Mr. Potok’s “militia” numbers are at least as accurate.
While we’ve already packed a lot of information into this one post, let’s crunch Mr. Potok’s numbers just a little more to see what his figures actually say.
Once again, when you strip out all of Mr. Potok’s homeless “hate groups” you arrive at the surprising conclusion that, according to Potok’s carefully researched data, the largest segment of “hate groups” are Black, outnumbering the KKK, Neo-Nazis, Racist Skinhead and White Nationalist groups respectively.
[image]
Who knew? Mark Potok knows.
The Southern Poverty Law Center made its fortune by going after “hate groups” in the South, and Mr. Potok is always nattering about evil white Christians, who tend to live in the South, but according to his latest numbers there was a distinct drop in the number of these alleged groups last year:
[image]
Click to enlarge

Mr. Potok also issues regular alarums about how the Northwest is a magnet for “radical white nationalists” but, once again, his numbers have dropped:
[image]
Click to enlarge

Ironically, (we use that term a lot when dealing with Mr. Potok’s fundraising rhetoric), the traditionally more liberal Northeast actually showed a 6.25% increase in "hate groups" last year.

[image]
Click to enlarge

And finally, Mr. Potok has always claimed that the Republican Party is the root of all evil and represents the black heart of all hate-groupdom, but when you look at which states voted Republican in the 2012 Presidential election there are actually 12% more "hate groups" located in the Blue States even though the number of states in either camp was roughly even:
[image]
Click to enlarge

[image]
Click to enlarge

So what are we to make of these capricious numbers at the end of the day? The short answer is: Not much. Mark Potok's "hate group" numbers are a marketing ploy and an extremely lucrative brand name. Even Mr. Potok concedes on the legend of his hate map fundraising tool that these groups are doing nothing illegal:
"Listing here does not imply a group advocates or engages in violence or other criminal activity."
No crime. No violence. Just "wrong thoughts."
Admittedly, some of these groups do engage in what most people would consider inflammatory rhetoric, but as long as they're not breaking any laws… they're not breaking any laws and neither Mr. Potok nor any other "civil rights" vigilante groups have a right to silence anyone.
Mr. Potok uses his "hate group" smear because it allows him to incite his donor base, who were cultivated specifically for their political views, without having to accuse those groups of any actual crimes. His disclaimer may read "Listing here does not imply…" but that is precisely what it does and that's why the donors sent Mr. Potok more than $110,000 tax-free donor-dollars each and every day last year. And that, friends, is why Mr. Potok, who has no legal or law enforcement background, is compensated by this law firm to the tune of $150,000 a year. As Navin Johnson observed so many years ago, Mr. Potok's "Hate Map" is the kind of spontaneous publicity that makes people.
Publishers note: This article was originally posted at Watching the Watchdogs, and is reposted here with permission from the author.

Anne Stevenson: Huffington Post and Public Policy Bigot?

March 18, 2013 | by Michael Sharron | Link | Original Link

Anne Stevenson, a Huffington Post blogger and public policy consultant, wrote an article back in May of 2012 that I believe every man and every woman related to men needs to read. I warn you, after reading it, this article should be the reason you further dig your feet into the sand of the Fathers Right's/Men's Human Rights movement. Anne Stevenson clearly represents the true vitriol that allows sites like the Huffington Post to influence public polices and agendas clearly designed with gender politics centered around the "All Men Are Bad" mantra.

Before you dismiss this article as a angry, sexist woman who is just blogging to make money by writing salacious articles to drive people to the Huffington Post's affiliate links,we need to understand who Anne Stevenson is and why she is so dangerous.
Here is her Bio from the Huffington Post:
"Anne Stevenson is a nationally acclaimed writer, policy analyst and advisor. She holds a bachelor's degree in Political Science from Tufts University and is in the process of earning her Juris Doctorate. Stevenson's experience includes working directly with various international, national and local leaders, government offices, law firms, campaigns, and nonprofit organizations to provide support, strategic advice and grant writing services to leaders seeking to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of various publicly funded programs. Her featured interviews and commentary on politics, health and human services, disability rights, gender, employment, housing, and the justice system have appeared in numerous national news outlets and publications, including the Huffington Post, Washington Times, Boston Globe, Christian Science Monitor, US Conference of Mayors, FOX, NECN, and others.
Email: amns29@live.com"

As you can see, Anne Stevenson is not just some blogger. She is a up and coming star in the radical feminist public policy network that is bound and determined to drive misinformation that will have serious implications for your sons, husbands, brothers, and fathers. This is one lady that we need to keep our eyes on folks.
In compiling this article there were so many words and thoughts to express to A Voice For Men readers of just how insane Stevenson is that I could easily have written for days. Bearing that in mind, it's not so important what Anne thinks, but that she, and future employers, hears from men and women around the world how her brand of gender politics is a dangerous, destructive game. Her use of rhetoric and links to cherry picked statistics, from websites that exist to only to supply "credibility" to her position, is beyond dangerous.
I am asking readers of AVfM to read the article linked at the beginning of this post and then comment with your 4-5 sentence response. Say what you think the world needs to know about Anne Stevenson and her Huffington Post article. I will add it to the body of this post. We especially want to hear from women in our movement who have genuine concerns for their sons, brothers, and husbands. Once you have posted your comment and verified that I have added it, please contact Ms. Stevenson at her email address and send her a link to this living, growing document.

Anne Stevenson, Huffington Post, meet the Men's Human Rights Movement

To Anne Stevenson, the Huffington Post, and future employers of Ms. Stevenson; We, the readers of A Voice For Men, along with our sons, daughters, husbands, wives, brothers, sisters, fathers and mothers resent and reject the fraudulent claim that only men are perpetrators of domestic violence while only women are victims. This destructive and deceitful propaganda abandons those men, women and children who are victims of violent women for the sake of gender politics and money.
Your agenda denies every child being hurt by a mother, every husband hurt by a wife, and every woman in a same sex relationship hurt by her partner while robbing the ability to identify and seek help for all abusers. For every sick father that gains custody of a child, there is just as likely a sick mother gaining custody of a child. For every male batterer, there is a female batterer. Building public policy around gender stereotypes and politics might help drive funding or make a name for journalists like Anne Stevenson, but it unnecessarily and callously dismisses those victims who desperately need to see their struggles reflected in our policies and their pain addressed with our compassion.
Source
The time for misleading the public about this very important issue must come to an end. The time for an evidence-based, solution oriented approach is long overdue.
These are the men and women of the Men's Human Rights Movement, and here are their thoughts on Huffington Post journalist Anne Stevenson:

Greg to Anne Stevenson:

S.47, the VAWA just signed by Obama into law, defines Domestic Violence as "any that causes emotional distress and using unpleasant speech." Consequently all males are now perpetrators of Domestic Violence. Tell your readers Anne.
Also inform them that females slaughter their children three times more frequently than males.
You need to stop your propaganda Anne, and start speaking the truth.

James says:

What this blogger will never reveal on the Huffington Post is that in regards to who is doing the most Domestic Violence, the object is to to do away with ALL violence, not just the ones that are doing it the most to make a political or public policy statement. To publicize the amount of violence occurring at the hands of Men while overlooking violence from Women tells me that possibly Anne is not about ending violence, she is more interested in politics.

Peter Wright adds:

Have we not seen enough of radical feminism's program of estrangement and alienation of fathers from families? Anne Stevenson's new attacks and recommendations for the nation's fathers would see them estranged from their families at precisely the time when society is working to create more father involvement.

Stevenson's feminist ideology runs contrary to the attitudes of today's women and men who have largely disavowed the feminist label due to its more concerning goals. With that in mind I can only assume and hope that Ann Stevenson's employers and society at large will be mindful of her retrograde mission.

James Huff:

I think it's telling that Anne Stevenson's collectivist ideology would actually denounce the Clinton era Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act of 1996. She is obviously making the attempt to swallow any social justice movement under the banner of feminism, something her sisters-in-arms have been fairly successful with over the last 40 years.

The Feminist MRA writes:

Anne Stevenson's questionable academic credibility can be summed up in her latest peace on the Huffington Post; "Top 5 HHS Programs Endangering Women and Children." Not because the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services actually spends more on women's issues and women utilize more social services and health care then men. Not because statistically the outcomes of custody disputes still favor women significantly more than men. Not because women receive lighter sentences and face less jail time than men. Not even because one of the stories she linked actually detailed that the foster mother was responsible for the abuse. Not even because doing away with gender-based funding incentives contradicts her position of supporting women against gender-neutral policies, but because her Top 5 HHS Programs Endangering Women and Children only had 4 programs listed.

Declan Lyons says:

Having read your article 'Top 5 HHS Programs Endangering Women and Children,' I'm astounded at your failure to not only recognize violence committed by women against men and children, but to also ignore the injustices which have arisen from myopic, gender-biased domestic violence legislation in a legal system which automatically favors mothers above fathers.

I'm talking about the kind of instance where Judge Lori B Jackson saw fit to remove Lt. Col. Joel Kirk's children from his care and return them to their demonstrably violent mother, Tina Taylor Kirk.

You've made it obvious that you don't hold Men's safety as a priority, but if you truly care for the safety of children, as your headline suggests, you would be more concerned about violent mothers; who are the most likely people to kill their children.

From Grumpy Old Man:

As a child of the California family court system and father who endured this minefield years later, Anne Stevenson and the Huffington Post article projects a narrow one sided view which she backs up by dated references and Feminist bias. Fathers, mothers and especially children deserve better than what is portrayed here. If we truly want to get a better grasp on caring for our children we need to end this adversarial diatribe, get some people involved who do not have an agenda and move forward.

Says Knight Runner:

Finding an article full of misandry isn't difficult. However this article wasn't written by some anonymous blogger on some backwater web forum. This article was written by a person who is highly educated and well respected in her field and posted on the website of a well circulated publication. As such, I find it difficult to believe that she was unaware of her article's high level of misinformation.

Disorderly Conduct writes:

For decades the feminist movement has held a monopoly over the politics of the left. While much of this power has been used to make legitimate strides towards gender equality, gender feminists like Anne Stevenson have abused it to advance women's power without regard to the consequences; trampling Men's rights, perpetuating gender stereotypes and silencing dissenting opinion that speaks out against this injustice. On behalf of all who believe in universal human rights, I urge anyone with the power to do so to deny Anne Stevenson and the Huffington Post the platform to spread her sexism and bigotry.

Suzanne McCarley writes:

I read it twice and I still have no idea what Stevenson meant to convey, beyond a very generic (and rather garbled) "Men are pigs." I have seen better organized essays from grade school students, and I'm appalled by what Stevenson passes off as "citations."
The strongest impression I got was that it was intended to test the theory that Huffington Post readers are gullible morons who gobble up any gibberish written by a 'credentialed' feminist with a keyboard.
This is truly bottom-of-the-barrel sludge, not remotely resembling journalism, and adhering to a pathetically low standard, even for HuffPo.

Andy Bob on the Huffington Post HHS Article:

A perusal of Anne Stevenson's resume makes it clear that she is a professional feminist. This should serve as a warning to her readers that Ms Stevenson regards facts as nothing more than tools to be used to fashion a predictable man/bad; woman/good narrative.
Her feminist credentials also indicate that we can expect the usual chilling lack of concern for victims of female-perpetrated domestic violence. She will either haughtily deny the very existence of these victims, or dismiss their significance by relying on the well-worn feminist tactic of pretending that their numbers are negligible. This is a reprehensible lie.
The Men's Human Rights Movement advocates for the fundamental rights of all people, regardless of sex, race, age, religion or orientation. In order to achieve our goals, it is imperative that the bigotry of feminist ideologues like Anne Stevenson be exposed, and its adherents sidelined from the public discourse on domestic violence as soon as possible, lest the issue be forever bogged down in the mire of corruption and self-serving political agendas.

AVFM Publisher Paul Elam says:

50 years of misguided governance by a system that fails to embrace documented research on domestic violence and instead serves an ideological and monetary agenda has resulted in families and lives destroyed.
Anne Stevenson is clearly on a career path to perpetuate and perhaps worsen the problem. Our families and our children deserve better than this.
The problems of family and intimate partner violence are complex and require thoughtful and informed attention.
Individuals like Anne Stevenson and her ilk are all but broadcasting their intention to exacerbate the problem.

TO FUTURE EMPLOYERS OF ANNE STEVENSON

We believe any organization that hires Anne Stevenson will not serve their image well given her efforts to be misleading about serious public health issues in a way that ultimately brings harm to men, women and children. What her future employers need to realize is that gender politics is a double edged sword. Awareness of the accurate facts regarding domestic violence are finally starting to see the light of day, and a new, more encompassing paradigm, recognizing all victims and perpetrators, is beginning to emerge. We fully believe those organizations that continue to perpetuate destructive myths and ideologically driven agendas will fall on the wrong side of history, and the wrong side of public opinion.

AVfM and its growing body of supporters will be following Anne Stevenson's work regarding family and intimate partner violence and monitor her public statements and future employers actions very closely. We are prepared to provide measured, corrective responses to any further disinformation on behalf of those men, women and children ignored by her ideology.
A Voice for Men's editors encourages readers to extensively share this article with others on the major social networking sites in an effort to bring attention to the issues discussed in this article on Anne Stevenson and the Huffington Post.

An experiment in live blogging

March 18, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[quote] Nothing ventured, nothing gained. ~ Chaucer[/quote]
We are going to conduct an experiment here at AVFM and you get to participate. We were pleased to report about a month or so ago that AVFM had finally broken in to the top 100,000 worldwide ranking on Alexa. I had no way of knowing at the time that I would be able to tell you so soon that we have broken into the top 50,000. Nonetheless, here I am, and we have. It's a great place for us to be, thanks to your help.
Enough bragging, Paul, tell them about the experiment.
Michael Sharron, a Father's Rights Activist and blogger has written several articles for us on the Landen Gambill matter in North Carolina. He also happens to be a Search Engine Optimization (SEO) expert.
SEO, as I am learning, is not always an exact science. I won't go in to all the details (mainly because I don't know all of them), but one thing that seems to be working well for some blogs (not all) is something called live blogging. It is a method to renew content on a single blog post by making the post interactive. In this case, the interactive part will be you.
Here is how it will work for the first post, which will be coming in just a bit courtesy of Michael:
You will be reading an article about a particular up and coming fembot, whose activities we would like to draw some public attention to. You will be invited to share your non-slanderous, well-reasoned and compelling thoughts on the activities of this person in the comments. Remember, think scalpel, not chainsaw. Anyway, as comments come in they will be selected for appropriateness and copied directly into the article itself, in real time, and then deleted from the comments.
Why does this help some blogs? Because Google comes Goog Goog Googling along here and there, looking through the content of the site. As the article itself shows new content, Google "notices" this and it theoretically scores a little higher, pushing that piece up in the search returns and ultimately having a positive impact on our Page Rank, which is very important long term.
It is just icing on the cake that this happens to fit in perfectly with the kind of activism we like to do around here. So we are killing two birds, and all that.
Each of these experimental posts (we are planning to do three at this point) will be highlighted at the top with one of these [image] and a link back to this article for those that miss it.
And that is it. We get to see if live blogging will help AVFM grow even more, do some creative activism and you get to get your shots in where it might just count in a number of ways.
What's not to like?
The first post will be coming out in just a little while.

The Riptide controversy

March 18, 2013 | by Mateusz Wacek | Link | Original Link

[dropcap]T[/dropcap]he short version of the background is this: Deep Silver, a video game company, released a special edition of Dead Island: Riptide called “Zombie Bait”, and for this special edition, they decided to pack in a statue. The statue in question, the titular zombie bait, is of a female torso, minus the arms and head, and with gory detail. Deep Silver claimed the statue was “meant to signify a “grotesque take” on the Roman marble sculptures of the second and third centuries” and indeed, the link in the Gamespot article [1] is to such as statue, which features a nude male torso, missing the head and arms (though, without the blood and gore).

Perhaps Deep Silver really wanted to do a parody of ancient sculpture, or perhaps it was just for shock value, and happened to resemble the statue, or perhaps a bit of both. Either way, hackles were raised, goats were gotten, and dander was upped, pretty much all about perceived “objectification of women”, “violence against women”, and general “misogyny.” These are the same buzzwords many in the Men’s Human Rights’ movement are very familiar with.

Rhianna Pratchett, credited as a “Games writer” said “It’s not surprising to see games marketing aimed at men, but it’s not often quite so blatant i.e. (sic) ‘Look, tits!’ It is perfectly possible to keep the creative integrity of a franchise without resorting to one-gender marketing tactics.” Pratchett seems to be under the impression that any time something female is used in marketing, it’s automatically “aimed at men”, because nothing is sexier than a dismembered and bloody torso. As long as there are breasts involved, it’ll get ’em hard. According to her, men are like finches, copulating with freeze dried females so scientists can collect sperm (except the female birds were kept intact). While her statements that men have a Pavlovian reaction to depictions of breasts, even on a mutilated torso, is as misandrist as it is ridiculous, it gets better (or worse, depending on how you look at it). She then went on about a promotion used for The Walking Dead. “It’s a male zombie head with a screwdriver through its eyes. Nasty, sure. Gross, a little. In keeping, definitely. Offensive, no.” She doesn’t bother to explain why it’s not offensive, but she does make a point to mention that the acceptable promotion uses a male with a screwdriver through “its” eyes. While the misandry is blatant, what is unclear is if Pratchett actually is aware of her own misandry. She doesn’t bother to hide it, so either it’s too ingrained to be noticed, or she does realize it, and also realizes that feminism is so dominate, that there’s no need to be coy about anti-male hatred.

While the next commenter, Nels Anderson (developer for Klei Entertainment), only criticized the use of blood and gore to sell, the next to weigh in, Brian Moriarty relished in showing how shiny his armor is when he plays the white knight. He relates how he was teaching a college course called “Social Issues In Interactive Media And Games” (Why yes, he is a professor with feminist leanings. I’m as shocked as you are). During his class, he showed the picture of the torso.

Unfortunately, his male and female students didn’t achieve the desired level of feminist bile. According to him, “The general reaction could be characterized by one word: “Whatever”. This would not stand, and so he ramped it up, dropping questions loaded for bear. “So I asked my students, does this zombie-kitsch Dead Island torso objectify and degrade women or not? Does it contribute to the popular image of video games as violent, sexist and depraved? Do game companies bear any responsibilities to society beyond their mandate to make money? Would you work for a company that resorted to marketing gimmicks like this?”

He then noted how the students stared, silent and fidgeting. This is something pretty familiar to any student in a class with an unabashed ideologue. When you know your professor has an agenda, and when that professor (who has control over your grades) makes it clear what you’re supposed to believe, you’re more than a bit apprehensive to answer, lest you risk engaging in dialogue (you’re there to be talked to, not talked with), or worse, say the wrong thing and get immediately on the professor’s “Do not pass” list.

There was no mention in any of the articles about how the mutilated males objectify or degrade men, or that there is an image of video games as “violent, sexist and depraved” when the corpse has a penis. Only when there is a pair of breasts is it time to get outraged. However, more on that in the conclusion.

Ian Bogost, another professor, as well as video game designer and critic, also chimed on how the figure was offensive, but kicked it up a notch. Not only is it “offensive”, but “Dead Island Riptide now looks like a depraved rape joke.” I guess he noticed lack of feminist mention of rape with regard to this game, and felt it would not stand. Rape culture and rape apology were a bit overplayed cliches, but there’s always “rape joke”. Congratulations to Bogost for being the first to tie a mutilated torso to rape.

Jack Edwards, of Gaming Bolt [2], joins in the accusations of misogyny, and also tries to tie the dismembered torso into an accusation of sexualization. I guess I must have something wrong with my libido to not be turned on by mutilated remains, since so many people point out how dead sexy (see what I did there?) it must be. Though, he fails to drop the R-bomb. Nice try, but you’ll never make it to the higher levels of white knighthood without accusing someone of rape in some form or another.

Edwards also notes that, “As well as from typical groups, disapproval has also poured in from the gaming community en masse,” indicating that the disapproval is beyond just the gaming news sites.

And here is were I’d like to discuss what we can take from this. As mentioned above, the outrage is largely not from the depiction of violence. It’s from the depiction of violence against women (represented by this bloody women’s torso). This isn’t something that should come as a shock to many MRAs, but worth mentioning at least for the benefit of showing more examples. Violence against men occurs in video games far more often than against women (much like in real life), but never registers as such. At best, it’s an example of violence, but never does it indicate violence against men as a group. Only when women are the victims is it a gendered issue.

The same happens with sexualization. Duke Nukem, Doomguy, the titular Prince of Persia, Johnny Cage, Ryu, and the unnamed Two Worlds hero dude (to give just a few examples) all are the height of physical fitness and attractiveness, with many of the above mentioned appearing, or having the possibility of appearing, shirtless and/or showing off their manly physique. I'm sure feminists are just working on the final drafts of indignation-filled articles about how objectified Jax was, when his ripped torso and bulging muscles first graced Mortal Kombat II.

As for rape, a topic feminists love to bring out when they want to shut up the other side, the Tomb Raider franchise was criticized recently for a scene where Laura Croft would be almost raped by the villain. The scene was meant to be shocking and disturbing, and garner sympathy for the heroine. Of course, it had the rape of a woman by a man (even if only attempted), and so became a target. However, Alpha Protocol had an actual achievement where the main male character got raped by a woman. No, that's not a misread. Allowing your male protagonist to get raped was encouraged to the point of the game rewarding you for it.

You never heard of it? Don't worry. Neither did I until I looked through some of the comments on the Dead Island controversy, and did a quick search for the "Savage Love" achievement [3]. While a game that literally rewards players for getting their male character raped by a woman went unnoticed, we don't have to guess what would happen if the sexes were reversed.

From this story we can also take a lesson on chivalry, something that is, again, not exactly new to the MRA, but worth looking at as an example. The denouncing of Deep Silver for this publicity stunt is part of a trend in the video game community, especially among video game journalists. IGN, X-Play, Gamespot, and pretty much every other major tech news site/organization has at one time or another covered the "Women in video games" topic, usually with the conclusion that there's all this horrible, horrible misogyny about, and game companies should be ashamed of themselves for teaching boys to rape and abuse women.

Something to note is the amount of fervor and competition to be the strongest voice of denouncement against this horrible, horrible practice. If your colleague is saddened that something could be offensive to women, you need to be dismayed at the misogyny. Of course, the next guy will claim to be shocked, truly shocked, at the rampant anti-woman hostility in the industry. You can only top that by being disgusted at how video games make boys rape. It becomes a white knight lance measuring contest. After all, if you're seen as too soft on patriarchy, you'll not get your coveted pat on the back by feminists. If you're lucky, there'll be some people (hopefully male) who disagree, and want to look at the situation objectively.

They'll wonder why only violence against women, or sexualization of women, ever gets a mention, and maybe point to one of the many cases where men are killed, or have their bodies put on display. You can then accuse them of contributing to rape culture, or demeaning women with such complaints (no, you need not worry about explaining how that works) to boost your feminist score.

A large part of this whole issue is the way the anti-woman boogieman (or should that be "person of boogie"?) is built up, and maintained. We have to be told that this is offensive to women. Notice the authority in the articles. The authors outright tell you to be offended. If you're not then you're a horrible rapeiculturist. The flimsiest of explanations can be made. There are breasts, ergo, it's objectifying women (you could point out that Duke Nukem has a penis, and therefore is also objectified, but no fair bringing logic into this sort of thing).

The torso is of a woman, so therefore, it's violence against women. While that same reasoning could be used to show violence against men due to the numerous mutilated male corpses, double standards make sure that doesn't happen. This isn't just an offensive add campaign (which you're told it is). It's an indication of an anti-woman culture in the video game industry.

White knights and feminists (not necessarily mutually exclusive terms) both have it in their interests to maintain the all-powerful narrative. Tilting at windmills makes you look ridiculous, but fighting giants, misogynist giants, is a noble cause. For feminists, every victim needs a perpetrator, and if the public believes that the video game industry is just a seething cesspool of rape, violence against women, rape, objectification, rape, and possibly rape, then it just strengthens the victimhood identity.

The feminist firestorms that erupt result in more than just talk and blog filling. The company which created this promotion has released a mea culpa letter, promising never to do it again, and that everyone has learned their lesson. More than that, companies are listening to feminists tell them how to make games. For example, Anita Sarkeesian was invited to Bungie studios [4] for the purpose of lecturing them on female characters in games. Yes… Bungie, a large company responsible for the widely popular Halo series, invited Anita Sarkeesian, a feminist who has turned being offended into a lucrative career, to talk to them about how they can better serve feminists.

Even outside of actual visits by ideologues, we can see feminist influence. The Tomb Raider series was under attack for having a female protagonist with large breasts, and so the company has made sure to tweak the game to what makes feminists happy. Companies now know that when they release a game, they'll be scrutinized for if it is feminist approved. Valve, for example, has gotten a seal of approval (more or less. Feminists are careful never to completely approve, lest they cut off the opportunity to criticize later, and claim misogyny) for making strong female characters in the Half Life, Portal, and Left 4 Dead series (feminists likely also were pleased with Half Life having all the enemies the player happily slaughters be male).

Consider the case of Duke Nukem Forever, which received quite a few negative reviews. For example, Ars Technica [5], Ben Kuchera, mentions several times in the write up that a flaw with the game is that it hates woman (exactly how the game hates women is never really clear, but the fun thing about feminist thought is not having to back up your claims). the negative review from Joystiq [6] also brings up misogyny as a claim of "objectification of women" (again, not explaining, nor backing up the claim). IGN [7] also tosses out "objectifying women" as a criticism without explaining.

While complaints about perceived misogyny weren't the only ones about the game, they were quite noticeable, and the comments indicated that the consumers cared about the sexism in the game, real or imagined, and the toxicity of the misogyny label has caused reviewers to recommend not buying the game, which in turn affected sales. Video games are obviously not movies, but just as movie studios are careful not to release movies that would offend feminist sensibilities, which would ultimately result in lowered ticket sales, we're seeing video game companies taking into consideration how offending feminists can harm their sales.

Most game makers (programmers, writers, designers, directors, etc.) are male. However, women can essentially force them to change the way they make games. While game makers are free to create whatever they choose, games that ruffle feminist feathers are excoriated, and companies know that being labeled "misogynist" is enough cause harm to sales. Feminists can also call upon white knight to help out, with males spreading the word that a title is anti-woman, and therefore shouldn't be bought, besides simply not supporting companies that feminists tell them to shun. Women do have power and influence on the industry.

It is subtle and indirect, but power nonetheless, and a benefit of the subtlety is how female feminists can influence the industry (as Sarkeesian is doing) while bemoaning lack of women in the industry. They can demand changes from the comfort of their own keyboards, and still point to the lack of women game designers as proof of patriarchy. There is no need to go through the work to actually make the games they want to play. Basically, feminists are able to have their cake, eat it too, and then claim that the patriarchy doesn't allow them to have cake (there is a cake comment in there related to video games, but I have the restraint not to make it).

I don't want to just end on a sour note, pointing out misandry and leaving it at that, if I can help it. This is a bad situation for men, and it's not going to get better on its own. Feminist influence in the video game industry, white knighting by journalists, and consumers voting with their dollar in the way feminists want them to (for games that are feminist approved, and opposed to those which raise feminist ire) are all trends that show no sign of even slowing down.

However, that doesn't mean nothing can be done. There are ways MHRAs can fight back. Those of us who are connected to tech journalism, and specifically video game journalism, can write articles about the topic, reaching people beyond readers of men's rights websites. Right now, articles about gender and sex in video games is pretty much exclusively from a pro-feminist side, and feminists are unchallenged in promoting their views. MHRAs have done well in the comment section of online news articles that are misandrist in nature. The same energy put into exposing bias and sexism in Guardian or Huffington Post misandry could be put to use in articles such as the ones mentioned above. Especially at this point, it's important for us to get people aware of the issue.

[1] http://www.gamespot.com/features/dead-island-riptide-and-the-problem-with-video-game-marketing-6402693/

[2] http://gamingbolt.com/dead-island-riptide-when-sex-doesnt-sell

[3] http://x360.cheatfreak.com/Alpha-Protocol-cheat-tipsandtricks-Earning-the-Savage-Love-Achievement/120-41182-38387.html

[4] http://www.gamespot.com/features/from-samus-to-lara-an-interview-with-anita-sarkeesia n-of-feminist-frequency-6382189/

[5] http://arstechnica.com/gaming/2011/06/duke-nukem-forever-review-barely-playable-unfunny-and-rampantly-offensive/
[6] http://www.joystiq.com/2011/06/10/duke-nukem-forever-review-fail-to-the-king-baby
[7] http://www.ign.com/articles/2011/06/14/duke-nukem-forever-review

Abortion, adoption, safe haven laws — and lies

March 19, 2013 | by Michael Sharron | Link | Original Link

This article is not a debate on abortion, adoption, or safe haven laws, whether these issues are right or wrong, good or bad, just or unjust. This article is going to focus on how abortion, adoption, and safe haven laws are a very well entrenched and supported "opt out" for many women who use these tools by exercising their federally protected "choice card" to escape a unwanted pregnancy and how men are not afforded ANY tool to do so when we create children through recreational sex (Unless of course we cut parts of our anatomy and use condoms to decrease the level of pleasure in the act). Of course this debate is nothing new, it has been around for decades.

In fact, now that I think about it, this article isn't even about abortion, adoption, or safe haven laws. It is about the phenomena of astounding numbers of men who are reported deadbeat fathers around the world; who created children and refuse to love or support their offspring, and who are denigrated and excoriated in doing so. Ah, if it was only that simple. I am actually a believer in the concept that politicians and many others actually like the fact that there is a huge pool of "deadbeat" fathers around the world because it makes for great fodder in attracting women's votes and appearing to be concerned about the dear, poor children of the world.

Let's face it, without deadbeat fathers, there would not be a lot of female victims for whom we need to create social services programs, employment, and funding. Sheriff's departments and other law enforcement agencies couldn't attract voters by listing men in their jurisdictions who are out on their yacht drinking champagne with a 20 year old blond bombshell named Bambie while their children are at home eating ramen noodles because dear ole dad won't support them.

Let's face it, deadbeat dads are big business and funding sources for politicians, judges, and feminist conspirators. Without a huge population of deadbeat dads, we would not have people generating statistics that set out to prove that men are by nature beasts who would rather have sex with their offspring than feed them and thus why women need to have custody of their children in all cases. And we sure as hell don't need to include men in the concept of abortion, adoption, and safe haven debate to screw this up.

But having said this, is it really fair that we give women the abortion, adoption, and safe haven placement option and call her a good person and pro-choice, while calling men deadbeat fathers because they don't have any tools to "opt out" of parentage aside from having a vasectomy or abstinence? How come when we go out at night and have a few drinks and forget to use a condom, we are held responsible financially for the results while women can abort, adopt out, or just hand the child over to a fireman and walk away no questions asked?

Consider this simplistic analogy: Take five Men and five Women, throw them into a mud pit, ask all ten to get out and then give the five Women a shower, soap, and a washcloth while giving the Men none of these. Then, after the Women are clean, present statistics to Congress showing that Women are cleaner by nature than Men. This is exactly what is happening with the relation to abortion, adoption, and safe haven laws and absent fathers.

Is Access To Abortion, Adoption, and Safe Haven Laws A Conspiracy To Keep Men Oppressed?

Hell No! I just added that header to make my writing more fluid so that I could continue to bitch about how our governments and feminist public policies hold men accountable for accidentally creating children we didn't intend to create and who we cannot support, while making sure that women have the option of abortion, adoption, or safe haven laws to do just that.

What really pisses me off more than anything is the fact that we give women the option of abortion, adoption, and safe haven laws to protect children from mothers who may make bad decisions during pregnancy or right after a birth. Considering the decisions made by some mothers that endangers a child, this is a good thing.

A lot of women who have abortions and adopt children out are not ones who would hurt or make a bad decisions with highly vulnerable infants. They make those choices because they aren't prepared to have a child, can't afford them, or want to wait. Of course, nobody is keeping statistics on these women, but they damn sure are on fathers who aren't prepared to have children, can't afford them, or who want to wait.

Then they use these statistics to point out how bad or irresponsible men are. Again, I don't have a problem with abortion, adoption, and safe haven laws if it is used to protect a child from a mother who may make a bad decision and hurt the child, and I guess I can understand how some may make the decision that they don't want a child for which they weren't prepared. But to give women this ability and then publicly excoriate and denigrate men who do the same is bullshit.

As I have done in just about all of my writing here on A Voice For Men, I again appeal to radical feminists on the planet to cut the patriarchal, dominant, everything-is-centered-around-making-sure-men-succeed-and-women-don't bullshit and get back to human rights and drop the sexual politics crap that is just designed to drive funding to your organizations.

What are your thoughts on this article without making this a right and wrong debate on abortion, adoption, and safe haven placement? Do you think men should have an out when we accidentally create children that we are not prepared to handle? Do you think that governments and professional feminist should be keeping numbers on fathers who can't support their children, but who would implode at the suggestion that we expose women who have abortions or adopt their children out?

What If Women Didn't Have Access To Abortion, Adoption, or Safe Haven Laws?

Aside from the safety issue, if women did not have access to abortion, adoption, or safe haven laws, do you think there would be just as many women on the planet who appeared to be bad people by not wanting to be with or support their children? Is it quite possible that the reason we have the appearance of good, nurturing, and loving mothers and a whole bunch of bad dads is due to the fact that women can hide behind these issues? If men had federally protected tools to end a pregnancy that was created accidentally, do you think there would be a huge population of dads who weren't supporting their children?

We need the appearance that all dads are bad, and all mothers are good because this is how we drive public policy. The reality is, in all corners of this planet, there are very good fathers and mothers, and there are very bad fathers and mothers. But the feminists are not going to hear this. Such neutrality is not good for business. It does not drive anger, emotion, and funding to their organizations. They need bad dads, and abortion, adoption, and safe haven laws to make sure that only women appear to want children.

A Voice for Men's editors encourage readers to extensively share this article with others on the major social networking sites in an effort to bring attention to the issues discussed on Abortion, Adoption, and Safe Haven Laws as they pertain to the denigration of fathers.

Indian government: men don't matter

March 19, 2013 | by David Cuspis | Link | Original Link

An Australian reads a story about new laws in India and is reminded of home.

I was reading the paper on the train the other day, when an article on the "rape crisis" in India caught my eye. Naturally, as we have been conditioned to obsess on protecting women, the mere mention of the word "rape" is eye-catching.
So I read the short piece, which detailed the new rape laws that had been passed in India (a country known for its blind eye to the public abuse of men by female police officers) that set new penalties for rapists, including a mandatory 20 year sentence, and the death penalty if the victim is killed or left catatonic.
The article mentioned also that the Women's Rights Advocates in India were criticizing the law for not putting marital rape under the definition of rape.
That may very well be a legitimate concern, as there is now very little to protect women who are in fact raped by husbands. However, this was not the part that caught my eye. The part that got my attention was the sentence "[the new laws] define rape as a crime committed only by a man against a woman."
I went onto the internet to confirm this, and lo and behold:

> Bowing to pressure from women (sic) activists, the government has decided to restore the term rape in criminal law that states only men can be booked for committing the offence against women. [1]

Let's just think about this for a second.
In India, a man or woman can force his/herself on a non-consenting male, and not be guilty of rape. This revolutionary new "definition" of rape, clearly advocated for by ideologues filled with hate and resentment for all people who have the Y chromosome, means that we will see a sharp increase in the cries of victimization from women, who will now claim that rape is an exclusively male crime.
I have spoken to feminists about this issue; among them a particularly headstrong male feminist. The thing that struck me the most about this conversation was his valuing ideology over reason and fact with missionary zeal. He insulted me personally, raised up an army of straw men from the pits of fallacy and kept repeating different variations of the same claims over and over again – that feminists oppose misandry and that MRAs, who see feminists as ugly, fat, friendzoning, dyke sluts, are arguing with strawmen. That was his redundant response to me refuting his "fact" that women are the only ones who are raped.
When I told him that I personally know a man who was held down and raped by an abusive woman, he told me that such events are rare, and by extension claimed that such laws are unnecessary.

That's right, gents. Protecting us is unnecessary. So unnecessary that we need to actually make distinctions in the wording of laws so as to deliberately exclude male victims (read: tin soldiers/sperm banks on legs).
The ideologues in the Indian government deemed it necessary to deliberately and actively deny men equal protection under the law. We've already seen men in that country forced to the back of buses like African-Americans in 1950s America. We've seen them beaten up by members of the public and female police officers alike for accidentally boarding the "female only" carriage of a train. And now we're seeing the government actively denying them equal protection under the law in sexual assaults.
It is things like this that make me marvel at how people can still believe in the patriarchy that feminists have always claimed existed. The government of a nation bowing to the unreasonable and unjust whims of feminists should not be possible in that patriarchy. Introducing blatantly anti-male laws that deny men protection from the same crimes as women is not the imagined feminist patriarchy, not by any stretch of the word.
We are past the point where apologists can twist the meaning of words to suit their argument effectively. In no way would the feminist's patriarchy lie down for misandric legislation. Whatever the feminists are selling, it can't be called patriarchy anymore. Well, unless patriarchy, a system of female privilege at the expense of men, is what it is and always was.
I don't even think it could be called a matriarchy, due to the fact that the majority of women aren't man-hating cretins. I'd prefer to call it — feminarchy.
There is little point in my MHRA friends and me attempting reasoned discourse in our home country of Australia. My conversation with the dogmatic white-knight devolved into a mud-slinging match where everything from my intelligence to my ethics and morals was insulted on a personal level.
And that is a good case scenario.
My best friend, a fellow activist, had a feminist threaten to stab him when he brought up men's issues. That's right, she threatened to stab him. Imagine the outcry if he had threatened to so much as slap her?
These vehement knee-jerk reactions from feminists across the globe are an instinctive, animalistic response. When an animal is cornered, it lashes out, and similarly the feminist movement is consolidating its forces and lashing out at any detractors who threaten to topple their ivory tower. Have you ever seen a legitimate human rights advocate threaten to stab someone for exercising free speech? Human rights movements have their roots in humanitarianism, not in the barn of Animal Farm.
The Indian law was designed by feminists, deliberately excluding all male victims in order perpetuate the myth that women are the only victims in this world.
Men, i.e. human beings, are now having their protection under the law undermined even in countries such as mine. I am privy to the suffering of many of men at the hands of professional victims.
A good friend of mine received death threats due to a false claim of sexual harassment brought upon him by a psychotic attention-seeker whose advances he turned down. The same man was the victim of beatings at the hands of his then-girlfriend when she got angry with him for disagreeing with her very strong opinions.

Another friend of mine was taken to court over false accusations that were then dropped with no apology or compensation. The same man has been the victim of a botched circumcision.
Another friend of mine was savagely bashed by his girlfriend and raped by another woman whilst semi-conscious, and was ashamed to even talk about it.
These men have been told by feminists that it was their fault that they didn't seek help for it. Yet no help exists for men. There is only one men's rights charity in Australia, and they receive no support from the blue-pill government and Julia "Tu Quoque" Gillard. And when MHRAs try to start charities for the support of men, feminists – the very same feminists who victim-blame males for not seeking help – condemn these charities as misogynistic.
None of these men received any protection under the law, and now those horrible creatures in India that have the nerve to call themselves human beings are making it official: Men Don't Matter.
Did you hear that, men? Yeah, especially you over there in India:
YOU DON'T MATTER
(But you didn't hear it from the feminists; it's all the fault of patriarchy)
Reference:
1.) http://www.hindustantimes.com/India-news/NewDelhi/only-men-can-be-booked-for-rape/Article1-1021702.aspx
————–

Ryerson Student Union: On the path of bigotry

March 20, 2013 | by Dan Perrins | Link | Original Link

On March 15, Ryerson Student Union fell to deploring depths of bigotry and denied the opening of a Men's Issues Campus Group, publicly stating that men and boys have no issues worthy of examination.
Today we find that the bigotry continues from the student union president at Ryerson. Are any of us surprised?
Ryerson Student Union members go to the same school, study the same subjects and are graduates of over two decades of the same forced feminist philosophy. Now they are going to extraordinary lengths to keep force feeding society their special Canadian University blend of misandry, seasoned with censorship and rancid animosity.
According to theeyeopener, three students from Ryerson, Anjano Rao, Argir Argirov and Sarah Santhosh made the application, generated the necessary documents to create a men's issues group and presented them before a seven person student union groups committee.
They were denied.
A letter of appeal was sent to the Ryerson Student Union President Rodney Diverlus.
Denied.
Now before we go any further here are just three of RSU's groups.
[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- Harry Potter Association
- RU Anime
- Vinyl Appreciation Society

[/unordered_list]
It would seem that even the issues of fictitious and inanimate objects have more of a voice at Ryerson University than men and boys, given their recent ruling and reply to appeal.
According to theeyeopener Diverlus said "[C]ommittee members raised concerns about the group's association, and whether or not they were directly or indirectly associated with the groups A Voice For Men or Canadian Association For Equality."
So they were denied recognition because of unsubstantiated and anomalous claims that they might be associated with other groups that also concern themselves with the issues of boys and men?
That was the objection that was sufficient to rate the students concerns as less worthy of inclusion that a club dedicated to Harry Potter?
The contemptible arrogance of that notwithstanding, the implication that this group has any ties to AVFM, which they do not, is as credible as saying RSU has ties to Al Qaeda because they also have a Muslim Students' Association. Whether the three students have an association with CAFE is unknown here, as we have no association with them, either.

To our knowledge, the only thing these three groups share is compassion for men and boys, but that is apparently enough to inspire a McCarthyesque response from RSU.
We might suggest a questionnaire for future RSU use.
Question 1. Are you now or have you ever been a member of groups that have compassion for men and boys?
No need for question 2.

Diverlus goes a little further by stating that:

> These are groups that are, in some jurisdictions, considered to be a hate group, become known to have profiled women on campuses who speak against them, and they are tied to individuals who not only go out of their way to negate the struggles of women but can also create some problematic discourse on language around the idea of women's rights.

And this is where the bigotry is reinforced by lies.
What "jurisdiction" would that be, Mr. Diverlus? We know of no such jurisdiction, either in Canada or the United States. We know of some accusations, completely unsubstantiated, such as those coming from RSU, but that hardly constitutes a jurisdiction.
There is also no truth at all in the accusation that AVFM or anyone else has profiled women who have spoken against them. What Diverlus is referring to here is that AVFM did news stories on people, ideologues similar to those at RSU, who were engaged in illegal acts like vandalism, harassment and blocking doors in order to prevent students at the University of Toronto from attending a lecture on male suicide and educational problems, acts that were also condemned by the administration of the University of Toronto.

Ryerson Student Union has some interesting ideas on discourse.

We also have to wonder just what Diverlus means by "problematic discourse on language." The syntax of that statement is muddy, but still clear enough to indicate that Diverlus and crew have anointed themselves as the final and quite draconian arbiters of what discourse is to be allowed from students at Ryerson University. Not to mention the fact that there is no record anywhere of any of the parties in question ever challenging the legitimacy of women's human rights, and abundant evidence that all support those rights.
That last statement from Diverlus was one sentence. Once sentence with two outright lies, one implied lie and a clear indication of license to control what students would and would not be allowed to think; at a Canadian university.
The article from theeyeopener, thankfully not written by Diverlus, goes on further to state that the groups six page constitution has goals to "create a progressive and constructive voice and lend representation to any and all Ryerson students concerned with the issues of men and boys." There is no intention of taking away women's rights, as is well stated by one of the group.

With Rod's next quote we find out he actually lives with his head in his ass.

> We know that oppression and the marginalization of men is something that doesn't exist just like the oppression and marginalization of straight people or white folks in our society.

This kind of statement is coming from a university where men are steadily and rapidly decreasing in numbers, as they are from the employment scene; where suicide for men happens at four to five times the rate that it does for women, and where male victims of sexual assault and domestic violence are systematically sidelined?
The fact that the Supreme Court of Canada did not believe Nicole Ryan's abused woman's plea and still decided not to punish her for soliciting murder was in no way shape or form the marginalization of a male's life at all?
The very fact that RSU is refusing to allow open discussion of these matters is proof of the need for a men's issues group. We should not be surprised that the problem is being denied by its very source.
Asking the Ryerson Student Union if men and boys need help is like asking BP if we need electric cars.
The silver lining to this story, which desperately needs one, is that according to theeyeopener, the group says they will continue to "push hard" to accomplish their goals. That is the lesson we have always learned from history. You can sabotage people, lie about them, demonize them and worse. You can use every bit of power and influence at your disposal to throw people off track, to derail their efforts and to cause them as much grief as possible in order to dishearten them from their just pursuits. But you cannot kill the truth. You cannot forever silence those justly demand to be heard. Over and over again, we have seen this played out on the world stage, as tyrants and bullies pushed back against truths so toxic and threatening to their agenda, and were ultimately forced to relent.
All they manage to do in the end is show their desperation and their lack of moral and intellectual validity. In the end, the unprincipled dictates of forced ideology have always failed. And this will be no exception.
The time has come to recognize that men are human beings with their own unique and undeniably real troubles, challenges, hopes, dreams and difficulties. The truth about that is here. The need for it to be heard and addressed is here. The facts are speaking and the fire is starting to burn. The only thing in the way is the bigotry of ideologues who fail to see that their days of silencing the truth are coming to an end.
But we have seen their kind come and go before, and we have laid to rest their toxic ideas in a grave dug specially as a resting place for the worst of our human failings.

AVFM and NCFM join forces on men's college groups

March 20, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

The most important announcement ever from AVFM.

After several discussions with National Coalition for Men (NCFM) President Harry Crouch, I am happy to make an official announcement that AVFM is joining forces with NCFM for an initiative unlike anything the MHRM has seen before.

As recent events demonstrate, there is great need for the establishment of men's issues groups at Western universities that are both focused on addressing all relevant issues to men and boys, including misandry, and that operate independent of any gender ideology.

We have also seen, as evidenced by the treatment of the Men's Issues Awareness Group at the University of Toronto and the students at Ryerson University who are struggling to establish a men's issues group, there is some significant resistance. Much of that resistance has been in direct conflict with the principles of free speech, free assembly and the open dissemination of ideas.

It is now evident that the most critical front for the advancement of men's issues is the university campus. And that is where we are going to go.

AVFM and NCFM are undertaking a cooperative plan to foster the establishment and development of men's issues groups throughout Western academe. We will be offering assistance to interested students in writing charters, constitutions and organizing executive structures, as well as development of promotional materials designed to attract other students to their ranks and educate them about the issues. We will be extending financial assistance for printing and other associated costs.

We will be working in concert with and sometimes following the lead of Christopher J. Thompson, NCFM's Campus Ambassador, who has already established an NCFM Chapter at Montana State University. Thompson plans to expand his efforts to other schools.

Since the events at the University of Toronto, I have been personally contacted by a professor at a major Western University and a student at a large Midwestern school, both of whom are interested in establishing men's issues groups.

The important thing (of many important things) in the upstart and support for these emerging groups is that they have the support of individuals who have a comprehensive understanding of the issues, as well as a keen awareness of some of the difficulties they will face.

Regarding that, I have only the deepest admiration, respect and confidence in NCFM, with President Harry Crouch. Harry is the perfect alliance for AVFM, enabling us to push ahead with this initiative, and to do it correctly. He understands the issues as well as anyone alive, which is why he is at the helm of the oldest American men's rights organization in existence.

Harry is also, like the editors, contributors and supporters of AVFM, an unabashed and uncompromising advocate for men and boys. He also has no illusions about what the problems are and the kind of effort we need to undertake to address those problems.

I have said before that 2013 will be the year of the MHRM. I am more confident of that now than ever, though the road ahead is a difficult one. The forces of misandry are also accelerating, as is the strength of ideological governance.
We are not going to be deterred.
AVFM has grown at an incredible pace, from the relatively unknown status of a personal blog, to an influential and widely read publication hosting the most incisive commentary on the state of men and boys that has ever existed. We have effectively established, in our short history, that the podium is no longer the sole property of anti-male gender ideologues. That alone would have been considered impossible by many not so long ago. But the time has come for a great step forward. Not only are we ready to take it, the fact is that we must. The unassailable and uncompromising message that men's rights are human rights must be taken outside the online world and directly into the halls of higher education and beyond.
This is how we will begin.

University of Toronto, CAFE, host Nathanson and Young

March 21, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]
The following notice has been posted to the website of the Canadian Association for Equality:
From Misogyny & Misandry to Intersexual Dialogue
A conversation exploring the effects on both men and women of our current approach to gender and how we might foster a genuinely intersexual – and intersectional – dialogue that is both broad and deep, while incorporating all aspects of personal and social identity
With presentations by Dr. Katherine Young and Dr. Paul Nathanson, authors of Spreading Misandry and Legalizing Misandry, followed by a conversation with panelists.
Thursday, April 4 at 7:00 PM
Ramsay Wright Laboratories, Rm. 117 * 25 Harbord Street (at St. George St)
Recommended Donation $5 * All Welcome
End of notice.
AVFM Ontario News reporter Dan Perrins and cameraman Christian Chiasson will be covering at the scene.
[/box]

Dongle-Gate: The sterilization of men in tech culture

March 21, 2013 | by Kyle Spier-Swenson | Link | Original Link

---

Earlier this week Adria Richards, employee of SendGrid, created the latest media shitstorm after tweeting about two guys behind her in a tech conference. Outraged by the conversation they were having, she took a pic of them, then publicly tweeted their picture and the outrageous behavior.

What the now former engineer for Play Haven and his friend didn't know; Was that the conference they were attending had copy and pasted their code of conduct from the Ada Initiative's example code of conduct. This code of conduct forbids any sexual discussion. You heard that right, a public convention, with thousands of people, talking, socializing, etc. explicitly forbids any discussion about sex or sexual remarks amongst conference goers.

Some back story here:

The Ada Initiative is a feminist organization aimed at removing male sexuality from tech spaces while allowing feminism approved flavors of female sexuality to remain. I really wish I was being hyperbolic here, but this an exact quote on that topic:

> The Ada Initiative explicitly supports discussion of sex when it is on-topic for the conference and done in a woman-positive way, and has published specific guidelines on how to achieve this.

While explaining why they shut down a talk about sex at a hacker conference late last month, they made their agenda and ideology even more well-known: Men can't handle thinking about sex without harassing, groping, and even raping women. Think that's more hyperbole? Here are some more excerpts from the same article quoted above:

> Certain sexual topics can trigger PTSD in people who have been sexually assaulted, and can be perceived as encouragement to humiliate, objectify, and assault women, regardless of the intent of the speaker.
>
> Discussing sex creates a "sexualized environment" which many people take as a signal to treat women as sexual objects rather than as fellow conference attendees, resulting in a higher incidence of harassment and assault of women. Too many women have been raped at technical conferences; we should do everything we can to prevent future rapes.
>
> Many people are unable to separate "talking about sex" and "saying derogatory things about women," and take the introduction of one for permission to do the other.
>
> Sex in many societies is strongly tied to the objectification and humiliation of women.

I was honestly at a loss for words when I read that article. This is the biggest feminist group advocating for inclusiveness in tech spaces, and they associate men thinking or talking about sex with the victimization of women.

This is what men going to tech conferences have to look forward to; this is the new elevator-gate, and even though Adria Richards isn't associated with The Ada Initiative (the new skepchick), she is poised to become the next Rebecca Watson, enabled by policies put forth by The Ada Initiative. If you thought this would be limited to Atheist conferences, you were wrong.

Adria harpooned in a blog post about how the image of some little girl in a slideshow was her "trigger" for publicly humiliating two men for making a joke among themselves. She opined that this girl wouldn't be able to enter the tech field when she grew up "because the ass clowns behind (Adria) would make it impossible for her to do so." That this was justification for getting a guy fired and creating a massive media outrage. Talk about hyperbole.

Adria Richards is no small fry. She is a public speaker, proposes to be a communication bridge between developers and upper management. She even has personal friendships with the organizers at PyCon, to the point that after tweeting about these men, she contacted PyCon to request they be handled, via text.

Men, this is how your sexuality is viewed by women and men like this. DongleGate goes beyond ElevatorGate, because now are you not only forbidden from saying anything to a woman that she doesn't like, but you also can't say anything within earshot of women that they might not like.

I suppose it would be too much to ask that she at least lead by example?

Guess so. In AdriaSpeak, this could be described as the recommendation to sexually harass TSA members.

And ladies: This is how weak women like Ms Richards think you are:

> Women in technology need consistent messaging from birth through retirement they are welcome, competent and valued in the industry.

Not only are you children who can't handle adult conversations, but you also need consistent condescending encouragement (and maybe some "good job" stickers?) to be able handle a job in the technology industry. I on the other hand happen to think more highly of women.

While flaunting herself as a "Joan of Arc", she ended her blog with this statement:

> Yesterday the future of programming was on the line and I made myself heard.

Today, the future of tech culture is on the line, and we are making ourselves heard. We will not stand by idle while ideologues promote a culture of hatred, fear and victimhood.

???

Addendum from the publisher: I have just been informed by Kyle Spier-Swenson that Sendgrid is not near as happy with Adria Richards as she appear to be with herself. They fired her crazy ass.

From Twitter:

And from Facebook:

There now, who says there is no good news in the world?

And yet another addition to the addendum, more evidence that Adria's mouth is a perfect match for her foot:

L O Fucking L

Domestic violence statistics, laws and information for men

March 21, 2013 | by Michael Sharron | Link | Original Link

---

The following article on Domestic Violence statistics, laws, and information as it pertains to the Men's Human Rights Movement, is intended to maintain a live document to which our community can continually add information.
The end goal is both practical and experimental; to maintain one core document that encompasses exhaustive information about domestic violence, and to use it to spread the truth.
At the end of this article is a contact form that you are encouraged to use to add relevant information as it relates to Domestic Violence, statistics, laws, and other information that is pertinent to our mission. Additionally, it is important to use the social sharing icons located at the end of this document to propagate this article on the many major social networking sites like Facebook, Twitter, Google+, and others so that other Men and Women who are affected by bad Domestic Violence laws can learn, educate, and get involved in our movement.

A Voice For Men Statements on Domestic Violence

Domestic Violence is a serious issue facing all of humanity. Violence reduction against all humans requires a collaborative effort that is solution and evidence based; not grounded in governmental politics, sexual politics or gender ideology. Amelioration efforts must encompass proven interventions, both in treating victims and perpetrators and in providing legal remedies that serve the purpose of amelioration.
All these strategies must produce a sustained effort with informed sensitivities to men, women, and in particular, children, instead of using misdirection and other tactics that are designed to further ideological agendas and fund organizations.

Click on any tab for more reading

[tabs style="default"] [tab title="Laws"]When talking about Domestic Violence laws, the combination of how violence is defined in the Violence Against Women Act and how these matters are prosecuted collide to create an environment that is dangerous for men, women and children and for members of their extended families who have to endure the fallout.
Influential definitions of violence, put forth by politicized legal experts, include non-violent acts such as pointing a finger while speaking in an elevated voice and other perhaps uncomfortable, but essentially non-violent acts. Those definitions, as presented in VAWA are completely subjective.
Terms like "if you feel like…" are commonly used throughout this federal legislation and many use this to their advantage for revenge, to deflect attention from the fact of mutual violence and to put themselves in a better position in divorce and child custody matters.

With regard to prosecution, domestic violence laws are usually decided on the legal concept of “preponderance of the evidence” rather than “innocent until proven guilty.” This means without any forensic evidence, or indeed any evidence other than the accusations of a plaintiff, a Judge can still find guilt if he/she believes that violence “likely” occurred. The problem with this thinking is that judges are politically motivated and want to stay in the graces of the Domestic Violence Industry. Consequently many of them allow and enable false allegations or mutual combat to proceed to conviction for men only. [/tab] [tab title=”Statistics”]A Voice For Men believes that credible and verifiable domestic violence statistics are being ignored because the organizations responsible for gathering and reporting data have a vested financial and political interest in domestic violence being perceived in ways that fit with their requests for government funding. More specifically, many of the agencies tasked with ending domestic violence need for the issue to fit their worldview so that their organizations can continue to provide employment, fund programs and services, and garner political influence using government money.

