Leeds Times - Saturday 14 July 1866

A WOMAN CONVICTED OF MAKING A FALSE CHARGE OF INDECENT ASSAULT.—Our readers may remember that some time ago a woman named Allen charged Mr. Moseley, a London dentist, with committing a serious assault upon her in a railway carriage. The charge broke down completely, and the woman was on Wednesday put upon her trial at the Central Criminal Court, on a charge of perjury. Convincing evidence was given of the infamous character of the defendant, and of the respectable character of the prosecutor; it was satisfactorily proved that Mrs. Allen had sworn falsely, not in one but in many instances; that her dress and her bonnet were unruffled by her supposed struggles with her ravisher; and that she had omitted to complain of Mr. Moseley's alleged violence at the several stations at which the train stopped before reaching Euston-square. The jury found her guilty, but strongly recommended her to mercy, on the ground that "Mr. Moseley might have taken some little liberties with her"—in other words, he might have done what by their verdict they were convinced he had not done! The Recorder said he always paid great attention to the recommendations of juries, but on the present occasion he felt he should be neglecting his duty to the public if he paid any attention to this recommendation. The ground furnished for it was not of sufficient weight. It was suggested that some temptation might have been afforded by Mr. Moseley in the railway carriage, but there was not a particle of evidence to support that view. The offence was one of the most serious which could be advanced against any person, and if it had been successfully established in this instance, it would have unquestionably involved the utter ruin of an entirely innocent man. When the charge was made with the view of extorting money, and when that charge was deliberately persisted in before the magistrate, the court felt bound to pass a severe sentence, and yet the lightest which for such an abominable crime could be passed—namely, that the prisoner be kept in penal servitude for the term of five years.—No one will think the sentence too severe. Charges such as Mrs. Allen preferred against Mr. Moseley are, we fear, much more frequent than is generally supposed, as the difficulty of meeting them commonly makes the accused, however innocent, only too glad to escape by a compromise. It is not often that a lady is so indiscreet as to represent herself as the subject of outrageous violence, and at the same time present herself to the police with a highly ornamental bonnet, undemolished, on her head, and a bouquet of unruffled flowers in her hand.

False charge of indecent assault – 1868

Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper - Sunday 05 April 1868

FALSE CHARGE OF INDECENT ASSAULT.

John Mabe, labourer, aged 23, was charged on remand at the Thames police-court on Tuesday with indecently assaulting and robbing Maria Bedwell, aged 18. At the first investigation the prisoner said she was a servant out of place, living with her aunt in Eglinton-road, Bromley; that she received a purse containing 7s. 6d. from her aunt, and went out for her upon an errand; that, after speaking to a young man named George Rayen, living next door to her aunt, she was dragged into an arch under the North London railway, near the Tower Hamlets' cemetery at Bromley, and then subjected to very rough and indecent usage from a man who was intoxicated, and in the presence of the prisoner, and that he also assaulted her; that her first assailant struck her on the eye, which was blackened; that the prisoner used filthy language and made improper overtures to her; and, finally, that both men beat her, and ran away with her hat, a small parcel of coke, and her purse and money. The hat and parcel were restored to her in the Commercial-road, near the Stepney railway station, where the prisoner was given into custody. It was now stated by the police that the prosecutrix was a person of loose character, that she did not live in the Eglinton-road with an aunt, and that the young man she had spoken to resided two miles from the place she mentioned.—Mr. Benson called the girl, who said she lives with a Mrs. Spencer, who is not her aunt. She declined stating where she obtained the money in the purse she had lost. Charles Roberts, 22, Collingwood-street, Mile-end, stated that he was talking to prosecutrix near the railway arches at Bromley on the 24th of March, when three men came up. One of them turned back; the others went on. He then left her, and the girl proceeded on her way, taking the same direction as the two men. He heard no cries or screams.—Mr. Henry Noble, of 35, Lawrence-road, Bow, said his attention had been drawn to this case by a report in the papers. He was in one of the arches of the North London railway, which he rented, a few days ago, when he heard a quarrel. He saw the girl Bedwell standing against the wall and a man abusing her. A boy was also in the arch. He saw the man strike her. He said to one of his men, "What girl is that?" and the reply was, "She is always about here." He said to the man who struck her, "Don't do that again, or I will give you into custody." She made no complaint of outrage or robbery.—Mr. Benson believed the complainant's account of the indecent assault and robbery was a tissue of falsehoods, and discharged the accused.

False charge of indecent assault – 1875

On Thursday James Berwick, proprietor of the Lorrimore Arms Tavern, Walworth, surrendered his bail at the Surrey sessions, to answer to an indictment charging him with indecently assaulting Miss Kate Gander, about 17 years of age….

Mr. Williams submitted to the jury that the charge was all false. These accusations were very easily made, but they were very hard to disprove. The defendant was a married man and had grandchildren; was it likely that he would be guilty of such a serious offence as this, when his own wife and married daughter were in the bar, and would be able to hear all that went on in the cellar? It was against common sense.

The jury, without calling on Mr. Lilley to sum up the case, returned the verdict of "Not guilty," — The Chairman said that he quite agreed with the verdict and the defendant left the court without the slightest stain on his character.

False allegation of indecent assault – 1883

Nottingham Evening Post - Monday 10 December 1883

A CHARGE WITHDRAWN.—Elizabeth Hinde Cooks, a married woman living in Yat-street, was summoned for having laid a false charge of indecent assault against Edward Astle with intent to obtain money. Mr. Greaves, on behalf of Cooks, produced a medical certificate showing that she was suffering from nervous debility, and was unable to attend. She had also lost a child on the day of the first hearing. Mr. Briggs, on behalf of Astle, said that having cleared his character, he was quite prepared now to withdraw the summons against the woman. The Bench allowed this course to be pursued.

George Neel, 18, fish hawker, was charged with committing a rape upon Mary Evans, at Berry Pomeroy, on the 2nd of September. Mr. Underhay prosecuted; Mr. Carter defended. The prosecutrix is the wife of John Evans, a boat builder, of Brixham…

The Judge said that during the 11 years he had been on the Bench he had known more absolutely false charges for rape than for any other offence. As had been remarked more than 200 years ago, it was a charge easily made, but very difficult to disprove. The present was a somewhat extraordinary case in which there was violent and conflicting testimony with which the jury must deal. His Lordship summed up strongly in favour of the prisoner, who was aquitted.

Taraji P. Henson Proves That #Outrage Over Trayvon, Ferguson Misguided

April 6, 2015 | by Mumia Ali | Link | Original Link

"More dads, less crime…"
= Larry Elder

By now you've no doubt heard about "Empire" actress Ms. Taraji P. Henson's mea culpa to the Glendale, CA police department, for her earlier accusation of their racially profiling her son, 20-year-old Marcell Johnson. The Los Angeles Times reports:

> "I would like to publicly apologize to the officer and the Glendale Police Department," she said in an Instagram message with the hashtags #TurningANegativeIntoAPositive and #LoveTarajiPHenson. "A mother's job is not easy and neither is a police officer's. Sometimes as humans we overreact without gathering all the facts. As a mother in this case, I overreacted and for that I apologize. Thank you to that officer for being kind to my son."

This apology follows on the heels of Ms. Henson's making similar accusations that the University of Southern California also racially profiled her son, which has led her to putting young Marcell at her alma mater Howard University back east. Howard, for those who may not be aware, is considered a HBCU (Historically Black Colleges and Universities).

Ms. Henson had no choice but to eat her words and accept a bit of egg on her face after video evidence came to light of Marcell's traffic stop by the coppers; not only did he run a yellow light while a pedestrian was crossing the street, he was also in possession of marijuana, paraphernalia associated with it and, by his own admission, a Ritalin pill that he did not have a prescription for:

> The footage from Oct. 18 shows the officer driving in traffic about 10:10 p.m. in Glendale when the actress' son, who is in a Honda Civic ahead of him, drives through a lighted crosswalk as a person walks across. His race was not apparent in the video as he was driving.
> The officer, still behind the 20-year-old, speeds up and initiates a traffic stop.
> In the video, the officer approaches Henson's son's Honda and tells him he was stopped for driving through a lighted crosswalk while someone was walking in it. The youth tells the officer he was headed to a friend's home in Calabasas.
> He hands the officer his insurance information and says he has never been arrested. He says his name is Marcell Johnson, and his mother is Taraji P. Henson. Johnson is his father's last name. [boldface added]
> Then the officer asked whether he had anything illegal in his car, and the young man responded that he had marijuana in his backpack, according to the video.

> He told the officer he has a state-issued medical marijuana license but couldn't find it.
> "I appreciate you being honest with me about the weed. I do appreciate that because I do smell weed," the officer said.
> During the lengthy traffic stop shown on the video, Johnson was searched and told the officer he had Ritalin, a prescription drug used to treat hyperactivity, in his car. He admitted he didn't have a prescription and that he had gotten the pill from a friend.
> "You know you're not supposed to have that, right?" the officer told him.
> Johnson then consented and allowed the officer to search his car. At that point, the officer was joined by two other officers and a police cadet.
> For most of the traffic stop, officers searched Johnson's car for the Ritalin pill, which they never found because he said he may have left it at his friend's house. They also found hash oil, marijuana and a grinder. The officer found a knife, which they determined was legal.
> On the video, he told one of the officers he had smoked marijuana two hours before driving, so a sobriety test was performed. He passed the test.
> After checking his car, the officer decided not to cite him for the original infraction because it would have a lasting effect on his driving record. Instead, he cited the young man for possessing marijuana.
> "I am not going to give you a citation for running that yellow because that would actually put a moving violation on your driving license, and you are going to have to go to traffic school and all that stuff, so I am helping you by not giving you a violation on it. All I am going to do is take the weed from you," he said.
> The officer told Johnson he could go to court, show proof he has a prescription and probably just pay a fine.
> "It felt like this was a little better than the other one," he said. "I am giving this to you too because you smoked weed about two hours ago … and a warning if you have Ritalin on you and you're not supposed to, don't do it. That's a big violation and I wouldn't want to do that to you."
> Glendale Police Chief Robert Castro said the racial profile allegations resulted in threats against the department.
> "The contact and actions with Marcell Johnson were legal, professional and empathetic," he said.

The above was admittedly a lengthy passage, but it was necessary to include it in today's column because it highlights a number of issues that Black folk aren't too keen to be all that terribly honest about, especially within potential earshot of Whites – you know, the whole "airing dirty laundry thing".

Only problem with that line of argument, as William H. Cosby noted more than a decade ago, was that our "dirty laundry" was getting out of school at 3 pm and running amok.

To be sure, racial profiling of Black men and boys in particular is a very real thing, as is police brutality involving the same; but the fact of the matter is that there is more than enough blame to go around.

What Ms. Henson's recent gaff proves is that there is a very real problem taking place in the Black precincts of America, and it's the utter lack of fathers being involved in the lives of their kids, especially their sons. Say what you will of Fox News commentator Bill O'Reilly, but on this point, he was spot-on.

Notice the bolded line in the above quote? I did that to highlight the fact that Marcell's father was MIA – literally reduced to one line of text in a newspaper report. As I was curious about Marcell's daddy, I decided to look up Ms. Henson's Wikipedia entry to see if I could find out a bit more info on Mr. Johnson; here's what I found:

> "Henson became pregnant her junior year of college, she gave birth May 1994 to her son Marcell Johnson. Her son's father was her high-school sweetheart."

Yet another two-liner. No mention of whether they married or not, or whatever became of Mr. Johnson. Hmm.

What cannot be denied in this case, and indeed the cases of the late Trayvon Martin and Michael Brown, is that in all their cases, they, like Marcell, had a weak father presence, and an overwhelmingly suffocating mother influence that is willing to raise hell in defence of them, even in the face of less than savory facts about their boys.

Those in the Black sections reading these words will interpret them as, among other things, blaming the victims for their demise and in the case of Marcell, his being pulled over in the first place – but things just don't happen out of nowhere. The ugly truth of the matter is that all three of these men were headed toward trouble – it was only a matter of time for Trayvon and Michael, and it remains to be seen if this brush with the law will be enough to scare young Marcell straight.

As I've said before, and it bears repeating now, that anywhere one observes violent and property crime, "thug life" behavior, pestilence and just overall disorder and chaos in the Black community, you can be sure that fathers will be few and far between, and what I have referred to as Baby Mamaism will reign supreme. Not only that, but as Ms. Henson has demonstrated, very often the Baby Mamas of Black America will aid and abet their antisocial sons in their misbegotten deeds.

All manner of social science research and study has repeatedly validated the fact that involved fathers – and let me be a stompdown pedant about this, MARRIED AND LIVING IN THE SAME HOUSE AS THE MOTHER – produce kids, boys and girls alike, with markedly improved life outcomes for them, than kids whose father is not living with them. This is just a fact that must be honestly grappled with, as we continue this charade of a "conversation" about racial issues in the United States at this time.

Trayvon, Michael, and now Marcell, are three vivid examples of Baby Mamaism having failed.

How many more young Black men must pay the ultimate price for a warped ideology?

Again, there’s enough blame to go around.

It’s time that Black America be honest enough with itself, to admit that.

Teach women not to interrupt men

April 7, 2015 | by August Løvenskiolds | Link | Original Link

Editor's note: This article is also available in Spanish.

Guys, has a woman ever distracted you while you were busy? Distracted you to address some petty concern that you don't give a damn about? The phenomenon is known as "vaginterruption" (verb: "to vaginterrupt") and I am sick of it.

So, I was standing in the checkout line of a Walmart Neighborhood Market, staring off into space and lost in thought: I was mentally rotating n-dimensional objects though an n-1 dimensional space in an effort to nail down a deterministic algorithm to generically solve the otherwise intractable mathematics problem known as the Travelling Salesman, when a woman I'd never seen before grabbed my arm.

My mathematical musings fell apart like the fantastical details of Jackie Coakley's Rolling Stone rape hoax.

"Can you tell me if that brand of butter is good quality?" she yelled, pointing at the two-pound 2-pack of Land O Lakes® salted sweet cream butter waiting to be scanned with the rest of my fortnightly grocery haul.

I'm serious in my commitment to MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way) principles – I hadn't spoken to or even looked at a woman in real life all that month, nor did I care to. Yet, once again, I was being vaginterrupted – imposed upon by a woman to solve her problems like a slave is directed to massage the mistresses' wretched, fungal feet.

Land O Lakes® butter is a domestic American brand of consistent quality; a mildly flavored butter that ranked mid-range in one taste test. The 2-pack was on sale for well under $5 for 2 pounds, which made it an incredible value even for an aggressive discounter like Walmart.

I considered just walking away without answering, much like that sullen chick with flabby arms did in the infamous (almost 40 million views) YouTube video entitled "10 Hours of Walking in NYC as a Woman" that demonized men of color to the delight of both white racists and feminists everywhere. The problem was that I was both trapped in line and low on food (beer) at home; I didn't relish the thought of having to return to the store later to redo all my shopping.

I also considered a number of rude rejoinders that would not have worked out well for me – a dozen other shoppers were gawking at the woman's outburst, waiting to see if I would surrender to her butter lust or fight back. In the end I gave in to the inevitable brain-rape and I told the entitled harpy the reasons why my choice of that butter was a good one.

I felt so sullied, so used. I just wanted to run home, shower, collapse into a fetal position and die.

Women in our matriarchal culture feel entitled to use men as walking brains or walking wallets – a process known as "cash-calling": taking cash out of our wallets or cashing in on men's superior knowledge and logical reasoning skills. Women see men as resource-objects to be used and discarded at will without ever considering that men are also sexual beings that get enervated by being judged by cash-calling considerations without sexual recompense.

Had that woman in the store respected me for my male sexuality, she would have written her question on a flashcard, then dropped to her knees, unzipped my pants and started blowing me while she waved the flashcard question in front of my vision. I would have been happy and even grateful to help in her evaluation of the merits of butters had she taken such a thoughtful and honest way of compensating me equally for my help but no, she brutally just took what she wanted – my mental labor – and left me hanging soft and dry.

Now, there are good, strong and brave women in the world who are aware of men's sexual needs and take great care to only interact with men on a transactional sexual basis. I've seen these women on street corners, leaning on lampposts with one knee out; dancing in gentlemen's clubs; and flirting with professors both during and after class.

These are the women who earn men's respect – they understand men and our needs. They grasp that real equality means an eagerness to trade for men's resources by giving men sexual favors – what men really care about.

Meanwhile, feminist assholes blather on about how poor, feckless women should get stuff for free – more comfortable abortion clinics, more protection from whatever happens to be scaring them at the moment, free tampons, free birth control – the list of demands from the feminists seems to grow every week without a hint that they are willing to put sexual or other goods for men on the negotiating table.

The smallest suggestion that men have needs, too – especially sexual needs that feminists are woeful at meeting – sends these feminists into apoplexy. They see men as beasts of burden they can exploit at will without even an actual touch of gratitude or the offer of a blumpkin.

It is brutal exploitation of men. It has to stop.

Some feminists are keen to blame the victim, claiming that men should create some sort of "patriarchy" – a sort of parallel to the generally accepted matriarchy, one gathers – that encourages men to keep their sexual needs under control around women, even as women adopt more mentally intrusive and provocative clothing (or lack thereof) styles that vaginterrupt men suggestively and aggressively with no actual sexual follow-through.

They insist that men and male sexuality are somehow "toxic" and "rapey" even though women rely on us for our resources and men's ways of wisdom in building civilization for them, and populating that civilization via the children conceived by the creamy tears of our loins.

So women, teach each other not to bother men. This is your responsibility and no one else's.

If you are interested in a man's help, give him a coy smile and if you are worthy of his valuable time, he’s sure to come up to you and slap you on your assets.

And, we have to note for the inevitable quote miners: this article is satire, a satire of feminism. Deal with it.

---

As more and more men go their own way (MGTOW), or, alternatively, as other men are passively feminized by feminism into simpering wimps ("simps") terrified of asserting themselves as men in the real world, eventually the dangerous, dirty, and difficult male-dominated jobs necessary to support and sustain society will go unfilled – terrified-of-everything feminists sure as hell won't take them.

Offering increasing salaries for these jobs is only a temporary stop-gap: the stagnant, reluctant tax-base combined with ever spiraling demands for women-only pampering have already bankrupted governments but soon even borrowing money from our international rivals will hit a wall as the world wakes up to the fact that a society run by feminists never pays its debts – a phenomenon based on a biological theory called Briffault's law:

> Any agreement where the male provides [the female] with a current benefit in return for a promise of future association is null and void as soon as the male has provided the benefit.

Colloquially, this is known as "it is a woman's prerogative/right to change her mind" or "no-fault divorce" but whatever you call it, once it becomes de facto government policy (by, say, electing a feminist woman as POTUS) it will strip away whatever financial credibility governments have left and the breakdown of civil society will be at hand.

Women know this about each other and I believe this is why women are reluctant to vote women into political office – women trust men to protect them more than they trust women to. Women are the majority of voters yet feminists endlessly flog the idea that women's votes and choices are somehow the fault of men. Even the liberal rag The Nation believes that electing a woman POTUS is a bad idea because women can't use shame to control her in the same effective way as they can a male politician.

A while back I wrote about this in an article called A small taste of the Fempocalypse.

Speaking of a tasty apocalypse, eating, or rather, finding and preserving food is a big problem when services and societies collapse. This winter Dallas experienced several moderate ice storms that threatened power outages across the region – power lines in my area are maybe a century old as well as above ground and are subject to snapping under the weight of ice accumulations or falling tree branches.

Before the storms I would prepare a large amount of highly spiced meat for when a power loss seemed imminent. I drew on ideas and ingredients from across the world to create a unique dish that was not quite a curry and not quite shawarma.

Spicy civil breakdown chicken
(about 4 servings)

- 1 lb boned and skinned chicken breasts (2 large breasts). I know some of you prefer chicken thighs and for them this recipe should work as well, if not better.

- 3 tablespoons peanut oil. (Olive oil may be substituted.)
- 1 heaping tablespoon of hot curry paste – I used a brand called "Patak's Original Hot" that I found at Fiesta Mart.
- 1 1/2 tablespoons of ground fresh chili paste. I used "Sambal Oelek", which is a sugar-free, thicker version of the trendy Sriracha sauce also made by Huy Fong Foods.
- One tablespoon Teriyaki sauce
- Juice of one lime
- Fresh ground black pepper

Cut each chicken breast into 7-10 roughly equal pieces. (If using chicken thighs, 3-4 pieces), Place in a large, non-reactive storage container (I used an old juice container that I no longer use for juice – too much sugar) and mix in all the other ingredients. Marinate at least one hour but overnight is better.

Preheat oven to 400 degrees F. Line an edged pie pan with foil and lubricate the foil with oil or non-stick cooking spray.

Place the marinated chicken pieces on the foil, evenly spaced and not touching.

Place in oven and bake for 30 minutes or so, turning the pieces once. The chicken will sweat quite a bit of liquid during baking; I wait until all of it has evaporated before removing it to cool. This is important to preserving the meat – for a more moist result bake for 20 minutes but this will not keep for as long.

You can enjoy this intensely flavorful chicken in many ways; before serving I often slice it further:

- As a topping for a salad.
- In a wrap (pita or flour tortilla) with lettuce, bleu cheese dressing and shredded sharp cheese.
- In a stir fry with squash and/or cauliflower.

You can also serve as-is, perhaps with whatever vegetable you favor. Store leftovers in the fridge until the feminist marauders of the collapse come to harvest you for your resources. Then, grab it and flee if you can.

This recipe was inspired by a shawarma recipe developed by Tori Avey.

The Rolling Stone rush to judgment wasn't "isolated and unusual," it was business as usual in our culture

April 8, 2015 | by Pierce Harlan | Link | Original Link

The Columbia University Graduate School of Journalism issued a scathing report Sunday on the editorial breakdown at Rolling Stone magazine that allowed publication of a story about a purported gang rape of a woman named "Jackie" at the University of Virginia that never really happened. The magazine said it considers the whole affair "an isolated and unusual episode."

And once again, we've learned nothing from yet another in a long line of high profile rape accusations that imploded under the weight of its own prevarications. The fact that "Jackie's" outlandish rape tale was so readily believed by the article's author, by Rolling Stone's editors, and by vast segments of the American public wasn't "an isolated and unusual" phenomenon. It was business as usual in our culture. If you can stomach an example, read the chilling transcript of Bonny Ghosh's television news report about the Hofstra "rape" case shortly before it imploded. (It's little wonder that after Danmell Ndonye swore under oath that she lied about the rape, the falsely accused young men were booed on a national television program.)

The real lesson of the UVA "gang rape" that never really happened isn't about Sabrina Erdely, Rolling Stone or its lax editors. It isn't about reporters who take liberties with the facts, and it's not about "editorial breakdowns." And it isn't about "expert fabulist storytellers" who tell rape lies but who seem like credible people. Those are pieces in a much larger puzzle.

The real lesson of the "gang rape" at UVA that never really happened is about a culture happy to reduce an entire gender to vile caricature any time an allegation of a sex offense is made. The usual suspects who write for news outlets and popular websites do it routinely. It's about a culture that happily rushes to judgment and assumes that men and boys accused of sex offenses are guilty by reason of penis without considering even the possibility that it may not have happened the way the accuser said. It's about a culture where keeping an open mind about a rape allegation is branded "victim blaming" and "rape culture."

Read this and you'll understand where the Rolling Stone article came from–you can see example after example of the twisted mentality that led that article to be written and believed every day of the week in newspapers, magazines, and on popular websites.

The sneering mob at the hanging trees of the Old South never really left us. They became the sneering mob quick to believe Ruby Bates and Victoria Price, Tawana Brawley, Crystal Gail Mangum, Wanetta Gibson, Danmell Ndonye, and too many others to chronicle. Sometimes, as at Duke University, the sneering mob gussies itself up with PhDs and tenure and assumes guilt because the accused penises are attached to white, "privileged" lacrosse players. The sneering mob invariably rationalizes its rush to judgment by citing wildly inflated statistics and pointing to other, unrelated cases and insisting that since it happened there, it must have happened here, too.

It's too easy to cluck our tongues and tsk-tsk Sabrina Erdely and Rolling Stone and pretend what they did was "isolated and unusual." The real lesson of the Rolling Stone debacle is that it's neither. It's business as usual.

5 Reasons No Man Should Marry And 1 Reason He Might

April 8, 2015 | by Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) | Link | Original Link

I write this as a woman happily married for 15 years. We met in graduate school and neither one of us had any real understanding of the risks legal marriage involves, so we did it. It's wasn't about having a wedding, either. We got married in a park with only close family and friends present and then we went for pizza. I bought my dress the day before. To us, it was about making a lifelong commitment and pledging to love one another, til death do us part.

If I knew then what I know now, I might have made a different choice.

Being legally married is like having a loaded gun in my hand. I can choose not to pull the trigger, but ultimately his life is in my hands, and that is unfair. No one should have the right to destroy another person, but legal marriage gives women exactly that power. 70% of young men in the US are unmarried, and for the 30% who went ahead and put a ring on it? Good luck. Here are 5 reasons no man should consider getting married, and one reason he might.

1. You'll be considered her personal property

Once upon a time, getting married and settling down and having kids and taking on a mortgage was the definition of manhood. All those things made you an adult, worthy of respect and admiration. In 2015, those things make you a chump. Father knows best has been replaced with the image of fathers as bumbling, slovenly idiots who would be sleeping in a dumpster if it were not for the controlling, condescending shrew he married.

2. Your sex life will die

According to Dr. Helen Smith, who wrote Men On Strike: Why Men are Boycotting Marriage, Fatherhood and the American Dream, married men have more sex, on average, than single men, but the men having the most sex, and the most satisfying sex are men cohabiting, but not married to their partners. Unmarried women know that sex is part of the deal, and refusing regularly jeopardizes the whole relationship. Married women understand they can use sex as a weapon, because the costs of divorce are so high.

3. You will lose your space

In most marriages, women treat the house and all the rooms in it as theirs. You might get a mancave or a closet to keep your things in, but you can be sure whatever space you have is not going to be in the main section of the house. Gone are the offices, the dens, the rec rooms, the billiards rooms with a wetbar. Spaces designed for the comfort of men have been torn out of family homes, reflecting a new social reality in which men are not considered central to the family.

4. Divorce will financially ruin you

Getting legally married is like betting half your stuff she won't cheat on you. No matter what she contributed, or did not contribute to the marriage, half of your stuff is hers. It works in reverse too, if she happens to be wealthier than you, but in general, men earn more money than women, so the reality is she'll be taking your stuff. If you are not married, she has no claim on your assets, nor you on hers. That fact alone makes rejecting marriage the smartest financial move a man can make.

5. You'll lose your family

If you have kids, she'll be taking those, too. Women get custody of children 80% of the time, and you will be lucky to see your children a few weekends a month. You will have to pay her for the privilege of seeing your own children, too, but you have no legal right to make certain that money is being spent caring for your children. If she spends the money at the hair salon, that's her business. If you refuse to pay her, you'll go to jail. Oh, the children don't even have to be yours. You can and will be made to support children she fathered with another man.

So why the hell would any man marry? It only applies to men who want children. If you do not legally marry the mother of your children, those children legally belong to her. You have no legal right to be a presumed parent to your children, and it is virtually impossible for an unmarried father to gain access to his children if the mother does not agree.

All things considered, marriage is a shit deal for men. When I got married, I had no idea I was asking my husband to take these risks. He didn't know either. We do have children, so I'm glad we married, but it's completely depressing to know the main function of my marriage is to keep me from being a complete monster to him by running away with his children. Obviously, I would never do that, but reality is reality. Gloria Steinem once said that "women's total instinct for gambling is satisfied by marriage," but the truth is that it is men who have the most to lose when they legally wed.

Men should think very carefully before saying "I do". It can easily turn into an "I'm fucked."

Divide and conquer: the feminist SJW modus operandi

April 9, 2015 | by Prentice Reid | Link | Original Link

“Whitey” is under every bed, he’s behind every problem facing women and minorities, he is omnipresent, he is both our mortal enemy and yet we are all so helpless that we must beg or demand that he fix the problems he supposedly created for us. All the victims of whites together could build a better world, a world of peace and harmony without war, without pollution and most of all, without rape. If we all would just invest our energy into ending white privilege and securing favors for women then we can all live in a Grand Feminist Utopia.

Or so feminists would have you believe. This reductionist view of Black people and women is akin to a modern-age Noble Savage doctrine and is insulting to not just minorities and women but to every intelligent white person as well. Here are some of the atrocious examples of recent feminist propaganda aimed at reinforcing this world-view.

Quote from the above article:

> Dad, you are a white man….
> You have both the privilege and the curse of living in the unmarked, white blind spot of the American racial imaginary. If you have enjoyed living there, departing only to return comfortably home to White every night, I’m afraid you have a problem.
> Me. I am your problem….

> I am your problem, Dad. You are the white father of a black daughter. You are accountable to a life that is squarely outside of the jurisdiction of the whiteness that swaddles you….
> Somehow, you feel like a white man first and my dad second.

Amazing, isn't it? To think that a daughter could approach her own father, the one who nurtured her, cared for her and comforted her throughout her entire childhood and treat him like an enemy simply because he's white. This man was "daddy" long before he was a "white man" in her eyes. Her self-hating prejudice is the byproduct of some hardcore feminist indoctrination more than likely. Let's examine another one:

> Tell me again how you don't see color. In this short video, poet Marshall Gillson delivers a stirring message with everything that needs to be said about what's wrong with a "colorblind" approach.

Of course the basic message this "poet" is communicating to the audience is that white people are guilty by virtue of their skin color of covert racism and that people who try to move past color must be bullied back into displaying white guilt. The useful idiots who adopt this mentality end up alienating people who should have been their allies.

White Privilege, Explained in One Simple Comic

September 21, 2014 by Jamie Kapp

Share 212.9k Share 2.7k

White privilege can be a tricky thing for people to wrap their heads around. If you've ever called out white privilege before, chances are you've heard responses like "But I'm didn't ask to be born white!" or "You're being reverse racist."

The next time that happens, just show the nay-sayer this succinct comic by Jamie Kapp explaining what white privilege is — and what it isn't.

In the above comic we see feminists brainwashing their followers with the assumption that all white people are privileged just because they exist. Certainly most of the white female feminists we encounter do come from a privileged class since a large portion of them attend big universities at their father's expense and they have the luxury of lounging around in Women's Studies classes sipping Starbucks. There is a large difference however between the average pampered white woman and the homeless white man sleeping on the streets or contemplating suicide because he's tired of being treated like a human ATM machine.

This is the twisted rhetoric of the feminist and race-hustler movement we are up against. Sadly too many people have either fallen for it and it is tearing our nation apart at the seams. The philosophical narrative ignores the fact that all throughout history in the United States most human rights movements have been composed of good "people", regardless of color or gender. Without such unified cross-cultural efforts none of these movements could have succeeded.

It's no wonder that the Jesse Jacksons and Al Sharptons and other race-hustlers feverishly defend false rape claims like we witnessed in the Tawana Brawley and Crystal Mangum cases. They know where their bread is buttered and they know that if they want to continue filling their pockets through identity politics they have to lick the feminist movement's boots.

As such, there will be no efforts from them to liberate black fathers from the corrupt family court system. There will be no marches for men who are child support slaves due to being forced to pay for children that DNA tests have proven are not theirs. These self-serving charlatans have remained silent (or joined in) on labeling Bill Cosby a rapist without demanding he be innocent until proven guilty. They will leave you isolated while they cry wolf displaying racial paranoia until the nation is too exhausted of sympathy to respond when someone suffers from real racism.

Isolation is detrimental to sanity because it is much easier to formulate and bask in xenophobic prejudices of “the other” when you live in a narcissistic echo chamber composed only of people who look just like you, talk just like you, and thus mirror the same cultural bigotry. As a Black man, I am well aware of the myriad problems men in disadvantaged communities face.

I grew up in the St. Louis area and went to school in the poverty stricken East St. Louis area as well as the violent Ferguson, Missouri neighborhood. Two of my childhood friends were gunned down at a young age. However it took me years to realize that the greatest determining factor in issues plaguing Black men was gender rather than race. This is evident in the fact that the greatest sentencing disparity in prison is based on gender rather than race and that police profile people based on the fact that they are men more so than because they are black.

If there’s anything I’ve learned it’s that it took people of all colors to intervene in my life and to influence me not to go down the paths that resulted in the demise of my friends. My ticket out of the ghetto was the US. Army and that path eventually led me into the Iraq War in 2003. In the Army I was exposed to a multitude of different cultures and peoples.

Though the experience was often traumatic it resulted in a maturation process that forced me to see outside of myself. I had to learn to rely on others who were very different from me and to help them in turn and in that process I became cognizant of the fact that beyond those variable exteriors we all had similar dreams, we all bleed the same color, we all wanted better opportunity, and we all were seeking purpose in life.

This was a makeshift brotherhood but it was an efficient, disciplined, and eventually a cohesive, tightly knit group of people who were prepared to die for each other without hesitation. In areas where one person from one background was weak, another person from another background was strong, and I began to see where I myself fit in within that equation. This was a necessary road towards finding purpose and learning to transcend the shallow racial differences modern culture had told me were the necessary order of the day.

I brought these lessons with me into the men’s movement. I now understand that this is what we need; a brotherhood, an Army, a fraternity that can acknowledge that we are different but still love each other and stand together as brothers first and everything else second. This does not mean that women need to be excluded from the men’s movement but we have to have a sturdy foundation of brotherhood in place when women are around or else the male instinct to compete with each other for female attention will take over and eventually destroy the movement.

This is the instinct that the feminist movement plays upon and has worked with lethal precision. This is why they give lip service to caring about Black men while putting in place legal policies in the family court and criminal court system that result in Black men being incarcerated at higher rates and losing access to their children.

It’s all about dividing Black men from white men and subsequently making both demographics easier to domesticate. And meanwhile most men are blinded to the fact that it is mostly spoiled, middle-class white women (and to a lesser degree, bitter Black women) manipulating the entire process. They have taken over almost every major public and governmental institution using the gender card and race card and they will not stop until they are met with a unified force of men (and women) from all backgrounds, colors, religious affiliations and classes.

The “solution” is not to force diversity in the clichéd manner in which feminists do so but to understand the bigger picture when having minor squabbles with people based on race.

We are up against seemingly insurmountable odds but it’s not as if men have not defeated drastic odds before. We are men, we have climbed the highest mountains, we have visited the moon, we have sailed every sea and ocean on the planet, we have cured epidemic diseases, and we will defeat the obstacles the feminist movement have placed in our path as well but we can only achieve victory together.

The courage of building bridges

---

The theme of our upcoming October conference on men's issues, ICMI 15, is Building Bridges Between Men and Women in the 21st Century. On the surface this may sound easy but the truth is harsh:

Bridges are a bitch.

Whether you are trying to cross a chasm, a treacherous sea or a raging river – or all three – the task of bridge-building is daunting and the cost is enormous. The weather, the tides, the floods – and even if you build a beautiful, state-of-the-art structure, unforeseen factors like harmonic failure can kill your bridge catastrophically.

Yet as difficult as it is to build a physical bridge, building a social / political / ideological bridge is harder and more fraught with pitfalls for the brave souls that try it.

When you reach out and attempt to build such a metaphorical bridge to an opposing force, your friends and allies will view you as a traitor to your cause and the opposing force will see you as a charlatan, a dilettante or a dupe – or perhaps all three.

- Neville Chamberlain, the ill-fated British Prime Minister on the eve of World War II, attempted to build a bridge of peace with Germany's Adolph Hitler. Chamberlain is remembered with scorn as a naïve politician who kowtowed to a tyrannical maniac – Wikipedia still (as of this writing) uses Chamberlain as its introductory example of odious political appeasement.
- Paul Elam, founder of AVfM, was trying to build a bridge between married men and MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way) when he once remarked casually that he would not judge the claims of married men who felt as if they could aspire to be MGTOW. Fueled in part by a few disgruntled former associates of Paul, the MGTOW community at large turned on him and fractured with some factions reacting harshly against Paul and AVfM even though AVfM consistently denigrates marriage as a wise or even viable choice for men and supports MGTOW without reservation.
- Karen Decrow, who served as president of the feminist flagship NOW from 1974-1977, was disowned by feminists when she tried to build bridges into the men's rights community in the early 1980's. As recounted in an article in The Atlantic, "Just as the Supreme Court has said that women have the right to choose whether or not to be parents, men should also have that right," she told The New York Times, calling this "the only logical feminist position to take."
- Warren Farrell, also a former NOW official, fell from feminist favor when he reached out to men by noting the ways that women have power – and exercise that power over men.
- Charlotte Taft, a firebrand feminist who became the innovative, utopian and courageous longtime director of the Routh Street Women's [Abortion] Clinic in Dallas, was dumped by feminist abortion referral services when she dared to build a bridge to anti-abortion groups with language designed to build understanding and conciliation.

- Emma Watson's "He For She" effort to build a bridge between men and feminism gave lip service to men's issues but pressure from feminists prevented her campaign from openly recruiting women to help men – their official pledge, taken by over a quarter of a million male sycophants, reads "Gender equality is not only a women's issue, it is a human rights issue that requires my participation. I commit to take action against all forms of violence and discrimination faced by women and girls." [emphasis added].

One can recount these cases of bridge builders endlessly. The highest of motives – ensuring peace, resolving differences, saving lives, solving problems, building understanding and coöperation – are all worthy, worthwhile goals that can crash and burn catastrophically when good intentions run into the meat grinder of human greed and history.

And no one is greedier than a feminist.

Much of the activism of AVfM comes from our confronting and exposing the greed, hatred for men, lies, rape hoaxes, and malevolence of feminism (malevolence that is sometimes deliberate and sometimes unwitting). Despite their facetious rhetoric to the contrary, feminists work to thwart efforts to address men's issues at every turn:

- They fight pro-male legislation.
- They normalize drugging schoolboys to suppress energetic behavior.
- They justify the hatred of men.
- They oppose shared parenting.
- They support social disapprobation of men's sexuality by likening active male sexuality to rape.
- They promote male genital mutilation.

Recent attempts by feminists to reach out to men are seen by men as scabrous, insincere attempts to bully men into compliance, and are attacked by other feminists as the acts of traitors.

Feminists for the most part are just too cowardly to risk alienating their base by making genuine, heartfelt appeals to men. A great example of this is Lindy West's obtuse bridge entitled "If I Admit That 'Hating Men' Is a Thing, Will You Stop Turning It Into a Self-Fulfilling Prophecy?, which was an orgy of man-hate and victim-blaming of men for all the shit that feminists do to them. This is the essay that "Big Red" Chanty Binx plagiarized in famous videos of her feminist "love" for men.

Jessica Valenti argued that the act of women hating men is inconsequential to bridge building because men are too callous to be affected by women's disapproval: "If a woman hates men, it has approximately zero effect on any given man." Seriously, that was her point.

At the other extreme, feminists like Christina Hoff-Sommers (arguably a FINO, feminist-in-name-only) who rely on evidence and support evidence-based men's concerns, have their books actually burned by feminists.

Another promising (and now former) feminist is newcomer Alexandra Blue, who made a wretched anti-male video "Dear Men" but quickly changed her perspective in the aftermath. She is now planning on making a video about men's issues and is asking for both donations and video submissions by men telling their own stories.

Of course, because she is a bridge-builder, she is still catching shit from both sides of the divide. I like her, I find her convincingly sincere but I do not completely trust her.

Bridge building is a bitch. It can work, Nixon DID go to China. It can also fail, and fail horribly.

I admire the courage of Paul Elam and AVfM in their choice to try to build bridges between men and women at the next ICMI conference. I'm enthusiastic to be one of the speakers there.

But man, our work is cut out for us.

Author's note. I knew Charlotte Taft personally during the 1980's. We have had no contact since then.*

Addendum:
For any that are confused: no, I am not advocating building bridges between men's rights advocates and feminists. Never in a billion years. Feminists are useless; that would be a bridge to nowhere.

Men and the expression of power

April 10, 2015 | by AVfM Video Source | Link | Original Link

The following talk by renowned psychologist James Hillman was given at the Minnesota Men's Conference in 1988. Unlike many in the Mythopoetic men's movement, Hillman refused to ignore the world and its political and cultural problems. In this talk he takes on the topic of power, of the many forms that power can take in society, and of feminism's attack on expressions of power. He appeals for the reinvention and rediscovery of all the ancient facets of power in human culture, stating "I want to re-empower power, from the bad case that it's been given, and find the places where you're putting your power-drive down, with false humility, with niceness, with adaptation…"

---

Preparing food while going your own way as MGTOW can be elaborate or simple but unlike feminism and feminists, it is important to be open to new ideas, especially since nutrition information, like feminism. is marred by faulty science and ideological garbage:

> [T]here is a large body of evidence demonstrating that the systematic misreporting of energy and macronutrient intake renders the results and conclusions of the vast majority of federally funded nutrition studies invalid.
> – Edward Archer

In order to protect their ideological purity feminists construct "safe spaces" or "hug boxes" free from the rigors of reality, guarding their delicate female constitutions and sensibilities from hard work, toxic male sexuality, and the annoyance of logic and facts. Hug boxes are used for clutching pearls, exploiting male slaves and cooking up flimsy-as-tinfoil rape hoaxes like the UVa-Rolling Stone-Jackey Coakley debacle and other feminist failures culinary, journalistic and legal.

Since feminists obsessed with both hating men and, oddly, assuming those hated men's traditional roles have no value as women or logicians, it is incumbent on men to master traditional women's kitchen roles, particularly since kitchens, unlike feminists, are of at least modest utility in maintaining our diets and health.

To that end, I am exercising my vaunted patriarchal privilege to co-opt the tinfoil feminist hug box and retasking it as a tasty, easy and healthful way to prepare an inclusive and diverse selection of vegetables, either as a main dish or as a side dish to a proper meat-based man's meal.

The following recipe is from my most recent experiments but you can adapt it in many ways I'll discuss after.

Hug box feminist vegetables
(serves 1 very generously or 2)

- One 2′ x 1′ sheet of aluminum foil (60 cm x 30 cm sheet of al-u-min-i-um foil).
- 1/2 Red Bell Pepper
- 2-3 Button Mushrooms
- 1/2 Small Carrot
- 1 Yellow (Summer) Squash
- 1 large or 2 small cloves Garlic
- Fresh ground black pepper
- Spices [I used Ms Dash(tm) Southwest Chipotle]
- 1/2 stick butter
- Splash of teriyaki sauce

Cooking different vegetables at the same time can be challenging because each has its own unique cooking times and properties. Often I've seen stir-fry recipes that insist on using no more than 1 or 2 vegetables in order to avoid this problem.

The solution is to cut each vegetable into a specific.size and thickness so that identical cooking times achieve equity-of-outcome, a feminist ideal impossible with people unless feminists use the knife of sexism on men.

Pre-heat the oven to 400-425 degrees F or whatever temperature is called for in your main dish (if any).

Temporarily place the foil into a shallow vessel (such as a cast-iron skillet or collander) to create the beginnings of a hug box you can fill with vegetables.

For the red bell pepper: slice in half and store one half for some other use. Seed and de-vein the remaining half, then cut lengthwise into 8 strips of roughly the same thickness. Place in the hugbox.

Rinse the mushrooms under running tap water and slice each into 5 sections. (The water they absorb during rinsing will add to the steam in the hugbox.) Add mushroom slices to the hugbox.

For the carrot, I cheated like a feminist wife – I regularly buy a bag of crinkle-cut carrot slices from the store and I tossed a small handful into the hugbox. To mimic the effect, slice the carrot at a 45 degree angle into even slices and add to the hugbox.

For the squash, I cut off the top and bottom, then sliced it into chunks as follows: starting at one end, slice off a 1 inch chunk at a 45 degree angle. Rotate the squash 1/4 turn, and slice off another chunk. Repeat rotating and slicing until you have 10-12 chunks. Add to the hugbox.

Smash and peel the garlic, then mince and sprinkle over the veggies in the hugbox.

Cut the butter into 4-5 segments to top the hugbox.

Add the pepper and spices and a splash of teriyaki sauce.

Fold the foil to close the hugbox by width, and then by length, leaving a small hole at the top to let the steam out.

Place in oven for 20-45 minutes depending on how you like your vegetables – tender-crisp to soft to mush.

Enjoy as a side or main dish.

Donate the leftover aluminum foil to your local rape culture group so they can recycle it into fragrant feminist headgear to repel patriarchal mind control rays.

Other vegetables can be added or substituted into your hugbox, including:

- Fresh Green Beans
- Snow peas
- Broccoli (peel & slice stems; chunk florets)

- Cauliflower (chunk florets)
- Onions (slice about 1 cm thick)
- Zucchini (chunk like summer squash)
- Whole Sweet Corn

I haven't tried potatoes in the hugbox and I wouldn't recommend them. I also haven't tried hard winter squashes (acorn, butternut, pumpkin, etc.) but I might experiment with them in the future. I'm not a fan of green bell peppers but if you like them they can be used as well.

Green vegetables may discolor a bit in the hugbox. Adding a pinch of baking soda to the bottom of the hugbox will retard this process, theoretically, anyway.

The hugbox will also work on a grill over indirect heat.

Not all vegetables are feminists but when you get down to it, most feminists are vegetables.

Hugboxes have their uses but only in the kitchen or while being grilled. Otherwise, keep your distance, especially if feminists are nearby, if only to preserve your healthy, manly appetites.

Shooting in a tribunal: anti-sexist women judges evacuated first

April 10, 2015 | by Silvio Altarelli | Link | Original Link

On April 10, 2015, a shooting happened in Palace of Justice of Milano. Three men died. The video of the evacuation published by the national newspaper Repubblica shows what happened:

> After the shooting, police evacuated the Palace of Justice, keeping inside all men and allowing only to women to get out».

When the Titanic sank, feminists argued that «by natural law women and children should be saved first» (New York Times, 19/4/1912). Now, rather than acknowledging the sexism, feminists explain that women were correctly evacuated first, because the shooter was a men. He was also old, white and with black hair. But then, why not black first? Why not young first? Why not blonde and bald first? Let's stop here:

> «having a logic discussion with feminists is like playing chess with pigeons: no matter how good you are, the pigeon will continue to overthrow all the pieces on the board and will strut around triumphantly.» (anonymous)

Anyhow, the shooter that entered with a gun left with the gun.

Since the Titanic we know that there are no feminists on sinking ships. We now learn that the same happens in tribunals: MANY OF THE WOMEN WHO ESCAPED FIRST WERE JUDGES.

A cynic misogynist could ask: are they paid to fight crime, or to escape first because they are women?

But our courages judges proved that they are firmly against sexism, when a journalist was sentenced for having written (about a jail that was badly managed): "it would be better to have a male director."

Half of Italian judges are women, and the most powerful of them is Maria Gabriella Luccioli. In 2008 the newspaper Corriere della Sera celebrated her achievements with these words:

> «Maria Gabriella Luccioli is the first woman who become President of the Cassazione [Supreme Court in Rome], where, using sentences as strokes, she rewrote family law. All and always in favour of women.»

Ms. Luccioli herself stated in an old interview to Repubblica: «somebody tells with a bit of exaggeration, that the Supreme Court is becoming feminist». Her sentences, according to which parental alienation is child abuse only when the alienator is a father, but not when the alienator is a mother, are a masterpiece of justice in full agreement with article 4 point 4 of the Istanbul Convention:

> «measures that are necessary to prevent and protect women from gender-based violence shall not be considered discrimination».

A misogynist could complain that judges should apply laws fairly rather than rewriting laws in favour of women and imposing ideologies such as feminism. Then, our courageous judges would courageously sentence him for sexism.

So, I urge all Italian fathers to continue to respect the sentences that, according to the European Court for Human Rights, violate their human rights, that favour child abuse when perpetrated by mothers, and to continue to make peaceful protests that get peacefully ignored.

After all, the slogan written in tribunals «law is equal for everybody» has not yet been officially replaced by the slogan «women and female children first» used by modern Italian feminists such as Luisa Betti and Barbara Spinelli: a great candidate from Italy to lead the new EU feminist organization GREVIO that will inquire to extirpate sexism from Europe.

Karen Straughan challenges the feminist paradigm of helplessness

Jim Crow laws and feminism

April 11, 2015 | by Dre Morell | Link | Original Link

Note: This article is also available in Spanish.

There is something to be said of remembering the past, in that we are often doomed to repeat those same mistakes very much into our future if we do not learn from them. Indeed women have quite considerably "Come a long way, baby". We live in a society circa 2015 whereas a woman can vote, hold office, drive a car, excel academically, own property, have an income, own a business, the list is almost endless considerably in a westernized society such as the United States of America.

One question I have always begged with respect to modern feminism and in particular Third Wave is what is the endgame? Politically speaking there are no more "rights" to grant women, we can argue over what is good social policy that may happen to impact women more but certainly the question of "rights" as it pertains to women has been long since settled.

The more a long journey comes to an end and as victory nears, what then becomes of the soldiers too hardened on the social battlefield? For those who benefit directly and indirectly from having grievances, the fight can never leave the blood as it is addictive and has to be exercised. Fighting for the right to vote, to be educated, to be validated, to not be raped in a marriage, to get equal pay laws, to have an abortion under the right to privacy….what battles become left as all the great battles have already been fought?

Such is the case with modern third wave feminism. There are no more great battles to be fought politically or in the court room any longer say perhaps for keeping abortion legal which truly is nothing more than saber rattling by most conservatives, it boils down rather succintly into the social grievances between men & women which often lay far beyond the doors of any courtroom and far from any policy that can ever be truly enforced. So what happened?

Read any current article, gripe, or blog post on modern feminism and it has waded down into rallying cries over "man-spreading", "mansplaining", t-shirts with certain depictions of women, private dongle jokes overhead in conversation, clapping being too traumatic, video games…you name it. Much of this is hardly the business of any government or political system, let alone can be solved by one.

Boys and men allegedly have to be taught not to rape (assuming rapists would take to such lessons to start with), while idealistically it cannot hurt to make mention of such and point out what clearly may not be consent we shouldn't be in the enterprise of just educating boys or men on this subject. In addition we should also be educating girls and women how words, actions or body language can be misinterpreted as "consent" and that stating "NO" quite forcefully and verbally helps to lower any resulting ambiguities if we are dealing honestly between the genders to solve a problem.

Yet we seem to be living in this climate wherein these social-justice warrior types are prodding men to act a certain way around and towards women. Such actions go beyond mere manners and courtesies to be extended to a person, but identify specific behaviors towards women that men should exhibit. The mere act of saying “hello” to a woman in the street or remarking her beauty is being written off as “harassment”, sitting with your legs spread is being called “aggressive posturing” rather than it just simply being personal style or comfort, interrupting a woman, while certainly rude to interrupt anyone, is being mischaracterized as a gender-isolating behavior. Being loud or obnoxious somehow is being morphed into a specific and social affront to women and women alone.

There is history here, a parallel if you will….in the pre-Civil Rights Era. During that time there was a specific code of conduct that was to be observed in public venues by African Americans under Jim Crow. Keep in mind Jim Crow in specific was not just about a legal system of discrimination, but a social one with very devastating impacts.

Jim Crow laws in the United States, for example, mandated the racial segregation of public schools, public places such as a library, restrooms, restaurants, and even drinking fountains. One common rationale for the systemic exclusion of Black Americans was that it was for their own protection. It was argued that having blacks in white schools would mean constantly subjecting them to adverse feeling and opinion which might lead to morbid race consciousness.

Contrast this with laws such as VAWA, or the Violence Against Women Act, and primary aggressor laws. A primary aggressor is defined in the US as the party who is the most significant or primary aggressor and police must determine which party is the primary aggressor in order that the true victim can seek safety and so that offenders are held accountable.

To determine if one is a primary aggressor police must consider:

- offensive and defensive injuries
- seriousness of the injuries received by each party
- whether a party acted in self defense or in defense of another
- “height and weight” of the parties
- which party has the “potential” to seriously injure the other party
- whether a party has a “fearful demeanor”
- whether a party as a “controlling demeanor”

And these are just to name a few. To the logical mind it’s very easy to see how such can be misread by the police or manipulated at worse by the alleged victim. We can also see how it is much easier for the police, especially male officers to view women primarily as victims and men as perpetrators which is in part reinforced by advantageous-sexism on behalf women to this narrative. What you end up creating, much like the Jim Crow laws of the south, is an environment that has a disproportionate impact on men, as many “judgment” calls have to be made without the complete presence of factual knowledge. Bias can inform many judgments unfortunately – just ask anyone who is Black and lives in America.

If a man who is 5 ft 10 and 200 lbs is bloody, yet his 5 ft 4 inch 98lb wife has a broken nose, chances are the man is more likely to go to jail even if the woman assaulted him first and more savagely because his injuries may not be as visible. He also has a distinct height and weight advantage, the woman may show signs of fear, all chipping away at the logical possibility that he in fact may be the "victim" while she is the aggressor.

Just as Jim Crow laws justified white people's irrational "fear" of Black people, and Black men in particular, so feminists and SJWs justify modern behavioral constraints on men, based on women's irrational, and unfounded, fear of men.

Specifically:

Men are never to assert a woman is lying about rape or sexual assault/harassment.

Men are not to be skeptical of her claims of sexual assault. Even if they listen and believe her, they are certainly not to confirm and verify first in pursuit of evidence and facts.

Men are never to suggest a woman is being too emotional and irrational, even if what she says is highly emotional and irrational.

Men are to never to find a type of woman attractive, and we don't get to define beauty individually by the choices and associations we keep. But women are free to judge men on their appearance such as weight, height, wealth, hair, chest, dick size, etc.

Men are not to speak to women in public they do not know or pay them a compliment (which granted may run too coarse), and anything he states, even "good morning" may be interpreted by women as harassment.

A man is to presume full social responsibility while in the company of a woman, even if she is drinking and an "adult". It matters not if neither could not give proper consent prior to sexual conduct. He is not only responsible for himself, but also hers when he has to shield her from her own actions while in a state of inebriation. #HeForShe

Men cannot have any "valid" opinion on something as complex as abortion, which is not even fully settled among women in terms of religious and philosophical leanings.

Men can never strike a woman, even in self defense, because she is the fully capable equal "weaker" sex. When asserting herself physically, a man should still temper his strength and be in constant understanding she is still a "woman".

Of course these are just mere examples not meant by any means to cover every seemingly new social affront claimed by women to which a behavior pegged as "male", yet exhibited by both genders. The logic of Jim Crow is rearing its head in current society and strictly relegated gender conduct is fast approaching, with men playing the role of deferential Negro appeasing women's irrational fears. We must maintain a watchful eye when trying to improve relations in society. While we wish to cultivate our best behaviors, it's a slippery slope once we start dictating all behaviors into a strict regime of codified conduct in which men are the controlled and women are the controllers. Sexism is not materially different than racism.

One more lost irony here is that in the Victorian era you had codes of conduct as well – behaviors that were to be observed by men and women. There was and are entire manuals on social conduct which had to be observed, adhered to and followed by members of that society. One can argue this again is history repeating under the guise of “improving” society.

It matters not from which mountain social commandments are shouted. The fact they are shouted at all, and not negotiated and discussed among individuals based on evidence, facts and rational interpretations of the social environment is the issue. Feminists and SJWs attempt to impose controls on men based purely on what is and is not acceptable to their tastes.

Irrational fear of gender is no different than irrational fear of race.

Things feminists say to female anti-feminists

Monty Python and the meaning of satire

April 13, 2015 | by B.R. Merrick | Link | Original Link

It may be hard to believe, but what you are about to read contains not a single fluid ounce of satire. No, I'm not kidding. Trust me: When I choose to kid, you'll know it.

Or will you? That, apparently, is the problem with choosing to write satire. One of my first truly satirical (and not merely sarcastic) articles at A Voice for Men carried enough of a punch that apparently a few commenters briefly thought I was serious. A good rule of thumb, if you're the sort that unknowingly encounters satire from time to time, and you find yourself reading the words of a grown man known for writing about men's issues who starts to take pot shots at women and girls, suggesting that one be violent with them; is to first reason with yourself that the man in question is not intending to be taken seriously.

I was proud of one commenter on my last article who actually thought, for a short while, that the article to which I linked was being satirical in its attempted take-down of the men's movement. That's a commenter who displays the modicum of intelligence that I am certain is requisite to understanding what A Voice for Men is all about. Surely the healthy and handsome young Australian man who interviewed me and several other men would not be so willingly blind as to think that the men's movement, like feminism, is nothing more than a grievance industry.

Sadly, that was not the case. Ironically, the satire of which he spoke in one of his questions to me, written by one Paul Elam especially for the benefit of men like him, escaped his otherwise intelligent mind. Amazingly, the same can be said of many people who comment at this website.

One of the recent pieces written for A Voice for Men by August Løvenskiolds suffered the same misunderstanding. Several commenters questioned the validity of a man getting upset about butter questions at Wal-Mart. As I am often content to sit on the sidelines and amuse myself from time to time with observing human nature, I remain unconcerned with any fallout that some of our more intelligent adversaries might glean from reading, in the same austere fashion, the complaints of people who don't understand satire, or who are afraid that such writing will be misinterpreted by too many who have yet to be taken in by the radical notions upon which much of this movement is based.

And now for something completely different:

You may be asking yourself why I would interrupt a non-satirical piece with a silly sketch. I do it for two reasons, neither of which has to do with speaking in a silly, high-pitched whine. Firstly is to confess that it took me years to understand the satire inherent in the sketch and in Monty Python's humor in general, because I was too busy laughing until I cried. Secondly is to spoil the good fun by taking the comedy apart, therefore explaining the critical importance of critical thinking.

You have the essentials of satire quite clearly laid out in the sketch: You are watching a television program that features commentary on social and political issues, ostensibly for your intellectual benefit. You have one guest who is a representative of the government, and one that takes the opposing view.

The mediator-host thanks both for being on the show and begins by talking to the government official. It is plain from the way he gushes over the minister's magnificent attire that looks and fashion are apparently just as important as the subject at hand, which is government funding of a basic civilizational need: housing.

From there – since the small patch of brown liquid, the only voice allowed to speak against the government, appears to have nothing to say – it can be safely assumed that any hope of an actual debate that calls into question what the government is doing has now evaporated. The minister can say whatever he wants, in whatever way he chooses, because the pretense of a debate is all that is needed. This is the meaning of the satire.

How observant of television commentary was this silly sketch? Turn on Fox News or CNN. Look at the female hosts. Look at the primping and high fashion. Listen to the male hosts in Italian suits. Marvel at their straight, white teeth. Notice anything missing?

Count on your fingers, because I'm sure it would be possible to calculate without having to remove your shoes, the number of guests on these programs who speak against the government. Oh, against the Democrats (Fox) or Republicans (CNN), sure. However, any voice that is truly contrary to the status quo may as well be a small patch of brown liquid, which could be creosote or some extract used in industrial varnishing. Good evening.

The funniest thing about such satire is that, when in the throes of the pain such satire tries to point out, the individual who encounters it can see that it's not funny at all. Don't believe me? Watch Dave Chappelle joke about male-on-male rape:

On the surface, you have a popular stand-up comic using, for shits and giggles, the trauma of men who were victimized at the hands of another man. Underneath, you have an actor who, when once in the midst of telling jokes about people with dark brown skin, noticed that whitey was laughing too hard. He then left a 50 million dollar deal with Comedy Central to convert to Islam.

As should be plain to anyone who understands the importance of satire to comedy, the above video now seems quite different. It should be obvious from the opening line: "I'm one of those people that's so smart that I'm uncomfortable in this world." He ends with the truth: A man would rather tell his wife that he was committing adultery with another woman than admit that another man penetrated the most physically and psychologically vulnerable area of his body with his penis, rendering him a faggot, and taking from him his conception of his own masculine identity.

In summation, and in keeping with what at least one commenter on YouTube pointed out, Chappelle made the audience the satire. They laughed and laughed, and probably learned very little. Now in Chappelle's mind, whitey can laugh all he wants. The joke's on him.

Monty Python did much the same thing and continues to do so. In an interview where John Cleese, one of the troupe's founding members, discusses the importance and beauty of comedic satire, he mentions in passing his regret over getting married to a nasty American woman who took him to court after a 16-year marriage that stripped him of his fortune, one that he had spent decades building by entertaining millions.

To make ends meet for his ex-wife and to keep himself alive, he went on what he actually called "The Alimony Tour." Ha, ha, I have to pay the bitch, so please show up and laugh at my jokes. Robin Williams would have had to do the same thing. Kudos to Cleese for having the emotional strength to pull through. So far.

This is par for the course with Cleese, who did everything but kick Graham Chapman's coffin at his memorial service. He insisted on laughter. What the attendees probably didn't know was that Cleese had to be escorted from the hospital room when Graham, his former writing partner and fellow Python, passed away. We laugh lest we cry.

I am convinced that the only reason anyone would read something at A Voice for Men that sounds hateful towards women or seems to call for violent action, then sound the siren of warning that the writer has gone too far, or that the words could too easily be taken out of context; is because there is still a little of the visceral feeling that men are too quick to be hateful and violent. This is not surprising, given the huge number of people out there that still believe in the necessity of what Thomas Paine called "a necessary evil."

You have to ask yourself what your reflexive emotional and sometimes physical reactions are the minute a man raises his voice, compared to when a woman raises hers. Is it not likely that fear is a more influential factor? What if he does something? Men, not women, are expected to be the biggest doers in society. What if something with the doing goes wrong when the man gets mad? What if he's mad because he's filled with hate? Should this be reported as a hate crime?

I take as one of my operating premises that the overwhelming majority of men and women do not mean me any harm, which is why I walk out my door every day. I hold to another operating premise that A Voice for Men is a website about compassion for men and boys. I embrace a third operating premise that such compassion is immediately salient and naturally extends to women and girls. Consequently, when I read something here that sounds disrespectful of women, I already know what's going on: somebody's joking. It happens every time.

This leads me to the logical conclusion that people who don't get it don't get much about the men's movement, of which this website is a teeny tiny yet marvelous part. Satire shouldn't have to be explained. When it is explained, like comedy, it falls apart and ceases to carry as much power as it should.

Cleese once complained that "The Ministry of Silly Walks" sketch was a personal disappointment because people missed the satire since they were too busy laughing at his lanky lower limbs flailing around. I was one of them. As I go my own way, I can assure you that I no longer wish to be in that crowd. They'll never get it. La marche futile.

Guyland and faces in tree bark

April 13, 2015 | by Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) | Link | Original Link

I am a 24 year old male college student who dedicates a lot of time working with men who want more than anything to be understood. During my time as an activist specializing in male college students, I've worked with students from New York University, New Mexico Tech, Fordham Lincoln Center, Georgia State University, Queen's University, Madison Area Technical College and Bangor University—to name a few. Since then I've started Zen Men, LLC (formerly KSU Men, CSO), a nationally-recognized men's rights organization that specializes in male students.

Guyland: The Perilous World Where Boys Become Men deserves special mention in my reading list because it speaks to my target demographic of male students aged 16 to 26. Recently I met the author, masculinity studies academician Dr. Michael Kimmel.

Kimmel's Guyland is a pertinent addition to a sensationalized conversation where school shootings, Greek life and aggressive promiscuity are the lions, tigers and bears of collegiate masculinity. The thesis is that young men experience extended adolescence as dictated by a debaucherous fraternity subculture called "Guyland." Guyland is a territory of sorts, but only insofar that it is governed by the malevolent "Guy Code" preaching stoicism to bros before hos.

In Guyland, calling a young man a "pussy" or a "faggot" is enough to make him drink himself to death, assault women, trivialize crimes against minorities, or retreat to a land of video games, sports and porn (pg. 127; 134; 143; 151; 161). Insecure, codependent or naive young men and women gravitate to Guyland in an attempt to fit in with the wrong "almost-men," a term Kimmel comfortably borrows from Michael Kaufman on page 179.

Guyland guys are somehow both reckless enough to invite alcohol poisoning and powerful enough to derail adolescence. On the other hand, Kimmel suggests that defeating Guyland means not trying to "prove" one's masculinity. It would be excellent if the book's only suggestion was to avoid peer pressure, but conjecture pads the pages. Ultimately, the text appears to be something other than a road map to adulthood, let alone a product of the scientific method.

Guyland defines collegiate masculinity almost entirely in terms of Greek life fraternities, which causes me to suspect selection bias in Kimmel's surveys. Kimmel admits near the beginning that "most guys aren't bad, they just know bad guys," but apparently this minority of bad guys are still universally influential in adolescence—until people ignore them.

As someone in Kimmel's subject age bracket, I think that Kimmel is perpetuating the sadly popular notion that collegiate masculinity is predatory, irresponsible, privileged, entitled or hedonistic. A written statement to this effect is that women's independence disincentivizes men from growing up (pg. 31), apparently in the same world where women's sexuality is a reward for men who grow up in their relationships! I recall in Kimmel's recent speech that men would have more sex if they supported gender equality in relationships. The subtle irony of describing angry white male entitlement while using women's sexuality as an object of control in the same speech appears lost on most.

Kimmel posits numerous negative effects of Guyland, citing data as if to suggest that his selection of surveys are predictors of what men want. In doing so, Kimmel casts social phenomenon typical of adolescents—such as peer pressure and unwarranted entitlement—and makes them appear male. If in any case Kimmel admits that vices are not exclusively male, his only criticisms to women involve their holding up a male power structure with "guy-like" behaviors, namely hazing.

My personal frustration with Kimmel using picked cherries to represent young men aside, do note that he ultimately argues that his selected stars form a constellation—rather, that his selected respondents form a social system.

To put it another way, Kimmel sounds like he is describing a face he saw in a tree's bark. Features in the bark and branches might give the appearance of a face, but trees don't actually have faces, just like the dreaded Guys of Guyland don't have a natural inclination to uphold the Guy Code. The nature of things does not always match the perception we have of them.

Kimmel's response to this basic lesson of science seems to be "Hey, not all trees have faces, but most trees are near other trees with faces," right before claiming how tree faces indicate Native American resentment towards white colonialism or something. No, that doesn't make sense, but then again, neither does his book.

Science is not about seeking confirmation, putting it on paper, and calling it "empirical data" to back conjecture like that shown in this passage:

> [Journalist Tim Beneke] looked at the language men use to describe female attractiveness. Women are "ravishing," or "stunning," she's a "bombshell" or a "knockout"; she's "dressed to kill," a real "femme fatale." Men describe themselves as being "blown away" and "knocked out." As suggested in metaphor, women's beauty is perceived as violence to men. Men use violence to even the playing field, to restore equality.

Violence against women is retaliation against beauty? How did any scholar get to this part of the book without thinking it is one big opinion piece?

That is part of the required reading for many masculinity studies courses. I'm looking at the same tree, and I'm sorry Dr. Kimmel, I just don't see the face. Please don't say "privilege blindness," because that hurts falsifiability.

Remember that Guyland is a contribution to fields that are not particularly mature in the sciences. Just ask Martin Fiebert, Erin Pizzey, Adam Jones, Susan Steinmetz, Richard Gelles and Murray Strauss about their adventures in publishing evidence that men are not as privileged as we are led to believe.*

Given my experience and research, Guyland appears to be a vehicle for salient Woozles populating the endnotes, and no human being has the time for a full deconstruction of the text. So in the interest of brevity, let's revisit the big picture: understanding male students and helping them grow into healthy adults.

If you, the reader, want to understand men and boys and the way they grow up, then first understand that Kimmel preaches to a choir that assumes college males are as insecure and impressionable as grade school children. The same rhetoric that brought us unwarranted fear of Judas Priest, Marilyn Manson, and Grand Theft Auto turning teenagers into heathens is now targeting college fraternities.

Given my experience being a male college student, I felt no desire to entertain peer pressure from men or women. I think that the debauchery Kimmel casts as "male" is one part an escape from the pressures imposed by elders, and another part an impatient curiosity to experience gratification reserved only to those over 18 or 21 years old. This is not masculinity gone wrong, it's rebellious youth feeling tired of people telling them how to behave.

If and when debauchery reaches dangerous levels and causes death, sexual assault and torment, our job is not to validate our feelings of distrust and antagonism under a pretense of understanding in the way Kimmel does. If you want to know young men and help them grow into functional, calculated adults, you must notice that Kimmel's science is actually politics.

As a male student omitted from the contrived context built in Guyland: The Perilous World Where Boys Become Men, I ask that you please take the time to understand your sons instead of letting strangers understand them for you.

For more on Kimmel's methodology, see Peter Allemano's review of Guyland.

* The named academicians were subjected to bomb threats, verbal abuse, death threats and other terrors from feminist activists and scholars. These same activists succeeded in either delaying or outright stopping publication of data showing how men can be victims of women in the same way that women can be victims of men.

What ever happened to chivalry?

April 13, 2015 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Editor's note: This article is also available in Spanish.

I have a Google alert for the word chivalry, and not a day goes by that I don't receive several articles on the topic. The articles appear slightly tilted toward the theme 'Male chivalry is dead,' followed by a reasonable number demonstrating 'Chivalry is alive and well' – the latter because some man, somewhere, risked life, limb or money to serve a woman's immediate welfare.

To be sure, chivalry displayed by individual men is on the decline, and women, men, government and mainstream media denounce this devolution with one voice: Men are becoming selfish pigs. MRAs and MGTOW choose to summarize it differently; that men are sick of being exploited and have chosen to shed their unnecessary selflessness.

Chivalry is documented in etiquette manuals of prior centuries explaining how a man is to take off his hat in a woman's presence, shake her hand, open doors, buy her gifts, and assist her in a multitude of ways. The message in these gestures is deference to the superiority of females:

> "If you see a lady whom you do not know, unattended, and wanting the assistance of a man, offer your services to her immediately. Do it with great courtesy, taking off your hat and begging the honour of assisting her." [Gynocentric etiquette for men – 1847]
> "In the familiar intercourse of society, a well-bred man will be known by the delicacy and deference with which he behaves towards females. That man would deservedly be looked upon as very deficient in proper respect and feeling, who should take any physical advantage of one of the weaker sex, or offer any personal slight towards her. Woman looks, and properly looks, for protection to man. It is the province of the husband to shield the wife from injury; of the father to protect the daughter; the brother has the same duty to perform towards the sister; and, in general, every man should, in this sense, be the champion and the lover of every woman. Not only should he be ready to protect, but desirous to please, and willing to sacrifice much of his own personal ease and comfort, if, by doing so, he can increase those of any female in whose company he may find himself. Putting these principles into practice, a well-bred man, in his own house, will be kind and respectful in his behaviour to every female of the family. He will not use towards them harsh language, even if called upon to express dissatisfaction with their conduct. In conversation, he will abstain from every allusion which would put modesty to the blush. He will, as much as in his power, lighten their labors by cheerful and voluntary assistance. He will yield to them every little advantage which may occur in the regular routine of domestic life:—the most comfortable seat, if there be a difference; the warmest position by > the winter's fireside; the nicest slice from the family joint, and so on." [Gynocentric etiquette for men – 1873]

> "It must always be borne in mind that the assumption of Woman's social superiority lies at the root of these rules of conduct." [Gynocentric etiquette for men – 1897]

One reason for a decline of male chivalry is the vanishing payoff. Women no longer reciprocate for chivalry via good ol fashioned gestures like cooking, homemaking, praise, and affection that would have occurred at the time the above comments were penned. Today they don't even receive a thank you… is it any wonder men are seeing chivalry as a bad deal? The meal ticket, the flowers, the slaving at a job, the deference is all better spent on oneself.

Despite the hand-wringing over a decline in chivalry, women appear to be doing very well for themselves; they are well decked out with material goods, they display increasing body-freedom and body-pride, and their entry into workplace and careers is unprecedented. Society continues to indulge them as much as it ever did – more.

With this bare fact one might ask if chivalry merely appears to be on the decline and if women are receiving it from another source? My observation – obvious to many in the manosphere – is that they have corralled a rich new source of chivalry.

From Husband Sam to Uncle Sam

The heading is from Dr, Warren Farrell's Myth of Male Power, where he describes how men have traditionally striven to institute women-centered government by acting as women's proxy agents in the political sphere. This behavior, explains Farrell, is based on the chivalrous tradition of male servicing of women's needs. The following passage from Farrell's book explains the phenomenon:

> "Doesn't the fact that almost all legislators are men prove that men are in charge and can choose when to and when not to look out for women's interests? Theoretically, yes. But practically speaking the American legal system cannot be separated from the voter. And in the 1992 Presidential election , 54 percent of the voters were female, 46 percent were male. (Women's votes outnumber men's by more than 7 million). Overall, a legislator is to a voter what a chauffeur is to the employer – both look like they're in charge but both can be fired if they don't go where they're told. When legislators do not appear to be protecting women, it is almost always because women differ on what constitutes protection. (For example, women voted almost equally for Republicans and Democrats during the combination of the four presidential elections prior to Clinton).
> "The Government as Substitute Husband did for women what labor unions still have not accomplished for men. And men pay dues for labor unions; the taxpayer pays the dues for feminism. Feminism and government soon become taxpayer-supported women's unions. The political parties have become like two parents in a custody battle, each vying for their daughter's love by promising to do the > most for her. How destructive to women is this? We have restricted humans from giving “free” food to bears and dolphins because we know that such feeding would make them dependent and lead to their extinction. But when it comes to our own species, we have difficulty seeing the connection between short-term kindness and long-term cruelty: we give women money to have more children, making them more dependent with each child and discouraging them from developing the tools to fend for themselves. The real discrimination against women, then, is “free feeding.”

> Ironically, when political parties or parents compete for females’ love by competing to give it, the result is not gratitude but entitlement. And the result should not be gratitude, because the political party, like the needy parent, becomes unconsciously dependent on keeping the female dependent. Which turns the female into “the other” — the person given to, not the equal participant. In the process, it fails to do what is every parent’s and every political party’s job — to raise an adult, not maintain a child.
> But here’s the rub. When the entitled child has the majority of the votes, the issue is no longer whether we have a patriarchy or a matriarchy — we get a victimarchy. And the female-as-child genuinely feels like a victim because she never learns how to obtain for herself everything she learns to expect. Well, she learns how to obtain it for herself by saying “it’s a woman’s right” — but she doesn’t feel the mastery that comes with a lifetime of doing it for herself. And even when a quota includes her in the decision-making process, she still feels angry at the “male dominated government” because she feels both the condescension of being given “equality” and the contradiction of being given equality. She is still “the other.” So, with the majority of the votes, she is both controlling the system and angry at the system.” [The Myth of Male Power]

Do we need further evidence of “what ever happened to chivalry?” Not only have politicians taken over the job of chivalric appeasement of the ladies, it appears both the Left and Right of politics are jousting each other for the privilege to serve them. This I can understand… how else might they get elected?

John Stuart Mill, champion of feminism, urged shifting of the responsibility for chivalry out of the hands of every man and into the legislative framework of government proper, contending that chivalry was not always reliable and must give way to a more reliable,

State-enforced protection and benevolence toward women. He writes:

> "From the combination of the two kinds of moral influence thus exercised by women, arose the spirit of chivalry: the peculiarity of which is to aim at combining the highest standard of the warlike qualities with the cultivation of a totally different class of virtues – those of gentleness, generosity, and self-abnegation towards the non-military and defenseless classes generally, and a special submission and worship directed towards women; who were distinguished from the other defenceless classes by the high rewards which they had it in their power voluntarily to bestow on those who endeavoured to earn their favour, instead of extorting their subjection…
> The main foundations of the moral life of modern times must be justice and prudence; the respect of each for the rights of every other, and the ability of each to take care of himself. Chivalry left without legal check all those forms of wrong which reigned unpunished throughout society; it only encouraged a few to do right in preference to wrong, by the direction it gave to the instruments of praise and admiration. But the real dependence of morality must always be upon its penal sanctions – its power to deter from evil. The security of society cannot rest on merely rendering honour to right, a motive so comparatively weak in all but a few, and which on very many does not operate at all." [J. S. Mill: The Subjection of Women – 1869]

Ernest B. Bax confirms that the chivalric behavior of both Left and Right of politics was indeed, per Mill's suggestion, well underway by the year 1907:

> "All parties, all sorts and conditions of politicians, from the fashionable and Conservative west-end philanthropist to the Radical working-men's clubbite, seem (or seemed until lately) to have come to an unanimous conclusion on one point – to wit, that the female sex is grievously groaning under the weight of male oppression." [Essays: New & Old (1907), pp.108-119]

Feminism draws its strength from chivalry, but instead of soliciting chivalry from men in the traditional, interpersonal manner it has learned how to get it solely from the government – holding the government to ransom thanks to suffragettes gaining the vote for gynocentrism women.

Instead of men giving up seats in buses, government now provides seats in legislative assemblies and boardrooms via quotas. Instead of men opening car doors for women, government opens doors into universities and workforces via affirmative action. Instead of men being the sole protectors of women from violence, government now protects them with an army of police specially trained to service women's accusations (over and above more serious crimes). Instead of men providing living expenses, governments now provide it as social welfare and compensation for the 'wage gap'. Etc. ….. government as substitute husband.

The only difference between the two sides of politics is that the Left is more sycophantic in its deliverance of chivalric rule – and the Right more heroic in its deliverance of chivalry. Same gynocentrism, different knight.

Signing White House Council on Women & Girls

Gynocentric chivalry was an unbalanced idea to begin with. Men are now backing away from the custom, and we can yearn for the day government on both sides on the political fence does the same. Perhaps when the world's growing army of grass eaters brings about a collapse in revenue they will see the light. In the meantime, let's not give feminists a pass on their claim to have walked away from chivalry…. they have merely found a new source.

Joshua Stoneman enlisted in the Navy before 9/11 in 2001. He served for ten years across thirty countries conducting merchant vessel boardings, oil rig defenses, anti-piracy measures and anti-terrorism operations, all while keeping shipping lanes open. Stoneman lived in Greece for one year, Japan for three, and served on a guided missle cruiser for five years. He since married in Japan, and now he and his current partner live in Wisconsin.

During Joshua's second deployment, his first son was born. Upon returning, the bottom fell out from his relationship with his first-born's mother. A family court judge deemed Joshua's service "detrimental" to his then infant son's well-being, allowing only allowed visitation rights and not joint custody. After many years, cases and tens of thousands of dollars in legal fees, Joshua still watches his first son grow older and emotionally distant because the court said so.

It is because of love for his sons that Joshua Stoneman founded the second Zen Men chapter at Madison Area Technical College (MATC) while working on his new engineering degree.

Joshua's aims to help young men avoid the same hardships he faced, and to tell young minds in colleges everywhere that men are not criminal, violent, or rapacious by nature. Joshua sees men as noble, compassionate and therefore deserving of credit where credit is due. He wants to help put a stop to the forces that paint men as harmful towards women and children.

So long as Zen Men @ MATC (ZMMATC) abides by Zen Men LLC's Terms of Chapter Affiliation, it is eligible for affiliation benefits that support activist missions local to MATC.

Donors to Zen Men LLC should know that their contributions are no longer just going to a single organization, but rather to a men's rights activist network across academia. ZMMATC's faculty sponsor is a #WomanAgainstFeminism, meaning that she as an adviser is more courageous than the first adviser for Zen Men @ Kennesaw State U (ZMKSU).

It's too soon to say what the future will hold for ZMMATC, but amazing things happen when the right passion. Joshua organized several students because he is a leader in his own right, and based on what I see so far, he's not going to let anyone stop him from restoring sanity.

Joshua's current plan is to teach students how to protect themselves in risky relationships, and what it means to be a good parent. While there are no promises this early in the game, Joshua aspires to start new chapters on other Wisconsin campuses.

To follow ZMMATC's work, visit its MATC CollegiateLink profile. Major announcements will appear either on AVfM publications or on ZenMen.org.

Please help me welcome Joshua, his adviser, and their followers to Zen Men LLC's network, and herald in the start of a new era in academia. With help from men like Joshua, young men and women will learn real world lessons that gender studies professors would never teach.

If you are interested in starting your own Zen Men LLC chapter, read our Terms of Chapter Affiliation and fill out the form on the bottom of the page.

Kendrick Lamar Proves That Black Women Want To Control Black Mens' Sexuality

April 14, 2015 | by Mumia Ali | Link | Original Link

"(Black) woman, thou name art hypocrisy…"

And in this week's in buffoonery in Black America, we have the following news story coming out of Media Takeout:

> "IT'S GOING DOWN!! Black Feminists Are DRAGGING Kendrick Lamar On Instagram . .. They're UPSET . . . That He Preaches All That KUNTA Stuff . . . But Married An EXOTICAL!!"

Madam Noire reports:

> "Last week, we were so happy to report that Kendrick Lamar confirmed his engagement to his high school sweetheart, Whitney Alford. However, it appears that not everyone was pleased with the big news.
> Over the weekend, self-proclaimed Dark Skin Activist Rashida Strober took to Facebook to call out the "Complexion" rapper over his wife-to-be's appearance. According to Strober and many of her supporters, Kendrick is a hypocrite.
> "Well, well, well would you looky here," Strober wrote. "ANOTHER FAKE CONSCIOUS MUTHER F-KER EXPOSED. I will never support him nor his music with one dime of my money and encourage all dark skinned women not to either!"
> The post spread quickly, with many cheering Strober on for slamming Kendrick. Others, however, didn't share her sentiments.
> To give you a bit of background information, Strober is founder of the Dark Skin Is Beautiful campaign and creator of "A Dark-Skinned Woman's Revenge" and "Ice Cream Lady's Dream" stage plays. According to the Florida native's biography, she began advocating for people with darker complexions in 1998. She was inspired to do so after enduring years of bullying at the hands of classmates who put her down because of her complexion."

Clutch Magazine has its say:

> "Last week, Kendrick Lamar announced his engagement to long-time girlfriend Whitney Alford. Even though he received tons of 'congratulatory' remarks, once the dust settled, people have a few things on their minds. And once again, the subject of colorism came up.
> How could someone so 'righteous' parade around with a racially ambiguous woman, many wondered? Was Lamar just another color-struck Black man? Others asked.
> Well, the first question may be easier to answer than the last. One > producer/rapper attempted to do so when he posted a photo of Eldridge Cleaver. 9th Wonder thought a photo of Cleaver and his wife, Kathleen, would answer everyone's questions about Lamar being self-hating and chasing light-skinned women. He asked if Cleaver would be called a sell-out too?

> But actually, no.
> That's not a good example. Cleaver, who was a known rapist of white woman, is basically the type of person people are trying to say Lamar is. The lighter the berry, the sweeter the juice. Even Kathleen Cleaver spoke out against how men in the Black Power Movement specifically sought after lighter skinned women, because of their own 'light is right' issues."

Not to be out done, Beyond Black & White writes:

> "I've recently been following two stories on Madame Noire regarding black men and their dating choices. The first was a piece about a self-proclaimed "dark skin activist" calling out Kendrick Lamar for having an extremely fair skinned fiancé.
> The other story was about Romeo Miller whining on a talk show about all the hate mail he's received for having a white girlfriend.
> "It's crazy to think that in 2015, when I start posting pictures of me and my girl–obviously I'm black, she's white. I didn't think that would be a problem. A lot of hate mail and hate comments was on there. They're like, 'Why are you with this girl?' 'She's only with you because of this.' It's sad because honestly if anybody knows me, all the girls I've dated, I've dated girls who've been as black as Akon and white as Casper. It don't matter. It's all about the heart. In this time and place, she's the one who captured my heart. She could be blue, green or yellow and it would have been her."
> So here's two very public examples of black men getting flack for dating light skinned women and non-black women. There's no denying it. Black women also get the pushback when we date interracially, so isn't it even?
> Not even a little."

BB&W's proprietor (and seemingly chief and only writer) Ms. Christelyn Karazin, then goes on to list four "reasons" as to the supposedly big difference between Black men who "swirl" (or in this case, you know, actually date/marry Black women, just ones who happen to be lighter-skinned) and Black women who do the same, and the degree of recriminations both get – of course, leaving out little inconvenient facts like, oh, I don't know, LOSING AN EYE for daring to marry a White woman, or in this case, being hounded mercilessly for having the audacity to actually marry your light skinned highschool sweetie.

I'm telling ya, you just cannot make this stuff up.

While certainly nothing new among those of us in Black America, those outside of it may be new to this sort of nonsense. But here's the deal: there are many Black women in Black America, like the one who got this tempest in a teapot roiling, who are of the view that they have a moral right to tell another human being, who just so happens to be Black men, as to who they can and cannot date. Rashida Strober*, self-proclaimed dark-skinned womens' advocate, is by no means alone or unique in Black American life; one can find scores of ladies just like her, who demand that successful Black men like Lamar, date not only Black women – not only Black women that's he's known since highschool – but that he must date the Blackest Night Black Woman(TM) in the solar system – and if he doesn't, he's a sellout, a coon, a Benedict Arnold to the Black race, you name it.

What. A. Crock.

The only thing more ridiculous than having to suffer through the B.S. like that which Ms. Strober has foisted onto the rest of us, are many dark-skinned Black women's blatant and flagrant hypocrisy when they turn right around and chase after White men or failing that, light-skinned pretty boys as mates; indeed, there is an entire sector of the Internet devoted to such an enterprise, known as "Black Women's Empowerment", where rejected Black women gather to cry into their beer, kick dirt on Black men, and try their hands at seducing White men, with varying degrees of success. The wailing and gnashing of teeth has gotten so bad in recent years, that even Black women themselves can be heard in other Black online venues wanting to put some distance between themselves and this sorry corner of the World Wide Web.

There seems to be a trend these days of Black Feminists whipping up on "conscious rappers" over the past few years; there was Brittney Cooper's bromide against conscious rap fixture Talib Kweli, and now this from Ms. Strober, about Kendrick Lamar's supposed phony act about being Black because he says one thing in his songs and does another. Only problem with that is, that Lamar's soon to be bride has been with him since before he ever became famous, and regardless of the fact that she is lighter-skinned, she still is, and identifies herself as, BLACK.

Ahhh, but you see, Sistas like Lamar's lady, they ain't Black enough, you see. The darker the berry, and all that.

What this latest controversy just goes to show, is that women, in this case very dark-skinned ones, do indeed attempt to control the sexuality of Black men, especially the more high-profile and successful ones. So, can we please kill this idea that it is only men who want to control womens' sexuality? The truth is that it's more like a two-way street, if anything.

Finally: as I've shown and proved in a previous column, Black Feminists have a tangle of problems that are much more urgent and pressing than what conscious rappers say or do. Dark-skinned lasses like Ms. Strober would do well to read what I had to say in said column, for she will find much wisdom in its words.

My colleague Janet Bloomfield has an interesting theory as to why men of all skin tones might have a preference for lighter tones than their own:

> Here's a little pet theory of mine I'd like to throw out, just for the hell of it. I think humans prefer lighter skin and hair and eye colors because those tend to be the > result of recessive genes. A man with darker tones who has a child with a woman of lighter tones will almost always see his genes expressed in the children. Dark tones tend to be dominant. The preference for lighter skin is a natural paternity test.

The problem, ain't Kendrick Lamar, or Talib Kweli, ladies.

The problem, is you.

Fix it.

Please.

*I first got wind of Ms. Strober while watching a rather lengthy – and deeply embarassing – interview she did with Tommy Sotomayor. You can see it for yourself here. Let me know what you think!

The UVA rape hoax: Aftermath and lessons for us all

April 14, 2015 | by Jonathan Taylor | Link | Original Link

I hope many of us are familiar with what is now called The UVA Rape Hoax. Back in November, a "journalist" at Rolling Stone named Sabrina Rubin Erdely published an account of a woman named "Jackie" who was allegedly gang-raped at a Phi Kappa Psi frat house. As we pointed out (among other things) in December 2014, the rhetoric with which Erdely described frats was so caricatured that it bordered on being a transparent farce.

Erdely's account has since been discredited in its entirety. More than being merely "baseless," almost every claim made by "Jackie" and chronicled by Erdely in Rolling Stone has been objectively proven false. After a four-month investigation, Charlottesville police declared they had "exhausted all investigative leads" and that there is "no substantive basis to support the account alleged in the Rolling Stone article."

As the final nail in the coffin, the Columbia University Graduate School of Journalism released a scathing 13,000-word report claiming that > Rolling Stone's repudiation of the main narrative in "A Rape on Campus" is a story of journalistic failure that was avoidable. The failure encompassed reporting, editing, editorial supervision and fact-checking. The magazine set aside or rationalized as unnecessary essential practices of reporting that, if pursued, would likely have led the magazine's editors to reconsider publishing Jackie's narrative so prominently, if at all. The published story glossed over the gaps in the magazine's reporting by using pseudonyms and by failing to state where important information had come from.

Sabrina Erdely issued an "apology" on April 5, 2015 to "Rolling Stone's readers, to my Rolling Stone editors and colleagues, to the U.V.A. community, and to any victims of sexual assault who may feel fearful as a result of my article." She made no apologies to the falsely accused young men – an apology that is deeply owed, and the omission of which is a telltale sign of the lack of moral character that underpinned and motivated her extreme lack of professionalism.

Rolling Stone, however, has decided not to fire Erdely. They have also not declared that they will make any policy changes in light of what they have "learned." As one commenter on Reddit put it, "No one fired, censured, suspended, no pay checks docked, delayed, or denied, not even to pay for the broken windows at the frat house."

Nor did the avalanche of evidence that Erdely's story was a massive farce stop "social justice warriors" – feminists being prominent among them – from continuing their deranged crusade to destroy the reputations and livelihoods of the young men at Phi Kappa Psi, and to use the occasion as an excuse to demonize men and masculinity in general, and college men in particular. These feminists held (and still hold) incredible influence in the media and even the legal system, and to this day they have neither retracted their positions nor apologized for their unvarnished bigotry.

Now Phi Kappa Psi plans to sue Rolling Stone, and I hope they clean them out. An example needs to be made out of people who do this kind of thing. If Rolling Stone wants to shelter the likes of Sabrina Erdely and give a free pass to the kind of prejudice she foments, they deserve to go down with her.

Feminists are still clinging to their guns, however. For all of their claims of "but feminism helps men, too" none of them have dissented with the likes of Jessica Valenti and other feminist media mobsters by putting forth the idea that maybe – just maybe – assuming guilt by gender alone is the exact opposite of what equality is about. These feminists continue to publish articles about how "something" must still have happened.

Someone should let them know that April Fools Day was a couple of weeks ago.

The question now becomes: how can we take this catastrophic failure of social justice and turn it into something positive? How can we take the regressive, stone-age mentality of Feminists & Friends, and make progress toward something that resembles real equality?

First and foremost, when it comes to issues like this, we must create a culture of compassion for the wrongly accused. We also must not shy away from acknowledging that when it comes to rape, 99% of the wrongly accused are men. And we must familiarize ourselves with their experiences and hear them out in their own light.

Men whose are falsely accused of rape often have their reputations destroyed. Their livelihood is turned to shambles. Their friends are alienated or turned against them. Their families fractured. Their confidence and sense of security are shattered. They are falsely imprisoned for months if not years, where ironically they stand a greater likelihood of actually being raped. They suffer from vigilante attacks and vandalism. And they experience suicidal thoughts and tendencies borderline on suicidal tendencies.

In short, they experience every form of suffering that victims of rape experience. And that means we have every reason to say that false rape accusations can be just as harmful as rape itself, and victims of false rape accusations deserve our compassion, attention, protection, and care.

It is beyond obvious by now that feminism cannot create this culture of empathy for the wrongly accused. Far from it; overwhelming evidence strongly confirms that their modus operandi is to demonize the wrongly accused simply for existing in the first place. They have not learned anything since the Duke lacrosse rape hoax, the Bryan Banks case, the Hofstra rape hoax, the Meg Lanker-Simons rape threat hoax, or any of the other many rape hoaxes that have come to light in recent years.

And that brings us to one of the most important lessons, one that non-feminists need to learn as well: if we have not learned by now that feminists will never learn from their mistakes, I fear we have learned very little indeed. They will continue – as they always have– to destroy the lives of innocent men simply for being accused, and will not stop until the power to do so has been seized from their grasp, and until they are effectively marginalized from the discussion on gender issues.

Enough of the senseless deflections of “but feminism is about equality,” “not all feminists are like that,” and so forth. The actions of these feminists speak far louder than such fairy-tale wants and wishes of what feminism would be, could be, or should be.

When it comes to what Feminism is in the real word, this is what Feminism looks like, and it will never change. It is irredeemably corrupt, and it’s time to toss it into the rubbish heap alongside other historical bigotries and failed ideologies.

Lauren Southern: Why I am not a feminist

April 15, 2015 | by AVfM Video Source | Link | Original Link

Why do we think she's still getting inundated with people telling her she just doesn't understand feminism?

Will any of those people have the self-awareness to think it's maybe they who don't understand feminism?

Maybe they've been led down the primrose path, and Lauren Southern is the one who understands something that they don't?

Draconian child support laws killed Walter Scott

April 15, 2015 | by Mumia Ali | Link | Original Link

Note: This article is also available in Spanish.

"It's no fun – being on the run,
Because they got me – Public Enemy number one…"
-Chuck D

The recent shooting death of Walter Scott by (now former) policeman Michael Slager in North Charleston, SC, earlier this month is being viewed by many in the country, particularly those in the Black American community, as yet another example of racially inspired police brutality run amok, and on this point they would have a good one – the evidence in favor of such a position is indeed quite compelling. However, upon closer inspection, one finds that what played a powerful role in Mr. Scott's demise was the utterly draconian child support laws which disproportionately affect Black American men.

As Citizen Journo Mr. Tommy Sotomayor notes in his excellent video presentation on YouTube, nearly 15% – one eighth of all inmates currently in the Palmetto State's prisons – are there due to being in arrears for child support payments. We know that Black men in particular tend to be disproportionately represented in the prison population overall in this country. And Mr. Sotomayor argues that Black women themselves have a role to play in this current state of affairs – one that has, even if indirectly, played a role in at least one Black man that we are aware of, winding up dead.

While some may see this as yet another misogynistic dig at (Black) women on the part of Sotomayor or indeed, the writing and editorial staff here at A Voice For Men, his argument is not without precedent. Nearly two years ago, keyed to the release of her book "Doing The Best I Can: Fatherhood In The Inner City", Johns Hopkins University professor Kathryn Edin published an interview in the Philadelphia Weekly newspaper which discusses the book's premise and why she and her co-author, fellow scholar Timothy Nelson, felt it was important to delve into this rarely examined side of the "family values" debate. Edin, who co-authored the critically acclaimed "Promises I Can Keep: Why Poor Women Put Motherhood Before Marriage" a decade ago, argues that our elected officials and governments at all levels, got it completely wrong about poor and minority dads – that far from the stereotypes of being "deadbeats" and "hit and run" guys, these were men who desperately wanted to father, to be there for their kids – but they faced formidable, sometimes insurmountable obstacles to make that happen. One of those obstacles, was the child support system that hounds rather than helps them in their quest to be there for their kids.

From all that we can gather, Mr. Scott was on good terms with his kids, so there were no problems there. The only problem was that, according to the Wikipedia entry on him, he was arrested ten times for contempt of court charges related to his inability to pay child support. Some reports showed that he had earned only $800 USD monthly – hardly enough for a single adult grown man to live on in the current economy, let alone pay the anywhere from $7,000-$18,000 USD arrears in child support that he owed (depending on which news source you choose to believe). As a result, Scott rightly feared that he would be put back in prison on that fateful morning earlier this month when he was pulled over in a routine traffic stop. To avoid capture and yet another arrest, he chose to flee.

Sadly, his story in this regard is by no means unique – indeed, it is a lot more common than we're willing to admit, as Alice Goffman, another (White!) academic, notes in her work "On The Run: Fugitive Life In An American City", and Charles Murray documents in his excellent tome "Coming Apart: The State Of White America, 1960-2010". Both of these works detail the lengths to which poor and inner city men, Black, White and Latino, go to avoid the police for a whole range of "offenses" – which include child support arrears. All three of these works were written about and based in my home town of Philadelphia, and I can tell anyone reading this that the Family Court building on 11th St. between Market and Chestnut is the stuff of urban legend – you can and will be locked up by the Sheriff's Department on the spot if you are so much as a few bucks in the red on child support payments. Not only that, but as Goffman notes in "On The Run", it is not at all unusual for people in the hood – in this case Black women – to use the system to "get back" at their baby daddies.

Back here at the ranch, AVFM colleague Mr. Ty Henry, recently wrote an equally excellent piece covering the Scott shooting, giving yet more damning evidence of the carnage our nation's wrong-headed and draconian child support laws are doing to Black and poor men:

> "David Pate, associate professor of social work at University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee, stated in the International Business Times that most arrests of black men in arrears come during traffic stops.
> "Black men live in constant fear, period. And I think the fear that Mr. Scott had was on different levels," said Pate. "There needs to be more uncovering of how the child support system works and whether it helps families who are really poor. For families that are making less than $10,000 [a year], is it helping those children be in a better place when they know their parents are under constant stress of being locked up?"
> Black men have the highest rate of non-payment, due to high unemployment, said Pate."

Yet, with these facts well known and academically documented, the Social Justice Warriors among us refuse to deal honestly with them – or they ignore them altogether, as we can see in the recent column written by perennial Manosphere nemesis, David Futrelle of We Hunted The Mammoth infamy:

> "Over on men's rights hate site A Voice for Men, Attila Vinczer has found the true villain in the case of Walter Scott, the black man shot in the back after he ran from a white cop: Don't blame the cop for shooting and killing a man who was no danger to him whatsoever; blame the ex-wife who simply wanted Scott to pay > the child support he owed…”

Please note that nowhere in his entire spiel does he address what Mr. Henry actually wrote – and chances are very high that if he gets wind of this column, he won’t address the facts contained herein either. Note how he only puts up strawmen to knock them down – going to comments made by readers over at men’s rights discussion groups on Reddit and so forth.

But at least Futrelle is saying something; the Black Feminist Brigades don’t even do that.

None of the most prominent among them – Feminista Jones, Brittney Cooper, Kimberly Foster, Jamilah Lemieux, Mikki Kendall – have addressed the 500 lb. gorilla in the middle of the room. All of them talk about the shooting itself, but don’t say a mumbling word about the root causes – which I find utterly ironic, since that is the mantra that SJWs, Black and White, always go to when anything racial comes up. This is hugely important, since we are constantly being bludgeoned over the head with claims that Black feminists are fighting the good fight not just for Black women, but for Black men like Walter Scott, too. Given their icy silence on the matter, please pardon me when I say that I can’t tell.

In a sane world, the murder of Walter Scott would force a national dialogue about child support and family court system, especially in a time when we claim to be redefining what man and fatherhood means; but, as we Red Pillers know all too well, one should never listen to what people say; we should watch what they do. In the end, however, our ever-increasing Matriarchy is just fine with keeping the old rules about man and fatherhood in play, especially when it suits them to do so.

No matter how many poor and Black men get caught in the undertow.

Eating while MGTOW: Chicken Valenti Cassolette

---

What if you could take a soup like minestrone and convert it into a casserole that could satisfy cravings for spaghetti and pizza in the process?

It is a challenge, to be sure, but not nearly as hard as finding a feminist that is competent and confident in the kitchen. As a part of the MGTOW life, men colonizing kitchens and pwning feminist kitchen ninnies is just one way to savor a life free from female demands.

Feminist Jessica Valenti started a food blog in January 2015 – well, sort of. It is a food newsletter entitled "Eat me"; the title is certainly an indication of the nurturing nature of superior women like her. The newsletter site formerly featured an archive of her weekly musings that was like watching a zombie chew babies – raw man-hating id meets her defenseless kid. Her discomfort around food and its preparation was palpable and more proof that feminist women have little business in kitchens – the sharp edges and burning temperatures are too much for their delicate sensibilities.

Alas, the archive into her mental degeneration has disappeared mysteriously but in its memory I've named this tasty one-pan meal after her abortive efforts. As MGTOW we may be done with marriage and women but this doesn't mean we should forget the reasons we're on this road.

Now, a cassoulet is a slow-cooked French stew that uses meat and white beans. The alternate spelling, cassolette, is also recognized by the Urban Dictionary as the sexual fragrance of a woman's vagina.

This cassolette, like Valenti, is more Italian than French but unlike Valenti the fragrance is surprisingly divine.

The problem with most casserole-related dishes is, like feminism, they result in a big mess that men have to come in and clean up later. See, for example, the recipes for Italian Chicken casseroles here, here, and here: each uses multiple cooking vessels, leaving you with a pile of pans to wash – all those recipes will leave you with a dirty skillet, colander and saucepan. None of that is needed for this dish, which also substitutes a variety of vegetables for the starchy pasta.

Chicken Valenti Cassolette

(serves 2 very generously)

Equipment:

1 8"x8" or 9"x9" baking dish (I used a glass one).
1 microwave-safe glass or ceramic serving plate
1 cheese grater
1 meat cleaver (or heavy knife)
1 metal spatula
1 cutting board
Aluminum foil

Ingredients:

1 frozen chicken breast (straight from the freezer).
1 tablespoon peanut oil
1 jalapeño pepper
3 button mushrooms
1 large or 2 small cloves garlic
1/2 small carrot
1 yellow (summer) squash
1/3 head of cauliflower
1 dozen fresh green beans
1 cup of your favorite tomato-based pasta sauce [I used Prego® Italian Sausage and Garlic]
Fresh ground black pepper
Spices [I used Ms Dash® Southwest Chipotle]
1/2 stick butter
4 ounces of Mozzarella cheese
1/2 ounce of Parmesan cheese

Preheat oven to 425 degrees Farenheit.

Place the frozen chicken breast on the microwave safe plate and microwave for 1 minute at full power. The idea is to take the chill off and thaw the chicken slightly – just enough so that it is easy to slice thin but is still mostly frozen.

While the chicken is in the microwave, oil the baking dish. Cooking spray may be used instead of peanut oil but I enjoy the sensation of getting my oily fingers all up in that dish.

Transfer the chicken breast to the cutting board and rinse the plate it was on under hot tap water, then set the plate aside to drip-dry.

Using the meat cleaver, slice the still semi-frozen chicken lengthwise into 7-8 slices and line the bottom of the oiled baking dish with those slices. Place baking dish in the hot oven.

Rinse the cutting board and cleaver under hot water and get ready to prepare the veggies.

Slice the jalapeño into eight slices lengthwise. If you prefer a milder dish, remove the seeds and membrane. Cut each slice into thirds – you should have 24 pieces in all. Set aside on the microwave plate.

Rinse the mushrooms and slice each into 5 pieces. Set aside with the jalapeños on the microwave plate.

Smash and mince the garlic. Set aside with the jalapeños and mushrooms on the microwave plate.

Remove the baking dish from the oven – the chicken should be turning white instead of pink by now. Sprinkle the veggies from the microwave plate on top of the chicken and return to the oven.

Cut the carrot into slices on a 45 degree bias. Set aside on the now empty microwave plate.

Cut the yellow summer squash into 1 inch chunks. Set aside with the carrot slices on the microwave plate.

Slice the cauliflower into thin splices and set aside with the carrots and squash.

Remove the stems and ends from the green beans and set aside with the carrots, squash and cauliflower.

Remove the baking dish from the oven and add the remaining four sliced veggies to/as the top layer of the baking dish.

Top with one cup of tomato sauce, black pepper, butter and other spices. Cover with foil and bake for 40 minutes.

After 40 minutes, remove from oven and grate the mozzarella directly onto the vegetables. Top off with the parmesan cheese. Do NOT re-cover – return to oven for 10-20 minutes until cheese on top is bubbly and lightly browned.

Cool ten minutes and serve. Cover any leftovers with aluminum foil and once cooled, refrigerate.

If your diet allows you to eat bread products, the buttery-tomato-y liquor in the bottom of the baking pan is a fantastic dipping sauce.

This recipe, with a side salad and some warm dinner rolls, could easily feed four people. As with many tomato-based dishes, the flavor will hold and even improve when reheating the next day.

The only folks this dish won't please are feminists but remember, they are impossible to please and they always want more.

New poll results: The decimation of feminism

---

In January of this year, the Huffington Post crowed that "2014 Was A Great Year For Feminism" but of course, like all feminists, they are liars. According to a new poll, the population of feminists was decimated in the last year – and then some.

Feminists LOVE to use dictionary definitions in their articles about feminism to show the gentle and just plain reasonableness of their vicious, man-hating cult.

So, to make them feel safe and comfortable, I'll start with a definition of a word, too.

> Decimation (Latin: decimatio; decem = "ten") was a form of military discipline used by senior commanders in the Roman Army to punish units or large groups guilty of capital offences such as mutiny or desertion. The word decimation is derived from Latin meaning "removal of a tenth". – from the first result when I googled "decimation definition"

Two years ago, in the Spring of 2013, a poll by the Economist/YouGov put the percentage of Americans who call themselves feminists at 28%: Just 28% of Americans consider themselves feminists, with women twice as likely as men to use that label for themselves.

According to Google, the American population in 2013 was 316.5 million. This means there were roughly 89 million American feminists back then.

Two years later and a new poll is out on feminism:

> The poll, conducted by research and communications firm PerryUndem, shows that a strong majority of Americans agree on gender equality. Eighty-five percent, for example, say they believe in "equality for women."
> But many fewer want to put the feminist label on their beliefs. Eighteen percent of poll respondents said they consider themselves feminist. Fifty-two percent said they were not feminist, 26 percent were not sure, and 4 percent refused to answer the question. [Emphasis added.]

Wow – in two years, it seems those Americans calling themselves "Feminist" fell from 28% to a mere 18%, a drop of 10% of the population and about 37% of feminists.

The US Population is now estimated to hit 325 million this year (2015). 18% are still feminist, which equates to 58.5 million feminists.

So, in real terms, feminists have dropped from 89 million to 58.5 million. More than 30 million people mutinied and bolted from feminism in the last 2 years.

Numbers that large can be hard to grasp. So let's compare:

Suppose every man, woman and child in heavily feminist Scandinavia (Denmark, Finland, Norway, and Sweden) died overnight. That would be 25.8 million dead, far short of the numbers of defecting American feminists. You would have to add in the slaughter of another feminist Scandinavian state – Minnesota, population 5.5 million – to put you over the top in numbers – barely.

Suppose terrorists killed not just one magazine's employees but every man, woman and child in France. That would be 65 million dead. The defecting American feminists equal almost half of France!

Suppose the entire population of my huge home state Texas invaded Mexico. The 27 million vacancies left behind still couldn't hold the 30+ million former US feminists.

About 21 million students are enrolled at US colleges and universities. If every one of them became a feminist they would still fall 9 million short of replacing the feminist defectors.

Feminists have been decimated 4 times over in just 2 years. We are talking Holocaust, Black Plague and Killing Fields as comparable depopulating events. Not even abortions compare: the 2 year decline in feminism is equal to about 21 years of abortions.

During the feminist evaporation the media has been particularly cruel to Men's Humans Rights Advocates and of course, Paul Elam and AVFM in particular. Yet for every scabrous article invented about us, another couple hundred thousand feminists threw up their hands at the lies and confabulations of the media and walked away.

Many of my MGTOW brothers have been skeptical that fighting feminism can make any real progress and have heaped scorn on us for engaging feminism. 30 million former feminists would beg to disagree that fighting feminism is futile.

At their current rate of decline, the last US feminist will check her privilege, hang up her hatred of men, go on a diet and buy a new razor sometime during the year 2019, ironically the 100th anniversary of the 19th amendment and women's suffrage – an anniversary that no one except a few on-the-dole trans-exclusive radfems will bother to celebrate.

Now, polls have margins of error and pendulums swing both ways but after a year of furious battles, this bit of fresh news had the writers and editors here dancing at their keyboards.

And feminists do not do well under pressure.

We'll be keeping it up, grinding away at AVFM, as usual.

Zen Men Summer 2015 Pledge Drive

---

Zen Men LLC is a donor-supported organization that needs your help fighting gynocentrism and misandry. Please consider making a contribution to get gender equity right with the most successful student-run men's rights organization in the nation.

In the state of Georgia, rape is something that only a man does to only a woman or a girl. On Kennesaw State University, there exists a Title IX imbalance in gendered counseling services. There is also a self-defense course run by a gynocentric police force.

Since helping me start KSU Men in November of 2013, you in the MHRM community built the fastest growing men's rights student organization all the way up to the successful Male Students in Peril conference. You are the reason that Zen Men LLC can address problems affecting neglected and abused young men, and speak with greater political influence.

Zen Men members enjoying a night out. Includes students from Kennesaw State, Southern Polytechnic State, and Georgia State

Here's what your support made possible in recent months:

- U.S. Navy Veteran Joshua Stoneman founded a new Zen Men chapter in Madison Area Technical College (MATC).
- We challenged the toxic Rape Culture myth in a live classroom presentation.
- We scheduled a volunteer effort with an equitable IPV shelter in Blue Ridge, GA to help them develop their evidence-based IPV awareness curriculum for high schools in Fannin and Gilmer counties.

- A Zen Men volunteer pulled masculinity studies academician Dr. Michael Kimmel aside for an interview.

We depend on your generosity, so you decide whether or not Zen Men LLC continues its mission. Our growing volunteer team needs you to help the United States education system see how it's been failing young men, and we can do that by providing assistance to our neglected, battered and suicidal sons.

If you believe that change comes only with hard work, then we need you to be more than a passive observer and take an active role in resisting gynocentrism and misandry.

One of the many loads of groceries donors funneled into a campus food pantry to feed homeless and financially struggling students.

Your support is no longer going to just one organization. Zen Men LLC is spreading its geographic influence through a new affiliation program that gives students incentives to start Zen Men chapters. By contributing to this pledge drive, you can now fund localized activist projects across more universities, and further develop the MHRM's political influence through Zen Men LLC.

If you want to participate in hands-on activities, you can also work directly with us by applying for a volunteer position, writing an article, or taking on an unassigned task in our project tracker.

Ideology, gynocentrism and misandry are the new Dark Age, and we need you to be a part of the next Renaissance.

The pledge drive ends on May 15th, but our promotion here on A Voice for Men will last for only a few days. If everyone reading this donated just $5, we will reach our goal in a matter of hours. Will you please spare the price of one cup of coffee and share this campaign on Facebook, Twitter and Reddit to gift our sons the help they deserve as human beings?

Eating While MGTOW: Boom-boom chicken

April 17, 2015 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

OK, so we already know that chicken is a favorite among those looking for bang for their grocery bucks. It is a very versatile food as well. You got your fried chicken, roasted chicken, chicken nuggets, chicken soup, bar-b-cue chicken and chicken and dumplings. You can turn south of the US border and find other uses. Chicken fajitas, chicken enchiladas, chicken flautas and a dozen other things called pollo con something or another.

We like chicken so much we actually name other kinds of meat after it. Chicken of the Sea and chicken fried steak come to mind. Heck, we even invoke the sacred chicken when we are eating something that a lot of people normally don't eat.

"How's those frog legs?"

"Not bad!" comes the answer. "They taste like chicken."

It would seem like all this attention and notoriety might place chicken in an exalted place in human culinary experience, but what it really does is create boredom. Personally, I can't remember the last time the words, "Oh boy! Chicken!" came out of my mouth. Probably because it never happened.

Well, with one exception.

Today I am going to introduce you to Vietnamese style boom-boom chicken. Now, normally with Vietnamese food the French would get some kind of mention because of their influence on Vietnamese cuisine. It was the French, after all, who came to Indochina to fight a war. They might have even won if the combatants were all sauciers and sous chefs.

Boom-boom chicken, I think, is pure Vietnamese cooking, but I can't swear to the accuracy. I am just going by the fact that the dish does not require ridiculous amounts of butter and cream. In fact, it does not require any of either. What it does require is being brined in advance, and careful attention to the marinade, which is a bit of magic all on its own. The result of this is that you will eat chicken so good that it would make you lick your fingers in front of the Queen.

First the brine.

Just as a point of information, brining poultry is a really outstanding way to ensure you won't be eating chicken jerky by the time it is done cooking. It makes the meat moist, plump and helps it maintain a very pleasant texture. Normally, I would suggest brining for 12 hours. Because we are going to marinade this chicken after it is partially brined we are cutting the brining time in half to 6 hours.

To start with, place one gallon of warm water in a large bowl (large enough to easily hold a gallon of water and a whole chicken cut into parts. To the warm water add 3/4 cup kosher salt and I cup brown sugar. Optionally, you can add any number of other spices and ingredients, from peppers to honey to rosemary to cumin and others. This time, however, I recommend you stick with the salt and sugar only. We are going to add plenty of seasoning for the chicken in the marinade.

Stir the salt and brown sugar into the water till it completely dissolves, then allow the water to return to room temperature. It's ok to cheat by throwing a few ice cubes into the mix.

Once the brining solution is cooled, drop in the chicken, cover and place in the refrigerator for 6 hours.

And now for a break to put you in the mood for boom-boom chicken.

Now comes the fun part; the boom-boom chicken marinade that will blow the water out of your rice paddy. The ingredients are as follows:

1 cup soy sauce (low sodium is actually full of sodium)

1 tablespoon ginger, finely chopped

1 tablespoon finely chopped onion (white, Spanish onion)

4-6 garlic cloves, well mashed (with or without the garlic's consent)

1/2 teaspoon each powdered cinnamon, garlic, and cloves

1 tablespoon sugar

1/2 teaspoon black pepper

Make this marinade in advance, while your boom-boom is brining and make sure it is mixed thoroughly. When the time comes, remove the chicken from the brining solution, rinse off with cold water to remove excess salt, and then put the chicken in a large, freezer style zip lock bag. Pour marinade in the bag with the boom-boom and make sure it coats everything. Place in fridge for one hour, coming back to shake the bag and recoat the chicken about every 15 minutes.

There are two ways of cooking the chicken. You can place the chicken on a cookie sheet and bake in a pre-heated oven for an hour at 325 degrees Fahrenheit. That method sucks, though. This recipe is made for a grill. Charcoal or gas does not matter. Flames do matter, so does smoke, and you don't get either inside most kitchens unless you have bigger problems than boom-boom chicken. This is definitely a job for the porch or patio.

Once your grill is hot, place your chicken skin side down and let it cook till the skin is getting crispy and has grill marks. Then turn it over, lower heat, cover and allow to finish cooking. If you are lucky your grill will have an upper rack where the chicken can sit away from the direct flame and finish.

If you are experienced enough you can tell if chicken is done just by looking at the color. Or you can cut into a piece to test it for doneness, but this is not the preferred method. Cutting the chicken (or any meat) before it has come off the grill and had a chance to rest will cause the juices to flow out and dry out the meat.

The best way is to use a meat thermometer. They are inexpensive. Simply push the thermometer’s pointed end into a deep piece of meat like a breast or a thigh. When the internal temperature is 165, take the boom-boom off the grill, cover with foil and let it rest for 10 minutes.

Follow all these steps properly and you will have chicken that might just change your mind about chicken.

This chicken is delicious, easy to make and it will love you long time.

Alison Tieman on bullying by Expo Equality and Calgary Expo

April 18, 2015 | by AVfM Video Source | Link | Original Link

We may face allegations of “white knighting” for a fellow MRA but we don’t care. Feminists and their enablers are hatemongering intolerant fascist bullies. Especially those running the “Expo Equality” group and the people in charge of the Calgary Expo.

More on the story here.

Also, by the way, for those of you who went to Calgary to meet the Badgers, the word we have is that until sunset they’ll just be hanging out and relaxing (not exhibiting, not selling things, just hanging out) at Reader Rock Garden Historic Park. We don’t know exactly what they’ll be wearing, they likely won’t have any big signs, but they are going there and you may find them there.

Women creator group banned by “inclusive” Calgary Comic Expo

With 97,000 attendees last year, this year’s Calgary Comic Expo – billed as the 2nd largest in Canada and the 4th largest in North America – should’ve been a blast for all the guests, exhibitors and visitors.

For one group promoting comic books and free expression, though, the trip turned into a humiliating nightmare – through no fault of their own.

Eight members of the women’s creative artistic group the Honey Badger Brigade (once located in space BF 3821 at the Expo) – Anna Cherry, Brian Martinez, Alison Tieman, Mike Stephenson (of YouTube channel DoctorRandomercam), Karen Straughan (GirlWritesWhat), Hannah Wallen, Sage Gerard, and Rachel Edwards – had their exhibitor’s booth shut down by security just before the doors opened to the public on Friday, April 17, the 2nd day of the 4-day exposition. They were then summarily ejected from the premises along with Alison’s husband and Anna’s companion – 10 ejections in all.

One leader of the cooperative group – comic producer Alison Tieman – was also blacklisted permanently from attending similar Comic Expositions across Canada, effectively destroying her ability to promote her art.

Their crime? Alison politely answered a question during a panel discussion.

Yes. That’s it. No threats, no violence – nothing of the sort. Here’s the question and Tieman’s firm but respectful answer.

After a question involving “Men’s Rights Activitist types” (MRAs) comes up, Alison asks politely “Would you like us to field that question?” twice, and then added “…because I am a Men’s Rights Activist…”

The feminist on the panel interrupts to give her enthusiastic consent: “Okay!”

Alison: “…and you can hate on me. The reason why I don’t like feminism is because you promote this idea that women are defined by being victims. If you look at the context of all of your issues, men also face considerable problems as well, and they need to be brought into the story and not just for men’s sake – because this hides men’s vulnerability – [but] also for the sake of challenging the notion that women are defined as victims.”

Apparently, if you’re not a woman who is a victim at the Calgary Comic Expo, the feminists there will work like hell to turn you into one.

Two of the men in the group – Sage and Mike – uploaded a video the evening of the ban summarizing the expulsion “fiasco.”

Now, the Honey Badgers’ weren’t out to harass anyone at the Calgary Expo they were there to have fun and promote their art. They had constructed costumes for “cosplay,” defined by Google as a portmanteau of the words "costume play"…a performance art in which participants called cosplayers wear costumes and fashion accessories to represent a specific character or idea.

There were plans to bring bathing suits to visit nearby hot springs in the Calgary area, play PS4 video games and board games. They looked forward to meeting each other in person – many for the first time – and also celebrities, exchanging fist bumps with beloved characters like "Hershel" from The Walking Dead (actor Scott Wilson).

In a phone interview, the Badgers said they had little inkling that trouble was afoot – there were a lot of friendly conversations at the booth and the folks at neighboring exhibitor tables helped them with things like box cutters – to, you know, open boxes, not threaten feminists. There were no confrontations or anything amiss.

The Badgers were looking forward to meeting some of their fans and promoting their comics and posters, and comic book authors Alison and Brian were especially keen to increase exposure of their work.

Everything seemed to be going well until out of nowhere, security appeared. There was no warning. They knew exactly where and how to hit them.

During the interview I badgered the Honey Badgers with questions:

Did you have any warning that the ban was coming? No.

Did they issue any warning strikes or make any other attempts to defuse the situation? No. It was a done deal – shut the booth down and get out.

Interestingly, the rules for the Expo state that an "Oral Warning" is the first method that security will use in case of a problem. Security apparently violated their own published protocols by immediately jumping to steps 2 and 3 (expulsion and lifetime ban).

Adherence to one's published protocols is important because failing to do so can become an element in a fraud case – the Honey Badgers paid money to lease their space and the Expo then broke the contract, kicked them out and kept their money. In essence, the Expo appears to have defrauded them via a false or deceptive promise.

Did the Expo explain the reason you were being banned? Not really.

Initially, security noticed that members of the Honey Badgers were recording them and security seemed unwilling to go on record, perhaps because they knew what they were doing was nefarious. They tried to separate Alison from the group but her husband would not be parted from her.

The claim was that Alison had derailed a panel Question and Answer session – a session Alison had politely sought – and received – approval to join. A session that did not become heated or even off track. Indeed, Alison calmly explained how the victim narrative of feminism harmed both men and women. What should have been an insightful moment of the Expo became instead a "thoughtcrime" straight out of Orwell's 1984.

The security men also claimed they had received 25 complaints about Alison's one brief statement. No evidence of these complaints was produced or offered – if they came from Twitter, it is not even clear that any of the complainers even attended the Expo.

Feminists are famous for “brigading” – ganging up via social media in order to amplify some imagined slight to titanic proportions. Perhaps security was lazy, naïve or both but they took these alleged complaints as some sort of gospel account of a serious offense without bothering to investigate them thoroughly.

Did the Expo allow you time to defend yourself? No.

The Honey Badgers were presumed guilty with no full investigation and were given no opportunity to defend themselves.

Did the Expo offer you any appeals process? No.

The Honey Badgers were kicked out of the Expo without recourse.

Did the Expo offer to refund your money? No. All the monies are forfeit with no recompense.

Did security let you discuss your options out of their earshot? No.

Security even denied the Honey Badgers the right to counsel or to simply discuss their options privately.

The Honey Badgers perceived that the security guards seemed embarrassed and ill-at-ease with themselves, as if they knew what they were doing was wrong or cowardly. It is easy to imagine why they might feel that way – clearly, they were scaring and humiliating the Honey Badgers in ways clearly prohibited by their own guidelines.

The ironies in this tragic situation abound. A group of women who support free expression were harshly censored. Feminists who claimed they support women and minority artists got a minority artist’s career derailed and a woman artist’s career destroyed.

An exposition that claimed to support women, minorities and free speech kicked out women and minorities for exercising free speech.

How do feminists expect to attract followers when they treat women like shit? Hell, how do they even sleep at night?

Toward the end of my interview with them, the Honey Badgers made one thing clear: they didn’t want any talk of boycotts or anything else that would hurt the livelihood of the exhibitors in the same way that the Honey Badgers were injured. Their argument is with the shabby ways they were treated by the Expo organizers.

Several folks on twitter asked where they could buy Honey Badger comics and other merchandise now that their Expo time ended prematurely. The Honey Badgers are still working this out but you can keep an eye on their website.

The Honey Badgers did suggest that the “super sponsors” be contacted with complaints about the situation.

Both the organizers and the “super” sponsors can be found here.

Comics legend Stan Lee was a no-show at Calgary Comic Expo this year. Common sense, tolerance, fairness and decency also went lacking.

Censorship, Calgary Expo, and Men's Human Rights: One geek girl's perspective.

April 19, 2015 | by Lindsey Ratha | Link | Original Link

At times I thought maybe the men's rights people were hyperbolic and that by considering them seriously I was making a slippery slope fallacy; my supposition was just because society is predisposed to be more protective of women and prioritize the feminist narrative, this tendency does not mean they will censor countervailing ideas.

My supposition was proven false.

As I said in my earlier post, I was looking forward to meeting the Honey Badger Brigade at the Calgary Expo. I've been going to the Expo since I was a teenager. I am a gamer, an artist and a writer who has been interested in producing my own comic book. When I found the Honey Badgers online I was instantly attracted to their courage to push the boundaries on current narratives.

I share a willingness to explore new frontiers and I crave the unconventional.

Alison Tieman, one of the founding Honey Badgers, has an online comic called Xenospora. She is an amazing artist and you should check it out.

Alison is also very much an advocate of women, along with being a men's rights activist (MRA). There is palpable irony that she and the Honey Badgers were thrown out of the Calgary Expo over their stand against censorship. Although she believes women can be agents in their own life stories without a victimhood narrative, people at the expo (and others tweeting about the expo) excluded her from their in-group – from which they claim to speak for all women.

I am a woman. I wanted to see the Honey Badger Brigade and if I were at one of the "women in comic books" panels, I'd love to hear a wide-ranging variety of perspectives.

The Badger's basic civil and human rights have been violated, and with this violation, my opportunity to show public support for them at the Calgary Expo was compromised. Bullies using the feminist narrative are more than willing to take away the rights of others, including "dissenting" women.

This is what intolerance looks like. In-group preference wins out and the group undermines another's humanity.

Alison is not a "token woman" of the MRA. Six of the eight Honey Badgers at the expo were women. Nor is she a demon. She is her own person, and a kind, talented and courageous one at that:

Even if you have no interest in gender politics on either side, please at least take a stand against censorship.

#Expogate video roundup

April 19, 2015 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

We normally try to limit our number of videos in a day but too much has been going on at the Calgary Expo. If you're still not up to date on it, you can read the basics here: Women creator group banned by "inclusive" Calgary Comic Expo. Not much has happened since we published that story that we can tell you about, although we can tell you there will be a lot more news about it in the days ahead. Meanwhile, the #Expogate hashtag has been an absolute joy to watch as people come out of the woodwork not just in support of the Badgers, but at the feminist/Social Justice bullies that made this happen.

There's a growing flurry of YouTube activity as well, and here are some of the better ones we've seen, some righteous in their anger at this Stalinist garbage, and others actually coming out of the closet and asking what's wrong with talking about men's rights.

And by the way feminists, you done fucked up: you just tricked a corporation operating on public property, at an event subsidized by the government, into discriminating against a group of women because you didn't like their politics–the fact that they are critics of feminism and supporters of the human rights of men.

Meantime, enjoy the videos:

Feminism for beginners

April 19, 2015 | by Ken Gallagher | Link | Original Link

"Feminism is about equality and is good for everybody."

This statement couldn't be further from the truth!

I am a staunch anti-feminist because feminism has had a very negative impact on my life – namely blatant gender discrimination and bullying in the workplace, and more than 3 years in family court trying to finalize a divorce that is yet to be finalized. And to think, it was only 5 or so years ago that I was dismissing feminism as a harmless movement for university girls desperately in need of attention.

I was wrong – completely wrong – in many ways. While I do believe that many young people have been brainwashed into believing the dictionary definition of the word "feminism," it was the aforementioned workplace discrimination, divorce and completely unwarranted financial devastation that led me to take a closer look at this thing called feminism – a movement firmly rooted in hate and greed, while claiming to be about gender equality.

And now that I have reached the conclusion that feminism has not only ruined my life, but the lives of countless others – men, women and children alike. I wanted to write this article to explain to others exactly how feminism has become so stealthily entrenched in our society and how it works to undermine men, their families and society so that people in search of answers can begin to learn about this toxic social scourge.

Feminism in a Nutshell

Thanks to organizations like the National Organization for Women (N.O.W.), feminism is exceptionally well-funded primarily through donations that have rolled in for decades. It is the deep pockets of feminism that allow it to wield untold power and influence over the following:

- The government
- The media
- The education system

Over time, feminism has used its power and influence to slowly change these entities into 'tools' used only for the spreading of the feminist message, namely female supremacy rooted in the hatred of men, or misandry, and ultimately aimed at the transfer of wealth from men to women.

How Feminism Influences Governments

In short, it's simple – politicians win elections based on votes.

Feminism pits politicians against one another by making demands for gender-biased laws in return for those desperately needed votes. Politicians, eager for the votes of the undecided voters, many of whom are young single women with feminist leanings, concede to feminist demands and pass laws that blatantly discriminate against men. Examples of this discrimination are as follows:

Employment Laws

Affirmative Action is specifically designed to give preference to job applicants based on their gender, race and sexual orientation to the extent where qualified white heterosexual men "need not apply."

As many of the winning applicants are effectively incompetent, they are often quickly moved into management positions where they seemingly don't need an in-depth understanding of their profession but, instead, rely on their subordinates for knowledge and guidance to make decisions. Over time, female subordinates are promoted while male subordinates are simply ignored or bullied into leaving, the result being organizations completely void of truly qualified people clearly explaining why we live in dysfunctional societies.

I have met many people who claim this cycle of female domination is commonplace especially in academia and government and I believe them because I have witnessed it for years now. Dr. Janice Fiamengo, a Professor of English at the University of Ottawa in Canada is also a staunch anti-feminist for this very reason.

Now imagine a qualified man interviewing for a job in an organization dominated by incompetent female managers who only secured their jobs in the first place because of their gender. A man's chances of getting that job are slim to none especially given that the last thing any incompetent manager wants is competent subordinates who could expose managerial incompetence, so competent subordinates are often perceived as threats despite that threat being real or merely perceived.

And obviously, the last thing a misandrist wants is to have to spend 40 hours a week working with a man!

And to think that these incompetent people are quickly promoted into management positions where their incompetence can be hidden and their power wielded only to have feminists continually complain about a so-called pay gap. It's laughable at best, criminal at worst.

Family law

Divorce in North America has become a billion dollar "industry" that incentivizes women to divorce their husbands whereby women:

- Are more likely to be believed when making false abuse claims against a husband and, therefore; more likely to receive sympathy from a court and custody of children, and
- Are more likely to receive lucrative alimony payments for lengthy periods of time more often than not leaving divorced men financially ruined.

Paternity laws are completely broken whereby men are often forced to support children they can prove (through DNA testing) aren't theirs, or support children that are theirs without any parental visitation rights whatsoever.

While single mothers who experience difficulty providing for their children are given government assistance, men in the same circumstances are punished, often harshly, whereby their driver's license can be confiscated leaving them unable to work, and eventually landing them in jail where they are completely unable to provide financial assistance for their loved ones.

Criminal law

False rape and sexual assault allegations are commonplace today and in many jurisdictions there is little, if any, penalty for a false accuser found to be lying. Those accused, on the other hand, are often left financially destroyed and their reputations in tatters.

While extensive scientific studies prove that roughly half of all domestic violence is perpetrated by women, thanks to something called the "Duluth Model" (which not only wasn't proven to begin with, but has since been completely disproven), men are automatically presumed to be the perpetrators and women the victims, not to mention there is almost no help whatsoever for male victims of domestic abuse.

Many domestic violence allegations are also false and occur in the lead up to women filing for divorce in an attempt not only to garner sympathy from the family law courts, but also to almost ensure a man's custody to his children is completely denied.

Note the difference in the diagram between the feminist claim that men hate "women" and the reality of discrimination against men resulting in men hating "feminists". Nonetheless, feminists continue to insist that all men are misogynists which couldn't be farther from the truth.

How Feminism Influences the Media

The goal of the feminist infiltration of the media is simple: to spread feminist lies and propaganda for convincing societies that only men are potential perpetrators of evil and all women are potential innocent helpless victims.

Similar to Joseph Goebbels, the Minister of Propaganda under the National Socialist Party led by Adolf Hitler in the 1930s and 1940s in Germany, feminists fully understand the power of the media and the effectiveness of the expression "If you tell somebody something over and over enough times, eventually they'll believe it."

I don't know about you, but I gave up on cable television a couple of years ago primarily because of the never-ending drone of misandry whereby men (and boys) are constantly vilified by making them appear stupid, dangerous or both. The underlying purpose of this blatant vilification is:

- Feminists work to portray women as not only smarter, but also as helpless victims at the hands of evil men (and only men) in order to gain special treatment and privileges which is a contradiction in itself because if all women are smarter than all men, how can women possibly be victims?
- Feminists also want to portray women as smarter and more capable to help further the systematic exclusion of men from secondary schools, colleges and universities, and, ultimately, good jobs eventually making men unable to provide for families.

Feminists hope to systematically emasculate men into becoming subservient to women so:

- Women can hold power over men who are too weak to stand up for themselves because many men subjected to the media's constant anti-male message have, over time, developed low self-esteem and have bought into the nonsense that women are somehow stronger than men and weaker than men all at the same time, and
- To destroy the nuclear family by trying to defy nature whereby women have been trained to reject men that are not subservient, but on a sexual level, women despise weak men. The contradiction between their belief system and their natural sexual desires result in dysfunctional interaction with men and, ultimately, broken families and fatherless children.

This power over the media and constant droning of subtle misandry has resulted in a society whereby all forms of masculinity are discouraged, thus ultimately driving a wedge between men and women, the goal of feminism being the destruction of the nuclear family to "free" women from an imagined life of servitude to men.

Moreover, it has resulted in the following:

- Never in recent times has there been so many single men of marrying age who have no interest in marriage
- Being a divorced, single man living alone is not only socially acceptable, but commonplace
- Being a single mother is also socially acceptable and commonplace
- Children with no father in their lives are commonplace and are more apt to experience difficulty interacting with other children, difficulty in school, and often end up leading unproductive, non-fulfilling lives as single men.

The feminist media agenda is especially damaging for boys because they learn from a very early age that they are inferior and effectively worthless. This, combined with a an educational system that pounds the same message into their heads, results in many boys experiencing behavioral problems, doing poorly in school, ending up as wards of the state and going on to become part of the criminal justice system. This is what feminism does to boys and men!

How Feminism Influences the Education System

Feminists understand full well the influence adults have on children. This is why the modern-day education system is specifically geared towards female achievement and male under achievement. By doing so, girls are much more likely to go on to college or university, and the good paying jobs mentioned earlier. Disadvantaged boys, however, are more likely to not receive they education they need to lead a productive, fulfilling life.

For those emasculated boys that do finish secondary school, college and university can be a social minefield of gender discrimination ranging from torment and bullying to full-blown false rape allegations.

To quote an anonymous author, “Now make an uneducated guess what pro-equality, pro-diversity, emphasis on feelings, trigger warnings, rape hysteria, compulsory feminist classes, anti-lad culture, invasion of male spaces, presumption of male guilt, political correctness, aversion to heated debates, and the transformation within one generation have in common? Women!”

Simply put, the reality of today is that colleges and universities have become places of indoctrination whereby young students learn what to think and not how to think, furthering the goals of feminism by trumpeting lies, demonizing masculinity, and ultimately minimizing the number of men who receive a decent education that will lead to a prosperous life.

In reality, colleges and universities have gone from places where free speech and critical thought were encouraged to politically correct hell holes where free speech and critical thinking are not only discouraged, but simply not tolerated to the extent where “outspoken” students simply searching for truth are being expelled leaving their career aspirations completely in the lurch.

In short, the attitude of young feminists today is simple: anyone who challenges their baseless claims of constantly being victims of male aggression, while simultaneously being superior to males, is deemed a threat that must be neutralized.

Not only is the result of this destructive behavior devastating for those young men who don’t finish college or university, but more importantly, many of the young people who do graduate are the product of leftist brainwashing completely incapable of tolerance or critical thinking, and of no real value to society as their ability to make a meaningful contribution to the world has been seriously handicapped.

As a result, many young men are steering clear of post-secondary education paving the way for even more young radical feminists and simply making the problem worse.

So where will we be as a society when there is a serious shortage of skilled young men to help run our world? Especially when the very people who pushed them away from a post-secondary are only really good at one thing – promoting political correctness!

Summary

Hopefully, you can see how the three main spheres of feminist influence – on governments, the media and the education system – work in tandem to stealthily further the goals of feminism while simultaneously destroying men and families.

The result of elevating women at the cost of men results in economic gain for women and economic loss for men. Simply put, it’s the transfer of wealth from men to women. As women get more money, they gain more power and, in turn, more money will be donated to feminist causes thus giving feminists even more power and accelerating the wealth transfer. Sadly, all of this stealthy state-sanctioned robbery of men is done, for the most part, without the public's knowledge disguised as "the fight for gender equality."

Much the same way Robin Hood stole from the rich and gave to the poor, feminism steals from men and gives to women. One of the reasons Robin Hood was so popular was because the rich were always portrayed as villains and the poor as helpless victims, which is exactly what feminism does – except men are the villains and women the helpless victims.

This is how feminism, disguised as a fight for gender equality, is so appealing to so many people. But unlike Robin Hood, feminism is a scam whose perpetrators should be tried as criminals for the unjust treatment of men, and the systematic destruction of families and society as a whole.

Simply put, feminism is a scam – a wealth transfer – wealth that men have earned is stolen and given to women.

So my question to you is simple: Is feminism really about the fight for gender equality or is it about the fight for female supremacy masquerading as the fight for gender equality?

A message to those on the fence about men's rights

April 20, 2015 | by Danny Baines | Link | Original Link

Editor's note: This article is also available in Spanish.

So, you've heard about men's rights activism. You are curious to know more. How could such a maligned movement possibly be valid? You stumble upon A Voice For Men. You see outrageous headlines. They confirm your fears that the movement is full of misogynists. You laugh for a while. We've all been there. The activists seem bitter and angry. They say some very inappropriate things.

The question in your mind is this: Why do people get drawn into this movement? I was one of those people drawn in, and I've stayed. So I know the answer.

We all know how bad women have it. We've read about all the rapes. We've read about how women are questioned and disbelieved when reporting rape. We've read about the single women struggling to raise children with an absentee father failing to pay his child support. We've read about FGM. We've read about domestic violence. We've heard about the sexualization of women in the media. We are, quite frankly, disgusted with the behavior of men.

Maybe you accept that men can have it hard in some ways. But that doesn't invalidate feminism, surely? OK so men might have it hard sometimes, but you wouldn't go as far as saying they need a movement, right? You wouldn't be that extremist, right?

Right?

The following are areas of men's rights activism, and how they relate to extremism. This list is by NO means complete!

1. Domestic violence

We know women are victims of domestic violence. So why deny it? The thing is, men's right's activists don't deny it. We say that domestic violence is 50% by men, 50% by women. This statistic comes from 300 different studies, as shown in the Fiebert Bibliography. (1) MRA's belief that both genders are victims is shown on whiteribbon.org.

In other words, MRAs believe the problem isn't any gender's fault. Which position is more extremist? Saying that just one group of people is responsible for everything bad, or sharing the blame equally?

2. Genital mutilation

We all know that women are the victims of FGM. Why do men's rights activists have to derail the conversation? Why distract us with male circumcision issues all the time? The thing is, cutting off the foreskin is the same as FGM type 1, which also removes outer skin. In some circumcisions, the frenulum is removed. This is the same as removing the clitoris in FGM type 2. The rarest and worst type of FGM is type 3, which has no parallel in male circumcision.

But… you may note that FGM is illegal in every single western nation on the planet, (2) and has never been practiced in western culture throughout the whole of history. And we live in the west. Our campaigns affect the west. So which is more extremist? Focusing on an issue which causes 0% of the suffering, or focusing on an issue which causes 100% of the suffering? No child is capable of choosing mutilation, regardless of any minor coincidental medical benefits. It has always been a religious practice designed to oppress men's sexuality.

3. Sexualized body image

We all know that women are portrayed sexually everywhere in the media. The thing is, so are men. After you've finished walking down your local Walgreen's or Rite Aid's makeup section, take a walk down the aisle dedicated to muscle supplements, or look at the fitness magazine covers, or the deodorant adverts. Take a look at the romance novel section. Ask yourself, when was the last time you saw a man looking that good in real life? Ask yourself how easy it is for a man to live up to that body image? Are they photoshopped?

Which position is more extremist? That only women suffer from sexualization, or that only men suffer from sexualization? The answer is neither. The thing is, MRAs don't deny women are sexualized. They only point out that men are sexualized too, because who else will say it? Surely the middle ground is pointing out that both genders are even. It may be hard on us all, but we all have a basic instinct to look good for the opposite sex!

4. Child support

We all know of the deadbeat dads. They run off and leave a poor woman struggling to raise children on her own. Did you know that 70% of divorces are initiated by women? (3) That women desire custody of the children in 90% of cases anyway? Did you know that 75% of men fall into child support arrears because they lost their jobs? (4) Did you know that even when they can't pay, they are imprisoned, lose their driving licenses, and can't vote?

So which position is more extremist? Focusing on deadbeat dads and blaming them for the helplessness of single women? Or, focusing on men as victims of a situation beyond their control? Isn't it more extremist to blame the victim? Men are more often in the situations which we, as a society, put them in and want them in.

5. Patriarchy We all know that men are at the head of everything. As owners of the system, they dominate and control women who have no power. By extension, men are to blame for everything. This is patriarchy. However, what are our gender roles? Men carry out their roles for society, just as women do. Women have always crossed those bridges men designed and built. They have always lived in those houses. Whether through taxation benefits or marriage, women have always shared in wealth of even the highest earning men. Children become what you make of them. Did you know that almost all children are raised by women?

So which position is more extremist? Believing that men are in charge of everything, so by extension, we live in a patriarchy? Or believing that women control us all for the first third of our lives, encourage us to succeed in our gender role, then spend our money? In this way, we could extend blame to women for literally every ill in the entire world. It's matriarchy. But here’s the thing. An MRA may believe in smashing a matriarchy. Or, he sees traditional gender roles as even and fair. He’s either just as extremist as a feminist, or, he’s taken a middle road and isn’t extremist at all!

So next time you read A Voice For Men, read all the anger, the parody, the farce, and see the ridiculous jokes, ask yourself if that anger is justified.

If the opponents of men’s rights see us as extremist, ask yourself if that’s really the case. If someone saw your views as extremist, and they were wrong, ask yourself if you’d take the mickey out of those people? Ask yourself if you’d joke about them? Ask yourself if you’d write sarcastically?

Imagine that you are not an extremist. And still, nobody listens to your important concerns. Imagine if your important concerns being so frowned upon that you got blamed for everything bad that has ever happened in the entire world. Wouldn’t your humor be tinged with bitterness? Wouldn’t you confront those telling lies about you?

I think you would.

Any word anyone writes on the Internet is there to be judged by all. That’s the nature of the beast. All we ask is that you judge with your mind clear and your eyes open.

What if Chris Copeland were a raped woman?

April 20, 2015 | by Ty Henry | Link | Original Link

> "I want to thank all the fans, friends, teammates, coaches and the Pacers organization for their support and prayers during this time. I also want to apologize to everyone, particularly the NBA and the Pacers for my bad choice at being out at that time. I am doing as well as can be expected and I will work hard to make a full recovery."
> -Statement from Chris Copeland

What if Chris Copeland were a female athlete found assaulted and/or raped? Would the foregoing statement be issued, or would the premise behind it be met with anything but outrage prior to its public dissemination? Indeed, would anyone even foresee a need for it?

Those are the squirm-inducing questions, in the aftermath of the events of April 8.

For those not in the know, Copeland is a backup forward with the Indiana Pacers of the NBA. Copeland is also married to Katrine Saltara, with whom he was enjoying an evening on the town, culminating with a brief side trip at 10ak Club in New York City into the wee hours.

As Copeland and his wife exited, they, along with another unnamed woman, were stabbed by a knife wielding lowlife. Luckily, the wounds were treatable and Copeland and Saltara were rushed to the hospital.

The timbre of the conversation topics that ensued reflect the gendered cognitive dissonance in a public discourse where "blaming the victim" is supposedly verboten. Why then, did the general discussion about Copeland involve some combination of the following?:

"What was he doing out at 4am?"

"Should NBA players have curfews?"

"Why did he put his team in jeopardy?"

"Nothing Good happens after (insert random, arbitrary time)am."

Because our collective comfort and relative tolerance with even passive/aggressive victim blaming appears contingent on Y chromosomes. So a few provocative things bear speaking aloud.

Theresa Braeckell bears no blame for what Missouri Running Back Derrick Washington did to her in 2010. Jerry Sandusky's victims did not "entice" him. Ma'lik Richmond and Trent Mays bear full responsibility for what occurred in a Steubenville bedroom, as do Brandon Vandenburg and Corey Batey for what occurred at Vanderbilt University.

Here's what's also true. Kassandra Perkins and Steve McNair are the same.

Cherica Adams and Fred Lane are the same.

Rihanna and Ivan Brannam (Jennifer Capriati's domestic violence victim) are the same.

And Chris Copeland is the same as the recent spring break gang rape and shooting victims. All deserve our compassion, support and redress in the form of state imposed penalties for the agents of their suffering.

Full S-T-O-P.

So Chris Copeland, a reserve athlete who plays little, is out with his wife a full 16 hours before he is due at work. Why shouldn't he be? After all, the cycle of NBA life is largely nocturnal. Most games are at night, and teams frequently spend a week or more away from home, where players often sleep during the day. When one factors in that he had his wits about him and wasn't causing a ruckus, what's the problem?

Because of our collective impulse to apply the "You Shoulda Seen It Coming" doctrine to men, regardless of circumstance.

Credit should be extended to those who refused to take the bait. Gregg Doyel mocked those who assailed Copeland for throwing himself into an assailant's brandished knife. Vice Sports' Dan O'Sullivan displays a level of moral clarity and consistency that others lacked, differentiating between "bad choices and bad luck" and pointing out that Copeland "owes an apology to no one." Unfortunately, there were far too few of them.

Fortunately, Copeland wasn't openly mocked like pro golfer Robert Allenby. Allenby reported being assaulted, kidnapped and robbed outside a Honolulu bar after a tournament round. While there are certainly details in Allenby's account which warrant scrutiny, and journalists are duty bound to apply critical thinking to any allegation, he certainly incurred more demonstrable injuries than UVa's Jackie did, so an attack is not out of the question, even if, as some believe, he may have "fallen down drunk" after leaving a club. Indeed, at least one local woman observed an altercation of some sort.

But never mind Mr. Allenby. Whatever happened, he must'a had it coming.

If this echo sounds familiar, it should. When Oakland University basketball players Duke Mondy and Dante Williams were falsely accused of rape, Coach Greg Kampe had no issue suspending them , saying that the players, not the false accuser, "put themselves and our basketball team and, more importantly, Oakland University, in this situation." The Sports Reporters' Mitch Albom suggested that athletes learn a lesson from the Jameis Winston case, not to "put themselves in that position." Even Brian Banks, it seems, has internalized to some degree the Cult Of Male Self-Loathing the NFL has adopted in the wake of the league's capitulation to the Gender Grievance Industrial Complex, stating someone accused should sit so as "not to draw attention to himself."

With murder/domestic violence victim Steve McNair, it was "he is a cheater, why shouldn't we spit on his grave."

With domestic violence victim Tiger Woods, it was "why was he poking the pies of Perkin's waitresses" instead of "why isn't Elin Woods in custody?"

Why was Chris Copeland out with his wife at 4am? I really couldn't care less. Those who do care, given the context, are the ones who owe Chris Copeland, and humanity, an apology.

Calgary Comic Con sponsors need to hear your voice

April 20, 2015 | by Matt Karlsson | Link | Original Link

I'm going to assume you know the basics of what happened to the Honey Badgers at the Calgary Comic Convention just a few days ago. Mundane Matt's videos are a good primer; if you haven't watched them, do so now to get an idea of what happened. Some aspects of the situation are still unclear. I freely admit that.

That is irrelevant to what I have to say to you.

I have no time for those who seek to limit free speech. Let's be blunt, right up front: I consider censorship pathetic cowardice. I consider it weak-minded bullying. I consider it the refuge of the inadequate. That's at best. At worst, it is nothing more and nothing less than totalitarianism, regardless of its origin. It is a road paved with skulls, as history has repeatedly shown.

Sure, let's hear arguments about 'shouting fire in a crowded theater' and where the limits lie. I'm all for it, because I'm all for the inviolable right to speak ones' mind. Let's argue politics; I'm sure a lot of you would disagree with mine, and I welcome a healthy debate. Who knows? One of us might change our mind. That's the beauty of the concept, the open debate, the sparking of ideas from mind to mind, the alchemy of new thoughts created simply by exchanging old ones. That freedom is a beautiful thing, and leads to more beautiful things, as well as terrible and mundane and everything in between. We are adults, however, and as long as the words remain words, we can handle it.

Can't we?

Not the Calgary Comic Con people. They have shown themselves to be weak-minded. They bent under the shrilling of a few loud voices. They banished political diversity because it scared them or offended them. Whatever their justification, they have censored us.

This is not okay.

While I am well aware this would not fall under any Canadian federal statute, as it is not the government seeking to limit the Honey Badgers' speech. We can't seek recourse that way. But our excellent Badgers raised $10,000; our excellent community donated $10,000; the City of Calgary, local businesses and the Comic Con are now richer by some amount just under $10,000.

That is bullshit.

As I said, however, the law does not seem to apply. Perhaps, as some commenters in other articles have said, there are legal recourses that can be pursued, and I urge people to pursue them vigorously. But those mills grind slow, and they grind, sadly, ever less fine.

So where can we go? Where is our refuge?

Where we can find refuge is in our speech, in our voices, in our emails and twitter-blasts.

It is already in our hands. We just have to exercise it.

Nice guy that I am, I'll even drop you the links:

info@calgaryexpo.com

Or if you prefer an indirect approach:

sponsors@calgaryexpo.com

Let us be the loud voice this time. Send them an email. Express your displeasure. Shine a light on this sad attempt to silence an unpopular (they seem to think, anyway) opinion. Demand an apology and, most of all, a refund. That is the sharpest cut of all: tell them with one voice that as they have taken, so we shall not give. Not one cent. Not one minute. Not one good word. With one voice, tell the sponsors that your days of using their services, of even considering setting foot in Calgary or the convention, are over. Finished. Done. That you will encourage everyone you know to do the same. Let them know their attempt to quash free speech is not only noticed, but it will be held up for shame and scorn as long as the Internet lasts.

No free speech for us, no money for them. It's that simple to say.

I have raised my voice. I ask you to do the same.

Feminists further cheapen rape with “My family raped me”

Feminism is not the only problem in the world for men, nor is it the cause of all men’s problems. But holy shit, is everybody sick of feminism yet? And if not why not?

Chivalry but equality: the feminist double-standard

Author Warren Farrell has written in detail on how the feminist movement has freed women from the old role women were formerly forced into by circumstance and by chivalrous laws. Men, however, have not been freed and there is no effort whatsoever by mainstream culture to liberate them from their role as provider/protector/performer.

Men are expected to treat women like helpless, delicate flowers one day and then the next, we are supposed to forget that they were helpless and see them as competent enough to make half of the decisions in relationships or the workplace. We are directed to believe women capable of making good decisions. If we note the hypocrisy, we are called misogynists.

When women are asked what they want in a relationship a sizeable portion of them will say that they want a man who will provide them with some measure of chivalry but one who can also “isn’t afraid of an independent woman”.

These are the same independent women who are often overly paranoid of men but the second they get a flat tire at the side of the road or their car gets stuck in the snow, they can magically trust any unrelated man in the city to come along and change her tire for her or push her out of the snow. No fear, no suspicion. Just the expectation, in fact the promise, of chivalry.

The accumulative burden of constantly supporting this double-helping of entitlement eventually wears men down and has led an increasing number of men to the conclusion that dating is simply not worth it.

The feminist movement, which claims to be driven by an overriding desire for equality has reinforced and demanded that women be given both equality and chivalry, and this message is interwoven within much of what feminism pushes for.

Sometimes the message is more explicit than implicit and I have gathered some of the more remarkable examples of it here for your viewing pleasure. First up is an article from Bustle.com titled “Can You Be a Feminist And Still Expect Guys to Pay?”

She goes on to add:

> "Of course, at the end of dinner or drinks, I'll make a very convincing slow-motion gesture towards my wallet, which gets progressively slower until he tells me that he's got the bill."

So not only is she dishonest in her philosophical outlook but she's also dishonest with her body language and her expectations of her dates. I hope she's not confused about why she doesn't get many second dates.

Let's move on to the next example. This one is from Forbes.com and the feminist author flat-out states that the man being expected to pay on the first date is about sex and she conjures up the mythical gender pay gap as an excuse:

Forbes

Men Should Pay on First Dates and That Does Not Undermine Feminism

Erika Johnson

FOLLOW

If there is a singular conversation starter about gender and money it is this:

Who pays on the first date?

As women make huge huge gains in family medical leave and gaining seats on corporate boards and in Congress, dating expectations barely budge. The status quo is that men pay on first dates. Last week NerdWallet released the results of a survey that found 77 percent of straight people believe men should pay on first dates — a sentiment held by 82 percent of men and 72 percent of women. I am one of those women. I have no financial reason not to pay for my own $29 grilled farm-raised salmon on a first outing with a man. But I really, really prefer if he coolly assumes the bill and slips the server his Visa.

It's not about snagging a rich husband or a free meal.

It's about sex.

Comment Now

This author elaborates further:

> "The other reason men should pay for dates? It's easy-peasy. The navigation of gender politics is an anxiety-inducing daily grind. Women resent they earn less, care for children more and are expected to wax every last hair from their mons pubis before going on the date in the first place."

She can't even be honest about her gold digging nor about the fact that she is a glorified prostitute but there it is in the fine print.

On to the next example. This one is from Elite Daily:

ELITE DAILY

Chivalry Isn't Dead: Why Feminists Still Want A Gentleman

Sarah MacKenzie in Dating

> "[L]et's get one thing straight: I am a feminist through and through. Raised as one of three daughters, it was always without question that I would attend college and pursue a fulfilling career…
> But, I value and appreciate true gentlemen because it subtly reveals a more caring, sensitive and genuine side that most males are not willing to broadcast or expose…
> So, pay attention, boys, because it certainly does not go unnoticed when you do little things like pay for a first date or open a door for a lady….it really does reveal a hell of a lot more about a male as the gentlemen he is and not just a boy."

So if you aren't willing to pay for her dates and open her doors like she's royalty that means you aren't worthy of even being called a man!!!! And what do you get in exchange for acting as her servant? You receive the graces of her holy presence, of course! You will notice that there is never any mention in any of these feminist rantings about what women are obligated to do on these dates other than being there and not looking like shit.

This next example is so extreme that the feminist in this one not only expects you to pay for the date, but she openly expects you to walk on the side of traffic on the sidewalk and demonstrate pride in your male disposability:

GLAMOUR SEX ♥ DATING

Sweetness

I'm a Feminist and I Still Want These 7 Gentlemanly Gestures. Do You?

By Jillian Kramer · 1 hour ago

S he couldn't believe he would dare hold open the door for her. "I'm perfectly capable of opening a door myself," my feminist friend quipped as she walked briskly through the opening to the restaurant on a recent date. As she retold the story later with equal gusto and disgust, so put-off that this man thought she needed his help, I simply replied, "Perhaps the poor guy was just trying to be a gentleman."

I like to think of myself as a feminist too, but I find gentlemanly gestures to be respectful and kind, not demeaning, toward our sex. In fact, don't show them to me and I'm likely to show you the door. If you're with me, here are seven acts we're sure to appreciate.

> "1. Hold open the door… Yes, I have hands capable of wrapping around a handle, arms able to pull or push a door ajar—but a man reaching for it first, saving me the effort, is oh so sweet if only because it isn't necessary.
> 2. Walk on the side of traffic. My guy does this now, and while he's yet to save me from a barreling bus or a wave disguised as a puddle, it's nice to know he would. It's a protective gesture that lets me know I'm more important than his safety or comfort."

See that? She revels in the knowledge that her man thinks of himself as an expendable knight. The thought of his potential death delights her.

And last, but not least, let's take a look at the most recent example of the feminist media telling us that women deserve equality and chivalry at the same time.

Opinion: Chivalry, not gender politics, dictates who pays for that first date

Men who refuse to pay for a first date may find themselves left on the shelf

CAN a woman be a feminist and still expect a man to pay for a first date?

> "[A]re the ideals of feminism and the convention of a man paying for a first date incompatible?
> I say no. Emphatically no.
> I don't believe it's paradoxical to argue for women's rights and equality, yet at the same time think a man should cough up for a couple's first excursion, whether it costs him $50 or $500."

Whether it's $50 or $500? She emphasizes the fact that whether it costs him a little or costs him a lot, it will cost him. This is what men are up against in today's dating scene and why courtship is dying. By far, the most dramatic display of women's entitled, double-helping of privilege was broadcast by President Barack Obama when he implied that First Lady Michelle Obama deserved equal pay for being his wife.

> "President Barack Obama used anecdotal evidence of his female-dominated household to connect with women during a town hall Wednesday, adding that "there is clearly not equal pay in the White House."
> "Let me say, Michelle would point out that first ladies get paid nothing. So there is clearly not equal pay in the White House, when it comes to her and me," the President said to the invitation-only audience gathered in Charlotte.
> "But before we were in the White House, I wanted to make sure Michelle got paid as much as she could … If she had a bigger paycheck, then that made us able to pay the bills," Obama said. "Why would I want my spouse or my daughter discriminated against? That doesn't make any sense."

So Obama admits that Michelle partakes of the chivalrous role of housewife, yet she dominates his household and deserves equal pay. Not from his wallet, but from the chivalry-derived paychecks of the taxpayer, of course.

Now don't get me wrong, I do not have a problem with chivalry nor equality in a relationship. If a couple decides that the man is to take on the more prominent role of provider and protector, that's fine with me as long as in exchange for this he is allowed to make the final decisions in the home while the woman plays second fiddle.

It goes without saying that a chivalrous relationship is a must when a woman is pregnant and needs someone to watch over her and without a doubt this arrangement has enabled the human species to survive for ages, but today women do not have to get pregnant, and thus we can choose equality in a relationship.

If the couple chooses equality, then the woman needs to be paying her half as much as possible and not expecting the man to be expendable and protect her as though she's helpless. It's up to men to force women to choose which role they want to play and to hold them to it. Every woman who wants to have her cake and eat it too needs to be disowned and kicked to the curb.

Men also need to do a better job of calling out this nonsense culturally whenever they see it and we need to do a better job at supporting other men who already are. Raising our daughters to not view themselves as entitled princesses, like the feminist authors showcased in this article, also goes a long way to changing our culture for the better.

I made him remember my name

Editor's note: The following poem submitted to us by Men's Human Rights Ireland, is published with permission of the author, Shawnda Kettles.

This poem is also available in Spanish.

We are in a writers group on facebook and come across many different stories, articles and poems.

We thought we'd share this with the world.

I made him remember my name

I made him remember my name.
From the first moment he met me
I made sure that I would find a way
To be a permanent part of his memory.
I wanted him all to myself.
All for myself.
All by myself.
And I was determined to have him.
He told me I was different.
I told him to his own words he should probably listen….And take heed
Because he didn't know just how true
Those words that he spoke
Would cause his life to almost be choked
And beaten
And threatened
Out of his control.
I made him remember my name.
See, when he met me,
I didn't appear threatening
To his well being
Or his emotional feelings.
I'm classy with a great smile,
An endearing personality by the mile

And enough charisma to put a person in denial….
About who I really am.
He thought he had the upper hand,

And I let him think it.

That's the trick to this game,
To let your opponent think they are winning it.

But I quickly lured him in Little by little
To this deadly web that I spin.
I did everything for him and I never let him forget it.
I controlled all of the money including how he spent it.
I made him remember my name.
I made him believe that I was just a woman catering to her man
But what I was truly doing was gaining the upper hand.
I gave him love better than he ever received
I fulfilled the physical desires that his body need.
I gained his love.
I gained his trust.
I gained his dependency.
I gained his lust.
And once I had all of that
Then I had all of him.
And I held onto it
But I chipped away at it.
Piece…
By piece…
By piece.
So subtly….
That he didn't even know I was doing it.
I made him remember my name.
I would build him up extremely high
But break him down twice as deep.
I would tell him that I hated him
And turn around and say I needed him
With the same breath.
I would get angry and destroy his things
I would tell him that he couldn't be loved by anyone else.
As long as I was happy,
He was safe.
If I was unhappy
He paid for it with his face.
I made sure he always would question if I mean it.
But I beat him so bad I made him think I had the penis.
But what did I care?
Who would believe him?
Who could he turn to?
With whom could he share?

Everyone would dismiss his verbal pleas
Saying he was a man
And I am a vessel that’s weak.
They would tell him to man up
And make him feel shame
But what do I care.
I made him remember my name.

This one got to me straight away

Having suffered domestic abuse myself years ago I thought this poem exactly showed me what domestic abuse can be through the eyes of an abuser,

Too often people ignore male victims because they are bigger and stronger than the females who go out to kill their spirit by a thousand cuts.

FAQ: ICMI ’15 ticket prices and program content

April 22, 2015 | by Susan Morris | Link | Original Link

There have been some comments and some direct questions about the differences between this year’s and last year’s conference, particularly about there being fewer speakers on the program this year and the ticket price being higher. As Conference Manager, I think you are entitled to receive some answers.

Last year, in our naïvety and enthusiasm, we overbooked the number of speakers for the two-day event. During the conference it became clear that the program was too full and did not allow enough time for decent length talks followed by full question and answer sessions. This year we have arranged ten speakers. Each speaker will give a talk of 35 minutes followed by a 10 minute question and answer session. And this year we will ensure that we start each session on time.

Dr. Tara Palmatier will be Master of Ceremonies and she will also be a member of the 90 minute discussion panel which will be moderated by Sage Gerard. The other five members of the panel will be announced shortly.

The conference is not just about hearing the speakers or asking questions in the panel discussion but also about meeting up with your fellow MHRAs. And so, as requested by attendees at last year’s conference, in drawing up the program we have allowed more time for you to network.

We have extended the afternoon break and the lunch time and we will be opening the doors each day at 8am. So, provided you arrive early, you will have over eight hours across the two days to mingle with other attendees and to network. And that’s not including the time spent at the evening events, socializing and networking with other like-minded people over dinner or pizza.

We’re arranging an optional taxi service to collect you from your hotel and take you to the venue and then to return you afterwards, whether after the conference program finishes for the day or after the dinner or pizza evening events.

Not long after last year’s conference I was appointed conference manager for ICMI ’15 and I immediately asked attendees, speakers and staff for feedback regarding their experience of ICMI ’14.

As you know, protesters’ threats led to the DoubleTree Hilton Hotel ensuring that we had to find a new venue for the conference at very short notice. We were exceedingly lucky and very thankful that the VFW Base at St Clair Shores was able to offer us a place to hold the conference.

It was clear from the attendees’ feedback that, given the emergency conditions we’d been working under, they understood the limitations of the venue and the catering arrangements and indeed, they congratulated us on managing to make the conference actually happen. However, it was also clear that they expected this year’s event to be rather more professional, both in venue and in proceedings.

Our overriding concern has been to choose a venue which would withstand the sort of pressures which the protesters levelled at the DoubleTree Hilton and which they also tried to inflict on the VFW Base. Fortunately for us, the Commander and his staff were made of sterner stuff.

It took time to find the right venue but I am quite sure we have found one which you will like. Inevitably, it costs more than the DoubleTree Hotel would have done or the VFW Base did but it isn't glitzy or too expensive for our or your pockets.

The protesters from last year have already vowed to shut us down this year and though we know they will not achieve their aim, they will still be protesting (as is their right, of course). Security and safety of our attendees, speakers and volunteer staff will always be of prime importance and so, to avoid a repeat of last year's emergency appeal for funding, we have built into the costs added but reasonable security cover.

Another reason which people tend to forget is the cost of flying in the speakers and volunteer staff and accommodating them all. Between speakers, panel discussion members and staff, we'll have some forty-five people there. Whilst all concerned are giving their time for free, the travel and accommodation costs mount up alarmingly. It takes time to set up the conference hall properly and so we cannot just arrive at the venue the day before the conference.

I'm afraid it all adds up and the price of the ticket has been the subject of much discussion in our conference management group. Contrary to the headline which I saw somewhere, the ticket price has not been set at $649!

Unfortunately last year's ticket price was set before all the costs had been worked out and did not cover anywhere near all the expenditure which was incurred, which means that the price was set unrealistically low. By the time we realised, the tickets had been on sale for some weeks and there was nothing we could do about the price.

So overall, comparing last year's and this year's ticket prices is not a straight comparison. And I'm sorry that because of last year's unrealistic price, this year's price may have come as a surprise to some people who would like to attend.

We know that people have travel and hotel costs on top of the ticket price and we do not want to price people out of being able to attend but neither can we afford to make a loss again. And so you see the ticket pricing structure which we arrived at. Contrary to the efforts made by our detractors to blacken our name, the ticket price is not aimed at making a profit but breaking even would be nice.

As you'll see from the e-ticket store we have a new purchasing system which is part of a new pre-registration system. It will make it much quicker for all attendees when they arrive on the first day of the conference and will also allow us to refine our catering plans by knowing in advance how many people to expect.

The Early Bird Discount ensures that if you purchase your ticket by the 30th of April, you will only pay $399. Buy it between 1 May and 30 June and you'll still get it at a good discount, at the price of $449. The price will increase in $50 steps until it gets to the buy-at-the-door price of $649 and we expect very few, if any, to do so. In fact, that price has been set to deter people from doing so, so that they don’t hold up those people who have been entered into the pre-registration system and only need to book in.

A sub section will be set up on the Forum soon, so that you can make arrangements with fellow attendees, to meet up and even perhaps to share hotel accommodation.

We on the conference management team have spent months making our plans for ICMI ’15 and are excitedly looking forward to it. We are promising you a pretty good event (says she with typical British understatement!).

I shall be flying in to Houston from the UK. It will be my first flight, a long one around ten hours and I can’t say I’m looking forward to it. But the end result will be worth it. I am looking forward to meeting as many of you as I can.

I hope you’ll come and say hello. You’ll find me quite easily. I’ll be the woman clutching a clipboard and looking permanently harassed. I did think about wearing pearls and clutching those but I’m told that might give the wrong impression.

Awakened with a kiss: sexual assault

Editor's note: This article is also available in Spanish and Portuguese.

If you have the slightest doubt that colleges don't have the foggiest idea how to handle claims of sexual assault, look no further than Brandeis University.

A student was accused of sexually assaulting a fellow student, with whom he had been in a nearly two-year romantic relationship. The couple eventually broke up, but remained friendly. Then, suddenly, in January 2014, the accuser alleged that the accused had initiated non-consensual interactions dating to 2011. Based on a vague allegation of sexual assault, the accused student was placed on "emergency suspension."

Brandeis skipped its regular hearing process – who needs fair processes? -and called in a big gun to investigate: Elizabeth Sanghavi, one of the authors of the Department of Education's dreadful "Dear Colleague" letter. Sanghavi interviewed both parties but elected not to put anyone under oath or record the interviews. According to Prof. KC Johnson, "The accused student had no right to counsel, and no right to see his accuser's testimony, much less to cross-examine the accuser."

Sanghavi concluded that the first time the two students had slept together, the accused committed sexual assault. The fact that this "assault" led to a 21-month relationship did not raise red flags for Sanghavi that perhaps the interaction really was consensual.

Sanghavi also found the accused guilty of nonconsensual sexual conduct because he sometimes awoke the accuser with a kiss, the same as countless couples in intimate relationships do every day around the globe. No matter, Sanghavi held. The accused waking the accuser with a kiss counted as "sexual assault because sleep is a 'state of incapacitation'" and, hence, the accused student took "sexual advantage of incapacitation," according to a lawsuit suit filed by the accuser.

Brandeis punished the "rapist" with a Disciplinary Warning, and no suspension. But the accused student claims in a lawsuit that Brandeis allowed the investigator's findings to be made public, and as a result, he was let go from an internship with a "high-ranking elected official" and had job offers withdrawn.

Now the Department of Education's Office for Civil Rights (OCR) is investigating Brandeis for potentially violating the accused student's Title IX rights. That's a positive thing, but why would OCR go to bat for an accused male? It may have something to do with the fact that the accused student is gay, said the College Fix.

I failed to mention that both the accuser and the accused here are male.

No matter. The investigation is a good thing, and perhaps it will lead to a positive precedent for all students. Because at some point, someone has to put a stop to this madness. Schools can't tackle accusations of sexual assault by checking their common sense at the front door, and that's what the sexual grievance industry insists they do (and that's one reason schools shouldn't be in the business of adjudicating sexual assault

Yes, it is beyond dispute that kissing a sleeping person can be offensive contact. But shouldn't it be viewed in context, and in light of all the surrounding circumstances? Are we supposed to simply ignore the fact that this particular couple was involved in a long-term sexual relationship, where partners negotiate boundaries in myriad, often subtle ways, and where they typically develop a course of conduct that is qualitatively different, and far more complex, than the barnyard rutting of couples who've hooked up for a one-night stand?

Newsflash: long-term couples generally are perfectly fine with – I dare say they enjoy – being awakened by a kiss. If this were sexual assault, it is fair to assert that a significant percentage of people in long-term relationships, probably most, are every bit as guilty. To suggest that such interactions are in the same galaxy as sexual assault is not just silly, it borders on pathology.

And that goes to the crux of the matter. The people who now dominate both public policy and the public discourse on sexual assault seem to lack the personal experience – dare I say "maturity"? – to have such responsibility. It is time for them to take their rightful place at the kids' table and to yield the floor to adults who aren't driven by a hysterical, angry, political agenda.

April 23, 2015 | by James Jackson | Link | Original Link

There has been a push lately by many to get the face of a woman on the $20 bill. The justification for this is that there are currently no women on any U.S. coins or paper money. My knee-jerk comeback would be: “So what?” We also do not have any gays (that we are sure of), African-Americans, Puerto Ricans, American Somoans, Whigs, baseball players, porn actors, Kardashians, or short-haired blue-eyed American-Water-Spaniel therapy dogs. Just because a group is not represented does not mean it deserves to be. But upon further reflection, there is no reason all of the faces on money need to be white men. Surely, there are qualified candidates in all of these groups that deserve a shot. (My guess is that Kim Kardashian is the most qualified since her face and butt are everywhere else and she owns most of the money anyway).

But what about women? Have they had any representation?

Here’s a bit of interesting history for you: there were no men on U.S. coins before the 1859 Indian cent. However there was one idealized woman on most all coins.

Miss Liberty was on 41 different coin designs before 1859 and has been on about 70 coin designs in total. (In my counts, I am including coins that the populace may have had in their pockets and am excluding commemoratives, gold colds, platinum coins, etc.) There was Liberty Cap Facing Left, Liberty Cap Facing Right, Draped Bust, Flowing Hair, Braided Hair, Liberty Seated, Standing Liberty, Walking Liberty and many variations of these designs and others. Even the Mercury dime actually pictured Miss Liberty. Add 4 women on state coins and Susan B Anthony and Sacajawea for a total of 76 women on coin designs. I count 64 men on coin designs and this includes 24 Presidential Dollars, which frankly, I have never seen. [1]

Paper currency is more difficult to determine, since there is more room for pictures. I ignored people in the background. I counted each group of men or women in the foreground as one. Using this method, I counted 134 men and 41 women on U.S. paper currency. [2]

If we are really looking for diversity on our money, I would say other groups deserve a chance before any more women. But since women are the largest group of voters and very self-indulgent, I think I can safely bet an Alexander Hamilton that a woman will soon be on the $20 bill. But which woman? Here are the 15 women that the group Women On 20s have promoted as candidates: Alice Paul, Betty Friedan, Shirley Chisholm, Sojournor Truth, Rachel Carson, Rosa Parks, Barbara Jordan, Margaret Sanger, Patsy Mink, Clara Barton, Harriet Tubman, Frances Perkins, Susan B. Anthony, Eleanor Roosevelt, and Elizabeth Cady Stanton.

I think I can safely say that if a man had the same resume as any of these women, he would never be considered for face-time on money. But since we often have a lower standard for women and we will pick one, which woman is the most qualified?

I would eliminate Alice Paul, Betty Friedan, Susan B. Anthony, Patsy Mink and Elizabeth Cady Stanton from the start. They were full-time women's activists. Self-indulgent women selected the 15 candidates, so it is no surprise that they would select women's activists. But both men and women have suffered due to their gender roles, and to fight to end women's restrictions but not men's, I find this totally sexist, selfish, and disqualifying. I would say that Warren Farrell would be a more deserving candidate since he has fought for both women's and men's rights, but no one would push for his picture to be on money, assuming he were dead. (Being dead is a requirement for being on American money and Farrell is very much alive, but you get my point).

Shirley Chisholm, Sojournor Truth, Barbara Jordan, and Harriet Tubman have fought for women's rights as well as African-Americans' rights. Again, fighting for women's rights without also advocating for men's rights is disqualifying in my mind. But did their fights for African-Americans' rights overcome this problem? Shirley Chisholm's focus was women's rights, not African-Americans' rights. Sojournor Truth, born a slave in New York, was basically an abolitionist lecturer, and as such, unremarkable. I also find Congresswoman Barbara Jordan's accomplishments uninspiring, and she is known for the very sexist remark: "I believe that women have a capacity for understanding and compassion which a man structurally does not have. He does not have it because he cannot have it. He's just incapable of it." [3] Harriet Tubman, on the other hand, escaped from slavery, helped hundreds of other slaves escape through the Underground Railroad, was a leader in the abolitionist movement, and served as a nurse, scout and spy for the North during the Civil War. I would consider her a viable candidate for U.S. currency.

Rosa Parks was strictly a civil rights activist, and in my opinion, quite unremarkable in her accomplishments. She refused to give her seat to a white person on a Montgomery, Alabama bus which sparked a campaign by the NAACP to boycott the bus system. For this she was arrested and received a fine of $14. Besides this, she and her husband were fired from their jobs and moved to Detroit to find work. That seems to be the extent of her sacrifice. I can imagine that a black man in her situation would have been beaten or possibly killed. Martin Luther King, Jr. and E.D. Nixon, the leaders of the boycott, both had their homes destroyed by bombings. Not qualified.

Margaret Sanger was an advocate for contraception and family planning, but again, mostly for women. She established an organization which became Planned Parenthood. However, Sanger's ideas were popular in Europe and probably would have come to the United States without her. Sanger was arrested in 1914, but jumped bail and fled to England—hardly the move of an American hero. She told the story of Sadie Sachs in her speeches, a woman who died after a self-inflicted abortion and apparently fictional. She also was racist, and an advocate of eugenics. Not qualified.

Eleanor Roosevelt also fought for women's rights, and more generally, human rights, but again, not specifically men's rights. Roosevelt instituted the planned community of Arthurdale, West Virginia—which failed. She advocated for equal application of New Deal programs to African-Americans, defended Japanese-Americans after Pearl Harbor, helped working women receive higher wages, banned male reporters from her press conferences, lobbied for the immigration of groups persecuted by the Nazis, lobbied for government-sponsored day care, was a delegate to the United Nations General Assembly, was instrumental in drafting the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, chaired the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, and chaired the Presidential Commission on the Status of Women. It is a close call, but I do not believe she is qualified to be on our currency. I believe that the bulk of her resume was due only to her being married to the President.

I find Rachel Carson's contribution quite underwhelming. She wrote a book. Silent Spring helped start the environmental movement.

Clara Barton's humanitarianism led her to help those devastated by war and natural disaster from around the world. She gathered supplies and formed field hospitals in aiding soldiers in the Civil War. She ran the Office of Missing Soldiers after the war. She also brought aid to war-torn Europe and brought the Red Cross to America from Switzerland. The American Red Cross aided flood, earthquake, forest fire, and hurricane victims as well as those ravaged by war. She was also one of the first women to hold a government job in the United States. I consider her qualified.

Frances Perkins was FDR's Secretary of Labor and was instrumental in the establishment of Social Security, the Civilian Conservation Corps, child labor laws, minimum wage, and unemployment insurance. I consider her qualified.

In summing up, I do not believe any of the 15 candidates proposed by Women On 20s would even be considered if they were men with the same accomplishments. Of course, women have not been allowed the same opportunities for achievement, so maybe a lower standard is necessary. Even so, I would only consider Tubman, Barton, and Perkins as accomplished enough to be on U.S. currency. I also noticed that 10 of the 15 candidates from Women On 20s were very active women's advocates.

This is one more example of the selfishness of women today, focusing only on those who benefit themselves.

Don’t give up on marriage? Request denied.

Editor’s note: This article is also available in Spanish.

The problems with marriage and relationships that have helped create and sustain MGTOW – Men Going Their Own Way – are not just confined to feminist-generated man-hate. Conservative women and their presumption of control over standards for men’s behavior are also at fault.

Every few months one sees articles, usually appeals by conservative women, imploring men to come back to civilization and somehow fix what feminists have broken: relationships between men and women.

Presumably, these non-feminist conservative women will look on admiringly as men rush to the rescue again.

In response to the “sexodus” of men abandoning both dating and marriage, in December of 2014, an article by Laura Perrins co-editrix of the British publication The Conservative Woman declared:

> [Men on dating] websites are heavily outnumbered by women (perhaps this confirms the sexodus). Sexodus men should know that not all women agree with the third wave feminists who want masculinity to be squashed. Many women do want a partner for life, and not on wholly unreasonable terms either. And remember you only have to find one! Just one. She is out there if you only put down the video game long enough to look.

My comment back then was this:

> Actually, given the divorce rate, men who believe in marriage must find not one, but a series of wives, each willing to settle for less as the ex-wives plunder our wallets.
> Until conservative women rise up in numbers to smite the hairy feminist hordes, don’t expect men, denied any voice on gender issues, to come running back to an estrogenic conflict we know we cannot win.
> #WomenAgainstFeminism are making a difference but need more voices.

The latest article in this genre is by Kathy Gyngell, also a co-editrix of The Conservative Woman. She implored:

> The crux of the matter is where all this leaves children. As [Peter] Lloyd points out:“not having a father leaves a hole in the soul of a child”. The next generation should be of concern to men as much as women. That’s why men playing victim, however badly they have been treated, is no answer. It will not stop that gap. It will just speed up the sexodus.
> The challenge for real men (and real women) is otherwise. It is to challenge > feminism not to ape it.

Guess what, honey: REQUEST DENIED.

Marriage has become utterly useless to men. A married man is a fool. He has married the state, not a woman. The woman is merely the excuse for the state to harvest his labor and savings.

You cannot shame us with that “real men” bullshit any longer. We have broken the chains of obligation without recompense. The gate is open and the stallions are gone. Get the fuck over it.

Women dominate the social structures of society, from the family, to education, to divorce courts, to criminal justice, to every other institution of power. Women voters elect the toadying sycophant men who preside over women’s abattoir for the male gender.

If you want men to join in this fight for you again, with all due respect, you must join us, make it worth our while, and prove yourselves to be worthy, hard-working and compassionate partners to men.

Suck it up, buttercup. Men are sick of your shit and we will not take it any more.

When women like feminist firebrand Shulamith Firestone starve to death alone in their government-supported hovels, the fact of men not caring is not misogyny. It is a learned apathy, an extinction of our bonding instinct, killed piece by piece through societal torture. Our instincts are now undone, except perhaps for avoiding losing battles and enjoying a life independent of women’s endless demands.

We just have more fun things to do than to submit to the brutal slavery to women any longer.

Until YOU fix your own problems, you can jump right off for all we care.

If you see a man who is absurdly happy with his life, rest assured, he has discovered the joy of living as MGTOW. More and more men figure this out every day while you bleat your helplessness.

I know that men can find a joy in solitude that eludes the lonely souls of women. I know it because I found it.

Helplessness is no longer a good look for you, darling.

America’s invisible men

“I am an invisible man. No, I am not a spook like those who haunted Edgar Allan Poe; nor am I one of your Hollywood-movie ectoplasms. I am a man of substance, of flesh and bone, fiber and liquids — and I might even be said to possess a mind. I am invisible, understand, simply because people refuse to see me. Like the bodiless heads you see sometimes in circus sideshows, it is as though I have been surrounded by mirrors of hard, distorting glass. When they approach me they see only my surroundings, themselves, or figments of their imagination — indeed, everything and anything except me.”

The above quotation comes from Ralph Ellison’s classic work “Invisible Man”. Written 63 years ago, it has since been repeatedly hailed as one of America’s most deeply moving and profound works of literary fiction, rooted in Ellison’s “Invisible Negro” narrator, as he tries to navigate a world that sees, at best, only aspects of himself – aspects that are what the viewer wants to see, what is not actually there. As I thought of the latest spate of “missing Black men” stories coming out in the media, I couldn’t help but to think of Ellison, and the powerful work he sired more than six decades ago. Only he would truly, fully appreciate the colossal irony that these current news stories points us all to.

By now, I’m fairly certain everyone reading this has at the very least heard about all of this in passing, but for the record, it all got started with a piece a few weeks back appearing in Forbes and focusing on Ferguson, MO – site of where young Michael Brown, a Black teenager with a complex history, to put it mildly, was shot and killed by police officer Darren Wilson. The Forbes story noted that Ferguson, a small city of just over 21K residents, had the highest percentage of “missing” Black men of any city or municipality in the nation.

Other stories followed – perhaps the best known one to date being the New York Times “Upshot” blogpost that reported three of America’s biggest cities – NYC itself, Chicago and Philadelphia – also had very high rates of “missing” Black men – some 120K for the Big Apple, more than 40K for Chitown and 36K for the City of Brotherly Love. A followup blogpost appearing on the Philly.com website delved a bit more into detail for the grim tale of the tape for my beloved hometown. In all, the tally suggests that there are more Black men “missing” nationwide than the total number of Black men in NYC itself – at something like 1.5 million.

Nor is this anything new, all of the pundits and quants tell us – it has been a steadily growing trend ever since the 1950s (!), with the pace quickening every decade since.

Before I go any further, I would like to suggest that the use of the term “missing” is not only woefully misleading, misguided and sensationalistic – it is also, simply, inaccurate. “Missing” infers that Black men aren’t where they’re supposed to be, and that there are others actively searching for them – like Natalee Holloway, or Elizabeth Smart if you will. Instead, I would like to propose that what we are seeing here, isn’t just some random event, but, as Ellison so astutely noted so many years ago, that so many Black men in our time are "invisible" – and not just to the near-mythological "White Man(TM)", either. Indeed, Black men are invisible right within the bowels of Black America itself. Many Black Americans are loathe to admit this within ear/eyeshot of White folks, but the harsh truth is that they too do not wish to see so many Black men.

This is important because of the spin being put on this being put on the so-called "missing Black men" story, most notably by the NYT's Upshot blog, is that what is driving it all is the Big R (read: Racism) big and small – from draconian prison sentencing and flawed court proceedings, to the way in which public education resources are allocated to America's Black precincts, to the ways in which cops who are patrolling their districts or walking the beat mistreat Black male citizens, to the ways Black men are treated with regard to employment, hiring and career advancement opportunities. While all these factors have their merits, so too do the internal forces within Black America that have served to render Black men invisible, as the American Thinker website dishing on the NYT piece lays out: while many Blacks are loathe to openly admit it in front of whites, the fact of the matter is that the LBJ-created Great Society programs, making possible what I have coined as Baby Mamaism to reign, has indeed not just greatly weakened the Black family, but it has almost single-handedly made millions of Black men invisible, proofed by the now mantra-turned-parody, "I don't need no man" trumpeted by so many Black women themselves. Researchers and writers like Kathryn Edin and Hanna Rosin know the deal on this score as well, but aren't willing to shout it from the rafters, lest they be turned out as heretics and traitors to the causes of the Left.

So too, does Black-on-Black crime, particularly that of the deadly sort, homicide, play a role in making Black men invisible, but once again Black folks aren't all that enthused to address the matter with the same vim and vigor as they do whenever a white cop guns down a Black male on America's streets. And for good reason: doing so would open a serious can of worms so monstrous and devastating in scope, that it would really tear some stuff up – and, in the minds of some of the more self-proclaimed "enlightened" Negroes, give whites everywhere a smoking gun with which to visit their racism onto the rest of Black America-proper. While these aren't wholly unfounded concerns, they cannot work as legitimate excuses as to why we in Black America shouldn't be as brutally honest and as enthusiastically engaged in rooting out the very real internal causes that undermine us from within. At the very least, it gets harder and harder with each passing "outrage" of a white cop-on-Black-male shooting, to take seriously, when if, for example, Walter Scott was gunned down not by officer Michael Slager but "Mike-Mike" Jenkins from around the way, to take seriously – one cannot help but come away with the very distinct impression that #BlackLivesMatter ONLY when said Black lives are being taken by whites, or those perceived as such.

All of this, the internal and external forces, add up to making millions of Black men invisible, not just to whites, but to Blacks as well. And it does so in many, many ways.

For example, one of those profound ways Black men are rendered invisible, is when it comes to the massive homelessness problem Black men face. Late last year, shortly after officially joining the staff of A Voice For Men as its Editor of Urban American affairs, I discussed a wild idea I had with Managing Editor Dean Esmay: I would shadow roughly 300 Black homeless men, for an undetermined length of time, and at some point in the future would write about my findings. Dean was ecstatic, and enthusiastically gave his stamp of approval on the project.

For the next six months, I would attend countless NA and AA meetings, job fairs and other social events with these homeless Black men – and the stories I would hear, see and experience, is the stuff you simply do not get in what I have come to refer to as the Negrosphere Media. There, the focus, indeed I would dare say obsession, is with glam-level fame and celebrity on the one hand, and the outrage-of-the-day news "stories" designed to gin up racial angst and foaming at the mouth on the part of its readers. The stories of the Black men I was shadowing, didn't exist.

That's because, in a very real sense, they don't – and many of these and related Black men, homeless or not, gainfully employed or not – get it. Which explains why so many of them crawl into their own holes in the ground, much like Ellison's narrator of Invisible Man does towards the end of the book. While there is much made of the idea of Men Going Their Own Way among largely white men in the largely white Manosphere, Black men have been doing just that for decades, and without much fanfare or even discussion among others. While white men can make a stir with their saber rattling about "going their own way" – a kind of act of civil disobedience to the powers that be, of which they would say, includes women themselves in our time – for Black men, it ain't about making a social or political point, but just sheer survival in the face of a world that is at the least indifferent and at worst deeply hostile to them. Nobody really cares about Black men in their own right, and the fellas who live life everyday and every night as Black men know it.