When looking at domestic violence statistics, the numbers are all over the board with one organization reporting that men commit domestic violence 95% of the time, and another reporting that domestic violence occurs at even rates between men and women. Until governments get serious about ending all violence, instead of using violence to push gender specific agendas, we will likely never have true statistics on the problem. Currently, virtually all organizational methods for collecting statistics do not get counted as domestic violence when women hit men. Men often fear reporting violence perpetuated against them and few law enforcement agencies and judges want to talk about violence against men.[/tab] [tab title=”VAWA”]The Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) was first enacted into federal law on September 13, 1994. It was considered ground breaking legislation by then President Bill Clinton.

Unfortunately, it only addressed violence by men against women. It completely overlooks violence against men and children perpetrated by women, and violence in the LGBT community that we now know exists at equal rates to heterosexual relationships. In the past eight years, VAWA has transformed itself from domestic violence legislation to a massive industry that hinges on and supports the idea that there is a “War on Women” being waged by men and is routinely used to drum up support from targeted women voters. The Violence Against Women Act is frequently used in the United States to piggyback other controversial legislation. By attaching other laws to VAWA it is easier to deter objection on the grounds that if you object, you must support bruised and beaten women.

As we discussed in our section on Domestic Violence laws, there is very dangerous wording in VAWA that guarantees violence committed by Men and it has devastating effects on Men and Women in their families.[/tab] [tab title=”Funding and Industry”]When talking about Domestic Violence funding, it is important to note that federal money allocated to responding to domestic violence is currently at $460 billion dollars annually and is not distributed to victims of proven violence.

In reality, the majority of this money goes to non-profit organizations, political action committees, training, law enforcement, and other groups. This has set up what many call the Domestic Violence Industry that, as stated earlier, relies on federal money to complete their missions, often which have nothing to do with serving victims.

Of course, Congress is not going to continue this level of funding if domestic violence is eradicated, so this incentivizes violence reporting that finance these professional organizations. If domestic violence funding, complete with oversight and accountability went directly to victims, then it is quite possible we could start diminishing domestic violence levels across the board.
However, that would mean less need for government money on which political groups and other special interest groups feed themselves.[/tab][tab title="DVPO's"]Domestic Violence Protection Orders are actually exacerbating violence and research is now showing that they are highly ineffective and in many cases counter productive. Consider your typical Domestic Violence incident, which means two people arguing, yelling, possibly hitting walls and sometimes exchanging blows.
The police are called, and the man is taken to jail. Adding a DVPO to this mix, the man in jail is now faced with being severed from his children, losing his job, his home and freedom. While many may say "Good, he deserves it," they tend to forget that this was a situation involving mutual combat, and that he may be the primary source of support for his wife and children. Additionally, some men, when unjustly cornered in this fashion, fall into rage and despair, becoming capable of much worse than the mutual combat that had already transpired. While protective orders may sound good and feel good, they are actually a lighting rod for increased levels of violence.
Additionally, Domestic Violence restraining/protective orders are usually handed out freely by magistrates and judges applying the "It's better to be safe than sorry" mentality in these matters which has systemic and lasting consequences in future employment, constitutional rights, and reputation for, men, and their children, even if they are not found guilty.[/tab][tab title="False Allegations"]A Voice For Men believes that false allegations of domestic violence are at epidemic levels. Over 1,000,000 restraining orders are issued each year in American Family Courts. They are "normal" part of divorce strategy. What fuels false allegations is clear.
By lowering the definition of violence so low and applying subjective criteria for having police over to your house to automatically arrest a man, and given that the courts do not require evidence to gain a conviction, and the fact that a lot of money hinges on these false allegation being adjudicated guilty, this sets the stage for a complainant to make this allegation without any fear of repercussions. We have many examples of women who were found guilty of making false allegations that routinely walk out of courtrooms with nothing more than a stern warning from a Judge.
These allegations are becoming quite ordinary and expected for the simple reason that they work. They provide the accuser a solid leg up strategically, enabling them to take control of a marriages assets and property with no evidence justifying it.[/tab][tab title="Domestic Violence Analogy"]If you are reading this article and still compelled to demand that domestic violence laws remain centered around women because you believe that men far outnumber women abusers then I would like to provide this simple analogy to demonstrate how dangerous your thinking is.

If a woman walks into a daycare and harms eight children and a man walks into another daycare and hurts only three children then the woman has hurt far greater numbers of children. But if we suggested that new laws needed to be drafted to prevent women from entering daycare facilities on these grounds, then the mainstream media and women's rights groups would be outraged that we are singling out the Woman only. And, they would be right in doing so. Not just because it is unfair to condemn all women based on the actions of a minority, but because the three children that were hurt also matter. It is not about who hurt more children, it is about all the children being hurt.
In virtually all social problems we face, none are as focused on gender as domestic violence. And that bias is clearly reflected in our laws and statistics.[/tab][tab title="Mandatory Arrest"]Much like Protective Orders, while they may feel good and sound good on news reports, the reality is all they do is further compound the issue which escalates further hostility — especially when the situation revolves around mutual conflict and violence. As we see in Erin Pizzey's video below, rarely are Domestic Violence situations one-sided involving a man just coming home from work one afternoon and deciding to beat his wife.
Taking a highly volatile situation and adding in a mandatory arrest which causes loss of employment, further financial problems, inflaming untreated emotional or psychological orders, and you have set the stage for greater violence. According to a Harvard University study, when states enact mandatory arrest policies, the intimate partner homicide rate increases by 57%. (Source: Iyengar R. Does the certainty of arrest reduce domestic violence? Evidence from mandatory and recommended arrest laws. Cambridge, MA: National Bureau of Economic Research, 2007.) This means that over 600 persons a year, most of them women, are murdered as a result of these polices.
Prosecution, jail, and causing someone to lose their job, reputation, and adding to further financial difficulty is never going to work, and pretending that all domestic violence incidents are men's fault only contributes to the problem. The only way to effectively address domestic violence is by addressing the underlying issues that lead to ineffective coping skills. Of course, I am sure the radical feminist love seeing Men carted off to jail and losing everything thing they own, but in retrospect all they are doing is creating an environment that assures future violence. Mandatory arrests are simply not working.[/tab][/tabs]
[image]

Women Supporting Reforming Domestic Violence Laws And The Violence Against Women Act

When discussing Domestic Violence, laws surrounding violence, and statistics, it is easy to imagine that a casual reader of this article will dismiss it as ramblings from Men who are upset that they can no longer beat women and get away with it. Therefore, this section of the article is devoted to the many women from A Voice For Men who have plenty to say about Domestic Violence. Additionally, we are going to provide links and commentary from other well established Women's group who oppose VAWA and the current ways in which Domestic Violence laws are actually increasing violence, encouraging false allegations, creating false statistics, encouraging fraud, and which are centered around gender and sexual politics rather than ending ALL violence.

Meet Erin Pizzey. Never heard of her? Well if you have done your research on Domestic Violence you would know that she is a Woman who actually started the first Women's shelter in the United Kingdom and is considered an expert on Domestic Violence worldwide. What we learn from Erin is that in order to end all violence stemming from domestic partnerships and marriages, we must do so equally and absent ideologies that Women are the only ones abused and that Men exclusively commit violence. To learn more about Erin Pizzey CLICK HERE.
[youtube http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=pyfwJ55hKgE?rel=0&w=560&h=315]
From Concerned Women For America:
"VAWA has created a vast bureaucracy with an annual price tag of $455 million. Instead of addressing the root problems of violence and ending battering, the broad definitions of violence in VAWA mean that husbands are thrown in jail based on flimsy allegations of causing "emotional distress" or "unpleasant speech." Meanwhile, drug-addicted boyfriends and alcoholic cohabitors continue to batter, and all men are assumed to be capable of violence."
"The end result is that a bill that supposedly addresses domestic violence is, instead, a thinly veiled means of promoting feminist ideology, and anyone who dares to raise questions is accused of waging a "war against women." In such a climate, rational disagreement is virtually impossible."
From Women Against VAWA Excess, we learn how radical feminist groups are actually suppressing domestic violence statistics in order to bring to light "Patriarchal Dominance", are publicizing articles that only show male perpetration of violence against women, and are obstructing evidenced based research that attempts to shed truth on the fact that women are equally responsible for domestic violence.
Phyllis Schlafly, an American constitutional lawyer, activist, and author states that "For 30 years, the feminists have been pretending that their goal is to abolish all sex discrimination, eliminating all gender differences no matter how reasonable. When it comes to domestic violence, however, feminist dogma preaches that there is an innate gender difference: Men are naturally batterers, and women are naturally victims (i.e., gender profiling)."
SAVE Services, a non-profit devoted to evidenced based and real solutions to ending domestic violence across all genders, is one of the top organizations worldwide that has an advanced legislative network that talks with Congress daily on ways to bring rational and humanistic laws on violence that have far greater outcomes than the Violence Against Women Act does. And, the board and legislative team consist of many women. But there is another group of women who should be concerned about domestic violence reform that we rarely hear about. These women have a tremendous reason to see new laws and consciousness regarding violence change from our current thinking that "Men are Bad" and "Women are Good" ideology pushed by thousands of organizations and non-profits across the world. They are the second wives who's husband are unable to see their children because of a false allegation, grandmothers who have not seen their grandchildren in a decade because of protective orders brought from custodial mothers who wanted to gain tactical advantage in child custody matters, sisters of men who have witnessed mutual combat between her brother and wife/ex-wife where he was the only one held accountable, and daughters of fathers who learned at 18 that her father was actually wanting to be involved in her life, but was either moved 5 states away, or prevented from contacting her because he yelled one night and the police were called.

Other Women who have an interest in seeing domestic violence reform, and who should be concerned about men's right in general are the many hundreds of millions of custodial mothers all over the world who have male children that will one day face a system where he is likely to be alienated and marginalized in his child's life because of a family court system that allows false allegations of domestic violence to proceed to conviction, or who will find himself on the wrong side of a judge who has been trained (thanks to VAWA) that his yelling is considered domestic violence under the law.
You think this does not happen? You think that evidence will exonerate him? That's how the erroneous idea that false allegations only represent a fraction of all domestic violence cases is perpetuated Please do research on "preponderance of the evidence" vs. "innocent until proven guilty" and how these legal definitions influence domestic violence laws that are alienating tens of millions of paternal grandmothers (former custodial mothers no less) from their grandchildren each year.

The Future of Domestic Violence Laws, The Violence Against Women Act, and The Family Courts

Domestic violence laws and complaints have always been used in the family courts worldwide as a tactical tool to put the opposing party in a bad situation in divorce and in child custody matters. Although, I'm not sure why given the century old history of marginalizing men in the family court process whether they had any history of violence or not.
What is clear is that there is a massive push by many father's rights groups, some psychologists and others around the idea that equally shared parenting is the best approach after a divorce or separation. And, there are many US States stating to take a close look at shared parenting. We are even starting to see this take place in the United Kingdom, Canada, and other countries (although unfortunately to a lesser degree).
A Voice For Men believes that shared parenting scares organizations that advocate on behalf of women who have become accustomed to the control, access to social services, and the freedom to relocate after a divorce that custody has afforded them historically.
In 2012, the National Organization For Women's foundation released their annual report on Family Law in the Fall of 2012 which began with the opening sentence:

> This Special Report of the NOW Family Law Ad Hoc Advisory Committee > focuses on the destructive ability of abusive parents (usually the father) – aided by fathers' advocacy groups or fathers' rights groups – to deny the protective parent (usually the mother) custody of minor children. Discussed in this issue is how abusers deny custody, and the damage it causes to a half million or more children exposed to continuing physical, psychological and sexual abuse.

Clearly, battle lines have been drawn by major women's advocacy groups outlining that the domestic violence issue will be how the National Organization For Women plans on attacking shared parenting initiatives when they arise. And it's working. Virtually all shared parenting initiatives have legislative language attached to it mandating that if domestic violence is a "concern," then equal parenting can not be considered — thus another incentive for false accusation and the issue of a restraining order.
This will be beneficial to those that benefit financially and politically from the manufactured rise in domestic violence statistics, lawyers who make tremendous amounts of money from two parents fighting for 18 years, rather than equally parenting, and Judges who use bad fathers as election props. And, the behemoth of all lobbying organization known as the National Child Support Enforcement Association (NCSEA) will sit idle and watch this unfold knowing that if shared parenting is realized, there will be fewer men paying child support which justifies their existence and political stature.
The combined power of the National Organization For Women, Bar Association/Lawyers Groups, the Child Support Enforcement Lobby, and other groups have always used domestic violence as a reason why it's best to have a "mother take all" family law system. Because you, your sons, your brothers, your fathers, and your new husbands are natural abusers, which of course maintains their agendas.
Having said all this, I want to make it very clear to women in paternal families that you are equally devastated by this ideology and we are looking to you to join in this fight to oppose these groups because your presence in your grandchildren, step-children, and nieces and nephews lives are at stake.
[youtube http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=LlFAd4YdQks?rel=0&w=420&h=315]

A Voice For Men Supporter Comments on Domestic Violence Laws and Statistics From The United States, Canada, Australia, The United Kingdom, India and Others

Perhaps the most important part of this article on domestic violence laws, statistics, and other information as it relates to the Men's Human Rights Movement is for others reading this document to hear your stories; be it as a father, paternal grandmother, step-mother, aunt/uncle, or other family member.
Using the form below we encourage you to submit well thought out, succinct, and hard hitting examples of how bad domestic violence laws have affected you. Once received, we will add your thoughts to this section so we ask that you be as brief as possible so that this document does not become so big that it's loses it's readability.
Furthermore, you will not be identified in the post. Lastly, I can not begin to convey how important it is to share this article on the major social networking sites with the hundreds of millions of Men and Women worldwide who have an interest in Men’s Rights, and who see bad Domestic Violence laws and statistics hurting innocent alleged perpetrators.

SPLC 2013: Still no minorities at the top

March 22, 2013 | by VFM News and Commentary | Link | Original Link

Last week, Watching the Watchdogs examined the Southern Poverty Law Center's latest "hate map" fundraising tool and broke the amazing, astounding, unprecedented news that for the first time in history the number of alleged "hate groups" designated by the SPLC's Public Relations chief, Mark Potok, (something even the FBI cannot do…), actually DECLINED!!

While this inconceivable turn of events left many investigators gasping in amazement, a quick head-count of the SPLC's top executives reveals a caucus as Caucasian as it was the day Morris Dees opened the doors of the company in 1971. There are still some unbroken traditions that one can count on in this mad, mad world.

This seeming incongruity was brought to the attention of Mr. Dees 19 years ago by journalists Dan Morse and Greg Jaffe in their week-long exposé in the SPLC's hometown newspaper, the Montgomery Advertiser, in 1994.

[image]

Click to enlarge

Dan Morse noted in his article, "Equal treatment? No blacks in center's leadership":

> Inside, no blacks have held top management positions in the center's 23-year history, and some former employees say blacks are treated like second-class citizens.

Last week the SPLC released its IRS Form 990 tax return for 2012, listing the names and compensation packages for its top executives (see pages 7-8). And the winners are:

Richard Cohen — President/CEO — $340,923

Morris Dees — Founder and Chief Trial Counsel — $344,771
Joseph Levin — Director and General Counsel — $185,102
Mary Bauer — Legal Director — $168,819
Teenie Hutchinson — Secretary — $162,644
Wendy Via — Development Director — $166,760 (+$19,582)
Mark Potok — Senior Fellow — $162,206 (+$10,814)
David Utter — Director — Miami – $158,013
And a new (white) face for 2013:
Sheila Bedi — Deputy Legal Director – $129,893

Not shown is Michael Toohey, the SPLC's Former COO, $234,309 (+$4,428). If anyone knows of a public photo of Mr. Toohey, please pass the info along to Watching the Watchdogs.
[image]
Click to enlarge

Conspicuously absent from the latest monochromatic rogue's gallery, yet again… is Dr. Heidi Beirich, the SPLC's new "Intelligence Director." Dr. Beirich replaces "Senior Fellow" Mark Potok as the chief fundraiser and go-to media "expert." Beirich and Potok both started working at the SPLC in 1999, both are public relations pros, though Dr. Beirich boasts two Masters degrees and a Doctorate to Mr. Potok's B.S. in Poli-Sci, yet Dr. B has yet to be paid as much as her male counterpart.
[image]
Click to enlarge

Also missing from the list is Lecia Brooks, the SPLC's Outreach Director and highest paid minority, though not as highly paid as her white colleagues. In fact, when the Form 990 included salaries as paltry as $70,000, (they are a "non-profit" after all), our Ms. Brooks was nowhere to be found. As Outreach Director, Lecia Brooks' primary concern is fundraising and she has no influence over the running of the company. Hopefully, she got a 5-digit raise like the SPLC's other prime fundraisers, Mark Potok and Wendy Via. It was a record-breaking year, after all.
[image]
Lecia Brooks does hold one unique distinction, though. She was allowed to serve as "Interim Director" of the SPLC's "Teaching Tolerance" program for several months. As Dan Morse noted in his 1994 "Equal Treatment" article:

> The Law Center's ambitious new project, Teaching Tolerance, which is designed to promote racial and cultural justice throughout America's schools, is produced by an eight-member all-white staff according to the Law Center.

"Teaching Tolerance" continued to be led by "whites only" until 2009, when Ms. Brooks was tapped to keep the seat warm during the interregnum until her successor could be selected, the highly diverse Maureen Costello:

[image]
No report on the all-white nature of the SPLC's leadership would be complete without mentioning the company's first president, Julian Bond, and its diverse Board of Directors. As Dan Morse pointed out in his 1994 article, "Friendly board: friends, associates fill board," the SPLC's board consists of friends and cronies of Morris Dees who rubber-stamp whatever is put before them by Dees. Some of the board members Morse mentioned in 1994 are still on the board today, as is at least one lingerie mogul. All of the board members are unpaid, which is not unusual in the so-called "non-profit" sector, and almost all of them are located hundreds or thousands of miles from Montgomery. In short, they may be diverse on paper, but they are not highly paid and they have no influence on the day-to-day operations of the SPLC. It's a classic case of "brownwashing" to dupe the donors.
[image]
And as we've mentioned numerous times, Morris Dees wrote in his autobiography, A Season For Justice, that he only offered Julian Bond the "largely honorary position of president" in exchange for the use of Bond's name on the SPLC's first fundraising letters. Last year, Watching the Watchdogs produced short video for Youtube that describes the history of the all-white leadership of the SPLC, Teaching Tolerance, the Bond paid endorsement and the rubber-stamp Board of Directors.

The only thing more difficult to believe than the fact that an alleged "civil rights" group headquartered in Montgomery, Alabama, sitting literally in the back yard of Dr. Martin Luther King's own Dexter Avenue Baptist Church, could remain lily-white at the top for more than 40 years is the incredible fact that well-meaning people sent the SPLC more than $40 million donor dollars last year.
What could that money have done for real charities closer to home?
This article originally appeared in Watching the Watchdogs, and is reposted here with permissions.

AVFMR: Voice of Europe-The Spanish Model

March 22, 2013 | by James Huff | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]
On March 22 2013, Lucian Vâlsan, our European News Director and Huffnagel Pista, alongside with James Huff, the Director of AVFM Radio and producer invite you to join them on the second edition of The Voice of Europe – a radio show sponsored by AVfM, addressing the issues of men and boys at a European level.
This show will mainly be about the situation in Spain. As Lucian Vâlsan reported, the feminist establishment in this country is shaking badly and we might assist, within a foreseeable future, to a complete nation-wide rejection of feminist totalitarianism and a rise of Spain as the first country to become feminist-free after being taken over by ideologues during the dark days of the Zapatero government.
We will also have reports from Iceland, a tiny country that is also quite likely to overthrow feminist governance within a few weeks.
Call in and Skype in and engage in discussions with us on how can the Spanish model of kicking the feminists out can be exported to other countries or areas.
Call in number: (001) 310 388 9709
The show will commence at 7 PM GMT (London, Reykjavik and Lisbon time).
That is 8 PM CET (Madrid, Paris, Brussels, Rome, Oslo, Stockholm, Copenhagen, Budapest, Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw, Amsterdam, Bern, Bratislava, Prague, Belgrade, Tirana, Ljubljana, Zagreb, Sarajevo and Skopje time)
That is 9 PM EET (Helsinki, Tallinn, Riga, Vilnius, Kiev, Chisinau, Bucharest, Sofia, Athens, Ankara and Nicosia time)
That is 10 PM FEET (Minsk time)
And, finally, 11 PM Moscow time.
And for the listeners from North America this means 3 PM EST, 2 PM CST, 1 PM MST and 12 PM PST (times adjusted in accordance with DST, which commences earlier in North America).
SHOW PAGE
[/box]

F.E.M.M. Feminists Emasculating Men and Masculinity

March 22, 2013 | by Dan Perrins | Link | Original Link

F.E.M.M., according to their website, is a University of Toronto group with the defining acronym "feminists engagement with men and masculinities.'
I call bullshit.
I call Bullshit, in stop sign red, do not pass go, do not collect $200.00, ten foot tall letters.
An acronym more suited to this organization is;
Feminists Emasculating Men and Masculinity
F.E.M.M. is Full of Fetid Feminist Fecal Philosophy, which in layman's-doesn't-know-or-care-about-intersectionality-or-other-bullshit-terms translates to extremely unhealthy for men and boys.
We already met F.E.M.M. once before, at the lecture by Dr. Janice Fiamengo at the University of Toronto. We've heard them try, and then finally admit they don't know about the rates of male abuse in Canada. Hell, I'm a men's human rights activist and I know the rate for both sexes for the last general social survey. Their response was pitiful to say the least. It was like watching a herd of deer in the headlights.
They froze. In fact, the male representative I questioned really had no answer at all. He wasn't even aware of any statistics on the matter. At least a female member agreed domestically abused men should be helped.
I will say they were polite, a little ignorant, well, extremely ignorant, but cordial enough.
You may want to stop drinking liquids for this one, I take no responsibility for any or all damage to your computer or phone due to uncontrollable outbursts of 'WTF' and ' You gotta be shitting me' Those were my two most common reactions I felt when reading up on these 'champions' of men.
A Voice for Men S.O.P. on this one; pack your shovel, hip-waders, haz-mat suit, and be prepared to drop some I.Q. points with an examination of F.E.M.M..
To begin with lets have a intelligence plummeting look at their executive team. Merciful heavens forgive me for what I am about to show you,but please don't say you weren't warned. This shit can't be un-seen.
First up on our smorgasbord of gender studies soup head sandwiches is Spencer Sawyer, who has the title of Executive Coordinator.
His bio;

> "Spencer is a 4th year Women and Gender Studies and Sexual Diversity Studies double major studying at University of Toronto St. George. He is focusing his academic research on feminist critical masculinity theory with hopes of developing meaningful strategies to engage men with concepts of gender and identity.
> He will be taking a fifth year in his undergrad, and hopes to attend the > Social Work program here at Uof T upon graduating. His interests include mindless television consumption, calling out bigots on online games, and napping with his boyfriends cat."

I know, I could have issued a trigger warning for uselessness, but you would have kept reading anyway.
If I've surprised any readers with the fact that Spencer is a Women's and Gender Studies / Sexual Diversity Studies double major I must have sent this article to the wrong website, and it has ended up on my other favorite site.
(Damn you cuteandtastykittens.com, you know we MHRA's can't eat just one)
Anyway, with a focus 'critical masculinity theory' you just know the answers Spencer will be able to provide for men and boys will be long winded but lacking substance. Think along the lines of a politician's promises, only less honest. I will say his claim about calling out bigots in online gaming communities is interesting. I wonder if he's ever called out Anita Sarkesian.
Feminist critical masculinity has been so positive for men, Spencer.
At least those who work in the mortuary. Those guys are busy, what with Canadian men committing suicide at three times the rate of women, and comprising 71% of all homicides. I only mention this out of courtesy because we have already established, as we did with domestic violence, that Women's Gender Masculinities Sexual Diversity Intersectionality students apparently don't come by a lot of that information.
Next up for team feminists fancystudies is:
Justin Gordon-Deacon, Communications Coordinator

> Justin (M4M) is a 100th year student in Ethics, Society & Law and Sexual Diversity Studies. Justin first hopped on the intersectionality surfboard in 2008 and rode the Third Wave all the way to the present. After finishing his undergrad, Justin hopes to become a high school teacher and push his queer feminist agenda on our nation's youth. In his spare time, Justin enjoys watching TV on the internet, joking about dying alone and leaving everything to his cats, and boring his family with his political views.

Forgive me for pointing out the obvious here but some how I am left with the feeling that Justin hasn't a clue what ethics are, but I do believe he bores his family. I could be wrong but that part where he lets us know his plan after finishing his undergrad, I believe that to be unethical. And kinda weird, too. How many college students actually plan to politicize the sexuality of children after they are out of school? How many schools want those kinds of teachers?
I think Justin's master plan is worth a few screen shots.
But just a suggestion, Justin, should there be any grey matter remaining in your cranium that can still process a reasonable thought. Do Canada's youth a favour. Stick to watching T.V., boring your parents and your cats. Let our youth decide who they want to be for themselves.

Whew, boy.
Now we move onto Emily Milton the Artistic Resources Coordinator.
Any gamblers out there want to place a bet what she is studying?

> Emily is a fourth year WGS and SDS major, and has had a complicated (haha) love for feminism since she was 13 or 14. She hopes to pursue a career in social work and continue to apply all the beautiful ideas about gender, femininity, masculinity, sex-positivity, trans identity, and anti-racism she's taken from her undergraduate degree and use them in tangible ways for the rest of her life.

Tangible.
I know all of you were amazed at the fact that Emily is as well a Women's/Gender Studies and Sexual Diversity Studies student.
I believe Emily's bio warrants an open question.
So tell me Emily what is it that feminism says about masculinity that is beautiful? I would love an answer. And so would the rest of the world.
Don't be shy Emily, enlighten us with how feminism has given men their solipsistic seal of approval.
Wait (as if you weren't), let me answer that for you.
[unordered_list style="star"]

- Men are beautiful when they hold up little cards that say "I need feminism because…" and then fill in the blank with whatever you suggest;
- Men are beautiful when they go to slutwalks but don't look at your tits unless they're hot;
- Men are beautiful when they tell you how equal you are but still pay for your shit;
- Men are beautiful if they are standing there blocking doors to keep other men from attended a lecture you don't like.

[/unordered_list]
Isn't that what feminism, and you finds beautiful about males and masculinity?
Lastly we have Jen Roberton the Alternative Programming Coordinator

> "Jen Roberton is a fourth year undergraduate student studying Sexual Diversity Studies and Comparative Literature at the University of Toronto. Her capstone undergraduate thesis is about the intersections of queer homeless youth and labour issues. When she is not busy with school or working as a bike mechanic, Jen enjoys smashing the system, cheap beer and cats."

First, sorry, but I have to do this.

What is with all the fucking cats?!

Thank you, better now.
At first glance it appears that Jen and Spencer could be in the same class together.
On closer inspection, they ALL are!
That class they are in together is the class of society that continually and willfully assumes that feminism and feminists know about men and boys.
How do I know ALL of F.E.M.M.'s executive are actively studying in that class?
F.E.M.M.'s great feminist educated minds apparently got together and drew up a mission statement, I'm only going to subject you to two sections of it. Its all that is required to prove the point.
Purpose/Mission/Objectives

> 1.0 To approach masculinity while working through a feminist framework, with the objectives of:
>
> […]
> c. Refusing to legitimize concepts involving "masculinism", women's "misandry", etc. but instead critically unpack them to understand the pressures of masculinity as a social, historical, and political phenomena constructed by men, not a targeted attempt from women or the feminist movement.
>
> d. Providing a space for conversation with room to make mistakes while respecting the comfort and safety of the membership

There you have F.E.M.M. in a nutshell. Their refusal to recognize the natural, healthy state of masculinity and all the positive things that go along with it, as well as the refusal to recognize misandry is the same old feminist bullshit repackaged with a newer best before date stuck on it.
A parting thought about part 'd.' They're going to need a lot of room for mistakes with their current feminist dogma, especially given that my first, cursory examination of them revealed they didn't know much of anything about the lives of men. FEMM has already made Grand Canyon sized mistakes by failing to hold feminist theory, or themselves, up to critical thought and scrutiny.
But hey, there is always the cats. They just love cats.

DongleGate II JudgyBitch judges judge-mental bitch

March 22, 2013 | by Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) | Link | Original Link

---

Delicate flower has her sensibilities offended. Gets her ass handed to her.

Adria Richards got her panties bunched up nice and tight when she overheard a couple of guys making a dongle joke while attending a PyCon conference as a PR rep for her company, SendGrid.

What the hell is a dongle?

don·gle

/ˈdäNGgəl/

noun

A device that is connected to a computer to allow access to wireless broadband or use of protected software.

Say it a few times. Dongle, dongle, dongle. Sounds like dong, like schlong, like a dick joke waiting to happen. It would have taken me about two seconds to start talking about big dongles and little dongles and whether the size of the dongle matters, but I'm crass like that.

Not Adria Richards. Why, she overheard a dongle joke and the petals of her exquisite flower simply crumpled in dismay and outrage and a deep sense of having being personally violated. So she turned around in her seat and snapped a shot of the dongle-jokers and then tweeted it with a request to the conference organizers to remove the offending cretins from her sight.

Some reports say that the troglodyte dick-jokers WERE removed from the conference, and some say no, but what IS clear is that one of the punsters was FIRED FROM HIS JOB because his little dick joke offended fragile little Adria.

http://arstechnica.com/tech-policy/2013/03/how-dongle-jokes-got-two-people-fired-and-led-to-ddos-attacks/

Over-reaction, much?

Some people at paste-bin thought so, and decided that the only reasonable course of action was to have Adria fired, too. A group of clearly talented hackers went in and crashed SendGrid, where Adria works and within hours the management team at SendGrid acted in the company's best interest and fired Adria.

http://topsy.com/pastebin.com/JaNh0w5F

The whole sorry episode is now being cast as some kind of witch-hunt against Adria for speaking out against sexism in the tech world. That is the part of this story I would like to address.

Naturally, Jezebel has picked up the story, and spins it hard to cast Adria as a brave heroine defending herself against the mean, scary men who are creating a hostile work environment for her with their offensive dick-jokes and general misogyny.
http://jezebel.com/5991792/woman-in-tech-tweets-about-sexist-dudes-in-tech-dude-get-fired-internet-meltdown-ensues
Without the slightest hint of irony, Lindy West writes:

> Regardless of what you think of the joke itself, it is sexist to contribute (willfully or cluelessly! Ignorance is not an excuse!) to a hostile work environment for women. Full stop. If you didn't realize you were doing it, that means you haven't bothered to think critically about women's comfort and needs.

No seriously. Attention all men everywhere, but especially you men working in tech fields: you need to stop thinking about the subject at hand (dongle dongle dongle schlongle dongle), stop considering your own needs and comfort and start thinking about women's comfort and needs.
Because we all know women get to define what constitutes an appropriate work environment, what behavior and language is considered polite and acceptable and if a lady is offended then the entire world must screech to a halt to address that tragedy.

Because equality.
Yeah, there's nothing sexist AT ALL about claiming that women have the right to go through life without being offended by anything ever, and it's certainly not the woman's job to get over her shit. No way! If I am offended, it can't be because I'm an emotional cripple incapable of dealing with the occasional dick-joke (that wasn't even aimed my way)! Nope. It's because men suck and I demand that you all stop sucking right now! This would be an excellent moment to insert a dick-joke, but I might faint when my lady brain comprehends the full extent of what I just wrote.

Now, let's be clear: the reaction to Adria's little tantrum over some guy making a dongle-joke was completely over the top.
http://www.dailydot.com/society/pycon-dongle-joke-misogyny-sexism-adria-richards/
Threatening to rape or murder someone, or suggesting they go kill themselves is some pretty awful stuff, but there is nothing inherently sexist about any of that. That's pretty equal opportunity awfulness. Adria wasn't targeted BECAUSE she's a woman. She was targeted because she had a hissy fit that resulted in someone losing their job! Over a dick-joke! And it turns out that Adria makes dick jokes herself, and that little bit of hypocrisy sent her critics over the edge.

What IS sexist is Adria deciding that the simple fact of owning a vagina gives her the right to decide what is and is not funny in any given situation. Waltzing through life believing you are owed special consideration because you are a WOMAN and you deserve to never be offended is sexist. Why should anyone believe they have the right to never be offended?
The man who made the dongle joke actually apologized for his "insensitivity", which is kind of a shame. He should have told her to go dongle herself. Adria over-reacted to a conversation that she wasn't even part of that resulted in a man being fired, and then boo-hoo'd her way across the internet when the same thing was done to her.

> My friends and I had decided forking someone's repo is a new form of flattery (the highest form being implementation) and we were excited > about one of the presenters projects; a friend said "I would fork that guys repo" The sexual context was applied by Adria, and not us.

>
> My second comment is this, Adria has an audience and is a successful person of the media. Just check out her web page linked in her twitter account, her hard work and social activism speaks for itself. With that great power and reach comes responsibility. As a result of the picture she took I was let go from my job today. Which sucks because I have 3 kids and I really liked that job.
>
> She gave me no warning, she smiled while she snapped the pic and sealed my fate. Let this serve as a message to everyone, our actions and words, big or small, can have a serious impact.

Turnabout is fair play, cupcake.
Whether or not the tech field is hostile to women is not the point, although if the few women who are in the field act like Adria, it's little wonder they meet with hostility. The real issue here is women feeling like they have the right to define social interactions with only their own comfort and needs in mind. On the one hand, women demand to be treated as equals, and then on the other hand, they want special consideration for their overwrought sensitivity to things like dick-jokes.
Deciding that you can police the conversations of others, and attempting to enforce your own aesthetic sense of what constitutes appropriate behavior for no reason other than you are a woman and you feel offended? Now that is sexist.
Looks like the tech world took a few steps to address sexism: Adria Richards is out of a job. I'd say she dongled herself quite nicely.
Lots of love,
JB

Ex NFL cheerleader blames alcohol for assault of minor

March 23, 2013 | by Jim Muldoon | Link | Original Link

Ex-NFL cheerleader, Elizabeth "Leigh" Garner, is being accused of "sexually assaulting" a 12-year-old boy after she took him into a bathroom during a party and fondled him. Garner, who is from Nashville, Tenn. is a former cheerleader for the Tennessee Titans and cheered for them until 2008. Now the only cheering she will be doing is the "I am an innocent woman cheer" in front of a judge, as she has been charged with sexual battery and solicitation of a minor for child rape.
Another sad twist to this story is that 42 year old Garner is currently married, and her husband is standing by her and defending her actions by saying

> "she thought the boy was a man."

He is not only condoning what she did, but accepting it and supporting a sexual predator. In fact, he is what feminists would call a rape apologist. I call him a spineless white knight as he obviously has no self respect.
The boy Garner sexually assaulted was the son of the host who had been throwing the party of which Garner was a guest.
The minor child told police that "Garner asked him if he had ever been with a woman before, and then she tried to pull down his pants."
He was able to escape the bathroom and went immediately to his mother to tell her what happened. The mother called police upon hearing of the assault.
Garner told detectives that it was all a "misunderstanding" and that she was "drunk and was confused about the boy's age."
She has currently been released from jail on $30,000 bond and faces more than eight years in prison if convicted, as it is a class B felony. This means that she faces a possibility of more than 8 years in prison for her crime, but there are several factors that lead me to believe that she will get the pussy pass for it.
A class B felony in Tennessee carries a sentence of 7.2 to 12 years in jail, depending if there are mitigating circumstances or not. In this case there will most likely be mitigating circumstances.
"When a judge is presented with a sentencing range to choose from, she/he will consider the pre-sentence investigation as well as any mitigating circumstances surrounding the offense. Mitigating circumstances may lessen the sentence and may include the fact that the offense was unintentional."
As Garner claims she was under the influence of alcohol and "thought the boy was a man", there will most likely be mitigating circumstances to be considered by the judge. This reduces her maximum potential sentencing to 7.2 years, with a Release Eligibility Date (RED) of 2.7 years.
So in reality Garner, crying that it was not her fault because alcohol took over her ability to think clearly, will in all likelihood only serve 2.7 years, unless she manages to really turn on the waterworks and get even less time, or perhaps, none at all even though she trapped and began sexually assaulting a 12 year old boy in a bathroom against his will. Feminists love to regurgitate the old line that being drunk is not an excuse when it comes to sexual assault or rape, but of course this line only applies if it is a man that is inebriated and doesn't take no as an answer. Women who drink to excess are always touted as being victims of the alcohol they freely ingested and never held responsible for their actions, even if those actions involve sexually assaulting a minor who said no.

When you ingest alcohol and then say you can't tell the difference between a 12-year-old and an adult, perhaps you should not be anywhere near any alcohol, since you are about as responsible as a child yourself. And this is the crux of the issue.
Women are allowed to get away with all kinds of bullshit because society treats women like children.
Look at how her husband defends her actions and is prepared to stand by her even though her actions were completely unacceptable. If she is telling the truth, then she knowingly attempted to cheat on her husband with another man. If she is lying she knowingly attempted to sexually assault a minor. How is either scenario acceptable to him? If the genders were reversed would she stand by him? I highly doubt it.
Men are held accountable for their actions and vilified at any opportunity. Women are coddled and given a pass based on nothing more than the fact that they are women. When will society wake up and hold all adults responsible for their actions regardless of their gender? If we can try a minor as an adult for certain crimes we admit that people are capable of being held accountable for their actions regardless of who had committed that crime.
It's time to hold women like Garner responsible for their actions and stop issuing pussy passes to these criminals. The truth is, women do horrible things, not because they are incapable of knowing right from wrong, but because they know that their nasty actions will be excused because of a few well timed tears. It's a lesson taught to girls at an early age that they are exempt from harsh punishment because they are girls, and girls need to be treated with kid gloves because they are delicate little flowers. Girls know they can get away with a lot of shit by whipping up some crocodile tears, and it's time to change that.
It's time to hold girls and women accountable for their actions. Their tears be damned.

More unwed moms; unattractive men to blame

March 23, 2013 | by Mark Trueblood | Link | Original Link

Recently, the New York Times published an article on the rise of single motherhood and its correlation to the declining economic health of men. This is well-trod territory and very familiar to AVfM readers. What I'd like to highlight is the hamster-on-meth effort to portray men as subhuman utilities and trumpet female hypoagency.

> Men who are less successful are less attractive as partners, so some women are choosing to raise children by themselves, in turn often producing sons who are less successful and attractive as partners…The fall of men in the workplace is widely regarded by economists as one of the nation's most important and puzzling trends.

Could this be happening because society is deliberately holding back men and boys? (Book #1 / Book #2)

> For all Americans, it has become much harder to make a living without a college degree…Women have responded exactly as economists would have predicted, by going to college in record numbers. Men, mysteriously, have not.

Mysteriously!

> Most economists agree that men have suffered disproportionately from economic changes like the decline of manufacturing.

And the war declared on us by vicious ideologues and opportunistic asshats.

> Professor Autor's own explanation… The children of lower-income parents are ever more likely to become, in turn, the parents of lower-income children. Moreover, a growing share of lower-income children are raised by their mother but not their father, and research shows that those children are at a particular disadvantage.

Fair enough. This is a plausible theory.

> Professor Autor said in an interview that he was intrigued by evidence suggesting the consequences were larger for boys than girls,

Tragically true. So what do we do about it?

> Conservatives have long argued that society should encourage stable parental relationships…promoting marriage is the best way "to make family life more stable for children whose parents don't enjoy the > benefit of a college education.

Savvy readers know that a few exceptions aside, conservatives have happily joined liberals in making a grotesque hash out of marriage and parenthood. So maybe they should work on fixing that first, before they promote marriage. But I digress.

> Liberals have tended to argue that the government should focus instead on improving economic opportunities. Jonathan Cowan, the president of Third Way…"If Democrats have as their goal being the party of the middle class, we need to ask, 'How can we get these fathers back involved in their children's lives?"

Oh goody! The Democrat Party, the financial and bureaucratic backbone of gender supremacy, is going to get fathers involved! This is going to be so great!

> But some experts cautioned that Professor Autor's theory did not necessarily imply that such children would benefit from the presence of their fathers.

This is misandry and bigotry against the poor. Another shining example of the tolerance of progressives.

> "Single-parent families tend to emerge in places where the men already are a mess," said Christopher Jencks, a professor of social policy at Harvard University. "You have to ask yourself, 'Suppose the available men were getting married to the available women? Would that be an improvement?'"

They're a mess! Surely, not worthy of the same parental rights of their female counterparts. And note the female hypoagency. She didn't choose to bring a child to term in less-than-ideal conditions. She's blameless; it's the men who are the mess!

> Instead of making marriage more attractive, he said, it might be better for society to help make men more attractive.

With society's help, I'm sure a few of us will make great breeding stock. The majority of us will plough the fields, and those who can't, will still be useful in the glue factory.
Guys, I know you're really busy teleporting random sperm into the unsuspecting uteruses of unwed women. But please take a moment to note the disregard of male value except in service of the female. We're not worthy of economic opportunity because we're human beings potentially capable of great things. It's only so we can man up and marry women. And if we're not an attractive provider, then we don't even deserve the right to play a role in the lives of our children.
Ladies, I'm sure you recognize this article doesn't do you any favors either. You are being portrayed as a helpless vessel that has babies "happen" to it. But don't worry, big strong government people will swoop in to coddle you.
Let's treat men and women with respect as human beings. Let's encourage them to be the best they can be, and take personal responsibility for their actions. Let’s value the contributions of fathers and mothers. Let’s restore a healthy male-female dynamic. Because if we don’t, no one will.

An open response to troubled men

March 24, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

I have just received another email from yet another man who is getting screwed over by a dishonest, manipulative ex-wife using a horrifically corrupt Western family law system to hurt him; another man getting his name dragged through the mud; another man losing his children, property and income for no valid reason; another man who never dreamed that men could face such injustice until it happened to him, wrecking his life; another man out of the hundreds I have heard from in the blue pill void, reaching out to AVfM after a hard time and a frantic search on the internet using keywords like divorce, child support and "men's rights."

These emails always leave me fumbling for a polite, supportive way to tell them they are fucked and that there is no help. These men write me because they think I am an expert on the system they are up against, and to some degree I suppose I am, so I don't much relish writing them back with the news that there are no answers that don't involve knee pads, copious amounts of Vaseline and platitudes like "survive to fight another day."

I think perhaps, I have been struggling with the wrong issues when replying to these men. Perhaps there is something else I should be saying; some other words of wisdom that I could try to impart to help them address the very real problems they face directly at the source. How about I just say what really needs to be said?

Like, fuck you.

Like, tough shit.

Like, go fucking bother someone else with your problems.

I'm quite serious.

It is not that I wish any ill will on these men. I most certainly do not. Indeed, these men are a huge part of the reason that I spend 12+ hours a day, seven days a week doing this work. I wish them no harm at all, and I think I am at least as aware of their struggles as anyone else – even more than most.

I am also aware that many of the men who support this movement got here from similar circumstances. Our comments are crowded with men who have had it all taken from them, and who were then beat mercilessly for not being able to bleed any more after being bled out.

We have thousands of readers come here every day, most of them men. It is easy enough to infer that most of them have either been directly affected by these problems or know other men who have.

How many men any more can say they don't know anything is wrong in the system? But how many men still stuff their fat fucking faces with cheese covered wacky fries and cruise sports channels on the big screen every day without lifting a finger? How many of these men at one point or another in their lives have stared into the utter destruction of a friend's, or even a brother's life, as it was happening, then looked at their watches and made noise about what time the game was coming on?

I will tell you how many — a fuck-ton of them; enough of them that at some point or another some of those indifferent, selfish assholes end up in my inbox pleading for guidance, legal help and financial assistance; looking desperately for someone or something to save them.

It is enough to make me want to hit “delete” and turn on a fucking ball game.
Here is the deal, and with this I give you the no holds barred truth about me and where I am today after years of bloodying my forehead on a brick wall.
I’m tired.
I am not wearing down or ready to quit, but I am honestly, genuinely tired. I am tired of seeing a handful of men and women fight for a cause that should include millions. I am tired of seeing a comparative handful of men and women cough up the lion’s share of financial assistance when most, even some who come here every day to read and cheer on FTSU, won’t cough up five fucking dollars to help us out; who are just fine as long as none of the burden, even a trivial part of it, is on them.
We will keep doing this no matter what. I can tell you personally that I will keep fighting this shit till my dying breath, and I know that many of the good men and women working with me feel the same way. Personally, I have no other clue what to do with myself. But the longer I am at this, the less patience I have with dead weight, those who think AVFM is a fucking source of entertainment, or a life preserver for when the tables finally, inevitably turn against them.
In a way, I feel even worse now for most of the men who will make contact with AVfM looking for that lifeline. Unless their story is one that has the potential for me to exploit and gain media attention to THE CAUSE, then all I will have for them is a link to this article.
Well, and perhaps this piece of advice.
If the system has ruined your life, join the club. You are now in the ranks of men you have ignored your whole life. My advice to you is simple. Take your fucking quietly and with grace. Expect the same compassion you have always extended to those men who wore the shoes you are now wearing.
If you want things to change, then stock up on Ramen, get cozy in your studio apartment and join us in the fight to fix this shit. Don’t ask us to help you, but rather give your life the only meaning it may have left, as someone ready and willing to turn your meager existence into helping others who have been similarly screwed over.
You want help? At least prove yourself worthy of it. There were millions of men totally fucked over before you showed up asking for the world to stop around your problems. Face it. You did nothing to help them. You didn’t even care.
Quit asking for things and become part of the solution. You obviously still have internet. Spend the next few days reading through this site. Study the men and women who are actually doing things, and fucking find something to do to help.
Your life as you know it is probably over. Turn that fact into part of the solution, turn it into a way to fight back, or turn your ass somewhere else.

Burn your uniforms, move to Brazil.

March 24, 2013 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

---

The following is a public service announcement, to help feminists. Really.
So, two guys at a tech conference make jokes about a funny-sounding word. Dongle. They also toss in some off colour puns using the technical jargon “fork”. For non-techies, this term refers to the creation of more than one version of the source-code of a software application. These words lend themselves readily to such low comedy, and in the culture of technology geeks, this is perfectly normal, acceptable and expected behavior.
Does this seem childish? Does it seem unprofessional for the practitioners of the serious business of software development to indulge in?
The people who do the truly innovative and world-changing work in any field do so by playing. In the world of software, the basic building blocks are the syntax of any of dozens of languages. Perl, Java, C, and PHP are the name of a few of these languages, all of which are considered “high level” – which means they are closer to english than they are to the elemental ones and zeros processed down at the hardware level of a computer. Software developers are good at what they do because they like to play with language. The imposition of speech codes with a heavy-handed interpretation towards preventing hurt feelings, at a conference designed for coders betrays bureaucratic mind-set fundamentally foreign to, and unfamiliar with the culture.
In fact, the interpretation of the spinning puns from the words “dongle” and “fork” as sexual hostility demonstrates flagrant ignorance and incompetence in such a culture. But it might not have been incompetence, it might have simply been the willful self-selection as victim for malicious purpose by Adria Richards. At the very least, her reaction to photograph the two jokers, to eject them from the conference, and to publicly excoriate them on the asinine basis of a threat narrative makes Richards an emotionally stunted asshole.
Having said that, I don’t think she should have been fired from her own job, just as I don’t think either of the two dongle-jokers should have been fired either.
In a healthy society, she would have not taken offence. Why not? Because while “dongle” and “fork” are both flaccid puns, they just aren’t very offensive. Even positing her immaturity and feminist-acculturated inability to cope with overheard bad puns, neither of the two bad punsters would have been fired in a healthy culture.
So why was one of them fired from his job? Was it because while attending a conference, presumably on the dime of his employer, he created a sexually hostile environment for Adria Richards and other female conference attendees? No, of course not, because he did no such thing. In fact, anyone claiming he did is a cretinous dolt and a liar. Was he fired because he violated the conference rules about sexually charged speech? Even if we believe he violated such a rule, no, that’s not why he was fired. He was fired because his employers fear feminists. I’ll say that again.
He was fired because his employers fear feminists.
In fact, the expedient disposal of a man due to the potential of cultivated and frivolous outrage from the feminist establishment is what has become in the last 30 years, standard operating procedure.

As the story unfolded and it became public knowledge that this man had been fired for the utterance of a totally harmless dongle pun, nobody was surprised, because this casual disposal of a man is normal in our feminized culture. It was just one more point of data on a decades long trend of human damage in appeasement to our culture's prevailing ideology of gender.
A woman claims to feel threatened, and a man is forcibly removed from his home. A female student claims rape and in a collegial court of kangaroos, run by students, a male student's academic career is ended with no inquiry or due process. A man refuses sex and in a fit of pique the rejected woman claims sexual assault, and like lemmings, the nearest compliant males spring into action to deliver violent retribution against the offending male animal. Careers ended, families destroyed, fathers ripped from their children, homes stolen through the fiat of a feminist informed legal system.
This is the story of the casual disposal of men so common it no longer provokes in most a justified outrage. It's business as usual.
Something quite unusual happened in the instance of the dongle-gate story, however. The firing of a man for the Adria Richards frivolous false threat narrative provoked a response. I have purposefully omitted his name from this discussion. But when it became public knowledge that he'd been fired, a backlash followed against the employer of Adria Richards. In response, and out of the same type of craven fear driving the male dongle-joker firing, Adria Richards was dismissed from her job too.
Many within the Men's Human Rights Movement responded with barely repressed glee at the news of Adria Richards firing. Her behavior, that of publicly throwing two men under the bus of the feminist false outrage and threat narrative machine, was douche-baggery of the first order. But it did not merit her firing. Similarly, the man fired for his dongle jokes shouldn't have been fired. As much attention as each of these individuals has received, dongle-gate is not really about Adria Richards or the fired dongle-joker. Dongle-gate is really about business as usual. The casual disposal of men in appeasement of a cultivated threat narrative, and calculated feminist outrage. The backlash against Adria Richards and her employer is also not really about her. It's about business as usual, the casual destruction of men in appeasement of feminism's cultivated narrative.
Even AVfM ran an article responding to the firing of Adria Richards, which concluded with " L. O. Fucking L". This wasn't really about Adria Richards, either. The unjust, cruel, often sadistic and hate-driven casual destruction of men and boys in response to a trivial misstep by a man, or even an imaginary grievance, has been business as usual for decades. Think Clarence Thomas, and the countless others who have been dongled since. Often such destruction is accompanied by public gloating and laughter by gender ideologues.
Our culture's now mainstream ideology of gender has much willful and sadistic human damage to answer for.
And let's not forget, it was not offence at a dongle-pun that got the dongle-punner fired. It was fear of the feminist establishment. The follow-up backlash against the former employers of Adria Richards wasn't really about her at all. It was a tiny venting of our culture's anger, recognizing the decades of human damage dealt in smug satisfaction by the last 2 generations of feminist ideologues and activists.

Some observers of this event have correctly noted that this is one of the first times the feminist fear machine has been spontaneously and loudly opposed. The immediate and real consequence to Adria Richards of her own douchebaggery indicates an awakening of the public to the reality of the malice and stupidity of the now-normal public feminist ethos.
I think this reading is incorrect.
I suspect that no awakening was ever needed. The backlash against Adria Richards and her now former employer is something more elemental than enlightened awareness of feminism's basic malice. Recall, the firing of dongle-joker was not due to his bad behaviour, but due to fear of the feminist establishment.
What we all just witnessed in the backlash against Adria Richards was the loss of patience. The end of forbearance with our culture's gender-religion of false victimhood and hate. I suspect that the vitriol heaped on Adria Richards and her former employer is just a prelude. I believe such events as the backlash against dongle-gate will recur, with an increasing flavor of justified rage at the decades-old practice of business-as-usual. It is driven by the casual destruction of men and boys; the mocking indifference to male suicide, male victimizing violence, and death; and the televised mocking of a man sexually mutilated for stating his desire for divorce.
What may be coming is not an awakening to the reality of feminism's fundamental hatred and violence, but the end of forbearance to what has been known all along. And it is likely to be very ugly indeed.
So, here is my sincere advice to feminists. Burn your uniforms, change your names, and move to Brazil.
Of course, I don't expect this advice to be taken seriously, even as I offer it as sincere advice driven by a real desire to prevent the personal destruction of the lives, families and careers of individuals who have flown the big-F banner with smug glee.
I expect this advice to be ignored at best. I expect it to be mocked. Feminists, I have come to expect, are too stupid to do anything except dial their own rhetoric up. The cultivated false threat narrative used to justify every large scale horror in history will be amplified, and feminists will singularly fail to do the one thing they should. They will not apologize for the continued carnage they cultivate, and they will not abandon the cult of gender ideology and all its hate and violence by proxy. They will likely dial their hate, their cultivated victimhood, and their aggression up to the red line.
And in every social institution that does not collapse under the weight of denied reality and self cannibalizing absurdity, they will be scourged from every social policy and establishment. It's going to be brutal and ugly.
And I'll say : I told you so.

Legitimate rape, advocacy, and censorship

March 24, 2013 | by Chris Deslone (aka @mensrightsrdt) | Link | Original Link

---

I'll begin by stating that my conversation with Katie Hanna started within the context of the Steubenville, Ohio rape case, but it is not limited to the details or genders of that particular rape case. Katie Hanna, statewide director of the Ohio Alliance to End Sexual Violence (OAESV), pointed out that DUI education had been effective with one of the Steubenville kids, but sex & consent education had not:

> Something has gotten in there that said, 'OK, we need to prevent drinking and driving,' " Hanna said. "We need to take it to that level with preventing sexual assault." – Yahoo Sports interview with Dan Wetzel (accessed 3/20/2013)

That hit me as a fundamental insight: Consent Education may not be getting through, but something (intoxication & driving) is getting through. We should understand why there's a difference here in order to close that difference. We should increase and target antirape messaging as we have done for DUI and Distracted Driving messages.

Here's where I'd lose a lot of mainstream readers: We must do it in a gender neutral way. Typhon Blue , Stefan Friedrich and many commenters at their blogs and at Reddit 1,2 have cited the problems with the NISVS definition of rape. We've also noticed the old FBI definition of rape, as well as the new one, and argued that the new one is still insufficient.

These erroneous definitions are used by advocacy organizations to request funding and make personnel decisions, and to justify their existence in the first place. I tried to relate these facts to Ms. Hanna in the first message I sent to her. To their credit, OAESV and National Sexual Violence Resource Center (NSVRC) both hate rape. Unfortunately, they don't seem to think that rape can happen to men – at least not by nonconsensually enveloping the penis with a mouth, vagina, or anus. That does count as sexual assault, but when you hear stats like this:

[image]

they exclude any reference to the many men forced or coerced to penetrate without their own consent.

Using Steubenville as a springboard, I tried to open a dialogue with OAESV. OAESV, NSVRC, and I argued at impasse for a day, and then they censored me. I did include @FBI and @DOJ at points in the exchange, but neither of those agencies responded at all. What follows is the dialogue between myself, OAESV and NSVRC, with an illustrative side conversation from a self-identified rape victim.

[image]
Click to enlarge
I used twitlonger; the link underlined in red works and the text is still available. Noting the NISVS report, and the FBI's rape definition, I argued that the sex and consent education should be done in a gender neutral way, and pointed out that the NISVS and FBI definitions of rape are not gender neutral.

The next morning, it looked like we might find agreement:

[image]
Click to enlarge
GREAT! So how far did this agreement go?

[image]
Click to enlarge
Here we met an impasse: a flat refusal, which I did not overcome.

[image]
Click to enlarge
Apparently, Sexual violence is bad. Rape is bad. But men aren't raped if they aren't penetrated. Coerced or forced envelopment of the penis is not-rape, confirming again the findings of Typhonblue.

[image]
Click to enlarge

[image]
Click to enlarge

@NSVRC piped in: No one deserves to be raped ever.

[image]
Click to enlarge
However, we don't know what "rape" is.

[image]
Click to enlarge
@funnyfaceking called his rape a rape. @NSVRC said again that rape is bad. But they did not call @funnyfaceking's rape a rape.

[image]
Click to enlarge

[image]
Click to enlarge

[image]
Click to enlarge

[image]
Click to enlarge

What they repeatedly avoid saying is that some sexual violence is classified as not-rape because of the gender of the victim. I tried to help them state the message that they send elsewhere, but don't want to admit that they say.