Indeed, all of the stories coming out about "missing Black men" invariably turn to the impact on Black women, and how missing Black men are derelict in their duty to them and to children, whether they have sired them or not. Notice how none of the reporters/researchers/writers of these stories have actually deigned to go out and sit down with a room full of Black men, and simply ask them what they would like for their own lives? No, the issue of "missing" Black men, is really about them fulfilling some predetermined role, for others – in this case, that of Black women writ large, secondarily for kids, and of course, for society at large. Coupling this with the frequent, unhelpful and unwarranted "tough love" sessions coming at Black men from every direction – even the President of the United States himself – it's little wonder as to how or why so many Black men simply drop out.

As noted above, there are scores of invisble Black men, and not just those most at-risk, either – indeed, scores more Black men, who are otherwise contributing members to an indifferent/hostile society, are also rendered invisible. I've referred to them as the "Tyrones" – solid, hardworking blue collar brothers, who, while they may not have gone on to a life in the professions, values education and hard work every bit as their white collar betters. Nevertheless, scores of Black women – the very same Black women who hold up news stories about "missing Black men" as "proof" of the uniqueness and dire straits of their travails – are quick to turn their noses up at "Tyrone" as a mating prospect, because of the nature of the way he makes his living. Indeed, a tremendous amount of focus in what I call the Black Relationship Expert Industrial Complex, is on trying to prepare the Sistas to engage in, and win, the Battle Royal for the astonishingly small pool of highly eligible Brothas in the round. One doesn't need to be an economics expert to see how that is lilely to turn out. I've written so much about this topic alone that it could amount to a book in its own right, deeply informed, in part, by my shadowing of some of the Black Relationship Expert industry's biggest and most popular names – all of whom agree with me in private but parrot the party line that their Black female clients want to hear in public – that it would be darkly funny if the issues weren't so urgent. Yet another example of this Black male invisibility can be seen in the current wails of "street harassment" on the part of Black women, and Black feminists in particular, as my good friend and AVFM contributor Rom Wills makes clear in a piece he wrote on the matter late last year:

> "Now, to be clear, I'm not saying just ignore street harassment. I personally believe that men should limit who they talk to on the street anyway. If a woman isn't giving a man a blatant invitation such as a smile or she initiates the conversation, he should just leave her alone. Too many men are gassing up the heads of basic women and it really isn't worth the trouble. That's what men need to do. Women, on the other hand, need to examine their own actions in encouraging street harassment. I don't mean in terms of how they dress. Women need to look at their selection criteria. Boys evolve into Gamesmen because they no longer want to be invisible. The only way for them not to be invisible is for women to change their criteria."

Indeed, it's so palpable, that even the Happy Social Justice Warrior, Dr. Nerdlove himself, admits it:

> "The Invisible Men"You see someone trying to intimidate and harass women. I see someone crying out 'notice me! Pay attention to me! I exist!'"
> This was a sampling of one of the many comments I received on my article about the HollaBack street harassment video – men claiming that because they are so invisible – culturally, socially and sexually – that they resort to seemingly desperate measures in order to be noticed at all. And while equating street harassment to someone desperately wanting someone to acknowledge them is ridiculous on its face, it's a very real anxiety that many men feel. I hear it over and over again in the letters I get from readers. I see it in complaints people leave on dating advice subreddits, in discussions about online dating… men insisting over and over again that society has so devalued male sexuality and masculine attractiveness that they feel functionally invisible."

Earlier this week, in the run up to the preparation for my column today, I got wind of a number of righteously indignant tweeters demanding to know "Where are the MRAs?" in response to all the press "missing" Black men was getting – "Men's Rights Activists, AVfM especially, should be right on the case, I tell you, saving all those Black men who have REAL problems!". That's the clear sentiment, and while of course being exceptionally disingenuous and bringing new meaning to the idea of arguing In Mala Fide, our erstwhile interlocutors do have a point – the Manosphere writ large, does have the perception of being shot through with privileged (read: largely college educated, white collar professional and higher-than average earning, with the attendant leisure time to engage in writing and discussing the issues of the day from their perspective online), white men; here is an issue they can actually DO something about – right?

Right?

Of course, what that conveniently leaves out, even if you buy into the idea of the Manosphere as per above, that it can "solve" or even meaningfully address, a problem that has been at the very least, SIX DECADES IN THE MAKING – and that public policy, at the highest levels, either can't or won't deal with. It reminded me of the appearance acclaimed and then-highly controversial film director Spike Lee made on the Oprah Winfrey Show – he was there to promote and discuss his film, "Do The Right Thing", a tale of racial strife on the hottest day of the Summer in the Bed-Stuy section of Brooklyn, NYC. The climatic end scene, which entailed a race riot that destroyed the neighborhood institution, Sal's Famous Pizzeria, also wound up with a Black man – "Radio Raheem" – being choked to death by the NYPD (erie shades of Eric Garner!). White audience members of Oprah's show demanded to know why Lee had ended the film on such a "down" note; why he hadn't concluded the feature on a more hopeful one? Lee's response was classic:

> "You want me to solve Racism inside of 90 minutes?"

The whole point of Lee's film – which has since been praised as arguably the single best film of his entire career – was to get people talking about the issues the film portrays – not to "solve" or even meaningfully "address" them. So it is the case with A Voice For Men, made even clearer by editor-in-chief Mr. Paul Elam in his excellent response to critics, "Concerning Concern Trolls":

> "You want to know what this movement is about? It is very, very simple in my opinion. The MHRM I envision is about one simple thing. Talking without fear or capitulation.
> Seriously. That is it. It is about nothing more than people talking to each other, openly and freely, in a world that does not want them to. Neither I nor AVfM has a legislative agenda, nor any politicians to endorse, nor lobbying to accomplish because none of that is of any value in a society that still refuses to accept reality.
> Sure, if you look at our mission statement you will see many items that will require political and judicial remedy to ultimately accomplish. That, however is > not our job at AVfM to accomplish directly. Our job is to push society to a place that it is able to sustain a narrative change that will in turn lead to sustained problem solving."

Indeed, the masthead says "A VOICE For Men" – NOT, "A Public Policy For Men" – and the very fact that AVfM has not only given yours truly – an invisible Black man – a voice, but one of the places of honor at the table – is something that would never, ever, happen in the Negrosphere Media. Trust me, I couldn't say what I'm saying here at the Root, or the Grio, or Ebony, or Single Black Male, or Very Smart Brothas – I simply couldn't exist there, because they don't want to see me and mine. They have made that abundantly clear, time and again – and the only times they are willing to put up with us, is when we can somehow either provide them with cheap yuks – as was the case with Charles Ramsey a few years back (who himself was and remains, very much invisible) or as a cudgel against The White Man(TM), as was the case with James Robertson earlier this year. As soon as we've served our purpose to puff up the egos and chests of our Black Bougie betters, we're sent back to our holes in the ground, to remain blissfully out of sight and out of mind.

Invsible Black men? What is the Ebony Tower, that contains such luminaries as Marc Lamont Hill, Melissa Harris-Perry, Michael Eric Dyson and Cornel West, doing about it? What are all the Nice White Ladies(TM), and SWPLs, doing about it? What is Barack Hussein Obama, Jr., 44th POTUS and Leader of the Free World, doing about it? What is Hillary Rodham Clinton, doing about it?

If you either can't, or won't, honestly answer these questions, kindly STFU.

Feminist Aphasia – How is sex different for men?

April 24, 2015 | by AVfM Video Source | Link | Original Link

It’s amazing how many people, even men, seem to believe that men have a lot more sex partners than women do. The fact that this is nearly mathematically impossible doesn’t seem to occur to them.

Is ana Kasparian listening? We hope so.

Lest We Forget

April 24, 2015 | by Mark Dent | Link | Original Link

Every year I attend the ANZAC Day clash between Essendon Football Club and my beloved Collingwood, two traditional rivals playing in the Australian Football League. Aside from the adrenaline which pumps through my veins as I anticipate the spine tingling roar at the conclusion of our national anthem, there is another moment when I must physically brace myself to contain the swirl of emotions which assail my body. No-it isn't in reaction to an outrageous umpiring error or a player's costly mistake. This reaction comes long before the first bounce to commence the clash.

I know that the ANZAC Day ceremony will entail a tribute. This tribute will invariably call upon the one hundred thousand people gathered there to bow their heads as they recall the selfless sacrifice of our brave men and women.

That's right-the brave men and women.

Being something of a history buff I wonder if perhaps the details of our female battalions who dug in at the Somme and endured the freezing conditions, slept in the mud, blood and guts of their girlfriends and charged the enemy trenches with fixed bayonets had eluded me.

I never saw footage of limbless, blind, deaf, shell shocked, facially disfigured young girls being carried or wheeled off ships as they arrived home to resume their civilian lives. Perhaps the cameras weren't operating that day.

Yet year after year we pay tribute and give equal standing to both the men and women. How is this gross misrepresentation of the facts allowed to go on unquestioned? Of course if one was stupid enough to raise the issue at a dining table the response would be as predictable as the effects of gravity. People would screech in indignant outrage: "Our women worked in the factories, nursed and cared for the wounded and suffered the grief of losing their husbands, brothers and sons!"

Hilary Clinton's infamous line about women being the primary victims of war comes to mind.

If a women was ever harmed in war time, particularly in World War One, it was as a result of an unexpected accident or illness. No woman ever fought side by side with the men nor were they expected to fight. Yet, I repeat-they receive the same gratitude, respect and acknowledgement as the men. It is incomprehensible and makes a disgraceful mockery of the Remembrance Day ceremonies.
A handful of men suffer from breast cancer. Can you imagine the outcry we would hear from women if all of the breast cancer awareness campaigns spoke of the dreadful devastation of breast cancer wrought upon our women and men without any reference whatsoever to the enormous statistical discrepancy in which gender is most badly affected? It doesn't bear thinking about. There's no need to wonder as it would never happen.

This issue of our media never being gender specific about issues negatively impacting upon men's lives was brought to a head for me over this weekend when a full page article on suicide titled, You're Not Alone appeared in the lift out section of the HeraldSun.

As I greedily scanned the paragraphs, hoping I would stumble across the sentence alerting the world to the fact that the terrible tragedy we call suicide disproportionately affects our men, I quickly realised my search was a futile one.

Over 75% of suicides are committed by a male. This of course doesn't mean we should focus solely on males, but given the disparity in the figures one would think we would be thrown a crumb of sympathy, an empathic wink or a pat on the head. Nope…nothing. No mention of men as a gender throughout the entire article. In fact the personal focus was on women who had lost a male partner and how difficult life was for them as a consequence.

On the same day as this article appeared the murder of a little boy by his mentally unstable father was receiving wall to wall coverage. Each time the story was told the announcer reminded everyone that domestic violence was a scourge which overwhelmingly affected women although a small minority of men were also victims. Suddenly it seemed very important for the public to understand that this is an issue that harms women and that is where all of our attention should be focused.

This very deliberate censorship can be found in a number of other issues which overwhelmingly affect men. I have never watched, listened to or read a media story on death and disability in the workplace which states-men are the overwhelming victims of death and disability in the workplace. In fact when the Victorian Government ran a campaign on this issue a few years ago, all of the television, radio and print advertisements referred to the Deaths of Victorians in the Workplace.

Oh- and the dead are referred to as people or workers in all of the documentation. We would never refer to the female victims of domestic violence as people or family members. We would be left in no doubt whatsoever that it was a woman who was slapped, pushed, beaten or verbally abused. Isn't it funny how gender is of no consequence when males are dying?

When our media speak or write about our homeless-that is all we ever call them. We don't mention the fact that 67% of our homeless roughing it on the streets are males or 75% taking shelter in boarding houses are males. Can you imagine this percentage remaining a non issue if it were females wandering our streets and making up 70% of our homeless?

Why is this deliberate deception and censorship so prevalent in our media? One could be led to believe there is some kind of agreement in media circles that anything which could focus attention upon the hardship, loss, grief and injustice men endure is to be hidden, glossed over or ignored.
Some claim that more women are victims of family violence. Nevertheless a very substantial proportion of men are also affected. Understanding this, all domestic violence ads still focus exclusively upon women.

Men are not referred to at all, other than as perpetrators of course.

Imagine a suicide campaign with the same resources behind it as the Domestic Violence Industry has. This suicide awareness campaign would involve huge billboards, advertisements on television and a barrage of print articles in our major papers. Women would not be referred to in any way whatsoever. They would simply not exist as victims in the world of suicide. When outraged women ask why we are not concerned about female suicide they would be informed that less women kill themselves and for different reasons. Perhaps we could suggest that if they are so concerned about the plight of women who kill themselves they could start up their own movement to bring awareness to the problem. Our focus just happens to be upon the men. That would surely soothe their indignation.

I would like this revised version of the pre-match ANZAC Day tribute to be read during the pre-match ceremony. It would go some way to addressing the rather absurd, insulting, inaccurate and somewhat deceitful insinuation that women have sacrificed as much as men throughout the many wars we have endured.

Ladies and gentleman, could we please be upstanding as we pause and offer a minute's silence in tribute to the courage and sacrifice of tens of thousands of young Australian men and boys who died so that we might live in a peaceful, free society. Others gave great support to our soldiers and we acknowledge the tireless work of the many nurses who took care of our men and gave them comfort in a time of need.

Talk to nearly any feminist and you soon get the impression that men like nothing better than to return home from a hard day’s work, kick the dog, slap the kids, and beat the wife who was far too busy watching Oprah while the kids were in school to have his dinner ready on time. But for those feminist-defying men with the audacity to risk accusations of misogyny because they have refused to waste their hard-earned cash by spending it on the latest whims of their favorite Disney princess and have instead gone their own way, allow me to present you something better.

“She’s Toast” is my variation on traditional French toast that most certainly can and should be done your own way whether that way tends more towards health consciousness or decadence. I like to begin by baking my own bread (recipe to follow), but store bought is just fine. Do it your own way, start with your favorite bread.

She’s Toast

- 1-2 slices bread (heartier, whole or multi-grain breads work best, as do thicker slices)
- 2 eggs, (or liquid egg substitute)
- 2 Tbsps milk (whole, low-fat, or nonfat)
- 1 tsp sweetener (table sugar, sucralose, stevia, etc.)
- Dash each nutmeg and/or cinnamon

Spray a non-stick skillet with cooking spray, then warm on medium heat.

Beat the eggs, milk, sweetener, and spices with a whisk or fork in a flat-bottomed dish barely large enough to lay a piece of bread in the bottom.

Place a slice of bread into the egg mixture, flip and allow it to absorb some of the mixture. Place the bread in the skillet.

Repeat with the other slice of bread.

Allow the bread to brown on the bottom, being careful not to burn it.

Flip it over. It is done when both sides are lightly browned. The bread should still be moist, but no liquid should be oozing out when cut.

Topping with butter and maple syrup is traditional, but use your imagination or one of my suggested topping below.

For an even simpler version try just putting the bread into a toaster and forget the other ingredients. Yes, at that point it is just toast but with the right toppings, even plain toast can be quite tasty.

Suggested Toppings

I often begin with a base of dairy such as butter, cream cheese, or Greek yogurt. Peanut or other nut butter is also good. For a healthier version try low-fat cream cheese or non-fat Greek yogurt sweetened with Splenda or Stevia. Top the base with your favorite jelly, jam, honey, molasses, fresh berries, or other soft fruit (like bananas or mangos).

For extreme decadence top it with a large scoop (or two) of your favorite ice cream, drizzle it with chocolate, butterscotch, caramel syrup, or hot fudge. Smother it with whipped cream and sprinkle on some chopped nuts or crumbled candy bars, Reese's pieces or M&M's.

For a more savory meal I omit the spices, smear it with a bit of Dijon mustard, melt a slice of cheese on top (I like Swiss, Havarti, or pepper jack), a couple of strips of bacon, smoked salmon, or sliced tomato, and finish it with an egg (I prefer over easy because the runny yolk becomes a sauce). Add a couple of avocado slices for garnish. I've even served it as an open-faced hamburger topped with mushroom gravy.

My Way Multi-grain Bread

- 2 cups strong coffee cooled to room temperature (other thin liquids can be used such as water, milk, and/or juice)
- 1 Tbsp or 1 packet bread yeast
- ½ cup sweetener (Sugar, brown sugar, sucralose, and/or Stevia) (amount can be adjusted for taste)
- 1 cup old-fashioned oats
- ½ tsp Kosher salt
- 1 cup bread flour (You could use all whole wheat, but the texture is better this way)
- 2 ½ cups whole wheat flour

Optional Ingredients

I almost always add the nuts and fruit, but occasionally some of the other stuff.

- 1 cup cooked whole grain (brown rice, quinoa, buckwheat, wheat berries, barley, etc.)
- 1 cup chopped or crushed nuts (I prefer pecans, but walnuts are also good)
- 1 cup dried fruit cut into raisin sized pieces (raisins, prunes, cranberries, apricots, mangos, dates, figs)
- 1 oz molasses (enhances the coffee flavor)
- 1 Tbsp olive oil (helps texture and moisture)
- 1-2 Tbsp small seeds (flax, sesame, chia, etc.)

I use a KitchenAid Heavy Duty stand mixer because it is powerful enough to knead bread dough and makes it so much easier, but this can be done entirely by hand, in a food processor, or bread machine (though I don't recommend baking bread in the machine).

Proof the yeast in the bottom of the mixing bowl for 5-10 minutes in the coffee, sweetener, and oats (This allows the yeast to dissolve and become active and the oats to absorb some moisture).

Once the yeast is active you will see lots of foam floating on top.

Add the rest of the ingredients (hold back ½ cup whole wheat flour) and mix slowly on the lowest speed to prevent the flour from flying out of the bowl and creating a huge mess.

Once the dough begins to form a ball, stop and check the dough for moisture content. The dough should feel slightly sticky, but shouldn't stick to the sides of the bowl or your fingers when you handle it.

Add the remaining flour in 2-3 additions until it feels just right.[1]

Continue kneading for five minutes (you may need to adjust this if you aren't using a mixer). Do not over-knead as the dough may become tough.

When the kneading is finished, remove the dough from the bowl and shape it into a ball. Return it to the mixing bowl, spray it lightly with cooking spray to keep it from drying out.

Cover it with a clean towel and set aside in a warm place. Allow the dough to rise until it doubles in volume. Depending on temperature and moisture content this could take an hour or two. Be patient.

I like to use a well-seasoned cast iron loaf pan because it heats more evenly, but any loaf pan will do. Just spray it lightly with oil.

When the dough is risen, remove it from the mixing bowl by turning it out onto a lightly floured cutting board (you may not need any flour if the dough isn't sticky).

The ball will deflate. Work the dough by turning it in on itself a couple of times.

Gently roll it around the cutting board to a ball, then work the shape into a log the same size as your loaf pan. The dough should nearly fill the pan.

Push it around a little to even it out. Spray it lightly with cooking spray and cover it once again with the towel.

Allow it to rise for about an hour. Pre-heat the oven to 350 degrees F while the dough is rising.

Once the dough has risen an inch or so above the top of the pan and looks more like a bread loaf, place it in the oven and bake for about 45 minutes.

When done, allow it to set for a couple of minutes; no more than five because the loaf may begin to sweat in the pan and the crust may become a bit soggy.

Remove the loaf from the pan. It should just lift out or fall out if you turn the pan upside down (careful the pan will still be piping hot).

Cool the loaf at least 10-15 minutes on a wire rack (so air can flow around all 6 sides) before cutting. The cooling allows the structure to set so the loaf will retain its shape.

I love to eat this while it is still warm. It doesn't need any sort of topping (not even butter). Allow the loaf to cool completely before placing in a plastic bag (I use a grocery bag) for storage.

This makes about 10-12 slices and is perfect for my She's Toast recipe.

Because there are no preservatives it lasts only about 2-3 days. If you can't eat that much bread, try feeding the leftovers to your dog instead of kicking him.

Of course, you will risk being called a misogynist by feminists who would prefer that you conform to their idea of manhood, but your dog will love you for it.

[1] This is important to the final shape and moistness of the loaf. It effects the rise. Too much moisture and the loaf will fall flat and not hold its shape. Too little moisture and it won't rise as high and may be dry and crumbly. It could take a little practice to get it right.

Open challenge to journalist Mike Donachie: Write the truth

Journalist Mike Donachie is widely believed to have either triggered or furthered the expulsion of the Honey Badger Brigade from the Calgary Comics Expo by tweeting a question to the Expo about why they were allowing a hate group.

In the wake of the lifetime ban of comics artist and creator Alison Tieman from comics expositions (effectively destroying her career) and the later backlash, Donachie has since offered denials and then an apology that one might characterize as lukewarm at best:

> Hi. This is Mike Donachie, using Reddit for the first time I hope I'm doing it right.
> I'm hoping to address the incident at Calgary Expo and my involvement in it, such as it was.
> First, my initial tweet. I expressed a concern that a major con like this would rent a booth to a Gamer Gate group. My understanding, at that point, was that such a group would be a negative thing to have at a con. Since then, many people have tweeted me to make it clear that isn't necessarily the case, and there are different types of people within Gamer Gate. It's not all hate speech, I'm told. People are people, as is true anywhere.
> I didn't know any of that. So that means my tweet, suggesting it would be a bad thing to have such a booth, wasn't based on the full facts. I regret it and I wish I hadn't sent it. In future, I will be more careful with expressing opinions on Twitter, at least until I have more facts. I should have borne in mind that my words, as a journalist, would carry weight. I simply didn't think of that because I don't work in Calgary. That was a mistake.
> Please be aware that, thanks to many helpful GG people on Twitter, I'm now reading more about Gamer Gate. I'm not a video games guy so I'm out of the loop. But I know I have a responsibility to be informed, so I plan to put that right.
> Next, the ejection of a group of people from the event. I don't know what happened and I didn't ask for it to happen. My initial tweet was ill-informed concern about something, but I didn't expect anyone to be thrown out. At no point was I in contact with anyone at the con. At no point did I ask for action to be taken. I still don't know why they were ejected.
> I had never heard of Honey Badgers before this and I don't know much about them. I'm hoping we can talk about their aims and what they do, but I don't intend to judge them.
> All of this is a long-winded way of saying: I'm sorry about what happened. These are not weasel words. I genuinely feel bad. I didn't want anyone's event ruined and I wish I'd thought about it before I tweeted. In future, I will act differently.

> I've been to lots of cons and I know the idea is to have fun. I feel terrible that someone wanted to do that, and hasn't been able to.
> Best wishes

An open letter of response to the children Of Oberlin, and their love letter to themselves.

In response to "In Response to Sommers' Talk: A Love Letter to Ourselves", The Oberlin Review, April 18, 2015:

Dear Oblinettes, First let me make clear that I am a Sexual Assault Survivor and Advocate – so where the Oberlin authors call for such voices to be given priority, I will advance by their permission and full throttle. My voice counts even if you are to hate what I say and how I say it! I really have no time for "Social Justice Worriers(sic)" who just make the issues less clear and all too egocentric.

Some, if not all of these Tizzified Students, do need to do some homework and stop just bombing social media, public gatherings and even their own "Incredulity Glands" with "Woozles" and "Fallacious Memes".

Just because you "squeem" it loudly and meme it endlessly, it does not make it reality – false evidence by citation (The Woozle Effect) does not make the false evidence magically more valid by repetition or volume. Maybe if the signatories to this laughable letter actually used a library and researched some basic facts (rather than constructing hug boxes with baskets of non-oppressive kittens) they may make some basic sense and not have damaged their own credibility on a global scale.

As Dutton observed in 2006 "Woozles are usually not simply a matter of authentic misreporting. They also reveal a desire to read into the data an a priori position that is really not there, what Bacon calls "idols of the theatre". All the data reporting mistakes I have found in the literature, without exception, were made in the direction of supporting feminist preconceptions." Rethinking Domestic Violence, Page 29.

If Francis Bacon was aware of the psychology of memery, when he published "Novum organum" in 1620, one does have to wonder if the modern day 21st century ignorance is due to good old fashioned ignorance, feigned ignorance or wilful ignorance coupled with the petulant stamping of feet? Idols of the mind (idola mentis) are no excuse – and yet here we see the students of Oberlin displaying the Idols of the Tribe (Idola tribus), Idols of the Cave (Idola specus), Idols of the Marketplace (Idola fori) and (Oh Drama) Idols of the Theatre (Idola theatri). So bloody Idol, they can't manage to open a text book.

When students get lost in the Idols of The Theatre, swallowing Academic Dogma whole and then becoming vacuous envoys for daftness and error, they really have no place in Higher Education… or Lower Eduction for that matter . They should not be funded to make fools of themselves or cause distress and damage to others.

The 1 in 5 Meme was debunked back in 1993, as written about by Hoff Sommers and she fully attributed the hard work to the two journalists, Schoenberg and Roe, of The Toledo Blade (Ohio). They obtained from Prof Mary Koss the admission that her claims were based upon a limited sample and should not be used Globally. So anyone spouting the 1 in 5 meme has had no credibility for over 20 years! I bet someone deliberately forgot to mention that lack of Credability to the Onblinettes!

There should end 20+ years of the Cult Of Mary Koss. But no – all you need is uneducated zealots who love "NOT" reading, but do love making themselves seem deludedly powerful, to just chant ad nauseum "1 in 5".

They want to live under a mentality of victimhood and special pleadings! This is why so many state that modern Feminism demands that all women be viewed as Victims, and shows just how bad stats and irrational claims (Sacred Science) are used to drive that cult position.

Please make sure that when you claim that Hoff Sommers is a Rape Apologist (TTC) you include Prof Mary Koss, who after woozling her own Data, had to retract the memes over 20 years ago. Many are unaware of just how pernicious the memes and cult mentality are. As Hoff Sommers observed, "Mary Koss and Sarah Buel were invited to give testimony on the subject of violence against women before the House judiciary Committee. Dean Kilpatrick's findings were cited. Neil Gilbert was not there; nor were any of the other scholars interviewed by the Toledo Blade.".(Who Stole Feminism page 224) Never let a discredited academic get in the way of Pushing a Political Agenda – and never let Credible academics contradict the meme holders and those who have invested a career on the backs of false memes.

Talk about Trivialising Victims (TTC) and the subject of rape. I just Don't Trust Academics seeking tenure, and once they have been caught repeating a known woozle they really have zero credibility, along with the pantheon of myths they have demanded others worship.

You can read all about it in The Toledo Blade newspaper in October 1993, three part, three day series:

Day One,"Rape The Making Of An Epidemic" and "..the science behind the alarming rape statistics, who benefits and how they affect the nation." and "Researchers"

Day Two, "The forgotten, The Vulnerable" and "Young Poor More At Risk"

Day Three, "The Haves and The Have Nots: Universities Are Spending Millions As Public Programs Fight To Survive" and "Program Funding"

All are visible and freely open for consultation in the Google Newspapers archives, and they are searchable too … so there really is no excuse for ignorance and shoddy homework that just doesn't pass basic ed 101, for 11 year olds. Wakipedia(sic) is not your friend, but Google Scholar is!

Where is the campus wide condemnation and false claims about Journalists who are not Erdleyesque or covered in moss due to the combination of Journalistic Inertia and Turpitude? Shouldn't both Schoenberg and Roe still be receiving Junior league Feminist Opprobrium today, given just how TOXIC (TTC) they must be to have contradicted Feminist Doctrine in the first place?

Only the most dangerous are subjected to malicious meme, and so The Oblinettes give Dr Hoff Sommers a back handed compliment each time the bear false witness against her and have to throw yet more memes in the hope that something negative will stick. In the trade that's what's known as Milieu Control, Loading the Language and Doctrine Over Person.

Brain washing and coercive control is far easier than people think. They demand that their mind is as solid as a rock and then wonder how they ended up locked in a compound surrounded by DEA and other law enforcement – or, even just repeatedly spluttering stats and memes that have been debunked and have zero credibility. Some just need permission to stop – so, by the power vested in me by a good dose of common sense, I hereby Absolve you all of your past meme munching – go forth and don't munch meme gain!

Lets fast forward to December 2014 when the DOJ publish a Special Report (NCJ 248471) "Rape and Sexual Assault Victimization Among College-Age Females, 1995–2013".

The report shows that not only is the incidence of sexual assault/rape lower on campuses, making them safer than the rest of the USA …. the DOJ also showed that the 1 in 5 meme is false and should read 0.03 in 5.

So, the 1 in 5 meme was in error by how many Thousands of Percent?

Some quick maths – if the rate is 7 per 1000 and not 200 per 1000, that is 200 divided by 7 = 28.57 … and since 7 is the 100% factor you multiply 28.57 by 100 = 2857% error. Now should that get a Grade A+ of an F–? Just how many standard deviations away from sanity are required, before the meme munchers shut up and get to the coffee pot super fast long after the wake up call? It's not a nightmare, it's bad education and cult indoctrination.

That some still demand that the 1 on 5 meme is real only shows how deeply the Sacred Science of Rape Culture has become a cult, where faith replaces reality and obedience to the group meme overrides a $60,000 education. That some so crassly have labeled Dr Sommers as rape denier (TTC) for having been proved right by the US Government, stinks of Petulant Sauce poured over the Smarting Posteriors of Cult Members.

That some keep demanding it is real and has to be real has led to the coining of the new Compound Noun: "Statistical Apoplexist" – "a person who refutes the reality of official stats that are known to be flawed, especially any stats that undermine their faith and cult membership of Social Media Inspired Cathedrals of Memery.

They are often to be found in academic settings and amongst those who believe they create reality upon demand, whilst wearing a White Trilby jauntily cocked to the left. They also frequently mistake Fedoras for Trilbies, and vice versa. Frequent inhabitants of safe spaces and known to kidnap kittens, they cite as reasonable cause their own psychological infirmity, whilst stroking the kitten in an overly aggressive fashion often leading to the kitten being traumatized for life.".

It was such a shocker that even the bastion of the 1 in 5 meme Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand tried to take it off her webpages without anyone noticing… but She Failed – poor lamb. Here is The Before – and here is The After. At least Obama has had the good sense to stay Stumb and hope that his public stupidity 25 January 2014 can remain just simmering until he runs off with a retirement package … or maybe he's too frightened of how Michelle would react?

Gillibrand, So inept in politics that she got caught with her pants down trying to cover up years of her own ignorance. Quite an amazing and complex set of Political Gymnastics, bending over backwards and kissing your own political career "au revoir"! It has to be more than rumour that she's in negotiation with Cirque du Soleil.

Rather than acknowledging decades of error, she just tried to reinvent the meme by inviting Columbia University 'mattress girl' Emma Sulkowicz to the State of The Union. She just had to keep the great Rape Culture Memes flying high in the media and the American Psyche! She has been justifiably vilified for her comments which went far beyond the acceptable for a US Politician. In light of Columbia facing legal action, Sulkowicz has even dropped making claims she was raped and now insists that her 1st amendment right and her desire to create art by public performance override any person's right to be presumed innocent until proven guilty.

Next year I will be touring US campuses dressing in a Mink Bikini with a Water Bed reporting that both Sulkowicz and Gillibrand have raped me with a Zucchini… and I'll be looking for any Braindead politician with a negligent coterie of sycophantic staff so that I too can go to The Prom. What a pity that Aaron Schock had to jump ship!

Of Course when asked if the claims are real or not, I shall just Quote Sulkowicz ".. really it's just an artistic expression of the personal trauma I've experienced at Columbia. If artists are not allowed to make art that reflect on our experiences, then how are we to heal?'".

It's interesting that after months of silence by Jean-Paul Nungesser, Sulkowicz has the temerity to claim"It's ridiculous that he would read it as a 'bullying strategy,' especially given his continued public attempts to smear my reputation…" which raises red flags for me of attempts by Sulkowicz to DARVO and Reverse Victim and Offender. To deny that her mattress antics have not had an impact upon Nungesser and not attacked him as a person should beggar belief, except it's normal behaviors when dealing with Crazy!

So we have decades of bad information and Unjust Social Media Memes being thrown about in Statistical Hysteria… and now we have actual proof of the "Backfire Effect".

The “Backfire Effect” (Nyhan, Reifler 2010) is a Psychological Bias where in the face of contradictory evidence, established beliefs do not change, but actually get stronger. It’s Confirmation Bias and comes under the purview of “I believe it, Therefore it just has to be is true” fallacies (Petulant Subset).

The pot shots at Hoff Sommers are classic misfires from those who are so inculcated into false ideas that they are acting like a headless cult. It’s pure Moral Panic with a shifting bogeyman as the Folk Devil. The “Moral Entrepreneurs”, the instigators of the Hysterical Headless Cult, have long moved on and sit back chuckling as they watch their marionettes still wielding the memes long after they have been debunked.

As soon as one mythical devil is shown to be Self Inflicted Fright Night, the adrenaline Junkied SJWs just move a little further west and create a new Bogeyman to keep the Sugar Rush going. The”Moral Entrepreneurs”, the Steinems and Kosses, keep lapping it up and using the incredulity of the masses as a smoke screen.

This also gets mixed up with the “White Hat Bias” (Cope, Allison 2010) – “bias leading to the distortion of information in the service of what may be perceived to be righteous ends”.

It’s time to stop worshiping at the temple of the great cathedrals of MSSs (Social Media Memes) and start doing some actual academic study and A+ homework. Hell, even an honourable try would raise grades above F Minus Minus!

As Dr Prof Sabine Sielke noted in 2004 “The Encyclopedia Of Rape” page 150:

> “In the United States the belief that representations of violence reproduce real violence was reinforced in the 1980s and 1990s by an intensified debate of prominent cases of rape, date rape, and sexual harassment within the media. This prominence of rape and sexual violence in popular culture seemed to suggest that American culture is a “rape culture.” However, the term rape culture misleadingly hints that rape occurs more frequently in a culture that talks about rape intensively than in cultures that deny its existence. Instead of documenting the state of real rape, though, the deployment of rape in American popular culture bespeaks the status of rape as a central trope within the American cultural imagination.”

If you look at some quality academic sources and ignore the travesty that is Wakipedia(sic) you find the following:

> “Rape culture is a concept of unknown origin and of uncertain definition; yet it has made its way into everyday vocabulary and is assumed to be commonly understood. The award-winning documentary film Rape Culture made by Margaret Lazarus in 1975 takes credit for first defining the concept.”

Please note that certain feminist editors at Wakipedia have refused for this valid reference to be used on the Wakipedia pages on Rape Culture, and they have even orchestrated editors who used it being banned from Wakipedia. DARVO away darlings, you simply destroy your own credibility each time you insist your feelz override the Wakipedia Five Pillars.

If you look up any details of this film "Rape Culture" you find very quickly that it was made in response to the Work of "Prisoners Against Rape" (PAR), a not for profit founded by Larry Cannon and William Fuller, Prisoners at Lorton Reformatory Virginia. It was filmed in 1974 and released in the first week of January 1975. Full History and Sources can be found "Here".

It was William Fuller who wrote to congress to submit evidence and who is the person who had Rape Culture entered into the Congressional Record. I bet they don't teach you that bit of African American History at Oberlin!

PAR worked with the Washington DC Rape Crisis Centre, primarily with Loretta Ross, Yulanda Ward and Nkenge Toure. If you watch the footage available on-line, please don't be fooled by the white female faces that only showed up when Cameras were about. Full details of the history can be found in the Interviews with Loretta Ross – Sophia Smith Collection Voices of Feminism Oral History Project, Loretta Ross, interviewed by Joyce Follet (2004-5)

The Oscar Winning Film makers Margaret lazarus and Renner Wunderlich of Cambridge Documentary Films are recognised as having coined the term Rape Culture. IF YOU LOOK AT THEIR WEBSITE YOU CAN FIND EVEN MORE DETAILS!

One has to wonder why is it that so many Middle Class and overly well funded students love the Unjust Social Media Memes, and are so happy to be party to the negation of Black African History in the USA and the sexism of ignoring Prison Rape? It seems that some just missed that whole Hashtag on #SolidarityIsForWhiteWomen and the cyber meltdowns of multiple SJW feministas.

It gives a whole new meaning to delicate snowflakes. They will squeem about campus rape and then tune in to replays of Oz which as Lara Stemple noted:

> On OZ, revolting images often seem designed just to revolt us. They certainly give those who know about prisons reason to dismiss the show. I can almost hear jim Gondoles, the cantankerous head of the American Correctional Association, sighing "( )h, come on" while watching it. In fact, during Stop Prisoner Rape's efforts to move the first-ever federal legislation to address prisoner rape through Congress, opponents nicknamed it "the OZ bill" (Martin) to make the point that the premiss on which our bill was based was preposterous. Fictional.

> When the public snickers at jokes about prison rape, I doubt their vision includes peace activists (Tom Cahill), women (Marilyn Shirley) or adolescents (Rodney Hulin). Our generalization of prisoners as a faceless, monolithic other has dehumanised those behind bars so thoroughly that personal details are essential to bring each individual to life in the public mind

Are they supposed to be Social Justice Warriors or just Social Justice Worriers, who see a bandwagon and demand free passage and a right to ignore Noise Ordinances that would control their inane and outraged blathering?

The whole 5 year mainlining (Since 2011) of the Rape Culture Crack will give social psychology decades of research material on just how a group can lose their grasp on reality and suffer mass psychosis. All because two words are placed side by side and knee jerks follow. Those Two Words could be "Rape"+"Culture" or "Wage"+"Gap" or even "Gamer"+"Gate".

However the greatests trigger for abreaction by the untutored and poorly tutored masses is "Factual"+"Feminist" … and they respond with such tortured uses of the English language as, "A rape denialist is someone who denies the prevalence of rape and denies known causes of it. Christina Hoff Sommers believes that rape occurs less often than statistics (those which actually leave out a plethora of unreported rapes) suggest. "

Fact 1: Statistics are Not Truth
Fact 2: Statistics identify trends in time
Fact 3: Dr Sommers uses statistics Correctly
Fact 4: Dr Sommers looks at how the statistics have been generated and how bias in the process does not just suggest error, but Identifies error and reduced value in the Stats.
Fact 5: Dr Sommer's concerns raised in her 1994 book "Who Stole Feminism" have been proved valid and even correct. See Chapter 10 "Who Stole Feminism" (1994) … read it if you dare!
Fact 6: Dr Sommers has never been a Rape Denialist or Apologist, but she has questioned Suggested Statistics where the methodologies of surveys studies have failed to pass PEER REVIEW and even Journalistic Scrutiny due to basic errors and failures by supposed academics to follow basic ethics and even common sense.

Where Junior League Social Justice Worriers demand that bad stats prove a Rape Culture exists, Dr Hoff Sommers is quite correct when she points out that The Rape Culture and it's associated memes Can't exists and have no validity. The evidence is lacking. Whoops: one headless cult popped with a tiny prick of logic!

It's shocking what happens when you refuse to be trapped in an Echo Chamber and actually use Academic Resources to balance reality against desire and even Bogeymen! Tis time for some to try growing up and have a try at dealing with "Reality".

BBC election coverage: Bigotry, bias and corruption

The BBC recently used public funds to host a sexist Q&A on upcoming election issues. Election candidate Mike Buchanan calls them out:

Dan Perrins: Shoes they will never walk a mile in, much less 75

April 26, 2015 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Two years ago today Earl Silverman threw a rope over the rafters in his garage and used it to hang himself. It was a tragic end to one very good man's dogged and tireless efforts to establish a shelter for Canadian men who were victims of violent partners.

Earl's tenacity in life made the shock and sense of loss of his death all the more profound. It was also a source of outrage for many of us as we watched the feminist community, the mainstream media and the Canadian government look the other way and whistle about a suicide which they played a role in causing.

Earl
The people with the resources, political muscle and public influence in the area of domestic violence had ignored, dismissed and even mocked Earl for years. All he wanted to do was help people. All they wanted him to do was shut up.

Score one for their side. Earl will never pester them again about the victims they throw under the bus each and every day. They are culpable in his death as surely as if they had tied the noose and fitted it around his neck.

When it came to Earl's personal decision to end his life, I think Karen Straughan had the most incisive view of the matter. And she knew the man far better than I did. I can only paraphrase from memory, but she said she did not believe that Earl killed himself in a fit of despair or self-pity. He took his life hoping that it would bring attention to the problems people were ignoring. In a sense, he intended his death to be a continuation of his work to make something good happen for an egregiously underserved population. It was, in a sense, a strategic suicide driven by desperation.

It is fitting, then, that this post also involves another tenacious, driven Canadian man who has spent so many years pounding the often icy pavement in Hamilton, Ontario, reaching out to help homeless men and spreading the word about men's issues to as many people as possible. He literally never stops.

Yes, it is Dan Perrins. And he is about to do a lot more pavement pounding. This time the 75 mile stretch between Hamilton and Toronto. Danny is undertaking the trek to do what he has so often done before: Raise money to help the disadvantaged and marginalized men via the Canadian Association for Equality.

From their website:

"We are pleased to announce that Dan Perrins and his canine companion Jeb, will be participating in Canada's national Mental Health Week this year. The way Dan has chosen participate is to walk from outside of Hamilton to Queen's Park Toronto. He has dedicated this walk to his older brother Anthony Perrins who killed himself on May 8, 1982 and Earl Silverman a friend and fellow human rights advocate, who killed himself on April 26, 2013.

Dan himself has been diagnosed with Post Traumatic Stress disorder and is familiar with the current mental health system in Ontario. His dog Jeb is part of his therapy for PTSD.

He's called it the "Men-Tell Health Because Silence is Deadly" walk in the hopes of encouraging men to reach out for help. He also wants to raise awareness about the lack of help for men who do reach out.

Jeb and Dan will start in Dundas, just outside of Hamilton, and walk towards Toronto. They'll be stopping at city halls of the municipalities along the way to hand deliver letters highlighting the necessity and urgency for an increase in mental health services geared towards men. It will take him about 5 days to cover the distance, which will be about 75 miles in total. Further details of the route Jeb has picked out for them will be announced shortly.

He will be staying in each city for a few hours most likely around 10 am – 2 pm along the way for a few hours to talk to people each day too.

Dan has chosen to walk for the Canadian Centre for Men and Families. Donations will help programs for men currently running at the centre, such as counselling, peer support, mindfulness meditation and legal resources, and help to create a larger variety of services to serve a wider population.

To support men's mental health, click here to donate now. Be sure to designate the donation to the "Men-Tell Health Walk (Because men not asking for help is deadly)" fund.

Dan is also inviting all those who support men's mental health to join him for legs of the walk."

AVFM is pledging a $3.00 per mile donation to CAFE for this project, and we are challenging all who are willing and able to add to that total. If you can't give and you live in the area, please consider walking side by side with Dan in one or more of the legs of his walk.

I also want extend a public salute to Dan Perrins for once again putting the "active" in activism in ways that most human beings simply won't do.

I don't know if there is a heaven, but if there is I am betting Earl Silverman is there right now, smiling about Dannyboy.

I know I am.

When psychotherapists hurt families

April 26, 2015 | by Tom Golden | Link | Original Link

Note: This article is also available in Spanish.

Imagine a paranoid schizophrenic.

He believes that everyone is out to get him. The world is conspiring to kill him. They are at every corner, at the bus stop, in the parking lot and watching his house at night.

He seeks out a psychotherapist. He is surprised but delighted when the therapist agrees with all his delusions. The therapist says, “Yes, people are out to get you, they are at the bus stop and parking lot and they are watching your house.” The patient and therapist collude on how to deal with this “problem” and in so doing dig the patient deeper and deeper into a delusional world that is ruining his life and the lives of the patient’s family.

The family has been trying to help the gentleman realize that this is a part of his psychosis, and he needs to take his meds, but they have been far from successful. Nothing they can say has made any difference. Now the patient has a professional ally who agrees with his delusions and that person is also an authority.

The family is sunk. They try to get a court ordered commitment to a mental health facility but the therapist testifies that the man is fine and his thoughts are not in error. The judge listens to the therapist and decides against the commitment.

Things go downhill quickly. It was bad enough for the family to deal with the man’s pathology on their own but now they are outgunned and easily defeated by the authority, the therapist, speaking out and contradicting their reality. It is simple to see the devastating impact of such collusion and the irresponsibility of the therapist. This is clearly malpractice.

But could this happen in real life? I’m afraid so.

I have seen a very similar dynamic when watching cases of what the DSM calls “Parent Child Relational Problem.” This is known outside the DSM as PAS or Parental Alienation Syndrome.

When this occurs one parent, usually the mother, believes that the other parent, usually the father, is the sole antagonist. She tries to alienate the children from the father by telling them falsehoods about him and claiming what a bad man their father is and that they should be afraid of him and not associate with him. She often wrongly claims him to be abusive, hurtful, and disruptive even though he is none of these things or is only a fraction of what she claims.

The man is nowhere near what she is describing, he is simply a partner in a relationship that has gone sour. He likely was a part of the problem just as the wife was also a part of the problem but in PCRP the wife frames him as the only problem and a dangerous one at that.

The wife’s erroneous beliefs share some commonality with the delusions of the schizophrenic. Both are far from the truth. Both are very hurtful to family members with the PCRP untruths being more directly injurious to the children. The underlying reason for this blaming and shaming is unknown but what is clear is that she seems to have an unbridled fury with the father over the failure of the relationship and an intensive desire to make him pay, and pay dearly.

She seems literally out to get him. She will often do things such as make false accusations towards the father or accuse him of sexually abusing the kids or of domestic violence against her.

Enter a psychotherapist for the mother.

What I have sometimes seen in this sort of scenario is the therapist going along with the mother's erroneous assessment of the father. Rather than do the hard work of helping the client assess both his and her responsibility in the failure of their relationship, and the tough work of learning to share custody, they instead take the easy path of agreeing with all the negative exaggerations the mom concocts about the dad.

The therapist may even encourage the mother to attack the man in court, or push for ending his visitation with the children. Worse yet, the therapist may testify in court that the father is the problem and needs to have a limited role with the children. The testimony is based solely on what was heard from the mother. If you only get one side of the story you are doomed to failure.

Mother and therapist are a team in their common belief that the father has been the real problem and work together to find ways to minimize the father's involvement and cut the children off from any contact with their dad. All the while the mother's responsibility in the divorce and relationship problems is completely ignored. With the therapists help, the mother is able to convince the judge and lawyers that her husband is the problem and needs to be treated accordingly.

It should be clear to people that this sort of unhealthy alliance between therapist and client is not helpful to the client and is certainly not helpful to the children or father. Now the mother has an ally who believes her delusional fury about the husband and is willing to testify in court to that effect.

This sort of testimony is devastating. The judge and lawyers tend to believe a professional therapist and see them as objective and holding the best interest of all. But in this case it is simply not happening. The therapist and mother are fused in a one-sided partnership to sink the father. This puts the man in a very precarious position where it is likely he will not be believed and will pay a steep price of being vilified and cut off from his children at a time that the children need him dearly.

In essence, this one-sided partnership is setting up a very heinous scenario.

Based on the testimony of the mother and her therapist the judge and lawyers will be duped by the false accusations into severely punishing the father. This dynamic is being called "3rd party abuse" where the institution, in this case the family courts, abuses the father in a continuation of the mother's abuse.

Now the father is the recipient of the abuse from not just the mother but from the actual institution that is supposed to be helping him. They are carrying out a punishment based on the mother's and therapist's false accusations. The institution is cutting dad out of his kids lives not because he is a bad dad but because the mother and therapist claim he is.

How could this happen?

Gynocentrism

The first reason is gynocentrism.

We live in a world that is steeped in an unconscious mandate. That mandate is very simple but very few people are aware of its presence and power. The mandate is to protect women at the expense of men.

We have been living this meme for centuries. It is actually what has made every successful culture thrive. It is an essential part of each culture to protect its women. Without women our culture would die a quick death and so we see the necessity and men sacrifice their own safety and sometimes their lives to keep the women safe.

- Think Titanic, where men willingly jumped to their deaths into the icy water while giving the women the lifeboats.
- Think every war we have ever fought and the hundreds of thousands of men who gave their lives.
- Think firemen and policemen sacrificing their safety and sometimes their lives so that other can be safe.

This mandate runs all around us and most of us aren't even aware of it.

When a mother gets furious and one-sided about the husband being the only problem and being dangerous, guess what happens? People automatically jump to protect her.

In a gynocentric world where the protection of women is an unconscious priority that is what people do without thinking. Protect the woman. The other side of this is if the man claims he is not the abuser he is immediately seen as suspect.

If you add in a therapist testifying in court that the man is the problem this is often insurmountable. Keep in mind that the same gynocentrism is likely present in the lawyers and in the judge. Due to this they will be easily swayed and more vulnerable to the testimony of the wife and the therapist. The therapist is the one link that should have training and awareness that goes beyond the gynocentric brainwashing but sadly this is rarely the case.

Male Disposability

One important result of gynocentrism is that men are seen as disposable.

They die in greater numbers at work, at war, by suicide, by murder, from nearly every major health problem and on and on. And guess what? No one cares.

People automatically and unconsciously see men as disposable. If you were to take any of the above examples of places men die more often and suddenly have women being the more frequent victims you would see protests in the streets. Immediately!

People would not tolerate seeing women die at war or at work. Congress would act quickly. But why don't they react now? Because men are seen as disposable.

Guess what that perception does? It diminishes the importance of men's emotions. If he is disposable then his emotions are just not that critical. Not like hers.

I have seen couples therapists who focus nearly exclusively on the emotional pain of the wife but blatantly ignore the pain of the husband. This happens more often than you might think but most don't see it. They too are living in that gynocentric trance that sees women as victims in need of assistance and men as, well, there to help women. Men's emotional pain is routinely ignored while men are described as cold and unfeeling.

This sort of automatic and unconscious bias plays out in a therapeutic relationship. In our example it increases the chances of the therapist being suckered into the lies of the mother since the therapist is seeing the world through gynocentric glasses. It will also mean that such a therapist will be less likely to sow concern or even see the man's emotional pain.

Women are Victims

For the past 50 years we have seen an incredible push to view women as victims. This push has been facilitated by the strong presence of gynocentrism.

Probably the most influential force in this movement has been the domestic violence industry. Their claims have for years voiced the meme that men are the primary perpetrators and women the sole victims of domestic violence.

This is how they gained traction to start. They would focus only on female victims and male perps. Due to gynocentrism everyone was more than willing to see women as being at risk and men being the perpetrators. The activists pushed this meme hard and told story after story to the media that it was women who were the perennial victims and men the perpetrators.

They were successful in gaining the attention of the gynocentric media who went along with this biased point of view and once you get women complaining about their safety and the media reinforcing that the politicians can't refuse to join the parade with academia not far behind.

This push to see women as victims has been so successful that there is now a default disbelief that men can even be victims.

All the while the peer-reviewed research is telling a very different story. Good science does not fall for the gynocentric trance.

The research is saying that men are between 33% and 50% of the victims of domestic violence but there is no one asking for stories about men, no one highlighting men as victims, no media reinforcing that claim, no politicians working to protect them and very few in academia who might offer support.

What do you get? You get a world that sees women as victims and men as perpetrators simply from a woman's accusation. In divorce cases lawyers have been suggesting women make false allegations of domestic abuse for some time knowing that even an allegation will stop the judge from giving much custody to the father.

This is mostly a risk free tactic since false accusations even when exposed, rarely are punished. Women are believed when they claim victimhood. Gynocentrism and the prevailing victim mentality insure that to be the case. Just think of a woman tied to the railroad tracks and imagine how many men line up to help. Judges, police, lawyers, therapists and on and on.

Political Correctness

Therapists are paid a good salary to be able to identify and assess pathology.

There are many psychological disorders that increase the likelihood of false allegations. Among them are borderline personality disorder, sociopathy, dissociative disorder, narcissistic personality disorder and other personality disorders. Lying and false accusations are not uncommon in any of those diagnostic categories.

The therapist is expected to be able to spot this type of pathology and when the pathology is present to be able to not reinforce such untruth to the client, or to the public, or in court testimony.

Sadly, the days of therapists being trained to root out such evil are pretty much gone.

In today's mandatory Politically Correct climate any woman claiming rape or domestic violence is believed no matter what. Even questioning her about her story is framed as re-traumatizing the victim or what they are calling "blaming the victim." If therapists go along with such a mandate their hands are tied – how do they stand up for the truth if the client is falsely accusing?

The therapist's inability to do so leaves their clients at risk, the families at risk, the court system perjured and themselves at risk of a malpractice suit. The therapist has simply become an enabler.

Over-Identification

The profession of psychotherapy tends to draw people who have a history of difficult childhoods and rocky upbringings.

Many therapists work through these early troubles in school or in their own therapy. Having worked it through puts them in a very good position to be of help to others who have experienced similar difficulties.

However, there is a subset who never really work through their own troubles and this can lead to all sorts of complications. One of those is if the therapist has not resolved old issues around being a victim – then when a client comes along who claims to be a victim, the chances are good that this therapist will over-identify with the client's victim stance.

In other words, the therapists unfinished childhood issues start being seen in the problems of the client.

Now the client's victimhood becomes enmeshed in the therapist's own victimhood. As soon as that happens the therapist loses objectivity. It is no longer simply about helping the client see the truth and work towards living a healthy and happy life. Now they are banded together as partners dedicated to stopping the identified perpetrator. They are a team to stop the bad guy, and that bad guy is both the bad guy envisioned by the client and the bad guy of the therapist's old and unfinished stuff.

So put all five of these things together and what do you get?

Gynocentrism, male disposability, victim mentality, political correctness, and a therapist who is overly identified with the victimhood of the client.

You get real trouble. The therapist will no longer be able to see the client in a therapeutic manner. More likely they will be seen as a comrade in a war to rid the world of this perpetrator.

At this point the therapist has become a danger to both their client and to the client's family. The truth is a casualty but so is the client's family. To make matters worse the therapist carries credentials that make them an authority and a part of the system.

The therapist has an official seal of approval that is then carried into the courtroom to sink the chances of the man to even see his children. This application of gynocentrism and the four other factors described above are killing our culture.

Fathers are Good

The fact is that fathers are a critical part of their child's life. Nearly every metric shows that when fathers are a big part of the child's life the child does better. When fathers are absent things fall apart in a big way. By limiting father's access to their children we are not only hurting the fathers, we are also setting our children up for failure. The gynocentric family court system is killing us.

We know now that dads do things automatically that help the healthy development of the child.

Here's one. Fathers are far more likely to toss their kids in the air. The mom's grit their teeth and warn him to be careful.

Now we know that being tossed in the air helps the kids to later be more able to take risks. The dad's automatic behavior with his children is exactly what they need.

By removing fathers from the homes we are shooting ourselves in the heart. The research is clear. Father involvement is a huge factor in healthy child development. By limiting the time fathers spend with their kids we are not only hurting the fathers, we are hurting the children.

Any time there is therapy done with a divorced family there needs to be checks and balances. If one parent is blaming the other totally, making accusations of abuse and domestic violence and wildly flailing in attempts to implicate the other, there needs to be some sort of safety valve.

We need a third party to verify that is the case. We need to have supports for all members of the family whether it is the mom, the dad or the kids. Divorces are serious business and can be extremely hurtful. We need to be sure they we are not the third-party abusers who have fallen into a trap of lies.

Those therapists who go along with the pathology of the accusing parent need to be called out on their incapacity to treat their client in a healthy and productive manner. They need to face disciplinary action if their over-identification has caused more pain and trauma in the family. They need to see the rights and well-being of all family members as being the essence of their work.

---

Famed native New York City TV chef Bobby Flay's dreamy 10 year marriage to Law & Order: SVU actress Stephanie March has turned into a nightmare served extra crispy. News accounts vary on which one of them filed for divorce but their prenuptial agreement is being challenged as well – poor Steph is due to get only $5000 per month and that's barely enough to cover the bleach treatments on her tresses, I guess.

As men going their own way (MGTOW) well know, it is bittersweet when couples you like split like a kiwi under a cleaver: bitter that another marriage has collapsed and sweet that you knew better than to fall into the marriage trap that destroys the lives, families and bank accounts of so many good men.

I mean, seriously: Law & Order: SVU features cops and lawyers destroying the lives of men (both guilty and innocent) every week merely because men dare to have sexual desires. Even touching – even looking at – any woman associated with that show should be seen as the height of suicidal ideation in men. Rattlesnakes are safer, tastier, and won't bite your retirement funds.

Although he was born and reared in New York City, Flay adopted Southwestern Cuisine as his hallmark to the point where he married Dallas girl March, who made uncredited appearances as his friend on some of his barbecue (BBQ) shows. In honor of his new-found "freedom" from having sex with March (but he's not free from paying her for it) and since he'll be tied up in court for a bit, I figured I'd help dudebro Bobby out by sharing some of my BBQ secrets.

One cornerstone of BBQ is the preparation of slabs of pork ribs. There is something distinctly primal to the combination of open fire, slabs of meat and ripping juicy flesh from one bone after another, much like attorneys gut the wallets of hapless former husbands while their ex-wives are bobbing their heads with approval on the laps of their new boytoys.

Many novices confuse BBQ with outdoor grilling. The methods have some common elements but the techniques are wildly different – grilling involves fast cooking of things like burgers and hotdogs over direct high heat. BBQ is prepared slowly using indirect heat for most or all the cooking. In relationship terms, grilling is a 10 minute walk of shame and BBQ is a drawn out divorce court fight.

Back in the 1980's the company I worked for gave 5 year anniversary gifts to employees who could survive the pressure cooker of long hours, impossible deadlines and international travel. Most of the gifts were gender neutral but one was distinctly male: a Weber® Original Kettle™ grill.

If you don't have access to a BBQ pit, you can modify a charcoal kettle grill to serve as one, but first you will need to gather what I call "veggie tailings" – the forgotten debris left over from vegetable preparation, much like the quiet, ignored tears of the confused children of divorce.

Veggie tailings include otherwise discarded things like:

- The husks, silk and stems from whole ears of freshly cleaned sweet corn.
- The dried husks, tough outer layers, stems, cores and root ends of large, sweet yellow onions.
- The stems and seeds from peppers like bell or jalapeño.

The leftover debris of any other fragrant vegetable that you enjoy is a good candidate for the tailings pile. If I'm planning on making BBQ I'll gather up the tailings for several days beforehand – once I even got corn husks free when I saw a farmer's market owner husking corn for sale and I asked nicely if I could haul off some of them to go with my purchase.

The fuel:

Regular, cheap charcoal is fine for use as fuel. In my area mesquite-infused charcoal is sometimes available and if the price difference is not too great I'll use that.

Chips or chunks of whole mesquite wood are also nice to have – I soak these in water for at least overnight before I use them. These are used only after the fire is started, of course.

The veggie tailings you've been collecting will also be turned into fuel. More on this below.

Firestarter:

I use an electric fire starter – basically a loop of metal that you plug directly into a wall outlet/or via extension cord once you are ready to start the fire. I avoid lighter fluid – while some folks have fond memories of the chemical aftertaste, I find it to be as unsavory as thinking that a prenup will protect you from a harridan armed with a pricey, weaponized divorce lawyer.

Prepare for the burn:

Remove the top cooking screen from the grill and on one side of bottom grill screen (NOT the center), make a small pile of charcoal. SMALL. We are BBQing, not grilling! If you want to be precise, make a square with 25 charcoal briquettes (5×5). Top with the cool, unplugged electric fire starter, then build a pyramid like the patriarchy of old forced feminists to erect: add a layer of 16 (4×4) briquettes, then 9 (3×3), then 4 (2×2), then 1. Beautiful.

Prepare the ribs for the BBQ:

Many people use a "dry rub" for the surface of their BBQ ribs – some recipes for these rubs can be quite elaborate – see, for example, this untested one from the Food Network.

I prefer to omit these rubs completely – like marriage, I find dry rubs to be painful, disappointing and utterly unnecessary to one's BBQ success – the salt in the rubs tends to draw moisture out of your meat and the spices on the surface can turn bitter if they burn.

Instead, using heavy-duty aluminum foil, I build a “cradle” under the ribs to contain their natural juices as much as possible while allowing the smoky heated air to surround them. If the ribs appear to be low in fat I’ll be tempted to rub some oil on them but I’ve found this step to be unnecessary also – raw dogging it works best for me.

Prepare the Veggies:

Peel 4 or more ears of sweet corn, saving the husks and other debris for the fire. Place on heavy-duty aluminum foil with salt, butter and whatever spices you prefer. Wrap tightly.

Slice off the stem and root ends of one or two yellow onions, saving the debris for the fire. Slice the remaining bulb in 2-3 round disks, each about 1/2 inch thick. Remove and save the dry outer layers of the slices.

Place a slice of onion on a sheet of aluminum foil and top with a splash of teriyaki sauce and a pat of butter. If you like, add a sliced button mushroom or two and seal the packet. Repeat with the other slices.

We DID start the fire

When all else is ready, it is time to fire up the grill. Plug in the electric starter. Within 5-8 minutes the coals will be aflame and you can unplug and remove the starter. I take this chance to flatten the coal pyramid to an arc slice of no more than 2 briquettes high. After about 4 more minutes all the coals should be at least 50% grey with fire and ash. It is time to damp down the fire like affirmative consent dialogue kills sexual passion.

If you have soaked-in-water Mesquite chunks or chips around, drain them and layer them over the hot coals. Careful! – the upwell of steam can be fast and scalding.

Next, later about 1 to 2 inches of veggie tailings over the coals. The steam should be robust but you still want to keep the fire going. This is the art of BBQ – moderated heat, not too hot and not too slow.

Onto the flames!

Place the top metal grill surface atop the damped coals and place the ribs and veggie packets on the cool side of the grill away from the direct heat. Open both the top and bottom air vents on the grill to 100% and close up the grill with the lid. After a minute or so, a strong vortex of steamy smoke should be bursting through the top vent. Close the vents to 50% – you may need to tinker with them to keep the fire low and steady.

As the veggie tailings dry out and eventually char, then burn, the sweet fragrance of corn/onion will permeate the neighborhood and local feminists will start hunting you for your resources, much like Stephanie March hunting for Bobby Flay’s credit cards. Tell the feminists that your fictitious “girlfriend” (or better, your fictitious “boyfriend”) is the real cook in the family and that she/he’ll be back from the store later. Once feminists are satisfied that your resources are under matriarchal supervision, their interest in your money will wane.

Keep an eye on the steam vent – too little steam/smoke means either:

1. The fire is going out like Lesbian bed death, in which case you may need to open the vents or even leave the top off for 5 minutes to refresh the fire, add more charcoal, or more likely

2. The fire is burning too hot, in which case you may need to damp down the fire further with more veggie tailings/damp wood chips, or cut down on the air reaching the coals.

Slowly cook the ribs, corn and onions for 2-3 hours. During this time you can prepare a BBQ sauce (see below) or taunt feminists on Twitter. For the last 10-20 minutes as the fire reaches its highest heat, remove the ribs from the foil and place them over the high heat to brown and caramelize the outside of the ribs.

Remove the food from fire, cool for 8-10 minutes, and serve.

To sauce or not to sauce:

I start with a bottle of commercially produced BBQ sauce but I always modify it. I'll add minced garlic, chopped green onion, chopped jalapeno pepper, black pepper, hot sauce, some leftover wine or beer, and whatever else I think might be interesting, then slowly simmer the result while the ribs are cooking.

My not-so-secret ingredient is a wild one: Angostura Bitters. One to two tablespoons to a bottle of sauce adds an amazing punch of flavor.

Bobby Flay worked in steamy kitchens for decades to build up his restaurant empire. At age 50 he should be enjoying the fruits of his labor. Instead, he will now be in a court fight with a vicious, toxic shrew.

Not even the best sauce can make that palatable.

Will Brittney Griner Get The Ray Rice Treatment?

By now I'm sure you've heard – WNBA star center Brittney Griner has been in the hoose-gow for going upside her fiance, fellow WNBA star Glory Johnson's head in a rough and tumble that would make Rickson Gracie blush. The happy couple was arrested by the Goodyear, AZ police, and, according to AVFM Sports Editor Ty Henry, the WNBA is currently "obtaining more information" into the events surrounding the arrest of their two marquee players. Just for the record, it has been suggested that it was Griner who was the aggressor, arguing with Johnson for several days before the brawl broke out in their Phoenix-area home where a man attempted to break up the two, himself getting hurt in the process. According to her Wikipedia page, Griner is 6'8″, 199lbs, while Johnson weighs in at a mere 170lbs and is 6'3″. That is important, because the argument goes, at least when it comes to straight couples, that the reason why the focus is on the men involved is due to their inherent physical size advantage they have over women (disregarding the fact that "Jack Spratt" couples are quite common). Of course, that goes right out the window when lesbian couples, where one more or less takes on the more "masculine" role is being considered, eh?

So, let's get right to it – one can't help but recall last year's hot story, where on Valentine's Day weekend, then NFL star-running back Ray Rice, punched out his then-fiance Janay, in an Atlantic City casino and resort elevator. Before all the facts were in, Rice was quickly suspended from the team, then booted from the Baltimore Ravens football club altogether, and then was suspended indefinitely from playing in the NFL ever again. An enormous push on the part of social justice warriors and Black feminists descended onto the NFL, imploring them to make much more noise about domestic abuse, and held out Rice as the whipping boy of all that is wrong with the league's culture of "toxic masculinity". As Rice would go on to say a year later, he was nearly brought to suicide as the result of the CYA lynch mob mentality and actions on the part of NFL Commissioner Goodall and company.

The NBA seems to have followed suit, airing ads about the need for men to "lean in" and have "conversations" about domestic violence and the like, seen most prominently during the famed All-Star Weekend that took place in NYC earlier this year. So, it is very interesting that its sister organization, the WNBA, now has to grapple with the very issues they have been raking male fans and players over the coals with.

The questions, are obvious. Will Griner be suspended from the Phoenix Mercury, pending results of a full police investigation? Will she be released from the team, due to the bad image Griner has given them? Will the WNBA indefinitely suspend her, like the NFL has done Rice – and if not, why? On what grounds?

More questions: will the WNBA now prominently display adverts, discussing the facts about domestic violence, and urging awareness of same to their lesbian fans and players? Will the WNBA now have lesbian anti-domestic violence advocates and workers, there to school and train its personnel and staff, on the issue? Will there be all manner of armchair psychological profiles of Griner in the press in the manner done to Rice, to account for her abusive actions? After all, it is a matter of public record that Griner has reported being bullied as a child – a classic "tell" of an abuser. If not, why?

Even more questions(!): will Feminista Jones, write about the ills of domestic violence as they pertain to the Black lesbian community in Time magazine? Will Kimberly Foster and her team at For Harriet, do the same? Will Kali Nicole Gross, PhD, pen at least one column about the darkside, pardon the pun, of Black lesbian love, in the august Huffington Post? Will Brittney "Professor Crunk" Cooper, speak on it from her perch at Salon.com? Keep in mind everyone, that a major plank of the Black Feminist manifesto, going all the way back to the Combahee River Collective more than four decades ago, was all about being deeply concerned with Black lesbian women; today, Black Internet Feminists, proclaim loud and long their allegience to the LGBT communities in Black America. Well, now is their time t really put up or shut up – will they?

Now, let's keep it brutally 100 here. I think we all know that to ask the questions, are to answer them. None of these folks, nor the WNBA itself, gives a damn about the truth, or fairness, or justice. They all care about their own bottomlines, and the ideologies they nuture and harbor, in that order. And if we've learned anything coming out of the Ray Rice affair, is that piling on men and men alone (recall the fact that Janay Rice herself has gone on the record in saying that she was just as much at fault as her now hubbie Ray in what went down that night in that elevator) is big business in America. Nothing will be said about the current Brittney Griner issue because it doesn't fit the Narrative, that only men alone can be aggressors – never women, under any circumstances.

Even if it's a lesbian couple who are duking it out in the middle of their own living room in full view of witnesses.

If you think what happened to Stephen A. Smith in the wake of the Ray Rice story was bad, can you imagine what will happen to him if he were to dish on the Brittney Griner issue in his signature no-holds-barred, tell-it-like-it-TIZ way? He won't just be fired; he'll be walked up to Calvary Hill and crucified.

I predict that the Brittney Griner story will quickly go down the rabbit hole, because it doesn't excoriate the right people. And I further predict that Black feminists will act as if nothing ever happened, even when prompted to discuss the matter (and oh, believe me, I will be prompting them, just so it will be on the record – follow me on Twitter to see all the action for yourself!).

You heard it here; count it!

What does R_PE culture mean to you?

April 27, 2015 | by B.R. Merrick | Link | Original Link

I remember when I first went to see “The Silence of the Lambs.” I walked home from the theater hugging my nipples. I remember telling myself that I definitely didn’t want to have any nightmares about it. Thankfully, that has never occurred.

I think that the character of Hannibal Lecter, played in an unfortunate immortal fashion by Anthony Hopkins, was a misrepresentation of men and of the nature of evil. The film does work in another way, however. As I’ve said before of great art: It has a tendency to transcend the original intentions of the artists who create it. Seeing how Hopkins went on to portray Lecter twice more as some sort of lovable antihero, it is clear to me that the culture didn’t fully comprehend that Lecter can be seen – and in my opinion ought to be seen – as symbolic of truth.

Americans are especially curious when it comes to the meanings of words like truth. Our politicians gather on a regular basis to bloviate about truth, freedom, etc. and they get millions to emotionally respond. Whenever this happens, I remind myself that what the campaigners are doing is manipulating emotions with words, like rapture.

We love truth right up until the moment that it becomes uncomfortable. Then we want our delusions so that we can go on feeling happy. I wrote an article years ago for another website about how I believe truth is like a mountain. You can spend your life researching, hiking, writing poetry, painting, photographing, looking at, and living near a mountain; and only gather a handful of information about it. Your mind and your emotions will change quite a bit concerning the mountain, but it will remain unchanged and unfeeling.

Truth is much the same. Truth is cognizant knowledge of reality, of facts. Reality, like a mountain, does not change shape. (I am deliberately leaving out mountains like Mount St. Helens that are formed by volcanic activity. Duh.) We either fit our minds around reality, as pleasant and unpleasant as it routinely gets, or we spend our lives stumbling about.

In the film, trainee Clarice Starling was warned by her professor not to allow Lecter to ask her any personal questions. Her fixation on her hopeful rise through a prestigious organization, which Lecter immediately gleaned from a fairly impersonal first interview, led her to abandon his good advice:

You’re so ambitious, aren’t you? You know what you look like to me with your good bag and your cheap shoes? You look like a rube. A well-scrubbed hustling rube with a little taste. Good nutrition has given you some length of bone, but you’re not more than one generation from poor white trash, are you, Agent Starling? And that accent you’ve tried so desperately to shed: pure West Virginia.

To this Starling could say little more than: “You see a lot, doctor.” The end result, after being sent unknowingly into the hell of another disturbed mind, is that her professor, a father figure who ascends a staircase just like her real father going up to heaven, is unable to offer her any comfort when Lecter proves that he can get to her anywhere at any time he likes. He knows the uncomfortable truth about her: She's an orphan from a world of poverty who has nightmares about screaming lambs and fantasies about saving victims. Now that she has a sociopath in her head, certain unpleasant thoughts about herself will never leave.

Not long before I saw that movie, I had the opportunity to be at a presentation that helped to teach me the importance of words. A man and a woman demonstrated for the group. Another man giving the presentation showed a 5X8 card to the man and different one to the woman. Then he held up a third card to the entire group with one word minus one letter: R_PE. He asked the man what word came to his mind. "Ripe," he replied. He asked the woman. With a slight look of astonishment, she replied, "Rape." Then he showed the group the other two cards. The man had read a card with words like "strawberries," "fruity," and "sweet." The woman had read a card with words like "crime," "violate," and "dirty."

The truth behind this activity? Just three letters and one underscore can mean the difference between the most pleasant and unpleasant thoughts. By itself, R_PE can mean nothing. It looks like an acronym, and an unknown one at that. Yet when reading the title of this article, I'm sure that every reader knew at what I was driving.

I was driving to Panama Beach, the site of yet another horrifying rape during Spring Break just this month, one that was caught on camera and witnessed by dozens of onlookers. A woman claims that four black college men raped her while she lay drugged on the beach. So full of their rapist bravado they were that they had the balls to film the crime in broad daylight on a crowded beach, while women watched going, "Whoooooo!"

National media is in an uproar, as well as the local sheriff, who called the video the "most disgusting, sickening thing." People all over this land mass want to look up to sheriffs, and one who joins in the national disgust over the national disgrace of unbridled male sexuality is sure to get his secret desire: to see the end of Spring Break in Panama Beach, which will undoubtedly lead to less worry one week per year, and a great deal less beer bottles to recycle.

I won't bother linking to the endless comments below the endless articles that call for genital removal, life sentences, and the death penalty for the men. I won't "blame the victim" for other people's sickening ideas of "justice." I will, however, point out that we have moved away rather rapidly from a culture where angry young women hold up signs saying, "Don't tell me not to dress like a slut; tell men not to rape." We now live in a R_PE culture where we hear, "Don't tell me not to drink and drive; tell the road to bend to my drunken will."

Since at least the Sexual Revolution, this one week per year has been about one thing to the young adult participants: going wild. The seemingly limitless jack-off videos of "Girls Gone Wild" are commonly shot at numerous Spring Break and Mardi Gras locations. We are asked to believe that the truth is that even women cannot tell, when bikini-clad and half drunk, when another drunk and bikini-clad woman is being raped. How long before Women's Studies programs in universities nationwide become mandatory for the young ladies?

They'd better pull it off soon, before Florence Welch does another video for another one of her songs. As you can see in this linked video, the songstress behind Florence + the Patriarchy Machine spends the bulk of the video simulating a gang rape bang. The difference, I suppose, is that she's not on Spring Break while it happens.

What is the message women are being sent when they watch a gang bang, I mean rape, I mean bang, I mean r_pe, I mean, "Whoooooo!"? It's the same mixed message, complete with mixed signals, that they asked for with the premiere of "50 Shades of Grey," a movie that mainstream media brags about breaking this, that, and the other box office record. I have no need to see such a movie, because I already know what it's about, having sat through a far more sexually explicit French movie entitled "Romance" (yeah, right), about a young woman with a gorgeous boyfriend who's content, in herbivore fashion, to hang out with her like brother and sister rather than have sex. After numerous casual encounters behind his back with numerous other men, she decides on a rather ugly but well-established middle aged man who ties her up and sexually assaults her. To solidify their "harmonious" relationship in her mind, she picks up the baby she made with her boyfriend, turns on the gas stove, blows up his apartment while he is sleeping in it, and runs off with her abuser, obviously because she is not bikini-clad and drunk on a beach where everyone goes to have sex.

The political Left has always understood the power of semantic arguments. They have usurped the word "liberal" that was once tied to tolerance of differences, and bastardized it, as they do with language in general, to mean the state of being extraordinarily generous with everyone else's money. Having won this victory, they are now free to redefine any word they choose: black, feminist, rape, minority, union, oppression, and now "Whoooooo!"

They also know how to tie up the political Right in their never-ending semantic game, and the political infighting has now reached such a degree as to make any meaningful debate problematic at best. Both the Left and the Right want power over discourse so badly now that truth itself remains largely silent because few are speaking it.

Fortunately, like a mountain, truth also remains large. The truth is that on beyond semantics, words are important. Words are, like music, a distinctly human language. Words are symbolic, and symbols call words to mind. A culture where hateful people are in charge – people who listen to hateful women – is a dying culture, because hate cannot produce life-oriented thoughts and behavior. The words that "liberals" control continue to have various meanings, contexts, and symbols that they will never be able to completely control.

When free speech becomes a privilege and is guarded by something as sickening as political correctness, it dies. When men are sent mixed signals, and continue to believe that fast-and-easy sex with the opposite sex is possible in a dying culture, they can ruin their lives.

The truth is: It is long past time for men to spend Spring Break bonding with each other, far from the influence of women. When men lead the way, women are sure to follow, except that this time they'll have to do so by going in their own direction, like the men. More male bonding means women are further from men. This will lead to more female bonding, and a resurrection of the mystery surrounding the opposite sex.

It should be painfully clear that the empire's all-encompassing desire to regulate humanity is failing, when heavily regulated universities filled with heavily regulated learning and heavily regulated minds filled with heavily regulated guilt over politically incorrect thoughts go on largely unregulated Spring Break to have sex with women whose minds are filled with thoughts (and fantasies) about r_pe.

Want more truth? Here's some truthful advice: If you don't want to have regretful bad sex with men who will now regret it for the rest of their natural lives while they suffer the mother of all public lynchings, don't go on Spring Break. And don't tell me what to write; tell yourself to stop reading.

Excerpt from Black Man's Guide Out of Poverty

April 28, 2015 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

> The following is an excerpt from The Black Man's Guide Out of Poverty: For Black Men Who Demand Better, by Aaron Clarey, better known as Captain Capitalism.
> No matter what the media tells you,
> No matter what politicians say
> And no matter what Oprah says,
> Families need fathers.
> This "heroic single mother" bullshit is precisely that – bullshit.
> Because of a myriad of reasons (beyond the scope of this book) there is a social, political, and economic push to marginalize fathers in today's society, belittling the role they play in both society and the family. In return, they exalt single motherhood, single parenthood, and pretty much any other form of the family as long as it isn't the normal, nuclear family, and as long as it doesn't have a father.
> Unfortunately, this skewed approach has had the disastrous consequences you'd expect it to have when you more or less dismiss or kick out an entire sex from society. Divorce, broken families, broken children, crime, psychological problems, recession, lower economic growth, increased bankruptcies, drug addiction, alcoholism, you name it, nearly every problem we have today in the US is (at least in-part) due to the lack of strong, manly fathers in today's families.
> Thankfully, however, just because society is trending this way, doesn't mean you have to. And like all other decisions in life, if you make the right ones, your personal life will benefit from it. So when it comes to raising your children you have to ignore what society says and KNOW that children NEED their fathers and they need tough fatherly love.
> Of course, children can't just get by on "tough, fatherly love." They need both the nourishing, forgiving, kind, sweet love from their mother and the disciplinarian, patriarchical love from their father. But right now society is so skewed towards the motherly "bribe you with cake" method of rearing that children are being ill-reared. This not only gives you the right to mete out the tough, fatherly love, but a mandate.
> What this tough, fatherly love is though, is simple. It's the love that is more concerned with your children 30 years from now, than you are about them today. So while the mother is tending to all the immediate needs of her children today (food, injuries, care, emotions, etc.), as a father it is your responsibility to train them, prepare them, and equip them to survive as adults into tomorrow.
> Sadly, this is not the "cookies and cake" sort of love the mother gets to deal out, > but it is no less important. It is telling your child no, disciplining and punishing them if they display aberrant behavior that will get them hurt and killed in the future, and ensuring they do not get too full of themselves so they might function well with other adults. But the real value of fatherly love is the wisdom, guidance, and context they will need to navigate and be successful in life.

> For example, my insistence on humans being the most important thing in life, and your wife/children being the most important human beings, is the context necessary for every human to go forth and get the most out of life. That context, however, is just not provided by mothers.
> Another example was a female friend of mine whose dad would not pay her way through college unless she majored in a STEM field. At the time she hated him for it. He was "not letting her be herself." But in the end this WISDOM paid off greatly. She is now a doctor, does not live at home, and does not worry about poverty or strife.
> And a third, lifting weights. When I was a teenage boy I was told by my mother that girls don't like jocks or big strong guys. They liked sensitive caring men. Men who listened to their problems. And all the other typical female bullshit women say. Of course, pursuing that strategy was a SPECTACULAR failure and led to absolutely NO success with women. It wasn't until I listened to one of my fatherly male elders did he provide me the guidance that women do not want sensitive, caring men, but strong, aloof, and indifferent men, no matter what they say. In the end I hit the gym (among other things) and improved my success with women dramatically.
> The point is that your sons and daughters need strong, disciplined, and strategic long-term love. Because while motherly love is kind, forgiving, and absolutely necessary it does NOTHING to prepare your children for the harsh realities of life that they are going to face in the future. And if you don't deliver this necessary love to them, they WILL suffer a life of confusion, failure, ineptitude, and strife because they were always pampered, never trained, hardened, or disciplined.
> In short, it is the mother's love that ensures the child doesn't run away.
> It is the father's love that ensures your child wants to come back home to visit you as an adult.

National Coalition for Men files formal complaint with U.S. Defense Secretary over bogus army sexual assault court-martial

April 28, 2015 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

The National Coalition for Men (NCFM) has filed an official complaint with the U.S. Secretary of Defense and others, after a lengthy inquiry, in the matter of the court-martial of a highly-decorated combat veteran and Army Officer.

U.S. Army Major Christian "Kit" Martin is an Apache helicopter pilot assigned to the 101st Airborne Division at Fort Campbell, Kentucky. Major Martin has served with honor and distinction for nearly 29 years including several combat deployments to Iraq.

As a result of NCFM's extensive inquiry they have filed a 19-page complaint with Defense Secretary Aston Carter, Army Chief of Staff General Ray Odierno, the DOD Inspector General and Senator Rand Paul. The complaint has been shared with approximately 20 other political office holders and news media outlets including the Military Times, and Dateline on ID (Investigation Discovery), who is considering covering this story as another in a long list of ideologically and politically motivated persecutions of military personnel involving allegations of sexual assault, harassment, and domestic violence.

As we have seen many times before, the allegations that involve various sexual assault violations stem from a high-conflict separation and divorce from a vindictive ex-wife, who has been well educated in intricacies in the way that allegations of sexual assault are handled in the military, and the knowledge of the ferocity of how those allegations result in court-martial proceedings.

In today's military, almost any allegation of domestic violence or sexual assault is certain to be sent to a court-martial, regardless of the validity of the allegations. Many of the Pentagon and military senior leadership have been cowed and neutered by ferocious ideological feminists who send cases to court-martial even when the facts state otherwise. In this case, the allegations had been investigated and rejected by civilian authorities more than a year before the Army picked up where they left off.

Not surprisingly, the ex-wife's allegations came only after being told by Major Martin that he wanted a divorce; allegations about incidents that she said had been going on for years but she never told anyone, never said anything to anyone, never sought out or asked for help from the dozens of resources and programs available to military domestic violence victims; they just kind of popped up when she was faced with divorce. My, isn't that interesting! Can anyone say, BULLSHIT!?

What is even more disturbing in this case is the fact that court records, transcripts, and official files have already determined that the allegations are unfounded and have decided that Major Martin's ex-wife was untruthful (a liar).

The court records show that Major Martin's ex-wife; Ms. Joan Harmon, isn't his wife at all.

She never was. It has been discovered that Ms. Harmon never divorced a man she married, Mr. Carlos Guerra, a resident of Tennessee, before fleeing nearly a decade ago with their three young children. Mr. Guerra, still Harmon's legal husband, tried without success for years to find Harmon and their kids.

As a result of the efforts of Major Martin's legal team, his ex-wife, or should we say his bigamist ex-wife has been formally charged with a felony count of Bigamy in the Commonwealth of Kentucky. She has already been arrested, arraigned, and is pending trial in August.

NCFM has also discovered that the military has attempted to pressure civilian authorities to dismiss charges against Ms. Harmon, which is a clear violation of the Posse Commitatus Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1385. If the charges against Ms. Harmon are dismissed, her credibility as the sole accuser will be enhanced, thereby increasing the chances of a conviction. Consequently, the Army is trying to make that little irritating fact go away.

There is also significant evidence of the issue of Unlawful Command Influence on the part of military commanders at Fort Campbell, primarily on the part of the Deputy Commander for Operations, Brigadier General Mark Stammer, or as he is referred to in military circles as "Stammer the Hammer," presumably due to his no-nonsense and zero-tolerance approach to allegations of sexual assault and domestic violence.

Brigadier General Mark Stammer
AVfM is in full support of no-nonsense and zero-tolerance approaches and policies to address domestic violence and sexual assault but we are also fully aware of how spurious and false allegations seem to take on a life of their own, especially under the hype and hysteria of the non-existent sexual assault epidemic in the military. This false allegation monster is exacerbated by false and misleading facts about the real extent of the problem, retaliation, extreme political correctness, self-serving interests and capitulation and cowardice to the shrill voices of sex assault epidemic supporters, including the likes of Senators' Kirsten Gillibrand and Claire McCaskill.

The mountain of evidence, however, paints a very different picture; one of a fast track to a court-martial based on little to no evidence as in this case in addition to allegations made by a liar; a determination already made by civilian Kentucky authorities.

Just as we have seen at our college campuses with the shoddy, Homer-Simpson-like unqualified investigations, kangaroo courts and the rush to judgment, the same principles are applied to our military. It seems, in today's day and age, innocuous and innocent conduct is immediately classified as some type of harassment or assault, and cases are sent to court-martial based on nothing more than unproven and unverified allegations. In many cases like this one, they are sent to court-martial even when the allegations have been proven false in a civilian court of law.

NCFM has discovered at least 16 separate state and federal criminal law violations that Ms. Harmon has committed that have been ignored by the Army, yet they are basing their case primarily on allegations made by a liar, and quite possibly a pathological liar.

As we have seen and reported before, there are more than a few problems with this suspect court-martial. The desire, or the political need to appear to wipe out sexual assault in the military by any means possible has resulted in the hijacking and obliteration of the truth, the constitution and due process.

Civilian military criminal defense attorney Jocelyn C. Stewart of Tacoma Washington, a former military (JAG) prosecutor and defense attorney who specializes in military sexual assault, states;

> Now more than any other time in the history of the United States military is a service member at risk of being accused of sexual assault, facing investigation by tenacious law enforcement and eventual trial by court-martial.

As a stern warning to all male members of the U.S. military; you are in a hostile work environment; an environment that can mean the end of your military career or land you in prison based on nothing more than one false allegation. Even if you don't end up in the Leavenworth Detention Barracks, you are one false allegation away from having your life negatively changed forever.

The only true and accurate way this can be described is that this is lunacy times infinity on steroids.

This is all too often a common scenario where allegations alone; without proof, seem to suffice to charge a soldier with a host of offenses, and in effect, ending that soldier's career. The NCFM complaint letter also addresses the overbearing and overreaching sexual assault briefings that portray only men as abusers and only women as victims.

This overreach is having a devastating and negative effect on the military. In a recent article in the Military Times, many soldiers shared their displeasure at being labeled and told time after time that essentially they are rapists who need to be trained and reminded over and over not to rape.

In the article, Army Staff Sgt. Alexander VanArsdall said the military's sexual harassment and assault prevention training has been > one-sided, and overly focused on painting men as aggressors and women as victims….a common thing among male service members, when they head into the training, is to say, 'It's time to learn what a racist, sexist, intolerant bastard I am.'…that's what it feels like. We start to get a little indignant and upset, and feel persecuted in our own right.

Domestic violence and sexual assault posters, billboards, brochures and handout materials litter military installations like graffiti in Times Square on New Year's Eve. Leaflets are taped above urinals in the men's latrines, and one military member interviewed stated that he cannot walk 50 feet without seeing something to remind him what a despicable rapist in waiting he truly is.

NCFM reported of the story of now retired Army Lieutenant Colonel Darin Haas, the former Fort Campbell SHARP director who was charged with violating a restraining order.

As it turned out, the restraining order, made by a philandering ex-wife, was fraudulent; the policies and legalities of the Clarksville Tennessee Police Department were called into question, and all charges were dismissed. The main stream media, however, once they got their salacious headlines of a high-ranking Army officer who headed the sexual assault program being arrested, ignored the subsequent exoneration – they were no longer interested in the story.

Major Martin continues to fight and we expect some significant changes in his case. It is to be hoped that someone in the military's hierarchy will review these draconian, biased policies and make changes to restore a level of sanity, common sense, and rule of law to these types of allegations and how they are handled.

Major Martin's fiancée Laura Spencer has set up a Facebook page; "Protect your Soldier" for support. Please feel free to visit her Facebook page and offer some support.

It is hoped, due to the media interest, that this case will become the catalyst for the overhaul of the military justice system in the manner in which allegations of sexual assault, harassment, and domestic violence are handled.

The bottom line is that there is no epidemic of sexual assault in the military. Those statistics being thrown around like bird seed have already been debunked. The so-called misleading surveys have already been proven inaccurate, and from a commonsense perspective, does anyone actually believe in the figures being thrown around that essentially state that someone in the military has a chance of being the victim of a sexual assault that is FORTY (40) times higher than what occurs in the City of Detroit?

PUUUU-LEEEEZE!!!

There is no dispute that there are cases of sexual assault, harassment and domestic violence in the military but to classify it as an epidemic based on a false narrative, hysteria and a rush to judgment, is simply a terrible insult to the majority of honorable men and women in our military who do not engage in these types of behaviors.

Level-headed commonsense solutions, rule of law, the constitution and due process should dictate how these cases are handled. Not, as in the case of Major Christian "Kit" Martin, should an innocent man be sacrificed on the hysterical and delusional altar of political correctness and gender ideology run amok.

At long last, justice for Vladek Filler

Editor's note: This article is also available in Spanish.

They say the wheels of justice turn slowly. As in so many other cases, "they" are not particularly reliable informants. As we all know, very often the wheels of justice do not turn at all and when they do it is often to roll across the backs of innocent people. Particularly men.

Vladek Filler is such a man. In his case the "justice" system ran him down in the street, then backed up to leave tread marks on him again for good measure.

In his case, though, I am very happy to say that the justice system experienced a correction, even if just for a moment.

Vladek has been through an eight year nightmare, starting with an abusive, extremely volatile and disordered ex-wife who made a false allegation of rape in the process of a divorce. That allegation landed in the hands of a corrupt, ideological prosecutor who committed multiple violations of prosecutorial ethics and law to get a conviction.

When that conviction was overturned because of the prosecutorial misconduct, the same prosecutor's office went after him again for an alleged assault. Vladek was convicted for allegedly tossing some water on his wife in a fight and was forced to serve 21 days in jail.

Vladek and Son

Just as he prevailed in getting the bogus rape conviction overturned, Filler was again exonerated in a post-conviction review on April 24. Represented by attorney Hunter Tzovarras, Vladek's conviction was tossed out, a remarkable, exceedingly rare event at post-conviction review. Even more remarkably, his conviction was unhinged because the court accepted Tzovarras' argument that Filler was again convicted because of prosecutorial misconduct.

The court essentially ruled that the same prosecutor's office persecuting Vladek Filler all these years was still at it, and that his conviction and incarceration were the product of malfeasance from state functionaries. They also cited Brady violations in their ruling. The conviction has been completely vacated and the new Deputy District Attorney has dismissed the charge.

Now Vladek Filler is a free man, with no criminal record, just as he was before the Ellsworth, Maine prosecutor's office went on an illegal and vicious campaign to ruin his life.

That office, as some of you may know, was voted out on their corrupt asses in the last election which is arguably the reason that the new DA did the right thing.

Mary Kellett, the prosecutor who drew first blood in this eight year war, is out of a job and now has the distinction of being the only prosecutor in the Maine to have had her license suspended by the State Supreme Court for prosecutorial misconduct.

For a man who lived nearly a decade of his life in turmoil, this ending is as good as it gets.

It must be said that there was some excellent legal work (and activism) done during the course of Vladek's saga. I have it on very good authority that attorney Hunter Tzovarras did brilliant, tenacious work on Vladek's behalf. I know enough to say that our readers in Maine might want to bookmark his website.

Other than Mr. Tzovarras, there have been many good people over the years who have stepped up to make what aid they could in this classic struggle of one man against a monster of a bad system. There is one person who stands out to me in particular:

Vladek Filler.

I have had many, many people tell me that they could not take the stress of what I do. I even let those kudos go to my head every once in a while.

Unless I think about Vladek.

I have been watching his case for five, almost six years. I have tried to be as supportive as possible when I could, as many at AVFM have, but mostly I have just followed events to the best of my ability, which is mostly all the justice system allows me to do.

In following this case, though, I have been honored and awed to witness Vladek Filler carry weight and face pressures that would make me fold like a cheap suit. Whatever I or AVFM or attorneys or other activists have done to try to help further his cause, it was in the course of our jobs. We could all be as noisy and irritating to the legal system and the press as we wanted because we were shielded from any real consequences.

Vladek Filler stared straight down the barrel of a gun for eight years without blinking.

He never quit fighting, never cried uncle, never dropped it all just so he could get out from underneath the crushing weight of a justice system turned savage. He never made a deal, took a plea or kissed their rings in hopes they would call off the dogs. They came after him with everything.

He stood his ground like a lone, defiant Spartan warrior.

I don't think I have ever known anyone so brave, or so honorable. Vladek Filler forced the wheels of justice in his case back on track and in doing so scored a victory for all of us.

This is a great moment for justice and a great moment for Vladek Filler. Let us hope that now he and his loved ones can move forward, savoring the peace and the fact that justice, at long last, has finally been done.

Eating while MGTOW: The Sizzle of the Lambs

When I'm not biting the heads off kittens, you are likely to find me standing with a smokin' hot flame on my right and a very tasty little lamb chop to my left, both of which are about to make me extremely merry. Pull your heads out of the gutter, guys. We aren't talking about THAT kind of flame, nor THAT kind of lamb chop. This is, after all, about satisfying the primal urges of the man who isn't wasting his resources on what could be a futile attempt at achieving satisfaction from a tasty little lamb chop. This recipe should shock even the most vocal feminist into silence and satisfy the Hannibal Lector in all of us. It is best when eaten rare and can even be served with fava beans and a nice Chianti.

August Løvenskiolds latest offering managed to smoke out my better nature by reminding me that BBQ season is nigh and that it may be time for me to blow a little smoke of my own. In the world of BBQ, there is BBQ and there is BBQ. Purists will tell you that BBQ is low, slow, indirect heat and smoke. But in the broadest sense, BBQ has come to mean nearly anything cooked outdoors (and sometimes indoors) over an open flame. Accordingly, there are actually three ways to do BBQ: grilling, smoking, and slow roasting. Most of what we call BBQ is some combination of the three. August's slow roasted ribs are a prime example. He roasts them over indirect heat for 2-3 hours and uses smoke as a flavoring ingredient. I'll leave smoking for another day, but it is an even longer process where smoke not only adds flavor, but is used as a preservative. But grilling is what most folks think of when BBQ gets mentioned. That's my topic today.

Grilling is a hot and fast cooking process using direct heat. It is best done with charcoal or wood fires, using hardwood (such as oak, mesquite, or fruit woods). While the kind of wood can be important to the flavor, the smoke doesn't have time to penetrate the meat the way it does in longer cooking methods. This makes marinades, seasonings, and sauce more prominent as flavoring ingredients. Obtaining a charred outer crust is another way to enhance flavor.

The key to good grilling is to start with the meat or vegetables, whichever the case may be. What you intend to grill dictates everything else. My opinion (and yours may be different) is that the best lamb chops for the grill are the smaller New Zealand or Australian chops. They are smaller because the lambs are slaughtered younger. Because they are younger, they don't develop as much of the gamey flavor that turns a lot of folks off lamb. Besides, enjoying underage lamb won't entice local law enforcement to invite you to dinner at the big house for the next several years, although any officers called to the scene might think dinner at your house is warranted.

Once you've purchased your lamb chops, you may want to French them. Forget it guys, Frenching lamb chops has nothing to do with… well whatever you think it has to do with. Frenching, in this context, means to remove the fat and cartilage between the rib bones, giving them a nice clean look. If your ribs have come in a full rack, it is easiest to French them before cutting them into chops. But most likely, they will have already been Frenched so all you need do is trim any excess fat, then cut them apart.

Next, prepare the marinade. This not only adds flavor, it helps to reduce the gaminess, if done properly. At the hotel where I learned to prepare what many said were the best lamb chops they had ever eaten (and others said was the only time they ever liked lamb), I used a mint, lime, & cilantro salad dressing because that's what they wanted me to use. But I figured I could do better, so one day when there was no dressing, I improvised. There was no going back. For one or two racks of chops the following should do:

1 Tbs each fresh parsley, cilantro, and rosemary, finely chopped
2 Tbs mint leaves, finely chopped
Juice of 1 lime
½ tsp Dijon mustard
1 clove garlic, minced
1 tsp onion, minced
Pinch salt, pepper
2 oz olive oil, extra virgin

Combine all but the olive oil, then whisking quickly while slowly drizzling in the oil. Don't stop whisking. What you want is to emulsify the mixture. Normally oil and water (or lime juice) mix about as well as a feminist and a frat boy, but with the addition of an emulsifying agent (mustard) and rapid motion, you can force them together against their will without worrying about any false allegations to create a pleasantly creamy marinade. If they don't emulsify, oh well, you can still use it to marinate your chops, it just won't be as cool. Hint: if you want to begin your meal with a salad, make a little more to use as a dressing and set some aside.

Toss the chops in the marinade until they are well-coated. I like to refrigerate them overnight, but a couple of hours will suffice. Before grilling, shake off any excess marinade.

Once you've marinated your chops, you should be ready to light the grill. Paul's method works well. So does August's. I would caution against using any chemical starters because they can get into your food. I also caution against using pre-treated ready-to-light charcoal for the same reason. Let the charcoal burn for about 30 minutes or until white-hot. In the meantime, prepare your potatoes and veggies.

I like to use small potatoes (red, gold, or purple) because they cook faster. Coat them lightly with oil, sprinkle with salt and pepper, wrap them in foil, and place them directly on the coals. Roast until done. Time can vary from 30 minutes to about an hour. Unwrap them, smash them, and drizzle with garlic butter before serving. Start the potatoes 20-30 minutes before grilling the veggies.

Slice an eggplant lengthwise (aubergine to our European friends) into ¼ to ½ inch thick slices. Do the same for a zucchini. Coat lightly with olive oil and season with salt and pepper. Lay the veggies across the grill and cook until done, turning once about halfway through. They can be served as is, but if you enjoy fava beans, cut the veggies into bite

While the veggies are grilling, open a can of fava beans and dump them into a small saucepan. Heat them over the grill with some stewed tomatoes and a bit of fresh oregano, salt, and pepper. Drain the beans when hot. Stir in the grilled veggies. You can grill a slice of onion and clove or two of garlic with the other veggies if you like and add them into the mix.

But, if you prefer, corn works extremely well on the grill, but I prepare it somewhat differently from August. Leaving the husks attached at the bottom, gently peel them back on each ear. Remove the silk, brush with a little butter or olive oil, then season with salt, pepper, and granulated garlic. Pull the husks back up and place them on the grill. Turn as necessary to keep them from burning, but a little charring is a good thing. Remove the husks before serving.

The chops cook quickly. What you want is to char the outside while leaving the inside nice and rare to medium rare. For this the coals need to be really hot. If you are bold and daring, place the chops directly on the coals, otherwise lower the grill as close to the coals as possible. If placing the meat directly on the coals, gently and carefully blow away any ash (it doesn't taste good). But be careful. Putting your face too close and blowing too hard can cause burns to the face and eyes. If the coals are good and hot, a couple minutes per side and they are done. No sauce necessary, but a drizzle of the mint, lime, and cilantro dressing works. However, getting mint jelly anywhere near this should land you in prison for rape where hopefully you will share a cell with Dr. Lecter.

Dr. Tanveer Ahmed – Keynote speaker 2015 TorontoDV Symposium

April 29, 2015 | by Attila L. Vinczer | Link | Original Link

We are delighted to present Dr. Tanveer Ahmed as our 2015 TorontoDV Symposium keynote speaker. Ahmed is travelling from Australia to deliver what will be a spectacular presentation about the effect of Domestic Violence on men, women and children.

His comprehensive balanced approach will drive the direction of Domestic Violence to a closer end, where both men and women will be seen as significant victims and significant perpetrators thereof. Dr. Tanveer Ahmed will deliver insight aimed at our Judiciary as well as the public they officiate over. We desperately need to better understand the entire dynamics of DV and IPV.

Articles such as this one, authored by Ahmed are needed in greater numbers addressing the whole of DV and IPV, Intimate Partner Violence.

Men forgotten in violence debate

"There is too little acknowledgement of the importance of male disempowerment in debates surrounding domestic violence. Gender relations have changed dramatically in the past few decades, but discussions about family violence are stuck in the mindset of 1970s radical feminism."

That article caught my attention and the backlash that it caused, was alarming. Why? Who would not want to include men as significant victims of Domestic Violence, when that is what science tells us? It was clear to me, Ahmed would be an integral speaker at the 2015 TorontoDV Symposium.

We look forward to having you in Toronto this June 5, 6 and 7, 2015.

Tanveer Ahmed's short bio

Dr Tanveer Ahmed is an Australian based psychiatrist, author and local politician. He is a general adult psychiatrist seeing patients in a range of settings, varying from hospital inpatients, doing legal reports for the justice system and seeing adolescents referred from schools. Tanveer has involvement in the media and writes on social and psychological issues in various Australian publications. He also appears regularly on radio and television. He is an elected local politician in a municipal area within inner Sydney. He is the published author of popular migration memoir "The Exotic Rissole". He was once chosen by a Prime Minister's committee as one of a hundred future leaders of Australia under the age of 40.

Tanveer has long held an interest in domestic violence issues, both from his experience in ethnic communities as well as the patients he sees within his practice. He was a White Ribbon ambassador in Australia for close to a decade, including helping to expand the campaign in Pakistan. He was forced to resign from his position after a feminist backlash when he wrote an article in the Australian newspaper arguing male violence can be an expression of underlying distress and male disempowerment was a growing factor in driving male violence towards women. Tanveer was born in Bangladesh but grew up in Australia. He is married and a father of two daughters living in Sydney.

U.N. advises women need more in order to compete with men

April 30, 2015 | by Jason Sinclair | Link | Original Link

Well hear we are, back at the beginning of the debate. Do we want equal opportunities for all or do we want equal outcomes for all?

The U.N. released a report as noted in TIME that said the latter is what the world should strive for. I know this sounds like communism… Well it is communism, but apparently it's for a good cause. It's for the benefit of women. It's not fair that they would be expected to perform the same as men. They often decide to stay home and raise children, and why should that affect their bottom line? Why in the world would anyone's decisions have to change the outcome or solvency of someone's lifestyle.

You think maybe I'm exaggerating? Nope, here's a quote.

> "We must go beyond creating equal opportunities to ensure equal outcomes," the report says. "'Different treatment' may be required to achieve real equality in practice." This report, called progress of the world's Women 2015–2016,

I wonder how far this should go? Should we ensure that the decision to not go to college or university has no affect on a persons life outcome. It's really not fair to stop someone from becoming a programmer just because they never went to school to learn to program! Maybe they couldn't afford it? Maybe they decided that they just don't have enough time to dedicate to study and work which would cause them not to be able to spend the time at home that they are entitled too.

Ahhh, the age old question. Do I spend more time at work and make more money or do I spend more time with my family? One allows me to provide a better standard of living for my family, the other allows me to be there for my family in person. It's not fair that one seems to always come at the cost of the other, and life should always be fair you know.

Another jewel from the article addresses this apparent inequality

> "Removing legal barriers to female employment is not enough, the report says, noting that "we also need measures that free up women's time."

I don't know of any legal barriers to women's employment, admittedly I live in the west and we have a much richer society than many of the countries they are referring to.

> The U.N. is calling for more "decent work" for women, which they define as a job that is well paid, secure and "compatible with women's and men's shared responsibility" for children and housework. The report also says redistributing household duties is "critical" for achieving substantive equality worldwide.

So men should do less paid work and women should do more paid work. Who gets to decide how a household should run? Should it not be up to the people who live in that household? If it makes more sense for a man to work out of the house due to an income he can likely expect in comparison to her then who is the U.N. to tell these people they are wrong. That if only they would split each duty evenly, never one doing more than the other on any specific task regardless of what it does to a specific household, we can finally expect to see parity.

So how about these thoughts, mandate that half of parental leave be taken by the father, if there is no father then there is no second half of the leave, same would go for fathers if there was no mother in the picture. This would allow men to spend more time with their kids in their formative years and simultaneously force women to gain valuable seniority and experience in the job market.

We could ensure women are filling up the fields that have few of them by mandating what courses are available to them when they apply to university or college. We could say, no we have enough women nurses, you are eligible to take engineering or math this semester. How about we do the same for men, no sir, engineering isn't available to you, you can take early childhood education, or nursing this semester.

I know that there are places out there where gender roles are fairly seriously enforced by society, but telling industries, companies, governments and employers that women need special rules and a helping hand helps no one. Especially women. I sometimes think the major difference between a feminist and a member of the MHRA is that the feminist doesn't truly believe that Women are absolutely as capable of making wise decisions regarding their own life, or that they should have to bear the responsibility for those actions. The MHRA on the other hand says, 'Go ahead, Make your bed and lie in it just as we all do.'

May 1, 2015 | by Robert Franklin | Link | Original Link

At last, Vladek Filler is a free man. Oh, he's been "free," as in "no longer in jail," for over two years. But when I say "free," I mean free of all the consequences of the vendetta waged against him by his ex-wife and a shamefully corrupt Ellsworth, Maine prosecutor's office that stopped at nothing to railroad an innocent man.

That man, Vladek Filler, has always been factually innocent, but now he's officially, legally so. A state appeals court quashed his conviction of assault, the only prize former District Attorney Carletta Bossano's office had to show for its relentless hounding of him.

It all started some eight years ago when, in the midst of their divorce and child custody fight, Vladek's wife, Ligia Filler, claimed that he had raped her. Despite the fact that he had no police record, that the claim occurred during a child custody battle and that Ligia Filler was obviously emotionally unstable, Assistant District Attorney, Mary Kellett pursued the case against Filler with a zeal borne, not of a desire for justice, but of a desire for blood.

Kellett's behavior in Filler's case was not merely morally and ethically wrong, although it was both those things. It apparently was the product of her blind faith in the notion that women never lie about rape. I say that because of the multiple other rape and sexual assault cases prosecuted by Kellett that were either overturned on appeal or that she lost outright. Most prosecutors have a sense of when to charge a case, when to take one to trial and when an accused is probably innocent. Kellett seems to have had no such sense, at least when it came to sexual assault charges.

Otherwise, why did she not offer Vladek the dismissal the facts of his case so clearly warranted? Put simply, all Kellett had was the word of a woman who had every reason to lie and on whose behalf there was literally no evidence. Most prosecutors can see such a case for what it is — a sure loser.

Not only that, but the family court judge that viewed the same evidence Kellett did gave primary custody to Vladek, not his wife. How likely is it that a family court judge would place children with a father if the judge had the slightest inkling that the father might have done what his wife claimed? Without a doubt, that judge saw the truth — an emotionally disabled mother making wild, unsubstantiated charges against her husband for the sole purpose of keeping him out of his children's lives.

Mary Kellett didn't care. She knew, as few others did, that she would violate any rule of prosecutorial ethics and criminal procedure in order to put an innocent man in prison. And she almost succeeded. Filler was at first convicted, but the very judge who heard his trial for rape overturned the conviction on — of course — the grounds of prosecutorial misconduct.

But Kellett wasn't finished. Ligia also claimed that Vladek had tossed water on her during an argument. Now, most prosecutors wouldn't waste their time on such a trivial matter, particularly since, once again, there was no evidence that Vladek had done any such thing. But again, he was convicted, and again it was due to Kellett's misconduct. Filler served 21 days in jail.

It is that conviction that the appellate court overturned on April 24th. It too was the product of Kellett's many ethical violations.

But Filler is not a man to allow injustice to run free in the streets. Not content with complete vindication of all his actions by courts of law, he took on the District Attorney's Office and Mary Kellett specifically, filing a grievance against her for her blatant wrongdoing.

He won that one too. Mary Kellett now has the distinction of being the only prosecutor in the history of the state to have been suspended from the practice of law due to her ethical violations while in the service of the people of the county.

But even that isn't the end of the story. In last year's election, DA Bossano was ousted from office due in no small part to her failure to oversee the corrupt behavior of her subordinate, Kellett.

In short, Vladek Filler's story is that of a lone man standing up to a system of criminal prosecution that was all too used to running roughshod over men accused of sexual assault. What Mary Kellett did in Filler's case are the actions of a lawyer to whom it never occurs that there might be adverse consequences to her violations of law. Almost certainly, she'd done similar things countless times before and was astonished when one person stood up and shouted "Halt!"

Mary Kellett is now out of a job and has a black mark on her record as an attorney.

If this had been an NBA championship series, Vladek Filler would have swept the opposition. Eight years later, he has his children and his criminal record is unblemished. He is indeed a free man.

What he doesn't have, though, is his good name. Oh, the people who know him admire him and he has the love of his children and the avid support of his sister who did yeoman service on his behalf throughout his legal ordeal.

But the same Maine news media that were all too eager to shout from the rooftops allegations made against him, that reported his convictions, that unquestioningly channeled Ligia's false claims and Kellett's false statements about the case have suddenly gone quiet. Yes, those who were happy to convict an innocent man in their own court — that of public opinion — don't care to report the fact that, at long last, he's not guilty of the offenses charged. So far, not a word of his exoneration has been reported in the local or state news media.

In its own way, that's every bit as shameful as Mary Kellett's illegal, immoral and unethical conduct.

But in the end, Vladek Filler is the last man standing. For eight years, he stood against the enormous power of the state criminal justice system and won. That's something for every reader of this blog to ponder. Vladek Filler's grit and determination have been rewarded. Maybe yours can be as well.

And perhaps best of all, there are two kids (no longer little) down in Georgia who have a father they can look up to. They too can learn a thing or two about the power of being right and not backing down. Those kids may not yet realize it, but they've got a dad whose example will serve them all their lives.

Why yet another liberal progressive woman abandons feminism

May 1, 2015 | by Christine Damon | Link | Original Link

Editor's note: This article is also available in Italian.

I am not the typical woman you see posting pictures and declaring she doesn't need feminism. I considered myself a feminist for 30 years. Like most women who consider themselves feminists, I didn't read feminist literature or take women's studies courses. I just believed it was about equality. I believed, and still do, that women are as intelligent and capable as men and should have equal rights and opportunities. That is what I thought feminism was all about. I was wrong.

In June of 2013 my boyfriend was driving me to work. We were pulled over by the Ashland Police and he was arrested for rape, cuffed, and thrown in the maximum security rape tank at the Jackson County Jail on a $1 million bail. It seems there had already been a secret grand jury that had indicted on just the testimony of his accuser.

I was completely aware of the allegations. His father's now ex wife, Lisa, a mentally ill woman with a history of false reporting, was doing it to punish his father. It turns out the judge in the divorce had already dismissed her claims against her husband of sexually abusing the chihuahuas. Now she was going after Greg to hurt his father. She had told a friend that if she "didn't get the house, the boat and the dogs in the divorce she would destroy" his father's life by claiming that he had raped her.

I sprung into action. After alerting work to the situation, I drove home to start making phone calls. A terrible mistake had been made. I believed that I could get them the information and he would be released. I was wrong.

First, I found out that the police had not done an investigation. When Greg found out what Lisa was claiming, he immediately contacted the police. It took weeks for them to get back to him. He went down and told the detective in charge what had and had not happened. There had never been any sex, consensual or otherwise. Greg gave him a list of witnesses and informed him of her mental illness and the fact that she was on a list of psychotropic drugs. No witnesses were ever contacted.

How does this happen? How does a completely innocent man, with a completely clean record and no evidence that a crime was committed end up being thrown in jail and held on an enormous bail? We thought it must be complete incompetence. We were wrong.

It turns out the Ashland Police Department was rolling out a new program. It is called You Have Options and it is being widely celebrated and implemented in police forces nation wide. Under this program the police act more as rape crisis counselors than detectives. They blindly believe the accuser, allow the accuser to decide how much of an investigation takes place, if any. It also allows the accuser to decide if the witnesses or the accused are interviewed or informed of the charges. If Greg's father had not alerted him to what she was doing he might not have been aware of it until they were arresting him.

In the week after Greg's arrest I did the investigation the police should have done. I found Lisa's daughter, who was willing to testify for the defense on Lisa's multiple false accusations. I had established that Lisa was not even in the state at the time she claims the assault happened (two years prior), and I got a letter from a friend of Lisa's who claimed that Lisa had premeditated the false allegation to punish Greg's father in the event she did not get what she wanted in the divorce. I found a lot of exculpatory evidence and got it to the police. Making matters worse, in that first week I was also fired from the job that I loved and was given no explanation. It would all be worth it if I could get Greg out of that horrible place. The detective put together a report and delivered it to the DA who promptly ignored it.

It turns out that Oregon has hearsay exception laws that allow for the indictment for rape on just the accusers testimony if there is no other evidence and if there is no reason to question that testimony. By not doing an investigation the police managed to avoid all the evidence and all the reasons to question her claims, and as a safety net for the DA, just in case they are completely wrong, and destroying innocent people's lives, the DA gets the grand jury to give them immunity. This is a recipe for disaster. No accountability.

Fortunately, Greg got an amazing public defender. She uncovered the fact that Lisa had claimed that Greg had been molesting her for years and it was all in her psychiatric report. The police had requested that report over a year ago and the DA was still waiting for it. When the report finally arrived, 53 days after Greg had been incarcerated and the day before jury selection, there was absolutely no mention of it. Lisa had made it up and lied to the grand jury, a felony. The charges were "dismissed in the interest of justice." Greg was released and I had him home.

That is when the real learning began. At this point I still believed that feminism was about equality. If feminists knew this was happening they would be concerned, too. Again, I was wrong. Feminists asked us not to come forward with the story. They did not want other women to be discouraged from coming forward. The DA chose not to file charges against Lisa stating that "Just as Hartley is innocent under the law because of his constitutional protections, so, too, the same presumption of innocence applies to his accuser" "How would we prove it? There was no confession or recantation."

So, the only time they will consider it a false report is when the accuser actually recants and confesses to the crime? The only evidence there had ever been of a crime in this case was of her filing a false report and committing perjury before a grand jury. No wonder they get to claim that false reporting is rare. What is really rare is women admitting they falsely accused innocent men.

Apparently we were supposed to go home and try to get on with our lives. We were supposed to pretend it never happened. The state, the city, and police refuse to acknowledge what happened. It wasn't their fault. There would be no justice. At least Rolling Stone admitted their mistake and apologized. We can not even get them to acknowledge we exist.

I descended on social media like a storm. Surely those good people on Huffington Post, Raw Story, Salon, among others would care that this was happening. False reporting is not only horrendous for the accused it makes it harder for actual rape victims to get justice. The response was being called a traitor to my gender, to be told I was internalizing my misogyny. I actually had a feminist threaten to destroy my life and contact my employer to get me fired. Jokes on her; I had no job.

Most of the feminists who bothered to listen, came back with attacks. My boyfriend should learn to control himself. I calmly explained he had done nothing wrong. They could not hear it. Feminists repeat the lie that false reporting is rare often enough that they blindly believe it. Even when the cases that feminist journalists use to prove that there is a rape crisis end up being false reportings, they still either choose to believe the accuser, despite evidence they are lying, or claim that at least they brought attention to the problem. They are so blinded they cannot even admit that a crime with actual victims has been committed.

The common narrative among feminists is that women do not lie about rape. They also charge anyone who bothers to question the veracity of those claims with victim blaming. There have been recent protests at Berkley and Ohio University against affording the accused due process. These feminists feel that since women do not lie about rape, we should just be able to assume that all accused are guilty.
There is absolutely no concern that innocent lives may be destroyed.

When the Rolling Stone came forward with an apology over the article on the UVA Gang Rape, which also ended up being a false reporting, their was a tremendous outrage. Feminists were not angry because innocent men were falsely accused and had their reputations damaged. They were not angry because a woman had committed the crime of false reporting. They were angry that Rolling Stone followed this narrative and inadvertently exposed the fact that women do, in fact, lie about rape. The fact that there were actual victims of the false reporting is not even mentioned. Not only did they not care about the victims of false reporting, they flatly refused to admit that they even existed.

Fortunately a local monthly publication was willing to cover our nightmare and wrote an amazing story, but people needed to know about this outside of our little valley though. The You Have Options program responsible was being outsourced to other states. It was a finalist for the Webber Seavey award for Quality in Law Enforcement. Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand was promoting it to Congress as a solution to the rape crisis and was using it as the model for the Campus Accountability & Safety Act (CASA) program. I wrote articles and letters to every media outlet I could find contact information for, from DemocracyNow to FOX news. Absolutely no one was interested in covering the story. How could they continue to claim that false reporting was rare if they acknowledged it was happening?

The bigger question we should all be asking is, if there is indeed a rape crisis and if false reporting is so rare, why is it these journalists who are intent on exposing the rape crisis keep exposing false reportings and can not seem to find an actual rape?

What I learned in those first months was that feminism was not interested in equality. Feminism is a profoundly dishonest ideology that puts forth dishonest studies designed to get the results they want. Feminists attack anyone who even attempts to point out its shortcomings and hypocrisy. Feminism is in no way interested in the truth. And feminists are completely unconcerned with the injustices suffered by the falsely accused, all while claiming that they are fighting for men’s rights as well.

I am a strong intelligent woman who fights for equality. I am an educated, a middle aged, hairy legged, liberal, hippy. I thought I was a feminist. I was wrong.

Lauren Southern tells: Why I am not a feminist

May 2, 2015 | by AVfM Video Source | Link | Original Link

Rebel Media contributor Lauren Southern recently made a video explaining why she is not a feminist, which resonated with a very large audience. As of this writing the video has received an impressive 560,650 views.

“A few years ago I uploaded this sign of myself saying I don’t need feminism, because I believe in equality – not entitlements and supremacy. To my surprise the photo was shared all over the internet, from Buzzfeed and even of Time Magazine. I got a lot of support for the photo, but I also got a lot of hate and criticism. Most of that criticism from feminists who claim/ed I do not know what the word feminism means because feminism is actually a movement for equality. So today I want to speak to those feminists and explain why I’m still not a feminist and why third-wave feminism is not in fact a movement for equality.”

Gamergate, bomb threats, and #GGinDC

May 2, 2015 | by Frank Lin | Link | Original Link

The online consumer revolt known as GamerGate has officially invaded meatspace–and yes, this is of interest to Men's Human Rights Activists, even those who don't much like video games (although an awful lot of us do).

Last night, at restaurant Local 16 in Washington DC over 300 members of the online movement gathered together to discuss their love of games and resist the authoritarian hydra of radical SJWism hellbent on controlling every square inch of popular culture. Much to the detriment of the mainstream narrative put forth by outlets such as the USA's ABC, The Washington Post, and other outlets, photographic evidence shows that excluding women and minorities was not on the menu.

Admittedly, however, diversity in hair dye was lacking compared to their philosophical opponents.

Anti-GamerGate meet-up

GamerGate meet-up

Instead, everyone was invited, even the curiously aggressive anti-gamergate columnist Arthur "The Mindkiller" Chu, a dogged, if not always coherent, critic of rational thought.

The event was organized by GamerGate luminaries Milo Yiannopoulos and Christina "Based Mom" Hoff Summers as a way for GamerGaters to meet, interact, network, and enjoy one another's company. In case you're new to GamerGate, the movement kicked off last summer as an investigation into corruption in games journalism and eventually exposed the radical feminist agenda of turning video game culture into a node for disseminating ideological feminist propaganda. The event went off without a hitch, despite repeated calls,Tweets, and emails made to the host venue by SJW's demanding that the event be shut down, culminating in Arthur Chu's final message, "It's ending tonight." Whatever Chu meant by that statement, he looked pretty stupid when after midnight an anonymous bomb threat brought in the police. Well, so much for going off without a hitch.

I highly doubt that Arthur Chu issued the threat and I'm inclined to believe it was the work of a third party troll, just as I'm inclined to think that the person who made the death threat against Anita Sarkeesian at Utah State was the work of a third party troll. Naturally we can't expect the establishment media to report this threat, but what we can do is observe a familiar pattern, based on the experiences of CAFE in Toronto, last year's first annual International Conference on Men's Issues at St. Clair Shores, Zen Men's Male Students In Peril conference last November, and the HoneyBadger Brigade's recent travails at the Calgary Expo–the first people to have a pro-Gamergate presence in the real world were Men's Rights Activists who came to say nothing except that gamers are awesome just the way they are and censorship is bad.

First they'll slander our leaders and try to prevent venues from hosting our events. If that fails, they'll either show up themselves to pull fire alarms or block entrances, or we'll get anonymous death threats. While thus far no threats have lead to serious violence, it raises our security fees and forces us to take extraordinary measures to ensure that events go forward without disruption. Meanwhile the establishment media carries on if as we are the ones doing the threatening.

While this pattern can be discouraging, GamerGate has responded to the bomb threat by planning meetups in Sydney Australia, San Francisco California, and Boston Massachusetts. Instead of being dispirited, GamerGate took the bomb threats as a challenge, and is currently engaged in one thing that the Men's Human Rights Movement (excluding India) has only recently begun doing itself: showing up, having fun, and if anybody asks, declaring your non-affiliation with radical ideological feminism. This is the non-feminist counter culture we need. Little additional work is required because totalitarian feminists will predictably show the wider culture just how tolerant and committed to diversity they really are. The key is to not let yourself be intimidated.

Unlike the Men's Human Rights Movement, GamerGate has the advantage of being organized around video games, which are far more fun and sustaining than dreary discussions around domestic violence statistics, suicide rates, and male-only military conscription. I believe we stand to take a page from their playbook and whistle while we work.

"Based Mom" Christina Hoff Summers summed it up rather nicely, speaking to the gathered crowd of gamers:

> The media campaign against gamers has astonished me, not because it was one-sided and recklessly wrong and stupid, but because of all of you. The gamers were the first group that I've seen that pushed back their plans to turn gamer culture into Oberlin College. You staged the first citizen's uprising against the humor-impaired, check-your-privilege bullies. But I have to say, and I'm fond of saying, they made a big mistake when they took on the gamers, because you know how to slay a dragon. And you like to win."

So there it is, folks. The rate at which the wider culture is waking up to the truth about intolerant gynocentric feminism is rapidly increasing, and as long as we show up, eventually we'll turn the corner. If there's a GamerGate meetup near you, I encourage you to go and have fun (so long as you have genuine interest in the subject and aren't just there to proselytize). Our opponents' chief weapon is a threat-narrative based on a nebulously defined "Other." All we have to do is show up, self-identify as that Other, act like normal, healthy people, and before long the entire narrative sounds utterly ridiculous to the wider culture and falls apart. Once we disarm feminists of their best weapon our ability to advocate on behalf on men and boys will get a lot easier, as our philosophical opponents won't be able to lean on the image of the threatening "Other" in the imaginations of the general public. They'll have to discuss facts, and they'll lose.

And hey, if feminists show up too, say hi, and invite them to actually debate us some time rather than hate on us.

I believe the MHRM in the West is at a similar stage in its development as the gay rights movement was in the 1980’s. On one hand homosexuality was still widely seen as deviant and threatening, yet everybody had a favorite band with a gay lead singer.

Most people born after 1980 regarded homosexuality as nothing particularly abnormal, and at some point in the 2000’s resistance to gay marriage seemed to crumble overnight. That’s not to say that campaigners for gay rights didn’t work their asses off, but the most important groundwork was already laid in the 80’s.

GamerGate gives people who care deeply about the problems faced by boys and men the opportunity to lay that sort of groundwork now. By showing that we, too, are human, and have the same type of real-world interests and concerns and hobbies that they do and by the way–men’s rights are human rights.

So show up. Smile. And if you see Milo give that beautiful man a friendly wink for me.

Bullying: 3 rules

May 2, 2015 | by Lee Turner | Link | Original Link

For the generation of boys and girls reared almost exclusively by women, I have been thinking about how to explain, to borrow from the character of Tyler Durden, what bullying is and what one can do about it.

In Australia, March 20th is the National Day of Action Against Bullying and Violence. Participating schools are to run workshops on the matter and there is a government website Bullying. No Way! (BNW) offering graphic materials and lesson plans to facilitate this event.

The workshops include sensitivity training, a wristband and the school gets a certificate of participation. Toxic masculinity is not mentioned anywhere, though it all sounds like feminist incompetence anyway, more-so because the core message is institutional intervention. Institutional responses cost taxpayer money, but are they being operated on the right premise? This article uses the Laser of Occam to dissect and cauterize the issue of bullying in Australian schools.

When I went to school in the 80's and 90's bullying was an ordinary occurrence and I and some of my friends were frequent targets of it. Reflecting back on it now, I realise that whilst painful then, this experience was a necessary one. It has not destroyed our lives and appears to have been at least partly instrumental in making us what we are today – fully functional members of society, sometimes quite successful in career and business. It grows thick skin and teaches one to deal with personal conflict.

Bullying is a common theme in online media and much has been made of organised efforts to root it out in Australian schools. A so-called National Safe School Framework (NSSF) has been established and dates back to similar initiatives reaching as far back as 2003.

"Cyber bullying" has been in the news a lot. Meanwhile, overseas, the Columbine School massacre in the United States in the late 90's looms large in the public discourse and is the 9/11 of bullying. It is a problem with sometimes fatal consequences.

I can say from direct personal experience and of many of those around me that bullying can have a lasting negative effect on a person's life…yet, I can also say that overcoming bullying on one's own terms is a positive and empowering experience. Whilst the Australian government's efforts to do something about this problem are well-meaning, they will be ineffective and may do more damage than good in the long run, producing a generation of kids too reliant on institutional intervention in their personal conflicts, with bullying still alive and well somewhere outside of the reach of schools and governments.

Reading through the BNW site, I get a clear sense that a lot of it was written by people who have never been bullied in school, and if they were, did not succeed in overcoming it. Alternatively, bullies are natural leaders and the case may also be that government leadership in tackling this community concern is taken up by people that may well have

As such, the advice they offer is ineffective and is in general terms in line with feminist archetypes in society and public education – moral panic, social engineering and failure/incompetence redefined as success and personal uniqueness. They elevate victimhood as “inspirational” and fail to offer any solutions to the underlying problem or attempt to explore the causes in any detail. Their conclusion is unanimously to allocate more taxpayer resources to tackling the problem, which means jobs for civil servants. But does it equate to a reduction in bullying?

The most important point that is consistently missed in anti-bullying rhetoric is what it means to the child. It is a character test and a lesson in overcoming adversity. Failure to cope with it successfully is a personal failure and not that of any system educational or otherwise.

School is a place of learning and this too is learning. A child who encounters bullying will not benefit from being completely shielded from it and unlike an adult, has no choice but to find a way to exist an adverse environment.

An adult who is being bullied in a workplace always has the choice to leave. Going to school is not optional. This is the fundamental “disconnect” between the central message of anti-bullying campaigners, “just ignore it.” They must have forgotten what it is like to be a school child. The most effective way to ignore bullying is to stop going to school, but since that is not an option, bullying should really not be ignored on a personal level, rather, it must be confronted sooner or later. Luckily, the child is offered multiple chances to do so and it is up to the adults in their life to guide them through this wilderness.

The second fundamental failure of anti-bullying campaigners is the, “listen to your child” message. Once again, it is as if they have forgotten about this aspect of the childhood experience where much is held in secret from the adults. “No snitching” is a firm rule and, as with the point made above, is different to what adults can do in their lives.

If a child cannot stick to this, they will never grow up to be independent. As such, asking the child to suspend this rule is contradictory to the expectation the adults have of them to grow up and become independent of constant care. The law does not apply in the same manner to a child as it does to an adult, therefore something like “rough and tumble” play is not the same as assault in adult life.

The third aspect of this matter is the polite fiction some, if not most, parents envelop themselves in: that their child is special and precious and nothing bad or violent may ever befall them or of them – how could it? Bullying is first a failure of parenting – those of the bullies and the bullied alike. Your child holds up a mirror to you alone.

Let us look at the core precepts of the Australian anti-bullying campaign and attempt to draw some conclusions that may illuminate the issue beyond tax-dollar spendthrift government rhetoric.

The definition of bullying

The government’s definition of bullying is interesting, not so much in the substance, but in nuance:

> "Bullying is when one person (or a group of people) with more power than someone else, tries to upset or hurt them. This power can come from being more popular, stronger or part of the group. They might repeatedly try to hurt them physically, socially isolate them, or say and do mean or humiliating things to them. Bullying can happen in person or online, and it can be obvious or hidden."

This definition confuses intimidation of adults in the workplace, or citizens by corporations or government (both categories outside the scope of this article) and bullying in school. The difference is that any perception of power discrepancy between students not based on physical size is purely fictional.

Bullies produce a show of power, but it is paper-thin and only as lasting as the target of bullying or an intervening teacher allows it to be. All students are equally powerless before the infinitely greater power of the school and their parents. Further, harming the victim is only secondary to the purpose of elevating the bully above his peers and establishing a social hierarchy.

Finally, what is this overt and hidden bullying? Does one hurt more than the other and is more or less preventable? Bullying can occur out in the open or in the shadows of some far-away corridor or online. How the teachers respond to it also varies. The NSSF asserts that teachers should always intervene, but in practice that may not always happen, partly because uniting against a victim establishes an order beneficial to the learning experience of the majority. A teacher may choose to go along with bullying of one outcast for the sake of peace and quiet of the rest. They may also choose to do so as a lesson to the victim.

Bullying is also a survival technique, where the odd kid out, too weak to defend themselves, is targeted. It no longer has meaningful biological function in human society, but must be a part of the human animal's older nature and therefore is not entirely invalid. The message to the target should be: "why am I a target and what can I do to not be one?"

Why bullying occurs

According to BNW and quoting a 2009 survey, bullying occurs because the bully

- doesn't like the person being bullied
- finds bullying fun
- likes to feel tough and strong, in control
- thinks it will make them popular.

The problem with these points is that it doesn't really define the nature of bullying. Not "liking" someone is an excuse to justify bullying morally on the part of the bully, who normally has a firm grasp of right and wrong but seeks to subvert them to find justification for immoral action that they enjoy.

How many will remember what the precise issue was, ten or twenty years later? This is because there was no issue.

The survey is correct on the next two points – bullying is fun and makes the bully feel tough and in control, and as for the fourth point, it definitely makes them popular.

However, the most important point about "why" is omitted.

Bullying, like violence. is a learned behavior and must come primarily from the child's family, often reinforced by the behavior of teachers that use bullying and intimidation (threat of detention, school yard junk duty, etc) to control in lieu of personal charisma and professional discipline.

What the parent can do to prevent bullying

The main message here is that they must talk to the child. The problem is that being bullied is a deeply personal issue. Many children may not show overt signs of being a target and never speak of it to their parents or other adult protectors.

There is definitely something that a parent can do beyond the three rules discussed below and these are mostly common sense.

- Teach your child manners.
- Make sure they are always dressed neatly.
- Do not send them to an expensive school in false belief that the size of tuition fee is guarantee of future success. Rich kids will definitely pick on the pauper's child. Children are cruel like that.

What can the child do to prevent being bullied

And this is at the core of the matter. Ultimately, the problem of bullying is up to the child to solve but for the parent to instil. The Australian government offers some marginally useful advice, such as "just ignore it", but consistently fails to frame the issue as first and foremost a personal handicap as well as its most effective and immediate solution – personal action.

The BNW page suggests in its lesson plans that a collective response is necessary – classmates standing up for a bullied person and older students leading younger students by example.

The reality is that in a lot of schools students socialize within their grade only, a year or two apart being too great a difference in maturity levels, interests, etc., and where they do, these interactions tend to happen by subculture – punks, nerds and footies hanging out with their own only. When bullying occurs it is from members of one social group against another, with most people not getting beaten up standing by in fear and aversion of getting involved.

Ultimately, it is up to the parent to instil something in their children's minds to help them not become a target. They must do this at an early age and continue to reinforce it throughout their life. As a child raised by women, I was always taught to not strike back. I had to learn on my own what really works and how to do it.

Here, on the edge of fatherhood, I have thought, how I would explain this to a 6-7 year old, male or female in the simplest, but most re-interpretable terms, so that these axioms stick with them and continue to guide throughout their life, how to avoid being bullied?

These are as follows:

- Do not show off.
- Do not back down.
- Have fun.

And I explain:

- Do not show off.

Do not overstep your boundaries unless you are prepared to back it up, in which case it is being yourself and not showing off, though it might seem like it to others. In other words, be yourself. Children can sense falsehood a mile off and they will punish it relentlessly.

- Do not back down.

It doesn't say "never back down." The reason: if confronted with bullying, you must respond firmly and best do so the first time it happens. If you do not, it will become harder and harder with each subsequent instance. Insult for insult, shove to shove and if it comes to it – punch for punch and make it hurt. Do not be afraid of getting beaten up. Make no mistake – it will continue if you do nothing and it will get worse. You may not recognise it at first and you may chicken out the second time, but you must confront it eventually. When you do, the typical result will be that the bully will become discouraged, move onto another victim and your suffering will stop.

So, it's true, bullying will never stop, but it might stop for you if you act. The crazy thing is – if you respond in kind, you might end up as friends together for the rest of yuor time at school. Not all bullies are born criminals and some make good friends.

- Have fun.

The most mystical and most important clause – have fun. School, believe it or not, is meant to be the best time of your life, not the worst. Find something to do other than being cornered in the playground and getting beaten up. Find a hobby. Australian schools often have facilities that provide for these interests, be they music, sport or other. All schools have a library, a football oval, a workshop and a computer lab.

Make the best of your time at school as you have no choice other than to attend it. As long as you are smiling you are doing the right thing for this is the most important lesson you can learn – you must become the agent of your own fortune and well-being, which is a principle that will guide you through life.

May 2, 2015 | by Mumia Ali | Link | Original Link

> "Happy now, bitch?"
> – Bunk Moreland, "The Wire"

Last year I wrote a column about NFL star-running back Adrian Peterson, making the case that the violence he visited on his toddler-aged son was by no means an isolated event but part of a long chain of such violence that is the norm in Black America – and that it has its roots in Baby Mama-led homes.

Indeed, in that same piece, I strongly asserted that the major defining feature of Baby Mamaism that is now the default setting for family formation in Black America, is its ungodly levels of violence, often starting with said Baby Mamas themselves. This cycle of violence then spirals out to the children, male and female alike, and easily confirmed a thousand ways to Sunday via social media like YouTube and World Star Hip Hop. Social science surveys and researchers have also confirmed this, but of course, researchers are often reluctant to openly say so. Political correctness and all that.

Reaction to my argument was strong; I expected it to shake up foes of the Men's Rights Movement, but I had to admit that I was taken aback by the pushback from a few fellow travelers, who felt that my missive was a bit of a reach: in their eyes, the connection I made between Peterson's actions and Baby Mamaism, was a stretch at best, an outright falsehood at worst.

Indeed, in a later and more recent column where I examined the misdeeds of "Empire" actress Ms. Taraji P. Henson I was once again upbraided for daring to come at such a strong and brave single mother, whose son was already showing early signs of antisocial behaviors and going off the rails. This enabling is commonly part and parcel of Baby Mamaism (and puts to bed the Big Fat Lie that Baby Mamas who are well-to-do have nothing to worry about). Where was my compassion?

Well, Ms. Toya Graham, has changed all that – and in so doing, has vindicated all that I said.

"America's Mom," Ms. Graham, will forever go down in history as that brave heroine who just happened to be on the scene last Monday, when she spied her 16 year-old son among the protesters hurling rocks at the Baltimore police in the wake of the death of 25 year-old Freddie Gray. Her onscreen antics – which included not just physical, over-the-top violence and outright child abuse but a goodly bit of pottymouthism to boot – have been hailed by the Cathedral Media as the actions of a loving, involved parent who is bravely fighting against all odds to raise her six kids(!!!) right.

Of course, there is no mention of a Mr. Graham and when Fox News host Bill O'Reilly pointed this inconvenient fact out, he was excoriated by none other than one of the famed Martin Luther King clan, Alveda King.

Nevermind that, had the roles been reversed, and it were a Black dad, married or no, out there whupping up on his daughter, he wouldn't just be vilified by the press but he'd very likely wind up in the same place as young Mr. Gray. Nevermind that this kind of pelting by the media has indeed happened not just to Peterson, not just to Rev. Creflo Dollar, but to everyday American citizens who just happened to be dads straightening their daughters out.

No, those cases are different. Here, the key difference is that Graham is just trying to save her boy, don'tcha know – a brave, single mother fighting against all odds, who is deserving of all our compassion and empathy!

You just cannot make this stuff up.

Indeed, I think Baltimore itself is a case study in what happens when we get "A Woman's Nation" – if no one's noticed, it is ruled top to bottom by women – in this case, Black women. It has a Black woman as a mayor (its second; its first Black female mayor, Sheila Dixon, was ousted for corruption). It has a Black woman as its chief prosecutor (barely a month on the job, part of a strong police family – hmm). One of the officers under potential indictment for the murder of Freddie Gray, is a Black woman who just so happens to be a Sargeant (her subordinates in the case happen to be white male officers; Ferguson, this ain't); and of course, there's Toya Graham, decked out in Wookie Weave and very much acting the part of stereotypical Baby Mama (I'm convinced she was the inspiration for "The Wire's" Delonda Brice).

Baltimore is not just a de facto matriarchy – it is a de jure matriarchy. As I've said so many times before, wherever de facto matriarchy is the order of the day, there too shall you find violence, disorder, chaos, pestilence, poverty and anarchy. Baltimore, anyone?

And look at the real world results: Graham uses violence against her only son (the other FIVE kids by multiple Baby Daddies are girls!) that, by her own admission, she has used before (proving that it doesn't work); Mayor Stephanie Rawlings-Blake has called the protestors/rioters – largely Black boys like Graham's son – "thugs" and her lead prosecutor, who hails from a strong police-family, is already being met with extreme suspicion by Baltimore's public.

It will be very interesting to see what, if anything, the Black Feminist Brigades will have to say about all of this; whether they will continue to bang on about "Black male privilege" in the face of the facts above.

Perhaps they will repeat the same strategy they exhibited in the recent domestic violence case of WNBA stars Brittney Griner and Glory Jonhson, keep their silence about all of this and act like whatever else they were doing was more important.

That, I must admit, would be a welcome change.

But what is clear is that Black men have no friends in a Black woman-led nation – they certainly don't in Baltimore, a matriarchy in which Black women are above reproach.

The evidence, broadcast before the world to see, speaks for itself.

Freddie Gray is dead. Toya Graham is a heroine.

And the band plays on.

Mark Judge hits one over the little league fence

May 2, 2015 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Just ten days before the Mother's Day release of the book, Say Goodbye to Crazy, Mark Judge, a sometimes writer for Daily Caller and some site called acculturated.com, used our video program to write about it, without even reading the book.

In fairness he did try to make contact — in a YouTube comment. He seemed a little frustrated that he had be unable to get through.

[image]

As you can see I responded after checking my email and finding zip. Turns out he was so hot and bothered (or frustrated from trying to reach me) to get going on this one that he didn't wait to write his article. Pretty decent piece, too, except for the big ol' streak of yellow running through it.

He actually wrote a very unambiguous endorsement for the idea that we live in a society indifferent to female perpetrated emotional abuse. He makes a convincing, cogent presentation well worth the read. He even goes to the extra measure to point out the reality that the issues have been politicized, and that it isn't helping.

Then he politicizes the issues right before your eyes, by heaping some social justice on Yours Truly.

> On the other side of the political spectrum, conservatives tend to scream that feminism is to blame when the discussion of abusive women comes up. Every woman who gets off a funny line about men instantly becomes Medusa. This trivializes genuine emotional abuse, and often masks simple misogyny. (This, sadly, seems the case with Paul Elam, Dr. Palmatier's co-author on Say Goodbye to Crazy. Palmatier is a brilliant analyst, but in video conversations with her, Elam comes across as angry and crude.)"

I really appreciate this. As a very slightly right of center, fiscal conservative and social liberal who is frequently accused of running a crypto-leftist operation by right wing whackaloons it is a nice to hear the same ridiculousness from the left here and there.

While this mention of me very near the end of the article was the only time you would know I wrote half the book is something my poor deflated ego will have to suffer through, I am still perplexed at his following that with instructions to his readers that the issue was not political.

So, female abuse is being hidden by angry right wingers screaming that feminism is the reason for female abuse? I am wondering why he did not provide a single example of that being the case. OK, I lied. I know the reason, and so does Mark. He did not have one.

Mark, feminism and the left both make it is difficult to broach the subject of female abusers. The other major culprit is the right, not because they are screaming about feminism but because they are a political group mostly comprised of people on white horses who won't hear a word about poor, soft little porcelain women being abusive.

The force that drives all these people is gynocentrism. It is the same gynocentrism that makes a woman expressing indignation a brilliant analyst, and a man doing the same thing angry and crude.

Now, I won't argue at all that Dr. T is an eminently qualified, articulate and highly knowledgeable woman, especially in this particular wheelhouse. She is what I would call a silverback; a massive force to be reckoned with and I am honored that she was able to overcome my crude anger enough to co-author a book with me.

But Judge's actions leave some questions in my mind. One, it appears he tried for two weeks to reach me without using the contact form on my site, or consulting the masthead, in order to ask questions of Dr. Palmatier, which he could have done through the contact form on her site. He did manage to find her site to reference one of her articles but he did not manage to find or use the contact form there, which might have given him some better results. So he went where any reasonable journalist would. To YouTube comments. Nice try but there are better places to try that would have landed him a press copy of the book.

Not exactly Woodward and Bernstein level investigative journalism skills there. After all, I found his email in thirty seconds just using his name and I am a registered techtard. Then again this is the modern media. Journalism and skills (along with ethics) seldom live under the same roof. This is precisely why Judge runs with the canard that physical abuse is a woman's issue, endorsing a corrupt governmental, cultural and academic apparatus that only recognizes male perpetrators and female victims. "This is a good thing," says Judge, "as violence against women remains prevalent and a problem."

And it is no wonder he feels this way, since "Feminists have worked so hard over the last fifty years to turn men from ogres into enlightened companions…"

There is not much useful to glean about Judge from this that anyone understanding gender politics does not already know, but I do think it speaks well to the power of the subject matter. Before even being published, Say Goodbye to Crazy managed to get an obviously left-leaning gynocentrist to acknowledge at least one form of abuse from women that is under addressed.

I hope it has the same effect on gynocentrists on the right. Maybe together they will figure out how to think about the unthinkable.

How to respond to a feminist assault on your business

May 3, 2015 | by August Løvenskiolds | Link | Original Link

In their never-ending quest for cultural dominance, money, and resources, sooner or later, feminists will assault your business.

If you are in a business that caters to women you are a prime target but even businesses that only tangentially involve women – like urology, precious gem prospecting, and monster trucks – are not safe from feminist incursion. Feminists have even infiltrated the National Football League (NFL) in the United States and are worming their way into every aspect of it.

Watching the rugged men of the NFL flail about trying to appease abusive feminists is cringe-worthy: the more concessions the NFL makes, the more emboldened feminists become. From players wearing humiliating pink garb in October to overreactions to allegations of domestic violence by players, the NFL seems determined to abase themselves and their players in the vain hope of magically warding themselves from a dragon with endless hunger and no compassion nor understanding of men.

Of course, feminists not only reacted cynically to the NFL's efforts but they are now going after the NFL's official beer sponsor, Anheuser-Busch, makers of Budweiser and Bud Light, who had actually supported feminists in their NFL assault!

If the Budweiser folks thought that they were protecting themselves by allying themselves with feminists, they were dead wrong. Feminists are now claiming, bizarrely, that Budweiser's new advertising slogan "The perfect beer for whatever happens" and the associated hashtag #UpForWhatever encourages rape! Noah Rothman at Hot Air has a great summary of the crazy situation.

Spanx, the bodywear company started by a woman and with a new woman CEO, is trying to placate feminists (and make inroads into their obese clothing purchases) by toadying to them – the company is rebranding as "feminist" and is placing girly-ish empowerment messages in their packaging. One such message is the fluffy and irrational "Don't take yourself or the 'rules' too seriously."

Naturally, feminists replied to this outreach with snark and cynicism.

From the NFL, Budweiser and Spanx case studies we can derive three general principles for dealing with feminists:

1. Feminists cannot be placated nor appeased. It is both pointless and counter-productive to try.

2. Feminists are not your friends and they can't be befriended.

3. You cannot become feminists' ally by supporting them.

In short: don't feed the dragon and don't try to ally with the dragon. These are mistakes that show the dragon that you are weak and easily consumed. Dragons love that.

Now, dragons seem large and powerful but like dragons themselves, this is imaginary.

In reality, feminists are lazy, irrational and mercurial. Their attention spans are short and like all hyperactive, low intelligence people they get bored easily. They crave attention and quickly get frustrated and move on when they get none. When they can't be bossy they leave in a sour lipid huff.

In 2013 a small beer brewery in Dallas a few blocks from my home had a problem similar to what Budweiser is experiencing now. The Deep Ellum Brewery's flagship beer "Dallas Blonde" came with the cheeky slogan "goes down easy."

Feminists were outraged – a double entendre about oral sex must be evidence of rape culture, right? After seeming to cave to feminists initially, Deep Ellum Brewery eventually came up with the perfect reply – a polite but firm fuck off, feminists:

> To those who have been offended by this glorified blowjob joke, I am sorry. Lesson learned.
> To those who have likened this to rape culture or tried to cheapen this to just some sexist asshole trying to sell beer, shame on you.
> Just as we don't need cheap tricks to sell our beer, you don't need cheap tricks to push your agenda.

Sure enough, after a few more sputtering, indignant remarks, feminists got frustrated, then bored, and moved off to find weaker targets to attack. Crisis averted, dragon slain.

As an aside – Deep Ellum Brewery just released their summer seasonal beer, Neato Bandito. It has both Czech and Mexican roots and is a delicious quaffing beer with notes of toasted corn. It is available now through the end of August and if you can find it, you'll enjoy it – it puts mass-produced Mexican beers to shame.

Back to dealing with feminists.

From the Deep Ellum Brewery case study, we can formulate the 4th principle for dealing with feminists:

4. Feminists are lazy, stupid and weak. Tell them, politely but firmly, to fuck off.

The Budweiser folks will save themselves much trouble if they adopt this tactic. People hate feminists – even other feminists hate feminists – and people will cheer Anheuser-Busch if they show some spine and face down the feminist bullies like the Dallas Deep Ellum Brewery did.

But in business, it is not enough to just slay dragons – one can loot their treasures and feast on their flesh.

Consider the case of another feminist target, Protein World, maker of protein powder dietary supplements for people who care about how their bodies look. Protein World started a limited marketing campaign with a fit girl in a bikini that pissed off lardy feminists. Instead of retreating and placating, Protein World decided to tweak feminist sensibilities further and the results were covered brilliantly by Janet Bloomfield:

> In reacting to #ProteinWorld with their typical idiocy and hysterics, feminists succeeded in taking a targeted ad campaign that ran in the UK and making it famous around the world, driving extraordinary and completely unexpected sales to Protein World. The end result is that they have made bikini girl famous around the world and dropped several million dollars worth of sales into a company they would like to blow up with a bomb. Seriously, you dumbass feminists? Did you not see that coming?

From this we can formulate the fifth principle of dealing with feminists:

5. People hate feminists so much that they will flock to your product if you are publicly unperturbed or even jokingly hostile in response to feminist assaults.

Management consultants charge large fees to companies like Anheuser-Busch to produce less effective reports than this one. So, NFL, Budweiser and Spanx, if you want to give a few shekels to A Voice for Men, I'm pretty sure Paul Elam wouldn't mind.

You're welcome.

The failures and disappointments of ICMI ‘14

May 3, 2015 | by Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) | Link | Original Link

Having never participated in a men’s issues conference before, I went to the ICMI ‘14 in Detroit with high expectations. The media promised me I would face a roomful of raging white male, cisgender misogynists; bitter men who can’t get laid and aren’t allowed to rape, violent members of AVfM staff who would happily bash me in the face and rapists lurking around every corner. I regret to inform you that I was largely, although not completely, disappointed.

First of all, there were chicks everywhere. I could hardly move without woman-slamming some broad who got in my way. Erin Pizzey and Senator Anne Cools woman-spread all over the place. Dr. T. assaulted pretty much everyone with her giant, poufy, utterly magnificent hair. Karen Straughan and the Honeybadgers woman-spread over an entire floor! I wasn’t the only one who found all the vagina disconcerting, either. Photographers struggled to find an angle that captured a men only audience. It was damn near impossible with strumpets in every other seat.

There was also a distinct shortage of bitter, angry white men, although a few did show up to snarl and sneer through the whole conference. One man in particular was nasty, snide and extremely belittling. His name was Jeff Sharlet of GQ Magazine. He even brought in his own submissive female, instructing her to wander around offering herself to attendees. I strongly encourage AVfM to invite more men of his ilk to ICMI ‘15 if they wish to maintain their image as a cabal of disillusioned, raging ideologues choking on bile and hate. A few more Jeff Sharlets and the equally white, male and raging Adam Serwer and ICMI ‘15 might have a shot at being a gathering place for fuming, emotionally compromised white men.

My hopes for sexual assault and harassment were raised when I saw that I was to be segregated from the hoi polloi of the conference, on a raised platform surrounded by a metal railing, at the far back of the hall. I was seated with David King, who was far too busy with technical issues to meet his required harassment quota. He failed to grab my ass even once, even though it was only inches away. James Huff was so intensely involved in the radio broadcast that he too, failed to find time to harass me. At one point, Terrence Popp came to sit with us and I thought for sure a rape would go down but he too disappointed me with respectful, civil behaviour. Of the hundreds of conference participants, not one harassed me. AVfM’s promise in that regard was a complete and disappointing failure.

I will now confess that I am partially responsible for the fact that Paul Elam did not grab me by the hair and smash my face into the wall. He had ample opportunity to do so, but I failed to live up to my part of the bargain and thus I am at fault for not getting a beating. You see, I was supposed to violently attack him first, inspired by the writers and editors at Jezebel. Had I slapped him across the face so hard his glasses flew off, like the Jezebel ladies did to their men, I most certainly would have gotten the beating I so richly deserved. I accept responsibility for this conference failure. Paul Elam did not beat me up because I didn't punch him first. This is a systemic failure in my life. I do not hit men, and they do not hit me. I shall have to work on that.

The only aspect of the conference that was even marginally successful was its ability to attract misogynists. Jessica Roy demonstrated significant hatred on women in her piece for Time Magazine, in which she refused to even acknowledge that women play a significant role in the MHRM. Jeff Sharlet and Adam Serwer, in addition to filling the angry white men quota, supplemented the misogynist category, too. In fact, virtually every reporter attending the event was a raging misogynist openly seething at the women who support and care about men and boys. Increasing press presence should ensure that ICMI '15 has a sufficient group of woman-hating Neanderthals at hand.

I hope that this evaluation will not lead others to conclude there is no point to attending the ICMI '15. Maintaining the MHRM as a hotbed of misogyny, harassment and violence will not be easy, to be certain, but it is far from impossible. The more tickets we sell, the more likely we are to attract feminist protesters. They will bring misogyny, harassment and threats of violence sufficient for this conference and a thousand more.

ICMI '15 or bust! I hope to see you there.

Gynocentrism – why so hard to kill?

May 3, 2015 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Many theories exist as to why we are saddled with a gynocentric culture in which men, to put it simplistically, play the role of servant to women. The explanation people choose will determine whether they believe gynocentrism is a permanent or temporary fact of human existence, and will dictate how they are likely to respond to it.

The first explanation is one of biological determinism – that men have always kowtowed to women regardless of fluctuations in cultural habits, customs, taboos and beliefs. Our genes, according to this theory, make men little more than nerve reflexes primed to obtain sex with females and reproduce – that we must position ourselves as slaves in order to meet that end.

A more reasonable version of the biology hypothesis was proposed by Lester F. Ward in his "Gynæcocentric theory"[1] which frames women as the dominant sex by dint of biology. Evolutionary Psychologists and Difference Feminists, who often collaborate,[2] support this view via anthropological, zoological and other scientific evidence. The basic theory holds that in the underpopulated world of the past, wombs were a precious and key resource to human survival, hence a genetic predisposition toward gynocentrism was a survival advantage. With the current overpopulation, however, wombs are now plentiful and cheap but our biological predispositions still make us overvalue them – ie. a redundant gynocentrism is built into our nervous system at a time when overpopulation could wipe out our species.

Biological determinists conclude that extreme gynocentrism is a permanent feature of human existence, and thus abandoning interactions with women is the only viable option if men want to be free of it: we must drop out of male-female interactions in order to avoid inbuilt gynocentric reflexes.

A completely different explanation is that gynocentrism is an extreme cultural exaggeration of human potential, one that hasn't played constantly throughout human history. This explanation leaves open the option to confront and potentially change gynocentric culture in the knowledge that it is not an inevitable fate for men to suffer.

The two perspectives above, one theory placing the accent on biology and the other on culture, have serious ramifications for how men conceptualize and responded to the problem – the one abandoning it, the other rejecting it and posing an alternative approach to male-female relations.

I personally wager that extreme gynocentrism, that which is based on chivalry and romantic love, is a novelty in the long walk of human evolution. And yet it doesn't appear to be going away, at least not quickly, despite concerted efforts to dismantle it. What could be going on?

Why is gynocentrism still alive?

With the different approaches to understanding gynocentrism touched on, I'd like to use the rest of this article to deal with one question – how to destroy the beast.

I'd like to think it will come to an end through natural processes. Human beings possess inbuilt regulating mechanisms that work to achieve homeostasis in biological, psychological and social systems, and which tend to cull extreme behaviors when they interfere with the overall psycho-biological economy.

Gynocentrism is an example of an extreme, discord-creating behavior, and yet those innate balancing mechanisms do not seem to be culling it from our repertoire. Why is that?

One explanation is that media is censoring those voices calling, nay yelling, for homeostasis.

Everyone draws information from the environment, and especially from the media, to construct internal schemas of the external world. We create internal pictures of how things work. However, if the environment is not providing adequate data, or worse, something in the environment is actively censoring the available data, it severely weakens our ability to understand the world and to create a balanced way of moving through it.

Censorship of the media by gynocentrists is not new, but historically speaking appears to be the No.1 force blocking a change in gender culture.

Go back 200 years and newspapers were the dominant media which began with some remarkable examples of free speech. But as soon as criticism of gynocentrism increased, the censor army infiltrated – free speech in newspapers was crushed. Ernest B. Bax for example wrote;

> When, however, the bluff is exposed… then the apostles of feminism, male and female, being unable to make even a plausible case out in reply, resort to the boycott, and by ignoring what they cannot answer, seek to stop the spread of the unpleasant truth so dangerous to their cause. The pressure put upon publishers > and editors by the influential Feminist sisterhood is well known.[3]

And;

> All parties, all sorts and conditions of politicians, from the fashionable and Conservative west-end philanthropist to the Radical working-men's clubbite, seem (or seemed until lately) to have come to an unanimous conclusion on one point – to wit, that the female sex is grievously groaning under the weight of male oppression. Editors of newspapers, keen to scent out every drift of public fancy with the object of regaling their "constant readers" with what is tickling to their palates, will greedily print, in prominent positions and in large type letters expressive of the view in question, whilst they will boycott or, at best, publish in obscure corners any communication that ventures to criticise the popular theory or that adduces facts that tell against it. Were I to pen an impassioned diatribe, tending to prove the villainy of man towards woman, and painting in glowing terms the poor, weak victim of his despotism, my description would be received with sympathetic approval. Not so, I fear, my simple statement of the unvarnished truth.[4]

Later came TV, which dethroned the old tabloid censorship. The Federal Communications Commission (USA) began handing out broadcasting licenses in the early 1950s (with the highest concentration of license grants and station sign-ons occurring between 1953 and 1956), spurring an explosion of growth in the medium. Half of all U.S. households had television sets by 1955.[5] With that advent, consider the success of Martin Luther King's civil rights campaigning which spanned from 1955 (Montgomery Bus Boycott) through to the mid 1960s. Without TV it would not have happened. Unfortunately, forces of political correctness infiltrated public broadcasting too, applying censorship and eventually dominating TV culture completely.

In the 1990's the new medium of the internet appeared and dethroned the old TV media with its censorship. This opened the door to thousands of revolutions gaining a voice, including the MRM & MGTOW, which have gained traction as cultural forces. But as usual, the cycle of → 1. New media technology → 2. subsequent cultural revolutions, and → 3. eventual feminist censorship, is playing out on the internet….. and we are entering the censorship phase of the cycle.

Those who say feminists will never succeed in censoring the internet are dreaming, and dare I say blind. It's happening – Twitter, Facebook, Youtube, Wikipedia, etc. all being taken over by feminist sensibilities and regulations. Free speech is experiencing a decline on most social media platforms.

The only avenue left is to grab our own domains and websites from which we can enjoy free speech, and to do it NOW before government regulators ask domain providers, hosting companies, and ISPs to institute onerous application criteria for the privilege. In short, give up on Youtube (etc) and grab a domain and website while you still can – social media is dying from censorship, and MGTOW, MRA and outspoken gamers etc will be its first casualties.

Despite the doom and gloom about impending censorship it's not all bad news, far from it. The window opened by the internet has been seized upon and used to maximum effect. We have inserted a narrative on what gynocentrism is, what men's issues are, and they've enjoyed considerable reach into the culture. Witness any comments section under an MSM article to gauge the new awareness of -and support for- these same issues. And the narrative is growing…

MHRAs, MGTOW, gamers, PUAs, antifeminists, and a growing coalition of everyday Joes, are poised to drive the nail deeper. We can continue to use social media -in spite of restrictive feminist guidelines- to drive the narrative home : gynocentrism is toxic and we want to to end. And those smart enough to grab their own domains and websites can come down harder with the message knowing there is no Hall Monitor to control our private soapboxes, at least not yet.

In fact let's grow our private websites exponentially so they overshadow PC social media outlets and continue competing with them in the battle for cultural real estate.

This article began with a description of different ways of conceptualizing the origins of gynocentric culture, and the question was posed of why does gynocentrism continue to exist. We then looked at the transformations of mainstream media through recent centuries, noting how media is a double-edged sword, at times championing free speech, and at times censoring it, with the latter being a potential cause for gynocentrism's longevity. Lastly was underlined how the internet currently gives voice to long suppressed thoughts, and of the need to make hay while the sun still shines – i.e. hopefully to make it shine longer and brighter. As long as we keep adding our story to mainstream media, and being the media, gynocentrism will atrophy and homeostasis will come.

Nothing is better after a delicious, filling meal than a good stogie, a snifter of brandy and flatulence. I can't help you with the smoke and the drink but when it comes to post-victual methane production, I'm your huckleberry.

So switch on your printers, gents, because after the first time you eat this eruptive combination, you are going to want to come back over and over again. And besides, you're MGTOW. You either don't have a woman there or even if you do you are the kind of campfire king that doesn't mind just letting her deal with it.

First, the beans.

Get those beans going because they are going to cook long and slow. You can do this in a large pot on the stove if you want. I prefer a slow cooker because I like equipment that frees you up to more or less ignore it. Here are the ingredients:

One pound of rinsed pinto beans (look for small rocks as they add nothing to the flavor and are bad for your teeth).

One yellow onion, (trigger warning) skinned and quartered.

However many crushed cloves of garlic float your boat.

A big ol' ham hock (smoked turkey neck is a sure winner, too).

One poblano pepper, destemmed, seeded and hacked into chunks.

One tablespoon chili powder.

One tablespoon ground cumin.

Salt to taste.

Extras

One white (Spanish) onion. Cold!

Some chopped cilantro.

Now, put your little gas makers in a big bowl and cover them with water plus 2-3 inches. Let sit in the fridge overnight. Drain the water and toss them in a big ass pot or slow cooker. Cover with fresh water liberally. Give at least 3-4 inches of water above the beans.

Add everything except the cilantro and white onion.

Put the pot on a stove and light a high fire under its ass until it boils like a feminist in finishing school.

Lower heat to simmer, cover and cook for 3-4 hours. Cook and stir occasionally for the last 30 minutes to reduce.

Or, if using a slow cooker, just dump the ingredients in, turn it on low and walk away.

You will want to come back and stir from time to time, and taste, as you might want to adjust seasoning. In your stove pot be sure to stir from the bottom so you don't burn your beanies.

Now for a little cornbread magic.

A good bowl of beans just fine all by itself, but when you drown a big old hunk of fresh out of the oven cornbread in them, they go to a whole new level. Here is the recipe for that. TRIGGER WARNING: unless you like fat and fat shaming, this is not for you. But if you don't care about all that crap and just want a damn good meal (several actually) on the absolute cheap, then get ready to get serious about getting full.

Jalapeno Cheese Cornbread

Rub the bottom and sides of a 9 x 13 backing pan with butter till it is greasier than a Chicago politician.

3 cups all-purpose flour

1 cup yellow cornmeal

1/4 cup sugar

2 tablespoons baking powder

2 teaspoons salt

2 cups of obnoxious full fat milk

3 big ol' eggs, whoop up on 'em a little but don't overbeat them.

2 sticks of unsalted butter, melted.

Tip: Melting butter is one of the very few reasons for a microwave to even exist. But if you go that way be sure to cover the container you use. Butter has pockets of water in it and they tend to expand much faster than fat when heated quickly. The sticks can pop like a feminist brain engaging a fact, splattering useful butter on the inside walls of that otherwise useless contraption.

8 ounces of shredded Monterrey Jack or other cheese of your choice, though I don't recommend anything too sharp for this recipe. Set about an ounce of it aside.

4 chopped scallions, white and green parts for the batter.

1 chopped scallion, white and green parts for the garnish.

1 or 2 fresh, large jalapeno pepper(s), destemmed, seeded and finely chopped, depending on how much you want to bring the pain. If you leave them out altogether, turn everything off, make yourself a mayonnaise sammich and put Mary Poppins in the DVD player. You're done.

Just kidding. Real men eat whatever they want.

Now, put all your dry ingredients into a large bowl and mix 'em up. Then put all your wet ingredients into another bowl and mix them up. Again, flour, cornmeal, sugar, baking powder and salt in one bowl. Milk, eggs and butter into another. Use a soft whisk to stir the wet ingredients into the dry ingredients till most of the lumps are dissolved.

DO NOT OVERMIX.

At this point if all the kitchen violence is getting to you, take a short break. If not, push on to the finish line.

Gently fold in about 2 cups of the Monterrey Jack, 3 scallions and the jalapenos. Fold until completely mixed in, then STOP. Cover the top of the bowl and let it set for about a half hour at room temperature.

This is a good time to preheat your oven to 350 degrees.

Pour your batter into the greasy pan, even out the top and sprinkle it evenly with remaining cheese and scallions, then and shove it into the oven. Shut the door on it like it was chivalry.

Let it cook for about 30-35 minutes.

Tip: You can check cornbread for doneness with a toothpick. Stab the cornbread in the middle with it as far down as it will go. Pull it back out. If it is wet, put it back in the oven till the toothpick comes back dry enough to remind you of your ex.

When done, set on counter to cool.

This is a good time to peel your white onion and slice it into rings as well as chop your cilantro, about a tablespoon of it.

The rest is a matter of style. Some people like their bowl of beans with the cornbread on the side. Others like their cornbread on a plate or in a bowl smothered in beans. However you take it, sprinkle the fresh chopped cilantro on your beans when served. Serve the cold raw onion rings on the side.

Some people might complain this recipe could be what is known down here as borracho beans if you just add a bottle of beer to the water. Trust me, just drink the beer with your dinner.

Now, sit back and stuff yourself. Wait 15 minutes. Fart.

Repeat as necessary.

Other recipies from Eating While MGTOW:

- Boom boom chicken
- Chicken Valenti cassolette
- Hug box feminist vegetables
- Stuffed chauvinist pig
- Buck buck chicken
- Look at the flowers! Stoup
- Gender binary gelatin dessert
- Spicy civil breakdown chicken

Another rape that never was

May 4, 2015 | by Jim Muldoon | Link | Original Link

Trigger warning: This story contains a description of a young innocent girl being raped that is supposed to get you angry with men. All men. You should be frothing at the mouth, demanding that we not blame the victims. With red face and veins standing out, you should be screaming that we should teach men to not rape. Then, you'll just have to bottle all that rage for the next rape, because this one didn't happen either.

On Thursday, 29th April 2015 numerous news outlets alerted the good people of Albury, New South Wales, Australia, that a 17 year old girl had been attacked by three men in the heart of their fair city.

The attack was described as a sexual assault by the Daily Advertiser, but as a rape by the ABC website. Both terms, sexual assault and rape, were used almost interchangeably by the media throughout. Which was it? Rape? Sexual Assault? Who cares? Get your torches and pitchforks and we'll sort the facts out after the lynching.

The other term that was abused was the word "allegedly". Sometimes it was completely left out, as in this headline from the ABC's website:

"Images of three men released after teenage girl raped at knifepoint in Albury, NSW".

The same article begins with this statement:

"Police have released computer-generated images of three men following the alleged rape of a girl in Albury, in southern New South Wales. [emphasis mine]"

Two paragraphs later and it's gone again:

"NSW Police said the group dragged the girl into bushes and sexually assaulted her at knifepoint before fleeing along Dean Street."

No, "alleged" is kept to a minimum. It is only used when it is legally necessary, and not when it is accurate. The assumption of guilt is further promoted by the repeated use of the word "victim".

As the headline states, computer sketch images of the three knife-wielding fiends were widely publicised, along with descriptions of age, height and weight. Both the Daily Advertiser and the Cowra Guardian ran Sarah Dean's emotive article entitled:

"Find them: East Albury rape victim, 17, was followed by men."

However, as the call for vigilante rape detectors went up, another familiar song and dance was beginning.

Albury mayor, Kevin Mack, thought it important to make a chivalrous call for damsels to be escorted at all times. According to the Age, he reportedly "cautioned women not to walk alone," because "it was an invitation to be taken advantage of."

Many news outlets then focussed on the Mayor's clear lack of understanding of feminist dogma. So effective was the feminist uprising that the Good Mayor (and yes, I do mean that in the sense of Good Men) promptly made a complete retraction of his earlier statements. SBS tell us that the Good Mayor said these politically appropriate words:

"She was doing what she would do every day and she's been the victim of a heinous crime and her callous attackers are responsible for that."

The Border Mail reports that Good Mayor Mack's grovelling went further, quoting him as saying:

"I absolutely and categorically support women and their rights, and believe that violence against women is totally unacceptable in any form. And to that end I encourage the community, as one, to support this and prevent this."

Yes, now the Good Mayor has his Feminist Sacred Babble working. Any idea how we support something and prevent it at the same time? Or are we just supposed to get caught up in the emotion and cheer?

So, the hunt was on. Clear descriptions of the monsters were distributed. Let's not forget that Albury is a small country city with a population of less than 50,000. So it should only be a matter of time before justice would be served, and served hard. Two days later, the NSW Police, in their Facebook page, made this surprising statement:

"An investigation into the reported sexual assault of a teenage girl in Albury earlier this week has concluded."

In case that doesn't explain it for you, they cleared it up by adding this:

"Police are no longer seeking three men and no further action is anticipated."

So, no rape? No sexual assault? Not even ordinary assault? No knife? No three men? No stalking?

Not even cat-calling or leering-with-intent?

Did the Good Mayor now demand that the feminist outrage machine apologise? Did the police charge the 17 year old girl for false accusations? Did anyone ask any hard questions at all?

Not yet, and breath-holding is not advised.

It gets worse. The Sydney Morning Herald's Rachel Browne who, whilst announcing that the investigation had been "finalised", continued to berate the still-not-Good Mayor for his victim blaming ways. She concludes with quotes apparently left by women on Mack's facebook page which ironically includes this gem:

"Start with the men who [rape], not blame women for men's disgusting actions."

I wonder how she feels about false allegations. Or perhaps we should just lock up any three young men. Maybe then she will feel she's getting justice for having to live on a planet that's contaminated by men.

In news.com.au the "finalised" announcement gets an even weirder treatment. The sketches of the men that are no longer wanted are still being shown, and they are still referred to as suspects for an attack that never happened.

Again, Mack gets a bitch-slapping for not being their bitch. But then, they go on to discuss what panelists in a domestic violence forum have to say about Mack's politically incorrect and clearly not-retracted-enough statements. The quote from one panelist, clearly proficient in the Sacred Babble, adds to the irony:

“When it comes to gender stereotypes, like saying that women need to take measures to protect themselves, we need to make people aware that the way they respond to these incidents perpetuates those myths.”

Which myths would they be? The myth that domestic violence includes being raped in a public park by strangers? That a rape that didn’t happen is still rape? That women never lie about rape? That false accusations of rape are good for innocent men?

What about the myth that mainstream news journalists and the domestic violence industry are not promoting feminist bigotry? Or, the myth that police and politicians are not well and truly cowed by the feminist propaganda machine?

Fortunately for the young men of Albury, the computer sketches did not throw suspicion on any actual individuals before the lynch mob was told to stand down. Because the other myth that is perpetuated is that the assumption of guilt somehow equates to justice.

On putting Meghan Murphy to bed

Rabble.ca writer and feminist Meghan Murphy just discovered something worse than objectification — subjectification by other feminists.

Murphy, a ginger, has become the subject of a clam-paign in full swing by feminists to put Murphy to bed in her hugbox without any supper or Smurfs to caress — in other words, get her ass fired. On Twitter the hashtag #DropMM encourages people to urge the pink poodle publication Rabble.ca to dump Murphy for being a bit too harsh on black trans woman Laverne Cox for a nude photo spread (NSF TERFs) in the women's magazine Allure that made women into cartoons, according to Murphy:

> …spending thousands and thousands of dollars sculpting their bodies in order to look like some cartoonish version of 'woman,' as defined by the porn industry and pop culture.

In addition to feminists' tweeting and contacting Rabble.ca directly, a petition to oust Murphy can be found here with a modest 906 signatures as of this writing. On the opposing side, hate groups of anti-trans radical feminists, known as TERF's (Trans Exclusive Radical feminists), have their own petition to keep Murphy's frothing contempt alive. The counter-petition has 1484 signatures as of this writing.

Murphy is, of course, having a meltdown over the situation, bizarrely blaming men and corporations for co-opting her beloved feminism and turning turnt feminists against her:

> This is what corporate feminism looks like. Literal billion-dollar corporations who screw over the working class and marginalized, time and time again, profiting from the misogynist standards they set for women, promoted and defended as "feminist." These wealthy white men have feminists across the web rallying together in support of their billion-dollar media empire and nefarious interests. While Hefner watches from his mansion, surrounded by his harem of young women, liberal American feminists who purport to be on the "progressive" side of history are doing his dirty work — not only by promoting the pornification of women and lining his pockets, but by actively working against any feminist who dares challenge him. [Emphais added]

Murphy is a foe of any hint that women have any "agency" — the self-determination, self-reliance and denial of victimhood often associated primarily with men — at all. Murphy sees patriarchy in everything and cannot abide the idea that some woman, somewhere, might be a capable, responsible adult.

I suspect Murphy's visceral disgust for Cox is that Cox's agency in becoming an attractive women (surgery, money, diet, exercise, makeup, hair, etc.) is too mannish — in the sense of too active — for Murphy to tolerate: for example, Murphy routinely denies that women sex workers might have the agency to choose and even enjoy working in sex. Or,

Murphy's core problem may have been that Cox ate macaroni and cheese the night before the photo shoot, and as a Canadian, Murphy was enraged that a trans woman was sullying an iconic Canadian foodstuff.

Who knows? Like feminism itself, my analyzing feminist craziness is good for amusement and little else.

Now, Murphy's hatred of men is so great that she's squarely in the radical feminist "men can't be feminists" camp: she wrote in xoJane that "It's not that I don't think men can be feminist. I know many men who clearly align themselves with the feminist movement. The problem seems to be with men who self-identify as 'feminist' as a means of gaining credibility or avoiding accountability. The problem is that many men who claim to be 'good men' or to respect women, don't actually… well… respect women."

Of course, the paradox for men is that if we respect women, should we kowtow to their whims (humor them), challenge their whims (treat them as equals capable of accepting criticism), reverence their whims (worship them out of love) or fearfully obey them? Feminists won't say except to note than whatever men do with regard to women is wrong somehow.

Murphy's opponents are also feminists of a different but also horrible sort — "hugbox" types who seek to suppress any dissent, a practice Murphy has rightly criticized:

> Pathologizing disagreement is an intellectually dishonest way to cope with challenging arguments. It certainly doesn't support critical thinking.
> It also creates a culture wherein people are afraid to express dissenting opinions or question the party line. This is ironic, because many of those under threat of being silenced are people who are speaking out against abuse, harassment and violence.

Holy cervix! Murphy almost sounds like Christina Hoff Sommers or the Honey Badgers there.

As men, our instinct when we see a squabble like this is to do something but there doesn't seem to be a worthy cause to get behind here: we've encouraged feminists to police their own extremists but is Murphy such an extremist, and does policing them mean censoring them? Murphy's views on men and trans folk are wretched but on other issues like censorship she is moderate and reasonable in ways rarely seen in other feminists.

Feminists don't accept allies in the way that other people do: feminists see allies as slaves and have no concept of loyalty to alliances. Men's rights advocates have nothing to gain here — as a practical political matter we have no sow in this sty.

We could make the cynical calculations that:

1. Whomever we support in a feminist internecine conflict will be undermined by the fact of our support — feminists would view our intervention as proof of the wrongheaded nature of the other side, and

2. Our best bet in our conflict with feminists is to keep feminists fighting each other, in that it takes the pressure from other areas where feminism damages men's issues – and women's as well.

One can legitimately support "Keep Murphy" due to her stance against censorship, and one can also legitimately support "Dump Murphy" for her disturbing positions on men, trans folk, patriarchy and women's agency.

Or, you can ease back with the popcorn and hope the fight goes on forever. For now, I need to put this article to bed, too.

Letter to US DoD re: Walk a Mile in Her Shoes

May 05, 2015

Mr. Jon T. Rymer

Inspector General, U. S. Department of Defense

4800 Mark Center Drive
Alexandria, VA 22350-1500

Re: Request for Investigation & Formal Complaint
Article 133, Conduct Unbecoming an Officer
Major General Peggy C. Combs
U.S. Army Cadet Command, Fort Knox, KY

Mr. Rymer,

AVfM, Education, LLC is an international men's human rights advocacy, educational, research and journalistic organization. Our directors, advisors, liaisons, and members are men and women from a wide variety of professions around the globe. Our membership is in the tens of thousands in more than 20 nations and we have affiliates in eight countries, publishing in seven languages. You can learn more about AVfM, our interests, efforts, and numerous accomplishments by visiting our website, www.avoiceformen.com.

During the month of April 2015, many entities across the country recognized Sexual Assault Awareness Month, including virtually all college campuses.

It has come to our attention that two universities; specifically Temple University and Arizona State University conducted a unique social experiment that was carried out by the ROTC program.

At both of those schools, ROTC cadets were ordered to wear red women's high heel shoes and partake in a one mile walk through the campuses in an event that was titled, "Walk a Mile in Her Shoes," allegedly to raise awareness of the problem of domestic violence and sexual assault on college campuses.

Numerous news media sources have thoroughly documented and filmed the event which vividly depicts male soldiers wearing red high heel shoes while dressed in official military camouflage uniforms, a direct violation of Army regulation 670-1. This coverage has proliferated throughout social media platforms.

Besides the direct violation of Army regulations, this act, reportedly ordered at the highest levels of the Army Cadet Command was demeaning, humiliating, and embarrassing to the male cadets who were ordered to take part.

This politically motivated and ideological event is an embarrassment to the United States military, which demands an official investigation. It is obvious from the thousands of negative comments on social media that this stunt has less to do with raising awareness about sexual assault and more to do with humiliating male ROTC cadets for the sake of gender politics. The cadets were under duress not in a position to object to their treatment.

It is unknown who actually ordered the ROTC cadets to comply, however the ultimate responsibility falls on the shoulders of the leadership of the Cadet Command, Major General Peggy C. Combs. The number of websites, message boards and Facebook pages depicting these events are too numerous to list but can be found in a matter of seconds with a basic internet search.

This organization, as well as many others across the country deplores domestic violence, sexual harassment and assault. When proven true, we believe that violators should be punished in accordance with all applicable laws.

There has been sweeping news media attention in the past few years of an "epidemic" of sexual assault in the military. The truth however is that there is no epidemic of sexual assault in the military. Extrapolated figures based on a recent survey using flawed methodology has fueled an irrational public and subsequently irrational political reaction even though the claim of an epidemic has already been debunked.

Contrived statistics have fueled a near hysteria that has been exacerbated by a number of political leaders and ideologically driven special interest groups. This has resulted in a narrative which portrays all male soldiers and cadets as suspected perpetrators, and women only as victims or survivors. This is in complete contrast to overwhelming evidence that members of both sexes fall into the classes of both perpetrators and victims. [1][2][3]

Sadly, the result of all this is that men in the military are now targeted as useful political pawns by senior military and political leadership.

AVfM respectfully asks the Office of the Department of Defense Inspector General to conduct a full and comprehensive investigation to determine who in the Cadet Command, chain of command, ordered male only ROTC Cadets to participate in a political charade and whether such orders were lawful.

If in fact it is determined that Major General Peggy Combs; the Commanding Officer of the Cadet Command is responsible, we ask that she be court-martialed in accordance with Article 133 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice; Conduct Unbecoming an Officer. AVfM also respectfully asks that the Inspector General's office issue a public apology and media press release to the cadets who were affected, their families, and the universities in which these events occurred.

AVfM fully supports eliminating sexual harassment and assault in the military. However, the meme of “raising awareness” has reached a point that can only be described as abusive, with constant and repeated briefings depicting only males as perpetrators and only women as victims. The military now appears to be acting at the behest of ideologues to further a political agenda, not to ameliorate the issue of sexual assault. The discrimination against male military members is having the deleterious effect of furthering division and mistrust between service personnel of different sexes.

AVfM welcomes the results of an investigation. If the DoD Office of Inspector General has any questions, please feel free to contact this organization, and we respectfully request a written response to this correspondence in accordance with normal business practices.

Sincerely & Respectfully,

Paul Elam, Chief Executive Officer, AVfM Operations, LLC

Book Review: The Mu Rhythm Bluff, an Adventure Book Discussing Masculinity and Disability

May 5, 2015 | by Yuval Levental | Link | Original Link

The Mu Rhythm Bluff, by Jonathan Mitchell, features an autistic man named Drake Dumas who is in his late forties and is unlucky at both love and cards. Jonathan Mitchell, the author, is autistic himself in real life, and much of the book's plot is based off his real life's struggles.

In the book, Dumas works as a medical transcriptionist, barely making a living in his late forties. He also plays poker as a hobby. Eventually, he gets fired from his transcriptionist job for not working well enough. However, he learns about an experimental treatment for autism called Transcranial Magnetic Stimulation and signs up for it. Even though the treatment doesn't seem to help much at first, he finds out that he can now read people's facial expressions really well at poker, even managing to win one million dollars at a famous tournament. However, his poker skills decline over time, and he must find them out how to get them back. He meets a couple women that claim to be interested in him, but only want his money. As his poker skills decline, those women lose interest in him.

One important theme of this book is the challenge of interacting with women with a profound disability. Dumas is a virgin in his late forties, and it pains him. He flaps his hands in public and rambles about incoherent topics, and as a result, many women mock his disability. After he wins the one million dollars, a journalist named Erin Hobbs exploits his life's story in the New York Times, portraying him as an untapped genius and trivializing his difficulties. As a result, Dumas is deeply angry.

To fulfill the expectations of masculinity, Dumas is expected to be a provider. It is often said that "a man's career is his penis". His boss at the transcription company, Natalie, pushes him around and threatens to fire him over small mistakes. After getting fired, he contemplates suicide, which is often the result of terminal unemployment for men. However, he discovers the experimental treatment for Autism, which changes his mind.

Although he wants to be cured from autism, there is a fad called the "Neurodiversity Movement" which says that autistics are different, not disabled, which serves as an attack on his potential masculinity. To this day, there is no evidence that autistics are truly talented and don't need assistance. In the book, Dumas clashes with higher-functioning autistics over this issue, and they refuse to give him support for his wish, claiming that he is just asking for attention. The book's author, Jonathan Mitchell, has written a brilliant essay on the matter in real life, Undiagnosing Gates, Jefferson, and Einstein.

Later on in the book when Dumas becomes rich from poker, a manipulative female journalist takes an interest in him, but she seems overly obsessed. Drake follows her into a limo — where he is held at gunpoint by the leader of a drug dealing gang. To survive, he now has to play poker for them for the rest of his life until he dies. Under a lot of pressure, Dumas must find a way to gain his poker skills back so the gang won't kill him. He must play along with them while thinking of a method to escape.

The writing style of this book is very detailed and in-depth. The reader will feel like he is being pulled into the story, as he learns about autism, poker, and dating. This book is very suspenseful, with Dumas trying to win endless money at poker with his new talent and having more luck dating women. As Dumas likes to repeatedly say, this book is "Like a Dagger Through the Heart."

Rebuttal to “Bullying: 3 rules”

I rarely submit articles for publication on AVfM (other than on server- or tech-related subjects) because I generally have far too much to be doing, even though there have been several occasions when I would really have liked to write something up.

Lee Turner’s recent article, Bullying: 3 rules, however, touched on a subject which deeply affected me personally and about which I have some quite strong perspectives so, however much I should be doing other things, this article is an adapted and slightly augmented version of a comment I posted on Lee’s article that was really too long to be posted as a comment anyway. So, fair disclosure: I’m not completely impartial on the matter.

For the most part, Lee’s piece contained a good deal of good and thoughtful advice but, in the spirit of constructive debate, I want to offer a rebuttal and a critique of several aspects of Lee’s piece.

What thesis?

There seemed to be two distinct theses running through Lee’s piece: on the one hand, the role of government and whether government initiatives can be worthwhile and, on the other, the actual subject at hand, viz. bullying.

We’re a politically diverse lot, which is precisely why we forbid discussion of partisan politics on AVfM — so the most I’ll say on this subject is that inclusion of even the assumption that a government initiative cannot succeed because, ipso facto, it is a government initiative is an unnecessary distraction from and adds little to the much more serious and profound debate around bullying.

Perhaps it is not even worth mentioning it, except to point out how a strong argument can be weakened by an unrelated argument that is, well, arguable.

No one-size-fits-all solution

Bullying is a complex subject and very difficult problem to resolve because it affects different people in different ways, and therefore reactions and long-term consequences are just as diverse.

I think Lee illustrated this point in the following passages:

> Reflecting back on it now, I realise that whilst painful then, this experience was a necessary one. It has not destroyed our lives and appears to have been at least partly instrumental in making us what we are today – fully functional members of society, sometimes quite successful in career and business. It grows thick skin and teaches one to deal with personal conflict.

I’m glad Lee’s experience didn’t destroy him or his future, but many kids aren’t so lucky, as he partially recognised when he then wrote:

> I can say from direct personal experience and of many of those around me that bullying can have a lasting negative effect on a person's life…
> For kids who can successfully face and deal with their abusers, I'm sure it is, indeed, an empowering experience and a valuable lesson (as you said) in conflict resolution.

Some of the comments in Lee's article echoed both of those sentiments.

My question, then, is what of those kids who never manage successfully to fend off their abusers? Lee mentioned that bullying sometimes has fatal consequences, citing the Columbine shootings as an example.

I would say, though, that deaths from bullying take the form, in much greater numbers, of suicide, whether at the time, or later in life. Indeed, at least one commentator on Lee's article mentioned this. Sometimes, the means of suicide takes years or decades to effect itself. I am, of course, referring to substance abuse.

Interventions

Lee gave a fairly decent amount of good advice, too, particularly the rejection of the old canard "ignore it [they'll go away if they don't get a rise from you]" and the need for kids to stand up to their bullies.

That idea is, and always was, a lie, a sop or a thought-terminating cliché that allowed adults to avoid having to face the problem head on. Bullies don't go away until you make them.

I do agree that how a child deals with bullying has more to do with how the kid is raised than it does with what the school or government does (though I don't think the school or, by extension, government should be free to wash their hands completely of the matter as once was the case).

In my own case, my parents' peculiar religiously-driven attitude was that fighting back, especially if it involves violence, is never justified. The damage that did was quite sufficient on its own, for I never learned how to defend or assert myself and therefore never learned (in childhood) any conflict resolution skills. I acquired them later in life, but not before the consequences of internalising and subsuming such conflict — the only socially-acceptable alternative available to me — did far more damage than it need have done.

How a child deals with abuse has as much to do with the psychology of the child, which also affects the consequences for and impact on the child, and what tools the child has to defend themselves.

That said, what the school does about bullying does matter. In my day, bullies were rarely punished (because they were just behaving normally or, at least, normally for them), where any kid who fought back was much more likely to be punished because (so far as I could tell) it was the path of least resistance for the staff involved.

That schools are now, at last, taking the problem of bullying seriously is hugely significant, even if the way they're going about may turn out to be ineffective. The authorities' first attempt may prove fruitless, but (so long as this is not just lip-service) sooner or later, they'll find an intervention, or at least a way to support victims of bullying, that does work.

Taking responsibility

I had grave difficulty with this one passage in Lee's piece, however:

> It is a character test and a lesson in overcoming adversity. Failure to cope with it successfully is a personal failure and not that of any system educational or otherwise.

The effect of this is to tell a child — whose character and personality are not yet fully developed — that their character is faulty, that there is something wrong with them or, at any rate, that their experiences are their fault. Perhaps that is not what Lee meant, but it is certainly how I read it (and if I, an adult, can interpret it that way, how might a child?).

Feminists are fond of saying that fault always lies with the perpetrator of abuse and, on this occasion, I agree with them. Where I differ from feminists is that the fault of one does not absolve the other of responsibility for dealing with that abuse.

School years are, as Lee said, about learning life skills as well as academic, and part of learning anything is getting it wrong on occasion. The message contained within that quote is completely counterproductive if you want a child to learn to cope with bullying on his or her own because it undermines their self esteem (which is already likely to be at a low ebb, anyway, after prolonged bullying) and thereby their ability to deal with the problem (yet) and to try again.

Still, I agree that shielding kids from bullying altogether (by adult intervention) is equally counterproductive because, as Lee pointed out, it doesn't teach coping skills that will be needed later in life.

> The second fundamental failure of anti-bullying campaigners is the, "listen to your child" message. […] "No snitching" is a firm rule and, as with the point made above, is different to what adults can do in their lives.

This is also deeply counterproductive. Children can't get the support they need if they won't (or can't) talk to the adults who, whether in loco parentis or their actual parents, have a duty to provide what support and teaching is required for the child to address the problem on their own.

If the kid could have dealt with it already, they would have, and the problem would have been short lived. If the kid can't deal with it, not asking for help means "sucking it up", bottling up the anger, hurt, humiliation and frustration (and the attendant consequences for low self-esteem), which solves nothing.

A problem not solved is merely a problem postponed. Sooner or later, it will demand redress, and better that it be addressed as a child than in adulthood where it can turn to substance abuse, bad relationships and other self-destructive behaviours (to say nothing of various kinds of mental health issues) and where unlearning ingrained behaviours takes much more effort than before they become established.

It is well known that adult men are bad about seeking help. Failing to train kids to ask for help when they need it is not going to ease that problem in the slightest.

So, what to do?

So far as I can see, the solution to bullying is not an either-or question. It requires awareness on the part of school staff and, to the extent that it is necessary, it is up to the state to ensure that every school, private or public, and member of teaching staff is aware of their obligation to understand the problem and be trained to deal with instances constructively as they arise. I would say that the only constructive things school staff can do is be cognisant of the nature of any given conflict, to punish bullies and not punish the victims who, especially if they are trying to figure out how to cope on their own, may not always use appropriate means to assert themselves.

Victims of bullying also need access to resources to teach them how to proactively defend themselves. For example, reacting to words with fists is not okay, so give them words that they can use and adapt.

But, if the victim is getting beaten up, then (I believe) it is appropriate to teach them effective self defence techniques designed to disable an attacker speedily and with only the minimum force required (and that kids must not be punished for doing so when they are required to employ those techniques). In fairness, Lee did allude to some of this in his article, but didn't elaborate on it.

The single most important thing a victim of bullying can do is learn how to assert themselves effectively and proportionately. Like mathematics or civilized conversation, this is a learned skill with which nobody is born. Why, then, should anybody expect kids to figure out such a complex and subtle skill on their own?

Teach kids that it's never okay to start a fight, but that it's absolutely okay to finish one started by somebody else.

Addendum: bullying in adulthood

Bullying is not, as Lee pointed out, a phenomenon unique to childhood. The techniques that are applicable to childhood bullying aren't always appropriate in the adult world, especially not in the workplace.

Outside of the workplace, there really isn't much you can do except remove yourself from the situation (unless the situation is at home, in which case that opens the whole question of DV and especially DV services for men).

The power dynamics of the workplace are quite different from those of the school yard. It's true, an adult victim of workplace bullying can choose to work elsewhere (even if they shouldn’t have to, though it may be the least-worst option in some instances), but it’s not quite true to to say that employees aren’t required to be there. Bullies and victims both certainly are, if they wish to remain employed there!

That being the case, there are some things that can be done in workplace bullying situations, assuming company management is functional and competent (and yes, that is quite an assumption).

From the company’s point of view, every employee (including management) is there to further the company’s business activities. Any conduct that interferes with an employee’s ability to discharge their duties also interferes with the company’s productivity — and any manager worth his or her salt should have an interest in rectifying such hindrances.

It doesn’t always work (especially in small companies or companies given over to cliquishness) but, in theory, a bully’s employment can be made conditional on their modifying their disruptive behaviour. Exactly how this can be achieved depends on the company amongst many other factors, but anybody experiencing workplace bullying might be able to effect some sort of change either via an Employee Assistance Programme (if there is one) or with a quiet word with one’s own manager (or their manager, if necessary). The idea is to make it the manager’s problem by framing it in terms of the victim’s productivity and therefore the productivity of the victim’s workgroup which, in turn, reflects on the manager.

There are no silver bullets and I am sure that many readers can quite legitimately take issue with what I’ve said just there, but I felt it was worth mentioning just in case it could help someone, even if it it can’t help everyone.

Epistle To Evan Marc Katz

Author's Note: It has come to my attention that popular dating coaches (for women) Evan Marc Katz and Andrew of The Rules Revisted have been discussing the Manosphere of late – yet another in the very long line of blog posts, articles and the like seeking to "examine" our corner of the Internet this year.

The following was an open letter I wrote to EMK, after a series of articles was published about him and his work on my blog Just Four Guys last summer. In light of the recent articles he and Andrew have written, I felt it important that an official "response" was registered. I welcome any and all comments in response.

> "We didn't land on Plymouth Rock; Plymouth Rock, landed on us!"
> -Malcolm X

Hello Evan,

OK, now that I've had a bit of time to sit down and reflect on our exchange over the past few weeks, I feel I'm in a better place to share my thoughts.

First, again, I want to thank you for taking the time out; I admit that I'm a persistent guy who can't take "no" for an answer – but if I simply did what guys like you do, I'd never get anywhere or have anything in this world. For mere mortals like us, persistence pays.

The first thing I want to say is that I am deeply offended by your handling of me and more importantly, my website. My old Just 4 Guys (J4G) web site has gone out of its way to take your concerns seriously, addressing them many times. Moreover, I really do not appreciate the way you have repeatedly referred to the fellas over there in the most derisive terms – terms that are completely unfair and counterproductive. Indeed, many of the very same things you say about us, you claim to have been said about you(!). I can think of no bigger case study of Projection.

Two of the J4G team members, Ciaran and Morpheus, have gone out of their way to be fair and respectful on your own website – this, after both have been viciously personally attacked without nary a word from you to your regular readers not to do so or failing that, to at least tone it down. Yet they continued to engage your readers with grace and aplomb. I know this because I quietly read the comments.

Not only that, but your characterization of them, and more broadly, J4G itself, was patently dishonest and unfair. Both Ciaran and Morpheus are happily married men, and so are quite a few team members and regular contributors. For you to paint J4G as a bunch of lonely bitter basement dwellers is disingenuous, and I've had enough of it.

I will not have you besmirch the website I cofounded and helped to build with my bare hands any longer. Measure for measure we are more fair and objective than your readers, and unlike you, I went out of my way to ensure that you were not personally attacked – I personally deleted some two dozen comments referring to you in a derisive way, and that's after I admonished everyone not to do so. I have upheld my word to you, Evan.

Moving to your "challenge", there have been at least half a dozen lengthy and detailed responses from J4G readers, as to how your hypothetical 38-year-old woman could find love and kids – which, I might add, is far and away more helpful and constructive advice than I could find on your site from your readers, most of whom seem completely cool with dismissing the travails of men out in the mating market in our time.

A case in point is the short Men post you had up from some years back. Women on your site felt wholly justified in taking a "let him eat cake" stance, again, with nary a peep from you. I read a lot of what you write, Evan and I pay close attention to what your lady readers have to say. To say that I am disappointed, would be an understatement.

I also deeply resent your repeated attempts to compare and liken J4G and similar pro-male sites to Jezebel, something no reasonable person would do. For one thing, we don't allow derisive comments about women to be said on the site – don't take my word for it, go and do a bit of research, and see pointed comments to this effect by yours truly. We don't allow gratuitous profanity, personal attacks or referring to women wholesale in profane ways, and not only have I, but also other team members have taken down comments from offenders as recently as a week ago(!). We are not bomb throwers and we seek to bring as much light as heat – we are nothing like Jezebel, and I resent, to the depths of my being, your repeated allegations in this regard. It is the height of disrespect, Evan. I want you to stop it.

Now, having said that: yes, as Morpheus has noted in your forum, there are indeed men at J4G who are in a bad place, as a result of their dealings with women. Some have said some harsh things along these lines. Neither I, nor Morpheus, Ciaran or any of the rest of the team, denies this fact.

On the other hand, and you can contact Dr. Jeremy Nicholson about this if you don't believe me, as he would know firsthand: shortly after our second email exchange was posted at J4G, Dr. Jeremy wanted to post a comment that turned out to be too lengthy. So, we decided to run his comment-turned-article on J4G, which was based on our exchanges. The result was a near 1K(!) comments-thread, where several J4G team members, including Morpheus, had gone on the record in defending Dr. Jeremy's piece from the more cynical commenters, and admonished them to ratchet back their derision. Again, where is the Jezebel equivalent? I reject out of hand your repeated attempts toward comparison in this regard. There is none.

On top of all of this, not only have J4G readers addressed your concerns about your typical woman client, I have done the same in my response to you, originally in email form and then in article form on J4G itself. I specifically said that it is not at all unusual to see women in Black America who were older than your example having relationships and some even kids as a result.

I told you about specific cases I knew of in this regard. I cited critically acclaimed research by nationally-known scholars who have noted the same thing. And I have said that this was true in some of America's poorest and racially segregated sectors.

Finally, I offered no comment one way or another about an older woman looking for love and kids – but I'll go on record right now. I have no problem in the least with it. In fact, I do not believe that simply because a woman is older, that she is no longer worthy of getting a relationship, love, sex or kids. I never felt this way, don't now, nor do I foresee it for the future.

What I DO have a concern about, however, and here I think I can speak for many of the J4G readership, is the way many Women – not "all" but enough to make it a problem for guys like me –go about "switching lanes" in their mating choices. Many Women will, as a result of their no longer being able to appeal to more top shelf Men like you, then turn to guys like us – that's the whole point of my essay "A Blue Collar Brotha Speaks". We're not the first, or even third choice – we're their last stop on the way to spinsterhood. A lot of the older gals we're talking about, first tried their hands at landing themselves a Mr. Big, got burned badly, got rode hard and hung out wet, and now toward the end of their reproductive attractiveness, turn to us. Oh, joy.

Which brings me to another point: J4G in particular, and the Manosphere more generally, is about the only place men in our time have to be heard in their own voices. Men in our time have been either inculcated or cowed, cajoled or coerced into saying things that the Ladies Want To Hear(TM) – under threat of job firings and expulsion from polite society, as the recent Stephen A. Smith situation aptly proves.

There is a huge incentive, quite a few actually, for men of your stature to tow the party line, Evan. Sure, there are True Believers, and I think you're one of them but that fact doesn't change what I've just pointed out, either.

The Manosphere provides a vital service in giving men who are disaffected, disabused and disrespected, a place to be heard, to vent, to let their feelings out and yes, to move toward solutions and becoming whole again – and I will not let those who couldn't be bothered to give a damn about the inner lives of Men, for decades, to suddenly come riding in on their high horses and fix their mouths to "tell" us "what we ought to be doing" – Bunk. That.

As professional therapists of some decades like Dr. Tara and Dr. Helen, the former a regular contributor to A Voice For Men, the latter an author of a well-known book and regular at PJ Media have gone on record in saying, counseling services for men are, at this juncture in early 21st century life, paltry at best and downright demeaning to men at worst – as the recent suicide of the late Robin Williams(!) makes clear. We STILL treat men's mental and emotional health issues like it was a cruel joke, the bodies of men littered hither and yon, with nary a mumbling word from the Cathedral about it. Had Williams known about the Manosphere, he just might be alive today. It's hard to see how he could have been worse.

And the same can be said on the dating and relationship front. It beggars belief how so many people like you can talk about the Pickup Artist community like a dog, but none of you gave a damn about men in this regard, and still don't – the majority of dating and relationship services are geared toward women, and that's true on both sides of the Color

Line, to this day, in 2014 – fact.

No one claims perfection with the Pickup community; I certainly don't but as someone who has lived cheek by jowl with them for several years, I can say without any fear of rebuke or reprisal that they are the ONLY ones out there who not only give a damn about the mating needs of men, but who actually provide a system and network of services that actually WORK.

Meanwhile, dating coaches like you abandon men and leave them to their fates on the Freeway of Love, with nary a look back, justifying it with trite bromides about how "Men aren't interested in really understanding women" and so forth. The Pickup community has shown all of you up for the failures that you truly are, proving that millions of men worldwide do indeed care deeply about connecting with women, and have had nowhere to turn to in order to get it done.

Many of you are deeply jealous of the Pickup Community's massive success (Neil "Style" Strauss' "The Game" has been a NYT bestseller, dwarfed only by the likes of Steve Harvey's "Act Like a Lady, Think Like a Man") in an area of the Self-Help market that Forbes magazine itself has said is all but impossible to break into – and they've done it without the stamp of approval from what we in the 'sphere refers to as the Cathedral – the complex of media, academia and credentialed "experts" and talking head pundits – that you and others of your ilk are a part and parcel of.

Don't hate the Player, hate the Game, indeed.

No one is a bigger critic of the Manosphere than me, Evan, and I've got the paper trail to prove it. As one of the relatively few Black voices in that space online, I have much to say about how and where the Manosphere can and should improve.

But I can also say, that without the Manosphere, I honestly don't know where I would be. Because it's clear that I don't even exist to the likes of people like you – for all intents and purposes, you are a social, economic and sexual One Percenter. Guys like me – Black, working class and blue collar – aren't even addressed by the Cathedral, unless it's time to "examine" what is "wrong with us" this time – or when BABY BOOMER(!!) upper class Women are finally "ready" to "settle down" and turn to one of us to get'er done.

I can think of no bigger insult, no deeper dis, than this, and I blame people like you for it. The Manosphere helped me find my voice, helped me to refine it in the form of tens of thousands of comments logged in after teaching myself how to type, use the Internet and computers, and how to write, and, by popular demand of its denizens, gave me the encouragement to try my hand at blogging – something I didn't even know existed before five years ago.

It was the Manosphere who gave my thoughts, my experiences, my feelings, my inner life, the time of day, when people like you, and a whole mess of Women, couldn't be bothered or care less. It was the Manosphere who gave me the chance to be heard, in the form of being published (and soon, being heard literally, in the form of radio – stay tuned), in just about every major venue of note and record – the Spearhead, A Voice For Men, the Good Men Project (back when Tom Matlack was still actually the head of it and wasn't forced out by the Feminist Lobby's Digital Mob), and other outlets like the Urban Politico. People like you don't even recognize my existence, and when you do it's for cheap yuks and finger wagging – just ask Charles Ramsey about all of that.

So I consider my critique of the Manosphere to be far and away more valid and useful than anything you or anyone on your side of the aisle could fix your mouths to say.

As for your book, etc: I have no problem in the least with it, nor your "mission" with the ladies. In fact, I know of no one in the Manosphere, who does. The ladies have every right to avail themselves of the services you and others like you provide, and I for one wish them all the best in their search for love and happiness.

Moreover, I found your book to be very well presented and written, and yes, there is much truth within its pages. But then, I didn't need to read your book to know that you try to engage the issues with a somewhat even hand – recall my citation of your "Curvy Women" post, for example. You were candid in a way that far too many in the Cathedral are not, and for that you are to be highly commended. It is in fact, one of the reasons why I chose to contact you in the first place.

But, and this is important to point out, when you say that me and mine are not being fair or "moderate" in our presentation of ideas at J4G, that we aren't "caring enough" with regard to the ladies' side of things, I have to respond with a look of incredulity – because, it has been my experience, that one, the whole of the culture in our time is inundated with the Concerns of Women(TM) – to the point that I for one, am drowning in it.

Everywhere I turn, from the street level to TED talks online, the concerns, interests, aspirations, fears and anxieties of women, are taken seriously, discussed at nauseating length openly, and we are all exhorted to do all we can to "care" – all the while, the very same people, and yes I am saying women here, do all they can to silence me and mine – from smear campaigns at the first ever Men's Issues conference, to making up whole cloth outright lies about the supposed involvement the late spree shooter Eilliot Rodger had with the Manosphere (hint: it was a LIE), to attempts to paint the whole of the Pickup Community as a "rape academy", to firing sportscasters for having the gall to say openly what we all have been actually thinking for quite sometime (please note the roaring applause from the virtually all-female audience of "The View" when Ms. Whoopie Goldberg came out in defense of Stephen A. Smith!), to attempts to silence anyone who questions shibboleths like "street harassment" and so forth (please see my recent email exchange with Ms. Lindsey, of Cards Against Harassment, for starters) – the list goes on and on and on.

What I've found, Evan, isn't that guys on my side of the fence who are intemperate and extreme – but the other side, the ladies, and yes, their male allies, who want to silence me and mine, want to tar and feather us as deviants and want to run us out of the public square, by hook or by crook. It is them who do not want a full-throated, open debate, or even a conversation – you must buy, hook, line and sinker, what they're selling, first, or you're just a knuckle-dragging, foaming at the mouth woman-hater not worth giving the time of day to.

You say that I, and by extension, the rest of J4G and even the Manosphere itself, is "angry"; that much of what is said on J4G is "misogynistic". I defy you, Evan Marc Katz, to find me proof, that I, Obsidian, am an "angry, bitter misogynist" – quote back to me direct statements, written by my own hand, where this is the case?

Quote me directly, the smoking gun evidence – or please cease and desist with these hateful and hurtful allegations, which serve no other purpose than to deflect the focus of my and my brothers' arguments, and derail the discussion once again onto the Concerns of Women(TM), as if they haven't had enough "focus, attention and caring" lo these many years already.

Nor do I or anyone I know in the 'sphere want to see it altered or stopped in any way – we're simply fighting for our own little corner of the world. And even that is now under threat, by those who claim to be so strong and independent, who proffer notions of Yo Go Grrlism, and "I don't need no Man"ism, who are so fragile and weak that they can't even handle a differing point of view.

No, men in our time must, in the words of Bill Maher, "make women nod" in approving and understanding "empathy" – an emotionally manipulative ploy if there ever was one – where men cannot speak in their own voices without fear of excommunication from the Cathedral.

And, in closing, I think this is why fate has chosen me, of all people, to do what it is that I am doing – I am not now, nor have I ever been, a part and parcel of said Cathedral. I cannot, and will not, be silenced, because those who oppose me cannot do anything to me that hasn't already been done.

They cannot bludgeon me with shouts of "racist', because I'm Black. They can't tar and feather me with bromides of "elitistism" because I am on the bottom of the social and economic hierarchy of American life. And they can't libel me with "misogynist" because some of my staunchest defenders have been and will continue to be, women themselves – many of whom do not agree with me on a great many things, I might add.

Not only that, but pouts of "patriarchy" is an utter joke when considering the fact that I hail from the most matriarchal sector of American life – the Black community – and has been thus for many decades running at this point. The Manosphere needed a voice that is hard to shut down, Evan.

Now, they have one.

I, and J4G, have answered your questions, Evan – now it is your turn to answer mine.

What has Feminism done for the Blue Collar Brotha?

Why should he "court" in the manner of his father and grandfather, given the massive – and rapid – changes that have come down the pike in as many decades? What direct, tangible benefits accrue to him, for doing so?

This last question is hugely important, both because of your total evasion of it when I first asked you, and because of the notion of some of your readers, that for guys like me, "courting" is the "way to go" – I am here to tell you and to tell them, it is most assuredly

NOT. All that will be done is wasting money and time, with precious little to show for it – either in terms of sex or relationships.

Being "bright and decent" simply doesn't count for a lot in the Black American mating market. Go back and reread the leadoff quote by "Tyrone" from Hill Harper's book "The Conversation" (yet another NYT bestseller, and, yet another in the umpteen tomes that cater solely to women, in this case Black) in my essay, "One of The Good Guys" – the Sistas, the same ones who bemoan "where all the good Black Men have gone?", turn their noses up at him, and waste his time and money.

Yet, if Tyrone says anything about his hurt, his pain, his disappointment, he is told, both by Black society and certain parts of the White one, to "Man Up" – which really means to Shut Up. No wonder so many Black Men die early deaths, from having to hold in all their thoughts, emotions and concerns. Well, I won't be another statistic.

Since I have asked you in plain language what's in it for me, to "court" (Black) women in our time today, it's only fair to answer the question, as to what's in it for a (Black) woman to be involved with me – and unlike you, I can be much more specific in my response:

1. I am fiercely loyal and faithful – something that any Black woman in particular that's worth her salt would recognize and appreciate. Even in the Age of Obamacare, trips to the doctor for treatment of STDs can be expensive, time-consuming and emotionally embarrassing.

2. I am debt, disease, and Baby Mama Drama free – compare and contrast to so many Black women in our time. No Black woman ever went out of house and home because of me.
3. I have never raised my hand to hurt a (Black) woman, and wouldn't consider doing so either – something else that ought to be of concern to Black women, given the extremely high levels of spousal and domestic violence in our time.
4. I believe in the values of education and hard work – they just don't come in the form of high status/high visibility credentialed positions. Something Black women are especially enamoured with.

And those are just for starters. In short, I can honestly say that I bring real value into a Black woman's life, measured in dollars and cents, among other things. But can the same be said in reverse?

Since so many Sistas have either refused to answer my questions along these lines outright, or have attempted to deflect them with abstract vagaries, I bring them to you to answer. Perhaps you will have succeeded where they have failed?

You say that you need to see the glass as half full. This I can respect.

But, I also see that it is a luxury people like you can afford. As for me, I am an empiricist and a cold-eyed realist, because where I come from there is precious little room for error. I'm as romantic as they come, but Life has taught me some harsh, but needed lessons, about how the real world works – and to see it for what it is, and not what I want it to be.

As a result of our conversations, more than 3K comments have been generated from Men across the country and from all walks of life. Many were first time commenters who had been lurking since our start on Jun 13, 2013. For anyone who claims to want to counsel women on how and why men think as they do when it comes to dating, sex and relationships, one would think that this would be a treasure trove for you, Evan.

But one thing is certain for sure – our conversation, and the intense response it generated, proves once and for all, that men are deeply interested in relationships and mating – they've just never had anyone who cared to listen.

That's what J4G is all about.

Stand by Your Manhood: Peter Lloyd Interview

May 6, 2015 | by AVfM Video Source | Link | Original Link

Peter Lloyd discussed issues facing men and boys on the Australian television program Studio 10. Various topics familiar to men's rights activists are discussed.

As well as leaving a comment here we're sure Studio 10 would love to hear from men's rights activists in the video comments.

Let’s hope Jane Gilmore can follow this explanation of domestic violence

May 7, 2015 | by Jim Muldoon | Link | Original Link

In December last year, A Voice for Men published an article of mine entitled “Jane Gilmore should stop with the rubbish domestic violence games.”

At the time, Gilmore was complaining that when feminist propaganda insisted that domestic violence should be called “men’s violence against women”, men would respond with the claim that women were just as likely to be the culprit. The overall thrust of her argument is that there is a direct link between masculinity, patriarchy and violence. In other words, the typical feminist argument that masculinity is toxic.

As I pointed out in my article, the facts are that most Australian men, and by most I mean some 98% of all men, seem to manage to get through their day without punching their loved ones in the face. Not only do they manage this feat on any particular day; but they are loving husbands and fathers day in, day out, week after week, year after year.

In her latest article in Daily Life, “The ‘One in Three’ claim about male domestic violence victims is a myth.” Gilmore revisits the same topic, but tries a different angle. The result is actually illuminating on the topic of domestic violence, but not in the way she intended.

It is important, before we tackle some detail here, to remember the history of the study of domestic violence. Feminist Dogma has it that men oppress women. The main problem with this viewpoint is that it does not present itself in everyday life as experienced by everyday people.

The answer to this, for feminist academics anyway, is to declare that the violence and other forms of oppression go unreported because they are hidden by Patriarchy. Of course, we must ignore the obvious question: if we’re all doing it, then who are we hiding it from?

The most obvious place to look for evidence of violence is to check criminal statistics. However, criminal records do not show violence in anything like the numbers required to be called oppression. In response, feminist academics have sought to design studies to unearth the despicable crimes kept behind the closed doors of Patriarchy.

In Australia, the first such major study was the 1996 Women’s Safety Survey by the Australian Bureau of Statistics (ABS). This bigoted study was financed by the feminist-riddled Office for the Status of Women and the Commonwealth Department of Health and Family Services.

And yes, Men’s Safety was of no concern whatsoever. Therefore, no data on men, except as perpetrators, was recorded.

This is where the claim that one-in-three women will experience violence in their lifetime started, even though the more technically correct claim, if relying on this report, would be that 36% of Australian women will experience violence, attempted violence or the threat of violence in their lifetime. And that's if you think the study provided truly meaningful data.

As we all know, the one-in-three figure has remained constant while the definition that follows has been ramped up by feminists in their attempts to turn domestic violence into a moral panic. For example, in 2013 Julia Gillard, whilst Prime Minister of Australia, gave the official stamp of her office to the claim that one-in-three women will be raped or beaten in their lifetime.

Since 1996, the Australian government has funded two other studies, known as the Personal Safety Study 2005 and the Personal Safety Study 2012. Perhaps out of embarrassment for the myopic 1996 survey, the ABS insisted in funding a component of these studies themselves to complement the feminist fixation on the plight of modern day damsels. This funding meant that some data on violence against men (the other human beings in this country) were included.

As far as academic study of domestic violence is concerned, there has always been essentially two camps. Feminists and those who are not feminists. Of course, the second groups were soon called Anti-feminist, misogynists and Patriarchal stooges.

This summary of the beginnings of this division in domestic violence, which academics also call Intimate Partner Violence (IPV), research is explained by Doctor Mary Allen of Dublin University:

"The gender neutral view of IPV began with the work of Straus et al. (1980), Straus & Gelles (1990), Stets & Straus (1990) and Steinmetz (1977/78). Using the data from the 1975 and 1985 National Family Violence Surveys (NFVS) in the USA, Straus and his colleagues found, that while 12.1% of wives were victims of their husband's violence in the year prior to the 1975 survey, 11.6% of husbands were victims of their wives' violence. In the 1985 survey, these figures had changed to 11.3% of wives and 12.1% of husbands being victims of violence."

Dr Allen then goes on to describe the work of Michael Kimmel, DG Saunders, Michael Johnson and other feminist academics who dispute the likes of Straus, Stets et al. She confirms that the dispute remains to this day, or at least until 2011 when she wrote her paper.

Allen is correct. The dispute has raged on for all of these decades. Feminist researchers, and only feminist researchers, declare that violence is a product of Patriarchy: men are violent, women are victims, and culture is to blame. The non-feminists have maintained their studies reveal that whether they are called marriages, couples, partners, families or interpersonal relationships – most get by without beating the crap out of each other. Where there is violence, women are just as likely to be the culprits as the knuckle-dragging men. This non-feminist view is often referred to as "gender neutral" or "gender symmetry".

However, when it comes to the popular press, the feminist academics are treated as being the only authoritative voices on domestic violence. Gilmore's articles are a perfect example of this.

In response to the barrage of feminist propaganda on the matter, “a diverse group of male and female professionals – academics, researchers, social workers, psychologists, counsellors, lawyers, health promotion workers, trainers and survivor/advocates” have set up a campaign to ensure that feminism is not the only voice in the domestic violence debate in the popular media.

Mischievously perhaps, they have used figures from the Personal Safety Study 2012 (PSS) for their title of the One-In-Three Campaign, claiming that at least one in three victims of domestic violence are male.

Gilmore claims that the One-In-Three Campaign’s use of the PSS figures is “Utterly false,” for a number of reasons. The first seems to be that the One-In-Three Campaign is a “Men’s Rights Activist website”. The implication here is that there are no academics or other serious minds questioning the One True Faith. Instead we have shadowy group of neck-beards and mother’s-basement-dwellers-who-can’t-get-laid trying to disrupt an otherwise adult conversation.

The second begins with Gilmore questioning the reliance of the statistics in the PSS itself:

“At first glance, the data in Table 3 of the PSS does appear to suggest that males are 33 per cent of people who have experienced an act of violence from a current partner in the last 12 months. That number, however, is clearly marked with a warning that states: ‘Estimate has a relative standard error of 25 per cent to 50 per cent and should be used with caution.’”

Now, “should be used with caution” does not mean “never use”. It means, let me type this slowly, “use with caution”. It also means that the figure could be lower or, and again let me type this slowly, it could be higher.

But for Gilmore, of course, the warning means simply that male victims disappear in a puff of statistical inaccuracy. What gets interesting is that she then starts to question the PSS more generally. She insinuates that while that particular weakness in the PSS clearly rules male victims out, other flaws mean that the count of female victims should be much higher.

The rationale boils down to female victims of domestic violence would be unwilling to participate in the study. Given that these women would be the survey’s real targets, then surely the whole survey is effectively useless, but Gilmore doesn’t go that far. Similarly, the study doesn’t examine the level or intensity of violence:

“So someone whose partner once threatened to throw a potato at them has the same representation in that data as a person who was controlled, beaten, raped, or humiliated every day for a year.”

Here is where things get really interesting. She is correct. These differences were completely ignored by the PSS and the earlier 1996 and 2005 surveys. But, this was not Patriarchy in action. Instead, these surveys relied on the feminist promoted concept of the “continuum of violence”. By using this model, each incidence of violence, or threat of violence, regardless of how mild or vicious, is counted as one count of violence.

The ingenuousness of this strategy, of course, is that whilst heinous acts of women being "controlled, beaten, raped, or humiliated every day for a year" are incredibly rare; minor threats are a dime a dozen and beef up the total violence counts by a significant factor.

But don't take my word for it. Gilmore turns to that font of all wisdom and knowledge when it comes to the One True Feminist Word on Domestic Violence in Australia, Dr Michael Flood. She quotes him directly as saying:

"[T]he real issue here is that the PSS is limited as a tool in understanding the dynamics of domestic violence."

To back up this claim, Gilmore seems to be citing Flood's article: "He hits, she hits: Assessing debates regarding men's and women's experiences of domestic violence". It's hard to tell because the link she provides doesn't work. But, never mind, because mine does.

For an insightful look at Flood's article in more detail, I recommend Tom Golden's critique in "A Flood of DV insanity and doublespeak". But, for our purposes here, it is worth looking at Flood's treatment of the limitations of the PSS figures in particular.

Flood's article acknowledges that feminists are dropping their insistence that non-feminist research is completely wrong. Instead, Flood claims the way forward is to follow the work of Michael Johnson in redefining terms to reframe the discussion on domestic violence.

Here is Dr Allen's summary of Johnson's definitions:

"Having abandoned PT [Patriarchal Terrorism] for intimate terrorism (IT), [Johnson] adds 'violent resistance' (VR) and 'mutual violent control' (MVC) and renamed CCV as situational couple violence (SCV)".

According to Flood, Johnson's main thrust is that, in summary, instead of looking at a blanket subject called domestic violence, we should be dividing the violence into these different subsets. For reasons unknown, Flood breaks it down to just three: namely IT, VR and SCV.

According to Flood, Situational Couple Violence is, "relatively minor, both partners practise it, it is expressive (emotional) in meaning, it tends not to escalate over time, and injuries are rare." It is here we have gender symmetry, but this violence is violence in name only, and should not be of concern to academics or the authorities.

With Intimate terrorism, however, "The violence is severe, it is asymmetrical, it is instrumental in meaning, it tends to escalate, and injuries are more likely." It also features "coercive control tactics" and so fits Partriarchy theory like a glove, including Johnson's claim that it is an almost exclusively male perpetrated violence. It is here, then, Flood believes the real work needs to be done.

Violent Resistance also gets a mention. This, of course, is the female counterpart of Intimate Terrorism: she can only take so much before she snaps. Note, it is never called Vengeful Violence, even if she stabs him in his sleep.

This has implications for surveys like the PSS. Flood cites Johnson directly when he says:

“Four studies have tried to break down the violence reported in largescale [sic] surveys, with findings that 75% and up to 89% of the violence is situational couple violence.”

Again, typing slowly for the hard of thinking, this is way, way, way worse than the relative standard error Gilmore was previously holding up as Exhibit One.

Flood tries to apportion “more accurate” figures in this way: we can dismiss some three-quarters of the female victim numbers in the PSS, because they would come under the heading of SCV; however, the male figures must be cut to 10% or even 5% of the PSS figures, also because they come under SCV. There is no reason given why the male figures should be reduced more that the female numbers.

This is all, of course, if Johnson “is accurate” and whilst Flood relies on that disclaimer, he doesn’t offer an alternative if Johnson is not.

Interestingly, Dr Denise Hines and Dr Emily Douglas in their paper, “A Closer Look at Men Who Sustain Intimate Terrorism by Women offer an insight as to why Johnson might feel that men are the vast majority of offenders, and a minuscule proportion of victims, in the Intimate Terrorism category:

“Johnson argues that IT can be explained by patriarchal theory and is the sole domain of men. The primary shortcoming of Johnson’s research is that he used only shelter samples of battered women, and men mandated into batterer treatment programs, to come to this conclusion.”

Irrespective of the failings of Flood and Johnson’s theories, it’s clear that feminist academics are beginning to disown the figures they have so carefully crafted over the years. This means that the sensationalist claims of men’s violence against women being of epidemic proportions that have recently appeared in the NT News, the ABC and others, don’t have any substance to them. But that message, even after having cited Flood’s work, has clearly not sunk in for Gilmore:

“And the facts are that women and children are overwhelmingly the victims of domestic violence, and men are overwhelmingly the perpetrators of violence, both against women and against each other.”

The facts are that domestic violence, in the sense where people are actually damaged, is nowhere near as prevalent as the feminist lobby claims. Where there is violence in the home, females are equally as likely to be swinging first and asking questions later.

This moral panic surrounding domestic violence that Gilmore seems to be encouraging, which is good for funding feminist institutions, is bad for society as a whole. It is dishonest of feminists to repeatedly tell women that men, as a class, are out to get them. It is also wrong to tell men that their very essence, because of their sex, is corrupted.

As for the male victims of domestic violence, Gilmore offers this sop:

“Obviously this does not mean that we should ignore the needs of male victims. Nor does it mean that we are doing so.”

Perhaps she should have a read of Hines and Douglas’ paper, written in 2010. Their conclusions don’t stop at the fact that male victims of serious violence at the hands of women do exist:

“All of the men in this study indicated that they had sought help of some form, and a previous article using this sample showed barriers to receiving help, particularly from domestic violence hotlines, domestic violence agencies, and the police. These barriers included being turned away, ridiculed, accused of being a batterer, and arrested (Douglas & Hines, 2009). Because of the very serious nature of their victimization, it is important to educate and train front-line domestic violence workers about the existence of men victims and their needs.”

That was true in 2010, and it is clearly still true today.

The gynæcocentric theory, by Lester Ward (1903)

May 7, 2015 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

It may not come as much of a surprise to learn some men were champions of gynocentrism over the centuries, men we might refer to as white knights on account of their exaggerated chivalry. Lester F. Ward (1841 – 1913) was one such champion, promoting the idea that women were naturally superior to men in his 'Gynocentrism theory' reprinted below. In this regard, Ward presaged the promotion of difference feminism by Evolutionary Psychologists and feminist writers like Harvard's Carol Gilligan who uphold the thesis of female superiority. As an early promoter of gynocentrism theory, Ward is now considered by feminist historians such as Ann Taylor Allen to be an early feminist.[1] The following is an excerpt from his longer work entitled Pure Sociology, published in 1903. – PW

The gynæcocentric theory

The gynæcocentric theory is the view that the female sex is primary and the male secondary in the organic scheme, that originally and normally all things center, as it were, about the female, and that the male, though not necessary in carrying out the scheme, was developed under the operation of the principle of advantage to secure organic progress through the crossing of strains. The theory further claims that the apparent male superiority in the human race and in certain of the higher animals and birds is the result of specialization in extra-normal directions due to adventitious causes which have nothing to do with the general scheme, but which can be explained on biological and psychological principles; that it only applies to certain characters, and to a relatively small number of genera and families. It accounts for the prevalence of the androcentric theory by the superficial character of human knowledge of such subjects, chiefly influenced by the illusion of the near, but largely, in the case of man at least, by tradition, convention, and prejudice.

History of the Theory

As this theory is not only new but novel, and perhaps somewhat startling, it seems proper to give a brief account of its inception and history, if it can be said to have such. As the theory, so far as I have ever heard, is wholly my own, no one else having proposed or even defended it, scarcely any one accepting it, and no one certainly coveting it, it would be folly for me to pretend indifference to it. At the same time it must rest on facts that cannot be disputed, and the question of its acceptance or rejection must become one of interpreting the facts.

In the year 1888 there existed in Washington what was called the Six o'clock Club, which consisted of a dinner at a hotel followed by speeches by the members of the Club according to a programme. The Fourteenth Dinner of the Club took place on April 26, 1888, at Willard's Hotel. It was known to the managers that certain distinguished women would be in Washington on that day, and they were invited to the Club. Among these were Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Miss Phoebe Couzins, Mrs. Croly (Jennie June), Mrs. N. P. Willis, and a number of others equally well known. On their account the subject of Sex Equality was selected for discussion, and I was appointed to open the debate. Although in a humorous vein, I set forth the greater part of the principles and many of the facts of what I now call the gynæcocentric theory.

Professor C. V. Riley was present and, I think, took part in the discussion. Many of my facts were drawn from insect life, and especially interested him. I mention this because a long time afterward he brought me a newspaper clipping from the Household Companion for June, 1888, containing a brief report of my remarks copied from the St. Louis Globe, but crediting them to him; and he apologized for its appearance saying that he could not explain the mistake. The reporter had fairly seized the salient points of the theory and presented them in a manner to which I could not object. This, therefore, was the first time the theory can be said to have been stated in print. The exact date at which it appeared in the Globe I have not yet learned, but presume it was shortly after the meeting of the Club. Professor Riley did not hesitate to announce himself a convert to the theory, and we often discussed it together.

I had long been reflecting along this line, and these events only heightened my interest in the subject. The editor of the Forum had solicited an article from me, and I decided to devote it to a popular but serious presentation of the idea. The result was my article entitled, "Our Better Halves." [3] That article, therefore, constitutes the first authorized statement of the gynæcocentric theory that was published, and as a matter of fact it is almost the only one. Mr. Grant Allen answered my argument on certain points in the same magazine,[4] and I was asked to put in a rejoinder, which I did,[5] but these discussions related chiefly to certain differences between the mind of man and woman and did not deal with the question of origin. I alluded to it in my first presidential address before the Biological Society of Washington,[6] and it came up several times in writing the "Psychic Factors" (Chapters XIV, XXVI).

Such is the exceedingly brief history of the gynæcocentric theory, and if it is entirely personal to myself, this is no fault of mine. Nothing pleases me more than to see in the writings of others any intimation, however vague and obscure, that the principle has been perceived, and I have faithfully searched for such indications and noted all I have seen. The idea has not wholly escaped the human mind, but it is never presented in any systematic way. It is only occasionally shadowed forth in connection with certain specific facts that call forth some passing reflection looking in this general direction. In introducing a few of these adumbrations I omit the facts, which will be considered under the several heads into which the subject will naturally fall, and confine myself for the most part to the reflections to which they have given rise. Many of these latter, however, are of a very general character, and not based on specific facts. In fact thus far the theory has had rather the form of a prophetic idea than of a scientific hypothesis.

We may begin as far back as Condorcet, who brushed aside the conventional error that intellect and the power of abstract reasoning are the only marks of superiority and caught a glimpse of the truth that lies below them when he said: –

> If we try to compare the moral energy of women with that of men, taking into consideration the necessary effect of the inequality with which the two sexes have been treated by laws, institutions, customs, and prejudices, and fix our attention on the numerous examples that they have furnished of contempt for death and suffering, of constancy in their resolutions and their convictions, of courage and intrepidity, and of greatness of mind, we shall see that we are far from having the proof of their alleged inferiority. Only through new observations can a trite light be shed upon the question of the natural inequality of the two sexes.[7]

Comte, as all know, changed his attitude toward women after his experiences with Clotilde de Vaux, but even in his "Positive Philosophy," in which he declared them to be in a state of "perpetual infancy," and of "fundamental inferiority," be admitted that they had a "secondary superiority considered from the social point of view."[8] In his "Positive Polity" he expressed himself much more strongly, saying that the female sex "is certainly superior to ours in the most fundamental attribute of the human species, the tendency to make sociability prevail over personality."[9] He also says that "feminine supremacy becomes evident when we consider the spontaneous disposition of the affectionate sex (sexe aimant) always to further morality, the sole end of all our conceptions."[10]

Of all modern writers the one most free from the androcentric bias, so far as I am aware, is Mr. Havelock Ellis. In his excellent book "Man and Woman," be has pointed out many of the fallacies of that Weltanschauung, and without apparent leaning toward anything but the truth has placed woman in a far more favorable light than it is customary to view her. While usually confining himself to the facts, he occasionally indicates that their deeper meaning has not escaped him. Thus he says: "The female is the mother of the new generation, and has a closer and more permanent connection with the care of the young; she is thus of greater importance than the male from Nature's point of view" (pp. 383-384). To him is also due, the complete refutation of the "arrested development" theory, above mentioned, by showing that the child, and the young generally, represent the most advanced type of development, while the adult male represents a reversion to an inferior early type, and this in man is a more bestial type.

In the sayings quoted thus far we have little more than opinions, or general philosophical tenets, of which it would be much easier to find passages with the opposite import. In fact statements of the androcentric theory are to be met with everywhere. Not only do philosophers and popular writers never tire of repeating its main propositions, but anthropologists and biologists will go out of their way to defend it while at the same time heaping up facts that really contradict it and strongly support the gynæcocentric theory. This is due entirely to the power of a predominant world view (Weltanschauung). The androcentric theory is such a world view that is deeply stamped upon the popular mind, and the history of human thought has demonstrated many times that scarcely any number of facts opposed to such a world view can shake it. It amounts to a social structure and has the attribute of stability in common with other social structures. Only occasionally will a thinking investigator pause to consider the true import of the facts he is himself bringing to light.

Bachofen, McLennan, Morgan, and the other ethnologists who have contributed to our knowledge of the remarkable institution or historic phase called the matriarchate, all stop short of stating the full significance of these phenomena, and the facts of amazonism that are so often referred to as so many singular anomalies and reversals of the natural order of things, are never looked at philosophically as residual facts that must be explained even if they overthrow many current beliefs. Occasionally some one will take such facts seriously and dare to intimate a doubt as to the prevailing theory. Thus I find in Ratzenhofer's work the following remark: –

> It is probable that in the horde there existed a certain individual equality between man and woman; the results of our investigation leave it doubtful whether the man always had a superior position. There is much to indicate that the woman was the uniting element in the community; the mode of development of reproduction in the animal world and the latest investigations into the natural differences between man and woman give rise to the assumption that the woman of to-day is the atavistic product of the race, while the man varies more frequently and more widely. This view agrees perfectly with the nature of the social process, for in the horde, as the social form out of which the human race has developed, there existed an individual equality which has only been removed by social disturbances which chiefly concern the man.
> All the secondary sexual differences in men are undoubtedly explained by the struggle for existence and the position of man in the community as conditioned thereby. Even the security of the horde from predatory animals, and still more the necessity of fighting with other men for the preservation of the group, developed individual superiority in general, both mental and physical, and especially in man. But any individual superiority disturbed the equality existing in the elements of the horde; woman from her sexual nature took only a passive part in these disturbances. The sexual life as well as the mode of subsistence no longer has its former peaceful character. Disturbances due to the demands of superior individuals thrive up to a certain point, beyond which the differentiation of the group into several takes place.[11]

Among biologists the philosophical significance of residual facts opposed to current beliefs is still less frequently reflected upon. I have stated that Professor Riley fully accepted the view that I set forth and admitted that the facts of entomology sustained it, yet, although somewhat of a philosopher himself, and living in the midst of the facts, the idea had not previously occurred to him. Among botanists, Professor Mechan was the only one in whose writings I have found an adumbration of the gynæcocentric theory. He several times called attention to a certain form of female superiority in plants. In describing certain peculiarities in the Early Meadow Rue and comparing the development of the male and female flowers he observed differences due to sex. After describing the female flowers he says: –

> By turning to the male flowers (Fig. 2) we see a much greater number of bracts or small leaves scattered through the panicle, and find the pedicels longer than in the female; and this shows a much slighter effort – a less expenditure of force – to be required in forming male than female flowers. A male flower, as we see clearly here, is an intermediate stage between a perfect leaf and a perfect, or we may say, a female flower. It seems as if there might be as much truth as poetry in the expression of Burns, –
> Her 'prentice han' she tried on man,
> An' then she made the lasses, O,
> — at least in so far as the flowers are concerned, and in the sense of a higher effort of vital power.[12]

It is singular, but suggestive that he should have quoted the lines from Burns in this connection, as they are an undoubted echo of the androcentric world view, a mere variation upon the Biblical myth of the rib. Of course he could find nothing on his side in the classic literature of the world, but wishing to embellish the idea in a popular work, he tried to make these somewhat ambiguous lines do duty in this capacity. The fact cited is only one of thousands that stand out clearly before the botanist, but not according with the accepted view of the relations of the sexes they are brushed aside as worthless anomalies and "exceptions that prove the rule." In fact in all branches of biology the progress of truth has been greatly impeded by this spirit.

All modern anatomists know how the facts that are now regarded as demonstrating the horizontal position of the ancestors of man, and in general those that establish the doctrine of evolution, were treated by the older students of the human body – rejected, ignored, and disliked, as intruders that interfered with their investigations. It is exactly so now with gynæcocentric facts, and we are probably in about the same position and stage with reference to the questions of sex as were the men of the eighteenth century with reference to the question of evolution. Indeed, the androcentric theory may be profitably compared with the geocentric theory, and the gynæcocentric with the heliocentric. The advancement of truth has always been in the direction of supplanting the superficial and apparent by the fundamental and real, and the gynæcocentric truth may be classed among the "paradoxes of nature."[13]

I want the world to know I have said this, and I mean it: the Southern Poverty Law Center is a multimillion $$ fraud organization that makes its money by spreading fear and hate and ignorance – mostly in the form of slanted half-truths- about innocent people who can't fight back.

The Southern Poverty Law Center steals, by deception, from well-meaning donors and from U.S. taxpayers to spread the kind of hatred that leads to intolerance and violence. This is in part because people like David Pakman are so fucking gullible, they think that if these snakes in Dockers say they're progressive, they're actually living the values they claim to stand for.

Yes, David, SPLC has been directly tied to inspiring intolerance and murder, by spreading hate, instigating spin and slander indiscriminately against anyone who might deviate somewhat from mainstream opinion (or just opinions not liked by the elites who rule us).

And David Pakman is giving this obscene group of wealthy millionaires (millionaires who got there on the backs of the poor and working classes), these corporate masters he claims to oppose, a free pass as he throws softball questions and gives them the mic.

David, you are better than this, I suspect. But the fact is you gave a reactionary fatcat whose organization has helped incite murder a free pass to smear human rights activists — even while one of those grassroots human rights activists has just completed a walk across Ontario to the Provincial Government House in Toronto, where he is as I write this conducting a hunger strike, asking for simple basic human rights that nobody, male or female, should ever be denied.

But you couldn't talk to him or any of us, before letting this fatcat weasel in Birkenstocks shit all over him and the rest of us.

Basic human rights, David. Do you get that? Basic human rights. That's what your group of wealthy cronies at the SPLC are all about attacking and stopping: the march of human progress, and treating all people as if they are flawed but valuable human beings, regardless of race or sex or orientation.

And you're helping these hate-inciting fatcats smear those working for those values, you brave young man, without having the guts to talk to us or ask us any questions let alone invite us on your show to ask him any genuinely challenging questions. Not even questions about his contemptible terrorist-inspiring organization — I expect that would be too much for you — but whether this bullshit he's feeding you about us really paints an accurate picture.

Pakman has not so much as approached us to comment before allowing the odious hate group known as the SPLC bash the innocent men and women of the Men's Human Rights Movement, who are incredibly easy to find and talk to (me and Paul can be reached right here).

But let's watch Pakman as he lets this rich fatcat tool of the corporate establishment attack us:

I want to repeat something so it's not possible to miss it: David Pakman, who supposedly is against corporate interests polluting the media, is sucking up to and unquestioningly accepting what a fatcat corporate bigot who just happens to dress a little like an old hippie says. Are you that easily fooled, Mr. Pakman?

And for you fat, wealthy, elitist, reactionary, pompous, self-serving liars at the SPLC (and yes Mr. Potok, I'm talking to you, you sociopathic, reactionary bigot): you are directly implicated in getting right-wingers murdered in this country. Which means you now have a body count sir, and that is something that, despite all your hateful bigoted lies and distortions, is something the Men's Human Rights movement to date does not have. We've never been implicated in anyone's murder, or even anyone's assault, not by any rational standard–unlike you.

You and everybody who has given money to or supported the SPLC in the last few years most certainly has helped incite terror and murder.

And you lie about human rights activists, even as they put their lives on the line.

Do you ever wake up and ask yourself if you're on the wrong side, David? I suspect you do.

Here's a hint: you are.

British general election – J4MB results and reflections

May 8, 2015 | by Mike Buchanan | Link | Original Link

Yesterday (7 May) the United Kingdom held a general election. Every poll in the final weeks led to confident predictions that the country would again be run by a coalition. The polls were wrong. A Conservative government with a small majority was elected, in large part due to the collapse of the Labour vote in Scotland, where the Scottish Nationalist Party – led by a radical feminist, Nicola Sturgeon – secured 56 of the 59 seats. The leaders of Labour, Liberal Democrats, and United Kingdom Independence Party (UKIP) have resigned.

Around 05:30 today, the results were declared in the two seats where Ray Barry and I were standing. I secured 153 votes, Ray 63, and I'd like to thank the good people who voted for us.

While more votes would have been welcome, we achieved what we set out to achieve, which was to use the democratic process to break the conspiracy of silence about men's and boys' human rights, and show up the hypocrisy and blatant gynocentrism of the mainstream political parties. This was perfectly illustrated in the acceptance speech of the re-elected Labour MP, Gloria de Piero – she was selected from an all-women shortlist, and was the Shadow Minister for Women and Equalities – who said:

> Whether you voted for me, or Helen, or Philip, or Simon, I promise to represent you all, and work tirelessly for you all.

The three individuals Ms De Piero cited were respectively the Conservative, Liberal Democrat, and UKIP candidates. So it's only men in Ashfield for whom she won't work tirelessly over the next five years. In recent months she won two of our 'Lying Feminist of the Month' awards.

On the bright side, at least she isn't the new (government's) Minister for Women and Equalities, and Labour's efforts to present themselves as a party for only half the population has clearly backfired on them. Ed Miliband (Labour party leader) has suffered a crushing defeat and resigned, Harriet Harman has announced her resignation as deputy leader, save only for being a caretaker leader pending the party finding someone else to lead it, and I don't think we'll be seeing much more of her. She is a spent force, as is her feminist ideology.

Nick Clegg (leader, Liberal Democrats) has gone from the mainstream political scene, his brief flirtation with power over, and many of his feminist sympathizing fellow Lib Dems are now without a seat at all. Most notable amongst these is Vince Cable, that white knight proponent of positive discrimination whose efforts to get more women onto the corporate gravy train of unearned seats on the boards of our major companies was contemptible.

David H pointed out that J4MB has only one fewer MP than UKIP, a party which has been around for 20 years, and which secured almost 5 million votes yesterday, yet secured only one MP (the 'first past the post' system is highly disadvantageous to small parties).

While we hoped (and expected) to secure a higher number of votes, we must recall this was our first general election, fought with very limited funds. At least we were able to present a picture of the state's widespread assaults on the human rights of men and boys to the electorate, getting the state to pay for the delivery of 95,000 leaflets bearing J4MB's message, and we achieved the most astonishing breakthrough into the mainstream media which could never have happened other than by us standing for election. J4MB is fighting a just cause, and at this stage justice cannot be measured by popularity in terms of voting numbers.

It's difficult to know what impact, if any, the mainstream media had on our results. On the one hand, national newspapers and magazines have either not mentioned us, or have been critical without – significantly – challenging the analyses or policies in our manifesto. That said, the comment streams in articles by the Telegraph, Independent, Mail, Express, and even the Guardian and Observer, have been highly supportive of J4MB, and many thousands of people have been led to our website after reading these articles. That must have caused the biased hacks to reassess their approach and thinking.

The behaviour of the BBC with respect to our standing in two seats near Nottingham was scandalous and we know they received many formal complaints, and emails were sent to their senior executives. As far as BBC television is concerned, the Sunday Politics show broadcast not long before the election consisted only of an interview of me by a young radical feminist. An interview of Ray Barry didn't appear on the show.

BBC Radio Nottingham didn't invite Ray to the Broxtowe hustings, and for the Ashfield hustings the BBC vetted an all-female audience, who asked questions mainly about women's issues. There wasn't a single question about men's issues in the hour-long programme, broadcast live. The presenter was a young Guardian-reading feminist, and I was placed on the panel between the two female candidates. The most insightful article about the fiasco was published by Breitbart.

A prime objective from standing in this election was to raise the public awareness of J4MB, and thereby the assaults on the human rights of men and boys. We've had an enormous increase in our blog hits today, the hit rate surpassing even that of yesterday. Hundreds of people have downloaded the manifesto, and we've secured a number of new party members. (I invite you to join them, and thereby help us fund the deposits of 50+ candidates in 2020. You can find details of party membership here. You can make single donations or set up monthly donations through PayPal, here.)

We'll be taking some time to review why all the positive engagement we had with the voters on the streets and on the doorsteps of Ashfield and Broxtowe didn't translate into higher vote numbers, but when you consider the earthquake of a Tory overall majority when all the media pundits were already carving up the power in a supposed hung parliament, it seems clear that people used their valuable vote to see off a far bigger perceived threat from the coalition of the left that was threatening to take the country back to the dark days of class division of the 1970s.

We believe there is another class division afoot now in Britain, against innocent men, and you can be assured we shall be carrying on, constantly reviewing our strategy, adapting and seeking every way we can to keep men's and boys' issues to the fore. Public awareness of our cause is increasing steadily, and by the next general election in 2020 we will ensure it is much higher. Our determination to secure justice for men and boys (and the women who love them) is stronger than ever.

I'd like to thank all the people who've supported us from the outset. People have helped with manifesto development, donations, provided support of various kinds, donated goods and services, and tramped the streets in recent weeks, delivering 30,000 leaflets door-to-door. I look forward to the coming years with optimism and enthusiasm, and to a successful 2020 general election. In the shorter term, I look forward to ICMI15.

Woman who consented to sex claims she was ‘raped by rape culture’

If you want to see how inane the public discourse about college rape has become, look no further than the student newspaper of Claremont McKenna College, The Forum. A woman college student recounts an incident where she found herself in a man’s dorm room after a party. He asked, “is this ok?” — meaning, was she okay with having sex. She admits that she said “yes” and that there wasn’t any coercion or imminent threat of violence, and “not a lot” of inebriation.

But now she says she secretly didn’t want to have sex, even though the young man would have no way of knowing that, so she declares in the student newspaper that she was — wait for it — “raped by rape culture.”

> Inspired by the recent performance of The Vagina Monologues at CMC, this piece is part of a series of Forum articles by women at CMC about women and sexuality. Check out the first piece in the series here. If you’re interested in contributing an article on these topics, contact us at thecmcforum@gmail.com. – from the introduction to the article “Why Yes Can Mean No.“

You read that right: “raped by rape culture.” It’s a term coined by the young woman and her friends to describe the purported experience where a woman’s agreement to have sex is “coerced by the culture that had raised us and the systems of power that worked on us . . . .”

If you think that makes no sense, just wait, she’s not finished. “Consent is a privilege, and it was built for wealthy, heterosexual, cis, white, western, able-bodied masculinity,” she posits.

Can it get any loopier? Keep reading.

What forced this poor soul to say “yes” when she secretly meant “no”? Among other things, she explains that “there was obligation from already having gone back to someone’s room, not wanting to ruin a good friendship, loneliness, worry that no one else would ever be interested . . . an understanding that hookups are ‘supposed’ to be fun.”

Get it? It is the fault of evil white straight men that she had sex because she’s lonely, didn’t want to ruin a friendship, has low self-esteem, and/or believed that hook-ups are supposed to be fun.

In days long gone, when rationality, literacy, and logic were still valued even a little, this sort of writing would be called exactly what it is–idiotic. But on our modern, vaunted American college campuses, it’s “well-written and so important,” “beautiful,” and “so perfect," as several comments put it.

Actually, a couple of comments beneath the article did nail it. One guy wrote: "There's a fella out there for you: Mongo the Mind-Reader." Another reader explained: "Modern feminism has taught generations of young women (and young men) that . . . women should 'embrace' their sexuality and have casual sex with as many partners as they like, without any consequences. . . . . Who taught you to say yes? It wasn't some wealthy, heterosexual, cis, white, western, able-bodied boogeyman. It was the very movement you now align yourself with who 'coerced' you into believing that 'hookups are supposed to be fun.'"

And those responses are far more than this piece of idiocy deserves.

If feminists wonder why their movement isn't widely embraced in middle America and why so few people (including so few women) identify as "feminists," they need look no further than extreme silliness like this. Add it to the misandry hall of fame.

Shootout At The O-Z Corral

May 8, 2015 | by Mumia Ali | Link | Original Link

"I'll be your huckleberry; that's just my game."
-Val Kilmer/Doc Holliday, "Tombstone"

By now, you've all heard: RooshV, who wrote a decidely less than flattering (and, by all accounts, fairly accurate) post about famed surgeon-turned-daytime talkshow host Dr. Mehmet Oz, appeared on the latter's show late last month. The topic was something that Roosh has admittedly been putting a sustained focus on: "fat-shaming". Readers of Roosh's personal website and his men's issues daily Return of Kings, will know well his "Fat-Shaming Week", where he and other writers for ROK make the case that bringing back some good ole fashioned shame and embarrassment to the ladies will provide the needed motivation for them to slim down. Dr. Oz, right out the gate, was unrelenting in his argument, that not only was "fat-shaming" ineffective, but that men like Roosh are stompdown bullies and meanines, completely lacking in empathy – and to that end trotted out a troika of larger ladies to tell Roosh about himself.

But wait, I thought shaming folk doesn't work?

Anyway, there's a lot of reaction to Roosh's appearance on the good doctor's show and as to be expected when such a polarizing figure is involved in anything, there can and will be lovers and haters on both sides. Some say that he did a yeoman's job against insurmountable odds and an implaccable foe; others cackle in their self-assuredness that Roosh is an A-1 loser. For his part, Roosh himself seems to be a bit letdown by it all, though from what I can tell and by his own admission, his appearance on one of the most popular daytime chat shows in America has been good for business. Last time I checked, Roosh's YouTube recap of the Dr. Oz Experience got upwards of 14K views and according to him both his social media and websites have seen massively increased activity in the days immediately following the show. Which only confirms the veracity of the old Marketing 101 adage, that any press is good press.

Three Powerful Points

For those on the inside of the Manosphere tent lamenting Roosh not being able to utterly dismantle and/or humiliate Dr. Oz, I think they ask for too much; after all, this is straight-up Blue Pill Theatre we're talking about here, performance art designed to placate the lady viewers and supporters of the program, not a forum in which to shed light on critical issues of our time, especially any that might pertain to straight men. Besides, do we really expect Dr. Oz to be allowed to be pwned on his own show? That's like Roosh allowing haters to trash his website. No, what happened last week was exactly the way it was supposed to happen, with Roosh remaining calm and poised, putting in a point here and there, and with Oz and his audience making fools of themselves.

Let me explain a few ways:

1. As noted above, Dr. Oz resorts to shaming the guest (Roosh) over his opinion; he lectures Roosh, sheaf of papers in hand (for added dramatic effect, of course – performance art, I tell you!), that "fat-shaming doesn't work". Roosh's excellent counter, which to my mind was the highlight of the entire show, was to inform the good doctor of the fact that obesity rates continue to rise, not just in the States but worldwide, and is proof that his and the entire medical field's methods of dealing with the problem has not worked either; something has to be done, and until something better comes along, a bit of good ole fashioned shame and embarrassment just might do the trick. If Dr. Oz truly believed what he was selling, he would not have attempted to shame Roosh directly and indirectly via his three Big Lady Panel. Oh, and nevermind the fact that it doesn't take a huge fan of Oz's show to know that he focuses, almost exclusively, on WEIGHT LOSS programs of varying stripe, ALL GEARED TOWARD WOMEN. Oz and Roosh are a lot more on the same page than he wants to openly admit, and only on a show geared toward placating the Rationalization Hamster, could such a glaring fact be so flagrantly omitted.

2. Dr. Oz was utterly unprofessional: he is NOT a trained psychoanalyst or psychotherapist (and even if he was, it would still be deeply unethical to "armchair analyze" someone without their express consent on a daytime television show), yet there he was, doing exactly this in calling Roosh a "sociopath" (which is a term that has risen to the same level as "misogynist" in our time and which means simply that, "I don't agree with you"), saying at one point that he would like to examine Roosh's brain because "clearly" he lacks empathy (as if being empathetic to a grossly obese woman somehow removes the health risks or the fact that a lot of men aren't sexually attracted to that) and continually taking mental health digs at Roosh. No wonder his peerage at Columbia want him removed from their midst. At another point in the show, when Roosh confronted him with some more facts about the obesity problem and Oz's own efforts to combat it, Oz goes into a flowery diatribe about how he sees "the whole person" and so forth. Fair enough – but if I were a betting man I would wager a princely sum that the very ladies to which he caters to, do NOT "see the whole person" when it comes to the men they are most interested SEXUALLY in – a fact that has been borne out recently by Rollo Tomassi, and backed up by such scholarly works as A Billion Wicked Thoughts.

3. The Big Ladies on the panel told on themselves: as the Roissy of old has rightly noted, the more the ladies shriek in dismay by something you've said, the more likely that what you've said is indeed accurate. These ladies' "outrage" is in fact their shock, dismay and yes embarrassment, that a man would actually tell them to their faces that their large frames are not attractive to him, nor to the bulk and mass of men everywhere. Their response – I was particularly amused by the Black woman doing the famed "neckroll" – was steeped in butthurt, not informed discourse. What could they say, after all? Nothing Roosh said factually, was inaccurate. So all they could do was respond with how "offended" and "hurt" they were, by what he was saying. Yawn.

What's Really Eating The Grande Dames

Of course, what's really at issue here isn't "shaming". If it was, women wouldn't shame short men – head on over to Support For The Short for a mind-numbingly long list of the ways in which women, including fat ones, ruthlessly shame, belittle and attack short men for being, well, short men; has Dr. Oz done even ONE show on this topic? To ask the question, is to answer it. The show was not even pointing out the very real and unassailable increased health risks associated with obesity, but the fact that it is not OK for straight men to openly state their physical desires/tastes/standards in women, and to openly disagree with those women who fail to measure up. Again, as Tomassi has pointed out, and he is by no means alone, men in our time are not to have or express, any desires that run counter to womens' "dumbing down" of physical standards; indeed, women are not to have ANY physical standards they must meet when it comes to men, that only men must do so, and that all that women need do is show up with vaginas. The very fact that Roosh is representative of a growing chorus of men, online and off, who run counter to this, is deeply vexing to women in our time, and will greatly welcome (and need!) other men who quite literally White Knight for them in fending off the truth.

No Country For Nice Guys

As many of you know, I work with both Roosh and another very polarizing figure, Paul Elam, editor-in-chief for A Voice For Men; indeed, I think it's fair to say, that together they are the two most controversial lightening rods in all of the Manosphere. Around the same time that I conducted what I consider to be both a groundbreaking and historic two-part, in-depth interview with Roosh, several major hit-pieces appeared in the Cathedral Media about the Manosphere in general and AVfM/Elam in particular. Much of the faux handwringing centered on the "tone" of Elam and the larger Manosphere; arguments were made that if a softer one were adopted, our side might get more traction. Elam's excellent counter was to note that it is the exact opposite, that is in fact the truth.

Citing Dr. Warren Farrell as proof, Elam noted that for all of Farrell's congenial, easygoing ways, focus on the facts and trying to be a good faith actor in the ongoing gender wars, he was all but forgotten after his departure from the National Organization for Women in the 1970s, for daring to suggest that men had issues to advocate for, too. Elam went on to say that it was because of his garrelous, knock-over-the-table-to-get-to-other-side-of-the-room nature, that not only got attention for the men's rights movement, but it in many ways, literally resurrected Farrell's career and profile. Whether you like or agree with Elam or his methods, you simply cannot deny that he has a powerful point. Being "nice" simply does not work.

And Roosh's appearance on the Dr. Oz show last week, bears this fact out.

It is completely fair to disagree with Elam's or Roosh's methods; for what it's worth, I don't always agree with them and indeed find some of them shocking. But what cannot be denied is that their methods work – and in the end, it's hard to argue with success. They are in fact getting the Manosphere message(s) out. It is sometimes necessary to shock the system in order to bring attention to issues that would go completely ignored otherwise. Like it or not, Roosh and Elam are doing precisely that.

Unlike many in the Manosphere, I see Roosh's recent appearance on Dr. Oz's show as nothing but a win with a capital "W", both for him personally, and for the wider Manosphere more generally; the fact that so many people have headed on over to Roosh's Facebook, Twitter, YouTube and websites, even – especially – to register their "comments of hate" – only proves that the Manosphere message is indeed spreading. I don't know for certain, but if my own small experience is anything to go by, I'm pretty sure that Roosh gets quite a few messages a week from men around the globe thanking him for doing what he does. In many ways, Roosh, like Elam, Tomassi and yes myself, are literally saving lives.

The lives of men. And in this case, quite a few women, too.

A Final Point

For those out there who want to take potshots at Roosh – or Mr. Elam, for that matter – let me tell you something:

Both of these men are, by any measure, success stories – modern day Horatio Algers, who saw opportunities in life and took them. They took calculated risks, scuffed their knees, picked themselves up and kept right on getting on up. Both of them have forged formidable websites and movements from humble beginnings, to the point where they are both global in scope and where now even Cathedral Media behemoths like Dr. Oz can no longer ignore them. The Manosphere truly has its own media arms now; we do not need the MSM, they need us. For his part, Roosh is literally a world traveler, successful self-published author many times over, is not only self-employed but employs others by running three highly successful websites and starting next month will be embarking on a lecture tour (I hope to catch up with him stateside soon). Dr. Oz, by comparison, got where he is as a direct result of a woman – Oprah – and by pandering to the worst of womenfolk in general. Roosh can both be rightly said to be a self-made man.

I'm just sayin'.

I see my life in terms of music

May 8, 2015 | by Isaac T. Quill | Link | Original Link

There are many things said of music, and one that most people can trill off their tongues is "Music has charms to soothe a savage breast.". It's that, or they go all Shakespeare and "If music be the food of love, play on…".

As I have a soft spot for that sentimental numb-nuts called Albert Einstein, my favourite quote is "If I were not a physicist, I would probably be a musician. I often think in music. I live my daydreams in music. I see my life in terms of music.". For me that is how music fits in my life.

Music is now so readily accessible and everyday that we fail to even notice when it's there in our ears. I'm old enough and decrepit enough to remember when music was made "live", or you bought these disks made of "vinyl" and "The Mamas & The Papas" were top of "The Hit Parade". People did not use acronyms as nouns, and CD, DVD, and MP3 just didn't exist. I remember my first set of (Shock Horror) "Stereo Headphones", which sat outside of my cranium and not inside my ears. They weighed approximately 3 pounds.

One thing that has been known for centuries, if not millennia, is that music and sound affects the human mood. From drums beaten to stir the blood pre battle, to Henry The Eighth (of the naughty Tudors) strumming his Lute and crooning out Green Sleeves. Today we have Blue-tooth enabled handsets linked to Spotify setting the mood with someone else's playlist for foreplay. When you look at the history of music, so much of the greatest music has been linked with religion. It seems that Hatching, Matching and Dispatching (Birth, Marriage & Death) needs music for extra value, and binds us emotionally to views and social practices.

With social networking, music and musical tastes can be shared and dropped at light speed. You can "friend" a rising star and end up hating them in a matter of hours. With digital music services like Amazon, you don't even have to buy a whole album. You just pick and mix like a child in a candy shop. With so much networking and ability to share and compare, one thing people tend not to do these days is talk about music. They listen in isolation and don't share. They just consume music. With the arrival of portable music, people now graze as they do other things. Gone are the days of portable music being limited to battery-powered transistor radios the size of a medium-sized child. I carry gigabytes of my chosen euphoria in a pocket-sized package.

Study upon study shows that music affects our moods, health and even our sex lives. I'm also old enough to remember the mass unexpected sales of Ravel's Boléro. It featured in the film "10", with Bo Derek and Dudley Moore. It's funny how a pair of Boobs and some good comedy can make classical music sexy. Roll over Beethoven.

Many who work with our ageing populations, created by modern medicine, known only too well that with the onset of Dementia and Alzheimer's one of the last things the person looses is their memory of music and their ability to even sing. Music helps keep our memories intact. Music keeps our minds functioning. Music even keeps us learning. And yet, from a biological point of view, music makes little sense. Sex is biological and is about reproduction and survival of the species. Food linked to hunting, gathering, eating and even social activity makes sense, but music is peculiarly human and seems to serve no use in human survival. Some postulate that music is an extension of language and how we as humans use tone of voice to communicate. Couple that with how beats can mesmerize and even create altered states and you have mystical experiences and even the roots of religion? What ever the reason that Music has evolved, in all human societies Music Moves us.

Science is fighting to unlock the mysteries of music, and they have found that the "nucleus accumbens" gets turned on by some nice beats. It's part of the brain that is linked to the cognitive processing of motivation, pleasure, reward and reinforcement learning. When you have sex it dumps dopamine into your brain. The same with food and with music. Science keeps finding that this music trigger only exists in humans, so whilst some may claim to have a Donkey that dances to Brahms, it's wishful thinking on their part. It's just proof that they have trained the poor animal in inhuman ways with a cattle prod.

Music also activates the amygdala, the most ancient part of the brain. The amygdala is intimately linked with instinct and memory. It's also one of the most significant parts of the brain linked with PTSD, where it develops a hair-trigger for flight and fight. Many wonder how Flashbacks and Re-Experiencing are possible. The amygdala goes into overdrive and triggers memories to motivate you to fight or flee. Your brain keeps on demanding that you are in an environment that is dangerous. It keeps on going trying to motivate you to act and save yourself, even though there is no danger. When you don't react, because in reality you are safe and in a safe place, your brain starts throwing memories at you to motivate you to flee. The more damage from the PTSD the more your own brain hits you with the wrong memories for what it is programmed to believe is the right reason. Many with PTSD have found that they can help control their symptoms and better manage the flashbacks and trauma with the right music. The music can in fact soothe the savage beast that has become your own brain.

Many years ago I spent a great deal of time with an old friend (David) who had quite an amazing international career in music. As a guitarist he was in great demand for sessions, as well as being the lead man in the bands for a number of household names. He was a genius and could play a guitar in any musical style, and literally mimic any known player. Imagine, if you can, Jimmy Hendrix playing Zip-a-Dee-Doo-Dah. One thing that many did not know was that David suffered from life long crippling clinical depression, and with it many suicide attempts. When playing he was in heaven and 100% happy, but he could literally walk off the stage with applause ringing, and within seconds try to take his own life. He described it as having holes in his feet. When he was immersed in music he filled up with joy and happiness, but as soon as he was no longer immersed, all that happiness and joy just drained from his body through those holes. His legs were like down pipes and he could feel the happiness just running away. In his sixties, David finally found peace under the care of a brilliant psychiatrist who finally found a drug combination that stitched those holes up. For the first time since David was 19 he could immerse himself in Music and the joy stayed with him. In fact, he could immerse himself in life and the joy stayed.

David taught me a great deal about depression, suicide and people's ignorance. I once met David as he was leaving a depression support group. He introduced me to his fellow sufferers and travellers. It was so interesting. They all said the same thing. Depression did not rob them of the ability to feel joy or happiness, it was holding onto that joy, those feelings, that was the problem. When they met up they all had great fun talking and sharing experiences, many very comical. And yet as they walked away, they could all feel that joy ebbing and the tide going out. The feelings of emptiness and numbness left behind needed massive explosions of emotion to try to fill the void. Yet, as soon as the emotion explosion had refilled them, there it was draining away into emptiness. So many had found music that helped to manage the void and the emptiness. One lady told me how music acted as a break-water, reducing the waves in her life and controlling the speed that her tide went out.

Whilst many on the outside believed that theses depressives used "Jolly Tunes to Pep Themselves Up", the reality was quiet different. They used music that acknowledged their own pain and allowed them to give themselves permission to be a Functioning Depressive, just doing the best they could, holding on! They had tunes and music that acted as their lifeline when the abyss beckoned. Often the music gave them permission to just be, and to hell with rest. When you are robbed of joy and feeling emotions, even great sadness, inspired by music, can be a relief from the numbness. It proves to you that you are still human and capable of feelings.

I make no secret that I'm disabled, but many don't know that one aspect is I live in untreatable physical pain 24/7. It's a bitch and it's my bitch, so keep you faux sympathy off my grass. It's just a minor part of what makes up me, and I hate it when folks start to strong-arm into the subject with bad advice, want to be part of my life (for their own agendas) and gush with false friendship and hijacking. Ask anyone who lives with chronic pain and they will tell you all about the loss, suffering, the risk and realities of suicide and just how much effort it takes to parent yourself with a raging, fire breathing dragon on your back. And it just won't take no for an answer. Honestly, most days I'd rather have an infant, incontinent version of RadFem Cathy Brennan in diapers, on a sugar rush with a quart of Red Bull added. That would be easy!

Sleep can be elusive when you have to deal with chronic pain, and many nights myself and David sat together, generations apart, talking and not talking, just listening to music and seeing how it felt. David showed me how to use music to live – to hold on and more – how to live life when all others just can't grasp what it's like to be you. In so many ways I've had to carve out a new life for myself, and to a great part, I've done that with music.

There is music from my past which I still love and yet can't listen to. One thing I can't handle is Christmas Carols which hark back to other times. Memories and more just make that too risky. I've had to look far and wide for new music with which to sculpt and refine my new life, and find tunes to hang onto when needed. Occasionally I find a new version of a Carol that is able to vault over that divide, and as such I have to thank Dean Esmay for an inconsequential tweet that brought me this amazing music and returned some happy memories to me.

It even reminded me of a Chris de Burgh song that I used to love, which also features a Christmas Carol out of time, but in just the right place.

I've looked for Dean's tweet, but it's long gone, lost in the mire of electronic noise. But, it is a memory and a moment of joy that I still know many months later. Call me a big softy, a Big Girl's Blouse or any other epithet you may wish, but here and now in May 2015, I'm writing this listening to a Christmas Carol and have a tear in my eye!

Thanks Dean!

Your inconsequential tweet of kindness, sent out to so many, has inspired more than you realise.

EAOE – my fingers and eyes are buggered, so if you want to bitch over typos, please tweet them to @IDontGiveAFlyingF or @RetentiveAnus

Romanian president wants to be the Nice Guy™ – and he fails

May 9, 2015 | by Lucian Vâlsan | Link | Original Link

Note: This article first appeared on AVFM Romania.

Did you know that May 8th was the "Equality of opportunity between women and men Day"? The Romanian president, Klaus Iohannis, was very preoccupied on Friday to announce this aspect. Moreover, he was very delighted to let us know about the moment when he signed into law the establishment of this holiday, as if this was his merit, not his constitutional obligation.

Translation: Respect for those around us is a virtue, and gender equality must become a reality in modern times. In March, I signed into law the act that declares May 8 as the Equality of opportunity between men and women Day, and today I am joining the international campaign #HeForShe, as a sign of support for women's rights worldwide. Seizing on this opportunity, the President also announced us that he joins the latest feminist ideological fashion of the UN – namely the international campaign #HeForShe.

It is true that in Romania the president has more prerogatives than in Hungary or Germany but it is also true that the president has fewer prerogatives than in presidential republics such as the USA or Belarus.

In other words, such ideological commitments would preferable to reside at the bottom of the presidential agenda (if they are to reside at all) lagging behind some far more important aspects such as overseeing the enforcement of the Constitution or the national defense policy (which includes the protecting of strategical resources).

It is not by chance that we mention the strategical resources. Also these days are used by a significant proportion of the civil society and diaspora to organize ample protests against the defective and downright corrupt management of the State's forrests, which are a strategical resource.

Considering that Mr. Iohannis is a president elected especially at the will of the diaspora and considering that a constitutional obligation of his own is questioned, this should be the focus of hist attention. But this doesn't happen. Klaus Iohannis is far more preoccupied with making ideological commitments.

#HeForShe – short version

For those who don't follow the nonsense spouted endlessly by institutions such as the UN, we remind our readers that #HeForShe is a campaign started at the initiative of the Goodwill Ambassador for UN Women (no, we're not joking, that's her title), the British actor Emma Watson.

The campaign was launched following a downright Orwellian speech with a misandric flavor, held on September 20th, last year.

Amongst other things, Emma Watson told then to the whole world that men and boys are not human. In her own words:

> I want men to take up this mantle so that their daughters, sisters, and mothers can be free from prejudice, but also so that their sons have permission to be vulnerable and human too.

In other words, not only our sons are not human now, but they also don't have the permission to be human unless they embrace the Orwellian-feminist message of Emma Watson and the rest of the feminist clique.

Can you imagine what would have happened if our president had joined a campaign that says women and girls aren't human because they run slower than men? All hell would've broken loose in no time, and rightfully so. But when the president neglects his constitutional duties in order to join a fundamentally misandric campaign, that doesn't matter.

What's funnier is that the president's message somehow still managed to offend the gender ideologues' sensibilities because, you see, Iohannis' message objectifies women.

Andreea Molocea, vice-president of a feminist association and Ph.D. candidate for the School of Multicultural-Feminist Indoctrination, known better to the public as the SNSPA (National School of Political Science and Public Administration) explains to us simpletons in the Adevărul newspaper:

> „Respect for those around us is a virtue." That is how [the president] starts his message and after the comma he mentions equality of opportunity. In other words, the president says that respect for women is a virtue; in other words women are "those around us," women are the object and men are the subject.

And we pay for this individual to get a Ph.D. so she can write more garbage like this – and do it under a veneer of authority. So much for patriarchy! And she goes on:

> The problem with the patriarchy is that it exceeds the domain of laws, rights and policies. These are just the tip of the iceberg of men's domination over women. The true domination comes exactly from this type of behavior, these subtle underminings, these reduction of us [women] from the center to the outskirts, from the heart till epidermis.

Aren't you feeling better for paying for the "studies" of this lady? Isn't it great that our taxes (mostly paid by men) are ideally used to pay for the "studies" of a lady who is then once again paid to write garbage about men?

And she goes on:

> Joining a global campaign of great visibility is an image benefit for them and zero benefits for me, the female citizen of Romania! […]
> I would like to see the elected President doing justice when a lot of injustice falls on women's shoulders. I would have wanted to see the President, today, May 8, > come out and publicly condemn the harassment acts that a mayor of a big city perpetrated for months against a woman!

Andreea Molocea, like most feminist ideologues, demonstrates a crass lack of knowledge regarding the laws and the inter-institutional relations of this country.

We will assume that in the last sentence she means the case of the mayor of Iași, Gheorghe Nichita who is under arrest facing charges of abuse of power and other crimes. The key expression here is "under arrest." In other words, Ghorghe Nichita is already in the process of being held accountable for his deeds – and this is the prerogative of the judicial apparatus, not the President's.

Speaking of the judicial apparatus – we have yet to see a feminist lauding the judicial apparatus, which in the meantime is being lauded internationally precisely because of the work of two genuinely courageous women: Monica Macovei and Laura Codruța Kövesi.

One of the reasons (if not the main reason) for which Gheorghe Nichita is being held accountable for his deeds (something that would not have happened 20 years ago) is precisely because these two ladies have tirelessly worked to strengthen the judiciary – a judiciary which is by the way, also dominated by women.

But, in the purest feminist fashion, these aspects don't matter. What matters is that Iohannis' message is not misandric enough and not conforming enough with the party line of the internationalist feminism.

This was expected

This move of president Iohannis and the disproportionate reactions of the feminist ideologues were expected.

We say this because the feminist ideologue-in-chief of this country, Mihaela Miroiu (coincidentally, also part of SNSPA) offered her public endorsement for Klaus Iohannis even from the first round (when also two women were in the race) arguing that Monica Macovei is not appropriate for the job because she doesn't believe in "social justice."

Mihaela Miroiu said at the time:

> [Monica Macovei] has a program that doesn't intersect at all with my preferences regarding justice with three eyes open, not with both eyes blindfolded. Justice and fairness aren't identical. As a President, she should deal with social justice, not just justice period.

In other words, the judiciary's impartiality (because that's what's all about when Justitia is blindfolded) is not part of the feminist plan. Equality under the law is the antithesis of feminism – an aspect which those of us in the politically activated non-feminist sector already know.

Other reactions

The upside of this whole deal is that the public didn't react well at all to the President's move – which is fantastic and shows once again that feminism is an uber-minority position in this country and with high chances of staying like that perpetually.

Considering that Mr. Iohannis was considered by most analysts as the president of the "Facebook generation" – we consider the reactions he got on his Facebook page to be relevant. Let's review a few of the reactions that the people who voted for him threw at the President.

Ms. Mihaela R. says:

> Mr. president, you are out of your mind, and I'm sorry to say so. This is your concern?!!! You are unrecognizable when compared to the Iohannis I voted for in November, and you're in free fall!

Ms. Maria C. adds:

> IF NOT EVEN NOW THERE'S NO EQUALITY BETWEEN MEN AND WOMEN, THEN WHEN??? In fact, women have already surpassed men in rights……..

Mr. Marius O. also says:

> I'm sorry for voting you, Mr. President!

And it goes on and on like that for several thousand comments.

These people are not AVFM members, nor militant anti-feminists and not even members of the opposition political parties. These people are average citizens of this country – most of them having voted for Mr. Iohannis in the last elections. For the president of the "Facebook generation" – this doesn't look good at all.

Is Klaus Iohannis a misandric ideologue?

The most complete answer that we can give is… we don't know yet.

I personally don't think he is. In the style of Hume's philosophy, I reject the "greater miracle."

It is much more likely for Iohannis to be badly informed (or even completely uninformed) but for him to have been weighed that this ideological forage to be a good image move and a good move to distract the public from the much more pressing matters. It's more likely that than to believe that Iohannis is part of a conspiracy or a great believer in the feminist cult.

Internationalist feminism is always disseminated first using the ignorance of various decision makers as well as using their misplaced good intentions. We have no proof, for instance, that Iohannis is aware of the fact that feminism was one of the spreading vectors of the Eugenic movement which later on was to serve as inspiration for the horrors of the National-Socialist regime in Germany. Ignorance is a much likely answer.

But ignorance of the real danger that gender ideology represents for the society does not, and should not, excuse the President. As head of State, he doesn't have the right to be ignorant, nor the right to be only half-informed.

This move will cost Mr. Iohannis votes – and quite a few of them. But, more importantly, Klaus Iohannis' move proves what AVFM Romania has asserted in its mission statement right from the get-go. We consider that generally, all the big political parties in Romania are either populist or gynocentric and thus unworthy of our support.

The main rival of Mr. Iohannis for the presidency want to shove Istanbul Convention down our throats, a document whose provisions are in flagrant contradiction with the Romanian Constitution, the Civil Code and any commonsensical principle. Mr. Iohannis is shoving #HeForShe down our throats.

Mr. Iohannis was voted mainly for the simple fact that he wasn't his rival. It is now obvious that this quality, although necessary in the eyes of the majority of the citizens, is not sufficient.

As long as such slippages are being tolerated, we will move step by step[note] towards a feminist governance.

[note] "Step by step" (Romanian: Pas cu pas) is the name of Klaus Iohannis' book where he details his step-by-step evolution from the mayor of the historical city of Sibiu (Hermanstadt) till being elected as head of State.

Music that guys have hung on to!

People who are unfamiliar with mental, or even MEN-TELL, health think that "not" being depressed, stressed and even suicidal is easy. They believe we all can float away by just imagining things. They also apparently have the ability to defy all study of human psychology and when told "Don't think of a pink elephant", they are able to think of anything but a pink elephant.

When addressing the issues of mental health (or any pathetic weakling who may just be a little bit blue and in need of a good talking to) they have a terrible habit of using metaphors to cover their own ignorance with a veneer of pseudo intellectualism and saccharined charm. They think of soft furnishings and view everyone as a set of drapes, telling you to pull yourself together. As one expert explained to me, soft furnishings can be an issue as people slip quietly and silently under the smothering duvet of clinical depression. It's all ever so slow and even comfortable, as you drift into it like sleep. Many have no idea what happened until they are deep in the nightmares, with no escape. Try twelve months of that, and you are forced to build a functioning life around your new (ab)normal.

One thing I am aware of is that there is a massive issue and elephant in the room that needs to be dealt with. Men and women "are" different and one way this shows up most starkly is the suicide rate, where men are 4 or even 5 times more likely to commit suicide than women. The disparity is growing not decreasing. The feminist demands that all men and women are 100% equal, and all "vanilla," is an old meme that has had it's day. Science keeps proving the feminists wrong, but they are still playing catch up using STEM. They do need to shut up until they are old enough to graduate and do some real-world real science afterwards.

Spare me the excuses and justifications, the pontificating and the crap, badly sourced and ignorant analyses. The issue is people dying, not your inability to actually use Google to find relevant materials, studies and to be able to handle cold hard facts. When a ship is sinking, you can bleat out all you like about life boat drills, but when that strategy fails you have to get inventive very fast to keep people afloat whilst help is still over the horizon.

I'm impressed by simple acts of advocacy. Many believe that to make change you have to do big things. You need to corral and control the media: make them your voice. Decades ago, a little guy dressed in some home-made cloth showed that view is rubbish. The media followed him because he had the right thing to say. They didn't follow immediately, he did have to keep on saying the right things, but eventually people listened and then he had a global voice! You may have heard of him. He's best known as Gandhi. He walked to the sea, made salt and destroyed a taxation system. One man making free salt was not an issue, but when millions did the same, a simple act of advocacy multiplied, was unstoppable.

Here at AVfM there is one guy who does it so well, he's a genius. That's Dan "Dannyboy" Perrins. From standing quietly whilst being screamed at by the likes of "Big Red," to dying his beard red to highlight that hair colour is not permission to abuse or to just walking with a message, Dan Perrins takes simple acts of advocacy and shakes other people's worlds – shakes their ignorance – he highlights the inequalities and the needs people have. And then, he's also a major contributor here at AVfM. He loves to FTSU "Facting Their Shit Up," illuminating ignorance so that it can self combust in indignation. Dan, the advocacy-o-matic has got the message, and every day he's acting as advocate for change. Dan is such a natural, many forget how hard others find it to find simple ways to advocate for change everyday.

I keep wondering how simple acts of advocacy can change the world. A tweet – a simple act of advocacy – plus one too many tequila – and I'm wondering about Pink Elephants and how to slay them. Why not collect together the "Music That Guys Have Hung On To," so that every tweet is an act of simple advocacy, giving guys permission to just be Human Beings and not Doings: to rebuild themselves with music that they make their own.

- Every tweet is a bullet aimed at pink elephants.
- Every tweet a message to others that they too may find powerful.
- Every tweet advocating change and support.

Forgive me for being stupid and having an imagination! I've no doubt that some loons in search of fossilised pachyderm poop (var Futrellii and Valentii) will wish to twist matters. It is after all how they make a living and peddle their own inanity . They will claim that I'm advocating for men to not have help, just an out of tune twitter feed! I'm not advocating any such thing. Just the creation of a place where "Music That Guys Have Hung On To" can be collected together for people to look at and use. If it should prevent one suicide, "Job's a good'un"! If it should achieve more, those are bridges to cross at a later date. I'm opening a door, not acting like a demented real-estate agent selling an un-built house off some crazed floor plan. If some want to do that, they are welcome to their own deluded castles in the air! I'll have fun charging them rent.

My Personal Top Ten Tunes are easy, and often surprising to others. Who would have thought at my age that I'm a "Drum & Base" freak. There are many songs I love but can't go back to, and so I've found new versions that take their place. Others are music that I've discovered and grown to love. They are not fixed in stone and can change.

If anyone wants to psychoanalyse that lot for significance, please be my guest. I find on-line amateur psychologists some of the most amusing "Social Justice Worriers"™ on the planet, and all in need of as much support as possible.

And….. This video of Carl Orff's Carmina Burana (Oh Fortuna) is a god send And comes with a nappy warning. Believe it or not I first sang Carmina Burana age 8, as one of the "Raggazi Chorus", making comments, in Latin, on middle-aged ladies virginity! Who ever said that classical music is boring or stayed! If you can watch this without laughing uncontrollably, you're a better guy than I, Gunga Din.

Simple everyday acts of advocacy can, as Gandhi knew, turn into an unstoppable force. So I've been looking at how to do that with some music, and make it easy for others to advocate. I've set up:

- A Twitter account – tweet your music choices
- A YouTube channel to hold play lists,
- A Google+ stream
- A Spotify account
- A Facebook account
- A Pinterest account
- A Tumblr account

It's simple and accessible to everyone on-line. It's just a set of places so that I can collect together "Music That Guys Have Hung On To".

All anyone has to do is tweet the details of the music and I'll do the rest. If you have a link to the music, all the better. I'll try and source free content for inclusion.

You can also tag tweets and other social media with #ManTube – it's a word I submitted to the Calm Zone #ManDictionary . It seems they don't want it, but I still think it has legs as an idea.

Anyone who wants to can graze over the "Music That Guys Have Hung On To," and find what makes a difference to them. It's not a panacea, and it probably won't shake the establishment to the foundations. It just allows people to advocate for change by remembering music and how guys are holding on! It even gives the opportunity to find people of a like mind.

There is no right or wrong music – no styles that are not welcome – no composers that are barred – If a parrot, tap dancing on a Stratocaster is your tune, that's the right music for you and maybe others. It's not about music criticism or who has the best or worst musical tastes, or even the biggest speakers. It's simply "Music That Guys Have Hung On To".

The only important thing is "Music That Guys Have Hung On To"…. PERIOD.

People don't have to say "why" they hung onto it, or even "who" hung onto it, all that is important is that one guy did and the music made a difference to him. You never know the difference it can make to another guy someday!

If some want to wade in and call me sexist please do, and you can then get off your ass and set up "Music That Gals Have Hung On To", or "Music That one-legged non-binary oppressed minority individuals Have Hung On To." It will be interesting to compare music profiles. This is not a contact sport for the oppression Olympics. If you want to play silly buggers, as referee I'll send you in for an early cold shower. I'll also send you to bed without any supper. It's what happens to naughty attention seeking children, twattering inanely in the guise of "Social Justice Worrier"™.

You can be anywhere on the planet when you find music that changes lives, and by a simple tweet you can be an everyday advocate for the need for change so that fewer guys are forced to hold on, with too many falling. Again, this is not about giving guys a cyber venue as the only option, it's about maybe helping them hold on until a real option comes along.

Now I do hate busy bodies, and those who think they can change you. I hate people sending me stuff and telling me stories about how it helped others. Unsolicited sympathy under the guise of help and advise is just not appreciated. But occasionally it can be a good thing … in moderation… in very tiny, tiny, tiny doses. I mean micron size doses. I'm really not interested in people who want to love bomb others with ill-considered re-tweets.

I remember this piece of music, because the first time I heard it it came with a message. Someone told me that their father had recently died of cancer. All through his treatment and chemo he was as sick as a dog, and then some. Each time he was too ill to talk or communicate, he put on his head phones and listened to some music. He never let anyone know what he was listening too. After he died they found out that this mountain of a brick layer who had been a Hells Angel in his earlier years had listened to this:

> Music is the strongest form of magic.
> *Marilyn Manson.

When you are told to not think of pink elephants, you think of them. I Just wish that Guys Holding On Were Pink Elephants and not real.

I hope that people will say that sharing “Music That Guys Have Hung On To” is a waste of time, because every-time I’ve heard the subject of male suicide dissed and thrown under the bus, that elephant just gets bigger and harder to ignore. But each time you acknowledge that elephant it can’t hide, and you can make it dance to your tune!

I Hope You Dance. Pick a tune.

EAOE – my fingers and eyes are buggered, so if you want to bitch over typos, please tweet them to @IDontGiveAFlyingF or @RetentiveAnus

Marital rape: why it is a thing

This is a response article to Amartya Talukdar's recent article, "Marital rape- a feminist tool to criminalize marriage in India".

Note: AVfM frequently publishes views with which it disagrees, and publication of a given piece must not be interpreted as even tacit support for the arguments offered therein unless one of senior management (which includes myself) say otherwise. This article, however, is an AVfM editorial.

The core thesis of Talukdar's article is that the notion of marital rape is a contradiction in terms on the ground that marriage is irrevocable, explicit and on-going consent to sex.

I disagree and, further, I think that this position is incompatible with the values and moral basis of the Men's Human Rights Movement. Here's why.

Definitions

Since frequently arguments of this nature revolve around the meanings of words I will spell out what I understand these core concepts to be and the meaning with which I use these core words, just like a contract would.

Rape is the crime of sexual intercourse without consent. There are subtle definitional differences in each western and first world jurisdiction (and many others besides) — in many instances, for example, the legal definition makes it nearly impossible for a woman to be guilty of the crime solely by virtue of her physiology — but all of them share that core principle.

Marriage is a legal, civil and social concept that binds two people together, much in the same way a contract does and, like a contract, obligates one to the other in various ways until the contract is legally dissolved. For some people, marriage entails additional meaning, but I am explicitly excluding any meaning born out of personal conviction (more on this later).

Precisely what those obligations are vary from jurisdiction to jurisdiction. For example, according to Talukdar:

> A woman in India has a right to maintenance even when husband is sick, and incapable of earning or is unemployed. He is duty bound to pay his wife alimony even after divorce. The Indian Courts have held that a man must "beg, borrow or steal" but he must maintain his wife.

In contrast, western definitions of marriage include provisions for alimony and division of marital assets after divorce, but I'm not aware that there is (now) any explicit obligation to provide for maintenance during marriage (the assumption being that, in cohabitation and in providing for himself, he provides for his wife also). There once was, but the legal doctrine of Courverture has long since been abolished.

Principle and practice

There is an important legal principle relevant to this discussion: Nullum crimen, nulla poena sine praevia lege poenali — "There exists no crime and therefore no punishment without pre-existing applicable criminal law" or, more simply put, "everything which is not forbidden is allowed". This is important because it codifies the primacy of liberty, but also the prerogative of law to curb liberty. In other words, if there is a law against an act, then that act is illegal unless another law provides for an exception.

So, we have an explicit law that criminalises rape and, to my knowledge (though I am no legal scholar), there is no explicit legal obligation, by either spouse, to submit to sexual intercourse — at least, not in any western jurisdiction I know of. Whether there is such an explicit provision in Indian law, I cannot say.

On the face of it, therefore, the law requires that, even within marriage, sex requires consent from both spouses or it is a crime.

The complicating factor, however, is interpretation. What is "consent", legally speaking? Though it shouldn't be the case, it is a fact that judicial interpretation of legislation is subject to social mores. Once, when marriage was more than a civil, contractual matter, judges frequently understood marriage to imply consent to sex, even if such consent was never codified in the black-letter of the law, and would therefore not convict a man of rape who forced himself on his wife. Talukdar hinted at this when he cited Hale:

> The noted English jurist, Sir Matthew Hale, stated the position of the common law in The History of the Pleas of the Crown (1736) that a husband cannot be guilty of the rape of his wife because the wife "hath given up herself in this kind to her husband, which she cannot retract".

It should be noted that Historia Placitorum Coronæ (the original title of Hale's treatise) is a chronicle, a contemporary description of facts and events as they were understood at the time; such works were and are not law and have no judicial authority (then or now), and can be nothing more than of historical interest.

It should also be noted that Historia was written in 1736, and that both the law and social mores change over time. Once, slavery was lawful and only landed people (which included women, by the way) had the right to vote. If defences of such law offered before slavery was abolished have no moral relevance in the 21st Century, then Hale's nearly 280-year-old interpretation of marital consent is of questionable relevance today.

While on the subject of other jurists Talukdar quoted, I think he misunderstood William Blackstone's remarks (he who gave us Blackstone's Formulation):

> The great jurist Sir William Blackstone wrote in "Commentaries on the Laws of England" that "Consensus, non concubitus, facit nuptias" ["Consent, not > cohabitation, makes the marriage"]. Hence consent for sex is implied when a man and woman get married.

Blackstone wasn't saying that marriage implies consent, he was saying the complete opposite: that the appearance and trappings of marriage (e.g. cohabitation) do not mean one truly is married, but rather only consent proves that the marriage is real. In other words, marriage is the consequence of consent, not the source of consent.

Sometimes, the legislature is moved to direct judges' interpretation and remove all doubt by passing legislation. This happened in respect of marital rape throughout most of the western and first world countries mostly in the decades either side of 1980 (but some earlier, and some later still). It was outlawed in Sweden, Norway, Canada, New Zealand, Austria and Ireland in 1965, 1971, 1983, 1985, 1989 and 1990 respectively and all of Australia, the United States and the United Kingdom by 1993.

Israel's judiciary (as opposed to legislature) outlawed marital rape in 1980, but what makes that case interesting is that the decision was based on and cited the Talmud, which dates back to at least the 6th Century CE!

Personal conviction versus law of the land

For some, marriage is a palpable evil (a view shared by certain MGTOW with certain radical feminists as cited by Talukdar). For others, it is little more than a formality done because it has always been done; for still others, it is a public declaration of mutual and exclusive commitment and for yet others still, marriage is a spiritual matter and a sacred institution.

I know for a fact that not everybody shares my thesis that marriage does not imply consent to sex but, so far as I can see, those who have disagreed with me in private do so out of personal conviction concerning those additional, special meanings they personally assign to marriage, rather than on any basis or principle of law.

I appeal to those for whom marriage has a special meaning, and especially those who are disinclined to impose their personal convictions on others, to keep that distinction clear in their minds: it is their freedom to include in their own marriage implied, on-going consent to sex if personal belief so moves them — because they choose to, which necessarily requires that others can choose not to.

Put in other terms, having the option puts everybody on an equal footing without regard to personal belief (which is a poor basis for making law).

The law is an ass (and why I think marriage does not imply consent)

All that is legal is not necessarily moral (e.g. much of what led up to the 2007 financial crisis), and all that is moral is not necessarily legal (e.g. format-shifting CDs you have paid for to your iPod. Yeah, until recently, that was technically illegal in the UK).

Much of what we do, as Men's Human Rights Activists, is to challenge unjust laws and lobby for their change. But first, we have to figure out what changes we want, why and on what basis to argue for the change. Talukdar identified the change (or rather, the preservation) of law he'd like to see, but the only contemporary justification (since, as I demonstrated above, and as Pastor Phil Snider of Brentwood Christian Church demonstrated in his speech before Springfield City Council, MO — you have to watch the whole of that short video to get the point — historical justifications count for little); the only contemporary justification for his point of view that he offered seemed to lie in the following:

> Rights come with duties. A woman in India has a right to maintenance even when husband is sick, and incapable of earning or is unemployed. He is duty bound to pay his wife alimony even after divorce. The Indian Courts have held that a man must "beg, borrow or steal" but he must maintain his wife. Then why shouldn't a man have right to have coitus with his wife if he is duty bound to maintain her?

There's something to that, insofaras Talukdar quite reasonably questions what rights the man has in return for the obligation to support and maintain his wife. But, the point could equally be used to argue for abolition of the man's obligation to maintain his wife as much as to argue that his wife owes him sex in exchange for that obligation.

[image]
But how shall MHRAs come to a principled view on conjugal relations in law — the legal basis on which the courts will judge allegations of rape by husbands of their wives?

Every aspect of our activism is underpinned by two, basic principles:

- That men deserve protection under the law equal to women, and
- that men's liberty, agency and autonomy, both bodily and financial, are not negotiable and are as inviolable as those of women.

A concrete example that embodies both is circumcision. Baby girls have the legal right to bodily integrity from birth where boys do not.

But that equality principle cuts (pardon me) both ways and what's good for the gander is good for the goose.

Since we, as MHRAs, demand that willing sex is not consent to parenthood, and that marriage is not open and on-going consent to access to a man's wallet, how can any MHRA support the proposition that marriage is open and on-going consent to sex regardless of whether the other spouse wants it?

Put in other words, if we demand bodily autonomy and integrity for men, women must necessarily enjoy the same right. In this case, that means the right to say 'no' to sex, even in the context of marriage. Some (of either sex) might choose never to say 'no' because of what marriage means to them, but at least they have that choice to make freely, and of their own will.

Moral relativism

I am not a moral relativist, which is to say that I think that morality transcends culture and that therefore, what is adjudged morally wrong in one culture — to the extent that I think anybody has any business prescribing moral strictures for others — is almost certainly not moral in others. If that sounds arrogant of me, then let me provide a two examples followed by two counter examples:

- Murder and theft are mala in se — wrong in and of themselves — because they are detrimental to society.
- We forbid genital cutting of girls in the West (including by those from other cultures living in the West) because it is detrimental to individuals and a violation of their bodily integrity.

I do not see how cultural background is a relevant factor in either of these cases. The two counter examples:

- Sex out of wedlock and choice of gender of sexual partner are questions of what two consenting adults choose to do in private. For as long as those adults take responsibility for the consequences of their actions, it is nobody else's business.
- Substance use is a matter of personal choice that affects only the user and therefore is nobody else's business, unless use becomes excessive and leads to antisocial behaviour such as theft (to maintain the habit), violence or neglect of the user's obligations (e.g. employment or dependent children).

One problem with moral absolutism is that because all the rules that apply in one culture don't necessarily apply in another, certain moral codes might be justified in one place but not another, therefore making pan-cultural statements about morality is a sticky proposition at best.

In this instance, who will provide for the vulnerable of India, some of whom are women and children, if not their husbands or the state (by way of social security good enough to provide for basic housing and nutritional requirements)?

I don't know the answer to that, therefore I don't feel comfortable passing moral judgement on an Indian husband's legal obligation to maintain his wife, even if I do feel comfortable in saying that that is a shitty deal for the husband.

At the same time, I feel quite comfortable in saying that rape is a malum in se — a wrong, in and of itself — anywhere and everywhere in the world, and that, by our own standards (as MHRAs), marriage cannot be on-going consent to anything (including sex) and that, therefore, there is no entitlement to sex inherent in marriage.

So to return to Talukdar's article and answer some of his questions; if—

> A woman who does not want to have sex with her husband should separate from him and file for divorce.

then, presumably, he has the same freedom to divorce and find a wife who will consent to sex or, if he can't—

> What should a man do if he is regularly denied sex by his wife? Should he masturbate, visit brothels or should be commit adultery?

then, frankly, yes; if extramarital sex is a sin, then better to sin with a willing partner than to sin with an unwilling partner (and using the services of a prostitute is probably a lot cheaper, from the man's point of view, than an on-going obligation to maintain a wife and children).

It can quite reasonably be argued that marital rape laws add a few grains to the gun in the room, particularly in divorce proceedings — they do — but I'd say that's about all they do. Rape is still illegal, whether within marriage or not. Accusations of rape add to the already numerous risks inherent in marriage (and men would do well to consider all of them, including potential maintenance obligations, before deciding to marry) but they cannot outweigh the right of any individual to self-autonomy, and certain rights cannot be contracted out of, even by marriage.

Sex without consent is rape. Nobody has the right to sex, even if most have the desire for it. Part of being an adult who takes responsibility for him- or herself is to recognise the difference between needs and wants (c.f. Maslow's Hierarchy of Needs), and to arrange their own affairs such that their needs are taken care of first, and that they are able to fulfill their wants to the extent they are capable — but without any sense of entitlement from anybody else.

Barry Williams talks of his hunger strike for men's issues in 1970's

In the light of Dan Perrins' hunger strike we think it timely to republish this classic interview between Dean Esmay and Australian Barry Williams who also went on a hunger strike for men's issues back in the 1970s, which met with success in having those issues heard and acted upon.

Why should you find Barry Williams interesting? Well listen to this interview and you'll see. We talk about his history of being a victim of domestic violence; being a single father raising multiple children without any support from the government or his violent alcoholic wife; and supporting his kids by himself even after sustaining a crippling injury.

We also talk about his improved relationships later on in life with his children's mother, his history of doing a hunger strike in front of Parliament House in Canberra in the Australian Capital Territory, plus his interactions with multiple Australian Prime Ministers and other government ministers and opposition leaders over the last 40 years.

Barry Williams and son Michael start a Lone Father rally at Parliament house, Canberra 1977

He describes the organization he built called the Lone Fathers Association; his lifelong efforts to help battered men; his being the only registered Federal lobbyist in Australia who speaks to men's issues; how the Australian government treats men and boys today versus decades ago; his work with various government ministers and opposition party leaders; his work with various court magistrates and officials, and more. His Lone Fathers Association may just be the largest and most successful men's aid society in the world, even though they continue to struggle to find any recognition or support, and it is possibly the oldest still-running organization for fathers in the world.

But here, listen to our interview and see for yourself:

The funny thing about Barry is just how disarming he is. When you talk to him, he sort of comes off as a genial, slightly rambly, moderately incoherent guy who's just a little out of his depth.

I said he comes off that way.

In reality, once you actually start listening to the man, he's as smart as anyone you'll ever come across who works on men's and boys' issues, and he has accomplished more in this area than anyone I have ever met. When you start listening to his story, and what he's accomplished over the last four decades, and what he's still doing, you'll be completely humbled: it is entirely possible that no one in the world has done more to help men and boys than this one man. And no, I'm not exaggerating in the slightest.

Barry is so disarming and so offhand in his manner of speaking, I did not even notice just how much he was saying while I was talking to him. It was only in going back and editing the interview for clarity and reviewing it a second time that I noticed his amazing habit of making seemingly offhand comments, when he was actually rattling off four or five absolutely fascinating bits of history and factual information at once, in a virtual blizzard of information and insights. You could write a book about everything he says in this interview. Indeed, I recommend listening to this interview once, then, thinking about it a bit, and going back to listen to it again. You may even want to take notes. This is a man who's known multiple Australian Prime Ministers, has received awards and recognition from the President of the United States and the heads of other governments, and he talks to you like he's just some bloke having a beer and discussing the latest football match on television.

It is arguable that today's men's movement stands on the shoulders of giants like Barry Williams, and it is important that we recognize, honor, and yes, even revere them. We hope that Barry's story brings inspiration to activists and to Dan Perrins as they continue to fight for the human rights of men.

Absent from big Daddy's presents on men's day: the acquittals and sentence reductions female criminals get on women's day

May 11, 2015 | by Ali Mehraspand | Link | Original Link

Tomorrow, on May 6th it will be men's day in Iran.

Men's day is always different from women's day in a lot of ways, but it has been particularly different in Iran.

On 4/10/2015, another women's day arrived in Iran and like previous years, brought with it the acquittal and reduction of female prisoners' sentences, provided that they meet the required conditions.

The requirements for women who are prisoners on women's day and who wish to use the acquittal or reductions are:

- That if she also has a private plaintiff, he or she is compensated.
- That she has not committed a 1st degree to 5th degree crime while on parole.
- That she has not used the acquittal/reduction in previous years.
- That she has not been imprisoned on more than two occasions.
- That her crime is not in the following: armed robbery, armed drug and alcohol trafficking, weapon trafficking, treason, kidnapping, running a brothel, spying, acid attacks and disruption of the economic system.

Upon meeting the above conditions and for the sake of women's day, the legal system:

- Acquits any woman with a sentence lower than six months
- Pardons half the sentence of women who had received between six months and five years.
- Pardons a third of the sentence of women who have received over five years.
- Acquits any woman who has been imprisoned for over ten years.
- Acquits any woman who has committed unintended crimes (such as manslaughter.)
- Acquits any woman with serious illness.
- Acquits any woman whose husband is also in prison or is executed. Furthermore, if a woman has a child's custody, should she have a life sentence, it will be reduced to 8 years, and should she have a type two crime, the sentence will be reduced to a third should she have a crime of type three, it will be reduced by 75% to only a quarter.
- Acquits any woman in debtor's prison if her debt is up to a billion Rials (approximately $33,000.)
- Pardons 80% of the sentence of any woman in debtor's prison for debts higher than the aforementioned amount.

The sentence disparity in Iran is already pretty huge, a fact that can be observed by comparing the number of husband killings with number of women in prison for husband killing. Almost 1 fifth of all murders involve a husband who is killed by his wife whereas only around 4% of the prisoners of murder are there for husband killing. This low number of female prisoners of husband killings have been used by women's groups to argue than husband killings are rare in Iran, while recent studies put the number of murders in which a woman single-handedly kills her husband at 6.8%. A study of spouse killings by Dr. Shahla Moazamy and Mohammad Ashury concluded that women who single-handedly kill their husbands only make a third of husband killings. In other cases, a husband-killer has assistance, usually from a man with whom she is having affair. This puts the total number of husbands killed by their wives at around 20% of all murders.

On the one hand, the sentence disparity can be observed in the fact that over 98% of those executed in Iran are men; on the other hand, while women continue to receive special consideration on women's day, no such acquittals and reduction of sentences has been given out on men's day.

May 12, 2015 | by Tom Golden and Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

---

It is easy to understand why the television show, “The Walking Dead,” is so popular. It is a well-written, well-executed and highly entertaining series. We mostly like it because the zombies are just walking around eating people and getting their heads blown up on our TV screens, not in real life.

Actually, we just wish that were true.

The world, the real one filled with real people, is already filled with real zombies. Gynocentric Zombies, or, if you prefer, Gynozoms. They are automatons who feed on the flesh of men and boys in order to satisfy the needs, real or imagined, of women and girls. It’s pretty simple really. Just imagine decaying, tooth snapping extras in The Walking Dead and adjust it – slightly — with the zombies of both sexes only attacking men and boys, as they do the zombie shuffle right past women and girls in perfectly good culinary condition. That about sums up our present state.

The vast majority of people are acting as if they were zombies, completely unaware of their inherent bigotry, while managing to zombiethink that they are so compassionate and balanced. They will often even boast of how progressive and equality minded they are.

But scratch and sniff and what do you get? The fetid stench of Eau de Zombie.

So, are you a Gynozom? It is easy to find out. Just a few questions will suffice.

Do you think that it’s okay for boys to be circumcised/mutilated as infants without any anesthesia while any cutting of infant female genitalia is forbidden by law? If so, you’re a Gynozom.

Do you do a twitchy shrug and shuffle on when you hear that men are 80% of the victims of suicide? 93% of workplace deaths? Then we need to call Michonne to pay you visit with her trusty katana.

[image]
Emma Watson without makeup.
Do you think that women are inherently good and superior to men, while men are inherently bad and inferior to women? Then your rank smell should be filling the empty space where your nose used to be before it rotted off.

Do you think that female victims of domestic violence deserve help while male victims don’t exist? Gy-no-zom!

Are facts immediately lost on you because your brain is now as functional as a head of cauliflower that has been laying in the hallway of a gender studies department for two weeks? Move toward the light! For the love of everything holy move toward the light!!

This is the real Zombie apocalypse. And is happening right now directly in front of societies, dull, greying eyes.

It’s time we start calling ~~people~~ the zombies out. Our politicians are all Gynozoms. They only make laws to help women and forget the men and boys. And they make laws to attack men and boys.
Remember, Gynozoms are everywhere and not only the acidic and lethal types. No, the Gynozom Invasion come in all sizes and flavors. The worst are probably the politicians but our academicians are staggering and limping just a few steps behind.

Generic Media Zombie
Then there is the media. Oh yes, the media. Nearly all are media (who were already zombies to begin with) are willing to attack and consume men and boys whenever they need a bit to eat. Bonus! They get fed and they also get to pat each other on their decomposing backs for “working hard” to protect women and girls. Yes, the media is overrun with Gynozoms. Swarming with them.

The most frightening aspect to Gynozoms is that you can’t identify them by the way they look. They look just like everyone else. In the Zombie movies it is easy to tell them from those who are fully alive. You can’t miss it. But in real life you can’t tell a Gynozom from a Gandhi just by looking. At any moment a Gynocentric Zombie who looks just like everyone else may come and take a bite out of you. If you are a man or a boy, no one will care. The other Gynozoms certainly won’t.

Be afraid, be very afraid.

MGTOW and fatherhood

May 12, 2015 | by August Løvenskiolds | Link | Original Link

In one of our backchannel discussions here at AVfM the talk turned to the question of whether MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way) were failing those in their number who were succumbing to biological urges and becoming husbands and/or fathers. To be fair, the MRA who raised the question also included PUA (the Pickup Artist community) in his critique but as I am a MGTOW who eschews social contact with women I'll confine my response to the MGTOW perspective.

I'll leave the person critiquing MGTOW unidentified for now but I welcome that MRA's comments and/or responding article, should that MRA wish to come forward with such.

I grew up with an excellent father who died when I was age 16. I am a lifelong MGTOW who nevertheless personally experienced the importance of having a good father in my life – and the pain of losing him.

On the surface, the MRA's critique struck me as absurd. Catholics don't teach Catholics how to be good Protestants. Alcoholics Anonymous doesn't teach their members the joys of binge drinking. Likewise, expecting MGTOW to support and validate those putative MGTOW who violate MGTOW precepts is prima facie lunacy.

MGTOW reject marriage as a dangerous trap for men with no discernible benefits either legal or emotional. Likewise, fatherhood in modern society has become a cruel ploy to turn men into slaves – involuntary cash dispensers for feckless baby-mamas. Fathers – even those that love and care for their kids – face real jail time as the penalty for those who rebel or are unable to pay. This is the functional equivalent to a form of slavery where your children are turned against you.

Instead of what should be the joys, personal validation and community utility of fatherhood, it has become now little more than the prospect of being raped in prison. No thanks – and fuck off – say MGTOW, and rightly so.

Nevertheless, men's biological impulse to enjoy sexual intercourse (sex), form enduring pair-bonds (marriage), and sire and rear healthy, happy children (fatherhood) are not easily dismissed or flicked off like a switch. I feel such urges like any healthy man does.

MGTOW communities exist in part to help men fight these destructive behaviors and channel those urges into safer, more personally productive pursuits.

Some MGTOW, like the YouTuber known as Sandman, also speculate on ways that these urges can be made safer for men using ideas like legalized prostitution, effective and non-intrusive male birth control technology, legal paternal surrender, adamantium-clad prenuptial agreements and pregnancy surrogates (both women and artificial wombs).

Men denied their basic male biological functions naturally seek innovations that could allow men to safely engage in sex, marriage and fatherhood without the current pitfalls for the unwary.

Of course, slaking the needs of men is still not safe and indeed, thanks mostly to the work of feminists conjoined with gynocentric traditional politicians, relief is unlikely to happen in the near future, if ever.

Consider prostitution: driven largely by useless, sex-negative radfem harridans, efforts to legalize prostitution are moving in the wrong direction – enterprising, voluntary working girls are being lumped together with involuntarily victims of sex-trafficking in narratives about the supposed evils of paid sex. This false equivalence is both misogynistic – it denies the intrinsic personal agency of voluntary women sex workers – and misandric in that it criminalizes men's sexual desire and practice.

The customers of prostitutes – chiefly men – are being criminalized for what would be legal, consensual sex if the exchange of money were not a part of the process – or, alternatively, if marriage were.

Consider the state of birth control: although new polyurethane condoms are a superior alternative to latex, condoms remain a clumsy, intrusive and pleasure-impairing experience for both men and women. The dream of a "male pill" for birth control remains illusive and even if realized will not stop the transmission of diseases such as AIDS.

Abortion and legal parental surrender remain rights for women only, and feminists, for all their bullshitting, useless blather about dictionary equality, absolutely refuse to consider equal legal rights for men in those areas. It will never happen with them in charge.

Expensive prenuptial agreements designed to protect men from alimony whores are cast aside routinely as unfair to women.

Likewise, women pregnancy surrogates can renege on their contracts, keep the child and extort child support from the sires. Artificial wombs are years away and will be only slightly less ruinous price-wise than those wombs with vaginae attached.

Planning for failure

The only way for men to win the game of being a man in our society is not to play.

Now, when we consider the implications of men not playing society's gynocentric sex games, abstinence-only sex education comes to mind – it is an idealized program that works only in fantasy lands like the Vatican, Texas and maybe Antarctica. Okay, it doesn't even work in those places, either.

Should MGTOW face the repugnant idea that some of our brothers will be overwhelmed by their biological urges and lose their red pill wisdom to the purported "one good blowjob" that a nefarious feminist might hypothetically use to subvert good MGTOW? Should we somehow support and even celebrate those wavering MGTOW who would betray core MGTOW principles and engage, and even marry, women?

I have to admit that I am torn by this question.

I love my MGTOW brothers and I trust almost all of them to do the right thing as best they understand and are able.

However, a few well-known MGTOW have proven to be bad apples – apexuals who retain competitive and dominating behaviors that are pointless and counterproductive in men that have forsworn slavery to the approving glances of women. Their understanding and commitment to MGTOW ideals is sloppy and lacks self-reflection.

Such MGTOW are rightly called PIGTOW: they do not grasp the truth that MGTOW who seek power and acclaim are no MGTOW at all but pretenders to the name that give all MGTOW a bad name.

In a similar vein are the faltering MGTOW still in slavery to their biological urges, who continue to consort with women and daydream about finding a "NAWALT" (from the phrase "Not All Women Are Like That") – an exceedingly rare woman who (it is supposed) rejects gynocentrism and feels a genuine, durable compassion and devotion to men.

I am torn between compassion for these MGTOW and the need to maintain clear standards for what MGTOW aspire to be.

Thus, I conclude that the MGTOW community should encourage men who adhere to the ideals of MGTOW to actually practice them:

- No marriage, ever. There is no point to it and no benefit from it. If a woman wants marriage she can go marry herself – you should not care what she wants.
- Seeking the approval or validation of any woman is contemptible. Strip them of their power to shame you – being insulted by a woman is a mark of efficacy and helps liberate all men from women's control.
- Dating, sexual intercourse and causing a pregnancy are strongly discouraged. Occasional slips can happen (so keep condoms handy) but should be minimized or avoided if possible.
- Take all precautions to protect your assets and yourself. Women will harvest you economically and destroy you personally, without hesitation or regret, if given the chance. Remember, men owe women nothing at all.
- Be prepared if a woman tries to rape you. Women always feel entitled to use and discard men's bodies without consent and they reject entreaties to stop their raping behaviors.
- Displays of power, social dominance and wealth are dangerous and unseemly as they confirm gynocentric cultural norms. Wear threadbare, unfashionable clothing and shoes as a form of social camouflage.
- Excess work productivity that supports a gynocentric welfare society should be curtailed in favor of other, more pleasurable activities that do not aid general prosperity.
- Being poor, or giving the appearance of poverty, are excellent deterrents to women's interest in you.
- Self-reliance, self-sufficiency and mastery of self are good but do not flaunt these traits in the presence of women – use them to set an example to other men.
- Resist your instinct to protect women: don't white knight – putting yourself at risk to aid a damsel-in-distress supports gynocentrism and invites them to abuse and exploit you. Go play a video game instead – let her solve her own problems if she can.
- Gender roles are meaningless and it is harmless to either observe them, or transgress them. Don’t stress out over them either way – it is not worth the aggravation. Treat them as mild amusements if you think about them at all.

- Exercise compassion for men and set a good example of how a liberated MGTOW should act and be.
- If you must interact with women, record the interactions electronically and keep the recordings forever. This will impair their ability to abuse you with lies and false accusations.
- Avoid being alone with women in your workplace or home. Public contact only, and then only when necessary.

Many movements, social or religious, are torn between a slipshod evangelism that underplays key aspects of the movement, and a puritan fundamentalism that runs roughshod over evangelism.

I try to hold myself harshly to my ideals while I practice a firm compassion for those that see things differently.

This balance works for me. A fair hearing of it is all I ask.

Questions for Feminists

May 12, 2015 | by Jason Sinclair | Link | Original Link

Winston Churchill said "Those who fail to learn from history are doomed to repeat it."

The human race has some very dark history. Certain groups have destroyed other groups for whatever ideological reason they can come up with. We lived in a world that saw slavery, murder, hatred because of a physical difference, a difference in the god or gods we may have believed in.

I was taught about a lot of these as a child in school. I was taught about fountains that were relegated to a person with a certain skin colour, or how hate allowed a nation to somehow allow the Genocide of a people who were set aside only by their beliefs. How a government decided that their were thoughts that were inappropriate for people to have and decided to burn any piece of literature on topics not approved.

I was taught these things because of that quote. When I learned about these things as a kid in school I couldn't believe people were ever so ignorant and hateful. I was a kid, I didn't understand how hate and fear can motivate people to do crazy and stupid things. How awful hateful things come from small acts that build over time.

Recently I have seen some disturbing reincarnations of the fear and hate. It's not genocide or murder. It is however a frightful and disturbing trend.

Feminists…

Have you ever worried about becoming the embodiment of what you hate? That you would end up being exclusionary and intolerant?

I ask you to look at your fellow feminists and the direction feminism is going. Take a look at the Feminists who decided it was a good idea to burn a book burn a book that didn't agree with their ideology, or the feminist who while shouting down a dissenting viewpoint held a sign that said 'I am expressing my right to free speech.' Or a group of feminists who decided that while they were completely justified in protesting and exercising that freedom of association, freedom of expression and the right to express their opinion on a topic in a public forum, while simultaneously excluding people who's only difference was biology. It didn't matter if they held the same opinion or not, They were not going to be tolerated simply due to a biological condition beyond their control.

Feminists, do you see the pattern? Do you see what you are becoming? I know many of you are saying "They aren't real feminists, they are misguided" If you truly believe that we are all equal then your beliefs and mine are aligned and all else aside we can have a meaningful dialogue and maybe, eventually come to an agreement. If you think the things above are a good way to get a message across to the world then I ask you to seriously take a look at our history. If you believe it was only because of men that these things ever happened at all, then I ask you to look at feminism in it's current state and think again.

Clementine Ford's Distorted Vision of Australia

Melbourne is routinely billed in our media as the world's most liveable city. The various groups who declare the world's top cities don't always agree on the number one position, but Melbourne, as well as Australia's other major cities, always appear somewhere in the top 10 or 20. Each group has a different list of criteria for what it is that makes particular cities "the best", but every one of them sees personal safety and low crime as crucial.

Clearly, none of these groups asked Clementine Ford what she thinks, because for her, in her latest rendition of the Sacred Babble, the disturbing backlash on speaking out about violence against women, life has never been more dangerous for Australian women.

How bad is it?

> "The reality is that simply being alive constitutes a 'dangerous situation' for women."

There are no points for guessing what, or should I say who, makes the most liveable city so dangerous for women:

> "It is astonishing how much more offended men seem to get by the possibility that they'll be lumped in with a group known to pose a risk to women than they are by the fact that, empirically speaking, the greatest risk to women's lives is men."

She goes on to tell us how women are murdered by their partners at rate of one a week. For those of you not so good with statistics, let me assist you through the murk:

One a week is 52 a year, and the Australian Bureau of Statistics (ABS), in their study on Domestic / Family homicide in Australia, confirm that in the 10 years from 2002-03 to 2011-12 some 488 women, or 48.8 per year, were killed by an intimate partner.

In terms of the total women in Australia, that is 0.0006% per annum.

It is difficult to see how men are the "greatest risk", however, when, again according to the ABS in 2013, 52 women were killed as pedestrians in traffic accidents, 1007 women were killed in accidental falls and 19,438 women died from some form of cancer.

But am I making light of the women who were murdered? Consider this heady mixture of victim-claiming while victim-blaming:

> "We're bullied for the 'sexism' of focusing solely on women, as if we should be prioritising the minute numbers of men who are victimised in hostile domestic situations although overwhelmingly not at risk of domestic homicide."

She also wrings her hands like this:

> "We're chastised for not including caveats that remind people that 'not all men' are involved in this extensive war on women."

Now, is she really claiming that some 8 million Australian men were involved in the murder of 52 women last year? But also consider that the Domestic / Family homicide in Australia figures put the "minute number" for men as 166 for the decade, which is 16.6 per year. So one-a-week is an "extreme war on women", but more than one-a-month is not enough for right-thinking feminists to give a shit.

Extraordinarily, she then goes on a rant as to how unfair it all is for men to object to her fear-mongering citing of false statistics to give her drivel a disguise of scientific authority. Of course, she claims that she has "an entire folder of emails" of threats. We are to assume that this folder is big, the threats are genuine, from men, and they are not all from the same nutter. Given her use of statistics, I have my doubts.

Consider this piece of numerical magic:

> "So far, 2015 has seen 35 women murdered in acts of violence, with the latest unnamed victim discovered overnight at a property in Dallas, Victoria. At least 29 of these murders are alleged to have been committed by men. The majority of these alleged perpetrators were in, or had previously been in, a form of intimate relationship with the murdered women."

Let me help you follow the bouncing ball here. 35 becomes 29 becomes some undefined number less than 29. Now, this article was written on May 12, 2015 – so we have had 20 weeks for the year thus far. Less than 29 divided by 20 is something like one-a-week. Right?

> "As the statistics stand now, two women are killed every week in Australia as a result of violence."

Did you miss it? Are you wondering how we got from one a week to two? It's the "as a result of violence" that requires your attention. This figure has nothing to do with domestic violence. She's now including women being killed by strangers, and maybe even killed by other women.

The next bit might upset Dr. Michael Flood and all the Good Men at White Ribbon Australia:

> "In regards to men's violence against women, [men are] praised for even acknowledging the problem, festooned with compliments and gratitude simply for offering what should be the fairly standard view that 'it's not on mate'… And they do this because it's a way of maintaining control and power, insisting that other men are the enemy but that this man must be freely accepted as a protector and ally."

Even when you try to help them, boys, it's oppression.

Most bizarre of all is Ford's next complaint:

> "Women still aren't allowed to take ownership over our own defense and protection."

What does this mean? Who's not allowing them? The oppressive men? The Good Feminist men? All men?

But even more, is she calling women to real action? Not just a poetry reading, or a season of the "Vagina Monologues", but real action? Is she calling for women to take responsibility for their "own defense and protection"?

Don't be silly.

> "Men's violence is the problem. Let's name it, and let's end it."

For those not familiar with the Sacred Babble, allow me to interpret:

Ford's work, having whined and complained enough to make her sound important, is now done. She has completed the gargantuan task of naming "it".

"Let's end it" is the cue for the Good Feminist Men, now that they have been suitably chastised for their preening and posturing and oppressing, to get on with the task of actually ending the "extensive war on women". Preferably, they will do this in a quiet, efficient manner that leaves the women blissfully unaware of the civil rights abuses and carnage that comes from blaming 8 million men for the actions of a few.

I wonder how Tourism Australia's campaign, "There's nothing like Australia" sells the feminist moral panic to potential international visitors? The City of Melbourne's own website makes out that Melbourne is a great place to visit, without any warnings to women about the "extensive war" being waged.

Weren't the other countries concerned when their women came back abused, dead or worse? Or are those countries also run by Patriarchy and they thought it was all part of good international relations?

In which case, what's going to happen when the Good Feminist Men appoint a Misogyny-Finder General to conduct secret tribunals to rid us, or at least women, from this manufactured scourge.

Won't those Patratriarchs be worried when their men are incarcerated or, worse, indoctrinated, due to trumped up charges of oppression?

I can see the new campaign now "Australia – Safety for Women, Lessons for Men." And Melbourne, the World's Most Ideologically Correct City.

Feminist Gas Attack: a Textbook Case of Pavlovian Binding

May 13, 2015 | by Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) | Link | Original Link

The graphic image shown here was first posted on a feminist Facebook group. The creator of the image speaks to us in the comment directly below the image, and tells us what is going on.

When I saw this, I saw a great opportunity to make a point about Pavlovian binding and how it operates, so I took the trouble to write a fairly lengthy comment myself.

When I tried to post my comment, I got a notification that the item, and the entire thread, had been removed. Nevertheless, I preserved what I had written. I expanded on that material and polished it up, and I share this now, below.

> Re: the present agitprop.
> The problem is that there is no such thing as “the MRAs”. That is a projected, fabricated, straw-dummy category – pure and simple! “MRA” is a political fiction and nothing more.
> For your propaganda to be legitimate and worth listening to, you must make it specific. Who/what precisely are “the MRAs”, and who/what precisely are we sticking that label to? What criteria would define membership in this set? What are the core items of doctrine? Is there an “MRA” charter or manifesto available? How about a link to this, so we may confirm that you have truthfully represented these things?
> Also, it would help to have a list of names, along with evidence that the actual persons in question fit all of the relevant criteria – starting with, of course, self-identification. Do any of the people whose names you might provide actually claim to be “MRAs”?
> For example, is the young man depicted actually an “MRA”? Has he named himself as one? Is it possible to contact him so as to verify that? Overall, is this what an “MRA” looks like? You fail to address any of these points, and that is a fact which we cannot fail to remark.

Oh wait a minute: is that Elliot Rodger?? It sort of looks like him. Hey, you know what? If Jessica Valenti and I had been standing together on the sidewalk that day when Elliot came around the corner with his gun, he would have killed both of us deader than fucking hell.

Ahhh, death! It is an awesome force for equality, is it not?

Okay, another problem is, that the red words in the picture offer "MRA" as just one category among several. The mix is bizarrely eclectic, and it looks like the creator is a bit confused about what is what. Either that, or the creator knows perfectly well what is going on and only wishes to create confusion in others.

Overall this reminds me of the Monty Python joke about "farting in your general direction", since that pretty well describes what is being done. Nothing specific has been targeted in terms of actual persons, and nothing specific has been directed at this unspecific target. In other word, zero evidence has been given.

Gas warfare. That is what it comes to. No use in sword-fighting the fart, is there?

In sum, it is unsupported accusations against unnamed persons — and incoherent accusations, at that. So you might as well be saying "bla-bla-bla" – it is precisely that vacuous. It has no moral or argumentative substance of any kind. But then, it isn't meant to. It is meant chiefly to arouse panic and paranoia among real, individual people who might just vaguely intersect with some part of the fuzzy set which has been constructed here.
That's right: names or no names, evidence or no evidence, real individual people are under under the gun here. Real individual people are targeted here, for things they never said or did.

There's a name for this, if memory serves. Don't they call it "false accusation"?

In a nutshell: Pretty much anybody who is outspokenly critical of feminism, for any reason, is targeted here.

And yes, you can keep your mouth shut if you like, but you're next in line if you decide to speak up.

The purpose of all such propaganda, and all such rhetoric, is to intimidate any critical non-feminist into shutting up about feminism. After all, feminism is a hegemonic cultural paradigm, so if you bite the power, the power must bite you back.

The creator of this graphic image is very clearly a feminist, although that person hasn't got the moral courage or frankness to admit it. I am curious why so many feminists hate to declare their feminism. I have no problem with admitting that I am not a feminist – in fact, I will announce this fact to all the world at any time. But what's with all of the feminists who want to operate in stealth mode these days?

If feminists merely want to use Pavlovian smear tactics against people who say > no to feminism, why can't they simply announce their target with the correct name: non-feminist people? At least that way, we know what the score is and where things stand.

> But of course, they will never be so honest because they can't admit that they are crooked, shameless liars. I guess I can't quite blame them; if I were a crooked, shameless liar I'm sure I'd want to keep it under wraps, too.
> But is it asking too much, for feminists to unfurl their banner openly, in broad daylight, and stop being crooked, shameless liars? Or is moral flatulence the "secret weapon" they hope to win the war with?
> Is feminism nothing but a Monty Python joke applied in an evil, unconscionable way?
> Feminism needs badly to recuperate its public image. The world isn't fooled by the lying and hating any more — after all, we've had half a century to study this in action, and we would be bloody thick if we still couldn't see what feminism is, after all these years.

MGTOW: chemo for a cultural cancer

May 13, 2015 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Discussion in the manosphere about the roots of runaway gynocentrism continues and is unlikely to end in a unified view, though every thinking person agrees that gynocentrism is very real.

A number of MGTOW adopt the biological determinist view that gynocentric-chivalry is embedded in our nervous systems and therefore relationships with women will always be subject to extreme gynocentrism. An equally large number hold the alternative view that gynocentrism is a cultural exaggeration of biological potential and not an inevitable fate for men to suffer.

Aside from those differences over origins, both sides agree that gynocentric marriage – its culture, customs, laws, taboos – must be utterly abandoned, not reformed. Notice here I refer to gynocentric marriage and not to a marriage of the minds, hearts, dreams, goals, projects, and bodies that might come with non-gynocentric relationships.

Can relationships be cleansed of extreme gynocentrism – relationships with mothers, sisters, female colleagues, friends or lovers? Based on fluctuations of gender roles over millennia, I would think yes; male-female interactions can be purged of the extreme gynocentrism we see today. We have been there before, and we can go there again.

Would such a project entail reform of gender relationships? Yes it would, though I prefer to see it as dismantling those infected structures and keeping only the non-gynocentric elements aligning with voluntarism, self-determination, egalitarianism.

Those thinking it possible to nudge a post-gynocentric culture into existence, foolhardy as that may sound to MGTOW fatalists, have already made a few suggestions on how to bring it about.

As mentioned in a previous article a first possible strategy is to undermine the media's censorship of voices who would criticize gynocentric culture (media censorship of these voices being a major cause for its longevity), creating an awareness revolution the beginnings of which are well underway.

The second strategy – and an act of self-preservation for men – is to starve the cancer of its preferred food, ie. withdrawing from marriage and as many other gynocentric customs as possible to hasten its demise. I'm reminded here of a recent comment by MGTOW buddy August Løvenskiolds:

> Avoidance of poison should be a self-evident good. Deepening the divide between men and women is the only way to impress on the larger society that something is badly astray. Society will notice a crack but will be forced to deal with a chasm."

The three parts of this pithy statement deserve a closer look. August's contention that the poison of gynocentrism deserves avoiding is a no brainer; ie. subjecting yourself to gynocentric slavery will destroy you from the inside out, and the outside in. It steals your wallet, your freedom and ultimately your sanity. The second part contends that society must first see a crack in its system before registering it has gone astray – a crack that rejection of gynocentric marriage will help widen into a chasm. The last and most important in the context of this article is the comment that society will be forced to address and rectify the problem as the cracks turn into a chasm.

This last point plays directly into the theme of the International Conference on Men's Issues: Building Bridges Between Men and Women in the 21st Century. We can do that by not repairing the cracks in faulty bridges but by widening them to allow the structure to collapse and make way for a new bridge – one that can withstand the weight of human compassion without crumbling. August, who will be speaking on the topic of 'going his own way' at the upcoming conference, is an advocate for tearing down treacherous old bridges and crafting newer, better structures in their place… breaking eggs to make omelets.

[image]Eschewing gynocentric relationships shouldn't be misunderstood as simple gender-separatism, at least not for many MGTOW. It can also be an act of activism. Think of men withdrawing from marriage as a reversed-gender Lysistrata play where, instead of Ancient Greek women withholding sex as a means to change cultural norms (as in the play), it is now men who withhold something in order to change the culture. A means to an end – that for the sake of which.

The women of Lysistrata did not want to give up sex for all eternity, and I expect a number of MGTOW don't want to give up interactions with women for all eternity if a non-gynocentric possibility were made available. It is a rational strategy, then, to reject gendered institutions in order to wipe out gynocentrism, after which bridges between men and women can be built.

Having described the activist effect of withdrawal from gynocentric relationships, I'd like to end with a qualifier. MGTOW is far more than a cultural activism project, or far less depending on your view. A MGHOW can ignore the goal of ridding gynocentrism from the world while fully remaining a man going his own way. Noting the activist element is not intended to suggest what MGHOW 'should' be doing – he can, and will, do whatever he wishes. As recently summarized by August Løvenskiolds, "One can become MGTOW for risk management, or for political reasons (such as MRAs), or both."

We need not buy the divisive line that Going Our Own Way should be for the sake of personal benefit only, or for political or cultural benefit only. Among MGTOW who see extreme gynocentric culture as an anomaly, many will have an urge to destroy the beast on a societal level even while doing the same in their personal, private lives.

Women: Our Better Halves (1888)

May 14, 2015 | by Lester Frank Ward | Link | Original Link

Lester Frank Ward delivered this his first major essay on Gynæcocentrism Theory in 1888, entitled Our Better Halves. The speech was delivered at the Fourteenth Dinner of the Six O'clock Club in Washington on April 26, 1888, at Willard's Hotel, where Sex Equality was selected as the evening's topic. Distinguished women in Washington on that day were invited to the Club, among them being Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Miss Phoebe Couzins, Mrs. Croly (Jennie June), Mrs. N. P. Willis, and a number of others equally well known. – PW

But let us now inquire what grounds there are for accepting this mental and physical inferiority of women as something inherent in the nature of things. Is it really true that the larger part taken by the female in the work of reproduction necessarily impairs her strength, dwarfs her proportions, and renders her a physically inferior and dependent being? In most human races it may be admitted that women are less stalwart than men, although all the stories of Amazonian tribes are not mere fictions. It is also true, as has been insisted upon, that the males of most mammals and birds exceed the females in size and strength, and often differ from them greatly in appearance.

But this is by no means always the case. The fable of the hedgehog that won the race with the hare by cunningly stationing Mrs. Hedgehog at the other end of the course, instructed to claim the stakes, is founded upon an exception which has many parallels. Among birds there are cases in which the rule is reversed. There are some entire families, as for example the hawks, in which the females exceed the males. If we go further down the scale, however, we find this attribute of male superiority to disappear almost entirely throughout the reptiles and amphibians, with a decided leaning toward female supremacy; and in the fishes, where male rivalry does not exist, the female, as every fisherman knows, is almost invariably the heavier game.

But it is not until we go below the vertebrate series and contemplate the invertebrate and vegetable worlds that we really begin to find the data for a philosophical study of the meaning of sex. It has been frequently remarked that the laws governing the higher forms of life can be rightly comprehended only by an acquaintance with the lower and more formative types of being. In no problem is this more true than in that of sex.

In studying this problem it is found that there is a great world of life that wholly antedates the appearance of sex—the world of asexual life—nor is the passage from the sexless to the distinctly male and female definite and abrupt. Between them occur parthenogenesis or virgin reproduction, hermaphroditism, in which the male being consists simply of an organ, and parasitic males, of which we shall presently speak, while the other devices of nature for perpetuating life are innumerable and infinitely varied. But so far as sex can be predicated of these beings, they must all be regarded as female. The asexual parent must be contemplated as, to all intents and purposes, maternal. The parthenogenetic aphis or shrimp is in all essential respects a mother. The hermaphrodite creature, whatever else it may be, is also necessarily a female. Following these states come the numberless cases in which the female form continues to constitute the type of life, the insignificant male appearing to be a mere afterthought.

The vegetable kingdom, except in its very lowest stages, affords comparatively few pointed illustrations of this truth. The strange behavior of the hemp plant, in which, as has long been known, the female plants crowd out the male plants by overshadowing them as soon as they have been fertilized by the latter, used to be frequently commented upon as a perverse anomaly in nature. Now it is correctly interpreted as an expression of the general law that the primary purpose of the male sex is to enable the female, or type form, to reproduce, after performing which function the male form is useless and a mere cumberer of the ground. But the hemp plant is by no means alone in possessing this peculiarity.

I could enumerate several pretty well known species that have a somewhat similar habit. I will mention only one, the common cud-weed, or everlasting (Antennaria plantaginifolia), which, unlike the hemp, has colonies of males separate from the females, and these male plants are small and short-lived. Long after their flowering stalks have disappeared the female plants continue to grow, and they become large and thrifty herbs lasting until frost.

In the animal kingdom below the vertebrates female superiority is well-nigh universal. In the few cases where it does not occur it is generally found that the males combat each other, after the manner of the higher animals, for the possession of the females. The cases that I shall name are such as all are familiar with. The only new thing in their presentation is their application to the point at issue.

The superiority of the queen bee over the drone is only a well-known illustration of a condition which, with the usual variations and exceptions, is common to a great natural order of insects. The only mosquito that the unscientific world knows is the female mosquito. The male mosquito is a frail and harmless little creature that swarms with the females in the early season and passes away when his work is done.

There are many insects of which the males possess no organs of nutrition in the imago state, their duties during their ephemeral existence being confined to what the Germans call the Minnedienst.[1] Such is the life of many male moths and butterflies. But much greater inequalities are often found. I should, perhaps, apologize for citing the familiar case of spiders, in some species of which the miniature lover is often seized and devoured during his courtship by the gigantic object of his affections. Something similar, I learn, sometimes occurs with the mantis or “praying insect.”

Merely mentioning the extreme case of Sphaerularia, in which the female is several thousand times as large as the male, I may surely be permitted to introduce the barnacle, since it is one of the creatures upon which Prof. Brooks lays considerable stress in the article to which I have referred. Not being myself a zoologist, I am only too happy to quote him. He says:

> Among the barnacles there are a few species the males and females of which differ remarkably. The female is an ordinary barnacle, with all the peculiarities of the group fully developed, while the male is a small parasite upon the body of the female, and is so different from the female of its own species, and from all ordinary barnacles, that no one would ever recognize in the adult male any affinity whatever to its closest allies.

The barnacle, or cirripede, is the creature which Mr. Darwin so long studied, and from which he learned so many lessons leading up to his grand generalizations. In a letter to Sir Charles Lyell, dated September 14, 1849, he recounts some of his discoveries while engaged in this study. Having learned that most cirripedes, but not all, were hermaphrodite, he remarks:

> The other day I got a curious case of a unisexual instead of hermaphrodite cirripede, in which the female had the common cirripedial character, and in two valves of her shell had two little pockets in each of which she kept a little husband. I do not know of any other case where a female invariably has two husbands. I have one still odder fact, common to several species, namely, that though they are hermaphrodite, they have small additional, or, as I call them, complemental males. One specimen, itself hermaphrodite, had no less than seven of these complemental males attached to it.

Prof. Brooks brings forward facts of this class to demonstrate that the male is the variable sex, while the female is comparatively stable. However much we may doubt his further conclusion that variability rather than supplementary procreative power was the primary purpose of the separate male principle, we must, it would seem, concede that variability and adaptability are the distinguishing characteristics of the male sex everywhere, as the transmitting power and permanence of type are those of the female. But this is a very different thing from saying that the female sex is incapable of progress, or that man is destined to develop indefinitely, leaving woman constantly farther and farther in the rear. Does the class of philosophers to which reference has been made look forward to a time when woman shall become as insignificant an object compared to man as the male spider is compared to the female? This would be the logical outcome of their argument if based upon the relative variability of the male sex.

We have now seen that, whether we contemplate the higher animals, among which male superiority prevails, or the lower forms, among which female superiority prevails, the argument from biology that the existing relations between the sexes in the human race are precisely what nature intended them to be, that they ought not to be disturbed and cannot be improved, leads, when carried to its logical conclusion, to a palpable absurdity. But have we, then, profited nothing by the thoughtful contemplation of the subject from these two points of view?

Those who rightly interpret the facts cannot avoid learning a most important lesson from each of these lines of inquiry. From the first the truth comes clearly forth that the relations of the sexes among the higher animals are widely abnormal, warped, and strained by a long line of curious influences, chiefly psychic, which are incident to the development of animal organisms under the competitive principle that prevails throughout nature. From the second comes now into full view the still more important truth with which we first set out, that the female sex is primary in point both of origin and of importance in the history and economy of organic life. And as life is the highest product of nature and human life the highest type of life, it follows that the grandest fact in nature is woman.

But we have learned even more than this, that which is certainly of more practical value. We have learned how to carry forward the progress of development so far advanced by the unconscious agencies of nature. Accepting evolution as we must, recognizing heredity as the distinctive attribute of the female sex, it becomes clear that it must be from the steady advance of woman rather than from the uncertain fluctuations of man that the sure and solid progress of the future is to come. The attempt to move the whole race forward by elevating only the sex that represents the principle of instability, has long enough been tried. The many cases of superior men the sons of superior mothers, coupled with the many more cases of degenerate sons of superior sires, have taught us over and over again that the way to civilize the race is to civilize woman. And now, thanks to science, we see why this is so.

Woman is the unchanging trunk of the great genealogic tree; while man, with all his vaunted superiority, is but a branch, a grafted scion, as it were, whose acquired qualities die with the individual, while those of woman are handed on to futurity. Woman is the race, and the race can be raised up only as she is raised up. There is no fixed rule by which Nature has intended that one sex should excel the other, any more than there is any fixed point beyond which either cannot further develop. Nature has no intentions, and evolution has no limits. True science teaches that the elevation of woman is the only sure road to the evolution of man.

Update Live interview with Dan Perrins now:

Dan Perrins has just completed a 75 mile walk from Hamilton, Ontario to Toronto in order to draw attention to two major men's mental health issues. The first is male suicide, which claims the life of eight Canadian men a day. This is an issue that has directly affected Dan. Today is the anniversary of his brother's death by suicide.

The other issue is that of Canada's governmental indifference to men who are experiencing abuse in intimate relationships. Earl Silverman tried for years to fight that fight with the Canadian government, with efforts to establish a funded shelter for male victims of DV. The government's reaction was silence. The reaction of the already established, feminist based, DV service industry in Canada was to mock and ridicule Mr. Silverman. His fight ended with his own suicide two years ago.

Dan has already delivered his demands at the footsteps of the Queen's Park Legislative Assembly, who at first refused to even accept his demands for review. After some discussion they reversed and accepted the documents.

Dan has vowed that he will remain on hunger strike at the assembly building, sleeping in the park across the street and spending daytime hours in the protest area in front of the building, until he gets a commitment in writing by the government to take action on his demands.

I will be interviewing Dan this evening and placing that interview in this article, unedited, once that is done.

I have instructed AVFM editorial staff that this notice will remain in the top featured spot on this website till this is over.

I also encourage all MHRAs, especially those in the Toronto area to contact local media and advise them that there is a hunger strike underway at their Legislative Assembly.

It is up to us to support Dan Perrins in any way possible. After walking 75 miles to bring attention to the issues we most care about, he did the unimaginable. He did not seek rest and comfort, but instead moved directly toward a hunger strike and sleeping in the rough.

AVFM will be tweeting this article, every eight hours, with updates, because every eight hours Ontario loses another, son, brother, father or husband while the Canadian government busies itself with any way it can to ignore the problem.

More to come.

If feminism were about equality, it would never fly

May 14, 2015 | by Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) | Link | Original Link

In the present talk we shall discuss the axiomatic counter-feminist equation that feminism equals female supremacism. It falls within the mandate of strict anti-feminism to expose the inner workings of feminism in as many ways as possible, and the present talk operates under that mandate.

So what is female supremacism? It is the moral conviction, openly stated or merely implied, that women are superior to men and that the ruling power in most areas of life ought to be a female power. This is a revolutionary idea because it overturns many things and modifies the details of life in a radical, far-reaching way – more than we have time to describe here .

The accomplished outcome of female supremacism would be a state of female supremacy. Female supremacism and female supremacy are therefore separate things: the former is the anticipation of the latter, and the latter is what the former would swing into practice in real world terms.

I would make bold statement that female supremacism as a system of social energy is objectively real; it EXISTS; it is out there in the world, ranging freely in one guise or another, covertly or overtly. I can attest from my observation that many people harbor this culture virus either strongly or weakly. I would further attest that it overlaps with "feminism" , and more than just a trifle.

It is formulaic to declare that feminism "seeks equality between men and women", and whether you consider that an honest assessment of feminism, it is the one most commonly invoked. Yes, you hear it all the time. It is what a lot of people want the world to believe that feminism is.

So, if you believe that feminism is "about equality", then you would naturally suppose feminism and female supremacism to be mutually exclusive. Yet counter-intuitive as it seems, nothing rules out their cohabitation in the same individual's mind. And why? Because "equality" is an essentially contested concept. The possible meanings of "equality" are so varied, so flexible, and so ambiguous that (given the right mental gymnastics) they can easily admit female supremacism in close moral proximity. That is especially true if the thinker does not expressly call supremacism by its correct name, or harbors the doctrine latently, as a logical result of unclear thinking in some other area.

Consider also, that feminism is a movement which advocates for women's interests; who would dispute this? And female supremacism, if you wish to call it a "movement", certainly does likewise; how could it possibly do otherwise?

Therefore, feminism and female supremacism converge upon the point of advocating for women's interests. The only difference is that female supremacism, unlike "equality", doesn't sound respectable. Most people would not openly admit to it, but still, for reasons we have suggested, cognitive dissonance can be rationalized. And such being given, the terrain of women's advocacy is left wide open as a zone of conjoined political effort.

So, feminism (arbitrarily defined as "sexual equality") and female supremacism may coexist in the same person's mind — and I have only lightly sketched how this might happen. But the next step up from the individual is the collective: what is true of the individual mind could as well be true of the group mind, for what is a group mind if not (among other things) the sum of individual minds composing it?

It is clear that both equalitarians and supremacists may converge upon the zone of women's advocacy—and that is a lot of overlap. And in the battle for feminism's soul, the question that occupies us above all, is to know which of these principles is constitutive of the feminist movement as a group mind.

Consider once again the uncertainty of the term equality, and its doubtful utility as a category of understanding. A movement built upon the "quest for equality" would be a house built on mud or shifting sand, or worse, a cloud-castle built on thin air. So-called equality, if it is to mean anything at all, must be operationalized; it depends entirely on what is being done, when it is being done, how it is being done, and where you set the zero in the equation. Equality is infinitely plastic in its applications; the goal-posts can always be shifted and the parameters can always be reassigned. It is inherently fickle and flakey.

Now consider the meaning of female supremacism. It is easy to wrap your mind around, and in practice it would offer no puzzling quirks or moral uncertainties. The guidelines would be coherent and crystal clear—reducible to whatever gives women the upper hand in a given situation. Consider also that supremacism in its naked form would be elemental and devoid of hypocrisy, because unburdened by the need to appear respectable.

So which of these two, sexual equality or female supremacism, would compose the stable foundation for a movement?

Clearly, female supremacism would be the winning ticket. And yet, female supremacism sounds nasty. It does not sound respectable, and any movement that openly endorsed it would have a public image problem.

By contrast, sexual equality is a flakey concept that means little if anything, and yet. . . it sounds noble. It sounds lofty. It sounds edifying. And most of all, it is so very unseemly to question it.

A movement built upon either female supremacism alone, or sexual equality alone, would not be practical. But if you roll them up together in the same joint (so to speak), then hey man, that'd be some righteous shit!

The so-called "quest for equality" would fizzle out very quickly if it were not animated by a malignant will. It would not be infinitely greedy; it would not "want it all"; it would be satisfied with a clear, definite list of things, after which it would roll up the tent and call it a day. And more, it is doubtful that such a movement would even get airborne at all when you consider, once again, what an unstable concept this "equality" really is.

Female supremacism, on the other hand, wants it all. It is a malignant will that will not quit, but keeps on coming back for more. It is able to stay the course; it is able to go the distance; it never sleeps and never takes a day off, and ultimately, it will leave no stone unturned! But again. . . it is not respectable.

Or at least, not if it walks around naked.

And that is why the rhetoric of equality is so very, very important: because it drapes the obscene flesh of female supremacism in a decent bathrobe.

So once more, both sexual equality and female supremacism advocate for women; that is where they converge into a conjoined political effort. And their relation is symbiotic. If plenty of feminists did not have supremacist motives, the movement as a whole would have no stable foundation, no cohesion, nothing to give it permanence, and finally it would lack a reliable engine. Yet if the rhetoric of equality were missing, female supremacism could never travel; it could never leave the house without getting arrested! Equality rhetoric not only veils female supremacism, but permits it to operate almost unhindered in a multitude of forms because equality as a concept is capable of unlimited shape-shifting.

Female supremacism and equality rhetoric: what a team! Neither the bathrobe nor the obscene flesh would log any mileage at all without the other.

So, is “equality” the soul of feminism? Or would that title go to female supremacism? Ask yourself, where does feminism get its real muscle? What is the true animating principle? Is feminism powered by any so-called quest for equality, and is such a thing even possible considering the vacuity of equality as a concept? Does the so-called quest for equality exist as anything more than a RHETORIC of equality? And finally, what does this RHETORIC of equality in fact serve? Does it serve actual “equality” (whatever that is)? Or does it in fact serve female supremacism? Please think about these questions.

An announcement from The Patriarchy regarding Aaron Clarey

Note: This article is also available in Spanish.

We are pleased to announce that the Grand Patriarch has made a decision regarding Aaron Clarey and the controversy over his comments on the feminist-inspired Mad Max film. The Grand Patriarch met with the Council of Patriarchal Overlords (the Lesser Council of Patriarchal Shitlords was excluded from this decision because, well, duh, they're shitlords) and has the following declaration to make to all MRAs, globally:

> Whereas Aaron Clarey is a man who writes on men's issues but does not consider himself an MRA; and
> Whereas Aaron Clarey is a man who likes women but does not like feminists whether they are women or men; and
> Whereas Aaron Clarey is entitled to his opinion on any subject, as are all humans;
> Therefore, the Grand Patriarch and the Council of Patriarchal Overlords declare that henceforth and forever more, all thoughts elucidated by Aaron Clarey are to be shared, without hesitation or reservation, by all MRAs everywhere until the end of time.

Thank you for your prompt attention to this matter.

You are required to subscribe to Aaron Clarey here.

Abby Dawson needs to eat her words

Abusive staff strike again on Kennesaw State University (KSU), this time through adviser Abby Dawson. Dawson threatened to call security on a student named Kevin Bruce, who was simply waiting to speak to someone.

[image]
Kevin Bruce shares his side of the story leading up to the confrontation.

> "[…] sitting there waiting until someone is available is harassing them."
> –Abby Dawson

Excuse me?

I don't know who Abby thinks she is, but her behavior is not conducive to a positive campus community. Thankfully, a Twitter and media conversation blew up largely in Kevin's defense, and once again we learned the value of taping confrontations. Kevin was smart enough to put Dawson on tape and expose her arrogant power trip, starting the hashtag #ItsBiggerThanKSU. Good on you, Kevin.

Once again we see University staff using unsubstantiated allegations of "harassment" to harass students in a fit of projection. I've gone through a similar nightmare from the Interdisciplinary Studies Department. KSU now more than ever needs to recognize that allegations of harassment can be a form of harassment in themselves.

KSU is investigating context surrounding Kevin's video, but I know from personal experience that KSU's Legal Division and Behavioral Response Team has the University's best interests in mind, not the students'. For that reason, I am sending an open invitation to Kevin and his friends to contact us and share his perspective. We will defend his standing as a student and presume his innocence until guilt of harassment is proven beyond a reasonable doubt. Considering that Dawson's idea of "harassment" involves sitting in a waiting room, I doubt that KSU can come up with a valid excuse to give Kevin any more trouble.

False allegations are becoming a pandemic on University campuses, and Abby Dawson was willing to throw a student she didn't like under the bus by lying to the authorities. This is enough to spark outrage, and students are not going to tolerate staff abuse for long.

We're tired, and we're ready to put a stop to this madness. Cross your fingers and hope that KSU does the right thing, because if they don't, then Zen Men will stage a demonstration to pressure KSU administration into acting with basic human decency. Speaking for myself, I would draw great pleasure from scrapping with Scrappy once more if it meant helping students hold corrupt faculty members accountable.

My two cents to Abby

Universities abuse their students too freely, and it’s time we fought back. KSU students, please remember to use your smartphones to record rude or otherwise corrupted staff to hold them accountable for bad behavior. Your camera is your best friend in the face of twisted government-funded organizations. Keep it ready at all times, because you do not know when nastiness will occur.

Also, Kevin, if you are reading this, exercise your FERPA rights by filing an open records request with the KSU Division of Legal Affairs. Ask for every email mentioning your name, particularly by Dean Michael Sansivero, the Behavioral Response Team, and all people involved in this investigation. You might not get some of the emails until the investigation concludes, but you can use those emails against KSU if they disrespect you further.

My best goes out to Kevin, and we at Zen Men will follow this investigation with great interest. Let’s see if KSU’s moral compass stays well-adjusted under pressure.

Keep Feminista Jones – and all Black feminists – out of the mainstream media

I knew it wouldn't be long before the Black Feminist Brigades would be weighing in on the recent brouhaha over putting Civil War heroine Harriet Tubman on the $20 bill, replacing US President Andrew Jackson. And, as always, Feminista Jones didn't disappoint.

Writing in the Washington Post yesterday, Ms. Jones makes the case that Tubman didn't play a pivotal role in the Underground Railroad freeing as many slaves as possible, to support good ole American capitalism – oh no – but to "subvert" it:

> "On one hand, replacing the face of Andrew Jackson – a man whose wealth was made on the backs of enslaved black people – with Tubman's image sounds like an idyllic reversal of fortune. But in examining Tubman's life, it's clear that putting her face on America's currency would undermine her legacy. By escaping slavery and helping many others do the same, Tubman became historic for essentially stealing "property." Her legacy is rooted in resisting the foundation of American capitalism. Tubman didn't respect America's economic system, so making her a symbol of it would be insulting."

But, upon closer inspection, the historical record shows that the late great Ms. Tubman was very much the savvy American businesswoman.

Wikipedia Is Your Friend, Feminista

Let's count the ways in which Harriet had no problems in the least with leveraging her life story to make a buck, shall we? Checking in with Wikipedia, it says the following about Ms. Tubman's financial situation:

> "Tubman's friends and supporters from the days of abolition, meanwhile, raised funds to support her. One admirer, Sarah Hopkins Bradford, wrote an authorized biography entitled Scenes in the Life of Harriet Tubman. The 132-page volume was published in 1869, and brought Tubman some US$1,200 in revenue. Criticized by modern biographers for its artistic license and highly subjective point of view, the book nevertheless remains an important source of information and perspective on Tubman's life. Bradford released another volume in 1886 called Harriet, the Moses of her People, which presented a less caustic view of slavery and the South. It, too, was published as a way to help alleviate Tubman's poverty."

Got that, folks? Tubman authorized a biography, twice, for the express purpose of making money – not exactly a ringing endorsement of striking a blow against good ole American capitalism, hmm? According to this calculator, $1200 USD in 1869 would be worth about $21,052.63 USD as of 2014.

Nice work if you can get it, right? Trust me, Feminista ain't making that kind of money for her book, I can promise you that.

But wait, there's more! Wikipedia also records the fact that Ms. Tubman was not above a good ole get rich quick scheme, involving gold at that:

> "Because of the debt she had accumulated (including delayed payment for her property in Auburn), Tubman fell prey in 1873 to a swindle involving gold transfer. Two men, one named Stevenson and the other John Thomas, claimed to have in their possession a cache of gold smuggled out of South Carolina. They offered this treasure – worth about US$5,000, they claimed – for US$2,000 in cash. They insisted that they knew a relative of Tubman's, and she took them into her home, where they stayed for several days. She knew that white people in the South had buried valuables when Union forces threatened the region, and also that black men were frequently assigned to digging duties. Thus the situation seemed plausible, and a combination of her financial woes and her good nature led her to go along with the plan. She borrowed the money from a wealthy friend named Anthony Shimer, and arranged to receive the gold late one night. Once the men had lured her into the woods, however, they attacked her and knocked her out with chloroform, then stole her purse and bound and gagged her. When she was found by her family, she was dazed and injured, and the money was gone."

Again, I ask the readers out there – does the above sound like someone who has taken a vow of poverty to make a statement about the wicked American money making machine? To ask the question, is to answer it.

The Real Reason Why Black Women Are Broke

Jones continues in her Bizarro-styled rant, with the following harangue about why she thinks Black American women are in dire financial straits:

> "American capitalism historically has been used to oppress and disenfranchise women and people of color. At various points in our nation's history, women were forbidden from owning property, married women were forbidden from working, and black women were restricted to jobs as cooks and maids. Even today, economic injustice continues in the form of unequal pay, limiting women's ability to reach their full economic potential. For every dollar a white man earns from his labor in the United States, white women earn 78 cents, black women earn 64 cents, and Hispanic women earn just 54 cents. This isn't a result of a lack of effort to rise up. Even with a college degree, black women earn less than white men without one. Single black women have a median net worth of just $100." (Last line bolded for emphasis by yours truly)

That's right Feminista – single Black women have a net worth that's in the toilet – and rightly so. Because the vast majority of single people, male and female alike, will never have as much net worth, equity and assets, as married people – and that, is the secret to success in America, as I've pointed out in my previous column, "Mo'Nique Proves That Diva Culture Is Ruinous To Black Women":

> "Speaking of economics, when topics like the one we're currently examining comes up, it is rarely done so with the bottom line in mind. However, when one considers the facts, it becomes clear just how fiscally ruinous certain cultural norms and behaviors actually are in Black American life, and accounts much more for the state of things there than anything "racist". For example, last week I made the case that a major reason Black women as a group have the lowest net worth of any group of American women, was due to the fact that they are the least partnered group of women – they have the lowest marital rate, the highest divorce rate, the highest rate of breakup and infidelity (both cheating and being cheated on) in relationships, and of course, the highest out-of-wedlock birthrates – and that this too, was due at least as much to the adherence to "diva culture" among Black women, than anything else. I stated a simple truth: that for most average Americans, a surefire way of upping your economic profile was to get married, stay married and work together with your spouse to build a better life. It's something that has worked, and continues to work, and if anyone knows this, it's the White feminists in our time who have successfully implanted the notion into the minds of millions of Black women that "they don't need no man". They've played a seriously cruel joke on their "sistas" – one that amounts to real dollars and cents lost on the ledger.
> And, as Mo'Nique's current situation aptly shows, it doesn't stop there. She has lost numerous opportunities to act in what would become highly acclaimed (and financially successful) films that could have put her onto yet another Oscar track. How much has those lost acting jobs cost her? Could it be to the tune of millions?
> You do the math."

Boom.

As to the idea that Black women couldn't own property back in the day, Harriet Tubman's own life proves such a notion a big fat lie, to say nothing of numerous examples of prosperous Black women businesswomen – my own grand mother was among them – throughout the previous century. Madame C.J. Walker is perhaps the best known but by no means was she alone. To attempt to suggest that Black women were somehow prevented from making money, owning and running businesses and the like, is to run roughshod over the simple historical record. To peddle this idea just beggars belief. This is the mind of Feminista Jones, y'all – and it ain't pretty.

Feminista Jones, Hypocrite Extraordinaire

It's always interesting to see Miseducated Negroes like Jones attempt to talk out of both sides of their mouths – bemoaning American capitalism and consumer culture on the one hand, while doing everything they can to reap the benefits of the same on the other. We see this on craven display by Jones herself, tweeted by her own ever-working fingers.

There she is, spending much of the past month globetrotting, topping off her tour in Abu Dhabi, capital of the United Arab Emirates – playground to the Rich & Famous, the Arnold Schwarzenegger of Capitalism.

While Women of Color toil away in the nooks and crannies of the Cultural Capital of the world in Dickensian fashion, tending to the hands, feet and eyebrows of New York City's Elite Ladies who really could use some feminist advocacy on their behalf, Ms. Jones flits around the globe, literally in the lap of luxury, tweeting at a rate of roughly a dozen an hour to dish on how palatial her lodgings are, how much she's drank with her newfound buds overseas and chopping it up with her feminists in arms in foreign lands. Car 54, Where Are You?

So, miss me with your fakin' the funk with a nasty dunk, crocodile-tear laden ode to keepin' it real on the economic tip, Feminista. You very much love the dough.

And so did Harriet.

Neither of you would be American, otherwise. If you really want to do something and make a difference, you can start right there in your own hometown, at a nailery near you.

In Summation

As feminists in general, and Negro ones in particular, continue to make themselves look an utter fool to say nothing of rank hypocrites, the mainstream media gonna learn, as Rolling Stone did, not to get so cuddly with these folks; doing so only degrades their brand and credibility among the reading public, at a time when trust in the media is at an all-time low, and when journalism is really taking it on the chin in a death-by-a-thousand-cuts fashion. I know that times have been hard for WaPo and Jeff Bezos has been trying to shake things up, but giving space to folk like Jones just ain't the ticket. All it does is prove to the public that they, along with the rest of the Cathedral, have truly jumped the shark – after all, we've gone, in less than half a century, from Woodward & Bernstein, to Feminista Jones.

Oh, how the mighty, have truly fallen.

Omelets, marriage and MGTOW

May 16, 2015 | by Andrew DiKaiomata | Link | Original Link

I make omelets my own way. By that, I mean exactly like you'd see in any cookbook. I whisk some eggs, melt some butter in a frying pan, pour the eggs in along with some cheese and maybe some other things for filling. What, you might ask, makes it my own way? The fact that it's me doing it.

I also go my own way to work in the morning. The highway and during rush hour with thousands of other people. Each of them also going their own way. Why do I say I'm going my own way to work? Simply because it's me doing it. Now you'd think that's hardly my own way. If I were to go my own way to work, you'd think it would mean in some way fundamentally different – and you'd be right.

Like men going their own way.

If you were to imagine going out on your own, on your own way, you might expect that would mean something like MGTOW, that you are free from outside control, not dependent on another's authority.

You might envision someone shrugging off society's yolk, refusing to self-sacrifice and being one's own boss. That's what MGTOW is, even though a man certainly has the right to place himself in danger, to sacrifice himself for another, and to support others, he chooses not to. He goes his own way, in his life, in his choices, he remains sovereign.

Marriage is dangerous for men, it's sacrificial and compels the man into support for his wife or ex-wife. In marriage, a man necessarily compromises, gives up sole control over his life and his property. As with the earliest known MGTOW groups "The Anti-Bardell Bachelor Band" it was acknowledged that MGTOW and marriage could not co-exist.

Now what about this concept of MGTOW simply meaning male self-determination? This is such a gross over-simplification as to completely change the concept. MGTOW can be better thought of as a second or third order male self-determination. That is, a man who is determined to maintain and preserve his self-determination and determined to refuse anything that might infringe on his future self-determinism.

For example, a man has the right, and could have his own self-determination to join the military, but joining the military greatly reduces a man's self-determination. A soldier cannot go his own way. After he is no longer under military obligation, he could be MGTOW, yet while active, he no longer has his autonomy, independence and sovereignty. In the same way, a married man cannot be MGTOW.

Hopefully, I've already addressed possible rebuttals. Yes, men ought to have the maximum amount of choices, autonomy, freedom and options. Yet, the movement is not simply a group of men making choices from options they have. That understanding would not be recognizable to hardly anyone professing to be MGTOW. I won't be appealing to the dictionary to say that MGTOW are by definition unmarried, but rather re-iterate that the philosophy and reason for existing preclude marriage, since MGTOW can be better understood as a second or third order self-determinism.

MGTOW is not simply about men making their own choices. It’s about making the choices that ensure further choices and maximum freedoms.

No man is under obligation to be MGTOW, but if you choose to sell yourself into government slavery (whether martial or marital), you are not MGTOW. If a man is married, he can be a great guy, he could live a great life, he could wake up sympathetic and with a desire to be MGTOW but he is not MGTOW. That’s how the movement understands itself, that’s what its philosophy prescribes and that’s simply what MGTOW is.

Can marriage be saved? Should it?

May 16, 2015 | by August Løvenskiolds | Link | Original Link

As MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way) I'm opposed to marriage for myself, and as MRA (Men's Rights Advocate) I'm opposed to how marriage and marriage laws are presently administered. I would not recommend marriage to any straight man – there are no benefits to men and many pitfalls.

I will never marry but as a hypothetical exercise AVFM editor Peter Wright and I have been discussing the question of whether marriage can be salvaged and reformed as an institution. As Peter noted in an article:

> Aside from those differences over origins, both sides agree that gynocentric marriage – its culture, customs, laws, taboos – must be utterly abandoned, not reformed. Notice here I refer to gynocentric marriage and not to a marriage of the minds, hearts, dreams, goals, projects, and bodies that might come with non-gynocentric relationships.

To understand the issues of marriage in the modern context, let's review the historical purpose of marriage and invent some new terms for the old and new forms of marriage as they now stand, just as "mail" became "junk mail", "email", "snail mail", "voicemail" and "spam."

These new terms, in rough historical order, are:

- Biomarriage – the first, pre-society pair bonds.
- Andromarriage – the legal codification of biomarriage that includes contractual obligations for both men and women.
- Phallomarriage – the religious co-option of andromarriage to serve the divine.
- Gynomarriage – the current version of andromarriage with no benefits or protections for men's interests.
- Egalmarriage – an egalitarian form of marriage we have yet to create.

I apologize to the reader for having to introduce so many new terms but to disentangle the fraught subject of marriage we need to be crystal clear on what types of marriage we are talking about.

In the beginning, before laws and large societies, there was biomarriage – biological marriage – a partnership, enduring or not, for producing, rearing and caring for the children of sexual unions. Yes, there were ancient adoptions but in human lore they end badly – that troublesome Moses kid didn't do his adoptive p's any favors. Even the elderly and infertile could still biologically marry to support an extended family or cement an alliance but for our purposes "biomarriage" suffices as a working concept.

We say that biomarriage is the basis of civilization for good reasons: biomarriages produce children, who produce grandchildren, who produce extended families, who produce clans, that produce villages, that produce towns, that produce cities and states, that produce nations, that produce empires, that conquer worlds.

Biomarriage has some distinctive gender roles based on biology: women bear and nurse children; men protect and provide for mothers and children. Single men and single women were less successful at producing viable offspring and so natural selection caused genes that encouraged biomarriage to become widespread compared to those genes that did not.

Strong men were better at fulfilling the obligations of being fathers and women who chose those strong men left more progeny, so men became bigger and stronger over time as their genes spread. This is why women hitting men is still seen as less serious than the reverse: she is testing his strength and endurance in the face of pain to gauge his ongoing suitability as a mating prospect. A man who hits a woman – even defensively hitting her back – is displaying a weak intolerance for self-control in the face of pain and society reviles him regardless of the viciousness of the provocation unless he takes on an impressive amount of damage first.

Men who selected women based on markers for fertility – youth, breasts, hips and swayback – also were more successful at reproduction. To the dismay of modern feminists, these mate selection preferences still dominate human coupling: women still swoon for strong, successful men and men still have standards for women's attractiveness. Weirdly, feminists still rigorously enforce the unequal violence standards that disadvantage weak men while they oppose beauty standards that equally disadvantage ugly women.

To maximize the effectiveness of biomarriage at producing viable offspring, over time, certain details of biomarriage were codified into religious and civil law, including: sexual fidelity (especially in women, to protect fatherhood), durability (to protect women and motherhood), and presumptive consent to sex (to maximize fertility and protect both father/mother from spurious rape allegations). This new form of marriage was androcentric – based primarily on the needs of men to guarantee fatherhood – so I'll call it "andromarriage."

These obligations were basic to andromarriage: break one and the andromarriage was destabilized, so harsh penalties, including death, were used to enforce those laws.

In times when the tribe with the biggest army wins, any threat to fertility threatened all the lives of the group. This point is important and we'll come back to it later.

With the rise of gynocentrism and leisure culture, the harsh penalties for violating the andromarriage laws began to erode – as our preferences for expanding the purview of women increased we became less willing to hold women to any standards or responsibilities. We now see women as lifelong children: too weak, frail, stupid and mercurial to be trusted with adult responsibility when it comes to adhering to the strict requirements of an andromarriage contract. Western countries now look on places that stone adulterers as barbaric even though we were killing them ourselves not that long ago. A woman stoned to death is a woman held to adult standards that feminists now reject.

When “No Fault” divorce arrived in my home state Texas in the early 1980’s andromarriage as a viable institution was dead and gone – I realized my desire for a pair bond was impossibly risky and pointless under the new law. My college sweetheart and I broke up. She took up with a married man; he divorced his (2nd) wife to marry her; they annulled their putative marriage 4 months later and her non-husband remarried his prior wife, who thus became his 2nd, 3rd and 4th wife depending on how one wishes to count their marital odyssey.

Modern marriage became a sick joke sustained by the inertia of fairy tales rather than a firm societal commitment to it. The only groups of any note promoting marriage were homosexual organizations who wanted the legal, psychological, and social validation of being eligible for it. I remember Texas singer/politician Kinky Friedman (and others) remarking once that if gays wanted the hell that is marriage, they were welcome to it.

The modern ideal of gynomarriage as “love” without consequences for women is bad enough – it ignores the former obligations of the andromarriage contract, the care of children, and the health (both mental and physical) of the couple. When combined with alimony, child support and domestic violence laws weighted against men, andromarriage became “gynomarriage” – gynocentric marriage – a legal cudgel for women to extract men’s wealth, protection and resources and give nothing – not even sex nor children – in return.

Now, if I were a religionist obsessed with sin and purity, I’d be tempted to reject marriage because of gay marriage: in the religionist way of thinking, the existence of homosexual marriage contaminates the holy ordinance of marriage with sin, and such affronts to purity must be forsworn. One might understand this religious perspective on marriage as “phallomarriage” – phallocentric marriage – marriage to please the divine order with the man as head-of-household and woman as his loyal helpmeet. Phallomarriage, like the andromarriage of old, uses punishments like prison, beatings and executions to enforce its edicts.

Phallomarriage is a crude attempt to turn back the clock and restore some features of andromarriage. It is based on outdated assumptions that are unworkable in the modern world.

I don’t see gay marriage as problematic at all – in fact, it has the potential to help rehabilitate straight biomarriage by destroying the gendered presumptions of marriage roles in both law and in the popular understanding of what marriage should be: egalitarian. I DO have a problem with trying to rehabilitate andromarriage, phallomarriage or gynomarriage – we live in an age of egalitarianism now (or at least, one that overwhelmingly, if superficially, presumes itself to want egalitarianism). There can be no going back; marriage can only evolve, not regress.

Can we craft a form of marriage – call it “egalmarriage” for “egalitarian marriage” – that can serve both human pair-bonding instincts and egalitarian sensibilities?

We no longer need the severe child-producing focus of biomarriage – the world population is such that we can and must de-emphasize procreation as a basis for marriage. 99% of the world's population could die overnight and biomarriage would still be unnecessary to human survival until about 99.99% of the population perishes – our fertility has been too successful and is now a threat to humanity through overpopulaton, pollution, disease, and the exhaustion of resources like food and water.

For egalmarriage to work, I believe we must rebalance the scales and limit the property and child custody rights women have in gynomarriage.

Specifically, eliminate "community property". A husband keeps what he earns – a wife would have no claim on half of his salary or retirement. Likewise, a wife keeps what she earns. The couple can negotiate for any shared monies but the presumption of sharing must be eliminated. Marriage would still have mild economic benefits for the couple – maintaining one home is generally cheaper than two – but a marriage windfall to one spouse at the expense of the other would be gone.

The reasoning for this is simple: equal systems are inherently unstable, they inevitably tip to one side. To stabilize egalmarriage, ironically, we must make it so unequal that both partners are encouraged to preserve it: the high-earning spouse feels that her earnings are safe and the low-earning spouse is motivated to please the high-earning spouse and negotiate value for those services.

To make it very simple: spouses must need each other in as many and extreme ways as possible for a marriage to work.

For example, a husband might wield economic power while the wife wields sexual and reproductive power. Such a relationship is stable as long as each maintains their power. If the husband loses his economic power, the wife leaves and if the woman neglects her sexual assets, the husband leaves.

Eliminating the "community property" concept restores full economic power to the husband (or wife), motivating his wife (or her husband) to hit the gym and master Cosmo's latest sex tips.

In a similar way, making child custody equal (with no child support transfer payments between the divorced couple, of course) after divorce will destabilize divorce (and thereby stabilize marriage): women will be less tempted to divorce when they know that there is no financial advantage to be gained from it. In this way, egalmarriage circles back the the stability of biomarriage but with a relaxed fertility standard: the hyperproduction of babies is no longer critical to egalmarriage. Couples might marry for companionship with children as an option rather than an expectation.

But should we do it?

Reforming marriage will never occur, as noted above. Perhaps a new form of marriage – egalmarriage – can be created in parallel to the current gynomarriage to eventually replace all versions of marriage 1.0, just as email and vmail are replacing snail mail. Perhaps many different types of marriage could be invented to address the needs of the polygamous, the polyamorous, the cosplayers and/or the bestiality crowd. (That's a joke, folks.)

I’m MGTOW. I’ve got no need or desire for any sort of marriage, nor will I live to see new forms of marriage come to pass. Still, I think it is an interesting thought experiment that helps us come to terms with the problems of marriage, whether men should engage in it, and where we can bury the corpse.

To be clear: I do not endorse any form of marriage. I do, however, have compassion for those men who have a suicidal desire to try it.

The most prestigious legal body in America is considering changing the Model Penal Code to criminalize holding your girlfriend's hand on a date

May 16, 2015 | by Pierce Harlan | Link | Original Link

The American Law Institute is the most important and most prestigious organization of legal scholars and prominent attorneys in the United States. The ALI drafts model laws that become statutes and Restatements of the Law that are widely cited as authority in judicial opinions.

Next week, the ALI is considering a proposed revision to the sexual assault provisions of the Model Penal Code that represents both a grotesque expansion of criminal law and an attempt to transform gender relations by punishing male conduct that has long been socially acceptable.

A group of very prominent legal scholars who have no political agenda are fighting back. They've written a stinging memorandum exposing the injustices in the proposed revision, That memorandum is set forth at the end of my post. I don't have the intellectual firepower to add anything to it, but a few items that jumped out:

The proposed revision to the Model Penal Code would turn a young man on a date into a criminal if he timidly reaches out to hold his date's hand without her prior positive agreement. (Because the proposed revision is written in gender neutral terms, theoretically, the young woman would be guilty if she initiated the contact, but in a society where gender roles are largely defined by pursuer and "hard to get," and where male complaints of sexual assault are hardly ever reported and even less likely to be believed, this proposed law is intended to punish, and change, traditional male behavior.)

The revised law would also require "prior positive agreement" — akin to the murky and unjust "affirmative consent" that's all the rage on college campuses. Passivity would not be a defense. By putting the burden on the male to prove that the female consented, the proposed law would compel the accused to waive his right not to testify.

The authors of the proposed revision acknowledge that the proposed revision does not comport with current social norms. The idea seems to be that by punishing men for behavior that is now socially acceptable, eventually, men will conform to the new norms. Social engineering, at the cost of hapless young men.

I'll quote one paragraph from the memo:

> As is well known, the criminal law has an unfortunate history of excessive punishment in the name of protecting women especially when issues of race are present. . . . Equal Rights Advocates, Inc., In Support of Petitioner (acknowledging the history of rape prosecutions as both racist and sexist and rejecting "the notion that destruction of men's lives served to protect and honor women"). As with other areas of criminal law, expanding the statutes in the ways set forth in > the draft would fall particularly hard on individuals of color who are represented disproportionally [sic] at each stage of the criminal justice system.

I've only scratched the surface — read the memo below.

MEMORANDUM

Date: May 12, 2015

From: Undersigned ALI Members and Advisers
To: ALI Director, Deputy Director, Project Reporters, Council and Members
Subject: Revisions to Sexual Assault Provisions of the Model Penal Code

Dear Colleagues:

As you are aware, the American Law Institute (ALI) has undertaken a review of the sexual assault provisions of the Model Penal Code. The undersigned members of ALI are concerned about the direction the project has taken. Although the drafts have generated little attention outside of the project itself and although the project has been criticized for late distribution of drafts (see e.g., ALI Reporter, Summer 2014 at 23), we hope that you will consider our concerns both before and during the upcoming Annual Meeting session on Tuesday, May 19 at 9:00 a.m. when Discussion Draft No. 2 dated April 28, 2015 will be considered.

If there is political consensus on anything in the United States today, it is the consensus that our government has overcriminalized and overincarcerated the American public. See, e.g., 2016 Candidates Are United in Call to Alter Justice System and Bipartisan Summit On Criminal Justice Reform.

In his message to the Bipartisan Summit, President Obama said that, "[T]here is an increasing realization that what we're doing is wrong." http://www.cut50.org/summit1.

The ABA also is actively working to reduce overcriminalization and you are aware that ALI itself is running a project to revise the Model Penal Code provisions on sentencing and to reduce the collateral consequences of criminal convictions. Earlier this year in Yates v. United States, No. 13-7451, Slip op. (U.S. February 25, 2015), http://www.supremecourt.gov/opinions/14pdf/13-7451_m64o.pdf, a decision in which all nine justices agreed that overcriminalization needs to be reined in, Justice Kagan wrote:

That brings to the surface the real issue: overcriminalization and excessive punishment in the U.S. Code…. §1519 is a bad law — too broad and undifferentiated, with too high maximum penalties, which give prosecutors too much leverage and sentencers too much discretion. And I'd go further: in those ways, §1519 is unfortunately not an outlier, but an emblem of a deeper pathology in the federal criminal code. (Id. at 18-19, dissenting on other grounds).

Against this political consensus and judicial backdrop, the current ALI draft is an extreme deviation, focused on expanding criminal sanctions for sexual behavior and expanding the problems cataloged by Justice Kagan.

Some of the flaws in the draft are described in comments already posted to the ALI website by Professor Abbe Smith, Professor Laird Kirkpatrick, Professor Kimberly Ferzan, George Liebmann, Guy Struve and others to which the undersigned invite your attention. Because of the length of the draft (250 single-spaced pages), this memorandum can only address a modest subset of the problems found in the draft as a whole.

To understand the draft, please consider a most common behavior in the following hypothetical: Person A and Person B are on a date and walking down the street. Person A, feeling romantically and sexually attracted, timidly reaches out to hold B's hand and feels a thrill as their hands touch. Person B does nothing, but six months later files a criminal complaint. Person A is guilty of "Criminal Sexual Contact" under proposed Section 213.6(3)(a).

How can this be? The draft explains:

Section 213.0(5) defines "sexual contact" expansively, to include any touching of any body part of another person, whether done by the actor or by the person touched. Any kind of contact may qualify; there are no limits on either the body part touched or the manner in which it is touched…. (Discussion Draft No. 2, Substantive Material, at 31).

The offense arises because Person A failed to obtain the draft's requisite prior "positive agreement" to the "sexual contact." Section 213.0(3). The draft repeatedly "makes clear that when a complainant's behavior has been passive—neither expressly inviting nor rebuking the defendant's sexual advances, that behavior cannot be considered sufficient to show affirmative permission." (Discussion Draft No. 2, Substantive Material, at 54) Person A's guilt is absolute because, "feeling romantically and sexually attracted" and feeling "a thrill as their hands touch," Person A has no defense against the accusation that the touch included the "purpose of sexual gratification… or sexual arousal." Section 213.0(5).