[image]
Click to enlarge

[image]
Click to enlarge

[image]
Click to enlarge

I tried to show why it's problematic for advocacy:

[image]
Click to enlarge

[image]
Click to enlarge

[image]
Click to enlarge

This 30 second vid was from a debate held at University College London on 28th February 2012, featuring a few women interrupting a speaker and asserting that it's impossible for a woman to rape a man – because there's no penetration of the victim.

[image]
Click to enlarge

[image]
Click to enlarge

[image]
Click to enlarge

[image]
Click to enlarge

[image]
Click to enlarge

I referred here to Heather Hayes of Lansford, PA who, having bitten and chased her hopefully-now-ex-boyfriend and twisting his testicles for refusing to have sex with her, was charged with indecent exposure and open lewdness but not with sexual assault.

[image]

Click to enlarge

[image]
Click to enlarge

I left to run errands, and returned to discover that my account had been blocked:

[image]
Click to enlarge

As an aside, I see that this image puts the time at 5:29 and the previous one, containing the same text, puts it at 3:29. I can't explain this except to say that twitter time may be localized in some fashion. (btw, funnyfaceking, as far as I can tell, is not one of the taxpayer funded agencies that censored my account.)

I logged out to see if I could determine what happened and found this:

[image]
Click to enlarge

It is my firm belief that @OhioAllianceESV and @nsvrc "blocked" or "spam blocked" my twitter account, prompting Twitter to take (albeit temporary) adverse action against me. This is oppressive censorship of political speech by organizations that accept tax-deductible contributions. I encourage people to print this article and send it, anonymously if you wish, as a complaint to your congressional representatives and TLAs as you see fit.

Star Crazy: The dark side of Pauley Perrette

March 25, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Actress Pauley Perrette has been embroiled in a decade long, post-divorce court battle with her former husband, Francis "Coyote" Shivers. There are a couple of possible versions of reality regarding this story. Let's examine them, one at a time, starting with how this might be written if Perrette herself were choosing the script:

A starlet in distress, but justice prevails

Pauley Perrette, a talented and popular actress in the very popular television show, CBS's NCIS, has all the standard trappings of show business success; fame, fortune; a bitter and very public divorce, the aftereffects of which have lasted for years.

A quick read through of the numerous Google returns on the story paints a horrific, ugly picture. Perrette's marriage was destroyed by a highly abusive, obsessive ne'er-do-well of a husband, Francis Shivers, a musician who supplemented his income by spinning records in L.A. night clubs. At least that's what he did when he wasn't making his wife's life a living hell. Part of that hell was cutting the letter "C" into Perrette's back while she was tied to a chair, among assorted other abuses.

Shivers' bizarre and controlling behavior literally sent Perrette scrambling out of the couple's marital home with what she could carry in her hands. Unsatisfied with just her departure, Shivers followed that with a campaign of physical and psychological harassment that spanned for years.

Using a savvy manipulation of the family law system to inflict harm on his ex-wife, he was able to stalk and terrorize her while remaining legally protected. His plans failed, though, and resulted in his arrest in 2012 for violating a restraining order. He was convicted of that offense and awaits sentencing on March 27.

Finally, after years of heaping continued abuse, Perrette's nightmare appears to be over. Coyote Shivers will face justice and may have time to think about his misdeeds behind bars.

End story.

Now, that would be very consistent with the picture of her life that Perrette has sold to the media, the courts and the police. A very sad story with a hopeful ending that promises the possibility of long overdue justice.

However, let's try telling the story again, this time using the evidence available which is already a matter of public record. Let's pretend for a moment to care about what is really happening more than we care about the quirky-cute TV star, the darling of everyone's eye, like she is a damsel in distress needing our unquestioning help.

While it might be nice to end the story in a Perrette positive way, as though there were no holes in all her scripted details, as though the elements of her heartrending plot fit together for cause and effect with clarity and credibility, it would not be the truth according to many.

The fantasy begins to unravel

Hollywood is a place that thrives on make-believe. Not so dissimilar are our family courts, which are often tasked with sorting out wildly different accounts of the events that lead to a divorce, and what happens afterward. That is certainly true in the ongoing legal struggles between Perrette and Shivers.

Getting their story right depends on a thorough examination of the evidence and using that examination to make sound judgments. And it appears in this case, the court got it wrong, at least as it applies to convicting Francis Shivers of a crime.

With all the evidence we have been able to gather, we were not able to construct a credible story starring a helpless Pauley Perrette caught in the machinations of an evil ex-husband.

In fact, the evidence we have seen, and bring to you here, paint an entirely different story; one that points to Pauley Perrette being a highly calculated liar and manipulator; one who made a series of false allegations, who charmed her way into public sympathies and police protection, and who routinely perjured herself in family courts in order to obtain restraining orders which she weaponized and used to ruin Francis Shivers' life.

What we found was a wolf in victim's clothing.

What's more, it appears that her plan was scripted, and quite literally.

To begin, the arrest and conviction.

The March 27 sentencing of Francis Shivers is not where this story begins, and clearly won't be where it ends, but it is a pivotal point in beginning to understand the history and possible future of this case.

Shivers was, without a doubt, convicted of violating a temporary restraining order placed on him by a court at the behest of Pauley Perrette. To be more specific, Shivers and his current wife walked into a sushi restaurant they were known to frequent regularly. They left the restaurant before being seated, after Shivers spotted Perrette's boyfriend, Thomas Arklie, at a nearby table.

There are conflicting reports about what followed, which will be the focus of a future article, but Shivers was later arrested for violating the terms of the temporary order. It is for that incident, and that incident alone, that Shivers is now facing sentencing on the March 27.

That is one of the more perplexing elements of this protracted drama. Throughout the entire history of this case, which now spans almost a decade, there has been no other proof demonstrated that Francis Shivers ever did anything more wrong than become angry, perhaps even childish, during the process of a high conflict divorce. Well, that and he walked into the wrong restaurant at the wrong time.

The restraining order that Shivers was convicted of violating was one sought by Perrette after one she had issued on him previously from their divorce had expired. That order had been in place for five years without incident. She had been granted the new order temporarily and was awaiting a court hearing on it at the time of the incident in the sushi restaurant.

The two restraining orders, however, have something else in common.
Both were issued without a shred of evidence that Francis Shivers presented any kind of physical threat to Pauley Perrette.
The first order was issued based on allegations of abuse made by Perrette, after she was served with divorce papers. Shivers filed for a divorce months after discovering that Perrette was having an affair, according to court documents, with a pizza delivery boy.
It is clear that the marriage was rocky and the breakup conflicted, but even the judge presiding over the case, The Hon. Gretchen Taylor, determined that nothing that rose to the level of a physical threat from Francis Shivers ever happened. The original restraining order did not require Shivers to leave the family home, but rather granted him "exclusive use and possession" of it.
To quote Judge Taylor:

> I see no family code section 6321 (A)(2) behavior that says that Mr. Shivers has engaged in an assault, threat of an assault or behavior that rises to the level of such severe emotional harm that he needs to be excluded from his home.[1]

Nonetheless the judge did issue a restraining order, apparently designed to facilitate peace between the mutually combative couple.
Stated Taylor:

> I think there is sufficient, well-founded fear on the part of the respondent. [Perrette] And if I properly had a request from the petitioner [Shivers], I might even find well-founded fear on his part. But I don't.

In other words, Shivers and Perrette fought a lot and were not very nice to each other; the typical American divorce. And let's face it, a restraining order issued with those kind of exceptions from a judge does not exactly convey imminent threat.
Apparently, though, Perrette desired the continued protection of the court (or the potential for abuse a restraining order affords) and filed for an extension of that order in November of 2011. That request was granted temporarily, ex parte, and the estranged couple was due to appear in court for a ruling on making it permanent.
At this point one might assume that it would have been in Francis Shivers' best interest to just sign off willingly on whatever kind of protection order that Perrette wanted. After all, the divorce was final. Property was settled. They had no children. Shivers had even moved on to fall in love again and remarry. All he would have to do is just avoid Pauley Perrette and he could move on without his life being complicated by all the drama.
As it turns out, things were not near that simple. According to records obtained by AVFM, Shivers actually had little chance of finding peace in a new life because it was not Pauley Perrette that needed protection. It was Francis Shivers.
As reported recently here by Suzanne McCarley, a media smear effort by Perrette, involving the cooperation of another ex of Shivers, Bebe Buell, and her "journalist" friend

Roger Friedman, formerly of Fox Entertainment, was conducted as a part of a much larger campaign of lies designed to ruin Shivers in retaliation for their failed marriage.
Buell's public support and alliance with Perrette is more than a little suspect, as Perrette is on record herself with the court, previously accusing Buell of stalking and harassing her and Shivers when they were married, and — you guessed it — seeking a restraining order to get her to stop.[2]
It is clear that after the divorce, Perrette was ironically more than willing to join forces with her former stalker in order to go after the reputation of Shivers (who Perrette contended was actually Buell's victim).
It is a tangled web, indeed, but the idea that Perrette has been lying about Shivers, both to the media and in court, is a matter of unquestionable fact for many who were close to the couple during and after the breakup.
According to a statement by Lisa Lynch, a former friend and roommate of Perrette's, who was close enough to her that they got matching tattoos, Perrette has told numerous lies to the court.

> After reading some of the Declarations filed with this court, I can say confidently that not only does Ms. Perrette make numerous false statements in her Declarations, but that I am certain she has made these false statements knowingly and willfully.[3]

Another friend of the couple, attorney and former private investigator Jason Fishbein, submitted a statement to the court detailing several areas where he believes Perrette offered false testimony. One of his declarations is particularly interesting in light of the other facts of this case.
Said Fishbein:

> Ms. Perrette told me about her fondness for restraining orders, and that it was she who insisted that Mr. Shivers get one against Beverlie "Bebe" Buell. Those were Ms. Perrette's words: that Mr. Shivers was "reluctant" and that eventually she "insisted." I understand that Ms. Perrette has told an opposite version of events to the court and I state firmly that her story now is the exact opposite of what she told me. [4]

Jason Fishbein spoke with AVFM recently, offering us some more perspective on the case, and perhaps of Perrette's affinity for restraining orders.

> I've seen it from the perspective of a private investigator." [the restraining order] but I've never seen last this long and be this effective, and the most insane part is that she wrote all this in her own hand in 2002.

2002? That was two full years before Perrette and Shivers broke up.
The further we dig into and deconstruct this story of a forlorn actress subjected to the abuse and psychological torture of a depraved and bitter ex-husband, we see that that the groundwork for Perrette's current, malicious actions were laid out well in advance of her troubles with Francis Shivers.

It appears that Francis Shivers, while clearly a victim of his own bad judgment, is also caught up in Pauley Perrette's personal psychodrama, one that was perhaps destined to be realized regardless of her life circumstances.
More of this becomes apparent when examining the declarations of Blaire Barnette, who was acquainted with both Perrette and Shivers, and who by coincidence is also the individual who served Perrette with Shivers' divorce petition.

> In November 2004 I visited Francis Shivers at his house on Whitley Terrace. There he told me about the extramarital affair his wife "Pauley" had with a boy she would only describe as the "pizza boy." He said she was terrified of her sex scandal being exposed and made very frightening threats about what she would do if he ever told anybody. He then showed me a script Pauley wrote and explained that Pauley threatened she would do this to him.[5]

The script was entitled "Star Crazy" and a basic outline of the plot almost reads like a plagiarized version of precisely what has happened to Francis Shivers in the aftermath of his divorce from Perrette, with the sole caveat that it was written by Perrette two years before any of this started manifesting in real life.
The storyline of Star Crazy is simple. A young actress, one of "sinister" character who handles rejection with vindictiveness, meets a man, stalks him, then "schmoozes" police, makes herself look great by taking on a charity cause, and lies to get a restraining order on the man when it is actually her that is doing the stalking — then proceeds to ruin the man's life by manipulating public opinion, the courts and police.[6].
It is an eerily close story to what appears to be actually going on in the life of Francis Shivers, who now faces sentencing because he walked into an establishment that Pauley Perrette knew he regularly patronized.
It is unrealistic to rule out the possibility of a setup in that scenario. And given an examination of the testimony of the people involved, and Perrette's own hand scrawled vision of "Star Crazy" it is unrealistic not to think that this is the likeliest explanation.
From Barnette's declaration:

> The female TV star [in the script] goes so far as to scratch the guy's initials into her own car just so she could call the police on him…

In the campaign waged by Perrette, she alleges that Shivers left hundreds of bizarre post-it notes everywhere for her, as a tool to taunt and control her. One of those notes allegedly appeared, like magic, during an interview she did with Roger Friedman, who also happens (quite magically) to be close friends with Perrette's new friend and former stalker, Bebe Buell.
These are two superficially different events with the same possible underlying theme; create evidence and then make sure it gets "discovered."

Let us remember the despite the outrageous claims of abuse, year after year of restraining orders and a coordinated plan of character assassination through the media and the courts, there are only three things ever definitively proven about Francis Shivers. One, he walked into a sushi bar. Two, he has, or at least had, very bad taste in women. And three, he filed for a divorce against Pauley Perrette, a woman with a history of deceitful and retributive actions against those who reject her, after catching her in an affair with the pizza delivery boy.
Also from the declarations of Lisa Lynch:

> I have been present when Ms. Perrette broke up with lovers in her past, and I can say she has a history of vindictive actions toward them, when none was warranted. In particular, I recall her stealing the cat of her ex-boyfriend Daniel Rivas, and then when he wanted to take her to court about this, Ms. Perrette filled out the paperwork for a restraining order in retaliation.

There is also more from Blaire Barnette, who recalls what happened in relation to the day that she served Pauley Perrette with the divorce papers, and Perrette's ensuing allegations:

> I later recall reading court papers where Pauley lied to the court and said I stalked her and assaulted her, and that I punched her in the chest and she suffered a sore chest from the attack. Nothing could be further from the truth. Pauley was served and that is all. It was photographed and witnessed. It was at this point I really saw the "Star Crazy" at work, completely lying to a court, falsely accusing me of assault, just to further her vindictive goals.

So what do we have here when all is said and done?
Pauley Perrette maintained a restraining order on her ex-husband for nearly a decade. She participated in seeking a restraining order against Bebe Buell, before joining forces with Buelle, using a media hack to spread disinformation about Shivers that she could use to justify her restraining order and further discredit Shivers. She makes allegations of assault and abuse against multiple individuals, none of it proven, none of it substantiated. She has been quoted by reputable sources as being obsessed with the use of restraining orders as a weapon, has been accused herself of using them now on multiple occasions, and has written and entertained the idea of pitching a Hollywood script based on a character that is both evil, and stunningly autobiographical.
Seriously, is this "Star Crazy," or is this star crazy?
The truth is that the answer to that one is as unimportant as it is obvious. The real question here, and the real issue, is Francis Shivers.
Regardless of his judgment in women, he does not deserve to be the one facing time in jail. Unfortunately, in a court system hardwired to overreact to women alleging abuse, that is exactly what is happening. Even worse, the truth won't save him, or likely put the heat on Perrette, where it belongs.

Only the public can do that. And right now it appears the public loves celebrity more than it loves justice. Perhaps even more than it loves women.
Pauley Perrette is star crazy like a fox.
[1]Court Transcript 01-31-2005
[2]Declaration of Pauley Perrett 08-19-2001
[3]Declaration Of Lisa Lynch 09-17-2006
[4]Declaration Of Jason Fishbein 02-05-2007
[5]Declaration Of Blair Barnette 02-04-2007
[6]Star Crazy -highlighted

Pauley Perrette, Francis Shivers and yellow media

March 25, 2013 | by Suzanne McCarley | Link | Original Link

I don't pay much attention to celebrity gossip. Indeed, I take a perverse sort of pride in no longer recognizing most of the names on the magazine covers in checkout lines at grocery stores. I rarely even watch TV anymore, having lost all faith in the networks after ABC cancelled The Unusuals (don't get me started.) However there is one show I have watched pretty faithfully until recently – CBS's NCIS.

The plots range from tolerable to good, the chemistry between the characters is compelling, and the characters themselves are delightful. Especially Abby Sciuto, the funky, brilliant Goth Girl in the lab. I know people who call NCIS "The Abby Show." Everybody loves Abby, and Pauley Perrette, the actress who portrays her with such likability, comes off as charming and fun. In public at least.

It appears that Ms. Perrette has a darker side, one that has exposed itself in her failed marriage to musician Francis "Coyote" Shivers, which has become a protracted drama and media event of its own.

On March 24, the New York Post published an article strongly suggesting that Pauley Perrette is not all sweetness and light.

> [Perrette's] ex-husband says he broke up with the 43-year-old "NCIS" star after she slept with the pizza deliveryman, according to a court document.
> Now, he claims, she's living the plot of an unsold film script she wrote and framing him with cops. He faces possible jail time this week for violating a restraining order.

This article, by Isabel Vincent and Melissa Klein, stands in stark contrast to Pauley Perrette's numerous dramatic accusations against her ex-husband. Ms. Perrette publicized those accusations back in September 2006, with the assistance of then Fox News writer Roger Friedman, who also published a follow-up article this past week, on the Showbiz 411 site. He is apparently still sympathetic to Perrette's "plight."

Before I show you Friedman's articles, allow me to provide a glimpse into his ethics. I'm no fan of Fox News, but some days they get it right over there. Back in 2009, Fox fired the gossip columnist, officially citing his review of a pirated copy of "X-Men Origins: Wolverine." There was also talk of homophobia on the part of Fox, and of Friedman's laxity regarding "fact checking."

Roger Friedman was fired from Fox for unethical journalism, and it appears that the absence of fact checking didn't just affect the work for which Fox gave him the boot. His hit piece on Francis Shivers is another example.

So let us take a closer look at the brand of journalism Friedman practices.

Let me start by saying I'm not here to paint Francis "Coyote" Shivers as some kind of saint. He's not a hero. He's not a superstar. He's a second tier musician who has managed to remain in "the business" for many years, which indicates competence and talent. He doesn't just have a documented weakness for predatory, mentally unbalanced women; he marries them. As I said, Shivers is hardly a hero, but to those who know him, Roger Friedman's portrayal of him as a predator is ludicrous at best.

I'll do a bit of "fact checking" for Friedman, since he won't do it for himself; I have some sources. From his Fox News article:

> Abby is known for her high level of intelligence and playful energy, but in real life, the actress who plays her has been going through hell.

Citation, Please? Oh. Here's one from Blair Barnette, who served Pauley Perette divorce papers on behalf of Francis Shivers, and who knew both of them.
She asserted that Perrette was harassing him, by " filing a restraining order against Mr. Shivers, despite her own story that the only time she had seen him in about six months was when she was entering his residence unannounced in the middle of the night." This is from Blair Barnette's Declaration in lieu of live testimony, executed February 4, 2007. * Golly, who is "stalking" whom? This and other court documents would suggest that perhaps Ms. Perrette, who herself has a very high level of intelligence, was not so much "going through hell," as in fact putting Mr. Shivers through hell.
More from Friedman's article:

> Shivers [...] didn't start his reign of terror with Perrette. His second-most recent ex-wife, Bebe Buell, who lives in Maine, has been inundated with a mountain of false police reports, invented complaints and restraining orders for years...

This paragraph is far more telling than Friedman lets on. You see, one of Friedman's primary sources for his story is Shivers' ex-wife Bebe Buell, who is also an "ex" of Steven Tyler and mother of Liv Tyler, as well as a renowned drug addled ~~groupie~~ rock music fan. According to Pauley herself, as stated in court documents, Buell is the one who initiated and pursued much of the court harassment that went on for years.
Oh, and look, Mr. Friedman, I have a source! It is the Declaration of Pauley Perrett 08-19-2001, written and signed by the star herself!
Here are some select quotes for anyone with a short attention span:

> Since Mr. Shivers and I met, we have had to deal with the continued harassment by his ex, Bebe Buell. Over the last three years, she has called repeatedly, followed us or had us followed, called and harassed our friends, has continuously and hatefully slandered us both in phone calls, letters, in public and in the press. She has blatantly lied in her signed statement to the court. We have hard proof of all of this...

And how is this?

> She has Obsessive Compulsive Disorder (OCD) and occasionally takes medication for this. We are constantly afraid of the times when she does not control herself, and we and others become the victims of her > obsessions and her compulsions.

Or this?

> […]because she tracks my whereabouts and has said that she has me followed, and with her history of attacking other women, I do not feel safe going (to New York) and would very much like to, without the threat of her confronting me.

And…

> Ms. Buell states in her book that her obsession with him 'will never, ever be over – never.'"

And yet now, by all appearances Pauley and Bebe are BFFs. Hmmm.
Mr. Friedman continues his masterpiece of sound, ethical journalism with this little gem, a quote from Bebe Buell:
"'Instead he found Pauley,' Buell says, 'His next meal ticket.'"
Really? A thirty-one year old, underemployed actress/waitress (which she was at the time) with a resume full of bit parts and commercials is a "meal ticket?" Mr. Friedman (Remember: professional journalist) did not see fit to verify or even question that statement. Oddly though, in the declaration I quoted above, Pauley Perrette emphasizes her and Shivers' modest financial means, more than once. Perhaps Friedman, the little worm, didn't read it.
It gets better. (Like you didn't know it would.) More from the article:

> According to both women, Shivers stalked them and inflicted upon each of them endless mental distress. They each claim he terrorized them sexually during their respective relationships. When they compared notes, Buell and Perrette found that their situations, in fact, were eerily the same.

Friedman reports this as if he believes it; as though he did not even question how Perrette and Buell went from victim and stalker, respectively, to teammates waging a coordinated attack on Shivers.
There are more people who have reason to question Perrette's credibility. Here are excerpts from the Declaration of Lisa Lynch (September 17, 2006) a friend so close, she and Perrette have matching tattoos:

> After reading some of the Declarations filed with this court, I can say confidently that not only does Ms. Perrette make numerous false statements in her Declarations, but that I am certain she has made these false statements knowingly and willfully.
> […]I have been present when Ms. Perrette has broke up with lovers in > her past, and I can say that she has a history of vindictive behavior towards them…Ms. Perrette filled out the paperwork for a Restraining Order in retaliation.

> […]I lived with Ms. Perrette and Mr. Rivas at the time…There was absolutely NO fear of him on the part of Ms. Perrette, and the Restraining Order paperwork she filled out was for the sole expressed purpose of manipulating the court…
> […]Ms. Perrette also made a point of using the supposed Restraining Order to tarnish the reputation of Mr. Rivas…
> […]I was also around when Ms. Perrette broke up with (another man)…and noticed a similar pattern…I never understood why she felt the need to be so vindictive.
> […]I have read Ms. Perrette's Declarations concerning Restraining Orders against Bebe Buell and I can confidently state that she has misrepresented the situation. It was not Mr. Shivers who was instigating getting Restraining Orders against Ms. Buell, rather it was Ms. Perrette who was eager to file such paperwork. I recall one time when Ms. Buell harassed me at my work, and Ms. Perrette's response was to be excited about the incident because 'now we have something on her.'
> [Perrette's] behavior can be very vindictive, manipulative, victimizing, destructive, untruthful, morally wrong, and in my opinion obsessive.

I suppose that Friedman forgot to interview Lynch for his hit piece on Shivers.
Then there is the Declaration of Jason Fishbein, an attorney and former private investigator, at one time another very close friend of Ms. Perrette, and now, oddly enough, not such a close friend any more. (February 5, 2007.)* Mr. Fishbein stated:

> I have witnessed Ms. Perrette's representation of various facts as she told to me in the past, which do not match the way she has represented those same things to the court during her divorce proceedings.

Now, what was that line from Friedman's article again?
"When they compared notes, Buell and Perrette found that their situations, in fact, were eerily the same."
Imagine that; Pauley Perrette and Bebe Buell do have quite a bit in common, don't they? It appears that they are both highly skilled in the art of lying, using courts and slimy, supplicating little douchebag journalists to wage vendettas.
Friedman goes on at length from there, in a manner that would do William Randolph Hearst proud. He (somehow) dredges up another of Shivers' exes:

> In July, one of Shivers' former girlfriends, Angela Garber, filed a complaint against him in Los Angeles Superior Court for assault, battery, sexual battery and intentional infliction of emotional distress.

Of course she didn't file a complaint until two years after the alleged incidents (odd timing, that) and apparently the police didn't take the case. Friedman doesn't mention that Ms. Garber continued her "relationship" (a fling maybe, then some emails?) with Shivers for months, even though the first "assault," a brutal kidnap and rape no less, occurred within a week of their meeting.
http://www.fearnotlaw.com/articles/article24800.html
Friedman also doesn't mention that Pauley Perrette is rumored to have paid all of Garber's legal expenses, and has hired her as some sort of assistant. Nor does he mention that Garber's allegations against Shivers were part of what Perrette used to obtain a restraining order on him, and that once that restraining order was obtained, Garber dropped her case against Shivers.
Okay, now take a look at this. Here's another of Shiver's former girlfriends, one who didn't jump on Pauley Perrette's bandwagon, and isn't on Pauley Perrette's payroll. This is from the Declaration of Jamie Broyles, October 28, 2009, a former girlfriend of Shivers who Perrette alleged was abused by him.

> […]Francis Shivers, has never been violent with me, nor has he ever threatened violence. I am not afraid of any physical harm from him…I was encouraged by other parties to file my request…I want to make it clear that the reference to his ex-wife Laura "Pauley" Perrette was in no way meant to lend credibility to Ms. Perrette or her claims (redacted) and want NO association with those claims or Ms. Perrette.

Then Friedman shares snippets of his sympathetic conversations with Pauley Perrette, in which she claims Shivers vandalized her home, apparently as a form of harassment. She even "discovers" yet another bit of evidence of his evil machinations, right there during the interview at her home! What an amazing coincidence! So very dramatic and convincing.

> She detailed an unending series of harassments… leaving thousands of notes on small pieces of yellow paper.
> While we were talking, Perrette turned over a standing ashtray, and a yellow missive fell out.
> "I thought I got the last of them," she said, "but they are everywhere."

And of course, according to Perrette, the police have been no help. Friedman wonders why, but there is no indication that he ever asked, you know, the police. He does, however, quote a Celebrity Hollywood Private Investigator, John Nazarian.

> Nazarian says that after dealing with many celebrity stalkers, Shivers — who, we must add, denies it all — may be the worst. Perrette agrees.

Well. Pauley Perrette probably knows a stalker when she sees one.
Oh, and one last little tidbit that Friedman forgot to report on in the midst of his reporting. He took a stab at self disclosure in the interview he did with Perrette:

> Full disclosure: I knew Shivers slightly in the mid-1990s when he was married to Buell and living in New York, although I haven't seen him in at least eight years.

Full disclosure? Hardly. He didn't know Shivers, unless "knowing" him meant that he saw him once. He knew Buell. They are good friends. Buell even mentions him in the same sentence with her mother in the appreciations she wrote for her book.
And that is how he got involved with this story, and why he continues to do her favors by going after Shivers. Friedman does the grunt work for Buell's vendetta, which she now shares with Perrette, and Friedman gets the benefit of an inside track on some of the rock stars from Buell's past, like Steven Tyler:
http://www.ascap.com/eventsawards/events/expo/news/2013/02/aerosmiths-steven-tyler-to-take-part-in-keynote-interview-at-2013-ascap-expo.aspx
http://www.aeroforceone.com/index.cfm/pk/view/cd/NAA/cdid/1617267/pid/302766 http://www.showbiz411.com/2013/02/08/mr-aerosmith-campaign-steven-tyler-will-testify-today
Sorry, Friedman, but full disclosure would have included the admission of what a scumbag you are.
Roger Friedman's articles on Francis Shivers are nothing more than sleazy hit pieces, doubtless born of an avaricious desire to curry favor with celebrities who can bring him a payoff. That would be particularly helpful since he is "no longer with" media giant Fox.
On that note, I will close with a Tweet from Roger Friedman's Showbiz 411 site, dated Sunday, March 24, in response to the New York Post article. You know, the one that cites legal documents:
[image]
https://twitter.com/showbiz411/status/315832210794090498

Funny thing, Mr. Friedman. Francis Shivers was indeed convicted, of walking in to the wrong restaurant at the wrong time. Much more on that will be coming out on this website within a matter of hours.
But if I were a journalist like you, I would not be so high and mighty about missing things. Just saying.

Pauley want a restraining order? Characteristics of false accusers

March 26, 2013 | by Dr. Tara J. Palmatier | Link | Original Link

---

NCIS actress Pauley Perrette alleges that her ex-husband, Francis "Coyote" Shivers, abused her during their 4-year marriage and has conducted a stalking and harassment campaign against her in the 8 years during and since their divorce. Shivers is currently awaiting sentencing due to a dubious protective order violation that seems like a deliberate set-up orchestrated by Perrette and her current boyfriend.

According to various reports, Shivers and Perrette met in 1998, shortly after she was released from a voluntary hospitalization in the Cedars-Sinai psychiatric unit. Sources claim Perrette had a meltdown and voluntarily admitted herself for approximately 3-4 weeks. Unconfirmed reports indicate that she may have been given the diagnoses of bipolar disorder, borderline personality disorder and severe depression during her stay. The couple married two years later in 2000.

While together, Perrette claims that Shivers' first ex-wife, Bebe Buell (more on her shortly), stalked the couple and filed restraining orders against her. Perrette's former roommate and best friend (so close the two women have matching tattoos), Lisa Lynch, states in her court declaration that Perrette was the driving force behind the restraining orders against Buell and that Shivers was "reluctant" to file. Currently, Buell and Perrette seem to have joined forces in harassing and vilifying Shivers.

Shivers filed for divorce from Perrette shortly after discovering she was allegedly having an affair with a "pizza delivery boy" in July 2004. Reports indicate Perrette initially tried to woo him back and was panic stricken at the possibility of her affair being made public. A former mutual friend, Blair Barnette substantiates this claim in her declaration.

Perrette filed her first TRO against Shivers exactly one week after he filed for divorce in December 2004. Her stalking and harassment behaviors seem to have escalated over the last 8 years, particularly once Shivers began dating after their separation, and continues to this day.

Shivers has since remarried and has numerous declarations from close friends and other associates depicting Perrette as the vindictive, obsessive and dishonest party in this scenario. According to these declarations, Perrette allegedly has a history of seeking restraining orders against former exes. Perrette's former BFF and tattoo twin, Lynch, states:

> I have been present when Ms. Perrette broke up with lovers in her past, and I can say she has a history of vindictive actions toward them, when none was warranted. In particular, I recall her stealing the cat of her ex-boyfriend Daniel Rivas, and then when he wanted to take her to court about this, Ms. Perrette filled out the paperwork for a restraining order in retaliation.

The unlikely alliance between Perrette and Buell is strangely suspect and seems to be a case of "the enemy of my enemy is my friend." Even more suspect is the outline for a screenplay titled Star Crazy that Pauley admitted to writing in 2002 at the most recent court hearing. Star Crazy pre-dates Perrette's allegations against Shivers by approximately two years. The outline is essentially a how-to destroy an ex with false allegations DIY and appears to foreshadow what has transpired in the Perrette-Shivers case.
Star Crazy plot points:

1. An actress of "sinister" character meets a man.
2. Sinister actress stalks man.
3. Sinister actress "schmoozes" and manipulates police into believing her tales of abuse.
4. Sinister actress lends her celebrity to a charity to gain good will.
5. Sinister actress tells more lies and falsely obtains a restraining order against the man, when (wink, wink) the actress is in reality the predator and the unwitting man is her prey.
6. Sinister actress destroys the man's life via the police, courts and public opinion and becomes a media darling.

It would seem Star Crazy is an example of life imitating bad art under Perrette's direction. By all accounts, the only thing Shivers appears guilty of is a history of incredibly bad taste in women and consistently poor judgment, neither of which is a crime. The Hon. Judge Gretchen Taylor who presided over the Perrette-Shivers divorce proceedings said as much in 2005.
[image]Speaking of bad taste in women, Mr. Shivers' first marriage was to Beverle "Bebe" Buell. Buell is a former 1970s Playboy Playmate/groupie/rock star communal party favor who became pregnant with daughter, actress Liv Tyler, after a fling with Aerosmith front man, Steven Tyler while in a "non-exclusive" live-in relationship with another 70s rocker, Todd Rundgren.
Buell lied about Liv's paternity for nearly a decade, passing her off as Rundgren's child. She kept it secret until Liv met her biological father when she was 8-years old, noticed the strong physical resemblance and asked her mother if Tyler was her father.
Buell later said she committed paternity fraud to "protect" baby Liv from Steven's drug use, which is a flimsy excuse at best. Most women who commit paternity fraud do so to protect their own selfish interests and not the child's best interests. Lying about a child's paternity is in no one's best interests except the mother's.
Shivers married Buell in 1992 and filed for divorce in 1998 (finalized in 1999). According to Shivers, he divorced Buell because he repeatedly found her aggressively pursuing rock stars against their wishes and alleges that Buell has a long notorious history of stalking rock stars.
Why are Buell's paternity fraud and serial stalker behaviors relevant? They show Buell to be a practiced and opportunistic liar who plays fast and loose with the truth when it serves her agenda. The article written by Roger Friedman (Buell's close friend) dissected here indicates that when Buell heard about the marriage disintegrating in July 2004, she emailed Perrette (in violation of the RO against her) and offered to "help" Perrette in the divorce. Seems like a case of the Borderline leading the Borderline, although, if Shivers' and his advocates' claims about Perrette are true, it's doubtful she needed stalking and restraining order advice from Buell.

Buell is the only ex of Shivers who has corroborated Perrette's accounts – well, Buell and a former girlfriend, Angela Garber, who seems to have corroborated Perrette's claims only while she was employed as Perrette's assistant. Allegedly, the woman withdrew her restraining order petition after she left Perrette's employ.
[image]
Bebe Buell

While reading through the various court documents and accounts, there appears to be a pattern of poor judgment and tactical errors by Shivers. In April 2012, Shivers tweeted that he and his current wife would be having dinner at their favorite restaurant, Shintaro. It seems self-evident that you don't advertise your whereabouts or itinerary on social media accounts if you are actively being stalked by an obsessive, vindictive ex (or stalked by any whackaloon for that matter) – especially if you don't have a restraining order against your stalker. Even if you do have a restraining order, you still shouldn't advertise your whereabouts. It's mystifying that Shivers did not have a reciprocal restraining order. This seems like a real blunder by Shivers and by his legal representatives.
Predictably, when the Shivers arrived at Shintaro, Pauley was already there, waiting, perched and poised to call the cops and TMZ to report Shivers' "violation" of the restraining order. A restraining order that had been in place for 5 years without incident, had recently expired and been reinstated at an ex parte motion filed by Perrette's attorney shortly before the Shintaro incident. The whole debacle seems like an obvious and ham-fisted set-up by Perrette.
Did Perrette make false allegations against Shivers and harass, stalk and set him up? Let's see if the court declarations and other evidence we have about Perrette and the case fit the characteristics of false accusers, false allegations and the falsely accused.

Defining Key Terms

Here are some of the psychological drivers and concepts that underlie the behaviors of false accusers and possibly Perrette's behaviors and claims.
High-Conflict People (HCP): "High Conflict People have high-conflict personalities. Conflict is part of who they are. It's a lifelong pattern of thinking and feeling and acting. Time after time, they argue against feedback, regardless of how helpful or truthful it may be. And time after time, they try to persuade others to agree with their rigid points of view and to help them attack their Targets of Blame. The issues come and go, but their personality traits keep them in conflict. Their problems remain unresolved and the stress on those around them often increases" (Eddy, 2008, p. 16).
HCPs are triggered by 4 fears:

1. The fear of abandonment.
2. The fear of feeling inferior.
3. The fear of loss of resources (e.g., attention, status, money, power, control, career, etc.)
4. The fear of public exposure of their misdeeds.

Trigger any of these fears and the HCP will often go straight for the jugular.
HCPs don't handle rejection, disappointments, criticism or conflict like most people. Specifically, most people don't become vindictive stalkers or snap when they're rejected or things don't go their way.
HCPs often generate conflict because they enjoy it. They seem to derive a buzz from the conflict, drama, chaos and vitriol they generate. Many HCPs are very litigious and enjoy the adversarial nature of the courts where they can play victim and use the law to punish their Target(s) of Blame.
This definition echoes the descriptions of Perrette's personality in the declarations written by her friends and associates, particularly the affidavits of Lisa Lynch, Blair Barnette and Jason Fishbein (links at the bottom of article).
Personality Disorders: Not all HCPs have personality disorders (PD), but many of them do or have enough PD traits to be consistently problematic. Frequently, personality-disordered HCPs fall into the Cluster B or "dramatic" PD continuum.
Cluster B disorders include histrionic personality disorder, borderline personality disorder, narcissistic personality disorder and antisocial personality disorder. At their core, I believe all Cluster B disorders stem from sociopathy (i.e., lack of empathy for others, refusal to hold themselves accountable for their behaviors and exploitation of others). Bleiberg (2001) refers to these characterological disorders as "severe" because they chronically engage in extreme conflict, drama and cause the most problems in society.
Most individuals with PDs are not "crazy" in the sense that they don't know right from wrong and, therefore, are not responsible for their actions. Most PD individuals know right from wrong, they just don't care when abusing others, lying, cheating, etc., gets them what they want. Again, this is fundamentally sociopathic behavior.
It is well known in the mental health community that individuals with these disorders frequently confuse their feelings for facts and are prone to confabulation (i.e., lies told by liars who believe their own lies). This is typically a significant source of conflict for themselves and anyone that gets close to them.
Target of Blame: The Target of Blame is an individual who is targeted or victimized by a HCP as the source of the conflict, when, in reality, it is the HCP who is generating the conflict. "Anyone can become a Target of Blame just by being in a close relationship or being an authority figure in the [HCP's] life" (Eddy, 2008, p. 347).
Negative Advocates: A negative advocate (NA) can be even more impassioned about destroying the HCP's target than the HCP herself. The NA believes the HCP's tale of victimhood and sees himself/herself as the HCP's savior/avenger. NAs are essentially dupes of the HCP, particularly when they engage in violence by proxy be it death threats, harassment via the courts, financial distress and/or real physical violence.

Perrette's current boyfriend seems to have helped her to set-up Shivers at Shintaro and some of her fans have allegedly made death threats against Shivers. AVFM is currently in the process of securing digital copies of these threats.
DARVO (Deny, Attack and Reverse Victim and Offender): Predators, bullies, HCPs and abusive PDs commonly engage in DARVO. Jennifer Freyd, PhD (1997, pp. 23-24) finds that:

> Actual abusers threaten, bully and make a nightmare for anyone who holds them accountable or asks them to change their abusive behavior. This attack, intended to chill and terrify, typically includes threats of lawsuits, overt and covert attacks, on the whistle-blower's credibility and so on.
> The attack will often take the form of focusing on ridiculing the person who attempts to hold the offender accountable. The attack will also likely focus on ad hominem instead of intellectual/evidential issues. Finally, I propose that the offender rapidly creates the impression that the abuser is the wronged one, while the victim or concerned observer is the offender. Figure and ground are completely reversed. The more the offender is held accountable, the more wronged the offender claims to be.

This is similar to what Eddy (2006, p. 29) describes as the persuasive blaming tactics of high-conflict individuals. "Persuasive Blamers persuade others that their internal problems are external, caused by something else or someone else. Once others are persuaded to get the problem backward, the dispute escalates into a long-term, high-conflict situation. One that few people other than persuasive blamers can tolerate." Getting the problem backward is precisely what happens when DARVO occurs.
Figure and ground are completely reversed, which is what appears to be happening in the Perrette-Shivers case. Perrette also seems to have engaged in DARVO after stealing an ex's cat and pre-emptively filing a restraining order when he threatened to report her to the police.
Precipitants of False Allegations
When a man makes the decision to end a relationship with a high-conflict, personality disordered and/or sociopathic woman, there is a strong potential for physical, emotional and/or legal violence by the woman. Stories abound of women killing their ex-partners and their own children during divorce and custody battles and killing ex-boyfriends, for example, the Jodi Arias case. Facebook stalking and other forms of cyber-stalking are considered normal and acceptable behavior in some female circles. However, unlike most male abusers, female abusers have another weapon in their arsenal, which can be just as lethal as any firearm or poison.
[image]That weapon is the false allegation by which the false accuser fabricates an act of violence, manufactures evidence, claims they fear for their safety based solely on their feelings with zero or dubious corroborating evidence, distorts or exaggerates the intensity and nature of mutual arguments or falsely accuses a partner or ex of behaviors of which the accuser is actually guilty (i.e., DARVO) in an effort to cover their tracks, deflect and project their bad behavior onto the person they have harmed.

A false allegation is a form of psychological violence and violence by proxy (i.e., using law enforcement and the court system and/or being ostracized from one's family and social circles) that can destroy careers, reputations, familial relationships and friendships and lead to real physical violence (e.g., police violence, negative advocate violence, prison assaults, character assassination, etc.)
The two most common precipitants to false allegations are:

1. Ending the relationship; and
2. Beginning a romantic relationship with a new partner.

This is true for both men and women in a relationship with an abusive, high-conflict and/or personality-disordered partner. The false allegation/smear campaign is a way to retaliate or punish the target because the ex feels abandoned, rejected and, possibly, inferior to their target's new object of affection.
I have worked with several men whose wives, girlfriends and exes have offered to drop their false allegations and pending court cases if the man in question returns to the relationship. These women did not file protective orders out of fear, but out of their compulsion to continue to control and abuse their target.
Male HCPs also make false allegations and are just as malicious and disturbed as their female counterparts, but there are far more tactical advantages for women who manufacture false allegations in the court system than men. In my experience, male abusers engage in smear campaigns and stalking behaviors typically minus the false criminal allegations, while female abusers oftentimes engage in all three.
If male HCPs were able to manipulate the courts as easily as female HCPs (i.e., credibly play helpless victim to the courts rampant female-bias), it's likely that the number of false allegations and restraining orders filed by HCP males would be nearly equal to that of HCP females. Genuine male victims are unlikely to report abuse to authorities and seek protective measures like restraining orders because they fear being ridiculed, that they won't be believed or, even worse, that they will be wrongly arrested while their female abuser hides her smirk behind a flood of crocodile tears. Male HCPs undoubtedly know this and are unwilling to take the risk of filing false criminal charges. For female HCPs, there is very little downside to making a false allegation of abuse.
Even when female false accusers admit to lying or have their cases dismissed due to lack of evidence or discovery of evidence that disproves their claims, the most they get is a slap on the wrist and maybe some mandatory counseling, but more on this later.
Filing false allegations of domestic violence and sexual assault is an abnormal, maladaptive and costly (i.e., time and money wasted by law enforcement and clogged court systems and costly to the victims of false allegations and their loved ones) response to being dumped or having to share custody, but in CrazyLand, it is frequently a reflexive response. When a HCP or PD feels abandoned, rejected, less than or is worried their bad behaviors will be exposed, their knee jerk response oftentimes is to embark upon a scorched earth trajectory of destruction just like we seem to be witnessing in the Perrette-Shivers case.

Characteristics of False Accusers

[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- False accusers are much more likely to have personality disorders such as histrionic personality disorder, borderline personality disorder, passive-aggressive personality disorder or paranoid personality disorder (Wakefield & Underwager, 1990). HCP traits are often synonymous with PD traits.
- False accusers appear to be highly defensive and rigid, to have poor insight and a tendency to deny personal shortcomings. They tend to be extremely concerned about and sensitive to how others perceive them. Fears of inferiority and exposure.
- False accusers tend to confuse feelings with facts. A woman may "feel" abused or may "feel" the children are being abused, when, objectively speaking, no abuse has actually occurred. Compounding this problem is that courts now allow women to press charges or file for restraining orders based solely upon their feelings, which may or may not have a basis in reality, rather than evidence of wrongdoing by the man (Zepezauer, 1994). This also seems to be occurring in the Perrette-Shivers case. Specifically, the Hon. Judge Gretchen Taylor stated:

[/unordered_list]

"I see no family code section 6321 (A)(2) behavior that says that Mr. Shivers has engaged in an assault, threat of an assault or behavior that rises to the level of such severe emotional harm that he needs to be excluded from his home . . . I think there is sufficient, well-founded fear on the part of the respondent [Perrette]. And if I properly had a request from the petitioner [Shivers], I might even find well-founded fear on his part. But I don't" [have a restraining order request from Shivers – a tactical error on his part].

[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- False accusers are likely to misperceive the behavior of others and to react to stressful situations in maladaptive ways. Depending upon the specific personality disorder, they are characterized by instability of mood, impulsivity, inappropriate emotional overreactions, a need for approval and attention, and difficulties handling anger and conflict (Wakefield & Underwager, 1990).
- False accusers also have an obsessive hatred of and anger toward their ex-partner, so much so that their hatred and anger become a driving force in their lives. Buell admits in her autobiography that her obsession with Shivers "will never, ever be over – never." It now seems that Buell and Perrette have joined forces in a mutual vendetta.

[/unordered_list]

Characteristics of the Falsely Accused

The falsely accused targets of blame tend to be your average nice guys with nurturing and passive personalities. These men are unlikely to be socially aggressive or competitive and tend to lack insight (i.e., don't learn from their mistakes) into their personal relationships.

This may explain why so many of these men have a pattern of relationships with abusive, HCP/PD women. Even when the woman is known to have a history of making false allegations in her previous relationships — like Perrette seems to have — or has made threats during their marriage to call 911 and have him arrested, somehow these men just don't see what most people could see coming from outer space until it's too late (Wakefield & Underwager, 1990).

Because of their sensitive and caring natures, these men may also be more vulnerable to relationships with needy and manipulative women. Many of these men may also have been raised by one or more parents with HCP/PD traits and possibly groomed to tolerate these kinds of abuses. Once in a relationship with a HCP, they may behave somewhat passively as they continue to naively hope that everything will magically work out in the end or that they will finally win "mother's" love or approval. This rarely, if ever happens.

Characteristics of False Allegation Cases

Ross and Blush (1987; 1990) have found certain patterns that characterize false allegation cases. The following patterns are not exhaustive, but rather the most applicable to the Perrette-Shivers case:

[unordered_list style="arrow"]

- The allegations start after separation and legal action commences.
- There's a history of family dysfunction with high-conflict and other hidden underlying issues.
- The female accuser is often a histrionic or borderline personality.
- The female accuser takes an angry, defensive and justifying stance.
- The accused male is generally nurturing, passive and lacks "macho" characteristics.
- The female accuser presents as assertive and organized with a justifiable argument supported by "facts, figures and opinions supporting her evidence" and comes across as outraged and worried about her ex's behavior.
- The female false accuser becomes resistant, hostile and passive-aggressive or overtly aggressive upon cross-examination of her claims, as most HCPs/PDs do, and is likely to try to discredit any evaluator or law enforcement official that questions her assertions and may threaten to sue or file an ethics complaint.
- The false accuser has intense and chaotic interpersonal relationships and is prone to intense valuation and devaluation and will attempt to punish others who they believe have abandoned or hurt them, which also appears to describe the Perrette-

Shivers case.

[/unordered_list]

To the Professional Victim Goes the Spoils

Over the last 25 years, as the domestic violence and divorce industries have grown, a perverse system has developed in response to female initiated false allegations of abuse in which the false accuser is rewarded.

Female false accusers get attention. The person they hate is punished. They receive social approval. We all hate abusers, right? Look at that courageous woman who's fighting for her life! Female false accusers may also receive free legal representation, welfare payments, free counseling and other support services and support from family, friends and neighbors — in other words, even more attention (Wakefield & Underwager, 1990).

[image]

Buell

Perrette sure is getting a lot of press mileage out of this. Had it not been for her allegations against Shivers, she would have remained unknown to most non-NCIS fans. Pauley has also allegedly rallied negative advocates to her cause. In April 2011, Pauley sniffled that she might have to quit the only job that's given her fame because of Shivers' alleged harassment. As previously reported, Shivers alleges he subsequently began receiving death threats from Perrette's fans. AVFM will publish these threats in an upcoming article. Does anyone believe that someone who appears to court the limelight as much as Perrette does would actually walk away from what she seems to crave most – celebrity and attention?

There are very little, if any consequences for women who make false allegations in family and criminal court (Green & Schetky, 1988). Ultimately, the female false accuser has far more to gain than she has to lose. However, I'm hopeful that we'll soon be seeing more stories like that of Daryl Guinyard, the man who sued his ex-wife in civil court for making false sexual abuse allegations and was awarded $852,000 in punitive damages.

The problem of false allegations will continue as long as law enforcement, the courts and society continue to protect enable women like Pauly Perrette from facing the natural consequences of their behavior.

Putting the Pieces Together

Based on what is known about Perrette's alleged psychiatric issues, apparent history of filing baseless restraining orders against exes and what we know about the 4 fears that drive HCPS, a different story from the one Perrette has been spinning comes into focus.

Fears 1 and 2: Abandonment and Inferiority. After Mr. Shivers filed for divorce, Pauley's harassment via law enforcement and the courts began. This seems to be a narcissistic rage reaction, as in, "How dare you leave me? How dare you reject me?"

Fears 3 and 4: Exposure of Misdeeds and Loss of Resources. Barnette states in her affidavit:

> In November 2004 I visited Francis Shivers at his house on Whitley Terrace. There he told me about the extramarital affair his wife "Pauley" had with a boy he would only describe as the "pizza boy." He said she was terrified of her sex scandal being exposed and made very frightening threats about what she would do if he ever told anybody. He then showed me a script Pauley wrote and explained that Pauley threatened she would do this to him.

Based on Barnette's affidavit, it appears Perrette continues to harass Shivers in an effort to cover her tracks regarding her fling with "the pizza boy." As previously, noted, it seems equally likely that Perrette continues her campaign of hate against Shivers due to a tremendous amount of narcissistic rage that was undoubtedly triggered when he filed for divorce and moved on with his life, despite the fact that she is the one that blew up the marriage by allegedly shtooping the pizza delivery boy. It also seems likely that Perrette feared a public sex scandal and engaged in DARVO to cover her butt and defame Shivers in a pre-emptive counter-offensive strike.

Closing Thoughts

It can be difficult to sort out who is telling the truth in these he said-she said cases, but not impossible if judges and law enforcement are able to look past their biases of man = bad/woman = victim. HCPs who engage in these behaviors typically can't substantiate their claims or, if confronted on their inconsistencies and contradictions (i.e., lies), just make up more lies to try to substantiate their claims or feign outrage. This may help the falsely accused and his legal representatives hang the false accuser with a rope of her own making, if and when he needs to prove his version of events as opposed to her ever evolving versions of the "truth."

HCPs/PDs/Persuasive Blamers rely on the force of their emotions to sell their lies, half-truths and distortions. Since most people are suckers for drama, especially in the form of a tearful, self-righteous woman, a falsely accused man needs concrete proof if he wants to be believed and, sometimes, concrete evidence isn't enough.

After reading numerous Internet articles and comments on this case, I have reached the conclusion that the parties involved in this saga are all nucking futz to various degrees, no offense to Mr. Shivers and his advocates as I'm a bit of an eccentric myself. There is benign crazy and malignant crazy. Judge Taylor had this to say about Shivers at the January 31, 2005 hearing:

> . . . I think there's been very little problem in the last 6 months, very little problem, a few emails and your allegation [Pauley claimed Mr. Shivers hacked into her email because he printed out copies of emails that she sent him] without a scientific analysis that makes it totally irrefutable. The worst things that happened were on the occasion when Ms. Perrette went to the residence and brought the cops and went through the window.
> Mr Shivers, I think you're behaving rather bizarrely. I think it's a little > bit creepy to have paper bags over the windows, stuff like that. It doesn't look pretty, right? But that's not a crime. It's not a crime, but it does look weird. I agree. It looks strange, but I don't issue restraining orders against strange people.

I have examined the declarations and the other evidence AVFM has in its possession of this case and cannot comprehend why Mr. Shivers has not requested and been granted a reciprocal restraining order. I cannot comprehend how the judge presiding over his current case is unable to discern the obvious set-up that occurred. I cannot comprehend why the judge is ignoring what seems to be Perrette's history of stalking her exes and harassing them through the courts because from what little I've seen of Perrette on NCIS, she's just not that good an actress.

Shrink4Men Coaching, Counseling and Consulting Services:

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier, PsyD provides confidential, fee-for-service, consultation, coaching, and counseling services to both men and women via telephone and/or Skype chat. Her practice combines practical advice, support, reality testing, safe divorce strategies, coping strategies for dealing with abusive, high-conflict/personality disordered partners and exes and goal-oriented outcomes. Please visit the Shrink4Men Services page for professional inquiries.

Court Document Links:

Court Transcript 01-31-2005
Declaration of Pauley Perrette 08-19-2001
Declaration Of Lisa Lynch 09-17-2006
Declaration Of Jason Fishbein 02-05-2007
Declaration Of Blair Barnette 02-04-2007
Star Crazy -highlighted

References:

Bleiberg. (2001). Treating personality disorders in children and adolescents. New York: Guilford Press.

Blush, G. L. & Ross, K. L. (1990). Investigation and case management issues and strategies. Issues in Child Abuse Accusations (2) 3.

Blush, G. L. & Ross, K. L. (1987). Sexual allegations in divorce: The SAID syndrome. Conciliation Courts Review, 25(1).

Eddy, W. (2008). It's all your fault! 12 tips for managing people who blame others for everything. HCI Press.

Eddy, W. (2006) SPLITTING: Protecting Yourself While Divorcing a Borderline or Narcissist.

Freyd, J.J. (1997) Violations of power, adaptive blindness, and betrayal trauma theory. Feminism & Psychology, 7, 22-32.

Green, A. H., & Schetky, D. H. (1988). Child Sexual Abuse. New York:Brunner/Mazel.

Wakefield, H., & Underwager, R. (1990). Personality Characteristics of Parents Making False Accusations of Sexual Abuse in Custody Disputes. Issues In Child Abuse Accusations, 2(3), 121-136.

Zepzauer, F. S. (1994). Believe her! The woman never lies myth. Institute for AVFM News and Activism: DONGLEGATE!

March 26, 2013 | by James Huff | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]
Tonight on AVFM News and Activism James and Bob just can't help but join in on the fun that everyone is having over Donglegate, the controversy surrounding events at the PyCon Tech Conference earlier this moth where Adria Richards took a photo of two men making "offensive jokes" and twittered them leading to one of the men's termination. What happened next was almost unheard of in the professional work world until now- she got canned for making the issue public. Since then there has been a furor in Men's Rights circles as well as a flurry in the media concerning the appropriateness of off color remarks and the reaction to them. James and Bob will not be left out and neither should you so join us for some fun.
The show starts tonight, the 26th, at 9:00 PM Eastern, 8:00 PM Central, which is 2:00 AM February 27th in London and 11:00 AM February 27th in Brisbane.
SHOW PAGE
[/box]

Spring 2013 Fundraiser

March 26, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

As it is with each change of season, it is time to do our quarterly fundraiser at A Voice for Men. Spring 2013 is here!

And, as is the case each time we launch a fundraiser, I hope that we have accomplished enough in the previous quarter to inspire you to part with some of your hard earned money to help us carry on. So far you have each and every time responded in spades and carried us to a successful conclusion to our fundraising efforts. On behalf of the entire editorial board I can't thank you enough for that.

But I don't want to take anything for granted, especially not now.

In recent days, AVFM has reached new heights in terms of drawing attention to the fact that a growing body of men and women are demanding that society take notice of the issues faced by men and boys. We are effectively drawing more readers than many mainstream feminist websites, included some very well-heeled examples like Good Men Project.

We have helped inspire debate about and dissent from the feminist hegemony in media, government and academe, as well as the social and family setting.

We have directly caused bigoted ideologues to out themselves to the world, as we have seen at the University of Toronto and Ryerson University, and we have incurred the predictable backlash of those same agents of deceit who would try to shut us down and silence our cause.

We are still standing and stronger than ever. But it is time to move ahead with vigor.

I just recently posted the announcement that AVFM and NCFM have joined forces to help establish university men's issues awareness groups throughout western academic institutions. And now is the time to set to that work in earnest. It is time to take the message that men's rights are human rights directly into the heart of the proverbial beast.

If you think the University of Toronto was illuminating, just wait.

In the truest sense, we have finally arrived at the pivotal moment in our history that was the purpose of this organization all along. We stand at the springboard of the future of the Men's Human Rights Movement; a future that must involve wresting the power to lie and distort with impunity directly from the hands of feminist ideologues. It is time to force our will into the public discourse on sexual politics, and force the issues of men and boys directly onto the worldwide stage.