The draft purports to preserve mens rea as an element of the offense, but that is no comfort because it is proven with barely an effort from the prosecutor: "Person A, When walking down the street side by side with your date, you knew, or knew of the risk, that Person B had not expressed prior positive agreement that you could reach out and hold B's hand, didn't you? In fact, that's exactly why you were "timid" about it, right?" To avoid making the prosecutor's task so simple, Person A must not testify but, as shown below, Person A will have great need to testify because of the shifting of the evidentiary burden that is caused by the "positive agreement" standard. Note that Person A is still guilty even if they were both wearing gloves. Section 213.0(5) ("clothed or unclothed")

Consider the same couple, but now Person B responds to the criminal hand-holding by pausing to kiss Person A on the cheek. Person A remains guilty since there is no mechanism for retroactive consent, but now Person B is also guilty because Person A has not expressed prior positive agreement for this particular escalation. Under this scenario, the actions of both A and B would satisfy the elements of the offenses. Thus, they would be adjudicated as sex offenders, would be required in many states to register as such and would suffer the other collateral consequences of conviction for a sex offense.

At every stage of every physical relationship, the “perpetrator” is at risk with no safe harbor of any type. If the initiator got positive agreement “sufficient to show affirmative permission” (Discussion Draft No. 2, Substantive Material, at 54) to initiate a kiss, the initiator is still at risk because the accuser can always counter by asserting, “I didn’t say you could kiss me that way.” If the initiator got positive agreement “sufficient to show affirmative permission” and did the kiss the right way, the initiator is still at risk with the next identical kiss because, “I didn’t say you could kiss me twice.” The draft acknowledges that its standard “requires the fact finder to focus on the existence of consent regarding each of the disputed sex acts.” Id. and Section 213.0(3).

With passivity expressly disallowed as consent, the initiator quickly runs up a string of offenses with increasingly more severe penalties to be listed touch by touch and kiss by kiss in the criminal complaint. This sweeping standard would bring in countless individuals for conduct that heretofore has been innocent.

Objectors to the foregoing analysis might say that prosecution of these offenses and the other examples provided throughout this memorandum would surely be declined or dismissed, but that would require an assumption that every prosecutor, judge, and jury in the country would ignore the Black Letter Law endorsed by ALI. It would also ignore the real problems of strategic accusations that already plague divorce and child custody matters. An accusation can be devastating even when no prosecutor chooses to pick up the accusation in a formal indictment. The draft is devoid of concern for any of these matters despite such factors as the long recognized reason for the elimination of “heart balm” torts:

Those actions for interference with domestic relations which carry an accusation of sexual misbehavior—that is to say criminal conversation, seduction, and to some extent alienation of affections—have been peculiarly susceptible to abuse. . . it is notorious that they have afforded a fertile field for blackmail and extortion by means of manufactured suits in which the threat of publicity is used to force a settlement… and that no preventive purpose is served, since such torts seldom are committed with deliberate plan. (Prosser and Keeton, Torts (5th ed. 1984) sec.124, at 929).

There is also the long acknowledged problem of sexual defamation for political and other purposes. See, e.g., David Reisman, Democracy and Defamation, Fair Game and Fair Comment, 42 COLUM. L. REV. 1085, 1282 (1942). The draft here proposes to bring back the power of sexual accusation but this time as part of the criminal code and in a very expansive way.

The expansive definitions of the offenses also work to reshape the evidentiary burden when the prosecutor needs merely to say, “Ladies and Gentlemen of the jury, you must find for the prosecution because there has been no evidence presented to prove that prior positive agreement was obtained.” With guilt as the default outcome in the absence of evidence, the Defendant will be pressed to waive Fifth Amendment rights and testify, trying to cobble together recollections of subtle behaviors sufficient to create a reasonable doubt that, perhaps, “positive agreement” that is “sufficient to show affirmative permission" (not passivity) did occur. The lowered standards for what constitutes a crime become doubly worrisome when considered together with the uniquely restrictive rules of evidence that limit the presentation of defensive evidence only in sex crime trials.

None of this is inadvertent or the result of loose drafting. To the contrary, the intentionality of the draft is fully disclosed in the announcement that its purpose is to create very expansive statutes and standards with a "default position" of overcriminalization:

> [T]he appropriate default position clearly is to err in the direction of protecting individuals against unwanted sexual imposition. (Discussion Draft No. 2, Substantive Material, at 53).

> Of course, a legal standard requiring the affirmative expression of consent to sex will—inevitably—entail many false negatives, in the form of findings of unwillingness when in fact passionate desire was present. But the contrary standard now prevalent in American law will—just as inevitably—entail many false positives, assumptions of willingness and subsequent sexual intrusion when such intimacy was entirely unwanted. Section 213.2(2) reflects the judgment that the harms that arise under the latter standard present far greater reason for concern. (Id.).

The draft also expressly states that its intention is to equate silence with unwillingness and criminal victimization:

The argument has been made—and no doubt will be repeated—that equating silence with unwillingness, as Section 213.2(2) does, "patronizes" or "infantilizes" women, treating them as if they were incapable of expressing their own desires. (Id.).

The draft defends this rule by equating it to a doctor obtaining "informed consent" before performing surgery (Id.), but it does not acknowledge any of the differences between the risks of surgery and ordinary human contact. Most importantly, the claimed analogy fails to recognize that medical informed consent is a precaution chosen by the doctor as a safeguard against possible civil damages for malpractice, not as a required behavior to avoid criminal liability.

The draft also acknowledges that it is not reflecting any existing social norm or consensus about behavior that should be deemed so extreme as to warrant criminal sanction. Instead, it clearly states that its intention is to coerce conformity to its own choice of new norms for behavior:

> On the one hand, it is customary—at least for serious felonies—to reserve the social opprobrium and strong penalties of the criminal law for conduct that is universally condemned as intolerable. By this measure it would be acceptable, perhaps even obligatory, to define the sexual offenses quite narrowly, restricting them to clearly aberrational behavior and declining to attach penal sanctions to conduct that significant segments of our society regard as predictable, harmless, > or even valuable in some circumstances. On the other hand, a vitally important function of the criminal law is to identify and seek to deter behaviors that pose unjustifiable risks, even when those risks are not yet universally understood.... [The law] must often be called upon to help shape those norms by communicating effectively the conditions under which commonplace or seemingly innocuous behavior can be unacceptably abusive or dangerous. (Discussion Draft No. 2, General Commentary, at 11).

Beyond the draft's "positive agreement" problem, the draft's expansion of criminal liability includes many elevations in the seriousness of existing crimes and the creation of many new crimes between competent, consenting individuals. Among other offenses, the draft criminalizes conduct between professionals (mental health providers, lawyers, executives, etc.) and those under their supervision or in their care. Indeed, the relationship creates a per se rule, a conclusive presumption of criminality. The issues are complex, far more complex than the draft suggests.

For example, Section 213.4(2)(a) creates a per se felony if the actor "is engaged in providing professional treatment, assessment or counseling for a mental or emotional illness, symptom or condition," regardless of whether the provider is in a position that requires professional licensing, and engages in a sexual relationship "substantially contemporaneous" with the time of the treatment period. Likewise, Section 213.4(2)(b), creates a per se felony for criminal defense lawyers and for domestic relations lawyers who enter a sexual relationship with a client.

The draft asserts that existing licensing rules, ethical requirements, and civil liabilities are not sufficient to catch all of the cases that should be caught but, if so, the solution is not necessarily an expansion of criminal liability, and a substantial one at that. According to the draft's comments, there are approximately one million mental health providers in the United States, of whom about 20 percent (200,000) have become sexually active with a client at some point in their careers. Discussion Draft No. 2, Substantive Material, at 87.

In all of these cases, the draft creates a conclusive presumption that the relationship constitutes felonious sexual exploitation regardless of whether the relationship has continued through years of marriage, and regardless of whether the "victim" objects to any prosecution. The draft acknowledges that these new crimes, "are largely a new departure for American law" (Discussion Draft No. 2, Substantive Material, at 100) and worries that critics will say it "patronizes" or "infantilizes" its mandatory victims. Id. at 53. That worry is well placed.

Perhaps least well defined and very much subject to abuse is Section 213.4, Sexual Intercourse by Coercion, particularly Section 213.4(1)(a)(iii), which creates a third degree felony (ten years) where the actor "obtains that person's consent by threatening to take or withhold action in an official capacity, whether public or private, or cause another person to take or withhold action in an official capacity, whether public or private." The commentary acknowledges that extortion, criminal coercion, and other laws already exist to deal with such things as corrupt officials (Discussion Draft No. 2, Substantive Material, at 75-76), but the draft explicitly states its intent to create new sex crimes on top of the existing law. Id.

The draft has no de minimis threshold for a “threat” that is criminalized so long as the complainant claims that the “threat” was the cause of the consent to sexual intercourse, thereby nullifying the coerced consent. Section 213.4(1)(a)(iii). Suppose that Person A “threatens” to vote for the contestant not preferred by Person B, the sex partner of Person A, during the viewer voting phase of the television show “American Idol.” Six months later, Person B files a criminal complaint alleging that this “threat” was the means by which Person A “obtains consent” to sexual intercourse with Person B. Person A is guilty of a ten-year felony because of this “threat” to “cause another person [the recorder of “American Idol” votes] to take or withhold action in an official capacity, whether public or private.” Id. Yes, that is an absurd result but this model statute intended for promulgation to the states invites this result as well as many others that would work to overcriminalize and overincarcerate.

The draft states that it is difficult to distinguish “threats” from mere “offers” of a benefit to which the benefitted party is not entitled and, accordingly, the draft chooses to treat “offers” as the equivalent of “threats.” Id. at 77-80. Thus, an offer to vote in favor of your sex partner’s preferred “American Idol” contestant is also a third degree felony if the complainant later asserts that the offer was the cause of the consent to sexual intercourse. The draft candidly admits that it “represents a largely new direction for legislation in this area.” Id. at 75.

As this memorandum is being circulated, the U.S. Supreme Court, in Johnson v. United States, Docket No. 13-7120, argued April 20, 2015, has under consideration the question of whether the Armed Career Criminal Act so completely fails to articulate what conduct it punishes as to be unconstitutionally vague. See, e.g., http://www.washingtonpost.com/politics/courts_law/court-considers-limits-to-vagueness-in-statutes/2015/04/20/80bd39b2-e78a-11e4-9767-6276fc9b0ada_story.html. That statute is a model of clarity (and restraint) in comparison to proposed Section 213.4(1)(a)(iii).

In addition to creating new offenses, other offenses are elevated up to and including life imprisonment for “aggravating factors.” For example, Section 213.8 elevates rape to the level of first degree murder if the rape occurs in conjunction with a commercial sex act. Section 213.1(1)(b) elevates rape to the level of first degree murder if the rapist utilized a lookout. Many other elevations are found throughout the draft without any demonstration of need for even longer sentences in a prison system that is already over-burdened with geriatric prisoners. See, e.g., Jamie Fellner, Graying Prisoners, N.Y. TIMES, August 18, 2013. The multiplication and elevation of offenses also magnifies the problem identified in the quotation by Justice Kagan (above) about statutes that “give prosecutors too much leverage” and coerce pleas to lesser offenses. See also Jed S. Rakoff, Why Innocent People Plead Guilty, N.Y. REV. OF BOOKS, Nov. 20, 2014.

As is well known, the criminal law has an unfortunate history of excessive punishment in the name of protecting women especially when issues of race are present. See Coker v.

Georgia, 433 U.S. 584 (1977) (holding death penalty to be unconstitutionally excessive in case of rape of adult women); Brief Amici Curiae of the American Civil Liberties Union, the Center for Constitutional Rights, the National Organization for Women Legal Defense and Education Fund, the Women's Law Project, the Center for Women Policy Studies, the Women's Legal Defense Fund, and Equal Rights Advocates, Inc., In Support of Petitioner (acknowledging the history of rape prosecutions as both racist and sexist and rejecting "the notion that destruction of men's lives served to protect and honor women"). As with other areas of criminal law, expanding the statutes in the ways set forth in the draft would fall particularly hard on individuals of color who are represented disproportionally at each stage of the criminal justice system.

We invite the ALI Council and Members to thoroughly examine the proposed draft. At virtually every turn, the draft creates new sex crimes and elevates the punishment of existing sex crimes, with all of this occurring at the same time as the rest of the nation and ALI itself (in the Sentencing Project) have become united in recognition of the need to reduce overcriminalization and overincarceration.

The United States is "indisputably the world leader in locking up human beings behind bars." David Cole, Punitive Damage, N.Y. TIMES, May 18, 2014, at BR24. Even after the release from prison, the consequences of a conviction linger long and burdensome with approximately seven million currently on post-release supervision. See Lauren E. Glaze & Erinn J. Herberman, Correctional Populations in the United States, 2012, U.S. Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics, Dec. 19, 2013,http://www.bjs.gov/index.cfm?ty=pbdetail&iid=4843 and Too Many Laws, Too Many Prisoners: Never in the Civilized World Have So Many Been Locked Up for So Little, THE ECONOMIST, July 22, 2010, http://www.economist.com/node/16636027.

Federal and state data uniformly show that sexual assaults are decreasing. See, e.g., U.S. Department of Justice. National Crime Victimization Survey. 1993-2013,http://www.bjs.gov/index.cfm?ty=dcdetail&iid=245. Even the draft concedes that "victimization rates for sexual assault, like those for violent crime generally, have dropped significantly in recent decades." Preliminary Draft No. 4, Substantive Material, at 20.

The ALI should not be working so aggressively to create new crimes and to elevate the punishment of existing crimes. This is particularly the case where the draft's commentary does so little to show that the current law is inadequate and does so little to consider non-criminal options for less serious behavior where some would like to see a shift in social norms. Among other deficiencies, the current draft contains no acknowledgement of the ongoing ALI project to revise the Restatement on Intentional Torts to Persons which clearly can provide an adequate remedy for many concerns about sexual behavior. Further, the draft contains no analysis of its impact on convictions and imprisonment contrary to standard practice in most revisions of criminal offenses. Accordingly, ALI members are left with no idea of how many thousands or millions of new sex offenders are being created by the draft proposal.

We believe that the Sexual Assault Project needs a fundamental rethinking. While the Project is not strictly limited as would be the case with a proposed Restatement, we believe that the stunning expansion of criminalization proposed by the draft is unwise, unjust, and contrary to the national consensus regarding the need to reduce the already existing problem of overcriminalization and overincarceration.

We urge the ALI Council and members to become more fully involved because it will be you and your organization whose names will be on the final product. We hope that you will attend and speak at the Annual Meeting on May 19, 2015 and that you will submit comments on the draft. We hope that you share our concerns about the dramatic expansion of criminal liability contained in the current draft.

To facilitate communication with any interested member, we invite you to contact Chris at sa.mpc.revisionconcerns@gmail.com to allow efficient routing of inquiries to our group.

Note: This article is also available in Spanish.

Author's note: I am as relieved as anyone that the supersized kerfuffle between AVFM and some elements of the MGTOW community has at least for the time being lost its intensity. That being said, this writing is in no way intended as an insulting shot at the MGTOW community, even the fringe elements of that community which I would term as extremely ideological. That intention will be evident in the text that follows. That said, I will not respond to anyone who plays victim to this article by mischaracterizing it as an attack. PE

I recently received an email that was sent to both AVFM and to a prominent MGTOW online forum, regarding the assumed differences between MHRAs and MGTOW. In it, several questions were posed. The way the questions were framed indicated to me that the sender did not have a real horse in the race. His wording was for all appearances unbiased and his attitude genuinely in search of honest answers. He got cordial, fairly detailed responses from both parties.

There was more than one question, all of them cogent and deserving of answers. I will take one at time, answering them all in a series of pieces, hopefully returning the thoughtfulness of his query with commensurate effort on my part to answer in kind.

I do not have permission to reveal this individuals name, or copy verbatim the contents of his email, but I do state this with an open invitation to the writer to come to these comments and point out if I make any mistakes that might mislead readers.

I also note that the answer you see from me here is not verbatim what I sent back in the email. It is an edited and expanded response (for the sake of publication) of what I sent back to the writer, but it does not stray at all from the general intent of what I had to say. Again, the person who contacted me is welcome to appear here to either validate or contradict that as he sees fit.

Paraphrasing as accurately as possible, the MGTOW response asserted that one of the main differences between MGTOW and the MHRM was that MGTOWs did not spend their time negotiating for rights that they believe are inherently theirs for the taking. In other words, MGTOWs are not interested in making a deal with Massa for moving out of the cotton field and into a house job, which brings "better" treatment, clothing and food. Their aim is for leaving the plantation, not for a better position in running it.

This is a point, by the way, that has genuine merit, save the fact that the idea that this differentiates MGTOW from MRHM is ill-informed.

My response, now expanded, was as follows.

> This is was pretty good response to you with a couple of caveats. MHRAs do strongly believe that the best choice for men is to make informed decisions that are in their own best interest without depending on changing law or gaining societal approval to back them.
> Where your MGTOW responder failed, IMO, is that he does not understand that the greatest majority of MRAs don't see legislation as a way to solve their problems. Most of us, as do I, believe that asking government to fix your problems is a like asking feminists to end misandry. That is made apparent throughout our literature.
> Perhaps it is the simple use of the word "rights" that has thrown your responder off, or perhaps it is something else. But whatever prompted his perception it was not from our actions.
> The mainstay of what we do at AVFM is write scathing, inflammatory and often highly offensive commentary that mocks and ridicule misandrists of all flavors. It has literally sent millions of people to this site, many of whom explore what we have to say and why we say it in the way we do. This is how we call more attention to problems faced by men who have never heard an alternative worldview, thus leading more men toward MHRA/MGTOW ideals. For example, we publish commentary exposing the corruption of legislation like VAWA. We have no alternative bill to propose, and are not interested in developing one.
> We don't want a "Violence Against Men ACT," and a search of that term on AVFM will literally yield you nothing but contempt for the very idea of it. Similarly, we don't want an "Equal Pay Act" for men or anything else of that ilk.
> As you can see though our pages, we do no legislative lobbying, form no political action committees and endorse no political ideologies. We even eschew "left vs right" bickering in the comments precisely for the reasons I just outlined. It is pointless political "right chasing" in which we do not engage.
> When we do challenge government officials, we harbor no illusions of it bringing change in government. We even joke in the comments about not holding our breath waiting for answers. The reason for that is simple. We mock and challenge a small amount of government officials in order to humiliate and provoke their ill-considered reaction. When that happens we use their own words for even more fodder to pull readers.
> Our aim is not sweeping social or legal reform, but to fuck up and embarrass some really corrupt, misandric people. We then use the media attention to lead more men to MRA and indeed MGTOW.
> It does not take a surplus of brain power to figure out that AVFM is just one of many conduits for newcomers to find MGTOW, given the reality that they cannot stay here long at all without being exposed to those ideas in different places in the web.
> We do, however, get the occasional opportunity to help individual men by > advocating against a corrupt legal system. That is not the same thing as lobbying for laws. For instance in the Vladek Filler alleged rape case we were not only very helpful in his exoneration, but in getting the prosecutor who legally terrorized him sanctioned, and the office that let her go after him voted out on their asses.

> That was a huge plus, especially for Mr. Filler, and we are elated at the results. But a more informed eye can see that there was a larger goal in mind than one man's freedom.
> That case brought a lot of traffic here, and unless the laws of averages suspend at this URL, it means that forums and Youtube channels that run purely on MGTOW philosophy also enjoyed the benefits of that work.
> Personally, I embrace and advocate MGTOW philosophy, even if I was compelled to come to the conclusion that there are many high profile MGTOW advocates who simply don't understand what we do or why, thus the faulty ideas you were given in that email.
> I also urge anyone reading this to consider that the supposed division between MGTOW and the MHRM, which is evident in some MGTOW communities, could hardly be proven by the heavy population of men on this site who identify as MGTOW yet participate fully as MHRAs. It is just a guess, but my take on the matter is that the "rift" is just a reflection of any given groups need to individuate and separate. It is a part of establishing group identity, which is most cases a healthy thing to do. The relative measure of health is in how you do it. Make of that what you will from the record of it online."

There were more points brought up in the MGTOW response that I think were not quite hitting the nail on the head. In the days ahead I will cover all of them, even the questions that did not produce a MGTOW reply, one by one.

This is not for the sake of the MGTOW community outside of AVFM, though I wish them well and continued good effort. It is instead, for me, just an opportunity to take a reasonable inquiry from someone who cares about this subject and give them honest answers which may be of use to our MGTOW and MHRM readers.

Down the aisle again on the marriage question

Once again I find myself walking into the murky waters of marriage, this time not in real life but in print, praise angels. As mentioned in a recent article by August Løvenskiolds, we had a conversation about marriage which unearthed some alternative ways of looking at it. On several points our understanding aligned, and on others they diverged. So rather than rely on August's article alone, I'd like to lay down my own thoughts.

The conversation was partly stimulated by a comment I made elsewhere, which we decided to unpack – and I hope to unpack it further in this article:

> Aside from those differences over origins, both sides agree that gynocentric marriage – its culture, customs, laws, taboos – must be utterly abandoned, not reformed. Notice here I refer to gynocentric marriage and not to a marriage of the minds, hearts, dreams, goals, projects, and bodies that might come with non-gynocentric relationships.

The contention of this paragraph is, hypothetically speaking, that a marriage can be based on different priorities than those of gynocentrism. But before getting into it further lets start with the widest definition of marriage from the Oxford Dictionary, which is:

"any intimate association or union"

This definition covers pretty much all unions in which two or more things are brought together – whether in physics, biology, linguistics, or culture. In this case we are referring to human unions, and while some of the accompanying customs and behavior go well beyond this basic definition, they each conform to this minimum requirement in order to satisfy for the label marriage.
There are two main orders of human union to consider: one involving culturally prescribed marriage customs, vs. the unadorned biological demand for intimate association.

During our discussion, and in his recent article, August proposed several combinations of words (portmanteaus) to describe different kinds of marriage. For the sake of simplicity I'm only going to tackle the two primary terms which are Gynomarriage, and Biomarriage.

Gynomarriage

Gynomarriage, (portmanteau of gynocentrism + marriage) describes the typical union between a men and women today. It is based on the culturally prescribed roles of female superiority and male-chivalry, a combination more generally referred to as romantic love. This is our modern understanding of marriage.

[image]
During the time this marriage has existed, laws have evolved to buttress and enforce it, laws tilted almost exclusively to favor wives both during the marriage, and especially in the case of its downfall.

As a social construct gynomarriage has not been around forever, with other periods in history generating different forms of marriage as was outlined by August (eg. Andromarriage – male centered). During the last 800 years however, and ongoing today, gynomarriage has ruled; so that's what we'll concern ourselves with in this article. To better understand it, let's contrast it with another, far more important 'marriage' holding relevance today.

Biomarriage

Biomarriage (biology + marriage) is a very different idea involving not cultural constructs, but biological necessities built into our DNA. The 'marriage' urged by biology is based on three factors: sexual pleasure; intimate bonding/attachment; and reproduction with the concomitant parenting instinct (hence why both males and females are triggered by neoteny).

[image]Each of these imperatives has operated since our remote hominid past and will continue to compel our behavior for long after gynocentric culture ceases to exist. Like gynomarriage, biomarriage takes place between two adults, but in this case has done so for literally millions of years, not hundreds.

I'd like to spend the remainder of this piece talking about biomarriage because gynomarriage belongs, as any MGTOW or MHRA worth the name will tell you, in the scrap bin of history. People can easily get by without it, but the same cannot be said about biomarriage because the compulsion for human bonding, affection, and sex are far too powerful to ignore.

Some MGTOW will refuse to consider a biomarriage with a woman, a serious but otherwise rational choice to make in an environment that exposes men to being savaged by the in-creep of gynocentric exploitation.

If a man refuses the possibility of a non-gynocentric relationship with a woman, what is required are, at bare minimum, artificial avenues for expressing his biological compulsions. He can satisfy sexual needs with porn, imagination, prostitutes, fleshlights or fuck-buddies. He can satisfy his attachment needs at least partially with close friends, family, or perhaps with a pet. Likewise he can satisfy parental instincts via fathering the young among us — teaching school children, working in a daycare center, caring for the disabled, mentoring a fatherless child, coaching little league, looking after orphaned animals, or buying a puppy.

Are these replacement measures enough? Yes, they meet the minimum standard for maintaining physical and emotional stability. But it requires a strong understanding of one's biological needs, and awareness, and a willingness to work hard on meeting those needs. Rather than satisfying our biological needs via "an intimate association or union" we can use a bricolage of band-aids to ensure our biological and psychological health.

So while you may legitimately think you can reject, nay should reject gynomarriage, do not rush to reject the elements we have detailed under the heading biomarriage unless you want to risk your health, and life.

We need to realize that while history has been full of amazing men who never married and eschewed relationships with women, and no man should be shamed for taking this course, it also pays to remind men that choosing isolation from the opposite sex has a cost, and should not be viewed as something trivial to do to yourself. Depression, anxiety, paranoia, delusions, suicide, and more must be protected against. Most people can probably do it, but they'll need more than video games and YouTube in the long run to pull it off. It's going to involve things like meditation, consciously working to both acknowledge your urges, and to cater to them in creative ways.

We can employ alternatives to satisfy our biological urges, but we might also revisit the question of whether there's a way to conduct a biomarriage with a real flesh-n-blood human being minus the gynocentrism – think of it as a biofriendship based on the more essential facts of human being. I'd like to think that's possible, if not now then sometime in the future.

How S.E. Cupp, CNN and other media were duped by a hateblogger & his friends

Note: This article is also available in Spanish.

Hello. If you're arriving here for the first time from another source, let us start with the basics: there is no boycott of Mad Max Fury Road, or any Hollywood film, by Men's Rights Activists. The "boycott" is a completely fabricated story by a handful of elitists abusing their power in the media–and betraying their fellow journalists while doing it.

So let's get it clear: The story of the MRA boycott of the Hollywood film is false. If you believed it, you were sucked in by a liar. The question is, who's the source of the lie, and why were they lying?

The phony story of the MRA boycott seems to have started over the weekend, and has only picked up steam in the press in the following days, despite multiple people and organizations reaching out to inform the press that the story was false. It appears to have originated from a discredited hate-blogger named David Futrelle, well known for his racist and sexist remarks, as well as his historic child rape apologia.

Carolyn Cox and The Mary Sue have acknowledged the hate-blogger as their source, but have refused further comment on their fake story so far. So has Jenny Kutner of Salon, who appears to now have blocked anyone who asks her about the misreporting.

Jessica Goodman, an ideological feminist (we are told) also repeated the fake story on the Huffington Post. Most fascinating, after being informed that the story is fake, Goodman appears to have merely reworded her headline and clumsily edited her article, although the last we looked it was still contradicting itself and making claims verified to be factually false. Goodman has not apologized, retracted, nor clarified, and has refused comment when asked.

In the meantime, CNN and The Hollywood Reporter then astonishingly picked up the already publicly discredited story, and have since refused to comment despite multiple inquiries.

We begin to suspect that Loren O'Neill has betrayed at least one of her fellow CNN reporters, as the famed S.E. Cupp tweeted the now-debunked story, and when called out on it, denied responsibility and refused further comment when asked.

[image]

Let us be clear: any claim that Men's Rights Activists are in any way boycotting Mad Max: Fury Road is misreported at best. If any person in the media tells you of this purported boycott, you need to correct them, and if they refuse to acknowledge the correction, you need to complain to their editors. If they continue to repeat the lie, they are smearing and slandering innocent human rights activists. This is an abuse of power.

So far we've found this fake story metastasizing in multiple places. Matt Kamen and Dave Thier, and Anthony Furey have all run this unsubstantiated and totally debunked story. There is no MRA boycott, almost none of the people being quoted are MRAs, and perhaps most damning of all, none of these media sources chose to reach out to Men's Rights Activists to confirm the story or call anything in it into question.

I'm sorry, ladies and gentlemen, but this is a trust-shattering oversight at best for every one of these reporters–although I hasten to add that at least some of them can regain honor by simply apologizing and printing a clarification. If they care about the truth, they need to get a move on; even our friends in the Spanish-speaking world are picking up the bogus, already-discredited story, and repeating it. Examples include De Bruno Carmelo, Agencias, and 20 Minutos.

This is serious. The early creators of this bogus, debunked story are all running from the story and hiding from comment. Those of you who are in the press who were duped by your fellow journalists owe it to your readers, and your respective publications, to call these other reporters to task for misinforming the public. The mainstream media's reputation is the lowest it has ever been. Is it time, perhaps, for some of you to dig in and recommit to telling the full story to your readers, regardless of who is made unhappy?

And by the way, we are really serious with this question: was anyone paid to put this fake story in the press? If so, who was paid and who did the paying?

Watch for further updates as we see if anyone, at all, in the mainstream media has the guts to report that this story is phony.

Update: An earlier version of this story accused a New York Post writer of repeating the smear campaign, however, we appear to have misidentified him.

Time to end the fatuous shaming

May 18, 2015 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

I used the above feature image for a reason. Pam Grier, now 65, was a regular visitor (and I dare say near permanent resident) of my teenage masturbatory fantasies. Or, as I just informed a couple of fellow MHRAs in one of our Skype sessions, I did not see her movies as “blaxploitation” films. They were just two hours out of my life where the large bucket of popcorn sitting in my lap served two purposes.

Grier wasn’t just hot. She was smoldering, with enough natural heat to produce an alternative energy source for, say, the planet.

It causes me to wonder, though, just where Social Justice Worriers™, include among many of their ill-conceived and utterly moronic ideas the notion that some mysterious “male beauty standard” is out their poisoning the minds of women, causing destruction to their otherwise intact sense of self-esteem and even driving some to starve themselves to death trying to get skinny enough to feel attractive.

That standard, say many of the professional, toothless Worriers, is used to drive women to buy clothing, cosmetics and even surgery that they really don’t want. And of course we know the average woman had no investment at all in her physical attractiveness until COSMO and Redbook started publishing.

The men behind the curtain at those publications and others like it told all women they needed to look like Twiggy, and of course, women, being the mindless, servile creatures that they are, obeyed. Well, except for the huge number of women who are now more obese than at any time in human history.

Hint. Either go on a diet or start shopping for clothes at Omar the Tentmaker.
That is not a digression from the topic, as we now see popularized use in the Social Justice Worrier lexicon of terms like “fat shaming,” and “fat acceptance.” That is shorthand for learn to love coronary artery disease, diabetes and sexual rejection. Such trends — and the statistics — still stand in contrast to the assumption that we are shaming and manipulating women into becoming human stick figures.

Of course, the feminist solution is to take stupidly conceived problems and respond to them with even stupider proposed solutions, like “fat acceptance.”

I won’t bore you with an unneeded rehash on the science of human physical attraction (waist-to-hip ratio). For those interested, you can read a decent enough summary here:

http://www.livescience.com/7023-rules-attraction-game-love.html

Save the science for later, as it is scarcely useful in addressing feminist ideas, being just another artifact of patriarchal oppression.

For now, let’s stick with anecdotal reality. It is not any more useful to Feminist Worriers, since “anecdotal reality” still contains the word reality, but at least it can be demonstrated pictorially, which gives them a fighting chance at understanding. Please take note of the following images:

This is just a small handful of some of the most famous sex bombs in media history. As always, there will be some complaints from the peanut gallery. Why did you leave out Kate Upton? What about Selma Hayek? And where, for Pete's sake, is Apollonia?

Sorry, but write your own article. While all these non-imaged women score high on the scorch meter, I had the pleasure of personal choice here, even if some of my choices were bona fide femtard throwaways, e.g. Beyoncé. Even stupid can be hot, and some would be even hotter if they were too stupid to talk.

Now, that actually was a digression. Allow me to put the rails back on the track.

The point here is that throughout history, bigger, meatier more buxom and Rubenesque women have always captured the libido of a majority of men. As long as the proportions were even close to correct, and as long as the brain did not come addled with too much stupid, they resulted in perfectly acceptable sexual specimens.

Let's revert back to imagery for feminist readers:

Now, to the core of the issue, and with full disclosure. I am not fat shaming here. Truth is, I am 50 (probably closer to 60) pounds overweight myself. Fortunately I have learned how not to crawl under the bed and cry hysterically whenever someone mentions that I would be healthier if I lost weight.

First, even if I tried, I would not fit under the bed. Too damned fat for that. Second, it is a stupid, emotionally feeble response to hearing facts, thus the special tools provided in this article for feminists.

I type with my laptop, in my, uh, lap. I figure when I can no longer see the keyboard I will cut back on the linguine. Till then, I accept my extra weight, and don't give a flying tosh what the rest of the world thinks about it.

I am here, however, to do some stupid shaming. Like stupid to the level that people reach when they decide that what you are sexually attracted to is a political choice, not a biological one. These are people who think there is something wrong with you if cellulite and triple chins don't give you a boner.

[image]
"Nice body!" said Joseph Goebbels
No matter how hard you try, you can't push people in that kind of direction. Take the once super, super, SUPER model Twiggy as an example.

She was becoming huge (in terms of popularity) about the time I started figuring out what to do with a hard on in the bathroom, but I never rubbed one out thinking about her.

Why? Because Twiggy was not a woman. She was a coat hanger who occasionally had a piece of lettuce and a sip of water. They put millions into pushing her image. She was still less sexy than a number two pencil and far less useful.

The point here is that no one, not even with the help of attraction theory research, can dictate what anyone will be attracted to. Ask any cab driver trying to date a female surgeon, even one that looks like Jacklyn Friedman.

Some men really are turned on by very large women. Some are indeed turned on by women who look like they spent the summer in a concentration camp. To each his own, as they say, and there is not a person on earth who can rightfully judge it.

Just as true is the fact that no matter what you do, you can't make someone attracted to things that repulse them. If you don't like your body, then change it. If you weigh "too much" lose weight. If you don't weigh "enough" put some on. For for the freaking love of god quit trying to infect the world with the infantile idea that you have a right to turn them on. You don't. The entire planet has a right to throw up in their mouth a little at the very sight of you.

Oh, and if you really want to know the source of all the fembot outrage at hot bodies, I can offer the precise answer to that, pictorially.

Mad Max: MLK Blvd

May 19, 2015 | by Mumia Ali | Link | Original Link

"I'm just here for the gasoline."
-Mad Max

It's been observed that the movies that generate the most buzz are usually the ones that tend to be the more successful of the lot, and this year's "Mad Max: Fury Road" is no exception. It's been three decades since a Mad Max film has hit the silver screen, and this time around the titular character, played by Tom Hardy, shares significant screen time with "Imperator Furiosa", portrayed by native South African blonde bombshell Charlize Theron. The "Imperator" strikes me as an older, post-apocalyptic Tank Girl type – you know what I mean, gals who can kick copious amounts of male butt this way and that. Just like the guys.

This was the main point Return of Kings contributor and Youtube personality Aaron Clarey, aka Captain Capitalism, makes in his recent column on the matter; he argues that the Mad Max franchise, which was originally about a lone law man trying to uphold what little law is left in a barren dystopic wasteland, has now fallen prey to the PC police, too – and urges all red-blooded, right thinking men everywhere, to boycott the movie.

Clarey's article, struck a very tender nerve in the Cathedral Media – it quickly gained traction and was soon being bemoaned by feminists left, right and center, as yet another example of the banality (and, of course, misogyny) of the Men's Rights Crowd, even though Mr. Clarey doesn't identify as an MRA and in fact, like ROK's proprietor RooshV himself, has had some choice words for the androcentric activists. Nevertheless, Clarey has put himself squarely into the crosshairs of the Social Justice Warriors, who seem to be out for blood.

What else is new?

I honestly don't see what the big deal was about Clarey's remarks; I mean, is it really that big a state secret that Hollywood has been about "messaging" of varying stripes, like, forever? To me, "Furiosa" has antecedents in the Sci-Fi genre going back to at least 1979's Ellen Ripley in "Alien", and both Sir Ridley Scott and James Cameron went on record in stating they specifically wanted to feature a "kickass" lady leading the franchise, as a direct statement on the feminism of the era. Cameron also directed The Terminator, which made Linda Hamilton's shrinking violet of a character in the first film, into a ripped one-chick army in the sequel, Terminator: Judgment Day. Since then, "powerful females" have featured prominently in one form or another , in just about every Terminator sequel since. Even more to the point, the last Mad Max film, "Beyond Thunderdome", had the Mel Gibson-version Max playing opposite the Amazonian leader of Bartertown, the shrewdly intelligent and gutsy Aunty Entity, portrayed by the immortal Tina Turner.

So, this notion that Clarey shines a spotlight on, that Hollywood has been a dissimentator of feminist ideas, if not agendas, is by no means anything new.

Nor is “messaging” by Hollywood and the rest of the entertainment machine in any way limited to White Girls Kicking Butt – as a Black man, I deeply appreciated the messaging of such films as “To Sir, With Love”, “Guess Who’s Coming To Dinner?” and “In The Heat Of The Night”, all starring Sir Sidney Poitier, showing that African Americans could be graceful under pressure and in the face of often unremitting and dehumanizing bigotry and hatred.

Nevertheless, critics of the messaging machine that is PC-addled Hollywood have made a legitimate point, too: that there can be seriously unintended consequences by fiddling around with the boundaries of where reality ends and fantasy begins, and vice-versa.

It may be an old saw at this point, but the simple truth of it is that I done lost count as to how many younger brothers honestly think they’re going to be the next Tony Montana or Nino Brown – the point that both of these men were tragic figures is utterly lost on this crowd, who look up to both as characters to emulate and lionize, not to pity and avoid.

So too, have I seen quite a few ladies, in my neck of the American woods, who honestly think they have a bit of Sarah Connor, Ellen Ripley or Imperator Furiosa in them.

And that’s when reality comes crashing in.

The problem I have with this current tempest in a teapot isn’t that Clarey doesn’t have a point – he obviously does – but with what I’ve been observing for quite some time about these kinds of “discussions” in the larger (read: whiter) culture: no disrespect to my white readers, but honestly, from my vantage point here in Black America, it feels like a lot of the issues that are argued about along sexual politics lines among white folks feels very arid and academic, abstract in a way that seems remote to me. Take, for example, this very discussion about Mad Max – a film about how society’s institutions and orderly functions have utterly collapsed, and how one guy is trying to hold what little society there is left together. Add to that the notion that there are women who think they can hold their own against maurading bandits of the most blood-thirsty types, and to my mind, the film should have been called “Mad Max: MLK Blvd”, because that is the reality of modern-day, inner city/urban Black America.

Indeed, word on the wires is that acclaimed director Spike Lee is working on a film to be called “Chiraq” – which is what black Chicagoan’s call their hometown, implying that it has become a war zone (with more dead than all the US military casualties in Afghanistan – think on that for a moment). Lee’s most recent effort was the recounting of the Hurricane Katrina disaster, where the world caught a glimpse of societal order breaking down and total anarchy reigning in New Orleans.

Whether it be due to acts of God or gradual societal decay, the point is that modern-day Black America definitely has a dystopian feel to it – Baltimore, the setting of the fictional series “The Wire” can be included here as well. Mad Max could feel at home in any of these settings – the only difference being, that the cast, in the main, would be Black.

And in these enviroments – as we saw recently with Baltimore Baby Mama of The Year, Ms. Toya Graham – there really IS a meme out there among Black women that holds that they can be just as kick-butt as any Black man. Spend a bit of time watching YouTube (I highly recommend in particular, Tommy Sotomayor's "Beastie Channel" and Colin Flaherty's "White Girl Bleed A Lot" channel) along with any random sampling of World Star Hip Hop to see the mind-numbing evidence for yourself: feral girls, women and even elderly birds, tearing into each other and the occasional guy with abandon. I say "occasional" because for the most part, when a Black woman steps to a Black man, the results are almost always bone-crushingly brutal for the Sista in question – as the infamous uppercut-throwing bus driver incident out in Cleveland, OH, clearly showed.

I have always argued that modern-day Black America, which is a de facto and increasingly becoming a de jure Matriarchy – as Baltimore demonstrates – is indeed the culmination of half a century's worth of "messaging" on the part of white feminists and their allies in the academia, media and yes, entertainment industries, along with law makers and the like. All of the major goals that white feminists have fought for, can be seen in extremis in Black America today – and it is not at all pretty. Every weekday at 3pm, is like experiencing Dawn of the Planet of the Park Apes all over again, as the feral spawn of Baby Mamas like Toya Graham, are unleashed onto what is left of civil Black society (read: when public schools let out) and all Hell breaks loose in Black American streets. Hordes of such kids are right in the middle of the streets, fighting up a storm – almost always girls – to the point where it takes a combined effort by school and city cops, NTAs and teachers, to reign the anarchy in.

Which usually fails.

And that brings us round robin as to why I do what I do – because I think it is important for the world to see, the realities of A Woman's Nation on the ground. And that would mean, Black America. All of the lofty ideals, take a pernicious turn there, with scores of its denizens paying a powerful price. As I've said before, and it bears repeating now, ANYWHERE you see Baby Mamaism, which is the daughter of White Feminism, reigning in a society, there too shall you find pestilence, anarchy, dysfunction, violence, filth and Big Man Breeding (the current Mad Max film centers on the five-lady harem of Immortan Joe, the major villian). It may be a bit too "racist" for my colleague Clarey or indeed, anyone else in the largely White Manosphere to say, but I have no problem in the least saying that inner-city, urban Black America has truly devolved into a Law of the Jungle – again, as Baltimore has recently shown us.

I guess that's why I've always been such a huge fan of Sci-Fi, particularly of the dystopian variety, like Mad Max or Robocop or Judge Dredd – because I could relate to the themes these films portray onscreen; after all, they weren't that far off from my day to day reality as a Black man trying to hold it together in an increasingly falling apart Black America. While my white colleagues continue to do battle with largely white detractors on the (white) feminist side of the aisle, I must continue to deal with the in-your-face reality of anarchy that white feminist agendas have wrought on me and mine.

"Mad Max", c'est moi.

An Open Letter to Dr. Daniel Papp

May 19, 2015 | by Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) | Link | Original Link

---

Dr. Daniel Papp graduated Dartmouth College with a bachelor's degree in International Affairs in 1969, and then a Ph.D. in the same field from the University of Miami in 1973. He now serves as the President of Kennesaw State University (KSU).

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=65ZUl4bIBD8

Dr. Papp,

You are no doubt aware of Abby Dawson's conduct towards Kevin Bruce, and the surrounding controversy now branded with the hashtag #ItsBiggerThanKSU. As someone who has experienced similar treatment by faculty members, I find it is necessary to voice my disappointment with Kennesaw State University.

Between the experiences of Kevin Bruce, myself, and other students who experienced hardships with faculty, it appears that KSU is not responsive to student interests unless it improves their image.

After being unjustly accused of harassment for writing a single email to a professor, and then watching Abby Dawson bully Kevin Bruce, I closed my eyes and wished more than anything else that KSU would learn that a harassment accusation can itself be a form of harassment. Threatening to call the police on a student is a means of abusing that student. Your students need to trust that KSU will care about their ability to peacefully pursue academic achievement. and they can't do that so long as bullies on campus can use a dial pad as a weapon with impunity.

We don't deserve to live in real fear of the cops and lawyers that watch over this campus because a few faculty members decide to live in fake fear of students.

Zen Men is now publicly encouraging students to videotape every confrontation with faculty members within parameters deemed reasonable by applicable laws. As the hashtag states, this is bigger than KSU, and it's certainly bigger than poor advising. Please understand that more reckless accusations by faculty make KSU look worse, if not totally negligent. We need to hold more staff members accountable for their behavior, and we are willing to resist threats to our well-being.

Your students prepared a list of demands based on this sentiment:

Demands released by disgruntled KSU students
The list goes in the right direction, but it is missing an item that I would like to propose: Draft a new policy establishing when one can call campus security in a non-emergency. One grows tired of watching people run to the cops instead of solving their own problems with discussion and cooperation. We need to make it harder to call the cops over non-issues, especially if an accused student does not behave in a way that warrants police intervention.

I volunteered to release all of documentation in my possession surrounding KSU to the media, and I have asked the staff of A Voice for Men to republish some old articles demonstrating flaws in KSU's programs and procedures. I ask the public to watch KSU's response carefully, because we don't want any more hand-waving when discussing our education.

Anyone can call KSU police with any complaint, and with easy access comes easy misuse. We should not have to ask, but please exercise your executive powers to prevent faculty from unjustly intimidating students with unwarranted threats of police intervention.

I would applaud KSU's decision to place Dawson on administrative leave, but given my own experience with abusive faculty and a corresponding lack of closure, is hard to know if KSU is fully sincere in its commitment to the students in assisting Kevin Bruce. We only want KSU to respect its students, and there is no respect where faculty will gleefully initiate force by proxy on a hair-trigger.

Disciplining Dawson is not enough. You still have other faculty who behave in this same manner, so we need you to take proactive measures to end further abuse of police resources and counteract the developing culture of fear, animosity and presumption poisoning our campus. Knowing that the student body is now mobilizing, it is my hope that you and all under you govern yourselves not just according to policy, but also to context.

KSU is trying to evolve beyond its reputation as a commuter school as one of the nations 50 largest universities in the United States, but over the past couple of years it has fallen under controversy for the sole reason that manipulative bullies are on payroll. The fact that Kevin Bruce faced Dawson under the circumstances is bad enough, but similar situations happened before, and does not bode well for our trust in KSU.

I ask, as one of your students, to lead us into the future of education away from this dystopian nightmare.

Sincerely,

Sage Gerard

Mad Max Fury Road: A real Men's Rights Activist's review

May 19, 2015 | by Redd Fields | Link | Original Link

Note: This article is also available in Spanish.

So as I was watching this film I came to two conclusions. First Aaron Clarey at Return of Kings (once again we note, Clarey is not an MRA and Return of Kings is a noted anti-MRA site–eds) didn't watch the film before he blasted it. Secondly, this is NOT a feminist film.

This film starts with Mad Max being chased down, beaten and shaved, tattooed like an animal, and turned into a living blood bank. Every single person in this society but the leaders are treated as property and animals. In the post apocalyptic world the ladies with large girth and buxom breasts are treated literally as cows. They are milked. The beautiful women are treated as "breeders" and are the subject of the main villain Immortan Joe's desires and the reason for this 2 hour car chase. Lets be clear here, this is NOT a misogynistic society. They do not hate or have disdain for women in this society, women are treated as objects and are insanely valuable. Abuse isn't always misogynistic.

In contrast men are valued for two things, either hard labor grunts, or warriors expected to sacrifice themselves spray painted on the face with silver paint awaiting their rebirth in a post apocalyptic Valhalla. Both main roles for men are as disposable objects–with the exception of the "blood bags." They either live their lives working themselves to death, or die on the road in a futile attempt for redemption in hopes their miserable existence will give them a glorious second life in paradise. Make no mistake, this film highlights misandry, not misogyny in society. Ironically, it seems, George Miller did this on accident in his attempt to make a supposed "feminist" film.

Back to Max. With his back freshly tattooed and hanging from a bird styled cage having his blood drained for Nux's benefit, Furiosa leaves to fill her tanker with gasoline. With her "breeder" cargo secretly stowed away in the tanker she soon veers off the road to the refinery and sets in motion the most epic car chase ever captured on film. With her treachery exposed Immortan Joe races to his harem locked in a chamber behind a vault door to find it emptied of his prized "breeders." Littered throughout the chamber are messages like "Our babies will not be warlords" and "we are not objects" written in white paint. These women are pissed, and rightfully so.

With that, the chase is on. A very weak Nux vies for the top spot in the chase strapping his "blood bag" Max to the front of his car with a direct IV feeding into his arm. Max is valued for his O negative blood, a prized commodity, with Nux being expected to literally suicide himself for the greater good. What ensues is nothing short of remarkable. Decked out steampunk styled cars pile up one after an other in an amazing car chase that includes, I kid you not, a car with a live musician on the roof playing guitar in front of about a dozen speakers. Normally this wouldn't work but Miller sells this cartoonish monstrosity with ease. Absolutely wonderful addition to the film. Max eventually escapes his plight on the front of his car during a sandstorm and ends up on Furiosa's truck in her mad rush for the "Green Place" and the "Good Mothers." By the time they find the "Good Mothers" Nux has switched sides as he falls for one of the "breeders." Human nature prevails in this film, and when given the chance the two main male characters of Nux and Max both fall into their hyper-masculinized characteristics of the male protective instincts.

Here's where Miller's supposed feminist vision falls to absolute pieces. This matriarchy of the Good Mothers have been getting raided by many parties looking for women and resources, and they have killed every single man they could in their paranoia irrespective of their character or intentions. #killallmen anyone? In their absolute paranoia they have failed to increase their numbers by procreation (every man they see they kill on sight), and failed to secure any male protection making them incredibly vulnerable. Now feminists will contend they do just fine, but when Furiosa is surprised to not see dozens of women, if not hundreds, we come to one inevitable conclusion. True matriarchies either destroy themselves, or are subject to the whims of conquerors. Either way, like this feminist utopia, true matriarchies die due to their own paranoid delusions. This single scene does more to hurt feminism and its goals of matriarchal domination than any scene in the history of cinema. This all from a supposedly feminist film.

The entire crew turns around and heads back to liberate the now undefended citadel, and restore hope to the people starving and dying of thirst. This is a wonderful film about restoring justice to the downtrodden and oppressed. This is a film about the humanity of both genders, the desire for love and compassion. This is a film about the deposition of tyrants and the liberation of the hopeless.

The landscapes are breathtaking. The filmmaking is second to none. Despite being the purest action film I've ever seen, and I'm a total film junkie, the characters are fully flushed out. Character development isn't lacking; these people seem real. This is exactly like a Michael Bay film should be but aren't. This film celebrates masculinity, it celebrates femininity.

This isn't a feminist film. This is a humanist film.

George Miller may have created one of a long line of films that ultimately bring the human race together instead of tearing it apart, despite Eve Ensler's best efforts.

4/4 Stars.

WTF is the deal with Emma Sulkowicz & #FakeRape?

We do not know who these people are though we have our suspicions and all we can say is we seriously wish them well. Except they may be too kind to Emma Sulcowicz, and they don't seem to have saved energy for the scumbags who made her famous. We suggest posters for them as well.

We also salute Mundane Matt for being the first serious news source we've seen, so far, that's covered the ridiculous nonexistent MRA boycott correctly.

Amanda McCracken: virgin, chameleon or just plain phoney?

May 20, 2015 | by Jim Muldoon | Link | Original Link

This is a strange old world, and with some 7 billion human being running around at the same time, I guess that there really will be all kinds of people with strange beliefs and behaviours. However, while many things are possible, there are some stories that just send the bull'o'meter well past 11 on the scale of 1-10.

Amanda McCracken tells such a tall tale for Al-Jazeera America. The piece is called "Are we entitled to sex?" with a subtitle of "My celibacy put me in the crosshairs of men's rights activists and feminists alike".

Personally, I have always insisted on completing the feminist refrain of "her body, her choice," with "her problem," and I certainly view McCracken's celibacy as being her own business (and please, no jokes about renaming her Amanda "Won't Fill" McCracken).

However, the question is about entitlement to sex. McCracken is certainly entitled to her celibacy. But, if she wants to end it, surely she needs the willing, enthusiastic, signed by three lawyers, consent from her prospective paramour. I know it's not real consent, because nothing ever is for feminists, but surely the guy gets some say, doesn't he?

She insists this decision to keep her lady gap unfilled is controversial. In fact, according to her own website, she has had several essays published by mainstream outlets, and all of them have one topic: her virginity. It seems she has made a dogged attempt to ensure it's controversial. The reason she gives for this OMG choice is that it was based on her "religious principles". It is this phrase, as I read her drivel, that keeps coming up like reflux after sixteen pickled eggs.

And let me say this before I go any further: this is not an attack on truly religious people. Many good folks live quietly by a faith which requires them to stick by certain principles. For the most part they abide by such rules. Where they might fail, it is usually because they are human, and not because they are hypocrites. And they have every right to pursue those goals for themselves.

But McCracken seems to lack the many traits that normally come with such good, honest, decent people.

There are men and women who do remain celibate on religious grounds. But, celibacy is only ever a part of that picture. Usually it means that their selection criteria is limited to those who are similarly serious about that particular religion and want to raise their children according to their faith. Typically there are many do's and don'ts that they abide by, and they require those same rules to be paramount for their prospective partner. "No sex before saying I do" is only one of them.

Another feature of the devout is that they talk like the devout. They tend to couch their rationale in reference to their deities, spiritual leaders and holy books. In another article,

When True Love Keeps Waiting, in Christianity Today, McCracken tells the Christian Women, Cultural Comment section that she is 37 and still hanging in there on a commitment she made at her local church at age 15 by taking the "True Love Waits" vow. So, we can deduce that McCracken's purported faith is Christian at least.

But, in Aljazeera America, there is no talk of the teachings of Jesus, any of her Pastor's services, or any particular section of the Bible. McCracken instead refers to Science. She informs us that women "release higher levels of the relationship bonding neurochemical oxytocin than men during sexual activity." (Ironically, or stupidly if you prefer, she tries to make a point about relationships whilst linking to a study about chemicals released during masturbation.)

Now, oxytocin is associated with uterus contractions during labour and breastfeeding, and helps the mother bond with the child, so perhaps it's not so surprising that women have more of it. But what is the issue, here? Is the man of her dreams required to share her "spiritually sacred" beliefs, or does he just need a jar of oxytocin in his pocket?

McCracken then talks about an article that she wrote for the New York Times called "Does my virginity have a shelf life?" We'll come back to the contents of this later, but for now let's just consider the responses to this article that lead her to conclude that:

"Feminists and misogynists both say that if you aren't having sex, there's something wrong with you: You're not playing for the team."

I'm not going to investigate the Sacred Babble of feminists and what they may or may not say about McCracken's virginity, but I do note that men's rights activists have mysteriously morphed into misogynists. What's worse are the actual statements that lead her to conclude that men's rights activists are against her:

"I received a variety of messages from men suggesting [my virginity] did indeed have an expiration date. I was told I was selfish for not having sex with men I dated and that I am a mean tease for being intimate with men, but not having sex with them. One man even said, 'You need to learn how to give more than you receive.'"

The next line says, "Equally vicious were the e-mails from my fellow feminists… By abstaining, they said I was relenting to pressures set up by a patriarchal society."

How anyone could conclude the comments from the men as "vicious" is beyond me. But, now we are to believe that the pious woman saving herself for Mr Right as the Good Lord intended is also a feminist who can live her life independently from any man (except, should she find him, the One True Love).

Even more of a stretch: the men who were telling her to have sex are somehow part of the "patriarchal society" that pressures women to not have sex. Note also that the messages are from "men". How did she know they were men's rights activists?

The answer, of course, is Elliott Rodger.

Surprised?

With sentences too illogical to parse, she uses a bizarre ritual of word association that take us from her, a willing celibate, to "incels" (involuntary celibates), which then leads us to men for whom, “the ‘truth’ lies in getting laid, no matter the consequences.” Rodger is apparently a hero to these men, and his “initials have become permanent glossary entries on men’s rights activism (MRA) websites.”

His initials? Glossary?

The men who whose ultimate goal is to get laid celebrate a man who didn’t?

It will come as no surprise, dear reader, that we are then led to the film “Bridesmaids”. I know, you were wondering why I hadn’t already made the connection to this culturally iconic moment in Western Civilisation.

It is, of course, that unforgettable moment where a woman calls “a casual hook-up buddy” for a lift, because her car had broken down. McCracken complains that the buddy lives up to his name by asking for a casual hook-up:

“It’s an expectation we see in movies over and over: men putting in a certain amount of time with a woman and expecting sex as a reward.”

I need to point out here that she has no problem with the woman expecting the man to help her (a reward), because she had sex with him at some other time. Now there’s an expectation we see in real life, never mind the movies, over and over again. Even when the couple are divorced, she still wants her hand in his wallet.

The Moron Display is now fogging up, with steam escaping from the sides. Are casual hook-up buddies “incels”? Or are they “incels” in the times between casual hook-ups? At this present time, both my hands are busy on the keyboard. Does that make me an “incel” right now?

And if we get laid, do we find the “truth”? Or do we find the “truth”, and then we get laid? And what are the consequences of finding the “truth”? Herpes?

It is here that we must now turn to the content of McCracken’s piece in the New York Times that started it all. This gets the entire row of stupidity warning lights flashing as the Probability of Reality Gauge flashes an ever falling negative number.

Apparently the Good Lord has no problem with McCracken being naked with her boyfriends, and clearly orgasms are somehow part of the Christian ethic, according to McCracken, as long as there are no penile insertions involved. If only one of those lucky men had a bucket of oxytocin handy, perhaps wedding bells might have rung.

McCracken sets herself up as a martyr for clinging to her “religious principles”. So much so that “Being a virgin has become such a part of my identity.” This she has achieved, she boasts, by her “self-confidence and ironclad willpower.” So it is surprising, to say the least, when she says:

“I’ve happily taken on a dominatrix role and men have enjoyed it.”

What part of her “religious principles” covers that? Is that something in the fine print of the “True Love Waits” vow? Or does whipping, spanking and some verbal abuse not count as True Love, so there’s no need to wait?

And, if sainthood is too much of a stretch, what about simply a place history:

“In fact, I might be a candidate for a Guinness World Record: virgin who has come close to having sex the most times.”

Now, teenage girls, as they get older, get more and more opportunities to be alone with boys for what used to be called heavy petting. One can understand, as they begin to explore a world of emotions and desires, all new to them, that they are torn between their sexual instincts and their religious beliefs or their parents’ warnings. Those girls can talk about getting “close to having sex,” without the ring of hypocrisy.

But an adult woman whose “ironclad willpower” is set to maintaining her virginity is constantly going past first, second and third base, but never making the home run?

If you take the time to read McCracken’s essays (don’t try it alone), you’ll find that each one seems to be written by a different woman. The claim to virginity is the same, but the reasoning, the motivations, the problems that come from the decision, and the insights she claims as a result seem to be moulded to suit the publication, rather than any reality.

She is a chameleon. Chaste Virgin for the Christian Times, Raunchy Virgin for the New York Times, and MRA Butt-Kicking Feminist Virgin With A Faith for Aljazeera America and a bit of all of the above for The Feminist Virgin in Elle Magazine (see her website for the pdf).

Throughout, McCracken claims that her problem with the men in her life was that they all had a problem with commitment.

But, which McCracken would they commit to? The virgin, pure as fresh snow, as she clings to her faith in a world of unbelievers? The sophisticated, scientific feminist scathingly critical of the seedy world of misogynistic men and their web-sites, yet defying the sisterhood to keep her virginity? The sexually liberated dominatrix who is into anything, except the main event? Or, some bizarre, ever changing mix of all three?

Any man who could commit to that would need commitment – of the mental institution variety.

But is any of it true? The virgin status? The religious faith? The hypersexual sexless affairs? The angst? The constant criticism from others? Any of it?

The only thing I would buy is her claim to be a feminist, because she certainly is an Adept of The Sacred Babble. Everything else requires verification from an independent source.

I cringe at the thought of the inevitable sequel, which would be some Reality TV series where 20 male contestants vie for the right to her precious gift. In my mind, each week would see a contestant being kicked out for failing a test. For example, they might be asked to engage McCracken in a conversation for 10 minutes where she is not the topic.

The first loser gets a prize of $19 million. Each week, as contestants are eliminated one by one, the prize goes down $1 million at a time. The last surviving candidate gets no money at all, but gets to take McCracken home for a night of “I don’t know if I’m ready yet.”

Do You Mind If I Write A Post?

May 20, 2015 | by Frank Lin | Link | Original Link

Hello reader.

I'm sorry. I forgot to ask first. Do you mind if I say hello?

Very good then, hello. I'd like to share a few ideas with you but first I'd like to ask if I can write the topic sentence. I can? Thanks! Hold on, just a few more questions. It's a twelve word sentence. Do you mind a twelve word sentence? Is that OK? Also, there's a swear word. Do you mind if I type a swear word? You don't? Great! Wait, hold on. One more thing. It's in English. Do you mind the fact that its in English? You don't? Awesome sauce!

OK, here's the sentence: stopping after every discrete action to obtain consent is annoying as hell.

Now, do you mind if I also include a follow-up remark to that as well? Are you sure? You're not drunk, are you? High? Distressed? Triggered? Suffering from deeply embedded Stockholm Syndrome? Well, there's really no way for me to know that your consent is valid, since we're on opposite sides of an internet connection. So I'm taking a pretty big risk here. I'm like the James Bond of consensual blogging. Shaken, not triggered.

Anyway, here's my follow-up remark: if this turns you off reading, imagine how much it will turn you off sex.

Think I'm being academic? Far from it! Now, not only coming to a campus to you, but, eventually, everywhere! Here let me – oh, wait! I forgot to ask. Do you mind if I quote someone? I know, I know, I'm bringing in a third party. Kinky, eh? Well, let me sell you on it: his sentences are long and his thoughts are deeply penetrating. Are you ready? Is that a yes? Is it? I CAN'T HEAR YOU! WHO'S YOUR WRITER?!? WHO'S YOUR WRITER?!?

I can't take that confused look on your face as consent. Nor your smirking. Nor your obvious willingness to continue reading. Nope. I need your expressed, verbal consent. Since we're on the internet, please register it in the comment section below.

Ah, OK. There it is. Yeah, you wanna see that quote, don't you? You wanna see how hard the grammar gets. You verbvert, you! I bet you've got a filthy, dirty keyboard. Don't worry, I'm going to make you (consensually, of course) clean it up. Anyway, I can see you kind of nodding now. Is that a yes? Because body language doesn't count anymore. All hail the post-intimacy society!

OK, you finally said yes: here's Pierce Harlan over at Community of The Wrongly Accused (you should definitely read the full article) explaining why what's going on over at the American Law Institute is such a big deal:

> The American Law Institute is the most important and most prestigious organization of legal scholars and prominent attorneys in the United States. The ALI drafts model laws that become statutes and Restatements of the Law that are widely cited as authority in judicial opinions.

Pierce Harlan foresaw the danger of the “Dear Colleague” Letter years ago, and how it would lead to the flood of false rape accusations on college campuses we have today. Oh, crap! That was an entire follow-up sentence without prior consent. I’m so sorry. Please forgive me! Please forgive me! I just started typing and actually enjoying myself and I forgot mid-flow to stop all the action and check in with you – verbally, of course, because that’s all that matters anymore. So now I’m a rapist. My college career is ruined! They’ll never let me write a snarky article again. What’s that? You won’t tell anyone as long as I do everything you say (including sex on demand) and never break up with you? Well… err… I guess that’s fair. It’s not like I really have a choice if I want to graduate without getting my name dragged through the mud. Go rape culture awareness!

Whew! Thanks for being so forgiving. You really let me off easy on that one. Now, do you mind if I include another quote? This one’s a little longer. Actually, its quite a bit longer. Like, almost twice as long. Do you think you can handle that? Is this what you want? Are you sure? Say yes. Out loud. Louder. LOUDER SO THAT THE RESIDENT ASSISTANTS CAN HEAR!!!

Very good. You consent. Thank you. Here’s the other quote:

> The proposed revision to the Model Penal Code would turn a young man on a date into a criminal if he timidly reaches out to hold his date’s hand without her prior positive agreement. (Because the proposed revision is written in gender neutral terms, theoretically, the young woman would be guilty if she initiated the contact, but in a society where gender roles are largely defined by pursuer and “hard to get,” and where male complaints of sexual assault are hardly ever reported and even less likely to be believed, this proposed law is intended to punish, and change, traditional male behavior.)

OK, now last time I forget to ask permission before writing a follow-up comment. You own me now, and I’ve learned from my mistake. May I make a follow-up comment?

No?

OK.

Another Clementine Whine

May 21, 2015 | by Mark Dent | Link | Original Link

The name Clementine Ford is synonymous with hatred, bigotry and hypocrisy. I hold this woman in utter contempt. Her latest article on women's netball (a very popular game played here in Australia) is a delicious demonstration of the bigotry this woman unashamedly promotes.

During the past thirty years, many areas of our society which were once seen as the sole domain of men have been infiltrated and opened up to women. This has been demanded by feminists and any reluctance to allow females to participate in these areas has been branded misogynistic and a sign of the wish to see women excluded and subjugated. Of course, like women, some men like to be in the company of their own gender at times, but this natural inclination is considered hate filled and oppressive in men. Yet the notion of the girls getting together and excluding men is seen as fair , proper and entirely understandable.

The once male only Scout movement is now open to girls and has been for some time. Funnily enough, the Girl Guides, which was always considered to be the female equivalent of the Scout movement, is still exclusively for females. No-one appears to be upset by this incredible double standard.

We have had swimming pools and gyms promoting certain hours in which only female members are permitted to attend.

In Australia, our most popular sport is AFL or Aussie Rules. There have been constant cries for this competition to become more female friendly and a demand for more women on the boards of individual clubs and at the highest level of administration. Everyone nods solemnly in fierce agreement whenever this push is articulated by an outraged female journalist and a policy is now in place which will see more women involved in all areas of our great game.

A female footy league has grown exponentially and this has been encouraged and supported by the AFL. The AFL believes we will soon have national women's Football League and they are doing all that is within their power to make this become a reality. We will have an all female game played as a curtain raiser before the main game this weekend at the magnificent MCG, a football stadium here in Melbourne.

This infiltration is seen as a good thing by everyone.

This brings me to Clementine Ford's article in today's Melbourne Age.

It is titled: Why some sports should remain a women's game

I think that the title says it all. But let's delve more deeply into the inner thoughts of this woman.

Here are her opening lines:

If you're a woman who plays traditionally 'female' sport at a competitive level, you'll probably be familiar with the bittersweet frustration of watching as that sport becomes increasingly popular among male players.

So men "infiltrating" a once all female sport creates a bitter/sweet emotional reaction in Clementine's breast. I don't think the creation of a women's football league has elicited any such bitter/sweet feelings in any part of Clementine's body. That is clearly a just and long overdue move which should be applauded by all fair-minded and right thinking people. As far as I know this is exactly how men have reacted to the women's league. They have embraced the development of a women's league.

Clementine points out that:

Netball Australia CEO Kate Palmer thinks elite netball would be shooting itself in the foot if it started to promote the men's game. She says:

"There simply are not the same opportunities for women in sport and across our society as there are for men. I think it's wonderful that we are the only sport that is run by women for women. But also being a women's game is what makes us a unique product, and I think that if we open the elite game up to men then we will lose our product differentiation."

So the netball CEO thinks it is wonderful to have a sport run exclusively by women for women and that opening the elite game up to men means they will lose their "product differentiation." This thinking is expressed unapologetically at the very time demands for more women at board level and across all aspects of the AFL is strongly advocated by journalists and the people holding power in the AFL.

Ford continues:

Palmer has a point. Although it seems callous and, dare I say it, sexist to discriminate against men in a female dominated field, the fact is that women's sport is not accorded the same respect and funding opportunities as the majority of highly publicised men's sport (or, as it appears to be known as in Australia, just 'sport'). Women are routinely expected to listen to condescending explanations about how 'boring' it is to watch them attempt anything physical, not to mention the more insidious arguments that position female athletes as weaker than and therefore somehow less than their male counterparts.

Clementine in no way attempts to explain why women's sport is not accorded the same respect and funding opportunities as men's sport. Could it be that the answer is one that she finds too disturbing to confront?

Clementine concedes she is being sexist, but excuses her blatant gender bigotry and justifies her prejudice by pointing out the fact that many people (unfairly) see women's sport as being "boring" to watch and female athletes as weaker, somehow less than their male counterparts. This is breathtaking in its idiocy for in the very next lines she confesses to holding those very same beliefs! She is afraid people will find the male version of these sports superior and more explosive. Why would this happen other than for the uncomfortable fact that men's sports are superior and more explosive?

She writes:

Yet like netball, roller derby is also dealing with an increase in popularity among male players. More and more men's leagues are popping up, which is a fantastic tribute to the sport in theory but which practically can cause some concern for the women's leagues that struggle to source funding and attention. If men's derby suddenly becomes recognised as either a novelty or a superior, more explosive version of the original, what effect will that have on the people who have put their blood, sweat and tears into establishing the sport in the first place?

It numbs the brain doesn't it?

Clementine is in no way concerned about the fact that men have poured their blood, sweat and tears into establishing the much loved game of Australian Rules football or that this is in any way an argument to stop the female infiltration of our great game. She believes the inclusion of women can only lead to better outcomes. Yet she has no such beliefs when it comes to men entering a once female dominated environment.

She knows that women cannot compete with men. Her fear is that funding and media coverage will be diverted from the female game and focus on the men. This fear is justified, because men and women prefer to watch men perform in any sport, with the exception perhaps, of gymnastics.

So her argument boils down to "keep men out of our games because they play them too well and make us look bad!"

I wrote about this female double standard in an article titled, When Ladies Rule. I wrote then that I have never heard a complaint about the incredibly lopsided playing field when it comes to the world of modelling. I am sure Clementine believes that the far greater coverage and funding of female models is right and proper.

Here we have a perfect opportunity for Clem and all her girlfriends to prove to all of the cynics out there that women can not only compete with men but actually show their superiority by drawing bigger crowds, more tv coverage and more funding than their male counterparts.

Perhaps she could explain why the AFL has no fear that women's involvement in football will divert funds and media attention from the men's game. These issues are not decided by sexism or prejudice, but money. If women flock to female footy in greater numbers than they attend male footy, would any male journalist who suggested women be excluded from playing the game be supported by Clementine?

When pigs fly.

The Feminist Abyss

May 21, 2015 | by Robert Stacey McCain | Link | Original Link

Note: This article is also available in Romanian.

What do we mean by the word "feminism"? This question has become increasingly crucial to the way that we talk about men, women and sex in the 21st century. Almost everyone claims to accept feminism if they can be permitted to define it in the most commonly accepted understanding of "equality" as basic fairness.

Especially in terms of educational and employment opportunity, no one argues in favor of discrimination against women. Yet this widely accepted idea of feminism, as a concern for equality in the sense of fairness and opportunity, is not the goal of the feminist movement today, nor was this the goal of the movement when it began in the late 1960s. The leaders of the Women's Liberation movement were radicals — many of them were avowed Marxists — who advocated a social revolution to destroy the basic institutions of Western civilization, which they denounced as an oppressive system of male supremacy, often labeled "patriarchy."

Women are oppressed and men are their oppressors, feminists declared, calling for the destruction of this systematic oppression: "Smash patriarchy!"

Feminism confuses many people who do not understand that the movement has a political philosophy — a theory — and that this theory is fundamentally incompatible with human nature. In fact, feminists do not believe there is such a thing as "human nature." They insist instead that all human behavior (especially including sexual behavior) is "socially constructed" and, because feminists believe that the society that constructs our behavior is a male-dominated system which oppresses women, everything that we accept as "human nature" is part of that oppressive system. A feminist blogger explained this in July 2014:

> Radical Feminism is, and has always been a political movement focused on liberating girls and women, those who are born into the sex caste female, from the unnatural, yet universal roles patriarchy has assigned.
> Radical Feminism fights to disassemble the subliminal sex role behavior performances that cause female subordination. . . . This is socialized behavior instruction. It's a teaching, a grooming from birth that is false, harmful to our freedom and must stop.

What this blogger described as "the unnatural, yet universal roles patriarchy has assigned" are the characteristics we call masculinity and femininity — the normal traits and behaviors of men and women. Feminists consider these roles "unnatural," both the cause and effect of "female subordination," and their movement can therefore never be satisfied with the simple fairness that most of us think of as "equality." As long as these "universal roles" (masculine men and feminine women) continue to define human existence, feminism has not achieved its objective.

“PIV is always rape, OK?” Mocking laughter greeted this declaration from an anonymous radical feminist blogger who, in December 2013, explained that heterosexual intercourse — PIV being a feminist acronym for “penis-in-vagina” — is “inherently harmful,” a manifestation of male supremacy and the patriarchy’s violent oppression of women. The same blogger elsewhere declared, “No woman is heterosexual,” a statement that seems absurd, except to those who have studied the influential feminist scholars whose theories support such a claim.

Heterosexuality, these authors argue, is never a woman’s own free choice, nor is female heterosexuality the result of natural instinct or biological urges. Rather, according to radical theorists whose works are commonly taught in Women’s Studies courses at universities everywhere, women who are sexually attracted to men have been indoctrinated — brainwashed by “hetero-grooming” — to believe that male companionship is desirable or necessary to their happiness.

The blogger whose anti-PIV rantings inspired so much laughter (“Was she dropped on her head?”) was, in fact, able to cite as sources for her arguments such eminent feminist authors as Mary Daly, Dee Graham and Sheila Jeffreys. To say that these lesbian feminists are “controversial,” and that their radical views are not shared by the majority of American women who call themselves “feminists,” is by no means a refutation of their arguments.

Those who would attempt to separate “mainstream” feminism from the more radical aspects of its ideology cannot avoid the problem that the faculty and curricula of university Women’s Studies programs — where feminism wields the authority of an official philosophy — are disproportionately dominated by radical lesbians.

This hegemonic influence is not merely manifested in the fact that outspoken lesbian activists are employed as directors and professors in Women’s Studies programs everywhere, but also plainly evident in the textbooks and readings assigned in their classrooms. Even if a moderate heterosexual feminist were to become a Women’s Studies professor, she would find it nearly impossible to assign a textbook that was not crammed with radical anti-male/anti-heterosexual readings from lesbian feminists like Charlotte Bunch, Adrienne Rich, Audre Lorde, Janice Raymond, Judith Butler and others.

It is this radical ideology which drives the feminist “rape culture” discourse that claims (contrary to evidence) women on college campuses are systematically victimized by male sexual violence. University administrations, state legislatures and even the federal government have reacted to these feminist claims, despite data showing that incidents of rape have declined nationwide in the past two decades, and that female college students are actually less likely to be raped than women who don’t attend college. When I covered a “SlutWalk” protest in Washington, D.C. — half-naked women marching to show that the way a woman dresses doesn’t mean she is “asking for it” — I listened to their chants and realized that their message was really about silencing critics of feminism: “Shut up, because rape.”

Feminism is a totalitarian movement that seeks to eliminate opposition by branding critics “misogynists” and “rape apologists” or as Amanda Marcotte called them, “rape truthers.” Attempts to discuss the actual prevalence of rape on college campuses are shouted down by feminist activists, and even after feminist claims are proven false (as when a Rolling Stone story about a “gang rape” at the University of Virginia was exposed as fraudulent), this doesn’t end the militant rhetoric. Why? Because the “rape culture” discourse isn’t about rape, it’s about culture. It is specifically about promoting a campus culture that is hostile to men and hostile to heterosexuality. This anti-male propaganda is intended to inspire in female students an attitude of hatred and suspicion toward male students: Fear and Loathing of the Penis.

Encountering this hateful attitude in feminist blogs, I began researching these radical theories in depth. Studying dozens of books by feminist authors, I encountered many dangerous ideas and theories, some of them so crazy as to provoke laughter. Thus was inspired “McCain’s Law of Feminism.”

There are three kinds of feminism:

> 1. Feminism that is wrong;
> 2. Feminism that is crazy;
> and
> 3. Feminism that is both wrong and crazy.

When in doubt, it’s usually Number Three.

Sarcasm aside, however, it’s no joking matter. Feminists take their ideas very seriously, and their influence in our society — especially among the intellectual elite — means that we cannot afford to laugh them off, no matter how wrong or how crazy their ideas may be. Nor does the wrongness or insanity of their ideas mean that the problems feminists complain about are non-existent. Even if there is no “epidemic” of rape on university campuses, men do rape women, men do harass women, men do cheat and lie and do other bad things that hurt and harm women.

The problem with feminism is that, after more than four decades, the movement has changed society in ways that actually make it more likely that women will suffer these harms. Feminists have successfully attacked basic institutions — especially marriage and the family — that should provide women protection from many of these harms. Feminists have also attacked cultural norms of morality, and undermined customs of courtesy and decency, fostering a climate where there are no commonly recognized rules to prevent or mediate conflicts between men and women. The destruction of civilized restraints has unleashed savage impulses, so that sexual relations at times approach the “war of all against all” of which Thomas Hobbes once warned.

“The personal is political,” Women’s Liberation leader Carol Hanisch declared in the 1960s, and this is exactly the problem with the feminist movement. These are desperately unhappy women whose grievances are so profoundly personal that attempts to solve them through politics can never succeed. Feminists are crazy, but their craziness is rooted in anger, and this anger expresses itself as the politics of revenge. For women who succumb to this ideology of insane rage, it does not matter to whether their theories are wrong or whether innocent human beings are harmed by the policies they advocate.

The feminist movement demands blood sacrifice — the lives of more than a million unborn children are destroyed annually in the name of "a woman's right to choose" — to appease their need for sadistic vengeance against the society they blame for their personal unhappiness. A movement organized with the death of innocents as one of its basic demands is not a movement that will be honest or ethical in the pursuit of its other demands. Feminism's lies are therefore never accidental or random. Rather, deliberate deception is necessary to the movement's success. Feminists lie because if they told the truth, their movement would be recognized for what it is, and would collapse in discredited failure.

Having spent more than a year researching feminist theory, I have exposed what can only be described as a bottomless abyss of perverse insanity. Bizarre ideas that were once discussed only in obscure academic journals now make headlines on a daily basis. The Pentagon shoves women into Army Ranger training. Former Olympic gold medalist Bruce Jenner "comes out" as transsexual. Pop singer Miley Cyrus announces her bisexuality and launches a crusade against "gender norms and identity." Public schools want to teach radical feminist gender theory to elementary school kids. Feminism's war against human nature is leading our society into a chaotic bedlam of androgynous confusion. As we stare together into the feminist abyss, we can never forget that the abyss is also staring back at us.

Liana Kerzner spreads false accusations

Liana Kerzner, a writer for The Escapist and Metaleater and widely known simply as "Liana K" has been spreading false allegations about Men's Rights Edmonton and, we think, MRAs globally. We'll let Nick Reading and Nephanor explain:

Note: Nephanor is a co-host of Tales from the Infrared, so we do have a tie there. But no matter, we stand by it: Liana Kerzner, aka Liana K, is an abusive liar. And we are not the first ones to notice. Why do feminist abusers like this constantly get a free pass in the media? (NB: The question is rhetorical, we know why.)

Update: We've been informed that Liana K feels that she didn't mean to lie, she was just confused.

Ramping up the dirty tactics against pro-male activism

---

On May 20, 2015, Time magazine published a short article about a nasty kerfuffle that happened on Twitter. “Short article” is an understatement — it’s a fluff filler item at best. However, the content is weighty enough that I feel moved to compose something of greater heft. I will explain this, but first you should read the Time article. It will take you all of three minutes:

Troll uses Twitter Ads to Spread Transphobic Message

The nearly faceless author of this piece (Kia Kokalitcheva) has no readily discernible political standpoint, so the piece looks like straight-up reporting and little more. Yet there lurks an unpleasant core of greater interest, from which we may extract a topical object lesson.

To recapitulate the article: an unknown person opened a Twitter account and pretended to be the Australian feminist Caitlin Roper. Under this false personna, the hoaxer tweeted calls for transgendered people to commit suicide, evidently wishing to character-assassinate Roper by making it appear that Roper was personally saying this.

Not very sporting, I must say! Personally, I don’t hold with such methods.

Of particular interest is, that the hoaxer used “promoted tweets” – basically a system where you pay Twitter to signal-boost your tweets to a much larger public. For some reason, it took Twitter a while to discover the offensive nature of those promoted tweets, but when it did, it promptly suspended the account.

After this, two important things happened. First, Time published the above-linked news item. Second, shortly thereafter, a Twitter account called Conservative News (@BreakingNews) signal-boosted the Time article, also as a promoted tweet. (Which means, yes, for some reason they were paying to make the story better known.)

All of this leaves us with a few questions, and in order to address those I will make the Time article my focal point. That article contains the following highly significant paragraph:

“This isn’t the first time that the victim of the impersonation, Caitlin Roper, had been targeted with fake accounts. She’s also been attacked by men’s rights groups, including A Voice For Men, for her political and philosophical views. However, it is not clear whether any of them were behind Tuesday’s incident.”

This is where the plot thickens, and I think it is right to go “hmm” at the mention of AVFM. The emotionally-charged context of the entire article makes it just a tad suspicious that AVFM’s name would pop up here, and we are entitled to wonder if a politically motivated targeting was intended.

The final sentence in the paragraph carefully puts the writer, and Time magazine itself, beyond the reach of legal action for defamation. The editors in their professional wisdom surely know how to play this game, and wouldn't let anything slip by that might compromise them.

Let's take a closer look at what the article is saying. We are first told that Caitlin Roper has been targeted by fake Twitter accounts in the past. We are next told that Roper has been "attacked" by "men's rights groups", and that these "groups" included AVFM.

The nebulous phrase "men's rights groups" is a standard intellectual cop-out, since nobody is named and no evidence is given. By contrast, "AVFM" is a definable target. Mind you, AVFM is not a person, and only questionably a "group". But a lot of people are loosely clustered around this website and benefit from its existence. Those people would now find themselves living under a smog of unwholesome imputations.

I was naturally curious to learn how AVFM had (allegedly) "attacked" Caitlin Roper, so I did a quick search. I found the following article by Dr. Greg Canning, from June 17, 2014:

http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/feminist-lies-feminism/caitlin-roper-professional-victim-amateur-man-hater/

It was an interesting, well-written piece. It pulled no punches, but it was in the best of journalistic traditions and I could discover no fault with it. Certainly, it did Caitlin Roper no favors — but when you make yourself a public figure you must expect scrutiny from that very same public whose lives you overshadow. This comes with the territory.

So what I'm saying is that AVFM's hands are entirely clean in this matter — certainly cleaner than Caitlin Roper's, to judge by Dr. Canning's article.

Additional detail on Caitlin Roper might be of interest. Roper has left the following tweet on Twitter:

> A copy of my twitter profile, offering sex to men on the internet. This is how far some men will go to silence women pic.twitter.com/6sCK1BA85S
> — Caitlin Roper (@caitlin_roper) October 27, 2014

While the action allegedly directed against her was reprehensible, I must note that she uses a feminist linguistic ploy. When she says "this is how far some men will go to silence women", she dishonestly conflated women as a plurality with women in the abstract. But Roper herself is neither a plurality of women, nor women in the abstract. She is a singular female person who cannot possibly fathom the motives of her unknown abuser. Hence, she cannot hope to know if this alleged "man" wants to silence "women", or merely wants to silence Caitlin Roper.

So as we said earlier, AVFM's hands are clean . . . but when Kia Kokalitcheva places AVFM's name next to all of that unsavory stuff, it insinuates guilt by juxtaposition and creates a Pavlovian set-building effect.

For example, we know that AVFM published sharp words about Caitlin Roper, and we know that other people did far worse things. This obliquely hints at an affiliation between AVFM and those other people, even though no such thing is demonstrable. Did Kokalitcheva willfully try to create that impression? If so, was this done with the connivance of the Time editorial team? And is the political stance of either Kokalitcheva or the editors a feminist stance? I cannot say for sure, but I am certainly entitled to wonder.

At any rate, the Time article does AVFM an injury, as well as injuring (more indirectly) anyone speaks passionately for male human rights, or anyone (like the present writer) who speaks critically against feminism.

As for the @BreakingNews Twitter feed, we can't help wondering why they wanted to signal-boost the Time article in the first place. We find it intriguing that they would pay good money to make that specific item more famous, and we can't help wondering if there's an agenda behind this. Is there a pattern here, and will that pattern repeat itself? Is it officially a "thing" now, to allocate funds toward falsely narrativizing male human rights advocates ? Is it the wave of the future? I reckon time will tell, so all of this bears watching.

The story that we've shared in this article wouldn't be nearly so fraught if it didn't follow hard upon the fictional "men's rights boycott" of the new Mad Max movie.

Just think: a handful of people in the entire world said "Mad Max Fury Road is a feminist movie – don't see it!" You'd think this was nothing to get fussed about, wouldn't you? Yet thanks to that paltry wisp of evidence, self-appointed pundits of the feminist persuasion have announced that there is a big social movement afoot to not see Mad Max Fury Road. Furthermore, the story has spread everywhere, and people are sopping it up like uncritical sponges for no other reason than because they saw it in print. Efforts to set the record straight have so far met with limited success, and the woozles are proliferating.

But the fact remains that the men's rights boycott of Mad Max Fury Road does not, by any meaningful stretch, exist at all. Firstly, none of the people who bad-mouthed that movie were self-defined men's rights activists. Secondly, I happen to know a few people who do self-define as "men's rights activists", and nary a one has said one bad word about Mad Max Fury Road. In truth, they were largely indifferent and hardly understood what all the fuss was about.

Yes, I see a pattern here. It seems that a lot of people will not hesitate to make up stories about reality that don't match reality at all. They will either proclaim those stories outright, insinuate them in some way, or conjure them by the clever use of "spin."

The Mad Max Fury Road boycott hoax was sheer fabrication out of virtually nothing, directed against a poorly defined group. The Twitter troll episode, on the other hand, was oblique insinuation directed at a relatively well-defined group. Common to both cases, however, was imposed definition or false narrativization of a marginal community, by a group in power.

Are you thinking of Gamergate now? I certainly am, for that was another marginal community which got falsely narrativized and defined.

It seems that if you belong to the ruling establishment, you have the power not only to write history (like any other victor), but the power to define and narrativize both the culture as a whole, and any subculture that falls beneath your sway.

Such is the curse that presently falls upon us. Although feminism is a minority worldview, it is highly organized as a power structure and hegemonic within society. You will get along okay if you don’t speak openly against it, but the minute you raise your voice — or merely proclaim yourself not a feminist — you can expect trouble. All manner of wildly untrue things will be said about you, and you will find yourself conflated with people, groups and ideas that you’ve barely even heard of.

False definition, false narrativization, and just brazenly making things up, is standard behavior from the feminist establishment and everybody who supports it. By all appearance they are ramping up this game, and what we see now is only the beginning. We are sailing into some dirty weather, so let’s batten down the hatches.

The burning of the supplicant feminist leper AKA Joss Whedon

May 22, 2015 | by Jack Outis | Link | Original Link

> "Don't talk like one of them, you're not! Even if you'd like to be. . . . [T]hey need you right now. But when they don't, they'll cast you out, like a leper"
> —Ledger's Joker

Imagine the perfect KKK member: proactively ignorant, intellectually shortsighted and blissfully full of supremacist belief. His blind faith can only be matched by his intense need to please, to become a barren supplicant to his chosen KKK tribe. Problem is: this specific perfect KKK member is black.

Congratulations, you just met Joss Whedon, the barely tolerated equivalent of a supplicant self-hating black male trying his desperate best to be accepted by a supremacist cult called feminism.
Feminists accepting Joss Whedon was, from the beginning, as plausible as the KKK accepting a black member; they may half-heartedly pretend they give the unworthy a shred of perfunctory, volatile acceptance but deep down? They only have utter contempt and distrust for the outsider.

Joss Whedon the once promising and very prominent male feminist wannabe has been excomulgated by the feminists he so fervently believed in. His spectacular fall from grace was due to the fact he made a movie the fans disliked for not being feminist enough and became his enemies overnight, just like an angry mob with torches & pitchforks (with plenty of progressive & colorful death threats) started attacking him until the hate became so intense they drove him out of Twitter (he was even forced to close his account himself). This fallout is not a secret and there are excellent reports that explain why now Joss Whedon is now an official persona non grata to feminists.

Grab a cup of coffee or a glass of wine, and enjoy Joss Whedon's misfortune and delicious fall from feminist grace in this brief report.

Whedon's pilgrimage to the ovarian church

It is hard to wrap your mind around the amount of truly hard work it took from a supplicant such as Joss Whedon to try to convince his feminist audience over several decades he truly was not another "toxic" male, that even though he had no uterus he was noble, only to be marginally tolerated by feminists themselves. Despite the fact Joss did do his feminist homework, he licked all the right boots, kissed all the proper asses and even gave a few public tongue twirls to the likes of Anita Sarkeesian.

Fig. 1: Anita using a promotional object.

He preached to the choir hard, even going as far as denouncing the 2015 Jurassic Park movie clip as "70's sexism" while sucking up to a feminist website via Twitter. The result of all his hard sucking up? Whedon was told by Marvel studios to retract his comment because even themselves understood his feminism had gone too far yet he kept preaching by giving a non- apology.

He clearly tried very, very hard over the years to show feminists he was "worthy" despite the fact he has acknowledged himself he is imperfect for not having a womb (seriously, I am not making this up) in fact, he tried so hard over the years it would seem he was motivated beyond reason, fervently, almost as if by faith, only to fail to convince feminists themselves beyond reasonable doubt he was truly one of them. (Psst…having male genitalia does not help Joss) But what would fuel him over decades to try to convince those who he clearly does not belong to? To be rejected, to be considered unworthy of holding half the sky of feminism over and over again?

Exactly, intense guilt.

The implication is that just like a self-hating gay at a gay conversion church trying to distance himself from other "sinful" gays. Whedon's intense need for validation only implies his guilt, his need to distance himself from those he abhors: other "toxic" males. Problem is, a persistent loud denial usually implies a silent coy affirmation and in Joss' case, his constant need to deny he is "toxic" through his feminist work, only implies he hates a part of himself so much that he finds it secretly reprehensible, but instead of a gay conversion church, male feminists like Joss Whedon go to an ovarian church.

Joss is not an isolated case, plenty of male feminists seem to be driven by guilt especially rape guilt, for example asking this question on Twitter to male feminists results on either radio silence or total outrage with plenty of colorful swearing.

> "If you have never raped anyone, why do you feel so much rape guilt? Do innocent drivers apologize for hit and runs?"

> —Jack Outis Troll

(Sidenote: too bad Joss quit Twitter, I wanted to ask him that and many other questions… sour grapes, I am banned too anyway)

Going back to Joss' crusade, to show he was a worthy man, imagine this wealthy supplicant's daily pilgrimage to the feminist church over decades only to metaphorically kneel, forehead to the floor with hands high up holding his mutilated offering, the evidence of the castration of his own "toxic masculinity" ideas through his films.

In many ways, his feminist films are a form of atonement for his own closeted guilt. Joss Whedon films are his personal testament to that which he is not supposed to be, to that which he relates deeply then has an urge to overcompensate and denounce, to atone for, to deny his implied sins, to prove his worth, to wash away his implied guilt and be granted a shred of volatile feminist acceptance at best or just nothing. All this supplicant work on Whedons's behalf, only to be called by his own supporters exactly what he was trying to "prove" he was not: a misogynist.

> Joss Whedon; the male feminist whose intense supplicant work to appeal feminists only turned him into another misogynist. Few ironies in life are as rich as his.

Even if Joss Whedon has tried to save face and deny that it was the feminist hate what drove him away from Twitter, it is hard to believe death threats from his own former allies did not get to him. Why close the account if ignoring them was easier? Why not lending it to a PR agency of his trust? James Cameron does that all the time. See? As usual with SJWs, emotions dictate their contradictions.

The sins of the supplicant lepper

Granted,Whedon's career is far from over, he is currently more than bankable as a director but among feminists he just became as hated as certain slightly reviled male feminist that goes by the name Hugo, which begs the question,

What did Whedon do to to anger them so intensely?

In short he committed these 3 fatal sins against feminism,

1. Being male
2. Sterilizing a flawed imaginary female character
3. Include a harmless sexual joke in Latin AKA a "rape joke"

Yes, he had the audacity to include the all of the above blasphemies in his 2015 blockbuster "Avengers: Age of Ultron". But let's see the details on his transgressions against the church of the celestial vagina AKA feminism.

Being male: For starters, Joss has not realized that unless properly castrated, male feminists like him are too imperfect and rather just occasional useful objects to advance the feminist agenda (hence why Anita posed with him on Twitter, to use him as promotion. See Fig 1). He certainly already is mentally castrated but unless he undergoes orchiectomy the prospect of being a successful male feminist is just as bad as being a black KKK member, because you are showing you are too dumb to even notice and too stupid for even trying to join a group of supremacists and to top it off, also because you will forever be an ousider.

Sterilizing Black Widow: Logically all narcissists with the mind of a child (AKA feminists) related intensely to an imaginary character that is far sexier and relevant than they themselves will ever be* therefore these femi-zealots experienced immediate intense rectal discomfort (butthurt) by being told their sexy powerful and relevant imaginary self had been sterilized by the male brain of the director (therefore Whedon also was given rapey brains). Think about it. All your life you have been a butt-ugly feminist with a shitty personality and out the Marvel gates comes this perfect avatar of a woman (the one you will never be) called Black Widow, a sexy, smart, assassin therefore butt-ugly feminists like you can easily inhabit and hide behind her just like toddlers wearing a spiderman halloween costume. Of course, it makes perfect sense! (if you have the mind of a child.)

How would you feel if a director made you feel your imaginary fertility (signaled by imaginary sexy looks) was not only worth something but that it was invaluable only to be robbed of that fertility? Exactly, this whole tantrum is all about ugly feminists with low fertility value believing they are as sexy as an imaginary character. Their outrage stems from themselves having no real fertile value signaled by any sexually attractive looks and when their avatar was revealed to have been sterilized therefore having zero fertile value, well, feminists just lost their proverbial shitty menses and started hurling very real death threats at the Whedon leper.

But of course! It makes perfect sense to make death threats right and left (especially if you have the mind of a feminist Macdonald's triad child). To top it off, Whedon had the audacity to have an imaginary character say she was a "Monster" for killing people but since she said that in front of a green monster (the Hulk) feminists just conveniently conflated and assumed Black Widow meant she was a "barren monster". It appears besides making them intensely retarded feminism also makes them hard of hearing.

A harmless sexual joke in Latin: The term in question is "Prima Nocta" which is used in a comedic scene where the Avenger characters take turns to try to lift Thor's hammer, RDJ's character Tony Stark jokingly claims that if he manages to lift the hammer he would re-enact "Prima Nocta" which is an obscure reference to the alleged medieval right of Feudal lords to have sex with lower cast females. It is not surprising feminists did not find the joke humorous and were publicly mortified and offended.

This happened simply because humor requires intelligence and feminists consistently lack it. Second of all, feminists will only laugh at rape or mutilation jokes about males only if told by a female comedian, anything said by a male HAS TO BE ABOUT RAPE, (right feminists?). Lastly, the flawed assumption that an alleged feudal custom from the middle ages can truly translate into a 100% rape rate. Was it impossible for peasant women to fuck a rich feudal lord to trade up husbands AKA hypergamy? Was it always impossible for the females to give consent? Again, enteraining these thoughts of rape not taking place are taken by feminists as the equivalent of blasphemy because to them, rape is as holy as the crucifixion.

*(which surprisingly, unlike game characters, they did not try to ban, my money is on the fact that Scarlet Johanson has a mind of her own and feminists would not find it as easy to use the same tactics but she might as well also be another feminist)

The burning of the supplicant lepper

> "Unlike female ones, male feminists can be abused endlessly and not a single woman will come to their aid. See? Equality."
> —Jack Outis Troll

A few months back, I made the above observation on one of my many now defunct Twitter accounts and it gives me infinite pleasure to see the above rule in action, if you are a female feminist getting a death threat, your genitalia will grant you automatic sympathy from everyone, but if you are a male feminist? Good luck, you are on your own. Just like what happened with Whedon, nobody will come and help you. See? Equality.

But being burned on the very pink cross Joss helped his feminists sisters build? That is priceless.

It boggles the mind how much hypocrites like Whedon would campaign for "equality" for women yet when he gets death threats he forfeits his own equality by exercising the double standard of "toughening out the abuse" by not complaining about it publicly or outright denying it despite the fact he made a reference to the death threats he had received via the very last tweet before he closed his account.

Fig. 2: referencing his mortality is literary coincidence, not that someone sent him death threats. Nah…not at all….

Joss should make up his mind, either double standards are OK or they are not. Either he does not defend women when they receive threats the way he does not defend himself or he complains about his own death threats the way he does when women receive rape/death threats themselves. Just imagine the amount of noise feminists would be making if Anita Sarkeesian had received the number of vicious threats Whedon received this time around. But since Joss is a "man" he is supposed to take it. See? Equality.

The best thing about the abuse directed at Whedon is that it mainly came from women exercising the kind of abuse they would otherwise adamantly oppose. Their behavior toward Whedon is pure unalloyed hypocrisy in motion, they do to him exactly what they claim should never be done to anyone (anyone female that is, men are less equal thus fair game). See? There is no honor among thieves and there is no prisoners among SJWs, they will eat each other or anybody they deem a “traitor”.

Just imagine if Anita Sarkeesian had received exactly the same level of abuse and death threats Whedon received this time around. That would have been quite a drama or another $160K Kickstarter to help her with her resulting imaginary PTSD. But for Whedon? He is supposed to be less than equal, just another toxic male that can take any amount of abuse, no matter how many death threats are sent his way. (See fig 3 along with all of all of these).

Fig. 3: See? Men are supposed to take it.

Fittingly, several outlets reported how Whedon had been receiving more hate than any female feminist from feminists themselves, (priceless) so much so that even comedian Patton Oswald compared feminists going after Whedon to a lynch mob (see fig. 4)

Fig. 4: He has since deleted it.

If only Whedon had a mind of his own, the following would be a good piece of advice:

Fig. 5: Heed Karen’s advice Joss, for you will never satisfy them.

Sad thing is, male feminist like Joss Whedon do not realize that at best, they are very similar to a hyena's hemorrhoid; it does not matter what they do, half the time they will be either covered in shit or if annoying enough, the feminist beast will just bite them off.

Editor's note: Whedon claims he was NOT run off Twitter by feminists/SJWs.

My Life in the No-Shame Zone

May 23, 2015 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

Note: This article is also available in Spanish.

One of the recurrent themes in MGTOW videos and essays is the continuous shaming that thirty-something adult men receive from their mothers (and often fathers) when it comes to getting married. The old folks pretend to be concerned about their sons' welfare, but what they really want is a continuation of the bloodline, as well as an opportunity to dandle grandkids on their knees.

Well, I never got that sales pitch. My father died in 1963 when I was 13 so any request on his part for grandchildren would have been premature. My mother, however, had ample opportunities to nag me, as she did not die till 1995. I was 45 years old when she clocked out, yet I can honestly say she never said a word to me about marriage or grandchildren.

So was my mother a saint? Did she have a serene que será será attitude? Was she a radical environmental activist who thought the planet already had too many people? No, no, and no. So why did she leave me alone? She was never shy about offering unsolicited advice on other topics – such as education.

Like so many adults who have never been to college, my mother thought prosperity and happiness were impossible without a college education. My father was a shining example. He had degrees from elite colleges and parlayed his education into a high-status job. He was professionally ambitious and my mother was something of a social climber, so they had a symbiotic relationship.

I don't know that it ever occurred to my mother that my father's drive (in subsequent years, he would have been characterized as a Type A personality) probably had more to do with his rapid rise than his diplomas. As I said, he died (of a heart attack) when I was 13, leaving my mother a widow at 43. I'm guessing she had some second thoughts about the pitfalls of high-pressure careerism.

But she still believed in education as the key to upward mobility. She had grown up (born in 1920) in an era when relatively few people, men or women, went to college. In those days, a sheepskin could elevate someone above the herd. Though my mother had never gone beyond secretarial school, over the years, she learned so much about the "right" schools she probably could have moonlighted as a college admissions counselor.

At any rate, she never inquired about my social life while I was in a pressure cooker prep school, academically-demanding college, and a fast-track program at grad school. After all, time spent socializing is time that could be spent studying. And education is why you're there, right?

I was finishing grad school in June 1972 when my maternal grandmother died. I'm sure she would have been after me to give her some great-grandchildren had she lasted longer, but she never got the chance. That left only my mother to shame me into marriage and reproduction.

In 1973, at age 23, I got my first “real” job in a small city about 125 miles from home. I talked to my mom occasionally on the phone and usually went home one weekend a month. A few years before, she had characterized me as a “good catch,” and given my age and job status, she should have started asked me the fabled question: “Have you met anyone?”

But she never said a word. Never. Not a peep. Not when I was 23, not when I was 33, not when I was 43. Why? I think she knew the message would ring hollow. Here’s why.

In 1973 my younger brother, age 15, went off the deep end. To this day, I don’t know what the diagnosis was.emotional, mental, bipolar, borderline, whatever. Various therapists, psychologists, and psychiatrists offered hope. After all, he was young, and there was plenty of time for him to get his life in order. Unfortunately, he never did.

As the years went by, hope gave way to resignation. My brother lived with my mother till the day she died, never held a job, and abused her physically and emotionally. As insufferable as he was, my mother could never bring herself to give him the heave-ho. From age 43 to 53, she had successfully met all the challenges of single motherhood. After my brother went wacko, her life was hell on a daily basis.

A lack of grandchildren was the least of my mother’s problems. How could she ever encourage me to reproduce after that bouncing baby boy she gave birth to at age 38 had morphed into an albatross? He was only five years old when my father died, so perhaps something had been festering in the ten years since that happened. My mother sometimes suspected that bad genes (from my father’s side of the family, natch) were responsible for my brother’s problems.

Now I have no doubt that had I presented my mother with grandchildren, she would have lavished them with affection and attention. But as my younger brother had demonstrated, having children is risky business. Sure, one expects them to be a burden to some degree for a couple of decades or so.but for the rest of your life? To be sure, my mother continued to offer advice.on retirement planning, mutual funds, the advantages of owning a home, and all the usual topics. But not a word about marriage and kids.

My mother was quite capable and financially savvy. She should have enjoyed a pleasant, prosperous retirement, but taking care of my younger brother depleted her financial resources as well as her energy. Depression was her constant companion. I remember one day when my mother was really down in the dumps, she admitted “If I knew then what I know now, you would never have had a little brother.”

So the lesson for MGTOWs is simple: There are illusions and there is reality. You might have an image of marriage in your head involving a mate, children, a family dog, and a little cottage with roses around the door. But if you are considering getting married and/or having children, you must expunge all such imagery from your head.

Instead, look at reality, that is, all the married couples you know. More importantly, look at the married-with-children crowd. Do an informal survey and ask yourself if you would want to trade places with any of the husbands/fathers you know. If you do go the family-man route, your reality won’t be exactly the same as theirs, but it sure as hell won’t be like the image you've been carrying around in your head. The worst mistake anyone can make is seeing one's peers entrapped in snares and crowing, "Oh, that won't happen to me. I'm smarter than they are."

Well, I don't claim to be smarter than my peers, but the snares were obvious to me. Every time I visited my mother, the pitfalls of procreation were on display. When you have a front-row seat for a circus of horrors, you aren't quite so eager to run away and join the circus. After what I witnessed during my visits, no amount of shaming would have had an effect on me. So my mother saved her breath.

Now I would never advise anyone flat-out not to get married or not to have children. Family life could be the key to a rich, fulfilling life.but what are the odds of that happening? There is a strong possibility you are making a mistake. It's not like driving a lemon off a used car lot, or buying a house with a leaky roof, or getting a bad haircut. Those mistakes are relatively easy to correct. But if something goes south with your marriage or your family, the consequences may reverberate throughout the rest of your life.

You can't say that about remaining single and childless. Even if you have second thoughts about that status as the years pass, you can remain secure in the knowledge that whatever the pros and cons of flying solo, you have not made a mistake. The worst-case scenario for bachelorhood is no match for its wedlock counterpart.

You’re a good boy, Damon Young

May 24, 2015 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

> Cop: We’re looking for two Negros in a white car.
> Rubin ‘Hurricane’ Carter: Any two will do?

It seems now that Huffington Post, in another of its never ending efforts to placate the grievances of privileged white women, has now enlisted the help of black men. In particular, I am talking about Damon Young.

Someone just sent me the link to his piece entitled, “Men Just Don’t Trust Women – And It’s A Huge Problem.” The article was originally posted at verysmartbrothas.com back in March and spread through other media outlets like it was smallpox.

First, before I even get to the profundity of the fail in this article, I have to say I take exception to the name of the site it came from. Very Smart Brothas? As opposed to what, the idiots they imagine all other black men to be?

It is hard to tell if this kind of thinking stems from very long-term periods of marginalization or if it is just the result of impotent and inane racial politics over the last 40 years from the likes of Al Sharpton and Jesse Jackson, et al. Whatever the reason, that URL screams to me that the authors are convinced that the average black man is stupid; that the Very Smart Brothas are the exceptions – the ones who measure up to white folk.

Now, god help us, let’s get to what Damon Young actually had to say.

True to its title, the article informs us that men don’t trust women when they make claims. The evidence of that? Well, according to Young it starts with all the denial ridden males out there who did not believe the woman who lied through her teeth to Rolling Stone about being gang-raped (not to mention the woman who ran that story without a hint of fact checking).

Well, in fairness, that was the conversation he had with his wife which actually led to the real reason why men are a problem when it comes to not trusting women. In what appears to be a completely understandable segue, the couple went from talking about one really disgusting rape liar to the Bill Cosby case.

According to the article that is the biggest piece of prima facie evidence that men don’t trust women. It is because there are too many of us who won’t convict Bill Cosby in our minds before he is given the benefit of due process. Some of us very stubborn holdouts actually think he is innocent till proven guilty. That is the actual rationale for why men are the problem offered up by this Very Smart Brotha.

Unfortunately, Damon digs the hole deeper, attempting to explain this on a more personal level by using his own marriage as an example:

> When the concept of trust is brought up, it’s usually framed in the context of actions; of what we think a person is capable of doing. If you trust someone, it means you trust them not to cheat. Or steal. Or lie. Or smother you in your sleep.

> By this measure, I definitely trust my wife. I trust the shit out of her. I also trust her opinions about important things. I trusted that she'd make a great wife, and a trust that she'll be a great mother. And I trust that her manicotti won't kill me.
> But you know what I don't really trust? What I've never actually trusted with any women I've been with? Her feelings."

In other words, the problem with men not trusting women is actually based on the notion that we tend not to interpret their emotionally driven subjective reality as unquestioned fact. Therefore, we are creating a huge problem.

Very Smart Brotha? Nope. Actually, Damon Young should be writing at housenigger.com, because that is exactly what he is.

This particular denizen of what Mumia Ali calls the Negrosphere, offers up little more than poorly parroted postmodern claptrap from his feminist owners. Apparently, this Very Smart Brotha is quick to get cozy and warm with elitism, even if it means playing the drone for a bunch of white girls that would cross the street to avoid passing by him on the sidewalk.

If you think I might be conflating his obsequiousness in the area of sexual politics with racism against blacks, think again. Like any good houseboy, he takes a pretty dim view of field hands and makes work of distancing himself from the same.

I conversed with Ali on this topic and here is what he had to say:

> Right in his own backyard out in Pittsburgh, black folks in the lower classes are being sold out by their own upper class betters, including Young himself. He writes/does his thing from the comfort of Panera bread store, on his Google pixel laptop, then goes back home to love and play among his fellow bougie blacks.
> Lower and working class blacks in Pittsburgh have no voice, in large part thanks to folks like him. They are ignored; are invisible."

Ali's intelligence, by the way, is proven in his writing, not implied in his web address. I have never met him in person, but I am still certain he does not wear t-shirts that say, "Really Smart Black Dude," or anything else equally reeking of insecurity.

Allow me to dispense a little common sense here that is going to be painfully obvious to most readers of this publication. Feelings are not to be trusted. Period. They can and should be honored, but an honor that simply acknowledges their existence and their importance to the person feeling them.

They may be useful in understanding a person's frame of mind, but they are useless, and often counterproductive, when stupidly treated like objective reality. Wanna take any bets on how many women felt like the Scottsboro Boys should be strung up without a trial?

Where would the Duke LaCrosse victims be if we just trusted feelings over facts? And should we not also take note that those victims came very close to having those feelings crush them in a much more permanent way.

The call to trust women's feelings is just another in a long list of shopworn feminist shit tests on men, a ruse to enjoy an insane amount of entitlement. And yes, Damon Young, it is the same basic entitlement whites felt during lynchings but I am sure you won't spill any of your mocha latte over that since it was so like 20 minutes ago.

We could get into a much larger lesson here, like an examination of the fact that women trust women far less than men do, and over a lot more important things than their feelings du jour. Or, as one black feminist writer observed:

> Distrust among women is at epidemic proportions, especially among women of color. I am always amazed at the number of women I encounter who declare proudly, that they don't hang with other FEMALES, preferring the company of males whom they are quick to assert are less prone to gossip, back-stabbing, and emotionalism."

We could even start taking a look at the fact that men indeed tend to trust women too much. They assign sugar and spice niceness to women even when confronted by mountains of evidence to the contrary. If Crystal Gale Mangum's boyfriend had not been chasing a feelings freaking train wreck, is it possible that he might now be slightly less dead?

All of this is tied to why Damon Young is strutting like a banty rooster for women of any race, throwing his fellows under the bus and encouraging children of privilege to believe that the world owes them uncritical belief in whatever they claim to feel.

One other tidbit we might want to consider here is the idea that men don't trust women is balderdash on its face. Most men spend their entire lives mindlessly following women's emotions; following and believing in pretty much anything if they imagine it is going to get them a pat on the head for being a good boy. That includes far too common fraudulent damseling that Young is playing the well-trained step-and-fetch for right now.

It would also be remiss to not point out that men have some very sensible reasons to insist that women earn trust, not just grant it to them along with summary acceptance of their feelings as facts.

In the end, though, these things don't need real explanation to our readers. Efforts to convince the likes of Damon Young are also pointless. He is too self-enamored of being so above all those lesser black men to consider any information that might cause some dissonance.

He does, though, serve as a great historical artifact. The American Civil Rights Movement died with the emergence of gender feminism. Feminists did not just ride in on the coattails of civil rights activism for actual minorities. They demanded that the coat itself be handed to them. They have been wearing it ever since. One look at the politics of black communities will tell you volumes about that.

And now, in the Golden Age of sexual lunacy, they don't just get to don the couture of the "oppressed." They now have men like Damon Young following them around like Uncle You-Know-Who, ready to dust off any unsightly lint with a whistle and a smile.

Malcolm X is turning over in his grave. So is the Civil Rights Movement, courtesy of some Very Smart Brothas.

Consider men in their vulnerability: On scars and cognitive diversity

May 24, 2015 | by Lindsey Ratha | Link | Original Link

Note: This article is also available in Spanish.

Something happened that I haven't been able to quite settle out. I have always compared myself to men and sought to understand where the differences lay. It has never been black and white, estrogen and testosterone. I've had a long-standing interest in hobbies and work environments that are predominately male, or traditionally male-dominated. I can go into this in more detail later, but this tendency led me to a gym-rat lifestyle and gave appeal to physical labor jobs.

When I took a landscaping job I was much more hesitant in driving truck and trailer than my male counter-parts, almost universally. And looking back, if I had received an insult or a slight from an impatient co-worker as I choked up some courage to try, I'd probably break. This is despite understanding the need for criticism and that these jab were intended to toughen weak spots, not kill the entire ego.

Two things became more obvious to me on this path.

The first was risk adversity. No matter how many fight clubs, push-up contests or video games lined with an important side task of out-trolling my opponents would have revealed this. This was serious. Work boots on, get to the worksite, and get paid. What do you mean you're scared?

The second was disposability. Years of seeing myself as physically strong, and the specialness I thought the macho brought, helped me make the decision to undertake hard, physical work. Easy, I'm boss, I can powerlift 200. But in signing my body up, by upholding a macho demeanor, there was no margin for weakness.

ZERO margin. One weekend out in a park a longboard hurled into my foot from behind after its rider had bailed trying to miss me. The front sliced into my skin, but unable to tear into my achilles instead tore the skin around my ankle into a U. (Not for the weak of stomach.)

I was laid off from my job, unable to wear work boots for months.

The wistful thoughts of my exclusion while watching a crew of men working construction or cramming into a truck to go to another work site were temporarily extinguished. However, it was the summer contemplating human inequality with the lens of evolutionary psychology and writing in this blog that led me to the most influential step. Facing my own intellectual dishonesty and learning to stay when being criticized. I found freedom in finding space were ideas could simply be ideas.

> "Exchange is to cultural evolution as sex is to biological evolution." – Matt Ridley, in the Rational Optimist

It may have been my attempts to imitate male hyperagency that forged an empathy that would betray everything I thought I knew, causing millions of titans to fall in my worldview. Paradoxically, in having to stand without them I have never felt more connected. Ideas plus other ideas equal the potential for innovation, and taking ownership of my own willingness to explore and share was key.

Cognitive diversity brings new insights, not the monoculture of group-think.

I have to honor my own nature, which sometimes lies counter to what the majority of people with matching genitalia choose to do. This isn't good or bad, just descriptive. I do not believe we all have to agree to establish respect and understanding.

Life with no margin for weakness is hard – unnecessarily hard, in my opinion. We all need help once and a while.

When you consider that many more men are expected to live this way to be respected and even acknowledged as human beings, though are just as likely to be the victims of domestic violence as women and even more likely to be homeless, we, as a society are fogged in by bias. Consider gynocentrism. Consider the in-group favoritism feminism has created, as well as how it resembles dogma more and more.

Consider men, in their vulnerability.

Men and women have unique struggles, as well as very similar ones. Where I have had the autonomy to explore the gray in-between, many men will find themselves trapped in similar circumstances. My scars are just like any scars, but the stories are always different, as are others reactions to them. Sometimes the reactions are simply based in natural instincts and biology, but if you could fly above the fog, what would you see?

International Men’s Movement #7: Indian Men’s Movement Goes International

May 25, 2015 | by AVFM Hangouts | Link | Original Link

I am breaking normal protocol for this important announcement. PE

This is an episode of International Men’s Movement you don’t want to miss. Lucian Valsan and Paul Elam will be joined by Anil Kumar, founder of Save Indian Family Foundation (SIFF) which has become the most advanced and organized men’s human rights effort on the planet.

This episode is especially important and ceremonial as we take the opportunity to announce the launch of AVFM India, the latest addition to the AVFM Worldwide family of websites flying under the AVFM banner.

The site will be unique in that AVFM India, under the direction of Anil Kumar, will cover articles, news, and hangouts in English as well as in vernacular and regional Indian languages like Hindi, Bengali, Gujarati, Tamil, Telugu and Marathi, making it spectacularly accessible to a massive new audience.

This is especially promising given the caliber of individuals who are driving AVFM India operations.

This episode will not only be informative about the state of affairs for men and boys in India, but it will also be a celebration. AVFM marches on with the addition of these great, seasoned activists from India helping to lead the way.

The program starts May 26, 2015 at 1:00 AM Central Time US, 9:00 AM Bucharest and 11:30 AM in New Delhi.

Not all women are feminist Poopypants

May 25, 2015 | by August Løvenskiolds | Link | Original Link

Feminists want us to trust easily-triggered, fragile feminists in jobs where the slightest hesitation or physical shortcoming can mean life or death. In short, feminists advocate for the employment of Poopypants: a physically and emotionally fragile shell of a human. If you cannot see how suicidal to society it would be to heed their advocacy, allow me to explain.

Imagine you're a part of a highly-trained group of people tasked with a dangerous job. This could be anything: firefighters, fisherfolk, Marines, electrical engineers, Army Rangers, police / SWAT team members, Navy sailors, Air Force pilots, or really, any dangerous situation where one has to trust the skill, courage and clear-headedness of one's coworkers.

If you saw the movie "Top Gun" you know what happens when one's comrades suffer emotional weakness: in the final scenes, Ice Man's life is put in increased peril when Maverick becomes emotionally overwhelmed in the heat of battle and flees the fight. Yes, in true happy ending style, Maverick recovers his courage and the day is saved but in a real fire-fight his delay would have killed all of them, except perhaps a few survivors when his carrier base sank into the sea.

Having steady allies in battle (or other conflicts) is essential to success in any significant situation involving, you know, conflict.

A metaphorical Superman is awesome; Poopypants is not an asset.

Poopypants will get you killed, widow your husband/wife and orphan your beloved children. Superman's presence builds confidence in the team's success (and your personal survival) and even if Superman's competence is discouraging to one's own career goals, you are happy to have him on the team in a premier role. You've weighed survival vs. quick death, and survival won.

Poopypants can be your colleague and even your love interest but in a crisis, Poopypants is disposable.

If Superman takes up with that annoying Lois Lane feminist nightmare manic pixie, that's one less landmine the rest of those on the team have to worry about stepping on.

So, what happens when the skills and emotional wherewithal of a new recruit are unknown?

When a new recruit arrives at your badger pod, the first thing you want to know is, can I trust this fucker? Is this new recruit a Super person, or Poopypants?

This is what the currently discredited "hazing" rituals are about. Put the new recruit through simulated hell for a short ime to evaluate whether trust or exit is the best choice for all involved. If the new recruit flakes out on simulated hell, the new recruit is unsuited to the rigors of real hell. People will perish (or othewise be put at risk) unnecessarily, including the recruit.

This is just one other reason why everyone should reject feminism: they require the relaxing of performance standards, and the removal of allegedly “abusive” social tests that serve the critcal societal interest of establishing the trustworthiness of those who seek positions of trust.

I mean, seriously, when a feminist demands that we ban terms like “bossy,” how can any stakeholder – man or woman – trust a member of her supposedly “empowered woman” cohort to serve in a position of power that can be undermined by the utterance of a single word?

No thanks, bossy grrrlz.

When I first auditioned for a volunteer editor’s spot at AVFM, I carefully detailed over 90 grammatical errors (including suggested corrections) on a single page of the AVFM website of that era. A female AVFM editor called me “pedantic” and a male editor dismissed me as naive about the meat-grinder of becoming an editor – he laughed at my arrogance in thinking that I could withstand the (moderate) abuse they (now “we”) give each other in the context of the massive amount of abuse AVFM editors get from feminists.

I responded with a measured and humorous anger. I was in.

But enough about me; you can perhaps see the general principle now: in critical jobs, it is important to test the strength of the employees before one sacrifices their lives (and the lives of their co-workers) in order to appease some ludicrous (if well-intended) standard of gender equality.

Just to play devil’s advocate (meaning, I find the following abhorrent): in an over-populated world, maybe it is acceptable to balance the purported scales of cosmic injustice by killing men and women unnecessarily by sanctioning unqualified candidates into jobs they are unsuited for, merely because they happen to have female genitalia, or identify as women. Maybe sending these posers, the innocents they demand dominion over, and their colleagues, to their unnecessary deaths is an important symbol of women’s liberation.

But a symbol to what?

Take your pick.

- Feminists’ demands are more important than protecting people’s lives?
- Feminists’ demands that result in the deaths of children are paramount?
- Feminists’ demands for quotas that circumvent legitimate job standards are acceptable even in the face of real lives lost?

Both men and women should be welcome to apply for any job. When a disproportionate number of those of either gender fail to qualify, it is not necessarily a signifier of discrimination.

It is a marker of sanity.

If you are assailed by “micro-aggressions,” need men to protect you from from “toxic masculinity” while you defend women’s unmodulated sexuality, argue that society should “listen and believe” to rape allegations without the same standards of evidence society uses in all other criminal matters, well, then, the answer is clear.

You have failed. Get the hell out, loser.

Believe it or not, this is for your own good. We’re both men and women; we protect society and you, even when it hurts your ludicrous, discredited philosophical bullshit ideology.

Mattress girl Emma Sulkowicz makes yet another questionable accusation — this time, against the university president

May 25, 2015 | by Pierce Harlan | Link | Original Link

Columbia University graduate Emma Sulkowicz, the mattress-toting face of the sexual grievance industry and the purveyor of a highly questionable rape claim lodged against a male classmate subsequently cleared of wrongdoing by both the university and the district attorney, has made yet another questionable accusation against yet another presumptively innocent male at Columbia. This time, it's the president of the University, Lee Bollinger. Read on–there might be an important lesson here.

Here's what happened. Sulkowicz graduated from the University on Tuesday, and the University discouraged her from bringing her ugly old mattress to the graduation ceremony. An email was circulated Monday from the Columbia administration asking students not to bring "large objects which could interfere with the proceedings or create discomfort to others in close, crowded spaces shared by thousands of people" to the ceremony. But Sulkowicz being Sulkowicz brought the mattress anyway, and the University allowed it even though the man she accused was also in attendance to receive a diploma. (His family was devastated, but no one seems concerned about them.) Sulkowicz was told by university officials moments before she crossed the stage that she was not allowed to carry the mattress as she received her diploma, but, of course, she ignored the instruction, and she and a gaggle of enablers toted the awful thing onstage.

It's what happened next that is disputed. Video shows President Bollinger standing on stage a few feet away from a dean. Each of the passing graduates shook the hands of the dean and then President Bollinger.

Sulkowicz's name was called out and her classmates let loose a high pitched cheer and gave her a standing ovation. Sulkowicz and her minions proceeded to walk across the stage with the big old mattress. They trotted right past the dean without bothering to stop or to shake his hand. As the mattress brigade approached President Bollinger, Bollinger looked away, either being distracted or more likely pretending to be distracted. Sulkowicz moved her head for an instant, perhaps in an effort to make defiant eye contact with the man who was recently sued because of her mattress stunt, and then she and her minions trotted right past him, too, mattress and all–without attempting to shake his hand.

The BBC's on-line report of the incident had this headline:

> Rape protest student 'snubbed' at graduation

The New York Times recites Sulkowicz's account:

> As Ms. Sulkowicz and her friends ascended the stage, Mr. Bollinger, who had > been shaking the students' hands, turned his back and leaned down as though to pick something up from his seat. Ms. Sulkowicz leaned over the mattress, trying to catch his eye, then straightened up and kept walking, shrugging with her free hand. …

> "I even tried to smile at him or look him in the eye, and he completely turned away," she said later. "So that was surprising, because I thought he was supposed to shake all of our hands."

Sulkowicz's account is curious because it suggests President Bollinger refused to shake her hand. Sulkowicz's claim doesn't withstand scrutiny. The video shows that Sulkowicz and her friends made no effort to shake the dean's hand just a moment before they approached President Bollinger. The dean was not in any way distracted, and there is no indication that he would have refused to shake their hands.

For his part, if President Bollinger was momentarily distracted, whether for real or for pretend, and if Sulkowicz was intent on shaking his hand, she could have done what every other graduate did — extend her arm to shake his hand. She didn't do it. She kept walking with that big, stupid mattress in between her and the president. Nevertheless major news outlets have taken Sulkowicz's side and are reporting that Bollinger snubbed Sulkowicz.

The University said there was no intended snub and that Bollinger couldn't shake Sulkowicz's hand because the mattress was between them. The University also took issue with the New York Times' story in this statement:

The Times story about Columbia College Class Day reflects a highly selective and strained interpretation of actual events. President Bollinger participated in the Class Day ceremony, as he does every year, to honor all graduating students. As thousands of people saw in person and video of the event illustrates, the students who chose to carry a mattress in their hands marched right past Dean Valentini and President Bollinger rather than pausing for traditional handshakes with either the College Dean or University President. That is their right, but the idea that there was any intended "snub" is incorrect and does not ring true to anyone who knows President Bollinger and his graciousness.

On the one hand, Bollinger runs the risk that women's groups will accuse him of being a "rape denier" for snubbing the public face of campus rape. On the other hand, my guess is that he was happy Sulkowicz kept walking so that he didn't have to give her a photo-op that could be construed as a tacit endorsement of her puerile mattress stunt.

But President Bollinger did not refuse to shake her hand. Emma Sulkowicz wasn't looking for a handshake, she was looking for one last curtain call with her mattress, because it's all about her. The fact that President Bollinger didn't flash her a big, affirming smile was not just understandable but appropriate, given her open defiance of the university's request that she leave the mattress home.

There's an important lesson here. Sulkowicz put a questionable spin on a "he said-she said" interaction that lasted less than two seconds, and important news outlets ran with it because it fit their preferred narrative of "college woman oppressed by patriarchy." And this incident happened in broad daylight before hundreds of spectators and any number of video cameras. If President Bollinger could be wrongly convicted in the court of public opinion for this minor transgression under these not-very-murky and very public circumstances, think how easy it would have been to smear Paul Nungesser for a sexual interaction that happened in the privacy of Sulkowicz's dorm room in August 2012.

Perhaps this is a teachable moment for Bollinger and his university. They have been given a very, very, very small taste of what Paul Nungesser has gone through for years. To quote the dreaded Catherine Comins, "it is not a pain that I would necessarily have spared [him]. I think it ideally initiates a process of self-exploration."

The Feminist assault on the Australian Army

May 25, 2015 | by David O'Hanlon | Link | Original Link

It is galling that on the centenary of the Battle of Gallipoli the Australian Army is facing an existential threat from its own leadership. This threat is for the very soul of the Army comes in the chilling form of political correctness and the dead hand of orthodox feminism. It appears Clemenceau was correct when he observed that "War was too important to be left to the generals."

Many astute readers of A Voice For Men will be aware of the fraudulent White Ribbon Australia campaign (as opposed to the legitimate WhiteRibbon.org, which is not affiliated with the Australian group–Eds). They will be aware of how not a cent of the money the campaign earns has yet to go near anything remotely connected to domestic violence. They will also be aware of how the figures about domestic violence the campaign quotes were simply made up out of thin air, as they inevitably had to be, in order to support the equally fanciful myth that underpins the entire campaign, namely that only men are perpetrators of domestic violence. And if that was not enough, to add insult to injury, the name of the campaign itself was stolen from Erin Pezzey the founder of the first shelter for victims of domestic violence in the UK, who created the White Ribbon that actually cares about all victims of Domestic Violence. (1)

What readers outside of Australia may not be aware of though is that the Australian Army is, as an institution, closely associated with the dubious White Ribbon Australia and great pressure is placed upon serving members to participate in it. The Chief of the Australian Army, Lt. General David Morrison, who self-identifies as a feminist, has even publicly stated that it is his hope that the Army will be the largest single organization associated with campaign. But how did it come to pass that Australia's beloved Army, custodians of the ANZAC heritage, come to tarnish its hard won reputation by being associated with a transparent and outrageous fraud?

Part of the answer is that in 2013, just when Lt. General Morrison the now notorious "Jedi Council" scandal broke. This involved male soldiers filming female soldiers having sex and posting the footage on the Australian Army's internal internet. Lt. Morrison responded by famously posting a video statement in which he tells those soldiers involved that there is no place for such actions or for them in the Australian Army. The video became an overnight viral sensation and the General a national personality.

So far so good. So where did things go wrong? How could a crucial western nation in the middle of the War on Terror be afflicted by an ideology that threatens to completely destroy its morale, discipline and effectiveness. Lt. General Morrison claims that as result of this and exposure to the problems of sexual harassment faced by women soldiers by members of his staff he decided that the solution was the adoption of the feminist ideology not just personally but as the governing philosophy of the Australian Army. This was entirely in keeping with feminism's self-presentation as the sole defenders of women rather than a ruthless political programme responsible for the ruthless politicization of rape as means of leveraging power.

However in adopting the ideology of feminism Morrison did not get real about the issue of women in the military and the issues they face. He got ideological which is a denial of reality which in turn for an Army is a recipe for disaster. In self identifying as a feminist Morrison identifies himself as an ideologue and a partisan of an ideology that is based upon demonstrably false premises and can only be sustained through the industrial scale generation of false data and the ruthless suppression of even the slightest dissent through smearing anyone who would question its assumptions as rapists or rape enablers.

Such a mindset informs the (dishonest, unethical) White Ribbon Australia campaign which Lt. General Morrison has fallen for hook, line and sinker. Through Morrison and his immediate predecessor, Lt. General Gillespie, who is listed as one the campaign's paid board members, feminism has been able to enlist the prestige and authority of the Army to its service. Young male Australian soldiers have been, and one suspects are still today, led by Generals who regard soldiers innocent of the rape or abuse of women themselves, but who do not sign up to feminism as the enablers of such things. This is a terrible and unwarranted opinion for any officer to have of the troops under him but it is especially deplorable in the Chief of the Army. In such an environment could any soldier really exercise a free choice not to participate in the White Ribbon Australia campaign?

Feminism is a particularly intolerant ideology and within a military framework this aspect is only exacerbated. A sour, intolerant climate of fear for stepping out of line with the new doctrine and atmosphere of political correctness has taken hold in the Army. In a recent interview posted on the Army's Facebook page, Lt. General Morrison stated that there is also apparently no place in the Army for those soldiers who do not agree with this dramatic change of martial culture. At the end of his interview Morrison especially singles out young male soldiers, who have borne the brunt of the fighting in all Armies from the dawn of time and always will, for special hostile attention as being amongst those who need to get with, not just the new feminist agenda, but what Morrison himself describes as a feminine culture he wishes to see prevail throughout the Army. (2)

That there might be sound reasons, and not just sexism, why Armies have always been predominantly male and governed by a male ethos seems to have eluded Australia's senior soldier. More than at any other time in our history Australia has desperate need of the traditional, cheeky, irreverent Digger and his contempt for overbearing, pompous authority to keep the Army grounded in reality, true to itself and a safe and fit institution for freemen and women to serve.

Feminism is a deliberately divisive ideology, it being largely a product of the Frankfurt School's campaign to subvert Western society from within and achieve what the Marxist theorist Antonio Gramsci described as , "the long march through the institutions." Feminism is not about gender equality but is a radically illiberal and anti-enlightenment ideology. Having Feminism as the guiding philosophy of successive Chiefs of the Army represents a dangerous politicization of the Army. This in itself represents a fundamental challenge to the social contract that renders a regular Army compatible with democracy. In feminism the Australian Army faces a more serious threat to its continued existence that that posed by any foreign enemy. They simply sought to kill as many Diggers (Australian soldiers) as they could, not destroy the Army's soul.

As the name implies, is inherently chauvinist and inevitably demands special privileges for women at the expense of men whilst still being celebrated as victims no matter what their personal circumstances or achievements. Although it clearly regards women as superior to men it oxymoronically lacks confidence in their ability to achieve success without marshalling the full power of the state. Under such circumstances women who do achieve have to endure having their accomplishments permanently second guessed. Ironically, contrary to the intent, the grandstanding of women in the Army by the High Command actually undermines their acceptance as soldiers as an unremarkable and normal state of affairs.

Feminism rejects equality of opportunity, or as we say in Australia, "a fair go" which is liberalism. Rather it promotes equality of outcome which is Maoism. If the Australian Army was, like many European Armies, only ever involved in Peacekeeping Operations then it could get away with this. However the Australian Army is deeply involved in the War on Terror and such a policy will simply get people killed. There are many roles in the Army in which women can make a real contribution including combat support roles especially in Counter insurgencies. Because there is no frontline in these types of conflicts the difference between these roles and what used to be known as the "teeth arms" (Infantry, Artillery, Armour) may at times seem somewhat academic. However insisting that women be integrated into these corps can only be achieved by lowering standards thus degrading performance and needlessly putting lives, and indeed the nation, at risk.

Unlike the Olympics there is no special women's events in war run parallel to those of men. Its demands are absolute and failure is fatal. As the British Army found out the hard way during trials in the 1990s when men and women had to meet the same physical standards it resulted in over 60% of the women being unable to continue training due to injuries. (3) Women cannot be integrated into combat forces, certainly not at levels that would satisfy feminists without lowering standards. Of course women ought to be able to achieve all they can in the Army but it ought to be kept in mind that all soldiers are there to serve the Army, not the other way round.

Lt. General Morrison's revulsion at the abuse of women soldiers was commendable but, in reaction, to adopt feminism as an ideology was to embrace ignorance and prejudice. In doing so he showed himself to be easily led and intellectually unsophisticated. These are hardly characteristics one wishes to find in a Chief of Army. Although obviously painfully well intentioned Morrison is at best a gullible ideologue who was clearly unsuited to high command. Using Feminism as his primary organizing principle and politicalizing the Australian Army through association with the White Ribbon Australian campaign Morrison, despite his life time of devoted service, has done much reputational damage to it as an institution. To be of any use in protecting Australia, the Army is the one institution above all others that must remain both apolitical and ruthlessly meritocratic rather than making it the plaything of feminism.

Jessica Valenti is such a creep!

---

Our favorite dummkopf Jessica Valenti has a new column up about how she's holding off for the moment on "suggesting you put away all books written by men or only listen to female musicians", but she will confess that she creeps on men on the subway to judge them for their Twitter feeds.

> I was riding the subway recently when I noticed my seatmate scrolling through a Twitter feed that looked remarkably like mine. I was tickled to be sitting next to a like-minded person, but as I looked on I noticed there was one thing that seemed to be missing from his newsfeed: women. He was following fantastic and smart men, but still – as far as I could tell, all men.

You noticed? How did that happen? Were you fem-spreading into his space? Fem-breathing his air? Did you brush any part of your body up against him while you were creeping on his feed? Did you boob-brush him?

Ewwww. That's sexual assault, you know. Keep your tits, your hands, your eyes and your body to yourself, you pervert! And stop being such a nosy bitch. #BanNosy! Aside from her blatant disregard for another person's privacy, what is Jess moaning about today?

> …when your worldview is solely shaped by men, you are missing out. And like it or not, your taste in music, books, television or art says something about you: it sends a message about what you think is worth your time, what you think is interesting and who you think is smart. So if the only culture you pay attention to is created by men, or created by white people, you are making an explicit statement about who and what is important.

Oh really? That's an interesting claim. And just what are we missing out on? Let's look at the top ten bestselling books by women, both fiction and non-fiction (excluding children's books) for 2014 from Amazon.com:

1. Jesus Calling: Enjoying Peace in His Presence – Sarah Young
2. Unbroken – Laura Hillenbrand
3. Divergent – Veronica Roth
4. To Kill A Mockingbird – Harper Lee
5. Gone Girl – Gillian Flynn
6. The Goldfinch – Donna Tartt
7. Wonder – R.J. Palacio
8. Make it Ahead: The Barefoot Contessa – Ina Garten
9. If I Stay – Gayle Forman
10. Insurgent – Veronica Roth

I've read four of those books (Unbroken, Divergent, Gone Girl and Insurgent) and the only other two I might be interested in are Mockingbird (incredible that I have never read it) and Goldfinch. I quite liked Tartt's first novel The Secret History. I missed out on a cookbook, a religious guide, some psycho-babble and a teen-fiction book about a girl who loses her memory.

What did the men write during this time?

1. Strengths Finder 2.0 – Tom Rath
2. The Fault in Our Stars – John Green
3. Killing Patton – Martin Dugard
4. What If: Serious Scientific Answers to Absurd Hypothetical Questions – Randall Munroe
5. The Heroes of Olympus – Rick Riordan
6. The Book Thief – Martin Zuzak
7. Humans of New York – Brandon Stanton
8. Game of Thrones – George R. R. Martin
9. Capital – Thomas Piketty
10. How to Win Friends and Influence People – Dale Carnegie

I've read Book Thief, Game of Thrones and How to Win Friends. I might be interested in Patton, What If, and Capital. Six out of ten bestselling books written by men are non-fiction (three for women), so right off the bat, we can assume that if you read only women, you'll be reading mostly make-believe. I guess Valenti would like to see a world in which people spend most of their time in imaginary places with imaginary people rather than immersing themselves in facts, history, theory and research?

Color me shocked.

Let's take a look at the best-selling books of all time (excluding the Bible) written by men and women and see what our world views would look like if we read only women:

Top ten bestselling books of all time by women:

1. And Then There Were None – Agatha Christie
2. Steps to Christ – Ellen G. White
3. The Hite Report – Shere Hite
4. The Tale of Peter Rabbit – Beatrix Potter
5. Harry Potter – J.K.Rowling
6. You Can Heal Your Life – Louise L. Hay
7. Diary of a Young Girl – Anne Frank
8. To Kill A Mockingbird – Harper Lee
9. Valley of the Dolls – Jaqueline Susan
10. Gone With the Wind – Margaret Mitchell

Top ten bestselling books of all time by men:

1. A Tale of Two Cities – Charles Dickens

2. The Lord of the Rings – J.R.R. Tolkien
3. Dream of the Red Chamber – Tsao Hsueh-Chin
4. The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe – C.S. Lewis
5. She: A History of Adventure – H. Rider Haggard
6. The Little Prince – Antoine de Saint Exupery
7. The DaVinci Code – Dan Brown
8. The Catcher in the Rye – J.D Salinger
9. The Alchemist – Paolo Coelho
10. The Common Sense Book of Baby and Child Care – Benjamin Spock

If our world-view were shaped solely by reading women, we would be reading deeply personal autobiographies (Frank) and fictional accounts of a personal stories (Mockingbird) , soap operas, fiction aimed at children, illustrations the victim narrative (Heal Your Life), pornography (the Hite book, and yes, I've read it), a murder mystery and a spiritual guide.

If our world-view were shaped by reading men (and it is), we will be reading sweeping sagas and epics that involve entire civilizations over time (Rings, Lion, Red Chamber, Code), parables meant to critique philosophy (Prince, Alchemist), social commentary (Rye) and how to care for children. The difference between a saga and a soap opera is that the undercurrent of an epic is the survival of an entire civilization and way of life, while a soap opera generally only concerns a handful of families in competition with one another.

This actually fits in really well with feminist philosopher Carol Gilligan, who wrote a book called In A Different Voice, and the tl;dr is that women make morality and justice very personal (how will this affect the people I care about?) and men make morality and justice universal (would I want this to apply to everyone, everywhere?). At first feminists loved Gilligan because she seemed to be saying that personal morality was better – more nuanced and more likely to achieve true justice, but they quickly realized that if this is true, women cannot be trusted to make moral decisions that are intended to apply universally. The feminist hordes quickly turned on Gilligan and shredded her.

I keep a list of the books I have read and I counted back to November 2013 – I have read 80 books since that time. 62 were by men and 18 were by women. Just under a quarter of all the books I have read are by women, so I guess in Valenti's view, I'm sexist against women? Or I'm interested in universal subjects, not deeply personal ones, and I prefer a great deal of non-fiction? I am particularly interested in military history, and there is not a lot of that written by women.

Here's the list as an imgur file, if you're interested.

Most people, I think, choose books based on the subject matter, and they choose subjects they are interested in. I would say there are definite prejudices that come in to play, but that is because those prejudices are reasonable and rational. It is perfectly reasonable to think that when choosing between two books about warring factions in the Scottish Highlands, the one written by a woman will be a romance novel and the one written by a man will be narrative non-fiction. Not many men want to read about rippling chests and tight loins in a kilt and rape fantasies on the heather, while plenty of women do. Not many women want to read about how to maintain bowis and dorlochis in inclement weather when a battle looms and plenty of men do. At the end of the day, I doubt anyone gives a rat's ass if the romance novel was written by John Wordsmith and the battle bio by Jane Inkwell – they care about the subject matter, not what's under the kilt of the person who wrote it.

Valenti demonstrates her sexism perfectly with this particular column. Read books by women because a woman wrote them, not because the subject matter interests you. Here's a hint, Jess: write shit that doesn't put most men (and a whole lot of women) into a fucking coma, and they might want to read you.

And stop creeping on men on the subway.

It's gross.

Lots of love,

JB

Feminists Earn Merit Badge of Misandry

May 26, 2015 | by Hannah Wallen | Link | Original Link

On May 9th, I wrote about an effort by Dan Perrins to draw attention to issues of male suicide, and male victims of abuse. His 75 mile walk and his hunger strike served to both spread that awareness, and pressure Ontario politicians to consider these issues. In addition to his request that the Ontario legislature take action to ensure funding for shelters to house male victims of abuse, he asked that Canada's criminal defamation law be enforced against opponents of men's issues activists when they resort to libel or slander instead of honest discussion.

The hashtag #IStandWithDan was used to promote awareness of Dan's campaign. Feminists who oppose men's rights activism in general and Dan's activism specifically found it, and set about giving a demonstration of why men's rights activists are so critical of feminism.

Feminists often complain that men's rights activists never do anything. They visit forums for discussion of men's issues to tell us that very thing, accompanied by the accusation that men's rights activism is about nothing but criticizing feminism. With one of their chief accusations being a lack of real-world action, you'd think their response to #IStandWithDan would have been somewhere between neutral and positive.

Instead, a group of them reacted with outrage, opposing any suggestion that battered men should receive the same protections as battered women. Their arguments?

Some men are violent. Apparently this means that nonviolent men should be punished.

In light of the above, it was argued, abused men deserve nothing more than a few days in a homeless shelter to help them escape their circumstances:

Feminist math: 3 = 21. Wonder why so few of them enter STEM fields?

They also complained against the idea of holding gender discussion to the same legal standards as other speech. Dan asked that section 300 of the criminal code of Canada be upheld. This request is due to a habit among feminists of responding to advocacy with defamatory hyperbole. Assertions such as “male victims of sexual violence deserve the same legal recourse as female victims” and “fathers are as important to their children as mothers” are answered with targeted accusations of everything from intent to roll back women’s voting rights to a desire to legalize rape, and even pedophilia.

The right to free political speech extends to criticizing any group’s assertions and even to discussing known behavior. The disagreement between MRAs and feminists is whether it extends to leveling false accusations as a means of silencing or obscuring an opponent’s political speech. Dan’s request is that the legislators recognize everyone’s rights and responsibilities equally. His opponents wish to legalize the use of false, but often unfalsifiable accusations to silence whoever they do not wish to be heard. Rather than just admit that, however, they played the victim card, falsely claiming that the goal was to silence all criticism. When that claim was countered, one of the group made it his mission to spam the hashtag with repetition of that claim and others under the apparent belief that a lie repeated often enough actually does become the truth.

When these tactics did not deter either Dan’s efforts or the enthusiasm of men’s issues activists communicating in the hashtag, the opposition decided to switch gears. Beginning on the 15th of May, they began spamming the hashtag with random images ranging from ridiculous to gross to NSFW, along with a few threatoids. The attack was neither well organized nor enthusiastic enough to keep up with activity in the hashtag. It was abandoned after a couple of days and most of the spammers disappeared, with a few remaining behind to resume demonizing men and treating calls for accountability as an

Curious, I visited it. It was pitiful, a barely populated tag created by one of the same accounts which has been harassing Dan, entirely for the purpose of generalizing the dysfunction of criminals onto the general male population.

Feminists will tell you that feminism is about equality for everyone. They'll tell you it's not about man-hating. When the hashtag #yesallwomen was coined the excuse was that it was about female experiences, not bashing men. Thin as that excuse was for #yesallwomen, it's nonexistent for #menareviolent. There is no purpose for it except to, by compiling a list of incidents, insinuate that violence is a uniquely defining characteristic of masculinity.

Further, such an attack is not accidental or incidental. The same ideologues who engage in it object vehemently when dysfunctional female behavior is even discussed at all. While they expect men to take no issue with all being generalized to their lowest common denominator, the act of even acknowledging that women and girls are capable of having character flaws is taken as woman-bashing and treated as evidence of misogyny.

This can be seen in many men's issues discussion forums, where concern troll posts can be found admonishing the regulars that "women behaving badly" posts, generally put up as a response to "dysfunction-X is a male behavior," make them look like woman-hating basement dwellers. In other words, if feminists claim that certain character flaws are elements of masculinity, no man had better contradict them with anything stronger than "Nuh UH!" or he'll be labeled a misogynist, because as feminists will tell you, compiling evidence of a gender's dysfunction is a display of hate for that gender. Except, of course, when they do it.

Considering the attack on #IStandWithDan, a group of us decided to see what would happen if we gave the opposition a taste of their own medicine. We posted to #menareviolent, linking images, videos, and news stories showing men in a positive light.

Because the hashtag was infrequently used, the new posts were at first not noticed by its regular users. Our twitter followers, however, did notice, and some of them began following our lead. In short order the violent posts were drowned in a sea of men fighting fires, rescuing people trapped in flooded homes and submerged cars, saving animals, and volunteering to mentor children.

When the tag's dedicated feminists and their friends noticed the change, their response was very telling. They all but sat in a corner and hissed at us like vampires hit with bright light.

If it wasn't clear before feminists' response that the hashtag was, in fact, about demonizing men, the resentful whining that showing good things men do contradicts their hateful narrative made it obvious. While feminists claim to not hate men, they demonstrate a hateful opinion of what men's innate nature is. While they claim their advocacy is about equality for women and that somehow that advocacy will help men, they clearly have demonizing men as a goal. And while they claim that they want men to be kind, compassionate, and protective, they are offended at anything which shows men in that light. It's obvious that feminism is not about helping women, but about damaging society's view of men. Why else would a show of men displaying admirable character be taken as an attack?

These ideologues effectively communicated that while demonstration of admirable character is expected of men, it is never to be acknowledged, nor does feminism consider any admirable trait a male characteristic, even when examples of it are common among men. Only things which can be used to demonize men may be generalized as a means of defining and describing masculinity.

Feminists complain that women are objectified, but there's nothing more objectifying than treating a person in such a utilitarian manner as men are treated by feminist ideology. They want a man to be a weapon, a wallet, a stepping stone, a security blanket, a punching bag when they're mad… anything but an actual person with his own unique set of characteristics, experiences, and needs.

Such is the nature of feminist misandry. This is why they are so offended at advocacy for the inclusion of men and boys in human rights initiatives such as domestic violence victim's advocacy; not because need is a uniquely female experience, but because doing so requires acknowledging that men are equally human. And then they wonder why men's rights activists are critical of their rhetoric.

Tattoos, good judgement and women

With only three exceptions, I have paid a visit to the state fair every year since 1976. For some people, the state fair means the midway, or corny dogs, or pig races, or the auto show; for me, it means the freak show. Correction: it used to mean the freak show.

I don't remember when the freak show disappeared. You might suspect it fell victim to heightened sensitivity to human disabilities (thank God I still have Ripley's Believe-It-or-Not Odditoriums to satisfy my morbid curiosity). I don't doubt that such a change in attitude was a factor, but a bigger reason was the paucity of freaks. Thanks to medical advances, institutionalization, and legalized abortion, there just weren't that many freaks available.

There is one exception to that rule, however. I refer to the tattooed lady.

What distinguished the tattooed lady from the other freaks in the show was that her freakiness was self-inflicted. Also, she was ahead of her time. Today Americans spend $1,650,500,000 on tattoos; tattooing is the nation's sixth fastest growing industry.

Before going any further, I must admit that I don't like tattoos. Does that make me intolerant? Well, I could reject any other genre of artwork, such as murals or landscapes, without being accused of narrow-mindedness or bigotry. Why not tattoo art?

The subject was never an issue till a couple of decades ago. I used to occasionally pay a visit to one of the many local topless bars – pardon me, gentleman's clubs – so I could wallow in a state of beer-buzzed, middle-aged, semi-arousal.

By the late 1990s, tattoos were all the rage. It was almost impossible to see a dancer without a tramp stamp or some other symbol or picture, meaningful or meaningless (to me if not to her). I simply could not fathom why a young woman, with her skin at its peak of radiance and health, would do anything to detract from it. Flat-chested or full figure; statuesque or petite; blond, brunette, or redhead, healthy skin tone is a key component of neoteny and nubility.

One day in 1998, I made up my mind that if the club I was visiting couldn't offer at least one dancer without a tattoo, I would swear off gentleman's clubs. They couldn't, so I did. Spending money on superficial turn-ons is a dubious activity; spending money on turn-offs makes even less sense. I went to such establishments to ogle female flesh; if I wanted to see art — representational, abstract, primitive, or whatever – I would go to a museum.

Well, as one grows older, the things one doesn't like have a way of multiplying. According to a Fox News Poll, 13% of voters in 2007 had tattoos; by 2014 the number was 20%. It's no surprise that among seniors, tattoos are rare, and men are far more likely to have them. Today, the reverse is true among young adults. 25% of all men under 25 have at least one tattoo; for women in that age group, the number is 47%.

One can't help but wonder why. After all, goofy hair styles in garish colors can be transformed in a day. Even the most cringe-inducing piercings can be easily removed. Not so with tattoos.

Suppose you had the option of selecting items of apparel that you would wear forever. Go to your closet, pick out your favorite shirt, trousers, socks, shoes, and hat. Imagine that these items were made of some super substance that would never wear out, and you could wear them for the rest of your life. Assuming you could do that, would you? Of course not. But you can get tattooed sleeves you will wear forever. You can go beyond that to the rest of your torso and hence create a shirt you will wear forever. Same goes for leggings.

So what motivates people to get inked? (The average cost of tattooing is $150 per hour, and though I've never experienced it, I suspect the process is not pleasurable.) Well, according to Skin Deep: The Truth About Tattoos in America:

31% say it makes them feel sexy.

Ever hear of Victoria's Secret?

29% say it makes them feel rebellious.

Maybe when you're 14 years old, but consider the fact that meaningful subversion is best accomplished by those who fly under the radar – ghosting, in the current parlance.

5% say it makes them feel more intelligent.

Wouldn't a library card have the same effect?

The increase in tats has created a sort of fraternity of the inked. I've seen sleeved strangers in public say "nice sleeves" or something to that effect. It's like wearing a university or sports team T-shirt and encountering someone else wearing same while visiting the Great Wall of China. Of course, you're going to say something.

But it is difficult to understand why people compliment each other for, essentially, being blank canvases. The tattoo artist did the work, the tattooee just sat (or lay) there. A blank canvas can't express anything. It is mute. It is passive. When you see a heavily-tattooed person, the unspoken message is, "I really don't have much to say for myself."

Paradoxically, tattoos can speak loudly. The law firm I work for has a dress code for employees who appear in court. For the most part, it states the obvious, but it also goes into great detail about jewelry, hair styles, and accessories. Naturally, visible tattoos are taboo. But why?

One day I happened upon a documentary film wherein a famous trial attorney discussed the minutiae of his pre-trial preparation. He mentioned that he always swapped out his gaudy wedding ring for a plain gold band. Why? He didn't want the jury getting distracted by some flashy trinket while he was trying to get his point across to the jury. He wanted them to listen to him, not look at the rock on his left ring finger and wonder how much it cost.

Next time you have jury duty, look at the attorneys. The clothing will be conservative if not downright bland. Jewelry, if any, will be minimal. You will see no neckties with psychedelic patterns or hula dancers. That's because the stakes are high. A criminal trial could be a matter of life and death; a civil trial could involve millions of dollars. It's essential for the jurors to pay attention and not have their heads turned by tattoos or any other potential distraction. Still, if you're trying to get out of jury duty, a vivid display of tats during the jury selection process just might get you eliminated.

I suspect the elderly tattooed lady I saw at the state fair had never served on a jury. Wearing a bikini and tattooed from head to toe, she stood on a pedestal, objectified by mostly male gazers. I have no idea how old she was when she commenced her body art project, or how long it took her to acquire so many tattoos, but time had not been kind to her or them. Her sagging flesh had stretched and distorted the tats, and the color had faded with time. Now her body art looked as though it had been done by Salvador Dali working in pastels.

I don't know what the tattooed lady did after the freak show went belly up. I'm sure she's dead by now, and I suspect her arrival at the funeral home created a stir. If she had an open-casket funeral, did she wear her bikini?

Beyond aesthetics, the most disconcerting feature of tattoos is what you don't see: the lack of foresight. No surprise that tattoo removal is also a growth industry – up 32% since 2011. A related statistic from the Center for Progressive Excellence is that 61% of HR personnel say that tattoos would deter them from hiring somebody. So those tats could end up costing a lot more than the fees of the tattoo artist.

Suppose you've got your eye on a young lovely who seemingly has it all…including tattoos. If you like tattoos, great; but if you don't like them, can you just ignore them? After all, you're going to be looking at them every day, possibly till death do you part. Do you really want to cuddle up long-term with a dickless Queequeg?

Ultimately, you have to seriously question the judgment of a young woman who would make a permanent commitment to something as trivial as body art. Of course, good judgment is only rarely associated with young women, which is why young women are kept on a short leash in traditional societies. When young women are given freedom, they often fuck it up. That doesn't mean a tattoo-free woman can't be fucked up, but one who is tattooed…well, no matter what the design, it might as well be a big red warning flag.

Come to think of it, didn't Nathaniel Hawthorne write a novel on a similar theme?

Oh, feminism, how do I hate thee?

May 26, 2015 | by August Løvenskiolds | Link | Original Link

Let me count the ways…

There is a film being made about the "f" word. It is called, unsurprisingly, "The F Word – Film" – at least, that is their name on twitter. Glamour UK wrote an article on it and called it The Trouble with the F-word.

Whatever its name, if the documentary were about the words "fuck" and "fucking" it might have been worthwhile and even fun. But no, the documentary purports to explore the reasons "feminism" and "feminists" are hated – a question so simple that you have to wonder if the filmmakers were fucked in the head.

The trailer for the documentary opens and closes with the timorous, grating voice of Emma "bait and switch" Watson trying to entice men into supporting her feminist initiative "#HeForShe" by promising men help for men's issues – and then switching to make it only about women.

Really, that is all one needs to hate feminism. Feminism is a scam that promises to help men and reneges on the promise. If you don't understand why people get angry at the malice of liars and scams then a lot of scammers would love to meet you.

If feminism were to stop scamming men and women, a lot of people might look on the dictionary "equality" of feminism with a bit more favor.

Well, maybe they would if feminism weren't so sexually intrusive. Feminism wants to invade our bedrooms, regulate our sexual interactions and even control our sexual fantasies. If you are a man who is sexually attracted to pretty women, feminists will call you "creepy" and your sexuality "toxic." They will sneer at both you and the women who appreciate the aggressive and focused sexuality in men. What part of "equality" is demonizing men's sexuality while celebrating women's? Your sexuality is literally none of their fucking business but God help you if you tell them to fuck the hell off.

If feminism were to stop being such a scam and respected people's sexuality then perhaps folks could take it seriously.

Of course, for people to take feminists seriously, they would have to stop with all the rape hoaxes. Feminism has a long and proud history of faking rape for fun and profit. Did you know that the crown jewel of second wave feminism, the Roe v. Wade Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion, began as a rape hoax?

> Norma McCorvey…initially said that her third pregnancy, the one in question at the time of Roe v. Wade, was the result of rape, but years later she said she had invented the rape story in an attempt to make a stronger case for an abortion. The rape story was of little consequence to her lawyers, because they wanted to establish a right to abortion for all women, not just those who had been raped. – from "Women's History" website.

Norma McCorvey concocted a fake rape story on the theory that it would build sympathy with the Justices. The rape hoax was eventually dropped – it was limiting and it seems some lawyers and judges have this thing about professional ethics and disrespected Norma's feminist right to lie her fucking, scamming ass off – but abortion was legalized despite the efforts of these lying feminists.

Feminists carry on this proud tradition of rape hoaxes even today with wild stories such as the University of Virginia debacle where feminist Jackie Coakley attempted to destroy the lives of 5 to 7 men (depending on which of her lies you believe) of the Phi Kappa Psi fraternity. People hate rape hoaxes because they ruin men's lives and because they make it harder for real rape victims to be taken seriously – just like feminism.

If feminism were to (1) stop being such a scam, (2) respect people's sexuality and (3) cut out the rape hoaxes, then perhaps folks wouldn't hate it so much.

Well, of course, people will still viscerally hate feminism for the abortion thing. People love children – they are our future and the only good answer to the fact of personal mortality: being alive and living with the knowledge that some day we will die. Abortion is not really an "equality" issue in that men do not have reproductive rights – whether you think legal abortion is good or evil there can be no rational dispute that it is a privilege given to women and denied to men, and that this fact refutes feminism's claim to be a movement for equality.

So, if feminism were to (1) stop scamming, (2) respect people's sexuality, (3) cut out rape hoaxes, (4) disassociate itself from abortion and (5) adhere to its actual equality claims, then perhaps folks wouldn't run away when a feminist opens her cranial cock-holster.

Then again, there is that irritating minutiae issue – of late, feminism seems to be focusing on the tiniest details of human behavior with the intent of policing them or even criminalizing them. Rather than focus on real, pressing issues, feminism thinks it is its business to critique your choices of whom you follow on Twitter in case your taste might be sexist. From manspreading to mansplaining to manvertising, feminists see patriarchy everywhere and they want to crush it under their ample butts. All this nitpicking is irritating and people hate to be irritated.

Thus, if feminism were to (1) stop scamming, (2) respect people's sexuality, (3) cut out rape hoaxes, (4) disassociate itself from abortion (5) adhere to its actual equality claims, and (6) stop minutiae irritations, then perhaps folks wouldn't wish for asteroid strikes when a feminist stomps in.

Of course, some people will still hate the open man-hate of feminism. Feminists do sometimes try to cloak their man-hate by calling it "smashing the patriarchy" but no one is fooled by this dodge. Patronizing people demeans them and when people experience this, anger and hate are normal responses.

It seems that if feminism were to (1) stop scamming, (2) respect people's sexuality, (3) cut out rape hoaxes, (4) disassociate from abortion (5) adhere to equality claims, (6) stop minutiae irritations, (7) stop hating men, and (8) stop patronizing people, then perhaps folks wouldn't look for boiling lava when a feminist wants a snack.

Of course, one thing that really irritates people is laziness. Sloth is a deadly sin for a reason – we live in a harsh world and it is the lot of most people to work hard for food and shelter. With their fake statistics on the so-called wage gap, their cries for more comforts and pampering, and their reluctance to take dangerous, dirty jobs relegated to men, feminists come off looking like entitled dilettantes and feckless whiners.

It follows, then, that if feminism were to (1) stop scamming, (2) respect people's sexuality, (3) cut out rape hoaxes, (4) disassociate from abortion (5) adhere to equality claims, (6) stop minutiae irritations, (7) stop hating men, (8) stop patronizing people, (9) stop acting lazy, (10) eschew fake statistics, (11) de-emphasize pampering and (12) take difficult jobs, then perhaps critics wouldn't daydream about revenge so readily.

As it happens, sometimes what feminists omit hurts their reputation as well. Feminists rarely express (13) genuine gratitude – when they say "thank you" the sarcasm drips like pork grease from their clenched teeth. When men help them they demand more and more with not a thought that perhaps appreciation expressed gently might lift everyone's mood. Every interaction between a man and a feminist ends with the man hoping he never sees a feminist ever again.

Of course, the few "good" feminist talking points don't exactly endear them to people: even issues with some legitimacy (female genital mutilation and rape in the third world) are emotionally arduous and depressing. It might be wrong to dislike feminists for pushing these issues but it is human nature to turn away from pain, even third-hand. What is really evil, however, is how feminists attempt (14) to leverage third world crimes into pampering for first world feminists. Outrages like that earn feminists a special place in hell.

Well, that's 14 reasons why people hate feminism. There are a lot more but you get the point.

In their feigned innocence, feminists think that if people knew more about feminism they won't hate it so much. I'm willing to bet that this is the thesis of that ludicrous film and I'll be curious to see if any items on my list are reflected in it.

Keep saying that we are ignorant about you, feminists. People crave having their intelligence insulted (15). They will LOVE you for it.

I fucking promise they will.

Goin’ to Toronto soon

“Without deviation progress is not possible.” ~ Frank Zappa

In November of 2012, Dr. Warren Farrell was preparing to give a lecture on issues faced by boys in modern culture. This now famous video by Steve Brule’ documented the virulent and violent actions of the University of Toronto Student’s Union feminists in their effort to shut down his lecture.

This deplorable attempt to abridge the free expression of ideas still stands as one of the most remarkable examples of the common trend away from a liberal education and into fascism in modern universities. Unfortunately, it led directly to another equally unfortunate event.

Sarah Santhosh, a student at nearby Ryerson University was so put off by what she saw as the “close-mindedness” and “hate” of the feminist attackers that she decided that she wanted to form a men’s issues group at her school. She was joined by fellow students Anjana Rao and Argir Argirov in her efforts and they set about seeking ratification from the Ryerson Student Union (RSU) for a men’s issues group that addressed misandry.

They were quietly and quickly shut down.

The Eye Opener, Ryerson University’s student newspaper had this to say:

> Neda Hamzavi, a faculty of community services representative on the RSU Board of Directors (BOD), watched her amendment to the RSU’s policy on women’s issues pass without any debate, discussion or dispute.”

The Board’s action quickly diminshed the credibility of the school.

Under Hamzavi’s guidance, the RSU board’s rationale mostly rode on three simple, erroneous presuppositions. First, men’s rights groups don’t care about men’s rights, they just want to undermine the progress woman have made.

Other than saying this is untrue, I have no other response to that.

Two, the concept of misandry, “…ignores structural inequity that exist between men and women.”

What that actually means I am still unsure, except to say that the board appears to be saying that if you look at the hatred or irrational fear of men then it means you have to ignore the inequities that affect women. That is irrational, as projection often is, but it appears to be the message.

Finally, the RSU board further denounced and excluded men’s advocates by targeting them as, “Groups, meetings events or initiatives [that] negate the need to centre women’s voices in the struggle for gender equity.”

This one I understand clearly. It is the position of RSU that the discussion on gender equity can only be from one half of the population and that all concerns must put women at the center of attention.

It is a strange and I would argue disingenuous path to equity, especially given the inequitable treatment of the three students who wanted to form a men's issues group.

It should be pointed out that the actions of the RSU are not a reflection on university administration except to the extent that they allow any group such total control on the discourse.

Indeed, they showed open-mindedness and commitment to free expression when Karen Straughan was allowed to speak there in February of last year at a CAFE event. They further demonstrated their commitment to free speech when they picked up the tab for needed additional security after feminist thugs all but forecast another repeat of what happened at the University of Toronto.

It is with appreciation for that administration that I am pleased to announce that I will be speaking at Ryerson University on two consecutive days on the subject of Domestic Violence, the feminist academic fraud that has hindered our efforts to address the problem and the same misandry demonstrated by RSU that aggravate these already difficult issues.

The event is the Second Annual Toronto Domestic Violence Symposium and it is being hosted by the Maltese Charitable Trust. It takes place on the Ryerson Campus on June 5 and 6. It is just around the corner.

I am really looking forward to this event. It is especially satisfying for me as a men's human rights activist.

The Ryerson Student Union did their best to choke off debate and discussion. They shamelessly succeeded at shutting down three compassionate students who simply wanted to be a part of the solution.

But they have failed at their attempt to completely silence the world around them. Thanks to a reasonable and fair university administration, and to the determination of groups like AVFM, NCFM and others, the days of corrupt ideologues owning the platform are over.

As of June 5, 2015, the Men's Human Rights Movement will again take its rightful place where it is needed the most, in a Canadian university that has been ideologically corrupted with the very hatred it denies exists.

How Dave Thier rationalized lying to Forbes readers about a nonexistent boycott

May 27, 2015 | by AVfM Video Source | Link | Original Link

Why are reporters like Dave Thier of Forbes standing by their fake reporting of a nonexistent MRA boycott of Max Max Fury Road? We aren't sure, but an increasing number of non-MRA sources are wondering the same thing.

You might want to check out Dangerous Analysis.

Addendum: For the record, Dave Thier did not even respond to us when we contacted him. Neither did Forbes. Yes, we have promoted some of Aaron Clarey's work, some of which we like. Then again, we've published and promoted many things by non-MRAs, including stories in Forbes. Maybe Dave Thier and other reporters should talk to people before writing about them.

Steve Shives, male feminist, is an aggressively ignorant religious zealot

Portrayal of men in the media: why there needs to be a reverse Bechdel test

May 27, 2015 | by Nikita Coulombe | Link | Original Link

The Bechdel Test is an informal rating system outlined by graphic novelist Alison Bechdel that classifies media with three simple criteria: to pass the test a plot must

- "have at least two [named] women in it,
- who talk to each other,
- about something besides a man."

Very few video games pass all the criteria of the Bechdel Test, and just over half of movies do.

The test is imperfect; a film could pass the test but still include sexist content; nevertheless some cinemas and organizations – such as the Swedish Film Institute – are taking the rating seriously, and using it to highlight gender bias against women.

Is there a similar, Bechdel-like test that shows bias against men? No, but there should be.

For far too long, men have been cast as duds, yet doing so has clearly been profitable, thus pressure to change such negative stereotypes will need to come from the outside. Of course this will only happen when people are willing to recognize gender biases affect men, too, or how earnestly young men need more positive male role models to look up to in the media.

What would a male version of the Bechdel Test look like? In our book, Man (Dis)connected, social psychologist Philip Zimbardo and I describe a possible option we call the "MacGyver Test" (named after the popular 90s television adventure series) that a film or television show passes if it meets any of these criteria about its male characters:

- The absence of the mother is not required for the father to be portrayed as a competent dad.
- An honest, hard-working man is in a successful or leadership position and is not portrayed as a hapless loser.
- The female protagonist shows interest in male protagonist before he is the hero.
- The male protagonist solves problems in creative ways, and only uses violence as a last resort to carry out his goals or mission.

The list of media that pass these modest criteria would no doubt be a short one.

Another way to raise awareness around the portrayal of men in the media would be to swap the male and female roles in movies and television shows, and then re-examine the plots.

For example, let's reverse the roles of the "fearless" Princess Anna and the "rugged" iceman Kristoff in the Academy Award-winning animated children's movie, Frozen.

In the movie, Anna's older sister, Elsa, banishes herself from their castle because she can't control her magical ability to produce ice and snow with her hands. Anna sets out to find her sister and bring her home.

Anna is offered help by the smooth-talking Prince Hans, whom she immediately falls in love with. But who ends up helping her? The penniless iceman Kristoff, whose sled and reindeer Anna decide she can use for her own agenda – never mind if he needs them (she doesn't ask).

After nearly getting him killed, destroying his sled, and finally rescuing Elsa, Anna and Kristoff go their separate ways. It is only after Prince Hans proves himself to be evil, and Olaf – the dopey snowman sidekick – says to Anna that Kristoff would be a good match that Anna even bothers to consider Kristoff as a romantic partner.

Now imagine a movie where a prince felt entitled to use a hardworking woman whose only possessions were her sled and reindeer, which she uses to eke out a living, to go rescue his brother and after she voluntarily busts her butt to help him he goes back to his life without a second thought. Audiences would be up in arms! We would think "what's wrong with him? Why can't he get his act together?" Yet that thought doesn't even cross our minds while watching Frozen. Instead, we think Anna is quirky and adventurous. By the way, Frozen does not pass the MacGyver Test…

When two out of five children are being born to single moms (the rate is one out of two for women under 30 years old), a third of boys are growing up in father-absent homes, and boys with fathers are only spending half an hour a week in one-on-one conversation with their fathers vs. 44 hours in front of a television or computer screen (see source 8 below), we need to ask ourselves what impact the negative media portrayals of men are having on them (as well as young women).

Is it possible for the idea of men being men responsibly to make its way back into popular culture?

Why a feminist takeover of Hollywood is a problem and why it's happening

May 27, 2015 | by Rachael Lefler | Link | Original Link

I know right now the MRM has bigger fish to fry. Talking about the media is a trivial tactic used by feminists for them to cover up that in the western world, there is extremely little to no oppression of women, while the oppression of men persists like a difficult weed problem. But, what I'm personally more qualified to talk about, more than the Canadian legal issues that are the cause of Dan Perrins's courageous hunger strike, or about the Calgary Expo's hostility to the Honey Badger brigade and their upcoming legal battle, is art.

Normally, I dislike talking about art as if it were only the product of its social context. This came out of the cultural Marxist thinking, still prevalent in academia, that all cultural products were only worthy of study for what they could tell us about the intellectual climate of their time periods, or about those time periods' power hierarchies. There is some value in this. But now, the ability to produce art itself has become mass produced, taking power and social oppression more and more out of the equation when it comes to "figuring out" art, and it has become more and more about the individual psychological expressions of the artists, with the art functioning as personal statements but not so often political ones.

However, if something is being created for commercial purposes, the more expensive to make something is, the more power dynamics in society shape how it's made. This was true of big monumental sculptures in the Renaissance and remains true of Hollywood films today.

When the audience of the art is the masses, and the art is expensive to produce, the richest and most powerful people will always keep a close eye on it to make sure that the message it sends promotes their ideology. Going back to the Renaissance sculpture idea; though the artists of that period were Catholic, too, it was the power of the Catholic church that ensured that, while classically influenced, their works would convey a Christian message.

Who has the power over Hollywood movies today? The audiences, but specifically, the segments of the audience more prone to bitching about movies on Twitter and other social media sites.

The entertainment review media also has a lot of power over what directors do and don't do in a digital age, where movie makers are taking feedback and criticisms seriously and seeking to improve. As the film critic who goes by the alias The Nostalgia Critic points out, there is a lot of reason to consider this shift a good thing. After all, before movie makers could get feedback so directly about their movies, they were fumbling in the dark trying to generate successful ideas, and this led to a lot more movies that sucked.

But, I can see the writing on the wall here. When it comes to feminism, they don't genuinely care if a movie is good or bad, entertaining and charming or dull and lifeless. They only care about the extent to which the female characters in the story are whatever they decide makes a character empowered at the time. And, this taste is shifting constantly and there is never consensus, and nothing is ever agreeable enough to please them: as professional victims, they can't give up the power of their victim status too readily, so they have to find a nit to pick to complain about even the strongest and best female characters Hollywood can dream up.

And they're totally fine with a movie that perpetuates negative stereotypes about men, since we all know men are just dumb oppressive shitlords who can't keep their rape-sticks in their pants for five minutes. So you get movies like Brave, with strong female characters and a good story about mother-daughter bonding but where all the male characters are cretins, and only bowing to the whims of the mother and daughter makes the father character acceptable.

They had what I would call feminist strong female protagonists in Disney movies in the late 90's and early 00's that I remember fondly as a kid. Ariel in The Little Mermaid, although criticized for being crazy due to falling in love, is strong enough to challenge her father and assert her independence. Jasmine in Aladdin is a princess who wants to take a stand against the expectations society places on her as such. Belle in Beauty and the Beast is a badass bookworm who challenges traditional expectations for women and patriarchal attitudes in her society. Even Nala, from The Lion King, is a badass female character. But feminists on Tumblr have picked apart and attacked these fictional characters, who should be, by many of their standards, strong female characters.

But until all fictional women are perfect goddesses whose every action is strong and every word is an authoritative command, they cannot be satisfied. This is not likely to be challenged.

The mainstream entertainment news basically just repeats feminist tweets as authoritative golden scrolls handed down from on high. Feminists will never be satisfied by any work of fiction, no matter how in line it is with feminist principles. They can always demand more, and they always will. Their whole idea of "activism" is to cry about how they are being oppressed by the latest blockbuster and to angrily denounce the next one on Twitter.

Since they now claim to speak for all minority ethnic groups, they want more representation of them in the media. But this is ignoring that these minority ethnic groups have their own medias, made by and for them, and that the mainstream movies are made for everyone in the United States, which is a majority white country. For them, a token black person is insulting and not enough. Having a protagonist who's a strong, assertive, independent woman who does not get hitched is still a bad thing if she has the nerve to be white, for her story to take place in a European culture, to be thin, and to be able-bodied. I'm not even kidding here.

The fact is, this maddening obsession with a distorted concept of egalitarianism and fairness is never going to end, the media is never going to wake up to it and realize that they are pandering to a crazy minority within a minority of feminists, and Hollywood will keep trying to make films that meet their demands which are never able to be met, because the feminists will still find shit to complain about. This in turn will only drive good writers, directors and other content creators away, the people who want to make good movies, regardless of their value to social justice idiots.

This vacuum will be filled with shitty feminist movies, which will be made by activists who care nothing for the entertainment value or philosophical interest or artistry of their works but only about hijacking the fame-power of Hollywood studios to turn them into produce works which fit into their radical leftist agendas. Hollywood is experiencing a peak that will be short-lived before it gets taken over by people who do not care about movies and who only want to suck the fun out of everything in order to fight the nonexistent patriarchy, to make themselves feel important. They want to ruin everything fun by injecting their paranoid misandry into it.

Don't believe me? They've already got the friggin' ACLU on their leash. You would think the American Civil Liberties Union would have more important issues to tackle than a "dearth of female directors in Hollywood". You would also think that an organization based on libertarian principles would not be demanding that the iron fist of the state be brought down upon the private affairs of an entire industry just because a few women whined about… fewer women than men choosing to become directors?.. but you would be wrong. Enjoy the fact that the next decade is going to see the video game and film industries taken over by radical man-hating professional victims, which is already happening, while no one says or does anything.

Poster at UQ: this room is “a safer space for anyone who is not a cis-man.”

May 27, 2015 | by Jonathan Taylor | Link | Original Link

The below poster on a door at the University of Queensland reads “This women’s room is a safer space for anyone who is not a cis-man.” And if you’re wondering what cis-men are, the subtext clarifies them as “those who identify as men and were designated male at birth.”

[image]

The poster was created by the UQ Women’s Collective, a Feminist campus organization. We learn this from their symbol at the top right, which sports a classic Feminist logo and reads “Feminism, Activism, Community.”

Some questions come to mind when viewing this poster. Most importantly, shouldn’t spaces – especially ones watched over by those who claim to advocate equality – be equally safe for all people? And if a particular place is safer for one demographic, doesn’t that mean that it is less safe – i.e., more dangerous – for another?

What is the moral basis upon making certain places safer some, and more dangerous for others? What are the mechanisms by which these Feminists intend to enforce the unequal protections they wish to afford those who enter this space?

Does this mentality jive with the notion of equality? And if it does not (as indeed it does not in this case), don’t they deserve to be reminded? And if they are recalcitrant, do they truly deserve our recognition and support as a group that advocates gender equality?

This Feminist group will likely defend or rationalize this statement by stating that this isn’t a direct threat of harm per se. And that would be true – in somewhat the same way that it wouldn’t be a direct threat for a white person in the 1960s telling a black person that “something bad may happen to you if you walk down my street after sundown.” Imagine such a person then claiming to say such things in the spirit of racial equality.

This poster at UQ reminds me of the poster at the Women’s Resource Center at Ottawa University which said that men on campus should keep to well-lit areas, wear bells around their necks, and be accompanied by police wherever they go. Here it is:

[image]

How dehumanizing such a poster is. It is amazing that we would tolerate it. It is amazing that so many men themselves would tolerate it. But in our “enlightened” society in which the discourse on gender equality is dominated by Feminism, and our broader culture is enfeebled by a spirit of political do-nothingism, these things are a natural occurrence.

Those who oppose advocacy for men and boys often argue that men simply do not face sexism. But the warehouse of evidence we have accumulated begs to differ.

Far too often, higher education (and school in general) has become a hostile environment for men and boys. One might think, given the incredible decline in academic achievement among male students, that a wide range of governing bodies interested in closing the gaps would spark a conversation to reassess the well-being of men and boys in all areas of academic life.

Unfortunately, they have yet to pick up the torch and light the way. Third-party organizations have instead taken it upon themselves – and given much of their own resources – to issue a call to action. Much of higher education has yet to answer the call.

The time has come to stop acquiescing to a spirit of sexism on our university campuses. These kinds of attitudes need to be called out in no uncertain terms. People should not be made to feel unwelcome on campus simply because of what group they happen to be born into. The only thing that should be unwelcome in academia should be narrow-mindedness and prejudice.

The sloppy journalism of Raw Story's "tbogg"

We live in a time when "trusted journalist" is becoming an oxymoron and one of those morons responsible for the tarnishing of journalistic integrity is Tom Boggioni ("tbogg") of Raw Story, an ideological rag that routinely blocks Men's Rights Advocates (MRAs) merely for being MRAs.

There is no excuse for sloppy writing or sloppy thinking, especially in professional journalism. It is a highly competitive enterprise and a critical one: knowledge is power; lives can change forever with a few words and disasters happen when those words go astray. People's lives can end over a turn of phrase.

Attention, employers: if you want to hire a sloppy liar to tar your publication with his mendacity on display to the public in ways so embarrassing that you'll win the Tour de France by backpedaling, then Tom Boggioni can put the "oh, no" in your annual report.

Consider this one paragraph from tbogg's screed against Dean Esmay:

> Like it's twin brother, the gamergaters, there really is no formal membership in the MRA movement. As long as you hate women and all they stand for you're part of the gang. You can walk like an MRA, talk like an MRA, and even grow a neckbeard like them and it's all, "Hail fellow, well, met. Bitches, waddya gonna do, amirite?" There is probably an elaborate and awkward handshake too.

Here's a part of a screen capture just in case Raw Story tries to change or bury it: [image]

Let's unpack this bit-by-bit, shall we?

"Like it's twin…": Notice the use of the apostrophe in the word "it's," meaning that it's a contraction of "it is," not the possessive form of "it." Expanding the contraction to read "Like it is twin," we can see that the use of "it's" is clearly wrong. "Its" would be correct there.

Normally, nitpicking grammar errors like this is looked down on in informal conversational writing but among professional journalists and writers such mistakes are glaring and garish. They are also what poker players would call a "tell": they alert the careful reader that the author is up to something fishy.

"…twin brother…": For a supposed feminist, tbogg uses a lot of unnecessarily gendered language. Later on, tbogg implicitly mocks men for experiencing pain during divorce, thereby enforcing the patriarchal norm that men should not expose their weaknesses. Again, for a supposed feminist, tbogg sure is a shitty one: feminists are supposed to smash the patriarchy, not uphold it.

The word "brother" is superfluous (omitting it does not alter the basic meaning of the sentence) so we can infer that the writer was appealing to the sexist, anti-male bias of his intended feminist audience — he wants desperately to come off as the One Good Man standing in chivalric glory protecting the hapless damsels in his harem hugbox citadel.

Yeah, right, buddy. Women never see through posturing like that, nor do they escape from it in tankers.

"the gamergaters": Notice that we've sloppily jumped from a singular noun "twin brother" to a plural one. That's similar to writing "My dog the beagles" – wretched, erroneous prose. In addition. employers of tbogg would do well to note that #gamergate is a consumer group that exposes lapses in journalistic integrity and ethics and that by implicitly smearing them, tbogg is acknowledging that he opposes journalistic integrity and ethics.

"there really": The use of another superfluous word, and another tell, again alerts the reader that the author is now spinning fables like a spinster: he sounds like a child caught red-handed crying "I'm really innocent this time! I swear!"

"As long as you hate women and all they stand for you're part of the gang.": The author goes full sexist, conflating women with feminism and all men who oppose feminism as gang members who hate women. He ignores both the men who self-identify as feminists and the women who self-identify as MRAs (of whom male MRAs are quite fond.) Indeed, polls show that less than 1 in 4 women identify as feminists and thus it is both sloppy and mendacious for tbogg to equate the two.

Employers should also note that the collapsing feminist base makes it unwise to employ writers that appeal to a dying demographic even as they alienate a burgeoning one.

"You can walk like an MRA, talk like an MRA, and even grow a neckbeard like them and it's all, 'Hail fellow, well, met.'": Again the author reveals his penchant for chivalry, projecting his own patriarchal leanings onto MRAs. Even a passing glance at MRA writings would have told the author that MRAs oppose the sexism and gynocentrism that are intrinsic to chivalry and which a lot of feminists also reject. One may conclude that Boggioni is lazy, sloppy, dim, or perhaps some failed combination of the three.

Feminists should be especially appalled by this: judging all members of a group by the actions of a few extremists is even more damaging to feminism than MRAs since efforts like #KillAllMen paint feminism in homicidal ways that would make Nazi stormtroopers blush. Feminists have to be squirming to read that "It's a great way to duck responsibility for anything and everything" as tbogg goes on to say.

Mr. Boggioni may be surprised to discover that feminists are canny enough to parse out nuances like that and use them against men like him whenever it suits them.

"Bitches, waddya gonna do, amirite?": Mixing his metaphorical language by inventing quotes and switching continents, dialects and centuries is sloppy enough but even more importantly, the writer projects his own discomfort and disdain for women onto other men. Mr. Boggioni's frustration with women is obvious and inevitable: without a red pill understanding of women they will forever remain a puzzle to him. Mr. Boggioni will be shocked to discover that women are smart enough to see through feminist posers like him with ease.

You’re a joke to them, dude. Listen and believe.

Boggioni gets just about every important fact wrong in his article.

- There was and is no MRA boycott of the Mad Max film.
- Return of Kings is not an MRA site, indeed, it is anti-MRA. It is mendacious to say or suggest otherwise.
- The Mad Max film portrays the collapse of an idyllic feminist society that kills all men. This makes it an anti-feminist film.
- The movie depicts the oppression, exploitation and suffering of men. This makes it an anti-feminist film.
- Journalists DO have a responsibility to their readers to print the truth and exercise ethical behavior while doing so.

MRAs are used to this garbage and we are grateful for it: surviving such challenges makes us stronger and our opponents weaker.

Toward the end of his article Boggioni mockingly posits a Vast Feminist Conspiracy. I found it hard to tell whether he was referring to “Patriarchy Theory,” “Rape Culture,” “Gendered Domestic Violence,” or the “Alimony Racket” — there’s just so many; like his errors, they are all a blur.

#BlameOneNotAll reveals feminist hatred for men

May 28, 2015 | by Jack Barnes | Link | Original Link

Recently the Indian media company Mintified started a campaign called "Blame One Not All" which you can find on Twitter and Facebook.

Basically this campaign is pictures of women holding signs saying that not all men should be blamed for the crimes of one or a few. This campaign has drawn a lot of support from the public. But there is a small group of very vocal people who are not having any of it. They have engaged in campaign of their own to discredit the idea that not all men are to blame for this misdeeds of another man. Unfortunately, there are some who prefer to remain in the dark ages of human history. They hang on to prejudice like monkey with a banana. These people are throw backs to a time that most people wish had never happened. These backwards uneducated people are called feminists and to them if you are born with a penis you are born guilty. Don't believe me, take a look at few of the feminist responses to the #BlameOneNotAll hashtag.

[image] [image]

Of course these are just some tweets from the rank and file mouth breathers. Let's see what prominent members of the gender troglodytes have to say on the matter.

Anna Merlan over at Jezebel seems to be very confused as to what the Blame One Not All campaign is about.

> ".... the #BlameOneNotAll campaign seems to have been an attempt to pat good men on the back for the hard work of not raping or domestically abusing anybody..... Excuse me, does anyone have some cookies? Can someone give these men a fucking cookie? Thanks."

She thinks it's about giving good men a pat on the head. Of course any thinking person can see from the images that this campaign is not about congratulating men for being decent human beings. Far from it. It's about stating the fact that most men are decent human beings. Bigots like Anna are often easily confused by basic English. Poor thing.

Then there is Vicky Chandler at The Independent, who seems to suffer from the same lack of intellect as Anna Merlan. She too seems to think #BlameOneNotAll is about congratulating men for being human. It's the title of her article.

> "#BlameOneNotAll: Do men who don't hurt women actually need to be congratulated?"

But Vicky goes a few steps further down the derp road.

> "….what the campaign does is vilify the women speaking out about their experiences of sexism…..It's tiring to have to revisit this situation again, having to defend a woman's right to speak out about their experiences."

So a woman holding a sign that says "My favorite professor is a male and he doesn't show any inappropriate gesture. #BlameOneNotAll" vilifies women and raises the need to defend women's right to speak?

> "If these men were really worried about people thinking that they were a rapist, they would be addressing the behaviours of their fellow men, not attacking the brave women retelling their experiences of sexism and abuse."

A woman holding a sign that says "When my parents are not around my uncle doesn't make me feel uncomfortable. #BlameOneNotAll" is attacking women? As you can see from the above examples Vicky and her knuckle dragging friends are prone to emotional outbursts rather than rational logical thought.

Another thing about these throw backs and their lack of intelligence is that often let the cat out of the bag.

> "It's just another example of "Meninists" trying to silence women because what they have to say has bruised their ego. #BlameOneNotAll is an attempt at concentrating on each individuals' actions rather than critiquing a social structure that has forced millions of girls and women around the world to be subjected to systematic sexism, sexual violence and abuse. By saying 'not all' we're allowing many to excuse themselves from a situation they claim isn't their problem……I do hold all men accountable in helping their female friends, colleagues and family fight to change a frightening system where only 97 out of 100 rapists are imprisoned…."

As you can see here feminism is exactly as I have described it. These people still hold to the idea of judging a group based on the actions of a few or one and judging an individual based on prejudice for that person's group. I wonder if Vicky crosses the street when she meets a black guy walking towards her, because a small number of black guys might mug her. Or if she refuses to use a bank that hires Jews because a small number of white collar criminals are also Jewish? Or if she refuses to associate with gay people because a gay guy robbed a store that one time? And men, please don't forget to be sexist towards women when it works in their favor. You are responsible for helping women because you are a man and she is a woman and that's how feminist equality works.