Now is the time, people, to either move forward as a legitimate and unstoppable movement for actual human rights, or to collapse back in to the pile of so many false starts. There will be no stasis or stagnation for AVFM. We either move ahead, or we fold. It is just that simple.

I am betting that we are moving ahead.

On behalf of the editorial board of A Voice for Men, and as a matter of personal commitment, I give you my personal pledge to work harder, longer and with more intensity than ever before. And I am asking the same of you. Help us with your donation to this fundraising drive. Help us blow that thermometer up like a thermonuclear blast.
If you have a blog or a YouTube channel, please give this fundraiser a mention and let people know how important it is. Please post this note to your social networking pages and pass it along on your email lists.
I don't think it is in the least overdramatic or inaccurate to say that you might well look back at the Spring of 2013 and be able to say, "I was there where it all started to change, and I was a part of it happening."
Let's do this now.

For Donation options Please see donation menu top right of this page

Fundraiser closes 12:01 AM CDT, 3/29/13

$16,355!!!

Custodial Mother Karma

March 26, 2013 | by Michael Sharron | Link | Original Link

Ah, custodial mothers, undoubtedly a topic of much angst with many readers of A Voice For Men. However, I do not intend to turn this article into a diatribe against the world's mothers as some may suspect. Actually, I do not think any negative or visceral writing I could pen here today could come as close to making a point about custodial mothers than where I intend to go with this article.

I would also like to extend a nod to the many custodial mothers who are a part of the Men's Human Rights Movement, those mothers who made the conscious decision to either turn their back on feminist ideology and made sure that the father of their children were equally included in their kids' lives, or those mothers here supporting us today that have male children who most likely are experiencing hell in the family courts (or soon will be).

My story starts twelve years ago when my first daughter was born and I found myself in a precarious position in her life as a putative father (father not married to the mother) and instantly found myself excessively denigrated by a family court system that has a long history of hurting legal fathers, but does so with great furor to fathers who are not married to the mother.

Needless to say, I was turned into an obligatory non-custodial father in the blink of an eye and handed my sentence of visitor four days a month. Being a new father, I figured the world wasn't such a bad place and figured the custodial mother would be happy that I wanted to be an equal parent in the child's life; to nurture, care for, feed, bathe, clean, and be involved in every part of her life.

Unfortunately, I was wrong. For the first six years, the custodial mother followed the court ordered visitation to the tee and life was hell. By age eight, the mother was giving me more and more time with the child and by age ten we eventually went to the courts and hammered out the perfect 50/50 shared parenting agreement that continues in effect today. I also must say that I realize I do not have it as bad as most of you here, although one may suspect so given that I am a tireless advocate for fathers in their quest to become equal parents in their kids' lives.

Actually, some of you may be surprised to learn that I am also a custodial father of a female child who is very young, and one who demands that the court give the mother 50/50 time even though the law won't allow it in North Carolina.

So where am I going with this post?

Custodial Mothers of the world, be careful in your exhaustive activism for unequal family courts, for thou may seal the fate of your male children.

Today, another child was born in North Carolina, one who will be lumped into statistics as yet another child who came into the world with a loving mother and putative father.

Before anyone gets excited, no this is not my newest child, the child is actually the grandchild of the custodial mother I mentioned in the opening of this article.
Now, I suspect many of you are grinning from ear to ear knowing exactly where I am going with this, and you could not be more right. Although, I do want to say that while I should be enjoying the hell out of this, sitting back smoking a cigar and laughing my ass off, I need to control that and remember that this young man has the potential to have his life shattered if the relationship with the child's mother does not go as planned. But, I am not as nice as many of you may suspect and I am going to take a moment to, with great verbosity and enjoyment, scream from the rooftops…

CUSTODIAL MOTHER KARMA!

Why? Today I watched a Mother, a woman who did everything possible in the first six years of my daughters life to make sure I was nothing more than a marginalized payment provider to HER child became a staunch and very aggressive father's rights advocate for HER SON who is now a newly minted putative father and did so in the blink of an eye.
Today I watched this former custodial mother fight with nursing staff wanting to know WHY the child did not have the last name of her son, and could not fathom their legal response that in North Carolina he is not a father because he is not married to the mother. When told that her son could sign an "affidavit of parentage" before leaving the hospital which would give him some legal rights IF the default custodial mother of this baby agreed to it, my former custodial mother had a look on her face that I will never forget, and the words will probably stick with me till death.
Grandma (former custodial mother of my child): "What the hell do you mean he can sign a piece of paper? My son is this child's FATHER!"
Nursing Staff: "Ma'am, I understand, but by law he can't be considered the father unless the mother allows him to sign this affidavit"
Grandma: "Will this put his name on the birth certificate?"
Nursing Staff: "No Ma'am, this is just a NC Department of Health and Human Services form that they give us to have fathers sign in these circumstances (preparation for child support proceedings just in case). He will have to contact an attorney in order to establish legal rights.."
Grandma: "Are your F'ing kidding me?!?!"
Of course I, having lived this side of hell, sat back, watched, and could have told her all this, but I digress…

What Custodial Mothers AND FEMINIST CO-CONSPIRATORS Can Learn From This Article

Right now, in every corner of this planet, there are soon to be mothers and custodial mothers in a furious fight to maintain their position as supreme lord over their children and who will have no part in the father joining her at the throne. These mothers can be found over on Jezebel, Feministing, BlogHer, and A Circle of Moms conspiring with other mommies about how bad their ex-husbands or boyfriends are and what they can do to make sure he never sees the light of day again. All of this, while they have a male child feeding from their nipple and looking at him in wonderment.

Little do any of these mothers realize, roughly 50% of the worlds militant custodial mothers have male children whom they are working diligently to make sure that he, as a father, will be summarily kicked in the ass by the custodial mother in his life and the family courts. And who, will likely be standing in a hospital or court room one day screaming to high hell about how her son is a father dammit!
All I can do is again say: CUSTODIAL MOTHER KARMA!
But I do have a wonderful message for these mothers, a message that your feminist leaders forgot to tell you when they took your money at fundraisers or put pictures in front of your face of beaten and bloody women claiming that this would be you if the father ever got near you or your child again (likely in an effort to squeeze another dollar out of your pocket an into their non-profit trust account).
My message to you is this: cancel your subscriptions to the National Organization For Women's mailing list, close your accounts on Jezebel and Feministing, and join the dark side because you will likely find that your new life as an activist and non-custodial grandmother who will likely rarely see her grandchildren is best served here on A Voice For Men.
And remember all those things your feminist co-conspirators told you about your ex-husband or boyfriend, how he is a likely rapist, domestic abuser, and child molester? Yeah well, you just remember that because as they took your money and time then, they have every intention to tell the custodial mother of YOUR son's child the same thing about YOUR son.
Enjoy your stay on A Voice For Men.

Donglegate 3MP – the Fairy Tale

March 26, 2013 | by August Løvenskiolds | Link | Original Link

---

Once upon a time, over 35 years ago, on a snowy February 4th in New York City, a miracle birth gave the world a precious baby girl. But this was no ordinary baby girl, no regular gift of God, oh no. This baby girl was a 3MP – the rarest of the rare, specialest of the special, privilegest of the privileged: A tiny baby American Princess, and a Jewish Princess, and a Black Princess, all combined into one gurgling grin. Yes, she was a Triple Magical Princess!

As luck would have it, the Triple Magical Princess and her family moved to Minneapolis, Minnesota when she was just a wee lass and before anyone knew just how magical she was. One day, at seven years old, she became lost while walking home from a park. Darkness was coming on quickly and she was cold, hungry, teary-eyed and terrified. At last she knocked on the door of a strange house and magically, a kindly older couple took her in, called her mother, and then gave her a ride home. But this couple had a terrible secret – their own young son had disappeared forever when he was about her age, and learning about this scared the 3MP close to death. From that day forward she made a secret vow that she would never have children herself, so they would never have to feel fear like she did.

[image]The triple princess grew into a beautiful young woman, with perfect skin and shiny dark curly hair that she learned to wash only once a month. She was tall and buxom at 5’7″, 145 lbs, but she was fertile and healthy and intelligent and had a positive outlook on life, and was extremely enthusiastic, especially when it came to giving consent – just ask anyone she’s told about all this. More on that, later.

But it was her magic powers that were the most remarkable. The Triple Magical Princess had a magic called Neoteny. Everywhere she went, all she had to do was flash her toothy grin and ample bosom and men everywhere rushed to her to partake of her inspirational visage. So many men! Vast trainloads of men and boys flocked to be with her, and from those trains she pulled the tallest of the menz to become her suitors. These suitors felt themselves to be the luckiest menz on Earth, and in gratitude they showered her with flowers and candy and jewelry and gold and stuffed animals and video games and the list goes on forever!

Now, these good men’z projects included plans to become fathers by marrying the beautiful 3MP and making babies with her – a fine and honorable project just like the one that gave birth to you, and you, and you, but one that the 3MP didn’t want, because despite her crushing cramps, secretly the 3MP hated this idea of having little children most of all.

She loved empowering people and changing their lives – this brought her great joy – but despite all her denials, one day the menzes in her life figured out that she didn’t want to be a mommy after all. As word of her secret got around she found that her special magic was growing weaker. She wondered why this was, that the Viking menz who used to park in her presence with presents were now pulling out and going their own way. Perhaps it was the cold weather and dreary confines of Minnesota that were sapping her of her mojo. As she railroaded away the last of her menz poor, in pain and full of disgust (just like her), the 3MP made the biggest decision of her life – she would move as far away from Vikings as she could – to beautiful San Francisco, California!

She had done all of the right research, including listing "Californication" as her favorite TV show, so she packed up her hairbrush and nearly full bottle of shampoo and headed westward again. But nothing in her life prepared her for the men she would meat/meet in San Francisco.

[image]These new men in her life were not at all like the thick Vikings of Minnesota. These new men were shy and gentle, and many of them liked to walk around weekends dressed in nothing but metal and leather and hug each other a lot. Such strange men! With their soft hands and funny technobabble they were nothing like the rough Vikings she had grown to desire. But she was a special 3MP, you see, and so she decided to give these men a try, too.

As she walked the streets of San Francisco, her plumpness melted away and she imagined her magic was returning to her. I can date any man, she thought, any man at all! And so began her summer of boys – entire streetcars full of boys, and yet, by September they had all abandoned her, and she finally began to worry if her magic was now gone forever.

It was only then that during her prayers God revealed to her his miracle of the tech conference – and that these conferences had boys! Many, many boys! Her heart began to sing! Why, there must be 4 boys for every girl at these conferences, and those other girls are ugly feminists!

She tweeted excitedly to her friends about stuffing menz pants with socks and other giggly girl stuff. Once again her magic would blossom – she was sure of it.

But the boys at these conferences seemed off, somehow – instead of focusing on her beautiful hair and perfect skin and ample bosom, those in this crowd of menz were all wearing wedding rings and listening to speakers and playing with their computers and cell phones. And worst of all, they were all neckbeards! And none of them were paying any attention to her at all. She prayed harder than she had ever prayed before that God transform her into a keyboard so that she could feel the touch of a man's strong fingers one last time before she died.

It was only then that God answered her and told her about the evil Queen Ada, her Initiative, and how it banned and forbade all princess magic at tech conferences. The time of her magic was gone forever.

As she sat in her chair, seething in quiet anger and helplessness, an image of a 7-year-old girl flashed onto the screen above the crowd. The same little girl that she was once: lost, cold, hungry and alone.

Not again! NEVER AGAIN! The 3MP lashed out, and tweeted a picture of several of the neckbeards canoodling behind her. Her once beautiful smile twisted into a rictus of hate, and she swore that no one would ever live happily ever after ever again.

McMaster University: Girlz iz mo betta

March 27, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Ladies, do you desire a career in business? But do you have self-esteem, or perhaps even intelligence issues that would get in the way of completing a rigorous program of education that would prepare you for success in the business environment?
Would you love to get that B.A. in Business Management or even an M.B.A, but find that all those facts and icky numbers thingies and other really hard stuff get in the way?
Don't you worry your pretty little heads! The DeGroote School of Business at McMaster University has the business program just for you. Wanna know why, cupcake? Cause your special! Your "woman's way of knowing" has more to bring to the modern world of business than any of those hard to remember facts and figures that silly male business people keep insisting are so important.
Seriously, I think that McMaster University should have something like that on their about page.
I don't blame them for being conscious of the fact that men are falling out of education, and the subsequent reality that if they want to keep their programs solvent they need to appeal to women. Since they can't, as a part of Western academe, actually make a push for male students by touting their ability to create informed, critical thinkers ready for the business world, they are forced to go for the vanity sell.
And they have done so in spades on their website, with an article transparently titled, "Women Make Better Decisions than Men," which of course was backed up with long pink ribbons of touchy-feely feminist "scholarship" to support the elitist claim of the title.
I can just imagine the high caliber go-getter females they are targeting with that kind of rhetoric. And I am sure that their graduates will be highly competent and sought above all others for corporate recruitment in the years to come.
Oh my, I have become sarcastic again. Please accept my mea culpas. It is very difficult to keep a straight face while addressing an accredited university that uses blind sexism, appealing to emotional toddlers and insulting the intelligence of men and women everywhere just to indulge ideations of supremacy in their prospective students.
As to the "science" used for their citations, I had a choice here. I could write another 600 or so words taking it down, or I could just steal a comment made to their article that did just that for all of us.
It was a lazy article, so I chose the lazy way out, with thanks to the author of said comment.
From Scott Gustafson:

> I am a professor at a major state university. The title intrigued me, being so blatantly sexist and intentionally inflammatory. As an educational institution, you should be ashamed of yourself for letting such a poorly titled, researched, and written article be publicly promulgated. A cursory examination of your sources (which were not > completely cited, so one must dig in order to ferret out the data on which you based your rather spurious conclusions):

> Joy, L., Carter, N. M., Wagner, H. M. & Narayanan, S. (2007): The Bottom Line: Corporate Performance and Women's Representation on Boards. New York: Catalyst Inc.
> NOT a peer reviewed paper – but a corporate position piece with no fidelity of data to support the authors' claims.
> Wilson, N and A Altanlar. 2009. "Director Characteristics, Gender Balance and InsolvencyRisk: an empirical study.
> NOT a peer reviewed article, and the conclusion was that empirical inquiries lead to mixed results – the opposite conclusion of this article
> Fondas, N. and S. Sassalos (2000), "A Different Voice in the Boardroom: How the Presence of Women Directors Affects Board Influence"
> This article was based on archival survey data from 1991, and came to the conclusion that boards who included women at the time were more open to shareholder input and had a corporate culture of openness: NOT any specific qualities of the behavior of women. Again, poor research and sourcing.
> It was at this point I stopped seeking the empirical sources for you article, because you had lost all credibility. If one of my graduate students had produced this sexist pile of poorly produced pugnaciousness, I would have a long and serious discussion with them about academic standards. I suggest you may want to consider the same, being that you embarrass yourself as an academic institution by this article's inclusion in your public discourse.

You may want to stop by the McMaster thread and marvel also at how their marketing rep tries to backpedal and obfuscate about the article, even as it rests in its unaltered form, just a quick scroll up from the backpedaling and obfuscations.
I suppose to them it does not matter, as the idiots to which this article is designed to appeal likely won't be swayed by its utter destruction in the comments that follow.
Sigh. We have much work to do in this world.

Telegraph on stay-at-home mothers (and invisible fathers)

March 27, 2013 | by Andy Thomas | Link | Original Link

I've just, this second, read an article in the Telegraph. The title is "Taxman hits stay-at-home mothers," the gist of it being that the Coalition is developing policies designed to force mothers back to work by punishing stay-at-home mothers of traditional families. Here's the link:

Taxman hits stay-at-home mothers – Telegraph

The term stay-at-home mothers is used 10 times in this piece, including the caption of the associated image. That's TEN if you missed it, a big one-zero.

What about the fathers in these traditional families? Surely they are being hit as well? After all, they are half of the couple in the family unit and the one who's income is being taxed. How many times are they mentioned in this article?

The word "father" is used not once. The Coalition's policies on tax and the family are presumed not to affect them and, correspondingly, the article doesn't even give them a mention. In fact, no mention whatsoever is made to fathers, men* or husbands. And if you, like me, start to contemplate the signicance of this, you will surely find it disturbing. It's a real fucker, in fact, because it says a lot about our worth as males, and as human beings, in this society today.

Think about it…

Let's think about the whole narrative of what, to most people, would be an incontroversial article. The focus of the story is the stay-at-home mother. She is not only a mother, but she is a person—a human being with a face. As if to emphasise this, a photograph of the archetypal mother and child is provided for us. In this story, she is also the sole representative of the tradional family itself.

Presumably, in the reader's mind, just below the level of conscious introspection perhaps, there must also be the recognisation that, somewhere, there must also be a father in this traditional family. It's just that he's not in the picture—either literally or figuratively. He must be off to the side somewhere and, subconsciouly, the reader might visualise him as one of those grey faceless shop dummies, over in the corner, just out of shot. It's as if he were invisible.

Well, actually it's not as if he were invisible. He IS fucking invisible.

This article represents a glaring example of how men are invisible. Looking back at my own life, I know it's true, and nothing can ever be the same again once that realisation is made.

*I lied actually. The article does, in fact, make use of the word "man" several times, i.e. *taxman.

A monument to warriors wounded in the gender war: The Purple Hearts House

March 27, 2013 | by Robert Sides | Link | Original Link

Years ago I corresponded with a man living overseas. I'll call him Job (not his real name). He'd learned about me from my activism. I learned he was looking to come to America to help his son who, apparently, could not get the help he needed over there. So Job planned to come to the USA, find suitable medical care, then bring over his daughter and wife.

I warned him against bringing the "ball-and-chain." I told him no matter how nicely she acted there, once she got here her attitude would change. Markedly.

And not for the better.

Feminism would guarantee that.

My friend, a skilled programmer, noted my warning… then focused on getting his son help pronto. He tapped his savings, flew here, then spent countless hours pounding pavement while navigating myriad mental health mazes.

Task completed, he brought over his wife.

It was his undoing.

Sure enough, within a short time, not only was his wife making more and more demands on him, she started hiding her own savings. Then she began reading about America's feminists. Soon after came false accusations, restraining orders, and so on. The usual low-life litany.

Still, my friend kept attempting the Sisyphean task of trying to please and appease her. No matter. He could never satisfy her.

Still, Job stayed put, mostly to be with and protect his son and daughter (whom the wife now began abusing). Ultimately divorce papers were served, custody being awarded to the vaginate (surprise!). Then commenced the downward spiral of my friend.

His brother died around that time, adding to his agony. And though he'd left my friend a chunk of change, it did no good. Job's stepmother intervened, convincing his white-knight father to deny access without her permission. Which, of course, was never given. So my now-pauperized friend was left defenseless against his wife's free NOW-paid legal sharks. Summoned to court too often, he lost his job. Time with his kids was reduced. Next he lost his lodging, the one place his kids could visit, so it was cut altogether. He lost self-esteem and nearly his sanity.

A once proud, physically strong, productive, high-earning, caring father became a penniless bum living in a homeless shelter. Formerly optimistic, energetic, and creative, he morphed into a shell: clinically-depressed, drugged on meds, with sleep apnea. Shooting him would have been more merciful.

Gloria Steinem must be proud.

But this tale is not just about him. It's also about another friend. And the non-moving men's movement of the era, which forced individual guys to fight what should have been collective battles. It indicts those groups because when contacted, they did zip for desperate men.

Christopher Robin (his real name), wanted—and continues to want—one thing: contact with his son. Yet for years he's been denied that. He reached out, as did my other friend, to many men's groups who advertised help, but failed to deliver. In fact, most groups' "national offices" were just PO Boxes. And most leaders were power-hungry do-nothings interested only in taking money from men in need.
I saw such groups up close. Lonely, scared, newly scarred men would turn up bearing court papers, looking for help. "Leaders" would convince them to pay dues… what was jokingly called (in private, of course) "fleecing the sheep." Because what the lost souls got in turn was the business card of the group's lawyer (who made a killing while doing squat to gain custody).
Of course, the new recruits were now free to commiserate with fellow members… who'd similarly refused $20 annual donations to men's rights groups a few weeks ago, but now handed over $10,000 retainers to do-nothing shysters.
The era's delusions were hard to overestimate. Groups would brag about bills they "presented," caring not a jot if they ever passed into law. Clueless leaders didn't see that local politicians and reporters considered them jokes. One legend-in-his-own-mind would dispense coupons for free yogurt samples like he was a Tammany Hall ward boss. Unbelievable! It was like watching drunken goats try to fly jets.
Anyway, because those muttonheads refused to lead, individual men were left in the lurch. Most suffered horribly, alone and unnoticed, group dues paid or not.
Like my now homeless friend, Job.
And Christopher Robin.
In a recent post, the latter wrote:
"It has been a long time since I was an activist. It was my whole life for several years. I actually believed if we fought hard enough, we could make changes in the system and get justice."
Indeed. There certainly was a naïve belief that as soon as men saw a few guys fighting, others would join in. No one thought Team Penis would hide in trenches, much less start shooting at their own activists.
Now understand: Christopher's son's godfather is Gene Autry, the famous "singing cowboy"…

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Gene_Autry

And Chris, himself, was a good friend of Jack LaLanne:

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Jack_LaLanne

Plus he lives in Hollywood on land with many trees. The house is covered with purple hearts, too, originally one for each day he didn't see his son (1400-something, though now there should be over 6500!). He was ready, willing, and able to use his house and influence to help other men. All group leaders had to do was join in.

Which, of course, they didn't.
Christopher continues:
"Everyone I knew wondered why the media would not do a serious story on the Purple Heart House. The Hollywood Dell is home to movie stars, writers, directors, producers who drove by the old house every day. Writers from People, Time, Newsweek, the Los Angeles Times and CBS called me and set up a time for an interview. They were amazed at the passion we had… at the many dozens of heart-breaking stories featured on your Purple Heart Wall of Hope."
More on the Wall later.
So what happened?
"They were very interested. They asked all the questions that legitimate news people would ask. Each one of them were sure their coverage of this phenomenon would attract world-wide attention.
Each of them asked me about my in-laws. When I told them the story about my ex-wife and her mother, their attitude toward me changed. Each one of them told me that if my in-laws were Italian, Irish, Polish, Scandinavian— printing my story would not be a problem. However, my in-laws are not any of those and each one of those reporters admitted that no one would ever print my story."
Sound familiar? Any readers with exes who were believed despite lying?
Mr. Robin, again:
"Post-menopausal NBC news-lady, Laurel Erickson, made an appointment for 4pm to video your Purple Heart Wall of Hope and interview a few of our fathers. We waited until 6 and were about to give up on her when her video truck pulled up. There were several alienated fathers waiting. Finally we were sure we would get our story told. She exited the video truck with her driver, who was also her videographer.
She must have had a tough day because she looked very haggard, angry, and hostile. With microphone in hand, she walked toward us in a rather menacing manner. Immediately, she began to insist that the only reason we didn't get to see our children is because we probably were molesters. She insisted that she knew a lot of fathers who got to see their kids.
We had waited so long to get our story out… and this miserable hag ranted that it was our fault if we didn't get to parent our children.
She interviewed seven of our activists and we all watched and listened in disbelief. As she drove off, we prayed that she would never file our story. None of us could believe that this kind of hatred existed in newsrooms.
Each of our activists had exactly the same sentence. The Los Angeles County judges had made all of us 'visitors.' Wednesdays… and every other weekend."
I've known Christopher for years, though we've corresponded infrequently (though that happily seems to be a-changin'). Life happened and some things became too painful to revisit. Still, as he writes:
"Every day on the news we see firemen rescuing a kitten from a tree…. Poor Lindsay Lohan's problems…. Tiger Wood's love life…. but there is never a story about how fathers get destroyed the minute a divorce happens."

True. Men don't matter unless they get wounded or die trying to help others. Yet the fact is, every man's heart bleeds…and every divorced father should get a Purple Heart. Christopher Robin and his son should have lived a life as idyllic as that at Pooh Corner. Instead, like above-mentioned Job, he's been driven to his knees. Financially drained, arthritic, another victim of feminism run amok.
He continues:
"It has been several years since I have seen or spoken to any of my activist friends. No matter how hard we fought, we always got defeated. Some of my old friends have turned to booze and drugs. A couple have taken their lives.
As for me, I have dealt with severe clinical depression for more than 15 years. Naturally, I have considered suicide because depression is incurable but I must not do that because I pray every day that my little 10 year old will send me a card or drop by to say hello. Now it has been 18 years since I have seen him. He will be 29 years old in December."
Imagine: a system so evil it not only denies fathers custody, it alienates children so much they don't see their loving dads for decades thereafter! Is there a crueler fate than having all that matters taken from you while feminists, supported by male taxes, smirk?
And some say the Taliban is barbaric!
More from Christopher:
"No matter how tough we are, when the courts destroy a family, the pain in our hearts is beyond any physical pain. Even now, after all these years, if I see a commercial with a father and his son on TV, I begin to sob uncontrollably. If I am with friends and we begin to speak about my little son, I began to cry."
The Wall of Hope was an idea I concocted whereby men would send Christopher postcards he'd then laminate and affix to a wall:

http://www.thepurplehearthouse.com/stories.html

My dedication reads:
"Purple Heart Wall of Hope
There are walls, like that in Berlin, which kept us apart.
We were glad to tear them down.
Some walls, like that for Vietnam Vets, heal us.

This wall, covered with smiling faces, inspires us.
It's a testament to men's love for their children,
For families, fatherhood and fairness.

For despite loving their children dearly,
Many Fathers are kept away from them
By current public policies and biased divorce Laws.

Far from despairing, however, these pioneering fathers
Are reaching out to one another and to us.
They want us to see that they support each other,
And need our help.

The pictures you see here are from around the world.
They are sent by caring fathers as articles of faith.
Look closely at these photos.
Each represents a child in need of his father.

It is our fondest hope that love will triumph…
And children, the world over,
Will be reunited with their fathers."
Anyway, you'd think with such a golden chance for media attention, with, literally, "Hollywood connections," men's groups would have sent truckloads of cards. But no. Each feared being outdone by the other, so groups– for the most part– refused to participate at all.
Again, heart-breaking.
What could have happened had this house become a beacon for distressed men? Where would feminism be today if men had rallied around it, creating others across the land? What might have transpired if guys had just worn the buttons Christopher created?

http://sdrv.ms/15Hc1KO

Or had kids hold signs with the same logo?

http://sdrv.ms/14gp1KQ

It wouldn't have taken much to stop the women's movement back then. A few "warning shots" would have done the trick. Just like a handful of Maginot Line border guards firing in the air would have stopped Nazi patrols crossing into the Rhineland on March 7, 1936. But because the French failed to act, WWII ensued. And because MRM leaders failed to act, a one-sided Gender War commenced, collectively punishing billions of men.
At least be inspired by what some lone men were able to do. Then think about what we can all do together now, aided by the Internet:

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=mBml6YmZrmo

Read more about The Purple Hearts House here:

http://www.thepurplehearthouse.com

And watch a few Christopher-and-son videoclips here:

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=xzjKsZOdrGk http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=O6UiefCDCg8

Finally, consider sending Christopher an encouraging word (email via the PHH website, above). He might feel burned-out, but still: it could boost his spirits knowing others care. And who knows: he could re-start his famous house's project …and start reading AVFM regularly!

Why the University of Toronto is so important

March 28, 2013 | by Dan Perrins | Link | Original Link

On April fourth CAFE is hosting another lecture and discussion event. Their speakers this time are Dr. Katherine Young and Dr. Paul Nathanson. The topic is "From Misogyny & Misandry to Intersexual Dialogue"
I am positive it is going to be interesting and incredibly important event for the well being of men and boys.
The recent reactions against men's issues groups at Southern Ontario University Lectures have been horrendous. A violent protest erupted at the Warren Farrell lecture, shutting down peaceful discourse on the betrayal of boys and young men by today's society. An intelligent young man had come in search of answers to why his two friends had committed suicide, but he was treated with rabid, ignorant insensitivity by the feminist protesters, who told him something to the effect of "feminism has all the answers."
I know some answers to this gentleman's questions.
Full disclosure, one day in May back in the early 80's my brother committed suicide while he was a patient at the local mental health facility. It happened three days before he was to be discharged.
With no place to go.
He was 22. Twenty-nine years later to the day that my brother committed suicide, I too was a patient at the same hospital for many of the same reasons. Misandry, discrimination on the basis of sex, a lack of compassion for men and boys. The corruption in the Canadian 'just us' women system did not happen to my brother, only to me.
My older brother, if he was alive, would have been 51 when I lost all hope.
In a 1995 Statistics Canada Health Report paper by Kathryn Wilkins who, works in the Information and Research as well as the Health Analysis Divisions at Statistics Canada was published. It is called "Causes of death: How the sexes differ" Suicide is listed 20 times in this report. The author ends with this;

> Consequently, public health interventions to reduce male death rates will probably yield the most gains when targeted at young adult men.

In the wake of that intelligent and well-balanced recommendation, Statistics Canada reports the following numbers for the young man's age group (20 to 24 years old) during the years 2000 to 2009.
They are;

Cause of death	2000	2001	2002	2003	2004	2005	2006	2007	2008	2009
Intentional self-harm (suicide)	317	296	277	306	270	296	265	290	255	277

For men,

Cause of death	2000	2001	2002	2003	2004	2005	2006	2007	2008	2009
Intentional self-harm (suicide)	257	242	223	248	218	231	219	228	204	204

For women,

Cause of death	2000	2001	2002	2003	2004	2005	2006	2007	2008	2009
Intentional self-harm (suicide)	60	54	54	58	52	65	46	62	51	73

For the 2000-09 [1] years young men were gasping their last dying breath because there was no compassion for men and boys, making up an average rate of 80% of Canada's male suicide problem.
79.8% to be exact, not that it matters since society is willfully blind, deaf and mute to this deadly issue affecting young men
A report from July of 2012 for Statistics Canada on the Canadian suicide problem was written by Tanya Navaneelan called, "Health at a Glance Suicide rates: An overview." In her Summary she states, "Using vital statistics to explore different aspects of suicide in Canada has shown that males are far more likely to commit suicide than* females."
Young sir, if you are reading this, I would have you know that organizations like AVFM, NCFM , CAFE and others, are working to ensure that you are freely able to ask your questions in the future.
I also want you to know that AVFM intends to document any other criminal actions that you and others suffered at the hands of that anti male mob, whether they are wearing masks or not.
I will try to ask a question on your behalf, young sir. You and the family members of your friends are owed some answers. We all deserve to know why society does nothing about this deadly serious male health issue.
Why isn't the Canadian Government and health system addressing those last gasps for help from young men and boys? Why are they ignoring the balanced advice we as tax payers paid for? Why aren't governments and society willing to talk about that last deadly, quiet, lonely, gasps of men and boys calling to us from beyond the grave in the form of a number, a statistical gravestone, marking their loss all of hope?
On November 16, 2012 the world witnessed that young man's opportunity to ask Dr Farrell about his two friends suicides get heinously, maliciously, forcefully, criminally, taken from him.
May he and his friends and family never experience this tragedy again.
[1] http://www5.statcan.gc.ca/cansim/a47

Black 'leadership' betrays Black men–AGAIN!

March 28, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

WELCOME TO THE BLACK MENTAL HEALTH ALLIANCE OF MASSACHUSETTS, WHERE THE RULES ARE SIMPLE, DRESS LIKE WE WANT YOU TO, OR WE WILL SEND YOUR BLACK ASS TO JAIL.

I remember an interesting event from many years ago when I worked at a facility for treating alcoholism and drug addiction in young adults. One of the counselors there made the utterance during a staff meeting that he intended to tell the clients on his caseload that he would not do individual sessions with them if they showed up with "bizarre" haircuts, nose rings or other manner of personal appearance that did not meet his approval.

He was fired a couple of days later on a technicality, to the applause of the rest of us. Good fucking riddance.

The last thing that these young people needed was a supposed mental health professional so shallow and so judgmental that they could not look past fashion and into their humanity. Doing so is a skill fundamental to forming an alliance with people who might just trust you enough to help them.

Thankfully, that kind of "professional" really is the exception. That does not guarantee competence, but it does serve to rule out some of the most destructive and misguided before they get a chance to abuse and cheat clients by imposing their personal fashion sensibilities and calling it therapy. How can you understand a human being if you cannot see past a tattoo at what resides under the skin?

Hint for the woefully stupid. You can't treat alcoholism or drug addiction with a haircut. And yes, believe it or not you actually have to tell some people that more than once.

So, you can imagine my surprise, not to mention my disappointment, when I read that the Black Mental Health Alliance of Massachusetts was targeting and threatening young Black men in the Boston area for wearing their pants too low – with three years in prison. The message is delivered, with real tough-guy bravado, by Uncle Tom in a blue uniform.

Oh yeah, that is just what the Black community needs, more young Black men doing time in prison on bullshit charges.

Fuck, who needs the Klan any more when you have Black mental health professionals (who are apparently about as mentally healthy as Byron De La Beckwith) turning hostile, virulent racism inward on their own community?

They are getting the added kick of infusing sexism into the mix. Can you imagine what the reaction of the Black community would be if young, inner city women were threatened with prison for their fashions?

Make no mistake about it, this is not about improving matters for the Black community. It is not about understanding the struggles of young Black men. It is not even about recognizing them as human beings. It is Big Brutha, kissing racist White asses and kicking the impoverished, struggling members of their own community while they are down. And doing so under the banner of mental health.

Gee, where else have I seen young men stigmatized and derogated while claiming to be about the provision of mental health services? Oh yeah, it is in the White community. But racist-feminist ideologues on this side of the racial divide can't get away – at least yet – with overt threats of prison for how young men dress. That sort of bullying has to be reserved for those with the least resources to fight back.
It is actually hard to say how much of what is driving the Black Mental Health Alliance of Massachusetts is racist self-hatred, how much is sexism, and how much is just the misguided stupidity of people that think you can solve complex social problems by telling people how to dress, but it is safe to say there is a (un)healthy dose of all three in this shameless stunt of racially targeted bullying.
Apparently the Black men involved with the Black Mental Health Alliance of Massachusetts have pulled their pants up, alright. So high, in fact, they have squeezed their nuts out of existance.
I could go into more of analysis of this, but it is not worth the time it would take to fastidiously debunk this pile of res ipsa loquitur bullshit. I will just offer you the video and call it a day.

Well, there is one more thing: A message to the Black Mental Health Alliance of Massachusetts. I am very sure the Aryan Brotherhood, who have likely persecuted fewer Black men than you, is cheering you on. I am sure that George Lincoln Rockwell is equally impressed, you well behaved gaggle of step-and-fetches.
But it does leave me with a question or two about you. Is this what you have to offer young Black men? Prison for low belt lines and exposed underwear? Is this what mental health is for the Black community; a push to send young Black men to a horrible place where they will be raped and beaten and learn how to become real criminals, ultimately returning to the Black community?
If this is the case, then young Black men, and the Black community are really, truly fucked.

An open letter to feminists

March 29, 2013 | by Gordon Wadsworth | Link | Original Link

Dear feminists,
It has recently come to my attention that many of you are missing the point of the MHRM. I won't pretend to know what it's like anesthetized to the world around you by a single-minded fixation, but it's getting to the point where someone needs to sit down with you, calm you down, and explain the current situation. I know, that sounded terribly oppressive, and I know how much you hate mansplaining, but if you're going to pretend you fight for men's rights you may need to listen to men once in a blue moon.
And yes, I'm aware that your domesticated pet-feminist male sycophants agree with you, but thankfully they don't speak for all men, even if it is comforting and convenient for you to believe otherwise.
Let me first say that I honestly see the validity of feminism, I really do. Many of you have gone insane, but somewhere buried in the ravenous culture-destroying sandstorm of your discontent lies the simple validity of your movement. Feminism is merely an expression of post-industrial female humanity that seeks to free itself from male authority. I get that. My grandmother was a feminist and a wonderful lady. What many contemporary feminists don't seem to appreciate is that there is a flip side to this coin. With authority comes obligation, and the validity of the MHRM is that it seeks to free post-industrial male humanity from obligation to women.
Both of these post-industrial egalitarian goals, freeing women from male authority and freeing men from female obligation, could easily have coexisted under the same roof. Instead, for the past 50 years feminism has insisted on making the discussion one entirely about male authority. Those people intelligent enough to see this are now mostly pissed off about it, and attempting to convince us that misandry doesn't exist or that women are de facto oppressed will no longer work. Many men and women see an unfair and ever-expanding unhealthy male obligation to women in our culture.
Unfortunately for everyone, you insist on understanding and processing everything in terms of male authority. You see our movement in terms of male authority, and you thus miss the point entirely. This movement is about male obligation. We support your equality, we simply want to be freed from our obligations to you, which is why we often ask some of you to please grow up. Many of you apparently believe the MHRM is somehow trying to reassert male authority. This could not be further from the truth. In fact, judging from the rapid growth of MGTOW philosophy, it's probably more accurate to say that many men in our culture are fed up and want out altogether.
Whether men are even in a position of authority anymore is debatable, but ignoring that, let's agree to define pre-feminist Western culture as "patriarchy." I don't think anyone can deny that the last century of feminist activism has worked only to free women from male authority, and has even fought to keep men bound to their obligations to women. Female patriarchal roles have been discarded, while male patriarchal roles have been entrenched. In other words, feminists have selectively supported one half of the patriarchy while attacking the other, even while claiming universal opposition to the patriarchy.

Thus, patriarchy doesn't hurt men, the current scenario of double standards that have been put into place by 50 years of unopposed feminist activism hurts men. Stated more generally, feminism hurts men. Most men in the manosphere have done this math and come to this conclusion. So trying to convince us that "patriarchy hurts men" just won't cut it anymore.
And even if this were the patriarchy hurting men as you claim, why should this notion stop men from attempting to free ourselves from it? Why should such a notion compel men to be feminists instead of fighting on our own behalf? At best, the whole discussion on patriarchy is a semantic one, which doesn't change our condition or our efforts. At worst, the word patriarchy is a weapon; a distortion meant to validate your ideology and deny the legitimacy of men's views. This, by the way, is starting to piss men off.
And indeed pissing men off has become feminism's bread and butter. The expansion of anti male legislation is as common as it is unbelievable. I sometimes believe feminism has become the dominant force driving the expansion of misogyny in Western culture. This alone is enough to validate opposition to it. But more than this, your fight to free yourself from any semblance of male authority, real or imagined, is now infringing on our human rights as men. And when we attempt to discuss how our human rights are being violated, you even attempt to silence us by rolling over other fundamental human rights. This is why many of us laugh so heartily when you claim to fight for men's rights.
For fun, however, let's grant your thesis that you truly have men's interests at heart. Let's rewind a week and consider what happened at Donglegate, the recent spectacular debacle that redefined our state of millennial gender dysfunction, and in particular, let's examine how effective feminism's activism was on behalf of men. If feminism had men's issues at heart, it should have been apparent. Well here's what I observed:

1) You see men wanting to be half the picture as oppressive behavior.

Men valuing themselves and wanting to avoid being cut out of the picture is seen as men rising up to oppress women "again." Men speaking out about a man's career being thrown in the trash can wasn't merely men being angry about being cut out of their rightful half of the picture, it was a reflection of a misogynist culture trying to keep women out of tech. In other words, you see nothing but men attempting to assert their "authority" over women.
You fail to see men that are angry about being obligated to the increasingly fragile and volatile feelings of pampered, childish feminists. And I know how irate it makes you to see me use the word "half." How dare I say half when women are only a tiny fraction of those in the tech industry? The distribution of population by sex in the tech industry isn't as important as men and women in any industry being valued equally. Right now you are using an assumption that the population should be 50:50 as a pretext to devalue men.

2) You treat males as disposable.

A man's livelihood was disposed of for using the word "dongle." Well, no, that's not entirely accurate. A man's livelihood was disposed of for offending the delicate sensibilities of an adult-shaped Disney princess. The exclamation mark on this mystifying orgasm of male disposability was Doug Barry's recent article over at Jezebel arguing that the Adria Richards firing will be "hard to defend" in court before saying the following:

> Maybe those two hapless conference-goers didn't deserve to lose their jobs at PlayHaven and have their lives interrupted, but, then again, maybe women in the tech community deserve to attend a professional fucking conference full of professional fucking people without feeling like outsiders who have just accidentally interrupted a Halo circle jerk tournament in someone's windowless basement.

I guess the firing of these men is defensible then since we're pursuing a "higher" calling.

3) You make no boundary separating healthy female behavior from dysfunctional female behavior.

You view both equally as empowerment. If a female is behaving in a healthy way, sure it's empowering, and reflects a strong, independent, adult woman. Fine, I get that, and I agree. I see my own girlfriend as such a woman and she has my love and respect for it. But if a female is totally disrespectful and is behaving in a socially toxic manner, for some reason this is viewed equally as her right to feel empowered.

No one in the mainstream called Richards' behavior what it was — socially toxic. In keeping with the "empowered female" archetype, the consensus instead shifted the focus to the actions of the men being immature, juvenile, infantile, puerile, and any other word to portray their behavior in as irritating a light as possible. The distortions on their behavior were calculated to implicitly validate her actions and shield her from condemnation. This obligates these men to her "empowerment." Men must behave in a very specific manner so that a woman can feel welcome and empowered. No expectation exists for her to be a grown up. Supporting her empowerment is considered so important that nobody should ever condemn her dysfunction.

Kate Harding's tweet on the matter provides a good example of this lack of boundary. She summed the whole affair up as what happens "when women in tech speak out." Her summation doesn't allow room to consider whether Richards was speaking out in a healthy and functional manner or whether she was acting inappropriately out of hatred and spite to publicly shame someone. In Harding's mind, this was simply female empowerment being quelled by male authority. Harding simply can't see men being angry about a continued relationship of unhealthy obligation. As a result, her evaluation misattributes the resultant outcry as sexist, and mistakenly blames men for the problem.

4) You make no boundary separating healthy male behavior from dysfunctional male behavior.

Generally speaking, you don't make this boundary because you tend to see male behavior as inherently authoritative and oppressive either way. Jessica Valenti's tweet on the Donglegate matter provides a good example of this. "This is a joke, right? A woman is being fired for reporting harassment?" Here Valenti is equating an innocuous comment about a "dongle," one not even directed at Richards, with real harassment. Again, no expectation is made for women to be remotely adult about it, it's merely a form of harassment just like any other that victimizes women. As a result, the man immediately becomes judged a harasser, and his behavior is criminalized. His humanity and rights are denied and ignored in this process. He becomes obligated not to a reasonable and objective definition of harassment but to a woman's feelings.

5) You accuse men of being privileged no matter the circumstances.

When you accuse men of being uniformly privileged based on your narrow view of male authority, it delegitimizes any and all discussion of male obligation. You give yourself permission to ignore and marginalize the male perspective, and subsequently to ignore men's issues altogether. Lindy West provides a good example in her analysis of Donglegate over at Jezebel. From her article, "Woman in Tech Tweets About Sexist Dudes in Tech. Dude Gets Fired. Internet Meltdown Ensues,"

> Men, if you don't get that, it's because you don't have to get it. You are not qualified to be dismissive of a lifetime of microaggressions until you have personally experienced a lifetime of microaggressions. So if you don't get it, be thankful.

This is the accusation of privilege. Notice how it is designed to immediately silence and delegitimize any form of protest or any conflicting male perspective on the matter. Notice how her belief in male privilege has apparently prevented her from considering any "microaggressions" men might deal with. Notice how if we don't accept her frame and her rules we're fortunate for our ignorance. The men who lost their jobs might not feel privileged, but never mind them, they're ignorant. Lindy, you only piss men off when you ignore their views and shut down discussion with this type of adolescent behavior.
Thus if I were to grade your recent activism on behalf of men at Donglegate, I'd be forced to give you a D-. You should probably put in a better effort if you're going to claim to support men's issues. And there's a good reason for you to do so. Our culture is stuck in a destructive cycle of self-validating viewpoints. You continue making demands which show a callous disregard for the interests and well being of men, because you see women as de facto oppressed.
You then fail to acknowledge and legitimize any resulting anger, because you don't have the cognitive tools to acknowledge and legitimize any views that deviate from your own.

And when public outcries like the one over Donglegate turn into public outrage, you often write it off as misogyny, and double down on your views.
This cycle of destruction needs to stop. We don't need to be enemies, but you need to acknowledge male obligation to women and society as exactly one half of "patriarchal" oppression and start working harder to free men from it. If you continue to refuse, we will continue fighting your ideology, and events like Donglegate will be the Friday night lights of FTSU.
You've undoubtedly seen an explosion of what can at times fairly be called misogyny all over the internet. Can you honestly afford to keep writing it off and attempting to shame it out of existence? Can you honestly afford to keep throwing it all in one basket with the MHRM? Can you honestly keep attributing this outcry to a male proclivity for misogyny? Please consider those questions carefully.

Here we go again, University of Toronto

March 29, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

First, I wanted to extend a hearty and sincere thank you to the scores of you that helped in our recent fundraiser. As the closing deadline passed, we exceeded our goal, raising $16,355.00. More is undoubtedly on the way in the mail. It was our most successful effort ever, which is something we have been able to say after each and every fundraiser that we have had*. While we still rely a little too heavily on larger donors, the numbers of small donations – a critical part of success – were at an all-time high. We picked up several new monthly donors as well. So again, thank you. And now it is time to go back to putting that money to the use intended. PE*

[quote]"Truth is regarded as a terrible word in this age of deconstruction." ~ Katherine Young, from the Conference on Male Studies, April, 2010[/quote]

In six days, on April 4, 2013, the Men's Issues Awareness Group of the Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE) is hosting yet another important discussion at the University of Toronto. This time, Drs. Paul Nathanson and Katherine Young, authors of a seminal series of books on misandry in modern culture will present a discussion titled "From Misogyny & Misandry to Intersexual Dialogue." The discussion is billed by CAFE as "A conversation exploring the effects on both men and women of our current approach to gender and how we might foster a genuinely intersexual – and intersectional – dialogue that is both broad and deep, while incorporating all aspects of personal and social identity."

If this were almost any other subject being addressed by almost any other speakers, it would fall into the routine of academic life; with little cause for being given any more attention than other interesting and important discussions. That is not the case, however, as Young and Nathanson are on the record as highly critical of gender feminism, and have openly expressed concerns about the effects of cultural and academic misandry. Their upcoming presentation is now set against the backdrop of violence, obstruction, masked protest and attempts to suppress free speech that are the ongoing practice of certain elements at the University of Toronto. Anyone who would critique the current paradigm of anti-male hostility is indeed subjected to that hostility on a heightened level. We discovered that with Dr. Warren Farrell as attendees were harassed and bullied, as promotional signs were vandalized and as doors were blocked to prevent access to his presentation on the Boy Crisis.

Subsequently, Dr. Janice Fiamengo, who was shocked and concerned about the events surrounding Dr. Farrell's lecture, elected to respond by coming to the University of Toronto and giving a presentation on the deleterious effect of gender feminism on academic integrity. Her talk was met with masked protestors, a fire alarm being pulled to disrupt events, and ideologues using the Q & A to launch diatribes rather than questioning the information presented by Dr. Fiamengo.

Overall, the conduct of protesters was significantly less strident for Dr. Fiamengo's lecture than it was for Dr. Farrell's. There are generally two reasons for that. One, a video made by Studio Brule clearly showing the outrageous and hateful nature of the protesters went viral, demonstrating to the world how toxic their beliefs have become. Additionally, it was the work of A Voice for Men to identify as many of the protesters who were engaged in illegal and assaultive action at the Farrell presentation as possible and present them to the world at large. This clearly had a quieting effect on them, as they became much more covert (pulling a fire alarm and wearing masks) and noticeably more docile. Similarly, the fact that AVFM sent a news team to the Fiamengo lecture to document and expose any form of illegal protest also undoubtedly kept them in check. But it appears the sting from all this has not set well with the more radical elements in their midst.

Common Cause, an Ontario based anarchist-communist organization is now calling for militant action against the MHRM, and they are pointing directly to the series of events at the University of Toronto. Or, as the following says on their website:

> We need to move towards reactivating a radical, militant feminist movement that can contend, not just with the backwards misogynists of the men's rights movement, but with the issues that continue to affect women everyday on their campuses, from systemic oppression in male-dominated fields to the high prevalence of sexual assaults, not by turning to the police or the University administration, but through a militant organized resistance.

The article from which this text was lifted featured images of the protesters at the Farrell lecture.

Whether this is a precursor to taking some kind of radical, illegal action at the upcoming talk by Nathanson and Young, or if it is just more hot air from the same kind of hotheaded bullies at the UTSU that were put on a leash with relatively little effort can't be discerned at this time.

What I can tell you is that AVFM will have a live news presence at the University of Toronto on April 4, prepared to document what happens. As always, those engaged in peaceful, legal protest will be respected. Those that cross the line will be, if at all possible, identified, exposed and reported to authorities.

We will no longer tolerate the actions of ideological thugs at any event that addresses the concerns of men and boys, and indeed all human beings.

Shivers – and justice – remanded by Judge Kathryn Solorzano

March 30, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

In what is now a very unsurprising, even routine miscarriage of justice, Francis "Coyote" Shivers was taken into custody yesterday on the orders of Los Angeles Superior Court Judge Kathryn Solorzano. For those who are unfamiliar with this story, Shivers' sudden incarceration stems from his high conflict divorce from actress Pauley Perrette, and a litany of questionable, possibly criminal actions on her part which now appear to be sanctioned and enabled from the bench of Judge Solorzano.

Different perspectives on the case have now been published here from myself, Suzanne McCarley and Dr. Tara Palmatier. Much of the evidence presented on this site documents that in the minds and experience of people who know Perrette intimately, she is a serial false accuser with an in depth knowledge of the use of restraining orders as a legal bludgeon against individuals who anger or disappoint her.

It appears that the arrest of Francis Shivers is another success story in her illicit use of such legal instruments.

In anticipation of yesterday's hearing in Los Angeles, A Voice for Men, along with the National Coalition for Men, enlisted the services of Michael Conzachi, a licensed private investigator and 28 year veteran law enforcement officer and police investigator in Southern California.

Conzachi attended the hearing at which Shivers was remanded and raised several areas of concern, particularly with court events which were inconsistent with his extensive experience with California legal proceedings. All this is detailed in his report.

Report to AVFM/NCFM

Conzachi Resumé

Aside from Conzachi's reservations as stated in the report, AVFM has another overarching concern, particularly in regard to Judge Kathryn Solorzano's conduct.

Francis Shivers essentially had his probation revoked and was remanded into custody because of a Facebook post identifying Pauley Perrette as his "stalker" or "false accuser." The claimed concern of the court is that such public statements might incite someone to take unilateral, vigilante actions against Perrette.

On the surface those concerns might seem reasonable enough.

The real effects of the decisions of Judge Kathryn Solorzano are more far reaching.

As the articles from AVFM were entered into evidence, or at least mentioned to Judge Kathryn Solorzano, the court has sufficient reason to be equally concerned that such incitement is a two way street, and that Pauley Perrette has a string of allegations against her from credible sources alleging that her conduct in publicly persecuting Francis Shivers makes the Facebook post look like a mild joke in comparison.

Our sources and court documents indicate that Perrette has engaged in a lengthy public campaign to portray Francis Shivers as an abuser, rapist, stalker and false accuser; that he is a borderline psychotic emotional and physical terrorist out to ruin her life. She has publicized these unproven accusations about Shivers, not on a Facebook post, but in national media using her status as a celebrity to draw attention to her alleged struggles. We also have sources that confirm that Shivers has received a high volume of threatening and hostile communications, assumedly from some of Perrette's many fans as a result of her campaign.

Yet there is no court order preventing her from doing any of this, and clearly no concern from the court about it.

Whether this is a product of Mr. Shivers having poor representation in court, a court bias based on Perrette's sex and celebrity status, or Shivers' previous reluctance to avail himself to protective measures that would have shielded him from these actions is not known. It could likely be a combination of all three.

What we do know is that money, fame and power tend to go hand in hand with favorable court rulings, especially when the law and the system already function on biased based on sex alone.

Francis Shivers, regardless of the evidence and facts in this case, had every strike against him imaginable before the gavel ever hit the wood. He was ordered to wear a gag while his ex-wife was handed a megaphone and a baseball bat.

A simple Facebook post, which Shivers' wife testified under oath that he did not even make (she did), was enough to bring the wrath of the kourt down on him in a fury.

Francis Shivers never had a chance. Neither did the long dead idea of free speech.

List of feminist MEPs

March 30, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

At the beginning of March, we urged the readers of AVfM and generally people that are sympathetic to the goals of the MRM to write e-mails to the Members of the European Parliament (MEPs) and urge them to reject the report on "eliminating gender stereotypes in the EU"[1]. We even wrote a letter to the European Parliament[2] and reminded them that individual freedom matters more than the feminist ideology.
However, after the vote, we were forced to conclude that most MEPs couldn't care less[3].
But not all MEPs are like that! Well, not all of them, just 75% of them. In the same day in which that infamous report was voted on, there were 10 other resolutions subjected to debate and voting. Two other of them were "Situation of women in North Africa" and "Impact of the economic crisis on gender equality and women's rights." Three feminist resolutions in the same day!
Somehow, the European Parliament "forgot" to publicize the voting list for the report on "eliminating gender stereotypes in the EU" but Votewatch.eu[4] took care to publicize the results of the other two resolutions and, the most telling, the list on impact of the economic crisis on gender equality and women's rights. Those who voted in favor of this resolution are the same that voted in favor of other feminist resolutions in this European legislature.
After a one week work of three MRAs (myself included), we are proud to publicize the list of feminist MEPs, by country and European political party. There are 495 MEPs who are definitely not only feminists, but people that loath individual freedom and responsibility and people who consider, amongst other things, that it is the job of the Eurocracy to pick winners and losers and as long as the losers are male, everything is fine.
The list is long and, if you can't go through the entire thing and you live and vote in the European Union, we would advise you to use CTRL+F and go straight to the country you are interested in.
The European Parliament has a few groups. These groups are: ALDE (liberal-leftists), S&D (socialists), ECR (right-wing conservatives), EFD (eurosceptics), EPP (Christian-democrats – centrists), GUE-NGL (The United Left – hardcore Marxists), GFA (Green Leftists) and the Independents.
So, let's see who the femmies are!

1. Austria

Socialists: Karin Kandebach, Jörg Leichtfried, Evelyn Regner, Josef Weidenholzer.
ALDE: Angelika Werthmann
EPP: Heinz Becker, Othmar Karas, Elisabeth Köstinger, Hubert Priker, Richard Seeber
Green-Left: Eva Lichtenberger, Ulrike Lunacek
Independets: Martin Ehrenhauser, Hans-Peter Martin

2. Belgium

ALDE: Philippe de Backer, Louis Michel, Annemie Neyts-Utyttebroeck, Frédérique Ries,

Guy Verhofstadt
EPP: Ivo Belet, Anne Delvaux, Mathieu Grosch, Marianne Thyssen
Green-Left: Isabelle Durant, Philippe Lamberts, Bart Staes
Socialists: Frédéric Daerden, Véronique de Keyser, Saïd el Khadraoui, Marc Tarabella, Kathleen van Brempt.

3. Bulgaria

Socialists: Ivailo Kalfin, Evgeni Kirilov, Kristian Vigenin
EPP: Mariya Gabriel, Andrey Kovatchev, Svetoslav Hristov Malinov, Vladimir Urutchev
ALDE: Stanimir Ilchev, Metin Kazak, Vladko Todorov Panayotov

4. Cyprus

Socialists: Antigoni Papadopoulou, Sophocles Sophocleus
EPP: Andreas Pitsillides
Note: the other 3 Cypriot MEPs have voted Abstained, including one from EPP (which means she disobeyed the feminist party line)

5. Czech Republic

Socialists: Zuzana BRZOBOHATÁ, Robert DUŠEK, Richard FALBR, Pavel Poc, Libor ROUČEK, Olga SEHNALOVÁ
EPP: Zuzana ROITHOVÁ
Note: All the other Czech MEPs have either abstained or voted against feminist establishment, particularly because Czech Republic is extremely well represented in the conservative group and Jan BŘEZINA from EPP constantly disobeys his party when it comes to feminist-oriented topics.

6. Denmark

Green Left: Margrete Auken, Emilie Turunen
Socialists: Ole Christensen, Dan Jørgensen, Christel Schaldemose, Britta Thomsen
Note: Danish ALDE MEPs seem to constantly reject feminist-oriented topics, just like the Danish EPP MEP, Bendt Bendtsen.

7. Estonia

Green Left: Indrek Tarand
Socialists: Ivari Padar
ALDE: Vilja Savisaar-Toomast, Siiri Oviir, Kristiina Ojuland
Note: Tunne Kelam (EPP) usually dissents from the feminist party line and abstains from voting on these issues.

8. Finland

EPP: Sari Essayah, Sirpa Pietikäinen, Petri Sarvamaa
Socialists: Mitro Repo
ALDE: Nils Torvalds
Green Left: Satu Hassi

9. France

France has 74 MEPs. 60 of them are outright feminist and we suspect that at least 6 more are also sympathetic to the Marxism-Feminism ideology, though they tend to be absent from most meetings and, consequently, it’s hard to determine their position beyond all doubt. So, the French MEPs who are definitely feminists are as follows:

ALDE: Nathalie Griesbeck, Corinne Lepage, Robert ROCHEFORT, Marielle de Sarnez
EPP: Sophie AUCONIE, Jean-Pierre AUDY, Nora BERRA, Philippe BOULLAND, Alain CADEC, Jean-Marie CAVADA, Arnaud DANJEAN, Michel DANTIN, Rachida DATI, Joseph DAUL, Gaston FRANCO, Marielle GALLO, Jean-Paul GAUZÈS, Françoise GROSSETÊTE, Philippe JUVIN, Alain LAMASSOURE, Agnès LE BRUN, Constance LE GRIP, Véronique MATHIEU HOUILLON, Elisabeth MORIN-CHARTIER, Maurice PONGA, Franck PROUST, Dominique RIQUET, Jean ROATTA, Marie-Thérèse SANCHEZ-SCHMID, Tokia SAÏFI, Michèle STRIFFLER, Dominique VLASTO
United Left: Younous Omarjee
Green Left: François Alfonsi, Malika BENARAB-ATTOU, Jean-Paul BESSET, Jean-Jacob BICEP, José BOVÉ, Sandrine BÉLIER, Daniel COHN-BENDIT, Karima DELLI, Hélène FLAUTRE, Catherine GRÈZE, Yannick Jadot, Nicole KIIL-NIELSEN, Michèle RIVASI, Karim ZÉRIBI
Socialists: Eric ANDRIEU, Pervenche BERÈS, Françoise CASTEX, Jean Louis COTTIGNY, Harlem DÉSIR, Sylvie GUILLAUME, Liem HOANG NGOC, Gilles PARGNEAUX, Isabelle THOMAS, Patrice TIROLIEN, Catherine TRAUTMANN, Bernadette VERGNAUD, Henri WEBER

10. Germany

Only 5 German MEPs are known to constantly oppose feminist-oriented issues and, surprisingly enough, they come from EPP (Viviane Reding's party) and ALDE. The list of German feminist MEPs is also lengthy, like the French one and it goes like this:
ALDE: Nadja Hirsch, Silvana Koch-Mehrin, Alexander Graf Lambsdorff, Michael Theurer
EPP: Burkhard Balz, Elmar Brok, Birgit Collin-Langen, Albert Dess, Christian Ehler, Karl-Heinz Florenz, Michael Gahler, Ingeborg GRÄSSLE, Peter Jahr, Elisabeth JEGGLE, Martin KASTLER, Christa KLASS, Dieter-Lebrecht KOCH, Werner Kuhn, Werner LANGEN, Peter Liese, Thomas MANN, Hans-Peter MAYER, Doris Pack, Hans-Gert PÖTTERING, Horst Schnellhardt, Birgit Schnieber-Jastram, Renate Sommer, Thomas Ulmer, Sabine Verheyen, Axel Voss
Green Left: Jan Philipp Albrecht, Sven Giegold, Rebecca Harms, Gerald HÄFNER, Martin HÄUSLING, Franziska Keller, Barbara Lochbihler, Heide RÜHLE, Elisabeth Schroedter, Werner Schultz, Helga TRÜPEL
Socialists: Udo Bullmann, Ismail Ertug, Knut Fleckenstein, Evelyne Gebhardt, Jens Geier, Norbert Glante, Matthias Groote, Jutta Haug, Petra Kammerevert, Constanze Angela Krehl, Wolfgang KREISSL-DÖRFLER, Bernd Lange, Jo Leinen, Norbert Neuser, Bernhard Rapkay, Ulrike RODUST, Dagmar ROTH-BEHRENDT, Peter SIMON, Birgit SIPPEL, Jutta STEINRUCK, Barbara WEILER

11. Greece

Socialists: Kriton Arsenis, Spyros Danellis, Dimitrios Droutsas, Maria Eleni Koppa, Chrysoula Paliadeli, Anni Podimata, Sylvana Rapti, Georgios Stavarakis
Green Left: Nikos Chrysogelos
EPP: Marietta Giannakou, Georgios Koumoutsakos, Rodi Kratsa-Tsagaropoulou, Georgios Papanikolaou, Georgios Papastamkos
ALDE: Theodoros Skylakakis
Greek MEPs also offer a negative surprise: Two Greek MEPs from the right-wing eurosceptic group EFD are usually dissenting the party line and vote in favor of feminist resolutions. These disappointing MEPs are Nikolaos Salavrakos and Niki Tzavela.

12. Hungary

EPP: Zoltán Bagó, Erik Bánki, Tamás Deutsch, Béla Glattfelder, András Gyürk, Kinga Gál, Ildikó Gáll-Pelcz, Ágnes Hankiss, Lívia Járóka, Ádám Kósa, György Schöpflin, László Surján, József Szájer, Csaba Őry

Socialists: Zita Gurmai, Kinga Göncz, Edit Herczog, Csaba Sándor Tabajdi

Hungary also has an independent feminist MEP: Csanád Szegedi

13. Ireland

ALDE: Liam Aylward, Pat the Cope Gallagher, Marian Harkin

EPP: Jim Higgins, Seán Kelly, Mairead McGuinness, Gay Mitchell

Socialists: Nessa Childers, Emer Costello, Phil Prendergast

14. Italy

Socialists: Pino Arlacchi, Francesca Barracciu, Luigi Berlinguer, Salvatore Caronna, Sergio Gaetano Cofferati, Silvia Costa, Andrea Cozzolino, Paolo de Castro, Leonardo Domenici, Roberto Gualtieri, Vincenzo Iovine, Guido Milana, Pier Antonio Panzeri, Mario Pirillo, Gianni Pittella, Vittorio Prodi, Debora Serracchiani, Patrizia Toia

EPP: Roberta Angelilli, Antonello Antinoro, Alfredo Antoniozzi, Raffaele Baldassarre, Paolo Bartolozzi, Sergio Berlato, Vito Bonsignore, Antonio CANCIAN, Carlo CASINI, Lara Comi, Herbert Dorfmann, Giuseppe GARGANI, Salvatore IACOLINO, Giovanni LA VIA, Barbara MATERA, Erminia MAZZONI, Tiziano MOTTI, Alfredo PALLONE, Aldo PATRICIELLO, Crescenzio RIVELLINI, Licia RONZULLI, Potito Salatto, Amalia Sartori, Marco Scurria, Sergio Paolo Francesco Sivestris, Salvatore Tatarella, Gino Trematerra, Iva Zanicchi.

ALDE: Niccolò Rinaldi, Giommaria Uggias, Gianni Vattimo, Andrea Zanoni

Just like Greece, Italy also provides a negative surprise and these surprises are called Cristiana Muscardini (ECR) and Magdi-Cristiano Allam (EFD) who, despite being in an overtly non-feminist group, they dissent from the group’s position and vote in favor of feminist resolutions.

15. Latvia

ALDE: Ivars Godmanis

EPP: Sandra Kalniete, Krišjānis KARIŅŠ, Kārlis ŠADURSKIS

Green Left: Tatjana ŽDANOKA

Socialists: Alexander Mirsky

16. Lithuania

Socialists: Zigmantas BALČYTIS, Vilija BLINKEVIČIŪTĖ

EPP: Algirdas Saudargas, Radvilė MORKŪNAITĖ-MIKULĖNIENĖ

ALDE: Justina Vitkauskaite, Leonidas Donskis

Lithuania joins Italy and Greece in the negative surprises and the surprises are called Rolandas Paksas and Juozas Imbrasas, both from the eurosceptics’ group. Apparently, they’re eurosceptics until it comes to the Union to forcibly choose women over men.

17. Luxembourg

ALDE: Charles Goerens

EPP: Georges Bach

Green Left: Claude Turmes

18. Malta

Malta is a special case. Malta has 4 MEPs, all of them in the Socialist group, who rarely come to meetings (but cash in their paychecks paid by the taxpayers).

Edward Scicluna is the only one that voted in one of the resolutions included in our study to determine feminist MEPs and he voted in favor of it. The other three did not vote in the European Parliament for more than a year so their position on feminism could not be determined, though it can be guessed considering that no Socialist MEP ever voted against a feminist proposal.

19. The Netherlands

Socialists: Judith A. Merkies, Emine Bozkurt, Thijs Berman

Green Left: Judith Sargentini, Bas Eickhout, Marije Cornelissen

EPP: Corien Wortmann-Kool, Ria Oomen-Ruijten, Lambert van Nistelrooij, Esther de Lange, Wim van de Camp

ALDE: Sophia in ‘t Veld, Marietje Schaake, Gerben-Jan Gerbandy

United Left: Katinka Tamara Liotard (the one who made the report voted on March 12)

20. Poland

Socialists: Janusz Władysław Zemke, Marek Siwiec, Joanna Senyszyn, Wojciech Michał Olejniczak, Bogusław Liberadzki, Adam Gierek, Lidia Joanna Geringer de Oedenberg

EPP: Elżbieta Katarzyna Łukacijewska, Tadeusz Zwiefka, Jarosław Leszek WAŁĘSA, Rafał Trzaskowski, Bogusław Sonik, Joanna Katarzyna Skrzydlewska, Jacek Saryusz-Wolski, Jacek Protasiewicz, Jan Olbrycht, Bogdan Kazimierz Marcinkiewicz, Krzysztof Lisek, Jan KOZŁOWSKI, Lena KOLARSKA-BOBIŃSKA, Jarosław Kalinowski, Filip Kaczmarek, Sidonia Elżbieta JĘDRZEJEWSKA, Danuta Maria Hübner, Jolanta Emilia Hibner, Małgorzata Handzlik, Jerzy Buzek, Arkadiusz Tomasz Bratkowski, Piotr Borys

21. Portugal

Socialists: Vital Moreira, Ana Gomes, Elisa Ferreira, Edite Estrela, António Fernando Correia de Campos, Luis Manuel Capoulas Santos, Luís Paulo Alves

EPP: Maria do Céu PATRÃO NEVES, Nuno Melo, José Manuel Fernandes, Diogo Feio, Mário David, Carlos Celho, Maria Da Graça Carvalho, Regina Bastos

Green Left: Rui Tavares

22. Romania

ALDE: Renate Weber, Adina-Ioana Vălean, Norica Nicolai (member in the committe that drafts most if not all feminist legislation), Ramona Nicole Mănescu, Cristian Silviu Buşoi.

EPP: Iuliu Winkler, László Tőkés, Csaba Sógor, Theodor Dumitru Stolojan, Cristian Preda, Rareș Niculescu, Iosif Matula, Marian-Jean Marinescu, Elena Băsescu, Sebastian Bodu, Elena Oana Antonescu

Socialists: Claudiu Tănăsescu, Daciana Sârbu, Ioan Mircea Paşcu, Ioan Enciu, Viorica Dăncilă, George Cutaș, Corina Crețu, Minodora Cliveti, Victor Boștinaru.

Romania also has two independent feminist MEPs and these are Adrian Severin and Dan Dumitru Zamfirescu.

Romania, just like Lithuania, Italy, Ireland, Greece, Estonia, Cyprus, Slovakia and Slovenia, has NO MEP that ever voted against a feminist resolution.

23. Slovakia
ALDE: Sergej Kozlik
EPP: Peter ŠŤASTNÝ, Anna ZÁBORSKÁ, Alajos Mészáros, Miroslav MIKOLÁŠIK, Eduard Kukan, Edit Bauer
Socialists: Boris Zala, Monika SMOLKOVÁ, Katarína NEVEĎALOVÁ, Vladimír MAŇKA, Monika FLAŠÍKOVÁ BEŇOVÁ
Note: Jaroslav PAŠKA (EFD) usually abstains from voting on feminist resolutions or votes against and it is the only Slovak MEP that an MRA can consider voting for.
24. Slovenia
All Slovenian MEPs are feminists. The list of Slovenian MEPs that usually vote in favor of feminist resolutions is the same with the list of Slovenian MEPs. They do not skip meetings and never forget to vote in favor of feminist resolutions. These are the people that no Slovenian MRA should ever vote for:
ALDE: Ivo Vajgl, Jelko Kacin
EPP: Milan Zver, Alojz Peterle, Romana Jordan, Zofija Mazej KUKOVIČ
Socialists: Tanja Fajon, Mojca Kleva KEKUŠ
25. Spain
Spain is also a country with a lot of MEPs and almost all of them are feminists. Except Jaime Oreja (EPP), who is clearly a non-feminist, all the other Spanish MEPs are either overt feminists or play a kitty-cat game of „indecision" by either abstaining from vote or voting in favor of feminist resolutions and then subsequently issuing statements that they intended to vote against. These kinds of people will also be included in the list. And it goes like this:
United Left: Willy Meyer
ALDE: Izaskun Bilbao Barandica, Ramon Tremosa i Balcells
EPP: Pablo ECHEVERRÍA, Pilar Ayuso, Pilar del Castillo Vera, María Auxiliadora Correa Zamora, Agustín DÍAZ DE MERA GARCÍA CONSUEGRA, Rosa ESTARÀS Ferragut, Santiago Fisas Ayxela, Carmen Fraga ESTÉVEZ, Luis de Grandes Pascual, Cristina GUTIÉRREZ-CORTINES, Esther HERRANZ GARCÍA, Carlos José ITURGAIZ ANGULO, Teresa JIMÉNEZ-BECERRIL BARRIO, Verónica LOPE FONTAGNÉ, Gabriel Mato Adrover, Francisco José MILLÁN MON, Juan Andrés Naranjo Escobar, Eva Ortiz Vilella, José Ignacio Salafranca SÁNCHEZ-NEYRA, Salvador SEDÓ i ALABART, Alejo Vidal-Quadras.
Green Left: Ana Miranda, Raül Romeva i Rueda
Socialists: Josefa ANDRÉS BAREA, Inés Ayala Sender, Maria Badia i Cutchet, Alejandro Cercas, Ricardo CORTÉS LASTRA, Vicente Miguel GARCÉS RAMÓN, Iratxe GARCÍA PÉREZ, Dolores GARCÍA-HIERRO CARABALLO, Eider GARDIAZÁBAL RUBIAL, Enrique Guerrero Salom, María IRIGOYEN PÉREZ, Juan Fernando LÓPEZ AGUILAR, Miguel Angel MARTÍNEZ MARTÍNEZ, Emilio MENÉNDEZ del VALLE, María MUÑIZ DE URQUIZA, Raimon Obiols, Andrés PERELLÓ RODRÍGUEZ, Teresa Riera Madurell, Carmen Romero LÓPEZ, Antolín SÁNCHEZ PRESEDO, Luis YÁÑEZ-BARNUEVO GARCÍA
Spain also has an independent feminist MEP and his name is Francisco Sosa Wagner.
26. Sweden
Sweden is also a special case. Unlike all the other countries, Swedish MEPs affiliated with EPP (all 5 of them) are not feminists, whilst the so-called anti-system Swedish MEPs (like Christian Engström from the Pirate Party) are feminists. And the list for Sweden goes like this:

United Left: Mikael Gustafsson
Green Left: Amelia Anderdotter, Christian Engström, Isabella Lövin (the one that replied completely offtopic to the AVfM letter) and Carl Schlyter
ALDE: Kent Johansson, Cecilia Winkström
Socialists: Göran Färm, Anna Hedh, Olle Ludvigsson, Jens Nilsson, Marita Ulvskog, Åsa Westlund.

27. United Kingdom

The UK has MEPs that behave on this topic in Strasbourg exactly the opposite in comparison with the politicians in the UK. All independent UK MEPs are non-feminists, just like all the UK MEPs affiliated with the right-wing conservative group (ECR) and the ones affiliated with the eurosceptics lead by Nigel Farage (EFD). Moreover, five out of the 12 British ALDE MEPs are also non-feminists and even the British MEP affiliated with the United Left is rather reluctant to vote in favor of feminist resolutions. So despite having many MEPs, the list with UK feminist MEPs is rather short:
Socialists: Michael Cashman, Mary Honeyball, Richard Howitt, Stephen Hughes, David Martin, Linda McAvan, Arlene McCarthy, Claude Moraes, Brian Simpson, Peter Skinner, Catherine Stihler, Derek Vaughan, Glenis Willmott
ALDE: Sharon Bowles, Baroness Sarah Ludford, George Lyon, Edward McMillan-Scott, Bill Newton Dunn, Rebecca Taylor, Sir Graham Watson
Green Left: Jill Evans, Ian Hudghton, Jean Lambert, Alyn Smith, Keith Taylor
There are 754 people in the European Parliament. Roughly 50 of them are rarely coming to the sessions and some of them never came to any vote since they have been elected. There is also a group of 40-50 MEPs who simply refuse to vote on certain issues (including feminism). However, these 495 MEPs whom we listed here are definitely politicians that will anytime vote out individual men's rights in favor of Statist control and pandering to gender ideologues such as Katinka Liotard or Viviane Reding.
In theory, EPP and S&D are totally opposing parties – just like the Green Left and ALDE. But, as you can see, when it comes to the ideology of hate generally known as feminism, the opposition no longer exists and the only real opposition comes from groups like EFD (UKIP) and ECR, groups that are considered "fringe" or "hate groups" by the current European Marxist-Feminist establishment.
If you considered voting a politician from this list of 495 names, please think again. Any of these people would vote out your freedom as a man in favor of party interests and gender ideology.
In May 2014, there will be the next European Elections. This article is not meant to tell readers who to vote for, but who to avoid voting for.
Moreover, some of these 495 people might run for national parliaments or other national positions. Keep them in mind and avoid voting for them!
Politicians want votes and as long as they can get away with voting totalitarian feminist legislation, they will not care. Let's hold them accountable!

European elections usually have a low turnout, which means that if all the European readers of this website go to the ballot box and vote against a feminist politician, the results can be heavily modified.
In Spain, the population made feminism to be politically incorrect and politically dangerous for politicians. Let's make the Spanish model available for the whole EU!
[1] http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/government-tyranny/european-union-to-ban-pornography-then-men/
[2] http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/to-the-european-parliament/
[3] http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/feminist-governance-feminism/most-meps-couldnt-care-less/
[4] http://www.votewatch.eu/en/impact-of-the-economic-crisis-on-gender-equality-and-women-s-rights-motion-for-a-resolution-vote-res.html

The rise of chivalric love

March 30, 2013 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Love and war have always been opposed, as we see in our usual phrase 'make love not war' or in the rhetoric of pro and anti-war camps. That the two are mutually exclusive is obvious enough. However, in twelfth century Europe something peculiar happened that ushered in a melding of these two contrary principles. Here the military code of chivalry was mated with the fancies of courtly love to produce a bastard child which we will here call chivalric love (today we simply label it 'chivalry'). Prior to this time chivalry always referred to the military code of behaviour –one that varied from country to country– but one which had absolutely nothing to do with romantic love.

What method did twelfth century society use to bring this about? In a word, shaming.

The medieval aristocracy began to ramp up the practice of shaming by choosing the worst behaviours of the most unruly males and extrapolating those behaviours to the entire gender. Sound familiar? Knights were particularly singled out –much like today's sporting heroes who display some kind of faux pas– to be used as examples of bad male behaviour requiring the remedy of sweeping cultural reform.

During this time of (supposedly) unruly males, uneducated squires were said to ride mangy horses into mess halls, and rude young men diverted eyes from psalters in the very midst of mass. Among the knights and in the atmosphere of tournaments occasional brawls with grisly incidents occurred – a cracked skull, a gouged eye – as the betting progressed and the dice flew. Male attention to clothing and fashion was said to be appalling, with men happy to go about in sheep and fox skins instead of clothes fashioned of rich and precious stuffs, in colours to better suit them in the company of ladies. And perhaps worst of all were their lack of refinement and manners toward women which was considered offensive.

How and by whom was this unruly gender going to be reformed? One of the first solutions was posed by a French Countess named Marie. According to historian Amy Kelly, with her male reforming ideas;

> "Marie organized the rabble of soldiers, fighting-cocks, jousters, springers, riding masters, troubadours, Poitevin nobles and debutantes, young chatelaines, adolescent princes, and infant princesses in the great hall of Poitiers. Of this pandemonium the countess fashioned a seemly and elegant society, the fame of which spread to the world. Here was a woman's assize to draw men from the excitements of the tilt and the hunt, from dice and games, to feminine society, an assize to outlaw boorishness and compel the tribute of adulation to female majesty."[1]

Countess Marie was one among a long line of reformers to help usher in a gynocentrism whose aim was to convince men of their shared flaws –essentially to shame them- and to prescribe romantic love and concomitant worship of females as the remedy. Via this program romantic love was welded onto the military code and introduced as a way to tame men's rowdiness and brutality, something today's traditionalists agree with in their call for men to adhere to these same male roles established first in medieval Europe. One of today's authorities on this period describes the training of knights in her observation, "The rise of courtly love and its intersection with chivalry in the West are both events of the twelfth century. The idea that love is ennobling and necessary for the education of a knight comes out of the lyrics of this period, but also in the romances of knighthood. Here the truest lovers are now the best knights."[2]

With romantic love firmly established within the chivalric code we begin to see the romantic behaviours of soldiers so familiar to us today; going to fight and die for his Lady, love letters from the front lines, a crumpled photo of his sweetheart in a uniform pocket. Rather than for man, king and country it is his love for "her" that now drives a man's military sacrifice. This is also the reason why today's movies portraying warzones and carnage always include a hero and his Lady/Damsel pausing for a passionate tongue kiss while the bombs explode around them, as if to suggest that all this carnage is for the sake of her and romantic love. Once accepted into the chivalric canon various love "rules" were enforced with military might –by white knights as we call them- and the resulting culture has been unstoppable. To try and stop it brings the wrath of all those white knights who will bury your ass into the ground for breaking this new military "goal" of romantic love.

Prior to the Middle Ages romantic love was usually considered with suspicion and even viewed as a sign of mental instability requiring removal from the source of trouble and perhaps a medical solution. In the context of universally arranged marriages, romantic love, if it was indulged at all, was done so in a discreet and often underground way without the sanction of polite society. This was the situation worldwide until the advent of the European revolution.

The cult of chivalric love took root first among the aristocratic classes and soon after reached the common classes through literature and storytelling. Romance literature in particular. Having germinated initially in Germany and France in the twelfth centuries, the cult spread on the wings of a burgeoning book production industry that would bring the gynocentric revolution to the entire European continent.

When one considers the subjects in these books – Gawain and Guinevere, Tristan and Isolde, heroic male deeds for women, love scandals, courtship, upper-class weddings, adultery, and status – we are reminded immediately of today's women's magazines that spill out of the magazine racks of shops and waiting rooms.

Women's magazines and the omnipresent romance novel –and women's gluttony for them- can be traced back to this early period in which the term romance was actually coined. According to Jennifer Wollock, a professor of Literature at Texas University, such literature had a substantial female readership along with mothers reading to their daughters. Wollock states that the continuing popularity of chivalric love stories is also confirmed by the provenance of romance manuscripts and contents of women's libraries of the late Middle Ages.[2]

The three behaviors of chivalric love-code

Keeping with the male side of the equation, the main behaviors prescribed by the code of chivalric love are the doing of romantic deeds, gallantry and vassalage.

Prior to its redeployment in romantic relationships gallantry referred to any courageous behaviour, especially in battle. The word can still mean that. However, under the rules of chivalric love it became, according to the Google dictionary definition, "Polite attention or respect given by men to women." Can these two definitions of gallantry be any further apart? Like the contraries of military chivalry vs. chivalric love, these two definitions of gallantry stretch the definition to cover two completely different domains of behaviour. It appears then that women of the time successfully harnessed men's greatest sacrificial behaviours –chivalry and gallantry- to indulge their narcissistic appetites.

A vassal is defined as a bondman, a slave, a subordinate or dependent, or a person who entered into a mutual obligation to a lord or monarch in the context of the feudal system in medieval Europe. The obligations often included military support and mutual protection in exchange for certain privileges, usually including the grant of land held as a fiefdom. Vassalage was then utilized as a conceit that Maurice Valency called "the shaping principle of the whole design of courtly love."[3] Whether it was a knight, troubadour, or commoner the vassal-to-woman routine was the order of the day then, exactly as it is today.[4] Poets adopted the terminology of feudalism, declaring themselves the vassal of the lady and addressing her as midons (my lord), which was taken as standard flattery of a woman. One particularly striking practice showing an adaption from the feudal model involved the man kneeling on one knee before the woman. By kneeling down in this way he assumes the posture of a vassal. He speaks, pledging his faith, promising, like a liege man, not to offer his services to anyone else. He goes even further: in the manner of a serf, he makes her a gift of his entire person.

Citing evidence of vassalism Amy Kelly writes, "As symbolized on shields and other illustrations that place the knight in the ritual attitude of commendation, kneeling before his lady with his hands folded between hers, homage signified male service, not domination or subordination of the lady, and it signified fidelity, constancy in that service."[5]

In short it was the lover's feudal relationship between vassal and overlord which provided the lover with a model for his humble and servile conduct.[2]

———

The lead actors – then and now

Imagine twelfth century Europe as a great stage performance enacting the themes of chivalric love, one that would become so popular its actors would continue to serve as role models for the global population 800 years later. The lead actors in this medieval play are as follows, accompanied (in brackets) with the titles we apply to those same actors today as they continue this ancient drama:

Courtly Ladies (= Feminists). Feminists today refer to courtly ladies of the late Middle Ages as the first feminists, or protofeminists, and as with modern feminists these women enjoyed considerable privilege and means. In the 12th – 14th centuries evidence shows that women began to agitate for increased authority over the 'correct' way for men and women to conduct relationships, with particular emphasis on what they felt were acceptable roles for males in a dignified and civil society. Not surprisingly this was precisely the time when powerful women were able to establish the female-headed 'courts of love' which acted in a comparable way to today's Family Courts in that both arbitrated love disputes between conflicting couples.

Key literature from the period detailing proper etiquette expected in gender relations was commissioned for writing by powerful women (eg. 'The Art of Courtly love') and in some cases was written by women themselves (eg. Christine de Pizan's writings or those of Marie de France). The emerging discourse acted like a drug that promised the introduction of a one-sided power for females over males, and through the dissemination of romance literature that promise rapidly spread to all social classes in the continent. We have been living with the consequences ever since, a revolution far more significant to the history gender relations than the introduction of the birth control pill and no-fault divorce combined- the latter being mere epiphenomena generated within a larger culture of chivalric love.

The archetypes introduced into society by these high-born ladies are instantly recognizable; the damsel in distress (women as innocent, woman as helpless, women as victim), the princess (women as beautiful, women as narcissistic subject requiring devotion, women as deserving of special privileges), and the high born Ladies (women as morally pure, women as precious, women as superior, women as entitled). These illusions ensured that the attentions of men would be spent attending to women, a program so successful that modern feminists continue to shape today's cultural landscape with the program of their protofeminists forebears. And just like their forebears, feminists continue to use shaming narratives to facilitate their pedestalizing inheritance.

White Knights (= White Knights). We retain this metaphor for such heroic individuals, men who are gallant in so many ways, but mostly the wrong ways such as showing-off to undeserving women and concomitantly delighting in competing with and hurting other men. More than any other player in this play, white knights specialize in gallant behaviour for the purpose of impressing and ultimately getting their egos stroked by women.

For these first white knights the tournament, the forerunner to modern sporting tournaments, consisted of chivalrous competitions or fights in the Middle Ages. In these fights knights were only too willing to hurt their fellow men to win the praise of female spectators. The competitors were observed doing battle by women who would throw their garments into the arena where the sportsmen would pick them up and wear pieces of women's clothes -hence the male wearing a particular woman's scarf would represent her in the tournament.

The men were basically fighting for "her" then, just as they did elsewhere on real battlefields for wife and mother. The gallant man who won his tournament was granted an opportunity to dally with the woman whom he represented in the ring. We retain this gynocentric tradition today as golf tournaments, football tournaments, martial arts tournaments and so on, all designed to show male prowess where the winning competitors get to dally with the best ladies.

Other activities of white knights include impressing women with big gestures of protection. For example, the 'Enterprise of the Green Shield with the White Lady' was a chivalric order founded by Jean Le Maingre and twelve knights in 1399 committing themselves to the protection of women. Inspired by the ideal of courtly love, the stated purpose of the order was to guard and defend the honour, estate, goods, reputation, fame and praise of all ladies and damsels, an undertaking that earned the praise of Christine de Pizan. Le Maingre, tired of receiving complaints from ladies, maidens, and widows claiming to be oppressed by powerful men bent on depriving them of the lands and honours, and finding no knight or squire willing to defend their just cause, founded an order of twelve knights sworn to carry "a shield of gold enamelled with green and a white lady inside".

The twelve knights, after swearing this oath, affirmed a long letter explaining their purpose and disseminated it widely in France and beyond her borders. The letter explained that any lady young or old finding herself the victim of injustice could petition one or more or the knights for redress and that knight would respond promptly and leave whatever other task he was performing to fight the lady's oppressor personally. The similarities of this Order with contemporary enterprises such as the White Ribbon Campaign in which male "ambassadors" pledge an oath to all of womanhood to never condone, excuse or remain silent about violence against women, and to intervene and take action against any man accused of wrongdoing against a woman. The similarities in these gallant missions make clear that the lineage of white knights has progressed seamlessly into the modern era.

Troubadours I (= PUA and Game promoters). The troubadours' job was to spread the word about the virtues of chivalric love through music, song, poetry and storytelling. Aristocracy and commoner alike enjoyed hearing tales about bravery, and ladies were swept away with epic love poems as the troubadours practiced the rituals of chivalric love. Just like PUAs or Gamers today who write and speak in praise of pussy, troubadours too were composers and promoters of the 'arts of love' aimed at securing sexual fulfilment.

Like those troubadours, Roosh and Roissy (etc.) continue the tradition of prose-writing to illustrate the many ways to flatter women in order to get into their pants. Game is a very apt word for this 800 yr old tradition, with its proscription for rehearsed lines and lack of personal authenticity. It is a scripted game of women-worship aimed at a narrow goal. In essence this Casanova routine amounts to a feigning of chivalric love for the purposes of manipulation, usually to gain sex. When modern women call these men 'players' they may be very close to the mark. While Roosh et.al. outwardly claim to reject chivalry, they nevertheless embrace its tenets like consummate thespians.

Troubadours II (= Profeminist Men – sometimes derogatorily named 'manginas'). Unlike the troubadours mentioned above who advocated for a love aimed at sexual fulfillment, Troubadour II advocated a more idealized love of longing that did not consummate in sexual fulfillment. In essence these men more resembled sycophantic Romeos than horny Casanovas. The guiding concept for them was called "fin' amors," which meant pure love. Such men were particularly prevalent in the north of France, whereas in the south we see that troubadours (type I mentioned up above) celebrated a love that was adulterous or carnal in which full sexual encounters were sought.

Another thing that distinguished type II troubadours from the former is authenticity.

These men appeared to identify wholly with the role and were not merely players. The desire to serve women as their vassal, or perhaps as their masochistic slave, called upon their innermost character. Think of today's version being the typical profeminist men who work slavishly to pass on the message of their feminist superiors, much as these troubadours slaved to advocate the narcissistic idiosyncrasies of their Ladies. The vassalage role applies here more than with any other character of the Middle Ages – not as a merely pretentious means-to-an-end routine to gain sex, but rather as a soul-affirming act.

_____

Which brings us to what the MHRM refers to as gynocentrism. It is clear from the foregoing that unless evidence of (broadspread) gynocentric culture can be found prior to the Middle Ages, then gynocentrism is precisely 800 years old. In order to determine if this thesis is valid we need first to define exactly what we mean by "gynocentrism".

The term gynocentrism has been in circulation since the 1800's, as far as I can tell, with the general definition being "focused on women; concerned with only women."[6] Adam Kostakis further qualifies gynocentrism as, "male sacrifice for the benefit of women" and "the deference of men to women," and he concludes; "Gynocentrism, whether it went by the name honor, nobility, chivalry, or feminism, its essence has gone unchanged. It remains a peculiarly male duty to help the women onto the lifeboats, while the men themselves face a certain and icy death."[7]

From these definitions we see that gynocentrism could refer to any one female-centered practice in an otherwise androcentric society, or to even a single gynocentric act carried out by one individual. With this broad usage in mind the phrase 'gynocentric culture' proves more precise for the purposes of this essay , which phrase I will define here as any culture instituting rules for gender relationships that benefit females at the expense of males across a broad range of measures.

At the base of our current form of gynocentrism lies the practice of enforced male sacrifice for the benefit of women. If we accept this definition we need to look back and ask the accompanying question of whether male sacrifices throughout history were always made for the sake of women, or alternatively for the sake of some other primary goal? For instance, when men went to die in vast numbers in wars, was it for women, or was it rather for Man, King and Country? If the latter we cannot then claim that this was a result of some intentional gynocentric culture, at least not in the way I have defined it here. If the sacrifice isn't intended for the benefit women, even if women were occasional beneficiaries of male sacrifice, then we are not dealing with gynocentrism.

Male disposability strictly "for the benefit of women" comes in strongly only after the advent of the 12th century gender revolution in Europe – a revolution that delivered us terms like gallantry, chivalry, chivalric love, courtesy, romance and so on. From that period onward gynocentric practices grew exponentially, culminating in the demands of today's feminism. In sum, gynocentrism was a patchy phenomenon at best before the middle ages, after which it became ubiquitous.

With all this in mind it makes little sense to talk of gynocentric culture starting with the industrial revolution a mere 200 years ago (or 100 or even 30 yrs ago), or of it being two million years old as some would argue. We are not simply fighting two million years of genetic programming; our culturally constructed enemy is much, much simpler to pinpoint and to potentially reverse. The historical evidence is strong. All we need do now is look at the circumstances under which gynocentrism first began to flourish and attempt to reverse those circumstances. Specifically, if gynocentric culture was brought about by the practice of shaming, then that is the enemy to target in order to reverse the entire enterprise. For me that process could begin by rejecting the fake moral purity to which women of the last millennia have pretended and against which the worst examples of men have been measured in order to shame the entire gender.

References

1. Amy Kelly, 'Eleanor of Aquitaine and Her Courts of Love' Source: Speculum, Vol. 12, No. 1 (Published by Medieval Academy of America, 1937)
2. Jennifer G. Wollock, Rethinking Chivalry and Courtly Love, (Published by Praeger, 2011)
3. Maurice Valency, In Praise of Love: An Introduction to the Love Poetry of the Renaissance, (Macmillan, 1961)
4. For an excellent article about vassaldom today see Gordon Wadsworth's 'The Western Butler and his Manhood' which indicates an unbroken line between the romantic vassaldom of the Middle Ages and the "butler" role expected of males today. (Published on AVfM, 2013)
5. Amy Kelly, 'Did Women Have a Renaissance?' in Women, History, and Theory (Published by UCP Press, 1984)
6. Dictionary.com – Gynocentric
7. Adam Kostakis, Gynocentrism Theory – (Published online, 2011). Although Kostakis assumes gynocentrism has been around throughout recorded history, he singles out the Middle Ages for comment: "There is an enormous amount of continuity between the chivalric class code which arose in the Middle Ages and modern feminism… One could say that they are the same entity, which now exists in a more mature form – certainly, we are not dealing with two separate creatures."

PSA from AVFM News Europe

March 31, 2013 | by VFM News and Commentary | Link | Original Link

---

Narration: Manwomanmyth (http://www.youtube.com/user/manwomanmyth)
Music: The DDG Project
Editing: Lucian Vâlsan
AVFM Radio – The Voice of Europe –http://www.blogtalkradio.com/avoicefo…
On Fridays at 7PM GMT, 8PM CET and 9PM EET.

NC Coalition Against Domestic Violence and Men

March 31, 2013 | by Michael Sharron | Link | Original Link

In doing some research the other day, I happened across the NC Coalition Against Domestic Violence (NCCADV) website and discovered some information that while not surprising, needs to be available to men and women and their families in North Carolina. To learn more about what the NC Coalition Against Domestic Violence is NOT telling you: http://ncfathers.wordpress.com/2013/08/10/judy-chaet-operations-director-turns-her-back-on-some-violence/

If any of you have been reading my prior posts, much of the information in this one will be redundant. However, the main goal of this article will focused on putting the NC Coalition Against Domestic Violence and their staff at the top of the search engines where more North Carolina men and women and their families can learn how this organization seems more interested in gender and sexual politics than ending violence for everyone in NC. In what is literally a slap in the face to men, this coalition states the following about the causes of domestic violence on their website:

[quote style="boxed"]We believe that patriarchy, gender inequality, and all oppressions play a central role at the individual, institutional, and cultural levels in creating and maintaining an environment which accepts domestic violence. We believe it is vital to understand and advocate for the elimination of all forms of oppression, including, but not limited to: sexism, racism, and homophobia.

We believe it is critical to serve all domestic violence survivors, regardless of race, age, class and ethnic group, sexual orientation, gender identity, mental and physical abilities, religious and spiritual beliefs, and immigration status. We know oppression comes in all forms and leads to secondary issues for survivors; we will strive to serve all survivors of domestic violence and their respective needs.[/quote]

You read that right, the NC Coalition Against Domestic Violence places it's central reasoning for domestic violence in NC around patriarchy, gender inequality, and female oppression as the chief causes of domestic violence and places zero emphasis on stress, financial difficulty, substance abuse, marital conflict, or emotional/mental issues. Furthermore, the Coalition lists every single class of people on this planet who are survivors except men. This would indicate that they believe not one single man in NC has ever experienced being slapped, intimidated, or threatened.

[youtube https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=LlFAd4YdQks]

Furthermore, the NC Coalition Against Domestic Violence went on to state:

[quote]We believe that through the power of our shared experiences and collective voice, we can work together to create individual, institutional, and cultural change. We will work intentionally and actively to create safe spaces for survivors of domestic violence. We believe the voice and experience of survivors must be the foundation of our work, and that the domestic violence movement can change society.[/quote]

Definition of a coalition: a pact or treaty among individuals or groups, during which they cooperate in joint action, each in their own self-interest, joining forces together for a common cause.

How can the NCCADV state that they have a coalition of men and women sharing collective voices and shared experiences if the men in their organization are patriarchal oppressors bent on gender inequality? Or, are these men too stupid to see that they are being used as tokens to make the appearance of a coalition? Or, one could argue that they are there to simply stay in the good graces of federal money the coalition gets from federal and state grants. Either way, it is super irresponsible for the NC Coalition Against Domestic Violence to interject common radical feminist words like patriarchy into the narrative of domestic violence rather than focusing on the established causes for this social ill.
In doing serious research on domestic violence, I come across many of the most hard line feminist websites that have their own cherry picked statistics on violence and even they admit to a small fraction of female perpetuated violence, but that apparently escaped the idiots at the NC Coalition Against Domestic Violence.

A Message To Women Supporters of the NC Coalition Against Domestic Violence

As stated earlier, I think it is irresponsible for male supporters of this NC coalition to support the executive staff use of the very serious issue of domestic violence in order to advance a political agenda claiming female inequality and oppression that does not exist. But there is another group of even scarier supporters at the coalition. That is women in their ranks who have sons, brothers, husbands, fathers, nephews, and male friends. If the NC Coalition Against Domestic Violence is correct, and all social ills are directly related to patriarchy and masculinity, then there are a lot of sons and husbands that just got jammed into a box as potential domestic batterers.
I can guarantee you that not everyone who gives this coalition money and support believes that all their sons and male friends are sitting around conspiring to oppress women. For those within this organization who have sons who have/will get their asses handed to them in the family courts, I hope they remember the NC Coalition Against Domestic Violence and their support for them.
I am tired of seeing domestic violence coalitions hiding behind beaten women to fund other political agendas. Domestic violence in North Carolina is a very emotional hot button topic that many professional lobbyists and politicians use to broker power and gain votes. “Do it for the children,” they say. What they are saying is “If you don’t support what I am doing I am going to paint you a child hater and abuser in the public.” This is how they quash anyone who asks questions, holds them accountable, or attempts to open dialogue.
I refuse to be held hostage by this political play on words anymore and I am calling out the NC Coalition Against Domestic Violence staff as sexist radical feminist that have no intention on ending violence and would rather play politics with peoples lives. All victims of domestic violence in NC deserves better than what this coalition is pushing and I am sorry to see so many Men and Women throw their own gender and sons under a bus just to be part of some sexist political machine.

Additionally, I am disheartened to know that politicians in North Carolina support this coalition and give them the ability to further divide our state along gender lines. If you truly want to end domestic violence in NC, then a new coalition needs to be built – one that is bipartisan, gender neutral, identifying all domestic violence, and using statistical data from organizations that are neutral on the subject.

The NC Coalition Against Domestic Violence Needs To Hear From A Voice For Men

In my attempt to call out the NC Coalition Against Domestic Violence, I hope Women and Men who read this will reach out to the executive staff within this coalition and let them know that they are no longer safe to sit in their protected bubbles and push phoney statistics to the people of North Carolina in an effort to drive funding. It is important that we all do this even if not from NC because I will be the first to join in a fight with you against a similar organization anywhere in this world if it means furthering your activism and change on this issue. And, I suspect that the management of A Voice For Men feels the same way.
Lastly, I ask that you share this article with others on the many social networking sites like Facebook, Twitter, and Google+ in an effort to expose groups like the NC Coalition Against Domestic Violence who I believe is doing serious damage to many people, and who seem hell bent of furthering ideological agendas rather than ending violence against humanity.
You can make contact with NCCADV and Executive Director Beth Froehling HERE.

If other groups were targeted like men…

March 31, 2013 | by Mateusz Wacek | Link | Original Link

I've been seeing an increasing number of articles and social media posts with the "Men can stop rape" theme. There have been some variations, like the popular "Teach men not to rape" and/or references to "Rape culture" (well, the popular, feminist definition of rape culture, rather than how our culture actually views rape… but that's another topic).
All of this is to further the connection between "rape" and "men" in people's minds. It's been a pretty textbook example of saying far more than what is explicitly mentioned. Usually, at least unless pushed, the journalists, protesters, and others promoting this feminist rhetoric don't outright say that "All rapists are men" or that "All men have a duty to protect women". They don't need to. When someone says that they "Jewed" someone in a deal, they don't need to say that they believe Jews are greedy. The implication is plenty.
I've often considered what if other groups were targeted in the same way, and I'm not the only one. I've asked myself, "What if, instead of looking at the rates of convictions, and concluding that violence has a masculine face, we looked at the rates of conviction according to race, and concluded that violence has a black face?" The answer to that question, of course, would be that we would not do that (In this case, "we" being people who are relatively well-adjusted, and not racist), since people who would say such a thing would be racist. They'd be ignoring that the higher incidence of convictions for violent crimes by blacks is a result of a "justice" system that sees people color coded according to their guilt (Black = most guilty, then Brown = also, quite guilty, White = not all that guilty, and Yellow = mostly innocent).
In fact, when we look at incarceration rates, and see blacks are locked up at higher rates than whites, we don't conclude "Well, that just means blacks are inherently more violent" (well some of us do, but they are correctly singled out as bigots). Instead, we understand that blacks statistically are more likely to live in poverty, be denied educational opportunities, factors that lead to criminality (desperate actions arise from desperate situations). That's not to say blacks are the only ones, since I have personally known whites struggling to live day by day in poverty, just that it's more common. We also acknowledge racism in sentencing.
The problem, though, is when we read about statistics for male vs. female sentencing, we (again, "we" being our society) conclude that it's just that men are more violent than women. We acknowledge that juries view blacks as more guilty than whites, and more often, and we acknowledge that this is racist. However, we don't acknowledge that juries view men as more guilty than women, and more often, and that this is sexist. We don't acknowledge this even when the sex disparity in sentencing is worse than the race disparity.
MRAs, have, occasionally, used the racial angle as a means of demonstrating bigotry. We've commented that singling out a sex for violence is as bigoted as singling out a race. Here's the thing, though, all the "What if we just replaced 'men' with 'blacks' in these slogans," or "What if, instead of women's groups clamoring about men's violence against women, and claiming the need to take back the night from violent men, a white group clamored about black's violence against whites, and claimed the need to take back the night from violent blacks?" conjectures were purely hypothetical. Well, until now [1].

The White Student Union has been making claims about the "very large problem of black-male-against-white-female crime", and using this as reason/justification/excuse to go on very visible patrols, ostensibly to protect innocent whites (and especially, white women). No word yet on if they suggest white women also dress as "sluts" while walking on patrol.
It should come as no surprise to any MRA how much the rhetoric from this group matches the speech from feminists. Remove the racial element from the White Student Union, or add a racial element to feminists, and it would be hard to tell where the quotes came from.
For example, take this quote: "Violence against white women is the single greatest human rights violation of our generation."
Feminist, or racist? Actually, that was said by Patrick Stewart (minus the racial angle) in his white knight campaign to end violence against (you guessed it) women. [2]
How about: "We always knew when we took on the issue of violence against white women, that somehow our opposition would come after us." Was that said by a racist, or feminists?
Actually… Patricia Ireland (again, just insert "white", and it could just as easily be from a racist group. You don't even have to remove "women").
There's also "The virtue of white Christian womanhood is under attack at Towson University by degenerate criminals seeking to rob our women of their God given innocence."
That one would be racist.
Side note: "Feminist Or Racist" could be the next big party game.
This group is claiming that black criminals preying on white victims justifies demonizing an entire race, in pretty much the same way that feminists claim male criminals prey on female victims, and demonize an entire gender. Honestly, if someone were to write a satirical story, a work of fiction meant to demonstrate the bigotry in feminism by comparing it to racism, it would fit with the reality of what is going on at this moment almost perfectly.
It is important to note the similarity in this group's rhetoric to the feminist rhetoric, how targeting a race as suspect of criminality and violence is as abhorrent as targeting a sex for the same. However, also important to note is how the group uses white (no pun intended) knighting to further itself. They don't just protect whites from blacks. No, they protect white women from black men. It's as though they realized that they would have a pretty hard sell with the whole "White group stereotyping blacks, and claiming that all blacks are violent criminals" deal, and so decided to go with the selling point of protecting women. After all, the focus of the group is stopping violence against not just whites, but white women (or so they say, and they say repeatedly). Who can argue with ending violence against women? It's the same attempt at legitimacy used by the Klan back in the day. Hate groups used to use the "Scary black man" [4] image to justify fearing black men, and when you fear a group, you can more easily justify hating that group. After all, you're not the bad guy, picking on innocent victims… you're resolutely standing up to the forces of evil.

It's an old, and widespread pattern. The Klan was justified, you see, because blacks were scary, and attacking white women, so the Klan was just protecting the innocent, right (note: inconvenient things like facts and reality could be swept aside. All that matters is that enough people believed the story). The Jews were responsible for Germany's poverty and downfall. Anti-Westerner racism in China is justified because problems are caused by "Foreigners, trying to undermine harmony", and accusing groups as using religion to "split China and cause disharmony" justifies attacks on Christians, Buddhists, Muslims, and any other religion that the government doesn't approve of (which is pretty much any that isn't the government's official religion, or obsequious enough to the government). Wars in the Middle East are justified because scary Arab terrorists are trying to blow up America, so we need to kill them all.
The scary black man image might not be acceptable to the majority of America, but remove the racial element, make it about scary men of all races, and it's easily used by feminists. Fearing (and then hating) men because they're men might not go down so well, at least with the less gullible male white knights so valuable to feminists. However, fearing and hating men because men are a threat to all women, and do such horrible things to women… well, that's justified. Then, misandry is merely defensive. I'm not saying that hatred of men based on irrational rationalization might lead to violence against men. I'm saying it will, because it has. Black men weren't lynched solely because they were black. They were lynched because they were black males. Black women weren't murdered for whistling at white boys. Unfortunately, we're more than willing to look at the racial angle, but very hesitant to look at the sex angle.
This isn't limited to just the US, either. Yang Rui, a host for a Chinese government TV network said, "The Public Security Bureau wants to clean out the foreign trash: To arrest foreign thugs and protect innocent girls, they need to concentrate on the disaster zones in Wudaokou [student district] and Sanlitun [nightlife district]." [5] If any audience members were not sure about hating Westerners simply based on being the wrong ethnicity and/or skin color ("Foreigner" is used interchangeably with "Westerner", or people not of Asian decent, in China, and usually in a disparaging manner), then protecting the innocent flower of Chinese female virtue makes it justified.
A Romani camp was attacked (well, the men… women and children were warned to leave) by an Italian mob [6] all due to a false rape accusation by an Italian girl. The Romani men weren't solely attacked because of their ethnicity, but ethnicity plus gender.
And adding yet another layer to this, just a short while before the story about the White Student Union broke, Zerlina Maxwell penned an article for Ebony [3] offering her help on teaching men not to rape (how nice of her). Just put an anti-black spin on it, focus on black men raping white women, rather than just men raping women, and she could have written this as a gift to the Ku Klux Klan.
[1]
http://baltimore.cbslocal.com/2013/03/26/white-student-union-claims-towson-has-black-o n-white-crime-problem/

[2]
http://news.yahoo.com/blogs/lookout/patrick-stewart-million-men-violence-women-011042478.html
[3]
http://www.facebook.com/l.php?u=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.ebony.com%2Fnews-views%2F5-ways-we-can-teach-men-not-to-rape-456%23axzz2NvsB7wpO&h=DAQHG9RwT&s=1
[4] http://tvtropes.org/pmwiki/pmwiki.php/Main/ScaryBlackMan
[5]
http://www.businessweek.com/articles/2012-05-21/chinese-lash-out-at-foreigners-amid-turmoil#p1
[6] http://www.guardian.co.uk/world/2011/dec/11/italian-girl-rape-claim-gypsy

Hamilton area justice, misandry and murder – part 1

April 1, 2013 | by Dan Perrins | Link | Original Link

August 17 has been a date I find I can't easily forget, or put behind me. If you don't know what I am talking about with the Aug 17 date, read the article called "When Crutches Attack" for the more complete details on the following facts.

1. I put up public service announcements for AVfM letting society know Men's Rights Are Human Rights.
2. On August 17, 2012 I was physically attacked by man for doing so.
3. I took pictures of the event.
4. The attack happened on a street corner.
5. The attack forced me to step back into a cross walk.
6. Luckily there was no traffic. It is the main street.
7. The attacker used a weapon, a makeshift club.
8. I reported the attack to the police.
9. The police took a long time responding.
10. They knew exactly who I was and where I lived because, I had informed the local chapter of HPS not more than six hours before the attack who I was and what I do.

Addendums.

- When the police did eventually respond the criminal had long since left the area.
- I don't for a second believe the police's reason why it took them so long to respond.
- Hamilton Police Services (HPS) claimed it was because they got the street where I lived wrong.
- I did a follow up call regarding the attack. Proof of that is here.

Recently I identified that disturbed young man as Richard Russell. The other day he posted my personal information within a mile of where I live. I take that as implied threat and consider it personal.

Within five or six hours he replied to my identifying him.

I called and advised the police of his identity.

What they didn't know is that I was recording them.

What I didn't know is what the recorder would pick up. At 1:55 in we hear a chuckle, a slight laugh. What caused that laughter was my request for them to enforce the law. This is something HPS selectively does. The deciding factor if they enforce the law or how it is enforced is your sex. Proof here. I've got three strikes against me in regard to the decision making process engaged in by HPS.

First. I am male. Second, I have exposed some of their corruption, and third, I am a Men's Human Rights Activist. I am the bottom of their list.

Listen to that laugh again, listen real close. That is the sound of misandry with a badge.

That is how much I (read: you), as a male, are valued by this guffawing hyena who represents HPS. My well being, despite it being put in some fairly serious jeopardy by that disturbed individual on more than one occasion is comedy to the stinking lot of them. I told the Hamilton Police force I want them to enforce the law; the law they affirm an oath to uphold.

And they laugh.

This is not the first time Hamilton Police Services employees have ignored their fiduciary duty to act in an ethical and moral manner. That laugh is pretty much the same reply I received from them on Feb 3 2009, when I reported crimes by an ex to HPS in person. The response from the desk Sgt was "Suck it up, we don't intend to enforce the law." I informed them this was unacceptable and fought back, which resulted in threats and harassment from them. It lead to my developing P.T.S.D.

Those demoralizing deeds engaged in by HPS and the local justice system affected me profoundly. I couldn't eat, I couldn't sleep. I had hives coming out on my hands from the stress. I walked my former dog Zeke out into traffic, not because I wanted to end it all, but because I was disoriented and I couldn't function.

I was that messed up. I vividly remember the sound of the drivers horn and the beaming headlights in my eyes when I snapped out of it. Those events and many more are as fresh in my memory as if they happened yesterday; crisp, clean, like a nightmare in a loop. It happens every time something reminds me about my experiences with HPS.

It took another two years of threats of death and obstruction of justice for the HPS to completely destroy all hope in me. Hopeless or not, I do not intend to abandon my mission.

Some may even wonder why this is so important to me. It is, and it should be important to you. It is not just that I (and you) deserve the equal protection of the law. It is not just that HPS thinks that your status as a MHRA makes you a joke and an acceptable target for street thugs. It is not just that it is the criminals who are wearing the badges and carrying guns.

It is not even that HPS' Chief of Police Glenn De Caire has earned the nickname in Hamilton 'Chief Don't Care.' He he runs an organization full of employees who just don't care.

The real problem is that this kind of misandric mentality and hubris are killing Canadian men. Not in the figurative sense, not metaphorically, but very real graveyard dead.

In part 2 to this article, I will tell you how, and show you the smoking gun in HPS' hand.

Toronto Star interview with Paul

April 1, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

The video here does not need any real explanation. It is business as usual with the mainstream media. This time the Toronto Star sent a young reporter, Carys Mills, to speak with me.

During the discussion, she indicated that the University of Toronto had elected to employ special measures to protect students, perhaps in response to their vandals and thugs being profiled on this site. As promised, she did provide me a link to that information.

http://www.provost.utoronto.ca/office/Provostial_Statements/Provost_s_Statement_on_Recent_Controversial_Events_on_Campus__December_2012_.htm

Here is my response to her via email:

Thank you for sending this. It is unfortunately hard to respond in a comprehensive way. There is no direct mention from U of T admin about the abuse of students trying to enter the Farrell lecture. Nor is there any proof provided of the threats they mentioned, which they seem to indirectly attribute to AVFM. I suppose if you think that video evidence and public confession online of the acts that we addressed do not constitute sufficient proof, then perhaps you may also have questions for U of T admin regarding proof that any threats were made.

Personally, I am not buying it. I am 100% certain that no individual associated with AVFM would condone or tolerate any type of threat made against anyone. If I found out that anyone was, their connection with AVFM would be quickly severed. I am also 100% certain that the individuals who orchestrated the harassment, bullying, door blockading and vandalism that happened on November 16, have already spread a great deal of disinformation about AVFM, CAFE, Warren Farrell, Janice Fiamengo and others.
I can sympathize that in the face of complaints that students are being harassed, real, imagined or concocted, U of T admin would likely feel obligated to issue a statement condemning such actions. I condemn them too, but I am not convinced they ever happened.

Militants threaten violence at University of Toronto Thursday

April 2, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

The rubber is coming to meet the road.

In a statement just issued by the Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE), we have learned that radical groups are planning militant action to disrupt the upcoming talk at the University of Toronto by Dr. Paul Nathanson and Dr. Katherine Young, possibly with the use of violence.