Ok. I had a little fun with those bigots. Sometimes you just have to laugh at how horrible feminists are. But now it's time to get serious. These are ignorant bigots. There is just no other way to say it. The fact that they exist isn't the problem. The fact that they have the power to influence government policy, the education of social workers, doctors, lawyers, judges, politicians, and to infect the minds of high school kids and young adults in college is the problem. These people need to be removed from society. By removed I mean excluded, ostracized and shunned. The idea that someone is born guilty based on their biology is so outdated that I can't fathom how people in this day in age still believe it. How in the world can a person honestly say that they hold person A accountable for the actions of person B because the two look similar? Why do we tolerate the presence of such people in our schools, universities and in our government? The statement "I am a feminist" should end a person's career as quickly as "I am a Nazi" or "I am in the Ku Klux Klan."

But it doesn't and that's the problem.

These feminists aren't the problem. Society is the problem. We are the ones that are allowing this kind of hate to engrain itself in our culture. We are the ones that refuse to do anything about it. We are the ones who can stop this. Men and women together can bring an end to feminism. Go back through the images and quotes in this article and reread them. Remember that is your grandfather, father, uncle, husband, brother, brother-in-law, nephew, son and grandson they are talking about. They are all responsible for all the violence that happens to any woman anywhere. They were tried and convicted at the moment that hormones determined the sex of the unborn baby. They were born with a scarlet letter on their forehead.

The scarlet "M."

Male.

Masculine.

Monster.

National Geographic News discovers… feminist research…

May 28, 2015 | by Clint Carpentier | Link | Original Link

Gendered study with minute sample…

Ok, so this article a few years old, but has been making it's rounds on facebook recently.

Let's ignore that Susan Fiske is a feminist psychologist with a fascinating wiki dossier, and had close family among the Suffragettes.

The obvious problem is, she studied a whopping, an astounding, an unprecedented… twenty one men. I could do the same in my trailer court, probably get the same results, and it would be equally meaningless. A picture of nearly naked nubile women, without heads, won't engender empathic personality engagement; they were headless, therefore both brainless and emotionless, with nothing to offer any reliable indications as to their intention other than taut bellies with navel jewelry. Just what the fuck did she expect the reaction would be??? I would almost hazard a wager, that the "most misogynist" men were more red pill, and saw a shit test, and weren't playing the game, after all, the headless bodies could have been underage; and for shits and giggles, they might have thought the researchers were tools, hence the result.

> And the men who scored higher as "hostile sexists"—those who view women as controlling and invaders of male space—didn't show brain activity that indicates they saw the women in bikinis as humans with thoughts and intentions.
> Scientists have seen this absence of activation only once before, in a study where people were shown off-putting photographs of homeless people and drug addicts.
> (Related: "Sex-Based Roles Gave Modern Humans an Edge, Study Says.")

Yeah, I just about pissed myself at the related topic plug.

I like her questioning of what brain-scans of women would be. Never mind that women's brains act differently than men's anyhow (cross-wired with emotional overlays, as opposed to compartmentalized), but while sexy headless men might get them wet (the numerous images of, abs with kittens, comes to mind), what will really drive their brain-scans crazy, is a clean-cut business suit casually overlooking his estate. But her reasoning that the idea that women's brains wouldn't act the same under the same circumstances, is… insulting really.

> But Fiske doesn't think such an experiment would work the same way, because women usually react to men they desire by "interpreting their minds, thinking about what they're interested in, and then trying to please them," she said.

How does anyone "interpret the minds" of headless naked bodies they've never seen before? Hell, I have difficulties deciding whether I like porn-stars looking at me (via the camera) while getting ravished, or if I should feel cuckolded; I think I lean more to enjoying them focusing on enjoying the partner they are actually with. And for that matter, I'm not too keen on close-up parts shots, as I am whole body shots; but I think that has a lot to do with enjoying her reactions, while also enjoying her foot action. BAH, National Geographic, Fiske went about her research all wrong.

But let's entertain the idea that her research is correct…

I don't know about you, but I use tools all the time, and each one has a personality, and they're all out to get me. The hammer is a sneaky bitch, glancing off the nails and smashing my thumb; and if it's not my thumb, the nail gets fired across the room. All the blades are crazy fucking sadistic blood thirty cunts; they think they're innocent looking, but I'm onto them, I got enough scars. My patching trowel bit me once; it didn't like getting used as an emergency dustpan. The tape measures are clever, mean, and generally uncooperative; and if you hurt them, they WILL get you back. And the screwdriver deliberately wobbles on the screw, so you have to hold the screw steady, allowing the driver the opportunity to slip off and stab your finger.

I had a truck once (I'm no mechanic), every couple of months she would act up. So I'd take her to a mechanic, and he'd lift her… hood, and with his greasy paws, he'd massage her tender bits. She'd come outta the garage purring like a kitten, and he'd say, "there's nothin' wrong with her, fifty bucks." The wretched hoe was making me pay to get cuckolded before my eyes.

If men are seeing women as "tools", I'm not seeing that as a bad thing, but more likely a survival mechanism. Women are dangerous, and need to be viewed with caution, particularly those who prance around making a public sexual spectacles of themselves to feed their vanity. At the same time, tools are rarely seen as malevolent, but rather as benevolent.

Say goodbye to EVERY Crazy you will ever meet in your life

---

I am not an ex-wife nor am I a second wife, so when I picked up Say Goodbye to Crazy: How to Get Rid of his Crazy Ex and Restore Sanity to Your Life, I expected to spend a few hours immersed in someone's else's nightmare, grateful for my own calm, peaceful life. The first page and every page thereafter was a somewhat shocking reminder that dealing with Crazy doesn't necessarily require an ex-wife or a second marriage – it just requires a psycho bitch, and I have a wealth of experience dealing with that.

My mother is Crazy.

I can honestly say this book captivated me on a personal level unlike any other book I have ever read. I have, on occasion, attempted to make my way through some psychobabble about dealing with toxic parents or "difficult" people, but as SGTC makes clear, those books are mostly a pile of bullshit, the pages of which are worth wiping your ass with and not much else.

Crazy doesn't change. Crazy doesn't care. Crazy can't be reasoned with, can't be mollified, can't be pacified, can't be satisfied. Ten million pages of strategy isn't going to help when you're dealing with Crazy. Study them to your heart's content, and prepare to continue consuming crazy in doses that will affect your health, your happiness and everything in your world. SGTC doesn't mince words, and will never explain how you, are in fact, to blame for Crazy being crazy. Oh, you bear some of the blame when it comes to Crazy fucking up your life, but it's not the blame you think it is.

The book is divided into three sections. The first section helps you identify the kind of crazy you are dealing with, all the while reminding you that unless you are a psychiatrist specializing in personality disorders it is not your job to fix Crazy. You can't. These chapters were rather bittersweet for me to read, because one of my brothers and I both reached that conclusion with our mother, after many, many attempts to fix her. It can't be done. We no longer have any contact with her, because there is no in-between with her crazy: there is no happy medium where we can abandon ship once the level of toxicity reaches a certain point. She is radioactive from the first second. Quarantine was our only option. My oldest and my youngest brother are still feverishly trying to change their crazy mother. They try to accommodate, to pacify, to meet her demands, and they are still failing and digesting their daily dose of poison.

They will both be getting a copy of this book, but I'm not optimistic.

The second part of the book addresses preparations to deal with Crazy. Specifically directed at the individuals who are going to have to armor up for war, and present an unassailable and united front against escalating craziness, it walks through all the different manifestations of Crazy, and rubs salt into the open wounds in your own flesh that give Crazy the fault lines she needs to exploit your weakness.

It can be unpleasant to read.

I had to put the book down a few times and walk away, because the advice feels counter-intuitive, and yet bracingly, undeniably true. Being nice? Practicing forgiveness? Giving other people the benefit of the doubt? Those are lovely, wonderful things when you are dealing with normal people. Try that with Crazy and she will slip the point of her dagger in and then proceed to flay the skin from you one agonizing strip at a time.

Been there. Done that. The first 18 years of my life, I didn't know there was any alternative to the emotional assault my Crazy mother delivered day in and day out.

The third section of the book gets down to the nitty gritty? What can you do to get rid of Crazy and restore sanity to your life? It's filled with practical, concrete actions you can take, depending on what kind of Crazy you are dealing with and what your extenuating circumstances happen to be. Some of them are easy, some will rip your heart out and leave you bleeding on the floor, but they are necessary, and the book makes it clear why they are necessary.

In retrospect, I engaged many of the strategies the book recommends, but I had to learn them by trial and error and all things considered, I wish I hadn't bothered with all the false starts and dead ends. They were the source of considerable emotional turmoil and pain, and had this book existed, I might have avoided them.

I might not have found the book though, thinking it was for people going through divorce and we don't often describe leaving Crazy when Crazy is a parent. That's too bad, because it is very, very similar. For that reason, I want to endorse this book for pretty much everyone, whether you are dealing with Crazy or not. Crazy can be a lot of people – a sister, a mother, a mother-in-law, a co-worker, a girlfriend, a bat-shit crazy cousin or former best friend or aunt. This kind of Crazy is almost always a woman, and if you haven't met Crazy yet, consider yourself lucky, and assume your luck won't hold.

She's coming.

Say Goodbye to Crazy is an excellent book for men who are braving the dating market, in particular. Lots of women will "shit-test" men, and red-pill men know how to deal with that efficiently and effectively. What SGTC will help you determine, really early on, before you have wasted time and effort and resources, is whether you are dealing with a woman who has been confused by contradictory messages sent by the dominant culture about what she really wants (that's imminently curable, for those who care to put in the effort) and bona fide Crazy. Crazy will give you just enough to keep you focused on her. She will play along to the extent she has to. Then she will detonate and leave you, in the best case scenario with a mess to clean up. In the worst case scenario, she can do much, much more harm than that. SGTC will give you the tools to spot these psychos immediately and show them the gate before they ever cross your threshold.

I also strongly recommend this book for both men and women who work in an environment with a lot of women, especially if those women are in positions of power. Sooner or later, you're gonna run into Crazy. Knowing how to recognize her, how to deal with her and how to defeat her could be the difference between moving up in your organization or being forced to move on, hopefully without an inferno of false accusations and allegations of misconduct behind you. Crazy can, and will, attempt to destroy your entire life, and knowing how to spot these dangerous women (and some men) is critical.

One last word on SGTC – you aren't going to find any jargon, esoteric terminology, obscure references or indecipherable metaphors on these pages. This book is for everyone and it's written for everyone, in clear, concise and often very funny prose. There are no pats on the head, and no cookies for showing up. The book lays out how to recognize Crazy, how to prepare for battle and how to win. You don't need to have Crazy in your life right now to benefit from *Say Goodbye to Crazy. Smart people will realize that Crazy is everywhere, and sooner or later, she'll set her sights on you. This book can help.

Forewarned is forearmed.

The very best way to deal with Crazy is to shut her down from day one. Say Goodbye to Crazy will show you how to do that.

State charges alleged serial false rape accuser, but she disappears

May 29, 2015 | by Pierce Harlan | Link | Original Link

An assistant attorney general for Montana says that 24-year-old Christina Nadine Nelson, formerly Christina Mark, made a string of alleged false accusations against three men between 2009 and 2012. A total of five medical rape exams were conducted on her, and she made two reports of assault. “Christina had a motive or pattern of accusing young men that she had dated of raping her and assaulting her when no such rape or assault had occurred,” prosecutors have stated in court documents. At least one of the young men has been scarred for life.

Now, finally, she’s being charged with felonies in connection with two of the allegations she made. Except there’s a problem: authorities can’t find her. Nelson did not appear for her initial appearance on May 21. She wasn’t required to appear in person but by telephone. An assistant attorney general said Friday that Nelson’s whereabouts aren’t known, even by her own attorney. Nelson was supposed to appear last week in Yellowstone County as well but didn’t show. An assistant attorney general fears she might be in Europe.

How was this woman permitted to leave the country?

The incidents we know about are disturbing. Read on.

2009 PROM

In 2009, when Nelson was a German high school foreign exchange student studying in the United States, she said she was raped and cut with a knife by her date on the way to their prom. But detectives found inconsistencies with her statements. An investigation found she suffered no cuts on the night of her prom. When detectives asked if there was blood on her prom dress from the cuts, Nelson told them there was blood but she had washed it off.

Despite the inconsistencies, the boy Nelson accused was charged by police and expelled from school and was not allowed to return to campus. “He moved out of state because he felt that his reputation was destroyed by Christina’s allegations,” according to court documents filed by the prosecution. A month after the prom, Nelson stated she wanted to drop the charges against her date, and the charges were dropped, too late to spare the young man from the scars of an apparent false rape claim.

On August 10, 2012, Nelson told police that she was leaving her job at Planned Parenthood at about 5:30 p.m. when a former boyfriend approached her in the parking area. She said she told him she was married now and to go away. She alleged that he became violent. He supposedly slapped her in the face and punched her in the stomach nine times–presumably she was carefully counting. Then he took her to a vehicle where he raped her. After the supposed rape, Nelson joined friends at a downtown brewery for a drink and she got home about 7 p.m. She then went to a gym with her husband to work out. After showering, they sat in a sauna and hot tub. They returned home and had unprotected sex. Then she told her husband about the alleged rape at about 10 p.m., and he took her to a clinic.

A detective spoke to the former boyfriend, who met Nelson at Rocky Mountain College and dated her from November 2009 to about June 2011. The man proved he was in Seattle from Aug. 9 through Aug. 18. He had receipts and photos to back up his account. Surveillance video from Nelson's workplace showed her and a co-worker getting into their vehicles and driving away and no sign of the former boyfriend or his vehicle. (Thankfully, rape victims no longer require corroborative evidence, but in too many cases, now men and boys accused of rape need corroborative evidence to be cleared.) A detective reported having trouble re-contacting Nelson until she sent an e-mail on Aug. 29 saying she didn't want to press charges.

TWO OTHER 2012 REPORTS

In two April 2012 reports, Nelson had reported to law enforcement that she had been assaulted at her residence in Billings, although the SANE reports indicated that Nelson reported the rapes had occurred in dorm rooms at Rocky Mountain College. Law enforcement further learned that in April 2012, Nelson reported that the same former boyfriend she accused in August 2012 supposedly raped her.

This site has chronicled the news reports of many serial false rape accusers–see here.

False rape accusers are rarely treated as serious criminals. The sexual grievance industry has made a concerted effort to have police and prosecution stop charging false rape accusers because they assume that prosecuting false rape accusers somehow puts off rape victims from reporting or takes away from the effort to prosecute rapists, as if it were a zero sum game. Some claim that prosecuting false rape accusers violates women's human rights.

Aside from the inexcusable injustice to the men and boys whose lives are damaged or destroyed by a false rape accusation, failing to treat false accusers as serious criminals does no favors for rape victims. Every rape lie diminishes the perceived integrity of every rape accuser. The public loathes both rape and rape lies, and when the public perceives that false accusers are permitted to lie with impunity, it undermines confidence in the way rape is handled. As a result, juries are all the more reluctant to find even guilt in rape cases even when it may be deserved.

Society has made innumerable efforts in the past few years to get women to report their rapes, often at the expense of the due process rights of the men and boys accused. False accusers take advantage of these efforts. A few years ago, a woman arrested for falsely crying "rape" had the audacity to borrow a meme of the sexual grievance industry and proclaim, "That's why women don't report rape."

Milo Yiannopoulos: a mutilated penis is a sexy penis!

Breitbart.com is a pretty decent conservative website with some great commentary, even if it is at times a little lockstep with the two party paradigm that doesn't actually exist. They even do some really cogent fisking of feminism and the social justice crowd.

So, you can imagine my dismay when they posted a piece by Milo Yiannopoulos that was quite possibly the most stupid and disturbing piece I have seen since the Agent Orange Files. When I say that I am not excluding the pap served up at places like Jezebel, Raw Story and Anita Sarkeesian's YouTube channel.

The rationale he employs in his piece actually does fall in line with what I have seen from pro-mutilation feminists who think male genital mutilation is a good thing because they prefer the penis after it has been cut, though I must admit I have never seen a feminist be so brazen or, uh, detailed about it.

Milo informs us that he is gay, and then uses far too many words to paint a portrait of a gay man who likes "circumcision" because he thinks it will up the chances of getting a blow job. At least from him. As he says with flirtatious promise:

> Perhaps as a gay man I'm biased, but aesthetics matter. And let me tell you – sorry if this veers into "TMI" territory – that I'm infinitely more likely to make you happy down there if you're cut."

OK, so gay men are not exempt from being stupid. Or shallow. Or disgusting for that matter. Too bad that was the unintended revelation in his article. Sadly, he follows the important matter, the penises he is more likely to suck, with the afterthought, "Then there's the medical stuff."

He plasters readers the disinformation we have seen for the last 150 years from religious fundamentalists who have long sought to justify the sexual mutilation of children by making the procedure a cure looking for a disease. He tells us that removing erotic tissue containing over 20,000 nerve endings and upwards of 75% of male sexual sensitivity, is really a good thing. To wit:

> Getting circumcised reduces the risk of urinary tract infections, some sexually transmitted diseases, including HIV and penile cancer and cervical cancer in female sex partners. It prevents a whole galaxy of hideous illnesses that come from having a turtleneck: balanitis, balanoposthitis, phimosis and paraphimosis. (I won't spell them all out, but they're all horrible and, more to the point, avoidable.)"

Of course he never offers a single shred of proof. And of course he does not mention (or does not know) that teaching boys proper hygiene will just as much or more effectively prevent many of those problems. Nope, they have to be cut. Cause Milo likes a nice tidy penis. He even manages to draw a comparison of male sexual mutilation to botox injections, rinoplasty and other cosmetic sugical electives by women.

Yiannopoulos' contentions about HIV and STDs being conveniently prevented by the cut have been dimissed by the medical ethics board where they were reviewed . That part pissed me off so much that I left a comment, which went into moderation. Somehow I can't find it there after many more comments came in. Who knows, Disqus is a tad funny sometimes.

[image]
British Journal of Medicine
Yiannopoulos goes on to dismiss the claims of African men experiencing PTSD, claiming it must be malnutrition or some of the other bad stuff that happens in Africa. He also appears ignorant of the role male genital mutilation plays in alexithymia. Either because he does not know about it, or because Milo likes a nice….never mind.

A few personal notes for Mr. Yiannopoulos.

Penile cancer is a rare cancer. A woman has a one in eight chance of breast cancer. By your irrational standards, we should perform a double radical mastectomy on every female for their 13th birthday. We can even give them some implants and they will look just fine. After all, breasts aren't special snowflakes are they? Think of all the diseases we could prevent and how much bigger boobs will increase their chances of men and women finding them attractive!

Milo, advocacy for severing off sexual tissue more dense with nerve endings than fingertips because you imagine it increases your chances for giving or receiving a blowjob is better addressed by joining Sex Addicts Anonymous. 12 Step Programs are free, reduce denial and are a much better alternative than slicing on infants because cut dicks give you your jollies.

Also, for the love of Brianna Wu get some goddam sources for your claims. "It makes me hard," or "If you cut it I will suck it," are not sources.

Finally, please leave this subject to people who actually study the science instead of studying their probabilities of getting more sex.

Authoring your own life

May 31, 2015 | by Peter Wright & Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

---

Harnessing men's utility can be witnessed from the erection of Stonehenge to the Roman Empire to the moon landings. Cures for diseases and vaccines to prevent them happened from the intensely intelligent actions of the human male. Exploring new territories and engineering the transport to send people to new places has changed the world, almost all of it through risk and hardship borne by men. Men have driven civilization forward since we first walked away from the African savannah. Men's blood, sweat, tears and sacrifices are the fuel rods that have always driven the big machine of our society.

Conditioning men, training them to do that, was necessary.

If the world wanted to continue its forward march it needed to entice little boys with fictions of glory that would forge their identities as the architects and the engineers of the world around them. It was an easy sell given the perhaps innate tendency in males to risk and to accomplish more than the man next to him.

We have thus, from generation to generation, raised our men on a steady diet of stories about saviors, knights and world-building heroes. We train them see themselves in accordance with those fables, sometimes brutally. We teach them that their worth is actually their worth to the wants and needs of others. We instruct them to see themselves as worthless for doing or being anything other than what we expect them to be.

This kind of thinking probably had its appropriate place in a world that was driven by constant and immediate survival needs. There is no doubt that without humankind benefitting from male sacrifice, you would not be sitting there reading this over an internet connection in a safe and comfortable environment, perhaps half a world away.

So do we need to continue this kind of dependence on men to sacrifice unthinkingly for the needs of others? Seven billion examples of a species now dominating the planet and traveling the solar system suggest not.

Yet we continue on in the same mode, blinded by habituation and the thoughtlessness that comes with it.

The problem that we glean from this is clear. The labels of hero, savior and other forms of "real" manhood are now just euphemisms for the disposable servants we have become as an entire class of human beings. We proudly retell tales of sacrifice to our sons, even as the story of their own lives emerges – singing paeans to the yoke.

Such are the stories all little boys are raised on:

Book for 2-5 yr old boys, complete with battery-operated button that produces the sound of a damsel screaming

The stories seem harmless and even cute in isolation from their real-world implications. As fantasies we delight in them. But it pays to remember our identities consist, as Shakespeare said, of such stuff as dreams are made. The stories we absorb are the stories we enact, and in this case we enact them to the neglect of ourselves and our larger human potential.

The psychotherapeutic world has long understood the equation 'narrative becomes identity' – and the field is populated with therapies whose sole aim is to construct new narratives for our lives. Beginning with Freud's 'talking cure' and later archetypal psychology, cognitive psychology (scripts), narrative psychology, cognitive narratology (etc.), narrative therapy leads the way to healing and self-respect.

Men, in particular, are story creatures. Our psyches literally rely on them for existence as much as our bodies rely on food. We create stories about "who" we are; about the world we live in and our place in it; and about how we are meant to relate to others – men, women and children. Without them we lack orientation and are left with an existential vertigo.

Whatever you want to call them–scripts, myths, narrations, schema or stories–we can't live without them. However, like a bad dose of salmonella some narratives will give you a case of mental dysentery leading even unto death by overwork or suicide – such is their power to direct your behavior. Psychologists, good ones anyway, refer to these as pathologizing narratives and try to weed them out of your mental garden.

But who is to decide what a pathological narrative is? Surely it is not the feminist psychologists who now dominate nearly every part of the therapeutic landscape with pathological narratives.

The problem with all mainstream therapy, which is now nearly synonymous with feminist therapy, is that it doesn't recognize gynocentrism as a problem or perhaps doesn't see it at all. So they have no model for guiding men out of pathological (gynocentric) narratives and into new ones that might release them from the old script. In fact what they usually do, despite superfical overtures about therapy that focuses on the needs of the client, is actively encourage men to stay lodged in the depth of the gynocentric mythos.

How many men feel (and actually are) waylaid, ambushed and taken hostage by female-centric ideas when they enter couples counseling? How often do you hear that men are resistant to therapy because they don't want to express feelings, only to see the same purveyors of that idea rush in to shame men the moment they open up?

How many men would benefit from understanding that they cannot begin to identify who and what they are without first ending the unhealthy reliance on women, and others with a conflict of interest, as sources of approval in their lives?

There is a reason that men don't trust therapists. It is because there are so many therapists who don't trust men. Those practitioners are more likely to use men than to help them.

We don't just make narratives up – in many ways they make us up. So it's important to not let the culture write the script for us, the script that inevitably leads to the belief that we are rapists and emotional failures, that women are damsels, that we are knights in the Order of Chivalry, and that we must suffer our lives for the principles of gynocentrism. Like the tattered novel you just can't seem to finish reading, throw it in the trash and hunt for a new book, a better book, one that will bring value to your life.

If you are searching for a therapist make sure and ask one question: "Have you heard of gynocentrism?" If they haven't walk away and don't hire them. In fact be prepared to do so much walking away that your steps will number enough to walk around the entire planet three times. Doing therapy with men without a fundamental understanding of gynocentism is like trying to teach algebra without a fundamental understanding of mathematics.

The task of the gynocentrism-savvy therapist is to facilitate the male client's rewriting of his own story. The (completely imaginary) book will have a beginning, a middle and an end with a compelling plot throughout. It doesn't matter what the new fiction is, as long as it works for the client. It can be anything the therapist helps the client envision for himself during the course of therapy. They leave the therapy sessions with a new novel in which they are the protagonist, leading a gynocentrism-free life of self-determination.

The above underscores the importance of having a healthy narrative to live by. A good therapist can help you achieve that – if you need assistance at all. Some of us, many actually, can write our novels without help. Just make sure that the narrative you adopt is one that allows you to be a fully functioning human being. If your current story doesn't achieve that, burn it and dream up something new.

Dream big, but most importantly, dream what you choose.

Lying to get sex is not rape

May 31, 2015 | by Lucian Vâlsan | Link | Original Link

It has come to my attention that New Jersey law Assemblyman Troy Singleton (D) has sponsored a bill which would make "sexual assault by fraud" a punishable offense.

Even our own DV Policy Advisor, Erin Pizzey, thinks that we should give this a thought:

[image]

But is it really a good idea?

Mind you, I'm not a citizen of New Jersey (or even an American) but given that such ideas are bounced around various legislatures around the world, this topic is bigger than New Jersey.

In the following lines, I'll try to argue that such a law is a very bad idea. It should also be noted that just because I think the law is bad, that doesn't mean I think the supporters of it are bad people. It just so happens though that the road to hell is paved with good intentions. Which is why the arguments against this idea shall be rooted in the premise that its supporters are well-intended.

Based on a dubious story

The bill comes following the story of one Mischele Lewis, a 37 year old single mom who dated a man who claimed to be a British secret agent.

You can read the entire story in the link above but, basically, the short story is that the man Mischele Lewis dated lied about pretty much everything – his job, his material possessions, his children (he claimed to have none whilst having a daughter) and his background. On top of that, he asked Ms. Lewis for $5000 for a "government clearance" – amount which Lewis provided and then the man disappeared.

Law enforcement agreed that this is a classical case of fraud and arrested the man who last November pleaded guilty for fraud and was ordered to pay restitution.

So, case closed? Well, no. The single mom went #fullMcIntosh and started campaigning to get a law passed so that the actions of people like her ex-boyfriend be considered "rape" because… you know… having your feelings hurt is worth more than a petty fraud charge.

In her own words where she defends her crusade to promote this law on another thread:

> The psychological damage is akin to traumatic rape.

But is it really? Can Mischele Lewis genuinely claim with a straight face that she's on a similar level with genuine victims of rape?

No one doubts that her case is on the extreme spectrum of fraud of this type, but akin to traumatic rape?

Also, call it victim blaming if you like, but if you give $5000 to someone you met online claiming to be a secret agent – you do have a responsibility in here. Her defense is that they were together for one year – but that's a mitigating circumstance at best. When you get down to the brass tacks, any sane person would find it dubious (to say the least) when the partner asks out of the blue for a high amount of cash and for undisclosed reasons.

Call it heartless all you want – but making unsound economic decisions is a personal responsibility and it's part of life. Also, owning your mistakes is part of life.

What's morally wrong mustn't sine qua non be illegal

Some would say that the reverse is also true, but that's a discussion for another time. In defense of this new law, Ms. Lewis told the press that:

> I think [the law is] important because trying to deceive anyone for the purpose of sexual gratification is just wrong

Very few people would disagree that trying to deceive anyone for the purpose of sexual gratification is morally wrong.

But when it comes to public policy (laws, decrees, etc.) a rigid line has to be drawn in such a manner so as to prevent lawlessness. Too much regulation promotes lawlessness (since nobody can keep up with all the laws) and too little regulation may lead to unnecessary harm – and eventually to lawlessness as well.

And therein lies the problem: There is no sensible way to regulate such interpersonal relationships without cloaking the legal system and promote lawlessness.

Ms. Lewis argues that the law would only apply for "egregious lies" because the victims like her "can't ever come forward" as "[t]hey are so cloaked in shame and humiliation and as of right now, [have] no recourse to turn to". But what constitutes an "egregious" lie?

Would a woman forgetting to tell her partner that one of her breasts is false fall under this law? Let's say her breast falls on the floor (it can happen, by the way) – does that count as an egregious lie? What about a woman lying about being on birth control? What about a partner who promised not to gain weight and then one year later is 50kg heavier? Would that count as an "egregious" lie?

You may think that this is facetious, but when it comes to public policy, such questions must be asked and the policy ought to be rejected if convincing answers aren't given. We can agree that breaking your promise to your partner on not gaining weight and then gaining weight by choice is morally wrong. But should it be illegal?

Also, given that the US is a culture more prone to litigation than Europe, let's look at the enforcement end of this law. If such a law were to be on the books, it would follow that one could sue the partner for not pleasing him or her just as much. Or for taking $20 from the fridge and go out with friends without notice.

Ms. Lewis is adamant that this is not her intention, nor the lawmakers' – and that may indeed be 100% true. But when it comes to public policy, there is such a thing called the law of unintended consequences. The best intentions in the world are not good enough to bring good results – or even the intended results.

When no-fault divorce was introduced, virtually nobody intended to destroy the family – but rather to help those perceived to be "trapped" in marriages. Being well-intended just isn't a guarantee for anything, and this is true especially when it comes to do-good public policy.

The lying industry

Whether we like it or not, there is such thing as the cosmetics industry which is, essentially, an industry that exists for the sole purpose of helping people (mostly women but some men too) to deceive for the purpose of sexual gratification.

The US is the largest cosmetic market in the world with a revenue of over $60 billion dollars – more than Slovenia's annual GDP and twice as much as Senegal's GDP.

Also, besides the cosmetics industry, there is also the growing market of cosmetic surgeries. Whether Ms. Lewis and the lawmakers of New Jersey want it or not, such a law is bound to cross hairs with these industries at some point in the future. And what then? Start banning certain products for certain people? And on what criteria?

And, more importantly, is this the road the US wants to go down?

Let's take another extreme example (similar to Ms. Lewis'): Three years ago, a case in Belgium made international headlines when a man found out his wife… used to be a man.

Sex reassignment surgery is essentially cosmetic surgery. And, just like in Ms. Lewis' case, the wife in this story also forged the papers and hid the reality. Not for one year like in Ms. Lewis' case – but for 19 years.

Most can agree that the "wife" in the Belgian story was morally wrong. But should that deed be criminally punished? By Ms. Lewis' law, it would be.

Dubious legislative text

The law defines this new form of "rape" as:

> an act of sexual penetration to which a person has given consent because the actor has misrepresented the purpose of the act or has represented he is someone he is not.

Interesting. Notice that the law is worded in such a manner that only a man can be the perpetrator. Ms Lewis says we're wrong and in the thread quoted above she also says:

> Also penetration is not just penis and vagina. It's anything that crosses an opening be it finger, tongue, vibratory or penis. And any opening can be a mouth, ass or vagina. So do not attempt to extrapolate my meaning by one word. Just because the terminology says HE, doesn't mean just men. The law is to cover all sexes equally.

That's cute, but that's not how the law works. If when talking about the victim the law says "a person" and when talking about the perpetrator the law clearly says "he" – there's no way you can convince anyone that the law covers "all sexes equally" – no matter how much Ms. Lewis says so.

Also, the legal tradition (which matters more than Ms. Lewis' opinion) showed repeatedly that no, penetration doesn't mean "anything that crosses an opening" and given that male rape victims are still defined in the US as "made to penetrate" – one can already see that the wording of this law simply does not cover all sexes equally when push comes to shove.

More to the point – "has represented he is someone he is not" is so vague that it can apply to anything. If one lies about being a vegetarian to get in bed with a vegetarian, is that rape? According to this law, it is because one "has represented he is someone he is not".

By the same token, if a man says he owns a mansion and based on that information the woman chooses to have sex with him and then it turns out he doesn't own a mansion, is that rape? Well, according to the proponents of this law, yes it is. But should it be? If you chose to get in bed with someone based on what that someone owns, it says more about you as the "victim" than about the "perpetrator". Sure, the perpetrator is a liar, but the "victim" just exposed herself as a gold-digger and a liar (since the sex act was consummated because of the partner's possessions, not genuine attraction).

Such realities can't be negated just because a single mom feels hurt in her feelings. Deploying public policy on hurt feelings rarely leads to sound results.

Conclusions

Given the realities explained above, one should conclude that everyone is better off if such laws don't exist.

There are already enough legal protections for victims of rape and for victims of fraud. Ms Lewis was a victim of fraud and she had her day in court and received justice. She was not a victim of rape. And no amount of Social Justice Warrior-type of discourse can change that.

It's understandable if Ms. Lewis feels violated in her trust – but that is not (nor should it be) reason enough to turn the legal system on its head and open the floodgates to even more incarcerations. Because when you get to the brass tacks of it, the legal ramifications (which are real and unforgiving, regardless of Ms. Lewis' opinion) can and will essentially cast a significant portion of the populace (if not the majority) as criminals.

And if even Ms. Lewis' extreme case doesn't hold scrutiny, imagine the legal nightmare generated by a milder version of her case.

Erin Pizzey is well intended when she says we should think about this but the fact of the matter is that the more we think about this, the more we ought to realize that it's a terrible idea to involve the criminal justice system in this fashion in interpersonal relationships.

False accusations make victims of us all

June 1, 2015 | by EJ Spurrell | Link | Original Link

In 2009, a girl I once knew named Tami Zall reported that she had been the victim of a violent and random sexual assault in her own apartment by a strange man in the city of Abbotsford, British Columbia. The Abbotsford Police Department, in response to such a serious situation, expended numerous resources conducting a search and calling in major crime detectives and forensic identification units to catch this person. The response was swift and picked up by media sources all across British Columbia's Lower Mainland, creating a public response of fear and an outcry of support for the girl. In light of the tragedy that occurred in Abbotsford fifteen years earlier with the murder and sexual assault of Tanya Smith and the attempted murder of her friend Misty Cockerill, Abbotsford residents genuinely feared the risk of another psychopath roaming the streets.

The difference, of course, was that Terry Driver, the Abbotsford Killer, had actually committed the crimes. In Zall's case, it was entirely fabricated. Her false report wasted the valuable time of the police, and instilled fear in a public still concerned about the emergence of another psychopath.

Fast forward to today, and we see that Zall's situation is not at all unique, especially in light of the Morgan Triplett Hoax, in which a young lady solicited a stranger on Craigslist to beat her up in exchange for sex, the rape threat perpetrated by Meg Lanker-Simons… against herself and the now-infamous UVA rape hoax.

This is just a small, small handful of a much larger smorgasbord of rape hoaxes.

And for what reason? How are these hoaxes and false accusations justified by those in the femisphere?

Depending on who you ask, you'll get a variety of responses.

Such gems include:

> "They aren't hoaxes. Women would never lie about sexual assault. They have no reason to."
> "Men benefit from the experience of being falsely accused of rape."

And the ever-insightful:

> "Even if false, these accusations bring much-needed attention to the topic of sexual assault in America."

For what it's worth, I agree with the last statement. Just not in the way the statement was intended.

The reality is that false rape accusations and hoaxes do bring attention to the topic of sexual assault… the wrong kind. Think of any major media story over the past several years that got people talking… and at its core, you'll find that the vast majority of them were hoaxes.

We're told that we live in a culture of rape, which some people have taken to mean that rape is a low-level crime, barely worthy of the notice of society at large. (A false belief refuted by the leading advocates on sexual violence in the United States, RAINN.)

So I'm going to break down exactly what rape hoaxes perpetrate.

It perpetrates disbelief. If a person has been raped, it should go without question that they should have our implicit support. To live through such a harrowing experience is one thing, to heal from it another. But when we're bombarded with news stories such as the ones I've already listed, in which people were worked up into an anti-rape frenzy… only later to discover they've been duped, time and again, by attention-seeking liars, it devalues and marginalizes legitimate victims of sexual assault and rape.

I've known people who have been raped, both men and women. Even I woke up once after imbibing a bit too much at a party to a young woman performing oral sex on me in my early 20's. These things do happen. I've also known false accusations to happen to people I knew, in two other verified cases besides the Tami Zall situation I outlined above.

But with the media always hungry for a decent rape story, you find that many of those willing to share their tales are fabricating them, spinning a yarn for publicity and attention. The excuses vary, but in almost all the cases, it boils down to basic attention-seeking behavior.

But this self-serving behavior does not help anyone, in fact, it hurts far more people. It hurts those who have been falsely accused, because there exist a contingent of angry anti-rape activists who steadfastly refuse to disbelieve stories even after the perpetrator has admitted to lying or media has admitted to error who have permanently branded the victim of the accusation a rapist for life. Take the cases of Brad Wardell, Max Tempkin, and more recently, Paul Nungesser.

It hurts legitimate victims of sexual assault and rape because people are so fed up with false accusations that sometimes it's honestly hard to believe them, whether legitimate or not.

And it even hurts the accusers themselves… sometimes. It's not entirely uncommon for a false accuser to get off scott free without having to answer for false accusations.

Recently, the infamous Mattress Girl, Emma Sulkowicz graduated from Columbia University alongside the man she accused, Paul Nungesser. I won't get into the details of the accusation, or the outcome of the NYPD investigation or even the internal investigation by Columbia University. But sufficed to say, Nungesser was investigated and found to be innocent.

Despite this, Sulkowicz doubled-down and refused to take back her accusation, even in light of evidence that shows she was cordial and inviting to her rapist, even months after the alleged rape was said to have occurred. She engaged in a public shaming campaign against Nungesser which culminated in a so-called art project in which she carried her mattress around with her everywhere she went. To class, from class, and yes… even during her graduation ceremony, even after being asked not to.

The claim is that the art project was a protest, a project to bring awareness to the topic of sexual assault on campus, which has been claimed to affect up to one in five female students during the course of their university career. (A claim that, if true, outnumbers the prevalence of rape and sexual assault in third-world countries. But also a claim that has been thoroughly debunked.)

The accusation carried no weight, no evidence, not even a preponderance of evidence. And the university allowed her art project to continue, knowing full well that the project itself was aimed at her accused. Possibly knowing full well that the accused with then later sue the University for allowing his continued defamation.

Her project, like every other false accusation I've mentioned before does nothing to help true victims of rape. In my opinion, it's little more than seeking attention and publicity and is ultimately self-serving. And this is evident when you take into consideration that, now that Sulkowicz has graduated, she intends to sell her mattress to the highest bidder.

Rape is a serious crime. One that, when an accusation has been made, sends people into a frenzy. I have seen with my own eyes what happens when mobs form calling for the blood of an accused rapist. Even innocent ones. I have seen people's reputations destroyed by a jilted ex-lover seeking revenge for a bad break-up, and I have seen a man's entire life shift course because of a mutual drunken hook-up at a wedding in which the woman regretted it after the fact and brought forth an accusation.

This cannot be allowed to continue. Not just for the sake of the falsely accused, but mostly for the sake of future legitimate victims. As a father, I could not bear the thought of something like that happening to my child, and it's entirely likely that I would hunt down whoever had victimized her and destroy them before the police ever got to them. But I could not stand in judgement of those that disbelieved her, either, knowing full well the culture of rape hoaxes that have sprung up over recent years. And it is not the strangers standing in judgement that are to blame, but those that sought attention, or to alleviate their own guilt and shame by blaming others for their own poor choices.

In short, in order to take accusations of rape and sexual assault seriously, the false accusations must be treated as such. But in today's culture, we see even false accusations taken more seriously by those in the media that legitimate crimes.

It's almost as if the fiction is more trustworthy to the femisphere than the reality. And if that's the case, I feel for the future victims that such a culture will inevitably create, both for the falsely accused, and the future victims who refuse to report it because they're afraid they won't be taken seriously.

With that said, never fail to report rape. It is a crime. Report it always. Because while it might be hard to recount your tale to the police, it'll be ten times harder to go through life feeling like a victim, and the pats on the back and victim-sympathy you'll get from enablers boil down to little more than fluff.

Feminism: Saving the world from evil

June 1, 2015 | by Kevin Weinberg | Link | Original Link

Debbie Irontwat took a deep breath as she prepared to storm the White House with her brave she-warriors. After years of rereading Jane Austen novels and taking elective classes in Fem Lit at her local community college, she now had enough experience and expertise to tell the president how to run the country. All she needed to do was have the White House spokesperson pass on her ideas—which he'd already agreed to do.

It was time to kick some gender-neutral butt.

Debbie marched into the White House, her fellow feminists at her side. A man greeted her at the door. "May I help you ladies?"

Wow, they're insulting me right off the bat, Debbie thought.

"If by 'ladies', you mean vagina-bearing persons of the x-chromosome—or just vbpotxcs—then yes. I was invited to speak with the White House spokesperson after my petition on Feminismistheonlywaytoequality.com gained enough signatures."

"Right this way please, ma'am."

"Ugh, excuse you, sir."

"Hmm?"

"You just called me ma'am."

"Okay?"

"That's sexist."

"It is?"

"Of course!"

"Sorry, I didn't know that."

"Also, why are there 10 paintings on the wall behind you of men and only 1 of a woman?"

"I don't know."

"Ugh," Debbie grunted. "Typical male chauvinism. Okay, lead the way, peasant."

The peasant led Debbie through the White House, though in all honesty, it shouldn't have been called the "White House" but instead "the house of sexism and misogyny," as literally everything about it was filled to the brim with overt hatred of women, such as the bathrooms they passed: the Men's bathroom was on the left, and the Women's bathroom was on the right. What exactly where they trying to suggest here by doing that, huh? Debbie didn't know, but it was definitely sexist. Just like every video game.

After a brief walk, they entered a small office. Debbie's she-warriors were forced to wait outside, as this would be a one-on-one meeting. The man—of course it was a man, go figure!—she was meeting was named Steve Oberman, and Debbie knew right away she didn't like him: he was tall, handsome, and had good teeth. That's totally sexist. But not as sexist as what he did the moment she entered.

Without any regard for the fact that she was a human being deserving of respect and fair treatment, the man, Steve, pulled out her chair for her. What was he going to do next? Slap her in the face and rape her? Seriously. He pulled out her fucking chair!

“Umm, excuse me, sir,” she growled. “Do I look like I don’t have arms?”

“No, Miss Irontwat.”

“Then why did you pull out my chair?”

“Because … when a—” He stopped as if catching himself.

“When a what?” Debbie demanded. “When a woman? Is that what you were about to say?”

“I guess.”

“Typical chauvinist pig. Well?”

“Well what?”

“Aren’t you going to pull out my chair for me?”

“But you said…”

Debbie sighed. “Seriously? You’re confused?”

“A little.”

“And this, Mister Oberman, is why Violence Against Women is at an all-time high. Because you just don’t get it.”

“What don’t I get?”

“Of course I want you to pull out my chair for me. But I want you to do it while making remarks about how equal I am and that the reason you’re pulling out my chair is because I’m a person and not a woman.”

“Ah, understood.” Steve pulled out her chair and said, “I recognize your equality, and this gesture of chair-out-pulling holds no significance in relation to your gender.”

Good. Maybe he can learn after all. Now, it’s time to change the world and save women everywhere.

Steve took his own seat. Then, in a disgusting act of hatred against women, his eyes immediately met hers—as if he was going out of his way not to stare at her breasts. That was sexist. What, should she be ashamed of the fact that she had breasts? She was a *fem*inist! They were there because they were meant to be looked at. And here he was pretending they didn’t even exist like she should be ashamed she had them at all. How sexist!

A second later, he quickly stole a peek at her breasts.

How sexist! What, was she some kind of object for his amusement? Was he going to jump over the table next and throw her down and do butt things? There were always butt things when you dealt with people like this.

“Well, I’m glad you could come.”

“You’re glad?” Debbie asked. “Ugh! Ingrained Jane Austen societal micro chauvinistic sexism right there!”

“I see … so anyway, it’s a pleasure to finally meet you.”

“A pleasure to … finally meet me?” Debbie resisted the urge to throw something at him. How many things was he going to say that were sexist and discriminatory until he’d finally had enough?

“Let me just get right to the point,” Debbie said. “Women in America are suffering: they aren’t being paid equally, they are harassed at the workplace, and they don’t always have the same opportunities.”

“I agree,” Steve said excitedly. “Very much so. In fact, my wife went through much of that.”

“Your wife?” Debbie asked. “What, is she your property or something? Jane Austen, motherfucker! I READ HER BOOKS!”

“I see … so anyway, yes, I agree. These are serious issues in desperate need of change.”

“And that’s why I’ve come,” Debbie said. “Because you’re not attempting to fix things the proper way: the feminist way.”

“What do you mean?”

“Well, you’re trying to introduce new laws that force women to be paid the same amount of money and to give them the same opportunities while making workplace harassment illegal.”

“Yes, and?”

“And!” Debbie snapped. “That’s not going to fix the problem.”

“Then what is?”

Debbie grinned. “I’m glad you asked. In order to make women receive equal pay, the answer is not to pass a law requiring them to receive equal pay, but to ban the color pink from being sold in little girls’ toys.”

“Wait, what?”

“Also,” Debbie continued. “Little boys must play with dolls, while little girls must play with toy guns. Even though they might hate it and cry, that will fix everything. Secondly, all video games must be banned unless they portray a female character as the hero.”

“I’m not following.”

“Of course you’re not, but listen anyway. And the reason you’re not following is because of ingrained, societal, Jane Austen, cultural, society, sexism ingrained culture society preexisting gender stereotypes conformity.”

“I see…”

Debbie shook with anger as she continued. “Today I was watching a commercial. They were selling a hair product. And every actor in the commercial was female. And the bottle was pink! It’s almost like they’re trying to get us raped … on purpose!”

“I don’t understand.”

“How do you not understand? You see, it’s simple. By allowing pink things to be targeted to women, and by allowing little girls to play with toys that little girls tend to enjoy, you’re making it so that men will want to commit violent acts against us. The only way to stop the violence is to market products and services to demographics who aren’t interested in them. Duh!”

“How come?”

“Because of DNA and RNA and shit and whatever. Try to keep up, Mister Oberman!”

“So … you want to ban these things?”

“Yes.”

“And you want to ban sexualized women in video games by making them not attractive?”

“No, no, no!” Debbie shouted. “Do I look like an extremist feminist to you?”

“No comment.”

Debbie ignored his rude remark. “What I want, Mister Oberman, is to have females made even more attractive since their bodies are nothing to be ashamed of. But what we need to do is hook up special devices to males that prevent them from getting aroused at the sight of the female form, as to do so is sexist and makes them hate women.”

“I’m sorry, Miss Irontwat, but I’m just not understanding your logic here.”

“Of course you don’t! Do you even know the definition of prejudice, Mister Oberman? Prejudice is when you make a judgment on someone before you even know them. And as a feminist, we believe that, because of ingrained sexism in our society, all men are at least a little prejudiced. All of them. Even you. You might not seem like it at first, but even though I don’t know you, I’m sure if I did get to know you I’d be able to find your hidden ingrained societal given Jane Austen Fem Lit making the world a better place sexism Gender Conformity equal rights!”

“I … I guess I’ll pass on your feedback. Thanks for coming, I suppose.”

“One more thing!”

“Yes, Miss Irontwat?”

“People have this crazy idea that feminism isn’t about equal rights anymore. So I always make it a point to show them the dictionary definition of feminism before I conclude any conversation with a man. As you can see here”—she removed a pocket dictionary and showed it to him—“Feminism is only, and I repeat, only about securing equal rights for women.”

She patted her legs and stood up. “Now that that’s out of the way, I do hope that, by next week, the color pink is banned, every commercial has at least one female character in it, and Jane Austen’s words will replace the United States Constitution.”

Before waiting for him to respond, Debbie spun around and soared out of the room. Hopefully, her message would get through, and she could make the world a better place for women everywhere. Because feminism was about fighting for equality the only way that made sense: the annihilation of certain colors on the visible spectrum of light, and changing the way children played with toys.

The End.

Try a university outside the Anglosphere

June 1, 2015 | by Lucian Vâlsan | Link | Original Link

We are quite literally bombarded with horror stories from universities where men get their lives messed-up over a false rape allegation or over mass-hysteria promoted by libelous journalists (see the UVA hoax).

But it's not just the US. In Britain, we have the student unions which have the power to ban reading groups because they dared to study Friedrich Nietzsche. In Canada, student unions and other bullies of similar or larger caliber can and do ban even the very mention of misandry.

But the overwhelming majority of these highly insane cases have one thing in common: Virtually all take place in English-speaking countries. And those that don't take place in an English-speaking country, such as the East-German type of censorship enforced at the Uppsala University in Sweden, are still universities that are remarkably similar in their structure with the model used by the universities in the English-speaking nations.

With the full acknowledgment that not all (maybe even not most) students can afford to travel to get their degrees and ignoring the argument whether a degree is actually needed or is worth the time and money for most people – I will try to explain why there would indeed be a permanent solution to simply vote with your feet and get your degree in a non-English speaking country.

Different organizational structure

On continental Europe (i.e. everything except the UK and Ireland), China, Japan, Central America and South America (that is to say, the overwhelming majority of the planet) – universities deal almost exclusively with knowledge and little with anything else.

Nowhere in Europe – and I checked from Russia to Spain and from Norway to Italy – has a university any authority whatsoever to adjudicate anything outside plagiarism and similar disputes of this nature.

Even if two students beat each other during a class, the University can't do anything except to call the Police. And even if the students are found guilty by a court of law, they can still finish their studies there either in time (if they get a suspended sentence) or freeze their studies and continue at a later date (after they get out of jail). It so follows that if a court of law finds them innocent, the debate is already over no matter how serious the charges are. Also, the institution of "suspension" applied to students is de facto non-existent.

As a rule, expelling is limited to criminal deeds against the university itself (i.e. burn a university building or beat up a teacher) or aggravated academic crimes (i.e. plagiarism). In other words, the fact that a faculty member whined about "harassment" with no evidence and no criminal investigation – has zero meaningful consequences on the student(s) accused.

Campus culture is optional and highly limited in practice

As a rule, universities outside the Anglosphere own buildings that are quite at a distance from each other and the concept of fully-integrated campus is, for the most part, alien. And in the few place that it exists (such as the Paris-Sorbonne University) – it's still significantly more liberal than almost anything found in the present-day Anglosphere.

Also, as a rule, universities do also own at least one complex of dormitories but the dormitories are part of the city and not a gated community – and while some may be large enough to warrant their own police station, the campus police has no more (or less) authority than any other police station in that country. In other words, the campus police cannot be summoned to pick someone up because (s)he posted something offensive or because some of the speshulest snowflake that ever snowflaked found him/her triggering.

Sometimes these dormitory complexes give birth to a community – and that community has the freedom to legally associate. However, that freedom stops the second they wish to impose something on other students in the same complex who do not wish to join their new little club.

The dormitories themselves are administered directly by the universities but they cannot impose anything that goes contrary to the national education acts – which are quite liberty-oriented for the most part. Now, there are exceptions to this rule – but since staying in the dormitory is not obligatory to begin with, those exceptions are not numerous since market forces apply.

Virtually nowhere in Europe – or elsewhere outside the Anglosphere – is there such thing as a First Year Live-on Requirement, regardless of whether we're talking about taxpayer-funded universities (partially or fully) or private ones. In other words, one can graduate without even staying in dormitory campus to begin with.

This treatment stems from the commonsensical belief that students are legal adults and thus they need no babysitting. In fact, many students in Europe today go to college precisely to start learning how to handle life on their own – not to be even more sheltered and baby-sat in a gated campus.

More importantly – if one manages somehow to break one of the few rules that may exist in a particular campus, the worst case scenario is that one can get kicked out from the dorm and has to seek a rental flat for the rest of the academic year. But that won't bring expelling or the loss of scholarship (if applicable).

Deeds that might get one kicked out from the dormitories: destruction of property (e.g. burning a bed), repeated physical fights, not paying rent for a number of months, repeated organization of parties (this is mainly because the students have endless options of going to parties anywhere in the city with no restrictions)

Situations that never get one kicked out: any allegation of any crime, bringing alcohol in the dorms (as long as there's no loud party), petty nonsense (e.g. a student was triggered).

Student union is optional

The idea that a student union can ban a reading group at a university is totally alien outside the Anglosphere.

In most countries, there is a national student union. Italy has Unione degli Studenti, France has Union Nationale des Étudiants de France and some countries (like Germany) have more than one – Deutsche Studentenschaft (The German Student Union) and Sozialistische Deutsche Studentenbund (The Socialist German Student League).

But the role (and the power) of these unions is completely different from what one can find in the Anglosphere. For starters, membership in these unions is voluntary. Which means that most students don't belong to a union.

Then, the role of these unions is to represent the students in their relation with the local government (in federal nations, such as Germany) or directly with the national government (in more centralized nations such as France).

Recently, there has even been formed a European Students Union which is, for the most part, a do-nothing institution like many others under the patronage of the European Union. That may be annoying if you're a taxpayer, but the good news is that it's essentially toothless.

Besides these unions, there are also student organizations which are legally NGOs and are sometimes tied to the Universities (e.g. The Organization of the Students from "Babeș-Bolyai" University – in my city of rezidence) or tied to larger international NGOs who have branches for the entire city – which can contain more than one university (e.g. AIESEC).

Membership in these organizations is also voluntary (and free of charge in many cases) and they tend to come with some perks – like facilitating connection(s) with future employers or offering a discount for the public transport via their partnership with the City Hall. Speaking of perks, in some university cities, there are even economics-centered student organizations. Membership in such organizations can bring (for a tiny fee) various discounts at restaurants, cinemas, party events, concerts, etc.

But what all of these forms of student organizing have in common is that they don't have the power to impose anything to anyone who is not a member. And since membership is not compulsory, they essentially can't dictate anything to anyone – which means they're coerced by reality to use common sense and persuasion to get anything done.

The most recent example of the toothlessness of these unions was the little scandal created by the Trotskyite Student Union who wanted a professor banned from the Homboldt University in Berlin for the capital crimes of having a "rhetorical superiority", for displaying "eurocentrism" and for using "gendered language" (mind you, German is a gendered language, like most languages on the planet).

The University swiftly responded that the professor won't be banned, his lectures will continue to be hosted and those who disagree are invited to take part in a panel discussion with him – an offer which the Trotskyites refused because the professor was intimidating as he was "too confident" to debate with them. And that was the end of the story. Sure, the Trotskyites continued to whine on the Internet, but not a single flying toss is given.

Now imagine this story at an American university. This story also leads me to my next point.

Most of the universities outside the Anglosphere cannot become like the ones in the Anglosphere

Due to the way they're structured, there is both a physical and a structural impossibility for these universities to even come close in the degree of insanity with the Anglo Universities in any foreseeable future.

Even if the governments become more PC (as they already are in most of Europe) – giving the Universities the legal possibility to adjudicate criminal cases usually means referenda on the Constitutions (which is pooh-poohed by most governments) and large parliamentary majorities (two thirds at least) to amend both the criminal law and the national education acts (a de facto impossibility in the multi-party systems of Europe).

Also, given that most of the interaction between the students occurs during classes – while all the other interactions are 100% voluntary – any indoctrination attempt is bound to be limited in effect. This is one physical barrier preventing non-Anglo universities to go down the same road. Another barrier comes from the economic reality – most of them simply can't afford to start building gated campuses without risking to pull resources from more relevant projects which keep the university itself relevant on the global market.

Relatively similar educational quality

Now, if university ranking had been an exact science, then the difference between the various institutions' ranking tables wouldn't be so high.

In this ranking from the Times Higher Education – there are 74 Universities outside the Anglosphere in the first 200 (I counted Hong Kong as part of the Anglosphere). In this ranking, from Top Universities there are only 65 Universities outside the Anglosphere in the first 200.

But here's the catch – they're not even the same. University of Oslo is ranked 182 in the first link and 101 and in the second. Nagoya University from Japan is not even present in the first 200 in the first link whilst in the second it is ranked 103.

This leads us to an obvious conclusion: University ranking is both subjective and misleading. The reason why it's subjective is quite obvious – when establishing a ranking, criteria such as "prestige" (usually defined quite dubiously) or "networking" matter quite a lot. "Networking" is a nice way of saying "business links" – which is all fine and dandy until we consider that some universities on this planet are not businesses in the classical sense. Some of them are a form of social entrepreneurship (like the American universities used to be), some of them are State-owned, some of them are non-profits, and some of them are a mixture of all of the above combined.

But the reason why University ranking is misleading may be less obvious. For instance, a degree in European Studies is worthless on the job market regardless of whether it is obtained at Harvard or at Sofia University. Same goes for other degrees such as gender studies, horticulture, human resources and a plethora of similar ones.

Also, many universities do award diverse degrees – from mathematics to human resources. In the case of these universities, the averaging that occurs during the ranking process affects their standing. In other words, a University may be fabulous in 80% of its degrees – but it still has a crappy Humanities department and, when averaged, it thus ranks lower than a university that has fewer departments and all good. It also works the other way around: a university may be generally crap, but it has one or two programs that are fabulous.

In other words, one should research the value of the particular program they're interested in more than the overall value of the university, which, as noted, in addition to being misleading, can also be severely slanted by subjective criteria and cultural bias.

Programs in English

Even the very-very low ranked universities offer programs at least in English. In some universities, one can get a program in English, German and French, in addition to the local language(s).

Outside of the Anglosphere, speaking at least two languages (usually more, in Europe) is quite the norm.

However, in some nations, the most spoken second language is not English – but German (e.g. Greece or Czech Republic). This means that while getting a degree without knowing the local language is entirely possible, in some cases you might need to pick up some of the local tongue.

Picking up the local language may indeed be an economic advantage in the future. The foreign-language deficit is a known problem in the US (and rare skills are an economic advantage) while in Britain academics are still struggling to break what they call the vicious cycle of monolingualism.

To sum up

This article has not been written to bash the Anglosphere, but to point out that there are indeed better alternatives for those who (legitimately) fear the hostility of the modern-day university environment and just want to learn a particular subject without "listen and believe", "she fears you" and other mandatory similar nonsense.

At least for British (and Irish) students, getting a degree in continental Europe may indeed be cheaper (as part of various EU agreements). For US citizens, choosing Universidade de São Paulo (ranked 132, better than University of California Santa Barbara) may also be cheaper (as per the difference in the cost of living).

Many of the differences listed in this article also stem from the fact that outside the Anglosphere, the Universities usually test for the abilities in the field the individual wants to study – and don't take a holistic approach. In other words, your extracurricular activity doesn't really matter if you want to get a degree in physics. What matters is your command of physics at 12th grade level and a bit more. This is not always true for masters programs, though. An entire book can be written on the pros and cons of these two approaches but if you want to avoid shenanigans of gender ideologues, a university not taking a holistic approach is a plus.

The purpose of the advice to try a University from outside the Anglosphere is not as much as to put an economic pressure on the universities within the Anglosphere – but rather to put a cultural pressure on them as more people learn that things can indeed be done differently without cutting the educational quality.

In a way, what I'm proposing is in line with the MGTOW tradition – why play a University game that is right from the get go rigged against you when there are alternatives?

Gynocentrism, murder and the gender suicide gap

June 2, 2015 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

I'd gladly lose me to find you
I'd gladly give up all I got
To catch you I'm gonna run and never stop

I'd pay any price just to win you
Surrender my good life for bad
To find you I'm gonna drown an unsung man

I'd call that a bargain
The best I ever had

– The Who

Elliot Roger, a deeply disturbed young man, was obsessed with his rejection by women. He hated them for that rejection as surely as he hated men who found the acceptance he could not gain. 53 year old Norman Rousseau, with troubled health, shot himself just days before he and his wife were scheduled to be evicted from their home by the bank. Peter Denyer was facing similar circumstances when he shot his wife and two children, then himself. Darcell Coleman murdered the ex-boyfriend of the woman he was dating over a reported insult to her honor. Tao Hsiao jumped to his death after arguing with his girlfriend who would not quit shopping after a five hour spree in the mall.

All of these stories involved men going past the brink in one way or another. All of them ended horribly.

These tragedies regularly sit like bloody crowns of thorn atop the headlines in our news media. Much more importantly, each of these stories represents incalculable personal misery on those who are left behind, bearing only their grief and unanswered questions.

Media pundits, politicians, mental health professionals and gender ideologues step up to express canned outrage when cameras are on. Sanctimonious demands for gun control, better mental health services or a change in the nature of masculinity are the talking points that follow each tragic loss. The carnage, however, is deaf to all the armchair advice and rolls on unabated. What put these already vulnerable men over the edge has yet to have an honest examination in this society.

If you are looking for science here, an empirical answer, it won't be provided by this lone voice in the wilderness. What seems apparent though is that there is a common denominator here running like a bloodstained thread through each and every one of these human tragedies. It even has a name.

Gynocentrism.

Since I regard it as only an opinion I will state it in much plainer terms. It is men's determinatiion to find their worth in the acquisition of love and approval through protection of and provision for women that often puts them over the edge.

This is exactly what we socialize men to do. Whether you are a traditionalist father admonishing your son to “man up” and take care of your woman, or a feminist ideologue admonishing all men to man up and dedicate themselves to taking care of all women, the message is the same. Just shut up and get the job done. No excuses, no exceptions. If you don’t you will quickly find yourself at the lowest rung on the ladder of social approval. And if you are like a lot of men you will find yourself in a state of pain and deep shame. If you already have serious emotional or mental problems it might lead you to end it with a bullet or in a five story fall to a hard floor.

You might even be so anguished that you surrender to the compulsion to take yourself out and all those you love with you. It has happened countless times.

This is a problem that won’t be solved with gun control. Nor will the solution be found by media talking heads, whose main interest in the discourse is small scale celebrity and book sales. It certainly won’t be found by feminists, who disingenuously talk about ending gender roles even as they relentlessly demand that men, even complete strangers, take care of them.

The feminist line is partially correct. There is indeed some benefit to be found in an objective and healthy examination and rethinking of the male gender role. But as is already clear their ideas are just hollow rhetoric. When pinned down on it the most commonly parroted idea of what would benefit men is more pressure to take care of women. #HeforShe is the real agenda here. Same as it ever was.

When it comes to feminist overtures at examining the male gender role we have to ask the question, “That for the sake of which?” – For re-narration and revolution in the male role, or to pinpoint aspects of that role to be exploited as soft-spots to shame men into being even more gynocentric?

What if we took a true and serious look at the alleged feminist ideal? What if we really examined what was good for men? What conclusions would we draw?

Well, imagine an Elliot Roger who cared less whether women accepted him. Is it possible he would not have killed? Norman Rousseau, too, may have fared much better had his worth and identity not hinged simply on what he could produce for his wife. Peter Denyer, and his wife and children might still be alive had he not viewed poverty as a stain on his manhood and evidence of his uselessness. Darcell Coleman might not be in prison had he allowed his girlfriend to fight her own fights and defend her own “honor.”

Tao Hsiao may not have plummeted to his death if he had had the self-respect and boundaries to leave his girlfriend at the mall after an hour, or by not going at all — refusing to indulge her childish whims. He would have been much more equipped to do that if he were not struggling so pathetically to please her. What if Tao Hsiao was someone who would not be bothered with a woman who would spend 5 hours in a mall?

It is hard to know the answer to that because Tao Hsiao, and all the other men mentioned here clearly lived a life according to a gynocentric narrative; a life narrative that may have had some utility at one time in human evolution but which is now a wrecking ball in the lives of well-meaning men and a relentless infantilizing force in the lives of women.

In Texas the suicide rate in men rises and falls with the economy. It has no measurable effects on the lives of women. It is the same everywhere with the already lopsided male suicide rate in divorce. The body count doubles for men, while women pass through that gateway without so much as a statistical hiccup.

The message here is clear. Men are much more psychologically and emotionally dependent on women than the reverse.

This society teaches boys what they need to do to attract women when it should be teaching them how to reject selfish, unreasonable women without guilt or compunction. We teach boys, and ultimately men, that their real worth is in their labor and its efficacy in attracting and subsidizing women, just as surely as we teach women they are entitled to, even owed such special treatment.

As you look out across the landscape of men's lives, it's easy to see that so much wreckage — from suicide victims to concussions and torn ACLs on high school football fields — have their roots in the pursuit of women's approval and love.

You see it all across the culture. In every road crew (save the ones just holding up signs) you find men willing to put their bodies and lives at hardship and risk, most often to either attract a woman or to take care of one. You see it especially in poor men who work the worst of jobs, even fight in our wars, trying to measure up and qualify to be loved; qualify to be men.

Many of them in America have recently paid the ultimate price, calling out to their wives or mothers as they bled out in the desert sand. Or they come back home and suicide after finding out that their wounds, external and internal, are too much inconvenience for the women who claimed to love them.

This is the price of gynocentrism, and it is time we started teaching our boys and men that it is too steep. And our girls and women that they are not worth it. No one is.

We cannot ever fully end gynocentrism because we cannot end sexual competition. What we can do in the life of the average man is substantial, though.

We can offer, to any man willing and conscious enough to choose it, a path back to his personal dignity, a safe house for his resources and an escape from his dysfunctional conditioning. And we can offer, with good, conscious parenting, a much more healthy set of life options for our children. And we may just start to vacate our prisons in the process.

This is not, as some critics may allege, a mirroring of feminism which has only managed to estrange men and women while allowing women to still hang on to the resources men produce. That feminism is just another expression of gynocentrism. It is gynocentrism on crack.

Love and acceptance cannot be purchased with the mindless sacrifice of the unconscious, gullible white knight. That bargain usually earns the opposite in the form of abuse and parasitism. That ill-fated quest, the search for self-worth at the mercy of women's caprice, is the driving force behind the Elliot Rogers' of the world. What most men endure with a simple loss of self, other less stable men translate to blood in the streets.

If that is to change then more realistic alternatives for men must be present in a substantially different life narrative.

When I co-wrote "Authoring Your Own Life," with Peter Wright, our intent was to start a dialogue along these lines. Indeed, that is ultimately the goal of our version, our vision, of the men's movement. It is not life without women. It is life without gynocentrism. And it is attainable with a different way for men to measure their own worth; with a different narrative about their lives.

As we move into a new era of men finally starting to redefine themselves, for themselves, let's teach them from early on to reject, or at least to consciously manage, the gynocentrism on which far too much of the world depends and that sometimes drives men over the edge, leading them to destruction instead of the love they seek.

We can't do this by simply rejecting the gynocentric narrative, although that is where it must start. We must provide men and especially our boys with a new blueprint based on self-acceptance, self-worth and self-respect, none of which are even remotely dependent on a woman's approval.

We must provide men the opportunity to author their own lives, to eschew the pressures placed on them to surrender that authorship to others.

For some men, the results of that work will come not a minute too soon.

Battle and Brew, Gamergate, Zen Men, and why mob rule is killing fun as we know it

June 2, 2015 | by Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) | Link | Original Link

My organization Zen Men LLC tried to organize a GamerGate meetup at Battle & Brew (B&B), a video game themed bar. Politically-motivated bullies then attacked B&B, and the general manager Nate Sanders pulled the plug and said this was all my fault.

I did not want any B&B staff to deal with any unwarranted stress, but it was only right to warn them about a PR risk. When Nate and I first spoke, I told him about the bomb threat made against Local 16 in DC and warned him that there might be an unprovoked social media backlash just because GamerGate meetups happen. He was well aware of the circumstances, and I assured him that Zen Men LLC was not coming to the event for political reasons. The whole point of the event was to play video games and network.

This article shares correspondence with the general manager, including two phone calls and an email exchange. I did not include correspondence that only involved event business such as catering or space reservation. Normally I would consider this kind of information private, but I need authentic sources to back up what I say about people involved.

Please listen to the preliminary phone conversation before reading on, particularly from 6:28 on. I cannot stress this enough: Please listen to this recording.

I announced on both Reddit and ZenMen.org that the B&B general manager assured me that threats against patrons would not be tolerated, which is a realistic assumption given the content of the recording above. Given the ambiguity of text, one could interpret my announcement in a way to think that B&B was endorsing or supporting the politics of Zen Men or GamerGate. Nate therefore accused me of “misquoting” him, and for associating his business with politics that he did not want to deal with. My intention was not to suggest that B&B supported me or what I believe, but to suggest that I thought highly of Battle & Brew for Nate’s claim to keep things non-political.

Even so, I did apologize several times to Nate simply because I felt badly about a business facing unwarranted heat. I assured Nate—again, several times—that there was no effort on my part to put words in his mouth—even if people choose to see it that way. Although my speaking highly of his business did not necessarily constitute affiliation, Nate insisted I make this explicit what became this follow-up announcement.

When I was interacting with the public, I claimed that Nate would not tolerate threats to patrons made for political reasons, namely by “SJWs” (Social Justice Warriors), a term which only ever referred to politically-motivated agents. This does not necessarily mean that Nate is anti-SJW, it means that B&B is advertised as a non-political bar, and the behavior carried out by social justice activists is not compatible with their service. It is safe for me to assume that a business owner would not welcome needless political conflict, and me staying in line with that thinking does not mean that I tried to act as a representative.

As always with conflicts of this nature, I could have worded things differently to try and avoid some misunderstandings. But in my defense, those who understand the context surrounding GamerGate meetups know that the outrage Nate faced would have been the same no matter what, and I cannot be held responsible for the questionable tactics of others. I warned Nate that political nuts might target his bar, even though we weren't going to be there for political reasons. He acknowledged both points, so if he wishes to say that my calling him a responsible, neutral business owner was misquoting him, then he's free to explain an alternative position.

You can listen to the dramatic phone conversation here.

> I will no longer apologize for decisions made by other people regarding my speaking highly of a venue. I did that before, but I really should not have.

The impression that Battle and Brew was not a political venue made it attractive for a GamerGate meetup in the first place. GamerGate meetups are popping up all over the nation specifically because gamers who put freedom and fun first want to meet and play, putting them directly in B&B's target market.

Nate threatened to ban Zen Men LLC and all associated parties if I posted just one more thing about Battle and Brew. He also told me that the only way to make things right with him was to take down everything I posted about B&B, but nothing would change his mind about denying us service. I took down a Reddit thread with 300+ upvotes (which was automatically archived somewhere, I think), the Zen Men announcement, and the Eventbrite page ready to start earning B&B some money. But with this post, Zen Men LLC is now banned instead, and B&B's reactionary decision ironically threw them into the realm of politics.

I had to walk an awkward line between repairing a relationship with a fascinating business and asserting myself against ill-informed accusations and decisions pushed by a man who saw himself and his business as the only victims. I quickly made concessions—including ones I probably should not have—in good faith, but started pushing back when Nate started retaliating with claims about my personal intentions. Although he apologized for some personal remarks, he did not change his mind about the event or about his opinion of my intentions, which brings professionalism into the discussion.

In many ways, Nate really does come off as a talented, compassionate human being with thoughts and feelings, especially in our final email conversation, which I suggest you read. He and I both apologized to each other for any misunderstandings, and tried to close the conversation as respectfully and professionally as possible despite detectable frustration.

For that reason, I do not feel comfortable outright bashing B&B or Nate, but I do have to assert myself where reasonable. /u/oldmanbees from Reddit actually articulated the issue better than I could in a reply to me on this Reddit discussion about the aftermath:

[image]

Note for clarification that B&B had no signed contract with Zen Men LLC. We only had a verbal agreement that a reservation was in the works.

I regret that Nate and his crew had to deal with so much drama, but they seriously cannot expect me to walk off without a word. I do not endorse any retaliation of any kind against B&B or its staff, but as a customer I can comment on an establishment for the purposes of helping others make an informed decision about the quality of their service. This is the nature of accountability, and part of being a business owner is allowing the community to voice their own opinions about businesses. Please observe the timestamps for the reviews in the thread linked in the previous sentence to learn which opinions voiced at the time of this writing have nothing to due with this controversy.

Nate, you have to own up to the fact that you made a decision that affects the way you do business, and the way people view you as a member of their community. You did what you thought was best for you, your trade, your clients, and your passions. I respect that and wish you success, and I suspect that the controversy will get you more customers. But will you please stop kidding yourself about being non-political? Pay attention to the vibes in your bar as it responds to this article, and ask yourself if they appear to have a slant. I'll bet you are now on a path towards exclusivity, not neutrality.

> I wish Nate would admit that it was unprofessional to blame those trying to give him business of being among those threatening his business.

I can say more about the finer details of the drama, so those of you reading this article are free to ask me anything in this Reddit thread. I encourage B&B staff to join that conversation as well because they should speak for themselves to correct any misunderstandings. A good place to start would be in response to this reply by /u/StrixTechnica.

I will no longer apologize for decisions made by other people regarding my speaking highly of a venue. I did that before, but I really should not have. Still, I've tried to do the right thing and admit my mistakes whenever I've made them, but I wish Nate would admit that it was unprofessional to blame those trying to give him business of being among those threatening his business.

Zen Men is still hosting a GamerGate meetup. I'm disappointed that it can't be at Battle and Brew, but we'll still have our chance to enjoy each other's company away from all of this nonsense.

For those of you floating around the Internet who abused Nate into acting as proxy for your reckless rage, I hope you one day realize just how twisted and dysfunctional it is to take none of the blame for this.

Nate, did I really ever come off as anyone other than a customer concerned about your venue? Are you absolutely sure there is no difference between me and the people who harassed you into pulling the plug? Are you prepared to argue that businesses cutting off service to market demographics in response to political pressure that you were warned about is an apolitical act?

There is nothing neutral, courteous or decent about denying service to a group of people just because some strangers called you names on the Internet.

Alert: Growing whispering campaign(s) against critics of gynocentrism?

June 2, 2015 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

I see that Sargon of Akkad, who is not an MRA the last we checked, is being subjected to a whisper campaign. Similar whisper campaigns run regularly about Men's Rights Advocates. If you don't know politics much, especially American politics, it may surprise you, but the "whisper campaign" is a classic dodge that many politicians have used successfully to defeat their opponents.

But whisper campaigns aren't just done against politicians; they're run against anyone in a powerful political establishment who wants to silence critics. And while it's not clear that the lying liar who calls himself "MrTARDISreviews" is such a paid stooge, odds are he's been listening to other paid stooges at minimum:

We daily see people saying things about A Voice for Men and/or various members of our staff that are not true. We also see people online pretending to be MRAs advocating all sorts of crazy shit. We can frequently follow them and discover they are really sock puppets–new accounts with no history. Sometimes, they come out and outright impersonate us; the YouTuber Red Pill Philosophy (whom we have no issues with by the way, we don't agree with everything he says but more power to him) got a letter not long ago claiming to be from A Voice for Men, declaring that AVfM created and owned the concept of "The Red Pill" and everyone "must join AVfM" and other total garbage that we never said and do not believe–in fact AVfM has never made any such claim and we fully believe not everyone should be a Men's Rights Advocate, and even if you are one you owe us nothing (except, hopefully, not to lie about us).

Here's what I think is really happening: for years now, all this energy was put on MRAs. The problem is, MRAs have been increasingly successful: by refusing to shut up in the face of lies and shaming, we've shown the wider culture that yes, feminism is not God and yes, by God, you can criticize it without being a misogynist, a woman beater, a rapist, etc. So the result is the prejudiced people and those running the whisper campaign(s) are having to regularly widen the circle of people they attack. This must be frustrating for them.

But I put this out as a warning for all: expect more of this. Expect fakers pretending to be well-known critics of feminism. Expect fakers who repeat debunked lie after debunked lie about critics of feminism, or just critics of gynocentrism. There are people pretending to speak for AVfM. They do not. There are people who claim to be MRAs who are not, and can be easily proven as fakers when they use throwaway accounts and/or get called on the carpet by actual MRAs.

Do we claim we can say who is and is not an actual MRA? No, although we claim expertise in what a real MRA looks like. Sargon isn't one of them. Neither are a lot of phony sock puppets claiming to be MRAs while behaving like boors.

But feminism especially is a multibillion$$ multinational enterprise. The underlying gynocentrism that it depends on is also alive and well, and will also accuse you of misogyny if you just commit the sin of behaving as if women can be accountable adults.

I don’t know if there’s much more we need to say here, except that we expect other non-MRAs like Sargon to be subjected to the same whisper campaigns we have over the years. There’s nothing much to be done about it, except to recognize that it’s a real thing, it’s not paranoia, and you can usually identify the fakers by their words and actions, so don’t be paranoid, but be on the lookout.

Alice Munro's "Runaway" and women's accountability

June 2, 2015 | by Irene Ogrizek | Link | Original Link

Alice Munro's story Runaway is about a young country woman who runs away from an abusive husband. Her freedom is short-lived, however, as she soon steps off a Greyhound bus to call him. She's at a gas station and has regretted her decision.

Clark comes to get her and in the weeks following, he's duly chastened by her actions. His response empowers Carla, but later events suggest her empowerment is only temporary: in the story's coda, we learn Carla suspects Clark of having killed a missing and much-loved pet. Its absence provides a backdrop to the cycles of domestic abuse rendered by Munro—when it comes to this couple's marriage, we see a slow build-up of tension, a dramatic release and, of course, great make-up sex.

I've taken a lot of criticism from feminists lately. Much of it has to do with how I see victimization being proclaimed by hordes of western women, hordes who in fact enjoy a great deal of freedom. I'm puzzled by their claims and suspect that the power and status conferred by victim motifs is what drives women to incorporate them into their identities. This isn't to say that there are no victims—I've met plenty—but most belong to groups that are obviously disrespected: the elderly, the disabled and the economically disenfranchised. Rarely have I seen comprehensive victimization in women who have access to education, healthcare and financial stability. This raises a question: when it comes to victims, who really qualifies?

If there's anything the mainstream media is good at, it's maintaining and nurturing blind spots. With women and victimization, two obvious ones spring to mind: the issue of self-responsibility and abuse perpetrated by women. Both of these get short shrift, especially in instances where the abuse is directed at children. Many of Munro's stories are correctives in this regard, a fact that I believe explains at least some of her popularity. While in Runaway she captures cycles of abuse in an unhappy marriage, a secondary pattern of behaviour also emerges. Carla is controlled by an angry and unpredictable man; however, because she's also like most of us–she craves balance–she abuses others in turn. Passive-aggression is how she does it and her neighbour Sylvia, a newly widowed woman, is her target.

When Carla plots her escape, she turns to Sylvia for help. Carla cleans house for Sylvia and recently helped her with the more practical aspects of her husband Leon's death. The women bonded during that time, largely because Carla got into the habit of making light-hearted and impromptu gestures, gestures that reminded Sylvia of a life beyond her role as caregiver. After the funeral and an extended trip overseas, Sylvia is eager to see Carla to deliver a figurine she found on her travels: it's of a young sprinter and, in her mind, is symbolic of the younger woman's spirit. During that meeting Carla breaks down and asks for help. Sylvia lends her clothes and money and makes arrangements for Carla to stay with a friend in Toronto.

It's those clothes that Clark returns that evening. In fact it's the middle of the night when he begins tapping on the doors and windows of Sylvia's home, startling her awake. What follows is a tense exchange through half-open French doors. It's an argument conducted in the deep darkness of a country evening, and lit only by the ghostly headlights of passing cars.

Clark's intention was to intimidate Sylvia and how he arrived at that point should make us re-evaluate some of what we know about battered wives. During pillow-talk meant to arouse Clark, Carla lied about Leon, saying he had made sexual advances toward her. Given their dire finances, Clark comes up with the idea of blackmailing Sylvia: Leon was an award-winning poet of great renown and Clark believes Sylvia will pay to keep his bad behaviour secret. It's a patently dumb idea, but one triggered by Carla's lie. The situation deteriorates even further, however. Carla now needs to stop Clark and the only way she can do so without revealing her complicity is to create a distracting crisis. The crisis is to engineer an escape, and that can only be achieved with Sylvia's help.

What makes the story poignant is Sylvia's naive concern for Carla. In fact, she and Leon's intentions toward the young couple had been good all along; in return, both Clark and Carla schemed against them. While Carla cuts a more sympathetic figure–it's clear she's on the losing end of the relationship–Clark's abuse is mitigated by the fact that Carla isn't above using others too. I suspect this trickle-down pattern of abuse often unfolds in reality but is rarely examined. It's just not politic for feminists to do so.

And this is where the damning phrase, victim-blaming, has a lot of answer for. It's also where we need to step up our understanding of why both genders resort to violence to resolve domestic disputes. If we women want to be taken seriously, we need to stop being victims at every turn and get honest about our own capacities for villainy. We also need to acknowledge that children–those truly innocent victims–often get swept up in the crossfire initiated by two parents, not just one.

We can begin by supporting each other and cultivating true self-possession, the kind that can question all ideologies, including feminism. I know that as a young woman, practicing self-possession often went hand-in-hand with feeling isolated.

Let me explain. I was sharing an apartment with a friend who was making all the classic dating errors. She tried too hard and became intimate with men too soon. Consequently, she was often getting dumped and when she did, I found myself sharing space with someone who was chronically angry and showed it by slamming every door she opened. Since I was a few years older and had made my own mistakes, I learned from her and adopted a different paradigm. I accepted that whether I liked it or not, a hierarchy existed in our culture when it came to dating: if a woman gave away too much too soon, she would lose value in most men's eyes.

So I started my own personal rebellion: I carried mad money and was prepared to use it. This was in the 90s, when a screwball aspect of the Zeitgeist–that of over-valuing brutal honesty–somehow became a free pass for all bad behaviour (as in "I robbed a bank this morning, but hey, at least I'm being honest"). This meant that on dates where men revealed things I found unacceptable, I took them at their word and usually left. So that guy who admitted he'd slept with his ex right before meeting me for dinner? I went to use the ladies' room, saw an unalarmed exit and used it. The man who was just being honest when he said lonely women should become second girlfriends? I got out of his car at a red light and hoofed it to the metro station we'd just passed. In my mind, both dates qualified as losing propositions and I couldn't think of one reason to stay in the company of these men a minute longer.

The problem was that many of my peers, including that friend, undermined the efforts I was making to raise my personal bar and set clear limits. It was telling because instead of saying no to bad behaviour, she and many others I knew tolerated it and then relished feeling victimized, relished feeling like martyrs. It was disingenuous behaviour, but behaviour I came to see was widespread and deeply entrenched. Unfortunately not much has changed: I still see women going out of their way to be offended and in doing so, missing out on opportunities to mature.

And this is the problem with feminism's current focus in the sex wars. There's a tendency to magnify vulnerability and minimize responsibility. There's also a concerted denial around some certain hard truths: the fact is that a crime like rape, especially rape committed without witnesses, is hard to prove. It's also true that imbibing alcohol or drugs makes giving consent either impossible or impossibly complicated. Moreover, if a man is as drunk as a woman, he too can claim he was raped since taking advantage of a drunk partner, in a legal sense, means that a man or a woman can be a predator.

Denying these facts may feel satisfying, but when we do so, the real casualty is the truth. The reality is that saying no to sex or drugs, especially early in the evening or early in social negotiations, is usually enough to avoid serious problems. Women with the self-possession to do so have always known this, which is why so few of them are at the vanguard of feminism.

Malala Yousafzai

Runaway is a great story when it comes to understanding that female victims can be perpetrators too. For example, we acknowledge the connection between childhood abuse and pedophilia–we know that perpetrators have almost always been victims–but we punish pedophiles anyway. When it comes to women who fail to act, especially those who fail to remove children from dangerous circumstances, we respond as though these women's failures result in lesser consequences for children. However, don't children suffer similarly or worse when an indifferent or self-absorbed mother fails to protect them? Examining child abuse from the perspective of children who have lived with abusers and enablers seems a fruitful way of understanding that broader social issue, but it's a perspective that doesn't get a lot of air time. It's eclipsed by the more popular view that women living with abusers are also victims and so softening our perspective of their guilt, when it comes to their children, is only fair. But is that really a good idea, given all the social services available to women today?

Carla doesn't have children to fail, but she does fail her goat Flora. In a relationship that's all about payback, Carla's tepid attempt to leave Clark hasn't resolved their differences. It's only angered him to the extent that it's cost Flora her life. By the end of the story, we know that Carla knows this and knows she is living with a man spiteful enough to kill an animal she loves. What colours her character unfavourably is that she decides to stay with him regardless. Her dependence on him is such that she cannot deal with reality; she cannot tell herself a painful and obvious truth.

Dealing with reality seems less and less a priority of western feminists. Instead they have evolved into navel-gazers who are now evolving into narcissists. They have conveniently forgotten that women in other parts of the world face the unimaginable daily. And it's an oversight that can't be explained by a lack of information. I'm reminded of the unimaginable every time I ask my mother about her life during the second world war, or see a young woman like Malala Yousafzai asserting her right to be educated. We need to remember what real suffering looks like and acknowledge that calling the privileged countries we live in "rape cultures" is a sign of neurosis, not truth.

Contrasting characters like Carla and Sylvia remind us that there are degrees of suffering and that not all pain is inflicted on us. What Munro also shows us is that some bad experiences are not down to masculine villains. They're simply down to the choices we make.

Size Matters: How Tess Holliday Can Usher In A Larger Discussion About Standards Of Attractiveness

> "I'm too sexy for my car too sexy for my car,
> Too sexy by far,
> And I'm too sexy for my hat,
> Too sexy for my hat what do you think about that..."
> –Right Said Fred

(NOTE: Please see special announcement at the end of today's column. Thanks!)

The past week saw People magazine at the center of yet another controversy when it featured on its cover one Ms. Tess Holliday, hailed as the world's first BBW Supermodel, at 5'5″, 280lbs and wearing a 22 dress size. Like People's previous "beautiful people" cover last year, which featured "12 Years a Slave" award-winning actress Ms. Lupita N'yongo, we were all treated to yet another lecture, er, discussion, about the harmful effects of putting women into a rigid corset of beauty standards that weren't just constricting for them, but ruinous for society as a whole. Because People magazine, which has always been about bigging up the lives of the Beautiful People in its pages, has become something of a cultural signpost along these lines for our society at large, they are seen as setting beauty and attractiveness trends for our national heartthrobs and "it girls", while preaching, er, teaching us all that "beauty is subjective, not objective" and to be proud of who and what we are. Many folk of the social justice warrior variety will noddingly approve of such notions, finger wagging that within Diversity itself – a watchword in our time to be sure – is an infinite combination of wonderous attractiveness.

Except only when, it really isn't.

That's because your correspondent has found that after perusing another famous People product – the "Sexiest Man Alive!" covers extending back to its earliest beginnings three decades ago – what American women actually do in terms of what gets their motors running, and what they tout in terms of what society "should" find attractive, are two very different things. Based on my research, courtesy of People magazine's website, while women want "society" (read: men) to have a more forgiving view toward what they deem as hot, women themselves seem quite content to reserve the right to be very myopic about what makes them tingle downstairs.

Let's Count The Ways

Here is People's entire list of sexiest man alive covers, the latest of which was for 2014, and the earliest one that I could find being for the year 1985; beside the name of each "sexy man" is the year they made the cover of People for the honor, and their height:

2014: Chris Hemsworth 6'3″

2013: Adam Levine 6'0″

2012: Channing Tatum 6’1″

2011: Bradley Cooper 6’1″

2010: Ryan Reynolds 6’2″

2009: Johnny Depp 5’10”

2008: Hugh Jackman 6’2″

2007: Matt Damon 5’10”

2006: George Clooney 5’11”

2005: Matthew McConaughey 6’0″

2004: Jude Law 6’0″

2003: Johnny Depp 5’10”

2002: Ben Affleck 6’4″

2001: Pierce Brosnan 6’2″

2000: Brad Pitt 5’11”

1999: Richard Gere 5’11”

1998: Harrison Ford 6’1″

1997: George Clooney 5’11”

1996: Denzel Washington 6’1″

1995: Brad Pitt 5’11”

1994: People didn’t run a “Sexiest Man Alive!” cover for this year

1993: Richard Gere (de facto sexist man alive featured on the cover with his then-wife, supermodel Cindy Crawford)

1992: Nick Nolte(!) 6’1″

1991: Patrick Swayze 5’10”

1990: Tom Cruise 5’7″

1989: Sean Connery(!) 6’2″

1988 John F. Kennedy, Jr. 6’1″

1987: Larry Hamlin 6’1″

1986: Mark Harmon 6’0″

1985: Mel Gibson 5’10”

Two Major Observations

Well, there you have it folks – the Sexiest Men Alive!, so deemed by People magazine, for the past three decades. What they have to tell us about proxies for American mainstream desire on the part of the country’s women – to put it bluntly, what they find attractive to the point that they are willing to part ways with disposable cash – is quite distinct. In particular, that American women like their men tall, ripped, square-jawed, and of course, White. Keep in mind please, that the average height for adult American men is 5’10”, while American adult men standing at 6′ or above only makes up about roughly 15% of the same adult male population. As you can see here, there are precious few "average" American men listed above, an overwhelming majority of exceptional men on the list, and two lone standouts, both along racial and height lines, respectively. Certainly not representative of the American male population over the past three decades, I would think.

Sure, one could argue that 1996, the year Denzel made his one and to date, only appearance on the cover of People in this regard was a bit before Idris Elba, Lance Gross, Morris Chestnut or Lenny Kravitz's time, and I for one wouldn't dispute that; still, it's interesting indeed to observe the fact that since then, there hasn't been not just another Black man, but a man of color period, to grace the cover of People in this way. And while you could point out the fact that Tom Cruise, most certainly the runt of the litter here, has made the cut, we also have to note that that was a quarter of a century ago, while men who were notably taller than he – Brad Pitt, Johnny Depp, Richard Gere and George Clooney – have made the People cover, twice.

Moreover, staying with Cruise for a moment, because women tend to get antsy being called out on their heightism: let's make something crystal clear. Cruise is as known for his million dollar smile and leading man looks despite his lack of vertical cred, as he is for his thing for Scientology and penchant for being a perennial box office draw. Per his Wikipedia entry, he was Hollywood's highest-paid actor in 2012 (since then outpaced by another short guy, fellow Avenger to Hemsworth's Thor, Robert Downey, Jr. – Iron Man – officially listed at 5'8″), and fifteen of his movies have made in excess of $100M USD each, in the United States alone. "Mission: Impossible 2", for example, made upwards of $600M USD worldwide, back in 2000. Currently, Cruise stars in the fifth installment of the franchise, which is set to open worldwide next month – and it would not surprise me in the least if Cruise has made more money in sheer box office recepts for his movies over the course of his career, than the rest Sexiest Man Alive! list of actors combined. Cruise is the exception that proves the rule as per above: that short(er) guys have a chance with the ladies IF they are, well, exceptional, and way beyond the norm at that. Oh, and loaded. Indeed, I think it's fair to say that Tom Cruise is to Hollywood, what Prince is to the music world.

Let that sink in for a moment.

Let's look at this another way, one that should be by now, painfully obvious in its conspicuous absence: Bruce Lee, to this day more than four decades after his death under mysterious circumstances, remains the first name in martial arts films. Yet, by the data we have above from People's own website, he would have had little if any chance to make the cover of their "Sexiest Man Alive!" issue – he's both Asian, and 5'7″. Nor would Jackie Chan, at 5'9″, or Jet Li, at 5'6″. As Eddie Huang, creator of the sitcom "Fresh Off the Boat" recently noted to Bill Maher, Asian guys have at least as hard a time in the dating market as do Black women because of their not being perceived as "manly" as other of America's men – for which he was roundly excoriated by Black feminists. Studies of all kinds on the matter have consistently found, that women of all races in the western world rate Asian men dead last in terms of desirability and sex appeal; in this regard, People's "Sexiest Man Alive!" covers – some three deacades' worth – corroborates the data.

Yes ladies, let's talk about "diversity" in what beauty and attractiveness standards really is.

The Kevin Hart Test

In her recent article discussing the appearance of Ms. Holliday on People's cover, Ms. Lisa Respers France of CNN, bemoans People's apparent racially tone deaf insensitivity toward BBWs of color, most notably Black. While I have my own reservations as to Ms. France's motivations for making such a big stink over the whole thing in light of the fact that, as she freely admits herself, the Black press in the form of Ebony and Essence are certainly no strangers to bigging up Big Gals on their pages and websites, I can see her point if indeed the name of the game is "diversity" in beauty/attractiveness standards. So, with that idea in mind, if I could chop it up with Ms. France – or better still, if I could be the proverbial Ant-Man in the room and sit-in with her and her lady friends dishing on their heart throbs – I would be very curious if Kevin Hart's name would come tumbling out of her mouth?

You see, while I can't speak for Ms. France, what I can say – and this is backed up by quite a formidable amount of anecdotal evidence on the part of others – that ladies like her who may find themselves unconventionally attractive, still very much prefer guys who are as conventionally attractive as they come – starting first and foremost with height. Hart, who has made a career out of literally clowning himself for his lack of stature, is 5'3″ – and when I've been among Black women I am keen to toss his name out there to see what they have to say in response. Only after a bit of gentle prodding and prompting, do I get a few weak hands going up into the air in support of what he has to offer – nothing like the near-jumping out of their seats (and often wholly unsolicited) exhortations that "Idris can get it!" and "Michael Ealy! Gurrrrlll…" and so forth.

Also, I find it odd that Ms. France this year – and a battalion of Sistas last year during the Lupita Debate – were so keen on upbraiding society on a whole for questioning the beauty bona fides of Ms. N'yongo – while being utterly silent on nearly three decades of virtually all-White leading men on People's covers. Maybe they were satisified with the singular appearance of Denzel; maybe they were slow clapping on the putting green with their White sisters in tingly approval of Pitt, Cooper, Clooney and Tatum. Whatever the excuse, er, reason, for their silence, the fact remains that while Black women seem to be quite up in arms about who goes on People's cover when it comes to them, they don't seem as animated when it comes to guys. Maybe it's because, like their White counterparts, they too have a rather narrow view of what makes a man sexy, regardless of race – like we see in the case of Mr. Hart – and they're quite satisfied with what they see as per the list above?

This is important, because the past few decades have seen initially Black funny men like Eddie Murphy and Jamie Foxx – both standing at 5'9″ – transition from standup comics and wisecracking sidekicks in flicks to serious actors and sex symbols in their own right.

Murphy got the romantic lead in the early 90s classic "Boomerang", while for his part Foxx put his thing down in the more recent Quentin Tarantino vehicle "Django Unchained". Hart has yet to garner such a role, and, if the list as we have it above is anything to go by, that's not likely to happen anytime soon.

Ladies' Choice

As I've been saying over the course of this article, while women exhort men in our time to be more expansive as to what they find hot in women, women themselves seem quite cool with keeping what they find sexy in men quite narrow and rigid. As the aforementioned People list above clearly shows, one is hard-put to find many Reuben Studdards, Jonah Hills, Jet Lis, Kevin Harts or John Goodmans included. Nor is this anything new; Paul Newman was knockin' em dead way back in the day, while guys like Ernest Borgnine played parts like "Marty" and led a group of misfits in "McHale's Navy" – hardly the stuff of heartthrobs and moist panties. One gets the sneaking suspicion of "do as I say, not as I do" and "keeping my attractiveness standards for me, but challenge them for thee" with these gals. It certainly seems that way in both straight porn for men, and as well for romance and erotica – effectively "porn for women", Black or White.

For example, taking up the latter point first: as the book "A Billion Wicked Thoughts" makes clear, romance and erotica novel writers pretty much adhere to the script of what makes a desirable man and it looks like it was ripped from the three-decades long list of Sexiest Men Alive! above: the male protaganists are tall, chiseled, square-jawed and White. I know, I know, that's not the case in Black erotica – fair enough. Toss in Denzel for your template and take it from there.

My point is that you ain't likely to find any soft cuddly teddy bear type guys, no short guys and the like. Even in Feminista Jones' first try at penning steamy (and kinky) fiction, the main two male characters, who were also rivals in the book, were pretty much standard fare as per the People list above – the only difference being that they were both Black and one of them had long locs. Still tall, ripped and leading-man handsome, though – this, despite the fact that in real life, Ms. Jones' guy comes a lot closer to Cruise's height, than "Marcus", the 6'5″ former NFL pro that sounds like he was modeled on Richard Sherman. She could have just as easily wrote about a male lead who came closer to her real guy in real life, but didn't – and for good reason: because (Black) women like to look up – not down – at their leading men, and Jones, who stands at 6′ and is a BBW herself, of all people, is keenly aware of that fact.

"Cash rules everything around me, cream get the money, dollar-dollar bill y'all", indeed.

Going to the first point, what Lupita and Tess have in common is that the world of porn has confirmed that there are scores of men who think that they are the bomb – indeed, perhaps the most interesting thing about the porn world today, is it's laser-guided precision focus on niche markets, which makes it possible for a White, BBW, tatted-out Rockabilly chick like Holliday, or a Black-as-the-ace-of-spades, chiseled, short-haired chick like Lupita to find a not insignificant niche of men who will pay quite handsomely to see them in various states of undress, and, of course, to see them being skewered by venerable swordsmen of the era. Compare and contrast that to the romance and erotica lit market, where aside from surface things like skin color and other minor cultural stuff, the male leads are amazingly and to tell you the truth, as the People's list above attests to (remember, four guys have been featured on the cover, twice), mind-numbingly constant.

Then theres the fact that BBW women (and other women deemed to fall outside of the mainstream of American attractiveness), when they can choose it, don't seem to go for the "off brand" guys – indeed, in BBW porn, one of the first things you notice straightaway, is the fact that ALL of the male actors are porn analogs to the People list above – tall, chiseled and ripped – and if you do find a short(er) guy in the bunch – and they do exist, like Shorty Macc and ManDingo – they are, ahem, "exceptional" down below, if you catch my drift. The porn world equivalents of Tom Cruise and Prince, if you will. Ron Jeremy-looking types are few and far between.

Add to this the fact that both Holliday and N'yongo have been able to parlay their unique looks into real hard currency: both have high modeling contracts and/or endorsements (I think Lupita is also a Cover Girl makeup model/pitch-lady, in addition to a high-post acting career that garnered her an Oscar, and it wouldn't surprise me in the least to learn that Holliday has or will have secured similar deals). Compare that to Jonah Hill, Seth Rogen, Kevin Hart or John Goodman: are ANY of these guys gonna be modeling Hugo Boss, Calvin Klein, exotic cars, topshelf liquors or for that matter, hawking Axe deodorant anytime soon? To ask the question, is to answer it. No, in order to be an effective pitch-man in terms of endorsements and the like, you pretty much have to be a Don Draper/Jon Hamm clone – or damn near it.

It would seem that if anyone here needs to open their minds to the varied ideals and realities of attractiveness, it's women toward men – not the other way around.

A Personal Note

In my research and preparation for today's column, I read up on both Holliday's feature article in People, and as well France's own travails – and they are travails. No matter what one may think of heavier than average ladies in our time, etc., I would like to think that we all can agree that being downright mean to someone for simply existing, especially when they're simply going about their own business, is out of line. For what it's worth to these two ladies, I most certainly can dig it – I too have faced bullies while growing up.

But what was strange for me, was the fact that while guy bullies were easily dealt with enough by a flurry of well-placed punches to the head and face, the mean-spiritedness I faced on the part of the girls back then was a completely difference animal. You see, back then, I was quite short – about 5'5″ or so, and was told by the doctor while my mother sat nearby, that I wasn't likely to grow much more than that. I eventually made it to Tom Cruise and Robert Downey Jr.'s stature, but I was well into adulthood by then – and the ladies of my attentions were keen to inform me of that fact, in quite blunt and to be frank, abusive language. Indeed, I was rudely put down and scorned for something I didn't ask for, had no control over and could do nothing about, during this time of year, prom season. I had asked more than half a dozen female students out, and they all shot me down in the most ruthless of ways, simply for my lack of height. And while I could have gone on the prom if I really wanted to – there were several young ladies who wanted me to ask and take them – they were, to be frank, rather homely. And so, I decided to just sit it out. It was to be the first of many long nights in quiet contemplation that led to the man I am today.

Whenever I recount this story to friends and folks, I'm always told that said gals back then were jerks and to simply "move on" – but as I inform them, I would be happy to do so if I weren't constantly reminded of it. In my adult years, I've been just as ruthlessly scorned by ladies for my lack of height as I was back in high school, which lends credence to the old adage that high school never ends. As I've gotten older, it has gotten better, if by better it's meant that ladies don't put as much focus and importance on male height. The only problem with this is, well, they're older, and all that comes with it – usually kids; usually extra weight; usually psychological baggage and usually in the form of being done dirty by a conventionally tall guy.

In other words, the ladies reconsider guys like me when they have to. It's a tough and admittedly bitter pill to swallow, but swallow it I did, and today, I take it all in stride, usually politely declining offers and the like of attentions from the ladies.

I don't mention all of that to elicit pity or sympathy, only to cement the case that this entire discussion about reconsidering beauty and attractiveness standards will be at best half-assed and at worst utterly disingenuous, if women themselves don't take a long, hard look at their own ideals of male attractiveness. For example, on the questions of height and race – two very distinct and conspicuous factors involved in the People magazine list of sexy men above – women have some deep soul searching to do. And that's not even including "body acceptance" – most guys won't have the time or genes, to bulk up and cut up like Ryan Reynolds or Chris Hemsworth. And just like heavier women may have faced cruelty at the hands of others and notably men, shorter men or men of less desirable races – like Asian men – have faced unbelievably cruel remarks and the like from women – often, the very same women who make a big production out of the need for society to see them as desirable.

Women want men to take the speck out of their eye to see the whole of womanhood in all its permutations as beautiful; fair enough.

They can start by taking the plank out of their own eye that blinds them to all but a very small slice of men.

Genital mutilation rates are dropping. And that's great!

June 3, 2015 | by Lucian Vâlsan | Link | Original Link

There is a silent revolution going on in the world and only in recent years we started to hear about it. Although there's still a long way to go, the reality is that the world is slowly abandoning the genital mutilation of all children.

The genital mutilation rates of girls has always been a rather localized phenomenon and, in the last 20 years, the number of girls subjected to the practice has been consistently dropping in all the nations where it's practiced except for Gambia[1].

While the genital mutilation of females has been properly recognized for what it is, the same hasn't been true for the genital mutilation of boys for a long period of time. But that is slowly and consistently changing across the planet – and this time for the better.

We say this time because there was another moment in history when the genital mutilation rates for children (both boys and girls) was consistently increasing – and that moment wasn't that much time ago – it was in 1965 when the "tradition" of mutilating children started spreading from its contained communities. For girls, it was the expansion of Egyptian-minded framework of thinking while for boys it was the rapid expansion of the American "tradition" which most deeply affected South Korea.

So while for girls an entire library has been written, there's less analysis on how much the mutilation rates for boys have been dropping. As such, we'll focus on male genital mutilation in this article.

First things first

It is not the purpose of this article to debate the merits of any kind of genital mutilation on children. The position that non-consenting children (boys or girls) should be genitally mutilated in any way, shape or form is to be presumed a priori demented in and of itself.

It is also not the purpose of this article to discuss the merits of any kind of consensual genital mutilation that adult individuals might elect to perform on themselves. Individuals should be (and indeed are) free to do whatever they please with their bodies using their own resources. As such, this article will solely be focused on minors – and particularly minor boys.

In addition to proving that the rates of male genital mutilation are constantly and consistently dropping across the planet, it is also the purpose of this article to examine the cultural shifts in viewing the phenomenon.

The main limitation of this article is that the data available for some places is dubious to say the least. A second limitation is given by the fact that some estimations vary even within the same institution depending on the cultural bias of the author(s) doing the estimation.

But, regardless of the source, everyone agrees that the overwhelming majority of both men and women on this planet are not genitally mutilated. The most horrific estimates put the number of women being genitally mutilated at roughly 150 million (which is 4.2% of the global female population) while the most reliable data for men puts the proportion of genitally mutilated at a little under 30%[2].

In other words, 70 to 71 men out of 100 and 95 to 96 women out of 100 are free from genital mutilation. And, as time goes by, the proportion of mutilation-free individuals is bound to increase.

With that being said, we shall examine the data and the attitudes in every area (Asia, the Middle East, Africa, Europe, Latin America, Oceania and North America), as well as provide some cultural background where available.

Asia (outside the Middle East)

Just like with almost all areas examined, Asia is not unitary when it comes to its attitudes on male genital mutilation.

Three categories of nations can be identified:

- Muslim nations (Bangladesh, Pakistan, Indonesia, etc.) who do practice MGM
- Nations that don't practice MGM as a norm (China, eastern part of Russia, India, Japan, Vietnam, Thailand, etc.)
- Outliers that do practice MGM to some extent (Philippines, South Korea and Indonesia)

While one might be tempted to say that when it comes to Islam-dominated areas, the issue of MGM is a done-deal, that's not exactly the case everywhere and every time.

For instance, Vietnam, Cambodia and Laos have a total of roughly 300,000 Muslim people. Yet, even within this group, male genital mutilation (on children or adults) is statistically non-existent.

The reason for this is that circumcision is only symbolically performed on boys when they reach the age of 15. During a ceremony, a religious leader makes the gestures of circumcision using a wooden-knife[3].

Notice that we placed Indonesia both in the Muslim group and the outliers group. That is a deliberate move because Indonesia, although it's a country with an authoritarian government (at least by European standards) and in which over 88% of the population is Muslim, the prevalence of genital mutilation is a total outlier.

For starters, Indonesia is the place where genital mutilation is practiced both on boys and on girls during festivals and other ceremonial events[4]. Also, everyone admits that when genital mutilation of both girls and boys does occur in Indonesia, it is less severe than most of the other parts of the world[5].

Indonesia is also the place with a high number of so-called Quranists who believe that genital mutilation is haram because it contradicts the established dogma in the Qu'ran which states that man was made perfect by God.

In addition to the Quranists, Indonesia is also home to a large non-Muslim minority which actively opposes genital mutilation and which also created a scandal a few years ago when the Jakarta cabinet tried to introduce mandatory male genital mutilation under the fictional nonsense that it reduces HIV. The government was forced to backtrack on their intentions[6]. In reality, Indonesia's HIV problem is related to Indonesia's drug addiction problem, but that's a story for another day.

It should be noted that infant genital mutilation is virtually non-existent in most of Asia – regardless of whether it's done for "religious reasons" or for other reasons. The overwhelming majority of instances occur between the ages of 10 and 15[7].

The most significant outlier though is South Korea.

In South Korea, Islam is virtually non-existent (under 0.2% of the population) and male genital mutilation actually runs counter to the longstanding Korean tradition of revering the natural body[8]. Before 1945, there were statistically zero circumcisions in South Korea. Statistically zero doesn't mean there were none, but it does mean that it was so rare that it was way beneath 0.0001% in which case it is rounded to the nearest full number – in this case, zero (just like 7.0001% is rounded down as simply 7%).

Yet after 1945, the prevalence of circumcision started to increase to such an extent that in 2002 over 90% of high school boys were circumcised (but under 10% of men over the age of 70[9]). It should also be noted that any information regarding circumcision (outside of "it has to be done because potato") only started to emerge in South Korea in 1999[10].

The emergence of male genital mutilation in South Korea has already been established to be a direct consequence of the American military presence in the country following the Korean War[11]. The practice was then based mainly because of a widespread misconception of South Korean doctors about what phimosis is and its natural prevalence[12].

Yet, between 2002 and 2012, male genital mutilation in South Korea has dropped by 10.5%[13] and continues to drop at a rate of roughly 1.5% per year.

What makes South Korea special is that this drop is solely by individuals being persuaded of the harms of genital mutilation – and not by government or medical establishment action. This is mainly because South Korea never adopted the widespread neonatal genital mutilation (as it still is in some areas of the USA). And considering that Korean teens are more connected to the information than any other teens on the planet, the rates of genital mutilation will only keep on dropping.

The Middle East

With the notable exception of Israel, the Middle East is the area where the rates of genital mutilation of men have remained constant (and constantly high). This is not bound to change anytime soon given that the Quranist argument has little penetration in the area. To make things worse, the area is one that lacks medical facilities which make the practice even more dangerous than in places like the US (where at least 100 babies die annually as a result of “medical” genital mutilation).

In Israel however, progress is starting to occur and this can be noticed by the harsher and harsher rhetoric of the Jewish traditionalists on the topic. The traditionalist establishment is fully aware that it is bound to lose the battle once the genie is out of the bottle.

While 20 years ago the notion of intact Jewish men was utterly alien, by 2012, almost 5% of parents chose not to mutilate their sons[14]. As one can imagine, the issue is highly contentious in Israeli society not least because of the fact that it is irreversible and done in infancy (like the US) as opposed to the rest of the Middle East where the practice is usually done as a rite of passage somewhere around puberty.

The trend against male genital mutilation further accelerated when in 2013 it was reported that HIV rate skyrocketed between 2005 and 2013 – thus further quashing the utterly nonsensical claim that male genital mutilation “prevents” HIV.

It will be a long time until genital mutilation fades from Israel but the hardest steps have already been taken – namely the public questioning of it and the forming of a lobby through organizations such as the Israeli Association Against Genital Mutilation.

Africa

Africa is as diverse as it gets when it comes to the topic of genital mutilation.

The most interesting case is that of Republic of South Africa where the Children’s Act of 2005 outright bans the genital mutilation of girls and enshrines the unalienable right of boys to refuse genital mutilation, in addition to more-or-less banning it for boys under the age 16[15]. Enforcement of this law though is a different matter as some cultures within the country more or less mandate the genital mutilation of boys as a “rite of passage” – but that is slowly changing as members of those cultures start to question whether exposing their teenage boys to the risk of death is really such a good idea[16].

In a country where those who object the ritual of genitally mutilating teenage boys are being severely beaten, those who believe in the bodily autonomy of children have quite a monumental task ahead of them. In addition to that, the number of deaths following the practice of male genital mutilation is so high that the issue is now a health crisis in the nation[17].

As the junk science behind the HIV argument starts to get exposed and as the number of bodies pile up – South Africa will be an important front in the global battle against male genital mutilation in particular (just like Egypt and Gambia will be an important front in the battle against female genital mutilation).

Nevertheless, the majority of South African men are not mutilated[18] and the medical establishment is increasingly outright against it as a routine practice[19].

In other words, as the “traditional” practice fades away for reasons of obvious risks and the medical establishment becomes aware of the junk science de jour to justify the genital mutilation of boys and men, the overall rate continues to drop and will continue to drop for the foreseeable future.

Africa is also the only area/continent where the majority of men are mutilated – 4 out of 10 men being intact.

Latin America

In Latin America, genital mutilation of girls is unheard of and genital mutilation of boys is universally low (as in under 5%).

There are two exceptions to this rule – the Rio de Janiero area in Brazil (13.5% of men are mutilated) and Mexico. When it comes to Mexico, an exact number is almost impossible to find but the most horrific estimates place the prevalence at around 30% – while the most common estimates vary between 10 and 15%.

In other words, 7 to 9 out of 10 Mexican men are intact.

Overall, in Latin America, 9 out of 10 men are intact and the 10th might be.

We were unable to find any Latin-American based report discussing circumcision (for or against). What we did find however were US-based websites preaching the "benefits" of male genital mutilation. The good news though is that it doesn't work. There is no noticeable increase in rates of male genital mutilation anywhere in Latin America (not even in economically developed areas where access to the internet isn't an issue).

Europe

Female genital mutilation is banned everywhere in Europe and male genital mutilation is bound to follow sooner than many would even dare to think at this point.

Except for tiny areas in the West Balkans (e.g. Albania and Bosnia-Herzegovina), male genital mutilation in Europe is so rare that there are countries where one might come up empty-handed even if purposefully looking for men who have been subjected to the procedure.

In recent years, the legality of male genital mutilation has been put into question in multiple nations of Europe – namely Germany, the Netherlands, Austria, Switzerland, Norway, Sweden, Finland. In addition to these, the Council of Europe (which includes all nations of Europe except Belarus, Switzerland and the Vatican) adopting a resolution against ritual circumcision of any kind[20].

The resolution concerning the children's right to physical integrity was then followed by steps to further regulate it in several nations as well as a bitter political fight where appeals to emotion, non-sequiturs and other logical fallacies were used by the pro-mutilation lobby.

Unlike North America or Africa, the debate in Europe regarding male genital mutilation is not about medical "benefits" since every single respectable pediatrics and/or medical association in Europe outright opposes infant mutilation – with some (such as the Royal Dutch Medical Association) even openly engaging in anti-circumcision campaigns[21].

So the pro-mutilation lobby is left to use one of Europe's obsessions to at least appear legitimate: minority rights. Since "minority rights" has been used in many places in Europe to supersede the rights of the majority, it does indeed make tactical sense to try to use the same tactic to supersede the rights of children as well.

The political fight over the issue has brought allies that no one would have ever imagined to exist in a cultural dispute. The Jewish and the Muslim lobby joined hands to fight the establishment of children's rights to bodily integrity and the joining even reached state level – with Israel superseding its tense relationship with Turkey in the name of keeping male genital mutilation legal in Europe[22].

Some newspapers went as far as to say that Europe wants to ban Jewish boys[23], spurious accusations of "racism" abounded[24] and the number of Godwins pulled per minute went over 9000. Even officials within the Obama administration intervened in the public debate[25] alleging that a ban on male genital mutilation would trigger a new "Jewish exodus".

The problem with all of these is that they're totally untrue. Most Jewish folks in Denmark for instance don't circumcise their sons. Also, circumcision is de facto banned in present day northern Norway (we'll explain in a bit) and yet that hasn't triggered any exodus. It is totally understandable and praiseworthy to maintain some vigilance to issues concerning anti-Semitism but protecting innocent children from utterly unnecessary harm should and does indeed come first in more and more European countries.

The most interesting case is in Norway where male genital mutilation has become de facto forbidden in the northern part of the nation. As of January 1, 2015, male genital mutilation can only be performed in authorized sanitary units (hospitals) and is paid for by the regional Health Authorities. However, the hospitals in the jurisdiction of the Northern Norway Health Authority are now faced with an insurmountable "problem": exactly zero doctors employed in those hospitals are willing to perform genital mutilation on minors[26]. And since the law can't force the doctors to do it, parents who seek the procedure for their boys would have to travel long distances (i.e. to Trondheim) to get it, and most are unwilling to do it.

Norway had an average of 2000 circumcisions inflicted annually – but that number is already lower this month compared to last year's similar period as more and more doctors simply refuse to perform the procedure.

Some argue that with the increase of the Muslim population (which not only immigrates into Europe but also has more children per family than the non-Muslim population), the rates of male genital mutilation may increase in Europe. Yet, so far, this hasn't happen, also partly because doctors outright refuse to do it.

Sweden, for instance, has slightly more circumcisions (in absolute numbers) per year than Norway, even though it has a higher birthrate, bigger population and higher absolute number of Muslims[27].

Also, just like in the case of Asia, there are quite a few Jewish and Muslim communities across Europe who have gradually moved away from circumcision.

The debate over the legality of male genital mutilation in Europe will undoubtedly continue for years to come but, in the meantime, stricter and stricter regulations over the procedure apply and the public pressure to get rid of it entirely shows no sign of decreasing. In some nations, such as Denmark, 3 out of 4 people support a complete ban on the procedure being done on children[28].

Oceania

Female genital mutilation is banned across the area and male genital mutilation is banned in taxpayer-funded hospitals in Australia[29]. Although 58% of the overall Australian male population has been through genital mutilation, more than two thirds of the men under the age of 30 are intact[30] and the rates for infants continue to drop consistently. In 2003, a little under 13% of infant boys were being circumcised in Australia[31] and in 2010 the Royal Australasian College of Physicians estimated that number had dropped to 10%.

With the rise of awareness in the last 5 years regarding the harmful effects of male genital mutilation, the rate in infants is bound to have dropped even further, much to the dismay of individuals who made a living from it.

In New Zeeland, circumcision rates plummeted during 1970s from roughly 40% in 1972, to 26% in 1977, to 7% in 1991 and to minuscule rates in present day.

North America

Given how much has already been written about male genital mutilation in North America, we'll only limit ourselves to notice a few trends.

In the US, there are 10 states where circumcised men are a minority amongst the male population. In 5 of those states more than 3 out of 4 men are intact – namely Washington, Oregon, California, Nevada and Arizona. In Washington and Nevada, 9 out of 10 men are intact[32]. Of these 10 states, only one of them still funds circumcision through Medicaid[33] indicating a correlation between de-funding the procedure through Medicaid and plummeting rates.

Of the States with a circumcision rate over 80%, only North Dakota doesn't fund the procedure through Medicaid while in all the others, the procedure is covered through Medicaid.

The overall circumcision rate in the US is consistently dropping by 1% per year. It is also interesting to note that historically, the infant circumcision rate among Blacks has been consistently smaller when compared to whites until 1996 when they converged[34].

In Canada, no provincial health insurance plan covers circumcision. A 2007 survey concluded that neonatal circumcision rate in Canada is a bit under 32%[35].

In some areas, the infant mutilation rate was already minuscule over 10 years ago. In 2003, 1.1% of infant boys have been subjected to circumcision in Nova Scotia and in Newfoundland there were exactly zero circumcisions[36]. The rate in Newfoundland has been consistently around statistical zero for almost two decades.

Conclusions

While one can find small geographical areas where an increase in male genital mutilation applied on minors can be observed – the increase in those areas is marginal and far outweighed by the general global trend which is consistent, albeit very slow.

This article is not meant to proclaim victory, but it is meant to bring some perspective over the issue for both sides of the argument. Admittedly, the perspective doesn't look great at all for the pro-mutilation lobby, and it is thus noted that the advocates of male genital mutilation are indeed on the wrong side of history.

Even if the rates of genital mutilation of minors freeze at today's numbers, the overall prevalence of genital mutilation is still bound to decrease as older generations die off.

It is also great to notice that the advocates against genital mutilation have a largely consistent position – opposing the practice only on non-consenting minors and generally refraining from asking for total bans. We say "largely consistent" because there are exceptions. Just 6 months ago, a member of the British government demanded a total ban on any genital surgery of a female – including adult women who freely elect to have them done[37].

Such positions can be found in some other corners of the feminist sector – particularly the corner of Simone de Beauvoir fashion, which tends to believe that women's free choices are bad if they don't conform with the feminist ideals.

Such positions are quite harmful for the victims of genital mutilation (both female and male) as they distract attention from real human rights travesties towards dubious (but nonetheless free and legitimate) choices made by some adults with agency.

The evidence presented in this article should also put an end to the utterly nonsensical claim that opposition to male genital mutilation is "an internet phenomenon". If that were true, there wouldn't be any consistent pattern of decrease in male genital mutilation across the planet – including in places where internet access is complicated or impossible.

Although it was not the purpose of this article, it should be noted that the issue transcends politics (including in Europe where the issue is almost entirely political). There are pro-infant mutilation libertarians, anti-mutilation rightists, pro-mutilation leftists, and everything in between. This means that for the advancement of mankind's majority position, all one has to do is to make sure (s)he delivers the right arguments to the right group of people.

In conclusion – there is room for optimism. Almost all great achievements in the last century came rather silently as the world has gotten better and better, despite the impression that things are getting worse.

Try listening to actual women, Mark Ruffalo, you ignorant jerk

Mark Ruffalo, an actor, has recently taken it upon himself to inform the millions and millions of women who do not identify as feminists that they are "ignorant jerks". Leaving aside his comically deficient grasp of history – feminism ended the slave trade? Really? Really, Mark? The dates 1865 and 1960 don't strike you as just a teensy bit incongruous?

But let's be generous. Let's leave aside the fact that women could vote, hold office and own property long, long before feminism ever reared its ugly head and just concentrate on the*essence* of Ruffalo's pussy-begging assertions. In essense, Ruffalo is expressing his gratitude towards feminists and suggesting that women who do not share his enthusiastic obeisance are remiss. "Ignorant jerks" to use his phrase.

You're grateful to feminists, are you, Mark. All right. Let's by fully grateful then, shall we? According to your IMdB profile you were born in "Kenosha, Wisconsin, to Marie Rose (Hebert), a stylist and hairdresser, and Frank Lawrence Ruffalo, a construction painter."

Born into a nuclear family with a mother and a father? Lucky you. Married couples continue to be happier, healthier, wealthier and rear more successful, productive and better-off children compared to families headed by single mothers with fathers relegated to the status of ATMs. And you know that, don't you? You've been married to the mother of your three children for 15 years. Not stupid, are you? Just a hypocrite.

What happened to nuclear families? They were destroyed. By feminists. I suppose you can't thank a feminist just yet, since your family was not decimated and poisoned against health, wealth and happiness, unlike an increasing number of families today. Look around you? All those shattered kids? They're the products of families not like yours.

Thank a feminist for that.

Better hope your wife continues to find you calling the vast majority of women "ignorant jerks" charming, because if she tires of your left-wing, babbling bullshit, you're going to have a whole lot more to be grateful to feminists for. You'll love what feminists have created for you. Trust me.

Custody of your children? Not fucking likely. 80% of children are awarded to women and there is no jurisdiction in the United States that upholds a presumption of equality between parents. Not one. Shared parenting does not exist as a legal presumption anywhere in the US. Shared parenting initiatives continue to be tabled and defeated. Defeated by whom?

By feminists, Mark.

Thank a feminist that they do not consider you an equally valuable contributor to your children's lives and well-being, they do not believe that your children will benefit from an equal relationship with both their mother and their father, and they do not trust you to care for your children on your own without abusing them or using them as a proxy device to harm, control and injure your wife. Yes, Mark, feminists believe men like you do not truly love your children – you love hurting and controlling women and will use your children to do that, without hesitation or consideration for their welfare.

Thank a feminist, Mark.

You're married to an actress no one has ever heard of. Bet that chaps her ass a bit, doesn't it? She hasn't worked since 2003, but you have. You've done rather well. Hope she doesn't take a shine to the illegal immigrant pool boy and get knocked up with one last progeny before she files those divorce papers! You'll have even more to thank feminists for! Half of all the money you earned is hers. There is no means test to determine what she contributed, which was clearly not zero, but was it half? Trick question! Doesn't matter. Half of your future earnings may be hers, too. Ask Robin Williams.

Oh, wait. He's dead. One of the many men who kill themselves in an ignored epidemic of suicide fueled by grossly unfair family courts.

But she cheated on you? She wrecked your marriage? She broke your vows? Lol! So? Give her half. Oh, and that Latino bambino she's carrying? If you were still legally married when the baby was born, it's yours. DNA? Tee hee? You're so cute. Like that matters.

Thank a feminist, Mark.

You are an American citizen, Mark, so upon your 18th birthday, you were presented with a Selective Service Card and a choice: would you like to vote, apply for state and federal funding programs, and avoid a criminal conviction? Sign the card.

Why you?

Because you're male. That is the only reason. You are a man, you must agree to die. Your son will face the same choice the day he turns 18. Your daughters will not. Remember those suffragettes you were boo-hoo'ing over when you decided most women are "ignorant jerks"? Those women who fought for the right to vote, but not the obligation to die?

Those were the same women walking the streets of London handing out white feathers to men who had the audacity to survive their first deployment to the wretched, blood, piss, vomit and death-soaked trenches of World War I. Those feathers indicated the men were cowards. It was an effort to shame them back into the bloodbath, while the ladies stayed at home demanding rights without responsibilities. Those women marched around in petticoats that would never step over the corpses of friends, would never be pressed against mouths gasping for breath in air swirling with deadly gas, would never be torn to stem the life flowing out of the veins of brothers, friends, and strangers. Those petticoats were kept warm and safe at home while men died, horrifically and in astonishing numbers.

Gratitude? What's that? Those women weren't grateful. They handed out white feathers.

To the cowards. Who lived. They wanted them dead.

Thank a feminist, Mark.

Is your little boy a boisterous, active, physically engaged little guy, like so many boys are (and some girls)? Hope you're not planning on a public education for him. He'll be drugged out of his skull for his failure to emulate his sisters perfectly.

Thank a feminist, Mark.

Is your latest production hiring interns? Are they women? Don't piss them off, Mark. An accusation of impropriety or sexual misconduct can end your career. Due process? Lol! That's funny. Evidence? Proof? Plausibility? Stahp – you're killing me here! Too hilarious!#ListenAndBelieve, Mark. Tip toe through the tulips and well past the little shrews who have their sights set on you. The very basic tenets of justice and the presumption of innocence do not apply to you when the charge is sexual assault, no matter how ludicrous.

Thank a feminist, Mark.

You're a big guy, Mark, but I hope you know that your wife is allowed to punch, slap, hit, kick, bite, scratch or otherwise assault you and if you fucking dare to lift a hand to defend yourself, you will be arrested and charged, thanks to the Violence Against Women Act. I hope she doesn't read Jezebel regularly, because those ladies write columns about how much fun they have abusing their male partners. She might get ideas. Doesn't matter though, because this is on you, not her. Don't hit women, Mark, even women who hit you, because it's #HeForShe, remember? Not #WeForAll. Don't be silly. Violence against women and girls is bad. Violence against men and boys is funny!

Thank a feminist, Mark.

I sure hope you don't end up homeless, Mark. Watch out for teenage girls who enjoy beating homeless men to death. And yeah, most homeless are men. Lots of those men are escaping abusive domestic situations, but there are no spaces to serve their needs, because only women get funding to get away from domestic violence.

Thank a feminist, Mark.

This is the world you live in, Mark, and refusing to see the reality means it's the world your son will inherit. Are you good with that? As long as your daughters are fine, your son can go fuck himself? Are you sure?

Let me tell you a little about men's rights and what we do: we are a community of men and women who talk about gender and equality in a way that includes everyone. We talk about women and girls and men and boys and we consider them all equally valuable, worthy and deserving of help, support, acknowledgement and appreciation. No one is above criticism, no one is beneath notice. Everyone matters. Including men. Including boys.

Why?

Because men and boys are human beings. What other reason do you need?

If you think any conversation about gender that does not blame men and cast women as eternal, perpetual victims is axiomatically misogynist, you can thank a feminist. If you think women making decisions about their lives and how they want to live are “ignorant jerks”, thank a feminist. If you think the only way to understand the world is to cram it through the human-grinder of fascism, thank a feminist. If you think women are helpless, triggered, emotionally crippled quasi-toddlers in need of your white-knighting, thank a feminist. If you think women should be free to cast off all their traditional roles, but men should man up and embrace their traditional obligations without question or hesitation, thank a feminist.

If you’re going to be grateful to a feminist, be grateful to them for everything.

If you want to know why men are angry and why women are lining up beside them, rejecting the feminist label in numbers that increase every time the question is asked, start looking at what feminists do.

Then think about whether they deserve your thanks.

In the meanwhile, the next time it strikes you as a good idea to get up and proclaim the overwhelming of majority of women stupid, don’t.

Don’t be an ignorant jerk, Mark Ruffalo.

Men: We have got to start standing up for women's rights and gender equality

June 4, 2015 | by Kevin Weinberg | Link | Original Link

I write this article in a state of abject shame; truly, I type these words feeling dejected, inept, and riddled with a guilt I've been carrying within myself for far too long. You see, as a man, I have not done my part to uphold gender equality. I have lived my life in such a way as I believed morally correct, never really listening to what feminists had to say. But today, for the millionth time, I was told that feminism is a movement that just means gender equality. And today, for the first time…it finally clicked.

Feminists are right. We do need gender equality. And that is why I say as one man to any other man who may happen to stumble upon this: it's time we stood together and fought for gender equality. It's time we made a feminist difference.

To begin with, we need to stop these sexist, misogynistic, and anti gender equality activists like the Mary Sue, Salon, and the entire Gawker network who seem, for some reason, intent on enforcing paid maternity leave on employers. These woman-hating anti-feminists are actually suggesting that we should have unequal rights: that we allow women to live under a separate set of laws based on nothing but their gender. The nerve! It's wrong to treat people differently because of their gender.

You see, I have heard the feminist message, and I am here to say that we must change. We must stop accepting that men and women are fundamentally different in some aspects here or there, and we must impose feminist gender equality. I therefore propose that we seek to shut down all government-funded, women's-only universities, clamp down on women's history month, and put an end to college grants for single mothers. I propose we repeal the violence against women act, slice away mandated off-time for new mothers, and yes, we rid ourselves of the sexist laws that recruit young men to the army in the event of a draft. We must place our women on the frontlines in combat, whether they have children at home or otherwise.

Sorry, kids, mommy isn't coming home either—she's too busy being equal.

I've finally awakened and realized that gender equality is a good thing: we need gender equality. It's time we stood up, looked our female counterparts in the eyes, and in a chorus of loud, melodious voices, we shouted, "You are exactly the same as me in every single way! There are no differences between us!"

Indeed, several such male feminists have already begun leading the way, such as world-famous feminist and women's rights activist Ray Rice, who after being struck by his woman, channeled the energy of equality into his closed fist, and then with it delivered to her a patriarchy-smashing right hook. It was not just a regular punch. It was a feminist punch. It was the fist of equality and the power of mutual respect.

Previously, I would have thought it wrong to hit a woman. But really, should we discriminate against women on the basis of their gender? Feminists have made it clear to us that such discrimination is wrong, and that they are only interested in gender equality. And as a man who believes in treating women with respect and dignity, I now understand that the best way to show a woman respect is to jump in the air, spin around in a one-eighty-degree arc while simultaneously lifting your right leg, and then delivering a flying spin-kick into the chin of a woman who disrespects you—just like you'd do to any man.

It's time we stopped oppressing women. It's time we started treating them like we'd treat a man, ignoring their gender. If a woman hits you, there is a chance you might not hit her back. But if so, ask yourself: is it because she's a woman? Are you discriminating against her on nothing more than the basis of her gender! Don't. You must be like Guile from Street Fighter.

[image]

Here is a proper example of a man showing how much he respects a woman. Note the feminist way in which Guile demonstrates his views on gender equality and ending sexism.

Together, we can take down the patriarchy. It begins with you and me.

Update*: If you're too stupid to see this is satire, we feel sorry for you.*

Why claiming that all male nerds are privileged could be dangerous

June 5, 2015 | by Yuval Levental | Link | Original Link

"To whatever extent there is misogyny, one could say that there's also "male privilege." Rather it's to suggest that, given what nerdy males have themselves had to endure in life, shaming them over their "male privilege" is a bad way to begin a conversation with them." Scott Aaronson, MIT Professor

"They are perpetuating the story that we blacks tell ourselves: that we're the scrappy dark horse, the downtrodden victim, the rag-tag rebels fighting against an implacable enemy. And that'd be great… if that were true. Except it's not. Frankly, the blacks have won. Black culture is culture, period. Our president is black. The football and basketball players we cheer on, the rappers we lis–"

If you think that I sound crazy, you are probably sane to believe so. The examples I have highlighted here are only indicative of a certain segment of the black population. But most people know that African-Americans suffer from disproportionate poverty as a whole. However, this awareness doesn't extend to many socially deficient men, whom the media and social justice warriors portray as privileged based on stereotypical caricatures.

In the past 20 years, the neurodiversity movement has grown by leaps and bounds. While most people don't use the term "neurodiversity", there is a general myth that autistic children, usually boys, will always make up for their deficiencies and childhood bullying in adulthood through their assumed intellectual talents, by becoming wealthy and renowned. There is even a forum with over 80,000 members, WrongPlanet, which is based on this myth, yet only showcases a small handful of autistics. This took an ironic turn for the worse when multiple articles proclaiming male nerds to be "overly privileged" and "entitled" appeared over the past few years, telling them to give up their privilege. One example was an article praising the "Nice Guys of OKCupid" tumblr, whose author, who once attempted to murder a past girlfriend, said it was an "opportunity to snort derisively at the socially awkward". Another example were the "Gamers are Dead" articles, which started with Leigh Alexander, who said "They don't know how to dress or behave". Of course, many male nerds have a lot of privilege, but there are many other men with nerdy characteristics that have little to no privilege, as nerdy characteristics are very vaguely defined.

Several articles about this topic came in again January 2015 when an MIT Professor, Scott Aaronson, challenged the notion of male privilege in nerd culture. He claimed that in undergrad, he was so afraid of women humiliating him and portraying him as entitled due to his nerdiness that he even felt suicidal. Anyone who is scared about this kind of situation to the point of suicide should see a therapist. However, many commentators still portrayed him as privileged. And as an MIT professor, he is very privileged, but mental health still has a significant stigma in our society. If he is autistic, his executive functioning is sufficient enough to the point where he can hold down a professorship, and he doesn't stand out in public.

Amanda Marcotte, a political commentator, mocked his issues with a very bizarre rebuttal. One point she made was "There are many women out there who are also crippled by social anxieties who would prefer to hide in their hobbies and interests.… Being able to hide in mathematics is, in fact, a privilege, because it is one that has long been and continues in many ways, denied to women." She spreads the myth that people can just "hide" in theoretical mathematics. In fact, it is very hard work and can consume years of one's life, far from being an "escape". Tenure is also very difficult to achieve. Many autistics, a lot of whom would be classified as nerds, have difficulty concentrating and many don't even take up postsecondary education at all.

British journalist Laurie Penny wrote another rebuttal "On Nerd Entitlement" on sexism against nerd women saying "This is why Silicon Valley is fucked up. Because it's built and run by some of the most privileged people in the world who are convinced that they are among the least. People whose received trauma makes them disinclined to listen to pleas from people whose trauma was compounded by structural oppression." Even if what she is saying is true (but she doesn't provide sources), she is practically equating "left out" in childhood with "future success", when there is much evidence to the contrary. Dating columnist Harris O'Malley says (where I stole my intro from) "Aaronson and Alexander are perpetuating the story that we geeks tell ourselves: that we're the scrappy dark horse, the downtrodden victim, the rag-tag rebels fighting against an implacable enemy. And that'd be great… if that were true. Except it's not. Frankly, the nerds have won. Nerd culture is culture, period." Yet the examples of male nerds he gives, like Bill Gates and Mark Zuckerberg, only focus on highly-social productive nerds.

Jonathan Mitchell, a pro-treatment Autistic advocate, has written an essay debunking the idea that Einstein, Gates, and Jefferson were autistic and socially deficient He notes that while Einstein was a late talker, he became highly social in adulthood, dating many women, and was very productive. Bill Gates was excellent in marketing Microsoft to the masses, knowing how to communicate with salesmen with no special assistance. Mitchell himself is terminally unemployed due to lack of marketable skills.

Telling every male nerd, including those on the spectrum, that they are privileged and will be successful will create unrealistic expectations for many as there is no singular definition of a nerd. Many also might, as of late, be accused of entitlement when they can't live up to those expectations or feel socially rejected. These accusations come from the assumption that they must be lazy (instead of having poor executive functioning) or assuming that they are supposed to be popular in today's world because of their nerdiness (based on media stereotypes), so they must be doing something unethical. While there are no guarantees in life, it is a stretch to tell someone that he/she is more than capable, then turn the situation around.

Mark Potok of the SPLC viciously smears non-feminist people

---

Mark Potok, Senior Fellow at the Southern Poverty Law Center, was recently interviewed on the David Pakman show. This was uploaded to YouTube, and I encourage you to watch it, here:

Potok's agenda, during the interview, was to counterblast against threats to the feminist narrative and the feminist worldview. Almost everything Potok said was a regurgitation of old tropes about "angry men", "woman-hating" and all the rest of it. Apart from that, Potok's discourse was riddled with all manner of weasel language, misrepresentation, and false shading.

For starters, Mark Potok refuses to declare his political stance. In a discussion of this nature, you might reasonably think it is common courtesy to identify yourself as either feminist or non-feminist — so that we all know where we stand, right? It is just plain arrogant to pass over this point in silence, especially in politically-charged times like these, yet that is precisely what Potok does in the interview. Nowhere does he lay his cards on the table, and he clearly doesn't give a fig for either protocol or common courtesy.

Nowhere does Potok say "for the record, I consider myself a feminist." That statement is conspicuously lacking, for he inserts it neither at the beginning of the talk (as is proper), nor anywhere else in the talk. He is presumptuously mute upon this point, and the silence is telling. In his mind, feminism simply "is the world", and nobody needs to say any more about it.

Well, since Mark Potok will not declare himself, I reckon it falls upon me to do this in his stead. So I say it now:

Mark Potok is a feminist.

Okay, we cleared that up. If I am wrong, I hope Mr. Potok will get back to me so I can issue a correction and an apology.

Potok knows his audience; he knows how to jerk their strings and make them dance. Certainly, he knows what will keep the donational shekels ringing in the SPLC coffers, and the hysterical, demagogic drumbeat of "hatred toward women" was a recurrent theme throughout the interview. As "the Duke" said in Huckleberry Finn, "if that don't fetch 'em, I don't know Arkansas!"

Furthermore, Potok clearly meant to conflate "misogyny" with opposition to feminism — a standard feminist trick. This is where things get interesting. As we all know, anti-feminism is going mainstream in a big way. It threatens to bust out all across the cultural landscape and become ambient, in a manner that can no longer be ignored. I have referred to this elsewhere as the non-feminist breakout, and I have unpacked the feminist strategy in regard to that breakout.

The strategy is simple: containment.

To hear this SPLC feminist talk, you'd think that 75% of the world consists of angry male woman-haters, rape apologists, and other nasty critters of that ilk. Well that is a poisonous imputation to make about three-quarters of the human race. Does Mark Potok seriously believe that everybody who speaks a sharp word about feminism, or quietly disaffiliates from it, is a borderline criminal who must be "watched"? I mean, is Potok just pulling our leg? Is he just "trolling"?

And what's with that meaningless, outdated word "manosphere", anyhow? Talk about containing the non-feminist breakout! I, the present writer, certainly do not operate under any such construct. In reality, there is no such thing as "the manosphere", so I am bound to wonder if Mark is deceiving his listeners on purpose by planting a bogeyman image in their brains? Or is he just too intellectually lazy and arrogant to do his homework? You would think that as a journalist of sorts he would have higher standards than that, but what do I know?

At any rate, Potok, with a posse of SPLC lawyers at his disposal, undoubtedly knows that he doesn't risk any legal action for defamation of character. After all, he hasn't targeted any clearly defined individual. He has followed the safe-but-cowardly weasel path of making unsupported allegations against unnamed people. He knows full well that whoever "fits the profile" will be indirectly tarred, slandered and compromised. He also believes that nobody will ever call him to account for such behavior. However, he is wrong. I'm calling him to account right now. I'm calling him a scumbag for his behavior, but mind you that's only my opinion. Others are free to make up their own minds.

And if the feminist Mark Potok wants to look me, Fidelbogen, in my non-feminist eye and call me a rape apologist or woman-hater, he is welcome to do so. But I frankly doubt that he's got the yarbles for it.

I'll say it again: Mark Potok of the Southern Poverty Law Center is a feminist and he is manning the bucket brigade for the feminist narrative (which is now coming under fire). He is using the classic tricknology that feminists have always used: lying, conflating, spinning, smearing, narrative-building, and character assassination. His rhetorical sop that "men do have serious issues" isn't fooling anybody. Nor does his avuncular "old hippie" personna fool anybody. We non-feminist men and women aren't as stupid as he apparently believes, and we can see through his act like we can see through a sparkling pane of glass into a dirty house.

Mark, the funny law of the world is this: that when people finally dish back at you what you have dished out to them in the first place, you will have no moral ground from which to whine about it. After all, the aggressor sets the terms of engagement. Realistically then, all you can do is quietly suck it up, or else come clean and "face the music."

So please come clean, admit to the world that you are a feminist, and stop spreading false narratives in order to foment moral hysteria and raise money for the SPLC.

Non-feminist men and women will not exactly "thank" you for this, but I'm pretty sure they will get off your case.

Battle and Brew doesn't want to talk…

June 6, 2015 | by David King | Link | Original Link

… about the sorry little saga between themselves and Sage Gerard of Zen Men, LLC. And one wonders why not.

The objective of this piece is to record the facts and events as we understand them, to offer a speculative explanation of why not and to underscore, yet again, the threat that SJW nuttery poses to independent groups who, in the main, just want to be left alone to do what it is they do.

One delightful character, who goes by the name "Chef LuBu", has been lurking in the background but may prove key to that explanation.

Also, I'd like to address a few points made by the owner of B&B who, for whatever reason, decided not to identify himself. Though I believe I know the identity of at least one of the owners, I'm not going to publicly mention it because there's no reason to do so and is not why I looked into B&B's ownership. I note this only because the man evidently has so much faith in his own words, he is not inclined to put his name to them.

Doubtless he would say it is to avoid harassment but there is not, so far as I am aware, a shred of evidence that B&B have been harassed, even by SJWs. (Hrmm… Where have we seen that tactic used before?)

The last email Nate sent began with the following:

> I've spoken to our ownership and they've asked me to forward you this email. This will be our final contact with you and your associates. After all we have a business to run and we've spent far more time on this matter than I feel we should have.

which I interpret as a 'no contact' request with which I intend to comply, and I'd urge that nobody else contact anybody associated with B&B either. That pretty much leaves open, as an avenue for a right of response, only an AVfM article.

Incidentally, the reason I looked up B&B's ownership was to verify Nate's claim that there is an ownership from whom what followed in his email could have come. There is, and that's enough for me.

Summary of events

Here is a summary of events as I understand them.

1. Sage wanted an IRL meet-up of gamers who also happen to have a care about ethics and what SJWs are doing to their hobby, essentially, an Atlanta, GA version of GGinDC, to unwind and to escape the politics and fighting, if only just for an evening. Like GGinDC, there was never any intention of causing trouble or doing anything other than minding their own business.

2. Sage made inquiries with the General Manager of Battle and Brew, Nate Sanders, about the prospect of holding his event there, since B&B is a gamer-themed bar and it would be a natural venue for this interest group. Sage, at the time, had a very high opinion of B&B and wanted to give them his business. Sage also made it clear that there could be political fall-out and mentioned the GGinDC fiasco which, at the time, seemed to bother Nate not in the slightest. Per Sage's account, Nate assured Sage that B&B knew how to handle social media and would not permit any harassment of anybody within their walls.
   Because a private reservation of space would reduce the space available to regular patrons, B&B necessarily had to have some minimum guarantee of numbers and also of expected revenue, so Nate asked Sage to get some numbers before any contract was executed. That is standard practice and an entirely reasonable request.
3. Sage therefore (publicly) advertised on Zen Men's website (and also Reddit) both the potential for the event and a request to RSVP to get numbers to take back to Nate. I would have thought that was perfectly fair enough as well, though B&B's owner claims that he should never have done so.
4. Then all hell broke loose. Per Sage's article, Nate apparently emailed requesting a verbal meeting "ASAP" during which, per Sage's recording, he proceeded to accuse Sage of misquoting "dramatically" and assert that [emphasis mine] "you're making the bar look really bad" (because Nate interpreted Sage's posts to imply that the B&B took some political stance in support of Sage and his group).

   He repeatedly asserted that Sage claimed (or merely implied) support of Zen Men by B&B. This is completely untrue, but also highly significant because it was the only real basis on which to veto any contract with Zen Men, i.e. that any such association violated Nate's neutrality. Absent that excuse, B&B would have no reason whatever not to proceed with hosting Sage's event precisely because of the neutrality of which Nate is so protective.

   Nate said that this was initially brought to his attention when his Community Manager sent Nate a link to a Reddit thread publicising the event. In that last phone call, he made a big deal about B&B's political neutrality and taking zero political stance on anything. "I'm not okay with … being made to look like I support a political stance with 'my' business".

   He demanded that Sage take down all posts relating to B&B and informed Sage that the event would not be happening at B&B. Though Sage had no real incentive to do so, he complied out of good will and even posted a definitive statement (as well as on Reddit) that B&B were not in any way affiliated or supportive of Zen Men and, furthemore, the event would not be taking place at B&B.

   Sage also explicitly requested that nobody badger or bully B&B for their decision and expressed sympathy for B&B for "feeling close to heat".
5. Quite reasonably, Sage felt that he had been misrepresented and his reputation impugned by B&B, and posted his account of why his event won't happen at B&B as previously advertised.

6. Soon after, Nate sent Sage an angry email accusing him of illegal activity (i.e. recording those phone calls without his consent), repeated his claim that he and his business were being attacked (though provided no evidence of it) and promised to pursue what legal action he could.
7. Three hours later, Nate followed up with another email to say that he was backing down, presumably because he was told that Sage had broken no law. He claimed that Sage and his associates have "ruined my name all over the internet", that he believed he was seen as a "hate monger, a woman hater, a racist" amongst other things, and alleged that an "army of internet trolls would do everything [they] could to ruin me if I didn't set up the event". He then contradicted his earlier statement that Sage et al. were banned, and plead for the attack be called off.

   The nasty names Nate has allegedly been called should tell him a great deal about the nature of those who would do so. If he knows it's not true of him, why on earth would he assume it's true of Sage or his group?
8. Enter Chef LuBu, whose Twitter bio describes him as the "Community Manager @battleandbrew", presumably the same "community manager" Nate mentioned in the phone call.

   Nate's request for a non-existent attack to be called off rings rather hollow when two hours before he sent that email, LuBu sent this tweet (at 6:06pm EDT) and some time between then and 11pm EDT, Nate retweeted it:

   (although Nate has since unretweeted it.)
9. The next day, I invited Nate to write a submission for publication on AVfM to present his own perspective (although I did not promise that it would be published) on the basis that such an article would have roughly equivalent page ranking as Sage's piece, and it seemed only fair to give him the opportunity to give his side of the story and defend himself and his business.

   I attached strings to that offer, however, saying that he'd need to be completely honest, open and forthcoming about his reasons for vetoing Sage's event, and that he'd need to own the mistakes he made. I also said:

   > I think you would need to be quite explicit about the source and the nature of the heat that you received via social media. Names would be nice, of course, but we'd probably settle for just what was said, rather than who said it. Similarly, a public apology would be nice, but we'd probably settle for just the facts, from your perspective, of what led up to your decision not to proceed with a contract with Sage and his group.

   I also said

> Just to be clear: I'm not suggesting a public flogging or self flagellation here, I'm suggesting that you are (presumably) a rational person and made what you thought was a rational decision. The objective of any piece you submit would be in defence of your position and your business by demonstrating that you believed you acted in good faith by showing the detail of the fact that led you to act the way you did. From our point of view, we'd like to establish the manner in which these SJW goons continue intimidate business owners and operators like yourself. They've done it to plenty of other companies and individuals, and we'd like to see their hateful activities held to account.

and I reassured him that our moderators would not permit anybody to attack him or his business in the comments thread of such a submission. I went on to say:

> Look. There is no army of "internet trolls" out to get you. Nobody is interested in or has any reason to ruin you, except to the extent that you give them one. The whole point about GamerGate was originally ethics in journalism and, latterly, censorship and bullying by the real thugs who wish to do your core constituency and clientele harm — viz. gamers. Even women geeks and gamers aren't excepted from this sort of harassment.
> You're a gamer bar. However much you wanted to maintain a position of neutrality, you could not possibly be ignorant of the existence of such a phenomenon, even if you weren't familiar with its detail. Sooner or later, it was inevitable that it would affect you, which is precisely why you should care about GG. As it turned out, that particular horse bolted as soon as you caved to whatever pressure that caused you to veto Sage's event.
> You've said that you don't have time to familiarise yourself with the politics involved — yet you have already taken a political stance in respect of GG, Sage and his organisation, albeit (by your own admission) an uninformed one.
> You now have but two choices: get informed and take a principled stand one way or the other (note that we are not telling you what your position should be), or let your uninformed actions be your legacy.

10. About three and a half hours later, B&B's owner sent to Sage (via Nate, who made it clear that he wanted no further contact from or with us) a reply in an apparent attempt to draw a line under the whole affair. The next section of this post will deal with that reply.

Final contact from B&B and its owner

According to the owner of B&B (or his representative), the whole matter has been a misunderstanding of B&B's policies and mission which is to "provide an establishment that would be accepting and respectful to all members of the gaming community" and to "provide a safe and welcoming environment for all gamers and to demonstrate to the community around them that everyone can be accepted for who they are and what they believe."

Apparently, "all" does not include Sage, and certainly not anybody associated with #GamerGate. Indeed, > you are only a subset of the entire group and, frankly, in my opinion, you did not take into consideration the rest of that group when you considered the implications of your actions when you posted your intent to meet at Battle & Brew on Reddit.

> We also expect and insist that our customers, all of them, show the same acceptance and respect for one another regardless of their personal differences.

Okay, fair enough, but it seems that Sage is unacceptable to you precisely because of his personal differences (or, potentially, those between him and certain B&B staff). There is absolutely no reason to suppose that, had Sage's event gone ahead at B&B, that any disrespect would have been shown by Sage and his group to anybody else. They wanted to meet at B&B precisely because B&B would not tolerate such behaviour.

Any supposition to the contrary is prejudice on the part of B&B staff. So much for "inclusive".

This anonymous representative then went on say that Sage should have made the booking and solicited interest for the event "privately", even though an indication of numbers was required in order to secure that booking. Given the reasonable commercial constraints involved, how, precisely, does this guy expect Sage to find the requisite numbers without going public about it?

Worse, this anonymous representative accuses Sage of jeopardising the safety not only of his own group but that of B&B's employees and other patrons — even of himself and his family! That's a strong accusation to make considering no evidence of threats has ever been offered by B&B. And there was a great deal more of the usual threat narrative stuff besides.

It is all the more ironic, therefore, that the only possible threat comes from the feminists and SJWs that make up the anti-GamerGate crowd who, as I shall show in the next section, appear to be the very same people B&B are protecting.

In fairness, this individual did find his GM's actions "unacceptable", but excused them in terms of his youth, inexperience, and the GM's perception of Sage's public announcement as a direct attack on his character. He half-heartedly offered Sage allowance for his youth, but none for the attack on his character (or that on the reputation of his organisation, Zen Men, LLC). Apparently, some reputations are more worthy of protection than others.

This individual inevitably raised the question of recording calls though without any sense of irony given that B&B just demonstrated precisely why such practices are necessary. He accused Sage of being "disingenuous" and "lying" to Nate, presumably referring to Sage saying that his phone was dead. For all I know, it wasn't, but I don't think he has any evidence of that.

Then, this person returned to the matter of the public announcement. I suggest to B&B that, if public announcements are such a problem, that you include a prohibition of them in your Terms of Service and that you make it clear that they are not permitted on initial contact with prospective clients.

And he doubled down on Nate's assertion that Sage's public solicitations gave the impression that B&B sided with Sage.

No, indeed, Sir, "something doesn't add up", but I imagine that you did not have the following in mind when you said that.

The politics of the "apolitical"

It is evident that Chef LuBu, who describes himself as a feminist — the same man who evidently thinks that doing business with MRAs is akin to doing business with the KKK — is not fond of MRAs. In fact, he says that we shouldn't exist. He's evidently not very fond of #GamerGate, either.

If this is the same community manager (and how many could they have?) Nate said brought to his attention the Reddit post Sage later took down and with whom he said he was going to have spend all day doing PR and damage control, then it is reasonable to surmise that this whole sorry affair was political from the start because said community manager hated what Zen Men represented and was well motivated to sabotage Sage's event.

It is also quite feasible that the reason B&B have not offered a shred of evidence that there has been any harassment of any sort is that there is none, and this LuBu chap made the whole story up precisely to get Sage's event cancelled because he, personally, opposes Sage's politics. That's pure speculation, of course, and the truth will most likely never be known.

At no time did Battle and Brew disclose this conflict of interest or the personal politics of the one staff member apparently instrumental in getting the event vetoed. That makes you culpable, B&B. In my opinion, you misrepresented both your neutrality and your social media competence to Sage and the public at large, you have not been honest about your reasons for not wanting to do business with Sage and you still won't own your part in any of this.

Last words

Why should AVfM, a Men's Rights organisation, care about the policies and politics of one small bar in Georgia (who surely have the right to their own views and, to some extent, decide with whom they do business)?

It’s because — and this is the primary take-away from the whole episode — the driver of this sordid business is the same hatefulness that drives the anti-GamerGate lot, which is the same hatefulness with which much of our own activism is concerned. And, if my surmise about LuBu’s involvement is correct, then it is clear that Battle and Brew are already infected with the politics of hate, in which case B&B’s claims of inclusivity and protestations of apolitical neutrality are as disingenuous as B&B’s final communication to Sage.

It is clear, however, that Battle and Brew are anything but apolitical, and that the safe environment B&B hopes to provide is not such the two-way street as B&B, its GM or its owners claim it is.

What to do about real predators on campus, without hysteria

June 6, 2015 | by Irene Ogrizek | Link | Original Link

In case you haven't heard, Laura Kipnis' article on campus sex, "Sexual Paranoia Strikes Academe," is candid. She offers both a personal and professor's-eye-view of campus sexuality, starting with her experiences in the hippyish 70s and ending with the puitanical present. She's right, of course, when she says power relations among professors, students and institutions have shifted: women are now delicate flowers, men are presumed rapists, and institutions, God bless their best intentions, are busy protecting us all from our weak-willed selves.

Kipnis is addressing the burgeoning (and disconcerting) phenomenon of expanding female vulnerability, that industry where social slights are churned into tragedies and sexual misunderstandings into rape. One symptom? Words that used to denote genuine horrors have become caught in the machinery and distended beyond recognition: As Kipnis notes, the word survivor now "encompasses both someone allegedly groped by a professor and my great-aunt, who lived through the Nazi death camps."

Cathy Young is another writer who is equally candid. In a Washington Post article about sexual misconduct, she admits "there was the ex-boyfriend I thought I was seducing in the hope of getting him back — only to realize, the one time he finally said no harshly enough, that it had been more pressure than seduction." My response to her disclosure was physiological and for a reason. I'd been in the same position once upon a time, as my body would have made clear had I been attached to a lie detector while reading those words.

When it comes to Kipnis and Young's personal admissions, feminists should take note: admitting we've equally sinned as been sinned against is a great first step toward getting the pendulum back into the clock, never mind staying its current and injudicious course.

Here in Canada we've had our own sexual conflagration: radio host Jian Ghomeshi's life was razed to the ground by revelations he'd been violent with women during sex. His claims that it was consensual and took place in a BDSM context sent the media, both social and mainstream, into snickering overdrive, with BDSM aficionados weighing in hourly, telling Canadians how to get BDSM just right. As a nation, we aren't known for being lurid, torrid or even very sexy, but as Ghomeshigate unfolded, we sure tried. Along with minute details his intimate life came a parade of victims reaching back to his university years (Ghomeshi is in his 40s). For many, the sheer number of accusers, many of whom had suspiciously padded stories, proved his guilt. So much for the democratizing power of social media.

Cathy Young, a columnist for Real Clear Politics
I've been on both sides of this debate: I've heard accusations I knew were insupportable and those I knew were true even without proof. And with that being said, I'd like to tackle a less palatable dilemma: What do we do with the real McCoys? How do we manage the genuine creeps, both male and female?

At one academic job I held, I dated a man for a few weeks. He was an arts colleague, albeit in a different field, and if I had to characterize our romance, I would say it never really sizzled. So as we simmered on low, he volunteered to cover two of my classes while I tended to some personal business out of town. After I returned, he mentioned two students in the class, a twosome of best friends. They'd come from an ethnic high school (college enrolment in Quebec starts as early as 16) and were comely in a way that had nothing to do with their looks: they asked good questions, made clever observations and were notably ungiggly.

He suggested that one of the students enrol in a special program he and a colleague had started, a specialized program within a program. He brought it up often enough that I made the suggestion to her more than once. The second (or third) time I did, something strange happened.

The best analogy I can make is this: imagine your computer screen being yanked diagonally for a second before snapping back to normal. Now apply that to reality. I was telling this young woman about the program when it happened–I experienced a reframing reality blip. After it passed, I saw a dubious look on her face, one bordering on suspicion. I immediately knew my insistence was not the problem; instead, something about my colleague's suggestion was making her uncomfortable. So I back-pedalled, telling her she was fine where she was and that of course she was free to choose.

I broke up with this man shortly afterwards and was glad I did. At the end of the semester that young woman came to me for help. My colleague had invited her to his home. She didn't want to go, but didn't know how to get out of it. I asked if it was an unofficial social event–a party in other words–and she said no. (I did double-check afterward.) He was 42 and she was 17 and he'd given her a map to his house.

Although we both knew the significance of events, I responded by treating her dilemma lightly: I suggested she write him a note, which I would slip under his door, telling him her mother did not approve. When I realized I was counselling her to lie, I caught myself and suggested she actually tell her mother. However, I think we both knew she wouldn't. What we were doing, we were doing in secret: I was an older woman helping a younger one dodge an unwelcome advance.

(Please scroll down to see my postscript, where I provide more details about why I chose to believe this student.)

Emma Sulkowicz

I'm still not sure why I chose this route over reporting my colleague, but that young woman's sensible attitude and calm demeanour were key. My instincts told me to keep the emotional temperature as cool as she had set it and to avoid instigating a drama. (I did have a quiet word with an administrator afterward.) I also realized, later, that my relationship with my colleague left me open to an accusation of sour grapes, and that her complaint might not be taken seriously because of it. By this time I'd come to see that the man was jaded beyond reach and had all the toxic defences to go with it.

So it wasn't until 12 years later, and while I was at a different institution, that I heard about him again. He'd been called on the carpet for an inappropriate relationship and the student in question was claiming abuse. He'd hired lawyers and the young woman's claims were successfully refuted. By the time I heard about it, he was on the brink of being reinstated. The only hold-up was a religious holiday.

This surface drama may seem like the real story, but it isn't. The real story is my journey from that moment in my office when that young student approached me, map in hand, to the moment I stood on my former colleague's front steps, knowing what the likely outcome of my intervention would be. So why did I help a group of angry women eject this man from an institution he obviously cared about? Why did I do this to him and not to other colleagues whom I knew had made similar errors in judgement?

There were approximately 36 hours between my hearing about this man's latest contretemps and my knocking on the door of my neighbour. I used that time to do some serious motive-checking. I wanted to make sure that my own hurt feelings, as ancient as they were, were not informing my decision.

So what happened? In the intervening years, I'd exposed myself to a variety of theories about a variety of things. If that sounds hopelessly broad, it's because it is: I'm a magpie when it comes to theories and the one I pulled out of a hat for this bout of introspection came from the world of business. It's called Organizational Intelligence and is a form of knowledge management first popularized by business leaders like Peter Senge, he of the seminal book, The Fifth Discipline. Here's a definition pulled, yes, from Wikipedia:

Organization Intelligence is the capability of an organization to comprehend and conclude knowledge relevant to its business purpose. In other words, it is the intellectual capacity of entire organizations…including learning mechanisms, comprehension models and business value network models, such as the balanced scorecard concept.

My take on Organizational Intelligence is simpler and is based on a workshop I actually did with Senge. During discussions we drew analogies between the human body and the organization as organism. This is simplified, but works if we view good mental health as equivalent to good organizational health. So with that in mind, why did I turn this particular man in? It's because he had a history of pushing boundaries when it came to having relationships with his students, and his assertion of personal rights had turned into the equivalent of a disease: it was chronic and disruptive. While some might admire his actions, in, say, the way we might admire the rabble-rousing of an Irving Layton or Normal Mailer, I asked myself: did his disruptions actually contribute to the wellbeing of the college and the world, or were they just the tantrums of an angry man-child?

[image]
Peter Senge
Obviously I chose the latter view and then realized the theory worked more broadly. To wit: a student once asked me for a letter of reference. She was applying to a coveted program at a local university. I had no problem writing the letter; this student had performed well in my course. The problem? Along with the letter, I was required to fill out a form that asked me to assess the student on things like creativity, sociability and adaptability. Overall, I got the feeling the questions were really about common sense, as in does this student possess it or not?

That's when things got tough. This student, like my colleague, had a penchant for pushing boundaries and they too involved sexual matters. She was in the habit of wearing extremely low-cut T-shirts and sweaters, and to make matters worse, she was very well endowed, a set of facts that added up to a form of mildly disruptive behaviour. Sitting next to girls who were more modestly dressed didn't help (or boys trying to control their glances). That's because along with making her look sexy, her wardrobe also telegraphed poor judgement: by even the most liberal standards, it was obvious her clothes were less suited for a classroom and more suited for a night out in the clubs. So I agonized. I felt a duty to be honest, but that meant marking her down, a step I knew would likely lose her a spot.

And this brings me to the subjects of sex, campuses and disruption.

When it comes to the recent rape scandals–like those at UVA and Columbia–one fact both sides agree on is this: universities lack the capacity to manage sexual complaints equitably. Emma Sulkowicz, the accuser in the Columbia University case, garnered global attention by carrying her mattress to classes. She did so as a visual protest against the university's unwillingness to expel her alleged attacker. Sulkowicz has admitted she used this protest as a project for her senior thesis, a fact that raises questions about her sincerity. However, what makes matters worse, or perhaps less comprehensible, is that the accused, Jean-Paul Nungesser, a German exchange student, was not allowed to present exculpatory evidence at a hearing conducted by the university's Office of Gender-Based and Sexual Misconduct. As Cathy Young observed in the Daily Beast, Nungesser has his own gripes about the hearing. Among other things, he says he was never allowed to present the Facebook exchanges, which he regards as strongly exculpatory, to the panel: The hearing, he claims, had to focus exclusively on the facts of the alleged attack in an attempt to decide whose version of this event was more credible.

Young has also said "such cases need to be handled by real cops and courts, not campus 'gender equity' bureaucrats and pseudo-judicial panels," a sentiment with which many of us agree.

But it doesn't seem as though these panels are going anywhere soon, and the problem is that they often come down on the side of accusers, so much so that counter-suits, like the one Nungesser has filed against Columbia (for gender-based harassment), may be the only way of challenging their power.

This is where Senge's organization as organism paradigm, perhaps pitched as a "community welfare," might serve everyone better. The fact is that what my oversexed colleague and reference-letter student did amounted to disruptive behaviour. However, what Sulkowicz did was disruptive too. (Imagine a factory foreman, angry about shift work, lugging a mattress around in protest.) So taking the broader context into consideration means broader questions can be asked, questions like "How is everyone affected by this person's actions?" That's a question that may elicit support for women like Sulkowicz, but may also elicit responses like, "That mattress took up too much space in the classroom," or "I'd like to hear his side of the story," or "As a male student here, I felt intimidated."

This approach might also allow for a fuller explanation of both sides of a conflict, might allow someone like Nungesser to put evidence of his innocence forth in a more timely manner. After all, if the goal is to maintain the wellbeing of the entire community–where everyone is truly equal–hearing both sides fully is only fair.

Laura Kipnis started her essay with anecdotes about campus dating in the "wild old days" of the 70s, when students and professors "partied together, drank and got high together, slept together." She's right to mourn that free-spirited time before the advent of AIDS. I understand because those were my heydays too.

But times have changed and we need a way of discerning sexual predation from the fumbling of fallible human beings. One way would be to say to ourselves, when faced with a man like my colleague, "Over the years, this man has appeared in front of many judicial panels, using our institution's resources to do so. Does the ongoing assertion of his individual rights, in matters concerning intimacy, contribute to the wellbeing of our community?" I suspect this will leave the real lovers alone and allow professors or students, of either gender, to make a misstep or two without endangering their careers. The question is, can we calm everyone down first?

Postscript: I've been asked why I chose to believe the student. Her age, background and character spoke to her inexperience and I didn't see an obvious agenda, apart from the fact that she seemed confused about what to do. Her lack of animosity toward my colleague and desire for discretion were also telling. As for myself, I had come to see aspects of this colleague's behaviour that raised concerns: his interest in female students surpassed that of all the professors I knew. When I quietly shared my concerns with another (trusted) male colleague–he was the administrator I spoke to–his reaction confirmed he was of the same opinion. In the years following, I saw even more evidence of this second colleague's concern. That latter evidence informed my decision to act years later.

Emma Sulkowicz is raping the world

June 6, 2015 | by August Løvenskiolds | Link | Original Link

When you are forced, unwittingly and unwillingly, into participating in some sort of crime or other malfeasance, it's fair to say you have been abused. However, in the more bizarre world of postmodern art, when you see the depiction of a rape, you become both the rapist and the victim; their experience echoes through you in both erotic and painful ways. Indeed, you have been raped and you are the rapist in a sense that is more than metaphorical: you have been callously and carelessly exploited, and you are also the exploiter.

Look, it is art; if art makes perfect sense, the current school would think it is poor art. Shitty art about anal sex/rape, however, is the toast of the art world.

Consider Emma Sulkowicz, the recently graduated Columbia student known as "mattress girl" for lugging around her mattress in a (mock and mocking) performance-piece-cum-protest of her (fake) rape. Emma is now doing something even more vile to everyone in the world: she has released a sex tape that she teasingly suggests is a depiction — or maybe not, who knows? — of her allegation that she was raped by a student named "Paul":

> The following text contains allusions to rape. Everything that takes place in the following video is consensual but may resemble rape. It is not a reenactment but may seem like one….Ceci N'est Pas Un Viol is not about one night in August, 2012. It's about your decisions, starting now. It's only a reenactment if you disregard my words. It's about you, not him. — from her website linked below.

The title of the film, Ceci N'est Pas Un Viol (video at link is NSFW) translates as "This is not rape." The video at the website is non-functional as of this writing but can be found at the free porn site "Pornhub" under the following title:

> asian student releases interracial "art" video with fat guy

The video is just over eight minutes long but the sex, such as it is, ends after about four and one-half minutes. More on the contents of the video later but to understand Emma's thinking you need to understand some things about the current world of art. As Emma wrote:

> Do not watch this video if your motives would upset me, my desires are unclear to you, or my nuances are indecipherable.

How in the hell are we supposed to know any of that without watching the video? Emma continues:

> You might be wondering why I've made myself this vulnerable. Look—I want to change the world, and that begins with you, seeing yourself. If you watch this video without my consent, then I hope you reflect on your reasons for > objectifying me and participating in my rape, for, in that case, you were the one who couldn't resist the urge to make Ceci N'est Pas Un Viol about what you wanted to make it about: rape.

> Please, don't participate in my rape. Watch kindly. [sic]

Of course, Emma is just being coy; in another interview she admits she wants to see your reaction regardless:

> I am interested in what the public does with it, which begins with the way they deal with it from the moment it's disseminated. [Interesting word choice, Emma.]

At this point and for those unfamiliar with the latest protocols of artistic expression and appreciation, in the current theory, art is not a finished canvas, a standalone sculpture or a poem on a page. Art is neither beauty nor the depiction of beauty; art exists in the minds of those who encounter it and preferably interact with it — the creator envisions and makes a "work" that becomes "artwork" through the social response to it — including the emotions, social justice implications and/or political response to it. If you Google the term "feminist art" and select "images" the resulting "art" is about as pleasant and beautiful as a Soviet gulag, only less inspired and inspiring.

One can contrast this with different schools of art that focus on accomplishment, beauty, and the fascination with life, nature and the human form. Years ago, while walking through Frognerparken in Oslo, Norway, I was moved to tears by the incredible sculptures of Gustav Vigeland

The park, also know as The Vigelandsparken Sculpture Park, must be experienced to be believed. The mad and obsessive genius of designer and sculptor Gustav Vigeland is overwhelming and his work is a treasure to the world.

Vigeland's art is art worth seeing. Sulkowicz's art is art worth berating.

The title of her sex tape "this is not rape" would have been more pointed had she picked German (Paul's nationality) instead of French as her dilettante language-of-choice. The title can be interpreted in a number of ways:

- A simple description of the film's content — a sort of a "trigger soother" for those who might think they were watching a real crime, or the depiction of one;
- A retraction of her initial rape claim. In an art piece, unlike law, there is no singular "truth" and the interpretation of her title reflects not her views necessarily, but rather the myriad views of her audience;
- An ironic indictment of those school and law enforcement officials who investigated her allegations repeatedly and then rejected her claim of rape, clearing Paul of all charges. "Look at this" she is shouting, "they told me 'this is not rape!' Can you believe those idiots would treat my golden vagina like that?";
- A trap to catch the unwary filmmaker herself – by making a consensual film about a real life sexual encounter that went awry, Emma pretty much concedes that calling one incident rape, and the other, not, illustrates vividly the ludicrous nature of her initial claim: both men thought they had consent to have sex with Emma but it turns out that — surprise! — only the second guy did.

Basically, Emma is raping the entire world: drawing us into her bullshit narrative so that we can pause to reflect on how rape and culture interact to produce what feminists call "rape culture" — through feminist grandstanding, hoaxes and the hatred of men's sexuality. She's expanding from abusing Paul with a false rape accusation, to abusing the University President by falsely accusing him of snubbing her at graduation, to now abusing all of us as well.

She's treating you like her long-suffering mattress – just another prop in her performance art odyssey that started with consensual (but aborted) anal sex and has now grown into a vulgar sex tape wherein she purportedly re-enacts her purported rape. Or not, or not.

Consider the sex tape's contents. The screen is divided into four fixed camera angles as if to catch a crime in progress. The couple (Emma and an unidentified actor I'll call "Paul") enter her dorm room and are immediately all over each other, kissing and stripping off their clothes, which are gone by the 45 second mark as the oral sex begins.

There is no talking for the first 2:40 minutes and certainly no consent is asked nor given explicitly by either participant. One gets the impression that this is a new but established couple where consent is implicit and passion is still raw.

The first part of the sex is mutually reciprocal and thus can be assumed to be consensual — he performs a few seconds of oral stimulation on her hairy pudenda and then she sucks on his already erect penis. They both get on the bed; she puts a condom on his penis; Emma mounts Paul to begin vaginal intercourse.

There is no seduction, no talking and almost no foreplay. Everything screams that this is a couple who know each other's preferences well. At this point, both are guilty of sexual assault under "affirmative consent" because no explicit consent has occurred — the film as a scathing ANTI-feminist statement that affirmative consent is a joke to real-world lovers.

After 35 seconds with Emma on top they flip over to put Paul on top. After 35 more seconds, without warning, Paul slaps Emma once across her left facial cheek; she demands "hit me again," so he complies.

Not only are we sure that this is an established couple now but we can infer that they have a history of sadomasochism (S/m) or at least, moderately violent sex. She likes being slapped hard: she both actually and literally asked for it.

To avoid misunderstandings and heighten both excitement and safety, experienced S/m couples develop a specific set of "safe words" to moderate their violent play: for example, the word "Mercy" or even "Stop" might mean, conventionally, "scale it back a bit but keep going" and the word "Yellow" might mean "Full stop on everything." More about this in a moment.

She says "ow" twice, then he starts choking her – she says "stop", so he stops choking her but the sex continues. This is consistent with the idea that "stop" meant "scale it back…" and perhaps "get the fuck off of me" (which we never hear) might mean "full stop."

Paul then discards the condom, bends Emma knees to her chest in order to move her anus into place, and then Paul entered Emma anally without proper lubrication while continuing to pin her down. Emma says "ow" several times and then says "stop." It is not clear what she wants him to stop or scale back this time — maybe it was the anal penetration, maybe it was the way he was holding her arms, or maybe it was everything — there is no way to be sure. 35 seconds later Paul pulls out his penis, moves away off the bed, grabs his clothes and walks into the hallway naked. Emma grabs a towel, leaves for a moment, returns, makes the bed with a couple of sheets, then crawls into bed. The "work" is ended and the "artwork" begins?

We have no information of whether Emma and Paul's consensual rough play was covered by any safe words. I doubt that it was in a formal way but they act as if they had some awareness of…something. It is both his and her fault if they participated in rough play without "safe word" measures — the entire debacle would've been avoided. As it worked out, Emma could have written off the incident as "life experience" and discussed with Paul more effective ways for them to communicate during sex – they texted each other lovingly hundreds of times after the alleged rape, which only became a rape claim when Paul and Emma drifted apart, to Emma's consternation.

Equating bumbling, bad and unpleasant sex to rape undermines the credibility of real rape victims. It damages the lives of innocent men like Paul who will carry the abuse from Emma and her insane allies for the rest of his life while Emma is feted by powerful figures for her "courage" of spreading her legs, her lies, and her poison about one poorly executed sexual encounter. When Emma says "Look—I want to change the world," it is clear that she doesn't give a shit about how many men have to suffer for her to do that.

Use safe words, folks, and lots of lube. Better yet, don't have sex with feminists. Ever.

Don’t just do something, SIT THERE

“To be or not to be- that is the question.”
Shakespeare

Being is vital to the health of everyman but is rarely given the consideration it deserves: Being at a cafe, being in nature, being with a friend, being at home, being at peace. Smelling the roses. If allowed, these things have potential to replace some of the incessant doing that drives men’s existence too early into the coffin.

We’ve all heard the phrase Women are human beings and men are human doings.[1] It’s one of those catchy, hummable lines that everyone agrees with before it slips again from conscious awareness – even as it remains in front of our eyes and in our daily behavior. Even as it slips from awareness the fact remains that doing without being, and being without doing, bespeak unbalanced lives, ones that can and do lead to pathology.

The question we need to ask is what are we doing about it? I don’t mean what are we doing about it as a movement, but what are we, each of us, doing about it in our own personal lives. While some men are already addressing the balance, others may still be searching for the right balance, and for a better understanding of what’s at stake.

Pediatric psychiatrist Donald Winnicott contends that not only is being more important than doing in regards to psychological health, but that being must precede doing in order for doing to have significance:

> “Being is at the centre of any subsequent experience in life. In fact if the individual has not had the opportunity to simply be, his future does not augur well in terms of the emotional quality of his life. The likelihood is that this individual will feel empty.”
> “Now I want to say: ‘After being, is doing and being done to. But first, being.”
> “The ability to do, therefore, is based on the capacity to be. The search and discovery of the sense of self, in the context of therapy, is all to do with finding an identity.”
> “It cannot be overemphasized that being is the beginning of everything, without which doing and being done to have no significance.”[2]

Being, according to Winnicott, is more important to mental health, and is ironically the thing males are most encouraged to forego in favor of doing. You’d better not relax and simply be – there is work to be done!

The trend of separating boys and girls along these lines starts early. The boy gets a dump truck and a Bob the Builder toolkit, and the girl receives a Be Yourself Barbie™. Through the person of Barbie girls learn the experience of 'being' in a doll's house, and being relaxed, being pretty, being ugly, being among friends, being at a cafe, being married, or being happy, sad, jealous or vain. That's the psychological cloth little girls are cut from.

The first question we ask a boy is "What sport do you play," or "What kind of work do you want to do when you grow up?" Men are taught to be action figures who work, do the wage earning, do the repairs, or do their girlfriend. As long as they are doing something, we assume they are in their rightful place.

But doing can only return value if the person first exists. If he doesn't feel like he exists on a basic level, all efforts in doing have no meaning because there is no 'me' doing the doings. In that instance all doing becomes futile because it never leads to a sense of me-ness. Or, if doing does provide a momentary illusion of me-ness, it all vanishes the moment activity stops. When all is still, with no future plans, many men are swallowed by an existential void.

With the modern mandate that men do and women be, there's a dearth of male models for how to be. So for the purpose of this article lets revive a classical source illustrating what men have lost and why we would do well to rediscover it. For our purpose let's consult the 2,600 yr old sage Lao Tzu, who cultivated a philosophy of non-doing (Wu wei), defined as follows:

> Wu wei (Chinese: 無爲) is an important concept in Taoism that literally means non-action or non-doing. In the Tao te Ching, Lao Tzu explains that beings (or phenomena) that are wholly in harmony with the Tao behave in a completely natural, uncontrived way. The goal is, according to Lao Tzu, the attainment of this purely natural way of behaving, as when the planets revolve around the sun. The planets effortlessly do this revolving without any sort of control, force, or attempt to revolve themselves, instead engaging in effortless and spontaneous movement.[3]

Being aware of the importance of the doing/being dichotomy, one of the first books I gave my son, at the tender age of 10, was a children's version of the Tao Te Ching by Lao Tzu. We read it together and enjoyed some interesting discussion about the wise old sage, especially about his contention that the wise man "Acts without doing" — What did it mean? I'm not entirely sure if we got the meaning right, but we decided it meant to 'act' in the way you want to act, without 'doing' what others demand or expect from you.

Lao Tzu book for 7-10 yr old boys

"Therefore the wise one acts without doing"

In another translation the old sage says, Act without doing; work without effort. In each of these phrases he seems to be saying let it come naturally, let it arise out of being, and not from pressures from the outside world.

None of this is to suggest that boys and men shouldn't be active in the world. The good news for men seeking that greater balance is that you don't have to sacrifice doing in the process. Most men really MUST do in order to be healthy. But there is a distinction to be made here between healthy and unhealthy doing.

It's one thing to act from a spontaneous sense of self – a being self – and yet another to operate from compliance with the wishes of others because you were raised on a narrative of utility. Those living the narrative of utility must first become conscious of that before giving themselves over to an exploration of being, and if that consciousness is not first achieved then it's guaranteed that your attempts at being will be interrupted by internal guilt or by shaming from those who have most to lose from you walking off the plantation.

As per Lao Tzu we don't stop doing but rather become more conscious of our motives so that doing can emerge from a different center – not gynocentric duty, but conscious choice grounded in the ability to be.

One of Lao Tzu's main disciples Chuang Tzu elaborates the topic:

> Heaven does nothing: its non-doing is its serenity.
> Earth does nothing: its non-doing is its rest.
> From the union of these two non-doings
> All actions proceed,

> All things are made.
> How vast, how invisible
> This coming-to-be!
> All things come from nowhere!
> How vast, how invisible-
> No way to explain it!
> All beings in their perfection
> Are born of non-doing.
> Hence it is said:
> "Heaven and earth do nothing
> Yet there is nothing they do not do."
> Where is the man who can attain
> To this non-doing?[4]

Remaining with our fictional character Lao Tzu a little longer, let's consider the traditional tea-making ceremony legend says he helped to found. Just as Barbie is famed for her tea parties in which she teaches girls the arts of being among friends, Lao Tzu is credited with the first Chinese tea ceremony, a ritual centered in the experience of stillness and presence.

We may be reluctant to talk about a 'Tao of Barbie,' with her narcissistic overtones, but the tea drinking ceremonies of the Chinese and Japanese cultures deserve a nod to the noble Tao of Lao Tzu.

Taoism, like most ancient religions, talks about the balance between work and repose. By way of contrast, while Barbie also teaches girls that a work/life balance is possible, it's not certain that Barbie takes the work part of that equation very seriously.

To summarize, a common element running through all narratives about men is doing. We hear it in phrases like "All work, no play," "Don't just sit there, do something!," and "No rest for the wicked." Men slave for gynocentric culture as its saviors, fix-it men, martyrs, protectors, laborers, office-workers, and heroes – all narratives based on doing. But there's good reason for men to break from the cycle of servitude to enjoy some moments of being – being for themselves.

It's time we stopped for a cup of tea: ritually made, mindfully sipped, with or without friends, and without a need to watch the clock for the next round of work.

TL;DR – Steve Shives doesn’t understand the Men’s Rights Movement

June 7, 2015 | by AVfM Video Source | Link | Original Link

We have rarely found a video that states the MRM’s case so well, or answers some of the more specious criticisms of it so well, as the latest video from TL;DR. We couldn’t help but feature this prominently. Every minute is worth watching for anyone who is still on the fence about what we do:

All the more impressive for someone who is not an MRA and does not affiliate with the moment. It gives us hope that more people are listening and hearing through the bullshit.

We also find it heartening that aggressively ignorant people like Steve Shives are increasingly forced to acknowledge we have legitimate issues, even while they lie about us in the process.

You may want to subscribe to TL;dr.

Update: Macho Man Steve Shives has responded to TL;DR!

Tempest Tossed Out of Court: Karen Stollznow retracts sexual assault claim against Ben Radford

June 8, 2015 | by Steve Herman | Link | Original Link

In his 2014 piece, "Radford vs. Stollznow: Tempest in the Skeptic Community," AVFM's Robert O'Hara described accusations of stalking, harassment and sexual assault lodged against Ben Radford, a well-known figure in the field. Karen Stollznow, also a writer and skeptic, told her story in a since-pulled blog post for Scientific American. The story was quickly picked up by many of the usual subjects, spreading beyond the skeptic community to Slate (since pulled) and the Ada Initiative, an organization that "supports women in tech and culture."

As Robert O'Hara reported, the two sides, in conjunction with counsel, were very close to issuing a joint statement retracting the claims when Stollznow decided to litigate further. Stollznow immediately created an Indiegogo fundraiser: "Give a Voice to Harassment Victims" and quickly pulled in more than $60,000 to continue her legal fight. Radford, on the other hand, spent more than 25,000 borrowed dollars in attorneys' fees to that point. AVFM readers joined with Radford's friends and colleagues to contribute to his own legal fund, raising a small but admirable $10,249. The case dragged on for the next several months as Stollznow fought to adjudicate the case in Colorado, Stollznow's new home, but a state completely unrelated to Radford or the accusations. Witnesses were deposed and both sides, it seems negotiated anew.

On May 22, Radford tweeted a joint statement in which he and Stollznow affirm that "it would be wrong for anyone to believe that Ben Radford stalked, sexually harassed, or physically or sexually assaulted Karen Stollznow." Both parties asked bloggers to delete the allegations and expressed the desire to put the matter behind them. After a couple days, Stollznow even deleted the accusations from her Indiegogo page. Vindication, right?

Have you ever engaged in that old thought experiment? If a tree falls in the woods, does it make a sound? Well, for the past few weeks, we learned that a retraction of sexual assault claims can crash without the tiniest noise. Not one of those who spread the accusations, inside or outside the community, said a word. Not a single apology or even a pro forma "So…Stollznow and Radford issued this joint statement." In fact, the night before Radford released the joint statement, Stollznow posted a picture of her newborn baby to Twitter. The child is indeed adorable, but she could have just as easily posted the same image of the statement that Radford did. Stollznow also had the time to post to a thread in which she offered sympathy to another of the skeptic community's top accusers complained that the man she accused would be speaking at a conference.

The deafening silence continued. Hemant Mehta, a man wholly deserving of the title "Friendly Atheist," reached out to Stollznow, asking for confirmation of the statement.

It seemed as though news of Radford's pyhrric victory would go unheard.

Until today. Mehta published "If You Promote a Story that Turns Out to Be False, Don't

You Have an Obligation to Correct It?" an essay in which the frustratingly and admirably polite man summarized the story and published the settlement document. The primary point of Mehta's essay was to engage in a discussion of morality and journalistic integrity:

> Stollznow now says the allegations weren't true. Maybe you believe her. Maybe you think there's more to the story. Maybe you think she signed it only because it was costing too much to keep fighting this battle in court. But as far as the legal system is concerned, this issue has been resolved. Radford has been cleared of any wrongdoing.
> And yet every single one of the bloggers I linked to above has been silent about this matter. Unless I missed it, they haven't posted the joint statement. They haven't updated old posts with a mention of it. They haven't offered their opinion on it one way or the other. As far as they're concerned, Radford is still a bad guy even though the statement explicitly says he didn't do what he was accused of doing.
> They owe him an apology.
> Or, at the very least, they should tell us why he doesn't deserve one.

Mehta's standing in the community (seriously, the guy's really nice) may have been the catalyst for a couple of the accusers to break their silence regarding the joint statement. Rebecca Watson of Skepchick demonstrated her respect for the truth with "Apologizing for a Thing I Wasn't Wrong About & Didn't Know or Care About." In a 466-word post in which she manages to use "I" and "me" only 22 times, Watson asserts that she stopped arguing Stollznow's side after Stollznow disrespected her. Watson explains why she covered the allegations in the first place: "she [Stollznow] made the claims, I found them newsworthy, and I made it clear that her allegations were just that: allegations, which neatly fit in with the horrible things I already know to be true about Radford[.]"

PZ Myers jumped into the ring, demonstrating why traffic to his blog network keeps trending downward, with "I sincerely concede that Ben Radford is a litigious jerk." No, PZ Myers is not the most gracious man, instead blaming the victim. Radford was thoughtless, you see, in declaring an end to his years of false accusation hell and expensive litigation around the same time Stollznow had scheduled the birth of her child:

> Really, on what planet does compelling a woman to sign a legal document denying previous accusations on the day she's scheduled to go into a clinic for induced labor somehow affirm that I was mistaken in all of my previous impressions of the guy? It makes him a small-minded cartoon villain on top of all the unpleasant things about him. That he's smart enough to work the legal system does not change the fact that he's a leaky sack of shit.

Stephanie Zvan, another of those who were happy to accuse Radford, published "For the Record," a bulleted list of reasons why she hadn't noticed the nearly two-week-old statement contradicting an original essay that, no doubt, earned her a lot of hits. Perhaps the most offensive of the "apologies" to date, Zvan manages to slip an accusation of rape into an article about an accuser who withdrew her charge of sexual assault: “[I] …hope Ben Radford and onlookers have both learned something about getting clear consent for sexual behavior and eliminating misunderstandings.”

What’s the takeaway from the conclusion (one assumes) of this sordidness? There are no winners when it comes to false allegations. Radford, though vindicated, is still assumed guilty by some of the nastier people in organized skepticism. It’s highly doubtful that his Google results will ever be allegation-free. (Not to mention that he kissed a lot of borrowed money goodbye.) Stollznow and her husband have a new baby to which they must devote their time and attention. The skeptic community, once a lot of fun, has been cleaved in two, its smaller and more vicious and vocal piece trying to consume the other. If nothing else, this sad episode should remind skeptics that they should approach serious accusations in the same manner as any other claim: with skepticism.

Starting a MGTOW nation

June 8, 2015 | by Frank Worley | Link | Original Link

Editorial note: AVfM neither endorses nor rejects this proposal. We publish it for discussion's sake. We think it's significant that a growing number of men are thinking that rather than love their country, they're thinking of just leaving it. –DE

Every battle that we fight in the battle for equality is a battle against the state. Divorce laws, written and enforced by the state, rape laws; written and enforced by the state and the ever present and fearful family court system. Women have used democracy to pressure our gutless politicians into surrendering our constitution, personal liberty and any semblance of due process.

From India to America to Australia and back to Great Britain; governments have used their force to punish men from elementary school to the ends of our lives. Nothing male is sacred or protected. Many of us scoff at the very idea that we should be a 'protected class,' but find it equally distressing that adult women are treated as if they were helpless children in any debate or legal proceeding.

While the source of our oppression comes from women in general and feminism more specifically; it is the state that is our greatest enemy. The entrenched forces of Marxist Feminism and the cowardly politicians who cater to them, have taken all that is worthwhile from these once great and free nations. So what is left for those of us who seek only to be treated as equals under the law? We have made some slow progress in changing some laws, but are those changes enough? Will we see equality in our time?

For just over two years now I have been advocating in favor of independence for the United States territory of Puerto Rico. Puerto Rico, like the Philippines, Guam and Cuba was acquired by the U.S. during the Spanish American War around 1898. Cuba and the Philippines have since become independent nations while Guam and Puerto Rico languish in a so called 'commonwealth' status. However, both territories and the U.S. Virgin Islands retain the right to petition for and seek independence legally.

Part of the proposal I have advocated in my writings is to implement specific constitutional definitions of equality and ending spousal support. The proposed constitution contained in the petition for independence also specifically requires joint parenting after divorce and requires that if child support is required that it be a percentage of income that automatically adjusts due to change of income for any reason. It also requires that mother's pay the exact same percentage of child support to the fathers, during the time the children are with the fathers which should be 6 months out of every year.

Parents can also opt out of support payments all together.

The definition of being equal under the law in this proposal is service. Military or civilian part time service is required for all citizens and immigrants both to deny entry to those who would seek only benefits of the new country and also to eliminate all other constantly changing definitions of who is a ‘protected class.’ Complete your service and you are equal under the law; fail to complete and you are not.

The nation-state proposal is a limited government, free market economy with a built in personal savings and retirement system that is funded by individuals, their employers and a national trust. This keeps politicians from using social programs for ‘protected classes’ to bankrupt the country. It also makes it easier on business owners because instead of paying into benefits programs and multiple federal and state social welfare programs they make direct deposits into the employees’ accounts and the employee then decides which benefits they want or don’t want.

Let me address some obvious questions.

Is this for real? Yes.

Is it possible? Yes.

How? Votes.

Puerto Rico already has a vibrant independence and sovereignty movement. The only problem with that independence movement is that it is mostly left leaning pro-feminist or social democrat. Very few of those people support limited government or true equality for men. So in order to accomplish this feat we need votes. Lots and lots of votes.

One of my early proposals was the establishment of a micro-independent state on the eastern third of Puerto Rico. The idea was to ask people who supported independence to move to one of several municipalities (PR uses a municipality system as opposed to a county system) register to vote and then vote for Mayors and council members who supported our program and then call a referendum. If the petition for independence was denied by Congress then simply declare independence recognizing what that might imply.

To accomplish this micro independence I would need upwards of 25 thousand MGTOW’s to relocated to the specific areas and register to vote. Have no fear of being denied the vote as American citizens born in Puerto Rico can and do move to the mainland U.S. and register to vote and some of them have become members of Congress like Nydia Velazquez and Luis Gutierrez. Any American citizen can move to Puerto Rico and vote and run for office and vote for independence.

This tactic was actually used to make Hawaii a state. Mainland Americans moved to Hawaii in such numbers that they were able to tilt the balance of voting power in favor of statehood. I’m simply calling for doing the same thing, in reverse. While I welcome support from MGTOW’s from every nation; only American citizens can vote in the elections to seek independence. Once independence has been acquired I will work to welcome MGTOW men from all countries of the world.

Plainly put, we are oppressed our rights by government. The only immediate and complete solution to this problem is to concentrate our forces to create a majority in a single location so that WE become the state. We create a constitution that recognizes complete equality, we write and enforce the laws without having to cow tow to the feminists. We can see liberty and equality in our time, but only if we assume the same responsibility as a group that we do as individuals: that we shall be free by our own choice and action.

Interview with Dr. Tanveer Ahmed – Domestic Violence

Tanveer Ahmed recently sat down with the Canadian Association for Equality to have a talk about Domestic Violence:

Retreating into activism

June 9, 2015 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Everything we do at AVFM, success or failure, is a lesson. Our recent work toward ICMI ’15 was no exception. Indeed, it turns out to have been instrumental in identifying problems and finding solutions.

Identifying the problem in this case was simple. The combination of stress and workloads for such an endeavor was taking a heavy toll. We were, in fact, not fully recovered from last year, emotionally or financially. We have been forced to set healthy limits on our commitments. We also learned that we need alternatives that help ameliorate activist burnout, not increase it.

We think we have found such an alternative.

This Fall, at an undisclosed location in the Great Smokey Mountains, we are having the first ever AVFM MHRA retreat. It will be three days of food, drink and fellowship. There will be a couple of round table discussions scheduled in, but other than that it is about time together.

That is, after all, why most people wanted ICMI to begin with. It is not for hours of lectures, but for time spent in the company of likeminded friends in a pressure-free environment. Our online work is stressful and demanding. Our time together should be just exactly the opposite.

We also get the benefit of removing stress from organizers, as well as making it more accessible financially to MHRAs who want to attend. For instance, this Fall the costs to attendees for three days lodging in an excellent lodge is well under $200.00. The food buy in is $50.00 a head. That and the transportation to get there (many of us are carpooling), is all it takes. All the bennies of ICMI, none of the PITAs.

The first retreat has been scheduled and is already at capacity attendance. So, sorry, there is no more room for anyone else to attend this time. The only order of “business” at that event will be to set out a proposed schedule for future retreats so that any known MHRA who wants to can attend in the future.

There will be two, possibly three kinds of retreats. One, a general annual retreat for all MHRAs. Two, a men-only retreat. And three, a women-only retreat should they decide to have one.

There is only one other catch to sort out. These events will be invitation only, and if we don’t know you an invitation won’t be extended. We will establish a small committee to determine exact screening criteria, but the general idea is that those who want to attend will have to have vouching by well-established activists.

I would love to just open it up to the general public, but I think most people realize the countless reasons why that is not prudent.

This model of approaching group meetings is also advantageous for other reasons. Given that AVFM has ended all direct fundraising, the self-reliance qualifier of this model means no AVFM funds are collected or expended. It also means that the average person who wants to attend can do so for far less money than it would require to attend an ICMI.

Also, and I think very importantly, these retreats will probably be a much better model for networking and future activism than the ICMI model. More face time, less structure and the like make for better networking, planning and exploring ideas.

The Indian MHRAs are a very advanced group of activists. They have been wise enough to put as much focus on team building and burnout prevention as they do on activism. We are going to learn from them here at AVFM.

It is time to move our staff of volunteers and others in the MHRM toward more healing, which I think in the long run means more activism.

On behalf of Team AVFM, I hope that many of you choose to join us in the future.

‘Respectful Relationship’ poster series aims to educate boys and young men

June 9, 2015 | by AVFM | Link | Original Link

Editor’s note: The following blurb and pictures are from the 1 in 3 website. – PW

One in Three (Australia) has produced a series of seven free digital poster designs aimed at educating boys and young men about respectful and healthy relationships. Covering issues such as sexual abuse/unwanted sex, social abuse/isolation and physical and emotional abuse, the posters aim to encourage young males not to accept unhealthy or abusive behaviours in their relationships. If the posters are to be used in a co-ed (mixed sex) context, we would expect that other posters be displayed giving similar messages to girls and young women. There are many such posters available from other organisations.

The posters are available as high-resolution PDF files in A3 size, in 7 designs. They are ready to download, print off and display at your school or service.

A man's protest transformed into discourse about women

June 10, 2015 | by Douglas Galbi | Link | Original Link

Matheolus adoring woman on pedestal

Note: This article is also available in Portuguese.

In a medieval masterpiece of men's sexed protest, Matheolus poured out his anguish and anger about injuries he suffered from the church and his wife. Matheolus's protest generated quarrels about women, apologies to women, and defenses of women. That's a characteristic deliberative effect. Gynocentric society tends to transform men's sexed protest into discourse about women.

The reception of Matheolus's text illustrates the effects of gynocentrism. Matheolus wrote his work of men's sexed protest in Latin in 1290. About a century later, Jehan Le Fèvre loosely translated Matheolus's work into French. Perhaps fearing the dominant social power, Le Fèvre added apologies and excuses to his version:

> I wish to excuse myself in my writing, since I do not slander the good women nor do I desire to slander. I would rather retract it than be hated for foolish language. God knows it {my book}, and I keep my payment for it, for I have no ill will toward women. Nor do I say anything in anger, except to color my statements. Good and virtuous women can never be honored too much.[1]

Le Fèvre depreciated men's anger, as continues to be done even for men's anger arising from outrageous injustice. Le Fèvre instead hinted at his dispassionate financial interest in translating Matheolus's book. While poetry has long been condemned as lying, Le Fèvre's Matheolus masochistically welcomed being beaten for his poetry. He declared, "If I lie, I want to be beaten." Then he disavowed everything he had written as merely translating other men's words:

> It is fitting, since I translate, for me to speak or shut up. For this I beg that it be not displeasing if in this moral treatise I record some words which may be biting. For nothing proceeds from me, not the smallest bit, which is not found in histories and in ancient memories.

Le Fèvre recognized the social hostility to men's sexed protest. With reasonable self-interest, he distanced himself from Matheolus's work.

In addition to adding excuses and disclaimers to Matheolus's text, Le Fèvre wrote an additional text that he positioned as a defense of women. He began his additional book with an appeal to women:

> My ladies, I entreat your mercy. I would like to apologize to you here for what I said without your permission about the great strife and the torments of marriage.[2] > no woman and anyone alive should hate me for that {translation of Matheolus's book}. Therefore, if I was so occupied, I beg that it be pardoned and forgiven me by your grace. For I am all ready to write a book to redeem myself: please don't deny this to me. … Without your grace, I don't want to live.

Men protesting their suffering in marriage isn't permitted without women's permission. Le Fèvre again excused his earlier work as only a translation. He urgently sought to avoid women's hate and gain their grace:

Le Fèvre as writer represents the servile, self-obliterating woman-server of bleeding-man medieval chivalry. He explained that he wrote his new book:

> to defend you ladies faithfully, and especially to show that no man ought to blame women; we ought to praise and love them, cherish, honor, and serve them, if would would deserve their grace.

The value of men's lives, in Le Fèvre's view, is contingent on women's grace. Men blaming women is categorically illicit, while men serving women is categorically required. In attacking men who reject such subordination, Le Fèvre and like-minded men claim to be defending women.

Le Fèvre used subordination to women as a strategy to advance his pecuniary and sexual interests. Le Fèvre urged women to buy and promote his book:

> My ladies, I ask you humbly, if I have pleaded your case weakly through my ignorance, use here your strength to make up for my defects and publish your honor, that all may know of it. … Please advocate for me, or I can truly say and promise that I will never have a day of gladness, but will remain in sadness, which will prey on my weary body, if I have to pay the expenses. [3]

With ignorance of the art of love, Le Fèvre sought women's sexual favor through subservience and flattery:

> Have mercy, mercy on poor Smith {Le Fèvre, in a pun on his name}, who suffers a greater thirst on his lip than did the rich man in hell; for he doesn't know how to work on iron, but his effort is all on parchment. He has made this book for you, for he well knows that to all males who carry both purses and sacks, you are comfort, joy, and rest.

Sacks are a figure for scrotums, or more generally, male genitals. Carrying a purse associates men with paying money for enjoying women's company. Seeking "mercy" is associated with men begging women for love.[4] That's not a propitious seduction strategy. Embracing subordination to women does, however, help men to sell their books to women.

Le Fèvre's dispassionate, narrowly self-interested translation and refutation of Matheolus's sexed protest prompted additional gynocentric literature. Christine de Pizan indicated that "Matheolus," which probably meant both Le Fèvre's translation of Matheolus's work and his refutation of it, inspired her to write Livre de la cité des dames (Book of the City of Ladies).[5] De Pizan also contrived to create a "querelle des femmes" (quarrel about women). Debate about women played out at the heights of French society, including the queen and leading clergy. Men's concerns, as they had been throughout the long prior history of men's sexed protest, were largely belittled and ignored.

An exemplary development was Martin Le Franc's Le Champion des Dames (The Champion of Ladies). Finished in 1442, The Champion of Ladies goes on for an interminable five books containing 24,336 verses. Le Franc positioned his work as a response to what were originally Matheolus's heartfelt lamentations. Le Franc charged Matheolus with defaming women. The Champion of Ladies tendentiously pits the titular champion against allegorical bogeymen Malebouche (Badmouth), Brief Conseil (Hasty Judgment), Vilain Penser (Evil Thinking), Trop Cuidier (Much Presuming), Lourt Entendement (Slow Wit), and Faulx Semblant (False Seeming):

> Against foul Badmouth and his host —
> That proud and overweening captain —
> The Champion his lance lowers, most > Hardily however he is smitten,
> He fears no more than a mitten
> The balance of the battle's woes,
> For his victory is certain:
> He'll win no matter how it goes.[6]

A modern-day translator of *The Champion of Ladie*s described Matheolus's work as providing "misogynistic depictions of marriage, using humor to impugn women."[7] The champion shames and blames all men for Matheolus's sexed protest. To the modern champion of women, The Champion of the Ladies shows "understanding of the multifaceted nature of gender relations."[8] That apparently isn't meant to be funny.

The voluminous, tedious scholarly literature moralizing against medieval "anti-feminism" and “misogyny” serves dominant structures of gynocentrism. That literature refuses to recognize the possibility of medieval men’s sexed protest.[9] Many persons today also refuse to recognize violence against men, forced financial fatherhood, institutionalized inequalities in biological parental knowledge, vastly disproportionate imprisonment of men, and many other pressing injustices against men. The connection between medieval men’s sexed protest and men’s sexed protest today is obvious in structures of repression.

Burke (2013) approaches Le Livre de Leesce as a player on Team Christine de Pizan and promises further work “in the tradition of my author.” Id. p. 137. While Burke (2013) regarded Le Fèvre as putting forward a defense of women, Pratt (2002) perceived Le Fèvre to have committed an unpardonable literary crime and lamented:

> Le Fèvre’s defense of women was a literary game in which ambiguity and irony allowed antifeminist attitudes to be perpetrated with impunity.

Id. p. 114. Fortunately, punishment for “antifeminist attitudes” continues to be strengthened.

Josh O’Brien looks at the ludicrous narrative of ‘Rape culture’.

Something of a Life

June 11, 2015 | by John Elliot | Link | Original Link

It was 1955, and the sun shone on the houses that were our homes. I played outside and enjoyed the world of a five-year-old.

From a few doors away, a girl of thirteen started coming to our house, presumably out of a teenager's fascination with small children. I can't remember what we did, but one day I put my hand up her skirt from behind. She stiffened and then relaxed as the frisson of pleasure took over her body. After that we engaged in rudimentary sexual activity regularly, in the back garden, in a den that we had made.

I was too young to have proper intercourse. She was frustrated with my pathetic efforts and, accordingly, one day she calmly got up and went to the back door of our house. My mother came to the door and the girl complained that I had sexually interfered with her. In the background, I hopped up and down, thinking that now I was in big trouble. My mother didn't understand, or pretended not to, and the girl went off down the garden path, defeated. My mother took me into the house and told me not to do it again, wiping my hands with a wet rag. It was one of the few good things she did for me.

That day I learned something I became conscious of in later life:

- Fearful girls, damaged women, and feminists lie brazenly about sexual matters
- They believe that sex is something bad that males do to females
- They believe that they are absolved from all complicity in such matters. It doesn't matter that they took part willingly. It was the male's fault.

Much later, when Feminism came along, I understood instinctively what motivated them.

The years passed, and I suffered from child abuse. I was frequently beaten by my father. I was terrorised every day. I spent the whole of my childhood in fear. My mother displayed the typical damaged female characteristic of passivity. When I tried to talk to her about it she just defended my father. Such women frequently defend abusive men. Males suffer more violence than females, mainly from other men of the nasty variety. This is enshrined in the figures obtained from the Home Office. Girls suffer nowhere near as much physical violence as boys. The wrong kind of father loves to beat his boys.

I remember, above all, pleading with my parents to stop terrorising me. It was making me ill. "Listen to him." My parents would say. "He is terrorising us and would have it that we are terrorising him!" The more I begged them to desist the more oppressive they got.

When I grew up I was exhausted. I couldn't do my schoolwork, and couldn't work at a job. I just wanted a big rest in life. When you suffer child abuse, you don't grow up to become Rudolph Valentino. Your ability to make friends and have girlfriends is all but destroyed. And so I was given a bad time by a percentage of women who didn't want to hear that I was not feeling well. They wanted me to sweep them off their feet. They couldn't have behaved more nastily towards me.

What's more, my attempts at seeking recompense and delivering my father and mother to justice came too late. They only give you three years between being abused and bringing a case against the perpetrators. Those three years, and many more further down the line, are likely to be spent in confusion, in the belief that this is what life is like anyway, that abuse is normal. The abused person doesn't have the wherewithal to understand how much they've been exploited until much later in life. So it was that my parents completely escaped the sanction of the law and my hardship was nowhere acknowledged, no compensation paid and I ended up living in dreadful poverty. (Moreover, many years later during the Labour Government of Tony Blair, legal aid for cases of physical and emotional violence against children was silently brought to an end, without a word of objection from the Media, while it was kept for cases of sexual abuse.)

In 1972 I was in Oxford. Not at college but just living in the usual, single person's accommodation which was enough to make you sob. The loneliness was unbearable and the students of the Far Left were accommodating. I fell in with them and used to go round their houses. I didn't take part in their political activities but just went round for the sake of someone to talk to. It was there that they plotted the kind of society that we are today labouring under. The Feminists, Marxists, Anarchists and Progressives in general were all talking garbage. They didn't have a single jot of personal experience in life, the likes of which I had had, and were grabbing onto ideologies in order to give their life some purpose, direction and meaning. They didn't seem to get it from their studies either. It was my first meeting with Feminism and I disliked it thoroughly. Since when had women had a more difficult life than the one I'd had!?

One day I tried talking to these ideologues about what life is really like. They became so incensed that one of their leaders, a young anarchist man who used to go round dressed in a fireman's coat, grabbed me behind both arms (a favourite trick of a certain type of "activist," beware) and threw me out of the house. Not to worry, they had fulfilled their part in my life. I had kept my head above water knowing them. They had provided me with a year and a bit of contact with people. As for them, I learned to know their type intimately. Now, the TV bleats out the ideas I listened to back then in an unremitting way and the whole of society is repeating their rhetoric.

You will notice, of course, that while back then these groups were calling for "Free Speech" and to "Make Love Not War," they now censor speech everywhere, especially in the media and are very much more interested in making war on groups who are opposed to them. This is the way of every change or revolution in society. First they are the 'opressed,' then they become the oppressors.

> "The most radical revolutionary will become a conservative on the day after the revolution" – Hannah Arendt.
> "The anti-fascist of today will be the fascist of the future." – Unknown.

But more than that, every group that comes into power, whether oppressed or not, will become violent towards every other group that does not agree with it, even to the point of exterminating them. This has been evident in many societies, such as Germany, Cuba,

Rwanda etc. … Too many feminists of today are secretly longing for a time when men will be liquidated together with non-progressives.

The years passed, and I was getting nowhere with anything. I approached Social Services telling them that I lacked self-esteem as a result of the abuse in my childhood, and could they help me with it, so that I could have some sort of social life? They took me on and gave me 'social skills' therapy in order to help me with my low self-confidence. The idea is that if you learn the right way of approaching women, you will gain self assurance. It didn't do me any good. I already knew social skills. I was just too shy to put them into effect. The child abuse of my youth had had a definitive effect.

One of the social workers said, "I'm a feminist and a very angry one!" At that point I should have picked up on this warning and fled from there, but I stayed because I needed help. One day, at one of the sessions, I had had enough. I told them that I was sick and tired at the way their feminism kept interfering with my therapy on an ongoing basis. I told them I wanted it to stop. For my pains they immediately terminated my sessions.

A few months later I received a letter from the Psychological Forensic Service. Psychiatric hospitals have forensic psychology departments which help people who have broken the law. I hadn't broken the law, however, and was referred maliciously to the service by the feminists. This is the kind of thing that has been happening to men in silence. This example is a subsection of the false sexual allegation by women of men such as in false allegations of rape. I was falsely accused of being anti-women. Following receipt of this letter I suffered from headaches for a whole year. I thought, this couldn't be happening to me.

Abuse of men by feminists occurs in the Health System and not just in the family and criminal courts. Men are in fear of talking about these kind of matters openly for fear of being seen as guilty of the allegations made against them.

The feminists had referred me, behind my back, saying that I was anti-women. I saw the letter they sent. Eventually, I went to the meeting at the Forensic Service and explained the situation to the psychologist. Luckily he understood, and said I wasn't in need of therapy. I was relieved of that weight. I left.

I then went to County Hall to look at my Social Worker records. They had written, on one page, that at the "next" session I'd "wanted a woman to f..k." I couldn't believe what I read. This had never happened. Nothing I'd ever said could have been construed in this way. I was devastated and felt a sexual feeling rise in my groin at what they had done to me. I felt shame, as if this was some sort of rape impulse or some other perversity, rather than a pretty normal reaction to someone who has just shamed your sexual identity.

The thing is if you have something really horrendous done to you, which is a lie and is designed to get you into the worst trouble, you will likely have a reaction such as a sexual feeling arising in your body. It happens because you realise that someone or some people have tried, most blatantly, to destroy you, and this triggers a fear and shame reaction especially if it's tied to sex. This attests to an area of suffering by men which is not allowed to be talked about. This is probably the kind of thing that happens to men when they are sentenced to death.

I left and went to a solicitor. The solicitor wrote to County Hall. Their reply came back, and they didn't admit anything. The oppression was total. I was screwed. Down through the years this caused me great anguish.

But I knew what was in feminists' minds for certain.

More time passed and I was living alone and broken in unpleasant accommodation. I suffered from anxiety and depression and was medicated for it. Life was a terrible struggle. Thatcher came and went, and then a huge liberal onslaught started. The media were attacking men, day in day out, year in year out. Television is a staple diet of the lonely, and I had to put up with these insults every time I switched the thing on.

I started writing letters to people in power. I wrote to the television companies, to their complaints agencies, to my member of Parliament, to the Equality and Human Rights Commission, to the Home Office, to the heads of the political parties and many, many others which I can't remember. The result was always the same. They would quash my complaints. I never, ever, received a reasonable reply. I came to the conclusion that I had tried talking with these people and they weren't prepared to talk. I was dealing with people who didn't believe in freedom of speech. They didn't believe in letting men have a right of reply on the media. They were either indoctrinated or they were pandering to the population and their votes. They were the fascist left. They were the oppressive State. Now, even the right is feminised.

All that I did, and all that I went through, I went through by myself with no-one to rely on for help. There was no-one to turn to. All the anxiety that I underwent was done on my own. All the nightmares that I have every night. So many years, so much pain. Now, I'm in my twilight years, friendless, and having achieved nothing in life. I haven't had a career or family. The biggest sadness in my life is that I never had children. Let this article attest to the kind of horrendous life men can have such that they owe nothing to Feminists and their stories of woe.

Finally, I would like to finish off this article with the conclusions that I have come to as a result of the above formative experiences. I have come to the understanding that the problems of this life are caused by the following two sections of society:

The males who are violent and beat up other men on the street. They beat up their male offspring. As children, they beat up other male children in school. They rape and beat up women. These control the streets. A similar kind, who use intellectual oppression rather than physical, are frequently found in power and are responsible for the state of affairs by which five per cent of the population own ninety five per cent of the wealth. They send other men to war. They give power to Feminists. These males are psychopaths.

The second group is that of psychopathic women. These associate with the violent men of the street and with the men who run society. They keep normal men subdued by making false allegations of rape against them. They protect male abusers. They seek to establish a core of powerful and unpleasant Feminists at the top of society to accompany the core of powerful and unpleasant men that is already there. They want to be equally represented in Government and Media. They have a pathological hatred of normal sexuality.

We currently live under a system of terror maintained by psychopathic men and psychopathic women. Rich men opress the poor. Feminists persecute men. Throughout history this kind of terror has raised its head regularly. Power must, at all costs, be taken from these two subsections of society. Their psychopathy must be described and measures taken to incarcerate their strain of being.

An open media must be established in which freedom of speech is entrenched so that psychopaths can never again take over society as they have done at the time of writing.

Tim Hunt is not the issue. Toxic feminism is.

June 11, 2015 | by Rachel Edwards | Link | Original Link

Yesterday feminists across the first world screamed in outrage over an old man having an unpopular opinion. Why? Because this man happened to be a nobel prize winner in science: Tim Hunt.

Now I am going to present an equally unpopular opinion: I really could not care less if there are sexist men in science. There I said it. Why you may ask? Because science isn't all about gender. Science is about merit and finding universal truths. If we were to toss out every person in the scientific field with unpopular opinions that are unrelated to their work, we'd have no one left.

Think of how many deeply religious Islamic women there are in Science, Technology, Engineering, and Math (STEM) in middle eastern countries in comparison to the rest of the world. A good portion of them are going to be anti gay, because unlike Christianity where there's supposedly some room for interpretation, Islam is very clear about it's stance on homosexuality being a sin.

Try suggesting that we kick out all the anti-gay muslims in science because they aren't progressive enough and see what happens. What about every scientist who's ever said something un-PC? You would have to lower standards just to get people to fill the jobs.

Now I know feminists would have you believe that every woman in science is a rational perfect flower, who never fucks up or says anything offensive, but we're all human here. Let He/She/Xie who has never said a single offensive thing in their lives cast the first stone.

People today believe that great people in history were flawless. They were never racist, sexist, discriminatory, or had weird beliefs. Yeah do a little research sometime. Because the more you dig, the more you find that the men and women we view idealistically were far from perfect.

Often these people are like storms in a bottle. That's what makes them different. That's what makes them able to think outside the box. The more rules and restrictions you place on them, the harder it becomes for these people to exist and do the things they do,

But society seems to only want science if it comes from perfect unoffensive boring people who never shake things up. They want people who are so afraid to step out of line that they would rather stay quiet and keep their job, than speak up and go against the establishment.

What did Tim Hunt really say that was offensive? That romantic entanglements are a distraction in science? That some women in science can't take criticism? Neither of those things are incorrect. Did he suggest segregation? No! Did he say women were entirely incompetent? No!

Feminists project their feelings and paranoid delusions about men onto every man that steps out of line. Hell he doesn't even have to step out of line. If he even grazes the line, they blow up and ask that we place that man's head on a pike. They will metaphorically burn him at the stake.

But what is the feminist excuse for this? They claim that there is a systematic bias against women. Yet how many men in science stood behind women in the decision to take down Tim Hunt? How many men white knighted on twitter, and called for his resignation?

Feminists scream that women have no power in the first world, but they are given anything they ask for. They would burn science to the ground if it meant that no one would be offended. They would have us go into the dark ages if it would give them power in a visible way.

Which is why I would take a bigoted male scientist over a screaming feminist any day of the week. Because the bigot is at least honest about his bigotry. He won't feign innocence, tolerance, and acceptance like feminists do. The open bigot is at least somewhat aware that his bigotry is based in emotion, where as the feminist will claim that her bigotry is noble and just,

She believes that her justifying her discrimination is all for the greater good. All because of some power + privilege inter-sectional bullshit that overly simplifies the murky waters of human interactions to race, sexuality, and genitalia. They talk people in circles trying to sound as if they are any closer to solving these human problems than the rest of us. They aren't and at their best they are making things worse.

Inter-sectional feminists entering STEM ruin STEM for other women. They do it by being overly sensitive easily offended emotional basketcases. So then when other women come into the same space who aren't this way, their male colleagues will keep their distance, and pass those women up for job opportunities. Not because they are women, but because they are afraid of confrontation and the stakes are higher in those higher ranking positions.

You aren't going to place high risk people in high ranking positions like this. Why would you? Feminists look at this and will call this male privilege. They don't see how accusing every man of transgressions, whether real or imagined, affects the morale of a workplace. It makes men less likely to trust new women coming into those spaces.

But what do feminists do? They see this hostility, and say that it's good. That the men complaining are just mad that women are taking power, and that the women who object just don't understand feminism and need to move out of the way, This kind of drama is bad for science.

But if you even suggest that there may be more complex reasons for why there are less women in STEM, they jump all over you. They push and bully, and demand that everyone make special accommodations just for them. It'd be like inviting someone to a birthday party, only to find that they've stolen the cake and taken a shit on the table.

All the while screaming, "This cake is mine! I deserve it, because all my life people have deprived me of cake! You don't deserve this cake! You're cake privileged! How dare you tell me to share! You're only upset that I'm getting what I deserve!"

The fucked up party guest doesn't realize that a party belongs to everyone invited to that party. Then maybe she gives a piece to the handful of people that kiss up to her. She'll throw that single piece of cake in the corner for them to fight over. Then as the police are carrying this psycho off the premises, she will scream that this is just another sign of oppression.

This is what entitlement does to a space. Feminism turns people against one another, and leads women to believe the worst of their male colleagues. If they fail to get their work done, if they create a hostile work environment, if they do nothing worth mentioning, they will suggest that the reason that they are not moving up, is because of discrimination.

But that is really what this is all about. It is about mediocre women who believe that they are better at what they do than they actually are, screaming that the reason they can't get ahead is patriarchial oppression. It's not just science, it's every field. Even fields that women are less suited for on average. Fields that require extreme upper body strength,

So if you are a woman, who has done everything right, who works hard, and does her job, and you're wondering why your male colleagues have you at arms length, this is why. It's not you, it's that the current political and social climate has made your very existence in a space political. They have made you a risk and a liability.

If anyone objects to this, or points it out, people strike them down. If anyone suggests that women are human, and capable of mistakes, it will be suggested that they believe all women incompetent, and they will be out of the door before they can blink.

So thanks feminism for placing the most sensible and accomplished women in the worst position possible. Thank you for taking away freedoms and calling it progressive. Thank you for making women in STEM unemployable walking lawsuits and being entirely incapable of understanding how that happened.

Review of Emma “Matress Girl” Sulkowicz’s Rape Porn Video

June 11, 2015 | by Kevin Weinberg | Link | Original Link

In what is perhaps the most bizarre twist to false accuser Emma Sulkowicz’s—also known as “Mattress Girl”—tale of deception, dishonesty, and the public shaming of a false-accusation victim, recently news came to light that Miss Sulkowicz has created a graphic, very naked, and very-much pornographic recreation of rape.

Interestingly, she’s called it “performance art.” Yeah, sure.

This eight-minute “performance art” is little more than a guy squeezing her neck and slapping her while she moans “no, no,” as he shags her. In other words it’s your basic, run-of-the-mill porno.

Naturally, the video is generating some controversy, the least of all which stems from the disclaimer that comes beforehand, which states, in no uncertain terms, that if you watch the video—which she posted publicly—without her consent, then you are in fact participating in her rape.

Sheesh, it doesn’t take a whole lot to get a rape accusation out of this broad, does it?

As can be expected, the feminist propaganda networks are attempting to put as positive a spin on this as possible. These dishonest websites are posting positive coverage and, really, they’re digging deep to bullshit their way out of this one. Even the ones who aren’t painting this in a positive light are doing damage control. The following is the article title from Reason.com.

> “Yes, Emma Sulkowicz Appeared in a Pornographic Art Video. Doesn’t Mean Much.”

With a title like the above, you can really see the desperation as the narrative crumbles around the feminist movement. Their hero—their iconic “mattress girl”—has made an eight-minute porn video. And so now, faced with this revelation, they must change all of their beliefs to conform around this unexpected occurrence and find some way of condoning—and even praising—rape porn, something that they would be railing against had it been anyone else who’d done it or if it had appeared in a video game.

I suppose the “art” part of her rape scene comes—no pun intended—from the rhetorical questions she asks after the trigger warning she posts. (Of course there’s a fucking trigger warning).

> “Do you refuse to see me as either a human being or a victim? If so, why? Is it to deny me agency and thus further victimize me? If so, what do you think of the fact that you owe your ability to do so to me, since I’m the one who took a risk and made myself vulnerable in the first place?”

But let’s put that aside and focus on the content. It wouldn’t be fair to denigrate Emma’s porn movie just because she was so against rape in the past. Hey, I used to hate James Bond movies, and now I love them.

And so, that brings us to the movie itself: Emma's first rape film. (Daddy must be so proud).

I'm not going to lie. While I appreciate her enthusiasm, there was a lot that got in the way of me enjoying her content. For starters, all the bullshit questions, trigger warnings (of course there's a trigger warning) and down-scrolling it takes to access the video really kind of hinders my ability to enjoy the rape. Thankfully, the video can be accessed with minimal bullshit weighing it down.

Now, the camera angles need work. The guy they got for the film looks as though he's not really happy to be doing this, but no one really watches porn for the male actor anyway so who cares. Let's talk about Emma. In a nutshell, her performance was abysmal.

At no point was I convinced she was really being raped. Her shouts of "no" and "please" utterly failed to impress upon me that she was being raped and really took away from the overall immersion one would expect from a high-quality video.

The sound effects were cheap, and even with four cams it wasn't very clear what was going on. You'd think after making so much money from falsely accusing a guy of rape, she'd be able to afford a decent fucking camera.

Overall, I'm going to give this one a 4/10

Pros:

- Decent breasts
- Hilarious irony
- Bonus points for putting feminists in an odd position

Cons:

- Terrible camera angles
- Too much filler bullshit
- Poor acting
- You become a rapist by watching it (according to the creator)

I suggest giving this one a pass.

Feminism is an “occult” operation

June 11, 2015 | by Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) | Link | Original Link

---

The following is one possible definition of feminism:

A special advocacy movement for women which incorporates hatred of the male sex as an occult driving force.

Such characterization begs justification—a task (one of several) which I have set for myself. I am aware that certain self-described feminists see themselves as people of good will and would feel aggrieved by my clear description of feminism as a hate movement. I understand their position and get no fun from trampling on their susceptibilities, but a higher imperative operates here: the truth must be told even if it stings.

The present description of feminism, as I hope to show, comports very well with the pragmatic truth of our world. Feminism talks a noble game, but only as a window dressing or rhetorical skin. To peel back this skin and probe the workings of the underlying social organism shall be our present endeavor.

To begin: feminist ideology is incoherent. It has meant so many things in the mouths of so many women’s advocates that it appears to mean everything and therefore nothing. But not quite nothing; women’s advocacy is a constant, even if a colloidal suspension of mutually exclusive things are advocated. Feminists themselves have admitted that there are “many different feminisms” and I shall not dispute them. I believe they speak accurately.

From feminists themselves I have only heard one declaration that comes near to a coherent description of their movement, namely that it seeks “equality” between men and women. This desired outcome of sexual equality appears to be the sole wire connecting the many beads of women’s advocacy. Otherwise the women’s movement appears to be a free-for-all, a scattered constellation of clutter with no particular center and no especial perimeter. I say appears, and my choice of words is considered.

The principle that feminism seeks sexual equality should theoretically instill coherence into the movement. Yet given that equality is an essentially contested concept, lacking coherence outside the realm of mathematics, it offers nothing better than mud beneath the mud. “Equality” emerges as a fuzzy, shifting object—one that can never be entirely nailed down because men and women can never be fully “equal” in every possible situation or every conceivable nuance of meaning which the word might be understood to convey. Consequently, the feminist ideologues can go on churning out new demands for “equality” until hell freezes over—a bottomless bag of tricks!

So much for coherence. Our examination leaves only the aforementioned rhetorical skin, a mere surface coherence that proves disingenuous on closer inspection. We end with a nagging suspicion that feminism preaches “equality” only for public relations’ sake while covertly meaning something altogether different.

This altogether different “something” is what presently holds our interest. I shall contend that, despite appearances, feminism does in very deed embody a deep organic consistency. However, the plan of this consistency cannot be clearly exhibited until we brush aside (rather brusquely) what feminists say about themselves and see the facts flat-on, with vision unencumbered by doctrinaire models of political discourse. From such scrutiny a picture emerges. Not a pretty picture to be sure, but one that explains the world in a way that is usefully frank, and frankly useful.

Feminism hides (occults) its nature by what we shall term cognitive fragmentation.

Cognitive fragmentation means that feminism pretends to be many different things so that the controlling core of the movement appears to be just "one kind" of feminism among many. This follows from our earlier statement that feminism lacks coherence.

Feminism embraces many jostling particles which by logic ought to exclude each other. Yet certain binding forces prevent the mass from flying altogether apart. These binding forces keep feminism compact enough to operate as a political entity on the field of power.

By means of cognitive fragmentation, feminism turns what might seem a drawback into a distinct advantage. Cognitive fragmentation means that feminism appears to be this and this, and that and that, and that other thing over there too! No end in sight! Consequently the movement can work on a hundred different projects from a hundred different directions, with each module enjoying immunity from most of the others. Thereby the movement as a whole gains deniability. The right hand "knoweth not what the left hand doeth" or else pretendeth not to know.

Yes, feminism harbors many schools of thought and shades of opinion, many sects and coteries. Often these appear harmless; when their adherents are challenged regarding the occult nature of feminism as a whole they can easily pass the buck by declaring, "oh no, I'm not that kind of feminist!"—a perpetual round-robin of "they went thataways!" The radical feminist "bad guys", so it appears, are always just over the hill. Then they're over the next hill, and the next . . .

Yes, the world contains many kinds of feminism—some better, some worse. And it contains many kinds of feminists: we could measure the feminist population purely as a cross-section of human nature without even taking ideologies into account. And a reasonable thinker might well expect to find, somewhere in that woodpile, a veritably "bad" feminism along with a number of correspondingly bad feminists engaged in its practice. This does not broach the borders of the fantastical. To suppose that such bad feminists veritably do exist, neither violates the strictures of probability nor warps them by a single iota.

It is critical to understand that feminism did not float down from heaven on a gold plate. Feminism is by every measure a product of the human condition on planet earth, complete with the trimmings you might expect. The dirt, the deceit, the sham, the shadows, the smoke, the mirrors . . . and all the rest.

The phrase "not that kind of feminist" has revelatory importance because the speaker confirms the existence of "that kind of feminist" in the first place. Even feminists themselves acknowledge “that kind of feminist” as a real part of the world.

Feminism occults its operative core by making that core appear as only one “kind” of feminism among many. You are encouraged to ignore it, to overlook it, to lose track of it, to think positive thoughts—while scanning the entire smorgasbord of feminisms in a distracted manner . . . .

Cognitive fragmentation literally fragments the knowledge of the observer, placing the observer in a state of false consciousness as concerns feminism—unable to cognize its occult unity. Think of this as a variation on “divide and rule”—feminism divides itself in order to rule the target’s mind by dividing his awareness.

Cognitive fragmentation operates also within the mind of the individual feminist, as a prophylaxis against cognitive dissonance.

Here is the modus operandi, as trenchantly as can be stated: any critique of feminism will be met with either screaming histrionics, or a cool assurance that the critique is invalid because the thing it criticizes isn’t really feminism. Feminism is adept at sliding out of its skin like a snake and slithering away intact.

Granted that many feminisms exist, it is remarkable how they all appear to converge toward a realization of female supremacy, as if this were a one-point perspective goal on the time horizon. One might suppose the feminists to have agreed upon a division of labor. Whether this happened on purpose or whether it “just happened” seems a point of secondary interest. Either way it happened and keeps happening.

Anything that seeks “more for women” can be harnessed to the wagon of female supremacism. Even if the “more” in question seems innocuous and not the least man-hating, it can theoretically put women in a stronger position—which marks a step closer to the goal! Man-haters are fine with that sort of thing.

It requires no particular audacity to see a conspiracy in all of this. Etymologically, to con-spire means to breathe together—although a metaphorical kind of breathing is meant, suggesting a group of people mutually attuned to the point of synchronous aspiration. If conspiracy seems too strong a word maybe “connivance”, “collusion” or “complicity” would be more to your liking. Whatever your preference, you will find it illuminating to understand feminism as an affair of kindred minds working in concert across a range of vocations. To understand it otherwise would favor an imbalance of probability.

This range of vocations gives the feminist machine its orchestrated character, its pervading sense of holographic globality—which to the average male feels like something condensing from the air and percolating from the cracks in the earth. And it happened all at once. Plenty of ordinary men during the 1990s felt backstabbed or violently ambushed for no good reason. One day the average fellow woke up in the middle of a Kafka novel. Everyman as Joseph K.

At an extreme, feminism’s mission will be accomplished when any woman has the power to lead any man around by the nose—anywhere, at any time, for any reason. Which is to say that any third-rate female could lord it over the finest man who ever lived. That is what they really want, and all of their activisms, all of their insistences, all of their campaigns both large and small, point incrementally toward the fulfillment of this goal, however far in the future such fulfillment may lie. That this goal will never in all likelihood be realized, matters not; they can still dream of it and plunder aplenty along the way.

Yes, the world contains many different feminisms and they all belong to the same elephant. A blind man would overlook this.

Eddy Baller interviews Dean Esmay on abuse and recovery

June 11, 2015 | by AVfM Video Source | Link | Original Link

Personal development & dating coach for men Eddy Baller recently interviewed AVfM's Operations Manager, Dean Esmay. They had an interesting talk on the wide range of men's rights issues and the challenges men in abusive relationships often face–including even seeing that they're in one in the first place.

How is it that individual podcasters who've never heard of us until recently can do better and more sincere interviews than the professional press does most of the time?

(Yes, that question is rhetorical. Anyway, go check out Eddy Baller.)

Janet Bloomfield is a Korean man – the hoax revealed!

June 12, 2015 | by Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) | Link | Original Link

---

Order the book here – free for the next five days!

The eureka moment dawned slowly, and once the realization sank in, it was like someone launched a thousand missiles at the Hoover Dam and my whole, authentic self broke free! My journey began benignly enough – in the form of an apricot, eyelet lace, empire waisted summer top my neighbor brought over along with some clothes for my six year old. It's darling, don't you think?

[image]

I noted that it was a medium, a size that tends to be roomy on me, but it looked to be a smallish medium, so I thought I would give it a try. Eyelet lace, for those who don't know, is 100% cotton, and does not stretch at all. I got it over my head easily enough but once I tried to get my …ahem… bosoms arranged, I got trapped! I was stuck in the shirt! I couldn't get it up or down! I had to jump up and down tearing at the cloth to extricate myself and it was completely mortifying!

I can't fit into a medium?

OMG I CAN'T FIT INTO A MEDIUM!

The feeling washed over me in heavy waves. The weight of reality struck me with full magnitude.

I'm fat.

I grabbed the shirt and angrily yanked it open to check the label once again, and that's when I noticed it was from the Children' Place and I was attempting to heave my adult bosoms into a child's medium.

Oops.

Okay, so I'm not fat. But dammit, for that one moment in time, I felt fat. And that's when I realized that while the literal minded may prefer to consult charts and weights and numbers and indices and other "objective" or "empirical" datasets to determine human conditions like "weight", in actual fact, weight is just another social construction, like gender or race or height or eye color.

And I am fat.

My actual weight:height ratio or any other patriarchal, oppressive construct you care to evoke does not determine if I am fat. How I feel determines that, and since my feelings are as authentic as anyone else's, they count as evidence, and only the most anti-intellectual, poorly educated troll would deny that. This morning, trying to fit into a shirt intended for a 10 year old, I experienced all the mortification and humiliation fat women go through in their quest to find cute, affordable clothes. I share their pain, because I experienced it this morning. I understand the daily shame and degradation facing fat people, because I might have tried to put that shirt on in a grocery store or something and then I would have been judged for buying Ben & Jerry's and who is to say my imagined experiences are less legitimate than real experiences when the facts of fatness have been established?

Now, now haters, and lovers of reason and logic, simmer down. You are on the wrong side of history, here. There are lots of people who experience identifies they do not superficially appear to possess, and it is only because you are superficial that you can't see or appreciate that reality. If you practiced a little depth, you might find the world a much more interesting place!

Just sayin'….

Milo Yianoppolous is trans-race, for example. He is actually a Black man. Caitlyn Jenner, anyone? Rachel Dolezal is also trans-race.

[image]

She was born a white girl from the Midwest, but is in fact a Black woman, and lives that life so thoroughly, she is President of the NAACP chapter in Spokane and a Professor of Africana Education at Eastern Washington University. Sigh….. I wish I could be that committed to living as a fat person….

My regular readers will know, of course, that I am joking, although I did get stuck in that stupid shirt this morning. I think apricot eye-let lace should come back for adult women, because it's really cute!

It's been rather hilarious watching commenters at Jezebel and Gawker and even Breitbart try to figure out how they are supposed to react to Rachel Dolezal, a white woman who alters both her hair and skin to pass as a Black woman. If race and gender are social constructs, why is Rachel a problem? Why can't she pretend to be a Black woman? Why can't she be a Black woman? The feminists in particular trip over themselves rushing to defend Caitlyn Jenner as an authentic woman, but condemning Rachel for being a "pretend" Black woman. It's different because …. well, they can't quite figure that out, it just is, okay?

I'll give you a hint. Jezebel: it's because neither gender nor race are social constructs. Caitlyn Jenner is a woman because she has the neurology of a woman's brain, which is distinct from a man's brain. Rachel Dolezal is a "pretend" Black woman because she inherited her DNA from her German, Swedish and Czech ancestors. This is why her skin and eyes and hair are light in color.

Gender isn't something you can put on for show. Well, you can dress in drag for sure and pretend to be the other gender, which we're all pretty cool with. You can also dress up and pretend to be another race or ethnicity, but the Thought Police have now deemed that offensive (as long as it's non-white culture you are appropriating – pretending to be Irish every March 19th or German every October is perfectly fine).

A lot of people are suggesting that Rachel is mentally ill based on the extent of her deception. Of course, none of them would accept a diagnoses of mental illness for Bruce Jenner. SJWs and feminists have a hard time in particular understanding why anyone would do such a thing. It's actually not that difficult for those of us outside the SJW mindset to figure out: she's an academic, and in that particular realm, Black women have a lot of privilege. Most women with PhDs follow the patterns of their less educated sisters and acquire degrees in bullshit like Africana Studies. Ooh, sounds rigorous! Who stands the best chance of landing a cushy, tenured job in academia in Africana Studies? A lily-white woman from the Midwest, or a spunky Black woman subjected to multiple episodes of race-based threats, stalking and terrorism?

Duh.

Follow the money.

And let's throw one more faggot on the fire – as a Black woman, Rachel is very, very light-skinned and has light eyes – the epitome of beauty in the Black community. In the Midwest she's just meh, whatever. Another blonde chick of German and Swedish ancestry. Dime a frickin' dozen.

Rachel is not mentally ill, she's ambitious, canny and vain. And there are limits to what ambitious, canny and vain humans can do to achieve their goals. Rachel is about to find that out. It will be interesting to see if feminists and SJWs continue on their current trajectory and rip her to shreds, or parse her ambitions to be a net positive and come out to support her. I suspect they will eat her alive, but I've learned to never underestimate a feminist's capacity for delusion.

So what the hell does this have to do with me being a Korean man? Let's talk for a moment about the idea of "cultural appropriation", which to me is a made up word designed to disguise a form of affirmative action for less able people who want the perks more able people earn. Let's take gaming as an example. SJWs and feminists piss and moan about representation of minorities and women in games and demand that game designers accommodate their tantrums. The Witcher 3 is set during the Middle Ages in land-locked Europe? Where are the Black people? Uh, in Africa? Now connect the dots. A white game developer who creates a Black character is demonstrating cultural appropriation and cannot possibly understand what it is like for a Black person to plant claymores in a circle around the ferris wheel to successfully get through the incoming helicopter checkpoint on the One Shot, One Kill Mission in CoD. This is because claymores and ferris wheels and helicopters and checkpoints mean something completely different to Black gamers.

Uh, what?

Wait. No, they don't. But that's the logic. If SJWs and feminists can convince the creators of popular culture that they need characters representing diverse gender and race perspectives, and that only women and members of the under-represented races can accurately create/portray those characters – well, voila! Guess who gets hired?

The same thing took place with the Sad Puppies movement in nominating Hugo Award candidates. Science fiction writers put down their collective feet and spanked the hell out of the SJWs and sent them crying to their safe spaces to eat cookies and color in their gender neutral books, because science fiction writers, like game developers, filmmakers, painters, photographers, painters, singers, artists and creators of all persuasions understand that appropriation isn't the same thing as representation*.

Are you human? Do you have the capacity for empathy? Can you imagine life in someone else's shoes? Congratulations, you may represent any human being you like. Hey, even if you don't have the capacity for empathy and can't readily imagine life through someone else's eyes, you still get to represent any human you like through your creative endeavors. Pity about your psychosis and profound autism, but your neurodiversity art rocks!

I have written a book that takes place in Korea during the Korean War. I have never been to Korea, and I certainly have never been in a war. The story includes first person narration from an elderly Korean man, a young Korean woman, a small Korean boy, a mid-20s American soldier, an American woman, a Korean soldier, a displaced Korean woman refugee, a middle-aged man who is a career soldier, a young American boy, an elderly American man, a dog and a deer.

According to SJW, feminist logic, I have appropriated the culture and experiences of all these others and that is unacceptable. It would only be acceptable if I were those identities. And depending on how we want to measure it, I am each of those identifies. I have shared their feelings, and if feelings are evidence, then I am an elderly Korean man.

Except feelings are not evidence and every sane person knows that.

Indeed, those who reject Bruce Jenner as a woman are basing their logic on experience – Bruce lived his entire childhood and most of his adult life as a man and has only recently acquired some of the attributes that allow him to experience life as a woman. For many, this invalidates his claim to womanhood. It doesn't matter how he feels – what he has experienced is what matters.

And fair enough. There is nothing "trans-phobic" or hateful about that stance. It's merely supporting evidence and experience over feeling and intuition. Here's a delightful irony for you: while I have no evidence (and neither does anybody else at this point), I feel, my intuition tells me that brains are gendered from birth and trans-gender is directly related to prenatal hormonal exposure. I sense that a baby is washed with hormones that create a male or a female brain and then something loopy happens and the wrong secondary sex characteristics develop, leaving a female brain trapped in a male body, or vice versa. The moment evidence appears to indicate I am dead wrong, I will abandon this hypothesis no matter how I feel at the moment, because I don't prioritize feelings over evidence.

Twitter is already having a field day with Rachel, and it will be interesting to see how this plays out. If the SJWs triumph, I suppose I will have to come out as a Korean man in order to assert my authority to write books with male Korean narrators. I'm also going to have to come out as a child, a soldier and a refugee. And a deer. And a dog. I hope chewing bones will suffice to authenticate me as a canine (and no jokes about my looks sufficing, you bastards!).

I draw the line at sniffing butts.

For those of you who are interested, the book is free, for the next five days, on Amazon.com, and after that period, it will be $2.99 which is the lowest price Kindle would allow. If you miss the 5 day window, and would still like a copy, email me at janet@judgybitch.com, and I'll forward one.

Tess Holliday's big belly flop

June 12, 2015 | by Mumia Ali | Link | Original Link

"When you pray for rain, you gotta deal with the mud."
-Denzel Washington/Robert McCall, "The Equalizer"

I knew it wouldn't be long before newly minted and the world's first BBW supermodel Ms. Tess Holliday would find herself in the crosshairs for breaking the size-barrier in the beauty world – and to be sure, she's had to contend with more than her fair share of detractors, concern trolls and yes, outright haters. But all of that is small potatoes compared to the kerfuffle Holliday finds herself in, right now.

I say that because her recent quote, part of a larger in-depth piece written up on her life and times appearing on the Guardian website, is in so many ways, the shot heard around the world:

> "We're in a cafe, finally sitting down after a six-hour shoot that's had Holliday traipsing blocks in oppressive heat and then a rainstorm. Throughout, she's been a hilarious corrective to the notion of models as mute and biddable clotheshorses. At one point, an African American guy, middle-aged, said something appreciative as he walked by. "What do guys think they'll achieve by yelling something?" she asked, shifting her weight and adjusting the cape primly. "They're like: 'She'll love this, I'll definitely get her number.'" A pause, and then she added, with some satisfaction, "I do admit that black men love me. I always forget that, and then I come to a black neighbourhood and I remember." And no one quite knew what to say. Later, finally and effortfully manoeuvred into some lethal-looking Christian Louboutin stilettos, adding height to her 5ft 5in, she'd calmly told the photographer: "If you're not shooting my shoes, I will fuck you up.""

Ms. Holliday's off-the-cuff observations about the preferences of certain Black men, set the Sistahood off on a tizzy not seen since #SolidarityIsForWhiteWomen a few summers back – thus far, both the Root and Clutch have weighed in with the appropriate recoiling in righteous indignation, while over at Ms. Ann owned and operated outrage-machine Jezebel, the comments section is aflame in a frenzied micro-parsing of Ms. Holliday's now infamous quotation – it all falls into the catergory of "you just cannot make this stuff up".

There's a heck of a lot of meat on the bone here – pardon the pun – so, let's get right to it, shall we?

In A Time Of Universal Deceit, Telling The Truth Becomes A Revolutionary Act

First, let's address the obvious – what Ms. Holliday said, about Black men finding her attractive, IS TRUE. It's so true, in fact, that it is a staple of standup comedy routines, as both Chris Rock and more recently, Amy Schumer, clearly demonstrates. Everyone knows that Black men, when compared to white ones, do indeed tend to prefer their women built for comfort, rather than speed. Sure, the handwringing interlocutors will be keen to point out, ALL Black men don't go in for BBW gals; no doubt about it. BUT, it is fair to say that, all other things being equal, it is not at all uncommon for Brothas to be seen preferring the ladies who have dress sizes going well into the double digit figures. As both Rock and Schumer jokingly point out above, this is particularly true when it comes to white women – and someone like Holliday, who was born and largely raised in the Deep South – Mississippi, one of the Blackest states in the union, in fact – ought to know. The southern states have long been known to be among the largest, especially when it comes to the ladies on average, and, well, the results speak for themselves. Spend ANY time below the Mason-Dixon line, and you will find two easily observable things:

1. The ladies are hella larger, both Black and white

And

1. The Brothas love it.

Only the grossly naive or the ideologically blinkered, would even attempt to dispute this simple fact of American life.

But wait, there's more to this plus-sized Gordian knot – one that is right in Ms. Holliday's newfound wheelhouse…

All BBWs Are NOT Equal

Ah, the irony. At the same time Tess holds herself out as challenging standards of beauty, she finds herself with a bullseye on her ample bottom for promoting many of the very same standards – of course, race, but of something else:

Her grill.

It may be deeply politically incorrect to say so within polite company, but the harsh truth is that lighter-skinned women – namely white, but failing that, the fairer-complexioned of ladies from other ethnicities – are nearly universally seen as MORE attractive, than their more dusky-hued sisters. Put that together with the fact that, no matter what one may think of Ms. Holliday's dress size, she truly does have a very pretty face – and it has long been known that a Big Girl can get a whole lot farther in life with a pretty face, than just being a Big Girl. And the plain truth of the matter is, that there are quite a few big girls in Black America, who are nowhere near as comely as Ms. Holliday – there, I said it. This is hardly anything shocking or new, but it seems that it does need to be put on blast. But, there's something else we have to note with Ms. Holliday that explains why she gets so many Brothas coming out to the yard:

Despite her large frame, she is still shapely – this is borne out in the excerpts of her Red Hook, Brooklyn (location very important – read on) photoshoot, where she is clad in little more than undergarments which includes a corset – you can clearly see a defined waist and hips. Even in other shoots where she's not wearing any waist-binding garments, her figure is apparent. Indeed, I am quite certain that one of the reasons why she has prevailed in being a model despite her overall dress size, is BECAUSE she is both still shapely, AND because she is facially very pretty. Her alabaster white skin is the icing on the cake, insofar as beauty standards go – and the irony is not lost one little bit on the Sistahood.

As I've noted in a previous series of podcasts on YouTube, one of the dirty little secrets the ladies – particularly Black – don't want out in the open, is the long-running "beef" between the varying factions of the BBW community. Part of it does indeed have to do with race, as Ms. Lisa Respers-France recently bemoaned when Ms. Holliday's People magazine cover first made the newsstands; but that is just the tip of the iceberg. There is a not insiginficant portion of larger ladies in BBW discussion spaces and venues online (and off!) who feel that the "pretty big girls" – those like a Tess Holliday, a Sofia Rose (fashion model/pornstar), a Rosie Mercado or the late Mia Amber Davis – all women who definitely would fit, pardon the pun, the technical description of "BBW", but who still meet enough of the conventional beauty standards (waist to hip ratio, i.e., "hourglass" figure; lots of cleavage/big bustline; conventionally pretty faces; longer hair, lighter complexions, etc.) – are taking all of the air out of the room when it comes to the idea of challenging conventional standards of beauty and attractiveness – that in truth, they do more harm than good for the "Beautiful At All Sizes" movement, because their "offsets" acts to put the overall issue of size/fat acceptance to sleep. After all, a pretty faced woman is a pretty faced woman, regardless of her dress size – right?

Right?

Let's compare and contrast, shall we? I'm going to ask all the men – especially Black – out there, if you had to choose which lady you'd like to be with for the evening, based on nothing more than appearance, would you choose:

1. Tess Holliday

OR

1. Brittney Cooper

Both ladies are roughly equivalent in terms of height, weight and dress size, give or take. Both would definitely be considered "BBWs", if not more, right? And yes, one is Black – Cooper – while the other is white – Holliday. Granted.

But, race aside for a moment, is anyone here going to seriously argue that there isn't a heck of a lot of difference between these two ladies?

Really?

Look, I ain't even gonna front – if I have to choose between Tess or Brittney for the evening, I'm taking Tess in a New York nanosecond, bang, there it is.

Who would you pick, fellas? Tell the truth and shame the devil, now.

The Delicious Irony Of The "Big & Beautiful" Movement – Among Other Things

As I was reading the coverage, ahem, of Ms. Holliday's most recent exploits, I couldn't help but notice all of the ironies, the paradoxes, the contradictions that her very presence in this time, brings bubbling to the surface. As Ms. Amy Otto of the Federalist recently discussed on a closely-related topic and which I developed further in a piece of mine on Prof. Cooper herself, there very much seems to be a desire to, on the one hand, cajole society at large into accepting women who fall a bit off the mark when it comes to that which is deemed pretty and attractive; and on the other – as the Protein World "Beach Body" scandal bears out, there seems to be a push to get ALL women to "dumb down" that which is deemed attractive, so that "all" women can be "beautiful". I'll let Ms. Otto tell it:

> "Women engaged in this stampede of weaponized envy are at the root of why women shy away from achievement. The enforced norm in female culture of managing expectations down to the lowest common denominator needs to stop. The fact is, Crawford per this recent photo is still spectacular-looking.
> The sheer desperation displayed during the moment they diminish another woman shows why women still aren't measuring up to men. Men do not spend their days lamenting Brad Pitt's good looks. They accept differences in allocation as the norm. Women often find it easier to avoid building their own capacity and resort to establishing their value by tearing others down.
> It's depressing to watch women regress to redistributive tendencies instead of taking their own initiative to control what they can and let go of what they cannot. There is little value in worrying about what Cindy Crawford looks like, and men as a group seem to largely understand this. Women instead enforce the idea that only "good" woman is one who lowers her expectations to never exceed the lowest common denominator amongst the female population. Remember how a bad photo makes them "love" Crawford more.
> The desperate need to attack accomplished women because they may make other women feel bad about their own accomplishments is a predominately female trait at the crux of what holds women back from assuming a sane and equal partnership in society. Until women are capable of admiring and aspiring towards those who achieve more than they can at that moment, they will remain behind."

This explains why, in part, there is this kneejerk reaction to "respectability politics" among folk like Brittney Cooper, because being respectable takes work – just like looking good does. Yes, Tess is white and yeah, despite her large dress size, she still has a lot going for her, which explains in part why she's getting all the press she's getting right now. Nevertheless, it is plain as day as to the work she puts into her appearance – the meticulous makeup, the coiffed hairstyles, the choices in clothing – and that, as much as anything, is what sets a lot of the Sistahood off. As Ms. Otto rightly points out, it is the tendency and preference, for the Babe Borg Hivemind to denigrate those who put effort into anything, in this case, how they look, rather then bigging them up and aspiring to achieve at least something coming close – to do the best they can, to be the best they can be. As Ms. Otto further points out in her piece, men simply don't spend a lot of time hating on Idris Elba or Brad Pitt – and that has definitely been true for yours truly. I may not have the looks of a George Clooney or a Tom Cruise, but I can work to improve what I DO have, while admiring them both from afar for their achievements and being class acts of human beings in the process.

The other irony that is glaring in the Guardian treament of Ms. Tess Holliday, is her tendency to do what I call a Princess Di Move. The late Royal was, at one time at least, the most photographed woman on the planet and would often use her paparazzi-fueled fame as a sounding board for issues she cared about – land mines and their impact on children in war torn third-world countries, AIDS and so forth; but Lady Diana also tried to engage the public and the press when it suited her, and pulled back or otherwise lament and berate them when it didn't. Human nature aside, the truth of the matter was that Di chose to be in the spotlight; she chose to use that spotlight to her own ends. Yet, she also refused to pay the price of being in said spotlight – which entailed less than flattering media coverage of her life and times.

The exact same thing is seen here with activists of varying stripe like Ms. Holliday; I've experienced it firsthand in my tussles with Ms. Feminista Jones, to name just a few: ladies who feel that the media is their personal sounding board and bullhorn, that the public square is their personal stage and amphitheatre, one in which they simply don't have to deal with, or even engage, those who dare to take a differing point of view to that which they have presented. If ignoring/blocking you doesn't work, they take to trying to shame you, and if that doesn't work, out comes silly and ridiculous charges of "stalking" and the like. These ladies conveniently leave out the fact that they were the ones who chose to make themselves public figures, and, well, there are long established rules for such an undertaking – you take all comers. You can't be strong and independent and brazenly making a statement and striking a blow for all (BBW/"alt") women everywhere on the one hand, and flop all over the fainting couch when the heat is on in reaction to what you've said or done, on the other. Acting in such a manner doesn't acquit feminists well and in fact does more to support the view among many in the Manosphere itself, that a substantial number of women do indeed behave like children, not fully formed adults.

More Ironies Abound

Yet another ironic point in all of this, was something that I noted in my previous piece on Ms. Holliday and the larger, pardon the pun, issue she drew attention to: constrictive or rigid standards of attractiveness. As I pointed out to CNN's Ms. Lisa Respers-France a week ago, while she and other Black women seem hellbent on "challenging" attractiveness standards FOR THEM, they don't seem all that bothered by the fact People magazine hasn't had a Black or other man of color "Sexiest Man Alive!" in nearly two decades, and hasn't had a short-statured one in 25 years – as I make clear in an unpublished comment I left over on Clutch's previous Tess Holliday discussion:

> "Hello ladies,
> The problem I'm having with this discussion is the fact that very often, the very women who bemoan not being held up as a standard of beauty in society often will have no qualms in the least with checking only for the most conventionally attractive of men(!). I've discussed this in more detail in my column today:
> Size Matters: How Tess Holliday Can Usher In A Larger Discussion About Standards Of Attractiveness > http://www.avoiceformen.com/wo…
> For example: using People magazine's "Sexiest Man Alive!" cover issues, I took a look at the past three decades' worth of such men; the results?
> 1. 15 of the 25 men selected/voted were 6′ tall and above (vs. only 15% of the adult American male population being that height)
> 2. Four of the men selected made the Sexiest Man Alive! cover, twice (Brad Pitt, George Clooney, Richard Gere and Johnny Depp)
> 3. ALL of the men selected were in phenomenal shape – no "teddy bears" like Jonah Hill or John Goodman
> 4. Only ONE man of color has EVER made the list in THIRTY YEARS – Denzel Washington, in 1996 – and there hasn't been a man of color to do so since
> 5. Only ONE short man has made the list – Tom Cruise, and that was 25 years ago(!).
> A few weeks back, Clutch magazine covered remarks made by Mr. Eddie Huang and how he was savaged by Black feminists for daring to state the obvious – that out on the open mating market, Asian men are very similar to Black women in that both are seen as less desirable when compared to other demographic groups. People's "Sexiest Man Alive!" list corroborates all that he's said on the male side of things, because no Asian males have ever made the cut.
> In my view, so long as women, in this case Black, are either unable or unwilling to take a long, hard look at their own attractiveness standards when it comes to (Black) men, nothing will really, truly, ever change. And worse, it will only mark them out as entitled hypocrites.
> Mumia Obsidian Ali,
> A Voice For Men"

Hmmm.

Where The Brothas Aren't

Finally, going back now to Ms. Holliday's "Black men like me" remarks – I knew it wouldn't be long before someone trotted out the bugbear known as "street harassment" and connected it to the infamous video made by outrage-outfit Hollaback! NYC last fall; I've treated that particular issue in some detail, as have my good friend and colleague Mr. Rom Wills, so I won't belabor any of that.

What I do want to say this time around however, is to again note the delicious irony of the social justice warriors here – how they're so quick to speak FOR Black men, especially of the variety that makeup the demographics of places like Red Hook, Brooklyn, instead of actually talking TO them. It's why I became a citizen journo in the first place, because it became clear to me that Black men like me – working class, blue collar and salt of the earth – were never going to get a place at the media table to tell our stories and give our take on the issues of the day if we didn't represent for ourselves. More than five years on from making that fateful decision, it's good to see that I continue to be vindicated.

Neither Jezebel, the Root, Clutch or the Guardian, has saw it fit to talk to any Black men about Ms. Holliday's remarks, one way or the other – this, in a age where we are supposed to be about listening to the voices of "others". Hmm.

My personal experience of the so-called SJW crowd has been anything but positive – they seem so self-absorbed in their self-righteous crusades and lecturing of others as to how the world should work, that on the off-chance they actually come across someone like me – you know, who can actually write, think and express himself well beyond the grunts and snorts that are imputed to me and mine – I'm met with what AVfM colleague and social media director Ms. Janet Bloomfield has term "stunned silence". Indeed, we kind of have a running inside joke and bet as to what it will finally take for the SJWs of the world to finally take notice of the "poor little people" like yours truly for a change. And since it has become clear to me that they will never actually sit down with guys like me, I've decided to give Black men like me a voice – hence the recent launching of my YouTube channel featuring, among other things, my daily podcasts, to be coupled very soon with video documentary content depicting everyday Black men speaking in their own voices.

I can just picture all the pearls that will be clutched, right now.

As for Ms Holliday, as the Guardian article makes poignantly clear, she is far from a natural public relations expert and has feet of clay with the best of them. Perhaps this episode will give her a lot to think about before she goes back out into the spotlight to tout her "cause" before the world.

One, can hope…

Willow Domestic Violence Center: Beginning the path to healthy change

June 12, 2015 | by Juan D'Anconia | Link | Original Link

I was initially surprised that the police offered to remove me from my home when my wife became violent toward me. They said that my children would have to remain with the perpetrator. When I asked what would happen if I were the perpetrator, they said that I would then be removed and my children would remain in the home with the victim! Heads you win! Tails I lose!

I went to the probate office of the county court where a wonderful female officer listened to me talk about my problems and helped me fill out a petition for an order of protection against my wife. The woman never told me that I would be treated differently because I was a man. The topic never came up. She was patient as I tried to get the words out.

While she was working on my case, she asked me to sit in a very large waiting room. I looked around and saw women who were filing orders of protection. I was the only man. I felt no shame. I felt pride about being strong enough to protect myself and my children.

I noticed a small room containing an office within the big waiting room. In it were a few women typing at their computer keyboards and answering phones. After a few minutes, a young woman from that small office approached me. She extended her hand and said, “I am here to help you.”

She immediately apologized for the name of her organization, Alternatives for Battered Women (ABW), saying that she and others were trying to get the name changed to properly reflect their clientele which includes men and women. She helped me that day. She sat next to me in court when I was in front of the judge. The order was granted.

Weeks later, I called ABW, saying that I wanted to learn more about their organization, and perhaps volunteer. I met with several of their representatives. First, I praised the woman who helped me in court. At the meeting, they told me that they were going to change their name and asked for my help. They told me that a large fraction of their clientele is male and lives in the suburbs, contrary to the common notion that domestic violence victims suffer at the hands of inner-city deadbeat dads.

I told them the story about the police who wanted to remove me from my home. They said that should have never happened. I told them that they might consider messaging and training for local law enforcement in order to emphasize that domestic violence is usually mutual and when it is unilateral it is twice as likely that the woman is the primary aggressor. I left the meeting with respect for the organization and optimism that their new name would acknowledge the full scope of interpersonal violence.

Ladies and gentleman, please welcome “Willow Domestic Violence Center,” one of a small but growing number of Domestic Violence shelters in the United States that openly serves both men and women:

http://willowcenterny.org/

“Domestic violence knows no boundaries. It affects women and men of all ages, income levels, cultures, religions, races, and sexual orientation—in cities, suburbs, and rural areas.

While the name Alternatives for Battered Women served a specific and important purpose to bring attention to this hidden crime – our mission and our services have evolved.

Everyone has the right to be safe.

Domestic violence is not only physical

Domestic violence is the power and control of one person over another that can be physical, psychological, emotional, verbal, sexual, and/or financial abuse.

We are here for you.

Women, men and their dependent children who are victims of physical, verbal, psychological, sexual, economic, or threatened abuse by the person with whom they live or have lived in the past are candidates for shelter.”/

Congratulate Willow on their new name (info@WillowCenterNY.org). Praise them as being pioneers. Donate to them to show your support.

Let’s hope that other IPV organizations follow suit.

On men, women and victims

There is a part of me that sparks a gag reflex when I think about writing dating advice claptrap. And while I am still not going to sink into such pablum, some responses to a meme I recently made reminded me of a theme I have seen echoed through parts of what some would call the manosphere for years.

The best explanation would be to show you the meme I placed on facebook, highlighting one of the early comments to it:

And now the comment:

> Too bad women have the uncanny ability to completely fake everything about them until they are married. But I like your point.
> Like · Reply · 14 ·

I have heard and seen this sentiment many, many times before. It is, with all respect to the man commenting, what I consider to be a copout on personal accountability.

Before anyone rages, I get it. Women (and men) tend to enter relationships careful to always have their best foot forward. In the honeymoon phase of a new relationship, what you see is almost never what you really get.

I know too that many personality disordered women have especially honed skills at "fooling" their target into thinking they are something they are not. They have refined expertise in figuring out what makes you tick and indeed an uncanny ability to project precisely what they know you want to see and hear.

They are the master of the Love Bomb and will pile on adulation and admiration from the earliest moments in the relationship, almost smothering you in unconditional approval.

So, it is easy to nod my head in agreement with the well-meaning commenter who apparently feels like he is at the mercy of women with ill-intents because he has no way of knowing better.

It is also even easier to not nod my head in agreement because I pretty much think all this is bullshit. It is a copout designed for men to absolve themselves of their responsibilities when choosing women with which they will be vulnerable.

With some rare exceptions, men can screen out high-conflict, high-maintenance, high-frustration and high-danger women with a relatively small amount of consciousness and the willingness to accept responsibility for their own choices.

For some men that means taking a rather bitter dose of medicine in the form of the truth.

One, if you are sucked in by anyone in life saying all the right things at all the right times, you are what carnies call a “mark.” That is the carnival crowd’s term of endearment for a sucker who is just begging to part with his money.

On the heels of that is the reality that what people say is generally meaningless in assessing them as a human being. Sure, some crazies out there can’t talk for more than 30 seconds without revealing a bunting of crimson flags on full display.

Most women who turn out to be bad choices are somewhat more subtle, at least till you have an opportunity to see how they operate when stressed or disappointed.

And there’s the rub. People almost never show you who they are with words. They do it with actions. If you are like so, so many men and you are just listening for the right words and getting all tingly when you hear them, then you are the one with the problem.

I have long suggested that men pick a point early in a relationship to issue a firm NO to something relatively inconsequential that she wants, and then to watch her reaction like it was the most important psychodrama in your life. That is not a stretch because it actually could be. Add a few more years, a few more noes and a lawyer and you have 100% assurance of being in a living hell.

If her reaction is an immature level of disappointment; if she becomes cold and aloof, withholds sex and affection; if she responds with that ubiquitous female “fine” in a tone that promises retribution for not getting her way, then she is showing you everything you need to know.

One step further toward her after a demonstration like that and you have just elected to become the architect of your own misery. Telling yourself you had no way of knowing is a bit of self-delusion most men cannot afford in the long run, though there are millions of men every day who do just that – writing checks with their desire for love and sex which their bodies ultimately cannot cash.

You don’t even need to create a test scenario to find out. Modifying behavior completely, even in the do-good early days of relationship infatuation, is nearly impossible. There are tells in your line of vision at all times.

Does she shower you with buckets of, “You’re the most remarkable man I have ever met,” on the third date? That is not a sign that you have stumbled on Ms. Right. That is a sign that you are walking into a minefield and you need to quickly backtrack out of it.

Is she putting you up as some sort of savior for her physical or emotional life, before she knows how you take your coffee or how you like your eggs cooked? If that is the case, and you are buying it, you might want to consider that the only thing in you gullible enough to fall for it is your ego.

Healthy men don’t just not need a pedestal to stand on, they avoid standing on pedestals like the plague. And they cast a very, very wary eye at anyone who tries to elevate them to that level after spending a collective 8 hours or so getting to know them.

Here’s the deal, guys. Crazy women are NOT that skilled at hiding their crazy. Anyone actually looking for it can see it. In almost all cases it is only hidden from men who refuse to quit wearing blinders. That is the real, and I wager only problem here.

You may point out, and quite correctly, that it is easier to suck in a man who has very damaging and unresolved family of origin issues. It is indeed easier with men who have those problems. They were trained to seek abuse, and they are good at it. Crazy women, the destructive, high-conflict variety, have a great deal of cold empathy and have an expansive set of tools with which to manipulate and control their mark. If the mark has family issues, it paints a bigger target on his back.

The answer to it is just the same as it is for anyone else. Stay out of relationships till you are conscious of how you are manipulated and controlled. Family of origin issues can be very tough and time consuming to fully process, but it does not stop you from taking appropriate action when it is called for. As they say, “Fake it till you make it,” and, “If you bring your mind, your ass will follow.”

Feminism has brought us 50 years of women digging a chasm between themselves and men. Their path is one of mistrust, distance and separatism (except from men’s wallets and the occasional desire for proxy violence). It is an ideology not of healthy bonding between men and women, but rather it is a poisoning of the ground.

Men who believe they are hapless victims of evil women, but who make no effort to screen them out based on character or values, are following right into the feminist mindset of a hostile-dependent relationship with the enemy.

It is the worst model for male-female relations in human history and it thrives because it only demands a victim mentality, fertilized with a lack of agency and accountability.

Is this an endorsement for marriage to “the right woman”? No. Refusing to participate in marriage is wise because it reduces the chances that the state will wind up governing your life, and it removes the temptation for women to play that trump card, no matter how carefully screened, should the opportunity arise.

It still remains that human beings are a pair-bonding species. Marriage or not, most people choose not to fly solo. With that in mind, every human individual has a choice about who they are with. In short, there are no victims, only volunteers.

The more men that understand that the fewer men will end up searching pathetically for help that is most likely not there.

Has Time Magazine libelled AVFM?

Has Time Magazine libelled AVFM?

Recently (May 22, 2015), I posted an article on A Voice for Men. If you have not read this article I recommend that you do so, since it will furnish the necessary back story for the present discussion:

Ramping up the dirty tactics against pro-male activism

My purpose in writing was twofold. First, I wanted to put the journalistic behavior of Time magazine under a microscope. Second, I wanted to provide an object lesson that would be relevant to upcoming stages in the non-feminist political struggle.

While giving the article a post-publication lookover, I became aware of a glaring nuance which had oddly escaped my notice when I first composed the material. To explain what I'm talking about, I must share a passage from a Time article which I quoted originally in my own article:

"This isn't the first time that the victim of the impersonation, Caitlin Roper, had been targeted with fake accounts. She's also been attacked by men's rights groups, including A Voice For Men, for her political and philosophical views. However, it is not clear whether any of them were behind Tuesday's incident."

The present point of interest lies in a comparison of the paragraph's first two sentences. The issue is, in a word, flagrant. I am bloody thick to have missed it the first time around, and were it physically possible to kick myself in the back of the head, I'd be doing so this very minute.

Make careful note of the transition between the first sentence and the second sentence. The first sentence informs us that it wasn't the first time Caitlin Roper had been targeted with fake accounts.

Now, skip ahead to the second sentence. It says, verbatim: "She's also been attacked by men's rights groups, including A Voice for Men…". (The boldface emphasis is my own.)

The carryover is ambiguous, because the second sentence could be interpreted to say that the entities in question had "attacked" Caitlin Roper specifically by using fake profiles, as in the first sentence. But ambiguous or not, there is arguably an arc of meaning here, and I would have to call it a strong connection. The phrase "she's also been attacked" (in the second sentence) points back very naturally to "this isn't the first time" (in the first sentence), as to an antecedent. They establish a paralellism, and seem to entail each other.

At any rate, owing to lack of clarity, an imputation has been planted in the reader's mind — although we might call it an "imputation with plausible deniability". The imputation is, that AVfM has "attacked" Caitlin Roper by use of a fake Twitter account.

The bare possibility that such an imputation was made, even inadvertently, is no light matter. In my opinion, it raises the stakes — both for Time magazine and for the author, Kia Kokalitcheva.

Accordingly, I shall pronounce the question one more time, in the clearest possible English, so that none will mistake my meaning:

Do Time magazine or Kia Kokalitcheva mean to imply, that AVfM has attacked Caitlin Roper by use of a fake Twitter account?

I think that Time magazine owes us a clarification and/or correction here — and likely an apology too. I would say that the buck stops with the editorial team, since they're the ones who let this pass on their watch.

I think the best plan would be to post the needful statement online, and to inform the publishers of AVFM when this has been done. AVFM contact information can be found here:

> Contact Us

In conclusion, I would like this to stand as an object lesson: that it is wrong to use underhanded tricks against non-feminist people, or against non-feminist communities in general.

I would ask all concerned parties to spread this article through Twitter, Facebook, and any other form of online media. When using Twitter, it good to include @TimeMagazine along with any hashtags you deem applicable.

Self-respect isn’t earned, it’s taken

June 13, 2015 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

There is a crisis of self-respect for men in this culture. It also appears anything but coincidence that the men who fail to respect themselves live in a culture where the respect of men in general is at an all-time low.

It is easy to turn the evidence for this into a redundant diatribe, but the facts on the ground are just too compelling to gloss over. Our returning combat vets are dying more from the neglect of the government who sent them into harm’s way than they are from enemy action. Our overall treatment of them would be a national disgrace if enough people respected or even gave a damn about men. Fact is, they don’t.

We have been watching the wholesale demonization of men on college campuses for years now. It is open season on men and their civil liberties in academe, even as the culture yawns in response to each life being destroyed in the name of ideology.

Loving fathers enter our family court system; a system that makes them the default demon, estranges them from their children and saddles them with the financial support of the very person using that corrupt system to destroy them.

Again, from society: Shrug. Whatevs.

The media continues its onslaught of lies about everything male in news and opinion, all of it sandwiched between advertising that paints men as feckless incompetents who could not buy a new Chevrolet or take two Tylenol for a headache without a woman’s guidance.

There is more, much, much more; a mental health industry that actually considers the destruction of men to be good therapy, especially family therapists whose method is to encourage men to live with and tolerate all manner of abuse.

Men who are seeking to improve their self-esteem often pay to have it further damaged by the sick ideologues that permeate the “helping” professions.

It is particularly fortuitous then, that “self-esteem” is largely a joke. It is nothing more than an elusive butterfly, concocted by self-help hucksters and hacks in order to keep people engaged in their services. If they can keep you chasing the promise of something that does not exist in any measurable way they can keep you paying them to find it.

That is the only reason you hear terms like “self-esteem” from mental health professionals, and why you never hear the term “self-respect.”

Self-esteem is how you feel about yourself, which is subject to change at any moment in any person under any number of varying circumstances. It is impossible to measure or quantify which means in many ways that it is an utterly worthless goal unless you are in the business of selling dreams.

Self-respect, on the other hand, is about how you treat yourself and what kind of treatment you will tolerate from others. It is clearly and unmistakably measurable. And more importantly, it is completely attainable regardless of outside influences.

Anyone can clearly see and measure how they are treating themselves and what sort of treatment they tolerate from others. In short, people know when they are being crapped on, and when they are enabling it. Failing to act on that in a self-respectful way falls squarely in the lap of the individual.

Rather than being a disadvantage, that is the trump card in your hand if you are determined to play it. Self-respect is about your behaviors. It is about your choices, and I would wager to say that handing that over to the care of anyone but yourself is one of the poorest choices you can ever make. That does add a degree of difficulty because it puts the responsibility in your lap to get it done. But of course that is true of everything else in life.

That truth leads to an unassailable fact. You can instinctively handle most anything life throws at you if you respect yourself enough to keep your own best interests at the forefront.

In fact, I think it more than fair to say that you could take the average man, put him through a gender studies program, send him through a nightmare marriage with a personality disordered basilisk, take his children and his assets in the divorce and drive his own family and friends to blame him for the entire mess, and his self-respect would still be within relatively easy reach.

If he has the spine to take it.

Having that spine, too, is simply a matter of his choice, far removed from his life circumstances.

Spine is not bestowed or gifted from others. It is not something you earn by graduating from man school. It cannot be located and delivered by a friend, a therapist or clergy. Spine is taken, without compunction or apology, and without hesitation. There is not a man on earth who can't do it, there are just too many who won't.

It should be clarified here that calling on people to find their spine is not a thinly veiled euphemism for "man up." Far from it. Women need spine, too. All humans do. It is undeniably a must in human mental health for all people to have boundaries; to have limits on how they are treated. Not having a spine does not make you less of a man, but it does make you less human and less healthy.

Once a man takes what belongs to him, namely his own spine, the battle is more than half over. Self-respect is a learned behavior. You can learn how to practice self-respect and with practice you only get better, but if you don't go into it with an upright spine you are wasting your time.

A little secret, if you actually do have a good grip on your own spine, your need for someone to show you how to grow and maintain your self-respect will quickly lessen. And your need for useless ideas like self-esteem will simply vanish.

I am not trying to oversimplify. Much of this requires a form of courage most men have had pounded out of them. This is especially true for men who have been taught to disrespect themselves — either from their families or other significant relationships stretching through the span of their lives. Add to that the way society often treats men and you end up with a lack of self-respect in men on a cultural level.

It is still your choice. And it will happen for any man who is willing to turn his back on every situation in life that demeans him. If that means kicking a crazy woman to the curb, then he simply (if not easily) has to choose his self-respect over his fear of loss and/or rejection. He has to let his spine call the shots, and then spine up and take on whatever emotions result from that. When the grief is over, the spine will be stronger, and its value much more appreciated.

For some it may involve rejecting the abusive treatment of a dysfunctional parent or even a dysfunctional child, and rejecting any notion of guilt that goes with it.

Understanding the value of that can be as simple as facing the fact that as a man without self-respect your capacity as a romantic partner, family member, father or son may be far less beneficial to anyone than you mistakenly imagine it to be.

And if we really want to take it into the pain zone, your value to yourself can only be diminished by a lack of self-respect.

Advice is cheap, and easy to give. Nonetheless I am going to offer some here for those who want it.

Your self-respect belongs to you. Take it. You don't need permission or approval and if you are waiting for either of those things you are missing the point. Take it! Wrest it from the hands on anyone else trying to hold it like they were a thief. Rip if from their grip and dare them to try to take it back.

If they try, get them out of your life and don't let them back in till they can pull their head out of their ass and recognize your agency and your humanity.

If you won’t do that, get used to a very sorry lot in life, and living with the knowledge that you have chosen your own misery. I know, this is closing on a cold note.

This website is dedicated to the idea that the truth often has a chilly edge.

The historical role of gynocentrism in societal collapse

June 14, 2015 | by August Løvenskiolds & Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

MGTOW YouTube producer Turd Flinging Monkey (TFM) recently talked about his theory of how historical patriarchies (real ones, not the faux versions feminists are forever whining about) interact with gynocentrism to produce cycles of societal growth and collapse. The theory, referred to as the traditionalism cycle, has appeared in major civilizations. The traditionalism cycle goes something like this:

1. Patriarchal traditionalism →
2. Gynocentric traditionalism →
3. Progressive gynocentrism →
4. Societal collapse →
5. Return to step 1 above.

Here's the video that describes this in more detail.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=vKySNyUWxDA

The "traditionalism theory" is both descriptive of observed historical patterns and makes falsifiable predictions about how wealthy societies will break down over time if they fail to control gynocentric resource demands.

The theory is a reasonable one; societies start with patriarchs (father-elders) as the controlling class, then move through traditional and progressive forms of gynocentrism before collapsing under their own weight – the inability of resource production to keep up with the unchecked demands of an increasingly indolent yet powerful populace. The theory says that gynocentrism escalates with the advent of abundance if abundance exists in a given culture.

What we appreciate about TFM's exposition of his theory is that he did some detailed historical research to back it up – something sorely lacking in the discussion of the roots of gynocentrism. Instead of real research we often see pull-it-out-of-your-ass histories or dismissive appeals to biology – "it's all in the genes."

The irony that "Turd Flinging Monkey" did NOT pull it out of his ass is not lost on us.

The pull-it-out-of-your-ass kind of history is based on half-guesses, ideology and assumptions with little to no evidence – except perhaps references to items like Lysistrata, a play; Helen of Troy, a myth; The "Rule of Thumb" law authorizing standards of domestic violence (which even feminists admit is a complete fabrication), religious tales, fairy tales, and other fantasy sources – i.e. to assume myths and fables mirror real life has marginal utility at best and is often times just crap: have you ever seen a centaur?

Surely the classical depictions of centaurs must have mirrored real creatures and behaviors or they wouldn't have mentioned it?! Any thinking person will recognize the problem; relying on ancient mythologies is akin to having future zoologists base the history of equine evolution on episodes of My Little Pony: Friendship is Magic.

Mythology's chief value is in metaphor: when the goddess Ishtar's love interest Gilgamesh spurns her, she threatens to unleash zombies unless her father punishes Gilgamesh for his impudence. The metaphors seem to boil out of this, the oldest of human stories:

- Women exercise covert, rather than overt, power.
- Spurned women will unleash their fury on the men who spurned them, as well as others.
- Fathers will side with angry, abusive daughters over innocent men.
- Women in power will give power to the dangerous and unproductive.
- Zombies are real!

Some of those metaphors are useful; some not so much.

The same goes for reductive biological explanations. Aside from the laziness of such approaches, the error in over-emphasizing biology is that biology is a product of environmental pressures that can, and do, change over time. Where you see biology you will always see a facilitating environment shaping it. Changes in environmental conditions (like over-population and resource depletion) could eliminate the biological "need" for gynocentrism entirely – wombs lose value when reducing the population is the only viable survival option for a species.

Fortunately, TFM breaks with the catalogue of errors and is trying to keep his analysis fact-based and real.

With that said there are some major, unspoken nuances that should be added to the conversation. The first is that there are degrees of gynocentric culture in both its traditional and progressive forms. Gynocentric societies are not cookie-cutter one-size-fits-all. Like hurricane categories with wind strengths of one to five, gynocentric culture can be imagined in a similar way – as differing in reach and packing winds anywhere from dangerous to destructive to catastrophic.

Like hurricanes, which become more intense depending on a confluence of atmospheric pressure, temperature, humidity, and wind direction, likewise the intensity of a given gynocentric culture rests on multiple factors. TFM has named one of them in his video: abundance.

Abundance is a good start, one that, in isolation from other factors, can definitely lead to a (lets call it) 'category one' gynocentric culture. But as we add more contributing factors the gynocentrism gets more pervasive and more destructive – factors like

- male to female population ratio,
- aristocratic conventions influencing the masses,
- communication technologies,

- reproductive technologies,
- military campaigns,
- foreign threats,
- the strength and structure of cultural narratives perpetuating the sentiment,
- and so on.

As these and many other factors converge the strength of gynocentric culture grows potentially up to a ‘category five’ such as was born in the Middle Ages with the mother of all gynocentric cultures that has spanned over 800 yrs and been exported from Europe to the rest of the world.

Ours.

We don’t intend to give an exhaustive reply here but will end with a general comment about our present culture. At this point the gynocentric culture birthed in medieval Europe is unprecedented in the long path of history – it was only there, and then, that the combination of romantic chivalry and courtly love was born, along with a bunch of other contributing factors that made this gynocentric revolution the mother of them all. But there’s no doubt there have occurred smaller, less intense manifestations of gynocentric culture throughout history along the lines TFM suggests.

Recognizing gynocentrism and how it hurts men, families and society is critical to the process of limiting and perhaps undoing the toll that it takes on everyone.

A version of this essay first appeared on gynocentrism.com.

Transcending the matriarchy

June 15, 2015 | by Stephen Jarosek (aka Codebuster) | Link | Original Link

---

Peter Wright's article Don't just do something, SIT THERE[1] is nicely timed, because the question of being, all-too-often identified with crystal gazers, Mother-Gaia worshippers and astrologists, now has some science behind it to give it cred.

Two threads of research are now converging into a more compelling interpretation for the cognitive sciences:

- Neural plasticity[2] and the role of experience in wiring the brain;
- DNA entanglement (nonlocality).

These are important developments, because the info-tech narrative that depicts the brain as a computer and DNA as analogous to computer software is not how things work in nature. By factoring in neural plasticity and DNA entanglement, however, we have a radically different way of interpreting life processes.

Sol Luckman[3] provides one tidy, if gimmicky, little summary of how our understanding of the workings of DNA has changed over the years. And experimental evidence suggesting DNA entanglement has been around for a while, for example, in the work of Pizzi et al (2004)[4].

[We should note that current narratives in neural plasticity and DNA entanglement are still in their infancy, and taken literally, they do not always concur with this author's own interpretations. Gimmicks, like the Mother-Gaia narrative, are irritatingly persistent and refuse to die… hopefully, introducing these ideas into the manosphere will expand the narrative. Men have always played a fundamental role at the cutting edge of science, maybe we can prove that this remains unchanged]

We can now take being, as described in Peter's article, more seriously. The question of being is not new, of course. It is often raised in different contexts across different cultures. Some of our own greatest philosophers have tackled the phenomenology of being at various times, and they've even given it fancy, proper names, like Dasein. But the life-science informing them was inconsistent with the way things worked in nature. Those of us with our ears to the ground, though, sense that there is now some change afoot.

Factoring in these most recent developments, the essential point about being is that every organism has to learn how to be. It has to experience its world in order to be able to interpret it and respond effectively within its ecosystem. This applies to all living organisms, including the neurons and cells that constitute your brain and body.

The principles of consciousness are simple… they have to be… even though they have not been clearly articulated in the mainstream. No human intervention is required to make consciousness. Consciousness happens all by itself, it's been that way before humans even existed, and it will continue to be that way after we've long gone. By way of analogy, Isaac Newton's laws of physics are also simple, because they have to be, and we can bear witness to these laws in the technologies of our time. In order to accomplish something as compelling for a science of being (life, consciousness) as what Newton provided for physics, we need to establish a couple of assumptions (axioms) first:

● The process of consciousness starts from the moment of conception;

● Experience begins at the moment of conception, such that the neuroplastic brain begins wiring itself up at the moment of conception (there is no genetic blueprint that maps the brain's functional specializations);

● Nonlocality is crucial to explaining the binding problem. It explains how neurons (and other body cells) are entangled into a unity in a manner that is analogous to how people within a city are "entangled" through telecommunications and media.

The modern entangled city, from the perspective of systems theory, is a powerful metaphor for the binding problem. Telecommunications, in effect, simulates the binding problem by connecting everyone into a shared understanding of how to be that is instantaneous (well, almost). Every person is a neuron within a city-brain wiring itself up with cultural experience. And just as humans come in two forms, male and female, so too, the stuff between our ears comes in two forms… neurons and glia. And what might be the mechanism that "binds" neurons/glia? DNA entanglement would seem to be a good place to start looking.

Once we accept nonlocality as the all-pervasive given, the basic processes, based in semiotic theory, make perfect, easy sense (just briefly, semiotic theory relates to the fundamental properties of thought processes for all living entities – motivation, association and habituation). It all revolves around knowing how to be. These semiotic principles apply to all critters, including single cells and neurons. But nonlocality (entanglement, the binding problem) must be assumed to be essential to making it all work… if we can stomach this as an axiomatic given, then all the complexities of consciousness fall out into a much simpler, more logical framework.

WHAT THIS MEANS FOR THE MYTH OF PATRIARCHAL OPPRESSION

It is now well established that, by far, most of a human brain's wiring (its functional specializations) is accomplished within only the first few years of life. These are the years spent under the care of the primary nurturer. It is the primary nurturer, usually the mother, who first defines the things that matter… the things that first wire brains, to set the foundations for all that comes later. Momma knows what she wants her little man to be, and she knows what entitlements her little girl deserves. And whether or not she knows what she is doing (many don't), she plays a direct role in how her dependents read her cues and how they grow up knowing what their place in society is to be. Children first learn how to be from their primary nurturer. It's not rocket science to realize that The Matriarchy establishes the foundations in young minds upon which "The Patriarchy" (whatever feminists imagine that to be) is built.

Taken individually, The Matriarchy wields far greater power than The Patriarchy ever could. There is no such thing as a patriarchy that magically materializes on its own, from a vacuum, independently of The Matriarchy that nurtures and raises it, to then go on to oppress womankind.

Our interpretation provides a very different mechanism for cultural and behavioural inheritance. Of course genes and DNA remain important to all life processes, but the traditional reason for their importance, based in the genocentric paradigm, needs to be dispensed with. Cultural and behavioural inheritance is more likely to proceed along the following lines:

1) Children first learn from their primary nurturer the things that matter. For most children, this is likely to be the mother;

2) Based on the training and rewards that most children receive first from their mothers, boys become men who do women's bidding, while girls become women who, feminist indoctrination notwithstanding, prioritize the raising of children;

3) As children grow into adolescence, the secondary nurturer, mostly the father, also begins to play an important role. For most boys in western culture, the father becomes a role model. In other cultures, at an appropriate time marked as "coming of age," the boys' fathers often remove them from the community and its matriarchal influences, to subject them to initiation rituals that inculcate into them the responsibilities of manhood. For most girls generally, the mother obviously continues to play a crucial role as a role model, but the father also plays an important role that will impact on what she will look for in men;

4) From a broader cultural-evolutionary perspective, how might we best describe the patriarchal role of men? If the matriarchal role of women is to define the things that matter (that we relate ultimately to cultural norms), then the role of men is to redefine and discover new things that matter… these are matters of transcendence, identity, self-reliance and purpose. When feminists assert the matriarchal role to be the more spiritual, as usual, they have no idea what they are talking about;

5) At this point we can begin to understand the source of hypergamy, and why women, so long as they have not been indoctrinated by feminism, were traditionally inclined to look to men as objects of respectability… they wanted to look up to men, they wanted men to initiate, to provide direction. Feminists detest this allocation of gender roles because they rationalize it as a patriarchal plot, a conspiracy to keep women down. They fail to understand that it is almost always the primary nurturer that sets the foundations for this kind of patriarchy narrative, both from the perspective of how she raises her children and the man she chooses to father them with (just to be clear for the knee-jerk crowd… no, we are not advocating for a return to "traditionalism");

6) Boys become men who provide, and girls become women who are provided for (or, in the current affirmative-action zeitgeist, they might work so long as it does not impact too adversely on quality of life). Boys become the actors who first learned from their primary nurturer the visceral rewards that come from being an actor. And girls become the acted-upon, and it was from their primary nurturer that they first learned to expect the entitlements that come from being an acted-upon;

7) Every individual's personality develops with their experiences within culture.

Consistent with pragmatism, culture reaffirms in their mind the things that matter. Their personality becomes a manifestation of cultural personality. They acquire the same accent, the same priorities and motivations and the same fears and aversions that characterize the rest of their culture. Culture plays a central role in every man's and woman's knowing how to be;

8) Rinse, repeat… down on through the millennia, from mother and father to daughter and son.

This is how cultures evolve. Genes and DNA are especially important in biological processes, but they are least directly relevant to the mind-stuff. In this context, gynocentrism is pure mind-stuff… or to put it another way, nurture… the sex differences in behaviour are more accurately interpreted as coming from predispositions that impact on culture and not any kind of genetic blueprint. This explains culture's predisposition to unbridled gynocentrism. This is why the mother's role is not the trivial indulgence that feminists want to portray it to be.

IF MOMMA AIN'T HAPPY, AIN'T NOBODY HAPPY

Feminism's obedient attack-dogs, like Steve Shives[5] or Matt Binder,[6] believe that they have it all sewn up. They can be counted on to respond on cue with the matriarchal indoctrination that they had inculcated into them from their infancy. They know their correct place as white knights saving damsels in distress. Without question, they lay their coats over puddles so that the li'l ladies won't get their dainty feet wet. They have no idea of the matriarchal source that governs their blind obedience to their mistress. They don't remember back when they used to have their cute little noses rubbed into their poo on the carpet, and spanked so that they never do it again. They don't see that the principles that shape their behaviour and their reflexes are exactly the same principles that a lion tamer relies on to tame a lion that first learned obedience to humans as a cub.

We are not bashing mothers here, as dispensing discipline on infants and children is an imperfect science… but we should understand that it will often transition into child abuse. And we are not asking feminism's attack-dogs to defy Momma… but everyone does need to understand where their auto-reflexes to do Momma's bidding first come from. It's an automatic Pavlovian reflex, and not a rational, logical act. So much of what we take for granted – the stuff that disappears into "just the way things are" – has its origins in those first few years of life under matriarchal dominance. That's why child abuse, when Momma does it, so often passes under the radar. The matriarchal influence is so much a part of the neural wiring that we are unable to envisage what the world would be like in the absence of it. It's like a fish, used to spending its whole life in water, having no conception of what "out of water" would be like.

Neural plasticity in conjunction with lived experiences, not "genetic programming," is the key to understanding that what works in training dumb animals for circus acts also works in training dumb males as obedient lap-dogs for The Feminist Matriarchy, or as dumb providers who don't question the provided-fors that spend their money. Feminism's chumps retain no conscious memory of the indoctrination that provides the basis for their subconscious, reflexive motivations. And it's the man-up crowd that are the biggest babies, dedicated as they are to doing women's bidding, that are the least likely to question the basis for their reflexive, gynocentric impulses.

Before anyone can hope to transcend anything, they need to first transcend The Matriarchy.

Bahar Mustafa's misandry: not as ironic as advertised

I remember what it was like to work construction, back before my teaching days when I was trying to offset my college costs. A friend of mine named Daniel, whom I was working with at the time, prided himself on being a smartass.

One day he told me – with his classic mischievous grin – "Isn't it amazing how you can be a total ass to some people, and then simply say 'just kidding' and everything's ok? I mean, you can walk up to a guy and say 'Hey man, your girlfriend and I had a great time in bed yesterday…just kidding!' Or 'dude, I just want to let you know I've always thought you were an idiot…just kidding!'"

Of course, he was making fun of people who basically walk around verbally sucker punching people and then trying to excuse themselves from well-merited retaliation by saying "just kidding."
Something similar could be said of the "ironic misandry" (as feminist Amanda Hess at Slate puts it) of Bahar Mustafa. What is ironic misandry? According to Hess it is:

> a tongue-in-cheek form of discourse favored by the young feminist internet natives. You may have spied them on Twitter or Tumblr, working on their "KILL ALL MEN" cross-stitch or sipping from a mug labeled 'MALE TEARS.' Ironic misandrists say they're poking fun at long-standing stereotypes about militant feminist man-haters.

Feminist Amanda Hess is giving us this definition of "ironic" misandry because she is defending the statements of feminist Bahar Mustafa (pictured above), the recently-elected welfare and diversity officer for Goldsmith University's student union. To kick off a "diversity" event, Mustafa said on Facebook "if you're a man and/or white PLEASE DON'T COME. Don't worry lads we will give you and allies things to do" and posted the above picture of herself next to a picture of a cup that said "male tears."

Mustafa also had an "ironic" feminist tendency of tweeting with the hashtag #killallwhitemen.

We are supposed to believe it "ironic" that a feminist would do such a thing. I must confess, folks, I'm shocked – shocked I tell you – that a feminist would even consider it. If by "consider it" you mean "do it all the time. In case you've forgotten:

> The proportion of men must be reduced to and maintained at approximately 10% of the human race.

That quote comes from feminist professor Sally Gearhart in her article "The Future – If There Is One – Is Female." Quite "ironically," this violence-promoting quote was featured in a later book promoting nonviolence which was titled Reweaving the Web of Life: Feminism and Nonviolence (page 266, if you need it).

Another "ironic" quote:

> I think it's not a bad idea at all. If life is to survive on this planet, there must be a decontamination of the Earth. I think this will be accompanied by an evolutionary process that will result in a drastic reduction of the population of males.

This one comes from Dr. Mary Daly, the professor who segregated and excluded males from her classroom (funny how much of a recurring theme that is lately). This was her response when asked what she thought of the above quote by Dr. Gearhart in an interview by EnlightenNext Magazine.

And isn't it "ironic" that the magazine is called EnglightenNext? Does Dr. Daly seem enlightened to you? She did to a lot of her colleagues.

These are just a sample of statements we have compiled on our compilation page "The Language of Misandry in Academia." We must ask: is it ironic to see such statements coming from feminists? I mean, it's not like they have acquired a reputation for that kind of thing, right?

Where else have we seen the "ironic" misandry of excluding men on the basis of sex? Oh yes – very recently, we saw the poster below at the University of Queensland, courtesy of the "ironic" feminists there:

[image]

Yes, the practice of excluding men here follows the same spirit as that of Bahar Mustafa. "Coincidentally," of course.

Here's another Ironic Feminist™ burning copies of Dr. Christina Hoff-Sommers's The War Against Boys:

[image]

More Ironic Feminism™ can be seen here, courtesy of the UCLA student group Bruin Feminists for Equality:

[image]

This is totally not sexist. In much the same way that it is not racist to walk around asking random black people not to steal.

The below brand of Ironic Feminism™ has been featured at over sixty colleges and universities during mandatory anti-rape orientation for first-year students (in some cases only males were required to attend these):

[image]

What a coincidence – Dr. Keith Edwards (the man above) is a feminist! Here is his article "Why Feminism is in my best interest as a man." How ironic that he would say that!

Did anyone truly find it ironic that feminists presumed the guilt of the men accused of rape during the 2006 Duke lacrosse rape hoax, the 2013 Ohio U rape hoax, and hundreds of others? Did anyone find it "ironic" that, after the UVA / Rolling Stone rape hoax unraveled, feminist Zerlina Maxwell wrote an article for The Washington Post saying that "no matter what" we should automatically believe rape accusers? Here it is:

[image]

Did anyone think it "unexpected" and "out of character" for feminist and mainstream media writer (The Guardian) Jessica Valenti, commenting on that same hoax, to tweet:

[image]

Did anyone seriously not see these kinds of things coming from a feminist? Did it hit anyone out of the blue? Was anyone never informed that feminists have an unfortunate tendency to behave in this way?

No, Amanda Hess – I'm afraid we have seen much "ironic" feminism around here. So much that we have become very well acquainted with it.

Ah, but I must add the disclaimer that no, not all feminists are like that. No, not all feminists are narrow-minded, sexist, humorless troglodytes. In much the same way that not all the grass is green and not all the sky is blue.

Here's what's ironic: today, many advocates of "diversity" in academia have transitioned from a spirit of moral indignation to unvarnished bigotry, justifying their corruption with the notion of "two wrongs make a right…but only when I'm the one doing it." They then rationalize their stranglehold over the conversation on equity and diversity by claiming continuity with a value system that they – more than simply abandoning – have betrayed.

Bahar Mustafa is such a person. And so are the many people that we catalog and call out on this platform.

Over twenty thousand people have signed a petition for Bahar Mustafa to be called to account. It is quite obvious that she lacks the proper fit for her position as welfare and diversity officer. I am not sure if even this many signatures will unseat her, but one thing we can credit this petition with doing is raising the public profile of Mustafa's bigotry.

So what's the takeaway? As I've said before, misandry in academia is not merely a collection of infrequent and disassociated anomalies arising from individuals uninfluenced by supportive or acquiescent peer groups. On the contrary, it is culturally pervasive in academia in a way that cannot be reasonably characterized as incidental or coincidental.

And as I said last time, it's long past time we start opposing it.

Report: Man arrested for standing absolutely still in his own house

Emergency operators in Palm Beach County, Florida received an anonymous phone tip at 7:36 PM the previous evening by a "transitioning squirrelkin" alleging that Ernest Pollock, a 31 year old train conductor, assaulted her.

> I'm up in this tree across the street watching this creepy pervert through his window, and he was standing erect—ERECT for God's sakes—in the middle of his living room eating a big burrito and watching male power fantasies like he wasn't hurting anybody. His… his… rigidity in the face of images of rape and patriarchial norms triggered my PTSD from when I was in sixth grade—an—and-and—an—

The operators disconnected the call after struggling to address the caller, who instead of stating her name on request, started insisting that the operators use "pronouns" consisting of chirping noises. S.W.A.T. troops were dispatched a few hours later when 6 Twitter users claiming to know Ernest heard that he was planning to plant a bomb in a nearby McDonald's visible from his house. The Twitter users all had accounts less than a day old, but each user claimed that they were "afraid to come out uhntil (sic) now."

The "power fantasy" the caller observed Ernest watching was an episode of Californication, a scene of which is shown below outside of badly needed context (NSFW):

Residents in Ernest's quiet suburban neighborhood were deeply disturbed by the incident and his taste in television. During the raid, aspiring actress and neighbor Kimberly Lance yelled this to one of our correspondents on the scene over the sound of a K-9 unit improvising Pollock's circumcision:

> It's absolutely disgusting. How can we stop violence against women so long as men conspire to take advantage of women under the guidance of PUA scum like David Duchovny and his guild of rapists-in-training?

Kimberly is one of many members of the emerging End-it-All Party, which challenges local representatives to combat intimate partner violence. Their advocacy work includes mailing bloody roller pins to the wives of male Florida state senators inscribed with the words "You have the power to stop him," and publicly chopping sausages with meat cleavers to the tune of Fugazi's Suggestion. Kimberly helped draft the party's mission statement, which included "writing new laws uhntil (sic) ignorance and hate are no longer perpetuated by masculine social constructs." Kimberly vowed on record to "take men like Ernest out from their homes so they can no longer hurt innocent bystanders expressing their American right to judge men standing around plotting to oppress women."

One End-it-All volunteer quips "If we stop men while they think the thoughts we think they think, then they can't act the way we are sure they'll act. Sexism is only going to stop when pussy gets proactive.”

Ernest is now facing animal abuse charges for “bleeding excessively into the K-9 unit’s eyes” and one count of disturbing the peace for “all the screaming.”

Coming up next, Hillary Clinton gains strong early approval ratings for the 2016 race by informing the Florida constituency that “wives were the primary victims of dog attacks,” and a Florida teenager discovers a morbidly obese woman wearing “furs, spy shit, and, like, five phones” hiding in a hedge outside of his father’s house.

Anti-rape program cuts campus rape in half by teaching women to say “no,” but the sexual grievance industry says it’s “victim blaming”

June 15, 2015 | by Pierce Harlan | Link | Original Link

A study shows that a program designed to teach college women how to resist unwanted sex almost halved the risk of rape on three college campuses. Here’s how a news report described the program:

> The 12-hour resistance program, conducted in four sessions, taught women how to effectively assess the risk of sexual assault by men they knew, recognize the danger in coercive situations, get past emotional roadblocks to resist unwanted sexual behaviors and practice verbally resisting the behavior or actions. The program also spent two hours teaching self-defense strategies and included several hours bringing all the instruction together in a session on safe sex practices and effective communication about sex.

The overriding theme of the new program is to teach college women to just say “no.”

But that’s a big problem for the usual suspects. Kathleen Basile, a lead behavioral scientist in the division of violence prevention at the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, said this: “The main problem with a preventive approach that is focused on potential victims of sexual assault is that it puts the responsibility for preventing the assault on the potential victim, and does not acknowledge the role that potential perpetrators and the larger community play.” Basile said that the most pervasive myth about sexual assault is that victims bear some of the blame because of how they dressed, what they drank or some other way they put themselves at risk. “Sexual violence is never a victim’s fault,” she said.

Here we go again.

In this new program, no one is “blaming” women for being raped, and no one is giving license to the sociopaths who rape. The new program is designed to help women protect themselves from sociopaths, but extremists in the sexual grievance industry would prefer to withhold that protection in order to conform to some radical feminist orthodoxy. If we took a poll, I would bet that the vast majority of Americans would agree the extremists’ position is loony.

Put aside the usual caterwauling about “victim blaming,” the new program is disturbing in one very important sense: since women are able to half the number of “rapes” by learning to say no, this suggests that significant numbers of college men are being held responsible for sexual misconduct even though their “victims” have reasonable alternatives to engaging in the sex act but don’t exercise them. These men are not overcoming their “victims” with force despite their protests. They are stopping when their “victims” tell them they don’t want to have sex. In other words, a lot of men are being held responsible for “rape” that isn’t really rape.

What they really need to teach young women, and young men, is about the regret asymmetry that separates young men and women when it comes to sex.

California assemblyman sponsors three new college related sexual assault bills

June 16, 2015 | by Michael Conzachi | Link | Original Link

California Assemblyman Das Williams, (D) Carpenteria, has authored and sponsored three bills touted as the "College Campus Sexual Assault Legislative Package, Assembly Bills, 967, 968, and 969. The proposals have received widespread support thus far in the legislature, and most likely will pass in the near future.

These proposals were touted in an article in Time Magazine http://time.com/3910602/campus-rape-sexual-assault-california-law/ which prominently portrays a picture of–you guessed it1 Mattress Girl Emma Sulkowicz, the now Columbia graduate who toted around a mattress in protest of Columbia not expelling her rapist. The only problem of course is that the rape never happened, and readers to this site are fully aware of that entire circus. Sulkowicz's mattress toting bordered on pathology yet she was an invited and honored special guest by the equally pathological Senator Kristen Gillibrand to the State of the Union Address.

In one brief dissent of logic and sanity of the Bill was a statement from Republican Assemblywoman Shannon Grove, one of the four lawmakers who voted against the bill.

"Those committing sexual assault within our college campuses should be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law by our judicial system, not at a campus disciplinary proceeding. "College administrators should not be conducting criminal trials for serious crimes and our state legislature should not mandate punishments at these quasi- judicial hearings."

Duh! Haven't tons of advocates, college law professors, attorneys, law enforcement professionals and some journalists been saying the same thing? Hellllllloooooo!!!!! Hey,,,,, politicians,,,,, is there anyone home upstairs???

Let's take a brief look at what these bills propose.

AB 967 – Requires college campuses to establish a minimum of a two year suspension up to expulsion if an individual is found guilty of a sexual offense. It also requires colleges to report and disclose adjudication outcomes for sexual assault offenses.

Notes: The Bill proposes the elimination of special status of a student in determination hearings, such as a member of an athletic team.

AB 968 – Requires the college academic transcripts to include a notation to indicate on a student's transcripts when the student is ineligible to reenroll due to a suspension or expulsion.

Notes: The Bill provides additional clarity to protect colleges from civil liability when denying re-enrollment, and does necessarily require a finding of guilt, just a suspension.

AB 969 – Clarifies existing law to allow community colleges to suspend or expel a student for conduct that threatened the safety of students or the public that occurs off campus.

The bill would also require prospective students to disclose in any application process for any college, if they dismissed from a college for campus sexual assault. Colleges would be have to allow a prospective student a hearing before being enrolled, if they were previously dismissed from a college for a sexual assault.

Notes: The Bill proposal makes it mandatory for students to declare prior suspensions or expulsions including if they are currently in the adjudication process, prior to being allowed entry into the new college. This allows for the free flowing of information between colleges to determine eligibility to enroll and relieves the institution from civil liability if they deny to hold a hearing to an applicant student.

On the surface, these Bill proposals seem to clarify and establish uniform standards for the handling of sexual assault related violations as well as other crimes that may be of concern to the safety of students and staff. From a common sense perspective, these proposals seem logical and well intentioned to allow for a safe campus environment.

We all know however, how these things morph from something entirely different from the original legislative intent.

In looking at the fine print of the Bill proposals, there are some glaring problems, omissions, and obvious inconsistencies that could follow student for the rest of his or her life.

Money – $$$ – in each of the proposals, there is language allowing for the schools to receive state financial assistance if they comply with all of the rules, and the implementation of additional bureaucracies.

False allegations – NONE of the proposals indicate any type of sanction for the false reporting of a sexual assault or related crime, and none allow for any type of notation on transcripts for the false reporting of a crime or sexual assault.

Preponderance of evidence – None of the proposals reveal, or would indicate that a suspension or expulsion came about as a result of a preponderance of the evidence of a sexual assault or related offense. Most people and prospective employers are completely unaware of just how easily a college male can be railroaded in a college tribunal.

Self-admission – The proposals force students to declare, when applying to new colleges if they had been suspended or expelled due to a safety or sex related violation.

Transcripts – Any student, male or female, would take into their life; their entire life, college transcripts with a notation that they had been suspended or expelled due to a sex related violation. There is no language indicating that a college must remove any such notations if the allegations were later proved to be false or unfounded. Imagine applying for a job and having to supply your college transcripts that indicate a suspension for a sex related offense that was later proved false, then having to explain that to a prospective employer?

Liability – There is significant language that protects the educational institution from civil liability if they deny enrollment or entry to a student upon learning that the student had been previously suspended or expelled from another campus for a sex related violation.

Essentially, and in realistic terms means that in order to protect themselves from civil liability, there will be no college in the land that will allow for a student to attend their campus if they had been previously suspended for a sex related offense.

Future college admissions – any future college admission or attempted transfer to another school will be affected. In legitimate cases, this is a good idea, however the new college, upon learning of a prior suspension for any type of sex offense, will most likely deny admission to limit the possibility of civil liability; meaning any future college attendance will be non-existent. We have all seen the inept and constitutionally defective college kangaroo court process and the future of a student that depends on a group of ideological circus clowns, is abhorrent.

We have all seen how the college campus adjudication process has been an abject failure when handling alleged cases of sexual assault, and how the most simple and innocent of behaviors falls under the umbrella of sexual assault violations. We have also seen the implementation of affirmative consent, and how one minor misstep in any intimate setting, any misstep in communication, any misstep in receiving enthusiastic consent will and shall be labeled a sexual assault.

To further validate just how absurd the lunacy has gotten with respect to any kind of intimate contact, the well-respected the prestigious (allegedly) American Law Institute has recently proposed a model domestic violence penal code that would criminalize a man on a date who innocently reaches out to hold the hands of his date without her prior permission. http://www.ali.org/index.cfm?fuseaction=projects.proj_ip&projectid=26 Image, after a nice evening dinner date and movie, a couple happily walking on a pier in anywhere USA and the man reaches out and innocently holds the hand of his female date, risks criminal sanction, if this absurd suggestion ever becomes law.

We are seeing more and more legislation, more and more policies, more and more awareness programs and information campaigns that essentially will seek to criminalize and sanction any type of routine and intimate contact between men and women on a college campus. Virtually all of these programs however place the responsibility and fault on males. To say that this is an understatement, would in fact be an understatement since the inception of language in man; since the times when primitive man began communicating with one another by grunting and banging rocks together.

Common sense, sound logic, science, fact, rule of law and due process should be the prevailing factors in the drafting of legislative proposals, not emotion, hysterics, ideology, and what this seems to reveal; pathology.

Readers are encouraged to contact Assemblyman Das Williams to either abandon this legislation as colleges are ill equipped to handle cases of sexual assault or to include in the list of violations, the false reporting of a sexual assault.

Black men and men's rights: where do we fit?

June 16, 2015 | by Dre Morell | Link | Original Link

There was a time not so long ago when the very idea of a "Men's Right's Movement" was completely laughable and deemed unnecessary. A few years ago before my own awakening I would've agreed with that in the early 2000s. But as I have grown from a boy into a man I have come to see quite distinctly there are concerns that the world seemingly has fallen for political lie of Feminism in that it cares about the concerns and welfare of men. If we are going to be a legitimate "Men's Movement" then we are going to have to confront and deal with issues that affect all men, and we cannot deal with issues that affect all men if we try and skirt around what affects minority men of color.

Already, I am calculating in my head the sneers, jeers, eye-rolling and accusations that I am playing the race card, race-baiting, being a race hustler, etc. Already I am reading the comments and I anticipate being accused of racism merely because I am willing here and now to try and broach the subject itself. Already I see those in denial that it's 2015, this should be over already. I already see comments that racism will only go away if we stop talking about it, and finally I see comments saying "but we are a small movement, we have no time to address these concerns and we can't focus on those issues".

Well let me inform you, gentleman and ladies, feminists – more or less the loyal opposition – do exactly the same thing when this topic comes up. There is the same level of denial and inaction to address or do something meaningful about race. One of the ways to do that is not to exploit race for mere political gain, but by showing deep compassion and concern for men of color in our movement. When you think about the issues that specifically affect men of color, you have a good deal of material to work with in the first place. If you wanna talk recent history, the new "manspreading" rules by the MTA in NYC, those first two men arrested were Latino. This ties directly into the corrupt criminal justice system that disproportionately affects men and men of color, and this campaign came at the heels from whom? Feminists, who couldn't be bothered to ask a man to simply move over on a crowded subway and instead snapped pictures of unsuspecting men in public about how they sit and complained. Never mind about women doing the same thing and taken up seats with their bags cause "equality". This is just one example showcasing how the feminist movement is no ally to men of color, since they directly contributed to a policy that will target men of color disproportionately as a result.

Wanna talk incarceration period? We know we have more men than women in jail. We know most of those men are men of color. Imagine if we were to come out against the drug war? Think about it. Men sell drugs for what purpose? Money. So here you have men, largely affected by a world in which their skills are of no use, but still expected to bear the brunt of financial responsibility. A world where these men are expected to excel in an education system largely beneficial to females, and where unruly males are placed on psychoactive drugs and written off as troublemakers. They drop out of school yet need income. No GED, no HS Diploma, and gone are the factory jobs where a man could support himself decently and respectfully. So he sells drugs, ends up in the prison industrial complex, and once out will not be eligible for a job as a result of having a record. We failed him the moment he entered kindergarten. And most of these men affected are? Surprise, surprise….men of color.

Lifespans, education level, income inequality, criminal justice, prison reform, divorce court, child support….all have had not just devastating impacts on men, but men of color more disproportionately.

But in order to get here we have to come to an understanding and get to the point that when race comes up it is not about "guilting" white people. Yet you can't pretend that being white, in America, has not been beneficial. There is not a single measurable statistic that is going to truly show otherwise. It's also not about your personal views on race, race relations, your experiences, or how your family came here with nothing.

It's about acknowledging there are collective differences in treatment and benefits based on skin color. There isn't a person of color that does not wish this wasn't the case. I've been Black a long time and I can assure you none of us start our day hoping to get profiled, stopped and frisked and having our constitutional rights violated. We don't enjoy stepping onto an elevator with a white woman and them automatically having that woman assume we are going to rob them or "fitting" the often times very vague and coincidental description of known criminals.

If we work together to fix the issues men of color deal with, that is addressing a Men's Rights Issue. That attracts more men, that gives us more appeal, with each step we become closer to truly unifying and becoming a beacon to attract more men, not an alarm telling other men, certain men to stay away.

We don't have to agree on every single little thing but as men we have to be able to speak honestly, YET RESPECTFULLY at the same time and work to address issues of concern.

I am not here to guilt you in so much as point out every time someone tosses around the term "race card" or "race baiter" you ain't helping the dialogue. If you disagree fine, we are men, we're gonna disagree, I expect it…..how you express that disagreement matters. The media showcases us as a movement for white men only and if you refuse to discuss race, then congrats, you're just giving feminists the ammunition they need to label the movement as right-wing anti-minority. Feminists have a long history of shutting out and exploiting women of color, and do we really want to be like feminists? Caring about issues people of color have only in name, but nothing substantive?

This is a real chance do something Feminists seemingly are incapable of, or unwilling to do: address the concerns of all men and really give a shit.

We should listen, take in, ask questions, think about it, research, respond and then try to solve and work through disagreement …….T-O-G-E-T-H-E-R.

In the recent videos on "catcalling", who was largely showcased in that? Men of color. A behavior many men participate in, but who was made to look like the villain? Black and Latino men. Why? Because feminists are not inclusive, they are largely upper middle class white women caring only about their own gains of power.

If we men of color are truly your brother in arms, when we tell you “this is a problem” you do not help your brother by telling him “tough shit and to let it go”…..you ask him, who is fucking with you and point them out so we can get the sons-of-bitches together. That’s what family does, that’s what unity does. Because if the Men’s Right Movement as a whole keeps ignoring the issues men of color have it will collapse and be forever cast into the fires of a perception it doesn’t want and won’t be able to survive as America moves to a more racially multi-faceted place. So let’s be ahead of the curve here for a change?

It is time to take the next step and have a Men’s Rights Movement that addresses the issues of every man affected and deals with them in a real, meaningful way. No one is asking to devote all resources and time solely into issues that affect men of color, but understand they do affect men of color more in some aspects and to speak to it.

In doing so, you will be speaking to the larger system of oppression against men in general.

On Circumcision: Hidden Harm

June 16, 2015 | by Frank Lin | Link | Original Link

Circumcision can be a very personal topic, and while it stirs some powerful emotions, it's important to discuss. It can be difficult for a circumcised man to come to terms with the horror that he's the victim of something utterly beyond his control, and it can be easier to for him to say that he's not a victim at all, and search to justify why genital cutting of infant males is a reasonable practice in the 21st century. What I would ask is to think forward, and to consider the well-being of future generations of infant boys being brought into the world, and their futures lives as adult men.

Male circumcision bestows no hygienic benefits that can't already be attained by the use of soap and water. And parents should not be in the business of making aesthetic considerations of an infant's penis.

But what bothers me the most is the psychological barbarity of the practice. Days after an infant boy is born, while his mind is just beginning to make sense of the world he's been brought into, and his role in it, here at the crucial early stages of his life where his deepest sub-conscious drives are being organized, he is being told in no uncertain terms that his body is someone else's property, and his lot in life is suffering, and he had better get used to it. No one cares if you cry, young one, you have a job to do, and that job is to absorb pain.

While I speculate on the mental mechanics in play, research "by Dan Bollinger and Robert S. Van Howe, M.D., M.S., FAAP, found that circumcised men are 60% more likely to suffer from alexithymia, the inability to process emotions." From the link:

> People suffering from alexithymia have difficulty identifying and expressing their emotions. This translates into not being able to empathize with others. Sufferers of severe alexithymia are so removed from their feelings that they view themselves as being robots. If acquired at an early age, such as from infant circumcision, it might limit access to language and impede the socialization process that begins early in life. Moderate to high alexithymia can interfere with personal relationships and hinder psychotherapy. Impulsive behavior is a key symptom of alexithymia, and impulsivity is a precursor to violence.

So when people say circumcision isn't so bad because it happens at such a young age that the baby forgets the painful memories, I feel a deep sense of horror. At least with a traumatic memory, therapy, meditation, and introspection help you learn how that memory affects your perceptions of the world and your patterns of behavior in it. And being conscious of those perceptions and behaviors you can make choices about mitigating their most harmful effects. But if the memory is stored as a deep physical sensation at the bottom of your sub-conscious mind, locked away at the sub-basement machine code level of human awareness, reachable (if at all) only through the most soul-piercingly powerful and doggedly pursued meditation practices, it may remain forever

I for one think it’s terribly cruel to inflict that kind of harm on a person, the kind of harm that changes your perceptions of the world without you ever being able to do anything about it. And if you still think that forgotten memories excuse barbarity, then you can justify any crime against a child, as long as he or she is young enough to forget how evil you are.

So you see, its not just about how the victim’s mind is conditioned, but also about the parents’ minds as well. And yours. We should not be nurturing callousness towards pain. The great chicken-and-egg question with men’s issues deals with men not speaking out, and society not listening. I believe one place where we can begin to slow down this cycle is by banning the practice of circumcision, so maybe, just maybe, there might be fewer men who never question the sources of their pain, and more people who are willing to listen when they do.

Those of us in the men’s rights world sometimes give short shrift to the term “micro-aggression,” but in the case of circumcision, I think it applies. We are, after all, talking about a small cut that inflicts permanent physical and psychological damage, effects perceptions, and alters behaviors. Perhaps the next next time our philosophical opponents lecture us about the evils of manspreading, we should thank them for their interest in our crotches, and direct them towards the more substantive issue of male genital cutting.

For further insight on the topic, here’s a pediatrician moved by integrity activists:

Treating anxiety with a new narrative

June 17, 2015 | by Peter Wright & Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Anxiety may be the most pervasive "psychiatric" problem in the world. All the more interesting, then, that it is a problem with so little general attention in the media and the medical establishment.

The symptoms can be a mildly annoying, with the occasional and temporary sense of unrest and unease. The reasons for it happening maybe quite obvious at the time. Then again, it can appear to come straight out of the blue. It can come or go without visible "triggers," like high-stress events.

In more extreme, but very common incidents of the disorder, the symptoms can be life-diminshing, horrific experiences. Full blown anxiety attacks, commonly known as "panic attacks" include tachycardia (rapid, runaway pulse), sweating palms, frightening disorientation, an overwhelming sense of impending death or doom and crippling levels of fear that last anywhere from minutes to hours.

Even when the sufferer knows the events are not lethal; even after experiencing them hundreds of times, it does not put the sufferer at ease during an attack. Each one is as bad as the last. It can become a living hell in which the sufferer feels like a ticking time bomb in between debilitating attacks.

The Latin root of anxiety is angere which means to choke, squeeze or compress tightly. That's what happens to our bodies when anxiety hits – our chest muscles seize up and breathing tightens. Our neck constricts and creates a lump in the throat. We choke on the words, can't get them out. Lips, face, hands, legs stiffen and make it hard to move, and our blood vessels constrict to create tension headaches. It's as if we are caught by a giant who squashes us in his fist.

Anxiety disorders are the most common of all psychiatric complaints, appearing at twice the rate of mood disorders such as depression and bipolar illness.[1] Anxiety is characterized by:

a. bodily symptoms of tension, racing heart, shakiness or sweating.

b. state of uneasiness, nervousness, dread, distress, fear, panic and in extreme cases terror.

c. apprehension about failure, misfortune or danger.[2]

Anxiety also colors the way we think, feel and act. "It is a petty monster," writes author Daniel Smith "able to work such humdrum tricks as paralyzing you over your salad, convincing you that a choice between blue cheese and vinaigrette is as dire as that between life and death."[3]

Numerous forms exist, including generalized anxiety disorder (GAD), social anxiety disorder, separation anxiety disorder, performance anxiety, stranger anxiety, agoraphobia, post-traumatic stress disorder, obsessive–compulsive disorder, situational anxiety, phobias and panic disorder to name but a few. Each has its own peculiarities and triggers (though they may be very difficult to identify), and each requires a different approach to understand and manage it.

With so many anxiety disorders, we will limit ourselves to a category affecting men, one that you won't find mentioned in the textbooks on therapists desks.

The anxiety disorder with no name

In the past, psychologists have spoken of 'performance anxiety' and 'castration anxiety' as ways to understand men, but these terms do not go near far enough. Men's anxieties are born of far broader concerns than having a metaphorical (or real) penis chopped off.

The cause of men's anxiety, in this case, is the the entire misandric culture they must daily rise from bed to face. Most men will be unaware of this as facing and dealing with misandric pressures is socially forbidden and often sequestered behind a wall of denial. It's the culture itself that demands they perform, be in service, be under constant scrutiny and suspicion for wrongdoings, and one that will penalize them if they step out of line.

In that sense, men's denial of that anxiety is a survival mechanism.

As a man in this world, if you are NOT anxious then there is either something terribly wrong with you or you are one of the lucky few who has unlocked the answers to this problem.

All men (and boys) are under assault from social forces and the resultant anxiety is a natural response. These forces berate you every minute about your supposed violent tendencies, about rape culture, child maintenance, alimony and manning up for women. All of this punishes you with the stress of failure or the stress of disobedience. The whole society you live in colludes to keep you silent about all of it.

So let's talk about it. In fact, lets also give it a name – Misandric Culture Anxiety (MCA). To be perfectly blunt, we are asserting that the modern male gender role and the unattainable demands it places on boys and men in misandric culture causes mental illness in men.

Among the many causes of anxiety, MCA is one of the big ones. And if you happen to have another underlying anxiety disorder, MCA will exacerbate it. If you have social phobias, MCA will make you even more nervous about mixing with other people.

If you take Valium or alprazolam (Xanax) for generalized anxiety disorder, the added load of MCA will tempt you to unilaterally increase your dose. This is highly dangerous in terms of tolerance and addiction. Both Valium and Xanax are benzodiazepines which can have bad synergistic side effects with alcohol and which can both result in dangerous withdrawal symptoms from high doses over a prolonged period of time. Actually, withdrawal from these drugs can possibly kill you.

The other problem, even aside from MCA, is that of tolerance. Like most other drugs, tolerance develops and higher doses are needed for the same therapeutic benefit. While they may provide short term solutions, these psychoactive drugs are a treatment that can easily become worse than the problem they are treating.

While anxiety attacks may have very obscure triggers, reducing the overall exposure and impact of MCA on our lives can reduce the stress and anxiety that comes with it. Before touching on ways to do that, lets first have a look at the way men have traditionally dealt with it – by self-medicating, often destructively, as a way of reducing the choke-hold of anxiety.

Is it any wonder men drink more alcohol?

How many times are cocktails after work to "de-stress" actually just a form of self-medication for anxiety? How much of that becomes problem drinking because of tolerance? How many other drugs, particularly benzodiazepines, are combined with alcohol or otherwise abused to provide more synergistic effect on the anxiety?

Anxiety can be difficult to treat. There are no magic cures and the many manifestations of anxiety require varied responses. However, there are general strategies that can, for many men, reduce anxiety and with it the need to self-medicate. The first thing to investigate is potential or known triggers, a no-brainer, but in this model it is done in conjunction with assessing the self-narratives that might be needlessly, pointlessly placing you in front of those triggers. If for instance your anxiety is triggered by a desire to provide for a woman, creating anxiety lest you fall short or fail in your "duty," then you need to rewrite that narrative with one that changes your behavior and attitudes.

If you can't pinpoint the triggers, or they are ones you can't avoid, there are still ways to reduce the intensity of your anxiety. Neurofeedback treatments, along with efforts to monitor your body's emotional arousal will help you better detect anxiety levels and apply strategies to regulate their intensity. But first you have to agree to pay attention to your own needs and well-being – something many men have a hard time doing.

Meditation, breathing control, exercise, reducing caffeine (and other stimulants) can also help. Even some forms of cannibis are now demonstrating anxiolytic effects, though regarding that as a singular approach is something we deem to be unwise. Drugs that mask problems, even non addictive ones, do not ultimately lead to addressing the root causes of the problem.

In some people, anxiety can be more or less "cured," yet in others its symptoms can be made much more manageable. As always, the dedication and determination of the sufferer will have the greatest impact on results.

It is a complicated subject which we will be handling in a series of articles in the future which are focused on solutions.

One thing is certain, at least in our opinion. Any efforts to address anxiety issues in men without an intense focus on narrative reconstruction are substandard. If you want to reduce anxiety, you must change the expectations you place on yourself which produce it in the first place. You will also need to withdraw permission from the people in your circles, and society at large, to burden you with their expectations.

Starting a MGTOW nation – a response

June 17, 2015 | by Lucian Vâlsan | Link | Original Link

> "There are no solutions – only trade-offs. You can make some things better by making some other things a little worse and sometimes you can make some things a little better by making some other things a lot worse." – Thomas Sowell

On June 8, Mr. Frank Worley penned a column on this publication in which he laid out a plan to start what he calls "a MGTOW nation" in the current US Commonwealth territory of Puerto Rico.

Incidentally, I'm probably on the same page with Mr. Worley on 90% of the issues (most likely even more), and yet I still think his approach is unattainable. So in this article I'll try to explain why and, since I'm not a follower of Critical Theory, I'll also provide two alternatives that make more sense for someone wanting to take radical action.

Fair warning: This will be long.

The main flaw in Mr. Worley's plan is that it doesn't account for one simple truth: gynocentrism is a given. It's not going to go away – not now, not ever.

Human nature is flawed – and gynocentrism is one of those flaws. So the question arises on how to erect institutions that constrain those flaws. And herein lies the second flaw in Mr. Worley's plan – it never answers to the question and then what? Allow me to elaborate.

Throughout the plan there is an implied view that if we just get the right people in power in the area to-be-turned into a micronation, everything will be just fine. This is essentially what Thomas Sowell calls the unconstrained vision of man in his seminal work A Conflict of Visions.

The unconstrained view is the view that man is fundamentally good and it's solely the institutions that cause harm. As such, the unconstrained vision goes, one only needs to put the right people in the right institutions and a far superiour society (if not an outright utopia) would emerge.

The constrained vision of man, on the other hand, acknowledges right from the get go that human nature is flawed. As such, the constrained vision views power, any kind of power, with suspicion and purports to erect institutions meant to dilute and diffuse the power as much as possible. Lord Acton's Power tends to corrupt, and absolute power corrupts absolutely – is a great illustration of the constrained vision of man.

Mr. Worley's proposal seems to adhere largely to the unconstrained vision of man. One such example of this adherence is in this paragraph:

> It also requires that mother's pay the exact same percentage of child support to the fathers, during the time the children are with the fathers which should be 6 months out of every year.

Such an approach lacks any proper nuance. What happens if both parents stop working (and thus can't afford the reciprocal constitutional child support)? Send them both to jail?

Also, believe it or not, there are countless couples in the US and worldwide who are more than happy with unequal arrangements. Divorce was very rare when I was growing up, but I had a classmate whose parents were divorced but got along very well. She (the classmate) was spending 9 months a year with her father with the mother only visiting once in a while – and then three months in a row (usually in the summer) with the mother. Such an arrangement would be unconstitutional in Mr. Worley's MGTOW nation, even though it satisfied both of the parents and the kid.

A constrained vision would seek to disincentivise divorce through courts. And the model already exists in most of Eastern Europe, most of Scandinavia (except Sweden), the Netherlands and a few other places.

In my neck of the woods, no matter how much the ex-spouses hate each other, they both hate the Court even more because it's slow and largely inefficient (like any proper State bureaucracy). As such, incentives to work things out through private arbiters (mediators) are high and this cuts back quite a lot from the divorce rape that can be seen in the Anglosphere.

As a general point, for a MGTOW nation, there is quite a lot of attention given to family law. But MGTOWs as a rule don't seek to get married. As such, the target demographic to me looks more like being geared towards already divorced men and second-wives who get harmed indirectly by the misandric practices of the current US family courts system – and less towards MGTOWs per se. But I digress.

But perhaps the most open adherence to the unconstrained vision of man comes at the beginning:

> While the source of our oppression comes from women in general and feminism more specifically; it is the state that is our greatest enemy. The entrenched forces of Marxist Feminism and the cowardly politicians who cater to them, have taken all that is worthwhile from these once great and free nations.

For starters, there is no such thing as "once great and free nations" – and that is because there are no perfect solutions, but merely trade-offs. Was the US that imprisoned people for public statements against war a freer nation than 2015 US? Was the 1950s US when any message had to be de facto pre-approved by the Cathedral media which acted as gatekeepers of large audiences freer than 2015 US when we literally are the media?

The US (and the world in general) has gotten freer in some respects and less free in other respects. Whether the trade-offs balance each other out is up for discussion but the quote above lacks any kind of perspective.

Secondly, Marxist-Feminism is a symptom of the human flaw of gynocentrism. And the symptom emerged the moment societies started to abandon the constrained vision of man and gradually moved towards an unconstrained vision. And this shift happened in peacetime. You'll notice there is no Marxist-Feminism during wartime.

Thirdly, the politicians aren't cowards – they just follow (like everyone else) their own self-interest on the short run. The politician's primary interest is to get votes and keep his/her cushy job with all the perks, privileges, benefits and entitlements that come with that job. And precisely because gynocentrism exists, there are thus inherent incentives to pander to women.

It therefore follows from these facts that Mr. Worley's nation would be subjected to the same gynocentric incentives as anyone else. Sure, one could argue that the first (or even the first three) generation of citizens won't fall prey to these. But sooner or later, it would still happen if the legal system is similar (and it is, in Mr. Worley's proposal).

And then what?

Whenever a plan for building anything that is meant to last is being put forth, the next logical question is and then what? What happens after the nation has been established?

Suppose one gathers the 25,000 voters needed and establishes the nation, just like Mr. Worley says. Okay, then what?

Mr. Worley tells us that "[i]f the petition for independence was denied by Congress then simply declare independence recognizing what that might imply" – but is it really that simple?

Let's presume it is. What's the plan if the Congress orders a full military invasion? And don't tell me it can't happen, because that's magical thinking. The belief that the largest and the most military powerful State on the planet would just accept loss of territory simply because some random dudes coordinated on the Internet, moved there and "declared independence" is as realistic as the belief in Santa Claus.

Let's be crystal clear: even if the first 25,000 are all young, healthy and military trained men – that's still not enough to defend the newly created nation. Puerto Rico also has the geographical disadvantage of being sea-locked. Which means there's no room for retreat. All the US military would have to do is to surround the place and bombard the whole island into oblivion. And the "International community" won't say a thing.

But if a military invasion seems extreme, there's also another even more likely scenario: what if the local population simply doesn't like this new nation's arrangements?

Mr. Worley himself admits that the independence sentiments in there is geared mostly towards unconstrained government and gynocentric leanings – which increases the likelihood that the locals will just rebel. What happens then?

But let's assume the locals would join hands and sing Kumbaya and the Congress won't order a military invasion. That still doesn't mean the US would be happy. It is entirely within the realm of possibilities for the President to just simply declare the new nation as a rogue state – and then what? Being declared a rogue state essentially means that no relevant actor on the global market wants to do business with you. What then? How would a proper economy develop?

Where I'm getting with this is that there are countless ways for the US government to treat such a development negatively and Mr. Worley's plan doesn't seem to take any of them into consideration.

Also, the original plan doesn't say anything on what will happen in order to avoid the fate of the Shakers. Sure, the Shakers were a religious sect but MGTOWs are usually disinclined to have children. Sustaining a nation through immigration only is possible – but for how long?

Most people want to have children, but most MGTOWs don't. Would this new nation change its focus once it's established?

Practical objections

But before even thinking of further developments after the establishment of such a nation, one should first honestly examine if such thing is possible to begin with.

The proposal says that what is first needed is for 25,000 US citizens to move onto the island, buy property and register as voters to tilt the balance of power into a more liberty-oriented worldview. Mr. Worley says that we can see "liberty and equality in our time". Of course, there's an argument to have on whether he means "equality" or rather "equity" (I presume he means the latter) but let's leave that aside for the moment.

Let's look at a similar example.

The Free State Project vs. the "MGTOW Nation"

The Free State Project(FSP) commenced in 2001 (14 years ago) as a project to convince 20,000 libertarians to move to New Hampshire to achieve "Liberty in our lifetime" – just like Mr. Worley.

But FSP has more advantages than Mr. Worley's project. Last presidential elections brought a little over one million votes for the Libertarian candidate, Gary Johnson. That said, it means that there are at least two million libertarians in the US that could resonate with the FSP.

So, FSP caters to at least two million people and wants to convince 1% of them to move to NH. Moreover, FSP has ideas less radical (for starters, they don't want to secede from the union).

After 14 years of heavy investment and advertising, they still haven't secured 20 thousand people to even promise to move there. At the moment of this writing, 1,755 people had taken the step and a bit over 15,000 more have promised to move there when the 20,000 goal is reached.

In other words, they're barely 7% on their goal in 14 years. Even if their rate of commitment and movement doubles in the next 5 years, it would still take more than 20 years from now on until the project may reach completion. Not quite "in our lifetime" for the early movers.

On the other hand, Mr. Worley's proposal caters to a far smaller demographic of people, proposes measures that are far outside of the Overton window and comes with higher costs.

It's one thing to require 20 thousand out of at least 2 million to move to a state with the population of Bahrain and the surface of Macedonia – and a whole other thing to require 25 thousand out of a far smaller demographic to move to an isolated place with the population of Uruguay and a surface smaller than Cyprus. Space really is an issue.

No matter how one looks at it, the total number of MGTOWs in the US isn't that big. Reason magazine (a libertarian publication) has a circulation of roughly 50 thousand in the US. That means 50,000 Americans are willing to pay money for libertarian content. On the other hand, no MGTOW space reaches that number even if they offer their readers their content for free. The most performing MGTOW spaces I've encountered are at around 25 thousand subscribers, but not all of them are from the US.

At best, the total number of MGTOWs in the US is around 100,000 – and I admit to being overly-optimistic with that number.

So, to recap, FSP wants 1% of libertarians in the US to move to a state and tinker with the political space a little bit to make it more liberty-oriented. The "MGTOW nation" project wants 25% of MGTOWs in the US to move to a much smaller area and with a bigger population in order to secede from the US. And the 25% figure is based on the highly optimistic assumption that there 100,000 MGTOWs in the US.

One is allowed to dream – but common-sense should dictate that this unattainable now. The emphasis is on "now". It doesn't mean it's unattainable ever, but for now, things are quite clear.

As I said, I'm not an adherent to the Critical Theory (criticize for the sake of criticizing) – so let's examine two alternatives.

The alternatives presented are by no means perfect because they stem from the constrained view of man and the view that perfect doesn't exist. The purpose of the alternatives is to be more attainable.

Alternative #1 – Subverting the culture from inside

If there's anything history teaches us is that political change follows social change. Sure, there are exceptions to that rule, but not too many exceptions.

Marijuana legalization or removing the state-funding for male genital mutilation were totally unthinkable in 1990 and they are now the policy in several states.

The same will be true for family law and the welfare of men on the long run. Here are a few tactics that undermine/subvert the unconstrained vision of today:

- create male scarcity for women
- technology
- alternative narrative

All three of them are already happening and a very safe bet is to invest time and other resources into accelerating them. But let's explain these tactics a bit more.

By "male scarcity for women" I don't mean "avoid women" or other forms of radical separatism – but rather a scarcity of resources.

It's no secret that the consumer economy is mostly women spending men's money (see the numbers that show that women are responsible for most of the purchases, regardless of how much they earn themselves).

Also, given that in most countries men pay most of the taxes and women are the primary beneficiaries of government handouts, another way of creating scarcity is for individual men to shrink their contributions to the government.

There are a lot of ways to do that. Minimalism, as explained by economist Aaron Clary, is one of the options. But not the only one. People associate "tax avoidance" (a perfectly legal procedure) with the ultra-rich but the reality is that this procedure can be (and indeed is) used by a whole plethora of people from all walks of life.

And this is already happening, but not fast enough. Even if a small percent of people in a region opt out almost entirely from the tax system, change can occur in that region. Opting out of marriage is one of the ways to do this.

Many people don't realize how opting out of marriage harms an unconstrained government – but one should take a look at Japan or Germany to understand how serious the marriage-avoidance is. You'll notice that virtually the only ones pissed off at the situation are those from the Government.

There are also ways to create scarcity socially. We already see traditional gynocentrists whining that men are cheap, and the modern gynocentrists trying everything in their power to justify collecting money from men directly. This should happen more often. Annoyed gynocentrists should be music to any sane person's ears.

Technology already subverts (and will continue to subvert) the State's reliance on "women as bait" for men's resources. The inevitable emergence of reliable male birth control, the rise of sex robots or the rise of artificial wombs, are pieces of technology that unabashedly undermine the current zeitgeist. These things will do more to force a change in the State's approach than any new nation could ever do.

On the alternative narrative front, one should consider more often to promote one in corners where nobody thought before. This is already happening but again, it doesn't happen fast enough.

Collectivists, gynocentrists and establishmentarians promote their narrative every chance they get – why shouldn't the rest do the same? Besides, sometimes promoting an alternative narrative amounts to one simple word: "NO!"

One would be amazed how much can be achieved by simply saying no. There are numerous social situations where men's goodwill is implicitly expected because "that's the way it is" (or because potato). Saying no when perfectly capable adults just expect you to do stuff for them pays dividends in the long run. This aspect deserves a separate discussion in and of itself.

The combination of these three factors – technology, alternative narrative and male scarcity – is deadly for the current zeitgeist if enough pressure is applied. And it has the bonus that it doesn't require relocation and can be (and indeed is) applied globally.

Alternative #2 – Private cities

Now, whenever someone mentions "private cities" most people think of either artificial islands or places like Gurgaon, India. Sure, those are private cities, but are not the only model of private city out there, nor the only conceivable model of private city.

Atlantic Station in Georgia (the US state, not the nation) is another example of private city. Now, I happen to think in quite unfavorable terms of Atlantic Station and consider it a place that I wouldn't enter even if I were paid $100 per second spent there – but its existence shows that the concept of a private semi-autonomous city within an existing nation is not exactly a pipe dream, but rather the reality.

But if the degree of autonomy that Atlantic Station enjoys is debatable to say the least, there are other already existing projects around the world that make far more sense.

One particular example is the Honduran ZEDEs (Zone for Employment and Economic Development). What makes the ZEDEs from Honduras so special is that these areas have the privilege of opting out from most Honduran laws if they so desire and deem that would increase their competitiveness and ability to attract investors and/or entrepreneurs.

Given the economic state of Honduras in comparison to the US – it is far more attainable to move to one of these areas. As explained above, Mr. Worley's proposal, if it is to happen at all, would have to take even more than the Free State Project (time-wise). In contrast, the building of the first ZEDE is already under construction and most likely will be completed before the end of this decade. By the time FSP reaches its goals, there may be even two ZEDEs in Honduras. By the time Mr. Worley's proposal gains any semblance of attainability in the horizon, there would be more than 100 fully-functional private autonomous cities around the world.

By no means should one think that the private city alternative is perfect. But the current trends pretty much make the case themselves that this alternative is better than Mr. Worley's.

Conclusions

This is a discussion that will keep on going for years to come and there are numerous competing ideas on what men who want to opt-out of the uber-gynocentric culture can do in this regard.

The purpose of this article was to provide an alternative view that is more focused.

With all due respect to Mr. Worley, seceding a territory from the US is just unattainable. Reality doesn't work that way. Also, adopting a similar legal system that led to the problem in the first place shows that the reality of gynocentrism is not yet clearly understood.

And on the point of legal systems, I would recommend looking more into the croud-sourced laws idea since such a project would allow to incorporate what has worked around the world on various issues, as opposed to just taking the US-style legal system as a default.

There are countries out there in the world where divorce rape doesn't happen (or it happens with far fewer consequences than in the US). Yet MGTOWs from the Anglosphere don’t even consider studying them, let alone advocating for (some of) them.

What I’m trying to say is that more study is needed before jumping to radical solutions. Our philosophical opponents are doing enough of that (jumping to radical solutions and/or conclusions without enough study).

Most of us here at AVfM, when we decided to join the politically activated non-feminist sector, we joined for the long run – under the realistic expectation that we won’t see equity in our time, but rather small and gradual cultural shifts that would lay the ground work that shall constitute the turning point to get that for our children or grandchildren.

Just like one doesn’t plan to buy a Cadillac when he can’t even afford a meal a day – the same way one doesn’t plan to build a nation when it’s not even clear there’s a reasonable amount of demand and resources available for that.

Mistaking the face for the mask and trying to tear it off

Because access to the full movie, “The Mask You Live In” is tightly controlled with very limited access (quelle surprise), Tom Golden had to settle for doing a review based on the trailer.

Consider that an outreach message for anyone who can get us a copy of the film or access to viewing it.

Meanwhile, Tom found plenty on which to comment in the brief trailer.

Women, Wallets and Waste

June 18, 2015 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Author's note; If you are happily married or in any other mode of human bonding that puts you in the role of primary breadwinner, please feel free to ignore this piece. It is written solely for those men who have chosen a different path.

More specifically, it is written for men who are going their own way, but who do not want to totally cut themselves off from sex and occasional female companionship.

For you old timers here, think of this as a comment from "Dr. Paul" for men. PE

If all you want is periodic sex and companionship with a woman, then smile real big. You owe that to yourself. Well, unless you are using your wallet to get there.

If that is the case, you are throwing away good money and putting yourself in the role of a John. If that floats your boat, well enough. But you might want to keep reading anyway.

We will start with some uncomfortable basics.

Inconvenient fact #1

Women decide in the first five minutes (or seconds) of meeting you whether they want to bed down with you.

That is a fact that I will wager 90+% of men never get through their skulls.

Those five minutes, or seconds as the case may be, are the only moments ever that you have sway over which way she goes with her decision, and your biggest hope for her deciding your way is not to give a damn what she decides.

I don't create the rules. I just observe them.

That is not to say that money can't play a role in that time. A guy head to toe in Armani and Italian leather will stand out for sure, and will attract more women. He will also attract the very kind of woman who wants to take all that shit from him the second she can get her claws in.

Inconvenient fact #2

Some guys get laid a lot more often. Whether it is money, movie star looks, a porn star cock and the skills to back it or a very serious (often innate) understanding of female psychology, some men just have an edge. Adjust your expectations accordingly. It is much easier to do that when you learn to aggressively manage that pathetic pining to get laid. And in almost ironic fashion, learning to not be pathetic about women with your wallet or anything else is one of the few things you can do to increase your sexual opportunities.

So even if more sex is your motive, the path to get there is a daily dose of IDGAF pills.

Inconvenient fact #3

Using your wallet in a "dating scene" is better described as saying that you are actually paying a string of prostitutes in the hopes that one of them will deliver service.

Talk about inconvenient. This one takes the cake. Take an honest prostitute. She will go away when you are done and won't tell you that she doesn't like your shirt or that your friends drink too much.

Thankfully, there are also some decidedly convenient facts. Remembering them can help you think of your wallet as something other than where you used to keep money when you had it.

Convenient fact #1

There are women who don't mind paying their own way. Sure, they are not falling out of trees. They are out there, though. And you can encounter them if you are the kind of man uninterested in any other kind of woman.

That means projecting your values to the people who know you, without compromise (and without a lot of fanfare).

You can even do a reasonable amount of advertising in your own social circles that you only do the Dutch thing; that if you were a multi-millionaire you would not pay a woman to spend time with you. Feel free to let people quietly know that if you wanted an escort service you have the Yellow Pages.

If you don't make too much of a production of it; if you are not too ostentatious (and if you don't have leprosy or body odor) that will likely result in a woman expressing interest in you who may not have otherwise done so.

It will also turn off every goldbricking skeezer in the group. If you have been chasing tail with your wallet, you know just the kind of woman I am talking about. She already has some of your cash. Maybe a lot of it.

Convenient fact #2

Looks depreciate. Money appreciates. Two realities of life are at play here. Looking at them honestly can be a little chilling. One, a woman's looks depreciate with time. I am not just talking about time in the sense of crow's feet and sagging boobs. I am talking about the basic reality that you could be with the most beautiful woman in the world, a wild, incredible lover, and over a period of time she would lose her luster.

Well, in your eyes anyway. It is no different for her. Man or woman, you have sex with the same person enough times and the passion fades. There may be some exceptions, but I am wagering not many.

The longer men and women stay together, the less emphasis and value they put on sex.

On the other hand, your money (aside from inflation) will be just as good in five years as it is right now.

When you chase women with your wallet, her looks and your money both dry up on you. So put your freaking wallet up and just open your mind to a woman who fits your lifestyle. You will be in much better shape when and if it is over.

Convenient fact #3

You are in charge of all of this. You can either see yourself as someone just playing the cards they were dealt, or you can become the dealer.

You can live with the reality that money attracts whores, or you can enjoy the delusion that if you spend enough you will be wanted and loved.

Or, should you decide to take a different path, you can become hooker kryptonite and learn to better attract lower maintenance women, regardless of how much time you actually want to spend with them.

The falsely accused are the real victims

#SpankAFeminist: Because it’s finally time to put abusive liars over the knee

June 20, 2015 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

Feminists say so much stupid, ignorant, or just plain evil shit it boggles the mind, and in response a new hashtag has begun that I hope to see spread on Twitter, Tumblr, and other social media platforms.

#SpankAFeminist speaks to our need to metaphorically spank feminists for their transgressions.

Why would you spank a feminist? Well in reality, we know a lot of them would complain but some might actually enjoy it. Who knows? Maybe they’re just shit-testing us all and waiting and feeling frustrated that we aren’t responding right. They make so many phony, transparently, scientifically debunked assertions, that answering them is like playing Whack-A-Mole.

So here’s an easy thing to do: from now on when they say something idiotic on social media, just respond with a spanking. It’s all they’re really worthy of anyway.

Some examples:

► For being the kind of bitter, humorless, hateful harpies who’d feign that “Spank a Feminist” is advocacy of real “violence against women.”

► For swindling people with the notion that a career is the path to self-fulfillment.

► For demanding that special jobs be made for women whether women want them or not.

► For bullying any gay men or women who reject feminist ideology.

► For the hateful lie that laws limiting abortion are efforts of men to control women.

► For lying about campus sex assault rates.

► For lying and claiming that wars and other suffering are caused by men alone.

► For pretending that men who financially support women and kids are oppressing them.

► For hideously bullying the majority of women who reject feminism.

► For the appalling racism of saying black and Hispanic and Asian men oppress their women.

► For attempting to ban from all public spaces anyone who might question their assertions and beliefs.

► For the racist lie that 3rd world men routinely beat women & treat them like property.

► For making up the gigantic conspiracy theory they call “The Patriarchy.”

► For behaving as if they stand for gays and minorities when they clearly don’t.

► For pretending that rape and sexual assault are primarily male-on-female.

► For pretending to give a damn about men and boys when they obviously hate them or view them as defective at least.

► For pretending they speak for women when they do not.

► For pathetic shaming of male anatomy and sexuality.

► For decades of covering for female child molesters and child abusers.

► For behaving as if men and women choosing different lifestyles is oppression.

For all of this and so much more, #SpankAFeminist

This would be my starting list of reasons why any time you meet a feminist, you should spank him or her until they cry. And do it every time they open their mouths to spew forth their hateful lies about standing for tolerance, inclusion, and equality, when there is no movement in the modern world that does more to fight against tolerance, inclusion, freedom, and equality than feminism. Not even real life fascists or communists can top them at this point.

Feminism is an intolerant, hateful, racist, anti-gay, misandrist, misogynist, gynocentric religion and hate movement. What other good reasons can you think of to spank a feminist? I'd really like to hear your ideas as well. Not just here on A Voice for Men, but out in the world of Social Media.

So many Feminists to Spank, so little time. Honestly, I think there may be a solution here.

False accusations and the denial of men’s emotional pain

June 20, 2015 | by Tom Golden | Link | Original Link

I keep hearing that false accusations of rape make it harder on real victims of rape. Really? There may be a kernel of truth in this idea but it completely ignores the trauma and pain of the man who is falsely accused. The knee jerk reaction of most people is to worry over the woman and ignore the pain of the man.

This pattern to focus on females in emotional pain and offer help while ignoring the emotional pain of men and boys is the default in the United States. This not only leaves our men and boys without help, it also leaves us with an ignorance about their emotional pain.

To get a sense of the emotional pain of the falsely accused listen to the words of a young man falsely accused of rape via an article on slate.com:

> My girlfriend was raped several years ago. I was falsely accused of rape less than a year ago. I contacted her (I had known her before her incident) because I was desperate for someone to talk to who would understand what I was going through. To my great relief, it turned out that we understood each other very well. From the initial stages of suicidal thoughts and not being able to function to the long-term fear, mistrust, and guilt that are facts of our lives, it turns out that her experience of being raped and mine of being falsely accused of rape were very similar.

He touches on some of the hallmarks of a false accusation which he and his girlfriend realized were very similar to her reaction to having been raped. The loss of functioning, the suicidal thoughts, the long-term fear and mistrust along with the potent guilt are a few of their similar reactions.

It often starts out innocently enough. He hears that she has accused him of something he didn’t do. He is not so worried, at least not at first. He knows he did nothing wrong and figures that when people get the facts that this will blow over like a dark cloud that never rains a drop. But, to his shock, he starts seeing that even when he speaks the truth about what actually happened he is still considered a criminal.

But our young falsely accused man goes a step farther in his descriptions of his situation. Listen to what he says:

> One important difference, though, is that when she was violated, she received a great deal of help (medical, legal, psychological). Apart from family and friends, I was on my own. My legal and psychological problems had to be dealt with by me at a time when I couldn’t eat, sleep, or think (except, of course, about killing myself).

He sees very clearly that very few believe him while nearly everyone believes the woman. The system and our culture are failing him. His pain is invisible while hers is treated with reverence, even though she is lying.

He must be shocked by the amount of coddling and care that she gets from friends, family, the university, the authorities, and so many others. He is likely shocked again when he compares this to the reaction he receives. Almost no support, but plenty of negatives.

In most instances the woman is believed no matter what. The police ignore his side and treat him like a rapist, the media is more than happy to paint him as if convicted and throw his name around willy nilly with at least the inference that he is a rapist. Rape centers make demands that all those claiming to have been raped should be believed no matter what. While it might be a good idea to put your trust in someone in crisis it quickly turns to crap if you put your trust in someone who is lying. The rape centers refuse to admit there are liars out there and they will go to great lengths to shame the police, the hospital, the media, the public or anyone who might even ask a question about the veracity of her claims. This sets us up for a real mess. By giving the liars a pass you set up the falsely accused for chaos.

As time goes on he realizes that he is basically alone in his knowledge of the truth. No one believes him. Even his friends are wondering. He starts to feel way out on a limb and also very shocked. It is just hard to believe that your entire universe of friends, teachers, adults are looking at you sideways due to the lies of a woman. It’s hard to believe that a system of “justice” has gotten things so wrong and is intentionally and wrongly painting you as a criminal. The world which not long ago seemed safe and predictable has now become unsafe and very unpredictable. This promotes confusion and the devastating isolation that is so common for the falsely accused along with the potent fears of the world being a big unpredictable booby trap. They feel isolated, profoundly judged and labelled, unsafe and alone and in a world that has gone mad.

This is a billboard that says double standard. While the emotional plight of the young woman is given support at every step by friends, family, the police, courts, the media and others the emotional state of the young falsely accused male is ignored and denied. He is viewed as the problem. She is automatically seen as a victim simply because she accuses him, he is seen as a pariah simply for being accused. He is in great pain and turmoil but no one lifts a finger to be of assistance. The sad fact is he is presumed guilty prior to trial. He is now seen as an object, not as a human being. He is profoundly objectified. The double standard could not be more stark.

The larger problem is that this pattern of catering to the emotional pain of females and ignoring the emotional pain of males is not exclusive to false accusations. You see this same pattern most everyplace you look. In my work with traumatized men over the past 30 years I have seen it repeatedly. Time and again I would see that in a traumatized family the men’s wives would be the focus of help and the man’s pain would be ignored. Often times people would approach the father and rather than ask about his situation they would say, “How’s your wife holding up?” The woman gets the support, the man, gets asked about his wife.

This same pattern is seen when our culture, media, and academia all focus on female victims of domestic violence and ignore the male victims. They do this even though research shows that men are about 1/2 of the victims. Congress sets up a billion dollar service for women and men get ignored or even blamed.

We see the same ignoring of men’s emotional pain when we see that males are 80% of completed suicide but there are no services specifically for males who are suicidal. There is also not much research looking into why men are 80% of completed suicides. It seems it is much easier to get funding to study women, the men get left out. And of course, the media fails to inform the public of men in pain. Dead silence. Same thing with workplace deaths where men are 93% of the dead. People simply don’t care. If these deaths were female or even some minority the media would be screaming loudly. But when men are the victims, we get silence.

Our culture is now and always has been very gynocentric (for more information see www.gynocentrism.com). One definition of gynocentrism found on that site is “any culture instituting rules for gender relationships that benefit females at the expense of males across a broad range of measures.” When it comes to emotional needs it is clear in our culture that a woman’s emotional pain is a call to action while a man’s emotional pain is ignored. Some try to cover this profound bias by claiming men are cold and don’t want to deal with their emotions. But this has simply been a cover to excuse oneself from even needing to pay the slightest attention to the man’s emotional pain. Epic fail.

The contrast is great between the cultural response to female and male emotional pain. One gets compassion and the other gets ignored, shamed, or both. This contrast is so great that it behooves the label of bigotry. Just as we saw whites create a system where whites automatically got services superior to that of blacks today we see our government and charities developing services where women get care and compassion far superior to that of men and no one even notices. No one. Reminds me of a bigoted 1950’s southern town that didn’t think its action were in any way a problem. In today’s world, the status quo, that is nearly everyone, are guilty of bigotry by not having compassion for the emotional pain of men. Which side of the fence do you stand on? Are you a bigot who has little compassion for boys and men?

Perhaps someday we will look back on this era and see its bigotry just as we now look back on the racism of the 1950’s. I do hope that day comes quickly.

State vs federal law and medical marijuana

June 21, 2015 | by Christopher Granger | Link | Original Link

On Monday the Colorado Supreme Court ruled that a company can still fire an employee even if they are using medical marijuana. This is a blow to those who have found that medical marijuana helps where pills don't. Brandon Coats was fired from the Dish Network when he failed a random drug test in 2010. Even though Coats stated that he never smoked while on the job and only smoked in the privacy of his own home. The court ruled that even though state law in Colorado allowed the use of medical marijuana it went against federal law. This ruling may open many doors by those in the marijuana business to be either sued or taken to court. At present there are cases in lower courts waiting to be heard against the marijuana business.

You would think that states such as Colorado where it is legal to purchase recreational marijuana wouldn't have these problems. Unfortunately until the federal government gets on board allowing for medical marijuana to be used nationally more and more of these attempts to hinder the usage of medical marijuana will be popping up.

One of the main problems at the moment for those in the marijuana business is banking. Since the federal government is involved in the banking business it is hard for growers or business owners to get loans or deposit money into banks due to federal law against marijuana.

This grey area between state and federal law will be here for some time. The congress has begun talks on medical marijuana but as of this time nothing has been set in stone and all that is being done is talking. The marijuana business is a powerful force to be looked at and taken seriously as this weed is growing with increasing popularity.

More and more studies are being done on the effectiveness of marijuana as an alternative to pills that don't seem to be worth the money that is spent on them. Sooner or later the federal government will remove its restrictions against marijuana, mostly due to the fact that at the moment there are 23 states that allow medical marijuana and more are coming on board. The presidential elections of 2016 will see an increase in the number of states that allow medical marijuana and this will force the federal government to look at changing national law concerning medical marijuana. For information on the status of the legalization of medical marijuana in the State of Florida please go to forthepeople.com and United For Care.

A new psychology for men

June 21, 2015 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Psychology clings to a universal model – that men are incorrigibly flawed and require a dismantling of their identities, habits, and preferences before being reconstructed according to a feminist model of masculinity. All modern therapies have this basic premise in common.

For example, one of the more popular models of men and masculinity to emerge in the last 20 years, promoted as A New Psychology of Men, is described in the following terms by one of its founders:

> The new psychology of men has emerged over the past 15 years within the larger fields of men's studies and gender studies. Informed by the academic breakthroughs of feminist scholarship, the new psychology of men examines masculinity not as a normative referent, but rather as a problematic construct. In so doing, it provides a framework for a psychological approach to men and masculinity that questions traditional norms of the male role and views some male problems as unfortunate byproducts of the male gender role socialization process.[1]

Since it's inception this "new" psychology of men has restated traditional gender stereotypes about men; that they are flawed, violent, emotional primitives in need of reconstruction. This supposedly "new" model has also been developed into a training course teaching therapists how to effectively work with men.

The course, designed by former American Psychological Association President Ronald Levant, is based on two principles held almost universally by therapists working with men; a) that patriarchy theory represents the real world, and b) that males are stunted in their emotional processing abilities. Let's look at these two pillars of therapy.

Patriarchy theory

As with most psychologists and therapists today, Levant is informed by feminist-inspired patriarchy theory which posits that all men have power over all women and that such power is enforced by men's violence. The theoretical vision, trumpets Levant, provides a "new" way of looking at men:

> What scholars in the area of men's psychology have attempted is nothing less than a reconstruction of masculinity. It starts from the recognition that there is a problem, and locates the roots of that problem in the male gender role… The new psychology of men strives to address the feminist critique of patriarchy while remaining empathetic to men.[2]

As many readers will know there is nothing "new" in this characterization of men, which we can summarize with the phrase, 'Women have problems, and men are the problem.' As Levant stresses, the primary approach to therapy with men is first to problematize them; “It starts from the recognition that there is a problem.”

In this model men are viewed as being problems before they even meet the therapist, who ignores the possibility that men’s problems may lie outside themselves in a world of grief they did nothing to deserve.

In other words, whatever the presenting complaints of the client they are immediately dismissed by the practitioner in order to coerce the client into an ideological mold of manhood. The practitioner, depending on their degree of indoctrination, may actually believe this will address the client’s issues but even a cursory examination of the “masculinity as identified problem” approach reveals numerous, deep flaws. In fact, this approach proves to be abusive in any reasonable interpretation of the word.

As I explain below there are other approaches to working with men that don’t presume they are flawed and need fixing. That approach begins with asking men what they experience in life, and what they might want to achieve in therapy, and actually listening to their answers. Therapists may be interested to hear men speak of a range of experiences and goals wholly unrelated to patriarchal domination of women and children.

Men as emotionally dumb

Referring to men as dumb has the double-meaning of both lacking in intelligence and being mute. This forms the basis of Levant’s theory that men possess little emotional awareness about themselves or others, that they are lacking in emotional intelligence, and that even were they to discover some emotional awareness they would not know how to express it in words, such is the depth of male lacuna. He refers to this problem in men as alexithymia – a Greek term meaning no words for emotions, insisting that most North American males suffer from this syndrome.

Levant states that “it is so very widespread among men that I have called it normative male alexithymia,”[3] a syndrome that by definition only men and boys can be labelled with. There even exists a Normative Male Alexithymia Scale used to assess the depth of men’s need for therapeutic correction. Levant states,

> One of the most far-reaching consequences of male gender-role socialization is > the high incidence among men of… the inability to identify and describe one's feelings in words… men are often genuinely unaware of their emotions. Lacking this emotional awareness, when asked to identify their feelings, they tend to rely on their cognition to try to logically deduce how they should feel. They cannot do what is automatic for most women -simply sense inwardly, feel the feeling, and let the verbal description come to mind.[4]

This claim, that men are "unaware of their emotions," an assumption so typical of psychology's view of men, has been a cornerstone of the therapeutic world for the last 40 years. And it is demonstrably wrong.

According to the vast majority of studies on emotional processing, men and boys are able to identify emotional arousal in themselves and others equally to women, emotions like jealousy, love, anger, sadness, anxiety, etc. But men and boys choose to regulate that emotional arousal not by verbalizing it so much (women's preferred method) but by taking intelligent action. A woman for example might talk with her melancholic friend about what is worrying her in order to cheer her up; the man may invite the same melancholic friend to the movies; both responses -talking, or acting- serve to intelligently modulate emotions.

What Levant has failed to discriminate are 1. recognizing emotions, and 2. verbalizing them. He, and so many psychologists who came before and after him, assume that by not verbalizing emotion males must also have failed to recognize emotions. Countless studies however show this to be a false conclusion.[5] Men, like women, can sense the full range of emotions – but they may choose to respond to that knowledge in a different manner to women.

Breaking with the past – starting afresh

Repackaging patriarchy theory is a move we no longer wish to make – at least not if we wish to genuinely help men. Increasing numbers of men are tired of waiting for the psychotherapeutic industry to drag its collective ass out of gynocentrism-land to develop a genuine new model for tackling male psychology.

To attain that model there has to occur a break with patriarchy theory and assumptions that men and boys are emotional dummies. As in a court of law we begin the new therapy with an assumption that men are not only innocent until proven guilty, but that 'men are good' to use Tom Golden's iconic phrase.

Nor will work with men be savvy until it admits the realities of cultural misandry, gynocentrism and their undeniably crushing effects on modern males. The daily assaults on men and boys from advertizing, mental health services, media, family courts, pharmaceutical companies, education from grade school to grad school, anti-male bigots and ideologically driven governance must be included in the picture.

These are problems which are deleterious to all aspects of men's lives, including mental health. The mental health industry is a huge part of that problem, not a part of the solution.

A sane alternative to all this must disabuse men, women and society of the following myths:

● men belong to a patriarchy and take that model as their life script;
● men are emotionally inept;
● men are default potential sexual predators;
● men are violent and uncaring;
● men are not necessary as parents;
● men are unable to commit;
● men are emotionally unavailable;
● men are not as human or deserving as women.

The things we do want to include in a new mental health model are:

● enhanced understanding of misandry, gynocentrism and their consequences;
● recognizing and honoring men's emotional acumen;
● recognizing and combating misandry and gynocentrism in the mental health industry;
● professional understanding of the ways men differ from women in how they cope with life;
● a prohibition on the practice of expecting men to emulate women's emotional processes;
● an allowance of men's legitimate anger without infecting them with ideological shame;
● the steadfast belief that men's issues, pain and needs are as important as anyone else's.

These points alone are sufficient to create a revolution in the way we work with men. Forcing engineers to sew makes as much sense as forcing chemists to bake

---

Humans have been using yeast to make bread for at least 5 000 years, and possibly longer. Yeast can reasonably be considered humanity's 'oldest industrial microorganism'. Yeast, a living, single-celled fungus, feeds on the sugars and starches in bread, releasing carbon dioxide, which is what makes the bread rise. Bread-makers and chemists alike understand bread-making as chemistry. Amadea Avogadro is generally understood to bethe first scientist who understood the basic premise of chemistry: That elements could exist as molecules, or chemical compounds. He first articulated what is now known as 'Avogadro's Law' in 1811, meaning that the practice of chemistry predates the theoretical understanding of chemical processes by thousands of years.

Women are 200% preferred over men on STEM

The problem with "We need more women in—"

The misandry of Code.org

Stephanie Vasko, writing for Slate, advocates for STEM programs to include practice, in the form of traditional arts, to promote social justice and feminist ideals, claiming 'the combination of sewing, crafting, making and STEM offers educators a critical opportunity to explore ethics and social justice with students'. Vasko goes on to claim that most of the individuals populating what she describes as the 'maker movement' consisting of 'makerspaces' or 'making activities' are white, privileged and male. Vasko fails to explain the phenomenon of Asian students excelling at 'making activities', particularly the activities of 'making' computer algorithms, and the corollary trend for women to engage in STEM related educations and activities only until they become wealthy enough to choose subjects that interest them. 'I'm tired," Vasko writes, 'of organizations being set up to tell young women and young brown and black men that they should aspire to be young white men'.

Vasko's assertion that crafts belong traditionally to women and men of color is partially correct in that virtually all crafts were originally practiced by men exclusively, as evidenced by guilds. The earliest known baker's guild was established in 168 BC in Rome and allowed men to pass on their memberships to sons. And while spinning wool for use in textile production was very likely a woman's occupation (hence the word 'spinster'), the weavers were men. Top practitioners of individual crafts were called 'master craftsmen', who passed on secrets gleaned through practice to younger apprentices.

As the Industrial Revolution progressed, many traditional crafts became automated, dramatically reducing the cost of things like bread and clothing. The men who might formerly have been master craftsmen now became the scientists who explored the technology and theory that permitted even faster and cheaper production. Traditional crafts became hobbies for women, but for most of human history, they were vital to economic activity and run largely by men.

In advocating for STEM majors to increase their already significant workload to study crafts that eventually led to theories they must learn, Vasko inadvertently advocates for all students to become white, privileged and male, because privileged, white males were those craftsmen for most of human history. Encouraging students, especially women and men of color, to learn the theories and mathematics that inform STEM, rather than focus on the practical applications is the truly radical act.

It does little good if our chemists can bake a perfect baguette but fail to understand the consequences of crushing nickel hydrazine perchlorate with a mortar and pestle.

Boom.

AVfM Classics: Male/female discrepancies in transsexualism

June 22, 2015 | by Jesse | Link | Original Link

While transsexualism has been and remains a poorly-understood condition, certain consistent aspects have been outlined by experiment and observational evidence. One of these aspects is the discrepancy between the sexes, which several, mostly European studies have shown is quite wide, with around three times as many male-to-female as female-to-male transsexuals. But, what are the reasons for this discrepancy? To examine that, we must first examine the phenomenon of transsexualism itself.

Many would suggest that the cause of transsexualism is inherent and genetic. They point to differences in the brain structures of transsexuals, prior to any treatment with hormones or surgery, as evidence of these inherent differences. Transsexual brains appear to be more like those of the sex they identify with, rather than those of the sex they are associated with by virtue of their chromosomes, hormones, and primary and secondary sex characteristics.

These studies are problematic, however, since they tend to feature incredibly small sample sizes that make any statistical conclusions suspect. Further, even if we accept discrepancies in the brains of transsexuals as an assumption, this is a far cry from establishing that these differences are inherent. Indeed, there is strong evidence that human brains are extremely malleable, up to and throughout adulthood. Brains can quickly and dramatically rewire themselves in response to the right stimuli. Of course, this capacity is even greater in childhood.

Humans are tremendously intelligent and adaptable creatures. We are born with few instinctual behaviors, but the capacity to learn a tremendous number. And our first type of learning is imitation. Before we understand any language, before we even have a concept of self as separate from the other, we imitate. We are vastly impressionable. While it seems true that we have some aspects of personality that are set from the start, would it not be very strange to label any one aspect of personality, or even array of personality traits, as inherently “masculine” or “feminine”?

Certainly, some are more typical of one sex or another, but the fact of the matter is that there is no such thing as “what it’s like” to be a man or woman. If one is a man or woman, they have a sense of that contribution to their experiences, but that cannot be said to be a typical experience of being a man or woman. Each person’s experience is unique; this is even more true when taking into account people throughout history and in other cultures today.

There do not appear to be any hormonal or other consistent physical differences between transsexual individuals and others of their born sexes beyond those in the brain. Many transsexuals report having the initial inklings of their transsexual feelings arise very young, and while these assertions can easily be questioned in individual cases, there is no reason to doubt that, for many, this is the case. Certainly, some modern cases of apparent early childhood transsexualism have received a fair amount of media coverage.

But, given that the inherent, prenatal explanations for transsexualism are highly questionable, what other explanations are there, and why might these lead to the discrepancy between male and female rates of transsexualism? This area is fraught with difficulty. Few modern studies seek any explanation beyond the genetic and inherent. Indeed, modern research almost seems to put the cart before the horse, seeking reasons to validate the assertions of identity politics it takes as a given. Still, by using information from related fields of study, one can begin to build a case for an altogether different and quite environmental explanation.

That a parent's own sexual identity affects how he or she deals with children has been shown in studies, as have differences in how parents treat children according to the child's sex. Indeed, this is even the case when parents are unaware of the differences in their actions and reactions towards their children. These sex-based differences in approach are present from a very young age, and are shown to have profound effects on children.

But how might these effects lead to transsexualism? Children begin forming ideas of gender roles very early, and these ideas are simplistic, exaggerated, and extremely rigid, to the point of outright cognitive dissonance when their stereotypes are not adhered to. Children seek to understand their social environment and their place in it. It is important to realize that children have no deep, abstract understanding of gender roles. If a five-year-old boy identifies as a girl, it is not because of some deep-seated existential angst or abstract understanding of his own sex and gender, but because he associates more with certain simplistic and rigid stereotypes assigned to girls.

And why would a young boy associate more with the stereotypes assigned to girls? Well, one good reason would be because he wants to, because he regards his stereotypes of women as superior. For instance, in a feminist household, expressions of masculinity may be viewed with derision, or, when there is a father present, as a source of shame. Even without such associations, however, a child often just spends more time with his or her mother. While it does not occur until after a large proportion of gender ideas are formed, school also exposes children, primarily, to female role models. Not to mention the fact that many behaviors typical of boys are frowned upon and even drugged out of them in modern school environments.

And where do boys find themselves today? Today, women can be anything they want. Women can be action heroes, happy homemakers, corporate executives, and powerful politicians. There are two categories of fashion, fashion for everyone and fashion for women only. Women are the ones seen as beautiful and glamorous. Women are kind, gentle, empathetic, and allowed to freely express emotion. With the traditional strengths of men now seen as irrelevant or even negative, why wouldn't a boy rather be a girl? Is this not as good an explanation as any for the discrepancies between MtF and FtM transsexualism?

It is simply implausible that a child that associates with the opposite sex label has any real understanding of what that means, but unfortunately, such associations often stick. Further, this gender dysphoria is extremely harmful, frequently leading to severe depression and high suicide and poverty rates for transsexuals. As one might expect, researchers believe that male-to-female transsexuals are the hardest-hit by these problems.

There are several reasons for this, from the far greater shame associated with men breaking gender roles than women, to the simple fact that, after puberty, MtF transsexuals have a much harder time passing as women, due to body size, facial and body hair, and other secondary sex characteristics, than FtM transsexuals have passing as men. Neoteny is relatively easy to overcome with hormone therapies. There may be other reasons, such as different social pressures that tend to lead to each type of transsexualism, but these are poorly studied.

These arguments, while highly speculative, do raise important questions for how we approach raising boys in a changed culture. If, indeed, the way the sexes are treated by parents, teachers, media, and the rest of society leads to gender dysphoria and its often dire consequences, we must renew our efforts to define a new and modern role for boys, or to seek to end these gender stereotypes altogether. The rigidly controlled idea of what passes for masculine in our culture does a disservice to boys and men alike. Until boys are able to associate positive roles and freedom with their sex, it should be no surprise that a greater proportion of them wind up rejecting it, much to their own detriment.

There is no need for more women in STEM

June 22, 2015 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Note: This article is also available in Italian.

The latest complaint du jour from gender ideologues, especially those in academe, is that there is a shortage of women in STEM fields. I note with irony that most of the bitching is coming from people with arts degrees that, judging by their other common rhetoric, can not manage statistics any more than they can manage physics or engineering. These are generally the same people whose investment in rocket science is to critique the fashion choices of a man who helped land a spacecraft on a comet. For the moment, I will set aside that show-stopping bit of reality and focus more on the subject at hand.

Science does not need women at all. Having a vagina will not help us produce cold fusion energy any more than having a vagina will take physicists closer to understanding quantum mechanics. Of course, having a penis does not solve those problems either. What science needs is more scientists, and prescreening them based on genitalia isn't very, well, scientific. As a matter of fact, it is unscientific enough to call stupid and stupid enough to call feminist.

And that brings us to what we are really talking about here. Feminists don't want more women in STEM for the sake of science. They want more women in STEM because the historically consistent lopsided numbers of men to women in STEM make it appear that women are either A) not generally as apt as men in hard sciences or B) not near as interested as men in hard sciences.

Unfortunately for the unscientific ideologues crowing about getting more women in STEM, both of those statements are true. Indeed, I would bet that "A" has a great deal to do with "B." In other words it makes a lot of sense that there is a strong correlation between women's aptitude and their interests. In the old days we used to call that insight and self-assessment. In postmodern times we call it patriarchal oppression.

As a species, we seem to be getting dumber all the time.

I will beg the indulgence of any ideologues reading this and ask you to pretend you are in the real world for the next few paragraphs.

STEM requires a higher level of intelligence, generally speaking, than being a receptionist or cleaner of sewers. That is not to say there are not some very bright receptionists and sewer cleaners out there. After all, Einstein started out as a patent clerk. It is evident however, that intelligence, particularly in the range approaching genius, plays a role in both aptitude and interest in very difficult subjects.

Accepting that means you accept there is and always will be a lot more men in STEM than women. You can have STEMwalks, Take Back the STEM rallies and any other form of nonsense you want. It won't change a thing.

Let's examine this using a graph. I have selected a very simple one for the gender studies majors, so they too will feel included.

[image]

As you can see here, the distribution of general IQ is different for each sex. When you look at the extreme ends of the bell curve you notice that men dominate, both in high and low intelligence, while women's IQs are grouped more toward the average.

That means a lot more men than women with the intelligence to do things like design rockets. It also explains why you see so many more men at the helm of Fortune 500 companies, leading governments and doing all other sorts of things ideologues like to blame on sexism. It is not sexism. Let's call it smartism, because that is what it is. Science, technology, innovation and leadership are predominately driven by men because they are the ones more likely to possess the intelligence to excel.

That is not being smug. The bell curve also demonstrates that men dominate at the lower end, which partly explains why our prisons are clogged with men of low intellect. It is just a reality that we have to face until someone, likely a man, figures out a reliable way to raise IQs in human beings.

In the meantime ideologues with lower IQs are dominating the discourse on why there is a dearth of women in STEM. To put it less kindly, people with insufficient intelligence to handle hard sciences are trying to lead the discussion on how to attract talent.

Precisely what I would expect from people whose intelligence is limited. I know, that is ableist, and I don't care. If you don't mind I will pass on the idea that we can improve science and the society it serves by seeking anything but excellence.

Right now any woman in western culture with the intelligence, aptitude and interest can enter STEM education with no barriers that anyone else does not face. Nothing is or should be in their way to a future in STEM and indeed there are some brilliant women who have done so and been great contributors.

I can't imagine that they are pining to work alongside incompétents simply because it puts another vagina in their workplace. If they were that stupid they would not have been able to earn the right to be where they are.

The Washington Post rape survey is not reliable–but it points up some very disturbing views held by college women

June 22, 2015 | by Pierce Harlan | Link | Original Link

There's a new college rape survey with some very disturbing findings. The findings are disturbing not for the reasons the sexual grievance industry thinks, but because the answers shine a light on very troubling views held by college women — about men accused of sexual assault, and men wrongly accused of sexual assault. The survey underscores that that our daughters especially, but also our sons, are in need of much remedial education about concepts that are basic to our jurisprudence. Read on, but not with an empty stomach.

Rape laws and policies are shaped by surveys where every rape allegation is uncritically accepted and none are tested against competing claims of innocence. The impact of these surveys on public policy is significant, even draconian. They are uncritically accepted to make laws that diminish the due process rights of young men accused of sexual assault in American colleges, and that is unjust. The only legitimate way to test for the prevalence of rape on campus would be to take a representative sampling of rape accusations and carefully examine the evidence (including interviewing the accused and all pertinent witnesses) as to each claim in a painstaking, objective manner. Every time rape claims are subjected to scrutiny against competing evidence of innocence, most are either deemed unfounded or false. Why on earth is every assertion in a rape survey accepted as true?

The Washington Post and the Kaiser Family Foundation have conducted a survey that, once again, uncritically accepts every characterization of sexual wrongdoing. The survey supposedly shows around 20 percent of college women are sexually assaulted. In fact, the survey is alarming on a host of levels, but not for the reasons the sexual grievance lobby insists. Here are some excerpts–and my comments:

First, college students — women more than men — are prone to rush to judgment and assume guilt based on an accusation:

21. In general, when you hear that a man is accused of sexually assaulting a woman on campus, do you generally think the (woman) is more to blame, the (man) is more to blame or do both share the blame?