From the statement by CAFE[1]:

> A protest of this event is planned by the UTSU and its allies, including the Association of Part-time Undergraduate Students and the University of Toronto-based "Ontario Public Interest Research Group (OPIRG)." OPIRG, funded by levies on all students, has joined with more extreme groups Common Cause and the Radical Student Movement, to organize a "militant" response on Thursday. Common Cause has pledged to respond to "men's issues" events with a "move towards reactivating a radical, militant feminist movement." Meanwhile, the "Radical Student Movement," promises that individuals associated with disagreeable groups will be "verbally condemned as well as physically challenged."

Speaking on behalf of the editorial board of A Voice for Men, I urge all MHRAs who plan to attend this event to take this threat very seriously. Clearly part of the strategy of these groups in publicly announcing their intentions is to intimidate both the speakers involved and attendees into resignation. It would suit their agenda well if the event were cancelled due to the threat of violent actions. It would hand them their victory.

We urge CAFE, Drs Nathanson and Young, MHRAs and all students who plan on attending the lecture to persevere. Do not let a band of radical thugs dictate what discourse will and will not be allowed on a university campus.

That being said, we encourage all to be vigilant and careful. These groups have already demonstrated their willingness to employ violence whenever it suits their agenda.

Here is a short list of recommendations for those attending, which must also be regarded as marching orders for anyone in attendance of this lecture representing A Voice for Men.

[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- Do not engage in violence in any form, for any reason. If you are facing physical hostility, retreat. Find a path away from it and take it without hesitation;
- If attacked and you cannot escape, hit the ground face down and cover your head with your hands. Pull your knees to your chest and make your body as compact as possible;

- Do not hesitate to call for police assistance. We anticipate they will be there in force;
- Do not attend this event alone;
- Do not attend this event alone;
- ABR. Always be recording. Do this as a protective measure, to dissuade anyone from becoming violent. AVFM News personnel will be there to take video in multiple locations;
- If doors are blocked, either by persons or objects, do not attempt to push through. Seek assistance from police;
- Do not engage in any shouting matches or exchanges of verbal hostility with protesters. Keep your emotions in check. Remember the men who were harassed at the Farrell lecture on the video by Studio Brule. BE THEM, NOT THE PROTESTERS;
- For MHRAs generally speaking, these are strong suggestions. For anyone in an official capacity with AVFM, they are a deal breaker. Anyone engaging in violence, escalating hostility or acting in a provocative way at this event will be immediately and permanently stricken from the ranks of this organization. NO EXCEPTIONS.

[/unordered_list]

It appears, gents and ladies, that the individuals who were shamed into docility and wearing masks after their moral bankruptcy was exposed to the world, have not much enjoyed wearing a leash since then. Let me remind you that it was not AVFM that put them on that leash, except to the extent that we along with others actively and accurately exposed their true mindset to the world.

It was not brute force that forced their brief retreat into the shadows, but the light of truth shining on them for the world to see. That same world, despite the best intentions of the mainstream media and hate groups like the University of Toronto Student's Union, also saw the calmed and reasoned reaction of those who opposed them. We humiliated them with a mirror, not with a club or with hateful chanting.

For that sake of everything we stand for, we must stay on that course and refuse to be detoured by thugs and bullies. Let them be seen for what they are, clearly. Do not distort that image or distract from it with your own foolishness and immaturity. Nor with your anger, no matter how righteous you may think it to be.

Please read the CAFE announcement carefully and let it sink in. We are at what I think will be regarded as a pivotal moment in the history of the Men's Human Rights Movement.

During the last protest at the University of Toronto protesters wore masks, which is now in violation of Canadian law.

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Bill_C-309

In closing, I also want to make a plea to certain parties that I am sure will be reading this announcement. To the Toronto Police Force, the University of Toronto Campus Police and the University of Toronto Administration: We respectfully urge you to protect the safety and personal freedoms of all who attend this event, including the right to peacefully protest. Above all, we urge you to consider the rights of individuals to gather in the name of fostering awareness of problems that affect our society. You have been publicly advised in advance of this event that militants are planning hostile, even violent actions to disrupt it and/or keep it from happening. That advance notice comes not from us, but from the militants themselves. We respectfully request that you act on that accordingly and with forethought.

All of you play an important role in preserving personal freedoms by PUNISHING offenders.

That begins with enforcing the law.

Also, to the members of the mainstream media: Kindly do your job. How you cover this story may well offer up proof to the world that you are either journalists, or ideologues who support violence and the repression of free speech; the very freedom on which your profession depends to exist in the first place.

So far, you have given violence and the abridgment of free speech a pass because it was perpetrated in the name of an ideology that many of you support. You have done this to your utter disgrace. Should any of you choose the path of journalism, which requires the real courage you have thus far not displayed, you have a chance at redeeming your integrity – if you ever had it to begin with.

To the readers of AVFM, I offer you a personal pledge. Regardless of what police, university officials, the mainstream media or any other entity does or does not do, this publication will not veer from its course. Protesters who obey the rule of law, and engage in their right to free expression will not be profiled on these pages or publicly exposed. Those who stray past that line, even by a fraction, will be subjected to every effort we can make to identify them and create a record of their actions that will follow them for life. We always have, and always will, continue to summarily dismiss any notions that we abandon that policy, regardless of the source.

And a final note to the militants. The days when you can silence the advocacy for men and boys are over. Indeed, your corrupt plans and illicit actions have only inspired the formation of more groups, in more cities, dedicated the justice you would deny us all. You have fomented the movement that will burn your hateful ideology to the ground. Like all hateful groups that came before you, you will eventually choke on your own toxic ideas. And the world will collectively say, “Good riddance.”

[1] CAFE Announcement

AVFM News and Activism: Militant threat at U of T

April 2, 2013 | by James Huff | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]

Tonight we have returning as our guest Iain Dwyer of CAFÉ who will be talking about the upcoming event at the University of Toronto featuring Drs. Katherine Young and Paul Nathonson who will talk about misandry. We will also be talking about the escalating rhetoric coming from those who have protested these events in the past and the inclusion of more militant groups into the fray. This is undoubtedly a harbinger of things to come for Men's groups across the U.S. and Canada as well as the rest of the world so please join us and call in to discuss this very important topic.

The show starts tonight, the 2nd, at 9:00 PM Eastern, 8:00 PM Central, which is 2:00 AM April 3rd in London and 11:00 AM April 3rd in Brisbane.

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

Farewell, Rocky

April 2, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

It has been a while since I have been able to look at this website as a personal blog. It is one of the losses that came with the growth I had hoped for. Still, I trust you will allow me this indulgence. I owe it to my friend, Rocky. PE

[quote]Heaven goes by favor. If it went by merit, you would stay out and your dog would go in.~ Mark Twain[/quote]

11 years.

That is how long Rocky was in my life. I met him shortly after my partner brought him home from a rescue organization dedicated to Lhasa Apsos. And did he ever need to be rescued. There was no way to fully put together the events that led him to our home, but it was obvious that it was a very hard road. He was dangerously malnourished. Whatever had happened, whether it was abandonment, the death of his owner or some other kind of neglect I am certainly better off not knowing, it left him emaciated and sick; practically on death's door.

His physical problems were taken care of easily enough. Plenty of good food, medical care and a loving home did the trick. The scars, if I can call them that, lasted. He remained, for the entirety of his life, completely fixated on food. He ate as though every meal was his first in ages, and as though it would be his last. It even provided for some comical relief in our home. Rocky at dinner time, the several times a day he had treats, was like watching a kid at Christmas rip through paper to get to presents. He devoured everything with abandon. And he begged incessantly, even with a belly full of dinner and one of his beloved snacks.

But of course that was not near all he did. Like so many other faithful dogs, he was the epitome of love and friendship to the less deserving humans that cared for him. He was a constant source of companionship and approval. He was the wagging tail every morning, delighting in any attention paid to him; the faithful friend that often slept at my feet as I worked. He was the clean spot in my days, always available to me; an especially great gift when so many of those days meant dealing with the dirt that a life like mine can throw at you.

His excited, impatient barking was the first thing I heard every time I got out of my car in the garage. He greeted me there at the door every day for years, as though I had been gone for ages, even after a trip to the corner store. He often stayed on the patio, even in the brutal heat of Houston summers, refusing to come back inside till I returned. He never failed, until the arthritis crippled him to the point that he could not come out to welcome me home any more.

I know there are mountains of problems in this world, so many of them far worse than my grief and loss. But Rocky was my friend, and he proved it each day of his life more truly and with more heart than any human I have ever known. He was certainly more faithful and kind than I have ever learned to be.

I consider myself fortunate. I have a very fine veterinarian, a man of compassion and sensitivity that gently ended Rocky’s pain yesterday as I cradled his head in my hands and said good-bye through my tears. But I am luckier still for the company of my happy, hungry companion, who never let a single day pass without reminding me that I was loved.

R.I.P. Rocky 04/01/2013

Bad doggie, good doggie

April 3, 2013 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

Bad Doggies, Good Doggies.

If you've been observing the MHRM in the past few weeks, you'll have noticed an awful lot of hoopla surrounding efforts to form men's issues groups in and around Toronto, Ontario. The discussion focuses on who is and is not allowed to regard themselves as human beings worthy of human rights, endowed with a right to free expression and capable of freely associating with whom they choose. Apparently a vocal subset of citizenry in Toronto and surrounding cities are firmly bent on disallowing any such exercised rights by those they deem to be: "the bad people". Perhaps not even actual people, just men.

CAFE, the Canadian Association for Equality has produced and presented a series of lectures from speakers like Dr Warren Farrell, Dr Janice Fiamengo, and in an event scheduled for tomorrow, Drs. Paul Nathanson and Katherine Young. All of these events address issues of human rights concerns for men and boys in Canada and wider western culture.

Of course, all of this has angered and offended a collection of individuals calling themselves variously, the University of Toronto Student Union, the comically named Ontario Anacho-Communist Collective and a recently vocal Revolutionary Students Movement. The dramatically named RSM has this week published their intention to escalate their radicalism, and to condemn as well as "physically challenge" whoever they identify as a Men's Human Rights Activist(the RSM's statements omit the word "human" from that identification, which they probably have some reason for doing).

However, the University of Toronto Students Union, University of Toronto gender studies students and others have consistently attended the events and speaking engagements produced by CAFE to oppose and protest against academics speaking on issues like male disenfranchisement in education, the epidemic of male suicide and the public acceptability of hatred toward men and boys as a biological demographic.

Actually, to call opposition to these events "protest" isn't quite adequate. Harrassment, vandalism, assault (including assault on Toronto Police brought in to protect lecture attendees from harm) is what's been demonstrated so far. One young man attending the lecture by Dr Farrell was there seeking understanding of why two of his friend committed suicide. The "protesters" of that event, knowing nothing about him besides his intention to hear the lecture, hectored him with the accusations "You are scum, fucking scum, child rapist, rape apologist scum", punctuated with flying spittle.

But all this bad behavior was recorded on video by at least one person not sympathetic to organized public violence, vandalism, assault and harassment. That video, by Stephen Brule, went viral. Another organization with no tolerance for hatred, violence or organized harassment or any other criminal behavior did what the main-stream media has so far singularly failed to do.

A Voice for Men engaged in the revolutionary act of citizen journalism. We discovered the names of the vandals, the harassers and those organizing suppression of free expression, and we published their names. Of course, this description makes it sound like what we did was difficult. In reality, the individuals participating in violence, censorship, harassment, and vandalism bragged about it on their respective Facebook and Twitter pages. We republished their bragging and said in effect "this is not acceptable or civilized behavior". We said what the main-stream media has so far been unwilling to say; that violence, street harassment, assault and the organized plans to conduct such actions are criminal.

We used words like thug and bigot, which we stand behind; which we will use again as needed and appropriate.

Obedience training now available at the University of Toronto

Indeed, after our reporting on the hate fuelled and violent public antics of U of T feminists at the Warren Farrell lecture, these same "protesters" dialed their behavior way back. They didn't event physically assault anyone attempting to hear Dr Janice Fiamengo speak. Of course they did attempt to derail her address by setting off a fire alarm in the lecture hall and also used the question period after Dr Fiamengo's presentation to launch inane diatribes about how men addressing their own human rights concerns are "racist, sexist, homophobic, trans-phobic, cis-phobic, et-cetera".

After the public spanking by AVFM of the "protestors" at the November 2012 Warren Farrell lecture, Janice Fiamengo's "protestors" were, in fact, positively subdued. Although evidently capable of learning with the assistance of some behavior modification from AVfM – they still behaved poorly. They even wore masks, an obvious and overt demonstration of consciousness of guilt.

For this continued, albeit diminished inability to adhere to civilized, legal behavior in public, we had to roll up a newspaper and swat the bad little doggies on the nose again.

Having raised several puppies myself, its never an enjoyable task to push a little dog's nose into its own pool of piddle on the floor. It would be cruelly irresponsible, however, to allow a puppy, or indeed an infant, to maintain and develop antisocial behaviors.

In the excitement surrounding the upcoming presentation by Drs Nathanson and Young, individuals self identifying as "Revolutionary Student's Movement" have published an unambiguous intention to harass and physically assault anyone they recognize as a human rights activist addressing the issues of men and boys.

My silky terrier, Moosehead, used to bark through the fence at our neighbors, often for no obvious reason and late at night. This would wake me and likely wake the neighbors as well. I loved that little dog, but it took the application of a plant sprayer to train her that my voice through the window saying "Moose! Quiet!" meant it was time to stop barking at the neighbor and come inside. After being told to be quiet, Moosehead would always bark just one more "yap!" at the neighbors before coming inside. But come inside she did.

The Bad Little Doggies in Toronto will likely attend Thursday's presentation by Nathanson and Young, and will almost certainly make clear their disagreement that freedom of expression is a fundamental human right in Canada. But like a bad little doggy smacked (gently) on the nose when it pees on the rug, those who don't yet apparently grasp that men's rights are human rights are learning, slowly, to be good little doggies.

I am certainly looking forward to watching the video of the lecture, and of whatever coverage is given to efforts by protestors to "condemn" and "physically challenge" attending Men's Human Rights Activists, including the coverage by AVfM's team in Toronto.

For the bigots at the University of Toronto: Those Who Oppose Us

April 3, 2013 | by Jared White | Link | Original Link

As we look to events in Toronto, the timeliness of Jared White's classic won't stop running through my head. Here it is again, with some links added to the lyrics that might help those trying to understand. –DE

The rift between men and women has widened throughout recorded history
In today's "free world" there are those that seek to widen that rift even further
Some widen it with claims of men's oppression of women
They widen it with claims that masculinity is evil
That men are born oppressors that need to be fixed

Others widen it with dehumanizing standards of chivalry and self sacrifice
They call themselves "feminists" and "traditionalists"
Democrats and Republicans
Feminists trivialize the discrimination men face
To them, men have no issues, men can't face discrimination
Because men are privileged
Men's problems are insignificant
Undeserving of attention until all of their demands for women are satisfied
In the face of this hatred, there's only one logical response:

FUCK 'EM!
Fuck feminists
Fuck the left
Fuck the right
Fuck anyone in between who feels men don't deserve rights
Fuck everyone who claims men need to be "fixed"
Fuck everyone who ignores that men suffer right along side women
Fuck anyone who thinks they can define men or masculinity
I'm the only one that can define me you fucking bigots
My status as human doesn't depend on what I can do for women or society
The time for silence is fucking over

It's time to raise your voice
Because the truth is out
And those who oppose us can't stop it now
The truth is set free and hatemongers don't wanna listen
But the jig is up bigots, so fuckin' pay attention

There's a message been growin' for years and now it's seen the light
In defense of masculinity
Men's rights

Those who oppose us with your hateful ideology
It's time for men to get their fair share of the equality

Equal rights for men
Those who oppose us want none of it
"Men oppressed women for years"
At least that's how they spun it
"Men are privileged"
"The rulers of the world"
Why care about them when you can care about girls?
Well take a look around as you walkin' through the streets
At the men scrapin' for the change shinin' at your feet
A second thought about em' never crossed your mind
Because a man needin' help doesn't fall in line
With the free world's view of the issues that need action
When it's men on the bottom the issue looses traction
The majority of the homeless got a dick
But you wouldn't know
According to the media men just run the show

And the family courts?
Don't even get them started
When the process is over men are nothin' but a wallet
When his pockets are empty they stack him on a prison shelf
Only option left in his mind?
Fuckin' kill himself

Suicide rates overflow among men
But they ain't the right gender so they garner no attention
Only thing you'll hear is bout some "deadbeat dad"
Vanished from the world money left on his tab

And you bigots wonder why men are angry?
Want the message toned down?
Quieter?
More friendly?
I'm not standin' at the back of your line or your bus
Nah
I'm here to fuck your shit up

It's time to raise your voice
Because the truth is out
And
Those who oppose us can't stop it now
The truth is set free and hatemongers don't wanna listen
But the jig is up bigots, so fuckin' pay attention

There’s a message been growin’ for years and now it’s seen the light
In defense of masculinity
Men’s rights
Those who oppose us with your hateful ideology
It’s time for men to get their fair share of the equality

I’m just gettin started and your time is coming to an end
Like I said in the hook fuckin’ pay attention
Discrimination holds no bars against a young man
Even when its got its claws wrapped around a boy’s hand
Put a man with a girl
They call it statuatory rape
But when a woman’s with a boy?
They call that shit a date
Lock the evil dick up and throw away the key
But give that poor oppressed woman all the fuckin’ sympathy
And don’t forget that little boy has got responsibilities
This the part about it all that really fuckin kills me
When a woman gets pregnant and her victim can’t escape it
Now a boy has to pay his ‘strong independent’ rapist

Those who oppose us don’t want you to know
About the pain men endure all around the globe
When we show them facts
They just scream in indignation
“Women are the only ones who face discrimination”

Fuck that bullshit your reign is over
Men are done just lyin’ down and rollin’ over
For every lie that you told we got the media’s attention
And we’re ringing in the truth twice as hard as your ommissions

Our voices are finally being heard
No longer silenced by some muthafuckin ’empty words
And if you bigots got a problem here’s a tip
Cry me a river
Build a bridge
And get the fuck over it

It’s time to raise your voice
Because the truth is out
And
Those who oppose us can’t stop it now

The truth is set free and hatemongers don’t wanna listen
But the jig is up bigots, so fuckin’ pay attention
There’s a message been growin’ for years and now it’s seen the light

In defense of masculinity
Men's rights
Those who oppose us with your hateful ideology
It's time for men to get their fair share of the equality

Oh and by the way? Don't bother with the shaming tactics. We've heard them already.

But if you're one of the growing number of women and men who want to climb on board? Come on over, and welcome. –DE

Donglegate vs Vaginagate

April 3, 2013 | by Hannah Wallen | Link | Original Link

In summer of 2012, Michigan House Democrat Lisa Brown made an impassioned speech in protest of proposed legislation which would enact upon the abortion industry regulations which she did not approve. Brown ended her speech with the following:

"Finally Mr. Speaker, I'm flattered that you're all so interested in my vagina, but 'no' means 'no.'"

The statement was inflammatory, insinuating that her specific body was of interest to other legislators. It was accusatory, as 'no means no' is a widely recognized anti-rape slogan, insinuating in the context used that rape was an issue between the legislators. It was unnecessarily graphic, as the legislation was largely about licensing, insurance, safety measures, and fetal tissue disposal, not Lisa Brown's vagina. For breaking decorum, she was suspended from speaking on the floor for a few days.

Considering recent events, one would not think this a big deal. After all, people lose their jobs over less overt behavior. This is the proper protocol for handling offensive use of sexual innuendo in a professional setting, right?

Nope.

All hell broke loose among the left-wing press, feminist media, the internet community, and the general female public as the vaginapocalypse rained down upon the heads of Michigan House Republicans. The incident was treated as an act of misogyny, a labeling of women's bodies as dirty and unacceptable, an attack on reproductive rights, evidence of a conspiracy of patriarchal domination, everything except a disciplinary action related to an individual's inappropriate, flippant use of sexual innuendo in the context of a serious discussion.

Protest was made against the censure, on the basis that silencing Brown over her glib remark constituted condemning the use of correct terminology for women's body parts. This was a red herring assertion, given the rest of her statement. The response from the house would have been the same if she had used a slang term. The statement itself was unmerited and out of place.

Discussing it at the time, it seemed like the outrage over the censure was consistent with feminist objection to Victorian morality standards. It must be acceptable to refer to body parts in discussion in a modern, enlightened society, right?

Apparently not, considering the response to Donglegate, in which Adria Richards claimed to be offended after hearing an anatomy reference and a second statement pass between two men sitting behind her at the PyCon Conference in Santa Clara, California.

Richards chose to impose her sensibilities on her colleagues by two means. She publicized the incident, tweeting the photo she took of the two men, along with a complaint about their speech. She also texted event staff, requesting enforcement of the conference's rules against harassing behavior. In other words, she interpreted a conversation that did not involve her to be a form of harassment, and requested that an authority address it, but first she made sure to openly slander those involved.

The feminist defense of that choice made Richards out to be a combination victim and hero, as if she had suffered some type of damage from overhearing the men's joke, and overcome an attack by leveling one at them. As the discussion continued, her supporters dug themselves deeper, relating dongle jokes to patriarchy, and offending female sensibilities to assault. They compared perceived importance of the speech involved in the two incidents, but ignored the similar details, and the not-so-similar visibility.

Both incidents took place in professional environments. Both environments had at least some level of expected decorum. Both involved speech with sexual overtones, to which at least one member of the sex opposite that of the speaker took some offense.

In both cases, censure resulted because the behavior was disapproved. In both cases, the reasons for disapproval were the same: Breach of professional decorum, and concern over the offensiveness of the statements made.

The men photographed by Adria Richards, dubbed "the Donglers" by the internet community, were seated in an audience during a presentation, speaking quietly to each other. Their speech was not stated to, stated about, or directed at her. They were not on camera (yet,) nor were they speaking for an audience. Richards simply picked a few disapproved sentences from their conversation, and reacted.

Lisa Brown addressed the speaker of the house directly, and used language which is associated with anti-rape campaigns, thereby insinuating not just sex, but chastisement for an attempted sexual assault. Her statement was made in front of members of the house, and the cameras of the press, during a moment when she had the floor, and therefore everyone's attention.

Contrary to feminist assertions, Brown's comment was worse. It was more public, and more targeted. If we must respond to sexual speech with offense, Brown's comment was more offensive in the suggestion that it contained. If feminist advocates were honest, they would have had the same reaction to both incidents, with either more criticism for Brown, or more support for the Donglers.

The same political and social groups who flipped out over the censure of a politician for her unnecessarily sexualized speech on the Michigan House floor during a televised discussion have been supporting the complaint that got a man fired for a private discussion that was less overt and less inflammatory. Some of them have even protested the idea of providing his family with any financial aid in the wake of his job loss. That effort was condemned as sexist, and everyone associated with it denigrated in blog posts and the discussions taking place in the comments underneath them, for the heinous crime of showing some compassion for the now jobless dongler. All of that response seems to be based on the idea that reference to the penis is, by itself, automatically sexist against women.

What a contrast. Mention of the word vagina draws support from the feminist-influenced public as must-be-protected speech, while discussion even hinting at the concept of a penis draws criticism as a form of aggression. Taking things just at face value, the obvious conclusion is that while feminists treat women's bodies as something special and sacred, they consider men's bodies a dangerous affront.

Of course, there is more to the difference in the two responses than that. It isn't just a matter of body parts. It's a matter of gender, and gender issues. Yes, feminists do treat women's bodies as sacred, and men's as a dangerous affront, but they also treat feminist-defined women's issues as sacred, and men's issues as a dangerous affront. Vaginagate wasn't about the use of the term vagina, nor was it about the inflammatory manner in which it was used. It was about supporting the feminist position on abortion issues, and the feminist politician making the statement.

Reddit feminists discussing the contrast between Donglegate and Vaginagate stated as much, asserting that the two incidents didn't compare because Brown's statement was made as part of a political argument against legislation which would place regulations on the abortion industry. They were willing to support speech which they would otherwise find offensive, specifically because a feminist politician said it in support of a feminist cause. They condemned Brown's critics, not because said critics were sexist or prudish, but because they were criticizing feminist-approved arguments.

The feminist treatment of overheard Dongle jokes and talk of forking repos as harassing behavior is in a way consistent with Vaginagate. Feminists disapprove men, masculinity, and male sexuality, deeming the male body vexatious, and any mention of it vulgar. It isn't that sexual humor, in and of itself, offends them. It's offense at humor expressed without feminist approval.

Donglegate wasn't about men's bodies, or about inappropriate or inflammatory statements. It wasn't even really about female sensibilities. Deeply offended as Adria Richards claimed to be, she wasn't so upset that she couldn't make similar jokes and worse in her twitter feed. One of the two statements at which she feigned offense was not even innuendo, but a commonly used phrase with no sexual connotations except those Richards applied herself. Her response wasn't about the men's words at all. It wasn't about the feminist attitude toward men's bodies. It was about the feminist attitude toward men, and how in social settings, women can use perceived victim status to wield against them the power of castigation and character assassination, forcing accommodation whether it is needed or not.

It's about control.

A few questions for the men of UTSU

April 3, 2013 | by Suzanne McCarley | Link | Original Link

Reading articles and watching videos about recent events at the University of Toronto, a bit of a side issue keeps popping into my head, and I think it's time to address it. Who are these men anyway? Who are these male feminists who participate in the protests? Guys, are you reading this? As yet we have been unable to identify you, otherwise I'd use your names. But seriously, I've got to ask you: Why do you do this? What makes you tick?

What kind of men are you?

I don't ask that to challenge your manhood, but simply to try to understand it. As a men's human rights activist and the mother of a young man, I hesitate to engage in any sort of man-shaming. Hearing, "Man the fuck up!" from a woman is the very last thing any man needs to hear, at least that is what I believe. So please don't mistake my inquiry for that kind of judgement on you or whatever you define your masculinity to be.

However, it seems pretty clear that somewhere in your identity as men that you feel it necessary to demonize other men who are struggling to understand their place in the world but have at least figured out that a self-loathing feminist narrative is not what they want. Is it your job, as a man, to demonize them? To stop them? To bully and harass them for simply existing and looking for answers?

Is that the kind of men you are?

I must state from the outset that I am not confusing you with the poor kid in the vagina costume. I'm pretty sure he's damaged beyond redemption. I don't even want to imagine how he came to so thoroughly despise his own sex, but he has my pity, not my contempt. Ironically though, those of you who otherwise participate in these "protests," wearing masks, pulling fire alarms, blocking doors and suppressing free speech probably think you'd never debase yourselves in that manner. Yet you do.

You just don't do it wearing pink plush female genitalia.

So please tell me, why do you support an ideology in which some people think ninety percent of you should be dead? Are you perhaps deluded enough to believe that you would number among the "lucky" ten percent? If so, I have news for you. I didn't see one of you that looked either hot enough to be a sperm donor or strong enough to build infrastructure, so exactly what qualities do you possess that might give you immunity in a Feminist Utopia?

Do you think your sycophancy will earn you their heartfelt approval? Maybe a little pussy? Is that, for you, the price of selling your fellow man down the river?

Is that the kind of men you are?

Do you think you're Super Special? Are you somehow "evolved" enough to earn respect and compassion from those whose ideology hinges on denying those things to all men? Do you think these particular women even have compassion? Why not ask Vanja Krajina about her compassion for men? Wait, I know, it is hardly fair to refer you to a sociopath.

So instead, ask any of the women you are so eager to please about compassion for men and boys. Ask a non sociopath, if you can find one in the ranks of those women telling you where to step and where to fetch. Just ask for the proof of that compassion.

Then see how fast you go from hot to rot.

You see, you really don't get it, do you? You are nothing but tools to them, pandering toadies who protect all their dirty little secrets for whatever payoff you imagine you are getting.

Could it be that you feel guilty for your "Male Privilege"? If so, please tell me how privileged you feel paying your own tuition, knowing that many of your classmates receive scholarships and preference in admissions because they have vaginas? How privileged do you feel knowing that after you graduate you will have to wait in line behind them (regardless of their or your abilities) for almost every job opening? Is this something you think you deserve, as some sort of reparations for all of the men throughout history who provided for, protected, fed, sheltered "oppressed" women?

Do you have an overblown sense of chivalry that compels you to sacrifice everything, including your masculinity and your dignity (not to mention all critical thought) in order to protect these poor, helpless, oppressed darlings that have you jumping through hoops with a snap of their fingers? Is that why you puff out your chests like pale imitations of silverbacks, of a John Wayne on estrogen, bravely carrying out their ill will on other men you don't even know?

Oh. Wait a minute! Now I get it. Hah! You Guys! This really is all about the pussy, isn't it? Of course it is! You men are all alike, aren't you? You just wanna get in their pants! (Duh!) Now that actually makes sense. But do be careful, as this plan could backfire and literally cost you a pound of flesh. Well, half a pound anyway. And most of you, if I may be so direct, you're doing it wrong.

Do you read "Game" sites and books? Maybe you should, because believe me, enrolling in Women's Studies classes may get you close enough to the girls to sniff their asses, but it will also get you freindzoned a lot more often than getting you laid. And those sites and books might actually help you understand that you really can get pussy. You don't have to keep settling for a pat on the head and a "goooood boy" in exchange for selling your own humanity down the river. That is exactly what you are doing, by the way.

Because that IS the kind of men you are; insinuating yourselves into the good graces of some really intellectually skanky women, playing Captain Macho Bodyguard/thug/lapdog at public events, or wherever she snaps her fingers and points to. It is the beta move of a wannabe alpha. Take it from me, as a woman, you can do better than that. Oh, and you might want to notice that the guys they are actually fucking are not the ones hopping around like trained bunnies trying to please them.

Just saying.

I know, I know. This is in all likelihood not going to reach you. Men like you have always opted to settle for the smell of pussy, even when it remains out of reach, when confronted with the fear of your choices taking even the smell away. But I had to try. I had to make the attempt to reach out and help you understand how self defeating and pointless your action are. And how pathetic.

I am an advocate for all men and boys. Even men like you, which I think in the course of writing this I have come to understand better than when I started asking all those questions.

Thanks for listening, though. I guess we'll be seeing you at the event Thursday night. Remember to smile for the cameras!

Revolutionary Students Movement calls for violence

April 3, 2013 | by Kristina Hansen | Link | Original Link

With the recent events surrounding the University of Toronto and CAFE's lectures about men's rights/issues, there has been a significant call to action from feminists and their supporters such as the Revolutionary Students Movement (RSM) to "condemn and physically challenge" men's rights activists.

> "We cannot tolerate this reactionary [MRA] point-of-view! The MRAs must be exposed for what they really are—at best, opportunistic hate-mongers who are taking advantage of the powerlessness keenly felt by the masses. At worst, they represent the most reactive, backward voices within the masses. As such, they need to be verbally condemned as well as physically challenged."

This is indeed a call to verbally and physically assault men's rights supporters and activists. The irony here is that they have not "exposed" any men's rights activists, but they have done a good job at exposing themselves as advocates of verbal and physical violence.

Not only have they managed to expose themselves as advocates of violence, they have also exposed themselves as a hate movement. Again the irony is rife and reeks of abject stupidity. If you are wondering what stupidity smells like, it's mostly a combination of body odor and incense with a high note of fear.

Their comparison of men's rights activists to the KKK in the article is ludicrous

> "The KKK, like the MRAs, also construed itself as 'victims'."

It does nothing but demonstrate that the RSM is an ill-informed bunch of brainwashed sheep who have bought into the feminist propaganda bullshit.

The problem is that groups like the RSM and their supporters are incapable of anything other than thuggery and see violence as the only answer. These are people who are incapable of any rational thought process and have been blinded by a dangerous ideology, quite like suicide bombers who believe their violence and self sacrifice will gain them praise and honor.

This is the reason that caution and vigilance is required when dealing with these people. They have no problem with inflicting harm and engaging in violence for their cause. They have condemned all men's rights supporters and activists and labeled them as the evil enemy that must be destroyed. basically at any cost.

> "the underworld of misogynists has been unleashed."

They will stop at nothing to vilify us and skew public perception to their advantage. They encourage hatred towards all men's rights supporters and activists with their propaganda, just as any totalitarian regime does.

> “men’s rights activist [sic]and the organizations they politically affiliate themselves with hold other anti-modern, proto-fascist sentiments such as opposition to same sex marriage, immigration, women in the workplace and the economic advancement of non-white citizens.”

The irony in the quote above is that men’s rights supporters and activists are “proto-fascists”, yet it is groups like the RSM who are the ones acting like dictators and emphasizing an aggressive nationalism, militarism, and form of racism which one could accurately attribute to hate groups such as the KKK, who incites and condones bias-motivated violence.

These individuals are unbalanced and dangerous. They may be good for a laugh when you read their blogs or articles, but make no mistake. These people are as rational as a potato and are basically only capable of violently lashing out to defend their ideology because their arguments and talking points are weak.

When you have no rational argument or facts to stand on, brute force and violence are the only things left in your arsenal. They will provoke us in any attempt to incite violence and use that provocation to justify acts of violence towards us.

We can never give in and feed their desire for violence. We must stand strong and stare their hatred of us in the face. We must never raise our fists in either anger or defiance. We must remember that our strength comes from our ability to separate ourselves from those that advocate and promote violence, and that together we have become a powerful force that has never used violence and yet has been able to strike absolute fear into the hearts of those that seek to silence us.

That is power.

Feminism, with and without the mask

April 4, 2013 | by Jared White | Link | Original Link

I will put it this way. When Jared White says stay tuned, you best fucking stay tuned. PE

NCFM sues Selective Service for sex discrimination

April 4, 2013 | by NCFM | Link | Original Link

PRESS RELEASE

Contact: Marc Angelucci, Esq., NCFM Vice President, marcangelucci@hotmail.com 626-319-3081

Or, Steven Svoboda, Esq., NCFM PR Director, arc@post.harvard.edu 925-395-2065

Lawsuit Asserts Department of Defense's Recent Repeal of Ban on Women in Combat Removes Lone Legal Obstacle for Requiring Women to Register for Draft

Los Angeles (4/4/13) – The National Coalition For Men (NCFM) is a non-profit educational organization that advocates for equal rights for men and women.

The National Coalition For Men has filed a lawsuit that challenges the legality of requiring only males to register for the military draft. The lawsuit was filed against the U.S. Selective Service System in the United States District Court for the Northern District of California on April 4, 2013, Case Number CV13-02391.

[image]The 1981 U.S. Supreme Court equal protection case of Rostker v. Goldberg, 453 U.S. 57 (1981) held that men and women were not similarly situated in the U.S. military because women were excluded from combat, therefore women did not have to register for the draft. Dissenting Justice Thurgood Marshall wrote, "The Court today places its imprimatur on one of the most potent remaining public expressions of 'ancient canards about the proper role of women'."

In January of this year, U.S. Secretary of Defense Leon Panetta announced that women will be allowed to enter all combat positions in all branches of the U.S. military, thereby removing the sole legal basis for requiring only males to register for the draft.

NCFM's complaint alleges that because men and women are now similarly situated in the military, Selective Service's requirement that only males must register for the draft violates the rights of both men and women to equal treatment under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments of the United States Constitution, and under United States Code, Title 28, Section 1983.

The plaintiffs seek injunctive and declaratory relief, ordering Selective Service to stop discriminating against men and women by requiring both men and women to register for the draft, or by requiring neither to register for the draft.

Men failing to register for the draft can be fined up to $250,000, sentenced to up to five years in prison, and be denied eligibility for federal and state benefits including jobs, financial aid, citizenship, loans, and job training. Only men now face these harsh penalties.

NCFM calls on the Obama Administration and Congress to end the institutional sex discrimination that requires only men to register for the draft. The ancient canard is gone, because women are now eligible for combat roles in all branches of the U.S. military. There is no longer any legal justification for continuing the unequal treatment of our draft age population based solely on their gender. The Selective Service System should treat men and women equally, including imposing penalties against both men and women for failing to register.

JTO at the University of Toronto today

April 4, 2013 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

---

[quote style="boxed"]If you're looking for some hot water, I can help you find it. ~ Jack White[/quote]

[dropcap]H[/dropcap]ello everybody. I'll begin by saying I love flying! My favorite part is the take-off, followed closely by the landing. Roaring down the runway, feeling the fuselage tilt back as the plane climbs and banks to it's course has never, in the last 4 decades failed to put a big smile on my face. As I write this, the planet is rotating about 30,000 feet beneath my seat over the wing of Air Canada's flight 212 from Vancouver to Montreal — and then on to Toronto. The photo at the beginning of this article is the view directly to my left, shot from my cell phone. By the time you read this I will have landed and this article will have been emailed and edited by Paul before posting on the site. If it's early on Thursday, I'm probably asleep in my hotel room in Toronto.

To the members of the University of Toronto Student's Union, to the members of the thrillingly named "Revolutionary Student's Movement" and to the members of the "Ontario Anarcho-Communist Collective": Hi, I'm John the Other and I'm delighted to be here in Toronto. I'll be attending Thursday's presentation by Drs Nathanson and Young. I read Legalizing Misandry and Spreading Misandry as each book was published, and copies of both sit on my bookshelves back in Vancouver. I've also read some of the public statements by your groups, particularly the University of Toronto Student's Union and the Revolutionary Student Movement (that name amuses me).

What is it exactly that you are revolting against? Your ideology, as nearly as I can figure, /is/ the current status quo in the western world. I thought it was organizations like AVfM who are working to effect change in public understanding, policy and social narrative.

However, concerning the announcement by the RSM that men's human rights activists will be, according to the RSM, "condemned and physically challenged". Are you jokers kidding me? I cannot read or retype those words without rolling my eyes and giggling. Street violence, right? That's what you're promising? Can it even be possible that you clowns are that stupid?

In case it's not completely obvious by now, I'll spell it out for you as clearly as I'm able. To everyone screaming, crying and working themselves up to commit violence, censorship and other public mischief: We've been saying for years that the ideology of gender you support is based on hatred and violence and you are proving us right. You are repeatedly proving that everything we've been saying is correct. In fact, your ridiculous, illegal and violent antics at each of the past presentations by the Canadian Association for Equality are why I've come all the way to Toronto. I want to see you perform your histrionic, absurdist and violent dance in person. I want to see it myself and capture it on video, because it is the most powerful and convincing message any of us can possibly send of the ethical, moral and factual bankruptcy of the populist ideology of gender and of the absolute urgent necessity of our activism at AVfM.

You are our most convincing and effective allies in spreading our message. That's why I'm in your town, gentlemen and ladies. I have told you of my plans, and have done so in the full confidence that you will STILL give me exactly what you've been working yourselves up to; absurd, histrionic vitriol and violence. Here is the evidence of your absolute ethical bankruptcy and the continued abject failure to respond to anything argued by the Men's Human Rights Movement except by more escalated hatred identity politics and empty accusations of malice. You know how that song goes. Rape apologetics, child molestation etc, etc.

Well, here, it appears that you have even made some really nifty, intellectually grounded signs that will be on display tonight.

[image]

Wow, there is a sound argument. Quite impressive. And you even spelled "misanthropic" correctly. Let's have a look at another one of your academically profound statements.

[image]

Ah yes, of course, what's the gender card without the race card? By the way, that reminds me, I will be accompanied today by, among others, one Agent Tungsten. She may have some questions about this sign, in particular. She will be representing questions from the scores of women in our movement. By the way, "won't" has an apostrophe. I know it is nit picking, but this is a University campus we are talking about, and the sign only has eight words. Please, you are already embarrassing yourself enough without adding illiteracy to the mix.

Now, it has occurred to me that many, if not most of you, are already sharply aware of your own abject moral failure. The masks worn by protesters at the last CAFE event were a strong indicator of consciousness of guilt. But in light of that possible self-knowledge, you – the various members of the University of Toronto Student's Union, the anarcho-communist clowns and so on – might be doubling down. Your escalation of public aggression and violence may be in the hope that, even though you've outed yourself as having no moral leg to stand on, your hope that those arguing for the human rights of men and boys will be frightened and intimidated into silence. I don't know if that hypothesis is correct, but if it is, I have to wonder: Have none of you been paying attention?

In fact, let my visit to Toronto be an object lesson. You promised to "condemn and physically challenge" men's human rights activists, and voila, here I am in your city, along with a whole bunch of my fellow Men's Human Rights Activists providing logistical and practical support. I don't say that to provoke you, or as a challenge for you to follow through with your promised threats, but simply as a clear statement that if you think you are going to shut anyone up, you are just not paying attention.

In fact, while you are here, I invite you to browse though the contents of this website. Pay particular attention to the rhetoric of myself and the site's owner, Paul Elam. Listen to any one of the several interviews with him posted to the site. Does anything about A Voice for Men, in any form or fashion, indicate to you that we have any intention of being silenced? Does it even seem like a remote possibility to you?

If it does, then I suggest you might bow out of sexual politics and seek assistance with your learning disability.

In spite of how clearly I've laid out what I expect and how eager I am to exploit the continued antics of those who, when it comes down to it, are nothing but violent bigots and thugs, I am counting on you to carry on as you have been.

My job is to take everything you do, every law you break, every act of moral repugnance and every attempt to bully or silence anyone, and use it in the arena of public discourse to fuck your shit up.

Love, John.

Ignoble goal, noble method and insanity

April 5, 2013 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

It appalls me that what I'm about to spell out here is even necessary, but after the positively cartoonish stupidity demonstrated by self-professed feminists in Toronto, what appears obvious to me must not only be stated clearly, but explained as to a mentally defective toddler.

Intention and action are not separate. This assertion is the opposite of the expression "the ends justify the means". Do noble goals justify the pursuit of such goals by ignoble, or unethical methods? Is it justifiable to use a violent, or immoral strategy in the achievement of a noble, or socially positive goal?

For a great many, the answer appears to be a resounding yes, which is very sad indeed. Sad, not because a "better" way exists, but because the question itself is incoherent. Is it justifiable to pursue a noble goal through ignoble methods? This question falsely presumes that methods and goals are separable.

For example, the claim of those engaging in violence, censorship and harassment is that they do so in pursuit of universal human rights. This is utterly incoherent. Their efforts to protect those rights using methods of censorship, vandalism, assault and other criminal behavior are a complete contradiction of their stated values.

Methods are not separable from goals. Methods indeed ARE the goals they pursue. This is a simple, self-evident concept and yet, here I am, spelling it out. Is this exposition really necessary? Really?

What about an example from recent history? Why did the Klu Klux Klan cover their faces behind masks and hoods?

This is a question of motivation, and thus, speculation. But here's at least a few reasons. Intimidation is almost certainly near the top of the list. If you were black, living in a community in which the Klan was active, being harassed by people you know are your neighbors, but who are semi anonymous behind hoods, almost certainly increased the intimidation.

But the masks of Klansmen also indicate self-awareness. In the legal lexicon, this is called consciousness of guilt. The reason to hide their faces was principally that they knew they were engaged in wrongdoing.

http://www.judcom.nsw.gov.au/publications/benchbks/criminal/consciousness_of_guilt.html http://www.omsj.org/blogs/understanding-consciousness-of-guilt

Women and men, gays, lesbians, transsexuals, this ethnicity, that ethnicity – should work together. I'm paraphrasing from memory something the "protesters" at Thursday's CAFE presentation by Drs Nathanson and Young chanted through megaphones in the hallway directly outside the lecture theater where they were speaking.

Due to the crystal clear intention to disallow the presentation, the hallway was as far as the attending police would allow the demonstrators. Their overt intention, as publicized, was to engage in direct personal violence against anyone identified as a Men's Human Rights Activist. Feminists showed up to shout down and silence any opinion but their own. Feminists showed up with masked enforcers, carrying clubs and a public declaration of intended violence. This was the presence on the ground in Toronto of feminism's modern face; to silence Nathanson and Young, chanting "we should work together".

"We should work together!" they screamed, drowning out all voices but their own.

They screamed this into my face, over and over. I replied I agree with what you are saying now, but you are demonstrating the opposite intention by screaming over anything I might say, any question I might ask, and preventing, by force, anyone else from having a voice or listening to anyone but you.

"We should work together" was screamed into my face repeatedly by the members of an angry, masked mob. They chanted it to the rhythm of wooden clubs beaten on the floor in a scene lifted directly from Lord of the Flies.

Proponents argue that feminism is a synonymous with equality. They claim they advocate for the human rights of all, including men and boys; that it is they who fight for an end to unequal sentencing in courts, work to reduce the 60% to 90% male weighted issue of homelessness, and work to resolve the issue of 80% male suicide. This claimed to me at an event addressing male marginalization, institutional anti male sexism – which they attended in force wearing masks, carrying bullhorns and insulting signage to silence,to shut down and to disrupt the event – the very same event which they published a prior statement promising to assault Men's Human Rights Activists.

The same individual who made this claim, directly to my face, is the same individual who, at Janice Fiamengo's previously protested lecture, wore a mask and carried a sign reading "I'm sorry I hurt your manfeelz". As I attempted to reply to her claims about the goals of our cause, she shouted me down. "MANSPLAINING! MAINSPLAINING! MANSPLAINING! MANSPLAINING MAINSPLAINING".

It is a word meaning whatever I might say as a man is invalid, void and to be ignored because of my sex. You are male and therefore wrong: mansplaining. She then screamed, from less than two feet away "Misandry isn't real! Misandry isn't real! Misandry isn't real! Misandry isn't real!" persisting in this abuse until the person I was trying to converse with walked away out of the "I'm being deafened" range of her voice.

Gender ideology, she further assured me, is my friend. I should abandon my activism and embrace her ideology. You know, the one claiming that "women being people" is a radical notion.

I related some of this to Harry Crouch in a Skype conversation from my hotel room after having joined a few other activists for dinner. His observation?

"We won't be rid of this violent hateful insanity until we locate their space ship". His joking speculation being that they are aliens. I simply think they are minds broken and deranged by an ideology similar in almost every respect to a fundamentalist religious cult.

A peaceful goal cannot be attained through violence. The human rights of any group cannot be achieved or protected by the suppression of the rights of another group. Working together cannot be achieved by silencing, intimidating, assaulting and censoring. Why does this need to be spelled out?

These people are all sane enough to get their pants on the right way each day. They're functional enough to pay their bills, to vote, to drive cars, and use a knife and fork at the dinner table without serious self-injury. Do they really not grasp the very basic concept that violence and censorship used as tools for social change lead nowhere except toward further violence and censorship?

Do these questions really need to be asked? Can otherwise functional humans actually lack comprehension of what is so screamingly obvious?

I can think of four possible hypotheses as alternative explanations. One is that a major subset of humans are not intelligent. They are not sentient, thinking, self-aware beings. They are not fully realized people. Rather, they are upright apes; creatures whose appearance, clothing and superficial manner resembles sentience, but only superficially; people who are actually sub-sentient, instinct driven beasts.

I'm not a fan of this explanation, at all.

Another possibility is that all the overt, obvious contradiction between claims like "feminism is about equality" and the relentless efforts to silence, censor, intimidate and threaten violence are purposeful. They understand completely what they are doing. They are evil.

I don't care much for this as an explanation either.

What about mental illness? Can it be that so large a subset of male and female humanity – particularly those we find engaging in efforts to silence all opinion differing from their own- feel compelled to force the silence and obedience of people they freely admit face serious human rights issues (homelessness, suicide, exclusion in education and so on) are the victims of mental illnesses; Cluster B brain chemistry malfunction manifested as gender ideology with mob singing back-up?

I know some of my colleagues put their money on this explanation, or on a variation of it. I think it has some merit but I don't think its a complete answer.

Here's my best guess. Reason, unfortunately for some, is ideology soluble. By ideology, I mean any system of thought which begins with the answer; any point of view that starts with its axioms being the same as it's conclusions. My Holy Book is the explanation of life, the universe and everything because my Holy Book says it is the explanation of life the universe and everything. This is my definition of ideology, in contrast to a reality I will call philosophical, rather than ideological. What distinguishes these terms? A philosophical view begins with a question or an observation followed by a question. Answers such as may be found are not fixed points in the cosmos. Rather than being axiomatic, answers depend on observation, reason, rationality, and evidence – and are subject to change, depending on changes in observed evidence and so on. It is not a view with a fixed, immutable “truth”, except which can be derived from observation and evidence. Truth (capital T) distinguishes ideology.

Ideology is the antithesis of reason. In fact it may be so dangerous to a human mind it can permanently cripple those infected by it, rendering them incapable of reason, thought and sentience.

This is my best guess and most likely hypothesis, provided as an explanation of what I have seen repeatedly and have just seen on the campus of the University of Toronto in Ontario.

And feminism is an ideology.

On tits, ass and fucktards

April 5, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

I love a nice set of tits.

I mean, seriously. I don't mean they have to be big. In fact, small shapely tits are every bit as nice as big ones.

Oh, and I like a nice round ass, too; curvy with a smallish waist floating over hips that flare at just the right angle. I like well-formed thighs that lead up to the promise land, and smooth knees above shapely calves. Of course, all that combined with a woman's pretty face is a crowning glory; full lips that promise supple kisses and great blow jobs, clear eyes and unblemished skin. All this combines to make a woman utterly fuckable, and visually that is what I like most of all. I like to look at women that are little fuckmuffins.

And I really like it when those fuckmuffins are sexually liberated and adventurous; when they like to please and be pleased, not living life with prudish sticks up their asses made from the same wood that forms the chips on their shoulders. It makes them a fuck-ton more fun.

If you have a problem, with any of this, you can go fuck yourself.

Of the now almost endless list of things that have grown annoyingly stupid and sanctimonious about feminism is the Victorianesque shaming of my sexual programming as a man. Even with the so called "sex positive" feminists, the most hypocritical assholes of them all, the only positive sexuality they embrace is that of women. To them, male sexuality, in all its glory, is something to be buried, controlled and allowed to surface only when it serves the sexual needs of some narcissistic, horny, self-absorbed little "sex positive" princess.

The FAT (feminist and traditionalist) clause applies here, also. And the traditionalists have been at it longer than even the feminists have. Who are those traditionalists? You will know them by their obsequious silence while feminists shame men for committing the scurrilous act of looking at women sexually. Or better yet, as they join in with their "men can stop rape" bedfellows to twist and distort the natural inclinations of young men with Puritan sexual guilt that marches in lockstep with the feminist hatred of male sexuality.

Gynocentrism, as the name directly implies, is about the pussy, not the dick.

Now, all that being said, is woman-as-fuckmuffin all I care about? Hardly. As a matter of fact, I would throw fuckmuffin to the curb faster than you can say "patriarchy" to spend time with a woman of good character and intelligence. I have learned in life that my dick has a healthy agenda for humanity, but not necessarily for me. So as my values have matured, so has my taste in women.

The point here is that my development in this way is a product of normal masculine development. It is not a result of feminist fucktards trying to shame me for liking tits, or traditionalist fucktards trying to shame me for the exact same thing.

And I am the one that benefits from it, not feminists, not traditionalists, and not fuckmuffin, who is prone to act indignant when she feels sexualized (by the wrong guy). She can become so angry at being “objectified” that you can see her tits shake right through that tight sweater with the neckline that plunges to the vicinity of her toes.

You see, if you want men to quit sexualizing women so much, all you have to do is get out of their way. Time and experience will lead them to understand that fuckmuffin should be regarded with same respect as you would afford a stinging insect. The scar tissue from burns bear messages; important ones. Like, “Hey man, those tits are nice, but pay attention to how she ACTS.”

Most men get this with time. And they learn to value women for much more than their looks. Again, they do this without the chiding of neurotic ideologues or the shopworn moralizing of pious freaks whose main problem is that they are ashamed of their own sexuality.

And until they get it? Leave them the fuck alone. There is nothing wrong with them. Nothing needs to be fixed. If you want to help a young man like that, just start encouraging him to connect the dots between fuckmuffin’s propensity to take her own picture and post it to Facebook four times a day and her ultimate tendency to make him miserable. Eventually he will get the connection. And if he doesn’t, maybe that makes him happy. Either way, it is none of your fucking business.

Toronto Protest Up-To-Date Coverage

April 5, 2013 | by Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) | Link | Original Link

---

There will be a good deal of video available on the University of Toronto protest in the coming days. As more video is produced, it will be updated to this page.

AVFM Coverage:

FSAC Coverage:

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=PZvUA6hUVok

From 18Upper

From St37One:

From EqualityCanadaTV:

From StudioBrule:

From Dean Esmay:

From Genderratic(a historical comparison):

http://youtu.be/Ko9i1_6oatk

http://youtu.be/EoRphmGrtn8

From John the Other(John Hembling):

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=vprTOAg1Qh0

From The Amazing Atheist — great video by TJ till he stuck his foot in it at the end and suggested “The MRA thing is over.” Not only a weak move (he could not even look at the camera while he said it) but hypocritical. TJ has always taken the same exact stand about feminists that we have.

Ryersonian Live Feed:

http://live.ryersonian.ca/Event/Protesters_expected_to_disrupt_mens_issues_awareness_event_at_U_of_T?Page=1

The Voice of Europe: Identity Politics

April 5, 2013 | by James Huff | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]

On April 5, 2013, Lucian Vâlsan, the European News Director for AVfM, Huffnagel Pista, Hungarian MRA and permanent co-host and James Huff, the Director of AVfM Radio and producer invite you to join them in a principled discussion about identity politics.

The only radio show addressing the issues of men and boys at a European level is hosting this discussion in order to make it clear what identity politics means and how it leads to dangerous ideologies such as feminism, (anarcho-)communism or national socialism.

Perpetual revolution, perpetual victimhood, perpetual perception of imagined oppression and perpetual (gender) class struggle are amongst the core tenets of several collectivist ideologies and they are also toxic ideas and practices for society as a whole.

Call in and Skype in and engage in discussions with us on identity politics and the increasingly obvious parallels between the ideology of hate commonly known as feminism and other ideologies that have torn Europe apart with the last hundred of years.

Call in number: (001) 310 388 9709

The show will commence at 7 PM GMT (London, Reykjavik and Lisbon time).

That is 8 PM CET (Madrid, Paris, Brussels, Rome, Oslo, Stockholm, Copenhagen, Budapest, Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw, Amsterdam, Bern, Bratislava, Prague, Belgrade, Tirana, Ljubljana, Zagreb, Sarajevo and Skopje time)

That is 9 PM EET (Helsinki, Tallinn, Riga, Vilnius, Kiev, Chisinau, Bucharest, Sofia, Athens, Ankara and Nicosia time)

That is 10 PM FEET (Minsk time)

And, finally, 11 PM Moscow time.

And for the listeners from North America this means 2 PM EST, 1 PM CST, 12 PM MST and 11 AM PST (times adjusted in accordance with DST both for Europe and North America).

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

Did you know women hold up half the sky?

April 5, 2013 | by John Hembling (JtO) | Link | Original Link

---

Neither did I. At least, I didn't know it until having it screamed at me by the protestors of the Nathanson and Young talk at the University of Toronto.

Lord of the Flies. This is the only comparison I can make that will convey a sense of what I just experienced tonight. As predicted in an article published earlier today on AVfM, a contingent of 70 to 80 radical feminists converged on the CAFE presentation of Drs Nathanson and Young. I had arrived, along with fellow MHRAs Dan Perrins, Christian Chiasson, Agent Tungsten and a handful of others, eager to hear Dr. Nathanson and Dr. Young speak. We loitered near the building's entrance, drinking coffee and meeting each other face to face – most for the first time. About an hour prior to the scheduled start of the CAFE presentation, the feminists arrived, equipped with placards and signs on posts, from the direction of Spadina Avenue. Weirdly, on observing a handful of Men's Human Rights Activists, they veered away from the building's entrance and took up a position on the boulevard at the end of the block.

We were puzzled by this. After a few minutes, I made my way down to the grassy knoll at the end of the 100 block of Harbord street where I discovered that chanting in rhyme appears to be what now passes for a serious rebuttal to the Men's Human Rights Movement. "MRA's telling lies – we wont fall for your disguise!!"

I asked what lies. They chanted louder. I didn't ask what disguise – that much was obvious. Many of the protestors, particularly the male feminists in attendance, wore full face masks like low rent extras in a Hong Kong Kung Fu flick. I asked questions. What is it you object to? Are you protesting the authors of Legalizing Misandry? Why are you wearing masks?

The masks were apparently worn to prevent MHRAs from identifying, harassing, stalking and interfering with the employment of "legitimate protesters". I was not aware we did that and challenged this assertion with requests for specifics, examples or even a cited source. Apparently if I don't supply the evidence in arguments made against me I am beyond any help of gods or men. I tried, without success, to engage any of the apparent leaders of the rhyming chanters in discussion.