	Man more to blame	Woman more to blame	Both share the blame	Neither are to blame (vol.)	No opinion
All	65	1	28	1	5
Men	60	1	33	1	6
Women	70	1	24	*	5

Second, perhaps the most disturbing question of all shows that college students (especially college women) are woefully unschooled in the concept of Blackstone's formulation, that it is "better that ten guilty persons escape than that one innocent suffer." This concept is imprinted on the DNA of our jurisprudence. We've written extensively about this concept (see here) and won't repeat ourselves here. Yet, in this survey, a whopping percentage of women think it's better that innocent young men be punished for offenses they didn't commit than to allow a guilty man to go free. Little wonder, given that the sexual grievance industry has dominated the public discourse on these issues for so long:

32. Which of the following do you think is MORE unfair: (An innocent person getting kicked out of college after being accused of sexual assault) or (A person who commits sexual assault getting away with it)?

	An innocent person getting kicked out	A person who commits sexual assault getting away with it	Both (vol.)	No opinion
All	42	49	6	3
Men	49	42	7	3
Women	36	56	6	1
Compare to: Kaiser Family Foundation national poll of U.S. adults, 3/15/15
Adults	44	47	6	3

Third, there is a disturbing absence of understanding about what constitutes "consent." As but one example, a dizzying 44 percent of women polled didn't think nodding in agreement constitutes consent. This lack of understanding likely skewed the results of the survey, perhaps significantly:

35. Do you think if a person (INSERT 1ST ITEM) this establishes consent for MORE sexual activity, or not? What about if someone (INSERT NEXT ITEM)?

a. takes off their own clothes

	Yes	No	Depends (vol.)	No opinion
All	47	49	3	1
Men	50	45	3	2
Women	44	52	3	1

b. gets a condom

	Yes	No	Depends (vol.)	No opinion
All	40	54	4	1
Men	43	51	4	2
Women	38	58	4	1

c. nods in agreement

	Yes	No	Depends (vol.)	No opinion
All	54	40	3	3
Men	58	36	3	3
Women	51	44	3	3

d. engages in foreplay such as kissing or touching

	Yes	No	Depends (vol.)	No opinion
All	22	74	3	*
Men	30	66	3	*
Women	15	82	3	*

e. does not say 'no'

	Yes	No	Depends (vol.)	No opinion
All	18	77	3	1
Men	20	75	4	1
Women	16	80	2	1

Fourth, despite the responses of the women surveyed in question 35(e) — where the vast majority don't think an absence of "no" is enough to show consent — in the following response, more women prefer the "no means no" standard over "yes means yes" as the "better" standard to show whether an encounter was consensual. The absence of a "no"

under the "no means no" standard would show consent. So which is it, ladies? Given the confusion among respondents, we must seriously question the trustworthiness of this survey:

38. Which of the following do you think is the better standard to use when determining whether sexual activity is consensual or not? (A Yes Means Yes standard, where both parties must clearly agree before engaging in sexual activity), (A No Means No standard, where sexual activity must stop if one person objects), or, in practice, is there not much difference?

	Yes means Yes standard	No means No standard	Not much difference	No opinion
All	34	42	23	2
Men	33	40	26	1
Women	34	43	21	2

Fifth, the question about "physical force" fails to define "physical force" and fails to ask if the "physical force" was accompanied by the woman's consent (of course, if the women nodded their heads in agreement to sex, as shown above, a significant percentage of them would not think that's consensual anyway):*

52. (Since starting college/While you were in college) (has/did) anyone (had/have) sexual contact with you by using physical force or threatening to physically harm you? Yes or no?

	Yes	No	No opinion
All	5	95	*
Men	1	99	*
Women	9	91	*

Sixth, the following query asks about "unwanted" sex — a subjective standard that has nothing to do with the legal standard of sexual assault since women can outwardly manifest consent while secretly not wanting to engage in the act. The question asks about times when respondents "were unable to provide consent because you were passed out, drugged, or drunk, incapacitated, or asleep." The wording of this question dooms to the survey's usefulness. A reasonable person taking this survey would not assume "drunk" sex is the same as "incapacitated" sex (because the survey uses both words, so it's not reasonable to assume one word is surplusage or that they mean the same thing). By any measure, "drunk"sex is not sexual assault, yet we know that a staggering percentage of sex occurs after imbibing alcohol:*

INCAPACITATED SEXUAL ASSAULT

READ TO EVERYONE: The next two questions ask about your experiences with unwanted sexual contact while you were unable to provide consent or stop what was happening because you were passed out, drugged, or drunk, incapacitated, or asleep. These situations might include times that you voluntarily consumed alcohol or drugs and times that you were given drugs without your knowledge or consent.

54. (Since starting college/While you were in college), (has/did) someone (had/have) sexual contact with you when you were unable to provide consent or stop what was happening because you were incapacitated? This question asks about incidents that you are certain happened. Yes or no?

	Yes	No	No opinion
All	9	91	*
Men	4	96	*
Women	14	86	*

55. (Since starting college/While you were in college), (have/did) you (suspected/suspect) that someone (has had/had) sexual contact with you when you were unable to provide consent or stop what was happening because you were incapacitated? This question asks about events that you think, but are not certain, happened. Yes or no?

	Yes	No	No opinion
All	6	94	*
Men	3	97	*
Women	8	92	*

Seventh, sexual coercion (sex obtained by making promises such as inviting you to a party) is apparently considered sexual assault (which is absurd):*

COERCION

56. (Since starting college/While you were in college), (has/did) anyone (had/have) sexual contact with you either by making threats of nonphysical punishment, such as being fired from a job or damaging your reputation, or by making promises of rewards, such as raising a grade or inviting you to a party? Yes or no?

	Yes	No	No opinion
All	3	97	*
Men	1	98	*
Women	4	96	*

The survey is eye-opening because of the percentage of young women who think its better to sacrifice their wrongly accused brothers than to let a rapist stay enrolled in college. This reflects a disturbing undercurrent we've been writing about for many years — that the wrongly accused are treated as collateral damage in the "more important" war on rape. (Of course, merely expelling a rapist isn't going to stop him from raping college or other women, often in the same off-campus place where he raped while he was a student. The sexual grievance industry doesn't seem very worried about that.)

Put all that aside, the survey is making headlines for reinforcing the 1-in-5 canard. As shown above, the survey is not reliable because of the way the questions are worded. Beyond that, even if the questions were worded properly, it would still be problematic. A recent scientific study shows that some women lie on surveys to minimize their consensual sexual encounters, likely because of societal double-standards that find it acceptable for men, but not women, to engage in sexual activity. These lies are designed to bring women in sync with their expected gender role, and it is the same reason many women lie about rape–to defend their femininity. Should we not expect, then, that some women report in surveys that they've been subjected to*unwanted* sex even when, in fact, the sex was consensual in order to be in sync with societal expectations about gender roles? The Washington Post survey doesn't take that into account.

Why is it assumed that sexual assault surveys are the moral equivalent of truth serum where women are incapable of telling anything but the one, objective truth? Why is every untested assertion of sexual assault assumed to be true based solely on the "victim's" side of the story? The fact is, people exaggerate, lie, and claim their behavior is better than it really is in all sorts of surveys and other public pronouncements–not just sex surveys. People exaggerate the hours they work; how often they go to church; their height and their weight; and their altruism during emergencies. White voters lie in surveys about their willingness to vote for a black political candidate. Heck, people even lie about the reason they buy a new computer. Nearly one in four women admitted to exaggerating or lying in social media about key aspects of their lives between one and three times per month.

It is well to note that surveys also show that almost 30 percent of women claim to have seen a ghost. Should we conclude there's an epidemic of ghostly encounters afflicting college women? Or would we require some greater proof before reaching that conclusion?

This is a serious question, with serious implications. The issue we raise isn't some abstraction, and we do not write this to engage in some sort of "Oppression Olympics." The fact is, sexual assault surveys are routinely used to justify the policy of diminishing the due process rights of male students accused of sexual assault. There are legitimate reasons for doubting the reliability of these surveys, and these concerns should not be dismissed as rape apology, misogyny, or slut shaming. Nor should we be demonized for merely raising the issue. This is an issue that ought to be seriously, and respectfully, discussed.

Love shyness and male privilege

June 22, 2015 | by Yuval Levental | Link | Original Link

Love-shyness is a condition (download book as PDF here) named in 1987 by Brian Gilmartin, a professor of Psychology. Gilmartin conducted a study, which might be the only known study of its kind, focusing on the traits of college-aged and middle-aged men who were virginal and had significant trouble meeting women. There is not even a Wikipedia article, as he is the only source on the subject. Obviously, many feminists today would label these men as entitled "Nice Guys" and claim that they were just being lazy. However, his study revealed several unique characteristics common among his subjects which were beyond their control.

Gilmartin believes that love-shyness is a very crucial issue, not limited to just dating problems. For instance, on page 442, he reports that the unemployment rate for love-shies was sixteen percent. This is because they had difficulty making job connections and working up the courage to meet new employers. The surprising finding was that most love-shies were college-educated and had done well in classes, so they were well-learned in a textbook sense. Some other characteristics include demanding families and lack of athletic ability. Above all though, the most unusual characteristic was that love-shies might have trouble breathing through the nose.

When psychological conditions are analyzed, usually the mental state is most focused on. However, physical symptoms are just as important. On page 365, In Shyness and Love, Gilmartin states, "Indeed, if one were to predict among a large group of elementary school boys just exactly who is likely to go on to a life of chronic and painful love-shyness, there does not appear to be any better or more readily observable medical predictor than that of difficulties involving the nose." The control group in his study could mostly breathe properly, with the percent difference between the two groups being anywhere from 30% to 50%. He then states that the ability to breathe through the nose is associated with the feeling of freedom. This is because proper breathing cools the body, allowing for clarity in thinking. Possible causes that Gilmartin listed included a deviated septum and an abnormal nasal structure.

An autistic critique of feminism

#YesAllWomen is complete nonsense

I posted this fact on the RedPill subreddit to get the word out about this finding. A good number of respondents did claim that they had trouble breathing through the nose, though there were some exceptions. However, nothing is always true. The post received a net count of 172 upvotes and was well-received.

Adding to this, Gilmartin estimated that 40% of people with love-shyness have Asperger's syndrome. Interestingly enough, a study from the University of Missouri that was published in Molecular Autism in 2011 noted that autistic children had flatter noses and wider eyes. Perhaps, air might not be able to move efficiently up the nose, leaving a sufferer winded and unconfident 24/7. Additionally, another study also from 2011 noted that children with extra divisions in their lungs also have autism. The extra divisions cause resistance to inhaled air, making the sufferer winded constantly.

In conclusion, this discovery has nothing to do with male entitlement, patriarchy, male privilege, or so forth. Men with severe love-shyness already have a difficult time, yet are falsely accused of being privileged because the media portrays them as such. Hopefully, with this evidence, we can push forward with dating help for men, in addition to improving marketable skills.

Black Men Are The Sharp End Of The Men's Rights Movement Spear – They Just Don't Know It

June 22, 2015 | by Mumia Ali | Link | Original Link

"David, listen to me. It's not what's he's doing to you. It's what you're not doing."
-Bill Cosby, May 2004

Last week's column, written by AVFM contributor Andre Morell, rightly examines the current state of the Manosphere, particularly along racial lines. Mr. Morell observes that many of the issues activists in the Men's Rights Movement fight for, from equity in child custody, child support and divorce courts to justice against false rape accusations and fighting against bigoted and misandrist portrayals of men in everyday situations, not only could apply to Black American men in general, they in fact loom very large in their lives. Morell then raises the question, if I may put it so colloquially, of why there ain't no Brothas on the wall; I argue that the question, even if compelling, is ill-put.

The question is why no Brothas want to be on the wall in the first place.

Look, it has long been known that the Manosphere – that corner of the Internet where there are all manner of social media, like websites, blogs, podcasts and the like, devoted to the concerns of men big and small, profound and trivial – is a bit monochrome. Sure, inside baseballers will point to a sizable presence of (white) women, like Karen Straughan or Janet Bloomfield; they can cite statistics that firmly point to the fact that Black readership of websites like A Voice for Men and say, Return of Kings – without a doubt, two of the largest online venues for the affairs of men in day to day life to date, have a not insignificant portion of "men of color".

But, let's face it – it isn't unfair, or a stretch, to say that the Manosphere, especially in terms of its biggest names and best known faces, are largely white and male.

And you know something?

I, for one, am completely cool with that.

Don't get me wrong – in order for the Manosphere to move forward, it will, for mere reasons of its own survival, have to get serious about its Angry White Guy™ problem, because that's the perception of the MRM from the outside looking in – and unlike the other "legs" of the Manospherian "stool" – like MGTOWs and PUAs – MRAs (Men's Rights Activists) NEED the support of the public at large in order to begin to make any headway on the issues they advocate for. The aforementioned groups don't need such public support, and in fact in one case – MGTOWs in particular – they actively eschew it.

But, to be an MRA, is by definition, to play the public relations game. And like it or not, in the identity politics-driven world in which we live, the MRM continuing to have a largely white, and aging, "face" before the public, ignites as many fires as it seeks to stamp out.

Simply put, the MRM won't be able to move to the next level in their agenda – which, make no mistake about it, is all about changing hearts and minds, no matter how many of the party faithful may gnash their teeth and stamp their feet about it – so long as they continue to have the perception that the MRM is shot through with Angry White Guy™. As many in their topmost ranks should well know by now, when it comes to politics and public relations, perception very much IS reality.

But all of that is beside the point of my missive today; why aren't Black men involved in what could arguably be called the greatest civil rights issue(s) of our time? I submit that it doesn't have anything to do with the admittedly largely white Manosphere, and everything to do with the failure of Black men to take their own destinies into their hands.

I mean, think about it: why is there no Black analog to the Manosphere? After all, it isn't like Black men don't blog, or use social media. Just last month, Mr. Paul Elam, editor-in-chief of A Voice for Men, wrote a particularly frank open letter of sorts to one Mr. Damon "The Champ" Young, editor-in-chief of Very Smart Brothas, a very well known and popular website that features, among others, Damon and his partner in crime, Mr. Panama Jackson. That article featured an equally going-hard-in-the-paint quote from yours truly, about Mr. Young himself and why I felt he failed to live up to the hype of being hailed as part of the new school of Black media moguls. No matter what one may think of me personally, my take on Young or indeed Young himself, what cannot be denied is the fact that Young, nor Jackson, is no stranger to the MRM cause – I was a kind of unofficial "ambassador" for the movement over at VSB, for the better part of five years. Not only that, but both Jackson and Young, had to concede that the MRM did indeed have a number of valid points.

So, why didn't they take up the banner, at least on a part-time basis?

Well, the easy answer is race – that the MRM and wider Manosphere, is just too white, and by extension racist, to fully get on board with the movement's concerns, aims and goals – even if it could be proven beyond a shadow of a doubt, that said concerns had much more urgency and importance for Black men than anyone else. Of course, there's also the fact that Black men like Young and Jackson, honestly and simply do not agree with the ideas of the MRM, which is fair though in my view woefully misguided. To say nothing of just flatout wrong.

At any rate, my point is that it ain't like Black men in the know, like a Young or a Jackson, simply don't know any better – they do. They simply do not see the plight of Black men along these lines to be important enough to make a stink about it.

And that is what is really, truly, holding Black men back from the Men's Rights Movement.

Back when I interviewed Prof. Michael Kimmel, recognized perhaps the world over as one of the foremost experts on mens' issues and the so-called "crisis of masculinity" in our time, we spent a goodly bit of time discussing his then-recent book "Angry White Men" – which argues, in part, that part of the "problem" of white men in our time, is that of "aggrieved entitlement" – that they felt entitled to a world that is no longer their own, and they're hopping mad about it.

While Kimmel and others like him indulge themselves in the rantings of white guys on the fringes of polite society, I came to discover a key factor that accounts for how and why

Black men are MIA in the MRM:

It's because, in a very real and profound way, Kimmel's analysis is correct. White men, rightly or wrongly, are fighting to either preserve the world they know before it completely slips away (as is the case in some sectors of the Manosphere, like Return of Kings and its titular leader RooshV's recent ideas of "Neomasculinity"), or, to remake the world in an image that is more amenable to them (as is the case of Paul Elam and Dean Esmay, here at AVfM). In either case, white men see themselves as movers and shakers, as warriors fighting for a cause, no matter how daunting, no matter how "lost". White men see the world as theirs.

Black men, on the other hand, simply do not. Take a listen to what Black men talk about, be it on the block or in the halls of Congress – there is no sense of "aggrieved entitlement"; no sense of fighting to regain what was or is being lost; no sense of really forging a new path forward along the lines of masculinity and its relationship to the rest of the world. Black men are listless, apathetic, in ways big and small; and of those who are advocates of one stripe or another, they are largely of the type Mr. Elam took Mr. Damon Young and others out to the woodshed for – as being little more than lapdogs and sycophants to largely middle and upper middle class white women and their sisters-from-a-distance, Black feminists. Why should Mr. Elam, who's worked his behind off over the better part of the past decade, throw his doors open to a cohort of men who can't even be bothered to give a damn themselves about their own lives? Why should Roosh give a damn about Black men, when Black men don't seem to give a damn about themselves?

Why is it that in more than five years, we can count the numbers of well-known Black MRAs on one hand? Why is it that Black men simply don't care enough to make a ruckus about their own lives? Why don't Black men show up for themselves? Why don't Black men make their own spaces with which to articulate these issues?

I say the reason is, in part at least, due to an utter lack of ownership on the part of Black men and yes, entitlement, that white men, for better or for worse, do have. In order for Black men to truly find a place in the Men's Rights Movement – read, among and with their white colleagues and brothers-in-arms – Black men will have to hash some things out for themselves. Black men will have to become a little entitled, too. In feeling entitled to basic rights as men, Black men will be saying that Black men are worth a damn.

That's some entitlement that needs to happen.

Is Feminism Non-Violent?

There are many schools of thought concerning revolution, how it works, and how to make it work better. I will discuss two of these, because I put them ahead of anything else you might say upon that subject.

First, consider Malcolm X, who famously remarked that “there is no such thing as a non-violent revolution”. He was right. Any revolution at all requires violence in the form of violation, meaning a discontinuity which violates a system of understanding or authority.

Discontinuity is the operative term because it implies a sudden change of state. First you are A, then all at once you are B. There is nothing seamless in the transition from A to B, and that’s what revolution is all about. To arrive at B, you must violate A.

Any revolution worth the name involves, more or less, a paradigm shift from A to B. More to the point, a revolution violates a paradigm by breaking out of it. For example, the American revolution violated the paradigm of the British Empire by breaking out of it.

So how do you break out of a paradigm? The same way you break out of anything else — by breaking something! And it is violent to break things, is it not?

I admit that Malcolm X could have meant “violence” as a layman would understand it, meaning down-and-dirty physical violence or the threat of such. If nothing else, a confrontation where voices are raised, emotions run high, and somebody finally backs off. So as you might conclude, “violence” covers quite a spectrum — but it always has something to do with violation.

Next, consider Gandhi, the apostle of non-violence who certainly tried his hand at revolution, although he did this too soon to benefit from Malcolm X’s 1963 wisdom. Gandhi faced his share of violence, and violence finally ended his life. Yet he did pull India out of the British Empire by violating the paradigm of that empire. I think it is safe to call this a revolution.

But again, Malcolm X was right — there is no such thing as a non-violent revolution. Not only are establishments notorious for never giving up their power without a fight, but revolution would not be revolution in the first place if the element of violation went missing.

All revolution is violative. You must break eggs to make omelettes.

How did Gandhi make his revolution happen non-violently? The answer is that he didn’t, or at any rate, not precisely. Let’s look again at Malcolm X’s precept. He says there is no such thing as a non-violent revolution, but what are we entitled to conclude from this? I would say, only that no revolution can occur without the admixture of violence somewhere along its timeline.

However, that says nothing about the source of the violence. It does not stipulate that the dissidents should be violent against the establishment, only that violence should occur somewhere in the mix of events. So it could just as well be the establishment cracking down on the dissidents – that too would count as violence, and would stamp the character of violence upon the revolutionary process.

The non-feminist revolution, like any other revolution, will entail violence because it will entail violation. The ruling cultural paradigm, that of feminism, is to be booted out of our lives on non-feminist authority — and that surely violates intellectual protocol, if nothing else. Those on the receiving end (the feminists themselves) will feel this as a wrenching change — rather like a quantum jump, owing to its discontinuity.

Events at the University of Toronto, in Canada, have been revealing. On three separate occasions, speakers were scheduled to give public lectures on matters pro-male or critical of the feminist establishment. Each time, anti-male crowds greeted the event with behavior that could be described as violent. Their purpose was manifestly political: to block open expression, within the academic community, of ideas that could undermine the accepted foundation of intellectual authority within that community.

Simply put, Toronto was a turf war. The anti-male rioters perfectly understood the critical nature of the conflict. They of course understood the symbolic significance of the occasion. But further, they knew that if the non-feminist side could proselytize unmolested in what they (the rioters) consider “their” territory, it would be a game changer, signalling that the non-feminist side has gained institutional legitimation.

So the anti-male rioters were repelling an attack upon their shore, preventing the enemy from gaining a beachhead that would ease the way to incursions further inland. Their naked fear was evident.

The greatly outnumbered non-feminist group acted with coolness, and did credit to itself. Nothing in their comportment hinted at physical violence. And yet, a rarified form of violence — a purely cerebral kind — was at least implicit. It may have lacked noise, blunt force or other such drama, but it was profoundly violative. A paradigm was openly challenged, and the enormity of this challenge was not lost upon the challenged. It provoked a wildly outlandish reaction from them because they felt violated.

What prompted all the fuss and feathers? A pair of staid middle-aged writers were making a speech about a serious social problem, namely misandry: the pervasive hatred of men and maleness in the culture at large.

Now surely we ought to look into something like that, and if possible, remedy it. I would certainly think so. Furthermore, I would salute the authors, Nathanson and Young, for their active moral conscience, and I would encourage them to give public lectures every chance they get.

But as we have seen, it is no easy thing to make an openly pro-male speech on a college campus. Many people in those settings simply do not want the possible reality of misandry to be referenced in any way, and if you attempt this they will try to shut you up by force.

In other words, by violence. They hate to be told that man-hating exists at all: their screaming paroxysms and their ‘Lord of the Flies’ stick-poundings bore witness to this.

The anti-male “Femistasi” group in Vancouver was whipped into a similar rage by the statement that men’s rights are human rights. Evidently they don’t approve of human rights for half the population, and the bare idea of such a thing makes them rabidly angry.

Friends, it looks like we are on the side of Ralph and Piggy. That’s the sort of revolutionaries we are.

So again, revolution is a violent process, meaning that violation is involved at every level.

First comes the violence of intellectual audacity needed to break out of a paradigm.

Next, any violence meted out by defenders of that paradigm.

Finally, any violence meted out by the attackers of the paradigm in response to the defenders.

Such is our template of revolution as extrapolated from Malcolm X, and it is a true vision. It comports with the facts of the world.

Malcolm X stated the facts, but Gandhi astutely put them to work. He apparently understood that violence in a raw, dramatic form comes at a cost because it can easily make you look like the bad guy. He also apparently understood that abstention from violence virtually never makes you look like the bad guy. He understood that if you confine your violence to only the most rarified forms of violation, you would drive your opponent into an untenable position — to either inflict raw, dramatic violence at the risk of discrediting himself, or to do nothing at all and leave you free to move your plans forward unmolested.

Gandhi’s method, if ideally practiced, is the miniscule violence of a pinprick which ends the life of a balloon: the main violence is the loud bang that follows!

So the principle holds true that no revolution happens without some manner of violence or violation. Feminism, with its genius for playing the victim, seems to have imbibed the spirit of Gandhi in a perverted way. A feminist will use every trick in the book to invert the narrative in feminism’s favor, either provoking actual violence from the opposition or elaborately lying about it.

Such is the art of the threat narrative, and the feminists are past masters of this art.

I think our best plan is to out-Gandhi the feminists. In principle, this is not difficult. We have seen how morbidly sensitive they are, when any threat to their paradigm looms on the horizon. That is when they “lose it”, and do unwise things, and make fools of themselves.

And this happens right readily, for the tree of feminist folly is heavy with fruit and need only be shaken. A threat to their paradigm, even a subtle one, is a pinch they will keenly feel — and keen too, will be their reaction.

Thus far, their reaction has consisted of yelling, pounding, ripping, lying and journalistic smearing. These operations attain a certain point on the violence spectrum, though not, I grant you, the utmost. But as matters predictably escalate, so too will the level of feminist violence.

Such is the nature of revolution. We ought to be on the lookout for this, and what's more, we ought to be careful that none of wildly exaggerated violence comes from our side.

Let THEM be the violent ones — that is, let them be the ones who look like the bad guys. They have already damaged themselves plenty, by their behavior, and we know that if we only push their buttons in the right combinations, they'll repeat the performance. They can barely restrain themselves, and not for long.

If the anti-male rioters had been wise, they would have stayed home and let the scheduled events take place in peace. But they were not wise, so they gave the non-feminist side valuable publicity while giving themselves horrendous publicity.

Of course, they were in a bind and they knew it, for if they had stayed home they would have symbolically surrendered the field and admitted the right of non-feminist groups to operate on "their" campus. They knew they had to make a gesture of some kind and so they did, but they made a hash of it and discredited themselves. In the end, they showed the world exactly how much they detested the idea of male human rights.

A word to our side. All who see themselves as part of the pro-male, non-feminist vanguard should openly endorse the principle of non-violence, and reiterate this in a way that the broader public will undoubtedly hear it. And when you form a non-feminist co-movement of any kind, you should state this principle near the top of your manifesto. Nail that manifesto to the wall, so you need only point to it and say: "THAT, right there! That is what we stand for!"

We should repudiate all physical violence apart from what self-defense requires, and we should stand quietly with our arms folded while the other side comes slowly to a boil. Let the world bear witness to this. If there is no such thing as a non-violent revolution, then let theirs be raw, dramatic violence, and let ours be merely intellectual violation that we direct against the feminist establishment and its cultural paradigm.

From such a strategy we can only gain, and they can only lose.

Study proves most animals are self-aware

June 23, 2015 | by Paul Hamaker | Link | Original Link

A sense of self has long been thought to be a human's only characteristic. New experiments and observations of experiments that date as far back as 1950 have convinced Professor Thomas Hills with the University of Warwick's Department of Psychology and Professor Stephen Butterfill from Warwick's Department of Philosophy that most animals possess a sense of self. The discovery was reported in the June 15, 2015, edition of the journal Current Zoology.

Mice and other vertebrates were seen to stop at points in a maze that required a decision. The decision making indicates that animals can propose and reject different paths of action. The animals can envision an outcome or a number of outcomes based on a decision before they make the decision. This capacity is a key element of self-awareness.

The researchers found that the areas of the hippocampus in test animals displayed more activity when the animals had to make a decision in a maze. The same areas of the human brain are activated to a greater extent when humans envision the outcome of a choice. The physical evidence substantiates the concept that most animals are self-aware.

The level of self-awareness in animals does not appear to be at the same level of human beings. The research does show that even mice have the basics of self-awareness needed to have a sense of self. The sense of self would assist animals in hunting, foraging, and mating. This is the first known demonstration of physical evidence that indicates that animals have a sense of self.

False accusations and the denial of men’s emotional pain

June 23, 2015 | by Tom Golden | Link | Original Link

I keep hearing that false accusations of rape make it harder on real victims of rape. Really? There may be a kernel of truth in this idea but it completely ignores the trauma and pain of the man who is falsely accused. The knee jerk reaction of most people is to worry over the woman and ignore the pain of the man.

This pattern to focus on females in emotional pain and offer help whil e ignoring the emotional pain of men and boys is the default in the United States. This not only leaves our men and boys without help, it also leaves us with an ignorance about their emotional pain.

To get a sense of the emotional pain of the falsely accused listen to the words of a young man falsely accused of rape via an article on slate.com:

“My girlfriend was raped several years ago. I was falsely accused of rape less than a year ago. I contacted her (I had known her before her incident) because I was desperate for someone to talk to who would understand what I was going through. To my great relief, it turned out that we understood each other very well. From the initial stages of suicidal thoughts and not being able to function to the long-term fear, mistrust, and guilt that are facts of our lives, it turns out that her experience of being raped and mine of being falsely accused of rape were very similar. …”

He touches on some of the hallmarks of a false accusation which he and his girlfriend realized were very similar to her reaction to having been raped. The loss of functioning, the suicidal thoughts, the long-term fear and mistrust along with the potent guilt are a few of their similar reactions.

It often starts out innocently enough. He hears that she has accused him of something he didn’t do. He is not so worried, at least not at first. He knows he did nothing wrong and figures that when people get the facts that this will blow over like a dark cloud that never rains a drop. But, to his shock, he starts seeing that even when he speaks the truth about what actually happened he is still considered a criminal.

But our young falsely accused man goes a step farther in his descriptions of his situation. Listen to what he says:

“One important difference, though, is that when she was violated, she received a great deal of help (medical, legal, psychological). Apart from family and friends, I was on my own. My legal and psychological problems had to be dealt with by me at a time when I couldn’t eat, sleep, or think (except, of course, about killing myself).”

He sees very clearly that very few believe him while nearly everyone believes the woman. The system and our culture are failing him. His pain is invisible while hers is treated with reverence, even though she is lying.

He must be shocked by the amount of coddling and care that she gets from friends, family, the university, the authorities, and so many others. He is likely shocked again when he compares this to the reaction he receives. Almost no support, but plenty of negatives.

In most instances the woman is believed no matter what. The police ignore his side and treat him like a rapist, the media is more than happy to paint him as if convicted and throw his name around willy nilly with at least the inference that he is a rapist. Rape centers make demands that all those claiming to have been raped should be believed no matter what. While it might be a good idea to put your trust in someone in crisis it quickly turns to crap if you put your trust in someone who is lying. The rape centers refuse to admit there are liars out there and they will go to great lengths to shame the police, the hospital, the media, the public or anyone who might even ask a question about the veracity of her claims. This sets us up for a real mess. By giving the liars a pass you set up the falsely accused for chaos.

As time goes on he realizes that he is basically alone in his knowledge of the truth. No one believes him. Even his friends are wondering. He starts to feel way out on a limb and also very shocked. It is just hard to believe that your entire universe of friends, teachers, adults are looking at you sideways due to the lies of a woman. It's hard to believe that a system of "justice" has gotten things so wrong and is intentionally and wrongly painting you as a criminal. The world which not long ago seemed safe and predictable has now become unsafe and very unpredictable. This promotes confusion and the devastating isolation that is so common for the falsely accused along with the potent fears of the world being a big unpredictable booby trap. They feel isolated, profoundly judged and labelled, unsafe and alone and in a world that has gone mad.

This is a billboard that says double standard. While the emotional plight of the young woman is given support at every step by friends, family, the police, courts, the media and others the emotional state of the young falsely accused male is ignored and denied. He is viewed as the problem. She is automatically seen as a victim simply because she accuses him, he is seen as a pariah simply for being accused. He is in great pain and turmoil but no one lifts a finger to be of assistance. The sad fact is he is presumed guilty prior to trial. He is now seen as an object, not as a human being. He is profoundly objectified. The double standard could not be more stark.

The larger problem is that this pattern of catering to the emotional pain of females and ignoring the emotional pain of males is not exclusive to false accusations. You see this same pattern most everyplace you look. In my work with traumatized men over the past 30 years I have seen it repeatedly. Time and again I would see that in a traumatized family the men's wives would be the focus of help and the man's pain would be ignored. Often times people would approach the father and rather than ask about his situation they would say, "How's your wife holding up?" The woman gets the support, the man, gets asked about his wife.

This same pattern is seen when our culture, media, and academia all focus on female victims of domestic violence and ignore the male victims. They do this even though research shows that men are about 1/2 of the victims. Congress sets up a billion dollar service for women and men get ignored or even blamed.

We see the same ignoring of men's emotional pain when we see that males are 80% of completed suicide but there are no services specifically for males who are suicidal. There is also not much research looking into why men are 80% of completed suicides. It seems it is much easier to get funding to study women, the men get left out. And of course, the media fails to inform the public of men in pain. Dead silence. Same thing with workplace deaths where men are 93% of the dead. People simply don't care. If these deaths were female or even some minority the media would be screaming loudly. But when men are the victims, we get silence.

Our culture is now and always has been very gynocentric. (for more information see http://gynocentrism.com) One definition of gynocentrism found on that site is "any culture instituting rules for gender relationships that benefit females at the expense of males across a broad range of measures." When it comes to emotional needs it is clear in our culture that a woman's emotional pain is a call to action while a man's emotional pain is ignored. Some try to cover this profound bias by claiming men are cold and don't want to deal with their emotions. But this has simply been a cover to excuse oneself from even needing to pay the slightest attention to the man's emotional pain. Epic fail.

The contrast is great between the cultural response to female and male emotional pain. One gets compassion and the other gets ignored, shamed, or both. This contrast is so great that it behooves the label of bigotry. Just as we saw whites create a system where whites automatically got services superior to that of blacks today we see our government and charities developing services where women get care and compassion far superior to that of men and no one even notices. No one. Reminds me of a bigoted 1950's southern town that didn't think its action were in any way a problem. In today's world, the status quo, that is nearly everyone, are guilty of bigotry by not having compassion for the emotional pain of men. Which side of the fence do you stand on? Are you a bigot who has little compassion for boys and men?

Perhaps someday we will look back on this era and see its bigotry just as we now look back on the racism of the 1950's. I do hope that day comes quickly.

Australia’s Rosie Batty is seriously batty

June 23, 2015 | by Mark Dent | Link | Original Link

I recently took a deep breath, steeled myself and clicked play on a video of Rosie Batty’s recent speech to the National Press Club.

What followed was beyond insane. I sat staring at my computer screen, hoping one person, preferably a man, in that audience, would raise his hand and simply say:

“Enough!”

But no, these hardened journalists nodded like neutered sycophants at every vile, bigoted word she spoke. You must watch the speech and see the sea of sickeningly contrite cowards, nodding at Batty’s every word, like followers of some twisted cult. Many eyes were moist with tears and there was a look of almost orgasmic smugness on the faces of the women the camera chose to capture as their guru assured them that they were victims in an oppressive patriarchy.

Batty is a bigot. Her own words make this an uncontestable fact.

We all know, despite all evidence to the contrary, that Batty refers to Family Violence as a gendered violence. As she spoke, it seemed to me she could have said almost anything, and her captive audience would have accepted it unquestioningly.

We are used to hearing the old one in three, one in five statistics with regard to women and their experience of violence and sexual assault. Both are wildly inaccurate. But when Batty said she would make it easier for her audience to understand how devastating these (false) statistics are, she asked them to imagine that the whole audience was female. Of the 150 women present, 50 of them will have experienced violence in some form. She didn’t define what behaviour constitutes violence. This was a wise move as we know it can range from a slammed door to having a knife through your neck. The vast majority would be victims of the former type of abuse. Cue the slow , sad head shakes of the females as the camera panned across the room……oh how we suffer sisters….it is our (not so secret) burden.

I have become almost immune to the twisted, manipulated statistics used by feminists to prove that violence is an entirely gendered problem. So I was able to sit through this predictable babble without too much angst.

I had no idea that so much worse was yet to come.

We of course had the usual ridiculous references to “Australia’s Dirty Little Secret’- apparently 25 years of advertising campaigns, billboards across the country spelling out the evils of men and their abusive ways, the creation of countless DV shelters, a Minister for Women, documentaries, education programs in our schools, the spending of tens of millions of dollars in funding, the creation of the White Ribbon Organization and endless discussion forums and current affair programs focusing on Family violence , it is still a secret.

Batty spoke about the role the media plays in forming attitudes about Family violence.

She had the nerve to quote the story of a man who killed his wife and three children. What disgusted her most, was the fact that people who knew the father said he was in fact a “nice man” The story also mentioned the fact that his wife had suffered a brain trauma injury and the strain of taking care of her and his children cause him to snap.

Her next line was supposedly the smack between the eyes we all need when we dare to think something may have broken inside a person who murders their entire family.

Batty said: “News flash- nice men who love their family do not control or murder them.”

But Batty is wrong. She knows it too. Many women have been absolved of all guilt after butchering their children. Almost universally the women were said to be under enormous strain and words like cracked, snapped, breakdown, overwhelmed, struggle depression and cry for help are attached to any article focusing on the murder of children by their mother.

The Journalists know this and that audience was filled with nothing but journalists. I waited for one to stand up or even raise a hand and say,“Rosie, why do you speak of the excuses we make for men when they kill, when we are far more likely to excuse women who kill? In fact, the example you cited of the man who murdered his family is a rare case of a violent man being presented as something more than an evil, masculine monster”

There was not even a facial twitch to betray a hint of discomfort with her outrageously biased, bigoted words. There have been so many recent cases of women doing just what the man did and people have described them as good mums and caring people. Was this not a worthy point to be raised and discussed?

The elephant was not just in the room, it was taking a big shit centre stage and still, not one journalist had the fucking balls to point out the elephant and its big pile of shit. They just smiled their sad, knowing smiles and let the bigot spew more hate.

“Women are not to blame!” Batty said.

Again, silence. No mention of the many blameworthy women in our society who have escaped Batty’s attention.

Batty repeated the word “women and children” like a holy mantra throughout her speech. This is such a clever ploy as it deeply embeds the notion that men are a distinct and very separate group of beings who target innocent “women and children” with their violent abuse. It’s neat and simple and something the public can swallow and believe. The fact that in the past decade, 52% of the children murdered by a parent were killed by their mums is neither here nor there in Rosie’s world.

A number of times Batty referred to the urgency of the problem and the need to keep the focus on Family Violence from slipping off the radar. I found that comment simply hilarious.

Has a day gone by in the past two decades where there has not been a story about domestic violence or the problem with men and violence?

When questioned by the “one good man” on the role gender plays in this societal scourge, Batty really found her voice. It seemed she was reading directly from a feminist manifesto.

> " It's absolutely a stereotypical Australian male-there's nowhere to hide. As men and women we are born with our views of life. From the moment that we breathe you have your male sense of privilege and entitlement that you view through your lens. You don't know any different. As a woman we know our place."

This disgusting drivel was allowed to roll on uninterrupted, with not even a hint of an eyebrow being raised, let alone a voice.

Rosie then launched into a personal history of her family and spoke of the expectation that she would marry while her three brothers would go to an agricultural college and inherit the farm, having a career path for the rest of their lives.

She added:

"I never got the rich husband." I suppose she means the one she felt entitled to marry and who would be there for her as provider and protector. Rosie wasn't born with a sense of entitlement and privilege.

She then said:

"But dad did divide up the farm and gave us all an equal share."

So why did we have to endure the sob story about her patriarchal father? Did Rosie really want to work on the farm for the rest of her life? It seems everyone was treated fairly and gender was irrelevant.
She then jumped from family violence to demanding that we "work out better gender based levels in our political parties' and noted that "the media is very top heavy with males. Looking at her predominantly female audience this seemed a rather exaggerated observation.

Again, Batty sees patriarchy at play when numbers are not equal in certain occupations. It has nothing to do with choice, it's all about subjugation of the female species. She made no reference to the huge gender imbalance in teaching, a profession that literally molds the values and ideas our future generations carry with them for a lifetime. Nor was she concerned about the female dominated professions of nursing and social work.

In the final moments of her time Batty reiterated her most important message.

It is a gender issue.
We want to excuse violence.
We want to blame drugs and alcohol.
We want to say it's the ice epidemic.
We want to believe that.
We want to believe it's mental illness.
But NO!

These issues exacerbate violence, inflame, but are not the cause.

The cause is a gender issue.

After much gnashing of teeth and cursing the sniveling cowardice of the fawning minions,

I heard the host of the speech announce there would be just one more question from a young girl, a student from Canberra Girls' Grammar.

She shares the surname and resides in same town as a well known academic with misandrist tendencies. If she is his daughter, I am sure her dad would be very proud of her.

The war against boys: Are the ADHD drugs unsafe?

June 23, 2015 | by Tom Golden | Link | Original Link

[Ed. note: AVfM's Tom Golden sounded the alarm about the drugging of American boys .]

Have you heard anything in the media about the meds used for ADHD being unsafe? I would bet not. But guess what? There's been quite a bit of scientific data pointing towards that very possibility. Just have a look at this page:

http://www.leonardsax.com/stimulants.html

Leonard Sax, M.D. has been pointing out these potential risk factors for some time and I can't remember seeing any articles in the news media other then those written by Sax.

The worst thing about these potential side effects and brain changes resulting from these meds is that they center around de-motivating the boy. The very thing that the medicine is trying to do, to help him focus, is negated by this potential impact of simply not wanting to get out of bed. Here's what Sax says in his excellent book on boys, Boys Adrift:

> "The stimulant medications appear to exert their harmful effects by damaging an area of the developing brain called the nucleus accumbens. Independent groups of researchers at the University of Michigan, the Medical University of South Carolina, the University of Pittsburgh, Brown University as well as in Sweden, Italy, and the Netherlands all have found that exposing laboratory animals to these medications, even at low doses and for short periods can cause permanent damage to the nucleus accumbens, the part of the brain that is responsible for translating motivation into action. if a boy's nucleus accumbens is damaged, he may still feel hungry, or sexually aroused. He just won't feel motivated to do anything about it."

Sax states that we can't be certain yet about the damage in humans since the evidence is not fully in. However, he asks parents a simple question: Would you like to volunteer your son for a trial?

Most parents would say no. But that is only if they know the dangers. At this point very few people seem to know these drugs may be risky. I have seen no headlines, heard no "60 Minutes" reports or specials on NPR. I have heard nothing about the possible risks involved. Silence. Just consider what might happen if medications used for mostly girls were found to have a similar risk. There would be a firestorm of articles about the misogyny of the medical professionals and the pharmaceutical companies labeling them as patriarchal evil doers and oppressors. It would likely be front page material. But not so with boys.

But it gets worse. The media is usually informed by medical professionals and those folks are simply not speaking up, or worse yet, they are saying the opposite. Take Dr Biederman for example. Dr. Joseph Biederman is the chief of pediatric psychopharmacology at Massachusetts General Hospital. You know, the hospital associated with Harvard University. Here's a bit from Wikipedia about Dr Biederman:

> In 2007, Biederman was ranked as the second highest producer of high-impact papers in psychiatry overall throughout the world with 235 papers cited a total of 7048 times over the past 10 years as determined by the Institute for Scientific Information (ISI).[2] The same organization ranked Biederman at #1 in terms of total citations to his papers published on ADD/ADHD in the past decade.[3]
> Biederman was the recipient of the 1998 NAMI Exemplary Psychiatrist award. He was also selected by the Massachusetts Psychiatric Society Awards committee as the recipient of the 2007 Outstanding Psychiatrist Award for Research. In 2007, Biederman received the Excellence in Research Award from the New England Council of Child and Adolescent Psychiatry. He was also awarded the Mentorship Award from the Department of Psychiatry at the Massachusetts General Hospital.

This is someone who's opinion is counted by all and especially by the media.

And what does Dr Biederman say about these drugs. According to Sax he has been "strenuously encouraging" their use. Why would the head of Harvard's hospital pharmacology not mention the risks of these drugs? Well, we don't know but we do know one thing, Dr Biederman received 1.6 million dollars from the pharmaceutical companies and never bothered to tell anyone. You do the math.

Then there is Dr. Fred Goodwin, former chief of the National Institute of Mental Health (NIMH). Apparently Dr Goodwin has been singing a similar tune about these drugs being safe and guess what? He has now been outed as getting 1.3 milion dollars from the pharmaceuticals.

How many more Biederman's and Goodwins are out there? Maybe these doctors are part of the reason we haven't been hearing much?

Parents need to know the risks involved. If the media and our medical professionals won't do it, we need to. Send this article and its links to parents who might need to know this information.

Boy uses cannabis oil, says ‘I’d rather be illegally alive than legally dead’

June 23, 2015 | by Lindsay McCane | Link | Original Link

New research is being conducted daily on the use of cannabis oil as a medication, especially in Colorado.

Recently, the Health Symposium at National Jewish Health reviewed several studies about people using marijuana as a treatment for issues such as seizures and insomnia.

Coltyn Turner, 15, says he uses cannabis oil, and states that he would rather be “illegally alive than legally dead.”

Coltyn has Crohn’s disease, and takes cannabis oil four times a day to treat it, according to CBS Denver. Coltyn has been battling the disease since he was 11, and was giving up hope until the cannabis treatment.

“I was just on every pharmaceutical there was out there until I would up in a wheelchair,” Coltyn said.

“He got sick and we had no other options,” Wendy Turner, Coltyn’s mother said, adding that they moved to Colorado in 2014 for him to receive the treatment. “We thought, ‘Well, why not try?’ And it worked.”

“We are very proud of this program in terms of the potential,” Ken Gershman, from the Colorado Department of Public Health and Environment said talking about the program at the National Jewish Health’s Marijuana and Health Symposium, KTVQ reports.

Coltyn is just one example that the cannabis is working. His mother says she hopes that his story will bring awareness, and more action.

“We want people to understand that this is a good option,” Wendy said.

Fisherman and swordfish stab each other to death

June 24, 2015 | by Diana Duel | Link | Original Link

A Hawaiian fisherman died after being pierced through the chest by the very same swordfish he had just speared in the Honokohau small boat harbor on the big island. According to the state Department of Land and Natural Resources, witnesses stated that a charter boat captain had jumped into the water to catch the fish when it fought back. The man was not named in the statement but local television station KITV identified him as 47-year-old Randy Llanes.

Although paramedics quickly performed CPR after pulling him out, they could not save him.

“He was a tough guy, he was such a tough guy that everyone’s scared of him, the whole harbor’s scared of him,” Randy’s sister-in-law Kalina Llanes told KITV. “However, those who knew him well were not scared of him because he has such a big heart.”

In fact, locals who came to attend a gathering for Llanes actually jumped in the harbor and swam out to the spot where he died, leaving a traditional lei there in his honor.

Swordfish typically grow to be anywhere from about 10’-15’ long and can weigh as much as a ton and a half. Females are larger than males. The fish that killed Llanes was reported to be 6-feet long (including its 3-foot bill) and weighed in at 40 lbs.

Swordfish are extremely active and fierce fighters. They have been known to dive so quickly they have impaled their swords into the ocean bottom up to their eyes when harpooned or hooked. They generally do not attack humans unless attacked first. In fact, ancient Hawaiians (as well as fishermen from other cultures, including Sicily) tend to fear them because the fish are known to run their swords through the planking of canoes and other small boats when injured. However, contrary to what many people believe, they do not use their swords as spears, but instead generally use them to “slash” at enemies and prey.

Drug policy more dangerous to men than drugs

June 24, 2015 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

In Lebanon, Tennessee a 61-year-old black man, John Adams, and his wife were sitting at home watching TV. Suddenly there was a thunderous pounding at the door. The couple thought it was a home invasion, and they turned out to be right. The intruders burst through the door with guns. Adams, who had retrieved a shotgun, fired once at them but was immediately gunned down in a hail of bullets. He later died at Vanderbilt University Medical Center in Nashville.

The police investigated the case but it was an internal investigation because the intruders, the killers, were the police.

They were out that day, as they are all across the United States, kicking in doors, looking for drugs, arresting and sometimes shooting people. As has happened so many other times, when they launched the paramilitary style attack on the Adams' home, they were at the wrong address. They were "supposed" to be attacking the house next door.

The official response from police? Lebanon Police Chief Billy Weeks said the officers who pelted John Adams' body with bullets were not at fault.

And perhaps he was correct, in what I would assume is a remarkably myopic interpretation of the word "fault." The police, after all, are following legal and political instructions. They do not make laws, bad or good. They just have the job of enforcing them. We can debate the merits of whether doing evil things is to be excused under the premise of "doing your job," at another time.

Right now, however, let's examine those "legal and political instructions," and the tragedies they are inflicting on society, particularly in the world of men. Just like current social hysteria of "rape culture" has its roots in the racism that affected the Scottsboro Boys and countless other black men, the so-called War on Drugs was conceived as a weapon against minority men and has now crossed the lines of color to put all men in the crosshairs.

> Most of the attacks upon white women of the south are the direct result of a cocaine-crazed negro brain."

That is not taken from a KKK introductory manual. It was a small part of similar, lengthy testimony given before congressional panels on drug policy. This particular quip was from Dr. Christopher Koch of the Pennsylvania Board of Pharmacy. That was in 1914. The wheels had been in motion for a racist and sexist drug policy, however, earlier than that. In 1910 the US Government released an official report stating:

> It has been authoritatively stated that cocaine is often the direct incentive to the crime of rape by the negroes."

It is easy to infer a great deal from the mentality in the nascent stages of US drug policy, particularly the idea that both racism and misandry are intersectional; that both rape hysteria and drug hysteria have their roots in targeting minority men and have now begun to consume the entire population. The numbers in the United States, the most incarceration prone nation on earth, are ominous. Here are some statistics provided by drugpolicy.org.

- Amount spent annually in the U.S. on the war on drugs: More than $51,000,000,000;
- Number of people arrested in 2013 in the U.S. on nonviolent drug charges: 1.5 million;
- Number of people arrested for a marijuana law violation in 2013: 693,482;
- Number of those charged with marijuana law violations who were arrested for possession only: 609,423 (88 percent);
- Number of Americans incarcerated in 2013 in federal, state and local prisons and jails: 2,220,300 or 1 in every 110 adults, the highest incarceration rate in the world;
- Proportion of people incarcerated for a drug offense in state prison who are black or Latino, although these groups use and sell drugs at similar rates as whites: 57 percent;
- Number of students who have lost federal financial aid eligibility because of a drug conviction: 200,000+;
- Number of people in the U.S. who died from a drug overdose in 2013: 43,982;
- Tax revenue that drug legalization would yield annually, if currently illegal drugs were taxed at rates comparable to those on alcohol and tobacco: $46.7 billion;
- The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention found that syringe access programs lower HIV incidence among people who inject drugs by 80 percent;
- One-third of all AIDS cases in the U.S. have been caused by syringe sharing: 354,000 people;
- U.S. federal government support for syringe access programs: $0.00, thanks to a federal ban reinstated by Congress in 2011 that prohibits any federal assistance for them.

In short, the War on Drugs is adversely affecting and killing far, far more people than drugs themselves. Most all of them are men. Without a doubt they are affecting minority men disproportionately. It is much easier for police to kick in doors with guns blazing in places where the victims cannot afford legal representation. This obviously makes drug policy, especially of this particularly virulent strain, a men's issue.

But how, you may ask, does this related to men's general emotional and psychological health? Well, it does in many ways. Prison is a physically and psychologically devastating “solution” to men with addiction problems or for casual users. It effectively takes nonviolent “offenders” and puts them in one of the most violence inducing environments possible.

The overwhelming majority of incarcerated drug offenders are men. There are many factors affecting this, primary among them is that men are twice as likely to be arrested and incarcerated for the same crimes as women. Women’s “criminality” is much more likely to be treated as a mental health issue, while the same behavior in men is viewed and treated as simply criminal.

There is much more than this but it would take a book to get to all of it. Still, the possibility of the therapeutic effects of illegal drugs needs to be part of this discussion. Cannabis has shown significant theoretical promise for a number of physical and emotional ailments but being a Schedule I drug according to the US government it is dismissed, by law, of having any possible medicinal value. Serious research on its medical benefits is nearly impossible to fund.

Throughout history, human beings have used drugs, legally sanctioned or not, for recreational and medicinal purposes. Our knowledge of addictions points directly to the conclusion that those who live with a great amount of stress, trauma or who come from dysfunctional backgrounds are more prone to seek relief in that way. It is ludicrous to assume that the appropriate reaction to that is to punish people with more stress, trauma and dysfunction, which is all our criminal justice system has to offer.

It is time that we rethink our position on supposedly illicit drugs of all kinds and sensibly approach this with damage control in mind instead of just creating more damage. The criminal model of drug abuse response is a deadly and utterly mindless approach, rooted in both sexual and racial bigotry. A mental health model which respects individual freedoms could do more damage control, quit lining the pockets of the prison-industrial complex, save billions in wasted dollars and would literally save lives every day.

The worst that would come from it is that it would offend the puritanical sensibilities of the modern temperance movement. I am betting the grieving widow of John Adams would agree.

I see them as symbols, and I leave symbols to the symbol-minded. ~ George Carlin

> The debate over the rebel flag that began anew after last week’s church shootings in Charleston, S.C., has morphed into a full-blown Confederate controversy.
> While Stars and Bars have long been associated by many with slavery, the latest campaign to remove Confederate emblems has extended beyond the flag to statues, memorials, parks and even school mascots.”

That is how the FOX NEWS story began, slicing to the core of the latest of what has been a seemingly unending controversy over the flag that flew over the Confederacy during the civil war. Now civil rights “activists” not only want the flag erased from the view of Americans, and most other artifacts of secession, they also want to condemn the entire southern United States to live forever in shame of its heritage, as though it was the epicenter of slavery and bigotry.

Clearly, the struggle for civil rights for African Americans in this country is not over. Just as clearly, efforts to correct that problem by abridging this particular type of expression demonstrates an ignorance of history so egregious that it is mind-boggling.

Let’s get some facts straight, which is clearly not happening in the hysteria around this issue. I will borrow directly from an obscure but well-sourced website, slavenorth.com.

> African slavery is so much the outstanding feature of the South, in the unthinking view of it, that people often forget there had been slaves in all the old colonies. Slaves were auctioned openly in the Market House of Philadelphia; in the shadow of Congregational churches in Rhode Island; in Boston taverns and warehouses; and weekly, sometimes daily, in Merchant’s Coffee House of New York. Such Northern heroes of the American Revolution as John Hancock and Benjamin Franklin bought, sold, and owned black people. William Henry Seward, Lincoln’s anti-slavery Secretary of State during the Civil War, born in 1801, grew up in Orange County, New York, in a slave-owning family and amid neighbors who owned slaves if they could afford them. The family of Abraham Lincoln himself, when it lived in Pennsylvania in colonial times, owned slaves.[1]
> When the minutemen marched off to face the redcoats at Lexington in 1775, the wives, boys and old men they left behind in Framingham took up axes, clubs, and pitchforks and barred themselves in their homes because of a widespread, and widely credited, rumor that the local slaves planned to rise up and massacre the white inhabitants while the militia was away.[2]”

It took a sometimes violent Abolitionist Movement to get the industrialized north to find easy wisdom in banning the trade in human flesh. And once the north did, it was quick to forget its history of complete and total complicity — and to ignore slavery in southern states as a national problem.

All that holiness and innocence from a government that had all but exterminated the indigenous people who were inconveniently living in America when it was “discovered,” and who then quickly embarked on the path of Manifest Destiny which was basically a policy of go west and kill anything that gets in your way. Oh, and take some dirt cheap Chinese labor with you so you can build a railroad without practicing the immorality of slavery.

Indeed, the air of bigotry hung so thick in northern air that not even whites could escape it. The Irish, who were treated like trash from the moment they hit our shores were commonly referred to as “White Negroes,” by the oh so progressive people north of the Mason-Dixon Line.

This ad comes from the New York Times. Note that the person who placed it was selling some items and had some work he wanted to hire for, as long as the person who showed up wasn’t Irish.

[image]

The Times ran ads just like this from 1851 to 1923, long after they had proven their forward thinking by winning the Civil War and burning The South to the ground.

Since then, the government has won many other wars. Some of them were even legit but we are right now, even as this grossly sensationalized controversy rages, killing people halfway across the world because they have oil. Our media apparatus is playing footsie with the government and big petroleum to gin up loads of anti-Muslim sentiment and fear so that we can proceed unimpeded where it concerns fossil fuels.

If I wanted to yank down a flag, which I don’t, it would not be the flag of the Confederacy. The American Flag would seem a much more logical choice given that there has been a thousand times more atrocities committed while waving it.

As I said, though, I have no desire to tear down our flag or any other. I have no desire to blot out the artifacts of our history in order to offer meaningless appeasement to people who could be working on real, more meaningful problems than just choosing to be offended.

I look at the Confederate Flag with neither admiration nor animus. It is a symbol of our past, nothing more, nothing less; a part of the American story. That is a story with much more to live down than the Stars and Bars, and much more to live up to than the pettiness of victim politics. It is also a story, even with all the demagoguery of the social justice crowd, which tells of the ending of slavery and subsequent efforts to keep the hope of freedom alive.

I do not know what motivated a madman to commit those horrific acts in South Carolina. I just know that it wasn’t a flag that pulled the trigger.

Leading Swedish feminist admits: Domestic violence is not a gender issue

June 24, 2015 | by Eva Solberg | Link | Original Link

Translator's note: For decades, even the hint that women may actually be responsible sometimes for domestic violence was taboo. The wind of change now blows full force in Sweden as a leading feminist takes it to a public forum to break the taboo and propose solutions. We are bringing her article here to AVFM, an article which has over 80% approval rate on the original platform. LV

Domestic violence is not a gender issue

Intimate partner violence (IPV) is not a gender issue – it is time for family peace.

In the last few days the results of the government investigation of IPV have been presented to me by the responsible minister. After reading them I am compelled by reality to present a dissaproving note to both the investigators and the government who still seem to be of the view that sexism is the solution to the problem of domestic violence.

The tone and the division was already defined right from the title – "The National Strategy to Combat Men's Violence Against Women" – infering that we have a guilty sex and an innocent sex. But thanks to extensive research in the field, both at the national and international level, we now know with great certainty that this breakdown by sex is simply not true. We also know through extensive practice and experience that the attempts to solve the issue through this kind of analysis have failed. And they failed precisely because violence is not, and never has been, a gender issue.

In Sweden, however, even the slightest questioning of the current model has been regarded as swearing in an otherwise quiet and echoing church. Few are those who have dared to openly question the current model, but it is about time to start doing so. Sweden is, or should in any case strive to be, a knowledgeable society. This society is characterized above all by its willingness to be guided by free and politically independent research when it comes to making decisions affecting all of us. As such, careful analysis and lessons of accumulated experience ought to be an important criterion in decision making.

The efforts conducted so far aiming to end IPV have not been working. This is also acknowledged by the government. The reason for this should obviously be analyzed carefully. And, whatever the reasons for analyzing, we can be sure of one thing. The road to a solution for this social problem is hardly to stubbornly continue to feed the patient with more of the same medicine that has already been tried unsuccessfully for decades. It is time to raise the bar.

The available knowledge out there is not lacking in substance. In what has come to be known as the Partner Abuse State of Knowledge Project (PASK), which is the world's largest research database on IPV, no less than 1700 scientific papers on the topic are summarized. Virtually all differ in their conclusions from the tired gendered analysis that the government has once again introduced.

When such a considerable amount of research is evaluated, some clear and interesting patterns emerge. One such pattern is that violence in the family, rather than being gender-bound, appears to rather be an inherited generational problem. To know this and then continue to ignore the damage done to the children who are today subjected to violence is a huge social betrayal. We condemn these children thus to repeat the patterns they've learned from their parents and by doing so we ultimately condemn our society to continue to perpetuate the problem with enormous costs in both money and personal suffering.

Enskede Årsta Moderates, where I am the chairwoman of the Opposition Alliance in the district, has taken a clear and continuing responsibility to prioritize the work on domestic violence in the direction of prevention. In our efforts, we prioritize the methods to be more legally secure. We are also the first district of Stockholm to have introduced the anti-DV program FRIDSAM combined with treating both men and women. By doing so, we have demonstrated the importance of seeing the big picture when violence occurs in families without prejudices and preconceptions. We had hoped that our unique approach would be spread to more locations but unfortunately this has not yet been the case.

Another aim of ours was to provide better care for children and increase the quality of the social services. This, however, never got fully implemented.

Very often I, as a politician, talk with parents who don't get to meet their children. I have also heard many children talking about how they witnessed major vulnerabilities in the processes that are intended to protect them. This is, of course, completely unacceptable. I am also deeply concerned with the one-sided focus on men being seen only as perpetrators in cases involving domestic abuse. I have met and spoken with many fathers and children who have witnessed and experienced a very different reality. The research also provides evidence to their stories that, yes, women also use violence within families. Both the partners and the children can be victims. If we view women only as victims, doesn't this set up these men and their children to be in a disadvantaged position? If we as women do not stand up for these men, who then will do it? Any form of violence is illegal and must be combated.

Therefore, as the chairwoman of the Women of the Moderate Party in Stockholm, I intend to initiate a process where we meet with and listen to all of those who in any way have experience with domestic violence. I also welcome the representatives of the authorities, such as social workers, police officers and others to contact us and bring their experiences into the discussion as well. And, above all, I want to see those exposed to or subjected to unjust legal sanctions that hit the children due to misuse of authority, prejudice, ideological tunneled vision or whatever the cause might be. This of course applies to both men and women.

Without more transparency and openness regarding the vulnerability of those who are otherwise entitled to a protective family life which has been threatened or destroyed, we will never manage to create a better society. We now learn from the National Public Health Institute that the risk of suffering from mental illness, substance abuse and other conditions that lead to social vulnerability is twice as high for children who are deprived of one or both of their parents. We also know that every day children are being taken away by one of their parents, both within Sweden and from Sweden to abroad, and the distrust of the parents towards the responsible authorities is growing at an alarming rate.

We have to start daring to see and talk about this difficult and complicated problem. And we must begin to recognize the fact that domestic violence, in at least half of its occurrence, is carried out by female perpetrators. Otherwise, our efforts to protect the most vulnerable among us, the children, will never become more than just an aspiration. We will continue to fail in the attempt to help families break the destructive pattern.

Let us now stand together, not divided by sex, and help each other with the work to now, once and for all, commence to break the destructive patterns wherever they occur. Do you want to help us with that?

Adding men’s interests to men’s rights

June 24, 2015 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

I follow the comments around here pretty closely most of the time. I have been doing so recently more than usual. And I have found a few instances of what I expected to find.

People are starting to notice that we are expanding the content here, both in quantity and in subject matter. We have also made changes to present more material on the front page, with plans to expand that even more.

AVFM is changing. Allow me to explain.

While we are still light years from some needed social changes and actual, measurable improvements to men’s rights are still lacking, we have accomplished one thing. Namely our job.

AVFM’s core mission has been to change the public narrative about sexual politics; to force a critique of feminism into the cultural consciousness and to chip away at the empathy gap when it comes to the sexes. We are starting to see that happen, and I personally could not be more proud of the team working here, the contributing writers and all of you who have financially supported this operation for so long.

The growth of our message throughout the mainstream is now unstoppable because of you.

We have also, I am quite certain, played a significant role in enhancing the prominence and relevance of many in the old guard of feminist critics.

In the best of ways this means that we have to change with the times that we have helped create. We will continue to be a foundational resource for mainstream writers who are daring to be part of the change, providing the message discipline and men’s issues information for them to emulate, as they have been doing much more in recent years.

We will continue to expand our reach in different ways. Anti-feminism and anti-gynocentrism, while still making some children of privilege shriek, is not the taboo that it was nearly six years ago when we launched. Far fewer people are offended by it, or find it strange. A truckload more people like it.

The worm is turning. That opens a door for us and insists on ushering us through it.

As many of you have already noticed, we have started to post articles which skirt and even go over the edge of MHRM relevance, focusing on men’s interests, not just their rights. There will be more of that in the future.

We will be running articles on various subjects. Science and technology, gaming, political news, general interest stories and other subjects where the only criteria is if they will be of interest to a predominately male audience.

And so what becomes of the provocative, iconoclastic men’s rights, men’s mental health and anti-gynocentric literature? It will stay front and center, of course, and without apology. The mission here has not changed in the least. We are just making some structural changes in how we carry it out.

With some operational restructuring and the completions of some projects under development, we also believe that we can intensify our antagonistic effect on the gynocentric cultural narrative.

So, to those of you who have understandably read and scratched your head at some recent articles (Hi Clint!), and have asked yourselves “What has this got to do with men’s rights?” I have an answer.

Nothing.

And everything.

This is the future for how AVFM pushes the counter-theory. It is fitting with what we have been saying for years. We ARE the media. We have proven it. The day when we can say we ARE the mainstream may or may not come, at least in my life.

But you can bet your ass I will keep swinging to the last breath.

There are already some other big plusses in these changes. Today is June 24. We are three days past where we would normally have to have a fundraiser, calling on men already affected by the problems to reach in their wallets and help us keep our nostrils above the waterline financially.

For the first time in six years, I did not have to bother you and you did not have to be bothered. For me personally that is a gift; riddance of a source of stress I never wanted, but was necessary for the time.

Now, we are moving to a very affordable, reward-based membership model that only depends on people who can afford it. All of the money goes to fund the business structure around AVFM and all the material here will remain free. Avoiceformen.com will not be a source of personal income for me for the foreseeable future. Whatever the outcome the time has come that AVFM pays its own way on and with the mainstream’s dime, and a little support from those who care.

We obviously hope you will be a part of that and subscribe to us when we launch the membership plan. Just as we hope you continue to support us in spirit on the work we do.

To good days ahead. Thank you.

Feminist Imperialism

June 25, 2015 | by Alvar Bardolf | Link | Original Link

Feminists are imperialists. They look around for some part of civil society which is not yet subject to the feminist yoke, they invade it, demand it show obeisance to feminist dogma, and then extract money, privilege and power.

A central strategy they use is to appeal to the prejudiced concern society has for the well-being of women and the prejudiced indifference society has for the well-being of men. Society is willing to defend any women perceived as attacked, and to punish any man perceived as attacking them, without examining the merit of the case. Society is willing join in the attack on any man perceived as being attacked by a woman and to punish any man perceived as defending themselves from a woman, without examining the merit of the case. Feminists reinforce this immoral female privilege by demanding that women be believed irrespective of how ridiculous what they are saying may be.

Feminists exploit these prejudices by a number of tactics. Feminists craft vicious lies about men in the part of civil society they wish to invade, lies that are intended to provoke outraged rejection. Feminists then lie about the people who reject them. They isolate individuals who attempt to confront their lies with truth and accuse them of misogyny, knowing that the accusation of harming women is so toxic no one dares call them out in the lie. Any one who persists will meet a twitter campaign to shame them publicly and get them sacked. Finally, feminists lie to the police about the nature of the rejection they meet and try to get them jailed or killed.

Feminists deploy verbal violence. They have a battery of verbal tactics for insinuating that someone has shameful or immoral attitudes to women or does shameful or immoral things to women. And by using insinuation rather than straight talk they evade the need for proof, evade confrontation with the contrary truth and evade account for their dishonesty.

Feminists deploy emotional violence. They tell stories and orchestrate events that are intended to hurt men’s tenderest feelings. Women who get in the way are subjected to the same. Feminists lack the honour of men, who abjure such attacks as the lowest and most contemptible cowardice.

Feminists do all this to get society to connive at their invasion. They lie, attack and appeal to society’s prejudice to solicit mob enforcement of obeisance to their ideology. Then they get the pay-off.

Some people think the proper defence of a part of civil society under invasion is to make concessions: to institute policies giving effect to what may seem to be reasonable feminist demands. It is not. It is pandering to malice and lies. Civil society has not unfairly discriminated against women. Men and women have wanted different privileges and different duties, they have wanted different roles and different protections. Those wants have formed the customs and practices of civil society which, in the Honey Badgers’ well turned phrase, is ‘perfectly wonderful just as it is and should be left alone to go it’s own way’.

Unfortunately, civil society has not been left to go it’s own way. Feminists have pursued a strategy of piecemeal imperialism. Society is so pro-women that to succeed in this strategy feminists have had to do nothing more than claim that some part of civil society is unfair to women for it to submit to feminist demands. In this way has civil society progressively been brought under the feminist yoke.

The part of civil society that is gamer culture has recently submitted to the feminist yoke. The event of the exclusion of the Honey Badgers from the Calgary Expo showed just how oppressive that yoke is. Not the slightest deviation is permitted. To make sure the lesson was clear, all the tactics mentioned above were used. I was particularly struck by the deliberate use of emotional violence. Someone willed that the Honey Badgers should not simply be excluded, but that they should be made to cry, and the exclusion was orchestrated so that they did.

Kant said the only intrinsic good was a good will. He wasn’t right about that, but he was right that willing is of great moral significance. A good will is a very great good, an ill will a very great evil. The will of those who hurt the Honey Badgers stands revealed before us all for the evil it is.

And this ill will is no small thing. It is a very great part of feminism as a whole. It is drunk on conviction in its own moral superiority; it exults in the power to humiliate and to hurt; it lusts after the power to punish all who do not bend the knee. It can be satisfied by nothing less than the subjugation of all society to the feminist yoke. There can be no accommodation with such a will, no compromise, no concession. There can only be rejection. Society is not in need of feminism: it is in need of liberation from it.

Hera, Ancient Greek goddess of…. feminism?

June 26, 2015 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

The Greek goddess Hera was the patroness of marriage, status, and social power, and as I hope to demonstrate here, a goddess appropriate to feminism too. By analyzing the character of a goddess we follow the late psychologist James Hillman's suggestion that "Mythology is psychology in ancient dress," – ie. it gives us insight into human nature, and more specifically into the nature of feminism.

No other goddess in the Greek pantheon comes close to capturing the activities we associate with feminism – not the warlike independence of the Amazons, not the esteemed motherhood of Demeter, and not the allure of Aphrodite. These are merely peripheral topics taken up by a feminism that is concerned with securing multiple varieties of power, and Hera is the goddess I'm going to finger for that role.

Marriage

Hera was first and foremost a goddess of marriage, or rather the goddess of marriage. Under her sign marriage tamed men to great advantage of the Greek State – and the State in turn extended honors to her cult. In parts of Greece men could not be recognized as citizens until the day of their marriage, thus enticing men to marry and providing a means for Greek cities to continue reproducing the citizen-estate – not to mention securing a ready supply of laborers, taxes and military personnel to boot. James Hillman writes,

> Marriage belongs to the state; it belongs to society, to the community. Zeus and Hera are social stability; they are the state in a way, so we can be married by a Justice of the Peace at City Hall, because marriage is also secular. We recognize that by having both church weddings and legal weddings. Our tax code, our inheritance laws acknowledge that a fundamental structure of the organization of society is marriage. Therefore some can claim it has nothing in particular to do with the persons who are engaged; it hasn't anything to do with God; it hasn't anything to do with symbolic representations. It is a fundamental structure of society belonging to the polis or the city or the community.[1]

While the marriage of Hera and Zeus is mythological, life in this instance had a way of imitating art. In the marriage month (Gamelion) the mythical marriage of Hera and Zeus was reenacted and celebrated with public festivities, a time when many couples would get married in imitation of the divine couple. On these occasions prayers and offerings were given to Hera, and the bride would pledge fidelity to extending Hera's dominion on earth. One can only surmise that the riches, status, and influence of the divine couple became a model to which each couple would hope to aspire.

Another facet of Hera's cult was the focus on buildings, and her temples were usually the biggest and most lavish in all Greece. Women would carve small houses, or make them out of clay and give as offerings to the Goddess. Remarking on this practice, Hillman states that our modern obsession with houses and real estate, one of the bedrocks of our economy, may also arise from a Hera-like sentiment;

> If you think back to all the times you play house as a child, or had a dollhouse, or made little houses out of cartons and boxes, this is an archetypal move going on. We forget that the house is not just something made by an architect and sold you by a developer… What one does for the house, to the house, with the house, is taking care of Hera. Housekeeping is a Hera activity. Our culture recognizes this. Think of the enormous quantity of house magazines: House and Garden, House Beautiful, Home Decorating, Architectural Digest, World of Interiors, the home section of newspapers, home improvement on TV, supposedly a best-selling TV show or one of the most watched, "This Old House."
> "I know a woman who decorates people's houses. You pick out the furniture and the fabrics – > then she'll lay out the paintings you should have, what repros you should have on the wall, and the bric-a-brac and what colors the walls should be and so on. She told me that in every one of the cases that she works with (of married couples), the woman picks out everything in the house and the entire house belongs to her except for the husband's desk and his playroom and maybe the garage. He has his little area and the rest of the house is hers. He makes no decisions about what color the upholstery should be or the kinds of window shades.
> "Often when you go to people's houses the wife shows off the house while the husbands talk shop. "Come, let me show you my house; I want to show you the house." She's showing a part of her Hera nature.
> "There are these old sayings (whether you go with the gender of them or not): a woman likes a man who can do things around the house, and she hates it that she always has to pick up after him and he leaves things in a mess. By desecrating the house that way, he insults Hera. And a man likes a woman who's a good housekeeper. These are Hera statements. Another one: She loves the house more than me. And the jokes: A man is making love to a whore and she says, "You're the greatest;" and when he's making love to his mistress, she says, "I love you so much." But when he's making love to his wife, she says: "I wonder what color we should paint the ceiling." Now, that is a nasty gender joke, but it isn't! She really loves the house. That's crucial and shouldn't be treated as just a kind of obsession. Her obsession with the house equals his obsession with sex.[1]

In a telling newspaper cartoon some years ago, two women were conversing. The first said she was getting a divorce, to which her friend replied it must be an awful thing to go through. "Not really" the woman replied, "it's actually a dream come true; I get the house, the furniture, the artworks and the kids. I've been planning this divorce since I was a little girl!" In this cruel cartoon we get a sense that the husband was merely a backdrop to securing the larger vision of a house, renovations, furnishings and the children. But especially the house.

Taming Men

Hera was nicknamed 'The Tamer.' She tamed horses, men and heroes and in some places was recognized as the tamer of the seasons, of nature, and even the universe itself.

Her goal was to limit wildness and freedom by placing all creatures in her service. Her tools-for-taming were the entrapment of men and women in marriage, the use of her own sexuality as an enticement for conformity, shaming, and aggressive punishment of any rebellious behaviours. Even her lordly husband Zeus did not escape her control: "Hera's cruel rage tamed him."[2]

Hera was worshipped as 'Goddess of the yoke,' an enslaving device symbolizing her desire to create utilities of beasts and men. She yoked obedient men to wives, and yoked heroes to an inevitable death through their performance of labours that bring betterment to women and society.

In the Iliad Hera is said to tame heroes through death, not marriage. Death through service to others was considered -and is still considered- something appropriate for males and for their own good. In The Myth of Male Power Warren Farrell recounts a Greek story which illustrates the fact:

> The Hero As Slave:
> Once upon a time, a mother who wanted to see the beautiful statue of Hera had no oxes or horses to carry her there. But she did have two sons. And the sons wanted more than anything to make their mother's wish come true. They volunteered to yoke themselves to a cart and take her over the mountains in the scorching heat to the faraway village of Argos, the home of the statue of Hera (the wife of Zeus). Upon their arrival in Argos, the sons were cheered and statues (that can be found to this day) were built in their honor. Their mother prayed that Hera give her sons the best gift in her power. Hera did that. The boys died. The traditional interpretation? The best thing that can happen to a man is to die at the height of his glory and power. Yet had this been a myth of two daughters who had substituted themselves for oxen to carry their father somewhere, would we > have interpreted the daughters' deaths as proof that the best thing that can happen to a woman is to die at the height of her glory and power? The statues and cheers can be seen as bribes for the sons to value their lives less than their mother's request to view a statue. The fact that the statue was of Hera, the queen of the Olympian gods and protector of married women is symbolic. The sons' sacrifice symbolized the mandate for men to become strong enough to serve the needs of mothers and marriage, and to be willing to call it glory if they died in the process. Which is why the name Hercules means "for the glory of Hera".[3]

Sexual manipulation was another of Hera's strategems to gain what she wanted. In one popular tale, for instance, she asked if she could borrow Aphrodite's magic girdle to help her woo the King of the gods. By borrowing Aphrodite's natural charms (the girdle) Hera imitated the goddess of love and sex and thereby seduced Zeus. As we read in Homer's Iliad, the magical girdle of Aphrodite had the power to create subservience in the target;

> Hera was divided in purpose as to how she could beguile the brain in Zeus of the aigis. And to her mind this thing appeared to be the best counsel, to array herself in loveliness, and go down to Ida, and perhaps he might be taken with desire to lie in love with her next her skin, and she might be able to drift an innocent warm sleep across his eyelids, and seal his crafty perceptions…
> Now, when she had clothed her body in all this loveliness, she went out from the chamber, and called aside Aphrodite to come away from the rest of the gods, and spoke a word to her: 'Would you do something for me, dear child… Give me loveliness and desirability, graces with which you overwhelm mortal men, and all the immortals…

> Then in turn Aphrodite the laughing (philomeides) answered her: 'I cannot, and I must not deny this thing that you ask for, you, who lies in the arms of Zeus, since he is our greatest.' She spoke, and from her breasts unbound the elaborate, pattern-pierced zone (himas), and on it are figured all beguilement (philotes), and loveliness is figured upon it, and passion of sex (himeros) is there, and the whispered endearment (oaristos) that steals the heart away even from the thoughtful. She put this in Hera's hands, and called her by name and spoke to her: 'Take this zone, and hide it away in the fold of your bosom. It is elaborate, all things are figured therein. And I think whatever is your heart's desire shall not go unaccomplished.' So she spoke, and the ox-eyed lady Hera smiled on her and smiling hid the zone away in the fold of her bosom.[4]

Hera employed sexual manipulativeness as an artifice to purchase the power and influence she so desperately craved. Today we would call this behavior "Love bombing," which has the ability to tame a man to schemes he might otherwise have never dreamed of following.

Binding Hera's rage

When Hera didn't get her desired measure of power, when her status didn't reach high enough, or worse, when she lost status or power, things went very badly for the world around her. Epithets of spitefulness, jealousy, vengefulness, vindictiveness, cruelty and rage belong to the scorned goddess, and from a reading of the myths it seems she felt scorned much of the time.

We turn for example to the priestess Medea who murdered her children as revenge against her husband's transgressions. Her husband, Jason of Argonauts fame, decided to leave her after the marriage went stale. He found a new bride and Medea devised to make them suffer for their happiness. Much like the goddess Hera to whom Medea was priestess, she carried out a scorched-earth policy in the face of frustrated power urges, saying;

> Sorry, kids, but your dad's a douche

> I will send them with gifts in their hands, carrying them unto the bride a robe of finest woof and a chaplet of gold. And if these ornaments she take and put them on, miserably shall she die, and likewise everyone who touches her; with such fell poisons will I smear my gifts. And here I quit this theme; but I shudder at the deed I must do next; for I will slay the children I have borne… and when I have utterly confounded Jason's house I will leave the land, escaping punishment for my dear children's murder, after my most unholy deed… so help me God, Never shall he see again alive the children I bore to him, nor from his new bride shall he beget issue, for she must die a hideous death, slain by my drugs. Let no one deem me a poor weak woman who sits with folded hands, but of another mould, dangerous to foes and well-disposed to friends.[5]

After killing Jason's bride with a poison-smeared robe, murdering her own children, and then setting fire to the palace, Medea fled to Athens where she married the mighty King Aegeus, thereby securing a place of notoriety in the mythological scheme of Greece.

Mythologist Karl Kerenyi asks, "What should we make of it that Medea, a barbaric representative of the Hera world, and her gloomy cult, found acceptance in the sacred precinct of Zeus' spouse?"[6] Kerenyi was struck by the fact that Hera remained associated with Medea's barbarism and surrounded her with the sanctity of her own world. Our thoughts on this question might extend to a similar comparison of moderate feminism and how it remains associated with radical feminism's relational and cultural terrorism.

The Greeks understood better than we moderns, however, that impulses of the psychopathic mind needed to be restrained by a civil society.

To that end the Greeks developed a religious ritual that involved winding a rope tightly around a statue or effigy of the Goddess Hera, particularly during what they imagined to be her 'unfulfilled' moments. That hog-tying symbolized containment of destructive energies resulting from loss of status or power. Participants understood the binding was of the proverbial 'woman scorned,' a ritual teaching how to deal with such behavior in the lives of mortals.

In contrast to her fulfilled behavior within marriage, when the Queen of Heaven lost her marital station and status, she would tear the social fabric into black confetti. Hera then became monstrous or in some stories started giving birth to monstrous creatures who did her bidding. Jungian psychologist Murray Stein talks to this monstrous side of the goddess;

> This compounding of evil upon evil is an image of Hera in her Iuno inferna aspect and energized by a full-blown animus rage and destruction, running amuck through the world, devouring whomever she can lay her hands on. Hera is in this development a veritable epidemic of pathology.
> The ancient cults of Hera showed great foresight and wisdom in "binding" her image during the dangerous periods of her cycle. This was prophylactic against the potentiation of the she-dragon. But what could they have done to prevent > this potentiation in the face of the Typhaonian spirit energizing it? Hera's reaction to her experience with Zeus bursts all fetters, for without a full experience of the Teleia [fulfillment] aspect of the cycle the bindings on the infernal aspect of it cannot possibly hold. Thus we find in the Homeric and classical image of her a Hera Unbound, whose boundlessness knows no limit to destruction. The rhythm inherent in the archetype has been disturbed, and we get a sort of symphony whose rhythm is one long downbeat. The restoration of Hera Teleia is an individual and cultural historical project that is still being worked on in our time.[7]

Feminism

The comparisons of Hera and Medea with feminism are unmistakable. The male shaming, intimidation, manipulation, and power-seeking are all there – as are the destructiveness and scorched-earth policy accompanying frustrated goals.

It's no surprise that a Google search for Hera + feminist returns over 80,000 results, and Medea + feminist over 100,000, and the number of feminist orgs, initiatives and editorials paints its own picture; The Hera Women's Cancer Foundation; Hera Entrepreneurs Against Trafficking; Hera Hub: female-focused co working space and entrepreneurship; The Hera Herald; Hera Society; Hera Health, Empowerment and Rights for Women; Hera Communications: Empowerment, Enrichment, Enlightenment; Women's Club Hera (etc.).

Along with Hera, Medea is universally recognized as a feminist heroine. As an example of feminist websites promoting her we read, "There is, however, one other role that we twenty-first-century audiences are able to recognize in Medea: that of the feminist pioneer. And the fact that this precursor of the suffragettes is a mythic character dramatized nearly 2,500 years ago by a man is quite astonishing."[8]

The Wikipedia entry for Medea reads, "Medea is widely read as a proto-feminist text to the extent that it sympathetically explores the disadvantages of being a woman in a patriarchal society," – to which characterization is implied (by feminists) that we dare not read her as anything but a hapless victim, as one Jungian analyst Cheryl Fuller was to discover.

Fuller, a feminist, gives a revealing account of what happened when she attempted to shine a light on the dark side of Medea, and by extension of women. She writes;

> Eight years ago as I searched for a dissertation advisor, I ran into a wall with the feminist scholars on the faculty of my university. As soon as I explained that I wanted to write about Medea came the assumption: of course, they said, you will be looking at the patriarchy as the issue in her behavior. And when I replied that indeed I was not going to be looking in that direction, but rather at Medea herself and at the meaning intrinsic to her acts and her story, interest in my work evaporated and they declined to serve on my committee. Though long a feminist myself, I had been absent from developments in academic feminism. It had escaped my attention that there were "right" ways and "wrong" ways to study > women, both real and mythological, and clearly considering Medea as anything other than a victim of the patriarchy was the "wrong" way.

> I persisted, found an advisor who could accept my apparently heretical viewpoint and happily explored the character of Medea and developed a description of a Medea complex. But the resistance to considering that Medea could be anything other than a hapless victim of the patriarchy continued to intrigue me and set me to wondering about the meaning of excluding this dark and troubling aspect of her, and by extension all of us, from our understanding of what it is to be human and more specifically a woman. It is this wondering which is the subject of my paper.[9]

In summary, the traditional binding of Hera has failed and her destructive energies are loosed upon the world – to devastating effect. Her bindings began to unravel in the Middle Ages with the advent of an indiscriminate chivalry that saw men worshiping women as pure and infallable vessels, while failing to recognize and bind their destructive potentials with reasonable forms of social constraint.

While we continue on our current path the scorched earth policy too will continue… compliments of a vengeful, and power-craving Hera.

Gays Against Feminism: Because gay people are not your property, feminists

June 26, 2015 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

A gay friend online recently gave me this:

[image]

Since I've stood up for gay rights since back in the early 1980s, I'll take it. And use it. I'm a moralfag by nature anyway (look it up).

Back when there was an actual social and political cost to being gay-friendly (let alone gay) I almost certainly would have been beat up badly had I shown someone that card. That was back when it was socially acceptable to beat the fuck out of a gay man just for being gay. Or suspected gay. It was when being friendly to "faggots" and "dykes" and "trannies" all by itself could also get you hurt or fired from your job.

I do not want to make it out like I took a bullet for anybody. I did not, although I did once rescue a drunk gay man whose abusive boyfriend had gotten him liquored up and then left him stranded miles from home with no money in a tough working-class blue-collar bar. He was sweet and affectionate and kept hitting on guys, so I took him literally under my arm, cuddled him a bit, told him to stop trying to kiss me, and said, "come on man, let's get you out of here" and took him home and put him on my couch where he promptly passed out. The next day we went to his boyfriend's house and while the boyfriend was away I helped him clean his shit out and find his car keys so he could go stay with friends he trusted.

It was a long time ago, but those working class people–including the women–might well have crippled or killed him with their fists and feet if I'd left him there.

(And no, I had no idea who he was. I still don't to this day, I never saw him again. But he was grateful, and if you're out there, pal, I hope you're good and safe and figured out how to avoid abusive relationships.)

So if you ever wonder why I'm almost completely immune to hateful feminist bigotry and disgusting attempts at shaming, and am 100% comfortable in the company of gay, lesbian, bi, whatever people, bear in mind that I remember fully and vividly how informal vigilante lynchings were something most people would just look the other way at–if it was a gay man.

(Oh, and shout out to my Gamergate and general geek culture homies: it was Science Fiction that taught me to see people as human first and whatever else they were second. Fuck anyone who hates geeks and nerds and calls them "misogynists" or uses "gamer" or "geek" as an epithet.)

There are also those who pretend gays and lesbians always had it as bad as each other. As a rule, they did not.

Now absolutely, lesbians would often take horrible harassment and would occasionally be hurt, even killed, and sometimes mutilated like the gay men were. But as a rule, it was gay men–yes, the gay men–who were getting thrown in jail, thrown in mental hospitals, raped by fag bashers (yes, that was and is still a thing), sometimes even castrated, lobotomized, hung, or just plain beat to death. Sometimes, 100% legally.

Often by, or at the behest of, women. Not just men.

When you watch or read histories of the Stonewall Riots, it's fascinating to watch how hard they will generally work to move lesbians up to the front of the story, even though it was overwhelmingly gay men who were being most brutally persecuted.

Carefully read the in-depth stories of how the first Stonewall riot began, and you will discover that at the very beginning, at an underground gay club, during a police raid a cop tried busting a lesbian for being among the other "criminal" homosexuals, and she was somewhat roughed up as they tried to put her into a paddy wagon. She asked for help from her fellows, wondering aloud if they were going to let the police arrest her. The cops were immediately mobbed by gay men coming to her defense.

Let that sink in: the riot began with gay men coming to the defense of a lesbian. There is of course nothing wrong with that–the cops were violating her human rights after all–but it shows how the male protective instinct toward women is part of even most gay men.

Remember that the next time you hear about men's inherent violence, or hear yet another radfem insist that gay men are misogynists–which they frequently do.

The above of course are just examples. There are countless other examples of feminist homophobia and racism, which can also be found right in the classic 2nd wave feminist texts. So if someone tries to tell you that hating gay men is new to feminism, it's not.

And if they try to tell you feminism is better now, just look how feminists treat gay men who reject feminism today.

And what's so fascinating about the racism and gay-hate that's been part of feminism for decades is that feminists and their apologists automatically behave as if these were statistical outliers, and therefore "not real feminists."

I'm sorry, history does not support this. Just as there were people who joined the Nazi Party (yes, I just went there) who didn't particularly hate Jews, the misandrist assumptions of 1960s and 1970s feminism fell just as much against gay men as they do today, if not more so.

Feminism has always been a movement that treats gay men as disposable. It still is. If you're a gay man and you refuse to suck feminist dick, there will be consequences. Those consequences can include shunning, harassment, expulsion, job loss, and more. You may even be physically attacked. If you doubt it, start asking non-feminist gay men about their experiences. You'll hear tales of their careers being torpedoed, their work being removed from publication, physical attacks, false allegations, and more.

For that matter, start asking non-feminist lesbians about this (which is something that Robert Stacey McCain should do a better job of, hint hint Stacey). A lot of them will have stories of abuse and harassment from feminists. And yes, that includes mainstream, respected feminism, not just "radfems." In fact, I think we should hand it to the hardcore radfems: they are fully aware of their hateful bigotry and embrace it. The non-radical feminists just, 9 times out of 10, accept bigoted feminist lies about little boys and the men they grow into without ever questioning them.

And that's all men they lie about–which includes gay men as well as men of every single race.

And yes, my gay friends, this should be something you remember: feminism is implicitly racist. It always has been, for it is an inescapable conclusion of their "Patriarchy" theory (or their new favorite word, "intersectionality") that not just gay men, but black men and brown men and "yellow" men often and routinely rape and brutalize women, or just laugh at the brutality and accept it–for real and not as dark humor or sarcasm or irony.

Indeed, ask a feminist some time to explain to you how "rape culture" works in the Black and Hispanic communities in North America. Watch how fast they change the subject or try to call you a racist for just asking that question.

And so now we finally see the rise of gay men who fight feminism, not just here on A Voice for Men (which has welcomed gay men from the day we opened our doors) but in the wider world, with the growing and fearless #GaysAgainstFeminism.

[image]A smart gay man should avoid feminists like he avoids any other kind of religious bigot. It's heartening to see more and more gay men standing up, and not just here on A Voice for Men, where they have done so for many years but out in the world at large.

Gay men owe you nothing, feminists.

N-O-T-H-I-N-G.

And you don't get to play the race card anymore either, honey. The smart fags and dykes don't care what color your skin is if you're a bigot. And more and more of them are not just starting to feel it. They're starting to say it. Without apology.

[image]

They are finally saying it without apology, because they know: they owe no apologies for it whatsoever. And the race card won't work any better than the vagina card.

Because feminism is a hate movement. And it doesn't care who it hurts.

A new age for gays, or a trip to the gallows?

June 27, 2015 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Unless you have been stranded on an island that resides in another dimension, you are now aware that the Supreme Court of the United States has ruled that any prohibition on same sex marriage is unconstitutional, effectively making gay marriage legal in all 50 states.

According to most legal pundits, it will be difficult and very time consuming to reverse that decision. In fact, it probably will not happen. Like Roe v Wade, like it or not, this controversial topic is now the law of the land.

Of course, many gays and lesbians are jubilant, and many religious conservatives are anything but.

In this anything but humble writer's opinions, both groups have it dead wrong. At best the SCOTUS did not make the right or wrong decision, it just made the right wrong decision; the best bad choice.

The fundamental problem is that both gay rights activists and religious conservatives generally and often unquestioningly accept the state as the legitimizing authority of their relationships.

Perhaps the greatest hypocrisy is from the religious right, many of whom vehemently demand "small government" that respects their religious freedoms with huge bureaucracies to enforce their morality on the entire population and a massive prison-industrial system to back it up.

Gay rights activists want the government out of their bedrooms by insisting that said government license and legitimize their relationships. At least part of that mentality can be attributed to the feminist mindset of "Keep the government out of my vagina but give me free birth control and abortions."

It is not that the SCOTUS got it wrong so much as they were ruling on the wrong issue.

Certainly, I agree that the law of the land should apply to all people, and I have no inclination to say otherwise regarding gay marriage. So with that I will say congratulations to the gay community.

And welcome to the governmental tyranny over your lives with the rest of us.

Marriage, before they licensed it in the manner one does to drive a car or own a dog, was a religious institution in which the government was not involved. Well, with the exception of many places where the church actually was the government and vice versa.

Eliminating the church from legal governance, and keeping the government out of church has been an important but very slow process over the past three centuries. We have done much better at keeping the government out of church than the other way around. Freedom of religion still faces minor challenges. Freedom from religion has a long way to go but I digress.

Unless anyone has not noticed, the church, at least some sects, have changed a great deal with the social climate. Many churches will now marry anyone with a license.

That license is the problem.

It is somewhat baffling that two groups, often at complete ideological odds with each other, still bend knee and worship at the altar of the State. In the case of religious conservatives, it is even more perplexing that they so often loudly bemoan government interference in family life and divorce, while demanding the government sanction their model, and only their model, of marriage.

Truth is often stranger than fiction.

For some gay people the right to marry embodies their desire to have recognized the love and family that the law previously denied. I also realize that for many gay people that the issue is not so much the license, but the legal rights that come with it, from hospital visitation to health insurance to tax incentives and inheritance.

All of that, every last bit of it, serves as evidence of where we have failed to remove the church from governance. They are matters that could be remedied by enforcing the separation of church and state. That could be accomplished without the destructive intrusions into family breakup that are sure to follow the SCOTUS ruling.

Instead of less government intrusion in their private lives, the gay community has just seen the floodgates open. They will start figuring it out when the divorces start rolling in, especially for couples with adopted children and one crazy spouse. It will be even worse for gay parents. Adopted children are already damaged from some form of abandonment. A follow-up of dose parental alientation is hardly what they need.

It is exactly what many of them will get.

I have never taken a directly political stance on this issue for this very reason. I support the right of every gay man to be treated no differently by society or under the law than anyone else. So in a system that sucks, and laws that suck, and the beatings they and their children will take I will be happy to make room in the foxhole right alongside the rest of us.

Perhaps a generation or two in the trenches of family law will convince them a little more thought should be put into their cause. They will realize that behind the façade of every government license lives the very real threat of governmental control and abuse.

When that control walks into your family’s home, the results can be catastrophic. When stripping you of assetts, rights and children, the government is certainly on record with their willingness.

Review: TNT television network's suicidal "Proof" of nothing

The new 10-episode TNT series Proof seeks to engage the third most pressing question of all: Is there life after death?

The other two questions are, of course, "Are we alone in the Universe?" and "How the hell can we get rid of feminist shows like this?"

In Hollywood terms, one would pitch this hot mess as "Supernatural meets Dr. House MD," or, alternatively, as a sort-of X-Files Lite. Kyra Sedgwick, one of my favorite actresses due in part to her long marriage to Kevin Bacon, is an executive producer of the series who should consider getting back into acting.

In the series, Jennifer The L Word Beals plays Dr. Cat Tyler, a complicated (which is code for "bitchy" according to the movie Gone Girl), divorced (of course), and vegan (ditto) heart surgeon whose skill is scored highly by the women who try to suck up to her and "adequate" by the men who don't. The Seattle hospital where she works is a futuristic model of technological coolness where women never talk about footwear nor wear any kind other than running shoes.

Clearly, the show is making a huge effort to appeal to men in an effort to sell us some nebulous theology devoid of sexual passion.

Dr. Tyler is abusive to her staff, family, interns, fellow doctors and boss (played with aplomb by the typecast nerdy black guy Joe Terminator 2 Morton). In the second episode, for example, when a brain-damaged man in her care is driven by her to threaten suicide by jumping off their 10-story hospital building, Dr. Tyler urges him to do it – 3 seconds and splat! Charming.

Interestingly, Beals, whose large, neotenous eyes make her look decades younger than her 51 years would imply, was recommended by David Duchovny for the part of "Dr. Scully" in the original X-Files but lost the part to Gillian Anderson. In the X-Files, Scully was hinted to be immortal, which ups the delicious creepiness of the real-world Beals's seeming agelessness. Since a 6-episode reboot of X-Files is coming to the Fox Network this fall, it is tempting to see Proof as a sort of preëmptive revenge porn for Beals.

No one can stand Dr. Tyler except terminally ill computer mogul "Ivan Turing" (Matthew Modine in an obvious nod to gay computer pioneer Alan Turing) who goes all 50 shades of bribery on Dr. Tyler – the apparently heirless Turing offers his entire fortune to Beals for ~~one night of passion~~ her seeking hard scientific proof that there is an afterlife (or not). Yup, that was a part of Scully's job, too.

Scully, because she is immortal, will never get to experience the afterlife, or, perhaps the one moment of fading life when the dying realize that there is not an afterlife in any enduring, conscious way.

For in that sleep of death, what dreams may come…Must give us pause…

Finding scientific proof of an afterlife is a dubious (and I believe an impossible) enterprise. When the show's writers wrote that it would take 3 seconds to fall 10-stories (30 meters) they were not being rigorous: at 9.8 meters per second squared of normal Earth gravity, impact with the ground would occur after just 2.4744 seconds, not 3. Imprecision like this is inherent in eyewitness (death witness?) testimony but the flailing supernatural bullshit of Proof did make me reflect on the implications of validating with certainty the question of the afterlife.

As Shakespeare noted in Hamlet's famous soliloquy, it is the uncertain nature of the afterlife that helps keep suicidal thoughts and actions at bay. Sure, living creatures have a moderate instinct for survival on both species-wide and individual levels but in times of trial suicides do happen.

Proof has yet to discuss religion – their to-date "afterlife for atheists" motif is nutty on a lot of levels – but religions that talk about the afterlife (or just death) deal with suicide in varying and interesting ways:

Catholics view suicide as a mortal sin and reject salvation or even consecrated burial for the bodies of suicides. Jump off the building, and you're done, unforgiven forever..

Jews also reject suicide but encourage the living survivors to think about the dead person in the most positive possible way: changing their mind, and having regret before actual cessation of life: jump off the building, and in compassion we assume you changed your mind on the way down and forgive you for the act.

Buddhists have an even more nuanced understanding of suicide: reverence for life prohibits it in general but in certain cases those who commit suicide in an advanced state of spiritual enlightenment are not condemned for it. Jump off a building and we assess your level of enlightenment with compassion.

Islamists, of course, believe that suicidal martyrdom is the ticket to paradise. Crash into the building and you're all good.

The validation of a determinate afterlife (even that there is not one) has implications for all people, religious or not, and might lead to more loss of lives than occurs now. An indeterminate afterlife, though unsettling, is, at least, not directly lethal in that no reward, good nor bad, is clear.

In the psychology of men, those who are broken of their will to live, cast out of family life by the courts, or define their worth by their ability to please women are at higher risk of suicide, and scientific proof that, say, death leads to warm family reunions – as suggested repeatedly by Proof – is both a mildly comforting hugbox to the bereaved and extremely dangerous to actual living families in cases where one family member falls into despair and decides to reunite everyone in death.

Luckily for now, science has a weak to non-existent grasp on the origin and meaning of consciousness and has no chance to understand the post mortem of the putative soul. While a technically dead patient might be resuscitated with unlikely knowledge gleaned from the afterlife, the validation of such is elusive and not reproducible as scientific proof. You’d think a self-made billionaire might be smart enough to understand that.

Lawsuit filed to level playing field in presidential debates

June 28, 2015 | by Karl Dickey | Link | Original Link

On June 22, 2015, the Libertarian Party, the Green Party and an organization known as Level the Playing Field (formerly Americans Elect) filed suit against the Commission on Presidential Debates (CPD). The basis of the lawsuit is the claim that the CPD puts forth rules for inclusion in the presidential debates which are unfairly exclusionary.

The CPD markets itself as being non-partisan; however, it has proven itself to be bi-partisan by excluding presidential candidates who have a mathematical chance of being elected President of the United States. Gary Johnson, the Libertarian Party's 2012 presidential nominee, has been working for inclusion in upcoming presidential debates since they shut him out in 2012. Through his Our America Initiative, he has been raising money to file a lawsuit himself and also has a petition people can sign who are supportive of having the presidential debates to be more inclusive rather than exclusive. Our America Initiative is still intending to file his suit utilizing a different argument for inclusion.

Speaking about yesterday's lawsuit, Gary Johnson said, "This first step will increase the pressure on the Commission on Presidential Debates. The next step will be to file the complaint that will challenge the CPD directly on the basis of long-standing anti-trust laws. Opening yet another front in the battle for fair debates is a great development. The more pressure we can apply to make the nationally-televised debates open to all credible, qualified candidates, the better."

The multi-pronged legal challenge, a critical element of the effort is a grassroots and public awareness campaign to mobilize thousands of Americans to let the Federal Elections Commission, the CPD, debate sponsors and the news media to know that the two-party control of the debates must end. Polls show that a majority of Americans today say that neither the Republican nor the Democratic Party represents them. That majority deserves an opportunity to see and hear qualified third party and independent candidates from the national debate stage.

There has not been a third-party challenger in the presidential debates since Ross Perot and since he received such a high voting percentage, the rules for inclusion in the debates changed dramatically to be more exclusive. The objective has clearly been to keep third-party candidates out of the media and out of the debates, thereby discrediting them as serious or viable candidates. Yet, Gary Johnson did have a mathematical chance to win the presidency because he was on enough ballots in the nation and many feel he should have been given the platform in the presidential debates. The key problem Johnson faced was the CPD's rule that he reach a minimum of 15 percent in national polling; yet, his name was not used in the polls the CPD used.

Peter Ackerman

"It's the little rules that nobody can see that make all the difference," plaintiff Peter Ackerman of Level the Playing Field, told TIME in an interview, suggesting that the debate rule could be the unseen panacea. The influence of the presidential debates cannot be discounted as to affecting the outcome of a presidential election. Ackerman's Level the Playing Field would like to see the Democratic and Republican nominees face off with the third-party candidate with the highest polling or with the most public signatures.

"The FEC has had Plaintiffs' administrative complaint for over nine months (284 days), and yet has taken no action on it even though [Federal Election Campaign Act] requires the agency to act within 120 days," the lawsuit states. "The FEC has also effectively pocket-vetoed a separate, but related, petition for rule-making requesting that it amend its debate regulation to prohibit the use of polling as the sole means of access to presidential debates. The FEC is apparently ignoring the petition for rule making even though it too was filed more than nine months ago; even though 1,251 independent individuals and organizations – all but four of whom were unknown to Plaintiffs – filed comments supporting a rule-making; and even though the only commenter opposing the proposed rule-making was the CPD itself."

Child Support: How much is too much?

June 28, 2015 | by Julie Garrison | Link | Original Link

In the State of California, a noncustodial dad making $3,000 a month may have to pay nearly half of what he makes in court-ordered support for his three children. In other states, the scenario is similar.

The payment amount is based on each parent's income and the amount of time he or she spends with the children. Other factors taken into consideration are the needs of each child including health insurance, special needs, daycare and education. The income and needs of the custodial parent are factored into the calculations in addition to the paying parent's ability to pay and the children's standard of living before the parents separated and divorced.

When the amount of child support a dad must pay, however, amounts to a monthly windfall for the custodial parent, it discourages shared parenting. The more the noncustodial dad sees the children, the less money the Court generally requires him to pay. This is why, in today's scenario, aiming for equally shared parenting time is better for the children.

When a dad must work two or three jobs and incur substantial overtime simply to pay his child support order, action should be taken to alleviate that dad's burden of providing for his kids. This can become increasingly arduous for him if he has remarried, and he and his new wife now provide for new children as well.

Another consideration arises if an ex-wife has remarried. In this instance, she is usually being at least partially supported financially by her new spouse. If her ex-husband's child support is particularly burdensome, he may consider petitioning the Court for lowered child support payments.

There are a few steps a father can take to have his child support re-examined and possibly lowered.

Discuss: He can discuss the matter with his ex-wife and see if she would be agreeable to lowering his monthly child support payments. If the ex-wife agrees, they will need to have this change approved by a judge in order to make it enforceable and to protect that dad in the future.

Seek Modification: If the ex-wife does not agree to receiving lower child support payments, the dad must then ask the Court for a hearing to have the existing child support order modified. At this hearing, the judge will determine whether or not the amount of support may be lowered and whether it will be temporary or permanent.

Retain: A dad faced with overly burdensome child support should seriously consider retaining an attorney for assistance. The best type of attorney he can retain is a family law lawyer who specializes in fathers' rights. There may be strategies that this attorney can use to better prove a dad's case in court.

No dad should be forced to pay more child support than he is realistically able to afford.

The Court is not in the business of forcing dads to work two or three jobs and excessive overtime hours simply to support his children. This is unfair to dads and can be detrimental to the children of divorced parents.

An open letter to Christian conservatives: Why you lost and what I suggest you do about it

June 28, 2015 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

Hello my American social conservative and Conservative Christian friends.

Yes I do call you friend. I have been known to sometimes work with you on various projects, and I hold nothing but goodwill in my heart for most of you who are working unappreciated–or even lied about and abused–doing things like setting up shelters for pregnant women who don't want to abort, standing up for the need children have for their fathers, running homeless shelters and soup kitchens, and doing other charitable and relief work. Some of you helped save my life some years ago when I was completely destitute and, yes, suicidal.

Although I will say some of you, those of you who require a Bible-reading and statement of faith before feeding–I've seen this personally, it's not a myth–you should put a stop to it. You make people hate Jesus when you make it like he'll only feed you, bind your wounds, or give you shelter if you listen to him lecture first. When the good Samaritan acted, he didn't ask whether the man he saved was spiritually clean first.

But beyond that, I find much good in traditional, conservative values. Social conservatives also attempt to preserve what is good in our society, and not just protect it from bad, and that too is valuable.

Now. I just said a lot of nice things about you. I meant every word. But I'm not a social conservative, and I never will be. And I really mean that: never. I tried living that way once and it was absolutely horrible. No thank you, no no no no. If you want to live that way go for it. Do it joyfully and without apology. I will not, nor will I be teaching my sons to live that way. Ever. They will make their own choices, including whether or not to believe in God or if they do how they will approach scripture. It is not my job, or yours, to tell them how to live.

So what to do about people like me who've heard your message, in great detail, and simply said "no thank you?" Because here's the thing: we're a majority of people now.

We frequently tell feminists that they're a minority of the population, because they are, and always have been, and likely always will be, and that they have no right to tell the rest of us how to live. Because they don't.

But you are a minority of the population too. And just as most people accept that there is some truth to what feminists say (it's hard to be wrong 100% of the time, although they try), most people accept there's some truth in what you say. But most people also think you're wrong about a lot of stuff too.

I don't say that to mock you or hurt you. I say it to tell it like it is.

Given that this is reality, and most people will not ever become fundamentalist Christians or social conservatives, as I see it you have a couple of options. For religious reasons you may want to flee Mammon and shun the wider world. That's an old and grand tradition among American conservatives in particular. You may well find Bible verses that justify you doing that–it would probably be a gross misreading in my opinion, but what do I know? I'm a Catholic and we don't accept Fundamentalist notions that you can just pick up a Bible and find God's will in it based on your own personal interpretations or by just reading the plain text.

No really, we don't. Look up what Catholic and Orthodox teachers and theologians say about Sola Scriptura. They reject it completely and are bemused most of the time when you fling Bible verses at them. Even if they agree with your usage of the quote, which they occasionally will, they'll always seem somewhat condescending to you because in their view you guys get the Bible wrong so often it's impossible to keep track of.

Now again you don't have to agree with me on that, and you can scream that I'm dead wrong and start flinging more Bible verses at me to prove it. I won't be interested. My mind and my heart are hardened to your message. I very seriously mean that. I do not accept salvation in the way you offer it. I reject it wholesale in fact. I'd rather burn, and yes I mean that. I spent years in Bible study with you guys and I think you're dead, dead wrong in your approach to scripture.

But I'm not interested in debating you on it either. I suggest dealing with the fact that most of your fellow Christians don't use the Bible the way you do. And I only bring up all this Bible stuff for one reason:

To remind you that your views are frequently a minority among even Christians, and you have no right to speak for them either. Well, you can try, but most won't listen because they think you're wrong. So is there any chance the Holy Spirit is leading them aright and you are the misled ones? Just a thought.

You want to push the message that abortion is always murder? OK. We've heard you say that for almost 50 years. And while there is strong evidence that a growing number of young people are more pro-life than their parents, you're reading your own desires into assuming that's going to eventually translate into abolishing abortion. It won't. The vast majority of people want abortion legal in some fashion, and always have. They just want limits on it. Otherwise, you've lost that argument. I'm sorry but you have. It isn't relevant whether I agree with you or not. In fact, let's say I do agree with you: then I'd be saying we lost. Whatever. It isn't going to change.

Ditto the issue of homosexuality. You lost. You really did. You lost completely and utterly.

Are there people out there sharing an ideology that attempts to normalize sexual abuse of children and teaching young people dodgy things on human sexuality? Who even use sexuality, homosexual or heterosexual, in cultlike fashion to lure followers? Absolutely. Are there mothers and fathers who sexually molest their children in a "homosexual" fashion? Yes. But these days, most of us know at least a few gay men and women and the vast majority of them are not trying to convert your children and the vast majority of them are not mentally ill and very, very few people are going to "become gay" due to exposure. You may wish to declare them sinners and you have a right to do that–but you would do better to look after your own salvation not theirs. Their choice is between them and God. Leave them alone unless they're picking your pocket or breaking your leg. Worry about the ideologues actually pushing an agenda, which most (I said most) gay people are not doing.

I will also note for you something else: there's this large and growing thing called the Manosphere, of which the large and growing and increasingly influential Men's Rights Movement is part. No one controls that movement, and that's a little scary. Have you ever heard that joke about "Organized Baptist" being a contradiction in terms? Yeah. It's true of the Men's Rights Movement too. A lot of conservative, religiously oriented guys and girls are here, and they are standing right next to the queers and the weirdos and the beggars and the prostitutes and the tax collectors.

Do you happen to remember who else partied with people like that? While others were busy piously reading from the scriptures and lecturing on immorality while living their own lives of hypocrisy and sin?

Here's the thing: most MRAs welcome social conservatives with open arms. We really do. We just won't let you be in charge, and we will not tell you what your itching ears want to hear. We have quite the marketplace of ideas going here, and we will listen to what you say, we will think on it, and if you are right we will say we think you right and if you are wrong we will say we think you wrong.

So will you accept that with humility and add your wisdom to this growing movement of malcontents and rebels when there are ears ready to hear your wisdom and your insight? And prepared to accept it if your advice is refused? And also just be glad when you make a point and others do listen based on your words? The Bible calls that humility you know, and it's a good thing for a Christian to cultivate. So if you can do all that, welcome. But if you just want to condemn us for not living up to your moral standards, well, Christ had some tart words for that too. Maybe you should look them up.

Now, as I say, you could walk away from all this "Men's Rights" drivel. Some of you have. I've read quite a few snotty, ignorant things by conservatives slamming MRAs. The overwhelming majority of those "conservatives" never even bothered to talk to one of us. I hope you guys realize that by doing this–by slandering people you haven't even tried talking to on their own terms–you're quite possibly harming your brothers, your sons. Because your sons are increasingly saying the same things we do. If not aloud to you, then to their friends:

Why on Earth would any sane man yoke himself to a woman, becoming her wage slave, knowing that at any point in this bargain she can pull out and take everything he has including his children, even use weapons on him, and have him jailed for his troubles, unilaterally and with no practical recourse for about 90% of the male population when it happens?

By the way, have you visited any of the men in debtor's prison? They're all over America now. They're almost all fathers we've been putting in jail while everyone is worried whether the government will recognize gay couples as married by law or whether or not there should be a 150 year old flag flying over some state capital. Dads in jail. Ripped from their children, jailed without due process, and what will you say or do about that except call them bums?

Furthermore, young men are fleeing conservative Christian denominations in droves because frankly most of you are busy telling them why they need to buckle down and straighten up and fly right and protect the women and own up to a huge list of responsibilities to women you've put on their shoulders and they're increasingly saying, "Why should I do that? What sane man would? Do I get anything out of this but your grudging praise and maybe some sex I can get 50 other ways?"

Yes, young women are leaving too. But it's hard not to notice that on any given Sunday, there are more women than men in most Churches these days. Now you could flatter women's vanity, women's egos, and say something ludicrious about women being more spiritually advanced than men. Or it could be that young men are hearing nothing but what they owe and what they must do and what you expect of them, and wondering what they get out of it besides your vague promises of salvation and moral righteousness without any strong reason to believe you have any authority to make such promises.

Oh, and I've noticed a lot of you–a whole lot of you, maybe most of you–always blame your sons when the relationship goes bad and he loses his kids. Damn near 100% of the time. Now why would that be? Am I just imagining that?

By the way, those young men can't find anything in the Bible that says they personally are required to sacrifice all to a woman. Because it's not in there. Not unless you torture the scriptures so hard they finally give you what you want. Some fringe reading of Genesis and the word "helpmeet" or something or other St. Paul said about wives submitting I would imagine. I assure you that will fall on deaf ears more than 90% of the time, not just with most people but especially with most young men. Not just because atheists don't agree with the Bible, but because most Christians think you're going overboard there too.

It is also hard not to notice just how often in so many churches the preacherman is telling women what they want to hear. Those women like a man at the pulpit, for the most part, but if he starts challenging them on what they owe to their men besides vague "submission" (what do I need a woman's submission for?) you will see a lot of them walking out the door and not coming back. Maybe, just maybe, you should let them–if they will show no genuine, demonstrable regard for the well-being, safety, and care of your brothers, your sons.

Did I just suggest women should have to prove to men that they are worth having a relationship with? I did. Is there something un-Biblical about that? I've read it, and I don't think there is.

Furthermore, I have to tell you–and I know these words will be harsh but I think you need to hear them: before the Feminists came along, you guys had a reputation for being the most shrill, humorless, rigid killjoys and nosy busybodies and nuisances in the world. Indeed, that kind of behavior, I submit, is a big part of why for all practical reasons the Social Justice crowd has taken over so much of society: you guys were so ghastly to people so often no one could stand you anymore, and these even worse people flooded in to fill the gap.

But we aren't putting you back in that gap. Sorry, we're not. Deal with it.

Feminist women are frequently humorless, bitter, nasty scolds, killjoys who ruin the fun for everyone–but you frankly have let too many of these same types of control freak witches control your churches. You have also not called out these women in your numbers for their abusive behavior.

In other words, a whole lot of us are anticipating having to take you social conservatives on once we've taken care of the feminists. Which, by the way, we will, with your help or without.

Or you could decide we don't have to be hostile, and accept that Christ's mission for you is to share your wisdom with those willing to hear, and not keep telling the rest of us we have to do everything your way because you and your friends are convinced you've read the Bible and/or Constitution 100% correctly and everyone else has got it wrong.

By the way, that VAWA thing? Thanks for opposing it, even if you failed to ever once mention the boys who get beaten raped or killed by their girlfriends or wives, directly or by proxy while you scoff and laugh just like the feminists. I must have missed the part in the Scriptures where wives are allowed to beat their husbands.

I was recently pleased to help create a hashtag called #SpankAFeminist. There were a number of conservatives expressing discontent there. I can only respond by reminding you once again that nobody likes humorless, stick up the butt, rigid, controlling, judging, belittling, sniffing, passive-aggressive, cringing-at-the-possibility-that-some-woman-somewhere-might-be-offended prudes. And uh, I remember when that was you guys.

Or you could laugh, wince a little at some bad jokes and some tasteless humor and imagery–just like I do–and accept that poking fun at yourselves as well as your enemies is perfectly OK, and that there is no roving band of MRAs running around the streets with paddles looking to chase women around, and no roving bands of gay MRAs are coming for your children either.

So will you fulminate about how self-evidently correct you think your scriptural readings are? Or will you open your heart to people telling you you're getting it wrong and may be harming your sons in the process? Also, maybe you want to tell them to stop arguing with us, and start alerting those running your churches, and even the entire Conservative Movement, that if they don't start loving and respecting the wants and needs and desires of your sons, most of those boys are just going to leave.

How long would you stay in a place where all they do is take and never give? That may be some sort of self-flagellating Christian ideal, but seriously: how long would any of you do that, and who among you would instruct anyone else that they should make such a choice?

Conservatives, you need to start challenging not just yourselves, but specifically your women. You need to tell your women they are not the center of the universe and that society was not molded to work at their whims and wishes either. You as a Christian Man undoubtedly know your place, which is as a humble servant of God. Well start telling your women that, you bloody cowards, and stop, just stop, calling your sons losers and layabouts and bums who need to “man up” in order to provide for a woman. That’s a lousy deal and you know it. So just admit it: it’s time for women and men to figure out what kind of relationship will work for them, and not on you to tell them how to do it.

Now if you want a dirty little secret? I will bet heavily that if you just let people choose how they want to live, the majority will wind up choosing something that looks like that “traditional” relationship we so often talk about, with the man making most of the money and the woman making most of the home stuff. Just as I suspect that if you tell women that if they get pregnant, no man is obligated to financially support them unless he actually agreed to be a father, there will likely be fewer abortions because there will likely be a lot less profligate sexual activity to begin with.

But it’s up to you. Keep this in mind though: you aren’t going to make conservatives out of most MRAs. But most MRAs–not all but most–will 100% accept conservative and religious MRAs and back you if you have a good ideas. Good ideas can come from all sorts of people.

Just know your place. Seriously. Know your place.

Feminists now go after Heavy Metal. Is a #MetalGate in the making?

AVfM Classics: Your feelings and why they don't matter

June 29, 2015 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

This post originally appeared on AVfM April 3, 2010.

Standard Dr. Paul disclaimer: This advice is not intend for all women. So if it does not apply to you do not be offended by it. If you are offended on behalf of all women, then please stick around. Grandiosity is treatable.

Dear ladies,

Let's talk feelings. Actually, forget that. I'll talk feelings, because if you talk feelings, I won't get to talk at all.

I know, that sounded insensitive. It was insensitive, and quite intentionally so. But keep reading, there is a method to my malice, and a message that you really need to hear. I don't want you to miss out on it because you're in a huff over the fact that I regard your feelings at best as obstructive, and at worst the primary and overarching cause of failure in your love life. And worse yet, as a source of abusive control for anyone crazy enough to get close to you.

As ironic as it may sound to you, if you want a good love life the first step is to get your feelings out of the way, or at least quit using them as a weapon. So let's get out of Oprah mode and just use our brains long enough to sort this thing out.

It starts, like most of your problems, in childhood. That's the cute and annoyingly whiney phase of life that boys, unlike you, are forced to outgrow. You don't get all the blame for that, but if you really want a meaningful relationship, you'd better start taking some responsibility for correcting it.

Babies, whether blue or pink, are pretty much alike. When a child gets hungry or dirty or tired or sick or lonely or scared, they tend to react by screeching until someone does something about it. It makes sense. Babies, after all, can't take care of themselves.

But not too far along in life the paths of boys and girls, emotionally speaking, fork into two very different directions. By the time both have some measure of language and cognitive skills the reaction to all that caterwauling changes, and not so subtly.

Pretty early in a boy's life, about the time he can speak in complete sentences, tolerance for remaining a baby wears thin. His wailing is met with everything from ridicule to threats. If "big boys don't cry," doesn't work, then, "I'll give you something to cry about," usually does, especially after a few rounds of following through.

Psychologists will tell you that this is where we harm boys, that we dissociate them from their feelings and shut down their emotional selves. They even call it abuse.

But in most cases, unless taken too far, it doesn't abuse boys feelings as much as it teaches them to start mastering them. That kind of self control is a pretty good skill that comes in handy for a lot of things, like, say, being an adult. You see, before the psychologists came along to tell us what rotten parents we were, we had a different name for the effect we had on boys, although not so catchy and marketable.

We called it growing up. It was all the rage.

We knew, even without a Ph.D. in conjecture, that not maturing was a bad thing. It resulted in all sorts of problems, like permanent childhood and self centeredness.

And a whole lotta women.

That's because while we were insisting that boys learn real life skills, girls got a different message. Actually, they got the same message that they'd been getting since birth. Namely that squawking loud enough will get you what you want. That is why that while boys your age grew into manhood, you just got older, hairier and more irritating.

And more vulnerable to being exploited.

The self help gurus have zeroed in on that one like chicken hawks and turned your feelings about your feelings into a cash cow. For a fee, they tell you to express your feelings, write them down, trust them, affirm them, discuss them in groups, put them in a journal, confront people with them, list them, learn more words for them, read about them, mouth them through a sock puppet like a neurotic ventriloquist and above all, get them validated as something sacred by all in your life.

That have led you to attend the Church of Emotionalism, where your tears are holy and Kleenex are passed right along with the collection plate. Can I get an amen?

But they aren't telling you anything really different than the same bullshit you have been told your whole life, and that you now tell yourself. When you have pain, or even a sense of slight annoyance, someone else is supposed to by God fix it.

And so you remain, born again baby that you are, stuck in self-delusion until you get some things straight.

Despite what your therapist told you, or what you saw on Oprah, your feelings don't have any inherent value compared to say, facts, logic or a good cheeseburger. Most of the feelings you think are so important are as transient as campaign promises and worth just about as much attention.

What you feel right now won't be the same thing you feel in a few hours, or, if you are like a lot of women, in a few minutes. So expecting your man to stand constantly at the ready, as though his purpose in life is to validate and honor every fleeting emotion you have at each and every point of their temporary existence is a non starter. If that is what you expect, you don't need a relationship, you just need a better therapist.

And the same for taking your relationship straight into turmoil because you use your feelings to undermine communications every time a logical solution undermines your agenda.

You know exactly what I am talking about. The more reason and logic point to your being wrong, the more unreasonable and illogical you become. It is calculated and intentional. It's the tried and true plan of "If being reasonable doesn't get me what I want, I will just be increasingly unreasonable till I get it anyway." Nothing like bullying someone into compliance.

And in a really twisted, perverted way, it makes sense. Heck, you're a slave to your feelings, why shouldn't everyone else be?

For a while, in many cases, it even seems to work. But it ultimately blows up in your face because all this nonsense is just a recipe for him to eventually cook up a great big casserole dish full of fuck-this-crazy-bitch.

Are you feeling me?

Ladies, the only real purpose for your feelings is to tell you there is a problem you need to fix. After that, continuing to dwell on them, or childishly forcing your partner to obsess on them with you, only keeps you from finding solutions.

It may annoy him into fixing things for you, as surely as you were still laying in a crib, but at this point in your life that is only to shut you up. It leaves you less respected and less respectable every time it happens. When your man gives in to this he isn't meeting your emotional needs, and you certainly aren't meeting his. All you have accomplished is pressuring him into changing your emotional diaper.

If you think that is the path to a healthy relationship, think again. Jerking people around on an emotional leash is only good thing if you are a psychopath.

Hostility will always be the natural result for people who use emotions not to connect or to create intimacy, but as a weapon to control and manipulate. It is hostility well deserved.

Now, there has been a long running misconception about men and women that has been around about as long as igneous rock. That is that women are somehow more gifted in the emotional department than men.

Of course, that's more bullshit. Training half the population to be childish, emotional puppeteers in ways that ultimately sabotage their own emotional fulfillment is hardly a gift. It is more like a cruel joke. And it may seem funny when you are 20 but it will be much different at 45 when you are rapidly graying, cooking for one, and wondering why so many men get tired of listening to you in about 5 minutes.

With that in mind, if you want to see evidence of real emotional acumen, consider the following names:

Shakespeare, Keats, Hemmingway, Steinbeck, Gibran, Kipling, Blake, Wordsworth, Byron and Shelly. Or even the great contemporary songwriters, Simon, King, Kristofferson, Dylan, Hiatt, Lovett and Henley. This list is a drop in the bucket, and if we added to it till we covered every genius in world history in the realm of the human heart, we would have to address 95% of them as mister.

In fact, truth be known, most of the men in your life who you have dismissed as emotional zeros more likely belong on that list than you do. You just never knew it because you are such an emotional mess.

Feminists would tell you that this is sexism, and perhaps they are right, though as usual for the wrong reasons.

It may well be sexist to the core to raise half the population, your half, to be emotional cripples while telling them they are emotional giants.

Yes, we are biological failures but we'll try to be less manly…we promise!

June 29, 2015 | by Annelie Sjöberg | Link | Original Link

How much contempt for men does Sweden tolerate? That is the question I ask myself and that rings in my head after reading the article in today's SVT public opinion section. Note that I am writing about contempt for men – not man-hating.

Hate is a word that is abused daily. A feeling of hatred stems mostly in the experience of having been the victim of an injustice, a desire for vengeance and vindication. Contempt, however, is nothing more than a disparagement of a person or group of people. Disregard is a symptom of a deeper problem: a patronizing view of a group of people as inferior in comparison with other groups.

The article can be, along with others, summarized as follows:

- Destructive masculinity norms are a major social problem.
- Men today are growing up with a number of privileges in the form of power and economic advantage. But men get even with destructive behaviors that limit their possibilities.
- Masculinity norms make men constantly prove their manhood and encourage aggressive and violent behavior that affects the people around them as well as themselves. We want men to be able to choose for themselves how they want to be and live.
- Men as a group have to take more responsibility for violence and sexual violence.
- Many men still refuse to see their collective responsibility for masculinity norms and their consequences. Sometimes they are perpetrators, but they are always spectators and fellow human beings.
- We can always make a difference. We need to start talking about violence and sexual abuse as male problems and work to teach all men actively to break with the destructive masculinity norms.

These arguments are starting to seriously irritate me. What masculinity norms are they talking about? I meet through my work a large number of young people. About half of them are male. I have never encountered one who says it would be normal to engage in violence and sexual abuse.

On the contrary, such behavior is condemned vigorously and perhaps hardest by men. The same applies to all of my male acquaintances. Never have I heard anyone defend violence and abuse against women and children.

Violence is definitely not some normal standard of behavior. It is abhorred.

Now, one would certainly guess that the article being discussed was written by some extreme radical feminists – but it was signed by a number of elected MPs who believe that half the population will bear responsibility for what a few individuals do and this presumption of guilt is only based on a biological fact that one can not control: namely the sex you happen to be born into.

Therefore, I have some questions I would like to ask the authors:

- How can it be deemed acceptable and even desirable that representatives of our highest legislative and decision-making bodies depict a group of people as extra blameworthy only because of an inborn trait, i.e. biological sex. Would it would be considered ok to do the same if it was about other properties such as color, ethnic or socio-economic background?
- How should young boys and men who do not recognize themselves in the image painted of them, address the fact that society regards them as collectively responsible for crimes they never committed? What signals are we sending to a rising generation of boys and young men in one of the world's most equal countries?
- How should I, as a woman, feel included in a movement that claims to fight for equal rights and duties for both sexes, yet all my male friends, relatives and colleagues are portrayed as the only gender that must change in order to fit into the female norm? How should I, as a woman ever feel equal with men if only my sex matters for whose rights are worth the most?

As if this were not enough, we can now read how the Swedish Prime Minister once again is involved in the campaign #HeForShe. In one of the world's most equal countries, Sweden's chief political boss believes that men must take much greater responsibility for gender equality. On the government website we read:

> In the few areas in society is there such a great development as in gender equality. That people, irrespective of gender, increasingly are able to work, learn and make their voice heard, has been a crucial part of the Swedish success story, for our growing economy and personal freedom. Now, the success story continue, says Stefan Löfven.
> The theme "What responsibility do men have for promoting equality between women and men" was discussed by the leading representatives from the United Nations, industry, trade unions, civil society and the responsible ministers.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister Löfven. How about we to start working for equality for real? In our own home? Do you think, like any of us, that gender should not play any role in the opportunities we have as individuals?

Circumcision could raise the risk of autism

June 29, 2015 | by Debbie Nicholson | Link | Original Link

Approximately 55 percent to 65 percent of all newborn boys are circumcised in the United States each year. Routine circumcision is usually performed during the first 10 days (often within the first 48 hours), either in the hospital or, for some religious ritual circumcisions, at home.

Conclusions are based on converging observations in animal, clinical and ecological studies, Dr. Morten Frisch, MD, PhD, DSc, consultant and senior investigator conducting epidemiological research at Statens Serum Institute. Adjunct professor of sexual health epidemiology at Aalborg University and lead author of this study along with Jacob Simonsen, Center for Sexology Research, Aalborg University, hypothesized a possible impact of ritual circumcision on the subsequent risk of autism spectrum disorder (ASD) in young boys.

This study included 342,877 boys born between 1994 and 2003 and followed through the age of nine, and during the course of the study.

During the course of the study 4.986 cases of autism were diagnosed. The study showed that regardless of cultural background, circumcised boys were more likely to develop autism. Being circumcised before age 10 was associated with a 46 percent increased risk but if circumcision took place before the age of five the risk doubled.

Circumcised boys in non-Muslim families were also more likely to develop hyperkinetic disorder by 81 percent.

Dr. Frisch stated “Our investigation was prompted by the combination of recent animal findings linking a single painful injury to lifelong deficits in stress response and a study showing a strong, positive correlation between a country’s neonatal male circumcision rate and its prevalence of ASD in boys.”

Today it is considered a medically unacceptable practice to circumcise boys without proper pain relief but none of the most common interventions used to reduce circumcision pain completely eliminates it. Some boys will endure intensely painful circumcisions. Researchers say that the pain associated with circumcision in very young babies is likely to be more severe during the operation and post-operatively.

Painful experiences in neonates have been shown in animal and human studies to be associated with long-term alterations in pain perception, a characteristic often encountered among children with ASD.

“Possible mechanisms linking early life pain and stress to an increased risk of neurodevelopmental, behavioral or psychological problems in later life remain incompletely conceptualized,” said Dr. Frisch, who continued, “Given the widespread practice of non-therapeutic circumcision in infancy and childhood around the world, our findings should prompt other researchers to examine the possibility that circumcision trauma in infancy or early childhood might carry an increased risk of serious neurodevelopmental and psychological consequences."

There are experts, however, that are urging caution about this study.

Professor Jeremy Turk. MD, BSc (Hons), FRCPsych, FRCPCH, DCH, Consultant Child and Adolescent Psychiatrist in the Trust's Behavioural Phenotype Learning Disabilities Service and a Professor of Developmental Psychiatry at the Institute of Psychiatry, related to the Daily Mail that while the findings of the study were "interesting," they needed to be "considered carefully."

"This is not a causal study, but instead compares data sets and looks for correlations. While this is a valid way of doing a study, it means that we must be careful about any implications," he said. "For example, many cases of autism are missed until children are older and as there are relatively few cases of autism this could easily skew the data." "Furthermore, there are many potentially confounding variables which could explain raised ASD rates, which the authors do not explore or account for."

"Finally, I have some issues with the premise in that their speculations regarding early pain as a cause of autism are, to say the least, highly speculative."

Dr. Rosa Hoekstra, PhD, a lecturer in The Open University's Science faculty, commented to the Daily Mail, "I think this is an extremely speculative study." She related that the study is based on registered data, "and takes a registered autism diagnosis at face value, without considering cultural or social factors affecting the likelihood of an (early) autism diagnosis. Even in a high income country like Denmark, not all children with autism are detected and given a suitable autism diagnosis at an early age."

Professor McConway, professor of applied statistics also with the Open University adds "This study raises an interesting question, but one that cannot be fully answered with these data."

Notes On A Scandal: Dr Umar Johnson, The "Conscious Stripper"

June 29, 2015 | by Mumia Ali | Link | Original Link

"We had the best organization a black man's ever had. Niggers ruined it."
Denzel Washington, "Malcolm X"

The past month has seen a flurry of activity and downright scandal surrounding and concerning one Dr. Umar Johnson, the self-proclaimed "Prince of Pan-Africanism". Johnson, who also claims to be a descendant of famed abolitionist Frederick Douglass, is a highly popular and well-known name on the "conscious" lecture circuit, giving talks and seminars as far away as Rotterdam in the Netherlands, on all things Black & Proud. Perhaps the most ambitious move of his stellar career to date, came about two years ago when Dr. Umar announced his intentions to build a school for Black boys in Virgina on the campus of a defunct university. He appealed to the Black public for funding, his goal to raise $5M USD inside two years. All seemed well with the universe.

Until the Conscious Stripper happened.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=ho03Xhacpu8

Last month, word hit Black social media that Ms. Khym Ringgold, a Ft. Lauderdale, FL resident, 40-something year old single mother of four boys, one of whom is reportedly in prison and a "performance artist" – which includes, among other things, impersonating famous celebrities like Janet Jackson and is a staple at local strip clubs, posted a series of what she claims are text messages between herself and Dr. Umar Johnson which supposedly revealed their "illicit affair". For his part, Dr. Umar released via his Facebook a statement giving his side of what went down, claiming that the whole thing has caused him to lose a $1M USD donation by an unnamed NBA player.

Both have agreed as to the basic facts: that they met last August during a "Garvey Day" celebration in Ringgold's native Ft. Lauderdale; that they had a brief sexual relationship that took place in Philadelphia PA on three separate occasions in late March to early April of this year; and that those sexual encounters took place during the late night and at a hotel.

And that is where all hell breaks loose.

To be sure, Dr. Umar is certainly no stranger to controversy; he's made enemies among whites, Black feminists and even other "conscious Blacks" for his many stances regarding race, Black feminism, Black women more broadly and homosexuality. Indeed, he made only one appearance on the front pages of A Voice For Men, arguably the largest mens' issues website on the planet, because its leaders, namely editor-in-cheif Mr. Paul Elam, and managing editor and chief of operations Mr. Dean Esmay, felt that Dr. Umar's strident Black nationalist stance could bring more heat than light. Nevertheless, he has a large supporter base of African Americans, who see him as a politically incorrect breath of fresh air and one of the relatively few Black men of his stature who is an open advocate for Black men and boys. This has drawn him the ire of Black feminists in particular, among their number Charing Ball and Feminista Jones, both of whom have taken to social media of their own to denounce Dr. Johnson. More recently, after bowing out of a scheduled interview with yours truly's newly launced daily podcast heard on YouTube for reasons of "needing to be careful with who I do interviews with because people have agendas", Ms. Ringgold then turned around and gave an "exclusive" sitdown with MadameNoire's Ms. Charing Ball – the same Charing Ball who, one year ago, wrote a hit-piece on Dr. Umar for his aforementioned controversial views. During the interview, Ms. Ringgold contended that she actually dated Dr. Umar and broke things off with him when his excuses and other inconsistencies gave her too many questions to answer. She further alleged that he was "unfit" to lead a school for Black boys and asserted that he was not qualified to head up such an academy. However, Ms. Ringgold, who has by now conducted a number of "friendly" interviews in addition to the aforementioned MadamNoire, has failed to offer any evidence to support her claims as to the fitness of Dr. Umar to head up a school or that there is any grounds for fiscal malfeasance on his part. Indeed, by all accounts, Ms. Ringgold's entire argument seems to stem from her being a woman scorned.

However, what this latest tempest in a Black teapot shows us, is that there is a concerted effort on the part of Black feminists – like Jones and Ball – to take ANY opportunity to tear ANY prominent Black man down who does not otherwise comport themselves to their own agendas. It is for this reason that I argue Dr. Umar is indeed the latest victim of Black feminists.

Recent events of the past few years aside, it's an old story with an equally old set of tactics. Black feminists were behind the attempts to derail US Supreme Court nominee Clarence Thomas on the grounds of what would become known as "sexual harssment", despite an utter lack of hard evidence that anything untoward took place on the job between Thomas and Anita Hill (plus the fact that Hill's own veracity was called into question for her lack of urgency in reporting such a supposedly important matter to the authorities). That was a full quarter century ago.

Then, there were attempts on the part of Black feminists, like bell hooks, to derail Nation of Islam's Minister Louis Farrakhan's Million Man March which took place in the fall of 1995. Despite the stated purpose of the gathering of one million Black American men on the national mall in Washington DC to examine the role their own actions have taken place in the state of things in Black America itself, Black feminsts were intent on charging Farrakhan and the organizers of the event not just with sexism and misogyny for "excluding" Black women, but also for charging them with scamming MMM supporters out of large sums of money. The charges and accusations, of course, were never proven or verified.

Black feminists have been after quite a few rappers, Tupac Shakur among them, despite again, having no evidence that he was indeed guilty of raping a groupie gal in a hotel (despite being arrested and convicted of the offence; how many innocent Black men has this happened to?) and the fact that some of his best known records were ones where Tupac extolled the virtues of Black womanhood itself, like "Dear Mama", "Brenda's Got A Baby" and "Keep Ya Head Up". More recently, Black feminists went after conscious rap fixture Talib Kweli, for daring to disagree with the Black Feminist Borg Hivemind, in saying that while he greatly disagreed with rapper Rick Ross, he nevertheless was indeed a part of hip hop culture and life. There are many more examples.

That brings us to the present day – where we have just witnessed a massive smear campaign attempt against Bill Cosby, despite the fact that there were no evidence or charges brought against him for allegations of sexual assault and rape nearly a half century old. Indeed, Brittney Cooper, the self-professed "Professor Crunk", has gone on record that the "court of public opinion" should be sufficient to "indict" and "convict" Cosby and that her thoroughly non-legal opinion should somehow hold weight in determining such matters. She and Jones have taken to the airwaves to further smear Cosby – a Black man who has worked tirelessly to assist Black Americans, especially in the area of education, giving more money and support to HBCUs than any other Black celeb or entertainer.

Even the President of the United States isn't beyond the reach of Black feminists' pernicious attempts to derail efforts to assist Black men and boys. Last year, Ms. Cooper took to her social media and her columnist spot at Salon.com to browbeat Barack Obama for failing to include Black women and girls in his "My Brother's Keeper" initiative; and even more Black feminists came to the fore just last month to upbraid the 44 POTUS yet again for what they see as his failure to check in with the Hivemind before moving forward with his push to do something for Black men and boys before his term in office ends in Jan 2017.

Strangely enough, Black feminists are MIA when it comes confronting real threats to the Black nation who happen to take the form of Black males – like drugs dealers, vicious and violent rapists, murderers, gangbangers and other organized crime thugs, car jackers and other local miscreants – or even to do more pedestrian things like organizing neighborhood cleanup efforts, which in themselves have been shown to have a dramatic impact on crime rates. It seems that Black feminists only get their backs up when Black men attempt to do anything hopeful and positive that doesn't require running it by the Black Feminist Politburo first. As far as Black feminists are concerned, Dr. Umar's school for Black boys can't happen because he doesn't tow their party line or his private life doesn't align with their sexual politics. And that's sad.

Because ultimately, the biggest losers aren't Black men like Dr. Umar; it's Black boys. Right here in my hometown of Philly, some 75% of Black men aged 24-54 – the prime age of life – are highschool dropouts and functional illiterates. Even worse, of those remaining 25% of Black men who do have highschool degrees, a significant portion of them are reading below grade levels. Nor is what is happening in Philly unique; similiar or worse results have been observed and documented in Detroit; NYC; Newark; Camden; Washington, DC; Houston; New Orleans; Miami-Dade county; Baltimore; Atlanta; Chicago; the list goes on and on. While the rumor and gossip machine that is Black America clamors on and as Black feminists continue their war on and against any Brotha they don't much like, it's Black boys, who will grow up to become Black men, will continue to enter a world they are hopelessly, woefully, utterly unprepared to function in, much less compete or thrive. And we all know how that story ends – here in Philly, despite a plethora of public schools closing on the watch of Black political and civic leadership, including my own alma mater Germantown High School, the City of Brotherly Love has recently erected a new local penal institution out on State Road.

I don't agree with everything Dr. Umar Johnson says or does; nor do I share his "preacher style" of oration and presentation. I don't agree with his views with regard to gays and lesbians. I find his "racial small tent" strategy to be tenuous at best, highly ruinous at worst, in a time when the world is a much smaller place than it was prior to the mid to late 1990s and the advent of the Internet. I think his focus solely on Black women when it comes to relationship advice and assistance owes more to personal bias with him having daughters, when it is clear that Black men needs such help and advice as well. Trust me when I tell you, I could think up quite a few reasons why I have real areas of real disagreement with Dr. Umar.

But he is among a precious few Black men who have the desire and talent, who wants to save the minds of Black boys and prepare them to take their rightful place in the world of tomorrow. And to tell you the truth, Black America needs all the help it can get.

It really does make one think about how the seemingly best of Black men get the most grief from Black women – in this case feminists – while the worst of us either get a silent pass of tacit approval, or outright laudable accolade.

With friends like these, Black America – and the Good Black Men in particular – certainly do not need any (white) enemies.

Analysis of CAFE’s Pride Parade drama

June 29, 2015 | by Steve Brulé | Link | Original Link

The Toronto Pride Parade banned the Canadian Center For Equality (CAFE) for life this year. But Jacob Gal, head of the York Pride Fest, reached out to CAFE and invited them to join the York parade on June 20, 2015 in Richmond Hill, north of Toronto.

Justin Trottier, one of CAFE’s founding members, informed Gal of the Toronto Pride decision and, after looking into the background and details of the “controversy,” Gal concluded that the exclusion was unjustified. Gal was pleased to welcome CAFE to his event in Richmond Hill and, after the event, went even further, saying that he would be pleased to partner with CAFE in the future since they shared common goals.

Gal learned that Toronto Pride organizers, like executive director Mathieu Chantelois, were concerned that CAFE was not catering to every group but was primarily focused on issues affecting men. But Gal pointed out that many, if not all, of the groups participating in Pride parades target specific demographic groups. Gal indicated that specialization is often necessary in order to better meet the needs of a particular demographic, adding that if he excluded specialized groups, there wouldn’t be much of a parade left. Gal also noted that Toronto Pride in fact welcomes many other specialized groups, but singled out CAFE for exclusion without justification.

Toronto Pride also accused CAFE of being misogynistic (Toronto Star article), but Gal pointed out that the accusation of misogyny is liberally and inappropriately applied today as a kind of generic slur devoid of substance, and he referred to a recent example in a local high school.

I first learned about the Canadian Association For Equality (CAFE) almost three years ago when I was filming “Broken,” a short documentary about two men after divorce.

Trottier invited me to interview Dr. Warren Farrell, a well-known author and recognized authority on men, fathers, and gender issues, who was giving a lecture at the University of Toronto. A group of feminists protested the lecture; they blocked the entrances and exits to the venue, intimidated attendees, and chanted slogans until the police were called to physically remove them. Since that inaugural lecture, feminist groups have targeted CAFE in a manner that can only be described as “bullying with a vengeance.”

CAFE says that they champion equality for all, but they also publicly recognize that issues affecting men are ignored, under-reported and/or under serviced: there are no men’s shelters, the male suicide rate is alarmingly high, the homeless are mostly male, and prisons are filling up with men whose crimes appear to be “breathing while poor.” With this in mind, CAFE decided to open the Canadian Center for Men and Families, the first of it’s kind in Canada. Feminists derided this effort and attempted to have CAFE’s registered charity status revoked.

CAFE has also hosted lectures on misandry in the media, violence against aboriginal men and boys, male suicide, the experience of males in university, moving beyond misogyny and misandry, and more. But instead of celebrating and supporting an organization that is working hard to expand the public discourse and provide desperately-needed services to men of all sexual orientations, these feminists remain obsessed with frustrating and dismantling CAFE, and shutting down their events. This group of feminists shut down talks by Dr. Janice Fiamengo, Dr. Paul Nathanson, Dr. Catherine Young, Dr. Warren Farrell, and more. They used smear campaigns to have CAFE's Equality Day evicted from Toronto Island, to have CAFE banned from the Toronto Pride Parade, and to cause trouble for CAFE's organizers in their private lives. These feminists seem to be connected with Vice, Toronto Pride, and NOW magazine (see also 2014). What could possibly explain this commitment to destroy CAFE?

Ideological feminists see CAFE as a threat in the same way that anyone who benefits from a lie feels threatened by someone who speaks the truth. CAFE has hosted speakers like Dr. Janice Fiamengo and Karen Straughan, both of whom are critical of feminism for its role in demonizing men for profit. The inescapable reality exposed by critics of feminism is that feminists have spread fear and hatred of men for many years by lying about statistics and gender-relations issues: the "1 in 4" statistic from Ms. Magazine, the claim that Domestic Violence is one-sided male on female, the "Pay Gap," and so much more.

Fiamengo has even clearly explained that feminism expands by claiming to represent every identifiable demographic group, whether they want to be included or not: women, lesbian, gay, trans, bi-sexual, people of color, differently-abled, etc, etc. There's room for everybody … except, of course, straight white men, who are scapegoated as the cause of every problem from car crashes to bad hair days. This is the only unifying feminist theme: straight white men are the source of all that is bad. The all-consuming cultural-imperialist goals of feminism require an enemy, the "Patriarchy ™," which is code for straight white men, the only identifiable group excluded from the suffocating arms of feminism.

Feminist theory revolves around "The Patriarchy™" (a simplification of the traditional Patriarchal social organizational structure), which claims that all women are, and always have been, systematically oppressed by all men, as graphically explained by the infamous Big Red (video at right).But as Sir Arthur Conan Doyle famously observed, "There is nothing more deceptive than an obvious fact," and in this case, the obvious fact is that Patriarchal societies were the norm of history, which is why the lie of Patriarchy™, in the manner used by feminists, is so very effective. Even though Patriarchal societies had both male and female rulers, this is still a trivial view of power. All members of society were subject to prescribed roles, males no less than females. Men were responsible not only for themselves, but for the behavior of their wives, often with severe consequences, and a great many privileges came by virtue of being female, a fact conveniently ignored by feminists.Perhaps more importantly, the broad arc of the history of civilization is best characterized by the urgent need to survive, not by the mythical oppression of women by men. The need to survive is what motivated men to invent, design, build and maintain virtually everything, and much of it was done to celebrate, elevate, protect, and impress women, not to oppress them. Men competed with one another for female favor and mating privileges throughout history, and they continue to do so today. That women of the past had obligations within family life is not evidence of oppression but of the pressing need to survive. And the unavoidable human suffering on the chaotic road to civilization – a road that must be built, maintained and rebuilt in-perpetuity – was and is borne by both men and women.

Feminists are utterly and willfully blind to the nuances of the historical power held by men and women. They have donned special victim-goggles through which to view the world – goggles that filter out all male suffering, all male sacrifice, all male-specific strengths and talents – and all female privilege – leaving only the "woman as victim of man" meme. This reaches comical extremes when people like Hillary Clinton proudly exclaim that "women have always been the primary victims of war." But to be more specific, feminism has morphed irrevocably into "everyone is a victim of the heterosexual-white-man," which is classic scapegoating behavior.

Groups like A Voice For Men (AVfM) are even bolder in identifying the deceit of feminism. Many writers and thinkers published on AVfM have concluded that all cultures in human history can be characterized as being "gynocentric," which means "putting the needs of women first." This is evident in common phrases like "women and children first" as practiced during crises like the sinking of the Titanic, and as seen during virtually any emergency to this day, including fires, sinking ships, money for medical research, or psycho-shooting-sprees in which men have used their bodies as human shields for their wives and girlfriends.

It's not hard to understand why gynocentrism was necessary for survival in the wild and dangerous world that we have now largely domesticated: any society that failed to protect women, or to prioritize their needs, would have perished. Men had to protect women and compete for their affection as much as they needed to build civilization. "Gynocentrism" is far more powerful at explaining human history than the "Patriarchy(tm)," can ever pretend to be. Ironically, some thinkers are even pointing out that it is the very gynocentric nature of society that enabled feminism to flourish in the first place. After all, would an oppressive patriarchal society not merely squash the cackling chickens as they hatch? The squawking feminists not only hatched, but were protected, obeyed and given resources, and for over 40 years feminist demands were treated more like commands to be obeyed than requests to be considered. Feminism's expansion of power was speedy and easy. In other words, exactly what you would expect in a gynocentric culture, and some have pointed out that feminism looks increasingly like gynocentrism on steroids.

Thinkers like Fiamengo and Straughan, and groups like A Voice For Men are beginning to question and criticize feminist claims and assumptions, and CAFE has hosted lectures by those who recognize that feminism plays a role in creating and/or exacerbating issues that affect men. This conversation is creeping into mainstream, and that is what terrifies feminists, whose response is to ramp up the rhetoric in an attempt to virtually outlaw criticism of feminism. It is now routine that anyone connected to a group that criticizes feminism is accused of misogyny, and then vilified.

Feminists in Toronto have been doing this to CAFE since it's inception. But some people, like Jacob Gal of York Pride Fest, are starting to think for themselves. They are reclaiming their identities from the feminist cultural imperialists, and this is a mark of maturity. The strength and maturity to stand up and say “I can think for myself, I can decide for myself, and I can speak for myself,” … and act accordingly.

I hope this is a new trend.

More rules for simpering male feminists

June 29, 2015 | by August Løvenskiolds | Link | Original Link

So, you want to be a simp?

A simp, also called a pussy-beggar, a creepy nice guy, or a friend-zoned guy, is a derisive term for a guy who panders shamelessly to women he is sexually attracted to, especially out of weakness or a lack of character. Both men and women cringe instinctively at such men, even if they are handsome or wealthy. The term appears to be derived by back-formation from terms like "simpleton," and "simpering."

The spread of this term through blue pill men is the beginning of awareness that the narrative society tells men about what women respond to in term of sexual attraction to men is as phony as Santa Claus.

Recently, I've been reviewing some popular articles touting "rules" for male feminists to adopt to be accepted by their feminist masters. I wrote about one such set of rules a year ago and I'd like to cover two more such sets of rules in this article.

In particular, I'd like to contrast the different styles of "rules" between those produced by a certain class of attractive, entitled women and those produced by others.

First, let us cover the list by Derrick Clifton, a serial list-maker whose toothy grin reminds me of the fictional Kzinti rat-cat's: an aggressive tell.

Derrick's list is entitled "So You Want to Be a Male Feminist? Here Are 11 Simple Rules to Follow" and has appeared widely at places like Mic and Everyday Feminism. This list is written in a direct, "do this, do that" manner typical of rule-based male hierarchies. Derrick unconsciously adopts the metaphor of a wannabe slave foreman instructing lesser slaves on how to behave in the presence of their masters:

> 1. Understand that women are leading the way and affirm their capable leadership. Don't assert yourself at the forefront.
> 2. When it comes to issues that directly pertain to women's bodies and experiences, be quiet and listen.
> 3. Men don't get to determine if they are "allies" to the feminist movement. Women do.
> 4. Take responsibility for addressing men's issues with other men, rather than expecting women in feminism to do all of the work.
> 5. Use your male privilege to encourage other men to work towards gender equality under women's leadership.
> 6. Don't use the label of 'feminist' as a way to try to get women to like you — > that's disingenuous and counterproductive.

7. When given opportunities to execute professional tasks related to feminist issues, consider referring other women instead.
8. Educate yourself about the history of feminism and how women of different backgrounds have approached the movement.
9. Ensure your feminism is intersectional.
10. Acknowledge that sometimes, women need opportunities to discuss feminist issues without the presence of men. And that's okay.
11. When women criticize your involvement in feminism, don't talk over them or talk down to them. Actively listen and be accountable.

This verbose list can be simplified quite a bit if one focuses on the actual actions Derrick is promoting:

Rules 1, 2, 3, 7, 1o and 11: Shut the fuck up. Slaves don't speak ahead of masters.

Rules 4. 5: Keep fellow slaves under control or you will suffer with them.

Rule 6 Castrate yourself. Masculinity and male sexual desire are bad. See also rules 1, 2, 3, 7, 10 and 11.

Rules 8 and 9: Learn to anticipate the moods and needs of your various masters so as to serve them better.

Ironically, Derrick's list suggest a good way for male MRAs to infiltrate feminist groups: simply sit in the back, say nothing, and do nothing – the ladies are in command so you are on vacation. Avoid looking at the feminists directly (toxic male gaze) and take lots of cryptic notes. If you are asked to speak, use some variation of "I feel like men have spoken enough, it is women's turn." The more reticent but confident and even defiant you seem, the more the feminist women will feel compelled to shit-test you. When they finally become overbearing (and they will), smile, say goodbye, and leave (until next time). The idea is to undermine the idea that men are in any way welcome to feminism even if they are the most passive, worshipful men ever.

Derrick's translated list makes it clear that feminism seeks to both break the will and test (or even dismantle) the sexuality of men. This is a recipe for societal disaster, of course: without proud, confident, sexually energized men doing difficult and dangerous jobs, society would collapse in less than a day. Interestingly, a new book on men in feminism suggests that the MORE masculine you are, the better:

> There are a few guys in the book who are more [conventionally masculine]. Ironically, those guys are probably most successful in the movement, in a conventional sense of success. They tend to be the ones who rise to positions of leadership. They get audiences. People listen to them. And that's partly because > they mobilize that more conventional masculine posture that they've developed. That's another one of the contradictions of experience in the field, I think.

But Derrick is merely the slave foreman of the slaves (or so he wishes). Let's see what sort of list the slave master herself comes up with.

Emma Watson created a firestorm last year when she birthed the United Nations backed "#HeForShe" movement. Emma recently came out with her own list of demands for male feminists with a much different tone than Derrick's: Emma's list assumes that the slaves are under such firm control that milady need only make casual suggestions and her sycophants will jump to fulfill them:

1. It's ok to let your girl pick up the bill. Oops! "Your girl?" Suddenly male sexuality is back and supported by feminists? This item sounds like a quiet, gentle and accommodating tip for men but in her explanation, Emma makes it clear that it is, in fact, quite bad when men fail to pay the bill on a date:

> Before you break out into a cold sweat when throwing down your credit card over the digestif menu, Emma assures that the fourth-wave of feminism isn't about killing-off chivalry. She says, "just because women want equality does not mean that acts of chivalry towards women must end. Chivalry is consensual and only becomes a problem when people expect things to be a certain way and follow the status quo."
> Emma told the audience a dating anecdote to explain: "I once took a man out for dinner, I chose the place and I paid… and it was really awkward, it didn't go down well! But the cool thing was we were both willing to have the conversation about why it was so uncomfortable."

For sexually active men, "awkward" dates mean one thing: no sex tonight. Emma wants the well-trained male slave to note this nuance and always have his wallet out first.

2. You shouldn't be ashamed to be a feminist. Again, Emma wants you to feel good about your being her slave while obscuring the fact that as a feminist, you are, in fact, her slave and SHE controls the shame-stick and can beat you with it whenever she pleases. Your identity as a loyal slave is your entire purpose for being and you'd better learn to love it. Or else.

3. Got girls in your business? Make sure they're getting paid equally. Again, the slave mistress needs you to protect the "girls." How adorable. And manipulative – you must implicitly accept the wage gap lie. The equality façade of feminism slips a bit – protect girls and ignore men.

4. Feminism shouldn't be threatening. Ignore the men who've been victims of the multiple mainstream feminist rape hoaxes and the men would've been brutalized in the media and in real life by feminists. Emma warns us that such wrongthink is bad – men shouldn't care about themselves; only women are worthy of men's concern.

5. It's ok for men to cry. [sic] Emma's perhaps unconscious ploy here is to get her slaves to express their emotions so she can weed out the weaker ones. No amount of feminist bullshit will erase women's powerful biological imperative to mate with strong men instead of weak ones.

6. Don't succumb to posturing. Now this rule is interesting and a bit convoluted. Notice Emma didn't say "Don't posture" but rather "Don't succumb" to it. Posturing in men is a form of dominance display whereby men show fitness to appeal to female approval. Again, perhaps unconsciously, Emma is demanding that men not only posture for her, but also that they do it with such aplomb that they don't succumb to lesser men, nor look as though the posturing was troublesome. Emma's feminism demands not just masculinity but ubermasculinity in her preferred partners.

7. Sign up in support of the #HeForShe campaign. For those duller slaves who can't read through her coyness, Emma closes with a direct, self-serving command.

No thanks, Emma. Men are not your slaves, and we don't owe you shit.

The smell of feminist fear

Without really remembering who he was–I had commented on one of his videos once, didn't even remember–when he asked me for an interview I was happy to grant it. During the course of that conversation (which was very good by the way) I discovered he was only 16 and was blown away. Then I saw this and couldn't stop laughing:

He's not even an A Voice for Men reader. He's just been watching videos and doing his own research and finding out that the authority figures around him are frequently really like.

Ah, corrupting the nation's youth. Guess what feminists? It's all over but the shouting I think. Boys like this are the men of the future, and they have no interest in your bullshit at all.

Why straight men should support gay marriage

The Supreme Court of the United States has recently found prohibitions on same sex marriage to be unconstitutional, and rendered gay marriage legal in all 50 states by majority decree. Dissenters from the majority opinion were opposed to the Court's interpretation of its reach, with Justice Roberts writing '[w]hether same-sex marriage is a good idea should be of no concern to us. Under the Constitution, judges have power to say what the law is, not what it should be'.

Same sax marriage is a good idea that heterosexual men have a vested interest in supporting, because it will be followed rapidly by same sex divorce, and possibly offer a solution to unfair marriage, divorce and child custody laws, which currently discriminate harshly against men in favor of women. Same sex divorce strips gender out of the equation, long used to justify legal discrimination against men. Feminist organizations in particularoppose equality when it comes to parenting after divorce, casting men as likely abusers of children, despite evidence that demonstrates women perpetrate most domestic violence against children, and children are more likely to be murdered by their mothers.

When children have two mothers or two fathers, it will be increasingly difficult, if not impossible, to cast one parent as negligent, abusive or undeserving on the basis of gender alone. A case will have to be made to prove allegations to justify reduced custody or access to the couple's children, which would be the default under shared parenting as a legal standard. Currently, men must engage in expensive and time-consuming litigation to prove they are deserving of equal or primary custody, a situation that results in poor and working class men accepting unequal parenting because they cannot afford to litigate. Feminist writers advocate for poor mothers to remain single for the precise reason that the courts will refuse access to the fathers of their children on the basis of gender. Access to children under marriage is difficult; when men remain unmarried, it becomes almost impossible.

Courts are slowly evolving to enforce child custody arrangements and punish parents who refuse to abide by court orders, although it is not unusual for men to go years never seeing their children, while paying court mandated child support. Parental alienation has received attention in the press recently after Bill Hudson disowned his children with actress Goldie Hawn, whom he accuses of deliberately 'poisoning' his children against him. Parental alienation is made easier when mothers engage damaging and false stereotypes about fathers, a situation that will not exist for same sex parents. Courts may treat parental alienation more seriously when there are no sexist stereotypes to engage, and instead see alienation as the controlling and abusive behavior it is.

Same sex marriages also provide an opportunity to examine domestic violence laws that legally discriminate against men by assuming they are perpetrators on the basis of their gender alone. Same sex partnerships are more violent in general than heterosexual relationships, with lesbians reporting the highest rates of intimate violence. When violent spouses are both women, or both men, it becomes necessary to examine evidence to determine which spouse is legally responsible for the violence, and may increasingly lead to domestic violence being understood as a problem that is perpetrated and experienced by both spouses equally.

Same sex marriages have the potential to challenge laws and customs surrounding marriage, divorce, child custody and domestic violence that currently discriminate against men on the basis of gender. Straight men have much to gain from these relationships, which may provide a legal foundation to challenge laws that unfairly target and punish men, and their children.

The new male archetypes: Servant, Slave and Scapegoat

June 30, 2015 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

"The modern hero, the modern individual who dares to heed the call and seek the mansion of that presence with whom it is our whole destiny to be atoned, cannot, indeed must not, wait for his community to cast off its slough of pride, fear, rationalized avarice, and sanctified misunderstanding. 'Live,' Nietzsche says, 'as though the day were here.' It is not society that is to guide and save the creative hero, but precisely the reverse. And so every one of us shares the supreme ordeal––carries the cross of the redeemer––not in the bright moments of his tribe's great victories, but in the silences of his personal despair." Joseph Campbell ~ The Hero with a Thousand Faces

Anyone suggesting they have ideas that will actually help men, psychologically speaking, has an obligation to place their philosophy, their rationale, front and center for men to see. I also understand that most practitioners don't really do that, especially in what I loosely define as the "mental health" industry.

Usually what you get is a short and sputtering list of platitudes about "wholeness," finding your "inner this" or "inner that," accompanied by an obscure definition of the practitioner's approach. It is either that or you get nothing but the bill.

Sometimes, often actually, they will inform you that they subscribe to feminist theory, which is an admission of their philosophy, except to the extent that it should be viewed cautiously, regardless of your sex.

Perseus

This writing is intended to explain exactly what An Ear for Men is about in regard to assisting men, specifically in their more modern struggle for identity and an understanding of where they fit in the world. This is particularly important as the lack of those things may well result in some serious problems. Among them are family dysfunction, substance abuse, suicide, violence, anxiety, depression, shame and a lack of self-respect that often crosses the line into self-hatred.

It is not that the current crisis of male identity is the sole cause of these problems. It certainly isn't. For example, family dysfunction is a self-perpetuating malady passed down from parents to children. In and of itself it has little to do with modern masculinity. Alcoholism is not a "male problem," nor is violence or other forms of abuse, though those practicing under a feminist shingle may send that very message.

When assessing problems, it can be very difficult to tell the difference between cause and symptom, between a problem and its source. Does family dysfunction cause substance abuse or is substance abuse the cause of the dysfunction? Is violence at the root of relationship problems or do relationship problems fuel and promote the violence? Do communication problems cause hostility or does hostility cause communication problems?

Are all these problems symbiotic, just a teeter-totter interaction of various pathologies feeding each other? If so, can we ameliorate one problem by successfully intervening on another?

I suggest that there may be some truth answering those last two questions in the affirmative. There are, however, workarounds, back doors if you will, to what may well form part of the root structure of an array of problems with no readily visible connection. The good news about that is that you don't need to see the connection initially in order to do something about it.

The philosophy here is that solutions begin with a recognition that there is indeed a crisis in male identity and male self-respect. It affects all of us, gay or straight, black or white or other race, regardless of religion or socioeconomic status.

Fifty years of gender politics have thrust all men into a new paradigm of sexual politics with no rule book. We are now three generations of men who have been pummeled with messages of who we are, almost all of them wrong, and who we are supposed to be, almost all of them destructive in one way or another. Our mental health industry is one of the prime proponents of these misguided ideas. They are espoused, for profit, at the expense of our men and boys.

The Old School Archetypes

The classic, historical masculine archetypes of Hero, Villain, Ruler, Warrior, Creator, Sage, Rebel and Explorer, all of which either defined what men chose or what they were driven to be. They provided men a model of what they chose not to be as well. They gifted men with a sense of identity and purpose, a rudder for their navigation of life. To a great degree (with some downsides) they worked. Jungian analysts, in the days before the ideological corruption of the field of psychology would likely tell you that these archetypes are rooted in our biology.[1]

It is also important to note that all these archetypes are anthropomorphic projections of the human male experience. They took root in our earliest mythologies because they were already in play in human life. Strangely, "mythology" told the real story of our lives. Every epic battle, great journey, tragedy and triumph of mythical figures mirrored the internal and external experience of real human beings in some way or another.

And so it went from epoch to epoch.

All that has been supplanted with a new and toxic narrative. To simplify it, we now live in a Zeitgeist where all male archetypes have been reduced to that of Villain, with the expectation that they will assume the role of Hero when needed…and directed. The ongoing expectations of men to protect, provide, sacrifice and endure have not changed. The change in narrative, however, demands that recognition and honoring of those things ceases in favor of persistent demonization.

Hera

Similar changes have happened in the lives of women. The Manipulator, the Bitch, the Saboteur, the Queen and the Damsel in Distress have usurped the timeless archetypes of mother (Demeter), daughter (Persephone), lover (Aphrodite), civic life and learning (Athena), etc.. While all these and other female archetypes are on full social display, the spectrum of those archetypes has begun to degrade into a vacillation between two roles based on immediate perception. Women are universally seen as the Queen, unless they are in distress or claim to be in distress. Once the perception of female distress registers, social consciousness reverts them to being the original Damsel in Distress. It is as though they live in a perpetual state of flux between empowered and helpless, depending on which is more advantageous, just as we see play out today across the geopolitical landscape.

That, too, is ultimately heading for a crisis of identity in women, though for the purpose of this discussion we need not explore that further.

The denial of all this, and the assumption that it has not had a tremendous impact on the psyches of men, has left them in an emotional and social wasteland that produces more of the psychosocial problems already identified in this writing.

This leads to an inescapable conclusion. While men do need assistance with specific problems, they are also suffering in a famine of functional archetypes. Failing to recognize this, even if we seek in earnest to help them with problems symptomatic of that deficit, is putting a Band-Aid on potentially mortal wounds.

If we are to help men, it requires us to enable them to nurture a new narrative of themselves and their lives. They need new archetypes that foster a new sense of identity if they are going to thrive in a new age.

So what exactly is an archetype?

The Greek root words are archein, meaning “original or old,” and typos, meaning “Model or type.” Archetype: Original Model. Archetypes are the old, original models on which men, in the unconscious recesses of their biology, shape and mold their lives.

Perhaps in the days when there were payoffs, e.g. honor, appreciation, respect and status, men’s unconscious movement toward one archetype or another made more sense.

We do not live in those times any more, and we haven’t for most or all of your lifetime. What remains for most men in modern life is a world of expectation without reward, burden without honor and service without self.

Most men know on some level that this is true, but many have a very hard time facing it out of fear. Fear of the loss of social approval, the loss of love and the loss of what they imagine is the only space the world grants them.

Some of the fear is at least superficially warranted. Facing these issues means reaching a level of consciousness sufficient to make you a bad fit in the world of the walking blind. It means a new mythology with new archetypes born of a newer and more accurate picture of the world.

Medea

The daunting challenge is that men can no longer afford the luxury of allowing biology alone to write their story. Technology and ideology have rendered that too dangerous. The old model makes men far too easy to manipulate and far too willing to comply with the manipulation to their own detriment. You can find this same story throughout classic mythology so it is nothing new. Those, however, were cautionary tales, the moral lesson from which has been erased from the cultural consciousness. Most dare not speak honestly of Hera and Medea in the modern age.

The results of that resembles a modern genocide of the male soul.

Fortunately, that which has been forgotten can be learned again. And that which has been learned in error can be corrected. The fruits of that effort are the restoration and "wholeness" so easily promised and seldom delivered.

The risks of embracing this on a personal level is actually an illusion. Once you walk the newer path you will most probably find you don't particularly want to return to the old one. The feigned approval of others loses its luster when the vision clears.

Despite appearances, all of this is really not so arcane. It is actually quite simple. You can start with most any problem in life; relationship and family issues are a good start. Map the mythology that got you there, that determined your actions and reactions. Were you playing the role of the Hero? The Warrior? Were you surrendering to the Siren's Song? Was the Damsel in Distress a façade with something more sinister behind the surface impression?

Did a faulty narrative of your place and worth in this world lead you directly into a painful wall? And if that is true, do you have the fortitude to face it and change the story?

Imagine the consciously constructed mythology that would lead you to a better place with better people. Imagine the story of you being written by your own hand.

The solutions are not always easy, but they are made much more accessible when you make the decision to clear your own path; when you are at the helm, navigating your own way, when the stars in the sky are arranged according to your own dreams and desires.

How many miserable professional men out there can remember a time when they aspired to be artisans, writers or artists, only to watch those dreams buckle beneath the oppressive weight of a story that they did not write?

How many desperate men are clinging to the role of provider and protector, having become automatons in loveless, abusive marriages that have ground their self-respect into the dust?

How many men have stories that end with a bottle of scotch and a handgun because they cannot breathe and do not know where to find free air?

Men need an alternative to the new mythology's archetypes of Servant, Slave and Scapegoat. The only thing preventing that from happening is being trapped in or clinging to a narrative they did not produce and which has never served them.

We have seen the results of men living in a world that is devoid of any honoring of men's roles or even of men's being. How can men cope in this sort of world? How can therapists or anyone else facilitate a man moving from this restrictive, prison-like consciousness into a more truly masculine path that embraces his well-being, self-interest and happiness?

That is what An Ear for Men is about. Not just a place for men to tell their stories, but to author and own them with support and encouragement from other men.

Shaming as the narrative of hate

As most of us are all well aware, by now, feminism is based on the The Patriarchy myth… the belief that The Patriarchy has conspired in the oppression of women for the millennia of human civilisation. Thanks to recent developments over the past few years, however, it has been increasingly coming to light that The Patriarchy narrative is a solipsistic rationalization at best, an unfalsifiable theory that is without foundation. We now know that feminism is, through and through, a scam. How have feminists gotten away with this?

Projection explains much of it, it would seem. We see others as we see ourselves, with the narrative, "this is what I would be thinking if I was behaving the same way, or saying the same thing." Thus, feminists have been projecting their selfish motivations without realizing it, with the subconscious narrative "everyone else is a selfish scumbag because I know that I am." And everyone else has been projecting their own working assumption, also without realizing it, "let's hear them out… surely this is how I would be reacting if I was denied my basic rights." Or to put a different spin on it, "nobody can be that stupid." One party underestimates their opposition, the other overestimates. There is as much ignorance as there is scam in this collective cultural hallucination. We have now come to realize that our working assumption has been inconsistent with the feminist view of the world.

But this still doesn't explain how feminism, as preposterous a phenomenon as it is, with its foundations in ignorance, has become so successful in the course of half a century. The answer is that the projection of collective ignorance requires an attitude to motivate it. This is the attitude of hate and its strategy, informed as it is by the female perspective, is shaming. The more that their jig is shown up for what it is, the more that they dig their boots in, the more that they hate being shown up, and the louder that they shame. Shaming is the strategy you have when you don't have a strategy. Shaming does not appeal to reason, logic or evidence. It is, at its foundations, a form of bullying.

Projection

It is now becoming increasingly understood that feminism is, at its very foundations, misandric. The feminist myth of patriarchal oppression makes assumptions that are ignorant of the truths of human nature, such women's hypergamy, or the role of primary nurturers in establishing the cultural foundations in young minds. Ignorance is not necessarily, in and of itself, always hateful… for example if it is open to being corrected. But stubborn ignorance, the type that entrenches itself in opposition to being corrected, will be resonant with hateful motivations. When feminists assert the myth of patriarchal oppression, they are making assumptions that are inherently hostile to men.

But, as we introduced above, projection relates more specifically to the inner narrative that one is conducting. When feminists shout "sexist pig!" and "misogynist!" they are not expressing any kind of truth about the male condition. They are instead projecting their own sexism and hatred of men. They are seeing men as sexist and hateful because they are sexist and hateful.

When feminists see sexism in hiring practices, they are projecting the inner narrative that is speaking to them… "this patriarchy is doing exactly what I would do if I had the same decisions available to me." And lo and behold, this is exactly what feminists do, in the favouritism of women, in affirmative action, to make up for "all those millennia of oppression." The truth of the matter behind effective hiring decisions, however, is very different… it relates to efficiency and merit and responsibilities to profitability. Any business that does not make choices based on merit and efficiency deserves to fail. For feminists, however, their personal projection is their solipsistic reality.

Whenever feminists shout "misogyny!" they are projecting their hostility to men… that is, they are projecting their misandry. How could it be anything else? This must surely be the stuff of satire. Those in whom the hate burns most toxic are calling hate on half of humanity as it has existed for millennia. They are not seeing men as men are. They are seeing men as feminists are. The irony is lost them. Their only recourse is the shaming narrative.

Shaming is energy-intensive. It requires a lot of shouting. From the wage-gap myth to the rape culture fiction, shaming requires denial and refusal to address the most basic facts, such as the mathematics of simple averages.

But women hate women, don't they?

The idea that women should be friends with women just because they are women is typical of emotionally stunted toddlers that still think in terms of blue-for-boys and pink-for-girls. Take Jessica Valenti (2014), who famously tweeted "I trust women." We assume that she means she trusts women unconditionally. There is established theory, in relational aggression, that describes how dishonesty and betrayal are integral to women's modus operandi. Valenti trusts the gender in which trust is most often betrayed! Go figure. But it all makes sense when we interpret her "I trust women" as just more of the shaming narrative that implies "but I don't trust men." In other words, Valenti's "I trust women" is a lie… this is a necessary assumption that we should make, because nobody, even someone with a Master's in Women's and Gender Studies, can be that stupid. Ms Valenti can take solace in the fact that, when we are calling her a liar, we are crediting her with more intelligence than she credits herself.

While we are on the topic of relational aggression – you know, lying, gossip, deception, social exclusion… and shaming. Feminist writer Phyllis Chesler (2009) does an admirable job of documenting how women oppress women, how women keep women down. Though, predictably, as a feminist, she knows the cause and who is really pulling the strings. It is, of course, she assures us, The Patriarchy. It would seem that feminists with sons are sometimes open to editing their narrative to let some semblance of truth shine into the dankest, darkest corners – even as they persist with their "because Patriarchy"

When are the more intelligent feminists going to come to their senses? It seems that we wait in vain… for any among them who might be reading this, here's a tip… we already have "equality" (for want of a better word), we always have. Women have never been denied workplace opportunities by The Patriarchy because women have been raising their sons to compete for them. Got it? The Matriarchy is The Patriarchy. The cultural system does its thing with men and women just as the brain does its thing with neurons and glia, or just as any ecosystem does its thing with all the critters that constitute it. Remove one component and the system becomes unstable. But I digress.

Feminists with sons notwithstanding, all other feminists are so fixated on their toxic obsession with the patriarchy myth, that they wilfully turn a blind eye to the ways in which women keep women down. They fundamentally fail to understand the psychology of women (and men), they are constantly projecting their ignorance of female (and male) nature. And the shaming narrative is all that they can rely on to express their hate.

Bringing rape to the people

But as if all this is not enough, even more remarkable, in their obsession with their hateful agenda, is that feminists hurt women. In their agenda to make the rape experience accessible to the narratives of ordinary women, feminists must necessarily trivialize rape.

Is rape to be regarded as something serious and traumatic, a life-altering event, or is it to be regarded as something trivial, something accessible to every woman to justify her entitlements, something on a par with headaches and tummy rumbles? If the former, then the FBI (2009) estimates that 89,000 women reported being raped in America in 2008, which translates to 29 women for every 100,000 people, or, of the order of about 1 in 1500 women. It is not realistic to expose one in five women to this kind of rape, given the risk of real injury. But if women want the latter, say, a kind of Rape Lite, then the one-in-five women that will be raped during their lifetimes is clearly not enough, because most every woman occasionally encounters rapey looks while on public transport, or walking in the street. Heck, a woman is likely to be offended by something rapey every time she leaves her front door. And studies by academics have shown that even headaches and tummy rumbles, as forms of PTSD, can ultimately be attributed to some hidden memory of rape that can only be brought to light under Recovered Memory Therapy (RMT).

Thanks to feminism, the cry of "RAPE!" is now a fashion statement. Along with designer purses, Michael Kors boots, Emma Sulkowicz mattresses and Gucci handbags, a lady's membership to the "I've-been-raped-too" club provides the ideal fashion accessory. In this new Cool, she can strut her stuff with confidence and a radiant smile. Thanks to feminism, rape is no longer a terrible, humiliating experience requiring treatment for PTSD. In this new era of rape, you can one day make a false accusation of rape without bearing any risk of recourse, and on another you're doing a porn video. The cry of "RAPE!" frees women up to explore their sexuality, to lie about rape, to liberate their inner whore, and, ultimately, to shame The Patriarchy.

It is the shaming of The Patriarchy that is the intent in Pooja Relan's (2015) video clip, when she tries to convince everyone that "My Family Raped Me" – even when it is her mother that is calling someone else's daughter a slut.

In their eagerness to shame The Patriarchy, rape no longer means what it used to mean. These days, it just means being pissed at something. And on that strict interpretation, it should mean that men can also claim membership to the "I've been raped too" club… anyone should, theoretically, now be able to claim rape by the bus driver when they miss the bus, or by the store attendant when they've been overcharged at the grocery store.

But for men claiming rape, there's a catch… the cultural assumption that women don't rape. Women can perpetrate precisely the same misdeed, but when they do it, it is never rape. The whole point of this "rape culture" shaming narrative is ultimately to be able to target men for abuse, because it relies on the assumption that only men rape and therefore, any misdeed perpetrated by a man against a woman is rape.

Shaming opportunities everywhere

Feminists and their social justice warriors are never interested in justice, fairness, or, as they call it, "equality" for all. Far from it. They are only interested in "equality" for themselves… this is the sort of "equality" that only ever invites one side to the debate. Not unlike George Orwell's "some animals are more equal than others." It is the sort of "equality" that seeks out shaming advantages at every opportunity.

If feminists truly cared about justice, fairness and "equality," they would care about those who are most innocent and vulnerable. They would care about the abuse of children and that it is women who are their primary abusers. They would care that mothers abusing children are Stage 1 of the domestic violence life-cycle. But from feminists, we never hear about the abuse of children by women… this would be inconvenient to their agenda and their shaming narrative.

Feminism represents something unparalleled in the history of humanity. They even hate their own children, dosing their boys up with Ritalin to fix their boyish behaviour, or biasing the education system against boys to make up for all those millennia of patriarchal oppression, while turning a blind eye to the collateral damage that befalls their girls, in the pursuit of their rabid agenda. By contrast, even the Nazis and Stalinists at least loved their children. Feminism relies on "the enemy" to do its dirty-work. Men of all stripes, from feminist men to traditional White Knights of The Patriarchal Order, are essential to mobilizing the feminist agenda. Imagine the Nazis relying on the Jews to do their dirty-work. Feminism's hateful shaming narrative is integral to mobilizing this absurdity.

The gay rights that feminists often claim to fight for presents something of a quandary for them, given that gay men are… men. This inconvenience is one that is difficult for them to dispense with. As Dean Esmay (2015) documents, with screenshot references, feminists often lump gay men in together with The Patriarchy, regarding them with the same disdain:

● There were the Redstockings of the 1960s, along with all kinds of prominent feminists in the late 60s and early 70s, whose gay-bashing rhetoric flowed from their basic premise of man-hating;
● Contemporary feminist Cathy Brennan tweets that “Gay men are men. They rape women just like straight men”;
● In his 1976 talk, John Lauritsen observes that there was a widespread pattern of vilification of gay men and gay organisations by feminists.

The hypocrisy of their history of shaming gays and yet claiming to fight for gay rights is just how feminists do business… the irony is lost on them.

The agenda of feminists is so hateful that they would shame even the likes of Isaac Newton and George Washington, Jesus Christ and Gautama Buddha if they could get away with it… I stand corrected… sometimes they do. For example, in her 1986 book “The Science Question in Feminism,” Sandra Harding referred to Newton’s Principia Mathematica as a “rape manual.”

Feminists are not interested in the rights of others. Feminism is just a behemoth of a shaming machine, and that’s all it is. Even when they are doing “good” (e.g., facilities for the disabled), theirs is simply a masquerade to shame The Patriarchy. They don’t care… any more than they care about the real victims of real-rape. Feminists are interested only in shaming opportunities.

Conclusion

Shaming is the strategy you have when you don’t have a strategy, and fundamental to its effectiveness is hate. If you you’re not too sure what to make of a feminist’s initiative, ask yourself if there is a shaming opportunity in it, a way of saying “look at how good I am, and how wicked you must be.” This is manipulation and relational aggression at work. Shaming by feminists is pure projection. It makes sense. After all, feminism is a hate movement.

Author Jenny Trout and the feminist censorship brigade

June 30, 2015 | by Kevin Weinberg | Link | Original Link

As social media continues to play an increasingly more prevalent force in determining societal trends, so too does it also serve as an ever-sharpening weapon in the battle for free speech.

A few months ago, Jenny Trout, a USA-Today bestselling author and feminist activist, initiated a campaign to have a book removed from sale after finding its contents offensive. The book, a fictionalized retelling of the real-life romance between Thomas Jefferson and his slave, Sally Hemings, found itself at the center of a heated controversy regarding the nature of consent.

After stumbling across the book, Jenny created a blog post requesting that her fans do not buy, read, or search for the book, but that if they must read it, they should pirate it. Additionally, she asked her fans to call e-book retailers and report the book for "rape," although the book itself does not actually contain any rape, sex, or BDSM of any kind.

According to her blog post, entitled: "Don't Do This Ever: "WHAT THE FUCKING FUCKITY FUCK FUCK FUCK?!" Miss Trout determined that, because Sally was a slave and Thomas was her master in real life, she reasoned that any romance between the two characters, fictional or otherwise, must naturally constitute rape regardless of how they are portrayed in the story. Miss Trout also claims that due to the historical fact that Sally was also a child at the time she ended up with Thomas Jefferson—regardless of her age in the fictional story—then that must mean it's not only a book of rape, but child rape, as well—and racist. Essentially, racist child rape.

After establishing for her readers why she feels that the book is a rape fiction (though the book has neither rape nor sex), Jenny provides her fans with a list of telephone numbers to various ebook distributors including Amazon and Barnes & Noble, and she asks that they call these retailers and ask them to pull the book from sale.

Amazingly, her tactics worked. Within days, the book was removed most major e-book venders.

> "I contacted amazon about this, and a lovely and very helpful consultant named Dayana promised me she would do everything she can to ensure that it is removed," remarks commenter Amber.
> "Update us if you do find it on Smashwords. I have a friend who works there, and I can talk to them about it," remarks feminist author Amy Leigh Strickland."

Alternatively, Jenny suggested that if for any reason her fans wanted to read the book, that rather than pay the author for her work, it would be a better idea to pirate it so that the author is not given royalty money for the sale of her book. The following is a direct quote (the capital letters as well as use of bold font were part of the original post)

> "PLEASE, PLEASE, I URGE YOU NOT TO BUY THIS BOOK. NOT TO SEE "HOW BAD" IT IS. IT IS BAD ENOUGH WITHOUT KNOWING THE CONTENT. ITS EXISTENCE IS BAD. IF YOU ABSOLUTELY MUST READ IT, AND I DON'T KNOW WHY YOU WOULD WANT TO, FIND A PIRATED COPY OR LEARN TO LIVE WITH DISAPPOINTMENT."

If all these seem like extreme measures, then complicating matters is the fact that Jenny Trout, by her own admission, did not read the book. When asking her for comment on Twitter, she informed me that she does not "want" to read the book, either.

When considering her status as a best-selling author, Jenny Trout's actions call into question the matter of ethics. Is it an abuse of power for a best-selling author to use her fan base for the purpose of sabotaging another author's career? Especially one who was inexperienced and had very few fans?

In what was perhaps the most shocking twist to the story, it was later discovered that the author Jenny Trout was brutally attacking was actually a black woman. This created some confusion, because Jenny claims her actions were designed to help "women of color" in the field of writing, although the only known result of her actions was to remove one from it.

While all this was happening, I tried to reach out to Jenny to defend this author and her work even though I personally did not even like the book in question. I was merely concerned about freedom of speech and censorship. I told Jenny that she shouldn't do this. That this is hideous behavior. Her response? She took a picture for me. I feel it is fair to suggest that her response was very "feminist" in nature.

[image]

Since this incident, I have been branded a rapist, a rape apologist, a racist, a misogynist, and I have had my own books attacked by feminists who support her and her cause.

[image]

Recently, several of Miss Trout's fans have even gone to my author page on Amazon to call me a rapist, warning potential customers not to purchase any of my novels because I am a "Rape Supporter."

What do you think? Do authors have a right to create stories even if someone else finds them offensive? Or should the things we are permitted to read, think, feel, say, do, and want require a feminist permission slip? Feel free to comment and let me know your thoughts on the matter.

Future trends in eyewear technology

June 30, 2015 | by David Frankk | Link | Original Link

Wearable technology has been around for a few years but not all of us have gotten a firsthand experience with it yet. The next few years might be a lot different. Wearable technology is one of the hottest technologies to hit Silicon Valley in the last few years. According to Forbes, 71% of 16-24 year olds want wearable technology. Keeping in mind this growing market, the future will probably see prescription glasses being replaced with SmartGlass technology.

Though wearable technology has been around for some time, the groundbreaking event was the launch of Google Glass in 2013. Given only to selected individuals initially, Glass was and continues to be a fair reflection of what the future of Eyewear technology looks like. Since the launch of Google Glass, most of the tech giants have noticed the buzz around these fashionable products which led them to make their versions of eyewear. Some of these include Sony's SmartEyeGlass, Apple iGlass and Microsoft HoloLens. In 2014, 1 million smart glass units were sold in the U.S. – and that figure is expected to grow to 100 million units in a matter of a few years. This gives a huge opportunity for lens manufacturers to innovate with the changing times.

A substantial subset of wearable technology is Eyewear, which uses SmartGlass and can be worn just like prescription glasses. Eyeglass World, a leading retailer of affordable prescription eyewear, is the first national chain to launch a retail collection of prescription lenses for smart glass technologies in the U.S. It becomes the first brick-and-mortar retailer in the world to offer Recon Jet, Vuzix M100 and Epson Moverio hardware all under one roof, along with the availability of prescription lenses. The company has partnered with Rochester Optical to provide smart glass solutions using Smart GOLD lenses, to cater to the unique visual demands of smart glasses. "Through the Epson Moverio glasses and the augmented reality these apps provide, there are incredible benefits that can be gained by viewing and interacting with digital content that's intertwined into our everyday environment," said Eric Mizufuka, product manager at Epson America.