The insistence ensued that I (as well as others at AVFM) personally harassed, stalked and interfered with the families and employers of those violent bigots who assaulted and harassed attendees at Dr. Warren Farrell's November 2012 lecture, and apparently has more to it than histrionic narrative building. It was preemptive rationalization and projection and what should be expected from those who claim the sky needs to be held up by women or by men.

"Don't believe MRA Lies! Women hold up half the sky!"

And no, I don't know what "hold up the sky" means either.

Dialogue is the opposite of war,however, and the subject of tonight's CAFE presentation.

“From Misogyny & Misandry to Intersexual Dialogue”

“We don’t speak to you scum” was about the most civil reply I could elicit. Several signs naming me personally as well as referring to the dog-training metaphors of my recent writing on AVFM was heartening. At least I know my writing has an attentive audience. One poster repeatedly claimed that M(H)RAs referred to feminists as dogs to be trained, betraying purposeful self selected victimization of the canine metaphor. No, little femmies, we’re not saying you are actual, literal untrained house pets. Puppies are cuter and not generally driven by such purposeful malice.

After repeated attempts to engage civilly with children of the leisure class met with nothing other than more accusations screamed in rhyme, we withdrew to find our seats for the scheduled lecture.

MRAs! – No way! Shame on you promoting hate!

Shame on you and the U of T for allowing misogyny!!

This is the caliber of counter argument against a human rights movement seeking to address issues such as male homelessness, suicide, educational disparity, sentencing disparity, healthcare disparity, family court discrimination, paternity fraud, lack of reproductive rights, forced conscription, child soldiers, incarceration for profit, genital mutilation and employment marginalization among other problems.

One poster read “Misogynist Rape apologetic Assholes”.

Wow, well argued. Convincing too, especially the rhymes and near rhymes.

Predictably, they set off the fire alarm. Yet again. That’s right, men addressing male human rights issues must not be allowed to meet or speak. They must be stopped at every turn because of Patriarchy! And Penis!

I had 50 conversations like this:

Him: “You’re a rape apologist”!

Me: “Dude, I’m a person. I’m a human standing right here. This is me”.

Him: “Fucking MRA rapist”!

Me: “I’m a person in front of you, standing here. Are you really telling me I’m a rapist”?

Him: “Your website supports rape so you do too”!

Me: “I write for AVFM, and nobody there supports rape. You’re accusing a real person (me) of a violent crime”?

At this point – his brain made a “click” noise. I’m sure I heard it. CLICK!. He then indexed the next accusation, just as if his rape-apologist narrative had never happened.

Him: “You’re a privileged, sexist, sick and twisted cis-gendered privileged white male and you should be put down”! Yes, he really said that.

Me: “What on earth makes you think I’m “cis gendered”?

I hear his brain go CLICK again as the next accusation indexes into place.

Him: “Well you’re a sick, privileged white overlord scum”!

Me: “Why must you reduce me to a racial stereotype, can’t I just be human”?

CLICK

Him: “You’re a hatemonger racist”! I had to cut him off here.

Me: “Nope, we’re going back one. You called me white scum. What does my ethnicity have to do with anything? I don’t care what color you are. It’s a trivial detail”.

CLICK!

Him: “How dare you disregard something so fundamental to my identity”!

And on it went. He accused me of every egregious category of bigotry he could think of. Each time I demonstrated the illogic and simple falsehood of each accusation, like a talking doll with a pull-string in the back of his neck, he indexed to the next attack, with seemingly no awareness of what he’d said seconds earlier. One argument of this pattern would be surreal. I had over 50 conversations of this shape, each with different individuals. Some of the accusations even circled around to repetitions of themselves.

When, after the fire alarm was sorted out, we returned to the lecture hall to proceed with the presentation, the “protestors” waited a discreet four or five minutes before following us in as far as the outer hallway where a dozen police halted their progress where, of course, they began chanting again.

Having stripped off the cardboard placards, they now carried 4 foot long 2 inch by 1 inch wide wooden sticks which they used in unison to hammer on the floor in tempo with a chant of:

“MRA’s telling lies! We wont fall for your disguise!! Boom boom boom.” Those without wooden clubs kicked doors and lockers, matching those hammering the floor with wooden clubs, and shouting: “We wont fall for your disguise!”, while wearing bandanas and black balaclavas.

I could not make this up.

“We have clubs and crazy eyes! A scene right out of Lord of the Flies!” That’s my rhyme. They didn’t chant it but it would have been fitting.

I walked into the middle of this mob and stood, waiting for whatever was next. To those who got right into my face I asked, “What if you’re wrong”? This just made them shout their rhyme about lies and disguises louder while hiding behind their disguises. Nobody struck me or anyone else with a club, although after this bit of drama several other MHRAs suggested I had put myself in unnecessary danger. I reserve my disagreement. Considering this display of attempted intimidation I can only imagine the outcome had the same event occurred without multiple camera-equipped Men’s Human Rights activists to guarantee public accountability of whatever transpired.

After the presentation’s many delays only about 6 people had an opportunity to pose questions. One of whom was a man who had previously been seduced by a self avowed feminist. Her stated goal in life was apparently to bed as many men as possible in order to level false accusations of rape against them for her own satisfaction. The false rape accusation phenomenon was something at least 6 attending protesters insisted to me in the most urgent tone cannot, does not, never has and never will happen and doesn't exist.

After the question period, Dan Perrins interviewed Dr Paul Nathanson before both Nathanson and Young were escorted by multiple police officers to their cars. Roughly 20 officers attended, including 3 undercover officers. The threat of violence by campus feminists was taken seriously.

I'm flying back to Vancouver tomorrow where I regret the necessary admission that Feminists in my home town are not sane either, and likely just as dangerous.

Lindy West pees on leg, says it's raining

April 7, 2013 | by Dr. Tara J. Palmatier | Link | Original Link

---

Lindy West recently wrote a disingenuous femifesto on Jezebel titled, If I admit that 'hating men' is a thing, will you stop turning it in to a self-fulfilling prophecy? Gordon Wadsworth did a brilliant job of addressing Ms. West's dubious assertions here.

Ms. West claims that:

[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- Feminists are aware of the problems men and boys face and that they really care about them, really, really;
- "Patriarchy" is the cause of these problems;
- Misandry does not exist. Those who insist misandry exists are angering feminists who believe in things like the patriarchy, rape culture, that telling men and boys (most of whom are not rapists) not to rape is a viable solution to sexual violence and that women in the western world still face large scale discrimination and disadvantage;
- Feminism and feminist sponsored legislature/initiatives that favor women and girls in all things are the antidote to the problems faced by men and boys, not the cause of them; and
- Some feminists do hate men, however, if more and more men and women keep complaining and insisting on equal treatment under the law and resources to remedy these problems, feminists will start hating on men for reals. So, if you think feminists hate men now, keep complaining and demanding redress and they'll really give you something to complain about.

[/unordered_list]

Pardon the crassness, but Ms. West just peed on your leg and told you it was raining — or what some mental health professionals call gaslighting. Feminists know what gaslighting is, too. It's listed as a form of psychological abuse on most women's domestic violence websites.

Gaslighting is a term derived from the 1940 film, Gaslight, in which the husband character attempts to make his wife believe she's going insane. He causes her to doubt her perceptions and memory (gaslighting). His wants to institutionalize her, so he can take off with a fortune.

Who is likely to engage in gaslighting?

Sociopaths, personality-disordered individuals, bullies and abusers. Children who are unable to distinguish between magical thinking/fantasy and reality do as well. It's a non-clinical issue until a certain age – unless the parents fail to foster the child's critical thinking and reality testing abilities and fail to teach the child that, unless they grow up to be a fiction writer or a gender ideologue, making stuff up is called lying and lying is wrong.

Martha Stout, PhD (2006) states it's common for sociopaths to deny their misdeeds, abuses and/or crimes. They can be such charming and practiced liars that their victims may doubt their own experiences and believe the lies of the sociopath.

Many of my clients have been gaslighted by their abusive, personality disordered and/or sociopathic wives, girlfriends and exes. For example:

- Husband always places his car keys on a hook by the front door. Wife takes car keys and hides them unbeknownst to husband. Husband asks wife if she has seen the keys. Wife tells husband he needs to be more responsible with his things and then later hangs keys on hooks after husband spends hours looking for them.
- Girlfriend constantly ridicules and denigrates boyfriend. Boyfriend tells girlfriend he is hurt by her criticisms and name-calling. Girlfriend becomes outraged when held accountable and denies having said these things. She tells boyfriend it's "all in his head," he "misunderstood," is "too sensitive" or she's doing it to "help him be a better man."
- Ex-wife sends hostile email to ex-husband to say she plans to violate their custody order by not having kids at the designated exchange time and place because (fill in self-centered, self-serving, PASing reason here). Ex-husband replies and asks ex-wife if she is planning to violate the court order to clarify (yes, you really have to spell these things out for some Family Court judges). Ex-wife becomes outraged at having her pending violation of the court order pointed out to her and sends another hostile email denying what she wrote in the first email (even though it's in writing) and accusing ex-husband of "always twisting things around" to make her look like "the crazy problem parent."

Over the last year, the MSM has begun to report on men's issues and the MRHM after ignoring and occasionally ridiculing both for decades. Since feminists are unable to sweep these matters under the carpet anymore and the MHRM isn't shutting up, feminists are changing tactics. In a painfully obvious attempt to maintain their stranglehold on the narrative, feminists are now insisting feminism has been and is fighting for men and boys and that they care about the much higher rates of male suicide, unemployment and homelessness and male victims of violence, the female bias in family and criminal courts and the academic underperformance of boys.

Feminist organizations care about male victims of DV? Where are the shelters offering beds to men and their children? Most DV centers have discriminated against men and boys since their inception based on their sex and yet receive millions of dollars in state and federal monies. Meanwhile, there are only a handful of men's DV shelters, that is, if there's even a handful.

Women, who already outlive men, continue to receive the majority of healthcare funding and research monies. Girls and women are still given more educational entitlements even though they outperform boys and outnumber them in colleges and universities. Where's the help? Where's the evidence of "working on it?" Is the "Dear Colleague letter" what feminists consider "helping?"

Men are sentenced to prison more often and for far longer than women who commit similar crimes (if women are punished at all). There are actually groups in the UK lobbying for the elimination of female prisons altogether and recommend sentencing female criminals to therapy instead of jail.

Therapy is not a crime deterrent. Kind of, sort of, not really holding a woman accountable for theft, murder, rape, violence or child abuse by sending her to a therapist's office is not justice either. In therapy, the female criminal will likely be coached to blame her crimes on her parents, her boyfriend, her ex-husband or some random stranger that allegedly abused her thereby absolving her from any accountability and meaningful consequences for her actions. To repeat, this is not justice and it's not a crime deterrent. It's the enabling of criminal and aberrant behaviors.

Feminist organizations like NOW have built powerful political lobbies to discredit Parental Alienation Syndrome. They helped to block it from being included in the DSM-V despite years of peer-reviewed research proving it's a real phenomenon. NOW claims PAS is junk science and a ploy by abusive fathers to take children away from loving mothers. NOW paints fathers who want equal parenting rights as potential deadbeat dads and potential pedophiles and abusers.

NOW and other like-minded feminist groups just aren't harming fathers and children in their zeal to maintain a female-biased Family Court – they're hurting grandmothers, aunts and mothers who are targets of an alienating parent, too. Millions of VAWA dollars are spent each year training judges and law enforcement to continue to see men as the aggressors and women as the victim despite evidence that there is gender symmetry in domestic violence (i.e., men and women abuse one another at nearly equal rates).

There is an ongoing battle across the US to make 50/50 parenting the default and to abolish lifetime alimony. Are feminist organizations fighting that battle? No, Fathers' Groups and the MHRM are fighting the battle. Where are the feminist organizations fighting for these changes? (*Saying you're working on it by dismantling the patriarchy doesn't count.) The reality is feminist organizations are actively lobbying for even more female-friendly Family Court laws while cranking up the erosion of men's rights and equal protection under the law. And VAWA? It ought to be renamed VUAA, the Vaginas Über Alles Act.

Ms. West's article also calls to mind a scene from "Brawl in the Family" (The Simpsons, Season 13 Episode 23, 1:21-1:57 – funniest episode ever) in which Nelson Muntz, Springfield's town bully, gives a spotted owl a noogie while taunting, "Stop endangering yourself! Stop endangering yourself!"

Despite all evidence to the contrary, West claims that feminism is on the side of men and boys. She blames the problems men and boys face on the “patriarchy” and patriarchy equals men and that means y-o-u, men and boys. The reason you’re committing suicide at 4x a higher rate than women, represent more of the homeless, the unemployed, etc., etc., etc., is you. If men are to blame for the problems they currently face, it because too many men (and women) have stood by, ignored the growing problem and done nothing.

Earlier, I said Lindy West was peeing on your leg and telling you it’s raining. I’d like to amend that. Lindy West is telling you it’s raining when you can clearly see the stream of urine soaking your trousers, that you’re crazy and are just making up the urine and, even if it really is urine, hey, you brought it on yourselves and don’t you know how hard feminists like Lindy are fighting you to help you and how tired feminists are of the injustices and inequalities men and boys suffer? What’s wrong with you? Where’s your gratitude? Sheesh!

Forget microagrression, Ms. West is committing a macroaggression on your intelligence.

West’s line of “reasoning” is not unfamiliar. My therapy and coaching clients sometimes send digital recordings of their partner/ex’s abusive diatribes, blame-fests, rages, etc. There are similarities:

I wouldn’t have had to kick you in the balls and screech at you for hours if you hadn’t been 10 minutes late coming home from work, leaving me alone with the kids because you have no idea how hard it is to be a stay-at-home-mom when the kids are in school all day, and I know you weren’t stuck in rush hour traffic, you were probably cheating on me you pig, and hey, don’t bring Facebook Freddie into this, if you were a real man capable of meeting my needs, I wouldn’t have to turn to someone else, oh, big deal, so you work 60 hours a week, so I don’t have to, so what? What do you want? A fucking medal? YOU’RE SUPPOSED TO TAKE CARE OF ME! Keep pushing me and I’ll take the house and kids and have you arrested. Who do you think the cops are gonna believe? You or sweet, lil ole wouldn’t harm a fly me? I wouldn’t have to get like this if you weren’t such an asshole! This is all your fault!

These are the words and behaviors of a bully who is blaming her abuses on the victim and so is the gaslighting attempt by Lindy West.

Reference:

Stout, M. (2006). The Sociopath Next Door. Random House.

Coaching and Consulting Services:

Dr Tara J. Palmatier provides confidential, fee-for-service, consultation/coaching services to help both men and women work through their relationship issues via telephone and/or Skype chat. Her practice combines practical advice, support, reality testing and goal-oriented outcomes. Please visit the Shrink4Men Services page for professional inquiries.

Shut the fuck up or FTSU

April 7, 2013 | by Greg Canning | Link | Original Link

Feminists such as this and this "shut the fuck up" variant, would have us believe that there exists in modern liberal democracies a "patriarchy", a system of systemic male control designed to oppress women by ostensibly favoring men over women in opportunity and thus singularly biasing outcomes.

I don't see it, rather I see social systems that have evolved over time to ensure the survival of the group, systems that progress over time toward improvement of conditions for the group's members. The reality of human reproductive biology has seen gynocentrism at the core of such systems, which involved different roles and treatment for subgroups based on sex, race, age, ability, and other discriminators. These systems continue to evolve, hopefully toward a situation of equity and fairness for all (I rarely hear the terms equity or fairness from the mouths of ideological feminists.)

Feminists also seem to be fixated on the idea that numerical parity (be it average wages, number of politicians, number of CEO's etc.) defines equality. Numerical parity is forgotten and ignored in the areas where women now surge well ahead [i.e. university enrolments, graduations, custody and alimony awards, life expectancy and health outcomes, reproductive choices etc.] but this is apparently acceptable payback for the presumed sins of generations of men past.

Similarly feminists are simply not interested acknowledging that in some areas such as the dirty and dangerous occupations, occupational deaths and injuries, educational outcomes, health outcomes, suicide rates, conscription and military service, family court bias, sentencing bias etc. numerical parity with men would equate to a significant loss of the systemic privilege women are currently afforded over men, by that system that they argue systemically favors men.

Regrettably women in general have not taken up all of the opportunities that feminism has purportedly opened up for them, as illustrated in this recent Queensland Government Report Queensland Women at a Glance, Aug 2012.

Despite decades of equal opportunity legislation, affirmative action and special programs encouraging women to participate fully in the workforce and in public life in many areas the burden of such participation still falls disproportionately on men.

Only 60% of women of working age are actually employed and almost half of these don't even work full time. Notwithstanding this lower workforce participation rate women still predominate overall in the cozy, comfortable and low risk occupations and the professions.

Of the total numbers employed, women account for 76% clerical and administrative workers, 68% of community and social service workers, 65% of sales workers, and 55% of those employed in the professions. Women have however, been unwilling to break through the glass floor and reach parity with men in the higher risk, less comfortable and more physically strenuous occupations.

Whilst 34% of workers classified as “laborers” are women, when it comes to getting down and dirty with hard manual labor the participation rates are pathetic, with women accounting for only 10% or technical and trade workers and a mere 6% of machinery operators and drivers.

Within the mining industry women constitute a meager 13.5% of the total workforce, but disproportionately hold 20.8% of the managerial roles and 64.9% of the clerical and administrative roles. There are very few women risking their lives, lungs and health at the coalface or underground, with women accounting for a paltry 1.7 % of trade workers and 4.3% of machinery operators.

Despite access to these more highly paying occupations and trades being equally available to men and women for more than 20 years women still mostly avoid them. Pay scales for these more dangerous and technical jobs are based on the position requirements and not on the sex of those preforming the task, which clearly explains why in 2006 the median weekly income in the mining industry was $1,600-$1,999 for men and $1,000-$1,299 for women. Women just won’t do the harder better paying jobs, and a similar pattern is evident in the manufacturing and construction industries.

Women in general retain a greater choice than many men in employment; they less frequently have the expectation of becoming primary breadwinners. Men’s worth on the other hand, is still more commonly judged by society on their ability to provide financial security to their families that is their value as an income deriving utility.

The clear reluctance of women to partake in hard work, or any work at all for that matter is evident in the fact that 1 in 5 women in Queensland list government welfare benefits as their main source of household income. (Presumably paid by the system that favors men over women — right?) Women also make up the vast majority of those who choose to be single parents (87.6%), who do not work and remain dependent on government handouts. Thus significantly increasing the burden on those men and women who do participate in the workforce and whose taxes fund the lifestyle of those too indolent to work or too selfish to offer their children the benefit of a 2 parent family.

We deny the existence of patriarchy (as preached by feminism) in modern western culture, but acknowledge a pervasive gynocentrism that historically confined both men and women to restrictive sex roles.

Students in high school in Queensland are allowed to select the non-core subjects they study. Despite this choice female students still make up the vast majority of students selecting the subjects such as Dance (92.6%), Home Economics (91.9%), Tourism (76.8%), Study of Society (79.4%) and Hospitality Studies (78.9%), but very few girls choose subjects such as Technology Studies (6.8%), Engineering Technology (5.3%), Aerospace Studies (12.3%) and Information Processing and Technology (16.3%).

Female students remain more engaged with education with school retention rates for girls to year 12 being 86% but only 80% for boys. University entry and course completions by women continue to far outnumber men; in 2010, 61.2% of course awards to domestic students went to women.

Whist authorities fail to acknowledge this education advantage held by women, women themselves seem unable or unwilling to translate it into more equal numbers in leadership roles.

Despite the fact that women hold almost 2/3 (64.2%) of Queensland Public service positions (no patriarchal bias there apparently) they account for 41.7% of Senior Officers and 32.2% of Senior Executive Service officers. These numbers show that a greater proportion than the, approximately 20% women who are career centered (according to Catherine Hakim's Preference Theory) are reaching senior and executive positions in the Queensland public service. As in public service employment generally, this likely reflects unfair favoritism shown women in government employment.

Women also comprise 36.7% of all Queensland Government Board members (December 2011) and 44.6% of all new appointments and 50.0% of reappointments to Queensland Government boards again representing higher numbers than expected.

For the record men's human rights activists have no intention of "shutting the fuck up," in fact the stronger your insistence that we do the louder and more persistent our voices will become.

We deny the existence of patriarchy (as preached by feminism) in modern western culture, but acknowledge a pervasive gynocentrism that historically confined both men and women to restrictive sex roles.

Equality or more correctly an equity that accounts for innate differences and the personal choices of men and women, will not be achieved whilst feminism remains focused only on women and women's outcomes and traditionalists attempt to keep sex roles confined.

What is required, is a dialogue, where men are given an equal voice with as much academic effort and funding applied to the men's perspective as has already been devoted to the women's perspective. This is beginning to happen and the response of junior gender ideologues such as Ms. Shut The Fuck Up and others as demonstrated at three recent CAFE events at the University of Toronto will greatly accelerate its momentum, whilst clearly demonstrating its necessity.

University of Toronto Report from Agent Tungsten

April 8, 2013 | by Agent Tungsten | Link | Original Link

Agent Tungsten reporting from the University of Toronto protests against the Canadian Association for Equality's talks on misandry and misogyny

My First Time – Agent Tungsten

So how did I live this long without ever really encountering Radical Feminism before? Easy: I've got a great bullshit detector and whenever I came across something like that it was very easy to dismiss and move on. Frankly, I was too busy living my life to waste time with it. Some would say I should have seen it in college, but college for me was working full time and going to school at night and on weekends. Prior to going to college, I always had a full time and a part time job. My mother taught me to be self-sufficient and never expect anyone else to support me.

One of the core tenets of my life has been a belief in free speech (as long as that speech does not promote violence). When I saw the activities at Dr. Farrell's talk and the box cutter wielding thugs harassing John Hembling (aka John the Other aka JtO), I was furious. No one has the right to stifle free speech, plus, I couldn't believe anyone could so thoroughly dismiss their own hypocrisy. So when I heard that JtO, Dan, and Christian were going to last Thursday's talk sponsored by CAFE, my first thought was that they needed female bodyguards to keep the white knights at bay. My second thought was that I could do it, so I volunteered.

Off to Toronto Thursday morning, where I met the guys on my team for the first time. We arrived well before the protestors and just talked and got to know each other while we waited. Once the protestors arrived and got themselves organized on the grassy knoll we strolled over to get our first look. I wasn't impressed.

Some wore disguises, some didn't and it took them some time to get their chants in sync. While I appreciated the sign naming John and myself, I did wonder what their "Feminist Welcome" would be. JtO engaged them in conversation and I talked to a self-identified gay man who wanted to tell me about the feminist experience. I really couldn't help it, I laughed. There was so much hypocrisy, so much flawed rhetoric, I laughed quite a bit that day.

Originally I felt that my role there was just to record the happenings, stay in the background, and to be a witness, if needed, if anyone on my team was accused of any wrongdoing. I became much more involved than I intended, because when faced with such hypocrisy and such blatant lies, I had no other choice.

The videos I took are all up on Dean Esmay's YouTube channel. Please excuse the quality, I had never used a camcorder before.

Since I prefer to look at the positives, I'll give you a few examples of the good things I saw:

• During the “women hold up half the sky” chant, a woman walking down the street looked over and questioned “then who holds up the other half? We need both men and women!”

• The promised “physical confrontation” never materialized. (Although intimidation was certainly attempted.)

• I had real conversations with at least three or four of the protestors. I didn’t even attempt it with “Big Red”, I learned long ago not to bang my head against a brick wall.

• I saw doubt in the eyes of a couple of them–doubt about what they were saying. It was as if they spent so many hours furiously agreeing with each other that they never considered there is a reasonable opposing argument and didn’t know what to think.

• The “Shame on you!” guy took one of the Men’s Rights March 2013 Internet statements I was handing out and promised to take it home and read it.

• One of the protestors promised to actually read Warren Farrell’s book, “The Myth of Male Power” and come to her own conclusion on the out-of-context, mined quotes often used against him.

• Contrary to what “GenuineWitty” reported on another site, I didn’t see a single MHRA that could be considered “extremist”.

• Many of the protestors talked to and listened to JtO.

I showed my videos to my 15 year old stepson (he had already seen other videos of the protest on Reddit) and we had a very honest and enlightening talk about it. I am very happy to report that he has learned critical thinking along the way. He was both amused and dismayed at the lack of logic and thought, and the lack of a basic grasp of history and math displayed by these college students.

My conclusion is that I hope that those willing to listen will consider what they heard and continue to do the hard work of thinking about issues and coming to their own conclusions based on their own research, reading, and thought. And in the words of JtO to the young man who told him to go to Hell, I wish you all find Health, Happiness, and Love.

Fleetches, flootches, and feminism4

April 8, 2013 | by Ben Hourigan | Link | Original Link

An indirect response to Lindy West

A friend recently posted me Lindy West's March 28 article from Jezebel in response to me using the #antifeminist tag on some of my recent tweets: one about a proposal in Australia to introduce women-only train carriages, issued on International Women's Day, and another about Adria Richards and Donglegate.

It's been suggested to me more than once, and I've only used it twice, that the #antifeminist hashtag is a disgusting thing. This in spite of its being used, among other things, by women posting about how feminism isn't compulsory: that women can take responsibility for their own lives without pinning their hopes on reform of a system, because they are self-determined outside of or in spite of that system. This is one version of what it means to be antifeminist: to say that if you're unhappy with your situation it's you that's got to change it. Antifeminism can be individualism, if feminism is a collectivism. For my part, I'm interested in the case that feminism is a sexism, and that if one is antisexist, one should also be antifeminist.

No doubt part of what draws ire about this label or position is that it draws too wide a circle. Credit to those who speak to me about the issue (rather than unfriending, blocking, or insulting me on social media), for bringing this into focus. There are many kinds of feminism. In fact, when I've asked female friends who identify as feminist what feminism means to them, I've typically gotten a unique answer. Every one seems to have their own idea of what feminism is.

So what I mean when I say I'm antifeminist (for the moment), is that I'm antifeminist4.

The what now?

We could talk about first-wave, second-wave, third-wave feminism and so on, but repeating the terms will get old fast. So I'm going to talk about feminism1 through feminism4. Understand that this discussion is exploratory, and not intended to be authoritative. I'm telling a story, but that story is a work in progress, and an attempt at reaching understanding through dialog. Also, while some of these map to historical movements, it's my belief that feminisms 1 + 2 are still active and relevant, and also that they may be present, in part, in the thought of people who I would call feminists4.

Feminism1 begins in the 18th century and runs (as a movement) through to the achievement of universal suffrage throughout the rich countries of the west, but still has relevance in other parts of the world, such as parts of the middle east. Feminism1 is a humanist movement, and asks for the rigorous application of universal human rights—particularly those core rights to life, liberty and property, to women. These rights are now decisively guaranteed throughout the OECD countries, where women are entitled to equal treatment under, and are not actively discriminated against by, the law.

Feminism2 follows feminism1. This is the feminism of Simone de Beauvoir and Virginia Woolf, which asserts women's right to self-realization against the demand or expectation that they devote themselves to the service of husband and family at the expense of their own individual desires and interests. This is also a humanistic feminism—an interest in self-realization is seen as a legitimate, universal human characteristic that women have been denied the opportunity to pursue.

Feminism3 is the feminism of the late 20th century. In this period, existing revolutionary politics, particularly orthodox Marxism, are transforming into fractured identity politics, in part as a response to the discrediting of communism by the murderousness and economic failure of the USSR and China, and in further part because the long economic boom from immediately after WW2 until 2007 dramatically lifted living standards and eroded the working class's incentive to revolt. Radical political and cultural theorists and activists turned their attention to the struggles of "oppressed" or otherwise disadvantaged groups, many of which (but not women) were minorities, to continue the cause of revolution.

Feminism3, like all identity politics, is not a humanist movement. It is grounded in specific demands for the advancement of the interests of a particular group, which are not necessarily founded in universal human rights. Feminism3 includes affirmative action among its methods. Feminism3 is also acutely concerned with turning legislative acknowledgment of female equality into real material gains for actual women.

Feminism4 might be a strawman. Might. In a sense you could say that feminism4 is a sacrificial anode, a speculative "movement" or phase onto which we can load contemporary feminism's worst proponents and features without dismissing feminism in general. Feminism4, I propose, is feminism3 that has forgotten that the old humanistic movements turned into sectional lobby groups to keep anyone interested in revolution when the old working class was disappearing or deserting traditional Marxism. By feminism4, identity politics has turned into a war of all against all, where every group that can mount or manufacture a case for being or having been oppressed or disadvantaged pleads to government for special payments, allowances and subsidies, special protections and privileges, without regard to whether those payments and privileges may weigh upon the rights, or through taxation the incomes, of other interest groups.

Feminism4 also moves towards popularizing some of the notions of radical feminism, such as that rape is an integral part of patriarchal (read "contemporary") culture and of male sexuality.

But that's all a preamble. The intention is to talk about Lindy West's March 28 article on Jezebel. A friend tweeted it to me, and I feel that to him, rather than to Lindy West, I owe it a response.

One final note before I properly begin: most of what I'm saying is about the way things are in what I'll call "the rich world." This might be something like what readers think of as "the West" or "the OECD countries." But there are places in the world where women are routinely subject to degrading, inhumane, and brutal treatment that is a manifestation of the very deepest human evil. There are also violent, coercive, and psychopathic individuals within our rich societies that subject women to similar degrading, inhumane, and brutal treatment on a localized basis.

How to address this (and it must be addressed) raises uncomfortable questions about how far we may go in the use of force, surveillance, and other means to root out injustice. These are questions for another time. I will only say for now that I hold the solutions to inhumanity must follow some version of: "the maximum freedom for each compatible with the freedom of all," that the rule of law is must be preserved, and that we must always act as if there are basic negative rights to life, liberty, and property that may be abrogated only in the gravest of circumstances, if ever.

Now, my response to Lindy West. You will need access to the original to fully process it, as I have provided only the headings, and select quotes, to indicate which part of the piece I am addressing.

If I Admit That Hating Men is a Thing, Will You Stop Turning it Into a Self-fulfilling Prophecy?

> Okay, so maybe you are a man.

The first error is right here: you don't have to be a man to say that feminism4 is misandric (which I don't, by the way, but I wouldn't have to be a man to say it). And actually, one of the issues with feminism4 is that it insists that whether you are a man is relevant to your judgment of feminism4—which is a sexist point.

> Maybe you haven't had the easiest ride in life … It is hard to be a human. I am so sorry. … none of these terrible, painful problems in your life were caused by the spectre of "misandry." … the most powerful proponent of misandry in modern internet discourse is you — specifically, your dogged insistence that misandry is a genuine, systemic, oppressive force on par with misogyny. … Feminism is, in essence, a social justice movement—it wants to take the side of the alienated and the marginalized, and that includes alienated and marginalized men. Please stop turning us against you.

It's not my intention to call feminism as a whole, or even feminism4 specifically, misandric. My contention is rather that it is a sexist ideology, in part because of its reading every problem in terms of gender, in part of its being specifically aimed at the advancement of the interests of a particular sex, and in part due to its proponents' tendency to draw attention to their critics' sex, race, and orientation.

Nor is it, I think, entirely West's intention to say that men who identify misandry as a problem are blaming it on feminism.

I do have an issue with feminists4 levelling the word "misogyny" at many men. The way I define it, "misogyny" means hatred of women. There are men who hate women as women, but for many, the holding of a position that is antagonistic to a particular feminist aim (particularly a feminist4 aim) does not entail such a hatred. For instance, Tony Abbott, currently the Australian opposition leader, is frequently labelled a misogynist, among other things for his 2006 opposition to access to RU486 (the morning after pill). But Abbott doesn't, I believe, hate women. He is a Catholic, and he allows his religious beliefs about sexuality and the place of women in society to intrude upon his duties as a legislator. I believe this is wrong because regardless of the veracity of its cosmology, Catholicism's ethical teachings are coercive and sex-negative. You might mistake this for misogyny, but only if you held the reductive view that all opposition to feminist aims has misogyny at its root, or if you were ignorant of his religious beliefs, their content, and their role in shaping his choices.

"Misogynist," as it's more commonly used by feminists4, actually seems to mean "a position which is antithetical to feminist4 interests." Calling someone misogynist in this way is a hyperbolic claim that often falsely paints any objection to part of the feminist4 project as evidence of sexist hatred. Holding this view, only under very specific circumstances would I call anything "misandric". I might say that feminists4 are anti-male sexists some of the time, but I wouldn't say they hate men, or that even one of them hates men, unless I had very good reason to specifically believe it.

I'd go so far as to say that to verify a woman hated men, I'd have to ask her. If she denied that hatred, I'd have to take her at her word. Men deserve a similar courtesy and generosity where accusations of misogyny are concerned.

While we're at it, since I don't believe misogyny, as hatred of women, is widespread, I also dispute that misogyny is "a genuine, systemic, oppressive force." I also don't accept that feminism4 "wants to take the side of the alienated and the marginalized, and that includes alienated and marginalized men." If it did, it would be a more universal humanistic ideology—which West disputes later.

> It is nearly impossible to address problems facing women—especially problems in which men are even tangentially culpable—without comments sections devolving into cries of "misandry!" from men and replies of "misandry isn't real" from women. Feminists are tired of this endless, fruitless turd-pong..

Turd pong indeed. Feminism4 is a bad ideology in part because it invites this game. It claims that it is right to have a specific movement that addresses women's issues (and lays them at the feet of men or "patriarchy"), while denying that a movement in which males defended or pushed back against encroachments on their rights or esteem would have any validity. I happen to agree with them: masculinism is something I'd prefer not to see. But I'd prefer not to see it because masculinism would be sexist—just like feminism4 is.

Part One: Why Feminism Has "Fem" in the Name, or, Why Can't We All Just Be Humanists?

> I wish, more than anything, that I could just be a "humanist." … Humanism is a > gorgeous dream, and something to strive for. In fact, it is the exact thing that feminism is striving for right now (and has been working on for decades)! Yay, feminism!

If West is a humanist, fantastic! She's probably not a feminist4. This is great to hear. She might be a feminist1 or a feminist2, or more likely a combination of both. And I'm glad to have been sent this article, because it's the first I've seen from a feminist perspective that actually addresses the issue that I've been raising, which is that universal humanism is a more appropriate ideology from within which to advocate for women's rights, or anyone's rights. But West's not in agreement with me there.

> you can't make problems disappear just by changing "feminism" to "humanism" and declaring the world healed. That won't work.

When I say that humanism is a more appropriate ideology to address the problems that feminists face, I say this because: (1) suffering is a universal human phenomenon; (2) sexism affects men and women, even more so now that feminists4 have reversed anti-female sexism and adopted an anti-male sexist posture in their political discourse. The criticism of feminism4 here is that sexist or sex-specific ideologies (of which feminism4 is one) aren't up to the task of eradicating sexism and inequality.

Of course you can't make problems disappear by changing words. But have you ever heard the saying "two wrongs don't make a right"? Using sexism to fight sexism merely perpetuates sexism. In most nonphysical conflicts, someone (preferably all parties) has to stand up, be better, and transcend the conflict. Men and women have to do this.

Fleetches, Flootches, and Feminism4

> Imagine you're reading a Dr. Seuss book about a bunch of beasts living on an island. There are two kinds of beasts: Fleetches and Flootches … To argue that all problems are just "beast problems" is to discredit the idea of inequality altogether. It is, in fact, insulting.

I like this Fleetch/Flootch story. It's a good way of abstracting the conflict. However…

Imagine that for thousands of years it was a struggle for both Fleetches and Flootches to survive. Fleetches tended to get killed in wars, which they were forced to participate in by their chiefs and lords, and by an ideology that denied them worth if they weren't prepared lay their lives on the line; they also wore themselves out or got killed in dangerous outdoor jobs. The Fleetches did a lot of this to protect the Flootches, who they fed and provided with shelter. Flootches were spared the obligation to participate in combat, and got to do a lot of their work indoors, which kept them safer than the Flootches. A lot of this was the case because the Flootches had to look after the children they and the Fleetches shared. But Flootches had to do a lot of domestic labor, because basic necessities like water and food were time-consuming to get, transport, store and prepare, and they tended to die a lot in childbirth because neither Fleetches nor Flootches had invented medicine.

All this time, one group did have it better than others: the aristocracy (and later an emergent merchant class), which was composed of both Fleetches and Flootches. The Fleetches of this group did rule, but the Flootches of the group enjoyed relative power and comfort as well, greater than any Fleetch or Flootch that did not belong to the aristocracy.

Flootches and Fleetches together came up with a bunch of ideologies that we might group together under the heading Beastism, which inspired struggles against the disenfranchisement and hardship that non-privileged Fleetches and Flootches alike suffered. It helped root out some of the worst offenses against Beasts, especially slavery, where aristocratic and merchant Fleetches and Flootches claimed to own other Fleetches and Flootches, mainly on the basis that Fleetches and Flootches of particular colors weren't really Beasts at all and weren't entitled to the same moral consideration that all Beasts are: in effect, that their suffering counted for nothing.

By applying Beastism and working it into their systems of government over hundreds of years, the mass of Fleetches and Flootches ended up suffering a lot less systematic deprivation. The rise of the merchant class over the aristocracy brought in a new system of values that ended up privileging technological development, and raised living standards for all Beasts so much that almost every one of them lived better than the aristocrat Fleetches and Flootches of years past. At least, this is how it was in the rich countries, which by coincidence (or was it coincidence?) tended to be the ones that had most thoroughly worked Beastism into their society.

The Fleetch rulers, though, did neglect to apply Beastism rigorously to Flootches. This was a manifest wrong. Flootches (and some Fleetches with them, but mostly Flootches) developed an ideology called Flootchism, and succeeded over time in getting their just entitlement to fair treatment under the law—to equal rights to life, liberty, and property. Then the Flootchists worked on getting Fleetches to recognize that a Flootch's commitment to domestic labor and child-rearing should be a choice, not an obligation, and that Flootches' choice to do other things, including just taking care of their own individual interests, was okay.

By now, technology had improved to the point that many Flootches in the places where Flootchism was most popular didn't have to worry about dying in childbirth, and could spend much less time in domestic labor. Life wasn't so hard any more! Flootches now had a lot of choices: they could go into formerly Fleetch-only jobs, or they could choose to be protected and supported by Fleetches while they looked after the kids, as they had been, mainly, for a long time previously.

True, Flootches didn't always do that well in the workplace. Part of it is just because succeeding is hard. There's a lot of competition. And if you haven't had much practice or role models ahead of you, it might be harder than if you did. Flootchists started complaining that Flootches earned less money, but they often didn't notice that part of the reason was that Flootches tended to choose the most desirable jobs. Flootch-dominated professions were mostly always safe and indoors. Fleetch dominated professions were often outdoors, and often dangerous. Employers in these professions sometimes had to pay more because Beasts generally didn't want to do them so much. Employers in Flootch-dominated professions could often pay less because they had so many Beasts wanting to do the jobs.

Where Flootches had more choice now, Fleetches didn't, really. They were still often obliged to go and die in war, facing threats of fines and imprisonment if they didn't in some places, and generally expected to do the kind of work (often dangerous work, remember) that would allow them to support a Flootch and some children if it was necessary, or if a Flootch they liked desired it.

But that didn't really matter. Things were so much better for almost all Beasts that Beasts generally ended up getting a bit tired of Beastism, especially the most radical kinds that said you had to overthrow the entire Beast society. But some Beasts with a deep commitment to radical Beastism decided that if you split beasts into groups which each worked towards their own interests, rather than the interests of Beasts as a whole, you could get some of them to keep fighting the radical Beastist fight, especially if you could tell those Beasts a story that said they weren't getting their fair share of the new prosperity.

In this split Beastism, some Flootchists started arguing that it was fair, in promoting the interests of Flootches, to ask for legal privileges and protections that Fleetches didn't have. They asked for Flootch quotas in professions and in the legislature, but didn't propose quotas for Fleetches. Some wanted goods that Flootches used but Fleetches didn't to be exempt from tax. Some wanted Flootch-only spaces, even though they'd said in the past that Fleetch-only spaces, or spaces only for Fleetches and Flootches of a particular color, were wrong. And the list went on.

In short, these particular Floochists said it was okay for Flootches to ask that Fleetches be stripped of some of their rights to life, liberty, and property. They said this was okay because Fleetches in the past had been rulers. In short, they said that encroaching on Fleetch rights was okay because it was revenge. One thing they often forgot about was that all this time, only a very small proportion of Fleetches, probably 1% or less, had really held the power that the Flootches said they all did.

Some Fleetches used this new Flootchism as a reason to say that Flootches hated Fleetches. They were wrong: it was just that some of the Flootchists had a bunch of bad arguments that seemed to be aimed at Fleetches. But the new Flootchism had increased antagonism between some Fleetches and some Flootches. A Flootchism that was really about Flootches only (even if it said that Fleetches could and should be Flootchists), that denied Fleetch suffering, and said that it wasn't interested in hearing about any Fleetch problems until all Flootch problems were taken care of, reduced the common ground on which Fleetches and Flootches could cooperate, and it reduced their ability to understand and empathize with each other on the basis that they both suffered.

Flootchism—at least, some Flootchism—had turned into an ideology that increased conflict and turned Fleetches off the cause of "equality." It obscured the fact that all beasts were effectively in the same boat—a life in which they would struggle and suffer—and that the greatest inequality in the places where Flootchism was most popular was still between the aristocrats (who were now mostly merchants) and the rest of the Beasts.

Neither Fleetches nor Flootches were likely to make much headway towards their equality if they were caught up fighting each other. And that's why some Fleetches and Flootches started saying that the old Beastism was better than the new Flootchism.

> When women say things like "misandry isn't real," we mean it the same way you might say, "Freddy Krueger isn't real." …

I'm not claiming misandry here (see above). Some people are, I guess. Not me. Let me stop here and say that misogyny, as a systematic force or widespread feeling, is also not real … just like Freddy Kruger. Misogynists are real: mainstream misogyny isn't.

Sexism, in both directions, is real. The problem with the words "misogyny" and "misandry" is that if they're used to talk about hate, they're just too strong for us to credibly be able to say that what they talk about is widespread. Misogyny and misandry are things exhibited by people with serious personal problems. Those people probably need professional help more than they need a political ideology.

Part Two: Why Claiming that Sexism Isn't Real Is a Sexist Thing to Say

First the title. I wouldn't claim that sexism isn't real. I'm claiming that feminism4 is sexist. Feminism4 is evidence that sexism is real. I'm not claiming that it's the only sexist ideology. Just that it's one of them.

> We live in a world of measurable, glaring inequalities. Look at politicians, CEOs … these fields are dominated by men. (And, in many cases, white men.)

What if we say that part of the reason for this is just that women haven't been in the game that long? When a family commits to upward class mobility, it usually takes a few generations of education, networking, and savings for the shift upward to happen. Having removed the barriers to female advancement by ensuring that women have full and equal legal entitlements to life, liberty, and property, as well as by instituting anti-discrimination legislation in many places, earlier kinds of feminism have established the ground for this kind of material inequality to be gradually remedied. But you can't force the issue. If having complete equality of outcomes now involves impinging on the rights of others, I'm sorry, but you just can't have it. Those rights are super-important, and they're for everyone. If you say they can ever be suspended, you are playing a very dangerous game.

Adults (and well-raised children) realize that you can't have everything you want right this very minute, especially if it means you have to punch someone else in the face to get it.

> It’s fine (though discouraging) if you legitimately believe that [there is no social structure favoring men], but you need to own up to the fact that that is a self-serving and bigoted point of view.

This is a classic feminist4 argument: if you disagree with feminsm4, you are a sexist and/or a bigot. And it’s not much of an argument. It’s really more of an insult. Some people—men and women alike–are against sexism, racism, homophobia and transphobia, but still think feminism4 has lost the plot, and that it has various cases to answer. Those people, if they are civil and informed, deserve a conversation. If your conversations with people tend to go like this:

> A: I think feminism4 is a bad ideology and here’s why…
>
> B: Well, you’re a bigot, you straight, white man, you!

you don’t have much of an ideology. Especially if A turns out to be female, homosexual, colored, trans, or any combination of them. Sometimes they do.

Part Three: Why People Being Shitty to You Is Not the Same as You Being Systematically Disenfranchised

> There might be a lot of women in your life who are mean to you…

The women in my life are lovely to me, and I love them. I’ve actually seen some of them get upset with themselves for wanting what they want, because feminism3 and 4 say they should be different. I don’t like ideologies that go around telling people that what they are and what they like is not okay.

I’m not seeing much misandry around me, I’ve got to say. And I don’t think I’m systematically disenfranchised. But I still think feminism4 is a bad ideology.

> There are some really shitty things about being a man. … The difference is, though, that the radfem community on Tumblr does not currently hold the reins of power in every country on earth (even in nations with female heads of state, the political and economic power structures are still dominated by men).

I’m glad the radical feminist community doesn’t hold the reins of power. I think it promotes a sexist ideology. There are people in power who hold sexist views about women, too. I don’t think that’s okay either.

> If you present fairness as the goal—that some day everything will be “fair” for everyone—you’re slipping into an unrealistic fantasy land.

Okay, so we are saying that we aren’t for fairness anymore? I know West and I are likely disagree on this, but to me, a fair system is one where the rules are universally applicable and universally applied, where no group gets a leg up, and no group gets beaten down. I think by and large we have this already, but it’s under threat from an overblown system of government in which parties attempt to buy votes by pork-barreling (handing privileges, tax credits, and cash payments to various constituencies). Insofar as feminism4 attempts to construct a constituency that rewards this pork-barrelling, it is harmful to the cause of fairness.

> Feminism isn't about striving for individual fairness … If a particular woman is underqualified for a particular job, fine. That isn't sexism. But she shouldn't have to be systematically set up, from birth, to be underqualified for all jobs (except for jobs that reinforce traditional femininity, obv).

And she isn't.

Part Four: A List of "Men's Rights" Issues That Feminism Is Already Working On

I'm going to address this entire section at once. This section says that every problem it talks about, whether it affects men or women, is the result of patriarchy. I find this at once reductive and insufficient.

I'm not going to dispute, right now, that patriarchy existed in the past. I know there are those who do, such as Warren Farrell, author of The Myth of Male Power. Farrell argues that sexism was always a two-way street (he calls this bisexism), and that there have always been patriarchal and matriarchal domains within societies.

I dispute that patriarchy exists now, in the rich world. If it were really a matter of men deliberately and systematically lording it over women, we wouldn't have any female CEOs or heads of state. If men wanted to and were capable of oppressing women to the degree that we could lay the blame for all our sex- and gender-related problems at the feet of something as simple as patriarchy, men would have used legislation and force to forbid women from assuming these positions, or even from getting an education or showing their faces in public. As a matter of fact, this is done in some parts of the world, and in many of these situations religion is used as a cover for this abuse of human rights. This is deplorable. Thankfully, it's not the situation that we face.

If I were asked to identify which form of hierarchy is most pervasive in our society, which causes people the most suffering and unhappiness, it is the hierarchy of wealth. We might call this plutocracy. In this plutocracy, men and women with money can buy the ability to dominate other humans and have them do their bidding. It's a relatively free exchange, but in the midst of it, the non-wealthy (who don't even have to be what we'd call "poor") submit themselves to coercion, danger, and psychological abuse. The difficulty about this is that being rich isn't in itself a bad thing, or necessarily the result of bad behavior.

Since we're using our computers here, allow me an Apple fanboy moment while I ask, "would you say that it was clearly wrong that our economic system allowed Steve Jobs to become one of the richest people on the planet by spending essentially his entire adult life shepherding an industry that has massively enriched human life, knowledge, and productivity, to the point that he died early in part because he was working too hard to tend adequately to his health? Of the entire turnover of the company he helped establish, he would have taken perhaps a fraction of a percent for himself, but that turned out to be a very large amount of money. Is that necessarily wrong?”

Although widespread growth in income inequality is an issue, especially, at present, in the United States, it is for other reasons than that the rich necessarily oppress others in gaining and maintaining their wealth. Sometimes wealth is the almost accidental result of doing something that many others find helpful and valuable. It behoves the rich and powerful, though, to see that those who work for them are fairly compensated, are not mistreated or abused, feel a sense of agency and satisfaction in their work, are not physically endangered … and I could go on.

Addressing plutocracy is further complicated if we believe that some of the measures we could take, like expropriation, transgress a commitment to rights that we may believe apply to everyone.

The benefits (and the moral pitfalls) of plutocracy are open to men and women alike. Warren Farrell writes that “the U.S. Census Bureau finds that women who are heads of households have a net worth that is 141 percent of the net worth men who are heads of households,” and that “among the wealthiest 1.6 percent of the U.S. population (those with assets of $500,000 or more), women’s net worth is more than men’s” (*The Myth of Male Power, 32–33).

High net worth women, like high net worth men, are able to buy the services and obedience of the poorest men and women in their society, and throughout the world. Marissa Mayer, current CEO of Yahoo, stands to make USD 50 million in her position; she has used her power (or perhaps her wealth and power is conditional on her willingness to make this proposal) to end her company’s practice of allowing employees to work at home. This will likely diminish the autonomy and job satisfaction of thousands.

This is not patriarchy: this is plutocracy.

What’s more, I won’t even venture to say that plutocracy is the cause of every problem we might have in our lives. The world’s more complicated than that.

> We care about your problems a lot. Could you try caring about ours?

It’s possible to say that feminism4 is not a helpful (even maybe a sexist) ideology or that its worldview is incorrect without that being motivated by resentment against women, or a lack of care for women’s problems. There are women who aren’t feminists, don’t like feminism, or don’t like what feminism seems to have become (feminism4). Would we suggest that they resent women or don’t care about their problems?

Part Five: I’m Sorry That You Are in Pain, But Please Stop Taking It Out on Women

> It feels good to open up to perspectives that are foreign to you, accept your complicity in this shitty system … So stop trying to convince us that we hate you and I promise we’ll start liking you a whole lot more.

I have to admit, when we get to this last bit, that I'm just not on board with the idea that "we" (opponents of feminism4?) are complicit "in this shitty system," or that the system is even all that shitty. I actually think that we (men and women alike) are in more danger from ideological forces that seek to undermine a commitment to universal rights, the rule of law, and the freedom of each compatible with the freedom of all, than from "this shitty system." "This shitty system," as West calls it, is built on that universality and those rights, and on their rigorous application. If they're not being rigorously applied, I'm all for going and fixing that up. This is not a problem for women or feminists alone. Maybe West and I would agree on that.

You don't have to have had a shitty life to be against feminism4, and you don't have to blame a shitty life, or anything, on women, to be against it. You might be against it because:

- you think it's a politics of resentment
- you think it's sexist
- you think it's collectivist, and you prefer individualism
- you think it's disempowering
- you think its factual claims are false or overly selective
- you think earlier feminist movements or modes of discourse were better

This list could go on, and on, and on. For any ideology, there are numerous reasons you could be against it. Some of these come down to irresolvable conflicts of fundamental values. Just because someone disagrees with you, does not mean that they hate you, or that they are a bigot.

Let's go back to the title to finish up: "If I Admit That Hating Men is a Thing, Will You Stop Turning it Into a Self-fulfilling Prophecy?" I take it as implied from this, and from West's other comments, that male accusations of feminist misandry are "causing" her (or tempting her) and other feminists to hate those men who make the accusations.

I'd like to put it to everyone that hate is optional, and undesirable. That someone says something you disagree with doesn't mean you have to hate them. Those of us who think of ourselves as against sexism, or for justice, or generally as good people, would, I think, generally agree that hating others is something to be avoided, even if it's only for the rather hollow reason of maintaining the moral high ground.

I think we should continue to agree on that. Hate is not okay.

(Image: no mo hate!, CC 2009 by Julia Lamphear).

Four women sexually assault 19 year old man in Toronto

April 8, 2013 | by Kristina Hansen | Link | Original Link

On the March 30 a 19 year old young man went out to a nightclub in Toronto and ended up meeting four women. As the night wound down they offered him a ride home, which he accepted as an innocent and well-meaning.

The four women took him to a parking lot in the Queen Street West/Spadina Avenue area of Toronto where they all proceeded to sexually assault him.

Because we do not know any of the details of the sexual assault it is hard to know what the women actually did to the young man, but the term "sexual assault" is one of those vague terms that, when applied to a male victim, comes off to the general public as nothing more than innocent groping, or perhaps some unwanted kissing because of the faulty assumption that men cannot possibly be raped by a woman.

The term "sexual assault" is a blanket description that could mean anything from an unwanted touch of the leg to forcing a man to penetrate a woman against his will. And for those who can't seem to wrap their heads around it, yes, men can become erect even when they are not sexually aroused, just as women can unintentionally orgasm while being raped.

The police reported that the young man thankfully did not require treatment in hospital.

Detective Constable Thomas Ueberholz with the Toronto Police Sex Crimes Unit said that his division does get complaints of sexual assaults on males by females:

> "Although the majority generally is females that are victims or complainants, it is not completely unusual for a male to be the victim of a sexual assault."

Det. Const. Shannon McParland praised the man for coming forward in an interview with QMI, saying

> "It is often hard for a male victim to approach police about a crime of this nature."

In a report from the Canadian Centre for Justice Statistics (2003) showed that men made up eight per cent of the adult victims of sexual assaults which were reported to police.

According to the 2003 report, male victims of sexual assault are just as likely as female victims to report the crime to police, but I have a hard time believing this to be the case since there is such a stigma attached to men who are victims of sexual assault. In fact, when interviewed by the National Post, Nicole Pietsch, co-ordinator of the Ontario Coalition of Rape Crisis Centres, said

> "Male victims, like female victims, can encounter stigmas when seeking help. It is not completely unusual for a male to be the victim of a sexual assault. Other men > will say for example, ‘Oh, he’s so lucky,’ like that was actually a positive thing when it wasn’t. I think that that just feeds into the myth that sexual violence [against males] is something the victim wants.”

Her comment confirms my suspicions that the majority of men who are sexually assaulted are not reporting these crimes to the police, nor are they talking about them openly with others. These men become silent victims because men who report being sexually assaulted are at risk of being ridiculed by others who just don’t understand the fact that a man is not always interested in sex, especially with those that force themselves on him against his will. Nor is it understood that men, when trapped in a situation such as this young man was, have been taught that it is wrong to ever hit a woman, even when she is sexually assaulting him.

The fear a man has of being arrested for assaulting a woman, even in self-defense, is so crippling that he cannot even afford an attempt to defend himself should the female perpetrator turn around and claim he was attempting to rape her just so she can escape any accusations.

On Twitter there were numerous users who posted nasty and ignorant statements ridiculing the young man.

[image]

It is a sad view of how many in society negatively stereotype men who come forward to seek help for sexual assault. It’s an attitude that needs to be changed to reflect the reality that men are just as capable of being sexually assaulted as women, and that they deserve the same compassion and understanding that women do.

I personally would like to commend this young man for his strength and courage in reporting this crime to the police, and for standing up for his rights as a human being.

As for the women who sexually assaulted this young man, police say they were all white, approximately 5’4″ in height, roughly 190-200 pounds and somewhere between 30 and 36 years old.

The driver spoke with what sounded like a British accent and had a tattoo of wings on the back of her neck. Another woman had longer, dark hair with red dye at the bottom.

After the suspects let go of the man, they were seen leaving the area in a vehicle that resembled a silver Honda SUV.

[box]Anybody with information is asked to contact police at 416-808-7474 or Crime Stoppers anonymously at 416-222-TIPS (8477).[/box]

Introducing the “gender intelligent” workplace

April 8, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

As is more and more frequent these days, I was contacted this morning with a list of questions from a member of the mainstream media. This time it was Leah Eichler, a weekly columnist for The Globe who is also writing a feature article for Canadian Business Magazine on “Women in Work.” She had some questions for me in relation to her work on that article.

As is also the case with the mainstream media, I never know which of my statements, or in what context they will be used for a finished piece. Regular readers of this site know full well that the MSM has not exactly dazzled us with exactitude, diligence or ethics. So, like many times before, I bring you the questions, unedited, with the complete answers I provided Ms. Eichler. — PE

1. Do you think the focus on women in business has grown more pronounced?
Clearly, yes, it has, along with the focus on women in most everything else in modern culture.

2. Have you encountered a move toward gender intelligent workplaces and what is your take on this?

No, I haven’t. There is indeed a huge focus on gender, rather sex, in the workplace these days, but I would call it anything but intelligent. In fact, I would guess that what you mean by “Gender intelligent” (the language of social engineers) is actually “Female favoring,” They are not the same thing at all, though I don’t find the latter concept to be any more positive for the workplace. I think actual “gender intelligence” would imply an understanding of both sexes equally, and the knowledge that the workplace has never been particularly friendly to men any more than women. The nature of business is to maximize the utility of any given employee at the least possible cost. It’s about the bottom line, not the genitalia.

What has happened is that the workplace has become plagued by gender politics, pitting men and women against each other collectively, and I think business has suffered for it.

3. Have you noticed any reaction to this emphasis, by men?

Yes, but not within the workplace. Men know that reacting with anything other than support in the workplace for the targeted advancement of women is career suicide. I am not just talking about reasonable measures like making some allowances for pregnancy and childbirth. The problem shows up where qualified men are being passed over for hiring or promotion in favor of less qualified women in order to fill quotas, as well as the liberal use of litigation against men and companies by women, much of it based on false pretense. Attacking men and masculinity is now a culture-wide phenomenon, and it has resulted in a workplace that is overtly hostile to men while granting women the power to successfully persecute with the ease of a pointed finger. Most all of men’s venting about this kind of problem comes to places like my website, where it is often expressed anonymously.

More simply put, the most common reaction from men has been politically forced silence, or an obsequious, fear based lauding of the current state of affairs.

4. Lately, I've encountered the term "misandry" which I must admit I wasn't very familiar with. Do you think the emphasis on women's advancement has gone too far?

What I think is important is that it is not access to professional advancement for women that is a problem. The problem is how we are going about it. In a just society there would ideally be no barriers to anyone pursuing professional goals based on sex. That being said, quotas and the lowering of standards to accommodate under or unqualified female applicants has had a negative impact on business performance as well as doing no real favors to women, generally speaking. The direct inference of such policies is that women are incapable on their own of competing with men on a level playing field. It diminishes the credibility of all women in the workplace while fostering a culture of under performance and sexual animosity that is completely unnecessary.

Misandry is a large part of the problem. I offer the following article from Degroote School of Business at McMaster University:

http://www.degroote.mcmaster.ca/articles/women-make-better-decisions-than-men/

I invite you to read the article along with the 100+ comments that follow it. In particular the comment by Professor Scott Gustafson. This article is misandry in action. It is an attempt to recruit women into a business school based on biased, even fraudulent scholarship that paints men as inferior. This is the one of the building blocks for your "gender intelligent" workplace.

I would argue that as long as men are bullied into compliance, you will not hear much from them on this in the work environment. But when that gag comes off, as it eventually will, you will see a pronounced backlash against female favoring polices and against women, many of whom do not deserve it. Men, as is customary, will be blamed for this. The fault, however, will be directly in the laps of gender ideologues.

5. Are men disadvantaged by the emphasis to promote women in business?

It is impossible to not disadvantage one group when you favor another. It is simple physics. And this is what is happening because we have lost focus on promoting merit in favor of bowing to identity politics. Worse, we ultimately disadvantage both groups. By favoring the soft misogyny of quotas and reduced standards, we not only undermine men who have earned recognition by accomplishment and merit, we undermine the credibility of the many women who can compete without being given a head start in the race and forcing everyone else to run slower. This is only a formula to undermine the personal competition critical to business success.

I refer you again to the report from the Campaign for Merit in Business.

The best way, in my opinion, to assist women collectively with achieving professional success, is to prepare them to compete under the same diligent standards that men have always faced, and without treating them like children. That means they must make the same sacrificial decisions that men have made for professional advancement for ages. Personal life, comfort and entitlement go out the window, as does a lot attention to family and friends. Money becomes the sole motivator, not the lifestyle choices that have historically led women to lower income positions from which they have demanded to be paid "equally."

Women, like men have always done, must bend to the needs of the workplace, not the other way around. This is accomplished with education and the matured understanding that professional life means almost unending personal sacrifice. Turning the workplace into a social sciences laboratory and forcing compromises that do not serve the needs of business is a recipe for failure and a guarantee that women's desire to be regarded as equals will be met with deserved contempt.

6. I would love to learn more about A Voice for Men, why (and when) you started it and why you saw the need for it.

I started A Voice for Men in 2008 as a personal blog. My desire was to simply raise awareness of issues faced by men and boys in modern culture. Many of those issues are cataloged here:

http://www.avoiceformen.com/activism/about/

Since then, the site has grown exponentially into the most widely read online publication targeting men's issues that has ever existed. We have attracted scores of men and women of every lifestyle, color, creed, sexuality, religion and lack of religion who support the idea that where it concerns men and boys, most of society is getting it wrong.

This is particularly true where it concerns gender ideologues, many of whom claim to "advance the equality of women," but who instead seek to advantage women over men by any means necessary, including unscrupulous concepts like quotas, reduced standards and fanciful but meaningless jargon like "gender intelligent workplace."

Hope this helps,

Paul

Drs Paul Nathanson and Katherine Young

April 9, 2013 | by VFM News and Commentary | Link | Original Link

---

Amid all the histrionics and attempts to stifle free speech, these two brave academicians followed through with what they set out to do; have a discussion on misandry in our culture.

Part One

Part Two

Part Three

AVFM News and Activism: Toronto Review

April 9, 2013 | by James Huff | Link | Original Link

[box icon=""]

Tonight we are going to have our own follow-up of events last week at the University of Toronto. Joining us will be Daniel Perrins who will give his own verbal account of events. We also invite anyone who was there to call in and give an account as well. There has been much coverage of this in Men's Rights circles and all of it has been excellent but tonight we want to give our listeners a chance to share their comments and ask questions directly to those who were there.

The show starts tonight, the 9th, at 9:00 PM Eastern, 8:00 PM Central, which is 2:00 AM February 10th in London and 11:00 AM February 10th in Brisbane

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

Protecting my sons

April 9, 2013 | by Nevada Thompson | Link | Original Link

In response to the Montana Kaimin article about establishing National Coalition for Men groups at campus universities across the nation, I would like to thank Bjorn Bergeson for the neutral and informative perspective. Sadly, I was disheartened to read Ms. Phenocia Bauerle, Montana State Diversity Coordinator's comment about our message being "problematic" and Brent Hildebrand, UM Men of Strength's comment that the information we disperse is "misleading".

I am the President of the National Coalition for Men – Montana State University (NCFM-MSU). I am a woman, I have four boys, three of which are teenagers. I am aware of the rights, privileges and protections that I receive due solely to the nature of my gender. However, I would like to take a moment to clear the air about the NCFM message. Being a mother of four boys, I do not agree with some of the costs that my boys may have to endure to ensure my continued protection and support. Therefore, I have agreed to take on the role of President of NCFM-MSU to help level the playing field.

Let it be known that we are not women haters, rape apologists. We do not justify abuse. In fact, we are striving for true gender equality with the belief that education and accountability are the keys to success. When I first came to Montana State University I saw that it really catered to women, which is great for me. However, thinking about my children I noticed that they had nothing to support, grow, enhance and educate men; hence, the beginning of NCFM-MSU to offer support, education and guidance to the men of our community.

There has been legislation drafted that is obviously violating human rights and it is our duty to protect them. Is that not what is being said about women, we must protect their fundamental rights? TheDepartment of Educations's now infamous "Dear Colleague" letter is unquestionably harmful to men and has therefore been on many people's minds. However, it is not our only focus and we are not saying that rape does not exist, nor that it should go unpunished. We are saying that education of responsibility needs to take place and both sexes need to be protected This is our simple goal: protection without supplanting the fundamental civil rights of others.

Watching the President of Kappa Sigma initially supporting NCFM's message, and then flipping hours after Ms. Bauerle's and Mr. Hildebrand's statements were released, it is clear the Montana University System is teaching students what to think; no longer instructing these emerging professionals how to do so.
I welcome any input on this topic as it is imperative this discussion take place to preserve safety for all on Montana campuses. In conclusion, today I noticed that HB 240 is awaiting Governor Bullock's signature to allow students to carry handguns on college campuses to protect "helpless women", clearly a reaction from a father striving to protect his daughters.

Laws have already been enacted to remove the presumption of innocence in sexual assault cases, effectively creating “rape prone cultures” where women are afraid of being assaulted at every turn. A woman in such a hyper-emotional state could easily misinterpret a situation, resulting in the unjustified death of one of my sons.

How do we protect them?

Little red frothing fornication mouth

April 9, 2013 | by Dan Perrins | Link | Original Link

I thought I would jot down my take on the ideological feminist flying monkeys and the CAFE lecture Thursday night involving Dr Paul Nathanson and Dr. Katherine Young.

Videos are being done edited and uploaded, the Skype twixt Paul and I had has been over forked with bits and bytes clogging up the net. The lead up and the sorting of documentation is always a much longer process than the show itself.

There were actually two shows going on Thursday night. One was a circus, the other an open dialogue on misandry and misogyny. I wanted to cover both. Each had it's certain appeal. The open dialogue lecture was important; knowledge being shared. The circus was an adrenaline rush full of clowns, trained poodle-boys, and ferocious lioness who have been robbed of true equality by feminism.

Feminism is particularly good at training its minions in two skills, herding and security. One could say they've developed it into an art form.

That is what I witnessed on Thursday night; the herding and security central to feminism's narrative.

They've certainly lulled more people in history into believing their claims than any other I can think of. Hitler, Himmler, Hess, Goering, Speer and Goebbels could have learned a thing or three from feminism. Godwin's Law be damned, the M.O.'s of these two groups are frighteningly similar.

First they keep the message uniform, to keep it pure. The narrative is pure fascist Third Reich material, blame and other a group. Make up and chant hateful claims, repeat the hateful claims, and repeat them again, ad nauseam. Silence dissent. Hear none of it. If you do hear it, denounce and vilify those who blaspheme. ostracize, obfuscate, and spread copiously throughout society. Yell it at the top of your lungs. Use mechanical advantage to screech the tired old fascist feminist fallacy "its the ~~Jew's~~ patriarchy's fault."

The Patriarchy: something set up to benefit all men and yet it oppresses men as well. It is something they are tearing down because it hurts us and they want to help while they demonize and criminalize us. I believe the layman's term for this is contradictory bullshit. Heavy on the contradictory part and the bullshit part.

Feminists throw "patriarchy" around like a blanket tainted with smallpox.

"May I borrow a cup of patriarchy? I am baking up some man-hate." "Spare some patriarchy for the children?" "Sorry, I can't make the Slut Walk today. My patriarchy is acting up."

It's always patriarchy's fault. It's the creator of original sin, don't you know? So it was written in the Book of Dworkin — so it was sacrificed on the Altar of Ensler.

That was the common plot of the Three Ringed Circus that had organized to protest the lecture by CAFE.

There was lots of coverage. JTO gave us a wandering snapshot of wading through the ~~crowds~~ circus. But that was more like a side-show. The main attraction was "Little Red Frothing Fornication Mouth." She is a star in her own world, and trying to make it to the big time via feminism's you go gurrl attitude and sheer tits in your face gumption.

And you know what? I couldn't have cared less about her vociferous avocation of what I should do. I couldn't as well have cared less about her tits. However I do have a problem believing her, and here's why.

I brought up the topic of mental health and how men make up about 80% of the suicide population in Canada. I mentioned there was about 4 papers on the CMHA website. I was wrong about the CMHA paper count. Sorry for misstating the facts.

There are 12 pieces of information for women and one for men. Men do, however, bear mentioning in a second paper dealing with all of Canadian society — as are women. That would make it 11 to 1. Perhaps men's voices from beyond the grave might be a little silent. Perhaps Canadians are a little deaf. Perhaps it's because feminists like 'Lil Red have bulldozed over those voices.

You can still learn about those men in statistics, those left behind in the carnage — as seen in the studio Brule' video of a young man searching for some answers as to why his two friends committed suicide, as well as on epitaphs.

Their feminist follow up? Laugh like a maniac and tell people who have actually done some research to "Shut The Fuck Up" as Red was so hot to do to anyone other than her that tried to be heard.

Make no mistake about it she is scared. So scared she could not would not engage in any civil discourse. She brushed away someone who looked to be a reporter with a casual STFU, she screeched those STFU's at me incessantly for about 12 minutes. That and constantly conflating feminism with women and visa versa.

So much for logic. So much for keeping the discussion honest. Just screech, and I do mean screech like a banshee, that MHRA's are just a bunch of women haters.

When told point-blank that none of it is correct, I got the same set of replies: "It's the patriarchy. You just hate women. You're a misogynist." No specific order. They have their indoctrination cemented firmly in every sentence, and every thought.

Early on in the night I had a short discussion with two young men who did not wish to be identified. They were afraid of backlash. Literally all they had to say was we think there should be an open discussion about how men and boys are treated these days but because of the militant actions by feminists they were afraid to go on the record, even just audio. I will say they were intelligent young men. It's a damn shame they live in fear of militant backlash.

This is what the femmies want. They want people to be afraid to state a differing opinion. It is what their whole protest was about.

That is the security aspect of feminism; complete and utter silence, complete faith and compliance. No critical thought required, or tolerated.

‘Little Red Frothing Fornication Mouth’ represents how feminism is helping men and boys. She allowed a peek beneath the veneer of the rhetoric spewed endlessly of late by feminists.

‘We are your friend’ they say. You don’t need to worry about men’s issues. We have them covered. We have them covered so well that your attempts to cover them is offensive to us. No, it’s an attack! It’s hate, you misogynistic pigs! Can’t you see we are trying to help you? Shut your fucking mouths and let us fucking help you! And if you don’t we will make you fucking pay!

Sound familiar?

Heads up, feminists, your use-by date has reached the tertiary stage. The MHRM is like time, ravaging your ignorant body of theories. From now on it is the steady onward march to the day that brings your inevitable silence, Little Red Frothing Fornicating Mouth and all.

Postcards for Papa!

April 10, 2013 | by Robert Sides | Link | Original Link

[box type=”info” icon=”none”]

Father’s Day falls on Sunday, June 16 this year. Let’s remind President Obama that dads matter.

How?

By participating in something I call… Postcards for Papa.

The idea is to hand-write (legibly!) a message citing the importance your father, living or deceased. You might also say how being kept from your father harmed you. Or how your grandfather or other men served as surrogate fathers. Or how being a father yourself is a key part of your life.

The postcards should be directed to the President, but sent to the address below. The accumulated cards will then be given to the President by Paul or his designate, media coverage being arranged.

Media can also be fed samples during the run-up to June, compiled cards serving as colorful reminders of why men’s roles matter…while encouraging others to send their thoughts, too.

Everyone can participate: mothers, sons, daughters; adults and kids; military personnel; etc.

You can also send more than one card.

Other groups can/should be contacted, too, urged to join in. The can cite their group’s affiliation, too: he more a group sends cards, the better known it becomes.

The plan is to fill bags and bags with cards from around the world, delivering them to America’s president a la the famous scene from the movie, Miracle on 34th Street (when kids’ letters to Santa were brought to the court house by postmen).

The messages should be simple. The more succinct and sound-bite-worthy, the more likely reporters and others will pick them as heartfelt musings.

I conducted this campaign a few times in the pre-Internet past:

https://dl.dropbox.com/u/36923150/PFP-yellow.PDF

https://dl.dropbox.com/u/36923150/PFP-ATF.PDF

Some cards were pre-addressed by groups. Others were plain, from the Post Office. Still others had father-related themes…like these:

https://dl.dropbox.com/u/36923150/PFP-bowl.jpg

https://dl.dropbox.com/u/36923150/PFP-braves.jpg

https://dl.dropbox.com/u/36923150/PFP-boxers.jpg

So please: join in! Being an activist has never been easier. And the impact is potentially huge.

Send your cards to:

Postcards for Papa

Purple Heart House

2297 Holly Drive

Hollywood, CA 90068

The owner, Christopher Robin, will keep us apprised of the tally as time goes by. If you don't know about him, read this:

http://www.thepurplehearthouse.com

Finally, for inspiration, take a look at some cards sent in the past:

http://exhibita.smugmug.com/MensRights/Fathers-Day/Postcards-for-Papa

[/box]

GMP and Matlack part ways

April 10, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

The final nail has been driven into any imagined legitimacy that the Good Men Project ever had, or any possible remaining notion that the publication has anything to do with men, Good or otherwise.

According to an announcement posted hours ago by "editors," Tom Matlack, the sites founder, has ended his affiliation with the site as a board member, columnist and adviser.

It's over.

In the short, unceremonious announcement the possible reason for Matlack's departure was stated pretty clearly, in this writer's opinion. Matlack's original vision for the website was given mention, in part from Tom's own words:

> The original goal of The Good Men Project was to allow a place to tell men's stories — stories that speak to the male experience and "change the teller and change the listener".

And of course the reason for his departure was also given a mention:

> The vision has extended the storytelling of men, by men, for men, into a cultural conversation that is lively, dynamic, multi-media and cross-platform, and with a diversity of voices.

It is not as though the translation is hard to see. Tom Matlack really did have a vision of a publication by, about and for men. He chose the wrong bedfellows to get it started and ended up with a publication by, about and for feminists – and no one else.

As harsh as I have been on him on the pages of this website, I actually feel for Tom right now. For whatever it is worth, I think his inherent goodness was the source of his undoing. He assumed that he would be free to speak his own truth, honestly and plainly, and allow others to do the same; that the ideas themselves would sink or swim in the arena of unabridged public discourse.

When he actually followed through on that, his feminist masters, whom he had trusted with belief in their "Good" intentions, ran a shiv directly into his back and twisted it. Sociopaths Hugo Schwyzer and Amanda Marcotte left in a huff. Many other elements in the feminist community viciously turned on him, and on GMP, and let it be known that the publication would remain under fire as long as it did not toe a strictly feminist line.

Having subjected Matlack to a virtual castration, GMP CEO Lisa Hickey (or whoever pulls her strings) went on to "salvage" the publication with a scorched earth policy, removing any trace of dissent from feminism from the site. The works of Dr. Elly Tams, Girl Writes What and of course Yours Truly, were scrubbed from the database.

Noah Brand, the men's human rights mocking founder of the now defunct, "No, Seriously, What About Teh Menz?" was hired as Editor-in-Chief, with the supposed claim that he would "…work on strengthening the Good Men Project brand through the core values of a male perspective, pure storytelling, and provocative yet thoughtful debate."

Moderators have since gone to work to ensure that any comments critical of feminism or supportive of men's human rights are scrapped and their authors banned before their targeted, predominately female audience can read them.

Whatever my misgivings about Matlack have ever been, I don't think this is the publication he wanted, and I think (though I have not a shred of proof) that is why he has been thrown under the bus for the final time, or why he simply left in disgust.

There was not a word from Matlack in the announcement of his departure; no farewell wishes, no reflection on his time there, just the clear promise of what the publication was going to be with him out of the way.

I expect it won't be long before Marcotte and Schwyzer return, now that the environment has been cleared of any dissent, free speech and Tom Matlack.

Personally, I want to wish Tom well. I butted heads with him several times. I think he made a lot of mistakes, the worst of which was, likely for the sake of his investment, coddling the sharks he was swimming with. At times I thought he was a bit of a jerk, but given who I am I can't judge that one too harshly.

I never, though, really thought he was as much insincere as misguided. What I think he really was, in retrospect, was trapped. A man who really cares anything about other men was never going to last there. Not even the man who started it all.

I do think Tom is a good man who loves his wife and children, and who really wanted to bring something of substance to the community of men. He just didn't understand the big picture very well.

Of course, all this is guessing. It is just my speculation after a few years watching events over there, reading Tom's articles and exchanging a few emails with him in the early going. I watched with some respect, and some bemusement, as he went up against feminists on many occasions, even as his publication depended on their approval for its survival.

Whatever he was, though, whether innocent dupe of sexual politics he did not fully grok, or just a stubborn guy, more conviction than strategy, I am convinced he was the last shred of anything genuine about GMP.

So, I am glad he is gone. If Matlack is the man I think he is, even if I intensely disagree with his take on manhood, he is too good a man to be in a place like that.

Good luck, Tom.

Rape farming: The next generation

April 11, 2013 | by August Løvenskiolds | Link | Original Link

---

A member of the brassica family that includes mustard, cabbage, and cauliflower, the plant called “rape” or “rapeseed” is a high-oil, high-protein crop that is one of the foundations of modern agriculture.

Of course, both the terms “rape” and “rapeseed” can cause emotional distress to certain segments of the population, so at some point the plants were renamed “Canola” (from “Canadian oil”), in order to appease the distressed.

Suddenly, all the feminist bullshit in Toronto, Canada, has a basis in ironic fact.

As the terms “rape” and “rapeseed oil” began to decline on food product labels during the 1990’s, by an odd coincidence, feminists began to face a real problem – the other sort of rape, meaning an unwanted sexual assault, was declining also. The sexual revolution, the ready availability of birth control, the widespread availability of porn and the hypergamy of women meant that fewer and fewer men raised to be rapists by their abusive single mums had enough dry time to service the rape needs of the gynocentric ideologues who had worked so hard to damage men and boys.

Bigots of all stripes had used rape narratives as a staple of their propaganda diets. Want to undermine a black man, or a Romani (gypsy) man, or a Jewish man, or really, any man? Accuse him of rape, and toss a noose over the limb of a tree – problem solved. Even when the stories were recanted, either it was too late, or the police did nothing to the false rape accuser.

Unfortunately, the flaw in the rape narrative is that unless you have an actual rape, sooner or later your narrative will lose its power and your bigotry needs will go frigid and starve.

Imagine what would happen if 70% of the food in your city or town vanished. There would be panic, riots, extreme violence, crushing fear and death would soon be commonplace. The wasting of food would be a crime, dubious food would be consumed nevertheless, and the total collapse of social order would drive draconian measures to save society.

Now consider…the decline in the forcible rape rate from 1979 to 2009 was over 82%.

As the rates of actual jump-out-of-the-bushes forcible rape dropped to near extinction, the bigots against men who relied on rapists faced a huge problem – how to grow and promote rape without seeming to grow and promote rape.

Some feminists, formerly sex-positive, linked the decline of rape to the rise of pornography, and thus began to battle sexual liberation and pornography in earnest, betraying the sexual freedoms won by their younger, hotter sisters. They even claimed, comically, that pornography somehow leads to rape and they used credible death row experts like serial killer Ted Bundy to argue their point. The strange bedfellows of Christianists jumping onto to their bedwagons must have unnerved these early feminist rape farmers, and they mostly bailed.

Badly burned, the early rape farmers changed their working model of rape whorticulture to resemble illegal drugs such as pot – like marijuana farmers, they had to produce a valuable cash crop AND hide their efforts AND claim they hated their crop and wanted to end it. Unlike marijuana farmers, their product was vile and they often fancied killing, brutalizing and maiming their primary customers.

Just as some farmers use genetic engineering to produce new crops, the rape farmers used memetic engineering to breed new types of faux rape. Some of them were pretty silly and failed to sprout, such as:

Birth rape.

Verbal rape

Pity sex rape.

Sexual regret rape.

Others, just as ludicrous, gained marginal traction:

Drunken hook-up rape.

Date rape.

Now, farming rape has been at best a mixed bag for feminists. The stunning 82% decline in the rape crop has occurred despite all the false accusations, definitional expansions, and delusional rhetoric to the contrary. Those evil men just aren't raping enough to satisfy the needs of feminists, and as early as 1994, scientific studies were beginning to note this.

Thus the Next Generation of Rape Farmers was born.

While they still retained some of their focus on discovering new and previously unsuspected forms of rape, the Next Generation Rape Farmers reasoned that, since the actual forcible rape of women was approaching extinction anyway, there was no real harm in stripping away the protections and precautions that women had used for generations to protect themselves from a hostile world.

Modest clothing? Screw that – modesty is nothing more than victim-blaming! Bring on the slut walk!

Police protection? Despite their dedication to put their lives on the line for your safety, they'll never believe you, so learn to hate and disrespect the police to their faces. Maybe they will try to protect you, anyway.

In their desperation to save their failing rape crop, the feminist rape farmers are tossing their own sisters into the grinder. Left in the dust, of course, are those male and female victims of actual rape.

Hey, wait a minute: while victimhood is normally a transitory state subject to normal human healing, what if we can turn real rape victims into perpetual perennials so we can exploit the worst day of their lives FOREVER?

I have sisters, nieces, female cousins and DAUGHTERS. Every time a feminist rape farmer rips away the reasonable steps any woman might take to protect or heal herself, my rage and resolve to destroy feminist rape farmers is renewed.

One of the most recent experiences with rape farming is occurring even as I write these words – and it is on a 21+ month-old post on AVfM, "The unspoken side of rape"

The rape farmers are out in force – one, some febrile cat named Meow, wrote "Women who go to Slutwalks half naked are showing that no matter what someone is wearing they are not asking for rape, it shouldnt even matter what someone was wearing when they were raped, they never gave consent and that is the god damn problem".

This is the perfect gaslit storm of feminism: "Women, you live in a violent rape culture that hates women AND you should do nothing to protect yourself from it."

What level of idiocy does one have to have to think that that being defenseless is a great defense?

Well now, Meow, we've got your number. You are a rape farmer. You use rape and rape victims to feed your narratives that oppress both men and women. You have failed, and will continue to fail, as long as you seek to damage others in this way.

Your crop is dead. Plow it under and go fuck your field with something else.

No more slugs and snails

April 12, 2013 | by Max Cade | Link | Original Link

How does it feel to take the red pill?

It is like waking up after a bad dream; a dream in which boys and men are bad, and girls and women are good; a dream in which you can never escape the dark feelings of shame and self-disgust because you can never escape the fact that you are male.

I used to be ashamed to be a boy. I grew to be ashamed of being a man. How did this happen? How did my spirit get squashed by shame so that I felt lesser than the girls and women around me purely because I was born male? How did I wake up from this delusion? In telling my story, I hope to connect with other men who have grown up under the burden of such shame – and to celebrate and encourage what we are waking up to: the possibility of a new world in which men are valued as highly as women for who they are, not simply what they do.

"Slugs and snails and puppy dogs' tails – that's what little boys are made of. Sugar and spice and everything nice – that's what little girls are made of." This was my introduction to the shame of being a boy. I heard this rhyme repeated maybe a hundred times or more before I reached the age of 5. I took it in – deep inside me. I believed I was born dirty, disgusting and inferior to the colorful, giggling female creatures around me.

It probably didn't help that I was sexually abused by a much older girl at the age of 3 or 4, although the damage that abuse did to my sense of having an inviolable, worthy self didn't reach my conscious mind until much later.

But the message that boys and men were bad was repeated endlessly, all around me, throughout my childhood. Perhaps the most important early carrier of that message was my feminist mother, who used me as a therapist-type foil as she spent years listing the endless ways in which my Dad was supposedly making her life a living hell. I never heard his point of view. Dad bad, Mum good became Men bad, Women Good.

I didn't want to grow up like him.

The fact that I was bullied by my brother at home and by mostly boys at school just served to reinforce what I had earlier absorbed – boys are bad. Teachers strengthened this message by disseminating feminism, blaming boys first for any trouble in class and coming down much harder on us in every way. Girls came first – in the lunch queue, when sweets were handed out. Girls were never asked to put the chairs away. Once, for making a joke in class, I was made by the female teacher to kneel outside the classroom door for the rest of the lesson. What an expert in shaming she was.

In books and films I learned, however, that a Bad Boy could become Good. How? By becoming a Hero. A hero was someone who was endlessly strong and brave and proved it by rescuing some damsel in distress. Though I grew up aspiring to be such a hero, and later tried to rescue a fair few damsels, underneath I knew I could never measure up to such an impossible masculine ideal and felt my secret shame growing stronger.

But since my childhood coincided with the massive growth of feminism from the late 60s to the early 80s, I also absorbed from every direction the message that boys and men were now supposed to be soft, sensitive and ever so aware of the myriad needs of girls and women. When I was 12 and the teacher asked the class 'who is a feminist?', I was the only boy to raise my hand. Much laugher followed. I felt shamed but also brave and right. I was fighting the good fight for my mother and all damsels everywhere.

But as I entered dating age I was deeply confused about what a boy or a man was – and how he was supposed to behave. The concept of the New Man had arrived and I was only half-aware that the New Man was simply The Man Who Did What Women Wanted. I embraced the concept. Mostly I would try to be a good friend to the girls I liked – whilst noticing that they tended to hook up – yes, you guessed it – with the bastards. I was covered in acne and I knew it was bullshit that girls did not judge boys on their looks. I started to realize that they were not as pure and superior as they were painted – but at such a hormonal age I still desperately wanted their approval. In all this rejection, my shame continued to grow.

In my late teens — as my spots subsided — and I acquired a measure of confidence, I began to have some success with girls. Eventually, quite a lot of it. I felt, however, a constant pressure to be amazing (I now understand this need to be an attempt to cover up shame), fabulous, to please them to the nth degree, to give them what they wanted including in bed (girls coming first indeed), whilst very often not getting what I wanted. I thought that their needs were more important that mine. I was the protector, the romancer, the initiator, the ravisher, the spender of course, of most of the date money. I had to prove myself as a man in many ways to get the girl. And what did she have to do? Be pretty – and preferably a good conversationalist.

Eventually I 'won' what seemed to be a great prize in my beautiful and clever wife. But I was so grateful to have 'won' her that I let her alienate my friends and family and make my life all and only about her and our child. In my shame of not being good enough, I felt fear of losing her and so I thought I must do what she wanted. I neglected my needs. When it all went to shit and we got divorced, I let her take my son to another country without a fight. Three reasons: first, fairy tale chivalry and its modern feminist proxy told me that her needs came before mine. Second, I had been indoctrinated in the belief that a child needs its mother more than its father. Third, I knew that if I fought her for custody I would lose.

It all fell apart. I lost my job, I became depressed, I spent years on the dole and I became intimate with the feeling of being at the bottom of society's hierarchy: I was a man of limited utility to women.

My shame was complete.

I say 'limited' utility because in time I discovered that I could initiate quite a lot of casual relationships. I was close to being a Pick Up Artist – and in my behavior I see a cocktail of feelings about women; anger at past rejections and humiliations; fear of being 'owned' – confined as I had been through childhood abuse and in my marriage. Shame if they started to love me; I was not worth it.

This world of loneliness mixed with short-term sex and companionship was thin, pale and empty. I needed something solid, something I could trust. I discovered men's work through The Mankind Project. I saw vulnerable, open, honest men trusting each other, supporting each other and getting in touch with what they really wanted beyond what society and women demanded of them. My feelings of competitiveness with 'strange' men (rooted of course in the desire to win women) began to dissolve, as did my fear of them.

I read Warren Farrell. My compassion for boys and men just grew and grew. I started to look at the men cleaning streets and repairing buildings differently. I began to see them as fully human, beyond their utility. I started to look at teenage boys with far more warmth than judgment. I was waking up. I began to munch red pills like the starving man I had been – starving for a true and whole picture of what it is to be a man. I discovered Girl Writes What and A Voice for Men. I woke up to the damage feminism has inflicted on men and on wider society. I began to spread the word.

When my last relationship ended, I made a resolution. I was not going to chase after women any more. I would no longer put their needs ahead of mine. I would no longer try to impress them. I would no longer settle for a woman who was only giving me half or less of what I need from a relationship. I would find my own definition of what it means to be a man. Since I allowed in the wisdom and support of the community of awakened men and women that is the Men's Human Rights Movement, my male-shame has been dissolving faster and faster, like a snowball in the sun.

And here is what I say to anyone who would shame a little boy for the fact that he is male:

Skies and stars and infinite dreams. That's what little boys are made of.

Toronto offers $1,000 reward for those triggering false alarms

April 12, 2013 | by Dan Perrins | Link | Original Link

On April 4 2013, the Canadian Association for Equality, C.A.F.E., held an open discussion around the different forms of sexism. This time it was at the Ramsay Wright Laboratories and the title of the event was "From Misogyny & Misandry to Intersexual Dialogue." The scheduled speakers were Drs Paul Nathanson and Katherne Young. Once again it was time to crank up the University of Toronto Student Union's fear-factory false alarm brigade, who tripped another fire alarm during the lecture, sending emergency services into action for nothing.

I want to speak specifically to the gamblers of other people's lives. You are dangerous, bordering on lethal; not in a tough-guy kind of way, but in an adolescent, toxic-to-society kind of way.

You are cowards, so driven by blind hatred that you can't even recognize what discussion was going on. You feel you owe society such a duty that you put people's lives at risk. You did so without, of course, asking them, engaging them in dialogue, or considering the people who might have needed emergency assistance for real while you created a wild goose chase in the name of silencing free expression.

University of Toronto now the scene of repeated public safety offenses

Just under the fifteen minute mark into the talk, the infamous 'hero' of the University of Toronto Student Union's feminists triggered it for the second time in a row. It caused emergency services to be dispatched and forced people to exit the building, again. It caused money to be wasted, again. And most importantly, it caused innocent lives to willfully, needlessly, and consciously be put at risk, again. It was another roll of the dice on people's lives in the name of bullying an entire society.

The seriousness of the possible outcome(s) of the false alarm is serious enough that Canadian lawmakers have legislated some penalties for it.

First the Criminal Code of Canada;

> "437. Every one who wilfully, without reasonable cause, by outcry, ringing bells, using a fire alarm, telephone or telegraph, or in any other manner, makes or circulates or causes to be made or circulated an alarm of fire is guilty of
>
> (a) an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years; or
>
> (b) an offence punishable on summary conviction.
>
> R.S., c. C-34, s. 393;1972, c. 13, s. 31."

Fairly serious stuff, and it is what's known as a hybrid offence which gives the Crown the option of prosecuting one of two ways. If the crown elects to prosecute false fire alarm pulling indictable, the offender can serve up to two years less a day. The prisoner will serve time in a provincial jail. Not a nice place to live and you do not receive the same privileges as you would in a federal penitentiary. If the Crown elects to prosecute summary the courts will go easier on you, less time, possibly a fine with some community service.

From there we can move to the municipal laws. According to the City of Toronto by-laws, they have some fairly hefty fines in place for those who think its fun or a good idea to disrupt free speech this way.

> § 79-19. Interference.24
> No person shall impede or interfere with or hinder the Fire Department in the > performance of its duties.

Which goes on to stipulate further on down this gem;

> § 79-22. Offences.27
> Every person who contravenes any of §§ 79-12 and 79-13, 79-14A, 79-15 and 79-16, 79- > 17A and 79-19 to 79-21, inclusive, or who contravenes an order made under § 79-14B is > guilty of an offence and on conviction is liable to the penalty established by the > Provincial Offences Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.33 (as may be amended or replaced from time > to time), being on the date of enactment of this chapter, a fine not exceeding $5,000 > exclusive of costs.

It's a possible $5,000.00 addition to your expenses. That is really going to bite into those trips to the bar if you're a student. If not it's still a fair chunk of change to interrupt a lecture for about 20 minutes. That is what could happen if the Crown elects to prosecute summary. It does not mean you escape jail time either. Summary convictions can and do carry the possibility of incarceration.

But we are not done yet.

The City of Toronto, whether you know it or not, has a bounty on your head in the form of a reward.

Probably a good idea to reproduce it here, it might motivate someone to identify you, which might save some live(s)§ 433-1. Amount of reward.

> A reward of $1,000 shall be offered and, if accepted, paid to any person who supplies information leading to the conviction of any person or > persons who wilfully, without reasonable cause, make or circulate or cause to be made or circulated an alarm of fire within the city of Toronto.

Finally, the City of Toronto also has a bill ready to be served on you. It is a charge of $350.00 per vehicle per hour for the use of emergency services. All that is required is your name.

A name with a bounty on it.

I'd say life just got a little more interesting for you.

At future events, AVFM personnel will be monitoring fire alarms in the building with video surveillance. If you are caught on camera, we will identify you and file complaints with local police. We will also post those police reports, along with your name and image on the front page of this website. That should be of interest when future prospective employers Google your name.

Oh, and the reward money? We will use it to buy more cameras.

The UK Domestic Violence Protection Order (DVPO)

April 12, 2013 | by MRA London | Link | Original Link

---

MRA London activist, Lew Lenzter, describes the implications of proposals for the Domestic Violence Protection Order (DVPO) — the UK's equivalent of VAWA. – Ed (MRAL)

The UK government's Domestic Violence Protection Order, DVPO (or "dove-po"), will serve to exclude a man accused of violence by his partner from his home. A "pilot" scheme will be set up. Under this scheme men will be excluded from their homes on no evidence other than an accusation from their partners for up to 28 days. And no investigation will be carried out to test the truth of allegations.

No arrest will be made, of course. The Home Office consultation is clear to make this point, because it is – you guessed it – only a pilot scheme. And because no arrest will actually be necessary to keep a man out of his home under a DVPO, he's threatened with actual arrest for non-compliance. Indeed, the DVPO spawns the imaginary crime of breaching conditions, giving scope to the possibility of juicy convictions to sex up politicians' portfolios.

What is particularly dispiriting is that the current coalition government promised to restore our freedoms eroded away by freakily over-controlling earlier administrations. They promised to ditch the notorious Antisocial Behavior Order (ASBO) – which they did slowly and eventually. But now, they are planning to replace the ASBO with some sibling monster of a new name. The DVPO is nothing more than the ASBO for the home: a means to punish without a court decision while creating a crime out of nothing.

You can see the tabloid banner: EVIL DVPO BREACHER SENTENCED TODAY.

A paragon of British fairness. Indeed, the set up actually appears gender neutral on the surface. Anyone not looking deeper might be left with this impression. There is a phone-line for men as well as for women. A more discerning individual, however, will see the main text of the Home Office DVPO page is exclusively dedicated to female victims. There is at the bottom of that page a link to another page, itself with links to a plethora of female victimhood propaganda pages.

Moreover, another government page — Report Domestic Abuse — is top-heavy with links to pages helping women. And only one for helping men.

The unfairness doesn't stop there. Women's pages are elaborate, clear and easy to use. A wealth of information is laid out clearly and in an attractive way. Under the Home Office page you can find another elaborate female-only page, and, under a gender-neutral title.

The page for men is, however, a crudely put-together job with a large part of the front page taken up by a disclaimer for the reader, telling him he uses the information at his own risk. There is nothing of the sort on any of the women's sites. This government-sponsored men's page Men's Advice Line appears to be the only one of its kind.

Looking at the detail, there are three options for three different groups:

• Heterosexuals

• Gays

• Front line workers

But interestingly, the page for gays is identical to the one for heterosexuals. And, the same disclaimer from the front also appears on both these pages. The government has spared itself a lot of valuable time on this one.

After following links through, one arrives at a list of a few organizations. These ostensibly help men, but some are most notably (if not exclusively) run by and for women.

What a difference in government attitude between the two genders. Indeed, one question one might ask is this. Why have separate pages for women and men in this day and age of equality?

Some glaring loose ends also abound.

False Accusers

One issue conspicuously missing is the question of fake accusers. How will they be handled? There seems, in the government PDF for the Domestic Violence Protection Order, no consideration given to the possibility. You know already what the answer will be. "Well, it's only a pilot scheme, you see."

Police Decide

Police will be making assessments on risk. The police are taking control of issues that were once left to social workers, lawyers and courts. Governments have been slowly eroding away our liberties for the last three or four decades. They are slowly doing away with presumption of innocence and due process. These once-cherished rights are seen by modern government as a pesky nuisance.

Molestation

How many people do you know are molesters? One might probably answer not a lot. However, molestation here is given a rather broad definition. Apart from the physical acts to which the term normally relates, coming near to a property occupied by the accuser is also an act of molestation!

Homelessness

Homelessness resulting from being barred from home is in contravention of Human Rights Act, Article 3. The accused cannot be excluded from his home if this will happen, according to the Act. However, only in cases where breech of Article 3 is "immediate and foreseeable" will the accused be barred. But what DOES that mean? If a guy ends up sleeping in the gutter because the police just didn't see that might happen, it's then ok?

Not Beyond Reasonable Doubt

The DVPO will be issued on the balance of probabilities, not on whether a threat is proven beyond reasonable doubt. And remember, police will be the sole assessors.

Where do cranky conspiracy theorists turn out in the end to be right? In the UK. The UK is a police state. And today's government – our freedom respecting LibDem/Conservative coalition – is currently paving the way to strengthen our police state's foundations.

High Attrition Rate

A very telling fact is this. The pilot scheme has shown a high attrition rate as criminal proceedings develop. This underlines three glaring alternatives:

1. Couples wanting, in the end, to remain bonded.
2. Untruths and exaggerations on the part of the accuser (usually the woman) playing a role in the proceedings.
3. The perpetrator is just too smart to be nailed.

The facts are that only 25% of cases result in prosecution and only 1.5% – 5% in a conviction.

But the government and its supporting media are trying to sell the notion to the country that (3) is the primary reason for the high drop-out rate. Think about it what that means. It means a lot of very clever guys are beating their partners up.

We don't buy this. We believe the bulk of cases form a melange between (1) and (2). Moreover, we see this as a good sign. Couples resolving their differences are what the aim of a worthwhile public social service answering the issue of partner rowing should be.

But this displeases the government and the police. They want convictions, convictions, convictions. And couples separating galore.

Why? It's what keeps them in work. It gives police more to do in this age of declining crime. And the public anger it rouses wins lying politicians votes.

Female Violence Against Children

Violence against children is referred to time and again. But nowhere is it acknowledged that the bulk of violence against children is perpetrated by women. Social research studies in America have shown that most abuse of children is perpetrated by women.

Conclusion

I recall someone on a recent internet discussion saying that he listened through Orwell's Nineteen Eighty-Four on Radio 4. He said he thought it was the news.

A joke? Maybe. Or maybe not. Feminist government and over-controlling police statehood are two sides of the same coin. To quote Rich Zubaty, women follow rules and regulations, men follow principles. Erin Pizzey once commented that governments prefer women because they are more docile than men, because men want to change things, something which is a threat to their power.

Principles are deep and come from within. But principles and personal freedoms go hand-in-hand. Rules and regulations, however, are put together by governments. And, as we have seen over the last decade, western government can be very self-serving. It can be very unprincipled. Moreover, it is today showing a perceivable movement towards totalitarianism. Wikileaks has exposed disturbing practices already in place.

The DVPO is just another area of policy used as a tool by the government to strengthen its overall control of the public. It achieves this by exerting more control over men, typically by imprisoning them or contriving circumstances to threaten them with imprisonment.

And once you control men, you control everyone.

Gentlemen, we need to arrest this tendency. We are the men of today and it is for us to change things. Every area of feminist governance must be exposed and it can only be done by us. We must get our message out to the public at large.

This article was first published on MRALondon.org.

Interview with JTO and Dannnyboy

April 12, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Our very own JTO and Dannyboy were interviewed by news reporter Avery Haines at the recent event at the University of Toronto. They did a great job fielding questions.

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=hhIvG79eEoc&feature=youtu.be

What you will also pick up on during the interview is that Haines quoted CAFE member Iain Dwyer as saying that AVFM had put up posters on campus targeting protesters and making claims that "they would get theirs." I knew that there was something seriously amiss about that statement and contacted Dwyer myself for a quote. He had the following to say:

> I did not say that AVFM had put posters up on campus. I said that you put posts up, referring to your website. I think the reporter was campus focused, and that's where the misunderstanding came from.
>
> As for the 'they'll get theirs' comment, I said nothing of the sort. The woman who was interviewed with me (you can see her speaking in some of the video taken before the talk started) did say things to that effect. I couldn't tell you her exact words, but she did bring up the posting of some of the protesters twitter accounts and repeated the claims they had made about harrassment and threats.
>
> Although it is possible the reporter was trying to create controversy, I think her questions came more from a lack of understanding. We knew Avery Haines from an interview she did with Dr. Farrell in November and she was very interested in what he had to say about the boys crisis.

I am inclined to agree with Dwyer. I note that in her questioning of JTO and Danny she appears to ask mostly balanced questions and allows them ample time to answer in detail. Still, I think that news media in general has become too lax in attention to detail and accuracy.

That being said, please join me in thanking Dan and JTO for a job well done.

I also note that it appears this interview did not make it to local news. No bother, it is still available here, at the real media. PE

Erin Pizzey: Ask Me Anything on Reddit

April 13, 2013 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

A Voice for Men's Editor-At-Large and Domestic Violence Policy Advisor, Erin Pizzey, will be doing an Ask Me Anything on Reddit on Sunday, April 14 2013 (tomorrow, as of this writing) at 4pm Greenwich time, 11am Eastern Time here in the US. We would love to have everybody, including as many feminists as possible, as well as anyone interested in domestic violence in general, and of course as many Men's Human Rights Activists as we can get to show up and show some support for Erin's amazing life and work:

Please spread word to anyone who is interested in domestic violence, child abuse, men's issues, women's issues, and so on, for this rare historic opportunity to ask anything you want of the pioneer of the battered women's shelter/refuge movement, this early member of the women's movement of the 1970s, and supporter of the Men's Human Rights Movement any questions you want. Make your questions light and fun, or as tough and hard-hitting as you want. The one thing we ask is that you be polite and respectful and not engage in arguments with others; this conversation is with Erin, and not any petty squabbles with others asking questions.

We expect the event to run about 3 hours, however Erin says she'll do it as long as she can and may be back for followup questions in the following days if there's time. All are welcome, let's give her as much support as we can!

The thread will appear on Reddit's Ask Me Anything section 30-60 minutes before the event begins, so just look for her name and she'll be there, with a friend (yours truly) to help her with typing.

Urgent Update: The original version of this article linked to the wrong part of Reddit, make sure if you already bookmarked it or announced it elsewhere to tell people it is going to be at http://www.reddit.com/r/IAmA and not the earlier link that just ended in "/AMA". My mistake, sorry gang!

A request of readers

April 13, 2013 | by VFM News and Commentary | Link | Original Link

[box icon="none"]

I hope everyone is having a good weekend. I just need to make a very brief announcement.

I have had several people message me recently with a link to a website that apparently has the identity of the really loud, obnoxious and completely moronic red-headed woman at the University of Toronto protest.

I am asking everyone to cooperate with me in NOT linking to that website, or posting any of her personal details in the comments here. And I am asking moderators to remove any posts like this should they appear. While she is pretty vile as a human being, the only thing we know for sure is that she was exercising freedom of expression. We encourage that, even from the likes of this woman.

It is our policy to seek out and make public the identities individuals who break the law or who indisputably attempt to harass, bully or abridge the free expression of others in the furtherance of their ideology. Since we do that, treating people in the same way for simply expressing opinions that we don't agree, or for being ill mannered and garish for that matter, defeats what we are trying to accomplish.

I appreciate your understanding and cooperation with this important matter. PE

[/box]

Time to end restraining order terrorism

April 14, 2013 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

As reported earlier by AVFM contributor Michael Conzachi, a veteran law enforcement officer and investigator, a restraining order terrorism scheme has been exposed involving actress Pauley Perrette and the Los Angeles Superior Courts.

AVFM has been covering this story for several weeks now (actually longer) and has dedicated a great deal of energy interviewing witnesses, sorting through court and other documents and vetting the information.

While the case involving Perrette and Francis "Coyote" Shivers stands out because it involves several individuals of some celebrity, it is also remarkable because it represents one of the worst and most obvious lapses of legal ethics and common sense that we have ever addressed.

This case literally makes a mockery of justice, and demonstrates for the world to see, judicial hubris on a staggering level. Not to mention the fact that it shows a Los Angeles courtroom that is clearly serving as an enforcement tool for a decade long plan of harassment and revenge by a disturbed individual who has leveraged the abuse of restraining orders with her celebrity.

We intend to remind the Superior Court, and Judge Kathryn Solorzano, that while restraining orders may be a routine in her duties, they also can cause devastating consequences for those affected by them; often people who have had nothing whatsoever proven against them in a court of law.

Restraining orders have the power to render people homeless. They restrict individual freedom of movement and freedom of speech — liberties we all too often take for granted as we go about our daily lives. It is not just the responsibility of the court to use these orders judiciously and with sensitivity to impact they can have on often innocent people. It is also in the purview of the people to demand that officials execute their duties in good faith, and when they fail or become corrupt, remove them from power.

Our judges are charged with being the protectors of our Constitutional rights, not the destroyers of them.

But, unfortunately, the worst case scenario, that of the rubber stamping of lies, the rote acceptance of false allegations and the use of court power as muscle serving the machinations of vindictive abusers has become the norm in this culture.

It is time for the people to bring that nightmare to an end.

With that I am sending the following letter to Criminal Grand Jury for the County of Los Angeles, California, calling for an investigation into both the Pauley Perrette case, as well as the entire system governing restraining orders in the courts under their jurisdiction.

This is by no means the last effort on our part, nor is AVFM the only organization that will be undertaking continued efforts in this direction. Mr. Conzachi is now working with us to coordinate the actions of other human rights advocacy groups to bring attention to what is happening in the life of Francis Shivers, in the courts of Los Angeles and across the entire nation.

The time for silence from the citizenry is over. Nothing will start to solve the problems in a corrupt court system more quickly than a single judge who is publicly disgraced and removed from the bench. It may or may not be Solorzano, but before this is over with someone will pay the price for their corruption by being shown the door, or they will earn the respect of the populace by addressing the problem.

Nothing in between will be acceptable.

AVFM Letter to LA Grand Jury

Live now on Reddit

April 14, 2013 | by Erin Pizzey | Link | Original Link

Hi. I'm doing my Ask Me Anything on Reddit right now. These are the photos that the "redditors" need to prove it's really me answering questiosn. My friend Dean will be helping me with the typing. I hope to see you all there–and that you feel free to ask me anything!

This is the link to the Ask Me Anything session, just click here: http://www.reddit.com/r/IAmA/comments/1cbrbs/hi_im_erin_pizzey_ask_me_anything/

You will need a Reddit account to ask questions but it's free to set up and I hope if you're not already on it you'll sign up and come and say hello!

[image]

Once again, here's the link! http://www.reddit.com/r/IAmA/comments/1cbrbs/hi_im_erin_pizzey_ask_me_anything/

Update: We are done for now however we will come back next Saturday so we can get to anyone we missed. Thanks everybody so much!

Restraining order terrorism: We have arrived

April 14, 2013 | by Michael Conzachi | Link | Original Link

In recent weeks, A Voice for Men has published a number of articles by Suzanne McCarley, Dr. Tara J. Palmatier Psy.D and Mr. Paul Elam regarding the debacle of the Francis "Coyote" Shivers case who was recently convicted of violating a restraining order obtained or procured on behalf of his ex-wife, Ms. Pauley Perrette, an actress on the CBS television show, "NCIS."

In each of the articles, these authors painstakingly went through a plethora of information that included a number of court documents as well as interviews of persons intimately familiar with the facts of this case and its participants. I too reviewed many of these documents as well as personally attending one of the court hearings to see firsthand what was going on in the courtroom.

It is explicitly clear that we have a scenario involving a very disturbed woman with intimate knowledge of the intricacies of the restraining order process, and who has manipulated and exploited that process in order to exact a catastrophic and unrelenting level of revenge on her ex-husband. It is also quite disturbing that our criminal justice system has either facilitated or allowed this to happen, or has also been manipulated in similar fashion.

The articles published at AVFM have generated a number comments, emails and phone calls that essentially have gone "viral." There appears to be other entities that have either facilitated or contributed information in some form that makes one wonder what type and level of assistance Ms. Perrette has received in her quest for revenge. Some have suggested that certain segments of the criminal justice system have been willing participants in this debacle, and some of the facts uncovered thus far seem to support that.

There have been some serious questions as to the actions of the Los Angeles City Attorney's Office, specifically the actions of Deputy City Attorney Elizabeth Biderman Gertz, State Bar # 93523. Information is still being developed, however it appears that Ms. Gertz's conduct and attitude, some describe as an "angry misandrist" is complicit, with her relentless pursuit of Mr. Shivers, and, for lack of a better word, her "chummy relationship" with the Perrette camp.

What is also clear is that there is a developing trail of court documents, police reports, and electronic forensic evidence that is not subject to manipulation or alteration. As this develops that unbiased, untainted, and recoverable electronic evidence will continue to unveil the facts.

A number of comments mention the unusual connection between the LAPD Threat Management Unit, and a prominent "Hollywood" entertainment law firm. A number of comments mentioned the words, "collusion" and "corruption." Whether or not this is the case has yet to be determined, but it would truly be disturbing if law enforcement officers have turned into the enforcement arm of a Hollywood law firm to satisfy the desires of a disturbed celebrity with a boatload of cash.

We have seen similar scenarios in other forms of government such as what was exposed by the advocacy group, CREW, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, detailing the trail of former high ranking Homeland Security officials who mysteriously slid right into high paying jobs with defense contractors and defense lobbying firms after their government service retirements. These types of scenarios are quite common, evidenced by the daily news.

The information developed thus far clearly indicates that the Pauley Perrette case is an exceptional, but not uncommon example of the manipulation of the restraining order process, one in which a number of violations of First Amendment, federal and state criminal law and federal civil rights violations have been committed.

I am not speaking of the ones Mr. Shivers has been accused and convicted of.

By all accounts, Mr. Shivers was found guilty of violating a temporary, not permanent, restraining order, by employing a cell phone camera, a condition that may have been placed after the alleged violation. The question that readers must ask is why, would Mr. Shivers be denied the opportunity or the full legal right to employ any type of recording device, either audio or video in a public place?

It seems to me that the only reason for such a condition contained in Mr. Shiver's temporary restraining order was to prevent him from documenting years of unfounded allegations of harassment and stalking. What attorney, law enforcement professional, or judge facilitated this, allowed this to happen, or entered or signed any order that included this condition?

Why would entities of the criminal justice system prohibit anyone, in a public place, who is not committing a crime, to jail, try, and convict a person, who instinctively employs a cell phone camera to record a possible imminent physical attack, which it did, but also to record the incident to once again prevent another in a miles long trail of false allegations?

Think of the logic of that.

To be clear, Mr. Shivers was convicted of violating a temporary restraining order (turning on his cell phone camera) before he was given due process in a court of law to offer a defense on the legality of the original order on whether it was valid in the first place. Essentially, he was convicted of a crime based on an unproven, unsubstantiated allegation, before he had an opportunity in a court of law to dispute that allegation.

The sheer lunacy of this case makes my jaw drop, and I continue to shake my head in wondrous and glorious amazement at just how desperate and manipulative this whole circus has become, and the time and expense that the City and County of Los Angeles has invested in it.

With a large portion of Los Angeles resembling a third world country; tens of thousands of armed gang members running amok, human trafficking so bad that the U.N. is getting involved, a crumbling infrastructure, garbage and graffiti strewn on unrepaired. pot hole ridden streets, we have the criminal justice system relentlessly pursuing Mr. Francis Shivers and his dangerous cell phone camera and his stupid comments on social media.

Wow, let's call Sheriff Joe and America's Most Wanted.

AVFM will continue to obtain various documents including public record court documents, but it will be interesting to see, once this article is published, if suddenly a court order appears to seal these records. What the readers must ask is: who and why would anyone, especially if this case has been handled properly, attempt to seal the records of this case?

If that does occur, then that action should speak for itself — some person or persons have something to hide. On a positive note, some of the documents from this case have already been obtained, so any attempt to conceal information at this point would be futile.

What is also interesting is that Mr. Shivers was also convicted of violating his probation for his use of social media in commenting about his ex-wife. The concern of the court was that some third party could be compelled to take some action that might be harmful to Ms. Perrette. What is odd is that there has been no mention, investigation or efforts by judicial system personnel to investigate, curb or prosecute any person for the use of social media by his ex-wife as a forum for derogatory and threatening comments towards her ex-husband, some which have resulted in death threats.

Does anyone see a problem with this?

There have also been a number of comments, many of which are readily available on the Internet, that the jury that convicted Mr. Shivers was "Star Struck" by the celebrity status of Ms. Perrette. Some disagree as I do. I believe that the criminal justice system itself has been "Star Struck" by the celebrity status of Ms. Perrette.

This case is so egregious and blatant that "A Voice for Men, along with the National Coalition for Men are sending a letter to the Los Angeles County Criminal Grand Jury asking that a panel be convened for a formal investigation. The letter will be posted to this website and available for download within 24 hours.

Even considering the hundreds of years of experience of the AVFM contributors, professionals, and staff it remains truly remarkable that such a blatant manipulation and exploitation of the restraining order system could occur.