I got a chance to have an FAQ with Bruce Steffey, President and COO of National Vision, Inc. nearing the launch date. Following are some of the questions with their answers.

- What is unique about the offering Eyeglass World is bringing to market?
  We're the first retail chain to offer customized, prescription lenses for smart glass devices – an important step in overcoming an existing hurdle and sustaining growth in the smart glasses wearables category.

- What does this launch mean for the future of Eyeglass World stores across the country?
  All of our San Diego stores will open with this offering, and we plan to open eight or more stores in the market. In addition, we plan to rollout prescription lenses for Smart Glasses to all of our brands in the near future.

- What does the store experience look like for a customer?
  In these new Eyeglass World stores, we have a specialized, dedicated display area distinctly separate from the normal eyeglass selling floor. This dedicated area has the latest tablet technology with interactive content for customers to better understand the functionality and visual requirements of each device. Customers can try on each device, which is already fully enabled with content and apps.

- Why is prescription lens design important for smart glass users?
  Smart glass functionality – specifically devices that use a Heads Up Display (Google Glass, Vuzix M100) – created a new set of challenges for the optics industry. Without the appropriate corrective lenses, specifically designed to account for different focal points of certain devices, users cannot fully experience the benefits of their smart glass device. The greater visual clarity delivered by prescription smart glass lenses may help minimize eye strain and eye fatigue commonly associated with early smart glass adopters.

Paul Travers, founder, president and CEO of Vuzix, said, “We’re extremely excited about the launch of wearable smart glasses and prescription lenses in Eyeglass World. For Vuzix, having wider access to these products will be transformative in the workplace, leading to greater productivity and increased job satisfaction.”

Princess Rap Battles: when Princesses collide (videos)

June 30, 2015 | by AVfM Video Source | Link | Original Link

The Princess narrative virtually all Western women grow up with has left a legacy of destruction, not owing to the narrative per se, but rather to laws and institutions that allow these fantasies to become unchecked reality. The Prince is there to offer up cash and luxuries, and Princess gets what Princess wants. It’s not often the Princess narrative is light-hearted, but we have found the rare exception. Watch some classic Princesses take each other on, calling out the hypocrisy, inconsistency and sheer destructiveness of what it means to be a Princess.

Cheerios: only girls are exposed to unhealthy messages about their bodies (ad)

In a no doubt well-intentioned attempt to draw attention to the degree of harmful messages young people are exposed to about diet, health, standards of attractiveness and unrealistic expectations, Cheerios has created an ad that features only young girls. Young boys, who are flooded with images of men with perfect abs and, hairless torsos and rippling biceps are apparently either unaffected by these messages, or not considered an important target demographic for General Mills.

One word: Feminism (video)

June 30, 2015 | by AVfM Video Source | Link | Original Link

Degrading to men. Degrading to women. Abusive. Damaging. Obnoxious. Female privilege. Lies. Hate. False Statistics. Double standards. Belittling. Cowardly. Narcissistic. Wickedly dishonest. Malleable. Childish. Insatiable. Pathetic. Degrading. Injustice. Fear. Violence. Intimidation. Terrorism. Fraud. Self-victimization. Misinformation. Fear. Hypocrisy. Toxic. Mediocrity. Preposterous. Wrong. Abuse.

This is what feminism actually looks like to everyday people of all races, creeds, colors, and orientation around the world.

The EPA’s growing battle with the corn and ethanol industry

July 1, 2015 | by Thomas Richard | Link | Original Link

There’s a war brewing in the Corn Belt between two unlikely entities: the EPA and the agriculture industry. On one side of the equation, as the Associated Press (AP) reported June 25, is the Environmental Protection Agency, which is proposing that the amount of renewable fuels produced be reduced, and on the other side is big corn, which relies on ethanol sales to sustain its growth. Ethanol, which comes primarily from distilled corn, is mixed into gasoline and makes up 10 percent of each gallon of gasoline, and up to 15 percent in 16 states (as of 2014).

The problem is that supply can’t keep up with demand, and environmentalists, who once championed adding ethanol to your gas tank, are crying foul when they realized the damage the ethanol industry was doing to the environment. All this stems from an announcement last month when the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) said that roughly 4 billion gallons of renewable fuels won’t be used this year, and almost 5 billion gallons won’t be used next year, contrary to what was stipulated by Congress in 2007. Now the EPA is holding hearings before any final determinations are made in November, and everyone has a stalk in this field of green schemes.

According to the director of the EPA’s office of transportation and air quality Chris Gundler, “250 people have signed up to testify at the Jack Reardon Center.” Because so many people want to speak about the EPA’s proposed regulations, they’ve had to set up a second panel to hear from two different groups. These two meetings are the only ones planned by the EPA before it announces its decision. Grundler notes that unless the requirements are reduced, “there’s no way the standards can be met in the next few years. There would be widespread noncompliance, and the EPA is not in the habit of putting out standards we don’t think are achievable.”

The whole point of the 2007 renewable fuels law, signed into law under President Bush, was to lessen our dependence on foreign oil, reduce pollution, and “bolster the rural economy by requiring a steady increase in the overall amount of renewable fuels such as ethanol blended into gasoline over time.” With the explosion in fracking over the last five years, domestic oil production has risen so high that the U.S. is hardly dependent on any foreign oil.

And then two things happened on the way to the cornfield: large swaths of land from the Conservation Reserve Program were turned into massive seasonal cornfields, once a primary source of CO2-absorbing plants and woodland. It also diverted much-needed corn for food into corn ethanol, which caused “a sharp increase in food costs worldwide.” Growing corn and making ethanol also requires large amounts of water. For every gallon of ethanol made, nearly three gallons of water are needed.

Couple all this with the lack of infrastructure to grow enough corn and the agriculture industry unable to “produce enough non-ethanol fuels to meet the requirements,” and demand starts outpacing supply. “Granted, we are not growing them as fast or as large as Congress anticipated, but they are still growing, just at a different pace than what was expected in 2007,” Grundler told the AP.

The war between the agriculture industry and the EPA has gotten so bitter that Grundler was accused of “being in bed with the oil industry.” The president of the American Fuel and Petrochemical Manufacturers, Chet Thompson, agrees, telling the AP that it was laughable to think the EPA was on the oil industry’s side. “The EPA is doing what it is doing because it’s undeniable there’s a lack of demand and infrastructure out there to meet the statutory requirement,” Thompson said.

There will also be a rally of Renewable Fuel Standards (RFS) opponents, where two governors from each party are expected to speak: Iowa Gov. Terry Branstad (R) and Missouri Gov. Jay Nixon (D). Organizers of the rally will also be busing people in from outside the state, with members of the National Corn Growers Association (NCGA) coming in from Nebraska, Iowa, Illinois and Missouri. According to Chip Bowling, NCGA president, the EPA’s proposal will “hurt the ethanol industry” by “removing incentives to build up the infrastructure to handle higher volumes.”

Bowling believes his industry’s growth, and its ancillary sectors, will be negatively impacted if “retailers and oil companies aren’t required to increase the use of renewable fuels in their gasoline,” he said. “We’re the little guy going against the big guy. Anytime we’re displacing 10 percent of their production, they don’t like it.”

Aside from the massive deforestation that happened in the Amazon (mainly Brazil) and the U.S. to make room for cornfields, ethanol is also hydrophilic. This means that ethanol can readily absorb moisture out of the atmosphere (condensation) leading to lots of auto problems. Newer cars that are equipped to handle the increased ethanol can help to reduce levels of carbon monoxide, hydrocarbons, and benzene, though that is still in dispute with today’s technology. Older cars, however, can develop engine corrosion, and degradation of “plastic, rubber, or even metal in your fuel system,” all from that little bit of extra moisture pulled into your gas.

According to Popular Mechanics, any vehicles (or motorcycles) that have modern fuel injection systems (since the 1980s) simply don’t need the ethanol. So why is ethanol still being mandated? “President Bush made a decision to offset some of our dependence on foreign oil with domestically produced alcohol, and the Corn Belt senators agreed.” Indeed, according to the Renewable Fuels Association, in 2014 the United States produced 58% of the world’s ethanol fuel, and the gross value of the ethanol industry’s output was $32,000,000,000. It also exported over 800 million gallons of ethanol in 2014, with 43 percent being exported to Canada.

Now that we have plentiful supplies of domestic oil, closed-loop fuel injection systems, and truly modern automotive systems, it seems like now would be the right time to let the marketplace decide whether you should have grain alcohol in your gas, and finally drive the politicians out of the auto industry.

AVfM Classics: DARVO: Deny, Attack, and Reverse Victim and Offender

Have you ever marveled at how your abusive wife, girlfriend or ex is able to do and say the most hurtful, underhanded and contemptible things and then portray herself as the innocent victim? Have you ever wondered how she is able to convincingly accuse others, usually her victims, of the abusive behaviors and attitudes of which she is actually guilty? Wonder no more, the answer may be DARVO.

Dr Jennifer J. Freyd, PhD of the University of Oregon identified DARVO in the 1990s at the tail end of the repressed sexual abuse memories hysteria. In spite of its dubious origins, DARVO is a helpful concept with broader applications than Dr Freyd seems to have originally intended. Freyd writes about DARVO in conjunction with her work on betrayal trauma, which I discuss on the original Shrink4Men blog. According to Dr Freyd's webpage:

> "DARVO refers to a reaction that perpetrators of wrong doing, particularly sexual offenders, may display in response to being held accountable for their behavior. The perpetrator or offender may Deny the behavior, Attack the individual doing the confronting, and Reverse the roles of Victim and Offender such that the perpetrator assumes the victim role and turns the true victim into an alleged offender. This occurs, for instance, when an actually guilty perpetrator assumes the role of "falsely accused" and attacks the accuser's credibility or even blames the accuser of being the perpetrator of a false accusation."

DARVO seems to be a combination of projection, denial, lying, blame shifting and gaslighting. Dr Freyd notes that other observers have identified the same phenomena using different terms. My male clients experience this behavior when they try to hold the abusive women in their lives accountable. It also seems to be common behavior in most predators, bullies, high-conflict individuals and/or abusive personality-disordered individuals. DARVO especially seems to occur in high-conflict divorce and/or custody cases.

Of course, not everyone who denies wrong doing is engaging in DARVO. Many partners and exes of abusive women are accused of things they didn't do or of things that never happened. Naturally, when this happens, you deny the accusation and perhaps feel a little (or a lot) bewildered. How do you know if an individual's denial is the truth or an instance of DARVO? Freyd (1997, pp. 23-24) proposes:

> "It is important to distinguish types of denial, for an innocent person will probably deny a false accusation. Thus denial is not evidence of guilt. However, I propose that a certain kind of indignant self-righteousness, and overly stated denial, may in fact relate to guilt.

> I hypothesize that if an accusation is true, and the accused person is abusive, the denial is more indignant, self-righteous and manipulative, as compared with denial in other cases. Similarly, I have observed that actual abusers threaten, bully and make a nightmare for anyone who holds them accountable or asks them to change their abusive behavior. This attack, intended to chill and terrify, typically includes threats of lawsuits, overt and covert attacks, on the whistle-blower's credibility and so on.
> The attack will often take the form of focusing on ridiculing the person who attempts to hold the offender accountable. The attack will also likely focus on ad hominem instead of intellectual/evidential issues. Finally, I propose that the offender rapidly creates the impression that the abuser is the wronged one, while the victim or concerned observer is the offender. Figure and ground are completely reversed. The more the offender is held accountable, the more wronged the offender claims to be."

This is similar to how William Eddy, LCSW, Esq describes the persuasive blaming tactics of high-conflict individuals."Persuasive Blamers persuade others that their internal problems are external, caused by something else or someone else. Once others are persuaded to get the problem backward, the dispute escalates into a long-term, high-conflict situation. One that few people other than persuasive blamers can tolerate" (Eddy, 2006, p. 29). Getting the problem backward is precisely what happens when DARVO occurs. Figure and ground are completely reversed.

"It's only the Persuasive Blamers of Cluster B who keep high-conflict disputes going. They are persuasive, and to keep the focus off their own behavior (the major source of the problem), they get others to join in the blaming" (Eddy, 2006, p. 30). This is why many Narcissists, Borderlines, Histrionics and Antisocials effectively employ smear campaign and mobbing tactics when they target someone—be it a spouse, attorney, court evaluator or therapist. By blaming others for everything that's wrong in their lives they keep the focus off the real problem; themselves. This seems to be the exact denial-attack-reverse victim and offender behavior Freyd describes.

Freyd (1997, pp. 23-24) states:

> "The offender is on the offense and the person attempting to hold the offender accountable is on the defense. 'Deny, Attack and Reverse Victim and Offender' work best together. How can someone be on the attack so viciously and be in the victim role? Future research may investigate the hypothesis that the offender rapidly goes back and forth between attack and reverse victim and offender."

This behavior is crazy-making if you are the target of it. You know you're being attacked while your partner/ex plays the victim role for all she's worth, insisting on her distorted version of un-reality. Worse yet, many people believe her; their reasoning being, "She's so upset it must be true." Even some of my male clients who know their wives'accusations and lies aren't true, sometimes doubt themselves and what they know to be reality. I believe that many women and men who engage in DARVO come to believe their own lies after they repeat them enough times. I call it the "O.J. Simpson Effect."

Abusers typically employ different types of denial. Perhaps you're familiar with some of the following ones:

- Outright denial or gaslighting. "That never happened."
- Minimization. "It wasn't that bad."
- Amnesia. "I don't remember doing that."
- Redefinition. "I have a bad temper, so you shouldn't upset me."
- Projection. "You're abusive and controlling. You hurt me."
- Conversion. "I did wrong, but I'm a changed person and won't do it again."

Freyd (1997, pp. 23-24) concludes:

"The offender takes advantage of the confusion we have in our culture over the relationship between public provability and reality (and a legal system that has a certain history in this regard) in redefining reality. Future research may test the hypothesis that the offender may well come to believe in [her] innocence via this logic: if no one can be sure [she] is guilty then logically [she] is not guilty no matter what really occurred. The reality is thus defined by public proof, not by personal lived experience."

It may be difficult to sort out who is telling the truth in these cases. However, I've found that high-conflict individuals who engage in this behavior often can't substantiate their claims or, if they just make up more lies to try to substantiate their claims, they're inconsistent over time, so pay close attention and document their lies. This may help you hang her with a rope of her own making, if and when you need to prove your version of events as opposed to her ever evolving versions of the truth.

If she is threatening to call the police and make false allegations against you and/or you're considering divorce, it's extremely important that you document the abuse you're experiencing in a journal, a digital recorder or some other medium. Abusive, persuasive blamers rely on the force of their emotions to sell their lies, half-truths and distortions. Since most people are suckers for drama, especially in the form of a tearful, self-righteous woman, you'll need proof if you want to be believed. Think of it as making yourself DARVO-proof.

How men show love: George Thorogood and Bo Diddley

July 1, 2015 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

Men love music, both listening to it and creating it, just like women–and I would hazard a "sexist" guess that in general men are more obsessive about creating music than women are, although there are any number of fantastic female musicians out there. And frankly, as an MRA, I'm sick of being stereotyped as a stick figure man with his "raging misogyny" and bitterness and whatnot, so I freely talk about other interests, in my case things like music and video games and comics, Ty Henry is into things like sports, and so on. We're three dimensional human beings who show it to the world–and that is one of many things that those who hate us do not want us to do.

As it happens my tastes are eclectic but run very heavily to classical blues from the early 20th Century in the Mississippi Delta all the way to the blues-rock artists who emerged in the United States and the UK in the 1960s and 1970s. Yes it's old stuff, but so what? I was in diapers or not born when most of it was made, but I love it, and I love exploring the history of it all, as do many of the greatest musicians. I laugh at people who call Motown "roots music." Don't get me wrong, I fucking love Motown, I'm just saying, many of my favorite artists were dead before Berry Gordy graduated from school.

Take for example the great Bo Diddley. I recently found this wonderful video from 1965, which was (A) nade a year before I was born, (B) totally in black and white, and (C) absofuckinglutely awesome from start to end.

There's a number of historical things to note with sarcasm and/or sorrow here; things that help illustrate how absolutely poisonous "Social Justice" bigotry and toxic Feminism are. For example:

This video is 50 years old. Voting rights are still under dispute and under court contention in the United States. And while this was just a smidge after the Civil Rights Act of 1964, that Act took a while to get through the courts and if I'm not mistaken that may be a racially segregated audience. If not, then it seems to have segregated itself out of habit, but who cared? This is actually something of an amazing moment, black performers playing for an all-white audience, with the white girls and black girls screaming their heads off just as if Didley were the Beatles.

People think girls invented that shit for the Beatles? Ha. Here's one of the greatest Blues recordings ever made, by another man, the legendary BB King, and listen to those girls scream:

By the way tune in especially to about the 2:22 mark to hear one of the most delicious moments ever set to live recording. Must be some wicked Patriarchy making them girls act like that huh?

The jokes just write themselves, don't they? Think B.B. King dated a Cluster B girl a time or two? I have a feeling.

Did B.B. King need to get over his “toxic masculinity” so he would learn to express his emotions better? Yeah, fuck you.

Anyway, back to B.B. King’s contemporary, Bo Diddley. When I posted the delicious Bo Diddley video from 1965 above, I tweeted several bits of snark about it to #SpankAFeminist. I also noted the irony of how Bo Diddley was “obviously” oppressing all the woman in that video, especially the black one that he was obviously not letting play a guitar or anything, like an intersectional patriarchal bastard. Was it the white women or the black women he was most oppressing there? I still can’t decide.

Also by the way I’ve seen extensive interviews with multiple backup singers from this era, male and female. To a woman, and to a man, they all said they mostly preferred to be the backup rather than the lead, they didn’t like the star pressure and they just wanted to make music. Thanks for shaming them, feminists.

Anyway, in the middle of a righteous snark-fest, I got a response from someone I don’t really know saying, “How in the hell did I go 30 years without hearing this man play?!”

My heart warmed immediately. He felt safe saying “this man” rather than “this person.” And it gave me an opportunity to share more, and I noted that this man probably owes half his career to Bo Diddley, the guy who did the song you hear in 500 commercials, TV shows, and movies a year:

The response came wondering why George Thorogood didn’t owe Diddley royalties? A smart question. You almost cannot listen to that “Bad to the Bone” song without hearing Bo Diddley. My first response was to note that if he owed Diddley half his career, he owed the other half to this guy, who died when Thorogood was in High School in 1963:

Say what you will about Thorogood’s whisky, beer, and corn nuts sensibility. It’s amazing how he synthesized a sound of its own that is instantly recognizable as primarily a synthesis of these two fairly different men, isn’t it?

Now to that question of royalties: That assumption–rendered completely innocently in that individual’s case I am sure–seems like a bit of Social Justice poison that’s seeped into the culture. Yes, of course, some blues musicians got “ripped off” back in the 1970s but that’s a more tangled story than people assume, and actually most of the young blues-oriented rockers from the ’60s and ’70s openly idolized these old masters.

You know, when Bo Diddley was a kid, he generally wasn’t allowed to play for white people. Although if he was lucky they might, as they did other great blues artists of his generation, rub his hair, give him a penny, and affectionately ask him to play some nigger music for them, and he would likely oblige because he needed the money. By the time that video in 1965 was shot, he was actually at the pinnacle of his career, and it began to wane from there.

By 1985, 20 years later, as he was getting old and everyone had forgotten him. But this happened:

Note the moment at about 1:20 when the shy aging man comes out. The whole time as he walks, looking everywhere but at the audience or the other musicians. Manfully (yeah I said it) showing nothing. Finally, at 1:55 turning to look upon a sea of faces of every color, 100,000 in person and upwards of a billion worldwide in a live broadcast. His whole life, never so many cheering fans. An inconceivable, impossible moment, and indescribably beautiful if only you just watch him. And then he plays.

Three and a half minutes in, Bo Diddley even raps. In 1985. No one did that for mainstream audiences back then, and certainly not in an R&B audience. Not in 1985. But there's Bo doing it.

There is only one sane response to all that on your part, and it involves wiping away tears.

Oh and of course Thorogood paid those royalties, and Bo's name was right there on the record.

The hateful feminist narrative about history and the Social Justice poison never are laid so bare as when you contemplate this:

They tell us not to openly express our emotions because of our "toxic masculinity." No.

No.

There is no higher way for a man to show his love for another man than by trying to emulate him–and by letting others know that that man is his hero. Say what you will about George Thorogood, that is a truly brilliant moment, and it is a special moment between men that, much of the time, only men can understand instinctively.

And fuck you if you think there's something "sexist" about that observation. "Intersectional" feminist cultists: you poison everything.

The campus rape war is over, and the boys have lost because they never bothered to fight back

July 2, 2015 | by Pierce Harlan | Link | Original Link

Despite all the support from nationally renowned legal scholars, despite an incredible backlash last year, the sexual grievance machine is in high gear, running roughshod over the rights of our sons. There's no slowing it, despite the efforts of so many. I asked myself how this can be, and my conclusion is going to anger some people.

The war on campus rape may be the first witch-hunt in history where the members of the group under attack don't care that they are in the cross-hairs of a lunatic fringe. Since they won't fight back, it's hopeless to think the tide can be rolled back without them.

The sexual grievance lobby has done everything it can think of to assure that a woman's cry of rape is tantamount to a finding of guilt, the evidence be damned, yet the boys at risk of being wrongly accused sit meekly on the sidelines–too ashamed, too emasculated even to protest, much less mount a vibrant defense. In fact, many of them march in lockstep with their moral superiors–the campus rape crusaders (you know, kids and peer pressure and all)–who insist that ours is a "rape culture," that campus rape isn't just a "thing" but an epidemic, that "the rates of false accusation pale — indeed, pale to the point of transparency!," and that masculinity itself needs to be reprogrammed.

The boys act like deer caught in the headlights as United States senators, the mainstream news media, and "experts" purporting to research the prevalence of rape treat every accusation of rape as a fact without bothering to consider the other side of the story, much less subject it to scrutiny or test it against competing claims of innocence. (Can you say "Jackie"? How about "Emma Sulkowicz"?) And when someone dares to air the "he" side of a "he said-she said" rape claim, the sexual grievance lobby has a conniption. Yet college boys don't say a word about it. When Prof. KC Johnson went to Ohio University to talk about due process for those accused of sexual assault, he was vilified by extremist loons, and there wasn't any counter-demonstration to support his message.

The only ones who fight back are the ones who've already been expelled, or their mothers–God bless FACE–but that won't cut it.

The sad part is that if the boys bothered to engage themselves in the issue–if they'd bother to speak up–they'd have ample ammunition to attack the "rape culture" idiocy.

First, some of the brightest, most progressive minds in America have spoken out against the injustices to college men, yet the boys themselves sit back and let the scholars do not just the*heavy* lifting but all the lifting. One of the more chilling indictments of the current system was lodged by a guru of the sexual grievance lobby, none other than Brett Sokolow, head of the National Center for Higher Education Risk Management (NCHERM). Sokolow has done more to shape the sexual assault landscape on American college campuses than any person outside the Department of Education. Since the year 2000,

NCHERM has had in excess of 3,000 college clients. No group has more effectively fought for the rights of sexual assault victims on college campuses. Yet, last year, even Brett Sokolow painted a chilling picture about the hostility on American college campuses to the rights of men accused of sexual violence. Sokolow said that in the "hook up" culture, the evidence is often too murky to warrant charging and punishing the male accused of sexual misconduct, but that's exactly what too many schools are doing. Sokolow said that "in a lot of these cases, the campus is holding the male accountable in spite of the evidence – or the lack thereof – because they think they are supposed to, and that doing so is what OCR wants." And: "We see complainants who genuinely believe they have been assaulted, despite overwhelming proof that it did not happen." Worse, Sokolow suggested that mental health issues play a role in "case after case" of wrongful claims: "We fear for the mental health issues impacting many students, but in particular for those whose reality contact issues manifest in sexual situations they can't handle and campuses can't remedy. We hate even more that another victim-blaming trope – victim mental health – continues to have legs, but how do you not question the reality contact where case-after-case involves sincere victims who believe something has happened to them that evidence shows absolutely did not?" (Emphasis added.)

Second, the "rape culture" myth is built on absurdities that are downright laughable–college guys are reduced to vile caricature because of it, and if they wanted to take issue with it, this blog, and a lot of better sources than this, have been giving them all the ammunition they need for years. Start with the sexual grievance lobby's own internal inconsistencies–their silly "one-in-five" number is incredibly inflated when their numbers are crunched against their own almost-as-silly underreporting number. Hell, the Department of Justice recently said that it's not 1-in-5 college women who are sexually assaulted, it's more like 1-in 52 or fewer, perhaps a lot fewer. RAINN itself, the nation's leading anti-rape organization, debunked the "rape culture" meme: "Rape is caused not by cultural factors but by the conscious decisions, of a small percentage of the community, to commit a violent crime." RAINN decried the "inclination to focus on particular . . . traits that are common in many millions of law-abiding Americans (e.g., 'masculinity'), rather than on the subpopulation at fault: those who choose to commit rape." Want to know why there's a "rape epidemic" on campus? One reason is because almost half of all college women mistake consent for rape. Don't believe me? A full 44 percent of college women think that when a woman gives a guy a "nod in agreement," that isn't enough for consent. Seriously. Only 51 percent–the barest of majorities–think it is. Another study showed that "rape" can be cut in half, mainly by teaching women to say "no," which means it probably wasn't rape in the first place. Moreover, a whopping 56 percent of women think it's better that innocent young men be punished for offenses they didn't commit than to allow a guilty man to go free. (I guess they never heard of Blackstone's formulation.)

Third, there are the idiotic things the sexual grievance lobby says. Amanda Childress, Sexual Assault Awareness Program coordinator at Dartmouth College, declared that campus policies aren't going far enough to protect students. She asked: "Why could we not expel a student based on an allegation?" Dartmouth defended Childress's comment. Caroline Heldman, a professor at Occidental College, said this about lawsuits filed by men for alleged violations of their due process rights in connection with sexual assault claims: "These lawsuits are an incredible display of entitlement, the same entitlement that drove them to rape." Elisabeth Dee, who helped organize a mattress-carrying anti-sexual assault demonstration at Stanford, summed up the prevailing thought. She called on the school to reduce the standard of proof required to find someone guilty of sexual assault below the lowest legally permissible "preponderance of the evidence." Dee said that Stanford, should not be focusing on "defending the perpetrator, because essentially burden of proof is a defense of the perpetrator." Ezra Klein said its' "necessary" that "colleges will fill with cases in which campus boards convict young men (and, occasionally, young women) of sexual assault for genuinely ambiguous situations."Julia Horowitz, a journalist at University of Virginia's school newspaper, wrote that "to let fact checking define the [sexual assault] narrative would be a huge mistake." Zerlina Maxwell wrote this: "Ultimately, the costs of wrongly disbelieving a survivor far outweigh the costs of calling someone a rapist."

What, on earth, does it take to light a fire under college men? The protests of law school professors and all the rest can't do it if the victims don't care, and at present, the victims don't care.

Before you cry "unfair," I know there are college guys who are trying to fight back. Some of them write to us. They are to be commended, and this post isn't about them. Unfortunately, they are in the distinct minority.

It's time to admit that the battle is over because it can't possibly be won when the victim doesn't even know he's a victim. It's time to move on to other battlefields, and other victims–victims who actually give a damn that their scrota are marked with a bulls-eye.

The Fable of the Fish

July 2, 2015 | by Papa Possum | Link | Original Link

Editorial note: you can hear Papa Possum read his verse here. –Eds

Some angry creatures gathered once with grievances in mind
On how they felt society
conspired against their kind.
We'll call them "fish" since that themselves
they once did call in claim,
Although it's certain that you know them by another name.

Inside a bowl, upon a shelf,
in a department store,
They reinforced their discontent,
and shunned outside rapport,
Renounced the Strengths they could have played,
chose pessimism's pull:
"Our bowl, it is half empty! Don't dare say it is half full!"

With anger they topped off their bowl,
each echoed Marx's name.
Not one fish thought to look toward self,
but sought something to blame.
Each clenched right fin into a fist,
and thrust it toward the air,
Then swam in circles leftward…
never getting anywhere.

Across the aisle, in Games and Sports, were bicycles displayed.
Each built for action, work, or speed;
the fuming fish surveyed
And through their fish-eye view assumed each bike of dark ideals,
"All bikes were built for just one thing:
crush us beneath their wheels!"

The bikes were taken quite aback, sought to this fear relieve.
But the fish rallied, fist fins high, with "Swim left and believe!"
The fish bowl boiled over and splashed water everywhere

And when, at last, the rage died down, no bike was standing there.

The bikes had moved to aisle far from undeserv'ed rage,
Then lived their lives as each thought best;
the fish stayed in their cage.
So, here the story ends and if a moral's what you wish…
Then, "men need marxist feminists like bicycles need fish."

Steve Wozniak thinks robots will make us their pets

July 2, 2015 | by Jeff Wallace | Link | Original Link

Whether it's in the not-so-distant future like "The Terminator" or the distant past like "Battlestar Galactica," science fiction has always portrayed one common theme. When artificial intelligence takes over from the human race, our computers and robots turn on us and attempt to wipe out the human race. According to Steve Wozniak, co-founder of Apple, we need not fear that fate.

"Computers are going to take over from humans, no question," Mr Wozniak said.

In his view of the future, that won't come for hundreds of years. His vision still isn't quite as bright as in "Star Trek" where even though Data knows he is superior, he is willing to work alongside humans and even try to become more like them. He has the human race becoming pets to entertain and do menial tasks much the same as we do now with our pets.

"They're going to be smarter than us and if they're smarter than us they'll realize they need us," Mr. Wozniak said in an interview.

He does admit there is a chance that we could have a gruesome fate from the science world but it would be by man's own hand, creating "The Internet of Things." As Mr. Wozniak puts it, the main intelligence could just send out a message to the other computers to make that happen. In that scenario, we could be facing a future like the Borg from "Star Trek" where you have one central intelligence to which all other physical beings are connected.

"Like people including Stephen Hawking and Elon Musk have predicted, I agree that the future is scary and very bad for people. If we build these devices to take care of everything for us, eventually they'll think faster than us and they'll get rid of the slow humans to run companies more efficiently," Mr Wozniak said.

Single women raising children do a poor job

Almost a quarter of all American children under the age of 18 live in a home without a father. 70% of those children are living in poverty. The term 'single mother', used to describe women raising children in a home without a father, is not entirely accurate, given that over half of these mother are collecting child support, indicating they are single women as opposed to single parents. By contrast, nearly 70% of single men raising children are single parents, receiving no support from the other parent of the child.

Single women raising children without a father face a number of serious impediments to securing the well-being of both themselves and their children. Psychologist E. Mavis Heatherington found that one in four children being raised by single women 'have serious social, emotional, or psychological problems', compared to children raised in a home with both a mother and a father. Children raised in homes without fathers find it difficult to move up the economic ladder, or even to remain at the same level of income once a father is removed from the home. According to the Economic Mobility Project at Pew, '54 percent of today's young adults who grew up in an intact two-parent home in the top-third of household income have remained in the top-third as adults, compared with just 37 percent of today's young adults who grew up in a wealthy (top-third) but divorced family'. Regardless of where a child starts on the economic ladder, the loss of a father from his or her home has an impact on future economic well-being.

There are three important ways single women raising children are failing those children.

Single women raising sons have a difficult time helping those sons avoid criminal enterprise that results in jail time. A study from Princeton University found that boys raised without a father were 'two to three times more likely to end up in jail before they turned 30' than boys who grew up with a father present in the home. Single women raising children who introduced another man to the household had sons who found it even more challenging to avoid incarceration. Boys raised with a stepparent faced the highest risks of being jailed.

Single women raising daughters without fathers present in the home were less successful at helping daughters avoid falling pregnant as teenagers than mothers raising girls with fathers. Girls raised without the influence of their father in their daily lives were more thanfive times more likely to become pregnant as teenagers compared to girls raised with their fathers, creating a cycle of single women raising children without fathers.

Both boys and girls benefit academically from having their natural father present in the home. Given that education is one of the key determinants of economic success, children raised in homes without fathers are less likely to achieve independence and self-sufficiency. This is confirmed by economic mobility rates for children of all income levels, who do not have a father present in their homes. Single women who introduce new men into their households do not see the benefits of increased academic achievement passed on to their children. Only natural fathers consistently provide guidance and assistance to children with homework and other academic pursuits, resulting in higher achievements for children.

The long-term impact of single women raising children without a father present in the home is to create a cycle of poverty and reduced opportunity to escape those conditions. Daughters face elevated risks of becoming pregnant when adolescents, while sons face increased risks of being imprisoned. Both sons and daughters suffer academically without guidance and support from natural fathers. Taken together, families without fathers become entrenched in poverty with severely limited opportunities to take advantage of social mobility. Single women under the impression that raising children without a father in the home is a value neutral choice should perhaps consider whether they consider pregnant daughters, incarcerated sons and blighted futures for both also value neutral, because those are likely outcomes for children raised without their natural fathers.

Fitbit data increasingly used as court evidence

July 3, 2015 | by Glorianne Scott | Link | Original Link

There is one thing Jeannine M. Risley now knows for sure: before claiming to be raped, she should have taken off her Fitbit.

As fitness trackers like Fitbit, Jawbone, and Garmin, as well as smart watches such as the Apple Watch and the Samsung Galaxy Gear gain in popularity, consumers are collecting more data about themselves than ever. The fitness trackers, designed as motivational tools, collect data on sleep, heart rate, location, and activity among other things, while the smart watches aim to be a wearable version of your phone. This leads to an obvious question: what does one *do*with all that data?

In the case of a Canadian plaintiff, one uses the data to back up claims of a decline in post-injury activity. Believed to be the first such case of using Fitbit data as evidence in a court case, the personal injury case was the first in what many see as a growing trend in the law.

In the case of Jeannine M. Risley, the Fitbit data didn't bolster her claims; it contradicted them. Florida resident Risley, 43, was in Lancaster, Pennsylvania for work, staying at her boss's house. She claimed she was sleeping when she was raped by an intruder and staged the scene with an overturned chair and a knife nearby. However, when police downloaded the data from Risley's Fitbit, they found that not only had she not been sleeping, but she was up and walking about the entire night, including the time when she claimed to have been attacked. The Fitbit data was not the only evidence, of course; there were no signs of an intruder nor were there any footprints in the snow surrounding the house. Still, it is hard to argue with the activity data collected by the fitness tracker.

The data from digital technology is also used in divorce cases as spouses use apps to find phones and cheating spouses. While the data from "wearable" technology doesn't often get used directly as evidence,

> [R]ather it may be used to secure evidence. Today's tools may not be enough for a court to conclude that someone is in the throngs of passion with a paramour. But data showing, say, that someone in a divorce proceeding is near the address of a suspected lover with an elevated heart rate, is probably not ideal for someone in court, either."

Along these lines, Fitbit found itself in hot water when the data settings defaulted to public, meaning that if someone had inserted "hugging" or "kissing" as activities, that data could be found from a simple Google search. (This setting has now been changed.)

Astute attorneys are aware of this technology trend and are doing what they can to take advantage of it. Lawyers are encouraged to ensure the preservation of electronic data early in a case, including "interactive health data," or data collected by fitness trackers and the like. Privacy experts are also worried about the implications of storing so much data on the Cloud, perhaps negating the need for a warrant to collect the data.

If you find your fitness tracker motivating, and, as in the case of David Sedaris, it motivates you to take more steps (in his case, many more steps), then by all means use it. I wear mine daily for just this reason. Still, it doesn't hurt to be aware of how much data can be collected on you, and how that could ultimately be used against you if you're not careful.

Patrimalarkey #1: Women on Top

July 3, 2015 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

It is now almost universally accepted in western countries that all societies prior to the modern age were patriarchies. It is also often believed, by both men and women, that modern western countries are still patriarchies. This may seem like a reasonable presumption on the surface, after all, men did run all societies in the past didn't they? Not so much.

This is the first in a series of articles that will deal with different aspects of claims of patriarchy and detail different societies in different eras. They will detail how regarding these societies as patriarchies is, at best, a gross over-simplification. In reality societies have generally constrained both men and women, forcing them in to certain roles to serve the society itself.

The 16th century was a time of powerful female rulers in Western Europe. Queen Elizabeth ruled for what amounts to the second half of the 16th century. She was no figurehead either. She was the absolute ruler of England and Ireland (Britain would not arise as a state until generations later). Legally she was a 'Queen Regnant', meaning that she ruled in her own right and was not a 'Queen Consort' who is generally the wife of a King.

While it is true that the English practiced Male-preference primogeniture (preferencing inheritance by the first born son over other sons and all daughters) this did not stop many women inheriting and retaining thrones in their own right around this time.

Elizabeth I is well known throughout the English speaking world and is generally remembered as an effective leader who reformed the English state and built up a strong navy in the face of external military threats. Others show that while the early years of her reign were generally prosperous this was not so later on. What all of these sources agree on was that Elizabeth was the queen in her own right. The decisions made were made by her. It should be clear from this that she was the leader of the English and Irish states. She was no figure head.

What is generally not as well known is that there were several contemporary female monarchs in the British Isles. Immediately proceeding Elizabeth I as Queen of England and Ireland was Queen Mary I, her half sister. Queen Mary I is also known as 'Bloody Mary' as she had a habit of ordering the death of her subjects (usually by burning at the stake) when they didn't agree with her religious views. Mary I didn't reign for long (thankfully, given her penchant for violence) but was every bit as much in charge of England and Ireland as Elizabeth would be after her. Each effectively changed the national religion (Christian denomination) while reigning.

It is worth noting that Mary I's main competition for control of England and Ireland was another woman – Lady Jane Grey. In the end Mary made sure that Jane's head ended up rolling around in a basket rather than wearing a crown.

When Mary I married the terms of the marriage contract made her and her foreign husband joint rulers of England. He could not act without her consent. It is clear that the English nobility trusted an English woman to rule more than a foreign man. Nationality trumps gender. When Mary died in 1558 the crown did not remain with her foreign husband but rather went to her English half sister Elizabeth I. Patriarchy indeed.

To the north of England was Scotland, which was ruled by a Queen Regnant from 1542 to 1567. She is generally known as Mary Queen of Scots in English, probably to distinguish her from Mary I who was her contemporary. Her rule of Scotland overlaps that of both Mary I and Elizabeth I. The entirety of the British Isles was ruled over by female monarchs from 1553 to 1567. This period would likely have gone on much longer except that Elizabeth imprisoned and eventually executed Mary Queen of Scots after she fled south seeking Elizabeth's protection. Elizabeth apparently viewed Mary Queen of Scots as a potential rival since Mary was her niece. Mary Queen of Scots was fleeing south to England as she was suspected, then and now, of being a tacit accomplice in the brutal murder of her second husband.

Mary Queen of Scots was an absentee monarch during her early life, having spent her youth in France. Scotland was left in the hands of another woman, her mother, Mary of Guise.

So during this period we had Lady Jane Grey, Mary I, Elizabeth I and Mary Queen of Scots vying for power across the British Isles. It should be clear that this was no patriarchy. These women were no ones puppets – those that were successful ruled over England, Scotland and Ireland as ruthlessly and authoritatively as any male ruler. They also demonstrated that they were quite prepared to order the torture and execution of their enemies or those they perceived as enemies. These historical events and others that occurred in many other parts of the world throughout history demonstrate that these women were not helpless pawns of the patriarchy. They were powerful monarchs and in a very real sense, they were the law in their respective countries.

Patriarchy means literally rule by fathers but it is generally intended to mean rule by men. Such a society, one in which rule was mandated by men, would not permit female rulers. Women would simply not find their way in to positions of power. Even a cursory view of history reveals that female rulers, while fairly uncommon, feature across a wide variety of societies and eras. The upshot here is that there was no patriarchy – it was a myth. The reality is that societies shape social expectations of men and women to fit their own needs. In many cases, as have been noted by men's rights activists, men were considered disposable by society. In particular those men who were not members of the ruling class were considered disposable.

A patriarchy would not accept any female rulers by definition. The existence of even a single female ruler in a society negates the claim that that society was a patriarchy. The claim that most of human history was one continuous patriarchy is disingenuous at best.

Gather round, good people. Time to #spankaleftist

July 3, 2015 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

If I am allowed to brag, I think I have done a pretty admirable job of maintaining an apolitical stance at AVFM. You know, big tent, inclusiveness and all that. It is what you might call Liberal values. Well, unless you know anything about Liberalism.

I suppose I need to (grudgingly) qualify that statement. Yes, I know, NALALT. There now, I have recognized the microscopic minority of you that actually know what you are doing. All bettah now?

The partisan beefs keep coming up in MHRM circles. Like I said, I have generally kept my mouth shut. Like for six years. Now it is time for me to talk and the libs can STFU while I do it. Have a protest in the comments if you want, but I am going on a rant. Mod alert: Please don't act like a Liberal. Let them talk, such as they do, and feel free to let me know if any of them make sense.

If you detect a certain amount of animus in my mood today, Johnny needs to tell you what you won. You are spot on correct. I'm pissed. And I am not going to give you Dean's snooty and transparently collegial façade while I tell you to "know your place." Screw that. Let's get real.

If it were not for the American Left, we would not have about 80% of the problems with feminists that we do. In fact, were it not for the Left we could just spend our time addressing the gynocentrism in both parties, and probably make a lot more progress since the Right is a good bit more bound to logic and empiricism.

However, no matter how much I'd like to take a solid aim at the Right sometimes, about a hundred times more Leftist whackos make that seem like pointing at one cow turd in an auction barn and saying it is stinking the place up.

After all, whenever we have to engage Fascists and academic lickspittles pushing false research, bullying dissenters and yellow hacks in the press who have made it their work to demonize the MHRM, who do you think we are dealing with, politically speaking?

I will allow you to answer that for yourself but it ain't Pat Roberson, Sean Hannity or Tucker Freaking Carlson.

How completely FUBAR is it that I am forced to point that out about Carlson? I can't stand the little twerp but truth is truth.

Let me also say that I am sick and tired of going back to VAWA reauthorizations and over again as "proof" that the "problem is on the Right, too."

If any of this is news to you, it shouldn't be. Then again, if you are on the Left you probably don't know it, along with a lot of other things.

Let's take a look back at devout Socialist E. Belfort Bax. I think he was the last Liberal in the world who had a spine. I would say he had balls, but you know the Left Wing PC Police would issue me a sexism ticket or something. Anyway, here's Bax, in all his colloquial glory:

> The last point that we have to consider is the relation of this sex-question to Socialism. Some years ago, on its first appearance, I took up my esteemed friend August Bebel's book Die Frau in the hope of gaining some valuable hints or at least some interesting speculations on the probable future of sex-relations under Socialism. I was considerably disgusted, therefore, that for the "halfpennyworth of bread" in the form of real suggestion I had to wade through a painfully considerable quantity of very old "sack" in the shape of stale declamation on the intrinsic perfection of woman and the utter vileness of man, on the horrible oppression the divine creature suffered at the hands of her tyrant and ogre – in short, I found two-thirds of the book filled up with a second-hand hash-up of Mill's Subjection of Women and with the usual demagogic rant I had been long accustomed to from the ordinary bourgeois woman's-rights advocate."
> Essays in Socialism New & Old (1907), pp.108-119"

I guess a hundred years isn't as long as I thought it was. You can pick up the same exact tripe fresh off the shelf today, all of it written by Leftists with half of Bebel's intelligence.

Ask Karen Straughan what she saw when she went to a NOW convention and listened to some hulking basilisk passionately warming up all the "vaginas in the house."

I won't make you wait for the answer. If she was looking around she saw a string of booths and stands for the American Socialist Party and a dozen or so other Leftist causes. Nothing there from the Right and they probably would not have been allowed.

Feminism. Left.

That's correct. Feminism is a Left Wing ideology, born, bred and financed, and it is about time those of you talking all this herpy-derpy smack about inclusion and equality for "everyone" owned it.

I know that some on the Left would be most proud to do it. It is, after all, what Darwin, or maybe the sack full of amethyst crystals in their fanny pack, told them to do.

It is time you people on the Left who claim to support men's rights do more about it in your own circles but Leftists tend to police themselves with about the same efficacy as the NSA.

I know, I know, you guys are really busy. It is hard work robbing people who earn money so you can give it to those who don't. It is extra hard these days, having to support two wars you were all shrieking about till your guy got elected.

Think of it this way, though. This is your chance, for the first time in a hundred years, for the Left to be told by its own rank and file to start actually practicing a single thing they say.

So far, it isn’t happening. And it isn’t happening because 99% of you aren’t doing it. Maybe it will take a lot more credible people getting fed up and deciding to #spankaleftist to get it rolling.

2015 summer movies: A complete preview of July and August's film releases

July 3, 2015 | by Donald Shanahan | Link | Original Link

Boy, I'm just going to come out and say it. Contrary to prior expectations at the beginning of the calendar year, there is not much worthwhile left in the 2015 summer movie season. May and June were loaded and delivered from "Avengers: Age of Ultron" to "Jurassic World" and "Inside Out" with little hits in between like "Mad Max: Fury Road," "Spy," "San Andreas," and "Pitch Perfect 2." Outside of some noteworthy big hitters, the slates for July and August don't look all that strong. You'll see what I mean once you reach the August part of the list. Here's a complete preview of the final two months and second half of the 2015 summer movie season. As always, release dates can shift at any time, so check ahead before you head out to the theaters.

JULY 3

"Terminator: Genisys"— Most people don't know what to feel about this update/reboot/sequel, especially after the trailers have seemingly spoiled everything mysterious about the return of this franchise that should have stayed neatly finished nearly 25 years ago. "Thor: The Dark World" director Alan Taylor is at the helm guiding Arnold Schwarzenegger in his signature role alongside newcomers Emilia Clarke, Jai Courtney, and Jason Clarke. This studio hubris still thinks it can command a July 4th weekend. They're lucky "Minions" held off a week or little yellow gibberish-speaking man-things would beat this overfilled blockbuster handily at the box office. (trailer)

"Magic Mike XXL"— Here's a question for you, two actually. First, outside of the eye candy and fast-forwarding to the dance scenes, did anyone really like "Magic Mike" two years ago? Yeah, me neither. It was slow and tedious without really going anywhere. Secondly, isn't "XXL" the wrong shirt size for these "Medium" boys? They don't seem like the fat guy section of JC Penney's for Big and Tall clothes. I digress, but I'm sure there's still holes being burned in women's purses to fork over the dough to see the return of the best Dad Bods in the business. (trailer)

JULY 10

"Minions"— I am one of many wannabe box office movie gurus who predict that this film is going to absolutely rake. By July 10, "Inside Out" has had its time and nothing else stands in Dreamworks's way the rest of the summer for this offshoot film to have box office legs as strong as "Despicable Me 2." Parents, get ready to see this film more than you want to see it. By the way, the casting of Sandra Bullock is a nice touch as a villainess. (trailer)

"The Gallows"— Here's your requisite found footage summer horror movie with a cool concept and an unknown cast. "The Gallows" will lure the usual first-weekend-only horror fans for a nice debut where it will recoup its shoestring budget and force us to get 2-3 more of something that should have been done at one movie. Carry on. (trailer)

“Self/Less”— On the small scale front as a possible hidden gem, visionary director Tarsem Singh (“Immortals,” “Mirror, Mirror”) gives us the high sci-fi concept of a mind swap where a dying rich man (Ben Kingsley) transfers his consciousness into the younger and healthier body of Ryan Reynolds to unknown implications. Could this try to equal “Snowpiercer” from a year ago? Maybe, or maybe not. (trailer)

JULY 17

“Ant-Man”— The pessimistic scavengers are beginning to circle this latest Marvel tangent which closes out the Phase 2 of the Marvel Cinematic Universe. Advance scouts are calling for this to be Marvel’s first flop. People said that about “Guardians of the Galaxy” last year and its D-list obscurity, but look how that turned out. Can the Marvel brand market and squeeze out a hit out of a turmoil-filled production that saw a popular fanboy director (Edgar Wright) get replaced and odd casting choices (Paul Rudd as a superhero?) make news? This is Marvel’s biggest challenge to that, but, then again, everyone says that. (trailer)

“Trainwreck”— The ever-growing Amy Schumer ascension and coming-out party will peak with the fifth directorial effort of comedic renaissance man Judd Apatow. If done right, this will make more money than “Ted 2” with ease. Schumer’s appeal is that large and the romantic comedy and date night crowds will follow suit and join in. (red band trailer)

“Irrational Man”— For the better part of the last decade, polarizing-yet-acclaimed filmmaker Woody Allen has dropped his annual movie effort in the heart of the summer season as a deft piece of counter-programming next to the bloated blockbusters. He’s been hit (“Midnight in Paris”) and miss (“To Rome With Love”) with that strategy. “Irrational Man” centers around a college professor, played by Joaquin Phoenix, experiencing an emotional crisis until a new relationship with one of his students (Emma Stone, in her second consecutive Allen film) starts to bring him out of his funk. Allen is always a tricky sell and Joaquin Phoenix doesn’t make that any easier to swallow. (trailer)

“Mr. Holmes”— This small independent effort from Oscar winner Bill Condon (“Gods and Monsters,” “Chicago,” “Dreamgirls”) centers on a long-retired Sherlock Holmes, age 93, and played by Ian McKellen in 1947, being pulled out of retirement for one more big case. It is already playing in Great Britain after premiering at the Berlin Film Festival. There has definitely been a saturation point reached for all things Sherlock Holmes, but if anyone can give us something special and unique, it’s Condon and McKellen. (trailer)

“The Stanford Prison Experiment”— Staying in the independent/smaller arena is this psychological thriller based on the true events of the storied 1971 university program that went awry attempting to re-create a prison setting for mental tests with mock prisons and guards. Billy Crudup, Ezra Miller, Nelsen Ellis, Olivia Thirlby, Logan Miller, and Tye Sheridan form the ensemble. (trailer)

JULY 24

“Pixels”— Adam Sandler has ruined several wonderful things during his movie career. This time, he sets his sights on ruining nostalgic old video games and the reputation of

Peter Dinklage with this hair-brained alien invasion movie that looks absolutely terrible. And this is why we can't have nice things. (trailer)

"Paper Towns"— Last summer's surprise hit "The Fault of Our Stars" has opened the floodgates to getting angst-y movie adaptations of more John Green novels. His 2008 novel "Paper Towns" surrounds a coming-of-age tale for a high school kid (Nat Wolff) who seeks to solve the disappearance of his free-spirited, wild child neighbor and love interest (Cara Delevingne). Though this one appears to promise fewer required tissues, it is ideally placed for success with the underserved romance and teen crowd this summer. (trailer)

"Southpaw"— Jake Gyllenhaal transforms into a tattooed mess of a professional boxer trying to get his life in order as a single father fighting to prove his mental and emotional fitness in order to still have custody of his daughter. This heavy-hitting drama comes from director Antoine Fuqua ("Training Day," "White House Down") and co-stars Rachel McAdams. Gyllenhaal is on a roll following "Nightcrawler" and this looks to be another starkly jarring performance. Could Oscar finally come calling? He deserves it. (trailer)

JULY 31

"Mission: Impossible Rogue Nation"— Now, here we go. This is one of those noteworthy films worth getting excited about. In this writer's opinion, the "Mission: Impossible" series, with its evolving history and rotating directors (this time from "Jack Reacher" director Christopher McQuarrie) ever since J.J. Abrams hopped on board as the creative producer, has gotten better with each new installment. The ageless Tom Cruise is back for more spy swashbuckling and unreal stuntwork alongside Simon Pegg, Jeremy Renner, Ving Rhames, Alec Baldwin, Rebecca Ferguson, and America Olivo. Don't lie. That trailer footage of Tom hanging off the side of the plane has you all frothed up the same way him hanging from the world's tallest building did last film. This film moved up from a Christmastime release date to capitalize on the buzz and the easy pickings in this late summer slate. Smart move. (trailer)

AUGUST 7

"Fantastic Four"— Many people don't know what to make of this new reboot of Marvel's original superhero team. The marketing has been iffy and everyone wants to poke holes in its casting, direction, effects, writing, and chemistry without even seeing the film. Large reports of creative strife between the director ("Chronicle" helmer Josh Trank) and the studio don't help the matter. Fox is putting a great deal of effort in trying to power up their own Marvel Cinematic Universe and this is their biggest risk yet. Is it already dead on arrival in the eyes of public opinion? We'll find out. (trailer)

"Ricki and the Flash"— The indomitable Meryl Streep pulls another rabbit out of her hat to play a wannabe rock star who casts her family aside to chase her dreams of stardom. Directed (Jonathan Demme of "The Silence of the Lambs") and written (Diablo Cody of "Juno") by a pair of Oscar winners, keep an eye on this potential small-scale crowd-pleaser and Oscar bait. (trailer)

"Shaun the Sheep Movie"— The beloved farm animals of the claymation spin-off of “Wallace and Gromit” gets its long form adventure on the big screen. Naturally, the flock of curious sheep head to the big city. This is the quieter kids movie you parents are looking for this summer. (trailer)

AUGUST 14

“The Man From U.N.C.L.E.”— The kitschy 1960’s TV show gets adapted for the big screen in a bombastic (but hopefully still kitschy) period-set spy thriller directed by Guy Ritchie (the “Sherlock Holmes” series). Superman (Henry Cavill) and The Lone Ranger (Armie Hammer) are dueling American and Russian special agents who are forced to team up against a common threat. This will either be loud and cool or loud and a big mess. (trailer)

“Straight Outta Compton”— The historic rise and fall of the rap revolutionaries N.W.A. (Easy E, Dr. Dre, and Ice Cube) is the dramatic focus of this musical biopic from director F. Gary Gray (“Friday,” “The Negotiator,” “Set It Off”). Virtual unknowns, including Ice Cube’s own son playing his father, make up the lead trio while Paul Giamatti plays manager Jerry Heller that brought the men to fame. This looks lofty and ambitious compared to most other paint-by-numbers musical biographical films. Watch this film beat the dueling superheroes at the box office. (trailer)

AUGUST 21

“Sinister 2”— Here’s your prerequisite late August lightly marketed and obscurely-filled horror sequel that no one asked for or needed. Move on. (trailer)

“Hitman: Agent 47”— Here is your prerequisite sequel/reboot to a mostly-forgotten minor former hit that no one asked for containing none of the original cast. Carry on. One small note of interest is that this was supposed to be for Paul Walker before his fatal car accident. “Homeland” actor Rupert Friend took his place. (trailer)

“Masterminds”— “Napoleon Dynamite” and “Nacho Libre” director Jared Hess has assembled a cast to die for with Zach Galifianakis, Kristen Wiig, Owen Wilson, Jason Sudeikis, Mary Elizabeth Ellis, Ken Marino, Kate McKinnon, and Leslie Jones. He’s throwing them all together for a heist comedy stuck in a late summer release versus superhero films and other options. Good luck with your cheap shenanigans. (trailer)

“American Ultra”— In a comedy that appears far more funny and interesting than “Masterminds,” writer and YouTube ranter Max Landis delivers a stoner comedy about a perpetually high government that is too good to be exterminated by his superiors when deemed to be expendable. Old school “Adventureland” co-stars Jesse Eisenberg and Kristen Steward reunite for this one. (red band trailer)

AUGUST 28

“We Are Your Friends”— Zac Efron stars in this true story of an ambitious DJ looking to hit the next level and make it big as an artist and producer. Wes Bentley co-stars as his mentor and model-turned-actress Emily Ratajkowski plays the temptress he’s not supposed to fall for. Get your trance dance of self-importance on! (trailer)

“Regression”— Horror fans looking for something legitimate compared to the bad

sequels earlier in the season need to circle this one on the calendar. Renowned Spanish director Alejandro Amenabar ("The Others") returns to the genre with Ethan Hawke and Emma Watson in a twisted tale of guilt, admission, and truth surrounding a daughter who accuses her father of a heinous and unspeakable crime. There is some pedigree here higher than the usual horror trash. (trailer)

"War Room"— Finally, we have something for the devoted Christian audience. Filmmaker Alex Kendrick ("Courageous," "Fireproof," "Facing The Giants") returns with this drama highlighting the marital struggles and challenges within a household where the daughter is caught in the middle. Kendrick is a proven hitmaker and this film should strike a chord equivalent to the same crowd that made "Heaven is for Real" last spring. (trailer)

How to build a charcoal BBQ for your 4th of July celebration

July 3, 2015 | by Casey McCloskey | Link | Original Link

It’s almost the 4th of July and with that comes backyard BBQ ‘s and parties for many people. If you’re like me, you probably grew up when a BBQ meant grabbing a bag of charcoal from the grocery store along with a can of lighter fluid and allowing Dad the (sometimes) frustrating job of getting the fire going (which sometimes led to cursing and/or singed eyebrows in the process). Today, we have many more options for BBQ from gas to traditional charcoal and we’ve become smarter and now have aids such as charcoal chimneys. If you plan on going old school this weekend and creating a charcoal BBQ for your celebration, here is how to make the perfect fire.

Step One: Build a Pyramid

Instead of old school thinking that the charcoal should be in one flat layer, what you actually want to do is form a pyramid with the charcoal. It doesn’t have to be perfect. As long as it’s high in the middle and tappers down. This will allow you to have multi-zone heat to cook upon.

Step Two: Lighter Fluid

Yes, it smells. Yes, it is dangerous. Yes, people still use it, however, if you’re going old school BBQ then lighter fluid is a very necessary step in the process. The trick? Don’t rush. Many people try lighting their fires immediately after putting on the lighter fluid. Big mistake. This can cause flare ups and it can be dangerous. Instead, really give the charcoal a good soaking of lighter fluid and let it stand for at least a few minutes. This allows the fluid to seep into the charcoal.

Step Three: Another layer of Lighter Fluid and Light

After at least five minutes with the original coating of lighter fluid, it’s now time to add a second, lighter layer. Wait approximately 15 seconds after the second coat, get your matches and start the fire.

Step Four: Don’t rush the process

The last step to building a great charcoal BBQ is a simple matter of being patient. Allow the coals to turn gray before you begin to grill anything. You’ll have a slower, steady heat, and that is how you build the perfect old school charcoal fire.

Wishing everyone a happy and safe 4th of July!

Dr. Gregory A. Lewis in Chicago, are you sexually mutilating children?

July 4, 2015 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Advanced Urology Associates in Chicago, Illinois is a practicing group of nine specialists. The web page defining their practice includes the promise that they work as a team for all patients, and touts noble ideas such as, "[W]e believe the best doctor-patient relationship is one of mutual respect whereby the doctor provides information for the patient to consider."

That could be true until you consider what they are doing to defenseless children in their practice.

As a part of a sweeping range of urological problems they treat, the "circumcision" of infant boys is one of them. It may be prudent for parents considering not putting their infant in Dr. Lewis's hands, or any of his other team members.

The web page where they sell the practice of cutting away viable, natural tissue from the genitals of infants with no medical necessity is in direct conflict with any idea of a doctor-patient relationship based on "mutual respect whereby the doctor provides information for the patient to consider."

They are, in the opinion of many doctors opposed to the practice, actually selling cosmetic surgery to misinformed parents while totally ignoring the bodily autonomy of the victim.

Dr. Lewis and his peers sell this to parents by informing them of the possible benefits to circumcision, careful to use language that concedes that most of the purported benefits are unproven, and that benefits known, such as the decreased incidence of urinary tract infections, are conditions easily remedied with antibiotics.

What they do not do is offer one source of information about the very real possible consequences of what they do to their patients.

They do not tell parents that circumcision can lead to death and genital disfigurement; that botched cases have a profoundly destructive impact on the victims. Nor do they inform parents of the massive reduction in erogenous sensitivity that results from the procedure.

[image]

More importantly, you will see nothing about the possible, lifelong medical and psychological consequences of what they do to infants who cannot possibly make an informed decision.

Dr. Lewis is just one physician in that practice. He was named in the headline because his was the first name on the drop down menu of their practitioners on the circumcision page. The others are, Gregory J. Andros, M.D., Sandeep Sawhney, M.D., F.C.R.S, Thomas E. Burns, M.D., Thai T. Nguyen, M.D., Ryan G. Manecke, M.D., Constance Marks, M.D.,

Luke Cho, M.D., Neelima Kabre, M.D., and Elizabeth Bean, P.A. –C.

The purpose of this article is to hopefully reach parents who are considering placing their children in the care of this or any other medical practice performing what many concerned people and medical professionals define as genital mutilation.

It is important for parents to know the impact of pain caused by this procedure has on the barely developing brains of their infant sons, and the impact of the loss of sensitivity that ultimately results in sexual dysfunction in many men.

Parents should be aware of the increased risk of choking and difficulty breathing, the increased pulse (1.5 times the baseline rate), the tripling and quadrupling of cortisol levels (a steroid hormone released in response to stress).

Parents should be aware that circumcision is "among the most painful procedures performed in neonatal medicine," and that even in the rare cases that anesthesia is used, the postoperative pain far outlasts any pain management efforts that doctors provide.

Parents should be aware that "Behavioral changes in infants resulting from circumcision are very common, and can interfere with parent-infant bonding and feeding."

That is actually a small part of it. What is known about circumcision now is enough that it should literally frighten any concerned parent out of having the procedure done. Any concerned parent can read about this here.

Goldman-1999-BJU_international.

It is time for parents who are deciding on the basis of religion, custom or aesthetic appeal to be more informed about what circumcision actually is; what the real and often universal dangers are.

They are not going to hear this from medical groups that profit from doing them like Advanced Urology Associates in Chicago.

The basics in this article will be used many times ahead in the future, in an attempt to reach parents in every corner of the world where this barbaric practice is still common among medical professionals more concerned with profits than the well-being of their customers.

With this article, A Voice for Men now launches a long term project to expose elements of the medical establishment who are ignoring current data about circumcision and failing to help their patients make informed decisions about risks and benefits.

The practice of removing viable genital tissue containing 20,000 nerve endings on average, of performing cosmetic surgery without consent of the patient, and the people who do it, are going to be called out.

Laura Bassett is the perfect example of sexist double standards against men

Laura Bassett, the British soccer player who scored a goal on her own net, handing Japan the win, was understandably upset at her spectacular failure in the World Cup. The reaction from media and the general public is a perfect illustration of sexist double standards against men. Supporters took to Twitter and various social media to express their solidarity with Bassett, using the hashtags #IWillStandWithBass and #ProudOfBassett. 'What a dreadful way to lose. Poor, poor Laura Bassett.' Bassett was offered sympathy, support and encouragement, even though her actions dropped England out of the World Cup.

Bassett is not alone in committing sporting gaffes that result in catastrophe for the team. When Andres Escobar scored on his own net in the 1994 World Cup, he was not given condolences and sympathy. He was murdered. Escobar may be an extreme case, but there are examples of other male athletes failing on the sports field, and they are not generally met with kindness or forgiveness. When Gareth Southgate missed a penalty shot, costing England their title, The Business joined in the national chorus of condemnation and wrote a song about him. The lyrics are instructive. 'Gareth Southgate stood on the spot, couldn't believe the chance he got, he'd be a hero with one toe punt, but sent it at the keeper oh what a ct'.

The assumption that women need to be treated with gentleness and kindness is known as 'benevolent sexism'. Benevolent sexism holds that women are special and should be singled out for delicate treatment, particularly from men. Benevolent sexism, also known as chivalry, is what prompts men to open doors for women, walk on the outside of the street (to place their bodies between women and oncoming traffic or other obstacles), protect them from gunfire and remain seated on the deck of sinking ships. Benevolent impulses towards women may be innate for many men, arising from a phenomenon known as neotony. Women retain characteristics of childhood (softer skin, smaller stature, hairless faces) into adulthood, triggering protective instincts in men.

Bassett's supporters may be engaging in benevolent sexism, assuming a protective stance towards her because she is a woman, but the more significant sexism is our assumption that men who fail should not be extended the same consideration. Known as the 'empathy gap', as a culture, we tend to treat men with the expectation that they face their mistakes and accept brutal retribution, up to and including death, without flinching. Men are not permitted to express vulnerability, sorrow or genuine remorse, particularly not when their actions were preventable. This is a type of sexism that results in real harm against men and boys, who are taught their actions carry more weight than the same actions, when carried out by women. This is a partial explanation for huge sentencing disparities in the criminal justice system. Men and women who commit identical crimes face wildly different consequences. According to Professor Sonya Starr, 'men receive 63% longer sentences on average than women do, and women are…twice as likely to avoid incarceration if convicted.'

While benevolent sexism has been identified as a serious source of discrimination against women, benevolent sexism also results in gentle treatment of women who have made errors that would be unforgivable if made by a man. The sexist treatment of men as undeserving of compassion or gentle treatment arguably does far more harm than the benevolent sexism currently protecting Laura Bassett from experiencing the consequences of a bad play. If sexism is a problem in our culture, it is sexism against men that is more harmful.

The pangolin is the most illegally trafficked animal in the world

July 5, 2015 | by Carol Ann Swan | Link | Original Link

The pangolin is a critically endangered animal that most people have never heard about. Ironically, it is also the most illegally trafficked animal in the world. According to the WWF website:

> Between 2011 and 2013, an estimated 116,990 – 233,980 pangolins were killed, which represents only the tip of the (illegal trafficking) trade. Experts believe that seizures represent as little as 10 percent of the actual volume in pangolins in illegal wildlife trade."

The pangolin is a nocturnal and solitary animal that lives in forest and grassland ecosystems. There are eight known species of which four live in Africa and four live in Asia. It is an insectivore that feeds heavily on ants and termites and because of their poor vision, they have a heightened sense of smell and hearing.

All pangolin species are protected by national and international laws and are considered threatened or endangered. Unfortunately, two of the species are listed as critically endangered by the IUCN Red List of Threatened Species. The reason this scaly looking creature, which looks like a reptile but is actually similar to an anteater with armor, is heavily sought after is because its meat is used as a delicacy and scales used in folk-lore style medicines to treat afflictions like asthma and arthritis.

But despite the grim outlook for the pangolin's future, it looks like there may be hope as conservationists and government agencies are finally starting to notice the pangolin's plight. On March 3, 2015, the Humane Society International released a post card promotion via email so that people could share on social media sites in order to help raise awareness to the fact that in just one decade, one million pangolins were poached.

More recently, on June 24th through June 26th, the first Pangolin Range States Meeting was held in Da Nang, Vietnam. There were over a hundred participants from Africa and Asia in attendance. On the agenda were discussions on the threats to the pangolin species and strategies to help save them. It was also discussed that the "two most endangered pangolin species, Chinese or Formosan pangolin and Malayan or Sunda pangolin, may become extinct in 10 years if current trends continue".

At this time, it would seem that the most important step in protecting the pangolin is awareness and education. In order to help stop the illegal trafficking of this critically endangered animal, advocates, conservation groups and government agencies must start working with locals to come up with ways for them and the pangolin to coexist.

Male space is an inside job

July 6, 2015 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Spanning throughout the network of modern men's media you will find a substantial amount of perspective on the concept of "male space." You'll see a lot of harsh commentary from men who feel male space has been encroached upon by gender ideologues who believe that male occupied space is inherently dangerous to women.

This certainly would appear to be the case when you consider many traditionally male institutions that have been forced through legal channels or bad publicity to relent and include women in whatever they are doing. This even includes what some might consider privacy violations, such as female reporters being allowed into the locker rooms of professional athletes while they are in various stages of undress.

Some men point, and rightfully so, to the hypocrisy of this happening in a society which has had an explosion in women's organizations that routinely exclude men. Needless to say, male reporters won't be finding their way into the dressing rooms of female athletes unless they want to be arrested.

Sadly, this is usually where the conversation stops. There is little explanation to be found of what male space actually is, or why it is so important. With all respect to those writing on this subject, it too often falls short and lends itself to victim mentality. It's understandable. The hypocrisy is real, as is the dearth of male space. Still, I want to attempt to take a deeper look at what is happening. As always, you will stand as judge and jury on this particular take.

In the mid-1990s I worked at a residential treatment facility for men, women and young adults with alcohol and substance abuse problems. The campus was nestled in a locally iconic pre-midcentury residential area surrounded by sprawling oaks that were planted when the homes were built.

In addition to a nursing station and an administration building there were three homes, two for men and women respectively and one for young adults.

The men's home had a covered back porch with ample seating. During good weather (and sometimes bad) the men occupied that area, working on written assignments, reading or just talking with each other.

It was probably no coincidence that they chose this particular area to congregate. Just outside the porch railing was an outside stairway that led up to where the women were quartered, on the second story of the house next door. Every woman coming or going from there had to pass by within just a few feet of the men's porch. That often resulted in the women stopping to chat with the men. Sometimes briefly, sometimes longer.

I spent time observing their interactions. When women were not present, the men remained focused on what they were doing. They were generally loose and comfortable. Most importantly, they appeared comfortable in each other's company.

When female clients came by, particularly the attractive ones, everything changed.

Reading and writing ceased. The men's posture immediately improved. Occasionally chests puffed out, and some men stood upright, as if to take a more visible position among their peers.

What was really remarkable is that in most cases the men who were sitting and talking with each other disengaged and put their focus on the woman in their proximity. In more fundamental terms, when the women showed up, the men stopped whatever they were doing and focused their attention on them.

The competition was evident.

The more sexually attractive the woman was, the more the impact on the group of men; the more competition. Those occasions were sometimes marked by conflict and arguing among the men.

This was not an invasion of male space. The men were, instinctively perhaps, competing with each other, even undermining each other and betraying friendships in order to take the lead in drawing those women into that space.

It happened over and over again.

I decided to use this as an opportunity for an experiential exercise for the men, starting in the weekly men's group I facilitated. In that group I recited some of my observations to the men about what I saw. The anxiety level in the room immediately went up. Clients fidgeted, shifted their weight around in their chairs and stared at the floor.

We were already in uncharted territory for most in the group.

I gave them an assignment to carry out until the following week's group. I told them that when on the porch the objective was to remain focused on whatever they were doing and not interact with the women who came by; to be polite but explain to the women that they were busy at the moment and did not have time to socialize, and then to go back with whatever they were doing.

The anxiety level in the group spiked again.

I inquired about that and the responses I got were mostly an acknowledgment that the men feared their actions would be interpreted as rude and the women would be angry. I interpreted this, and still do, as meaning what the men actually feared was being rejected; that it was not about offending the women so much as losing their attention and approval. That fear is a topic for another article, by the way, in due course.

I sent the men off, some of them looking sheepish, to tackle this assignment. I was not convinced that they could or would go through with it.

I came to work the following Monday and the first thing I was greeted with was another staff member telling me that the women were complaining that the men had been rude to them over the weekend. I regarded that with some suspicion. That suspicion was later confirmed by talking to the men in the community. To a man they maintained that everyone had been polite but had followed through with the assignment.

They also confirmed that the women had become angry. In fact, a couple of them had tested the limits by dressing suggestively and lingering near the men's porch. When that failed the anger bubbled to the surface. Interestingly, and to my surprise, the men reacted to this by firming their resolve. Eventually they moved back into the house, where the women were not allowed.

The exercise yielded some interesting results. One, I did not anticipate the women's anger, though in hindsight I probably should have. The other is that not only did the men follow the instructions, they became determined not to be defeated. They grew closer to each other and for at least that weekend the arguments and conflict that typically happen between men in those settings dropped to near zero. They had congealed as a group and were working together, arguably on the problems that brought them to treatment to begin with.

Instead of surrendering their space, they created it, and built a fence around it as brothers.

Another interesting effect was the one this experiment had on the clinical and administrative staff. Some of the women who worked there were offended. They thought that the exercise I gave the men had nothing to do with their treatment for addiction and that it was hurtful to female clients. As I recall the word "abusive" even came up. Some of the male staff felt the same way, though male and female staff alike were unable to articulate any form of reasoning about it that made sense.

Their inability to do that was understandable. They were trying to express emotionally driven objections; an irrational rationale. The attitude was the same brand of obtuse that we find in people who think it was women's oppression that kept female reporters out of men's locker rooms and that men banding together, focusing on their own needs and the needs of their male peers was harmful to women.

Frankly, at that point, the staff was lagging behind the male clients on emotional health and insight alike. The men, with few exceptions, gained from it. Several of them described the experience as "empowering," an interesting word from the mouths of men.

I could see it in their demeanor as well. I found it intriguing that it expressed itself in some of the same ways that I saw in the men when they were posturing to draw feminine attention. Their posture was better. They walked more upright with an air of confidence atypical to men in that setting. They exchanged knowing glances and smiles with me for quite some time.

They felt better about themselves, something pretty important for people who have wrecked their self-respect with alcohol and drugs. They learned about themselves and about men.

Men change when you bring a woman into the picture. They change in very drastic ways. You can have a group of happily married, committed men in a group; men with no intention at all of infidelity, and when you introduce an attractive woman in the picture they change. They lose focus on whatever they are doing. They compete. It is instinctive, it is nature. And it affects all men. At least one of the men in that particular group was gay and he reported the same benefit as the others, plus he felt more included as a fellow man than he had before.

Is this a suggestion that men should avoid women? Hardly. Human beings pair bond. It is not nearly always for life but they still overwhelmingly tend not to fly solo in life. Their healthy, normal needs include intimate connection.

For men, just as it does for women, it also means a time and place for space of their own.

We may not be able to control whether women are allowed entrance to a men's country club, or into men's locker rooms or any number of other places. Each man and each group of men can, however, take the space they need to connect to themselves and to each other. Those who are offended by that are just those who want irrational, exploitive control.

That is what the majority of staff at a treatment facility found offensive. Men turning inward and doing the very work they were there to do; connecting to each other supportively in the process. They were concerned that men doing this was an affront to women. For them, the men's actions on that porch was a problem to be fixed rather than what it was, men in trouble supporting each other and restoring some of their dignity. They were isolated, disaffected men finding connection and a sense of community.

Men's challenge is not to defend male space, but to create it. Male space, the kind that matters, is not on golf courses or locker rooms. It is within the sanctity of their own minds and hearts. It is in the ability to tend to their own needs rather than blindly surrender to reproductive instinct, laying waste to their dignity and leaving their brothers under the bus along the way.

It cannot be taken. It cannot be encroached upon. It can only be surrendered.

Bemoaning the lack of male space is not an act of dissent. It is not activism. It is simply an acknowledgment of personal and collective failure.

When men value themselves and brotherhood more than an approving smile from a pretty face, they will have all the space they need.

Dying to be a father: the silence after the death of Darryl Hamilton

July 7, 2015 | by Ty Henry | Link | Original Link

It appeared that sports media had found, to borrow the favored SJW straw-man, “the perfect (male) victim” in the form of Darryl Hamilton.

Hamilton played 13 scandal and controversy free years in Major League Baseball, considered an asset for several teams in a distinguished, if not superstar, athletic career. He parleyed this career into a successful post-playing career in the sport, as a radio and television analyst and MLB League Office employee.

Universally admired, he had custody of sons from a previous marriage and by all accounts had an exemplary character. Unlike Tiger Woods and Steve McNair, there was no illicit affair which could be used to make this case of “moral hazard,” to obscure the severe domestic violence committed.

In the aftermath of his murder at the hands of his youngest son’s mother, the template for the narrative was laid out like instructions on the back of a Bisquick box.

“Abusive, arsonist mom has to share custody with retired baseball player and devoted dad, murders him two days later on Father’s Day.” After all, Monica Jordan cut a similar figure of one Crystal Gayle Mangum, late of the Duke Lacrosse hoax. After receiving the severe penalty of nothing for her actions, she went on to set fire to a home with her kids in it. Oh, and there was the small matter of the murder of Reginald Daye, for which she will be out in time to have even more unfortunate offspring. Not to be out-Left Eyed, Ms. Jordan set her estranged husband’s home alight in 2008. For this she received the onerous term of 240 community service hours and probation.

It’s not as if simple, pat narratives are anathema to national noise machine. Heck, they’re often accurate. When Rae Carruth put a hit out on his pregnant ex-girlfriend in 2000, the motive was pretty clear. OJ Simpson was driven to rage at the thought, and the sight, of his “prized possession” Nicole gallivanting with other men. Ray Rice was a “raging, patriarchal beast who was let off the hook easy by the criminal justice system, which turns a blind eye to revenue generators who brutalize women.”

So how did sports media choose to approach the death of a man who appears to have died because he had the temerity to think himself entitled to a shared custodial relationship with his son?

Did the major outlets seek to “open conversations” about gender parity in domestic violence? Was there any talk of “entitlement culture” that teaches women that children are their de facto property in the event of relationship dissolution? After all, when Kansas City Chiefs’ linebacker Jovan Belcher shot his girlfriend and mother of this child, Kassandra Perkins, then drove to the team practice facility and turned the gun on himself, it triggered a month-long, out front national dialogue and calls to action, such as from Jemele Hill, as well as the sober reflections on whether the "culture of football" predisposes men to harming women. Indeed, it's hard not to imagine the corpses of these two young people disintegrating, the sports gender grievance minions having (mis)used them springboards to push their one-sided agenda before they were properly embalmed.

Were there cries not to let Monica Jordan off the hook? Was Jordan's prior domestic violence victim, magnanimous enough to ask that she not get jail time, sought for one of those maudlin pieces on Outside The Lines, or even the network morning shows, the way prior victims of male abusers are. What about harsh criticism of District Attorney Jeri Yenne in the prior case, who offered non-jail plea. Was she asked if she leveled an objection when Jordan's 10 years of probation was terminated after little more than a year? Will we one day be treated to a salacious Sports Illustrated cover story like the recent one Jon Wertheim penned on former baseball player and full-time slug Milton Bradley?

Of course, the foregoing questions are all rhetorical; to ask them is to answer them. On the bright side, maybe we are seeing an improvement. After all, we didn't question his manhood, like we did with Jennifer Capriati's victim. His death wasn't called "absolutely fabulous" by a daytime panel-talk personality. We didn't turn his misfortune into fount for humor about which Perkin's "Pies" he "Poked" (Tiger Woods), nor ask openly if he got what he deserved (Steve McNair).

No, if you're a prominent man of character, with few foibles, who happens to be on the business end of extreme domestic violence, you'll never be the catalyst for a larger discussion. The best you can hope for is a few gracious remembrances and a sonorous obituary in your local paper.

Darryl Hamilton is indeed the perfect male domestic violence victim. He is no longer alive to speak, and no one in his fields of endeavor will speak for him and what his death represents.

Medical marijuana comes to Minnesota

July 7, 2015 | by Christopher Granger | Link | Original Link

On July 1, Minnesota became another in a growing list of states to legalize medical marijuana. There are eight dispensaries spread throughout the state and the marijuana is available in pills, oils and vapors. There will be no smoking of the medical marijuana. Minnesota may be the latest state to allow its citizens the opportunity to use medical marijuana for nine medical diseases. It is also the strictest state to be able to get on the list for this purpose. Minnesota is no-nonsense about this matter and it will probably be the costliest when it comes to its medical marijuana. Now with these restrictions and the fact that the patients may have to travel some 150 plus miles to acquire it, doesn't it make one wonder if it is going to be worth it? There are some problems to fix and take a better look at.

Marijuana for some time has been known to help with the seizures that children may have due to epilepsy. It is sold in oil form and has no THC content. It's name is Charlotte's Web and has been doing a great job for those children who can get it. Marijuana has also been able to help with cancer, aids and glaucoma patients.

Is this a big step for Minnesota? Yes, it is and it will get better. When the state realizes exactly what can be done for its people who suffer from the diseases that are outlined then they will open more dispensaries and allow it to be smoked rather than just offered in oil form.

Minnesota looked hard at this decision when the legislature finally passed it last year. For many, this opens up a possibly better way to fight the effects of certain diseases. Does this mean that the fight is over? Unfortunately, no. There are still those who fear that opening up medical marijuana to the public will eventually lead to the legalization of recreational marijuana. Law enforcement is not totally on board with this but will certainly follow the letter of the law if it does occur.

There are many people in Minnesota as well as around the country who are watching the outcome of legalized medical marijuana. For information on the status of the legalization of medical marijuana in the State of Florida, please go to forthepeople.com and United For Care.

Father’s Day passed amid family court reform efforts

July 7, 2015 | by Doug Carey | Link | Original Link

With Father’s Day having passed recently, we here in the Working Dads space thought it would be good to turn a spotlight on the need to reform our nation’s family courts, which continue to marginalize the role fathers play in the lives of their children by ordering sole custody, usually to mothers, in more than 80 percent of cases.

Father’s Day is an opportunity to highlight the gender inequality that presently exists in the family courts, as well as a chance to advance shared parenting as the new status quo in instances of divorce or separation. Presently, nearly 20 states are considering shared parenting and parental equality reform legislation that would not only recognize the value of both parents but more importantly, provide children what they most want and need — equal time with both parents in instances of divorce or separation.

“Fathers want to share the parenting time with mothers after separation, and research shows children want the same thing. Also, research overwhelmingly shows children greatly benefit when both parents play significant roles in their lives. With this in mind, I can’t think of a better gift for everyone on any Father’s Day than moving shared parenting reform efforts forward,” said National Parents Organization Founder and Board Chair Ned Holstein, MD, MS.

The shared parenting movement is supported by recent child development research. The most recent of many examples appeared this spring in the Journal of Epidemiology & Community Health. This 150,000-person study found that shared parenting after divorce or separation is in the best interest of children’s health. The study, “Fifty moves a year: is there an association between joint physical custody and psychosomatic problems in children?” evaluated the mental health of children and concluded that children with shared parenting, spending substantial time with each parent, were significantly less stressed than children living mostly with one parent.

SINGLE PARENTING VERSUS SHARED PARENTING

Not only do studies consistently show that shared parenting is best for children when parents divorce or separate, but also, federal statistics show the startling impact single parenting has on children. Consider that, according to the U.S. Centers for Disease Control, the U.S. Department of Justice and the U.S. Census Bureau, the 35 percent of children raised by single parents account for:

- 63 percent of teen suicides;
- 70 percent of juveniles in state-operated institutions;
- 71 percent of high school drop-outs;
- 75 percent of children in chemical abuse centers;
- 85 percent of those in prison;
- 85 percent of children who exhibit behavioral disorders;
- 90 percent of homeless and runaway children.

“Too many children have suffered when both parents aren’t actively involved in their lives. Please support the best interest of children on each and every Father’s Day by joining me in supporting efforts to bring shared parenting and parental equality to family courtrooms nationwide,” Dr. Holstein said.

Whether the problem is emotional disturbances of children, drug use, alcohol use, teen pregnancy, poor performance in school, trouble with the law or running with gangs, being raised by a single parent is a powerful risk factor. For many of these outcomes, single parenting is a stronger risk factor than race or poverty. Conversely, children on average do much better on all these measures if they have shared parenting. Children ardently desire shared parenting in most cases and are happier with it.

For parents, shared parenting significantly increases child support compliance, diminishes parental conflict and domestic violence and allows both parents to pursue their careers, social lives and other interests without the burden of single-handedly raising a child.

ABOUT NATIONAL PARENTS ORGANIZATION

National Parents Organization, a charitable and educational 501 (c)(3) organization, seeks better lives for children through family law reform that establishes equal rights and responsibilities for fathers and mothers after divorce or separation. The organization is focused on promoting shared parenting and preserving a child’s strong bond with both parents, which is critically important to their emotional, mental, and physical health. In 2014, National Parents Organization released the Shared Parenting Report Card, the first study to rank the states on child custody laws. ‘Jurassic World’ is a worthy sequel to Spielberg’s original classic

July 8, 2015 | by Michael Adams | Link | Original Link

When it comes to film franchises, there are those that truly tell a riveting story and those that merely serve their cash cow purpose. Both kinds make money, but the former withstands the test of time in a superior manner over the latter because at the end of the day, nothing beats a really well-told story. For every Hunger Games there’s a Divergent series, and audiences keen on attention to detail can spot the differences, as time is the friend of nothing ephemeral.

In 1993, when director Steven Spielberg unleashed Jurassic Park into the world, it was a film unlike any other, a glimpse of a world many millennia before us colliding with our current age, and it remains to this day ever as thrilling, scary, and beautiful as when it was first revealed. The graphics are stunningly ahead of their time, the emotions still feel real, and the scares are shockingly resonant.

‘Twas inevitable that sequels would be made, and even further was the inevitability that their quality was to be ill equipped in the ability to match that of the original. Spielberg’s own The Lost World: Jurassic Park from 1997 was simply too dark, and it lacked the*fun* of its predecessor. Then, despite featuring returning cast members from the first film (who had skipped round two), Joe Johnston‘s 2001 film, Jurassic Park III, faltered with its near-goofy plots, lack of attention to detail, and psychedelic color schemes.

These lackluster qualities do not apply to the latest journey into a world of prehistoric beasts. Directed by Colin Trevorrow, 2015 brings us Jurassic World, which is a deservedly-praised box office smash (scoring the highest grossing weekend ever, domestically and globally), and thankfully it is due at least in large part to merit rather than merely hype.

Although it’s not a perfect film, Jurassic World brings its audience into the wonderful spirit that made the original so, well…fun! It has a combination of fast-paced action; heartfelt bonding, (both of the fraternal, familial variety and the lightly romantic between its leads); and breathtaking shots of truly spectacular creatures and landscapes, which really engage the viewer on a sensory trip on par with some of the grandest big-screen epics of our age.

Leaping from science into science fiction, the premise of the story surrounds the creation of (and eventual need to put an end to) a made-up dinosaur, created in a lab, called the Indominus rex. The beast is far bigger, more violent, and more fierce than the ever-popular Tyrannosaurus rex, which is exactly the type of kick the executives now running the currently opened and thriving dinosaur village theme park are seeking for their investors’ gain and visitors’ thrills.

Taking place twenty-two years after the events depicted in the first Jurassic Park film, by this point in the world, the pervading thought is that jaded people are less than thoroughly enticed merely by the already-known species in the park. As a testament to the reality of human beings' ability to adjust to practically anything (and in turn, become "over it"), the park's operations manager, Claire Dearing (Bryce Dallas Howard), has spear-headed the creation of the new, diabolical I. rex. Dr. Henry Wu (B. D. Wong, reprising his role from the first film), the park's leading geneticist, keeps secret the DNA concoction that led to the I. rex's creation.

Velociraptor trainer Owen Grady (Chris Pratt) figures out there is a streak of DNA matching that of the velociraptors, contributing to the Indominus rex an intelligent streak that leads him, by way of cunning deception, to escape his cage during a feeding. He's furious, on the hunt to kill for sport, and all but unstoppable by any means the humans—who reached too high in their pursuit of prestige and financial gain—can throw at him. Everyone has different ideas of what to do, such as security officer Vic Hoskins (Vincent D'Onofrio), who thinks the team should let loose the raptors to hunt down the beast, caring little for the risk involved unlike the far more knowledgeable Owen, who warns against such an idea. The park owner and CEO of the Masrani Corporation, Simon Masrani (Irrfan Kahn) realizes before the death count even begins to rise that they may have flown too close to the sun in giving into their pride and desire always for more, more, more.

Meanwhile, Claire's nephews are out on their own in one of the park glass car-like machine rides for exploration of the park, then eventually on the run amidst the terrorized crowds. They had journeyed the many-mile flight to the island where the park is located to spend some time with their aunt, but she (at first) seems to care very little about spending said time with them. Leaving them in the care of a distracted babysitter, the brothers Mitchell—the elder being Zach (Nick Robinson) and the younger being Gray (Ty Simpkins)—ditch their caretaker and go out on their own, eventually leading them face-to-face with the on-the-loose Indominus rex.

Something of an explosive mess, the film manages to carefully give just enough detail about all the players involved so that a cohesive narrative can be followed, despite the story's hectic dealings, at least enough to where the confusion the characters are experiencing in the traumatic events happening on screen doesn't transplant itself into confusion for the audience. Most of these people are all new to the world of the franchise, and Trevorrow does quite a decent job in developing them enough to where viewers care about our heroes (plural) and heroine (singular—Claire is a major role, but the only female to be such. Make no mistake: it's a story for boys). That's not entirely a bad thing. Brothers Zach and Gray are entirely representative of a very fundamental fraternal bond to which so many people can relate, and their age differences and brotherly affection lends some well-needed heart to the big action movie that wouldn't otherwise be there, were the two of them lacking from the story. Side bar: the reinforcement that Zach is clearly a hormonal teenager by having literally every girl he sees catch his fancy is a bit much. But thankfully that tones down after the first half hour or so, as the more important plot lines swing into full gear.

Chris Pratt as our fearless protagonist, Owen, makes for a not entirely natural leading man. He seems to be adjusting to such a role as the story moves along. Here he is, hot off the press from leading another huge movie, Guardians of the Galaxy, (which is set for a sequel), and ending his seven-season run as the goofy, affable, adorable, lovable oddball Andy Dwyer on the brilliant television series Parks and Recreation. No one in Hollywood has a faster-growing career than Pratt right now, and some of that (ever so slightly arrogant?) glow from his super-stardom seems to shine through (a titch unfavorably) in his performance here. That said, once he gets into the rhythm of his character, anyone would be crazy not to fall in love with him. His endearing charm and substantially beefy good looks distill the makings of a muscular action hero with a side of sass, and in the end, the film is better for having him cast in it.

In all, Jurassic World has its weaknesses. Bryce Dallas Howard is not at her letter perfect best, mainly because she was given less complexity than the men in the story, and the movie suffers for it. Her shrewd acting and ability to be entirely subtle (as hauntingly demonstrated to a perfect T in her finest role to date—Ivy Walker in The Village) go to waste a bit here, as more often than not, she's simply "the uptight executive" type, rather than a dynamic human woman. But as aforementioned, it's a movie made for boys, that much is very clear.

Overall, it's an incredibly fun ride, and the kid inside anyone cannot help but get caught up in the adventure. That said, the "kid" of a certain age and up is who should watch this one; small children would be terrorized by some of the more extremely frightening moments that take place onscreen. That Indominus rex can really roar!

It's a big, giant summer movie. Would the eccentricities of it have been slightly rounder and more complete had it been directed by the dinosaur king originator, Mr. Spielberg himself? Probably…but then again, his hand as producer is certainly all over this movie, and it shows, in the most delightful way.

4 out of 5 stars.

Reinstate De’Andre Johnson, stop blaming for being a victim of assault and defending himself

July 8, 2015 | by AVfM Video Source | Link | Original Link

We don’t think there’s any way to watch this video rationally and not conclude that the woman here is the guilty party, flat out, no excuses. Both are acting like children to some extent but the whole idea that De’Andre Johnson is guilty of some massive crime is garbage. Women need to learn not to hit–in other words, women need to be expected to act like adults just like men.

This was self-defense so far as we can see, and this woman is nobody’s hero. We think this young man has the best take on it so far:

The Henpecked Club

July 9, 2015 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

The following is an expanded version of an earlier 2014 article. – PW

> Many a good man of the Henpecked Club has to be on his good behaviour in order to keep on anything like peaceable footing with his better half – (1860)[1]

The Henpecked Club is a very real organization, global in scope, that has been in continuous operation for at least the last 200 years. It served the needs of married men who faced domestic abuse from wives, and served young bachelors who might later have to deal with the same issues when they married.

Essentially a project for creating 'Good Men,' the Henpecked Club consisted of an international network of meeting-places where men came for support, especially if enduring emotional and physical abuse from wives. In this aspect the club is similar to Al-Anon, the modern support-movement for spouses of alcoholics. The clubs actively encouraged husbands to tolerate wives' abuse, with the strategy of placating them with any means necessary to moderate abusive behaviours.

The key word there is placate, which the men did in spades.

[image]Club members, for instance, were expected to take their wives breakfast in bed daily and to do most of the household chores even after a hard day's work, with the hope that this would place wives in a more amiable frame of mind or – perhaps more accurately – in a less abusive mood. The following are instructions to all members of the club:

1. That every member of this society shall kindle the fire, set the kettle over, and have the water boiling before he awakes his wife in the morning.
2. That every member shall take his wife her clothes to bed, after having aired and made them warm and comfortable, or be fined twopence for each offence.
3. That he shall state to his wife the work he has done, and ask if there is anything more she wishes him to perform before he goes to his work in the morning.
4. That if any member or members should come home to his dinner, and find his wife gossiping and the dinner not ready, he shall not complain; but cook for himself and family, and something for his wife that will make her comfortable when she does come home, or forfeit threepence.
5. That if any member or members after their day's labour come home and find that his wife has not washed the pots, or any other thing he thinks should have been done, he must do the same himself, and not find fault; he must likewise mend the fire, warm the water, sweep the house, mop and scrub the floor, and them make the bed or beds to her satisfaction, or forfeit fourpence.
6. That when any member shall have finished his week's work, he shall return home with his wages and give the same to his wife.

7. That when any member has given the wages to his wife, he shall ask her what she wishes him to do the next, if she wishes him to go to the shop he must go, but if she wish to go herself he must stay at home to clean the house and furniture, and set things in order, that she may be satisfied when she returns, or forfeit sixpence.
8. That every Sunday morning, each member shall rise at six o'clock, kindle the fire, clean and dress the children (if any) and get them ready for school, before his beloved wife shall be disturbed; but if she call for a pipe of tobacco, a pinch of snuff, or a glass of some nourishing cordial, he shall serve her that instant, or forfeit sixpence.
9. That peradventure a member's wife may wish to have some splendid clothing such as a silk velvet bonnet, a fine cap with artificials, a new gown, crinoline, boots, sandals, silk stockings, or any other article of fashionable dress, her husband shall provide for such things out of his over-time money, or forfeit one shilling and eightpence.
10. That when a member's wife is sick or in labour, he shall run for the doctor as fast as he can, whether it be night or day, frost or snow, hail or rain, or forfeit two shillings.
11. That any member refusing to clean the child when it has shitten or bawed (as the term may be), he shall forfeit sixpence.
12. That every member shall wash the child's shitten hippins [diapers], when his wife order him or forfeit fourpence.
13. That every Monday night, each member shall clean his wife and children's shoes and clogs.
14. That every Tuesday night each member shall look up the clothes for washing.
15. That every Wednesday night each member shall look the buttery over, and see whether there be a sufficient quantity of tea, coffee, sugar, butter, bread, cheese, meal, flour, beef or mutton, and if found wanting, he shall provide the same without grumbling.
16. That every Thursday night, each member shall provide for his loving wife such things as may improve her private happiness, such as cordials or spirits, according to circumstances.
17. That every Friday night, each member shall look up the stockings, shirts, &c., and such as want mending he shall mend them.
18. That every member shall pay the strictest observance to the five last-named rules or forfeit threepence for every neglect on conviction before the committee.[2]

Such instructions, which were typical of most of the Henpecked Clubs, were sometimes couched in self-mocking humor by the members suffering abuse by wives, and this has led to the erroneous assumption that the clubs were merely comedy. But that assumption is incorrect – and perhaps a little driven by denial of women's violence – for the issue of domestic abuse was a serious concern for the clubs, as were strategies for dealing with same.

Yorkshire Post – 1940

Men were also advised to absorb any violence or abuse without complaint, stoically tolerating it so as not to provoke or further upset the perpetrator. This, explained club policy, was how one become a 'good man.' If the man's wife continued her abuse after these conciliatory gestures, Club officials would ask the man what he may have unwittingly done to provoke her, followed by "How might you better serve her so she doesn't become upset again?" The answer to that question was typically for the husband to do more housework, but there was also a novel intervention of 'rocking a wife to sleep,' of which I will say more shortly.

Henpecked clubs existed in their hundreds from the 1700s through to contemporary times, and in places as diverse as England, Austria, USA, Germany, France, Australia, Yugoslavia, China, and Japan.

Why haven't we heard of these clubs – many containing several hundred members struggling to find ways to deal with difficult marriages – in an age when we are so hyper-focused on gender relations? Not even a peep from historians, despite the availability of material about Henpecked Clubs. Why?

Because it doesn't chime with the image of a 'dominant patriarchal husband' proffered in modern interpretations of history.

So in a gesture of redressing history, here is small part of an 1810 book entitled, Some Account of that Ancient and Honourable Society, Vulgarly Denominated The Henpecked Club – showing that the project of creating 'good men' has been going on for at least 200 years, and probably more:

> "[Husbands] submit to the pleasing bondage of their wives, in as great numbers, and with as much good will, as in any enlightened period of ancient or modern times.
> [image]"Henpeckicism, which has been graced by ranking as its Members the greater part of the most celebrated men who have appeared since the creation to the present day, whether legislators, philosophers, conquerors, poets or divines, requires no other argument to vindicate and establish its right to the most extensive influence and operation, than the language of every lover, who readily acknowledges himself to be, and swears to continue, the slave of his mistress, before marriage; ergo, he who denies her supremacy, when she becomes his wife, is guilty of the most criminal and unnatural rebellion against womanly authority that God himself have set over him. If other arguments were wanted, however, many might be adduced to prove that the superiority of the female is an ordination of Nature. For example, the noblest or fiercest dog will tamely submit to the snarling and snapping of the most pitiful bitch of the species."
> "For in Henpeckicism there is no distinction: the peerless woman lords it over her vassal even as the peasant: All are equally comprised in the description so happily given by the poet:

> “The crouching vassal of the tyrant wife,
> “Who has no sixpence but in her possession,
> “Who has no will but in her high permission,
> “Who must to her his dear friends secrets tell,
> “Who dreads a curtain lecture worse than hell”
> “The rules observed by the Members of those Meetings were every way adapted to preserve the existence of the institution. Such Members as had the honour of receiving a black eye from their spouses, were entitled to an allowance of 10s. 6d. per week, for so long as the glorious colouring remained: The allowance for two black eyes was £1 1s 0d. In all cases, proof was required that the contusion was received according to the true spirit of genuine Henpeckicism, that is, without resistance or murmuring, according to the example of that inestimable deceased Member, Socrates, who, together with his Lady, is alluded to by the poet in the following lines:
> “How oft she scolded in a day he knew,
> “How many pisspots at the sage she threw,
> “Who took it patiently, and wip’d his head-
> “Rain follows thunder – that was all he said.”
> Such married men as had not the honour to appertain to the Society, were earnestly requested to attend these Meetings, not as Members, but as visitors, in order that they might be induced to unite themselves with it, by witnessing the perfect happiness which it was calculated to confer. For what happiness can be greater than that of belonging to a spouse who takes upon herself the weighty care of regulating not only her own conduct, but that of her husband and the rest of her family; to a spouse who takes the trouble of receiving and paying all money; to a spouse who kindly undertakes the task of judging for her husband (in every occurence) of what is proper for him to do; of what time he should spend in public houses; of how much money he must expend; of what secrets ought to be retained in his or rather her possession, and of what ought to be divulged to the world? In short, she who takes upon herself all anxiety, all trouble, and leaves to her darling husband nothing to do but the delightful task of executing her commands; well remembering that:
> “His proper body is not his, but mine,
> “For so said Paul, and Paul’s a sound divine.”
> The design and ostensible object of the Institution having always been to preserve, and even, if possible, to extend the just and laudable dominion of the fair sex, the several meetings thought it proper, also, to request the attendance of bachelors, not merely with a view that they might be benefited by witnessing such perfect examples of submission, but that those bachelors who had not yet turned their thoughts toward matrimony, or who might have overlooked so great an inducement to enter into the married state as the existence of out Institution, might be induced, as early as possible, to place themselves on a level, in this respect, with most of the greatest men in the world.

“The most common methods by which females attempt the full exercise of that unlimited power which of right belongs to them, is, at a very early period after marriage, to become extremely noisy and abusive, and to make a point of dealing out blame very liberally to their husbands for every action which they commit, whether they are really of the opinion that their conduct has been reprehensible or not. This method is at some times attended by blows. Though a vigorous and persevering course of this treatment may frequently be successful, yet there is considerable danger of resistance from those brutal fellows injudiciously termed men of spirit, a resistance which may be attended with consequences extremely injurious to female countenance. I would strenuously recommend this method be pursued by women, however, with all those effeminate characters who are more afraid of sustaining a drubbing, than eager to vindicate their title to manhood, as would especially advise it to be practiced on the whole tribe of fops or puppies, creatures possessed of no better proofs that they are privileged to rank as men, than that they have two legs and wear breeches.

“Some women pursue a course quite the opposite of this, and with greater success. They at one time load their husbands with caresses, magnify their own affection, and seem to have no other avocation worth their attention but that of convincing them that the sole study of their lives will be to invent fresh blandishments, and to render them in all respects completely happy. At other times, however, they affect a sulkiness of behaviour: a sudden and sullen gloom succeeds their former cheerfulness; they sigh frequently, and burst into floods of tears; nay, they are even seized with swoonings and hysterics.

The wretched husband of such a wife, alarmed at these surprising symptoms, anxiously enquires the cause. She affects to evade the question–he becomes more importunate–she persists in declining to assign a reason–his importunities are redoubled–till he is at last informed, with gentle reproaches and a burst of grief, that he himself is breaking her heart; that the reward of all her love is his neglect, &c. &c. Astonished at a charge which he is wholly unconscious of having merited, he at first endeavours to ridicule what he terms her childish uneasiness. She affects, however, still to doubt–he makes solemn protestations of his innocence; and they are reconciled. In a few days, however, the same farce is played out again, and again, and again, till the unhappy man is at length almost convinced, contrary to the evidence of his own senses, that his conduct has been criminal. Nay, to pacify his afflicted partner, he is even brought to confess his imaginary faults, and to promise amendment in the future. For fear of unintentionally giving offence, he learns to keep a strict watch over his own actions, becomes afraid to take any notice of those of his wife, and is, for the same reason, cautious of contradicting her, lest his cruelty should cause her to > swoon; and, in short, becomes a Member of the Henpecked Society.

> "Though the great object of our Society is to extend the domination of the female sex, it is far from being its intention to obtain that end by such reprehensible or unhappy means. The only worthy Members of the Society are those who have become so, as much by conviction of its utility, as by entertaining a due sense of the superiority of their wives. All such Members, however, have been treated in a manner very different from the preceding. They have (and let every wife endeavour to follow the same plan) been first brought to acknowledge that their wives, by their care and economy, were better adapted than Themselves to manage their concerns; have been satisfied, by their attentive behaviour, that they were well qualified to govern their families; and have been convinced, by their mildness and moderation, that the authority with which they were invested would never be abused. In such a family, resistance will never be attempted. Commands from the one party will be met by prompt obedience from the other. Perpetual harmony will be established; and correction, when necessary, will be submitted to, according to the fundamental rule of the Society, without murmuring and without resistance."[3]

The Good Man's Wife Pacifier

Henpeck'd Club's Peace Box – Patent Cure for a Cross Wife

The good men of the Henpecked Club were responsible for an interesting innovation: an adult-sized rocking cradle, which was used for soothing nagging wives instead of babies. If you look closely you can see curved feet that allowed the cradle to be gently rocked from side-to-side by the dutiful husband.

The 'Peace Box' was invented by a club member named Harry Tap in 1862, and several were manufactured for hire by Henpecked Club members suffering under tempestuous behaviour from wives. If a wife was abusing her husband too much, the husband would entreat his wife to recline in the box, which could be rocked like a child's cot in order to send the wife to sleep. While she was sleeping the husband would perform all the household chores then awaken his wife who would hopefully have calmed down.

With those juicy historical morsels now in the open, we seem to have come full circle, back to the future. Here we remain, with hat in hand, beseeching Dear Woman for forgiveness for having displeased her, hoping that she will notice how hard we are trying to be good men.

You may at this point be feeling nauseous in the knowledge that men have been kowtowing to such abuse for hundreds if not thousands of years, and yet we're still being asked to to Take It Like A Man™, Man Up™, and be Good Men™. If you are feeling that way you are not alone, and with the growing army of men and women in the MHRM you can help bring an end to such appalling gynocentric customs.

Why men can’t say no. A historical perspective

July 9, 2015 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

A note to readers: These are opinion pieces. While there may be empirical support for elements of what I am saying, it won’t be presented here. It’s not an academic paper, just a take it or leave it bit of my opinion. PE

Men are only as mentally and emotionally healthy as their ability to say no to a woman. Actually, that bears repeating. Men are only as mentally and emotionally healthy as their ability to say no to a woman.

Obviously, this does not apply in some areas. Mental health problems won’t be solved by simply finding a woman and uttering the word “no.” Gay men may have a somewhat different perspective about this but they are raised with the same life expectations as straight men so there is no real pass for them either. Quite the contrary.

Still, I will hold to this proposition and do my best to explain it. I can tell a great deal about a man, his boundaries, his values and ultimately his integrity and character with a simple measurement of his obsequiousness with and deference to women.

To understand all this requires a bit of a history lesson, dating back to the twelfth century and the cultural movement driven by Romantic Chivalry.

At precisely that moment in history the warrior code was harnessed to the emerging culture of courtly love, an aristocratic invention that saw the military principles of honor, gallantry and service placed in the service of a new Commanders in Chief – courtly ladies.

As historian Jennifer G. Wollock summarizes, “The idea that love is ennobling and necessary for the education of a knight comes out of the lyrics of this period but also in the romances of knighthood. Here the truest lovers are now the best knights.”[1]

While there is arguable evidence that protection of women and children is a basic male instinct, tied to reproductive access, this is likely the first known time in history where that mandate was codified.

Over a period of a few hundred years, Romantic Chivalry spread to all the principle courts of Europe and found its way more broadly to lives of everyday men and women who coveted the lifestyle of the upper class. It also fostered a great deal of female privilege and the inescapable neoteny that came with it.

So went the first known institutionalization of pressuring men into a tradition of male servitude – or obsequiousness – toward women that continues unchecked today. Yet it was only the first of three foundational events that would become the prevailing model of gender relations; one that negatively impacts men's lives and mental health.

The next developmental watershed in men's deference to women was the Industrial Revolution. While thrusting humanity into modern civilization, it was the next giant step toward normalizing a standard of mental illness in men where it concerned their relationships with women.

Prior to the Industrial Revolution, men largely worked in or near their homes. They worked as artisans, farmers, producers of livestock, tradesman or some other profession that they passed down to their sons through apprenticeship and mentoring. While still driven by the force of Romantic Chivalry, they were as involved in the raising of children as mothers were. Those mothers, by the way, also had laborious duties that were a regular part of their role in the family. With the combined work of both parents and participation of the children, families operated more like business concerns than what you most commonly see today.

Both discipline and nurturing from both parents were immediately present; both male and female influence in the lives of children.

The Industrial Revolution, combined with Romantic Chivalry, accelerated the problem. The mass migration to cities began. Fathers were removed from the home (and the daily lives of their children) to go into factories and work. And of course one of the first products of that revolution was advanced technology in the home, making the lives of women much safer and less arduous. It also created a lot more free time for women, arguably time for them to become fixated on their emotional needs.

The impact of that on family dynamics hit like a tsunami. Women were left to the increasingly softening work of home and children alone, and left in want of adult company. Husbands returning from long, grueling days of labor returned home to be fed and to rest, without the luxury of making up time they had missed with their families.

In this familial void, women quickly turned to their children, particularly male children, to fill their emotional needs. And fathers, consumed by work and duty, largely just enforced the wishes of the mother on the children. This triggered the second wave of privilege and psychological neoteny in western women and where men, due to resentment over their absence, began to be demonized.

All of this greatly increased the likelihood that mothers would form inappropriate bonds with their male children in order to fill the holes in their lives. In other words, we took a step toward a society of emotional incest.

This is difficult to understate. What I am defining here is a culture of emotionally incestuous bonding between mothers and sons. The implications of that are tremendous, and in fact they seem to have been verified by the following 150 years of technological advancement and cultural malaise.

Perhaps it is not coincidental that the onset of the industrial revolution also saw the first formations of what were known to be "Henpecked Husbands" clubs; groups of men who gathered to use peer pressure to induce each other into tolerating more demands and abuse from their wives.

[image]The Industrial Revolution gave birth to a new age in civilization. It also ultimately resulted in the breakdown of the family unit as it was once known. The late nineteenth century rang in the Tender Years Doctrine, and with it the first legal presumption that younger children were better off in the care of mothers than fathers. The steamroller did not stop from there, it accelerated. The same glut of time and resources that spawned women to create an emotionally incestuous culture also produced gender feminism, the last and final of a monumentally powerful triad of events that left the majority of men in seemingly helpless servitude to women.

Barely one and a half centuries from the first American factory being built and our culture is all but dominated by a woman-first mentality. So rote and mindless have men become that they allow single mothers to effortlessly continue the spread of emotional incest and other forms of child abuse.

Our boys enter an education system completely dominated by female teachers, all of whom are a product of the same forces that created the new paradigm.

Society, especially the female dominated realms of home and early education, produces males that are highly, often terminally dependent on female approval. By the time boys get more substantial exposure to males, the pattern is set. Not to mention the fact that the males they are exposed to are as dependent on female approval as those who might otherwise provide mentoring. They too, as beta enforcers, put pressure on boys to participate in the incestuous bond as expressed in the schools.

This puts us squarely in an age of crippled masculine identity and the consequential impotence. We have legions of men who have stood by silently while their families have been destroyed in corrupt courts, where our young men are being driven out of education and into fields of combat and where men are more likely to support and enable these travesties than to object to them.

Their silence is the mental health issue of our time and you can see it reflected most clearly in men's interpersonal relationships with women.

When I co wrote "Say Goodbye to Crazy," a book aimed at women who were dealing with the devastation wrought in their relationships by mentally unstable and abusive ex-wives, a substantial part of the focus was directed at husbands who lacked the ability to stand up to their former partners.

That problem is not contained to the second marriages of a handful of men. It is a sweeping societal problem that affects all men.

If you read my last article about male space, you will know that when I gave men in a treatment setting the task of focusing on themselves vs focusing on the women in that community, the immediate reaction was fear. That fear was proven justified when the men and women, both staff and clients of that facility, reacted in anger to the men putting themselves first for a single weekend.

What was also proven was the dire need for men to overcome overwhelming programming and pressure.

With a catastrophic gender suicide gap and a plethora of other problems affecting men, at the root of it is men's programming to sacrifice their interests, well-being and their boundaries in order to take care of and please women.

They have lost the ability to say no. Indeed they have never had it. They are terrified of the loss implied by the very thought of it. The fact that we have done away with all of our rituals to transition boys into manhood does not help but that will be a topic for a future essay.

Correcting this, reversing the trend, is easier said than done. In fact, it is damned hard work for most, and simply undoable for the many who lack the strength to face and walk through fear on such a primal level. It can, however, be accomplished in stages for the dedicated.

The first stage is Simple Awareness and is by far the easiest. It is just education and can be had as easily as grasping the contents of this writing. When men understand the forces that compel them to please women at any cost, they create the opportunity and motivation to imagine it can be corrected. With that, they can rewrite their future, largely by rewriting their history. More to come on that as well.

The second stage is brutal. There is no other way to put it. It requires men to face the fear of ripping the emotionally incestuous bond; the foundational fear of all men, the fear that most resembles the fear of death. It means putting themselves in the jaws of the beast from which they have to scratch and claw their way out.

Once they have emerged they reach the final and unending stage of walking in the footsteps that were determined by a newly shaped history, sans the Romantic Chivalry, sans the emotional incest and sans the gynocentrism.

I realize that the definitions of these stages are cursory and incomplete. There is much more to them. A more thorough examination is next in this series of essays intended to help men free themselves and their sons from the clutches of a path that was chosen for them in favor of a path that they carve out for themselves.

Why don’t we have stories about women sacrificing themselves for the men they love?

---

Note: This article is also available in Romanian.

Spoilers ahead!

A comment section at my blog, www.judgybitch.com turned into an interesting conversation about women and their capacity to feel love for men the same way men feel love for women.

> Men will go to the battlefield for love, to die for it, to fight and kill other men for it. Its a form of deep desire that women if they can feel that at all will only have this for their own children.

This led to a discussion about cultural narratives – stories, songs, movies, poems – that depict women sacrificing themselves for the men they love. It was rather a short discussion, because we could only come up with one story, and it happens to be a story I absolutely love, and have written about here and here: The Hunger Games. In the Hunger Games, 24 kids between the ages of 12 and 18 are sent into an arena to battle to the death. Last person standing wins the Hunger Games. The heroine of the story, Katniss Everdeen ends up in the Hunger Games with the boy she loves, Peeta Mellark. Peeta is injured and an infection threatens to kills him, so the gamemakers give Katniss the opportunity to retrieve the medicine that will save Peeta’s life, but in doing so, she will face two large teenage boys and a girl who throws knives very, very well. There is a good chance Katniss won’t get the medicine and will be killed instead.

Peeta lapses unconscious and Katniss knows that without the medicine, he will die.

She goes to get the medicine, knowing that she risks the very real possibility of death. She does it to defy the gamemakers, to resist the social structure, to demonstrate to viewers that her essential humanity cannot be destroyed, and because she loves Peeta.

She survives. They both survive. So even the one story I could think of in which a woman dies to protect the man she loves, she doesn’t actually die. In Romeo and Juliet, Juliet takes her life, but not as a sacrifice that will save Romeo. She doesn’t want to live without him. Shakespeare was quite fond of women killing themselves, but I cannot think of a single story in which a female character dies to protect the man she loves. Does this story exist? Can anyone think of a song, story, poem or movie in which a woman gives her life to protect a man she loves from harm?

The inverse, of course, forms the basis of hundreds upon hundreds of stories. Men routinely sacrifice their lives to protect not just women they love, but women they don’t even know. How many war narratives offer ‘protecting women and children at home’ as the primary motivation for men? Men receive the message in hundreds of iterations: Protect women. That is your function. And it is very common to see women willing to protect children with their lives. The famous scene in Aliens sums up the deadly maternal trope: get away from her, you bitch.

The narrative of women, willingly risking and sacrificing their lives to protect men, is absent. That says an enormous amount about our culture, the value we place on men, and the expectations we have of women. If men need an additional reason to say 'no' to women, let it be this: she would not die for you.

The University of California’s microaggressions list

AVFM membership drive

July 10, 2015 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

As has been referenced here on the site recently, AVFM has overhauled its business model with the establishment of AVfM Operations, LLC (and its sibling company, AVfM Education, LLC). Even though it has happened behind the scenes, it is the most significant change the operation has ever undertaken.

For the most part, the difference is clearly positive. We have operated for six years off the generosity of readers, as expressed in our quarterly donation drives. This resulted in great success for AVFM at the expense of three negative consequences. One, it relied a great deal on men who were also the most in need of our advocacy. In other words, the poorest and most disaffected among us.

It also meant that a very small group of supporters were contributing the large donations that were required for our survival. Finally, paying me a personal income for the work I do proved to be a disadvantage to the mission in the long run.

Clearly, an alternative to all of this was needed.

Accordingly, we have switched to a membership driven platform, providing flexibility and affordability to anyone who wants (and is able) to support our mission.

This also puts the onus on the men and women in this community to help spread the weight around a good bit more.

There are perks with membership and more to come. First, all AVFM members who are logged in (see link top right) will not see advertising on the site. Those interested in allowing the ads, thus helping our ad revenue, will be able to do that via options in their user profile.

There are other perks, including my men's mental health podcasts from anearformen.com and access to the complete archives of AVFM Radio, which will be available as we sort out membership benefits in the near future.

AVFM subscribing members will get the benefit of knowing that all membership dues will go directly to the LLC to cover our work, and not to salaried employees or personal expenses.

This model offers flexibility to members as well. For example, if you can't quite stretch to $40 per month but want to support us with more than $20 per month, you might subscribe to both the $20 and $10 options.

You can opt in for as little as $5 per month. Also, one-time donations, which also go to AVfM Education, LLC, are still an option.

There is no commitment beyond one month and you can change the combination of membership levels according to your taste or needs at any time.

Additionally, all content on AVFM will remain free to all visitors. You need not subscribe to read AVFM but by becoming a member you will be playing a vital role in moving this site and our mission forward.

Should you wish to become a part of this membership drive, which will be ongoing from today until July 19, 2015, the first step will be to visit our Membership Center to get started. If you have any trouble creating your account or subsequently signing up for a subscription, first visit the support FAQ (we now have a tech support mechanism) and, if the problem is still not explained, there is a link where you can get help.

Also an important note to current AVFM monthly donors:

If you are already making regular monthly donations to AVFM under the old model, please cancel those now in your PayPal account before going to the Membership Center to join.

On a personal level, this comes with a sigh of relief. AVFM has been built into a platform that can be self-sustaining through memberships. That places the onus squarely on those who believe in our mission to participate. In other words, it's your movement. We will do the work to run AVFM and you can underwrite the significant and growing costs of doing so in a way that is within most readers reach.

I can now move my personal life out of the way and quit relying on the site as personal income while trying to finance activism. I make that statement with a great deal of gratitude for the people who helped put AVFM in a position to make this possible.

With your help, the future is bright for the MHRM. We will continue to make headway, shining the light of truth and reason on the toxic ideologues who are undermining your lives and the lives of your children.

I urge you to become a subscribing member of AVFM today. Please take the next two minutes to play your part in helping us make this critical transition to a more sustainable and effective platform for activism that is changing the cultural dialogue about men, boys and sexual politics.

Thank you.

Launch of A Voice for Male Students 2.0

July 10, 2015 | by Jonathan Taylor | Link | Original Link

I am proud to announce the launch of A Voice for Male Students 2.0, a radical structural and aesthetic overhaul of the world's largest platform dedicated specifically to educational equity for men and boys (see a screenshot of the old website here). There are implications in this change beyond a few pretty bells and whistles, however; we are transitioning from a blogging-oriented model to a service-oriented model, and while we will still be publishing blog posts from site staff and contributors our main focus will now be research, networking, special projects, counselling, and direct action.

Outgrowing our old model

AVFMS website was launched on August 20, 2013 with a focus on blogging about men's and boys' education issues. During the first twenty-two months, however, we occasionally created highly useful resources that went beyond simple blog posts. This includes graphs and charts developed in-house, a scholarships database, a lawsuits database, vast compilation pages (such as "The Language of Misandry in Academia"), a conferences page (which is now a database), and more.

All those were the products of rigorous and meticulous research.

Because these resources were often featured as blog posts they were quickly buried by regular blogging. In addition, since many of them were regularly updated "behind the scenes," expanding them increasingly took up more and more time – something that was also not readily apparent to site visitors.

In addition, because these resources (and the networking and relationship-building with other groups who requested them) grew over time, they collectively became such a big part of the AVFMS pie that it became difficult to justify presenting to the world that blogging was our primary focus.

As our resources grew, so too did the urge to place links and references to them on the front page. In time these references became so numerous that the front page began to appear as one vast smorgasbord, short-circuiting new users' experience by creating a "paradox of choice" whereby visitors had so many choices they did not know which path to take.

Some site visitors, for example, came from more academic backgrounds. They were just interested in education resources and didn't quite know what to make of resources regarding false accusations presented right beside them. And vice versa: visitors interested in due process issues had to sift through other resources they weren't particularly interested in. I have uprooted almost everything on this website and restructured it in a way that solves this problem.

A radical restructuring

The new structure now tailors your path through the site to your background and interests. For example, after either clicking on the "Key Resources" tab at the top or briefly scrolling down you will now be presented with this simple section:[image]

By clicking on an icon you will be taken to a section dedicated to that area of interest. Visitors interested in education issues, for example, can click on the mortarboard hat icon and be taken to this section:

[image]

As you can see, the new site layout not only allows you to more easily focus on your particular section of interest, it now presents our key resources – proportionate to their value and the work that goes into them – in a gallery fashion rather than as just another blog post.

And of course, you can now see all blog posts relevant to your section of interest by clicking on the "blog posts on this topic" button rather than sifting through the blog.

A visual makeover

As you can probably tell, I love "talking shop" about web design. Those who remember the old website layout will remember how "busy" it looked. As you can see, it has undergone a radical makeover. The front page now features evocative high-resolution imagery. This same approach – to make our resources more visually appealing – is suffused throughout the entire website. For example, in addition to presenting a much tighter and cleaner look, I have added over two hundred images to various blog posts, pages, and so forth.

Another example of this makeover is the Mission and Values page. Previously, each of our Nine Values was followed by an average of four paragraphs describing it. It took about thirty-six paragraphs to make it through the page – almost like reading a research paper! This is what it used to look like. Well, now look at it:

Sometimes less really is more.

Mission forward: the blacksmith philosophy, and our return to academia

I am planning on 2016 being a year of great expansion into academia. I plan to do this by first developing three critical resources. By forging these resources we will lay the groundwork to network with various academic groups:

- The Conferences database

- The education research database
- The scholarships database

Each of these databases is ripe for expansion. If you would like to work on them with me be sure to message me.

You may notice our new tagline as well: informing, connecting, empowering. These verbs encapsulate the heart of what we do. As I wrote in a new page describing our philosophy, we have truly become the blacksmiths when it comes to educational equity for men and boys. We do not fight all the local battles, but we are able to fortify and arm advocacy groups across the nation with effective tools to get the job done.

Below are some of the other additions to AVFMS 2.0.

New database: Conferences, Symposia, Workshops, Webinars, etc.

This was previously a simple list containing academic events that – too frequently – did not fit the topic of educational equity for men and boys. Irrelevant events have been pruned, 20+ events have been added, and the list itself has been converted into a database – view it here.

New position open: Conference Coordinator

To facilitate our goals we are currently looking for a Conference Coordinator who possesses good people skills, attention to detail, and believes in this site's mission and values. Along with our education research databases project, the Conferences project will be critical elements of our expansion into academia. Please use the contact form if you are interested in this position.

Many people would like to attend conferences, workshops, webinars, and so forth regarding boys' education issues, but are simply unaware of their existence. Organizations hosting such events are not networked nor synergized with other organizations, complicating logistics and reducing turnout. This isolates advocates and reduces the overall momentum of the advocacy community.

With the help of a Conference Coordinator we will create a solution by maintaining an updated database of events, networking with other groups, and promoting awareness of upcoming events. Here are a few of the Conference Coordinator's roles:

- Network with and maintain good relationships between AVFMS and other organizations
- Update conference database regularly
- Create and maintain email lists to send timely notifications to subscribers of new and upcoming conferences and other events

- Send notice of updates to relevant parties (advocacy organizations, news director to tweet/post on social media)

New posts and pages

Along with the release of AVFMS 2.0 come five new posts and pages, some of which are essential for solidifying our platform. Explore them at your leisure:

- Recruiting / Join Our Organization
- We Are the Blacksmiths (an AVFMS philosophy page)
- Introduction – The Educational Attainment & Well-Being of Men and Boys
- Introduction – Rights & Protections of Men and Boys in Academia
- Recognition & Awards (see bottom of the front page)

Overhauls of old pages

Several key pages below were radically overhauled. If you have never seen the first link, I suggest you do so; you will find a wealth of statistics and resources not just for male students, but for the broader Men's Human Rights Movement.

- The Men's Movement: Background and Core Issues
- Mission and Values
- Education Solutions
- Wrongful Accusations of Sexual Misconduct

Forward

The fall semester is rapidly approaching, and those who stand in our way have shown no desire to slow down yet. But we're just getting warmed up. I'm excited about what lies in store, and I can't wait to share more of my vision for this platform with my friends and fellow advocates.

Why Do People Hate Feminism?

The “War on Drugs” is actually a war on men

July 12, 2015 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

In the years I spent counseling drug addicts and alcoholics I saw some terrible things. In fact, terrible is a weak, inadequate word. I saw human nightmares on a scale that would sicken most people.

There was a mother (with her mother’s help) who made her four year old son available to pedophiles for drug money. There was a young man who burned his parent’s home to the ground in an attempt to cover his robbing them and selling their possessions. There were husbands and wives who sold their children and who became pimp and hooker teams in order to support drug habits.

There were all the brilliant minds gone to waste, careers down the drain, utterly destroyed families and fortunes squandered.

There was death. Lots of death. Parents burying children. Spouses burying spouses. The causes were varied. Suicide, murder, the death of innocents from chemically impaired drivers, heart attacks, strokes, esophageal varices, cirrhosis, overdose, hepatitis, HIV, Wernicke-Korsakoff syndrome, aspirating vomitus and a staggering list of other deadly effects so long that it could fill the contents of this article entirely. All of them were the direct result of alcohol and drug abuse.

You would think, then, that as a person charged with trying to alter the course of so much devastation that I would want to grasp at anything possible to change it. In fact, that is exactly who I did become and who I still am.

It is also why I am vehemently, angrily opposed drug policy that criminalizes the problem, and for the same exact reasons. The so-called War on Drugs is, in fact, a war. Like any other war it leaves death, disfigurement, suffering and grief in its wake.

In Mexico alone, the drug war has already left over 60,000 people dead (just from 2006-2012) and another 27,000 missing. Some estimates put the death toll at over 120,000 by 2013, not counting the missing. USA Today puts the total estimate at 138,000.

Assumedly, at least some of the 27,000 missing can be found in the mass graves scattered throughout Mexico containing the bodies of would-be illegal aliens, those slaughtered by cartels for refusing to smuggle drugs into the United States. Naturally, the preponderance of the bodies are male.

Not a single one of those deaths would have happened if drugs were legal. Nor would drug cartels (outside the pharmaceutical industry) exist. Nor would our prisons be filled to the bursting point with nonviolent drug “offenders,” almost all of whom are men.

As the old saying goes, follow the money. Here is what the War on Drugs is costing, at a rate that increases $500.00 per second.

Let’s take at look at it in real time:

// DrugSense Drug War Clock

Those dollar amounts, in case you are confused, are billions, and most all of those bucks go to feeding massive bureaucracies employing tens of thousands whose livelihood depends on the illegal drug trade. Without the cartels and street gangs they won't have jobs and they know it.

In 2008, the California Correctional Peace Officers Association spent a cool million fighting against a measure that would have reduced sentences and parole times for nonviolent drug offenders while emphasizing drug treatment over prison.

[image]

In fact, republicreport.com, a publication dedicated to exposing political corruption, reports that the top five lobby groups working to continue the cannabis prohibition are police unions, private prison corporations, alcohol and beer companies, pharmaceutical corporations and prison guard unions.

Follow the freaking money, indeed.

Notice that none of the lobby groups are medical or even psychiatric in nature. Those groups, along with assorted human rights organizations are the ones working more vigorously toward ending prohibition.

Alcoholic beverage companies are fine with you being thrown into a dirty cage so they don't have a much less harmful product than theirs competing with them. Same thing with Big Pharm. Cannabis is being found to have substantial medical benefits for some people, despite the federal Schedule I classification of the drug making research funds nearly impossible to acquire. The drug companies don't want you to have drugs available which might cut into the sales of their products, many of which are toxic and/or addictive.

Police and prisons? The handcuffs have to go on people and the steel gray doors have to slam for them to keep going. Who better than nonviolent pot smokers who present much less management problems during arrest and incarceration?

The rivers of blood created by the War on Drugs are also polluted with the most noxious forms of political slime.

Allow me to share a final note about drug abuse. Again, I say this as someone who is no stranger to its ill effects, professionally speaking. People are going to use recreational drugs. There is nothing you can do to stop it.

Well, there is something. Maoist China all but obliterated drug abuse by obliterating drug abusers via a bullet to the back of the head. With the open door policy of the 1980s, the drugs returned. China has gone back to waves of executions, but this time it is only the dealers. So, the drugs will remain.

Given that we are not yet a culture so fearful of recreational drug use that we are going into a mode of slaughtering (which would require us to execute the last four US presidents), drugs will be a permanent part of the social landscape.

The question isn't whether we can end drug abuse. It is clear we can't. The question is what is the best form of damage control? Tens of thousands of dead people, millions of men languishing in prisons and billions of wasted dollars, all of which have not slowed drug abuse in any measurable way, is the fool's solution.

And it is the misandrist's solution.

This is a war waged against men, primarily but not near exclusively minority men. It is a corrupt, destructive approach dependent on human ignorance and the false piety of sanctimonious, cocktail sipping a-holes who prefer dead bodies and destroyed civil rights to the idea of someone getting high on something other than their drug of choice.

In that spirit, it is an issue that will be addressed more frequently at A Voice for Men. In fact, I am somewhat embarrassed that we have neglected it for so long.

Better late than never, as they say.

Bill and Jared: A Tale of Two Men

July 12, 2015 | by B.R. Merrick | Link | Original Link

It was the worst of times, it was the worst of times, it was the age of foolishness, it was the age of foolishness, it was the epoch of incredulity, it was the epoch of incredulity, it was the season of Darkness, it was the season of Darkness, it was the spring of despair, it was the winter of despair, we had nothing before us, we had nothing before us, we were all going direct the other way… Yes, I'm a plagiarist, with a twist. And no, my name's not Oliver, nor would I like some more.

What do you do when you've written an article defending a serial rapist? Do you cower off into the wilderness, shrugging off all of humanity? Do you jump on with the zeitgeist and denounce the man you once defended? Do you parse words and engage in semantics like a run-of-the-mill politician in order to save face, as if the article was all about you? Do you get condescending and explain things plainly to plain people growing plainer by the day due to a decreasing amount of critical thinking skills in society at large?

No, I think it's best if you do what I'm doing now, which is to reify the reality of the situation. Bill Cosby, like Bill Clinton, is an innocent man until proven guilty. Neither man accused of rape has been proven a rapist. Both men have been, I suspect, and as I suspected when I wrote the first article defending the former, horndogs for women. I also suppose that both men were especially horndogs for women during the decade when men were suddenly free to be horndogs for women, thanks largely to Quaaludes.

How does a Mormon boy know about Quaaludes? Easy. Government schooling. I sang that song about cocaine that all the kids had heard in the 70s. Some future-hippy chick brought her guitar to our elementary school and got us all singing along in the schoolyard. All I knew was that cocaine and 'ludes (as they were called) were friggin' awesome and frickin' funny. We innocents were drug free but exposed to a drug-laden culture. That's all any of us knew.

In the present epoch, an admission of buying and using Quaaludes for sex is all the proof our man-hating culture needs to convict and ruin what's left of the life of America's Dad. Quaaludes are no longer a schoolyard joke, a once-legal drug that was made illegal when people started enjoying it too much; now Quaaludes are one thing and one thing only: a date-rape drug that rapists use to rape.

What the ongoing witch hunt doesn't want people to remember is that Quaaludes were popular with regular people back in the day for multiple reasons, one of which was sex. How popular? Well, remember my pledge to eternal doofosity when I tell you that I planned on spending however many hours it would take to research online and get concrete proof for the incredulous, when I happened to stumble on another doofus's remarkable video. Doofus Law Section 4.4.33-9 paragraph 8 (dog-eared for ease of reference, and mind the dried chocolate cake over the word "opportune") states quite clearly that when another doofus has made the point, the point is made, man:

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=wBe13StTKaM

Ha ha ha ha ha ha ha ha ha ha ha ha ha ha. …Sorry. Back to the point.

Need more proof of what Quaaludes actually meant to flower children of the 70s? I didn't think so. Apparently, when you ejaculate while high on Quaaludes, you feel like you're on the moon. One giant leap for mankind, indeed.

Unfortunately, if you're a moral leader, admitting to being a pill-popping pussy hound makes you a hypocrite. I imagine it is also humiliating. What if you're a moral leader who remembers his horndog days with a tinge of regret? What if you took care of all of this in private with your long-suffering wife years ago? What if you indulged in parties at the Playboy Mansion and grew tired of it after a while because it was way too easy? What if in the midst of it all you discovered the love of Christ and repented?

Yet another Bill suffered the same fate. One Bill Bennett, the author of The Book of Virtues was outed to millions as being a gambler. The most embarrassing part of the revelations that I read about concerning Bennett was that they didn't reveal a man going to the blackjack or craps tables, rubbing elbows with the guy sitting next to him; he was revealed to be just like those weird little old ladies you see in casinos each spending hours at one machine talking to no one, merely hitting the button as many times as their frail wrists can handle per second. He wasn't just guilty of gambling, a no-no in our leftover Puritanical culture; he was guilty of the lonesome, can't-help-himself sort of gambling, where his brain got an increasingly mild rush from clinking sounds and the occasional payout. It lends itself to the idea that he really didn't want anyone else knowing about it. Neither of the latter Bills ever fully recovered his reputation from the revelations concerning his embarrassing private behavior, and neither will Cosby.

I wonder if Jared Fogle will recover his. You know the dude, that geeky-looking but determined individual who showed the world that you can lose the weight if you eat at Subway. He's just had his home raided by the FBI who were looking for child pornography. Why are they doing so? Because apparently someone who worked with Fogle and to whom he was close was someone who peddled the stuff, and Fogle was once in his truck. (Perhaps the truck is made of Quaaludes?)

It doesn't seem to matter that when he found out about his friend's involvement with child pornography, Fogle disassociated himself from his former friend. It also doesn't seem to matter that raids are performed on a regular basis that ultimately mean nothing. Everyone seems to forget that these sorts of embarrassing things are frequently the sorts of activities in which some government types participate merely for show.

We all know Fogle thanks to Subway. He's a millionaire thanks to Subway. But because his home was raided and he associated with someone who indulged in child pornography, a mega-corporation (that I will never frequent again) publicly disassociates itself from Fogle, leaving him with his lonely millions and his long-suffering wife. Now, even if he's found innocent, and thanks in part to Subway, the word "pervert" will trick neurons in every brain that bothers to be bothered by misandrist mass media whenever his name is mentioned.

So what does an online writer do when the culture lynches yet another black guy? What's a boy to do when he stands by a white man whose home is raided by men with guns looking for perversion? Doofus Law Section 2A (you try navigating this damn book) states quite clearly that you should remind people that the former article and the present article are based on a principle that shines like a light in the darkness of human turmoil; an idea that, in the context of mankind's intellectual evolution, illuminates the depths of every prison where innocent men have suffered immeasurably through the annals of civilization; a profundity on philosophical par with the abolitionist movement, The Enlightenment, The Industrial Revolution, The Age of Information, and the men's movement: innocent until proven guilty.

I don't say that these men are innocent because I know them. I certainly don't say it because I'm omniscient. Their private lives haven't been recorded, so truth-seekers everywhere are left with yet another uncomfortable truth: we cannot know and cannot tell. That is the meaning of innocence in that enlightened phrase. It is keenly tied to another wonderful idea that most people prize quite highly: privacy.

It is also sadly based on some discomforting knowledge that all humans share: that people lie. We lie for all sorts of stupid reasons. We lie out of fear. We lie to get gain. According to the book excerpt in this article, 1 in 25 of us is a sociopath, which, if true, makes many of us sadistic and opportunistic liars. We rationalize our lies. We sometimes cringe at our lies. Those of us who are not sociopaths can get ground down by our lying. Uncomfortable Truth No. 273 is that we cannot always tell when we're being lied to. I've had honest-looking cops, judges, and car salesmen lie to me. I've had intimates lie to me. Hell, I've told a few.

So why do we bother? Jeez, that's a question for the ages. I think when you answer that question you achieve Nirvana or something. Until then, practical philosophers like Thomas Jefferson remind us that the notion of remaining innocent until the accuser proves the accusation is sacrosanct. It does not mean that we write off the accuser as a liar until proof is manifest; it means we don't know what we want to know and may never know. That means more emotional pain and mental suffering for us all.

I know what I don't want, and it causes me pain. I don't want the star of a show that I loved to be a rapist. I also don't want these women to by lying or gravely mistaken in their retrospection, like the heroine of that wonderful story A Passage to India. Unfortunately, only one side of this public trial is right, and none of us knows.

That is why, like Whoopi Goldberg and Raven Simone, I stand by the accused, the same as why I stood by Anthony Weiner. As I pointed out in the article I wrote years ago about him, I don't even like him. However, in standing by Cosby and Weiner I am standing by men in general, and against the disgusting rush to judgement, which will remain a pockmark on our culture even if Cosby turns out to be a serial rapist and Fogle a consumer of kiddie porn.

Nevertheless, if one or the other is guilty, you can expect the culture to do the superior dance of the victorious, even if it means disregarding the feelings of the victims, as they have done repeatedly right in front of Roman Polanski's victim. Think about the nauseating debate over global warming. Or is it climate change? It depends on whether you're blaming it for a blizzard or a tornado. In other words, it depends on your emotions. No one stops to think that if we have global warming/climate change, and if we have it because we're pumping out too much carbon monoxide and dioxide, then global-climate-warming-change is also responsible for every single nice day we have. We hate the alleged phenomenon when Hurricane Sandy hits. We ignore it when the majority of days pass without deadly hurricanes. In short, we treat the idea the way we treat men.

As I've said in yet another previous article, we are governed almost entirely by our emotions. The emotionally-charged, politically-motivated thinkers that normally foment public witch hunts are not counting on your intellect. They want your viscera. Innocent until proven guilty, when you're a woman who actually was raped and you can provide no evidence, sounds cold and cruel. A sanguine white knight, perhaps one like this Louisiana prosecutor who wants to kill more people, is just what you want. When you know a truth no one else knows and it hurts, how nice it would be to dispense with a principle that you want only when you or someone about whom you care have been falsely accused.

In a fit of passion, John Adams, the second president of America, passed the Alien and Sedition Acts. Freedom, to Adams, was a fine thing for him when he had had enough of a Parliament thousands of miles across a treacherous ocean telling him what to do. Once he was in power, he did the very same thing. Jefferson came along and undid that doing.

Such a veto must have hurt Adams's feelings. Whose emotions were more legitimate? We now have plenty of aliens living among us, and plenty of sedition; yet peaceful living goes on, with plenty of pleasant, sunny days. Jefferson and Adams remained friends for life and died on the same day, the 50th anniversary of their signing their names in virtual blood to a document that fed a cold, cruel reality to a King whose feelings were hurt by their words: Your Majesty, there are certain things you simply don't do. One of these things is, or at least ought to be, leaving a man alone until there is evidence that numerous accusers have truly been wronged by him. Then Adams and Jefferson bound up their friendship, fought a war, and won.

How far we've devolved since then. In the movie version of A Passage to India, one Mr. Fielding stands by the falsely accused in flagrant and unashamed opposition to a community who rally behind the accuser. Against their ire and in the comfort of their race-segregated club, he proudly announces: "I shall await the verdict of the court. If he is found guilty, I shall resign from the college and leave India. I resign from the club now." Almost as inspiring as Dickens: It was the suckiest of times, it was the suckiest of times…

Update: U.S. Army Major “Kit” Martin case. NCFM efforts prompt DoD investigation.

July 13, 2015 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

As AVFM reported here on April 28th, the National Coalition for Men; after a lengthy investigation filed a 19 page complaint with U.S. Defense Secretary Ash Carter, the Department of Defense Office of Inspector General and several others on behalf of U.S. Army Major Christian “Kit” Martin. The complaint stems from the persecution of Major Martin for a variety of sex related offenses that arose from a highly contentious divorce proceeding.

AVFM has learned that a number of developments have rapidly occurred.

Major Christian “Kit” Martin
As a result of the advocacy efforts conducted by NCFM, the Department of Defense, Office of Inspector General has officially opened a whistleblower investigation of Fort Campbell Kentucky’s handling of his courts-martial; rather their mishandling of his courts-martial. There may be other entities within DOD IG or other governmental entities that may have initiated inquiries that we have not yet been made aware.

We are also aware that this deplorable persecution has been brought to the attention of Congressman Duncan Hunter (R) California, a member of the House Armed Services Committee.

Secondly, Major “Kit” Martin has retained a new, civilian and military criminal defense team. Attorney and NCFM Advisor William L. Summers and Attorney R. Tucker Richardson III, in addition to new Army JAG Defense Counsel Captain John Shutt from Fort Knox Kentucky.

[image]
William L. Summers
Mr. Summers has been practicing law since 1969 and is considered one of the preeminent military criminal defense attorneys in the nation. You can go to Mr. Summer’s website and see his vast list of accomplishments which are too many to list here.

Mr. Richardson was elected in 2015 to the prestigious American Board of Criminal Lawyers. His website also has a lengthy list of accomplishments.

As in any criminal defense case, where there appears to be overreach and a capitulation to the military sex assault lynch mob, a strong and competent criminal defense team is essential.

[image]
R. Tucker Richardson III
Additionally, some very troubling and revealing information was discovered during the investigation of Major Martin’s case which should cause alarm to every man in the military. Some serious ethical and procedural issues were discovered that involved one of Fort Campbell's JAG prosecutors in this case. As a result an official complaint to the Commonwealth of Kentucky State Bar has been filed against her by Major Martin and his defense team.

Still yet was a Facebook post that Major Schlack-White sent to Senator Kristen Gillibrand (D) New York, who has been one of the loudest voices calling for all types of major "reform" in the way that the military and college campuses handle allegations of sexual assault.

[image]

As you can see, a female Army JAG attorney echo's many opinions that AVFM, NFCM and other organizations have been saying for a number of years — that the military is more divisive by gender than it ever has been in its entire 240 year history. Also, Major Schlack-White states that her colleagues refuse to have closed door meetings with her, presumably on cases they are working for fear of being falsely accused.

As we are all painfully aware, Senator Gillibrand seems to be impervious to facts and foolishly champions false rape accusers. If you recall, Gillibrand invited as a special guest to the State of the Union Address; Columbia Universities' infamous false accuser Emma Sulkowicz, otherwise known as "mattress girl."

Perhaps Gillibrand should have championed an actual victim in which an actual rape actually occurred but we are now in the fantasy rape twilight zone in which rapists are lurking around every corner and bush on college campuses, and behind every tank and in the depths of every aircraft carrier in the military. Every rape accusation is accepted as fact, even when proven false. Gillibrand has been heard in social, print, and television media stating that "mattress girl" did not receive justice at Columbia. I agree, Sulkowicz should have been expelled from Columbia and should be carrying around a jail mattress instead of a college one.

She should be in an orange jumpsuit instead of making porn vids about her confabulated rape.

AVFM, NCFM, and many other similar organizations have been speaking to for years to the biased ferocity prosecuting alleged sexual assault offenses in the military. While we are all in agreement with the aggressive prosecution of actual sexual assault violators, this zeal to send cases to courts-martial when evidence is lacking is a legal and ethical travesty. Many claims are proven unfounded, or, as in the case of Major Martin, proven false by civilian authorities. Still, the disturbing trend continues. The politically motivated push is to convict by any means necessary.

Today, it is guilty until "proven" guilty. If you are given the opportunity to prove your innocence you are still guilty. The military and college campuses want the accused's heads on a platter, due process be damned. The feminist trained and brainwashed idoeological zealots feel that an unproven and unverified accusation is sufficient for mob rule, their mob, and hanging tree. College honor tribunals and indeed now the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ) are no longer protection from the mob, they are part of it.

This political climate is truly reminiscent of the Salem Witch Trials of 1692 to 1693.

The severed heads that colleges and the Pentagon wants are nothing but photo ops that they can hold up for public view, much like ISIS is doing with bloodied, severed heads in the Middle East. “Look, see! We got one!” Fodder for the rabid, mindless followers of their corrupted theology.

Contrary to the wishes of some zealots, the eradication of the presumption of innocence; the ability to face and cross-examine your accuser; to eliminate constitutional and due process protections only in sexual assault cases, to allow for and present a defense still exist. In the military today, however, the Top Brass, whose noses have tarnished to brown, are seeking to destroy it all. For them, due process for the men who risk life and limb under their command, is a nuissance to be dispensed with for the sake of their bloated, corrupt careers. The military is going to rid its ranks of railroaded “rapists,” even if it means destroying innocent thousands and turning Ft. Leavenworth into a cottage industry.

It is no longer a dirty little secret (though it is still dirty) that the military sends virtually any allegation; regardless of the veracity, of domestic violence, sexual harassment or assault to a courts-martial or other sanction to demonstrate that the military is doing something about the manufactured domestic and sexual assault epidemic in the military.

The cowardly kowtowing of military commanders to extremely loud special interest groups and the likes of disingenuous politicians like Gillibrand and Claire McCaskill (D) Missouri, mean any allegation, absent probable cause and credible evidence, now go to a courts-martial or other sanction.

Collectively, our US Military Officers, have discarded their honor and defiled their oaths of service, which swears them to protect and defend the Constitution of the United States, not to protect their own and anyone elses careers. These officers, whether by action or omission, have become a shameful disgrace to the very uniforms they wear.

Major Jenny Schlack-White is a noble exception. Most remaining officers are ones who should now be filling the steel gray cages at Leavenworth for betraying those under their command.

Major Schlack-White comments that given the current state of distrust now established that her male colleagues refuse to have closed-door discussions on cases with her for the risk of being accused of some type of sexual harassment or assault. That is no different than in any other work setting in the military.

Military males have been complaining for several years in various online military forums that they fear and avoid being alone with any female military member in a job setting. The complaints in the forums are not sent up the chain-of-command for a reason. An officer who makes waves is an officer without a future. Again, the implication of cowardice is glaring.

I recall a young Captain when I served telling me, “Trust all officers. They are all honest.” Maybe there was a time that was close to true. If so, it is long gone.

The military has never been divided by gender so much as it is today. It is a toxic and hostile work environment for men. Many military males complain that they fear that any unfounded and unverified allegation of domestic violence, sexual harassment or assault will result in their removal from service, a possible courts-martial, or possibly a jail term. As a result, scores of highly trained and dedicated military men are leaving the service rather than make it a career. Who can blame them?

Ask any military male you know and you will hear that the current “man-bad woman good lynch mob mentality” and the constant hammering via SHARP briefings that military males are rapists and abusers in waiting and that they must be retrained and re-educated to not abuse or rape; that they are having a serious negative effect on morale and undermine the overall military mission.

All of this coming from officers who have betrayed their oaths, who are hurting morale and undermining the overall military mission. The hypocrisy in this is nauseating and despicable.

Sexual assault and harassment signs, pamphlets and brochures litter military instillations like graffiti in Times Square on New Year’s Eve and are plastered on the front pages of every military instillation’s website.

There is a glutinous level of sexual assault and harassment awareness; an awareness times infinity on steroids. The sexual assault epidemic in the military; just like the 1 in 5 on college campuses has been debunked so many times that we could post an article that would make War and Peace look like a Tweet.

As a result of this delusional hysteria and the ferocious quest to punish any male for any allegation is something that many simply can’t get their head around unless they or those close to them are directly affected.

Hopefully, the tide is turning. Responsible legal scholars and common sense journalists who opine based on logic and the Constitution are starting to raise their voices.

AVFM is confident that the retention of Major Martin’s new legal team will have a significant impact on his case and that other military males in similar situations will be helped by this as well.

When further developments occur we will bring them to you here.

Why gay men don’t need feminism – Part 1 challenging assumptions

Introduction

‘Why Gay Men Don’t Need Feminism’ is a four-part series of articles adapted from a speech that was intended to be presented at the Second International Conference on Men’s Issues in 2015 by the author, Matthew Lye (a.k.a. Andy Bob). The four parts are:
Part 1: Challenging Assumptions
Part 2: The Takeover
Part 3: Gay Bashing
Part 4: Brotherhood
As these articles are written from the perspective of a Men’s Human Rights Activist (MHRA), they focus on the dysfunctional relationship between feminism and gay men. Feminism has had an entirely different relationship with lesbians which is irrelevant to this topic, and has been examined in detail elsewhere.

Why Gay Men Don’t Need Feminism – Part 1: Challenging Assumptions

Gloria Steinem

In April, 2012, Gloria Steinem repeated one of modern feminism’s most durable and self-serving myths when she reaffirmed the unity between feminism and gay rights. She claimed that they were “completely the same thing”.[1] Predictably, no prominent media pundit publicly contradicted her. This is due in part to the fact that St Gloria is a feminist, which means she gets a pass from the mainstream media to spew whatever offensive nonsense pops into her head without it ever being challenged, and partly because no-one is entirely sure if she’s still chummy with the CIA. However, the main reason is that feminists like her have succeeded wildly in hoodwinking people who ought to know better – including hordes of gullible gay men – that it's true.

To be fair, Steinem called it 'women's rights', but she meant 'feminism', in the same way that feminists refer to something called 'the patriarchy' when they're really just talking about 'men'. It's always amusing how often feminists think they're fooling anyone by conflating these terms whenever it suits them. Like many gay men, my response to Steinem's baseless assumption that feminism and gay rights are completely the same thing is: "Not so fast, Gloria".

While there is a large number of gay people, often involved in LGBT activism, who – through a combination of fear, political convenience or just plain old ignorance – are content to huddle obediently on the coattails of feminism as it stomps its destructive path through our social, political, legal, educational and media institutions, there is also a significant number gay men who are under no illusions about the true nature of feminism and are outraged that their own rights movement is so closely, consistently and publicly associated with it.

One of the many gay men who weren't buying what Steinem was selling had this to say in the comments section of the website that conducted the original interview:

"Women have had equal rights for years. Modern day feminists are seeking female supremacy. It's really quite disgusting that an allegedly gay-oriented site would compare a legitimate civil rights movement to the nonsensical, insane ideology that is feminism. They're not the same thing, not in any sense. Feminists are some of the worst enemies gay men will ever encounter."[1]

To be completely blunt, it never fails to astound me whenever I come across any man, regardless of their sexual orientation, who doesn't know that feminists, to put it mildly, really don't like them. This is an ideology that has spent many decades loudly and aggressively blaming men for every single problem the world has ever known. It has demonized all non-approved manifestations of natural masculinity as inherently toxic aberrations that need to be either corrected, eliminated or punished.

It has pathologised male sexuality to the extent that all sexual activity involving men is interpreted as some form of violent sexual abuse – leading some prominent feminists to conclude that sex between consenting male adults is a re-enactment of heterosexual rape.[2] The absurdly perverse view that all intimate relations involving men is an expression of so-called rape culture is so tightly woven through feminist ideology, that feminists have succeeded in convincing governments to fund nation-wide campaigns and compulsory seminars and workshops in educational institutions, the military and the workplace in order to teach men and boys not to rape.

Whether or not governments really believe that men and boys won't realize that rape is wrong unless some Gender Studies graduate tells them so, or are simply hoping to avoid being branded misogynists for not giving in to the increasingly outrageous demands of feminist lobbyists, academics and media pundits, is ultimately irrelevant. What is relevant is the fact that governments have no place colluding with feminists to promote the assumption of the inherent criminality, violence and sexual deviancy of half of their constituents, and their sons. It is an open and direct assault on the dignity of men and boys that serves absolutely no purpose other than to validate feminist threat narratives and impose them on to the whole of society.

Feminists believe that men and boys are naturally evil, and our governing institutions agree with them – so, apparently, does LGBT, because allying with feminism can only mean that they support this kind of hateful, anti-male propaganda. Perhaps they see it as anti-straight male propaganda, which somehow makes it OK. If that's the case, then LGBT has forfeited whatever credibility it may have had to lecture anybody about the sins of bigotry, prejudice and discrimination.

The goals of feminism and the gay rights movement may look identical to Gloria Steinem, but to keen observers of what feminists actually say and do – as opposed to the thumbnail definition in whatever dictionary they insist on waving in the faces of unbelievers[3] – their goals and interests could not possibly be more diametrically opposed. One would have thought that the fact that feminists loathe men to the point where they will stand back in silence whenever one of their own suggests, culling, exterminating or genetically modifying the male population in order to solve what they call 'the man problem' would have alerted gay men who identify as feminists to the fact that feminist ideology is not their friend.[4]

As LGBT's continued public support of feminism proves, gay men can be as clueless about the true nature of feminism as anyone else, and feminists like Gloria Steinem are only happy to ensure that they stay that way in order to exploit the political benefits of their allegiance.[5]

Feminism has been relentless in promoting false and misleading assumptions about the MHRM. Many may wonder why they are not referred to here as accusations rather than assumptions. While they are usually asserted in the unmistakable tone of accusation, they are invariably based on assumptions which are sometimes genuine, but are usually fabricated. Apart from Steinem's glib assumption that feminism and gay rights are the same thing, there are three other significant assumptions about the MHRM that are particularly relevant to the topic of Why Gay Men Don't Need Feminism, and need to be addressed before moving on to examine how feminism bullied gay men into an alliance with man-hating bigots who openly despise them.

Assumption One: The MHRM ignores issues relevant to gay men

It must be understood that the author of this series of articles does not represent the Gay Division of the Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM) for the simple reason that there isn't one. Nor is there a Ladies' Auxiliary Committee full of Honey Badgers tenaciously organizing bake sales to raise money to help fund The Patriarchy's evil plan to restore its privileges, silence women and promote rape culture.[6]

The MHRM doesn't have a Gay Division, or a Non-white Division, an Other-abled Division or, mercifully, a Feminist Division. This is because the MHRM is not about division. It is about unity – unity among men, and the women who love them, to address issues that impact the rights and welfare of men and boys, regardless of their race, religion, ethnicity, ability, political affiliations or sexual orientation.[7]

This is not to say that the MHRM doesn't recognize the fact that many men and women experience adversity, particularly in the form of political and social discrimination, as a result of their various identities, it is simply that there are already well-established, well-organized and well-funded advocacy groups dedicated to addressing issues specific to those identities.

The MHRM has a well-documented history of wishing these groups well in their pursuit of their goals, providing of course, that those goals are geared towards fighting genuine injustice, and that they do not engage in promoting dishonesty or bigotry, or endorse bullying, censorship or violence in order to achieve them. With such limited resources, organizations like A Voice for Men, cannot offer much in the way of meaningful assistance to these already well-funded groups. This is the principal reason why A Voice for Men limits its focus to those issues which can impact the lives of all men and boys.

In many ways, this is a relief, and something of a blessing. Leaving these various identities at the door, so to speak, enables MHRAs to completely side-step the utterly pointless and indulgent game of comparing what feminists call 'points of intersectionality'. The number of points you manage to accrue establishes your victim-cred and determines where you sit in the Hierarchy of Oppression, and who gets to have the loudest voice.[8] White, middle-class, able-bodied women feminists obviously cheat when playing this game as they invariably hog the top rung of this hierarchy every time they play. Then again, it's their game, so they believe that they get to make the rules as much as they believe that they get to create and control the narratives regarding all issues.

The MHRM is not interested in playing feminist games involving identity politics which achieve nothing and create division and suspicion where there should be agreement and resolve. The MHRM encourages open and honest discussion which has inevitably resulted in the debunking of false feminist narratives and conclusively invalidated their most hitherto reliable myths, tropes and memes.

I participate in the MHRM, not as a gay man, but as a person, with a deep conviction that men and boys matter as much as everybody else. As such, I have always been accepted in this movement as a man who is concerned that men and boys are confronting urgent issues that deserve to be addressed honestly and openly, without being constantly derailed, marginalized, ridiculed, demonized and misrepresented by feminists and their enablers.

The sexual orientation of MHRAs, like their sex, race, religion and ethnicity is ultimately irrelevant to the credibility of their perspectives. Being gay does not give a MHRA any special insight into the devastating impact that feminism has wrought onto the gay rights movement. Anyone who can read and conduct research can reach similar conclusions to mine. Being gay simply makes this particular issue more personal – nothing more. The fact that feminists have gained such complete control over the political wing of the gay rights movement – and uses organizations like LGBT to attack its ideological opponents, like the MHRM – makes it an issue worth addressing.[9]

Assumption Two: MHRAs believes that feminism created men's problems

This ridiculous, and frequently-touted, assumption is typical of how feminists try to cope with being called on their bigotry, hypocrisy and deceit: they attempt to cover up their obvious lies with more lies that are even more unfounded and absurd.[10] No MHRA has ever blamed feminism for creating the issues addressed by the MHRM because that would be as foolish and impossible to support as believing in the existence of the so-called patriarchy.

Domestic violence, workplace deaths, suicide, homelessness, anti-father bias in family courts, genital integrity, chivalry justice, the assumption of male disposability, indifference to male pain and lack of reproductive rights were around long before feminism reared its ugly head to claim a monopoly on the public discourse on addressing these issues – and by addressing these issues, I really mean ignoring, marginalizing, minimizing and ridiculing them, as well as the men and boys whose lives they affect.

Feminists have certainly exacerbated these problems by lobbying for anti-male legislation and social policy, and by promoting a social and political climate so hostile to men and boys that the idea of addressing our issues honestly, compassionately and effectively is widely dismissed, thus ensuring that society now cares less about men and boys than it ever did. However, feminists did not actually create the issues themselves.[11] Feminists will continue to make this claim because they know that the mainstream media will continue to report it without bothering to find out whether or not it's actually true.[12]

I don't know what they teach in journalism courses these days, but it obviously doesn't include instructions on how to use Google, send emails or make the necessary phone calls to discover what MHRAs do, or do not, believe.

Assumption Three: MHRAs don't understand feminism

This is one of feminism's most condescending assumptions about MHRAs and it deserves to be vigorously challenged. Feminists never tire of claiming that feminism is not a monolith. We are constantly reassured that not all feminists are like that – NAFALT for short. Apparently, only radical separatist feminists hate men. The rest of them care about men and have, in fact, always been working tirelessly on our issues.

Some feminists even claim to have male family members and friends that they care about, despite them being cis-gendered patriarchs wallowing in male privilege they are too ignorant to check. Anyone who identifies as a feminist accepts both the existence of 'the patriarchy' and the idea that we live in a 'rape culture' – and are convinced that even their most beloved male relatives and friends collude in it, however unwittingly.

In other words, feminist believe that men are toxic beasts who have oppressed all women throughout all history and need to be taught not to rape. This caricature of reality is so foundational to feminist ideology that rejecting it would be akin to a self-identified Christian rejecting the divinity of Jesus Christ. Many feminists struggle to reconcile the anti-male bigotry inherent in their chosen ideology's dogma with their own personal relationships with the men in their lives, but that's their problem, not ours. Unless a feminist has actively engaged in publicly refuting the anti-male bigotry of feminist ideology, then they have no right to claim that they are not 'like that'.

Only a few feminists have earned the right to make the claim that they are not 'like that', and they deserve to be mentioned. These feminists, all women, embody the egalitarian principles that NAFALTs like to pretend they possess. Their innate integrity has never allowed these women to step away from the truth, but to speak to it boldly and eloquently, often at great personal and professional cost. Their rarity proves the rule about the monolithic nature of feminism.

The late, Karen DeCrow, friend and colleague of renowned MHRA, Dr. Warren Farrell, was an avid supporter of shared parenting. This former president of The National Organization for Women declared, "I've become a persona non grata because I've always been in favor of joint custody."[13] Consider how much independence of thought, genuine belief in equality and raw courage it must have taken for the president of N.O.W. to make the following statement about male reproductive rights:

"Justice therefore dictates that if a woman makes a unilateral decision to bring pregnancy to term, and the biological father does not, and cannot, share in this decision, he should not be liable for 21 years of support. Or, put another way, autonomous women making independent decisions about their lives should not expect men to finance their choice."[14]

Dr Warren Farrell eulogized his friend with these words: "With Karen's death passes a feminist who, were her leadership allowed to be the guiding light, would have allowed millions of children to have a dad to guide and love them."[15] Unfortunately for those children and their fathers, feminism could never be sustained under wise and benevolent leadership – it would be disbanded. Karen DeCrow was marginalized within the feminist movement because her egalitarian instincts were at odds with its misandric dogma. She stood by her instincts until the end of her life, ensuring that her memory will be always be honoured by those who share them.

Christina Hoff Sommers identifies as a feminist in the belief that feminism could be miraculously redeemed if feminists developed self-awareness and stopped hating men and boys. This demonstrates a kind of pie-eyed optimism that is oddly endearing. I say "oddly" because one would have thought that the author of The War on Men and Boys and Who Stole Feminism?, which are both intensively-researched studies of feminist corruption and its devastating impact, would have known better than anyone just how far feminism is from the possibility of redemption.

Christina Hoff Sommers has made the following observations: "We must have moral education in the schools, anti-bullying programs, but this does not mean programs to feminize boys."[16] She also stated: "I'm concerned that boys have become politically incorrect, that we are a society in the process of turning against its male children."[16]

Sommers blames feminism for undermining the rights and welfare of boys, which explains the vitriolic response she receives whenever she accepts speaking engagements at universities to share her concerns about these destructive developments.[17] Few people have defended the dignity of boys more passionately than Christina Hoff Sommers.

No summary of feminists who aren't 'like that' would be complete without including the fearless Camille Paglia. This brilliant woman has never hesitated to employ her robust wit to give feminists and their kin the kind of verbal spanking they deserve. I wonder how many trigger-prone feminists had to be bundled into hug boxes[18] when she made this comment: "Let's get rid of Infirmary Feminism, with its bedlam of bellyachers, anorexics, bulimics, depressives, rape victims, and incest survivors. Feminism has become a catch-all vegetable drawer where bunches of clingy sob sisters can store their moldy neuroses."[19]

Anyone familiar with the self-infatuated hypochondriacs who enjoy flaunting their endless array of physical and psychological ailments with total strangers on feminist websites like We Hunted the Mammoth will require no further explanation.[20]

Paglia challenges some of feminism's most cherished myths, like the one about male sexuality being a weapon used to oppress women: "Men are run ragged by female sexuality all their lives. From the beginning of his life, to the end, no man ever fully commands any woman. It's an illusion. Men are pussy whipped. And they know it.[19] Paglia usually puts 'patriarchal society' in scare quotes, which indicates that we should probably put 'feminist' in scare quotes when describing this admirable woman.

Feminists like to assert that MHRAs discuss feminism as a monolith due to our ignorance about feminism, whereas the truth is that MHRAs usually know more about feminism than most people who identify as feminists. It is important to celebrate these very rare feminists who really aren't 'like that' in order to emphasize the glaring differences between these genuine egalitarians and the rest of the individuals involved in the feminist movement – a movement which is failing more miserably than ever to disguise its vehemently anti-male premises and precepts behind predictably disingenuous sham rhetoric about equality.

How on earth did such a deeply misandric ideology like feminism manage to glob onto a human rights movement as heavily populated with men as the gay rights movement – and why have so many gay men not only tolerated this, but continue to avidly supported it? In order to examine these questions, it is necessary to pinpoint the moment when feminism took over the gay rights movement. Fortunately, this can be done without detailing the entire history of gay liberation. So, with all due respect to the Gay Liberation Front, the Gay Activists Alliance, the Mattachine Society and the Daughters of Bilitis, we can cruise right onto feminism's Second Wave.

In Part 2: The Takeover, we will go back to when the parasite that is feminism bullied and manipulated the gay rights movement into playing host, and demanded, as it still does, that gay men be grateful for it. This enterprise has been so successful, that many gay men today can only nod in ignorant agreement when someone like Gloria Steinem asserts that feminism and gay rights are sibling movements with complimentary goals. As we shall see, nothing could be further from the truth.

To the abusive feminist who demanded that I list all our accomplishments for men

July 13, 2015 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

One of the more common abusive, bullying tactics of feminists is to claim that MRAs only complain on the internet and don't actually do things to help people.

This is an abusive lie on multiple axes, and looks like an attempt to change the subject from feminist lies about rape, feminist lies about sexual assault, feminist lies about child abuse, feminist lies about fathers, and feminist abusiveness toward people in general.

In a way, this "you don't do anything but complain" bullying tactic is a good sign: they're figuring out that they have no good answers to most criticisms, and that their ideology is and always has been a minority ideology. So they feel the need to change the subject they strike a pose of "look, at least we're doing something! You do nothing!"

Never mind how much of what feminists do is hateful and destructive.

The problem with this "I demand you show to my satisfaction that you do things I consider important" is multifold. It ignores everything we've done to get innocent men out of jail, to get government officials fired, the counseling and support we give to individual men, the articles we publish to help educate the public, the money we've raised to fund people's legal defenses (Ben Radford is one famous example but there are many others), the petitions, the lobbyists we've worked with, the male birth control researchers we've worked with, the domestic violence and rape researchers we've worked with, the men's shelter groups we've worked with, and more.

But let's be clear about something else: A Voice for Men and the Men's Human Rights Movement as a whole probably operates on a budget smaller than one Domestic Violence Shelter group. Indeed, there is a Women's Shelter group, run entirely by feminists, not far from me, that has nearly a $4 million annual budget. Those millions are just for its one county in one medium-sized state in the US. Half a million$ annually is earmarked just for activism and education, in addition to the hefty salaries of those who run the joint.

We by comparison still have to have day jobs and do this stuff in our spare time, with maybe one or two people total who manage to survive–on very meager earnings–through their internet advocacy.

So this demand by feminists that we prove we do things to help men, with a list that feminists will approve of no less: It's an effort to change the subject. They have no actual interest in helping anyone but themselves, which is very obvious by their words and their deeds, and they actively work to stop and censor anyone who is working to address these issues from a non-feminist perspective.

The "show us what you do" thing is also breathtakingly arrogant: you, who do nothing to help men and boys' issues, who are part of a movement that actively combats efforts to address these issues, now demand that I do activism your way and to your approval–even though you actively work to thwart my activism and actively advocate harmful policies and repeat debunked lies about boys and men and debunked lies about the people I work with.

You, who spew lies about what I do, demand that I report to your satisfaction how I do my activism? Fuck you.

And I won't even dignify your claim that I do nothing.

So seriously, to your "you don't do anything!" bullshit? Pull the other one.

By the way, let's pretend for a minute that you are 100% right, that I do nothing, that A Voice for Men does nothing, that the Men's Rights Movement does nothing but complain.

Are our complaints wrong? Why are you talking about us, when the subject was human rights violations? Are we not allowed to bring up human and civil rights issues if we don't do activism your way, dancing to your tune?

We identify real abuses, real lies, real people who are hurt. And you're changing the subject to us and what you perceive as our flaws. What does that say about you as a person, or about your movement?

To my friends who are nice feminists

July 13, 2015 | by Dean Esmay | Link | Original Link

Yes I have friends who are feminists. How could I not? I'm an ex-feminist after all–although I'm sure some feminists will want to check me for having always harbored evil ideas that made me "not a true feminist" or somehow otherwise secretly impure. Isn't it amazing how people keep using the phrase "true feminist" in order to just dismiss all feminist misdeeds, all feminist lies?

"Well, they weren't real feminists." Fuck you. Yes they were.

I'm sorry you don't like it if I tell you feminism is and always has been a hate movement, but, feminism is and always has been a hate movement. A racist, sexist, vitriolic, irrational hate movement that is fascist and bullying to its very core.

In the 1970s friends of mine were facing bomb and death threats, censorship, and harassment. It has not changed in the 40 years since then–please stop lying and saying it's different now, because it isn't.

Feminism as a movement has taken billions of dollars and still runs on billions of dollars; this is why constant comparisons to the cash-poor, grassroots MHRM is stupid. (Well, it's one of several reasons why that's a dumb comparison, anyway.)

Feminism lies about domestic violence. It lies about rape. It lies about families. It lies about fathers. It lies about little boys. It lies about girls. It lies about women. It lies about history.

Feminism bullies. It bullies women who won't toe the line. It bullies men who won't toe the line. It bullies children who question its precepts.

Every time a feminist repeats racist hateful lies about "patriarchy" or "rape culture" and you don't identify both those ideas as toxic pseudoscience based on hateful, bigoted preconceptions, you enable that toxic, bullying, pseudo-scientific hate movement.

So. Given that I really believe every one of these things, let me tell you something:

I'm 49 and I've been reading about feminism probably longer than you've been alive. First wave, second wave, third wave, sex positive, anarcho-feminist, individualist feminist, equity feminist, marxist feminist–stop being a condescending bully and pretending I just don't understand these things and consider the possibility that it is me who has things to teach you not the other way around.

If you're a feminist, it is 99% likely you believe some of the hateful lies. I've only met a handful of feminists who really do reject the lies, and I frequently ask them: in recognizing hateful bigoted feminist lies, why do you still call yourself one? You're enabling a multibillion$$ hate movement by doing so.

But my friends, the real friends, they have their reasons, and while I don't understand them–it looks like nothing more than an emotional tie to a word, like not wanting to give up calling yourself a Baptist or something–I accept that they wish to continue identifying as part of a bullying, censoring, racist, fascist hate movement and irrational pseudoreligious cult. But they accept that this is what I think about their movement.

And no, I will not sugarcoat my opinions to make them happy. They either accept that these are my conclusions or they don't. The smart ones know better than to argue, and know how to accept disagreement like mature adults.

So. If you are a feminist who can accept these are my conclusions based on decades of experience and research, then I will accept that you are part of this thing that I consider an ugly malignant hate movement and still talk to you. In other words, I will accept you if you accept me.

But I will not accept it if you repeat feminist lies in front of me. I will respond every single time. If you don't want my response, don't spout feminist hate-garbage when I'm around.

Every feminist who makes snotty remarks about my supposed ignorance or my supposed need to educate myself about feminism mostly makes me chuckle. Ditto the frequent feminist attacks on my personal life, attempts to sex-shame me, snarks about my children, about my wife or my ex-wife (who both support what I do), about my supposed agenda (you know, my actual equal rights agenda) just cements my view that feminism is a toxic hate movement that hurts pretty much everybody it touches. Even the ones who benefit from it are slowly poisoned by it.

And every time you open your mouth and start saying that I "just don't understand feminism" or "not all feminists are like that" I respect you just a little bit less as a person, and view you as just a little bit more shameful, a little more shallow, a little more selfish and thoughtless.

And that's all. I'm not a feminist. I never will be one again, and I actively oppose it. Accept it and stay to talk with me of other things, or go away. It works for me either way.

Male doctors make less than female doctors

July 13, 2015 | by Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) | Link | Original Link

[Ed. note: this article originally appeared at Examiner.com, but has been unpublished for violations of AP style.]

A study in the Journal of the American Medical Association reports that male doctors are earning considerably more than female doctors, and a second study of Medicare reimbursements confirms that men are out-earning women by an astonishing 88% in annual Medicare reimbursements. In terms of gross income, male doctors out-earn female ones, but a closer examination of the data reveals that on a per service delivered model, female doctors earn more than their male counterparts.

There are several explanations for this large gap in earnings between men and women in the medical profession, none of which have anything to do with sexism or misogyny, contrary to claims made by feminist media commentators. Male physicians see approximately 60% more patients than women: 512/yr versus 320/yr, respectively. Male physicians also deliver more services per patient, chalking up 5.7 services billed per patient compared to women's 4.7. This gap held true across almost all specialities, with men delivering more services per patient than women. Assuming all services are medically necessary, male doctors deliver better healthcare than women to each patient.

Male doctors earn an average of $118, 782/yr from medicare. Multiplying 513 patients by 5.7 services (2924 services provided in total) and dividing the annual income by this number gives us a per service fee of $40.62. Female doctors earn an average of $63, 346, providing 4.7 services to 320 patients (1504 services provided in total) for an average per service fee of $42.11. Women doctors earn $1.49 more per service rendered than men.

In Canada, the UK and the US, there is a looming shortage of primary care physicians, also known as general practitioners or family doctors, because these non-specialized forms of medicine appeal to women doctors, who also prefer to work part time or not at all when they have young children. Dr. Brian Day, the head of the Canadian Medical Association notes that women doctors 'will not work the same hours or have the same lifespan of contributions to the medical system as males', exacerbating a medical system already strained by baby-boomer demographics. Since nearly half of all women doctors marry other doctors, they are not compelled by economic circumstances to provide for their families, permitting women doctors to work greatly reduced hours, by choice. According to an article published in the Annuals of Internal Medicine, 'differences [between men and women and hours worked] reflect personal choices that will increasingly affect the profession as more physicians marry physicians.'

Most of the so-called wage gap comes down to women's personal choices, and men's willingness to contribute more to their families in terms of earned income, which is neither sexist nor misogynist. When Forbes Magazine surveyed working women in America, an astonishing 84% of women agreed that staying home was a 'luxury' they aspired to, indicating that the wage gap may be a privilege for women – the privilege of not being required to contribute to a family financially to the full extent of her ability. For women doctors, this privilege is compounded not only by having the luxury of choice, but in earning more money per service delivered than men, who work longer hours, see more patients, and deliver more services to patients overall.

The wage gap in medicine, measured in terms of services rendered, disadvantages men, not women.

Feminists almost ruin Game of Thrones conversation at ComicCon (video)

Feminists are so utterly self-centered and prone to ruin every conversation it boggles the mind.

Bill Cosby’s victims? Or just a bunch of drug whoring star fuckers?

July 14, 2015 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

I heard it so many years ago, I forget if it was a joke or a story I was told that actually happened. Either way, it goes like this.

An average looking guy is at a party. In his lap is a small mirror holding two massive lines of cocaine, a razor blade and a short, metal straw. The coke came from a bag full of white powder that was bulging out of his shirt pocket.

A quite fetching young woman spotted him (and his cocaine) and crossed the room to sit right next to him just as he was Hoovering up one of the lines. She sat so close that one of her shapely thighs was pressed against his leg. She smiled and leaned in a little closer.

“That looks great,” she said, speaking of the single, sparkling white line that remained on the mirror.

“Yeah,” he said, “It’s some really decent shit.” He did not so much as look at her. He picked up the razor and started chopping at the remaining line, shaping it and reducing it to a finer powder.

The woman moved even closer into his space. He could feel her breath on his neck.

“So,” he said, “What do you do for a living?”

The woman giggled. “I’m a stew,” she said, and reached up to stroke the man’s forearm.

“You must make good money at that,” the man replied.

With a bright smile the woman said, “Well, yeah. I do.”

Suddenly the man leaned over and made the last line disappear in an instant.

“Well,” he said, “You ought to make enough to buy your own coke.”

I heard that story maybe 30 years ago. In a way, it was my first exposure to the red pill. And today it comes back to visit me in much the same way.

In the latest round of trial by media for Bill Cosby, the “stunning” revelation now alleged is that he gave women Quaaludes with the expectation it would help him score sex.

My response: Big fucking whoop. Women have been trading gash for stash for as long as I can remember, and they still are.

Saying that Bill Cosby gave women ludes to loosen them up for sex is about as worthy of pointing out as the likelihood is that those women loosened Cosby’s grip on his drugs by sticking their tits in his face.

Like it or not, drugs are chick magnets. Of course, I will figuratively grit my teeth and point out that not all women are like this. Indeed, not nearly all women do drugs at all, including a bunch of them who would fuck Bill Cosby simply because he is Bill Cosby. And including the women who would fuck Bill Cosby simply because he has been accused of sexual violence.

Of course, whatever actually happened between the sudden explosion of Cosby accusers and the 78 year old comedian is a matter of pure speculation. Nothing, absolutely nothing has been proven as a matter of due process. In that sense, as of today he is demonstrably innocent of all charges.

Where speculation turns to certainty is the fact that there is a healthy percentage of women who are just fine with the idea that dick comes with drugs.

We even saw evidence of it rear its head back in December of 2012, in the Twitter feed of Sophia Guo, one of the great unwashed idiots who felt threatened by men speaking without her approval. It came in the aftermath of the Warren Farrell protest.

This little gem says a lot about how Guo gets her blow.

[image]

Think and say what you want about Bill Cosby, the quintessence of drug culture sexual hookups is product for poontang. And we all know that rich, famous celebrity dudes with pockets full of money and drugs have an incredibly hard time finding women who will whore themselves out for any one of those three symbols of status. Cosby had them all.

My guess is that the only thing happening here is that the lowbrow party girls that glommed onto Bill Cosby and spread like warm peanut butter are just coming back for more.

Did Bill Cosby use his fame, fortune and pharmaceuticals to grease the wheels of his sex life? Probably yes, I think. That is the kind of grease that a lot of women yearn to bathe in.

It is also interesting that all but one or two of the long list of alleged victims are now so far past their sexual shelf-life that they could not trade sex for a ten dollar bag of Mexican schweg.

Double dipping the Cosby Cash may well be all some of them have.

When and if Bill Cosby is ever convicted of an actual crime, I will chime in on bashing him, right alongside the idiots who think waiting for a trial is too inconvenient.

Til then, all I see in this is a bunch of greedy women who commoditized their bodies like groupies who managed to get backstage at a rock concert.

Nothing new here, folks. Same as it ever was.

Interview With Willie Meggs, State Attorney for Leon County, On DeAndre Johnson Case

July 14, 2015 | by Ty Henry | Link | Original Link

State Attorney Willie Meggs (Courtesy ESPN)
Friday Morning, July 10, I secured a short interview with Willie Meggs, the long tenured State Attorney for Leon County. His jurisdiction includes the City of Tallahassee and as such, he makes the decision on whether to charge residents of the city, which includes athletes from Florida State University. As some may recall, it was his decision not to prosecute Jameis Winston, a decision for which he was widely reviled by many corners of sports and national media who chose to hide behind their interpretation of his "Lack of seriousness" at the press conference announcing the decision. Left out of that analysis, however, was his contemporaneous and aggressive sexual assault prosecution of starting wide receiver Greg Dent, as well as previous prosecutions of FSU football players.

I wrote an analysis of the case for AVFM here.

In the wake of the De'Andre Johnson case, Meggs' office again finds itself at the center of media discourse on gender violence. Johnson was involved in an altercation at a local bar on June 24 which ended with him striking a female patron to her face. In the interest of providing clarity for AVFM readers and the issues which concern our board, I wanted to get some answers from his office on key aspects of the case and, more importantly, the decision-making process in deciding who to charge, and with what.

To my pleasant surprise, Meggs graciously took my call himself. His comportment was every bit the direct but courtly southern gentleman of law figure he cuts on television. Engaging, honest, friendly, firm, and quick-minded. He was quick to interject to correct where he felt we "had it wrong," but never in a rude way.

The following are some key highlights of the interview.

What are the potential penalties facing Mr. Johnson, and how are cases such as his usually disposed of for a first offender.

Meggs: Well, for 1st degree battery, the maximum penalty is a year in the county jail. Now, there are two types of battery in these cases. The first, is to touch or strike another without consent. The other is to strike with the intent to cause harm. Now it's hard for me to say how cases typically are disposed because we weigh a variety of factors when charging: capability of the victim to defend; age; size; for example, how old are you?

Me: 42

Meggs: OK, so if you hauled off and battered a six-year-old, we'd put your fannie in jail [laughs on both ends of the call]

Speaking of children, some of our readers and staff feel based on the footage that maybe the woman should have also been charged, based on the footage, because they were both "acting like children"[Meggs firmly but politely interjects]

Meggs: Well, you're wrong on that. Now it's not illegal to be wrong, and everyone has a right to be wrong, and that includes (Johnson attorney Jose) Baez (who said the footage shows Johnson was not the "initial aggressor"), Sean Hannity, and even your editorial board. But those are not the facts of the case as we see it. People have a right to defend themselves from a battery

[Note: Meggs stated the previous day to the Tallahassee Democrat that the woman was defending herself, and "entitled" to throw a punch, and "did not commit a crime and therefore will not be charged with a crime"]

In your eyes, with regard to the charging decision, what was the initial "battery" by Johnson?

Meggs: Hitting someone in the nose

I meant before that. You stated she was defending herself from a battery. Which of the initial acts constituted a battery? Was it the initial jostle? Him grabbing her arm to prevent her closed fist from hitting him? And what is a proportional response to the threat from a balled fist?

Meggs: We're not gonna try the case in the papers, We're gonna try the case in a court of law. Some may want to try the case in outside of court, but that's not what we're going to do.

On an editorial note, it's my opinion you were treated unfairly by the national media in the Winston case. If you were the Florida St. toadie they made you out to be, you would not have charged the 7 or 8 athletes you have in the past.

Meggs: Well I appreciate that. It's part of what I've come to expect with the job. Not to say that I like it, but I understand. You know, when we have a football player [get into trouble] I like to say it's like putting a spoonful of scalding hot soup in your mouth;whatever you do next is gonna be wrong.

UPDATE: Yet another Florida State player is wanted in connection with another assault on a woman in a separate incident. Meggs has issued a warrant for the arrest of running back Dalvin Cook. The report from mark Schlabach is here.

Why do women leave tech? (video)

More than half of women leave tech because of sexism and a hostile environment? Skeptorr has a few other theories as to why women acquire in demand credentials and then refuse to capitalize on them.

Egalitarianism is a Men’s Rights project according to PBS Idea Channel

July 14, 2015 | by AVfM Video Source | Link | Original Link

Update: For AVfM’s official statement on this matter, see We agree with Mike Rugnetta & PBS Ideas.

Quoting notorious bigot Helen Lewis, PBS Idea channel has declared that:

1) All criticism of feminism justifies feminism
2) Feminism is not egalitarianism
3) Egalitarianism is a Men’s Rights project.

We 100% agree with #2, but we think #3 is backwards: Men’s Rights is an egalitarian project, while feminism is an anti-egalitarian project.

Anyway, they really did say all this on PBS Idea Channel. Just watch:

We want to thank PBS Idea Channel for both finally admitting feminism’s true nature as an anti-egalitarian movement, and for admitting that feminists view men’s human rights as something to be fought against.

Feminism is not the World. We are!

July 15, 2015 | by Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) | Link | Original Link

The feminists have a high opinion of themselves, but many others don't share that opinion, and those others have formed the project of taking feminism down a few pegs. I will enlarge upon this.

The root of the present struggle is that most feminists think feminism is the world, or is entitled to become the world. Feminist thinking is triumphalist, transformationalist and totalitarian, and feminism is proposed as a social engineering project that will alter every aspect of life down to the last molecule.

And how do they muster the needful arrogance for such a project? By sheer collective narcissism. They have convinced themselves that feminism is an absolute evolutionary good in terms of what it proposes, and they have based their temerity upon a model of reality that is wildly askew from how the world actually works.

They are gazing at the rest of the world as if into a mirror of their own ideas, so that everything they see reflects only what their fantasy requires them to see. Yes, they are staring at a reflection of themselves, and if that is not narcissism then I have no better idea what to call it.

But wait. On second thought, I do have a better name for it. I will call it feminist subjectivism.

Imagine a house in the middle of a town, with a group of noisy, dirty people living inside. These noisy, dirty people are a continual nuisance with their loud disturbances, and furthermore they are forever throwing garbage out the windows and emptying pisspots in wild disregard to pedestrians in the street below. And from time to time, these people are known to go about in the town spreading gossip and false information, and stirring up social trouble.

I say it is unnecessary to enter that house and go from room to room, or to strike up a fond acquaintance with all of the inhabitants. We are fully entitled to form some evaluation of the house and its denizens purely on the strength of what we can ascertain from the exterior. We mightn't know much, or care to know, about the life within those walls, but that does not compromise the objective truth of what we can plainly see from where we stand. We might even accept that there are some charming, sensitive artists living in that house, without compromising the truth of what we know about the situation in general. Our outside knowledge is as much knowledge, in an absolute sense, as what the insiders might correctively insist on telling us. In our own way, we are as much qualified to talk about those people and their house as they are.

When they presume to tell YOU what feminism is, they are presuming to hold an authority greater than yours. They are telling you that your wealth of observation and reflection is of no account and may be simply brushed aside.

But feminist house and its inhabitants are not the world, and we are no-wise obligated to throw away what we can plainly see about them, while accepting as truth only what they say about themselves. Nor, mark this well, are we bound to un-know what we know about ourselves and accept as truth only what they say about us!

Such is feminist subjectivism: the delusion that only a feminist may tell the rest of the world what feminism is. But as non-feminists — meaning, as the rest of the world — we occupy an entirely different epistemic standpoint. And we may speak, think, and draw conclusions with the full authority which our standpoint confers upon us. The feminists have got one hell of a nerve telling us that we don't understand what feminism is, since we can very plainly SEE what feminism is. Yes, they are trying to steal our eyes!

And this gets worse. For when the feminists pretend to a monopoly on self-definition, they also claim an exclusive right to define the rest of the world. And why? Because, in order to make their self-definition operate correctly, they must spin a contextualizing narrative about everybody else. In plain English, they have no choice but to lie about the rest of the world in order to maintain their story about who-and-what they themselves are. It is the classic cycle which any psychologist — professional or otherwise — will straight away know for what it is: you tell a lie, then tell a second lie to cover the first, and then a third and a fourth, and on it goes!

That explains why feminism must forever grow and grow in a process of perpetual revolution. In fact, feminism absolutely cannot stop growing until it colonizes every speck of the universe beyond itself. But the time is fast approaching when this growth will become unsustainable. And when that day arrives, the collapse will be breathtaking and, if you are a feminist yourself, harsh and brutal.
